Galen said even lawmakers in seemingly safe districts, and those "who don't have a reputation for being fast and loose with the rules," could be vulnerable if voters rise up in reproach "and everybody drops five or six points" in this year's midterm contests.

Abramoff, a former $100,000-plus fundraiser for President Bush with close ties to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, pleaded guilty on Tuesday to conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud. That cleared the way for his cooperation with federal prosecutors in bringing charges against former business and political associates.

The investigation is believed to involve up to 20 members of Congress and aides and possibly several administration officials.

The timing couldn't be worse, politically, especially for Republicans. Lawmakers who may be indicted could find themselves coming to trial this summer, just ahead of the midterm elections. Around the same time, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is expected to stand trial in the CIA leak case.

DeLay, who had to step down as majority leader in September after a grand jury in Texas indicted him in a campaign finance investigation, is awaiting a trial date. And former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., gave up his seat Dec. 1 after admitting he had accepted $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors.

DOJ_NMG_0007798

With so many trials and prosecutions in the works, speculation is swirling over whom Abramoff might bring down and on the possible fallout for others.

"Most seats in Congress are relatively safe this year. But they are not safe from a tsunami," said University of Virginia political scientist Larry Sabato, author of a book on political scandals. "Iraq, plus economic problems, plus these scandals, could produce a tsunami. That's what every incumbent on Capitol Hill has to fear."

Most Americans are convinced that corruption reaching into all levels of government is a deeply rooted problem. According to an AP-Ipsos poll last month, 88 percent say the problem is a serious one, with 51 percent calling it "very serious."

People need to know "that government is not for sale," Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said in pledging to pursue the investigation "wherever it goes."

For months, federal prosecutors have focused on whether Abramoff defrauded his Indian tribal clients of millions of dollars and used improper influence on members of Congress. Tribes represented by the lobbyist contributed millions of dollars in casino income to congressional campaigns.

Abramoff also took members of Congress on lavish overseas trips and provided sports tickets, golf fees, frequent meals, entertainment and jobs for lawmakers' relatives and aides.

Some lawmakers have already returned contributions. Others no doubt are nervously scouring their memories and appointment books.

For years, many lawmakers have shrugged off lobbyists' gifts as campaign contributions, harmless wining, dining and socializing. "Now you've got someone admitting exactly what the motivation was and explaining all the avenues they used," said Kent Cooper, a former Federal Election Commission official.

"You're talking about standard operating procedure here in Washington suddenly being turned on its head and a key operator signing a plea agreement that he may have been involved in some kind of public corruption," said Cooper, who tracks lobbying and campaign contributions for the nonpartisan Political Money Line service.

The Democratic National Committee called the situation the latest installment of a Republican "culture of corruption." That notion was disputed by White House spokesman Scott McClellan, who denounced Abramoff's activities as "outrageous" and noted that the lobbyist and his clients contributed to both parties.

That may be so, said Norman Ornstein, a political analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, "but it will disproportionately affect Republicans. They are the majority party and because Abramoff is a conservative Republican."

Case Bringing New Scrutiny To A System And A Profession (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

The biggest corruption scandal to infect Congress in a generation took down one of the best-connected lobbyists in Washington yesterday. The questions echoing around the capital were what other careers -- and what other familiar ways of doing business -- are endangered.

Jack Abramoff represented the most flamboyant and extreme example of a brand of influence trading that flourished after the Republican takeover of the House of Representatives 11 years ago. Now, some GOP strategists fear that the fallout from his case could affect the party's efforts to keep control in the November midterm elections.

Abramoff was among the lobbyists most closely associated with the K Street Project, which was initiated by his friend Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), now the former House majority leader, once the GOP vaulted to power. It was an aggressive program designed to force corporations and trade associations to hire more GOP-connected lobbyists in what at times became an almost seamless relationship between Capitol Hill lawmakers and some firms that sought to influence them.

Now Abramoff has become a symbol of a system out of control. His agreement to plead guilty to three criminal counts and cooperate with prosecutors threatens to ensnare other lawmakers or their aides -- Republicans and possibly some Democrats. At a minimum, yesterday's developments put both sides of the lawmaker-lobbyist relationship on notice that some of the wilder customs of recent years -- lubricated with money, entertainment and access -- carry higher risks. In the post-Abramoff era, what once was accepted as business as usual may be seen as questionable or worse.

"In the short run, members of Congress will get allergic to lobbyists," said former representative Vin Weber (R-Minn.), now a lobbyist for Clark & Weinstock. "They'll be nervous about taking calls and holding meetings, to say nothing of lavish trips to Scotland. Those will be out. For a period of time now, members of Congress will be concerned about even legitimate contact with the lobbying world."

The initial impact of a scandal that earlier produced a guilty plea from Abramoff associate Michael Scanlon could be changes in the way lawmakers and lobbyists interact. In the longer term, said many lobbyists and others, Congress will be pressured to revisit and toughen rules on gifts and travel that lawmakers and members of their staffs may accept. Some former lawmakers said even bigger changes may be needed to restore public confidence in how Washington works.

Former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who with Weber's help effectively used issues of corruption to wrest control of the House from the Democrats in 1994, said the Abramoff scandal should trigger a broader review in Congress of the way politicians finance campaigns and deal with lobbyists.

"I'm going to talk at length about the need for us to rethink not just lobbying but the whole process of elections, incumbency protection and the way in which the system has evolved," he said. "Which is very different from the way the American system is supposed to be like. I think Abramoff is just part of a large pattern that has got to be rethought."

Emotions ran high on K Street yesterday when news of Abramoff's plea deal began to break. "The Abramoff scandal is causing a reexamination of what lobbyists do in town," said R. Bruce Josten, executive vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "I wouldn't be surprised to see lawmakers become cautious in meetings with lobbyists."

With an eye on November's elections, Republicans have sought to limit the damage to themselves by portraying the scandal as bipartisan, describing Abramoff as an equal-opportunity dispenser of campaign cash and largess.

So far, the public has not identified corruption as solely a Republican problem. A Washington Post-ABC News poll in November asked Americans whether they thought Democrats or Republicans were better on ethical matters; 16 percent said Democrats, 12 percent said Republicans, and 71 percent said there was not much difference between the parties.

But Republicans worry about two possibilities. The first is that Abramoff, known for his close ties to DeLay, mostly implicates Republicans as a result of his plea agreement. That could shift public attitudes sharply against the GOP. "People are uneasy about what else is out there," said one GOP strategist who requested anonymity to speak more candidly about the possible political fallout.

Beyond that is a fear that the scandal and attention it could draw in the months before the election might further sour the public on Washington and Congress. As the party in power, Republicans know they stand to lose more if voters take retribution in November.

Regardless of the electoral implications, the Abramoff scandal may force changes on Capitol Hill in the form of tough new lobbying disclosure laws that even some lobbying advocates say it is time to consider. "There will be a push for increased oversight and disclosure of lobbying," said Douglas G. Pinkham, president of the Public Affairs Council, a lobbyist education group. "There needs to be greater transparency and better enforcement."

Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), who co-wrote campaign finance changes a few years ago, have introduced separate proposals that would crack down hard on lobbying as now practiced. Their ideas will serve as the starting point for what is expected to be a vigorous debate.

Some lobbyists reacted defensively yesterday, at pains to say that Abramoff was an exception to the way they do business. "The Abramoff style is so far afield from the normal course of business as to be irrelevant to me and probably most people in my line of work," said Joel Johnson, a Clinton White House official and now a lobbyist for the Glover Park Group.

"The whole Abramoff matter is atypical," agreed Ed Rogers of Barbour Griffith & Rogers. "It is not a lesson of how business is done in Washington."

John Jonas, a lobbyist at Patton Boggs, said he expects "less partying, less gifting, more awareness about compliance" with rules that have been "observed in the breach."

As for the perception of lobbying as a profession, "it's confirmed everybody's worst fears about lobbyists -- that they double-deal, that they're not aboveboard," Jonas said. "That hurts the legitimate practice of the profession."

DOJ_NMG_0007800

Gingrich said Republican leaders in Congress should take the initiative to reform lobbying and campaign finance, rather than hoping to slip quietly past the current scandal. "Things have to be done to really rethink where the center of the political process is," he said. "Right now, the center is a lobbying and PAC [political action committee] system center, which is not healthy."

GOP Leaders Seek Distance From Abramoff (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

With a House Republican committee chairman implicated in the criminal case and the highest echelons of the Republican Party increasingly vulnerable to charges, GOP leaders moved yesterday to distance themselves from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and prepare to combat a growing corruption scandal.

Hours after Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion charges, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) announced that he will donate to charity the tens of thousands of dollars that he has received from Abramoff's Indian tribe clients. Top Republican strategists pushed GOP leaders to embrace legislation to curb the influence of lobbyists.

And former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) called on House Republicans to elect a new majority leader to permanently replace Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), Abramoff's most powerful ally in Washington, who faces a trial on unrelated criminal charges of violating Texas campaign laws.

"Unequivocally, the House Republicans need to select a new majority leader in late January or early February," said Gingrich, who cited revelations in The Washington Post that a public advocacy group organized by DeLay associates had been largely financed by Russian energy interests.

The plea agreement signed by Abramoff yesterday implicates only one lawmaker, Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), but it indicates that future revelations would ensnare other public officials. The agreement refers broadly to trips, campaign contributions and entertainment offered to public officials "in exchange for agreements that the public officials would use their official positions and influence" for Abramoff's benefit. That suggests there were specific quid pro quos that could yield additional charges of bribery and public corruption.

Ney, the chairman of the House Administration Committee, which oversees the operations of the House, is never referenced by name, although Ney's spokesman confirmed that Ney is the "Representative #1" repeatedly mentioned in court documents outlining Abramoff's wrongdoing. The court documents depict "Representative #1" as accepting lavish gifts of travel, meals, entertainment and campaign contributions, then awarding congressional contracts to Abramoff's clients, inserting a statement of support in the Congressional Record, and even obtaining a travel visa for a relative of one of Abramoff's clients while in Russia on official business.

Ney spokesman Brian Walsh denied the charges, saying any official actions Ney had taken were based on "the merits and facts of the situation and not because of any improper influence from Jack Abramoff or anybody else."

"At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Ney said in a statement.

Republican strategists expressed some relief that the damage could be limited. Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said that if Abramoff's revelations ensnare only one lawmaker and some unknown staff members, Democrats will have little chance of sparking a political revolt when voters go to the polls in November to elect a new Congress.

But now that Abramoff has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors in exchange for a lighter prison sentence, he could provide testimony highly damaging to other high-level lawmakers. DeLay is not mentioned, but court documents do single out his former deputy chief of staff, Tony C. Rudy. The documents detail 10 monthly payments totaling $50,000 that went to the wife of an aide identified as "Staffer A." In exchange, that aide, identified elsewhere as Rudy, helped torpedo Internet gambling legislation and a postal-rate increase, according to Abramoff's plea agreement.

Moreover, numerous references to Abramoff-financed trips to Scotland and the Northern Mariana Islands raised anew questions about DeLay's own trips to both locations with Abramoff.

Dick DeGuerin, an attorney for DeLay, said he is not concerned about the Abramoff investigation. DeLay has offered to cooperate with the Justice Department probe and has not been called in, he said.

"If Jack Abramoff tells the truth, what he'll do is clear the air, and everyone will see there's no connection between Jack Abramoff's money-dealing and Tom DeLay," DeGuerin said.

Yesterday, Travis County prosecutor Ronnie Earle, who has been overseeing the probe into illegal corporate donations in Texas, tried to find that connection by sending subpoenas to Abramoff's two former employers in Washington, seeking documents and any correspondence involving DeLay and certain contributions by Abramoff clients.

The subpoenas are based on evidence that the law firm Preston Gates Ellis LLP and several Abramoff clients, including the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, made donations to Texans for a Republican Majority, a political action committee organized by DeLay and his associates. That committee has been indicted on charges of illegally using corporate funds, and Earle now appears to be seeking information on what the donors expected to get in return for their payments.

Even before the plea agreement was unveiled, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had circulated a 1997 quote from DeLay hailing Abramoff as "one of my closest and dearest friends."

"Tom DeLay was majority leader of the House of Representatives," said DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), "and Tom DeLay said Jack Abramoff was his best friend, nobody else."

But Democrats could be ensnared by the Abramoff case, as well. The lobbyist oversaw at the law firm Greenberg Traurig LLP a team of two dozen lobbyists that included many Democrats. The biggest beneficiaries of campaign contributions directed by the Abramoff team included such high-ranking Democrats as then-Sen. Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.), Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) and Rep. Patrick J. Kennedy (R.I.), a former head of the House Democrats' campaign committee.

Some key Republican strategists have complained that GOP leaders have been slow in responding to a scandal that has been unfolding for months and in holding internal elections to permanently replace DeLay in the House leadership.

With Abramoff's plea, that may change. In November, The Post detailed a fundraiser held by Hastert at one of Abramoff's restaurants that netted from the lobbyist's law firm and tribal clients at least $21,500 for the speaker's political action committee. Since then, numerous lawmakers from both parties have returned such donations, but only yesterday did Hastert join the line.

"While these contributions were legal, he believes that it is appropriate to donate the money to charity," said Ron Bonjean, Hastert's spokesman.

Lobbying Plan Was Central To GOP's Political Strategy (LAT)

By Janet Hook And Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The corruption investigation surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff shows the significant political risk that Republican leaders took when they adopted what had once seemed a brilliant strategy for dominating Washington: turning the K Street lobbying corridor into a cog of the GOP political machine.

Abramoff thrived in the political climate fostered by GOP leaders, including Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), who have methodically tried to tighten the links between the party in Congress and business lobbyists, through what has become known as the "K Street Project."

GOP leaders, seeking to harness the financial and political support of K Street, urged lobbyists to support their conservative agenda, give heavily to Republican politicians and hire Republicans for top trade association jobs. Abramoff obliged on every front, and his tentacles of influence reached deep into the upper echelons of Congress and the Bush administration.

Now, in the wake of a plea agreement in which Abramoff will cooperate in an influence-peddling investigation that might target a number of lawmakers, some Republicans are saying that the party will need to take action to avoid being tarnished.

"This is going to be a huge black eye for our party," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), a senior member close to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "Denny's going to have to be very tough and really speak out against people who are indicted. He's going to have to do it quickly and decisively and frequently."

Hastert moved Tuesday to inoculate himself from the scandal by announcing that he would give to charity about $60,000 he received from Abramoff and his clients. He is the latest of several lawmakers who have returned or redirected money they received from Abramoff-related sources.

One Senate Republican aide, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Republicans soon will unveil ethics reform legislation in an effort to blunt criticism from Democrats that they have fostered a "culture of corruption" in Washington.

The controversy may also increase the prospect that Republicans will shake up their leadership after Congress reconvenes at the end of January. House Republican moderates are calling for new leadership elections to permanently replace DeLay, who stepped down temporarily as majority leader after he was indicted in an unrelated case.

"Let's get a permanent leadership and begin moving forward and overcome the problems that are on the table right now," said Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership, a caucus of GOP moderates in Congress.

Conservatives are worried about possible political fallout for all Republicans, not just those who might be implicated, once Abramoff starts cooperating with prosecutors.

"This is the one thing that could result in a change in who controls the Congress," said Paul Weyrich, a conservative activist.

Abramoff pleaded guilty Tuesday to corruption charges in connection with allegations that he bilked his Indian tribe clients and conspired to bribe a member of Congress. He also will plead guilty to charges in a separate case in Miami, in connection with a deal to buy a floating casino fleet, SunCruz Casinos.

Although Abramoff admitted Tuesday to illegal conduct in some of his dealings, much of what he did to influence Congress amounted to larger-than-life versions of legal practices common among lobbyists.

Abramoff did not just ply lawmakers with meals; he opened a restaurant and plied them with his meals. He did not simply hand out tickets to sporting events; he offered access to several luxury skyboxes. He did not arrange garden-variety golf outings; he brought golfers to the world's most exclusive courses.

"The connections between Congress, congressional staff and lobbyists have been a problem for many years," said Dennis Thompson, author of the book "Ethics in Congress."

"In the last few years it's gotten out of control," Thompson said. "But Abramoff has taken it to a new level."

For investigators, the question is whether any lawmakers returned Abramoff's favors by using their offices to benefit him or his clients, which could violate federal law.

Critics of the campaign finance system say it would be a kind of rough justice if Republicans were hobbled by their relationships with a lobbyist, because they worked so hard to increase coordination between their party and K Street.

Republicans said their efforts were no different than what Democrats did for years to raise money and organize support from their constituencies, including labor unions and civil rights advocates. But Democratic critics said the GOP went much further in linking political money to policy outcomes, and that Abramoff was a master at maneuvering in a system that required lobbyists to "pay to play" on Capitol Hill.

"Jack Abramoff is a classic example of the pay-to-play system carried out in the extreme," said Fred Wertheimer, head of Democracy 21, a campaign-finance watchdog group.

According to a study by the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics, 296 members of Congress since 1999 have received contributions from Abramoff, his Indian tribe clients or SunCruz Casinos. Abramoff and his wife contributed $204,253 — all of it to Republicans.

In addition, Abramoff also leaned on his Indian clients to give to key lawmakers. The center found that Abramoff's clients gave almost $4.2 million, more than half to Republicans.

His most famous golf outings took members, including DeLay and Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), to the fabled St. Andrews course in Scotland. Such trips are against House rules if they are paid for by a lobbyist. DeLay and Ney said they believed the trips were properly paid for by a nonprofit group, but prosecutors are reportedly looking at whether Abramoff initially picked up some of the expenses.

DOJ_NMG_0007803

Favors done for DeLay and Ney have drawn particular scrutiny because they took aggressive steps to help Abramoff or his clients on issues that seemed remote from their own constituents' interests. When Abramoff was trying to buy the Florida floating casino fleet, Ney inserted a statement in the Congressional Record critical of Abramoff's rival.

Abramoff had been hired to stall legislation raising the minimum wage for the U.S.-administered Northern Mariana Islands in the Pacific Ocean, and DeLay was credited with helping him do so. DeLay also was an ally in Abramoff's effort to fight legislation to allow the taxation of Indian tribe gaming revenue.

DeLay and Ney, like other lawmakers who helped Abramoff, said they took action on the merits, not because they received favors from him.

The last time Washington lobbying came under such broad legal scrutiny was in the Abscam scandal of 1980, when an FBI sting operation led to the conviction of seven members of Congress on corruption charges.

That episode was widely viewed as a scandal involving isolated individuals, the proverbial "bad apples."

But some critics of the current campaign finance system say that the Abramoff scandal could have broader significance if it is seen as an indictment of a corrupt political system, not just individuals.

Abramoff Pleads Guilty, Will Cooperate (AP)

By Mark Sherman and Curt Anderson

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist who spawned a congressional corruption scandal, pleaded guilty Tuesday to three felonies and pledged to cooperate in a criminal probe edging closer to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay.

"I plead guilty, your honor," Abramoff said in flat, unemotional tones, accepting a plea bargain that said he had provided lavish trips, golf outings, meals and more to public officials "in exchange for a series of official acts."

In one case, he reported payments totaling $50,000 to the wife of a congressional aide to help block legislation for a client. The aide worked for DeLay, according to officials who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Public corruption aside, Abramoff admitted defrauding four Indian tribes and other clients, taking millions in kickbacks from a one-time business partner, misusing a charity he had established and failing to pay income taxes on millions of ill-gotten gains.

(AP) Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division Alice Fisher briefs reporters at the Justice...

Full ImageHe is expected to plead guilty to additional charges on Wednesday in Florida in connection with charges stemming from the 2000 purchase of a fleet of gambling boats.

At the Justice Department, officials said they intend to make use of the trove of e-mails and other material in Abramoff's possession as part of a probe that is believed to be focusing on as many as 20 members of Congress and aides.

"This investigation continues ... however long it takes, wherever it leads," said Alice Fisher, assistant attorney general.

Whatever the legal ramifications, there was swift political fallout at the dawn of an election year in which minority Democrats intend to make ethics a campaign issue.

In a turnabout, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., joined the roster of politicians announcing plans to donate Abramoff's campaign contributions to charity.

(AP) Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division Alice Fisher briefs reporters at the Justice...

Full ImageHouse Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said Abramoff's confession in court was "not a surprise because this Republican Congress is the most corrupt in history and the American people are paying the price."

Abramoff faces as much as 11 years in federal prison as well as fines in connection with his guilty pleas on charges of conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. The precise penalty is to be determined in part by the extent of his cooperation with prosecutors. Together with his former business partner, Michael Scanlon, he is expected to face restitution costs of $25 million.

Abramoff also will be required to pay $1.7 million for unpaid taxes, officials said.

Scanlon pleaded guilty last November to corruption charges as part of the investigation that began 21 months ago.

The Bush administration's former chief procurement official, David H. Safavian, was charged last fall with making false statements and obstructing investigations into a 2002 golf outing. He has pleaded innocent.

(AP) Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division Alice Fisher briefs reporters at the Justice...

Full ImageThe court papers released in connection with Tuesday's plea offered these glimpses into Abramoff's activities:

- On behalf of clients eager to stop internet gambling and postal rate legislation, Abramoff paid $50,000 in 10 equal monthly payments beginning in June 2000 to the wife of a congressional aide identified as Staffer A. Based on other information made public, Staffer A was Tony Rudy, at the time a top aide to DeLay. His identity was confirmed by officials who spoke only on condition of anonymity, noting that the court papers did not name the aide.

DeLay's office had no immediate comment. The congressman has previously said any actions he took on legislation were consistent with his political philosophy.

Separately, DeLay is fighting state campaign finance charges in Texas, hoping to clear himself in time to reclaim his leadership post in Congress.

- Abramoff contradicted statements by Rep. Bob Ney, saying the Ohio Republican accepted a golfing trip to Scotland in 2002 with the knowledge that the lobbyist's Indian clients were paying for it. Ney is not mentioned by name, but his identity is clear from a description of his committee chairmanship. Ney issued a statement saying, "At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature" of his activities.

(AP) Jack Abramoff leaves Federal Court in Washington Tuesday, Jan. 3, 2006. The once-powerful lobbyist...

Full Image- Abramoff also said he had made a $10,000 donation to the National Republican Campaign Committee at Ney's request, part of what the plea agreement refers to as the "corruption of public officials."

- Court documents said Abramoff solicited $50,000 from a wireless telephone company and got Ney's agreement to push the company's application to install a wireless telephone infrastructure in the House of Representatives, a job Ney's committee would have overseen.

At the Justice Department, Fisher said that in one instance, "Abramoff was so bold as to take fees to assist one client when he was actually working for another client to defeat the first client's interests." Those clients were Indian tribes were from Texas and Louisiana, and the issue involved casino gambling.

Apart from his lobbying in Congress, Abramoff raised at least $100,000 for President Bush's 2004 re-election effort, earning the honorary title "pioneer" from the campaign.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said he could not say whether Abramoff ever met Bush. McClellan said of Abramoff: "What he is reportedly acknowledging doing is unacceptable and outrageous."

(AP) Internal Revenue Service Commissioner Mark Emerson responds to questions from reporters at the...

Full Image"If laws were broken, he must be held to account for what he did," McClellan said.

Once a well-connected lobbyist able to command almost unimaginable fees - a Louisiana tribe once paid Scanlon and him more than $30 million over 26 months - Abramoff apologized after pleading guilty.

"Words will not ever be able to express my sorrow and my profound regret for all my actions and mistakes," he said. "I hope I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and those I've wronged or caused to suffer."

Pressure had been intensifying on Abramoff to strike a deal with prosecutors since another former partner, Adam Kidan, pleaded guilty last month to fraud and conspiracy in connection with the 2000 SunCruz boat deal in Florida.

Capitol Offense Guilty Plea By Lobbyist Raises Prospect Of Wider Investigation (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins, David Rogers And Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Prominent Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to three felonies and agreed to help prosecutors probing political corruption, raising the possibility of a wider investigation that could embroil powerful members of Congress.

Yet the fact that some Democrats also had dealings with Mr. Abramoff clouded the question of whether the scandal will have a sharp partisan impact in the November 2006 midterm elections.

Making the bribery case especially striking -- and worrisome for members of Congress -- is that some of its elements include transactions that occur in Washington every day. It is commonplace for lawmakers to solicit campaign donations from lobbyists, who routinely offer them in hopes of gaining advantage. Yet Mr. Abramoff also went far beyond routine practice by furnishing lawmakers with lavish trips, free meals and entertainment as well.

It remains unclear which lawmakers prosecutors are looking at, and also how persuasive Mr. Abramoff could be in helping to make potential cases against any of them stick. A onetime chairman of College Republicans -- a close ally of such party luminaries as Tom DeLay, Ralph Reed and Grover Norquist -- Mr. Abramoff says he has information that could implicate 60 lawmakers.

"The case is significant and the corruption scheme with Mr. Abramoff is very extensive," said Alice Fisher, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's criminal division, at a news conference. She said prosecutors "will continue to follow it wherever it leads."

The plea deal follows a 21-month Justice Department investigation of whether Mr. Abramoff offered lawmakers and their aides gifts in exchange for helping his lobbying clients in Congress. Besides conspiring to bribe legislators this way, Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty to bilking Indian tribes who were his lobbying clients, by arranging kickbacks from associates.

The sums he and several associates collected from Indian tribes and other clients evidently were huge. For the period 2001-2004 alone, those fees topped $80 million, investigators say. Mr. Abramoff also pleaded guilty to tax evasion.

The criminal information (used in lieu of an indictment) discussed only one legislator, citing this person as having been "provided a stream of things of value" in return for official favors. It said the things provided included campaign donations, a lavish golf trip to Scotland, tickets to sporting events and other entertainments, and regular meals at a pricey Washington restaurant called Signatures that Mr. Abramoff once owned. (See the document1.)

Though the filing didn't name the congressman, the information pointed to Rep. Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican, and his office has acknowledged that he is the one meant. Rep. Ney, chairman of the House Administration Committee, said he helped Mr. Abramoff's clients on the merits, not because of any improper influence.

Lawyers involved in the case say that prosecutors are looking at Mr. Abramoff's dealings with at least three other members of Congress and more than a dozen current and former congressional aides. That in itself would make this the broadest federal corruption case involving Congress since Abscam, more than two decades ago, which resulted in bribery convictions of six lawmakers. Abscam was a probe in which Federal Bureau of Investigation agents posed as Arab sheiks or their representatives and offered bribes to members of Congress, transactions secretly filmed in some cases.

In a more recent case, Republican Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham of California resigned from Congress in November after pleading guilty to receiving $2.4 million in bribes from military contractors and evading more than $1 million in taxes.

At a minimum, Mr. Abramoff's plea agreement increases political pressure on Mr. DeLay, the Texas Republican who has stepped aside as House Majority Leader while under indictment in an unrelated corruption investigation in his home state. Former DeLay press secretary Michael Scanlon, later a business associate of Mr. Abramoff, pleaded guilty in late November to joining in a fraud and bribery scheme with Mr. Abramoff.

Mr. Abramoff's plea deal twice refers to another onetime DeLay aide, Tony Rudy, who later worked as a lobbyist under Mr. Abramoff. In the plea arrangement, Mr. Abramoff said he and lobbying partners of his attempted to bribe Mr. Rudy by paying his wife $50,000 in 10 equal payments from June 2000 to February 2001. Mr. Abramoff sought, in return, help both in stopping legislation regarding Internet gambling and in opposing postal rate increases, according to documents filed yesterday.

In fact, an Internet gambling bill failed in the House late that summer. And the alleged payments also followed a controversial golf trip by Mr. DeLay to Scotland in June 2000 organized by Mr. Abramoff, who hired an Arizona golf-tour company to make the arrangements.

Mr. DeLay said he had thought the trip was financed by a nonprofit conservative group, the National Center for Public Policy Research, not by Mr. Abramoff or his clients. But House gift rules say such trips are acceptable only if they are principally designed for information gathering; instead, records reviewed by The Wall Street Journal indicate that recreation was the principal reason for the Scottish leg of Mr. DeLay's trip to Britain that June.

Former DeLay staffers say Mr. Rudy was a principal contact for Mr. Abramoff in the leadership's office, and Amy Ridenour, the center's president, has said she is "somewhat hazy about how Scotland got into it." Mr. Rudy, who has retained a defense attorney, didn't immediately return calls seeking comment.

Richard Cullen, an attorney for Mr. DeLay, said that he "encourages people who have information to cooperate and tell the truth and has full confidence he will be exonerated."

There were immediate signs from some Republicans that Mr. Abramoff's plea might sink Mr. DeLay's hopes of reclaiming his post as majority leader. He has sought to put off election for a successor while he tries to gain vindication on the charges against him in Texas. But Republican Rep. Jim Leach of Iowa said the party would be "insane" not to move ahead with new elections. "This is arguably one of the most troubling scandals in modern times and it reflects very poorly on the Congress," Mr. Leach said.

Important Question

The most important political question is whether the case reflects equally poorly on both parties -- or boosts the Democrats' fight to reclaim control of Congress in November's elections. As the public's attitude toward Congress and the Bush administration soured throughout 2005, Democrats built a significant lead when Americans were asked which party they wanted to control Capitol Hill. In December's Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 46% preferred Democrats to be in charge; 38% said the Republicans.

Yet the same survey showed that public skepticism about politicians' integrity is bipartisan. Roughly eight in 10 called corruption "equally a problem among both parties," raising questions about whether Democrats can make headway with their argument that Republican rule has created "a culture of corruption."

"I do think it will have a dramatic effect on future elections for both parties," said Rep. Wayne Gilchrest, a Republican moderate from Maryland. "Part of it is going to be anti-incumbent. Part of it will be people who don't vote because there's no hope. Part of it will be disgust with Republicans, who seem to be indicted every other week." Democrats argue that even a general anti-incumbent backlash could benefit them, since Republicans now hold more seats.

Aside from Messrs. DeLay and Ney, prosecutors are believed to be examining two Republican lawmakers for their dealings with Mr. Abramoff, as well as more than a dozen current and former congressional aides. One is Rep. John Doolittle of California. A spokeswoman for Rep. Doolittle has dismissed as "simply ridiculous" the idea that he "had some improper involvement" with Mr. Abramoff.

The other Republican lawmaker prosecutors are believed to be looking at is Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana. Mr. Burns, the largest Senate recipient of campaign donations from Mr. Abramoff and his clients, helped one Abramoff client get $3 million in federal money one year. In 2001, Mr. Abramoff flew two of Mr. Burns's aides to the Super Bowl; Mr. Abramoff also hired a pair of Mr. Burns's aides.

Mr. Burns said in a statement that "I've returned or donated to charity the contributions I've received from Abramoff and his clients and associates and to date, I have not been contacted by the U.S. Justice Department." If it asks, he will cooperate in any way possible, he said.

Republicans say Mr. Abramoff's dealings with Democrats, such as Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Democratic Sen. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota, will help blunt the partisan fallout. In 2002, Messrs. Reid and Dorgan sent separate letters asking the Interior Department to block an Indian tribe in Louisiana from opening a casino that would have competed with an existing casino operated by one of Mr. Abramoff's clients. The day after Mr. Reid sent his letter, Mr. Abramoff's client, a tribe called the Coushattas, sent a $5,000 contribution to one of Mr. Reid's fund-raising groups.

A spokesman for Mr. Reid said that "he has long opposed the expansion of off-reservation Indian gaming," and any official action he took was consistent with that view. The spokesman said Mr. Reid has never met Mr. Abramoff.

In 2002, Mr. Dorgan helped one of Mr. Abramoff's clients get $3 million in federal funding, and around the same time, Mr. Dorgan received $20,000 in campaign contributions from Mr. Abramoff's firm and clients. In fall 2003, Mr. Dorgan pushed Congress to consider granting federal recognition to a Massachusetts tribe that was an Abramoff client.

Mr. Dorgan has returned some $67,000 in donations he received from members of the lobbyist's firm and its clients, though he says all were legal and that he never met Mr. Abramoff. Yesterday Mr. Dorgan issued a statement taking credit for helping to expose "the corruption of Jack Abramoff" as a leader of the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

Congress may seek to inoculate itself from the scandal this year by pursuing legislation that would reform lobbying laws. Legislation proposed by Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain would require lobbyists to disclose more about their contacts with members of Congress and congressional aides. Other proposals would bar lawmakers and aides from accepting meals or gifts from lobbyists.

DOJ_NMG_0007807

Mr. Abramoff faced a maximum sentence of 30 years, but under the terms of his plea agreement that is likely to be reduced to between 9 and 11 years, the Justice Department said. That sentence could be reduced further, depending on the level of cooperation he provides in the case, which began in March 2004. Mr. Abramoff agreed to pay $25 million in restitution to the Indian tribes he admitted defrauding and pay $1.7 million to the Internal Revenue Service for taxes he had avoided.

"Words will not be able to ever express how sorry I am for this," Mr. Abramoff said in court as he offered his plea. "I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused."

According to the plea arrangement, Mr. Abramoff beginning in 2000 offered "Representative #1" and his staffers tickets to the Super Bowl, campaign contributions, meals and drinks and frequent "golf and related expenses" at Washington-area courses. In exchange, the agreement states, Representative #1 helped Mr. Abramoff and his clients 11 times.

In August 2001, it says, the legislator "used his position as chairman of a committee of the House to endorse and support a client of Abramoff as the provider of wireless telephone infrastructure to the House of Representatives." The legislator also helped Mr. Abramoff buy a casino-boat chain in Florida in 2000 and tried to add language to a bill that would have helped one of Mr. Abramoff's Native American clients, the plea deal says.

Rep. Ney, the man acknowledged by his own office to be Representative #1, said that "at the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities." A spokesman said Mr. Ney would "absolutely not" step aside as chairman of the House Administration Committee. The committee oversees election law as well as the day-to-day operations of the House. Mr. Ney, a former teacher, has represented a district in east-central Ohio since winning election in the Republicans' 1994 midterm election sweep.

'One Step at a Time'

Experts in Washington corruption cases said the language of the Abramoff plea deal makes clear the investigation will reach further. "It's not limited to Ney. The charges speak of 'public officials,' " said Stanley Brand, a veteran defense attorney and former Democratic counsel in the House. "It's a very, very tightly knit set of charges. They are not over pleading these cases. They are going one step at a time."

Campaign contributions aren't illegal unless there is an express agreement that the money is being paid in exchange for a particular action. That's one element that makes public-corruption cases difficult to bring, say former prosecutors. Unlike a crime such as robbery, there is often no clearly identifiable victim and usually little reason for either side to cooperate with law enforcement. That's what makes the deal with Mr. Abramoff key to what Justice Department officials describe as a wide-ranging, ongoing investigation.

Enlisting his testimony "is a huge break," said Randall Eliason, a law professor at American University and former head of the public-corruption unit for the U.S. Attorney's office in Washington. "He was in the meetings. He was there when the deals, if any, took place and can say, 'I gave him this in exchange for this official action.' "

Prosecutors will need significant corroborating evidence to prove potential charges against Mr. Ney or other members of Congress. The lobbyists' guilty pleas themselves can be used by defense lawyers to impeach Mr. Abramoff's credibility, adding to the Justice Department's challenge in building additional cases.

The FBI has been engaged in an aggressive crackdown on public corruption, officials say. In the past two years, the bureau has helped convict more than 1,050 government employees accused of corrupt activities, including 177 federal officials.

US Lobbyist Admits Fraud And Bribe Plot (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

Jack Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist and central figure in an influence-peddling scandal with reverberations throughout Washington, on Tuesday pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges and agreed to help prosecutors investigate the activities of top US lawmakers including Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader.

DOJ_NMG_0007808

Mr Abramoff on Tuesday pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. He admitted to conspiring to defraud his lobbying clients, and trying to bribe lawmakers and congressional aides with campaign contributions, meals, trips and sports tickets. He is expected to serve about 10 years in prison.

According to the charges filed on Tuesday, Mr Abramoff and a former aide to Mr DeLay, Michael Scanlon, overbilled several Indian tribes who were their clients. They then diverted the money either into their own pockets, or used it to provide what the charges said was "a stream of things of value", including a lavish golfing trip to Scotland, for a lawmaker and his staff.

No politicians are named in the papers filed on Tuesday by the Justice Department but prosecutors are understood to be investigating at least a dozen lawmakers, congressional aides and lobbyists, including Mr DeLay and Bob Ney of Ohio, a fellow Republican lawmaker.

Mr Abramoff's long-awaited decision to plead guilty and co-operate with federal investigators will give the Justice Department powerful new ammunition in its probe of alleged patterns of corruption and bribery within the ranks of the Republican leadership.

Democrats are hoping to exploit the perception of a "culture of corruption" among Republican leaders in the November congressional elections, although some Democrats also received campaign contributions from Mr Abramoff.

The charges on Tuesday said: "It was a purpose of the conspiracy for defendant Abramoff, Scanlon and others to enrich themselves by obtaining substantial funds from their clients through fraud and concealment."

Some of these funds were used to try to influence an unnamed congressman to "perform a series of official acts" including passing legislation.

Sports tickets and meals at Mr Abramoff's upmarket Washington restaurant were lavished on lawmakers. "His activities went far beyond lawful lobbying," said Alice Fisher, a top Justice Department official.

Tuesday's charges are separate from charges pending against Mr Abramoff in Florida. He is expected to plead guilty to those as well.

Scott McClellan, White House spokesman, said that, "if laws were broken, [Mr Abramoff] must be held to account for what he did".

Tremors Across Washington As Lobbyist Will Aid Inquiry (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - As a high-flying Republican lobbyist, Jack Abramoff has long been known as a mover and shaker in Washington. But when he cut a deal with federal prosecutors on Tuesday, he shook up this town as never before.

Not long ago, Mr. Abramoff was perhaps Washington's most aggressive - and, at $750 an hour, most highly compensated - deal maker, a flamboyant man who moved fluidly through the nexus of money and power. Now his decision to cooperate in a broadening corruption and bribery investigation has thrust him into the role of a corporate insider turning against the company that claimed just to be doing business as usual.

Even before Mr. Abramoff left the federal courthouse on Tuesday in a trench coat and fedora, nervous lawmakers of both parties, and even the White House, began trying to distance themselves from him.

Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois announced that he would donate to charity $69,000 in campaign contributions directed to him by Mr. Abramoff.

The plea bargain also had immediate ripple effects for a lawmaker who was once Mr. Abramoff's closest ally in the Republican leadership, Representative Tom DeLay of Texas. Mr. DeLay, indicted on a count of money laundering in a separate campaign-related case in Texas, is trying to regain his post as House majority leader, but Mr. Abramoff's plea complicates his prospects.

Mr. Abramoff, 46, pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion, and prosecutors said he used campaign contributions, lavish trips, meals and other perks to influence lawmakers and their aides. Court papers filed on Tuesday singled out just one member of Congress, "Representative No. 1," identified elsewhere as Representative Bob Ney, Republican of Ohio.

DOJ_NMG_0007809

But that was cold comfort on Capitol Hill, where there was a sense of lawmakers and lobbyists' waiting for the other shoe to drop. In a city whose history is rife with scandal and the political price it exacts, from the F.B.I. sting operation known as Abscam to the savings and loans collapse involving "the Keating Five," some experts feared that the Abramoff investigation would eclipse all the rest.

While Mr. Abramoff is most closely linked to Republicans, even Democrats, many of whom also benefited from his largesse, acted skittish.

"We're talking about people who have longstanding careers in Congress who took contributions from somebody who knew somebody who knew somebody who knew Jack Abramoff," said a Democratic Congressional aide who insisted on anonymity so as not to drag his boss into the scandal. "Now they're panicked. The hope is that this investigation will root out the wrongdoing without innocent people getting hit with the ricochet."

Mr. Abramoff's plea bargain is scary to Washington's power brokers precisely because he was so entangled with so many of them.

His ties to Grover G. Norquist, a leading conservative strategist and president of Americans for Tax Reform, and Ralph Reed, the former director of the Christian Coalition who is now a candidate for lieutenant governor in Georgia, date from his college days.

He once worked as a lobbyist alongside David H. Safavian, who was the head of the White House procurement office until just before his arrest last fall in the Abramoff investigation. And Mr. Abramoff's former personal assistant once worked for Karl Rove, President Bush's chief political strategist.

At the White House, administration officials have been reluctant to comment on the case, referring questions to the Justice Department and declining to defend Mr. Safavian. But on Tuesday morning, the White House spokesman, Scott McClellan, denounced Mr. Abramoff's actions.

"What he is reportedly acknowledging doing is unacceptable and outrageous," Mr. McClellan said. "If laws were broken, he must be held to account and punished for what he did."

Some Democrats saw the plea bargain as good political news. They are trying to build their 2006 midterm campaigns around what they call the Republican "culture of corruption" and say Mr. Abramoff taps into that theme.

Minutes after his deal was announced, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, which tries to help elect Democrats to Congress, trumpeted the news on its Web site. "Breaking News: Jack Abramoff to Plead Guilty," the headline said.

Publicly, Republicans insisted that they were not worried.

"I think there may have been some nervousness, but after reading the plea agreement today and seeing that only one person was named, there's got to be a little bit of relief out there," said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

But privately, some said they were concerned that the Justice Department might try to interpret bribery statutes more broadly than in the past. They fear a lesser standard of proof could ensnare lawmakers, lobbyists and aides, current and former.

"There's a lot of talk coming out of various quarters that the Justice Department is going to pursue a different definition of bribery, meaning that if somebody were to give a gift or a campaign contribution in the same time period as a member took an official action, that in and of itself would constitute bribery," said a former Republican leadership aide who insisted on anonymity. "That scares the bejesus out of people."

A one-time Hollywood filmmaker, Mr. Abramoff began his rise in Republican power circles in the 1980's, when he was chairman of the College Republicans National Committee. His staff included Mr. Norquist and Mr. Reed.

In 1994, when the Republicans reclaimed the House after 40 years, Mr. Abramoff rose to power with them. He used his contacts with Mr. DeLay and other prominent Republicans to build a lucrative lobbying and business enterprise that, at its peak, included a fancy restaurant, Signatures, with a special kosher kitchen. His primary clients were Indian tribes, which he has now acknowledged bilking.

From complimentary meals at his restaurant to lavish golfing trips to Scotland, including one taken by Mr. Ney and another by Mr. DeLay, to lucrative skybox tickets at Washington sports events, Mr. Abramoff's largesse seemed to know no bounds.

DOJ_NMG_0007810

According to the Center for Responsive Politics, an organization that tracks campaign contributions, he has directed more than $4.4 million since 1999 to candidates and campaign committees. The money came mostly from Mr. Abramoff's clients, but also directly from him and from a casino boat company that he once owned.

On Tuesday, a spokesman for Mr. Hastert said the speaker would join a growing list of members of Congress who have returned or donated money given them by Mr. Abramoff.

"The speaker believes that while these contributions were legal, it is appropriate to donate the money to charity," said the spokesman, Ron Bonjean.

Mr. DeLay, whose former press secretary, Michael Scanlon, was Mr. Abramoff's business partner and has also been indicted in connection with the investigation, has been working furiously to resolve the Texas case before the House reconvenes on Jan. 31.

The intent was to clear his name and forestall any call for leadership elections. But Republicans say even a legal victory in Texas could be overshadowed by Mr. Abramoff's case.

A spokesman for Mr. DeLay said that the lawmaker had nothing to fear from Mr. Abramoff's plea and that it should not be a factor in whether he should resume his position as majority leader.

"Mr. DeLay has been very clear that all of his actions were properly vetted and they were promptly and publicly disclosed in accordance with House ethics rules," the spokesman, Kevin Madden, said. "So there is no reason for him to be concerned."

The investigation is prompting people inside and outside Congress to change their behavior.

Mr. Hastert has raised the possibility of new ethics training for lawmakers.

Paul Miller, president of the 700-member American League of Lobbyists, said lawmakers and lobbyists were "taking a step backward and assessing how they are doing business and how they are operating."

Even as Mr. Miller acknowledged that Mr. Abramoff's case had tarnished his industry, he took pains to dispute the idea that Mr. Abramoff deserved the description "superlobbyist," so often bestowed on him in a city where money and influence speak louder than words and where when the mighty fall they fall hard.

"Jack Abramoff," Mr. Miller said, "is nothing more than a supercrook."

The Heat Is Now On Ohio Rep. Ney (LAT)

By Richard Simon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — In 2003, Rep. Bob Ney was in the news for helping lead the push to rename the French fries in the House cafeterias "freedom fries" to protest France's refusal to back the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Now, the Ohio Republican is in the spotlight as "Representative #1" — the unnamed lawmaker in federal court documents released Tuesday who allegedly received favors from lobbyist Jack Abramoff in return for supporting legislation beneficial to one of Abramoff's clients. The documents were unveiled as part of the guilty plea Abramoff entered to several charges stemming from his lobbying activity.

Ney has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing; in a statement Tuesday, he said: "At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities."

But Abramoff's agreement to cooperate with federal investigators as part of his guilty plea raised the prospect that Ney could face indictment. At the least, the Abramoff scandal has cast a cloud over Ney's lengthy political career.

Ironically, Ney won his first elective office by defeating a Democrat who had been tainted by scandal — Wayne Hays.

Hays was serving in the Ohio Legislature when Ney upset him in 1980. Four years earlier, Hays had quit his seat in the U.S. House after Elizabeth Ray, who was on the payroll of the committee he headed, said she was being paid to serve as his mistress. At the time. Ray famously said she could not type or "even answer the phone."

Ney, 51, won his House seat in 1994, when a GOP landslide gave Republicans control of the House and Senate for the first time in 40 years.

In 2001, he became head of the Committee on House Administration, a position that deals with chores that capture little public attention but are important to colleagues, such as overseeing parking on Capitol Hill.

It was in his role as the panel's chairman that he ordered the name change for French fries.

He also helped write legislation that authorized more than $3.8 billion in federal aid to help state and local officials improve their voting systems — a bill passed by Congress after the Florida vote-counting debacle in the 2000 election.

Born in West Virginia, Ney graduated from Ohio State University in the mid-1970s. He spent 1978 in Iran teaching English and is the only House member who speaks fluent Farsi.

During the last year, Ney has uncharacteristically broken with the GOP's House leadership on some key issues.

He was one of nine Republicans in the chamber to vote against a recently passed budget-cutting bill because of concern about its effect on his congressional district's steel industry and cuts to Medicaid. He also opposed the Central American Free Trade Agreement, and has been among a handful of Republicans working against reauthorization of the Patriot Act because of concerns about its effect on civil liberties.

Ney's district in eastern Ohio is heavily rural and picked up more Republican voters when it was redrawn after the 2000 census. He won reelection in 2004 with 66% of the vote.

Ney's spokesman, Brian Walsh, said Tuesday he expected the district's constituents to give the lawmaker the benefit of the doubt as the ethics scandal continued to unfold.

"I think many people in Washington these days presume someone to be guilty until proven innocent," Walsh said. "I think that's different in middle America."

Three Democrats already are vying for the right to oppose Ney in November. The campaign manager for one of the Democrats, Joe Sulzer, said the ethical allegations swirling around Ney were not yet "central in the way it is in D.C. right now" for most voters in the district.

But the Sulzer aide, Joe Abbey, added that he believed the Abramoff plea would "advance the issue tenfold" and sharpen questions of whether Ney was more focused on helping Abramoff than his constituents.

One Democratic official in Ney's district cautioned against counting out the lawmaker.

Mark Thomas, a Belmont County commissioner, noted that Ney helped secure more than $20 million for the area in a recently passed highway bill.

"I think the people in this district are taking the position that until he has been accused of whatever he may be accused of, and the facts come out, and he has an opportunity to respond," Thomas said, "we're going to be behind him as a congressman."

*

Times staff writer Ronald Brownstein contributed to this report.

Abramoff Pleads Guilty To Fraud (REU-Y2)

By Andy Sullivan

Reuters, January 4, 2006

Lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to fraud charges on Tuesday and agreed to help U.S. prosecutors in a corruption probe that could involve several top Republican lawmakers, including former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion before a federal judge in Washington. He also will plead guilty to conspiracy and wire fraud in a separate case in Miami on Wednesday, his lawyer there said.

The long-expected plea will give prosecutors valuable ammunition as they seek to prove that DeLay of Texas, Republican Rep. Bob Ney (news, bio, voting record) of Ohio and other top lawmakers gave Abramoff and his lobbying clients favorable treatment in return for campaign contributions, Super Bowl tickets and other gifts.

"Abramoff provided these things of value with the intent and often with the understanding that his clients would receive the official action they wanted," Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said at a press conference. "As admitted by Abramoff, his actions often produced the official influence that he sought."

Republican and Democratic lawmakers seeking to distance themselves from Abramoff and his clients have returned more than $200,000 in campaign contributions in recent weeks.

Abramoff, 47, faces a maximum sentence of 30 years, but under the terms of the plea deal it will be reduced to between 9 1/2 and 11 years. The sentence could be reduced even further if Abramoff cooperates fully, a Justice Department official said.

As part of the plea deal, Abramoff together with former partner Michael Scanlon will pay at least $25 million in restitution, and Abramoff will pay $1.7 million to the Internal Revenue Service for tax evasion.

REGRET, SORROW

Wearing a double-breasted, charcoal-colored suit, Abramoff answered Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle's questions in a hushed voice.

"I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused. All of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done," Abramoff said in a prepared statement.

According to the charges, Abramoff directed his Indian-tribe clients to hire Scanlon's public-relations firm at steep costs. Scanlon, a former DeLay aide, then secretly kicked back 50 percent of the $53 million he earned to Abramoff.

The two used the money to shower golf trips, lavish dinners and other favors on lawmakers. They also kept much of it for themselves.

Scanlon pleaded guilty to conspiracy in November and has been cooperating with investigators.

According to the charges, one unidentified lawmaker agreed to support legislation sought by Abramoff, place statements supporting him in the Congressional Record -- the official daily report on congressional proceedings -- and give one of his clients a contract to provide wireless telephone service to the House of Representatives.

That description matches actions taken by Ney, who inserted comments supporting Abramoff into the Congressional Record and who oversees routine matters like wireless service in congressional buildings as chairman of the House Administration Committee.

Ney's attorney Mark Tuohey was not available for comment.

The Justice Department's Fisher would not say how many officials are implicated in the probe.

"We are going to follow this wherever it goes. We are going to expend the resources that are necessary to make sure that people know that government is not for sale," she said.

DeLay attorney Dick DeGuerin said the Abramoff investigation would not uncover any wrongdoing by his client.

"Everything that Tom DeLay has done is above board," he told MSNBC, adding that early on, DeLay had offered the Justice Department cooperation in the investigation.

The charges are separate from those pending against Abramoff in Florida, where he has been charged in connection with falsifying a loan in the purchase of a Florida casino cruise line.

In an e-mail, Abramoff attorney Neal Sonnett said that Abramoff would plead guilty in Miami on Wednesday to wire fraud and conspiracy to commit wire fraud, while other charges would be dropped as part of the plea deal.

The FBI launched its investigation of Abramoff and Scanlon in March 2004, said Chris Swecker, head of the FBI's criminal investigative division.

Abramoff first contacted the Justice Department to discuss a plea a year and a half ago, Abramoff's Washington attorney Abbe Lowell said.

Abramoff Pleads Guilty (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

Lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court to charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud, agreeing to cooperate in an ongoing investigation into influence peddling on Capitol Hill.

Abramoff admitted to U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle he had taken part in a scheme involving the "corruption of public officials," saying he gave campaign contributions and funded lavish trips and other items "in exchange for certain official acts."

As part of the plea bargain, Abramoff agreed to pay at least $25 million in restitution -- which the government has described as the profits he concealed as part of the conspiracy.

DOJ_NMG_0007813

"Words will not ever be able to express my sorrow and my profound regret for all my actions and mistakes," he told Judge Huvelle in the Washington courtroom. "I hope I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and those I've wronged or caused to suffer."

It was not clear yesterday who might be targeted in the government probe, although both Republicans and Democrats have been the beneficiaries of Abramoff's lobbying activities. Since he was first identified as an investigative target, lawmakers from both parties have returned more than $200,000 in campaign contributions.

Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said the Justice Department will pursue the investigation "wherever it goes" and intended to "expend the resources to make sure people know that government is not for sale." Abbe Lowell, Abramoff's attorney, said his client will continue to work with investigators.

Democrats are expected to make ethics a centerpiece of this year's midterm election. After Mr. Abramoff's confession, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi called the Republican-led Congress the "most corrupt in history." Republican leaders were silent.

According to court documents, Abramoff and partner Michael Scanlon, a former aide to Rep. Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, conspired to defraud Indian tribes in six states of millions of dollars. Scanlon pleaded guilty to related charges in Miami in November.

The court documents also said Abramoff gave public officials and their relatives gifts of money, trips, meals and entertainment in return for favorable treatment of his clients. One member of the House, identified as Rep. Bob Ney, Ohio Republican, reportedly received a "lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world-famous courses" and other benefits in exchange for support on various issues.

The documents said Abramoff arranged for a $50,000 check to be sent through the mail from Texas to pay for the Scotland trip. Abramoff also is accused of arranging for one of Mr. Ney's former staff members to lobby the congressman in 2002 before the ex-staffer's one-year ban on lobbying had expired.

Mr. Ney has denied any wrongdoing, saying yesterday that at the time he dealt with Abramoff, "I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities." The congressman's attorney, Mark Tuohey, described the charges as "nothing new," saying they were included in a November plea agreement by Scanlon.

Also at issue are Abramoff's ties to Mr. DeLay, who accepted about $57,000 in campaign contributions as well as golf outings and other trips provided for or arranged by the lobbyist for lawmakers.

The documents also said Abramoff, who is expected to plead guilty to two additional federal charges in Florida stemming from a 2000 purchase of a fleet of gambling boats, filed a tax return for 2002 that concealed his illegal income.

Abramoff told Judge Huvelle "I plead guilty, your Honor" to each of three counts outlined in a November indictment. He had faced up to 30 years in prison, but prosecutors are expected to recommend 9½ years under terms of the plea bargain.

Prosecutors are thought to have finalized the Abramoff deal after a guilty plea by former partner Adam Kidan, who admitted Dec. 15 in federal court in Miami to committing mail and wire fraud in connection with the 2000 boat deal in Florida.

At the White House, spokesman Scott McClellan could not say yesterday whether Abramoff had ever met with President Bush, although the lobbyist and his associates logged more than 200 visits with administration officials and he raised $100,000 for Mr. Bush's 2004 re-election campaign.

Mr. McClellan called Abramoff's actions "unacceptable and outrageous." The spokesman said, "If laws were broken, he must be held to account for what he did."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, joined the growing list of lawmakers who have either returned money received from Abramoff or given it to charities. Lawmakers who have done so include Rep. Ernest Istook, Oklahoma Republican; Rep. Denny Rehberg, Montana Republican; Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican; Sen. Max Baucus, Montana Democrat; Sen. Conrad Burns, Montana Republican; and Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, North Dakota Democrat.

G.O.P. Lobbyist Pleads Guilty In Deal With Prosecutors (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to three felony counts in Washington today as part of a settlement with federal prosecutors, ending an intense, months-long negotiation over whether the Republican lobbyist would testify against his former colleagues.

Mr. Abramoff, 46, pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud, and tax evasion, setting the stage for prosecutors to begin using him as a cooperating witness against his former business and political colleagues. In exchange, Mr. Abramoff faces a maximum of about 10 years in prison in the Washington case.

The conspiracy charge included Mr. Abramoff's effort to influence at least one member of Congress and a Congressional staff member.

As United States District Judge Ellen S. Huvelle read each of the charges today, Mr. Abramoff answered softly, "I plead guilty, your honor."

"Your honor, words will not be able to ever express how sorry I am for this, and I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused," he said. "All of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done. I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and from those I have wronged or caused to suffer. I will work hard to earn that redemption."

At a news briefing this afternoon, Alice Fisher, an assistant attorney general, said Mr. Abramoff offered up gifts to government officials that included an all-expense paid trip to Scotland "to play golf on a world-famous course, tickets and travel to the Super Bowl in Florida, tickets for concerts and other events in Washington, repeated and regular meals at his upscale restaurant, and campaign contributions."

She said he provided these gifts "with the intent and often with the understanding that his clients would receive the official action they wanted."And, she said, "his actions often produced the official influence that he sought."

"Government officials and government action are not for sale," she said. "The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these types of cases, which have a devastating impact on the public's trust of government. We will not shy away from that responsibility, no matter where the trail leads."

Official Washington has been on edge for months awaiting word of Mr. Abramoff's legal future. Once a masterful Republican lobbyist with close ties to the former House majority leader, Representative Tom DeLay, Mr. Abramoff earned tens of millions of dollars representing Indian casino interests and farflung entities like the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas Islands.

Through a complicated web of financial arrangements, he helped funnel donations to his lawmaker friends' and their campaigns, and took members of Congress, mainly the Republicans in power, on lavish trips.

Mr. Abramoff is also scheduled to appear in Florida Wednesday in a related case, in which he was indicted last year. In that case, he is expected to plead guilty to fraud and conspiracy in connection with his purchase of the SunCruz casino boat line, and will face a maximum of about seven years' prison time.

Mr. Abramoff has been talking to investigators in the corruption case for many months, his lawyer, Abbe Lowell, said.

"Eighteen months ago, Mr. Abramoff first made contact with prosecutors to admit his wrongdoing and to seek forgiveness from those he has wronged," Mr. Lowell said today. "He intends to continue to work with the Justice Department and others to fully resolve all matters of interest, to provide restitution to anyone he has harmed, and to seek absolution from all."

Participants in the case, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the investigation, said Mr. Abramoff had provided a full picture of what evidence he could offer against other suspects.

On the corruption charge, prosecutors said in documents filed with the court today that Mr. Abramoff and his partner, Michael Scanlon, who reached a plea agreement with officials last year, conspired to "corruptly give, offer and promise things of value, including money, meals, trips and entertainment, to public officials and their relatives with the intent to influence, and in return for agreements to perform official acts benefiting" them and their clients.

The document details lavish gifts and contributions that Mr. Abramoff gave a House member, identified here only as "Representative #1."

Representative Bob Ney, a Republican of Ohio, acknowledged at the time of Mr. Scanlon's plea agreement that he was the person represented as Representative No. 1 in the documents in that case, but he has dismissed any suggestion that he was persuaded to do Mr. Scanlon's bidding because of campaign aid or perks like meals, entertainment or overseas travel.

Mr. Ney said in a statement today, "At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Reuters reported. Mr. Ney has not been charged.

The document also alleges that Mr. Abramoff bribed public officials, including "Representative #1," and his staff, when he funded a golfing trip to Scotland in exchange for the congressman's official actions to benefit his clients.

He is also accused of tax evasion for filing false documents and false entries to financial books and records, and filing a false income tax return in 2002, "all for the purpose of concealing additional unreported taxable income received by or on behalf of" himself, the documents state.

Mr. Abramoff is also accused of hiring congressional staffers and conspiring with them to lobby their former employers - including members of Congress - in violation of a one-year federal ban on such lobbying.

Mr. Abramoff's participation in Washington has taken place mostly below the radar, as prosecutors made the Miami case the focus of their public work and as Mr. Abramoff and his associates claimed they were preparing to stand trial, facing up to as many as 30 years in prison.

Though Mr. Abramoff's pleas in each location are separate, the deal reached with the Justice Department is all-encompassing, reducing the severe penalties Mr. Abramoff could have faced in either investigation, in exchange for his inside knowledge of certain lobbying work and legislative actions. One element of the deal is that he can serve prison time in the two cases concurrently, although the sentencing will not take place until much further along in the investigation.

The deal, a so-called "global" arrangement because it encompasses separate prosecutions in Florida and Washington, comes less than a week before Mr. Abramoff was scheduled to stand trial in the Miami case.

With Mr. Abramoff's cooperation, the Justice Department will have a potentially critical witness to alleged patterns of corruption or bribery within the Republican leadership ranks, which in some cases they believe also took the form of campaign donations and free meals at Mr. Abramoff's downtown restaurant, Signatures.

After more than two years of investigations, prosecutors have developed a list of at least a dozen lawmakers, congressional aides and lobbyists whose work appears suspect and who are now at the core of the case.

Already, prosecutors had a key witness in Mr. Scanlon, once press secretary to Mr. DeLay. When Mr. Scanlon reached a plea agreement last year, it put pressure on Mr. Abramoff to reach his own deal.

Now that Mr. Abramoff has done the same, one person involved in the case said: "When some people hear about this, they will clamor to cut a deal of their own."

‘Corruption … Very Extensive' Ex-lobbyist Abramoff Will Help Wide-ranging Investigation Involving A Dozen FBI Offices (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson And Jim Drinkard

USA Today, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — A little more than a year ago, Jack Abramoff was enjoying many of the benefits access to official Washington can provide.

There were multimillion-dollar lobbying fees to collect, Super Bowl tickets to distribute and lavish trips and dinners to host.

What set Abramoff (AY-bra-moff) apart from legitimate Washington power brokers, federal prosecutors say, was his willingness to exploit an extensive network of Capitol Hill contacts — from well-positioned congressional staffers to members of the Republican leadership — regardless of the rules.

“The corruption scheme with Mr. Abramoff is very extensive,” Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said. “Government officials and governmental action are not for sale.”

Abramoff's campaign of corruption officially ended Tuesday when he pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion. In addition to about 10 years in prison, he may be forced to repay more than $25 million, according to court documents.

Prosecutors say Abramoff's cooperation is central to a wide-ranging corruption investigation that stretches from Capitol Hill to congressional districts across the USA.

At least a dozen FBI field offices have been drawn into the inquiry, FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker said. Authorities have declined to disclose the number of possible targets in the ongoing inquiry, but it goes beyond one member of Congress or his office. "No criminal resources of the FBI will be spared in support of this important mission," Swecker said.

The plea agreement outlined a scheme by which Abramoff and his secret partner, public relations operative Michael Scanlon, billed Indian tribes for exorbitant fees, then split the profits. Abramoff hid some of the money from the IRS by directing it to a non-profit group he established, the Capital Athletic Foundation.

Abramoff's share of the kickbacks from fees paid by four Indian tribes in Louisiana, Texas, Michigan and Mississippi came to more than $20 million, prosecutors said.

Abramoff and Scanlon also provided "a stream of things of value" to public officials to get their help. The stream included "foreign and domestic travel, golf fees, frequent meals, entertainment, election support … employment for relatives of officials and campaign contributions," court documents say.

Among the recipients were a House member identified by the lawmaker's attorney as Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, and members of Ney's staff. They got trips to the Northern Marianas Islands in 2000, to the Super Bowl in Tampa in 2001, and to Scotland's storied St. Andrews golf course in 2002, according to the documents. Ney also held fundraising events at Abramoff's now-defunct Washington restaurant, Signatures.

In return, Ney and his aides put statements in the Congressional Record supportive of Abramoff's interests and helped an Abramoff client get a wireless telephone contract with the House of Representatives, the government charged. In a statement, Ney denied that he was influenced by Abramoff.

Abramoff also funneled $50,000 to the wife of an unnamed congressional aide in 2000 and 2001, in return for the aide's help in blocking legislation for a client.

Abramoff's guilty plea follows weeks of other scandal news involving government officials.

Republican Tom DeLay stepped down from his position as House majority leader last year after he was indicted on charges related to fundraising in a separate case in his home state of Texas. DeLay has close ties to Abramoff, who employed some of the Texan's former aides and paid for a separate golf trip to Scotland for DeLay. Randy "Duke" Cunningham resigned from the House in November after pleading guilty to taking at least $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors.

The developments appear to be damaging Americans' perception of their elected representatives. A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken Dec. 16-18 found that 49% of American adults say they believe "most members of Congress are corrupt." That's 1 percentage point below the level of 1994, when voters turned control of Congress over to Republicans. The GOP appears to be tarred by scandal slightly more than the Democrats; 47% said "almost all" or "many" Republicans are corrupt, compared with 44% for Democrats.

Among registered voters, 55% said the issue of corruption will be the "most important" or a "very important" factor in their decision on whom to vote for next year. The poll has a margin of error of +/-3 to 5 percentage points, depending on the question.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan called Abramoff's confessed conduct "outrageous."

"He needs to be held to account, and he needs to be punished," McClellan said. Abramoff was among President Bush's Pioneers, who raised at least $100,000 for his re-election in 2004.

Many Millions In Kickbacks From Tribes (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - The kickbacks from one Indian tribe exceeded $11 million. From another, they surpassed $6 million. In less than three years, Jack Abramoff secretly netted more than $20 million from tribes in five states, a sum close to half of the $43.3 million they paid him and a partner to lobby on their behalf.

"These are staggering numbers, even by Washington standards," said Stanley Brand, a defense lawyer who specializes in criminal and ethical matters. "The big firms do very, very well, but they don't come close to these kinds of numbers."

The level to which Mr. Abramoff enriched himself at the expense of clients came into sharp focus on Tuesday as his plea agreement on federal charges of conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion was made public by the Justice Department.

The agreement referred to five business relationships Mr. Abramoff had with Indian tribes, and in each case he admitted to receiving a large percentage of the tribe's total spending as a kickback. As part of his plea, Mr. Abramoff agreed to repay his former clients $25 million.

Mr. Abramoff carried out his fraudulent schemes by persuading clients that they needed the lobbying services of firms run by a former business partner, Michael Scanlon, or by his own companies. Mr. Scanlon pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to bribe a member of Congress, and as part of his plea, he agreed to repay $19.6 million to the tribes that once retained him.

Mr. Abramoff's largest kickback came from a Louisiana tribe that used his services from early 2001 through the spring of 2004. In the plea agreement Mr. Abramoff said the tribe paid companies run by Mr. Scanlon $30,510,000. But through an agreement between Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Scanlon, they concealed a kickback of about $11,450,000 to Mr. Abramoff.

In another scheme, beginning in early 2001, a Mississippi tribe paid Mr. Scanlon about $14,765,000, ignorant of the "secret profit-sharing agreement" between Mr. Scanlon and Mr. Abramoff that sliced off nearly half of the total, about $6,364,000, as a kickback to Mr. Abramoff.

A Michigan tribe paid Mr. Scanlon about $3.5 million from the middle of 2002 to the fall of 2003, unaware of the "secret arrangement" that directed about $540,000, half the profit earned by Mr. Scanlon's companies, to Mr. Abramoff.

In a scheme that suggested how little they cared for the needs of their clients, Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Scanlon persuaded a Texas tribe in 2002 to hire them to help the tribe reopen its casino through federal legislation. According to the plea agreement, while the tribe paid $4.2 million for services arranged by Mr. Scanlon, the two men concealed from the Texas tribe that, at the same time, they had collected millions of dollars from the Louisiana tribe to oppose all gaming in the Texas Legislature.

They also did not tell the Texas tribe that $1,850,000 of their fees went directly to Mr. Abramoff "pursuant to his undisclosed arrangement with Mr. Scanlon."

In a final case cited by the plea agreement, a New Mexico tribe paid Mr. Scanlon $2.75 million, hiding from tribal officials that the lobbying firm's profit margin was about 80 percent and that $1,175,000 of the total was paid to Mr. Abramoff through his secret agreement with Mr. Scanlon.

Paul Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, a trade group with 700 members, said Mr. Abramoff was "in a league by himself" as a Washington lobbyist, a term he said he used reluctantly.

"Jack Abramoff, by my definition, is not a lobbyist," Mr. Miller said. "He knowingly defrauded clients. In my view, he is nothing more than a scam artist."

Tiguas Hope Abramoff Plea Helps In Reopening Of Casino (AP)

By SUZANNE GAMBOA, Associated Press

AP, January 4, 2006

The governor of the Texas Tigua tribe, which operated a gaming casino near El Paso for more than eight years, is hoping lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty pleas in a federal corruption scandal will be a catalyst for restarting the tribe's gaming.

Tigua Gov. Arturo Senclair said the tribe is looking forward to what members of Congress will tell investigators should any be charged in the unraveling scandal that led Abramoff to plead guilty Tuesday.

"Maybe once this whole thing is done and all the e-mails are uncovered ... maybe when Congress members do start talking, maybe we can come back and start working with the state" to reopen the casino, he said.

Abramoff pleaded guilty Tuesday to three felonies and pledged to cooperate with investigators looking into the lavish trips, golf outings, meals and other gifts he said he provided to public officials "in exchange for a series of official acts."

The plea agreement filed by Justice Department officials said Abramoff and his ex-business partner Michael Scanlon solicited the Tigua tribe — identified in the document as Texas Tribe #1 — to hire them to provide lobbying and grass roots services to reopen the tribe's casino. The tribe was paying fees to the Scanlon business.

The tribe was to pay $4.2 million in fees and make "additional and substantial" campaign contributions at the direction of Abramoff and Scanlon, the plea agreement said.

Abramoff had told the tribe he'd work for free, but never revealed that he got about half the net profits, or $1.85 million, from the Scanlon business.

The investigators said Abramoff and Scanlon never told the Tiguas that beginning in 2001 they collected millions of dollars from the Louisiana Coushatta tribe to oppose all gaming in the Texas Legislature, including a 2003 bill that could have reopened the Tiguas' Speaking Rock Casino.

"Abramoff knew that Texas Tribe #1 supported and promoted this legislation while he worked to prevent its passage for the benefit of his other client, the Louisiana tribe," according to the plea agreement.

The Tiguas were forced to close the casino in February 2002 under a federal court ruling in a 1999 lawsuit brought by then Attorney General John Cornyn, now a U.S. senator. Cornyn has said he filed the lawsuit to enforce Texas law.

E-mails and other records released by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee — which conducted its own investigation — have shown that Abramoff hired former Christian Coalition director Ralph Reed to drum up opposition to Texas tribes' casinos in 2001.

"When we entered the Abramoff web, the assumption was this is the way we get things done in Washington, attending dinners, attending sporting events in skyboxes and attending golf outings. That's the way things got done," Senclair said. "You are a tribe, playing by the rules of the game, not knowing that's not the way it should have been done."

Despite the developments in the investigation, Senclair said there is little celebration for the tribe.

"We're still out of money. We still haven't been given restitution for the full amount (paid to Abramoff)," Senclair said. "There's still sadness because the casino is shut down."

Abramoff Reached Beyond The Limits (LAT)

By Faye Fiore And Martha Groves

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — At Beverly Hills High School, Jack Abramoff's weightlifting prowess was the stuff of legend.

As a senior, he became the first member of the school's 2700 Club, lifting a combined total of 2,700 pounds in the power squat, dead lift, bench press, and clean and jerk.

His former football coach, Bill Stansbury, recalled a game against Inglewood when Abramoff legally blocked an opposing player and knocked him out cold.

Abramoff also helped organize charitable events, Stansbury said, among them a Quarter-Pounder-eating contest at a McDonald's, with some proceeds going to the American Cancer Society, and a celebrity basketball game to benefit a youth foundation.

Today, about 30 years later, Abramoff is at the center of a political scandal in Washington — the result, in part, of the same drive, interest in charitable organizations and excess that he showed in his youth.

During a decade as one of the capital's most successful lobbyists, commanding hourly rates as high as $750, Abramoff, 46, amassed a personal fortune while lavishing lawmakers and others with golf junkets, free meals and access to sports arena skyboxes.

Now, he has pleaded guilty to conspiring to defraud some of his lobbying clients and bribe a lawmaker. Federal investigators are probing whether other lawmakers improperly returned Abramoff's favors by using their offices to benefit him and his clients.

His reach into the Republican power structure was vast. Beleaguered former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay once described him as "one of my closest and dearest friends." Abramoff was one of the "pioneers" who raised more than $100,000 for President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign.

The son of a Diners Club executive, Abramoff moved with his family from Atlantic City, N.J., to Beverly Hills when he was 10.

Soon after, he experienced a religious epiphany. His family was Jewish but not particularly observant, not like the characters in "Fiddler on the Roof," which he had recently watched. The Orthodox traditions of his grandparents' generation had perished over the years, and Abramoff, at age 12, decided to be the one to unbury them.

DOJ_NMG_0007819

He began walking to synagogue every Saturday and taught himself Hebrew, exhibiting early signs of the chin-to-chest drive that would later help catapult him to become one of the most well-connected Republican lobbyists in Washington.

At Beverly Hills High, he earned a reputation for ambition, hard work and commitment. He held the school record for the power squat, which he completed while holding 510 pounds on his back.

"Jack showed good leadership and was very dedicated, probably the strongest kid on the team," recalled Stansbury, who was the football team's offensive line coach when Abramoff played as the starting center. "For his size, he was extremely strong and very aggressive."

Abramoff was president of the high school Lettermen's Club, said Stansbury, who is now a teacher and coach at Paso Robles High School. "Jack always had a clear mission of where he wanted to be and how he was going to get there. I had a lot of respect for Jack's work ethic."

Steven Herbert, a freelance journalist who writes for The Times' sports section and attended the same schools a year behind Abramoff, recalled an early setback for Abramoff. He ran for student council president at the Hawthorne School, a Beverly Hills elementary and middle school, in 1972. Heading into a runoff election, Abramoff was disqualified for exceeding the spending limit. The principal, Herbert recalled, penalized Abramoff for holding a party, stating it amounted to a campaign expenditure that pushed him over the limit.

In the handful of interviews Abramoff has granted over the last year, he has refused to discuss the federal probe of his lobbying work but has talked about his past, including the religious revelation in his adolescence.

"I felt a twinge of sadness that that culture had died out in our family," he told Mother Jones magazine last summer. Recalling the decision he made then: "I'll be the person to resurrect it."

He became as conservative in his politics as in his faith and forged early friendships that would help him ascend his party's ranks. While an undergraduate at Brandeis University in Massachusetts, he met Grover Norquist, a Harvard graduate student who went on to head Americans for Tax Reform. Their common passion for conservative activism led them to organize young Republicans in the 1980 election, which some believed helped Ronald Reagan score an upset in that famously Democratic state.

Norquist was the first of many prominent Republicans that Abramoff would befriend as he took on key political chores on behalf of the GOP.

Abramoff became national chairman of the student wing of the GOP, the College Republican National Committee, a position once held by Bush confidant Karl Rove. There, Abramoff forged his long friendship with activist Ralph Reed, who would years later turn the Christian Coalition into a major political force within the GOP.

In his mid-20s, Abramoff set out to spread the Reagan Doctrine. He became executive director of Citizens for America, Reagan's grass-roots lobbying group.

With Republicans out of power in the early 1990s, Abramoff took a break from full-time politics and returned to his West Coast roots. He spent 10 years as a movie producer and made several B-grade films, including 1989's anti-communist romp "Red Scorpion."

In business and in politics, "he was always the consummate entrepreneur," said Marshall Wittmann, a former conservative activist who knew Abramoff during his rise to power and who is now a fellow at the centrist Democratic Leadership Council.

Abramoff was drawn back into politics in 1994 when the GOP takeover of Congress created opportunities for a talented rainmaker. Washington was full of new GOP lawmakers, and lobbying firms were desperate for people with Republican contacts. With his old friends suddenly in high places and his ticket already punched as a Reagan devotee, Abramoff was in demand almost overnight. He soon acquired a list of top-drawer clients — Unisys Corp., Tyco International and the government of the Northern Mariana Islands, a remote Pacific commonwealth that lawmakers were eyeing for additional federal regulation.

Abramoff became a bona fide high roller. He bought a majority stake in Signatures, a high-end restaurant on Pennsylvania Avenue between the White House and Capitol Hill that was a hot spot for Republican lobbyists, members of Congress and political fundraisers. GOP lawmakers filled his private skyboxes at Redskin, Oriole and Wizard games.

He also showed an interest in charitable organizations. Concerned about the quality of Jewish education in the Washington area, he founded an Orthodox school and sent two of his children there.

DOJ_NMG_0007820

A charitable organization he founded, the Capital Athletic Foundation, figures in the charges to which Abramoff entered guilty pleas Tuesday. Prosecutors said he induced a wireless telephone company to make $50,000 in payments to the foundation rather than pay a lobbying fee to the firm Abramoff worked for.

His most lucrative clients, though, were the Indian casino tribes he began to represent in the mid-1990s. Prosecutors say Abramoff and a partner conspired to defraud some of those tribes in five states, reaping millions of dollars from the scheme.

"Can you smell money?!" Abramoff wrote to his partner Michael P.S. Scanlon, a public relations consultant and former DeLay spokesman, regarding an Indian tribe rich with gambling casino profits. Scanlon recently pleaded guilty to federal conspiracy charges.

Abramoff at one point disparaged some of the tribal members who had made him rich, calling them "troglodytes" and "plain stupid … Morons."

Last year, Abramoff was forced to listen to those words in a hearing of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. "Why would you want to work for people that you have that much contempt for?" one senator asked.

On the advice of his lawyer, Abramoff did not respond.

Abramoff Case Could Have Far-reaching Impact (KRT)

By Michelle Mittelstadt, Dallas Morning News

KRT, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - Fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff's deal to cooperate in an influence-peddling investigation surely sent a chill Tuesday through Capitol Hill, where the Republican plied dozens of politicians with campaign contributions and favored some with lavish trips, Super Bowl tickets and pricey meals in exchange for legislative help.

"They have to be just sweating bullets," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a watchdog group. "Anybody who ever had anything to do with Jack Abramoff has to be rethinking every minute, every conversation with him."

The Abramoff case may not be marked by the outright bribery of corruption sagas such as Abscam and Koreagate, where members of Congress pocketed envelopes stuffed with cash. But it has the potential to rank as one of Congress' worst scandals in decades because of the number of lawmakers and aides who could be ensnared - and because of the disgraced lobbyist's reach into the top rungs of the GOP leadership.

Abramoff, who was one of President Bush's top fundraisers and traded on his ties to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, pleaded guilty Tuesday to charges of conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. It marked the latest twist in a corruption inquiry that is believed to be focusing on DeLay, R-Texas, and as many as 14 others on Capitol Hill.

"Government officials and government action are not for sale," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division. "The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these types of cases, which have a devastating impact on the public's trust of government. We will not shy away from that responsibility, no matter where the trail leads."

One lawmaker who may be in the crosshairs is Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, chairman of the House Administration Committee. In the Abramoff plea agreement, prosecutors detailed the legislative favors that Ney - identified only as "Representative No. 1" in court papers - performed for Abramoff's clients after receiving political contributions, overseas travel and other gifts.

"At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Ney said, denying wrongdoing.

Though Jack Abramoff has yet to become a household name, experts say the scandal could resonate with a public increasingly nervous about public corruption. An AP-Ipsos poll last month found that 88 percent of Americans believe corruption at all levels of government is a serious problem, with 51 percent calling it very serious.

"What makes a person like Abramoff so dangerous is he embodies and personifies problems that usually seem technical or abstract or too big to deal with," said Julian Zelizer, a Boston University history professor who wrote a book on congressional scandals. "Here you have a kind of villain that I think Americans might start paying attention to a bit."

DOJ_NMG_0007821

And just as Republicans used ethics as a cudgel to end House Democrats' four-decade lock on power in 1994, Zelizer and other experts said the current scandal holds peril for the GOP even though some Democrats also received Abramoff's largesse.

"There is always the cliche `a pox on both your houses.' But I do think the party in power does take extra heat on these things," said Larry Noble, executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics, among the watchdog groups that tracked the $2.1 billion paid by corporations and special interests to lobby Washington last year.

The Abramoff scandal holds the potential for strengthening lobbying disclosure and campaign finance regulations, particularly if the investigation remains front-page news with politicians' indictments, Noble said.

At the very least, there could be more scrutiny of lobbying, which Center for Public Integrity executive director Roberta Baskin called the "fourth branch of government in Washington."

"It's like the sun coming up on K Street right now," Baskin said. "There is the possibility and hope of there being a lot more scrutiny and accountability."

But Danielle Brian, head of the Project on Government Oversight, predicted change would be slow without a public outcry to force lawmakers to action.

"I definitely am not looking to Congress to make the changes themselves," Brian said, noting that the House and Senate ethics committees have been largely moribund in recent years. "I don't see there is any evidence there is any real self-policing going on."

Lobbyist's Guilty Plea Signals Broadening Scandal In Washington (KRT)

By Steven Thomma And Alison Young

Knight Ridder, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - The nation's capital braced Tuesday for a mushrooming political scandal as a well-connected lobbyist pleaded guilty to federal criminal charges and prepared to testify about members of Congress caught in his web of corruption.

Jack Abramoff, 46, invoked God as he apologized and pleaded guilty before a federal judge to one charge each of conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. He faces a maximum of 30 years in prison - and another potential plea in a Florida indictment related to his purchase of a fleet of casino cruise ships from a man who was murdered a few months later.

By itself, the fall of a high-flying lobbyist who collected $80 million in fees from casino-rich Indian tribes, wined and dined politicians at his own upscale Washington restaurant, Signatures, and flew them abroad for golf outings was a dramatic tale.

But it was the likelihood that Abramoff now will help federal prosecutors go after members of Congress that gripped official Washington.

"This is going to grow and multiply," said Bill Mateja, a former top official in the Bush Justice Department who's now a Dallas lawyer. "If I were on Capitol Hill, I would be shaking in my boots. Because if anyone knows where the skeletons are buried, it's Jack Abramoff."

The Abramoff case could rival or surpass the 1980 Abscam case, in which an FBI sting trapped members of Congress taking bribes. Six members of the House of Representatives and one senator were convicted then.

It also could make it easier for Americans to see the free flow of money and lobbyist influence in Washington and affect the way they vote in this year's congressional elections. Democrats hope to benefit, but polls so far show both parties losing public esteem.

Justice Department officials said they hoped their extensive investigation would send a message about corruption.

"Government officials and government action are not for sale," said Alice Fisher, an assistant attorney general. "The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these types of cases, which have a devastating impact on the public's trust of government."

The scandal threatens to engulf several high-ranking lawmakers from both major political parties, including:

- Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, the chairman of the House Administration Committee, whose Web page identifies him as the "11th most powerful member of Congress." He took a golf trip to Scotland on Abramoff's tab, but says he did nothing wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0007822

- Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, who was forced to step down last fall as House majority leader when he was indicted on a campaign-finance charge that isn't related to the Abramoff case. DeLay denies any wrongdoing in taking overseas trips financed by Abramoff. His spokesman said Tuesday that all of DeLay's actions were approved by the House ethics committee.

- Rep. John Doolittle, R-Calif., the secretary of the House Republican Conference, who took campaign contributions from Abramoff and whose wife was hired by an Abramoff foundation. Doolittle denies that his intervention in a California Indian casino case, which would've helped Abramoff, was connected to his relations to the lobbyist.

- Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., the Senate minority leader, who's denied that his intercession in an Indian-casino case that would've helped Abramoff was linked to a $5,000 contribution from an Abramoff client.

"Abramoff probably had relationships with lots more members of Congress," said Melanie Sloan, a former federal prosecutor, the head of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington and who's supported Democrats. "He's clearly been spilling his guts for several months."

Abramoff's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, said in a statement that his client "intends to continue to work with the Justice Department and others to fully resolve all matters of interest, to provide restitution to anyone he has harmed, and to seek absolution from all."

Abramoff would serve nine and a half to 11 years of his sentence under federal guidelines. That could be reduced further with his cooperation in the investigation. He also faces a fine of more than $750,000 and mandatory restitution estimated to be about $26.7 million - $1.7 million of that to the Internal Revenue Service for evading taxes, plus an undetermined amount of back taxes.

The lobbyist was contrite as he faced U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle.

"Your honor, words will not be able to ever express how sorry I am for this, and I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused," he said.

"All of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done. I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and from those I have wronged or caused to suffer. I will work hard to earn that redemption."

The most far-reaching charge said Abramoff corruptly influenced public officials and their relatives.

"Abramoff and others would offer and provide things of value to public officials, including trips, campaign contributions, meals and entertainment in exchange for agreements that the public officials would use their official positions and influence to benefit defendant Abramoff's clients and ... businesses," the federal charge said.

It didn't identify any public officials by name.

But it did say Abramoff influenced a House Committee chairman identified as "Representative A." It said Abramoff used "a lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world famous courses, tickets to sporting events ... regular meals at Abramoff's upscale restaurant, and campaign contributions" to win official favors from the congressman.

Representative A is apparently Ney.

An Abramoff partner, Michael Scanlon, who formerly had worked for DeLay, pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to bribe Ney. Ney has denied wrongdoing.

"At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Ney said in a statement.

The plea bargain also said Abramoff had defrauded several Indian tribes by charging them huge fees while lying about his work or the way that money was funneled to him. For example, it said he urged them to hire other firms while concealing that he got a 50 percent kickback from more than $54 million that the tribes paid those firms.

Abramoff greased his relationships with golf trips, meals at his restaurant and seats in his luxury skyboxes at Washington sports events. He and his clients also contributed freely to campaigns, $4.4 million since 2000, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics.

With the investigation threatening to spread, several members of Congress recently returned campaign contributions to Abramoff, a trend that House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., joined Tuesday evening. He announced that he'd return $70,000 in contributions from Abramoff-related clients, including Indian tribes.

DOJ_NMG_0007823

Previously, Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., returned $18,892. That amount included $1,892, the value of seats in Abramoff's skybox at a Washington sports arena, which Baucus had used but never reported.

Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., gave back $67,000 in Abramoff-related donations.

Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., returned more than $150,000 and summed up what probably is the prevailing attitude in Congress toward the once-popular lobbyist.

"This Abramoff guy is a bad guy," Burns told a Montana television station last month. "I hope he goes to jail and we never see him again. I wish he'd never been born, to be right honest with you."

Knight Ridder correspondents James Kuhnhenn and Maria Recio contributed to this report.

Lobbyist Admits Fraud And Bribe Plots (FT)

By Patti Waldmeirin Washington

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

Jack Abramoff, Republican lobbyist and central figure in an influence-peddling scandal with reverberations throughout Washington, yesterday pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges and agreed to help prosecutors investigate the activities of top US lawmakers including Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader.

Mr Abramoff yesterday pleaded guilty to conspiring to defraud his lobbying clients, breaking federal lobbying laws and conspiring to bribe lawmakers and congressional aides with campaign contributions, meals, trips and sports tickets. He is expected to serve about 10 years in prison.

According to the charges filed yesterday, Mr Abramoff and a former aide to Mr DeLay, Michael Scanlon, overbilled several Indian tribes who were their clients. They then diverted the money either into their own pockets, or used it to provide what the charges said was "a stream of things of value", including a lavish golfing trip to Scotland, for a lawmaker and his staff.

No politicians are named in the papers filed yesterday by the Justice Department, but prosecutors are understood to be investigating at least a dozen lawmakers, congressional aides and lobbyists, including Mr DeLay and Bob Ney of Ohio, a fellow Republican lawmaker.

Mr Abramoff's long-awaited decision to plead guilty and co-operate with federal investigators will give the Justice Department powerful new ammunition in its probe of alleged patterns of corruption and bribery within the ranks of the Republican leadership.

Democrats are hoping to exploit the perception of a "culture of corruption" among Republican leaders in November elections, although some Democrats also received campaign contributions from Mr Abramoff.

The charges yesterday said: "It was a purpose of the conspiracy for defendant Abramoff, Scanlon and others to enrich themselves by obtaining substantial funds from their clients through fraud and concealment."

Some of these funds were used to try to influence an unnamed Congressman to "perform a series of official acts" including passing legislation. Sports tickets and meals at Mr Abramoff's upmarket Washington restaurant were lavished on lawmakers. The charges also included breaking lobbying laws by hiring congressional staffers to lobby their former bosses within a year of their employment on Capitol Hill.

Yesterday's charges are separate from those pending against Mr Abramoff in Florida, where he has been charged with conspiracy and wire fraud.

Scott McClellan, White House spokesman, said that "if laws were broken, [Mr Abramoff] must be held to account for what he did".

Lobbyist Abramoff Pleads Guilty To Conspiracy, Fraud (LAW)

By Andy Metzger, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 4, 2006

Scandal-plagued lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty Tuesday to three counts of conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion as the Justice Department's investigation shifts away from Abramoff and toward lawmakers and Hill staffers who allegedly accepted what Abramoff now says were bribes.

DOJ_NMG_0007824

The plea deal could send Abramoff to prison for nine to 12 years and will require him to pay about $25 million in restitution to his former Native American tribal clients that he admitted to defrauding. Abramoff is also expected to plead guilty later this week to fraud charges in Florida, bringing an end to both of the Justice Department's investigations into him.

In a deal that closely mirrors the one made in November by former business partner Michael Scanlon, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges, Abramoff admits to providing trips, entertainment, and campaign contributions to Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, in return for several official favors. Ney is identified in the plea document as "Representative #1." (Ney's lawyer has stated that Ney is Representative #1).

Ney issued a statement Tuesday denying that he has done anything improper or illegal. "At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Ney said in the statement, which echoes his past remarks on the matter.

Abramoff also admitted to defrauding his tribal clients by directing them to pay millions of dollars to Scanlon's consulting and public relations company, but concealing that he received kickbacks from Scanlon equal to half of the profits -- an amount that exceeded $20 million. The charge that Abramoff defrauded Indian clients first surfaced in February 2004. Since then, the corruption investigation has widened to include Congress and members of the Bush administration. According to published reports, the Justice Department is currently investigating as many as 20 congressmen and Hill staffers.

At the hearing Tuesday in a Washington, D.C., federal courtroom, Abramoff appeared a hollow shell of the K Street power broker that he once was. Frowning and avoiding eye contact throughout the hearing with anyone except U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle, Abramoff often seemed on the brink of tears as he sat quietly at the defense table. He answered Huvelle's questions in monosyllables and barely spoke above a whisper. In a prepared statement Abramoff delivered at the end of the hearing, he said: "Words will not be able to ever express how sorry I am for this, and I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused. I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and from those I have wronged or caused to suffer."

Abramoff and his attorney, Abbe Lowell, did not answer questions after the hearing. Lowell released a statement saying his client had been in talks with the Justice Department for 18 months.

With Abramoff and his former business partner Scanlon both having cut plea deals to cooperate with prosecutors, all attention is now focused on Capitol Hill. According to published reports, lawmakers under investigation by the Justice Department include Ney, Rep. John Doolittle, R-Calif., Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., and former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas.

In addition to identifying Ney, Abramoff also implicated two congressional staffers-turned-lobbyists who worked for him at Greenberg Traurig. In the plea document they are referred to only as Staffers "A" and "B."

In his plea Abramoff alleges that Staffer A solicited contributions from Abramoff's lobby clients for a charity that Abramoff controlled. Those funds were then used to finance a golf trip to Scotland attended by Ney. During the hearing Judge Huvelle stated that the activities of Staffer A's wife and her organization are also under investigation.

Abramoff also claims in his plea that Staffer B, a former Ney aide who joined Abramoff's team at Greenberg, was the conduit through which he communicated with Ney to arrange what Abramoff now says were corrupt acts.

Neil Volz, Ney's former chief of staff who worked for Abramoff at Greenberg and is now a lobbyist with Barnes & Thornburg, is under investigation by the Justice Department. Other lobbyists under investigation are Tony Rudy, a former DeLay staffer who worked at Greenberg for a year before joining Alexander Strategy Group. Rudy's wife, Lisa, operated Liberty Consulting, which did work for several Abramoff clients and associates. Edwin Buckham, another former DeLay staffer now at Alexander Strategy, and Kevin Ring, a former chief of staff for Doolittle who later went to work for Abramoff, are also being investigated by the Justice Department, according to several published reports.

Ring declined to comment, citing the ongoing investigation. The others did not return calls for comment before deadline.

Abramoff Pleads Guilty, Agrees To Aid Probe Into Congress (BOS)

By Michael Kranish, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0007825

WASHINGTON -- Lobbyist Jack Abramoff yesterday pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud, and tax evasion charges in one of the biggest corruption cases in recent Washington history, agreeing to cooperate with prosecutors who are investigating whether members of Congress took bribes from him in exchange for favors.

Abramoff admitted that he told Indian tribes to give money to a lobbying firm while hiding his own $20 million take and that he also tried to bribe public officials, the government said.

The plea bargain sent shockwaves through Capitol Hill as lawmakers awaited word on possible indictments of members of Congress. The government said Abramoff gave "money, meals, trips, and entertainment to public officials and their relatives . . . in return for agreements to perform official acts."

The indictment did not provide the name of any public official who took action after receiving money or gifts from Abramoff. But it does refer to Abramoff's collaboration with an unnamed member of Congress. Yesterday Representative Robert W. Ney, Republican of Ohio, issued a statement indicating that he was the unnamed member, and denied any wrongdoing.

In pleading guilty, Abramoff told US District Court Judge Ellen Huvelle: "Words will not ever be able to express my sorrow and my profound regret for all my actions and mistakes. I hope I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and those I've wronged or caused to suffer."

The head of the Justice Department's criminal division, Alice S. Fisher, vowed to continue the investigation no matter where it leads.

"Government officials and government action are not for sale," she said at a news conference. "The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these types of cases, which have a devastating impact on the public's trust of government."

The charges against Abramoff revolved around his scheme to collect $20 million from Indian tribes in Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, and Texas.

Separately, Abramoff today is expected to plead guilty to charges involving fraudulent financial dealings in seeking to purchase a Miami cruise ship company, a deal that was largely unrelated to his tribal lobbying.

Abramoff, 46, faces up to 30 years in jail for the Washington-based charges, but prosecutors said that could be cut to 9 1/2 years under sentencing guidelines, with a possible further reduction for cooperating with the government in cases against others. He is expected to pay $25 million in fines to his victims and $1.7 million in evaded federal taxes. Prison time from his Miami charges could be served concurrently with his Washington-based charges, a Justice official said.

The case has been the talk of Washington for months because Abramoff has been a close associate of many leading officials, most of them Republicans. Abramoff was a top fund-raiser for President Bush and worked closely with Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader who resigned his leadership post late last year after being indicted in a separate case alleging violation of Texas voting laws.

In addition, Abramoff had close dealings with such high-profile Republicans as antitax activist Grover G. Norquist and former Christian Coalition director Ralph Reed.

Abramoff's role unraveled partly because of hundreds of e-mails between Abramoff and various associates obtained by federal investigators. While Abramoff represented himself publicly as a pious man who worked on behalf of tribal interests, he described tribal leaders in one e-mail as "moronic," adding: "I'd love us to get our mitts on that moola!! Oh well, stupid folks get wiped out."

Prosecutors made the deal with Abramoff partly in hopes of gaining new information for their investigation into the activities of an undisclosed number of public officials, including members of Congress and congressional aides.

Abramoff urged tribes to give money to numerous public officials, and at least two dozen members of Congress have returned contributions related to Abramoff. Senator Conrad Burns, Republican of Montana, returned $150,000 just before Christmas. Senator Byron L. Dorgan, a North Dakota Democrat, returned $67,000. Both have denied wrongdoing.

Abramoff got his start in politics at Brandeis University in Massachusetts in 1980, organizing college Republicans and forming an alliance with a Weston native, Norquist, who was rallying GOP members at Harvard Business School. The pair moved to Washington, where they worked for the national party with another rising GOP star, Reed.

DOJ_NMG_0007826

Abramoff's lobbying for tribes took off in the late 1990s, when some Republicans were pushing for a tax on Indian casino profits. Abramoff was hired by tribes to help kill the tax idea. Then Abramoff started collecting millions of dollars from tribes to help other casino interests.

The indictment cited four examples of how Abramoff exploited tribes, in conjunction with Capitol Campaign Strategies, the firm run by his partner, Michael Scanlon, a former DeLay press secretary who has pleaded guilty in a related case. The indictment declared that by concealing their conspiracy, Abramoff and Scanlon violated laws against fraudulent dealings. The two called the scheme "Gimmie Five," shorthand for Abramoff's collection of half of the profits:

Abramoff advised the Mississippi band of Choctaw Indians to hire Capitol Campaign Strategies for $14 million without disclosing to the tribe that he had secretly arranged to receive $6.4 million in that arrangement.

Abramoff advised the Louisiana Coushatta tribe to pay his partner, Michael Scanlon, and others $31 million without disclosing to the tribe that he would receive $11.4 million.

Abramoff advised the Michigan Saginaw Chippewa tribe to pay Capitol Campaign Strategies $3.5 million without disclosing to the tribe that he would receive $540,000.

Abramoff persuaded the Texas Tigua tribe to pay Scanlon $4.2 million in its effort to win approval for reopening its casino, without disclosing to the tribe that Abramoff would receive $1.8 million and that Abramoff was working separately to oppose the Tigua's effort to reopen the casino.

No charges were filed related to the work by Abramoff's firm for the Mashpee Wampanoag tribe of Massachusetts, which paid $50,000 to two of Abramoff's partners as part of an effort to win federal recognition and possibly build a casino.

While Abramoff's dealings with the tribes were widely publicized during Senate hearings into his tribal lobbying, his relationships with members of Congress received far less scrutiny during that probe. As a result, there has been much tension on Capitol Hill about whether Abramoff would strike a deal and implicate lawmakers. Those fears may have been increased by a portion of the Abramoff indictment that refers to "bribery and . . . fraud involving public officials."

Much of the speculation yesterday was focused on Ney, the chairman of the Committee on House Administration. Ney's congressional website notes that he has been described as the 11th most powerful member of Congress.

The indictment says Abramoff "provided a stream of things of value to a Member of the United States House of Representatives (Representative #1) and his staff." The indictment says that gifts include "a lavish trip to Scotland to play on world famous courses, tickets to sporting events, and other entertainment," and campaign contributions.

Some of the money for the Scotland trip came from a $50,000 donation Abramoff arranged from the Tigua tribe, the indictment said.

In exchange for those gifts, the indictment says, the congressman worked on "advancing the application" by an Abramoff client to get a wireless telephone system installed in House offices.

As soon as Abramoff's plea bargain was released, Ney issued a statement alluding to his involvement with Abramoff in matters covered by the indictment, but denying any wrongdoing.

"At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Ney said in a statement yesterday. His spokesman added that "the truth will show that congressman Ney did nothing wrong."

Representative Martin T. Meehan, the Lowell Democrat, said he hoped that the plea bargain will lead Congress to tighten lobbying restrictions, just as the Watergate scandal prompted limits on campaign contributions. Meehan has proposed legislation that requires lobbyists to disclose meetings with members of Congress, among other measures.

"Given the plea bargain agreement, there is an assumption that there is more to this case than we know," Meehan said, when asked in a telephone interview about the state of concern about possible future indictments. "This agreement means that Abramoff's web of corruption will begin to unravel. That can only help our efforts to pass meaningful lobbying and ethics reforms."

The plea deal follows a number of high-profile cases affecting top Republicans, including the DeLay indictment, the indictment of former vice presidential chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby in the CIA leak case, and a guilty plea on bribery charges by former US representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

DOJ_NMG_0007827

Hastert Donates Abramoff-linked Money (CNN)

CNN.com, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- House Speaker Dennis Hastert became the latest lawmaker to dump campaign contributions from clients of high-flying lobbyist Jack Abramoff, giving about $70,000 to charity Tuesday.

The donation came after Abramoff pleaded guilty to corruption charges and agreed to cooperate with a federal corruption investigation in Washington.

"The speaker believes that while these contributions were legal, it is appropriate to donate the money to charity," a spokesman for the Illinois Republican, Ron Bonjean, said. Bonjean did not specify which group or groups would receive the money.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion charges in an agreement with federal prosecutors that could have a wide-reaching effect in Washington. (Full story)

Abramoff is a former College Republican chairman with longstanding ties to top Republicans in Washington, including former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, conservative activist Grover Norquist and former Christian Coalition chief Ralph Reed.

A source close to the probe said investigators are looking at about a half dozen members of Congress, while a senior government official told CNN the probe involves about two dozen lawmakers and staffers.

Sources told CNN that Abramoff might have thousands of e-mails in which he describes the influence-peddling in which he was involved and explains what lawmakers were doing in exchange for the money he was putting into their campaign coffers.

Abramoff's guilty plea comes as Democrats head into the 2006 congressional elections by blasting what they call a "culture of corruption" surrounding the Republican leadership.

About two-thirds of the more than $4.4 million in political donations from Abramoff, his clients and associates since 1998 went to Republicans, according to records compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics, a campaign-finance watchdog group. A search of Federal Election Commission records since 1998 found no personal donations from Abramoff to Democrats.

Republican Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana told The Washington Post in December that he would return $150,000 in contributions from Abramoff, his clients and associates. Burns is up for re-election in November, and state Democrats have been hammering him over his ties to the lobbyist.

DeLay's political action committee, Americans for a Republican Majority, has returned $5,000 from Abramoff, according to federal election records. The Texas congressman gave up his leadership post in September after his indictment on charges that he improperly steered corporate money into the state's 2002 legislative races -- a case unrelated to Abramoff's. DeLay's trial in Texas on money laundering charges is pending. He has pleaded not guilty.

And North Dakota Sen. Byron Dorgan said in December that he would return $67,000 in donations from Indian tribes Abramoff represented. Dorgan, the ranking Democrat on the Indian Affairs Committee that investigated Abramoff's dealings with his tribal clients, told a North Dakota newspaper that he would not keep any money that "could have been the result of any action Mr. Abramoff might have taken."

He praised the Justice Department for securing Abramoff's plea agreement, saying in a written statement Tuesday that it "confirms much of the work that we have done and much of what we have found."

CNN congressional correspondent Ed Henry contributed to this report.

Mr. Abramoff's Plea (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

OMINOUSLY FOR members of Congress and their staffers who enjoyed themselves at his expense and then did his bidding, disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff agreed yesterday to plead guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. His deal follows a similar plea by Michael Scanlon, Mr. Abramoff's partner in lobbying and in crime. Mr. Abramoff admitted to bilking his clients, deceiving his law firm, misusing charities and lying on his income taxes. He also admitted to bribing at least one member of Congress and his staff, plying them with perks and being more than amply thanked by their help for his clients. Now that the two biggest private-sector targets in this case have agreed to cooperate, prosecutors can concentrate on the public officials involved.

As outlined in the charges filed against Mr. Abramoff, he and Mr. Scanlon "provided a stream of things of value" to a member of Congress and his staff, "including but not limited to a lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world-famous courses, tickets to sporting events and other entertainment, regular meals at defendant Abramoff's upscale restaurant, and campaign contributions for Representative #1, his political action committee, and other political committees on behalf of Representative #1." The public record makes clear that the unnamed representative is Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Administration Committee.

If the allegations are true, Mr. Ney ought to be not only ashamed but also embarrassed at how cheaply he and his staff could be bought. "In exchange for those things of value," the document dryly recites, the lobbyists obtained "agreements to support and pass legislation, agreements to place statements into the Congressional Record, meetings with defendant Abramoff's clients, and advancing the application of a client of defendant Abramoff for a license to install wireless telephone infrastructure in the House of Representatives."

Most of these details were already known. But Mr. Abramoff's cooperation -- he's been talking behind the scenes to prosecutors for months -- could expand prosecutors' knowledge about his entanglements with other officials. Notable among them are former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), who took three overseas trips with Mr. Abramoff and received more than $70,000 from the lobbyist, his associates and tribal clients, and the former second-ranking official at the Interior Department, J. Steven Griles, the recipient of an Abramoff job offer and a target of numerous Abramoff-initiated lobbying contacts.

Mr. Abramoff's plea -- he agreed to pay $25 million in restitution and faces a lengthy prison term -- wouldn't have come about without enterprising journalism, the tenacity of Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and the skilled efforts of federal prosecutors. But one player remains notable for its absence: the House ethics committee, which has been silent and, for most of the past year, dysfunctional. It is critical that the panel -- and its Senate counterpart, if appropriate -- rouse itself to deal with the scandal in its midst.

Reed Opponents Link Candidate To Abramoff Plea (AP)

By Doug Gross

AP, January 4, 2006

ATLANTA - Opponents of former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed in his bid for lieutenant governor wasted no time Tuesday tying the Republican to embattled lobbyist Jack Abramoff - who pleaded guilty to federal conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud charges.

Reed has said he regrets funding a multistate antigambling campaign with money from Abramoff's gambling-industry clients. Reed angered religious groups - considered his political base - when it was revealed that his work was paid for by Indian tribes with casinos who were trying to shut down would-be competitors.

Reed has not been accused of a crime.

A spokeswoman for Reed did not respond to several telephone calls and e-mails by The Associated Press seeking comment on Tuesday.

"The only thing I can say is that if you're Ralph Reed, you're awfully nervous right now," said Greg Hecht, a former state senator seeking the Democratic nomination for lieutenant governor. "When you get certain candidates that seem to intimate they hold a higher moral position than others, it becomes a real problem and this may just be one step in a line of difficulties for him."

Former state representative and Department of Human Resources commissioner Jim Martin, of Atlanta, also is seeking the Democratic nomination.

Brad Alexander, spokesman for state Sen. Casey Cagle - Reed's opponent in the Republican primary - said Cagle remains focused on his own agenda, but was quick to link Reed to Abramoff's plea.

"We have every confidence the ongoing Justice Department investigation will fully review the evidence and continue to seek appropriate legal remedies on behalf of all those wronged by Jack Abramoff, Ralph Reed, and the others involved in this matter," Alexander said.

DOJ_NMG_0007829

Abramoff agreed Tuesday with U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Huvelle when she said he had engaged in a conspiracy involving "corruption of public officials." The lobbyist also agreed when she said he and others had engaged in a scheme to provide campaign contributions, trips and other items "in exchange for certain official acts."

Prosecutors also say Abramoff and lobbying partner Michael Scanlon, who pleaded guilty in November, conspired to defraud Indian tribes in Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, New Mexico and Texas of millions of dollars.

Abramoff reaped roughly $20 million in hidden profits from the scheme, according to the information.

In a speech posted on Reed's campaign Web site in December, he said a lot of good came from his antigambling efforts. "Nevertheless, had I known then what I know now, I would not have undertaken that work," he said.

A campaign spokesman said Reed made the speech Dec. 9 before a Christian youth group in Alpharetta.

Throughout A City, Lessons Of The Fall (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

It was just past noon yesterday, about the time Jack Abramoff would be sitting down to lunch at Signatures, the restaurant he owned at Eighth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue NW. Over the roasted waluu ($19) or perhaps a starter of Kobe pot stickers ($12), he would be securing favors for his lobbying clients from well-fed lawmakers.

But the doors were locked at Signatures yesterday, the political memorabilia removed from the walls, the tablecloths gone, trash on the floor, dishes stacked on tables and stools stored on the counter of the still-stocked bar. A Zagat sticker in the window prematurely promised: "Rated Excellent 2006."

Instead of a table at the now-defunct restaurant, Abramoff had a lunchtime appointment three blocks down Pennsylvania, at the federal courthouse. There, in black raincoat and fedora, he pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax offenses that could cost him $25 million and put him behind bars for at a least a decade.

"I just want to say words will not ever be able to express my sorrow and my profound regret for all my actions and mistakes," Abramoff, slouched over the defense table, said quickly and softly into the microphone. "For all of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done. I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and from those I have wronged or caused to suffer."

Abramoff cut a wretched figure as he shuffled into the courtroom of Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle. The once-athletic lobbyist was slouching, his newly overweight frame wrapped in a double-breasted suit. His hand shook when he took his oath. After his plea, he closed his eyes and looked as if he were going to cry. He accepted soothing pats on the back from his lawyer. He clasped his hands together and rubbed fingers as if attempting to thumb-wrestle himself. Only the cufflinks and sharp blue tie hinted at the vast wealth and power Abramoff had amassed.

Abramoff was not alone in his misery. Away on an extended recess, lawmakers and staffers who were involved in the lobbyist's schemes had to worry that Abramoff would testify against them. And President Bush, who had returned to Washington with hopes of switching the debate to comfortable terrain such as taxes and terrorism, would be bumped out of the news by more scandal.

"Culture of corruption," howled House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean demanded that Bush return more than $100,000 raised for him by Abramoff.

The lobbyist's old friends and beneficiaries only piled on. "Self-serving and fraudulent," charged Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), aka "Representative #1" in court papers.

"Outrageous," said White House spokesman Scott McClellan.

In public, Abramoff's only defenders yesterday were of the $500-per-hour variety. Superlawyer Abbe Lowell, complete with pocket handkerchief, did his best to help his client. He lent him a pen. He poured him some Poland Spring water. He stood at Abramoff's side and guided his client as he went through the plea ceremony.

"I am 46 years old, Your Honor," Abramoff told the judge. "I graduated from Georgetown University Law School."

Without hesitation, the defendant said he was giving up his right to trial without the influence of drugs or mental illness. But when Huvelle went through his misdeeds, Abramoff's voice grew tight and quiet.

DOJ_NMG_0007830

"You failed to disclose" payments?

"Yes, Your Honor."

"You committed fraud?"

"Yes, Your Honor."

There were "misrepresentations made" about Abramoff's Capital Athletic Foundation?

Here Lowell whispered to his client. "That and other entities, Your Honor," Abramoff answered.

He admitted the "golfing trip to Scotland" was not for charitable purposes and agreed that he engaged in a public corruption scheme. "Yes, Your Honor," Abramoff said in a near-whisper. He took a sip of water.

You "provided things of value for an official act?"

"Yes, Your Honor."

"You have committed tax evasion?"

"Yes, Your Honor."

You filed "false and fraudulent forms?"

"Yes, Your Honor."

The disgrace continued for half an hour as Abramoff stood in the well, his fingertips pressing the table. The prosecutor, Mary Butler, told the judge that the lobbyist's passport has been surrendered and that, when Abramoff makes his restitution, "we would not expect it to be less" than $25 million. At this, the defendant gripped the table tightly.

Although prosecutors are recommending 9 1/2 to 11 years in prison, Huvelle repeatedly warned Abramoff that she is "not bound by these guidelines" and could sentence him to up to 30 years.

Abramoff rubbed his neck. "Yes, Your Honor."

The plea hearing was over, but not the ordeal. About 100 reporters formed a gantlet down the narrow hallway, peppering Abramoff -- "A statement outside?" "Jack, any reaction?" -- and following him to a waiting Town Car. Cameras pressed to the car's window, trained on the unhappy man in the black fedora. Even the loyal Lowell, climbing into the car, let a fleeting smile escape.

Plea Deal Stokes Anxiety On Hill Superlobbyist Abramoff Agrees To Help In Inquiry Involving Lawmakers (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard And Kevin Johnson

USA Today, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former superlobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty Tuesday to three felony counts of fraud, conspiracy and tax evasion, agreeing to help prosecutors in a wide-ranging probe of corruption in Congress.

Abramoff told U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle, “I plead guilty, your honor,” in a soft voice as each count was read. “All my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct,” he added before leaving the courtroom.

Abramoff had close ties to Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas and other legislators. Over the past six years, Abramoff and Indian tribes he represented gave more than $4.4 million in political contributions to more than 240 lawmakers, nearly two-thirds to Republicans.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., on Tuesday became the latest to unload Abramoff-tainted money, announcing he would give more than $60,000 to charity.

“The fear level on Capitol Hill, on a scale of 100, is 105,” said Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute. “Anybody touched by Abramoff is having difficulty sleeping these days.”

Abramoff, 46, also was to plead guilty to two counts of fraud today in a second case, involving a Florida business deal to buy a casino boat business. He was indicted last year in that case.

As part of Tuesday's plea deal, Abramoff will repay those he cheated, but it's unclear whether he can fully repay the $25 million in losses. He also is liable for $1.7 million in back taxes and penalties. The charges carry maximum penalties of 30 years in jail, but sentencing guidelines and his cooperation could bring that down to about 10 years.

A charging document accompanying the plea deal described an arrangement between Abramoff and a House member previously identified as Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, by the lawmaker's attorney. The House member did favors for Abramoff clients in return for "a stream of things of value," including travel, meals and entertainment, the document says.

In a statement, Ney denied he had been influenced by Abramoff. "At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature" of his activities, the statement said.

The probe goes beyond Ney's office. At least 12 lawmakers, their aides or other officials are the focus of the probe, say two federal officials briefed on the matter but who aren't authorized to speak publicly about ongoing investigations. It's unclear how many congressional offices are involved.

Abramoff built his lobbying practice over the past decade, raking in millions of dollars from clients who sought to harness his close government ties, especially Congress' GOP majority.

His specialty was representing Indian tribes with gambling interests, promising to protect them from federal taxation and competition.

In Senate hearings last year, Abramoff was portrayed as a power broker run amok. Testimony from tribal leaders and e-mails between Abramoff and his partner, Michael Scanlon, showed how they enriched themselves from the $82 million they billed the tribes. Scanlon, a former DeLay aide, pleaded guilty in November to fraud and bribery.

Abramoff Deals, Congress Quakes (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann And Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - Washington's long-awaited "A-bomb" has gone off.

Super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea Tuesday to three felony counts sets the stage for the biggest congressional scandal perhaps in decades, certainly since the Republicans took over Congress 10 years ago, pledging clean government.

In exchange for his guilty pleas, in both the Washington case and a separate Florida case in which he was indicted last year, Mr. Abramoff will cooperate with federal prosecutors investigating members of Congress, Capitol Hill aides, and other lobbyists. Political players with ties to Abramoff and his network, who knew the lobbyist was preparing to cut a deal, have been sweating for months. Now they're sweating harder.

Though members of both parties are involved, analysts expect Republicans - who control both houses of Congress - to bear the brunt of the political fallout. Abramoff, who has close ties to former House majority leader Tom DeLay of Texas, allegedly funneled campaign donations to lawmakers, who were treated to lavish trips and meals, in exchange for official acts.

"It could end some careers," says Jennifer Duffy, an analyst at the non-partisan Cook Political report.

Stanley Brand, a Washington defense lawyer and former Democratic counsel to the House, predicts at least six members of Congress and at least as many staff will be convicted by the end of the year.

Besides Representative DeLay, who is already under indictment in Texas, other members who are already battling allegations over their associations with Abramoff include Sen. Conrad Burns (R) of Montana, Rep. Bob Ney (R) of Ohio, and Rep. John Doolittle (R) of California.

Federal campaign records show that about 220 members of Congress received some $1.7 million in political contributions from Abramoff and his associates and clients, including American Indian tribes, between 2001 and 2004. According to Bloomberg news service, 201 of those members are still in Congress; Republicans received 64 percent of that money.

Since the whiff of scandal began to emerge around Abramoff, members have been rushing to return his contributions or donate the money to charity. But not everyone who ever took Abramoff-related money or perks is guilty of wrongdoing.

"It's not enough to take a campaign contribution," says Mr. Brand. "What's criminal is accepting the contribution in return for an express agreement to perform an official act. Beyond campaign contributions, one can't accept bribes or gratuities of any kind in return for official acts." Members of the executive branch may also be implicated in the investigation, he says.

"The line between a bribe and a legal contribution is very thin, but it is that line that keeps you out of jail," says Larry Noble, executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics. "The critical element is whether there was an understanding or agreement to take specific action in return for the money."

Abramoff joins former associate Michael Scanlon, former press secretary to DeLay, as a witness for the prosecution. Mr. Scanlon reached a plea deal last year, which raised the stakes for Abramoff. The Department of Justice says the two men defrauded Indian tribes they represented out of tens of millions of dollars.

In exchange for the guilty plea and cooperation, Abramoff would probably get a reduced prison sentence. In the Washington case, he faces a maximum of 10 years; in the Florida case, in which he is pleading guilty to fraud and conspiracy in the purchase of a casino cruise line, he could get as many as seven years.

"Up until now, I've said it will involve just a few members," says Mr. Noble. "But if they've reached a plea agreement with Abramoff, it means he's turned over people higher than him, and they must have some pretty strong evidence.

The explosion of the Abramoff scandal also represents bad news for the White House, just as President Bush is preparing for his Jan. 31 State of the Union speech - an effort to build on the momentum he started last month, after a stumbling first year to his second term.

All of Washington is looking ahead to next November's midterm elections, and whether Congress's low approval ratings and Republican woes in particular can grow big enough to swing control of one or both houses of Congress to the Democrats. Polls show that so far, the Democrats' charge that Republicans have created a "culture of corruption" has not seeped into public consciousness. But, analysts say, the 2006 campaign has not started in earnest, and it's too soon to say how the public is perceiving the corruption message.

"This will crowd out a lot of the news about the new Bush agenda," says Paul Light, a political scientist at New York University. "He'll be going up to the Hill to present his agenda, and meanwhile you have six, 12, 20 members desperately trying to return money to Abramoff, and another bunch wondering how they will look in an orange jump suit."

If the Bush White House tries to minimize the scandal, "it feeds the view that Bush doesn't take ethics seriously," says Professor Light. Last year, a top White House aide, I. Lewis Libby, was indicted in the scandal surrounding the public revelation of a CIA agent's identity.

For Congress as an institution, the Abramoff scandal reinforces prevailing attitudes that are already set in stone, says Light, who has studied the issue of trust in politics. "The American public has become inured to congressional scandals, and as long as members are bringing home enough pork, they basically say, a pox on both their houses."

Lobbyist's Guilty Plea Signals Broadening Scandal In Washington (KRT)

By Steven Thomma And Alison Young

Knight Ridder, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - The nation's capital braced Tuesday for a mushrooming political scandal as a well-connected lobbyist pleaded guilty to federal criminal charges and prepared to testify about members of Congress caught in his web of corruption.

Jack Abramoff, 46, invoked God as he apologized and pleaded guilty before a federal judge to one charge each of conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. He faces a maximum of 30 years in prison - and another potential plea in a Florida indictment related to his purchase of a fleet of casino cruise ships from a man who was murdered a few months later.

By itself, the fall of a high-flying lobbyist who collected $80 million in fees from casino-rich Indian tribes, wined and dined politicians at his own upscale Washington restaurant, Signatures, and flew them abroad for golf outings was a dramatic tale.

But it was the likelihood that Abramoff now will help federal prosecutors go after members of Congress that gripped official Washington.

"This is going to grow and multiply," said Bill Mateja, a former top official in the Bush Justice Department who's now a Dallas lawyer. "If I were on Capitol Hill, I would be shaking in my boots. Because if anyone knows where the skeletons are buried, it's Jack Abramoff."

The Abramoff case could rival or surpass the 1980 Abscam case, in which an FBI sting trapped members of Congress taking bribes. Six members of the House of Representatives and one senator were convicted then.

It also could make it easier for Americans to see the free flow of money and lobbyist influence in Washington and affect the way they vote in this year's congressional elections. Democrats hope to benefit, but polls so far show both parties losing public esteem.

DOJ_NMG_0007833

Justice Department officials said they hoped their extensive investigation would send a message about corruption.

"Government officials and government action are not for sale," said Alice Fisher, an assistant attorney general. "The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these types of cases, which have a devastating impact on the public's trust of government."

The scandal threatens to engulf several high-ranking lawmakers from both major political parties, including:

- Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, the chairman of the House Administration Committee, whose Web page identifies him as the "11th most powerful member of Congress." He took a golf trip to Scotland on Abramoff's tab, but says he did nothing wrong.

- Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, who was forced to step down last fall as House majority leader when he was indicted on a campaign-finance charge that isn't related to the Abramoff case. DeLay denies any wrongdoing in taking overseas trips financed by Abramoff. His spokesman said Tuesday that all of DeLay's actions were approved by the House ethics committee.

- Rep. John Doolittle, R-Calif., the secretary of the House Republican Conference, who took campaign contributions from Abramoff and whose wife was hired by an Abramoff foundation. Doolittle denies that his intervention in a California Indian casino case, which would've helped Abramoff, was connected to his relations to the lobbyist.

- Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., the Senate minority leader, who's denied that his intercession in an Indian-casino case that would've helped Abramoff was linked to a $5,000 contribution from an Abramoff client.

"Abramoff probably had relationships with lots more members of Congress," said Melanie Sloan, a former federal prosecutor, the head of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington and who's supported Democrats. "He's clearly been spilling his guts for several months."

Abramoff's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, said in a statement that his client "intends to continue to work with the Justice Department and others to fully resolve all matters of interest, to provide restitution to anyone he has harmed, and to seek absolution from all."

Abramoff would serve nine and a half to 11 years of his sentence under federal guidelines. That could be reduced further with his cooperation in the investigation. He also faces a fine of more than $750,000 and mandatory restitution estimated to be about $26.7 million - $1.7 million of that to the Internal Revenue Service for evading taxes, plus an undetermined amount of back taxes.

The lobbyist was contrite as he faced U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle.

"Your honor, words will not be able to ever express how sorry I am for this, and I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused," he said.

"All of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done. I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and from those I have wronged or caused to suffer. I will work hard to earn that redemption."

The most far-reaching charge said Abramoff corruptly influenced public officials and their relatives.

"Abramoff and others would offer and provide things of value to public officials, including trips, campaign contributions, meals and entertainment in exchange for agreements that the public officials would use their official positions and influence to benefit defendant Abramoff's clients and ... businesses," the federal charge said.

It didn't identify any public officials by name.

But it did say Abramoff influenced a House Committee chairman identified as "Representative A." It said Abramoff used "a lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world famous courses, tickets to sporting events ... regular meals at Abramoff's upscale restaurant, and campaign contributions" to win official favors from the congressman.

Representative A is apparently Ney.

An Abramoff partner, Michael Scanlon, who formerly had worked for DeLay, pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to bribe Ney. Ney has denied wrongdoing.

"At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Ney said in a statement.

The plea bargain also said Abramoff had defrauded several Indian tribes by charging them huge fees while lying about his work or the way that money was funneled to him. For example, it said he urged them to hire other firms while concealing that he got a 50 percent kickback from more than $54 million that the tribes paid those firms.

Abramoff greased his relationships with golf trips, meals at his restaurant and seats in his luxury skyboxes at Washington sports events. He and his clients also contributed freely to campaigns, $4.4 million since 2000, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics.

With the investigation threatening to spread, several members of Congress recently returned campaign contributions to Abramoff, a trend that House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., joined Tuesday evening. He announced that he'd return $70,000 in contributions from Abramoff-related clients, including Indian tribes.

Previously, Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., returned $18,892. That amount included $1,892, the value of seats in Abramoff's skybox at a Washington sports arena, which Baucus had used but never reported.

Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., gave back $67,000 in Abramoff-related donations.

Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., returned more than $150,000 and summed up what probably is the prevailing attitude in Congress toward the once-popular lobbyist.

"This Abramoff guy is a bad guy," Burns told a Montana television station last month. "I hope he goes to jail and we never see him again. I wish he'd never been born, to be right honest with you."

Knight Ridder correspondents James Kuhnhenn and Maria Recio contributed to this report.

Abramoff Pleads Guilty To 5 Criminal Charges (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr. And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Pleading for forgiveness from "the Almighty and those I have wronged," an ashen Jack A. Abramoff, once the most powerful lobbyist on Capitol Hill, stood before a federal judge today and pleaded guilty to a vast scheme of fraud and tax evasion that could send him to prison for nine to 30 years.

Abramoff now becomes the chief witness for the prosecution in its influence-peddling probe of Congress that some say presages the biggest corruption scandal on Capitol Hill in nearly three decades. It has already ensnared at least one member of Congress and two former congressional aides, and could now lead into unknown territory.

The plea includes a requirement that Abramoff cooperate truthfully in the widespread probe of his actions over a decade-long period, a process that could significantly reduce his jail time. Abramoff also must make restitution of some $25 million and pay a little more than $1.7 million in back taxes to the IRS.

Speaking softly, at times barely above a whisper, Abramoff, 46, responded with simple "yes" and "no" answers as he entered the guilty pleas during a 50-minute session before U.S. Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle.

Abramoff wore a rumpled black suit and appeared pale as he stood beside his lawyer, Abbe Lowell, in the packed fourth-floor courtroom. At the end of the court session, Abramoff stood and, with the judge's permission, read from a folded piece of paper.

"I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and those I have wronged or caused to suffer," Abramoff said in his brief statement. "Words will not ever be able to express how sorry I am for this, and I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused."

The indictment caps an intensive and sweeping investigation that the FBI launched in March 2004, and Abramoff's promised cooperation gives that probe a powerful impetus.

Justice Department officials said at a news conference that the fallen dealmaker had already begun sharing information and documents with them.

Officials declined to discuss additional charges, but said they were moving expeditiously, and some legal experts said they expected the agreement would lead to a cascading series of new charges.

"This is just the beginning," said Stanley Brand, a Washington lawyer and former general counsel of the House of Representatives.

"That is the pattern of the Justice Department. They start with the lobbyists and the outsiders, and they build into the public officials," he said. "The members of Congress are the highest point in the food chain."

The scandal is "about an eight on the Richter scale, and it is probably going to be a nine before it is all over," Brand said.

DOJ_NMG_0007835

Abramoff's jail sentence will be set at a later date and will depend on his continued cooperation, according to Mary Butler, the lead prosecutor. The counts of conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion could mean a prison term of up to 30 years. But federal sentencing guidelines call for 9 to 11½ years, officials said.

Abramoff and his attorney left the courthouse without further comment.

Abramoff also has agreed to plead guilty to wire fraud charges in a case in Florida relating to the purchase of a fleet of casino gambling boats, according to Neil Sonnett, his attorney in that case.

The sentences in the two cases are expected to be served concurrently.

Under today's plea agreement, which mirrors charges brought earlier against one of his former partners, Michael P.S. Scanlon, Abramoff admitted to engaging in a conspiracy to defraud Indian tribes of more than $20 million through a secret kickback arrangement.

Scanlon already has entered a guilty plea to a parallel conspiracy charge and has promised to cooperate in the probe.

Abramoff also admitted to defrauding his former law firm, Greenberg Traurig, by having clients direct payments to entities he controlled, bypassing the firm.

According to court documents, Abramoff and Scanlon hid the millions of dollars in fees by persuading Indian tribe clients with casino interests to pay consulting fees to companies and a nonprofit corporation that Abramoff had set up. The two then shared the excess profits "pursuant to their secret agreement."

Abramoff, according to the charges, lied to the tribes, telling them that he was working for nothing and, in some cases, denying any connection to the companies getting the payments. So bold were Abramoff and Scanlon in the scheme they called "Gimme Five," said a federal prosecutor, that in one case they simultaneously collected fees from two Indian tribes on the opposite sides of the same issue.

Though court documents refer only to "Representative One," the documents describe specific actions taken by Rep. Robert Ney (R-Ohio), the chairman of a key House committee.

Abramoff admitted to providing things of value to Ney and members of his staff, including "a lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world famous courses, tickets to sporting events and other entertainment." In return, the documents state, Scanlon and Abramoff got Ney's agreement to support specific legislation and favor an Abramoff client seeking a contract to provide wireless phone services to the U.S. House.

Ney, whose actions also had been cited in the Scanlon case, issued a brief statement denying that he had done anything wrong.

"Congressman Ney has never done anything illegal or improper and the allegations in this plea agreement do not change this fact," said Ney's spokesman, Brian J. Walsh.

A prosecutor, citing the items Abramoff provided to Ney and his staff in return for specific actions, said, "That's not lobbying, that's a crime."

In addition to Ney, the documents filed today for the first time describe specific actions taken by two unnamed former congressional aides who worked in collaboration with Abramoff and Scanlon.

One, "Staffer A", solicited a Michigan Indian tribe to make a $25,000 payment to the Abramoff-controlled Capital Athletic Foundation. Abramoff then "used this money for his personal and professional benefit to partially pay for a golfing trip to Scotland for himself, public officials, members of his staff and others." That same staffer, according to court documents, solicited a distilled beverage company that had hired Abramoff's firm for a $25,000 payment that was funneled to the same nonprofit to fund the same overseas trip.

Another staffer, described as a former chief of staff to Ney and a former chief of staff to the House Administration Committee, was cited in the documents for violating a restriction barring former aides from lobbying their bosses for a year after leaving the public payroll.

Lobbyist Accepts Deal And Becomes Witness In Corruption Case (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to three felony counts on Tuesday as part of a settlement with federal prosecutors, instantly becoming the star witness in a sweeping federal investigation into public corruption in Washington. The inquiry could involve as many as a dozen lawmakers, people involved in the case said.

Mr. Abramoff, 46, once a prominent Republican lobbyist, accepted a recommended reduced prison sentence of about 10 years in exchange for testifying against former associates in the influence-peddling case. The agreement also requires Mr. Abramoff to pay more than $26 million in tax penalties and restitution to former clients, although he has told associates he is broke.

The corruption inquiry involving Mr. Abramoff, potentially one of the most explosive in Congressional history, has expanded in recent months to encompass dozens of political operatives, including former Congressional aides and lobbyists suspected of arranging bribes in exchange for legislative work, participants in the case said.

His testimony, coupled with that of Michael Scanlon, a former Abramoff business associate who pleaded guilty in November, reaches into the executive and legislative branches and appears to be drawing an ever-tighter ring of evidence around the former House Republican majority leader, Tom DeLay, and other senior Congressional Republicans.

Standing hunched in a dark suit in front of a Federal District Court judge, his eyes downcast as the plea deal was announced, Mr. Abramoff bore little resemblance to the brash operative who in hundreds of e-mails messages obtained by prosecutors once boasted about his financial kickbacks, referring to them as a "gimme five" scheme.

Instead, in front of Judge Ellen Huvelle, Mr. Abramoff confessed to making "a multitude of mistakes" during a decade or so of lobbying work. In a soft, grainy voice, he pleaded guilty to defrauding at least four Indian tribes of tens of millions of dollars, enticing government officials with bribes and evading taxes.

"All of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done," Mr. Abramoff said. Emerging from the courthouse into a light drizzle wearing a black fedora, he slipped into a waiting car and was driven away. His next public appearance is scheduled for Wednesday in Florida, when he will plead guilty in a related case.

Mr. DeLay, who has taken in thousands in campaign donations from Mr. Abramoff and accompanied the lobbyist on a lavish golf trip to Scotland in 2000, has denied any wrongdoing. Richard Cullen, a former United States attorney representing Mr. DeLay, said his client "is confident that when the Department of Justice completes its investigation and gets to the bottom of this that they will conclude that he did nothing wrong." No lawmaker has been charged in the case.

Court documents filed Tuesday gave a snapshot of what Mr. Abramoff has been telling investigators during their plea negotiations over the last year and a half.

In one instance cited in court documents, Mr. Abramoff directed favors to a senior DeLay staff member - referred to in documents as "Staffer A," but identified by lawyers as Tony C. Rudy, now a Republican lobbyist. Those favors came in the form of payments to Mr. Rudy's wife, Lisa. Mr. Abramoff paid $50,000 to Lisa Rudy through a charity organization in exchange for her husband's "agreement to perform a series of official acts," the plea agreement said.

"Abramoff, Scanlon and others engaged in a course of conduct through which one or both of them offered and provided a stream of things of value to public officials in exchange for a series of official acts and influence," the agreement states.

Also mentioned in the plea agreement was a "Representative No. 1" who, along with members of his staff, accepted gifts, travel and free meals at Mr. Abramoff's restaurant, Signatures, in exchange for legislative help, including inserting a comment into the Congressional Record designed to help Mr. Abramoff with a business deal. Representative Bob Ney, Republican of Ohio, was identified as this figure after court documents were filed in connection with Mr. Scanlon's plea deal. Although Mr. Ney did not deny his association with Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Scanlon on Tuesday, he insisted, as he has in the past, that he was tricked by the two men into doing work on behalf of their lobbying clients.

According to people involved in the case, Mr. Ney's former chief of staff, Neil Volz, is referred to in the documents as "Staffer B," and is accused in the paperwork of violating the one-year lobbying ban after leaving Mr. Ney's office before beginning to lobby his former boss again. Lawyers for Mr. Rudy and Mr. Volz did not return calls seeking comment.

Mr. Abramoff helped funnel more than $1.5 million in campaign donations to hundreds of elected officials, more than half of them Republican, since 2000, according to analyses of his work. As prosecutors threatened to indict him - and ultimately, late Monday night, worked out a negotiated settlement after weeks of intense wrangling - the government's lawyers argued that Mr.

Abramoff had gone past the routine business of campaign fund-raising and political glad-handing into the realm of bribery. Or, as Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher put it on Tuesday, Mr. Abramoff "went far beyond lawful lobbying."

"Government officials and government action are not for sale," Ms. Fisher said, flanked by senior law enforcement officials at a news conference at the Justice Department.

As part of his all-encompassing settlement, Mr. Abramoff plans to plead guilty on Wednesday to two charges of conspiracy and fraud in a related case in Miami stemming from his purchase of a casino boat line, SunCruz Casinos, in 2000. He was scheduled to stand trial in that case next Monday.

That plea provides that all other charges against Mr. Abramoff in the case will be dropped, people familiar with the plea agreement said. He may face up to about seven years of prison time for the Florida charges, but that sentence can be served concurrently with the Washington sentence under the terms of his deal with Justice Department prosecutors. How much time Mr. Abramoff will spend in prison will be determined later, after he has fulfilled most of his obligation to help investigators.

Mr. Abramoff has been in talks with prosecutors for some 18 months, his lawyer in Washington, Abbe D. Lowell, said. According to people involved in the case, all of whom spoke on condition of anonymity because the broader investigation is continuing, Mr. Abramoff at times offered guidance to investigators as they pursued other targets.

According to participants in the case, he has shared information about David H. Safavian, a former Bush administration official indicted last year, and Tim Flanigan, the Tyco executive who withdrew his nomination as the second-in-command at the Justice Department after his ties to Mr. Abramoff came into question.

Tyco is also mentioned, although not by name, in the plea agreement. According to the court document, Mr. Abramoff sent a business proposal to "Company A," a manufacturing and services company identified by participants as Tyco. Mr. Abramoff "falsely advised" the company about the grass-roots company that he suggested they hire, and which in turn kicked back huge sums to Mr. Abramoff.

Mr. Abramoff told Tyco "that he was negotiating on their behalf" to try to save them money "when in fact he was simply setting a high price on services that he controlled and from which he would profit."

The publicly released court documents, followed by the Justice Department's news conference about the case, were designed as a "shot across the bow" to other potential suspects in the inquiry, a person involved said.

"With most cases, the plea is the end, but with Abramoff, the plea is just the beginning," said an F.B.I. official who spoke on condition of anonymity, adding, "This one has legs."

Abramoff Pleads Guilty To 3 Counts (WP)

By Susan Schmidt And James V. Grimaldi

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

Jack Abramoff, the once-powerful lobbyist at the center of a wide-ranging public corruption investigation, pleaded guilty yesterday to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials in a deal that requires him to provide evidence about members of Congress.

The plea deal could have enormous legal and political consequences for the lawmakers on whom Abramoff lavished luxury trips, skybox fundraisers, campaign contributions, jobs for their spouses, and meals at Signatures, the lobbyist's upscale restaurant.

In court papers, prosecutors refer to only one congressman: Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio). But Abramoff, who built a political alliance with House Republicans, including former majority leader Tom DeLay of Texas, has agreed to provide information and testimony about half a dozen House and Senate members, officials familiar with the inquiry said. He also is to provide evidence about congressional staffers, Interior Department workers and other executive branch officials, and other lobbyists.

"The corruption scheme with Mr. Abramoff is very extensive," Alice S. Fisher, head of the Justice Department's criminal division, said at a news conference with other high-ranking officials of the Internal Revenue Service and the FBI. "We're going to follow this wherever it goes."

DOJ_NMG_0007838

Fisher declined to identify the officials under scrutiny. "We name people in indictments," she said, adding: "We are moving very quickly."

Among the allegations in the court documents is that Abramoff arranged for payments totaling $50,000 for the wife of an unnamed congressional staffer in return for the staffer's help in killing an Internet gambling measure. The Washington Post has previously reported that Tony Rudy, a former top aide to DeLay, worked with Abramoff to kill such a bill in 2000 before going to work for Abramoff.

Abramoff's appearance in U.S. District Court came nearly two years after his lobbying practices gained public notice because of the enormous payments -- eventually tallied at $82 million -- that he and a public relations partner received from casino-rich Indian tribes. Yesterday, he admitted defrauding four of those tribal clients out of millions of dollars. He also pleaded guilty to evading taxes, to conspiring to bribe lawmakers, and to conspiring to induce former Capitol Hill staffers to violate the one-year ban on lobbying their former bosses.

Under terms of his plea agreement, Abramoff can expect to receive a prison sentence of 9 1/2 to 11 years, and he is required to make restitution of $26.7 million to the IRS and to the Indian tribes he defrauded. Today he is to plead guilty to fraud and conspiracy counts in a related case in Florida involving his purchase of a casino cruise line.

Standing before U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle in Washington yesterday, Abramoff looked sheepish and sad. "Your Honor, words will not be able to ever express how sorry I am for this, and I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused," he said softly. "All of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done. I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and from those I have wronged or caused to suffer."

Abramoff has been in extensive discussions with government lawyers for months leading up to yesterday's plea.

Ney, chairman of the House Administration Committee, is among the first of those expected to feel the fallout. In the court documents -- which identify him only as "Representative #1" -- Ney is accused of meeting with one of Abramoff's clients in Russia in 2003 to "influence the process for obtaining a [U.S.] visa" for one of the client's relatives and of agreeing to aid a California tribe represented by Abramoff on tax and post office issues.

Ney also placed comments in the Congressional Record backing Abramoff's efforts to gain control of the Florida gambling company, SunCruz Casinos, and offered legislative language sought by Abramoff that would have reopened a Texas tribe's shuttered casino.

The court papers said Ney advanced the prospects of an Abramoff client, a telecommunications company that won a contract to wire the House.

Two of Abramoff's former partners have already pleaded guilty and have promised to cooperate in the ongoing investigation of congressional corruption and are prepared to testify against Ney in connection with his aid in the SunCruz purchase. Prosecutors in Florida and Washington are in discussions about where a case against Ney should be brought, officials said.

Ney reiterated yesterday that he had done nothing wrong and said he was misled by Abramoff.

One of Abramoff's former associates, Michael Scanlon, a onetime press aide to DeLay, was a secret partner in Abramoff's Indian tribal scheme. Abramoff not only charged the tribes lobbying fees but also urged them to hire Scanlon's public relations firm at hugely inflated prices. Scanlon, in turn, kicked back half of the money to Abramoff, who was thus able to conceal the funds from public disclosure and even from the lobbyist's law firm.

They spread tribal money around and sought legislative favors in return. Abramoff and Scanlon "offered and provided a stream of things of value to public officials in exchange for official acts and influence and agreements to provide official action and influence," a statement of facts attached to the plea agreement said. "These things of value included, but are not limited to, foreign and domestic travel, golf fees, frequent meals, entertainment, election support for candidates for government office, employment for relatives of officials and campaign contributions."

Among the things of interest to investigators are payments made by Abramoff and his colleagues to the wives of some lawmakers and actions taken by Rudy and other senior Capitol Hill aides, some of whom went to work for Abramoff at the law firm Greenberg Traurig LLP, lawyers and others familiar with the probe said.

DOJ_NMG_0007839

Another person under scrutiny, sources said, is DeLay, who is facing separate campaign finance charges in his home state of Texas.

"Tom DeLay is not concerned that Mr. Abramoff is cooperating," said Richard Cullen, his attorney. "He urges everyone involved to cooperate in the investigation and to tell the truth." Cullen had no comment on allegations involving former DeLay aides Rudy and Scanlon.

Among the trips under scrutiny is a golf excursion to Scotland that DeLay and aides took with Abramoff in 2000 and a similar trip Ney took two years later.

DeLay has taken three overseas trips with Abramoff since 1997 -- to the Mariana Islands, Russia and Scotland -- and received more than $70,000 from Abramoff, his associates and tribal clients for his campaign committees.

Investigating DeLay could take up to a year and require the cooperation of other witnesses before issues surrounding the Texas Republican are resolved, according to people familiar with the case.

Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) and other legislators involved with Indian issues are among those being investigated, sources said.

A spokesman for Doolittle, whose wife received payments from Abramoff's lobbying firm, has previously said there was no connection with her husband's work. Burns's office has said his actions on behalf of Abramoff's tribal clients were in sync with his support for improving the lot of Indian tribes.

Also of interest to prosecutors is former deputy interior secretary J. Steven Griles, who held the job from 2001 to 2004. He has said he never tried to intercede on behalf of Abramoff's clients, but e-mails released by a Senate committee show more than half a dozen contacts Griles had with Abramoff or with a woman working as the lobbyist's go-between.

Prosecutors are continuing to investigate two of DeLay's top former deputies, Rudy and Edwin A. Buckham. Rudy is under investigation for assistance he allegedly provided Abramoff's lobbying clients while he was working for DeLay. Payments from Abramoff clients and associates to Liberty Consulting -- a political firm founded by Rudy's wife, Lisa -- are also under review by the Justice Department. Rudy did not return calls seeking comment yesterday.

Abramoff maintained a business relationship with Buckham, who runs the Alexander Strategy Group with Rudy. Among the areas of interest to prosecutors is client business directed to the Alexander Strategy Group when the firm was hiring the spouses of members of Congress, including DeLay's wife, Christine.

Christine DeLay was paid about $115,000 over three years while performing a special project -- contacting members of Congress to find out their favorite charity, according to her attorney.

Fisher, offering the Justice Department's first public comments on an inquiry that began in spring 2004, said that the Abramoff case is "very active and ongoing." She said the department is committed to making sure that people know "government is not for sale."

Abramoff Pleads Guilty To Federal Charges (Hchron)

By Micheal Hedges

Houston Chronicle, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Prominent lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who had several ties to former House majority leader Tom DeLay of Sugar Land, pleaded guilty today to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion charges,bringing a wide-ranging corruption probe to the doors of Congress.

As part of his plea bargain, Abramoff is expected to cooperate with prosecutors in their examination of the actions of several congressmen and their top aides. The charges could carry a prison sentence of up to 30 years.

The charges mentioned gifts and contributions to an unnamed House member who has been identified as Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, chairman of the House Administration Committee, allegedly in return for favors.

Ney has not been charged. He and DeLay have denied wrongdoing.

Abramoff agreed with U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Huvelle when she said that he had engaged in a conspiracy involving "corruption of public officials." The lobbyist also agreed when she said he and others had engaged in a scheme to provide campaign contributions, trips and other items "in exchange for certain official acts."

Court papers said Abramoff corruptly gave "money, meals, trips and entertainment to public officials and their relatives with the intent to influence and in return for agreements to perform official acts" benefiting Abramoff, former business partner Michael Scanlon and their clients. The papers said Abramoff caused former congressional aides to lobby their former bosses within a one-year window of employment, during which they are barred from such activities.

Scanlon, DeLay's former press secretary, pleaded guilty in November.

Abramoff was also expected to plead guilty today to two criminal charges in Florida involving a 2000 purchase of a fleet of gambling boats.

U.S. District Judge Paul C. Huck has scheduled a telephone conference for later today on the Florida case.

Abramoff was pressured to plea bargain there when former partner, Adam Kidan pleaded guilty recently to fraud and conspiracy in connection with the SunCruz boat deal.

In Washington, prosecutors say Abramoff and Scanlon conspired to defraud their Indian tribe lobbying clients of about $82 million after being hired to pave the way for gambling casinos and to block others.

Last month, five members of Congress — Rep. Ernest Istook, R-Okla.; Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan.; Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont.; Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont.; and Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D. — returned or gave away campaign donations from Abramoff.

DeLay and Abramoff went on two trips together that have been reviewed by investigators, one to Britain in 2000 and one to the Northern Mariana Islands during the New Year's holiday of 1998. Also, Abramoff clients made donations to DeLay political organizations.

The two men are also linked through several former DeLay staff members who eventually became wealthy working with Abramoff.

DeLay once called Abramoff his best friend.

DeLay attorney Richard Cullen declined to comment Monday amid reports Abramoff would strike a deal with prosecutors.

He has said previously that there was no indication the congressman is in jeopardy from the Abramoff investigation.

"Mr. DeLay is not concerned about the potential of Mr. Abramoff cooperating with the government," Cullen said in a recent interview. "Mr. DeLay thinks everybody should be cooperating (with investigators) and telling the truth."

Cullen said he met with federal prosecutors early in the probe and offered them DeLay's cooperation. Asked if any DeLay records or documents had been subpoenaed by investigators, Cullen said no records were sought.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan today said he did not know whether Abramoff ever met President Bush. Of Abramoff, McClellan said, "What he is reportedly acknowledged doing is unacceptable and outrageous."

"If laws were broken, he must be held to account for what he did," McClellan added.

In October, Bush appointee David Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, was indicted on charges he made false statements and obstructed a federal investigation into his dealings with lobbyist Abramoff.

Meanwhile, the prosecutor in the Texas money laundering case against DeLay issued subpoenas today looking for links between Abramoff and fundraising by the former majority leader.

District Attorney Ronnie Earle issued the subpoenas in Austin.

In the Texas case, Earle sought records from Abramoff's former employers, legal firms Greenberg Traurig LLP and Preston Gates Ellis & Rouvelas Meeds, LLP. He also subpoenaed records from a lawyer for the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, a former Abramoff client, and from a representative for the Barona Band of Mission Indians, a California tribe.

Will DeLay Go Down With His Friend? (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON – Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and lobbyist Jack Abramoff had been friends for years, trading easily on each other's success.

One rose to the pinnacle of power in Congress. The other became the most sought-after lobbyist in town. They built a politically potent network of former aides, lobbyists and comrades-in-arms.

DOJ_NMG_0007841

The question hanging over Washington on Tuesday: Could Mr. Abramoff's plummet and plea deal drag down his longtime ally?

"A lot of people, including Mr. DeLay's political enemies, are hoping that's the case. But I believe they'll be disappointed," said DeLay attorney Richard Cullen.

"DeLay has conducted himself consistently with the standards of conduct in the House and has violated no laws. So he's at peace in terms of where this investigation will end up, and it's premature to jump at the conclusion that Abramoff has information that's troubling to Mr. DeLay," Mr. Cullen said.

The Washington Post reported today that investigators have Mr. DeLay under scrutiny. The financial and political ties between the Sugar Land Republican and Mr. Abramoff are extensive, and their histories and causes are intertwined.

"There is no way this is good for him. How bad it will be will depend on what else we see happen," said Larry Noble, executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics, which studies campaign finance.

In court Tuesday, Mr. Abramoff – facing up to 11 years in prison and $27 million in restitution – confessed to providing all sorts of favors to just one lawmaker, and it wasn't Mr. DeLay. He told the court he'd provided the lawmaker, understood to be Ohio Republican Bob Ney, a "lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world-famous courses, tickets to sporting events and other entertainment," meals at Mr. Abramoff's upscale restaurant and generous campaign donations – largesse he also bestowed on Mr. DeLay.

Targets unknown

Prosecutors cited several favors that Mr. Ney offered in return, including help with Mr. Abramoff's purchase of a fleet of casino ships. Justice Department and FBI officials have offered no such examples involving Mr. DeLay, and they wouldn't say whether they're digging or expect to learn of any in coming months.

Mr. Abramoff and Mr. DeLay worked closely on many projects, traveling together to the Mariana Islands, Russia and the United Kingdom, ostensibly under the auspices of a conservative Washington think tank, the National Center for Public Policy Research. Mr. Abramoff sat on the group's board, and reports surfaced that two of his clients each donated $25,000 to the nonprofit a day before the Britain junket.

House rules prohibit travel paid for by lobbyists or their clients, though Mr. DeLay and other lawmakers on the trip say they had no idea where the group got the funds.

Mr. Abramoff and his partner, former DeLay press secretary Michael Scanlon – who has also pleaded guilty and cooperated with federal prosecutors – routinely boasted of their connections with the majority leader when selling their services to Indian tribes and others.

The Marianas connection could also provide investigators an interesting trail. Mr. DeLay sought to protect the garment industry on the islands, an American commonwealth in the Pacific, from U.S. labor laws.

In 1999, during a power struggle in the local legislature, two former DeLay aides, Ed Buckham and Mr. Scanlon, went to Saipan to persuade two lawmakers to switch sides in a leadership vote, dangling promises of federal largesse for which Mr. DeLay reportedly paved the way later. The favored candidate won and later awarded Mr. Abramoff a contract worth $1.6 million.

During the Marianas visit, Mr. DeLay called Mr. Abramoff "one of my closest and dearest friends," though by early 2004, when a Senate committee had begun investigating the lobbyist, Mr. DeLay tried to distance himself, telling reporters that "if anybody is trading on my name to get clients or make money, that is wrong and they should stop it."

Mr. DeLay and Mr. Abramoff also collaborated closely on the K Street Project, an effort to pressure Washington's premier lobbying firms to shun Democrats and stock their staffs with GOP loyalists. At one point, the House ethics panel reprimanded Mr. DeLay for threatening retaliatory legislation against a trade group for hiring a Democrat as its top lobbyist.

Critics have raised questions about the $115,000 that the congressman's wife, Christine DeLay, was paid over four years by Alexander Strategy Group – a firm led by Mr. Buckham and other former DeLay aides that got client referrals from Mr. Abramoff – for researching the charitable preferences of lawmakers. The DeLays said the work was real and the pay justified.

In the clear?

Jan Baran, a Republican ethics lawyer who once represented Speaker Newt Gingrich, said the plea deal might carry no implications for Mr. DeLay.

"There's nothing in there that involves him or suggests his involvement. ... If the Justice Department has some information about other public officials, they presumably would have included it by now," he said.

He noted that courts are strict when it comes to enforcing bribery law. Prosecutors must prove quid pro quo – Latin for "something for something." Mr. DeLay got favors from Mr. Abramoff. But so did several hundred colleagues.

Bribery would require proving the legislators offered a specific legislative favor in exchange for the power lunches, golf outings, trips and campaign cash. Accepting such dining and activities without the promise of legislative action is routine and legal in Washington.

"Lawful lobbying does not include paying a public official a personal benefit with the understanding, explicit or implicit, that a certain official act will occur. That's not lobbying. That's a crime," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, carefully sidestepping the issue of which lawmakers the Justice Department is targeting.

Investigating Mr. DeLay could take up to a year and require the cooperation of other witnesses before issues surrounding him are resolved, people familiar with the case told The Post..

As speculation bubbled about what Mr. Abramoff could offer federal authorities, there was activity involving Mr. DeLay in Austin.

Travis County prosecutor Ronnie Earle obtained subpoenas Tuesday for donations from two former Abramoff law firms – Greenberg Traurig and Preston Gates – to Mr. DeLay's state political action committee, Texans for a Republican Majority.

The grand jury, which is investigating money-laundering allegations against Mr. DeLay and several lieutenants, also ordered records of campaign donations from Mr. Abramoff's biggest lobbying client, the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians.

Staff writers Michelle Mittelstadt and Allen Pusey in Washington, and Pete Slover in Austin, contributed to this report.

Abramoff's Plea Tightens Noose Around Some Necks (KHOU-TV)

By Shern-Min Chow

KHOU-TV, CBS 11, Houston, TX, January 4, 2006

A high-powered lobbyist with ties to congressman Tom Delay cut a tell-all deal with the Feds.

What does Jack Abramoff's guilty plea mean for DeLay?

No question that's the big question now. How will this impact the former House Majority Leader and word is, about a dozen other congressmen.

None of Tuesday's charges connect Abramoff and DeLay, but Travis County's prosecutor is now issuing subpoenas for records linking the Sugar Land Republican to the lobbyist.

Insiders believe the noose is tightening on some after Abramoff's guilty plea.

Jack Abramoff's guilty pleas, revealed among other things, a stunning fraud scheme. He admits to bilking Indian tribes of more than $60 million and getting nearly half of that in kickbacks.

"Abramoff admitted today to his participation in an extensive corruption shceme. Abramoff gave things of value to public officials including foreign and domestic trips, campaign contributions, excessive meal and entertainment," said Justice Department spokesperson Alice Fisher.

He says those gifts bought legislative favors for his clients.

"As admitted by Abramoff, his actions often produced the official influence he sought," said Fisher.

The immediate fallout to Congressman DeLay? Late Tuesday, his office announced he will donate funds from Abramoff to local charities.

His office says an accounting process is now underway.

DeLay has received at least $57,000 in political contributions from Abramoff, his lobbying associates or tribal clients.

Experts say federal prosecutors will now move onto congressional aides

"The noose is tightening and its tightening through the use of people who are in direct contact with members of Congress," said Stan Brand, former U.S. House Counsel.

Some of those aides also enjoyed the lavish trips. Insiders believe at least a dozen congressmen will be under fire from Abramoff's deal.

In a carefully orchestrated appearance, he told the federal court, "words will not ever be able to express my sorrow and my profound regret."

But the punishment may. Abramoff will pay $25 million in restitution, $1.7 million in unpaid taxes, and prosecutors will recommend a prison sentence of 9 to 11 years.

Wednesday, he appears in Florida on charges relating to a fleet of gambling boats. He's expected to plead guilty to 2 to 6 other charges.

DeLay May Face New Jeopardy As Abramoff Probers Target Ex-Aide (BLOOM)

By Michael Forsythe Jonathan D. Salant

Bloomberg, January 4, 2006

Jan. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Jack Abramoff's guilty plea yesterday pushed the federal investigation of the lobbyist deep into the office of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay by implicating one of his top ex-staffers.

People close to the investigation identified the ``Staffer A" mentioned on page 13 of Abramoff's 15-page plea agreement as DeLay's former deputy chief of staff, Tony Rudy. While a member of DeLay's staff, Rudy helped Abramoff stop a measure that would have prohibited Internet gambling, according to the government. In return, Rudy's wife was paid $50,000 through a non-profit group, the government says. DeLay himself isn't named in the agreement.

The link to DeLay is at least the third to emerge in a 20- month investigation of Abramoff's ties with lawmakers, and it comes as DeLay, 58, fights separate money-laundering charges in Texas that forced him to step down as House majority leader.

Abramoff, 46, told a federal judge in Washington he will cooperate with prosecutors investigating political corruption.

``If I were DeLay, I would be very concerned," said Bill Mateja, a white-collar criminal-defense lawyer with Fish & Richardson PC in Dallas and formerly a senior counsel in the Justice Department's corporate criminal task force. ``A staffer is certainly a subject of the investigation. Whether it takes them all the way to DeLay, we'll have to wait and see."

Rudy didn't return a phone call seeking comment.

Legal Cloud

Abramoff's agreement to cooperate may scuttle DeLay's chances of returning as majority leader, because the Texas Republican may continue to be under a legal shadow for many more months. President George W. Bush said in an interview with Fox News Channel on Dec. 14 that he hoped Delay would be able to reclaim the majority leader's post because of his success in passing legislation.

``Do I? Yes, I do," the president said when asked whether he thought DeLay was innocent in the Texas case. He added, ``When he's over there, we get our votes through the House."

Abramoff's plea also increases the political jeopardy for Republicans in general during this election year, since most of the donations from the lobbyist and his former associates and clients went to members of that party.

Abramoff pleaded guilty yesterday to tax evasion, wire fraud and conspiring to corrupt public officials. He is set to plead guilty today to conspiracy and wire fraud in a separate case in federal court in Miami and will cooperate with prosecutors, according to a copy of the plea agreement obtained by Bloomberg News. The government will dismiss four other charges against him in connection with his purchase of a casino cruise-ship line in 2000, the agreement says.

Legislative Favors

The plea agreement in Washington charged Abramoff with conspiring to corrupt ``Representative #1," previously identified as Representative Robert Ney, an Ohio Republican, in return for legislative favors for the lobbyist's clients. Neither Ney nor DeLay has been charged.

``The corruption scheme with Mr. Abramoff is very extensive, and we will continue to follow it wherever it leads," Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher told reporters. ``This case is very active and ongoing."

In November, former DeLay spokesman Michael Scanlon, Abramoff's business partner, pleaded guilty to helping the lobbyist defraud Indian-tribe clients of more than $50 million. Scanlon is also cooperating with investigators.

Not Concerned

DOJ_NMG_0007844

DeLay's lawyer, Richard Cullen, said DeLay isn't concerned that Abramoff's plea arrangement will put the lawmaker in jeopardy.

``He's not apprehensive about this, because he knows he hasn't done anything wrong and he's confident that will be the ultimate conclusion," Cullen said.

Cullen said he couldn't comment on Rudy, saying DeLay has always demanded that his staff ``comply to the highest ethics and violate no laws. He would have no tolerance with staffers that did not obey the law."

About 220 lawmakers received at least $1.7 million in political donations from Abramoff, his associates and nine tribal clients between 2001 and 2004, according to a review of Federal Election Commission and Internal Revenue Service records. Of those, 201 are still in Congress. Republicans got $1.1 million, 64 percent of the total.

Many lawmakers are giving money back to Abramoff's clients or donating the funds to charity. House Speaker Dennis Hastert, an Illinois Republican, said yesterday he would donate his Abramoff-related money to charity. Hastert received $57,250 from Abramoff, his associates and his clients from 2001 to 2004, ranking fifth among all lawmakers. Republican Senator Conrad Burns of Montana, who ranked first, said last month he'd give donations he got from Abramoff to charity, and Democrat Byron Dorgan of North Dakota, who ranked fourth, said he would send Abramoff-related donations back to the tribes.

Top Recipient

DeLay was the top recipient of funds directly from Abramoff, having accepted $17,000 in donations from the lobbyist from 2001 to 2004.

The reference to Rudy in Abramoff's plea agreement suggests that the investigation is also zeroing in on Capitol Hill staff members as well as lawmakers.

Rudy went to work for Abramoff at the Greenberg Traurig LLP law firm in Washington in 2001. In 2000, Abramoff and former DeLay chief of staff Ed Buckham used their credit cards to underwrite a trip to the U.K. attended by DeLay and his wife, the Washington Post reported in April.

Before Rudy left DeLay's office, he helped Abramoff stop legislation curbing Internet gambling on behalf of eLottery Inc., the Washington Post reported in October.

Internet Gambling

Norwalk, Connecticut-based eLottery paid Abramoff's former firm, Preston Gates LLP, $720,000 in 2000. Preston Gates, Abramoff's employer at the time, said it was lobbying on legislation to ban Internet gambling. The legislation was defeated. DeLay was one of 44 Republicans to vote against the measure in July 2000, with 165 Republicans voting for it. The measure, which needed 270 votes to pass the House, failed by 15 votes.

At the time, Rudy's wife, Lisa, was being paid fees by Toward Tradition, a Seattle-based Orthodox Jewish nonprofit organization run by Rabbi Daniel Lapin, a friend of Abramoff's, the Post reported in October.

Rudy in June 2002 also solicited a $25,000 donation for Abramoff's Capital Athletic Foundation charity from a Cyprus-based importer of Russian vodka, the government charged. Abramoff then used that money to help pay for a Scotland golf trip. The foundation's ledgers, released in November by a Senate Committee investigating the lobbyist, showed Abramoff spent more than $160,000 on the August 2002 trip that was attended by Ney and other officials, including Christian activist Ralph Reed.

Representative Chris Shays, a Connecticut Republican, said in an e-mailed statement that ``Jack Abramoff's guilty plea and his close association with Tom DeLay underscore the need for a new majority leader in the Republican Party."

Shays said that ``it is time we make it clear that ethics are an essential part of how we do business and that our leadership needs to reflect this strong ethical conduct."

Lobbyist's Plea Likely To Expose Seamy Underside Of Congress (USAT)

USA Today, January 4, 2006

Jack Abramoff, the former lobbyist who pleaded guilty Tuesday to fraud and tax evasion, is a vivid illustration of Mark Twain's adage that truth is stranger than fiction. Abramoff got into lobbying after a stint making mediocre action movies. Once in the influence-peddling business, he made a quick fortune by defrauding Indian tribes, representing foreign dictators and cozying up to powerful lawmakers — often at a Pennsylvania Avenue restaurant he owned. (Related: Abramoff pleads guilty)

Perhaps some day someone will make a film about Abramoff. In the meantime, his plea has focused attention on an even more appalling spectacle: the lawmakers that were part of his network.

What is most shocking in the Abramoff case is not that he would want to make a fortune and spread it around to gain power and influence. It is that so many members of Congress would be so quick to accommodate him. As many as 20 lawmakers and senior staff members are believed to be under investigation. That makes Abramoff, who has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors, the most dangerous man in Washington right now.

Prosecutors say Abramoff "engaged in a pattern of corruptly providing things of value to public officials, including trips, campaign contributions, and meals and entertainment, with the intent to influence acts." Officials who were eager to take Abramoff's money are now scrambling to give it away.

The Abramoff scandal is likely to make 2006 the year a seamy underside of Congress comes into full public view. Barely a decade after the arrival of a reformist GOP Congress, the institution has fallen into one of its most tawdry periods ever, with members actively seeking favors in exchange for legislation that sells out the public interest for personal or partisan gain.

Some of their behavior is legal, though troubling. Today's Congress is more than willing to grant special tax breaks to companies and industries that provide the most bountiful political contributions and have the most influential lobbyists.

Some acts of individual lawmakers, though, might exceed even the minimal lobbying laws that govern their behavior. The Abramoff scandal, which touches both parties, shows a widespread sense of entitlement among lawmakers to some of the lifestyle perks that their better-paid lobbyist acquaintances enjoy.

One member of the House, Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, figures prominently in the plea agreement under the pseudonym Representative #1. He is alleged to have acted on Abramoff's behalf 11 times. Former majority leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, is likely to receive intense scrutiny for taking trips to the South Pacific, Scotland and elsewhere bankrolled by Abramoff's groups.

These, however, might be the tip of the too-long-ignored lobbying iceberg. Abramoff is far from the only Washington lobbyist who tried to join with members of Congress in cheating the public.

A full accounting will be a painful episode. It will bring shame to lawmakers and embarrassment to the nation. It will, we hope, lead to changes in the ways lobbyists are regulated and campaigns are financed. It's true that morality can't be legislated. Even so, a cleansing process triggered by the Abramoff scandal can help ensure that fewer members of Congress are beholden to corrupt special interests operating behind the scenes.

It's Not Personal, Jack, It's Strictly Business (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

The sight of Jack Abramoff striding out of federal court here yesterday, looking like a stocky gangster from a 40's movie in black fedora and trench coat, may seem like the strongest evidence so far of how graft and hubris have overwhelmed the capital.

It could have been a scene from "The Godfather," a favorite film of the felonious lobbyist. The Washington Post reported that he "did business with people linked to the underworld," bilked Indian tribes of tens of millions and then lavished a bundle in tribal gambling profits on greedy members of Congress.

The Post said Mr. Abramoff loved to amuse colleagues by imitating Michael Corleone as he rejected a corrupt politician's demand for a share of Mafia gambling money: "Senator, you can have my answer now if you like. My offer is this: nothing."

But just because this is a scale of amorality and blatant sale of government that astonishes even Washington cynics, why look on the dark side?

The Abramoff plea bargain may have left his former business partners and political pals panicking, wondering if the rat will rat them out. The Republican congressmen Tom DeLay and Bob Ney are among the sleazy solons caught up in the scandal, and the House speaker, Dennis Hastert, scrambled yesterday to launder $69,000 in dirty Abramoff contributions, donating the wad to charity. And then there's Ralph Reed, the choirboy Bible thumper who used his links to Christian groups to immorally play Indian tribes off against each other.

But looking at the big picture, in some ways the imperial presidency is working out quite well for everyone.

DOJ_NMG_0007846

Think about it: all those congressmen don't really need to do their jobs anymore. With the president able to make war more or less as he chooses, treat the enemy as he sees fit and snoop on Americans at will, our representatives have more time for the duty many are clearly best suited to: playing golf gratis in Scotland. (Remember how the White House press used to give poor Bill Clinton such a hard time about mere mulligans?)

Now that Dick Cheney has freed Congress from the bother of advising and/or consenting, lawmakers can work on new ways to game the system and wallow in the G.O.P.'s culture of corruption - while tut-tutting about the decline in American moral values.

Since the Republican-run Capitol doesn't have to worry about holding the Bush White House accountable for excesses in torture and spying and the other myriad ways it has placed itself above the law, congressmen have more leisure hours for Abramoff successors to treat them to some Redskins games and steak dinners.

Checks and balances are now as quaint as the Geneva Conventions. Congress is complicit in putting its thumb on the scale for the executive branch.

The Post reported that W. had taken advantage of an innovation started years ago by Samuel Alito Jr. to shore up executive privilege. As a young Justice Department lawyer in the Reagan administration, Mr. Alito created a strategy that has the president declare what laws mean when he signs them. Mr. Alito wanted the courts to focus as much on the president's interpretation of a law as on what he called "legislative intent."

W. has issued at least 108 such statements, The Post said, rejecting "provisions in bills that the White House regarded as interfering with its powers in national security, intelligence policy and law enforcement."

And since the imperial presidency is run by the vice president, W. has a lot of free time to do the things he likes to do. Confined with his wife and mother-in-law at the Crawford ranch, he spent his Christmas vacation mountain-biking and clearing brush.

He left the ranch for a brief visit at Brooke Army Medical Center in San Antonio, where he kidded in a way that again showed his jarring lack of empathy with the amputees from Iraq and Afghanistan: "As you can possibly see, I have an injury myself - not here at the hospital, but in combat with a cedar. I eventually won. The cedar gave me a little scratch. As a matter of fact, the colonel asked if I needed first aid when she first saw me. I was able to avoid any major surgical operations here, but thanks for your compassion, colonel."

W. also used the occasion to defend the Nixonian eavesdropping program that even made John Ashcroft and his deputy, James Comey, skittish. As The Times reported, Andy Card and Alberto Gonzales had to make an emergency trip to see the reluctant Mr. Ashcroft in the hospital in March 2004 to get the program recertified because Mr. Comey had balked.

You know you're in trouble when John Ashcroft is worried about overreaching.

Why Abramoff Matters (USAT)

USA Today, January 4, 2006

•What he knows could help bring criminal charges against at least 12 members of Congress or their aides.

•He paid for trips, donated campaign funds and did favors for Reps. Tom DeLay, Bob Ney and others.

Ex-Conyers Aide Arrested In Ghana On U.S. Fraud Charges (FREEP)

By david ashenfelter and joel thurtell

Detroit Free Press, January 4, 2006

A former aide to Michigan Congressman John Conyers Jr. was arrested in the African nation of Ghana on Friday, eight months after he failed to show up for sentencing on charges of defrauding sponsors and vendors of a national conference for black farmers of more than $150,000 in 1999.

FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said Dewayne Boyd, 49, of Detroit, was arrested by Ghanaian police on Friday.

She said Boyd was returned Sunday to New York, where he was to appear today in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn for a hearing to determine whether he will be returned to Michigan.

DOJ_NMG_0007847

Boyd was convicted by a federal court jury in December 2004 of seven counts of fraud in the scam he ran while working for Conyers, a Michigan Democrat. There was no evidence that Conyers, D-Mich., was aware of the scam. Conyers fired Boyd in 2002.

Relatives Of Missing Cruise Passengers Form New Group (NSDY/AP)

By John Christoffersen, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 4, 2006

STAMFORD, Conn. -- Relatives of cruise passengers who disappeared on the high seas are forming a new group to seek industry reforms, saying they want to draw attention to how they were treated and the extent of crimes aboard the ships.

The group, which includes eight families so far, will seek a second hearing before Congress. The first hearing last month focused largely on the disappearance of George Allen Smith IV of Greenwich in the Mediterranean Sea last July, one of the latest in a string of disappearances in recent years.

"To me the number of disappearances plus the number of sexual assaults they admit to is alarming," said Brett Rivkind, a lawyer for Smith's family and the new group. "The only way they're going to change is by Congress regulating them."

In the past five years, the FBI opened 305 criminal cases on the high seas, Chris Swecker, assistant director of the FBI, testified at last month's congressional hearing. Sexual assaults on cruise ships comprised 45 percent of the cases, while physical assaults made up 22 percent and missing persons 10 percent, Swecker said.

Besides Smith's case, federal agents are investigating an alleged rape of a passenger on the same cruise, a cruise line spokeswoman said Tuesday.

"It's an allegation and we are cooperating with the FBI," Lynn Martenstein, spokeswoman for Royal Caribbean Cruises, told The Associated Press.

The alleged rape occurred three days after Smith disappeared from the ship, Martenstein said. She called the alleged rape a separate incident.

FBI officials declined to comment.

Smith, whose family is part of the new group, vanished July 5 from a Royal Caribbean ship in the Mediterranean Sea between Turkey and Greece. The FBI has been investigating, but no one has been charged and no body has been recovered.

Rivkind said the alleged rape victim told him the FBI was investigating the incident.

James Walker, an attorney for Smith's widow, Jennifer Hagel-Smith, said the alleged rape victim was not his client.

Industry officials estimated that 13 people have disappeared from cruise ships in the past two years. With more than 10 million passengers last year, that means less than one person per million went missing, according to the International Council of Cruise Lines.

The council said there are about 50 cruise ship crimes against U.S. citizens reported to the FBI annually, or one crime per 200,000 passengers.

"You are much safer on a cruise ship than you are in virtually any community in the United States," said Michael Crye, president of the council.

U.S. Rep. Christopher Shays, a Connecticut Republican who led the hearing, and other lawmakers question such statistics because they said the industry supplies its own data to the FBI and might be downplaying crime to keep its business thriving.

"If we're going to have an impact on what's going on, we need to join together," said Kendall Carver, whose daughter, Merrian Lynn Carver, disappeared from a cruise in Alaska in August 2004. "I think the public needs to know about it."

Smith's family contends he was a victim of foul play covered up by a cruise ship line eager to avoid bad publicity.

"The lack of information given by cruise lines is abysmal and I think that needs to change," Bree Smith, George Smith's sister, said Tuesday. "To be a victim of one of these crimes and never see any justice done, it adds insult to injury."

The cruise line has said it handled the incident appropriately and has cooperated fully with investigators.

The new group does not have a name yet, but is organizing through an e-mail, cruisevictims@cox.net.

Recruiting Office Left Open 26 Times (MJS)

By JACQUELINE SEIBEL

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, January 4, 2006

Town of Brookfield - Police officers making routine checks on area businesses found a door to the local military recruiting office open 26 times since July, officials said Tuesday after a weekend burglary of military uniforms was reported at the facility.

Authorities are linking the burglary with the theft of a government vehicle outside a military recruiting office in Indianapolis, a development that has prompted interest from federal, state and local law-enforcement agencies.

Police believe the back door to the office at 20101 W. Blue Mound Road, which contains recruiting services for the U.S. Army, Navy, Air Force, Marines and Coast Guard, was likely unlocked again over the weekend, police Capt. Tim Imler said.

Three military uniforms, including a dress uniform and combat fatigues; a government-owned car; and keys to several government vehicles were stolen here sometime between Saturday evening and the discovery of the burglary at 7 p.m. Monday, Imler said.

In the parking lot where the 2003 Oldsmobile Alero was stolen, near the West Point Cinemas, another stolen government car was recovered, Imler said. That Chevrolet Malibu from Indianapolis had no apparent damage and was still bearing its government-issued license plates.

Today, the FBI will process evidence found in the vehicle stolen from Indianapolis, Imler said.

Michael Johnson, a supervisory special agent in the FBI's Milwaukee office, said the bureau is investigating the crime, but only as theft of government property.

"We have no reason to believe it is tied to terrorism at this point," he said.

Because the car from the Indianapolis recruiting office was found in Waukesha County, authorities have concluded that the two break-ins are related, Johnson said.

Yet Imler said authorities do not know why recruiting offices appear to have been targeted, especially since the burglar left behind computers and cash.

Also, a car with government plates would not be useful to a thief who did not have accompanying government identification, Johnson said. Someone whose aim was to collect military uniforms would be unlikely to target a recruiting station.

"There usually aren't a lot of people working in a recruiter's office, so it's doubtful they're going to have a lot of uniforms," he said.

The Indianapolis Police Department did not return phone calls seeking comment, and an officer from that state's military recruiting headquarters would only confirm that a car had been stolen.

Assisting the Town of Brookfield police and the FBI in the investigation are the U.S. Departments of Defense and Homeland Security, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the Joint Terrorism Task Force, consisting of federal, state and local officials.

Defense Department spokesman Lt. Col. Brian Maka said Tuesday that he had not heard about the Town of Brookfield burglary or that there had been other problems at military recruitment offices.

Gina Barton of the Journal Sentinel staff contributed to this report.

FBI Investigates Break-in At Military Recruiting Center,170 (MH)

The Miami Herald, January 4, 2006

BROOKFIELD, Wis. - Marine uniforms and a military vehicle were stolen from an armed forces recruiting center over the weekend, police said Tuesday.

The break-in follows the theft of a car from a recruiting center in Indianapolis over the weekend. That car was found at the same Town of Brookfield recruiting center where the new thefts were reported, FBI Special Agent Mike Johnson said.

Two military uniforms and a maroon 2003 Oldsmobile Alero were missing from the Brookfield site, but computers, money and electronic equipment were left behind, authorities said.

The recovered vehicle is being processed for evidence, Johnson said. The FBI is involved because federal property was stolen.

The stolen uniforms include Marine dress coats and military fatigues and boots. The thief or thieves could be impersonating military personnel, Town of Brookfield police Capt. Tim Imler said.

DOJ_NMG_0007849

Military Vehicle And Uniforms Stolen In WI (WFIE-TV)

WFIE-TV, January 4, 2006

Police say a military vehicle and uniforms have been stolen from a recruiting center in suburban Milwaukee.

The break-in follows the theft of a car from a recruiting center in Indianapolis over the weekend. FBI Special Agent Mike Johnson says that car was found at the same recruiting center in Brookfield, Wisconsin where the new thefts were reported.

In the Town of Brookfield, police say a 2003 Olds Alero was taken, also two Marine dress coats and some military fatigues and boots.

Police warn that the thieves may try to impersonate military personnel.

Robbed At Gunpoint, Barry Harbors 'No Animosities' (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

D.C. Council member and former mayor Marion Barry yesterday urged two young men who robbed him at gunpoint Monday night to turn themselves in to police, promising that he would urge authorities not to prosecute them.

"I have no animosities," Barry declared. "I don't even want you prosecuted, really. I love you. Give yourself up. Call the police. . . . I will do all I can to advocate non-prosecution."

Barry, 69, was held up in his kitchen about 9:30 p.m. Monday by two assailants who minutes earlier had helped him carry groceries from his car to his third-floor apartment in Southeast Washington. They pointed a gun at Barry's face and stole his wallet, which contained more than $200, his driver's license and two credit cards, police said.

The thieves apparently knew that Barry (D-Ward 8) was a longtime community leader, a fact that he said made the crime "kind of hurt" because he is well respected by so many people in the city. Barry was not injured in the holdup.

"There is a sort of an unwritten code in Washington, among the underworld and the hustlers and these other guys, that I am their friend," Barry said at an afternoon news conference in which he described the robbery in detail. "I don't advocate what they do. I advocate conditions to change what they do. I was a little hurt that this betrayal did happen."

D.C. police, who are battling a recent spike in holdups, said they were shocked that someone would knowingly rob a former mayor in his apartment. They have no suspects. A bystander found Barry's wallet -- without the cash -- on a nearby street. The billfold, driver's license and credit cards were returned yesterday to the council member, authorities said.

"I was very surprised, especially in the fact that the individuals knew who Mr. Barry was, and they went ahead and robbed him anyway," said D.C. Police Cmdr. Joel Maupin. "It shows that people don't care who you are -- they just want what you have."

Barry, a four-term mayor who returned to politics last year when he was elected to the council, called the news conference at the John A. Wilson Building, the District's city hall, to talk about the crime and to urge stiffer penalties for gun possession. Even as he characterized the city's problems with guns and violence as a "pandemic," he said he felt empathy for those who robbed him.

U.S. Attorney Kenneth L. Wainstein declined to comment on Barry's remarks. Prosecutors and police will make the call on whether to file charges against those responsible for the crime.

"As with all violent crimes, we will expend every effort in the investigation of this case, both to vindicate council member Barry's rights and to prevent the perpetrators from victimizing others in the future," Wainstein said.

Barry often has spoken out against street crime in a political career that goes back more than three decades. He was first elected mayor in 1978 and was reelected to second and third terms. He was in his third term when the FBI videotaped him smoking crack; he was convicted of one count of misdemeanor drug possession.

He settled in Ward 8 after completing a six-month prison sentence and won the council seat there in 1992, launching a comeback that eventually led to a fourth term as mayor. He recently pleaded guilty to two misdemeanor tax charges because he did not pay most of his income taxes after leaving the mayor's office in 1999. He is scheduled to be sentenced Jan. 18.

Monday's robbery was not the first time Barry has been the victim of violence. He was shot above the heart by a stray bullet during the 1977 takeover of city hall by a group of Hanafi Muslims -- an experience that he said was less scary than what happened at his home Monday evening.

DOJ_NMG_0007850

"On March 7, 1977, in this very same building, I walked across the hall and heard something ring out," Barry remembered yesterday. "And I got hit in my chest. I didn't even have time to think.

"In this incident, I had a chance to see it. I was much more frightened, much more emotionally involved. It was a horrific experience to face a gun," Barry said. "I could see my life flash before me at that moment."

Monday's episode began about 9 p.m. when Barry returned from shopping for groceries at a Safeway store in Southwest Washington. He parked outside his beige-brick apartment building in the 2600 block of Douglas Place SE, part of a neighborhood that police say has problems with drug dealing and burglaries but generally is not affected by the level of violence in harder-hit areas of Barry's ward. The young men, whom Barry said he did not recognize, asked if they could help carry his bags upstairs.

"Mr. B, can we help you with your groceries?" Barry said one of the youths asked him.

Such requests are common, Barry said.

"When I go home in the evening or come out in the morning or weekend, the young people are all over me, asking for money, begging for money. 'Give me a dollar. Give me five dollars,' " Barry said. "So I try to make a practice of making them work for what they get."

Barry gave the young men several bags. After helping him, they asked if they could have some candy in a dish on a dining room table. He and the young men talked a bit. Barry then handed the two a few dollars and they left.

About 15 minutes later, they came back.

"I just let them in. That's how we do it over there. At least that's how I do it," Barry said.

Once inside the apartment, one of the men pulled out "a gun and pointed it at my face and pushed me into the kitchen," he said.

The assailants quickly fled with Barry's wallet. Police said they were stepping up patrols in the neighborhood to prevent other robberies and to gather information about the assailants.

Yesterday, Barry called for a summit among the city's leaders to address gun violence. And he said he will prod the council to pass a bill he introduced to stiffen penalties for carrying a gun in the District. The proposed legislation would also prohibit judges in most cases from granting pretrial release to defendants facing gun charges.

"Violence is everywhere," Barry said. "Guns are everywhere. This ought to be the number one priority in our city -- saving lives, getting guns off the street and rehabilitating young people."

Barry Robbed At SE Home By Men He Helped (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

Former D.C. Mayor Marion Barry was robbed at gunpoint in his Southeast apartment Monday night by two young men whom he had paid minutes earlier to help him carry groceries from his car.

Mr. Barry, 69, said he was not injured during the robbery, but felt downhearted about being robbed in the Ward 8 neighborhood he represents on the D.C. Council. He also said that he doesn't want authorities to prosecute the robbers, if they are caught, and that he "loves" them.

"I was really kind of hurt," Mr. Barry, a Democrat, said at a press conference yesterday at City Hall. "There's sort of an unwritten code in Washington among the underworld, the hustlers, and these other guys that I'm their friend.

"I don't advocate what they do, but I advocate the conditions to change what they do," he said.

Mr. Barry said his wallet containing his driver's license, credit cards and an undisclosed amount of cash was taken. Police later recovered the wallet, minus the cash.

Mr. Barry said he had been shopping and had a trunk full of groceries when he stopped his car in front of his apartment building in the 2600 block of Douglas Road SE at about 9:30 p.m.

He said two young men approached him, calling him "B," as the neighborhood's young people refer to him. The men asked him whether they could help carry his groceries upstairs.

DOJ_NMG_0007851

Mr. Barry said he frequently pays young people who ask him for money in the neighborhood to perform such services, preferring that to a handout.

He said he made small talk with the men, one of whom identified himself as Marcus and told Mr. Barry that he lived across the street.

The men brought the groceries into Mr. Barry's apartment, and Mr. Barry gave each man some candy before they left. About 10 minutes later, he said, the two men came back to his door, and he thought nothing of letting them in.

"They had a gun, pointed it at my face and pushed me in the kitchen," he said, adding that his life flashed before his eyes when one of the men cocked the handgun while pointing it at his head.

Mr. Barry said that the apartment building has a secure outer door, but that it is often broken. He said he thought the door locked behind him when he came in.

Seventh District Cmdr. Joel Maupin said that he was "very surprised" to hear that Mr. Barry was robbed and that it might have been a crime of opportunity.

"It shows a lot of people really don't care who you are," he said. "All they want is to get what you have."

Mr. Barry said that he held no animosity toward the men who robbed him and that he would prefer they not be prosecuted if they were caught.

"For the young men who did this to me, I say to you, I don't hold any animosities, I don't even want you prosecuted really. I love you. Give yourself up. Call the police, let them know you engaged in this activity," he said.

He said that getting guns off the streets should be the "No. 1 priority of this city" and that crime had reached crisis proportions.

Metropolitan Police Department Capt. C.V. Morris, head of the violent crimes branch, said he did not agree completely with Mr. Barry's assessment of crime in the District.

"I agree to an extent," Capt. Morris said. "We have a situation where, yes, a lot of our crimes are declining, but when you look at our robberies, our robberies are peaking. And it's all about guns. So I definitely understand this."

Through November, the most recent month for which statistics are available, preliminary police reports show that all categories of crime except for robbery had declined citywide. Robberies were up 5.8 percent.

In the 7th Police District, which includes Ward 8, robberies were up 15 percent, statistics show. Homicides and sexual assaults were each up 16.3 percent, statistics show.

Mr. Barry said he visited former council member Sandy Allen on Monday, hugged her and offered prayers two days after her grandson was killed in the same area.

Mr. Barry's first three terms as mayor ended with a 1990 crack cocaine arrest and six months in federal prison.

He returned to win the Ward 8 council seat in 1992 and then the mayor's office in 1994 for his fourth term. However, Congress in 1995 sapped most of the mayor's powers by instituting a control board to run the city. Mr. Barry declined to run again in 1998.

In 2002, Mr. Barry backed out of running for an at-large seat on the D.C. Council after U.S. Park Police reported finding "traces" of marijuana and cocaine in his illegally parked Jaguar. No charges were filed, and Mr. Barry has disputed the account.

In 2004, Mr. Barry was elected to the Ward 8 seat on the D.C. Council after he defeated Mrs. Allen, the incumbent Democrat, in the primary.

Recently, Mr. Barry pleaded guilty to two misdemeanor charges stemming from an investigation that revealed he did not file taxes from 1999 through 2004. His sentencing is scheduled for Jan. 18.

Witness: Fawell Assigned Him Campaign Work (AP)

By MIKE COLIAS, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 4, 2006

A former employee of the Illinois secretary of state's office testified Tuesday that he spent much of his time on the clock working on political campaigns, including George Ryan's runs for governor and secretary of state.

DOJ_NMG_0007852

Brad Roseberry testified at the former governor's racketeering and fraud trial that Scott Fawell, Ryan's chief of staff when he was secretary of state, assigned him to do campaign work on numerous Republican campaigns from 1992 to 1999, when Roseberry was a state employee.

Roseberry said he spent much of his work time on campaigns for Ryan and other GOP candidates-- knocking on doors and putting up campaign signs-- in the months leading up to elections, even though taxpayers were paying his salary as a state employee.

"Toward the (election), it was virtually full time," said Roseberry, who testified under government immunity from prosecution for anything that he might say on the stand. It is illegal to do campaign work on state time.

Under cross-examination from lead defense attorney Dan K. Webb, Roseberry agreed numerous times that Ryan himself never directed him to do political work of any kind. Webb also insinuated that Roseberry might have fabricated some of what he told the FBI in exchange for his immunity.

Ryan, 71, and lobbyist Larry Warner, 67, are charged with racketeering, mail fraud and other offenses. The federal indictment says that when Ryan was secretary of state he steered big-money state leases and contracts to his friends, including Warner, and received gifts and free vacations.

Ryan and Warner say nothing they did was illegal.

Roseberry testified that he typically met with Fawell and other office workers to discuss campaign work and that he only recalled Ryan being present once, in 1992. He said he met with Ryan, Fawell and others at the secretary of state's office in Chicago to discuss Roseberry's work on a campaign for Bruce Clark, a Kankakee Republican and husband of Ryan's niece who was running for the Legislature.

"I told (Ryan) it would be a tough race," Roseberry said. "He said, 'I know that. Tell me something I don't know.'" Roseberry said the meeting lasted about 20 minutes, during which one supervisor suggested Roseberry take a leave of absence to work on Clark's campaign, but Fawell rejected the idea.

Webb questioned whether Roseberry might have concocted the story to improve his chances of avoiding jail time, saying it wasn't until Roseberry's fifth meeting with prosecutors, in January 2003, that he mentioned a meeting with Ryan.

"Had you made up your mind going into that meeting that you needed to make something up about George Ryan or you were never going to get a grant of immunity?" Webb asked.

"No," Roseberry said.

Roseberry testified that the government granted him immunity a few weeks after he told prosecutors about the Ryan meeting.

Webb also tried to poke holes in Roseberry's credibility by asking him questions about his alcoholism, which Roseberry acknowledged led to an inability to remember details for much of the time he worked in the secretary of state's office. He said he quit drinking in 1996.

Earlier Tuesday, a former Cook County prosecutor said Ryan in 1992 cursed when he and then-Cook County State's Attorney Jack O'Malley suggested a way to prevent corruption within the secretary of state's office.

Patrick J. Quinn said the conversation took place just before a news conference at which Ryan and O'Malley were to discuss the indictment of two secretary of state's office supervisors who were charged with selling phony drivers licenses.

Quinn said that after he suggested the anti-fraud method, Ryan turned to O'Malley, cursed and then said, "Those are my guys."

Quinn, now an Illinois appellate judge, said O'Malley told Ryan he wasn't trying to tell him how to run his office but that the press would ask questions about how he would prevent future corruption.

Quinn quoted Ryan as saying: "Jack, you're going to go out there and look like a hero for catching these guys, and I'll look like a hero for helping you."

Judge: Jurors Won't Learn Of George Ryan's Death Penalty Reform (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0007853

After a week off for the holidays, the trial of former Gov. George Ryan resumed today with Ryan's defense pressing forcefully but failing to put evidence of his death penalty reform before the jury.

Julie Bauer, one of Ryan's attorneys, argued it was critical that prosecution witness and Illinois Appellate Judge Patrick Quinn be questioned about his opinion of Ryan's decision to commute all death sentences in Illinois.

Outside the presence of the jury, Quinn called Ryan's decision "illegal and immoral" but swore he bore no ill will toward Ryan that led him to cooperate with prosecutors.

Prosecutors sought only to have Quinn, a former assistant state's attorney, testify about an unrelated 1992 conversation he had with then-Secretary of State Ryan and Cook County State's Atty. Jack O'Malley.

With the jury seated before him, Quinn said that during the conversation, Ryan crudely rejected a suggestion that Quinn believed could curb corruption among secretary of state employees who took bribes to sell driver's licenses to motorists who had lost their licenses for driving drunk.

The conversation occurred after the arrest of two secretary of state supervisors for the alleged offense.

Just prior to a news conference announcing the investigation and arrests, Quinn told O'Malley of a plan to store driver's photos at the secretary of state's office to prevent the issuance of illegal licenses.

"Mr. O'Malley told Secretary Ryan, 'George, Quinn has a good idea how you can cut down on this in the future,'" Quinn testified. "Mr. Ryan turned to Mr. O'Malley and said, '(Expletive) you, Jack. These are my guys.'"

Outside the jury's presence, Ryan's attorney Julie Bauer argued that Quinn's potential bias toward Ryan over the Death Penalty issue should be explored.

Even before the trial began, the defense sought to bring out evidence of Ryan's Death penalty reform.

But today, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer again rejected the effort and upheld the prosecution's argument that Ryan's policy decisions were irrelevant in the corruption trial.

Also testifying today was Brad Roseberry, a former Ryan political operative and supervisor in the Secretary of State's office.

Testifying under immunity from prosecution, Roseberry told jurors that he routinely did political work on state time.

He also testified that after Ryan was re-elected secretary of state in 1994, he compiled a list of state employees who had worked on the campaign in anticipation they would receive raises and promotions for helping Ryan.

Roseberry himself received a 20-percent raise after the election and was promoted to a position that did not exist before the election, he said.

Witness: Ryan Ignored Fraud (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, January 4, 2006

When a state prosecutor suggested a way to stop corruption in the secretary of state's office, George Ryan allegedly gave him a gruff response: "F--- you, Jack. These are my guys," Ryan told Cook County State's Attorney Jack O'Malley in May of 1992.

Illinois Appellate Court Judge Patrick Quinn, then O'Malley's public integrity chief, recalled the conversation Tuesday as he testified at Ryan's public corruption trial.

Ryan's reply came after Quinn conveyed an idea on cutting down on fraud in the secretary of state's office as he briefed Ryan and O'Malley before a news conference.

Quinn's office had just completed an investigation into the secretary of state's Midlothian licensing facility, charging employees with giving out driver's licenses to repeat DUI offenders in exchange for bribes. Quinn said O'Malley turned to him and said: "Why don't you tell George about that" idea to keep the fraud from occurring again.

Quinn testified he was surprised by Ryan's response.

"I would assume ... that Mr. Ryan would welcome any suggestions and, if nothing else, say: 'That sounds good. We will look into that,' " Quinn said. "That's what I would assume an elected official would say upon being presented with an idea about how to fight corruption -- to at least pay lip service to the idea that he'll cooperate."

When Ryan recoiled, O'Malley said Ryan might want to have a response ready in case reporters asked how he planned to stop bribes for licenses in the future, Quinn said.

"Jack, you're going to go out there and look like a hero for catching those guys and I'll look like a hero for helping you, and that's all anybody's going to ask," Ryan replied, according to Quinn.

O'Malley doesn't remember the exchange, according to Quinn and prosecutors. Quinn said at the time he told his supervisor about Ryan's response.

He said federal prosecutors later contacted him to ask about the alleged conversation; he didn't seek them out.

What role Ryan played

Prosecutors say Ryan's comeback epitomizes his take on rooting out corruption in his office. The trial, in its 14th week, entered the phase that explores what role Ryan played as investigations into corruption within his secretary of state's office intensified.

Ryan, 71, is charged with steering state contracts and leases to friends and taking cash, vacations and gifts in return. He's also charged with lying to the feds.

But Ryan's lawyers suggested Ryan rebuffed Quinn's idea because he didn't want to walk out and publicize a reform before he examined it. Years later, Ryan did revamp the secretary of state's computer system, digitizing all driver's licenses in an aim to cut back on fraud.

Outside of the jury's presence, Quinn, a judge for about nine years, ripped Ryan's 2003 decision to clear Death Row.

"It was absolutely illegal and immoral," he said.

The comment came as Ryan's lawyers sought to attack Quinn's credibility, painting him as an ex-prosecutor who had a beef with Ryan for commuting the sentences of criminals Quinn helped put behind bars.

Ryan lawyer Julie Bauer asked Quinn about his prosecution of Steve Manning, an ex-cop who landed on Death Row for murder. His conviction was later overturned by a higher court, and he was the 13th person to be let off of Death Row at a time when Illinois was mulling a moratorium on a troubled system here.

After hearing the testimony, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer ruled the jury couldn't hear it because it let lawyers expound on Ryan's policy decisions. She also said Ryan's 2003 decision to clear Death Row came years after Manning was released. Manning, who attended opening statements at Ryan's trial, won a $6.6 million jury verdict against the FBI last year for allegedly framing him in two crimes.

Doubts raised over memory

Also on Tuesday, former secretary of state worker Brad Roseberry said taxpayers paid for his salary as he did political work under Ryan from 1992 to 1999.

Roseberry, a court liaison for the secretary of state's office, testified that Ryan knew about him doing political work on state time at least at one point because Ryan was at a 1992 meeting where the issue was discussed.

But Roseberry said Ryan never told him to stay on the state payroll while he worked on political campaigns of Ryan and others.

Ryan attorney Dan Webb raised doubts about Roseberry's memory because he's a recovering alcoholic. Webb at one point asked if Roseberry concocted the meeting with Ryan to win an immunity order. Webb also asked if Roseberry drank a fifth of gin before that meeting. Roseberry said he couldn't recall.

Roseberry said the state later gave him a hefty raise as a reward for his political work.

Investigators Seek Info From Group On Doyle Donations (DULNT)

By Jr Ross

The Duluth News Tribune, January 4, 2006

MADISON, Wis. - State and federal investigators have asked a group that tracks campaign contributions for details on donations Gov. Jim Doyle received from utility interests, a company that won a state travel contract and a fundraiser held by a Department of Transportation official, the organization's executive director told The Associated Press.

Federal, state and local prosecutors announced last year they would review $20,000 in donations Doyle received from officials with Adelman Travel Systems shortly before and after the Milwaukee company won the state contract.

DOJ_NMG_0007855

The requests of the Wisconsin Democracy Campaign indicate investigators are looking at a wider range of donations than they have previously let on.

Mike McCabe, the group's executive director, said investigators had specific questions on the timing of donations Doyle received but gave no indication about the scope of their probe. He said the group was approached because of its unique data base detailing campaign donations.

"If they went to the Elections Board and went pawing through campaign finance repots, it'd be like looking for needles in a haystack," said McCabe, whose group advocates for campaign finance reform. "They came to us because we can help them find those needles."

The Department of Justice, U.S. Attorney's Office in Milwaukee, Dane County district attorney and FBI declined to comment Tuesday when contacted by the AP.

Doyle spokesman Dan Leistikow said the governor's administration has complied with all requests for information from investigators and was confident they would find no wrongdoing.

"People can look at this all day long if they want to, but they're not going to find anything because the governor and his entire administration act with integrity and the people of Wisconsin know that," Leistikow said.

Attorney General Peg Lautenschlager, U.S. Attorney Steven Biskupic and Dane County District Attorney Brian Blanchard announced a joint review of Doyle's donations from Adelman executives following media reports on a contract that could be worth up to $750,000.

McCabe said FBI agents first approached him a year ago asking general questions about corruption in the Capitol but were not focusing on Doyle at the time. He said Department of Justice and the FBI began asking more specific questions about Doyle's donations in early fall, and the organization complied with requests for information in November.

McCabe said DOJ specifically asked about donations from the Wisconsin Public Service Corp. The group turned that information over to investigators and also used it as part of a report it put out publicly last month detailing the $41,550 that executives of WPS and Alliant Energy Corp. gave to Doyle in the six months after the state Public Service Commission rejected their sale of the Kewaunee nuclear plant to a Virginia company.

The three-member commission, which included two Doyle appointees, reversed its decision on March 17 and allowed the sale to go through.

Leistikow said the governor was not involved in the process to award the Adelman contract and pointed out the PSC is an independent agency. Those involved in the PSC's decision have denied any undue influence.

McCabe said investigators asked about donations collected at a fundraiser held in September by Ruben Anthony Jr., deputy secretary at the Department of Transportation. He invited dozens of employees of companies that vie for DOT engineering contracts.

The Ethics Board is reviewing that fundraiser, but McCabe said the Democracy Campaign could not provide details to investigators on those donations because they will not be reported until later this month.

DOT spokeswoman Peg Schmitt said investigators have not asked the agency for any documents.

Department of Administration spokesman Scott Larrivee said the agency, which oversaw the awarding of the Adelman contract, first turned over documents to investigators in October and has complied with other requests since then.

He referred questions about the content of the documents to investigators.

Council Urged To Investigate Mariano (PHI)

By Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 4, 2006

Philadelphia's leading good-government lobby is calling on City Council to hold hearings and set new conduct rules in response to FBI documents and grand jury testimony showing that electricians' union leader John J. Dougherty had great influence over the office of indicted Councilman Rick Mariano.

The Committee of Seventy also asked for an investigation into Mariano's dismissal of three staffers who testified before a grand jury that indicted him on corruption charges. Committee president Zack Stalberg warned that lawsuits by wrongly fired employees could leave taxpayers on the hook.

"Mariano and Dougherty set a whole new standard for coziness and inappropriate insider behavior," Stalberg said of the revelations, which were first reported in The Inquirer and based on FBI reports and transcripts of grand jury testimony by Mariano aides as well as Dougherty and his political team.

Among other things, the documents reveal that:

Mariano never even interviewed his chief of staff, Walt DeTreux, before he was hired. Mariano left that task to one of Dougherty's political aides.

DeTreux took the job only on the condition that he "answer to the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers," according to an FBI summary.

Mariano aide John Lisko said he regularly briefed Dougherty "on all legislative, political, and administrative activities" in the office.

Mariano's lawyer, Nino V. Tinari, said he supported the idea of setting rules. But he said his client had been unaware of the extent of Dougherty's influence and therefore was not responsible for inappropriate ties.

"How could he be culpable of something he wasn't even aware of?" Tinari said.

Dougherty, a likely 2007 mayoral candidate who serves as treasurer of the city Democratic Party, declined to comment. He told The Inquirer last month that he had not controlled Mariano and had in fact encouraged him to be more independent.

DeTreux has said that FBI interviewers misinterpreted his comments. He said he meant that he wanted to run the office without interference from Mariano, whose staff had been seen as bumbling and disorganized.

But Stalberg said the details demonstrated the need for a Council policy designed to "insulate Council members and their staff from special interests."

"We would all be outraged if a Council member became controlled by a local company that went so far as to install its own staff in his or her office," he wrote. "The public elects officials and expects them to be independent - not captive to a business or a union or anybody else."

Mariano was indicted Oct. 25 on charges that he accepted $30,000 in bribes from businessmen in exchange for legislative favors. If convicted, he faces 10 years in federal prison.

Prosecutors also examined as a case of possible witness intimidation Mariano's Oct. 21 firing of DeTreux and Lisko and last month's axing of staffer Anna Davila, all of whom spoke to the grand jury. No charges have been filed.

Tinari said the staffers were not fired for testifying.

In separate letters to U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan, Philadelphia District Attorney Lynne M. Abraham, and City Controller Alan Butkovitz, Stalberg asked for an investigation into whether the firings were "consistent with city policy."

Butkovitz said he would be happy to investigate if the Mariano case weren't already being handled by the federal government.

"The problem with this is that the FBI's already heavily into this case, and I would just get in the way," he said. "From what I've heard, they'd have a fit."

Cathie Abookire, a spokeswoman for Abraham, said all questions related to the Mariano case would be referred to Meehan's office.

First Tennessee Waltz Trial Delayed As Dixon Seeks New Lawyer (AP)

By WOODY BAIRD, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 4, 2006

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (AP) -- Former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon told a federal judge Tuesday he is getting a new defense lawyer, a move that will delay the first scheduled trial for the Tennessee Waltz scandal by months.

Defense lawyer Walter Bailey stepped down after prosecutors raised questions about a potential conflict of interest with a government informant.

U.S. District Court Judge Jon McCalla said he expected Dixon's trial on charges of taking payoffs to influence legislation to be delayed at least two to three months. It had been set to begin Jan. 17.

The conflict of interest stemmed from work Bailey's law firm had done representing the informant, Tim Willis, in other legal matters.

Those cases involved issues that could be used to question the credibility and character of Willis, who is expected to be the prosecution's witness, but Bailey could have been limited in raising those questions because of his firm's previous work.

Outside the courthouse Dixon said he was initially disappointed in losing Bailey as his lawyer and seeing the trial delayed.

"At first you want to hurry up and get it out of the way, but maybe this ordeal is about long suffering, patience, learning how to let God work things for you," Dixon said.

The former lawmaker, a Memphis Democrat, said he is looking for a new attorney.

In Recordings, Mobster Pierces Veil On Gambino Crime Family (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 4, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- Mobster Victor Riccitelli wanted so badly to keep his recorded conversations with an FBI informant secret, he broke the mob's honor code and admitted his Mafia membership rather than have prosecutors play the tapes in court.

For the first time since Riccitelli and more than a dozen others were indicted in a landmark Mafia case in 2004, prosecutors recently offered the first clues as to why he was so insistent the tapes remain sealed: In them, he revealed the Gambino crime family hierarchy, placing ranks with names and explaining the upper echelon of one of the nation's most notorious crime syndicates.

Riccitelli, in conversations with a Stamford strip club owner working with the FBI, also described his Mafia induction ceremony, the secret ritual in which members swear a lifelong allegiance to the crime family.

"He said that a picture of a saint was placed in his hands and burned, and that he dumped the ashes in a dish," prosecutors wrote last week, describing the tapes in a memo to U.S. District Judge Janet Bond Arterton.

Riccitelli was scheduled to be sentenced for racketeering Tuesday but his case was delayed until Jan. 20. He faces six to eight years in prison and prosecutors want that tacked onto the end of his 13-year sentence for cocaine distribution _ all but ensuring that Riccitelli, 72 and a cancer patient, will die in prison.

Defense attorney John Einhorn did not return a message seeking a response to the prosecution memo.

The Gambino crime family, once led by John Gotti, allegedly runs illegal Connecticut gambling businesses that include sports betting, poker machines and the numbers racket, prosecutors said.

"The defendant is an incorrigible and possibly violent criminal whose life is marked by one constant: a never ending search for fresh opportunity to enrich himself illegally," prosecutors wrote.

In late 2003 _ when law enforcement officials were openly calling John Gotti's brother, Peter, the family boss _ Riccitelli was captured on tape explaining that Arnold "Zeke" Squittieri was in charge, with Anthony "The Genius" Megale serving as the No. 2 man and Joseph "Jo Jo" Corozzo as consigliere, or top adviser.

Megale, a Stamford man who pleaded guilty last year to racketeering in Connecticut and also faces charges in New York, handled much of the family's day-to-day operations, Riccitelli said.

"He's in New York every day. He's under the (expletive) fire," Riccitelli said. "It's the consigliere, the underboss and the boss. OK? The boss is a sweetheart, but he can't run around cause he's on parole. He'll go do what he gotta do now, don't get me wrong, but he can't go in the street where wise guys are because then he's gonna be seen."

Squittieri, of Englewood Cliffs, N.J., wasn't publicly identified as the Gambino boss until last year when prosecutors indicted him and Megale in New York and accused them of running the family. New York prosecutors have identified Corozzo as consigliere but he has not been charged as such.

It is unclear whether prosecutors will try to play the Riccitelli tapes at sentencing later this month. They were close to doing so in October when on the eve of trial Riccitelli tried again to have the tapes thrown out.

DOJ_NMG_0007858

Prosecutors put John Sereno, the FBI agent who led the investigation, on the stand and let him explain how he wired his informant before every meeting. As prosecutors were about to hit the play button, Einhorn leapt up and objected.

A judge ruled that the tapes would be admitted, and Riccitelli leaned back in his chair and said, "That's it. No point."

He pleaded guilty that day.

Two Plead Guilty In Mortgage Fraud (CINE)

By Mike Boyer, Enquirer staff writer

The Cincinnati Enquirer, January 4, 2006

Two loan processors have agreed to plead guilty to fraud and other charges in the federal probe into mortgage fraud involving low-priced homes in Greater Cincinnati.

Ike Bronson, a former loan processor at Seven Hills Financial mortgage brokerage, has agreed to plead guilty to charges of bank fraud, conspiracy and filing a false tax return, in documents filed in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati.

Bryan Young, another loan processor, has agreed to plead guilty to bank fraud and conspiracy charges, according to court papers.

More than three dozen people have entered guilty pleas in the ongoing probe by the Internal Revenue Service, the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service into the sale of more than $50 million in area real estate.

Bronson originated loans and recruited buyers for a number of properties sold at artificially inflated prices, according to investigators. He also was aware false information was submitted on mortgage loan applications.

Investigators said Bronson caused real or intended losses of more than $728,000 to financial institutions and failed to report $131,217 in income in 2003 as result of payoffs from fraudulent loan proceeds.

Young processed 15 to 20 loans that included false documents causing real or intended losses exceeding $255,000 for financial institutions, investigators said.

Both men waived a grand jury indictment and will appear in U.S. District Court on Jan. 12 to formally enter their pleas.

Separately, Erica Crum, a loan officer for two different mortgage companies, was sentenced last week in U.S. District Court to 37 months in prison and was fined $15,000, after admitting charges of conspiracy, bank fraud and money laundering.

She also was ordered not to seek employment in the mortgage industry and to pay restitution to be determined later.

Crum, who worked at Airline Union's Mortgage Co., in Springdale, until April 2002 and out of her home from then until May 2003 for Loan Star Mortgage, misrepresented to lenders the source of down payments purportedly made by borrowers, according to court papers.

She also engaged in at least 25 money-laundering transactions involving $393,626, investigators said.

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Not Told Of 2 Deaths During Study Of Heart Drug (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

The Scios unit of Johnson & Johnson yesterday added to the questions already clouding its heart failure medication Natrecor, saying the company had failed to tell federal regulators about the deaths of two patients in a clinical trial of the drug.

The two deaths were also omitted from a report of the trial published in October in The Journal of Emergency Medicine, the company said. That article reported 6 deaths within 30 days among 237 patients given Natrecor or other treatment in hospital emergency rooms in 2001 and early 2002. Five of those deaths were of people who had taken Natrecor.

The two additional deaths raised the total to seven among Natrecor patients, although Scios said yesterday that the difference did not change the safety assumptions about the drug.

Neither Scios nor Dr. W. Franklin Peacock 4th of the Cleveland Clinic, the principal investigator in the study, disclosed yesterday how the deaths had been omitted from the results, but said they had learned only recently that the deaths occurred within the 30-day study period. A final analysis of the results is under way and will be submitted to the Food and Drug Administration, said Mark Wolfe, a Scios spokesman. He said he did not yet know the causes of the two additional deaths.

DOJ_NMG_0007859

But a spokeswoman for the Cleveland Clinic, Eileen Sheil, said that Dr. Peacock strongly believed that the deaths had been accidental and not related to problems with Natrecor.

Natrecor, which the F.D.A. approved in August 2001 for use in acutely ill heart-failure patients, became a big seller for Scios. Sales were helped by use of the product in less severely ill patients, known as off-label use, sometimes in outpatient clinics in cardiologists' offices.

After achieving sales of $400 million in 2004, though, Natrecor's growth failed to meet forecasts last year after questions arose about its safety and whether it was effective enough to justify a cost of about $500 a treatment, compared with much cheaper alternatives. The Justice Department is also investigating whether Scios promoted the drug for unapproved uses. And the government recently announced that Medicare and Medicaid would no longer cover the drug's outpatient use.

Scios consistently defended Natrecor's safety. But the failure of researchers to accurately collect and report the death data in the Natrecor trial comes amid questions elsewhere in the medical industry about the accuracy of studies of drugs and medical devices.

"When you're talking deaths in clinical trials, mistakes are not an option," said Dr. Arthur Caplan, a medical ethicist at the University of Pennsylvania. "It's just an area where we have to have absolute, foolproof reporting in place."

Last month, the drug maker Merck was accused of misrepresenting the results of a clinical trial of the painkiller Vioxx to minimize its heart risks. The study was published in November 2000, almost four years before Merck stopped selling the drug amid safety concerns.

The Vioxx accusation came from Dr. Gregory D. Curfman, the editor of The New England Journal of Medicine, who said the authors of a Vioxx study had deleted data about strokes, heart attacks and other vascular problems suffered by some patients. Merck has denied mishandling the data submitted for publication.

While the findings of the Natrecor study were presented earlier at medical conferences, it was not until October that the complete results were published in The Journal of Emergency Medicine. At that time, Dr. Peacock and colleagues, who included a Scios executive, reported that five Natrecor patients had died within 30 days. The deaths included those from causes clearly not related to Natrecor use, including an accident, the study reported.

In the meantime, Scios had undertaken a retrospective review of the study to look at mortality in patients up to 180 days after treatment. It was during that review, according to the Scios spokesman, Mr. Wolfe, that the two additional deaths among Natrecor patients within the 30-day period were discovered. When the company learned of those deaths, it notified the F.D.A. and Dr. Peacock, Mr. Wolfe said.

Ms. Sheil, the spokeswoman for the Cleveland Clinic, said Dr. Peacock learned of the additional deaths in September and notified The Journal of Emergency Medicine, but the article had already been published. Its authors say they will update it once the analysis by Scios is completed, sometime in the next few months.

Agencies To Designate Chief FOIA Officers (FCW)

By Matthew D. Weigelt

Federal Computer Week, January 4, 2006

Federal agencies must designate a chief Freedom of Information Act officer by Jan. 13, and each new officer will review the agency's FOIA operations and develop an improvement plan by June, according to a memo.

Released Dec. 30 by the Office of Management and Budget, the memo states that each agency must send a report on its FOIA operations and its improvement plan to the Justice Department and OMB by June 14. Agencies will also post the improvement plans on their Web sites.

The chief FOIA officer will be responsible for agencywide compliance with FOIA and oversee the program's implementation, the memo states. The officer will designate several public liaisons and post their contact information on the agency's Web site. The liaisons will serve as supervisors who review concerns about services.

DOJ_NMG_0007860

President Bush issued an executive order Dec. 14 that directs agency leaders to ensure citizen-centered and results-oriented FOIA operations. In fiscal 2006 and 2007 FOIA reports, agencies will include information regarding the milestones made in FOIA improvement plans.

OMB Issues Further Guidance On FOIA Executive Order (GCN)

By Rob Thormeyer, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, January 4, 2006

Agencies must designate a chief Freedom of Information Act officer by Jan. 13, as well as review and revise their FOIA processing requirements by mid-June, according to a memorandum from the Office of Management and Budget.

In the memorandum dated Dec. 30, 2005, OMB also required agencies to establish one or more FOIA service centers and place contact information for public liaisons on their Web sites.

On Dec. 14, 2005, President Bush via executive order directed agencies to streamline their FOIA processing by appointing a chief FOIA officer and making information about how they handle these requests available online within six months.

In the OMB memorandum, deputy director Joel Kaplan provided more specifics and said agency FOIA officers must review their information operations and draft an improvement plan with concrete milestones for fiscal 2006 and 2007.

The plan must be submitted to the Justice Department and OMB and posted on agency Web sites by June 14, Kaplan wrote.

AARP Edges Away From Drug Imports (HILL)

By Kelly Mccormack And Bob Cusack

The Hill, January 4, 2006

In a move that is already attracting criticism from some lawmakers, AARP last week softened its support of drug reimportation legislation by saying that the new Medicare drug benefit saves senior citizens more than buying pharmaceuticals from Canada.

The powerful consumer group has previously endorsed reimportating drugs, but its revised position could severely damage momentum for legislation pending in Congress.

It could also alleviate political pressure on the White House and the pharmaceutical industry, which have opposed reimportation even though it is supported by a majority of members of Congress.

The group has enormous clout on Capitol Hill, playing a crucial role in passing the Medicare drug bill in 2003 and thwarting the GOP effort to reform Social Security last year.

AARP's press release on the matter, released over the holidays, did not get much attention last week. But the ramifications of it could be significant in the debate on the affordability of prescription drugs.

The new analysis, titled "The New Math: Cheaper than Canada? The drug benefit may be the better deal," used the government's Medicare plan finder to compare "stand alone" plans that cover all of a senior's prescription needs to the cost of acquiring drugs across the border. It concluded that seniors who enroll in a low-cost Medicare prescription-drug plan would save more in drug costs this year than if they were to buy the same drugs in Canada.

While Canadian drug prices are still cheaper than prices in the United States, AARP found that when a senior includes all out-of-pocket costs — premiums, deductibles and payments for medications — the price is lower.

AARP stressed that it continues to support reimportation legislation.

"The bottom line is drug prices are too high," said AARP spokesman Mark Kitchens. "The two ideas [reimportation and the Medicare drug benefit] are not mutually exclusive. Many Americans that are not on Medicare would benefit from reimportation. Medicare Part D is a tool that would make prescriptions more affordable."

But AARP CEO Bill Novelli adopted a different tone in the group's Dec. 29 release, saying, "Jan. 1 is truly a watershed day for many Americans who face the high cost of presciption drugs. Millions of Americans who have never had drug coverage can now save more money through Medicare Part D rather than turning to Canada to get their prescriptions."

Some congressional Democrats are still upset with Novelli for his role in AARP's backing of the GOP drug bill more than two years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0007861

The AARP release added, "In conversations with potential enrollees, AARP is hearing that the focus has shifted from the legislation to choosing the best plan to suit their needs."

These statements triggered strong reactions from both sides of the aisle.

"AARP is selling Medicare drug coverage, so it's not surprising that they're pushing their own product," said Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio). "Now they are making an apples-to-oranges comparison between Medicare drug coverage and Canadian drug prices. Seniors deserve decent drug coverage, and every American deserves lower-priced drugs. That's the bottom line."

AARP is working with the insurance company UnitedHealth Group to offer prescription-drug coverage. More than two million seniors have signed up for drug plans offered by the AARP-backed insurer.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) said that the AARP study "drives home the point that the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit can help beneficiaries save some serious money on their prescription-drug bills." But he emphasized that the savings will not be realized by all beneficiaries.

"We need to continue to work on other ways to lower prescription drugs costs for all Americans," said Grassley. "We can't let up on making prescription drugs more affordable."

"Saying that Medicare drug plans 'cost less' than buying prescription drugs from other countries is misleading," said Jon Yarian, a spokesman for Rep. Gil Gutknecht's (R-Minn.). "The cost of the prescription drugs hasn't changed. The only difference is who bears the burden of the expense. American taxpayers will be paying for these 'savings.'"

Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R-Mo.) said, "The fact remains that we still lack a comprehensive policy to address high prescription-drug prices in America when identical, safe and affordable medicines are readily available to Americans just over our borders."

The pharmaceutical industry was more optimistic about the potential savings in the Medicare prescription-drug benefit.

"Seniors shouldn't have to gamble with their lives by importing potentially dangerous, counterfeit prescription medicines," said the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America Senior Vice President Ken Johnson. "Instead they should opt for a safer, more affordable option offered by Medicare.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Guilty Plea In Strip Club Case (NSL)

By RUSSELL BEN-ALI, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, January 4, 2006

A Brooklyn woman accused of forcing Russian immigrants to dance nude in New Jersey strip clubs in a human trafficking ring run by her husband pleaded guilty yesterday to conspiracy charges in Newark federal court.

Viktoriya I'lina , 41, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Russia, is the last of three defendants to plead guilty in a case that involved luring more than 25 women from Voronezh in Russia, sending them to work in strip clubs and forcing them to pay exorbitant fees to members of the ring.

Yesterday she admitted demanding $5,200 from one dancer and $2,600 from another, when the two women stopped dancing in the clubs.

I'lina pleaded guilty before Judge John C. Lifland to one count of conspiracy to commit extortion, which carries a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a fine of $250,000. She also pleaded guilty to visa fraud, which carries a maximum prison sentence of five years and a fine of $250,000.

But under federal sentencing guidelines, I'lina will likely face a term of 41 to 51 months in prison when sentenced on April 13, authorities said. She also agreed to forfeit $25,575 seized from her Brooklyn residence during a court-ordered search.

"As we did with her husband, we'll be seeking a sentence at the top of that range," U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said in a statement. "For the treatment they imposed on these women, both of them deserve nothing less."

I'lina's attorney, Lawrence S. Lustberg , said he plans to file an extensive sentencing memorandum to prove that I'lina is less culpable than her co-conspirators.

DOJ_NMG_0007862

"We'll also show that for many of the women who were involved, she actually treated them with decency and dignity," Lustberg said of his client. He described her as the mother of a high school girl who traveled to the U.S. after earning a medical degree in Russia and has spent most of the past three and a half years in jail or under house arrest.

I'lina's co-defendants included her husband, ring organizer Lev Trakhtenberg , a promoter of Russian cultural events, and former boxer Sergey Malchikov , known as the group's local enforcer. The Brooklyn trio was arrested by FBI agents in August 2002.

The ring illegally gained cultural exchange visas for more than 25 women whom they represented as members of the Moscow Southwest Theater, a Russian acting troupe that visited the University of Chicago as part of an exchange program, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Once here, the victims were led to believe that their families in Russia would be harmed by mobsters if the women did not turn over much of their earnings from dancing up to 10 hours per day, six days per week in the clubs, authorities said.

Trachtenberg, a naturalized U.S. citizen, was sentenced last June to 60 months in prison for his role in the New Jersey ring. The sentence is to run concurrently with a 42-month sentence he received in Manhattan federal court, where he admitted last March to forcing one Russian woman into prostitution when she attempted to quit dancing.

Malchikov pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit forced labor, visa fraud and extortion and was sentenced last June to 45 months in prison.

Despite the ring's breakup, forced labor remains a serious problem facing law enforcement.

"We believe that this (practice) is ongoing still in New Jersey, in terms of Russian women dancing in clubs, but nothing directly related to these three defendants," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Leslie Faye Schwartz , who prosecuted the three cases.

Ater Gets Justice Dept. OK To Take Over New Orleans Elections (AP)

AP, January 4, 2006

Secretary of State Al Ater moved closer to readying a new date for the postponed New Orleans mayoral and city council elections, gaining approval from the U.S. Justice Department for special authority to take control of the elections.

The Legislature, in a recent special session, gave the secretary of state special powers to develop an emergency elections plan during a declared disaster that would let Ater relocate or consolidate polling places and address shortages of elections workers and voting machines.

That new law required approval by the federal government under the Voting Rights Act, and Ater spokeswoman Jennifer Marusak said the approval was granted.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco postponed the Feb. 4 New Orleans elections after Ater said it was impossible to ready the devastated city and track down voters so soon after Hurricane Katrina. The storm had damaged polling places and scattered the city's voters and elections workers around the nation.

Ater agreed to hold the elections by April 29 if possible, as part of the settlement of a lawsuit against him and Blanco, but a series of bureaucratic hurdles remain before he can recommend a new election date to the governor.

The governor and two legislative committees must agree to Ater's takeover of the elections - an agreement expected to win easy approval.

Then, Ater must present his emergency elections plan for New Orleans, which needs approval from the full Louisiana Legislature and another layer of approval from the U.S. Justice Department, Marusak said.

Ater is working on a tight schedule. To hold the mayoral and city council primary elections April 29, all those approvals must be in line by March 8, when the sign-up period for the elections must begin.

As part of the developing emergency elections plan, Ater's office is combing through a list of more than one million names submitted by the Federal Emergency Management Agency - people who sought FEMA hurricane aid - hoping to track down where Katrina evacuees have relocated since the storm forced thousands of people out of Louisiana.

Ater said he needed the information to notify evacuees of their voting rights and the way to request an absentee ballot for elections.

DOJ_NMG_0007863

Marusak said elections officials hope to mail the information by February and plan to use the FEMA list to start media campaigns about voting rights in areas housing the largest number of hurricane evacuees.

Ex-Boss Demanded Sex, D.C. Parks And Recreation Workers Say (WP)

By Karlyn Barker

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

The former chief of facility maintenance at the D.C. Department of Parks and Recreation allegedly kissed, fondled and demanded sexual favors from three women under his supervision, according to the women, who say the alleged harassment continued even after they told several supervisors at the agency.

The women are single mothers who were hired initially for maintenance jobs at $6.15 an hour under the District's welfare-to-work program. One former employee said she complained in person more than three years ago to Neil O. Albert, a former deputy mayor who was then the department's director.

The maintenance chief, Darnell Thompson Sr., 50, left his $66,000 position at the agency last summer after a current employee, Garrina Byrd, 28, filed a sexual harassment complaint against him with the city's Office of Human Rights.

"The Chief would grab my breasts or my behind and, if I had on a skirt, he would try to put his hand up my skirt," Byrd alleges in her complaint, filed in April. "I began to consent to the Chief's requests for sex because I was afraid that I would lose my employment."

Byrd, who was hired in 2001 and said Thompson's sexual harassment began in 2002, repeated her allegation last month at a D.C. Council committee's oversight hearing on the recreation department.

"Each time, he threatened to fire me if I didn't agree to his demands," Byrd testified. She told the panel that young women struggling to improve their lives should not be "forced to choose between their dignity and the need to make a living."

The District government has a "zero tolerance" policy that prohibits sexual harassment in the workplace and requires any supervisor who receives a complaint to make sure an investigation is conducted. Byrd's complaint has triggered mandatory training for the recreation department's 750 employees on what constitutes sexual harassment -- and what managers should do about it, said Kimberley Flowers, the department's new director.

The city has been criticized previously for failing to quickly address problems in the workplace. Five female deputies at the D.C. medical examiner's office filed complaints in 2003, alleging sexual harassment and racial discrimination, and later collected a settlement that totaled $250,000.

The allegations against Thompson are drawn from Byrd's complaint and from interviews with her and two former recreation department employees. The women alleged a range of sexual harassment incidents, most of which they said took place in Thompson's office at the facilities maintenance bureau at 1515 Half St. SW.

One woman, Annette Burns, said that Thompson tried to sexually assault her in 2002 when she was eight months pregnant -- and that she reported him to Albert. Demera Gaskins said Thompson came to recreation centers where she worked last year and pressured her for sex.

Thompson, hired in 1986, according to city records, declined to comment on the allegations when contacted by telephone at his home.

"I don't have any response," he said.

A spokeswoman for the District's Attorney General's Office, which is representing the Parks and Recreation Department, also would not comment.

Flowers and other city officials declined to discuss the allegations or say why Thompson left the agency, citing possible litigation and the confidentiality of personnel matters.

Allegations about Thompson were raised in April with the council's Committee on Education, Libraries and Recreation. Deborrah E. Jackson, an officer with the union representing non-management employees, said in an interview that she started hearing concerns about Thompson in 2001 and 2002 after the agency began hiring former welfare recipients, mostly women, for jobs that offered temporary work experience or "term" employment that could be renewed every 13 months.

DOJ_NMG_0007864

In a memorandum to council member Kathy Patterson (D-Ward 3), chairwoman of the panel, Jackson said there had been at least three sexual harassment allegations against Thompson. She wrote that Albert and another official, Neil Stanley, failed to heed the women's complaints.

"Neither of these administrators conducted in-house investigations," Jackson, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, Local 2741, told Patterson.

Albert and Stanley, however, said they took the allegations very seriously and investigated them.

"If the findings warranted it, the matter was referred to the Office of Human Rights," said Albert, who couldn't recall the specifics of any case. Albert left the agency in 2004 after three years to become a deputy mayor. He recently quit to run an education management company.

"Maybe someone didn't like the results, but it's not correct to say we didn't do anything about it," said Stanley, the agency's former general counsel who took over as interim director when Albert left. He is now a deputy director at the D.C. Department of Consumer and Regulatory Affairs.

Since January 2001, according to the Office of Human Rights, only one sexual harassment complaint -- Byrd's -- has been filed against the Department of Parks and Recreation. In the past three years, the office has received a total of 20 sexual harassment complaints from all District agencies.

Patterson said she called the Parks and Recreation Department twice about the sexual harassment allegations and about separate allegations that Thompson had brought a gun to work and threatened employees. She said that by the second call, Thompson was on administrative leave. He was dropped from the city payroll Aug. 19.

Byrd, Burns and Gaskins said they were thrilled to be hired as maintenance workers, assigned to pick up trash, rake leaves and clean recreation centers. The job paid only $6.15 to start. But it was their first steady employment, and the hours, 7 a.m. to 3:30 p.m., gave them time with their children.

Byrd alleged that her problems with Thompson began in 2002, when Thompson ordered her to pull up her shirt if she wanted to keep her job. She complied, she said, and was transferred that day from field work to the Half Street office. She answered phones, made calls -- and endured what she said in her council committee testimony was nearly three years of escalating sexual demands.

In her complaint, Byrd says she initially reported Thompson to a female supervisor, who told her to just tell him to stop.

"The touching progressed to the point where the Chief began asking for sex and when I refused, he threatened me by saying he would not extend my 13-month employment for another term," Byrd said in her complaint.

In an interview, Byrd alleged that Thompson called her into his office and showed her a termination letter.

"He asked me what was I willing to do to stay," and they then had intercourse on his desk, Byrd alleged, crying as she related the story. "I thought it would be one time and that I'd have a job and that would be the end of it."

Thompson, she alleged, began to demand a variety of sexual favors. He promoted her to a job as a clerical assistant, with a salary of $33,500 a year, even though she had no secretarial training. On Thompson's orders, she said, she spent more and more time in his office, fueling rumors that she was his girlfriend. That impression spread among co-workers when word got around that he had given Byrd $3,000 to buy a car.

She said that she did not ask for the money and that Thompson said nothing when he handed her the cash in an envelope outside the Half Street building. Thompson, she alleged, had been accused of sexually harassing another woman at work. Byrd said she regarded the cash as "hush money" so that she would not report him.

By last spring, Byrd said in an interview, she had begun refusing Thompson's sexual demands, and he showed her another termination letter. She said she discussed her problems with another supervisor, Julie Banks.

"She told me he had been threatening to fire her if she didn't have sex with him," said Banks, who urged Byrd to report Thompson.

On April 5, Byrd went to the department's headquarters on 16th Street NW and filed a complaint. That day, she was handed a letter that said she had received her "first and final" interview on her complaint, with no indication that anything would be done about it. The next day, she filed a complaint with the Office of Human Rights.

DOJ_NMG_0007865

"You come into the workplace to get training and instead you get abused," said Gary T. Brown, an attorney for Byrd who also represents Burns. He said as welfare-to-work women, both were particularly vulnerable.

Burns, now 28, started at the agency in 2000. She said she began having problems with Thompson in 2002 after she became pregnant and he transferred her to clerical duties in his office. She said she complained to a male supervisor that Thompson was touching her inappropriately, but the behavior continued.

On April 30, 2002, Burns said, Thompson cornered her in his office, grabbed her left breast and tried to kiss her. She said she fled in tears. The next day, she said, she went to headquarters and met with Albert and Stanley. She was placed on administrative leave, then transferred to an office away from Thompson. She said she heard nothing more about her complaint.

Burns, who had been hoping for a permanent job, was let go after her term employment ended.

"When I got terminated," she said, "I called Mr. Albert. He never called me back."

Albert recalled getting "one or two complaints" about Thompson. "We followed up on it immediately," he said.

Thompson was still the maintenance chief in 2004 when Gaskins, who was hired in 2003, alleges that he started making sexual demands. By then, she was a term employee with a salary of $12.95 an hour, and she said she agreed to his demands after he threatened to fire her.

"He was my boss," said Gaskins, now 25. "I pretty much had to do what he said."

But a few months later, when she began refusing, she said, Thompson handed her a termination letter, effective March 31 last year.

Johnnie Richardson, a work leader, said she heard complaints about Thompson from Gaskins and Byrd but didn't report him because she didn't believe the allegations.

Byrd returned to the Half Street office after Thompson was gone. Co-workers, she said, "have been horrible to me," and last month she was reassigned to another office with less convenient hours. She said she hopes her complaint will result in job training, a financial settlement and "someone taking responsibility."

Recently, Byrd said, she was among the employees summoned to a training session on how to recognize and prevent sexual harassment. The instructions, she said, "are four years too late."

Massachusetts Sued Over Gay Marriage Ruling (REU-Y2)

By Jason Szep

Reuters, January 4, 2006

Gay rights lawyers filed on Tuesday a lawsuit to stop a proposed ballot measure aimed at overturning a court decision that made Massachusetts the first and only U.S. state to legalize gay marriage.

The lawsuit by the Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders (GLAD) said the state's attorney general erred when he ruled in September that Massachusetts voters could decide in a 2008 poll to redefine marriage as the union of one man and one woman.

They said the decision by Thomas Reilly, a Democrat who is likely to run for governor this year, was unconstitutional because ballot initiatives cannot reverse judicial decisions under the state's Constitution.

"The attorney general simply got it wrong," Gary Buseck, GLAD's legal director, said in a statement.

Reilly's office said his decision was legally sound, adding that Reilly does not personally favor banning same-sex marriage.

Massachusetts' highest court ruled in 2003 that it was unconstitutional to ban gay marriage, paving the way for America's first same-sex marriages in May the following year.

Since then, about 7,000 gays and lesbians have wed in the state, and gay rights advocates across the country have sought to encourage other states to legalize same-sex marriages.

Those efforts have largely failed, most recently in Texas, which in November became the 19th U.S. state to approve a constitutional ban on same-sex marriage.

Homosexual couples in at least seven states have filed lawsuits seeking the right to marry, while as many as 10 states could see campaigns this year for amendments to uphold marriage as the union of a man and a woman.

'AN ELECTRIFYING ISSUE'

DOJ_NMG_0007866

In Massachusetts, VoteOnMarriage.org -- a coalition of conservative and Christian groups -- proposed the 2008 ballot initiative to amend the state constitution by defining marriage as exclusively between a man and a woman.

Between September 21 and November 23 last year, they gathered more than twice the number of voter signatures needed for state legislators to put the question to the public.

On Tuesday they predicted the lawsuit would be defeated.

"We don't think the suit is credible," said Kristian Mineau, president of the Massachusetts Family Institute, a backer of the initiative. "I think they were surprised at the magnitude of the number of signatures -- 170,000 -- which tells us what an electrifying issue this is with the people."

Conservatives and some religious groups say the issue is so important that voters should decide it, not the state Supreme Court.

Massachusetts' Republican governor, Mitt Romney, a devout Mormon with White House ambitions, supports their position.

The ballot initiative must be approved by 25 percent of the 200-member state Legislature this year and again in 2007 before it can go to voters.

If passed, it would not seek to annul marriage licenses already issued to same-sex couples.

GLAD said it expects the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County to consider the lawsuit against Reilly in the next few months.

Massachusetts Sued On Marriage Petition (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

A homosexual rights legal organization filed a lawsuit yesterday challenging a ruling that allowed a petition drive for a constitutional amendment that would end same-sex "marriages" in Massachusetts.

Massachusetts Attorney General Thomas Reilly "simply got it wrong" in September when he certified VoteOnMarriage.org's marriage amendment for a petition drive, said Gary Buseck, legal director of Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders (GLAD), which filed its lawsuit before the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court.

Article 48 of the state constitution says citizens cannot use constitutional amendments to reverse judicial decisions. The sole purpose of the marriage amendment, Mr. Buseck said, is to reverse the court's 2003 Goodridge decision, which legalized same-sex "marriage" in Massachusetts.

The proposed marriage amendment would allow marriages only between one man and one woman.

Johanna Schulman, president of GLAD's board of directors, is the lawsuit's plaintiff. Mr. Reilly and William F. Galvin, secretary of the commonwealth, are named as defendants.

The lawsuit asks the court to find that Mr. Reilly erred when he certified the VoteOnMarriage.org amendment for a signature drive. It also asks the court to block Mr. Galvin from taking any "further steps" to get the proposal on a ballot.

This fall, backers of the VoteOnMarriage.org amendment collected about 170,000 signatures, roughly twice the number needed.

Mr. Galvin certified more than 123,000 signatures in December. GLAD attorneys expect that he will send the amendment to state lawmakers when they go into session today.

The amendment must be approved twice by lawmakers before it can go before voters in November 2008. If the amendment is passed, backers say, it would not nullify existing same-sex "marriages."

More than 6,500 same-sex couples have "married" since the Goodridge decision went into effect in May 2004.

A spokesman for Mr. Reilly said yesterday that although the attorney general doesn't support the marriage amendment personally, he thinks that allowing it to proceed was the right decision.

In an opinion column written in September, Mr. Reilly said he looked carefully at the history of Article 48.

Citizen petitions have been used since the early 1900s to amend the state constitution "in response to a court decision finding a law unconstitutional," Mr. Reilly wrote. Petitions may not be used to "put a law back into effect" after a court has found it unconstitutional, but citizens are clearly allowed to amend the constitution "going forward," he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0007867

The amendment "was drafted with sound legal advice from constitutional scholars, and as long as the constitution and recent precedent are followed," it should survive a court review, said Kris Mineau, head of the Massachusetts Family Institute and spokesman for VoteOnMarriage.org.

ANTITRUST:

MAGAZINE CIRCULATION-FRAUD CASE ENTERS PLEA NEGOTIATIONS (ADAGE)

By Nat Ives

AdAge.com, January 3, 2006

NEW YORK (AdAge.com) -- One of the publishing executives accused of circulation fraud at Laptop magazine has entered plea negotiations with the U.S. Justice Department, court documents filed in the case show.

Deal likely

Proceedings regarding the executive, John Jay Annis, are on hold through Jan. 30 while the parties try to hammer out a deal, which Judge Steven M. Gold has indicated he considers likely.

The U.S. attorney's office for the Eastern District of New York, which has been investigating circulation practices since schemes by Newsday and Hoy to inflate their numbers became public, secured the arrests of Edward D. Brown, president-publisher, Bedford Communications, and Mr. Annis, Bedford's circulation director, last October.

Bogus distribution

Prosecutors accused the pair of scheming to inflate circulation at Laptop magazine by hiring a distributor to accept 15,000 copies that they would claim as paid circulation -- whether or not they were ever distributed. The distributor they hired was really an undercover postal inspector, prosecutors said.

It is unclear what a plea arrangement would mean to the circulation investigation. According to the Bedford Web site, Mr. Annis serves as a circulation consultant to “several other publishing companies,” so he may have information of interest to prosecutors about magazines beyond Laptop. That could explain the surprising effort by the government to arrange an elaborate sting on executives at Bedford, a relatively small target.

No comment

The lead prosecutor on the case, Jonathan Edward Davis, declined to comment on any such speculation or other facets of the negotiations. An attorney for Mr. Annis did not respond to a message seeking comment.

The U.S. attorney's office has also subpoenaed Time Inc. for information on that company's bulk-distribution programs. Time Inc. disclosed the subpoena in September and said it was complying.

But a plea deal may produce nothing more than testimony against Mr. Brown or a quicker resolution of the case.

Mr. Brown's status is also unclear. After the original order for his arrest and a reported not-guilty plea, court documents do not mention him again and do not list an attorney for him. Mr. Brown did not return a call seeking comment.

Linens 'N Things Deal Gets US Antitrust Approval (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

Filed at 2:20 p.m. ET

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - U.S. antitrust authorities said on Tuesday they approved plans by Linens 'n Things Inc. (LIN.N) to be taken over by private equity firm Apollo Management L.P. and its affiliates.

Officials have completed their investigation of the $1.3 billion deal without taking action, the Federal Trade Commission said in a notice.

Linens 'n Things faces stiff competition from larger rival Bed Bath & Beyond Inc. (BBBY.O) and discounters such as Target Corp. (TGT.N), which have expanded home decor offerings.

DOJ_NMG_0007868

Under the terms of the Apollo deal, financing is contingent upon Linens 'n Things reporting a fourth-quarter comparable sales decline of no more than 6 percent and earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization of not less than $ 140 million.

Cisco's Offer For Scientific-Atlanta Gets U.S. Antitrust Clearance (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

Cisco Systems Inc. received U.S. antitrust clearance for its offer to acquire Scientific-Atlanta Inc. for about $6.9 billion, or $43 a share.

The San Jose, Calif., networking titan said its bid still requires regulatory approvals in various foreign jurisdictions. Cisco agreed in November to acquire the maker of television set-top boxes, filling in the missing video element from its far-reaching effort to penetrate the consumer market.

Scientific-Atlanta, Lawrenceville, Ga., said its shareholders can vote on the proposed deal with Cisco at a special meeting Feb. 2. The companies expect the deal to close in Cisco's fiscal 2006 third quarter, which ends in April.

As of 4 p.m. composite trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market, Cisco was at $17.45, up 33 cents. As of 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, Scientific-Atlanta was at $42.90, off 17 cents.

Cisco Systems Says Regulatory Waiting Period For Acquisition Of Scientific-Atlanta Expires (AP)

AP, January 4, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP) -- Network equipment maker Cisco Systems Inc. said the federal waiting period for its acquisition of cable television technology company Scientific-Atlanta Inc. has expired without regulators taking any action.

On Tuesday, the companies said the U.S. antitrust waiting period expired on Friday, though the deal is still subject to approval by authorities outside the United States.

Under the transaction announced in November, Cisco will acquire Scientific-Atlanta for $6.9 billion, or $43 per share in cash, and assumed options. Scientific-Atlanta's cash balance will reduce the cost of the deal for Cisco to about $5.3 billion.

The deal, which is expected to close by late April, is expected to fuel changes in how TV is distributed and watched as programming is increasingly shuttled to homes using the language of the Internet.

Scientific-Atlanta, a leading maker of cable boxes and the technology behind them, is expected to benefit as its customers -- cable and phone companies -- move toward Internet-based TV offerings. Cisco is the world's largest supplier of data networking gear.

Shares of San Jose-based Cisco rose 33 cents to close at $17.45 Tuesday on the Nasdaq Stock Market. Shares of Scientific-Atlanta fell 17 cents to close at $42.90 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Banking Against Wal-Mart (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) will soon have to make a big decision: whether to grant retail giant Wal-Mart a charter to enter the consumer banking business. You won't be surprised to learn that the idea of more banking competition is not universally popular with . . . bankers.

In particular, the Independent Community Bankers Association (ICBA) is raising a ruckus in Washington to keep big bad Wal-Mart locked out of their game. We have here a textbook case of a powerful corporate lobby rushing to its pals in Congress and their regulators, in this case the FDIC, and pleading for them to squash competition that might lower the prices of banking services.

At issue is whether Wal-Mart should be granted the authority to establish an Industrial Loan Company (ILC) in Utah. ILCs are state-chartered, quasi-banks that were originally designed a century ago to help low-income workers get cheap loans. ILCs can provide most banking services, such as check cashing, lending, and credit card processing. Target and General Electric have been granted an ILC with little controversy. But because Wal-Mart has been portrayed as America's latest corporate villain, its political hurdles are much higher.

DOJ_NMG_0007869

If the bankers succeed in this protectionist gambit, the biggest loser won't be Wal-Mart, but rather consumers, particularly those in lower-income neighborhoods where competition in retail banking is traditionally scarce. Wal-Mart banking services in these areas might even solve the longstanding problems of red-lining and discriminatory lending practices. Wal-Mart already performs many bank-like functions that are especially popular in poor areas -- including wire transfers, money orders, paycheck cashing, and express bill payment services.

So it's especially notable that Congressman Barney Frank of Massachusetts and a gang of other Capitol Hill liberals have cast a skeptical eye toward Wal-Mart's entry into banking. If they decide to regulate Wal-Mart out of the industry, the end result will be higher banking service costs for the poor constituents they claim to represent.

The protest is all the more curious since Wal-Mart's immediate banking ambitions are quite modest. To head off the mounting opposition from the bankers, Wal-Mart insists that in the short term it merely wants to create an in-house banking affiliate so it can lower costs on credit card transactions at its stores. Traditionally, banks charge an interchange fee of roughly 2% on the cost of the retail credit/debit card transaction. Wal-Mart has determined that if it owns its own bank it can cut the transaction fee in half, and pass the cost-savings on to its customers who pay with Visa or MasterCard.

But why shouldn't Wal-Mart be permitted to engage in a whole range of banking services down the line, if it wishes to? That's the meaty policy issue at stake here: whether the traditional firewall between banks and commercial enterprises (i.e., the commercial lenders and the borrowers) should be officially torn down. The Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act of 1999 effectively abandoned this traditional separation between commerce and banking when it allowed securities and insurance firms to engage in most banking activities. This has all been part of a 25-year-long deregulation of banking that has led to huge increases in efficiency in American financial markets as well as vastly improved consumer services. (Remember the quaint notion of "banker's hours?")

Peter Wallison of the American Enterprise Institute notes that "the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act has eviscerated the policy case against allowing commercial firms to affiliate with banks." Wal-Mart's entry into the mix would merely continue what has been a benign, pro-competition trend.

Would granting Wal-Mart its ILC status impose an unnecessary financial risk on the soundness of the banking system? The Community Bankers lobby warns that "Wal-Mart's entrance into banking would constitute a dangerous over-concentration of economic power that would skew market forces." What clearly undermines this argument is that in every other consumer market that Wal-Mart has entered, from hardware services to selling gas at the pump, the impact of its gaining market share has been to reduce prices, not to raise them.

Studies have found, for example, that in neighborhoods where Wal-Mart has entered the grocery business, its prices range from 8% to 27% below those charged at the incumbent grocery chains. Moreover, if there were a repeat of the kind of bank failures we witnessed in the late 1980s, financially sturdy Wal-Mart would be far less susceptible to the risk of closure (and FDIC deposit insurance payments to depositors) than small and less capitalized community banks.

It's always possible that Wal-Mart will fall on its face in banking. We suspect, however, that what really spooks the banking industry is the threat of more competition, more convenience and lower prices for financial services. But that should be welcome news to members of Congress and the regulators at the Federal Reserve Board and the FDIC if they truly care about the welfare of the banking consumer.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

No New Deaths In Oklahoma, But The Fires Cut A Grim Path (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

SHAWNEE, Okla., Jan. 3 - Firefighters contained at least seven new and long-smoldering blazes across Oklahoma on Tuesday with no reported injuries, but hundreds of additional acres of drought-parched grassland and dozens of buildings were scorched or destroyed, officials reported.

DOJ_NMG_0007870

Texas and New Mexico also fought holding actions against the fires, some apparently set, that have so far claimed at least two dead in Oklahoma and three dead in Texas and consumed more than half a million acres and more than 500 homes.

One fire in Shamrock off I-44 between Oklahoma City and Tulsa gutted an unoccupied school and resisted barrages of flame-retardant chemicals dropped from a four-engine tanker plane. At least 62 firefighters from Tennessee, Alabama, North Carolina and other states were deployed in six eastern Oklahoma sectors with bulldozers, tanker trucks and other heavy equipment.

"The grass is so dead - you might as well have matches sitting out there," said Troy Taylor, a truck driver from Ringgold, Tex., who saw a wall of flame advancing on him on Sunday and fled with his wife, Lori, and their children.

The fire, which began on Sunday and was still active Tuesday afternoon, burned a trail 25 miles long, destroying 41,000 acres and 32 buildings in two counties.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency authorized the use of federal disaster relief funds to help Texas, Oklahoma and New Mexico fight the fires. But Lt. Gov. Mary Fallin of New Mexico, in a visit to the incident command center in Shawnee that is serving as firefighting headquarters, said Oklahoma was still waiting for the White House response to the state's request for a federal declaration of emergency to cover some of the state's expenses.

"Contact has been made," said Ms. Fallin, a Republican running for Congress.

Some of the visiting firefighters spoke with relish of rushing to the aid of the stricken Southwest. Pete Moditz, a career forester from Selmer, Tenn., showed off his legs scratched red through his pants from brambles as he led a tractor plow through the fires. Water might knock down a fire, but "that," he said, pointing to the yellow monster on tank treads, "puts it out."

A wet spring combined with parched conditions for the last six months have made Texas, Oklahoma and New Mexico a giant tinderbox.

"We've got reports that this is the worst drought since 1956," said Judge James Kittrell of Montague County, whose jurisdiction includes Ringgold.

Thirty-three of Oklahoma's 77 counties have suffered fires, with damages put at $10 million. In Texas, since Dec. 26, 159 fires have destroyed 238 homes and 254,555 acres, according to the state's emergency management center.

In New Mexico, 14 grass fires burned up to 60,000 acres.

The fire in Ringgold was frighteningly fast, residents said, falling on the North Texas town at speeds of up to 60 miles per hour. "We decided if the flames made it to the railroad tracks, we were going to leave," said Mr. Taylor, the truck driver, pointing to a distant ridge.

"Ten minutes later, it was in our yard," Mr. Taylor said.

The billowing wall of four-foot flames had burned its way to U.S. 82, jumped the road and blazed across the Taylors' lawn right up to the house.

Around them they could hear the sounds of their town burning down: propane tanks exploding, tires popping, paint cans blowing lids.

"The fire was right next to the van when we left," Mr. Taylor said.

"It came so quick, it went around the buildings and went on," he said. Mr. Taylor, who had driven around the block, realized his house was all right, jumped out of his van and began putting out his lawn of flames.

Battle Over Property Rights Goes On, Despite Ruling (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2006

The moment of truth is yet to arrive in the now-famous Fort Trumbull neighborhood in New London, Conn.

Six months after the US Supreme Court ruled that the city could seize and demolish private homes to make way for a commercial development project, determined residents are still living in their homes in the targeted neighborhood.

There have been no bulldozers. No wrecking balls. No police officers dragging homeowners away. At least, not yet.

Instead, the state of Connecticut has hired a mediator to try to find a more peaceful solution to the seven-year battle that has touched off a heated debate over the government's use of eminent domain to foster economic development.

DOJ_NMG_0007871

To property rights activists across the nation, Fort Trumbull has become ground zero in that battle ever since the high court's 5-4 ruling. These activists are using outrage over the case to spearhead a reform movement aimed at passing laws to make it increasingly difficult for local and state governments to raze homes and turn the land over to private developers.

"It has to be one of the most vilified Supreme Court decisions in history - where people understood the issues, understood the result, and didn't like it," says Scott Sawyer, a member of the legal team representing the homeowners.

On the other side of the debate are government officials, planners, urban renewal experts, and development firms warning that many cities and towns need every tool at their disposal to help foster prosperity in the face of chronic economic decline. To these advocates, New London is a prime example of a small city with high unemployment, a stagnant tax base, and no large tracts of vacant land to support a major development project. Without the option of using eminent domain, the city's economic prospects would be bleak, they say.

"We won. We would like to move the project forward," says New London City Manager Richard Brown. "We are champing at the bit to get going."

There is nothing new about the constitutional issue at the center of the case. The Supreme Court has long recognized that there is no bar to government takings that may provide both public and private benefits.

But Kelo v. New London was different because of the players involved. The high court's two prior legal precedents involved monopolistic landowners in Hawaii and a department store owner in Washington, D.C. In contrast, Susette Kelo is a homeowner, like most US citizens. When the government took action against her, many Americans could imagine the government taking similar action against them. Kelo's pink cottage in Fort Trumbull has become an icon, Mr. Sawyer says, as recognizable to some as the Liberty Bell.

"It is the house that represents property rights in the United States," he says. "Why would you ever tear that down?"

Sawyer and others say they aren't sure what will happen next. City officials say the development project is still economically viable. All they need is a green light from the mediator and the state.

The city's redevelopment agency has spent much of its $70 million budget preparing a large portion of the 90-acre riverfront site for the planned hotel, office, and condo project. Land has been graded, roads built, and utilities installed. But major construction has not yet begun.

Some analysts suggest that the national backlash following the Supreme Court decision has made it even more difficult to find companies willing to move in. What firm wants to locate to a piece of property that will long be associated with the taking of people's homes? these analysts ask.

Nonetheless, the city's planning board has approved the hotel portion of the project, and there are talks under way for the Coast Guard to move its research and development center to a vacant office building on the site. The building is all that remains of the US Naval Undersea Warfare Center, which was shut down in 1996.

When that center closed, the federal government agreed to turn over the 32 acres of property to the city. Rather than focus on that tract alone, the city expanded its redevelopment plan by 58 acres, including the Fort Trumbull neighborhood.

The homeowners say they aren't opposed to redevelopment. But they don't see why the renewal project has to include the demolition of their homes.

It is difficult to overestimate the level of animosity between New London development officials and the homeowners. After enduring years of attempts to force them out, residents say the toughest test so far has been losing at the Supreme Court.

"It took a while to get a handle on it," says Matt Dery, whose family has lived on the same corner in Fort Trumbull for 100 years. But Mr. Dery says his discussion with the mediator has left him hopeful. "Things have a way of working themselves out. Maybe there is a higher power at work here - I'm sure there is," he says.

Dery's neighbor, Byron Athenian, is just taking it day by day. "It is kind of a strange way to live," says Mr. Athenian, who has resided for 10 years in the house with gray shingles owned by his mother. This past fall, a few months after the Supreme Court ruling, he received an eviction notice. "When I first got it, it was like 'Wow, they only gave me 30 days to leave,' " he says.

The city's redevelopment agency sent notices to all tenants living in rented properties in Fort Trumbull. The move got the attention of Connecticut Gov. M. Jodi Rell, who instructed the city to withdraw the notices. Since then, the feud has been in hiatus pending the work of the mediator.

DOJ_NMG_0007872

But that hasn't stopped people from worrying about what might happen next.

"I think there could be civil disobedience if they moved in there with a wrecking ball," says Susan Munger, a member of the Coalition to Save the Fort Trumbull Neighborhood. "There has to be another way to resolve it that is satisfactory to the homeowners. Some of them don't have any intention of leaving."

As for a compromise, City Manager Brown isn't making any predictions. But he says New London badly needs a boost.

"The forecast for economic assistance from the state of Connecticut to its urban areas is not any better for the upcoming year than it was for the past couple," he says. "We are going to be left on our own to develop new sources of revenue, so we need the project to move forward."

Prevention Is Key To Avian Or Seasonal Flu (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

Avian flu has recently moved to the top of President Bush's health care agenda. But medical experts such as Susan J. Blumenthal have been warning for years that international travel, a weakened public health system and antiquated vaccines have made the prospect of an influenza pandemic a matter of when, not if.

Blumenthal, a former assistant surgeon general, in a recent speech in Washington warned that the H5N1 strain of the virus, now confined largely to birds, has the potential to develop into a deadly human virus. Already, the virus has "killed more birds than any in the history of the world," humans do not have immunity, it is striking younger victims and it has spread rapidly into at least 16 countries, she said.

A clinical professor of psychiatry at Georgetown and Tufts University schools of medicine, Blumenthal was the first deputy assistant secretary for women's health, from 1993 to 1997, and is an authority on global public health. She retired from the government last year.

In an interview, she talked about infectious diseases and chronic illnesses -- and what individuals and the government can do to reduce risk. She said one of the lessons of Hurricane Katrina is that the United States is not sufficiently prepared to deal with any number of crises, from a terrorist attack to a natural disaster to a pandemic.

-- Ceci Connolly

Q Why is a pandemic a matter of when, not if?

AEach generation has had a pandemic. The 1918 influenza pandemic killed 40 million people and infected 500 million. It was like a global blizzard over 18 months. With international trade and modern travel, the world is shrinking. . . . In 1969, the surgeon general announced the "war against infectious diseases is over." We thought we had conquered the microbe. But we've had 30 new diseases since 1972, including SARS [severe acute respiratory syndrome], monkey pox and Lyme disease.

How real is the threat of an avian flu pandemic?

On the question of are we more vulnerable, there is the group of people I call the ostriches and the Chicken Little. The ostriches point out that we have better science and public health than ever before, that we have not seen the H5N1 virus here. The Chicken Little say we do not have enough antiviral [medications]; we don't have a vaccine. The threat is probably somewhere in between.

How is the virus spread?

It begins in aquatic birds, moves to domestic poultry and then potentially to humans. . . . Asia is a hotbed [for H5N1] because people live in close proximity to poultry, and they lack a strong public health infrastructure. You can become infected through direct contact with poultry or contact with a surface that has poultry droppings or excretions. There have been about 135 human cases since 1997, which is relatively few.

Your speeches are alarming. Is that intentional?

Somewhat. If you give candid information, people make good decisions. But we also want it to be a wake-up call. People know they should eat right, exercise, get out of the way of a hurricane, but we don't always do those things. We know we shouldn't smoke, yet one out of five people do. It took Katrina and seeing some of the failures in not having state, federal and local preparedness not being coordinated to serve as a wake-up call to the concern of pandemic flu.

Are we prepared?

DOJ_NMG_0007873

We're not sufficiently prepared if a pandemic were to strike us this year. We have a plan that outlines the major steps to be taken. Hopefully we'll have the time to develop new vaccines and stockpile antivirals. We don't have [the necessary] communications systems in place. We don't have a rapid diagnostic tool for using in the field, there is no cell-based vaccine nor the production systems that would be needed. . . . But we can't forget the [pandemics] that are currently with us.

Such as?

Forty million people worldwide are infected with the AIDS virus; 3 million die each year. One million children die of measles each year because they don't get a 70-cent vaccine. . . . In the United States, we have the highest infant mortality rate of the industrialized world. We spend twice as much as any other nation on health care, and we rank 18th in life expectancy and 35th in overall health status.

If there is an outbreak of avian flu, would there be a quarantine in the United States, and what would it look like?

What we would suggest is social distancing -- have people stay in their homes, not go to mass gatherings. It would be a real challenge. We have a generation of physicians who haven't trained in quarantine techniques. During the SARS outbreak, it was health care professionals and students who violated the quarantine. If there is a pandemic, things could quickly degenerate into chaos. That's why it's important to rehearse for these things.

What should average Americans do to protect themselves against avian flu or other infectious diseases?

Get your seasonal flu shot. The seasonal flu causes 36,000 deaths in America and 500,000 worldwide. It translates into $37 billion in economic costs related to treatment. . . . Also get a pneumonia shot. Practice good hygiene, particularly around the holiday season when you are at a lot of parties shaking hands. Washing hands is one of the best public health interventions we have.

What would you put on the top of a public health agenda for 2006?

Smoking, certainly. If you thought there were a killer out there claiming the lives of one out of every five people, we'd have the FBI, CIA and police all out there tracking that terrorist. . . . Safe water. Water is one of the key health and political issues of the 21st century. [Unclean] water is the leading cause of death and disability in the world. Water impacts the economy; it's linked to energy, recreation, food. Katrina showed the importance of access to safe water. Sixty-five percent of our bodies are water.

You say in your speeches that we are a treatment-oriented society rather than a prevention-oriented society. Why is that noteworthy?

Small steps can bring big rewards. Losing five or 10 pounds can make you feel much better. Walking 10,000 steps a day. These can significantly decrease your risk for chronic illnesses. . . . On a public policy level, whether you're trying to prevent cancer, diabetes, a hurricane or bioterrorism, prevention is the cornerstone.

Buffalo Lawsuit Challenges A Casino Off Indian Land (NYT)

By David Staba

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

BUFFALO, Jan. 3 - In the latest salvo between local advocates and government officials over this city's future, a coalition of citizens' groups, churches, business people and lawyers filed a lawsuit in federal court on Tuesday to halt construction of an Indian casino on the Buffalo River waterfront.

The suit alleges that federal officials, including Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton, failed to abide by a 1988 law regulating gambling facilities established off reservation land when they approved the proposed Buffalo casino. The proposed facility is one of three gambling sites in this region allowed under a 2002 compact between New York State and the Seneca Nation.

In legal papers filed in Federal District Court, the plaintiffs - led by a group called Citizens Against Casino Gambling in Erie County - said that a Buffalo casino cannot be permitted under federal law, because the nine-acre site along the Buffalo River is not adjacent to an existing reservation and was not part of land claimed by the Seneca Nation.

In addition, the suit alleges that the approval process violated federal laws that require a study of the environmental impact of a proposed casino. The plaintiffs also say that demolition of a grain elevator at the proposed site would violate the National Historic Preservation Act.

DOJ_NMG_0007874

"Some people have tried to make this into grain silos versus a casino, but this is a much more important issue," said Richard Lippes, one of the plaintiffs' lawyers. "These citizens aren't opposed to progress. They just want the right things to happen in the right way."

Barry E. Snyder, president of the Seneca Nation, was not available for comment Tuesday afternoon. But on Friday, he spoke dismissively of a possible lawsuit during the partial opening of a luxury hotel adjacent to the Senecas' existing casino in Niagara Falls.

"Lawsuits come and go - they don't interest me," Mr. Snyder was quoted as saying in The Buffalo News. "We took the opportunity to build a casino and hotel in Niagara Falls because no one else would do it. I've said the same of Buffalo, and we're going ahead. I'm a man of my word."

Proponents also maintain that the casino will create jobs as well as spur economic development in the long dormant area.

Several parties to the lawsuit, including Mr. Lippes and the Preservation Coalition of Erie County, also took part in recent years in two other significant civic lawsuits that sought to preserve land.

They were among the litigants who halted a state plan to build a marina, which would have been constructed atop limestone walls that were part of the original terminus of the Erie Canal, and a proposal by an international commission to build a steel bridge next to the Peace Bridge, which was built in 1927 and connects Buffalo to Fort Erie, Ontario.

In each instance, a judge ruled that the government agencies involved did not follow proper planning procedures. Both plans have since been revised. The waterfront plans, proposed by the Empire State Development Corporation, now include the restoration of the canal terminus and other historic elements. As for the bridge, a two-nation panel has recommended a sweeping cable-stayed bridge over the Niagara River.

"In both cases, we got something better," said Mr. Lippes, who served as general counsel to the primary plaintiff in each case.

Like the waterfront and Peace Bridge suits, the legal challenge to the proposed Seneca Buffalo Creek Casino is being financed in part by the Margaret L. Wendt Foundation, which often provides money to educational or artistic organizations.

"We feel the need to make sure the laws are followed when making this kind of change to our community," said Janet Loew Day, a foundation trustee.

The plaintiffs said that taking the land for the proposed casino site off the tax rolls and creating, in essence, a tiny sovereign nation housing the casino would run counter to the canal restoration plans and other nascent development in the area.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

High-tech Gadgetry Pops Up In Drug Trade (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel, January 4, 2006

He couldn't help but show off a little.

With the eager customer watching, the alleged drug dealer waltzed into the bathroom of the East Knoxville house, flipped on the light and then pressed the switch into the wall. Up from the floor popped a secret compartment where drugs were kept hidden.

The customer must have seemed impressed because the alleged dealer gave him an impromptu tour of other hidden hatches used by his organization and even introduced the consumer to the "Kid" who crafted all of the devices.

Turns out, the customer was a rat.

This morsel of insider information on both the investigation and the inner workings of a large-scale Detroit-to-Knoxville drug trafficking organization is contained in an 83-page search warrant affidavit recently unsealed in U.S. District Court.

The search warrants obtained via the affidavit led to the November arrests of four men accused in a conspiracy case that Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck has alleged in court records funneled hundreds of pounds of cocaine, crack and marijuana and thousands of ecstasy pills from the Motor City to Knoxville starting in May 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0007875

The arrested - and later indicted - include alleged mastermind Robert "Party" Smith and the man Knoxville Police Department Investigator Bruce Conkey dubbed Smith's right-hand man, Stephen "Black" Ardis.

The search warrant affidavit broadens the suspect list in the alleged conspiracy to include at least a dozen other people, including both drug dealer suspects in Knoxville and supplier suspects in Detroit.

The lengthy document also reveals an organization that was, at times, as sophisticated as the make-believe cocaine kingpin Tony Montana of "Scarface" movie fame, who Conkey has testified was Smith's idol. At other times, the affidavit makes the group seem downright foolhardy.

Take the tour offered the informant, for instance.

It revealed a concerted effort by the alleged trafficking organization to spread out the risks of police raids by using a half-dozen different houses to handle the trade, the affidavit stated.

At some, deemed in the affidavit as "stash houses," drugs were stored. At others, termed in the affidavit as "crack houses," drugs were sold. If police hit any single place, the entire inventory of illegal wares would not be wiped out.

The group used sophisticated secret compartments, including the nifty pop-up box built into the floor of a bathroom at a house on Sunset Avenue, the affidavit alleged. Vehicles used to transport drugs also were equipped with hidden stash boxes, including a Ford Excursion described in the affidavit that had two secret compartments, one where the airbag should have been and another in the floor. Both were activated through cigarette lighters in the vehicle, the affidavit stated.

According to the affidavit, a man identified only as the "Kid" engineered hiding places for the alleged network's goody stash.

The alleged dealer who showed off the devices in August has not been charged. The affidavit makes clear he had no idea the customer he was trying to wow with his tour was working for Conkey and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Todd Lee.

The pair, who led the probe, used five informants in all during their two-year investigation. Only two are now willing to testify, the affidavit stated.

Despite the high-tech gadgetry and constant use of code words to cloak the illegal goings-on of the group, Smith and Ardis apparently were clueless that Conkey and Lee were on their trail, the affidavit alleged.

That changed in October when an unidentified woman called Ardis after Ardis drove past her home. She tipped him that one, maybe two, unmarked cars were tailing him, according to the affidavit.

"I can't believe you all didn't see them," she said.

Within days, secretly recorded phone conversations between Ardis and Smith showed not only that Ardis had figured out he was being followed but that the pursuing undercover officer was none other than "McConkey."

Conkey has for more than a decade managed to work undercover while having one of the most high-profile nicknames and reputations in the inner city.

Years ago, angry drug dealers who had accused Conkey of harassing them wrote and recorded a rap song about him, referring to him as "McConkey." The nickname stuck.

On Oct. 26, the affidavit alleges, Ardis called Smith to break the bad news that "McConkey" had been following him.

"I just now found out it was him," Ardis is quoted in the affidavit as saying.

Smith pressed Ardis on where he saw "McConkey" so they could move their operation, the affidavit alleged. But Ardis said it didn't matter where he moved. "McConkey" would find him, according to the affidavit.

" the (expletive) like Superman," Ardis said.

Days later, however, the pair were back in business, the affidavit alleged. Less than a month later, Conkey, Lee and a team of federal and local officers arrested them.

They are now awaiting trial, along with an alleged "mule" who authorities say ferried drugs for the pair and a person accused of being a customer. It's not clear if those named in the affidavit will be charged

Former State Prison Officer Faces Felony Drug Charges (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0007876

MISSOULA -- A federal grand jury here has indicted a former officer at the Montana State Prison on charges of attempting to distribute methamphetamine, heroin and marijuana.

Michael E. Short, 50, was arraigned in U.S. District Court in Missoula on Tuesday and was released without bail after pleading not guilty.

Prosecutors, the FBI and a state Corrections Department official declined to discuss specifics of the case, including whether Short is accused of trying to sell drugs to inmates. However, a statement from the U.S. attorney's office said the charges were the result of a joint investigation between the FBI and the Department of Corrections.

Corrections spokesman Bob Anez said only that Short worked at the prison for about 5 1/2 years before resigning in July 2005.

"Other than that, I can't comment beyond what is in the indictment because we don't want to do anything that would contaminate a jury pool should this case ever go to trial," Anez said.

It was not clear late Tuesday whether Short had hired an attorney.

The federal indictment, which is dated Dec. 8 but unsealed only upon Short's appearance Tuesday, charges Short with attempting to possess and attempting to distribute a quarter pound of marijuana and a half ounce of methampetamine on July 12, 2005, in the Deer Lodge and Anaconda area.

He faces a second charge of attempting to possess and attempting to distribute a quarter pound of marijuana, a half ounce of methamphetamine and 2 grams of heroin on July 16, 2005, in the same area. Short also is charged with being a drug user in possession of a firearm. All three charges are felonies.

Rhode Island Legalizes Medical Marijuana (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) -- Rhode Island on Tuesday became the 11th state to legalize medical marijuana and the first since the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June that patients who use the drug can still be prosecuted under federal law.

The House overrode a veto by Gov. Don Carcieri, 59-13, allowing people with illnesses such as cancer and AIDS to grow up to 12 marijuana plants or buy 2.5 ounces of marijuana to relieve their symptoms. Those who do are required to register with the state and get an identification card.

Federal law prohibits any use of marijuana, but Maine, Vermont, Alaska, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Montana, Nevada, Oregon and Washington allow it to be grown and used for medicinal purposes.

The U.S. high court ruled June 6 that people who smoke marijuana because their doctors recommend it can still be prosecuted under federal drug laws, even if their states allow it.

Federal authorities, however, have conceded they are unlikely to prosecute many medicinal marijuana users.

"I'm sure everybody in this room knows at least one person who would have benefited from medical marijuana," Rep. Thomas Slater, who has cancer, told fellow lawmakers before the vote. Slater said he does not use marijuana now, but it could become part of his treatment in the future.

Carcieri, unhappy with the override, said the law fails to provide ways for users to buy marijuana legally and leaves Rhode Islanders open to federal prosecution.

"Users will be forced to purchase marijuana in the illegal street market, putting them at risk and complicating the difficult jobs that our law enforcement personnel must do every day," the governor said.

Tom Riley, a spokesman for the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said the vote showed "misguided and out-of-touch" views on the harms of marijuana.

"There's this notion from the '60s or the '70s that marijuana is a harmless drug," Riley said. "It's not."

Legislators Override Veto, Then Begin New Session (PROJO)

By Scott Mayerowitz, Katherine Gregg And Elizabeth Gudrais

The Providence Journal, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0007877

PROVIDENCE -- Rhode Island became the 11th state yesterday to allow the use of marijuana to ease the pain of people suffering from serious and chronic illnesses such as AIDS and cancer.

Patients whose doctors or caregivers recommend marijuana will soon be able to possess up to 12 plants, or 2.5 ounces of marijuana. The new law protects them from arrest under state law, but does nothing to stop federal prosecution, leaving some critics to call the measure nothing more than a symbolic act.

The marijuana issue provided a dramatic start to the lawmakers' first day back in the State House in six months.

This year's legislative session began with an almost festive atmosphere. There were backslaps and smiles and tables full of food, despite simmering election-year tensions, especially those between House Speaker William J. Murphy's leadership team and an alliance of Republicans and dissident Democrats.

Murphy, D-West Warwick, vowed in the coming months to tackle -- among other things -- "responsible tax reform, a comprehensive energy strategy, a fair and livable working wage."

"The issues that we will face in this session are the issues that every Rhode Islander faces in their day-to-day lives," Murphy said.

BUT THE FOCUS yesterday was on marijuana.

Lawmakers had passed "medical marijuana" legislation in June, but the measure was vetoed by Governor Carcieri. The Senate overrode the veto the next day, but the House waited until yesterday to override, easily doing so with a 59-to-13 vote. Three members were absent and only 44 votes were needed for the override.

(Lawmakers have been officially on "recess" for the last six months, allowing for the override before officially adjourning yesterday and then opening a new session.)

"It's been a long wait and a lot of work, but this law will grant mercy and relief to the sick and suffering. Finally Rhode Island will stop denying sick people a proven means of relief from their pain," said the House sponsor, Rep. Thomas C. Slater, D-Providence, who has cancer.

Sen. Rhoda E. Perry, D-Providence, the Senate sponsor, called it a "progressive and compassionate piece of legislation." The bill carries the name of Edward O. Hawkins, Perry's nephew who died of AIDS.

Persuading his colleagues for an override, Slater said "Ten states have realized that it makes no sense in making people criminals for following their doctor's advice and relieving their pain." In those states, "The sky has not fallen and thousands of patients live in less pain."

House Minority Leader Robert A. Watson, R-East Greenwich, who supported and voted for the bill in the past, said that in his heart he wanted to pass the law but in the end he needed to stand behind the governor. Only 6 of the 14 other House Republicans joined Watson, voting to uphold the veto.

Carcieri's press secretary, Jeff Neal, said the governor continues to oppose the measure, saying it will "encourage criminal activity because it does not provide any means for the legal purchase of medical marijuana."

The Republican governor's office also said that "the definition of which medical conditions qualify one for use of marijuana is so broad that it would allow nearly any Rhode Islander to be a user."

Carcieri has said the bill "is full of loopholes" including a lack of standards for dosage and quality of the drugs, no legal source of the drug or marijuana seeds and allows patients and their caregivers to possess "staggering" amounts of marijuana.

The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy also weighed in yesterday, saying that using marijuana is still against federal laws and the Food and Drug Administration does not consider the drug a safe and effective medicine for pain relief.

"It's largely symbolic. I don't think that it will have practical effect," Tom Riley, a spokesman in the office, said of Rhode Island's law.

Riley also said that the vast majority of people who serve time for marijuana possession are trafficking the drug.

Additionally, in June the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that state laws permitting the medicinal use of marijuana do not supersede federal laws.

Ten states already have similar laws: Alaska, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Maine, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Vermont and Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0007878

There are other states that have medical marijuana laws, but the Marijuana Policy Project, which has been pushing for the law here, says these 10 states are the only ones where the law makes a practical difference. The Marijuana Policy Project works to "minimize" laws that are intended to prohibit marijuana use.

Rhode Island, Hawaii and Vermont are the only three states where medical marijuana came through legislative action. The other states approved it through ballot initiatives.

The group's executive director, Rob Kampia, hailed yesterday's vote -- the first after the Supreme Court ruling -- as a major victory.

"We will continue to roll back the government's war on the sick and dying and the White House drug czar can't stop us any more than he can make water flow uphill," Kampia said in a statement.

THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH now has 90 days to create rules and regulations regarding the use of marijuana for medical purposes.

Once those rules are in place, people looking to use marijuana must first get a signed statement by a doctor stating that in their opinion "the potential benefits of the medical use of marijuana would likely outweigh the health risks for the qualifying patient."

The department then has 30 days to approve or deny the application and another 5 days to then issue identification cards to those approved.

Anybody with such a card is immune from state criminal and civil prosecution or any disciplinary action by employers as long as they do not possess more than the allowed quantities.

The law does nothing to protect people from arrest or prosecution under federal drug laws.

The plants must be stored in "an indoor facility." Authorized caregivers cannot have a felony conviction in their past. The Department of Health is required to report back to the legislature by Jan. 1, 2007, on the number of people who availed themselves of the program, and any problems arising from it. Unless lawmakers vote to keep the program going, it will expire on June 30, 2007.

The legislation does not provide a way for people to get the drug, leaving that to illegal channels.

AFTER PASSING THE marijuana legislation, lawmakers shifted to the session ahead.

During an opening speech, Murphy more than once urged his colleagues "to put aside petty politics and whatever personal agenda[s] we might have in this election year and get down to doing the work that we have been sent here to do."

"Let's do what's right, not what's politically expedient," Murphy said. "And, please, this is an election year. Let's work for six months together as a House of Representatives and worry about politics in June."

Watson quipped in response: "I would hope that we don't rid the room of all petty politics, because we do need to have some fun."

More seriously, Watson said: "A majority is judged best by how they treat the minority."

Over in the Senate, lawmakers took the highly unusual step of recommitting two bills that passed by both chambers last year but were never transmitted to the governor's desk.

Senate spokesman Greg Pare said the bills were never given to Carcieri because the Senate leadership tried, but failed, to work out a compromise and avoid vetoes on the bills.

So yesterday, the Senate essentially killed off the bills by sending them back to committee.

The first was a lobbying bill that would have exempted from disclosures certain sales and purchases -- namely, transactions carried out "in the ordinary course of business and for fair market value" -- made by people and companies seeking to influence the General Assembly.

The other would have allowed Beacon Mutual Insurance, the state's dominant worker's compensation insurer, to expand beyond Rhode Island's borders and go from a public nonprofit to a private for-profit company.

Supporters Of Medical Marijuana Bill Concede Problems (PROJO)

By Felice J. Freyer

The Providence Journal, January 4, 2006

The medical marijuana law that passed yesterday allows doctors to recommend that patients obtain from illegal sources a drug of unknown potency and unknown purity.

This is not how doctors normally prescribe treatment.

But if the longstanding support of the Rhode Island Medical Society is any indication, many are willing to go this route -- because of the potential benefits to patients who can't get relief from pain, nausea, muscle spasms and other problems.

Even supporters of the concept, however, admit that it's "weird."

Under the new law, a doctor, a nurse practitioner or anyone else permitted to write prescriptions can sign a statement attesting that "the potential benefits of the medical use of marijuana would likely outweigh the health risks" for a patient with a "debilitating medical condition."

With this certification, the patient can apply for a card from the Health Department that prohibits prosecution by state authorities for growing or possessing marijuana. (Under a U.S. Supreme Court decision earlier this year, however, the federal government can prosecute.)

The law doesn't say where the marijuana will come from, but it's understood that patients or their caregivers will get it illegally from drug dealers, or grow it from seeds obtained illegally.

"It's a weird concept, isn't it?" said Dr. Margaret A. Sun, president of the Rhode Island Academy of Family Physicians, who testified in favor of the law before the General Assembly. "I'll give them a letter that it's OK for them to use medically, and then they're going to some alleyway and buy it on the street."

Before the law is put to use, the Health Department must write regulations. Sun hopes the regulations will provide some safeguards. Sun also is concerned about not knowing the strength or purity of the marijuana that patients may obtain. But she calls the law "a step in the right direction" for those who don't have an alternative.

Dr. Robert S. Crausman, chief administrative officer of the state Board of Medical Licensure and Discipline, disagrees. "It raises a world of issues for us," he said. "Our statute says it's unprofessional conduct to violate federal law. To create another law that allows doctors to violate federal law . . . puts our board in a very awkward circumstance.

"What other medications do doctors prescribe in this fashion?" said Crausman, who practices medicine part-time, specializing in lung diseases.

If a patient of his requested a medical certification to obtain marijuana, Crausman says he would probably decline because he wouldn't know where they were getting the marijuana plants. "I don't tell my patients on digoxin to take foxglove tea. . . . Aspirin comes from bark. When was the last time you took bark for a headache?"

In a 1999 review of medical marijuana, the Institute of Medicine of the National Academy of Sciences concluded that the active ingredients in marijuana had "potential therapeutic value" for pain relief, control of nausea and vomiting, and appetite stimulation. But it called smoking marijuana a crude way to deliver the medication, and one that also delivers harmful substances. Other than the hazards of smoking, the institute concluded, the side effects of marijuana are no worse than those of other medicines.

The new Rhode Island law allows marijuana use for cancer, glaucoma, HIV infection, AIDS, hepatitis C, or any condition causing wasting, chronic pain, severe nausea, seizures or muscle spasms.

Crausman acknowledged that marijuana contains "wonderful active ingredients," but he wishes they were available through pharmacies in a purified, regulated form. Meanwhile, he said, effective drugs are available for every condition and symptom that marijuana is said to treat -- including a pill containing the chief active ingredient in the plant.

But that pill often doesn't work because the drug isn't well-absorbed through the stomach. And many doctors and patients say that the existing medications don't work for everyone.

Sun, the family physician, said that her sister, who suffers from multiple sclerosis, smokes marijuana to relieve the muscle rigidity that sometimes makes her fall. "She'll take a puff or two of pot, wait 15 minutes, and get her muscles able to move more easily," Sun said.

"She's on a lot of medications, including muscle relaxers," Sun said. "They're very sedating. They work well, and eventually you become tolerant so you don't fall asleep. Then they don't work as well. . . . She finds that this is something that works well, works quickly and doesn't sedate her."

Among the patients in her East Providence practice, Sun said she doesn't have anyone she believes would benefit from smoking marijuana. "I'm sure there'll be people asking me for it," she added with a laugh. But doctors already face drug-seeking patients who want prescriptions for legal narcotics, she said.

Dr. Thomas A. Bledsoe, an internist who is interim director of Brown Medical School's Center for Biomedical Ethics, called the new law "an unsatisfactory solution." But he said he might make use of it for certain patients, after explaining the risks and unknowns. "Patients who are competent have decision-making capacity," Bledsoe said. "I see my job as giving them advice and giving them information."

In terminal cancer patients, Bledsoe said, "The symptoms that [marijuana] can help with can be very nasty, very interfering with normal life. We're talking about the rest of their life, and it's short. Quality of life is very important."

Diane Lipscombe, a professor of neuroscience at Brown Medical School who studies the biology behind chronic pain, said that the classic drugs for pain relief simply don't work for millions of people.

Marijuana contains substances called cannabinoids that are also produced naturally in the body, just as the body produces natural opiates, she explained. The two substances work together in the brain to numb pain. Cannabinoids may enhance the effect of opiates, and they are of particular interest because they also affect peripheral nerves, not just the brain, she said.

"There are millions of people who have no effective treatment for pain," said Lipscombe. "All I can say is, anything that can help people who are in constant pain is a good thing."

Legislators Override Carcieri's Medical Marijuana Veto (PRBN)

Providence Business News, January 4, 2006

The state House of Representatives on Tuesday voted 59 to 13 to override a veto by Gov. Donald L. Carcieri of legislation passed last year to legalize medical marijuana, making Rhode Island the 11th state to allow people with certain illnesses to use the substance.

Federal law forbids marijuana use, but Alaska, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Maine, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Vermont and Washington allow it to be grown and used for medicinal purposes. In June, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that patients who used the drug in those states could still be prosecuted under federal law.

The new Rhode Island law allows people with severe illnesses such as cancer, AIDS, multiple sclerosis and hepatitis C, on a doctor's recommendation, to get registered with the state and get permission to grow up to 12 marijuana plants or buy up to 2.5 ounces of the drug.

The law is effective immediately, but the state Department of Health, which will register users and give them identification cards, still has 90 days to develop procedures to do so.

The medical marijuana bill was one of the highest-profile measures in last year's legislative session, but Carcieri vetoed the measure. The state Senate voted the override his veto the following day, but the House recessed without taking action, leaving the bill's fate up in the air. Legislators voted on Tuesday before convening the 2006 House session – the last possible time they could do it.

After the vote, Carcieri issued a statement saying the law "will encourage criminal activity," because it does not provide any means for the legal purchase of medical marijuana, forcing them to buy the drug in the illegal street market.

The governor also objected to the lack of "safeguards to protect the community," such as restrictions on where marijuana can be cultivated and stored, and he called the definition of eligible medical conditions as "so broad that it would allow nearly any Rhode Islander to be a user." Finally, Carcieri noted, "this bill appears to violate federal law."

The governor noted that along with himself, the state police, the state Department of Health, and the chief judge of the Rhode Island Family Court had opposed the law.

The full text of the law is posted here.

Flying Under The Radar (ABAJRNL)

By Stephanie Francis Ward

American Bar Association Journal, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0007881

Coming off of a slow holiday diet of year-in-review articles calling attention to the biggest news of 2005, we call on you to take a look forward.

Place your hand on our crystal ball to see how our sources predict what legal news might be making headlines in the months to come.

To make our list, we first determined the most underrated, underreported and unappreciated issues affecting lawyers. And then we thought about how these topics are likely to play out in the future.

While the chosen list is far from comprehensive, it identifies developments that may indeed prove worthy of extra attention.

METH: PUBLIC DRUG ENEMY NO. 1

If you live in a small town and run into problems with the law, methamphetamine may be the first cause that authorities suspect. Some rural justice system officials estimate that the drug is a factor in up to 80 percent of their caseloads.

"It fuels domestic violence, child abuse, thefts, burglaries and crimes of violence because the people who use it get so paranoid," says John Sarcone, the county attorney in Polk County, Iowa. "Most of these people have children, and there are a number of kids who get removed" from home.

Problems caused by meth have surpassed those caused by other popular drugs, such as crack cocaine, says Linda McKinney, the public defender for south central Missouri's 44th district. "I think meth in all of its forms has been much more destructive physically because it's a harder drug to kick," she says. In her experiences, first as a prosecutor and then as a public defender, she knows of only 10 instances where the defendants were able to break their addiction.

Prosecutors elsewhere make similar observations. And some say that while adult use is most common among the working class, juvenile use involves children from across the economic spectrum. Boys often try the drug due to peer pressure, while girls see it as a way to lose weight. Presiding Judge John G. Moody of Missouri's 44th Judicial Circuit reports seeing more juvenile defendants, some as young as 10, testing positive for the drug.

Studies back up personal experiences. In a survey of 500 law enforcement agencies, 58 percent of the respondents cited methamphetamine use as their county's biggest drug problem. In addition, 87 percent reported an increase in meth-related arrests in the past three years. The survey, published in 2005, was conducted by the National Association of Counties.

According to a 2004 study by the Office of National Drug Control Policy, 11.7 million Americans reported that they had used methamphetamine at least once. In another study by the agency, which focused on juveniles, 6.2 percent of high school seniors surveyed reported that they had tried the drug.

It's little wonder that meth has the attention of the nation's top law enforcement official. Last summer, in a speech to the National District Attorneys Association, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the illegal manufacture and use of the stimulant is the country's biggest drug problem.

While the drug is moving into urban areas, it's more prevalent in smaller, more rural communities, largely because it's cheap and easy to manufacture. A meth lab inventory might include pseudoephedrine, which is found in over-the-counter decongestants, and chemicals such as hydrogen peroxide, lye and red phosphorus.

Some of the ingredients are combined and cooked, creating the danger of explosion. The cooking process generates liquid and solid wastes that can contaminate buildings, soil and groundwater. "Here in Iowa, we call them Beavis and Butt-Head labs," Sarcone says.

Increased caseloads are straining resources for courts, prosecutors and public defenders. McKinney says the caseload in her district has gone from 50,000 a year to 100,000 a year. Of those cases, she says, about 80 percent involve methamphetamine use.

McKinney's office represents about 90 percent of the county's criminal defendants. She fears that some defendants eventually will have to be turned away because of the increasing caseload.

In March, Iowa passed a law that restricts the sale of nonprescription medications containing pseudoephedrine. One of the mandates is that retailers must keep such medications behind the counter or in a locked case. Sarcone says he's already seeing fewer shoplifting arrests, and he thinks the law also will lead to a reduction in manufacturing cases. It's one of several states to pass such a law.

DOJ_NMG_0007882

"Pseudoephedrine laws, where the stuff is put behind the counter, are very effective," Sarcone says. He adds that a federal law, requiring all states to monitor sales of the drug, would be the most effective. "Without the ingredients you can't make it," he says. "It's like having the yeast to make the bread rise."

Drug courts also seem to help, mainly by reducing the number of repeat offenders. These courts focus on intensive programs to help defendants quit meth rather than do jail time.

In Twin Falls, Idaho, the county has operated such a program for three years. Prosecutor Grant P. Loebs says that about 50 percent to 60 percent of those who complete the program are staying clean. Still, he sees usage of the drug in about 90 percent of the county's presentencing reports.

Defendants who participate in drug courts have to take periodic drug tests and appear frequently before the judge. In Moody's court, participants are assigned a parole officer and a case manager, as well as a tracker, who handles drug testing.

"We try to get to know them, and they get to know that we are trying to help them," Moody says. "I try to praise them when they do well and act disappointed when they don't. It makes a difference."

THE FACT

Meth prices vary throughout the United States. At the distribution level, prices range from $3,500 per pound in parts of California and Texas to $21,000 per pound in the Southeast and Northeast regions of the country. Retail prices range from $400 to $3,000 per ounce.

Source:"Drug Trafficking in the United States," DEA

—Stephanie Francis Ward

Afro-Colombians Driven Off Land In Cocaine War (LAT)

By Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

PEREIRA, Colombia — Armando Garces was reluctant to leave his mountain village even after right-wing militia members had gone door to door telling residents they had 48 hours to evacuate, or else. He didn't like being ordered to abandon the only home he had ever known.

Then a daylong gun battle erupted between the paramilitary fighters and leftist guerrillas over control of nearby coca crops and transit routes. Garces' town, nestled in Colombia's Pacific coast rain forest, was caught in the crossfire between the rebels above the town and militia members below it.

"We hid under our beds all day, and the next morning we were gone," said Garces, recalling the terrifying day in June when his township, Bajo Calima, became a battleground in the nation's long-running drug wars. "Everyone agreed it was time to look for some other future."

So the 25-year-old woodcutter, his wife, two children and about 500 other residents joined the swelling ranks of Colombia's internally displaced. More than 3 million people have been driven from their homes by the civil conflict between armed groups vying for political dominance and the control of crops, especially those linked to the nation's drug trade.

Only Sudan has more internally displaced citizens than Colombia, according to the Norwegian Refugee Council, a human rights group that has tracked the displaced around the globe for the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Although Colombia has had a large displaced population for two decades, its size has increased quickly in recent months, experts say, and a disproportionate number of them are, like Garces, Afro-Colombians. They are targeted because they lack political clout and sophistication at a time when their rural homes have become economically attractive.

Ricardo Esquivia, general coordinator of Arvidas, an advocacy group for the displaced in Sucre state, said most AfroColombians who own such land either lack full knowledge of their rights or the political power to enforce them. One factor working against Afro-Colombians is the 80% illiteracy rate in the areas where many live, said Esquivia, himself an Afro-Colombian.

"They are historically vulnerable and relegated [to a lower status] because they have never fully exercised their economic, social and cultural rights," said Jorge Rojas, a leading advocate for human rights and the displaced in Bogota, the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0007883

Those rights include a constitutional provision that guarantees land title to rural Afro-Colombian communities that have organized loosely as a group and occupied their property for 10 years or more, said Luis Murillo, a former governor of Colombia's Choco state. Murillo, also an Afro-Colombian, estimates that 1 million Afro-Colombians, or one-third of those living in rural areas, have been forced off of their land.

The growth of the displaced has much to do with the changing logistics of Colombia's multibillion-dollar cocaine trade. The success of U.S.-sponsored spraying programs meant to eradicate coca leaf production in Colombia's Amazon basin has caused a shift in coca farming to more remote areas, including the coastal zone surrounding Bajo Calima, where Afro-Colombians are concentrated.

The port city of Buenaventura near Garces' hometown and the estuaries that drain into it have become the most important cocaine processing and transshipment centers in Colombia, U.S. law enforcement officials have said.

Garces and other residents were lucky to escape with their lives. In past years, both paramilitary and guerrilla groups in towns such as Bajo Calima have massacred thousands of people whom they suspected of helping the other side or just for being in the way.

Since July, Garces has lived in a shantytown called Plumon on the outskirts of Pereira, built into the side of a river canyon. It has no running water or electricity.

Internal refugees such as Garces put enormous pressure on towns where they have moved. "It's impossible to solve the housing problem. We are incapable," said Pereira City Manager German Dario Saldarriaga, whose town in the interior — about 120 miles northeast of Buenaventura and 105 miles west of Bogota — is struggling with 15,000 displaced residents, about half of them Afro-Colombian.

Pereira has built three new hospitals and is erecting nearly 1,000 housing units to accommodate the influx of displaced people, but needs 4,000 more houses to deal with the overflow. Meanwhile, crime has skyrocketed, Saldarriaga said.

"Sometimes we feel overwhelmed, but it's much worse in other cities like Medellin and Cali," he said.

Human rights groups inside and outside Colombia see a longer-term risk in the government's inability to stand up for the land rights of its citizens. Many say the voices of the displaced aren't being heard in Colombia's nascent peace process.

Although kidnappings and killings have declined, the process that President Alvaro Uribe began in July 2003 to try to demobilize Colombia's armed factions doesn't do enough to ensure that the displaced may someday return to the millions of acres of land they have abandoned, said Lisa Haugaard of the Latin America Working Group, a coalition of religious and humanitarian agencies in Washington.

Haugaard and others fear that a law passed last summer outlining the terms of "reinsertion" of fighters into society will mean that most of the abandoned land, which totals 10 million acres, will simply remain in the hands of demobilized paramilitary fighters.

If that turns out to be the case, shantytowns such as Plumon, where Garces lives, and Bosques de Otun could become breeding grounds for a future generation of Colombian insurgents, she said.

"There is definitely a silence in the peace process on this question of land rights. Yet it will be dealt with in conflict and in a myriad of conflicting ways on the ground," Haugaard said.

Officials at the U.S. Embassy in Bogota fear that the problem of Colombia's displaced is a humanitarian time bomb and said the U.S. Agency for International Development's $30-million annual aid package is being redesigned to focus more on the needs of Afro-Colombians. That redesign is partially the result of pressure from the Congressional Black Caucus in the U.S.

"It's a huge crisis for a country already dealing with a lot of other crises at the same time," said a U.S. Embassy official who asked not to be identified.

Control of the drug trade isn't the only motive causing armed groups to push rural Afro-Colombians off their land. In Sucre state, where Esquivia works, about 60,000 have fled the countryside for the state capital, Sincelejo, to escape the bloody fight for control of avocado and palm plantations or simply for territorial dominance.

Adelina Zuniga left her 15-acre farm in Macayepa for Sincelejo two years ago after massacres of suspected guerrilla sympathizers in her town sent a chilling message. Having fled the countryside, her family initially slept 15 to a room in a Sincelejo shanty. She has now emerged as a leader of the displaced and pastor of a local evangelical church.

DOJ_NMG_0007884

"People arrive with no place to stay, no work and bothered by the local police. Almost all the old folks who came with us have died of despondency. They go from being important to feeling useless. They see no solution," Zuniga said.

The influx has led to social problems, including teen prostitution and the growth of street gangs, said Esquivia of the Arvidas advocacy group.

Until security improves back home, Garces plans to stay put in Pereira's Plumon slum, where he has found work paying $2 a day picking coffee and loading sacks of cement onto trucks. Besides, people who have gone back to Bajo Calima have found nothing but a burned-out ghost town.

"I'm not going back to the war," he said.

Seeing Crime Guns Destroyed Gives Solace To Victims' Families (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

SOUTH PORTLAND, Me. - Kelly DeCambra made her way through a seven-inches-an-hour snowstorm to a dingy Maine State Police garage where, among the brake parts, transmissions and a flat-bed tow truck, she hoped to find a fragment of solace.

It would come in the form of a Ruger .44 Magnum Super Blackhawk revolver, caked with blood and the memory of Ms. DeCambra's son, 21-year-old Lionel St. Hilaire, who was shot to death with it last year.

The mother had come to watch the gun that was used to kill her son be sawed into pieces in an acrid plume of white-hot sparks.

Ms. DeCambra's act of witness was made possible by a law Maine enacted in 2001 that requires handguns used in homicides to be destroyed when they are no longer needed for evidence. Before that, guns were often sold or auctioned by police departments to raise money for other equipment.

Gun control advocates, gun rights supporters, and law enforcement officials say they believe that Maine is the only state where the police allow victims' relatives to watch a gun's destruction, and the acts of witness are arranged informally by the police, not spelled out in the law.

Supporters of the law, including the Maine Chiefs of Police Association, acknowledge that in a state like Maine, which in the last decade averaged about 20 homicides a year, destroying such weapons takes only a few guns out of circulation. But the requirement that crime guns be destroyed reflects a trend among police departments nationwide.

A few states, including New York and Wisconsin, require at least some guns to be destroyed, and others, like Washington, have rescinded bans on destroying guns used in crimes.

Several municipalities have passed ordinances to prevent crime guns from being sold, and the International Association of Chiefs of Police passed a resolution six years ago encouraging police departments to destroy guns used in crimes .

"It's just a culmination of factors," said Gene Voegtlin, the association's legislative counsel, based in Alexandria, Va. "Did police agencies really want to be in a situation where they were offering guns back to the public? A lot of the weapons that are confiscated aren't necessarily the highest quality, so there are some safety issues involved, liability issues involved." The association's resolution urges police departments not to sell their old police guns or trade them in to a manufacturer for new ones, a practice that began to be common in the 1990's.

Efforts to prevent the resale of guns have been spurred partly by highly publicized crimes like those committed by Buford O. Furrow Jr., a white supremacist who in 1999 used a gun that had once belonged to the police department in Cosmopolis, Wash., to wound five people at a Jewish community center in Los Angeles and kill a Filipino-American postal worker.

Although some police departments destroy guns, often by melting them down, others, usually smaller departments, still sell them.

"You got to use every penny you can get," said Roberto Fulgueira, the police chief in Sweetwater, Fla., who last year traded in his officers' old Glocks and some crime guns, saying he needed about $15,000 for new Glocks for his 65 officers.

With the money, he said, "I bought all my men guns, I bought bulletproof vests, and I still have a credit."

DOJ_NMG_0007885

Maine's law came about because of Debbie O'Brien, a Kennebunk woman whose 20-year-old son, Devin, was shot to death in 1996. When she learned that the state police would probably sell the gun used to kill her son, Ms. O'Brien said her reaction was, "Oh, my God, the police are here to help you and the next thing you know they're turning around and selling a gun, making money off my dead son."

Ms. O'Brien lobbied for the proposed law, saying that she told the state police, "Look, if you need money, let's do bake sales."

"You're in hell," she said. "You're just struggling to have a life, and then I realized that would include the gun."

William Harwood, a gun control advocate in Maine, and Robert M. Schwartz, executive director of the Maine Chiefs of Police Association, said the original proposal was for all crime guns to be destroyed. But because of the state's strong hunting lobby, they said, the final law included only handguns used in homicides.

"To be candid," Mr. Harwood said, "the legislation had as much symbolic importance as it does deterrence."

But the symbolism is powerful, said Ms. O'Brien, who watched the .22-caliber handgun used to kill her son be cut up six years after his death.

"It was just a very important day for my husband and I," she said. "This was a weapon that changed our lives."

For Ms. DeCambra, watching the destruction of the gun used to kill her son - even though it was done without ceremony in a stark garage - seemed the closest thing she could find to justice, and a way to ease her feelings of helplessness and guilt that she had not been there to help her son when he was gunned down by a woman's former boyfriend.

Ms. DeCambra said she never saw her son's body because it was already being autopsied by the time the police notified her.

She said she had been unable to see punishment imposed on her son's killer, Zachary Fenderson, who had found his ex-girlfriend with Mr. St. Hilaire one night, because Mr. Fenderson immediately shot and killed himself.

Ms. DeCambra said she was even thwarted when she tried to put up a cross in a wooded area across from the house where her son was killed. She said someone removed each cross she tried to erect - a wooden one, a steel one, even one anchored in cement. "I haven't had any control over anything," said Ms. DeCambra, 38, a bartender at Mulligan's in Biddeford, Me. "When I brought children into this world, it's my job to protect them, and I couldn't do that. I feel like I failed him."

Ms. DeCambra, who had her first child when she was 14 and who gave birth to Mr. St. Hilaire when she was 16, has had a rocky life, plagued with early drug use and health problems that required a pacemaker and several operations. Her son, she said, was molested as a child, acted out in school and was sent to residential treatment centers. At 12, she said, he was molested by a center staff member, who was convicted. At 18, he was jailed for two years for having sex with a 13-year-old girl.

"I'm the first one to say my son wasn't perfect," she said. "But he's not a monster. He was my son, and I loved him very much."

Seeking to grasp the enormity of her son's death, Ms. DeCambra asked for the crime scene photos of his body, which she keeps along with an evidence bag containing his crumpled clothes.

Seeing the gun destroyed seemed a tangible way to address her grief, and she brought along her 24-year-old daughter, her 18-year-old son and his pregnant fiancée, her 2-year-old granddaughter and two friends. Without fanfare, a state police detective, Jeff Linscott, brought out the long-barreled Ruger revolver. He said many victims' relatives do not attend gun destructions, recoiling at the thought of seeing the weapon.

Ms. DeCambra hid her face and wept, her hands shaking, as a mechanic used a red chop saw to slice the gun four times, the pieces to be tossed on a scrap pile of used brake rotors and other metal parts.

"I have the same nightmare over and over," Ms. DeCambra said. "I'm watching him get shot, and I can't stop it. I need to do this."

Editorial: Mark Outcome, Not Start Of Weed And Seed Effort (MODBEE)

Modesto Bee, January 3, 2006

For many people, the new year started with music, dancing and hearty partying. There was no such hoopla for the Jan.1 launch of the Weed and Seed program in west Modesto.

DOJ_NMG_0007886

That's appropriate. Weed and Seed is not a flash-in-the-pan kind of thing. It's a methodical, yearslong commitment to getting rid of gangs, drugs and other criminal elements, and then cultivating pride and revitalization in a neighborhood that has suffered from ugly stepsister treatment.

The program has been in the planning and wish stages since 2002. The city's first application for the U.S. Justice Department's Weed and Seed designation — and up to $1 million that comes with it — was rejected. Last summer, with the second application, the outcome was positive.

The Justice Department is promising tougher federal prosecution of people arrested for certain crimes. It also is insisting on proof of success. The California State University, Stanislaus, Center for Public Policy Studies is to assist with that measurement.

In fact, many organizations are tapped for Weed and Seed assistance. Some of the strategies are fairly obvious, such as stricter code enforcement to assure that trashy lots are cleaned up. But there are other, less predictable elements. For instance, volunteers are to provide income tax assistance to help residents recover some of the $2.5 million in earned income tax credits that have gone unclaimed in that ZIP code, 95351. The reclaimed money goes directly to the residents.

The neighborhood also is benefiting from significant private and public investments that tie nicely into the project. They include:

The city's $2 million makeover of the Maddux Youth Center in César Chávez Park. It was started last spring and is due for completion this year.

Plans for a $5 million Neighborhood Center at Marshall Park, off Sutter Avenue and just south of Paradise Road. The city is seeking bids for the project, which is to include a fire station and a police substation.

Installation of long-awaited sewer lines in the Robertson Road tract, a $2 million county project

Being part of the new Stanislaus County Enterprise Zone. Companies that locate or expand in the zone are eligible for tax breaks and other incentives.

Rising property values. Bob Schmal, a neighborhood resident active in the project, said there are almost no abandoned homes in the area anymore because there's such a demand for housing. Further, 60percent to 70 percent of the houses are owner-occupied, up from about 40percent a few years ago, Schmal said. As a result, there's a new attitude about the importance of upkeep.

For all the formal programs, the success of Weed and Seed will depend on people — especially the residents. The Stanislaus County Sheriff's Department is assigning deputy Noel Vento to the area; he's been effective in working with residents in Empire and south Modesto.

Sheriff's Lt. Jim Gordon is well aware that west Modesto residents have heard promises before. "We've told the neighborhood that we intend to make things better. We have to come through."

This effort is to affect more than the 15,000 residents of the designated area. Lessons learned here can be applied to other struggling neighborhoods.

The official launch of the Weed and Seed project isn't what's important. More significant is what has been accomplished by this time next year and the year after.

The mission of Weed and Seed is explainedon the Department of Justice Web site, www.ojp.usdoj.gov/ccdo/ws/welcome.html.

IMMIGRATION:

The Border's Vital Center (HILL)

The Hill, January 4, 2006

Republicans face one of the trickiest political problems they have faced as a party since Clinton pre-empted their program through triangulation and left them temporarily devoid of issues.

DOJ_NMG_0007887

As the number of illegal immigrants mounts in the United States, the demands of the party's nativist constituency for tighter border controls and immigration enforcement threatens to put it at odds with America's rapidly growing Hispanic population, dooming the GOP to possible minority status not just in California and New York but in Texas and Florida as well.

The push-pull between Hispanic demands for respect and nativist concerns about job loss, crime, education costs and urban crowding, all exacerbated by illegal immigration, poses a huge problem for party leaders.

The obvious answer to demands for limits on immigration is the border fence passed by the House and pending in the Senate. Slated to extend over 700 miles of the U.S.-Mexico border at a cost upwards of $2 billion, the barrier, coupled with increased enforcement manpower and effective employer sanctions, will likely give the United States a means to control population inflows. But what of the economic, moral, foreign-policy and political issues a fence will raise?

Economically, Mexican illegal immigrants are not in search of welfare but come looking for work. That they find it is obvious. Otherwise how could they send $11 billion a year home to their families and why would they come in increasing numbers?

Clearly the American economy needs their services. On a micro-economic level, they do jobs Americans don't want at wages below what we would consider acceptable — and perhaps below those that are legal as well. On a macro level, their presence holds down labor costs and permits the Federal Reserve to take more chances with low interest rates than it could in an inflationary-wage market.

The obvious answer to these concerns is a grand bargain that couples the strictest border defense with a generous guest-worker program, granting legal status to Mexican immigrants and regulating their numbers, working conditions, and wages — and assuring that they contribute to Social Security and other taxes.

The foreign-policy implications of a fence are harder to handle. Already Latin resentment against the United States is fueling the rise of an oil- and cocaine-based leftist oligarchy throughout our hemisphere. Castro now has friends in power in Venezuela and Bolivia and moderate allies in Brazil, Uruguay and Argentina. In Peru, a leftist Chavez look-alike, Ollanta Humala, is leading in the presidential race. In Nicaragua, Daniel Ortega may be heading back to power by a gradual military coup. And in Mexico itself, a Chavez protégé, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, is leading in the polls for the July 2006 presidential race. Can you imagine having a border with a Chavez or a Castro, whose ability to disregard American concerns would be underscored by massive oil reserves?

But it is in the realm of domestic politics that the GOP would pay the highest price for a purely nativist policy. Texas has now become a majority-minority state, joining California. Can its wholesale flip to the Democratic Party be far behind? Not if the Republicans are seen as an anti-Hispanic party! Is the GOP really willing to make political war against the Latinos by rubbing their noses in a border fence when they now account for 14 percent of the population and will probably increase their share to 18 percent over the next 10 years?

The permanent political price the Republican Party would pay for this shortsightedness is reminiscent of the way it antagonized the African-American vote in the '60s. Remember that Dwight Eisenhower carried blacks in 1952 and 1956. John F. Kennedy only narrowly prevailed in the black community. It was not until Barry Goldwater and Richard Nixon, pursuing the Southern strategy at all costs, drove blacks into the arms of the Democrats that their votes were irretrievably lost. Is the GOP, driven by the anger of its base, going to make Hispanics permanent Democrats?

By moving away from English-only policies and reaching out to Hispanics, Bush has closed the gap among Latino voters. Gore carried them by 30 points, but Kerry only won among them by 10. But the border backlash may be undoing all this good work.

The obvious answer is to couple a fence with a good guest-worker program, with a citizenship track predicated on good behavior. But if the Republican Party allows the House bill to become law — a fence with no guest-worker program — it will be antagonize the vital Latino vote and consign itself to permanent minority status.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race.

DOJ_NMG_0007888

TAX:

Federal Taxes Fall As Income Rises (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

Even as Americans' income rises, they are paying a smaller share of it in federal taxes, according to the latest statistical analysis by the Internal Revenue Service.

At the same time, the growing number of people who are subject to the alternative minimum tax are paying an increasing share of the total amount of federal income taxes, according to the Treasury Department's Statistics of Income Bulletin, which was released late last month. The report analyzed individual 2003 income-tax returns and is the latest data available on individual tax returns.

Falling tax rates under the Economic Growth and Tax Relief Reconciliation Act of 2001 resulted in a 6.1% decrease in total individual income tax in 2003, to $748 billion, from 2002. But the portion of total taxes paid under the AMT rose 38.2%, to $9.47 billion.

The AMT is a controversial parallel tax that, in 2003, kicked in at $40,250 of taxable income for single and head of household filers, and $58,000 for married couples -- for taxpayers with large families or deductions for such expenses as state taxes. Once subject to the AMT, many filers lose important deductions such as state and local taxes and personal exemptions.

The AMT is estimated to have snared four million taxpayers in 2005. If Congress doesn't move to restrain the tax -- a bill that would do that is now pending in Congress -- this number would jump to 21.6 million taxpayers this year, and married couples with gross taxable income above $45,000 would be subject to it. For 2005, married couples began to pay the AMT at $58,000. The government collects an average of $2,770 more in taxes per household from those who have to pay the AMT, according to the U.S. Treasury Department.

The AMT was originally designed to ensure that high-income earners wouldn't be able to use deductions and exemptions to the extent that they would end up paying no taxes at the end of the year. While it still accounts for a small share of total tax receipts, each year more people are being forced to pay it -- and revenue from the AMT is becoming increasingly important to government coffers.

For years, Congress has elected to limit the scope of the tax to keep the tax from eventually hitting middle-income earners. But each year that step is taken, the costs of forgone tax revenue grow because the federal long-term budget already assumes the income from the tax. For 2006 alone, a limit on the AMT could cost the government as much as $12.22 billion in lost revenue.

Despite the AMT, the average tax rate for all 130.4 million returns in 2003 fell for all income groups. The only exception was for people with returns less than $10,000, which stayed the same as the year before.

The adjusted gross income reported on these returns totaled just over $6.2 trillion, a 2.9% increase from the year earlier. Taxable income, or the amount of money subject to taxes after deductions, increased 2.5% to $4.2 trillion in 2003. This was the third successive year that total income tax declined.

In addition, the IRS says, the number of individuals who itemized their deductions decreased for the first time since 1999. The main reason for this drop is because Congress ended what amounted to a marriage penalty for couples taking the standard deduction. In 2003, married taxpayers filing jointly could take a standard deduction of $9,500, equal to the double the $4,750 allotted for singles. In 2002, the standard deduction for married taxpayers totaled just $7,850. * * *

The IRS said last week that you need to get written documentation if you are donating a car worth more than $500.

Looking to crack down on taxpayers who overestimate the value of donated cars -- for which they can then take a deduction on their tax returns -- the IRS says that anyone who donated a vehicle after Jan. 1, 2005, would need the charity to give a written acknowledgment with the value attached. Generally, taxpayers' deductions are limited to the gross proceeds from the sale of the vehicle by the charity.

DOJ_NMG_0007889

For charities who accepted donated vehicles in 2005, there is no need to have sold the vehicle in 2005 to receive a deduction. They can sell the vehicle in 2006 and still qualify for deduction under IRS rules.

Taxpayers, however, must deduct in the same year they make a donation. * * *

BRIEF: Nearly a million very small business owners will now be able to file employment taxes to the IRS just once a year instead of quarterly. Beginning now, employers who have employment tax liability of $1,000 or less can file using the new Form 944 instead of the old one, Form 941. The IRS says that some 950,000 employers will be able to qualify.

Two Feuding Gallery Owners Admit The Art Of Tax Evasion (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

A feud between Upper East Side gallery owners whose clients include some of New York's wealthiest collectors has resulted in both admitting to tax violations.

The owners are Helen Fioratti and James Sansum, her former protégé. Mr. Sansum, 39, pleaded guilty yesterday to failing to pay income tax on personal purchases, like clothing and his poodle's veterinary bill, that he made using gallery credit cards while working for Ms. Fioratti. Prosecutors said the money should have been declared as compensation. He was sentenced to pay $58,000 in back taxes and to three years' probation.

But the sentence fell far short of the 15 years in prison he faced under his original indictment, which accused him of stealing $568,000 in art, antiques, books and money from Ms. Fioratti.

Prosecutors said that Mr. Sansum was granted leniency after he volunteered information that led to the conviction of Ms. Fioratti on charges of evading sales tax on artwork sold at her gallery. Ms. Fioratti, 74, was sentenced last month to pay more than $550,000 in restitution. Mr. Sansum, according to prosecutors, claimed he learned how to cheat on his taxes from her.

Ms. Fioratti runs L'Antiquaire and the Connoisseur, at 36 East 73rd Street. It specializes in European art and counts Fords, Vanderbilts and the convicted Tyco executive L. Dennis Kozlowski among its clients. Ms. Fioratti hired Mr. Sansum in 1989 after he graduated from Harvard, where he was a classmate and friend of her daughter, Arianna.

In 2002, after resigning from Ms. Fioratti's gallery, Mr. Sansum opened James Sansum Fine and Decorative Art, just two blocks away at 1020 Lexington Avenue. Ms. Fioratti accused him of stealing art, including paintings by her daughter, to stock his new gallery. Mr. Sansum said the art had been given to him. He said he had been authorized to use gallery credit cards to supplement his $18,200 salary.

His supporters have said that Ms. Fioratti was retaliating for his defection, and that she was upset by the realization that he was gay. Ms. Fioratti's lawyer, Michael Miller, said yesterday that the suggestion that she was homophobic was nonsense. He said Ms. Fioratti had let Mr. Sansum live rent-free in her townhouse, giving him "a home when his personal world was falling apart," then was betrayed by him.

Mr. Sansum is suing Ms. Fioratti to force her to buy back his 6 percent share in her gallery. The value of that share is in dispute. Prosecutors said that Mr. Sansum had agreed to return four paintings by Ms. Fioratti's daughter; other disputed artworks will remain in the custody of the court until a judge decides who owns them.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Hearing To Focus On Landmark Pa. Abortion Case (LAW/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, The Associated Press

AP, January 4, 2006

Samuel Alito's decision as a U.S. federal appeals judge to uphold a 1980s Pennsylvania abortion restriction -- later overturned by the Supreme Court -- is likely to draw some of the toughest scrutiny at his upcoming confirmation hearing.

Pennsylvania lawmakers were among the first anywhere to approve restrictions on abortion -- including one that required women seeking the procedure to notify their husbands. Alito voted to uphold that requirement, but the Supreme Court disagreed, striking it down in a landmark 1992 decision.

DOJ_NMG_0007890

Senators are expected to grill Alito about the case, Planned Parenthood v. Casey, at his Supreme Court confirmation hearing, scheduled to begin Jan. 9. They're also expected to ask him about memos he wrote in the 1980s in which he said the case of Roe v. Wade -- the 1973 decision that legalized abortion nationwide -- should be overturned.

While the Court's decision in Casey upheld a constitutional right to abortion, the justices gave states new powers to make it more difficult for women to end their pregnancies. For that reason, activists on both sides regard Casey as the Court's most important abortion case since Roe.

Since Casey, state legislatures have approved hundreds of new regulations that determine when, where and how women may get abortions.

Waiting periods, parental consent laws, informed consent requirements and other restrictions have become commonplace. According to NARAL Pro-Choice America, an abortion-rights group, states have passed more than 460 abortion measures since 1995, although not all of them survived court challenges.

"The Casey decision greatly weakened the standard of review by which restrictions on the right to choose would be viewed by the court," said Blake Cornish, NARAL legal director.

While disappointed that the Court failed to overturn Roe, anti-abortion activists seized on the Court's reasoning that states may pass restrictions so long as they do not present an "undue burden" to a woman seeking to end her pregnancy.

"The Casey decision obviously did not go as far as we would have wanted, but it did allow us to work on legislation that (resulted) in saving lives," said Mary Spaulding Balch, director of state legislation for National Right to Life, an anti-abortion group.

Casey arose from 1980s-era abortion laws that were among the first of their kind in the nation.

They required women to wait at least 24 hours for an abortion, to certify that they had informed their spouses of the intended procedure, and to receive information from a doctor about fetal development and abortion risks and alternatives. Another provision required teenagers to get permission from a parent or judge before ending their pregnancies.

A three-judge panel of the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld most of the restrictions, but voted 2-1 to overturn husband notification, ruling that it presented an illegal barrier to women seeking abortions. The lone dissenter was Alito, who pointed out that the provision did not give husbands veto power over their spouses' decisions.

Although the Supreme Court rejected Alito's analysis, abortion-rights activists say the Casey decision gave them little to cheer about.

"Even though Roe stayed intact technically, Casey was the first challenge to Roe that started the erosion of Roe that is still going on now," said Dayle Steinberg, president and chief executive of Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania, the lead plaintiff in the case.

Jennifer Boulanger, who heads an abortion clinic that was a co-plaintiff in Casey, said women especially chafe at the 24-hour waiting period that the Court's ruling ushered in.

"Most women who are making this decision have thought about it for weeks. By the time they call us, they're ready. They don't want to have to wait any longer," said Boulanger, executive director of the Allentown Women's Center.

Anti-abortion activists say such rules have worked to reduce the number of abortions.

After Pennsylvania's first abortion restrictions took effect in the early 1980s, the number of abortions in the state declined sharply -- while rising nationwide. In the 1990s, the nation's abortion rate dropped as states began following Pennsylvania's lead.

"We were light years ahead of everybody else," said former state Rep. Stephen Freind, the architect of virtually all of Pennsylvania's abortion restrictions.

A 2004 study commissioned by the conservative Heritage Foundation found that abortion restrictions -- including parental involvement, informed consent, a ban on the type of late-term abortion known as partial-birth abortion, and a ban on Medicaid funding of abortion -- all helped reduce the number of abortions.

Abortion-rights activists cite other factors for the nationwide drop in abortions, including a decline in the number of unwanted pregnancies.

Alito Seen As Smart, Serious, Cautious (AP)

By NANCY BENAC, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

DOJ_NMG_0007891

AP, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Samuel Alito's ninth-grade Latin teacher still swoons at how beautifully he conjugated verbs. A fellow judge admires him as someone who won't use five words when two will do.

From the classroom to the courtroom to his neighborhood, President Bush's latest nominee for the Supreme Court leaves a distinct impression on people. Talk to those who know him best and a portrait emerges of a smart, serious, cautious young man who grew up to be a smart, serious, cautious judge.

His confirmation hearings begin next Monday.

Alito is hardly a social dynamo. But he is well-liked as a regular guy who doesn't lord it over others just because he's way smarter than truly regular guys.

Interest groups on the left portray him as an extremist eager to impose his conservative views on the nation. But among those who have worked closely with Alito over the years, even liberal Democrats tend to characterize him as fair-minded, measured and pleasant.

Joshua Schwartz, a George Washington University law professor who worked alongside him in the Reagan Justice Department but describes himself as a liberal Democrat, credits Alito with having "small-c conservative values."

"He's an incrementalist. He's cautious. He believes very deeply in hearing all sides of an argument before making a decision."

Alito got one of his first big career breaks in part because his father, too, had a reputation for evenhandedness.

In 1976, the young Alito's resume jumped out at federal appellate Judge Leonard Garth from among hundreds pouring in from would-be law clerks.

The judge had been so impressed by a presentation given years earlier by Alito's father, an Italian immigrant who became a New Jersey legislative aide, that he remembered the name and called the son in for an interview. Alito "served me precisely as I like law clerks to serve me, both as a sounding board and an incisive, analytical individual," says Garth, a moderate conservative appointed by Richard Nixon. "Sam is very reserved," Garth said, noting his thrifty way with words.

Now, Alito has been Garth's colleague on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for 15 years in New Jersey.

"I think he is the brightest person on our court," says Garth, including himself.

Alito has long managed to be the smartypants who doesn't act like a smartypants.

"I remember right where he sat: first row, second seat," says 91-year-old Grace Bolge, who taught him Latin at Reynolds Junior High in Hamilton Township outside Trenton. Alito easily nailed the nuances of verbs and the subtleties of proper translation, but never held himself out as better than the others, she recalls.

"There's a humbleness about him that I never saw in anybody else," says Bolge.

Decades later, Alito's law clerks voice similar sentiments.

Former clerk Katherine Huang remembers Alito dutifully taking phone messages for the whole office when everyone else took Good Friday off.

When one of Alito's fellow judges on the 3rd Circuit erected statues outside the entrance to her office, Alito's staff installed pink plastic flamingos at his doorway.

"He really enjoyed that," said Huang.

Alito, 55, credits his two college-age children with helping him keep his ego in check - "on a pretty much daily basis."

A neighbor, lawyer Hilary Brunell, says Alito displayed a restrained approach when they teamed up to coach high school students on a mock trial team that included Alito's son. Alito advocated much the same approach as they exchanged ideas about parenting, Brunell said.

"His attitude was that you can offer guidance and then it's up to the child to take it or not," she said.

Make no mistake, though, Alito can show flashes of pique.

His 91-year-old mother, Rose, says Alito was upset that he didn't get nominated for the Supreme Court earlier, when President Bush tapped Harriet Miers, who later withdrew her nomination. In 1988, when the National Law Journal ran a 211-word story suggesting that Alito had not had a good year as New Jersey's U.S. attorney, he penned a biting 522-word response that said the article "required the sacrifice of even minimal journalistic standards."

DOJ_NMG_0007892

It was in his college years - first at Princeton, then Yale Law School - that Alito's conservative streak became apparent, though he was hardly outspoken.

Mark Dwyer, Alito's friend at Princeton and roommate at Yale, says it "wasn't in Sam's nature to sit around and chat about who should be elected" or what laws should be enacted. "I would have guessed that he was a natural supporter for Republican politicians and moderate to conservative, but not extreme conservative," says Dwyer.

At Yale, Dwyer remembers Alito as so tidy the roomies were known as the "two Felixes."

At Princeton, Dwyer and Alito chose to take their meals at Stevenson Hall, a university-run alternative to the private eating clubs that are somewhat akin to a fraternity system. Dwyer called it a "muted statement" against the selective nature of the clubs.

Marsha Levy-Warren, who graduated from Princeton a year after Alito in 1973 and was part of the university's first coed class, says he was known to be conservative but not noisy about it. While Princeton was not as restive as some other universities at the time, she says, anti-war and liberal sentiments nonetheless were strong, and students such as Alito who "stood kind of in the opposite camp were known."

As unrest mounted, the university set up a special committee of faculty, students and administrators to study how the school was governed. Stanley Kelley, the professor who chaired the committee, selected Alito as his staff assistant.

Kelley, now retired, said that in a highly charged environment, Alito didn't align himself with extreme views on either side.

"He chose to associate himself with the middle," said Kelley.

Alito himself painted a much sharper and conservative political self-portrait in completing a 1985 application for a job in the Reagan Justice Department. He wrote of being most influenced in the 1960s by the writings of William F. Buckley, the National Review and Barry Goldwater's 1964 campaign. He also cited his membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a conservative alumni group known for its opposition to opening the school to women and bringing in more minorities.

"That's all certainly news to me," says Dwyer. "I would remember if Sam had ever said anything pro-Goldwater."

Levy-Warren, a New York psychologist and psychoanalyst, said she finds Alito's disclosure of membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton "distressing" and "painful," remembering CAP as a polarizing group that felt the school was moving in the "wrong direction" by welcoming women and minorities.

Alito now says he has no recollection of being a member of the group or participating in its activities.

As documents from Alito's past have trickled out, the judge's strongly conservative paper trail sometimes seems to clash with his more measured public comments.

He has been working to reassure senators that he maintains an open mind, despite pronouncements like those on the job application stating that he was "particularly proud" of his work on cases arguing that the Constitution does not protect the right to an abortion and opposing racial and ethnic quotas.

"The idea that Alito maintains an open mind on reproductive rights is simply not credible," says Ralph Neas, president of the liberal People for the American Way. Marcia Greenberger, co-president of the National Women's Law Center, sees "a series of mounting inconsistent statements and evasions."

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said the seeming contradictions mean that Alito will have "an especially heavy burden at the hearings in January to explain the growing number of discrepancies between his current statements and his past actions."

But John McGinnis, a Northwestern law professor who worked with Alito in the Reagan Justice Department, says both the sharply worded documents and Alito's restrained public persona represent different facets of the same Alito.

"It's not such a strange dichotomy," he said. "His ideals are quite conservative and his ideas of how to realize them are quite institutionally pragmatic."

McGinnis describes Alito as having a "Burkean" conservative ideal, referring to Edmund Burke, the 18th century English statesman and philosopher who opposed hasty political changes in favor of gradual reforms.

DOJ_NMG_0007893

Just such an approach is evident in a 1985 legal memo Alito wrote that counseled other lawyers in the Justice Department to gradually chip away at abortion rights rather than try to immediately overturn the landmark 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling.

Anthony Kronman, Alito's classmate at Yale and later dean of the law school there, points to Alito's statement on the 1985 job application that he had been drawn to Yale by the writings of Alexander Bickel, a constitutional law professor at the university.

"Bickel's leading virtue, the virtue that he celebrated and put on the highest level, was the virtue of prudence," says Kronman. "My hunch, my hope, is that Sam will prove to be a conservative of the Bickelian variety."

Anti-Alito Push Fails To Sway U.S. (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

Despite a major coordinated campaign, liberal interest groups have failed to convince the American public that the Senate should reject Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Every major poll indicates that far more voters think Judge Alito should be confirmed than think he should be rejected. Though that support generally is lower than it was for John G. Roberts Jr. before his confirmation for chief justice in the fall, it is on par with the public support for Supreme Court nominees during the past 20 years.

"Since the nomination of Samuel Alito, left-wing groups have lashed out at him through a number of avenues in an attempt to derail his nomination," conservative activists Sean Rushton and Joseph Cella said in a memo to supporters. "The left's campaign has involved television, radio, print and Internet campaigns, public statements, the issuing of reports, and a van-based road tour. In all these media, the left failed to generate any substantive opposition to Judge Alito."

A poll conducted by The Washington Post just before Christmas, for instance, found 54 percent in favor of Judge Alito's confirmation, compared with 28 percent opposed. A CNN poll last month similarly found 49 percent favoring Judge Alito and 29 percent opposed.

Judge Alito's confirmation hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee begin Monday.

Liberal interest groups started formulating opposition even before President Bush nominated Judge Alito in late October to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Before Mr. Bush finished introducing his nominee in a White House ceremony, People for the American Way issued a statement promising to "wage a massive national effort to defeat the nominee."

Other groups quickly followed suit and urged senators to oppose the nomination. They also aired ads against Judge Alito in states such as Maine and Rhode Island, where Republican senators represent more liberal electorates.

"Rolling Justice," a caravan of Alito opponents organized by the liberal Alliance for Justice, traveled through key states to try to raise opposition to the nomination. The effectiveness of the campaign was not clear.

At a December stop in Craig, Colo., three Rolling Justice members stopped at a Holiday Inn to meet with locals. No one showed up.

In an e-mail to journalists yesterday, People For the American Way President Ralph G. Neas said the campaign against Judge Alito represented the most formidable progressive coalition since the defeat of Robert H. Bork's nomination to the high court in 1987.

He said public opinion will turn against Judge Alito once his record receives full attention.

"While the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings on Alito next week will be as civil as the John Roberts hearings, there is no question that there will be much more drama and tension," Mr. Neas said.

Today, the group plans to release a final version of its report on why Judge Alito should be blocked.

Also today, the National Italian American Foundation will kick off a nationwide campaign of supporters who, like Judge Alito, are of Italian descent.

Independence A Key Issue In Roberts' First State Of Judiciary Report (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0007894

The year 2005 was a stormy one for the judiciary, not only because of the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist, but also because of clashes with Congress over the Terri Schiavo case, the politicking over judicial nominees, and issues such as Supreme Court citation of foreign laws and precedents.

Yet when Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. issued his first annual report on the state of the judiciary last week, he sidestepped those controversial questions and focused instead on what he saw as more bread-and-butter threats to judicial independence: low judicial salaries and high rental costs for courthouses. In doing so, he followed the precedent of predecessors Warren Burger and Rehnquist, who largely avoided controversial topics other than judicial salaries in their 30 years of annual reports.

Higher pay for judges and rent relief for courthouses, Roberts said, would have a "vanishingly small" impact on the overall federal budget but "would go a long way toward maintaining a strong and independent federal judiciary with the resources to administer justice efficiently and fairly. And that is priceless." Roberts also called for increased security for judges in the wake of violence aimed at federal and state judges last year.

Roberts issued the report three months into his tenure as chief justice, which he described as "a bit presumptuous," but said he did not want to break with the tradition of his predecessors.

Rep. Adam Schiff, D-Calif., co-chair of the Congressional Caucus on the Judicial Branch, supports Roberts' appeals, but expressed the hope that Roberts and the rest of the judiciary will do more to build public support for a more broadly defined brand of judicial independence.

"He could set a completely new tone and make an outreach to Congress and to the public to help the people understand that the judge's role is not to be popular," said Schiff. "He did not focus on that aspect of judicial independence." Schiff's caucus comprises two dozen members of Congress interested in improving relations between the legislative and congressional branches. The caucus has not yet met with Roberts, Schiff said.

The salary issue raised by Roberts is a recurring theme for chief justices; in 2002, as Roberts noted, the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist said he was 'beating a dead horse' by raising it. But the situation has only gotten worse, Roberts said, with the real pay of federal judges declining almost 24 percent since 1969. With a raise that began on Jan. 1, the annual salary of the chief justice went to $212,100. Associate justices are paid $203,000, while appeals judges get $175,100, and district court judges receive $165,200.

"There will always be a substantial difference in pay between successful government and private sector lawyers," Roberts acknowledged in his written report. "But if that difference remains too large -- as it is today -- the judiciary will over time cease to be made up of a diverse group of the nation's very best lawyers." Roberts noted that increasing numbers of judges are leaving the bench -- nine in the last year. "Every time a judge leaves the bench for a higher paying job, the independence fostered by life tenure is weakened," Roberts said.

The rent complaint is a newer but growing problem. During the 2005 fiscal year, the judiciary paid $926 million to the General Services Administration in rent, Roberts said, even though the GSA's actual cost of providing the space was $426 million. "The federal judiciary cannot continue to serve as a profit center for GSA," Roberts said. In part because of rising rents, about 1,500 jobs in the judicial branch were eliminated in the last two years.

In testimony before Congress last June, GSA official F. Joseph Moravec defended GSA rental policies as "an honest accounting of the cost of occupancy" for high quality courtroom space. The judiciary is the GSA's largest customer, he said, occupying 2,159 courtrooms and 39 million square feet, a threefold increase in the last 30 years. "It is high quality, functional space with befitting public areas, modern technological functionality and enhanced security features," said Moravec, commissioner of public building services.

Congress To Start Year With Unfinished Business (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

Congress will face key issues remaining from 2005 when they return later this month, including legislation to reduce entitlement spending, the future of the USA Patriot Act and a package of tax-cut extensions.

DOJ_NMG_0007895

When the House returns Jan. 31, leaders initially will focus on clearing legislation that would collect about $40 billion in savings from entitlement programs across the government -- a top priority for congressional conservatives and President Bush.

Final passage of the legislation was stymied last month after the Senate approved the final version with a few technical changes, meaning the House must reapprove it.

Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, said House leaders "intend to move very quickly" on the spending cuts and an extension of the Patriot Act, followed by a final package that will extend tax cuts.

Congress failed to pass a permanent extension of the Patriot Act last year, opting at the last minute for a one-month extension.

A House Democratic aide said Democrats have been alerted to expect votes Feb. 1 on both the spending cuts and the Patriot Act.

The Senate is scheduled to return Jan. 18. Initial focus will be on the Patriot Act, an asbestos litigation-reform bill and the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr., said Bob Stevenson, spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican.

Mr. Stevenson said the preference is to approve the Patriot Act without another temporary extension, but that the Senate Judiciary Committee already will be carrying a heavy load with the Alito nomination.

Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said "bipartisan concerns" have been raised over the Patriot Act, but Mr. Reid hopes to get "a good compromise bill done as quickly as possible."

Congress also failed to produce a final package of tax-cut extensions last year.

The House and Senate each passed legislation extending many of the same expiring tax cuts, but the main component of each bill is different and a final compromise has not been crafted. The Senate bill's centerpiece would prevent millions more Americans from having to pay the alternative minimum tax. The House bill would extend the reduced tax rate for capital gains and dividends income.

Democrats have argued that the proposed spending cuts would hurt the poor and that extending the tax cuts would benefit the rich.

Mr. Manley said the juxtaposition of the spending cuts and tax cuts could make it "a difficult vote for many moderate Republicans."

Immigration also will be on the Senate agenda early this year. The House approved a border security bill in December. Mr. Stevenson said the Senate will debate the issue, but leaders haven't decided which immigration bill to bring to the floor.

Congress May Focus On Retirement Funds (WSJ)

By Joi Preciphs

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress is expected to take steps when it reconvenes this month to shore up private pensions, but almost half the workers in private industry won't benefit since their employers offer no retirement plans.

About 48 million full-time employees -- or 45% of the private-sector work force -- receive no pension benefits and their companies offer no retirement-savings programs. Their ranks are expected to grow as larger employers shed retirement obligations and many small businesses steer clear of them altogether.

Workers without retirement benefits are disproportionately Hispanic, young, single, less-educated and lower-paid than the work force in general, according to an analysis of government data by the Employee Benefit Research Institute, a nonpartisan think tank here. They work largely in the health-care, custodial, retail, manufacturing, construction, mining and agriculture industries, and for small companies across the economy.

Hortencia Lemus has worked for 30 years at an Angelica Textile Services laundry plant in Colton, Calif., with no retirement benefits. Concerned about how she will support herself after retirement, she and many co-workers went on strike Dec. 20 to press their demands. So far, no settlement has been reached.

DOJ_NMG_0007896

"It's going to be hard to survive, and I'm getting older and it's going to be harder for me to find a job somewhere else," Ms. Lemus, a 48-year-old who speaks little English, said through a translator. "It is worrisome to think about looking for another job and starting brand new at a new place at our ages."

Small businesses, defined as companies employing fewer than 500 workers, employ almost half the private-sector work force and have the lowest rate of employer-sponsored retirement plans. Many business owners say they can't afford to fund both retirement and health benefits, and that their employees prefer health coverage.

Mike Sincavage owns an excavation company in Blakeslee, Pa., that employs five workers. Health-insurance costs jumped 27% this year, he said, not leaving much money to offer other benefits. Having health coverage is important to his workers, he said, as well as being able to maximize take-home pay.

"They said they would take care of their own retirement," Mr. Sincavage said. "In our type of business, the typical employee needs as much money in their pockets as they can have."

But with Americans living longer, workers without pension plans or sufficient savings are vulnerable to sharp drops in living standards after retiring. More than half of all workers reported that apart from their homes, they had less than $25,000 in total savings and investments, according to an EBRI report last year. Many workers say they can't save more because of rising living expenses, the report said.

Americans long have relied on three sources of income in retirement: the government Social Security programs, employer-provided pension plans and their own savings. For several years, Congress has been trying various means of encouraging people to save more themselves, including such changes as the 1997 bill that created Roth individual retirement accounts.

As old-style defined-benefit pensions -- the ones that pay a set sum each month -- atrophy, some lawmakers and analysts have been urging Congress to expand government incentives to increase personal savings even though previous attempts have had limited success.

In 1996, Congress created the Savings Incentive Match Plan for Employees, or Simple plan, to encourage companies with fewer than 100 workers to set up retirement-savings plans. Administrative paperwork requirements for companies are reduced if they make matching contributions or offer 2% of each full-time worker's compensation to the plan. But relatively few eligible employers have taken advantage of the program, says Denny Dennis, senior research fellow at the National Federation of Independent Business, a 600,000 member small-business advocacy group.

Provisions in the 2001 Economic Growth and Tax Relief Reconciliation Act, or the Bush tax-cut bill, also offered tax incentives for retirement-plan sponsors and further simplified program rules, but an EBRI survey said the changes have done little to increase plan sponsorship among small employers.

"To some extent it's a 'rob Peter to pay Paul' kind of thing" for many businesses, Mr. Dennis said about weighing one kind of benefit against another that many smaller employers face. But with financial-service companies such as Charles Schwab Corp., Fidelity Investments and others recently announcing plans to eliminate certain account-servicing fees, he said, more companies would likely consider the option.

Kathy Stokes Murray, a spokeswoman for the Brookings Institution's Retirement Security Project initiative, says one option Congress could pursue is expanding the Saver's Tax Credit. Created in 1991, it provides families with annual incomes under $50,000 with an income-tax reduction equal to 50% of funds contributed to an individual retirement account or other qualified savings plan. Its current form, however, doesn't help lower-income families who don't owe taxes.

Although Capitol Hill lawmakers floated measures last year to make the credit permanent or extend its sunset to 2008 or 2009, Peter Orszag, a Brookings Institution economist, called the proposals "partial and incomplete" because none of them broaden eligibility for middle-income households or index the credit's adjusted gross income phase-out limits for inflation.

Maryland Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin, who supported making the Saver's Credit permanent in the pension-overhaul package recently passed by the House, said the idea of making the credit refundable so that more lower-income workers could benefit has encountered resistance from lawmakers who have a "philosophical opposition" to it. He says there is bipartisan interest in the issue, but supporters will have to win over congressional leaders to gain further changes.

Groups like the Retirement Security Project also are pushing to lift rules that make it difficult for lower-income people to set aside savings and continue to qualify for government benefits such as food stamps and Medicaid, the federal-state health-care program for the poor and disabled. The current asset rules, they say, "create disincentives for low-income working families to build savings."

DOJ_NMG_0007897

The proposal also would help families with modest retirement savings who run into financial trouble, such as a job loss or major medical expense, and are forced to spend retirement savings because the money prevents them from qualifying for government aid.

"I think policy makers will address these issues in the near to immediate term," Mr. Orszag said. "It's not going to go away as the baby boomers continue to age. It's going to become increasingly more salient as the years go on."

Right Scales Back Election Year Agenda (HILL)

By By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, January 4, 2006

After a year in which many of their highest hopes were dashed, diminished or deferred, fiscal and social conservatives are compiling less ambitious legislative wish lists for 2006.

Republicans of all stripes looked at 2005, with expanded majorities in the House and Senate and President Bush just starting his second term, as a rare opportunity to win enactment of favored legislation.

But the new year is not seen that way at all. “The political reality is, generally speaking, that you have a tough time with big, ambitious ideas in an election year,” said former Rep. Pat Toomey (R-Pa.), the president of the anti-tax Club for Growth.

No prize was bigger, or ultimately more elusive, last year than Bush’s proposal to overhaul Social Security. But other desired, big-ticket legislative items, from a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage to an extension of the 15 percent tax rate on capital gains and dividends, also fell short.

Projected entitlement cuts were trimmed, a tax-cut package was pushed into the new year, and a reformation of the tax code never made it out of the legislative starting gate.

Many interest groups have scaled back their 2006 dockets, although few admit it.

“We decided a couple of religious-discrimination issues would be at the top of our agenda,” said Jim Backlin, legislative director for the Christian Coalition. Among them are an effort to force cable companies to carry all local signals, particularly those of religious broadcasters, on their systems and one to support the use of Jesus’ name in military chaplains’ prayers.

The “must carry” broadcasting issue was the top priority for the group last year, according to its website. But the No. 2 item, a Social Security overhaul, is no longer on the list.

Last year’s Christian Coalition agenda had 15 items; this year’s version has just 10.

In some cases, new legislative wish lists look a lot like the old ones. Andrea Lafferty, executive director of the Traditional Values Coalition, disputed the notion that expectations for 2006 have been scaled back.

“In no way do I feel that we’ve lost momentum,” said Lafferty, whose group remains focused on a litany of judiciary issues, including the confirmation of Judge Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court and constitutional amendments supporting the Pledge of Allegiance and banning gay marriage.

Lafferty chalks up stagnation on a number of the group’s highest priorities last year to “the nature of the beast.”

“Congress is not a fast-moving beast,” she said.

Leaders at the Christian Coalition and Traditional Values Coalition, like those at other interest groups, lobbying shops and think tanks around town, will listen for their primary priorities when President Bush makes his State of the Union address late this month.

“We make our views known before the State of the Union each year,” Backlin said.

“We’re definitely hoping that the president will make mention of the success of adult stem-cell research,” said Lanier Swann, director of government relations at Concerned Women for America. Many social conservatives are preparing for an early Senate battle over embryonic stem-cell research. Several activists pointed to the end-of-year enactment of legislation supporting cord-blood research as a major victory in 2005.

Fiscal conservatives will be parsing the president’s words and the numbers behind them.

Brian Riedl, a federal budget expert at the Heritage Foundation, said he hopes Bush’s speech has “a low price tag.”

DOJ_NMG_0007898

Typically, the State of the Union includes a long list of proposals that add up to a big cost for taxpayers, Riedl said.

"Instead, call for reductions in wasteful and unnecessary spending," Riedl advised. "Lay out a broad vision of why small government is good for taxpayers."

Riedl lauded lawmakers for what he called "cosmetic efforts" to rein in government spending in 2005. But in 2006, he said, "they need to do a better job of walking the walk."

While most of official Washington expects a tougher legislative road in a midterm election year, one tax lobbyist with close ties to the House and White House expressed hope that the approach of the end of Rep. Bill Thomas's (R-Calif.) tenure as Ways and Means chairman would prompt enactment of new tax laws.

"Thomas is trying to cement a legacy," the lobbyist said.

In addition to the Alito confirmation fight and abortion-related issues, social conservatives are gearing up for a Senate battle on immigration policy after House passage of a bill in 2005.

The issue tops the conservative Eagle Forum's Web page.

"Senators who are up for reelection in 2006 had better listen to the House votes," longtime conservative activist Phyllis Schlafly warned in a column.

Whatever their legislative goals, activists may not have much time to make them a reality before the next election.

"There is a shorter window," said Rep. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.). He said a string of legislative victories in 2005 was overshadowed by high expectations on Social Security, the enactment of laws just before long recesses and the devastation wrought by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita in the latter part of the year. A burgeoning lobbying scandal could easily be added to the list.

"Last year was the year for vision," Putnam said. "This next year's going to be a year for nose-to-the-grindstone, competent governance."

A Gentler Capitalism (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

On the field of ideology, 2005 was a lousy year for the American right. Twice -- in the president's proposal to privatize Social Security and in the government's failure to save New Orleans -- it confronted the public with the prospect of a radically reduced government. Twice, the public recoiled at the sight. In retrospect the year's biggest mystery is how George W. Bush thought he could privatize Social Security. Essentially Bush assumed the role of the national CEO who tells his workers he's dumping their defined-benefit pensions for some ill-defined 401(k) investment schemes. And essentially the American people responded with the same anger and anxiety that airline and auto employees have shown when their bosses reneged on their commitments of a secure retirement. The difference, of course, is that the American people have a lot more power as voters than they do as workers.

Bush's plan to scuttle Social Security was in tatters when Hurricane Katrina blew ashore. For Bush this was a double whammy, since FEMA's failure to respond to the storm underscored the image of a government that would not be there when needed. In today's America, where business has largely abandoned the guarantees of security it used to provide its employees, a similar abdication by government was clearly not what the public sought.

For the pervasive insecurity that is inextricably part of today's capitalism has become the dominant fact of modern life. "The fragmenting of big institutions has left many people's lives in a fragmented state: the places they work more resembling train stations than villages," writes sociologist Richard Sennett in "The Culture of the New Capitalism," a newly published collection of lectures he gave at Yale University in 2004. Throughout most of the 20th century, the insecurity endemic to capitalism was mitigated by business institutions organized, as Sennett's great predecessor Max Weber first noted, along military lines. The corporation gave the employee a place and a ladder, and in such a lifelong institution, Sennett notes, "it became possible to define what the stages of a career ought to be like, to correlate longtime service in a firm to specific steps of increased wealth."

Sennett is no apologist for the old corporate order, but it did impart a structure to people's work lives and a place to hone their crafts. The new workplace, by contrast, is a brave new world of short-term employment and relationships, where experience is not necessarily a virtue and institutional memory is sketchy at best. It may be a fine place for young workers, but "as middle age looms and children, mortgages and school fees appear, the need for structure and predictability in work grows greater." The frequent migration of executives from one firm to another, Sennett adds, imposes further costs on employees: "This managerial revolving door has meant that the steady, self-disciplined worker has lost his audience."

DOJ_NMG_0007899

In the absence of a more structured work life, what Sennett sees is a more muddled sense of self. He finds that confusion among displaced middle-aged workers, but also among young college graduates who, compared with their counterparts of the 1970s, are less able to articulate their career goals. In an economy that disdains continuity, how exactly do you define "career"?

From his interviews with a wide range of workers, Sennett turns up a widespread resignation to these immense changes in economic life. That doesn't mean, though, that the American people aren't reacting to this profound shift in their lives, and their sense of their lives. The increased prominence of religion in American life over the past several decades, I'd surmise, is in part a reaction to this embattled sense of self. And if most Americans take globalization as a given, many are increasingly enraged at our relatively open borders and the immigrants who cross them. These are two responses to the new insecurity that the right has exploited, though neither does anything to reestablish a more benign economy.

For the left, what 2005 has demonstrated is that while Americans have no great love for government, they do expect it to provide a baseline of security -- the more so since the employer-provided benefits of the past 60 years are going the way of the dodo. That means that government-supported universal health insurance will soon be back on the nation's agenda. But that's the easy part. Rebuilding the kind of security that defined private-sector economic life for most of the past century, and that helped individuals define themselves, is a conundrum that's daunting even to contemplate.

And yet: The new capitalism disdains stability; human beings, on the whole, don't. And immodest as it may be to alter the terms of capitalism, it's a damned sight easier than changing human beings.

Bush Loyalist Takes Economics To The Political Stage (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

In the last two months, Faryar Shirzad has been to Kenya, Uganda, Mongolia, Japan, China, the UK and Russia. He has just returned from the gruelling World Trade Organisation talks in Hong Kong. The only solace is occasional business-class travel.

He has no regrets. As the US deputy national security adviser for international economics, Mr Shirzad says his job is "endlessly fascinating ... It is a real privilege to see a foreign government at the peak of preparedness as they interact with our government, to see the leader of a country sitting down with ours talking through the difficult issues of the day."

After three years at the National Security Council, Mr Shirzad was promoted to lead its international economic staff. To ensure better co-ordination between the economic and foreign policy halves of the White House, he reports to the National Economic Council.

Trade, and its impact on political freedom rather than just commercial interests, is a key theme for President George W. Bush. "Condoleezza Rice [US secretary of state] and Stephen Hadley [national security adviser] are both very cognisant of the degree to which economics are now a driving element of our position in the world and the conduct of international relations ... Both are very mindful of the importance of integrating the economic agenda into the broader national security agenda," says Mr Shirzad.

His portfolio includes oversight of international finance, trade, environment, energy, investment, development assistance, humanitarian assistance and disaster response, being the G8 "sherpa" – the president's personal representative to the G8 process – and managing his preparatory work for most of the large economic summits.

Grant Aldonis, former commerce under-secretary for international trade, who calls Mr Shirzad his "best professional friend", sums up his role: "He is the last guy the president talks to about international economic issues before a decision is made ... He is the consummate staffer. He reserved judgment, thought through problems and gave unvarnished advice."

A framed, handwritten note from the president is prominent on Mr Shirzad's office wall. He is proud but modest, saying he is too embarrassed to read the presidential praise aloud.

DOJ_NMG_0007900

Mr Shirzad is attentive without being obsequious. He is seen as a good negotiator and is effusively loyal to Mr Bush, whom he lauds some ten times on different issues during the interview. The only long pause comes when asked if Mr Bush's decision to impose steel tariffs dented his image on free trade.

For all his discreet style, he is passionate about trade and in agreement with Mr Bush's view of freedom and the importance of democracy, drawn from his own life experience. He is the son of an Iranian diplomat, was born in London and lived in Pakistan and Rome. At 13, he was living in New York during the Iranian revolution in 1979 and vividly recalls the disruption for his family.

"My father had been consul-general, living in a big house, and we had to very quickly get out and assume a very low-profile existence. I cannot imagine what my parents went through, with four children, to lose their country, their job and most of their life assets. The thing we had going for us was our health, and the fact that we, by the grace of God, were in the United States."

The family moved to Bethesda, Maryland. His mother became a census-taker, checking up on families who hadn't filled out their 1980 census forms. He and his father lugged phone directories door to door. The family also set up a delicatessen and began stocking a few Iranian books.

Eventually the books took over so they sold the deli and started a book business, Iranbooks, which is still in operation today. "I think they at one point had the largest collection of Persian-language books outside Iran."

Continuing the career abruptly ended for his father, Mr Shirzad has forged a career in international affairs. He studied finance and went to Harvard graduate school to study public policy, before going to law school. He became a trade lawyer for seven years then served on the US Senate finance committee on the Republican staff.

"Bill Roth [Republican chair of the committee] was a very important influence. He was very much the embodiment of the greatest generation who went into public service at a young age and often at great personal sacrifice."

On the Hill he worked to get fast-track approval for trade deals for the president, which had been bogged down in a decade of partisan bickering. Mr Bush has since used this authority to pursue trade agreements in the Middle East with Morocco, Jordan, Bahrain, the UAE and Oman.

"We are seeing an agenda take hold in places like the Middle East, one that will have an enduring legacy beyond the time that the president is in office," he says. Officials are conscious of making the best use of that authority before it expires in 2007. "It is why the president has been so bold on the trade and WTO agenda."

Some trade analysts, however, argue that this record has come at a price, squandering political capital on obscure deals and leading to congressional fatigue at a time when Democrats are more resistant to supporting free trade agreements. The administration must also build support for a more ambitious Doha round.

Mr Aldonis says Mr Shirzad's challenge over the next year is to "mobilise political support when other themes are working against it, and find a strategy of appealing to internationalist Democrats. They came out of a nothing in Hong Kong and they have got a year left. How do they get out of the cul-de-sac of negotiations?".

Mr Shirzad, ever cautious, offers few clues. "We always have to worry about protectionism because politically it is an easy course for people to take. Trade legislation is hard work and politically difficult, but it is important."

Pharmacists Deal With Medicare Confusion Computer Glitch, Missing Cards Among Troubles (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, January 4, 2006

Pharmacists struggled with billing glitches and missing drug cards as they tried to fill prescriptions Tuesday under Medicare's new drug benefit, the most sweeping expansion to the program since its inception in 1965.

On the first full business day the benefit was available, pharmacists said some customers came in without cards or letters showing their eligibility and others were surprised that they had to pay full cost until meeting a deductible.

"We're trying everything we can to help, but people are confused," said Samuel Mogbo, a CVS drug store pharmacist in Chicago. He said some customers hadn't received their cards and others had lost them.

DOJ_NMG_0007901

About 21 million senior and disabled Americans have some kind of prescription-drug benefit. The majority either kept coverage from former employers or stayed in a Medicare Advantage plan they had previously joined. About 6.2 million people were automatically enrolled in the new Medicare program because they had been in state programs for low-income people. About 1 million joined on their own.

Those eligible have until May 15 to sign up without penalty. They can choose from an array of plans.

At Linda's Pharmacy in Chicago, most customers had their cards and those who didn't returned home to get them, said pharmacist and owner Linda Dobson. She said the pharmacy experienced "minor" billing problems.

Robert Hayes, president of the Medicare Rights Center in New York City, blamed many of Monday's problems on the malfunction of a major computer database used by pharmacists to check eligibility.

At Scheer Drugs in the Bronx, where more than 90% of Medicare recipients are low-income seniors who were automatically enrolled, "it's chaos," pharmacist Bill Scheer said.

"People are falling through the holes," he said. "They need their medicine."

Larry Kocot, senior adviser to Medicare Administrator Mark McClellan, said sheer volume caused computer slowdowns Monday, but these problems had been resolved by Tuesday.

"This is going very well," said Gary Karr, spokesman for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. He blamed snags on heavy computer traffic, pharmacists forgetting billing details and beneficiaries not having cards. "It's not a magic system," he said.

"It is confusing, but consider the volume of change. … This is a massive undertaking," said Glenna Canitz, executive director of Bay Pharmacy in St. Petersburg, Fla. Her pharmacy, which has filled thousands of prescriptions under the new benefit, experienced some denials, but she considered them "opening-day glitches."

Medicare Expands Tier Pricing System Cancer, Arthritis, MS Drugs Fall In Highest Levels (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, January 4, 2006

Medicare's drug benefit, expanding on a practice now in limited use in the private sector, requires patients to pay larger co-payments for expensive treatments, including some drugs for cancer, arthritis, multiple sclerosis and anemia.

In the private sector, some employers' insurance plans charge more for some so-called "lifestyle" drugs, such as impotence treatment Viagra or some allergy remedies.

But the Medicare program, which took effect Jan. 1, expands those charges into new territory: treatments for serious or life-threatening conditions.

While most working-age adults have insurance with two or three different "tiers" corresponding to how much they pay at the pharmacy for certain drugs — with generics the cheapest and brand-name drugs more — about 40% of the Medicare plans have four tiers, according to the analysis by Avalere Health, a for-profit research firm in Washington that did an analysis of the drugs earmarked for higher payments by patients. Fourteen percent have five tiers.

In comparison, 4% of workers with health insurance through their jobs have a fourth tier, according to a nationwide survey by the non-profit Kaiser Family Foundation.

In that fourth tier — where Medicare patients will most commonly pay 25% to 33% of the cost of the drug rather than a flat dollar amount — are such expensive treatments as Remicade and Enbrel for rheumatoid arthritis, Procrit and Aranesp for anemia and Copaxone and Betaseron for multiple sclerosis.

That differs, says Avalere President Daniel Mendelson and other benefit experts, from the drugs most commonly found in higher "tiers" in employer-offered plans. Often, those tiers are used by employers generally trying to get workers to think twice about taking expensive drugs for non-life-threatening conditions, such as hair loss, allergies or impotence.

Tier systems caught on in the late 1990s among employer-offered insurance, initially as a way to get patients to choose lower-cost generic drugs over more expensive brand-name products.

DOJ_NMG_0007902

The average co-payment now in private insurance is $10 for generics, $22 for brand-name drugs on an insurer's formulary and $35 for those not on the formulary, according to the Kaiser survey. The average co-payment for a fourth-tier drug is $74.

In Medicare, the tier prices vary, but generics are generally $10 or less, according to an analysis of 10 national plans by Avalere, while brand-name drugs range from $17 to $45 per prescription. Tier-four drugs are generally charged at 25% to 33% of the cost of the drug, although one national plan charges $50 to $69 per prescription.

Under one plan that charges 25% for drugs in the fourth tier, Medicare patients would pay $231 a month for anemia drug Aranesp, which is often used for cancer patients undergoing chemotherapy.

A patient taking Remicade for rheumatoid arthritis would pay $143 a month. The most expensive co-payment is in one national plan with a tier charging 75% of the cost of the drugs it places in that category, which include the breast cancer drug Herceptin (which would cost patients $1,991 a month), colon cancer drug Avastin ($1,839) and cancer drug Gemzar ($92).

Medicare officials say that most patients who did not have other drug coverage before will save substantially under the new program, even if their drugs are in the fourth tier. Instead of paying the full cost of the drug, the patient will have help from the government, especially after going through the "doughnut hole," which is the coverage gap during which the patient pays the full cost of the drugs until he or she has spent $3,600, after which the government pays 95% of the cost.

"In the case of Aranesp, the catastrophic (coverage) will start by the third month if the beneficiary has no other coverage," Peter Ashkenaz, spokesman for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said in an e-mail. "Overall, the savings will be high."

But some patients may not be able to pay their way through the doughnut hole, says Kevin Brennan, senior vice president of policy for the Arthritis Foundation.

"They may be out of luck," he says.

In addition, most of the pharmaceutical assistance programs that offered free or low-cost drugs to lower-income patients will no longer do so for those with Medicare drug coverage.

Overall, Brennan says, the Medicare drug benefit is a step forward, but his organization says it will monitor it closely and may go to Medicare officials with suggestions for changes. His organization is also watching what private insurers do. Some may decide to create similar tier structures in their offerings to workers.

"We're really concerned about that," says Brennan, who takes an expensive arthritis drug he says has "changed my life as far as my ability to function" and fears such drugs may become too costly, even for those with insurance, if co-payments rise.

"We're looking at a real crisis," he says. "These are wonderful drugs that are tremendously innovative, but they are incredibly expensive. We as a country are going to have to figure out how to pay for them."

The American Cancer Society is also watching closely.

"Co-payments are an issue for us with any treatment for cancer," says Christy Schmidt, senior director of policy. "All insurance companies look at the bottom line and how to control costs. Medicare is often a leader in policy in the nation. We intend to watch this over time."

In 2002, a policy to charge cancer patients up to $550 per chemotherapy drug and up to $250 per radiation treatment was instituted by PacifiCare for its Medicare managed-care patients. After an outcry, the insurer dropped many of the charges.

The Cancer Society says it knows of no current plans that require special cancer co-payments.

But as ever-more-expensive drugs hit the market, more employers may begin to set up four-tier drug-benefit programs, says Dave Guilmette, managing director at benefits consulting firm Towers Perrin.

"It's a creative way to manage costs," says Guilmette. The Medicare drug program "will stimulate a lot more of this kind of design."

But he doesn't think many employers will place expensive treatments for life-threatening conditions in fourth tiers. Rather, he says, employers are more likely to require the use of disease-management programs or have insurers insist that patients try lower-cost drugs before moving on to higher-cost ones.

"These are people who are typically very sick and need the drugs," says Guilmette. "If you're asking them to pay 50% of something costing $20,000 a year, that isn't a competitive practice."

DOJ_NMG_0007903

Eric Michael, pharmacy consultant with Mercer Health and Benefits, says that the fourth tier can make sense if employers and insurers are trying to get patients to realize the cost of expensive treatments, so long as there is an out-of-pocket maximum and the benefit is clearly explained.

He says some employers need to create such a tier to protect themselves from expensive new treatments that may treat both serious and non-serious conditions. Patients would pay more, for example, if they sought the expensive rheumatoid arthritis treatments Humira or Enbrel for a less serious use, such as for the cosmetic treatment of the rash caused by psoriasis.

"We need to make sure the drugs used are medically appropriate," he says. "A lot of plans are not putting those checks in place and are amazed when they spend $12,000 to $13,000 a year to cover a cosmetic thing."

Congress Drops 'Buy America' For Tankers (AP)

By Matthew Daly

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — A defense bill approved by Congress would allow open competition for a multibillion-dollar contract to supply refueling tankers for the Air Force.

President Bush is expected to sign the measure, squelching an earlier House-approved bill that would have helped The Boeing Co. by keeping the Pentagon from buying military equipment from the parent company of European jet maker Airbus SAS.

Boeing lost the lucrative tanker contract in 2004 amid an ethics scandal.

"Buy America" language had been inserted by Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. However, Hunter agreed to remove the provision last month at the request of Senate leaders and administration officials, who said it could spark retaliatory measures by other countries and limit Pentagon flexibility. Congress voted final passage Dec. 21.

Harald Stavenas, a spokesman for Hunter, said this week the lawmaker would fight for it in the future.

Chicago-based Boeing lost the tanker deal in 2004, after revelations that it had hired a top Air Force acquisitions official who later admitted giving the company preferential treatment.

The deal would have allowed the Air Force to buy or lease 100 Boeing 767 planes for use as tankers, but it was killed by Congress in the 2005 defense authorization bill. The Air Force has said it is likely to reopen the deal to competition, although no formal timeline has been set.

George Behan, chief of staff to Rep. Norm Dicks, D-Wash., said withdrawal of the buy-America clause was expected.

"There's no question there will be an open competition. The real question is whether the Pentagon will ever award the contract to a company that has a major European component, given the (U.S.) complaints about illegal subsidies the parent company is receiving," Behan said.

Dicks' district outside Seattle includes thousands of Boeing workers.

The House bill would have barred the Pentagon from purchasing goods and services from foreign companies that receive government subsidies. While no companies were named, lawmakers said the amendment was aimed at disqualifying Airbus' parent company from bidding on the tanker contract.

Airbus, which is 80 percent owned by the European Aeronautic Defence and Space Co., has long received subsidies from European governments, sparking tension between U.S. and European officials.

EADS, which is based in France and Germany, has said it plans to team with Northrop Grumman Corp. to offer a tanker version of its Airbus A330 passenger jet to produce a new generation of aerial refueling tankers. The contract could be worth at least $20 billion.

Boeing spokesman Doug Kennett said Tuesday that "Boeing welcomes fair competition and the opportunity to tender the best proposal possible."

Randy Belote, a spokesman for Northrop Grumman, said the California-based company believes its partnership with EADS would produce an American-made product. Last year, EADS said it would build a manufacturing plant in Mobile, Ala., if it wins the tanker contract.

Federal Raise Set At 3.44 Percent In D.C. Area; Raleigh-Durham Sees Highest Increase (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0007904

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

Most federal employees will receive pay raises ranging from 2.83 percent to 5.62 percent this year, according to pay tables published by the Office of Personnel Management.

The lowest raises will go to General Schedule employees who are outside the boundaries of 31 specially designated locality pay areas. The highest raise will go to employees in Raleigh-Durham-Cary, N.C., which has been designated as a locality pay zone for the first time and is catching up with nonfederal salaries in that area.

As previously reported, the 2006 pay table for federal employees in the Washington-Baltimore area shows an increase of 3.44 percent in salaries (putting the average federal salary here at $80,425).

In addition to Raleigh-Durham, four other metro areas will receive higher raises than Washington-Baltimore area employees. They are:

Hartford, Conn., 3.62 percent; Buffalo, 3.75 percent, also a new locality pay area; New York-Newark, 3.77 percent; and San Francisco-San Jose-Oakland, 3.95 percent.

Locality payments are supposed to close the gap between federal and nonfederal pay in 31 metro areas and a catchall category known as the "rest of the U.S." Locality adjustments reflect wage growth and labor markets and do not take into account cost of living, housing and other consumer prices.

Last year, the president's pay advisers calculated that federal employee pay, on average, lagged behind the private sector by 13.37 percent. Some Bush administration officials scoff at the use of the average, contending that some federal employees are paid in excess of private-sector salaries and some federal employees are not paid enough.

In addition to Raleigh-Durham and Buffalo, Phoenix has been designated as a locality pay area for the first time, and workers there will receive a 2.95 percent raise. In the three areas, officials determined that nonfederal salaries were above those paid for comparable GS positions.

Three areas have been removed as locality pay areas for 2006 and will receive transitional pay raises. They are: Kansas City, 2.25 percent; St. Louis, 2.49 percent; and Orlando, 2.8 percent.

E-mail:barrs@washpost.com

Cronyism And Crises (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

Defying early forecasts of easy confirmation, the Senate recessed for the holidays without approving Ellen Sauerbrey, President Bush's lamentable choice to head an important State Department agency that coordinates emergency relief for refugees of foreign wars, persecution and natural disasters. Her nomination has yet to clear the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, raising at least a glimmer of hope that she may not get the job.

Like all too many Bush appointees, Ms. Sauerbrey has political connections that seem her most obvious credential. A former Maryland state legislator and a twice-defeated gubernatorial candidate, she served as state chairman of President Bush's 2000 campaign. She is a favorite of Mr. Bush's far-right base, having pursued an anti-abortion and anti-family-planning agenda in her current patronage post as the American representative to the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women.

Unlike previous appointees to head the State Department agency, the Bureau of Population, Refugees and Migration, Ms. Sauerbrey has zero experience in emergency management and refugee resettlement. In the wake of the bungled response to Hurricane Katrina by a similarly uncredentialed appointee, Congress has become more sensitive to charges of this kind of cronyism. A few weeks ago, the Foreign Relations Committee bowed to a request from Senator Barbara Boxer and put off its planned vote on Ms. Sauerbrey.

Ms. Boxer is not the only committee member concerned by Ms. Sauerbrey's thin résumé for overseeing a $1 billion bureau with life-and-death responsibilities for helping to set up refugee camps and arranging for adequate food and protection. Senators on both sides of the aisle are troubled, and the nomination's approval by the committee is not the sure thing it once seemed.

The worry now is that Mr. Bush will bypass the Senate and install Ms. Sauerbrey on his own by using a recess appointment, the same tactic he used to make John Bolton the United States ambassador to the United Nations. The president should do just the opposite. The Senate's delay is a chance for Mr. Bush to rethink Ms. Sauerbrey's elevation and find someone with solid credentials for the refugee job.

DOJ_NMG_0007905

OTHER NEWS:

Only 1 W. Virginia Coal Miner Now Said Found Alive (REU)

Reuters, January 4, 2006

TALLMANSVILLE, West Virginia (Reuters) - Only one of 13 miners who were in a West Virginia coal mine when it was hit by an explosion was found alive, a company official told family members on Wednesday, after reports hours earlier that 12 had survived led to rejoicing.

Virginia Dean, whose uncle was in the mine, said, "Only one lived. They lied."

12 Found Alive In W.Va. Coal Mine (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

SAGO, W.Va., Jan. 3 -- A dozen miners trapped 12,000 feet into a mountainside since early Monday were found alive Tuesday night just hours after rescuers found the body of a 13th man, who died in an explosion in an adjacent coal mine that was sealed off in early December.

The bells at the Sago Baptist Church pealed, and joyous relatives rushed outside to celebrate their miracle: Miners surfacing after being in the cold, damp Sago Mine for 41 hours. Gov. Joe Manchin III said some would need medical attention.

"Everybody ran from the church screaming, 'They're alive! They're coming!' " said Loretta Ables, whose fianc, Fred Ware, was among the missing miners. She had lost hope when she learned about the dangerously high levels of carbon monoxide in the mine, but she was elated as she waited outside the church. "I feel great, very great."

The miners had apparently done what they had been taught to do: barricaded themselves in a pocket with breathable air and awaited rescue.

On Monday morning, a cart that takes miners deep into the mine had dropped the 13th miner off at his work station. It was 11,200 feet down the air intake channel, at the intersection of the sealed-off mine, where authorities think the blast occurred. Only 700 feet farther, the miners stopped the cart and walked off to begin work. They took their lunch buckets and gear. Their cart, undamaged by the blast, was still on the track.

Earlier Tuesday night, Manchin had held out hope for the 12, saying they "did not get the force of this blast."

"Our hopes are still high" for the other miners, the governor said. He said miracles happened in his state.

Bennett K. Hatfield, president of International Coal Group Inc., said: "We are clearly in a situation where we need a miracle, but miracles happen."

Federal regulators have cited the mine, in north-central West Virginia, more than 270 times in the past two years for safety violations, a third of them considered "significant and substantial," according to the Mine Safety and Health Administration. The problems included mine roofs that collapsed without warning, faulty tunnel supports and dangerous buildups of flammable coal dust. Recent violations included inadequate ventilation to dissipate dangerous gases.

Early Tuesday, rescuers drilled a 6 1/4 -inch hole 260 feet into an area near where the miners were thought to be. They measured carbon monoxide of 1,300 parts per million -- more than three times the level a person can safely breathe for 15 minutes.

After pounding on a pipe for 10 minutes, a common method for miners to communicate, rescuers lowered a microphone into the hole and picked up no response. A camera lowered into the hole showed no signs of wide-scale destruction such as a roof collapse from the explosion, making officials optimistic that rescuers would not have to dig through much debris.

Word of the deadly levels of gas in the mine left family members distraught. Some broke down sobbing, and others grew quietly somber.

DOJ_NMG_0007906

"It's hard to hear they might not be coming out," said Michelle Mouser, a niece of Terry Helms, a fire boss who inspeced the mine for problems each day before the production crews entered. "It's real down," she said of the mood of relatives gathered at the church as she sat under a drizzly, overcast sky earlier Tuesday.

"My heart goes out to each and every one of them," said Vinnie Ables, 30, Tuesday night. "At first I had no hope, and then I started to pray."

Except for relatives and friends of Terry Helms, whose relatives had told reporters they suspected he was the 13th man since the body was found at his work station, there was jubilation. People at the church sang a familiar hymn, "How Great Thou Art," as other relatives sped to the scene to greet the miners.

"I got scared a lot of times, but I couldn't give up," Charlotte Weaver, wife of miner Jack Weaver, told the Associated Press. "We have an 11-year-old son, and I couldn't go home and tell him Daddy wasn't coming home." Through the day, mine officials moved to speed the advance of the eight-man rescue teams, especially after a 1,300-pound robot equipped with a special camera became bogged down in mud while exploring the mine. The teams pressed through dank five-foot-high tunnels, hastily repairing ventilation systems as they went, but forgoing other repairs.

Hatfield said damage in the mine "resembled" that of a methane explosion. Methane is naturally produced in coal mines and is highly combustible. The "very substantial" explosion occurred in the sealed-off mine near where Helms's body was found.

Although their entrapment was not similar, the joy at the rescue of the 12 mirrored the relief 3 1/2 years ago when nine miners were brought to the surface one by one after being trapped for more than four days at the Quecreek mine near Somerset, Pa. Mining experts credited improved training in helping the miners to save themselves in both the Quecreek and Sago incidents.

Over railroad tracks and down a winding road along the Buckhannon River near the mine, miners' family members waited with increasing anxiety, remembering the last time they saw their loved ones.

Sam Luntz, 61, recalled urging his brother-in-law, miner Martin Bennett, 50, to retire. "He was at my house on Christmas Eve, and we talked about retiring. He laughed and said he'll probably work at the mine for the rest of his life," Luntz said.

Despite arthritis and the telltale cough of black lung disease, Bennett would not apply for disability benefits, Luntz said. His brother-in-law "loved his job."

Bennett's son is also a miner, but Luntz said it is unlikely he will return to the dangerous work, "especially if his dad don't come out alive."

In the hilly backwoods of West Virginia, mining runs in families for generations, and when disaster strikes -- this one is the biggest in recent local memory -- the community pulls together.

"Upshur County is like family -- when one person is hurt, we're pretty much all hurt," Sandy Fultz, an emergency medical technician and volunteer firefighter, said as she directed traffic near the mine.

Carmalita Rice, 19, a neighbor of missing miner Fred Ware, 59, said she knew the tall, thin widower was at risk the moment she heard the blast, which shook her bed. "We knew his schedule, so we knew he was in it," she said.

Helms's son Nick Helms, 25, said he was afraid to attend a briefing by mine officials. "Sometimes I can't get up the nerve to walk in. I'm scared of the news."

Terry Helms's fiance, Virginia Moore, said she packed his lunch bucket with sandwiches before he headed to work before dawn.

" 'Okay, babe. I'll see you tonight,' " she said he told her as he stepped into his red pickup truck.

"Be careful," she urged him.

From the morning darkness, he answered, "I will."

Relief Sweeps W.Va. Mining Town Families Learn 12 Miners Found Alive Underground (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, January 4, 2006

TALLMANSVILLE, W.Va. — Twelve miners trapped inside a coal mine for 42 hours were found alive shortly before midnight Tuesday, prompting screams of joy from family members in a nearby church.

DOJ_NMG_0007907

"They're all alive!" screamed one woman as she ran out of the church, its bells ringing in the dark.

Harley Ables, 29, said Gov. Joe Manchin told the families that 12 of the 13 miners were OK and coming out. One miner had been found dead.

Earlier in the evening, Ben Hatfield, president of International Coal Group, which owns the mine, said rescuers had yet to find signs of the other miners. The vehicle they had been traveling in had been found abandoned.

Hatfield said at the time that it appeared that the other miners had survived the explosion Monday and had sought safety in another part of the mine.

"It's another glimmer of hope but raises the question of where the other miners could have gone," Hatfield said.

Telling the miners' families that a body had been found, he said, was "about the hardest thing I've ever had to do.

Rescuers had to stop advancing through the mine shafts temporarily while they tried to restore ventilation sufficient to allow them to move farther, Hatfield said. The explosion disabled vents in the shaft.

"We remain hopeful there'll be some good news before it's all over, but hopes are certainly stretched thin," he said.

Hatfield said he did not know how the unidentified miner died. The body was found about 700 feet from the vehicle. He said rescuers would keep looking for the others. He said there was no evidence of a roof cave-in or collapse in the mine, and the vehicle was not damaged or thrown off its track.

Prospects of finding the miners alive were bleak. Before reaching the body, the rescuers had drilled narrow holes into the mine, inserted air monitors and found levels of carbon monoxide more than three times the maximum regarded as safe. The deadly gas is a byproduct of combustion, such as an explosion.

A camera lowered down a narrow hole had found no signs of the miners. Drilling crews pounded on steel pipes but heard no sounds or response from the missing men.

The rescue crews were in the farthest reaches of the mine, 11,200 feet from its entrance, when they found the body.

The missing men were thought to be trapped 260 feet beneath the surface.

Waiting family members had retreated to the nearby Sago Baptist Church to pray and wait out the efforts. Hundreds had spent Monday night huddled in tents or wrapped in blankets in the cool, damp mountain air.

Key to hope for a miracle was whether adequate levels of oxygen in the mine and survival training could have allowed the miners to construct a shelter from the carbon monoxide.

Carbon monoxide poisons by entering the lungs through breathing and displacing oxygen from the bloodstream. It can kill swiftly and, because it is odorless and colorless, with little warning.

The cause of the explosion remained unclear, Hatfield said. Lara Ramsburg, a spokeswoman for Gov. Joe Manchin, said it may have been sparked by lightning.

Jesse Stolzefels, 22 has worked in the mine for three years laying track for rail cars. It's a safe place to work, he said. "This was a freak accident," he said.

The best hope for the missing men is that they would have constructed a barrier against the deadly gas after the explosion. Materials to build such a structure — wood and plastic sheeting — would have been available in the mine, Hatfield said.

"Essentially, they could have built a room around themselves for safety," he said.

The explosion that trapped the miners occurred when the mine was reopening after being closed for the holidays. Ramsburg said two cars carrying miners were entering the mine when the blast occurred. The second car, carrying six miners, made it out after feeling the effects of the blast.

The accident recalled a similar drama four years ago when nine Pennsylvania coal miners were successfully rescued after being trapped for 77 hours in a flooded mineshaft 240 feet underground.

Town Pauses And Mourns One Who Did Not Return Son Remembers Hardworking, Unselfish Dad (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, January 4, 2006

TALLMANSVILLE, W.Va. — Nick Helms says he owes everything to his father: the clothes on his back, the food he eats.

DOJ_NMG_0007908

Most important, says Helms, whose father Terry was among 13 miners trapped in the Sago Mine after an explosion on Monday, is the life he gave to his son.

"He gave his life in there," he said of the mine, "so that I could go out and live mine."

Helms, 25, was among scores of relatives and friends of the miners who gathered Tuesday in a chilly drizzle at the Sago Baptist Church, a white chapel snug against a hillside across the road from the mine. The church erupted in joy when news came that 12 of the miners had survived.

But the news wasn't good for Helms. The 13th miner, whose body was found before the 12 were discovered, was Terry Helms, said his niece, Michele Mouser.

"He was a great guy. He was willing to help anybody," she said.

Terry Helms' job at the mine was fire boss, the official responsible for monitoring conditions inside the mine and helping to ensure the miners' safety. Helms, 50, was well aware of the dangers in mining and worked to make certain his son, Nick, didn't follow in his footsteps, Nick said.

"He worked so hard so I wouldn't have to set foot in a coal mine," said Nick Helms, who lives in Myrtle Beach, S.C. and hopes to become a professional golfer.

On Monday, when Nick Helms returned home from running errands, he had more than a dozen messages on his answering machine. He said he sensed his father might be in trouble.

His girlfriend finally reached him. Your dad's mine exploded, she told him. "I just about dropped on the floor," he said.

While friends and relatives awaited word on the trapped miners, veteran miners dropped by to offer support. When asked why they keep going back into the mine, knowing what can happen, miner Ted Johnson, 40, said, "It's as good a paying job as you'll find in this area."

Also prior to the news, clergy members and Red Cross counselors tried to comfort spouses and children. Piano music and singing could be heard.

"Wonderful hymns," said Barbary Chaapel, 64, whose sister's former husband, Jack Weaver, 51, was among those trapped in the mine. "I'll Fly Away. Amazing Grace."

Red Cross spokeswoman Cecelia Hart said about 25 volunteers were helping the miners' relatives and friends. "We're counseling; we're holding hands," Hart said.

A few hundred yards from the church, rescue workers and reporters jammed the narrow country lane leading from the church to the mine.

A few miles away, in the county seat, Buckhannon, signs of support sprouted. "Pray for the miners and their families," read the sign at Domino's Pizza.

Faith, and support of friends and family, are sustaining the miners' families, Chaapel said.

12 Miners Found Alive 41 Hours After Explosion (NYT)

By James Dao

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

SAGO, W.Va., Wednesday, Jan. 4 - Forty-one hours after an explosion trapped 13 men in a West Virginia coal mine here, family members and a state official said 12 of the miners had been found alive Tuesday night.

Earlier Tuesday evening, the body of one miner was found 11,200 feet from the mine entrance, within a few hundred feet of a vehicle used to transport the workers deep into the mine, company officials said. The miner was not identified, and the cause of his death was unclear.

Joe Thornton, deputy secretary for the West Virginia Department of Military Affairs and Public Safety, said the rescued miners were being examined at the mine shortly before midnight and would soon be taken to nearby hospitals. Mr. Thornton said he did not know details of their medical condition.

Outside the Sago Baptist Church, where people had gathered across the street from the mine, family and friends of the miners hugged each other and shed tears of joy as they learned the news.

DOJ_NMG_0007909

"It's a miracle," said Loretta Ables, who said her fiancé, Fred Ware, was among the survivors. "Everyone was telling us they were probably dead."

Earlier in the ordeal, air readings from a hole drilled 260 feet into the mine had revealed extremely high levels of toxic carbon monoxide, a likely byproduct of the explosion, mine company officials said.

After the one miner's body was found alone, Bennett K. Hatfield, the chief executive officer of International Coal Group, the mine's owner, said he considered it a hopeful sign that the other miners had abandoned the vehicle and found a safe pocket of air.

Terry Goff, a friend of one of the miners, said he learned that the miners were alive when the bell at the Baptist church began ringing just before midnight.

"People were rushing out, yelling, 'There's 12 alive!' " Mr. Goff said.

"When they found the body and said the carbon monoxide levels were high, I doubted my faith," he said, "but now we've got 12 men walking off that hill."

Throughout the day, trained rescue teams equipped with oxygen canisters had rotated through the mine, meticulously repairing the damaged ventilation system and combing through the mazelike corridors for the men.

Emotions seesawed throughout the day with each new piece of information. In the morning, hopes had run high that the miners, most of them highly experienced workers in their 40's and 50's, had barricaded themselves in a corridor with breathable air to wait for a rescue party.

By late afternoon, mine company officials said that with only a few thousand feet of mine left to search, the chances of the miners being alive seemed remote. But late in the evening, officials said the fact that 12 miners had apparently not been killed by the force of the explosion renewed hopes that they were alive.

Nick Helms, who waited all day for news of his father, Terry, said his father, a strapping 50-year-old, had endured numerous injuries in a 30-year career and hated mining because of the dangers, but refused to quit because the job put food on the table.

"He gave his life in there so I could go to the movies," Mr. Helms, 25, said of his father. Switching to the present tense, Mr. Helms added, "He is very selfless."

The explosion, which occurred at about 6:30 Monday morning in an unused part of the mine that had been sealed just last month, shook homes and woke people nearby. But it did not cause extensive damage inside the mine, company officials said.

Some concrete walls used to direct airflow had been knocked down by the force of the blast, but there were no cave-ins or piles of rubble from the explosion, officials said.

The real danger to the miners, officials said, would have come from the persistent high levels of carbon monoxide inside the mine.

A colorless, odorless gas, carbon monoxide impedes the body's ability to carry oxygen to vital organs. It can cause flulike symptoms like headaches and nausea, and in high enough quantities, it can kill a person in 15 minutes. Of particular danger to trapped miners, it can also cause confusion.

By Tuesday evening, monitors showed carbon dioxide readings of more than 300 parts per million in some sections of the mine, more than 10 times the amount considered safe, company officials said.

"The CO2 was the worst thing they could find," said Bruce E. Dial of Pineville, N.C., who worked as a federal mine safety official for more than 20 years.

Miners, after underground explosions or fires, are trained to find pockets of breathable air using special monitors, then barricade themselves in using a plastic-coated fabric known as brattice cloth.

Lewis Wade, a mine safety expert and senior science adviser for the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, said a well-sealed corridor could keep a miner alive for hours. "Explosions are devastating things," Mr. Wade said, "but miners are smart and resilient people."

Federal inspectors fined the Sago mine more than $24,000 for roughly 202 violations in 2005, according to federal records.

The total monetary figure is likely to rise substantially because the federal mine-safety agency has yet to put a dollar figure on some citations.

DOJ_NMG_0007910

The most serious of these citations are 16 "unwarrantable failure orders," which are problems that an operator knows exist but fails to correct.

Thirteen of these orders were issued in the past six months, federal records show.

"Under the Bush administration, the citing of unwarrantable failures has gone down dramatically," said Tony Oppegard, a top federal mine official in the Clinton administration and a former prosecutor of mine-safety violations in Kentucky. "So to see a rash of unwarrantable failures under this administration is a telling sign of a mine with serious safety problems."

Inspectors found dangerous accumulations of coal dust, which can be explosive. Other citations dealt with ventilation and firefighting equipment violations.

Since June, the mine has experienced 15 roof falls or wall collapses, with three causing injuries to miners, according to federal records. That is an unusually high number, Mr. Oppegard said, "and it's indicative of roof-control problems."

Asked about the violations on Tuesday, Mr. Hatfield said the mine's "bad history" had occurred before his company took it over last year, adding that dramatic improvements had been made since then.

The anxiety of the day was heightened by what seemed to be painfully slow progress by the rescue teams, which took the entire day to move 2,000 feet.

But, experts said, the teams had to proceed cautiously, frequently testing the air and repairing the ventilation system, because of an array of dangers. A weakened roof could have caved in, for instance, or trapped methane could have triggered a second explosion.

Dennis O'Dell, administrator of health and safety for the United Mine Workers of America, who was assisting in the search, said hasty rescue efforts had at times led to additional deaths. At the Blue Creek No. 5 Mine in Alabama in 2001, 10 men attempting to rescue trapped miners were killed in a second explosion.

"I know it's tough on families because every minute seems like an hour," Mr. O'Dell said. "It's just something you have to do. Everybody has done as good a job here as I have seen."

In one setback, a robot owned by the federal government became mired in mud inside the mine on Tuesday and was rendered unusable. Officials had hoped that the robot, equipped with lights, an air testing device and a video camera, would reach the trapped miners faster than human teams could.

The cause of the blast remained a mystery. Company officials said that the mine did not have a history of methane gas problems and that air testing conducted before the explosion found no evidence of methane, a highly combustible gas.

The apparent lack of methane led some mining experts to speculate that coal dust, which is highly combustible, caused the explosion. A spark from electrical equipment could ignite coal dust, they said.

Mr. Hatfield said the likelihood of a coal dust explosion seemed low because no work had been done in the mine over the weekend.

The trapped team was the first to enter the mine after the holiday layoff but had not begun work when the explosion occurred, he said. As a result, there would have been little or no coal dust in the air, he said.

Lightning was another possible cause. The explosion happened during a violent thunderstorm, and Mr. O'Dell said there had been incidents in which metal pipes extruding from underground mines had conducted lightning bolts. The bolts then ignited pockets of methane gas, he said.

A Timeline Of Key Events In The Sago Mine Explosion: (AP)

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

A timeline of key events in the Sago Mine explosion:

Jan. 2:

– An early morning explosion traps 13 miners underground, but rescuers cannot enter for nearly 12 hours because dangerous levels of carbon monoxide are being vented.

– Rescue crews finally enter the mine on foot for fear of sparking another explosion.

Advertisements

– The U.S. Mine Safety and Health Administration sends in a rescue robot, but it's abandoned after getting stuck in the mud.

Jan. 3:

– Rescuers keep pushing deeper into the mine shaft.

– A mine executive is "very discouraged" by air quality tests, which show carbon monoxide levels measured 1,300 parts per million, exceeding the maximum safe level of 400 parts per million.

– West Virginia Governor Joe Manchin says it will take a miracle to find the missing miners alive.

– One body is discovered in the mine. The prospects of finding anyone alive appear increasingly bleak with no signs of life.

– Shortly before midnight, family members say they have been told that the other 12 miners are alive, 41 hours after the explosion.

– One miner is in critical condition at a hospital, and was "unconscious but moaning" when he was brought to St. Joseph's Hospital, a doctor says.

Jan 4:

– Three hours after word that 12 miners had survived, the mine company's chief executive officer makes a stunning announcement that news of 12 survivors was wrong. Just one person survived, he says, explaining the wrong information was a miscommunication between rescuers and the command centre overseeing rescue efforts.

– Chaos and fights break out in the church where the families had gathered to wait, says John Groves, whose brother Jerry Groves was trapped in the mine.

Bush Says Nation Praying For W. Va. Miners (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Tuesday the nation was praying for 13 men trapped in a West Virginia coal mine and offered federal help to help bring them out, "hopefully in good condition."

"May God bless those who are trapped below the earth," Bush said from the White House as rescue crews scrambled to reach the miners 31 hours after they were trapped underground.

The miners were trapped early Monday 260 feet below the surface of the Sago Mine, located about 100 miles northeast of Charleston.

The president, speaking during a meeting with U.S. attorneys to seek renewal of the terror-fighting Patriot Act, said he called West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin to offer support.

"I told him that Americans all across our country were praying for the miners who are trapped in the mine there in West Virginia," Bush said. "I told him that I appreciated the great outpouring of compassion from the West Virginia citizens toward those worried family members. I also assured him that the federal government will help the folks in West Virginia any way we can to bring those miners out of that mine, hopefully in good condition."

The Mine Safety and Health Administration had rescue and safety specialists on the scene, set up a mobile command center and brought in a rescue robot able to explore areas of the mine that wouldn't be safe for human rescuers. The robot was abandoned for human searchers after it became bogged down in mud within the mine. Federal officials also monitored gas samples.

Bush was being regularly briefed on the situation, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said earlier Tuesday.

In US Mines, The Safety Record Has Been On An Upswing (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2006

The vigil at a coal mine in Tallmansville, W.Va., where dozens of well-wishers waited hour upon hour for word of 13 miners trapped 260 feet underground, is a scene that has become much more infrequent in coal country - a result of vast improvements in US mine safety.

DOJ_NMG_0007912

For an industry that endured at least 1,000 fatalities a year through the 1930s and '40s, the death toll of 28 in 2004, the latest figure available, underscores the achievement of stricter government oversight and corporate compliance, experts and officials say.

Still, coal miners account for about half of all mining-related fatalities - an indication that the men and women who plumb America's coal seams continue to encounter hazardous, potentially deadly conditions like the explosion that rocked the International Coal Group (ICG) mine in West Virginia on Monday.

In 2003, 16 mining fatalities occurred in underground mining work with a fatality rate of 35.7 per 100,000 workers, according to the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health. Of those, 11 occurred in coal operator mines. Coal contractors had the highest fatality rate, at 212.8 per 100,000 operator employees, the institute reports.

At press time Tuesday, hopes began to sag that the trapped miners would be rescued, after air-quality tests inside the mine showed carbon-monoxide readings triple the maximum safe level. Rescue workers also sent a camera into a hole drilled into the mine, to look for signs of the miners, and planned to move in a camera-equipped robot.

The blast occurred at about 6:40 a.m. Monday, trapping the miners below the surface of the mine, located about 100 miles northeast of Charleston.

By early Tuesday, rescuers had penetrated more than 9,000 feet into the coal mine but returned to the surface before the drilling crew punched into the mine. Officials thought the rescue team should exit in case the drilling caused a buildup of carbon monoxide, said Ben Hatfield, chief executive officer of ICG.

The federal government is helping in the rescue efforts. "We are praying and hoping for the best," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

The Mine Safety and Health Administration (MSHA) has rescue and safety specialists on scene, has set up a command center, and has brought in a rescue robot able to explore areas that wouldn't be safe for human rescuers.

The notion that mining ranks among the most dangerous occupations, in terms of on-the-job fatalities and injuries, may be misguided. "Of the 5,559 total work-related fatalities that occurred in 2003, only 56 (about 1 percent) occurred in coal and mineral mining," according to the National Mining Association website, which used data from the MSHA and the Bureau of Labor Statistics to calculate the number. Mining, the website notes, appears far down the list, behind trade, transportation, and public utilities (25 percent), construction (20 percent), and farming, forestry, and fishing (13 percent).

Coal mine explosions are typically caused by buildups of naturally occurring methane gas. The danger increases in winter, when the barometric pressure can release the odorless, highly flammable gas. The mine had been idle Saturday and Sunday, for the New Year's holiday.

ICG acquired the Sago Mine last March when it bought Anker West Virginia Mining Co., which had been in bankruptcy. The Sago Mine had annual production of about 800,000 tons of coal, the company said.

Federal inspectors cited the mine for 46 alleged violations of federal mine health and safety rules during an 11-week review that ended Dec. 22, according to records.

The more serious alleged violations, resulting in proposed penalties of at least $250 each, involved steps for safeguarding against roof falls, and the mine's plan to control methane and breathable dust. The mine received 208 citations from MSHA during 2005, up from 68 citations in 2004.

Safety at the mine has improved since ICG took over, said Gene Kitts, a company senior vice president. "We think we are operating a safe mine. We have no real clue about what triggered this explosion."

A Mining Disaster (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

THE MERE THOUGHT of being trapped at the bottom of a coal mine is horrible enough to send shivers down most people's backs. But after the explosion that trapped 13 men in a West Virginia coal mine early Monday, an equally chilling story of safety neglect may be emerging as well. According to Ellen Smith, editor of Mine Safety and Health News, the Sago coal mine, where the accident occurred, had an accident rate in 2004 that was three times higher than the national average. That record has since worsened: Last year, the mine's operators received 205 orders and citations for health and safety violations, 96 of which carried a "significant and substantial" risk of death or injury. In 2005 the mine was forced to halt operations 16 times after failing to comply with safety rules. Eight of those citations, which were among the most serious a mine can receive, occurred in the final quarter of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0007913

Mining has never been a pristine or perfectly safe business. But there are mines in this country that operate safely and that receive no health and safety citations at all. At the very least, the safety problems at Sago should have caused officials at the Mine Safety and Health Administration, which is responsible for mine inspections, to take notice. Did they? We may never know. At the moment, a spokesman for the MSHA says it is "hard to say" whether the mine's record was unusual. Ms. Smith says the MSHA, which used to publish the results of its accident investigations, no longer does so. The Bush administration's preference for concealing formerly public information has, it seems, penetrated the mine safety inspection world, too.

Another question worth asking in the wake of this event is whether the culture of the MSHA has changed in the past six years. Once purely an enforcement agency, set up to make sure that mines followed safety regulations, the MSHA has in the past several years formed a series of "partnerships" with mining industry groups. In principle, such partnerships might help make mines safer. In practice, they might have allowed the agency to become too friendly with the businesses it regulates. When Congress comes back to town, we'd like to hear some open discussion about the health of the nation's mine inspections.

Black Gold Or Black Death? (NYT)

By Jeff Goodell

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

IN recent years, one of the toughest turnaround jobs in American industry has been the effort to change the perception of coal from an industrial relic of 19th century to an energy source for the 21st century. The high-water mark of this makeover campaign may well have come last spring, when General Electric began its "ecomagination" advertising campaign touting its new clean coal technology. One ad featured glamorous, scantily clad models (male and female) shoveling coal in a dark mine while Tennessee Ernie Ford's version of "16 Tons," the great song about hard labor and corporate exploitation, played on the soundtrack. Near the end of the ad, a voice announced, "Harnessing the power of coal is looking more beautiful every day."

But there is nothing pretty about coal, as we have been grimly reminded by the plight of the 13 coal miners trapped by a mine collapse near Tallmansville, W.V. The American Lung Association estimates that 24,000 people die prematurely each year from power-plant pollution. In Appalachia, mountaintop removal mining - a method of mining in which the mountain is removed from the coal, rather than the coal removed from the mountain - has flattened some 380,000 acres in the region and destroyed more than 700 miles of streams.

Coal plants generate more than 130 million tons a year of combustion waste - fly ash, bottom ash, scrubber sludge - that is laced with toxic metals like arsenic and mercury and pumped into holding ponds and abandoned mines, where it can sometimes leak into aquifers and drinking water. Most important, coal plants are responsible for nearly 40 percent of the carbon dioxide released in the United States, meaning that if we're going to get a handle on global warming, we'll have to get a handle on coal.

Still, in recent years - thanks in part to skyrocketing natural gas prices, worries about dwindling oil supplies, regulatory rollbacks of the Bush administration - coal has become sexy. And it indeed has many virtues.

Coal is cheap and plentiful. Right now, more than half the electricity generated in America is produced with coal. America is often called "the Saudi Arabia of coal," with enough to last us for 250 years. Improvements in emission controls make new coal plants much cleaner than the old coal burners; 120 of these up-to-date plants are in the works right now. New technology allows coal to be liquefied into diesel, a possible substitute for oil.

There is also a strong cultural connection to the resurgence of coal, particularly in the producing areas: it is a red-state rock, a taking back of America from the silly blue-staters who believed the future would be powered by solar panels and switchgrass. I recently attended a rally for a new coal plant in the Midwest where boosters chanted, "Coal is U.S.A.! Coal is U.S.A.!"

Nothing, however, has been more important to the comeback of coal than the purported safety improvements in mining. The coal industry knows that as much as Americans may love a cheap kilowatt, they are not going to support burning coal if it results in people suffering miserable deaths in Appalachian coal mines. The industry works overtime to suggest that coal mining today has nothing in common with its dark and exploitative past. The old days of breaker boys (children who picked rocks out of the coal) and methane explosions are gone, the coal industry argues, and mining today is safe, well paid and professional.

DOJ_NMG_0007914

Promotional literature published by the National Mining Association and other industry groups usually show miners as clean-faced men in close proximity to high-tech machinery - computer screens, global positioning systems, bright yellow haul trucks. The average salary of a coal miner, the association says, is $50,000 a year. According to one coal industry Web site, working in a coal mine today is as safe as working in a grocery store.

The people in Tallmansville know better. Coal mining remains a dirty and dangerous business, especially in regions of Appalachia where all the easy coal is gone and what's left is increasingly difficult and dangerous to mine. (Coal mining is indeed a fairly safe operation in the big strip mines of Wyoming, where the 70-foot seams of coal lie so close to the surface that, in places, you can practically dig it out with a spoon.)

In parts of West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Kentucky, some mines are so complex and tight the workers call them "dogholes." Working in an underground mine, especially one owned by a small non-union operator in Appalachia, is one of the few jobs in America that is nearly as dangerous as commercial fishing in Alaska.

Not long ago, I spoke with a coal miner who was spending eight hours a day in a coal seam in western Kentucky that was a mere 20 inches high. You can't even turn around in a mine like that, have to mine laying on your belly. I asked him how much he earned. "Not enough to buy a new truck," he told me.

If coal is indeed going to be taken seriously as a fuel source in the 21st century, it's up to federal and state regulators to make sure that even 20-inch dogholes are safe (and they can be, with the proper technology, worker skills and governmental oversight). A good first step would be to reverse the Bush administration's new privacy rules, which have made it tougher for outsiders to obtain federal inspectors' reports. Even better would be to increase fines and other penalties for operators who break the rules. In many cases the penalties for running a dangerous mine - the West Virginia mine had 208 federal citations in 2005, up from 68 in 2004 - amounted to little more than a slap on the wrist.

In the summer of 2002, outside the Quecreek Mine in Pennsylvania, I watched for three days as heroic men rescued nine co-workers who had been buried alive. There was no talk about the Saudi Arabia of coal there, no easy words about energy independence or the economic virtues of burning coal. Like the families who stood vigil in Tallmansville this week, they were people who understood the real price of cheap power.

US Federal Reserve Nearing End Of Tightening Cycle (FT)

By Christopher Swann In Washington

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

US stocks put on a turn of speed in the first trading day of the new year, after the minutes of the Federal Reserve's meeting in December added to confidence that rates were unlikely to rise much further.

The S&P 500 climbed 1.64 per cent, or 20.51 points, to 1,268.8 – its biggest daily gain in points terms since April – and gave a boost to investors after a lacklustre 2005 in which the index rose just 3 per cent.

The minutes of the Fed's December meeting, at which rates rose by a quarter point to 4.25 per cent, confirmed that the US central bank is now close to the end of a tightening cycle that has lasted a year and a half. The Fed has been raising rates in quarter point steps since an historic low of 1 per cent was reached in June 2004.

In December a majority of the Fed's Open Market Committee argued that "the number of additional firming steps required probably would not be large".

The minutes indicate that members of the committee believed that the level of interest rates was now neutral – neither fostering nor constraining economic growth.

"In these circumstances, the committee thought that policy should no longer be characterised as accommodative," the minutes said.

The Fed also sounded more relaxed about the outlook for inflation than in previous meetings, saying intense competition in the US market and subdued pay rises had helped contain price pressures.

DOJ_NMG_0007915

The central bank said the economy had continued to expand at a solid rate at the end of last year, with inflationary pressures remaining subdued. "Overall and core consumer price inflation were projected to move higher in the first half of next year, reflecting the effects of higher energy prices, but then to trend lower as those effects ebb", it said.

The yield of the two-year Treasury bond fell six basis points in response to the minutes, to 4.34 per cent. Financial markets are still braced for a rate rise at this month's meeting, the last to be chaired by Alan Greenspan, outgoing chairman.

Some analysts cautioned that the market reaction was overdone. Marc Chandler, global head of currency strategy at Brown Brothers Harriman, said: "The market was predisposed to read the minutes with a dovish bias and, sure enough, it saw what it wanted to see."

Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital, was also sceptical, commenting that "we are left to debate the meaning of 'not large' today, whereas on December 13 we were trying to quantify 'some'."

But opinion remains divided about the likelihood of a further increase at Ben Bernanke's first meeting as chairman in March. Traders were pricing in a 60 per cent probability that rates would be raised to 4.75 per cent in March, down from an 80 per cent probability at the end of last year, said Ian Mr Morris, US economist at HSBC.

Fed Minutes Indicate Rate Increases Wrapping Up (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve is nearing the end of its 18-month drive to raise interest rates, with most central bank officials saying the number of additional increases needed to tame inflation "probably would not be large," according to minutes of a Dec. 13 meeting released Tuesday.

Members of the Fed's policymaking Open Market Committee differed on just how much further tightening was needed, saying the outlook was "becoming considerably less certain" and that future rate moves were more dependent on strength of economic data.

Though economists have widely predicted that the Fed will soon wrap up its campaign, the minutes rallied the stock and bond markets. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 129.91 points to 10,847.41.

"We needed confirmation just to make sure we were on the right page," says Kim Rupert of Action Economics. "We think there are several more (increases) ahead, although we do think they might pause after" the Jan. 31 meeting.

The Fed has been raising interest rates in quarter-point increments since June 2004 to fend off harmful inflation. Short-term rates, which were a low 1% in mid-2004, are now 4.25%.

Economists, like Fed officials, differ on when the central bank will decide that rates are at a neutral level that neither impedes nor over-stimulates growth. Most expect the Fed to raise rates by a quarter point on Jan. 31, which will also be retiring Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan's last day in office.

White House economic adviser Ben Bernanke has been nominated to succeed Greenspan.

Some forecasters, such as Global Insight, predict another quarter-point increase in March.

The minutes indicate that some Fed members already consider interest rates within a broad range of the level needed to keep the economy operating close to potential.

According to the minutes, Fed economists expect the economy to slow slightly in 2006 from the strong pace of 2005. Still, output will be near potential the next two years, and the inflation rate should rise in the first half of 2006, due to energy prices, before ebbing again.

Hurricane-related rebuilding will boost the economy in the near term, but that will be muted by rising interest rates and a slowing housing market. At the same time, Fed officials worry that given strong growth and rising factory utilization, inflation could rise if the central bank is not responsive.

David Kelly of Putnam Investments expects a quarter-point move at the Jan. 31 meeting and hopes the Fed stops there. He says the risks of slower growth already outweigh those of higher inflation.

The economy grew at a 4.1% annual rate in the third quarter. A report Tuesday said manufacturing expanded more slowly last month.

DOJ_NMG_0007916

Views On Rates Differ Within Fed (WP)

By Jeannine Aversa

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

Federal Reserve policymakers differed last month on how much higher interest rates would need to rise to keep the economy and inflation on an even keel, but most believed the end of the nearly two-year rate-hike campaign probably wasn't far off.

Minutes of the Fed's closed-door meeting on Dec. 13, released yesterday, provided insight into the thinking of Fed policymakers. At that meeting, Fed officials made their most extensive recent changes in the wording of the central bank's policy statement, which economists and market analysts parse for clues about future rate moves.

"Views differed on how much future tightening might be required," the minutes said, explaining why changes were made to the Fed's policy statement released after the December meeting.

One of the most important changes was that the Fed dropped language -- contained in previous statements -- that described interest rates as being too low, or accommodative. Economists viewed that move as a sign the Fed was winding down its rate-raising campaign.

Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan and his colleagues decided at the December meeting to boost rates for the 13th time since June 2004 to prevent inflation from flaring up. They noted that the economy was growing solidly and that the labor market had gotten stronger, forces that could lead to a pickup in inflation.

"Although future action would depend on the incoming data, this characterization of the outlook for policy was seen by most members as indicating that, given the information now in hand, the number of additional firming steps required probably would not be large," the minutes stated.

On Wall Street, stocks were buoyed by the Fed's assessment. The Dow Jones industrials surged 129.91 points to close at 10,847.41.

The Fed's action in December left its key short-term rate, called the federal funds rate, at 4.25 percent, the highest in 4 1/2 years. The funds rate is the interest that banks charge each other on overnight loans and is the Fed's main tool to influence economic activity.

The rate increase was part of an 18-month process in which the Fed lifted rates from extraordinary low levels to more normal ones. Before the central bank began its rate-raising campaign, the funds rate had been sliced to 1 percent, a 46-year low, in an effort to help revive the economy after the 2001 recession, terrorist attacks and accounting scandals rocked Wall Street.

Throughout the Fed's rate-raising cycle, it had pledged in its policy statement to boost rates at a "measured" pace. Economists came to view that as quarter-percentage-point increments. The Fed's 13 rate increases thus far have all been quarter-point hikes.

At the December meeting, some members thought the word "measured" was no longer necessary, the minutes revealed. However, the Fed's policy statement released at the time kept that word.

"Its retention for this meeting was seen as potentially useful to preclude a possible misinterpretation" by financial markets that the Fed might need to act more aggressively in boosting rates, the minutes said.

Many economists predict the Fed will bump up rates again at the next meeting, on Jan 31. That's the first meeting of 2006 and the last before Greenspan retires that day after 18-plus years at the helm of the Fed.

Some analysts believe another rate increase will come at the following meeting on March 28, which would mark the first one presided over by Ben S. Bernanke, who was nominated last year to replace Greenspan as Fed chairman.

On the housing market, Fed policymakers at the December meeting discussed "tentative signs that activity was beginning to slow," the minutes said. Thus far, housing barometers don't suggest "a significant weakening" in housing activity, the minutes said.

Policymakers also said the economy had bounced back from the Gulf Coast hurricanes. Hurricane-related rebuilding would boost economic activity, but this would be tempered by higher interest rates and subdued spending by consumers who may feel less wealthy as the housing market moderates, the minutes said.

DOJ_NMG_0007917

Fed Suggests It's Close To Ending Run Of Rate Rises (WSJ)

By Greg Ip, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials are less worried about inflation and thus may raise interest rates just one or two more times in the next few months, minutes of their December meeting suggest.

"The number of additional [rate increases] required probably would not be large," according to a summary of the Dec. 13 meeting, released yesterday, with the customary three-week lag. (Text of the minutes1)

More clearly than the statement issued just after the meeting, the minutes signal that the Fed is nearing the end of a campaign that has raised the target for the federal-funds rate -- charged on overnight loans between banks -- to 4.25% from a 46-year low of 1% in June 2004, in 13 quarter-percentage-point steps.

The likelihood that the Fed is nearing an end to its tightening was reinforced yesterday by weaker-than-expected economic data. An index of manufacturing activity, based on a survey of factory purchasing managers, slipped in December, and construction spending grew less than expected in November as home-renovation outlays fell. In addition, some economists estimate that consumer spending was flat in the fourth quarter for the first time since 1991.

The prospect of an end to rate increases sent the Dow Jones Industrial Average soaring 129.91 points, or 1.21%, to 10847.41, its biggest point and percentage gain since late October. Bonds finished mixed, with the yield declining on two-year Treasurys, which are sensitive to expectations on Fed policy. The dollar lost ground, meanwhile, posting its biggest decline against the euro in three months.

The minutes said Fed officials' inflation concerns had "eased somewhat" since the previous meeting Nov. 1. They noted that slowing housing-price gains would restrain consumer spending, and that officials had to be "mindful of the lags in the effect" of past rate increases on the economy. These factors all weigh in favor of the Fed halting its policy-tightening soon.

To be sure, some factors are pushing in the other direction. The minutes cite concerns that higher energy prices could yet push underlying inflation higher, that business spending had accelerated, and that the "sustained period" of low interest rates may have boosted home prices and raised the risk of an overheating economy. "Views differed on how much further" rates might have to rise, the minutes cautioned.

Given these conflicting forces, Fed officials may further weaken their verbal commitment to future rate actions in the statement issued after their meeting Jan. 31, the last to be led by Chairman Alan Greenspan. Some Fed officials think that would give the incoming chairman, Ben Bernanke, more freedom to plot the policy he thinks best -- whether to stop raising rates immediately or to continue raising them at his first Fed meeting on March 28.

On Dec. 13, the Fed altered two key parts of its post-meeting statement. It abandoned the assertion that interest rates were "accommodative," or below a level that neither stimulates nor restrains growth. And instead of saying rates would continue to rise at "a pace that is likely to be measured," it said instead, "some further measured policy firming is likely to be needed."

Economists at the time generally saw the retention of the word "measured" as a reaffirmation of plans to keep raising rates at a quarter point per meeting. But Fed officials, according to the meeting minutes and in sentiments expressed since, actually meant to convey less certainty about further rate increases. They retained the word "measured" to prevent speculation that a half-percentage-point increase might be in the cards, and eliminated the word "pace" because they thought the word might imply two or more rate increases.

Yesterday's minutes and weaker economic data prompted some economists to reconsider their rate views. Peter Hooper, chief U.S. economist at Deutsche Bank, still expects the federal-funds rate to rise to 5% by spring, but he said the minutes put that forecast "at risk." Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs, is also sticking to a forecast of 5% by mid-2006. But, Mr. Hatzius said the weak manufacturing report as well as Fed officials' apparent lack of worry about inflation "have increased the downside risk to our forecast a bit. It certainly could be 4.75%, although stopping at 4.5% would still require a significantly weaker set of numbers than we are expecting."

In financial futures markets, expectations of Fed actions have changed very little since early December. Contracts based on the federal-funds rate reflect expectations that it will rise to 4.5% on Jan. 31 and put about 50% odds on a move to 4.75% on March 28, with no increases deemed likely thereafter.

DOJ_NMG_0007918

Fed officials probably will tweak their post-meeting statement again on Jan. 31. Since most officials agree inflation is more likely to rise than fall and the inflation rate is near the high end of their "comfort zone," they may still want to signal a bias to tighter credit conditions. But because their actions will depend more on new economic data than in the past year and half, they may soften the commitment to raise rates further. For example, instead of saying further increases are "likely to be needed," the statement could say "may be needed."

The Institute for Supply Management, a group representing corporate purchasing managers, said yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity dropped to 54.2 in December from 58.1 in November and 59.1 in October. Readings above 50 indicate the manufacturing sector is expanding, and all parts of the index continue to exceed their 20-year averages.

Still, "the pace of growth has decelerated," Daniel J. Meckstroth, chief economist for the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI, said. "Hurricanes Katrina and Rita disrupted transportation networks and supply chains in manufacturing at a time when inventories were already lean, setting off a scramble for materials in September, October and into November. By year end, manufacturers got caught up."

The ISM's new-orders index, a gauge of future manufacturing activity, fell to 55.5 in December, down from 59.8 in November, and the production index, which measures output, slipped to 57 from 60.6 in November. New orders from other countries, as measured by ISM's export index, slid to 53.3 last month, down from 59.2 in November.

Manufacturers, however, got some relief from elevated prices for raw materials, including energy. The prices index fell to 63 from 74 in November and 84 in October. Still, manufacturers remain wary about energy prices, said Norbert Ore, Georgia-Pacific Corp.'s procurement director, who oversees the ISM survey. Several managers, he said, indicated they plan to buy energy-saving equipment and materials.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Department said construction spending grew 0.2% in November to a seasonally adjusted $1.146 trillion annual rate after rising 0.8% in October.

Private-sector construction grew 0.2%, fueled primarily by 0.5% increase in non-residential construction while residential construction slipped 0.1%. Government construction increased 0.3%, led by increases in educational and highway spending.

--Joi Preciphs contributed to this article.

Write to Greg Ip at greg.ip@wsj.com2

Fed's Notes Offer Hope Of A Brake On Rates (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - The Federal Reserve has set the stage for ending its 18-month campaign of raising interest rates, but officials signaled on Tuesday that they are entering a new period of uncertainty at the same time that Alan Greenspan prepares to retire as Fed chairman.

According to minutes released Tuesday from the Fed policy committee's meeting in December, officials agreed that they would probably have to push rates only a little higher before stopping.

"Given the information now in hand, the number of additional firming steps required probably would not be large," the summary said, ascribing that view to "most members" of the rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee.

On Wall Street, stock prices increased sharply in response. Major indexes rose more than 1 percent, with the Dow Jones industrial average up 129.91 points, or 1.2 percent, its largest one-day gain in a month.

The minutes also suggested, though, that investors might have gotten ahead of themselves.

For more than two years, the Fed has given investors explicit guidance about future rate decisions, most recently as it gradually pushed up interest rates from the lows of early 2004. But Fed committee members made clear at the December meeting that they were increasingly uncertain about both the potential course of the economy and the best way to communicate their intentions.

"Views differed on how much further tightening would be required," according to the minutes. "Members thought the policy outlook was becoming considerably less certain and that policy decisions going forward would depend to an increased extent on the implications of incoming economic data."

DOJ_NMG_0007919

The ambiguity struck Peter Kretzmer, senior economist at Bank of America. "The markets really seized on the idea they were closer," he said, referring to an end of rate increases, "but when one thinks about it, they also highlighted just as clearly that there's uncertainty. What they really highlighted is that what they do will depend more on the data."

The summary of last month's deliberations provided a wealth of new insights as the Fed prepares for the transition from Mr. Greenspan to Ben S. Bernanke, President Bush's nominee to be the next Fed chairman.

The meeting minutes confirmed that Fed officials became slightly less worried about inflation pressure, even though they expected high energy prices to push overall inflation somewhat higher for a while.

"Participants indicated that their concerns about near-term inflation pressures had eased somewhat," the minutes said. Policy makers said prices were being held in check by competition from foreign producers.

They also noted that labor costs had risen only moderately, despite strong economic growth. And they drew comfort from findings that the spike in oil prices last summer and fall had only a "muted" impact on consumer prices.

But Fed officials made it clear that they were divided about when to stop raising interest rates. They also labored mightily to preserve maneuvering room, warning that decisions would be heavily influenced by coming economic data.

"Views differed on how much further tightening would be required," according to the minutes. "Members thought the policy outlook was becoming considerably less certain and that policy decisions going forward would depend to an increased extent on the implications of incoming economic data."

Fed officials seemed to be warning that they might stop providing the hints on future policy decisions that they had been giving over the last two years, with phrases like a "measured" pace of rate increases.

Mr. Greenspan, who is to retire on Jan. 31 after 18 years at the helm of the Federal Reserve, has long warned that the Fed will not always tip its hand on future policy.

Mr. Bernanke, who is expected to win easy Senate approval as his successor, has argued for years that the central bank needs to be more "transparent." But he has not said that he favors advance guidance as a matter of principle.

Many analysts agree that the last two years have been unusually predictable, and that the Fed is now entering a new stage of uncertainty.

Robert DiClemente, chief United States economist at Citigroup, said: "It seems to me the consensus is less confident, and I sense that not only in the committee's own discussion but in the staff's backpedaling a bit on the outlook. It's indicative how people are more divided, and I think their willingness to guide market expectation has been diminished by that."

Two major factors made it much easier for Mr. Greenspan to offer guidance on the Fed's intentions over the last two years.

The first was that inflation remained low even while job creation and economic growth strengthened. That allowed the Fed to adjust policy gradually, without surprises.

The other was that the Fed had reduced interest rates far below normal from 2001 to 2004 in hope of invigorating a stalling economy. But by 2004, policy makers largely agreed that rates needed to be brought back to more usual levels.

Indeed, Mr. Greenspan told lawmakers early in 2004 that returning rates to normal, without disruption, would be his biggest policy challenge. "It's not a gimme putt," he remarked, borrowing a golf metaphor.

With the benchmark short-term interest rate, the Federal funds rate on overnight loans between banks, now at 4.25 percent, four times the level just 18 months ago, Fed officials are evidently getting close to at least a pause.

Based on prices for federal funds futures, investors are betting that the rate will climb to 4.5 percent at the next Fed policy meeting on Jan. 31, but then very little above that.

Still, several analysts said that investors might have read too much into the Fed's readiness for a pause, and predicted that the federal funds rate would reach 4.75 percent or even 5 percent this year.

Ian Shepherdson, chief United States economist at High Frequency Economics in Valhalla, N.Y., said the Fed was keeping its options open.

In a note to clients on Tuesday, Mr. Shepherdson wrote: "Clearly, there is a debate as to how much further tightening will be necessary. Still, this does not read like a Fed where everyone is looking for a reason to stop."

Stocks Start New Year With A Bang Dow, S& P, Nasdaq See Significant Gains (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0007920

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, January 4, 2006

Investors didn't waste any time putting a tepid 2005 behind them and celebrating the new year Tuesday by sending stocks sharply higher on 2006's first day of trading.

All three major stock indexes gained more than 1% after notes released from the Federal Reserve's last meeting indicated its 11/2-year-long campaign boosting interest rates might be near an end.

While a rally is always welcome on Wall Street, it's even more beloved in January. Market historians attach significance to the first trading days of the year, claiming they can predict how stocks will perform the rest of the year.

Even taken by itself, Tuesday's rally was a source of good cheer:

•The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index gained 38 points, or 1.7%, making it the best performer of all the major indexes. It was the index's biggest one-day percentage gain since July 8.

•The Dow Jones industrials, which fell 0.6% in 2005, sprang up 130 points, or 1.2%, to 10,847. Had that rally occurred a session earlier, the Dow would have ended 2005 up 0.6%.

•The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 21 points, or 1.6%, to 1269, its biggest percentage gain since Oct. 28. It was the first time in more than a month that all three indexes gained 1% or more the same day.

While many investors were hoping for a strong finish to 2005, they were pleased to see the rally, albeit late. “I'm pretty surprised this didn't happen sooner,” says Michelle Clayman, managing partner at New Amsterdam Partners.

Investors hope the rally can hang on for at least another four trading days due to the January “early warning system.” The last 35 times the S&P 500 has gained in its first five days, the market has ended the year higher 30 times, with an average gain of 13.7%, says the 2006 Stock Trader's Almanac.

But it will take more than one good day to soothe investors.

Most investors, especially after seeing the Fed's notes, are assuming there are only one or two more increases in short-term rates coming, says David Joy, strategist at RiverSource Investments. But Joy fears inflation could heat up and force the Fed to move more aggressively. “It's too early to say inflation is absolutely not a problem,” he says.

Al Goldman, strategist at A.G. Edwards, cautions investors from getting fixated on January, because a lot can happen the rest of the year. For instance, in 2005, the Nasdaq fell the first trading day of the year and didn't make it back above its first-day close until July 14.

“Would I rather have an up early January? You bet,” Goldman says. But “you can't take it to the bank.”

Dow Zooms Up 130 Points (WT)

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Wall Street had a bullish start to the new year yesterday, with the Dow Jones Industrial Average surging nearly 130 points after the Federal Reserve signaled a willingness to stop its campaign of interest rate increases in the near future.

In minutes from the Federal Reserve's Dec. 13 meeting, policy makers disagreed on exactly when to stop the policy of raising rates in quarter-percentage-point increments, but the Open Market Committee members did agree that an end was coming soon. The nation's benchmark rate stands at 4.25 percent, the result of quarter percentage point rises over the past 13 meetings dating back to June 2004.

Investors ended 2005 with the fear that the Fed would go too far in raising rates, choking off economic growth in its effort to stem inflation. That concern had kept stocks volatile for much of the year and stymied Wall Street's typical year-end rally. But the news of a possible policy shift was greeted with enthusiastic buying yesterday.

"Given the rise we saw, it shows you the importance of interest rates and what the Fed thinks," said Jay Suskind, head trader at Ryan Beck & Co. "This gives us hope that the Fed will be sensitive to the economy and we can get back to that nice 'Goldilocks' economy where growth is just right."

The Dow rose 129.91, or 1.21 percent, to 10,847.41.

DOJ_NMG_0007921

Broader stock indicators also advanced sharply. The Standard & Poor's 500 Index added 20.51, or 1.64 percent, to 1,268.80, and the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 38.42, or 1.74 percent, to 2,243.74.

Bonds moved higher, with the yield on the 10-year Treasury note falling to 4.37 percent from 4.40 percent late Friday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices rose sharply.

The Fed minutes helped stocks overcome a number of hurdles in early trading, including a sharp jump in energy prices prompted by wintry weather in the Northeast. A barrel of light crude settled at $63.14, up $2.06, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Wall Street remained concerned that the economy was already slowing after a pair of economic reports pointed to slowdowns in manufacturing and the red-hot housing market. The Institute for Supply Management's manufacturing index fell to 54.2 in December, less than the 57.5 reading expected by economists and off from 58.1 in November. In addition, the Commerce Department said construction spending rose 0.2 percent in November, far less than 0.7 percent gain expected.

Stocks also were weighed down in early trading because of negative news from a pair of Dow industrials. Wal-Mart Stores Inc. lost 57 cents to $46.23 as the retailer said its holiday sales will only approach the low end of its previous forecasts despite deep discounts used to lure buyers into the stores.

Fellow Dow component General Motors Corp. suffered after Banc of America Securities lowered its price target for the automaker to $13 per share from $16 per share, citing the likelihood of lower-than-expected savings on health care costs. Shares of the struggling automaker dropped 52 cents to $18.90.

The negative economic data and Dow pressures made the sharp rise in late trading even more surprising, said Chris Johnson, manager of quantitative analysis at Schaeffer's Investment Research in Cincinnati, who questioned whether the market's thirst for gains, unfulfilled in December, fueled some over-exuberance.

"This is definitely a nice bounce here today, but there are a lot of stocks that have no reason to rally that have rallied," Mr. Johnson said. "I hope it sticks, but I'm going watch cautiously here over the next couple of days."

In other action, Poultry producer Pilgrim's Pride Corp. fell to a new 52-week low after the company slashed its first-quarter profit forecasts in response to lower prices in the United States and disappointing sales in Mexico. Pilgrim's Pride tumbled $7.80, or 24 percent, to $25.36.

Walgreen Co. rose $1.13 to $45.39 as the drugstore chain said higher generic drug sales helped push profits up 5 percent in the first quarter. The company beat Wall Street profit forecasts by a penny per share.

Fed Minutes Give Stocks Life (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

Stocks rallied Tuesday afternoon after minutes from the Federal Reserve's December meeting suggested that the end of the central bank's 18-month campaign to raise interest rates will happen sooner rather than later.

A year earlier, it was almost the exact opposite on Wall Street: Fed minutes suggested rate increases would continue far into 2005, and the Dow Jones Industrial Average slumped 98.65 points in heavy trading. That set the tone for stocks for the rest of the month and presaged a flat market for 2005, as the Fed fulfilled its promise and boosted rates by eight more times to 4.25%.

Now investors are hoping that, just like last year, early January trading will help set the tone for 2006.

FED FUEL

Stocks shot higher Tuesday after the Fed released minutes at 2 p.m. Eastern

Dow industrials

Nasdaq composite

The Dow industrials, limp before the release of the minutes, surged 129.91 points, or 1.21%, to 10847.41. Exxon Mobil jumped 4.1% amid a big advance by crude-oil prices. But financial stocks such as American Express and Citigroup, which would benefit from an end to the rate increases, also rallied.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index popped 20.51, or 1.64%, to 1268.80, helped by the rally in financials, which make up more than 20% of the index. Technology stocks, which benefit from low rates as consumers and companies spend more on new gadgets, led Tuesday's advance. The Nasdaq Composite Index, heavy with tech stocks, rocketed 38.42 points, or 1.74%, to 2243.74. Microsoft gained 2.6% and Intel rose 2.4%, also propping up the Dow average.

DOJ_NMG_0007922

The dollar fell sharply against the euro and the yen, since the greenback usually benefits from higher interest rates.

Policy makers at the December meeting noted that inflationary pressures had "eased somewhat" since November and said "the number of additional firming steps required probably would not be large," the minutes say, though future actions are dependent on "incoming data." That raised hopes that the Fed, which boosted short-term rates by a quarter-point for the 13th-consecutive time last month, has only one more increase on tap. On Jan. 31, policy makers meet again in what will be the final meeting chaired by Alan Greenspan.

The Fed is broadly expected to nudge rates higher once again by a quarter-percentage point. Fed-funds futures contracts, bets on future moves by policy makers, reflected hopes that the increase will be the last. As of last Friday, the contracts priced in a 60% chance that rates would go to 4.75%. After the release of the minutes, those odds had fallen to 48%.

"Maybe it's only one and done for the Fed," said Ethan Harris, an economist at Lehman Brothers. Even if the Fed does raise rates more than once, he added, there is a "sense of relief that the end of the tunnel is in sight."

The market had a topsy-turvy start: Stocks opened higher in a rush of new-year enthusiasm that was quickly stamped out by reports on manufacturing activity and construction spending that failed to match Wall Street's expectations.

Commodities, which surged in 2005 amid rising demand from emerging economies such as China and India, continued their winning ways in 2006. Crude-oil prices, up 40% last year, rose $2.10 to $63.14 on the New York Mercantile Exchange following a weekend dispute between Russia and the Ukraine over natural-gas deliveries10. Comex gold futures rose $13.60 to $532.50 a troy ounce on the Nymex following an 18% rise last year.

Investors are keeping a close watch on stocks in the first few days of January, which often serve as guideposts for how the market will do during the rest of the year. According to the Stock Traders Almanac, the last 35 times the first five days of January have been positive on the S&P 500, the index posted full-year gains 86% of those times. The last 20 years the index has been negative during the first five days, it has posted a loss for the year half of those times.

Traders also have their eye on the pesky yield curve -- the difference between short- and long-term interest rates -- which hurt stocks in the closing days of 2005. Short-term rates had moved higher than long-term rates, traditionally a sign of trouble for the economy. Early Tuesday, the curve was slightly "inverted," with short-term rates higher than long-term rates. But the curve returned to normal after the release of the Fed's minutes amid hopes that rates at the short side of the curve won't go much higher.

In major market action:

Stocks rose11. On the Big Board, where 1.8 billion shares traded, 2,617 stocks rose and 812 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2 billion shares traded, 1,908 rose and 1,206 declined.

Bonds advanced12. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note gained 5/32 point, or $1.56 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.375% Tuesday. The 30-year bond fell 11/32 to yield 4.560%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar fell.13 It traded at 116.23 yen, off from 117.92 yen late Friday, while the euro rose to $1.2014 from $1.1826.

Capital-Spending Plays May Finally Pay Off (WSJ)

By Gregory Zuckerman

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

After a long lull, there are signs that companies are set to boost spending faster this year. The change could benefit many corporations, including Oracle Corp., Halliburton Co., Schlumberger Ltd. and Washington Group International Inc.

Capital expenditures, which include all kinds of spending that enhance a business's long-term prospects, such as buying or upgrading buildings or equipment, have been growing at a rate of about 11% in the U.S. for more than a year, though that has been edging up a bit lately.

But there are some signs that the spending is starting to rise faster, at least among larger, public companies. Companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index increased their spending on capital expenditures during the third quarter of 2005 by 24%, compared with the same period in 2004, according to Thomson Financial, which tracks these figures. That is quite a change.

DOJ_NMG_0007923

After a surge in the late-1990s, capital expenditures for these larger companies declined on a year-over-year basis between the third quarter of 2001 and the fourth quarter of 2003, and have averaged about a 9% increase each quarter subsequently, according to Thomson.

A number of analysts expect a jump in this kind of spending in the next year. That is in part because U.S. companies are sitting on a record pile of cash, and many have pared their debt, giving them ample funds to boost spending. While many have used that largess to increase share buybacks, dividends and acquisitions, a jump in capital expenditures could be in store for 2006, some say, as the recovery grows long in the tooth and companies deal with capacity strains in their businesses.

"A lot of industries are hitting points where there's not a lot of existing capacity to meet demand," says Greg Jensen, co-chief investment officer at Bridgewater Associates, a money-management firm in Westport, Conn., with more than $140 billion in assets. "To meet demand, more companies will have to invest more."

To be sure, some investors have been anticipating a surge in corporate spending for some time, but the results have been largely underwhelming. Some caution that with interest rates going up and more companies forced to shore up pension plans, there may be more disappointment ahead for business spending. But a lot of the increased spending may take place in areas with higher growth prospects, such as in Asia, where manufacturers continue to move operations.

And if stock prices stay down, it will probably be more attractive for companies to repurchase shares -- or acquire competitors -- rather than spend more on so-called organic growth.

"We continue to believe [mergers and acquisitions] will be the preferred use of cash in 2006, especially at current valuation levels," says Jason Trennert, chief investment strategist at ISI Group Inc., a New York research firm. "But increases in cap-ex could also be a bigger part of the program than we originally thought."

The safest bets for beneficiaries of a spending increase: businesses catering to industries that saw windfall profits in 2005, such as the energy sector. Some analysts point to stocks such as Halliburton, Schlumberger and Ameron International Corp. as likely beneficiaries of spending from energy companies.

Some analysts, such as Tobias Levkovich of Citigroup Inc., urge investors to focus on technology companies such as Oracle, Intel Corp., International Business Machines Corp. and Microsoft Corp. They predict that more companies will increase their spending on software and other tech areas, which can improve productivity.

Many of these large tech stocks already are quite inexpensive, providing investors with a margin of safety in case the expected jump in capital expenditures fails to materialize. Oracle, for example, is expected to see earnings rise a strong 18% to 79 cents a share for its fiscal year ending May 2006, but trades just a tad above the overall market's multiple of earnings. Oracle's balance sheet sports $2.3 billion more cash than debt.

A number of hedge funds have been buying up shares of Washington Group International, the construction and engineering company that saw revenue from mining projects jump more than 70% in the third quarter of 2005, compared with 2004's third quarter. That figure should keep rising amid the commodity boom.

Washington Group trades at about 21 times next year's expected earnings. That is a reasonable premium above the 14.5 price-earnings multiple of the S&P 500, considering analysts expect the company's profits to jump 28% to $2.52 a share in 2006 from $1.97 in 2005. The stock trades at less than two times its book value, an inexpensive price, and has a pristine balance sheet with no debt.

With Rosy Predictions, Pundits Missing 2006's Warning Signs (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

The columnist who tries to predict the future of the economy or the financial markets is a fool -- but no more so than the army of forecasters, money managers and economic policymakers who have been doing just that as part of the annual New Year ritual.

The consensus view, in case you've been on a beach reading Dan Silva spy novels these past two weeks and missed it, is that everything is going to be peachy-keen in 2006. Economic growth will slow only modestly from last year's unsustainable spurt; inflation will remain in check; the air will be let out gradually from the real-estate bubble; energy prices won't get any higher and probably will retreat a bit; the transition at the Fed will be seamless; the trade and budget deficits will shrink; the dollar may drift down, but only a bit; and stocks will post respectable gains.

DOJ_NMG_0007924

Oh, and yes, purchases of new golf equipment will trim three strokes from your handicap.

Okay, so last year did turn out better than we worrywarts would have imagined. The economy's ability to withstand energy-price spikes, hurricanes and the Republican political meltdown was truly impressive. And yesterday's New Year rally on Wall Street demonstrated the widespread desire to believe in macroeconomic magic.

But reduce it to its bare essentials, and the story of 2005 was that oil producers proved just as willing to lend us the money to buy oil that we otherwise could not afford as the Japanese and Chinese have been to lend us the money to buy cars, jeans and flat-screen TVs. The arrival of this newest credit card from the Middle East may have allowed us to live above our means for yet another year. But let's not fall into the trap of confusing that with long-term economic health.

While the signals coming from the economic pundocracy may be solid green, the ones coming recently from the marketplace are flashing yellow. A middling Christmas season for retailers. A bicoastal housing boom that has already begun to abate, with an initial 10 to 15 percent drop in prices from speculative highs. A stock market that couldn't sustain a year-end rally despite record profits. A bond-market yield curve that makes it no more expensive to borrow money at a fixed rate for 30 years as for one year.

Other warning signs: A corporate sector unable to find a more profitable use for its record retained earnings than buying up its own stock or overpaying for questionable acquisitions. Hedge funds so flush with cash that they are lending money into a commercial real estate bubble, bidding up the price of gold and financing hostile takeovers. Pay packages for corporate executives and investment bankers up 30 percent in a year in which investors were lucky to eke out a 3 percent gain.

This is not to argue the economy is hurtling toward a crackup. The strength of the economy over the past year -- indeed, over the past 23 years, during which there have been but two relatively shallow recessions -- speaks eloquently of the resilience that comes with the globalization of trade and capital flows.

At the same time, I have a hard time squaring so many disquieting realities with a consensus forecast that has the economy gliding into some magical macroeconomic equilibrium.

A more likely scenario, it seems to me, is a 2006 in which the economic chickens finally come home to roost. Annual growth rates will fall from their current 3.7 percent to somewhere below 2 percent before the final quarter as government deficits are trimmed and households stop spending down their home equity. Inflation will reach 3.5 percent as key workers finally demand their fair share of productivity gains, health care and commodity prices continue to rise, higher energy costs work their way into the economy, and import prices spike in response to another steep drop in the value of the dollar. As economic growth slows, stocks will continue to drift sideways, snuffing out a nascent boom in corporate capital expenditures. Meanwhile, the long bull market in bonds will finally end as interest rates rise -- the result of heightened inflation expectations, continued monetary tightening by the Fed and a newfound reluctance of foreigners to invest their trade surpluses in dollar-denominated Treasury bonds.

The one likely bright spot in this scenario is the export sector, both manufacturing and service, which will benefit from a weaker dollar, continued robust growth in China, India, Eastern Europe and Latin America, and a revived Japanese economy.

At the same time, additional risks include excessive lending to developing countries, a restructuring of the U.S. auto industry, a hit to corporate profits as a result of tighter pension rules and a banking crisis triggered by a collapse of several highly leveraged hedge funds. All of these are risks that Washington policymakers could address but in an hotly-contested election year probably won't.

Will things play out exactly this way? Surely not. But if history is any guide, the odds in favor of it are no worse, and probably a bit better, than the remarkably rosy scenario embraced by Washington and Wall Street.

Waiting For A Soft Landing (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0007925

At year's end I usually scan a stack of economic reports to see what lies ahead. Well, folks, according to most forecasts, we're headed for a swell year -- though a boring one. Typical is the forecast from the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development in Paris. In 2006 the U.S. economy should grow 3.5 percent (about the same as in 2005), it says. Unemployment drops from today's 5 percent to 4.8 percent. Inflation remains tame, at 2.5 percent. The world economy also does well; international trade expands 9 percent.

All this good news is, of course, bad for the news business. The sunny predictions suggest two familiar economic catchphrases: "soft landing" and "Goldilocks economy." The Federal Reserve stops raising interest rates before it causes a recession; that's the soft landing. Economic growth is then fast enough to keep unemployment low and not so fast as to trigger higher inflation; that's the Goldilocks economy, not too hot or too cold.

Could anything darken the outlook? Here are five candidates:

Housing goes bust. Higher mortgage rates have already dampened demand and prices. From 5.6 percent in June, rates on 30-year fixed mortgages have increased to 6.3 percent. They may reach 6.7 percent by year-end 2006, says Orawin Velz of the Mortgage Bankers Association. A "bust" would involve sinking prices after some big gains: about 25 percent over the past two years. That could depress consumer confidence and spending. If rates on adjustable-rate mortgages (more than half of new loans in 2004) rose sharply, more homeowners might miss monthly payments. But most forecasts aren't glum. For 2006 the mortgage bankers expect average housing prices to rise 6 percent, almost equaling the increase in personal income.

The dollar "crashes." In 2005 the U.S. trade deficit was $712 billion, estimates Moody's Economy.com. That's up from $624 billion in 2004. The willingness of foreigners -- including central banks in China and elsewhere -- to invest their surplus dollars in American stocks and bonds raises U.S. share prices and reduces U.S. interest rates. A dollar sell-off could do the opposite, hurting housing (above) and consumer spending. Though plausible, similar warnings in the past were never borne out.

General Motors files for bankruptcy. Bankrupt Delphi -- GM's biggest parts supplier -- and the United Auto Workers are negotiating tensely over Delphi's demands for deep wage and benefit cuts. If the UAW were to strike, GM might also shut down and suffer massive losses. A four-month strike could cost GM $20 billion, estimates Jonathan Steinmetz of Morgan Stanley. GM would still have to pay workers and outstanding supplier bills. GM itself might file for bankruptcy. Because everyone -- GM, Delphi and the UAW -- has so much to lose, Steinmetz doubts a doomsday outcome. Delphi, the UAW and GM will settle.

Oil jumps to $85 a barrel. Energy economist Philip K. Verleger Jr. thinks prices could rise up to 25 percent from 2005's peaks, driven partly by a scramble for low-sulfur oil to meet stiffer U.S. air pollution rules for cars and trucks. Supply disruptions or refinery outages could also create scarcities. Still, the U.S. Energy Information Administration predicts steady prices of $63 a barrel for West Texas Intermediate crude -- roughly even with the second half of 2005. Nariman Behravesh of Global Insight sees $57 WTI by the year-end.

The "yield curve" of interest rates "inverts." An inversion means that short-term interest rates (say, on three-month Treasury bills) exceed longer-term interest rates (say, on 10-year Treasury bonds). Usually, short-term rates are lower, because the risk of lending for lengthier periods is greater. Since 1965 interest-rate inversions have occurred seven times -- and recessions have followed in five, notes Bill Dudley of Goldman Sachs. The reason: An inversion signals tight money. In 2006 Dudley expects another inversion as the Fed raises short-term rates. But he thinks we'll escape a recession, because the overall level of rates will remain low.

There are other potential pitfalls. Will China's surging economy produce an unpleasant surprise? Will the replacement of Alan Greenspan with Ben Bernanke go smoothly? But the larger story of the U.S. economy has been that it continually overcomes many reasons for it to falter. Consumers have spent freely, drawing money from appreciated stocks or homes. From 1995 to 2005 consumer spending rose an average of 3.8 percent annually, notes Susan Sterne of Economic Analysis Associates. That may cool with the housing boom.

But something else will fill the gap. So say the standard forecasts. They're often right when predicting small shifts in the status quo. But they usually miss big changes, for good or ill. If something truly bad happens in 2006, you probably won't read about it first. Happy New Year.

Bush Backs Perry, But McClellan's For Mom (Hchron)

By julie mason

Houston Chronicle, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Texas governor's race is just getting started and already White House loyalties are divided, with President Bush backing Gov. Rick Perry and White House spokesman Scott McClellan supporting his mother, Carole Keeton Strayhorn.

"The president will support the Republican nominee, and it's pretty clear the Republican nominee will be his friend, Rick Perry," McClellan said today.

Strayhorn, the Texas comptroller elected as a Republican, announced Monday that she will run as an independent in the governor's race.

The White House spokesman is the youngest of her four sons.

"My mother cares deeply about Texas, and she has my full support," McClellan said.

By running as an independent, Strayhorn avoids facing the incumbent in a GOP primary battle that tends to favor the more conservative candidate.

Strayhorn, campaigning as "one tough grandma," said she is still a Republican and understands Bush's decision to support Perry.

Perry, who like Strayhorn was once a Democrat, served as lieutenant governor when Bush was governor.

"I respect what he's got to do, he is still my good friend," Strayhorn said of Bush during a campaign swing around the state. "He's got to do what he's got to do. My focus is Texas."

The president generally refrains from making endorsements in contested Republican primary races, but Perry did not draw a primary opponent this year. So Strayhorn's decision to run as an independent saves Bush from having to answer a lot of awkward questions about his choice in the primary.

"The president considers my mother a friend," McClellan said.

Before joining the White House staff in 2001, McClellan ran his mother's 1996 campaign for Texas railroad commissioner and her 1998 comptroller's race.

He said he has no plans to vacate his podium in the West Wing to help out his mother's campaign this year.

Instead, McClellan's brother, Brad, a former assistant Texas state attorney general, is running their mother's gubernatorial campaign.

Brad's twin, Dudley, is an attorney. Strayhorn's other son, Mark McClellan, is the administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services in the Bush administration.

"I am so pleased and proud of all my sons," Strayhorn said today. Bush is planning to actively campaign for Republican candidates this year. But his early backing of Perry probably won't be significant in the Texas race, said University of Houston political scientist Richard Murray.

"It would be huge news if he didn't support Perry," Murray said. "It's what you expected, and it will be marginally helpful for Perry. But it's only news if the president is breaking with someone from his own party."

Also running for governor as an independent is satirist Kinky Friedman. Former U.S. Reps. Chris Bell of Houston and Bob Gammage are the Democratic primary candidates.

Although he is supporting his mother in spirit, the White House spokesman can't actually vote for her. McClellan is registered to vote in Virginia.

Weld Is Criticized By D'Amato (NYT)

By Patrick D. Healy

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

Alfonse M. D'Amato, the former senator, sharply criticized a leading Republican candidate for governor, William F. Weld, saying last night that Mr. Weld was under the "cloud" of a federal investigation for once running a "sham college."

Mr. D'Amato, a Republican, also chastised Mr. Weld for resigning as governor of Massachusetts in 1997, before his second term was over, and then seeking to lead New York "without any real experience here."

DOJ_NMG_0007927

Speaking on NY1, where he is a paid commentator, Mr. D'Amato acknowledged that he did not feel "kindly" toward Mr. Weld, given that Mr. Weld had led the Justice Department's criminal division around the time that officials there began investigating Mr. D'Amato's brother, Armand, a lobbyist.

"You want to come and be the governor of New York without any real experience here, but you've got experience down in Tennessee running this institution that's being investigated up and down," Mr. D'Amato said. "It doesn't sound to me that this is the time and place, not with this cloud."

Mr. D'Amato also said that Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who is seeking the Democratic nomination for governor, had done an "excellent" job in office.

Mr. D'Amato said Mr. Weld would have trouble explaining the "multimillion dollar looting" of Decker College in Kentucky, which collapsed in bankruptcy last fall after federal officials cut off student loan aid because of mismanagement concerns.

Mr. Weld was Decker's chief executive from last January to October. Mr. Weld has said that federal prosecutors have told his lawyer that he was not being investigated.

Spokesmen for Mr. Weld and the state Republican Party declined to comment last night. Mr. Weld did not return a telephone message.

Kaine's Transportation Forums Yield Much Talk, Little Consensus (WP)

By Steven Ginsberg

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

Gov.-elect Timothy M. Kaine has spent the two months since his election gathering Virginians to discuss the traffic congestion problems that plague much of the state, but the forums, including one last night in Fairfax County, have failed to yield a consensus for any new action.

After talking with thousands of people about transportation issues in his most visible effort to prepare for the governorship, Kaine (D) remains committed to the proposals he outlined during the election campaign. He has used the 10 town hall meetings across the state more as a listening tour than as a forum to promote ideas.

The well-attended forums highlighted both the significance of traffic congestion in the lives of Virginians and the conflicting opinions on how to ease it.

"Everyone agrees there's a problem. No one seems to agree what the solutions are, and these meetings haven't gotten us there," said Prince William Board of County Supervisors Chairman Sean T. Connaughton (R), who attended a town hall in Manassas in November.

During his campaign, Kaine said he would ensure that money designated for roads and rails is not diverted to other priorities and pledged to help localities gain more power to regulate development and control traffic congestion.

Spokeswoman Delacey Skinner said Kaine intends to submit a plan in about two weeks that would primarily focus on those issues. The General Assembly convenes next Wednesday, and Kaine will be inaugurated Jan. 14.

Skinner said the town halls have given Kaine a chance to get "a very good sense of how urgent the problem is across the state."

Others said the urgency has been apparent for some time.

"Everybody knows what the priorities are," said Del. R. Steven Landes (R-Augusta), chairman of the House Republican Caucus. "I'm kind of befuddled about what his ideas are and what he wants to do. I guess it's almost like he's expecting the public to come up with a solution for transportation. He may be building momentum, but most people want to know what the plan is."

Fairfax Board Chairman Gerald E. Connolly (D) said the town halls are "building up a head of steam and putting pressure on members of the General Assembly." But he also said that "there have been very few specifics, and it would be nice if we heard more of that."

Landes said House leaders will present a transportation package that includes a proposal to increase fines for chronically bad drivers and that seeks to designate surplus state revenue for new projects. He added that House members oppose higher taxes, potentially setting up a showdown with the Senate, where members proposed a tax increase two years ago to pay for billions of dollars in transportation projects.

DOJ_NMG_0007928

As at all the other town hall meetings, Northern Virginians at George Mason High School in Falls Church last night offered Kaine a range of often contradictory ideas for how best to release motorists from their traffic headaches. Some said expansion of Metro transit was critical, while others said widening roads was a must. Many said it was necessary to raise taxes to pay for projects; others preferred tolls or private-sector investment.

About the only thing the crowd of about 500 commuters, politicians, activists and others shared was a sentiment that something needs to be done -- and quickly -- to ease the daily frustration of getting around in Northern Virginia.

"We need to address this issue and address it early," Kaine told them. "We just can't wait, because it gets tougher and tougher."

Several of the speakers praised Kaine's efforts to link land use and transportation.

"I highly applaud your stance. . . . We should definitely look at the impact [of development] on public facilities infrastructure," said Amy Tozzi of McLean.

The town halls and the focus on transportation have defined Kaine's time since Election Day, beginning with a pledge on the morning after his Nov. 8 victory to widen Interstate 66 inside the Capital Beltway and build a rail line to Dulles International Airport.

His town hall tour, which has attracted hundreds of frustrated commuters at nearly every site, started in Roanoke eight days after the election. It has included stops in Newport News, suburban Richmond, Manassas, Leesburg and Fredericksburg. Last night's was his first in Fairfax, the state's largest jurisdiction, and will be followed by a last one tomorrow in Virginia Beach.

At the forums and elsewhere, Kaine has repeatedly said that transportation problems are at a "crisis" stage and that he is targeting the 2006 General Assembly session as the time to make major improvements.

If the meetings have brightened the spotlight on transportation, they have done little to bring Virginians closer to agreement on what kinds of fixes to make and how to pay for them.

The crowd in Falls Church concentrated on the need for better transit service, a focus different from many of the other meetings.

"I'm very frustrated by the poor solutions we have for public transportation," said Jay Baker of Arlington County. "I wonder why there are so many miles of free roads and yet every passenger pays for every mile on Metro."

The town halls have also heightened the debate between those who see roads as essential to business growth and those who see them as generating suburban sprawl.

And in some cases, they have appeared to make prospects for change more difficult. At the Newport News meeting, commuters tallied a long list of reasons they don't want another water crossing in Hampton Roads, something state officials have labeled as vital and have been eagerly trying to build.

Gov. To Start Repaying Schools (LAT)

By Evan Halper And Duke Helfand

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger offered an olive branch to educators Tuesday with a proposal to begin repaying money the state borrowed from schools in recent years to balance the budget.

The plan to give schools about $1.7 billion extra — paid for with unanticipated state revenue — will be part of the budget Schwarzenegger proposes next week. It signals an effort to patch up his shredded relationship with the state's major education groups as he seeks reelection in November.

"We have the money this year to give it to the education community," the governor told reporters after administration officials announced the proposal. "They deserve it."

The move comes eight weeks after Schwarzenegger ended a vigorous campaign for Proposition 76, which would have capped state spending and cost schools billions. That item, rejected by voters in the November special election, had prompted school groups to bankroll a series of bruising television ads that helped send the governor's approval rating plummeting.

DOJ_NMG_0007929

Educators emerged from a meeting with Schwarzenegger on Tuesday to laud him for seeking common ground. But they said they're entitled to billions more; that his plan shortchanges schools of money they contributed to closing budget deficits in each of the last two years.

"This is a good start," said Scott Plotkin, executive director of the California School Boards Assn. "I think he's moving in the right direction."

But Plotkin said that although education groups "are not looking for another fight," they believe the state owes local districts $3.8 billion more.

School officials were also skeptical about the strings attached to Schwarzenegger's proposal: The governor wants some of the new money directed to his pet projects. Those include vocational education classes; grants to pay for new art, music and physical education programs; teacher training; and tutoring to help high school students pass exit exams.

"It's not always about how much money but how do you spend the money," he said.

Plotkin said local school officials are in a better position than the state to apportion the money effectively. Schools don't have the funds to pay for many of their students' most basic needs, he and others say, and they would rather be able to spend the money on such things as books and class-size reduction.

Still, officials in the Los Angeles Unified School District welcomed the news that more money could be on the way. The district has weathered years of deep budget cuts.

Supt. Roy Romer said he would use additional state funds to reduce the size of middle school and high school math classes, many of which now hover at about 40 students. The money could also help cover escalating healthcare costs, he said.

"This is a step in the right direction. I'm encouraged by it," Romer said. "It's not the whole package. But it's going down the road a step. Obviously, the governor is trying to make up for the deal he did not keep before, and I applaud that effort."

That deal was made after the governor took office in fall 2003, as he struggled to balance his first budget. Schools agreed to give up $2 billion they were owed under voter-approved spending formulas in return for his pledge that all the money would be restored in coming years.

A year later, the state still had a deficit, and Schwarzenegger kept the reduction in place. Now, as the 2006-07 budget is readied, educators say the tab has grown to $5.5 billion — the amount schools would get if they had been fully funded since 2004.

Schwarzenegger has made several recent moves that position him closer to the political center as he prepares to launch his reelection campaign in earnest. He has also announced that he wants to cancel a scheduled tuition increase at state colleges and universities, raise the minimum wage and help Californians buy cheaper medicines.

In his State of the State address Thursday, he is expected to announce plans for a large borrowing program to improve transportation systems, hospitals, ports and levees. Tuesday he told reporters the money could also be used to build thousands of new schools and modernize others.

Legislative leaders, meanwhile, said they were encouraged by the education funding plan.

"This is a very positive step for the governor," said Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles). "It does a lot to rebuild his relationship with us."

Nuñez, who in the past has sharply criticized the governor's education agenda, suggested that the Legislature and administration could devise a plan to pay back $5.5 billion over several years. If so, he said, "the sky might clear itself of the partisan bickering we dealt with last year," he said.

Administration officials, who contend that the governor never committed to paying that amount, said they are willing to talk about future funding.

Today, Schwarzenegger will visit a Los Angeles school to highlight a ballot initiative that he successfully championed before he was governor to fund after-school activities for students all over California. The measure is scheduled to take effect in the coming fiscal year, when the state will be required to spend $428 million for the program.

Nuñez and Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) say the state cannot afford the program, and they would like to put a measure on the ballot suspending it. "Voters approved this when the state had the money to pay for it," Nuñez said, but that is no longer the case.

DOJ_NMG_0007930

In History Lesson, Less Can Be More (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

It was just seven years ago, but for high school students, President Bill Clinton's impeachment is literally a subject for the history books.

Today's high school seniors were 10 or 11 at the height of the scandal, and today's middle-schoolers were approaching or entering first grade.

"This is very difficult for everybody, because it's so fresh," said Gilbert T. Sewall, director of the American Textbook Council, an independent group that reviews history texts. "It's easier to nail down history like the transcontinental railroad. With Clinton, you're dealing with material that has by no means been settled."

The House impeached Clinton on charges of lying to a federal grand jury and obstructing justice to conceal his affair with Monica S. Lewinsky, who was a White House intern when the relationship began. Clinton, who was acquitted in a Senate trial, was the second president impeached for conduct in office.

The impeachment is portrayed in the context of his two-term tenure -- a milestone event, but not one that overshadows how Clinton handled the economy, crime and health care.

The most commonly used texts give straightforward recaps of Clinton's toughest days, with some flavor of how it affected the nation. Absent are any lurid details about his relationship with Lewinsky that spiced up news reports and late-night talk shows as the scandal and impeachment played out in 1998 and early 1999.

"It should not be in the book for titillating purposes or settling scores," said Alan Brinkley, the Columbia University provost who has written or contributed to several history textbooks. "It should be in the book because of its significance to our recent history."

The impeachment is covered briefly in middle school texts. "The American Journey," published by McGraw-Hill, offers a description that is representative of other accounts. "Although there was general agreement that the president had lied, Congress was divided over whether his actions justified impeachment," the book says.

In "The Americans," a high school text published by McDougal Littell, the topic merits two paragraphs. The same book gave more space to the impeachment of Andrew Johnson in 1868. "The American Vision," a McGraw-Hill high school book written by Brinkley and others, has five paragraphs on Clinton's impeachment and one on his legacy.

"Compression is a tremendous challenge," Brinkley said. "Five paragraphs on a topic is a lot for all but the most important issues."

"A History of the United States," a high school text published by Pearson Prentice Hall, refers to the impeachment scandal as "a sorry mess" that diminished Clinton and his rivals. Polls showed most Americans did not believe Clinton's "tortured explanations of his behavior," the book says, but also did not think his offenses warranted his removal.

By the time students get to college, the textbooks offer more sophisticated detail of the impeachment and the way it all changed American public life.

Yet at all levels, the salacious details of the Lewinsky affair are nowhere to be found.

Middle school texts describe it as "a personal relationship between the president and a White House intern." High school books describe it as Clinton's "improper relationship with a young White House intern" or say Clinton "denied having sexual relations" with an intern.

Students don't need the details to grasp the impeachment struggle, said Allan J. Lichtman, a presidential historian and professor at American University. But they do need textbooks that present the issue with as much depth as is practical, he said.

"The books not only influence the students, they influence the teachers," he said. "And given that many students don't go on to college -- and even those who do may not revisit the material -- the textbook may be their most significant impression."

Women Start 1st Islamic Sorority (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

America's first Islamic sorority is more about God than being Greek.

DOJ_NMG_0007931

There will be no beer at Gamma Gamma Chi functions, in obedience to Islamic law, nor will there be group fraternizing with the opposite sex.

"Partying is allowed in Islam, but it's how you party," said Althia Collins, an Alexandria businesswoman who has helped create it. "You can have fun with girls and it doesn't have to include men."

Thirteen women at the University of Kentucky will form the sorority's first college chapter this spring, and another group is waiting to start at the University of Maryland's Baltimore campus. A citywide chapter in the District, made up of women from several local universities, is also in the works.

Along with pledges, there will be prayer to Allah. Instead of hazing, there's hijab, the scarf some devout Muslim women wear. Covering one's hair is not mandated within Gamma Gamma Chi; in fact, four out of the five board members do not wear one.

Mrs. Collins' daughter, Imani Abdul-Haqq, came up with concept for Gamma Gamma Chi while rushing sororities at Guilford College in Greensboro, N.C.

As Mrs. Abdul-Haqq entered the room wearing her scarf, "They looked at her like she had three heads," Mrs. Collins said.

Plus, a lot of sororities had Christian roots or began meetings with a Christian prayer, which discomfited the daughter, who converted to Islam in 1999. Since then, she has designed a line of Islamic wear, including T-shirts for women with slogans like "Real Women Pray" and "NO, I am not oppressed."

Mrs. Collins has contributed $50,000 in cash or in-kind services to start up the sorority, and Mrs. Abdul-Haqq chose the Greek letters Gamma Gamma Chi because together they mean "women on earth for a period of time," dovetailing with Islamic teaching.

Although Gamma Gamma Chi is open to all, no non-Muslims have joined to date. But other Muslims have reacted well, Mrs. Abdul-Haqq said.

"They think it's due time we have a organization like this for Muslim women," she said, "which helps them grow as women, leaders and part of many communities. It also gives them a chance to network."

They've had inquiries from Sunni, Shi'ite and the Nation of Islam women.

Before joining, members must recite a creed, learn the sorority song and take part in a secret induction ceremony that deals with "the values of the sorority" such as sisterhood and philanthropy.

Mrs. Collins converted in 1998, having grown up with a Baptist father and a mother who attended an African Methodist Episcopal Zion church. She began trying other churches during college, then, feeling restless, began investigating other faiths.

She began reading evangelistic texts about Islam during a visit to her sister, who had converted years before. Islam, she decided, appealed to her intellect, whereas Christianity seemed more concerned with the emotions.

"Besides," she said, "I really did not understand the Trinity."

To date, Gamma Gamma Chi has heard from young women in 18 states, Pakistan and the United Arab Emirates.

"I thought this was something revolutionary," Mrs. Collins said. "We are building a sorority established on the tradition of the sunnas; the ways of the prophet [Mohammed]."

Iran To Resume Its Nuclear Work; U.S. Warns Of Seeking Restraints (New York Times)

By Elaine Sciolino

New York Times, January 4, 2006

PARIS, Jan. 3 - Iran announced Tuesday that it planned to restart nuclear research, a move that jeopardized an agreement with the Europeans, complicated a Russian initiative and prompted an American threat.

The decision, contained in a brief letter delivered Tuesday to the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, declared that Iran "has decided to resume" research and development "on the peaceful nuclear energy program" that was suspended under an agreement with France, Germany and Britain in late 2004.

The letter did not define the research, but said the activities would resume Monday and be conducted "in accordance with Iran's safeguards agreement" with the I.A.E.A., the nuclear monitoring agency of the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0007932

"Research" has been a code word for experiments in enrichment of uranium at the previously secret facility at Natanz in central Iran. There is particular concern that Iran intends to reopen that site, perhaps to conduct modest enrichment experiments or even to manufacture and assemble centrifuges for enrichment, the most sensitive part of the nuclear fuel cycle.

Iran's move complicates a Russian initiative to break the deadlock over whether Iran has the right to enrich uranium. Russia has proposed that Iran be allowed to conduct uranium enrichment activities in Russia, as a way to guarantee that Iran's nuclear program is peaceful. A delegation from Moscow is scheduled to arrive in Tehran for talks this weekend, although Iranian officials have been less than enthusiastic about the proposal.

The United States warned Iran that it could face unspecified consequences if it resumed nuclear activities. "If Iran takes any further enrichment-related steps, the international community will have to consider additional measures to restrain Iran's nuclear ambitions," said Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman.

After receiving the letter, I.A.E.A. officials described its contents to representatives of the 35 countries that make up its board, which could censure Iran by referring its case to the United Nations Security Council.

Iran has argued consistently that its decision to enter into an agreement with the Europeans to suspend all uranium conversion and enrichment activities was temporary, not required under its international treaty obligations and dependent on receiving a broad range of economic, technological, political and security incentives which it said have not been forthcoming. It has also insisted repeatedly that it has a sovereign right to develop the nuclear fuel cycle in its own territory.

Indeed, in defending Iran's decision, the letter said that the suspension of the country's nuclear-related activities under the European agreement had been "voluntary and non-legally binding."

But the United States, and to an increasing extent the Europeans, are convinced that Iran is determined to become a nuclear power and have taken a forceful stance in trying to ban Iran from conducting any nuclear activity that could help in a weapons program.

This most recent decision is certain to further erode foreign confidence in Iran's leadership.

The Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has faced broad international condemnation recently for his inflammatory statements that the Holocaust is a myth and that Israel should be "wiped off the map." On Sunday, Mr. Ahmadinejad said Europe had decided to create Israel as a "Jewish camp" in the midst of Muslim countries as the best way to rid Europe of Jews.

Last August, Iran angered its European negotiating partners and the United States when it resumed the process of converting uranium at its site at Isfahan, a clear violation of the European agreement, but only a preliminary step in mastering the nuclear fuel cycle.

Criticism of Iran's decision to restart nuclear research and development activities was swift.

Besides the American threat, a statement from the British Foreign Office called Iran's letter "unhelpful and provocative," while Cristina Gallach, a spokeswoman for the European Union, branded it "a step in the wrong direction."

France called on Iran to reverse its decision. "We want Iran to abide by the suspension of all activities related to enrichment and reprocessing," a Foreign Ministry spokesman, Jean-Baptiste Mattei, told reporters.

Mohamed ElBaradei, the director of the nuclear agency, also called on Iran in a statement to maintain "its suspension of all enrichment-related activity as a key confidence-building measure" and to resolve other issues about its nuclear program.

The I.A.E.A. has repeatedly criticized Iran for failing to fully cooperate with requests to open certain facilities to its inspectors.

The agency has summoned Iranian officials to a meeting in Vienna on Wednesday to explain their intentions on research.

In a proposal presented last spring to the three European governments, Iran outlined steps that it said would advance its nuclear program, while providing assurances that its program was peaceful. Among the proposals was the installation of 3,000 centrifuges at Natanz.

On Monday, the head of the national security commission in Parliament, Alaeddin Borujerdi, said in Tehran that Iran was "determined" to reactivate the Natanz facility.

Iran could be gambling that even if it restarts nuclear research activities, it would once again avoid international sanctions. Despite threats by both the United States and the Europeans to refer Iran to the Security Council for punitive action after it resumed activities at Isfahan, the countries were forced to back down in the face of opposition from China and Russia, which each have veto power there.

DOJ_NMG_0007933

In Tehran on Tuesday, Mohammad Saeedi, the deputy head of the atomic energy agency, said on state television that Iran would resume research, without providing details.

He stressed that the research "has no connection with the production of nuclear fuel," but did not specify whether that ruled out all activities related to uranium enrichment.

He also portrayed the decision as one of national self-interest, explaining that the suspension of key nuclear activities under the agreement with the Europeans had hurt Iran. "During this period our experts incurred heavy losses and many of our researchers have lost their jobs," he said.

The letter to the I.A.E.A., which was signed with a scrawl, but without a typed name identifying the official, was written on stationery of the Permanent Mission of Iran to the United Nations in Vienna.

Parts of the letter were quoted in an I.A.E.A. news release while other parts were disclosed by a European diplomat who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the fears surrounding the nuclear issue.

US Warns Iran Against Resuming Nuclear Research (REU)

Reuters, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The United States on Tuesday warned Iran against resuming atomic fuel research and development which it said would further Tehran's efforts to build nuclear bombs.

"If Iran takes any further enrichment-related steps, the international community will have to consider additional measures to restrain Iran's nuclear ambitions," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

The United States suspects research and development work that Tehran said would restart on January 9 could help what Washington believes is its pursuit of a nuclear bomb, he told reporters.

Iran denies seeking nuclear weapons.

The United States has been pressing for months for Iran to be referred to the United Nations Security Council for possible sanctions because it says Iran has failed to dispel suspicions it is building a nuclear bomb.

International resistance to such a move has gradually been eroding as Iran has taken an increasingly hard line insisting on its right to develop peaceful nuclear programs to generate power.

Earlier on Tuesday, Iran said it would resume nuclear research and development which it suspended two years ago to defuse international pressure over its atomic ambitions.

Such work may include the manufacture and assembly of centrifuges used for uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of the nuclear fuel cycle. It could also include some small-scale enrichment tests.

Diplomats said Tuesday's move, which follows Iran's resumption of uranium conversion in August, was a serious blow to diplomatic efforts to resolve the dispute.

Iran Says It Will Restart Nuclear Fuel Research (LAT)

By Maggie Farley And Tyler Marshall

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — Iran announced Tuesday that it would resume nuclear fuel research next week, provoking new concern from the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog agency and nations, including the United States, that are convinced Tehran is trying to build nuclear weapons.

Iran delivered a letter to the International Atomic Energy Agency on Tuesday saying its nuclear body planned to resume research and development on its "peaceful nuclear energy program" on Jan. 9, ending a voluntary suspension of such activities since late 2003. In August, Iran restarted its work on the process to convert raw uranium into gas, and Tuesday's announcement was seen by some as an inflammatory effort to raise the stakes before another round of talks with European diplomats on Jan. 18.

"It has all the makings of another crisis," said a Western diplomat familiar with the negotiations. "Step by step, they are moving towards their goal. When will the Europeans say enough is enough?"

DOJ_NMG_0007934

The letter did not specify what kind of research activities would be restarted, and IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei has asked Iran for clarification. In September, the nuclear agency's board of governors passed a resolution warning Iran that resumption of any enrichment and reprocessing activities would open the door to punitive action. Enrichment of the gas produces nuclear fuel that can be used in a civilian reactor or as material for a bomb.

The deputy chief of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization said Tuesday that the activities would not include enrichment of uranium at this time. "That will be a separate issue on which no decision has been made," Mohammed Saeedi told Iranian state television.

Iranian officials this week asked the IAEA to remove seals and cameras from a nuclear facility at Natanz to allow work to resume. The U.N. agency had installed them when Iran agreed to the suspension.

Although the work at Natanz may not prove to be a technical violation, Western diplomats who have been negotiating to keep Iran's nuclear program in check view the announcement as provocative. Both U.S. and European diplomats reacted sharply to Iran's statement.

At a routine briefing Tuesday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack noted the IAEA was seeking clarification on the announcement. He warned that Iran could face punitive measures if any of its research activities were found to relate to uranium enrichment.

For more than two years, the Bush administration has been trying to persuade allies to refer Iran to the U.N. Security Council, where it could face political and economic sanctions. Tehran's declaration could bolster America's case.

"Our view is that if Iran takes any further enrichment-related steps, the international community will have to consider additional measures to constrain Iran's nuclear ambitions," McCormack told reporters. "Iran is trying to pursue nuclear weapons under the cover of a peaceful nuclear program."

He accused Iran of trying to drag out talks with Britain, France and Germany aimed at providing Tehran with peaceful nuclear energy, while attempting to develop its own expertise that it could use to build weapons. Those talks were suspended last summer after Iran declared it would resume a process of converting uranium into a gaseous substance — a key step toward enrichment.

In Paris, French Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei urged Tehran to hold to its earlier commitment to suspend "all enrichment and reprocessing activities."

The official also urged Tehran to seriously consider a Russian offer to guarantee a supply of safeguarded enriched uranium for the life of Iran's first civilian nuclear reactor nearing completion at Bushehr.

"We consider the time is short now, and that it is up to Iran to take the necessary decisions to relaunch a process of negotiations," Mattei said.

Tehran has sent mixed messages on the Russian proposal and a Foreign Ministry spokesman appeared to reject it Tuesday, saying that Iran wanted to keep control of the enrichment process.

Nonproliferation specialists in Washington viewed Tehran's announcement as the latest step in a strategy to gradually expand nuclear activities it had pledged to suspend, while stopping short of calling off the negotiations.

"Having pushed the envelope last year on uranium conversion and getting no resistance, they are trying to push again to get more," said Jon Wolfsthal, a nuclear nonproliferation specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

"The Iranians have calculated they can do anything shy of enrichment," he said.

Iran Announces Resumption Of Research On Nuclear Fuel (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr In Tehran

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

Iran said on Tuesday it would resume nuclear research, a move that is likely to provoke international concern.

Mohammad Saeedi, deputy to Iran's Atomic Energy Organisation, told state television the "resumption of research on nuclear fuel technology" had been notified to the International Atomic Energy Agency [IAEA] yesterday and would recommence within a couple of days. “Research has nothing to do with nuclear fuel production and is a separate issue, while no decision has yet been made about it [the latter],” Mr Saeedi said.

DOJ_NMG_0007935

Mohamed ElBaradei, the IAEA secretary-general, informed the 35 countries on the UN watchdog agency’s board that it had received a note from Iran and was seeking clarification.

The US responded on by warning Iran against resuming atomic fuel research, saying it could help what Washington believes is Tehran’s pursuit of a nuclear weapon, Sean McCormack, State Department spokesman, said. “If Iran takes any further enrichment-related steps, the international community will have to consider additional measures to restrain Iran’s nuclear ambitions,” he said, without specifying what action the US might take.

Negotiations between Iran and the EU3 – Britain, France and Germany –- collapsed in August after Iran rejected a European offer of incentives to abandon all its nuclear enrichment activities and resumed conversion activities at the Isfahan plant. Iran maintains that its nuclear work aims only to generate electricity.

A European diplomat in Tehran said the announcement was “vague” on the “nature and extent” of research activities. “If it’s related to enrichment activities it is very serious and a breach of IAEA resolution [in November].”

Last month, the EU held “talks about talks” with Iran in Vienna in an effort to woo Iran back to the negotiating table. Further talks are scheduled this month.

“Iran’s decision [on research] is because the two sides are setting a new base, a new agenda and new commitments for the new round of talks,” a senior Iranian official said. “The assembly of centrifuges could be Iran’s next step.” Part of the research might take place in Natanz, the main site for enrichment, he suggested.

As a way out of the impasse, Russia has proposed that Iran could enrich uranium on its soil and transfer the fuel to Iran for use in its nuclear plants. Iran has been careful not to reject the proposal outright in order to keep Russia on its side.

Tehran Will Restart Nuclear Fuel Research (WT/REU)

By Paul Hughes

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

TEHRAN -- Iran announced yesterday that it would resume atomic fuel research and development next week, raising the specter of a new showdown with the West, which suspects that Tehran wants nuclear technology to build bombs.

The news coincided with strong hints from Iran's Foreign Ministry that Tehran would reject a Russian compromise proposal aimed at defusing Iran's nuclear row with the West.

The two developments were likely to spark renewed calls from Washington and the European Union for the case to be referred to the U.N. Security Council, which could impose political or economic sanctions.

"The Atomic Energy Organization of Iran has decided to resume from Jan. 9, 2006, [research and development] on the peaceful nuclear energy program which was suspended," Iran said in a note delivered to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in Vienna, Austria.

Diplomats said the move, which follows Iran's resumption of uranium conversion in August, was a serious blow to diplomatic efforts to resolve the dispute over Iran's nuclear program.

"This does not help the process," said an EU diplomat, referring to efforts by the EU trio of Britain, Germany and France to find a negotiated solution to the standoff.

The United States yesterday warned Iran against resuming atomic fuel research.

"If Iran takes any further enrichment-related steps, the international community will have to consider additional measures to restrain Iran's nuclear ambitions," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington.

The United States has been pressing for months for Iran to be referred to the Security Council for sanctions because it says Iran has failed to dispel suspicions that it is building a nuclear bomb.

A resumption of nuclear research and development, frozen voluntarily by Iran two years ago to defuse international pressure over its atomic ambitions, could include the manufacture and assembly of centrifuges used for uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of the nuclear fuel cycle. It could also include some small-scale enrichment tests.

DOJ_NMG_0007936

The IAEA found in 2003 that Iran had conducted considerable clandestine research, including enrichment tests and centrifuge assembly, since the mid-1980s. But the agency has not detected any clear proof that Tehran wants to build atomic weapons.

A Security Council referral vote could be held at the next meeting of the IAEA's 35-nation governing board, scheduled for March 6. At its last session in November, the board opted to put off any vote to give time for Russia's proposal to bear fruit.

IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei urged Iran to cooperate more with his agency and to keep diplomatic channels open. Meanwhile, he urged Iran to take "measures to build confidence and enable the resumption of dialogue with all concerned parties."

Iran, which says its nuclear program will be used only for peaceful purposes, voluntarily suspended atomic research as well as all uranium processing and enrichment under negotiations with the EU trio that began in 2003.

Tehran began to roll back its suspension of nuclear work in August by restarting its uranium conversion plant at Isfahan, prompting the European nations to freeze talks with Iran. The talks resumed in December, and the sides are to meet again this month.

Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, stressed that the actual enrichment of uranium, done through injecting gas into centrifuges at Iran's unfinished Natanz facility, would not be resumed for now.

"That will be a separate issue on which no decision has yet been made," he told Iranian television.

Earlier yesterday, Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi was cool to a Russian proposal aimed at easing Western concerns that Iran could get its hands on bomb-grade, highly enriched uranium.

"The Russian proposal is ambiguous," Mr. Asefi told a weekly press conference. "If they want to propose enrichment [only] in Russia, we have said it is not acceptable. But if it is a complementary or parallel plan, we will study that."

A Russian delegation is expected in Tehran on Saturday to hold further talks on the proposal.

Iran Tells U.N. It Will Resume Nuclear Research (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran told the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency today it planned to resume nuclear fuel research after a 21/2-year hiatus, a vague declaration that was likely to be taken in the West as fresh evidence Tehran was trying to build an atomic weapon.

International Atomic Energy Agency head Mohamed Elbaradei said it was important that Tehran "maintains its suspension of all enrichment-related activity" as a way of reducing international suspicions about its nuclear plans.

Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, said research would "resume in cooperation and coordination with the IAEA in the next few days," adding that it would "have little to do with the production of nuclear fuel."

Beyond that, he would not specify what type of research Tehran planned but claimed its nuclear program had suffered significantly during the research suspension. He said Iran could no longer keep its research scientists in limbo.

Iran has said it remains determined, at some point, to resume uranium enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for nuclear weapons.

The announcement, while vague, was certain to raise further concerns in the United States and among its European allies who believe Iran wants to build a nuclear arsenal. Tehran says its nuclear program is for electricity generation.

ElBaradei also called on Iran to "build confidence and enable the resumption of dialogue with all concerned parties."

The Iranian mission to the IAEA said Tehran has decided to resume from Feb. 9 research and development "on the peaceful nuclear energy program which has been suspended," ElBaradei told the agency's board.

A European diplomat accredited to the agency said it was too early to evaluate the significance of the move and whether it would scuttle talks planned for later this month.

The EU has previously said that any decision by Iran to resume work on its uranium enrichment program would be "the red line" that would end European attempts to negotiate differences with Iran.

Furthermore, the EU has said a resumption of work on the program would revive attempts to take Iran to the U.N. Security Council for violating the nuclear nonproliferation treaty.

DOJ_NMG_0007937

But the diplomat, who demanded anonymity because he was not authorized to publicly discuss European Union strategy, said the Europeans needed details of precisely what Iran planned to research before making a decision on future talks.

Iran has come under heavy international pressure from the IAEA and the West to abandon its program to produce fuel for its Russian-built nuclear reactor that is due to come online this year and for its future nuclear power plants.

Iran has vowed it will never give up the right to produce nuclear fuel, which it says is guaranteed by the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

While refusing to permanently renounce uranium enrichment, Iran suspended many aspects of its nuclear fuel program in 2003 as a goodwill gesture during negotiations with the big three European powers, Britain, France and Germany.

The talks collapsed in August after Iran resumed uranium reprocessing activities, a step before enrichment, at its Uranium Conversion Facility in Isfahan, central Iran.

While the two sides resumed dialogue last month, talks have so far failed to resolve the dispute. More talks are scheduled for later this month.

Iran's decision to resume nuclear research coincided with the announcement by Asefi that Iran would reject a U.S. and European-backed Russian proposal to end the dispute if it required Tehran to cede the right to enrich uranium at home.

"The Russian proposal is ambiguous. We have to talk to the Russians to see what are the details," Asefi told reporters.

"If it means enrichment be carried out (only) in Russia, we have said it is not acceptable. But if it is a complementary plan, we will study it," Asefi said.

Extremists within the increasingly hard-line Iranian government have denounced the Russian proposal as a "dirty trick."

Intelligence Report Says Iran Seeks Nuclear Bomb: Paper (REU)

Reuters, January 4, 2006

LONDON (Reuters) - Iran is secretly trying to obtain technology and expertise needed to build a nuclear weapon, according to a leaked intelligence report that threatens to deepen a rift with the West over its nuclear program.

Tehran's nuclear purchasing plans stretch from Europe to North Korea and the former Soviet states, Britain's Guardian newspaper said, citing a report by an unnamed European intelligence agency.

The 55-page report, dated July 1, 2005, draws on material gathered by British, French, German and Belgian agencies and has been used to brief European government ministers, the newspaper said.

The leaked report comes as Iran and the West remain locked in a standoff over Tehran's nuclear program.

The United States and the European Union fear Iran's civilian nuclear power program is a cover for making nuclear weapons. Iran says it needs nuclear technology to generate electricity.

The leaked intelligence report claims Iran has an advanced program designed to acquire nuclear expertise, training and equipment.

It also says Syria, Pakistan and North Korea are part of a global black market in illicit weapons parts.

The document says Iran has built a web of front companies, middlemen and academics whose job is to find the information and materials needed for nuclear, biological and chemical arsenals, according to the Guardian.

"In addition to sensitive goods, Iran continues intensively to seek the technology and know-how for military applications of all kinds," the newspaper quoted from the report.

'MISSILE DEVELOPMENT'

According to the Guardian, the document details Tehran's attempts to build a missile capable of reaching Israel and southern Europe.

Iranian scientists are building wind tunnels, navigation technology and acquiring calibration devices needed for advanced missiles, the document says.

It concludes that Syria and Pakistan have also been buying technology and chemicals needed to develop rocket programs and to enrich uranium, according to the Guardian.

The report concludes that scientists in Tehran are shopping for parts for a new ballistic missile with "import requests and acquisitions ... registered almost daily", the Guardian said.

DOJ_NMG_0007938

The report's aim is to warn European Union companies from doing business with the front companies, the newspaper said. The report does not name Western firms or academics believed to have worked with Iran, North Korea, Syria or Pakistan.

On Tuesday, Iran said it would resume atomic fuel research and development next week.

That could lead to renewed calls from Washington and the European Union for the case to be referred to the U.N. Security Council, where Iran could face political or economic sanctions.

CIA Gave Iran Bomb Plans, Book Says (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a clumsy effort to sabotage Iran's nuclear program, the CIA in 2004 intentionally handed Tehran some top-secret bomb designs laced with a hidden flaw that U.S. officials hoped would doom any weapon made from them, according to a new book about the U.S. intelligence agency.

But the Iranians were tipped to the scheme by the Russian defector hired by the CIA to deliver the plans and may have gleaned scientific information useful for designing a bomb, writes New York Times reporter James Risen in "State of War: The Secret History of the CIA and the Bush Administration."

The clandestine CIA effort was just one of many alleged intelligence failures during the Bush administration, according to the book.

Risen also cites intelligence gaffes that fueled the Bush administration's case for war against Saddam Hussein, spawned a culture of torture throughout the U.S. military and encouraged the rise of heroin cultivation and trafficking in postwar Afghanistan.

Even before the book's release Tuesday, its main revelation — that President Bush authorized a secret effort by another intelligence outfit, the National Security Agency, to eavesdrop on unsuspecting Americans without court-approved warrants — had created a storm of controversy when it was reported last month in the New York Times in an article coauthored by Risen.

In the book, Risen says he based his accounts on interviews with dozens of intelligence officials who, while unnamed, had proved reliable in the past.

Bush has confirmed the existence of the program, but condemned the newspaper for the December report and for its use of confidential sources.

The CIA added its own criticism Tuesday, saying the book contains "serious inaccuracies."

The NSA domestic spying controversy is at the heart of an intensifying debate over whether the president has overstepped his authority in fighting the U.S.-declared war on terrorism by not adequately consulting or allowing oversight from Congress and the courts.

The Justice Department disclosed Friday that it was conducting a criminal investigation to find out who leaked classified details of the domestic spying program.

The book's release date was moved up in the wake of the NSA controversy, and it provides additional details of that domestic spying effort, in which Bush did not seek permission for domestic wiretaps from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

The New York Times delayed for a year publication of its article on the NSA's domestic spying, in part because of personal requests from the president. Critics have questioned whether the paper could have published the information before last year's presidential election if it had decided against a delay. Newspaper officials have refused to comment on reasons for the delay or on the exact timing.

Top New York Times officials also refused to publish a news article about the reported CIA plot to give intentionally flawed nuclear plans to Iran, according to a person briefed on the newspaper's conversations by one of the participants. That person said the New York Times withheld publication at the request of the White House and former CIA Director George J. Tenet.

U.S. officials have long maintained that Iran's rulers want to develop nuclear weapons, but Tehran has insisted that it seeks to develop only a civilian nuclear energy program. Whatever the case, the CIA was desperate to counter what it believed was a clandestine nuclear program, and turned to a Russian defector who had once been a nuclear scientist in the former Soviet republics, according to the book.

DOJ_NMG_0007939

The book says the CIA worked with the U.S.-based defector to concoct a story about how he was destitute, but in possession of valuable nuclear weapons blueprints that had been secreted out of Russia.

CIA officials had concerns about the man's temperament, Risen says, but sent the defector and the blueprints to Vienna anyway, with orders to hand-deliver them to someone at Tehran's diplomatic mission to the International Atomic Energy Agency, or IAEA, the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

His CIA handlers never imagined that the Russian defector would tip off the Iranians to the fatal flaw that they had hidden deep within the blueprints. But that, the book adds, is exactly what the Russian did, in part because the CIA failed to send anybody to accompany him out of fear that it might make the Iranians suspicious.

The book does not say whether Iran used the plans, but reports that a senior Iranian official visiting Vienna appears to have taken them immediately to Tehran after the defector dropped them off.

"He [the Russian] was the front man for what may have been one of the most reckless operations in the modern history of the CIA, one that may have helped put nuclear weapons in the hands of a charter member of what President George W. Bush has called the axis of evil," the book contends.

Two nuclear weapons experts who say that they have no knowledge about whether the covert effort described in the book occurred added that a deliberate flaw in the plans could have been easily found by the Iranians.

"Iran has excellent scientists and any information related to weapons designs could move its program ahead," said a European nuclear weapons expert, who refused to allow his name to be used because his government prohibits comments on nuclear weapons or designs.

David Albright, a former weapons inspector for the IAEA, agreed with the other expert that the plans could have shaved many years off Iran's nuclear effort.

"I wouldn't call it a colossal failure" by the CIA, said Albright, now president of the Institute for Science and International Security in Washington. "But I don't quite understand the purpose of it, why you would want to hand something like this to the Iranians. It's unlikely to work."

According to the book, the CIA effort to sabotage Iran's nuclear effort came on the heels of another massive intelligence failure, in which a CIA officer mistakenly sent an Iranian agent a trove of information that could help identify nearly every one of the spy agency's undercover operatives in Iran.

The Iranian was a double agent who turned over the data to Iranian authorities. They used it to dismantle the CIA's spy network inside the country and arrest or possibly kill an unknown number of U.S. agents, the book says.

White House Won't Undo N. Korea Sanctions (AP)

By Barry Schweid

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration on Tuesday rejected a North Korean demand that it lift sanctions as a way of possibly resuming stalled nuclear disarmament talks.

The two issues are unrelated, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. "I don't see in what way they are preventing North Korea from going back to the six-party talks."

The sanctions were imposed for alleged currency counterfeiting and other illegal activities.

"While under U.S. sanctions, it's impossible to sit face-to-face and discuss abandoning our nuclear deterrent," said the Rodong Sinmun, the North's ruling Workers Party newspaper, in a Korean-language commentary carried by the official Korean Central News Agency.

"The U.S. sanctions are obviously the fundamental element that disrupts the six-party talks," the newspaper said.

McCormack said it was important and reasonable for the United States to protect American currency. "We, the United States, as well as other countries are going to take steps to stop, inhibit or prevent illicit activities," he said.

The negotiations are designed to halt North Korea's nuclear weapons program. The six nations, which include Japan, China, South Korea and Russia, as well as the United States and North Korea, agreed to return to the negotiations as soon as possible, McCormack said.

DOJ_NMG_0007940

"We are prepared to do so, and we look forward to the resumption of those talks," he said.

As for the alleged violations, McCormack said the United States had offered North Korea a briefing and was turned down.

White House Supports Lebanon-Syria Probe (AP)

By Barry Schweid

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration urged U.N. investigators Tuesday to look into an allegation by a former Syrian vice president that President Bashar Assad had threatened former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri several months before Hariri was assassinated.

The allegation was made last week by former Vice President Abdul-Halim Khaddam, who left Syria several months ago.

Khaddam said Assad warned Hariri months before his assassination last year that he would "crush whoever attempts to overturn our decision" to extend the term of Lebanon's pro-Syrian president.

Hariri, a billionaire Lebanese nationalist who sought to assist his country wiggle free from Syrian control, was assassinated last February in Beirut. The blast killed 20 other people and helped accelerate U.N. demands that Syria release its grip on its smaller neighbor.

Referring to Khaddam's allegation, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "I think his remarks warrant further investigation" by the United Nations.

Mehlis already has implicated senior Syrian officials in Hariri's assassination. Syria has dismissed the charges as unfounded.

"I think that Mr. Khaddam's remarks raise some deeply troubling issues as to what exactly was going on during the period in time in question," McCormack said.

"They raise serious questions about who in the Syrian government may have been involved in the assassination," he said.

Bush Hopes Palestinian Election Goes Forward (REU-Y2)

Reuters, January 4, 2006

President George W. Bush wants Palestinian elections to go forward as scheduled this month with no delay and thinks Palestinians should be allowed to vote in East Jerusalem, a White House official said on Tuesday.

Bush is hoping the January 25 vote will mark a step forward in his vision of two states, Israel and Palestine, living side by side in peace.

The vote is widely seen as a referendum on Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas's rule following Israel's withdrawal from Gaza last year, which raised hopes of ending fighting and of founding a Palestinian state.

"It's our desire to see the elections go forward as scheduled," said a White House spokesman.

Israel has threatened to bar Palestinians from voting in East Jerusalem. Israel had allowed voting in East Jerusalem in the last Palestinian parliamentary election in 1996.

"We believe that people must have access to the ballot," the White House spokesman said. "Arrangements have been made in the past to ensure that those persons can vote and we believe some arrangements should be possible at this time."

U.S. Envoys To Help Resolve Vote Dispute (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

The United States said yesterday that it was sending envoys to the Middle East to help resolve a dispute that threatens to derail this month's Palestinian elections.

The dispatch of two senior diplomats was announced as campaigning officially began in the Palestinian territories, although electioneering in East Jerusalem was blocked by Israeli police.

Israel has said it will not permit voting in the city because of the participation in the process of the militant group Hamas. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas warned Monday that the election would not take place if Israel carried out its threat.

DOJ_NMG_0007941

"We see no reason why those elections should not proceed on Jan. 25," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington yesterday.

"We believe that the Palestinian Authority should be concentrating on preparations for those elections, so that the Palestinian people can vote in an atmosphere that is free from violence or coercion or intimidation."

Mr. McCormack noted that Israel had threatened previously to bar voting in East Jerusalem, which it annexed in the 1967 Middle East war, but that the two sides had been able to reach an agreement.

"We see no reason why the Palestinian Authority and the Israeli government shouldn't be able to come to some similar kind of accommodation for this round of voting, and we are going to be working with [them]," he said.

C. David Welch, assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, and Elliott Abrams, a deputy national security adviser for the region at the White House, will travel to Israel and the Palestinian territories today to meet with officials on both sides, Mr. McCormack said.

"We believe that these elections should be for all the Palestinian people within the parameters as defined by the Palestinian Authority," he said.

In East Jerusalem, which the Palestinians want to be the capital of their future state, Israeli police yesterday beat some Palestinian campaigners with clubs and arrested seven, including a local leader of Mr. Abbas' Fatah movement, wire service reports said.

Police spokesman Shmuel Ben-Ruby was quoted as saying the men had been released on bail after being questioned on "illegal activity by the Palestinian Authority in Jerusalem."

Israel allowed voting in East Jerusalem in the last Palestinian parliamentary elections in 1996, which Hamas boycotted.

Former Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who has joined current leader Ariel Sharon's new coalition, told the Al Jazeera television network that a decision on voting in East Jerusalem had not been made.

"We are waiting to see what will happen on the Palestinian side," he said, referring to internal Palestinian violence in the Gaza Strip that also has threatened the elections.

Palestinians Campaign For An Election That May Not Be Held (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 3 - Campaigning for Palestinian legislative elections opened Tuesday despite doubts about whether the vote will actually take place on Jan. 25.

With the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, on a tour of the Persian Gulf, Deputy Prime Minister Nabil Shaath cited the late Yasir Arafat, who died in November 2004, in kicking off the campaign for a riven Fatah movement.

Speaking by Mr. Arafat's tomb in Ramallah, on the West Bank, and using his nom de guerre, Mr. Shaath said, "With your permission, Abu Ammar, we will continue to fly the flag of Fatah and head to victory."

In a development that may roil the parallel Israeli political campaign, Israeli Channel 10 reported Tuesday night that the police had evidence that would show that the family of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had received $3 million from a wealthy Austrian, Martin Schlaff, in connection with his 1999 campaign. The money is thought to be connected to a $1.5 million loan from a South African businessman that is suspected of being used to refund illegal campaign contributions.

In a separate case, one of Mr. Sharon's sons, Omri, resigned from Parliament on Tuesday before his sentencing later this month for unrelated financing violations and falsification of documents from his father's 1999 campaign.

In opening the campaign, Mr. Shaath admitted that "Fatah has made mistakes and we must work to correct them." But he also warned that the radical Islamic movement Hamas, taking part in the elections for the first time, could win if Fatah failed to unite.

He questioned Hamas's ability to govern the Palestinians and deal with Israel - which considers Hamas a terrorist group, and which Hamas does not recognize. "How will negotiations with Israel be managed under Hamas?" Mr. Shaath asked. "How will they pay salaries and ensure security? What will they do for women?"

DOJ_NMG_0007942

Still, Fatah's biggest problems are its own divisions and a reputation for cronyism, mismanagement and corruption, coupled with its failure to achieve an independent Palestinian state through negotiation and compromise.

Fatah is looking for reasons to postpone the elections, because of fears that Hamas will win more than 40 percent of the 132 seats at stake and become either the most powerful political force or a sizable blocking minority in the future legislature. Many Fatah veterans would rather have no election than hand over such power to Hamas.

Hamas opposes another delay in the vote, having already agreed to Mr. Abbas's request to move the election from July to this month.

Israel, which opposes letting Hamas take part in the elections, has not yet decided whether to allow Palestinians in East Jerusalem to vote by postal ballot, as they have done in previous elections, when Hamas did not take part.

A senior Israeli official said, however, that Israel would help Palestinians in East Jerusalem who wanted to vote outside the city. In the past, he said, only 5,000 of the 120,000 or so eligible Palestinian voters in Jerusalem had been allowed to vote in post offices, and only 1,200 of them have done so, with a vast majority voting outside the city.

The issue has important symbolic value. Mr. Abbas said Monday that if voting were not allowed in East Jerusalem, it would be impossible to hold the elections. Israel clearly does not want to be blamed for any postponement, but also does not want to sanction the election.

"The post offices are there, and if we decide to have them open, then they'll be open," the Israeli official said. "We're waiting for the right moment to announce what our position is, and now is not the right moment. We're making assessments on a daily basis."

Mr. Sharon, 77, is to go into the hospital on Thursday for an operation under general anesthesia to plug a small hole in his heart that may have been a factor in the stroke he suffered Dec. 18. He will spend the night in the hospital and will temporarily cede his powers to his deputy, Ehud Olmert, for what is expected to be a three-hour period of operation and recovery.

Palestinians Kick Off Campaign Amid Signs Of 2nd Postponement (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 3 -- The leading Palestinian political parties kicked off campaigns for parliament on Tuesday, but there was a growing possibility that balloting would be postponed as two prominent candidates had confrontations with Israeli authorities in East Jerusalem, where Israel has prohibited election activities.

Mustafa Barghouti, a former presidential candidate and leader of the Independent Palestine movement, was detained by Israeli police while campaigning in Jerusalem's Old City and held for about five hours. Police said Barghouti had the proper permit to enter East Jerusalem, annexed by Israel after the 1967 Middle East war.

Israeli police also dispersed a rally for the Third Way movement outside the Old City's Damascus Gate. Hanan Ashrawi, a member of the Palestinian parliament from the Jerusalem district, was speaking at the event when police intervened. Ashrawi said police briefly detained one of her aides for obstructing a police officer.

"I'm seriously concerned over how this campaign has begun, and not only because of the highhanded manner of the Israelis," Ashrawi said in a telephone interview. "I'm also worried about our own domestic realities and the breakdown of law and order. There appears to be an emerging anarchy."

Palestinians are scheduled to vote on Jan. 25 for a new 132-seat legislature. There was a festive atmosphere in many parts of the West Bank, but several candidates in East Jerusalem faced problems, including some members of the governing Fatah movement who were detained.

The Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, suggested Monday that he might postpone the election because of Israel's ban on voting in East Jerusalem. It would be the second time Abbas has delayed the vote, which was initially scheduled for July.

The warning by Abbas angered candidates of the Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas. Recent public opinion polls project that Hamas, which does not recognize Israel, would win between 30 and 40 percent of the vote, second only to Abbas's secular Fatah movement. Hamas has never competed in national elections, but was highly successful in municipal races over the past year and has been popular because of its social service programs.

DOJ_NMG_0007943

"We have told them that postponing the election will lead to a vacuum and to a dark future," Ismael Haniyeh, a top Hamas candidate, told reporters in the Gaza Strip. "Postponing the election is not the solution."

The makeup of the new parliament will likely have little bearing on Palestinian policy, which will remain firmly in Abbas's control. But the results would help gauge both the popularity of Hamas, whose armed wing has carried out numerous attacks on Israeli soldiers and civilians during the most recent uprising that began in September 2000, and Fatah's unity as it endures a divisive generational power struggle.

Israeli officials have banned voting and electioneering in East Jerusalem because of the participation of Hamas, saying a 1996 agreement with Palestinian leaders about the election process prohibited the involvement of groups that do not recognize Israel.

"This time Hamas, a terrorist group, is participating," said an official in Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's office. "Because of this we cannot cooperate with the elections. This is our policy not only in East Jerusalem but throughout the process." The official spoke on condition he not be further identified.

A number of Palestinian politicians have called on the Bush administration to pressure Israel into allowing the vote to take place in East Jerusalem, an important symbol for Israelis and Palestinians, each of whom claim Jerusalem as their capital.

Barghouti, who lost the presidential race to Abbas a year ago, echoed that demand after his arrest. "Israel is trying to obstruct free elections in Jerusalem, and by doing so obstructing the process everywhere," he said.

After Israel, Who Can Run Gaza? (CSM)

By Rafael D. Frankel

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2006

GAZA CITY - As the first year devoid of an Israeli presence since 1967 dawns in the Gaza Strip, armed militias roam the streets freely, foreigners are kidnapped with regularity, and the measure of a man in this coastal territory is not his political title, or even the size of his house, but the number of AK-47-wielding bodyguards he employs.

When Israel left Gaza four months ago, full control over the 1.3 million people was ostensibly transferred to the Palestinian Authority (PA). But its authority in this coastal territory has deteriorated to such a state of anarchy, that the best-armed gangs or families are effectively the law now.

"Yasser Arafat left a terrible legacy of violence behind him where people are always acting outside the law," says Eyad Sarraj, a Palestinian political analyst and a candidate in the Jan. 25 elections. "Now, with him gone, everyone is fighting for his power."

Tuesday, Palestinian parties launched their election campaigns across Gaza and the West Bank with parades, posters, and banners. This is the latest manifestation of the central Palestinian power struggle between the Islamic militant group Hamas and the ruling Fatah Party.

With Palestinian Legislative Council elections scheduled in three weeks, the violence in Gaza has heightened as dozens of armed factions, most claiming ties to Fatah, jostle for control. On Monday, even the Palestinian police donned masks and shot their guns in the air in a mass protest against the PA's lack of will to give police permission to aggressively tackle the escalating crime.

All throughout the days here gun shots ring out. From time to time, explosions from homemade bombs, rockets, and the countering Israeli artillery fire echo through the graffiti-ridden streets.

But the police Monday had an additional demand of PA President Mahmoud Abbas, one that is being made increasingly by leaders of his Fatah Party: delay the elections. "We are in a dangerous situation in which any attempt to hold elections might bring about battles between armed factions and the police," PA Police Chief Ala Hosni told the Israeli newspaper Haaretz.

After insisting for weeks that elections would go ahead as scheduled, Mr. Abbas said for the first time on Monday that he would consider delaying the vote; not because of the violence, but due to the question of whether Israel would bar Palestinians in East Jerusalem from voting.

Despite previous ambiguous statements from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Israeli government spokesman Raanan Gissin says Israel will not stand in the way of Palestinians living in Jerusalem from casting ballots.

DOJ_NMG_0007944

"We will find a way to fulfill our obligations to allow them to exercise their right to vote," Mr. Gissin says. While the exact formula has not yet been decided, he says, it would likely be similar to the 1996 Palestinian elections when Israel allowed mail-in balloting from Jerusalem as well as easier access to areas in the West Bank with voting booths.

(Under the 1993 Oslo Accords, Palestinian political activities are prohibited in Jerusalem, as is participation in the PA by parties, such as Hamas, that do not recognize Israel's right to exist.)

"The Palestinians are looking for an excuse to blame Israel because they are incapable of controlling their own streets," Gissin says. "If they decide they want to cancel the election, they do it on their own merit, they can't hang it on us."

Mr. Sarraj, who is running for a seat in the Palestinian legislature with the Wahad [Promise] Party, says the PA's lack of law enforcement in Gaza and the talk about voting problems in East Jerusalem are calculated moves by Abbas to provide "excuses" to delay elections he knows Fatah will fair poorly in.

After the strong showing by Hamas in recent municipal elections in Palestinian cities, Abbas is worried that not only will Fatah lose substantial ground in the legislature, it may lose control of that body altogether, Sarraj says.

Of all the militant Palestinian groups, Hamas has been responsible for the most Israeli deaths in terrorist attacks. Yet in a move to increase its political standing, Hamas has largely kept to the terms of a cease-fire it agreed to with Abbas last February.

On Monday, an official Hamas statement demanded that "the excuse of the security situation and anarchy in the Palestinian Authority not be used to postpone the elections."

And it won't be, says Saeb Erekat, the chief Palestinian negotiator who often speaks for the PA. "President Abbas knows the catastrophic consequences of postponing the elections," he says. As long as Israel provides the same voting access as it did in 1996, Mr. Erekat says, the elections will go ahead as planned - Israel should "not stand in the way" of that process.

As for the violence on Gaza's streets, Erekat says that while "every effort is being made to contain" it, the PA was not sure who was behind the rash of shootings and government office takeovers by masked gunmen.

British human rights worker Kate Burton and her visiting parents were kidnapped last Wednesday by a previously unknown group of gunmen and released two days later.

"It's impossible to say who has guns in Gaza anymore," Erekat says. "The ballots are the only thing that can stop the violence at this point."

Power Shift Set During Procedure For Sharon (WT/AP)

By Josef Federman

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will hand over power to his deputy during a heart procedure this week, his office said yesterday, the first time an Israeli leader has agreed to give up his authority because of illness.

Mr. Sharon's office played down concerns about the 77-year-old leader's health, saying the procedure to close a small hole in his heart, including a period when he will be under general anesthesia, will last only three hours. However, officials canceled the weekly Cabinet meeting Sunday to give Mr. Sharon an extra day to recover.

Vice Prime Minister Ehud Olmert will take over during the procedure, Mr. Sharon's office said.

Doctors discovered the hole after Mr. Sharon suffered a mild stroke Dec. 18. The hole, measuring about one-eighth of an inch, apparently led to the stroke by allowing a small blood clot to reach Mr. Sharon's brain.

Although Mr. Sharon temporarily lost the ability to speak, his doctors said the prime minister suffered no lasting damage. He has resumed his full workload, and doctors say tomorrow's procedure, called a heart catheterization, will virtually eliminate the risk of a similar stroke.

The process of transferring power is spelled out in a 1992 law. But tomorrow will mark the first time in Israel's 57-year history that a leader has yielded his authority because of an illness, said legal commentator Moshe Negbi. In previous cases, including lengthy illnesses suffered by Golda Meir in the 1970s and Menachem Begin in the 1980s, their ailments were hidden from the public.

Last month's stroke has put the health of Mr. Sharon, who turns 78 next month, on the political agenda as he seeks a third term in March 28 elections.

DOJ_NMG_0007945

Mr. Sharon recently quit the hard-line Likud Party to head a new centrist party, Kadima (Forward), in the upcoming election.

The health scare appears to have had no effect on the party's prospects. Opinion polls forecast a strong victory for Kadima, and show Likud far behind.

Benjamin Netanyahu, a former prime minister elected to lead Likud last month, said yesterday he would not make an issue out of Mr. Sharon's health during the campaign.

Israel Undergoes Political 'revolution' Alignments Shift As Sharon Leaves Likud (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, January 4, 2006

TEL AVIV, Israel — Two months ago, politics in the Carmel Market, a gantlet of clothing stalls, butcher shops and spice kiosks, was straightforward. The small shop owners here are staunchly conservative and have supported Israel's largest party, Likud, for decades.

However, dramatic turns in Israeli politics over the past couple of months have reshaped the country's politics. The ruling Likud Party, a fixture in Israeli politics for more than 30 years, is struggling after its leader, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, left to form the centrist Kadima Party. The center-left Labor Party elected a socialist who vows to inject life into the faction.

Today, even in Likud bastions such as the Carmel Market, there is a political realignment. "Like my father, my family and most everyone here in the market, I used to vote Likud," says Yoni Ben-Yonatan, 24, owner of a dollar store. "But there have been so many changes. … I will stick with Sharon. My father won't."

The recent political changes are "nothing short of a revolution," says Asher Cohen, a professor of political science at Bar-Ilan University in Tel Aviv. "Here you have a sitting prime minister dumping the party he helped found 30 years ago to create an entirely new party."

Sharon was a key player in the establishment of Likud in 1973. The working-class people who populate open air markets such as Carmel have long provided Likud's support, Cohen says.

Likud swept to power in 1977. Since that victory, Likud prime ministers have governed Israel for 20 of the past 28 years. The decision by Sharon to leave the party has left Likud severely weakened and its future uncertain.

Sharon's new party is so popular that "it blows the two giants of Israeli politics (Labor and Likud) right out of the water," Cohen says.

Most voters seem to have chosen Sharon, a former general who as defense minister engineered Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982, over the party he helped create.

A recent poll in the Israeli daily newspaper Maariv showed that if elections were held now, Likud would drop from its current 40 seats to 16. According to the poll findings, Sharon's Kadima Party would win 40 of the 120 seats in the Knesset, Israel's parliament, making Kadima the largest of Israel's many political parties. National elections are scheduled for March 28.

"Sharon has the experience, he has the toughness, and only he can balance right and left and eventually bring us a real peace with the Palestinians," says Ben-Yonatan, who served in an elite Israeli army unit.

In announcing his new party, Sharon claimed he was abandoning Likud because the party's powerful right wing undermined his efforts to pursue peace with the Palestinians. Sharon supports the U.S.-brokered "road map" peace plan that would lead to creation of a Palestinian state.

Sharon also railed at Likud's 3,000-strong Central Committee, which set the party's political agenda. Sharon has blamed committee members for increasing political corruption in Israel.

Sharon's health complicates matters. On Dec. 18, the chronically overweight Sharon, 77, was hospitalized for two days for a mild stroke.

On Thursday, doctors are to seal a small hole in his heart that might have led to his stroke. His deputy, Ehud Olmert, will assume the prime minister's duties while Sharon undergoes the procedure, which should take three hours.

After Sharon abandoned the party, Likud elected hawkish former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, 56, as its chairman. Netanyahu condemned Sharon's withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the West Bank and is campaigning on a hard-line platform that would grant a Palestinian state on only a fraction of West Bank land.

DOJ_NMG_0007946

Israel's Labor Party has taken a turn leftward with the election of Amir Peretz, 53, a union leader. He unseated Labor Party leader Shimon Peres, 82, in primaries Nov. 9.

Peretz has vowed to raise the minimum wage and taxes on the wealthy. He packed his shadow Cabinet with social crusaders, such as Shelly Yechimovitch, a former news personality who often expressed her socialist politics on TV.

Peretz says Israel should accede to most Palestinian demands for creating an independent state before moving on to issues such as eradicating child poverty and unemployment. Convinced that Peretz could not bring peace with the Palestinians, Peres and three other prominent party veterans joined Sharon's new party.

It remains unclear whether Sharon's party, bolstered by moderate defectors from Labor and Likud, will mean Israeli politics are moving to the center. With no activists or party infrastructure, Kadima's life span could be as short or as long as Sharon's desire to rule, Cohen says.

Sharon's strength, says Asher Arian, a fellow at Jerusalem-based think-tank Israeli Democracy Institute, "is being more in tune with Israeli public opinion than anyone else."

Ashcroft Helps Israelis On Korean Weapons Deal (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, January 4, 2006

Israel's major aerospace company hired former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft's lobbying firm late last month to help secure the U.S. government's approval to sell a weapons system to the South Korean Air Force, according to lobbying disclosure records.

The South Koreans are choosing between an early-warning radar system built by Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI) and a similar, more expensive system built by Chicago-based Boeing Co. The radar systems enhance an air force's ability to track enemy fighter jets during combat.

U.S. law requires Israel, and any other country seeking to resell American military technology, to secure approval from the Department of State's Directorate of Defense Trade Controls. That agency can also consult with the Pentagon on whether to issue an export license. A State Department spokesman declined to comment.

Boeing already has the U.S. government's approval.

The South Koreans initially had intended to make a decision by Dec. 31, but the government told the companies last month that it would delay its final decision until May 2006, which gives the Israeli company an additional four months to get the U.S. government's blessing.

Boeing officials based in Seoul, South Korea, expressed disappointment with the four-month delay in news reports in that country and Israel. The Jerusalem Post reported last month that Alexander Vershbow, the U.S. ambassador to South Korea, met with the South Korean defense minister and pushed for Boeing. The $1 billion deal has garnered little attention in the U.S. media and in Congress.

In 2005, Boeing contributed $642,877 to Republican and Democratic lawmakers' political action committees and campaign committees, according to politicalmoneyline.com. The firm reported spending $4.9 million on lobbying in 2004.

A spokesman for Rep. Norm Dicks (D-Wash.), who traditionally aids Boeing because the company has a large presence in his district, said he was not aware of the sale and had not been contacted by Boeing on the matter. Spokespeople for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.) and Washington Democratic Sens. Patty Murray and Maria Cantwell did not return calls for comment.

South Korea, the world's 11th largest economy, has been investing heavily in its military in recent years. The U.S. ally has developed its own fighter plane and battle tank and launched an aircraft carrier, destroyers and submarines, said John Pike of GlobalSecurity.org, an intelligence research company.

"The [surveillance] technology makes a tremendous difference whether you have airplanes like this," Pike said, adding that not having the system is like having a "football team without a coach and captain. It is night-and-day in terms of efficiency and effectiveness of air power. Any serious, self-respecting country wants them or wants to get them."

DOJ_NMG_0007947

The Ashcroft Group and IAI signed a nondisclosure agreement, said spokeswoman Juleanna Glover Weiss, and IAI officials based in D.C. and Tel Aviv said the company does not comment on its consultants.

Ashcroft has built a lucrative lobbying practice since starting last summer. Public records also show that Oracle; ChoicePoint, a company that sells data to police and federal law-enforcement agencies; and the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants have hired Ashcroft.

Public records do not disclose how much IAI is paying Ashcroft. The records show that IAI also hired Morris Amitay for $20,000.

"I am not going to comment," Amitay said, referring to questions about the potential deal to IAI's office in Arlington, Va.

While it is not unusual for foreign governments to hire Washington lobbyists to navigate the executive-branch bureaucracy, Congress has a record of inserting itself into commercial transactions, especially when national-security issues are concerned. For example, the House overwhelmingly passed two resolutions last year encouraging the Bush administration to stop a potential merger between a Chinese oil company and Unocal, a U.S. oil company.

Israel has come under criticism from the U.S. government for selling arms to countries hostile to the United States, such as China and South Africa. In 2000, pressure from the Clinton administration and Congress stopped Israel from selling its Phalcon radar system to the Chinese.

"Past Israeli behavior does not inspire confidence," said Loren Thompson of the Lexington Institute, adding that past actions could spark Congressional action.

The United States suspended cooperation with Israel last year on some long-term military projects after Israel announced plans to sell China spare parts for Harpy Drone unmanned aerial vehicles. The United States and Israel signed a memorandum of understanding in August to regulate future arms sales between Israel and other countries.

Boeing has sold its surveillance system to the Australian and Turkish governments, said a D.C.-based Boeing official, who declined further comment. Last year, the Israelis sold the Phalcon system to India's air force, and, previously, they sold the Phalcon system to the Chilean air force.

The United States approved $22.4 billion in licenses to sell arms in 2004; Israel accounted for $1.33 billion in sales. Japan and Great Britain were the largest buyers of U.S. weapons, according to a State Department report

Rice To Visit Indonesia, Australia (REU-Y2)

Reuters, January 4, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will visit Indonesia and Australia, strong U.S. allies in fighting terrorism, from January 7-12, the State Department said on Tuesday.

Rice will first go to Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, for talks with President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono and other ministers, said spokesman Sean McCormack.

Both sides will discuss a range of issues, including U.S. support for "Indonesia's democratic development," cooperation in tackling the threat of avian flu and progress in recovery efforts after the devastating tsunami in December 2004.

They will also likely look at military relations between Indonesia and the United States, which have become closer as a reward for Jakarta's cooperation in the war on terrorism and against al Qaeda-linked militants.

In November, Washington announced it was restoring military ties, despite objections from human rights groups which said monitoring of armed forces would need to be tightened.

U.S. military ties were cut back after Indonesian troops shot at demonstrators in East Timor in 1991, killing dozens, when the tiny territory was ruled by Jakarta.

They were then severed after pro-Jakarta militias backed by elements in the military sacked East Timor in 1999 when the territory voted for independence.

In Australia, Rice will meet foreign ministers from Japan and Australia as part of a new "strategic dialogue" between the three countries, McCormack said.

Rice will also take part in a meeting between the United States and five Asia-Pacific countries that announced a pact last July to cut greenhouse gases that falls outside the Kyoto Protocol on climate change.

DOJ_NMG_0007948

Critics say the pact, the Asia-Pacific Partnership for Clean Development and Climate, is ineffectual and merely serves the needs of industrialized nations.

The pact, which involves the United States, Australia, China, Japan, India and South Korea, looks at how to develop technologies to reduce greenhouse gas emissions rather than having specific targets.

Expediting Homes For Tsunami Victims (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

MEUDANGGHON, Indonesia -- In a field along Sumatra's west coast, a group of villagers gathered under a blue tarp, peering at a laptop computer. The screen displayed a design of a simple brick house.

"Everyone okay with this?" asked Dave Hodgkin, a relief aid consultant. "Any changes? If you want a bigger window, tell us."

"Don't change anything," a woman in a black head scarf quickly responded. "It'll slow things down."

Hodgkin works with Fauna & Flora International, a British group that is preparing to build homes in this isolated village of 60 households in Aceh province, the area hit hardest by the tsunami of more than a year ago. Similar scenes have been taking place across Aceh over the past several months as aid workers help survivors plan entire communities.

Stung by intense criticism of a slow rebuilding effort after the Dec. 26, 2004, undersea earthquake and resulting tsunami, the Indonesian government and relief agencies are moving to pick up the pace. After building about 16,000 houses in 2005, Indonesia is undertaking what officials call the world's largest reconstruction effort ever after a natural disaster. The goal is to build 80,000 homes by the end of this year and a total of 120,000 by mid-2007.

Interviews with officials and survivors indicate that accelerating the rebuilding process will not be easy. Not all of the houses built in 2005 have been occupied, according to the Rehabilitation and Reconstruction Agency for Aceh and Nias, known by its Indonesian initials BRR. Nias is an island off the Sumatran coast and was heavily damaged by an earthquake last March.

More than 60,000 people still live in tents. Another 50,000 are in barracks or other forms of temporary shelter. Several hundred thousand are living with friends and family, but many will need homes of their own.

"Until the last person moves out of the barracks into their own house, that last person will say that we are slow," according to Kuntoro Mangkusubroto, director of the government relief agency.

But beginning this year, he said, there will be 5,000 housing starts a month. Officials said the increased pace will bring logistical challenges. Building 120,000 houses will require 13.7 million cubic meters of concrete, gravel and wood -- or 1.7 million truckloads of material, officials said. It will be trucked, shipped and in some cases flown by helicopter to remote areas, said Sudirman Said, BRR spokesman.

Moving the material will be hampered by the lack of transportation facilities. The tsunami and earthquake wrecked most of Aceh's ports, highways and bridges. Officials expect a port restoration at Meulaboh to be completed by February, but others will take longer.

One recent morning, on the eastern outskirts of Banda Aceh, the provincial capital, a single cargo ship loaded with sugar was docked at Malahayati port's only jetty. Two other ships, one carrying cement, idled in the harbor. The port can dock only one ship at a time.

"This is the main supply line for all the villages along the coast" of northern Aceh and part of its western coast, said Jan Roos, project manager for a construction firm hired by the Dutch government to enlarge the port. The Dutch are spending $8.2 million to dredge the harbor, build a second jetty and make other improvements. By October, Roos said, the port should be able to handle up to three ships.

Another port has been reopened for passenger ferries on the western side of the capital. But cargo ships still cannot land at the Ulee Lheue port, also to the west. Instead, the U.N. World Food Program and other relief agencies are using special landing craft that can pull up to shore, lower a ramp and unload.

Still, a landing craft must travel up to 18 hours from Ulee Lheue to Calang down the Sumatran west coast, a trip that used to take only 3 1/2 hours on the West Coast Highway before the tsunami battered it and dumped large chunks into the sea.

DOJ_NMG_0007949

The United States is spending $245 million to repair the highway, the largest infrastructure project in Aceh and the most complex. Land has shifted in many parts of the island, and in some areas 500 yards of beach are submerged or washed away. "The road now in many places is next to the ocean and has to be relocated," said William Frej, the Indonesia director of the U.S. Agency for International Development.

The road will be rebuilt up to five miles inland, he said. USAID officials hope it will be finished by 2008.

The only hitch is that some villagers, eager to be settled, are rebuilding close to the shore, near their old fishing grounds. But Frej said he thought many would ultimately move.

"The road is unquestionably the economic backbone of Aceh," he said. "I would suspect that many of the villages, when the road is completed, will be relocated much closer to the road."

Zainal Abidin, 55, who lost his wife and three of their six children in the tsunami, lives about 150 yards from the sea in Leupung on the west coast. He does not want to move. He went back to the site of his old village and has lived in a tent for almost a year.

Now, he said, "all I want is to have a house in my old place."

But a relief agency that has promised houses for the village is clearing fields near a hill inland. The leader of the village says only about half the people are willing to move.

Another challenge is obtaining land titles for an estimated 300,000 people affected by the tsunami. The BRR, with the help of large donors led by the World Bank, will help people secure their property rights and establish a land database. Holding a land deed will also help those who need loan collateral to start a business, said Eddy Purwanto, a BRR official.

"The idea is to reconstruct ownership," he said, "but also to get them out of the cycle of poverty."

Officials said that one of the most difficult challenges is managing expectations. After the tsunami, with record donations pouring in and 500,000 people in need of shelter, hopes were raised that houses would be built quickly.

"Total destruction is total destruction and it takes time to rebuild -- and I'm not even referring to Katrina," said Scott Campbell, Aceh director for Catholic Relief Services. "I'm referring to Hurricanes Ivan and Charlie and others over a year old where people are still not in permanent houses. And this is coming from a country where there's loads of resources and infrastructure."

In recognition that many people here are going to have to wait until 2007 for permanent houses, international Red Cross groups, the United Nations and the BRR are building 20,000 transitional homes of galvanized steel. Officials hope to move most people out of tents by April.

In what is left of the village of Meudangghon, a mile from the sea, 30 families live in tents on a field once lush with mango, durian and orange trees. Thirty other families are in barracks in the nearest town, 45 minutes away by motorbike and ferry.

The villagers plan to rebuild on higher ground about 1 1/2 miles inland, near a mountain. The land they will build on belongs to several villagers, who have agreed to sell to their neighbors, with the local government putting up the money, said Helen Barnes, the project manager of Fauna & Flora in Aceh.

Mohammad Nasir, the village head, said the planning process has taken a long time. But he said he believes it will be worth it.

"I have faith," he said. "I am optimistic this will work."

Police In India Make An Arrest In Scholar's Death (NYT)

By Saritha Rai

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

BANGALORE, India, Jan. 3 - The police in southern India on Tuesday announced the arrest of a suspect in the shooting of a well-known scholar here as anxiety rose over the possibility of terrorist attacks aimed at the region's high-technology industries.

Heightening tensions across this relatively prosperous belt of the country, the police said they had also uncovered plots to attack outsourcing companies after arresting four other suspects possibly connected to Islamic militant groups during the past two weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0007950

The police were put on high alert in a number of cities, installing checkpoints and searching people and cars in Bangalore, Hyderabad and Madras, all flourishing cities where hundreds of outsourcing companies offer services to Western clients.

The measures taken in Hyderabad coincided with a visit to the city by Prime Minister Manmohan Singh to open the Indian Science Congress, the country's biggest meeting of scientists and scholars.

Wire reports quoted Mr. Singh as saying that terrorists were singling out India's research institutes because of the country's growing technical and scientific prowess. "The symbols and temples of our knowledge society are today being targeted by terrorists," Mr. Singh told scientists at the conference.

Ajit Kumar Mohanty, the police commissioner in Hyderabad, said the police had been "even more vigilant" since arrests two days ago revealed plans for an attack at Hi-Tech City, where most of Hyderabad's technology companies are based.

On Sunday, the Hyderabad police arrested two men suspected of being part of larger networks and seized a large quantity of explosives. Reports quoted the police as saying that the men had given details of their plans to attack technology companies by using bombs detonated by cellphones.

The first of a series of recent arrests was made in mid-December.

The police said Tuesday that they believed more such groups were holed up in the city.

Last week a gunman shot dead a retired professor, M. C. Puri, and wounded four others in the offices of the Indian Institute of Science, the country's premier science and technology institution. On Tuesday, the Bangalore police announced the arrest on Sunday of a suspect, Abdul Rahman, 35, saying he was known for "a very strong connection" to the Lashkar-e-Taiba, a militant organization based in Pakistan.

China Releases Investigative Reporter Whose Jailing Had Upset U.S. (WP)

By Philip P. Pan

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

BEIJING, Jan. 3 -- The Chinese government released a prominent investigative reporter from prison Tuesday, even as it has been intensifying a crackdown on the press. The early release appeared intended to mollify the Bush administration, which had included the journalist on a short list of political prisoners whose cases it raises regularly with Chinese officials.

Jiang Weiping, 50, who spent the last five years in prison after writing a series of hard-hitting articles on government corruption for a magazine in Hong Kong, was granted a sentence reduction for good behavior and released one year before his term was set to end, according to his wife, Li Yanling.

Several human rights groups had campaigned for Jiang's release, including the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists, which honored him with its international press freedom award in 2001.

The release was the first of a prominent political prisoner by the Chinese government in more than nine months. It came several weeks after U.S. officials expressed frustration over China's failure to free a prisoner as a gesture of goodwill in advance of President Bush's visit to Beijing in November.

Jiang was on a list of 13 prisoners that U.S. officials handed the Chinese during a 2002 meeting between Bush and Jiang Zemin, China's president at the time. Senior U.S. officials pressed for the prisoner's release in several subsequent meetings, and the U.S. ambassador to China, Clark T. Randt Jr., raised the case in speeches.

John Kamm, executive director of the San Francisco-based Dui Hua Foundation, which lobbies Chinese officials on behalf of political prisoners, said the decision could signal a new readiness by the Chinese government to address U.S. criticism of its human rights record after a period in which it appeared unwilling to make concessions.

Jiang Weiping, a former bureau chief for the Hong Kong newspaper Wen Hui Bao, was arrested in December 2000 after writing a series of articles for the magazine Frontline that exposed corruption among senior officials in the northeastern province of Liaoning. He was then sentenced to eight years in prison on charges of revealing state secrets and inciting subversion. A higher court later reduced the sentence to six years.

Jiang's supporters said he was targeted by party officials upset by his reporting, which helped uncover some of China's largest and most colorful corruption cases in recent memory. He reported, for example, that one local mayor used state money to buy apartments for 29 mistresses, and that another official lost nearly $3.6 million in public funds in casinos in Macau. That official was later arrested and executed.

DOJ_NMG_0007951

Jiang also reported that one of the Communist Party's rising stars, Bo Xilai, covered up corruption among friends and relatives during his years as mayor of the city of Dalian. Bo, who is the son of the party elder Bo Yibo, was serving as the Liaoning governor when Jiang's reports were published, and is now China's trade minister.

Jiang's release came as the government has been stepping up a crackdown on freedom of expression that began nearly two years ago. Last week, Liaoning authorities upheld the conviction of Zheng Yichun, an Internet essayist who has been sentenced to seven years in prison for writing articles criticizing the government. The same day, propaganda officials fired the editor in chief of one of the nation's most daring newspapers, the Beijing News, prompting as many as 100 journalists there to stage a one-day strike.

Last month, prosecutors concerned about the release of state secrets indicted a researcher for the New York Times, Zhao Yan, on charges related to his reporting for the newspaper. Prosecutors were also expected to make a decision this week about whether to pursue a case against a Singapore newspaper journalist, Ching Cheong, who has been detained since April on suspicion of espionage.

Australia Revisits Drug-price Cap (WSJ)

By Veronica Brooks

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

CANBERRA, Australia -- Mark Vaile, Australia's trade minister and acting prime minister, said the government may remove an amendment included in the Australia-U.S. free-trade agreement designed to contain drug prices if pharmaceutical makers can prove the provision is "commercially detrimental."

The so-called evergreening amendment was negotiated by Australia's major opposition Labor in 2004 as a condition of the center-left party's support for the trade treaty and is designed to prevent drug companies from extending medicine patents so as to delay cheaper generic versions coming to market.

Australia's free-trade agreement with the world's biggest economy came into force at the start of 2005 and will be the subject of a formal review in March.

The Australian newspaper reported yesterday that the influential U.S. pharmaceutical industry is pushing Canberra to scrap the safeguard amendment.

"I am sure that the American side, particularly industry in America, would like to have a discussion about the way those amendments, and the provisions of those amendments are operating," Mr. Vaile told Australian Broadcasting Corp. radio.

"But the point needs to be made that they would have to prove that those amendments are being commercially detrimental, which we don't believe they are.

"Under the Australian system, innovative drug companies get a very liberal dose of protection under the patent arrangements," he added. "They do have opportunities for patent extensions if there is a significant improvement in the benefits that flow from that drug, but through our process of certification and the [Therapeutic Goods Administration] we don't allow the abuse of the system."

Under Labor's amendment to the free-trade-treaty legislation, drug companies misusing the patent system to delay the release of cheaper generic pharmaceuticals face fines of as much as A$10 million (US$7.3 million), have to pay damages for any losses to the generic-drug manufacturer, and repay extra costs to federal and state governments.

Labor insisted the government adopt the amendments, adamant that safeguards were required to preserve access to affordable medicines under Canberra's A$6-billion-a-year Pharmaceutical Benefits Scheme.

Bush Administration Criticizes Russia (Ap)

By barry scwhied

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

The Bush administration criticized Russia on Tuesday for imposing limits on natural gas supplies to Europe by reducing Ukraine's share through a pipeline that carries about 80 percent of Russian gas exports to the West.

DOJ_NMG_0007952

A decision by Russia to restore most of the gas it had withheld Monday in a pricing dispute "does not resolve the issue," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Noting that Europe was in the midst of winter's cold, McCormack decried "the use of energy for political purposes."

He noted that Ukraine, a former Soviet republic, was due to hold parliamentary elections. And yet, McCormack also said he was not trying to discern Russia's motives in limiting supplies and proposing a sharp boost in gas prices.

McCormack said State Department officials were talking to both governments to try to help resolve the dispute.

Russia has acussed Ukraine of trying to steal its share of gas from Europe, an allegation that Ukraine rejects and the State Department declined to address.

Russian Natural Gas Streams Through Ukraine Once Again (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

Russian natural gas flowed across Ukraine to countries throughout Europe yesterday, banishing the specter of immediate and prolonged shortages because of Moscow's price dispute with Kiev.

But relief was tempered by the realization that the Continent's dependence on Russian natural gas means it is vulnerable to future energy crises. (See related article1.) European officials also criticized Russia's behavior and called for a diplomatic resolution with Ukraine.

Calling Russia's decision to cut off gas shipments to Ukraine on Sunday "hasty," European Union Energy Commissioner Andris Piebalgs told BBC World, "I think Russia has overplayed this issue. We have never had such a situation in the 40 years since Russia and the previous Soviet Union made gas supplies."

Demanding Ukraine agree to end years of paying below-market prices for gas, Russia Sunday cut off shipments to the country, which also carries 80% of Russia's gas exports to Europe. After European customers began reporting steep declines in the flow of Russian gas, Moscow on Monday put more gas into the pipeline.

A spokesman for Russian state-controlled gas monopoly OAO Gazprom, which supplies a quarter of Europe's gas and aims to increase those sales, also admitted that the still-simmering crisis "absolutely has a negative impact on Russia's image and reputation."

Across Europe, officials were calling for steps to reduce dependence on Russian fuel. Poland, whose energy dependency on Russia is a legacy of its former status as a satellite of Moscow, launched an urgent search for new suppliers of natural gas. "I've instructed the economy minister to urgently prepare investment decisions allowing us to diversify gas supplies," Prime Minister Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz said.

Mr. Piebalgs said, "The situation has shown how vulnerable the union is to shortages of gas supply." A meeting today of representatives of EU member states and the gas industry will discuss how they would deal with future threats to Europe's supply. The Continent has few alternatives for supply with Norway producing at capacity and British gas fields in decline.

Both Russia and Ukraine showed interest yesterday in resolving the gas cutoff, which led to Monday's Europe-wide shortages, Russian accusations that Ukraine was at fault for stealing Europe-bound gas and Ukrainian denials. Gazprom said talks were planned with Ukrainian officials, though there was no sign of a compromise.

While European officials said the conflict is an economic one over prices, the crisis has clear political overtones. Under a 2004 deal with the previous government in Kiev, Moscow had agreed to continue to supply inexpensive fuel to Ukraine through 2009. But after pro-Western President Viktor Yushchenko took office early last year, Moscow has sought to raise the prices to world-market levels. The sides differ on what the terms of the contracts mean.

Gazprom officials said there is no valid contract for shipments to Ukraine this year and warned that the gas titan might not be able to continue to keep up supplies for European customers if demand in Ukraine -- now low because of unseasonably warm weather -- rises. Ukrainian officials said they were taking only gas they are entitled to under past agreements.

Gas Halt May Produce Big Ripples In European Policy (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0007953

FRANKFURT, Jan. 3 - Russia's shutdown of natural gas lines to Ukraine lasted less than 48 hours, but the repercussions could last far longer in Western Europe, which also relies heavily on Russian gas.

Even as the flow of gas to Germany, France and other countries resumed at normal levels by Tuesday evening, public officials and energy experts called on the Continent to rethink its energy policy.

Russia's standoff with Ukraine has exposed a deep European dependence on Russia, the officials and experts said. To reduce that vulnerability, they said, Europe should seek out other gas suppliers and develop alternative fuels, like clean-burning coal, nuclear power and renewable energy.

"If Russia is prepared to run the risk of cutting off supplies to its neighbors if they have a disagreement, how reliable are they as a supplier?" said William Ramsay, deputy executive director of the International Energy Agency, which advises 26 industrialized nations. "You have to ask the question."

Russia is virtually the sole supplier of gas to large swaths of Central and Eastern Europe, and to close neighbors like Finland. France and Italy buy between a quarter and a third of their imported gas from Russia.

In Germany, which is by far Russia's largest customer and has made energy the cornerstone of a broad economic alliance with Moscow, some experts said the standoff might even have political implications.

"Germany's alliance with Russia was not just conceived as a commercial deal, but as a way to integrate Russia into Europe," said Alexander Rahr, a Russia expert at the German Council on Foreign Relations in Berlin. "This could be in jeopardy if the gas dispute continues."

The European Union, he said, is likely to rush to Ukraine's defense in its dispute with Russia over gas prices, giving Germany little choice but to fall in line. And Russia can no longer count on the friendship between President Vladimir V. Putin and Gerhard Schröder, who stepped down as German chancellor in November.

Mr. Schröder's successor, Angela Merkel, has not commented publicly on the dispute between Moscow and Kiev. But her economics minister, Michael Glos, said Monday that Germany would increase its Russian gas purchases only if Moscow proved itself to be a dependable supplier.

Mr. Glos also rekindled a debate over Germany's larger energy policy, saying the new government ought to reconsider the Schröder government's plan to phase out nuclear power by 2021.

Mrs. Merkel supports extending the life of Germany's nuclear plants. But during negotiations to form a government, she was unable to persuade the Social Democrats with whom she shares power to shelve the planned phase-out, which had been championed by Mr. Schröder's coalition partner, the Green Party.

"The latest developments show how important it is to draw on a balanced, broad energy mix," Mr. Glos said in a statement on Monday. In a radio interview, he added, "The German nuclear power plants were doomed by the Red-Green coalition to be switched off only for political reasons."

Some experts predicted that Russia's recent actions would strengthen Mrs. Merkel's hand. Germany imports more than 40 percent of its gas from Russia, and within hours of the shutdown, the largest German supplier, E.ON Ruhrgas, said it was not getting its normal amounts of gas.

"We understand that Russia cannot continue to subsidize Ukraine with very cheap gas, given rising market prices," the company's chairman, Burckhard Bergmann, said in a statement. "But it is also important to raise prices to the international market level in steps that Ukraine can cope with."

Mr. Bergmann's careful tone is not surprising, given his company's complex ties with Russia. Ruhrgas owns a stake in Gazprom, Russia's gas monopoly, in addition to being one of its main customers. It is also a partner with Gazprom in a $4.7 billion project to build a pipeline from Russia, under the Baltic Sea, to Germany and other parts of Western Europe.

Mr. Schröder brokered that deal with Mr. Putin shortly before he left office. He later accepted a job as the chairman of the board of a Russian-German consortium that is building the pipeline - a decision that drew withering criticism from across the political spectrum here.

Experts note that the energy alliance between Germany and Russia originated under Helmut Kohl, Mrs. Merkel's political mentor, not Mr. Schröder - a fact the chancellor is sure to recall when she visits Moscow this month. She is unlikely to derail an arrangement that has profited both nations.

DOJ_NMG_0007954

"She might tell them when she goes there about the mess one can make by using energy as a political tool," said Mr. Rahr. "But she will do nothing to question the energy alliance between Germany and Russia."

Other experts argue that the European Union should negotiate an agreement with Russia that guarantees fair prices to all its members. Otherwise, there will be further disputes like this one.

While many here said they welcomed a debate over energy policy, some worried that it would be limited to perennial topics like nuclear power rather than forward-looking issues, like renewable energy.

Ukraine, for example, has the most potential of any European country to generate energy from crops, grasses and trees, often referred to as biomass, because of its rich soil and low population density, according to Hermann Scheer, president of the European Association for Renewable Energy.

"Those who prolong the current energy system are simply provoking things like the gas dispute," he said.

Ukrainians Angry Over Moscow Gas Dispute (AP)

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

KIEV, Ukraine — Disgruntled Ukrainians thronged Bessarabsky Market in downtown Kiev in freezing temperatures Tuesday to buy electric heaters after a natural gas cutoff by Russia brought on by a pricing dispute.

The halt of Russian gas supplies that began Sunday has not yet caused major heating problems, but Kiev residents feared the two sides were far from a resolution. Russian and Ukrainian officials agreed Tuesday to resume talks on the issue.

Residents of the capital largely blamed Russia, which wants Ukraine to pay four times more for gas than it did last year.

"It's Russia's revamped imperialism behind all this. They believe that with the cutoff of gas they can dominate us," said Valentyn Vasilyev, 32, who was among those buying a heater.

"Thanks to Russia I am now wasting handsome money on an electric heater. But Muscovites will not win this time," said 46-year-old Olena Kostenko, wiping her nose as it started to snow.

For the vendor doing a brisk trade at the open-air stand, the gas dispute has been good news. He sold 10 heaters in less than an hour, for $21 each.

"I regret I didn't have more of these," said Yuriy, who gave only his first name because he feared legal problems for selling unlicensed goods. "People are buying like crazy."

Nearby a poster read, "Do not buy Russian goods," and "Do not give money to Russian oppressors."

The cutoff also reduced gas supplies to Europe, which gets about a quarter of its gas from Ukraine, though the European countries most affected _ Hungary, Austria, Slovakia and Slovenia _ reported supplies were back to normal Tuesday.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack criticized Russia for "the use of energy for political purposes."

Noting that Europe was in the midst of winter's cold, McCormack said the decision by Russia to restore most of the gas it had withheld Monday to European countries "does not resolve the issue,"

The gas dispute highlights Ukraine's dependence on Russia as the key supplier to its energy inefficient industries. It also demonstrates Russia's opposition to Ukraine's attempts to break out of the Kremlin's sphere of influence and join the European Union and NATO.

Ukraine's tilt toward the West since President Viktor Yushchenko took office a year ago has irritated the Kremlin.

Ukraine's Foreign Ministry has characterized the gas dispute as an attempt by Moscow to wreck Ukraine's economy as the country tries to integrate into Western Europe.

Some Ukrainians, however, mainly pensioners with strong emotional ties to the former Soviet Union, still believe the country's future lies in the renewal of centuries-long economic, ethnic, religious and cultural links with Russia.

"What are we without Russia? A wasteland, nothing. You argue with a bear and it will ultimately eat you," retired army officer Mykola Kostenyk said.

Many communities in Ukraine's west reported a decrease in gas supplies and local providers said they would stop heating schools during the winter holidays.

In the key western city of Lviv, several factories reported shifting from gas to coal or oil as their primary energy source.

DOJ_NMG_0007955

On Tuesday, a pro-Russian opposition bloc loyal to Ukraine's first post-Soviet president, Leonid Kravchuk, demanded an urgent parliamentary session about the gas dispute and said a new caretaker government should be appointed until March parliamentary elections.

In a statement, Kravchuk's bloc said the current Cabinet, loyal to Yushchenko and Prime Minister Yuriy Yekhanurov, "cannot be an effective participant in any talks with the Russian side, including the gas issue."

Yushchenko and his allies "took a deliberately hostile position toward Russia on a broad range of international issues," the statement said.

Meanwhile, the office of the prosecutor general ordered a probe into the activities of all companies responsible for storing and securing gas supplies throughout Ukraine and overseeing "all the activities related with rational use of energy," a statement said.

Gas Price Dispute Worries Europeans (WT)

By Andrew Borowiec And David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

A bitter pricing dispute with Ukraine that briefly disrupted Russia's natural-gas supplies to Europe has fueled fears over Moscow's growing clout as an energy supplier to the Continent.

Gas shipments through Ukraine to Europe returned to normal yesterday -- a day after they were severely restricted in the pricing fight -- but doubts about Russia's reliability and intentions as an energy supplier dominated the European press.

"Welcome to the new Cold War," wrote the London Times, describing Moscow's leading role as energy supplier "Russia's most powerful weapon in its post-Soviet arsenal."

The dispute put in sharp relief two contrasting priorities of Russian President Vladimir Putin's foreign policy: his desire to use Russia's energy reserves to cement ties to Europe and his willingness to use those same resources to bring Ukraine's pro-Western government to heel.

Vladimir Socor, an analyst with the Jamestown Foundation, said Mr. Putin's goals in the dispute are "twofold."

He wants to "defeat Ukraine's [pro-Western] Orange political camp in the upcoming political elections and compel Ukraine to turn its transit-pipeline system into a Russian-Ukrainian consortium," Mr. Socor wrote in an analysis of the crisis.

Analysts said yesterday Moscow may have underestimated how badly the shutdown will damage its reputation in Europe, which now gets a quarter of its natural gas from Russia. The dispute also comes just as Russia assumes for the first time the chairmanship of the Group of Eight industrial powers.

London's Daily Mail called Russia's G-8 presidency "a travesty the West will come to regret," while in Paris, the conservative Le Figaro's headline proclaimed: "Putin plunges Europe into difficulty."

European Union officials said yesterday there was no immediate supply crisis, but EU Energy Commissioner Andris Piebalgs told reporters that "the situation has shown how vulnerable the Union is to shortages of gas supply."

Representatives of the 25 EU member states and the gas industry meet today in Brussels on ways to deal with future threats to Europe's gas supply.

Russian and Ukrainian energy officials began separate talks yesterday in Moscow to discuss the dispute.

The showdown pushed up world oil prices in New York and London markets.

Russian officials deny a political motive in the showdown, saying they switched off Ukraine's gas because Kiev rejected an abrupt, fourfold increase in gas prices to market levels. Russia also accuses Kiev of siphoning off pipeline shipments meant for European customers.

The Bush administration, which has strongly backed new Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko, said Gazprom's sharp price increase "raises questions about the use of energy to exert political pressure," according to State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

"Such a change should be introduced over time, rather than suddenly and unilaterally," Mr. McCormack said.

EU Could Step In To Help Solve Gas Dispute (FT)

By Sarah Laitner In Brussels And Tom Warner In Kiev

DOJ_NMG_0007956

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

Energy experts meet on Wednesday in Brussels to thrash out the EU's response to the Russia-Ukraine gas dispute after the stand-off led to a cut in European supplies.

European diplomats in Kiev said the EU could be prepared to play a more proactive role to help solve the dispute.

The threat to European supplies has renewed the debate over whether the EU needs a common energy policy to address its growing dependence on imported oil and gas.

The European Commission on Tuesday defended itself against criticism that it should have reacted more rapidly to the disruption when Russia cut the amount of gas it exports via a pipeline in Ukraine. Gas supplies to France fell 30 per cent on Monday, while countries in eastern Europe that rely heavily on Russian exports saw even bigger falls. The Commission insisted the dispute was between a gas supplier and transit operator.

Brussels has few weapons in its arsenal to respond to threats to EU supplies because energy policies are largely dealt with by the member states.

Tony Blair, British prime minister, raised eyebrows in October when he called for a common EU energy policy that included countries co-ordinating efforts to negotiate with suppliers.

"For far too long we have been in the situation where, in a haphazard and random way energy needs and energy priorities are simply determined in each country according to its needs, but without any sense of the collective power we could have in Europe if we were prepared to pool our energy and our resources," Mr Blair told the European parliament.

But member states have been reluctant to extend Brussels' powers over such a sensitive area as energy.

Predictions that two thirds of Europe's total energy and three quarters of its gas will be imported by 2020 are likely to spur calls for greater co-ordination to secure supplies.

Part of the difficulty lies in defining what a common European energy policy would be. The EU has spent more than a decade liberalising gas and electricity markets to create a single pan-European market, efforts which have been hampered by structural weaknesses in Europe's energy network and a lack of competition.

But member states have reacted coolly to ideas such as Commission control over strategic oil reserves or direction from Brussels on nuclear power options.

In a paper prepared for the British presidency of the EU, which ended last month, Prof Dieter Helm of Oxford University suggested measures such as creation of an EU gas security and storage regime and a European information exchange on future capacity plans.

Ukraine Concedes It Took Gas From Pipeline But Says It Had The Contractual Right (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

KIEV, Ukraine, Jan. 3 - Ukraine conceded Tuesday that it had withdrawn natural gas from its pipeline system that Russia said was intended for export to Europe, but said it had a contractual right to the fuel under an agreement with the Central Asian nation of Turkmenistan.

Both Russia and Turkmenistan export natural gas through Russian pipelines to Ukraine, which customarily takes some for its own use and ships the rest on to other European countries. But Russia cut the flow through the pipeline on Sunday, ostensibly in a dispute with Ukraine over pricing and transit fees. That set off alarm bells throughout Europe during the winter heating season and shook world energy markets' confidence in Russia.

Russia placed blame for the shortages on Ukraine, saying it stole gas intended for export, but under pressure from European governments, Russia restored full flow to the pipeline on Monday. Despite the bickering, the two countries resumed negotiations on gas prices on Tuesday.

Nevertheless, the price of crude oil leapt by more than $2 a barrel on Tuesday in afternoon trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange, fed by concerns over Russia's reliability. Crude oil prices rose to a two-month high of $63.80 a barrel at midday before pulling back slightly.

DOJ_NMG_0007957

While admitting that they took their usual allotment of gas on Tuesday, Ukrainian officials dismissed Russian claims that the gas had been stolen. Mikola Goncharuk, a member of the board of Ukraine's natural gas company, Naftogaz, said at a news conference in Kiev that his company had indeed drawn down gas from the pipeline system, but under a contract with Turkmenistan. Russian export gas, he said, was untouched.

"We are demanding the full volume of gas from Turkmenistan today," Mr. Goncharuk said. "For now we can get by without Russian gas."

Gazprom, Russia's government-owned gas company, insists that the pipeline carries only Russian gas for export to Europe.

Meanwhile, the political fallout continued from Russia's brief gas embargo, which was widely regarded in Europe as punishment of Ukraine for its rejection of Moscow in elections last year and its continued turn to the West and away from the Russian orbit.

In Washington, the State Department spokesman criticized Russia's use of energy as a foreign policy tool, while Austria and other Central and Eastern European countries agreed to make the diversification of energy supplies a priority, though they did not say how they would achieve it.

The European Union's top energy official said Tuesday that the pricing dispute could fester for weeks to come, jeopardizing one of the Continent's primary sources of energy. Andris Piebalgs, the energy commissioner, said the agreement by the two sides to resume talks on the issue was "just a temporary calmdown," according to the Bloomberg news agency.

Each side in the dispute has plausibly blamed the other because the pipeline system, a great achievement of the Soviet Union's postwar industrial expansion, was built as a unified web. After the Soviet Union broke up, the successor states divided the gas flow through treaties and commercial agreements that grew more complex each year.

Companies subsidized others, shrewd businessmen made millions or billions exploiting price discrepancies, gas utilities became government slush funds and corruption blossomed.

The gas is sometimes mingled in the web of pipes. In the argument on Tuesday, Ukraine said some of the gas entering its pipeline system had been bought from Turkmenistan and shipped by an intermediary company. Mr. Goncharuk said his company paid last Friday for 126 million cubic meters a day of gas from Turkmenistan, for an unspecified period.

He said that Ukraine therefore had a right to withdraw that volume of gas from its pipelines, but that it had chosen to take only 90 million cubic meters out of concern for the security of natural gas flows to Europe during the winter.

The Russian minister of industry and energy, Viktor Khristenko, said Tuesday that Gazprom had contracted the entire export capacity of Turkmenistan for the first quarter of 2006, the Dow Jones news service reported.

In statements carried in the Russian news media, Turkmenistan's mercurial and authoritarian leader, Saparmurat Niyazov, who presides over a closed nation deep in Central Asia, shed little light on the dispute. He has confirmed sales to Ukraine without elaborating on the discrepancy with Gazprom's statements. Gazprom controls the pipeline leading north from his country.

Mr. Goncharuk also asserted that Ukraine had a right to withdraw additional gas from the pipelines in lieu of transit fees from Russia under a barter agreement reached in 2004 and in force in 2005.

Volodymyr R. Sidenko, chief economist at the Institute of Economic Forecasting in the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, said: "Ukraine considers if we have not arrived at any agreement, the old one is in effect. The Russian side rejects these arguments."

Meanwhile, the gas dispute has already dented Ukraine's energy-intensive economy. Chemical and metallurgical industries slowed production to reduce demand by 15 to 20 percent, according to a statement by the Ukrainian government.

While Kiev scored points for withstanding what European nations almost universally regarded as Russia's intimidation tactics, its energy troubles are far from over.

Natural gas-guzzling steel mills and chemical plants earn much of Ukraine's export revenues. Outdated and inefficient, many have scraped by since the collapse of the Soviet Union only because of cheap energy from Russia. Market-rate energy prices, which Ukrainian officials acknowledge they must pay eventually, could plunge Ukraine back into recession, officials here have said.

On average, metallurgical plants would become unprofitable at natural gas prices above $105 per 1,000 cubic meters, according to estimates by Mr. Sidenko. The chemical industry would be unprofitable at prices above $85, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0007958

Under the 2005 contract, negotiated before the Orange Revolution, Ukraine pays $50 per 1,000 cubic meters. Gazprom is asking for $220 to $230 now, about double what most other former Soviet states pay.

Gazprom Says Gas Supplies Back on (REU)

By Christian Lowe

Reuters, January 4, 2006

MOSCOW (Reuters) - Russia's gas deliveries to European customers returned to normal on Tuesday as it traded insults with former ally Ukraine over who was to blame for supply disruptions across the continent.

Russian energy officials were set to meet counterparts from Ukraine on Tuesday to discuss the dispute but there was no sign of a softening of tone on either side in a dispute with clear political overtones.

Russia switched off Ukraine's gas when Kiev rejected a big hike in prices. It was forced to turn the taps back on after key European partners complained their supplies had been hit too and chided Moscow for using energy as a political tool.

Relations between the ex-Soviet allies, already strained after Ukraine elected a West-leaning leader a year ago, have now hit a new low with the gas dispute.

Russia has accused Ukraine of stealing gas intended for other European countries. Ukraine says Russia is lying.

The crisis has lent new urgency to efforts by European states to reevaluate their energy policy to ensure supplies are secure. EU energy officials meet for emergency talks on Wednesday.

Italy, Germany and France said their gas supplies from Russia were back to normal after Russia's state-run Gazprom pushed extra gas into the system to make up for the earlier shortfall.

However, Gazprom warned there was still a risk of supply disruptions to Europe if Ukraine continues to steal gas.

"There is still a danger that the situation could develop in such a way that we are not going to be in a position to compensate," Gazprom deputy CEO Alexander Medvedev told Reuters in an interview.

Ukraine has said it will help itself to Russian gas piped across its territory if temperatures dip below freezing.

MEETING PLANNED

Senior officials from Gazprom and Ukraine's state Naftogaz company were to meet later on Tuesday for the first time since negotiations collapsed in the final hours of 2005.

But the gulf between them was huge. In Moscow and Kiev, everyone from gas executives, television anchors, prime ministers and foreign ministry spokesmen lined up to blame the other side for the crisis.

Russia said it was Ukraine's fault by refusing to pay the same prices as its European neighbours, rejecting a last-minute compromise offered by Putin and then stealing Europe's gas when Gazprom, in exasperation, finally turned the taps off.

Ukraine was just as vehement. "The fact is that Gazprom officials are lying," said Naftogaz Ukrainy spokesman Eduard Zanyuk.

Ukraine said the Kremlin was punishing it for daring to pull away from its sphere of influence.

The Kremlin has made no secret of its dislike of the West-leaning stand of Ukraine's President Viktor Yushchenko who rose to power a year ago after mass protests forced a rerun of an election initially won by a Moscow-backed candidate.

Moscow is demanding an increase in the price Ukraine pays for its gas to $230 (133 pounds) per 1,000 cubic metres from the current $50 price that is rooted in Soviet-era subsidies.

Ukraine says such a big hike will badly damage its economy.

Ukraine's gross domestic product may fall by 5 percent and inflation rise to 27-30 percent in 2006 if the price for Russian gas increases to $230, a senior government official was quoted as saying on Tuesday by Unian news agency.

ENERGY RETHINK

The wobble in gas supplies sent a chill through capitals and energy markets, with some analysts saying the disruption had hurt Russia's credibility as a dependable supplier of energy.

Prices for oil -- Russia's other major money earner -- jumped a dollar to just over $60 a barrel as consumers feared the row could yet crimp fuel supplies to Europe. In Britain -- Europe's only major, freely traded gas market -- wholesale prices rose as much as 8 percent on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0007959

Tony Blair's spokesman said the British Prime Minister has long believed the EU needed a more coherent energy policy to meet the challenges of energy supply and security.

"These events have underlined the Prime Minister's thinking in making that argument," said the spokesman.

Noe Van Hulst, a director with energy watchdog the International Energy Agency, said Russia was playing a risky game.

"From the Russians' perspective, it's not in their long term interest to put their reputation (as a reliable energy supplier) ... at risk. It's dangerous," Van Hulst told Reuters.

It was unclear how the row would play out politically for Ukraine's Yushchenko.

His supporters say by cutting off gas Moscow had tried to put his administration in a bad light ahead of a March parliamentary election, when his biggest challengers will be the pro-Moscow parties.

But some analysts said the crisis would cost the pro-Moscow opposition support if voters view Russia's actions as aggressive and unfriendly.

Russia's Energy Politics (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

RUSSIAN PRESIDENT Vladimir Putin once again has overplayed his hand. In his zeal to reestablish Moscow's dominion over Ukraine, he has, as he did during the Orange Revolution, triggered an international crisis that could end up weakening rather than strengthening Russia's international position. Mr. Putin hoped that by shutting off gas supplies to Ukraine on Sunday, he could undermine its democratic and pro-Western government. Instead, he has provided a timely wake-up call to Western European countries dependent on Russian energy supplies. Those nations now see how Mr. Putin understands the question of "energy security," which he would make one of the principal topics for discussion by the Group of Eight this year.

For Ukraine and other former Soviet republics, Russia's crude use of energy for political ends is an old story. For years Moscow has been using its control over natural gas to reward neighbors who submit to its political diktat, such as Belarus, and punish those who seek greater independence, such as Georgia and Moldova. It has also been trying to gain control over pipelines carrying gas and oil, as well as electricity networks, by using gas as a lever. That leverage is considerable: Russia holds more than a quarter of the world's gas supplies and is a major supplier to virtually every country in Europe.

Ukraine used to be one of Moscow's pampered clients. In 2004, as part of his overt attempt to install a pro-Moscow puppet as Ukrainian president, Mr. Putin promised to heavily subsidize Ukraine's gas for years to come. But his meddling catalyzed the Orange Revolution, which gave Ukraine a democratic government determined to preserve its independence. So now Mr. Putin, acting baldly through the state-controlled company Gazprom, is seeking to quadruple the price Ukraine pays just weeks before parliamentary elections in which pro-Moscow parties are bidding to regain power. In partially shutting down supplies on Sunday, Mr. Putin calculated that Ukraine would allow Russian gas free transit to countries farther west through the same pipeline -- or, if it did not, that Western governments would blame Kiev.

Instead, when gas pressure fell off sharply yesterday in Vienna, Rome and Paris, it was Mr. Putin who was reproached -- including by such customers as Germany, which recently agreed to a controversial plan for a new pipeline under the Baltic Sea. Mr. Putin was forced to back down, though the underlying price dispute with Ukraine remains unresolved. He has a sensible way out of the conflict, which the Bush administration is urging on him: a negotiation in which Ukraine agrees to a gradual shift toward world market prices. Poland and the Baltic countries have cut such deals with Russia in the past -- though the prices they pay Gazprom are nowhere near what Mr. Putin proposed to charge Ukraine.

Even if Mr. Putin adopts this course, Western countries should absorb an important lesson. Without a prosperous or technologically advanced economy and with greatly reduced military strength, Mr. Putin hopes to restore Russia's world-power status through its control of gas. That inevitably means manipulating supplies to other countries for political ends. Western countries that do not wish to receive Mr. Putin's ultimatums -- from Germany, France and Britain to the United States, which is being pressed by Russia to line up as a major customer for new Arctic gas fields -- should realize that dependence on Russian gas is not consistent with "energy security." Instead they should develop alternative sources of supply, or a greater emphasis on nuclear energy. Russia cannot be allowed to hold its neighbors, or the world, hostage during a future cold winter.

Russia Shoots Itself In The Foot (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0007960

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

If President Vladimir Putin wants to convince the world that Russia is a more reliable energy supplier than the Middle East, playing and losing a game of chicken with Ukraine was not the way to go. Mr. Putin tried to use a pricing dispute between Gazprom, Russia's behemoth, and Naftogaz of Ukraine to punish President Viktor Yushchenko for Ukraine's westward leanings. Instead, he gave Russia another black eye and antagonized Europe.

When Gazprom turned down the natural gas spigot a notch, Ukraine simply took what it needed, leaving Europe short of fuel, furious and anxious. That's not a great start for Mr. Putin's turn at the head of the Group of 8, especially since energy security was to be his theme song.

Not that the conflict reflects that well on Ukraine. Russia has long charged wildly different rates to former Soviet republics, depending on their degree of loyalty or usefulness. Thus Belarus, which ceded control of all its pipelines to Russia and is firmly in the Kremlin's orbit, pays $47 per 1,000 cubic meters, while Estonia and Latvia, both in the European Union and NATO, pay about $120. The average price in Western Europe is expected to go over $250 this year. Ukraine had been paying $50, and using the energy wastefully and corruptly. Mr. Yushchenko has also been using cheap fuel as a lure for Western investors. Well, if Ukraine wants to play in the West, it may soon have to pay like the West.

Russia is still a more secure energy supplier than the Middle East. But Europe and the United States should remind Mr. Putin that energy security is a two-way street. Ukraine has no permanent right to a gas subsidy, but as long as Mr. Putin uses pricing to reward and punish, he undermines Russia's claim to be a reliable, businesslike supplier.

Morales Aligns Himself With Castro, Chavez (AP)

By Christopher Toothaker

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela — President Hugo Chavez offered Bolivia's president-elect diesel fuel, trade benefits and help in financing his social reforms as the two leftists cemented ties, reasserting their opposition to U.S. policy in Latin America.

Fresh from a visit with Cuba's Fidel Castro, Evo Morales said in Caracas at the start of a seven-nation world tour that he and the Venezuelan leader were uniting in a "fight against neoliberalism and imperialism."

Morales' next stops are Spain, France, Belgium, South Africa, China and Brazil — but not Washington. Morales' spokesman says he was not invited to Washington, where officials have expressed concern of the growing alliance between Morales, Chavez and Castro.

The Venezuelan leader received him with full military honors as well as hugs and smiles. Crowds of leftist, pro-government supporters cheered as Morales and Chavez arrived at the National Pantheon in downtown Caracas, then headed to a private meeting at Miraflores Palace.

Morales, who takes office as Bolivia's first Indian president on Jan. 22, predicted more leftist leaders would come to power in the region Tuesday in Caracas.

"The time of the people has arrived. This is the new millenium of the people," he said before leaving later that evening for Spain.

During the trip, Morales is expected to discuss with other leaders Bolivia's vast natural gas holdings — the second largest in South America — which he has said he wants to nationalize. But he says he would leave alone foreign oil and gas companies.

The trip is also designed to show that the coca-growing protest organizer has the presidential grit to hold his own on the world stage and tackle the deep problems of his country, including poverty and political instability.

At a joint news conference, Chavez said Venezuela would supply 150,000 barrels of diesel fuel monthly to Bolivia to supplant the impoverished country's imports.

"I won't accept you paying us a cent, you are going to pay us in agricultural products," said Chavez, adding that the offer was worth $180 million a year.

Chavez also said Venezuela will donate $30 million to Morales' government following his Jan. 22 inauguration.

In praising Castro and Chavez on Tuesday, he clearly established Washington's fiercest Latin American critics as his models.

DOJ_NMG_0007961

"We are here to resolve social problems, economic problems," Morales said. "This movement is not only in Bolivia; Fidel in Cuba and Hugo in Venezuela are logging triumphs in social movements and leftist policies."

"We are going to change Bolivia. We are going to change Latin America," Morales said.

Chavez referred to the three leftist leaders as "an axis of good" — a play on President Bush's reference to North Korea, Iran and prewar Iraq as the "axis of evil."

Just back from his first trip abroad over the weekend — to communist Cuba — Morales met on Monday with U.S. Ambassador David Greenlee. Representatives of both sides said the meeting was private and declined to give details.

Morales vowed during his campaign to be Washington's "nightmare," but has said he is open to developing relations with the United States. American officials, too, have said they hope to work with Morales.

"We'll see what kinds of policies President Morales pursues," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. "And, based on that, we'll see what kind of relationship the United States and Bolivia will have."

Chavez says he is leading a socialist revolution and has taken increasing control of the oil and gas industry.

High oil prices and the greater share of industry profits have allowed him to fund growing social programs, a goal Morales says he shares.

Morales' opposition to U.S.-led efforts to eradicate coca cultivation in his Andean nation also have alarmed Washington. Coca is the source of cocaine, but Bolivia's Indians also use it for hunger suppression and medicinal purposes.

Morales tended llamas as a young boy and rose to power at the head of street demonstrations that toppled two presidents, demanding that more power be transferred from the country's long-ruling lighter-skinned elite to Bolivia's poor Indian majority.

Peru Asks Chile To Extradite Fujimori To Face A Range Of Charges (NYT)

By Larry Rohter And Pascale Bonnefoy

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile, Jan. 3 - The government of Peru formally requested Tuesday that Chile extradite former President Alberto Fujimori, who governed Peru during the 1990's and has been held in custody here ever since he unexpectedly arrived two months ago from exile in Japan.

Mr. Fujimori, 67, is wanted in Peru on more than a dozen counts of corruption and violating human rights. The accusations against him range from bearing the responsibility for death squad killings and unauthorized wiretaps to paying bribes and siphoning money from government ministries.

In the past, Mr. Fujimori has denied all of the charges against him, saying they are part of a political campaign to discredit him. Peru is scheduled to hold an election for president in April, and though Mr. Fujimori has been ruled ineligible because of the charges, he had declared himself a candidate and was apparently on his way back to Peru to campaign when he landed here in November.

Relations between Chile and Peru have been tense for more than a century, and remain so because of disagreements over maritime boundaries. But at a news conference, the Chilean foreign minister, Ignacio Walker, said the Fujimori case was a purely legal matter, not an affair of state. "The courts offer guarantees of complete impartiality," he said. "This should not perturb our bilateral relations in any way."

Leaders of Peruvian human rights organizations and relatives of death-squad victims came from Lima to lobby for extradition. "We hope that the Chilean courts will act as consistently as they have recently with Pinochet," said Francisco Soberón, a member of one such group, referring to the former Chilean dictator who has been stripped of his immunity from prosecution for human rights abuses and corruption offenses.

Under Chilean law, government lawyers will now question Mr. Fujimori about the charges against him. Eventually, the case will move to the Chilean Supreme Court, which may take months to rule. "We are convinced there is more than enough evidence than what the Chilean Supreme Court normally requires for an indictment," José Miguel Vivanco, the executive director of Human Rights Watch, said in an interview here. "Denial of extradition would be incomprehensible, inexcusable."

When Mr. Fujimori arrived here, he was given a 90-day tourist visa, which expires Feb. 7. Theoretically, Chile's president, Ricardo Lagos, could decide not to renew the visa and have Mr. Fujimori expelled to Peru.

DOJ_NMG_0007962

There are, however, local legal precedents that work in Mr. Fujimori's favor, including some involving both Nazi war criminals and former associates of Mr. Fujimori. When Argentine judges recently sought the arrest and extradition of one of that country's former presidents, Carlos Saúl Menem, after he went into exile here, Chilean courts turned down their requests.

Mr. Fujimori, in fact, has hired Mr. Menem's lawyer, Gabriel Zaliasnik. Mr. Zaliasnik said last month that his client had come here because he "thought that the Chilean authorities would not discriminate against him" but that they would "treat him the same way they did with respect to Carlos Menem."

Hours after his arrival here, Mr. Fujimori was detained because of the charges he faces, and remains in custody at a police training school. His lawyer said Mr. Fujimori had been learning to play guitar and cultivating a small rose garden, but the Peruvian authorities complain that he has also been using meetings with relatives and associates to direct his supporters' actions back home.

Peru Asks Chile To Extradite Fujimori (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

BUENOS AIRES, Jan. 3 -- Peru's government on Tuesday formally asked Chile to extradite former president Alberto Fujimori and handed over 12 boxes of evidence that it said links him to human rights violations and corruption.

Fujimori was arrested on Nov. 7 in Chile, after defying an international warrant and returning to South America from Japan, which had granted him asylum when he fled Peru in 2000 during a corruption scandal. At the time of his arrest, Fujimori said he had hoped to return to Peru to run for president in this year's election.

The Peruvian government is seeking to prosecute Fujimori on 12 charges of crimes alleged to have been committed during his 1990-2000 presidency, including responsibility for a death squad accused of killing 25 people in two incidents. He also is accused of torture, illegal telephone surveillance, misuse of government funds and bribery. Fujimori denies all the charges.

Officials said the evidence presented to the Chilean Foreign Ministry includes testimony from many former Fujimori allies, several of whom have been tried in recent years for acts committed during Fujimori's authoritarian administration. Among those convicted were cabinet ministers, an ex-armed forces chief and Vladimiro Montesinos, a former intelligence chief who has been sentenced to 15 years on corruption and arms-dealing charges.

A Chilean Supreme Court judge is to rule on whether the evidence meets the main requirement for extradition -- establishing probable cause for a trial on charges considered serious crimes in both Peru and Chile.

"My sense is that there is enough evidence for any reasonable court to justify Fujimori's extradition," said Jose Miguel Vivanco, Americas director of New York-based Human Rights Watch. "Many key members of Fujimori's government have consistently implicated him in cases that are clearly crimes in Peru and also in Chile."

The Peruvian government also asked that Chile continue to detain Fujimori, who is being held at a correctional officers academy in Santiago, the capital. A spokesman for Fujimori in Lima, the Peruvian capital, told the Reuters news agency that his attorneys were seeking his release.

The extradition process could be lengthy, with many observers predicting deliberations that could stretch over several months and possibly more than a year. A judge on Chile's Supreme Court, Orlando Alvarez, is to review the evidence and question Fujimori and other witnesses. His decision could be appealed to a panel of five justices, which would issue a final decision.

Even though the Peruvian Congress banned Fujimori from running for president until at least 2011, the former leader had announced his intention to run before his arrest. His backers have continued to promote his candidacy, holding rallies on his behalf. Supporters praise Fujimori for having crushed the violent Shining Path rebel group and controlling hyperinflation with austere fiscal policies.

Blair Presses Bush On Engine Deal (REU-Y2)

By Jim Wolf

Reuters, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0007963

British Prime Minister Tony Blair has written to U.S. President George W. Bush to try to save a multibillion-dollar contract to develop an engine for the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, the Pentagon's costliest warplane program, people familiar with the matter said on Tuesday.

"A letter went from the prime minister to the president shortly before Christmas," said a person who asked not to be identified because of the matter's sensitivity.

At issue is a Pentagon plan, reported last week but in the works for more than a month, to kill a $2.4 billion General Electric Co.-Rolls-Royce Plc contract to develop an alternate turbofan engine for the fighter.

Pratt & Whitney, a United Technologies Corp. unit, is building the engine that will go in the first F-35s, a family of single-engine, radar-evading aircraft being built by Lockheed Martin Corp..

Proponents of an alternate engine have cited potential savings through competition. They also describe it as a hedge against having to ground the fleet in case of engine trouble. But developing a second engine has boosted development costs, something the Pentagon is under pressure to pare.

SALES IN THE BALANCE

If upheld by the White House and Congress in budget wrangling, canceling the project could mean tens of billions of dollars in extra sales over decades for Pratt & Whitney.

Saving the alternate engine program "was the purpose of (Blair's) letter," another person familiar the matter said.

"We're gratified by the efforts of our partner, Rolls-Royce, which has shared concerns with the U.K. government," said Rick Kennedy, a spokesman for Cincinnati, Ohio-based GE/Aviation, a GE division.

Rolls-Royce described the alternate engine program in a statement as "an important collaboration" between the United States and the United Kingdom but declined to comment on the Pentagon's cancellation plan.

The White House did not return a phone call seeking comment. Steve Atkins, a spokesman for the British Embassy in Washington, said: "We don't comment on confidential government-to-government correspondence."

Blair, Bush's staunchest foreign partner on Iraq, is well-placed to save the GE-Rolls-Royce engine. Britain has committed at least $2 billion to co-development of the F-35, the most of any of the project's eight foreign partners.

GE and Rolls-Royce, one of Britain's premier brands, won the $2.4 billion development contract in July. It is due to run through September 2013. The big money is in spares and maintenance over the engines' projected 40-year lifespan.

"Any letter from Blair is likely to get the president's very close attention," said Loren Thompson of the Arlington, Virginia-based Lexington Institute, a research group with close ties to the Pentagon and military contractors.

If the Pentagon sticks to its decision, GE probably would exit the business of building tactical fighter engines, Thompson said.

The F-35 is due to be the Pentagon's biggest purchase ever at an estimated $256 billion. The Pentagon plans to buy as many as 2,480 in three variants for the U.S. Air Force, Navy, Marine Corps and the British Royal Navy.

In addition, hundreds or thousands may be sold overseas, generating demand for at least 4,000 engines over coming decades, with each engine costing several million dollars.

The F-135 co-development partners include Britain, the United States, Italy, the Netherlands, Turkey, Canada, Australia, Denmark and Norway.

France To End State Of Emergency (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

PARIS, Jan. 3 -- The French government on Wednesday will end the state of national emergency it imposed eight weeks ago to counter the violence and arson that erupted in more than 300 cities and towns across the country, President Jacques Chirac said Tuesday.

The original declaration was "essential," but "strictly temporary," Chirac told his cabinet Tuesday, but he added that "considering the situation of these past several weeks, I decided to end it." The government had planned to keep the measure in force for another six weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0007964

During three weeks of unrest in late October and November, youths and young men of predominantly Arab and African descent set fire to an estimated 10,000 cars and attacked 255 schools, 233 other public buildings and scores of private businesses, according to police figures obtained by the French newspaper Le Monde.

Nearly 5,000 people were arrested and 400 were sentenced to jail terms in France's worst civil unrest since student demonstrations nearly four decades ago.

After nearly two weeks in which French police were unable to control the guerrilla-style tactics of the rioters, the government imposed a state of emergency using a law enacted half a century ago during France's unsuccessful war against rebels in its former colony of Algeria.

The law's activation, which was opposed by human rights organizations, socialist political leaders and other groups, gave police broad authority to conduct searches without warrants and impose curfews.

Officials feared a resurgence of problems on New Year's Eve, when -- even in calm years -- youths in poor suburban communities traditionally set cars ablaze in rituals of protest. On Saturday night, 25,000 extra police officers were deployed throughout the country in suburban neighborhoods where France's subsidized housing projects are located, as well as around famous landmarks such as the Eiffel Tower in Paris.

Police said the 425 car burnings recorded around the country Saturday night were fewer than officials had feared, though the number was higher than the 333 blazes set during the previous New Year's Eve. "The situation today is not completely satisfactory, as was shown Dec. 31," a government spokesman, Jean-Francois Cope, told reporters after the president's meeting with the cabinet. He said, however, that the violence had subsided significantly.

It is unclear whether the emergency measures had a significant impact on the violence, according to community leaders. Only a handful of towns imposed curfews. The large number of arrests, which were allowed under the special law, and the intervention of parents and community leaders with youths curbed the violence in many neighborhoods, other observers said.

Chirac, largely a lame duck in what is likely his last year as president, urged the cabinet to do more to address the country's high unemployment, one of the biggest problems facing the people who were responsible for the rioting. Since the violence abated, however, Chirac's government has initiated few programs to address the discrimination and joblessness faced by immigrant communities.

European Upturn Looks Set To Continue (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

BERLIN – Europe's economic upturn looks set to continue into 2006, as a manufacturing survey showed another improvement in business conditions and Germany reported a sharp drop in unemployment.

Manufacturing output and new orders in the 12 countries that use the euro as their currency are running at their highest for 18 months, according to the Purchasing Managers' Index for December. Strong global demand for European goods, coupled with a weaker euro, is helping European industry to lead a broadening economic recovery, economists say.

But analysts warn that a strengthening euro and an expected moderation of U.S. economic growth could limit the life of Europe's upswing, unless domestic demand improves too. Germany's labor office treated the surprisingly sharp drop in joblessness in December -- down 110,000 on a seasonally adjusted basis -- as a hopeful sign of greater demand for labor. The drop took the unemployment rate in Europe's biggest economy to 11.2%.

Employment in Germany isn't rising as fast as the number of people claiming unemployment benefits is falling, however. During last year, the number of jobs that contributed to social-security funds was consistently down from a year earlier. Employment and vacancies fell fractionally in November. Much of Germany's recent decline in unemployment is due to state-sponsored or subsidized job schemes.

But the rate at which German companies are shedding workers has slowed, says Thorsten Polleit, an economist at Barclays Capital in Frankfurt. "What we're seeing is, at best, stagnation," he says.

Elsewhere in Europe, industry is planning to add modestly to its payrolls, according to the PMI survey. Overall, the PMI rose to 53.4 in December from 52.8 a month earlier and beating expectations. A score of over 50 indicates that the manufacturing sector is growing. "Although not consistent with strong industrial-production growth in a historical context, the trend improvement in the manufacturing sector remains clear," Swiss bank UBS wrote in a research report.

DOJ_NMG_0007965

German and Italian industry reported the strongest rises in output and new orders, while French manufacturers reported only slight improvement. Coming after a dip in French business confidence in the Insee survey last month, the data added to evidence that the French economy, one of the euro zone's growth drivers in recent years, is weakening, while Germany's economy is improving on the back of soaring exports.

Outside the euro zone, the manufacturing PMI in the U.K. showed little change in December -- although that beat expectations of worsening conditions. The British economy is struggling to maintain its relatively high growth rates of the past decade, amid a slowdown in consumer spending. The British government hopes that business investment will contribute more to growth, but economists see little sign of that happening so far.

Mexico Investigates Death Of Man Shot In U.S. By Border Patrol Agent (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 3 - The Mexican authorities are investigating the death of an 18-year-old Mexican man shot by a United States Border Patrol agent after he had illegally crossed the border into California.

Witnesses told Mexican authorities that the man, Guillermo Martínez Rodríguez, was shot Friday. A brother and two other men traveling with him helped him to return to Tijuana, where he died in a hospital a day later.

Todd Fraser, a spokesman for the Border Patrol, acknowledged the shooting in a telephone interview on Tuesday, saying that an agent had "come under attack by an assailant who was throwing rocks." The agent "fired back in self-defense," Mr. Fraser said. Then, he said, the migrant climbed back over the fence and fled into Mexico.

Mr. Fraser said he did not have a figure for the number of migrants shot by American border agents last year, but he said the number of rock attacks by migrants against agents in the San Diego area had increased to 218 incidents in 2005, from 112 in 2004. "The rock attacks are increasing, and that is attributed to the increased enforcement by our agents," he said. "Smugglers are getting frustrated because they can't get their loads through, and that results in more attacks on our officers."

Mexican authorities, however, said the shooting reflected a growing hostility in the United States toward migrants. The authorities have used the shooting to draw attention to a law passed by Congress last month that would strengthen controls along the border and mandate the construction of miles of steel fences that Mexicans have likened to the Berlin Wall.

Mexico has condemned the proposed law as "shameful," saying it does not recognize the contributions of undocumented workers to the American economy. Previous border enforcement efforts, Mexican authorities say, have not stopped migrants, but have pushed them onto isolated and inhospitable routes.

Luis Cabrera, Mexico's consul in San Diego, said the shooting "goes against the spirit of cooperation that should exist along the border."

Fatal Shooting Of Mexican By Agent At Border Probed (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

Police officials in San Diego are investigating the shooting death of a Mexican national by a U.S. Border Patrol agent, who fired a shot at the man after being targeted in a rock attack.

Border Patrol spokesman Todd Fraser yesterday said the agent, an eight-year veteran whose name was withheld, came under attack Friday after approaching the man along fences on the U.S.-Mexico border near the San Ysidro, Calif., port of entry. He said the man was standing on the U.S. side of the fence at the time of the 7:25 p.m. encounter, but returned to Mexico after the shooting.

Mr. Fraser said the unidentified agent fired in self-defense, trying to protect himself from what agents in the area describe as a "rocking," during which agents and their vehicles are pelted with large rocks or chunks of cement blocks. He said the agent, fearing for his life, fired one round at the man, who then fled back to Mexico. He said the agent was not sure at the time whether the man had been hit.

DOJ_NMG_0007966

The shooting victim has been identified by Mexican officials as Guillermo Martinez Rodriguez, an 18-year-old who checked himself into a Tijuana, Mexico, hospital after the incident but died four hours later. He reportedly was struck by a single gunshot to the back of his right shoulder.

Mexican government officials denounced the shooting, including Ruben Aguilar, chief spokesman for Mexican President Vicente Fox, who said it "does no more than provide evidence that only a law that guarantees legal entry and is respectful of human rights can resolve the migratory problem both countries face."

The Mexican government has vigorously opposed efforts by U.S. officials to bring tighter security measures or build more fences along the border, even publishing and distributing documents last year showing migrants how to illegally enter the United States.

More than 1 million illegal aliens, mostly Mexican nationals, were apprehended by the Border Patrol last year.

San Diego police homicide Lt. Kevin Rooney said detectives are investigating the shooting and results of the probe will be forwarded to the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego for review.

Lt. Rooney said the shooting occurred between two border fences and that the agent, who was checking a report of illegal border crossers in the area, arrived in a marked vehicle and saw a man "holding a makeshift ladder as he stood near the northernmost fence."

He said the agent ran toward the migrant, who retreated to the south and "scooped up what the agent believed to be several rocks."

"As the agent unholstered his duty weapon, the male cocked his arm and made a throwing motion toward the agent. The agent fired at the male, who grabbed his arm and fled down a grade that leads to the primary border fence," he said.

A total of 218 rocking incidents occurred on the San Diego border last year, injuring more than a dozen agents. The rockings have gotten so violent that Border Patrol agents in San Diego now ride in "war wagons," vehicles fitted with custom-made steel screens and bars.

Mexico's federal attorney general's office said it also is investigating the incident, targeting "whomever is found to have been responsible," although a statement released by the office does not say if it plans to bring charges in the case and if so, against whom.

The attorney general's statement said Mr. Martinez Rodriguez, a native of Guadalajara who recently moved to Tijuana, was with four other persons when he was shot.

Mr. Fraser said that acts of violence have been on the rise all along the U.S.-Mexico border, adding that others who sought to throw large rocks at agents have been shot at, but he had no information on how many had been hit or if any had been injured or killed.

In July, rising border violence prompted the governors of California, Texas and six Mexican border states to pledge during a meeting to work together to attempt to stem the problem.

Sorry, But AIDS Testing Is Critical (WP)

By Richard Holbrooke

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

A month ago, on World AIDS Day, I wrote that despite all the public rhetoric about progress, "we are not winning the war on AIDS" and that the "very best that can be said is that we are losing at a slightly lower rate" [op-ed, Nov. 29]. I thought this was fairly obvious, given the fact that on each World AIDS Day since the first one 18 years ago, the number of people who are HIV-positive has increased. I thought it was even more obvious from just one stunning fact: that of the 12,000 people who will be infected in the next 24 hours around the world, over 90 percent will not learn they are sick until roughly 2013, when they develop full-blown AIDS. Meanwhile, not knowing their status, they will unintentionally spread it to other people over the next eight years, and these people will spread it to still more, and so on.

Given this situation, I suggested that current strategies are clearly not working, especially on prevention. While continuing to support increased funding for treatment of those who already have AIDS, I argued that far more emphasis should be put on detection and testing so that people learn their status and then, with counseling, change their behavior if they are HIV-positive, thus reducing the spread of the HIV virus.

DOJ_NMG_0007967

This may sound simple, even self-evident, to those not involved with the issue on a regular basis, but no column I have written for this newspaper provoked a greater reaction. To listen to some of the criticism you would think I had called for mandatory testing and quarantining of people with AIDS. "This man is out of control," wrote one prominent AIDS activist under the headline, "Someone stop this man." I was accused of "championing a conservative, traditionalist public health approach, which is simply looking to identify the infected and contain them."

Such criticism ignored my strong public advocacy over the past six years of much more funding for treatment. But far more distressing were the assertions of "progress" from world leaders and editorial pages. Originally designed to put pressure on public officials, World AIDS Day has turned into an empty rhetorical ritual in which world leaders issue high-minded statements, after which they let another year of living ever more dangerously pass.

Although there were plenty of calls for more funding for treatment, so far as I am aware no one suggested new prevention strategies or even admitted that today's approaches are not working. Current policies on prevention are simple enough: Conservatives emphasize promoting abstinence (which is why a minimum of 30 percent of the American contribution to the effort is earmarked for that purpose), while liberals stress the use of condoms and the need to avoid needle-sharing. Of course, any of these practices, if followed rigorously, will prevent the spread of AIDS, but none is ever going to be used by enough people to reverse the spread of the disease. It is a classic case of American "red state-blue state" politics and ideology trumping the brutal reality on the ground, or, more accurately, in a bedroom or alleyway.

I have been told repeatedly, for more than four years, that the case for testing is not proven. But isn't it obvious that AIDS will continue to spread more rapidly as long as 90 percent of those affected do not know their status? Wouldn't greater knowledge of one's status -- held in the strictest confidence (an essential part of any testing program) -- greatly modify behavior, both for those who are HIV-positive and for the large majority who, even in the worst-hit areas, are not infected? And wouldn't the greatest beneficiaries of widespread testing be women, who are all too often helpless victims but who do not know either their own status or that of any man in their life -- and who have no way of getting their men to be tested?

Yet the dedicated and committed professional community engaged in this desperate struggle, including UNAIDS and the World Health Organization, still refuses to make testing a top priority. (One commendable exception is Randall Tobias, the Bush administration's special envoy on AIDS, who makes it a practice to be publicly tested -- if possible with a local official -- in every country he visits; he well may be the most tested person on Earth.)

Why, in general, is the issue played down? I believe it is partly a case of a mind-set that was locked in 20 years ago, at the dawn of the AIDS crisis. Stigmatization was a huge problem then, even in the United States, and antiretroviral drugs were not yet available.

But times have changed, and so has the nature of the disease and the way it is spreading. (The greatest step forward in prevention would be the development of an effective microbicide that women could self-administer, but that goal is still eluding researchers.)

Recently there has been encouraging action in three small African nations -- Lesotho, Botswana and Malawi -- which have started making testing routine and officially encouraged (but not mandatory). Lesotho's new policy, creatively called KYS, or "Know Your Status," is especially worth watching because it is a formal, widespread national effort. If it works, perhaps the high priests of the worldwide effort on AIDS will stop listening to their own echoes and unexamined assumptions -- and take action. If ever there were a place where an ounce of prevention was worth a ton of cure, this is it.

The writer, a former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, is president of the Global Business Coalition on HIV/AIDS, a nongovernmental organization, and writes a monthly column for The Post.

Wish They All Could Be Like Estonia (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'grady

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0007968

With the 1989 fall of the Berlin Wall the world witnessed a backlash against the overintrusive state. A rallying cry in favor of economic liberalization went up around much of the globe. Some governments -- notably in Eastern Europe -- used the momentum to push deep, structural reform. Others -- notably in Latin America -- bungled the opportunity.

Is there any way to explain why it is that some countries have been able to restructure their economies so radically while others have been left in the clutches of special interests?

The 2006 Index of Economic Freedom, published today by the Heritage Foundation and The Wall Street Journal, provides powerful clues. The annual report surveys 157 countries, grading property rights protection, the regulatory environment, tax rates, fiscal policy, government intervention in the economy, monetary policy, black markets and trade policy, assigning each a numerical rating. Each country falls into one of four categories: "free," "mostly free," "mostly unfree" and "repressed." The chart shows this year's results.

DETAILS

See a country index of economic freedom for 2006.

As they do every year, the index authors observe the average per capita income of countries in each category. Not surprisingly, over the years, they have found a strong relationship between economic freedom and prosperity. Yet there is something more that can be observed in this pattern: Countries that liberalize quickly and thoroughly achieve resounding successes, politically and economically. Conversely, gradualism risks stagnation and even reversals, because the benefits are not evident enough to impress the electorate and generate a momentum in their favor.

Take, for example, the difference between the wealth of "repressed" economies and "mostly unfree" economies. The per capita GDP of the former is $4,239 while of the latter it is a tad lower at $4,058. This suggests that reforms that move a country one step up in economic liberty, on average, produce no material benefit to the population.

The jump from "mostly unfree" to "mostly free" yields a much better return but still leaves a country not particularly well-off. "Mostly free" countries have a per capita GDP of $13,530, while "free" countries have, on average, a per capita GDP of over $30,000.

This matters the most in democracies, where leadership needs to produce results if liberalization is to stick. Clearly, it's not the absolute income level that generates support for reforms but the growth in living standards that seems to hold the key. Halfhearted measures generate immense resentment from the "losers" of the old system but often don't yield large enough gains to create a constituency to support the changes.

For evidence of this, compare seventh-place Estonia, a tiny nation that undertook revolutionary reform in the mid-1990s, with Chile, rated 14th this year and often considered the poster child of economic liberty in the developing world.

Chile has been in various stages of economic reform since the 1973 coup that ousted Salvador Allende, who was threatening to take the country over the communist cliff. The return to democracy in 1989 brought about a series of left-of-center governments that, while boasting that they had not turned back the economic liberalism of the Pinochet dictatorship, slowed the pace of reform dramatically. The current socialist presidency of Ricardo Lagos even reversed liberalization in labor markets.

Meanwhile in Estonia, as former Prime Minister Mart Laar likes to explain, the post-Soviet period has been marked by rapid, deep reform. Communism was so reviled that policy makers, almost instinctively, chose its direct opposite and promptly enshrined the preference in law.

The results may explain why political support for economic liberalism continues in Estonia, while in Chile free markets are under assault even by center-right politicians. The difference is the rate of change of progress for citizens. In 2004, with reforms kicking in, Estonia's per capita GDP was almost $7,500, nearly double what it was in 2001 -- $3,951, when the country ranked 14th in the Index of Economic Freedom. In Chile, after 30 years of reform, per capita GDP remains below $5,900, edging up only slightly from $4,784 in 2001, when Chile ranked 13th.

The tale of two small nations tells a wider global story. Is it any wonder for example that Brazilians, who after almost two decades of being told they are converting to a market economy, widely reject the notion? Improvements have occurred, for instance in monetary stability, but the country is still ranked "mostly unfree," with a per capita GDP of $3,500. Maybe Mr. Laar could pay them a visit.

DOJ_NMG_0007969

Ms. O'Grady is member of the Journal's editorial board. She is co-editor, with Marc A. Miles and Kim R. Holmes, of the 2006 Index of Economic Freedom (422 pages, $24.95), available at 1-800-975-8625.

Social Insecurity Crisis (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

The year 2006 is just four days old, but I'm already prepared to nominate the natural resource of the year, the one that will have the most decisive impact on international relations - and that is undoubtedly oil.

Look at all the global trends involving oil (or gas) today, and they are all bad: the former leader of Germany gets voted out of office and goes to work for the president of Russia, running a pipeline company owned by Russia. The oil-for-food scandal tarnishes the U.N. The president of Iran, feeling so emboldened by the billions of dollars flowing into his country thanks to $60-a-barrel oil, engages in repeated rants about how the Holocaust was a myth. Vladimir Putin's oil-fueled government in Russia steadily erodes civil liberties at home, while using its energy clout abroad to try to punish Ukraine and to deflect U.N. pressure on Syria for its murderous campaign against Lebanese democrats and on Iran for its work to develop a nuclear bomb. I could go on. Do you have all day?

If you look at these trends, three things come to mind: They are all negative, they are all going to get worse with another year of $60-a-barrel oil, and the only force on the planet with the will and the way to neutralize their worst effects is America.

But here's the rub: America's refusal to have a serious energy policy makes these problems only more severe, and its refusal to have a serious entitlement policy - reforming Social Security and Medicare before they totally devour the U.S. budget - is only going to sap America's ability to play the global governing role that is so necessary for world stability.

To put it another way, our energy gluttony is strengthening the worst forces in the world and our entitlement gluttony is going to weaken our capacity to deal with those forces. As the Johns Hopkins University foreign affairs specialist Michael Mandelbaum puts it: "The greatest threat to America's role in the world today is not China. It's Medicare."

In a smart and original new book, "The Case for Goliath: How America Acts as the World's Government in the 21st Century," Mr. Mandelbaum argues that while U.S. foreign policy is hardly perfect, it is America - through its vast military deployments, diplomatic engagements and vital role in buttressing the global economy and its rules - that provides the basic governance that keeps the world stable and on a decent track.

Most countries in the world like this situation, he contends. They like it because they know that the U.S. is not a predatory power, so they are not afraid of the order it provides. They like it because this global order is helpful to every country in the world, but the cost of it is borne largely by U.S. taxpayers. And they like it because they can criticize the U.S. and still enjoy all the benefits it provides.

The best evidence for all this, Mr. Mandelbaum notes, is the fact that no military coalition has ever formed to counter America's global governing role - as happened with other hegemonic powers in history.

In Mr. Mandelbaum's view, America "is not the lion of the international system, terrorizing and preying on smaller, weaker animals in order to survive itself. It is, rather, the elephant, which supports a wide variety of other creatures - smaller mammals, birds and insects - by generating nourishment for them as it goes about the business of feeding itself."

No other country could play this crucial stabilizing role. But its continuation depends on "American taxpayers' being willing to keep paying for it," Mr. Mandelbaum said - and that gets us back to our runaway entitlements.

USA Today recently quoted David Walker, the U.S. comptroller general, as saying we are about to be hit by "a demographic tsunami" that will "never recede." The baby boomers total 77 million, and their first wave turns 60 this year. Unless we trim the Medicare and Social Security benefits promised to these boomers, the paper noted, America's "national debt will grow more than $3 trillion through 2010, to $11.2 trillion. ... The interest alone would cost $561 billion in 2010, the same as the Pentagon [budget]."

The same as the Pentagon's! So either Social Security and Medicare shrink or the Pentagon shrinks - because higher taxes seem to be out of the question for now. If history is any guide, Americans will prefer Social Security and Medicare over paying to make the world safe for China, India, Russia and Iran to pursue their interests.

DOJ_NMG_0007970

If so, the world may soon test out one of the most important theses of Mr. Mandelbaum's book: that the greatest threat to global stability is "not too much American power, but too little."

Crowded Foreign-Policy Calendar Will Test Bush's Management Skills (WSJ)

By Frederick Kempe

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

For those who may have forgotten during the untidiness of the past couple of years, President Bush was once billed as America's first "MBA President." This Harvard business grad ('75), in contrast to predecessor Bill Clinton, was to have been more disciplined both personally and in running his government.

Yet the messy Iraq war aftermath, the botched Katrina hurricane response in New Orleans and the expanding U.S. deficit have raised global concerns about Oval Office management. "What's in question is the traditional image of us as an effective country," says Fred Bergsten of the Institute for International Economics.

What President Bush has going for him is unappreciated momentum flowing off 2005, a more successful year than most realize1. And a dramatic 2005 shift of policy responsibility to Condoleezza Rice's State Department has also improved foreign-policy coordination and execution. That said, Mr. Bush faces an overcrowded agenda – the schedule includes decisive challenges in Germany, Iraq, Ukraine, China, India, the United Nations and more -- that could make 2006 one of the most significant foreign-policy years since the Cold War.

For President Bush, how he manages the second year of his second term will determine whether he can look forward to building a historic legacy in 2007-2008, his last two years of office, or instead be engaged in a lame duck's damage control. He also dare not forget the lessons of 9/11 and Katrina: It's the surprises that may shape history. "I worry less about the knowns than the unknowns," says Simon Serfaty of the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

With that in mind, here's an abridged 2006 Thinking Global calendar for the world's most important chief executive to help him stay on schedule and effectively manage the coming year. * * *

JAN. 12-13: Angela Merkel's Visit

Administration officials recognize the importance of newly elected German Chancellor Angela Merkel's visit to Washington well enough to have scheduled an "extended" meeting with the president, including lunch. That's this White House's equivalent of royal treatment.

One of the administration's smartest moves in 2005 was launching the year with an offensive to repair and deepen relations with Europe, which remains central to all of the U.S.'s challenges from fighting terrorism to advancing world trade. Working with Europe becomes easier in 2006 now that Ms. Merkel's election has removed one of the world leaders Mr. Bush trusted least, Gerhard Schroeder. (Jacques Chirac will have to wait until 2007 elections.)

Ms. Merkel's free market and Atlanticist instincts can help enormously, but she rules precariously over a right-left coalition in a country that's turned viciously anti-Bush. Jackson Janes of the American Institute of Contemporary German Studies warns that too much presidential warmth could backfire in a country where no one wants Ms. Merkel to be the president's lapdog.

A Merkel who looks statesmanlike while disagreeing with Mr. Bush this month might serve U.S. long-term interests better than an obedient ally.

JAN. 26: The Palestinian Democracy Gamble

The Palestinian Authority holds parliamentary elections that will test whether the U.S. was right to pressure Israel to lift its opposition to the participation of Hamas in the balloting. Hamas, still considered a terrorist organization by the EU and the U.S., performed well in local elections last year partly because voters consider it to be more honest than the corrupt, ruling Fatah party.

Whether Hamas winds in a landslide, as some fear, or emerges at the very least as a strong opposition, the real test will be whether the Bush administration is gambling right that it will moderate its behavior as it joins the political process. Will parliamentary democracy be as satisfying to Hamas as suicide terrorism and a charter that still calls for Israel's destruction?

The Palestinian outcome will influence Israel's own landmark elections March 28. Israel's former Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will lead a new centrist party, Kadima, with the unlikely support of long-time Labour Party rival Shimon Peres, against former right-wing Likud party allies that split over his Gaza withdrawal.

DOJ_NMG_0007971

FEBRUARY: Building an Indian Strategic Partnership

Bush administration officials are already privately speaking of the U.S. president's planned visit to India in February as historic. They say one of their administration's lasting legacies will be a new strategic relationship with the world's most populous democracy and one of its fastest growing economies.

Yet this is the stuff of long-term, delicate diplomacy. The U.S., in a wide-reaching July agreement with India, essentially recognized India as a nuclear state, departing from previous nonproliferation policy. Its hope is that the country will now politically reposition itself from longtime leader of the essentially anti-American non-aligned countries to a member of the community of democracies fighting terrorism, supporting freedom and, if necessary, counter-balancing China.

For starters, however, Washington is hoping India will find a way to satisfy its July agreement to separate its military and civilian nuclear operations and make them more transparent before the president rolls into town.

MARCH: Bringing Ukraine Into the West

Ukraine's March parliamentary elections are Europe's most important this year.

The Russian decision to cut off natural gas to Ukraine on Jan. 1, even if quickly reversed, made the stakes of Ukraine's March parliamentary elections all the more apparent. A revanchist Russia is increasingly ready to use its energy weapon to punish overly independent neighbors. A successful Ukrainian vote could put the dagger in residual Kremlin imperial ambitions to Kiev.

Alexander Motyl of Rutgers University says the West's best response is to embrace Ukraine even more resolutely. The U.S. should lift the Jackson-Vanik trade restrictions (the Senate has voted to lift, but the House has not), follow the EU lead and declare Ukraine a market economy, sign a bilateral agreement with Ukraine as a precondition of its WTO membership and begin a process that would make Ukraine a NATO member by the end of the Bush administration.

Which party wins voting in March isn't as important as a general acceptance that elections are free and fair and that Ukraine's democratic institutions continue to grow and resist Moscow's meddling.

APRIL: Managing the Chinese Rise

The next six-month review of China by the U.S. Treasury is due at some point in April or May. Last time around, the Treasury opted not to label China as a "currency manipulator," which could have triggered legislative action. But it will be increasingly more difficult for the Bush White House to avoid this course without suffering 2006 congressional trade action against Beijing.

With the U.S. trade deficit continuing to rise along with protectionism pressures, Mr. Bergsten, the economist, believes the time has come for the Bush administration to get tough with the Chinese who are maintaining their currency at a 25-30 % discount by his calculations. That in turn has prompted other Asian countries to maintain currencies "massively undervalued against the dollar."

If China won't budge, Mr. Bergsten suggests mobilizing the G-7, all of which is suffering, to take China to the WTO on the grounds that its undervalued currency is an improper trade subsidy. Yuan revaluation will help U.S. trade figures less than many might hope, so the larger point is whether the U.S. can coax China to play more by international rules.

JUNE: The Iraqi Tipping Point

Deadlines are always difficult to set for anything in the Mideast, but end-June is a fair bet as a tipping point for Iraq. The most important test following December's encouraging election is how quickly Iraqi officials can take to form a government and whether Sunnis will finally accept they are a minority and Shiites can be an enlightened and not vengeful majority.

The constitution established no deadline for the newly elected national assembly to appoint a government, but almost everyone agrees that the longer it takes the more it will feed the insurgency. That's exactly what happened after last January's elections.

So watch how deftly the gifted U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad can speed along government deals at a time when the locals remain hard-pressed to even accept December's electoral results. The year will be critical to Iraq's balance between progress and civil war – and that outcome will be central to Mr. Bush's Republican party in November's midterm elections and, more importantly to the administration's larger cause of Mideast transformation.

JULY: Saving World Trade Talks

DOJ_NMG_0007972

The best that could be said for world trade talks in Hong Kong last December was that the participants avoided a breakdown. The problem this year is that the body most capable of breaking the deadline, the G-8, has as its president dysfunctional Russia, a country neither democratic nor in the World Trade Organization.

All the more reason, says Mr. Bergsten, that the West should press Mr. Putin to prove his worth by making his July G-8 summit in St. Petersburg one devoted to closing differences among developed country leaders so that one can avoid the first breakdown in global trade talks since 1930. "The trade ministers will never resolve this," he says. "It's too deeply political."

SEPTEMBER: A Reformed or a Resigned U.N.

By the time of the September General Assembly of the United Nations in New York, the world is likely to know whether the organization has been capable of reforming itself or not. In 2006, the U.N. will either grow more relevant or more marginalized, but the status quo can't hold following the oil-for-food corruption scandal and breakdown over the Iraq war.

It will either respond to new global demands on its resources by making itself more efficient and effective, or be kicking the can down the road endangering the institution itself. By the end of 2006's first quarter, the U.N. will either have embraced the reform agenda set last September by giving the Secretary General more rapid-response management authority or it will opt for continued, consensual mediocrity.

By December, U.N. members will pick a new secretary general for the next five years. Watch to see whether they pick someone capable of leading an increasingly challenged organization that has had a surge of peacekeeping operations -- to 18 -- and is bracing for crises ranging from a possible pandemic to natural disasters and war-driven genocide.

OCTOBER: Dealing With Iran's Nuclear Program

By October 2006, Iran's first nuclear power plant, the Bushehr facility, is likely to come on stream. Mr. Sefarty of the Center for International and Strategic Studies predicts that may also be about the time that matters heat up over Iran's nuclear ambitions in Washington. Current Western efforts to get Moscow to negotiate a deal with Iran to reprocess its fuel in Russia are less about gaining Teheran's unlikely agreement to such a far-fetched plan and more about winning Russia's support at the U.N. should Iran be referred to the Security Council.

The good news is that the world's nuclear experts don't think Iran can produce a bomb for another few years. The bad news is that the reason is that Teheran is working on a more comprehensive program for a sustained capability rather than trying to produce a quick bomb or two.

The bottom line: months of negotiations with the world's two most egregious proliferators, Iran and North Korea, are producing little more than further negotiations. The U.S. is likely in 2006 to get off the sidelines to more energetically join European states pressuring an Iranian leader who is openly calling for Israel's destruction or relocation to Alaska or Bavaria. Don't expect any military fireworks, but increased diplomatic heat may bring matters to a boil ahead of congressional elections.

NOVEMBER-DECEMBER: The Midterm Elections

The key 2006 test of whether the MBA president has restored U.S. credibility for effectiveness will be mid-term congressional elections, coming long after memories of Katrina mishandling have faded. Of foreign-policy issues, Iraqi has the post potential to swing voters, with policy toward China of increasing importance and the Iranian threat as a possible emerging issue.

Don't rule out a Republican setback, which wouldn't be unusual for such elections in a presidential second term. Yet Mr. Bush's majority in the House is 231 to 202, difficult to overturn even with all seats up for grabs, given the power of incumbency. The Republican lead in the Senate is 55 to 44 with one independent. With 15 Republicans and some 18 Democrats are up for re-election, it would take a very bad Bush year to endanger his party's majority.

Expect a good Republican outcome if the U.S. economy remains strong, if the Iraq situation improves and the president can announce troop reductions, if China has given some ground on trade and currency revaluation, and if the president has managed any nasty surprises.

If Mr. Bush retains his majority, expect his final two years, when driving domestic change is always difficult, to focus on establishing his place in history as a man who has taken down tyrants and promoted Mideast transformation.

DOJ_NMG_0007973

Yet if the past is any guide, the main event of the year might not appear above. Just as 9/11 shaped his first term and Katrina tarnished the first year of his second one, it's a fair bet that his management ability in 2006 will be most severely tested by something unscheduled and unpredictable.

DOJ_NMG_0007974

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Secret Surveillance May Have Occurred Before Authorization (WP) ... 4
Agency First Acted On Its Own To Broaden Spying, Files Show (NYT) ... 5
Intelligence Panel Had Clue About Spying (AP) ... 6
On The Subject Of Leaks (NYT) ... 6
The Spy Plan's Spoiler (LAT) ... 7
FISA Fallacies (NRO) ... 8
Domestic Spying: Independent Look (SEAPI) ... 8
U.S. To Seek Dismissal Of Guantánamo Suits (NYT) ... 9
Justice To Try To Toss Gitmo Challenges (LAT/AP) ... 10
Dismissal Of Terror Detainee Cases Sought (REU) ... 10
Bush Could Bypass New Torture Ban (BOS) ... 11
Experts: London Bombings Cost About $2,000 (AP) ... 12

Patriot Act:

Bush Pushes For Patriot Act Renewal (AP) ... 13
Bush Steps Up Bid To Renew Patriot Act (WT) ... 14
Bush, Prosecutors Push Patriot Act (USAT) ... 14
Bush Assails Democrats Over Patriot Act (WP) ... 15
Bush Seeks Patriot Act Extension (VOA) ... 15
Bush Renews Patriot Act Campaign (NYT) ... 16
Bush Pushes For Patriot Act Renewal (AP) ... 17
Bush Pushes For Patriot Act Renewal (REU) ... 18

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Says Cities To Compete For Crisis Funds Based On Risk (USAT) ... 18
U.S. Adjusts Rules For Anti-terrorism Grants (KRT) ... 19
Terror Grants To Fund Disasters (WT) ... 20
More Aid To Go To High-Risk Areas (LAT) ... 21
Rules For Granting Terror Aid Are Overhauled (NYT) ... 22
D.C. May Benefit As DHS Bases Grants On Risk (WP) ... 24
Risk Wins A Round Over Politics (NYT) ... 25
Government Has 'Dirty Bomb' Cleanup Guide (AP) ... 26
Even After 'Dirty Bomb' Exposure, Residents Might Be Allowed Back In (New York Times) ... 26
Man Sues U.S. Over Ring Lost At Airport (FINDLAW/AP) ... 27
Living, And Dying, With Suicide Bombers (USAT) ... 27

War News:

From Cabinet Rooms Past, A Gathering To Assess Iraq (NYT) ... 29
Iraq Wants U.S. Choice Out As Chief Of Brigade (WP) ... 30
US Allies In Iraq: Valuable But Dwindling (CSM) ... 31
Iraqi V.P. Says No New Gov't Until April (AP) ... 32
Iraq Leaders Set Sights On Unity Government (REU) ... 33
Women Face Enormous Obstacles In Iraqi Politics (KRT) ... 34
Results Of Iraq Elections Not Likely For 2 Weeks (USAT) ... 35
International Team Probes Complaints About Vote (WT/AP) ... 36
Fraud Probe Continues Into Iraq Poll Results (FT) ... 37
U.S. Strike On Home Kills 9 In Family, Iraqi Officials Say (NYT) 37
Dozens Feared Dead In Indonesia Landslide (AP) ... 38
U.S. Raid Kills Family North Of Baghdad (WP) ... 39
Cautiously, Iraqis Open For Business (CSM) ... 40
CIA Enlisted Aid Of Iraqis In U.S. (WT) ... 41
End This Evasion On Permanent Army Bases In Iraq (FT) ... 42
History Lessons (WT) ... 43
Ex-CIA Agent Says US Missed Bin Laden In Afghanistan (FT) ... 43
Osama Debunks A Myth (WT) ... 44
Democracies In Danger (USAT) ... 45
Churchill At War (WSJ) ... 45

Corporate Scandals:

Skilling Faces New Enron Allegation (WSJ) ... 46
Enron Prosecutors, After Plea Bargain, Can Reduce Technical Jargon In Trial (WSJ) ... 47
Alleged Fund Fraud Leads To Charges 6 Ex-Putnam Fiduciary Trust Execs Accused (USAT) ... 48
SEC Charges 6 Ex-Putnam Officials (WSJ) ... 49
Ex-Stockbroker Charged With Profiting From Attorney Girlfriend's Inside Information (LAW/AP) ... 50
SEC Names Brian Cartwright Its New General Counsel (WSJ) ... 50
S.E.C. Names Counsel (NYT/REU) ... 50

Criminal Law:

Analysis: Abramoff Plea May Rock GOP Boat (SEAPI) ... 51
Case Bringing New Scrutiny To A System And A Profession (WP) ... 52
GOP Leaders Seek Distance From Abramoff (WP) ... 53
Lobbying Plan Was Central To GOP's Political Strategy (LAT) ... 54
Abramoff Pleads Guilty, Will Cooperate (AP) ... 56
Capitol Offense Guilty Plea By Lobbyist Raises Prospect Of Wider Investigation (WSJ) ... 57
US Lobbyist Admits Fraud And Bribe Plot (FT) ... 60
Tremors Across Washington As Lobbyist Will Aid Inquiry (NYT) 60

The Heat Is Now On Ohio Rep. Ney (LAT) 62
Abramoff Pleads Guilty To Fraud (REU-Y2)..... 63
Abramoff Pleads Guilty (WT) 64
G.O.P. Lobbyist Pleads Guilty In Deal With Prosecutors (NYT) . 65
'Corruption … Very Extensive' Ex-lobbyist Abramoff Will Help Wide-ranging Investigation Involving A Dozen FBI Offices (USAT) 66
Many Millions In Kickbacks From Tribes (NYT)..... 67
Tiguas Hope Abramoff Plea Helps In Reopening Of Casino (AP)68
Abramoff Reached Beyond The Limits (LAT)..... 69
Abramoff Case Could Have Far-reaching Impact (KRT)..... 70
Lobbyist's Guilty Plea Signals Broadening Scandal In Washington (KRT) 71
Lobbyist Admits Fraud And Bribe Plots (FT) 73
Lobbyist Abramoff Pleads Guilty To Conspiracy, Fraud (LAW) .. 74
Abramoff Pleads Guilty, Agrees To Aid Probe Into Congress (BOS) 74
Hastert Donates Abramoff-linked Money (CNN) 76
Mr. Abramoff's Plea (WP) 77
Reed Opponents Link Candidate To Abramoff Plea (AP) 78
Throughout A City, Lessons Of The Fall (WP) 78
Plea Deal Stokes Anxiety On Hill Superlobbyist Abramoff Agrees To Help In Inquiry Involving Lawmakers (USAT) 79
Abramoff Deals, Congress Quakes (CSM)..... 80
Lobbyist's Guilty Plea Signals Broadening Scandal In Washington (KRT) 81
Abramoff Pleads Guilty To 5 Criminal Charges (LAT)..... 83
Lobbyist Accepts Deal And Becomes Witness In Corruption Case (NYT) 84
Abramoff Pleads Guilty To 3 Counts (WP) 86
Abramoff Pleads Guilty To Federal Charges (Hchron)..... 87
Will DeLay Go Down With His Friend? (DMN) 88
Abramoff's Plea Tightens Noose Around Some Necks (KHOU-TV) 90
DeLay May Face New Jeopardy As Abramoff Probers Target Ex-Aide (BLOOM)..... 90
Lobbyist's Plea Likely To Expose Seamy Underside Of Congress (USAT) 92
It's Not Personal, Jack, It's Strictly Business (NYT)..... 92
Why Abramoff Matters (USAT)..... 93
Ex-Conyers Aide Arrested In Ghana On U.S. Fraud Charges (FREEP)..... 93
Relatives Of Missing Cruise Passengers Form New Group (NSDY/AP)..... 94
Recruiting Office Left Open 26 Times (MJS)..... 95
FBI Investigates Break-in At Military Recruiting Center,170 (MH)95
Military Vehicle And Uniforms Stolen In WI (WFIE-TV)..... 95
Robbed At Gunpoint, Barry Harbors 'No Animosities' (WP)..... 96
Barry Robbed At SE Home By Men He Helped (WT) 97
Witness: Fawell Assigned Him Campaign Work (AP) 98
Judge: Jurors Won't Learn Of George Ryan's Death Penalty Reform (CHIT) 99
Witness: Ryan Ignored Fraud (CHIST)..... 99
Investigators Seek Info From Group On Doyle Donations (DULNT)..... 101
Council Urged To Investigate Mariano (PHI) 101
First Tennessee Waltz Trial Delayed As Dixon Seeks New Lawyer (AP) 102
In Recordings, Mobster Pierces Veil On Gambino Crime Family (NSDY/AP)..... 103
Two Plead Guilty In Mortgage Fraud (CINE)..... 103

Civil Law:

U.S. Not Told Of 2 Deaths During Study Of Heart Drug (NYT). 104
Agencies To Designate Chief FOIA Officers (FCW)..... 105
OMB Issues Further Guidance On FOIA Executive Order (GCN)105
AARP Edges Away From Drug Imports (HILL)..... 105

Civil Rights:

Guilty Plea In Strip Club Case (NSL)..... 106
Ater Gets Justice Dept. OK To Take Over New Orleans Elections (AP) 107
Ex-Boss Demanded Sex, D.C. Parks And Recreation Workers Say (WP)..... 108
Massachusetts Sued Over Gay Marriage Ruling (REU-Y2)..... 110
Massachusetts Sued On Marriage Petition (WT) 111

Antitrust:

MAGAZINE CIRCULATION-FRAUD CASE ENTERS PLEA NEGOTIATIONS (ADAGE) 111
Linens 'N Things Deal Gets US Antitrust Approval (NYT/REU) 112
Cisco's Offer For Scientific-Atlanta Gets U.S. Antitrust Clearance (WSJ) 112
Cisco Systems Says Regulatory Waiting Period For Acquisition Of Scientific-Atlanta Expires (AP) 112
Banking Against Wal-Mart (WSJ) 113

Environment/Indian Affairs:

No New Deaths In Oklahoma, But The Fires Cut A Grim Path (NYT) 114
Battle Over Property Rights Goes On, Despite Ruling (CSM) .. 114
Prevention Is Key To Avian Or Seasonal Flu (WP)..... 116
Buffalo Lawsuit Challenges A Casino Off Indian Land (NYT) ... 117

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

High-tech Gadgetry Pops Up In Drug Trade (KNOXNS)..... 118
Former State Prison Officer Faces Felony Drug Charges (AP) 119
Rhode Island Legalizes Medical Marijuana (NYT/AP)..... 119
Legislators Override Veto, Then Begin New Session (PROJO) 120
Supporters Of Medical Marijuana Bill Concede Problems (PROJO) 122
Legislators Override Carcieri's Medical Marijuana Veto (PRBN)123
Flying Under The Radar (ABAJRNL)..... 123
Afro-Colombians Driven Off Land In Cocaine War (LAT)..... 125
Seeing Crime Guns Destroyed Gives Solace To Victims' Families (NYT) 126
Editorial: Mark Outcome, Not Start Of Weed And Seed Effort (MODBEE)..... 128

Immigration:

The Border's Vital Center (HILL)..... 128

DOJ_NMG_0007976

Tax:

Federal Taxes Fall As Income Rises (WSJ) ... 129
Two Feuding Gallery Owners Admit The Art Of Tax Evasion (NYT) ... 130

Congress-Administration:

Alito Hearing To Focus On Landmark Pa. Abortion Case (LAW/AP) ... 131
Alito Seen As Smart, Serious, Cautious (AP) ... 132
Anti-Alito Push Fails To Sway U.S. (WT) ... 134
Independence A Key Issue In Roberts' First State Of Judiciary Report (LAW) ... 135
Congress To Start Year With Unfinished Business (WT) ... 135
Congress May Focus On Retirement Funds (WSJ) ... 136
Right Scales Back Election Year Agenda (HILL) ... 137
A Gentler Capitalism (WP) ... 138
Bush Loyalist Takes Economics To The Political Stage (FT) ... 139
Pharmacists Deal With Medicare Confusion Computer Glitch, Missing Cards Among Troubles (USAT) ... 141
Medicare Expands Tier Pricing System Cancer, Arthritis, MS Drugs Fall In Highest Levels (USAT) ... 141
Congress Drops 'Buy America' For Tankers (AP) ... 143
Federal Raise Set At 3.44 Percent In D.C. Area; Raleigh-Durham Sees Highest Increase (WP) ... 143
Cronyism And Crises (NYT) ... 144

Other News:

Only 1 W. Virginia Coal Miner Now Said Found Alive (REU) ... 144
12 Found Alive In W.Va. Coal Mine (WP) ... 144
Relief Sweeps W.Va. Mining Town Families Learn 12 Miners Found Alive Underground (USAT) ... 146
Town Pauses And Mourns One Who Did Not Return Son Remembers Hardworking, Unselfish Dad (USAT) ... 147
12 Miners Found Alive 41 Hours After Explosion (NYT) ... 147
A Timeline Of Key Events In The Sago Mine Explosion: (AP) ... 149
Bush Says Nation Praying For W. Va. Miners (AP) ... 150
In US Mines, The Safety Record Has Been On An Upswing (CSM) ... 150
A Mining Disaster (WP) ... 151
Black Gold Or Black Death? (NYT) ... 151
US Federal Reserve Nearing End Of Tightening Cycle (FT) ... 153
Fed Minutes Indicate Rate Increases Wrapping Up (USAT) ... 153
Views On Rates Differ Within Fed (WP) ... 154
Fed Suggests It's Close To Ending Run Of Rate Rises (WSJ) ... 155
Fed's Notes Offer Hope Of A Brake On Rates (NYT) ... 156
Stocks Start New Year With A Bang Dow, S& P, Nasdaq See Significant Gains (USAT) ... 157
Dow Zooms Up 130 Points (WT) ... 158
Fed Minutes Give Stocks Life (WSJ) ... 159
Capital-Spending Plays May Finally Pay Off (WSJ) ... 160
With Rosy Predictions, Pundits Missing 2006's Warning Signs (WP) ... 161
Waiting For A Soft Landing (WP) ... 162
Bush Backs Perry, But McClellan's For Mom (Hchron) ... 163
Weld Is Criticized By D'Amato (NYT) ... 163
Kaine's Transportation Forums Yield Much Talk, Little Consensus (WP) ... 164
Gov. To Start Repaying Schools (LAT) ... 165
In History Lesson, Less Can Be More (WP) ... 166
Women Start 1st Islamic Sorority (WT) ... 167
Iran To Resume Its Nuclear Work; U.S. Warns Of Seeking Restraints (New York Times) ... 168
US Warns Iran Against Resuming Nuclear Research (REU) ... 169
Iran Says It Will Restart Nuclear Fuel Research (LAT) ... 169
Iran Announces Resumption Of Research On Nuclear Fuel (FT) 170
Tehran Will Restart Nuclear Fuel Research (WT/REU) ... 171
Iran Tells U.N. It Will Resume Nuclear Research (LAT/AP) ... 172
Intelligence Report Says Iran Seeks Nuclear Bomb: Paper (REU) ... 173
CIA Gave Iran Bomb Plans, Book Says (LAT) ... 173
White House Won't Undo N. Korea Sanctions (AP) ... 175
White House Supports Lebanon-Syria Probe (AP) ... 175
Bush Hopes Palestinian Election Goes Forward (REU-Y2) ... 175
U.S. Envoys To Help Resolve Vote Dispute (WT) ... 176
Palestinians Campaign For An Election That May Not Be Held (NYT) ... 176
Palestinians Kick Off Campaign Amid Signs Of 2nd Postponement (WP) ... 177
After Israel, Who Can Run Gaza? (CSM) ... 178
Power Shift Set During Procedure For Sharon (WT/AP) ... 179
Israel Undergoes Political ‘revolution' Alignments Shift As Sharon Leaves Likud (USAT) ... 179
Ashcroft Helps Israelis On Korean Weapons Deal (HILL) ... 180
Rice To Visit Indonesia, Australia (REU-Y2) ... 181
Expediting Homes For Tsunami Victims (WP) ... 182
Police In India Make An Arrest In Scholar's Death (NYT) ... 183
China Releases Investigative Reporter Whose Jailing Had Upset U.S. (WP) ... 184
Australia Revisits Drug-price Cap (WSJ) ... 185
Bush Administration Criticizes Russia (Ap) ... 185
Russian Natural Gas Streams Through Ukraine Once Again (WSJ) ... 185
Gas Halt May Produce Big Ripples In European Policy (NYT) ... 186
Ukrainians Angry Over Moscow Gas Dispute (AP) ... 187
Gas Price Dispute Worries Europeans (WT) ... 188
EU Could Step In To Help Solve Gas Dispute (FT) ... 189
Ukraine Concedes It Took Gas From Pipeline But Says It Had The Contractual Right (NYT) ... 189
Gazprom Says Gas Supplies Back on (REU) ... 191
Russia's Energy Politics (WP) ... 192
Russia Shoots Itself In The Foot (NYT) ... 192
Morales Aligns Himself With Castro, Chavez (AP) ... 193
Peru Asks Chile To Extradite Fujimori To Face A Range Of Charges (NYT) ... 194
Peru Asks Chile To Extradite Fujimori (WP) ... 194
Blair Presses Bush On Engine Deal (REU-Y2) ... 195
France To End State Of Emergency (WP) ... 196
European Upturn Looks Set To Continue (WSJ) ... 196
Mexico Investigates Death Of Man Shot In U.S. By Border Patrol Agent (NYT) ... 197

DOJ_NMG_0007977

Fatal Shooting Of Mexican By Agent At Border Probed (WT)... 197
Sorry, But AIDS Testing Is Critical (WP)..... 198
Wish They All Could Be Like Estonia (WSJ) 199
Social Insecurity Crisis (NYT) 200
Crowded Foreign-Policy Calendar Will Test Bush's Management Skills (WSJ)..... 201

TERRORISM NEWS:

Secret Surveillance May Have Occurred Before Authorization (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

Even before the White House formally authorized a secret program to spy on U.S. citizens without obtaining warrants, such eavesdropping was occurring and some of the information was being shared with the FBI, declassified correspondence and interviews with congressional and intelligence officials indicate.

On Oct. 1, 2001, three weeks after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, who was running the National Security Agency at the time, told the House intelligence committee that the agency was broadening its surveillance authorities, according to a newly released letter sent to him that month by Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.). Pelosi, the ranking Democrat on the committee, raised concerns in the letter, which was declassified with several redactions and made public yesterday by her staff.

"I am concerned whether and to what extent the National Security Agency has received specific presidential authorization for the operations you are conducting," Pelosi wrote on Oct. 11, 2001. The substance of Hayden's response one week later, on Oct. 17, 2001, was redacted.

The secret NSA program, developed in the immediate aftermath of the attacks on Washington and New York as a way to find any hidden al Qaeda operatives still in the United States, was authorized in October 2001, a senior administration official said.

The president and senior aides have publicly discussed various aspects of the program, but neither the White House, the NSA nor the office of the director of national intelligence would say what day the president authorized it. Don Weber, an NSA spokesman, said in an e-mail yesterday that it would be inappropriate to "discuss details which could potentially cause harm to the safety of our nation."

Pelosi's letter suggested that she and others on the committee first heard about expanded work by the NSA on Oct. 1, 2001, when Hayden briefed them on NSA activities.

"During your appearance before the committee," she wrote, "you indicated that you had been operating since the September 11 attacks with an expansive view of your authorities with respect to the conduct of electronic surveillance." The letter, while redacted in parts concerned with surveillance, made clear that the agency was "forwarding" intercepts and other collected information to the FBI. Two sources familiar with the NSA program said Pelosi was directly referring to information collected without a warrant on U.S. citizens or residents.

An intelligence official close to Hayden said that his appearance on Oct. 1, 2001, before the House committee had been to discuss Executive Order 12333, and not the new NSA program.

The order, signed by President Ronald Reagan in 1981, gave guidance and specific instructions about the intelligence activities that the U.S. government could engage in. It specifically prohibited domestic surveillance for intelligence purposes without a warrant "unless the Attorney General has determined in each case that there is probable cause to believe that the technique is directed against a foreign power or an agent of a foreign power."

The official said that Pelosi's concerns had been answered in writing and again several weeks later during a private briefing.

The NSA program operated in secret until it was made public in news accounts last month. Since then, President Bush and his advisers have defended it as legal and necessary to protect the country against future attacks and have said Congress was repeatedly consulted. But Democrats, some Republicans and constitutional law experts have raised concerns about whether Bush overstepped his constitutional authority and violated privacy laws meant to guard against the government spying on its own citizens without a warrant. The NSA's work, which is normally restricted to eavesdropping overseas, also angered judges on a special court that administers warrants for secret investigations.

New York Times reporter James Risen, who, with a colleague, was the first to write about the NSA program, released a book yesterday that includes details about the program and other intelligence issues facing the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0007978

Jennifer Millerwise Dyck, spokeswoman for the CIA, said the book contains inaccuracies about the CIA's work on Iran's nuclear program and Iraq, but she would not provide details.

Agency First Acted On Its Own To Broaden Spying, Files Show (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau And Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - The National Security Agency acted on its own authority, without a formal directive from President Bush, to expand its domestic surveillance operations in the weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks, according to declassified documents released Tuesday.

The N.S.A. operation prompted questions from a leading Democrat, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, who said in an Oct. 11, 2001, letter to a top intelligence official that she was concerned about the agency's legal authority to expand its domestic operations, the documents showed.

Ms. Pelosi's letter, which was declassified at her request, showed much earlier concerns among lawmakers about the agency's domestic surveillance operations than had been previously known. Similar objections were expressed by Senator John D. Rockefeller IV, Democrat of West Virginia, in a secret letter to Vice President Dick Cheney nearly two years later.

The letter from Ms. Pelosi, the House minority leader, also suggested that the security agency, whose mission is to eavesdrop on foreign communications, moved immediately after the Sept. 11 attacks to identify terror suspects at home by loosening restrictions on domestic eavesdropping.

The congresswoman wrote to Lt. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, then head of the N.S.A., to express her concerns after she and other members of the House and Senate Intelligence Committees received a classified briefing from General Hayden on Oct. 1, 2001, about the agency's operations.

Ms. Pelosi, then the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said, "I am concerned whether, and to what extent, the National Security Agency has received specific presidential authorization for the operations you are conducting."

The answer, General Hayden suggested in his response to Ms. Pelosi a week later, was that it had not. "In my briefing," he wrote, "I was attempting to emphasize that I used my authorities to adjust N.S.A.'s collection and reporting."

It is not clear whether General Hayden referred at the briefing to the idea of warrantless eavesdropping. Parts of the letters from Ms. Pelosi and General Hayden concerning other specific aspects of the spy agency's domestic operation were blacked out because they remain classified. But officials familiar with the uncensored letters said they referred to other aspects of the domestic eavesdropping program.

Bush administration officials said on Tuesday that General Hayden, now the country's No. 2 intelligence official, had acted on the authority previously granted to the N.S.A., relying on an intelligence directive known as Executive Order 12333, issued by President Ronald Reagan in 1981. That order set guidelines for the collection of intelligence, including by the N.S.A.

"He had authority under E.O. 12333 that had been given to him, and he briefed Congress on what he did under those authorities," said Judith A. Emmel, a spokeswoman for the Office of the Director of National Intelligence. "Beyond that, we can't get into details of what was done."

In 2002, President Bush signed an executive order specifically authorizing the security agency to eavesdrop without warrants on the international communications of Americans inside the United States who the agency believed were connected to Al Qaeda. The disclosure of the domestic spying program last month provoked an outcry in Washington, where Congressional hearings are planned.

General Hayden's October 2001 briefing was one of the first glimpses into the expanded but largely hidden role that the N.S.A. would assume in combating terrorism over the last four years.

In the briefing, Ms. Pelosi wrote to General Hayden, "you indicated that you had been operating since the Sept. 11 attacks with an expansive view of your authorities" with respect to electronic surveillance and intelligence-gathering operations.

"You seemed to be inviting expressions of concern from us, if there were any," Ms. Pelosi wrote, but she said that the lack of specific information about the agency's operations made her concerned about the legal rationale used to justify it.

One step that the agency took immediately after the Sept. 11 attacks, Ms. Pelosi wrote in her letter, was to begin forwarding information from foreign intelligence intercepts to the F.B.I. for investigation without first receiving a specific request from the bureau for "identifying information."

In the past, under so-called minimization procedures intended to guard Americans' privacy, the agency's standard practice had been to require a written request from a government official who wanted to know the name of an American citizen or a person in the United States who was mentioned or overheard in a wiretap.

DOJ_NMG_0007979

In the weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks, the agency began monitoring telephone calls and e-mail messages between the United States and Afghanistan to track possible terror suspects. That program led to the broader eavesdropping operation on other international communications, officials have said.

The agency has also tapped into some of the nation's main telecommunications arteries to trace and analyze large volumes of phone and e-mail traffic to look for patterns of possible terrorist activity.

Marc Rotenberg, director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, said the new documents, along with previous reports of objections to the program from Senator Rockefeller and James B. Comey, the former deputy attorney general, underscored the need for a comprehensive investigation.

"There's an increasing picture of concern, if not outright opposition, within the government," Mr. Rotenberg said. "But we can't second-guess anyone's actions on a document-by-document basis," particularly if the documents are released only in part, he added.

The way the N.S.A.'s role has expanded has prompted concern even from some of its former leaders, like Bobby R. Inman, a retired admiral who was N.S.A. director from 1977 to 1981. Admiral Inman said that while he supported the decision to step up eavesdropping against potential terrorists immediately after the 2001 attacks, the Bush administration should have tried to change the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to provide explicit legal authorization for what N.S.A. was doing.

"What I don't understand is why when you're proposing the Patriot Act, you don't set up an oversight mechanism for this?" Admiral Inman said in an interview. "I would have preferred an approach to try to gain legislation to try to operate with new technology and with an audit of how this technology was used."

Intelligence Panel Had Clue About Spying (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congressional intelligence committees had at least a hint in October 2001 that the National Security Agency was expanding its surveillance activities after the 9/11 attacks, according to a letter released Tuesday by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi.

The California Democrat had raised questions to Gen. Michael Hayden, then the NSA director, about the legal authority to conduct the eavesdropping work.

In the October 2001 letter, Pelosi said she was told in a briefing that month that the agency "had been operating since the Sept. 11 attacks with an expansive view" of its authorities "to the conduct of electronic surveillance under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and related statutes, orders, regulations and guidelines."

"I am concerned whether, and to what extent, the National Security Agency has received specific presidential authorization for the operations you are conducting," Pelosi, then the top Democrat on the intelligence panel, wrote Hayden.

President Bush has acknowledged he authorized the NSA to eavesdrop -- without warrants -- on international calls and e-mails of Americans and others inside the United States with suspected ties to al-Qaida or its affiliates.

"I can say that if somebody from al-Qaida is calling you, we'd like to know why," Bush said this week. "This program is conscious of people's civil liberties, as am I."

Bush and other senior officials have said he personally renewed the program more than three dozen times since October 2001, and a small group of Congress members was briefed on the highly classified effort.

But it appears that Hayden may have at least alluded broadly to the new surveillance work with a wider audience of House and Senate intelligence committee members during the classified October briefing. According to Pelosi's letter, Hayden spoke about the agency's new posture to expand its operations.

Hayden, who is now the nation's No. 2 intelligence official, told Pelosi he wanted to clarify ambiguities. "In my briefing, I was attempting to emphasize that I used my authorities to adjust NSA's collection and reporting," he wrote on Oct. 18, 2001.

The subsequent crucial sentences of the letter, released Tuesday, were blocked out for security reasons.

Key parts of Pelosi's letter were also withheld. For instance, one sentence indicates that the NSA was forwarding intercepts and other undisclosed information to the FBI without first getting a request.

A series of independent commissions have encouraged national security agencies to improve cooperation. But it is far from clear in the letter how this work may be happening.

Said Steven Aftergood, a government secrecy expert with the Federation of American Scientists: "It does seem that the NSA is doing something different and in a different way than what it has done before."

On The Subject Of Leaks (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0007980

Given the Bush administration's appetite for leak investigations (three are under way), this seems a good moment to try to clear away the fog around this issue.

A democratic society cannot long survive if whistle-blowers are criminally punished for revealing what those in power don't want the public to know - especially if it's unethical, illegal or unconstitutional behavior by top officials. Reporters need to be able to protect these sources, regardless of whether the sources are motivated by policy disputes or nagging consciences. This is doubly important with an administration as dedicated as this one is to extreme secrecy.

The longest-running of the leak cases involves Valerie Wilson, a covert C.I.A. operative whose identity was leaked to the columnist Robert Novak. The question there was whether the White House was using this information in an attempt to silence Mrs. Wilson's husband, a critic of the Iraq invasion, and in doing so violated a federal law against unmasking a covert operative. There is a world of difference between that case and a current one in which the administration is trying to find the sources of a New York Times report that President Bush secretly authorized spying on American citizens without warrants. The spying report was a classic attempt to give the public information it deserves to have. The Valerie Wilson case began with a cynical effort by the administration to deflect public attention from hyped prewar intelligence on Iraq. The leak inquiry in that case ended up targeting the press, and led to the jailing of a Times reporter.

When the government does not want the public to know what it is doing, it often cites national security as the reason for secrecy. The nation's safety is obviously a most serious issue, but that very fact has caused this administration and many others to use it as a catchall for any matter it wants to keep secret, even if the underlying reason for the secrecy is to prevent embarrassment to the White House. The White House has yet to show that national security was harmed by the report on electronic spying, which did not reveal the existence of such surveillance - only how it was being done in a way that seems outside the law.

Leak investigations are often designed to distract the public from the real issues by blaming the messenger. Take the third leak inquiry, into a Washington Post report on secret overseas C.I.A. camps where prisoners are tortured or shipped to other countries for torture. The administration said the reporting had damaged America's image. Actually, the secret detentions and torture did that.

Illegal spying and torture need to be investigated, not whistle-blowers and newspapers.

The Spy Plan's Spoiler (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

JAMES B. COMEY CAN HARDLY be considered soft on terrorism. As deputy attorney general, he has been one of the Bush administration's chief prosecutors of the war on terror, pursuing accused bombers and terrorists from Riyadh to Chicago. So his refusal to approve the administration's warrantless wiretaps of Americans cannot simply be dismissed as the rantings of an Al Qaeda apologist.

But Comey's objections, made in 2004 and first reported Sunday in the New York Times, do more than rob the president and his defenders of one of their favorite arguments. The article was based on the accounts of unnamed administration officials, and Comey isn't giving the reasons for his opposition to the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program. But they're easy to guess.

First, the program is unnecessary. There is already a special court to approve wiretaps of suspected terrorists, and it is notoriously obliging; in 2004, it received 1,758 requests for warrants and denied none of them. It often issues such warrants within hours and can approve them after the fact. (Details about the court's activities are secret.) And the Patriot Act, almost all of which has been renewed, gives law enforcement extraordinary powers to fight terrorists.

Second, the program is probably illegal. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which created that special court, specifically allows warrantless surveillance in the case of war, but for only 15 days after that war has been declared. If it had to conduct such surveillance for longer than that — Congress authorized the use of force, which is tantamount to a declaration of war, one week after 9/11 — the executive branch would need to change the law.

The administration has a novel response to this argument: We're at war, and we don't have time to obey the law. Or, as an assistant attorney general put it in a letter to Congress last month: We were worried that the special court that grants secret warrants would not do so with sufficient "speed and agility," and "any legislative change" to amend the system "would have tipped off our enemies." So the administration went ahead with its spying program anyway.

Last, and most important, the NSA's surveillance program is an affront to the American system of checks and balances — and Americans' right to privacy as guaranteed by the 4th Amendment. The president fails to grasp this point. Asked Sunday what he'd say to Americans worried about violations of their privacy, Bush responded with a breathtaking non sequitur. "If somebody from Al Qaeda is calling you," he said, "we'd like to know why."

DOJ_NMG_0007981

So, no doubt, would James Comey. But at least he understands that, even in a time of war, the government is not free to simply tap your phone to find out who's calling you and why.

FISA Fallacies (NRO)

By Rich Lowry

National Review Online, January 4, 2006

Is it written somewhere that the Constitution can be violated only by the president? One would think so, given the debate over the secret National Security Agency program to monitor, without court approval, calls between suspected al Qaeda operatives overseas and people in the United States. Opponents of the program say President Bush has trashed the Constitution, in particular the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable searches.

The Constitution, however, doesn't exist solely to constrain the executive, as those braying about the NSA wiretaps seem to suggest. It confers powers on the executive as well as limiting them. If those powers are abridged by another branch of the government, the Constitution is being violated — and not, obviously, by the president.

Thus, only one player so far in the NSA controversy has been held by a court to have probably violated the constitution, and he's a judge. Judge James Robertson resigned from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court — the secret court that approves domestic wiretaps related to national security — to protest the NSA program, making him something of a cause celebre among Bush bashers. But he's an odd hero, given that his contribution to the debate over the executive's surveillance power was a flagrant error.

In a 2002 decision, Judge Robertson and others on the FISA court imposed restrictions on the Bush administration's conduct of foreign-intelligence investigations that weren't mandated by the language of the 1978 FISA statute, and that had been explicitly made unnecessary by the 2001 Patriot Act. The Bush administration appealed, and the FISA court of review issued a stinging rebuke to Robertson, et al.

The court of review, apparently a stickler for such things, said the FISA "court did not provide any constitutional basis for its action — we think there is none — and misconstrued the main statutory provision on which it relied." Besides that, it was world-class jurisprudence. By effectively trying to micromanage the Justice Department, the decision continued, "the FISA court may well have exceeded [its] constitutional bounds."

Would that the court could permanently monitor the debate over the NSA program. Democrats who argue that Bush has abused the Constitution are, like Judge Robertson, themselves Constitution-abusers. The president has the authority under Article II of the Constitution to defend the United States. If he can bomb the nation's enemies overseas without a court's approval, he certainly can listen to their conversations. (FISA, which requires a special warrant for foreign-intelligence surveillance in the U.S., doesn't apply abroad, making cross-border calls a murky area).

Every administration, liberal or conservative, has claimed this warrantless surveillance power, and no court has ever denied it. The FISA court of review explained, citing the 14th Circuit's 1980 decision in a case involving the surveillance of a Vietnamese spy named David Truong, "The Truong court, as did all the other courts to have decided the issue, held that the President did have inherent authority to conduct warrantless searches to obtain foreign intelligence information." The court added, "We take it for granted that the President does have that authority."

The court in the Truong case noted that the executive "not only has superior expertise in the area of foreign intelligence, it is also constitutionally designated as the pre-eminent authority in foreign affairs." And the Constitution's framers knew what they were about, according to the Truong court: "Attempts to counter foreign threats to the national security require the utmost stealth, speed and secrecy. A warrant requirement would add a procedural hurdle that would reduce the flexibility of executive foreign-intelligence initiatives."

That argument rings all the truer in the Age of al Qaeda, when a fast-moving, amorphous enemy operates both outside and within U.S. borders. Like it or not, the president has the constitutional authority to wage the war on terror. His detractors don't like it, so they pretend the authority doesn't exist, and trample on the Constitution in the process.

— Rich Lowry is author of Legacy: Paying the Price for the Clinton Years.

Domestic Spying: Independent Look (SEAPI)

By SEATTLE POST-INTELLIGENCER EDITORIAL BOARD

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, January 4, 2006

It's hard to imagine that the Republican-led Congress is up to the job of unraveling the Bush administration's spying scandal. There's no other truly proper forum, however.

DOJ_NMG_0007982

At least in theory, some of the work could start in the Justice Department. As the American Civil Liberties Union has suggested, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales should appoint an independent counsel to look at possible crimes in the warrantless monitoring of Americans' communications.

But that appears unlikely. Instead, Gonzales' Justice Department has shamelessly launched an investigation to find who tipped The New York Times and the public to President Bush's approval of the wiretaps. Worse, Gonzales himself was involved in the spying decisions while serving as White House counsel. The Times reported that Gonzales, in March 2004, went to a hospital to try to talk then-Attorney General John Ashcroft into setting aside his chief deputy's objections to the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance.

John Dean, the White House counsel whose testimony helped bring down President Nixon, has written on FindLaw.com about the parallels between Bush's activities and those during the Nixon administration. Both presidents committed impeachable offenses, he argued.

The Senate seems ready to look at the administration's dubious claims that Bush violated neither the law nor the Constitution. But the House of Representatives, where impeachment proceedings begin, ought to take the lead in determining whether to hold the president accountable.

U.S. To Seek Dismissal Of Guantánamo Suits (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - The Bush administration notified federal trial judges in Washington that it would soon ask them to dismiss all lawsuits brought by prisoners at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, challenging their detentions, Justice Department officials said Tuesday.

The action means that the administration is moving swiftly to take advantage of an amendment to the military bill that President Bush signed into law last Friday. The amendment strips federal courts from hearing habeas corpus petitions from Guantánamo detainees.

On Tuesday, the Justice Department sent notices to all the federal judges in Washington who have cases involving challenges brought by Guantánamo inmates, informing them of the new amendment. The officials said the department would file formal notices within several days asking the judges to dismiss more than 160 cases involving at least 300 detainees.

If the administration wins its argument it would mean an abrupt end to a wide effort by dozens of lawyers to use the right of habeas corpus in federal courts to challenge the imprisonment of suspected terrorists at Guantánamo as enemy combatants.

The administration had selected Guantánamo as the site for a detention camp for terrorism suspects in the expectation that its actions would not be subject to review by federal courts. But in June 2004, the Supreme Court ruled that the naval base at Guantánamo was not outside the jurisdiction of United States law and that the habeas corpus statute that allows prisoners to challenge their detentions was applicable.

The challenges were brought in various district courts in Washington. After some federal judges disagreed over the meaning of the Supreme Court ruling, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit took up the issue, and during arguments in September, the appeals judges seemed skeptical of the administration's contentions.

In addition to arguing in court, the administration separately pressed its case in Congress and found a strong ally in Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, who said the challenges brought by Guantánamo inmates were frivolous and were clogging the courts. Mr. Graham, along with Senators Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, and Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona, sponsored the amendment to the Defense Act eliminating habeas corpus jurisdiction in federal courts.

The amendment instead allows the District of Columbia appellate court to review the results of military tribunals at Guantánamo in which the prisoners were found to have been properly deemed imprisoned as enemy combatants.

Administration critics have complained that the tribunals at Guantánamo, in which panels of three officers decide whether a prisoner is an enemy combatant, are unfair in several respects. The prisoners are not represented by lawyers and they often may not see evidence used against them for national security reasons.

Tasia Scolinos, the Justice Department spokeswoman, said the detainees had ample opportunity to be heard.

"We are aware of no other country that has provided their enemies with such extensive legal review during an ongoing conflict," Ms. Scolinos said. "Detainees are entitled to legal review both within the military system and to the highest civilian courts in the country."

The Justice Department requests asking the district judges to dismiss all the habeas corpus petitions are expected to be challenged by lawyers for the detainees, making it likely that the issue will be resolved by the appeals court or the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0007983

Although the courts and Congress are co-equal branches of government, the Constitution allows Congress to define the scope of jurisdiction for all federal courts below the Supreme Court.

Justice To Try To Toss Gitmo Challenges (LAT/AP)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department will seek dismissal of lawsuits from more than 300 Guantanamo Bay detainees fighting the legality of their confinement, using a new law that the Bush administration says sharply limits existing challenges. Advocates for detainees quickly registered their opposition Tuesday.

The measure, part of the Defense Appropriations Act that President Bush signed last week, was intended to allow detainees at the U.S. naval base in Cuba to appeal their detention status and punishments to a federal appeals court in Washington.

That avenue replaces the one tool the Supreme Court gave detainees in 2004 to fight the legality of their detentions -- the right to file habeas corpus lawsuits, which demand that the government justify someone's continued imprisonment, in any federal court.

The new provision won broad support only after its chief Democratic sponsor, Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, said it had been altered so it would not apply to pending cases.

But on Tuesday, the Justice Department notified judges at U.S. District Court in Washington that it will ask them to dismiss 187 cases involving more than 300 people because the law eliminates the jurisdiction of district courts to consider the legality of detentions at the naval base.

The decision to try to stop pending cases in their tracks drew an immediate rebuke from advocates for the detainees, who said the provision should apply only to new challenges. "The battle about what that provision means has only just begun," said Elisa Massimino, director of the Washington office of Human Rights First.

Many of the 500 or so prisoners held at Guantanamo were captured in Afghanistan and have been detained for several years without being charged.

Since the Supreme Court ruling, prisoner lawsuits against the government have piled up.

Administration officials and supportive lawmakers have argued that the United States gives the detainees unprecedented access to U.S. courts, in some cases more than U.S. military personnel who have been convicted of crimes by military courts.

Under the new law, detainees still may appeal their classification as enemy combatants or their conviction by a military commission to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

* __

On the Net:

Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov

Human Rights First: http://www.humanrightsfirst.org

Dismissal Of Terror Detainee Cases Sought (REU)

By Deborah Charles

Reuters, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The U.S. Justice Department will seek to dismiss more than 180 cases involving inmates at Guantanamo Bay who have challenged their detention in court, court documents showed on Tuesday.

The department filed a notice to judges presiding over the cases at the U.S. District Court in Washington to advise them that by the end of next week the Justice Department would file official motions to dismiss the cases.

The notice comes a week after President George W. Bush signed new legislation banning cruel and inhumane treatment of prisoners. The anti-torture law also curbs the ability of prisoners being held at the U.S. Naval Base in Cuba to challenge their detention in federal court.

The legislation requiring humane treatment of detainees in U.S. custody was originally opposed by the White House. But Bush backed off his original veto threats after Congress voted overwhelmingly to support the amendment, pushed by Sen. John McCain, an Arizona Republican who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam.

In a concession to the White House, the bill limits prisoners from going to lower-level civilian courts for relief from confinement. They can only go to an appeals court once they have gone through a military court process.

PRISONER LAWSUITS

DOJ_NMG_0007984

The United States has faced criticism at home and abroad for treatment of prisoners at Guantanamo and for holding prisoners indefinitely. Only nine of about 500 prisoners being held at the base have been charged, and the United States has been holding prisoners there since January 2002.

Hundreds of prisoners have filed lawsuits in civilian courts to protest their confinement or to protest conditions of confinement. While some have protested their confinement in general, others have sued over the type of Koran they have been given while others want access to DVDs, a Justice Department official said.

The Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees who have sued in civilian court, has criticized the anti-torture law for eliminating prisoners' access to the U.S. judicial system.

But the Justice Department official, who declined to be identified, said detainees still had the right to appeal, they just had to wait until the military process was completed.

"It affords more judicial review in civilian court than we afford our own military convicted of crimes," the official said.

Panels of military officers, formally called commissions, were due this month to hold hearings in the first U.S. war crimes trials since World War Two. The Pentagon has promised "full and fair" proceedings.

Human rights activists and military defense lawyers have criticized the military commission rules, saying they favor prosecutors, allow hearsay and evidence obtained through torture.

Bush Could Bypass New Torture Ban (BOS)

By Charlie Savage

The Boston Globe, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- When President Bush last week signed the bill outlawing the torture of detainees, he quietly reserved the right to bypass the law under his powers as commander in chief.

After approving the bill last Friday, Bush issued a "signing statement" -- an official document in which a president lays out his interpretation of a new law -- declaring that he will view the interrogation limits in the context of his broader powers to protect national security. This means Bush believes he can waive the restrictions, the White House and legal specialists said.

"The executive branch shall construe [the law] in a manner consistent with the constitutional authority of the President . . . as Commander in Chief," Bush wrote, adding that this approach "will assist in achieving the shared objective of the Congress and the President . . . of protecting the American people from further terrorist attacks."

Some legal specialists said yesterday that the president's signing statement, which was posted on the White House website but had gone unnoticed over the New Year's weekend, raises serious questions about whether he intends to follow the law.

A senior administration official, who spoke to a Globe reporter about the statement on condition of anonymity because he is not an official spokesman, said the president intended to reserve the right to use harsher methods in special situations involving national security.

"We are not going to ignore this law," the official said, noting that Bush, when signing laws, routinely issues signing statements saying he will construe them consistent with his own constitutional authority. "We consider it a valid statute. We consider ourselves bound by the prohibition on cruel, unusual, and degrading treatment."

But, the official said, a situation could arise in which Bush may have to waive the law's restrictions to carry out his responsibilities to protect national security. He cited as an example a "ticking time bomb" scenario, in which a detainee is believed to have information that could prevent a planned terrorist attack.

"Of course the president has the obligation to follow this law, [but] he also has the obligation to defend and protect the country as the commander in chief, and he will have to square those two responsibilities in each case," the official added. "We are not expecting that those two responsibilities will come into conflict, but it's possible that they will."

David Golove, a New York University law professor who specializes in executive power issues, said that the signing statement means that Bush believes he can still authorize harsh interrogation tactics when he sees fit.

"The signing statement is saying 'I will only comply with this law when I want to, and if something arises in the war on terrorism where I think it's important to torture or engage in cruel, inhuman, and degrading conduct, I have the authority to do so and nothing in this law is going to stop me,' " he said. "They don't want to come out and say it directly because it doesn't sound very nice, but it's unmistakable to anyone who has been following what's going on."

Golove and other legal specialists compared the signing statement to Bush's decision, revealed last month, to bypass a 1978 law forbidding domestic wiretapping without a warrant. Bush authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on Americans' international phone calls and e-mails without a court order starting after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0007985

The president and his aides argued that the Constitution gives the commander in chief the authority to bypass the 1978 law when necessary to protect national security. They also argued that Congress implicitly endorsed that power when it authorized the use of force against the perpetrators of the attacks.

Legal academics and human rights organizations said Bush's signing statement and his stance on the wiretapping law are part of a larger agenda that claims exclusive control of war-related matters for the executive branch and holds that any involvement by Congress or the courts should be minimal.

Vice President Dick Cheney recently told reporters, "I believe in a strong, robust executive authority, and I think that the world we live in demands it. . . . I would argue that the actions that we've taken are totally appropriate and consistent with the constitutional authority of the president."

Since the 2001 attacks, the administration has also asserted the power to bypass domestic and international laws in deciding how to detain prisoners captured in the Afghanistan war. It also has claimed the power to hold any US citizen Bush designates an "enemy combatant" without charges or access to an attorney.

And in 2002, the administration drafted a secret legal memo holding that Bush could authorize interrogators to violate antitorture laws when necessary to protect national security. After the memo was leaked to the press, the administration eliminated the language from a subsequent version, but it never repudiated the idea that Bush could authorize officials to ignore a law.

The issue heated up again in January 2005. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales disclosed during his confirmation hearing that the administration believed that antitorture laws and treaties did not restrict interrogators at overseas prisons because the Constitution does not apply abroad.

In response, Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, filed an amendment to a Defense Department bill explicitly saying that that the cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment of detainees in US custody is illegal regardless of where they are held.

McCain's office did not return calls seeking comment yesterday.

The White House tried hard to kill the McCain amendment. Cheney lobbied Congress to exempt the CIA from any interrogation limits, and Bush threatened to veto the bill, arguing that the executive branch has exclusive authority over war policy.

But after veto-proof majorities in both houses of Congress approved it, Bush called a press conference with McCain, praised the measure, and said he would accept it.

Legal specialists said the president's signing statement called into question his comments at the press conference.

"The whole point of the McCain Amendment was to close every loophole," said Marty Lederman, a Georgetown University law professor who served in the Justice Department from 1997 to 2002. "The president has re-opened the loophole by asserting the constitutional authority to act in violation of the statute where it would assist in the war on terrorism."

Elisa Massimino, Washington director for Human Rights Watch, called Bush's signing statement an "in-your-face affront" to both McCain and to Congress.

"The basic civics lesson that there are three co-equal branches of government that provide checks and balances on each other is being fundamentally rejected by this executive branch," she said.

"Congress is trying to flex its muscle to provide those checks [on detainee abuse], and it's being told through the signing statement that it's impotent. It's quite a radical view."

Experts: London Bombings Cost About $2,000 (AP)

By Tariq Panja

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

LONDON — The suicide bombings that killed 52 people on London's transit system in July were a relatively low-cost operation, security experts said Tuesday.

"I think the London bombings, including buying the train tickets and conducting reconnaissance, were done for no more than 1,200" pounds, or about $2,000, independent defense and security expert Paul Beaver told The Associated Press.

Terrorism financing expert Loretta Napoleoni said the bombings were relatively inexpensive largely because the four bombers were homegrown, living with their families in towns north of London and traveling to their targets using a rental car and a train.

"They were just a group of friends who lived at home," she said. "Their only costs were the homemade explosives and the traveling costs to London."

The British Broadcasting Corp. reported Tuesday that police believe the attacks cost "no more than several hundred pounds."

DOJ_NMG_0007986

Police have said the four used inexpensive, peroxide-based explosives. But they would not specify the estimated cost of the attack until they had completed the investigation into the "wider circumstances of how the attack was funded," police said Tuesday.

The BBC also reported that investigators believe teaching assistant Mohammad Sidique Khan, 30, was the group's chief's financier. He died in the attacks, along with the three other suspected bombers: Hasib Hussain, an unemployed 18-year-old; Lindsey Germaine, 19, whose occupation was unclear; and Shehzad Tanweer, 22, who helped out at his family's fish-and-chips shop.

Neither Beaver nor Napoleoni included in their estimates the costs of some suspects' travel to Pakistan, which has become a subject of the investigation.

Al-Qaida deputy leader Ayman al-Zawahri said in a statement broadcast in September that his terror network carried out the London bombings. Counterterrorism experts have not confirmed the link.

An August 2004 United Nations report said that al-Qaida had spent less than $50,000 on each of its major attacks since Sept. 11, 2001, including bombings in Bali, Madrid and Istanbul. Sanctions and other measures to block the group's funding had only "limited impact" on preventing attacks, the report said.

PATRIOT ACT:

Bush Pushes For Patriot Act Renewal (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — As the clock runs on Congress' short-term extension of the Patriot Act, President Bush met with federal prosecutors Tuesday and contended that the domestic anti-terror law is vital to keeping Americans safe.

Many key provisions of the law were to expire Dec. 31. Amid a debate over whether the act sufficiently protects civil liberties, most Senate Democrats and a few Republicans united against legislation that would have renewed several provisions permanently while extending others for four years.

In a move the White House adamantly opposed but later accepted, Congress approved a one-month extension of the law in its current form to allow the debate to continue. The new measure expires Feb. 3.

Bush, his voice rising in apparent irritation, said lawmakers must act on a permanent renewal of the law that expanded the government's surveillance and prosecutorial powers against suspected terrorists, their associates and financiers. Noting the Patriot Act was overwhelmingly approved not long after the 2001 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington, he said political considerations now were getting in the way.

"When it came time to renew the act, for partisan reasons, in my mind, people have not stepped up and have agreed that it's still necessary to protect the country," said the president, sitting at a table in the Roosevelt Room with federal officials and 19 district attorneys from around the country.

"The enemy has not gone away. They're still there. And I expect Congress to understand that we're still at war, and they got to give us the tools necessary to win this war," he said.

Later, outside the West Wing, district attorneys cited several cases in which the Patriot Act had played a crucial role, from staging an undercover sting on California weapons dealers attempting to sell Stinger missiles to securing convictions of major terrorist financiers in New York.

"We use it each and every day to protect our country against terrorists and criminals," said Ken Wainstein, district attorney for the District of Columbia.

"We believe this provides adequate safeguards in every respect," said Mary Beth Buchanan, the district attorney for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., said Bush should spend more time negotiating about the Patriot Act with Democrats and others on Capitol Hill and less on "staged meetings with hand-picked participants" at the White House.

"Contrary to the president's misleading comments, nobody wants to see the Patriot Act expire," Feingold said. "We want commonsense changes to the act that would give the government the power to combat terrorism while protecting the rights and freedoms of law-abiding citizens."

The White House event drew 19 of the country's 93 U.S. attorneys. They were contacted by officials at the Justice Department to attend, Wainstein said.

Among the provisions the renewal would make permanent are those that allow roving wiretaps so that investigators can listen in on any telephone and tap any computer they think a terrorist might use.

DOJ_NMG_0007987

Bush Steps Up Bid To Renew Patriot Act (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

President Bush yesterday began to pressure lawmakers into renewing the Patriot Act, meeting in the Oval Office with 19 U.S. attorneys, some of whom cited specific cases in which the anti-terror law protected Americans from attack.

Key provisions of the Patriot Act were to expire Dec. 31, but after an acrimonious civil liberties debate, Senate Democrats who had threatened to filibuster renewal allowed an extension of the law only through Feb. 3.

"This Patriot Act was passed overwhelmingly by the United States Congress in 2001," the president told reporters yesterday. "And now, when it came time to renew the act, for partisan reasons, in my mind, people have not stepped up and have agreed that it's still necessary to protect the country.

"The enemy has not gone away -- they're still there. And I expect Congress ... to give us the tools necessary to win this war. ... The American people expect to be protected, and the Patriot Act is a really important tool for them to stay protected," Mr. Bush said.

After the meeting, several U.S. attorneys cited cases in which the act had enabled law-enforcement agents to thwart attacks, from staging an undercover sting on California weapons dealers attempting to sell Stinger missiles, to securing convictions of major terrorist financiers in New York.

"We told him that we use it each and every day to protect our country against terrorists and criminals," said Kenneth L. Wainstein, U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia.

Roslynn Mauskopf, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of New York, said the law was instrumental in convicting two persons of funneling $20 million to the terror groups al Qaeda and Hamas.

The Patriot Act, enacted after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, expanded the authority of the federal government to conduct secret searches, obtain private records and intercept telephone calls to track suspected terrorists.

But Senate Democrats -- and a handful of Republicans -- opposed extension of the Patriot Act after the revelation last month that Mr. Bush authorized the National Security Agency to monitor international calls among suspected terror group members, including al Qaeda.

The White House yesterday condemned Senate Democrats for playing politics.

"They were engaging in obstructionist tactics to try to kill the Patriot Act, as they said in their own words," Bush spokesman Scott McClellan said, noting that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, had boasted "about killing the Patriot Act."

Sen. Russell D. Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat, said Mr. Bush should spend more time negotiating about the Patriot Act with Democrats and others on Capitol Hill and less on "staged meetings with hand-picked participants" at the White House.

"We want common-sense changes to the act that would give the government the power to combat terrorism while protecting the rights and freedoms of law-abiding citizens," Mr. Feingold said.

Bush, Prosecutors Push Patriot Act (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush fired the first shot in the renewed battle over the USA Patriot Act, hosting on Tuesday a group of federal prosecutors who said the soon-to-expire law helped solve major crimes.

“These good folks have used the Patriot Act to protect America,” Bush said. He accused Senate Democrats of blocking reauthorization of the law for “partisan reasons.”

The Patriot Act, passed after the 9/11 attacks to give law enforcement extra powers to track terrorism suspects, expires Feb. 3. Bush wants to make it permanent.

Bush-appointed U.S. attorneys from 14 states and the District of Columbia said the law has helped them crack cases involving terrorist finances, weapons exchanged for drugs, and child abductions.

Senate Democrats who blocked renewal late last year, such as Patrick Leahy of Vermont, said they support the law but want to make sure civil liberties are protected.

Four Republican senators joined Democrats in blocking renewal of the law: Larry Craig of Idaho, John Sununu of New Hampshire, Lisa Murkowski of Alaska and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska. The Senate GOP leadership agreed to a six-month extension. The GOP-led House of Representatives later cut that extension to five weeks from its original expiration date of Dec. 31.

The House is not scheduled to reconvene until Jan. 31, just three days before the Patriot Act expires.

DOJ_NMG_0007988

The coming debate could well focus on other issues, particularly disclosures that the Bush administration approved domestic wiretapping without warrants of people suspected of links to terrorism.

In voting to block renewal, Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said the revelation "greatly influenced my vote."

Michael Greenberger, director of the Center for Health and Homeland Security at the University of Maryland, said Bush may be aiming to pressure the four dissenting Republicans. But he said controversy over the warrantless surveillance program could make renewing the Patriot Act "an uphill task." Even Republicans such as Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania called the spying inappropriate.

U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf, from New York, said the Patriot Act enabled her office to convict two men of funneling $20 million to terrorist groups.

U.S. Attorney Carol Lam of California said that before 9/11, information from a foreign intelligence wiretap could not be shared with criminal prosecutors. She said officials had to choose between "pursuing an intelligence investigation or a criminal investigation."

Bush Assails Democrats Over Patriot Act (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

President Bush accused Democrats yesterday of blocking a full reauthorization of the USA Patriot Act for political reasons, as the White House stepped up an aggressive campaign to defend the president's terrorism-fighting authority.

"For partisan reasons, in my mind, people have not stepped up," Bush told reporters, with 19 federal prosecutors by his side. "The enemy has not gone away; they're still there, and I expect Congress to understand that we're still at war and they've got to give us the tools necessary to win this war."

White House spokesman Scott McClellan, speaking to reporters earlier in the day, said Senate Democrats are simply doing the bidding of liberal special interest groups such as the American Civil Liberties Union, which opposes the broad surveillance power authorized by the act. Democrats are trying to "appease" the ACLU "because they want to weaken and undermine the Patriot Act," McClellan said.

The Patriot Act, which Congress voted to extend until the end of this month amid a bitter political dispute over its reach, provides the federal government with broad power to monitor and prosecute terrorism suspects and those helping them. Many Democrats and a few key Republicans oppose the act as written because they say it does not provide adequate protections for the civil liberties of innocent Americans.

The Patriot Act is expected to dominate the debate when Congress returns at the end of the month and to serve as a backdrop for a broader, and possibly even more contentious, argument over Bush's anti-terrorism policies.

The White House is bracing for a heated dispute over both the Patriot Act and the recent revelations that Bush secretly authorized the National Security Agency to monitor communications within the United States involving terrorism suspects overseas. Congress is planning hearings on the NSA program this month and another vote on the Patriot Act early next month, when the current extension expires.

Adopting campaign-style tactics, Bush and his aides plan to accuse Democrats of jeopardizing national security to further their political agenda, a tack that worked well for the White House in the 2002 and 2004 elections. But the political environment is different now, with Bush less popular and Democrats better organized in opposition.

Moreover, key Republicans are also raising objections to Bush's broad interpretation of presidential power. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) was among the first to demand hearings on the NSA intercepts, and four GOP senators who typically back Bush in policy disputes played crucial roles in blocking the full reauthorization of the Patriot Act before Congress adjourned shortly before Christmas.

On another front, the Justice Department notified U.S. District Court judges in Washington that it will seek the dismissal of lawsuits from more than 300 Guantanamo Bay detainees who are questioning the legality of their confinement, using a provision of the defense appropriations law that the Bush administration says limits existing challenges.

The new provision prevailed after a sponsor, Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), said it would not apply to pending cases. But the Justice Department said the law eliminates the jurisdiction of district courts over challenges to the legality of detentions at the U.S. naval base in Cuba.

The new law still permits detainees to appeal being classified as enemy combatants or any military-commission convictions to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit.

Bush Seeks Patriot Act Extension (VOA)

By Scott Stearns

DOJ_NMG_0007989

Voice of America, January 4, 2006

President Bush says some opposition Democrats are playing politics with U.S. national security by delaying the long-term extension of controversial anti-terrorism laws. Opponents say the expanded police powers threaten civil liberties.

George Bush flanked by Attorney General Alberto GonzalesPresident Bush says he will spend the next 30 days trying to convince Congress and the American people that the nation needs a permanent extension of the anti-terrorism laws known as the Patriot Act.

"The American people expect to be protected, and the Patriot Act is a really important tool for them to stay protected," the president said.

First passed following the September 2001 terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, those broader police powers were due to expire at the end of 2005. Congress gave the president just a one-month extension through February 3 amidst concerns from Democrats and some Republicans that parts of the Patriot Act threaten civil liberties.

The laws give investigators broader powers to seize library and medical records as well as to conduct roving wiretaps. Opponents are also concerned about what they say is limited Congressional and judicial oversight.

President Bush says there is plenty of oversight in the Patriot Act. He says critics are putting partisan politics ahead of national security.

"There's oversight on this important program," he said. "And now when it came time to renew the act, for partisan reasons in my mind, people have not stepped up and have agreed that it is still necessary to protect the country. The enemy has not gone away. They are still there. And I expect Congress to understand that we are still at war, and they have got to give us the tools necessary to win this war."

This will be the president's first legislative challenge of the new year and comes at a time of new questions about expanding executive power following the president's admission that he authorized the surveillance of telephone calls without a court warrant.

President Bush says those intercepts are strictly limited to communications where one of the parties is outside the United States, and then only to people with known links to terrorist groups.

He says media reports that uncovered the operation have helped America's enemies by revealing U.S. intelligence techniques. The Justice Department is investigating how reporters learned of the program.

Congress will investigate the intercepts themselves and whether the president exceeded his power by authorizing them without a court order.

Bush Renews Patriot Act Campaign (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - President Bush assembled a phalanx of United States attorneys at the White House on Tuesday to bolster his call for Congress to renew the antiterrorism law known as the USA Patriot Act, intensifying a coming clash with Capitol Hill over civil liberties and national security.

Surrounded in the Roosevelt Room by 19 federal prosecutors, Mr. Bush said Congress was holding up renewal of the law because of politics.

"When it came time to renew the act, for partisan reasons, in my mind, people have not stepped up and have agreed that it's still necessary to protect the country," Mr. Bush said. "The enemy has not gone away - they're still there. And I expect Congress to understand that we're still at war and they've got to give us the tools necessary to win this war."

The president's remarks and an appearance by the United States attorneys in the West Wing driveway afterward were part of a stepped-up White House campaign to make permanent the antiterrorism law, which expanded the government's investigative powers after the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001.

The measure was originally passed with bipartisan support, but with time limits built in because many lawmakers were nervous about its broad reach in the wake of criticism that the legislation impinged on civil liberties. Last month, with major provisions of the law set to expire on Dec. 31, the White House made a strong push to make the law permanent, but Democrats and a handful of Republicans balked, and extended the law for only five weeks, to Feb. 3.

The White House efforts were further complicated by a simultaneous uproar in Congress last month over revelations that Mr. Bush authorized a secret spying program to monitor international phone calls and international e-mail messages of people in the United States.

The United States attorneys, all Bush appointees summoned to Washington by the Justice Department, echoed Mr. Bush when they appeared en masse in front of television cameras moments later.

DOJ_NMG_0007990

Rosalynn Mauskopf, the United States attorney for the Eastern District of New York, was among those who stepped up to the microphones and said the law had made it easier for the Eastern District "to choke off the supply of money to terrorists."

Specifically, Ms. Mauskopf said prosecutors had used the law, which broadens federal powers to demand financial records, to convict the spiritual adviser to Osama bin Laden, Sheik Muhammad Ali Hassan al-Mouyad, as well as Sheik Mouyad's assistant, for funneling millions of dollars to Al Qaeda and the militant group Hamas.

Administration and Congressional officials said they expected a compromise on the renewal bill in coming weeks between the White House and members of both parties. In mid-December, the House did pass a measure to make 14 of 16 expiring provisions in the act permanent, but that bill became bottled up in the Senate, eventually leading Congress to enact only a five-week extension.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who said he voted to block permanent renewal of the act in part because of the revelations about the spying program, said Tuesday that there was room for a deal.

"Look," Mr. Schumer said, "this is one that should be able to be worked out because the sides are relatively close."

One main sticking point is a provision that gives the federal government the power to demand access to library records on what patrons have borrowed and other information material showing their reading habits. The provision was challenged in a lawsuit in Connecticut by the American Civil Liberties Union.

The other main sticking point is an administrative subpoena, called a national security letter, that gives the federal government the power to demand records without a judge's approval.

Among the other United States attorneys called to the White House on Tuesday were Mike Garcia of the Southern District of New York, Carol Lam of the Southern District of California and Paul McNulty of the Eastern District of Virginia, who is also acting deputy attorney general.

Bush Pushes For Patriot Act Renewal (AP)

By JENNIFER LOVEN, The Associated Press

AP, January 3, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — As the clock runs on Congress' short-term extension of the Patriot Act, President Bush met with federal prosecutors Tuesday and contended that the domestic anti-terror law is vital to keeping Americans safe.

Many key provisions of the law were to expire Dec. 31. Amid a debate over whether the act sufficiently protects civil liberties, most Senate Democrats and a few Republicans united against legislation that would have renewed several provisions permanently while extending others for four years.

In a move the White House adamantly opposed but later accepted, Congress approved a one-month extension of the law in its current form to allow the debate to continue. The new measure expires Feb. 3.

Advertisement

Bush, his voice rising in apparent irritation, said lawmakers must act on a permanent renewal of the law that expanded the government's surveillance and prosecutorial powers against suspected terrorists, their associates and financiers. Noting the Patriot Act was overwhelmingly approved not long after the 2001 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington, he said political considerations now were getting in the way.

"When it came time to renew the act, for partisan reasons, in my mind, people have not stepped up and have agreed that it's still necessary to protect the country," said the president, sitting at a table in the Roosevelt Room with federal officials and 19 district attorneys from around the country.

"The enemy has not gone away. They're still there. And I expect Congress to understand that we're still at war, and they got to give us the tools necessary to win this war," he said.

Later, outside the West Wing, district attorneys cited several cases in which the Patriot Act had played a crucial role, from staging an undercover sting on California weapons dealers attempting to sell Stinger missiles to securing convictions of major terrorist financiers in New York.

"We use it each and every day to protect our country against terrorists and criminals," said Ken Wainstein, district attorney for the District of Columbia.

"We believe this provides adequate safeguards in every respect," said Mary Beth Buchanan, the district attorney for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., said Bush should spend more time negotiating about the Patriot Act with Democrats and others on Capitol Hill and less on "staged meetings with hand-picked participants" at the White House.

"Contrary to the president's misleading comments, nobody wants to see the Patriot Act expire," Feingold said. "We want commonsense changes to the act that would give the government the power to combat terrorism while protecting the rights and freedoms of law-abiding citizens."

The White House event drew 19 of the country's 93 U.S. attorneys. They were contacted by officials at the Justice Department to attend, Wainstein said.

Among the provisions the renewal would make permanent are those that allow roving wiretaps so that investigators can listen in on any telephone and tap any computer they think a terrorist might use.

Bush Pushes For Patriot Act Renewal (REU)

By Steve Holland

Reuters, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - President George W. Bush opened a 30-day push to gain renewal of the anti-terrorism USA Patriot Act on Tuesday with a partisan blast at Democrats and a meeting with U.S. prosecutors who called the law essential.

A temporary extension of the Patriot Act, passed in December to stop a Democratic filibuster blocking maneuver, expires February 3 and Bush is using the early days of the new year to press for permanent passage of the law.

He accused Democrats of blocking the law for "partisan reasons."

"The enemy has not gone away. They're still there. And I expect Congress to understand that we're still at war, and they've got to give us the tools necessary to win this war," Bush said.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan was blunter, saying Democrats were putting politics ahead of national security.

Bush brought to the White House 19 U.S. attorneys from around the country to help make his point that the law has been helpful to law enforcement.

Enacted in response to the September 11 attacks, the Patriot Act expanded the authority of the federal government to conduct secret searches, obtain private records and intercept telephone calls, among other activities, in its efforts to track down suspected terror cells.

The five-week extension was agreed on last month to give lawmakers more time to consider civil liberties protections.

DOMESTIC EAVESDROPPING

The debate over whether some provisions of the Patriot Act infringe too much on civil liberties became more heated after the revelation that Bush authorized the National Security Agency to conduct a domestic eavesdropping operation on Americans suspected of links to terrorism without seeking court approval.

The Democratic leader in the House of Representatives, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, rejected Bush's complaint that the Patriot Act was a victim of partisan politics and accused him of misleading the public.

Rather, she said, there are bipartisan concerns that the law "failed to secure the right balance between our national security and our civil liberties" and that the extension will give lawmakers time to "add the appropriate safeguards."

The senior Democrat on the Senate Judiciary committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, said their efforts were aimed at improving the Patriot Act, not ending it.

"We want to make sure that these far-reaching government powers have adequate checks and balances so they can be effectively used without unduly threatening Americans' hard-won freedoms from government abuse, Leahy said in a statement.

The U.S. attorneys spoke to reporters after their meeting with Bush and cited several examples of cases in which provisions of the Patriot Act allowed them to break up plots to attack the United States and other criminal activity.

"We told him that we use it each and every day to protect our country against terrorists and criminals," said Ken Wainstein, U.S. attorney for Washington, D.C.

The U.S. attorneys said they believed the civil liberties protections included in a compromise version of the bill agreed on by congressional negotiators were sufficient.

Roslynn Mauskopf, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of New York, said the law was used to gain convictions of two people for funneling more than $20 million to al Qaeda and Hamas.

"Without the provisions of the Patriot Act we would not have been able to build and prove this case against these two master terrorist financiers," she said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says Cities To Compete For Crisis Funds Based On Risk (USAT)

USA Today, January 4, 2006

Cities at greater risk from terrorism, a health crisis or natural disaster will get a bigger share of federal funds under the urban area security program, the Homeland Security Department said Tuesday. The announcement created potential winners and losers among dozens of metropolitan areas competing for funds, which overall are being reduced from $855 million last year to $765 million this year.

DOJ_NMG_0007992

"We are taking a giant step forward in implementing this risk-based strategy," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said. In the past, the grants generally went to the 50 largest cities for terrorism-related security measures. This year, cities at risk from natural disasters or health crises also are eligible.

"I think that's exactly what we have been screaming for all along," New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg said. New York got $207 million last year, by far the most of any community.

Homeland Security officials said they won't announce how much each recipient will get until June, after assessing each applicant's plans for the money.

The agency said 35 metropolitan areas will be eligible this year if they show they will use the money wisely. An additional eleven areas that previously received money under the program will still be eligible but may be dropped next year unless they show a compelling need and a sound plan. Those at risk of being dropped include Buffalo, Las Vegas, Louisville and Tampa.

U.S. won't lift sanctions on North Korea

The Bush administration rejected a North Korean demand that it lift sanctions as a way of possibly resuming stalled nuclear disarmament talks. The sanctions were imposed for alleged currency counterfeiting and other illegal activities.

The two issues are unrelated, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. "I don't see in what way they are preventing North Korea from going back to the six-party talks," he said.

The negotiations are aimed at halting North Korea's nuclear weapons program. The six nations are China, Japan, Russia, the United States and North and South Korea. All agreed in November to return to the negotiations as soon as possible, McCormack said.

Alito supporters run ads in 3 more states

A conservative group supporting Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito said it will spend $500,000 on new TV ads it will air this week in North Dakota, Maine and Louisiana in an attempt to influence senators considered swing votes on the nomination. The ads by Progress for America target Democrats Byron Dorgan and Kent Conrad of North Dakota, Republicans Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe of Maine and Democrat Mary Landrieu of Louisiana.

The ad is the group's fourth television spot since the federal appeals court judge was nominated Oct. 31 to replace retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Other ads have aired in Rhode Island, Nebraska and Arkansas.

Senate Judiciary Committee hearings on Alito open Monday. A vote by the full Senate is scheduled for Jan. 20.

Campbell won't run for Colo. governor

Former Republican senator Ben Nighthorse Campbell said he will not run for governor of Colorado. "I've kind of lost interest in public office," Campbell said. He declined to endorse either of the two Republicans still in the race, Rep. Bob Beauprez and former University of Denver president Marc Holtzman. "I feel the best candidates haven't emerged yet," Campbell said.

Former Denver district attorney Bill Ritter and Gary Lindstrom, a freshman state representative, are the only two Democratic candidates. Gov. Bill Owens, a Republican, is barred from running for re-election because of term limits.

Campbell, a former Democrat, won nine races and served 22 years in public office. He retired last year.

U.S. Adjusts Rules For Anti-terrorism Grants (KRT)

By Jim Puzzanghera

Knight Ridder, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Homeland Security Department announced Tuesday that 35 urban areas are eligible for $765 million in special anti-terrorism grants because of their high risk of attack and added new rules for allocating the money to force regional cooperation and eliminate wasteful spending.

The regions include Washington, New York, Philadelphia, Charlotte, N.C., Miami, Chicago, Kansas City, Minneapolis/Saint Paul, Dallas/Fort Worth, Los Angeles and the San Francisco Bay Area. Each has 60 days to come up with a proposal for what it would do with the money and justify how the expenditures would improve security.

The "investment justifications" are designed to avoid questionable decisions, such as the purchase of four Segway motorized scooters for a total of $24,815 by the San Jose, Calif., police and Santa Clara County, Calif., bomb squads.

"The fact of the matter is the public has the right to expect that even when the city's in a high-risk category, the money that it gets under this program has to be spent wisely and effectively," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said at a news conference.

The department gauged the risks via a computer evaluation that assessed population, vital infrastructure and frequency of terrorism investigations.

DOJ_NMG_0007993

Under the Urban Areas Security Initiative program, begun in 2003, major cities that are close to one another - such as Dallas, Fort Worth and Arlington, Texas, and San Francisco, San Jose and Oakland, Calif. - received separate grants. But Chertoff said the widespread impact of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita helped persuade his department to ignore municipal boundaries in making this year's grants.

"When terrorists plan an attack, the attack is not carefully delineated within the lines of political jurisdictions," he said. "Protecting the country is not about who gets to give the money out or what particular jurisdiction gets to have control over the funds that are being distributed by the federal treasury."

Although the grants are designed to deal with terrorism, Chertoff said his department would consider requests that were helpful in natural disasters as well, such as evacuation plans and interoperable emergency communications.

The method of distributing the money across regions has been criticized.

San Jose Mayor Ron Gonzales said it "could be a grave mistake."

In a letter to Chertoff last month, he noted that the San Francisco Bay Area is spread over 8,000 square miles and crosses dozens of jurisdictions.

"Obviously our local plans and resources must be coordinated among all levels of government with our neighbors," Gonzales wrote. "However, the overly broad combination of different urban centers in the name of efficiency could very likely lead to a lack of efficiency when we need it most."

But Don Parker, the fire chief and disaster manager for Vallejo, a city of about 116,000 at the northern end of the San Francisco Bay Area, said a regional approach was a good idea given the way terrorist attacks could affect surrounding communities.

"If San Francisco suffers a dirty bomb, there's going to be a lot of people leaving San Francisco pretty quickly," Parker said. His city stands to get some funding from the program for the first time.

The 35 high-risk urban areas encompass 95 cities with populations of more than 100,000 and are in 29 states and the District of Columbia. In 2005, 50 cities received $830 million in urban area grants.

The grants are just one part of homeland security funding for state and local governments. In 2006, Congress appropriated $2.5 billion for such grants, with $550 million distributed via formulas.

Homeland security grants have been the focus of a political struggle in Washington. Lawmakers from rural areas prefer formulas that guarantee a specific amount for each state, while those from urban areas want money distributed based on the risk of attack.

The urban security grants aren't dictated by formulas, but Chertoff used Tuesday's announcement to stress that the Bush administration prefers risk-based decisions on all grants.

The department said it intended to drop 11 cities from the program in 2007 after a year of transitional funding - including San Diego, Las Vegas and Tampa, Fla. - as it tried to focus the program on areas with the highest terrorism risk.

Terror Grants To Fund Disasters (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security has expanded eligibility for $756 million in anti-terrorism grant money to include preparation and response to natural disasters.

"Capabilities to evacuate people would obviously have relevance in a terrorism case with a certain kind of attack, but would also have relevance in a natural disaster of a certain kind," said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

Mr. Chertoff said the focus will be "upon geographic regions, as opposed to political jurisdictions," and that the change was made as a direct response to shortcomings surrounding last year's hurricanes and a review of the terror attack on London's underground rail system.

"To pick the obvious example, when you have a geographical area that's below sea level, which has a certain consequence and a certain risk that emerges through a natural disaster, that may also apply to a terrorism-driven disaster, and so that would be part of the plan," Mr. Chertoff said.

The urban grant is separate from a first-responder program that guarantees funding to every state and U.S. territory, including the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands. Critics of that congressionally mandated program have questioned smaller cities' need for such money and say the program is abused.

The 35 metropolitan areas eligible for this year's urban grant encompass 95 cities with populations of more than 100,000 people and include the Washington area and a 10-mile boundary, as well as Baltimore; Philadelphia; Chicago; Phoenix; Denver; Miami; Atlanta; Memphis, Tenn.; Indianapolis; Baton Rouge, La.; New Orleans; Boston; Detroit; Las Vegas; and Dallas.

To be eligible for the grants, regions must show they are at risk and how they will spend the money, Mr. Chertoff said.

DOJ_NMG_0007994

Key Capitol Hill lawmakers yesterday signaled support for changing the grant qualifications. Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican, said the risk-based threats should include border protection.

"I believe that all funds should be distributed on a threat basis, and that the department should reorient its resources, not only in the funds they distribute, but also in setting priorities for department initiatives based on threat," said Mr. Gregg, who chairs the Senate Appropriations subcommittee on homeland security.

The more than $3 billion first-responder program has swelled from four to 11 categories of grants. Allocations now include $400 million for law enforcement, $175 million for port security and $655 million for firefighter assistance.

Mr. Chertoff said firefighting grant funds have been used for questionable projects, such as $63,000 for a decontamination hazardous materials unit still in its crate stored in a warehouse and more than $100,000 each for custom-built mobile command centers hundreds of miles from major cities.

"If an area is not capable of coming up with an investment justification that makes sense, they're not going to get money," Mr. Chertoff said. "That's going to eliminate the proverbial leather jackets or other kinds of apocryphal stories or non-apocryphal stories you read about in years past."

More Aid To Go To High-Risk Areas (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Los Angeles and other high-profile urban areas could get more federal aid as a result of changes in the way the Department of Homeland Security allocates funds to train and equip police officers, firefighters and other emergency responders for possible terrorist attacks.

The plan, announced Tuesday by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, will shift more funds to high-risk areas and away from areas where attacks are considered less likely.

At the same time, other changes, along with an overall drop in federal aid levels, are stirring concern among some Los Angeles-area officials about the long-term effect of the new approach to distributing funds.

The plan is the latest round in a running battle between the Bush administration and Congress. The administration favors allocating anti-terrorism grants based on risk, thus favoring major urban centers on the East and West coasts. Congress has insisted on sharing aid more broadly, including funds for such towns as North Pole, Alaska, where the threat of attack is considered minimal.The debate was complicated by the nation's experience with Hurricane Katrina, which served as a reminder that terrorism is not the only threat facing emergency responders and that natural disasters could affect areas that have little to fear from terrorists.

The new approach, which applies only to Urban Areas Security Initiative grants, creates new regional groupings for the distribution of funds, including three in California. Another federal grant program remains unchanged; it allots each state a guaranteed minimum, according to a formula devised by Congress, and then distributes the rest on a risk basis.

"This is a step in the right direction," said Jack Weiss, a Los Angeles City Council member whose district encompasses Los Angeles International Airport. "At the same time, I'm always concerned when Washington wants us to create new bureaucracies to cope with the paperwork."

Many of the changes reflect an effort to make dwindling funds go further; grant money for the Urban Areas Security Initiative has dropped from $855 million last year to $765 million for 2006.

Though the program has always been risk-based, the department said, it is putting a greater emphasis on risk by limiting the number of eligible areas.

Previously spread among 50 cities, grant eligibility will now be limited to 35 regions that Chertoff identified as the "communities facing the greatest risk and demonstrating the greatest need in order to receive the highest return in our nation's security."

Some cities, such as San Diego, are being phased out for eligibility in the program after being given funding for a "bridge" year to complete ongoing projects. Those communities will still be able to receive other funding and could continue to receive the urban areas grants if they can demonstrate a need.

San Diego Mayor Jerry Sanders said he was disappointed, noting that his city has a major seaport, the busiest international border in the nation and the largest concentration of U.S. military forces in the world.

Sanders, who took office last month, blamed his predecessors for not doing a better job in lobbying for funds and vowed to discuss the situation with Chertoff when he visits San Diego on Thursday.

Chertoff said Tuesday that he expected complaints. "This is not a popularity contest," he said of the grant program.

DOJ_NMG_0007995

He said that his department's ability to assess risk had become increasingly more sophisticated and that federal officials had used a database of more than 30 million spreadsheets to calculate risk matrices — which measure an area's potential targets, including bridges, chemical and nuclear plants or hospitals, its vulnerabilities and the consequences of an attack.

Los Angeles-area first responders applauded the move to put more emphasis on risk.

"Hopefully we'll see more" funding, said Garden Grove Fire Department Capt. Tim Sawyer. "Instead of throwing money out there to everyone equally," he said, funding decisions would be made "more appropriate" by emphasizing risk profiles.

In a further move to ensure that only deserving projects are funded, the Homeland Security Department is requiring the 35 regions to submit a list of projects they would undertake with the grant money. The projects must pass review by a national panel to receive funding. In the past, all eligible areas received funds.

Many L.A. officials praised the move to create regional blocs that would apply for funding as a team. Three California regional groupings have been created: one encompassing Anaheim and Santa Ana; one for the Bay Area, including San Francisco, San Jose and Oakland; and one combining Los Angeles and Long Beach. The ports of L.A. and Long Beach handle 42% of the nation's trade and represent a significant potential target.

"If you look at the ports, the difference between the two is a political jurisdictional line — it's not a geographic difference, it's not a difference in the way trade operates or where the population is really distributed," Chertoff said, explaining the decision to combine Los Angeles and Long Beach.

The move to create regional blocs came from the lessons learned from Katrina, when the Gulf Coast was so badly damaged that surrounding areas were pulled in to respond, Chertoff said. "We have to consider consequences, vulnerabilities and threats in the context of a natural region," he said.

But Cmdr. Mike Grossman of the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department cautioned that Homeland Security's regional combinations might not mesh well with California's standardized emergency management system, which is organized by county. He pointed out that the federal agency has made Simi Valley and Thousand Oaks part of the Los Angeles-Long Beach area although they are part of Ventura County and its emergency response network.

"The configuration that has come out is not consistent with the structure the state has, which causes organizational issues," Grossman said.

Maurice Suh, L.A. deputy mayor for domestic security and public safety, said he didn't expect coordination with other jurisdictions to be an issue.

"We view this in a very positive light," he said. The Department of Homeland Security "has made clear to us that funding initiatives in the Southern California area is a priority. In our view, Los Angeles is the leader in terms of assets and security concerns in the area."

Rules For Granting Terror Aid Are Overhauled (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

Facing cuts in antiterrorism financing, the Department of Homeland Security announced today that it has overhauled its system for evaluating new requests for money from a $765 million aid program for cities. The new system is based less on politics and city boundaries and more on assessments of where terrorists are likely to strike and potentially cause the greatest damage.

The changes to the program, the Urban Area Security Initiative, are being driven in part by a reduction in the overall pool of money for antiterrorism efforts. For 2006, Congress has appropriated $120 million less in these urban grants than for 2005.

Domestic security grants in general, including the urban area ones, have been criticized because they have sent more antiterrorism money per capita to sparsely populated states like Wyoming and Alaska than to densely populated states like New York and California.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff acknowledged the criticism in making the announcement in a news conference today. "The fact of the matter is we have learned some lessons," Mr. Chertoff said. "We've listened to some of the critics. And where there is merit to some of those observations, we've incorporated changes to take account of those criticisms."

Under the new rules, individual cities, counties or political jurisdictions will not be vying for the terror aid. Grant applications will be limited to 35 metropolitan regions in 23 states and the District of Columbia. The areas encompass 95 cities with populations of 100,000 or more, the department said. In addition, 11 urban areas that had previously been given money will be allowed to apply for "sustainment funding," so projects already under way can be completed.

"A single urban area may, in fact, include several cities," Mr. Chertoff said. "For example, what we have identified as the California Bay Area consists of Oakland, San Francisco and San Jose, as well as other, smaller, communities."

DOJ_NMG_0007996

He said that studying the effects of natural disasters and terror attacks had led to the new approach. "Anybody who looked at what happened, for example, in Katrina and Rita, understood that even if the hurricane was directed at a particular jurisdiction, the effects were felt within the entire region," Mr. Chertoff said. "The whole region had to chip in in terms of assisting. And, of course, the region bore the brunt of the evacuations."

Until the application process is under way, it is unclear what the impact may be in cities now receiving money under the program, including New York, whose region will grow to encompass Yonkers. Mr. Chertoff emphasized that the designated areas are not guaranteed grants. "You may be at risk," he said, "but we have to ask ourselves, 'Are you going to use the money wisely?' "

He also said that the Homeland Security Department's ability to analyze the potential risks in urban areas and the potential effectiveness of proposals had increased with each year.

"We've got more data to work with; we've got better analytical tools to apply to that data," Mr. Chertoff said. "And that means we've got much more specificity in terms of the kinds of characteristics we take into account."

Set up after the 2001 terrorist attacks, the Homeland Security Department's local and state grant programs have drawn repeated criticism from members of Congress and budget watchdog groups because the early emphasis on spreading the money around resulted in tens of millions of dollars going to some communities where, critics said, the terrorist threat was not as urgent as elsewhere.

Examples cited in recent testimony to Congress include $557,400 awarded to North Pole, Alaska, a city of about 1,700 residents, to buy rescue and communications equipment, and $500,000 to Outagamie County, Wis., population 165,000, to buy chemical suits, rescue saws, disaster-response trailers, emergency lighting and a bomb disposal vehicle.

Officials from some smaller American cities that have received grants said they deserved a reasonable share of the antiterrorism aid.

"We certainly are much smaller than a city like New York or Los Angeles," said Don Thorson, administrator for the grant program in Omaha.

But, Mr. Thorson said: "We still are an urban area. And we still have risks. No one can predict where a terrorist might strike. Look where Timothy McVeigh struck. It was Oklahoma City."

Omaha received $5.1 million last year, which it used to buy bomb suits and communications equipment, among other items.

Mr. Chertoff said, "The public has a right to expect that even when a city is in a high-risk category the money it gets under this program has to be spent wisely and effectively."

Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York, who is chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security, said the shift properly made risk a more meaningful factor in allocating the money.

"The more risk-based they can make it, the better," Mr. King said. "It sends a message to Congress that homeland security is a serious matter, it is not a public works project, that we are not going down the pork-barrel road. That is vital." The Urban Area Security Initiative represents $765 million of the $2.5 billion budgeted in the 2006 fiscal year for state and local antiterrorism programs. A separate Homeland Security grant program, which gives money directly to states, has been allocated $550 million by Congress this fiscal year. That money will still be distributed, in part, based on a formula that sets a minimum for each state. But for the first time, money not obligated by this formula will be distributed based on risk.

When the Urban Area Security grants were first announced in 2003, only seven cities were given money: New York, Washington, Los Angeles, Seattle, Chicago, San Francisco and Houston. But the list quickly grew to 30 cities and finally to 50 as more cities were deemed eligible for the grants.

Last year, even though the number of cities remained about the same, a much larger share of the money went to the biggest cities, with New York getting $207.5 million, compared with $49.7 million in 2004.

The system unveiled today evaluates applications for aid based on how well cities meet emergency preparedness standards recently established by the Homeland Security Department.

The standards include detailed steps that local and state governments would be required to take in response to potential threats, like the release of the nerve agent Sarin in office buildings or the truck bombing of a sports arena. The applications will also be ranked based on a significantly expanded database that the agency has set up to try to objectively measure the risk level in each city, department officials said. The database includes, for example, an inventory of high-profile government buildings and major structures like bridges, as well as daily ridership on a subway system and how many subway stations a city system has.

Risk is defined as a combination of the perceived threat, the vulnerability of a particular city or asset, and the consequences of an attack.

"The system before was fairly Neanderthalic," one Homeland Security official said, on the condition on anonymity because he did not want to pre-empt Mr. Chertoff's announcement. "It was very, very sophomoric."

DOJ_NMG_0007997

The 35 regions eligible to apply for grants are Anaheim/Santa Ana, Calif.; San Francisco Bay; Los Angeles/Long Beach, Calif.; Denver; Washington; Fort Lauderdale, Fla.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Miami; Orlando, Fla.; Atlanta; Honolulu; Chicago; Indianapolis; New Orleans; Boston; Baltimore; Detroit; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Kansas City, Mo.; St. Louis; Charlotte, N.C.; Jersey City/Newark; New York; Cincinnati; Cleveland; Columbus, Ohio; Portland, Ore.; Philadelphia; Pittsburgh; Memphis; Dallas-Fort Worth; Houston; San Antonio; Seattle; and Milwaukee.

The 11 areas eligible to apply for sustainment money are Phoenix; Sacramento, Calif.; San Diego; Tampa, Fla.; Louisville, Ky.; Baton Rouge, La.; Omaha; Las Vegas; Buffalo; Toledo, Ohio; and Oklahoma City.

Mr. Chertoff has made clear that he expects protests when the final grant awards are announced. He acknowledged that when cities fall off the eligibility list his agency hears "outcries and complaints."

"I have to be very clear about this," he said. "The purpose of the U.A.S.I. program - indeed, the purpose of all Homeland Security funding - is not to generate popularity for the secretary or for the Department of Homeland Security. It is to address the highest priorities driven by an analytic, risk-based process."

The prospect of increased competition for the money comes as no surprise to officials in some smaller cities.

"We anticipated there would be a point soon where Bush would be concerned about throwing so much money out there," said Samuel Simon, director of public safety in St. Louis.

The city received $7 million last year, money spent - wisely, Mr. Simon said - to prepare for the possibility of a pandemic flu outbreak or small-scale terrorist attack.

D.C. May Benefit As DHS Bases Grants On Risk (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

Regions at the highest risk of terrorist attack or natural disaster will receive an increased share of grant money under a new urban funding formula unveiled yesterday by the Department of Homeland Security, the latest step in its effort to focus more resources on the gravest threats facing the United States.

The policy change, announced by Secretary Michael Chertoff, comes after several years of criticism from lawmakers and private research groups.

The critics complained that sparsely populated states such as Wyoming were receiving a proportionally greater share of Homeland Security money than populous jurisdictions, including Washington, that are much more likely to be attacked.

For fiscal 2006, Washington and 34 other metropolitan regions will be eligible to compete for $765 million from the department's largest grant program, the Urban Area Security Initiative. Eleven other urban areas that have received grants may still compete, but they are being warned they may be dropped if they cannot show a compelling need, officials said.

The smaller list is due in part to a cut in funding by Congress, which slashed $90 million from the program this year, and it will force cities in the same region to work together in seeking aid.

But Chertoff also characterized the changes as part of a broader effort to distribute money based on measurable risk factors, and he said that such grants are "not party favors to be distributed as widely as possible."

"We've looked at what happened in the hurricanes, we've looked at what happened over in London with the terrorist attacks on the rail lines, and that has reinforced the idea that we have to consider consequences, vulnerabilities and threats," Chertoff told reporters at a news conference.

Lawmakers and local officials in Washington and other major urban areas praised the changes, which were made in the face of continued infighting in Congress over funding formulas for other types of Homeland Security grants. David Robertson, executive director of the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments, said the change could mean more leverage for the District and its neighbors in competing for federal money.

"It's hard to minimize someone else's risk or what they perceive, but by any measure, the Washington area is right up there in terms of risk, both for terrorism and natural disasters," Robertson said.

The policy shift applies only to one part of DHS's vast grant apparatus, which is slated to distribute $2.5 billion in state and local Homeland Security grants during the current fiscal year.

One focus of controversy has been Homeland Security grants given to states in a separate program that will total $550 million in 2006. About 40 percent of that money is divided evenly among the states, regardless of threat or population, although DHS has been given wider latitude by Congress in spending part of the money this year.

Some smaller states and regions left out of the urban grant program have also protested the changes. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) said in a statement yesterday that major cities in Connecticut are being shortchanged despite the presence of a nuclear submarine base and other sensitive sites, and he complained that DHS has shifted its rationale for distributing grant money too many times.

DOJ_NMG_0007998

"Forcing cities to compete for an ever decreasing share of federal support is tantamount to disarming in the middle of a war," Lieberman said.

Nonetheless, many other lawmakers and homeland security experts praised the change.

"The philosophy of risk-based allocations for setting priorities is the right way to go," said David Heyman, director of the homeland security program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank. "We cannot continue to spend money based on political power in Congress or with no link to the threat. If we do, we'll spend ourselves to death without any security."

Decisions have not been made on how the funding will be distributed. The D.C. region has received about $167 million in urban area grant money since 2003, including $77 million in 2005, according to the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments.

Vulnerability to terrorism was the primary criterion for making grants over the last three years. The new formula adds the risk of natural disaster or disease to the calculation. Officials said the risk calculations are based on sophisticated and detailed data sets down to Zip codes.

"With every successive year we've gotten much more specific in terms of the way we measure and weigh the characteristics that go into our risk formula," Chertoff said. ". . . We've got more data to work with. We've got better analytical tools to apply to that data."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said in a statement that he was pleased by the announcement but indicated he was reserving judgment until final grant numbers are announced.

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) commended "DHS for moving the ball forward themselves."

"We cannot be completely safe everywhere, all the time, so we have to be putting our Homeland Security dollars where they're most needed," Davis said. ". . . The metro D.C. region was already targeted by terrorists. As the seat of government it just goes to reason that we would continue to be high on their list."

Risk Wins A Round Over Politics (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

The Homeland Security Department announced this week that it intended to rely more on the risk of a terrorist attack, and less on politics, when it hands out funds under a key antiterrorism program. This is very good news - with two caveats. It still remains to be seen precisely how the money will be handed out. And the improvements in this single program do not change the fact that Congress, thanks to the influence of small-state senators, still lets politics play a disturbingly large role in the distribution of other antiterrorism funds.

National security experts, including the 9/11 commission, overwhelmingly agree that antiterrorism money should be handed out based on the risk of an attack and the harm it would do. But members of Congress have trouble seeing any program - even one designed to protect the nation from terrorists - as above politics and patronage.

Senators from small low-risk states, led by Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, scored an unfortunate victory last year when they blocked an amendment, backed by all six senators from New York, California and Texas, that would have distributed more antiterrorism money on the basis of risk. As a result, states like Wyoming - and Maine - still get too much money, and places like New York City and Washington, D.C., get too little.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has, to his credit, been a consistent supporter of an approach based more on risk. In this week's announcement, he promised to rely more heavily on risk in making decisions on allocating $765 million under the Urban Area Security Initiative. There are, however, several factors that may interfere with his good intentions. The department intends to take into account the degree to which a grant could be used to help with disasters not related to terrorism, like hurricanes or pandemics. This could blur the program's focus and end up directing more money toward places that face nonterrorist threats, an outcome that was not Congress's intention.

It is also possible that when financing proposals are actually evaluated later this year, Mr. Chertoff's emphasis on risk will become lost in an array of other criteria.

Whatever success Mr. Chertoff has in improving this program, two others are still badly in need of a similar reorientation toward risk and away from politics: the State Homeland Security Grant Program and the Law Enforcement Terrorism Prevention Program, which account for much of the nation's antiterrorism spending.

Mr. Chertoff's emphasis on risk is the right one. We hope that the Homeland Security Department sticks to this principle when it makes its final grant decisions under the Urban Area Security Initiative later this year. And we hope that when Congress passes the next Homeland Security appropriation covering the other antiterrorism programs, it does a better job of putting risk ahead of politics.

DOJ_NMG_0007999

Government Has 'Dirty Bomb' Cleanup Guide (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The government issued cleanup standards Tuesday for a "dirty bomb" terrorist attack that would in some cases be far less rigorous than what is required for Superfund sites, nuclear power plants and nuclear waste dumps.

After such an attack, long-term radiation exposure could remain at levels that would be expected to produce cancers in one of every four people who return to the contaminated sites, anti-nuclear watchdog groups said after analyzing the new federal guidelines.

Dirty bombs -- largely theoretical terrorist weapons -- would use conventional explosives to disperse radioactive material without a nuclear explosion. Such weapons, which could use Cesium 137 or other radioactives, would be useful as terror devices because they can render an area dangerous or uninhabitable.

The guidelines issued by the Homeland Security Department say the impact from detonating a crude nuclear device or a dirty bomb could vary widely, from contaminating a small area, such as a single building or city block, to conceivably many square miles. So, it said, cleanup requirements also could vary widely.

In some cases, the document suggested, long-term radiation exposures of as much as 10,000 millirems per year -- a level equivalent to hundreds of chest X-rays a year or 30 times the annual exposure to radiation from natural "background" sources -- could be allowed for areas that are returned to general use.

If there is widespread contamination from a dirty bomb or an "improvised nuclear device" -- which could cause a crude nuclear explosion -- some areas may have to be put off limits permanently, the guidelines said.

The guidelines, which go into effect immediately but could be modified after a public comment period, brought sharp criticism from some environmental groups and nuclear watchdog organizations.

Long-term radiation levels of 10,000 millirems a year as would be permitted by the guidelines in some cases can be expected to produce a cancer in one of every four people exposed, said Diane D'Arrigo, of the Nuclear Information and Resource Service, a Washington-based nuclear industry watchdog group, citing government radiation risk assessments.

The federal guidelines do not establish specific numerical standards for cleanup, but they cite radiation "benchmarks" established by other agencies or international organizations that would be acceptable.

Among those benchmarks that could be used under the guidelines is one established by the International Commission on Radiation Protection which cites a long-term release of 10,000 millirems a year as an acceptable exposure standard after cleanup.

By comparison, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission does not allow exposure to the public of more than 100 millirems per year in its cleanup standard. The exposure at a future Yucca Mountain nuclear waste site has a limit of 15 millirems. Background radiation from natural sources averages about 350 millirems, while exposure from a chest X-ray is about 6 millirems.

Donald Tighe, a spokesman for the White House Office of Science and Technology, said the guidelines specifically avoided setting a numerical cleanup standard for long-term radiation exposure. Instead, he said, it is hoped the guidelines will help state, local and federal officials choose appropriate cleanup standards depending on circumstances.

"It would be very inaccurate for anyone to characterize this as leaning toward any one side of the range of (cleanup) standards" that might be available, said Tighe.

But Daniel Hirsch, of the Committee to Bridge the Gap, a nuclear watchdog group in California, said the guidelines are so lax that it opens the way for cleanup efforts to fall short of what is needed to protect public health.

The Department of Homeland Security "is proposing a nuclear Katrina, a formal policy of allowing the public to be exposed to massive radiation doses from a dirty bomb while the government does nothing to protect them," he said.

Even After 'Dirty Bomb' Exposure, Residents Might Be Allowed Back In (New York Times)

By Matthew L. Wald

New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - The Homeland Security Department, preparing for an attack by terrorists who would spread radioactive material, advised government officials on Tuesday that they should consider permitting people to re-occupy contaminated land and buildings even if they would be exposed to radiation at a level double what nuclear plant workers can legally receive.

The department published a document that stressed trying to balance the health risk of radiation exposure with minimizing the disruption that a “dirty bomb” would cause.

DOJ_NMG_0008000

If there is a delay in reoccupying areas evacuated because of contamination, “the disruption and harm caused by the incident could be inadvertently and unnecessarily increased,” the department advised. “Failure to restore important services rapidly could result in additional adverse public health and welfare impacts that could be more significant than the direct radiological impacts.”

The document, published in The Federal Register, listed precise exposure limits for emergency workers and members of the public in the immediate aftermath of a dirty bomb attack.

For the long term, it said that officials responsible for public health and safety should consider a variety of “benchmarks” in use around the world, some far higher than the standards in use in the United States for protection of the public in routine operations and nuclear accidents. One of those, from the International Commission on Radiation Protection, says that actions to reduce exposure to radiation, like evacuation or cleanup, may not be required until doses equal 10 rem a year, an amount that is about 30 times what the average American receives from natural and manmade sources of radiation, and double what power plant workers can legally receive. It is also about five times as high as the maximum that power plant workers commonly receive in a year.

An opponent of nuclear power, Daniel Hirsch, of the Committee to Bridge the Gap, said the standard that should apply is the one that the Environmental Protection Agency uses when power plants are torn down, which is 25-thousandths of a rem per year, one-400th of the international standard.

But a spokesman for the Environmental Protection Agency, John Millett, said that when his agency’s guidelines were set in 1991, with nuclear power plant accidents in mind, there was no consensus on what long-term exposure should be allowed.

Larry Orluskie, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, said the new guidance did not necessarily suggest using the international agency’s number, but recommended considering its use, “depending on what the circumstance is, and what the environment is, and the state and local authorities’ need for that area.’’

The document issued Tuesday lists a variety of factors, including the cost of cleanup. Mr. Hirsch and a second antinuclear group, the Nuclear Information and Resource Service, said that the 10 rem figure would produce cancer or leukemia in one person in four who was exposed to that amount annually for a total of 30 years. The two groups called the advice “a nuclear Katrina in the making.”

The department characterized its advice as a draft, because, it said, it would take public comment until March 6, but the advice takes effect immediately.

The document offered advice on both dirty bombs, a postulated weapon that is a conventional explosive laced with a radioactive contaminant, and on nuclear bombs that a terrorist group might smuggle into a city. Security experts say that a dirty bomb is far easier to construct and thus might be the more likely threat, and that if a terrorist group managed to detonate an actual nuclear bomb, then the No. 1 issue would probably not be the long-term health risk of radiation exposure.

The Homeland Security Department, with the E.P.A., the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and other agencies, has been working on the advice since 2003 but has had trouble developing a consensus.

Man Sues U.S. Over Ring Lost At Airport (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 4, 2006

(AP) - BOSTON-A man is suing the federal government, alleging his $7,000 wedding ring was stolen as he passed through a security checkpoint at Logan International Airport.

John Wright, 51, says he and his wife were taking a flight to San Juan, Puerto Rico, in July when he placed the 1.53-carat diamond and gold ring in a plastic tub along with his Rolex watch and wallet.

Wright, of Tiverton, R.I., then placed the bin on the scanner conveyer belt as he and his wife, Janet, passed through the metal detector. When he retrieved his belongings, Wright said, the ring was missing.

"I hadn't even gone 15 feet on my vacation and I was robbed," said Wright, a health teacher in Somerset.

He said he alerted the three Transportation Security Administration screeners who were at the checkpoint, and they searched the conveyer belt without success.

Wright filed the lawsuit in U.S. District Court last month after the TSA denied his claim seeking $7,000 to replace the ring. The lawsuit seeks reimbursement for the ring and attorney's fees.

Wright said he suspects one of the TSA screeners took the ring because there were no passengers in front of him as he went through the checkpoint with his wife, who was directly behind him.

Ann Davis, a spokeswoman for TSA, said she could not comment on the case, but said the agency does not tolerate workplace theft and aggressively investigates all complaints.

Living, And Dying, With Suicide Bombers (USAT)

By Ralph Peters

USA Today, January 4, 2006

After spending trillions of dollars on high-tech armaments, the United States finds itself confounded by a dirt-cheap weapon of genius: The suicide bomber. The ultimate precision weapon and genuine "smart bomb," the suicide bomber is hard to deter and exasperatingly difficult to defeat.

This is the "poor man's nuke." For a few hundred dollars (or less) and a human life, a suicide bomber can achieve strategic effects the U.S. Air Force can only envy.

For all of the claims that technology would dominate the 21st century — and not only in the realm of warfare — we find that impassioned faith still trumps microchips. Armed with a fervent belief in his god's appetite for blood, the suicide bomber can dominate headlines around the world with a few pounds of explosives.

A paradox of the Information Age is that it's simultaneously the new age of superstition. As calcified social orders collapse under the pressures of global change, those who feel most threatened flee into debased, occult religion. Increasingly, fanaticism finds outlet in shedding the blood not only of unbelievers, but also of co-religionists whose beliefs are seen as imperfect.

The suicide bomber views himself (more rarely, herself) as fulfilling a divine mission whose execution will be rewarded in paradise. How do we discourage an enemy who regards death as a promotion? How do we identify the religious madman among the masses in time to stop him from killing? On a practical level, defeating the increasing numbers of suicide bombers is our most difficult security mission.

Homeland vulnerable

Except for 9/11, suicide bombers have conducted their missions abroad. That's going to change, but it's a credit to the patriotism and decency of American Muslims that none of our fellow citizens has strapped on a bomb and walked into a Wal-Mart. Nonetheless, our enemies will find a way to bring their deadly campaign back to our doorsteps.

The suicide bomber is so powerful a weapon that not even the terrorists have realized its full potential. Today, we see intermittent, localized attacks. The suicide bomber is at the same stage of development as the tank was in World War I: Used in small numbers, armored vehicles did not achieve and sustain critical mass.

We need to prepare for the suicide-bomber blitzkrieg, when murderous zealots come at us in waves.

The obvious forerunners of today's Islamist fanatics were the Assassins, the notorious cult that operated from Persia through Syria in the 11th and 12th centuries. Armed only with sacramental knives and patience, the Assassins terrorized governments by killing sultans and grand viziers. It took the invading Mongols — the all-time masters of counter-insurgency warfare — to destroy the Assassins in their mountain strongholds.

But assassination became commonplace in the Muslim world thereafter. The Assassins came from an off-shoot sect of Shiite Islam. Today's suicide bombers are overwhelmingly Sunnis, but the pattern of waging an asymmetrical conflict through carefully planned murders is a tradition, not an aberration.

To be fair to the Assassins, they attacked only the mighty, not the masses. And, as Bernard Lewis, the giant of Middle Eastern studies at Princeton, pointed out, Islam's prohibition against suicide meant that yesteryear's murderers allowed themselves to be caught and suffer torture rather than kill themselves.

But the new age of faith is also an era of the perversion of religion, from the primitive blood-cult evident in ritual beheadings to the rationalization of a suicide bomber's death — not as self-murder but the consequence of a brave attack in the conduct of holy war.

Nor should it be as difficult as we assume for Westerners to grasp the psychology at work in the suicide bomber. Our own history is full of martyrs and religious warriors who went boldly and knowingly to their deaths. In every culture, the really good haters die well.

Who are they?

Deplore his act though we rightly do, the suicide bomber who imagines himself a defender of his threatened faith and humiliated people is the extremist equivalent of the soldier we revere for throwing himself on a grenade to save his comrades' lives. Our rules for self-sacrifice are different, but the psychology is uncomfortably familiar. The results may differ terribly, but the motivation has filial roots.

We see only the indiscriminate carnage, the apparent madness. Until we recognize his crazed valor, we cannot understand the suicide bomber. And it's much harder to defeat an enemy you don't understand.

Suicide bombers are recruited from the ranks of troubled souls, from those who find mundane reality overwhelming and terrifying. The suicide bomber longs for release from the insecurities of his daily experience. He is fleeing from life every bit as much as he's rushing toward paradise. He dreads women, sin and doubt.

DOJ_NMG_0008002

Hypnotized by faith and excited to ecstasy, he can walk into a children's clinic and press a detonator. No heart-rending child's face will stop him. His god will forgive the innocent. Nothing matters but the divine will as interpreted by the masters of terror — the most brilliant psychologists of our time.

We have faced enemies more dangerous, but none so implacable.

The world's great strategic struggle of this century is between those who believe in a generous, loving god — in any religion — and those who serve a punitive, merciless deity.

The suicide bomber has chosen his side.

Ralph Peters is the author, most recently, of New Glory: Expanding America's Global Supremacy, and a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

WAR NEWS:

From Cabinet Rooms Past, A Gathering To Assess Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - It will be an unusual sight on Thursday in the Roosevelt Room of White House, and deliberately so: President Bush will engage in a consultation of sorts with a bipartisan collection of former secretaries of state and defense.

Among them will be several who have left little doubt that they think Mr. Bush has dangerously mishandled Iraq, ignored other looming crises, and put critical alliances at risk.

The meeting was called by the White House, which sent out invitations just before Christmas to everyone who once held those jobs.

The invitees were told that they were being asked to attend a briefing on Iraq and other issues. It was unclear, one recipient said, "how interested they are in what we are thinking."

Among those planning to attend are Colin L. Powell, Mr. Bush's first secretary of state and the administration's best-known and most careful dissident voice, and Madeleine K. Albright, Mr. Powell's predecessor.

William Perry, who was secretary of defense in the Clinton administration, is flying in from California; he helped formulate foreign policy positions for Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts in the race for president in 2004.

"This should be interesting," said another former secretary who received an invitation, but asked not to be identified until he had heard Mr. Bush's arguments.

"It's not exactly as if these guys have reached out to hear a lot of outside opinions."

In fact, no one inside the White House could recall a meeting quite like this during Mr. Bush's first five years in office.

At moments he has called upon past presidents - notably his father and Bill Clinton - for aid missions to countries hit by the 2004 tsunami, and then to cities and towns hit by Hurricane Katrina. Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III was recruited to lead efforts to get debt relief for Iraq, and Brent Scowcroft, the former national security adviser, headed up a White House panel that reviews foreign intelligence issues, only to be dis-invited after he became a critic of the decision to invade Iraq.

But never before has Mr. Bush asked such a broad array of former senior officials to show up together, presumably armed with strong opinions about issues like whether the moment has come to begin an exit from Iraq and what the United States should be doing with North Korea, Iran, Sudan or public diplomacy.

Several of the officials, mostly Democrats, said they were concerned about being used as props in an effort to portray Mr. Bush as seeking what the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, recently called "common ground" on Iraq. But they said they suspected that the president was seeking to close the gap with officials of both parties who are influential in Congress, and often comment on Iraq and other issues on television and on op-ed pages.

Perhaps the most interesting dynamic will be between Mr. Bush and Mr. Powell. Since leaving office a year ago, Mr. Powell has been careful to avoid direct criticism of his former boss, though some of his former aides have been blistering in their descriptions of Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld (who presumably has an invitation because he served as secretary of defense under Gerald R. Ford).

In May, Mr. Bush traveled to Mr. Powell's house in McLean, Va., for a quiet dinner, but Mr. Powell publicly parted company with the administration on the issue of interrogation techniques for suspected terrorists, backing an amendment sponsored last year by Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, when the White House still opposed it.

Mr. Bush's guests will be briefed by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the American commander in Iraq, and Zalmay M. Khalilzad, the American ambassador there.

DOJ_NMG_0008003

"We invited them so they could hear from General Casey and Ambassador Khalilzad, so that they could hear about the progress we are making on our plan for victory in Iraq, from the military and civilian leaders on the ground," Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, said Tuesday evening, calling the meeting part of Mr. Bush's broader effort for "outreach on the strategy."

"There will be opportunity for them to ask questions and have a discussion," he said.

Iraq Wants U.S. Choice Out As Chief Of Brigade (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

BAGHDAD, Jan. 3 -- Over the strong objections of U.S. commanders in Baghdad, the Iraqi government has nominated a new leader for a brigade that is set to assume control over some of the capital's most sensitive areas. This dispute appears likely to postpone an already overdue handover by American forces for at least another month.

The 5th Brigade, 6th Division of the Iraqi army was scheduled to assume responsibility on Dec. 27 for the heart of Baghdad, including the perimeter of the fortified Green Zone, where the U.S. Embassy and many Iraqi government buildings are located. It was also to patrol the road to the city's main airport.

But a transfer ceremony that was to be attended by top generals was canceled three days beforehand, after Iraq's Defense Ministry said it would not approve the officer groomed by U.S. forces since August to command the unit, Col. Muhammed Wasif Taha, a 23-year Iraqi army veteran.

U.S. commanders are concerned that the rejection of a qualified Sunni Muslim candidate by a government that is dominated by the rival Shiite Muslim majority will fuel perceptions of Iraq's security forces as sectarian institutions, particularly in Sunni regions where sympathy for the insurgency runs deep.

American officers who work with the unit reevaluated the brigade without Taha in charge and lowered its readiness rating from Level 1, meaning it can operate without U.S. assistance, to Level 3, which means significant help is required. That rating, in force for a month, made it officially unqualified for the proposed new responsibilities.

"When you bring a new commander, we're not sure of his schooling, his experience on the ground. So it's hard for us to assess him," said Col. Ed Cardon, 45, of Watsonville, Calif., commander of the U.S. Army's 4th Brigade, 3rd Infantry Division. "We are very comfortable with Colonel Muhammed. We are not comfortable with a commander we've never worked with before. The handover was contingent upon their leadership remaining where it was."

The standoff comes at a time of broad political and military transition in Baghdad. The 3rd Infantry Division will leave the capital later this month, and the Iraqi government is preparing to give way to a new administration following the Dec. 15 elections.

The dispute simmered with little public notice for months, as official statements from U.S. and Iraqi officials depicted a seamless transition underway throughout the country to enable the eventual withdrawal of U.S. forces.

Throughout the handover, in which Iraqi forces have assumed control over dozens of former American bases, a few entire cities and the majority of land in the capital, U.S. officials have emphasized their role as trainers of the new Iraqi army. They defer questions over its deployment and command to the government. But their strong backing of Taha suggests reluctance to relinquish control over details of security, particularly in strategically important parts of the country.

Contacted several times this week, a Defense Ministry spokesman, Maj. Gen. Salih Sarhan, said Taha was likely to be confirmed on a trial basis. But on Tuesday he said the ministry had a different candidate in mind.

Sarhan did not name the person but described him as "an experienced, competent officer, and more senior in terms of rank" than Taha. "The ministry wanted to install a senior officer to be an executive commanding officer with the appropriate rank," Sarhan said.

Taha, 42, a graduate of Iraq's most selective military officer training program and of a top Pakistani military academy, is among the best commanders in the Iraqi army, according to U.S. officers who have worked with him.

In an interview, Taha said the Iraqi brigade to which he was assigned during the U.S. invasion dissolved without fighting. He later went to work for a satellite telephone company in Baghdad, then joined the new U.S.-backed Iraqi army in the summer of 2004.

As a Sunni Arab from Baghdad, he would help diversify the army's top ranks, which are currently dominated by Shiites and Kurds, U.S. officers said. Infusing the military with more Sunni Arabs -- the minority group that led the country under Saddam Hussein and makes up most of Iraq's insurgency -- could improve stability in restive Sunni regions where security forces are mistrusted.

"The military must be a balance between all the Iraqi sides," Taha said. "There is no need for one side to control everything. All Iraqis should be represented."

DOJ_NMG_0008004

Another Defense Ministry spokesman, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Taha had been a member of Hussein's elite Special Republican Guard and a high-level member of Hussein's Baath Party. Taha denies both claims.

Iraq's army was disbanded soon after the U.S. invasion, and former top officers were initially precluded from rejoining. But Iraq's Defense Ministry has embraced the return of many former commanders, who now make up the bulk of the new officer corps.

Cardon, the 4th Brigade commander, said the Defense Ministry's unnamed candidate is a brigadier general from Kut, a predominantly Shiite city southeast of Baghdad.

"Maybe the guy the government wants is the greatest officer in Iraq, or maybe he is the worst, we don't know," said Capt. Ed Ballanco, 31, of Montvale, N.J., commander of the military training team that is partnered with the Iraqi 5th Brigade. "I do know that Colonel Muhammed is by far and away the most professional officer I have worked with in this country."

Lt. Col. Fred Wellman, a spokesman for the multinational force responsible for training the Iraqi army, said he was surprised that the brigade's official rating had fallen so far based on the prospect of a different commander.

"My concern is we're investing ourselves in a person through personal loyalty, which is good, but that we are not allowing the system to work itself out," he said. "We have asked the Iraqis to take control of their ministry and that is what they are doing."

Cardon said American officials are increasingly concerned that the cohesion and quality of the Iraqi army will suffer because politics or sectarian considerations, rather than merit, determine appointments. Iraq's defense minister, Sadoun Dulaimi, a Sunni Arab and former academic, is widely expected to leave his post when a new government is formed based on last month's elections.

"You watch to see how many brigade commanders change jobs when you have a new defense minister," Cardon said. "It is very dangerous to politicize the leadership like this. The question then becomes, are you loyal to the country or to a political party?"

During the standoff over his appointment, Taha has received threatening phone calls. Cardon said he believes some of them are coming from officers within the Defense Ministry because the callers reached him on his cell phone. "Sometimes those death threats aren't just from insurgents, so I worry about his future," Cardon said.

Taha said he did not know why his appointment has been opposed. "I am the best among the officers and I don't know why they are against me," he said. "I am waiting and whatever God decides is all right."

US Allies In Iraq: Valuable But Dwindling (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - As member nations consider another calendar year in Iraq, the Bush administration's "coalition of the willing" appears increasingly unwilling to commit to the cause indefinitely.

Last week, two countries finished withdrawing the last of their troops from Iraq, and two others decided to cut their forces by about a third. In all, the coalition has declined from a 2003 high of 38 nations and 50,000 troops to 28 nations and about 20,000 soldiers today.

In terms of military operations on the ground, the withdrawals mean little, analysts say. Only Britain has a substantial security role, and so far it has remained steadfast. Yet each country's commitment to Iraq - however small - is a significant token to an administration that has long sought global support for the conflict. As such, the continual reshaping of the coalition is more a matter of foreign policy than military power, as Washington takes account of its strongest allies in the war on terror.

"Iraq has been the crucible that has shown us how limited our cold-war alliances were," says Thomas Donnelly, an analyst at the American Enterprise Institute here. "It took us 50 years to build NATO; the challenge we have now is that we've got to come up with something new."

The coalition is perhaps the first sketch of that new security structure, but recent months in particular have altered the face of it. Bulgaria and Ukraine withdrew the last of their roughly 1,200 troops from Iraq last month. Last week, Poland announced it would remove 600 of its 1,500 troops by March, and the South Korean parliament voted to pull out 1,000 of its 3,200 soldiers - with the rest leaving next year.

The news comes as the coalition was already shrinking. Italy will withdraw 300 of its 2,800 troops this month as part of a phased pullout, and other nations - most notably Spain and the Netherlands - have already withdrawn either all or virtually all their troops.

So far, the Pentagon has looked at the fluctuations without great consternation. "We don't set any conditions on coalition members," says Lt. Col. Barry Venable, a spokesman. "Certainly, we'd like more, but we're grateful for what each and every nation feels it can contribute."

DOJ_NMG_0008005

The ambivalence is born of the fact that - with the exception of Britain - coalition nations have not done the heavy lifting of fighting insurgents. "They weren't going to win the war, and if they left tomorrow, they wouldn't lose the war," says Andrew Bacevich, a professor of international relations at Boston University.

Drawing conclusions from who has drawn down their forces and why, however, is difficult. For its part, Italy says its withdrawal is part of a "success strategy." Even the United States has announced plans to cut troop levels, with military leaders saying they see progress in Iraq, so it is hardly surprising that other nations would be eager to do the same.

Yet analysts suggest there are a host of other reasons, as well. In some cases, such as South Korea, relations with the US have soured, giving the country less incentive to stay. In others, such as Spain, voters turned so strongly against the war after the Madrid train bombings that they elected a government that pledged to withdraw from Iraq.

In this context, continued participation in the coalition is an important measuring stick - both for how influential Washington remains, and for who is willing to listen. And the Bush administration has stressed how much it values any help. The president stopped in Mongolia in November to thank the country for its 130 soldiers.

Indeed, among the limited contributions of coalition nations, some have a significance beyond numbers. Poland has become a major power broker for the US in Europe, and its decision last week to keep some troops in Iraq - it had previously planned to withdraw them all - was seen as a US foreign-policy victory. Moreover, Iraq marks the first time that Japan has deployed troops to a war zone since World War II. Though the troops are there on a humanitarian mission, the US has encouraged Japanese military participation as it seeks a counterweight to China and South Korea.

"It marks a huge threshold for Japanese domestic political opinion," says Mr. Donnelly. "Japan used Iraq to rethink its whole approach to the use of military force."

From the beginning, however, international support for the war in Iraq has been thin - even among coalition members - and it has become only more so. The US also did most of the heavy lifting during the first Gulf War, but then it had a huge array of allies to help pay the cost. Though the lessons of this war are tied to its uncertain outcome, they have pointed to the limits of a limited coalition.

"What we need if we intend to have this global war on terror include some additional military campaigns is substantive military participation by allies and money," says Dr. Bacevich. "A coalition matters to the degree that it brings something substantive to the table."

Iraqi V.P. Says No New Gov't Until April (AP)

By Patrick Quinn

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Vice President Adil Abdul-Mahdi, a leading Shiite candidate to become the next prime minister, said Tuesday that Iraq may not have a new government until April if political and sectarian groups cannot set aside their differences.

A broad-based coalition government including Shiites, Kurds and Sunni Arabs is the only way to defeat the insurgency, Abdul-Mahdi told The Associated Press in an interview at his home along the banks of the slowly flowing Tigris River.

"The future government, I think, will be a national unity government. This is a must. It is not something that only the results of the elections can decide. It is a political necessity, and all parties agree on that," Abdul-Mahdi said, wearing a tan suit as he sat on an ornate chair in a functional but bare reception area in the heavily guarded single-story stone house.

The 63-year-old former exile's remarks reflect the desire of many Shiites, especially politically moderate Islamists, to make the government more inclusive and representative in an effort to stop the daily bloodshed that ravages Iraq.

Abdul-Mahdi, who served as finance minister in Iraq's first interim government, said the country's political parties have to show flexibility if they want to form a government quickly.

"If we are flexible with our requests, then we can see a government in a very short period. But if we are reluctant, rigid, then this might take a while, maybe two months, three months," he said. "We are hoping that all parties will be flexible and they will be moderate in their requests, practical in seeing things, looking at the future and not sticking to their pasts or the present."

There were indications that three main parties to emerge from the Dec. 15 parliamentary elections — the Shiite United Iraqi Alliance, the Sunni Arab Iraqi Accordance Front and the Kurdish coalition — were making significant headway in forming a coalition government ahead of the release of final results.

Leaders of the Accordance Front agreed Monday for the first time on the broad outlines for such a government during an unprecedented trip north to the Kurds.

Abdul-Mahdi said "theoretically we are very close" to forming a government, but it could take some time before final results are certified.

Some smaller Sunni Arab groups and secular parties are claiming widespread election fraud and have threatened to boycott the 275-member parliament if the elections are not rerun in some provinces including Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0008006

Although the United Nations has endorsed the elections as credible, those groups want an international assessment team to inspect about 1,500 complaints thoroughly. The team began its work on Monday.

Final results were to be released this week, but election officials said Tuesday they may take two weeks.

Abdul-Mahdi said the process could last longer.

"They will not be announced until next week. Then there will be a period of verification and ratification," he said. If there are appeals, "then it will take another two weeks."

But Abdul-Mahdi said the real delays in forming a new government could appear when "we come to the real discussion of posts and key posts."

One key post, that of prime minister, could go to the soft-spoken Abdul-Mahdi, the son of a respected Shiite cleric who was a Cabinet minister in Iraq's monarchy.

Trained as an economist, he left Iraq in 1969 for exile in France after being arrested, tortured, and jailed by the Baath party. In his youth, Abdul-Mahdi dabbled with Baathism and Maoism before adopting the Islamic-style democracy he now favors.

Abdul-Mahdi is currently a leading member of the powerful Shiite Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, one of two major Islamic groups making up the United Iraqi Alliance, the religious Shiite political organization that dominates Iraq.

The other candidate for the country's top job to emerge from the governing Shiite alliance is the incumbent, Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, head of the conservative Islamic Dawa party. Al-Jaafari's popularity, however, has apparently suffered because of his government's inability to stave off the insurgents and bolster the economy of a country with the world's third-largest proven oil reserves.

Abdul-Mahdi said he would actively campaign for the post.

That marks a change from after the Jan. 30 elections, when he reportedly took himself out of the running in favor of al-Jaafari, who was said to have the backing of Iraq's most prominent cleric, the powerful Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani.

This time, however, al-Sistani has not yet anointed a favorite.

"There is no intention of withdrawing," Abdul-Mahdi said. "On the contrary there is an insistence on this matter. I believe that this is the right thing to."

Preliminary results from last month's elections show the Shiite religious group expected to take nearly half the seats in parliament — or about 130, well short of the 184 needed to avoid a coalition government.

The Kurds could win about 55 seats, Sunni Arab groups about 50, while a secular group headed by former Prime Minister Ayad Allawi is expected to receive about 25.

Abdul-Mahdi said a broad-based government would have enough legitimacy to deflate the Sunni-led insurgency and eventually lead to the withdrawal of U.S.-led coalition forces. He did not give a timeline for such a withdrawal.

"We always thought that the final solution was a political one, not a military one," he said. "We are progressing on this front, the political front, and all the efforts we are doing on security issues, improving our armed forces, our security institutions, we are preparing all the conditions for the withdrawal of the multinational forces."

Iraq Leaders Set Sights On Unity Government (REU)

By Shamal Aqrawi

Reuters, January 4, 2006

ARBIL, Iraq (Reuters) - Iraqi leaders have agreed to press on with efforts to form a national unity government after the latest round of talks on Tuesday hosted by Kurdish officials in their northern stronghold.

Negotiations on how exactly to share posts among the rival ethnic and sectarian factions will convene in the coming days in Baghdad, Kurdish regional president Masoud Barzani said after he and Iraq's Kurdish interim president Jalal Talabani met minority Sunni Arab leaders from the Iraqi Accordance Front.

"We have agreed on a national unity government," Barzani told a news conference in the Kurdish capital Arbil. "The negotiations will continue in Baghdad among all the parties."

The discussions have been held despite Sunni protests that the results of the December 15 election were rigged -- a claim that has prompted electoral officials to invite a team of foreign experts who are arriving this week to review the process.

One election official said on Tuesday, however, that he expected to see final results published in the coming days which, despite some annulments for irregularities, will confirm the dominance of the Shi'ite Islamist Alliance despite strong turnout by Sunnis who boycotted the previous election in January.

"We are going to cancel between 50 to 70 ballot boxes out of around 31,000 from across Iraq," Commissioner Adel al-Lamy said.

"The overall results will not be affected by the cancellation. It will not affect the results in one city let alone affect the results of any province," Lamy told Reuters.

DOJ_NMG_0008007

Electoral officials in Iraq gave differing accounts of whether at least some of the four unnamed observers, two Arabs, a Canadian and a European, had begun work.

Though some Sunni Arab leaders say they will protest and reject talks on government roles unless the foreign monitors uphold their claims of fraud, the United Nations has already called the election largely fair and other Sunni politicians are staking their claims to a share of power in negotiations.

AIR STRIKE

Among grievances within the Sunni community dominant under Saddam Hussein are the activities of U.S. troops in their home areas of the north and west. In the latest friction, political leaders and the local police voiced outrage at a U.S. air strike on a house in the northern town of Baiji that killed six people.

In other violence, police said a sister of Interior Minister Bayan Jabor was kidnapped in Baghdad; aides to Jabor, a hate figure for Sunni rebels, said they were unaware of the incident.

The U.S. military said aircraft bombed the building in the oil refining town of Baiji late on Monday when three men were spotted from the air going into the house after digging a hole that troops suspected was for a roadside bomb.

Baiji police said six people were killed and three wounded when the house was obliterated. Among the casualties were two police officers, one killed, the other wounded, they added. The youngest casualty was 14, the local police chief said.

"I absolutely confirm there were no terrorists in this house," Baiji police chief Colonel Sufyan Mustafa told Reuters.

"Even if there had been, why didn't they surround the area and detain the terrorists instead?"

DIGGING ROAD

A statement issued by the U.S. 101st Airborne Division said soldiers monitoring film from a reconnaissance drone spotted three men digging a hole by a road around 9 p.m. (1800 GMT).

Pilots were alerted, the military said: "The individuals... were followed from the air to a nearby building. Coalition forces employed precision-guided munitions on the structure."

The military gave no casualty figures.

Asked whether a bomb -- an improvised explosive device or IED, in military jargon -- had been found in the road and what measures were taken to determine who was in the house before the attack, spokesman Lieutenant Colonel Ed Loomis said he could not detail tactics but said : "Digging in the road surface in the hours of darkness are the actions of someone emplacing an IED."

Lieutenant Colonel Barry Johnson, national spokesman for U.S. forces, said: "Insurgent activity was confirmed through multiple sources, to include previous intelligence and direct observation at the time of the air strike ... "We are working closely with Iraqi security forces ... to determine precisely what happened and any unintended casualties resulting from our targeting of insurgent activity."

A local official of the biggest Sunni Arab political group, the Iraqi Islamic Party, called for demonstrations.

Hussein al-Falluji, a leader of the Accordance Front, said: "Once again the occupiers have shown their barbarism."

Last week, the military said an air strike killed 10 people near the nearby town of Hawija after pilots tracked men who had been spotted digging by a roadside.

U.S. forces have used air power increasingly of late.

Official data show the average in the last quarter of 2005 was 54 strikes per month, compared with five strikes per month in the first quarter; the recent rate was comparable to the 56 per month seen in the second half of 2004 when troops fought a Shi'ite uprising and stormed the Sunni city of Falluja.

The U.S. government says it will start withdrawing its 160,000 ground troops from Iraq as Iraqi forces become more able to combat revolt against the Baghdad authorities. But analysts expect U.S. air power to remain a key factor in the conflict.

Women Face Enormous Obstacles In Iraqi Politics (KRT)

By Huda Ahmed

Knight Ridder, January 4, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Maha al Douri took a radical stance when she decided to run for a seat in the Iraqi Parliament in December: The 36-year-old candidate on a minor Shiite Muslim slate put her face on campaign posters - and succeeded in raising eyebrows around the country.

"I got threats," said al Douri. "I am the first (female) candidate to talk about women's rights. The political parties list women as candidates, but they want to waste the woman's voice. Where is the secularity and democracy we hear about? Are they only slogans?"

DOJ_NMG_0008008

She's hardly alone in wondering what the future holds for women seeking political power in Iraq. Al Douri, who studied politics and journalism for a doctoral degree, notes that any woman getting involved must be brave enough to risk enormous social pressure and to face tremendous practical obstacles.

The official line from the government and many politicians is that women are welcome to participate. The constitution, which voters ratified in October, even guarantees women equal rights in society and a quarter of the seats in Parliament.

"We seek a real role for women, not a marginal one," said Haider al Abadi, a prominent member of Iraq's largest political coalition, the United Iraqi Alliance, a Shiite group. "Society has now accepted women in the political field. ... We are keen for women to hold leading positions in the government."

During Saddam Hussein's 25-year reign, women did have a few opportunities to play important roles in government or elsewhere in society, but only as long as they complied with Saddam's demands to serve him and the ruling Baath party. Women had the right to vote, for instance, but like all Iraqis could vote only for Saddam.

Yet for all the talk of shedding a history of female repression and establishing a nation in which a woman's voice matters as much as a man's, signs that the government is becoming more Islamist worry champions of women's rights.

Proponents of Islam in government note that the religion explicitly values women, including by cherishing their contributions to family, home and society. Yet others fear that a conservative Islamic government would bar women from voting, moving or even studying independently of their fathers, husbands or brothers.

Already there have been numerous reports of husbands casting votes in their wives' names and of fathers voting for their daughters. Before October's constitutional referendum, in conservative areas campaign posters showing a woman's face - symbolizing the face of a new Iraq - were ripped from walls or painted over and denounced as shameful.

In the December parliamentary elections, security concerns prompted candidate Huda al Nu'aimi to decide at the last minute not to display any of her campaign posters, including those featuring her face. Like other female candidates, some of whom were even afraid to appear in public, al Nu'aimi feared that she'd be a target.

"I did not dare to be pursued by militias or organized criminal groups. I did not want my posters to be torn or covered in bad words," said al Nu'aimi, a candidate of the Iraqi National Dialogue Front, a major secular Sunni Muslim slate. "Here, the man is still the master."

Like many Iraqis who are worried about the direction their nation will take, Aseel Ayad wants women to have a stronger role in politics. The 23-year-old, who works in her family's Baghdad optical shop, thinks it's important that the new government's promises of gender equality - the right to work, vote and participate fully in society - don't vanish.

"As a woman, I feel I need women in office to help me achieve my goals," she said. "So far we have seen nothing in the past elections. Women have been represented in the slates, but only to fill a space, and they haven't been valued."

While some political groups did just that, others sought to fill the spaces on their slates that were constitutionally reserved for women with bona fide candidates, said Hussein al Musawi of the Sun of Iraq, the minor Shiite slate that included al Douri. It will take time for Iraq to embrace a political system that's open to women and for women to seize the opportunity, he said.

"This is a golden chance for women," al Musawi said. "They must exploit it in the best way they can and improve their role in society in these years, so in the next round of elections women will be able to raise their percentage" in Parliament.

Not everyone is eager for women's rights to top the government's agenda.

Mays Hussam, 34, an office manager in Baghdad, said the nation had more pressing issues, including the epidemic violence that kills Iraqis daily and the chronic electricity shortage. Only after Iraq's basic needs are met should the government take on more, she said.

"I don't want something for my gender," she said. "All I care about now is security and a healthy environment for my son. Once we're safer, I hope women will defend our rights."

Political analyst Hazim Ali of Jadriyah University said that security fears, however, weren't necessarily driving the movements to exclude women from politics. Some extremist clerics may be taking advantage of troubled times to keep women in traditional roles, he said.

"Politics here is a male thing," Ali said. "I consider it two-faced: We say we accept women's role in politics, but we do not believe in them."

Azhar al Sheikhli, the minister for women's affairs, said that too often women were regarded as simple-minded, unable to handle the rough-and-tumble political world. Strong laws are needed to guarantee women's rights, and new generations must be taught that women have much to give to Iraq, she said.

"The heads of our political lists realize they don't need women at the top of their lists to succeed, so they figure, `Why risk it?'" she said. "We hope that will change with time."

Results Of Iraq Elections Not Likely For 2 Weeks (USAT)

USA Today, January 4, 2006

BAGHDAD — An international team began reviewing the hundreds of complaints filed over Iraq's parliamentary elections, and an Iraqi elections official said Tuesday that results might not be ready for two more weeks.

U.S. aircraft, meanwhile, bombed a building where suspected insurgents were hiding north of Baghdad, killing seven people, Iraqi police said.

In the capital, the sister of Iraqi Interior Minister Bayan Jabr was kidnapped by gunmen who killed one of her bodyguards and seriously wounded another, said Adnan Thabet, commander of the Interior Ministry's special forces.

The Independent Electoral Commission of Iraq has completed its investigation of almost 2,000 election complaints and will announce the findings today, commission member Hussein Hindawi said.

However, the commission won't announce final election results until an international team finishes its work, meaning they might not be ready for two weeks, commission member Safwat Rashid said. Officials previously said final results of the Dec. 15 vote would be announced in early January.

The commission investigated 1,980 complaints, including 50 that were considered serious enough to alter results in some districts.

The international team, which began its work Monday, agreed to review Iraq's elections after protests by Sunni Arab and secular Shiite groups that the polls were tainted with fraud.

Preliminary results give the governing Shiite religious bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance, a big lead, but one that would still require forming a coalition with other groups.

U.S. aircraft bombed a house late Monday inBeiji, site of Iraq's largest oil refinery, killing seven people and wounding four, Iraqi police Capt. Arkan Jassim said. The U.S. military said an unmanned aircraft spotted three men planting a roadside bomb in the city 155 miles north of Baghdad, and that Navy F-14s bombed a nearby building the three had entered. In other violence, eight people were killed Tuesday in three attacks in Baghdad.

Gunmen attacked a car carrying construction workers in a western neighborhood, killing three, police Capt. Qasim Hussein said. Another car carrying civilians was fired on in the same area, killing two people, police 1st Lt. Thair Mahmoud said. Three civilians elsewhere in Baghdad were shot to death, police said.

International Team Probes Complaints About Vote (WT/AP)

By Jason Straziuso

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

BAGHDAD -- An international team began reviewing the hundreds of complaints filed about Iraq's parliamentary elections, and an Iraqi elections official said yesterday that results might not be ready for two weeks.

In the capital, the sister of Iraq's interior minister was kidnapped by gunmen, who killed one of her bodyguards and seriously wounded another, an Interior Ministry official said.

U.S. aircraft, meanwhile, bombed a building where suspected insurgents were hiding north of Baghdad, killing seven persons, Iraqi police said.

The Independent Electoral Commission of Iraq has completed an investigation of almost 2,000 election complaints and will announce the findings today, said commission member Hussein Hindawi.

But the commission won't announce the final election results until an international team finishes its work, meaning they might not be ready for two weeks, said commission member Safwat Rashid. Officials previously said the final results of the Dec. 15 vote would be announced early this month.

The commission investigated 1,980 complaints, including 50 considered serious enough to alter results in some districts, an election official said.

The international team, which began its work Monday, agreed to review Iraq's elections after protests by Sunni Arab and secular Shi'ite groups that the voting was tainted by fraud.

Preliminary results give the governing Shi'ite religious bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance, a big lead, but one that still would require forming a coalition.

Interior Minister Bayan Jabr's sister was kidnapped in northeastern Baghdad, said Adnan Thabet, commander of the Interior Ministry's special forces. He did not provide details about the abduction or the minister's sister -- including her name or age.

Mr. Jabr is a member of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq -- the country's largest Shi'ite party, also known as SCIRI. He was formerly a senior official of the Badr Brigade, a militia that belongs to SCIRI.

Mr. Jabr has in recent weeks been the focus of criticism regarding charges of torture and abuse at Interior Ministry prisons. Many of those abused were Sunnis, the group thought to sponsor the insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0008010

U.S. aircraft bombed a house late Monday in Beiji, site of Iraq's largest oil refinery, killing seven persons and wounding four, said Iraqi police Capt. Arkan Jassim. The U.S. military said an unmanned aircraft spotted three men planting a roadside bomb in the city, which is 155 miles north of Baghdad, and that Navy F-14s bombed a nearby building the three had entered.

But police in Beiji told Reuters news agency that the victims were innocent family members, the youngest being 14, and that they included two police officers, one of whom was killed.

"I absolutely confirm there were no terrorists in this house," police chief Col. Sufyan Mustafa told Reuters.

Fraud Probe Continues Into Iraq Poll Results (FT)

By Steve Negus, Iraq Correspondent

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

Final results for Iraq's December 15 elections may not be ready for another two weeks, Iraqi officials said on Tuesday, but politicians continued to hold talks on forming a national unity government to include all major ethnic and sectarian groups.

Officials from Iraq's independent electoral commission (IECI) say that the more than 2,000 complaints filed have already been investigated, but time was needed for a team from a Canada-based elections mission to check the violations-detection process.

The IECI had originally forecast that results might be available early this month, but Sunni Arab and secularists alleged widespread fraud and voter intimidation by Shia Islamists and demanded that international observers be brought in to check the results.

Consequently, last week the IECI invited the International Mission for Iraqi Elections (IMIE), a group set up in 2004 to monitor the country's political process, to send a team to Baghdad to review elections procedures.

Sunni leaders have welcomed the participation of the IMIE mission, which includes two Arab League representatives, a Canadian and a European. The mission started work on Monday.

The IECI for its part has said that in the next few days it will announce the cancellation of results in polling stations where major fraud had occurred.

Any cancellations, however, are not expected to change dramatically the outcome of an election where the Shia Islamist-led United Iraqi Alliance (UIA) is expected to secure between 120 and 130 seats in the 275-member parliament, compared to around 50 won by a Kurdish coalition and 40 gained by the main Sunni group.

Despite an outcome that would require the UIA to ally with only one major faction to create the two-thirds majority it needs to form a government, most mainstream Iraqi politicians have agreed that Iraq should have a national unity government to overcome ethnic and sectarian divides.

To this end, President Jalal Talabani and other Kurdish politicians have hosted meetings in their northern self-rule zone, which have been attended by the largest Sunni movement, the Islamist-leaning Iraqi Consensus Front.

On Tuesday, Front leader Adnan al-Dulaimi was quoted as saying that there was an "agreement to form a balanced Iraqi government by consensus and co-operation and away from any sectarian affairs".

Other groups, however, have denounced the Front for breaking ranks with Sunnis and secularists who rejected the election results, leaving open the possibility that some Sunnis will continue to contest the legitimacy of the elections even as others participate in the government.

Discussions in the north also focused on who among the UAI might head the government, with a statement from Mr Talabani's office on Monday saying that the president had no objection to Ibrahim al-Jaafari of the Shia Islamist al-Daawa retaining his post as prime minister.

Many Kurds were thought to be disappointed with Mr Jaafari's performance and to prefer Adel Abd al-Mahdi, vice-president, from the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (Sciri), a rival Shia Islamist party.

If Mr Jaafari's al-Daawa retains the premiership, then Sciri may insist on keeping control of the interior ministry – an arrangement likely to infuriate many Sunnis, who argue that the current Sciri interior minister has tolerated the mass detention and assassination of their co-religionists.

U.S. Strike On Home Kills 9 In Family, Iraqi Officials Say (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Omar Al-neami

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 3 - American F-14 warplanes killed nine members of an Iraqi family, including women and young children, during a bombing and cannon strike on Monday night that obliterated a home near the northern industrial city of Baiji, Iraqi officials said Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0008011

American officials said the warplanes had been pursuing insurgents who had been observed setting up a roadside bomb. They fled to a building, and the American planes struck the building and destroyed it.

The attack enraged Iraqi officials in Baiji, about 150 miles north of Baghdad, who said that the airstrike was unjustified and that it had destroyed an innocent family.

A preliminary investigation indicated the blast had killed the wife of the home's owner, his daughter-in-law and seven children and grandchildren, including one son who worked for the police, said Maj. Muthanna al-Qaisi, a spokesman for the governor of Salahaddin Province. Three more relatives were wounded, he said.

"The owner of the house is a very simple man," Major Qaisi said. "The American forces did not provide us with any justification for the attack, and the governor requires an investigation concerning this attack." He said the governor would meet with American officials on Wednesday to demand an explanation. The home, behind a mosque, was demolished in the 10:30 p.m. attack, he said.

Agence France-Presse in Baiji reported that eight bodies had been pulled from the rubble along with three survivors - two unconscious women and an 8-year-old boy whose cry for help alerted rescuers. Agence France-Presse quoted the owner of the home, Ghadban Hassan, as saying he was at a store 100 yards away when the bombs struck. He said 14 family members had been inside.

A Baiji police colonel, Sufyan Mustafa, told Reuters that the family members killed in the bombing did not include any suspected insurgents. "There were no terrorists in this house," he said.

American military officials said the airstrike came after a pilotless reconnaissance aircraft detected three men planting a roadside bomb about 9 p.m. The men "dug a hole following the common pattern of roadside bomb emplacement," the military said in a statement. "The individuals were assessed as posing a threat to Iraqi civilians and coalition forces, and the location of the three men was relayed to close air support pilots."

The men were tracked from the road site to a building nearby, which was then bombed with "precision guided munitions," the military said. The statement did not say whether a roadside bomb was later found at the site. An additional military statement said Navy F-14's had "strafed the target with 100 cannon rounds" and dropped one bomb.

American officials said they were working to confirm how many causalities were involved and who was killed. "We're now trying to determine in coordination with Iraqi security forces in the area exactly what casualties occurred, and why they occurred," said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a military spokesman.

In Baghdad on Tuesday afternoon, gunmen kidnapped the sister of the interior minister, Bayan Jabr, the Iraqi police said. Mr. Jabr is a highly polarizing figure, accused by Sunni Arabs of orchestrating widespread assassinations of Sunnis. Mr. Jabr has denied that, but American soldiers raided jails under his control last year and found Sunnis with clear signs of abuse.

North of the capital in Baquba, a suicide car bomber attacked a bus filled with police officers on Tuesday, killing three and wounding 14 more, the American military said.

The Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani said further talks aimed at forming a unity government would continue with discussions on how to spread government posts around to the main sectarian and ethnic blocs, Reuters reported. The main Sunni Arab political party agreed with the Kurds on Monday to drop objections to the validity of the parliamentary election on Dec. 15 and work toward forming a coalition government.

Officials from the Iraqi election commission said it could take another week or two before final certified results are released. An international team of election monitors is evaluating complaints that Sunni Arabs and some other groups were disenfranchised. Iraqi election officials and United Nations observers have rejected calls for new elections.

In an interview on Tuesday, the head of the Iraqi election commission, Adel al-Lami, said no more than 50 to 70 ballot boxes - of 31,000 - would be canceled because of findings of fraud.

Dozens Feared Dead In Indonesia Landslide (AP)

By Irwan Firdaus

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia -- Landslides triggered by heavy rains swept down on a village on Indonesia's Java island at dawn Wednesday, burying homes beneath tons of mud and leaving dozens of people missing and feared dead, officials said.

Most residents of Cijeruk, a village of about 200 people, were at home sleeping or performing early morning Muslim prayers when the landslide tumbled down from a nearby mountain, local government official Supriyanto told The Associated Press.

Budi Warityo, a police officer at the village in central Java, told The AP that so far only 12 people had been rescued and one body had been recovered, but that many of the remaining 200 people were missing and believed killed.

DOJ_NMG_0008012

"The rest of the villagers are feared to be buried under the mud," he said by telephone from the scene, about 130 miles east of Jakarta.

Meanwhile on the east of Java, rescuers tried to find survivors from a series of landslides and flash floods that killed at least 57 people and left dozens other missing earlier this week, officials said.

The mud and water destroyed bridges and roads in the already isolated area in Jember district, cutting of at least two villages two days after the disaster, el-Shinta radio reported.

Heavy tropical downpours cause dozens of landslides and flash floods each year in Indonesia, where millions of people live in mountainous regions and near fertile flood plains close to rivers.

U.S. Raid Kills Family North Of Baghdad (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Salih Saif Aldin

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

BAGHDAD, Jan. 3 -- U.S. pilots targeting a house where they believed insurgents had taken shelter killed a family of 12, Iraqi officials said Tuesday. The dead included women and children whose bodies were recovered in the nightclothes and blankets in which they had apparently been sleeping.

A Washington Post special correspondent watched as the corpses of three women and three boys who appeared to be younger than 10 were removed Tuesday from the house outside the town of Baiji, 150 miles north of Baghdad.

A U.S. military spokesman said that American forces take every precaution to prevent civilian casualties and that they were working with Iraqi authorities to determine what happened at the farmhouse in Baiji. "We continue to see terrorists and insurgents using civilians in an attempt to shield themselves," Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a military spokesman, said in an e-mail.

The Associated Press Television News showed footage of men carrying several bodies wrapped in carpets from the wreckage of the house. The men chanted ritual prayers: "There is no god but God."

The United States has steadily intensified its use of airstrikes against insurgents in Iraq in the past year, increasing the number of attacks from 25 in January 2005 to 120 in November.

The U.S. military says that it does not count civilian deaths from American attacks and that investigating deaths caused by any one strike is often impractical in dangerous areas. But some analysts say the U.S. military should make a systematic effort, both to test the reliability of its intelligence and to better learn how to reduce civilian casualties.

On Tuesday, Johnson said the U.S. military was trying to do that with the Baiji attack. "We are determining the facts in this particular case so we will know exactly how civilians may have been drawn into the air strike that was deemed necessary by our forces fighting insurgents on the ground," Johnson said in the e-mail.

Johnson deferred comment on civilian casualties in the strike to Iraqi officials.

U.S. forces had received the information leading to the attack from multiple sources, including existing intelligence and direct observation at the time of the strike, Johnson said in the e-mail.

A U.S. military statement said that an unmanned U.S. drone detected three men digging a hole in a road in the area. Insurgents regularly bury bombs along roads in the area to target U.S. or Iraqi convoys. The three men were tracked to a building, which U.S. forces then hit with precision-guided munitions, the statement said.

Maj. Abdul Jabbar Kaissi, a security officer in Salahuddin province, said the airstrike killed the 12-member family of his relative, Ghadban Nahi Kaissi, who is also a relative of Salahuddin Gov. Ahmad Mahmud Kaissi.

Officials said six surrounding houses were damaged and two residents in the area were wounded seriously enough to require treatment. Officials and other people at the scene said there had been no insurgents in the house targeted.

As American forces cordoned off the site Tuesday morning, the Post special correspondent witnessed emergency workers carrying out the bodies of the three boys on the thin mattresses where they had been found. Search crews used blankets to wrap up the bodies.

Emergency workers also retrieved the bodies of three women -- a bloodied older woman whose head was wrapped in a black veil and two younger women whose hair was uncovered and who were dressed for bed. The head of one of the two young women was crushed.

"I would certainly think that if they believe they had strong intelligence about enemy activity they would want to confirm that they had killed their intended targets and want to understand if they had killed or injured innocent people inadvertently," said Sarah Sewall, who was deputy assistant secretary of defense for peacekeeping and humanitarian aid during the Clinton administration. She is now program director at Harvard University's Carr Center for Human Rights Policy.

Separately Tuesday, top Iraqi police officials in the southern city of Basra said an Iranian citizen was among three men detained in a raid Sunday that uncovered a large amount of arms and explosives. One of the officials said some of the seized ordnance had markings showing it had been made in Iran. The raid was in Nashwa, east of Basra, near the Iran-Iraq border.

DOJ_NMG_0008013

The ordnance included 235 sticks of dynamite, as well as artillery and mortar shells and antitank mines, officials said.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad recently warned Iran against sending weapons into Iraq. A top U.S. military official, who spoke on condition that he not be identified further, had said repeatedly that weapons and guerrillas were entering Iraq from Iran.

Specific accounts of such smuggling seldom emerge. Police and officials in southern areas bordering Iran, and in the Interior Ministry in Baghdad, are predominantly Shiites. Many are members of religious political parties with links to Iran, a Shiite theocracy.

In northern Iraq, meanwhile, Kurdish regional leader Massoud Barzani held post-election talks with Sunni Arab leaders, telling reporters after the meeting that "we have agreed on a national unity government." Negotiations on the makeup of a coalition government will continue in Baghdad, Barzani said.

In Baghdad, however, spokesmen in the Shiite religious alliance that early results show netted the biggest share of votes in last month's elections said the alliance would accept only coalition partners that favored federalism and strong measures against members of the Baath Party that ruled Iraq under Saddam Hussein.

The measures would be antithetical to most prospective Sunni coalition partners, however. Their members come from the Sunni minority that lost power with the overthrow of Hussein's government.

Also in Baghdad Tuesday, police said a sister of Interior Minister Bayan Jabr, a Shiite, had been kidnapped, but Jabr's political party denied the abduction had occurred. Parts of central Baghdad were locked down as police searched for the woman.

Cautiously, Iraqis Open For Business (CSM)

By Charles Levinson

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2006

BAGHDAD - On a crisp winter afternoon in Baghdad's well-to-do Jadiriya neighborhood, families, young couples, and students from nearby Baghdad University crowd the tables outside the Hassan Ice Cream Shop.

A decade ago, when international sanctions meant sugar - among other commodities - was in short supply, ice cream shops such as the one Mohammed Hassan opened last April were illegal. Now, Iraqis are eagerly consuming what was once forbidden, and Mr. Hassan is raking in profits.

"I'm succeeding because I've filled a hole in the market," says Hassan. "I'm giving Iraqi families ice cream and a safe place to spend their free time."

Hassan's is one of the 24,000 new businesses that the Iraqi Ministry of Trade says have opened since the fall of Saddam Hussein in April 2003 and to which US officials point to support their claims that the Iraqi economy, despite ongoing security woes, is recovering.

"I think ordinary Iraqis have picked up on the sense that the economy looks better," says Thomas Delare, the counselor for economic affairs at the US Embassy in Baghdad.

The success of Hassan's parlor, in a large part, is due to location. It sits in a well-guarded neighborhood, just blocks away from the home of Iraqi president Jalal Talabani. Iraqi police stand on nearly every corner. And whereas most of Baghdad receives a few hours of electricity each day, here the lights (and ice cream freezers) rarely go out.

Elsewhere, new businesses aren't faring so well. Economists at the Baghdad Economic Forum say that as many as 90 percent of the 24,000 new businesses are idle, unable to secure the work, raw materials, and startup money to get off the ground. Security problems, unreliable electricity, and lack of finance are hobbling small businesses, analysts and local businessmen say. Dangerous roads, cheap imports

Not far from Hassan's ice cream parlor, Nour Ali Haider sits behind the counter of his leather jacket store. He is the sort of self-made entrepreneur the US would like to see blossom in Iraq's nascent free market economy. In 1989, fed up with his three-dollar-a-month job in a state-owned leather factory, Mr. Haider bought a dozen leather jackets and began hawking them from a street corner. Now he owns his own store and, until recently, business was thriving.

"Before the fall of Saddam I wouldn't have been able to talk [to journalists] because I'd have been so busy," he says. "Now I can sit here and talk and drink tea with you all evening."

His is one of dozens of leather goods stores along this heavily traveled boulevard. Buyers once came from all over Iraq and neighboring Jordan and Syria to buy inexpensive Iraqi-made leather coats here. But since car bombs, kidnappings, and assassinations have become a daily ordeal for ordinary Iraqis, business has all but disappeared. Two car bombs exploded just blocks away from his store last week.

Earlier this year, struggling to feed his wife and three kids, Haider tried his hand at another trade. He started a new business selling generators, a hot commodity in electricity-starved Iraq, but it proved to be a losing venture.

DOJ_NMG_0008014

"The generators I was selling were coming from China, and most of them were broken," he says. "And by the time I got into the market everybody already had generators. I lost $2,500."

Cheap imports from China and elsewhere are a sore subject for many small businessmen here. In 2003, the US-led Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) enacted a series of economic policies to rapidly liberalize the economy. They slashed tariffs on all but a handful of goods. Inexpensive wares began pouring in, leaving Iraqi producers struggling to compete.

"Everything is being imported from outside the country with no taxes, tariffs, or any kind of planning," complains Shaalan al-Shazar, the head of Ro'a al Muhager, an eight-person engineering firm that designs machines for small Iraqi factories. "This has led to the deterioration of Iraqi industry, and now I have no work."

As an engineer, Mr. Shazar should be well placed to benefit from the $21 billion that the US is spending to rebuild Iraq. But he hasn't seen a penny. Thanks to rampant corruption, he says, only foreign companies and well- connected Iraqis get contracts.

"Who is getting these contracts?" wonders Shazar. "I don't know. Friends of translators for the US, friends of the [US] Army. I never see any of these projects advertised in the newspapers."

Owners of small Iraqi construction firms echo such sentiments. Like the abolition of tariffs, they say it's another legacy of the economic policies enacted by the CPA. In this case, the concerned law is the CPA's controversial Article 39, an investment law that gave foreign companies unfettered access to Iraq, effectively freezing many local companies out of the rebuilding effort.
Risks of doing business in Iraq

But even if Shazar could get those contracts, he says it's just too dangerous to work with the Americans. "It's not that I don't want to work with the Americans, but I'm afraid."

Shazar has a centrally located office in downtown Baghdad. It was once just a 30-minute commute to get home each evening to his wife and six daughters on the city's western edge. Now, due to checkpoints and road blocks, the drive takes up to two hours. The commute has become too dangerous, so he's boarded up the office and works from home - secretly.

"My business is hidden inside my home now," he says. "There are no advertisements or signs outside. There are many insurgents in my neighborhood and if they knew that I'm a businessman and they think I have money, they will rob me or kidnap my daughter."

Now, the hope for many of Iraq's small businessmen, and indeed for the economy as a whole, is that last month's vote will herald an inclusive government that will help take the steam out of the insurgency.

"Domestic entrepreneurs and foreign investors have all been waiting for stability, predictability, and greater security," says Mr. Delare of the US Embassy. "The election doesn't guarantee any of those things, but it offers the promise that now we can put them in place."

CIA Enlisted Aid Of Iraqis In U.S. (WT)

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

From combined dispatches

A new book on the government's secret anti-terrorism operations describes how the CIA recruited an Iraqi-American anesthesiologist in 2002 to obtain information from her brother, who was a figure in Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein's nuclear program.

Dr. Sawsan Alhaddad of Cleveland made the trip to Iraq on the CIA's behalf. The book said her brother was stunned by her questions about the nuclear program because he said it had been dead for a decade.

New York Times reporter James Risen uses the anecdote to illustrate how the CIA ignored information that Iraq no longer had weapons of mass destruction. His book "State of War: The Secret History of the CIA and the Bush Administration" describes secret operations under the Bush administration's war on terrorism.

The major revelation in "State of War" has been the subject of extensive reporting by Mr. Risen's newspaper: The National Security Agency's eavesdropping of Americans' conversations without obtaining warrants from a special court.

The timing of the Times story and Mr. Risen's book publication have come into question as the newspaper held the story for a year after the White House expressed concerns that it could jeopardize national security.

The newspaper published the eavesdropping story on Dec. 16, the day the Senate debated whether to renew key elements of the anti-terror USA Patriot Act. Renewal efforts failed to gain enough Senate support, forcing the Bush administration to settle for a temporary extension until Feb. 3.

The Times story, co-written by Eric Lichtblau, has prompted the Department of Justice to investigate the sources of the national security leak.

A Time magazine article says Mr. Risen concedes his book requires readers to make a "leap of faith" and accept the credibility of his numerous anonymous sources. He is contesting a court order to reveal the identities of sources he quoted in a series of disputed articles about nuclear scientist Wen Ho Lee.

In "State of War," Mr. Risen writes that Dr. Alhaddad flew home in mid-September 2002 and had a series of meetings with CIA analysts. She relayed her brother's information that there was no nuclear program.

A CIA operative later told Dr. Alhaddad's husband that the agency thought her brother was lying. In all, the book says, about 30 family members of Iraqis made trips to their native country to contact weapons scientists, and all of them reported that the programs had been abandoned.

In October 2002, the U.S. intelligence community issued a National Intelligence Estimate that concluded that Iraq was reconstituting its nuclear program.

Mr. Risen writes that the NSA spying program was started in 2002 after the CIA began to capture high-ranking al Qaeda terror operatives overseas and took their computers, cell phones and personal phone directories.

The CIA turned the telephone numbers and e-mail addresses from the material over to the NSA, which began monitoring the phone numbers -- in addition to anyone in contact with the telephone subscribers, the book said, adding that this led to an expansion of the monitoring, both overseas and in the United States.

The book said the NSA does not need approval from the White House, the Justice Department or anyone else in the Bush administration to eavesdrop on a specific phone line in the United States.

In a chapter on a "rogue operation," the book said a CIA officer mistakenly sent one of its Iranian agents information that could be used to identify virtually every spy the agency had in Iran. The book said the Iranian was a double agent who turned over the data to Iranian security officials.

The book said the information severely damaged the CIA's Iranian network, and quoted agency sources as saying that several of the U.S. agents were arrested and jailed.

End This Evasion On Permanent Army Bases In Iraq (FT)

By Gary Hart

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

It has been the dream of Republican neoconservatives at least since 1998 – and probably years before – to overthrow Saddam Hussein and to use the new client state of Iraq as the US's military and political base from which to pacify the complex and troubled Middle East. Leaving aside the plausibility of this notion, it is not one with which the great American leaders of history would have identified and certainly not one they would have attempted to carry out in secret.

Having failed in this enterprise, as some of us predicted, the question is: what now? There is still the possibility that a central remnant of this secret scheme may yet be salvaged. Surprisingly, the trick has drawn little attention from the American audience. It is to help install at least the semblance of a "democratic" government in Baghdad, even one that in author Fareed Zakaria's perceptive term is an illiberal democracy; to construct permanent US military bases at strategic points throughout the country and then persuade the new "democratic" government to invite us to stay.

So, now that the debate has finally turned not on whether to stay or to go but on how soon and under what conditions we should leave, it would be a mistake of epic proportions to assume things are that simple. There is an old movie line my friend Frank Mankiewicz, the veteran political adviser, is fond of quoting: "These are desperate men and they will stop at nothing." This he said during the Watergate years and we all knew what he was talking about, but it also applies today. For those of us who warned against kicking a Middle East hornets' nest, to assume that now it is simply a question of timing would be to assume that the neo-con Houdinis who gave us Vietnam-in-the-desert are out of tricks.

Any attempt to find out whether the US is, or is not, constructing permanent military bases meets with frustration. The few who have attempted to get a direct answer to this question are met with evasion and purposeful confusion over what is or is not "permanent". But this is the ultimate test of true Bush administration intentions in Iraq. If we are, in fact, constructing permanent bases, "leaving" simply means a reduction of forces and the permanent stationing of US brigades in Iraq. If this "compromise" solution appeals to you, you might wish to refresh your memory about the disastrous French experience in Indochina or even certain phases of the British occupation of Iraq.

Under circumstances where Congress was performing its constitutional oversight responsibilities, and where the press was less intimidated by power, it would be a straightforward exercise to determine whether a final neoconservative trick is afoot. Congressional committees would have senior civilian and uniformed Pentagon and State department officials answer direct questions about US plans. "Mr or Madame secretary, are we, or are we not, constructing permanent military bases in Iraq and, if so, for what purpose?"

But this Congress has made clear it is a purely partisan institution, not a separate branch of government, and that it has no intention of fulfilling its duties to oversee the executive branch and inform the American people. Obviously, reporters could do the same with the White House press secretary (with no serious hope of an honest answer) or, even better, the president.

DOJ_NMG_0008016

And to forgo predictable semantic sleights of hand, let us define "permanent" as: fixed, solid, durable and lasting. In practical terms, that means pouring concrete and welding steel, not tents and ditch latrines.

It is a shame for any American to distrust the veracity of his or her leaders. But the current crop has given us more than enough reason to do so. So when the president says: "When they [Iraqis] stand up, we will stand down," it cries out for an explicit definition of what "stand down" means in practice. Otherwise, "stand down" will quickly join "stay the course" and "support the troops" as rhetorical substitutes for policy and the equivalent of the scarves magicians use to obscure the concealment of an ace up the sleeve.

The art of deception does not require outright lies. It may simply lie in refusing to reveal the truth, the art of the trick. Given all the purposeful obfuscation, deception and card-shuffling that went on during the run up to the Iraq war, and the shuck-and-jive since things turned ugly, does anyone seriously believe the neoconservative magicians are out of tricks?

History Lessons (WT)

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

Remarks by the president at Arlington National Cemetery Veterans Day ceremony, Nov. 11, 1998:

President Clinton: But if the inspectors are not permitted to visit suspect sites or monitor compliance at known production facilities, [Iraq's weapons of mass destruction] may as well be in Baltimore, not Baghdad. That would open a window of opportunity for Iraq to rebuild its arsenal of weapons and delivery systems in months -- I say again, in months -- not years. A failure to respond could embolden Saddam Hussein to act recklessly, signalling to him that he can with impunity develop these weapons of mass destruction or threaten his neighbors, and this is very important in an age when we look forward to weapons of mass destruction being a significant threat to civilized people everywhere. And it would permanently damage the credibility of the United Nations Security Council to act as a force for promoting international peace and security. We continue to hope, indeed pray, that Saddam will comply, but we must be prepared to act if he does not. (Applause.)

Ex-CIA Agent Says US Missed Bin Laden In Afghanistan (FT)

By Peter Spiegel, Defence Correspondent

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

US military commanders were told that Osama bin Laden was hiding in the mountainous Tora Bora region of Afghanistan in early December 2001 but failed to send troops to block his escape, according to a new account by the CIA officer who ran the agency's operations in the country.

Gary Berntsen, a CIA veteran who headed a paramilitary team called "Jawbreaker" during the Afghan war, said in a book published last week that one of his Arabic-speaking operatives found a radio on a dead al-Qaeda fighter during the Tora Bora battle and heard the terrorist leader repeatedly try to rally his troops.

"After the Spectre [gunship aircraft] cleared the area, Bilal heard a voice he recognised from dozens of tape recordings," Mr Berntsen wrote, using a pseudonym for an Arab-American former Marine who was part of the CIA team. "It was Osama bin Laden telling his troops to keep fighting."

Later on the same captured radio, "Bilal" and a second CIA agent, another American of Middle Eastern origin, reported hearing Mr bin Laden apologising for getting his men trapped in the mountains and killed in large numbers by American bombing, Mr Berntsen wrote. The book, titled Jawbreaker, was heavily edited by CIA censors.

Mr Berntsen also wrote that on the recommendation of a former Special Forces officer who was part of his team as a CIA contractor, he made a formal request for 800 US army Rangers to be deployed along the Pakistani border to prevent Mr bin Laden's escape, a request that was never granted.

The issue of whether senior US commanders failed to capture Mr bin Laden at Tora Bora because of an over-reliance on unreliable Afghan warlords became an issue in the 2004 presidential campaign when Democratic challenger John Kerry accused the Bush administration of allowing the al-Qaeda leader to escape by not sending American troops to the battlefield.

At the time, retired general Tommy Franks, the former head of US Central Command who ran the Afghan campaign, denied that the military knew of Mr bin Laden's presence and accused Mr Kerry of relying on "distortions of history".

"We do not know to this day whether Mr bin Laden was at Tora Bora in December 2001," Gen Franks wrote in the New York Times during the presidential race. "Tora Bora was teeming with Taliban and Qaeda operatives, many of whom were killed or captured, but Mr bin Laden was never within our grasp."

Mr Berntsen disputes this account, saying he told senior commanders of Mr bin Laden's presence and arguing that Afghan allies who had militia fighters in the region allowed Mr bin Laden to escape with about 200 Saudi and Yemeni fighters into Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0008017

"He was either badly misinformed by his own people or blinded by the fog of war," Mr Berntsen wrote of Gen Franks's claims and his insistence that Afghan militia were up to the task. "I'd made it clear in my reports that our Afghan allies were hardly anxious to get at al-Qaeda in Tora Bora."

Media reports have cited accounts of Mr bin Laden's presence at Tora Bora, but Mr Berntsen is the highest-ranking former official to publicly confirm that senior US commanders had been told the al-Qaeda leader was there during the battle.

Osama Debunks A Myth (WT)

By Richard Miniter

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

Indian Muslims, Internet gurus, television anchors, and at least one prime minister have said that [Osama] bin Laden has kidney trouble.

So where is the evidence? In short, there is no evidence, just a lot of chatter.

There is only one presumably well-informed source who has gone on the record to say that bin Laden was on dialysis: Pakistani Prime Minister Pervez Musharraf. And he later changed his mind.

At first, Gen. Pervez Musharraf seemed to strongly endorse the notion, in January 2002. "I think now, frankly, he is dead for the reason he is a patient, he is a kidney patient," he told CNN. Gen. Musharraf added, "Pakistan knew bin Laden took two dialysis machines into Afghanistan. One was specifically for his own personal use."

Over the next few years, bin Laden would appear alive and well in a string of audio and video tapes. In December 2004, when Gen. Musharraf again sat down with CNN's Wolf Blitzer, he all but reversed himself.

In fact, there is a mountain of evidence that bin Laden is not on dialysis.

No medical report has been produced that shows bin Laden is on dialysis. No reporter who has actually met bin Laden has seen the archterrorist hooked up to a dialysis machine or heard him talk about it. Robert Fisk, the only Western journalist to interview bin Laden three times, makes no mention of dialysis.

Peter Bergen led a CNN team into Afghanistan to interview bin Laden in 1997. Bin Laden appeared healthy and strong; neither the reporters nor bin Laden mentioned dialysis or kidney trouble.

Even bin Laden's longtime associates dispute the kidney ailment meme. Saudi newspaper editor Khaled Batarfi has known bin Laden for two decades, ever since the two were neighbors in the Saudi port city of Jeddah. He told the Sunday Tasmanian, an Australian newspaper, that bin Laden "does not suffer from kidney disease."

Foreign government officials who have met bin Laden also insist that he has no problems with his kidneys. Bin Laden lived in Sudan from 1991 to May 1996. I interviewed political leaders and intelligence officials there who knew him. Gutbi al-Mahdi, Sudan's former intelligence chief, told me bin Laden had no health problems during his time in Sudan. In fact, every Sudanese I spoke with denied that bin Laden had any health problems, let alone a kidney ailment requiring dialysis.

Bin Laden himself is of the same opinion. Hamid Mir, an intrepid Pakistani journalist who writes for the Pakistani daily Dawn, landed one of the only two authentic post?September 11 interviews with the world's most wanted man.

In the course of the wide-ranging interview, Mr. Mir asked bin Laden about his kidneys: "A French newspaper has claimed that you have a kidney problem and have secretly gone to Dubai for treatment last year [2000]. Is that correct?"

Bin Laden responded: "My kidneys are all right. I did not go to Dubai last year. One British newspaper has published an imaginary interview with an Islamabad dateline with one of my sons in Saudi Arabia. All this is false."

Perhaps the definitive account comes from bin Laden's doctor, who was arrested on October 21, 2002, in Pakistan and held incommunicado for a full month. "It was a very extensive investigation, eight hours a day," he said. "It went on and on." He added, "I was not physically tortured; there was just mental anguish."

Dr. Amer Aziz, a British citizen born in Pakistan, was interrogated by eight CIA and FBI agents, as well as by Pakistani intelligence officers. Strongly sympathetic to radical Islam, Aziz had treated bin Laden for years. He reportedly admitted to visiting bin Laden after the September 11 attacks. Upon his release, he talked freely to Paul Haven of the Associated Press in November 2002. The doctor said he had given bin Laden a "complete physical" in 1999 and treated him for back injuries after bin Laden was thrown from a horse. "His kidneys were fine," the doctor told Mr. Haven. He said "If you're on dialysis, you have a special look. I didn't see any of that," and added that bin Laden "was walking. He was healthy." Aziz was emphatic: "I did not see any evidence of kidney disease; I didn't see any evidence of dialysis."

Aziz later discussed the dialysis issue with the New York Times. "When I hear these reports, I laugh. I did not see any evidence."

He has good reason to laugh -- legions of Westerners have bought the story that bin Laden is on dialysis, with no proof at all.

DOJ_NMG_0008018

Richard Miniter is the author of two New York Times bestselling books, "Losing bin Laden" and "Shadow War," and is an internationally recognized expert on terrorism.

Democracies In Danger (USAT)

USA Today, January 4, 2006

Heading out. Four years ago, the United States invaded Afghanistan with a burning mission: to hunt down Osama bin Laden, mastermind of the still-raw 9/11 attacks, and destroy the fanatical Taliban regime that harbored him and other al-Qaeda leaders.

The mission is only partially accomplished, but the United States is on its way out. In a preview of events in Iraq, U.S. forces, rebuilding funds and projects are being cut and handed to Western allies and Afghans over the next year. The troubling suggestion is of a job half done.

The picture certainly doesn't look pretty. Bin Laden remains at large. Despite successful Afghan elections and solid leadership by President Hamid Karzai, democracy is precarious. A Taliban insurgency festers. Warlords hold sway in some areas and will likely gain power as U.S. forces depart. The heroin trade is going strong. Even the U.S. ambassador says the $623 million aid budget for this year — little more than half of the aid in 2005 — isn't enough.

Still, a drawdown makes practical sense, provided al-Qaeda isn't allowed to regain a foothold. The U.S. military is overstretched. Tracking down bin Laden and other al-Qaeda leaders depends less on a large troop presence in Afghanistan than it does on timely intelligence and cooperation from Pakistan.

Nor should the USA bear the entire financial burden of rebuilding the country. It has spent more than $47 billion on military efforts, and instilling democracy in a country that has never known it will take many years.

The lesson is this: Democracies don't bloom overnight, but working with the international community is the best solution in an intertwined world. International forces will now do what they have done for years in failing states: Be patient and try to avert the worst, not insist on a short path to an unattainable ideal.

In Iraq, the United States is already following a similar trajectory of retreating from grandiose post-invasion commitments.

Getting foreign help in Iraq is elusive, though. If President Bush can't find a way to win back allies whose advice he ignored in his headlong rush to war, the already-high price of that decision may go higher still.

Backing down. Russians can tell you something about dashed hopes for democracy. President Vladimir Putin has behaved for years like a cross between a czar and a KGB thug, rolling back democracy with near impunity, impervious to the international community's feeble protests because he has had little to fear.

But when Putin, acting to type, tried to cut off natural gas supplies to Ukraine over the weekend in a pricing dispute, international pressure forced him to back down.

The Russian president thought he had a good rationale for the cutoff. Ukraine still pays the ridiculously low gas prices it enjoyed as a Soviet satellite — less than a quarter of today's market value. Putin evidently thought his capitalist arguments for a fair price would win the day and the international community would join him in condemning Ukraine.

It isn't so simple. Russia agreed in 2004 to continue the low prices until 2009. But that was before the "Orange Revolution" swept in the pro-Western government of Viktor Yushchenko. Much as he denies it, Putin wants to use gas supplies to regain influence: A cut now, in winter, would send Ukraine's economy into a tailspin and angry protesters into the streets. But Putin's cunning overlooked the fact that many European countries also rely on Russian gas through the same pipeline. A sure way to enrage Western nations is to mess with their fuel supplies.

As the Europeans' supplies fell — Russia says the Ukraine was stealing from the pipeline — they questioned Putin's assurances that Russia is a stable energy supplier. The USA and others joined in the condemnation.

In an added irony, when Russia took over the chairmanship of the Group of Eight leading industrialized countries Sunday, it made energy security its cornerstone message.

The fiasco, most immediately, adds fuel to old questions of whether Russia deserves a place in the G8 at all, let alone its chairmanship. More broadly, just like the international cooperation designed to keep Afghanistan from disaster, the Ukraine-gas episode serves as a reminder of the immense power international pressure and clubs can have in curbing bad behavior — if only they'll use it.

Churchill At War (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

No one knows how Winston Churchill would have fought the war on terror or what he might have thought of the U.S. practice of holding members of al Qaeda at Guantanamo or secret CIA prisons in Eastern Europe. But in newly declassified records of the British Bulldog's War Cabinet meetings, Churchill offers some posthumous insights on wartime leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0008019

In 1942, the Cabinet discussed the options were Hitler to fall into British hands. "All sorts of complications ensue as soon as you admit a fair trial," Churchill said, according to notes taken by the deputy cabinet secretary Sir Norman Brook. To avoid such a "farce," which he thought would distract from the war effort, Churchill favored swifter means of dealing with Hitler. "This man is the mainspring of evil. Instrument -- electric chair, for gangsters."

Churchill called other Nazi leaders "outlaws" and argued that those who fell into British hands should be executed rather than put on trial. (There is no record of his views on water-boarding.)

At another Cabinet meeting, he advocated shooting German POWs if the Nazis were to kill British prisoners (the U.K., for the record, never did). After the Germans massacred the people of Lidice, Czechoslovakia, Churchill proposed, perhaps again half seriously, "wiping out German villages by air attack on a three-for-one basis." The Cabinet overruled him.

Churchill might wonder at today's attitudes toward fighting terrorists, about American "torture" of prisoners, and about the U.S. President who's often derided in London as a "cowboy." The British Prime Minister's clarity about the Nazi threat in World War II got his nation and the world successfully through that conflict.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Skilling Faces New Enron Allegation (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

In its effort to convict Jeffrey Skilling of multiple crimes at Enron Corp., the government is trying to trundle out a new witness against the former company president: himself.

In a court filing in Houston yesterday, federal prosecutors said Mr. Skilling attempted "to deceive" the Securities and Exchange Commission in a Dec. 6, 2001, deposition about his reasons for selling 500,000 Enron shares on Sept. 17 of that year.

The $15.6 million sale came less than three months before the energy giant collapsed into bankruptcy proceedings on Dec. 2, 2001. The government is seeking to use that SEC testimony in its trial against Mr. Skilling and former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay, which is scheduled to start in Houston Jan. 30. (See related article1.) Both men are former chief executives of Enron.

While the indictment against Mr. Skilling alleges numerous instances of criminal wrongdoing, the allegation that Mr. Skilling tried to deceive the SEC in his deposition is new. The government made its filing yesterday in opposition to a motion filed by Mr. Skilling's attorneys last month, seeking to keep his SEC testimony out of the coming criminal trial.

Insider trading related to the 2001 stock transaction is among the charges against Mr. Skilling. The government contends that he knew of and helped hide from the public numerous financial problems at Enron. He and Mr. Lay have pleaded not guilty to all charges, which also include conspiracy and securities-fraud allegations.

Daniel Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lead defense attorney, sharply challenged the contention in yesterday's government filing. "Mr. Skilling attempted to deceive no one, and the government knows it," he said in an interview.

Yesterday's court filing by the Justice Department's Enron Task Force quoted the Dec. 6, 2001, SEC deposition in which Mr. Skilling attributed the Sept. 17 stock sale to his fears about the impact of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on the stock market. "There was no other reason other than September 11th that I sold the stock," the government filing quoted Mr. Skilling as saying. "Oh, I agonized over it, absolutely agonized over it." He said it didn't have anything to do with concerns specific to Enron.

However, the government court filing says Mr. Skilling "failed to inform" the SEC that he had tried to sell 200,000 shares of Enron Sept. 6 through the brokerage firm Charles Schwab Corp. The filing said that trade didn't go through because the brokerage firm hadn't yet received formal notification that Mr. Skilling was no longer a top company officer, which would have restricted his ability to sell Enron stock. Mr. Skilling resigned from Enron in August 2001.

"Skilling's attempt to deceive the SEC about the reason for his sale in sworn testimony gives rise to an inference that material nonpublic information was a factor in his decision to sell in September 2001," the government argues in its filing.

Mr. Petrocelli, the Skilling attorney, said his client's Sept. 6 brokerage call about possibly selling some Enron stock "had nothing to do with any concerns about the company. He was thinking about beginning to diversify some of his holdings, which were virtually all in Enron stock." He said the sale of stock later that month was prompted by concerns about Sept. 11.

In last month's motion seeking to exclude the SEC testimony from the criminal trial, Mr. Skilling's attorneys said that SEC officials didn't properly warn the former Enron president about his criminal exposure before he talked in what he believed was a purely civil investigation. "Consistent with the Fifth Amendment, due process, and basic notions of fairness, the government may not use civil discovery devices to obtain evidence from the target of a criminal investigation," the motion said. Between Dec. 5, 2001, and Jan. 31, 2003, Mr. Skilling talked with the SEC on six occasions and declined to answer further questions only when he finally learned that he was a target of the criminal probe, the filing added. It noted that the SEC, which handles civil securities-law violations, and the Justice Department, which prosecutes criminal violations, worked closely together in the continuing four-year-old probe of Enron.

DOJ_NMG_0008020

Yesterday's government response disputed the argument that a criminal probe couldn't use information gleaned from a civil investigation. And in the case of Mr. Skilling's Dec. 6, 2001, SEC deposition, the filing said that the Justice Department's Enron Task Force hadn't yet been formed.

Mr. Skilling's willingness to talk with the SEC was part of a controversial strategy to speak out that he followed in the months after Enron's collapse. In press interviews and testimony before Congress, he repeatedly denied taking part in or knowing of any wrongdoing at Enron. By contrast, most of his former colleagues stayed mum for fear that anything they said could later be used against them. Mr. Skilling's lawyers have pointed to his willingness to talk as evidence that he had nothing to hide.

Enron Prosecutors, After Plea Bargain, Can Reduce Technical Jargon In Trial (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

The climactic courtroom battle in the Enron Corp. criminal war just got simpler -- and more complicated.

The plea bargain last week by former Enron Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey gives federal prosecutors the chance to present a shorter and less technical case against Mr. Causey's two co-defendants, former company Chairman Kenneth Lay and former President Jeffrey Skilling. The pair's trial on conspiracy, fraud and other charges is scheduled to start in Houston on Jan. 30.

If Mr. Causey had remained in the case, lawyers for the Justice Department's special Enron Task Force faced the challenge of getting deep into complex accounting transactions that prosecutors contend were used to hide the energy titan's financial problems.

At the same time, however, Mr. Causey's securities-fraud plea presents both sides with tricky new tactical questions, ranging from whether to call the former accounting chief as a witness to how he should be portrayed to the jury.

Prosecutors long have worried about jurors getting lost in complex accounting issues, such as how to account for special-purpose entities, say people familiar with the matter. Such special-purpose entities were allegedly used by Enron to create bogus profits and hide investment losses.

When public attention began to focus on some of these suspect dealings in late 2001, investor confidence plummeted, and the company was forced to seek bankruptcy-law protection within weeks.

With the trial now involving just the two men who were the public faces of Enron -- each did a stint as chief executive -- the government's case can shift emphasis. Prosecutors can focus more on whether the consistently optimistic public statements made about Enron's financial condition by the men qualified as lies and, thus, a fraud upon investors.

Prosecutors contend that Mr. Skilling, as president and chief architect of Enron's spectacular rise in the 1990s, was the lead deceiver until his surprise resignation in August 2001. After that, Mr. Lay took over the task of putting out false information to the public about Enron's financial condition and business prospects, prosecutors contend.

Such a prosecutorial approach would put less emphasis on proving that a particular accounting treatment was fraudulent and more on proving that Messrs. Lay and Skilling knew Enron had financial problems and lied about them to prolong a scheme that was making them wealthy.

The indictment estimates that Mr. Lay received more than $200 million in compensation and stock profits in 1998 to 2001, while Mr. Skilling received more than $100 million.

The concept of a highly paid executive lying to protect himself is a concept that a juror can understand without having to sit through an introductory accounting course. Mr. Causey's departure "absolutely will simplify the case the government has to present," says Jacob Frenkel, a former Securities and Exchange Commission lawyer now in private practice in Rockville, Md.

Ironically, a major setback in the government's four-year-old Enron probe might have helped push prosecutors to the Causey plea deal, says Christopher Bebel, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice in Houston.

Last year, the Enron Task Force prosecuted several former executives of Enron's telecommunications unit, and the trial degenerated into an often mind-numbing exercise in technical jargon. The jury acquitted defendants on numerous counts and deadlocked on the rest.

That experience helped the government realize that it "must redouble its efforts to simplify the evidence" in the coming trial, says Mr. Bebel.

There's one small potential upside for Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay that results from Mr. Causey no longer being at the defense table, observers say. If the government does provide persuasive evidence of accounting-related misdeeds, lawyers for the two remaining defendants could more easily argue that Mr. Causey hid the wrongdoing from them.

As defense counsel, "I wouldn't hesitate to paint Causey as someone...who didn't report violations," says Jonathan Halpern, a former federal prosecutor who is now in private practice in New York.

The Skilling and Lay camps haven't taken that course, so far.

Following Mr. Causey's plea to one count of securities fraud last week, lawyers for the two former top Enron executives painted him as an innocent man bludgeoned into a guilty plea by the pressure of the giant federal investigation and the threat of decades in prison.

Under his plea deal, Mr. Causey faces seven years in prison, which could be reduced to five if prosecutors feel he is particularly helpful in the continuing Enron investigation.

Before his plea deal, Mr. Causey had been working on a joint defense team with Messrs. Skilling and Lay. Their lawyers say that Mr. Causey repeatedly told them that he knew of no wrongdoing by his two former bosses. "He will not incriminate Jeff Skilling or Ken Lay," says Daniel Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lead defense lawyer.

Lawyers for Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling say that crimes weren't committed at Enron, save for a few relatively small ones by the company's former chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow, who hid them from his fellow executives. Defense lawyers regularly attack the credibility of Mr. Fastow, who has a plea bargain with prosecutors and is expected to testify at the coming trial.

The most obvious form of help that Mr. Causey could provide the government would be to testify. But prosecutors often spend months or years questioning and requestioning a major witness, looking for holes in the testimony.

Mr. Fastow, for example, reached his plea deal nearly two years ago. Prosecutors will have only a matter of weeks to debrief Mr. Causey. That could make putting him on the stand a riskier proposition for the government.

Many observers think the government will take that risk, since even relatively tepid testimony by Mr. Causey could be helpful. Given the positive public statements uttered by Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay about Enron, "it would be enough for Causey to take the witness stand and testify that there were many uncertainties attached" to Enron's internal financial analyses, says Mr. Bebel, the former prosecutor.

Alleged Fund Fraud Leads To Charges 6 Ex-Putnam Fiduciary Trust Execs Accused (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, January 4, 2006

Six former executives of Putnam Fiduciary Trust have been charged with scheming to defraud corporate client Cardinal Health and a group of Putnam mutual funds of $4 million, the Securities and Exchange Commission said Tuesday.

The SEC civil complaint, filed Friday in U.S. District Court in Boston, accuses the executives of hiding a 2001 trading error that caused Cardinal Health's employee retirement assets — invested in several Putnam mutual funds — to miss out on $4 million in stock market gains. Putnam Fiduciary is the transfer agent for Putnam Investments, a large mutual fund company.

The complaint charges former senior managing director Karnig Durgarian; former vice president Ronald Hogan; and former managing directors Donald McCracken, Virginia Papa, Sandra Childs and Kevin Crain.

At least four of them plan to fight the charges, their attorneys said.

According to the SEC complaint, Cardinal Health transferred an undisclosed amount of retirement plan assets to Putnam on Jan. 2, 2001, to invest in Putnam mutual funds.

But for an unknown reason, the assets were not invested until the next day.

This one-day delay caused the retirement plan to be “deprived of nearly $4 million in market appreciation,” the complaint reads.

The SEC alleges that the defendants used “deception, illegal trade reversals and accounting machinations” to shift $3 million of the losses to shareholders of other Putnam mutual funds.

The defendants also “improperly allowed Cardinal Health's (retirement) plan to bear approximately $1 million of the loss without disclosing to Cardinal Health that they had done so,” the SEC alleges.

The conduct was discovered last January, the SEC said.

SEC officials decided not to charge Putnam because the company has cooperated fully with the investigation, according to David Bergers, an SEC enforcement official in Boston.

Putnam made full restitution of the $4 million, fired or disciplined employees involved and strengthened the company's financial oversight and compliance “to make sure a situation like this could not happen again,” Putnam Investments CEO Ed Haldeman said.

DOJ_NMG_0008022

Attorney Anthony Mirenda, who represents Crain, said in a statement, “Mr. Crain will fight this to clear his name because he did not participate in any fraud.”

Crain “proactively brought this situation to the attention of internal auditors and has cooperated in the government's investigation throughout,” Mirenda said.

The accounting transactions used to correct the errors were approved by higher-ups and were “the normal safeguards and internal controls at Putnam at the time,” Mirenda said.

SEC Charges 6 Ex-Putnam Officials (WSJ)

By John Hechinger And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission charged six former Putnam Investments executives with civil fraud, alleging they covered up a scheme that resulted in $4 million in losses to five Putnam mutual funds and the retirement plan of Cardinal Health Inc. in 2001.

Walter G. Ricciardi, the SEC's deputy director of enforcement and administrator of the Boston office, called the alleged behavior "egregious." The SEC said it wouldn't charge Putnam, of Boston, because of the company's "swift, extensive and extraordinary cooperation" in the agency's investigation.

In March 2004, Putnam, a unit of Marsh & McLennan Cos. of New York, and one of the nation's largest mutual-fund companies, disclosed some of the losses and the departure of two executives related to the incident.

The company said it discovered the losses as part of an internal review and reported it to regulators and clients. It said it made restitution to customers.

In 2003, Putnam installed new management, including current Chief Executive Charles Haldeman, after the company became the first fund firm to face unrelated civil-fraud charges in a share-trading scandal that later engulfed most of the biggest players in the mutual-fund industry.

In a statement, Mr. Haldeman said the company had strengthened controls since the losses at the retirement plan. "We have worked hard at Putnam to create a culture in which all of our colleagues value the importance of taking care of other people's money and putting our clients first," he said.

The most recent charges, filed Friday, concern executives at Putnam Fiduciary Trust Co., which does administrative work for the mutual-fund company.

In January 2001, Putnam mistakenly allowed a one-day delay in investing money on behalf of Cardinal Health's 401(k) and other retirement plans, according to the SEC complaint, filed in U.S. District Court in Boston. The markets rose sharply on that day, causing customers to lose out on $4 million in gains, the agency said.

Putnam didn't report the delay to the client, the SEC said. Instead, Putnam executives conspired to cover up the losses by backdating trades and using improper accounting maneuvers, regulators alleged. As a result, shareholders in Putnam Research Fund, George Putnam Fund of Boston and Putnam Asset Allocation Balanced Portfolio, Growth Portfolio and Conservative Portfolio improperly bore $3 million of those losses. The losses for individual shareholders were small. They were slightly more than a penny a share at the fund most affected, Putnam Research, and less for the other funds. Participants in Cardinal Health's plan lost $1 million, the SEC said. Cardinal Health, of Dublin, Ohio, declined to comment.

The SEC charged Karnig Durgarian, a former managing director and chief of operations for Putnam Fiduciary; Donald McCracken, a former managing director and head of global operations services; Virginia Papa, a former managing director and director of defined-contribution servicing; Sandra Childs, a former managing director responsible for compliance; Kevin Crain, a former managing director overseeing plan administration; and Ronald Hogan, a former vice president. The agency said it was seeking unspecified fines.

Frank A. Libby, an attorney for Mr. Durgarian, said his client "looks forward to his opportunity to contest the SEC's claims." Anthony Mirenda, an attorney for Mr. Crain, said his client had no knowledge of the accounting maneuvers, didn't participate in any fraud and has cooperated with investigators. Mr. Crain believed the retroactive transactions "were routinely used at Putnam to correct errors and that these transactions in particular had been approved by appropriate people senior to him," Mr. Mirenda said in a statement.

Mr. Hogan's attorney, Jamie L. Wacks, said Mr. Hogan cooperated with investigators, and believed the transactions were intended to correct errors and had been "processed with the usual safeguards and controls." Ms. Wacks called the SEC action "meritless" and says her client denies wrongdoing. Ms. Papa's attorney, Michael J. Connelly, said she "has not misled any client, manipulated any record or covered up anything." Gary Matsko, an attorney for Mr. McCracken, said his client had an "unblemished" career and denies wrongdoing. An attorney for Ms. Childs declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0008023

Putnam said it "took action against the individuals, "including termination." The company wouldn't be more specific, though it said all had left the company between January 2002 and July 2004. In January 2004, Mr. Crain, after being terminated from Putnam for other reasons, left a voice mail for an internal auditor, saying the transactions had the "fingerprints" of "financial fraud," according to the SEC complaint. The SEC said Putnam later terminated Messrs. Durgarian and Hogan and Ms. Papa, as well as retroactively dismissing "for cause" Mr. McCracken, who had left the company in 2002.

Ex-Stockbroker Charged With Profiting From Attorney Girlfriend's Inside Information (LAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, The Associated Press

AP, January 4, 2006

A former stockbroker made nearly $23,000 on a pending acquisition by a Silicon Valley company after using insider knowledge he learned from his girlfriend, an attorney involved in the deal, prosecutors said Tuesday.

Lee Edelman, 34, was indicted on securities fraud charges after his girlfriend, an associate at a large Manhattan law firm, told him in March 2004 that Applied Materials Inc. was in talks to acquire Metron Technology NV. Applied Materials, based in Santa Clara, Calif., builds semiconductor-making equipment, while Metron provides support services for the industry.

Metron's share price almost doubled on Aug. 16, 2004, when the deal was announced. Edelman, of New York, quickly sold his shares, making $22,786, according to the indictment in U.S. District Court in Manhattan.

The Securities and Exchange Commission, which filed civil insider trading charges against Edelman, said in a release that Edelman broke up with his girlfriend several weeks after he began buying Metron stock. The attorney was not identified in court papers and was not aware of Edelman's stock buys, investigators said.

Edelman, reached by telephone at home Tuesday, said he did nothing wrong.

"I'm innocent, and I'm going to fight it to the end," he said. "She never gave me any information whatsoever."

An initial court appearance had not been scheduled. Edelman faces up to 20 years in prison, if convicted.

According to the complaint, Edelman and his girlfriend had a history of sharing confidential work and personal information and that the girlfriend trusted and expected Edelman to keep information about her clients confidential.

In March 2004, the woman disclosed the names of the companies involved in the transaction to Edelman and told him he must keep them confidential. Three months later, Edelman accompanied her to collect six boxes of documents related to the acquisition, the SEC said. For the next several weeks, she reviewed documents, talked with colleagues and clients and did other work related to the deal on weekends and evenings with Edelman present, the SEC said.

Edelman allegedly bought 12,000 shares between July 1, 2004, and Aug. 13, 2004.

SEC Names Brian Cartwright Its New General Counsel (WSJ)

By Judith Burns

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Securities and Exchange Commission announced Tuesday that securities lawyer and former astrophysicist Brian Cartwright will join the SEC on Jan. 23 as its new general counsel. Mr. Cartwright succeeds Giovanni Prezioso, who plans to return to the private sector early this year.

Mr. Cartwright, 58 years old, is a partner at the law firm of Latham & Watkins, in California, where he chaired the firm's public company practice and was one of five partners responsible for managing the firm. He holds a law degree from Harvard Law School, where he was President of the Harvard Law Review and winner of the Sears Prize. He served as law clerk to U.S. Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Malcolm R. Wilkey of the D.C. Circuit.

Before becoming a lawyer, Mr. Cartwright had a career as an astrophysicist. After graduating from Yale University, he earned a Ph.D. in Physics from the University of Chicago and worked as a research physicist at the University of California at Berkeley's space sciences laboratory. He published numerous articles in scholarly journals including the Astrophysical Journal.

In a prepared statement announcing the appointment, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox predicted Mr. Cartwright would be a powerful champion for investors.

"His talent, tenacity, and insight will serve the Commission, the capital markets, and investors well," Mr. Cox said.

S.E.C. Names Counsel (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 (Reuters) - Brian G. Cartwright, a securities lawyer who was previously an astrophysicist, has been named general counsel for the Securities and Exchange Commission, the agency said on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0008024

Mr. Cartwright will take office on Jan. 23, succeeding Giovanni P. Prezioso, who said in November that he would step down this year to return to the private sector.

Mr. Cartwright, 58, is a partner at the international law firm of Latham & Watkins, which is based in California. The S.E.C. chairman, Christopher Cox, was a partner at the firm in the 1980's.

Mr. Cartwright graduated from Harvard Law School in 1980 and was a law clerk to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. He was a research physicist in astrophysics at the University of California, Berkeley, from 1973 to 1977.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Analysis: Abramoff Plea May Rock GOP Boat (SEAPI)

By tom raum

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The plea deal worked out by Jack Abramoff could send seismic waves across the political landscape in this congressional election year. The Republicans, who control Congress and the White House, are likely to take the biggest hits.

The GOP has more seats to lose and has closer ties with the former lobbyist. But some Democrats with links to Abramoff and his associates are also expected to be snagged in the influence-peddling net.

While the full dimensions of the corruption probe are not yet clear, some political consultants and analysts are already comparing its damage potential to the 1992 House banking scandal that led to the retirement or ouster of 77 lawmakers.

"You don't have to be a political genius to sniff the smell of blood in the water," said GOP consultant Rich Galen.

Galen said even lawmakers in seemingly safe districts, and those "who don't have a reputation for being fast and loose with the rules," could be vulnerable if voters rise up in reproach "and everybody drops five or six points" in this year's midterm contests.

Abramoff, a former $100,000-plus fundraiser for President Bush with close ties to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, pleaded guilty on Tuesday to conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud. That cleared the way for his cooperation with federal prosecutors in bringing charges against former business and political associates.

The investigation is believed to involve up to 20 members of Congress and aides and possibly several administration officials.

The timing couldn't be worse, politically, especially for Republicans. Lawmakers who may be indicted could find themselves coming to trial this summer, just ahead of the midterm elections. Around the same time, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is expected to stand trial in the CIA leak case.

DeLay, who had to step down as majority leader in September after a grand jury in Texas indicted him in a campaign finance investigation, is awaiting a trial date. And former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., gave up his seat Dec. 1 after admitting he had accepted $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors.

With so many trials and prosecutions in the works, speculation is swirling over whom Abramoff might bring down and on the possible fallout for others.

"Most seats in Congress are relatively safe this year. But they are not safe from a tsunami," said University of Virginia political scientist Larry Sabato, author of a book on political scandals. "Iraq, plus economic problems, plus these scandals, could produce a tsunami. That's what every incumbent on Capitol Hill has to fear."

Most Americans are convinced that corruption reaching into all levels of government is a deeply rooted problem. According to an AP-Ipsos poll last month, 88 percent say the problem is a serious one, with 51 percent calling it "very serious."

People need to know "that government is not for sale," Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said in pledging to pursue the investigation "wherever it goes."

For months, federal prosecutors have focused on whether Abramoff defrauded his Indian tribal clients of millions of dollars and used improper influence on members of Congress. Tribes represented by the lobbyist contributed millions of dollars in casino income to congressional campaigns.

Abramoff also took members of Congress on lavish overseas trips and provided sports tickets, golf fees, frequent meals, entertainment and jobs for lawmakers' relatives and aides.

Some lawmakers have already returned contributions. Others no doubt are nervously scouring their memories and appointment books.

For years, many lawmakers have shrugged off lobbyists' gifts as campaign contributions, harmless wining, dining and socializing. "Now you've got someone admitting exactly what the motivation was and explaining all the avenues they used," said Kent Cooper, a former Federal Election Commission official.

DOJ_NMG_0008025

"You're talking about standard operating procedure here in Washington suddenly being turned on its head and a key operator signing a plea agreement that he may have been involved in some kind of public corruption," said Cooper, who tracks lobbying and campaign contributions for the nonpartisan Political Money Line service.

The Democratic National Committee called the situation the latest installment of a Republican "culture of corruption." That notion was disputed by White House spokesman Scott McClellan, who denounced Abramoff's activities as "outrageous" and noted that the lobbyist and his clients contributed to both parties.

That may be so, said Norman Ornstein, a political analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, "but it will disproportionately affect Republicans. They are the majority party and because Abramoff is a conservative Republican."

Case Bringing New Scrutiny To A System And A Profession (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

The biggest corruption scandal to infect Congress in a generation took down one of the best-connected lobbyists in Washington yesterday. The questions echoing around the capital were what other careers -- and what other familiar ways of doing business -- are endangered.

Jack Abramoff represented the most flamboyant and extreme example of a brand of influence trading that flourished after the Republican takeover of the House of Representatives 11 years ago. Now, some GOP strategists fear that the fallout from his case could affect the party's efforts to keep control in the November midterm elections.

Abramoff was among the lobbyists most closely associated with the K Street Project, which was initiated by his friend Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), now the former House majority leader, once the GOP vaulted to power. It was an aggressive program designed to force corporations and trade associations to hire more GOP-connected lobbyists in what at times became an almost seamless relationship between Capitol Hill lawmakers and some firms that sought to influence them.

Now Abramoff has become a symbol of a system out of control. His agreement to plead guilty to three criminal counts and cooperate with prosecutors threatens to ensnare other lawmakers or their aides -- Republicans and possibly some Democrats. At a minimum, yesterday's developments put both sides of the lawmaker-lobbyist relationship on notice that some of the wilder customs of recent years -- lubricated with money, entertainment and access -- carry higher risks. In the post-Abramoff era, what once was accepted as business as usual may be seen as questionable or worse.

"In the short run, members of Congress will get allergic to lobbyists," said former representative Vin Weber (R-Minn.), now a lobbyist for Clark & Weinstock. "They'll be nervous about taking calls and holding meetings, to say nothing of lavish trips to Scotland. Those will be out. For a period of time now, members of Congress will be concerned about even legitimate contact with the lobbying world."

The initial impact of a scandal that earlier produced a guilty plea from Abramoff associate Michael Scanlon could be changes in the way lawmakers and lobbyists interact. In the longer term, said many lobbyists and others, Congress will be pressured to revisit and toughen rules on gifts and travel that lawmakers and members of their staffs may accept. Some former lawmakers said even bigger changes may be needed to restore public confidence in how Washington works.

Former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who with Weber's help effectively used issues of corruption to wrest control of the House from the Democrats in 1994, said the Abramoff scandal should trigger a broader review in Congress of the way politicians finance campaigns and deal with lobbyists.

"I'm going to talk at length about the need for us to rethink not just lobbying but the whole process of elections, incumbency protection and the way in which the system has evolved," he said. "Which is very different from the way the American system is supposed to be like. I think Abramoff is just part of a large pattern that has got to be rethought."

Emotions ran high on K Street yesterday when news of Abramoff's plea deal began to break. "The Abramoff scandal is causing a reexamination of what lobbyists do in town," said R. Bruce Josten, executive vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "I wouldn't be surprised to see lawmakers become cautious in meetings with lobbyists."

With an eye on November's elections, Republicans have sought to limit the damage to themselves by portraying the scandal as bipartisan, describing Abramoff as an equal-opportunity dispenser of campaign cash and largess.

So far, the public has not identified corruption as solely a Republican problem. A Washington Post-ABC News poll in November asked Americans whether they thought Democrats or Republicans were better on ethical matters; 16 percent said Democrats, 12 percent said Republicans, and 71 percent said there was not much difference between the parties.

But Republicans worry about two possibilities. The first is that Abramoff, known for his close ties to DeLay, mostly implicates Republicans as a result of his plea agreement. That could shift public attitudes sharply against the GOP. "People are uneasy about what else is out there," said one GOP strategist who requested anonymity to speak more candidly about the possible political fallout.

DOJ_NMG_0008026

Beyond that is a fear that the scandal and attention it could draw in the months before the election might further sour the public on Washington and Congress. As the party in power, Republicans know they stand to lose more if voters take retribution in November.

Regardless of the electoral implications, the Abramoff scandal may force changes on Capitol Hill in the form of tough new lobbying disclosure laws that even some lobbying advocates say it is time to consider. "There will be a push for increased oversight and disclosure of lobbying," said Douglas G. Pinkham, president of the Public Affairs Council, a lobbyist education group. "There needs to be greater transparency and better enforcement."

Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), who co-wrote campaign finance changes a few years ago, have introduced separate proposals that would crack down hard on lobbying as now practiced. Their ideas will serve as the starting point for what is expected to be a vigorous debate.

Some lobbyists reacted defensively yesterday, at pains to say that Abramoff was an exception to the way they do business. "The Abramoff style is so far afield from the normal course of business as to be irrelevant to me and probably most people in my line of work," said Joel Johnson, a Clinton White House official and now a lobbyist for the Glover Park Group.

"The whole Abramoff matter is atypical," agreed Ed Rogers of Barbour Griffith & Rogers. "It is not a lesson of how business is done in Washington."

John Jonas, a lobbyist at Patton Boggs, said he expects "less partying, less gifting, more awareness about compliance" with rules that have been "observed in the breach."

As for the perception of lobbying as a profession, "it's confirmed everybody's worst fears about lobbyists -- that they double-deal, that they're not aboveboard," Jonas said. "That hurts the legitimate practice of the profession."

Gingrich said Republican leaders in Congress should take the initiative to reform lobbying and campaign finance, rather than hoping to slip quietly past the current scandal. "Things have to be done to really rethink where the center of the political process is," he said. "Right now, the center is a lobbying and PAC [political action committee] system center, which is not healthy."

GOP Leaders Seek Distance From Abramoff (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

With a House Republican committee chairman implicated in the criminal case and the highest echelons of the Republican Party increasingly vulnerable to charges, GOP leaders moved yesterday to distance themselves from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and prepare to combat a growing corruption scandal.

Hours after Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion charges, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) announced that he will donate to charity the tens of thousands of dollars that he has received from Abramoff's Indian tribe clients. Top Republican strategists pushed GOP leaders to embrace legislation to curb the influence of lobbyists.

And former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) called on House Republicans to elect a new majority leader to permanently replace Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), Abramoff's most powerful ally in Washington, who faces a trial on unrelated criminal charges of violating Texas campaign laws.

"Unequivocally, the House Republicans need to select a new majority leader in late January or early February," said Gingrich, who cited revelations in The Washington Post that a public advocacy group organized by DeLay associates had been largely financed by Russian energy interests.

The plea agreement signed by Abramoff yesterday implicates only one lawmaker, Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), but it indicates that future revelations would ensnare other public officials. The agreement refers broadly to trips, campaign contributions and entertainment offered to public officials "in exchange for agreements that the public officials would use their official positions and influence" for Abramoff's benefit. That suggests there were specific quid pro quos that could yield additional charges of bribery and public corruption.

Ney, the chairman of the House Administration Committee, which oversees the operations of the House, is never referenced by name, although Ney's spokesman confirmed that Ney is the "Representative #1" repeatedly mentioned in court documents outlining Abramoff's wrongdoing. The court documents depict "Representative #1" as accepting lavish gifts of travel, meals, entertainment and campaign contributions, then awarding congressional contracts to Abramoff's clients, inserting a statement of support in the Congressional Record, and even obtaining a travel visa for a relative of one of Abramoff's clients while in Russia on official business.

Ney spokesman Brian Walsh denied the charges, saying any official actions Ney had taken were based on "the merits and facts of the situation and not because of any improper influence from Jack Abramoff or anybody else."

DOJ_NMG_0008027

"At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Ney said in a statement.

Republican strategists expressed some relief that the damage could be limited. Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said that if Abramoff's revelations ensnare only one lawmaker and some unknown staff members, Democrats will have little chance of sparking a political revolt when voters go to the polls in November to elect a new Congress.

But now that Abramoff has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors in exchange for a lighter prison sentence, he could provide testimony highly damaging to other high-level lawmakers. DeLay is not mentioned, but court documents do single out his former deputy chief of staff, Tony C. Rudy. The documents detail 10 monthly payments totaling $50,000 that went to the wife of an aide identified as "Staffer A." In exchange, that aide, identified elsewhere as Rudy, helped torpedo Internet gambling legislation and a postal-rate increase, according to Abramoff's plea agreement.

Moreover, numerous references to Abramoff-financed trips to Scotland and the Northern Mariana Islands raised anew questions about DeLay's own trips to both locations with Abramoff.

Dick DeGuerin, an attorney for DeLay, said he is not concerned about the Abramoff investigation. DeLay has offered to cooperate with the Justice Department probe and has not been called in, he said.

"If Jack Abramoff tells the truth, what he'll do is clear the air, and everyone will see there's no connection between Jack Abramoff's money-dealing and Tom DeLay," DeGuerin said.

Yesterday, Travis County prosecutor Ronnie Earle, who has been overseeing the probe into illegal corporate donations in Texas, tried to find that connection by sending subpoenas to Abramoff's two former employers in Washington, seeking documents and any correspondence involving DeLay and certain contributions by Abramoff clients.

The subpoenas are based on evidence that the law firm Preston Gates Ellis LLP and several Abramoff clients, including the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, made donations to Texans for a Republican Majority, a political action committee organized by DeLay and his associates. That committee has been indicted on charges of illegally using corporate funds, and Earle now appears to be seeking information on what the donors expected to get in return for their payments.

Even before the plea agreement was unveiled, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had circulated a 1997 quote from DeLay hailing Abramoff as "one of my closest and dearest friends."

"Tom DeLay was majority leader of the House of Representatives," said DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), "and Tom DeLay said Jack Abramoff was his best friend, nobody else."

But Democrats could be ensnared by the Abramoff case, as well. The lobbyist oversaw at the law firm Greenberg Traurig LLP a team of two dozen lobbyists that included many Democrats. The biggest beneficiaries of campaign contributions directed by the Abramoff team included such high-ranking Democrats as then-Sen. Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.), Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) and Rep. Patrick J. Kennedy (R.I.), a former head of the House Democrats' campaign committee.

Some key Republican strategists have complained that GOP leaders have been slow in responding to a scandal that has been unfolding for months and in holding internal elections to permanently replace DeLay in the House leadership.

With Abramoff's plea, that may change. In November, The Post detailed a fundraiser held by Hastert at one of Abramoff's restaurants that netted from the lobbyist's law firm and tribal clients at least $21,500 for the speaker's political action committee. Since then, numerous lawmakers from both parties have returned such donations, but only yesterday did Hastert join the line.

"While these contributions were legal, he believes that it is appropriate to donate the money to charity," said Ron Bonjean, Hastert's spokesman.

Lobbying Plan Was Central To GOP's Political Strategy (LAT)

By Janet Hook And Mary Curtius

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The corruption investigation surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff shows the significant political risk that Republican leaders took when they adopted what had once seemed a brilliant strategy for dominating Washington: turning the K Street lobbying corridor into a cog of the GOP political machine.

Abramoff thrived in the political climate fostered by GOP leaders, including Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), who have methodically tried to tighten the links between the party in Congress and business lobbyists, through what has become known as the "K Street Project."

GOP leaders, seeking to harness the financial and political support of K Street, urged lobbyists to support their conservative agenda, give heavily to Republican politicians and hire Republicans for top trade association jobs. Abramoff obliged on every front, and his tentacles of influence reached deep into the upper echelons of Congress and the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0008028

Now, in the wake of a plea agreement in which Abramoff will cooperate in an influence-peddling investigation that might target a number of lawmakers, some Republicans are saying that the party will need to take action to avoid being tarnished.

"This is going to be a huge black eye for our party," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), a senior member close to House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). "Denny's going to have to be very tough and really speak out against people who are indicted. He's going to have to do it quickly and decisively and frequently."

Hastert moved Tuesday to inoculate himself from the scandal by announcing that he would give to charity about $60,000 he received from Abramoff and his clients. He is the latest of several lawmakers who have returned or redirected money they received from Abramoff-related sources.

One Senate Republican aide, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Republicans soon will unveil ethics reform legislation in an effort to blunt criticism from Democrats that they have fostered a "culture of corruption" in Washington.

The controversy may also increase the prospect that Republicans will shake up their leadership after Congress reconvenes at the end of January. House Republican moderates are calling for new leadership elections to permanently replace DeLay, who stepped down temporarily as majority leader after he was indicted in an unrelated case.

"Let's get a permanent leadership and begin moving forward and overcome the problems that are on the table right now," said Sarah Chamberlain Resnick, executive director of the Republican Main Street Partnership, a caucus of GOP moderates in Congress.

Conservatives are worried about possible political fallout for all Republicans, not just those who might be implicated, once Abramoff starts cooperating with prosecutors.

"This is the one thing that could result in a change in who controls the Congress," said Paul Weyrich, a conservative activist.

Abramoff pleaded guilty Tuesday to corruption charges in connection with allegations that he bilked his Indian tribe clients and conspired to bribe a member of Congress. He also will plead guilty to charges in a separate case in Miami, in connection with a deal to buy a floating casino fleet, SunCruz Casinos.

Although Abramoff admitted Tuesday to illegal conduct in some of his dealings, much of what he did to influence Congress amounted to larger-than-life versions of legal practices common among lobbyists.

Abramoff did not just ply lawmakers with meals; he opened a restaurant and plied them with his meals. He did not simply hand out tickets to sporting events; he offered access to several luxury skyboxes. He did not arrange garden-variety golf outings; he brought golfers to the world's most exclusive courses.

"The connections between Congress, congressional staff and lobbyists have been a problem for many years," said Dennis Thompson, author of the book "Ethics in Congress."

"In the last few years it's gotten out of control," Thompson said. "But Abramoff has taken it to a new level."

For investigators, the question is whether any lawmakers returned Abramoff's favors by using their offices to benefit him or his clients, which could violate federal law.

Critics of the campaign finance system say it would be a kind of rough justice if Republicans were hobbled by their relationships with a lobbyist, because they worked so hard to increase coordination between their party and K Street.

Republicans said their efforts were no different than what Democrats did for years to raise money and organize support from their constituencies, including labor unions and civil rights advocates. But Democratic critics said the GOP went much further in linking political money to policy outcomes, and that Abramoff was a master at maneuvering in a system that required lobbyists to "pay to play" on Capitol Hill.

"Jack Abramoff is a classic example of the pay-to-play system carried out in the extreme," said Fred Wertheimer, head of Democracy 21, a campaign-finance watchdog group.

According to a study by the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics, 296 members of Congress since 1999 have received contributions from Abramoff, his Indian tribe clients or SunCruz Casinos. Abramoff and his wife contributed $204,253 — all of it to Republicans.

In addition, Abramoff also leaned on his Indian clients to give to key lawmakers. The center found that Abramoff's clients gave almost $4.2 million, more than half to Republicans.

His most famous golf outings took members, including DeLay and Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), to the fabled St. Andrews course in Scotland. Such trips are against House rules if they are paid for by a lobbyist. DeLay and Ney said they believed the trips were properly paid for by a nonprofit group, but prosecutors are reportedly looking at whether Abramoff initially picked up some of the expenses.

Favors done for DeLay and Ney have drawn particular scrutiny because they took aggressive steps to help Abramoff or his clients on issues that seemed remote from their own constituents' interests. When Abramoff was trying to buy the Florida floating casino fleet, Ney inserted a statement in the Congressional Record critical of Abramoff's rival.

Abramoff had been hired to stall legislation raising the minimum wage for the U.S.-administered Northern Mariana Islands in the Pacific Ocean, and DeLay was credited with helping him do so. DeLay also was an ally in Abramoff's effort to fight legislation to allow the taxation of Indian tribe gaming revenue.

DeLay and Ney, like other lawmakers who helped Abramoff, said they took action on the merits, not because they received favors from him.

The last time Washington lobbying came under such broad legal scrutiny was in the Abscam scandal of 1980, when an FBI sting operation led to the conviction of seven members of Congress on corruption charges.

That episode was widely viewed as a scandal involving isolated individuals, the proverbial "bad apples."

But some critics of the current campaign finance system say that the Abramoff scandal could have broader significance if it is seen as an indictment of a corrupt political system, not just individuals.

Abramoff Pleads Guilty, Will Cooperate (AP)

By Mark Sherman and Curt Anderson

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist who spawned a congressional corruption scandal, pleaded guilty Tuesday to three felonies and pledged to cooperate in a criminal probe edging closer to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay.

"I plead guilty, your honor," Abramoff said in flat, unemotional tones, accepting a plea bargain that said he had provided lavish trips, golf outings, meals and more to public officials "in exchange for a series of official acts."

In one case, he reported payments totaling $50,000 to the wife of a congressional aide to help block legislation for a client. The aide worked for DeLay, according to officials who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Public corruption aside, Abramoff admitted defrauding four Indian tribes and other clients, taking millions in kickbacks from a one-time business partner, misusing a charity he had established and failing to pay income taxes on millions of ill-gotten gains.

(AP) Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division Alice Fisher briefs reporters at the Justice...

Full ImageHe is expected to plead guilty to additional charges on Wednesday in Florida in connection with charges stemming from the 2000 purchase of a fleet of gambling boats.

At the Justice Department, officials said they intend to make use of the trove of e-mails and other material in Abramoff's possession as part of a probe that is believed to be focusing on as many as 20 members of Congress and aides.

"This investigation continues ... however long it takes, wherever it leads," said Alice Fisher, assistant attorney general.

Whatever the legal ramifications, there was swift political fallout at the dawn of an election year in which minority Democrats intend to make ethics a campaign issue.

In a turnabout, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., joined the roster of politicians announcing plans to donate Abramoff's campaign contributions to charity.

(AP) Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division Alice Fisher briefs reporters at the Justice...

Full ImageHouse Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said Abramoff's confession in court was "not a surprise because this Republican Congress is the most corrupt in history and the American people are paying the price."

Abramoff faces as much as 11 years in federal prison as well as fines in connection with his guilty pleas on charges of conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. The precise penalty is to be determined in part by the extent of his cooperation with prosecutors. Together with his former business partner, Michael Scanlon, he is expected to face restitution costs of $25 million.

Abramoff also will be required to pay $1.7 million for unpaid taxes, officials said.

Scanlon pleaded guilty last November to corruption charges as part of the investigation that began 21 months ago.

The Bush administration's former chief procurement official, David H. Safavian, was charged last fall with making false statements and obstructing investigations into a 2002 golf outing. He has pleaded innocent.

(AP) Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division Alice Fisher briefs reporters at the Justice...

Full ImageThe court papers released in connection with Tuesday's plea offered these glimpses into Abramoff's activities:

- On behalf of clients eager to stop internet gambling and postal rate legislation, Abramoff paid $50,000 in 10 equal monthly payments beginning in June 2000 to the wife of a congressional aide identified as Staffer A. Based on other information made public, Staffer A was Tony Rudy, at the time a top aide to DeLay. His identity was confirmed by officials who spoke only on condition of anonymity, noting that the court papers did not name the aide.

DeLay's office had no immediate comment. The congressman has previously said any actions he took on legislation were consistent with his political philosophy.

Separately, DeLay is fighting state campaign finance charges in Texas, hoping to clear himself in time to reclaim his leadership post in Congress.

- Abramoff contradicted statements by Rep. Bob Ney, saying the Ohio Republican accepted a golfing trip to Scotland in 2002 with the knowledge that the lobbyist's Indian clients were paying for it. Ney is not mentioned by name, but his identity is clear from a description of his committee chairmanship. Ney issued a statement saying, "At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature" of his activities.

(AP) Jack Abramoff leaves Federal Court in Washington Tuesday, Jan. 3, 2006. The once-powerful lobbyist...

Full Image- Abramoff also said he had made a $10,000 donation to the National Republican Campaign Committee at Ney's request, part of what the plea agreement refers to as the "corruption of public officials."

- Court documents said Abramoff solicited $50,000 from a wireless telephone company and got Ney's agreement to push the company's application to install a wireless telephone infrastructure in the House of Representatives, a job Ney's committee would have overseen.

At the Justice Department, Fisher said that in one instance, "Abramoff was so bold as to take fees to assist one client when he was actually working for another client to defeat the first client's interests." Those clients were Indian tribes were from Texas and Louisiana, and the issue involved casino gambling.

Apart from his lobbying in Congress, Abramoff raised at least $100,000 for President Bush's 2004 re-election effort, earning the honorary title "pioneer" from the campaign.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said he could not say whether Abramoff ever met Bush. McClellan said of Abramoff: "What he is reportedly acknowledging doing is unacceptable and outrageous."

(AP) Internal Revenue Service Commissioner Mark Emerson responds to questions from reporters at the...

Full Image"If laws were broken, he must be held to account for what he did," McClellan said.

Once a well-connected lobbyist able to command almost unimaginable fees - a Louisiana tribe once paid Scanlon and him more than $30 million over 26 months - Abramoff apologized after pleading guilty.

"Words will not ever be able to express my sorrow and my profound regret for all my actions and mistakes," he said. "I hope I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and those I've wronged or caused to suffer."

Pressure had been intensifying on Abramoff to strike a deal with prosecutors since another former partner, Adam Kidan, pleaded guilty last month to fraud and conspiracy in connection with the 2000 SunCruz boat deal in Florida.

Capitol Offense Guilty Plea By Lobbyist Raises Prospect Of Wider Investigation (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins, David Rogers And Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Prominent Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to three felonies and agreed to help prosecutors probing political corruption, raising the possibility of a wider investigation that could embroil powerful members of Congress.

Yet the fact that some Democrats also had dealings with Mr. Abramoff clouded the question of whether the scandal will have a sharp partisan impact in the November 2006 midterm elections.

Making the bribery case especially striking -- and worrisome for members of Congress -- is that some of its elements include transactions that occur in Washington every day. It is commonplace for lawmakers to solicit campaign donations from lobbyists, who routinely offer them in hopes of gaining advantage. Yet Mr. Abramoff also went far beyond routine practice by furnishing lawmakers with lavish trips, free meals and entertainment as well.

It remains unclear which lawmakers prosecutors are looking at, and also how persuasive Mr. Abramoff could be in helping to make potential cases against any of them stick. A onetime chairman of College Republicans -- a close ally of such party luminaries as Tom DeLay, Ralph Reed and Grover Norquist -- Mr. Abramoff says he has information that could implicate 60 lawmakers.

"The case is significant and the corruption scheme with Mr. Abramoff is very extensive," said Alice Fisher, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's criminal division, at a news conference. She said prosecutors "will continue to follow it wherever it leads."

The plea deal follows a 21-month Justice Department investigation of whether Mr. Abramoff offered lawmakers and their aides gifts in exchange for helping his lobbying clients in Congress. Besides conspiring to bribe legislators this way, Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty to bilking Indian tribes who were his lobbying clients, by arranging kickbacks from associates.

The sums he and several associates collected from Indian tribes and other clients evidently were huge. For the period 2001-2004 alone, those fees topped $80 million, investigators say. Mr. Abramoff also pleaded guilty to tax evasion.

The criminal information (used in lieu of an indictment) discussed only one legislator, citing this person as having been "provided a stream of things of value" in return for official favors. It said the things provided included campaign donations, a lavish golf trip to Scotland, tickets to sporting events and other entertainments, and regular meals at a pricey Washington restaurant called Signatures that Mr. Abramoff once owned. (See the document1.)

Though the filing didn't name the congressman, the information pointed to Rep. Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican, and his office has acknowledged that he is the one meant. Rep. Ney, chairman of the House Administration Committee, said he helped Mr. Abramoff's clients on the merits, not because of any improper influence.

Lawyers involved in the case say that prosecutors are looking at Mr. Abramoff's dealings with at least three other members of Congress and more than a dozen current and former congressional aides. That in itself would make this the broadest federal corruption case involving Congress since Abscam, more than two decades ago, which resulted in bribery convictions of six lawmakers. Abscam was a probe in which Federal Bureau of Investigation agents posed as Arab sheiks or their representatives and offered bribes to members of Congress, transactions secretly filmed in some cases.

In a more recent case, Republican Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham of California resigned from Congress in November after pleading guilty to receiving $2.4 million in bribes from military contractors and evading more than $1 million in taxes.

At a minimum, Mr. Abramoff's plea agreement increases political pressure on Mr. DeLay, the Texas Republican who has stepped aside as House Majority Leader while under indictment in an unrelated corruption investigation in his home state. Former DeLay press secretary Michael Scanlon, later a business associate of Mr. Abramoff, pleaded guilty in late November to joining in a fraud and bribery scheme with Mr. Abramoff.

Mr. Abramoff's plea deal twice refers to another onetime DeLay aide, Tony Rudy, who later worked as a lobbyist under Mr. Abramoff. In the plea arrangement, Mr. Abramoff said he and lobbying partners of his attempted to bribe Mr. Rudy by paying his wife $50,000 in 10 equal payments from June 2000 to February 2001. Mr. Abramoff sought, in return, help both in stopping legislation regarding Internet gambling and in opposing postal rate increases, according to documents filed yesterday.

In fact, an Internet gambling bill failed in the House late that summer. And the alleged payments also followed a controversial golf trip by Mr. DeLay to Scotland in June 2000 organized by Mr. Abramoff, who hired an Arizona golf-tour company to make the arrangements.

Mr. DeLay said he had thought the trip was financed by a nonprofit conservative group, the National Center for Public Policy Research, not by Mr. Abramoff or his clients. But House gift rules say such trips are acceptable only if they are principally designed for information gathering; instead, records reviewed by The Wall Street Journal indicate that recreation was the principal reason for the Scottish leg of Mr. DeLay's trip to Britain that June.

Former DeLay staffers say Mr. Rudy was a principal contact for Mr. Abramoff in the leadership's office, and Amy Ridenour, the center's president, has said she is "somewhat hazy about how Scotland got into it." Mr. Rudy, who has retained a defense attorney, didn't immediately return calls seeking comment.

Richard Cullen, an attorney for Mr. DeLay, said that he "encourages people who have information to cooperate and tell the truth and has full confidence he will be exonerated."

There were immediate signs from some Republicans that Mr. Abramoff's plea might sink Mr. DeLay's hopes of reclaiming his post as majority leader. He has sought to put off election for a successor while he tries to gain vindication on the charges against him in Texas. But Republican Rep. Jim Leach of Iowa said the party would be "insane" not to move ahead with new elections. "This is arguably one of the most troubling scandals in modern times and it reflects very poorly on the Congress," Mr. Leach said.

Important Question

The most important political question is whether the case reflects equally poorly on both parties -- or boosts the Democrats' fight to reclaim control of Congress in November's elections. As the public's attitude toward Congress and the Bush administration soured throughout 2005, Democrats built a significant lead when Americans were asked which party they wanted to control Capitol Hill. In December's Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 46% preferred Democrats to be in charge; 38% said the Republicans.

Yet the same survey showed that public skepticism about politicians' integrity is bipartisan. Roughly eight in 10 called corruption "equally a problem among both parties," raising questions about whether Democrats can make headway with their argument that Republican rule has created "a culture of corruption."

"I do think it will have a dramatic effect on future elections for both parties," said Rep. Wayne Gilchrest, a Republican moderate from Maryland. "Part of it is going to be anti-incumbent. Part of it will be people who don't vote because there's no hope. Part of it will be disgust with Republicans, who seem to be indicted every other week." Democrats argue that even a general anti-incumbent backlash could benefit them, since Republicans now hold more seats.

Aside from Messrs. DeLay and Ney, prosecutors are believed to be examining two Republican lawmakers for their dealings with Mr. Abramoff, as well as more than a dozen current and former congressional aides. One is Rep. John Doolittle of California. A spokeswoman for Rep. Doolittle has dismissed as "simply ridiculous" the idea that he "had some improper involvement" with Mr. Abramoff.

The other Republican lawmaker prosecutors are believed to be looking at is Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana. Mr. Burns, the largest Senate recipient of campaign donations from Mr. Abramoff and his clients, helped one Abramoff client get $3 million in federal money one year. In 2001, Mr. Abramoff flew two of Mr. Burns's aides to the Super Bowl; Mr. Abramoff also hired a pair of Mr. Burns's aides.

Mr. Burns said in a statement that "I've returned or donated to charity the contributions I've received from Abramoff and his clients and associates and to date, I have not been contacted by the U.S. Justice Department." If it asks, he will cooperate in any way possible, he said.

Republicans say Mr. Abramoff's dealings with Democrats, such as Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Democratic Sen. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota, will help blunt the partisan fallout. In 2002, Messrs. Reid and Dorgan sent separate letters asking the Interior Department to block an Indian tribe in Louisiana from opening a casino that would have competed with an existing casino operated by one of Mr. Abramoff's clients. The day after Mr. Reid sent his letter, Mr. Abramoff's client, a tribe called the Coushattas, sent a $5,000 contribution to one of Mr. Reid's fund-raising groups.

A spokesman for Mr. Reid said that "he has long opposed the expansion of off-reservation Indian gaming," and any official action he took was consistent with that view. The spokesman said Mr. Reid has never met Mr. Abramoff.

In 2002, Mr. Dorgan helped one of Mr. Abramoff's clients get $3 million in federal funding, and around the same time, Mr. Dorgan received $20,000 in campaign contributions from Mr. Abramoff's firm and clients. In fall 2003, Mr. Dorgan pushed Congress to consider granting federal recognition to a Massachusetts tribe that was an Abramoff client.

Mr. Dorgan has returned some $67,000 in donations he received from members of the lobbyist's firm and its clients, though he says all were legal and that he never met Mr. Abramoff. Yesterday Mr. Dorgan issued a statement taking credit for helping to expose "the corruption of Jack Abramoff" as a leader of the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

Congress may seek to inoculate itself from the scandal this year by pursuing legislation that would reform lobbying laws. Legislation proposed by Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain would require lobbyists to disclose more about their contacts with members of Congress and congressional aides. Other proposals would bar lawmakers and aides from accepting meals or gifts from lobbyists.

Mr. Abramoff faced a maximum sentence of 30 years, but under the terms of his plea agreement that is likely to be reduced to between 9 and 11 years, the Justice Department said. That sentence could be reduced further, depending on the level of cooperation he provides in the case, which began in March 2004. Mr. Abramoff agreed to pay $25 million in restitution to the Indian tribes he admitted defrauding and pay $1.7 million to the Internal Revenue Service for taxes he had avoided.

"Words will not be able to ever express how sorry I am for this," Mr. Abramoff said in court as he offered his plea. "I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused."

According to the plea arrangement, Mr. Abramoff beginning in 2000 offered "Representative #1" and his staffers tickets to the Super Bowl, campaign contributions, meals and drinks and frequent "golf and related expenses" at Washington-area courses. In exchange, the agreement states, Representative #1 helped Mr. Abramoff and his clients 11 times.

In August 2001, it says, the legislator "used his position as chairman of a committee of the House to endorse and support a client of Abramoff as the provider of wireless telephone infrastructure to the House of Representatives." The legislator also helped Mr. Abramoff buy a casino-boat chain in Florida in 2000 and tried to add language to a bill that would have helped one of Mr. Abramoff's Native American clients, the plea deal says.

Rep. Ney, the man acknowledged by his own office to be Representative #1, said that "at the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities." A spokesman said Mr. Ney would "absolutely not" step aside as chairman of the House Administration Committee. The committee oversees election law as well as the day-to-day operations of the House. Mr. Ney, a former teacher, has represented a district in east-central Ohio since winning election in the Republicans' 1994 midterm election sweep.

'One Step at a Time'

Experts in Washington corruption cases said the language of the Abramoff plea deal makes clear the investigation will reach further. "It's not limited to Ney. The charges speak of 'public officials,' " said Stanley Brand, a veteran defense attorney and former Democratic counsel in the House. "It's a very, very tightly knit set of charges. They are not over pleading these cases. They are going one step at a time."

Campaign contributions aren't illegal unless there is an express agreement that the money is being paid in exchange for a particular action. That's one element that makes public-corruption cases difficult to bring, say former prosecutors. Unlike a crime such as robbery, there is often no clearly identifiable victim and usually little reason for either side to cooperate with law enforcement. That's what makes the deal with Mr. Abramoff key to what Justice Department officials describe as a wide-ranging, ongoing investigation.

Enlisting his testimony "is a huge break," said Randall Eliason, a law professor at American University and former head of the public-corruption unit for the U.S. Attorney's office in Washington. "He was in the meetings. He was there when the deals, if any, took place and can say, 'I gave him this in exchange for this official action.' "

Prosecutors will need significant corroborating evidence to prove potential charges against Mr. Ney or other members of Congress. The lobbyists' guilty pleas themselves can be used by defense lawyers to impeach Mr. Abramoff's credibility, adding to the Justice Department's challenge in building additional cases.

The FBI has been engaged in an aggressive crackdown on public corruption, officials say. In the past two years, the bureau has helped convict more than 1,050 government employees accused of corrupt activities, including 177 federal officials.

US Lobbyist Admits Fraud And Bribe Plot (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

Jack Abramoff, the Republican lobbyist and central figure in an influence-peddling scandal with reverberations throughout Washington, on Tuesday pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges and agreed to help prosecutors investigate the activities of top US lawmakers including Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader.

Mr Abramoff on Tuesday pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. He admitted to conspiring to defraud his lobbying clients, and trying to bribe lawmakers and congressional aides with campaign contributions, meals, trips and sports tickets. He is expected to serve about 10 years in prison.

According to the charges filed on Tuesday, Mr Abramoff and a former aide to Mr DeLay, Michael Scanlon, overbilled several Indian tribes who were their clients. They then diverted the money either into their own pockets, or used it to provide what the charges said was “a stream of things of value”, including a lavish golfing trip to Scotland, for a lawmaker and his staff.

No politicians are named in the papers filed on Tuesday by the Justice Department but prosecutors are understood to be investigating at least a dozen lawmakers, congressional aides and lobbyists, including Mr DeLay and Bob Ney of Ohio, a fellow Republican lawmaker.

Mr Abramoff’s long-awaited decision to plead guilty and co-operate with federal investigators will give the Justice Department powerful new ammunition in its probe of alleged patterns of corruption and bribery within the ranks of the Republican leadership.

Democrats are hoping to exploit the perception of a “culture of corruption” among Republican leaders in the November congressional elections, although some Democrats also received campaign contributions from Mr Abramoff.

The charges on Tuesday said: “It was a purpose of the conspiracy for defendant Abramoff, Scanlon and others to enrich themselves by obtaining substantial funds from their clients through fraud and concealment.”

Some of these funds were used to try to influence an unnamed congressman to “perform a series of official acts” including passing legislation.

Sports tickets and meals at Mr Abramoff’s upmarket Washington restaurant were lavished on lawmakers. “His activities went far beyond lawful lobbying,” said Alice Fisher, a top Justice Department official.

Tuesday’s charges are separate from charges pending against Mr Abramoff in Florida. He is expected to plead guilty to those as well.

Scott McClellan, White House spokesman, said that, “if laws were broken, [Mr Abramoff] must be held to account for what he did”.

Tremors Across Washington As Lobbyist Will Aid Inquiry (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - As a high-flying Republican lobbyist, Jack Abramoff has long been known as a mover and shaker in Washington. But when he cut a deal with federal prosecutors on Tuesday, he shook up this town as never before.

Not long ago, Mr. Abramoff was perhaps Washington's most aggressive - and, at $750 an hour, most highly compensated - deal maker, a flamboyant man who moved fluidly through the nexus of money and power. Now his decision to cooperate in a broadening corruption and bribery investigation has thrust him into the role of a corporate insider turning against the company that claimed just to be doing business as usual.

Even before Mr. Abramoff left the federal courthouse on Tuesday in a trench coat and fedora, nervous lawmakers of both parties, and even the White House, began trying to distance themselves from him.

DOJ_NMG_0008034

Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois announced that he would donate to charity $69,000 in campaign contributions directed to him by Mr. Abramoff.

The plea bargain also had immediate ripple effects for a lawmaker who was once Mr. Abramoff's closest ally in the Republican leadership, Representative Tom DeLay of Texas. Mr. DeLay, indicted on a count of money laundering in a separate campaign-related case in Texas, is trying to regain his post as House majority leader, but Mr. Abramoff's plea complicates his prospects.

Mr. Abramoff, 46, pleaded guilty to charges of conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion, and prosecutors said he used campaign contributions, lavish trips, meals and other perks to influence lawmakers and their aides. Court papers filed on Tuesday singled out just one member of Congress, "Representative No. 1," identified elsewhere as Representative Bob Ney, Republican of Ohio.

But that was cold comfort on Capitol Hill, where there was a sense of lawmakers and lobbyists' waiting for the other shoe to drop. In a city whose history is rife with scandal and the political price it exacts, from the F.B.I. sting operation known as Abscam to the savings and loans collapse involving "the Keating Five," some experts feared that the Abramoff investigation would eclipse all the rest.

While Mr. Abramoff is most closely linked to Republicans, even Democrats, many of whom also benefited from his largesse, acted skittish.

"We're talking about people who have longstanding careers in Congress who took contributions from somebody who knew somebody who knew somebody who knew Jack Abramoff," said a Democratic Congressional aide who insisted on anonymity so as not to drag his boss into the scandal. "Now they're panicked. The hope is that this investigation will root out the wrongdoing without innocent people getting hit with the ricochet."

Mr. Abramoff's plea bargain is scary to Washington's power brokers precisely because he was so entangled with so many of them.

His ties to Grover G. Norquist, a leading conservative strategist and president of Americans for Tax Reform, and Ralph Reed, the former director of the Christian Coalition who is now a candidate for lieutenant governor in Georgia, date from his college days.

He once worked as a lobbyist alongside David H. Safavian, who was the head of the White House procurement office until just before his arrest last fall in the Abramoff investigation. And Mr. Abramoff's former personal assistant once worked for Karl Rove, President Bush's chief political strategist.

At the White House, administration officials have been reluctant to comment on the case, referring questions to the Justice Department and declining to defend Mr. Safavian. But on Tuesday morning, the White House spokesman, Scott McClellan, denounced Mr. Abramoff's actions.

"What he is reportedly acknowledging doing is unacceptable and outrageous," Mr. McClellan said. "If laws were broken, he must be held to account and punished for what he did."

Some Democrats saw the plea bargain as good political news. They are trying to build their 2006 midterm campaigns around what they call the Republican "culture of corruption" and say Mr. Abramoff taps into that theme.

Minutes after his deal was announced, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, which tries to help elect Democrats to Congress, trumpeted the news on its Web site. "Breaking News: Jack Abramoff to Plead Guilty," the headline said.

Publicly, Republicans insisted that they were not worried.

"I think there may have been some nervousness, but after reading the plea agreement today and seeing that only one person was named, there's got to be a little bit of relief out there," said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

But privately, some said they were concerned that the Justice Department might try to interpret bribery statutes more broadly than in the past. They fear a lesser standard of proof could ensnare lawmakers, lobbyists and aides, current and former.

"There's a lot of talk coming out of various quarters that the Justice Department is going to pursue a different definition of bribery, meaning that if somebody were to give a gift or a campaign contribution in the same time period as a member took an official action, that in and of itself would constitute bribery," said a former Republican leadership aide who insisted on anonymity. "That scares the bejesus out of people."

A one-time Hollywood filmmaker, Mr. Abramoff began his rise in Republican power circles in the 1980's, when he was chairman of the College Republicans National Committee. His staff included Mr. Norquist and Mr. Reed.

In 1994, when the Republicans reclaimed the House after 40 years, Mr. Abramoff rose to power with them. He used his contacts with Mr. DeLay and other prominent Republicans to build a lucrative lobbying and business enterprise that, at its peak, included a fancy restaurant, Signatures, with a special kosher kitchen. His primary clients were Indian tribes, which he has now acknowledged bilking.

DOJ_NMG_0008035

From complimentary meals at his restaurant to lavish golfing trips to Scotland, including one taken by Mr. Ney and another by Mr. DeLay, to lucrative skybox tickets at Washington sports events, Mr. Abramoff's largesse seemed to know no bounds.

According to the Center for Responsive Politics, an organization that tracks campaign contributions, he has directed more than $4.4 million since 1999 to candidates and campaign committees. The money came mostly from Mr. Abramoff's clients, but also directly from him and from a casino boat company that he once owned.

On Tuesday, a spokesman for Mr. Hastert said the speaker would join a growing list of members of Congress who have returned or donated money given them by Mr. Abramoff.

"The speaker believes that while these contributions were legal, it is appropriate to donate the money to charity," said the spokesman, Ron Bonjean.

Mr. DeLay, whose former press secretary, Michael Scanlon, was Mr. Abramoff's business partner and has also been indicted in connection with the investigation, has been working furiously to resolve the Texas case before the House reconvenes on Jan. 31.

The intent was to clear his name and forestall any call for leadership elections. But Republicans say even a legal victory in Texas could be overshadowed by Mr. Abramoff's case.

A spokesman for Mr. DeLay said that the lawmaker had nothing to fear from Mr. Abramoff's plea and that it should not be a factor in whether he should resume his position as majority leader.

"Mr. DeLay has been very clear that all of his actions were properly vetted and they were promptly and publicly disclosed in accordance with House ethics rules," the spokesman, Kevin Madden, said. "So there is no reason for him to be concerned."

The investigation is prompting people inside and outside Congress to change their behavior.

Mr. Hastert has raised the possibility of new ethics training for lawmakers.

Paul Miller, president of the 700-member American League of Lobbyists, said lawmakers and lobbyists were "taking a step backward and assessing how they are doing business and how they are operating."

Even as Mr. Miller acknowledged that Mr. Abramoff's case had tarnished his industry, he took pains to dispute the idea that Mr. Abramoff deserved the description "superlobbyist," so often bestowed on him in a city where money and influence speak louder than words and where when the mighty fall they fall hard.

"Jack Abramoff," Mr. Miller said, "is nothing more than a supercrook."

The Heat Is Now On Ohio Rep. Ney (LAT)

By Richard Simon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — In 2003, Rep. Bob Ney was in the news for helping lead the push to rename the French fries in the House cafeterias "freedom fries" to protest France's refusal to back the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Now, the Ohio Republican is in the spotlight as "Representative #1" — the unnamed lawmaker in federal court documents released Tuesday who allegedly received favors from lobbyist Jack Abramoff in return for supporting legislation beneficial to one of Abramoff's clients. The documents were unveiled as part of the guilty plea Abramoff entered to several charges stemming from his lobbying activity.

Ney has repeatedly denied any wrongdoing; in a statement Tuesday, he said: "At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities."

But Abramoff's agreement to cooperate with federal investigators as part of his guilty plea raised the prospect that Ney could face indictment. At the least, the Abramoff scandal has cast a cloud over Ney's lengthy political career.

Ironically, Ney won his first elective office by defeating a Democrat who had been tainted by scandal — Wayne Hays.

Hays was serving in the Ohio Legislature when Ney upset him in 1980. Four years earlier, Hays had quit his seat in the U.S. House after Elizabeth Ray, who was on the payroll of the committee he headed, said she was being paid to serve as his mistress. At the time. Ray famously said she could not type or "even answer the phone."

Ney, 51, won his House seat in 1994, when a GOP landslide gave Republicans control of the House and Senate for the first time in 40 years.

In 2001, he became head of the Committee on House Administration, a position that deals with chores that capture little public attention but are important to colleagues, such as overseeing parking on Capitol Hill.

It was in his role as the panel's chairman that he ordered the name change for French fries.

He also helped write legislation that authorized more than $3.8 billion in federal aid to help state and local officials improve their voting systems — a bill passed by Congress after the Florida vote-counting debacle in the 2000 election.

Born in West Virginia, Ney graduated from Ohio State University in the mid-1970s. He spent 1978 in Iran teaching English and is the only House member who speaks fluent Farsi.

DOJ_NMG_0008036

During the last year, Ney has uncharacteristically broken with the GOP's House leadership on some key issues.

He was one of nine Republicans in the chamber to vote against a recently passed budget-cutting bill because of concern about its effect on his congressional district's steel industry and cuts to Medicaid. He also opposed the Central American Free Trade Agreement, and has been among a handful of Republicans working against reauthorization of the Patriot Act because of concerns about its effect on civil liberties.

Ney's district in eastern Ohio is heavily rural and picked up more Republican voters when it was redrawn after the 2000 census. He won reelection in 2004 with 66% of the vote.

Ney's spokesman, Brian Walsh, said Tuesday he expected the district's constituents to give the lawmaker the benefit of the doubt as the ethics scandal continued to unfold.

"I think many people in Washington these days presume someone to be guilty until proven innocent," Walsh said. "I think that's different in middle America."

Three Democrats already are vying for the right to oppose Ney in November. The campaign manager for one of the Democrats, Joe Sulzer, said the ethical allegations swirling around Ney were not yet "central in the way it is in D.C. right now" for most voters in the district.

But the Sulzer aide, Joe Abbey, added that he believed the Abramoff plea would "advance the issue tenfold" and sharpen questions of whether Ney was more focused on helping Abramoff than his constituents.

One Democratic official in Ney's district cautioned against counting out the lawmaker.

Mark Thomas, a Belmont County commissioner, noted that Ney helped secure more than $20 million for the area in a recently passed highway bill.

"I think the people in this district are taking the position that until he has been accused of whatever he may be accused of, and the facts come out, and he has an opportunity to respond," Thomas said, "we're going to be behind him as a congressman."

*

Times staff writer Ronald Brownstein contributed to this report.

Abramoff Pleads Guilty To Fraud (REU-Y2)

By Andy Sullivan

Reuters, January 4, 2006

Lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to fraud charges on Tuesday and agreed to help U.S. prosecutors in a corruption probe that could involve several top Republican lawmakers, including former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion before a federal judge in Washington. He also will plead guilty to conspiracy and wire fraud in a separate case in Miami on Wednesday, his lawyer there said.

The long-expected plea will give prosecutors valuable ammunition as they seek to prove that DeLay of Texas, Republican Rep. Bob Ney (news, bio, voting record) of Ohio and other top lawmakers gave Abramoff and his lobbying clients favorable treatment in return for campaign contributions, Super Bowl tickets and other gifts.

"Abramoff provided these things of value with the intent and often with the understanding that his clients would receive the official action they wanted," Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said at a press conference. "As admitted by Abramoff, his actions often produced the official influence that he sought."

Republican and Democratic lawmakers seeking to distance themselves from Abramoff and his clients have returned more than $200,000 in campaign contributions in recent weeks.

Abramoff, 47, faces a maximum sentence of 30 years, but under the terms of the plea deal it will be reduced to between 9 1/2 and 11 years. The sentence could be reduced even further if Abramoff cooperates fully, a Justice Department official said.

As part of the plea deal, Abramoff together with former partner Michael Scanlon will pay at least $25 million in restitution, and Abramoff will pay $1.7 million to the Internal Revenue Service for tax evasion.

REGRET, SORROW

Wearing a double-breasted, charcoal-colored suit, Abramoff answered Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle's questions in a hushed voice.

"I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused. All of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done," Abramoff said in a prepared statement.

According to the charges, Abramoff directed his Indian-tribe clients to hire Scanlon's public-relations firm at steep costs. Scanlon, a former DeLay aide, then secretly kicked back 50 percent of the $53 million he earned to Abramoff.

The two used the money to shower golf trips, lavish dinners and other favors on lawmakers. They also kept much of it for themselves.

Scanlon pleaded guilty to conspiracy in November and has been cooperating with investigators.

According to the charges, one unidentified lawmaker agreed to support legislation sought by Abramoff, place statements supporting him in the Congressional Record -- the official daily report on congressional proceedings -- and give one of his clients a contract to provide wireless telephone service to the House of Representatives.

That description matches actions taken by Ney, who inserted comments supporting Abramoff into the Congressional Record and who oversees routine matters like wireless service in congressional buildings as chairman of the House Administration Committee.

Ney's attorney Mark Tuohey was not available for comment.

The Justice Department's Fisher would not say how many officials are implicated in the probe.

"We are going to follow this wherever it goes. We are going to expend the resources that are necessary to make sure that people know that government is not for sale," she said.

DeLay attorney Dick DeGuerin said the Abramoff investigation would not uncover any wrongdoing by his client.

"Everything that Tom DeLay has done is above board," he told MSNBC, adding that early on, DeLay had offered the Justice Department cooperation in the investigation.

The charges are separate from those pending against Abramoff in Florida, where he has been charged in connection with falsifying a loan in the purchase of a Florida casino cruise line.

In an e-mail, Abramoff attorney Neal Sonnett said that Abramoff would plead guilty in Miami on Wednesday to wire fraud and conspiracy to commit wire fraud, while other charges would be dropped as part of the plea deal.

The FBI launched its investigation of Abramoff and Scanlon in March 2004, said Chris Swecker, head of the FBI's criminal investigative division.

Abramoff first contacted the Justice Department to discuss a plea a year and a half ago, Abramoff's Washington attorney Abbe Lowell said.

Abramoff Pleads Guilty (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

Lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court to charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud, agreeing to cooperate in an ongoing investigation into influence peddling on Capitol Hill.

Abramoff admitted to U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle he had taken part in a scheme involving the "corruption of public officials," saying he gave campaign contributions and funded lavish trips and other items "in exchange for certain official acts."

As part of the plea bargain, Abramoff agreed to pay at least $25 million in restitution -- which the government has described as the profits he concealed as part of the conspiracy.

"Words will not ever be able to express my sorrow and my profound regret for all my actions and mistakes," he told Judge Huvelle in the Washington courtroom. "I hope I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and those I've wronged or caused to suffer."

It was not clear yesterday who might be targeted in the government probe, although both Republicans and Democrats have been the beneficiaries of Abramoff's lobbying activities. Since he was first identified as an investigative target, lawmakers from both parties have returned more than $200,000 in campaign contributions.

Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said the Justice Department will pursue the investigation "wherever it goes" and intended to "expend the resources to make sure people know that government is not for sale." Abbe Lowell, Abramoff's attorney, said his client will continue to work with investigators.

Democrats are expected to make ethics a centerpiece of this year's midterm election. After Mr. Abramoff's confession, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi called the Republican-led Congress the "most corrupt in history." Republican leaders were silent.

According to court documents, Abramoff and partner Michael Scanlon, a former aide to Rep. Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, conspired to defraud Indian tribes in six states of millions of dollars. Scanlon pleaded guilty to related charges in Miami in November.

The court documents also said Abramoff gave public officials and their relatives gifts of money, trips, meals and entertainment in return for favorable treatment of his clients. One member of the House, identified as Rep. Bob Ney, Ohio Republican, reportedly received a "lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world-famous courses" and other benefits in exchange for support on various issues.

DOJ_NMG_0008038

The documents said Abramoff arranged for a $50,000 check to be sent through the mail from Texas to pay for the Scotland trip. Abramoff also is accused of arranging for one of Mr. Ney's former staff members to lobby the congressman in 2002 before the ex-staffer's one-year ban on lobbying had expired.

Mr. Ney has denied any wrongdoing, saying yesterday that at the time he dealt with Abramoff, "I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities." The congressman's attorney, Mark Tuohey, described the charges as "nothing new," saying they were included in a November plea agreement by Scanlon.

Also at issue are Abramoff's ties to Mr. DeLay, who accepted about $57,000 in campaign contributions as well as golf outings and other trips provided for or arranged by the lobbyist for lawmakers.

The documents also said Abramoff, who is expected to plead guilty to two additional federal charges in Florida stemming from a 2000 purchase of a fleet of gambling boats, filed a tax return for 2002 that concealed his illegal income.

Abramoff told Judge Huvelle "I plead guilty, your Honor" to each of three counts outlined in a November indictment. He had faced up to 30 years in prison, but prosecutors are expected to recommend 9½ years under terms of the plea bargain.

Prosecutors are thought to have finalized the Abramoff deal after a guilty plea by former partner Adam Kidan, who admitted Dec. 15 in federal court in Miami to committing mail and wire fraud in connection with the 2000 boat deal in Florida.

At the White House, spokesman Scott McClellan could not say yesterday whether Abramoff had ever met with President Bush, although the lobbyist and his associates logged more than 200 visits with administration officials and he raised $100,000 for Mr. Bush's 2004 re-election campaign.

Mr. McClellan called Abramoff's actions "unacceptable and outrageous." The spokesman said, "If laws were broken, he must be held to account for what he did."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, joined the growing list of lawmakers who have either returned money received from Abramoff or given it to charities. Lawmakers who have done so include Rep. Ernest Istook, Oklahoma Republican; Rep. Denny Rehberg, Montana Republican; Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican; Sen. Max Baucus, Montana Democrat; Sen. Conrad Burns, Montana Republican; and Sen. Byron L. Dorgan, North Dakota Democrat.

G.O.P. Lobbyist Pleads Guilty In Deal With Prosecutors (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to three felony counts in Washington today as part of a settlement with federal prosecutors, ending an intense, months-long negotiation over whether the Republican lobbyist would testify against his former colleagues.

Mr. Abramoff, 46, pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud, and tax evasion, setting the stage for prosecutors to begin using him as a cooperating witness against his former business and political colleagues. In exchange, Mr. Abramoff faces a maximum of about 10 years in prison in the Washington case.

The conspiracy charge included Mr. Abramoff's effort to influence at least one member of Congress and a Congressional staff member.

As United States District Judge Ellen S. Huvelle read each of the charges today, Mr. Abramoff answered softly, "I plead guilty, your honor."

"Your honor, words will not be able to ever express how sorry I am for this, and I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused," he said. "All of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done. I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and from those I have wronged or caused to suffer. I will work hard to earn that redemption."

At a news briefing this afternoon, Alice Fisher, an assistant attorney general, said Mr. Abramoff offered up gifts to government officials that included an all-expense paid trip to Scotland "to play golf on a world-famous course, tickets and travel to the Super Bowl in Florida, tickets for concerts and other events in Washington, repeated and regular meals at his upscale restaurant, and campaign contributions."

She said he provided these gifts "with the intent and often with the understanding that his clients would receive the official action they wanted."And, she said, "his actions often produced the official influence that he sought."

"Government officials and government action are not for sale," she said. "The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these types of cases, which have a devastating impact on the public's trust of government. We will not shy away from that responsibility, no matter where the trail leads."

Official Washington has been on edge for months awaiting word of Mr. Abramoff's legal future. Once a masterful Republican lobbyist with close ties to the former House majority leader, Representative Tom DeLay, Mr. Abramoff earned tens of millions of dollars representing Indian casino interests and farflung entities like the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas Islands.

DOJ_NMG_0008039

Through a complicated web of financial arrangements, he helped funnel donations to his lawmaker friends' and their campaigns, and took members of Congress, mainly the Republicans in power, on lavish trips.

Mr. Abramoff is also scheduled to appear in Florida Wednesday in a related case, in which he was indicted last year. In that case, he is expected to plead guilty to fraud and conspiracy in connection with his purchase of the SunCruz casino boat line, and will face a maximum of about seven years' prison time.

Mr. Abramoff has been talking to investigators in the corruption case for many months, his lawyer, Abbe Lowell, said.

"Eighteen months ago, Mr. Abramoff first made contact with prosecutors to admit his wrongdoing and to seek forgiveness from those he has wronged," Mr. Lowell said today. "He intends to continue to work with the Justice Department and others to fully resolve all matters of interest, to provide restitution to anyone he has harmed, and to seek absolution from all."

Participants in the case, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the investigation, said Mr. Abramoff had provided a full picture of what evidence he could offer against other suspects.

On the corruption charge, prosecutors said in documents filed with the court today that Mr. Abramoff and his partner, Michael Scanlon, who reached a plea agreement with officials last year, conspired to "corruptly give, offer and promise things of value, including money, meals, trips and entertainment, to public officials and their relatives with the intent to influence, and in return for agreements to perform official acts benefiting" them and their clients.

The document details lavish gifts and contributions that Mr. Abramoff gave a House member, identified here only as "Representative #1."

Representative Bob Ney, a Republican of Ohio, acknowledged at the time of Mr. Scanlon's plea agreement that he was the person represented as Representative No. 1 in the documents in that case, but he has dismissed any suggestion that he was persuaded to do Mr. Scanlon's bidding because of campaign aid or perks like meals, entertainment or overseas travel.

Mr. Ney said in a statement today, "At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Reuters reported. Mr. Ney has not been charged.

The document also alleges that Mr. Abramoff bribed public officials, including "Representative #1," and his staff, when he funded a golfing trip to Scotland in exchange for the congressman's official actions to benefit his clients.

He is also accused of tax evasion for filing false documents and false entries to financial books and records, and filing a false income tax return in 2002, "all for the purpose of concealing additional unreported taxable income received by or on behalf of" himself, the documents state.

Mr. Abramoff is also accused of hiring congressional staffers and conspiring with them to lobby their former employers - including members of Congress - in violation of a one-year federal ban on such lobbying.

Mr. Abramoff's participation in Washington has taken place mostly below the radar, as prosecutors made the Miami case the focus of their public work and as Mr. Abramoff and his associates claimed they were preparing to stand trial, facing up to as many as 30 years in prison.

Though Mr. Abramoff's pleas in each location are separate, the deal reached with the Justice Department is all-encompassing, reducing the severe penalties Mr. Abramoff could have faced in either investigation, in exchange for his inside knowledge of certain lobbying work and legislative actions. One element of the deal is that he can serve prison time in the two cases concurrently, although the sentencing will not take place until much further along in the investigation.

The deal, a so-called "global" arrangement because it encompasses separate prosecutions in Florida and Washington, comes less than a week before Mr. Abramoff was scheduled to stand trial in the Miami case.

With Mr. Abramoff's cooperation, the Justice Department will have a potentially critical witness to alleged patterns of corruption or bribery within the Republican leadership ranks, which in some cases they believe also took the form of campaign donations and free meals at Mr. Abramoff's downtown restaurant, Signatures.

After more than two years of investigations, prosecutors have developed a list of at least a dozen lawmakers, congressional aides and lobbyists whose work appears suspect and who are now at the core of the case.

Already, prosecutors had a key witness in Mr. Scanlon, once press secretary to Mr. DeLay. When Mr. Scanlon reached a plea agreement last year, it put pressure on Mr. Abramoff to reach his own deal.

Now that Mr. Abramoff has done the same, one person involved in the case said: "When some people hear about this, they will clamor to cut a deal of their own."

‘Corruption … Very Extensive' Ex-lobbyist Abramoff Will Help Wide-ranging Investigation Involving A Dozen FBI Offices (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson And Jim Drinkard
USA Today, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — A little more than a year ago, Jack Abramoff was enjoying many of the benefits access to official Washington can provide.

There were multimillion-dollar lobbying fees to collect, Super Bowl tickets to distribute and lavish trips and dinners to host.

What set Abramoff (AY-bra-moff) apart from legitimate Washington power brokers, federal prosecutors say, was his willingness to exploit an extensive network of Capitol Hill contacts — from well-positioned congressional staffers to members of the Republican leadership — regardless of the rules.

"The corruption scheme with Mr. Abramoff is very extensive," Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said. "Government officials and governmental action are not for sale."

Abramoff's campaign of corruption officially ended Tuesday when he pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion. In addition to about 10 years in prison, he may be forced to repay more than $25 million, according to court documents.

Prosecutors say Abramoff's cooperation is central to a wide-ranging corruption investigation that stretches from Capitol Hill to congressional districts across the USA.

At least a dozen FBI field offices have been drawn into the inquiry, FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker said. Authorities have declined to disclose the number of possible targets in the ongoing inquiry, but it goes beyond one member of Congress or his office. "No criminal resources of the FBI will be spared in support of this important mission," Swecker said.

The plea agreement outlined a scheme by which Abramoff and his secret partner, public relations operative Michael Scanlon, billed Indian tribes for exorbitant fees, then split the profits. Abramoff hid some of the money from the IRS by directing it to a non-profit group he established, the Capital Athletic Foundation.

Abramoff's share of the kickbacks from fees paid by four Indian tribes in Louisiana, Texas, Michigan and Mississippi came to more than $20 million, prosecutors said.

Abramoff and Scanlon also provided "a stream of things of value" to public officials to get their help. The stream included "foreign and domestic travel, golf fees, frequent meals, entertainment, election support … employment for relatives of officials and campaign contributions," court documents say.

Among the recipients were a House member identified by the lawmaker's attorney as Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, and members of Ney's staff. They got trips to the Northern Marianas Islands in 2000, to the Super Bowl in Tampa in 2001, and to Scotland's storied St. Andrews golf course in 2002, according to the documents. Ney also held fundraising events at Abramoff's now-defunct Washington restaurant, Signatures.

In return, Ney and his aides put statements in the Congressional Record supportive of Abramoff's interests and helped an Abramoff client get a wireless telephone contract with the House of Representatives, the government charged. In a statement, Ney denied that he was influenced by Abramoff.

Abramoff also funneled $50,000 to the wife of an unnamed congressional aide in 2000 and 2001, in return for the aide's help in blocking legislation for a client.

Abramoff's guilty plea follows weeks of other scandal news involving government officials.

Republican Tom DeLay stepped down from his position as House majority leader last year after he was indicted on charges related to fundraising in a separate case in his home state of Texas. DeLay has close ties to Abramoff, who employed some of the Texan's former aides and paid for a separate golf trip to Scotland for DeLay. Randy "Duke" Cunningham resigned from the House in November after pleading guilty to taking at least $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors.

The developments appear to be damaging Americans' perception of their elected representatives. A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken Dec. 16-18 found that 49% of American adults say they believe "most members of Congress are corrupt." That's 1 percentage point below the level of 1994, when voters turned control of Congress over to Republicans. The GOP appears to be tarred by scandal slightly more than the Democrats; 47% said "almost all" or "many" Republicans are corrupt, compared with 44% for Democrats.

Among registered voters, 55% said the issue of corruption will be the "most important" or a "very important" factor in their decision on whom to vote for next year. The poll has a margin of error of +/-3 to 5 percentage points, depending on the question.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan called Abramoff's confessed conduct "outrageous."

"He needs to be held to account, and he needs to be punished," McClellan said. Abramoff was among President Bush's Pioneers, who raised at least $100,000 for his re-election in 2004.

Many Millions In Kickbacks From Tribes (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky
The New York Times, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008041

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - The kickbacks from one Indian tribe exceeded $11 million. From another, they surpassed $6 million. In less than three years, Jack Abramoff secretly netted more than $20 million from tribes in five states, a sum close to half of the $43.3 million they paid him and a partner to lobby on their behalf.

"These are staggering numbers, even by Washington standards," said Stanley Brand, a defense lawyer who specializes in criminal and ethical matters. "The big firms do very, very well, but they don't come close to these kinds of numbers."

The level to which Mr. Abramoff enriched himself at the expense of clients came into sharp focus on Tuesday as his plea agreement on federal charges of conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion was made public by the Justice Department.

The agreement referred to five business relationships Mr. Abramoff had with Indian tribes, and in each case he admitted to receiving a large percentage of the tribe's total spending as a kickback. As part of his plea, Mr. Abramoff agreed to repay his former clients $25 million.

Mr. Abramoff carried out his fraudulent schemes by persuading clients that they needed the lobbying services of firms run by a former business partner, Michael Scanlon, or by his own companies. Mr. Scanlon pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to bribe a member of Congress, and as part of his plea, he agreed to repay $19.6 million to the tribes that once retained him.

Mr. Abramoff's largest kickback came from a Louisiana tribe that used his services from early 2001 through the spring of 2004. In the plea agreement Mr. Abramoff said the tribe paid companies run by Mr. Scanlon $30,510,000. But through an agreement between Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Scanlon, they concealed a kickback of about $11,450,000 to Mr. Abramoff.

In another scheme, beginning in early 2001, a Mississippi tribe paid Mr. Scanlon about $14,765,000, ignorant of the "secret profit-sharing agreement" between Mr. Scanlon and Mr. Abramoff that sliced off nearly half of the total, about $6,364,000, as a kickback to Mr. Abramoff.

A Michigan tribe paid Mr. Scanlon about $3.5 million from the middle of 2002 to the fall of 2003, unaware of the "secret arrangement" that directed about $540,000, half the profit earned by Mr. Scanlon's companies, to Mr. Abramoff.

In a scheme that suggested how little they cared for the needs of their clients, Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Scanlon persuaded a Texas tribe in 2002 to hire them to help the tribe reopen its casino through federal legislation. According to the plea agreement, while the tribe paid $4.2 million for services arranged by Mr. Scanlon, the two men concealed from the Texas tribe that, at the same time, they had collected millions of dollars from the Louisiana tribe to oppose all gaming in the Texas Legislature.

They also did not tell the Texas tribe that $1,850,000 of their fees went directly to Mr. Abramoff "pursuant to his undisclosed arrangement with Mr. Scanlon."

In a final case cited by the plea agreement, a New Mexico tribe paid Mr. Scanlon $2.75 million, hiding from tribal officials that the lobbying firm's profit margin was about 80 percent and that $1,175,000 of the total was paid to Mr. Abramoff through his secret agreement with Mr. Scanlon.

Paul Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, a trade group with 700 members, said Mr. Abramoff was "in a league by himself" as a Washington lobbyist, a term he said he used reluctantly.

"Jack Abramoff, by my definition, is not a lobbyist," Mr. Miller said. "He knowingly defrauded clients. In my view, he is nothing more than a scam artist."

Tiguas Hope Abramoff Plea Helps In Reopening Of Casino (AP)

By SUZANNE GAMBOA, Associated Press

AP, January 4, 2006

The governor of the Texas Tigua tribe, which operated a gaming casino near El Paso for more than eight years, is hoping lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty pleas in a federal corruption scandal will be a catalyst for restarting the tribe's gaming.

Tigua Gov. Arturo Senclair said the tribe is looking forward to what members of Congress will tell investigators should any be charged in the unraveling scandal that led Abramoff to plead guilty Tuesday.

"Maybe once this whole thing is done and all the e-mails are uncovered ... maybe when Congress members do start talking, maybe we can come back and start working with the state" to reopen the casino, he said.

Abramoff pleaded guilty Tuesday to three felonies and pledged to cooperate with investigators looking into the lavish trips, golf outings, meals and other gifts he said he provided to public officials "in exchange for a series of official acts."

The plea agreement filed by Justice Department officials said Abramoff and his ex-business partner Michael Scanlon solicited the Tigua tribe — identified in the document as Texas Tribe #1 — to hire them to provide lobbying and grass roots services to reopen the tribe's casino. The tribe was paying fees to the Scanlon business.

The tribe was to pay $4.2 million in fees and make "additional and substantial" campaign contributions at the direction of Abramoff and Scanlon, the plea agreement said.

Abramoff had told the tribe he'd work for free, but never revealed that he got about half the net profits, or $1.85 million, from the Scanlon business.

The investigators said Abramoff and Scanlon never told the Tiguas that beginning in 2001 they collected millions of dollars from the Louisiana Coushatta tribe to oppose all gaming in the Texas Legislature, including a 2003 bill that could have reopened the Tiguas' Speaking Rock Casino.

"Abramoff knew that Texas Tribe #1 supported and promoted this legislation while he worked to prevent its passage for the benefit of his other client, the Louisiana tribe," according to the plea agreement.

The Tiguas were forced to close the casino in February 2002 under a federal court ruling in a 1999 lawsuit brought by then Attorney General John Cornyn, now a U.S. senator. Cornyn has said he filed the lawsuit to enforce Texas law.

E-mails and other records released by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee — which conducted its own investigation — have shown that Abramoff hired former Christian Coalition director Ralph Reed to drum up opposition to Texas tribes' casinos in 2001.

"When we entered the Abramoff web, the assumption was this is the way we get things done in Washington, attending dinners, attending sporting events in skyboxes and attending golf outings. That's the way things got done," Senclair said. "You are a tribe, playing by the rules of the game, not knowing that's not the way it should have been done."

Despite the developments in the investigation, Senclair said there is little celebration for the tribe.

"We're still out of money. We still haven't been given restitution for the full amount (paid to Abramoff)," Senclair said. "There's still sadness because the casino is shut down."

Abramoff Reached Beyond The Limits (LAT)

By Faye Fiore And Martha Groves

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — At Beverly Hills High School, Jack Abramoff's weightlifting prowess was the stuff of legend.

As a senior, he became the first member of the school's 2700 Club, lifting a combined total of 2,700 pounds in the power squat, dead lift, bench press, and clean and jerk.

His former football coach, Bill Stansbury, recalled a game against Inglewood when Abramoff legally blocked an opposing player and knocked him out cold.

Abramoff also helped organize charitable events, Stansbury said, among them a Quarter-Pounder-eating contest at a McDonald's, with some proceeds going to the American Cancer Society, and a celebrity basketball game to benefit a youth foundation.

Today, about 30 years later, Abramoff is at the center of a political scandal in Washington — the result, in part, of the same drive, interest in charitable organizations and excess that he showed in his youth.

During a decade as one of the capital's most successful lobbyists, commanding hourly rates as high as $750, Abramoff, 46, amassed a personal fortune while lavishing lawmakers and others with golf junkets, free meals and access to sports arena skyboxes.

Now, he has pleaded guilty to conspiring to defraud some of his lobbying clients and bribe a lawmaker. Federal investigators are probing whether other lawmakers improperly returned Abramoff's favors by using their offices to benefit him and his clients.

His reach into the Republican power structure was vast. Beleaguered former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay once described him as "one of my closest and dearest friends." Abramoff was one of the "pioneers" who raised more than $100,000 for President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign.

The son of a Diners Club executive, Abramoff moved with his family from Atlantic City, N.J., to Beverly Hills when he was 10.

Soon after, he experienced a religious epiphany. His family was Jewish but not particularly observant, not like the characters in "Fiddler on the Roof," which he had recently watched. The Orthodox traditions of his grandparents' generation had perished over the years, and Abramoff, at age 12, decided to be the one to unbury them.

He began walking to synagogue every Saturday and taught himself Hebrew, exhibiting early signs of the chin-to-chest drive that would later help catapult him to become one of the most well-connected Republican lobbyists in Washington.

At Beverly Hills High, he earned a reputation for ambition, hard work and commitment. He held the school record for the power squat, which he completed while holding 510 pounds on his back.

"Jack showed good leadership and was very dedicated, probably the strongest kid on the team," recalled Stansbury, who was the football team's offensive line coach when Abramoff played as the starting center. "For his size, he was extremely strong and very aggressive."

DOJ_NMG_0008043

Abramoff was president of the high school Lettermen's Club, said Stansbury, who is now a teacher and coach at Paso Robles High School. "Jack always had a clear mission of where he wanted to be and how he was going to get there. I had a lot of respect for Jack's work ethic."

Steven Herbert, a freelance journalist who writes for The Times' sports section and attended the same schools a year behind Abramoff, recalled an early setback for Abramoff. He ran for student council president at the Hawthorne School, a Beverly Hills elementary and middle school, in 1972. Heading into a runoff election, Abramoff was disqualified for exceeding the spending limit. The principal, Herbert recalled, penalized Abramoff for holding a party, stating it amounted to a campaign expenditure that pushed him over the limit.

In the handful of interviews Abramoff has granted over the last year, he has refused to discuss the federal probe of his lobbying work but has talked about his past, including the religious revelation in his adolescence.

"I felt a twinge of sadness that that culture had died out in our family," he told Mother Jones magazine last summer. Recalling the decision he made then: "I'll be the person to resurrect it."

He became as conservative in his politics as in his faith and forged early friendships that would help him ascend his party's ranks. While an undergraduate at Brandeis University in Massachusetts, he met Grover Norquist, a Harvard graduate student who went on to head Americans for Tax Reform. Their common passion for conservative activism led them to organize young Republicans in the 1980 election, which some believed helped Ronald Reagan score an upset in that famously Democratic state.

Norquist was the first of many prominent Republicans that Abramoff would befriend as he took on key political chores on behalf of the GOP.

Abramoff became national chairman of the student wing of the GOP, the College Republican National Committee, a position once held by Bush confidant Karl Rove. There, Abramoff forged his long friendship with activist Ralph Reed, who would years later turn the Christian Coalition into a major political force within the GOP.

In his mid-20s, Abramoff set out to spread the Reagan Doctrine. He became executive director of Citizens for America, Reagan's grass-roots lobbying group.

With Republicans out of power in the early 1990s, Abramoff took a break from full-time politics and returned to his West Coast roots. He spent 10 years as a movie producer and made several B-grade films, including 1989's anti-communist romp "Red Scorpion."

In business and in politics, "he was always the consummate entrepreneur," said Marshall Wittmann, a former conservative activist who knew Abramoff during his rise to power and who is now a fellow at the centrist Democratic Leadership Council.

Abramoff was drawn back into politics in 1994 when the GOP takeover of Congress created opportunities for a talented rainmaker. Washington was full of new GOP lawmakers, and lobbying firms were desperate for people with Republican contacts. With his old friends suddenly in high places and his ticket already punched as a Reagan devotee, Abramoff was in demand almost overnight. He soon acquired a list of top-drawer clients — Unisys Corp., Tyco International and the government of the Northern Mariana Islands, a remote Pacific commonwealth that lawmakers were eyeing for additional federal regulation.

Abramoff became a bona fide high roller. He bought a majority stake in Signatures, a high-end restaurant on Pennsylvania Avenue between the White House and Capitol Hill that was a hot spot for Republican lobbyists, members of Congress and political fundraisers. GOP lawmakers filled his private skyboxes at Redskin, Oriole and Wizard games.

He also showed an interest in charitable organizations. Concerned about the quality of Jewish education in the Washington area, he founded an Orthodox school and sent two of his children there.

A charitable organization he founded, the Capital Athletic Foundation, figures in the charges to which Abramoff entered guilty pleas Tuesday. Prosecutors said he induced a wireless telephone company to make $50,000 in payments to the foundation rather than pay a lobbying fee to the firm Abramoff worked for.

His most lucrative clients, though, were the Indian casino tribes he began to represent in the mid-1990s. Prosecutors say Abramoff and a partner conspired to defraud some of those tribes in five states, reaping millions of dollars from the scheme.

"Can you smell money?!" Abramoff wrote to his partner Michael P.S. Scanlon, a public relations consultant and former DeLay spokesman, regarding an Indian tribe rich with gambling casino profits. Scanlon recently pleaded guilty to federal conspiracy charges.

Abramoff at one point disparaged some of the tribal members who had made him rich, calling them "troglodytes" and "plain stupid … Morons."

Last year, Abramoff was forced to listen to those words in a hearing of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. "Why would you want to work for people that you have that much contempt for?" one senator asked.

On the advice of his lawyer, Abramoff did not respond.

Abramoff Case Could Have Far-reaching Impact (KRT)

By Michelle Mittelstadt, Dallas Morning News
KRT, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - Fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff's deal to cooperate in an influence-peddling investigation surely sent a chill Tuesday through Capitol Hill, where the Republican plied dozens of politicians with campaign contributions and favored some with lavish trips, Super Bowl tickets and pricey meals in exchange for legislative help.

"They have to be just sweating bullets," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a watchdog group. "Anybody who ever had anything to do with Jack Abramoff has to be rethinking every minute, every conversation with him."

The Abramoff case may not be marked by the outright bribery of corruption sagas such as Abscam and Koreagate, where members of Congress pocketed envelopes stuffed with cash. But it has the potential to rank as one of Congress' worst scandals in decades because of the number of lawmakers and aides who could be ensnared - and because of the disgraced lobbyist's reach into the top rungs of the GOP leadership.

Abramoff, who was one of President Bush's top fundraisers and traded on his ties to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, pleaded guilty Tuesday to charges of conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. It marked the latest twist in a corruption inquiry that is believed to be focusing on DeLay, R-Texas, and as many as 14 others on Capitol Hill.

"Government officials and government action are not for sale," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division. "The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these types of cases, which have a devastating impact on the public's trust of government. We will not shy away from that responsibility, no matter where the trail leads."

One lawmaker who may be in the crosshairs is Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, chairman of the House Administration Committee. In the Abramoff plea agreement, prosecutors detailed the legislative favors that Ney - identified only as "Representative No. 1" in court papers - performed for Abramoff's clients after receiving political contributions, overseas travel and other gifts.

"At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Ney said, denying wrongdoing.

Though Jack Abramoff has yet to become a household name, experts say the scandal could resonate with a public increasingly nervous about public corruption. An AP-Ipsos poll last month found that 88 percent of Americans believe corruption at all levels of government is a serious problem, with 51 percent calling it very serious.

"What makes a person like Abramoff so dangerous is he embodies and personifies problems that usually seem technical or abstract or too big to deal with," said Julian Zelizer, a Boston University history professor who wrote a book on congressional scandals. "Here you have a kind of villain that I think Americans might start paying attention to a bit."

And just as Republicans used ethics as a cudgel to end House Democrats' four-decade lock on power in 1994, Zelizer and other experts said the current scandal holds peril for the GOP even though some Democrats also received Abramoff's largesse.

"There is always the cliche `a pox on both your houses.' But I do think the party in power does take extra heat on these things," said Larry Noble, executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics, among the watchdog groups that tracked the $2.1 billion paid by corporations and special interests to lobby Washington last year.

The Abramoff scandal holds the potential for strengthening lobbying disclosure and campaign finance regulations, particularly if the investigation remains front-page news with politicians' indictments, Noble said.

At the very least, there could be more scrutiny of lobbying, which Center for Public Integrity executive director Roberta Baskin called the "fourth branch of government in Washington."

"It's like the sun coming up on K Street right now," Baskin said. "There is the possibility and hope of there being a lot more scrutiny and accountability."

But Danielle Brian, head of the Project on Government Oversight, predicted change would be slow without a public outcry to force lawmakers to action.

"I definitely am not looking to Congress to make the changes themselves," Brian said, noting that the House and Senate ethics committees have been largely moribund in recent years. "I don't see there is any evidence there is any real self-policing going on."

Lobbyist's Guilty Plea Signals Broadening Scandal In Washington (KRT)

By Steven Thomma And Alison Young
Knight Ridder, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - The nation's capital braced Tuesday for a mushrooming political scandal as a well-connected lobbyist pleaded guilty to federal criminal charges and prepared to testify about members of Congress caught in his web of corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0008045

Jack Abramoff, 46, invoked God as he apologized and pleaded guilty before a federal judge to one charge each of conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. He faces a maximum of 30 years in prison - and another potential plea in a Florida indictment related to his purchase of a fleet of casino cruise ships from a man who was murdered a few months later.

By itself, the fall of a high-flying lobbyist who collected $80 million in fees from casino-rich Indian tribes, wined and dined politicians at his own upscale Washington restaurant, Signatures, and flew them abroad for golf outings was a dramatic tale.

But it was the likelihood that Abramoff now will help federal prosecutors go after members of Congress that gripped official Washington.

"This is going to grow and multiply," said Bill Mateja, a former top official in the Bush Justice Department who's now a Dallas lawyer. "If I were on Capitol Hill, I would be shaking in my boots. Because if anyone knows where the skeletons are buried, it's Jack Abramoff."

The Abramoff case could rival or surpass the 1980 Abscam case, in which an FBI sting trapped members of Congress taking bribes. Six members of the House of Representatives and one senator were convicted then.

It also could make it easier for Americans to see the free flow of money and lobbyist influence in Washington and affect the way they vote in this year's congressional elections. Democrats hope to benefit, but polls so far show both parties losing public esteem.

Justice Department officials said they hoped their extensive investigation would send a message about corruption.

"Government officials and government action are not for sale," said Alice Fisher, an assistant attorney general. "The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these types of cases, which have a devastating impact on the public's trust of government."

The scandal threatens to engulf several high-ranking lawmakers from both major political parties, including:

- Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, the chairman of the House Administration Committee, whose Web page identifies him as the "11th most powerful member of Congress." He took a golf trip to Scotland on Abramoff's tab, but says he did nothing wrong.

- Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, who was forced to step down last fall as House majority leader when he was indicted on a campaign-finance charge that isn't related to the Abramoff case. DeLay denies any wrongdoing in taking overseas trips financed by Abramoff. His spokesman said Tuesday that all of DeLay's actions were approved by the House ethics committee.

- Rep. John Doolittle, R-Calif., the secretary of the House Republican Conference, who took campaign contributions from Abramoff and whose wife was hired by an Abramoff foundation. Doolittle denies that his intervention in a California Indian casino case, which would've helped Abramoff, was connected to his relations to the lobbyist.

- Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., the Senate minority leader, who's denied that his intercession in an Indian-casino case that would've helped Abramoff was linked to a $5,000 contribution from an Abramoff client.

"Abramoff probably had relationships with lots more members of Congress," said Melanie Sloan, a former federal prosecutor, the head of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington and who's supported Democrats. "He's clearly been spilling his guts for several months."

Abramoff's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, said in a statement that his client "intends to continue to work with the Justice Department and others to fully resolve all matters of interest, to provide restitution to anyone he has harmed, and to seek absolution from all."

Abramoff would serve nine and a half to 11 years of his sentence under federal guidelines. That could be reduced further with his cooperation in the investigation. He also faces a fine of more than $750,000 and mandatory restitution estimated to be about $26.7 million - $1.7 million of that to the Internal Revenue Service for evading taxes, plus an undetermined amount of back taxes.

The lobbyist was contrite as he faced U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle.

"Your honor, words will not be able to ever express how sorry I am for this, and I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused," he said.

"All of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done. I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and from those I have wronged or caused to suffer. I will work hard to earn that redemption."

The most far-reaching charge said Abramoff corruptly influenced public officials and their relatives.

"Abramoff and others would offer and provide things of value to public officials, including trips, campaign contributions, meals and entertainment in exchange for agreements that the public officials would use their official positions and influence to benefit defendant Abramoff's clients and ... businesses," the federal charge said.

It didn't identify any public officials by name.

But it did say Abramoff influenced a House Committee chairman identified as "Representative A." It said Abramoff used "a lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world famous courses, tickets to sporting events ... regular meals at Abramoff's upscale restaurant, and campaign contributions" to win official favors from the congressman.

Representative A is apparently Ney.

An Abramoff partner, Michael Scanlon, who formerly had worked for DeLay, pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to bribe Ney. Ney has denied wrongdoing.

"At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Ney said in a statement.

The plea bargain also said Abramoff had defrauded several Indian tribes by charging them huge fees while lying about his work or the way that money was funneled to him. For example, it said he urged them to hire other firms while concealing that he got a 50 percent kickback from more than $54 million that the tribes paid those firms.

Abramoff greased his relationships with golf trips, meals at his restaurant and seats in his luxury skyboxes at Washington sports events. He and his clients also contributed freely to campaigns, $4.4 million since 2000, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics.

With the investigation threatening to spread, several members of Congress recently returned campaign contributions to Abramoff, a trend that House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., joined Tuesday evening. He announced that he'd return $70,000 in contributions from Abramoff-related clients, including Indian tribes.

Previously, Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., returned $18,892. That amount included $1,892, the value of seats in Abramoff's skybox at a Washington sports arena, which Baucus had used but never reported.

Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., gave back $67,000 in Abramoff-related donations.

Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., returned more than $150,000 and summed up what probably is the prevailing attitude in Congress toward the once-popular lobbyist.

"This Abramoff guy is a bad guy," Burns told a Montana television station last month. "I hope he goes to jail and we never see him again. I wish he'd never been born, to be right honest with you."

Knight Ridder correspondents James Kuhnhenn and Maria Recio contributed to this report.

Lobbyist Admits Fraud And Bribe Plots (FT)

By Patti Waldmeirin Washington

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

Jack Abramoff, Republican lobbyist and central figure in an influence-peddling scandal with reverberations throughout Washington, yesterday pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges and agreed to help prosecutors investigate the activities of top US lawmakers including Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader.

Mr Abramoff yesterday pleaded guilty to conspiring to defraud his lobbying clients, breaking federal lobbying laws and conspiring to bribe lawmakers and congressional aides with campaign contributions, meals, trips and sports tickets. He is expected to serve about 10 years in prison.

According to the charges filed yesterday, Mr Abramoff and a former aide to Mr DeLay, Michael Scanlon, overbilled several Indian tribes who were their clients. They then diverted the money either into their own pockets, or used it to provide what the charges said was "a stream of things of value", including a lavish golfing trip to Scotland, for a lawmaker and his staff.

No politicians are named in the papers filed yesterday by the Justice Department, but prosecutors are understood to be investigating at least a dozen lawmakers, congressional aides and lobbyists, including Mr DeLay and Bob Ney of Ohio, a fellow Republican lawmaker.

Mr Abramoff's long-awaited decision to plead guilty and co-operate with federal investigators will give the Justice Department powerful new ammunition in its probe of alleged patterns of corruption and bribery within the ranks of the Republican leadership.

Democrats are hoping to exploit the perception of a "culture of corruption" among Republican leaders in November elections, although some Democrats also received campaign contributions from Mr Abramoff.

The charges yesterday said: "It was a purpose of the conspiracy for defendant Abramoff, Scanlon and others to enrich themselves by obtaining substantial funds from their clients through fraud and concealment."

Some of these funds were used to try to influence an unnamed Congressmanto "perform a series of official acts" including passing legislation. Sports tickets and meals at Mr Abramoff's upmarket Washington restaurant were lavished on lawmakers. The charges also included breaking lobbying laws by hiring congressional staffers to lobby their former bosses within a year of their employment on Capitol Hill.

Yesterday's charges are separate from those pending against Mr Abramoff in Florida, where he has been charged with conspiracy and wire fraud.

Scott McClellan, White House spokesman, said that "if laws were broken, [Mr Abramoff] must be held to account for what he did".

Lobbyist Abramoff Pleads Guilty To Conspiracy, Fraud (LAW)

By Andy Metzger, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 4, 2006

Scandal-plagued lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty Tuesday to three counts of conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion as the Justice Department's investigation shifts away from Abramoff and toward lawmakers and Hill staffers who allegedly accepted what Abramoff now says were bribes.

The plea deal could send Abramoff to prison for nine to 12 years and will require him to pay about $25 million in restitution to his former Native American tribal clients that he admitted to defrauding. Abramoff is also expected to plead guilty later this week to fraud charges in Florida, bringing an end to both of the Justice Department's investigations into him.

In a deal that closely mirrors the one made in November by former business partner Michael Scanlon, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges, Abramoff admits to providing trips, entertainment, and campaign contributions to Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, in return for several official favors. Ney is identified in the plea document as "Representative #1." (Ney's lawyer has stated that Ney is Representative #1).

Ney issued a statement Tuesday denying that he has done anything improper or illegal. "At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Ney said in the statement, which echoes his past remarks on the matter.

Abramoff also admitted to defrauding his tribal clients by directing them to pay millions of dollars to Scanlon's consulting and public relations company, but concealing that he received kickbacks from Scanlon equal to half of the profits -- an amount that exceeded $20 million. The charge that Abramoff defrauded Indian clients first surfaced in February 2004. Since then, the corruption investigation has widened to include Congress and members of the Bush administration. According to published reports, the Justice Department is currently investigating as many as 20 congressmen and Hill staffers.

At the hearing Tuesday in a Washington, D.C., federal courtroom, Abramoff appeared a hollow shell of the K Street power broker that he once was. Frowning and avoiding eye contact throughout the hearing with anyone except U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle, Abramoff often seemed on the brink of tears as he sat quietly at the defense table. He answered Huvelle's questions in monosyllables and barely spoke above a whisper. In a prepared statement Abramoff delivered at the end of the hearing, he said: "Words will not be able to ever express how sorry I am for this, and I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused. I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and from those I have wronged or caused to suffer."

Abramoff and his attorney, Abbe Lowell, did not answer questions after the hearing. Lowell released a statement saying his client had been in talks with the Justice Department for 18 months.

With Abramoff and his former business partner Scanlon both having cut plea deals to cooperate with prosecutors, all attention is now focused on Capitol Hill. According to published reports, lawmakers under investigation by the Justice Department include Ney, Rep. John Doolittle, R-Calif., Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., and former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas.

In addition to identifying Ney, Abramoff also implicated two congressional staffers-turned-lobbyists who worked for him at Greenberg Traurig. In the plea document they are referred to only as Staffers "A" and "B."

In his plea Abramoff alleges that Staffer A solicited contributions from Abramoff's lobby clients for a charity that Abramoff controlled. Those funds were then used to finance a golf trip to Scotland attended by Ney. During the hearing Judge Huvelle stated that the activities of Staffer A's wife and her organization are also under investigation.

Abramoff also claims in his plea that Staffer B, a former Ney aide who joined Abramoff's team at Greenberg, was the conduit through which he communicated with Ney to arrange what Abramoff now says were corrupt acts.

Neil Volz, Ney's former chief of staff who worked for Abramoff at Greenberg and is now a lobbyist with Barnes & Thornburg, is under investigation by the Justice Department. Other lobbyists under investigation are Tony Rudy, a former DeLay staffer who worked at Greenberg for a year before joining Alexander Strategy Group. Rudy's wife, Lisa, operated Liberty Consulting, which did work for several Abramoff clients and associates. Edwin Buckham, another former DeLay staffer now at Alexander Strategy, and Kevin Ring, a former chief of staff for Doolittle who later went to work for Abramoff, are also being investigated by the Justice Department, according to several published reports.

Ring declined to comment, citing the ongoing investigation. The others did not return calls for comment before deadline.

Abramoff Pleads Guilty, Agrees To Aid Probe Into Congress (BOS)

By Michael Kranish, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Lobbyist Jack Abramoff yesterday pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud, and tax evasion charges in one of the biggest corruption cases in recent Washington history, agreeing to cooperate with prosecutors who are investigating whether members of Congress took bribes from him in exchange for favors.

Abramoff admitted that he told Indian tribes to give money to a lobbying firm while hiding his own $20 million take and that he also tried to bribe public officials, the government said.

The plea bargain sent shockwaves through Capitol Hill as lawmakers awaited word on possible indictments of members of Congress. The government said Abramoff gave "money, meals, trips, and entertainment to public officials and their relatives . . . in return for agreements to perform official acts."

The indictment did not provide the name of any public official who took action after receiving money or gifts from Abramoff. But it does refer to Abramoff's collaboration with an unnamed member of Congress. Yesterday Representative Robert W. Ney, Republican of Ohio, issued a statement indicating that he was the unnamed member, and denied any wrongdoing.

In pleading guilty, Abramoff told US District Court Judge Ellen Huvelle: "Words will not ever be able to express my sorrow and my profound regret for all my actions and mistakes. I hope I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and those I've wronged or caused to suffer."

The head of the Justice Department's criminal division, Alice S. Fisher, vowed to continue the investigation no matter where it leads.

"Government officials and government action are not for sale," she said at a news conference. "The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these types of cases, which have a devastating impact on the public's trust of government."

The charges against Abramoff revolved around his scheme to collect $20 million from Indian tribes in Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, and Texas.

Separately, Abramoff today is expected to plead guilty to charges involving fraudulent financial dealings in seeking to purchase a Miami cruise ship company, a deal that was largely unrelated to his tribal lobbying.

Abramoff, 46, faces up to 30 years in jail for the Washington-based charges, but prosecutors said that could be cut to 9 1/2 years under sentencing guidelines, with a possible further reduction for cooperating with the government in cases against others. He is expected to pay $25 million in fines to his victims and $1.7 million in evaded federal taxes. Prison time from his Miami charges could be served concurrently with his Washington-based charges, a Justice official said.

The case has been the talk of Washington for months because Abramoff has been a close associate of many leading officials, most of them Republicans. Abramoff was a top fund-raiser for President Bush and worked closely with Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader who resigned his leadership post late last year after being indicted in a separate case alleging violation of Texas voting laws.

In addition, Abramoff had close dealings with such high-profile Republicans as antitax activist Grover G. Norquist and former Christian Coalition director Ralph Reed.

Abramoff's role unraveled partly because of hundreds of e-mails between Abramoff and various associates obtained by federal investigators. While Abramoff represented himself publicly as a pious man who worked on behalf of tribal interests, he described tribal leaders in one e-mail as "moronic," adding: "I'd love us to get our mitts on that moola!! Oh well, stupid folks get wiped out."

Prosecutors made the deal with Abramoff partly in hopes of gaining new information for their investigation into the activities of an undisclosed number of public officials, including members of Congress and congressional aides.

Abramoff urged tribes to give money to numerous public officials, and at least two dozen members of Congress have returned contributions related to Abramoff. Senator Conrad Burns, Republican of Montana, returned $150,000 just before Christmas. Senator Byron L. Dorgan, a North Dakota Democrat, returned $67,000. Both have denied wrongdoing.

Abramoff got his start in politics at Brandeis University in Massachusetts in 1980, organizing college Republicans and forming an alliance with a Weston native, Norquist, who was rallying GOP members at Harvard Business School. The pair moved to Washington, where they worked for the national party with another rising GOP star, Reed.

Abramoff's lobbying for tribes took off in the late 1990s, when some Republicans were pushing for a tax on Indian casino profits. Abramoff was hired by tribes to help kill the tax idea. Then Abramoff started collecting millions of dollars from tribes to help other casino interests.

The indictment cited four examples of how Abramoff exploited tribes, in conjunction with Capitol Campaign Strategies, the firm run by his partner, Michael Scanlon, a former DeLay press secretary who has pleaded guilty in a related case. The indictment declared that by concealing their conspiracy, Abramoff and Scanlon violated laws against fraudulent dealings. The two called the scheme "Gimmie Five," shorthand for Abramoff's collection of half of the profits:

DOJ_NMG_0008049

Abramoff advised the Mississippi band of Choctaw Indians to hire Capitol Campaign Strategies for $14 million without disclosing to the tribe that he had secretly arranged to receive $6.4 million in that arrangement.

Abramoff advised the Louisiana Coushatta tribe to pay his partner, Michael Scanlon, and others $31 million without disclosing to the tribe that he would receive $11.4 million.

Abramoff advised the Michigan Saginaw Chippewa tribe to pay Capitol Campaign Strategies $3.5 million without disclosing to the tribe that he would receive $540,000.

Abramoff persuaded the Texas Tigua tribe to pay Scanlon $4.2 million in its effort to win approval for reopening its casino, without disclosing to the tribe that Abramoff would receive $1.8 million and that Abramoff was working separately to oppose the Tigua's effort to reopen the casino.

No charges were filed related to the work by Abramoff's firm for the Mashpee Wampanoag tribe of Massachusetts, which paid $50,000 to two of Abramoff's partners as part of an effort to win federal recognition and possibly build a casino.

While Abramoff's dealings with the tribes were widely publicized during Senate hearings into his tribal lobbying, his relationships with members of Congress received far less scrutiny during that probe. As a result, there has been much tension on Capitol Hill about whether Abramoff would strike a deal and implicate lawmakers. Those fears may have been increased by a portion of the Abramoff indictment that refers to "bribery and . . . fraud involving public officials."

Much of the speculation yesterday was focused on Ney, the chairman of the Committee on House Administration. Ney's congressional website notes that he has been described as the 11th most powerful member of Congress.

The indictment says Abramoff "provided a stream of things of value to a Member of the United States House of Representatives (Representative #1) and his staff." The indictment says that gifts include "a lavish trip to Scotland to play on world famous courses, tickets to sporting events, and other entertainment," and campaign contributions.

Some of the money for the Scotland trip came from a $50,000 donation Abramoff arranged from the Tigua tribe, the indictment said.

In exchange for those gifts, the indictment says, the congressman worked on "advancing the application" by an Abramoff client to get a wireless telephone system installed in House offices.

As soon as Abramoff's plea bargain was released, Ney issued a statement alluding to his involvement with Abramoff in matters covered by the indictment, but denying any wrongdoing.

"At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Ney said in a statement yesterday. His spokesman added that "the truth will show that congressman Ney did nothing wrong."

Representative Martin T. Meehan, the Lowell Democrat, said he hoped that the plea bargain will lead Congress to tighten lobbying restrictions, just as the Watergate scandal prompted limits on campaign contributions. Meehan has proposed legislation that requires lobbyists to disclose meetings with members of Congress, among other measures.

"Given the plea bargain agreement, there is an assumption that there is more to this case than we know," Meehan said, when asked in a telephone interview about the state of concern about possible future indictments. "This agreement means that Abramoff's web of corruption will begin to unravel. That can only help our efforts to pass meaningful lobbying and ethics reforms."

The plea deal follows a number of high-profile cases affecting top Republicans, including the DeLay indictment, the indictment of former vice presidential chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby in the CIA leak case, and a guilty plea on bribery charges by former US representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

Hastert Donates Abramoff-linked Money (CNN)

CNN.com, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- House Speaker Dennis Hastert became the latest lawmaker to dump campaign contributions from clients of high-flying lobbyist Jack Abramoff, giving about $70,000 to charity Tuesday.

The donation came after Abramoff pleaded guilty to corruption charges and agreed to cooperate with a federal corruption investigation in Washington.

"The speaker believes that while these contributions were legal, it is appropriate to donate the money to charity," a spokesman for the Illinois Republican, Ron Bonjean, said. Bonjean did not specify which group or groups would receive the money.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion charges in an agreement with federal prosecutors that could have a wide-reaching effect in Washington. (Full story)

Abramoff is a former College Republican chairman with longstanding ties to top Republicans in Washington, including former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, conservative activist Grover Norquist and former Christian Coalition chief Ralph Reed.

A source close to the probe said investigators are looking at about a half dozen members of Congress, while a senior government official told CNN the probe involves about two dozen lawmakers and staffers.

Sources told CNN that Abramoff might have thousands of e-mails in which he describes the influence-peddling in which he was involved and explains what lawmakers were doing in exchange for the money he was putting into their campaign coffers.

Abramoff's guilty plea comes as Democrats head into the 2006 congressional elections by blasting what they call a "culture of corruption" surrounding the Republican leadership.

About two-thirds of the more than $4.4 million in political donations from Abramoff, his clients and associates since 1998 went to Republicans, according to records compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics, a campaign-finance watchdog group. A search of Federal Election Commission records since 1998 found no personal donations from Abramoff to Democrats.

Republican Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana told The Washington Post in December that he would return $150,000 in contributions from Abramoff, his clients and associates. Burns is up for re-election in November, and state Democrats have been hammering him over his ties to the lobbyist.

DeLay's political action committee, Americans for a Republican Majority, has returned $5,000 from Abramoff, according to federal election records. The Texas congressman gave up his leadership post in September after his indictment on charges that he improperly steered corporate money into the state's 2002 legislative races -- a case unrelated to Abramoff's. DeLay's trial in Texas on money laundering charges is pending. He has pleaded not guilty.

And North Dakota Sen. Byron Dorgan said in December that he would return $67,000 in donations from Indian tribes Abramoff represented. Dorgan, the ranking Democrat on the Indian Affairs Committee that investigated Abramoff's dealings with his tribal clients, told a North Dakota newspaper that he would not keep any money that "could have been the result of any action Mr. Abramoff might have taken."

He praised the Justice Department for securing Abramoff's plea agreement, saying in a written statement Tuesday that it "confirms much of the work that we have done and much of what we have found."

CNN congressional correspondent Ed Henry contributed to this report.

Mr. Abramoff's Plea (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

OMINOUSLY FOR members of Congress and their staffers who enjoyed themselves at his expense and then did his bidding, disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff agreed yesterday to plead guilty to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. His deal follows a similar plea by Michael Scanlon, Mr. Abramoff's partner in lobbying and in crime. Mr. Abramoff admitted to bilking his clients, deceiving his law firm, misusing charities and lying on his income taxes. He also admitted to bribing at least one member of Congress and his staff, plying them with perks and being more than amply thanked by their help for his clients. Now that the two biggest private-sector targets in this case have agreed to cooperate, prosecutors can concentrate on the public officials involved.

As outlined in the charges filed against Mr. Abramoff, he and Mr. Scanlon "provided a stream of things of value" to a member of Congress and his staff, "including but not limited to a lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world-famous courses, tickets to sporting events and other entertainment, regular meals at defendant Abramoff's upscale restaurant, and campaign contributions for Representative #1, his political action committee, and other political committees on behalf of Representative #1." The public record makes clear that the unnamed representative is Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), chairman of the House Administration Committee.

If the allegations are true, Mr. Ney ought to be not only ashamed but also embarrassed at how cheaply he and his staff could be bought. "In exchange for those things of value," the document dryly recites, the lobbyists obtained "agreements to support and pass legislation, agreements to place statements into the Congressional Record, meetings with defendant Abramoff's clients, and advancing the application of a client of defendant Abramoff for a license to install wireless telephone infrastructure in the House of Representatives."

Most of these details were already known. But Mr. Abramoff's cooperation -- he's been talking behind the scenes to prosecutors for months -- could expand prosecutors' knowledge about his entanglements with other officials. Notable among them are former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), who took three overseas trips with Mr. Abramoff and received more than $70,000 from the lobbyist, his associates and tribal clients, and the former second-ranking official at the Interior Department, J. Steven Griles, the recipient of an Abramoff job offer and a target of numerous Abramoff-initiated lobbying contacts.

Mr. Abramoff's plea -- he agreed to pay $25 million in restitution and faces a lengthy prison term -- wouldn't have come about without enterprising journalism, the tenacity of Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and the skilled efforts of federal prosecutors. But one player remains notable for its absence: the House ethics committee, which has been silent and, for most of the past year, dysfunctional. It is critical that the panel -- and its Senate counterpart, if appropriate -- rouse itself to deal with the scandal in its midst.

Reed Opponents Link Candidate To Abramoff Plea (AP)

By Doug Gross

AP, January 4, 2006

ATLANTA - Opponents of former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed in his bid for lieutenant governor wasted no time Tuesday tying the Republican to embattled lobbyist Jack Abramoff - who pleaded guilty to federal conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud charges.

Reed has said he regrets funding a multistate antigambling campaign with money from Abramoff's gambling-industry clients. Reed angered religious groups - considered his political base - when it was revealed that his work was paid for by Indian tribes with casinos who were trying to shut down would-be competitors.

Reed has not been accused of a crime.

A spokeswoman for Reed did not respond to several telephone calls and e-mails by The Associated Press seeking comment on Tuesday.

"The only thing I can say is that if you're Ralph Reed, you're awfully nervous right now," said Greg Hecht, a former state senator seeking the Democratic nomination for lieutenant governor. "When you get certain candidates that seem to intimate they hold a higher moral position than others, it becomes a real problem and this may just be one step in a line of difficulties for him."

Former state representative and Department of Human Resources commissioner Jim Martin, of Atlanta, also is seeking the Democratic nomination.

Brad Alexander, spokesman for state Sen. Casey Cagle - Reed's opponent in the Republican primary - said Cagle remains focused on his own agenda, but was quick to link Reed to Abramoff's plea.

"We have every confidence the ongoing Justice Department investigation will fully review the evidence and continue to seek appropriate legal remedies on behalf of all those wronged by Jack Abramoff, Ralph Reed, and the others involved in this matter," Alexander said.

Abramoff agreed Tuesday with U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Huvelle when she said he had engaged in a conspiracy involving "corruption of public officials." The lobbyist also agreed when she said he and others had engaged in a scheme to provide campaign contributions, trips and other items "in exchange for certain official acts."

Prosecutors also say Abramoff and lobbying partner Michael Scanlon, who pleaded guilty in November, conspired to defraud Indian tribes in Louisiana, Michigan, Mississippi, New Mexico and Texas of millions of dollars.

Abramoff reaped roughly $20 million in hidden profits from the scheme, according to the information.

In a speech posted on Reed's campaign Web site in December, he said a lot of good came from his antigambling efforts. "Nevertheless, had I known then what I know now, I would not have undertaken that work," he said.

A campaign spokesman said Reed made the speech Dec. 9 before a Christian youth group in Alpharetta.

Throughout A City, Lessons Of The Fall (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

It was just past noon yesterday, about the time Jack Abramoff would be sitting down to lunch at Signatures, the restaurant he owned at Eighth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue NW. Over the roasted waluu ($19) or perhaps a starter of Kobe pot stickers ($12), he would be securing favors for his lobbying clients from well-fed lawmakers.

But the doors were locked at Signatures yesterday, the political memorabilia removed from the walls, the tablecloths gone, trash on the floor, dishes stacked on tables and stools stored on the counter of the still-stocked bar. A Zagat sticker in the window prematurely promised: "Rated Excellent 2006."

Instead of a table at the now-defunct restaurant, Abramoff had a lunchtime appointment three blocks down Pennsylvania, at the federal courthouse. There, in black raincoat and fedora, he pleaded guilty to conspiracy, fraud and tax offenses that could cost him $25 million and put him behind bars for at a least a decade.

"I just want to say words will not ever be able to express my sorrow and my profound regret for all my actions and mistakes," Abramoff, slouched over the defense table, said quickly and softly into the microphone. "For all of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done. I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and from those I have wronged or caused to suffer."

Abramoff cut a wretched figure as he shuffled into the courtroom of Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle. The once-athletic lobbyist was slouching, his newly overweight frame wrapped in a double-breasted suit. His hand shook when he took his oath. After his plea, he closed his eyes and looked as if he were going to cry. He accepted soothing pats on the back from his lawyer. He clasped his hands together and rubbed fingers as if attempting to thumb-wrestle himself. Only the cufflinks and sharp blue tie hinted at the vast wealth and power Abramoff had amassed.

Abramoff was not alone in his misery. Away on an extended recess, lawmakers and staffers who were involved in the lobbyist's schemes had to worry that Abramoff would testify against them. And President Bush, who had returned to Washington with hopes of switching the debate to comfortable terrain such as taxes and terrorism, would be bumped out of the news by more scandal.

"Culture of corruption," howled House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean demanded that Bush return more than $100,000 raised for him by Abramoff.

The lobbyist's old friends and beneficiaries only piled on. "Self-serving and fraudulent," charged Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), aka "Representative #1" in court papers.

"Outrageous," said White House spokesman Scott McClellan.

In public, Abramoff's only defenders yesterday were of the $500-per-hour variety. Superlawyer Abbe Lowell, complete with pocket handkerchief, did his best to help his client. He lent him a pen. He poured him some Poland Spring water. He stood at Abramoff's side and guided his client as he went through the plea ceremony.

"I am 46 years old, Your Honor," Abramoff told the judge. "I graduated from Georgetown University Law School."

Without hesitation, the defendant said he was giving up his right to trial without the influence of drugs or mental illness. But when Huvelle went through his misdeeds, Abramoff's voice grew tight and quiet.

"You failed to disclose" payments?

"Yes, Your Honor."

"You committed fraud?"

"Yes, Your Honor."

There were "misrepresentations made" about Abramoff's Capital Athletic Foundation?

Here Lowell whispered to his client. "That and other entities, Your Honor," Abramoff answered.

He admitted the "golfing trip to Scotland" was not for charitable purposes and agreed that he engaged in a public corruption scheme. "Yes, Your Honor," Abramoff said in a near-whisper. He took a sip of water.

You "provided things of value for an official act?"

"Yes, Your Honor."

"You have committed tax evasion?"

"Yes, Your Honor."

You filed "false and fraudulent forms?"

"Yes, Your Honor."

The disgrace continued for half an hour as Abramoff stood in the well, his fingertips pressing the table. The prosecutor, Mary Butler, told the judge that the lobbyist's passport has been surrendered and that, when Abramoff makes his restitution, "we would not expect it to be less" than $25 million. At this, the defendant gripped the table tightly.

Although prosecutors are recommending 9 1/2 to 11 years in prison, Huvelle repeatedly warned Abramoff that she is "not bound by these guidelines" and could sentence him to up to 30 years.

Abramoff rubbed his neck. "Yes, Your Honor."

The plea hearing was over, but not the ordeal. About 100 reporters formed a gantlet down the narrow hallway, peppering Abramoff -- "A statement outside?" "Jack, any reaction?" -- and following him to a waiting Town Car. Cameras pressed to the car's window, trained on the unhappy man in the black fedora. Even the loyal Lowell, climbing into the car, let a fleeting smile escape.

Plea Deal Stokes Anxiety On Hill Superlobbyist Abramoff Agrees To Help In Inquiry Involving Lawmakers (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard And Kevin Johnson

USA Today, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former superlobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty Tuesday to three felony counts of fraud, conspiracy and tax evasion, agreeing to help prosecutors in a wide-ranging probe of corruption in Congress.

Abramoff told U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle, “I plead guilty, your honor,” in a soft voice as each count was read. “All my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct,” he added before leaving the courtroom.

DOJ_NMG_0008053

Abramoff had close ties to Rep. Tom DeLay of Texas and other legislators. Over the past six years, Abramoff and Indian tribes he represented gave more than $4.4 million in political contributions to more than 240 lawmakers, nearly two-thirds to Republicans.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., on Tuesday became the latest to unload Abramoff-tainted money, announcing he would give more than $60,000 to charity.

"The fear level on Capitol Hill, on a scale of 100, is 105," said Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute. "Anybody touched by Abramoff is having difficulty sleeping these days."

Abramoff, 46, also was to plead guilty to two counts of fraud today in a second case, involving a Florida business deal to buy a casino boat business. He was indicted last year in that case.

As part of Tuesday's plea deal, Abramoff will repay those he cheated, but it's unclear whether he can fully repay the $25 million in losses. He also is liable for $1.7 million in back taxes and penalties. The charges carry maximum penalties of 30 years in jail, but sentencing guidelines and his cooperation could bring that down to about 10 years.

A charging document accompanying the plea deal described an arrangement between Abramoff and a House member previously identified as Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, by the lawmaker's attorney. The House member did favors for Abramoff clients in return for "a stream of things of value," including travel, meals and entertainment, the document says.

In a statement, Ney denied he had been influenced by Abramoff. "At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature" of his activities, the statement said.

The probe goes beyond Ney's office. At least 12 lawmakers, their aides or other officials are the focus of the probe, say two federal officials briefed on the matter but who aren't authorized to speak publicly about ongoing investigations. It's unclear how many congressional offices are involved.

Abramoff built his lobbying practice over the past decade, raking in millions of dollars from clients who sought to harness his close government ties, especially Congress' GOP majority.

His specialty was representing Indian tribes with gambling interests, promising to protect them from federal taxation and competition.

In Senate hearings last year, Abramoff was portrayed as a power broker run amok. Testimony from tribal leaders and e-mails between Abramoff and his partner, Michael Scanlon, showed how they enriched themselves from the $82 million they billed the tribes. Scanlon, a former DeLay aide, pleaded guilty in November to fraud and bribery.

Abramoff Deals, Congress Quakes (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann And Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - Washington's long-awaited "A-bomb" has gone off.

Super-lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea Tuesday to three felony counts sets the stage for the biggest congressional scandal perhaps in decades, certainly since the Republicans took over Congress 10 years ago, pledging clean government.

In exchange for his guilty pleas, in both the Washington case and a separate Florida case in which he was indicted last year, Mr. Abramoff will cooperate with federal prosecutors investigating members of Congress, Capitol Hill aides, and other lobbyists. Political players with ties to Abramoff and his network, who knew the lobbyist was preparing to cut a deal, have been sweating for months. Now they're sweating harder.

Though members of both parties are involved, analysts expect Republicans - who control both houses of Congress - to bear the brunt of the political fallout. Abramoff, who has close ties to former House majority leader Tom DeLay of Texas, allegedly funneled campaign donations to lawmakers, who were treated to lavish trips and meals, in exchange for official acts.

"It could end some careers," says Jennifer Duffy, an analyst at the non- partisan Cook Political report.

Stanley Brand, a Washington defense lawyer and former Democratic counsel to the House, predicts at least six members of Congress and at least as many staff will be convicted by the end of the year.

Besides Representative DeLay, who is already under indictment in Texas, other members who are already battling allegations over their associations with Abramoff include Sen. Conrad Burns (R) of Montana, Rep. Bob Ney (R) of Ohio, and Rep. John Doolittle (R) of California.

Federal campaign records show that about 220 members of Congress received some $1.7 million in political contributions from Abramoff and his associates and clients, including American Indian tribes, between 2001 and 2004. According to Bloomberg news service, 201 of those members are still in Congress; Republicans received 64 percent of that money.

Since the whiff of scandal began to emerge around Abramoff, members have been rushing to return his contributions or donate the money to charity. But not everyone who ever took Abramoff-related money or perks is guilty of wrongdoing.

"It's not enough to take a campaign contribution," says Mr. Brand. "What's criminal is accepting the contribution in return for an express agreement to perform an official act. Beyond campaign contributions, one can't accept bribes or gratuities of any kind in return for official acts." Members of the executive branch may also be implicated in the investigation, he says.

"The line between a bribe and a legal contribution is very thin, but it is that line that keeps you out of jail," says Larry Noble, executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics. "The critical element is whether there was an understanding or agreement to take specific action in return for the money."

Abramoff joins former associate Michael Scanlon, former press secretary to DeLay, as a witness for the prosecution. Mr. Scanlon reached a plea deal last year, which raised the stakes for Abramoff. The Department of Justice says the two men defrauded Indian tribes they represented out of tens of millions of dollars.

In exchange for the guilty plea and cooperation, Abramoff would probably get a reduced prison sentence. In the Washington case, he faces a maximum of 10 years; in the Florida case, in which he is pleading guilty to fraud and conspiracy in the purchase of a casino cruise line, he could get as many as seven years.

"Up until now, I've said it will involve just a few members," says Mr. Noble. "But if they've reached a plea agreement with Abramoff, it means he's turned over people higher than him, and they must have some pretty strong evidence.

The explosion of the Abramoff scandal also represents bad news for the White House, just as President Bush is preparing for his Jan. 31 State of the Union speech - an effort to build on the momentum he started last month, after a stumbling first year to his second term.

All of Washington is looking ahead to next November's midterm elections, and whether Congress's low approval ratings and Republican woes in particular can grow big enough to swing control of one or both houses of Congress to the Democrats. Polls show that so far, the Democrats' charge that Republicans have created a "culture of corruption" has not seeped into public consciousness. But, analysts say, the 2006 campaign has not started in earnest, and it's too soon to say how the public is perceiving the corruption message.

"This will crowd out a lot of the news about the new Bush agenda," says Paul Light, a political scientist at New York University. "He'll be going up to the Hill to present his agenda, and meanwhile you have six, 12, 20 members desperately trying to return money to Abramoff, and another bunch wondering how they will look in an orange jump suit."

If the Bush White House tries to minimize the scandal, "it feeds the view that Bush doesn't take ethics seriously," says Professor Light. Last year, a top White House aide, I. Lewis Libby, was indicted in the scandal surrounding the public revelation of a CIA agent's identity.

For Congress as an institution, the Abramoff scandal reinforces prevailing attitudes that are already set in stone, says Light, who has studied the issue of trust in politics. "The American public has become inured to congressional scandals, and as long as members are bringing home enough pork, they basically say, a pox on both their houses."

Lobbyist's Guilty Plea Signals Broadening Scandal In Washington (KRT)

By Steven Thomma And Alison Young

Knight Ridder, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON - The nation's capital braced Tuesday for a mushrooming political scandal as a well-connected lobbyist pleaded guilty to federal criminal charges and prepared to testify about members of Congress caught in his web of corruption.

Jack Abramoff, 46, invoked God as he apologized and pleaded guilty before a federal judge to one charge each of conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion. He faces a maximum of 30 years in prison - and another potential plea in a Florida indictment related to his purchase of a fleet of casino cruise ships from a man who was murdered a few months later.

By itself, the fall of a high-flying lobbyist who collected $80 million in fees from casino-rich Indian tribes, wined and dined politicians at his own upscale Washington restaurant, Signatures, and flew them abroad for golf outings was a dramatic tale.

But it was the likelihood that Abramoff now will help federal prosecutors go after members of Congress that gripped official Washington.

"This is going to grow and multiply," said Bill Mateja, a former top official in the Bush Justice Department who's now a Dallas lawyer. "If I were on Capitol Hill, I would be shaking in my boots. Because if anyone knows where the skeletons are buried, it's Jack Abramoff."

The Abramoff case could rival or surpass the 1980 Abscam case, in which an FBI sting trapped members of Congress taking bribes. Six members of the House of Representatives and one senator were convicted then.

It also could make it easier for Americans to see the free flow of money and lobbyist influence in Washington and affect the way they vote in this year's congressional elections. Democrats hope to benefit, but polls so far show both parties losing public esteem.

Justice Department officials said they hoped their extensive investigation would send a message about corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0008055

"Government officials and government action are not for sale," said Alice Fisher, an assistant attorney general. "The Justice Department will aggressively investigate and prosecute these types of cases, which have a devastating impact on the public's trust of government."

The scandal threatens to engulf several high-ranking lawmakers from both major political parties, including:

- Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, the chairman of the House Administration Committee, whose Web page identifies him as the "11th most powerful member of Congress." He took a golf trip to Scotland on Abramoff's tab, but says he did nothing wrong.

- Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, who was forced to step down last fall as House majority leader when he was indicted on a campaign-finance charge that isn't related to the Abramoff case. DeLay denies any wrongdoing in taking overseas trips financed by Abramoff. His spokesman said Tuesday that all of DeLay's actions were approved by the House ethics committee.

- Rep. John Doolittle, R-Calif., the secretary of the House Republican Conference, who took campaign contributions from Abramoff and whose wife was hired by an Abramoff foundation. Doolittle denies that his intervention in a California Indian casino case, which would've helped Abramoff, was connected to his relations to the lobbyist.

- Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., the Senate minority leader, who's denied that his intercession in an Indian-casino case that would've helped Abramoff was linked to a $5,000 contribution from an Abramoff client.

"Abramoff probably had relationships with lots more members of Congress," said Melanie Sloan, a former federal prosecutor, the head of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington and who's supported Democrats. "He's clearly been spilling his guts for several months."

Abramoff's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, said in a statement that his client "intends to continue to work with the Justice Department and others to fully resolve all matters of interest, to provide restitution to anyone he has harmed, and to seek absolution from all."

Abramoff would serve nine and a half to 11 years of his sentence under federal guidelines. That could be reduced further with his cooperation in the investigation. He also faces a fine of more than $750,000 and mandatory restitution estimated to be about $26.7 million - $1.7 million of that to the Internal Revenue Service for evading taxes, plus an undetermined amount of back taxes.

The lobbyist was contrite as he faced U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle.

"Your honor, words will not be able to ever express how sorry I am for this, and I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused," he said.

"All of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done. I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and from those I have wronged or caused to suffer. I will work hard to earn that redemption."

The most far-reaching charge said Abramoff corruptly influenced public officials and their relatives.

"Abramoff and others would offer and provide things of value to public officials, including trips, campaign contributions, meals and entertainment in exchange for agreements that the public officials would use their official positions and influence to benefit defendant Abramoff's clients and ... businesses," the federal charge said.

It didn't identify any public officials by name.

But it did say Abramoff influenced a House Committee chairman identified as "Representative A." It said Abramoff used "a lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world famous courses, tickets to sporting events ... regular meals at Abramoff's upscale restaurant, and campaign contributions" to win official favors from the congressman.

Representative A is apparently Ney.

An Abramoff partner, Michael Scanlon, who formerly had worked for DeLay, pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to bribe Ney. Ney has denied wrongdoing.

"At the time I dealt with Jack Abramoff, I obviously did not know, and had no way of knowing, the self-serving and fraudulent nature of Abramoff's activities," Ney said in a statement.

The plea bargain also said Abramoff had defrauded several Indian tribes by charging them huge fees while lying about his work or the way that money was funneled to him. For example, it said he urged them to hire other firms while concealing that he got a 50 percent kickback from more than $54 million that the tribes paid those firms.

Abramoff greased his relationships with golf trips, meals at his restaurant and seats in his luxury skyboxes at Washington sports events. He and his clients also contributed freely to campaigns, $4.4 million since 2000, according to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics.

With the investigation threatening to spread, several members of Congress recently returned campaign contributions to Abramoff, a trend that House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., joined Tuesday evening. He announced that he'd return $70,000 in contributions from Abramoff-related clients, including Indian tribes.

Previously, Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., returned $18,892. That amount included $1,892, the value of seats in Abramoff's skybox at a Washington sports arena, which Baucus had used but never reported.

Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., gave back $67,000 in Abramoff-related donations.

Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., returned more than $150,000 and summed up what probably is the prevailing attitude in Congress toward the once-popular lobbyist.

"This Abramoff guy is a bad guy," Burns told a Montana television station last month. "I hope he goes to jail and we never see him again. I wish he'd never been born, to be right honest with you."

Knight Ridder correspondents James Kuhnhenn and Maria Recio contributed to this report.

Abramoff Pleads Guilty To 5 Criminal Charges (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr. And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Pleading for forgiveness from "the Almighty and those I have wronged," an ashen Jack A. Abramoff, once the most powerful lobbyist on Capitol Hill, stood before a federal judge today and pleaded guilty to a vast scheme of fraud and tax evasion that could send him to prison for nine to 30 years.

Abramoff now becomes the chief witness for the prosecution in its influence-peddling probe of Congress that some say presages the biggest corruption scandal on Capitol Hill in nearly three decades. It has already ensnared at least one member of Congress and two former congressional aides, and could now lead into unknown territory.

The plea includes a requirement that Abramoff cooperate truthfully in the widespread probe of his actions over a decade-long period, a process that could significantly reduce his jail time. Abramoff also must make restitution of some $25 million and pay a little more than $1.7 million in back taxes to the IRS.

Speaking softly, at times barely above a whisper, Abramoff, 46, responded with simple "yes" and "no" answers as he entered the guilty pleas during a 50-minute session before U.S. Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle.

Abramoff wore a rumpled black suit and appeared pale as he stood beside his lawyer, Abbe Lowell, in the packed fourth-floor courtroom. At the end of the court session, Abramoff stood and, with the judge's permission, read from a folded piece of paper.

"I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and those I have wronged or caused to suffer," Abramoff said in his brief statement. "Words will not ever be able to express how sorry I am for this, and I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused."

The indictment caps an intensive and sweeping investigation that the FBI launched in March 2004, and Abramoff's promised cooperation gives that probe a powerful impetus.

Justice Department officials said at a news conference that the fallen dealmaker had already begun sharing information and documents with them.

Officials declined to discuss additional charges, but said they were moving expeditiously, and some legal experts said they expected the agreement would lead to a cascading series of new charges.

"This is just the beginning," said Stanley Brand, a Washington lawyer and former general counsel of the House of Representatives.

"That is the pattern of the Justice Department. They start with the lobbyists and the outsiders, and they build into the public officials," he said. "The members of Congress are the highest point in the food chain."

The scandal is "about an eight on the Richter scale, and it is probably going to be a nine before it is all over," Brand said.

Abramoff's jail sentence will be set at a later date and will depend on his continued cooperation, according to Mary Butler, the lead prosecutor. The counts of conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion could mean a prison term of up to 30 years. But federal sentencing guidelines call for 9 to 11½ years, officials said.

Abramoff and his attorney left the courthouse without further comment.

Abramoff also has agreed to plead guilty to wire fraud charges in a case in Florida relating to the purchase of a fleet of casino gambling boats, according to Neil Sonnett, his attorney in that case.

The sentences in the two cases are expected to be served concurrently.

Under today's plea agreement, which mirrors charges brought earlier against one of his former partners, Michael P.S. Scanlon, Abramoff admitted to engaging in a conspiracy to defraud Indian tribes of more than $20 million through a secret kickback arrangement.

Scanlon already has entered a guilty plea to a parallel conspiracy charge and has promised to cooperate in the probe.

Abramoff also admitted to defrauding his former law firm, Greenberg Traurig, by having clients direct payments to entities he controlled, bypassing the firm.

DOJ_NMG_0008057

According to court documents, Abramoff and Scanlon hid the millions of dollars in fees by persuading Indian tribe clients with casino interests to pay consulting fees to companies and a nonprofit corporation that Abramoff had set up. The two then shared the excess profits "pursuant to their secret agreement."

Abramoff, according to the charges, lied to the tribes, telling them that he was working for nothing and, in some cases, denying any connection to the companies getting the payments. So bold were Abramoff and Scanlon in the scheme they called "Gimme Five," said a federal prosecutor, that in one case they simultaneously collected fees from two Indian tribes on the opposite sides of the same issue.

Though court documents refer only to "Representative One," the documents describe specific actions taken by Rep. Robert Ney (R-Ohio), the chairman of a key House committee.

Abramoff admitted to providing things of value to Ney and members of his staff, including "a lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world famous courses, tickets to sporting events and other entertainment." In return, the documents state, Scanlon and Abramoff got Ney's agreement to support specific legislation and favor an Abramoff client seeking a contract to provide wireless phone services to the U.S. House.

Ney, whose actions also had been cited in the Scanlon case, issued a brief statement denying that he had done anything wrong.

"Congressman Ney has never done anything illegal or improper and the allegations in this plea agreement do not change this fact," said Ney's spokesman, Brian J. Walsh.

A prosecutor, citing the items Abramoff provided to Ney and his staff in return for specific actions, said, "That's not lobbying, that's a crime."

In addition to Ney, the documents filed today for the first time describe specific actions taken by two unnamed former congressional aides who worked in collaboration with Abramoff and Scanlon.

One, "Staffer A", solicited a Michigan Indian tribe to make a $25,000 payment to the Abramoff-controlled Capital Athletic Foundation. Abramoff then "used this money for his personal and professional benefit to partially pay for a golfing trip to Scotland for himself, public officials, members of his staff and others." That same staffer, according to court documents, solicited a distilled beverage company that had hired Abramoff's firm for a $25,000 payment that was funneled to the same nonprofit to fund the same overseas trip.

Another staffer, described as a former chief of staff to Ney and a former chief of staff to the House Administration Committee, was cited in the documents for violating a restriction barring former aides from lobbying their bosses for a year after leaving the public payroll.

Lobbyist Accepts Deal And Becomes Witness In Corruption Case (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to three felony counts on Tuesday as part of a settlement with federal prosecutors, instantly becoming the star witness in a sweeping federal investigation into public corruption in Washington. The inquiry could involve as many as a dozen lawmakers, people involved in the case said.

Mr. Abramoff, 46, once a prominent Republican lobbyist, accepted a recommended reduced prison sentence of about 10 years in exchange for testifying against former associates in the influence-peddling case. The agreement also requires Mr. Abramoff to pay more than $26 million in tax penalties and restitution to former clients, although he has told associates he is broke.

The corruption inquiry involving Mr. Abramoff, potentially one of the most explosive in Congressional history, has expanded in recent months to encompass dozens of political operatives, including former Congressional aides and lobbyists suspected of arranging bribes in exchange for legislative work, participants in the case said.

His testimony, coupled with that of Michael Scanlon, a former Abramoff business associate who pleaded guilty in November, reaches into the executive and legislative branches and appears to be drawing an ever-tighter ring of evidence around the former House Republican majority leader, Tom DeLay, and other senior Congressional Republicans.

Standing hunched in a dark suit in front of a Federal District Court judge, his eyes downcast as the plea deal was announced, Mr. Abramoff bore little resemblance to the brash operative who in hundreds of e-mails messages obtained by prosecutors once boasted about his financial kickbacks, referring to them as a "gimme five" scheme.

Instead, in front of Judge Ellen Huvelle, Mr. Abramoff confessed to making "a multitude of mistakes" during a decade or so of lobbying work. In a soft, grainy voice, he pleaded guilty to defrauding at least four Indian tribes of tens of millions of dollars, enticing government officials with bribes and evading taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0008058

"All of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done," Mr. Abramoff said. Emerging from the courthouse into a light drizzle wearing a black fedora, he slipped into a waiting car and was driven away. His next public appearance is scheduled for Wednesday in Florida, when he will plead guilty in a related case.

Mr. DeLay, who has taken in thousands in campaign donations from Mr. Abramoff and accompanied the lobbyist on a lavish golf trip to Scotland in 2000, has denied any wrongdoing. Richard Cullen, a former United States attorney representing Mr. DeLay, said his client "is confident that when the Department of Justice completes its investigation and gets to the bottom of this that they will conclude that he did nothing wrong." No lawmaker has been charged in the case.

Court documents filed Tuesday gave a snapshot of what Mr. Abramoff has been telling investigators during their plea negotiations over the last year and a half.

In one instance cited in court documents, Mr. Abramoff directed favors to a senior DeLay staff member - referred to in documents as "Staffer A," but identified by lawyers as Tony C. Rudy, now a Republican lobbyist. Those favors came in the form of payments to Mr. Rudy's wife, Lisa. Mr. Abramoff paid $50,000 to Lisa Rudy through a charity organization in exchange for her husband's "agreement to perform a series of official acts," the plea agreement said.

"Abramoff, Scanlon and others engaged in a course of conduct through which one or both of them offered and provided a stream of things of value to public officials in exchange for a series of official acts and influence," the agreement states.

Also mentioned in the plea agreement was a "Representative No. 1" who, along with members of his staff, accepted gifts, travel and free meals at Mr. Abramoff's restaurant, Signatures, in exchange for legislative help, including inserting a comment into the Congressional Record designed to help Mr. Abramoff with a business deal. Representative Bob Ney, Republican of Ohio, was identified as this figure after court documents were filed in connection with Mr. Scanlon's plea deal. Although Mr. Ney did not deny his association with Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Scanlon on Tuesday, he insisted, as he has in the past, that he was tricked by the two men into doing work on behalf of their lobbying clients.

According to people involved in the case, Mr. Ney's former chief of staff, Neil Volz, is referred to in the documents as "Staffer B," and is accused in the paperwork of violating the one-year lobbying ban after leaving Mr. Ney's office before beginning to lobby his former boss again. Lawyers for Mr. Rudy and Mr. Volz did not return calls seeking comment.

Mr. Abramoff helped funnel more than $1.5 million in campaign donations to hundreds of elected officials, more than half of them Republican, since 2000, according to analyses of his work. As prosecutors threatened to indict him - and ultimately, late Monday night, worked out a negotiated settlement after weeks of intense wrangling - the government's lawyers argued that Mr. Abramoff had gone past the routine business of campaign fund-raising and political glad-handing into the realm of bribery. Or, as Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher put it on Tuesday, Mr. Abramoff "went far beyond lawful lobbying."

"Government officials and government action are not for sale," Ms. Fisher said, flanked by senior law enforcement officials at a news conference at the Justice Department.

As part of his all-encompassing settlement, Mr. Abramoff plans to plead guilty on Wednesday to two charges of conspiracy and fraud in a related case in Miami stemming from his purchase of a casino boat line, SunCruz Casinos, in 2000. He was scheduled to stand trial in that case next Monday.

That plea provides that all other charges against Mr. Abramoff in the case will be dropped, people familiar with the plea agreement said. He may face up to about seven years of prison time for the Florida charges, but that sentence can be served concurrently with the Washington sentence under the terms of his deal with Justice Department prosecutors. How much time Mr. Abramoff will spend in prison will be determined later, after he has fulfilled most of his obligation to help investigators.

Mr. Abramoff has been in talks with prosecutors for some 18 months, his lawyer in Washington, Abbe D. Lowell, said. According to people involved in the case, all of whom spoke on condition of anonymity because the broader investigation is continuing, Mr. Abramoff at times offered guidance to investigators as they pursued other targets.

According to participants in the case, he has shared information about David H. Safavian, a former Bush administration official indicted last year, and Tim Flanigan, the Tyco executive who withdrew his nomination as the second-in-command at the Justice Department after his ties to Mr. Abramoff came into question.

Tyco is also mentioned, although not by name, in the plea agreement. According to the court document, Mr. Abramoff sent a business proposal to "Company A," a manufacturing and services company identified by participants as Tyco. Mr. Abramoff "falsely advised" the company about the grass-roots company that he suggested they hire, and which in turn kicked back huge sums to Mr. Abramoff.

Mr. Abramoff told Tyco "that he was negotiating on their behalf" to try to save them money "when in fact he was simply setting a high price on services that he controlled and from which he would profit."

The publicly released court documents, followed by the Justice Department's news conference about the case, were designed as a "shot across the bow" to other potential suspects in the inquiry, a person involved said.

DOJ_NMG_0008059

"With most cases, the plea is the end, but with Abramoff, the plea is just the beginning," said an F.B.I. official who spoke on condition of anonymity, adding, "This one has legs."

Abramoff Pleads Guilty To 3 Counts (WP)

By Susan Schmidt And James V. Grimaldi

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

Jack Abramoff, the once-powerful lobbyist at the center of a wide-ranging public corruption investigation, pleaded guilty yesterday to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials in a deal that requires him to provide evidence about members of Congress.

The plea deal could have enormous legal and political consequences for the lawmakers on whom Abramoff lavished luxury trips, skybox fundraisers, campaign contributions, jobs for their spouses, and meals at Signatures, the lobbyist's upscale restaurant.

In court papers, prosecutors refer to only one congressman: Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio). But Abramoff, who built a political alliance with House Republicans, including former majority leader Tom DeLay of Texas, has agreed to provide information and testimony about half a dozen House and Senate members, officials familiar with the inquiry said. He also is to provide evidence about congressional staffers, Interior Department workers and other executive branch officials, and other lobbyists.

"The corruption scheme with Mr. Abramoff is very extensive," Alice S. Fisher, head of the Justice Department's criminal division, said at a news conference with other high-ranking officials of the Internal Revenue Service and the FBI. "We're going to follow this wherever it goes."

Fisher declined to identify the officials under scrutiny. "We name people in indictments," she said, adding: "We are moving very quickly."

Among the allegations in the court documents is that Abramoff arranged for payments totaling $50,000 for the wife of an unnamed congressional staffer in return for the staffer's help in killing an Internet gambling measure. The Washington Post has previously reported that Tony Rudy, a former top aide to DeLay, worked with Abramoff to kill such a bill in 2000 before going to work for Abramoff.

Abramoff's appearance in U.S. District Court came nearly two years after his lobbying practices gained public notice because of the enormous payments -- eventually tallied at $82 million -- that he and a public relations partner received from casino-rich Indian tribes. Yesterday, he admitted defrauding four of those tribal clients out of millions of dollars. He also pleaded guilty to evading taxes, to conspiring to bribe lawmakers, and to conspiring to induce former Capitol Hill staffers to violate the one-year ban on lobbying their former bosses.

Under terms of his plea agreement, Abramoff can expect to receive a prison sentence of 9 1/2 to 11 years, and he is required to make restitution of $26.7 million to the IRS and to the Indian tribes he defrauded. Today he is to plead guilty to fraud and conspiracy counts in a related case in Florida involving his purchase of a casino cruise line.

Standing before U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle in Washington yesterday, Abramoff looked sheepish and sad. "Your Honor, words will not be able to ever express how sorry I am for this, and I have profound regret and sorrow for the multitude of mistakes and harm I have caused," he said softly. "All of my remaining days, I will feel tremendous sadness and regret for my conduct and for what I have done. I only hope that I can merit forgiveness from the Almighty and from those I have wronged or caused to suffer."

Abramoff has been in extensive discussions with government lawyers for months leading up to yesterday's plea.

Ney, chairman of the House Administration Committee, is among the first of those expected to feel the fallout. In the court documents -- which identify him only as "Representative #1" -- Ney is accused of meeting with one of Abramoff's clients in Russia in 2003 to "influence the process for obtaining a [U.S.] visa" for one of the client's relatives and of agreeing to aid a California tribe represented by Abramoff on tax and post office issues.

Ney also placed comments in the Congressional Record backing Abramoff's efforts to gain control of the Florida gambling company, SunCruz Casinos, and offered legislative language sought by Abramoff that would have reopened a Texas tribe's shuttered casino.

The court papers said Ney advanced the prospects of an Abramoff client, a telecommunications company that won a contract to wire the House.

Two of Abramoff's former partners have already pleaded guilty and have promised to cooperate in the ongoing investigation of congressional corruption and are prepared to testify against Ney in connection with his aid in the SunCruz purchase. Prosecutors in Florida and Washington are in discussions about where a case against Ney should be brought, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0008060

Ney reiterated yesterday that he had done nothing wrong and said he was misled by Abramoff.

One of Abramoff's former associates, Michael Scanlon, a onetime press aide to DeLay, was a secret partner in Abramoff's Indian tribal scheme. Abramoff not only charged the tribes lobbying fees but also urged them to hire Scanlon's public relations firm at hugely inflated prices. Scanlon, in turn, kicked back half of the money to Abramoff, who was thus able to conceal the funds from public disclosure and even from the lobbyist's law firm.

They spread tribal money around and sought legislative favors in return. Abramoff and Scanlon "offered and provided a stream of things of value to public officials in exchange for official acts and influence and agreements to provide official action and influence," a statement of facts attached to the plea agreement said. "These things of value included, but are not limited to, foreign and domestic travel, golf fees, frequent meals, entertainment, election support for candidates for government office, employment for relatives of officials and campaign contributions."

Among the things of interest to investigators are payments made by Abramoff and his colleagues to the wives of some lawmakers and actions taken by Rudy and other senior Capitol Hill aides, some of whom went to work for Abramoff at the law firm Greenberg Traurig LLP, lawyers and others familiar with the probe said.

Another person under scrutiny, sources said, is DeLay, who is facing separate campaign finance charges in his home state of Texas.

"Tom DeLay is not concerned that Mr. Abramoff is cooperating," said Richard Cullen, his attorney. "He urges everyone involved to cooperate in the investigation and to tell the truth." Cullen had no comment on allegations involving former DeLay aides Rudy and Scanlon.

Among the trips under scrutiny is a golf excursion to Scotland that DeLay and aides took with Abramoff in 2000 and a similar trip Ney took two years later.

DeLay has taken three overseas trips with Abramoff since 1997 -- to the Mariana Islands, Russia and Scotland -- and received more than $70,000 from Abramoff, his associates and tribal clients for his campaign committees.

Investigating DeLay could take up to a year and require the cooperation of other witnesses before issues surrounding the Texas Republican are resolved, according to people familiar with the case.

Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) and other legislators involved with Indian issues are among those being investigated, sources said.

A spokesman for Doolittle, whose wife received payments from Abramoff's lobbying firm, has previously said there was no connection with her husband's work. Burns's office has said his actions on behalf of Abramoff's tribal clients were in sync with his support for improving the lot of Indian tribes.

Also of interest to prosecutors is former deputy interior secretary J. Steven Griles, who held the job from 2001 to 2004. He has said he never tried to intercede on behalf of Abramoff's clients, but e-mails released by a Senate committee show more than half a dozen contacts Griles had with Abramoff or with a woman working as the lobbyist's go-between.

Prosecutors are continuing to investigate two of DeLay's top former deputies, Rudy and Edwin A. Buckham. Rudy is under investigation for assistance he allegedly provided Abramoff's lobbying clients while he was working for DeLay. Payments from Abramoff clients and associates to Liberty Consulting -- a political firm founded by Rudy's wife, Lisa -- are also under review by the Justice Department. Rudy did not return calls seeking comment yesterday.

Abramoff maintained a business relationship with Buckham, who runs the Alexander Strategy Group with Rudy. Among the areas of interest to prosecutors is client business directed to the Alexander Strategy Group when the firm was hiring the spouses of members of Congress, including DeLay's wife, Christine.

Christine DeLay was paid about $115,000 over three years while performing a special project -- contacting members of Congress to find out their favorite charity, according to her attorney.

Fisher, offering the Justice Department's first public comments on an inquiry that began in spring 2004, said that the Abramoff case is "very active and ongoing." She said the department is committed to making sure that people know "government is not for sale."

Abramoff Pleads Guilty To Federal Charges (Hchron)

By Micheal Hedges

Houston Chronicle, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Prominent lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who had several ties to former House majority leader Tom DeLay of Sugar Land, pleaded guilty today to conspiracy, fraud and tax evasion charges,bringing a wide-ranging corruption probe to the doors of Congress.

As part of his plea bargain, Abramoff is expected to cooperate with prosecutors in their examination of the actions of several congressmen and their top aides. The charges could carry a prison sentence of up to 30 years.

The charges mentioned gifts and contributions to an unnamed House member who has been identified as Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, chairman of the House Administration Committee, allegedly in return for favors.

Ney has not been charged. He and DeLay have denied wrongdoing.

Abramoff agreed with U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Huvelle when she said that he had engaged in a conspiracy involving "corruption of public officials." The lobbyist also agreed when she said he and others had engaged in a scheme to provide campaign contributions, trips and other items "in exchange for certain official acts."

Court papers said Abramoff corruptly gave "money, meals, trips and entertainment to public officials and their relatives with the intent to influence and in return for agreements to perform official acts" benefiting Abramoff, former business partner Michael Scanlon and their clients. The papers said Abramoff caused former congressional aides to lobby their former bosses within a one-year window of employment, during which they are barred from such activities.

Scanlon, DeLay's former press secretary, pleaded guilty in November.

Abramoff was also expected to plead guilty today to two criminal charges in Florida involving a 2000 purchase of a fleet of gambling boats.

U.S. District Judge Paul C. Huck has scheduled a telephone conference for later today on the Florida case.

Abramoff was pressured to plea bargain there when former partner, Adam Kidan pleaded guilty recently to fraud and conspiracy in connection with the SunCruz boat deal.

In Washington, prosecutors say Abramoff and Scanlon conspired to defraud their Indian tribe lobbying clients of about $82 million after being hired to pave the way for gambling casinos and to block others.

Last month, five members of Congress — Rep. Ernest Istook, R-Okla.; Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan.; Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont.; Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont.; and Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D. — returned or gave away campaign donations from Abramoff.

DeLay and Abramoff went on two trips together that have been reviewed by investigators, one to Britain in 2000 and one to the Northern Mariana Islands during the New Year's holiday of 1998. Also, Abramoff clients made donations to DeLay political organizations.

The two men are also linked through several former DeLay staff members who eventually became wealthy working with Abramoff.

DeLay once called Abramoff his best friend.

DeLay attorney Richard Cullen declined to comment Monday amid reports Abramoff would strike a deal with prosecutors.

He has said previously that there was no indication the congressman is in jeopardy from the Abramoff investigation.

"Mr. DeLay is not concerned about the potential of Mr. Abramoff cooperating with the government," Cullen said in a recent interview. "Mr. DeLay thinks everybody should be cooperating (with investigators) and telling the truth."

Cullen said he met with federal prosecutors early in the probe and offered them DeLay's cooperation. Asked if any DeLay records or documents had been subpoenaed by investigators, Cullen said no records were sought.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan today said he did not know whether Abramoff ever met President Bush. Of Abramoff, McClellan said, "What he is reportedly acknowledged doing is unacceptable and outrageous."

"If laws were broken, he must be held to account for what he did," McClellan added.

In October, Bush appointee David Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, was indicted on charges he made false statements and obstructed a federal investigation into his dealings with lobbyist Abramoff.

Meanwhile, the prosecutor in the Texas money laundering case against DeLay issued subpoenas today looking for links between Abramoff and fundraising by the former majority leader.

District Attorney Ronnie Earle issued the subpoenas in Austin.

In the Texas case, Earle sought records from Abramoff's former employers, legal firms Greenberg Traurig LLP and Preston Gates Ellis & Rouvelas Meeds, LLP. He also subpoenaed records from a lawyer for the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, a former Abramoff client, and from a representative for the Barona Band of Mission Indians, a California tribe.

Will DeLay Go Down With His Friend? (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON – Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and lobbyist Jack Abramoff had been friends for years, trading easily on each other's success.

One rose to the pinnacle of power in Congress. The other became the most sought-after lobbyist in town. They built a politically potent network of former aides, lobbyists and comrades-in-arms.

DOJ_NMG_0008062

The question hanging over Washington on Tuesday: Could Mr. Abramoff's plummet and plea deal drag down his longtime ally?

"A lot of people, including Mr. DeLay's political enemies, are hoping that's the case. But I believe they'll be disappointed," said DeLay attorney Richard Cullen.

"DeLay has conducted himself consistently with the standards of conduct in the House and has violated no laws. So he's at peace in terms of where this investigation will end up, and it's premature to jump at the conclusion that Abramoff has information that's troubling to Mr. DeLay," Mr. Cullen said.

The Washington Post reported today that investigators have Mr. DeLay under scrutiny. The financial and political ties between the Sugar Land Republican and Mr. Abramoff are extensive, and their histories and causes are intertwined.

"There is no way this is good for him. How bad it will be will depend on what else we see happen," said Larry Noble, executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics, which studies campaign finance.

In court Tuesday, Mr. Abramoff – facing up to 11 years in prison and $27 million in restitution – confessed to providing all sorts of favors to just one lawmaker, and it wasn't Mr. DeLay. He told the court he'd provided the lawmaker, understood to be Ohio Republican Bob Ney, a "lavish trip to Scotland to play golf on world-famous courses, tickets to sporting events and other entertainment," meals at Mr. Abramoff's upscale restaurant and generous campaign donations – largesse he also bestowed on Mr. DeLay.

Targets unknown

Prosecutors cited several favors that Mr. Ney offered in return, including help with Mr. Abramoff's purchase of a fleet of casino ships. Justice Department and FBI officials have offered no such examples involving Mr. DeLay, and they wouldn't say whether they're digging or expect to learn of any in coming months.

Mr. Abramoff and Mr. DeLay worked closely on many projects, traveling together to the Mariana Islands, Russia and the United Kingdom, ostensibly under the auspices of a conservative Washington think tank, the National Center for Public Policy Research. Mr. Abramoff sat on the group's board, and reports surfaced that two of his clients each donated $25,000 to the nonprofit a day before the Britain junket.

House rules prohibit travel paid for by lobbyists or their clients, though Mr. DeLay and other lawmakers on the trip say they had no idea where the group got the funds.

Mr. Abramoff and his partner, former DeLay press secretary Michael Scanlon – who has also pleaded guilty and cooperated with federal prosecutors – routinely boasted of their connections with the majority leader when selling their services to Indian tribes and others.

The Marianas connection could also provide investigators an interesting trail. Mr. DeLay sought to protect the garment industry on the islands, an American commonwealth in the Pacific, from U.S. labor laws.

In 1999, during a power struggle in the local legislature, two former DeLay aides, Ed Buckham and Mr. Scanlon, went to Saipan to persuade two lawmakers to switch sides in a leadership vote, dangling promises of federal largesse for which Mr. DeLay reportedly paved the way later. The favored candidate won and later awarded Mr. Abramoff a contract worth $1.6 million.

During the Marianas visit, Mr. DeLay called Mr. Abramoff "one of my closest and dearest friends," though by early 2004, when a Senate committee had begun investigating the lobbyist, Mr. DeLay tried to distance himself, telling reporters that "if anybody is trading on my name to get clients or make money, that is wrong and they should stop it."

Mr. DeLay and Mr. Abramoff also collaborated closely on the K Street Project, an effort to pressure Washington's premier lobbying firms to shun Democrats and stock their staffs with GOP loyalists. At one point, the House ethics panel reprimanded Mr. DeLay for threatening retaliatory legislation against a trade group for hiring a Democrat as its top lobbyist.

Critics have raised questions about the $115,000 that the congressman's wife, Christine DeLay, was paid over four years by Alexander Strategy Group – a firm led by Mr. Buckham and other former DeLay aides that got client referrals from Mr. Abramoff – for researching the charitable preferences of lawmakers. The DeLays said the work was real and the pay justified.

In the clear?

Jan Baran, a Republican ethics lawyer who once represented Speaker Newt Gingrich, said the plea deal might carry no implications for Mr. DeLay.

"There's nothing in there that involves him or suggests his involvement. ... If the Justice Department has some information about other public officials, they presumably would have included it by now," he said.

He noted that courts are strict when it comes to enforcing bribery law. Prosecutors must prove quid pro quo – Latin for "something for something." Mr. DeLay got favors from Mr. Abramoff. But so did several hundred colleagues.

Bribery would require proving the legislators offered a specific legislative favor in exchange for the power lunches, golf outings, trips and campaign cash. Accepting such dining and activities without the promise of legislative action is routine and legal in Washington.

"Lawful lobbying does not include paying a public official a personal benefit with the understanding, explicit or implicit, that a certain official act will occur. That's not lobbying. That's a crime," said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, carefully sidestepping the issue of which lawmakers the Justice Department is targeting.

Investigating Mr. DeLay could take up to a year and require the cooperation of other witnesses before issues surrounding him are resolved, people familiar with the case told The Post..

As speculation bubbled about what Mr. Abramoff could offer federal authorities, there was activity involving Mr. DeLay in Austin.

Travis County prosecutor Ronnie Earle obtained subpoenas Tuesday for donations from two former Abramoff law firms – Greenberg Traurig and Preston Gates – to Mr. DeLay's state political action committee, Texans for a Republican Majority.

The grand jury, which is investigating money-laundering allegations against Mr. DeLay and several lieutenants, also ordered records of campaign donations from Mr. Abramoff's biggest lobbying client, the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians.

Staff writers Michelle Mittelstadt and Allen Pusey in Washington, and Pete Slover in Austin, contributed to this report.

Abramoff's Plea Tightens Noose Around Some Necks (KHOU-TV)

By Shern-Min Chow

KHOU-TV, CBS 11, Houston, TX, January 4, 2006

A high-powered lobbyist with ties to congressman Tom Delay cut a tell-all deal with the Feds.

What does Jack Abramoff's guilty plea mean for DeLay?

No question that's the big question now. How will this impact the former House Majority Leader and word is, about a dozen other congressmen.

None of Tuesday's charges connect Abramoff and DeLay, but Travis County's prosecutor is now issuing subpoenas for records linking the Sugar Land Republican to the lobbyist.

Insiders believe the noose is tightening on some after Abramoff's guilty plea.

Jack Abramoff's guilty pleas, revealed among other things, a stunning fraud scheme. He admits to bilking Indian tribes of more than $60 million and getting nearly half of that in kickbacks.

"Abramoff admitted today to his participation in an extensive corruption shceme. Abramoff gave things of value to public officials including foreign and domestic trips, campaign contributions, excessive meal and entertainment," said Justice Department spokesperson Alice Fisher.

He says those gifts bought legislative favors for his clients.

"As admitted by Abramoff, his actions often produced the official influence he sought," said Fisher.

The immediate fallout to Congressman DeLay? Late Tuesday, his office announced he will donate funds from Abramoff to local charities.

His office says an accounting process is now underway.

DeLay has received at least $57,000 in political contributions from Abramoff, his lobbying associates or tribal clients.

Experts say federal prosecutors will now move onto congressional aides

"The noose is tightening and its tightening through the use of people who are in direct contact with members of Congress," said Stan Brand, former U.S. House Counsel.

Some of those aides also enjoyed the lavish trips. Insiders believe at least a dozen congressmen will be under fire from Abramoff's deal.

In a carefully orchestrated appearance, he told the federal court, "words will not ever be able to express my sorrow and my profound regret."

But the punishment may. Abramoff will pay $25 million in restitution, $1.7 million in unpaid taxes, and prosecutors will recommend a prison sentence of 9 to 11 years.

Wednesday, he appears in Florida on charges relating to a fleet of gambling boats. He's expected to plead guilty to 2 to 6 other charges.

DeLay May Face New Jeopardy As Abramoff Probers Target Ex-Aide (BLOOM)

By Michael Forsythe Jonathan D. Salant

Bloomberg, January 4, 2006

Jan. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Jack Abramoff's guilty plea yesterday pushed the federal investigation of the lobbyist deep into the office of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay by implicating one of his top ex-staffers.

People close to the investigation identified the ``Staffer A'' mentioned on page 13 of Abramoff's 15-page plea agreement as DeLay's former deputy chief of staff, Tony Rudy. While a member of DeLay's staff, Rudy helped Abramoff stop a measure that would have prohibited Internet gambling, according to the government. In return, Rudy's wife was paid $50,000 through a non-profit group, the government says. DeLay himself isn't named in the agreement.

The link to DeLay is at least the third to emerge in a 20- month investigation of Abramoff's ties with lawmakers, and it comes as DeLay, 58, fights separate money-laundering charges in Texas that forced him to step down as House majority leader.

Abramoff, 46, told a federal judge in Washington he will cooperate with prosecutors investigating political corruption.

``If I were DeLay, I would be very concerned," said Bill Mateja, a white-collar criminal-defense lawyer with Fish & Richardson PC in Dallas and formerly a senior counsel in the Justice Department's corporate criminal task force. ``A staffer is certainly a subject of the investigation. Whether it takes them all the way to DeLay, we'll have to wait and see."

Rudy didn't return a phone call seeking comment.

Legal Cloud

Abramoff's agreement to cooperate may scuttle DeLay's chances of returning as majority leader, because the Texas Republican may continue to be under a legal shadow for many more months. President George W. Bush said in an interview with Fox News Channel on Dec. 14 that he hoped Delay would be able to reclaim the majority leader's post because of his success in passing legislation.

``Do I? Yes, I do," the president said when asked whether he thought DeLay was innocent in the Texas case. He added, ``When he's over there, we get our votes through the House."

Abramoff's plea also increases the political jeopardy for Republicans in general during this election year, since most of the donations from the lobbyist and his former associates and clients went to members of that party.

Abramoff pleaded guilty yesterday to tax evasion, wire fraud and conspiring to corrupt public officials. He is set to plead guilty today to conspiracy and wire fraud in a separate case in federal court in Miami and will cooperate with prosecutors, according to a copy of the plea agreement obtained by Bloomberg News. The government will dismiss four other charges against him in connection with his purchase of a casino cruise-ship line in 2000, the agreement says.

Legislative Favors

The plea agreement in Washington charged Abramoff with conspiring to corrupt ``Representative #1," previously identified as Representative Robert Ney, an Ohio Republican, in return for legislative favors for the lobbyist's clients. Neither Ney nor DeLay has been charged.

``The corruption scheme with Mr. Abramoff is very extensive, and we will continue to follow it wherever it leads," Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher told reporters. ``This case is very active and ongoing."

In November, former DeLay spokesman Michael Scanlon, Abramoff's business partner, pleaded guilty to helping the lobbyist defraud Indian-tribe clients of more than $50 million. Scanlon is also cooperating with investigators.

Not Concerned

DeLay's lawyer, Richard Cullen, said DeLay isn't concerned that Abramoff's plea arrangement will put the lawmaker in jeopardy.

``He's not apprehensive about this, because he knows he hasn't done anything wrong and he's confident that will be the ultimate conclusion," Cullen said.

Cullen said he couldn't comment on Rudy, saying DeLay has always demanded that his staff ``comply to the highest ethics and violate no laws. He would have no tolerance with staffers that did not obey the law."

About 220 lawmakers received at least $1.7 million in political donations from Abramoff, his associates and nine tribal clients between 2001 and 2004, according to a review of Federal Election Commission and Internal Revenue Service records. Of those, 201 are still in Congress. Republicans got $1.1 million, 64 percent of the total.

Many lawmakers are giving money back to Abramoff's clients or donating the funds to charity. House Speaker Dennis Hastert, an Illinois Republican, said yesterday he would donate his Abramoff-related money to charity. Hastert received $57,250 from Abramoff, his associates and his clients from 2001 to 2004, ranking fifth among all lawmakers. Republican Senator Conrad Burns of Montana, who ranked first, said last month he'd give donations he got from Abramoff to charity, and Democrat Byron Dorgan of North Dakota, who ranked fourth, said he would send Abramoff-related donations back to the tribes.

Top Recipient

DeLay was the top recipient of funds directly from Abramoff, having accepted $17,000 in donations from the lobbyist from 2001 to 2004.

The reference to Rudy in Abramoff's plea agreement suggests that the investigation is also zeroing in on Capitol Hill staff members as well as lawmakers.

Rudy went to work for Abramoff at the Greenberg Traurig LLP law firm in Washington in 2001. In 2000, Abramoff and former DeLay chief of staff Ed Buckham used their credit cards to underwrite a trip to the U.K. attended by DeLay and his wife, the Washington Post reported in April.

Before Rudy left DeLay's office, he helped Abramoff stop legislation curbing Internet gambling on behalf of eLottery Inc., the Washington Post reported in October.

Internet Gambling

Norwalk, Connecticut-based eLottery paid Abramoff's former firm, Preston Gates LLP, $720,000 in 2000. Preston Gates, Abramoff's employer at the time, said it was lobbying on legislation to ban Internet gambling. The legislation was defeated. DeLay was one of 44 Republicans to vote against the measure in July 2000, with 165 Republicans voting for it. The measure, which needed 270 votes to pass the House, failed by 15 votes.

At the time, Rudy's wife, Lisa, was being paid fees by Toward Tradition, a Seattle-based Orthodox Jewish nonprofit organization run by Rabbi Daniel Lapin, a friend of Abramoff's, the Post reported in October.

Rudy in June 2002 also solicited a $25,000 donation for Abramoff's Capital Athletic Foundation charity from a Cyprus-based importer of Russian vodka, the government charged. Abramoff then used that money to help pay for a Scotland golf trip. The foundation's ledgers, released in November by a Senate Committee investigating the lobbyist, showed Abramoff spent more than $160,000 on the August 2002 trip that was attended by Ney and other officials, including Christian activist Ralph Reed.

Representative Chris Shays, a Connecticut Republican, said in an e-mailed statement that ``Jack Abramoff's guilty plea and his close association with Tom DeLay underscore the need for a new majority leader in the Republican Party."

Shays said that ``it is time we make it clear that ethics are an essential part of how we do business and that our leadership needs to reflect this strong ethical conduct."

Lobbyist's Plea Likely To Expose Seamy Underside Of Congress (USAT)

USA Today, January 4, 2006

Jack Abramoff, the former lobbyist who pleaded guilty Tuesday to fraud and tax evasion, is a vivid illustration of Mark Twain's adage that truth is stranger than fiction. Abramoff got into lobbying after a stint making mediocre action movies. Once in the influence-peddling business, he made a quick fortune by defrauding Indian tribes, representing foreign dictators and cozying up to powerful lawmakers — often at a Pennsylvania Avenue restaurant he owned. (Related: Abramoff pleads guilty)

Perhaps some day someone will make a film about Abramoff. In the meantime, his plea has focused attention on an even more appalling spectacle: the lawmakers that were part of his network.

What is most shocking in the Abramoff case is not that he would want to make a fortune and spread it around to gain power and influence. It is that so many members of Congress would be so quick to accommodate him. As many as 20 lawmakers and senior staff members are believed to be under investigation. That makes Abramoff, who has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors, the most dangerous man in Washington right now.

Prosecutors say Abramoff "engaged in a pattern of corruptly providing things of value to public officials, including trips, campaign contributions, and meals and entertainment, with the intent to influence acts." Officials who were eager to take Abramoff's money are now scrambling to give it away.

The Abramoff scandal is likely to make 2006 the year a seamy underside of Congress comes into full public view. Barely a decade after the arrival of a reformist GOP Congress, the institution has fallen into one of its most tawdry periods ever, with members actively seeking favors in exchange for legislation that sells out the public interest for personal or partisan gain.

Some of their behavior is legal, though troubling. Today's Congress is more than willing to grant special tax breaks to companies and industries that provide the most bountiful political contributions and have the most influential lobbyists.

Some acts of individual lawmakers, though, might exceed even the minimal lobbying laws that govern their behavior. The Abramoff scandal, which touches both parties, shows a widespread sense of entitlement among lawmakers to some of the lifestyle perks that their better-paid lobbyist acquaintances enjoy.

One member of the House, Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, figures prominently in the plea agreement under the pseudonym Representative #1. He is alleged to have acted on Abramoff's behalf 11 times. Former majority leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, is likely to receive intense scrutiny for taking trips to the South Pacific, Scotland and elsewhere bankrolled by Abramoff's groups.

These, however, might be the tip of the too-long-ignored lobbying iceberg. Abramoff is far from the only Washington lobbyist who tried to join with members of Congress in cheating the public.

A full accounting will be a painful episode. It will bring shame to lawmakers and embarrassment to the nation. It will, we hope, lead to changes in the ways lobbyists are regulated and campaigns are financed. It's true that morality can't be legislated. Even so, a cleansing process triggered by the Abramoff scandal can help ensure that fewer members of Congress are beholden to corrupt special interests operating behind the scenes.

It's Not Personal, Jack, It's Strictly Business (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

The sight of Jack Abramoff striding out of federal court here yesterday, looking like a stocky gangster from a 40's movie in black fedora and trench coat, may seem like the strongest evidence so far of how graft and hubris have overwhelmed the capital.

It could have been a scene from "The Godfather," a favorite film of the felonious lobbyist. The Washington Post reported that he "did business with people linked to the underworld," bilked Indian tribes of tens of millions and then lavished a bundle in tribal gambling profits on greedy members of Congress.

The Post said Mr. Abramoff loved to amuse colleagues by imitating Michael Corleone as he rejected a corrupt politician's demand for a share of Mafia gambling money: "Senator, you can have my answer now if you like. My offer is this: nothing."

But just because this is a scale of amorality and blatant sale of government that astonishes even Washington cynics, why look on the dark side?

The Abramoff plea bargain may have left his former business partners and political pals panicking, wondering if the rat will rat them out. The Republican congressmen Tom DeLay and Bob Ney are among the sleazy solons caught up in the scandal, and the House speaker, Dennis Hastert, scrambled yesterday to launder $69,000 in dirty Abramoff contributions, donating the wad to charity. And then there's Ralph Reed, the choirboy Bible thumper who used his links to Christian groups to immorally play Indian tribes off against each other.

But looking at the big picture, in some ways the imperial presidency is working out quite well for everyone.

Think about it: all those congressmen don't really need to do their jobs anymore. With the president able to make war more or less as he chooses, treat the enemy as he sees fit and snoop on Americans at will, our representatives have more time for the duty many are clearly best suited to: playing golf gratis in Scotland. (Remember how the White House press used to give poor Bill Clinton such a hard time about mere mulligans?)

Now that Dick Cheney has freed Congress from the bother of advising and/or consenting, lawmakers can work on new ways to game the system and wallow in the G.O.P.'s culture of corruption - while tut-tutting about the decline in American moral values.

Since the Republican-run Capitol doesn't have to worry about holding the Bush White House accountable for excesses in torture and spying and the other myriad ways it has placed itself above the law, congressmen have more leisure hours for Abramoff successors to treat them to some Redskins games and steak dinners.

Checks and balances are now as quaint as the Geneva Conventions. Congress is complicit in putting its thumb on the scale for the executive branch.

The Post reported that W. had taken advantage of an innovation started years ago by Samuel Alito Jr. to shore up executive privilege. As a young Justice Department lawyer in the Reagan administration, Mr. Alito created a strategy that has the president declare what laws mean when he signs them. Mr. Alito wanted the courts to focus as much on the president's interpretation of a law as on what he called "legislative intent."

W. has issued at least 108 such statements, The Post said, rejecting "provisions in bills that the White House regarded as interfering with its powers in national security, intelligence policy and law enforcement."

And since the imperial presidency is run by the vice president, W. has a lot of free time to do the things he likes to do. Confined with his wife and mother-in-law at the Crawford ranch, he spent his Christmas vacation mountain-biking and clearing brush.

He left the ranch for a brief visit at Brooke Army Medical Center in San Antonio, where he kidded in a way that again showed his jarring lack of empathy with the amputees from Iraq and Afghanistan: "As you can possibly see, I have an injury myself - not here at the hospital, but in combat with a cedar. I eventually won. The cedar gave me a little scratch. As a matter of fact, the colonel asked if I needed first aid when she first saw me. I was able to avoid any major surgical operations here, but thanks for your compassion, colonel."

W. also used the occasion to defend the Nixonian eavesdropping program that even made John Ashcroft and his deputy, James Comey, skittish. As The Times reported, Andy Card and Alberto Gonzales had to make an emergency trip to see the reluctant Mr. Ashcroft in the hospital in March 2004 to get the program recertified because Mr. Comey had balked.

You know you're in trouble when John Ashcroft is worried about overreaching.

Why Abramoff Matters (USAT)

USA Today, January 4, 2006

·What he knows could help bring criminal charges against at least 12 members of Congress or their aides.

·He paid for trips, donated campaign funds and did favors for Reps. Tom DeLay, Bob Ney and others.

Ex-Conyers Aide Arrested In Ghana On U.S. Fraud Charges (FREEP)

DOJ_NMG_0008067

By david ashenfelter and joel thurtell

Detroit Free Press, January 4, 2006

A former aide to Michigan Congressman John Conyers Jr. was arrested in the African nation of Ghana on Friday, eight months after he failed to show up for sentencing on charges of defrauding sponsors and vendors of a national conference for black farmers of more than $150,000 in 1999.

FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said Dewayne Boyd, 49, of Detroit, was arrested by Ghanaian police on Friday.

She said Boyd was returned Sunday to New York, where he was to appear today in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn for a hearing to determine whether he will be returned to Michigan.

Boyd was convicted by a federal court jury in December 2004 of seven counts of fraud in the scam he ran while working for Conyers, a Michigan Democrat. There was no evidence that Conyers, D-Mich., was aware of the scam. Conyers fired Boyd in 2002.

Relatives Of Missing Cruise Passengers Form New Group (NSDY/AP)

By John Christoffersen, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 4, 2006

STAMFORD, Conn. -- Relatives of cruise passengers who disappeared on the high seas are forming a new group to seek industry reforms, saying they want to draw attention to how they were treated and the extent of crimes aboard the ships.

The group, which includes eight families so far, will seek a second hearing before Congress. The first hearing last month focused largely on the disappearance of George Allen Smith IV of Greenwich in the Mediterranean Sea last July, one of the latest in a string of disappearances in recent years.

"To me the number of disappearances plus the number of sexual assaults they admit to is alarming," said Brett Rivkind, a lawyer for Smith's family and the new group. "The only way they're going to change is by Congress regulating them."

In the past five years, the FBI opened 305 criminal cases on the high seas, Chris Swecker, assistant director of the FBI, testified at last month's congressional hearing. Sexual assaults on cruise ships comprised 45 percent of the cases, while physical assaults made up 22 percent and missing persons 10 percent, Swecker said.

Besides Smith's case, federal agents are investigating an alleged rape of a passenger on the same cruise, a cruise line spokeswoman said Tuesday.

"It's an allegation and we are cooperating with the FBI," Lynn Martenstein, spokeswoman for Royal Caribbean Cruises, told The Associated Press.

The alleged rape occurred three days after Smith disappeared from the ship, Martenstein said. She called the alleged rape a separate incident.

FBI officials declined to comment.

Smith, whose family is part of the new group, vanished July 5 from a Royal Caribbean ship in the Mediterranean Sea between Turkey and Greece. The FBI has been investigating, but no one has been charged and no body has been recovered.

Rivkind said the alleged rape victim told him the FBI was investigating the incident.

James Walker, an attorney for Smith's widow, Jennifer Hagel-Smith, said the alleged rape victim was not his client.

Industry officials estimated that 13 people have disappeared from cruise ships in the past two years. With more than 10 million passengers last year, that means less than one person per million went missing, according to the International Council of Cruise Lines.

The council said there are about 50 cruise ship crimes against U.S. citizens reported to the FBI annually, or one crime per 200,000 passengers.

"You are much safer on a cruise ship than you are in virtually any community in the United States," said Michael Crye, president of the council.

U.S. Rep. Christopher Shays, a Connecticut Republican who led the hearing, and other lawmakers question such statistics because they said the industry supplies its own data to the FBI and might be downplaying crime to keep its business thriving.

"If we're going to have an impact on what's going on, we need to join together," said Kendall Carver, whose daughter, Merrian Lynn Carver, disappeared from a cruise in Alaska in August 2004. "I think the public needs to know about it."

Smith's family contends he was a victim of foul play covered up by a cruise ship line eager to avoid bad publicity.

"The lack of information given by cruise lines is abysmal and I think that needs to change," Bree Smith, George Smith's sister, said Tuesday. "To be a victim of one of these crimes and never see any justice done, it adds insult to injury."

The cruise line has said it handled the incident appropriately and has cooperated fully with investigators.

The new group does not have a name yet, but is organizing through an e-mail, cruisevictims@cox.net.

DOJ_NMG_0008068

Recruiting Office Left Open 26 Times (MJS)

By JACQUELINE SEIBEL

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, January 4, 2006

Town of Brookfield - Police officers making routine checks on area businesses found a door to the local military recruiting office open 26 times since July, officials said Tuesday after a weekend burglary of military uniforms was reported at the facility.

Authorities are linking the burglary with the theft of a government vehicle outside a military recruiting office in Indianapolis, a development that has prompted interest from federal, state and local law-enforcement agencies.

Police believe the back door to the office at 20101 W. Blue Mound Road, which contains recruiting services for the U.S. Army, Navy, Air Force, Marines and Coast Guard, was likely unlocked again over the weekend, police Capt. Tim Imler said.

Three military uniforms, including a dress uniform and combat fatigues; a government-owned car; and keys to several government vehicles were stolen here sometime between Saturday evening and the discovery of the burglary at 7 p.m. Monday, Imler said.

In the parking lot where the 2003 Oldsmobile Alero was stolen, near the West Point Cinemas, another stolen government car was recovered, Imler said. That Chevrolet Malibu from Indianapolis had no apparent damage and was still bearing its government-issued license plates.

Today, the FBI will process evidence found in the vehicle stolen from Indianapolis, Imler said.

Michael Johnson, a supervisory special agent in the FBI's Milwaukee office, said the bureau is investigating the crime, but only as theft of government property.

"We have no reason to believe it is tied to terrorism at this point," he said.

Because the car from the Indianapolis recruiting office was found in Waukesha County, authorities have concluded that the two break-ins are related, Johnson said.

Yet Imler said authorities do not know why recruiting offices appear to have been targeted, especially since the burglar left behind computers and cash.

Also, a car with government plates would not be useful to a thief who did not have accompanying government identification, Johnson said. Someone whose aim was to collect military uniforms would be unlikely to target a recruiting station.

"There usually aren't a lot of people working in a recruiter's office, so it's doubtful they're going to have a lot of uniforms," he said.

The Indianapolis Police Department did not return phone calls seeking comment, and an officer from that state's military recruiting headquarters would only confirm that a car had been stolen.

Assisting the Town of Brookfield police and the FBI in the investigation are the U.S. Departments of Defense and Homeland Security, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and the Joint Terrorism Task Force, consisting of federal, state and local officials.

Defense Department spokesman Lt. Col. Brian Maka said Tuesday that he had not heard about the Town of Brookfield burglary or that there had been other problems at military recruitment offices.

Gina Barton of the Journal Sentinel staff contributed to this report.

FBI Investigates Break-in At Military Recruiting Center,170 (MH)

The Miami Herald, January 4, 2006

BROOKFIELD, Wis. - Marine uniforms and a military vehicle were stolen from an armed forces recruiting center over the weekend, police said Tuesday.

The break-in follows the theft of a car from a recruiting center in Indianapolis over the weekend. That car was found at the same Town of Brookfield recruiting center where the new thefts were reported, FBI Special Agent Mike Johnson said.

Two military uniforms and a maroon 2003 Oldsmobile Alero were missing from the Brookfield site, but computers, money and electronic equipment were left behind, authorities said.

The recovered vehicle is being processed for evidence, Johnson said. The FBI is involved because federal property was stolen.

The stolen uniforms include Marine dress coats and military fatigues and boots. The thief or thieves could be impersonating military personnel, Town of Brookfield police Capt. Tim Imler said.

Military Vehicle And Uniforms Stolen In WI (WFIE-TV)

WFIE-TV, January 4, 2006

Police say a military vehicle and uniforms have been stolen from a recruiting center in suburban Milwaukee.

DOJ_NMG_0008069

The break-in follows the theft of a car from a recruiting center in Indianapolis over the weekend. FBI Special Agent Mike Johnson says that car was found at the same recruiting center in Brookfield, Wisconsin where the new thefts were reported.

In the Town of Brookfield, police say a 2003 Olds Alero was taken, also two Marine dress coats and some military fatigues and boots.

Police warn that the thieves may try to impersonate military personnel.

Robbed At Gunpoint, Barry Harbors 'No Animosities' (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

D.C. Council member and former mayor Marion Barry yesterday urged two young men who robbed him at gunpoint Monday night to turn themselves in to police, promising that he would urge authorities not to prosecute them.

"I have no animosities," Barry declared. "I don't even want you prosecuted, really. I love you. Give yourself up. Call the police. . . . I will do all I can to advocate non-prosecution."

Barry, 69, was held up in his kitchen about 9:30 p.m. Monday by two assailants who minutes earlier had helped him carry groceries from his car to his third-floor apartment in Southeast Washington. They pointed a gun at Barry's face and stole his wallet, which contained more than $200, his driver's license and two credit cards, police said.

The thieves apparently knew that Barry (D-Ward 8) was a longtime community leader, a fact that he said made the crime "kind of hurt" because he is well respected by so many people in the city. Barry was not injured in the holdup.

"There is a sort of an unwritten code in Washington, among the underworld and the hustlers and these other guys, that I am their friend," Barry said at an afternoon news conference in which he described the robbery in detail. "I don't advocate what they do. I advocate conditions to change what they do. I was a little hurt that this betrayal did happen."

D.C. police, who are battling a recent spike in holdups, said they were shocked that someone would knowingly rob a former mayor in his apartment. They have no suspects. A bystander found Barry's wallet -- without the cash -- on a nearby street. The billfold, driver's license and credit cards were returned yesterday to the council member, authorities said.

"I was very surprised, especially in the fact that the individuals knew who Mr. Barry was, and they went ahead and robbed him anyway," said D.C. Police Cmdr. Joel Maupin. "It shows that people don't care who you are -- they just want what you have."

Barry, a four-term mayor who returned to politics last year when he was elected to the council, called the news conference at the John A. Wilson Building, the District's city hall, to talk about the crime and to urge stiffer penalties for gun possession. Even as he characterized the city's problems with guns and violence as a "pandemic," he said he felt empathy for those who robbed him.

U.S. Attorney Kenneth L. Wainstein declined to comment on Barry's remarks. Prosecutors and police will make the call on whether to file charges against those responsible for the crime.

"As with all violent crimes, we will expend every effort in the investigation of this case, both to vindicate council member Barry's rights and to prevent the perpetrators from victimizing others in the future," Wainstein said.

Barry often has spoken out against street crime in a political career that goes back more than three decades. He was first elected mayor in 1978 and was reelected to second and third terms. He was in his third term when the FBI videotaped him smoking crack; he was convicted of one count of misdemeanor drug possession.

He settled in Ward 8 after completing a six-month prison sentence and won the council seat there in 1992, launching a comeback that eventually led to a fourth term as mayor. He recently pleaded guilty to two misdemeanor tax charges because he did not pay most of his income taxes after leaving the mayor's office in 1999. He is scheduled to be sentenced Jan. 18.

Monday's robbery was not the first time Barry has been the victim of violence. He was shot above the heart by a stray bullet during the 1977 takeover of city hall by a group of Hanafi Muslims -- an experience that he said was less scary than what happened at his home Monday evening.

"On March 7, 1977, in this very same building, I walked across the hall and heard something ring out," Barry remembered yesterday. "And I got hit in my chest. I didn't even have time to think.

"In this incident, I had a chance to see it. I was much more frightened, much more emotionally involved. It was a horrific experience to face a gun," Barry said. "I could see my life flash before me at that moment."

Monday's episode began about 9 p.m. when Barry returned from shopping for groceries at a Safeway store in Southwest Washington. He parked outside his beige-brick apartment building in the 2600 block of Douglas Place SE, part of a neighborhood that police say has problems with drug dealing and burglaries but generally is not affected by the level of violence in harder-hit areas of Barry's ward. The young men, whom Barry said he did not recognize, asked if they could help carry his bags upstairs.

"Mr. B, can we help you with your groceries?" Barry said one of the youths asked him.

Such requests are common, Barry said.

"When I go home in the evening or come out in the morning or weekend, the young people are all over me, asking for money, begging for money. 'Give me a dollar. Give me five dollars,' " Barry said. "So I try to make a practice of making them work for what they get."

Barry gave the young men several bags. After helping him, they asked if they could have some candy in a dish on a dining room table. He and the young men talked a bit. Barry then handed the two a few dollars and they left.

About 15 minutes later, they came back.

"I just let them in. That's how we do it over there. At least that's how I do it," Barry said.

Once inside the apartment, one of the men pulled out "a gun and pointed it at my face and pushed me into the kitchen," he said.

The assailants quickly fled with Barry's wallet. Police said they were stepping up patrols in the neighborhood to prevent other robberies and to gather information about the assailants.

Yesterday, Barry called for a summit among the city's leaders to address gun violence. And he said he will prod the council to pass a bill he introduced to stiffen penalties for carrying a gun in the District. The proposed legislation would also prohibit judges in most cases from granting pretrial release to defendants facing gun charges.

"Violence is everywhere," Barry said. "Guns are everywhere. This ought to be the number one priority in our city -- saving lives, getting guns off the street and rehabilitating young people."

Barry Robbed At SE Home By Men He Helped (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

Former D.C. Mayor Marion Barry was robbed at gunpoint in his Southeast apartment Monday night by two young men whom he had paid minutes earlier to help him carry groceries from his car.

Mr. Barry, 69, said he was not injured during the robbery, but felt downhearted about being robbed in the Ward 8 neighborhood he represents on the D.C. Council. He also said that he doesn't want authorities to prosecute the robbers, if they are caught, and that he "loves" them.

"I was really kind of hurt," Mr. Barry, a Democrat, said at a press conference yesterday at City Hall. "There's sort of an unwritten code in Washington among the underworld, the hustlers, and these other guys that I'm their friend.

"I don't advocate what they do, but I advocate the conditions to change what they do," he said.

Mr. Barry said his wallet containing his driver's license, credit cards and an undisclosed amount of cash was taken. Police later recovered the wallet, minus the cash.

Mr. Barry said he had been shopping and had a trunk full of groceries when he stopped his car in front of his apartment building in the 2600 block of Douglas Road SE at about 9:30 p.m.

He said two young men approached him, calling him "B," as the neighborhood's young people refer to him. The men asked him whether they could help carry his groceries upstairs.

Mr. Barry said he frequently pays young people who ask him for money in the neighborhood to perform such services, preferring that to a handout.

He said he made small talk with the men, one of whom identified himself as Marcus and told Mr. Barry that he lived across the street.

The men brought the groceries into Mr. Barry's apartment, and Mr. Barry gave each man some candy before they left. About 10 minutes later, he said, the two men came back to his door, and he thought nothing of letting them in.

"They had a gun, pointed it at my face and pushed me in the kitchen," he said, adding that his life flashed before his eyes when one of the men cocked the handgun while pointing it at his head.

Mr. Barry said that the apartment building has a secure outer door, but that it is often broken. He said he thought the door locked behind him when he came in.

Seventh District Cmdr. Joel Maupin said that he was "very surprised" to hear that Mr. Barry was robbed and that it might have been a crime of opportunity.

"It shows a lot of people really don't care who you are," he said. "All they want is to get what you have."

Mr. Barry said that he held no animosity toward the men who robbed him and that he would prefer they not be prosecuted if they were caught.

"For the young men who did this to me, I say to you, I don't hold any animosities, I don't even want you prosecuted really. I love you. Give yourself up. Call the police, let them know you engaged in this activity," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0008071

He said that getting guns off the streets should be the "No. 1 priority of this city" and that crime had reached crisis proportions.

Metropolitan Police Department Capt. C.V. Morris, head of the violent crimes branch, said he did not agree completely with Mr. Barry's assessment of crime in the District.

"I agree to an extent," Capt. Morris said. "We have a situation where, yes, a lot of our crimes are declining, but when you look at our robberies, our robberies are peaking. And it's all about guns. So I definitely understand this."

Through November, the most recent month for which statistics are available, preliminary police reports show that all categories of crime except for robbery had declined citywide. Robberies were up 5.8 percent.

In the 7th Police District, which includes Ward 8, robberies were up 15 percent, statistics show. Homicides and sexual assaults were each up 16.3 percent, statistics show.

Mr. Barry said he visited former council member Sandy Allen on Monday, hugged her and offered prayers two days after her grandson was killed in the same area.

Mr. Barry's first three terms as mayor ended with a 1990 crack cocaine arrest and six months in federal prison.

He returned to win the Ward 8 council seat in 1992 and then the mayor's office in 1994 for his fourth term. However, Congress in 1995 sapped most of the mayor's powers by instituting a control board to run the city. Mr. Barry declined to run again in 1998.

In 2002, Mr. Barry backed out of running for an at-large seat on the D.C. Council after U.S. Park Police reported finding "traces" of marijuana and cocaine in his illegally parked Jaguar. No charges were filed, and Mr. Barry has disputed the account.

In 2004, Mr. Barry was elected to the Ward 8 seat on the D.C. Council after he defeated Mrs. Allen, the incumbent Democrat, in the primary.

Recently, Mr. Barry pleaded guilty to two misdemeanor charges stemming from an investigation that revealed he did not file taxes from 1999 through 2004. His sentencing is scheduled for Jan. 18.

Witness: Fawell Assigned Him Campaign Work (AP)

By MIKE COLIAS, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 4, 2006

A former employee of the Illinois secretary of state's office testified Tuesday that he spent much of his time on the clock working on political campaigns, including George Ryan's runs for governor and secretary of state.

Brad Roseberry testified at the former governor's racketeering and fraud trial that Scott Fawell, Ryan's chief of staff when he was secretary of state, assigned him to do campaign work on numerous Republican campaigns from 1992 to 1999, when Roseberry was a state employee.

Roseberry said he spent much of his work time on campaigns for Ryan and other GOP candidates-- knocking on doors and putting up campaign signs-- in the months leading up to elections, even though taxpayers were paying his salary as a state employee.

"Toward the (election), it was virtually full time," said Roseberry, who testified under government immunity from prosecution for anything that he might say on the stand. It is illegal to do campaign work on state time.

Under cross-examination from lead defense attorney Dan K. Webb, Roseberry agreed numerous times that Ryan himself never directed him to do political work of any kind. Webb also insinuated that Roseberry might have fabricated some of what he told the FBI in exchange for his immunity.

Ryan, 71, and lobbyist Larry Warner, 67, are charged with racketeering, mail fraud and other offenses. The federal indictment says that when Ryan was secretary of state he steered big-money state leases and contracts to his friends, including Warner, and received gifts and free vacations.

Ryan and Warner say nothing they did was illegal.

Roseberry testified that he typically met with Fawell and other office workers to discuss campaign work and that he only recalled Ryan being present once, in 1992. He said he met with Ryan, Fawell and others at the secretary of state's office in Chicago to discuss Roseberry's work on a campaign for Bruce Clark, a Kankakee Republican and husband of Ryan's niece who was running for the Legislature.

"I told (Ryan) it would be a tough race," Roseberry said. "He said, 'I know that. Tell me something I don't know.'" Roseberry said the meeting lasted about 20 minutes, during which one supervisor suggested Roseberry take a leave of absence to work on Clark's campaign, but Fawell rejected the idea.

Webb questioned whether Roseberry might have concocted the story to improve his chances of avoiding jail time, saying it wasn't until Roseberry's fifth meeting with prosecutors, in January 2003, that he mentioned a meeting with Ryan.

DOJ_NMG_0008072

"Had you made up your mind going into that meeting that you needed to make something up about George Ryan or you were never going to get a grant of immunity?" Webb asked.

"No," Roseberry said.

Roseberry testified that the government granted him immunity a few weeks after he told prosecutors about the Ryan meeting.

Webb also tried to poke holes in Roseberry's credibility by asking him questions about his alcoholism, which Roseberry acknowledged led to an inability to remember details for much of the time he worked in the secretary of state's office. He said he quit drinking in 1996.

Earlier Tuesday, a former Cook County prosecutor said Ryan in 1992 cursed when he and then-Cook County State's Attorney Jack O'Malley suggested a way to prevent corruption within the secretary of state's office.

Patrick J. Quinn said the conversation took place just before a news conference at which Ryan and O'Malley were to discuss the indictment of two secretary of state's office supervisors who were charged with selling phony drivers licenses.

Quinn said that after he suggested the anti-fraud method, Ryan turned to O'Malley, cursed and then said, "Those are my guys."

Quinn, now an Illinois appellate judge, said O'Malley told Ryan he wasn't trying to tell him how to run his office but that the press would ask questions about how he would prevent future corruption.

Quinn quoted Ryan as saying: "Jack, you're going to go out there and look like a hero for catching these guys, and I'll look like a hero for helping you."

Judge: Jurors Won't Learn Of George Ryan's Death Penalty Reform (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, January 4, 2006

After a week off for the holidays, the trial of former Gov. George Ryan resumed today with Ryan's defense pressing forcefully but failing to put evidence of his death penalty reform before the jury.

Julie Bauer, one of Ryan's attorneys, argued it was critical that prosecution witness and Illinois Appellate Judge Patrick Quinn be questioned about his opinion of Ryan's decision to commute all death sentences in Illinois.

Outside the presence of the jury, Quinn called Ryan's decision "illegal and immoral" but swore he bore no ill will toward Ryan that led him to cooperate with prosecutors.

Prosecutors sought only to have Quinn, a former assistant state's attorney, testify about an unrelated 1992 conversation he had with then-Secretary of State Ryan and Cook County State's Atty. Jack O'Malley.

With the jury seated before him, Quinn said that during the conversation, Ryan crudely rejected a suggestion that Quinn believed could curb corruption among secretary of state employees who took bribes to sell driver's licenses to motorists who had lost their licenses for driving drunk.

The conversation occurred after the arrest of two secretary of state supervisors for the alleged offense.

Just prior to a news conference announcing the investigation and arrests, Quinn told O'Malley of a plan to store driver's photos at the secretary of state's office to prevent the issuance of illegal licenses.

"Mr. O'Malley told Secretary Ryan, 'George, Quinn has a good idea how you can cut down on this in the future,'" Quinn testified. "Mr. Ryan turned to Mr. O'Malley and said, '(Expletive) you, Jack. These are my guys.'"

Outside the jury's presence, Ryan's attorney Julie Bauer argued that Quinn's potential bias toward Ryan over the Death Penalty issue should be explored.

Even before the trial began, the defense sought to bring out evidence of Ryan's Death penalty reform.

But today, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer again rejected the effort and upheld the prosecution's argument that Ryan's policy decisions were irrelevant in the corruption trial.

Also testifying today was Brad Roseberry, a former Ryan political operative and supervisor in the Secretary of State's office.

Testifying under immunity from prosecution, Roseberry told jurors that he routinely did political work on state time.

He also testified that after Ryan was re-elected secretary of state in 1994, he compiled a list of state employees who had worked on the campaign in anticipation they would receive raises and promotions for helping Ryan.

Roseberry himself received a 20-percent raise after the election and was promoted to a position that did not exist before the election, he said.

Witness: Ryan Ignored Fraud (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, Federal Courts Reporter

DOJ_NMG_0008073

Chicago Sun-Times, January 4, 2006

When a state prosecutor suggested a way to stop corruption in the secretary of state's office, George Ryan allegedly gave him a gruff response: "F--- you, Jack. These are my guys," Ryan told Cook County State's Attorney Jack O'Malley in May of 1992.

Illinois Appellate Court Judge Patrick Quinn, then O'Malley's public integrity chief, recalled the conversation Tuesday as he testified at Ryan's public corruption trial.

Ryan's reply came after Quinn conveyed an idea on cutting down on fraud in the secretary of state's office as he briefed Ryan and O'Malley before a news conference.

Quinn's office had just completed an investigation into the secretary of state's Midlothian licensing facility, charging employees with giving out driver's licenses to repeat DUI offenders in exchange for bribes. Quinn said O'Malley turned to him and said: "Why don't you tell George about that" idea to keep the fraud from occurring again.

Quinn testified he was surprised by Ryan's response.

"I would assume ... that Mr. Ryan would welcome any suggestions and, if nothing else, say: 'That sounds good. We will look into that,' " Quinn said. "That's what I would assume an elected official would say upon being presented with an idea about how to fight corruption -- to at least pay lip service to the idea that he'll cooperate."

When Ryan recoiled, O'Malley said Ryan might want to have a response ready in case reporters asked how he planned to stop bribes for licenses in the future, Quinn said.

"Jack, you're going to go out there and look like a hero for catching those guys and I'll look like a hero for helping you, and that's all anybody's going to ask," Ryan replied, according to Quinn.

O'Malley doesn't remember the exchange, according to Quinn and prosecutors. Quinn said at the time he told his supervisor about Ryan's response.

He said federal prosecutors later contacted him to ask about the alleged conversation; he didn't seek them out.

What role Ryan played

Prosecutors say Ryan's comeback epitomizes his take on rooting out corruption in his office. The trial, in its 14th week, entered the phase that explores what role Ryan played as investigations into corruption within his secretary of state's office intensified.

Ryan, 71, is charged with steering state contracts and leases to friends and taking cash, vacations and gifts in return. He's also charged with lying to the feds.

But Ryan's lawyers suggested Ryan rebuffed Quinn's idea because he didn't want to walk out and publicize a reform before he examined it. Years later, Ryan did revamp the secretary of state's computer system, digitizing all driver's licenses in an aim to cut back on fraud.

Outside of the jury's presence, Quinn, a judge for about nine years, ripped Ryan's 2003 decision to clear Death Row.

"It was absolutely illegal and immoral," he said.

The comment came as Ryan's lawyers sought to attack Quinn's credibility, painting him as an ex-prosecutor who had a beef with Ryan for commuting the sentences of criminals Quinn helped put behind bars.

Ryan lawyer Julie Bauer asked Quinn about his prosecution of Steve Manning, an ex-cop who landed on Death Row for murder. His conviction was later overturned by a higher court, and he was the 13th person to be let off of Death Row at a time when Illinois was mulling a moratorium on a troubled system here.

After hearing the testimony, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer ruled the jury couldn't hear it because it let lawyers expound on Ryan's policy decisions. She also said Ryan's 2003 decision to clear Death Row came years after Manning was released. Manning, who attended opening statements at Ryan's trial, won a $6.6 million jury verdict against the FBI last year for allegedly framing him in two crimes.

Doubts raised over memory

Also on Tuesday, former secretary of state worker Brad Roseberry said taxpayers paid for his salary as he did political work under Ryan from 1992 to 1999.

Roseberry, a court liaison for the secretary of state's office, testified that Ryan knew about him doing political work on state time at least at one point because Ryan was at a 1992 meeting where the issue was discussed.

But Roseberry said Ryan never told him to stay on the state payroll while he worked on political campaigns of Ryan and others.

Ryan attorney Dan Webb raised doubts about Roseberry's memory because he's a recovering alcoholic. Webb at one point asked if Roseberry concocted the meeting with Ryan to win an immunity order. Webb also asked if Roseberry drank a fifth of gin before that meeting. Roseberry said he couldn't recall.

Roseberry said the state later gave him a hefty raise as a reward for his political work.

Investigators Seek Info From Group On Doyle Donations (DULNT)

By Jr Ross

The Duluth News Tribune, January 4, 2006

MADISON, Wis. - State and federal investigators have asked a group that tracks campaign contributions for details on donations Gov. Jim Doyle received from utility interests, a company that won a state travel contract and a fundraiser held by a Department of Transportation official, the organization's executive director told The Associated Press.

Federal, state and local prosecutors announced last year they would review $20,000 in donations Doyle received from officials with Adelman Travel Systems shortly before and after the Milwaukee company won the state contract.

The requests of the Wisconsin Democracy Campaign indicate investigators are looking at a wider range of donations than they have previously let on.

Mike McCabe, the group's executive director, said investigators had specific questions on the timing of donations Doyle received but gave no indication about the scope of their probe. He said the group was approached because of its unique data base detailing campaign donations.

"If they went to the Elections Board and went pawing through campaign finance repots, it'd be like looking for needles in a haystack," said McCabe, whose group advocates for campaign finance reform. "They came to us because we can help them find those needles."

The Department of Justice, U.S. Attorney's Office in Milwaukee, Dane County district attorney and FBI declined to comment Tuesday when contacted by the AP.

Doyle spokesman Dan Leistikow said the governor's administration has complied with all requests for information from investigators and was confident they would find no wrongdoing.

"People can look at this all day long if they want to, but they're not going to find anything because the governor and his entire administration act with integrity and the people of Wisconsin know that," Leistikow said.

Attorney General Peg Lautenschlager, U.S. Attorney Steven Biskupic and Dane County District Attorney Brian Blanchard announced a joint review of Doyle's donations from Adelman executives following media reports on a contract that could be worth up to $750,000.

McCabe said FBI agents first approached him a year ago asking general questions about corruption in the Capitol but were not focusing on Doyle at the time. He said Department of Justice and the FBI began asking more specific questions about Doyle's donations in early fall, and the organization complied with requests for information in November.

McCabe said DOJ specifically asked about donations from the Wisconsin Public Service Corp. The group turned that information over to investigators and also used it as part of a report it put out publicly last month detailing the $41,550 that executives of WPS and Alliant Energy Corp. gave to Doyle in the six months after the state Public Service Commission rejected their sale of the Kewaunee nuclear plant to a Virginia company.

The three-member commission, which included two Doyle appointees, reversed its decision on March 17 and allowed the sale to go through.

Leistikow said the governor was not involved in the process to award the Adelman contract and pointed out the PSC is an independent agency. Those involved in the PSC's decision have denied any undue influence.

McCabe said investigators asked about donations collected at a fundraiser held in September by Ruben Anthony Jr., deputy secretary at the Department of Transportation. He invited dozens of employees of companies that vie for DOT engineering contracts.

The Ethics Board is reviewing that fundraiser, but McCabe said the Democracy Campaign could not provide details to investigators on those donations because they will not be reported until later this month.

DOT spokeswoman Peg Schmitt said investigators have not asked the agency for any documents.

Department of Administration spokesman Scott Larrivee said the agency, which oversaw the awarding of the Adelman contract, first turned over documents to investigators in October and has complied with other requests since then.

He referred questions about the content of the documents to investigators.

Council Urged To Investigate Mariano (PHI)

By Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 4, 2006

Philadelphia's leading good-government lobby is calling on City Council to hold hearings and set new conduct rules in response to FBI documents and grand jury testimony showing that electricians' union leader John J. Dougherty had great influence over the office of indicted Councilman Rick Mariano.

DOJ_NMG_0008075

The Committee of Seventy also asked for an investigation into Mariano's dismissal of three staffers who testified before a grand jury that indicted him on corruption charges. Committee president Zack Stalberg warned that lawsuits by wrongly fired employees could leave taxpayers on the hook.

"Mariano and Dougherty set a whole new standard for coziness and inappropriate insider behavior," Stalberg said of the revelations, which were first reported in The Inquirer and based on FBI reports and transcripts of grand jury testimony by Mariano aides as well as Dougherty and his political team.

Among other things, the documents reveal that:

Mariano never even interviewed his chief of staff, Walt DeTreux, before he was hired. Mariano left that task to one of Dougherty's political aides.

DeTreux took the job only on the condition that he "answer to the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers," according to an FBI summary.

Mariano aide John Lisko said he regularly briefed Dougherty "on all legislative, political, and administrative activities" in the office.

Mariano's lawyer, Nino V. Tinari, said he supported the idea of setting rules. But he said his client had been unaware of the extent of Dougherty's influence and therefore was not responsible for inappropriate ties.

"How could he be culpable of something he wasn't even aware of?" Tinari said.

Dougherty, a likely 2007 mayoral candidate who serves as treasurer of the city Democratic Party, declined to comment. He told The Inquirer last month that he had not controlled Mariano and had in fact encouraged him to be more independent.

DeTreux has said that FBI interviewers misinterpreted his comments. He said he meant that he wanted to run the office without interference from Mariano, whose staff had been seen as bumbling and disorganized.

But Stalberg said the details demonstrated the need for a Council policy designed to "insulate Council members and their staff from special interests."

"We would all be outraged if a Council member became controlled by a local company that went so far as to install its own staff in his or her office," he wrote. "The public elects officials and expects them to be independent - not captive to a business or a union or anybody else."

Mariano was indicted Oct. 25 on charges that he accepted $30,000 in bribes from businessmen in exchange for legislative favors. If convicted, he faces 10 years in federal prison.

Prosecutors also examined as a case of possible witness intimidation Mariano's Oct. 21 firing of DeTreux and Lisko and last month's axing of staffer Anna Davila, all of whom spoke to the grand jury. No charges have been filed.

Tinari said the staffers were not fired for testifying.

In separate letters to U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan, Philadelphia District Attorney Lynne M. Abraham, and City Controller Alan Butkovitz, Stalberg asked for an investigation into whether the firings were "consistent with city policy."

Butkovitz said he would be happy to investigate if the Mariano case weren't already being handled by the federal government.

"The problem with this is that the FBI's already heavily into this case, and I would just get in the way," he said. "From what I've heard, they'd have a fit."

Cathie Abookire, a spokeswoman for Abraham, said all questions related to the Mariano case would be referred to Meehan's office.

First Tennessee Waltz Trial Delayed As Dixon Seeks New Lawyer (AP)

By WOODY BAIRD, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 4, 2006

MEMPHIS, Tenn. (AP) -- Former state Sen. Roscoe Dixon told a federal judge Tuesday he is getting a new defense lawyer, a move that will delay the first scheduled trial for the Tennessee Waltz scandal by months.

Defense lawyer Walter Bailey stepped down after prosecutors raised questions about a potential conflict of interest with a government informant.

U.S. District Court Judge Jon McCalla said he expected Dixon's trial on charges of taking payoffs to influence legislation to be delayed at least two to three months. It had been set to begin Jan. 17.

The conflict of interest stemmed from work Bailey's law firm had done representing the informant, Tim Willis, in other legal matters.

Those cases involved issues that could be used to question the credibility and character of Willis, who is expected to be the prosecution's witness, but Bailey could have been limited in raising those questions because of his firm's previous work.

Outside the courthouse Dixon said he was initially disappointed in losing Bailey as his lawyer and seeing the trial delayed.

DOJ_NMG_0008076

"At first you want to hurry up and get it out of the way, but maybe this ordeal is about long suffering, patience, learning how to let God work things for you," Dixon said.

The former lawmaker, a Memphis Democrat, said he is looking for a new attorney.

In Recordings, Mobster Pierces Veil On Gambino Crime Family (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 4, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- Mobster Victor Riccitelli wanted so badly to keep his recorded conversations with an FBI informant secret, he broke the mob's honor code and admitted his Mafia membership rather than have prosecutors play the tapes in court.

For the first time since Riccitelli and more than a dozen others were indicted in a landmark Mafia case in 2004, prosecutors recently offered the first clues as to why he was so insistent the tapes remain sealed: In them, he revealed the Gambino crime family hierarchy, placing ranks with names and explaining the upper echelon of one of the nation's most notorious crime syndicates.

Riccitelli, in conversations with a Stamford strip club owner working with the FBI, also described his Mafia induction ceremony, the secret ritual in which members swear a lifelong allegiance to the crime family.

"He said that a picture of a saint was placed in his hands and burned, and that he dumped the ashes in a dish," prosecutors wrote last week, describing the tapes in a memo to U.S. District Judge Janet Bond Arterton.

Riccitelli was scheduled to be sentenced for racketeering Tuesday but his case was delayed until Jan. 20. He faces six to eight years in prison and prosecutors want that tacked onto the end of his 13-year sentence for cocaine distribution _ all but ensuring that Riccitelli, 72 and a cancer patient, will die in prison.

Defense attorney John Einhorn did not return a message seeking a response to the prosecution memo.

The Gambino crime family, once led by John Gotti, allegedly runs illegal Connecticut gambling businesses that include sports betting, poker machines and the numbers racket, prosecutors said.

"The defendant is an incorrigible and possibly violent criminal whose life is marked by one constant: a never ending search for fresh opportunity to enrich himself illegally," prosecutors wrote.

In late 2003 _ when law enforcement officials were openly calling John Gotti's brother, Peter, the family boss _ Riccitelli was captured on tape explaining that Arnold "Zeke" Squittieri was in charge, with Anthony "The Genius" Megale serving as the No. 2 man and Joseph "Jo Jo" Corozzo as consigliere, or top adviser.

Megale, a Stamford man who pleaded guilty last year to racketeering in Connecticut and also faces charges in New York, handled much of the family's day-to-day operations, Riccitelli said.

"He's in New York every day. He's under the (expletive) fire," Riccitelli said. "It's the consigliere, the underboss and the boss. OK? The boss is a sweetheart, but he can't run around cause he's on parole. He'll go do what he gotta do now, don't get me wrong, but he can't go in the street where wise guys are because then he's gonna be seen."

Squittieri, of Englewood Cliffs, N.J., wasn't publicly identified as the Gambino boss until last year when prosecutors indicted him and Megale in New York and accused them of running the family. New York prosecutors have identified Corozzo as consigliere but he has not been charged as such.

It is unclear whether prosecutors will try to play the Riccitelli tapes at sentencing later this month. They were close to doing so in October when on the eve of trial Riccitelli tried again to have the tapes thrown out.

Prosecutors put John Sereno, the FBI agent who led the investigation, on the stand and let him explain how he wired his informant before every meeting. As prosecutors were about to hit the play button, Einhorn leapt up and objected.

A judge ruled that the tapes would be admitted, and Riccitelli leaned back in his chair and said, "That's it. No point."

He pleaded guilty that day.

Two Plead Guilty In Mortgage Fraud (CINE)

By Mike Boyer, Enquirer staff writer

The Cincinnati Enquirer, January 4, 2006

Two loan processors have agreed to plead guilty to fraud and other charges in the federal probe into mortgage fraud involving low-priced homes in Greater Cincinnati.

Ike Bronson, a former loan processor at Seven Hills Financial mortgage brokerage, has agreed to plead guilty to charges of bank fraud, conspiracy and filing a false tax return, in documents filed in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati.

Bryan Young, another loan processor, has agreed to plead guilty to bank fraud and conspiracy charges, according to court papers.

DOJ_NMG_0008077

More than three dozen people have entered guilty pleas in the ongoing probe by the Internal Revenue Service, the FBI and the U.S. Postal Inspection Service into the sale of more than $50 million in area real estate.

Bronson originated loans and recruited buyers for a number of properties sold at artificially inflated prices, according to investigators. He also was aware false information was submitted on mortgage loan applications.

Investigators said Bronson caused real or intended losses of more than $728,000 to financial institutions and failed to report $131,217 in income in 2003 as result of payoffs from fraudulent loan proceeds.

Young processed 15 to 20 loans that included false documents causing real or intended losses exceeding $255,000 for financial institutions, investigators said.

Both men waived a grand jury indictment and will appear in U.S. District Court on Jan. 12 to formally enter their pleas.

Separately, Erica Crum, a loan officer for two different mortgage companies, was sentenced last week in U.S. District Court to 37 months in prison and was fined $15,000, after admitting charges of conspiracy, bank fraud and money laundering.

She also was ordered not to seek employment in the mortgage industry and to pay restitution to be determined later.

Crum, who worked at Airline Union's Mortgage Co., in Springdale, until April 2002 and out of her home from then until May 2003 for Loan Star Mortgage, misrepresented to lenders the source of down payments purportedly made by borrowers, according to court papers.

She also engaged in at least 25 money-laundering transactions involving $393,626, investigators said.

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Not Told Of 2 Deaths During Study Of Heart Drug (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

The Scios unit of Johnson & Johnson yesterday added to the questions already clouding its heart failure medication Natrecor, saying the company had failed to tell federal regulators about the deaths of two patients in a clinical trial of the drug.

The two deaths were also omitted from a report of the trial published in October in The Journal of Emergency Medicine, the company said. That article reported 6 deaths within 30 days among 237 patients given Natrecor or other treatment in hospital emergency rooms in 2001 and early 2002. Five of those deaths were of people who had taken Natrecor.

The two additional deaths raised the total to seven among Natrecor patients, although Scios said yesterday that the difference did not change the safety assumptions about the drug.

Neither Scios nor Dr. W. Franklin Peacock 4th of the Cleveland Clinic, the principal investigator in the study, disclosed yesterday how the deaths had been omitted from the results, but said they had learned only recently that the deaths occurred within the 30-day study period. A final analysis of the results is under way and will be submitted to the Food and Drug Administration, said Mark Wolfe, a Scios spokesman. He said he did not yet know the causes of the two additional deaths.

But a spokeswoman for the Cleveland Clinic, Eileen Sheil, said that Dr. Peacock strongly believed that the deaths had been accidental and not related to problems with Natrecor.

Natrecor, which the F.D.A. approved in August 2001 for use in acutely ill heart-failure patients, became a big seller for Scios. Sales were helped by use of the product in less severely ill patients, known as off-label use, sometimes in outpatient clinics in cardiologists' offices.

After achieving sales of $400 million in 2004, though, Natrecor's growth failed to meet forecasts last year after questions arose about its safety and whether it was effective enough to justify a cost of about $500 a treatment, compared with much cheaper alternatives. The Justice Department is also investigating whether Scios promoted the drug for unapproved uses. And the government recently announced that Medicare and Medicaid would no longer cover the drug's outpatient use.

Scios consistently defended Natrecor's safety. But the failure of researchers to accurately collect and report the death data in the Natrecor trial comes amid questions elsewhere in the medical industry about the accuracy of studies of drugs and medical devices.

"When you're talking deaths in clinical trials, mistakes are not an option," said Dr. Arthur Caplan, a medical ethicist at the University of Pennsylvania. "It's just an area where we have to have absolute, foolproof reporting in place."

Last month, the drug maker Merck was accused of misrepresenting the results of a clinical trial of the painkiller Vioxx to minimize its heart risks. The study was published in November 2000, almost four years before Merck stopped selling the drug amid safety concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0008078

The Vioxx accusation came from Dr. Gregory D. Curfman, the editor of The New England Journal of Medicine, who said the authors of a Vioxx study had deleted data about strokes, heart attacks and other vascular problems suffered by some patients. Merck has denied mishandling the data submitted for publication.

While the findings of the Natrecor study were presented earlier at medical conferences, it was not until October that the complete results were published in The Journal of Emergency Medicine. At that time, Dr. Peacock and colleagues, who included a Scios executive, reported that five Natrecor patients had died within 30 days. The deaths included those from causes clearly not related to Natrecor use, including an accident, the study reported.

In the meantime, Scios had undertaken a retrospective review of the study to look at mortality in patients up to 180 days after treatment. It was during that review, according to the Scios spokesman, Mr. Wolfe, that the two additional deaths among Natrecor patients within the 30-day period were discovered. When the company learned of those deaths, it notified the F.D.A. and Dr. Peacock, Mr. Wolfe said.

Ms. Sheil, the spokeswoman for the Cleveland Clinic, said Dr. Peacock learned of the additional deaths in September and notified The Journal of Emergency Medicine, but the article had already been published. Its authors say they will update it once the analysis by Scios is completed, sometime in the next few months.

Agencies To Designate Chief FOIA Officers (FCW)

By Matthew D. Weigelt

Federal Computer Week, January 4, 2006

Federal agencies must designate a chief Freedom of Information Act officer by Jan. 13, and each new officer will review the agency's FOIA operations and develop an improvement plan by June, according to a memo.

Released Dec. 30 by the Office of Management and Budget, the memo states that each agency must send a report on its FOIA operations and its improvement plan to the Justice Department and OMB by June 14. Agencies will also post the improvement plans on their Web sites.

The chief FOIA officer will be responsible for agencywide compliance with FOIA and oversee the program's implementation, the memo states. The officer will designate several public liaisons and post their contact information on the agency's Web site. The liaisons will serve as supervisors who review concerns about services.

President Bush issued an executive order Dec. 14 that directs agency leaders to ensure citizen-centered and results-oriented FOIA operations. In fiscal 2006 and 2007 FOIA reports, agencies will include information regarding the milestones made in FOIA improvement plans.

OMB Issues Further Guidance On FOIA Executive Order (GCN)

By Rob Thormeyer, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, January 4, 2006

Agencies must designate a chief Freedom of Information Act officer by Jan. 13, as well as review and revise their FOIA processing requirements by mid-June, according to a memorandum from the Office of Management and Budget.

In the memorandum dated Dec. 30, 2005, OMB also required agencies to establish one or more FOIA service centers and place contact information for public liaisons on their Web sites.

On Dec. 14, 2005, President Bush via executive order directed agencies to streamline their FOIA processing by appointing a chief FOIA officer and making information about how they handle these requests available online within six months.

In the OMB memorandum, deputy director Joel Kaplan provided more specifics and said agency FOIA officers must review their information operations and draft an improvement plan with concrete milestones for fiscal 2006 and 2007.

The plan must be submitted to the Justice Department and OMB and posted on agency Web sites by June 14, Kaplan wrote.

AARP Edges Away From Drug Imports (HILL)

By Kelly Mccormack And Bob Cusack

The Hill, January 4, 2006

In a move that is already attracting criticism from some lawmakers, AARP last week softened its support of drug reimportation legislation by saying that the new Medicare drug benefit saves senior citizens more than buying pharmaceuticals from Canada.

The powerful consumer group has previously endorsed reimportating drugs, but its revised position could severely damage momentum for legislation pending in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0008079

It could also alleviate political pressure on the White House and the pharmaceutical industry, which have opposed reimportation even though it is supported by a majority of members of Congress.

The group has enormous clout on Capitol Hill, playing a crucial role in passing the Medicare drug bill in 2003 and thwarting the GOP effort to reform Social Security last year.

AARP's press release on the matter, released over the holidays, did not get much attention last week. But the ramifications of it could be significant in the debate on the affordability of prescription drugs.

The new analysis, titled "The New Math: Cheaper than Canada? The drug benefit may be the better deal," used the government's Medicare plan finder to compare "stand alone" plans that cover all of a senior's prescription needs to the cost of acquiring drugs across the border. It concluded that seniors who enroll in a low-cost Medicare prescription-drug plan would save more in drug costs this year than if they were to buy the same drugs in Canada.

While Canadian drug prices are still cheaper than prices in the United States, AARP found that when a senior includes all out-of-pocket costs — premiums, deductibles and payments for medications — the price is lower.

AARP stressed that it continues to support reimportation legislation.

"The bottom line is drug prices are too high," said AARP spokesman Mark Kitchens. "The two ideas [reimportation and the Medicare drug benefit] are not mutually exclusive. Many Americans that are not on Medicare would benefit from reimportation. Medicare Part D is a tool that would make prescriptions more affordable."

But AARP CEO Bill Novelli adopted a different tone in the group's Dec. 29 release, saying, "Jan. 1 is truly a watershed day for many Americans who face the high cost of presciption drugs. Millions of Americans who have never had drug coverage can now save more money through Medicare Part D rather than turning to Canada to get their prescriptions."

Some congressional Democrats are still upset with Novelli for his role in AARP's backing of the GOP drug bill more than two years ago.

The AARP release added, "In conversations with potential enrollees, AARP is hearing that the focus has shifted from the legislation to choosing the best plan to suit their needs."

These statements triggered strong reactions from both sides of the aisle.

"AARP is selling Medicare drug coverage, so it's not surprising that they're pushing their own product," said Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio). "Now they are making an apples-to-oranges comparison between Medicare drug coverage and Canadian drug prices. Seniors deserve decent drug coverage, and every American deserves lower-priced drugs. That's the bottom line."

AARP is working with the insurance company UnitedHealth Group to offer prescription-drug coverage. More than two million seniors have signed up for drug plans offered by the AARP-backed insurer.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) said that the AARP study "drives home the point that the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit can help beneficiaries save some serious money on their prescription-drug bills." But he emphasized that the savings will not be realized by all beneficiaries.

"We need to continue to work on other ways to lower prescription drugs costs for all Americans," said Grassley. "We can't let up on making prescription drugs more affordable."

"Saying that Medicare drug plans 'cost less' than buying prescription drugs from other countries is misleading," said Jon Yarian, a spokesman for Rep. Gil Gutknecht's (R-Minn.). "The cost of the prescription drugs hasn't changed. The only difference is who bears the burden of the expense. American taxpayers will be paying for these 'savings.'"

Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R-Mo.) said, "The fact remains that we still lack a comprehensive policy to address high prescription-drug prices in America when identical, safe and affordable medicines are readily available to Americans just over our borders."

The pharmaceutical industry was more optimistic about the potential savings in the Medicare prescription-drug benefit.

"Seniors shouldn't have to gamble with their lives by importing potentially dangerous, counterfeit prescription medicines," said the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America Senior Vice President Ken Johnson. "Instead they should opt for a safer, more affordable option offered by Medicare.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Guilty Plea In Strip Club Case (NSL)

By RUSSELL BEN-ALI, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, January 4, 2006

A Brooklyn woman accused of forcing Russian immigrants to dance nude in New Jersey strip clubs in a human trafficking ring run by her husband pleaded guilty yesterday to conspiracy charges in Newark federal court.

DOJ_NMG_0008080

Viktoriya I'lina , 41, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Russia, is the last of three defendants to plead guilty in a case that involved luring more than 25 women from Voronezh in Russia, sending them to work in strip clubs and forcing them to pay exorbitant fees to members of the ring.

Yesterday she admitted demanding $5,200 from one dancer and $2,600 from another, when the two women stopped dancing in the clubs.

I'lina pleaded guilty before Judge John C. Lifland to one count of conspiracy to commit extortion, which carries a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a fine of $250,000. She also pleaded guilty to visa fraud, which carries a maximum prison sentence of five years and a fine of $250,000.

But under federal sentencing guidelines, I'lina will likely face a term of 41 to 51 months in prison when sentenced on April 13, authorities said. She also agreed to forfeit $25,575 seized from her Brooklyn residence during a court-ordered search.

"As we did with her husband, we'll be seeking a sentence at the top of that range," U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie said in a statement. "For the treatment they imposed on these women, both of them deserve nothing less."

I'lina's attorney, Lawrence S. Lustberg , said he plans to file an extensive sentencing memorandum to prove that I'lina is less culpable than her co-conspirators.

"We'll also show that for many of the women who were involved, she actually treated them with decency and dignity," Lustberg said of his client. He described her as the mother of a high school girl who traveled to the U.S. after earning a medical degree in Russia and has spent most of the past three and a half years in jail or under house arrest.

I'lina's co-defendants included her husband, ring organizer Lev Trakhtenberg , a promoter of Russian cultural events, and former boxer Sergey Malchikov , known as the group's local enforcer. The Brooklyn trio was arrested by FBI agents in August 2002.

The ring illegally gained cultural exchange visas for more than 25 women whom they represented as members of the Moscow Southwest Theater, a Russian acting troupe that visited the University of Chicago as part of an exchange program, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Once here, the victims were led to believe that their families in Russia would be harmed by mobsters if the women did not turn over much of their earnings from dancing up to 10 hours per day, six days per week in the clubs, authorities said.

Trachtenberg, a naturalized U.S. citizen, was sentenced last June to 60 months in prison for his role in the New Jersey ring. The sentence is to run concurrently with a 42-month sentence he received in Manhattan federal court, where he admitted last March to forcing one Russian woman into prostitution when she attempted to quit dancing.

Malchikov pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit forced labor, visa fraud and extortion and was sentenced last June to 45 months in prison.

Despite the ring's breakup, forced labor remains a serious problem facing law enforcement.

"We believe that this (practice) is ongoing still in New Jersey, in terms of Russian women dancing in clubs, but nothing directly related to these three defendants," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Leslie Faye Schwartz , who prosecuted the three cases.

Ater Gets Justice Dept. OK To Take Over New Orleans Elections (AP)

AP, January 4, 2006

Secretary of State Al Ater moved closer to readying a new date for the postponed New Orleans mayoral and city council elections, gaining approval from the U.S. Justice Department for special authority to take control of the elections.

The Legislature, in a recent special session, gave the secretary of state special powers to develop an emergency elections plan during a declared disaster that would let Ater relocate or consolidate polling places and address shortages of elections workers and voting machines.

That new law required approval by the federal government under the Voting Rights Act, and Ater spokeswoman Jennifer Marusak said the approval was granted.

Gov. Kathleen Blanco postponed the Feb. 4 New Orleans elections after Ater said it was impossible to ready the devastated city and track down voters so soon after Hurricane Katrina. The storm had damaged polling places and scattered the city's voters and elections workers around the nation.

Ater agreed to hold the elections by April 29 if possible, as part of the settlement of a lawsuit against him and Blanco, but a series of bureaucratic hurdles remain before he can recommend a new election date to the governor.

The governor and two legislative committees must agree to Ater's takeover of the elections - an agreement expected to win easy approval.

Then, Ater must present his emergency elections plan for New Orleans, which needs approval from the full Louisiana Legislature and another layer of approval from the U.S. Justice Department, Marusak said.

DOJ_NMG_0008081

Ater is working on a tight schedule. To hold the mayoral and city council primary elections April 29, all those approvals must be in line by March 8, when the sign-up period for the elections must begin.

As part of the developing emergency elections plan, Ater's office is combing through a list of more than one million names submitted by the Federal Emergency Management Agency - people who sought FEMA hurricane aid - hoping to track down where Katrina evacuees have relocated since the storm forced thousands of people out of Louisiana.

Ater said he needed the information to notify evacuees of their voting rights and the way to request an absentee ballot for elections.

Marusak said elections officials hope to mail the information by February and plan to use the FEMA list to start media campaigns about voting rights in areas housing the largest number of hurricane evacuees.

Ex-Boss Demanded Sex, D.C. Parks And Recreation Workers Say (WP)

By Karlyn Barker

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

The former chief of facility maintenance at the D.C. Department of Parks and Recreation allegedly kissed, fondled and demanded sexual favors from three women under his supervision, according to the women, who say the alleged harassment continued even after they told several supervisors at the agency.

The women are single mothers who were hired initially for maintenance jobs at $6.15 an hour under the District's welfare-to-work program. One former employee said she complained in person more than three years ago to Neil O. Albert, a former deputy mayor who was then the department's director.

The maintenance chief, Darnell Thompson Sr., 50, left his $66,000 position at the agency last summer after a current employee, Garrina Byrd, 28, filed a sexual harassment complaint against him with the city's Office of Human Rights.

"The Chief would grab my breasts or my behind and, if I had on a skirt, he would try to put his hand up my skirt," Byrd alleges in her complaint, filed in April. "I began to consent to the Chief's requests for sex because I was afraid that I would lose my employment."

Byrd, who was hired in 2001 and said Thompson's sexual harassment began in 2002, repeated her allegation last month at a D.C. Council committee's oversight hearing on the recreation department.

"Each time, he threatened to fire me if I didn't agree to his demands," Byrd testified. She told the panel that young women struggling to improve their lives should not be "forced to choose between their dignity and the need to make a living."

The District government has a "zero tolerance" policy that prohibits sexual harassment in the workplace and requires any supervisor who receives a complaint to make sure an investigation is conducted. Byrd's complaint has triggered mandatory training for the recreation department's 750 employees on what constitutes sexual harassment -- and what managers should do about it, said Kimberley Flowers, the department's new director.

The city has been criticized previously for failing to quickly address problems in the workplace. Five female deputies at the D.C. medical examiner's office filed complaints in 2003, alleging sexual harassment and racial discrimination, and later collected a settlement that totaled $250,000.

The allegations against Thompson are drawn from Byrd's complaint and from interviews with her and two former recreation department employees. The women alleged a range of sexual harassment incidents, most of which they said took place in Thompson's office at the facilities maintenance bureau at 1515 Half St. SW.

One woman, Annette Burns, said that Thompson tried to sexually assault her in 2002 when she was eight months pregnant -- and that she reported him to Albert. Demera Gaskins said Thompson came to recreation centers where she worked last year and pressured her for sex.

Thompson, hired in 1986, according to city records, declined to comment on the allegations when contacted by telephone at his home.

"I don't have any response," he said.

A spokeswoman for the District's Attorney General's Office, which is representing the Parks and Recreation Department, also would not comment.

Flowers and other city officials declined to discuss the allegations or say why Thompson left the agency, citing possible litigation and the confidentiality of personnel matters.

Allegations about Thompson were raised in April with the council's Committee on Education, Libraries and Recreation. Deborrah E. Jackson, an officer with the union representing non-management employees, said in an interview that she started hearing concerns about Thompson in 2001 and 2002 after the agency began hiring former welfare recipients, mostly women, for jobs that offered temporary work experience or "term" employment that could be renewed every 13 months.

DOJ_NMG_0008082

In a memorandum to council member Kathy Patterson (D-Ward 3), chairwoman of the panel, Jackson said there had been at least three sexual harassment allegations against Thompson. She wrote that Albert and another official, Neil Stanley, failed to heed the women's complaints.

"Neither of these administrators conducted in-house investigations," Jackson, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, Local 2741, told Patterson.

Albert and Stanley, however, said they took the allegations very seriously and investigated them.

"If the findings warranted it, the matter was referred to the Office of Human Rights," said Albert, who couldn't recall the specifics of any case. Albert left the agency in 2004 after three years to become a deputy mayor. He recently quit to run an education management company.

"Maybe someone didn't like the results, but it's not correct to say we didn't do anything about it," said Stanley, the agency's former general counsel who took over as interim director when Albert left. He is now a deputy director at the D.C. Department of Consumer and Regulatory Affairs.

Since January 2001, according to the Office of Human Rights, only one sexual harassment complaint -- Byrd's -- has been filed against the Department of Parks and Recreation. In the past three years, the office has received a total of 20 sexual harassment complaints from all District agencies.

Patterson said she called the Parks and Recreation Department twice about the sexual harassment allegations and about separate allegations that Thompson had brought a gun to work and threatened employees. She said that by the second call, Thompson was on administrative leave. He was dropped from the city payroll Aug. 19.

Byrd, Burns and Gaskins said they were thrilled to be hired as maintenance workers, assigned to pick up trash, rake leaves and clean recreation centers. The job paid only $6.15 to start. But it was their first steady employment, and the hours, 7 a.m. to 3:30 p.m., gave them time with their children.

Byrd alleged that her problems with Thompson began in 2002, when Thompson ordered her to pull up her shirt if she wanted to keep her job. She complied, she said, and was transferred that day from field work to the Half Street office. She answered phones, made calls -- and endured what she said in her council committee testimony was nearly three years of escalating sexual demands.

In her complaint, Byrd says she initially reported Thompson to a female supervisor, who told her to just tell him to stop.

"The touching progressed to the point where the Chief began asking for sex and when I refused, he threatened me by saying he would not extend my 13-month employment for another term," Byrd said in her complaint.

In an interview, Byrd alleged that Thompson called her into his office and showed her a termination letter.

"He asked me what was I willing to do to stay," and they then had intercourse on his desk, Byrd alleged, crying as she related the story. "I thought it would be one time and that I'd have a job and that would be the end of it."

Thompson, she alleged, began to demand a variety of sexual favors. He promoted her to a job as a clerical assistant, with a salary of $33,500 a year, even though she had no secretarial training. On Thompson's orders, she said, she spent more and more time in his office, fueling rumors that she was his girlfriend. That impression spread among co-workers when word got around that he had given Byrd $3,000 to buy a car.

She said that she did not ask for the money and that Thompson said nothing when he handed her the cash in an envelope outside the Half Street building. Thompson, she alleged, had been accused of sexually harassing another woman at work. Byrd said she regarded the cash as "hush money" so that she would not report him.

By last spring, Byrd said in an interview, she had begun refusing Thompson's sexual demands, and he showed her another termination letter. She said she discussed her problems with another supervisor, Julie Banks.

"She told me he had been threatening to fire her if she didn't have sex with him," said Banks, who urged Byrd to report Thompson.

On April 5, Byrd went to the department's headquarters on 16th Street NW and filed a complaint. That day, she was handed a letter that said she had received her "first and final" interview on her complaint, with no indication that anything would be done about it. The next day, she filed a complaint with the Office of Human Rights.

"You come into the workplace to get training and instead you get abused," said Gary T. Brown, an attorney for Byrd who also represents Burns. He said as welfare-to-work women, both were particularly vulnerable.

Burns, now 28, started at the agency in 2000. She said she began having problems with Thompson in 2002 after she became pregnant and he transferred her to clerical duties in his office. She said she complained to a male supervisor that Thompson was touching her inappropriately, but the behavior continued.

On April 30, 2002, Burns said, Thompson cornered her in his office, grabbed her left breast and tried to kiss her. She said she fled in tears. The next day, she said, she went to headquarters and met with Albert and Stanley. She was placed on administrative leave, then transferred to an office away from Thompson. She said she heard nothing more about her complaint.

DOJ_NMG_0008083

Burns, who had been hoping for a permanent job, was let go after her term employment ended.

"When I got terminated," she said, "I called Mr. Albert. He never called me back."

Albert recalled getting "one or two complaints" about Thompson. "We followed up on it immediately," he said.

Thompson was still the maintenance chief in 2004 when Gaskins, who was hired in 2003, alleges that he started making sexual demands. By then, she was a term employee with a salary of $12.95 an hour, and she said she agreed to his demands after he threatened to fire her.

"He was my boss," said Gaskins, now 25. "I pretty much had to do what he said."

But a few months later, when she began refusing, she said, Thompson handed her a termination letter, effective March 31 last year.

Johnnie Richardson, a work leader, said she heard complaints about Thompson from Gaskins and Byrd but didn't report him because she didn't believe the allegations.

Byrd returned to the Half Street office after Thompson was gone. Co-workers, she said, "have been horrible to me," and last month she was reassigned to another office with less convenient hours. She said she hopes her complaint will result in job training, a financial settlement and "someone taking responsibility."

Recently, Byrd said, she was among the employees summoned to a training session on how to recognize and prevent sexual harassment. The instructions, she said, "are four years too late."

Massachusetts Sued Over Gay Marriage Ruling (REU-Y2)

By Jason Szep

Reuters, January 4, 2006

Gay rights lawyers filed on Tuesday a lawsuit to stop a proposed ballot measure aimed at overturning a court decision that made Massachusetts the first and only U.S. state to legalize gay marriage.

The lawsuit by the Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders (GLAD) said the state's attorney general erred when he ruled in September that Massachusetts voters could decide in a 2008 poll to redefine marriage as the union of one man and one woman.

They said the decision by Thomas Reilly, a Democrat who is likely to run for governor this year, was unconstitutional because ballot initiatives cannot reverse judicial decisions under the state's Constitution.

"The attorney general simply got it wrong," Gary Buseck, GLAD's legal director, said in a statement.

Reilly's office said his decision was legally sound, adding that Reilly does not personally favor banning same-sex marriage.

Massachusetts' highest court ruled in 2003 that it was unconstitutional to ban gay marriage, paving the way for America's first same-sex marriages in May the following year.

Since then, about 7,000 gays and lesbians have wed in the state, and gay rights advocates across the country have sought to encourage other states to legalize same-sex marriages.

Those efforts have largely failed, most recently in Texas, which in November became the 19th U.S. state to approve a constitutional ban on same-sex marriage.

Homosexual couples in at least seven states have filed lawsuits seeking the right to marry, while as many as 10 states could see campaigns this year for amendments to uphold marriage as the union of a man and a woman.

'AN ELECTRIFYING ISSUE'

In Massachusetts, VoteOnMarriage.org -- a coalition of conservative and Christian groups -- proposed the 2008 ballot initiative to amend the state constitution by defining marriage as exclusively between a man and a woman.

Between September 21 and November 23 last year, they gathered more than twice the number of voter signatures needed for state legislators to put the question to the public.

On Tuesday they predicted the lawsuit would be defeated.

"We don't think the suit is credible," said Kristian Mineau, president of the Massachusetts Family Institute, a backer of the initiative. "I think they were surprised at the magnitude of the number of signatures -- 170,000 -- which tells us what an electrifying issue this is with the people."

Conservatives and some religious groups say the issue is so important that voters should decide it, not the state Supreme Court.

Massachusetts' Republican governor, Mitt Romney, a devout Mormon with White House ambitions, supports their position.

The ballot initiative must be approved by 25 percent of the 200-member state Legislature this year and again in 2007 before it can go to voters.

If passed, it would not seek to annul marriage licenses already issued to same-sex couples.

GLAD said it expects the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County to consider the lawsuit against Reilly in the next few months.

DOJ_NMG_0008084

Massachusetts Sued On Marriage Petition (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

A homosexual rights legal organization filed a lawsuit yesterday challenging a ruling that allowed a petition drive for a constitutional amendment that would end same-sex "marriages" in Massachusetts.

Massachusetts Attorney General Thomas Reilly "simply got it wrong" in September when he certified VoteOnMarriage.org's marriage amendment for a petition drive, said Gary Buseck, legal director of Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders (GLAD), which filed its lawsuit before the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court.

Article 48 of the state constitution says citizens cannot use constitutional amendments to reverse judicial decisions. The sole purpose of the marriage amendment, Mr. Buseck said, is to reverse the court's 2003 Goodridge decision, which legalized same-sex "marriage" in Massachusetts.

The proposed marriage amendment would allow marriages only between one man and one woman.

Johanna Schulman, president of GLAD's board of directors, is the lawsuit's plaintiff. Mr. Reilly and William F. Galvin, secretary of the commonwealth, are named as defendants.

The lawsuit asks the court to find that Mr. Reilly erred when he certified the VoteOnMarriage.org amendment for a signature drive. It also asks the court to block Mr. Galvin from taking any "further steps" to get the proposal on a ballot.

This fall, backers of the VoteOnMarriage.org amendment collected about 170,000 signatures, roughly twice the number needed.

Mr. Galvin certified more than 123,000 signatures in December. GLAD attorneys expect that he will send the amendment to state lawmakers when they go into session today.

The amendment must be approved twice by lawmakers before it can go before voters in November 2008. If the amendment is passed, backers say, it would not nullify existing same-sex "marriages."

More than 6,500 same-sex couples have "married" since the Goodridge decision went into effect in May 2004.

A spokesman for Mr. Reilly said yesterday that although the attorney general doesn't support the marriage amendment personally, he thinks that allowing it to proceed was the right decision.

In an opinion column written in September, Mr. Reilly said he looked carefully at the history of Article 48.

Citizen petitions have been used since the early 1900s to amend the state constitution "in response to a court decision finding a law unconstitutional," Mr. Reilly wrote. Petitions may not be used to "put a law back into effect" after a court has found it unconstitutional, but citizens are clearly allowed to amend the constitution "going forward," he wrote.

The amendment "was drafted with sound legal advice from constitutional scholars, and as long as the constitution and recent precedent are followed," it should survive a court review, said Kris Mineau, head of the Massachusetts Family Institute and spokesman for VoteOnMarriage.org.

ANTITRUST:

MAGAZINE CIRCULATION-FRAUD CASE ENTERS PLEA NEGOTIATIONS (ADAGE)

By Nat Ives

AdAge.com, January 3, 2006

NEW YORK (AdAge.com) -- One of the publishing executives accused of circulation fraud at Laptop magazine has entered plea negotiations with the U.S. Justice Department, court documents filed in the case show.

Deal likely

Proceedings regarding the executive, John Jay Annis, are on hold through Jan. 30 while the parties try to hammer out a deal, which Judge Steven M. Gold has indicated he considers likely.

The U.S. attorney's office for the Eastern District of New York, which has been investigating circulation practices since schemes by Newsday and Hoy to inflate their numbers became public, secured the arrests of Edward D. Brown, president-publisher, Bedford Communications, and Mr. Annis, Bedford's circulation director, last October.

Bogus distribution

Prosecutors accused the pair of scheming to inflate circulation at Laptop magazine by hiring a distributor to accept 15,000 copies that they would claim as paid circulation -- whether or not they were ever distributed. The distributor they hired was really an undercover postal inspector, prosecutors said.

It is unclear what a plea arrangement would mean to the circulation investigation. According to the Bedford Web site, Mr. Annis serves as a circulation consultant to “several other publishing companies,” so he may have information of interest to prosecutors about magazines beyond Laptop. That could explain the surprising effort by the government to arrange an elaborate sting on executives at Bedford, a relatively small target.

DOJ_NMG_0008085

No comment

The lead prosecutor on the case, Jonathan Edward Davis, declined to comment on any such speculation or other facets of the negotiations. An attorney for Mr. Annis did not respond to a message seeking comment.

The U.S. attorney's office has also subpoenaed Time Inc. for information on that company's bulk-distribution programs. Time Inc. disclosed the subpoena in September and said it was complying.

But a plea deal may produce nothing more than testimony against Mr. Brown or a quicker resolution of the case.

Mr. Brown's status is also unclear. After the original order for his arrest and a reported not-guilty plea, court documents do not mention him again and do not list an attorney for him. Mr. Brown did not return a call seeking comment.

Linens 'N Things Deal Gets US Antitrust Approval (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

Filed at 2:20 p.m. ET

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - U.S. antitrust authorities said on Tuesday they approved plans by Linens 'n Things Inc. (LIN.N) to be taken over by private equity firm Apollo Management L.P. and its affiliates.

Officials have completed their investigation of the $1.3 billion deal without taking action, the Federal Trade Commission said in a notice.

Linens 'n Things faces stiff competition from larger rival Bed Bath & Beyond Inc. (BBBY.O) and discounters such as Target Corp. (TGT.N), which have expanded home decor offerings.

Under the terms of the Apollo deal, financing is contingent upon Linens 'n Things reporting a fourth-quarter comparable sales decline of no more than 6 percent and earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization of not less than $140 million.

Cisco's Offer For Scientific-Atlanta Gets U.S. Antitrust Clearance (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

Cisco Systems Inc. received U.S. antitrust clearance for its offer to acquire Scientific-Atlanta Inc. for about $6.9 billion, or $43 a share.

The San Jose, Calif., networking titan said its bid still requires regulatory approvals in various foreign jurisdictions. Cisco agreed in November to acquire the maker of television set-top boxes, filling in the missing video element from its far-reaching effort to penetrate the consumer market.

Scientific-Atlanta, Lawrenceville, Ga., said its shareholders can vote on the proposed deal with Cisco at a special meeting Feb. 2. The companies expect the deal to close in Cisco's fiscal 2006 third quarter, which ends in April.

As of 4 p.m. composite trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market, Cisco was at $17.45, up 33 cents. As of 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, Scientific-Atlanta was at $42.90, off 17 cents.

Cisco Systems Says Regulatory Waiting Period For Acquisition Of Scientific-Atlanta Expires (AP)

AP, January 4, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP) -- Network equipment maker Cisco Systems Inc. said the federal waiting period for its acquisition of cable television technology company Scientific-Atlanta Inc. has expired without regulators taking any action.

On Tuesday, the companies said the U.S. antitrust waiting period expired on Friday, though the deal is still subject to approval by authorities outside the United States.

Under the transaction announced in November, Cisco will acquire Scientific-Atlanta for $6.9 billion, or $43 per share in cash, and assumed options. Scientific-Atlanta's cash balance will reduce the cost of the deal for Cisco to about $5.3 billion.

The deal, which is expected to close by late April, is expected to fuel changes in how TV is distributed and watched as programming is increasingly shuttled to homes using the language of the Internet.

Scientific-Atlanta, a leading maker of cable boxes and the technology behind them, is expected to benefit as its customers -- cable and phone companies -- move toward Internet-based TV offerings. Cisco is the world's largest supplier of data networking gear.

Shares of San Jose-based Cisco rose 33 cents to close at $17.45 Tuesday on the Nasdaq Stock Market. Shares of Scientific-Atlanta fell 17 cents to close at $42.90 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Banking Against Wal-Mart (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) will soon have to make a big decision: whether to grant retail giant Wal-Mart a charter to enter the consumer banking business. You won't be surprised to learn that the idea of more banking competition is not universally popular with . . . bankers.

In particular, the Independent Community Bankers Association (ICBA) is raising a ruckus in Washington to keep big bad Wal-Mart locked out of their game. We have here a textbook case of a powerful corporate lobby rushing to its pals in Congress and their regulators, in this case the FDIC, and pleading for them to squash competition that might lower the prices of banking services.

At issue is whether Wal-Mart should be granted the authority to establish an Industrial Loan Company (ILC) in Utah. ILCs are state-chartered, quasi-banks that were originally designed a century ago to help low-income workers get cheap loans. ILCs can provide most banking services, such as check cashing, lending, and credit card processing. Target and General Electric have been granted an ILC with little controversy. But because Wal-Mart has been portrayed as America's latest corporate villain, its political hurdles are much higher.

If the bankers succeed in this protectionist gambit, the biggest loser won't be Wal-Mart, but rather consumers, particularly those in lower-income neighborhoods where competition in retail banking is traditionally scarce. Wal-Mart banking services in these areas might even solve the longstanding problems of red-lining and discriminatory lending practices. Wal-Mart already performs many bank-like functions that are especially popular in poor areas -- including wire transfers, money orders, paycheck cashing, and express bill payment services.

So it's especially notable that Congressman Barney Frank of Massachusetts and a gang of other Capitol Hill liberals have cast a skeptical eye toward Wal-Mart's entry into banking. If they decide to regulate Wal-Mart out of the industry, the end result will be higher banking service costs for the poor constituents they claim to represent.

The protest is all the more curious since Wal-Mart's immediate banking ambitions are quite modest. To head off the mounting opposition from the bankers, Wal-Mart insists that in the short term it merely wants to create an in-house banking affiliate so it can lower costs on credit card transactions at its stores. Traditionally, banks charge an interchange fee of roughly 2% on the cost of the retail credit/debit card transaction. Wal-Mart has determined that if it owns its own bank it can cut the transaction fee in half, and pass the cost-savings on to its customers who pay with Visa or MasterCard.

But why shouldn't Wal-Mart be permitted to engage in a whole range of banking services down the line, if it wishes to? That's the meaty policy issue at stake here: whether the traditional firewall between banks and commercial enterprises (i.e., the commercial lenders and the borrowers) should be officially torn down. The Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act of 1999 effectively abandoned this traditional separation between commerce and banking when it allowed securities and insurance firms to engage in most banking activities. This has all been part of a 25-year-long deregulation of banking that has led to huge increases in efficiency in American financial markets as well as vastly improved consumer services. (Remember the quaint notion of "banker's hours?")

Peter Wallison of the American Enterprise Institute notes that "the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act has eviscerated the policy case against allowing commercial firms to affiliate with banks." Wal-Mart's entry into the mix would merely continue what has been a benign, pro-competition trend.

Would granting Wal-Mart its ILC status impose an unnecessary financial risk on the soundness of the banking system? The Community Bankers lobby warns that "Wal-Mart's entrance into banking would constitute a dangerous over-concentration of economic power that would skew market forces." What clearly undermines this argument is that in every other consumer market that Wal-Mart has entered, from hardware services to selling gas at the pump, the impact of its gaining market share has been to reduce prices, not to raise them.

Studies have found, for example, that in neighborhoods where Wal-Mart has entered the grocery business, its prices range from 8% to 27% below those charged at the incumbent grocery chains. Moreover, if there were a repeat of the kind of bank failures we witnessed in the late 1980s, financially sturdy Wal-Mart would be far less susceptible to the risk of closure (and FDIC deposit insurance payments to depositors) than small and less capitalized community banks.

It's always possible that Wal-Mart will fall on its face in banking. We suspect, however, that what really spooks the banking industry is the threat of more competition, more convenience and lower prices for financial services. But that should be welcome news to members of Congress and the regulators at the Federal Reserve Board and the FDIC if they truly care about the welfare of the banking consumer.

DOJ_NMG_0008087

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

No New Deaths In Oklahoma, But The Fires Cut A Grim Path (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

SHAWNEE, Okla., Jan. 3 - Firefighters contained at least seven new and long-smoldering blazes across Oklahoma on Tuesday with no reported injuries, but hundreds of additional acres of drought-parched grassland and dozens of buildings were scorched or destroyed, officials reported.

Texas and New Mexico also fought holding actions against the fires, some apparently set, that have so far claimed at least two dead in Oklahoma and three dead in Texas and consumed more than half a million acres and more than 500 homes.

One fire in Shamrock off I-44 between Oklahoma City and Tulsa gutted an unoccupied school and resisted barrages of flame-retardant chemicals dropped from a four-engine tanker plane. At least 62 firefighters from Tennessee, Alabama, North Carolina and other states were deployed in six eastern Oklahoma sectors with bulldozers, tanker trucks and other heavy equipment.

"The grass is so dead - you might as well have matches sitting out there," said Troy Taylor, a truck driver from Ringgold, Tex., who saw a wall of flame advancing on him on Sunday and fled with his wife, Lori, and their children.

The fire, which began on Sunday and was still active Tuesday afternoon, burned a trail 25 miles long, destroying 41,000 acres and 32 buildings in two counties.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency authorized the use of federal disaster relief funds to help Texas, Oklahoma and New Mexico fight the fires. But Lt. Gov. Mary Fallin of New Mexico, in a visit to the incident command center in Shawnee that is serving as firefighting headquarters, said Oklahoma was still waiting for the White House response to the state's request for a federal declaration of emergency to cover some of the state's expenses.

"Contact has been made," said Ms. Fallin, a Republican running for Congress.

Some of the visiting firefighters spoke with relish of rushing to the aid of the stricken Southwest. Pete Moditz, a career forester from Selmer, Tenn., showed off his legs scratched red through his pants from brambles as he led a tractor plow through the fires. Water might knock down a fire, but "that," he said, pointing to the yellow monster on tank treads, "puts it out."

A wet spring combined with parched conditions for the last six months have made Texas, Oklahoma and New Mexico a giant tinderbox.

"We've got reports that this is the worst drought since 1956," said Judge James Kittrell of Montague County, whose jurisdiction includes Ringgold.

Thirty-three of Oklahoma's 77 counties have suffered fires, with damages put at $10 million. In Texas, since Dec. 26, 159 fires have destroyed 238 homes and 254,555 acres, according to the state's emergency management center.

In New Mexico, 14 grass fires burned up to 60,000 acres.

The fire in Ringgold was frighteningly fast, residents said, falling on the North Texas town at speeds of up to 60 miles per hour. "We decided if the flames made it to the railroad tracks, we were going to leave," said Mr. Taylor, the truck driver, pointing to a distant ridge.

"Ten minutes later, it was in our yard," Mr. Taylor said.

The billowing wall of four-foot flames had burned its way to U.S. 82, jumped the road and blazed across the Taylors' lawn right up to the house.

Around them they could hear the sounds of their town burning down: propane tanks exploding, tires popping, paint cans blowing lids.

"The fire was right next to the van when we left," Mr. Taylor said.

"It came so quick, it went around the buildings and went on," he said. Mr. Taylor, who had driven around the block, realized his house was all right, jumped out of his van and began putting out his lawn of flames.

Battle Over Property Rights Goes On, Despite Ruling (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2006

The moment of truth is yet to arrive in the now-famous Fort Trumbull neighborhood in New London, Conn.

Six months after the US Supreme Court ruled that the city could seize and demolish private homes to make way for a commercial development project, determined residents are still living in their homes in the targeted neighborhood.

There have been no bulldozers. No wrecking balls. No police officers dragging homeowners away. At least, not yet.

DOJ_NMG_0008088

Instead, the state of Connecticut has hired a mediator to try to find a more peaceful solution to the seven-year battle that has touched off a heated debate over the government's use of eminent domain to foster economic development.

To property rights activists across the nation, Fort Trumbull has become ground zero in that battle ever since the high court's 5-4 ruling. These activists are using outrage over the case to spearhead a reform movement aimed at passing laws to make it increasingly difficult for local and state governments to raze homes and turn the land over to private developers.

"It has to be one of the most vilified Supreme Court decisions in history - where people understood the issues, understood the result, and didn't like it," says Scott Sawyer, a member of the legal team representing the homeowners.

On the other side of the debate are government officials, planners, urban renewal experts, and development firms warning that many cities and towns need every tool at their disposal to help foster prosperity in the face of chronic economic decline. To these advocates, New London is a prime example of a small city with high unemployment, a stagnant tax base, and no large tracts of vacant land to support a major development project. Without the option of using eminent domain, the city's economic prospects would be bleak, they say.

"We won. We would like to move the project forward," says New London City Manager Richard Brown. "We are champing at the bit to get going."

There is nothing new about the constitutional issue at the center of the case. The Supreme Court has long recognized that there is no bar to government takings that may provide both public and private benefits.

But Kelo v. New London was different because of the players involved. The high court's two prior legal precedents involved monopolistic landowners in Hawaii and a department store owner in Washington, D.C. In contrast, Susette Kelo is a homeowner, like most US citizens. When the government took action against her, many Americans could imagine the government taking similar action against them. Kelo's pink cottage in Fort Trumbull has become an icon, Mr. Sawyer says, as recognizable to some as the Liberty Bell.

"It is the house that represents property rights in the United States," he says. "Why would you ever tear that down?"

Sawyer and others say they aren't sure what will happen next. City officials say the development project is still economically viable. All they need is a green light from the mediator and the state.

The city's redevelopment agency has spent much of its $70 million budget preparing a large portion of the 90-acre riverfront site for the planned hotel, office, and condo project. Land has been graded, roads built, and utilities installed. But major construction has not yet begun.

Some analysts suggest that the national backlash following the Supreme Court decision has made it even more difficult to find companies willing to move in. What firm wants to locate to a piece of property that will long be associated with the taking of people's homes? these analysts ask.

Nonetheless, the city's planning board has approved the hotel portion of the project, and there are talks under way for the Coast Guard to move its research and development center to a vacant office building on the site. The building is all that remains of the US Naval Undersea Warfare Center, which was shut down in 1996.

When that center closed, the federal government agreed to turn over the 32 acres of property to the city. Rather than focus on that tract alone, the city expanded its redevelopment plan by 58 acres, including the Fort Trumbull neighborhood.

The homeowners say they aren't opposed to redevelopment. But they don't see why the renewal project has to include the demolition of their homes.

It is difficult to overestimate the level of animosity between New London development officials and the homeowners. After enduring years of attempts to force them out, residents say the toughest test so far has been losing at the Supreme Court.

"It took a while to get a handle on it," says Matt Dery, whose family has lived on the same corner in Fort Trumbull for 100 years. But Mr. Dery says his discussion with the mediator has left him hopeful. "Things have a way of working themselves out. Maybe there is a higher power at work here - I'm sure there is," he says.

Dery's neighbor, Byron Athenian, is just taking it day by day. "It is kind of a strange way to live," says Mr. Athenian, who has resided for 10 years in the house with gray shingles owned by his mother. This past fall, a few months after the Supreme Court ruling, he received an eviction notice. "When I first got it, it was like 'Wow, they only gave me 30 days to leave,' " he says.

The city's redevelopment agency sent notices to all tenants living in rented properties in Fort Trumbull. The move got the attention of Connecticut Gov. M. Jodi Rell, who instructed the city to withdraw the notices. Since then, the feud has been in hiatus pending the work of the mediator.

But that hasn't stopped people from worrying about what might happen next.

"I think there could be civil disobedience if they moved in there with a wrecking ball," says Susan Munger, a member of the Coalition to Save the Fort Trumbull Neighborhood. "There has to be another way to resolve it that is satisfactory to the homeowners. Some of them don't have any intention of leaving."

As for a compromise, City Manager Brown isn't making any predictions. But he says New London badly needs a boost.

DOJ_NMG_0008089

"The forecast for economic assistance from the state of Connecticut to its urban areas is not any better for the upcoming year than it was for the past couple," he says. "We are going to be left on our own to develop new sources of revenue, so we need the project to move forward."

Prevention Is Key To Avian Or Seasonal Flu (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

Avian flu has recently moved to the top of President Bush's health care agenda. But medical experts such as Susan J. Blumenthal have been warning for years that international travel, a weakened public health system and antiquated vaccines have made the prospect of an influenza pandemic a matter of when, not if.

Blumenthal, a former assistant surgeon general, in a recent speech in Washington warned that the H5N1 strain of the virus, now confined largely to birds, has the potential to develop into a deadly human virus. Already, the virus has "killed more birds than any in the history of the world," humans do not have immunity, it is striking younger victims and it has spread rapidly into at least 16 countries, she said.

A clinical professor of psychiatry at Georgetown and Tufts University schools of medicine, Blumenthal was the first deputy assistant secretary for women's health, from 1993 to 1997, and is an authority on global public health. She retired from the government last year.

In an interview, she talked about infectious diseases and chronic illnesses -- and what individuals and the government can do to reduce risk. She said one of the lessons of Hurricane Katrina is that the United States is not sufficiently prepared to deal with any number of crises, from a terrorist attack to a natural disaster to a pandemic.

-- Ceci Connolly

Q Why is a pandemic a matter of when, not if?

AEach generation has had a pandemic. The 1918 influenza pandemic killed 40 million people and infected 500 million. It was like a global blizzard over 18 months. With international trade and modern travel, the world is shrinking. . . . In 1969, the surgeon general announced the "war against infectious diseases is over." We thought we had conquered the microbe. But we've had 30 new diseases since 1972, including SARS [severe acute respiratory syndrome], monkey pox and Lyme disease.

How real is the threat of an avian flu pandemic?

On the question of are we more vulnerable, there is the group of people I call the ostriches and the Chicken Little. The ostriches point out that we have better science and public health than ever before, that we have not seen the H5N1 virus here. The Chicken Little say we do not have enough antiviral [medications]; we don't have a vaccine. The threat is probably somewhere in between.

How is the virus spread?

It begins in aquatic birds, moves to domestic poultry and then potentially to humans. . . . Asia is a hotbed [for H5N1] because people live in close proximity to poultry, and they lack a strong public health infrastructure. You can become infected through direct contact with poultry or contact with a surface that has poultry droppings or excretions. There have been about 135 human cases since 1997, which is relatively few.

Your speeches are alarming. Is that intentional?

Somewhat. If you give candid information, people make good decisions. But we also want it to be a wake-up call. People know they should eat right, exercise, get out of the way of a hurricane, but we don't always do those things. We know we shouldn't smoke, yet one out of five people do. It took Katrina and seeing some of the failures in not having state, federal and local preparedness not being coordinated to serve as a wake-up call to the concern of pandemic flu.

Are we prepared?

We're not sufficiently prepared if a pandemic were to strike us this year. We have a plan that outlines the major steps to be taken. Hopefully we'll have the time to develop new vaccines and stockpile antivirals. We don't have [the necessary] communications systems in place. We don't have a rapid diagnostic tool for using in the field, there is no cell-based vaccine nor the production systems that would be needed. . . . But we can't forget the [pandemics] that are currently with us.

Such as?

Forty million people worldwide are infected with the AIDS virus; 3 million die each year. One million children die of measles each year because they don't get a 70-cent vaccine. . . . In the United States, we have the highest infant mortality rate of the industrialized world. We spend twice as much as any other nation on health care, and we rank 18th in life expectancy and 35th in overall health status.

If there is an outbreak of avian flu, would there be a quarantine in the United States, and what would it look like?

What we would suggest is social distancing -- have people stay in their homes, not go to mass gatherings. It would be a real challenge. We have a generation of physicians who haven't trained in quarantine techniques. During the SARS outbreak, it was health care professionals and students who violated the quarantine. If there is a pandemic, things could quickly degenerate into chaos. That's why it's important to rehearse for these things.

What should average Americans do to protect themselves against avian flu or other infectious diseases?

Get your seasonal flu shot. The seasonal flu causes 36,000 deaths in America and 500,000 worldwide. It translates into $37 billion in economic costs related to treatment. . . . Also get a pneumonia shot. Practice good hygiene, particularly around the holiday season when you are at a lot of parties shaking hands. Washing hands is one of the best public health interventions we have.

What would you put on the top of a public health agenda for 2006?

Smoking, certainly. If you thought there were a killer out there claiming the lives of one out of every five people, we'd have the FBI, CIA and police all out there tracking that terrorist. . . . Safe water. Water is one of the key health and political issues of the 21st century. [Unclean] water is the leading cause of death and disability in the world. Water impacts the economy; it's linked to energy, recreation, food. Katrina showed the importance of access to safe water. Sixty-five percent of our bodies are water.

You say in your speeches that we are a treatment-oriented society rather than a prevention-oriented society. Why is that noteworthy?

Small steps can bring big rewards. Losing five or 10 pounds can make you feel much better. Walking 10,000 steps a day. These can significantly decrease your risk for chronic illnesses. . . . On a public policy level, whether you're trying to prevent cancer, diabetes, a hurricane or bioterrorism, prevention is the cornerstone.

Buffalo Lawsuit Challenges A Casino Off Indian Land (NYT)

By David Staba

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

BUFFALO, Jan. 3 - In the latest salvo between local advocates and government officials over this city's future, a coalition of citizens' groups, churches, business people and lawyers filed a lawsuit in federal court on Tuesday to halt construction of an Indian casino on the Buffalo River waterfront.

The suit alleges that federal officials, including Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton, failed to abide by a 1988 law regulating gambling facilities established off reservation land when they approved the proposed Buffalo casino. The proposed facility is one of three gambling sites in this region allowed under a 2002 compact between New York State and the Seneca Nation.

In legal papers filed in Federal District Court, the plaintiffs - led by a group called Citizens Against Casino Gambling in Erie County - said that a Buffalo casino cannot be permitted under federal law, because the nine-acre site along the Buffalo River is not adjacent to an existing reservation and was not part of land claimed by the Seneca Nation.

In addition, the suit alleges that the approval process violated federal laws that require a study of the environmental impact of a proposed casino. The plaintiffs also say that demolition of a grain elevator at the proposed site would violate the National Historic Preservation Act.

"Some people have tried to make this into grain silos versus a casino, but this is a much more important issue," said Richard Lippes, one of the plaintiffs' lawyers. "These citizens aren't opposed to progress. They just want the right things to happen in the right way."

Barry E. Snyder, president of the Seneca Nation, was not available for comment Tuesday afternoon. But on Friday, he spoke dismissively of a possible lawsuit during the partial opening of a luxury hotel adjacent to the Senecas' existing casino in Niagara Falls.

"Lawsuits come and go - they don't interest me," Mr. Snyder was quoted as saying in The Buffalo News. "We took the opportunity to build a casino and hotel in Niagara Falls because no one else would do it. I've said the same of Buffalo, and we're going ahead. I'm a man of my word."

Proponents also maintain that the casino will create jobs as well as spur economic development in the long dormant area.

Several parties to the lawsuit, including Mr. Lippes and the Preservation Coalition of Erie County, also took part in recent years in two other significant civic lawsuits that sought to preserve land.

They were among the litigants who halted a state plan to build a marina, which would have been constructed atop limestone walls that were part of the original terminus of the Erie Canal, and a proposal by an international commission to build a steel bridge next to the Peace Bridge, which was built in 1927 and connects Buffalo to Fort Erie, Ontario.

In each instance, a judge ruled that the government agencies involved did not follow proper planning procedures. Both plans have since been revised. The waterfront plans, proposed by the Empire State Development Corporation, now include the restoration of the canal terminus and other historic elements. As for the bridge, a two-nation panel has recommended a sweeping cable-stayed bridge over the Niagara River.

DOJ_NMG_0008091

"In both cases, we got something better," said Mr. Lippes, who served as general counsel to the primary plaintiff in each case.

Like the waterfront and Peace Bridge suits, the legal challenge to the proposed Seneca Buffalo Creek Casino is being financed in part by the Margaret L. Wendt Foundation, which often provides money to educational or artistic organizations.

"We feel the need to make sure the laws are followed when making this kind of change to our community," said Janet Loew Day, a foundation trustee.

The plaintiffs said that taking the land for the proposed casino site off the tax rolls and creating, in essence, a tiny sovereign nation housing the casino would run counter to the canal restoration plans and other nascent development in the area.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

High-tech Gadgetry Pops Up In Drug Trade (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel, January 4, 2006

He couldn't help but show off a little.

With the eager customer watching, the alleged drug dealer waltzed into the bathroom of the East Knoxville house, flipped on the light and then pressed the switch into the wall. Up from the floor popped a secret compartment where drugs were kept hidden.

The customer must have seemed impressed because the alleged dealer gave him an impromptu tour of other hidden hatches used by his organization and even introduced the consumer to the "Kid" who crafted all of the devices.

Turns out, the customer was a rat.

This morsel of insider information on both the investigation and the inner workings of a large-scale Detroit-to-Knoxville drug trafficking organization is contained in an 83-page search warrant affidavit recently unsealed in U.S. District Court.

The search warrants obtained via the affidavit led to the November arrests of four men accused in a conspiracy case that Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck has alleged in court records funneled hundreds of pounds of cocaine, crack and marijuana and thousands of ecstasy pills from the Motor City to Knoxville starting in May 2003.

The arrested - and later indicted - include alleged mastermind Robert "Party" Smith and the man Knoxville Police Department Investigator Bruce Conkey dubbed Smith's right-hand man, Stephen "Black" Ardis.

The search warrant affidavit broadens the suspect list in the alleged conspiracy to include at least a dozen other people, including both drug dealer suspects in Knoxville and supplier suspects in Detroit.

The lengthy document also reveals an organization that was, at times, as sophisticated as the make-believe cocaine kingpin Tony Montana of "Scarface" movie fame, who Conkey has testified was Smith's idol. At other times, the affidavit makes the group seem downright foolhardy.

Take the tour offered the informant, for instance.

It revealed a concerted effort by the alleged trafficking organization to spread out the risks of police raids by using a half-dozen different houses to handle the trade, the affidavit stated.

At some, deemed in the affidavit as "stash houses," drugs were stored. At others, termed in the affidavit as "crack houses," drugs were sold. If police hit any single place, the entire inventory of illegal wares would not be wiped out.

The group used sophisticated secret compartments, including the nifty pop-up box built into the floor of a bathroom at a house on Sunset Avenue, the affidavit alleged. Vehicles used to transport drugs also were equipped with hidden stash boxes, including a Ford Excursion described in the affidavit that had two secret compartments, one where the airbag should have been and another in the floor. Both were activated through cigarette lighters in the vehicle, the affidavit stated.

According to the affidavit, a man identified only as the "Kid" engineered hiding places for the alleged network's goody stash.

The alleged dealer who showed off the devices in August has not been charged. The affidavit makes clear he had no idea the customer he was trying to wow with his tour was working for Conkey and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Todd Lee.

The pair, who led the probe, used five informants in all during their two-year investigation. Only two are now willing to testify, the affidavit stated.

Despite the high-tech gadgetry and constant use of code words to cloak the illegal goings-on of the group, Smith and Ardis apparently were clueless that Conkey and Lee were on their trail, the affidavit alleged.

DOJ_NMG_0008092

That changed in October when an unidentified woman called Ardis after Ardis drove past her home. She tipped him that one, maybe two, unmarked cars were tailing him, according to the affidavit.

"I can't believe you all didn't see them," she said.

Within days, secretly recorded phone conversations between Ardis and Smith showed not only that Ardis had figured out he was being followed but that the pursuing undercover officer was none other than "McConkey."

Conkey has for more than a decade managed to work undercover while having one of the most high-profile nicknames and reputations in the inner city.

Years ago, angry drug dealers who had accused Conkey of harassing them wrote and recorded a rap song about him, referring to him as "McConkey." The nickname stuck.

On Oct. 26, the affidavit alleges, Ardis called Smith to break the bad news that "McConkey" had been following him.

"I just now found out it was him," Ardis is quoted in the affidavit as saying.

Smith pressed Ardis on where he saw "McConkey" so they could move their operation, the affidavit alleged. But Ardis said it didn't matter where he moved. "McConkey" would find him, according to the affidavit.

" the (expletive) like Superman," Ardis said.

Days later, however, the pair were back in business, the affidavit alleged. Less than a month later, Conkey, Lee and a team of federal and local officers arrested them.

They are now awaiting trial, along with an alleged "mule" who authorities say ferried drugs for the pair and a person accused of being a customer. It's not clear if those named in the affidavit will be charged

Former State Prison Officer Faces Felony Drug Charges (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 4, 2006

MISSOULA -- A federal grand jury here has indicted a former officer at the Montana State Prison on charges of attempting to distribute methamphetamine, heroin and marijuana.

Michael E. Short, 50, was arraigned in U.S. District Court in Missoula on Tuesday and was released without bail after pleading not guilty.

Prosecutors, the FBI and a state Corrections Department official declined to discuss specifics of the case, including whether Short is accused of trying to sell drugs to inmates. However, a statement from the U.S. attorney's office said the charges were the result of a joint investigation between the FBI and the Department of Corrections.

Corrections spokesman Bob Anez said only that Short worked at the prison for about 5 1/2 years before resigning in July 2005.

"Other than that, I can't comment beyond what is in the indictment because we don't want to do anything that would contaminate a jury pool should this case ever go to trial," Anez said.

It was not clear late Tuesday whether Short had hired an attorney.

The federal indictment, which is dated Dec. 8 but unsealed only upon Short's appearance Tuesday, charges Short with attempting to possess and attempting to distribute a quarter pound of marijuana and a half ounce of methampetamine on July 12, 2005, in the Deer Lodge and Anaconda area.

He faces a second charge of attempting to possess and attempting to distribute a quarter pound of marijuana, a half ounce of methamphetamine and 2 grams of heroin on July 16, 2005, in the same area. Short also is charged with being a drug user in possession of a firearm. All three charges are felonies.

Rhode Island Legalizes Medical Marijuana (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) -- Rhode Island on Tuesday became the 11th state to legalize medical marijuana and the first since the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June that patients who use the drug can still be prosecuted under federal law.

The House overrode a veto by Gov. Don Carcieri, 59-13, allowing people with illnesses such as cancer and AIDS to grow up to 12 marijuana plants or buy 2.5 ounces of marijuana to relieve their symptoms. Those who do are required to register with the state and get an identification card.

Federal law prohibits any use of marijuana, but Maine, Vermont, Alaska, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Montana, Nevada, Oregon and Washington allow it to be grown and used for medicinal purposes.

The U.S. high court ruled June 6 that people who smoke marijuana because their doctors recommend it can still be prosecuted under federal drug laws, even if their states allow it.

DOJ_NMG_0008093

Federal authorities, however, have conceded they are unlikely to prosecute many medicinal marijuana users.

"I'm sure everybody in this room knows at least one person who would have benefited from medical marijuana," Rep. Thomas Slater, who has cancer, told fellow lawmakers before the vote. Slater said he does not use marijuana now, but it could become part of his treatment in the future.

Carcieri, unhappy with the override, said the law fails to provide ways for users to buy marijuana legally and leaves Rhode Islanders open to federal prosecution.

"Users will be forced to purchase marijuana in the illegal street market, putting them at risk and complicating the difficult jobs that our law enforcement personnel must do every day," the governor said.

Tom Riley, a spokesman for the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said the vote showed "misguided and out-of-touch" views on the harms of marijuana.

"There's this notion from the '60s or the '70s that marijuana is a harmless drug," Riley said. "It's not."

Legislators Override Veto, Then Begin New Session (PROJO)

By Scott Mayerowitz, Katherine Gregg And Elizabeth Gudrais

The Providence Journal, January 4, 2006

PROVIDENCE -- Rhode Island became the 11th state yesterday to allow the use of marijuana to ease the pain of people suffering from serious and chronic illnesses such as AIDS and cancer.

Patients whose doctors or caregivers recommend marijuana will soon be able to possess up to 12 plants, or 2.5 ounces of marijuana. The new law protects them from arrest under state law, but does nothing to stop federal prosecution, leaving some critics to call the measure nothing more than a symbolic act.

The marijuana issue provided a dramatic start to the lawmakers' first day back in the State House in six months.

This year's legislative session began with an almost festive atmosphere. There were backslaps and smiles and tables full of food, despite simmering election-year tensions, especially those between House Speaker William J. Murphy's leadership team and an alliance of Republicans and dissident Democrats.

Murphy, D-West Warwick, vowed in the coming months to tackle -- among other things -- "responsible tax reform, a comprehensive energy strategy, a fair and livable working wage."

"The issues that we will face in this session are the issues that every Rhode Islander faces in their day-to-day lives," Murphy said.

BUT THE FOCUS yesterday was on marijuana.

Lawmakers had passed "medical marijuana" legislation in June, but the measure was vetoed by Governor Carcieri. The Senate overrode the veto the next day, but the House waited until yesterday to override, easily doing so with a 59-to-13 vote. Three members were absent and only 44 votes were needed for the override.

(Lawmakers have been officially on "recess" for the last six months, allowing for the override before officially adjourning yesterday and then opening a new session.)

"It's been a long wait and a lot of work, but this law will grant mercy and relief to the sick and suffering. Finally Rhode Island will stop denying sick people a proven means of relief from their pain," said the House sponsor, Rep. Thomas C. Slater, D-Providence, who has cancer.

Sen. Rhoda E. Perry, D-Providence, the Senate sponsor, called it a "progressive and compassionate piece of legislation." The bill carries the name of Edward O. Hawkins, Perry's nephew who died of AIDS.

Persuading his colleagues for an override, Slater said "Ten states have realized that it makes no sense in making people criminals for following their doctor's advice and relieving their pain." In those states, "The sky has not fallen and thousands of patients live in less pain."

House Minority Leader Robert A. Watson, R-East Greenwich, who supported and voted for the bill in the past, said that in his heart he wanted to pass the law but in the end he needed to stand behind the governor. Only 6 of the 14 other House Republicans joined Watson, voting to uphold the veto.

Carcieri's press secretary, Jeff Neal, said the governor continues to oppose the measure, saying it will "encourage criminal activity because it does not provide any means for the legal purchase of medical marijuana."

The Republican governor's office also said that "the definition of which medical conditions qualify one for use of marijuana is so broad that it would allow nearly any Rhode Islander to be a user."

Carcieri has said the bill "is full of loopholes" including a lack of standards for dosage and quality of the drugs, no legal source of the drug or marijuana seeds and allows patients and their caregivers to possess "staggering" amounts of marijuana.

DOJ_NMG_0008094

The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy also weighed in yesterday, saying that using marijuana is still against federal laws and the Food and Drug Administration does not consider the drug a safe and effective medicine for pain relief.

"It's largely symbolic. I don't think that it will have practical effect," Tom Riley, a spokesman in the office, said of Rhode Island's law.

Riley also said that the vast majority of people who serve time for marijuana possession are trafficking the drug.

Additionally, in June the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that state laws permitting the medicinal use of marijuana do not supersede federal laws.

Ten states already have similar laws: Alaska, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Maine, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Vermont and Washington.

There are other states that have medical marijuana laws, but the Marijuana Policy Project, which has been pushing for the law here, says these 10 states are the only ones where the law makes a practical difference. The Marijuana Policy Project works to "minimize" laws that are intended to prohibit marijuana use.

Rhode Island, Hawaii and Vermont are the only three states where medical marijuana came through legislative action. The other states approved it through ballot initiatives.

The group's executive director, Rob Kampia, hailed yesterday's vote -- the first after the Supreme Court ruling -- as a major victory.

"We will continue to roll back the government's war on the sick and dying and the White House drug czar can't stop us any more than he can make water flow uphill," Kampia said in a statement.

THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH now has 90 days to create rules and regulations regarding the use of marijuana for medical purposes.

Once those rules are in place, people looking to use marijuana must first get a signed statement by a doctor stating that in their opinion "the potential benefits of the medical use of marijuana would likely outweigh the health risks for the qualifying patient."

The department then has 30 days to approve or deny the application and another 5 days to then issue identification cards to those approved.

Anybody with such a card is immune from state criminal and civil prosecution or any disciplinary action by employers as long as they do not possess more than the allowed quantities.

The law does nothing to protect people from arrest or prosecution under federal drug laws.

The plants must be stored in "an indoor facility." Authorized caregivers cannot have a felony conviction in their past. The Department of Health is required to report back to the legislature by Jan. 1, 2007, on the number of people who availed themselves of the program, and any problems arising from it. Unless lawmakers vote to keep the program going, it will expire on June 30, 2007.

The legislation does not provide a way for people to get the drug, leaving that to illegal channels.

AFTER PASSING THE marijuana legislation, lawmakers shifted to the session ahead.

During an opening speech, Murphy more than once urged his colleagues "to put aside petty politics and whatever personal agenda[s] we might have in this election year and get down to doing the work that we have been sent here to do."

"Let's do what's right, not what's politically expedient," Murphy said. "And, please, this is an election year. Let's work for six months together as a House of Representatives and worry about politics in June."

Watson quipped in response: "I would hope that we don't rid the room of all petty politics, because we do need to have some fun."

More seriously, Watson said: "A majority is judged best by how they treat the minority."

Over in the Senate, lawmakers took the highly unusual step of recommitting two bills that passed by both chambers last year but were never transmitted to the governor's desk.

Senate spokesman Greg Pare said the bills were never given to Carcieri because the Senate leadership tried, but failed, to work out a compromise and avoid vetoes on the bills.

So yesterday, the Senate essentially killed off the bills by sending them back to committee.

The first was a lobbying bill that would have exempted from disclosures certain sales and purchases -- namely, transactions carried out "in the ordinary course of business and for fair market value" -- made by people and companies seeking to influence the General Assembly.

The other would have allowed Beacon Mutual Insurance, the state's dominant worker's compensation insurer, to expand beyond Rhode Island's borders and go from a public nonprofit to a private for-profit company.

DOJ_NMG_0008095

Supporters Of Medical Marijuana Bill Concede Problems (PROJO)

By Felice J. Freyer

The Providence Journal, January 4, 2006

The medical marijuana law that passed yesterday allows doctors to recommend that patients obtain from illegal sources a drug of unknown potency and unknown purity.

This is not how doctors normally prescribe treatment.

But if the longstanding support of the Rhode Island Medical Society is any indication, many are willing to go this route -- because of the potential benefits to patients who can't get relief from pain, nausea, muscle spasms and other problems.

Even supporters of the concept, however, admit that it's "weird."

Under the new law, a doctor, a nurse practitioner or anyone else permitted to write prescriptions can sign a statement attesting that "the potential benefits of the medical use of marijuana would likely outweigh the health risks" for a patient with a "debilitating medical condition."

With this certification, the patient can apply for a card from the Health Department that prohibits prosecution by state authorities for growing or possessing marijuana. (Under a U.S. Supreme Court decision earlier this year, however, the federal government can prosecute.)

The law doesn't say where the marijuana will come from, but it's understood that patients or their caregivers will get it illegally from drug dealers, or grow it from seeds obtained illegally.

"It's a weird concept, isn't it?" said Dr. Margaret A. Sun, president of the Rhode Island Academy of Family Physicians, who testified in favor of the law before the General Assembly. "I'll give them a letter that it's OK for them to use medically, and then they're going to some alleyway and buy it on the street."

Before the law is put to use, the Health Department must write regulations. Sun hopes the regulations will provide some safeguards. Sun also is concerned about not knowing the strength or purity of the marijuana that patients may obtain. But she calls the law "a step in the right direction" for those who don't have an alternative.

Dr. Robert S. Crausman, chief administrative officer of the state Board of Medical Licensure and Discipline, disagrees. "It raises a world of issues for us," he said. "Our statute says it's unprofessional conduct to violate federal law. To create another law that allows doctors to violate federal law . . . puts our board in a very awkward circumstance.

"What other medications do doctors prescribe in this fashion?" said Crausman, who practices medicine part-time, specializing in lung diseases.

If a patient of his requested a medical certification to obtain marijuana, Crausman says he would probably decline because he wouldn't know where they were getting the marijuana plants. "I don't tell my patients on digoxin to take foxglove tea. . . . Aspirin comes from bark. When was the last time you took bark for a headache?"

In a 1999 review of medical marijuana, the Institute of Medicine of the National Academy of Sciences concluded that the active ingredients in marijuana had "potential therapeutic value" for pain relief, control of nausea and vomiting, and appetite stimulation. But it called smoking marijuana a crude way to deliver the medication, and one that also delivers harmful substances. Other than the hazards of smoking, the institute concluded, the side effects of marijuana are no worse than those of other medicines.

The new Rhode Island law allows marijuana use for cancer, glaucoma, HIV infection, AIDS, hepatitis C, or any condition causing wasting, chronic pain, severe nausea, seizures or muscle spasms.

Crausman acknowledged that marijuana contains "wonderful active ingredients," but he wishes they were available through pharmacies in a purified, regulated form. Meanwhile, he said, effective drugs are available for every condition and symptom that marijuana is said to treat -- including a pill containing the chief active ingredient in the plant.

But that pill often doesn't work because the drug isn't well-absorbed through the stomach. And many doctors and patients say that the existing medications don't work for everyone.

Sun, the family physician, said that her sister, who suffers from multiple sclerosis, smokes marijuana to relieve the muscle rigidity that sometimes makes her fall. "She'll take a puff or two of pot, wait 15 minutes, and get her muscles able to move more easily," Sun said.

"She's on a lot of medications, including muscle relaxers," Sun said. "They're very sedating. They work well, and eventually you become tolerant so you don't fall asleep. Then they don't work as well. . . . She finds that this is something that works well, works quickly and doesn't sedate her."

Among the patients in her East Providence practice, Sun said she doesn't have anyone she believes would benefit from smoking marijuana. "I'm sure there'll be people asking me for it," she added with a laugh. But doctors already face drug-seeking patients who want prescriptions for legal narcotics, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0008096

Dr. Thomas A. Bledsoe, an internist who is interim director of Brown Medical School's Center for Biomedical Ethics, called the new law "an unsatisfactory solution." But he said he might make use of it for certain patients, after explaining the risks and unknowns. "Patients who are competent have decision-making capacity," Bledsoe said. "I see my job as giving them advice and giving them information."

In terminal cancer patients, Bledsoe said, "The symptoms that [marijuana] can help with can be very nasty, very interfering with normal life. We're talking about the rest of their life, and it's short. Quality of life is very important."

Diane Lipscombe, a professor of neuroscience at Brown Medical School who studies the biology behind chronic pain, said that the classic drugs for pain relief simply don't work for millions of people.

Marijuana contains substances called cannabinoids that are also produced naturally in the body, just as the body produces natural opiates, she explained. The two substances work together in the brain to numb pain. Cannabinoids may enhance the effect of opiates, and they are of particular interest because they also affect peripheral nerves, not just the brain, she said.

"There are millions of people who have no effective treatment for pain," said Lipscombe. "All I can say is, anything that can help people who are in constant pain is a good thing."

Legislators Override Carcieri's Medical Marijuana Veto (PRBN)

Providence Business News, January 4, 2006

The state House of Representatives on Tuesday voted 59 to 13 to override a veto by Gov. Donald L. Carcieri of legislation passed last year to legalize medical marijuana, making Rhode Island the 11th state to allow people with certain illnesses to use the substance.

Federal law forbids marijuana use, but Alaska, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Maine, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Vermont and Washington allow it to be grown and used for medicinal purposes. In June, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that patients who used the drug in those states could still be prosecuted under federal law.

The new Rhode Island law allows people with severe illnesses such as cancer, AIDS, multiple sclerosis and hepatitis C, on a doctor's recommendation, to get registered with the state and get permission to grow up to 12 marijuana plants or buy up to 2.5 ounces of the drug.

The law is effective immediately, but the state Department of Health, which will register users and give them identification cards, still has 90 days to develop procedures to do so.

The medical marijuana bill was one of the highest-profile measures in last year's legislative session, but Carcieri vetoed the measure. The state Senate voted the override his veto the following day, but the House recessed without taking action, leaving the bill's fate up in the air. Legislators voted on Tuesday before convening the 2006 House session – the last possible time they could do it.

After the vote, Carcieri issued a statement saying the law "will encourage criminal activity," because it does not provide any means for the legal purchase of medical marijuana, forcing them to buy the drug in the illegal street market.

The governor also objected to the lack of "safeguards to protect the community," such as restrictions on where marijuana can be cultivated and stored, and he called the definition of eligible medical conditions as "so broad that it would allow nearly any Rhode Islander to be a user." Finally, Carcieri noted, "this bill appears to violate federal law."

The governor noted that along with himself, the state police, the state Department of Health, and the chief judge of the Rhode Island Family Court had opposed the law.

The full text of the law is posted here.

Flying Under The Radar (ABAJRNL)

By Stephanie Francis Ward

American Bar Association Journal, January 4, 2006

Coming off of a slow holiday diet of year-in-review articles calling attention to the biggest news of 2005, we call on you to take a look forward.

Place your hand on our crystal ball to see how our sources predict what legal news might be making headlines in the months to come.

To make our list, we first determined the most underrated, underreported and unappreciated issues affecting lawyers. And then we thought about how these topics are likely to play out in the future.

While the chosen list is far from comprehensive, it identifies developments that may indeed prove worthy of extra attention.

METH: PUBLIC DRUG ENEMY NO. 1

If you live in a small town and run into problems with the law, methamphetamine may be the first cause that authorities suspect. Some rural justice system officials estimate that the drug is a factor in up to 80 percent of their caseloads.

DOJ_NMG_0008097

"It fuels domestic violence, child abuse, thefts, burglaries and crimes of violence because the people who use it get so paranoid," says John Sarcone, the county attorney in Polk County, Iowa. "Most of these people have children, and there are a number of kids who get removed" from home.

Problems caused by meth have surpassed those caused by other popular drugs, such as crack cocaine, says Linda McKinney, the public defender for south central Missouri's 44th district. "I think meth in all of its forms has been much more destructive physically because it's a harder drug to kick," she says. In her experiences, first as a prosecutor and then as a public defender, she knows of only 10 instances where the defendants were able to break their addiction.

Prosecutors elsewhere make similar observations. And some say that while adult use is most common among the working class, juvenile use involves children from across the economic spectrum. Boys often try the drug due to peer pressure, while girls see it as a way to lose weight. Presiding Judge John G. Moody of Missouri's 44th Judicial Circuit reports seeing more juvenile defendants, some as young as 10, testing positive for the drug.

Studies back up personal experiences. In a survey of 500 law enforcement agencies, 58 percent of the respondents cited methamphetamine use as their county's biggest drug problem. In addition, 87 percent reported an increase in meth-related arrests in the past three years. The survey, published in 2005, was conducted by the National Association of Counties.

According to a 2004 study by the Office of National Drug Control Policy, 11.7 million Americans reported that they had used methamphetamine at least once. In another study by the agency, which focused on juveniles, 6.2 percent of high school seniors surveyed reported that they had tried the drug.

It's little wonder that meth has the attention of the nation's top law enforcement official. Last summer, in a speech to the National District Attorneys Association, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the illegal manufacture and use of the stimulant is the country's biggest drug problem.

While the drug is moving into urban areas, it's more prevalent in smaller, more rural communities, largely because it's cheap and easy to manufacture. A meth lab inventory might include pseudoephedrine, which is found in over-the-counter decongestants, and chemicals such as hydrogen peroxide, lye and red phosphorus.

Some of the ingredients are combined and cooked, creating the danger of explosion. The cooking process generates liquid and solid wastes that can contaminate buildings, soil and groundwater. "Here in Iowa, we call them Beavis and Butt-Head labs," Sarcone says.

Increased caseloads are straining resources for courts, prosecutors and public defenders. McKinney says the caseload in her district has gone from 50,000 a year to 100,000 a year. Of those cases, she says, about 80 percent involve methamphetamine use.

McKinney's office represents about 90 percent of the county's criminal defendants. She fears that some defendants eventually will have to be turned away because of the increasing caseload.

In March, Iowa passed a law that restricts the sale of nonprescription medications containing pseudoephedrine. One of the mandates is that retailers must keep such medications behind the counter or in a locked case. Sarcone says he's already seeing fewer shoplifting arrests, and he thinks the law also will lead to a reduction in manufacturing cases. It's one of several states to pass such a law.

"Pseudoephedrine laws, where the stuff is put behind the counter, are very effective," Sarcone says. He adds that a federal law, requiring all states to monitor sales of the drug, would be the most effective. "Without the ingredients you can't make it," he says. "It's like having the yeast to make the bread rise."

Drug courts also seem to help, mainly by reducing the number of repeat offenders. These courts focus on intensive programs to help defendants quit meth rather than do jail time.

In Twin Falls, Idaho, the county has operated such a program for three years. Prosecutor Grant P. Loebs says that about 50 percent to 60 percent of those who complete the program are staying clean. Still, he sees usage of the drug in about 90 percent of the county's presentencing reports.

Defendants who participate in drug courts have to take periodic drug tests and appear frequently before the judge. In Moody's court, participants are assigned a parole officer and a case manager, as well as a tracker, who handles drug testing.

"We try to get to know them, and they get to know that we are trying to help them," Moody says. "I try to praise them when they do well and act disappointed when they don't. It makes a difference."

THE FACT

Meth prices vary throughout the United States. At the distribution level, prices range from $3,500 per pound in parts of California and Texas to $21,000 per pound in the Southeast and Northeast regions of the country. Retail prices range from $400 to $3,000 per ounce.

Source:"Drug Trafficking in the United States," DEA

—Stephanie Francis Ward

DOJ_NMG_0008098

Afro-Colombians Driven Off Land In Cocaine War (LAT)

By Chris Kraul, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

PEREIRA, Colombia — Armando Garces was reluctant to leave his mountain village even after right-wing militia members had gone door to door telling residents they had 48 hours to evacuate, or else. He didn't like being ordered to abandon the only home he had ever known.

Then a daylong gun battle erupted between the paramilitary fighters and leftist guerrillas over control of nearby coca crops and transit routes. Garces' town, nestled in Colombia's Pacific coast rain forest, was caught in the crossfire between the rebels above the town and militia members below it.

"We hid under our beds all day, and the next morning we were gone," said Garces, recalling the terrifying day in June when his township, Bajo Calima, became a battleground in the nation's long-running drug wars. "Everyone agreed it was time to look for some other future."

So the 25-year-old woodcutter, his wife, two children and about 500 other residents joined the swelling ranks of Colombia's internally displaced. More than 3 million people have been driven from their homes by the civil conflict between armed groups vying for political dominance and the control of crops, especially those linked to the nation's drug trade.

Only Sudan has more internally displaced citizens than Colombia, according to the Norwegian Refugee Council, a human rights group that has tracked the displaced around the globe for the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Although Colombia has had a large displaced population for two decades, its size has increased quickly in recent months, experts say, and a disproportionate number of them are, like Garces, Afro-Colombians. They are targeted because they lack political clout and sophistication at a time when their rural homes have become economically attractive.

Ricardo Esquivia, general coordinator of Arvidas, an advocacy group for the displaced in Sucre state, said most AfroColombians who own such land either lack full knowledge of their rights or the political power to enforce them. One factor working against Afro-Colombians is the 80% illiteracy rate in the areas where many live, said Esquivia, himself an Afro-Colombian.

"They are historically vulnerable and relegated [to a lower status] because they have never fully exercised their economic, social and cultural rights," said Jorge Rojas, a leading advocate for human rights and the displaced in Bogota, the capital.

Those rights include a constitutional provision that guarantees land title to rural Afro-Colombian communities that have organized loosely as a group and occupied their property for 10 years or more, said Luis Murillo, a former governor of Colombia's Choco state. Murillo, also an Afro-Colombian, estimates that 1 million Afro-Colombians, or one-third of those living in rural areas, have been forced off of their land.

The growth of the displaced has much to do with the changing logistics of Colombia's multibillion-dollar cocaine trade. The success of U.S.-sponsored spraying programs meant to eradicate coca leaf production in Colombia's Amazon basin has caused a shift in coca farming to more remote areas, including the coastal zone surrounding Bajo Calima, where Afro-Colombians are concentrated.

The port city of Buenaventura near Garces' hometown and the estuaries that drain into it have become the most important cocaine processing and transshipment centers in Colombia, U.S. law enforcement officials have said.

Garces and other residents were lucky to escape with their lives. In past years, both paramilitary and guerrilla groups in towns such as Bajo Calima have massacred thousands of people whom they suspected of helping the other side or just for being in the way.

Since July, Garces has lived in a shantytown called Plumon on the outskirts of Pereira, built into the side of a river canyon. It has no running water or electricity.

Internal refugees such as Garces put enormous pressure on towns where they have moved. "It's impossible to solve the housing problem. We are incapable," said Pereira City Manager German Dario Saldarriaga, whose town in the interior — about 120 miles northeast of Buenaventura and 105 miles west of Bogota — is struggling with 15,000 displaced residents, about half of them Afro-Colombian.

Pereira has built three new hospitals and is erecting nearly 1,000 housing units to accommodate the influx of displaced people, but needs 4,000 more houses to deal with the overflow. Meanwhile, crime has skyrocketed, Saldarriaga said.

"Sometimes we feel overwhelmed, but it's much worse in other cities like Medellin and Cali," he said.

Human rights groups inside and outside Colombia see a longer-term risk in the government's inability to stand up for the land rights of its citizens. Many say the voices of the displaced aren't being heard in Colombia's nascent peace process.

DOJ_NMG_0008099

Although kidnappings and killings have declined, the process that President Alvaro Uribe began in July 2003 to try to demobilize Colombia's armed factions doesn't do enough to ensure that the displaced may someday return to the millions of acres of land they have abandoned, said Lisa Haugaard of the Latin America Working Group, a coalition of religious and humanitarian agencies in Washington.

Haugaard and others fear that a law passed last summer outlining the terms of "reinsertion" of fighters into society will mean that most of the abandoned land, which totals 10 million acres, will simply remain in the hands of demobilized paramilitary fighters.

If that turns out to be the case, shantytowns such as Plumon, where Garces lives, and Bosques de Otun could become breeding grounds for a future generation of Colombian insurgents, she said.

"There is definitely a silence in the peace process on this question of land rights. Yet it will be dealt with in conflict and in a myriad of conflicting ways on the ground," Haugaard said.

Officials at the U.S. Embassy in Bogota fear that the problem of Colombia's displaced is a humanitarian time bomb and said the U.S. Agency for International Development's $30-million annual aid package is being redesigned to focus more on the needs of Afro-Colombians. That redesign is partially the result of pressure from the Congressional Black Caucus in the U.S.

"It's a huge crisis for a country already dealing with a lot of other crises at the same time," said a U.S. Embassy official who asked not to be identified.

Control of the drug trade isn't the only motive causing armed groups to push rural Afro-Colombians off their land. In Sucre state, where Esquivia works, about 60,000 have fled the countryside for the state capital, Sincelejo, to escape the bloody fight for control of avocado and palm plantations or simply for territorial dominance.

Adelina Zuniga left her 15-acre farm in Macayepa for Sincelejo two years ago after massacres of suspected guerrilla sympathizers in her town sent a chilling message. Having fled the countryside, her family initially slept 15 to a room in a Sincelejo shanty. She has now emerged as a leader of the displaced and pastor of a local evangelical church.

"People arrive with no place to stay, no work and bothered by the local police. Almost all the old folks who came with us have died of despondency. They go from being important to feeling useless. They see no solution," Zuniga said.

The influx has led to social problems, including teen prostitution and the growth of street gangs, said Esquivia of the Arvidas advocacy group.

Until security improves back home, Garces plans to stay put in Pereira's Plumon slum, where he has found work paying $2 a day picking coffee and loading sacks of cement onto trucks. Besides, people who have gone back to Bajo Calima have found nothing but a burned-out ghost town.

"I'm not going back to the war," he said.

Seeing Crime Guns Destroyed Gives Solace To Victims' Families (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

SOUTH PORTLAND, Me. - Kelly DeCambra made her way through a seven-inches-an-hour snowstorm to a dingy Maine State Police garage where, among the brake parts, transmissions and a flat-bed tow truck, she hoped to find a fragment of solace.

It would come in the form of a Ruger .44 Magnum Super Blackhawk revolver, caked with blood and the memory of Ms. DeCambra's son, 21-year-old Lionel St. Hilaire, who was shot to death with it last year.

The mother had come to watch the gun that was used to kill her son be sawed into pieces in an acrid plume of white-hot sparks.

Ms. DeCambra's act of witness was made possible by a law Maine enacted in 2001 that requires handguns used in homicides to be destroyed when they are no longer needed for evidence. Before that, guns were often sold or auctioned by police departments to raise money for other equipment.

Gun control advocates, gun rights supporters, and law enforcement officials say they believe that Maine is the only state where the police allow victims' relatives to watch a gun's destruction, and the acts of witness are arranged informally by the police, not spelled out in the law.

Supporters of the law, including the Maine Chiefs of Police Association, acknowledge that in a state like Maine, which in the last decade averaged about 20 homicides a year, destroying such weapons takes only a few guns out of circulation. But the requirement that crime guns be destroyed reflects a trend among police departments nationwide.

A few states, including New York and Wisconsin, require at least some guns to be destroyed, and others, like Washington, have rescinded bans on destroying guns used in crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0008100

Several municipalities have passed ordinances to prevent crime guns from being sold, and the International Association of Chiefs of Police passed a resolution six years ago encouraging police departments to destroy guns used in crimes .

"It's just a culmination of factors," said Gene Voegtlin, the association's legislative counsel, based in Alexandria, Va. "Did police agencies really want to be in a situation where they were offering guns back to the public? A lot of the weapons that are confiscated aren't necessarily the highest quality, so there are some safety issues involved, liability issues involved." The association's resolution urges police departments not to sell their old police guns or trade them in to a manufacturer for new ones, a practice that began to be common in the 1990's.

Efforts to prevent the resale of guns have been spurred partly by highly publicized crimes like those committed by Buford O. Furrow Jr., a white supremacist who in 1999 used a gun that had once belonged to the police department in Cosmopolis, Wash., to wound five people at a Jewish community center in Los Angeles and kill a Filipino-American postal worker.

Although some police departments destroy guns, often by melting them down, others, usually smaller departments, still sell them.

"You got to use every penny you can get," said Roberto Fulgueira, the police chief in Sweetwater, Fla., who last year traded in his officers' old Glocks and some crime guns, saying he needed about $15,000 for new Glocks for his 65 officers.

With the money, he said, "I bought all my men guns, I bought bulletproof vests, and I still have a credit."

Maine's law came about because of Debbie O'Brien, a Kennebunk woman whose 20-year-old son, Devin, was shot to death in 1996. When she learned that the state police would probably sell the gun used to kill her son, Ms. O'Brien said her reaction was, "Oh, my God, the police are here to help you and the next thing you know they're turning around and selling a gun, making money off my dead son."

Ms. O'Brien lobbied for the proposed law, saying that she told the state police, "Look, if you need money, let's do bake sales."

"You're in hell," she said. "You're just struggling to have a life, and then I realized that would include the gun."

William Harwood, a gun control advocate in Maine, and Robert M. Schwartz, executive director of the Maine Chiefs of Police Association, said the original proposal was for all crime guns to be destroyed. But because of the state's strong hunting lobby, they said, the final law included only handguns used in homicides.

"To be candid," Mr. Harwood said, "the legislation had as much symbolic importance as it does deterrence."

But the symbolism is powerful, said Ms. O'Brien, who watched the .22-caliber handgun used to kill her son be cut up six years after his death.

"It was just a very important day for my husband and I," she said. "This was a weapon that changed our lives."

For Ms. DeCambra, watching the destruction of the gun used to kill her son - even though it was done without ceremony in a stark garage - seemed the closest thing she could find to justice, and a way to ease her feelings of helplessness and guilt that she had not been there to help her son when he was gunned down by a woman's former boyfriend.

Ms. DeCambra said she never saw her son's body because it was already being autopsied by the time the police notified her.

She said she had been unable to see punishment imposed on her son's killer, Zachary Fenderson, who had found his ex-girlfriend with Mr. St. Hilaire one night, because Mr. Fenderson immediately shot and killed himself.

Ms. DeCambra said she was even thwarted when she tried to put up a cross in a wooded area across from the house where her son was killed. She said someone removed each cross she tried to erect - a wooden one, a steel one, even one anchored in cement. "I haven't had any control over anything," said Ms. DeCambra, 38, a bartender at Mulligan's in Biddeford, Me. "When I brought children into this world, it's my job to protect them, and I couldn't do that. I feel like I failed him."

Ms. DeCambra, who had her first child when she was 14 and who gave birth to Mr. St. Hilaire when she was 16, has had a rocky life, plagued with early drug use and health problems that required a pacemaker and several operations. Her son, she said, was molested as a child, acted out in school and was sent to residential treatment centers. At 12, she said, he was molested by a center staff member, who was convicted. At 18, he was jailed for two years for having sex with a 13-year-old girl.

"I'm the first one to say my son wasn't perfect," she said. "But he's not a monster. He was my son, and I loved him very much."

Seeking to grasp the enormity of her son's death, Ms. DeCambra asked for the crime scene photos of his body, which she keeps along with an evidence bag containing his crumpled clothes.

Seeing the gun destroyed seemed a tangible way to address her grief, and she brought along her 24-year-old daughter, her 18-year-old son and his pregnant fiancée, her 2-year-old granddaughter and two friends. Without fanfare, a state police detective, Jeff Linscott, brought out the long-barreled Ruger revolver. He said many victims' relatives do not attend gun destructions, recoiling at the thought of seeing the weapon.

DOJ_NMG_0008101

Ms. DeCambra hid her face and wept, her hands shaking, as a mechanic used a red chop saw to slice the gun four times, the pieces to be tossed on a scrap pile of used brake rotors and other metal parts.

"I have the same nightmare over and over," Ms. DeCambra said. "I'm watching him get shot, and I can't stop it. I need to do this."

Editorial: Mark Outcome, Not Start Of Weed And Seed Effort (MODBEE)

Modesto Bee, January 3, 2006

For many people, the new year started with music, dancing and hearty partying. There was no such hoopla for the Jan.1 launch of the Weed and Seed program in west Modesto.

That's appropriate. Weed and Seed is not a flash-in-the-pan kind of thing. It's a methodical, yearslong commitment to getting rid of gangs, drugs and other criminal elements, and then cultivating pride and revitalization in a neighborhood that has suffered from ugly stepsister treatment.

The program has been in the planning and wish stages since 2002. The city's first application for the U.S. Justice Department's Weed and Seed designation — and up to $1 million that comes with it — was rejected. Last summer, with the second application, the outcome was positive.

The Justice Department is promising tougher federal prosecution of people arrested for certain crimes. It also is insisting on proof of success. The California State University, Stanislaus, Center for Public Policy Studies is to assist with that measurement.

In fact, many organizations are tapped for Weed and Seed assistance. Some of the strategies are fairly obvious, such as stricter code enforcement to assure that trashy lots are cleaned up. But there are other, less predictable elements. For instance, volunteers are to provide income tax assistance to help residents recover some of the $2.5 million in earned income tax credits that have gone unclaimed in that ZIP code, 95351. The reclaimed money goes directly to the residents.

The neighborhood also is benefiting from significant private and public investments that tie nicely into the project. They include:

The city's $2 million makeover of the Maddux Youth Center in César Chávez Park. It was started last spring and is due for completion this year.

Plans for a $5 million Neighborhood Center at Marshall Park, off Sutter Avenue and just south of Paradise Road. The city is seeking bids for the project, which is to include a fire station and a police substation.

Installation of long-awaited sewer lines in the Robertson Road tract, a $2 million county project

Being part of the new Stanislaus County Enterprise Zone. Companies that locate or expand in the zone are eligible for tax breaks and other incentives.

Rising property values. Bob Schmal, a neighborhood resident active in the project, said there are almost no abandoned homes in the area anymore because there's such a demand for housing. Further, 60percent to 70 percent of the houses are owner-occupied, up from about 40percent a few years ago, Schmal said. As a result, there's a new attitude about the importance of upkeep.

For all the formal programs, the success of Weed and Seed will depend on people — especially the residents. The Stanislaus County Sheriff's Department is assigning deputy Noel Vento to the area; he's been effective in working with residents in Empire and south Modesto.

Sheriff's Lt. Jim Gordon is well aware that west Modesto residents have heard promises before. "We've told the neighborhood that we intend to make things better. We have to come through."

This effort is to affect more than the 15,000 residents of the designated area. Lessons learned here can be applied to other struggling neighborhoods.

The official launch of the Weed and Seed project isn't what's important. More significant is what has been accomplished by this time next year and the year after.

The mission of Weed and Seed is explainedon the Department of Justice Web site, www.ojp.usdoj.gov/ccdo/ws/welcome.html.

IMMIGRATION:

The Border's Vital Center (HILL)

The Hill, January 4, 2006

Republicans face one of the trickiest political problems they have faced as a party since Clinton pre-empted their program through triangulation and left them temporarily devoid of issues.

As the number of illegal immigrants mounts in the United States, the demands of the party's nativist constituency for tighter border controls and immigration enforcement threatens to put it at odds with America's rapidly growing Hispanic population, dooming the GOP to possible minority status not just in California and New York but in Texas and Florida as well.

The push-pull between Hispanic demands for respect and nativist concerns about job loss, crime, education costs and urban crowding, all exacerbated by illegal immigration, poses a huge problem for party leaders.

The obvious answer to demands for limits on immigration is the border fence passed by the House and pending in the Senate. Slated to extend over 700 miles of the U.S.-Mexico border at a cost upwards of $2 billion, the barrier, coupled with increased enforcement manpower and effective employer sanctions, will likely give the United States a means to control population inflows. But what of the economic, moral, foreign-policy and political issues a fence will raise?

Economically, Mexican illegal immigrants are not in search of welfare but come looking for work. That they find it is obvious. Otherwise how could they send $11 billion a year home to their families and why would they come in increasing numbers?

Clearly the American economy needs their services. On a micro-economic level, they do jobs Americans don't want at wages below what we would consider acceptable — and perhaps below those that are legal as well. On a macro level, their presence holds down labor costs and permits the Federal Reserve to take more chances with low interest rates than it could in an inflationary-wage market.

The obvious answer to these concerns is a grand bargain that couples the strictest border defense with a generous guest-worker program, granting legal status to Mexican immigrants and regulating their numbers, working conditions, and wages — and assuring that they contribute to Social Security and other taxes.

The foreign-policy implications of a fence are harder to handle. Already Latin resentment against the United States is fueling the rise of an oil- and cocaine-based leftist oligarchy throughout our hemisphere. Castro now has friends in power in Venezuela and Bolivia and moderate allies in Brazil, Uruguay and Argentina. In Peru, a leftist Chavez look-alike, Ollanta Humala, is leading in the presidential race. In Nicaragua, Daniel Ortega may be heading back to power by a gradual military coup. And in Mexico itself, a Chavez protégé, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, is leading in the polls for the July 2006 presidential race. Can you imagine having a border with a Chavez or a Castro, whose ability to disregard American concerns would be underscored by massive oil reserves?

But it is in the realm of domestic politics that the GOP would pay the highest price for a purely nativist policy. Texas has now become a majority-minority state, joining California. Can its wholesale flip to the Democratic Party be far behind? Not if the Republicans are seen as an anti-Hispanic party! Is the GOP really willing to make political war against the Latinos by rubbing their noses in a border fence when they now account for 14 percent of the population and will probably increase their share to 18 percent over the next 10 years?

The permanent political price the Republican Party would pay for this shortsightedness is reminiscent of the way it antagonized the African-American vote in the '60s. Remember that Dwight Eisenhower carried blacks in 1952 and 1956. John F. Kennedy only narrowly prevailed in the black community. It was not until Barry Goldwater and Richard Nixon, pursuing the Southern strategy at all costs, drove blacks into the arms of the Democrats that their votes were irretrievably lost. Is the GOP, driven by the anger of its base, going to make Hispanics permanent Democrats?

By moving away from English-only policies and reaching out to Hispanics, Bush has closed the gap among Latino voters. Gore carried them by 30 points, but Kerry only won among them by 10. But the border backlash may be undoing all this good work.

The obvious answer is to couple a fence with a good guest-worker program, with a citizenship track predicated on good behavior. But if the Republican Party allows the House bill to become law — a fence with no guest-worker program — it will be antagonize the vital Latino vote and consign itself to permanent minority status.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race.

TAX:

Federal Taxes Fall As Income Rises (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

Even as Americans' income rises, they are paying a smaller share of it in federal taxes, according to the latest statistical analysis by the Internal Revenue Service.

DOJ_NMG_0008103

At the same time, the growing number of people who are subject to the alternative minimum tax are paying an increasing share of the total amount of federal income taxes, according to the Treasury Department's Statistics of Income Bulletin, which was released late last month. The report analyzed individual 2003 income-tax returns and is the latest data available on individual tax returns.

Falling tax rates under the Economic Growth and Tax Relief Reconciliation Act of 2001 resulted in a 6.1% decrease in total individual income tax in 2003, to $748 billion, from 2002. But the portion of total taxes paid under the AMT rose 38.2%, to $9.47 billion.

The AMT is a controversial parallel tax that, in 2003, kicked in at $40,250 of taxable income for single and head of household filers, and $58,000 for married couples -- for taxpayers with large families or deductions for such expenses as state taxes. Once subject to the AMT, many filers lose important deductions such as state and local taxes and personal exemptions.

The AMT is estimated to have snared four million taxpayers in 2005. If Congress doesn't move to restrain the tax -- a bill that would do that is now pending in Congress -- this number would jump to 21.6 million taxpayers this year, and married couples with gross taxable income above $45,000 would be subject to it. For 2005, married couples began to pay the AMT at $58,000. The government collects an average of $2,770 more in taxes per household from those who have to pay the AMT, according to the U.S. Treasury Department.

The AMT was originally designed to ensure that high-income earners wouldn't be able to use deductions and exemptions to the extent that they would end up paying no taxes at the end of the year. While it still accounts for a small share of total tax receipts, each year more people are being forced to pay it -- and revenue from the AMT is becoming increasingly important to government coffers.

For years, Congress has elected to limit the scope of the tax to keep the tax from eventually hitting middle-income earners. But each year that step is taken, the costs of forgone tax revenue grow because the federal long-term budget already assumes the income from the tax. For 2006 alone, a limit on the AMT could cost the government as much as $12.22 billion in lost revenue.

Despite the AMT, the average tax rate for all 130.4 million returns in 2003 fell for all income groups. The only exception was for people with returns less than $10,000, which stayed the same as the year before.

The adjusted gross income reported on these returns totaled just over $6.2 trillion, a 2.9% increase from the year earlier. Taxable income, or the amount of money subject to taxes after deductions, increased 2.5% to $4.2 trillion in 2003. This was the third successive year that total income tax declined.

In addition, the IRS says, the number of individuals who itemized their deductions decreased for the first time since 1999. The main reason for this drop is because Congress ended what amounted to a marriage penalty for couples taking the standard deduction. In 2003, married taxpayers filing jointly could take a standard deduction of $9,500, equal to the double the $4,750 allotted for singles. In 2002, the standard deduction for married taxpayers totaled just $7,850. * * *

The IRS said last week that you need to get written documentation if you are donating a car worth more than $500.

Looking to crack down on taxpayers who overestimate the value of donated cars -- for which they can then take a deduction on their tax returns -- the IRS says that anyone who donated a vehicle after Jan. 1, 2005, would need the charity to give a written acknowledgment with the value attached. Generally, taxpayers' deductions are limited to the gross proceeds from the sale of the vehicle by the charity.

For charities who accepted donated vehicles in 2005, there is no need to have sold the vehicle in 2005 to receive a deduction. They can sell the vehicle in 2006 and still qualify for deduction under IRS rules.

Taxpayers, however, must deduct in the same year they make a donation. * * *

BRIEF: Nearly a million very small business owners will now be able to file employment taxes to the IRS just once a year instead of quarterly. Beginning now, employers who have employment tax liability of $1,000 or less can file using the new Form 944 instead of the old one, Form 941. The IRS says that some 950,000 employers will be able to qualify.

Two Feuding Gallery Owners Admit The Art Of Tax Evasion (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

A feud between Upper East Side gallery owners whose clients include some of New York's wealthiest collectors has resulted in both admitting to tax violations.

The owners are Helen Fioratti and James Sansum, her former protégé. Mr. Sansum, 39, pleaded guilty yesterday to failing to pay income tax on personal purchases, like clothing and his poodle's veterinary bill, that he made using gallery credit cards while working for Ms. Fioratti. Prosecutors said the money should have been declared as compensation. He was sentenced to pay $58,000 in back taxes and to three years' probation.

DOJ_NMG_0008104

But the sentence fell far short of the 15 years in prison he faced under his original indictment, which accused him of stealing $568,000 in art, antiques, books and money from Ms. Fioratti.

Prosecutors said that Mr. Sansum was granted leniency after he volunteered information that led to the conviction of Ms. Fioratti on charges of evading sales tax on artwork sold at her gallery. Ms. Fioratti, 74, was sentenced last month to pay more than $550,000 in restitution. Mr. Sansum, according to prosecutors, claimed he learned how to cheat on his taxes from her.

Ms. Fioratti runs L'Antiquaire and the Connoisseur, at 36 East 73rd Street. It specializes in European art and counts Fords, Vanderbilts and the convicted Tyco executive L. Dennis Kozlowski among its clients. Ms. Fioratti hired Mr. Sansum in 1989 after he graduated from Harvard, where he was a classmate and friend of her daughter, Arianna.

In 2002, after resigning from Ms. Fioratti's gallery, Mr. Sansum opened James Sansum Fine and Decorative Art, just two blocks away at 1020 Lexington Avenue. Ms. Fioratti accused him of stealing art, including paintings by her daughter, to stock his new gallery. Mr. Sansum said the art had been given to him. He said he had been authorized to use gallery credit cards to supplement his $18,200 salary.

His supporters have said that Ms. Fioratti was retaliating for his defection, and that she was upset by the realization that he was gay. Ms. Fioratti's lawyer, Michael Miller, said yesterday that the suggestion that she was homophobic was nonsense. He said Ms. Fioratti had let Mr. Sansum live rent-free in her townhouse, giving him "a home when his personal world was falling apart," then was betrayed by him.

Mr. Sansum is suing Ms. Fioratti to force her to buy back his 6 percent share in her gallery. The value of that share is in dispute. Prosecutors said that Mr. Sansum had agreed to return four paintings by Ms. Fioratti's daughter; other disputed artworks will remain in the custody of the court until a judge decides who owns them.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Hearing To Focus On Landmark Pa. Abortion Case (LAW/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, The Associated Press

AP, January 4, 2006

Samuel Alito's decision as a U.S. federal appeals judge to uphold a 1980s Pennsylvania abortion restriction -- later overturned by the Supreme Court -- is likely to draw some of the toughest scrutiny at his upcoming confirmation hearing.

Pennsylvania lawmakers were among the first anywhere to approve restrictions on abortion -- including one that required women seeking the procedure to notify their husbands. Alito voted to uphold that requirement, but the Supreme Court disagreed, striking it down in a landmark 1992 decision.

Senators are expected to grill Alito about the case, Planned Parenthood v. Casey, at his Supreme Court confirmation hearing, scheduled to begin Jan. 9. They're also expected to ask him about memos he wrote in the 1980s in which he said the case of Roe v. Wade -- the 1973 decision that legalized abortion nationwide -- should be overturned.

While the Court's decision in Casey upheld a constitutional right to abortion, the justices gave states new powers to make it more difficult for women to end their pregnancies. For that reason, activists on both sides regard Casey as the Court's most important abortion case since Roe.

Since Casey, state legislatures have approved hundreds of new regulations that determine when, where and how women may get abortions.

Waiting periods, parental consent laws, informed consent requirements and other restrictions have become commonplace. According to NARAL Pro-Choice America, an abortion-rights group, states have passed more than 460 abortion measures since 1995, although not all of them survived court challenges.

"The Casey decision greatly weakened the standard of review by which restrictions on the right to choose would be viewed by the court," said Blake Cornish, NARAL legal director.

While disappointed that the Court failed to overturn Roe, anti-abortion activists seized on the Court's reasoning that states may pass restrictions so long as they do not present an "undue burden" to a woman seeking to end her pregnancy.

"The Casey decision obviously did not go as far as we would have wanted, but it did allow us to work on legislation that (resulted) in saving lives," said Mary Spaulding Balch, director of state legislation for National Right to Life, an anti-abortion group.

Casey arose from 1980s-era abortion laws that were among the first of their kind in the nation.

They required women to wait at least 24 hours for an abortion, to certify that they had informed their spouses of the intended procedure, and to receive information from a doctor about fetal development and abortion risks and alternatives. Another provision required teenagers to get permission from a parent or judge before ending their pregnancies.

DOJ_NMG_0008105

A three-judge panel of the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld most of the restrictions, but voted 2-1 to overturn husband notification, ruling that it presented an illegal barrier to women seeking abortions. The lone dissenter was Alito, who pointed out that the provision did not give husbands veto power over their spouses' decisions.

Although the Supreme Court rejected Alito's analysis, abortion-rights activists say the Casey decision gave them little to cheer about.

"Even though Roe stayed intact technically, Casey was the first challenge to Roe that started the erosion of Roe that is still going on now," said Dayle Steinberg, president and chief executive of Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania, the lead plaintiff in the case.

Jennifer Boulanger, who heads an abortion clinic that was a co-plaintiff in Casey, said women especially chafe at the 24-hour waiting period that the Court's ruling ushered in.

"Most women who are making this decision have thought about it for weeks. By the time they call us, they're ready. They don't want to have to wait any longer," said Boulanger, executive director of the Allentown Women's Center.

Anti-abortion activists say such rules have worked to reduce the number of abortions.

After Pennsylvania's first abortion restrictions took effect in the early 1980s, the number of abortions in the state declined sharply -- while rising nationwide. In the 1990s, the nation's abortion rate dropped as states began following Pennsylvania's lead.

"We were light years ahead of everybody else," said former state Rep. Stephen Freind, the architect of virtually all of Pennsylvania's abortion restrictions.

A 2004 study commissioned by the conservative Heritage Foundation found that abortion restrictions -- including parental involvement, informed consent, a ban on the type of late-term abortion known as partial-birth abortion, and a ban on Medicaid funding of abortion -- all helped reduce the number of abortions.

Abortion-rights activists cite other factors for the nationwide drop in abortions, including a decline in the number of unwanted pregnancies.

Alito Seen As Smart, Serious, Cautious (AP)

By NANCY BENAC, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Samuel Alito's ninth-grade Latin teacher still swoons at how beautifully he conjugated verbs. A fellow judge admires him as someone who won't use five words when two will do.

From the classroom to the courtroom to his neighborhood, President Bush's latest nominee for the Supreme Court leaves a distinct impression on people. Talk to those who know him best and a portrait emerges of a smart, serious, cautious young man who grew up to be a smart, serious, cautious judge.

His confirmation hearings begin next Monday.

Alito is hardly a social dynamo. But he is well-liked as a regular guy who doesn't lord it over others just because he's way smarter than truly regular guys.

Interest groups on the left portray him as an extremist eager to impose his conservative views on the nation. But among those who have worked closely with Alito over the years, even liberal Democrats tend to characterize him as fair-minded, measured and pleasant.

Joshua Schwartz, a George Washington University law professor who worked alongside him in the Reagan Justice Department but describes himself as a liberal Democrat, credits Alito with having "small-c conservative values."

"He's an incrementalist. He's cautious. He believes very deeply in hearing all sides of an argument before making a decision."

Alito got one of his first big career breaks in part because his father, too, had a reputation for evenhandedness.

In 1976, the young Alito's resume jumped out at federal appellate Judge Leonard Garth from among hundreds pouring in from would-be law clerks.

The judge had been so impressed by a presentation given years earlier by Alito's father, an Italian immigrant who became a New Jersey legislative aide, that he remembered the name and called the son in for an interview. Alito "served me precisely as I like law clerks to serve me, both as a sounding board and an incisive, analytical individual," says Garth, a moderate conservative appointed by Richard Nixon. "Sam is very reserved," Garth said, noting his thrifty way with words.

Now, Alito has been Garth's colleague on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for 15 years in New Jersey.

"I think he is the brightest person on our court," says Garth, including himself.

Alito has long managed to be the smartypants who doesn't act like a smartypants.

DOJ_NMG_0008106

"I remember right where he sat: first row, second seat," says 91-year-old Grace Bolge, who taught him Latin at Reynolds Junior High in Hamilton Township outside Trenton. Alito easily nailed the nuances of verbs and the subtleties of proper translation, but never held himself out as better than the others, she recalls.

"There's a humbleness about him that I never saw in anybody else," says Bolge.

Decades later, Alito's law clerks voice similar sentiments.

Former clerk Katherine Huang remembers Alito dutifully taking phone messages for the whole office when everyone else took Good Friday off.

When one of Alito's fellow judges on the 3rd Circuit erected statues outside the entrance to her office, Alito's staff installed pink plastic flamingos at his doorway.

"He really enjoyed that," said Huang.

Alito, 55, credits his two college-age children with helping him keep his ego in check - "on a pretty much daily basis."

A neighbor, lawyer Hilary Brunell, says Alito displayed a restrained approach when they teamed up to coach high school students on a mock trial team that included Alito's son. Alito advocated much the same approach as they exchanged ideas about parenting, Brunell said.

"His attitude was that you can offer guidance and then it's up to the child to take it or not," she said.

Make no mistake, though, Alito can show flashes of pique.

His 91-year-old mother, Rose, says Alito was upset that he didn't get nominated for the Supreme Court earlier, when President Bush tapped Harriet Miers, who later withdrew her nomination. In 1988, when the National Law Journal ran a 211-word story suggesting that Alito had not had a good year as New Jersey's U.S. attorney, he penned a biting 522-word response that said the article "required the sacrifice of even minimal journalistic standards."

It was in his college years - first at Princeton, then Yale Law School - that Alito's conservative streak became apparent, though he was hardly outspoken.

Mark Dwyer, Alito's friend at Princeton and roommate at Yale, says it "wasn't in Sam's nature to sit around and chat about who should be elected" or what laws should be enacted. "I would have guessed that he was a natural supporter for Republican politicians and moderate to conservative, but not extreme conservative," says Dwyer.

At Yale, Dwyer remembers Alito as so tidy the roomies were known as the "two Felixes."

At Princeton, Dwyer and Alito chose to take their meals at Stevenson Hall, a university-run alternative to the private eating clubs that are somewhat akin to a fraternity system. Dwyer called it a "muted statement" against the selective nature of the clubs.

Marsha Levy-Warren, who graduated from Princeton a year after Alito in 1973 and was part of the university's first coed class, says he was known to be conservative but not noisy about it. While Princeton was not as restive as some other universities at the time, she says, anti-war and liberal sentiments nonetheless were strong, and students such as Alito who "stood kind of in the opposite camp were known."

As unrest mounted, the university set up a special committee of faculty, students and administrators to study how the school was governed. Stanley Kelley, the professor who chaired the committee, selected Alito as his staff assistant.

Kelley, now retired, said that in a highly charged environment, Alito didn't align himself with extreme views on either side.

"He chose to associate himself with the middle," said Kelley.

Alito himself painted a much sharper and conservative political self-portrait in completing a 1985 application for a job in the Reagan Justice Department. He wrote of being most influenced in the 1960s by the writings of William F. Buckley, the National Review and Barry Goldwater's 1964 campaign. He also cited his membership in the Concerned Alumni of Princeton, a conservative alumni group known for its opposition to opening the school to women and bringing in more minorities.

"That's all certainly news to me," says Dwyer. "I would remember if Sam had ever said anything pro-Goldwater."

Levy-Warren, a New York psychologist and psychoanalyst, said she finds Alito's disclosure of membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton "distressing" and "painful," remembering CAP as a polarizing group that felt the school was moving in the "wrong direction" by welcoming women and minorities.

Alito now says he has no recollection of being a member of the group or participating in its activities.

As documents from Alito's past have trickled out, the judge's strongly conservative paper trail sometimes seems to clash with his more measured public comments.

He has been working to reassure senators that he maintains an open mind, despite pronouncements like those on the job application stating that he was "particularly proud" of his work on cases arguing that the Constitution does not protect the right to an abortion and opposing racial and ethnic quotas.

DOJ_NMG_0008107

"The idea that Alito maintains an open mind on reproductive rights is simply not credible," says Ralph Neas, president of the liberal People for the American Way. Marcia Greenberger, co-president of the National Women's Law Center, sees "a series of mounting inconsistent statements and evasions."

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said the seeming contradictions mean that Alito will have "an especially heavy burden at the hearings in January to explain the growing number of discrepancies between his current statements and his past actions."

But John McGinnis, a Northwestern law professor who worked with Alito in the Reagan Justice Department, says both the sharply worded documents and Alito's restrained public persona represent different facets of the same Alito.

"It's not such a strange dichotomy," he said. "His ideals are quite conservative and his ideas of how to realize them are quite institutionally pragmatic."

McGinnis describes Alito as having a "Burkean" conservative ideal, referring to Edmund Burke, the 18th century English statesman and philosopher who opposed hasty political changes in favor of gradual reforms.

Just such an approach is evident in a 1985 legal memo Alito wrote that counseled other lawyers in the Justice Department to gradually chip away at abortion rights rather than try to immediately overturn the landmark 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling.

Anthony Kronman, Alito's classmate at Yale and later dean of the law school there, points to Alito's statement on the 1985 job application that he had been drawn to Yale by the writings of Alexander Bickel, a constitutional law professor at the university.

"Bickel's leading virtue, the virtue that he celebrated and put on the highest level, was the virtue of prudence," says Kronman. "My hunch, my hope, is that Sam will prove to be a conservative of the Bickelian variety."

Anti-Alito Push Fails To Sway U.S. (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

Despite a major coordinated campaign, liberal interest groups have failed to convince the American public that the Senate should reject Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Every major poll indicates that far more voters think Judge Alito should be confirmed than think he should be rejected. Though that support generally is lower than it was for John G. Roberts Jr. before his confirmation for chief justice in the fall, it is on par with the public support for Supreme Court nominees during the past 20 years.

"Since the nomination of Samuel Alito, left-wing groups have lashed out at him through a number of avenues in an attempt to derail his nomination," conservative activists Sean Rushton and Joseph Cella said in a memo to supporters. "The left's campaign has involved television, radio, print and Internet campaigns, public statements, the issuing of reports, and a van-based road tour. In all these media, the left failed to generate any substantive opposition to Judge Alito."

A poll conducted by The Washington Post just before Christmas, for instance, found 54 percent in favor of Judge Alito's confirmation, compared with 28 percent opposed. A CNN poll last month similarly found 49 percent favoring Judge Alito and 29 percent opposed.

Judge Alito's confirmation hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee begin Monday.

Liberal interest groups started formulating opposition even before President Bush nominated Judge Alito in late October to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Before Mr. Bush finished introducing his nominee in a White House ceremony, People for the American Way issued a statement promising to "wage a massive national effort to defeat the nominee."

Other groups quickly followed suit and urged senators to oppose the nomination. They also aired ads against Judge Alito in states such as Maine and Rhode Island, where Republican senators represent more liberal electorates.

"Rolling Justice," a caravan of Alito opponents organized by the liberal Alliance for Justice, traveled through key states to try to raise opposition to the nomination. The effectiveness of the campaign was not clear.

At a December stop in Craig, Colo., three Rolling Justice members stopped at a Holiday Inn to meet with locals. No one showed up.

In an e-mail to journalists yesterday, People For the American Way President Ralph G. Neas said the campaign against Judge Alito represented the most formidable progressive coalition since the defeat of Robert H. Bork's nomination to the high court in 1987.

He said public opinion will turn against Judge Alito once his record receives full attention.

"While the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings on Alito next week will be as civil as the John Roberts hearings, there is no question that there will be much more drama and tension," Mr. Neas said.

Today, the group plans to release a final version of its report on why Judge Alito should be blocked.

Also today, the National Italian American Foundation will kick off a nationwide campaign of supporters who, like Judge Alito, are of Italian descent.

DOJ_NMG_0008108

Independence A Key Issue In Roberts' First State Of Judiciary Report (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 4, 2006

The year 2005 was a stormy one for the judiciary, not only because of the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist, but also because of clashes with Congress over the Terri Schiavo case, the politicking over judicial nominees, and issues such as Supreme Court citation of foreign laws and precedents.

Yet when Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. issued his first annual report on the state of the judiciary last week, he sidestepped those controversial questions and focused instead on what he saw as more bread-and-butter threats to judicial independence: low judicial salaries and high rental costs for courthouses. In doing so, he followed the precedent of predecessors Warren Burger and Rehnquist, who largely avoided controversial topics other than judicial salaries in their 30 years of annual reports.

Higher pay for judges and rent relief for courthouses, Roberts said, would have a "vanishingly small" impact on the overall federal budget but "would go a long way toward maintaining a strong and independent federal judiciary with the resources to administer justice efficiently and fairly. And that is priceless." Roberts also called for increased security for judges in the wake of violence aimed at federal and state judges last year.

Roberts issued the report three months into his tenure as chief justice, which he described as "a bit presumptuous," but said he did not want to break with the tradition of his predecessors.

Rep. Adam Schiff, D-Calif., co-chair of the Congressional Caucus on the Judicial Branch, supports Roberts' appeals, but expressed the hope that Roberts and the rest of the judiciary will do more to build public support for a more broadly defined brand of judicial independence.

"He could set a completely new tone and make an outreach to Congress and to the public to help the people understand that the judge's role is not to be popular," said Schiff. "He did not focus on that aspect of judicial independence." Schiff's caucus comprises two dozen members of Congress interested in improving relations between the legislative and congressional branches. The caucus has not yet met with Roberts, Schiff said.

The salary issue raised by Roberts is a recurring theme for chief justices; in 2002, as Roberts noted, the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist said he was 'beating a dead horse' by raising it. But the situation has only gotten worse, Roberts said, with the real pay of federal judges declining almost 24 percent since 1969. With a raise that began on Jan. 1, the annual salary of the chief justice went to $212,100. Associate justices are paid $203,000, while appeals judges get $175,100, and district court judges receive $165,200.

"There will always be a substantial difference in pay between successful government and private sector lawyers," Roberts acknowledged in his written report. "But if that difference remains too large -- as it is today -- the judiciary will over time cease to be made up of a diverse group of the nation's very best lawyers." Roberts noted that increasing numbers of judges are leaving the bench -- nine in the last year. "Every time a judge leaves the bench for a higher paying job, the independence fostered by life tenure is weakened," Roberts said.

The rent complaint is a newer but growing problem. During the 2005 fiscal year, the judiciary paid $926 million to the General Services Administration in rent, Roberts said, even though the GSA's actual cost of providing the space was $426 million. "The federal judiciary cannot continue to serve as a profit center for GSA," Roberts said. In part because of rising rents, about 1,500 jobs in the judicial branch were eliminated in the last two years.

In testimony before Congress last June, GSA official F. Joseph Moravec defended GSA rental policies as "an honest accounting of the cost of occupancy" for high quality courtroom space. The judiciary is the GSA's largest customer, he said, occupying 2,159 courtrooms and 39 million square feet, a threefold increase in the last 30 years. "It is high quality, functional space with befitting public areas, modern technological functionality and enhanced security features," said Moravec, commissioner of public building services.

Congress To Start Year With Unfinished Business (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

Congress will face key issues remaining from 2005 when they return later this month, including legislation to reduce entitlement spending, the future of the USA Patriot Act and a package of tax-cut extensions.

When the House returns Jan. 31, leaders initially will focus on clearing legislation that would collect about $40 billion in savings from entitlement programs across the government -- a top priority for congressional conservatives and President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0008109

Final passage of the legislation was stymied last month after the Senate approved the final version with a few technical changes, meaning the House must reapprove it.

Ron Bonjean, spokesman for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, said House leaders "intend to move very quickly" on the spending cuts and an extension of the Patriot Act, followed by a final package that will extend tax cuts.

Congress failed to pass a permanent extension of the Patriot Act last year, opting at the last minute for a one-month extension.

A House Democratic aide said Democrats have been alerted to expect votes Feb. 1 on both the spending cuts and the Patriot Act.

The Senate is scheduled to return Jan. 18. Initial focus will be on the Patriot Act, an asbestos litigation-reform bill and the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr., said Bob Stevenson, spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican.

Mr. Stevenson said the preference is to approve the Patriot Act without another temporary extension, but that the Senate Judiciary Committee already will be carrying a heavy load with the Alito nomination.

Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said "bipartisan concerns" have been raised over the Patriot Act, but Mr. Reid hopes to get "a good compromise bill done as quickly as possible."

Congress also failed to produce a final package of tax-cut extensions last year.

The House and Senate each passed legislation extending many of the same expiring tax cuts, but the main component of each bill is different and a final compromise has not been crafted. The Senate bill's centerpiece would prevent millions more Americans from having to pay the alternative minimum tax. The House bill would extend the reduced tax rate for capital gains and dividends income.

Democrats have argued that the proposed spending cuts would hurt the poor and that extending the tax cuts would benefit the rich.

Mr. Manley said the juxtaposition of the spending cuts and tax cuts could make it "a difficult vote for many moderate Republicans."

Immigration also will be on the Senate agenda early this year. The House approved a border security bill in December. Mr. Stevenson said the Senate will debate the issue, but leaders haven't decided which immigration bill to bring to the floor.

Congress May Focus On Retirement Funds (WSJ)

By Joi Preciphs

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress is expected to take steps when it reconvenes this month to shore up private pensions, but almost half the workers in private industry won't benefit since their employers offer no retirement plans.

About 48 million full-time employees -- or 45% of the private-sector work force -- receive no pension benefits and their companies offer no retirement-savings programs. Their ranks are expected to grow as larger employers shed retirement obligations and many small businesses steer clear of them altogether.

Workers without retirement benefits are disproportionately Hispanic, young, single, less-educated and lower-paid than the work force in general, according to an analysis of government data by the Employee Benefit Research Institute, a nonpartisan think tank here. They work largely in the health-care, custodial, retail, manufacturing, construction, mining and agriculture industries, and for small companies across the economy.

Hortencia Lemus has worked for 30 years at an Angelica Textile Services laundry plant in Colton, Calif., with no retirement benefits. Concerned about how she will support herself after retirement, she and many co-workers went on strike Dec. 20 to press their demands. So far, no settlement has been reached.

"It's going to be hard to survive, and I'm getting older and it's going to be harder for me to find a job somewhere else," Ms. Lemus, a 48-year-old who speaks little English, said through a translator. "It is worrisome to think about looking for another job and starting brand new at a new place at our ages."

Small businesses, defined as companies employing fewer than 500 workers, employ almost half the private-sector work force and have the lowest rate of employer-sponsored retirement plans. Many business owners say they can't afford to fund both retirement and health benefits, and that their employees prefer health coverage.

Mike Sincavage owns an excavation company in Blakeslee, Pa., that employs five workers. Health-insurance costs jumped 27% this year, he said, not leaving much money to offer other benefits. Having health coverage is important to his workers, he said, as well as being able to maximize take-home pay.

"They said they would take care of their own retirement," Mr. Sincavage said. "In our type of business, the typical employee needs as much money in their pockets as they can have."

DOJ_NMG_0008110

But with Americans living longer, workers without pension plans or sufficient savings are vulnerable to sharp drops in living standards after retiring. More than half of all workers reported that apart from their homes, they had less than $25,000 in total savings and investments, according to an EBRI report last year. Many workers say they can't save more because of rising living expenses, the report said.

Americans long have relied on three sources of income in retirement: the government Social Security programs, employer-provided pension plans and their own savings. For several years, Congress has been trying various means of encouraging people to save more themselves, including such changes as the 1997 bill that created Roth individual retirement accounts.

As old-style defined-benefit pensions -- the ones that pay a set sum each month -- atrophy, some lawmakers and analysts have been urging Congress to expand government incentives to increase personal savings even though previous attempts have had limited success.

In 1996, Congress created the Savings Incentive Match Plan for Employees, or Simple plan, to encourage companies with fewer than 100 workers to set up retirement-savings plans. Administrative paperwork requirements for companies are reduced if they make matching contributions or offer 2% of each full-time worker's compensation to the plan. But relatively few eligible employers have taken advantage of the program, says Denny Dennis, senior research fellow at the National Federation of Independent Business, a 600,000 member small-business advocacy group.

Provisions in the 2001 Economic Growth and Tax Relief Reconciliation Act, or the Bush tax-cut bill, also offered tax incentives for retirement-plan sponsors and further simplified program rules, but an EBRI survey said the changes have done little to increase plan sponsorship among small employers.

"To some extent it's a 'rob Peter to pay Paul' kind of thing" for many businesses, Mr. Dennis said about weighing one kind of benefit against another that many smaller employers face. But with financial-service companies such as Charles Schwab Corp., Fidelity Investments and others recently announcing plans to eliminate certain account-servicing fees, he said, more companies would likely consider the option.

Kathy Stokes Murray, a spokeswoman for the Brookings Institution's Retirement Security Project initiative, says one option Congress could pursue is expanding the Saver's Tax Credit. Created in 1991, it provides families with annual incomes under $50,000 with an income-tax reduction equal to 50% of funds contributed to an individual retirement account or other qualified savings plan. Its current form, however, doesn't help lower-income families who don't owe taxes.

Although Capitol Hill lawmakers floated measures last year to make the credit permanent or extend its sunset to 2008 or 2009, Peter Orszag, a Brookings Institution economist, called the proposals "partial and incomplete" because none of them broaden eligibility for middle-income households or index the credit's adjusted gross income phase-out limits for inflation.

Maryland Democratic Rep. Ben Cardin, who supported making the Saver's Credit permanent in the pension-overhaul package recently passed by the House, said the idea of making the credit refundable so that more lower-income workers could benefit has encountered resistance from lawmakers who have a "philosophical opposition" to it. He says there is bipartisan interest in the issue, but supporters will have to win over congressional leaders to gain further changes.

Groups like the Retirement Security Project also are pushing to lift rules that make it difficult for lower-income people to set aside savings and continue to qualify for government benefits such as food stamps and Medicaid, the federal-state health-care program for the poor and disabled. The current asset rules, they say, "create disincentives for low-income working families to build savings."

The proposal also would help families with modest retirement savings who run into financial trouble, such as a job loss or major medical expense, and are forced to spend retirement savings because the money prevents them from qualifying for government aid.

"I think policy makers will address these issues in the near to immediate term," Mr. Orszag said. "It's not going to go away as the baby boomers continue to age. It's going to become increasingly more salient as the years go on."

Right Scales Back Election Year Agenda (HILL)

By By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, January 4, 2006

After a year in which many of their highest hopes were dashed, diminished or deferred, fiscal and social conservatives are compiling less ambitious legislative wish lists for 2006.

Republicans of all stripes looked at 2005, with expanded majorities in the House and Senate and President Bush just starting his second term, as a rare opportunity to win enactment of favored legislation.

But the new year is not seen that way at all. “The political reality is, generally speaking, that you have a tough time with big, ambitious ideas in an election year,” said former Rep. Pat Toomey (R-Pa.), the president of the anti-tax Club for Growth.

DOJ_NMG_0008111

No prize was bigger, or ultimately more elusive, last year than Bush's proposal to overhaul Social Security. But other desired, big-ticket legislative items, from a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage to an extension of the 15 percent tax rate on capital gains and dividends, also fell short.

Projected entitlement cuts were trimmed, a tax-cut package was pushed into the new year, and a reformation of the tax code never made it out of the legislative starting gate.

Many interest groups have scaled back their 2006 dockets, although few admit it.

"We decided a couple of religious-discrimination issues would be at the top of our agenda," said Jim Backlin, legislative director for the Christian Coalition. Among them are an effort to force cable companies to carry all local signals, particularly those of religious broadcasters, on their systems and one to support the use of Jesus' name in military chaplains' prayers.

The "must carry" broadcasting issue was the top priority for the group last year, according to its website. But the No. 2 item, a Social Security overhaul, is no longer on the list.

Last year's Christian Coalition agenda had 15 items; this year's version has just 10.

In some cases, new legislative wish lists look a lot like the old ones. Andrea Lafferty, executive director of the Traditional Values Coalition, disputed the notion that expectations for 2006 have been scaled back.

"In no way do I feel that we've lost momentum," said Lafferty, whose group remains focused on a litany of judiciary issues, including the confirmation of Judge Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court and constitutional amendments supporting the Pledge of Allegiance and banning gay marriage.

Lafferty chalks up stagnation on a number of the group's highest priorities last year to "the nature of the beast."

"Congress is not a fast-moving beast," she said.

Leaders at the Christian Coalition and Traditional Values Coalition, like those at other interest groups, lobbying shops and think tanks around town, will listen for their primary priorities when President Bush makes his State of the Union address late this month.

"We make our views known before the State of the Union each year," Backlin said.

"We're definitely hoping that the president will make mention of the success of adult stem-cell research," said Lanier Swann, director of government relations at Concerned Women for America. Many social conservatives are preparing for an early Senate battle over embryonic stem-cell research. Several activists pointed to the end-of-year enactment of legislation supporting cord-blood research as a major victory in 2005.

Fiscal conservatives will be parsing the president's words and the numbers behind them.

Brian Riedl, a federal budget expert at the Heritage Foundation, said he hopes Bush's speech has "a low price tag."

Typically, the State of the Union includes a long list of proposals that add up to a big cost for taxpayers, Riedl said.

"Instead, call for reductions in wasteful and unnecessary spending," Riedl advised. "Lay out a broad vision of why small government is good for taxpayers."

Riedl lauded lawmakers for what he called "cosmetic efforts" to rein in government spending in 2005. But in 2006, he said, "they need to do a better job of walking the walk."

While most of official Washington expects a tougher legislative road in a midterm election year, one tax lobbyist with close ties to the House and White House expressed hope that the approach of the end of Rep. Bill Thomas's (R-Calif.) tenure as Ways and Means chairman would prompt enactment of new tax laws.

"Thomas is trying to cement a legacy," the lobbyist said.

In addition to the Alito confirmation fight and abortion-related issues, social conservatives are gearing up for a Senate battle on immigration policy after House passage of a bill in 2005.

The issue tops the conservative Eagle Forum's Web page.

"Senators who are up for reelection in 2006 had better listen to the House votes," longtime conservative activist Phyllis Schlafly warned in a column.

Whatever their legislative goals, activists may not have much time to make them a reality before the next election.

"There is a shorter window," said Rep. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.). He said a string of legislative victories in 2005 was overshadowed by high expectations on Social Security, the enactment of laws just before long recesses and the devastation wrought by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita in the latter part of the year. A burgeoning lobbying scandal could easily be added to the list.

"Last year was the year for vision," Putnam said. "This next year's going to be a year for nose-to-the-grindstone, competent governance."

A Gentler Capitalism (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

DOJ_NMG_0008112

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

On the field of ideology, 2005 was a lousy year for the American right. Twice -- in the president's proposal to privatize Social Security and in the government's failure to save New Orleans -- it confronted the public with the prospect of a radically reduced government. Twice, the public recoiled at the sight. In retrospect the year's biggest mystery is how George W. Bush thought he could privatize Social Security. Essentially Bush assumed the role of the national CEO who tells his workers he's dumping their defined-benefit pensions for some ill-defined 401(k) investment schemes. And essentially the American people responded with the same anger and anxiety that airline and auto employees have shown when their bosses reneged on their commitments of a secure retirement. The difference, of course, is that the American people have a lot more power as voters than they do as workers.

Bush's plan to scuttle Social Security was in tatters when Hurricane Katrina blew ashore. For Bush this was a double whammy, since FEMA's failure to respond to the storm underscored the image of a government that would not be there when needed. In today's America, where business has largely abandoned the guarantees of security it used to provide its employees, a similar abdication by government was clearly not what the public sought.

For the pervasive insecurity that is inextricably part of today's capitalism has become the dominant fact of modern life. "The fragmenting of big institutions has left many people's lives in a fragmented state: the places they work more resembling train stations than villages," writes sociologist Richard Sennett in "The Culture of the New Capitalism," a newly published collection of lectures he gave at Yale University in 2004. Throughout most of the 20th century, the insecurity endemic to capitalism was mitigated by business institutions organized, as Sennett's great predecessor Max Weber first noted, along military lines. The corporation gave the employee a place and a ladder, and in such a lifelong institution, Sennett notes, "it became possible to define what the stages of a career ought to be like, to correlate longtime service in a firm to specific steps of increased wealth."

Sennett is no apologist for the old corporate order, but it did impart a structure to people's work lives and a place to hone their crafts. The new workplace, by contrast, is a brave new world of short-term employment and relationships, where experience is not necessarily a virtue and institutional memory is sketchy at best. It may be a fine place for young workers, but "as middle age looms and children, mortgages and school fees appear, the need for structure and predictability in work grows greater." The frequent migration of executives from one firm to another, Sennett adds, imposes further costs on employees: "This managerial revolving door has meant that the steady, self-disciplined worker has lost his audience."

In the absence of a more structured work life, what Sennett sees is a more muddled sense of self. He finds that confusion among displaced middle-aged workers, but also among young college graduates who, compared with their counterparts of the 1970s, are less able to articulate their career goals. In an economy that disdains continuity, how exactly do you define "career"?

From his interviews with a wide range of workers, Sennett turns up a widespread resignation to these immense changes in economic life. That doesn't mean, though, that the American people aren't reacting to this profound shift in their lives, and their sense of their lives. The increased prominence of religion in American life over the past several decades, I'd surmise, is in part a reaction to this embattled sense of self. And if most Americans take globalization as a given, many are increasingly enraged at our relatively open borders and the immigrants who cross them. These are two responses to the new insecurity that the right has exploited, though neither does anything to reestablish a more benign economy.

For the left, what 2005 has demonstrated is that while Americans have no great love for government, they do expect it to provide a baseline of security -- the more so since the employer-provided benefits of the past 60 years are going the way of the dodo. That means that government-supported universal health insurance will soon be back on the nation's agenda. But that's the easy part. Rebuilding the kind of security that defined private-sector economic life for most of the past century, and that helped individuals define themselves, is a conundrum that's daunting even to contemplate.

And yet: The new capitalism disdains stability; human beings, on the whole, don't. And immodest as it may be to alter the terms of capitalism, it's a damned sight easier than changing human beings.

Bush Loyalist Takes Economics To The Political Stage (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

In the last two months, Faryar Shirzad has been to Kenya, Uganda, Mongolia, Japan, China, the UK and Russia. He has just returned from the gruelling World Trade Organisation talks in Hong Kong. The only solace is occasional business-class travel.

He has no regrets. As the US deputy national security adviser for international economics, Mr Shirzad says his job is “endlessly fascinating ... It is a real privilege to see a foreign government at the peak of preparedness as they interact with our government, to see the leader of a country sitting down with ours talking through the difficult issues of the day.”

DOJ_NMG_0008113

After three years at the National Security Council, Mr Shirzad was promoted to lead its international economic staff. To ensure better co-ordination between the economic and foreign policy halves of the White House, he reports to the National Economic Council.

Trade, and its impact on political freedom rather than just commercial interests, is a key theme for President George W. Bush. "Condoleezza Rice [US secretary of state] and Stephen Hadley [national security adviser] are both very cognisant of the degree to which economics are now a driving element of our position in the world and the conduct of international relations ... Both are very mindful of the importance of integrating the economic agenda into the broader national security agenda," says Mr Shirzad.

His portfolio includes oversight of international finance, trade, environment, energy, investment, development assistance, humanitarian assistance and disaster response, being the G8 "sherpa" – the president's personal representative to the G8 process – and managing his preparatory work for most of the large economic summits.

Grant Aldonis, former commerce under-secretary for international trade, who calls Mr Shirzad his "best professional friend", sums up his role: "He is the last guy the president talks to about international economic issues before a decision is made ... He is the consummate staffer. He reserved judgment, thought through problems and gave unvarnished advice."

A framed, handwritten note from the president is prominent on Mr Shirzad's office wall. He is proud but modest, saying he is too embarrassed to read the presidential praise aloud.

Mr Shirzad is attentive without being obsequious. He is seen as a good negotiator and is effusively loyal to Mr Bush, whom he lauds some ten times on different issues during the interview. The only long pause comes when asked if Mr Bush's decision to impose steel tariffs dented his image on free trade.

For all his discreet style, he is passionate about trade and in agreement with Mr Bush's view of freedom and the importance of democracy, drawn from his own life experience. He is the son of an Iranian diplomat, was born in London and lived in Pakistan and Rome. At 13, he was living in New York during the Iranian revolution in 1979 and vividly recalls the disruption for his family.

"My father had been consul-general, living in a big house, and we had to very quickly get out and assume a very low-profile existence. I cannot imagine what my parents went through, with four children, to lose their country, their job and most of their life assets. The thing we had going for us was our health, and the fact that we, by the grace of God, were in the United States."

The family moved to Bethesda, Maryland. His mother became a census-taker, checking up on families who hadn't filled out their 1980 census forms. He and his father lugged phone directories door to door. The family also set up a delicatessen and began stocking a few Iranian books.

Eventually the books took over so they sold the deli and started a book business, Iranbooks, which is still in operation today. "I think they at one point had the largest collection of Persian-language books outside Iran."

Continuing the career abruptly ended for his father, Mr Shirzad has forged a career in international affairs. He studied finance and went to Harvard graduate school to study public policy, before going to law school. He became a trade lawyer for seven years then served on the US Senate finance committee on the Republican staff.

"Bill Roth [Republican chair of the committee] was a very important influence. He was very much the embodiment of the greatest generation who went into public service at a young age and often at great personal sacrifice."

On the Hill he worked to get fast-track approval for trade deals for the president, which had been bogged down in a decade of partisan bickering. Mr Bush has since used this authority to pursue trade agreements in the Middle East with Morocco, Jordan, Bahrain, the UAE and Oman.

"We are seeing an agenda take hold in places like the Middle East, one that will have an enduring legacy beyond the time that the president is in office," he says. Officials are conscious of making the best use of that authority before it expires in 2007. "It is why the president has been so bold on the trade and WTO agenda."

Some trade analysts, however, argue that this record has come at a price, squandering political capital on obscure deals and leading to congressional fatigue at a time when Democrats are more resistant to supporting free trade agreements. The administration must also build support for a more ambitious Doha round.

Mr Aldonis says Mr Shirzad's challenge over the next year is to "mobilise political support when other themes are working against it, and find a strategy of appealing to internationalist Democrats. They came out of a nothing in Hong Kong and they have got a year left. How do they get out of the cul-de-sac of negotiations?".

Mr Shirzad, ever cautious, offers few clues. "We always have to worry about protectionism because politically it is an easy course for people to take. Trade legislation is hard work and politically difficult, but it is important."

DOJ_NMG_0008114

Pharmacists Deal With Medicare Confusion Computer Glitch, Missing Cards Among Troubles (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, January 4, 2006

Pharmacists struggled with billing glitches and missing drug cards as they tried to fill prescriptions Tuesday under Medicare's new drug benefit, the most sweeping expansion to the program since its inception in 1965.

On the first full business day the benefit was available, pharmacists said some customers came in without cards or letters showing their eligibility and others were surprised that they had to pay full cost until meeting a deductible.

"We're trying everything we can to help, but people are confused," said Samuel Mogbo, a CVS drug store pharmacist in Chicago. He said some customers hadn't received their cards and others had lost them.

About 21 million senior and disabled Americans have some kind of prescription-drug benefit. The majority either kept coverage from former employers or stayed in a Medicare Advantage plan they had previously joined. About 6.2 million people were automatically enrolled in the new Medicare program because they had been in state programs for low-income people. About 1 million joined on their own.

Those eligible have until May 15 to sign up without penalty. They can choose from an array of plans.

At Linda's Pharmacy in Chicago, most customers had their cards and those who didn't returned home to get them, said pharmacist and owner Linda Dobson. She said the pharmacy experienced "minor" billing problems.

Robert Hayes, president of the Medicare Rights Center in New York City, blamed many of Monday's problems on the malfunction of a major computer database used by pharmacists to check eligibility.

At Scheer Drugs in the Bronx, where more than 90% of Medicare recipients are low-income seniors who were automatically enrolled, "it's chaos," pharmacist Bill Scheer said.

"People are falling through the holes," he said. "They need their medicine."

Larry Kocot, senior adviser to Medicare Administrator Mark McClellan, said sheer volume caused computer slowdowns Monday, but these problems had been resolved by Tuesday.

"This is going very well," said Gary Karr, spokesman for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. He blamed snags on heavy computer traffic, pharmacists forgetting billing details and beneficiaries not having cards. "It's not a magic system," he said.

"It is confusing, but consider the volume of change. … This is a massive undertaking," said Glenna Canitz, executive director of Bay Pharmacy in St. Petersburg, Fla. Her pharmacy, which has filled thousands of prescriptions under the new benefit, experienced some denials, but she considered them "opening-day glitches."

Medicare Expands Tier Pricing System Cancer, Arthritis, MS Drugs Fall In Highest Levels (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, January 4, 2006

Medicare's drug benefit, expanding on a practice now in limited use in the private sector, requires patients to pay larger co-payments for expensive treatments, including some drugs for cancer, arthritis, multiple sclerosis and anemia.

In the private sector, some employers' insurance plans charge more for some so-called "lifestyle" drugs, such as impotence treatment Viagra or some allergy remedies.

But the Medicare program, which took effect Jan. 1, expands those charges into new territory: treatments for serious or life-threatening conditions.

While most working-age adults have insurance with two or three different "tiers" corresponding to how much they pay at the pharmacy for certain drugs — with generics the cheapest and brand-name drugs more — about 40% of the Medicare plans have four tiers, according to the analysis by Avalere Health, a for-profit research firm in Washington that did an analysis of the drugs earmarked for higher payments by patients. Fourteen percent have five tiers.

In comparison, 4% of workers with health insurance through their jobs have a fourth tier, according to a nationwide survey by the non-profit Kaiser Family Foundation.

In that fourth tier — where Medicare patients will most commonly pay 25% to 33% of the cost of the drug rather than a flat dollar amount — are such expensive treatments as Remicade and Enbrel for rheumatoid arthritis, Procrit and Aranesp for anemia and Copaxone and Betaseron for multiple sclerosis.

That differs, says Avalere President Daniel Mendelson and other benefit experts, from the drugs most commonly found in higher "tiers" in employer-offered plans. Often, those tiers are used by employers generally trying to get workers to think twice about taking expensive drugs for non-life-threatening conditions, such as hair loss, allergies or impotence.

DOJ_NMG_0008115

Tier systems caught on in the late 1990s among employer-offered insurance, initially as a way to get patients to choose lower-cost generic drugs over more expensive brand-name products.

The average co-payment now in private insurance is $10 for generics, $22 for brand-name drugs on an insurer's formulary and $35 for those not on the formulary, according to the Kaiser survey. The average co-payment for a fourth-tier drug is $74.

In Medicare, the tier prices vary, but generics are generally $10 or less, according to an analysis of 10 national plans by Avalere, while brand-name drugs range from $17 to $45 per prescription. Tier-four drugs are generally charged at 25% to 33% of the cost of the drug, although one national plan charges $50 to $69 per prescription.

Under one plan that charges 25% for drugs in the fourth tier, Medicare patients would pay $231 a month for anemia drug Aranesp, which is often used for cancer patients undergoing chemotherapy.

A patient taking Remicade for rheumatoid arthritis would pay $143 a month. The most expensive co-payment is in one national plan with a tier charging 75% of the cost of the drugs it places in that category, which include the breast cancer drug Herceptin (which would cost patients $1,991 a month), colon cancer drug Avastin ($1,839) and cancer drug Gemzar ($92).

Medicare officials say that most patients who did not have other drug coverage before will save substantially under the new program, even if their drugs are in the fourth tier. Instead of paying the full cost of the drug, the patient will have help from the government, especially after going through the "doughnut hole," which is the coverage gap during which the patient pays the full cost of the drugs until he or she has spent $3,600, after which the government pays 95% of the cost.

"In the case of Aranesp, the catastrophic (coverage) will start by the third month if the beneficiary has no other coverage," Peter Ashkenaz, spokesman for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said in an e-mail. "Overall, the savings will be high."

But some patients may not be able to pay their way through the doughnut hole, says Kevin Brennan, senior vice president of policy for the Arthritis Foundation.

"They may be out of luck," he says.

In addition, most of the pharmaceutical assistance programs that offered free or low-cost drugs to lower-income patients will no longer do so for those with Medicare drug coverage.

Overall, Brennan says, the Medicare drug benefit is a step forward, but his organization says it will monitor it closely and may go to Medicare officials with suggestions for changes. His organization is also watching what private insurers do. Some may decide to create similar tier structures in their offerings to workers.

"We're really concerned about that," says Brennan, who takes an expensive arthritis drug he says has "changed my life as far as my ability to function" and fears such drugs may become too costly, even for those with insurance, if co-payments rise.

"We're looking at a real crisis," he says. "These are wonderful drugs that are tremendously innovative, but they are incredibly expensive. We as a country are going to have to figure out how to pay for them."

The American Cancer Society is also watching closely.

"Co-payments are an issue for us with any treatment for cancer," says Christy Schmidt, senior director of policy. "All insurance companies look at the bottom line and how to control costs. Medicare is often a leader in policy in the nation. We intend to watch this over time."

In 2002, a policy to charge cancer patients up to $550 per chemotherapy drug and up to $250 per radiation treatment was instituted by PacifiCare for its Medicare managed-care patients. After an outcry, the insurer dropped many of the charges.

The Cancer Society says it knows of no current plans that require special cancer co-payments.

But as ever-more-expensive drugs hit the market, more employers may begin to set up four-tier drug-benefit programs, says Dave Guilmette, managing director at benefits consulting firm Towers Perrin.

"It's a creative way to manage costs," says Guilmette. The Medicare drug program "will stimulate a lot more of this kind of design."

But he doesn't think many employers will place expensive treatments for life-threatening conditions in fourth tiers. Rather, he says, employers are more likely to require the use of disease-management programs or have insurers insist that patients try lower-cost drugs before moving on to higher-cost ones.

"These are people who are typically very sick and need the drugs," says Guilmette. "If you're asking them to pay 50% of something costing $20,000 a year, that isn't a competitive practice."

Eric Michael, pharmacy consultant with Mercer Health and Benefits, says that the fourth tier can make sense if employers and insurers are trying to get patients to realize the cost of expensive treatments, so long as there is an out-of-pocket maximum and the benefit is clearly explained.

He says some employers need to create such a tier to protect themselves from expensive new treatments that may treat both serious and non-serious conditions. Patients would pay more, for example, if they sought the expensive rheumatoid arthritis treatments Humira or Enbrel for a less serious use, such as for the cosmetic treatment of the rash caused by psoriasis.

"We need to make sure the drugs used are medically appropriate," he says. "A lot of plans are not putting those checks in place and are amazed when they spend $12,000 to $13,000 a year to cover a cosmetic thing."

Congress Drops 'Buy America' For Tankers (AP)

By Matthew Daly

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — A defense bill approved by Congress would allow open competition for a multibillion-dollar contract to supply refueling tankers for the Air Force.

President Bush is expected to sign the measure, squelching an earlier House-approved bill that would have helped The Boeing Co. by keeping the Pentagon from buying military equipment from the parent company of European jet maker Airbus SAS.

Boeing lost the lucrative tanker contract in 2004 amid an ethics scandal.

"Buy America" language had been inserted by Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. However, Hunter agreed to remove the provision last month at the request of Senate leaders and administration officials, who said it could spark retaliatory measures by other countries and limit Pentagon flexibility. Congress voted final passage Dec. 21.

Harald Stavenas, a spokesman for Hunter, said this week the lawmaker would fight for it in the future.

Chicago-based Boeing lost the tanker deal in 2004, after revelations that it had hired a top Air Force acquisitions official who later admitted giving the company preferential treatment.

The deal would have allowed the Air Force to buy or lease 100 Boeing 767 planes for use as tankers, but it was killed by Congress in the 2005 defense authorization bill. The Air Force has said it is likely to reopen the deal to competition, although no formal timeline has been set.

George Behan, chief of staff to Rep. Norm Dicks, D-Wash., said withdrawal of the buy-America clause was expected.

"There's no question there will be an open competition. The real question is whether the Pentagon will ever award the contract to a company that has a major European component, given the (U.S.) complaints about illegal subsidies the parent company is receiving," Behan said.

Dicks' district outside Seattle includes thousands of Boeing workers.

The House bill would have barred the Pentagon from purchasing goods and services from foreign companies that receive government subsidies. While no companies were named, lawmakers said the amendment was aimed at disqualifying Airbus' parent company from bidding on the tanker contract.

Airbus, which is 80 percent owned by the European Aeronautic Defence and Space Co., has long received subsidies from European governments, sparking tension between U.S. and European officials.

EADS, which is based in France and Germany, has said it plans to team with Northrop Grumman Corp. to offer a tanker version of its Airbus A330 passenger jet to produce a new generation of aerial refueling tankers. The contract could be worth at least $20 billion.

Boeing spokesman Doug Kennett said Tuesday that "Boeing welcomes fair competition and the opportunity to tender the best proposal possible."

Randy Belote, a spokesman for Northrop Grumman, said the California-based company believes its partnership with EADS would produce an American-made product. Last year, EADS said it would build a manufacturing plant in Mobile, Ala., if it wins the tanker contract.

Federal Raise Set At 3.44 Percent In D.C. Area; Raleigh-Durham Sees Highest Increase (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

Most federal employees will receive pay raises ranging from 2.83 percent to 5.62 percent this year, according to pay tables published by the Office of Personnel Management.

The lowest raises will go to General Schedule employees who are outside the boundaries of 31 specially designated locality pay areas. The highest raise will go to employees in Raleigh-Durham-Cary, N.C., which has been designated as a locality pay zone for the first time and is catching up with nonfederal salaries in that area.

As previously reported, the 2006 pay table for federal employees in the Washington-Baltimore area shows an increase of 3.44 percent in salaries (putting the average federal salary here at $80,425).

In addition to Raleigh-Durham, four other metro areas will receive higher raises than Washington-Baltimore area employees. They are:

DOJ_NMG_0008117

Hartford, Conn., 3.62 percent; Buffalo, 3.75 percent, also a new locality pay area; New York-Newark, 3.77 percent; and San Francisco-San Jose-Oakland, 3.95 percent.

Locality payments are supposed to close the gap between federal and nonfederal pay in 31 metro areas and a catchall category known as the "rest of the U.S." Locality adjustments reflect wage growth and labor markets and do not take into account cost of living, housing and other consumer prices.

Last year, the president's pay advisers calculated that federal employee pay, on average, lagged behind the private sector by 13.37 percent. Some Bush administration officials scoff at the use of the average, contending that some federal employees are paid in excess of private-sector salaries and some federal employees are not paid enough.

In addition to Raleigh-Durham and Buffalo, Phoenix has been designated as a locality pay area for the first time, and workers there will receive a 2.95 percent raise. In the three areas, officials determined that nonfederal salaries were above those paid for comparable GS positions.

Three areas have been removed as locality pay areas for 2006 and will receive transitional pay raises. They are: Kansas City, 2.25 percent; St. Louis, 2.49 percent; and Orlando, 2.8 percent.

E-mail:barrs@washpost.com

Cronyism And Crises (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

Defying early forecasts of easy confirmation, the Senate recessed for the holidays without approving Ellen Sauerbrey, President Bush's lamentable choice to head an important State Department agency that coordinates emergency relief for refugees of foreign wars, persecution and natural disasters. Her nomination has yet to clear the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, raising at least a glimmer of hope that she may not get the job.

Like all too many Bush appointees, Ms. Sauerbrey has political connections that seem her most obvious credential. A former Maryland state legislator and a twice-defeated gubernatorial candidate, she served as state chairman of President Bush's 2000 campaign. She is a favorite of Mr. Bush's far-right base, having pursued an anti-abortion and anti-family-planning agenda in her current patronage post as the American representative to the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women.

Unlike previous appointees to head the State Department agency, the Bureau of Population, Refugees and Migration, Ms. Sauerbrey has zero experience in emergency management and refugee resettlement. In the wake of the bungled response to Hurricane Katrina by a similarly uncredentialed appointee, Congress has become more sensitive to charges of this kind of cronyism. A few weeks ago, the Foreign Relations Committee bowed to a request from Senator Barbara Boxer and put off its planned vote on Ms. Sauerbrey.

Ms. Boxer is not the only committee member concerned by Ms. Sauerbrey's thin résumé for overseeing a $1 billion bureau with life-and-death responsibilities for helping to set up refugee camps and arranging for adequate food and protection. Senators on both sides of the aisle are troubled, and the nomination's approval by the committee is not the sure thing it once seemed.

The worry now is that Mr. Bush will bypass the Senate and install Ms. Sauerbrey on his own by using a recess appointment, the same tactic he used to make John Bolton the United States ambassador to the United Nations. The president should do just the opposite. The Senate's delay is a chance for Mr. Bush to rethink Ms. Sauerbrey's elevation and find someone with solid credentials for the refugee job.

OTHER NEWS:

Only 1 W. Virginia Coal Miner Now Said Found Alive (REU)

Reuters, January 4, 2006

TALLMANSVILLE, West Virginia (Reuters) - Only one of 13 miners who were in a West Virginia coal mine when it was hit by an explosion was found alive, a company official told family members on Wednesday, after reports hours earlier that 12 had survived led to rejoicing.

Virginia Dean, whose uncle was in the mine, said, "Only one lived. They lied."

12 Found Alive In W.Va. Coal Mine (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008118

SAGO, W.Va., Jan. 3 -- A dozen miners trapped 12,000 feet into a mountainside since early Monday were found alive Tuesday night just hours after rescuers found the body of a 13th man, who died in an explosion in an adjacent coal mine that was sealed off in early December.

The bells at the Sago Baptist Church pealed, and joyous relatives rushed outside to celebrate their miracle: Miners surfacing after being in the cold, damp Sago Mine for 41 hours. Gov. Joe Manchin III said some would need medical attention.

"Everybody ran from the church screaming, 'They're alive! They're coming!' " said Loretta Ables, whose fianc, Fred Ware, was among the missing miners. She had lost hope when she learned about the dangerously high levels of carbon monoxide in the mine, but she was elated as she waited outside the church. "I feel great, very great."

The miners had apparently done what they had been taught to do: barricaded themselves in a pocket with breathable air and awaited rescue.

On Monday morning, a cart that takes miners deep into the mine had dropped the 13th miner off at his work station. It was 11,200 feet down the air intake channel, at the intersection of the sealed-off mine, where authorities think the blast occurred. Only 700 feet farther, the miners stopped the cart and walked off to begin work. They took their lunch buckets and gear. Their cart, undamaged by the blast, was still on the track.

Earlier Tuesday night, Manchin had held out hope for the 12, saying they "did not get the force of this blast."

"Our hopes are still high" for the other miners, the governor said. He said miracles happened in his state.

Bennett K. Hatfield, president of International Coal Group Inc., said: "We are clearly in a situation where we need a miracle, but miracles happen."

Federal regulators have cited the mine, in north-central West Virginia, more than 270 times in the past two years for safety violations, a third of them considered "significant and substantial," according to the Mine Safety and Health Administration. The problems included mine roofs that collapsed without warning, faulty tunnel supports and dangerous buildups of flammable coal dust. Recent violations included inadequate ventilation to dissipate dangerous gases.

Early Tuesday, rescuers drilled a 6 1/4 -inch hole 260 feet into an area near where the miners were thought to be. They measured carbon monoxide of 1,300 parts per million -- more than three times the level a person can safely breathe for 15 minutes.

After pounding on a pipe for 10 minutes, a common method for miners to communicate, rescuers lowered a microphone into the hole and picked up no response. A camera lowered into the hole showed no signs of wide-scale destruction such as a roof collapse from the explosion, making officials optimistic that rescuers would not have to dig through much debris.

Word of the deadly levels of gas in the mine left family members distraught. Some broke down sobbing, and others grew quietly somber.

"It's hard to hear they might not be coming out," said Michelle Mouser, a niece of Terry Helms, a fire boss who inspeced the mine for problems each day before the production crews entered. "It's real down," she said of the mood of relatives gathered at the church as she sat under a drizzly, overcast sky earlier Tuesday.

"My heart goes out to each and every one of them," said Vinnie Ables, 30, Tuesday night. "At first I had no hope, and then I started to pray."

Except for relatives and friends of Terry Helms, whose relatives had told reporters they suspected he was the 13th man since the body was found at his work station, there was jubilation. People at the church sang a familiar hymn, "How Great Thou Art," as other relatives sped to the scene to greet the miners.

"I got scared a lot of times, but I couldn't give up," Charlotte Weaver, wife of miner Jack Weaver, told the Associated Press. "We have an 11-year-old son, and I couldn't go home and tell him Daddy wasn't coming home." Through the day, mine officials moved to speed the advance of the eight-man rescue teams, especially after a 1,300-pound robot equipped with a special camera became bogged down in mud while exploring the mine. The teams pressed through dank five-foot-high tunnels, hastily repairing ventilation systems as they went, but forgoing other repairs.

Hatfield said damage in the mine "resembled" that of a methane explosion. Methane is naturally produced in coal mines and is highly combustible. The "very substantial" explosion occurred in the sealed-off mine near where Helms's body was found.

Although their entrapment was not similar, the joy at the rescue of the 12 mirrored the relief 3 1/2 years ago when nine miners were brought to the surface one by one after being trapped for more than four days at the Quecreek mine near Somerset, Pa. Mining experts credited improved training in helping the miners to save themselves in both the Quecreek and Sago incidents.

Over railroad tracks and down a winding road along the Buckhannon River near the mine, miners' family members waited with increasing anxiety, remembering the last time they saw their loved ones.

Sam Luntz, 61, recalled urging his brother-in-law, miner Martin Bennett, 50, to retire. "He was at my house on Christmas Eve, and we talked about retiring. He laughed and said he'll probably work at the mine for the rest of his life," Luntz said.

DOJ_NMG_0008119

Despite arthritis and the telltale cough of black lung disease, Bennett would not apply for disability benefits, Luntz said. His brother-in-law "loved his job."

Bennett's son is also a miner, but Luntz said it is unlikely he will return to the dangerous work, "especially if his dad don't come out alive."

In the hilly backwoods of West Virginia, mining runs in families for generations, and when disaster strikes -- this one is the biggest in recent local memory -- the community pulls together.

"Upshur County is like family -- when one person is hurt, we're pretty much all hurt," Sandy Fultz, an emergency medical technician and volunteer firefighter, said as she directed traffic near the mine.

Carmalita Rice, 19, a neighbor of missing miner Fred Ware, 59, said she knew the tall, thin widower was at risk the moment she heard the blast, which shook her bed. "We knew his schedule, so we knew he was in it," she said.

Helms's son Nick Helms, 25, said he was afraid to attend a briefing by mine officials. "Sometimes I can't get up the nerve to walk in. I'm scared of the news."

Terry Helms's fiance, Virginia Moore, said she packed his lunch bucket with sandwiches before he headed to work before dawn.

" 'Okay, babe. I'll see you tonight,' " she said he told her as he stepped into his red pickup truck.

"Be careful," she urged him.

From the morning darkness, he answered, "I will."

Relief Sweeps W.Va. Mining Town Families Learn 12 Miners Found Alive Underground (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, January 4, 2006

TALLMANSVILLE, W.Va. — Twelve miners trapped inside a coal mine for 42 hours were found alive shortly before midnight Tuesday, prompting screams of joy from family members in a nearby church.

“They're all alive!” screamed one woman as she ran out of the church, its bells ringing in the dark.

Harley Ables, 29, said Gov. Joe Manchin told the families that 12 of the 13 miners were OK and coming out. One miner had been found dead.

Earlier in the evening, Ben Hatfield, president of International Coal Group, which owns the mine, said rescuers had yet to find signs of the other miners. The vehicle they had been traveling in had been found abandoned.

Hatfield said at the time that it appeared that the other miners had survived the explosion Monday and had sought safety in another part of the mine.

“It's another glimmer of hope but raises the question of where the other miners could have gone,” Hatfield said.

Telling the miners' families that a body had been found, he said, was “about the hardest thing I've ever had to do.

Rescuers had to stop advancing through the mine shafts temporarily while they tried to restore ventilation sufficient to allow them to move farther, Hatfield said. The explosion disabled vents in the shaft.

“We remain hopeful there'll be some good news before it's all over, but hopes are certainly stretched thin,” he said.

Hatfield said he did not know how the unidentified miner died. The body was found about 700 feet from the vehicle. He said rescuers would keep looking for the others. He said there was no evidence of a roof cave-in or collapse in the mine, and the vehicle was not damaged or thrown off its track.

Prospects of finding the miners alive were bleak. Before reaching the body, the rescuers had drilled narrow holes into the mine, inserted air monitors and found levels of carbon monoxide more than three times the maximum regarded as safe. The deadly gas is a byproduct of combustion, such as an explosion.

A camera lowered down a narrow hole had found no signs of the miners. Drilling crews pounded on steel pipes but heard no sounds or response from the missing men.

The rescue crews were in the farthest reaches of the mine, 11,200 feet from its entrance, when they found the body.

The missing men were thought to be trapped 260 feet beneath the surface.

Waiting family members had retreated to the nearby Sago Baptist Church to pray and wait out the efforts. Hundreds had spent Monday night huddled in tents or wrapped in blankets in the cool, damp mountain air.

Key to hope for a miracle was whether adequate levels of oxygen in the mine and survival training could have allowed the miners to construct a shelter from the carbon monoxide.

Carbon monoxide poisons by entering the lungs through breathing and displacing oxygen from the bloodstream. It can kill swiftly and, because it is odorless and colorless, with little warning.

The cause of the explosion remained unclear, Hatfield said. Lara Ramsburg, a spokeswoman for Gov. Joe Manchin, said it may have been sparked by lightning.

DOJ_NMG_0008120

Jesse Stolzefels, 22 has worked in the mine for three years laying track for rail cars. It's a safe place to work, he said. “This was a freak accident,” he said.

The best hope for the missing men is that they would have constructed a barrier against the deadly gas after the explosion. Materials to build such a structure — wood and plastic sheeting — would have been available in the mine, Hatfield said.

“Essentially, they could have built a room around themselves for safety,” he said.

The explosion that trapped the miners occurred when the mine was reopening after being closed for the holidays. Ramsburg said two cars carrying miners were entering the mine when the blast occurred. The second car, carrying six miners, made it out after feeling the effects of the blast.

The accident recalled a similar drama four years ago when nine Pennsylvania coal miners were successfully rescued after being trapped for 77 hours in a flooded mineshaft 240 feet underground.

Town Pauses And Mourns One Who Did Not Return Son Remembers Hardworking, Unselfish Dad (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, January 4, 2006

TALLMANSVILLE, W.Va. — Nick Helms says he owes everything to his father: the clothes on his back, the food he eats.

Most important, says Helms, whose father Terry was among 13 miners trapped in the Sago Mine after an explosion on Monday, is the life he gave to his son.

“He gave his life in there,” he said of the mine, “so that I could go out and live mine.”

Helms, 25, was among scores of relatives and friends of the miners who gathered Tuesday in a chilly drizzle at the Sago Baptist Church, a white chapel snug against a hillside across the road from the mine. The church erupted in joy when news came that 12 of the miners had survived.

But the news wasn't good for Helms. The 13th miner, whose body was found before the 12 were discovered, was Terry Helms, said his niece, Michele Mouser.

“He was a great guy. He was willing to help anybody," she said.

Terry Helms' job at the mine was fire boss, the official responsible for monitoring conditions inside the mine and helping to ensure the miners' safety. Helms, 50, was well aware of the dangers in mining and worked to make certain his son, Nick, didn't follow in his footsteps, Nick said.

“He worked so hard so I wouldn't have to set foot in a coal mine,” said Nick Helms, who lives in Myrtle Beach, S.C. and hopes to become a professional golfer.

On Monday, when Nick Helms returned home from running errands, he had more than a dozen messages on his answering machine. He said he sensed his father might be in trouble.

His girlfriend finally reached him. Your dad's mine exploded, she told him. “I just about dropped on the floor,” he said.

While friends and relatives awaited word on the trapped miners, veteran miners dropped by to offer support. When asked why they keep going back into the mine, knowing what can happen, miner Ted Johnson, 40, said, “It's as good a paying job as you'll find in this area.”

Also prior to the news, clergy members and Red Cross counselors tried to comfort spouses and children. Piano music and singing could be heard.

“Wonderful hymns,” said Barbary Chaapel, 64, whose sister's former husband, Jack Weaver, 51, was among those trapped in the mine. “I'll Fly Away. Amazing Grace.”

Red Cross spokeswoman Cecelia Hart said about 25 volunteers were helping the miners' relatives and friends. “We're counseling; we're holding hands,” Hart said.

A few hundred yards from the church, rescue workers and reporters jammed the narrow country lane leading from the church to the mine.

A few miles away, in the county seat, Buckhannon, signs of support sprouted. “Pray for the miners and their families,” read the sign at Domino's Pizza.

Faith, and support of friends and family, are sustaining the miners' families, Chaapel said.

12 Miners Found Alive 41 Hours After Explosion (NYT)

By James Dao

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

SAGO, W.Va., Wednesday, Jan. 4 - Forty-one hours after an explosion trapped 13 men in a West Virginia coal mine here, family members and a state official said 12 of the miners had been found alive Tuesday night.

DOJ_NMG_0008121

Earlier Tuesday evening, the body of one miner was found 11,200 feet from the mine entrance, within a few hundred feet of a vehicle used to transport the workers deep into the mine, company officials said. The miner was not identified, and the cause of his death was unclear.

Joe Thornton, deputy secretary for the West Virginia Department of Military Affairs and Public Safety, said the rescued miners were being examined at the mine shortly before midnight and would soon be taken to nearby hospitals. Mr. Thornton said he did not know details of their medical condition.

Outside the Sago Baptist Church, where people had gathered across the street from the mine, family and friends of the miners hugged each other and shed tears of joy as they learned the news.

"It's a miracle," said Loretta Ables, who said her fiancé, Fred Ware, was among the survivors. "Everyone was telling us they were probably dead."

Earlier in the ordeal, air readings from a hole drilled 260 feet into the mine had revealed extremely high levels of toxic carbon monoxide, a likely byproduct of the explosion, mine company officials said.

After the one miner's body was found alone, Bennett K. Hatfield, the chief executive officer of International Coal Group, the mine's owner, said he considered it a hopeful sign that the other miners had abandoned the vehicle and found a safe pocket of air.

Terry Goff, a friend of one of the miners, said he learned that the miners were alive when the bell at the Baptist church began ringing just before midnight.

"People were rushing out, yelling, 'There's 12 alive!' " Mr. Goff said.

"When they found the body and said the carbon monoxide levels were high, I doubted my faith," he said, "but now we've got 12 men walking off that hill."

Throughout the day, trained rescue teams equipped with oxygen canisters had rotated through the mine, meticulously repairing the damaged ventilation system and combing through the mazelike corridors for the men.

Emotions seesawed throughout the day with each new piece of information. In the morning, hopes had run high that the miners, most of them highly experienced workers in their 40's and 50's, had barricaded themselves in a corridor with breathable air to wait for a rescue party.

By late afternoon, mine company officials said that with only a few thousand feet of mine left to search, the chances of the miners being alive seemed remote. But late in the evening, officials said the fact that 12 miners had apparently not been killed by the force of the explosion renewed hopes that they were alive.

Nick Helms, who waited all day for news of his father, Terry, said his father, a strapping 50-year-old, had endured numerous injuries in a 30-year career and hated mining because of the dangers, but refused to quit because the job put food on the table.

"He gave his life in there so I could go to the movies," Mr. Helms, 25, said of his father. Switching to the present tense, Mr. Helms added, "He is very selfless."

The explosion, which occurred at about 6:30 Monday morning in an unused part of the mine that had been sealed just last month, shook homes and woke people nearby. But it did not cause extensive damage inside the mine, company officials said.

Some concrete walls used to direct airflow had been knocked down by the force of the blast, but there were no cave-ins or piles of rubble from the explosion, officials said.

The real danger to the miners, officials said, would have come from the persistent high levels of carbon monoxide inside the mine.

A colorless, odorless gas, carbon monoxide impedes the body's ability to carry oxygen to vital organs. It can cause flulike symptoms like headaches and nausea, and in high enough quantities, it can kill a person in 15 minutes. Of particular danger to trapped miners, it can also cause confusion.

By Tuesday evening, monitors showed carbon dioxide readings of more than 300 parts per million in some sections of the mine, more than 10 times the amount considered safe, company officials said.

"The CO2 was the worst thing they could find," said Bruce E. Dial of Pineville, N.C., who worked as a federal mine safety official for more than 20 years.

Miners, after underground explosions or fires, are trained to find pockets of breathable air using special monitors, then barricade themselves in using a plastic-coated fabric known as brattice cloth.

Lewis Wade, a mine safety expert and senior science adviser for the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, said a well-sealed corridor could keep a miner alive for hours. "Explosions are devastating things," Mr. Wade said, "but miners are smart and resilient people."

Federal inspectors fined the Sago mine more than $24,000 for roughly 202 violations in 2005, according to federal records.

DOJ_NMG_0008122

The total monetary figure is likely to rise substantially because the federal mine-safety agency has yet to put a dollar figure on some citations.

The most serious of these citations are 16 "unwarrantable failure orders," which are problems that an operator knows exist but fails to correct.

Thirteen of these orders were issued in the past six months, federal records show.

"Under the Bush administration, the citing of unwarrantable failures has gone down dramatically," said Tony Oppegard, a top federal mine official in the Clinton administration and a former prosecutor of mine-safety violations in Kentucky. "So to see a rash of unwarrantable failures under this administration is a telling sign of a mine with serious safety problems."

Inspectors found dangerous accumulations of coal dust, which can be explosive. Other citations dealt with ventilation and firefighting equipment violations.

Since June, the mine has experienced 15 roof falls or wall collapses, with three causing injuries to miners, according to federal records. That is an unusually high number, Mr. Oppegard said, "and it's indicative of roof-control problems."

Asked about the violations on Tuesday, Mr. Hatfield said the mine's "bad history" had occurred before his company took it over last year, adding that dramatic improvements had been made since then.

The anxiety of the day was heightened by what seemed to be painfully slow progress by the rescue teams, which took the entire day to move 2,000 feet.

But, experts said, the teams had to proceed cautiously, frequently testing the air and repairing the ventilation system, because of an array of dangers. A weakened roof could have caved in, for instance, or trapped methane could have triggered a second explosion.

Dennis O'Dell, administrator of health and safety for the United Mine Workers of America, who was assisting in the search, said hasty rescue efforts had at times led to additional deaths. At the Blue Creek No. 5 Mine in Alabama in 2001, 10 men attempting to rescue trapped miners were killed in a second explosion.

"I know it's tough on families because every minute seems like an hour," Mr. O'Dell said. "It's just something you have to do. Everybody has done as good a job here as I have seen."

In one setback, a robot owned by the federal government became mired in mud inside the mine on Tuesday and was rendered unusable. Officials had hoped that the robot, equipped with lights, an air testing device and a video camera, would reach the trapped miners faster than human teams could.

The cause of the blast remained a mystery. Company officials said that the mine did not have a history of methane gas problems and that air testing conducted before the explosion found no evidence of methane, a highly combustible gas.

The apparent lack of methane led some mining experts to speculate that coal dust, which is highly combustible, caused the explosion. A spark from electrical equipment could ignite coal dust, they said.

Mr. Hatfield said the likelihood of a coal dust explosion seemed low because no work had been done in the mine over the weekend.

The trapped team was the first to enter the mine after the holiday layoff but had not begun work when the explosion occurred, he said. As a result, there would have been little or no coal dust in the air, he said.

Lightning was another possible cause. The explosion happened during a violent thunderstorm, and Mr. O'Dell said there had been incidents in which metal pipes extruding from underground mines had conducted lightning bolts. The bolts then ignited pockets of methane gas, he said.

A Timeline Of Key Events In The Sago Mine Explosion: (AP)

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

A timeline of key events in the Sago Mine explosion:

Jan. 2:

– An early morning explosion traps 13 miners underground, but rescuers cannot enter for nearly 12 hours because dangerous levels of carbon monoxide are being vented.

– Rescue crews finally enter the mine on foot for fear of sparking another explosion.

Advertisements

– The U.S. Mine Safety and Health Administration sends in a rescue robot, but it's abandoned after getting stuck in the mud.

Jan. 3:

– Rescuers keep pushing deeper into the mine shaft.

– A mine executive is “very discouraged” by air quality tests, which show carbon monoxide levels measured 1,300 parts per million, exceeding the maximum safe level of 400 parts per million.

DOJ_NMG_0008123

– West Virginia Governor Joe Manchin says it will take a miracle to find the missing miners alive.

– One body is discovered in the mine. The prospects of finding anyone alive appear increasingly bleak with no signs of life.

– Shortly before midnight, family members say they have been told that the other 12 miners are alive, 41 hours after the explosion.

– One miner is in critical condition at a hospital, and was “unconscious but moaning” when he was brought to St. Joseph's Hospital, a doctor says.

Jan 4:

– Three hours after word that 12 miners had survived, the mine company's chief executive officer makes a stunning announcement that news of 12 survivors was wrong. Just one person survived, he says, explaining the wrong information was a miscommunication between rescuers and the command centre overseeing rescue efforts.

– Chaos and fights break out in the church where the families had gathered to wait, says John Groves, whose brother Jerry Groves was trapped in the mine.

Bush Says Nation Praying For W. Va. Miners (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Tuesday the nation was praying for 13 men trapped in a West Virginia coal mine and offered federal help to help bring them out, "hopefully in good condition."

"May God bless those who are trapped below the earth," Bush said from the White House as rescue crews scrambled to reach the miners 31 hours after they were trapped underground.

The miners were trapped early Monday 260 feet below the surface of the Sago Mine, located about 100 miles northeast of Charleston.

The president, speaking during a meeting with U.S. attorneys to seek renewal of the terror-fighting Patriot Act, said he called West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin to offer support.

"I told him that Americans all across our country were praying for the miners who are trapped in the mine there in West Virginia," Bush said. "I told him that I appreciated the great outpouring of compassion from the West Virginia citizens toward those worried family members. I also assured him that the federal government will help the folks in West Virginia any way we can to bring those miners out of that mine, hopefully in good condition."

The Mine Safety and Health Administration had rescue and safety specialists on the scene, set up a mobile command center and brought in a rescue robot able to explore areas of the mine that wouldn't be safe for human rescuers. The robot was abandoned for human searchers after it became bogged down in mud within the mine. Federal officials also monitored gas samples.

Bush was being regularly briefed on the situation, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said earlier Tuesday.

In US Mines, The Safety Record Has Been On An Upswing (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2006

The vigil at a coal mine in Tallmansville, W.Va., where dozens of well-wishers waited hour upon hour for word of 13 miners trapped 260 feet underground, is a scene that has become much more infrequent in coal country - a result of vast improvements in US mine safety.

For an industry that endured at least 1,000 fatalities a year through the 1930s and '40s, the death toll of 28 in 2004, the latest figure available, underscores the achievement of stricter government oversight and corporate compliance, experts and officials say.

Still, coal miners account for about half of all mining-related fatalities - an indication that the men and women who plumb America's coal seams continue to encounter hazardous, potentially deadly conditions like the explosion that rocked the International Coal Group (ICG) mine in West Virginia on Monday.

In 2003, 16 mining fatalities occurred in underground mining work with a fatality rate of 35.7 per 100,000 workers, according to the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health. Of those, 11 occurred in coal operator mines. Coal contractors had the highest fatality rate, at 212.8 per 100,000 operator employees, the institute reports.

At press time Tuesday, hopes began to sag that the trapped miners would be rescued, after air-quality tests inside the mine showed carbon-monoxide readings triple the maximum safe level. Rescue workers also sent a camera into a hole drilled into the mine, to look for signs of the miners, and planned to move in a camera-equipped robot.

DOJ_NMG_0008124

The blast occurred at about 6:40 a.m. Monday, trapping the miners below the surface of the mine, located about 100 miles northeast of Charleston.

By early Tuesday, rescuers had penetrated more than 9,000 feet into the coal mine but returned to the surface before the drilling crew punched into the mine. Officials thought the rescue team should exit in case the drilling caused a buildup of carbon monoxide, said Ben Hatfield, chief executive officer of ICG.

The federal government is helping in the rescue efforts. "We are praying and hoping for the best," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

The Mine Safety and Health Administration (MSHA) has rescue and safety specialists on scene, has set up a command center, and has brought in a rescue robot able to explore areas that wouldn't be safe for human rescuers.

The notion that mining ranks among the most dangerous occupations, in terms of on-the-job fatalities and injuries, may be misguided. "Of the 5,559 total work-related fatalities that occurred in 2003, only 56 (about 1 percent) occurred in coal and mineral mining," according to the National Mining Association website, which used data from the MSHA and the Bureau of Labor Statistics to calculate the number. Mining, the website notes, appears far down the list, behind trade, transportation, and public utilities (25 percent), construction (20 percent), and farming, forestry, and fishing (13 percent).

Coal mine explosions are typically caused by buildups of naturally occurring methane gas. The danger increases in winter, when the barometric pressure can release the odorless, highly flammable gas. The mine had been idle Saturday and Sunday, for the New Year's holiday.

ICG acquired the Sago Mine last March when it bought Anker West Virginia Mining Co., which had been in bankruptcy. The Sago Mine had annual production of about 800,000 tons of coal, the company said.

Federal inspectors cited the mine for 46 alleged violations of federal mine health and safety rules during an 11-week review that ended Dec. 22, according to records.

The more serious alleged violations, resulting in proposed penalties of at least $250 each, involved steps for safeguarding against roof falls, and the mine's plan to control methane and breathable dust. The mine received 208 citations from MSHA during 2005, up from 68 citations in 2004.

Safety at the mine has improved since ICG took over, said Gene Kitts, a company senior vice president. "We think we are operating a safe mine. We have no real clue about what triggered this explosion."

A Mining Disaster (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

THE MERE THOUGHT of being trapped at the bottom of a coal mine is horrible enough to send shivers down most people's backs. But after the explosion that trapped 13 men in a West Virginia coal mine early Monday, an equally chilling story of safety neglect may be emerging as well. According to Ellen Smith, editor of Mine Safety and Health News, the Sago coal mine, where the accident occurred, had an accident rate in 2004 that was three times higher than the national average. That record has since worsened: Last year, the mine's operators received 205 orders and citations for health and safety violations, 96 of which carried a "significant and substantial" risk of death or injury. In 2005 the mine was forced to halt operations 16 times after failing to comply with safety rules. Eight of those citations, which were among the most serious a mine can receive, occurred in the final quarter of the year.

Mining has never been a pristine or perfectly safe business. But there are mines in this country that operate safely and that receive no health and safety citations at all. At the very least, the safety problems at Sago should have caused officials at the Mine Safety and Health Administration, which is responsible for mine inspections, to take notice. Did they? We may never know. At the moment, a spokesman for the MSHA says it is "hard to say" whether the mine's record was unusual. Ms. Smith says the MSHA, which used to publish the results of its accident investigations, no longer does so. The Bush administration's preference for concealing formerly public information has, it seems, penetrated the mine safety inspection world, too.

Another question worth asking in the wake of this event is whether the culture of the MSHA has changed in the past six years. Once purely an enforcement agency, set up to make sure that mines followed safety regulations, the MSHA has in the past several years formed a series of "partnerships" with mining industry groups. In principle, such partnerships might help make mines safer. In practice, they might have allowed the agency to become too friendly with the businesses it regulates. When Congress comes back to town, we'd like to hear some open discussion about the health of the nation's mine inspections.

Black Gold Or Black Death? (NYT)

By Jeff Goodell

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008125

IN recent years, one of the toughest turnaround jobs in American industry has been the effort to change the perception of coal from an industrial relic of 19th century to an energy source for the 21st century. The high-water mark of this makeover campaign may well have come last spring, when General Electric began its "ecomagination" advertising campaign touting its new clean coal technology. One ad featured glamorous, scantily clad models (male and female) shoveling coal in a dark mine while Tennessee Ernie Ford's version of "16 Tons," the great song about hard labor and corporate exploitation, played on the soundtrack. Near the end of the ad, a voice announced, "Harnessing the power of coal is looking more beautiful every day."

But there is nothing pretty about coal, as we have been grimly reminded by the plight of the 13 coal miners trapped by a mine collapse near Tallmansville, W.V. The American Lung Association estimates that 24,000 people die prematurely each year from power-plant pollution. In Appalachia, mountaintop removal mining - a method of mining in which the mountain is removed from the coal, rather than the coal removed from the mountain - has flattened some 380,000 acres in the region and destroyed more than 700 miles of streams.

Coal plants generate more than 130 million tons a year of combustion waste - fly ash, bottom ash, scrubber sludge - that is laced with toxic metals like arsenic and mercury and pumped into holding ponds and abandoned mines, where it can sometimes leak into aquifers and drinking water. Most important, coal plants are responsible for nearly 40 percent of the carbon dioxide released in the United States, meaning that if we're going to get a handle on global warming, we'll have to get a handle on coal.

Still, in recent years - thanks in part to skyrocketing natural gas prices, worries about dwindling oil supplies, regulatory rollbacks of the Bush administration - coal has become sexy. And it indeed has many virtues.

Coal is cheap and plentiful. Right now, more than half the electricity generated in America is produced with coal. America is often called "the Saudi Arabia of coal," with enough to last us for 250 years. Improvements in emission controls make new coal plants much cleaner than the old coal burners; 120 of these up-to-date plants are in the works right now. New technology allows coal to be liquefied into diesel, a possible substitute for oil.

There is also a strong cultural connection to the resurgence of coal, particularly in the producing areas: it is a red-state rock, a taking back of America from the silly blue-staters who believed the future would be powered by solar panels and switchgrass. I recently attended a rally for a new coal plant in the Midwest where boosters chanted, "Coal is U.S.A.! Coal is U.S.A.!"

Nothing, however, has been more important to the comeback of coal than the purported safety improvements in mining. The coal industry knows that as much as Americans may love a cheap kilowatt, they are not going to support burning coal if it results in people suffering miserable deaths in Appalachian coal mines. The industry works overtime to suggest that coal mining today has nothing in common with its dark and exploitative past. The old days of breaker boys (children who picked rocks out of the coal) and methane explosions are gone, the coal industry argues, and mining today is safe, well paid and professional.

Promotional literature published by the National Mining Association and other industry groups usually show miners as clean-faced men in close proximity to high-tech machinery - computer screens, global positioning systems, bright yellow haul trucks. The average salary of a coal miner, the association says, is $50,000 a year. According to one coal industry Web site, working in a coal mine today is as safe as working in a grocery store.

The people in Tallmansville know better. Coal mining remains a dirty and dangerous business, especially in regions of Appalachia where all the easy coal is gone and what's left is increasingly difficult and dangerous to mine. (Coal mining is indeed a fairly safe operation in the big strip mines of Wyoming, where the 70-foot seams of coal lie so close to the surface that, in places, you can practically dig it out with a spoon.)

In parts of West Virginia, Pennsylvania and Kentucky, some mines are so complex and tight the workers call them "dogholes." Working in an underground mine, especially one owned by a small non-union operator in Appalachia, is one of the few jobs in America that is nearly as dangerous as commercial fishing in Alaska.

Not long ago, I spoke with a coal miner who was spending eight hours a day in a coal seam in western Kentucky that was a mere 20 inches high. You can't even turn around in a mine like that, have to mine laying on your belly. I asked him how much he earned. "Not enough to buy a new truck," he told me.

If coal is indeed going to be taken seriously as a fuel source in the 21st century, it's up to federal and state regulators to make sure that even 20-inch dogholes are safe (and they can be, with the proper technology, worker skills and governmental oversight). A good first step would be to reverse the Bush administration's new privacy rules, which have made it tougher for outsiders to obtain federal inspectors' reports. Even better would be to increase fines and other penalties for operators who break the rules. In many cases the penalties for running a dangerous mine - the West Virginia mine had 208 federal citations in 2005, up from 68 in 2004 - amounted to little more than a slap on the wrist.

In the summer of 2002, outside the Quecreek Mine in Pennsylvania, I watched for three days as heroic men rescued nine co-workers who had been buried alive. There was no talk about the Saudi Arabia of coal there, no easy words about energy independence or the economic virtues of burning coal. Like the families who stood vigil in Tallmansville this week, they were people who understood the real price of cheap power.

DOJ_NMG_0008126

US Federal Reserve Nearing End Of Tightening Cycle (FT)

By Christopher Swann In Washington

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

US stocks put on a turn of speed in the first trading day of the new year, after the minutes of the Federal Reserve's meeting in December added to confidence that rates were unlikely to rise much further.

The S&P 500 climbed 1.64 per cent, or 20.51 points, to 1,268.8 – its biggest daily gain in points terms since April – and gave a boost to investors after a lacklustre 2005 in which the index rose just 3 per cent.

The minutes of the Fed's December meeting, at which rates rose by a quarter point to 4.25 per cent, confirmed that the US central bank is now close to the end of a tightening cycle that has lasted a year and a half. The Fed has been raising rates in quarter point steps since an historic low of 1 per cent was reached in June 2004.

In December a majority of the Fed's Open Market Committee argued that "the number of additional firming steps required probably would not be large".

The minutes indicate that members of the committee believed that the level of interest rates was now neutral – neither fostering nor constraining economic growth.

"In these circumstances, the committee thought that policy should no longer be characterised as accommodative," the minutes said.

The Fed also sounded more relaxed about the outlook for inflation than in previous meetings, saying intense competition in the US market and subdued pay rises had helped contain price pressures.

The central bank said the economy had continued to expand at a solid rate at the end of last year, with inflationary pressures remaining subdued. "Overall and core consumer price inflation were projected to move higher in the first half of next year, reflecting the effects of higher energy prices, but then to trend lower as those effects ebb", it said.

The yield of the two-year Treasury bond fell six basis points in response to the minutes, to 4.34 per cent. Financial markets are still braced for a rate rise at this month's meeting, the last to be chaired by Alan Greenspan, outgoing chairman.

Some analysts cautioned that the market reaction was overdone. Marc Chandler, global head of currency strategy at Brown Brothers Harriman, said: "The market was predisposed to read the minutes with a dovish bias and, sure enough, it saw what it wanted to see."

Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital, was also sceptical, commenting that "we are left to debate the meaning of 'not large' today, whereas on December 13 we were trying to quantify 'some'."

But opinion remains divided about the likelihood of a further increase at Ben Bernanke's first meeting as chairman in March. Traders were pricing in a 60 per cent probability that rates would be raised to 4.75 per cent in March, down from an 80 per cent probability at the end of last year, said Ian Mr Morris, US economist at HSBC.

Fed Minutes Indicate Rate Increases Wrapping Up (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve is nearing the end of its 18-month drive to raise interest rates, with most central bank officials saying the number of additional increases needed to tame inflation "probably would not be large," according to minutes of a Dec. 13 meeting released Tuesday.

Members of the Fed's policymaking Open Market Committee differed on just how much further tightening was needed, saying the outlook was "becoming considerably less certain" and that future rate moves were more dependent on strength of economic data.

Though economists have widely predicted that the Fed will soon wrap up its campaign, the minutes rallied the stock and bond markets. The Dow Jones industrial average rose 129.91 points to 10,847.41.

"We needed confirmation just to make sure we were on the right page," says Kim Rupert of Action Economics. "We think there are several more (increases) ahead, although we do think they might pause after" the Jan. 31 meeting.

The Fed has been raising interest rates in quarter-point increments since June 2004 to fend off harmful inflation. Short-term rates, which were a low 1% in mid-2004, are now 4.25%.

Economists, like Fed officials, differ on when the central bank will decide that rates are at a neutral level that neither impedes nor over-stimulates growth. Most expect the Fed to raise rates by a quarter point on Jan. 31, which will also be retiring Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan's last day in office.

DOJ_NMG_0008127

White House economic adviser Ben Bernanke has been nominated to succeed Greenspan.

Some forecasters, such as Global Insight, predict another quarter-point increase in March.

The minutes indicate that some Fed members already consider interest rates within a broad range of the level needed to keep the economy operating close to potential.

According to the minutes, Fed economists expect the economy to slow slightly in 2006 from the strong pace of 2005. Still, output will be near potential the next two years, and the inflation rate should rise in the first half of 2006, due to energy prices, before ebbing again.

Hurricane-related rebuilding will boost the economy in the near term, but that will be muted by rising interest rates and a slowing housing market. At the same time, Fed officials worry that given strong growth and rising factory utilization, inflation could rise if the central bank is not responsive.

David Kelly of Putnam Investments expects a quarter-point move at the Jan. 31 meeting and hopes the Fed stops there. He says the risks of slower growth already outweigh those of higher inflation.

The economy grew at a 4.1% annual rate in the third quarter. A report Tuesday said manufacturing expanded more slowly last month.

Views On Rates Differ Within Fed (WP)

By Jeannine Aversa

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

Federal Reserve policymakers differed last month on how much higher interest rates would need to rise to keep the economy and inflation on an even keel, but most believed the end of the nearly two-year rate-hike campaign probably wasn't far off.

Minutes of the Fed's closed-door meeting on Dec. 13, released yesterday, provided insight into the thinking of Fed policymakers. At that meeting, Fed officials made their most extensive recent changes in the wording of the central bank's policy statement, which economists and market analysts parse for clues about future rate moves.

"Views differed on how much future tightening might be required," the minutes said, explaining why changes were made to the Fed's policy statement released after the December meeting.

One of the most important changes was that the Fed dropped language -- contained in previous statements -- that described interest rates as being too low, or accommodative. Economists viewed that move as a sign the Fed was winding down its rate-raising campaign.

Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan and his colleagues decided at the December meeting to boost rates for the 13th time since June 2004 to prevent inflation from flaring up. They noted that the economy was growing solidly and that the labor market had gotten stronger, forces that could lead to a pickup in inflation.

"Although future action would depend on the incoming data, this characterization of the outlook for policy was seen by most members as indicating that, given the information now in hand, the number of additional firming steps required probably would not be large," the minutes stated.

On Wall Street, stocks were buoyed by the Fed's assessment. The Dow Jones industrials surged 129.91 points to close at 10,847.41.

The Fed's action in December left its key short-term rate, called the federal funds rate, at 4.25 percent, the highest in 4 1/2 years. The funds rate is the interest that banks charge each other on overnight loans and is the Fed's main tool to influence economic activity.

The rate increase was part of an 18-month process in which the Fed lifted rates from extraordinary low levels to more normal ones. Before the central bank began its rate-raising campaign, the funds rate had been sliced to 1 percent, a 46-year low, in an effort to help revive the economy after the 2001 recession, terrorist attacks and accounting scandals rocked Wall Street.

Throughout the Fed's rate-raising cycle, it had pledged in its policy statement to boost rates at a "measured" pace. Economists came to view that as quarter-percentage-point increments. The Fed's 13 rate increases thus far have all been quarter-point hikes.

At the December meeting, some members thought the word "measured" was no longer necessary, the minutes revealed. However, the Fed's policy statement released at the time kept that word.

"Its retention for this meeting was seen as potentially useful to preclude a possible misinterpretation" by financial markets that the Fed might need to act more aggressively in boosting rates, the minutes said.

Many economists predict the Fed will bump up rates again at the next meeting, on Jan 31. That's the first meeting of 2006 and the last before Greenspan retires that day after 18-plus years at the helm of the Fed.

DOJ_NMG_0008128

Some analysts believe another rate increase will come at the following meeting on March 28, which would mark the first one presided over by Ben S. Bernanke, who was nominated last year to replace Greenspan as Fed chairman.

On the housing market, Fed policymakers at the December meeting discussed "tentative signs that activity was beginning to slow," the minutes said. Thus far, housing barometers don't suggest "a significant weakening" in housing activity, the minutes said.

Policymakers also said the economy had bounced back from the Gulf Coast hurricanes. Hurricane-related rebuilding would boost economic activity, but this would be tempered by higher interest rates and subdued spending by consumers who may feel less wealthy as the housing market moderates, the minutes said.

Fed Suggests It's Close To Ending Run Of Rate Rises (WSJ)

By Greg Ip, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials are less worried about inflation and thus may raise interest rates just one or two more times in the next few months, minutes of their December meeting suggest.

"The number of additional [rate increases] required probably would not be large," according to a summary of the Dec. 13 meeting, released yesterday, with the customary three-week lag. (Text of the minutes1)

More clearly than the statement issued just after the meeting, the minutes signal that the Fed is nearing the end of a campaign that has raised the target for the federal-funds rate -- charged on overnight loans between banks -- to 4.25% from a 46-year low of 1% in June 2004, in 13 quarter-percentage-point steps.

The likelihood that the Fed is nearing an end to its tightening was reinforced yesterday by weaker-than-expected economic data. An index of manufacturing activity, based on a survey of factory purchasing managers, slipped in December, and construction spending grew less than expected in November as home-renovation outlays fell. In addition, some economists estimate that consumer spending was flat in the fourth quarter for the first time since 1991.

The prospect of an end to rate increases sent the Dow Jones Industrial Average soaring 129.91 points, or 1.21%, to 10847.41, its biggest point and percentage gain since late October. Bonds finished mixed, with the yield declining on two-year Treasurys, which are sensitive to expectations on Fed policy. The dollar lost ground, meanwhile, posting its biggest decline against the euro in three months.

The minutes said Fed officials' inflation concerns had "eased somewhat" since the previous meeting Nov. 1. They noted that slowing housing-price gains would restrain consumer spending, and that officials had to be "mindful of the lags in the effect" of past rate increases on the economy. These factors all weigh in favor of the Fed halting its policy-tightening soon.

To be sure, some factors are pushing in the other direction. The minutes cite concerns that higher energy prices could yet push underlying inflation higher, that business spending had accelerated, and that the "sustained period" of low interest rates may have boosted home prices and raised the risk of an overheating economy. "Views differed on how much further" rates might have to rise, the minutes cautioned.

Given these conflicting forces, Fed officials may further weaken their verbal commitment to future rate actions in the statement issued after their meeting Jan. 31, the last to be led by Chairman Alan Greenspan. Some Fed officials think that would give the incoming chairman, Ben Bernanke, more freedom to plot the policy he thinks best -- whether to stop raising rates immediately or to continue raising them at his first Fed meeting on March 28.

On Dec. 13, the Fed altered two key parts of its post-meeting statement. It abandoned the assertion that interest rates were "accommodative," or below a level that neither stimulates nor restrains growth. And instead of saying rates would continue to rise at "a pace that is likely to be measured," it said instead, "some further measured policy firming is likely to be needed."

Economists at the time generally saw the retention of the word "measured" as a reaffirmation of plans to keep raising rates at a quarter point per meeting. But Fed officials, according to the meeting minutes and in sentiments expressed since, actually meant to convey less certainty about further rate increases. They retained the word "measured" to prevent speculation that a half-percentage-point increase might be in the cards, and eliminated the word "pace" because they thought the word might imply two or more rate increases.

Yesterday's minutes and weaker economic data prompted some economists to reconsider their rate views. Peter Hooper, chief U.S. economist at Deutsche Bank, still expects the federal-funds rate to rise to 5% by spring, but he said the minutes put that forecast "at risk." Jan Hatzius, chief U.S. economist at Goldman Sachs, is also sticking to a forecast of 5% by mid-2006. But, Mr. Hatzius said the weak manufacturing report as well as Fed officials' apparent lack of worry about inflation "have increased the downside risk to our forecast a bit. It certainly could be 4.75%, although stopping at 4.5% would still require a significantly weaker set of numbers than we are expecting."

DOJ_NMG_0008129

In financial futures markets, expectations of Fed actions have changed very little since early December. Contracts based on the federal-funds rate reflect expectations that it will rise to 4.5% on Jan. 31 and put about 50% odds on a move to 4.75% on March 28, with no increases deemed likely thereafter.

Fed officials probably will tweak their post-meeting statement again on Jan. 31. Since most officials agree inflation is more likely to rise than fall and the inflation rate is near the high end of their "comfort zone," they may still want to signal a bias to tighter credit conditions. But because their actions will depend more on new economic data than in the past year and half, they may soften the commitment to raise rates further. For example, instead of saying further increases are "likely to be needed," the statement could say "may be needed."

The Institute for Supply Management, a group representing corporate purchasing managers, said yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity dropped to 54.2 in December from 58.1 in November and 59.1 in October. Readings above 50 indicate the manufacturing sector is expanding, and all parts of the index continue to exceed their 20-year averages.

Still, "the pace of growth has decelerated," Daniel J. Meckstroth, chief economist for the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI, said. "Hurricanes Katrina and Rita disrupted transportation networks and supply chains in manufacturing at a time when inventories were already lean, setting off a scramble for materials in September, October and into November. By year end, manufacturers got caught up."

The ISM's new-orders index, a gauge of future manufacturing activity, fell to 55.5 in December, down from 59.8 in November, and the production index, which measures output, slipped to 57 from 60.6 in November. New orders from other countries, as measured by ISM's export index, slid to 53.3 last month, down from 59.2 in November.

Manufacturers, however, got some relief from elevated prices for raw materials, including energy. The prices index fell to 63 from 74 in November and 84 in October. Still, manufacturers remain wary about energy prices, said Norbert Ore, Georgia-Pacific Corp.'s procurement director, who oversees the ISM survey. Several managers, he said, indicated they plan to buy energy-saving equipment and materials.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Department said construction spending grew 0.2% in November to a seasonally adjusted $1.146 trillion annual rate after rising 0.8% in October.

Private-sector construction grew 0.2%, fueled primarily by 0.5% increase in non-residential construction while residential construction slipped 0.1%. Government construction increased 0.3%, led by increases in educational and highway spending.

--Joi Preciphs contributed to this article.

Write to Greg Ip at greg.ip@wsj.com2

Fed's Notes Offer Hope Of A Brake On Rates (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 - The Federal Reserve has set the stage for ending its 18-month campaign of raising interest rates, but officials signaled on Tuesday that they are entering a new period of uncertainty at the same time that Alan Greenspan prepares to retire as Fed chairman.

According to minutes released Tuesday from the Fed policy committee's meeting in December, officials agreed that they would probably have to push rates only a little higher before stopping.

"Given the information now in hand, the number of additional firming steps required probably would not be large," the summary said, ascribing that view to "most members" of the rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee.

On Wall Street, stock prices increased sharply in response. Major indexes rose more than 1 percent, with the Dow Jones industrial average up 129.91 points, or 1.2 percent, its largest one-day gain in a month.

The minutes also suggested, though, that investors might have gotten ahead of themselves.

For more than two years, the Fed has given investors explicit guidance about future rate decisions, most recently as it gradually pushed up interest rates from the lows of early 2004. But Fed committee members made clear at the December meeting that they were increasingly uncertain about both the potential course of the economy and the best way to communicate their intentions.

"Views differed on how much further tightening would be required," according to the minutes. "Members thought the policy outlook was becoming considerably less certain and that policy decisions going forward would depend to an increased extent on the implications of incoming economic data."

The ambiguity struck Peter Kretzmer, senior economist at Bank of America. "The markets really seized on the idea they were closer," he said, referring to an end of rate increases, "but when one thinks about it, they also highlighted just as clearly that there's uncertainty. What they really highlighted is that what they do will depend more on the data."

DOJ_NMG_0008130

The summary of last month's deliberations provided a wealth of new insights as the Fed prepares for the transition from Mr. Greenspan to Ben S. Bernanke, President Bush's nominee to be the next Fed chairman.

The meeting minutes confirmed that Fed officials became slightly less worried about inflation pressure, even though they expected high energy prices to push overall inflation somewhat higher for a while.

"Participants indicated that their concerns about near-term inflation pressures had eased somewhat," the minutes said. Policy makers said prices were being held in check by competition from foreign producers.

They also noted that labor costs had risen only moderately, despite strong economic growth. And they drew comfort from findings that the spike in oil prices last summer and fall had only a "muted" impact on consumer prices.

But Fed officials made it clear that they were divided about when to stop raising interest rates. They also labored mightily to preserve maneuvering room, warning that decisions would be heavily influenced by coming economic data.

"Views differed on how much further tightening would be required," according to the minutes. "Members thought the policy outlook was becoming considerably less certain and that policy decisions going forward would depend to an increased extent on the implications of incoming economic data."

Fed officials seemed to be warning that they might stop providing the hints on future policy decisions that they had been giving over the last two years, with phrases like a "measured" pace of rate increases.

Mr. Greenspan, who is to retire on Jan. 31 after 18 years at the helm of the Federal Reserve, has long warned that the Fed will not always tip its hand on future policy.

Mr. Bernanke, who is expected to win easy Senate approval as his successor, has argued for years that the central bank needs to be more "transparent." But he has not said that he favors advance guidance as a matter of principle.

Many analysts agree that the last two years have been unusually predictable, and that the Fed is now entering a new stage of uncertainty.

Robert DiClemente, chief United States economist at Citigroup, said: "It seems to me the consensus is less confident, and I sense that not only in the committee's own discussion but in the staff's backpedaling a bit on the outlook. It's indicative how people are more divided, and I think their willingness to guide market expectation has been diminished by that."

Two major factors made it much easier for Mr. Greenspan to offer guidance on the Fed's intentions over the last two years.

The first was that inflation remained low even while job creation and economic growth strengthened. That allowed the Fed to adjust policy gradually, without surprises.

The other was that the Fed had reduced interest rates far below normal from 2001 to 2004 in hope of invigorating a stalling economy. But by 2004, policy makers largely agreed that rates needed to be brought back to more usual levels.

Indeed, Mr. Greenspan told lawmakers early in 2004 that returning rates to normal, without disruption, would be his biggest policy challenge. "It's not a gimme putt," he remarked, borrowing a golf metaphor.

With the benchmark short-term interest rate, the Federal funds rate on overnight loans between banks, now at 4.25 percent, four times the level just 18 months ago, Fed officials are evidently getting close to at least a pause.

Based on prices for federal funds futures, investors are betting that the rate will climb to 4.5 percent at the next Fed policy meeting on Jan. 31, but then very little above that.

Still, several analysts said that investors might have read too much into the Fed's readiness for a pause, and predicted that the federal funds rate would reach 4.75 percent or even 5 percent this year.

Ian Shepherdson, chief United States economist at High Frequency Economics in Valhalla, N.Y., said the Fed was keeping its options open.

In a note to clients on Tuesday, Mr. Shepherdson wrote: "Clearly, there is a debate as to how much further tightening will be necessary. Still, this does not read like a Fed where everyone is looking for a reason to stop."

Stocks Start New Year With A Bang Dow, S& P, Nasdaq See Significant Gains (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, January 4, 2006

Investors didn't waste any time putting a tepid 2005 behind them and celebrating the new year Tuesday by sending stocks sharply higher on 2006's first day of trading.

All three major stock indexes gained more than 1% after notes released from the Federal Reserve's last meeting indicated its 11/2-year-long campaign boosting interest rates might be near an end.

While a rally is always welcome on Wall Street, it's even more beloved in January. Market historians attach significance to the first trading days of the year, claiming they can predict how stocks will perform the rest of the year.

Even taken by itself, Tuesday's rally was a source of good cheer:

DOJ_NMG_0008131

·The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index gained 38 points, or 1.7%, making it the best performer of all the major indexes. It was the index's biggest one-day percentage gain since July 8.

·The Dow Jones industrials, which fell 0.6% in 2005, sprang up 130 points, or 1.2%, to 10,847. Had that rally occurred a session earlier, the Dow would have ended 2005 up 0.6%.

·The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 21 points, or 1.6%, to 1269, its biggest percentage gain since Oct. 28. It was the first time in more than a month that all three indexes gained 1% or more the same day.

While many investors were hoping for a strong finish to 2005, they were pleased to see the rally, albeit late. "I'm pretty surprised this didn't happen sooner," says Michelle Clayman, managing partner at New Amsterdam Partners.

Investors hope the rally can hang on for at least another four trading days due to the January "early warning system." The last 35 times the S&P 500 has gained in its first five days, the market has ended the year higher 30 times, with an average gain of 13.7%, says the 2006 Stock Trader's Almanac.

But it will take more than one good day to soothe investors.

Most investors, especially after seeing the Fed's notes, are assuming there are only one or two more increases in short-term rates coming, says David Joy, strategist at RiverSource Investments. But Joy fears inflation could heat up and force the Fed to move more aggressively. "It's too early to say inflation is absolutely not a problem," he says.

Al Goldman, strategist at A.G. Edwards, cautions investors from getting fixated on January, because a lot can happen the rest of the year. For instance, in 2005, the Nasdaq fell the first trading day of the year and didn't make it back above its first-day close until July 14.

"Would I rather have an up early January? You bet," Goldman says. But "you can't take it to the bank."

Dow Zooms Up 130 Points (WT)

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Wall Street had a bullish start to the new year yesterday, with the Dow Jones Industrial Average surging nearly 130 points after the Federal Reserve signaled a willingness to stop its campaign of interest rate increases in the near future.

In minutes from the Federal Reserve's Dec. 13 meeting, policy makers disagreed on exactly when to stop the policy of raising rates in quarter-percentage-point increments, but the Open Market Committee members did agree that an end was coming soon. The nation's benchmark rate stands at 4.25 percent, the result of quarter percentage point rises over the past 13 meetings dating back to June 2004.

Investors ended 2005 with the fear that the Fed would go too far in raising rates, choking off economic growth in its effort to stem inflation. That concern had kept stocks volatile for much of the year and stymied Wall Street's typical year-end rally. But the news of a possible policy shift was greeted with enthusiastic buying yesterday.

"Given the rise we saw, it shows you the importance of interest rates and what the Fed thinks," said Jay Suskind, head trader at Ryan Beck & Co. "This gives us hope that the Fed will be sensitive to the economy and we can get back to that nice 'Goldilocks' economy where growth is just right."

The Dow rose 129.91, or 1.21 percent, to 10,847.41.

Broader stock indicators also advanced sharply. The Standard & Poor's 500 Index added 20.51, or 1.64 percent, to 1,268.80, and the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 38.42, or 1.74 percent, to 2,243.74.

Bonds moved higher, with the yield on the 10-year Treasury note falling to 4.37 percent from 4.40 percent late Friday. The dollar was mixed against other major currencies, while gold prices rose sharply.

The Fed minutes helped stocks overcome a number of hurdles in early trading, including a sharp jump in energy prices prompted by wintry weather in the Northeast. A barrel of light crude settled at $63.14, up $2.06, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Wall Street remained concerned that the economy was already slowing after a pair of economic reports pointed to slowdowns in manufacturing and the red-hot housing market. The Institute for Supply Management's manufacturing index fell to 54.2 in December, less than the 57.5 reading expected by economists and off from 58.1 in November. In addition, the Commerce Department said construction spending rose 0.2 percent in November, far less than 0.7 percent gain expected.

Stocks also were weighed down in early trading because of negative news from a pair of Dow industrials. Wal-Mart Stores Inc. lost 57 cents to $46.23 as the retailer said its holiday sales will only approach the low end of its previous forecasts despite deep discounts used to lure buyers into the stores.

Fellow Dow component General Motors Corp. suffered after Banc of America Securities lowered its price target for the automaker to $13 per share from $16 per share, citing the likelihood of lower-than-expected savings on health care costs. Shares of the struggling automaker dropped 52 cents to $18.90.

DOJ_NMG_0008132

The negative economic data and Dow pressures made the sharp rise in late trading even more surprising, said Chris Johnson, manager of quantitative analysis at Schaeffer's Investment Research in Cincinnati, who questioned whether the market's thirst for gains, unfulfilled in December, fueled some over-exuberance.

"This is definitely a nice bounce here today, but there are a lot of stocks that have no reason to rally that have rallied," Mr. Johnson said. "I hope it sticks, but I'm going watch cautiously here over the next couple of days."

In other action, Poultry producer Pilgrim's Pride Corp. fell to a new 52-week low after the company slashed its first-quarter profit forecasts in response to lower prices in the United States and disappointing sales in Mexico. Pilgrim's Pride tumbled $7.80, or 24 percent, to $25.36.

Walgreen Co. rose $1.13 to $45.39 as the drugstore chain said higher generic drug sales helped push profits up 5 percent in the first quarter. The company beat Wall Street profit forecasts by a penny per share.

Fed Minutes Give Stocks Life (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

Stocks rallied Tuesday afternoon after minutes from the Federal Reserve's December meeting suggested that the end of the central bank's 18-month campaign to raise interest rates will happen sooner rather than later.

A year earlier, it was almost the exact opposite on Wall Street: Fed minutes suggested rate increases would continue far into 2005, and the Dow Jones Industrial Average slumped 98.65 points in heavy trading. That set the tone for stocks for the rest of the month and presaged a flat market for 2005, as the Fed fulfilled its promise and boosted rates by eight more times to 4.25%.

Now investors are hoping that, just like last year, early January trading will help set the tone for 2006.

FED FUEL

Stocks shot higher Tuesday after the Fed released minutes at 2 p.m. Eastern

Dow industrials

Nasdaq composite

The Dow industrials, limp before the release of the minutes, surged 129.91 points, or 1.21%, to 10847.41. Exxon Mobil jumped 4.1% amid a big advance by crude-oil prices. But financial stocks such as American Express and Citigroup, which would benefit from an end to the rate increases, also rallied.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index popped 20.51, or 1.64%, to 1268.80, helped by the rally in financials, which make up more than 20% of the index. Technology stocks, which benefit from low rates as consumers and companies spend more on new gadgets, led Tuesday's advance. The Nasdaq Composite Index, heavy with tech stocks, rocketed 38.42 points, or 1.74%, to 2243.74. Microsoft gained 2.6% and Intel rose 2.4%, also propping up the Dow average.

The dollar fell sharply against the euro and the yen, since the greenback usually benefits from higher interest rates.

Policy makers at the December meeting noted that inflationary pressures had "eased somewhat" since November and said "the number of additional firming steps required probably would not be large," the minutes say, though future actions are dependent on "incoming data." That raised hopes that the Fed, which boosted short-term rates by a quarter-point for the 13th-consecutive time last month, has only one more increase on tap. On Jan. 31, policy makers meet again in what will be the final meeting chaired by Alan Greenspan.

The Fed is broadly expected to nudge rates higher once again by a quarter-percentage point. Fed-funds futures contracts, bets on future moves by policy makers, reflected hopes that the increase will be the last. As of last Friday, the contracts priced in a 60% chance that rates would go to 4.75%. After the release of the minutes, those odds had fallen to 48%.

"Maybe it's only one and done for the Fed," said Ethan Harris, an economist at Lehman Brothers. Even if the Fed does raise rates more than once, he added, there is a "sense of relief that the end of the tunnel is in sight."

The market had a topsy-turvy start: Stocks opened higher in a rush of new-year enthusiasm that was quickly stamped out by reports on manufacturing activity and construction spending that failed to match Wall Street's expectations.

Commodities, which surged in 2005 amid rising demand from emerging economies such as China and India, continued their winning ways in 2006. Crude-oil prices, up 40% last year, rose $2.10 to $63.14 on the New York Mercantile Exchange following a weekend dispute between Russia and the Ukraine over natural-gas deliveries10. Comex gold futures rose $13.60 to $532.50 a troy ounce on the Nymex following an 18% rise last year.

Investors are keeping a close watch on stocks in the first few days of January, which often serve as guideposts for how the market will do during the rest of the year. According to the Stock Traders Almanac, the last 35 times the first five days of January have been positive on the S&P 500, the index posted full-year gains 86% of those times. The last 20 years the index has been negative during the first five days, it has posted a loss for the year half of those times.

DOJ_NMG_0008133

Traders also have their eye on the pesky yield curve -- the difference between short- and long-term interest rates -- which hurt stocks in the closing days of 2005. Short-term rates had moved higher than long-term rates, traditionally a sign of trouble for the economy. Early Tuesday, the curve was slightly "inverted," with short-term rates higher than long-term rates. But the curve returned to normal after the release of the Fed's minutes amid hopes that rates at the short side of the curve won't go much higher.

In major market action:

Stocks rose11. On the Big Board, where 1.8 billion shares traded, 2,617 stocks rose and 812 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2 billion shares traded, 1,908 rose and 1,206 declined.

Bonds advanced12. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note gained 5/32 point, or $1.56 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.375% Tuesday. The 30-year bond fell 11/32 to yield 4.560%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar fell.13 It traded at 116.23 yen, off from 117.92 yen late Friday, while the euro rose to $1.2014 from $1.1826.

Capital-Spending Plays May Finally Pay Off (WSJ)

By Gregory Zuckerman

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

After a long lull, there are signs that companies are set to boost spending faster this year. The change could benefit many corporations, including Oracle Corp., Halliburton Co., Schlumberger Ltd. and Washington Group International Inc.

Capital expenditures, which include all kinds of spending that enhance a business's long-term prospects, such as buying or upgrading buildings or equipment, have been growing at a rate of about 11% in the U.S. for more than a year, though that has been edging up a bit lately.

But there are some signs that the spending is starting to rise faster, at least among larger, public companies. Companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index increased their spending on capital expenditures during the third quarter of 2005 by 24%, compared with the same period in 2004, according to Thomson Financial, which tracks these figures. That is quite a change. After a surge in the late-1990s, capital expenditures for these larger companies declined on a year-over-year basis between the third quarter of 2001 and the fourth quarter of 2003, and have averaged about a 9% increase each quarter subsequently, according to Thomson.

A number of analysts expect a jump in this kind of spending in the next year. That is in part because U.S. companies are sitting on a record pile of cash, and many have pared their debt, giving them ample funds to boost spending. While many have used that largess to increase share buybacks, dividends and acquisitions, a jump in capital expenditures could be in store for 2006, some say, as the recovery grows long in the tooth and companies deal with capacity strains in their businesses.

"A lot of industries are hitting points where there's not a lot of existing capacity to meet demand," says Greg Jensen, co-chief investment officer at Bridgewater Associates, a money-management firm in Westport, Conn., with more than $140 billion in assets. "To meet demand, more companies will have to invest more."

To be sure, some investors have been anticipating a surge in corporate spending for some time, but the results have been largely underwhelming. Some caution that with interest rates going up and more companies forced to shore up pension plans, there may be more disappointment ahead for business spending. But a lot of the increased spending may take place in areas with higher growth prospects, such as in Asia, where manufacturers continue to move operations.

And if stock prices stay down, it will probably be more attractive for companies to repurchase shares -- or acquire competitors -- rather than spend more on so-called organic growth.

"We continue to believe [mergers and acquisitions] will be the preferred use of cash in 2006, especially at current valuation levels," says Jason Trennert, chief investment strategist at ISI Group Inc., a New York research firm. "But increases in cap-ex could also be a bigger part of the program than we originally thought."

The safest bets for beneficiaries of a spending increase: businesses catering to industries that saw windfall profits in 2005, such as the energy sector. Some analysts point to stocks such as Halliburton, Schlumberger and Ameron International Corp. as likely beneficiaries of spending from energy companies.

Some analysts, such as Tobias Levkovich of Citigroup Inc., urge investors to focus on technology companies such as Oracle, Intel Corp., International Business Machines Corp. and Microsoft Corp. They predict that more companies will increase their spending on software and other tech areas, which can improve productivity.

Many of these large tech stocks already are quite inexpensive, providing investors with a margin of safety in case the expected jump in capital expenditures fails to materialize. Oracle, for example, is expected to see earnings rise a strong 18% to 79 cents a share for its fiscal year ending May 2006, but trades just a tad above the overall market's multiple of earnings. Oracle's balance sheet sports $2.3 billion more cash than debt.

DOJ_NMG_0008134

A number of hedge funds have been buying up shares of Washington Group International, the construction and engineering company that saw revenue from mining projects jump more than 70% in the third quarter of 2005, compared with 2004's third quarter. That figure should keep rising amid the commodity boom.

Washington Group trades at about 21 times next year's expected earnings. That is a reasonable premium above the 14.5 price-earnings multiple of the S&P 500, considering analysts expect the company's profits to jump 28% to $2.52 a share in 2006 from $1.97 in 2005. The stock trades at less than two times its book value, an inexpensive price, and has a pristine balance sheet with no debt.

With Rosy Predictions, Pundits Missing 2006's Warning Signs (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

The columnist who tries to predict the future of the economy or the financial markets is a fool -- but no more so than the army of forecasters, money managers and economic policymakers who have been doing just that as part of the annual New Year ritual.

The consensus view, in case you've been on a beach reading Dan Silva spy novels these past two weeks and missed it, is that everything is going to be peachy-keen in 2006. Economic growth will slow only modestly from last year's unsustainable spurt; inflation will remain in check; the air will be let out gradually from the real-estate bubble; energy prices won't get any higher and probably will retreat a bit; the transition at the Fed will be seamless; the trade and budget deficits will shrink; the dollar may drift down, but only a bit; and stocks will post respectable gains.

Oh, and yes, purchases of new golf equipment will trim three strokes from your handicap.

Okay, so last year did turn out better than we worrywarts would have imagined. The economy's ability to withstand energy-price spikes, hurricanes and the Republican political meltdown was truly impressive. And yesterday's New Year rally on Wall Street demonstrated the widespread desire to believe in macroeconomic magic.

But reduce it to its bare essentials, and the story of 2005 was that oil producers proved just as willing to lend us the money to buy oil that we otherwise could not afford as the Japanese and Chinese have been to lend us the money to buy cars, jeans and flat-screen TVs. The arrival of this newest credit card from the Middle East may have allowed us to live above our means for yet another year. But let's not fall into the trap of confusing that with long-term economic health.

While the signals coming from the economic pundocracy may be solid green, the ones coming recently from the marketplace are flashing yellow. A middling Christmas season for retailers. A bicoastal housing boom that has already begun to abate, with an initial 10 to 15 percent drop in prices from speculative highs. A stock market that couldn't sustain a year-end rally despite record profits. A bond-market yield curve that makes it no more expensive to borrow money at a fixed rate for 30 years as for one year.

Other warning signs: A corporate sector unable to find a more profitable use for its record retained earnings than buying up its own stock or overpaying for questionable acquisitions. Hedge funds so flush with cash that they are lending money into a commercial real estate bubble, bidding up the price of gold and financing hostile takeovers. Pay packages for corporate executives and investment bankers up 30 percent in a year in which investors were lucky to eke out a 3 percent gain.

This is not to argue the economy is hurtling toward a crackup. The strength of the economy over the past year -- indeed, over the past 23 years, during which there have been but two relatively shallow recessions -- speaks eloquently of the resilience that comes with the globalization of trade and capital flows.

At the same time, I have a hard time squaring so many disquieting realities with a consensus forecast that has the economy gliding into some magical macroeconomic equilibrium.

A more likely scenario, it seems to me, is a 2006 in which the economic chickens finally come home to roost. Annual growth rates will fall from their current 3.7 percent to somewhere below 2 percent before the final quarter as government deficits are trimmed and households stop spending down their home equity. Inflation will reach 3.5 percent as key workers finally demand their fair share of productivity gains, health care and commodity prices continue to rise, higher energy costs work their way into the economy, and import prices spike in response to another steep drop in the value of the dollar. As economic growth slows, stocks will continue to drift sideways, snuffing out a nascent boom in corporate capital expenditures. Meanwhile, the long bull market in bonds will finally end as interest rates rise -- the result of heightened inflation expectations, continued monetary tightening by the Fed and a newfound reluctance of foreigners to invest their trade surpluses in dollar-denominated Treasury bonds.

The one likely bright spot in this scenario is the export sector, both manufacturing and service, which will benefit from a weaker dollar, continued robust growth in China, India, Eastern Europe and Latin America, and a revived Japanese economy.

DOJ_NMG_0008135

At the same time, additional risks include excessive lending to developing countries, a restructuring of the U.S. auto industry, a hit to corporate profits as a result of tighter pension rules and a banking crisis triggered by a collapse of several highly leveraged hedge funds. All of these are risks that Washington policymakers could address but in an hotly-contested election year probably won't.

Will things play out exactly this way? Surely not. But if history is any guide, the odds in favor of it are no worse, and probably a bit better, than the remarkably rosy scenario embraced by Washington and Wall Street.

Waiting For A Soft Landing (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

At year's end I usually scan a stack of economic reports to see what lies ahead. Well, folks, according to most forecasts, we're headed for a swell year -- though a boring one. Typical is the forecast from the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development in Paris. In 2006 the U.S. economy should grow 3.5 percent (about the same as in 2005), it says. Unemployment drops from today's 5 percent to 4.8 percent. Inflation remains tame, at 2.5 percent. The world economy also does well; international trade expands 9 percent.

All this good news is, of course, bad for the news business. The sunny predictions suggest two familiar economic catchphrases: "soft landing" and "Goldilocks economy." The Federal Reserve stops raising interest rates before it causes a recession; that's the soft landing. Economic growth is then fast enough to keep unemployment low and not so fast as to trigger higher inflation; that's the Goldilocks economy, not too hot or too cold.

Could anything darken the outlook? Here are five candidates:

Housing goes bust. Higher mortgage rates have already dampened demand and prices. From 5.6 percent in June, rates on 30-year fixed mortgages have increased to 6.3 percent. They may reach 6.7 percent by year-end 2006, says Orawin Velz of the Mortgage Bankers Association. A "bust" would involve sinking prices after some big gains: about 25 percent over the past two years. That could depress consumer confidence and spending. If rates on adjustable-rate mortgages (more than half of new loans in 2004) rose sharply, more homeowners might miss monthly payments. But most forecasts aren't glum. For 2006 the mortgage bankers expect average housing prices to rise 6 percent, almost equaling the increase in personal income.

The dollar "crashes." In 2005 the U.S. trade deficit was $712 billion, estimates Moody's Economy.com. That's up from $624 billion in 2004. The willingness of foreigners -- including central banks in China and elsewhere -- to invest their surplus dollars in American stocks and bonds raises U.S. share prices and reduces U.S. interest rates. A dollar sell-off could do the opposite, hurting housing (above) and consumer spending. Though plausible, similar warnings in the past were never borne out.

General Motors files for bankruptcy. Bankrupt Delphi -- GM's biggest parts supplier -- and the United Auto Workers are negotiating tensely over Delphi's demands for deep wage and benefit cuts. If the UAW were to strike, GM might also shut down and suffer massive losses. A four-month strike could cost GM $20 billion, estimates Jonathan Steinmetz of Morgan Stanley. GM would still have to pay workers and outstanding supplier bills. GM itself might file for bankruptcy. Because everyone -- GM, Delphi and the UAW -- has so much to lose, Steinmetz doubts a doomsday outcome. Delphi, the UAW and GM will settle.

Oil jumps to $85 a barrel. Energy economist Philip K. Verleger Jr. thinks prices could rise up to 25 percent from 2005's peaks, driven partly by a scramble for low-sulfur oil to meet stiffer U.S. air pollution rules for cars and trucks. Supply disruptions or refinery outages could also create scarcities. Still, the U.S. Energy Information Administration predicts steady prices of $63 a barrel for West Texas Intermediate crude -- roughly even with the second half of 2005. Nariman Behravesh of Global Insight sees $57 WTI by the year-end.

The "yield curve" of interest rates "inverts." An inversion means that short-term interest rates (say, on three-month Treasury bills) exceed longer-term interest rates (say, on 10-year Treasury bonds). Usually, short-term rates are lower, because the risk of lending for lengthier periods is greater. Since 1965 interest-rate inversions have occurred seven times -- and recessions have followed in five, notes Bill Dudley of Goldman Sachs. The reason: An inversion signals tight money. In 2006 Dudley expects another inversion as the Fed raises short-term rates. But he thinks we'll escape a recession, because the overall level of rates will remain low.

There are other potential pitfalls. Will China's surging economy produce an unpleasant surprise? Will the replacement of Alan Greenspan with Ben Bernanke go smoothly? But the larger story of the U.S. economy has been that it continually overcomes many reasons for it to falter. Consumers have spent freely, drawing money from appreciated stocks or homes. From 1995 to 2005 consumer spending rose an average of 3.8 percent annually, notes Susan Sterne of Economic Analysis Associates. That may cool with the housing boom.

DOJ_NMG_0008136

But something else will fill the gap. So say the standard forecasts. They're often right when predicting small shifts in the status quo. But they usually miss big changes, for good or ill. If something truly bad happens in 2006, you probably won't read about it first. Happy New Year.

Bush Backs Perry, But McClellan's For Mom (Hchron)

By julie mason

Houston Chronicle, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Texas governor's race is just getting started and already White House loyalties are divided, with President Bush backing Gov. Rick Perry and White House spokesman Scott McClellan supporting his mother, Carole Keeton Strayhorn.

"The president will support the Republican nominee, and it's pretty clear the Republican nominee will be his friend, Rick Perry," McClellan said today.

Strayhorn, the Texas comptroller elected as a Republican, announced Monday that she will run as an independent in the governor's race.

The White House spokesman is the youngest of her four sons.

"My mother cares deeply about Texas, and she has my full support," McClellan said.

By running as an independent, Strayhorn avoids facing the incumbent in a GOP primary battle that tends to favor the more conservative candidate.

Strayhorn, campaigning as "one tough grandma," said she is still a Republican and understands Bush's decision to support Perry.

Perry, who like Strayhorn was once a Democrat, served as lieutenant governor when Bush was governor.

"I respect what he's got to do, he is still my good friend," Strayhorn said of Bush during a campaign swing around the state. "He's got to do what he's got to do. My focus is Texas."

The president generally refrains from making endorsements in contested Republican primary races, but Perry did not draw a primary opponent this year. So Strayhorn's decision to run as an independent saves Bush from having to answer a lot of awkward questions about his choice in the primary.

"The president considers my mother a friend," McClellan said.

Before joining the White House staff in 2001, McClellan ran his mother's 1996 campaign for Texas railroad commissioner and her 1998 comptroller's race.

He said he has no plans to vacate his podium in the West Wing to help out his mother's campaign this year.

Instead, McClellan's brother, Brad, a former assistant Texas state attorney general, is running their mother's gubernatorial campaign.

Brad's twin, Dudley, is an attorney. Strayhorn's other son, Mark McClellan, is the administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services in the Bush administration.

"I am so pleased and proud of all my sons," Strayhorn said today. Bush is planning to actively campaign for Republican candidates this year. But his early backing of Perry probably won't be significant in the Texas race, said University of Houston political scientist Richard Murray.

"It would be huge news if he didn't support Perry," Murray said. "It's what you expected, and it will be marginally helpful for Perry. But it's only news if the president is breaking with someone from his own party."

Also running for governor as an independent is satirist Kinky Friedman. Former U.S. Reps. Chris Bell of Houston and Bob Gammage are the Democratic primary candidates.

Although he is supporting his mother in spirit, the White House spokesman can't actually vote for her. McClellan is registered to vote in Virginia.

Weld Is Criticized By D'Amato (NYT)

By Patrick D. Healy

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

Alfonse M. D'Amato, the former senator, sharply criticized a leading Republican candidate for governor, William F. Weld, saying last night that Mr. Weld was under the "cloud" of a federal investigation for once running a "sham college."

Mr. D'Amato, a Republican, also chastised Mr. Weld for resigning as governor of Massachusetts in 1997, before his second term was over, and then seeking to lead New York "without any real experience here."

DOJ_NMG_0008137

Speaking on NY1, where he is a paid commentator, Mr. D'Amato acknowledged that he did not feel "kindly" toward Mr. Weld, given that Mr. Weld had led the Justice Department's criminal division around the time that officials there began investigating Mr. D'Amato's brother, Armand, a lobbyist.

"You want to come and be the governor of New York without any real experience here, but you've got experience down in Tennessee running this institution that's being investigated up and down," Mr. D'Amato said. "It doesn't sound to me that this is the time and place, not with this cloud."

Mr. D'Amato also said that Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who is seeking the Democratic nomination for governor, had done an "excellent" job in office.

Mr. D'Amato said Mr. Weld would have trouble explaining the "multimillion dollar looting" of Decker College in Kentucky, which collapsed in bankruptcy last fall after federal officials cut off student loan aid because of mismanagement concerns.

Mr. Weld was Decker's chief executive from last January to October. Mr. Weld has said that federal prosecutors have told his lawyer that he was not being investigated.

Spokesmen for Mr. Weld and the state Republican Party declined to comment last night. Mr. Weld did not return a telephone message.

Kaine's Transportation Forums Yield Much Talk, Little Consensus (WP)

By Steven Ginsberg

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

Gov.-elect Timothy M. Kaine has spent the two months since his election gathering Virginians to discuss the traffic congestion problems that plague much of the state, but the forums, including one last night in Fairfax County, have failed to yield a consensus for any new action.

After talking with thousands of people about transportation issues in his most visible effort to prepare for the governorship, Kaine (D) remains committed to the proposals he outlined during the election campaign. He has used the 10 town hall meetings across the state more as a listening tour than as a forum to promote ideas.

The well-attended forums highlighted both the significance of traffic congestion in the lives of Virginians and the conflicting opinions on how to ease it.

"Everyone agrees there's a problem. No one seems to agree what the solutions are, and these meetings haven't gotten us there," said Prince William Board of County Supervisors Chairman Sean T. Connaughton (R), who attended a town hall in Manassas in November.

During his campaign, Kaine said he would ensure that money designated for roads and rails is not diverted to other priorities and pledged to help localities gain more power to regulate development and control traffic congestion.

Spokeswoman Delacey Skinner said Kaine intends to submit a plan in about two weeks that would primarily focus on those issues. The General Assembly convenes next Wednesday, and Kaine will be inaugurated Jan. 14.

Skinner said the town halls have given Kaine a chance to get "a very good sense of how urgent the problem is across the state."

Others said the urgency has been apparent for some time.

"Everybody knows what the priorities are," said Del. R. Steven Landes (R-Augusta), chairman of the House Republican Caucus. "I'm kind of befuddled about what his ideas are and what he wants to do. I guess it's almost like he's expecting the public to come up with a solution for transportation. He may be building momentum, but most people want to know what the plan is."

Fairfax Board Chairman Gerald E. Connolly (D) said the town halls are "building up a head of steam and putting pressure on members of the General Assembly." But he also said that "there have been very few specifics, and it would be nice if we heard more of that."

Landes said House leaders will present a transportation package that includes a proposal to increase fines for chronically bad drivers and that seeks to designate surplus state revenue for new projects. He added that House members oppose higher taxes, potentially setting up a showdown with the Senate, where members proposed a tax increase two years ago to pay for billions of dollars in transportation projects.

As at all the other town hall meetings, Northern Virginians at George Mason High School in Falls Church last night offered Kaine a range of often contradictory ideas for how best to release motorists from their traffic headaches. Some said expansion of Metro transit was critical, while others said widening roads was a must. Many said it was necessary to raise taxes to pay for projects; others preferred tolls or private-sector investment.

About the only thing the crowd of about 500 commuters, politicians, activists and others shared was a sentiment that something needs to be done -- and quickly -- to ease the daily frustration of getting around in Northern Virginia.

DOJ_NMG_0008138

"We need to address this issue and address it early," Kaine told them. "We just can't wait, because it gets tougher and tougher."

Several of the speakers praised Kaine's efforts to link land use and transportation.

"I highly applaud your stance. . . . We should definitely look at the impact [of development] on public facilities infrastructure," said Amy Tozzi of McLean.

The town halls and the focus on transportation have defined Kaine's time since Election Day, beginning with a pledge on the morning after his Nov. 8 victory to widen Interstate 66 inside the Capital Beltway and build a rail line to Dulles International Airport.

His town hall tour, which has attracted hundreds of frustrated commuters at nearly every site, started in Roanoke eight days after the election. It has included stops in Newport News, suburban Richmond, Manassas, Leesburg and Fredericksburg. Last night's was his first in Fairfax, the state's largest jurisdiction, and will be followed by a last one tomorrow in Virginia Beach.

At the forums and elsewhere, Kaine has repeatedly said that transportation problems are at a "crisis" stage and that he is targeting the 2006 General Assembly session as the time to make major improvements.

If the meetings have brightened the spotlight on transportation, they have done little to bring Virginians closer to agreement on what kinds of fixes to make and how to pay for them.

The crowd in Falls Church concentrated on the need for better transit service, a focus different from many of the other meetings.

"I'm very frustrated by the poor solutions we have for public transportation," said Jay Baker of Arlington County. "I wonder why there are so many miles of free roads and yet every passenger pays for every mile on Metro."

The town halls have also heightened the debate between those who see roads as essential to business growth and those who see them as generating suburban sprawl.

And in some cases, they have appeared to make prospects for change more difficult. At the Newport News meeting, commuters tallied a long list of reasons they don't want another water crossing in Hampton Roads, something state officials have labeled as vital and have been eagerly trying to build.

Gov. To Start Repaying Schools (LAT)

By Evan Halper And Duke Helfand

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger offered an olive branch to educators Tuesday with a proposal to begin repaying money the state borrowed from schools in recent years to balance the budget.

The plan to give schools about $1.7 billion extra — paid for with unanticipated state revenue — will be part of the budget Schwarzenegger proposes next week. It signals an effort to patch up his shredded relationship with the state's major education groups as he seeks reelection in November.

"We have the money this year to give it to the education community," the governor told reporters after administration officials announced the proposal. "They deserve it."

The move comes eight weeks after Schwarzenegger ended a vigorous campaign for Proposition 76, which would have capped state spending and cost schools billions. That item, rejected by voters in the November special election, had prompted school groups to bankroll a series of bruising television ads that helped send the governor's approval rating plummeting.

Educators emerged from a meeting with Schwarzenegger on Tuesday to laud him for seeking common ground. But they said they're entitled to billions more; that his plan shortchanges schools of money they contributed to closing budget deficits in each of the last two years.

"This is a good start," said Scott Plotkin, executive director of the California School Boards Assn. "I think he's moving in the right direction."

But Plotkin said that although education groups "are not looking for another fight," they believe the state owes local districts $3.8 billion more.

School officials were also skeptical about the strings attached to Schwarzenegger's proposal: The governor wants some of the new money directed to his pet projects. Those include vocational education classes; grants to pay for new art, music and physical education programs; teacher training; and tutoring to help high school students pass exit exams.

"It's not always about how much money but how do you spend the money," he said.

Plotkin said local school officials are in a better position than the state to apportion the money effectively. Schools don't have the funds to pay for many of their students' most basic needs, he and others say, and they would rather be able to spend the money on such things as books and class-size reduction.

DOJ_NMG_0008139

Still, officials in the Los Angeles Unified School District welcomed the news that more money could be on the way. The district has weathered years of deep budget cuts.

Supt. Roy Romer said he would use additional state funds to reduce the size of middle school and high school math classes, many of which now hover at about 40 students. The money could also help cover escalating healthcare costs, he said.

"This is a step in the right direction. I'm encouraged by it," Romer said. "It's not the whole package. But it's going down the road a step. Obviously, the governor is trying to make up for the deal he did not keep before, and I applaud that effort."

That deal was made after the governor took office in fall 2003, as he struggled to balance his first budget. Schools agreed to give up $2 billion they were owed under voter-approved spending formulas in return for his pledge that all the money would be restored in coming years.

A year later, the state still had a deficit, and Schwarzenegger kept the reduction in place. Now, as the 2006-07 budget is readied, educators say the tab has grown to $5.5 billion — the amount schools would get if they had been fully funded since 2004.

Schwarzenegger has made several recent moves that position him closer to the political center as he prepares to launch his reelection campaign in earnest. He has also announced that he wants to cancel a scheduled tuition increase at state colleges and universities, raise the minimum wage and help Californians buy cheaper medicines.

In his State of the State address Thursday, he is expected to announce plans for a large borrowing program to improve transportation systems, hospitals, ports and levees. Tuesday he told reporters the money could also be used to build thousands of new schools and modernize others.

Legislative leaders, meanwhile, said they were encouraged by the education funding plan.

"This is a very positive step for the governor," said Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez (D-Los Angeles). "It does a lot to rebuild his relationship with us."

Nuñez, who in the past has sharply criticized the governor's education agenda, suggested that the Legislature and administration could devise a plan to pay back $5.5 billion over several years. If so, he said, "the sky might clear itself of the partisan bickering we dealt with last year," he said.

Administration officials, who contend that the governor never committed to paying that amount, said they are willing to talk about future funding.

Today, Schwarzenegger will visit a Los Angeles school to highlight a ballot initiative that he successfully championed before he was governor to fund after-school activities for students all over California. The measure is scheduled to take effect in the coming fiscal year, when the state will be required to spend $428 million for the program.

Nuñez and Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) say the state cannot afford the program, and they would like to put a measure on the ballot suspending it. "Voters approved this when the state had the money to pay for it," Nuñez said, but that is no longer the case.

In History Lesson, Less Can Be More (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

It was just seven years ago, but for high school students, President Bill Clinton's impeachment is literally a subject for the history books.

Today's high school seniors were 10 or 11 at the height of the scandal, and today's middle-schoolers were approaching or entering first grade.

"This is very difficult for everybody, because it's so fresh," said Gilbert T. Sewall, director of the American Textbook Council, an independent group that reviews history texts. "It's easier to nail down history like the transcontinental railroad. With Clinton, you're dealing with material that has by no means been settled."

The House impeached Clinton on charges of lying to a federal grand jury and obstructing justice to conceal his affair with Monica S. Lewinsky, who was a White House intern when the relationship began. Clinton, who was acquitted in a Senate trial, was the second president impeached for conduct in office.

The impeachment is portrayed in the context of his two-term tenure -- a milestone event, but not one that overshadows how Clinton handled the economy, crime and health care.

The most commonly used texts give straightforward recaps of Clinton's toughest days, with some flavor of how it affected the nation. Absent are any lurid details about his relationship with Lewinsky that spiced up news reports and late-night talk shows as the scandal and impeachment played out in 1998 and early 1999.

"It should not be in the book for titillating purposes or settling scores," said Alan Brinkley, the Columbia University provost who has written or contributed to several history textbooks. "It should be in the book because of its significance to our recent history."

DOJ_NMG_0008140

The impeachment is covered briefly in middle school texts. "The American Journey," published by McGraw-Hill, offers a description that is representative of other accounts. "Although there was general agreement that the president had lied, Congress was divided over whether his actions justified impeachment," the book says.

In "The Americans," a high school text published by McDougal Littell, the topic merits two paragraphs. The same book gave more space to the impeachment of Andrew Johnson in 1868. "The American Vision," a McGraw-Hill high school book written by Brinkley and others, has five paragraphs on Clinton's impeachment and one on his legacy.

"Compression is a tremendous challenge," Brinkley said. "Five paragraphs on a topic is a lot for all but the most important issues."

"A History of the United States," a high school text published by Pearson Prentice Hall, refers to the impeachment scandal as "a sorry mess" that diminished Clinton and his rivals. Polls showed most Americans did not believe Clinton's "tortured explanations of his behavior," the book says, but also did not think his offenses warranted his removal.

By the time students get to college, the textbooks offer more sophisticated detail of the impeachment and the way it all changed American public life.

Yet at all levels, the salacious details of the Lewinsky affair are nowhere to be found.

Middle school texts describe it as "a personal relationship between the president and a White House intern." High school books describe it as Clinton's "improper relationship with a young White House intern" or say Clinton "denied having sexual relations" with an intern.

Students don't need the details to grasp the impeachment struggle, said Allan J. Lichtman, a presidential historian and professor at American University. But they do need textbooks that present the issue with as much depth as is practical, he said.

"The books not only influence the students, they influence the teachers," he said. "And given that many students don't go on to college -- and even those who do may not revisit the material -- the textbook may be their most significant impression."

Women Start 1st Islamic Sorority (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

America's first Islamic sorority is more about God than being Greek.

There will be no beer at Gamma Gamma Chi functions, in obedience to Islamic law, nor will there be group fraternizing with the opposite sex.

"Partying is allowed in Islam, but it's how you party," said Althia Collins, an Alexandria businesswoman who has helped create it. "You can have fun with girls and it doesn't have to include men."

Thirteen women at the University of Kentucky will form the sorority's first college chapter this spring, and another group is waiting to start at the University of Maryland's Baltimore campus. A citywide chapter in the District, made up of women from several local universities, is also in the works.

Along with pledges, there will be prayer to Allah. Instead of hazing, there's hijab, the scarf some devout Muslim women wear. Covering one's hair is not mandated within Gamma Gamma Chi; in fact, four out of the five board members do not wear one.

Mrs. Collins' daughter, Imani Abdul-Haqq, came up with concept for Gamma Gamma Chi while rushing sororities at Guilford College in Greensboro, N.C.

As Mrs. Abdul-Haqq entered the room wearing her scarf, "They looked at her like she had three heads," Mrs. Collins said.

Plus, a lot of sororities had Christian roots or began meetings with a Christian prayer, which discomfited the daughter, who converted to Islam in 1999. Since then, she has designed a line of Islamic wear, including T-shirts for women with slogans like "Real Women Pray" and "NO, I am not oppressed."

Mrs. Collins has contributed $50,000 in cash or in-kind services to start up the sorority, and Mrs. Abdul-Haqq chose the Greek letters Gamma Gamma Chi because together they mean "women on earth for a period of time," dovetailing with Islamic teaching.

Although Gamma Gamma Chi is open to all, no non-Muslims have joined to date. But other Muslims have reacted well, Mrs. Abdul-Haqq said.

"They think it's due time we have a organization like this for Muslim women," she said, "which helps them grow as women, leaders and part of many communities. It also gives them a chance to network."

They've had inquiries from Sunni, Shi'ite and the Nation of Islam women.

Before joining, members must recite a creed, learn the sorority song and take part in a secret induction ceremony that deals with "the values of the sorority" such as sisterhood and philanthropy.

DOJ_NMG_0008141

Mrs. Collins converted in 1998, having grown up with a Baptist father and a mother who attended an African Methodist Episcopal Zion church. She began trying other churches during college, then, feeling restless, began investigating other faiths.

She began reading evangelistic texts about Islam during a visit to her sister, who had converted years before. Islam, she decided, appealed to her intellect, whereas Christianity seemed more concerned with the emotions.

"Besides," she said, "I really did not understand the Trinity."

To date, Gamma Gamma Chi has heard from young women in 18 states, Pakistan and the United Arab Emirates.

"I thought this was something revolutionary," Mrs. Collins said. "We are building a sorority established on the tradition of the sunnas; the ways of the prophet [Mohammed]."

Iran To Resume Its Nuclear Work; U.S. Warns Of Seeking Restraints (New York Times)

By Elaine Sciolino

New York Times, January 4, 2006

PARIS, Jan. 3 - Iran announced Tuesday that it planned to restart nuclear research, a move that jeopardized an agreement with the Europeans, complicated a Russian initiative and prompted an American threat.

The decision, contained in a brief letter delivered Tuesday to the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, declared that Iran "has decided to resume" research and development "on the peaceful nuclear energy program" that was suspended under an agreement with France, Germany and Britain in late 2004.

The letter did not define the research, but said the activities would resume Monday and be conducted "in accordance with Iran's safeguards agreement" with the I.A.E.A., the nuclear monitoring agency of the United Nations.

"Research" has been a code word for experiments in enrichment of uranium at the previously secret facility at Natanz in central Iran. There is particular concern that Iran intends to reopen that site, perhaps to conduct modest enrichment experiments or even to manufacture and assemble centrifuges for enrichment, the most sensitive part of the nuclear fuel cycle.

Iran's move complicates a Russian initiative to break the deadlock over whether Iran has the right to enrich uranium. Russia has proposed that Iran be allowed to conduct uranium enrichment activities in Russia, as a way to guarantee that Iran's nuclear program is peaceful. A delegation from Moscow is scheduled to arrive in Tehran for talks this weekend, although Iranian officials have been less than enthusiastic about the proposal.

The United States warned Iran that it could face unspecified consequences if it resumed nuclear activities. "If Iran takes any further enrichment-related steps, the international community will have to consider additional measures to restrain Iran's nuclear ambitions," said Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman.

After receiving the letter, I.A.E.A. officials described its contents to representatives of the 35 countries that make up its board, which could censure Iran by referring its case to the United Nations Security Council.

Iran has argued consistently that its decision to enter into an agreement with the Europeans to suspend all uranium conversion and enrichment activities was temporary, not required under its international treaty obligations and dependent on receiving a broad range of economic, technological, political and security incentives which it said have not been forthcoming. It has also insisted repeatedly that it has a sovereign right to develop the nuclear fuel cycle in its own territory.

Indeed, in defending Iran's decision, the letter said that the suspension of the country's nuclear-related activities under the European agreement had been "voluntary and non-legally binding."

But the United States, and to an increasing extent the Europeans, are convinced that Iran is determined to become a nuclear power and have taken a forceful stance in trying to ban Iran from conducting any nuclear activity that could help in a weapons program.

This most recent decision is certain to further erode foreign confidence in Iran's leadership.

The Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has faced broad international condemnation recently for his inflammatory statements that the Holocaust is a myth and that Israel should be "wiped off the map." On Sunday, Mr. Ahmadinejad said Europe had decided to create Israel as a "Jewish camp" in the midst of Muslim countries as the best way to rid Europe of Jews.

Last August, Iran angered its European negotiating partners and the United States when it resumed the process of converting uranium at its site at Isfahan, a clear violation of the European agreement, but only a preliminary step in mastering the nuclear fuel cycle.

Criticism of Iran's decision to restart nuclear research and development activities was swift.

Besides the American threat, a statement from the British Foreign Office called Iran's letter "unhelpful and provocative," while Cristina Gallach, a spokeswoman for the European Union, branded it "a step in the wrong direction."

France called on Iran to reverse its decision. "We want Iran to abide by the suspension of all activities related to enrichment and reprocessing," a Foreign Ministry spokesman, Jean-Baptiste Mattei, told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0008142

Mohamed ElBaradei, the director of the nuclear agency, also called on Iran in a statement to maintain "its suspension of all enrichment-related activity as a key confidence-building measure" and to resolve other issues about its nuclear program.

The I.A.E.A. has repeatedly criticized Iran for failing to fully cooperate with requests to open certain facilities to its inspectors.

The agency has summoned Iranian officials to a meeting in Vienna on Wednesday to explain their intentions on research.

In a proposal presented last spring to the three European governments, Iran outlined steps that it said would advance its nuclear program, while providing assurances that its program was peaceful. Among the proposals was the installation of 3,000 centrifuges at Natanz.

On Monday, the head of the national security commission in Parliament, Alaeddin Borujerdi, said in Tehran that Iran was "determined" to reactivate the Natanz facility.

Iran could be gambling that even if it restarts nuclear research activities, it would once again avoid international sanctions. Despite threats by both the United States and the Europeans to refer Iran to the Security Council for punitive action after it resumed activities at Isfahan, the countries were forced to back down in the face of opposition from China and Russia, which each have veto power there.

In Tehran on Tuesday, Mohammad Saeedi, the deputy head of the atomic energy agency, said on state television that Iran would resume research, without providing details.

He stressed that the research "has no connection with the production of nuclear fuel," but did not specify whether that ruled out all activities related to uranium enrichment.

He also portrayed the decision as one of national self-interest, explaining that the suspension of key nuclear activities under the agreement with the Europeans had hurt Iran. "During this period our experts incurred heavy losses and many of our researchers have lost their jobs," he said.

The letter to the I.A.E.A., which was signed with a scrawl, but without a typed name identifying the official, was written on stationery of the Permanent Mission of Iran to the United Nations in Vienna.

Parts of the letter were quoted in an I.A.E.A. news release while other parts were disclosed by a European diplomat who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the fears surrounding the nuclear issue.

US Warns Iran Against Resuming Nuclear Research (REU)

Reuters, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The United States on Tuesday warned Iran against resuming atomic fuel research and development which it said would further Tehran's efforts to build nuclear bombs.

"If Iran takes any further enrichment-related steps, the international community will have to consider additional measures to restrain Iran's nuclear ambitions," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

The United States suspects research and development work that Tehran said would restart on January 9 could help what Washington believes is its pursuit of a nuclear bomb, he told reporters.

Iran denies seeking nuclear weapons.

The United States has been pressing for months for Iran to be referred to the United Nations Security Council for possible sanctions because it says Iran has failed to dispel suspicions it is building a nuclear bomb.

International resistance to such a move has gradually been eroding as Iran has taken an increasingly hard line insisting on its right to develop peaceful nuclear programs to generate power.

Earlier on Tuesday, Iran said it would resume nuclear research and development which it suspended two years ago to defuse international pressure over its atomic ambitions.

Such work may include the manufacture and assembly of centrifuges used for uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of the nuclear fuel cycle. It could also include some small-scale enrichment tests.

Diplomats said Tuesday's move, which follows Iran's resumption of uranium conversion in August, was a serious blow to diplomatic efforts to resolve the dispute.

Iran Says It Will Restart Nuclear Fuel Research (LAT)

By Maggie Farley And Tyler Marshall

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

UNITED NATIONS — Iran announced Tuesday that it would resume nuclear fuel research next week, provoking new concern from the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog agency and nations, including the United States, that are convinced Tehran is trying to build nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0008143

Iran delivered a letter to the International Atomic Energy Agency on Tuesday saying its nuclear body planned to resume research and development on its "peaceful nuclear energy program" on Jan. 9, ending a voluntary suspension of such activities since late 2003. In August, Iran restarted its work on the process to convert raw uranium into gas, and Tuesday's announcement was seen by some as an inflammatory effort to raise the stakes before another round of talks with European diplomats on Jan. 18.

"It has all the makings of another crisis," said a Western diplomat familiar with the negotiations. "Step by step, they are moving towards their goal. When will the Europeans say enough is enough?"

The letter did not specify what kind of research activities would be restarted, and IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei has asked Iran for clarification. In September, the nuclear agency's board of governors passed a resolution warning Iran that resumption of any enrichment and reprocessing activities would open the door to punitive action. Enrichment of the gas produces nuclear fuel that can be used in a civilian reactor or as material for a bomb.

The deputy chief of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization said Tuesday that the activities would not include enrichment of uranium at this time. "That will be a separate issue on which no decision has been made," Mohammed Saeedi told Iranian state television.

Iranian officials this week asked the IAEA to remove seals and cameras from a nuclear facility at Natanz to allow work to resume. The U.N. agency had installed them when Iran agreed to the suspension.

Although the work at Natanz may not prove to be a technical violation, Western diplomats who have been negotiating to keep Iran's nuclear program in check view the announcement as provocative. Both U.S. and European diplomats reacted sharply to Iran's statement.

At a routine briefing Tuesday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack noted the IAEA was seeking clarification on the announcement. He warned that Iran could face punitive measures if any of its research activities were found to relate to uranium enrichment.

For more than two years, the Bush administration has been trying to persuade allies to refer Iran to the U.N. Security Council, where it could face political and economic sanctions. Tehran's declaration could bolster America's case.

"Our view is that if Iran takes any further enrichment-related steps, the international community will have to consider additional measures to constrain Iran's nuclear ambitions," McCormack told reporters. "Iran is trying to pursue nuclear weapons under the cover of a peaceful nuclear program."

He accused Iran of trying to drag out talks with Britain, France and Germany aimed at providing Tehran with peaceful nuclear energy, while attempting to develop its own expertise that it could use to build weapons. Those talks were suspended last summer after Iran declared it would resume a process of converting uranium into a gaseous substance — a key step toward enrichment.

In Paris, French Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei urged Tehran to hold to its earlier commitment to suspend "all enrichment and reprocessing activities."

The official also urged Tehran to seriously consider a Russian offer to guarantee a supply of safeguarded enriched uranium for the life of Iran's first civilian nuclear reactor nearing completion at Bushehr.

"We consider the time is short now, and that it is up to Iran to take the necessary decisions to relaunch a process of negotiations," Mattei said.

Tehran has sent mixed messages on the Russian proposal and a Foreign Ministry spokesman appeared to reject it Tuesday, saying that Iran wanted to keep control of the enrichment process.

Nonproliferation specialists in Washington viewed Tehran's announcement as the latest step in a strategy to gradually expand nuclear activities it had pledged to suspend, while stopping short of calling off the negotiations.

"Having pushed the envelope last year on uranium conversion and getting no resistance, they are trying to push again to get more," said Jon Wolfsthal, a nuclear nonproliferation specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

"The Iranians have calculated they can do anything shy of enrichment," he said.

Iran Announces Resumption Of Research On Nuclear Fuel (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr In Tehran

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

Iran said on Tuesday it would resume nuclear research, a move that is likely to provoke international concern.

Mohammad Saeedi, deputy to Iran's Atomic Energy Organisation, told state television the "resumption of research on nuclear fuel technology" had been notified to the International Atomic Energy Agency [IAEA] yesterday and would recommence within a couple of days. “Research has nothing to do with nuclear fuel production and is a separate issue, while no decision has yet been made about it [the latter],” Mr Saeedi said.

DOJ_NMG_0008144

Mohamed ElBaradei, the IAEA secretary-general, informed the 35 countries on the UN watchdog agency’s board that it had received a note from Iran and was seeking clarification.

The US responded on by warning Iran against resuming atomic fuel research, saying it could help what Washington believes is Tehran’s pursuit of a nuclear weapon, Sean McCormack, State Department spokesman, said. “If Iran takes any further enrichment-related steps, the international community will have to consider additional measures to restrain Iran’s nuclear ambitions,” he said, without specifying what action the US might take.

Negotiations between Iran and the EU3 – Britain, France and Germany — collapsed in August after Iran rejected a European offer of incentives to abandon all its nuclear enrichment activities and resumed conversion activities at the Isfahan plant. Iran maintains that its nuclear work aims only to generate electricity.

A European diplomat in Tehran said the announcement was “vague” on the “nature and extent” of research activities. “If it’s related to enrichment activities it is very serious and a breach of IAEA resolution [in November].”

Last month, the EU held “talks about talks” with Iran in Vienna in an effort to woo Iran back to the negotiating table. Further talks are scheduled this month.

“Iran’s decision [on research] is because the two sides are setting a new base, a new agenda and new commitments for the new round of talks,” a senior Iranian official said. “The assembly of centrifuges could be Iran’s next step.” Part of the research might take place in Natanz, the main site for enrichment, he suggested.

As a way out of the impasse, Russia has proposed that Iran could enrich uranium on its soil and transfer the fuel to Iran for use in its nuclear plants. Iran has been careful not to reject the proposal outright in order to keep Russia on its side.

Tehran Will Restart Nuclear Fuel Research (WT/REU)

By Paul Hughes

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

TEHRAN -- Iran announced yesterday that it would resume atomic fuel research and development next week, raising the specter of a new showdown with the West, which suspects that Tehran wants nuclear technology to build bombs.

The news coincided with strong hints from Iran's Foreign Ministry that Tehran would reject a Russian compromise proposal aimed at defusing Iran's nuclear row with the West.

The two developments were likely to spark renewed calls from Washington and the European Union for the case to be referred to the U.N. Security Council, which could impose political or economic sanctions.

"The Atomic Energy Organization of Iran has decided to resume from Jan. 9, 2006, [research and development] on the peaceful nuclear energy program which was suspended," Iran said in a note delivered to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in Vienna, Austria.

Diplomats said the move, which follows Iran's resumption of uranium conversion in August, was a serious blow to diplomatic efforts to resolve the dispute over Iran's nuclear program.

"This does not help the process," said an EU diplomat, referring to efforts by the EU trio of Britain, Germany and France to find a negotiated solution to the standoff.

The United States yesterday warned Iran against resuming atomic fuel research.

"If Iran takes any further enrichment-related steps, the international community will have to consider additional measures to restrain Iran's nuclear ambitions," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington.

The United States has been pressing for months for Iran to be referred to the Security Council for sanctions because it says Iran has failed to dispel suspicions that it is building a nuclear bomb.

A resumption of nuclear research and development, frozen voluntarily by Iran two years ago to defuse international pressure over its atomic ambitions, could include the manufacture and assembly of centrifuges used for uranium enrichment, the most sensitive part of the nuclear fuel cycle. It could also include some small-scale enrichment tests.

The IAEA found in 2003 that Iran had conducted considerable clandestine research, including enrichment tests and centrifuge assembly, since the mid-1980s. But the agency has not detected any clear proof that Tehran wants to build atomic weapons.

A Security Council referral vote could be held at the next meeting of the IAEA's 35-nation governing board, scheduled for March 6. At its last session in November, the board opted to put off any vote to give time for Russia's proposal to bear fruit.

IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei urged Iran to cooperate more with his agency and to keep diplomatic channels open. Meanwhile, he urged Iran to take "measures to build confidence and enable the resumption of dialogue with all concerned parties."

DOJ_NMG_0008145

Iran, which says its nuclear program will be used only for peaceful purposes, voluntarily suspended atomic research as well as all uranium processing and enrichment under negotiations with the EU trio that began in 2003.

Tehran began to roll back its suspension of nuclear work in August by restarting its uranium conversion plant at Isfahan, prompting the European nations to freeze talks with Iran. The talks resumed in December, and the sides are to meet again this month.

Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, stressed that the actual enrichment of uranium, done through injecting gas into centrifuges at Iran's unfinished Natanz facility, would not be resumed for now.

"That will be a separate issue on which no decision has yet been made," he told Iranian television.

Earlier yesterday, Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi was cool to a Russian proposal aimed at easing Western concerns that Iran could get its hands on bomb-grade, highly enriched uranium.

"The Russian proposal is ambiguous," Mr. Asefi told a weekly press conference. "If they want to propose enrichment [only] in Russia, we have said it is not acceptable. But if it is a complementary or parallel plan, we will study that."

A Russian delegation is expected in Tehran on Saturday to hold further talks on the proposal.

Iran Tells U.N. It Will Resume Nuclear Research (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran told the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency today it planned to resume nuclear fuel research after a 21/2-year hiatus, a vague declaration that was likely to be taken in the West as fresh evidence Tehran was trying to build an atomic weapon.

International Atomic Energy Agency head Mohamed Elbaradei said it was important that Tehran "maintains its suspension of all enrichment-related activity" as a way of reducing international suspicions about its nuclear plans.

Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, said research would "resume in cooperation and coordination with the IAEA in the next few days," adding that it would "have little to do with the production of nuclear fuel."

Beyond that, he would not specify what type of research Tehran planned but claimed its nuclear program had suffered significantly during the research suspension. He said Iran could no longer keep its research scientists in limbo.

Iran has said it remains determined, at some point, to resume uranium enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for nuclear weapons.

The announcement, while vague, was certain to raise further concerns in the United States and among its European allies who believe Iran wants to build a nuclear arsenal. Tehran says its nuclear program is for electricity generation.

ElBaradei also called on Iran to "build confidence and enable the resumption of dialogue with all concerned parties."

The Iranian mission to the IAEA said Tehran has decided to resume from Feb. 9 research and development "on the peaceful nuclear energy program which has been suspended," ElBaradei told the agency's board.

A European diplomat accredited to the agency said it was too early to evaluate the significance of the move and whether it would scuttle talks planned for later this month.

The EU has previously said that any decision by Iran to resume work on its uranium enrichment program would be "the red line" that would end European attempts to negotiate differences with Iran.

Furthermore, the EU has said a resumption of work on the program would revive attempts to take Iran to the U.N. Security Council for violating the nuclear nonproliferation treaty.

But the diplomat, who demanded anonymity because he was not authorized to publicly discuss European Union strategy, said the Europeans needed details of precisely what Iran planned to research before making a decision on future talks.

Iran has come under heavy international pressure from the IAEA and the West to abandon its program to produce fuel for its Russian-built nuclear reactor that is due to come online this year and for its future nuclear power plants.

Iran has vowed it will never give up the right to produce nuclear fuel, which it says is guaranteed by the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

While refusing to permanently renounce uranium enrichment, Iran suspended many aspects of its nuclear fuel program in 2003 as a goodwill gesture during negotiations with the big three European powers, Britain, France and Germany.

The talks collapsed in August after Iran resumed uranium reprocessing activities, a step before enrichment, at its Uranium Conversion Facility in Isfahan, central Iran.

While the two sides resumed dialogue last month, talks have so far failed to resolve the dispute. More talks are scheduled for later this month.

Iran's decision to resume nuclear research coincided with the announcement by Asefi that Iran would reject a U.S. and European-backed Russian proposal to end the dispute if it required Tehran to cede the right to enrich uranium at home.

"The Russian proposal is ambiguous. We have to talk to the Russians to see what are the details," Asefi told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0008146

"If it means enrichment be carried out (only) in Russia, we have said it is not acceptable. But if it is a complementary plan, we will study it," Asefi said.

Extremists within the increasingly hard-line Iranian government have denounced the Russian proposal as a "dirty trick."

Intelligence Report Says Iran Seeks Nuclear Bomb: Paper (REU)

Reuters, January 4, 2006

LONDON (Reuters) - Iran is secretly trying to obtain technology and expertise needed to build a nuclear weapon, according to a leaked intelligence report that threatens to deepen a rift with the West over its nuclear program.

Tehran's nuclear purchasing plans stretch from Europe to North Korea and the former Soviet states, Britain's Guardian newspaper said, citing a report by an unnamed European intelligence agency.

The 55-page report, dated July 1, 2005, draws on material gathered by British, French, German and Belgian agencies and has been used to brief European government ministers, the newspaper said.

The leaked report comes as Iran and the West remain locked in a standoff over Tehran's nuclear program.

The United States and the European Union fear Iran's civilian nuclear power program is a cover for making nuclear weapons. Iran says it needs nuclear technology to generate electricity.

The leaked intelligence report claims Iran has an advanced program designed to acquire nuclear expertise, training and equipment.

It also says Syria, Pakistan and North Korea are part of a global black market in illicit weapons parts.

The document says Iran has built a web of front companies, middlemen and academics whose job is to find the information and materials needed for nuclear, biological and chemical arsenals, according to the Guardian.

"In addition to sensitive goods, Iran continues intensively to seek the technology and know-how for military applications of all kinds," the newspaper quoted from the report.

'MISSILE DEVELOPMENT'

According to the Guardian, the document details Tehran's attempts to build a missile capable of reaching Israel and southern Europe.

Iranian scientists are building wind tunnels, navigation technology and acquiring calibration devices needed for advanced missiles, the document says.

It concludes that Syria and Pakistan have also been buying technology and chemicals needed to develop rocket programs and to enrich uranium, according to the Guardian.

The report concludes that scientists in Tehran are shopping for parts for a new ballistic missile with "import requests and acquisitions ... registered almost daily", the Guardian said.

The report's aim is to warn European Union companies from doing business with the front companies, the newspaper said. The report does not name Western firms or academics believed to have worked with Iran, North Korea, Syria or Pakistan.

On Tuesday, Iran said it would resume atomic fuel research and development next week.

That could lead to renewed calls from Washington and the European Union for the case to be referred to the U.N. Security Council, where Iran could face political or economic sanctions.

CIA Gave Iran Bomb Plans, Book Says (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a clumsy effort to sabotage Iran's nuclear program, the CIA in 2004 intentionally handed Tehran some top-secret bomb designs laced with a hidden flaw that U.S. officials hoped would doom any weapon made from them, according to a new book about the U.S. intelligence agency.

But the Iranians were tipped to the scheme by the Russian defector hired by the CIA to deliver the plans and may have gleaned scientific information useful for designing a bomb, writes New York Times reporter James Risen in "State of War: The Secret History of the CIA and the Bush Administration."

The clandestine CIA effort was just one of many alleged intelligence failures during the Bush administration, according to the book.

Risen also cites intelligence gaffes that fueled the Bush administration's case for war against Saddam Hussein, spawned a culture of torture throughout the U.S. military and encouraged the rise of heroin cultivation and trafficking in postwar Afghanistan.

Even before the book's release Tuesday, its main revelation — that President Bush authorized a secret effort by another intelligence outfit, the National Security Agency, to eavesdrop on unsuspecting Americans without court-approved warrants — had created a storm of controversy when it was reported last month in the New York Times in an article coauthored by Risen.

In the book, Risen says he based his accounts on interviews with dozens of intelligence officials who, while unnamed, had proved reliable in the past.

Bush has confirmed the existence of the program, but condemned the newspaper for the December report and for its use of confidential sources.

The CIA added its own criticism Tuesday, saying the book contains "serious inaccuracies."

The NSA domestic spying controversy is at the heart of an intensifying debate over whether the president has overstepped his authority in fighting the U.S.-declared war on terrorism by not adequately consulting or allowing oversight from Congress and the courts.

The Justice Department disclosed Friday that it was conducting a criminal investigation to find out who leaked classified details of the domestic spying program.

The book's release date was moved up in the wake of the NSA controversy, and it provides additional details of that domestic spying effort, in which Bush did not seek permission for domestic wiretaps from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

The New York Times delayed for a year publication of its article on the NSA's domestic spying, in part because of personal requests from the president. Critics have questioned whether the paper could have published the information before last year's presidential election if it had decided against a delay. Newspaper officials have refused to comment on reasons for the delay or on the exact timing.

Top New York Times officials also refused to publish a news article about the reported CIA plot to give intentionally flawed nuclear plans to Iran, according to a person briefed on the newspaper's conversations by one of the participants. That person said the New York Times withheld publication at the request of the White House and former CIA Director George J. Tenet.

U.S. officials have long maintained that Iran's rulers want to develop nuclear weapons, but Tehran has insisted that it seeks to develop only a civilian nuclear energy program. Whatever the case, the CIA was desperate to counter what it believed was a clandestine nuclear program, and turned to a Russian defector who had once been a nuclear scientist in the former Soviet republics, according to the book.

The book says the CIA worked with the U.S.-based defector to concoct a story about how he was destitute, but in possession of valuable nuclear weapons blueprints that had been secreted out of Russia.

CIA officials had concerns about the man's temperament, Risen says, but sent the defector and the blueprints to Vienna anyway, with orders to hand-deliver them to someone at Tehran's diplomatic mission to the International Atomic Energy Agency, or IAEA, the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

His CIA handlers never imagined that the Russian defector would tip off the Iranians to the fatal flaw that they had hidden deep within the blueprints. But that, the book adds, is exactly what the Russian did, in part because the CIA failed to send anybody to accompany him out of fear that it might make the Iranians suspicious.

The book does not say whether Iran used the plans, but reports that a senior Iranian official visiting Vienna appears to have taken them immediately to Tehran after the defector dropped them off.

"He [the Russian] was the front man for what may have been one of the most reckless operations in the modern history of the CIA, one that may have helped put nuclear weapons in the hands of a charter member of what President George W. Bush has called the axis of evil," the book contends.

Two nuclear weapons experts who say that they have no knowledge about whether the covert effort described in the book occurred added that a deliberate flaw in the plans could have been easily found by the Iranians.

"Iran has excellent scientists and any information related to weapons designs could move its program ahead," said a European nuclear weapons expert, who refused to allow his name to be used because his government prohibits comments on nuclear weapons or designs.

David Albright, a former weapons inspector for the IAEA, agreed with the other expert that the plans could have shaved many years off Iran's nuclear effort.

"I wouldn't call it a colossal failure" by the CIA, said Albright, now president of the Institute for Science and International Security in Washington. "But I don't quite understand the purpose of it, why you would want to hand something like this to the Iranians. It's unlikely to work."

According to the book, the CIA effort to sabotage Iran's nuclear effort came on the heels of another massive intelligence failure, in which a CIA officer mistakenly sent an Iranian agent a trove of information that could help identify nearly every one of the spy agency's undercover operatives in Iran.

The Iranian was a double agent who turned over the data to Iranian authorities. They used it to dismantle the CIA's spy network inside the country and arrest or possibly kill an unknown number of U.S. agents, the book says.

DOJ_NMG_0008148

White House Won't Undo N. Korea Sanctions (AP)

By Barry Schweid

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration on Tuesday rejected a North Korean demand that it lift sanctions as a way of possibly resuming stalled nuclear disarmament talks.

The two issues are unrelated, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. "I don't see in what way they are preventing North Korea from going back to the six-party talks."

The sanctions were imposed for alleged currency counterfeiting and other illegal activities.

"While under U.S. sanctions, it's impossible to sit face-to-face and discuss abandoning our nuclear deterrent," said the Rodong Sinmun, the North's ruling Workers Party newspaper, in a Korean-language commentary carried by the official Korean Central News Agency.

"The U.S. sanctions are obviously the fundamental element that disrupts the six-party talks," the newspaper said.

McCormack said it was important and reasonable for the United States to protect American currency. "We, the United States, as well as other countries are going to take steps to stop, inhibit or prevent illicit activities," he said.

The negotiations are designed to halt North Korea's nuclear weapons program. The six nations, which include Japan, China, South Korea and Russia, as well as the United States and North Korea, agreed to return to the negotiations as soon as possible, McCormack said.

"We are prepared to do so, and we look forward to the resumption of those talks," he said.

As for the alleged violations, McCormack said the United States had offered North Korea a briefing and was turned down.

White House Supports Lebanon-Syria Probe (AP)

By Barry Schweid

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration urged U.N. investigators Tuesday to look into an allegation by a former Syrian vice president that President Bashar Assad had threatened former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri several months before Hariri was assassinated.

The allegation was made last week by former Vice President Abdul-Halim Khaddam, who left Syria several months ago.

Khaddam said Assad warned Hariri months before his assassination last year that he would "crush whoever attempts to overturn our decision" to extend the term of Lebanon's pro-Syrian president.

Hariri, a billionaire Lebanese nationalist who sought to assist his country wiggle free from Syrian control, was assassinated last February in Beirut. The blast killed 20 other people and helped accelerate U.N. demands that Syria release its grip on its smaller neighbor.

Referring to Khaddam's allegation, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "I think his remarks warrant further investigation" by the United Nations.

Mehlis already has implicated senior Syrian officials in Hariri's assassination. Syria has dismissed the charges as unfounded.

"I think that Mr. Khaddam's remarks raise some deeply troubling issues as to what exactly was going on during the period in time in question," McCormack said.

"They raise serious questions about who in the Syrian government may have been involved in the assassination," he said.

Bush Hopes Palestinian Election Goes Forward (REU-Y2)

Reuters, January 4, 2006

President George W. Bush wants Palestinian elections to go forward as scheduled this month with no delay and thinks Palestinians should be allowed to vote in East Jerusalem, a White House official said on Tuesday.

Bush is hoping the January 25 vote will mark a step forward in his vision of two states, Israel and Palestine, living side by side in peace.

The vote is widely seen as a referendum on Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas's rule following Israel's withdrawal from Gaza last year, which raised hopes of ending fighting and of founding a Palestinian state.

"It's our desire to see the elections go forward as scheduled," said a White House spokesman.

Israel has threatened to bar Palestinians from voting in East Jerusalem. Israel had allowed voting in East Jerusalem in the last Palestinian parliamentary election in 1996.

"We believe that people must have access to the ballot," the White House spokesman said. "Arrangements have been made in the past to ensure that those persons can vote and we believe some arrangements should be possible at this time."

DOJ_NMG_0008149

U.S. Envoys To Help Resolve Vote Dispute (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

The United States said yesterday that it was sending envoys to the Middle East to help resolve a dispute that threatens to derail this month's Palestinian elections.

The dispatch of two senior diplomats was announced as campaigning officially began in the Palestinian territories, although electioneering in East Jerusalem was blocked by Israeli police.

Israel has said it will not permit voting in the city because of the participation in the process of the militant group Hamas. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas warned Monday that the election would not take place if Israel carried out its threat.

"We see no reason why those elections should not proceed on Jan. 25," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington yesterday.

"We believe that the Palestinian Authority should be concentrating on preparations for those elections, so that the Palestinian people can vote in an atmosphere that is free from violence or coercion or intimidation."

Mr. McCormack noted that Israel had threatened previously to bar voting in East Jerusalem, which it annexed in the 1967 Middle East war, but that the two sides had been able to reach an agreement.

"We see no reason why the Palestinian Authority and the Israeli government shouldn't be able to come to some similar kind of accommodation for this round of voting, and we are going to be working with [them]," he said.

C. David Welch, assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, and Elliott Abrams, a deputy national security adviser for the region at the White House, will travel to Israel and the Palestinian territories today to meet with officials on both sides, Mr. McCormack said.

"We believe that these elections should be for all the Palestinian people within the parameters as defined by the Palestinian Authority," he said.

In East Jerusalem, which the Palestinians want to be the capital of their future state, Israeli police yesterday beat some Palestinian campaigners with clubs and arrested seven, including a local leader of Mr. Abbas' Fatah movement, wire service reports said.

Police spokesman Shmuel Ben-Ruby was quoted as saying the men had been released on bail after being questioned on "illegal activity by the Palestinian Authority in Jerusalem."

Israel allowed voting in East Jerusalem in the last Palestinian parliamentary elections in 1996, which Hamas boycotted.

Former Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who has joined current leader Ariel Sharon's new coalition, told the Al Jazeera television network that a decision on voting in East Jerusalem had not been made.

"We are waiting to see what will happen on the Palestinian side," he said, referring to internal Palestinian violence in the Gaza Strip that also has threatened the elections.

Palestinians Campaign For An Election That May Not Be Held (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 3 - Campaigning for Palestinian legislative elections opened Tuesday despite doubts about whether the vote will actually take place on Jan. 25.

With the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, on a tour of the Persian Gulf, Deputy Prime Minister Nabil Shaath cited the late Yasir Arafat, who died in November 2004, in kicking off the campaign for a riven Fatah movement.

Speaking by Mr. Arafat's tomb in Ramallah, on the West Bank, and using his nom de guerre, Mr. Shaath said, "With your permission, Abu Ammar, we will continue to fly the flag of Fatah and head to victory."

In a development that may roil the parallel Israeli political campaign, Israeli Channel 10 reported Tuesday night that the police had evidence that would show that the family of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had received $3 million from a wealthy Austrian, Martin Schlaff, in connection with his 1999 campaign. The money is thought to be connected to a $1.5 million loan from a South African businessman that is suspected of being used to refund illegal campaign contributions.

In a separate case, one of Mr. Sharon's sons, Omri, resigned from Parliament on Tuesday before his sentencing later this month for unrelated financing violations and falsification of documents from his father's 1999 campaign.

In opening the campaign, Mr. Shaath admitted that "Fatah has made mistakes and we must work to correct them." But he also warned that the radical Islamic movement Hamas, taking part in the elections for the first time, could win if Fatah failed to unite.

DOJ_NMG_0008150

He questioned Hamas's ability to govern the Palestinians and deal with Israel - which considers Hamas a terrorist group, and which Hamas does not recognize. "How will negotiations with Israel be managed under Hamas?" Mr. Shaath asked. "How will they pay salaries and ensure security? What will they do for women?"

Still, Fatah's biggest problems are its own divisions and a reputation for cronyism, mismanagement and corruption, coupled with its failure to achieve an independent Palestinian state through negotiation and compromise.

Fatah is looking for reasons to postpone the elections, because of fears that Hamas will win more than 40 percent of the 132 seats at stake and become either the most powerful political force or a sizable blocking minority in the future legislature. Many Fatah veterans would rather have no election than hand over such power to Hamas.

Hamas opposes another delay in the vote, having already agreed to Mr. Abbas's request to move the election from July to this month.

Israel, which opposes letting Hamas take part in the elections, has not yet decided whether to allow Palestinians in East Jerusalem to vote by postal ballot, as they have done in previous elections, when Hamas did not take part.

A senior Israeli official said, however, that Israel would help Palestinians in East Jerusalem who wanted to vote outside the city. In the past, he said, only 5,000 of the 120,000 or so eligible Palestinian voters in Jerusalem had been allowed to vote in post offices, and only 1,200 of them have done so, with a vast majority voting outside the city.

The issue has important symbolic value. Mr. Abbas said Monday that if voting were not allowed in East Jerusalem, it would be impossible to hold the elections. Israel clearly does not want to be blamed for any postponement, but also does not want to sanction the election.

"The post offices are there, and if we decide to have them open, then they'll be open," the Israeli official said. "We're waiting for the right moment to announce what our position is, and now is not the right moment. We're making assessments on a daily basis."

Mr. Sharon, 77, is to go into the hospital on Thursday for an operation under general anesthesia to plug a small hole in his heart that may have been a factor in the stroke he suffered Dec. 18. He will spend the night in the hospital and will temporarily cede his powers to his deputy, Ehud Olmert, for what is expected to be a three-hour period of operation and recovery.

Palestinians Kick Off Campaign Amid Signs Of 2nd Postponement (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 3 -- The leading Palestinian political parties kicked off campaigns for parliament on Tuesday, but there was a growing possibility that balloting would be postponed as two prominent candidates had confrontations with Israeli authorities in East Jerusalem, where Israel has prohibited election activities.

Mustafa Barghouti, a former presidential candidate and leader of the Independent Palestine movement, was detained by Israeli police while campaigning in Jerusalem's Old City and held for about five hours. Police said Barghouti had the proper permit to enter East Jerusalem, annexed by Israel after the 1967 Middle East war.

Israeli police also dispersed a rally for the Third Way movement outside the Old City's Damascus Gate. Hanan Ashrawi, a member of the Palestinian parliament from the Jerusalem district, was speaking at the event when police intervened. Ashrawi said police briefly detained one of her aides for obstructing a police officer.

"I'm seriously concerned over how this campaign has begun, and not only because of the highhanded manner of the Israelis," Ashrawi said in a telephone interview. "I'm also worried about our own domestic realities and the breakdown of law and order. There appears to be an emerging anarchy."

Palestinians are scheduled to vote on Jan. 25 for a new 132-seat legislature. There was a festive atmosphere in many parts of the West Bank, but several candidates in East Jerusalem faced problems, including some members of the governing Fatah movement who were detained.

The Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, suggested Monday that he might postpone the election because of Israel's ban on voting in East Jerusalem. It would be the second time Abbas has delayed the vote, which was initially scheduled for July.

The warning by Abbas angered candidates of the Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas. Recent public opinion polls project that Hamas, which does not recognize Israel, would win between 30 and 40 percent of the vote, second only to Abbas's secular Fatah movement. Hamas has never competed in national elections, but was highly successful in municipal races over the past year and has been popular because of its social service programs.

"We have told them that postponing the election will lead to a vacuum and to a dark future," Ismael Haniyeh, a top Hamas candidate, told reporters in the Gaza Strip. "Postponing the election is not the solution."

The makeup of the new parliament will likely have little bearing on Palestinian policy, which will remain firmly in Abbas's control. But the results would help gauge both the popularity of Hamas, whose armed wing has carried out numerous attacks on

DOJ_NMG_0008151

Israeli soldiers and civilians during the most recent uprising that began in September 2000, and Fatah's unity as it endures a divisive generational power struggle.

Israeli officials have banned voting and electioneering in East Jerusalem because of the participation of Hamas, saying a 1996 agreement with Palestinian leaders about the election process prohibited the involvement of groups that do not recognize Israel.

"This time Hamas, a terrorist group, is participating," said an official in Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's office. "Because of this we cannot cooperate with the elections. This is our policy not only in East Jerusalem but throughout the process." The official spoke on condition he not be further identified.

A number of Palestinian politicians have called on the Bush administration to pressure Israel into allowing the vote to take place in East Jerusalem, an important symbol for Israelis and Palestinians, each of whom claim Jerusalem as their capital.

Barghouti, who lost the presidential race to Abbas a year ago, echoed that demand after his arrest. "Israel is trying to obstruct free elections in Jerusalem, and by doing so obstructing the process everywhere," he said.

After Israel, Who Can Run Gaza? (CSM)

By Rafael D. Frankel

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2006

GAZA CITY - As the first year devoid of an Israeli presence since 1967 dawns in the Gaza Strip, armed militias roam the streets freely, foreigners are kidnapped with regularity, and the measure of a man in this coastal territory is not his political title, or even the size of his house, but the number of AK-47-wielding bodyguards he employs.

When Israel left Gaza four months ago, full control over the 1.3 million people was ostensibly transferred to the Palestinian Authority (PA). But its authority in this coastal territory has deteriorated to such a state of anarchy, that the best-armed gangs or families are effectively the law now.

"Yasser Arafat left a terrible legacy of violence behind him where people are always acting outside the law," says Eyad Sarraj, a Palestinian political analyst and a candidate in the Jan. 25 elections. "Now, with him gone, everyone is fighting for his power."

Tuesday, Palestinian parties launched their election campaigns across Gaza and the West Bank with parades, posters, and banners. This is the latest manifestation of the central Palestinian power struggle between the Islamic militant group Hamas and the ruling Fatah Party.

With Palestinian Legislative Council elections scheduled in three weeks, the violence in Gaza has heightened as dozens of armed factions, most claiming ties to Fatah, jostle for control. On Monday, even the Palestinian police donned masks and shot their guns in the air in a mass protest against the PA's lack of will to give police permission to aggressively tackle the escalating crime.

All throughout the days here gun shots ring out. From time to time, explosions from homemade bombs, rockets, and the countering Israeli artillery fire echo through the graffiti-ridden streets.

But the police Monday had an additional demand of PA President Mahmoud Abbas, one that is being made increasingly by leaders of his Fatah Party: delay the elections. "We are in a dangerous situation in which any attempt to hold elections might bring about battles between armed factions and the police," PA Police Chief Ala Hosni told the Israeli newspaper Haaretz.

After insisting for weeks that elections would go ahead as scheduled, Mr. Abbas said for the first time on Monday that he would consider delaying the vote; not because of the violence, but due to the question of whether Israel would bar Palestinians in East Jerusalem from voting.

Despite previous ambiguous statements from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Israeli government spokesman Raanan Gissin says Israel will not stand in the way of Palestinians living in Jerusalem from casting ballots.

"We will find a way to fulfill our obligations to allow them to exercise their right to vote," Mr. Gissin says. While the exact formula has not yet been decided, he says, it would likely be similar to the 1996 Palestinian elections when Israel allowed mail-in balloting from Jerusalem as well as easier access to areas in the West Bank with voting booths.

(Under the 1993 Oslo Accords, Palestinian political activities are prohibited in Jerusalem, as is participation in the PA by parties, such as Hamas, that do not recognize Israel's right to exist.)

"The Palestinians are looking for an excuse to blame Israel because they are incapable of controlling their own streets," Gissin says. "If they decide they want to cancel the election, they do it on their own merit, they can't hang it on us."

Mr. Sarraj, who is running for a seat in the Palestinian legislature with the Wahad [Promise] Party, says the PA's lack of law enforcement in Gaza and the talk about voting problems in East Jerusalem are calculated moves by Abbas to provide "excuses" to delay elections he knows Fatah will fair poorly in.

DOJ_NMG_0008152

After the strong showing by Hamas in recent municipal elections in Palestinian cities, Abbas is worried that not only will Fatah lose substantial ground in the legislature, it may lose control of that body altogether, Sarraj says.

Of all the militant Palestinian groups, Hamas has been responsible for the most Israeli deaths in terrorist attacks. Yet in a move to increase its political standing, Hamas has largely kept to the terms of a cease-fire it agreed to with Abbas last February.

On Monday, an official Hamas statement demanded that "the excuse of the security situation and anarchy in the Palestinian Authority not be used to postpone the elections."

And it won't be, says Saeb Erekat, the chief Palestinian negotiator who often speaks for the PA. "President Abbas knows the catastrophic consequences of postponing the elections," he says. As long as Israel provides the same voting access as it did in 1996, Mr. Erekat says, the elections will go ahead as planned - Israel should "not stand in the way" of that process.

As for the violence on Gaza's streets, Erekat says that while "every effort is being made to contain" it, the PA was not sure who was behind the rash of shootings and government office takeovers by masked gunmen.

British human rights worker Kate Burton and her visiting parents were kidnapped last Wednesday by a previously unknown group of gunmen and released two days later.

"It's impossible to say who has guns in Gaza anymore," Erekat says. "The ballots are the only thing that can stop the violence at this point."

Power Shift Set During Procedure For Sharon (WT/AP)

By Josef Federman

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will hand over power to his deputy during a heart procedure this week, his office said yesterday, the first time an Israeli leader has agreed to give up his authority because of illness.

Mr. Sharon's office played down concerns about the 77-year-old leader's health, saying the procedure to close a small hole in his heart, including a period when he will be under general anesthesia, will last only three hours. However, officials canceled the weekly Cabinet meeting Sunday to give Mr. Sharon an extra day to recover.

Vice Prime Minister Ehud Olmert will take over during the procedure, Mr. Sharon's office said.

Doctors discovered the hole after Mr. Sharon suffered a mild stroke Dec. 18. The hole, measuring about one-eighth of an inch, apparently led to the stroke by allowing a small blood clot to reach Mr. Sharon's brain.

Although Mr. Sharon temporarily lost the ability to speak, his doctors said the prime minister suffered no lasting damage. He has resumed his full workload, and doctors say tomorrow's procedure, called a heart catheterization, will virtually eliminate the risk of a similar stroke.

The process of transferring power is spelled out in a 1992 law. But tomorrow will mark the first time in Israel's 57-year history that a leader has yielded his authority because of an illness, said legal commentator Moshe Negbi. In previous cases, including lengthy illnesses suffered by Golda Meir in the 1970s and Menachem Begin in the 1980s, their ailments were hidden from the public.

Last month's stroke has put the health of Mr. Sharon, who turns 78 next month, on the political agenda as he seeks a third term in March 28 elections.

Mr. Sharon recently quit the hard-line Likud Party to head a new centrist party, Kadima (Forward), in the upcoming election.

The health scare appears to have had no effect on the party's prospects. Opinion polls forecast a strong victory for Kadima, and show Likud far behind.

Benjamin Netanyahu, a former prime minister elected to lead Likud last month, said yesterday he would not make an issue out of Mr. Sharon's health during the campaign.

Israel Undergoes Political ‘revolution' Alignments Shift As Sharon Leaves Likud (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, January 4, 2006

TEL AVIV, Israel — Two months ago, politics in the Carmel Market, a gantlet of clothing stalls, butcher shops and spice kiosks, was straightforward. The small shop owners here are staunchly conservative and have supported Israel's largest party, Likud, for decades.

However, dramatic turns in Israeli politics over the past couple of months have reshaped the country's politics. The ruling Likud Party, a fixture in Israeli politics for more than 30 years, is struggling after its leader, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, left to form the centrist Kadima Party. The center-left Labor Party elected a socialist who vows to inject life into the faction.

DOJ_NMG_0008153

Today, even in Likud bastions such as the Carmel Market, there is a political realignment. “Like my father, my family and most everyone here in the market, I used to vote Likud,” says Yoni Ben-Yonatan, 24, owner of a dollar store. “But there have been so many changes. … I will stick with Sharon. My father won't.”

The recent political changes are “nothing short of a revolution,” says Asher Cohen, a professor of political science at Bar-Ilan University in Tel Aviv. “Here you have a sitting prime minister dumping the party he helped found 30 years ago to create an entirely new party.”

Sharon was a key player in the establishment of Likud in 1973. The working-class people who populate open air markets such as Carmel have long provided Likud's support, Cohen says.

Likud swept to power in 1977. Since that victory, Likud prime ministers have governed Israel for 20 of the past 28 years. The decision by Sharon to leave the party has left Likud severely weakened and its future uncertain.

Sharon's new party is so popular that “it blows the two giants of Israeli politics (Labor and Likud) right out of the water,” Cohen says.

Most voters seem to have chosen Sharon, a former general who as defense minister engineered Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982, over the party he helped create.

A recent poll in the Israeli daily newspaper Maariv showed that if elections were held now, Likud would drop from its current 40 seats to 16. According to the poll findings, Sharon's Kadima Party would win 40 of the 120 seats in the Knesset, Israel's parliament, making Kadima the largest of Israel's many political parties. National elections are scheduled for March 28.

“Sharon has the experience, he has the toughness, and only he can balance right and left and eventually bring us a real peace with the Palestinians,” says Ben-Yonatan, who served in an elite Israeli army unit.

In announcing his new party, Sharon claimed he was abandoning Likud because the party's powerful right wing undermined his efforts to pursue peace with the Palestinians. Sharon supports the U.S.-brokered “road map” peace plan that would lead to creation of a Palestinian state.

Sharon also railed at Likud's 3,000-strong Central Committee, which set the party's political agenda. Sharon has blamed committee members for increasing political corruption in Israel.

Sharon's health complicates matters. On Dec. 18, the chronically overweight Sharon, 77, was hospitalized for two days for a mild stroke.

On Thursday, doctors are to seal a small hole in his heart that might have led to his stroke. His deputy, Ehud Olmert, will assume the prime minister's duties while Sharon undergoes the procedure, which should take three hours.

After Sharon abandoned the party, Likud elected hawkish former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, 56, as its chairman. Netanyahu condemned Sharon's withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the West Bank and is campaigning on a hard-line platform that would grant a Palestinian state on only a fraction of West Bank land.

Israel's Labor Party has taken a turn leftward with the election of Amir Peretz, 53, a union leader. He unseated Labor Party leader Shimon Peres, 82, in primaries Nov. 9.

Peretz has vowed to raise the minimum wage and taxes on the wealthy. He packed his shadow Cabinet with social crusaders, such as Shelly Yechimovitch, a former news personality who often expressed her socialist politics on TV.

Peretz says Israel should accede to most Palestinian demands for creating an independent state before moving on to issues such as eradicating child poverty and unemployment. Convinced that Peretz could not bring peace with the Palestinians, Peres and three other prominent party veterans joined Sharon's new party.

It remains unclear whether Sharon's party, bolstered by moderate defectors from Labor and Likud, will mean Israeli politics are moving to the center. With no activists or party infrastructure, Kadima's life span could be as short or as long as Sharon's desire to rule, Cohen says.

Sharon's strength, says Asher Arian, a fellow at Jerusalem-based think-tank Israeli Democracy Institute, “is being more in tune with Israeli public opinion than anyone else.”

Ashcroft Helps Israelis On Korean Weapons Deal (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, January 4, 2006

Israel’s major aerospace company hired former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft’s lobbying firm late last month to help secure the U.S. government’s approval to sell a weapons system to the South Korean Air Force, according to lobbying disclosure records.

The South Koreans are choosing between an early-warning radar system built by Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI) and a similar, more expensive system built by Chicago-based Boeing Co. The radar systems enhance an air force’s ability to track enemy fighter jets during combat.

DOJ_NMG_0008154

U.S. law requires Israel, and any other country seeking to resell American military technology, to secure approval from the Department of State's Directorate of Defense Trade Controls. That agency can also consult with the Pentagon on whether to issue an export license. A State Department spokesman declined to comment.

Boeing already has the U.S. government's approval.

The South Koreans initially had intended to make a decision by Dec. 31, but the government told the companies last month that it would delay its final decision until May 2006, which gives the Israeli company an additional four months to get the U.S. government's blessing.

Boeing officials based in Seoul, South Korea, expressed disappointment with the four-month delay in news reports in that country and Israel. The Jerusalem Post reported last month that Alexander Vershbow, the U.S. ambassador to South Korea, met with the South Korean defense minister and pushed for Boeing. The $1 billion deal has garnered little attention in the U.S. media and in Congress.

In 2005, Boeing contributed $642,877 to Republican and Democratic lawmakers' political action committees and campaign committees, according to politicalmoneyline.com. The firm reported spending $4.9 million on lobbying in 2004.

A spokesman for Rep. Norm Dicks (D-Wash.), who traditionally aids Boeing because the company has a large presence in his district, said he was not aware of the sale and had not been contacted by Boeing on the matter. Spokespeople for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.) and Washington Democratic Sens. Patty Murray and Maria Cantwell did not return calls for comment.

South Korea, the world's 11th largest economy, has been investing heavily in its military in recent years. The U.S. ally has developed its own fighter plane and battle tank and launched an aircraft carrier, destroyers and submarines, said John Pike of GlobalSecurity.org, an intelligence research company.

"The [surveillance] technology makes a tremendous difference whether you have airplanes like this," Pike said, adding that not having the system is like having a "football team without a coach and captain. It is night-and-day in terms of efficiency and effectiveness of air power. Any serious, self-respecting country wants them or wants to get them."

The Ashcroft Group and IAI signed a nondisclosure agreement, said spokeswoman Juleanna Glover Weiss, and IAI officials based in D.C. and Tel Aviv said the company does not comment on its consultants.

Ashcroft has built a lucrative lobbying practice since starting last summer. Public records also show that Oracle; ChoicePoint, a company that sells data to police and federal law-enforcement agencies; and the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants have hired Ashcroft.

Public records do not disclose how much IAI is paying Ashcroft. The records show that IAI also hired Morris Amitay for $20,000.

"I am not going to comment," Amitay said, referring to questions about the potential deal to IAI's office in Arlington, Va.

While it is not unusual for foreign governments to hire Washington lobbyists to navigate the executive-branch bureaucracy, Congress has a record of inserting itself into commercial transactions, especially when national-security issues are concerned. For example, the House overwhelmingly passed two resolutions last year encouraging the Bush administration to stop a potential merger between a Chinese oil company and Unocal, a U.S. oil company.

Israel has come under criticism from the U.S. government for selling arms to countries hostile to the United States, such as China and South Africa. In 2000, pressure from the Clinton administration and Congress stopped Israel from selling its Phalcon radar system to the Chinese.

"Past Israeli behavior does not inspire confidence," said Loren Thompson of the Lexington Institute, adding that past actions could spark Congressional action.

The United States suspended cooperation with Israel last year on some long-term military projects after Israel announced plans to sell China spare parts for Harpy Drone unmanned aerial vehicles. The United States and Israel signed a memorandum of understanding in August to regulate future arms sales between Israel and other countries.

Boeing has sold its surveillance system to the Australian and Turkish governments, said a D.C.-based Boeing official, who declined further comment. Last year, the Israelis sold the Phalcon system to India's air force, and, previously, they sold the Phalcon system to the Chilean air force.

The United States approved $22.4 billion in licenses to sell arms in 2004; Israel accounted for $1.33 billion in sales. Japan and Great Britain were the largest buyers of U.S. weapons, according to a State Department report

Rice To Visit Indonesia, Australia (REU-Y2)

Reuters, January 4, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will visit Indonesia and Australia, strong U.S. allies in fighting terrorism, from January 7-12, the State Department said on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0008155

Rice will first go to Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, for talks with President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono and other ministers, said spokesman Sean McCormack.

Both sides will discuss a range of issues, including U.S. support for "Indonesia's democratic development," cooperation in tackling the threat of avian flu and progress in recovery efforts after the devastating tsunami in December 2004.

They will also likely look at military relations between Indonesia and the United States, which have become closer as a reward for Jakarta's cooperation in the war on terrorism and against al Qaeda-linked militants.

In November, Washington announced it was restoring military ties, despite objections from human rights groups which said monitoring of armed forces would need to be tightened.

U.S. military ties were cut back after Indonesian troops shot at demonstrators in East Timor in 1991, killing dozens, when the tiny territory was ruled by Jakarta.

They were then severed after pro-Jakarta militias backed by elements in the military sacked East Timor in 1999 when the territory voted for independence.

In Australia, Rice will meet foreign ministers from Japan and Australia as part of a new "strategic dialogue" between the three countries, McCormack said.

Rice will also take part in a meeting between the United States and five Asia-Pacific countries that announced a pact last July to cut greenhouse gases that falls outside the Kyoto Protocol on climate change.

Critics say the pact, the Asia-Pacific Partnership for Clean Development and Climate, is ineffectual and merely serves the needs of industrialized nations.

The pact, which involves the United States, Australia, China, Japan, India and South Korea, looks at how to develop technologies to reduce greenhouse gas emissions rather than having specific targets.

Expediting Homes For Tsunami Victims (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

MEUDANGGHON, Indonesia -- In a field along Sumatra's west coast, a group of villagers gathered under a blue tarp, peering at a laptop computer. The screen displayed a design of a simple brick house.

"Everyone okay with this?" asked Dave Hodgkin, a relief aid consultant. "Any changes? If you want a bigger window, tell us."

"Don't change anything," a woman in a black head scarf quickly responded. "It'll slow things down."

Hodgkin works with Fauna & Flora International, a British group that is preparing to build homes in this isolated village of 60 households in Aceh province, the area hit hardest by the tsunami of more than a year ago. Similar scenes have been taking place across Aceh over the past several months as aid workers help survivors plan entire communities.

Stung by intense criticism of a slow rebuilding effort after the Dec. 26, 2004, undersea earthquake and resulting tsunami, the Indonesian government and relief agencies are moving to pick up the pace. After building about 16,000 houses in 2005, Indonesia is undertaking what officials call the world's largest reconstruction effort ever after a natural disaster. The goal is to build 80,000 homes by the end of this year and a total of 120,000 by mid-2007.

Interviews with officials and survivors indicate that accelerating the rebuilding process will not be easy. Not all of the houses built in 2005 have been occupied, according to the Rehabilitation and Reconstruction Agency for Aceh and Nias, known by its Indonesian initials BRR. Nias is an island off the Sumatran coast and was heavily damaged by an earthquake last March.

More than 60,000 people still live in tents. Another 50,000 are in barracks or other forms of temporary shelter. Several hundred thousand are living with friends and family, but many will need homes of their own.

"Until the last person moves out of the barracks into their own house, that last person will say that we are slow," according to Kuntoro Mangkusubroto, director of the government relief agency.

But beginning this year, he said, there will be 5,000 housing starts a month. Officials said the increased pace will bring logistical challenges. Building 120,000 houses will require 13.7 million cubic meters of concrete, gravel and wood -- or 1.7 million truckloads of material, officials said. It will be trucked, shipped and in some cases flown by helicopter to remote areas, said Sudirman Said, BRR spokesman.

Moving the material will be hampered by the lack of transportation facilities. The tsunami and earthquake wrecked most of Aceh's ports, highways and bridges. Officials expect a port restoration at Meulaboh to be completed by February, but others will take longer.

One recent morning, on the eastern outskirts of Banda Aceh, the provincial capital, a single cargo ship loaded with sugar was docked at Malahayati port's only jetty. Two other ships, one carrying cement, idled in the harbor. The port can dock only one ship at a time.

DOJ_NMG_0008156

"This is the main supply line for all the villages along the coast" of northern Aceh and part of its western coast, said Jan Roos, project manager for a construction firm hired by the Dutch government to enlarge the port. The Dutch are spending $8.2 million to dredge the harbor, build a second jetty and make other improvements. By October, Roos said, the port should be able to handle up to three ships.

Another port has been reopened for passenger ferries on the western side of the capital. But cargo ships still cannot land at the Ulee Lheue port, also to the west. Instead, the U.N. World Food Program and other relief agencies are using special landing craft that can pull up to shore, lower a ramp and unload.

Still, a landing craft must travel up to 18 hours from Ulee Lheue to Calang down the Sumatran west coast, a trip that used to take only 3 1/2 hours on the West Coast Highway before the tsunami battered it and dumped large chunks into the sea.

The United States is spending $245 million to repair the highway, the largest infrastructure project in Aceh and the most complex. Land has shifted in many parts of the island, and in some areas 500 yards of beach are submerged or washed away. "The road now in many places is next to the ocean and has to be relocated," said William Frej, the Indonesia director of the U.S. Agency for International Development.

The road will be rebuilt up to five miles inland, he said. USAID officials hope it will be finished by 2008.

The only hitch is that some villagers, eager to be settled, are rebuilding close to the shore, near their old fishing grounds. But Frej said he thought many would ultimately move.

"The road is unquestionably the economic backbone of Aceh," he said. "I would suspect that many of the villages, when the road is completed, will be relocated much closer to the road."

Zainal Abidin, 55, who lost his wife and three of their six children in the tsunami, lives about 150 yards from the sea in Leupung on the west coast. He does not want to move. He went back to the site of his old village and has lived in a tent for almost a year.

Now, he said, "all I want is to have a house in my old place."

But a relief agency that has promised houses for the village is clearing fields near a hill inland. The leader of the village says only about half the people are willing to move.

Another challenge is obtaining land titles for an estimated 300,000 people affected by the tsunami. The BRR, with the help of large donors led by the World Bank, will help people secure their property rights and establish a land database. Holding a land deed will also help those who need loan collateral to start a business, said Eddy Purwanto, a BRR official.

"The idea is to reconstruct ownership," he said, "but also to get them out of the cycle of poverty."

Officials said that one of the most difficult challenges is managing expectations. After the tsunami, with record donations pouring in and 500,000 people in need of shelter, hopes were raised that houses would be built quickly.

"Total destruction is total destruction and it takes time to rebuild -- and I'm not even referring to Katrina," said Scott Campbell, Aceh director for Catholic Relief Services. "I'm referring to Hurricanes Ivan and Charlie and others over a year old where people are still not in permanent houses. And this is coming from a country where there's loads of resources and infrastructure."

In recognition that many people here are going to have to wait until 2007 for permanent houses, international Red Cross groups, the United Nations and the BRR are building 20,000 transitional homes of galvanized steel. Officials hope to move most people out of tents by April.

In what is left of the village of Meudangghon, a mile from the sea, 30 families live in tents on a field once lush with mango, durian and orange trees. Thirty other families are in barracks in the nearest town, 45 minutes away by motorbike and ferry.

The villagers plan to rebuild on higher ground about 1 1/2 miles inland, near a mountain. The land they will build on belongs to several villagers, who have agreed to sell to their neighbors, with the local government putting up the money, said Helen Barnes, the project manager of Fauna & Flora in Aceh.

Mohammad Nasir, the village head, said the planning process has taken a long time. But he said he believes it will be worth it.

"I have faith," he said. "I am optimistic this will work."

Police In India Make An Arrest In Scholar's Death (NYT)

By Saritha Rai

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

BANGALORE, India, Jan. 3 - The police in southern India on Tuesday announced the arrest of a suspect in the shooting of a well-known scholar here as anxiety rose over the possibility of terrorist attacks aimed at the region's high-technology industries.

DOJ_NMG_0008157

Heightening tensions across this relatively prosperous belt of the country, the police said they had also uncovered plots to attack outsourcing companies after arresting four other suspects possibly connected to Islamic militant groups during the past two weeks.

The police were put on high alert in a number of cities, installing checkpoints and searching people and cars in Bangalore, Hyderabad and Madras, all flourishing cities where hundreds of outsourcing companies offer services to Western clients.

The measures taken in Hyderabad coincided with a visit to the city by Prime Minister Manmohan Singh to open the Indian Science Congress, the country's biggest meeting of scientists and scholars.

Wire reports quoted Mr. Singh as saying that terrorists were singling out India's research institutes because of the country's growing technical and scientific prowess. "The symbols and temples of our knowledge society are today being targeted by terrorists," Mr. Singh told scientists at the conference.

Ajit Kumar Mohanty, the police commissioner in Hyderabad, said the police had been "even more vigilant" since arrests two days ago revealed plans for an attack at Hi-Tech City, where most of Hyderabad's technology companies are based.

On Sunday, the Hyderabad police arrested two men suspected of being part of larger networks and seized a large quantity of explosives. Reports quoted the police as saying that the men had given details of their plans to attack technology companies by using bombs detonated by cellphones.

The first of a series of recent arrests was made in mid-December.

The police said Tuesday that they believed more such groups were holed up in the city.

Last week a gunman shot dead a retired professor, M. C. Puri, and wounded four others in the offices of the Indian Institute of Science, the country's premier science and technology institution. On Tuesday, the Bangalore police announced the arrest on Sunday of a suspect, Abdul Rahman, 35, saying he was known for "a very strong connection" to the Lashkar-e-Taiba, a militant organization based in Pakistan.

China Releases Investigative Reporter Whose Jailing Had Upset U.S. (WP)

By Philip P. Pan

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

BEIJING, Jan. 3 -- The Chinese government released a prominent investigative reporter from prison Tuesday, even as it has been intensifying a crackdown on the press. The early release appeared intended to mollify the Bush administration, which had included the journalist on a short list of political prisoners whose cases it raises regularly with Chinese officials.

Jiang Weiping, 50, who spent the last five years in prison after writing a series of hard-hitting articles on government corruption for a magazine in Hong Kong, was granted a sentence reduction for good behavior and released one year before his term was set to end, according to his wife, Li Yanling.

Several human rights groups had campaigned for Jiang's release, including the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists, which honored him with its international press freedom award in 2001.

The release was the first of a prominent political prisoner by the Chinese government in more than nine months. It came several weeks after U.S. officials expressed frustration over China's failure to free a prisoner as a gesture of goodwill in advance of President Bush's visit to Beijing in November.

Jiang was on a list of 13 prisoners that U.S. officials handed the Chinese during a 2002 meeting between Bush and Jiang Zemin, China's president at the time. Senior U.S. officials pressed for the prisoner's release in several subsequent meetings, and the U.S. ambassador to China, Clark T. Randt Jr., raised the case in speeches.

John Kamm, executive director of the San Francisco-based Dui Hua Foundation, which lobbies Chinese officials on behalf of political prisoners, said the decision could signal a new readiness by the Chinese government to address U.S. criticism of its human rights record after a period in which it appeared unwilling to make concessions.

Jiang Weiping, a former bureau chief for the Hong Kong newspaper Wen Hui Bao, was arrested in December 2000 after writing a series of articles for the magazine Frontline that exposed corruption among senior officials in the northeastern province of Liaoning. He was then sentenced to eight years in prison on charges of revealing state secrets and inciting subversion. A higher court later reduced the sentence to six years.

Jiang's supporters said he was targeted by party officials upset by his reporting, which helped uncover some of China's largest and most colorful corruption cases in recent memory. He reported, for example, that one local mayor used state money to buy apartments for 29 mistresses, and that another official lost nearly $3.6 million in public funds in casinos in Macau. That official was later arrested and executed.

Jiang also reported that one of the Communist Party's rising stars, Bo Xilai, covered up corruption among friends and relatives during his years as mayor of the city of Dalian. Bo, who is the son of the party elder Bo Yibo, was serving as the Liaoning governor when Jiang's reports were published, and is now China's trade minister.

DOJ_NMG_0008158

Jiang's release came as the government has been stepping up a crackdown on freedom of expression that began nearly two years ago. Last week, Liaoning authorities upheld the conviction of Zheng Yichun, an Internet essayist who has been sentenced to seven years in prison for writing articles criticizing the government. The same day, propaganda officials fired the editor in chief of one of the nation's most daring newspapers, the Beijing News, prompting as many as 100 journalists there to stage a one-day strike.

Last month, prosecutors concerned about the release of state secrets indicted a researcher for the New York Times, Zhao Yan, on charges related to his reporting for the newspaper. Prosecutors were also expected to make a decision this week about whether to pursue a case against a Singapore newspaper journalist, Ching Cheong, who has been detained since April on suspicion of espionage.

Australia Revisits Drug-price Cap (WSJ)

By Veronica Brooks

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

CANBERRA, Australia -- Mark Vaile, Australia's trade minister and acting prime minister, said the government may remove an amendment included in the Australia-U.S. free-trade agreement designed to contain drug prices if pharmaceutical makers can prove the provision is "commercially detrimental."

The so-called evergreening amendment was negotiated by Australia's major opposition Labor in 2004 as a condition of the center-left party's support for the trade treaty and is designed to prevent drug companies from extending medicine patents so as to delay cheaper generic versions coming to market.

Australia's free-trade agreement with the world's biggest economy came into force at the start of 2005 and will be the subject of a formal review in March.

The Australian newspaper reported yesterday that the influential U.S. pharmaceutical industry is pushing Canberra to scrap the safeguard amendment.

"I am sure that the American side, particularly industry in America, would like to have a discussion about the way those amendments, and the provisions of those amendments are operating," Mr. Vaile told Australian Broadcasting Corp. radio.

"But the point needs to be made that they would have to prove that those amendments are being commercially detrimental, which we don't believe they are.

"Under the Australian system, innovative drug companies get a very liberal dose of protection under the patent arrangements," he added. "They do have opportunities for patent extensions if there is a significant improvement in the benefits that flow from that drug, but through our process of certification and the [Therapeutic Goods Administration] we don't allow the abuse of the system."

Under Labor's amendment to the free-trade-treaty legislation, drug companies misusing the patent system to delay the release of cheaper generic pharmaceuticals face fines of as much as A$10 million (US$7.3 million), have to pay damages for any losses to the generic-drug manufacturer, and repay extra costs to federal and state governments.

Labor insisted the government adopt the amendments, adamant that safeguards were required to preserve access to affordable medicines under Canberra's A$6-billion-a-year Pharmaceutical Benefits Scheme.

Bush Administration Criticizes Russia (Ap)

By barry scwhied

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

The Bush administration criticized Russia on Tuesday for imposing limits on natural gas supplies to Europe by reducing Ukraine's share through a pipeline that carries about 80 percent of Russian gas exports to the West.

A decision by Russia to restore most of the gas it had withheld Monday in a pricing dispute "does not resolve the issue," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Noting that Europe was in the midst of winter's cold, McCormack decried "the use of energy for political purposes."

He noted that Ukraine, a former Soviet republic, was due to hold parliamentary elections. And yet, McCormack also said he was not trying to discern Russia's motives in limiting supplies and proposing a sharp boost in gas prices.

McCormack said State Department officials were talking to both governments to try to help resolve the dispute.

Russia has acussed Ukraine of trying to steal its share of gas from Europe, an allegation that Ukraine rejects and the State Department declined to address.

Russian Natural Gas Streams Through Ukraine Once Again (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008159

Russian natural gas flowed across Ukraine to countries throughout Europe yesterday, banishing the specter of immediate and prolonged shortages because of Moscow's price dispute with Kiev.

But relief was tempered by the realization that the Continent's dependence on Russian natural gas means it is vulnerable to future energy crises. (See related article1.) European officials also criticized Russia's behavior and called for a diplomatic resolution with Ukraine.

Calling Russia's decision to cut off gas shipments to Ukraine on Sunday "hasty," European Union Energy Commissioner Andris Piebalgs told BBC World, "I think Russia has overplayed this issue. We have never had such a situation in the 40 years since Russia and the previous Soviet Union made gas supplies."

Demanding Ukraine agree to end years of paying below-market prices for gas, Russia Sunday cut off shipments to the country, which also carries 80% of Russia's gas exports to Europe. After European customers began reporting steep declines in the flow of Russian gas, Moscow on Monday put more gas into the pipeline.

A spokesman for Russian state-controlled gas monopoly OAO Gazprom, which supplies a quarter of Europe's gas and aims to increase those sales, also admitted that the still-simmering crisis "absolutely has a negative impact on Russia's image and reputation."

Across Europe, officials were calling for steps to reduce dependence on Russian fuel. Poland, whose energy dependency on Russia is a legacy of its former status as a satellite of Moscow, launched an urgent search for new suppliers of natural gas. "I've instructed the economy minister to urgently prepare investment decisions allowing us to diversify gas supplies," Prime Minister Kazimierz Marcinkiewicz said.

Mr. Piebalgs said, "The situation has shown how vulnerable the union is to shortages of gas supply." A meeting today of representatives of EU member states and the gas industry will discuss how they would deal with future threats to Europe's supply. The Continent has few alternatives for supply with Norway producing at capacity and British gas fields in decline.

Both Russia and Ukraine showed interest yesterday in resolving the gas cutoff, which led to Monday's Europe-wide shortages, Russian accusations that Ukraine was at fault for stealing Europe-bound gas and Ukrainian denials. Gazprom said talks were planned with Ukrainian officials, though there was no sign of a compromise.

While European officials said the conflict is an economic one over prices, the crisis has clear political overtones. Under a 2004 deal with the previous government in Kiev, Moscow had agreed to continue to supply inexpensive fuel to Ukraine through 2009. But after pro-Western President Viktor Yushchenko took office early last year, Moscow has sought to raise the prices to world-market levels. The sides differ on what the terms of the contracts mean.

Gazprom officials said there is no valid contract for shipments to Ukraine this year and warned that the gas titan might not be able to continue to keep up supplies for European customers if demand in Ukraine -- now low because of unseasonably warm weather -- rises. Ukrainian officials said they were taking only gas they are entitled to under past agreements.

Gas Halt May Produce Big Ripples In European Policy (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

FRANKFURT, Jan. 3 - Russia's shutdown of natural gas lines to Ukraine lasted less than 48 hours, but the repercussions could last far longer in Western Europe, which also relies heavily on Russian gas.

Even as the flow of gas to Germany, France and other countries resumed at normal levels by Tuesday evening, public officials and energy experts called on the Continent to rethink its energy policy.

Russia's standoff with Ukraine has exposed a deep European dependence on Russia, the officials and experts said. To reduce that vulnerability, they said, Europe should seek out other gas suppliers and develop alternative fuels, like clean-burning coal, nuclear power and renewable energy.

"If Russia is prepared to run the risk of cutting off supplies to its neighbors if they have a disagreement, how reliable are they as a supplier?" said William Ramsay, deputy executive director of the International Energy Agency, which advises 26 industrialized nations. "You have to ask the question."

Russia is virtually the sole supplier of gas to large swaths of Central and Eastern Europe, and to close neighbors like Finland. France and Italy buy between a quarter and a third of their imported gas from Russia.

In Germany, which is by far Russia's largest customer and has made energy the cornerstone of a broad economic alliance with Moscow, some experts said the standoff might even have political implications.

"Germany's alliance with Russia was not just conceived as a commercial deal, but as a way to integrate Russia into Europe," said Alexander Rahr, a Russia expert at the German Council on Foreign Relations in Berlin. "This could be in jeopardy if the gas dispute continues."

DOJ_NMG_0008160

The European Union, he said, is likely to rush to Ukraine's defense in its dispute with Russia over gas prices, giving Germany little choice but to fall in line. And Russia can no longer count on the friendship between President Vladimir V. Putin and Gerhard Schröder, who stepped down as German chancellor in November.

Mr. Schröder's successor, Angela Merkel, has not commented publicly on the dispute between Moscow and Kiev. But her economics minister, Michael Glos, said Monday that Germany would increase its Russian gas purchases only if Moscow proved itself to be a dependable supplier.

Mr. Glos also rekindled a debate over Germany's larger energy policy, saying the new government ought to reconsider the Schröder government's plan to phase out nuclear power by 2021.

Mrs. Merkel supports extending the life of Germany's nuclear plants. But during negotiations to form a government, she was unable to persuade the Social Democrats with whom she shares power to shelve the planned phase-out, which had been championed by Mr. Schröder's coalition partner, the Green Party.

"The latest developments show how important it is to draw on a balanced, broad energy mix," Mr. Glos said in a statement on Monday. In a radio interview, he added, "The German nuclear power plants were doomed by the Red-Green coalition to be switched off only for political reasons."

Some experts predicted that Russia's recent actions would strengthen Mrs. Merkel's hand. Germany imports more than 40 percent of its gas from Russia, and within hours of the shutdown, the largest German supplier, E.ON Ruhrgas, said it was not getting its normal amounts of gas.

"We understand that Russia cannot continue to subsidize Ukraine with very cheap gas, given rising market prices," the company's chairman, Burckhard Bergmann, said in a statement. "But it is also important to raise prices to the international market level in steps that Ukraine can cope with."

Mr. Bergmann's careful tone is not surprising, given his company's complex ties with Russia. Ruhrgas owns a stake in Gazprom, Russia's gas monopoly, in addition to being one of its main customers. It is also a partner with Gazprom in a $4.7 billion project to build a pipeline from Russia, under the Baltic Sea, to Germany and other parts of Western Europe.

Mr. Schröder brokered that deal with Mr. Putin shortly before he left office. He later accepted a job as the chairman of the board of a Russian-German consortium that is building the pipeline - a decision that drew withering criticism from across the political spectrum here.

Experts note that the energy alliance between Germany and Russia originated under Helmut Kohl, Mrs. Merkel's political mentor, not Mr. Schröder - a fact the chancellor is sure to recall when she visits Moscow this month. She is unlikely to derail an arrangement that has profited both nations.

"She might tell them when she goes there about the mess one can make by using energy as a political tool," said Mr. Rahr. "But she will do nothing to question the energy alliance between Germany and Russia."

Other experts argue that the European Union should negotiate an agreement with Russia that guarantees fair prices to all its members. Otherwise, there will be further disputes like this one.

While many here said they welcomed a debate over energy policy, some worried that it would be limited to perennial topics like nuclear power rather than forward-looking issues, like renewable energy.

Ukraine, for example, has the most potential of any European country to generate energy from crops, grasses and trees, often referred to as biomass, because of its rich soil and low population density, according to Hermann Scheer, president of the European Association for Renewable Energy.

"Those who prolong the current energy system are simply provoking things like the gas dispute," he said.

Ukrainians Angry Over Moscow Gas Dispute (AP)

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

KIEV, Ukraine — Disgruntled Ukrainians thronged Bessarabsky Market in downtown Kiev in freezing temperatures Tuesday to buy electric heaters after a natural gas cutoff by Russia brought on by a pricing dispute.

The halt of Russian gas supplies that began Sunday has not yet caused major heating problems, but Kiev residents feared the two sides were far from a resolution. Russian and Ukrainian officials agreed Tuesday to resume talks on the issue.

Residents of the capital largely blamed Russia, which wants Ukraine to pay four times more for gas than it did last year.

"It's Russia's revamped imperialism behind all this. They believe that with the cutoff of gas they can dominate us," said Valentyn Vasilyev, 32, who was among those buying a heater.

"Thanks to Russia I am now wasting handsome money on an electric heater. But Muscovites will not win this time," said 46-year-old Olena Kostenko, wiping her nose as it started to snow.

For the vendor doing a brisk trade at the open-air stand, the gas dispute has been good news. He sold 10 heaters in less than an hour, for $21 each.

DOJ_NMG_0008161

"I regret I didn't have more of these," said Yuriy, who gave only his first name because he feared legal problems for selling unlicensed goods. "People are buying like crazy."

Nearby a poster read, "Do not buy Russian goods," and "Do not give money to Russian oppressors."

The cutoff also reduced gas supplies to Europe, which gets about a quarter of its gas from Ukraine, though the European countries most affected _ Hungary, Austria, Slovakia and Slovenia _ reported supplies were back to normal Tuesday.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack criticized Russia for "the use of energy for political purposes."

Noting that Europe was in the midst of winter's cold, McCormack said the decision by Russia to restore most of the gas it had withheld Monday to European countries "does not resolve the issue,"

The gas dispute highlights Ukraine's dependence on Russia as the key supplier to its energy inefficient industries. It also demonstrates Russia's opposition to Ukraine's attempts to break out of the Kremlin's sphere of influence and join the European Union and NATO.

Ukraine's tilt toward the West since President Viktor Yushchenko took office a year ago has irritated the Kremlin.

Ukraine's Foreign Ministry has characterized the gas dispute as an attempt by Moscow to wreck Ukraine's economy as the country tries to integrate into Western Europe.

Some Ukrainians, however, mainly pensioners with strong emotional ties to the former Soviet Union, still believe the country's future lies in the renewal of centuries-long economic, ethnic, religious and cultural links with Russia.

"What are we without Russia? A wasteland, nothing. You argue with a bear and it will ultimately eat you," retired army officer Mykola Kostenyk said.

Many communities in Ukraine's west reported a decrease in gas supplies and local providers said they would stop heating schools during the winter holidays.

In the key western city of Lviv, several factories reported shifting from gas to coal or oil as their primary energy source.

On Tuesday, a pro-Russian opposition bloc loyal to Ukraine's first post-Soviet president, Leonid Kravchuk, demanded an urgent parliamentary session about the gas dispute and said a new caretaker government should be appointed until March parliamentary elections.

In a statement, Kravchuk's bloc said the current Cabinet, loyal to Yushchenko and Prime Minister Yuriy Yekhanurov, "cannot be an effective participant in any talks with the Russian side, including the gas issue."

Yushchenko and his allies "took a deliberately hostile position toward Russia on a broad range of international issues," the statement said.

Meanwhile, the office of the prosecutor general ordered a probe into the activities of all companies responsible for storing and securing gas supplies throughout Ukraine and overseeing "all the activities related with rational use of energy," a statement said.

Gas Price Dispute Worries Europeans (WT)

By Andrew Borowiec And David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

A bitter pricing dispute with Ukraine that briefly disrupted Russia's natural-gas supplies to Europe has fueled fears over Moscow's growing clout as an energy supplier to the Continent.

Gas shipments through Ukraine to Europe returned to normal yesterday -- a day after they were severely restricted in the pricing fight -- but doubts about Russia's reliability and intentions as an energy supplier dominated the European press.

"Welcome to the new Cold War," wrote the London Times, describing Moscow's leading role as energy supplier "Russia's most powerful weapon in its post-Soviet arsenal."

The dispute put in sharp relief two contrasting priorities of Russian President Vladimir Putin's foreign policy: his desire to use Russia's energy reserves to cement ties to Europe and his willingness to use those same resources to bring Ukraine's pro-Western government to heel.

Vladimir Socor, an analyst with the Jamestown Foundation, said Mr. Putin's goals in the dispute are "twofold."

He wants to "defeat Ukraine's [pro-Western] Orange political camp in the upcoming political elections and compel Ukraine to turn its transit-pipeline system into a Russian-Ukrainian consortium," Mr. Socor wrote in an analysis of the crisis.

Analysts said yesterday Moscow may have underestimated how badly the shutdown will damage its reputation in Europe, which now gets a quarter of its natural gas from Russia. The dispute also comes just as Russia assumes for the first time the chairmanship of the Group of Eight industrial powers.

London's Daily Mail called Russia's G-8 presidency "a travesty the West will come to regret," while in Paris, the conservative Le Figaro's headline proclaimed: "Putin plunges Europe into difficulty."

DOJ_NMG_0008162

European Union officials said yesterday there was no immediate supply crisis, but EU Energy Commissioner Andris Piebalgs told reporters that "the situation has shown how vulnerable the Union is to shortages of gas supply."

Representatives of the 25 EU member states and the gas industry meet today in Brussels on ways to deal with future threats to Europe's gas supply.

Russian and Ukrainian energy officials began separate talks yesterday in Moscow to discuss the dispute.

The showdown pushed up world oil prices in New York and London markets.

Russian officials deny a political motive in the showdown, saying they switched off Ukraine's gas because Kiev rejected an abrupt, fourfold increase in gas prices to market levels. Russia also accuses Kiev of siphoning off pipeline shipments meant for European customers.

The Bush administration, which has strongly backed new Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko, said Gazprom's sharp price increase "raises questions about the use of energy to exert political pressure," according to State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

"Such a change should be introduced over time, rather than suddenly and unilaterally," Mr. McCormack said.

EU Could Step In To Help Solve Gas Dispute (FT)

By Sarah Laitner In Brussels And Tom Warner In Kiev

Financial Times, January 4, 2006

Energy experts meet on Wednesday in Brussels to thrash out the EU's response to the Russia-Ukraine gas dispute after the stand-off led to a cut in European supplies.

European diplomats in Kiev said the EU could be prepared to play a more proactive role to help solve the dispute.

The threat to European supplies has renewed the debate over whether the EU needs a common energy policy to address its growing dependence on imported oil and gas.

The European Commission on Tuesday defended itself against criticism that it should have reacted more rapidly to the disruption when Russia cut the amount of gas it exports via a pipeline in Ukraine. Gas supplies to France fell 30 per cent on Monday, while countries in eastern Europe that rely heavily on Russian exports saw even bigger falls. The Commission insisted the dispute was between a gas supplier and transit operator.

Brussels has few weapons in its arsenal to respond to threats to EU supplies because energy policies are largely dealt with by the member states.

Tony Blair, British prime minister, raised eyebrows in October when he called for a common EU energy policy that included countries co-ordinating efforts to negotiate with suppliers.

“For far too long we have been in the situation where, in a haphazard and random way energy needs and energy priorities are simply determined in each country according to its needs, but without any sense of the collective power we could have in Europe if we were prepared to pool our energy and our resources,” Mr Blair told the European parliament.

But member states have been reluctant to extend Brussels’ powers over such a sensitive area as energy.

Predictions that two thirds of Europe's total energy and three quarters of its gas will be imported by 2020 are likely to spur calls for greater co-ordination to secure supplies.

Part of the difficulty lies in defining what a common European energy policy would be. The EU has spent more than a decade liberalising gas and electricity markets to create a single pan-European market, efforts which have been hampered by structural weaknesses in Europe's energy network and a lack of competition.

But member states have reacted coolly to ideas such as Commission control over strategic oil reserves or direction from Brussels on nuclear power options.

In a paper prepared for the British presidency of the EU, which ended last month, Prof Dieter Helm of Oxford University suggested measures such as creation of an EU gas security and storage regime and a European information exchange on future capacity plans.

Ukraine Concedes It Took Gas From Pipeline But Says It Had The Contractual Right (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

KIEV, Ukraine, Jan. 3 - Ukraine conceded Tuesday that it had withdrawn natural gas from its pipeline system that Russia said was intended for export to Europe, but said it had a contractual right to the fuel under an agreement with the Central Asian nation of Turkmenistan.

Both Russia and Turkmenistan export natural gas through Russian pipelines to Ukraine, which customarily takes some for its own use and ships the rest on to other European countries. But Russia cut the flow through the pipeline on Sunday, ostensibly in a dispute with Ukraine over pricing and transit fees. That set off alarm bells throughout Europe during the winter heating season and shook world energy markets' confidence in Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0008163

Russia placed blame for the shortages on Ukraine, saying it stole gas intended for export, but under pressure from European governments, Russia restored full flow to the pipeline on Monday. Despite the bickering, the two countries resumed negotiations on gas prices on Tuesday.

Nevertheless, the price of crude oil leapt by more than $2 a barrel on Tuesday in afternoon trading on the New York Mercantile Exchange, fed by concerns over Russia's reliability. Crude oil prices rose to a two-month high of $63.80 a barrel at midday before pulling back slightly.

While admitting that they took their usual allotment of gas on Tuesday, Ukrainian officials dismissed Russian claims that the gas had been stolen. Mikola Goncharuk, a member of the board of Ukraine's natural gas company, Naftogaz, said at a news conference in Kiev that his company had indeed drawn down gas from the pipeline system, but under a contract with Turkmenistan. Russian export gas, he said, was untouched.

"We are demanding the full volume of gas from Turkmenistan today," Mr. Goncharuk said. "For now we can get by without Russian gas."

Gazprom, Russia's government-owned gas company, insists that the pipeline carries only Russian gas for export to Europe.

Meanwhile, the political fallout continued from Russia's brief gas embargo, which was widely regarded in Europe as punishment of Ukraine for its rejection of Moscow in elections last year and its continued turn to the West and away from the Russian orbit.

In Washington, the State Department spokesman criticized Russia's use of energy as a foreign policy tool, while Austria and other Central and Eastern European countries agreed to make the diversification of energy supplies a priority, though they did not say how they would achieve it.

The European Union's top energy official said Tuesday that the pricing dispute could fester for weeks to come, jeopardizing one of the Continent's primary sources of energy. Andris Piebalgs, the energy commissioner, said the agreement by the two sides to resume talks on the issue was "just a temporary calmdown," according to the Bloomberg news agency.

Each side in the dispute has plausibly blamed the other because the pipeline system, a great achievement of the Soviet Union's postwar industrial expansion, was built as a unified web. After the Soviet Union broke up, the successor states divided the gas flow through treaties and commercial agreements that grew more complex each year.

Companies subsidized others, shrewd businessmen made millions or billions exploiting price discrepancies, gas utilities became government slush funds and corruption blossomed.

The gas is sometimes mingled in the web of pipes. In the argument on Tuesday, Ukraine said some of the gas entering its pipeline system had been bought from Turkmenistan and shipped by an intermediary company. Mr. Goncharuk said his company paid last Friday for 126 million cubic meters a day of gas from Turkmenistan, for an unspecified period.

He said that Ukraine therefore had a right to withdraw that volume of gas from its pipelines, but that it had chosen to take only 90 million cubic meters out of concern for the security of natural gas flows to Europe during the winter.

The Russian minister of industry and energy, Viktor Khristenko, said Tuesday that Gazprom had contracted the entire export capacity of Turkmenistan for the first quarter of 2006, the Dow Jones news service reported.

In statements carried in the Russian news media, Turkmenistan's mercurial and authoritarian leader, Saparmurat Niyazov, who presides over a closed nation deep in Central Asia, shed little light on the dispute. He has confirmed sales to Ukraine without elaborating on the discrepancy with Gazprom's statements. Gazprom controls the pipeline leading north from his country.

Mr. Goncharuk also asserted that Ukraine had a right to withdraw additional gas from the pipelines in lieu of transit fees from Russia under a barter agreement reached in 2004 and in force in 2005.

Volodymyr R. Sidenko, chief economist at the Institute of Economic Forecasting in the Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, said: "Ukraine considers if we have not arrived at any agreement, the old one is in effect. The Russian side rejects these arguments."

Meanwhile, the gas dispute has already dented Ukraine's energy-intensive economy. Chemical and metallurgical industries slowed production to reduce demand by 15 to 20 percent, according to a statement by the Ukrainian government.

While Kiev scored points for withstanding what European nations almost universally regarded as Russia's intimidation tactics, its energy troubles are far from over.

Natural gas-guzzling steel mills and chemical plants earn much of Ukraine's export revenues. Outdated and inefficient, many have scraped by since the collapse of the Soviet Union only because of cheap energy from Russia. Market-rate energy prices, which Ukrainian officials acknowledge they must pay eventually, could plunge Ukraine back into recession, officials here have said.

DOJ_NMG_0008164

On average, metallurgical plants would become unprofitable at natural gas prices above $105 per 1,000 cubic meters, according to estimates by Mr. Sidenko. The chemical industry would be unprofitable at prices above $85, he said.

Under the 2005 contract, negotiated before the Orange Revolution, Ukraine pays $50 per 1,000 cubic meters. Gazprom is asking for $220 to $230 now, about double what most other former Soviet states pay.

Gazprom Says Gas Supplies Back on (REU)

By Christian Lowe

Reuters, January 4, 2006

MOSCOW (Reuters) - Russia's gas deliveries to European customers returned to normal on Tuesday as it traded insults with former ally Ukraine over who was to blame for supply disruptions across the continent.

Russian energy officials were set to meet counterparts from Ukraine on Tuesday to discuss the dispute but there was no sign of a softening of tone on either side in a dispute with clear political overtones.

Russia switched off Ukraine's gas when Kiev rejected a big hike in prices. It was forced to turn the taps back on after key European partners complained their supplies had been hit too and chided Moscow for using energy as a political tool.

Relations between the ex-Soviet allies, already strained after Ukraine elected a West-leaning leader a year ago, have now hit a new low with the gas dispute.

Russia has accused Ukraine of stealing gas intended for other European countries. Ukraine says Russia is lying.

The crisis has lent new urgency to efforts by European states to reevaluate their energy policy to ensure supplies are secure. EU energy officials meet for emergency talks on Wednesday.

Italy, Germany and France said their gas supplies from Russia were back to normal after Russia's state-run Gazprom pushed extra gas into the system to make up for the earlier shortfall.

However, Gazprom warned there was still a risk of supply disruptions to Europe if Ukraine continues to steal gas.

"There is still a danger that the situation could develop in such a way that we are not going to be in a position to compensate," Gazprom deputy CEO Alexander Medvedev told Reuters in an interview.

Ukraine has said it will help itself to Russian gas piped across its territory if temperatures dip below freezing.

MEETING PLANNED

Senior officials from Gazprom and Ukraine's state Naftogaz company were to meet later on Tuesday for the first time since negotiations collapsed in the final hours of 2005.

But the gulf between them was huge. In Moscow and Kiev, everyone from gas executives, television anchors, prime ministers and foreign ministry spokesmen lined up to blame the other side for the crisis.

Russia said it was Ukraine's fault by refusing to pay the same prices as its European neighbours, rejecting a last-minute compromise offered by Putin and then stealing Europe's gas when Gazprom, in exasperation, finally turned the taps off.

Ukraine was just as vehement. "The fact is that Gazprom officials are lying," said Naftogaz Ukrainy spokesman Eduard Zanyuk.

Ukraine said the Kremlin was punishing it for daring to pull away from its sphere of influence.

The Kremlin has made no secret of its dislike of the West-leaning stand of Ukraine's President Viktor Yushchenko who rose to power a year ago after mass protests forced a rerun of an election initially won by a Moscow-backed candidate.

Moscow is demanding an increase in the price Ukraine pays for its gas to $230 (133 pounds) per 1,000 cubic metres from the current $50 price that is rooted in Soviet-era subsidies.

Ukraine says such a big hike will badly damage its economy.

Ukraine's gross domestic product may fall by 5 percent and inflation rise to 27-30 percent in 2006 if the price for Russian gas increases to $230, a senior government official was quoted as saying on Tuesday by Unian news agency.

ENERGY RETHINK

The wobble in gas supplies sent a chill through capitals and energy markets, with some analysts saying the disruption had hurt Russia's credibility as a dependable supplier of energy.

Prices for oil -- Russia's other major money earner -- jumped a dollar to just over $60 a barrel as consumers feared the row could yet crimp fuel supplies to Europe. In Britain -- Europe's only major, freely traded gas market -- wholesale prices rose as much as 8 percent on Tuesday.

Tony Blair's spokesman said the British Prime Minister has long believed the EU needed a more coherent energy policy to meet the challenges of energy supply and security.

"These events have underlined the Prime Minister's thinking in making that argument," said the spokesman.

Noe Van Hulst, a director with energy watchdog the International Energy Agency, said Russia was playing a risky game.

DOJ_NMG_0008165

"From the Russians' perspective, it's not in their long term interest to put their reputation (as a reliable energy supplier) ... at risk. It's dangerous," Van Hulst told Reuters.

It was unclear how the row would play out politically for Ukraine's Yushchenko.

His supporters say by cutting off gas Moscow had tried to put his administration in a bad light ahead of a March parliamentary election, when his biggest challengers will be the pro-Moscow parties.

But some analysts said the crisis would cost the pro-Moscow opposition support if voters view Russia's actions as aggressive and unfriendly.

Russia's Energy Politics (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

RUSSIAN PRESIDENT Vladimir Putin once again has overplayed his hand. In his zeal to reestablish Moscow's dominion over Ukraine, he has, as he did during the Orange Revolution, triggered an international crisis that could end up weakening rather than strengthening Russia's international position. Mr. Putin hoped that by shutting off gas supplies to Ukraine on Sunday, he could undermine its democratic and pro-Western government. Instead, he has provided a timely wake-up call to Western European countries dependent on Russian energy supplies. Those nations now see how Mr. Putin understands the question of "energy security," which he would make one of the principal topics for discussion by the Group of Eight this year.

For Ukraine and other former Soviet republics, Russia's crude use of energy for political ends is an old story. For years Moscow has been using its control over natural gas to reward neighbors who submit to its political diktat, such as Belarus, and punish those who seek greater independence, such as Georgia and Moldova. It has also been trying to gain control over pipelines carrying gas and oil, as well as electricity networks, by using gas as a lever. That leverage is considerable: Russia holds more than a quarter of the world's gas supplies and is a major supplier to virtually every country in Europe.

Ukraine used to be one of Moscow's pampered clients. In 2004, as part of his overt attempt to install a pro-Moscow puppet as Ukrainian president, Mr. Putin promised to heavily subsidize Ukraine's gas for years to come. But his meddling catalyzed the Orange Revolution, which gave Ukraine a democratic government determined to preserve its independence. So now Mr. Putin, acting baldly through the state-controlled company Gazprom, is seeking to quadruple the price Ukraine pays just weeks before parliamentary elections in which pro-Moscow parties are bidding to regain power. In partially shutting down supplies on Sunday, Mr. Putin calculated that Ukraine would allow Russian gas free transit to countries farther west through the same pipeline -- or, if it did not, that Western governments would blame Kiev.

Instead, when gas pressure fell off sharply yesterday in Vienna, Rome and Paris, it was Mr. Putin who was reproached -- including by such customers as Germany, which recently agreed to a controversial plan for a new pipeline under the Baltic Sea. Mr. Putin was forced to back down, though the underlying price dispute with Ukraine remains unresolved. He has a sensible way out of the conflict, which the Bush administration is urging on him: a negotiation in which Ukraine agrees to a gradual shift toward world market prices. Poland and the Baltic countries have cut such deals with Russia in the past -- though the prices they pay Gazprom are nowhere near what Mr. Putin proposed to charge Ukraine.

Even if Mr. Putin adopts this course, Western countries should absorb an important lesson. Without a prosperous or technologically advanced economy and with greatly reduced military strength, Mr. Putin hopes to restore Russia's world-power status through its control of gas. That inevitably means manipulating supplies to other countries for political ends. Western countries that do not wish to receive Mr. Putin's ultimatums -- from Germany, France and Britain to the United States, which is being pressed by Russia to line up as a major customer for new Arctic gas fields -- should realize that dependence on Russian gas is not consistent with "energy security." Instead they should develop alternative sources of supply, or a greater emphasis on nuclear energy. Russia cannot be allowed to hold its neighbors, or the world, hostage during a future cold winter.

Russia Shoots Itself In The Foot (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

If President Vladimir Putin wants to convince the world that Russia is a more reliable energy supplier than the Middle East, playing and losing a game of chicken with Ukraine was not the way to go. Mr. Putin tried to use a pricing dispute between Gazprom, Russia's behemoth, and Naftogaz of Ukraine to punish President Viktor Yushchenko for Ukraine's westward leanings. Instead, he gave Russia another black eye and antagonized Europe.

When Gazprom turned down the natural gas spigot a notch, Ukraine simply took what it needed, leaving Europe short of fuel, furious and anxious. That's not a great start for Mr. Putin's turn at the head of the Group of 8, especially since energy security was to be his theme song.

Not that the conflict reflects that well on Ukraine. Russia has long charged wildly different rates to former Soviet republics, depending on their degree of loyalty or usefulness. Thus Belarus, which ceded control of all its pipelines to Russia and is firmly in the Kremlin's orbit, pays $47 per 1,000 cubic meters, while Estonia and Latvia, both in the European Union and NATO, pay about $120. The average price in Western Europe is expected to go over $250 this year. Ukraine had been paying $50, and using the energy wastefully and corruptly. Mr. Yushchenko has also been using cheap fuel as a lure for Western investors. Well, if Ukraine wants to play in the West, it may soon have to pay like the West.

DOJ_NMG_0008166

Russia is still a more secure energy supplier than the Middle East. But Europe and the United States should remind Mr. Putin that energy security is a two-way street. Ukraine has no permanent right to a gas subsidy, but as long as Mr. Putin uses pricing to reward and punish, he undermines Russia's claim to be a reliable, businesslike supplier.

Morales Aligns Himself With Castro, Chavez (AP)

By Christopher Toothaker

The Associated Press, January 4, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela — President Hugo Chavez offered Bolivia's president-elect diesel fuel, trade benefits and help in financing his social reforms as the two leftists cemented ties, reasserting their opposition to U.S. policy in Latin America.

Fresh from a visit with Cuba's Fidel Castro, Evo Morales said in Caracas at the start of a seven-nation world tour that he and the Venezuelan leader were uniting in a "fight against neoliberalism and imperialism."

Morales' next stops are Spain, France, Belgium, South Africa, China and Brazil — but not Washington. Morales' spokesman says he was not invited to Washington, where officials have expressed concern of the growing alliance between Morales, Chavez and Castro.

The Venezuelan leader received him with full military honors as well as hugs and smiles. Crowds of leftist, pro-government supporters cheered as Morales and Chavez arrived at the National Pantheon in downtown Caracas, then headed to a private meeting at Miraflores Palace.

Morales, who takes office as Bolivia's first Indian president on Jan. 22, predicted more leftist leaders would come to power in the region Tuesday in Caracas.

"The time of the people has arrived. This is the new millenium of the people," he said before leaving later that evening for Spain.

During the trip, Morales is expected to discuss with other leaders Bolivia's vast natural gas holdings — the second largest in South America — which he has said he wants to nationalize. But he says he would leave alone foreign oil and gas companies.

The trip is also designed to show that the coca-growing protest organizer has the presidential grit to hold his own on the world stage and tackle the deep problems of his country, including poverty and political instability.

At a joint news conference, Chavez said Venezuela would supply 150,000 barrels of diesel fuel monthly to Bolivia to supplant the impoverished country's imports.

"I won't accept you paying us a cent, you are going to pay us in agricultural products," said Chavez, adding that the offer was worth $180 million a year.

Chavez also said Venezuela will donate $30 million to Morales' government following his Jan. 22 inauguration.

In praising Castro and Chavez on Tuesday, he clearly established Washington's fiercest Latin American critics as his models.

"We are here to resolve social problems, economic problems," Morales said. "This movement is not only in Bolivia; Fidel in Cuba and Hugo in Venezuela are logging triumphs in social movements and leftist policies."

"We are going to change Bolivia. We are going to change Latin America," Morales said.

Chavez referred to the three leftist leaders as "an axis of good" — a play on President Bush's reference to North Korea, Iran and prewar Iraq as the "axis of evil."

Just back from his first trip abroad over the weekend — to communist Cuba — Morales met on Monday with U.S. Ambassador David Greenlee. Representatives of both sides said the meeting was private and declined to give details.

Morales vowed during his campaign to be Washington's "nightmare," but has said he is open to developing relations with the United States. American officials, too, have said they hope to work with Morales.

"We'll see what kinds of policies President Morales pursues," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. "And, based on that, we'll see what kind of relationship the United States and Bolivia will have."

Chavez says he is leading a socialist revolution and has taken increasing control of the oil and gas industry.

High oil prices and the greater share of industry profits have allowed him to fund growing social programs, a goal Morales says he shares.

Morales' opposition to U.S.-led efforts to eradicate coca cultivation in his Andean nation also have alarmed Washington. Coca is the source of cocaine, but Bolivia's Indians also use it for hunger suppression and medicinal purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0008167

Morales tended llamas as a young boy and rose to power at the head of street demonstrations that toppled two presidents, demanding that more power be transferred from the country's long-ruling lighter-skinned elite to Bolivia's poor Indian majority.

Peru Asks Chile To Extradite Fujimori To Face A Range Of Charges (NYT)

By Larry Rohter And Pascale Bonnefoy

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile, Jan. 3 - The government of Peru formally requested Tuesday that Chile extradite former President Alberto Fujimori, who governed Peru during the 1990's and has been held in custody here ever since he unexpectedly arrived two months ago from exile in Japan.

Mr. Fujimori, 67, is wanted in Peru on more than a dozen counts of corruption and violating human rights. The accusations against him range from bearing the responsibility for death squad killings and unauthorized wiretaps to paying bribes and siphoning money from government ministries.

In the past, Mr. Fujimori has denied all of the charges against him, saying they are part of a political campaign to discredit him. Peru is scheduled to hold an election for president in April, and though Mr. Fujimori has been ruled ineligible because of the charges, he had declared himself a candidate and was apparently on his way back to Peru to campaign when he landed here in November.

Relations between Chile and Peru have been tense for more than a century, and remain so because of disagreements over maritime boundaries. But at a news conference, the Chilean foreign minister, Ignacio Walker, said the Fujimori case was a purely legal matter, not an affair of state. "The courts offer guarantees of complete impartiality," he said. "This should not perturb our bilateral relations in any way."

Leaders of Peruvian human rights organizations and relatives of death-squad victims came from Lima to lobby for extradition. "We hope that the Chilean courts will act as consistently as they have recently with Pinochet," said Francisco Soberón, a member of one such group, referring to the former Chilean dictator who has been stripped of his immunity from prosecution for human rights abuses and corruption offenses.

Under Chilean law, government lawyers will now question Mr. Fujimori about the charges against him. Eventually, the case will move to the Chilean Supreme Court, which may take months to rule. "We are convinced there is more than enough evidence than what the Chilean Supreme Court normally requires for an indictment," José Miguel Vivanco, the executive director of Human Rights Watch, said in an interview here. "Denial of extradition would be incomprehensible, inexcusable."

When Mr. Fujimori arrived here, he was given a 90-day tourist visa, which expires Feb. 7. Theoretically, Chile's president, Ricardo Lagos, could decide not to renew the visa and have Mr. Fujimori expelled to Peru.

There are, however, local legal precedents that work in Mr. Fujimori's favor, including some involving both Nazi war criminals and former associates of Mr. Fujimori. When Argentine judges recently sought the arrest and extradition of one of that country's former presidents, Carlos Saúl Menem, after he went into exile here, Chilean courts turned down their requests.

Mr. Fujimori, in fact, has hired Mr. Menem's lawyer, Gabriel Zaliasnik. Mr. Zaliasnik said last month that his client had come here because he "thought that the Chilean authorities would not discriminate against him" but that they would "treat him the same way they did with respect to Carlos Menem."

Hours after his arrival here, Mr. Fujimori was detained because of the charges he faces, and remains in custody at a police training school. His lawyer said Mr. Fujimori had been learning to play guitar and cultivating a small rose garden, but the Peruvian authorities complain that he has also been using meetings with relatives and associates to direct his supporters' actions back home.

Peru Asks Chile To Extradite Fujimori (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

BUENOS AIRES, Jan. 3 -- Peru's government on Tuesday formally asked Chile to extradite former president Alberto Fujimori and handed over 12 boxes of evidence that it said links him to human rights violations and corruption.

Fujimori was arrested on Nov. 7 in Chile, after defying an international warrant and returning to South America from Japan, which had granted him asylum when he fled Peru in 2000 during a corruption scandal. At the time of his arrest, Fujimori said he had hoped to return to Peru to run for president in this year's election.

The Peruvian government is seeking to prosecute Fujimori on 12 charges of crimes alleged to have been committed during his 1990-2000 presidency, including responsibility for a death squad accused of killing 25 people in two incidents. He also is accused of torture, illegal telephone surveillance, misuse of government funds and bribery. Fujimori denies all the charges.

DOJ_NMG_0008168

Officials said the evidence presented to the Chilean Foreign Ministry includes testimony from many former Fujimori allies, several of whom have been tried in recent years for acts committed during Fujimori's authoritarian administration. Among those convicted were cabinet ministers, an ex-armed forces chief and Vladimiro Montesinos, a former intelligence chief who has been sentenced to 15 years on corruption and arms-dealing charges.

A Chilean Supreme Court judge is to rule on whether the evidence meets the main requirement for extradition -- establishing probable cause for a trial on charges considered serious crimes in both Peru and Chile.

"My sense is that there is enough evidence for any reasonable court to justify Fujimori's extradition," said Jose Miguel Vivanco, Americas director of New York-based Human Rights Watch. "Many key members of Fujimori's government have consistently implicated him in cases that are clearly crimes in Peru and also in Chile."

The Peruvian government also asked that Chile continue to detain Fujimori, who is being held at a correctional officers academy in Santiago, the capital. A spokesman for Fujimori in Lima, the Peruvian capital, told the Reuters news agency that his attorneys were seeking his release.

The extradition process could be lengthy, with many observers predicting deliberations that could stretch over several months and possibly more than a year. A judge on Chile's Supreme Court, Orlando Alvarez, is to review the evidence and question Fujimori and other witnesses. His decision could be appealed to a panel of five justices, which would issue a final decision.

Even though the Peruvian Congress banned Fujimori from running for president until at least 2011, the former leader had announced his intention to run before his arrest. His backers have continued to promote his candidacy, holding rallies on his behalf. Supporters praise Fujimori for having crushed the violent Shining Path rebel group and controlling hyperinflation with austere fiscal policies.

Blair Presses Bush On Engine Deal (REU-Y2)

By Jim Wolf

Reuters, January 4, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair has written to U.S. President George W. Bush to try to save a multibillion-dollar contract to develop an engine for the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, the Pentagon's costliest warplane program, people familiar with the matter said on Tuesday.

"A letter went from the prime minister to the president shortly before Christmas," said a person who asked not to be identified because of the matter's sensitivity.

At issue is a Pentagon plan, reported last week but in the works for more than a month, to kill a $2.4 billion General Electric Co.-Rolls-Royce Plc contract to develop an alternate turbofan engine for the fighter.

Pratt & Whitney, a United Technologies Corp. unit, is building the engine that will go in the first F-35s, a family of single-engine, radar-evading aircraft being built by Lockheed Martin Corp..

Proponents of an alternate engine have cited potential savings through competition. They also describe it as a hedge against having to ground the fleet in case of engine trouble. But developing a second engine has boosted development costs, something the Pentagon is under pressure to pare.

SALES IN THE BALANCE

If upheld by the White House and Congress in budget wrangling, canceling the project could mean tens of billions of dollars in extra sales over decades for Pratt & Whitney.

Saving the alternate engine program "was the purpose of (Blair's) letter," another person familiar the matter said.

"We're gratified by the efforts of our partner, Rolls-Royce, which has shared concerns with the U.K. government," said Rick Kennedy, a spokesman for Cincinnati, Ohio-based GE/Aviation, a GE division.

Rolls-Royce described the alternate engine program in a statement as "an important collaboration" between the United States and the United Kingdom but declined to comment on the Pentagon's cancellation plan.

The White House did not return a phone call seeking comment. Steve Atkins, a spokesman for the British Embassy in Washington, said: "We don't comment on confidential government-to-government correspondence."

Blair, Bush's staunchest foreign partner on Iraq, is well-placed to save the GE-Rolls-Royce engine. Britain has committed at least $2 billion to co-development of the F-35, the most of any of the project's eight foreign partners.

GE and Rolls-Royce, one of Britain's premier brands, won the $2.4 billion development contract in July. It is due to run through September 2013. The big money is in spares and maintenance over the engines' projected 40-year lifespan.

"Any letter from Blair is likely to get the president's very close attention," said Loren Thompson of the Arlington, Virginia-based Lexington Institute, a research group with close ties to the Pentagon and military contractors.

DOJ_NMG_0008169

If the Pentagon sticks to its decision, GE probably would exit the business of building tactical fighter engines, Thompson said.

The F-35 is due to be the Pentagon's biggest purchase ever at an estimated $256 billion. The Pentagon plans to buy as many as 2,480 in three variants for the U.S. Air Force, Navy, Marine Corps and the British Royal Navy.

In addition, hundreds or thousands may be sold overseas, generating demand for at least 4,000 engines over coming decades, with each engine costing several million dollars.

The F-135 co-development partners include Britain, the United States, Italy, the Netherlands, Turkey, Canada, Australia, Denmark and Norway.

France To End State Of Emergency (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

PARIS, Jan. 3 -- The French government on Wednesday will end the state of national emergency it imposed eight weeks ago to counter the violence and arson that erupted in more than 300 cities and towns across the country, President Jacques Chirac said Tuesday.

The original declaration was "essential," but "strictly temporary," Chirac told his cabinet Tuesday, but he added that "considering the situation of these past several weeks, I decided to end it." The government had planned to keep the measure in force for another six weeks.

During three weeks of unrest in late October and November, youths and young men of predominantly Arab and African descent set fire to an estimated 10,000 cars and attacked 255 schools, 233 other public buildings and scores of private businesses, according to police figures obtained by the French newspaper Le Monde.

Nearly 5,000 people were arrested and 400 were sentenced to jail terms in France's worst civil unrest since student demonstrations nearly four decades ago.

After nearly two weeks in which French police were unable to control the guerrilla-style tactics of the rioters, the government imposed a state of emergency using a law enacted half a century ago during France's unsuccessful war against rebels in its former colony of Algeria.

The law's activation, which was opposed by human rights organizations, socialist political leaders and other groups, gave police broad authority to conduct searches without warrants and impose curfews.

Officials feared a resurgence of problems on New Year's Eve, when -- even in calm years -- youths in poor suburban communities traditionally set cars ablaze in rituals of protest. On Saturday night, 25,000 extra police officers were deployed throughout the country in suburban neighborhoods where France's subsidized housing projects are located, as well as around famous landmarks such as the Eiffel Tower in Paris.

Police said the 425 car burnings recorded around the country Saturday night were fewer than officials had feared, though the number was higher than the 333 blazes set during the previous New Year's Eve. "The situation today is not completely satisfactory, as was shown Dec. 31," a government spokesman, Jean-Francois Cope, told reporters after the president's meeting with the cabinet. He said, however, that the violence had subsided significantly.

It is unclear whether the emergency measures had a significant impact on the violence, according to community leaders. Only a handful of towns imposed curfews. The large number of arrests, which were allowed under the special law, and the intervention of parents and community leaders with youths curbed the violence in many neighborhoods, other observers said.

Chirac, largely a lame duck in what is likely his last year as president, urged the cabinet to do more to address the country's high unemployment, one of the biggest problems facing the people who were responsible for the rioting. Since the violence abated, however, Chirac's government has initiated few programs to address the discrimination and joblessness faced by immigrant communities.

European Upturn Looks Set To Continue (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

BERLIN – Europe's economic upturn looks set to continue into 2006, as a manufacturing survey showed another improvement in business conditions and Germany reported a sharp drop in unemployment.

Manufacturing output and new orders in the 12 countries that use the euro as their currency are running at their highest for 18 months, according to the Purchasing Managers' Index for December. Strong global demand for European goods, coupled with a weaker euro, is helping European industry to lead a broadening economic recovery, economists say.

DOJ_NMG_0008170

But analysts warn that a strengthening euro and an expected moderation of U.S. economic growth could limit the life of Europe's upswing, unless domestic demand improves too. Germany's labor office treated the surprisingly sharp drop in joblessness in December -- down 110,000 on a seasonally adjusted basis -- as a hopeful sign of greater demand for labor. The drop took the unemployment rate in Europe's biggest economy to 11.2%.

Employment in Germany isn't rising as fast as the number of people claiming unemployment benefits is falling, however. During last year, the number of jobs that contributed to social-security funds was consistently down from a year earlier. Employment and vacancies fell fractionally in November. Much of Germany's recent decline in unemployment is due to state-sponsored or subsidized job schemes.

But the rate at which German companies are shedding workers has slowed, says Thorsten Polleit, an economist at Barclays Capital in Frankfurt. "What we're seeing is, at best, stagnation," he says.

Elsewhere in Europe, industry is planning to add modestly to its payrolls, according to the PMI survey. Overall, the PMI rose to 53.4 in December from 52.8 a month earlier and beating expectations. A score of over 50 indicates that the manufacturing sector is growing. "Although not consistent with strong industrial-production growth in a historical context, the trend improvement in the manufacturing sector remains clear," Swiss bank UBS wrote in a research report.

German and Italian industry reported the strongest rises in output and new orders, while French manufacturers reported only slight improvement. Coming after a dip in French business confidence in the Insee survey last month, the data added to evidence that the French economy, one of the euro zone's growth drivers in recent years, is weakening, while Germany's economy is improving on the back of soaring exports.

Outside the euro zone, the manufacturing PMI in the U.K. showed little change in December -- although that beat expectations of worsening conditions. The British economy is struggling to maintain its relatively high growth rates of the past decade, amid a slowdown in consumer spending. The British government hopes that business investment will contribute more to growth, but economists see little sign of that happening so far.

Mexico Investigates Death Of Man Shot In U.S. By Border Patrol Agent (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 3 - The Mexican authorities are investigating the death of an 18-year-old Mexican man shot by a United States Border Patrol agent after he had illegally crossed the border into California.

Witnesses told Mexican authorities that the man, Guillermo Martínez Rodríguez, was shot Friday. A brother and two other men traveling with him helped him to return to Tijuana, where he died in a hospital a day later.

Todd Fraser, a spokesman for the Border Patrol, acknowledged the shooting in a telephone interview on Tuesday, saying that an agent had "come under attack by an assailant who was throwing rocks." The agent "fired back in self-defense," Mr. Fraser said. Then, he said, the migrant climbed back over the fence and fled into Mexico.

Mr. Fraser said he did not have a figure for the number of migrants shot by American border agents last year, but he said the number of rock attacks by migrants against agents in the San Diego area had increased to 218 incidents in 2005, from 112 in 2004. "The rock attacks are increasing, and that is attributed to the increased enforcement by our agents," he said. "Smugglers are getting frustrated because they can't get their loads through, and that results in more attacks on our officers."

Mexican authorities, however, said the shooting reflected a growing hostility in the United States toward migrants. The authorities have used the shooting to draw attention to a law passed by Congress last month that would strengthen controls along the border and mandate the construction of miles of steel fences that Mexicans have likened to the Berlin Wall.

Mexico has condemned the proposed law as "shameful," saying it does not recognize the contributions of undocumented workers to the American economy. Previous border enforcement efforts, Mexican authorities say, have not stopped migrants, but have pushed them onto isolated and inhospitable routes.

Luis Cabrera, Mexico's consul in San Diego, said the shooting "goes against the spirit of cooperation that should exist along the border."

Fatal Shooting Of Mexican By Agent At Border Probed (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 4, 2006

Police officials in San Diego are investigating the shooting death of a Mexican national by a U.S. Border Patrol agent, who fired a shot at the man after being targeted in a rock attack.

Border Patrol spokesman Todd Fraser yesterday said the agent, an eight-year veteran whose name was withheld, came under attack Friday after approaching the man along fences on the U.S.-Mexico border near the San Ysidro, Calif., port of entry.

DOJ_NMG_0008171

He said the man was standing on the U.S. side of the fence at the time of the 7:25 p.m. encounter, but returned to Mexico after the shooting.

Mr. Fraser said the unidentified agent fired in self-defense, trying to protect himself from what agents in the area describe as a "rocking," during which agents and their vehicles are pelted with large rocks or chunks of cement blocks. He said the agent, fearing for his life, fired one round at the man, who then fled back to Mexico. He said the agent was not sure at the time whether the man had been hit.

The shooting victim has been identified by Mexican officials as Guillermo Martinez Rodriguez, an 18-year-old who checked himself into a Tijuana, Mexico, hospital after the incident but died four hours later. He reportedly was struck by a single gunshot to the back of his right shoulder.

Mexican government officials denounced the shooting, including Ruben Aguilar, chief spokesman for Mexican President Vicente Fox, who said it "does no more than provide evidence that only a law that guarantees legal entry and is respectful of human rights can resolve the migratory problem both countries face."

The Mexican government has vigorously opposed efforts by U.S. officials to bring tighter security measures or build more fences along the border, even publishing and distributing documents last year showing migrants how to illegally enter the United States.

More than 1 million illegal aliens, mostly Mexican nationals, were apprehended by the Border Patrol last year.

San Diego police homicide Lt. Kevin Rooney said detectives are investigating the shooting and results of the probe will be forwarded to the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego for review.

Lt. Rooney said the shooting occurred between two border fences and that the agent, who was checking a report of illegal border crossers in the area, arrived in a marked vehicle and saw a man "holding a makeshift ladder as he stood near the northernmost fence."

He said the agent ran toward the migrant, who retreated to the south and "scooped up what the agent believed to be several rocks."

"As the agent unholstered his duty weapon, the male cocked his arm and made a throwing motion toward the agent. The agent fired at the male, who grabbed his arm and fled down a grade that leads to the primary border fence," he said.

A total of 218 rocking incidents occurred on the San Diego border last year, injuring more than a dozen agents. The rockings have gotten so violent that Border Patrol agents in San Diego now ride in "war wagons," vehicles fitted with custom-made steel screens and bars.

Mexico's federal attorney general's office said it also is investigating the incident, targeting "whomever is found to have been responsible," although a statement released by the office does not say if it plans to bring charges in the case and if so, against whom.

The attorney general's statement said Mr. Martinez Rodriguez, a native of Guadalajara who recently moved to Tijuana, was with four other persons when he was shot.

Mr. Fraser said that acts of violence have been on the rise all along the U.S.-Mexico border, adding that others who sought to throw large rocks at agents have been shot at, but he had no information on how many had been hit or if any had been injured or killed.

In July, rising border violence prompted the governors of California, Texas and six Mexican border states to pledge during a meeting to work together to attempt to stem the problem.

Sorry, But AIDS Testing Is Critical (WP)

By Richard Holbrooke

The Washington Post, January 4, 2006

A month ago, on World AIDS Day, I wrote that despite all the public rhetoric about progress, "we are not winning the war on AIDS" and that the "very best that can be said is that we are losing at a slightly lower rate" [op-ed, Nov. 29]. I thought this was fairly obvious, given the fact that on each World AIDS Day since the first one 18 years ago, the number of people who are HIV-positive has increased. I thought it was even more obvious from just one stunning fact: that of the 12,000 people who will be infected in the next 24 hours around the world, over 90 percent will not learn they are sick until roughly 2013, when they develop full-blown AIDS. Meanwhile, not knowing their status, they will unintentionally spread it to other people over the next eight years, and these people will spread it to still more, and so on.

Given this situation, I suggested that current strategies are clearly not working, especially on prevention. While continuing to support increased funding for treatment of those who already have AIDS, I argued that far more emphasis should be put on detection and testing so that people learn their status and then, with counseling, change their behavior if they are HIV-positive, thus reducing the spread of the HIV virus.

DOJ_NMG_0008172

This may sound simple, even self-evident, to those not involved with the issue on a regular basis, but no column I have written for this newspaper provoked a greater reaction. To listen to some of the criticism you would think I had called for mandatory testing and quarantining of people with AIDS. "This man is out of control," wrote one prominent AIDS activist under the headline, "Someone stop this man." I was accused of "championing a conservative, traditionalist public health approach, which is simply looking to identify the infected and contain them."

Such criticism ignored my strong public advocacy over the past six years of much more funding for treatment. But far more distressing were the assertions of "progress" from world leaders and editorial pages. Originally designed to put pressure on public officials, World AIDS Day has turned into an empty rhetorical ritual in which world leaders issue high-minded statements, after which they let another year of living ever more dangerously pass.

Although there were plenty of calls for more funding for treatment, so far as I am aware no one suggested new prevention strategies or even admitted that today's approaches are not working. Current policies on prevention are simple enough: Conservatives emphasize promoting abstinence (which is why a minimum of 30 percent of the American contribution to the effort is earmarked for that purpose), while liberals stress the use of condoms and the need to avoid needle-sharing. Of course, any of these practices, if followed rigorously, will prevent the spread of AIDS, but none is ever going to be used by enough people to reverse the spread of the disease. It is a classic case of American "red state-blue state" politics and ideology trumping the brutal reality on the ground, or, more accurately, in a bedroom or alleyway.

I have been told repeatedly, for more than four years, that the case for testing is not proven. But isn't it obvious that AIDS will continue to spread more rapidly as long as 90 percent of those affected do not know their status? Wouldn't greater knowledge of one's status -- held in the strictest confidence (an essential part of any testing program) -- greatly modify behavior, both for those who are HIV-positive and for the large majority who, even in the worst-hit areas, are not infected? And wouldn't the greatest beneficiaries of widespread testing be women, who are all too often helpless victims but who do not know either their own status or that of any man in their life -- and who have no way of getting their men to be tested?

Yet the dedicated and committed professional community engaged in this desperate struggle, including UNAIDS and the World Health Organization, still refuses to make testing a top priority. (One commendable exception is Randall Tobias, the Bush administration's special envoy on AIDS, who makes it a practice to be publicly tested -- if possible with a local official -- in every country he visits; he well may be the most tested person on Earth.)

Why, in general, is the issue played down? I believe it is partly a case of a mind-set that was locked in 20 years ago, at the dawn of the AIDS crisis. Stigmatization was a huge problem then, even in the United States, and antiretroviral drugs were not yet available.

But times have changed, and so has the nature of the disease and the way it is spreading. (The greatest step forward in prevention would be the development of an effective microbicide that women could self-administer, but that goal is still eluding researchers.)

Recently there has been encouraging action in three small African nations -- Lesotho, Botswana and Malawi -- which have started making testing routine and officially encouraged (but not mandatory). Lesotho's new policy, creatively called KYS, or "Know Your Status," is especially worth watching because it is a formal, widespread national effort. If it works, perhaps the high priests of the worldwide effort on AIDS will stop listening to their own echoes and unexamined assumptions -- and take action. If ever there were a place where an ounce of prevention was worth a ton of cure, this is it.

The writer, a former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, is president of the Global Business Coalition on HIV/AIDS, a nongovernmental organization, and writes a monthly column for The Post.

Wish They All Could Be Like Estonia (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'grady

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

With the 1989 fall of the Berlin Wall the world witnessed a backlash against the overintrusive state. A rallying cry in favor of economic liberalization went up around much of the globe. Some governments -- notably in Eastern Europe -- used the momentum to push deep, structural reform. Others -- notably in Latin America -- bungled the opportunity.

Is there any way to explain why it is that some countries have been able to restructure their economies so radically while others have been left in the clutches of special interests?

The 2006 Index of Economic Freedom, published today by the Heritage Foundation and The Wall Street Journal, provides powerful clues. The annual report surveys 157 countries, grading property rights protection, the regulatory environment, tax rates, fiscal policy, government intervention in the economy, monetary policy, black markets and trade policy, assigning each a numerical rating. Each country falls into one of four categories: "free," "mostly free," "mostly unfree" and "repressed." The chart shows this year's results.

DOJ_NMG_0008173

DETAILS

See a country index of economic freedom for 2006.

As they do every year, the index authors observe the average per capita income of countries in each category. Not surprisingly, over the years, they have found a strong relationship between economic freedom and prosperity. Yet there is something more that can be observed in this pattern: Countries that liberalize quickly and thoroughly achieve resounding successes, politically and economically. Conversely, gradualism risks stagnation and even reversals, because the benefits are not evident enough to impress the electorate and generate a momentum in their favor.

Take, for example, the difference between the wealth of "repressed" economies and "mostly unfree" economies. The per capita GDP of the former is $4,239 while of the latter it is a tad lower at $4,058. This suggests that reforms that move a country one step up in economic liberty, on average, produce no material benefit to the population.

The jump from "mostly unfree" to "mostly free" yields a much better return but still leaves a country not particularly well-off. "Mostly free" countries have a per capita GDP of $13,530, while "free" countries have, on average, a per capita GDP of over $30,000.

This matters the most in democracies, where leadership needs to produce results if liberalization is to stick. Clearly, it's not the absolute income level that generates support for reforms but the growth in living standards that seems to hold the key. Halfhearted measures generate immense resentment from the "losers" of the old system but often don't yield large enough gains to create a constituency to support the changes.

For evidence of this, compare seventh-place Estonia, a tiny nation that undertook revolutionary reform in the mid-1990s, with Chile, rated 14th this year and often considered the poster child of economic liberty in the developing world.

Chile has been in various stages of economic reform since the 1973 coup that ousted Salvador Allende, who was threatening to take the country over the communist cliff. The return to democracy in 1989 brought about a series of left-of-center governments that, while boasting that they had not turned back the economic liberalism of the Pinochet dictatorship, slowed the pace of reform dramatically. The current socialist presidency of Ricardo Lagos even reversed liberalization in labor markets.

Meanwhile in Estonia, as former Prime Minister Mart Laar likes to explain, the post-Soviet period has been marked by rapid, deep reform. Communism was so reviled that policy makers, almost instinctively, chose its direct opposite and promptly enshrined the preference in law.

The results may explain why political support for economic liberalism continues in Estonia, while in Chile free markets are under assault even by center-right politicians. The difference is the rate of change of progress for citizens. In 2004, with reforms kicking in, Estonia's per capita GDP was almost $7,500, nearly double what it was in 2001 -- $3,951, when the country ranked 14th in the Index of Economic Freedom. In Chile, after 30 years of reform, per capita GDP remains below $5,900, edging up only slightly from $4,784 in 2001, when Chile ranked 13th.

The tale of two small nations tells a wider global story. Is it any wonder for example that Brazilians, who after almost two decades of being told they are converting to a market economy, widely reject the notion? Improvements have occurred, for instance in monetary stability, but the country is still ranked "mostly unfree," with a per capita GDP of $3,500. Maybe Mr. Laar could pay them a visit.

Ms. O'Grady is member of the Journal's editorial board. She is co-editor, with Marc A. Miles and Kim R. Holmes, of the 2006 Index of Economic Freedom (422 pages, $24.95), available at 1-800-975-8625.

Social Insecurity Crisis (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 4, 2006

The year 2006 is just four days old, but I'm already prepared to nominate the natural resource of the year, the one that will have the most decisive impact on international relations - and that is undoubtedly oil.

Look at all the global trends involving oil (or gas) today, and they are all bad: the former leader of Germany gets voted out of office and goes to work for the president of Russia, running a pipeline company owned by Russia. The oil-for-food scandal tarnishes the U.N. The president of Iran, feeling so emboldened by the billions of dollars flowing into his country thanks to $60-a-barrel oil, engages in repeated rants about how the Holocaust was a myth. Vladimir Putin's oil-fueled government in Russia steadily erodes civil liberties at home, while using its energy clout abroad to try to punish Ukraine and to deflect U.N. pressure on Syria for its murderous campaign against Lebanese democrats and on Iran for its work to develop a nuclear bomb. I could go on. Do you have all day?

If you look at these trends, three things come to mind: They are all negative, they are all going to get worse with another year of $60-a-barrel oil, and the only force on the planet with the will and the way to neutralize their worst effects is America.

DOJ_NMG_0008174

But here's the rub: America's refusal to have a serious energy policy makes these problems only more severe, and its refusal to have a serious entitlement policy - reforming Social Security and Medicare before they totally devour the U.S. budget - is only going to sap America's ability to play the global governing role that is so necessary for world stability.

To put it another way, our energy gluttony is strengthening the worst forces in the world and our entitlement gluttony is going to weaken our capacity to deal with those forces. As the Johns Hopkins University foreign affairs specialist Michael Mandelbaum puts it: "The greatest threat to America's role in the world today is not China. It's Medicare."

In a smart and original new book, "The Case for Goliath: How America Acts as the World's Government in the 21st Century," Mr. Mandelbaum argues that while U.S. foreign policy is hardly perfect, it is America - through its vast military deployments, diplomatic engagements and vital role in buttressing the global economy and its rules - that provides the basic governance that keeps the world stable and on a decent track.

Most countries in the world like this situation, he contends. They like it because they know that the U.S. is not a predatory power, so they are not afraid of the order it provides. They like it because this global order is helpful to every country in the world, but the cost of it is borne largely by U.S. taxpayers. And they like it because they can criticize the U.S. and still enjoy all the benefits it provides.

The best evidence for all this, Mr. Mandelbaum notes, is the fact that no military coalition has ever formed to counter America's global governing role - as happened with other hegemonic powers in history.

In Mr. Mandelbaum's view, America "is not the lion of the international system, terrorizing and preying on smaller, weaker animals in order to survive itself. It is, rather, the elephant, which supports a wide variety of other creatures - smaller mammals, birds and insects - by generating nourishment for them as it goes about the business of feeding itself."

No other country could play this crucial stabilizing role. But its continuation depends on "American taxpayers' being willing to keep paying for it," Mr. Mandelbaum said - and that gets us back to our runaway entitlements.

USA Today recently quoted David Walker, the U.S. comptroller general, as saying we are about to be hit by "a demographic tsunami" that will "never recede." The baby boomers total 77 million, and their first wave turns 60 this year. Unless we trim the Medicare and Social Security benefits promised to these boomers, the paper noted, America's "national debt will grow more than $3 trillion through 2010, to $11.2 trillion. ... The interest alone would cost $561 billion in 2010, the same as the Pentagon [budget]."

The same as the Pentagon's! So either Social Security and Medicare shrink or the Pentagon shrinks - because higher taxes seem to be out of the question for now. If history is any guide, Americans will prefer Social Security and Medicare over paying to make the world safe for China, India, Russia and Iran to pursue their interests.

If so, the world may soon test out one of the most important theses of Mr. Mandelbaum's book: that the greatest threat to global stability is "not too much American power, but too little."

Crowded Foreign-Policy Calendar Will Test Bush's Management Skills (WSJ)

By Frederick Kempe

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2006

For those who may have forgotten during the untidiness of the past couple of years, President Bush was once billed as America's first "MBA President." This Harvard business grad ('75), in contrast to predecessor Bill Clinton, was to have been more disciplined both personally and in running his government.

Yet the messy Iraq war aftermath, the botched Katrina hurricane response in New Orleans and the expanding U.S. deficit have raised global concerns about Oval Office management. "What's in question is the traditional image of us as an effective country," says Fred Bergsten of the Institute for International Economics.

What President Bush has going for him is unappreciated momentum flowing off 2005, a more successful year than most realize1. And a dramatic 2005 shift of policy responsibility to Condoleezza Rice's State Department has also improved foreign-policy coordination and execution. That said, Mr. Bush faces an overcrowded agenda – the schedule includes decisive challenges in Germany, Iraq, Ukraine, China, India, the United Nations and more -- that could make 2006 one of the most significant foreign-policy years since the Cold War.

For President Bush, how he manages the second year of his second term will determine whether he can look forward to building a historic legacy in 2007-2008, his last two years of office, or instead be engaged in a lame duck's damage control. He also dare not forget the lessons of 9/11 and Katrina: It's the surprises that may shape history. "I worry less about the knowns than the unknowns," says Simon Serfaty of the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

With that in mind, here's an abridged 2006 Thinking Global calendar for the world's most important chief executive to help him stay on schedule and effectively manage the coming year. * * *

JAN. 12-13: Angela Merkel's Visit

DOJ_NMG_0008175

Administration officials recognize the importance of newly elected German Chancellor Angela Merkel's visit to Washington well enough to have scheduled an "extended" meeting with the president, including lunch. That's this White House's equivalent of royal treatment.

One of the administration's smartest moves in 2005 was launching the year with an offensive to repair and deepen relations with Europe, which remains central to all of the U.S.'s challenges from fighting terrorism to advancing world trade. Working with Europe becomes easier in 2006 now that Ms. Merkel's election has removed one of the world leaders Mr. Bush trusted least, Gerhard Schroeder. (Jacques Chirac will have to wait until 2007 elections.)

Ms. Merkel's free market and Atlanticist instincts can help enormously, but she rules precariously over a right-left coalition in a country that's turned viciously anti-Bush. Jackson Janes of the American Institute of Contemporary German Studies warns that too much presidential warmth could backfire in a country where no one wants Ms. Merkel to be the president's lapdog.

A Merkel who looks statesmanlike while disagreeing with Mr. Bush this month might serve U.S. long-term interests better than an obedient ally.

JAN. 26: The Palestinian Democracy Gamble

The Palestinian Authority holds parliamentary elections that will test whether the U.S. was right to pressure Israel to lift its opposition to the participation of Hamas in the balloting. Hamas, still considered a terrorist organization by the EU and the U.S., performed well in local elections last year partly because voters consider it to be more honest than the corrupt, ruling Fatah party.

Whether Hamas winds in a landslide, as some fear, or emerges at the very least as a strong opposition, the real test will be whether the Bush administration is gambling right that it will moderate its behavior as it joins the political process. Will parliamentary democracy be as satisfying to Hamas as suicide terrorism and a charter that still calls for Israel's destruction?

The Palestinian outcome will influence Israel's own landmark elections March 28. Israel's former Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will lead a new centrist party, Kadima, with the unlikely support of long-time Labour Party rival Shimon Peres, against former right-wing Likud party allies that split over his Gaza withdrawal.

FEBRUARY: Building an Indian Strategic Partnership

Bush administration officials are already privately speaking of the U.S. president's planned visit to India in February as historic. They say one of their administration's lasting legacies will be a new strategic relationship with the world's most populous democracy and one of its fastest growing economies.

Yet this is the stuff of long-term, delicate diplomacy. The U.S., in a wide-reaching July agreement with India, essentially recognized India as a nuclear state, departing from previous nonproliferation policy. Its hope is that the country will now politically reposition itself from longtime leader of the essentially anti-American non-aligned countries to a member of the community of democracies fighting terrorism, supporting freedom and, if necessary, counter-balancing China.

For starters, however, Washington is hoping India will find a way to satisfy its July agreement to separate its military and civilian nuclear operations and make them more transparent before the president rolls into town.

MARCH: Bringing Ukraine Into the West

Ukraine's March parliamentary elections are Europe's most important this year.

The Russian decision to cut off natural gas to Ukraine on Jan. 1, even if quickly reversed, made the stakes of Ukraine's March parliamentary elections all the more apparent. A revanchist Russia is increasingly ready to use its energy weapon to punish overly independent neighbors. A successful Ukrainian vote could put the dagger in residual Kremlin imperial ambitions to Kiev.

Alexander Motyl of Rutgers University says the West's best response is to embrace Ukraine even more resolutely. The U.S. should lift the Jackson-Vanik trade restrictions (the Senate has voted to lift, but the House has not), follow the EU lead and declare Ukraine a market economy, sign a bilateral agreement with Ukraine as a precondition of its WTO membership and begin a process that would make Ukraine a NATO member by the end of the Bush administration.

Which party wins voting in March isn't as important as a general acceptance that elections are free and fair and that Ukraine's democratic institutions continue to grow and resist Moscow's meddling.

APRIL: Managing the Chinese Rise

The next six-month review of China by the U.S. Treasury is due at some point in April or May. Last time around, the Treasury opted not to label China as a "currency manipulator," which could have triggered legislative action. But it will be increasingly more difficult for the Bush White House to avoid this course without suffering 2006 congressional trade action against Beijing.

With the U.S. trade deficit continuing to rise along with protectionism pressures, Mr. Bergsten, the economist, believes the time has come for the Bush administration to get tough with the Chinese who are maintaining their currency at a 25-30 % discount by his calculations. That in turn has prompted other Asian countries to maintain currencies "massively undervalued against the dollar."

DOJ_NMG_0008176

If China won't budge, Mr. Bergsten suggests mobilizing the G-7, all of which is suffering, to take China to the WTO on the grounds that its undervalued currency is an improper trade subsidy. Yuan revaluation will help U.S. trade figures less than many might hope, so the larger point is whether the U.S. can coax China to play more by international rules.

JUNE: The Iraqi Tipping Point

Deadlines are always difficult to set for anything in the Mideast, but end-June is a fair bet as a tipping point for Iraq. The most important test following December's encouraging election is how quickly Iraqi officials can take to form a government and whether Sunnis will finally accept they are a minority and Shiites can be an enlightened and not vengeful majority.

The constitution established no deadline for the newly elected national assembly to appoint a government, but almost everyone agrees that the longer it takes the more it will feed the insurgency. That's exactly what happened after last January's elections.

So watch how deftly the gifted U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad can speed along government deals at a time when the locals remain hard-pressed to even accept December's electoral results. The year will be critical to Iraq's balance between progress and civil war – and that outcome will be central to Mr. Bush's Republican party in November's midterm elections and, more importantly to the administration's larger cause of Mideast transformation.

JULY: Saving World Trade Talks

The best that could be said for world trade talks in Hong Kong last December was that the participants avoided a breakdown. The problem this year is that the body most capable of breaking the deadline, the G-8, has as its president dysfunctional Russia, a country neither democratic nor in the World Trade Organization.

All the more reason, says Mr. Bergsten, that the West should press Mr. Putin to prove his worth by making his July G-8 summit in St. Petersburg one devoted to closing differences among developed country leaders so that one can avoid the first breakdown in global trade talks since 1930. "The trade ministers will never resolve this," he says. "It's too deeply political."

SEPTEMBER: A Reformed or a Resigned U.N.

By the time of the September General Assembly of the United Nations in New York, the world is likely to know whether the organization has been capable of reforming itself or not. In 2006, the U.N. will either grow more relevant or more marginalized, but the status quo can't hold following the oil-for-food corruption scandal and breakdown over the Iraq war.

It will either respond to new global demands on its resources by making itself more efficient and effective, or be kicking the can down the road endangering the institution itself. By the end of 2006's first quarter, the U.N. will either have embraced the reform agenda set last September by giving the Secretary General more rapid-response management authority or it will opt for continued, consensual mediocrity.

By December, U.N. members will pick a new secretary general for the next five years. Watch to see whether they pick someone capable of leading an increasingly challenged organization that has had a surge of peacekeeping operations -- to 18 -- and is bracing for crises ranging from a possible pandemic to natural disasters and war-driven genocide.

OCTOBER: Dealing With Iran's Nuclear Program

By October 2006, Iran's first nuclear power plant, the Bushehr facility, is likely to come on stream. Mr. Sefarty of the Center for International and Strategic Studies predicts that may also be about the time that matters heat up over Iran's nuclear ambitions in Washington. Current Western efforts to get Moscow to negotiate a deal with Iran to reprocess its fuel in Russia are less about gaining Teheran's unlikely agreement to such a far-fetched plan and more about winning Russia's support at the U.N. should Iran be referred to the Security Council.

The good news is that the world's nuclear experts don't think Iran can produce a bomb for another few years. The bad news is that the reason is that Teheran is working on a more comprehensive program for a sustained capability rather than trying to produce a quick bomb or two.

The bottom line: months of negotiations with the world's two most egregious proliferators, Iran and North Korea, are producing little more than further negotiations. The U.S. is likely in 2006 to get off the sidelines to more energetically join European states pressuring an Iranian leader who is openly calling for Israel's destruction or relocation to Alaska or Bavaria. Don't expect any military fireworks, but increased diplomatic heat may bring matters to a boil ahead of congressional elections.

NOVEMBER-DECEMBER: The Midterm Elections

The key 2006 test of whether the MBA president has restored U.S. credibility for effectiveness will be mid-term congressional elections, coming long after memories of Katrina mishandling have faded. Of foreign-policy issues, Iraqi has the post potential to swing voters, with policy toward China of increasing importance and the Iranian threat as a possible emerging issue.

Don't rule out a Republican setback, which wouldn't be unusual for such elections in a presidential second term. Yet Mr. Bush's majority in the House is 231 to 202, difficult to overturn even with all seats up for grabs, given the power of incumbency.

DOJ_NMG_0008177

The Republican lead in the Senate is 55 to 44 with one independent. With 15 Republicans and some 18 Democrats are up for re-election, it would take a very bad Bush year to endanger his party's majority.

Expect a good Republican outcome if the U.S. economy remains strong, if the Iraq situation improves and the president can announce troop reductions, if China has given some ground on trade and currency revaluation, and if the president has managed any nasty surprises.

If Mr. Bush retains his majority, expect his final two years, when driving domestic change is always difficult, to focus on establishing his place in history as a man who has taken down tyrants and promoted Mideast transformation.

Yet if the past is any guide, the main event of the year might not appear above. Just as 9/11 shaped his first term and Katrina tarnished the first year of his second one, it's a fair bet that his management ability in 2006 will be most severely tested by something unscheduled and unpredictable.

DOJ_NMG_0008178

Williams, Jan

From: Williams, Jan

Sent: Wednesday, January 4, 2006 12:32 PM

To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Akers, Eric J.; Ames, Andrew; Barnett, Thomas O.; Battle, Michael (USAEO); Beach, Andrew; Beck, Cherith (USAARE); Bianco, Joseph F.; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Boardman, Michelle; Boote, John; Bottner, Andrea; Bounds, Ryan W (OLP); Bradbury, Steve; Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Burch, Victoria; Chambers, Shane P; Clinger, James H; Cohen, Brian; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Cook, Elisebeth C; Cook, Marita L. (USAWY); Cooperstein, Theodore M; Coppenger, Chesed L. (TAX); Costigan, Michael; Coughlin, Robert; Curtis, O. Benton; Daley, Cybele; David, Matt; Dhillon, Uttam; Dummermuth, Matt (USAVAE); Eisenberg, John; Elwood, Courtney; Elwood, John; Flaherty, Connor; Freeman, Sharee (CRT); Friedrich, Matthew; Gambatesa, Donald (USMS); Garre, Gregory G; Glut, Martha (USANE); Gober, Chris; Golden, Lois; Goodling, Monica; Gorsuch, Neil M; Greg Harris; Hagle, Timothy; Harris, Gregory; Henke, Tracy (SMO); Hertling, Richard; Hofer, Patrick F. (TAX); Hoisington, Jana; Holland, Eric W; Irving, John (ODAG); Jaffer, Jamil N; Jordan, Theresa (USADE); Jungeblut, Neal P.; Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keehner, Laura; Kessler, Elizabeth A; Korn, Jennifer; Lesch, Jaclyn; Little, Kimani (CRT); Lonick, Saundra; Luckinbill, Trent W.; Macklin, Kristi R; MacLean, Alex (CRT); Magnuson, Cynthia; Malloy, Sandra; Marshall, C. Kevin; Martinson, Wanda; Masoudi, Gerald; McArthur, Patrick; McDonald, Bruce; McFarland, Steven T (ODAG); McIntosh, Brent; McKee, Cindy (USAKS); McKeown, Matt (ENRD); McKnight, Cynthia M (CRT); McNally, Edward; McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Metcalf, Mark H (CRT); Miranda, Matthew; Monheim, Thomas; Moore, Miriam (ODAG); Morrison, Richard T. (TAX); Murphy, Sean; Neumayr, Mary (ENRD); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nichols, Grant W; Nowacki, John; OConnell, James; Otis, Lee L; Otis, William G.; Parsky, Laura; Peabody, Payson R. (TAX); Peed, Carl; Potter, Janet; Racicot, Tim (USAMT); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Roberts, Crystal; Roe, Price (OCIO); Roehrkasse, Brian; Roper, Matt M; Rosenberg, Chuck; Rowe, Kiri; Sampson, Kyle; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Schmitt, Glenn; Schwartz, Arthur; Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Selim, George (CRS); Sellers, Kiahna (OAG); Smith, Kimberly A; Sours, Raquel; Strug, Kerri; Swenson, Lily F; Taylor, Bruce A.; Tenpas, Ronald J (ODAG); Todd, Gordon (OLP); Tomlinson, Linda (USANH); Turner, Donald J. (USAPAM); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Underhill, Deborah; Vargas, Omar (CRT); Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Warren, Julie; Williams, Jan; Woodruff, William; Brand, Rachel; Clark, John (USMS); Clement, Paul D; Fisher, Alice; Flores, Robert; Gillis, John; Herraiz, Domingo S.; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kim, Wan (CRT); Leonhart, Michele M.; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McNulty, Paul J; Moschella, William; O'Connor, Eileen J. (AAG/TAX); Sanchez, William J (CRT); Tamargo, Mauricio J; Tandy, Karen P; Wooldridge, Sue Ellen (ENRD)

Subject: The Morning Update: 1/4/06

Attachments: tmp.htm

Importance: Low

The Morning Update

This morning, President Bush will travel to the Pentagon to be briefed on operations in Iraq, Afghanistan, and the global War on Terror. The President will make a statement on the important progress being made in defeating the enemy and advancing democracy. In 2005, Iraqis voted in three successful elections and Iraqi Security Forces are growing in size and capability. Afghans are taking greater responsibility for their security, and NATO is assuming a larger role. The President will also discuss the work and sacrifices ahead in 2006.

9:30 am: THE PRESIDENT participates in Department of Defense Briefings

EST The Pentagon | Arlington, Virginia

11:35 am: THE PRESIDENT makes a statement on the Global War on Terror

EST The Pentagon | Arlington, Virginia

From Today's Morning Headlines

President Bush Discusses The Importance Of The Patriot Act With Prosecutors Who Have Used This Valuable Tool To Protect Americans. "As the clock runs on Congress' short-term extension of the Patriot Act, President Bush met with federal prosecutors Tuesday and contended that the domestic anti-terror law is vital to keeping Americans safe. ...
'The enemy has not gone away. They're still there. And I expect Congress to understand that we're still at war, and they got to give us the tools necessary to win this war <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060104/ap_on_go_pr_wh/bush_patriot_act;_ylt=AnprLX9tGXGxBRowiAbqkMIp24cA;_ylu=X3oDMTBiMW04NW9mBHNlYwMlJVRPUCUl> ,' he said. Later, outside the West Wing, district attorneys cited several cases in which the Patriot Act had played a crucial role, from staging an undercover sting on California weapons dealers attempting to sell Stinger missiles to securing convictions of major terrorist financiers in New York. 'We use it each and every day to protect our country against terrorists and criminals,' said Ken Wainstein, district attorney for the District of Columbia." (Jennifer Loven, "Bush Pushes For Patriot Act Renewal," The Associated Press, 1/3/06)

Secretary Chertoff Announces Improvements To Homeland Security Grants.
"Facing cuts in antiterrorism financing, the Department of Homeland Security announced today that it has overhauled its system for evaluating new requests for money from a $765 million aid program for cities. The new system is based less on politics and city boundaries and more on assessments of where terrorists are likely to strike and potentially cause the greatest damage where terrorists are likely to strike and potentially cause the greatest damage.

<http://www.nytimes.com/2006/01/03/politics/03cnd-grants.html> " (Eric Lipton, "Rules For Granting Terror Aid Are Overhauled," The New York Times, 1/4/06)

As The Economy Grows, Companies Expect To Spend More In 2006. "Capital expenditures, which include all kinds of spending that enhance a business's long-term prospects, such as buying or upgrading buildings or equipment, have been growing at a rate of about 11% in the U.S. for more than a year, though that has been edging up a bit lately. But there are some signs that the spending is starting to rise faster, at least among larger, public companies.
<http://online.wsj.com/article/SB113634224979437194.html?mod=todays_us_money_and_investing> Companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index increased their spending on capital expenditures during the third quarter of 2005 by 24%, compared with the same period in 2004, according to Thomson Financial, which tracks these figures." (Gregory Zuckerman, "Capital-Spending Plays," The Wall Street Journal, 1/4/06)

Senator John Cornyn (R-TX): "Judge Alito's Record Reveals That He Believes In Judicial Restraint, Not Judicial Activism." "But more important, we do not select judges in our country to impose their own personal views of right and wrong on the rest of us. We select them to apply the judgments that we the people have already made through democratic means - whether in our laws or Constitution. It is to Judge Alito's credit that he puts his own personal views aside and decides cases on their legal merits. This may not always yield the result USA TODAY's editorial page seeks, but the proper remedy is not to ask unelected judges to bend the law to achieve the results you favor.
Judge Alito's record reveals that he believes in judicial restraint, not judicial activism. This is why the president nominated him, it is why I support him, and it is why, ultimately, I believe the United States Senate will confirm him.
<http://www.usatoday.com/news/opinion/editorials/2006-01-03-letters-alito_x.htm> " (Sen. John Cornyn, Letter To The Editor, "Alito Shows Judicial Restraint," USA Today, 1/4/06)

Iraqi Leaders Continue Talks To Form A National Unity Government.
"Iraqi leaders have agreed to press on with efforts to form a national unity government after the latest round of talks on Tuesday hosted by Kurdish officials in their northern stronghold. Negotiations on how exactly to share posts among the rival ethnic and sectarian factions will convene in the coming days in Baghdad, Kurdish regional president Masoud Barzani said after he and Iraq's Kurdish interim president Jalal Talabani met minority Sunni Arab leaders from the Iraqi Accordance Front. 'We have agreed on a national unity government,' Barzani told a news conference in the Kurdish capital Arbil. 'The negotiations will continue in Baghdad among all the parties.' <http://today.reuters.com/news/newsArticle.aspx?type=topNews&storyID=2006-01-03T190701Z_01_SCH149970_RTRUKOC_0_US-IRAQ.xml&archived=False> " (Shamal Aqrawi, "Iraq Leaders Set Sights On Unity Government," Reuters, 1/3/06)

Chairman Of The Joint Chiefs Of Staff General Pace Discusses The Progress And Work Ahead In Iraq. "After wrapping up a trip to visit troops across the globe, President Bush's top military adviser gave his prediction for the New Year. 'I predict that the enemies of the United States of America are going to have a bad year in 2006,' chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace said Tuesday in a brief interview as he walked through the halls of Landstuhl Regional Medical Center. ...

'We're making good progress there, and we're going to be sticking with the program we've got right now, which is training the Iraqi armed forces, training the Iraqi police, turning over more and more of the security responsibilities to the Iraqi government,' <http://www.estripes.com/article.asp?section=104&article=34093> he said. 'We'll be able to transition then more and more of the country to their control and as we transition that, we'll be able to have fewer of our forces maybe in country to be able to get the job done.'" (Scott Schonauer, "Gen. Pace: Enemies Of U.S. 'Are Going To Have A Bad Year,'" Star And Stripes, 1/4/06)

Yesterday From The White House

President Discusses Use And Reauthorization Of USA PATRIOT Act <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060103.html>

* In Focus: USA PATRIOT Act <http://www.whitehouse.gov/infocus/patriotact/>

U.S. Attorneys Discuss Patriot Act Meeting With The President <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060103-3.html>

Press Briefing By Scott McClellan <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060103-1.html>

You are currently subscribed to Communications Update - Agencies as:
jan.williams@usdoj.gov.
To unsubscribe send a blank email to:
leave-whitehouse-communications-update-agency-1239098E@list.whitehouse.gov

The Morning Update

This morning, President Bush will travel to the Pentagon to be briefed on operations in Iraq, Afghanistan, and the global War on Terror. The President will make a statement on the important progress being made in defeating the enemy and advancing democracy. In 2005, Iraqis voted in three successful elections and Iraqi Security Forces are growing in size and capability. Afghans are taking greater responsibility for their security, and NATO is assuming a larger role. The President will also discuss the work and sacrifices ahead in 2006.

9:30 am: THE PRESIDENT participates in Department of Defense Briefings
EST The Pentagon | Arlington, Virginia

11:35 am: THE PRESIDENT makes a statement on the Global War on Terror
EST The Pentagon | Arlington, Virginia

From Today's Morning Headlines

President Bush Discusses The Importance Of The Patriot Act With Prosecutors Who Have Used This Valuable Tool To Protect Americans. "As the clock runs on Congress' short-term extension of the Patriot Act, President Bush met with federal prosecutors Tuesday and contended that the domestic anti-terror law is vital to keeping Americans safe. ... 'The enemy has not gone away. They're still there. And I expect Congress to understand that we're still at war, and they got to give us the tools necessary to win this war,' he said. Later, outside the West Wing, district attorneys cited several cases in which the Patriot Act had played a crucial role, from staging an undercover sting on California weapons dealers attempting to sell Stinger missiles to securing convictions of major terrorist financiers in New York. 'We use it each and every day to protect our country against terrorists and criminals,' said Ken Wainstein, district attorney for the District of Columbia." (Jennifer Loven, "Bush Pushes For Patriot Act Renewal," The Associated Press, 1/3/06)

Secretary Chertoff Announces Improvements To Homeland Security Grants. "Facing cuts in antiterrorism financing, the Department of Homeland Security announced today that it has overhauled its system for evaluating new requests for money from a $765 million aid program for cities. The new system is based less on politics and city boundaries and more on assessments of where terrorists are likely to strike and potentially cause the greatest damage." (Eric Lipton, "Rules For Granting Terror Aid Are Overhauled," The New York Times, 1/4/06)

As The Economy Grows, Companies Expect To Spend More In 2006. "Capital expenditures, which include all kinds of spending that enhance a business's long-term prospects, such as buying or upgrading buildings or equipment, have been growing at a rate of about 11% in the U.S. for more than a year, though that has been edging up a bit lately. But there are some signs that the spending is starting to rise faster, at least among larger, public companies. Companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index increased their spending on capital expenditures during the third quarter of 2005 by 24%, compared with the same period in 2004, according to Thomson Financial, which tracks these figures." (Gregory Zuckerman, "Capital-Spending Plays," The Wall Street Journal, 1/4/06)

Senator John Cornyn (R-TX): "Judge Alito's Record Reveals That He Believes In Judicial Restraint, Not Judicial Activism." "But more important, we do not select judges in our country to impose their own personal views of right and wrong on the rest of us. We select them to apply the judgments that we the people have already made through democratic means – whether in our laws or Constitution. It is to Judge Alito's credit that he puts his own personal views aside and decides cases on their legal merits. This may not always yield the result USA TODAY's editorial page seeks, but the proper remedy is not to ask unelected judges to bend the law to achieve the results you favor. Judge Alito's record reveals that he believes in judicial restraint, not judicial achieve the results you favor. Judge Alito's record reveals that he believes in judicial restraint, not judicial activism. This is why the president nominated him, it is why I support him, and it is why, ultimately, I believe the United States Senate will confirm him." (Sen. John Cornyn, Letter To The Editor, "Alito Shows Judicial Restraint," USA Today, 1/4/06)

Iraqi Leaders Continue Talks To Form A National Unity Government. "Iraqi leaders have agreed to press on with efforts to form a national unity government after the latest round of talks on Tuesday hosted by Kurdish officials in their northern stronghold. Negotiations on how exactly to share posts among the rival ethnic and sectarian factions will convene in the coming days in Baghdad, Kurdish regional president Masoud Barzani said after he and Iraq's Kurdish interim president Jalal Talabani met minority Sunni Arab leaders from the Iraqi Accordance Front. 'We have agreed on a national unity government,' Barzani told a news conference in the Kurdish capital Arbil. 'The negotiations will continue in Baghdad among all the parties.'" (Shamal Aqrawi, "Iraq Leaders Set Sights On Unity Government," Reuters, 1/3/06)

Chairman Of The Joint Chiefs Of Staff General Pace Discusses The Progress And Work Ahead In Iraq. "After wrapping up a trip to visit troops across the globe, President Bush's top military adviser gave his prediction for the New Year. 'I predict that the enemies of the United States of America are going to have a bad year in 2006,' chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace said Tuesday in a brief interview as he walked through the halls of Landstuhl Regional Medical Center. ... 'We're making good progress there, and we're going to be sticking with the program we've got right now, which is training the Iraqi armed forces, training the Iraqi police, turning over more and more of the security responsibilities to the Iraqi government,' he said. 'We'll be able to transition then more and more of the country to their control and as we transition that, we'll be able to have fewer of our forces maybe in country to be able to get the job done.'" (Scott Schonauer, "Gen. Pace: Enemies Of U.S. 'Are Going To Have A Bad Year,'" Star And Stripes, 1/4/06)

Yesterday From The White House

President Discusses Use And Reauthorization Of USA PATRIOT Act

- In Focus: USA PATRIOT Act

U.S. Attorneys Discuss Patriot Act Meeting With The President

Press Briefing By Scott McClellan

You are currently subscribed to Communications Update - Agencies as:
jan.williams@usdoj.gov.
To unsubscribe send a blank email to:
leave-whitehouse-communications-update-agency-1239098E@list.whitehouse.gov

Williams, Jan

From: Williams, Jan

Sent: Thursday, January 5, 2006 8:15 AM

To: Bradbury, Steve; Brand, Rachel; Clark, John (USMS); Clement, Paul D; Fisher, Alice; Flores, Robert; Gillis, John; Herraiz, Domingo S.; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kim, Wan (CRT); Leonhart, Michele M.; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McNulty, Paul J; Moschella, William; O'Connor, Eileen J. (AAG/TAX); Sanchez, William J (CRT); Tamargo, Mauricio J; Tandy, Karen P; Wooldridge, Sue Ellen (ENRD); /o=USDOJ/ou=USAPAE/cn=Recipients/cn=Mailboxes/cn=SMalloy; Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Akers, Eric J.; Ames, Andrew; Barnett, Thomas O.; Battle, Michael (USAEO); Beach, Andrew; Beck, Cherith (USAARE); Bianco, Joseph F.; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Boardman, Michelle; Boote, John; Bottner, Andrea; Bounds, Ryan W (OLP); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Burch, Victoria; Chambers, Shane P; Clinger, James H; Cohen, Brian; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Cook, Elisebeth C; Cook, Marita L. (USAWY); Cooperstein, Theodore M; Coppenger, Chesed L. (TAX); Costigan, Michael; Coughlin, Robert; Curtis, O. Benton; Daley, Cybele; David, Matt; Dhillon, Uttam; Dummermuth, Matt (USAVAE); Eisenberg, John; Elwood, Courtney; Elwood, John; Flaherty, Connor; Freeman, Sharee (CRT); Friedrich, Matthew; Gambatesa, Donald (USMS); Garre, Gregory G; Glut, Martha (USANE); Gober, Chris; Golden, Lois; Goodling, Monica; Gorsuch, Neil M; Greg Harris; Hagle, Timothy; Harris, Gregory; Henke, Tracy (SMO); Hertling, Richard; Hofer, Patrick F. (TAX); Hoisington, Jana; Holland, Eric W; Irving, John (ODAG); Jaffer, Jamil N; Jordan, Theresa (USADE); Jungeblut, Neal P.; Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keehner, Laura; Kessler, Elizabeth A; Korn, Jennifer; Lesch, Jaclyn; Little, Kimani (CRT); Longlet, Benjamin; Lonick, Saundra; Luckinbill, Trent W.; Macklin, Kristi R; MacLean, Alex (CRT); Magnuson, Cynthia; Marshall, C. Kevin; Martinson, Wanda; Masoudi, Gerald; McArthur, Patrick; McDonald, Bruce; McFarland, Steven T (ODAG); McIntosh, Brent; McKee, Cindy (USAKS); McKeown, Matt (ENRD); McKnight, Cynthia M (CRT); McNally, Edward; McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Metcalf, Mark H (CRT); Miranda, Matthew; Monheim, Thomas; Moore, Miriam (ODAG); Morrison, Richard T. (TAX); Murphy, Sean; Neumayr, Mary (ENRD); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nichols, Grant W; Nowacki, John; OConnell, James; Otis, Lee L; Otis, William G.; Pagliocca, Theresa; Parsky, Laura; Peabody, Payson R. (TAX); Peed, Carl; Potter, Janet; Racicot, Tim (USAMT); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Roberts, Crystal; Roe, Price (OCIO); Roehrkasse, Brian; Roper, Matt M; Rosenberg, Chuck; Rowe, Kiri; Sampson, Kyle; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Schmitt, Glenn; Schwartz, Arthur; Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Selim, George (CRS); Sellers, Kiahna (OAG); Smith, Kimberly A; Sours, Raquel; Strug, Kerri; Swenson, Lily F; Taylor, Bruce A.; Tenpas, Ronald J (ODAG); Todd, Gordon (OLP); Tomlinson, Linda (USANH); Turner, Donald J. (USAPAM); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Underhill, Deborah; Vargas, Omar (CRT); Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Warren, Julie; Williams, Jan; Woodruff, William

Subject: The Morning Update: 1/5/06

Attachments: tmp.htm

Importance: Low

The Morning Update

This morning, the President will meet with a group of former Secretaries of State and Defense who will be briefed on ongoing operations in the War on Terror. This will be an opportunity to discuss the plan for victory in Iraq, the progress being made, and the challenges ahead.

Later in the day, President Bush will sign the Violence Against Women and Department of Justice Reauthorization Act of 2005. The President will then travel to the State Department and announce the National Security Language Initiative - a new strategy to strengthen our national security, expand educational opportunity, and help win the War on Terror by increasing the number of Americans learning critical foreign languages.

9:30 am: THE PRESIDENT participates in a meeting with the Secretary of State, Secretary of

EST Defense, Former Secretaries of State and Former Secretaries of Defense

The White House | Washington, DC

10:20 am: THE PRESIDENT participates in a Photo Opportunity with the Secretary of State,

EST Secretary of Defense, Former Secretaries of State and Former Secretaries of Defense

The White House | Washington, DC

3:20 pm: THE PRESIDENT and Mrs. Bush participate in a signing of H.R. 3402, the Violence

EST Against Women and Department of Justice Reauthorization Act of 2005

The White House | Washington, DC

3:45 pm: THE PRESIDENT makes remarks to the U.S. University Presidents Summit on

EST International Education

U.S. Department of State | Washington, DC

From Today's Morning Headlines

At The Pentagon, President Bush Addresses The Importance Of The Missions In Iraq And Afghanistan. "President Bush predicted today that 2006 would be a year of progress in Iraq and Afghanistan, which he called 'the two major fronts in this war on terror.' ... Mr. Bush, speaking at the Pentagon after a meeting with his top military advisers, said that if the Iraqis themselves 'continue to make progress on the security and political side that we expect,' the United States may be able to withdraw even more troops. 'But my decisions will be based upon conditions on the ground and the recommendation of our commanders, not based by false political timetables in Washington,' Mr. Bush said. 'I'm not going to let politics get in the way of doing the right thing in Iraq, <http://www.nytimes.com/2006/01/04/international/middleeast/04cnd-prexy.
html> and the American people have got to understand that.'" (David Stout, "Bush Predicts A Year Of Progress In Iraq And Afghanistan," The New York Times, 1/5/06)

Today, President Bush Discusses Progress And The Work Ahead In Iraq With Former Secretaries Of State And Defense. "President George W. Bush, who has been criticized for consulting with only a tight circle of trusted aides, is soliciting the views of former secretaries of state and defense, some of whom have doubted his Iraq policy. The group will meet Bush on Thursday and will be briefed by Gen. George Casey, the U.S. commander in Iraq, as well as Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador there. 'The president initiated an effort to broaden the outreach,' White House spokesman Scott McClellan said. 'It is an opportunity to talk about our plan for victory in Iraq, and the progress we're making and the challenges ahead.' <http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/iraq_bush_dc;_ylt=As6c9CfdIa_Zdysy.mtOnfes0N
UE;_ylu=X3oDMTA2Z2szazkxBHNlYwN0bQ--> " ("Bush Reaches Beyond Inner Circle On Iraq Policy," Reuters, 1/5/06)

Vice President Cheney Says The United States Must Remain Committed To Fighting The War On Terror. "Vice President Dick Cheney on Wednesday strongly defended a secret domestic eavesdropping operation and said that had it been in place before the September 11 attacks the Pentagon might have been spared. ... He said as the memory of September 11 faded, some politicians were 'yielding to the temptation to downplay the ongoing threat to our country and to back away from the business at hand.' 'The enemy that struck on 9/11 is weakened and fractured yet it is still lethal and planning to hit us again. Either we are serious about fighting this war or we are not, <http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/20060104/pl_nm/security_cheney_dc;_ylt=Al8_e f99HtuJWm.9o7UtJiYa.3QA;_ylu=X3oDMTBiMW04NW9mBHNlYwMlJVRPUCUl> ' Cheney told the Heritage Foundation think tank." (Patricia Wilson, "Cheney Strongly Backs Eavesdropping Operation," Reuters, 1/4/06)

As A Former FBI Special Agent, Rep. Michael Oxley (R-OH) Writes That NSA Surveillance Of Suspected Terrorists Is A Critical Tool In The War On Terror. "But my position is also based on personal experience. As special agent of the FBI, I conducted wiretaps. They were wrapped in layers of legal protections and never done without probable cause. Our law enforcement and intelligence professionals do not want useless information that takes them off the trail of criminals and terrorists. Some in the national media want to frame this as a debate on the domestic liberties of American citizens. But these are international phone calls and e-mails involving al-Qaida members and sympathizers prepared to attack again if they can. <http://www.limanews.com/story.php?IDnum=21021> I spend more time thinking about protecting the lives of millions of Americans than I do worrying about Osama bin Laden's civil rights." (Rep. Michael G. Oxley, Letter To The Editor, "President Right To Fight Terrorists," Lima News, 12/31/05)

The President And Mrs. Bush Send Best Wishes And Hopes To Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon And His Family. "President George W. Bush said on Wednesday after Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had a stroke that 'we are praying for his recovery' and analysts said the crisis would further slow Bush's Mideast peace policy. ... 'Laura and I share the concerns of the Israeli people about Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's health, and we are praying for his recovery,' <http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/20060105/pl_nm/israel_sharon_usa_dc;_ylt=Apm BUyeGo_bLAw_cZIo__SBZ.3QA;_ylu=X3oDMTBiMW04NW9mBHNlYwMlJVRPUCUl> Bush said in a written statement. 'Prime Minister Sharon is a man of courage and peace. On behalf of all Americans, we send our best wishes and hopes to the prime minister and his family,' Bush added." (Steve Holland, "Bush On Sharon: 'We Are Praying For His Recovery,'" Reuters, 1/4/06)

The American Bar Association Unanimously Gives Judge Alito A "Well Qualified" Rating. "The American Bar Association gave U.S. Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito its top rating on Wednesday as backers and foes of the 55-year-old conservative geared up for next week's Senate confirmation hearing. The ABA's Standing Committee on the Federal Judiciary announced it had unanimously rated Alito as 'well qualified' for a seat on the nation's highest court. <http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/20060104/pl_nm/court_alito_dc;_ylt=Ap74wZY29 EqZRltdQI92qiMa.3QA;_ylu=X3oDMTBiMW04NW9mBHNlYwMlJVRPUCUl> In assessing President George W. Bush's nominee, a federal appeals judge since 1990, the lawyer's group considered Alito's qualifications, integrity and judicial temperament." (Thomas Ferraro, "Law Group Gives Alito Top Rating," Reuters, 1/4/06)

Standards-Based Education Reform Yields Gains On National Achievement Tests. "More than a decade of effort to provide standards-based education reform has yielded gains, especially in mathematics, <http://washingtontimes.com/national/20060104-114050-5515r.htm> on national achievement tests in the fourth and eighth grades, a report shows. The 'Quality Counts 2006' report, released yesterday by Education Week newspaper, showed marked progress, both nationally and locally, in closing achievement gaps in math between white students and minorities and between poor and non-poor students." (Joyce Howard Price, "Math Performance Improving In Tests," The Washington Times, 1/5/06)

Yesterday From The White House

President Discusses War On Terror Following Pentagon Briefing <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060104.html>

* In Focus: National Security <http://www.whitehouse.gov/infocus/nationalsecurity/>
* In Focus: Defense <http://www.whitehouse.gov/infocus/defense/>

Remarks By The Vice President On Iraq And The War On Terror <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060104-2.html>

President's Statement On Health Of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060104-6.html>

Statement On Death Of His Highness Shaykh Maktoum Bin Rashid Al Maktoum <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060104-5.html>

Setting The Record Straight: Critics Launch Attacks Against Program to Detect and Prevent Terrorist Attacks <http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060104-7.html>

Ask The White House - Ken Wainstein, United States Attorney, District of Columbia Discusses The Patriot Act.
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/ask/20060104.html>

Press Briefing By Scott McClellan
<http://www.whitehouse.gov/news/releases/2006/01/20060104-1.html>

You are currently subscribed to Communications Update - Agencies as:
jan.williams@usdoj.gov.
To unsubscribe send a blank email to:
leave-whitehouse-communications-update-agency-1239098E@list.whitehouse.gov

The Morning Update

This morning, the President will meet with a group of former Secretaries of State and Defense who will be briefed on ongoing operations in the War on Terror. This will be an opportunity to discuss the plan for victory in Iraq, the progress being made, and the challenges ahead.

Later in the day, President Bush will sign the Violence Against Women and Department of Justice Reauthorization Act of 2005. The President will then travel to the State Department and announce the National Security Language Initiative – a new strategy to strengthen our national security, expand educational opportunity, and help win the War on Terror by increasing the number of Americans learning critical foreign languages.

9:30 am: EST	THE PRESIDENT participates in a meeting with the Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense, Former Secretaries of State and Former Secretaries of Defense The White House | Washington, DC
10:20 am: EST	THE PRESIDENT participates in a Photo Opportunity with the Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense, Former Secretaries of State and Former Secretaries of Defense The White House | Washington, DC
3:20 pm: EST	THE PRESIDENT and Mrs. Bush participate in a signing of H.R. 3402, the Violence Against Women and Department of Justice Reauthorization Act of 2005 The White House | Washington, DC
3:45 pm: EST	THE PRESIDENT makes remarks to the U.S. University Presidents Summit on International Education U.S. Department of State | Washington, DC

From Today's Morning Headlines

At The Pentagon, President Bush Addresses The Importance Of The Missions In Iraq And Afghanistan. "President Bush predicted today that 2006 would be a year of progress in Iraq and Afghanistan, which he called 'the two major fronts in this war on terror.' ... Mr. Bush, speaking at the Pentagon after a meeting with his top military advisers, said that if the Iraqis themselves 'continue to make progress on the security and political side that we expect,' the United States may be able to withdraw even more troops. 'But my decisions will be based upon conditions on the ground and the recommendation of our commanders, not based by false political timetables in Washington,' Mr. Bush said. 'I'm not going to let politics get in the way of doing the right thing in Iraq, and the American people have got to understand that.'" (David Stout, "Bush Predicts A Year Of Progress In Iraq And Afghanistan," The New York Times, 1/5/06)

Today, President Bush Discusses Progress And The Work Ahead In Iraq With Former Secretaries Of State And Defense. "President George W. Bush, who has been criticized for consulting with only a tight circle of trusted aides, is soliciting the views of former secretaries of state and defense, some of whom have doubted his Iraq policy. The group will meet Bush on Thursday and will be briefed by Gen. George Casey, the U.S. commander in Iraq, as well as Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador there. 'The president initiated an effort to broaden the outreach,' White House spokesman Scott McClellan said. 'It is an opportunity to talk about our plan for victory in Iraq, and the progress we're making and the challenges ahead.'" ("Bush Reaches Beyond Inner Circle On Iraq Policy," Reuters, 1/5/06)

Vice President Cheney Says The United States Must Remain Committed To Fighting The War On Terror. "Vice President Dick Cheney on Wednesday strongly defended a secret domestic eavesdropping operation and said that had it been in place before the September 11 attacks the Pentagon might have been spared. ... He said as the memory of September 11 faded, some politicians were 'yielding to the temptation to downplay the ongoing threat to our country and to back away from the business at hand.' 'The enemy that struck on 9/11 is weakened and fractured yet it is still lethal and planning to hit us again. Either we are serious about fighting this war or we are not,' Cheney told the Heritage Foundation think tank." (Patricia Wilson, "Cheney Strongly Backs Eavesdropping Operation," Reuters, 1/4/06)

As A Former FBI Special Agent, Rep. Michael Oxley (R-OH) Writes That NSA Surveillance Of Suspected Terrorists Is A Critical Tool In The War On Terror. "But my position is also based on personal experience. As special agent of the FBI, I conducted wiretaps. They were wrapped in layers of legal protections and never done without probable cause. Our law enforcement and intelligence professionals do not want useless information that takes them off the trail of criminals and terrorists. Some in the national media want to frame this as a debate on the domestic liberties of American citizens. But these are international phone calls and e-mails involving al-Qaida members and sympathizers prepared to attack again if they can. I spend more time thinking about protecting the lives of millions of Americans than I do worrying about Osama bin Laden's civil rights." (Rep. Michael G. Oxley, Letter To The Editor, "President Right To Fight Terrorists," Lima News, 12/31/05)

The President And Mrs. Bush Send Best Wishes And Hopes To Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon And His Family. "President George W. Bush said on Wednesday after Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had a stroke that 'we are praying for his recovery' and analysts said the crisis would further slow Bush's Mideast peace policy. ... 'Laura and I share the concerns of the Israeli people about Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's health, and we are praying for his recovery,' Bush said in a written statement. 'Prime Minister Sharon is a man of courage and peace. On behalf of all Americans, we send our best wishes and hopes to the prime minister and his family,' Bush added." (Steve Holland, "Bush On Sharon: 'We Are Praying For His Recovery,'" Reuters, 1/4/06)

The American Bar Association Unanimously Gives Judge Alito A "Well Qualified" Rating. "The American Bar Association gave U.S. Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito its top rating on Wednesday as backers and foes of the 55-year-old conservative geared up for next week's Senate confirmation hearing. The ABA's Standing Committee on the Federal Judiciary announced it had unanimously rated Alito as 'well qualified' for a seat on the nation's highest court. In assessing President George W. Bush's nominee, a federal appeals judge since 1990, the lawyer's group considered Alito's qualifications, integrity and judicial temperament." (Thomas Ferraro, "Law Group Gives Alito Top Rating," Reuters, 1/4/06)

Standards-Based Education Reform Yields Gains On National Achievement Tests. "More than a decade of effort to provide standards-based education reform has yielded gains, especially in mathematics, on national achievement tests in the fourth and eighth grades, a report shows. The 'Quality Counts 2006' report, released yesterday by Education Week newspaper, showed marked progress, both nationally and locally, in closing achievement gaps in math between white students and minorities and between poor and non-poor students." (Joyce Howard Price, "Math Performance Improving In Tests," The Washington Times, 1/5/06)

Yesterday From The White House

President Discusses War On Terror Following Pentagon Briefing

- In Focus: National Security
- In Focus: Defense

Remarks By The Vice President On Iraq And The War On Terror

President's Statement On Health Of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon

Statement On Death Of His Highness Shaykh Maktoum Bin Rashid Al Maktoum

Setting The Record Straight: Critics Launch Attacks Against Program to Detect and Prevent Terrorist Attacks

Ask The White House – Ken Wainstein, United States Attorney, District of Columbia Discusses The Patriot Act.

Press Briefing By Scott McClellan

You are currently subscribed to Communications Update - Agencies as:
jan.williams@usdoj.gov.
To unsubscribe send a blank email to:
leave-whitehouse-communications-update-agency-1239098E@list.whitehouse.gov

Reyes, Luis (SMO)

From:	Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent:	Thursday, January 05, 2006 10:43 AM
To:	Swenson, Lily F; Gorsuch, Neil M; Brand, Rachel; Hertling, Richard; Pacold, Martha M; Holland, Eric W; Seidel, Rebecca
Subject:	Fw: Draft DOJ Human Trafficking Report
Attachments:	DOJ HT Report 1.04.06 Draft Narrative.wpd

Here is the latest draft of this. Pls see email below from Omar on comment period (fairly tight). Thanks!

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD .USDOJ.gov>; Rothenberg, Laurence E <Laurence.E.Rothenberg@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Roth, Monique <Monique.Roth@usdoj.gov>; Thacker, Stephanie <Stephanie.Thacker@usdoj.gov>; Oosterbaan, Andrew <Andrew.Oosterbaan@usdoj.gov>; McHenry, Teresa <Teresa.McHenry@usdoj.gov>; Voris, Natalie (USAEO) <Natalie.Voris@usdoj.gov>; Hagy, David, W. <David.Hagy@usdoj.gov>; Bottner, Andrea <Andrea.Bottner@usdoj.gov>; Kaplan, Jennifer <Jennifer.Kaplan@usdoj.gov>; Scott-Finan, Nancy <Nancy.Scott-Finan@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Ho-Gonzalez, William <William.Ho-Gonzalez@usdoj.gov>; Kockritz, Janis <Janis.Kockritz@usdoj.gov>; Hagen, Leslie A. (USAEO) <Leslie.Hagen@usdoj.gov>; Placido, Anthony P. <Anthony.P.Placido@usdoj.gov>; Bell, T March (CRT) <T.March.Bell@crt.usdoj. gov>; Allred, David (CRT) <David.Allred@crt.usdoj.gov>; Burch, Jim <Jim.Burch@usdoj.gov>; Roberts, Marilyn <Marilyn.Roberts@usdoj.gov>; Darke Schmitt, Katherine <Katherine.Darke.Schmitt@usdoj.gov >; Cammarata, Pam <Pam.Cammarata@usdoj.gov>; david.johnson3@ic.fbi.gov <david.johnson3@ic.fbi.gov>; kerri.galvin@ic.fbi.gov <kerri.galvin@ic.fbi.gov>; lmball@usa.net <lmball@usa.net>; stansstrauss@comcast.net <stansstrauss@comcast.net>; Grenadier, Lorna (CRT) <Lorna.Grenadier@crt.usdoj.gov>; Troup, Linda M (CRT) <Linda.Troup@crt.usdoj.gov>; Frost, Joye <Joye.Frost@usdoj.gov>
CC: Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Schlozman, Brad (CRT) <Brad.Schlozman@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Little, Kimani (CRT) <Kimani.Little@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Wed Jan 04 22:24:47 2006
Subject: RE: Draft DOJ Human Trafficking Report

Good evening!

Attached for your review is the second draft of the Department's report on human trafficking. Your comments on the first draft have been enormously helpful and you'll see that many of your suggestions have been incorporated into this draft. Over the next few days, we will continue to work with individual components on footnote citations and outstanding pieces of information. While we proceed with wrapping up a few loose ends, we ask for your comment on this draft to be transmitted to me no later than COB, Friday, January 6. In addition, please recall that we requested back-up documents to be delivered to us by January 3 (see the email below).

As you may already know, we are facing a tight schedule and this review will be your last opportunity to provide substantive comment. On Tuesday, January 10, we will circulate a final draft, requesting a response by Wednesday, January 11. We intend to have this document finalized and to the printer by Thursday January 12.

This report is turning into a document that we all can be proud of! Feel free to call me with any questions.

Many Thanks,

Omar

PS- Go Texas, up by 6!

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, December 21, 2005 11:49 AM
To: Vargas, Omar (CRT); Hertling, Richard; Rothenberg, Laurence E; Roth, Monique; Thacker, Stephanie; Oosterbaan, Andrew; McHenry, Teresa; Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Hagy, David, W.; Bottner, Andrea; Kaplan, Jennifer; Scott-Finan, Nancy; Ho-Gonzalez, William; Kockritz, Janis; Hagen, Leslie A. (USAEO); Placido, Anthony P.; Bell, T March (CRT); Allred, David (CRT); Burch, Jim; Roberts, Marilyn; Darke Schmitt, Katherine; Cammarata, Pam; 'david.johnson3@ic.fbi.gov'; 'kerri.galvin@ic.fbi.gov '; 'lmball@usa.net'; 'stansstrauss@comcast.net'; Grenadier, Lorna (CRT); Troup, Linda M (CRT); Frost, Joye
Cc: Reyes, Luis (SMO); Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Little, Kimani (CRT)
Subject: RE: Draft DOJ Human Trafficking Report

Everyone:

A follow-up to last night's email.

First, please find attached versions of the documents we circulated yesterday formatted in MS Word.

Second, as discussed during our last meeting, please gather support documentation for the information contained in this report that pertains to your agencies. We ask that you maintain two sets of copies of these back-up documents (one for yourselves and one for us) and provide a copy to our office no later than COB January 3, 2006. Again, you are welcomed to call me with any questions.

Thanks, Omar

<< File: DOJ HT Report.12.20.05 Draft MS WORD.doc >>
<< File: DOJ HT Report Task List 12.20.05 MS WORD.doc >>

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Tuesday, December 20, 2005 9:30 PM
To: Hertling, Richard; Rothenberg, Laurence E; Roth, Monique; Thacker, Stephanie; Oosterbaan,

Andrew; McHenry, Teresa; Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Hagy, David, W.; Bottner, Andrea; Kaplan, Jennifer; Scott-Finan, Nancy; Ho-Gonzalez, William; Kockritz, Janis; Hagen, Leslie A. (USAEO); Placido, Anthony P.; Bell, T March (CRT); Allred, David (CRT); Burch, Jim; Roberts, Marilyn; Darke Schmitt, Katherine; Cammarata, Pam; 'david.johnson3@ic.fbi.gov'; 'kerri.galvin@ic.fbi.gov
'; 'lmball@usa.net'; 'stansstrauss@comcast.net'; Grenadier, Lorna (CRT); Troup, Linda M (CRT); Frost, Joye
Cc: Reyes, Luis (SMO); Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Little, Kimani (CRT)
Subject: Draft DOJ Human Trafficking Report

Everyone:

We greatly appreciate the hard work you have expended towards this draft report. It looks pretty good, but there is some work left to do. Attached for your review and comment is a first draft of the report. Also attached is a "tasking document" with follow-up questions and requests for additional information that will greatly enhance our final product. We ask that you supply us with your responses no later than COB Friday, December 23. We will then circulate a second draft of the report the week after next, once again asking for your review and comment. Please remember that the purpose of this report is to provide the general public with information regarding the Department's activities to implement the President's directives to combat human trafficking. Feel free to call me with any questions.

Many Thanks,

Omar

<< File: DOJ HT Report. 12.20.05. Draft Narrative.wpd >> << File: DOJ HT Report Task List.12.20.05.wpd >>

Department of Justice
Report on Activities to Combat Human Trafficking
Fiscal Years 2001-2005

I. An Introduction to Human Trafficking

Human trafficking is a pernicious crime that violates the fundamental principles of our society. For traffickers, victims are commodities to be traded and exploited in any market. Human trafficking is the modern-day form of slavery. It requires the use of force, fraud, or coercion by a trafficker to compel a person into, or hold someone in, an employment situation in which he or she will be criminally exploited. Trafficking may occur when victims are transported across borders or within a nation, or may not involve transportation at all. Victims, often women, are usually lured by promises of well-paying jobs. Once deprived of the opportunity to return home or communicate with their family, victims are generally held through force or threats in situations of sexual exploitation or forced labor. Human trafficking offenses thus transgress the victim's human liberty in violation of the Thirteenth Amendment's guarantee of freedom. As such, trafficking offends the core civil rights on which our Constitution and our country are based.

> Human life is the gift of our Creator -- and it should never be for sale. It takes a special kind of depravity to exploit and hurt the most vulnerable members of society. Human traffickers rob children of their innocence, they expose them to the worst of life before they have seen much of life.
>
> –President George W. Bush, July 16, 2004

By statute, a victim of a "severe form of trafficking in persons" is entitled to certain public programs and benefits. A severe form of trafficking must include the recruitment, harboring, transportation, provision, or obtaining of a person for one of the three following purposes:

- Labor or services, through the use of force, fraud, or coercion; or
- A commercial sex act, through the use of force, fraud, or coercion; or
- If the person is under 18 years of age, any commercial sex act, regardless of whether any form of coercion is involved.[1]

Since 2001, the Department of Justice has achieved an impressive record of prosecuting defendants for holding their victims in compelled service in such diverse areas as prostitution, field labor, domestic service, concubinage, "exotic dancing," pornography, garment factory "sweatshops," and street peddling. From fiscal year 2001 through fiscal year 2005, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys'

Insert Graphic Depicting Rate of Increase FY '96-'05

---

[1] Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, Pub. L. No. 106-386, § 103(8), 114 Stat. 1464 (signed into law on October 28, 2000; codified as amended at 22 U.S.C. § 7102 (8)).

DOJ_NMG_0008203

Offices filed 91 trafficking cases, a 405% increase over the number of trafficking cases filed from fiscal years 1996 through 2000. In these cases, Department attorneys charged 248 trafficking defendants, a 210% increase over the previous five fiscal years. In addition, prosecutors with the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices convicted 140 defendants of trafficking-related crimes, a 109% increase over the previous five years.

Traffickers take advantage of the victims' hopes for a better life, preying on or even creating vulnerabilities that they can exploit. For example, in United States v. Satia, Louisa Satia and her husband, Kevin Nanji, used a false passport to bring 14 year-old "R.O." from Cameroon, where R.O. had worked for Satia's mother since the age of 12. R.O. was lured by the promise of an American education. Satia and Nanji refused to send the girl to school, however, and instead forced her to work for them as a maid and as a nanny to their young children. R.O. was not permitted to leave Satia and Nanji's apartment alone, except to take out the trash and walk the children to the school bus stop. Satia hit R.O. routinely, poked R.O. in the eyes, sprayed window cleanser on R.O., poured cola and glue in R.O.'s hair, and threatened her with deportation even though they were the ones who had brought her to the country illegally. Nanji made repeated sexual advances toward the girl. Apart from keeping R.O. in a condition of involuntary servitude, Satia solicited numerous people to sell their identities to her so that she could create false passports and routinely arranged false marriages as part of an immigration fraud scheme. In 2002, after their conviction at trial of involuntary servitude, the defendants were sentenced to 9 years in prison and ordered to pay $105,300 in restitution.[2]

Traffickers may lure their victims into otherwise legitimate labor or into the sex industry. For instance, in a pathbreaking case in Florida, United States v. Cadena, Mexican women and girls as young as 14 years of age were brought to the United States with promises of good jobs as waitresses and landscapers, only to be held as slaves in a high-volume prostitution operation.[3] The Cadena family would hold the women in their service by shooting into the ground at their feet, threatening their families, beating them, and raping them as punishment if they tried to run away. The ringleader and six other men were convicted of involuntary servitude and sentenced to up to 15 years of incarceration. The Cadena case is ongoing, and Federal Bureau of Investigation and Departmental prosecutors and victim-witness specialists have continued to prosecute Cadena family members and assist the survivors. In 2002, one of the family members was apprehended at the United States-Mexico border and pled guilty to conspiracy to enslave the women and girls. With the cooperation of the Mexican Government, the Department secured the conviction of one of the Cadena brothers in Mexico in 2002, where he was sentenced to 24 years of incarceration. In 2005, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department's Office of International Affairs achieved the arrest in 2005 of yet another member of the family; trial is pending in Mexico as of the time of this report and an request for extradition prepared by the Office of International Affairs is pending. The Cadena victims have been assisted by a non-governmental organization that is funded by the Department's Office for Victims of Crime, and with the help of the case agents, prosecutors, and victim/witness staff, they have been able to bring their children and custodial parents to the United States.

---

[2] United States v. Satia, No. 00-590 (D. Md. 2002)

[3] United States v. Cadena, [insert case information].

DOJ_NMG_0008204

Any specific instance of human trafficking may involve a range of other criminal activity that is not limited to federal anti-human trafficking laws, such as inter-state transportation for prostitution, money laundering, and racketeering. Trafficking indictments often reflect this. For instance, in United States v. Zavala, Mariluz Zavala, who in November 2005 received a 15 year prison sentence for enslaving Peruvian workers in Long Island, New York, was charged with a multi-object conspiracy, where the Department alleged that she and her co-conspirators had conspired to commit forced labor and involuntary servitude by withholding immigration documents. The Department also charged her with extortion and falsifying immigration documents, criminal violations that are not found in federal anti-human trafficking law.[4] In forced prostitution cases, such as United States v. Reyes-Rojas,[5] where two brothers were charged with sex trafficking, additional charges often include inter-state transportation for prostitution under the law known commonly as the "The Mann Act,"[6] and harboring people for prostitution. In cases like United States v. Maksimenko, where a Lithuanian man pled guilty to for enslaving Ukranian women in strip clubs through force and threats, trafficking charges are predicate acts under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) statutes,[7] and accordingly can sustain money laundering charges for transactions carried out with the proceeds of, or in furtherance, of a trafficking scheme.

Sometimes, when a trafficking situation has occurred but there is not sufficient evidence with which to establish a trafficking offense, the Mann Act and immigration statutes can be powerful tools to vindicate the federal interest. The case of United States v. Reddy is a good example of this.[8] In that case, which was uncovered before the passage of the TVPA[9] the investigation revealed that, for over ten years, defendant Lakireddy Bali Reddy, a wealthy San Francisco Bay Area businessman, maintained a number of young girls and women as a quasi-harem for his sexual gratification and to work in his household and business enterprises. These victims were predominantly from families of lower castes in India and were brought into the United States by way of fraudulent employment offers or sham marriages. Members of Reddy's family posed as relatives of the victims to assist in their fraudulent migration. His scheme came to light after a teenage girl died of carbon monoxide poisoning in the apartment where he had sequestered her, her sister, and another girl. In 2001, Reddy pled guilty to transporting his victims in interstate and foreign commerce for illegal sexual activity. He was sentenced to more than 8 years in prison and ordered to pay $2,000,000 in restitution to four of his victims. The victims received benefits and services under the TVPA and today remain safely in the United States.

---

4 United States v. Zavala, [insert case information].

5 United States v. Reyes-Rojas, [insert case information].

6 18 U.S.C. § 2421.

7 Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO), Pub L. No. 91-452, 84 Stat. 941.

8 United States v. Reddy, [insert case information].

9 TVPA, Pub. L. No. 106-386.

DOJ_NMG_0008205

DOJ_NMG_0008206

II. An Administration Priority

Early in this Administration, the President identified the eradication of human trafficking as a priority. Two particular actions by the President focused Federal resources on trafficking. First, in February 2002, the President issued Executive Order 13257, creating a cabinet-level Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. The President ordered that the Task Force be chaired by the Secretary of State and be comprised of the Attorney General, the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, the Director of Central Intelligence, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and the Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development.[10] The President took this action to ensure that the TVPA was fully implemented in a coordinated fashion throughout the federal government.[11]

> Slavery, human trafficking, and sexual servitude are crimes that wrench our hearts. They rob human beings of freedom. They strike at our nation's belief in the potential of every life. They are crimes that demand swift and implacable prosecution of the predators. They are crimes that deserve warmth and compassion for the victims.
>
> -Attorney General John Ashcroft, January 29, 2004

Second, also in February 2002, the President issued National Security Presidential Directive 22 (NSPD-22) to identify human trafficking as an important national security matter as well as to instruct federal agencies to strengthen their collective efforts, capabilities, and coordination to support the President's goal of abolishing human trafficking.[12] NSPD-22 states that human trafficking a transnational threat that is an affront to the principles on which this country stands. The relationship of human trafficking to organized crime, especially transnational criminal syndicates, fosters official corruption and threatens the rule of law.[13] The clandestine movement of persons across borders also poses terrorism and public health concerns. The United States Attorney's Office for the District of Montana, for example, treats every border incursion as potentially related to terrorism and, in 2004, was involved in a joint operation with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Canadian Border Services Agency that resulted in the identification of a dozen Korean women believed to be destined for the sex trade, 80% of whom tested positive for tuberculosis. The syndicates that recruit and move these victims are often the same ones that are responsible for other trans-border crimes, like smuggling. Traffickers can and will move any type of cargo, human or otherwise, for profit. The fight against trafficking is

---

[10] Exec. Order No. 13257, 3 C.F.R. 13257 (2002).

[11] The President subsequently issued an Executive Order amending Executive Order 13257 on March 18, 2004, conforming it to the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-193, 117 Stat. 2875.

[12] National Security Presidential Directive Memorandum Regarding Combating Trafficking In Persons, (Feb. 25, 2002) Parts of NSPD-22 are classified and cannot be released to the public.

[13] Id.

DOJ_NMG_0008207

therefore a critical element of United States foreign policy, requiring full use of the tools of diplomacy and the cooperation of American and foreign law enforcement.

Moreover, NSPD-22 views the abolition of prostitution, the driving force behind sex trafficking, as integral to the abolition of human trafficking. Regarding the United States's policy towards prostitution, NSPD-22 states:

> The United States opposes prostitution and any related activities, including pimping, pandering, and/or maintaining brothels as contributing to the phenomenon of trafficking in persons. These activities are inherently harmful and dehumanizing. The United States Government's position is that these activities should not be regulated as a legitimate form of work for any human being.[14]

NSPD-22 created a three-point plan of action:

1. Implementing Training in Federal Agencies

The President required all federal agencies to ensure that their own personnel were trained and equipped to carry out their anti-trafficking responsibilities and that their personnel coordinated with counterparts in other agencies. Further, NSPD-22 stated that the United States has a zero-tolerance policy with regard to trafficking by United States Government employees and contractors, who are to be educated about trafficking and investigated, prosecuted, and punished for engaging in it.

2. Developing Cooperation With State and Local Law Enforcement in the United States

The President recognized that state and local law enforcement are critical to federal efforts to combat human trafficking. NSPD-22 instructs federal agencies to vigorously enforce laws against traffickers, and to provide training and assistance to state and local law enforcement to assist them in recognizing victims and to hold perpetrators accountable for their crimes.

3. Integrating and Coordinating International Programs

The President required all federal agencies to coordinate foreign assistance programs, including funding to governmental and non-governmental organizations and public awareness programs, to combat trafficking in persons. NSPD-22 also required agencies to ensure that contractors receiving United States funding through international programs do not engage in trafficking activities. The President also directed agencies to work to prevent future victimization by reducing the vulnerability of individuals to trafficking, particularly through the expansion of educational and economic opportunities and the protection and promotion of human rights. The President further directed federal agencies to employ diplomatic and foreign policy tools to encourage other nations and multilateral organizations to work with the United States to combat this crime, to draft

---

[14] Id.

DOJ_NMG_0008208

and enforce laws against trafficking, and to hold accountable those who engage in this crime.[15]

In 2003, Congress passed and President Bush signed the reauthorization of the TVPA, known as the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA).[16] The TVPRA of 2003 codified the President's Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons by creating the Senior Policy Operating Group (SPOG), which meets quarterly. The TVPRA slightly expanded the SPOG's authority, particularly as it concerns inter-agency coordination to develop the capacity of foreign nations, both source and destination countries, to combat trafficking; to examine the role of sex tourism in human trafficking; and to foster consultation with governmental and non-governmental organizations regarding implementation of the TVPRA.

The Attorney General has been an engaged member of the SPOG, and the Department supports the committee in a variety of ways. In 2004, for example, the Civil Rights Division and the Office of Justice Programs participated a SPOG subcommittee charged with designing the President's international human trafficking initiative. Currently, the Civil Rights Division, the Criminal Division, Office of Legal Policy, and the Office for Victims of Crime are members of the SPOG Subcommittee on Domestic Trafficking. The National Institute of Justice, a component of the Office of Justice Programs, is a member of the SPOG Subcommittee on Research, which shares information regarding research grants and other activities by each SPOG member agency. This subcommittee is also studying the issue of accurately estimating the number of trafficking victims within the United States. In addition, the Office of Justice Programs, the Department's principal grant-making agency, and the Office on Violence Against Women participate in the interagency grant information-sharing process of the SPOG. The grant information-sharing process is designed to provide SPOG member agencies with an opportunity to review and comment on proposed grant awards, helping to ensure that domestic and international grant programs are coordinated across the federal government. Finally, the Office of Legal Policy chairs the SPOG Subcommittee on Regulations, a working group charged with the development of federal regulations to implement the TVPRA.

---

[15] Id.

[16] Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-193, 117 Stat. 2875 (2003) (signed into law by President Bush on December 19, 2003).

DOJ_NMG_0008209

III. Scope of the Problem

A. How Many Victims and Who are They?

It is extremely difficult to quantify the number of victims trafficked globally and into the United States each year. Some estimates indicate that as many as 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders annually, with up to 17,500 victims trafficked into our country each year.[17] Clearly, the problem is of sufficient magnitude that a continued dedication of substantial resources to this enforcement area is very much in order.

Despite our record number of investigations and prosecutions, there is a noted disparity between the estimated number of victims and those who have been found and assisted. The Department realizes that it must address the incongruity between some estimates and the less than 1,000 victims that have been rescued through the efforts of federal, state, and local law enforcement since 2003, when services for trafficking victims were first made available under the TVPA. Though the possible reasons for this disparity vary, the difference nevertheless signals the need to carefully scrutinize the estimated number of trafficking victims to assure that it reflects as accurately as possible the true number of human trafficking victims within our country.

Some estimates may overstate the extent of the problem and conflate human trafficking with the smuggling and harboring of illegal aliens or with the related crime of migrant prostitution. Trafficking victims are not all illegal aliens; human trafficking is distinct from human smuggling. Trafficking victims may be United States citizens, legal residents, or visitors. For example, United States v. Pipkins was the first case in which the Department successfully prosecuted two pimps for trafficking women and girls, all American citizens.[18] Prostitution alone is not trafficking; but where, as here, it involved the use of force or coercion to prevent people from leaving the enterprise, it becomes trafficking. Human smuggling, on the other hand, is the facilitation, transportation, attempted transportation, or illegal entry of a person or persons across an international border, in violation of American immigration laws. Many of those illegally entering the United States are smuggled, not trafficked.[19] Smuggling may occur clandestinely or through deception, such as the use of fraudulent passports or other immigration documents.[20] Human smugglers enter into a contractual relationship with those they will illegally transport into our country. The smuggler is often paid a considerable amount of money for his services and the relationship normally ends once the smuggled person has entered the United States and the debt is paid.

---

17 U.S. Dept. of Justice, Assessment of U.S. Gov't Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons, Fiscal Year 2003 (2004); Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, U.S. Dept. of State, Ann. Rep. (2005).

18 United States v. Pipkins, 378 F. 3d 1281 (11th Cir. 2004).

19 The Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center, Fact Sheet: Distinctions Between Human Smuggling and Human Trafficking (2005).

20 Id.

DOJ_NMG_0008210

Identifying and assisting victims of human trafficking are difficult tasks, and consequently, the Department does not have reliable figures regarding the number of victims who may be in the United States. Trafficking victims who have been rescued in connection with federal government activities over the past several years have come from more than 50 different countries, with the disproportionate majority coming from Latin America.[21] But several factors contribute to the difficulty of identifying trafficking victims. Human trafficking, like many other crimes, often requires that the victim and the criminal enterprise remain in the shadows of our communities. Moreover, victims often suffer from paralyzing fear and are reluctant to seek help, further exacerbating the problem. Traffickers prey on the meek and destitute, coercing and deceiving them into hiding.

Another explanation for this disparity is that victims may be helped by state and local law enforcement activities that the Department does not know about, or, in some instances, state and local officials may not realize that they have uncovered trafficking victims. Under our federal system of government, state and local governments may prosecute these cases under other criminal laws. Furthermore, although a particular prosecution by the Department may only result in the rescue of one or a few victims, it is reasonable to assume that enterprises that have been in business for several years have victimized hundreds of people.

The Department is committed to discussing and refining methodologies for estimating the number of victims that may yield more reliable results. The enactment of anti-trafficking crimes at the state level, many of which are based on the Department's model anti-trafficking statute, is a heartening trend, as the men and women in state and local law enforcement far outnumber the federal resources available to combat this problem.[22] As with domestic violence and sexual abuse, it is local police and prosecutors who will investigate and prosecute the lion's share of trafficking cases in the coming years. The Department is committed to supporting these partners in expanding the victim-centered approach it has developed.

B. The Department Responds to this Crime with A Victim-Centered Approach

Typically, federal prosecutors learn about a crime from the victim, from the eyewitness, or through an investigation. For traffickers to be successful, they must hide their crime from law enforcement by hiding their victims and their collaborators. Those who benefit from trafficking – men who frequent prostitutes and those who benefit from the low cost labor that the traffickers broker – are often momentary beneficiaries, and may not even know that the victim is being held in compelled service. Thus, the only remaining eyewitness is often the victim. To prevent their workforce from running away and to forestall detection, traffickers have an incentive to instill

---

[21] U.S. Dept. of Justice, Assessment of U.S. Gov't Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons, Fiscal Year 2003 (2004); U.S. Dept. of Justice, Assessment of U.S. Gov't Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons, Fiscal Year 2004 (2005).

[22] The Department's model state law is discussed below in detail at ____. A copy of the model state law is available as an appendix to this report and on the internet at http://www.usdoj.gov/crt/crim/model_state_law.pdf.

DOJ_NMG_0008211

fear in their victims– fear of American law enforcement, fear of their captors, and fear of anyone they meet in their unfamiliar settings. Many victims are far from their country of origin and their families. They do not speak English and are more likely than not to lack any legal immigration status. Traffickers prey on the unsettled aspects of their lives, playing victims against each other and fostering collaboration.

Victims of trafficking often live and are forced to work in linguistic and social isolation. They fear the threat of exposure and feel shame about the work they are forced to do, particularly when that work includes sexual abuse. They also fear continued violence or the threat of reprisals against loved ones. They can develop a psychological dependence on the trafficker or others. Immigrant victims of human trafficking often face a special set of circumstances that keep them in the shadows of our nation's communities. Traffickers will often withhold from immigrant victims of trafficking their immigration documents. Immigrant victims may have a fear of American law enforcement , do not understand their rights, and fear risking default on monies owed their captors, as well as the collateral effect that may have on their families back home. The result is that victims will rarely self-report and so they must be pro-actively found.

While relying on the victims to give testimony about their suffering – the same duty American law requires of any witness – the Department places a premium on addressing the victims' need for recovery. Agents, prosecutors, and victim/witness staff work with, and are intensifying their relationships with, victim service providers. These groups, often experienced faith or community-based organizations that have previously served immigrant or abused populations, can help keep the victims safe, meet their medical and housing needs, and help them find an equilibrium in their lives through job training, language classes, and life-skills counseling. Victim-centered prosecutions that recognize that the government's interest in these cases stems from the violation of the fundamental right of freedom. Moreover, victim-centered prosecutions are essential to the liberation and care of victims. In vindicating the survivor's right to be free, federal prosecutors must give him or her the opportunity to use that freedom and the support to make it meaningful. The Department's approach flows from our nation's foundational principles – respect for human dignity and one's civil rights.

"It's there fault that I lost my friends, my parents....My story is very long. It took me about a year to reach my parents....They (the defendants) don't repent for everything they did to me, for all the damage they did to me. They hit me....They thought they were big shorts. I tried to defend myself but couldn't. I tried to escape...."

–An in-court statement by S.A.H., a victim in United States v. Jimenez-Calderon

Federal law enforcement are committed to combating human trafficking with a victim-centered approach. Federal investigators and prosecutors, including Federal Bureau of Investigation and Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents and Assistant United States Attorneys, immediately refer a victim to victim-witness specialists who begin to provide the appropriate referrals to victim service providers, often grantees that are funded through the Office for Victims of Crime and the Department of Health and Human Services Office of Refugee Resettlement. The Civil Rights Division and the Office for Victims of Crime work together to ensure that grantees are available to provide services to victims. In addition, because trafficking victims may avail themselves of victim services providers funded through other Departmental components, such as the Office on Violence Against Women and the Bureau of Justice Assistance, grantees of these offices are trained on providing assistance to victims of human trafficking.

DOJ_NMG_0008212

Department components regularly promote a victim-centered response and educate other law enforcement agencies and victim service providers about the dynamics of trafficking and the need for pro-active investigations in an effort to increase awareness and outreach to new partners, with the ultimate goal of preventing victimization. For example:

- Since 2002, Civil Rights Division staff have trained federal, state, and local law enforcement officers and victim service providers about proactive victim-centered investigations. In addition, Criminal Section lawyers are educating prosecutors and other law enforcement officials across the country on the criminal provisions of the new trafficking statute and providing practical guidance on investigating and prosecuting these difficult cases, as well as assisting localities to establish regional working groups to better coordinate and focus anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. The Section continues to organize and lead training efforts at the Justice Department's national training facility for federal investigators and prosecutors from around the country, as well as victim-witness coordinators from U. S. Attorneys' offices.

- Since January 2003, nearly 40,000 law enforcement officers, attorneys, social service providers, advocates, medical and mental health professionals, and community members have been trained by the Office for Victims of Crime and Bureau of Justice Assistance grantees. Moreover, the Bureau of Justice Assistance's law enforcement training emphasizes that code enforcement officials, fire marshals, and other persons that may have access to where victims are being held should be trained on signs of human trafficking.

- The Federal Bureau of Investigation's Civil Rights Unit and various United States Attorneys' Offices have also participated in dozens of regional Department of Justice sponsored human trafficking training conferences hosted throughout the country, in cities including Los Angeles, California; Houston, Texas; New Haven, Connecticut; Portland, Oregon; St. Louis, Missouri; San Diego, California; San Francisco, California; and Tampa, Florida.

DOJ_NMG_0008213

IV. Tools for Investigating and Prosecuting Human Trafficking

The Prosecutor's Tool Box

Involuntary servitude
Labor wage and hour laws
Mann Act
PROTECT Act
RICO Act
Trafficking Victims Protection Act
Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003
Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005

The Department's meaningful success in combating human trafficking would not be possible without the enactment of several statutes by Congress. Prior to 2000, trafficking cases were prosecuted under a number of federal criminal statutes including the involuntary servitude statutes,[23] the Mann Act,[24] and labor laws concerning workplace conditions and compensation.[25] The Mann Act statutes were formerly thought of as the primary federal anti-trafficking tool, when "trafficking" was perceived as interstate transportation for prostitution, as opposed to the modern definition, which focuses on compelled service. The involuntary servitude statutes set forth a variety of substantive crimes covering the slave trade, involuntary servitude, peonage. Sections 1584 and 1581, of Title 18 of the United States Code, which respectively criminalize involuntary servitude and peonage, are the primary statutes used in involuntary servitude and trafficking prosecutions. Section 1583, which criminalizes kidnaping victims into slavery, likewise remains a useful tool in modern federal prosecutions. Prior to the TVPA, these statutes did not always treat the workers involved as victims and enforcement authority for each of these possible anti-trafficking tools was scattered across the United States Government, leading to differing outcomes depending on which charges were brought or which agency learned of the allegations of abuse.

Today, the centerpiece of United States Government efforts is the TVPA.[26] The TVPA provided for a range of new protections and assistance for victims of trafficking in persons who comply with law enforcement investigations; it expanded the crimes and enhanced the penalties available to federal investigators and prosecutors pursuing traffickers; and it expanded United States activities internationally to prevent victims from being trafficked in the first place.

---

[23] See 18 U.S.C. §§ 1581-1588. These statutes are still used when appropriate and were updated and supplemented by the restitution, forfeiture, and attempt provisions enacted in the TVPA.

[24] See 18 U.S.C. §§ 2421-2424.

[25] E.g., Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act, Pub. L. No. 97-470, 96 Stat. 2583 (1983) (codified as amended at 29 U.S.C. § 1851).

[26] TVPA, Pub. L. No. 106-386.

DOJ_NMG_0008214

Protections and Assistance for Victims

The TVPA authorized a dedicated stream of funding for victim services and provides for immigration relief for severe forms of trafficking.[27] Under the TVPA, a victim is certified by the Department of Health and Human Services as eligible for services funded by any federal or state program or activity, such as the Departments of Agriculture, Health and Human Services, and Labor or the Legal Services Corporation. Department of Health and Human Services certification is granted after consultation with the Department's law enforcement officials, including investigators and prosecutors, that the victim meets the statutory definition of a "victim of a severe form of trafficking" and is also cooperating with the federal law enforcement investigation. The TVPA also authorized the Department to fund and provide training and technical assistance to law enforcement agencies and victim service providers.

The Department's Office for Victims of Crime directs its funding to support services for pre-certified victims and may, in special circumstances, fund organizations that provide services to certified victims. Pre-certified victims are those victims who have been identified by law enforcement in connection with an investigation and are awaiting Department of Health and Human Services certification that they are a victim of a severe form of trafficking. This is significant because pre-certified victims are not entitled to the same publicly funded benefits that certified victims are, yet the need for services is most acute at this stage. Secondarily, providing those services enables victims, in most instances, to cooperate with law enforcement to investigate and prosecute their human traffickers. A safe and healthy victim is better able to articulate to investigators and a court what has happened to her. Indeed, a survivor of trafficking can often be one of the most effective anti-trafficking tools as an advocate and a provider of services for victims.

Insert images of trafficker mug-shots

Defined Crimes and Enhanced the Penalties

The TVPA,[28] defined human trafficking as a crime, crated stiff sentences, and provided prosecutors with definitions of terms used to describe the offense such as "coercion," and "commercial sex act."[29] Traffickers that use force, fraud or coercion may be sentenced to up to a term of up to life imprisonment.[30]

Prevention

---

[27] A more detailed discussion about victim services programs administered by the Department of Justice is below in Part VI "The Department's Collateral Attack on Human Traffickers," Section B "Restoring a Victim's Dignity."

[28] See, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1589-1594.

[29] 22 U.S.C.§ 7102.

[30] See, 18 U.S.C. 1591.

DOJ_NMG_0008215

Insert Image of Bilateral Safety Corridor Coalition Public Awareness Calendar

The TVPA has given the Department the tools needed to increase public awareness within our communities, particularly among law enforcement and social services agencies, as well as internationally. The Department's activities, including those undertaken by non-governmental organizations that receive grants from the Office for Victims of Crime, aim to prevent victimization through public awareness and outreach are discussed below in Part VI "The Department's Collateral Attack on Human Traffickers," Section C "Public Awareness Supports Pro-Active Investigations."

Subsequently, in 2003, Congress, with the President's support, re-authorized the TVPA,[31] enhancing penalties and adding responsibilities to the United States Government's anti-trafficking portfolio, such as new public awareness campaigns to combat sex tourism and some refinements to the federal criminal law. Significantly, Congress included trafficking among the terms that constitute money laundering and racketeering, under the RICO statute. Prosecutors have used this effective tool to dismantle trafficking schemes. It also created a mandatory restitution section and a forfeiture provision. These sections work together to ensure that defendants convicted of trafficking in persons receive sentences that reflect the seriousness of their crimes. The TVPRA has produced reals results in the field, yielding penalties three and four times those obtained under smuggling or harboring statutes and under historical servitude and trafficking statutes, as discussed earlier in this section.

Graphic depicting rate of sentences in trafficking cases

It also clarified the provision that victims meet the statutory requirement to comply with law enforcement investigations by allowing victims to assist with law enforcement efforts, such as providing investigators with important factual testimony, and it relieved victims under the age of 18 from meeting this requirement altogether. Congress also created a new civil action that allows trafficking victims to sue their traffickers in federal district court. Specifically, the TVPRA of

---

[31] TVPRA Pub. L. No. 108-193.

DOJ_NMG_0008216

2003 gave victims of human trafficking the right to bring federal civil suits against their traffickers for actual and punitive damages.

The account of a Philippine teacher from a rural village is illustrative of how civil suits are an important aspect in fighting human trafficking when prosecutors are unable or have insufficient evidence to bring forward a criminal prosecution. In August 2004, a Santa Monica jury awarded her $825,000 for her enslavement by Judd Jackson, a Sony Pictures executive, and his wife, Beth.[32] The Philippine teacher thought she was coming to the United States to work as a travel companion to an elderly woman. Instead, her passport was taken away and she was enslaved. The Jacksons made her clean their home, provide meticulous care for their dogs, and sleep on the dining room floor. After a little more than one year of working from 5:30 a.m. to as late as 10 p.m., a neighbor called the police and the victim was referred to the Coalition to Abolish Slavery and Trafficking (CAST), a grantee of the Department's Office for Victims of Crime human trafficking victim services program. The victim is now an advocate on behalf of trafficking victims, speaking publicly about the evils of human trafficking.

On January __, President Bush signed into law the Trafficking Victims' Protection Reauthorization of 2005 (TVPRA of 2005). In addition to reauthorizing the TVPRA, the law enhances our ability to combat trafficking in persons by extending our prosecutorial tools and providing new protections for victims. In important enhancements to prosecutorial tools, the bill establishes extra-territorial authority for prosecution of trafficking in persons offenses committed by federal contractors abroad or persons accompanying them and adds trafficking in persons as predicates for the offense of document servitude, where one's identity papers, such a foreign birth certificate, passport, or immigration documents are withheld by the trafficker and used to coerce or compel the trafficking victim. The TVPRA of 2005 also promotes efforts to fight domestic trafficking in persons. It requires a comprehensive research and statistical review and analysis of incidents of trafficking and commercial sex acts within the United States and annual conferences, to be conducted by the Department for the benefit of state and local law enforcement, other governmental agencies, and non-governmental organizations, on domestic trafficking in fiscal years 2006, 2007, and 2008 and biennially thereafter.

In addition, the TVPRA of 2005 establishes a grant program to develop, expand, and strengthen assistance programs for United States citizens and permanent residents who have been subjected to trafficking and establishes a pilot program to create residential treatment facilities for children subjected to trafficking. It also creates a new grant program for state and local law enforcement authorities to investigate and prosecute trafficking of U.S. citizens and permanent residents, including efforts to reduce demand for commercial sex acts. Furthermore, the TVPRA of 2005 contains new requirements for data collection that will promote effective responses to trafficking. These include study by the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center, an inter-agency program discussed in more detail below, of the relationship between trafficking and terrorism and of the abduction and enslavement of children as soldiers, and development of a mechanism for quantifying the number of victims of trafficking.

---

[32] [Insert case citation.]

DOJ_NMG_0008217

The President, also in 2003, signed into law, the Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to end the Exploitation of Children Today Act of 2003, the law known as the PROTECT Act. The PROTECT Act, developed with the assistance of experts in the Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section of the Criminal Division (CEOS), has given the Department's prosecutors several new tools to combat sex trafficking and child prostitution. The Act makes it a crime for a United States citizen to travel in foreign commerce and engage in illicit sexual activity with minors,[33] and now includes an attempt provision.[34] Moreover, this Act facilitated prosecutions by eliminating the requirement that the Department prove that the traveler-predator intended to have sex with a child prior to traveling.

---

[33] Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to end the Exploitation of Children Today (PROTECT) Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-21, 117 Stat. 650.

[34] PROTECT Act, Pub. L. No. 108-21 (codified as amended at 18 U.S.C. § 2423(c)).

DOJ_NMG_0008218

V. Halting Human Trafficking with a Record Number of Aggressive Investigations and Prosecutions

Since 2001, the Department has achieved a record number of human trafficking investigations and prosecutions through a unique victim-centered approach that focuses on three important themes: sex trafficking, labor trafficking, and child sex trafficking. Prosecutions of sex and labor trafficking depend for their success on the elements of force, fraud, or coercion that render the victim's role involuntary. Because trafficking is modern day slavery, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft designated the Civil Rights Division, in early 2001, as the principal architect of the Department's comprehensive response to human trafficking. The Civil Rights Division has collaborated with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Attorneys' Offices, the Criminal Division, and the Office of Justice Programs to uncover and investigate these criminal enterprises, to prosecute and hold traffickers accountable for their criminal conduct, and, most importantly, to rescue victims and return to them their dignity.

In 2004, the Federal Bureau of Investigation took an important step towards the vigorous investigation of trafficking crimes when it launched the Involuntary Servitude and Slavery/Trafficking in Persons Initiative. This Initiative has achieved important results in the manner in which the Bureau uncovers and investigates these cases in coordination with the Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions. Specifically, the Bureau's Civil Rights Unit, the primary Bureau agency charged with investigating federal civil rights statutes:

- Developed and disseminated a general human trafficking investigative protocol to all FBI field offices;
- Implemented commercial sex trafficking intelligence collection requirements and disseminated those requirements to every Bureau Field Intelligence Group;
- Established a mechanism for the Bureau to properly classify cases as human trafficking, alien smuggling, or child prostitution;
- Expanded the Bureau's outreach to national human trafficking victim advocacy organizations, such as The Freedom Network and the International Justice Mission to establish contacts and leverage partnerships.
- Commenced, in October 2005, human trafficking threat assessments in each of the nation's 56 Bureau Field Offices. The threat assessments are intended to help the Bureau determine the nature and scope of human trafficking and to develop a more informed response to this criminal activity. Field Offices will be guided by this analysis in determining whether to establish or enhance their participation in local anti-human trafficking task forces, including establishing relationships with local non-governmental organizations and more aggressive involvement in investigations by federal, state and local law enforcement;[35] and
- Created, in November 2005, a case tracking database to track and maintain important human trafficking related data from the Bureau's Field Offices regarding the

---

[35] Fed. Bureau of Invest., Human Trafficking Initiative Elec. Commc'n to all Field Offices (Oct. 21, 2005).

DOJ_NMG_0008219

Department's prosecutorial decisions, identifying emerging trends and reporting significant events in the field to the Bureau's Civil Rights Unit.

A. Sex Trafficking

"We have all the ingredients they want....We have a migrant workforce and a legal sex trade."

-Gerald Gardner, Nevada Deputy Attorney General and Las Vegas Office Chief, at a press conference inaugurating the Department's Las Vegas Anti-Human Trafficking Task Force, Las Vegas Sun, September 29, 2004

Human trafficking typically manifests itself in compelled service either for forced labor or in the "sex industry." Sadly, in both areas, sexual abuse of female victims is common.

Sex trafficking is both a crime and phenomenon. The TVPA's "sex trafficking" statute[36] makes it illegal to use force or coercion to obtain persons for commercial sexual activity, with special provisions regarding the involvement of minors. Other activities that the Department considers part of the phenomenon of sex trafficking, such as servitude for non-commercial sexual activity or compelled service in strip clubs or other non-prostitution sectors of the sex industry, are properly prosecuted under traditional slavery statutes or even the forced labor statute, but are no less components of sex trafficking than commercial sexual activity.

The increase in sex trafficking cases filed and prosecuted by the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices over the past five years is staggering. Between fiscal years 2001 and 2005, federal prosecutors filed 68 cases of sex trafficking, a 870% increase over the seven cases the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices filed between fiscal years 1996 and 2000. Also during that same time period, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices charged 187 defendants with sex trafficking, a 450% increase over the 34 defendants` charged between fiscal years 1996 and 2000. In addition to the new records set in investigations and prosecutions of sex trafficking, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices have achieved impressive results in convicting traffickers. From fiscal years 2001 to 2005, federal prosecutors obtained the convictions of 109 sex trafficking defendants, a 445% increase over the 20 defendants convicted during the previous five fiscal year period.

Insert graphic depicting the rate of increase FY '96-'05.

Sex trafficking may occur in any American community–urban, suburban or rural–and involves

[36] 18 U.S.C. § 1591.

DOJ_NMG_0008220

both aliens and United States citizens. Sex trafficking can occur in bars, farm worker camps, and sex entertainment and prostitution enterprises. The traffickers are endlessly inventive. While the public stereotype of these cases involve large scale international organized crime syndicates, forced prostitution cases often involve groups of family members or even individual pimps. In United States v. Jimenez-Calderon, a group of family members recruited women and girls from the Mexican state of Tlaxclala to come to the United States with promises of love, only to hold them in prostitution through force and threats to them and to their families in Mexico.[37] The lead defendant in Jimenez-Calderon received a sentence of 17 years of incarceration following her guilty plea.[38]

Cases involving United States citizen victims that might not have been brought under the Mann Act are now being brought using the TVPA sex trafficking statute, which does not require interstate travel. In United States v. Gates and Heyward, two persons pled guilty in 2004 to sex trafficking for running an internet prostitution business from their home, at times using girls as young as 14 to perform sexual acts. Defendant Gates, who beat the women who disobeyed him and provided drugs to support some of the women's addictions, was sentenced to more than 14 ½ years in prison. His co-defendant girlfriend, Heyward, received a sentence of 9 years of incarceration.[39]

Many cases involving individuals from countries of the former Soviet republic in the past few years have involved compelled service in "exotic dancing." In United States v. Gasanov, a husband and wife were convicted at trial and sentenced to serving five years in prison and paying $516,150 in restitution for bringing Uzbeki women to El Paso, Texas, under the guise of a student researcher exchange program, only to hold them in compelled service in strip clubs by confiscating their immigration documents, known as document servitude, and making threats against their families.[40] In United States v. Maksimenko, five persons have pled guilty as of December 19, 2005, for their roles in a scheme to enslave Ukrainian women in Detroit-area strip clubs through threats and extortion.[41]

Sometimes victims are held in sexual slavery without any commercial aspect. In United States v. Soto, eight men were convicted in 2003 for their roles in an alien smuggling organization that would hold vulnerable alien women as "concubines," forcing them to cook, clean, and submit to the sexual demands of the alien smugglers through force, threats, and punitive rape. The lead defendant in the Soto case was sentenced to 23 years of incarceration following his guilty plea.[42]

In some communities, women are imported to work as "bargirls." While this is not technically sex trafficking under the TVPA, as it does not involve a sex act, the women are treated as sex

---

37 United States v. Jiminez-Calderon, No. 02-00553-3, (D.N.J. 2003).
38 Id.
39 United States v. Gates and Heyward, [insert case information].
40 United States v. Gazanov, [insert case information].
41 United States v. Maksimento, [insert case information].
42 United States v. Soto, [insert case information].

DOJ_NMG_0008221

objects and forced to entertain male bar patrons, dancing and drinking with them at their pleasure. In United States v. Kang, for example, a Korean couple lured Korean women to New York City with promises of good jobs as hostesses in the their nightclub, but subjected them to physical abuse, held them for repayment of a $10,000 debt, and attempted to force them into prostitution.[43] Seven defendants have pled guilty to forced labor and obstruction of justice charges. The defendants include a Federal Air Marshal and a Department of Homeland Security agent, who attempted to force one of the victims to get on a flight to South Korea to keep her from testifying against the Kangs.[44] In another "bargirl" case, United States v. Molina, six Hondurans in Ft. Worth, Texas, received sentences of up to 5 years and 3 months of incarceration following their guilty pleas for harboring the women and making them repay their alien smuggling debts by entertaining the male patrons of the defendants' bars.[45]

B. Labor Trafficking

Labor trafficking occurs when a victim is forced to work in an area of the economy that would otherwise be a legal form of labor, absent the coercion. This phenomenon commonly is found in farms, factories, and households. Similar to sex trafficking, if a person is subjected to coercive force such that he cannot leave his employer's service, he is considered a victim regardless of whether he initially chose to perform that type of work, or even if he receives some pay for his labor. There is no requirement that the victim be transported by the defendant.

The increase in labor trafficking cases brought by the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices over the past five years is also significant. Between fiscal years 2001 and 2005, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices filed 23 labor trafficking cases, an increase of 110% over the 11 labor trafficking cases the federal prosecutors filed between fiscal years 1996 and 2000. In these cases, 61 defendants were charged with labor trafficking, an increase of 33% over the 46 defendants the charged during the previous five fiscal year period.

Insert graphic depicting the rate of increase FY '96-'05.

As in sex trafficking cases, vulnerable United States citizens may find themselves trapped in a forced labor situation, unable to escape because of threats or coercion. For example, in United States v. Michael Lee, the defendants recruited homeless African-American men for their orange-picking operation. Once employed, the workers were involuntarily retained by beatings, threats, and a "company store" debt run up by short-term loans for rent, food, cigarettes, and cocaine. The defendants were convicted in 2001 and received prison terms of up to 4 ½ years of incarceration.[46]

---

43 United States v. Kang,[insert case information].

44 Id.

45 United States v. Molina, [insert case information].

46 United States v. Michael Lee, [insert case information].

DOJ_NMG_0008222

Forced labor situations often appear in parts of the agricultural sector that require "stoop labor." One such case, United States v. Garcia,[47] involved the first successful defense of the TVPA against a constitutional challenge. In that case, four defendants received sentences of up to nearly 4 years of incarceration in 2005 for recruiting young undocumented Mexican aliens from the Arizona border and transporting them to New York with false promises of good wages, only to force them to work in the fields for little or no pay and house them in overcrowded and filthy conditions through threats to turn them over to the Border Patrol.[48] In their constitutional challenge, the defendants argued that the TVPA was unconstitutionally vague, inviting arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement, and that Congress exceeded its authority in enacting it because it did not involve interstate commerce. A federal district court disagreed and found that the TVPA's terms were clear and provide adequate notice of the conduct it prohibits.[49] It also found that Congress had the power to enact the TVPA under the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution.[50]

Insert Image of "Ramos Van Attack"

In another example of forced "stoop labor," three brothers were convicted in 2002 in United States v. Ramos[51] for using threats and debt bondage to hold migrant workers in their employment for the duration of the harvesting season, and for assaulting the owner of a transportation service to cut off any avenue of escape the workers might have had from the area. The Ramos brothers were sentenced to 15 years of incarceration and ordered to forfeit $3 million

---

47 United States v. Garcia, No. 02-110, 2003 WL 22938040 (W.D.N.Y. 2003).

48 Garcia, 2003 WL 22938040.

49 Id. at 2.

50 Id.

51 United States v. Ramos, [insert case information].

DOJ_NMG_0008223

in proceeds from their slavery operation.

Domestic servant cases continue to be a regular part of the Department's forced labor portfolio. Sadly, in many of these cases the young female victims are subjected not only to long hours and low pay for their work as nannies and maids, but suffer sexual abuse at the hands of their captors as well.

For instance, in United States v. Mubang,[52] a Cameroonian woman was convicted of bringing an eleven year-old girl to the United States illegally and under false pretenses. Once the girl was in America, she was forced to care for the defendant's two children and perform all the household chores without pay. The defendant forced the victim to comply by beating her with a broken metal broom stick and a cable cord, forbidding her from speaking of her employment conditions to anyone, forbidding her from leaving the house or opening the door to anyone, and interfering with her mail. Mubang fled the country soon after her conviction but was returned to the United States in 2005 through the assistance of the Cameroonian government. She is currently serving a sentence of 17 ½ years of incarceration.

Similarly, in 2004, in United States v. Trisanti, a Los Angeles woman was convicted of involuntary servitude for trafficking two victims into the United States from Indonesia and forcing them to work as domestic servants through threats and physical violence. Trisanti was sentenced to 46 months in prison and ordered to pay $203,000 in restitution.[53]

C. Child Sex Trafficking

"Our society has no place for those who prey on children and no tolerance for child prostitution or sex trafficking."

–Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, December 16, 2005.

Within the Department, CEOS historically has taken the leading role in overseeing the prosecution of cases of sex trafficking of minors. Sex trafficking in children occurs when persons under the age of 18 are provided or obtained for a commercial sex act. Prior to the passage of the TVPA, this aspect of human trafficking was traditionally dealt with by law enforcement under the label "Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children" (CSEC), and all states have statutes criminalizing child prostitution. It is a continuing challenge to incorporate long-established child protective services, family court, and anti-CSEC activities and programs into the anti-trafficking effort.

Usually, when people commit crimes, the best the criminal justice system can do is punish the offender and occasionally have him repay the out-of-pocket expenses of the victims. This plea not only does that, but attempts to give the victims future opportunities for treatment, counseling, and even an education.

-Tim Burgess, United States Attorney for the District of Alaska, stating the plea agreement in United States v. Boehm on March 19, 2004.

[52] United States v. Mubang, [insert case information].

[53] United States v. Trisanti, [insert case information].

DOJ_NMG_0008224

Like other forms of trafficking, child sex trafficking can occur in any community. The TVPA supplemented the Mann Act, which prohibits the interstate transportation of persons for prostitution, by extending federal jurisdiction to situations in which the pimps did not cross a state line with their minor victims. In recent years, the Department has prosecuted cases of child sex trafficking across the nation. In United States v Boehm,[54] for example, four persons pled guilty to sex trafficking of children, among other charges. In 2001, Boehm, along with his co-defendants, agreed to distribute cocaine and cocaine base to persons under the age of 21 and to recruit minors for sexual purposes in exchange for money and crack cocaine. All five defendants were sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from 3 years to more than 13 years and Boehm, as part of his plea agreement, also forfeited his residence and provided $1.2 million in trust for the future benefit of his victims.[55] The trust fund will compensate Boehm's victims for expenses to drug treatment, counseling and can be used for educational and professional training expenses.

An important vehicle for the Department's efforts to combat child sex trafficking is the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Innocence Lost Initiative. Launched in 2003, the Innocence Lost Initiative is implemented by the Bureau's Violent Crimes and Major Offenders Section, in partnership with CEOS, United States Attorneys' Offices, and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (NCMEC) to address the problem of domestic child prostitution in the United States. The Department's Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention has supported NCMEC's training activities in connection with this Initiative with an approximate total of $126,000 since 2004. The Violent Crimes and Major Offenders Section first identified 14 Bureau Field Offices located in areas where there is a high incidence of prostituted children. The Section then asked each of these offices to establish a task force to address the problem through a variety of federal criminal statutes including the Mann Act, TVPA, and RICO,[56] where appropriate, to neutralize the entire criminal enterprise. The Section asked the remaining 42 Bureau Field Offices to assess whether the localities they serve have a substantial child prostitution problem.

Insert map of Initiative Lost Task Force locations

As of September 30, 2005, Innocence Lost Initiative Task Forces have been instituted in Atlantic City, New Jersey; Boston, Massachusetts; Chicago, Illinois; Detroit, Michigan; Harrisburg, Pennsylvania; Houston, Texas; Indianapolis, Indiana; Los Angeles, California; Miami, Florida; Tampa, Florida; Toledo, Ohio; Portland, Oregon; San Francisco, California; and Washington, D.C. In connection with this initiative, federal law enforcement agencies, prosecutors, and social service providers from were brought to NCMEC's Washington, D.C.-area offices, where the

---

54 United States v. Boehm, [insert case information].

55 Id.

56 RICO, 18 U.S.C. § 1961, et seq.

DOJ_NMG_0008225

groups from the same jurisdiction were trained together in order to cultivate cooperation, partnership, and an effective integration among the critical enforcement entities in each city. To date, more than 350 key personnel have been trained. As a result of the Department's substantial investigatory efforts through this Initiative, CEOS has seen a marked increase in the number of requests from both Assistant United States Attorneys and Bureau agents in the field for advice, guidance, and co-counsel on child prostitution cases.

More importantly, on December 16, 2005, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales announced that more than 30 child victims were recently identified in connection with the latest phase of Innocence Lost, bringing the total of child victims identified to more than 200 since the Innocence Lost Initiative began. This latest effort resulted in the arrest of 19 individuals. Between 2004 and 2005, the Innocence Lost Initiative has resulted in 139 open investigations, 505 arrests, 60 complaints, 70 indictments, and 67 convictions.

Child sex trafficking may also involve child sex tourism, which occurs when individuals travel to foreign countries to engage in sexual acts with children, who are often the victims of trafficking. As with non-coerced child prostitution, CEOS has taken the leading role in overseeing the development of anti-sex tourism policies and resulting prosecutions. United States Attorneys' Offices nationwide, with guidance or co-counsel assistance from CEOS, have obtained at least 50 sex tourism indictments or complaints and a minimum of 29 convictions between 2003 and 2005 under the PROTECT Act, with approximately 60 investigations currently pending.

In 2003, in the first prosecution under the PROTECT Act, Michael Clark, who had been arrested in Cambodia for sexually abusing two Cambodian boys (ages 10 and 13), was charged with attempting to engage in illicit sexual conduct after travel in foreign commerce. Clark pled guilty to the charges and was sentenced to 8 years of imprisonment. In connection with his plea, Clark reserved the right to appeal the constitutionality of the PROTECT Act, arguing that Congress exceeded its power to enact criminal laws that do not involve interstate commerce and that criminalizing activities in a foreign country violate his right to due process and international law. Clarks' appeal is currently pending before the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals.[57]

Also in 2003, in United States v. Russell,[58] an American man was prosecuted when an investigation revealed that he had traveled to the Philippines on numerous occasions over a two-year period in order to engage in sexual acts with children and to produce child pornography for the purpose of importation into the United States. At least three Philippine children have been identified as victims of Russell, who pled guilty and was sentenced to more than 3 years of imprisonment.

D. Inter-Agency Coordination

Implementation of the President's directive to combat human trafficking requires meaningful

---

[57] United States v. Clark, 315 F. Supp. 2d 1127 (W.D. Wash. 2004).

[58] United States v. Russell, [insert case information].

DOJ_NMG_0008226

inter-agency coordination. Much of the coordination has been accomplished through the President's Inter-Agency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, and subsequently the Senior Policy Operating Group, discussed above. In connection with these efforts, the Department has engaged with other federal agencies to create additional vehicles of inter-agency coordination.

The most significant achievement in this regard is the Department's support of the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center, administered by the Department of Homeland Security and led by a steering committee comprised of representatives from the Department, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Department of Homeland Security. The Center provides a mechanism to bring together federal agency representatives from policy, law enforcement, intelligence, and diplomatic areas to work together on a full-time basis to achieve increased effectiveness among federal law enforcement and to convert intelligence about human trafficking, alien smuggling, and clandestine terrorist travel into effective law enforcement activities. Analysts accomplish this function by identifying issues related to migrant smuggling or trafficking in persons and then forward their findings to the relevant federal agencies or interagency organizations for consideration and appropriate action. The Center has been under development since mid-2004 and shortly thereafter started initial operations. It is poised to become fully functional in the very near future.

In addition, the Department in July 2004 entered into a Memorandum of Understanding with the Department of Homeland Security and the Department of Health and Human Services streamlining protocols for the Health and Human Services ("HHS") certification of victims (or in the case of minors, eligibility letters) rescued in connection with Department of Justice or Homeland Security law enforcement efforts. A determination by HHS that victims have suffered a "severe form of trafficking" enables these individuals to qualify for federally funded or administered benefits and services to the same extent as refugees.[59] The agreement also marked an important step towards the coordination of treatment of potential trafficking victims by agents of the Departments of Homeland Security and Justice through better information sharing. It is important to note that at least 30% of the investigations filed by the Department since 2001 were initiated by agents of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

E. Coordination Within the Department of Justice

The Department's anti-trafficking investigative and prosecution strategy requires effective intra-agency collaboration to bring the specialties of each component to bear on these multi-faceted, complex, and labor-intensive criminal cases. The following components are important contributors to the Department's activities in support of the President's directive to combat human trafficking:

- The Civil Rights Division, particularly its Criminal Section
- The Criminal Division, particularly its Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section,

---

[59] TVPA, 22 U.S.C. §§ 7105(b)(1)(A), (B), and (E).

DOJ_NMG_0008227

Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, Domestic Security Section, International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program, Office of International Affairs, Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training, and Organized Crime and Racketeering Section

- The Executive Office of United States Attorneys and United States Attorneys' Offices nationwide
- The Federal Bureau of Investigation, and its Field Offices
- The Office of Community Oriented Policing Services
- The Office of Justice Programs, particularly its Bureau of Justice Assistance, Bureau of Justice Statistics, National Institute of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, and Office for Victims of Crime
- The Office of Legal Policy
- The Office of Legislative Affairs
- The Office on Violence Against Women

Representatives from the Civil Rights Division, the Criminal Division, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation meet periodically to share information and to identify ways to leverage resources to identify and combat trafficking in persons, among other criminal activity. In addition, the Office of Legal Policy convenes regular meetings of Department of Justice components to coordinate the development of policies regarding the Department's anti-human trafficking activities. The Criminal Section of the Civil Rights Division, in early 2003, authored a comprehensive legal monograph on trafficking issues to assist United States Attorney personnel in the field to prosecute trafficking cases more effectively. The monograph has been distributed at the Department's training center, the National Advocacy Center, at human trafficking training workshops.

Both the Civil Rights Division and CEOS publish newsletters that provide valuable information regarding human trafficking prosecutions, case analysis, and developments that are important to the work of other Departmental components and the non-governmental organizations that advocate on behalf of trafficking victims. The Civil Rights Division provides investigators, prosecutors, and victim assistance professionals with technical assistance regarding human trafficking and keeps the field of trafficking victim advocates informed about the Division's efforts to prevent and prosecute this crime. And, since 2003, the quarterly CEOS newsletter has discussed issues of sex tourism and trafficking in all but two editions.

From the time that the TVPA was enacted, the Department recognized that alien smuggling, document fraud, and various forms of human trafficking, while constituting separate offenses, can be integrally related, as discussed above.[60] The trafficking of victims across international borders virtually always involves alien smuggling, also possibly including some type of fraud or misrepresentation. Perhaps the most direct manifestation of cooperation between the Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions is that in 2002 the Civil Rights Division detailed several experienced attorneys to the Criminal Division's Alien Smuggling Task Force for a three-year period. Over the past three years, Civil Rights prosecutors have targeted the criminal infrastructure that makes international trafficking possible. Examples include successful prosecutions involving the fraudulent adoption of Cambodian babies, the sexual exploitation of Estonian women employed in massage parlors, and large-scale fraudulent leasing of foreign workers to major U.S. companies. The three-year details, which recently ended, demonstrate the concrete, effective results that can be obtained through innovative approaches to anti-trafficking cooperation.

---

[60] See, Part I "An Introduction to Human Trafficking."

DOJ_NMG_0008228

The Department has taken a number of steps to ensure that its components are well trained in the Department's strategy of victim-centered, proactive investigations:

- In October 2002, the Civil Rights Division organized comprehensive anti-trafficking training for federal prosecutors and agents at the Department's training facility, the National Advocacy Center, in Columbia, South Carolina. Approximately 150 federal prosecutors and agents attended the training.

- In November 2002 the Attorney General issued "blue sheets" for prosecutors, outlining the new TVPA crimes and adding guidance regarding the prosecution of such crimes to the U.S. Attorneys' Manual. The "blue sheets" highlight human trafficking as a priority and provide a comprehensive source of information and resources within the Department and with related agencies.

- In fiscal year 2003, the Civil Rights Division provided periodic training at the Federal Bureau of Investigation training center in Quantico, Virginia for Bureau and Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents.

- In January 2004, the Civil Rights Division and the Executive Office of United States Attorneys' Office of Legal Education hosted a comprehensive training session for federal agents and prosecutors at the Department's National Advocacy Center. Furthermore, the Civil Rights Division actively participates in human trafficking training sessions at United States Attorneys' Offices as part of the regular curriculum offered to Federal Bureau of Investigation, Department of Homeland Security Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and Department of State Diplomatic Security Service agents.

DOJ_NMG_0008229

VI. The Department's Collateral Attack on Human Traffickers

A. Multi-Disciplinary Task Force Initiative

The Department has designed, developed, and instituted locally based, multi-disciplinary task forces to investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases. These task forces embody the Department's victim-centered approach because they are specifically engineered to aid in uncovering victims, providing them with immediate protection and support, and then working with them to further investigate and prosecute the trafficker.

In July 2004, the Department hosted the first ever National Training Conference on Human Trafficking: Rescuing Women and Children From Slavery, in Tampa, Florida. The National Conference was designed to introduce the model of victim-centered investigations and the concept of human trafficking prosecutions through the creation of local task forces. Hosted by the Department and with a keynote speech by President Bush, the conference brought together more than 500 attendees, consisting of 21 teams of about 20 state, local, and federal officials who were willing to thereafter work together to combat human trafficking in their respective communities across America. Teams included the following members: United States Attorneys or designated Assistant United States Attorneys; Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement Special Agents-In-Charge; Federal Bureau of Investigation Special Agents-In-Charge; local law enforcement agency special crimes and victim units; state and local prosecutors; and governmental and non-governmental organizations, especially faith and community-based victim service providers. The Department invited teams from the following jurisdictions that the Civil Rights Division identified as the most intense trafficking jurisdictions in the country at that time: Atlanta, Charlotte, Chicago, El Paso, Houston, Las Vegas, Long Island, Los Angeles, Miami, Newark, New Orleans, New York City, Washington, D.C., Philadelphia, Phoenix, Richmond, San Diego, San Francisco, St. Louis, Seattle, and Tampa.

President Bush, along with then-Attorney General John Ashcroft, announced this important new initiative on July 16, 2004 at the Department's National Conference on Human Trafficking, where the President condemned human trafficking as an affront to America's fundamental values and committed his Administration to combating trafficking on every level at home and abroad. Regarding domestic efforts to combat trafficking, the President remarked, "We're supporting organizations that rescue the victims, passing stronger anti-trafficking laws, and warning travelers that they will be held to account for supporting this modern form of slavery. Women and children should never be exploited for pleasure or greed, anywhere on Earth."

Then-Attorney General John Ashcroft set forth the Department's comprehensive anti-trafficking strategy: protecting the victims, prosecuting the perpetrators, and partnership-building that addresses, attacks, and prevents human trafficking. The Attorney General also noted that the Bush Administration had, up to that time, provided more than $35 million in funding to community-based service providers that aid trafficking victims, and he announced a further $14 million in support of the Department's task force initiative. Concurrently with the National Conference, the Department issued a funding solicitation, entitled Law Enforcement and Service Provider Multi-disciplinary Anti-Trafficking Task Forces. The solicitation urged applicants to leverage existing federally-funded victim services efforts and to mirror the victim-focused federal, state, and non-governmental partnership that was the theme of the Conference. In the fall of 2004, the Bureau of Justice Assistance and the Office for Victims of Crime issued a joint solicitation for concept papers to continue the coordinated law enforcement task forces and victim services initiatives. Federal funds made available through this solicitation were intended to support task forces or supplemental funding of current trafficking victim service providers in areas with pre-existing Bureau of Justice Assistance-funded task forces.

DOJ_NMG_0008230

"The conference program provided a model of collaboration among service providers and law enforcement and underscored the necessity of teamwork in working to keep victims of trafficking front and center in both the prosecution and service delivery areas-it was a great kick off for the task force initiative."

-Florrie Burke, Senior Director of International Programs, Anti-Trafficking Program, SOLACE Program for Survivors of Torture

Task forces add to the Department's law enforcement resources the intelligence and expertise of locally-based immigration agents, local community- and faith-based social service providers, and local law enforcement, particularly special crimes and vice squads. These task forces recognize that local authorities, often more than federal officials, may be in the best position to find trafficking victims because of their familiarity with their jurisdictions, but might need the training and support of the federal government to recognize this crime for what it is. The Department has too often seen in federal investigations police reports indicating that local officers responded to complaints but failed to stop the ongoing exploitation of trafficking victims simply because they were not trained to recognize trafficking situations. The task force approach leverages local knowledge and staff resources with strong federal statutes. Indeed, victims rescued in United States v. Reddy,[61] United States v. Molina,[62] and United States v. Ramos[63] were brought to the Department's attention through the activities of state and local law enforcement. Moreover, they

---

[61] See, Part I "An Introduction to Human Trafficking" above for a discussion about United States v. Reddy.

[62] See, Part V "Halting Human Trafficking with a Record Number of Aggressive Investigations and Prosecutions," section B "Labor Trafficking" above for a discussion about United State v. Molina.

[63] See, Part V "Halting Human Trafficking with a Record Number of Aggressive Investigations and Prosecutions," section B "Labor Trafficking" above for a discussion about United State v. Ramos.

DOJ_NMG_0008231

serve as a way to incorporate the non-governmental crime victim services organizations, funded by federal grant awards, into the law enforcement activities in their area. Local community- and faith-based organizations are essential to reaching those victims in communities that are isolated by geography, culture, or language.

The task force convened by the United States Attorney's Office for the Northern District of Texas presents an illustration. In 2004, the United States Attorney for the Northern District of Texas established a working group consisting of representatives from the police departments of the Dallas-Fort Worth area, including Arlington, Coppell, Garland, Grant, Prarie, Irving, and Richardson, and representatives from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Internal Revenue Service, and Department of Labor. The group's faith and community-based partners include several charitable organizations such as Catholic Charities and Mosaic Family Services, Inc., which received a grant from the Department of provide victim services and to assist with the formation and implementation of this program.

Just prior to the conference, the Department had begun work on eight task forces. Immediately following the National Conference, the Department embarked on a 20-city training initiative designed to reinforce the training received at the National Conference and to institute nearly two dozen task forces. Within a year of the National Conference, 18 task forces were operating with Departmental support. There are now 32 task forces.

Insert graphic of the United States depicting the location of the 32 jurisdictions with task forces.

Each of the 32 task forces, funded in part through $13 million in grants from the Department's Bureau of Justice Assistance and the Office for Victims of Crime since fiscal year 2004, is coordinated through the local United States Attorney's Office and includes representatives of local FBI field offices and Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement as well state and local law enforcement and social services agencies. In order to receive Department of Justice funding support and the assistance of the local United States Attorney, local law enforcement agencies and victim service providers are required to enter into a Memorandum of Understanding with all task force members committing themselves to collaborating together on investigations and assistance to victims. Applicants were invited to design task forces that best suited the needs of their local communities, and many task forces involve faith-based and other community organizations in their work. At their core, task forces include the local United States Attorney's Office; Federal Bureau of Investigation Field Offices; Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents; state and local law enforcement agencies; and social services agencies, including community-based victim services providers. As of June 2005, with reporting based only on the first six months of operation by the 18 task forces that existed at that time, 61 victims of severe trafficking had been identified and many more victims were rescued from environments where trafficking was occurring.

DOJ_NMG_0008232

The Houston (Harris County, Texas) trafficking task force provides a meaningful illustration of the work and potential of the Department's multi-disciplinary task forces. In 2004, concerned that trafficking might fall into the cracks between civil rights and organized crime enforcement programs, the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas formed the Human Trafficking Rescue Alliance with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Harris County Sheriff's Department, and a number of non-governmental organizations who had recently come together on the issue. The Rescue Alliance began with listening sessions of the stakeholders and moved to joint training for law enforcement and other community groups. Rescue Alliance members attended the Department's National Training Conference on Human Trafficking in Florida in July 2004, and pledged themselves to work together to combat trafficking. When the Bureau of Justice Assistance called for grant proposals, the working group was ready with a task force proposal that built upon and solidified their relationships. As the profile of this issue has grown, so has the demand for training on the part of state and local law enforcement, and the most recent training opportunity sponsored by this task force in November 2005 drew more than 300 participants. The United States Attorney's Office worked closely with the Civil Rights Division on training and task force development. As a result, they were able to transition seamlessly into jointly prosecuting cases when they arose. The regular meetings of the Rescue Alliance have solidified the relationship of the law enforcement participants with the Office for Victims of Crime and Health and Human Services victim-services grantees such as the YMCA of Houston and Catholic Charities.

Insert image of Houston Chronicle Article,
8/14/04 regarding creation of task force

One
n e n o
v
e l a s p
e
c t
of the Rescue Alliance has been to place Harris County Sheriff's Deputies with vice-squad experience in Federal Bureau of Investigation and Immigration and Customs Enforcement Field Offices on the squads tasked with trafficking investigations. Especially in the Federal Bureau of Investigation office, having a full-time investigator with extensive knowledge of the local landscape was invaluable, and his activities served as a catalyst for the other agents on the task force to work pro-actively to identify and dismantle trafficking rings. The inclusion of agents from the Texas Alcohol and Beverage Commission has proven instrumental in the success of the Rescue Alliance.

As a result of operations by the Rescue Alliance, two large-scale trafficking operations resulted in federal human trafficking indictments in the Houston area in the fall of 2005 -- one involving allegations of Mexican women and girls forced into prostitution and another involving allegations that dozens of Central American women and girls were held in peonage in a "bargirl" operation. These prosecutions, which are pending at the time of this report,[64] could not have happened without the interagency approach and close cooperation with non-governmental service providers and advocacy groups that was fostered and intensified through the Bureau of Justice Assistance grant. The Rescue Alliance is an example of an energized and successful task force effort that successfully blends state, local, and federal personnel, across traditional organized crime and civil rights approaches, to work with the non-governmental community to act in the best interests of the victim while seeking justice.

DOJ_NMG_0008233

The Bureau of Justice Assistance, in collaboration with other federal partners, provides ongoing training and technical assistance to task forces. In 2005, the Bureau of Justice Assistance, in collaboration with the Civil Rights Division, the Office for Victims of Crime, and other experts, developed a specific training curriculum for law enforcement officers nationwide who may come into contact with trafficking victims, entitled Human Trafficking in the United States, Promoting Law Enforcement Awareness. The curriculum is a flexible, one-day training course educating law enforcement officers about the basics of the phenomenon of human trafficking and a victim-centered approach to proactive investigation of potential cases. The curriculum provides an introduction to human trafficking, its victims, and offenders; a legal overview with a focus on the TVPA; investigative considerations and techniques; an overview of the role of victim service providers; the need for victim services and the types of services available; and immigration matters, including the role of immigration officials and remedies available to victims. The training program also reviews lessons on understanding the need for a formal multi-disciplinary approach towards human trafficking and an understanding of the important role of the community in law enforcement efforts. The training curriculum is unique in that it incorporates multimedia learning and each participant is provided with multimedia resources to be used in training other officers and building greater community awareness and support. The course is taught by seasoned investigators who have handled trafficking cases as well as national experts on trafficking issues.

In February 2005, the Bureau of Justice Assistance convened a conference of the 22 nascent task forces that had been instituted by that time. More than 115 individuals attended. Federal participants in the conference included representatives from within the Department as well the Departments of Homeland Security and Health and Human Services. The focus of the conference was to explain the degree of collaboration needed among federal, state, and local law enforcement, prosecution, and victim services agencies in order to effectively rescue victims and prosecute traffickers. Task force members

> The Human Trafficking Task Forces are just the approach we need to combat human trafficking. With all of us working as a team we will be more effective in this endeavor than we would be if we tried to combat human trafficking individually.
>
> – Lt. Bill Rule, Collier County Sheriff's Office, Victim Services Bureau

[64] An indictment contains only charges and is not evidence of guilt. The defendants in these and any other cases cited in this report in which convictions have not been obtained are presumed innocent and are entitled to a fair trial at which the government has the burden of proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

DOJ_NMG_0008234

were trained using the Human Trafficking in the United States, Promoting Law Enforcement Awareness curriculum, described above. Future cross-training of task force members will enable the Department to build on that effort by sharing best practices and linking the groups' efforts across geographical lines.

B. Restoring Victims' Dignity

As discussed above[65], the Department places a premium on the recovery of trafficking victims. Federal investigators and prosecutors will therefore immediately refer a victim to victim service professionals for immediate care. In many cases, the referral process and the provision of services is expedited through relationships already established by task force partners. Some task forces have created innovative ways to connect victims identified through law enforcement activity with services. The United States Attorney's Office for the Middle District of Florida, for example, developed a compendium of victim service providers for use by task force members in Fort Myers, Jacksonville, and Tampa. The task force in Indianapolis, Indiana, coordinated through the United States Attorney's Office for the District of Indiana, has as partner the Indianapolis Family Justice Center. The Family Justice Center, created in connection with President Bush's Family Justice Initiative, a program that is administered by the Office on Violence Against Women, co-locates services to families involved in domestic violence. Making this Center the coordinator of services to victims of human trafficking makes the response to victims more efficient and effective.

Once potential cases of trafficking are uncovered, victims may become eligible for important services that help to keep them safe as they recover from their victimization. Trafficking victims, like all crime victims, may be eligible for services and benefits under the Victims of Crime Act, a program administered by the Office for Victims of Crime.[66] The TVPA, as amended, created new protections for alien victims.[67] Under the TVPA, victims are afforded:

---

[65] See, Part III "The Department Responds to this Crime with a Victim-Centered Approach."

[66] The Crime Victims Fund, established by the Victims of Crime Act of 1984 (VOCA), is a major source of funding for victim services throughout the nation. The Office for Victims of Crime administers the Fund and distributes funding to the states on a formula basis to support crime victim assistance and crime victim compensation programs. Victim assistance includes lifeline victim services such as crisis intervention, emergency shelter and transportation, counseling, and criminal justice system advocacy. Crime victim compensation is a direct reimbursement to or on behalf of a crime victim for expenses such as medical costs. Trafficking victims may be eligible for support under the Crime Victims Fund, the TVPA, or both of these programs, depending on the circumstances of their cases and, in the case of the Crime Victims Fund, the specific guidelines of the state agency that administers the program.

[67] TVPA, Pub. L. No. 106-386 § 107(b)(1) (codified at 22 U.S.C. § 7105(b)(1)).

DOJ_NMG_0008235

- Immigration relief, in the form of an administrative change in immigration status known as "continued presence" as well as a temporary, non-immigrant visa known as the "T visa;"
- Access to refugee benefits;
- Adequate shelter, care, and protection;
- Legal assistance;
- Information & translation services; and
- Mandatory restitution.[68]

The TVPA authorizes similar victim services programs to be administered by the Department of Health and Human Services, thus requiring a significant amount of coordination between the Office for Victims of Crime and the Department of Health and Human Services. In 2004, the Office for Victims of Crime initiated regular coordination meetings with the Office of Refugee Resettlement, its counterpart agency at HHS, known as the Human Trafficking Victim Services Coordination Working Group. This coordination is specifically intended to avoid any duplication in services to trafficking victims as both HHS and the Office for Victims crime may fund grantees that provide services to pre-certified victims. Consequently, grantees funded by the Office for Victims of Crime under the TVPA only provide services to victims of trafficking before they are certified as victims of a "severe form of trafficking" by the Department of Health and Human Services.

Insert quote from a victim impact statement

Since fiscal year 2003, the Office for Victims of Crime has funded 20 victim service providers to assist pre-certified victims of trafficking in the United States, one grant to the Headquarters of the Salvation Army to work with their territorial divisions to provide shelter to trafficking victims, and one grant to an organization provide technical assistance. Since January 2003, Office for Victims of Crime-funded grantees have served 741 pre-certified trafficking victims. The Department, in cooperation with other law enforcement agencies, have assisted 687 victims to obtain continued presence immigration status, allowing them to remain in the country and to receive benefits and services.

The period between being rescued and receiving certification is the time when victims are most vulnerable and typically have a host of needs that includes housing, clothing, and food; medical, dental, and psychological care; legal assistance and immigration advocacy; and interpretation services. However, few organizations or communities have the resources to provide or fund these services. The Office for Victims of Crime grant program helps communities fill this critical service gap and, in the process, supports victims' abilities to cooperate with law enforcement. Immigrant victims are offered culturally and linguistically appropriate services and may, if needed, petition for T visas that would allow them to remain in the United States legally. Some organizations are specifically prepared to provide immediate, critical assistance in crisis situations until the services of a local victim service provider can be put in place.

---

[68] Id.

DOJ_NMG_0008236

The Office for Victims of Crime supports the work of the victim service providers it funds with technical assistance that is made available through workshops, on-site consultation, and via the internet. Training and technical assistance includes mentoring guides and safety protocols for both providers and clients. Grantees also provide training to local police and non-governmental organizations. Since fiscal year 2003, approximately 38,635 persons have been trained through the efforts of Office for Victims of Crime grantees. Training topics have included the dynamics of trafficking, the legal definition of trafficking under the TVPA, legal rights and services for trafficking victims, and cultural considerations in serving these victims. More important, the Office for Victims of Crime and the National Institute of Justice are studying effective approaches to victim service delivery and plan to publish an evaluation of field-tested services in 2006.

In addition to the work of the Office for Victims of Crime, the Office on Violence Against Women has, since 2001, funded more than $700,000 for technical assistance projects that assist Office on Violence Against Women grantees in providing services to trafficking victims. For example, Legal Momentum's Immigrant Women Program provides technical assistance to Office on Violence Against Women grantees to foster their ability to serve immigrant victims of domestic violence, sexual assault, and stalking. Because trafficking victims may seek services from Office on Violence Against Women grantees if they have also been a victim of domestic violence, sexual assault, or stalking, the Immigrant Women Program training workshops educate grantees about the availability of T- and U-visas, identifying whether a victim has been trafficked, barriers faced by trafficking victims who seek services, and conducting outreach to potential victims of trafficking. In addition, Legal Momentum has developed a nationwide directory of experts working with immigrant victims of domestic violence, sexual assault and stalking, which may be of use to trafficking victims who are also victims of these crimes. Nearly 950 attorneys and advocates have attended these workshops and another 150 will be trained within the next year. Another example is the Family Violence Prevention Fund, which used Office on Violence Against Women funding in 2003 to establish a project aimed at improving collaborative responses to trafficked victims of domestic violence and sexual assault. The main goal of the project was to build multi-disciplinary collaborations between service providers and law enforcement to effectively and appropriately assist trafficking victims in Georgia and Washington. Plans are underway to expand the project into Alaska.

C. Public Awareness Supports Pro-Active Investigations

Public awareness is essential to proactive investigations that uncover victims. In fact, the prosecutions in United States v. Kil Soo Lee[69], which resulted in the single largest rescue of [69] In this case, the Korean owner of a sweatshop in American Samoa held 200 Vietnamese and Chinese factory workers, who were brought to American Samoa to work as sewing machine operators in the Daewoosa Samoa garment factory in involuntary servitude. The workers were deprived of food, beaten, and physically restrained in order to force them to work for up to two years. Lee was convicted in 2001, and in June 2005 he was sentenced to 40 years in prison.

---

DOJ_NMG_0008237

trafficking victims in the Department's history, and United States v. Soto[70] were brought to the attention of federal law enforcement through referrals by non-governmental organizations that work with populations at risk for trafficking. The Department works to motivate communities, especially anti-human trafficking task forces, to increase awareness among law enforcement, various government inspectors (especially health code, wage and hour, and occupational safety and health agents), hospitals and other medical providers, social services agencies, and community- and faith-based organizations.

Increased outreach and public awareness is critical to the investigation and prosecution of human trafficking cases. Since 2003, the Department has made available a brochure describing its processes and resources to assist non-governmental organizations in dealing with trafficking victims and the Department in a more efficient way. Through outreach, America's communities – particularly immigrant communities – are better educated about this crime and how to report possible cases. Moreover, increased public awareness about this crime and the benefits available to its victims can eliminate important aspects of the leverage that traffickers hold over their victims.

As a result, all components speak publicly about trafficking and the Department's activities to combat this crime to state, local, and foreign legislators, law enforcement officers, prosecutors, and non-governmental victim advocacy and services organizations. The Civil Rights Division, for example, has delivered more than 200 presentations around the nation since fiscal year 2001. Office for Victims of Crime grants to 21 human trafficking victim service providers under the TVPA include funding to increase public awareness in the communities they serve. Civil Rights Division representatives continuously emphasize the important role that faith and community-based organizations can play. Because of their proximity to the communities they serve, they can provide immense intelligence about potential criminal enterprises and trafficking victims, provide immediate, crisis care, and long term programs that help to prevent further victimization. The Federal Bureau of Investigation Civil Rights Unit has appeared on national television and local radio programs which highlight, define, and expose trafficking to the general public, including CNBC, Donny Deutche's The Big Idea, and WMAL AM 630's "Danger Zone" with Richard Carlson, a Washington, D.C.-area radio program. The Civil Rights Unit has also provided human trafficking-related training presentations at various non-governmental conferences, such as the International Association of Labor Standards Annual Conference in

> "We must make it as easy as possible for these victims to know that aid and comfort have arrived. The Catholic Coalition to Combat Trafficking...also conducts public outreach and advocates on behalf of victims.... I will also ask our pastors to communicate the goals of this campaign to every active religious and layperson.... There should be no zones where this mission of love and redemption does not reach."
>
> -Archbishop John J. Myers, Archdiocese of Newark, at the National Training Conference on Human Trafficking, July 16, 2004.

---

[70] See, Part V "Halting Human Trafficking with a Record Number of Aggressive Investigations and Prosecutions," section B "Labor Trafficking" above for a discussion about United States v. Soto.

DOJ_NMG_0008238

Memphis, Tennessee, and the National Organization of Women's Annual Conference in Los Angeles, California.

United States Attorneys' Offices are also involved in providing outreach and education about human trafficking within their districts. The United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of California, for example, has hosted five conferences on human trafficking since October 2001. Each of these conferences have provided training about applicable statutes and resources available for victims, including contact information for potential victims, to local law enforcement and non-governmental organizations serving trafficking victims. These conferences have resulted in long-standing relationships between federal prosecutors and law enforcement, state and local police, and numerous local service-providers, such as the Bilateral Safety Corridor Coalition. Another example is the efforts of the United States Attorney's Office for the District of Connecticut, which convened a meeting in May 2004 of federal and state agencies to determine why human trafficking cases has not been prosecuted in this jurisdiction. By September 2004, this office convened a training conference intended to educate federal, state, and local law enforcement and victim service providers about human trafficking and how to identify resources, including federal grant opportunities. The result of these efforts has been the creation of an anti-human trafficking task force that includes the Connecticut State Police, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Social Security Administration, State Department's Diplomatic Security Service, and United States Coast Guard as well as non-governmental organizations serving trafficking victims.

CEOS participated in a joint project to develop a brochure and posters designed to curb child sex tourism. Its partners include the Department of Homeland Security's Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement; the Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons; and a number of non-governmental organizations, such as the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and the Sexual Exploitation of Children, World Vision, and Rape, Abuse, & Incest National Network. The proposed brochure and poster are intended to be widely distributed both within the United States as well as abroad in an effort to combat the problem. The section is also actively engaged in promoting the Department's strategy of multi-disciplinary cooperation that emphasizes the victim-centered approach to combating domestic child prostitution with non-governmental organizations such as the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The victims of sex trade see little of life before they see the very worst of life -- an underground of brutality and lonely fear. Those who create these victims and profit from their suffering must be severely punished. Those who patronize this industry debase themselves and deepen the misery of others. And governments that tolerate this trade are tolerating a form of slavery.

–President George W. Bush, speaking to the United Nation's General Assembly, September 23, 2003

D. Promoting Foreign Criminalization and Prosecution of Human Trafficking

As discussed above,[71] the President has directed federal agencies to use all diplomatic and foreign assistance tools in the nation's effort to abolish human trafficking. The Department has had an important role in advancing this directive. The Department's primary goal in this regard is to promote the efforts of foreign governments to criminalize human trafficking and to enhance their capacity to investigate and prosecute these crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0008239

In September 2003, in an address to the United Nations General Assembly, President Bush announced a $50 million international initiative to combat human trafficking. This initiative will increase the capacity of several source and destination countries to combat trafficking. Specifically, the President's initiative aims to replicate our victim-centered prosecutions through multi-disciplinary task forces and increased outreach in Cambodia, India, Indonesia, Mexico, Moldova, and Tanzania.

The Department has been actively involved in the design, development, and implementation of this initiative. Working primarily through the Civil Rights Division, the Department coordinated with the Departments of Health and Human Services, Labor, and State, as well as the United States Agency for International Development, to develop the capacity of foreign governments to investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases, and to develop partnerships with non-governmental organizations to prevent the vulnerable from becoming victims through outreach and education as well as to protect and rehabilitate victims. The inter-agency working group found the lessons learned by the Civil Rights Division in its prosecution of trafficking cases and its organization of trafficking task forces a valuable model for the implementation of the President's international initiative. The objective of the initiative thus became the institution of multi-disciplinary efforts to combat human trafficking in particular geographic regions. In practice, this would mean that programs to promote awareness raising, victim shelters, and police and prosecutor training would be established and supported in a collaborative effort by each of the participating federal agencies. The Department designs country assessments to help the United States Government better understand the nature of the trafficking problem in a particular area and to inventory what efforts were currently underway.

Foreign Country
Human Trafficking Assessments By the Department of Justice

- What is the current statutory framework;
- What is the capacity of police to investigate trafficking offenses;
- What is the level of prosecutorial skill and interest in trafficking victims;
- What is the current state of services for victim shelter and restoration by both governmental and non-governmental organizations;
- What is the current level of cooperation between prospective anti trafficking team members, and;
- What is the level of political will and interest among those government officials who would be the implementers of the plan.

The first task is to gain a foundational understanding of human trafficking within the host country by answering such questions as: Who are the victims and where do they come from? What kind of coercion is used to control the victims? What are the historical and cultural factors that

---

[71] See, Part II "An Administration Priority."

DOJ_NMG_0008240

The first task is to gain a foundational understanding of human trafficking within the host country by answering such questions as: Who are the victims and where do they come from? What kind of coercion is used to control the victims? What are the historical and cultural factors that influence trafficking or the response to it? Is there trafficking of minors into sexual exploitation? what industries tend to have labor trafficking? Next, the Department's trafficking experts design a matrix of the necessary tools that would be required to rescue particular victims, place them into restorative care, and hold perpetrators accountable.

Once the assessment is completed, the United States Government, through the local United States Embassy, and the host government enter into a Letter of Agreement (LOA) that states the roles and responsibilities of both parties and the level of funding to be provided in connection with the President's initiative. Department team members then coordinate with the other federal agencies to deploy training and other capacity building and to assign to the host country personnel from the United States Government to provide expertise and mentoring to those working on the anti-trafficking project. A primary goal of every LOA entered into in connection with the President's initiative is the Department's imperative to rescue victims and hold perpetrators accountable. The President's initiative was designed to place a clear emphasis on results that change lives for victims and their families.

The United States Government's work with the Mexican Government in connection with this initiative presents a useful illustration of the Department's work. Since 2003, the Department's Civil Rights Division, along with Criminal Division's International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program, has been actively conducting country planning sessions in both Mexico and Indonesia, and has detailed a Civil Rights Division attorney to the United States Embassy in Moldova, in connection with the President's international human trafficking initiative. In Mexico, a significant number of senior United States law enforcement specialists met repeatedly over the past year with their counterparts from the Mexican Government before a final Letter of Agreement was signed in mid 2005. As a result, both partners have a clear understanding of how the President's program will be implemented. One significant factor in the United States-Mexico anti-trafficking partnership is the agreement to work together on cases that involve criminal trafficking enterprises that are active on both sides for the border.

The Department's experts have also assisted their counterparts in other countries with assistance in developing a victim-centered response to human trafficking through meetings and training workshops. For example, many foreign governments host their own training in partnership with the United States Embassy. Lasting a week to two weeks, the Department's attorneys and investigators teach critical skills such as evidence gathering, pro-active investigations, and victim interviews. Workshops provide an opportunity to practice skills and learn new law enforcement methods that reflect the lessons Department has learned in investigating and prosecuting these cases. The Department's consistent theme in each of these events is to present the crime of human trafficking as a multi-disciplinary challenge requiring collaboration among governmental and non-governmental agencies. The Department has learned that a critical need in many developing countries is the ability to develop a framework for governmental and non-governmental organizations to collaborate, particularly as it concerns the protection of victims and programs to prevent further victimization.

DOJ_NMG_0008241

Department experts also participate in regional, multilateral consultations between law enforcement executives that promote international cooperation between the country of victim origin and the destination country, such as the Southeast European Cooperative Initiative. Attendees at workshops conducted by the Department are often law enforcement executives who can and do take information and put it into practice. In one recent example, Department lawyers relied upon contacts made through these training sessions, to assist a country in arresting recruiters who held the children of trafficking victims as hostages to prevent the victims from providing evidence to assist in a United States prosecution.

Since fiscal year 2003, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has participated in the Southeast European Cooperative Initiative as the lead observer on human trafficking and has detailed agents to Albania, Bulgaria, and Romania to work on trafficking issues. The Regional Center for Combating Trans-Border Crime in Bucharest, Romania, coordinates southeastern European police and customs regional actions for preventing and combating trans-border crime, including trafficking in persons and migrant smuggling. The following twelve countries are actively involved with the Center: Albania, the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Greece, Hungary, Macedonia, Moldova, Romania, Serbia and Montenegro, Slovenia and Turkey.

Another important Departmental component in the international arena is the Office of International Affairs of the Criminal Division, which serves as the link between federal, state, and local anti-trafficking efforts and foreign prosecution and judicial authorities. Good working partnerships with foreign governments have been essential to the Department's efforts to combat human trafficking. The Office of International Affairs' most significant contribution to United States Government anti-trafficking efforts has been to assist in gathering evidence from abroad and to assist foreign prosecutors in gathering evidence located in our country. For example, in United States v. Carreto,[72] Mexican nationals were accused of recruiting uneducated women and girls from impoverished areas of Mexico and compelling them to prostitute themselves in both Mexico and New York. Carreto's victims were forced to service up to 20 men a day as prostitutes and were beaten if they did not make enough money during a single day or if they attempted to hide the money they made. One victim was also forced to have an abortion.[73] The Office of International Affairs, in collaboration with the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York, helped secure testimony, as well as documentary and physical evidence, gathered by Mexican authorities in their investigations of the Carretos' transnational operation. Similarly, the Office of International Affairs secured evidence and testimony from Russia in support of a federal prosecution by the United States Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of California of a defendant in California accused of trafficking her niece into the United States and forcing her to be used in prostitution.[74] In another case, the Office of International Affairs assisted a European country investigating a trafficking scheme involving Europe and [72] United States v. Carreto, [insert case information].

---

[73] Id.

[74] Id.

DOJ_NMG_0008242

Eastern Europe. The Department sent to that country evidence obtained pursuant to searches in the United States of locations where the targets were believed to have stored potential evidence of their crimes.

The Office of International Affairs also works to extradite traffickers from foreign nations to the United States or from our country to foreign nations for prosecution. On September 28, YYYY, Mexico provisionally arrested a Mexican national pursued by the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida on charges including conspiracy, alien smuggling, and transporting women and minors for purposes of prostitution between August 1996 and February 1998. The victims, who reportedly did not know their fate until they arrived in the United States, were not allowed to leave the brothels until they paid a smuggling fee to the accused, who allegedly took 70% of the prostitution proceeds.

Dismantling transnational human trafficking networks requires a willingness and ability to work closely with our foreign partners in countries where victims are recruited. Consequently, the Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions are actively involved in outreach and providing technical assistance to foreign governments and non-governmental organizations. Since 2002, Civil Rights Division officials have addressed international gatherings convened in countries such as Guatemala, the Dominican Republic, Suriname, China, Indonesia, Cambodia, Thailand, Azerbaijan, Ukraine, Moldova, El Salvador, Mexico, Canada, Hungary, Philippines, Japan, Colombia, India, South Africa, and Brazil to encourage a coordinated response to human trafficking worldwide. These events are attended by foreign law enforcement executives, prosecutors, judges, and non-governmental organizations that advocate on behalf of or provide assistance to trafficking victims.

Insert graphic depicting the rise in the number of OPDAT/ICITAP programs by fiscal year, FY 2001-2005.

The Criminal Division's Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and its International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program work to build effective partnerships with other law enforcement agencies sharing the goal of eradicating predatory trafficking groups. Between fiscal years 2001 and 2005, these office conducted a total of programs involving 25 countries. Other components of the Department, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Civil Rights Division, and the Office for Victims of Crime, often assist these efforts by providing technical assistance and informational briefings with foreign delegations. Since the passage of the TVPA, Civil Rights Division lawyers have participated in numerous training and outreach programs, speaking at more programs last year and the year before than ever before in countries such as Cambodia, Singapore, Bangkok, Austria, and Mexico.

In addition, some United States Attorney Offices, particularly in connection with their local Task Forces, have been involved in training and educating visitors from foreign governmental and non-governmental organizations about strategies to combat human trafficking. Representatives of the United States Attorney's Office for the Middle District of Florida, for example, along with its task force members from the Collier County Sheriff's Office, the Immigrant Rights Advocacy Center, and the Florida State University Center for the Advancement of Human Rights, traveled to Central America in late 2004 to educate governmental leaders about the efforts of their task force to combat human trafficking and provide assistance to its victims. An additional example is that of the United States Attorney's Office for the Western District of Washington, where the Seattle offices of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the United States Department of Labor's Office of the Inspector General have worked together to share information about efforts to combat human trafficking with officials and visitors from countries such as Brazil, Germany, Mexico, France, Italy, and Spain, and with organizations like the World Affairs Council.

DOJ_NMG_0008243

The Department also works with foreign governments to adopt legislation that aids in the investigation and prosecution of traffickers and the protection of victims. Through the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training, the Department's trafficking experts in the Civil Rights Division, CEOS and United States Attorneys' Offices assist foreign governments with the development and ratification of anti-human trafficking legislation to help ensure that foreign governments adopt laws that are victim-centered and compliant with Palermo Protocol.[75] For example, in fiscal year 2004 alone, Civil Rights Division attorneys and its victim-witness coordinator have conducted training sessions and have assisted in drafting trafficking legislation in Asia, Africa, Europe, the Caribbean, North America, and South America, in coordination with the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training. These training sessions emphasize the Department's experience in investigating and prosecuting these cases, collecting evidence, and keeping the victim safe. In fiscal year 2004, the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and the International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program assisted 7 foreign nations with legislation that directly or indirectly furthered anti-human trafficking efforts in fiscal year 2004.

The Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training provides substantial technical assistance based on a victim-centered strategy known commonly as the "Three Ps of Trafficking in Persons: Prevention, Protection and Prosecution." Technical assistance by this office includes educating and developing joint projects with foreign law enforcement officials geared to strengthening their capacity to prevent transnational trafficking; protect victim witnesses and thereby encourage their participation in investigations and prosecutions; and effectively investigate and prosecute trafficking cases. This office also works with host countries on developing evidence collection techniques which can generate evidence usable in prosecutions – either here in the United States or in a foreign country.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, working through the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training, has provided training programs in Suriname and Ghana. In fiscal year 2004, the FBI trained 50 international visitors, including officials from Australia,

---

[75] Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime, Dec. 3, 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0008244

India, Pakistan, South Africa, Haiti, and England. In addition, the Bureau's Civil Rights and the Asian Criminal Enterprise and Crimes Against Children Units conducted a training session at the British Embassy in January 2005 during a program jointly sponsored by the British Embassy and Women in Federal Law Enforcement.

Insert Graphic of Globe Showing international efforts

Another component of the President's international human trafficking program are activities to prevent victimization. An important step towards prevention is the Department's efforts to increase international public awareness about human trafficking. Raising the visibility of human trafficking and the efforts of the United States government to combat it encourages foreign governments to take victim-centered action to prevent, uncover, and prosecute cases of human trafficking. International public awareness is increased through activities of the Civil Rights Division, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Office of Justice Programs, the Office on Violence Against Women, and United States Attorneys' Office working through the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and the International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program, in connection with briefings for foreign delegations and training programs. These training programs provide foreign parties – law enforcement officials, prosecutors, legislators, and non-governmental organizations – with information about the strategies the Department has employed to combat trafficking. Federal investigators and prosecutors, mostly Civil Rights Division attorneys, share lessons learned in prosecuting these cases, building local multi-disciplinary task forces, and providing services and protection for victims.

In addition, to the Department's efforts concerning human trafficking, CEOS has trained attorneys and investigators from numerous countries on sex trafficking of children. CEOS staff have trained individuals from: the Council of Baltic States (11 Baltic nations), Albania, Angola, Armenia, Austria, the Balkans, Belgium, Belize, Bosnia, Brazil, Bulgaria, China, Costa Rica, Croatia, Czech Republic, El Salvador, Ecuador, Georgia, Germany, Guinea, Hungary, Indonesia, Israel, Japan, Korea, Lithuania, Latvia, Macedonia, Mexico, Montenegro, Nigeria, Panama, the Philippines, Poland, Romania, Russia, Senegal, Serbia, Slovenia, South Africa, Suriname, Thailand, the United Kingdom, and Ukraine, among others.

E. Fostering State, Local and Non-Governmental Activities to Combat Human Trafficking

The Department's work with state and local governmental agencies, particularly activities to expand anti-trafficking law enforcement authority, is intended to harness the almost one million state and local law enforcement officers who might come into contact with trafficking

States, governors, and legislatures can help by adopting anti-trafficking laws. The Justice Department has created a model state anti-trafficking law, and I intend to send a copy of it to every governor and legislative leader in those 40-plus states that do not yet have their own anti-trafficking laws.

-Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales at the Hoover Institution Board of Overseers Conference, February 28, 2005 victims. In 2004, the Department developed and introduced a model state law at the National Training Conference on Human Trafficking because many states do not have laws that criminalize this activity. At that time, only four states - Texas, Florida, Missouri, and Washington - had state laws against trafficking. The model state law reflects lessons learned through the Department's prosecutions, especially enforcement of the TVPA by the Civil Rights Division. Adoption of the model statute would promote a uniform national legal strategy to combat human trafficking.

DOJ_NMG_0008245

On July 21, 2004, the United States Senate unanimously passed a resolution, authored by Texas Senator John Cornyn, endorsing the Department's model state anti-trafficking statute and encouraging states to adopt it. The Senate resolution also singled out for praise the Civil Rights Division in its prosecution of human trafficking crimes and lauded the Department's National Conference on Human Trafficking. In March 2005, Attorney General Gonzales sent letters to state governors and legislative leaders explaining the scope of the trafficking problem, pointing to the need for state assistance to the federal government in fighting trafficking, and urging them to adopt the model. Department officials have since promoted the model law, and Civil Rights Division attorneys continue to provide technical assistance regarding the model state law to state legislators and related organizations, such as the National Foundation for Women Legislators. To date, 15 states have enacted anti-trafficking legislation, many of which reflect the Department's model criminal statute.

Insert Graphic of states that have adopted anti-trafficking laws.

As discussed above,[76] outreach and technical assistance are critical to uncovering this insidious crime. The Civil Rights Division, along with the Criminal Division, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Office of Justice Programs, the Office on Violence Against Women, and United States Attorneys' Offices, works actively to increase awareness among local law enforcement and community- and faith-based organizations through training presentations and the provision of technical assistance. The strategy employed by each of these components reinforces a victim-centered approach to prosecutions and the collaborative work of task forces. Examples of the Department's activities to increase awareness of human trafficking among state and local governmental agencies, non-governmental organizations, and in our nation's communities include the following:

---

[76] See, Part III "Scope of the Problem," section B "The Department Responds to the Crime with A Victim-Centered Approach."

DOJ_NMG_0008246

- An attorney in the Civil Rights Division authored an August 2002 article in Police Chief Magazine, entitled Working Together to Stop Modern-Day Slavery. The article outlined ways for local law enforcement during the course of their usual investigations to identify trafficking cases.

Insert Police Chief Magazine Image Here

- In fiscal year 2003, the Civil Rights Division conducted training sessions in the Washington, D.C. metropolitan area, New York City, Chicago, San Diego, Atlanta, Dallas, and several other cities and with numerous non-governmental organizations such as the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Women in Federal Law Enforcement and the National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives.

- An attorney in the Civil Rights Division authored a December 2003 article in Police Chief Magazine, entitled, Human Trafficking: A Guide to Detecting, Investigating, and Punishing Modern-Day Slavery. The article gave an overview of federal anti-trafficking efforts and urged increased cooperation among state, local, and federal law enforcement officials.

- In fiscal year 2004, the Civil Rights Division conducted more than fifty training sessions around the United States at conferences and meetings in cities such as Albuquerque, Baltimore, Chicago, Houston, Los Angeles, Newark, New Jersey, and Salt Lake City.

- With funding from the Office on Violence Against Women, the International Association of Chiefs of Police is developing a training package for local law enforcement officers, including a guidebook on the identification and investigation of human trafficking crimes and a roll call training video with a discussion guide to accompany the guidebook.

- The International Association of Chiefs of Police National Law Enforcement Leadership Initiative, in connection with a $200,000 cooperative agreement with the Office on Violence Against Women, is planning a summit of law enforcement leaders in the summer of 2006 to continue to extend the level of awareness of and commitment to combating human trafficking.

- The Bureau of Justice Assistance, in collaboration with the Office of Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS), initiated, in fiscal year 2005, a program to educate local law enforcement about human trafficking through the COPS Regional Community

DOJ_NMG_0008247

Policing Institutes at a cost of $245,000. In 2005, COPS conducted three "train-the-trainer" sessions for 300 law enforcement trainers, including members of the then-existing 18 multi-disciplinary task forces, with the human trafficking curriculum developed by the Bureau of Justice Assistance. This program will be expanded in 2006 to hold at least five sessions, educating 5,100 law enforcement personnel.

- Also in fiscal year 2005 and independent of the Bureau of Justice Assistance, COPS sponsored an additional 6 training sessions for nearly 700 law enforcement officers, non-law enforcement governmental officials, and community-based organizations.

- The National Institute of Justice is supporting research that will provide a clear perspective on the current state of law enforcement's understanding of human trafficking. The research will identify current law enforcement responses to human trafficking; the implications of such responses for victims; and best practices and lessons learned by law enforcement and the partners with whom they collaborate on trafficking cases (e.g., victims service providers, attorneys, etc.).

- The Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, through the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children and the Fox Valley Technical College, provides training on topics such as child maltreatment, runaway and missing children, the protection of children, and domestic trafficking of children for sexual purposes. Since 1998, this training program has reached more than 64,000 local law enforcement officers, prosecutors, and community service providers.

DOJ_NMG_0008248

VII. Conclusion

The Department has achieved incredible success in carrying out President Bush's directive to combat human trafficking. Under this Administration, the Department has been aggressive and effective in its effort to halt human trafficking. Prosecutorial activity has increased four-fold when compared to the last four years of the previous administration. The Department also has been innovative in its approach, by developing a multi-disciplinary victim-centered approach to uncovering human trafficking schemes, rescuing and protecting victims and working with foreign, governmental and non-governmental partners to prevent further victimization. Moreover, the Department has harnessed the diverse tools found within its components through intra-agency coordination that is primarily driven by the Civil Rights Division. There is however, much work to be done.

Because the fundamental liberties of a human trafficking victim are violated by traffickers, the Civil Rights Division will continue to lead the Department's efforts to combat this heinous crime, working with federal investigators and prosecutors as well as victim services organizations both here and abroad. With the new tools found in the TVPRA of 2005, the Department will continue work with its federal, state and local partners to expand the reach and intensity of anti-human trafficking task forces and encourage states to criminalize sex, labor and child sex trafficking.

DOJ_NMG_0008249

Gorsuch, Neil M

From:	Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent:	Thursday, January 05, 2006 10:47 AM
To:	Elwood, Courtney; Sampson, Kyle; Scolinos, Tasia; Moschella, William; Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Roberts, Crystal
Cc:	Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Subject:	FW: Draft DOJ Human Trafficking Report
Attachments:	DOJ HT Report 1.04.06 Draft Narrative.wpd

Thought you may want to review this, as well. As you'll see we have a very strong story to tell and be proud of. Any comments on substance or thoughts about launching this publicly/on hill/with groups, etc. would be appreciated in context of the plans we've discussed in SI meetings. NMG

-----Original Message-----
From: Reyes, Luis (SMO)
Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 10:43 AM
To: Swenson, Lily F; Gorsuch, Neil M; Brand, Rachel; Hertling, Richard; Pacold, Martha M; Holland, Eric W; Seidel, Rebecca
Subject: Fw: Draft DOJ Human Trafficking Report

Here is the latest draft of this. Pls see email below from Omar on comment period (fairly tight). Thanks!

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>
To: Vargas, Omar (CRT) <Omar.Vargas@crt.usdoj.gov>; Hertling, Richard <Richard.Hertling@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Rothenberg, Laurence E <Laurence.E.Rothenberg@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Roth, Monique <Monique.Roth@usdoj.gov>; Thacker, Stephanie <Stephanie.Thacker@usdoj.gov>; Oosterbaan, Andrew <Andrew.Oosterbaan@usdoj.gov>; McHenry, Teresa <Teresa.McHenry@usdoj.gov>; Voris, Natalie (USAEO) <Natalie.Voris@usdoj.gov>; Hagy, David, W. <David.Hagy@usdoj.gov>; Bottner, Andrea <Andrea.Bottner@usdoj.gov>; Kaplan, Jennifer <Jennifer.Kaplan@usdoj.gov>; Scott-Finan, Nancy <Nancy.Scott-Finan@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Ho-Gonzalez, William <William.Ho-Gonzalez@usdoj.gov>; Kockritz, Janis <Janis.Kockritz@usdoj.gov>; Hagen, Leslie A. (USAEO) <Leslie.Hagen@usdoj.gov>; Placido, Anthony P. <Anthony.P.Placido@usdoj.gov>; Bell, T March (CRT) <T.March.Bell@crt.usdoj.gov>; Allred, David (CRT) <David.Allred@crt.usdoj.gov>; Burch, Jim <Jim.Burch@usdoj.gov>; Roberts, Marilyn <Marilyn.Roberts@usdoj.gov>; Darke Schmitt, Katherine <Katherine.Darke.Schmitt@usdoj.gov>; Cammarata, Pam <Pam.Cammarata@usdoj.gov>; david.johnson3@ic.fbi.gov <david.johnson3@ic.fbi.gov>; kerri.galvin@ic.fbi.gov <kerri.galvin@ic.fbi.gov>; lmball@usa.net <lmball@usa.net>; stansstrauss@comcast.net <stansstrauss@comcast.net>; Grenadier, Lorna (CRT) <Lorna.Grenadier@crt.usdoj.gov>; Troup, Linda M (CRT) <Linda.Troup@crt.usdoj.gov>; Frost, Joye <Joye.Frost@usdoj.gov>
CC: Reyes, Luis (SMO) <Luis.Reyes@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>; Schlozman, Brad (CRT) <Brad.Schlozman@crt.usdoj.gov>; Comisac, Rena (CRT) <Rena.Comisac@crt.usdoj.gov>; Little, Kimani (CRT) <Kimani.Little@crt.usdoj.gov>
Sent: Wed Jan 04 22:24:47 2006

Subject: RE: Draft DOJ Human Trafficking Report

Good evening!

Attached for your review is the second draft of the Department's report on human trafficking. Your comments on the first draft have been enormously helpful and you'll see that many of your suggestions have been incorporated into this draft. Over the next few days, we will continue to work with individual components on footnote citations and outstanding pieces of information. While we proceed with wrapping up a few loose ends, we ask for your comment on this draft to be transmitted to me no later than COB, Friday, January 6. In addition, please recall that we requested back-up documents to be delivered to us by January 3 (see the email below).

As you may already know, we are facing a tight schedule and this review will be your last opportunity to provide substantive comment. On Tuesday, January 10, we will circulate a final draft, requesting a response by Wednesday, January 11. We intend to have this document finalized and to the printer by Thursday January 12.

This report is turning into a document that we all can be proud of! Feel free to call me with any questions.

Many Thanks,

Omar

PS- Go Texas, up by 6!

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Wednesday, December 21, 2005 11:49 AM
To: Vargas, Omar (CRT); Hertling, Richard; Rothenberg, Laurence E; Roth, Monique; Thacker, Stephanie; Oosterbaan, Andrew; McHenry, Teresa; Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Hagy, David, W.; Bottner, Andrea; Kaplan, Jennifer; Scott-Finan, Nancy; Ho-Gonzalez, William; Kockritz, Janis; Hagen, Leslie A. (USAEO); Placido, Anthony P.; Bell, T March (CRT); Allred, David (CRT); Burch, Jim; Roberts, Marilyn; Darke Schmitt, Katherine; Cammarata, Pam; 'david.johnson3@ic.fbi.gov'; 'kerri.galvin@ic.fbi.gov '; 'lmball@usa.net'; 'stansstrauss@comcast.net'; Grenadier, Lorna (CRT); Troup, Linda M (CRT); Frost, Joye
Cc: Reyes, Luis (SMO); Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Little, Kimani (CRT)
Subject: RE: Draft DOJ Human Trafficking Report

Everyone:

A follow-up to last night's email.

First, please find attached versions of the documents we circulated yesterday formatted in MS Word.

Second, as discussed during our last meeting, please gather support documentation for the information contained in this report that pertains to your agencies. We ask that you maintain two sets of copies of contained in this report that pertains to your agencies. We ask that you maintain two sets of copies of these back-up documents (one for yourselves and one for us) and provide a copy to our office no later than COB January 3, 2006. Again, you are welcomed to call me with any questions.

Thanks, Omar

<< File: DOJ HT Report.12.20.05 Draft MS WORD.doc >>
<< File: DOJ HT Report Task List 12.20.05 MS WORD.doc >>

-----Original Message-----
From: Vargas, Omar (CRT)
Sent: Tuesday, December 20, 2005 9:30 PM
To: Hertling, Richard; Rothenberg, Laurence E; Roth, Monique; Thacker, Stephanie; Oosterbaan, Andrew; McHenry, Teresa; Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Hagy, David, W.; Bottner, Andrea; Kaplan, Jennifer; Scott-Finan, Nancy; Ho-Gonzalez, William; Kockritz, Janis; Hagen, Leslie A. (USAEO); Placido, Anthony P.; Bell, T March (CRT); Allred, David (CRT); Burch, Jim; Roberts, Marilyn; Darke Schmitt, Katherine; Cammarata, Pam; 'david.johnson3@ic.fbi.gov'; 'kerri.galvin@ic.fbi.gov'; 'lmball@usa.net'; 'stansstrauss@comcast.net'; Grenadier, Lorna (CRT); Troup, Linda M (CRT); Frost, Joye
Cc: Reyes, Luis (SMO); Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Little, Kimani (CRT)
Subject: Draft DOJ Human Trafficking Report

Everyone:

We greatly appreciate the hard work you have expended towards this draft report. It looks pretty good, but there is some work left to do. Attached for your review and comment is a first draft of the report. Also attached is a "tasking document" with follow-up questions and requests for additional information that will greatly enhance our final product. We ask that you supply us with your responses no later than COB Friday, December 23. We will then circulate a second draft of the report the week after next, once again asking for your review and comment. Please remember that the purpose of this report is to provide the general public with information regarding the Department's activities to implement the President's directives to combat human trafficking. Feel free to call me with any questions.

Many Thanks,

Omar

<< File: DOJ HT Report. 12.20.05. Draft Narrative.wpd >> << File: DOJ HT Report Task List.12.20.05.wpd >>

Department of Justice
Report on Activities to Combat Human Trafficking
Fiscal Years 2001-2005

I. An Introduction to Human Trafficking

Human trafficking is a pernicious crime that violates the fundamental principles of our society. For traffickers, victims are commodities to be traded and exploited in any market. Human trafficking is the modern-day form of slavery. It requires the use of force, fraud, or coercion by a trafficker to compel a person into, or hold someone in, an employment situation in which he or she will be criminally exploited. Trafficking may occur when victims are transported across borders or within a nation, or may not involve transportation at all. Victims, often women, are usually lured by promises of well-paying jobs. Once deprived of the opportunity to return home or communicate with their family, victims are generally held through force or threats in situations of sexual exploitation or forced labor. Human trafficking offenses thus transgress the victim's human liberty in violation of the Thirteenth Amendment's guarantee of freedom. As such, trafficking offends the core civil rights on which our Constitution and our country are based.

> Human life is the gift of our Creator -- and it should never be for sale. It takes a special kind of depravity to exploit and hurt the most vulnerable members of society. Human traffickers rob children of their innocence, they expose them to the worst of life before they have seen much of life.
>
> –President George W. Bush, July 16, 2004

By statute, a victim of a "severe form of trafficking in persons" is entitled to certain public programs and benefits. A severe form of trafficking must include the recruitment, harboring, transportation, provision, or obtaining of a person for one of the three following purposes:

- Labor or services, through the use of force, fraud, or coercion; or
- A commercial sex act, through the use of force, fraud, or coercion; or
- If the person is under 18 years of age, any commercial sex act, regardless of whether any form of coercion is involved.[1]

Since 2001, the Department of Justice has achieved an impressive record of prosecuting defendants for holding their victims in compelled service in such diverse areas as prostitution, field labor, domestic service, concubinage, "exotic dancing," pornography, garment factory "sweatshops," and street peddling. From fiscal year 2001 through fiscal year 2005, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys'

Insert Graphic Depicting Rate of Increase FY '96-'05

---

[1] Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000, Pub. L. No. 106-386, § 103(8), 114 Stat. 1464 (signed into law on October 28, 2000; codified as amended at 22 U.S.C. § 7102 (8)).

DOJ_NMG_0008253

Offices filed 91 trafficking cases, a 405% increase over the number of trafficking cases filed from fiscal years 1996 through 2000. In these cases, Department attorneys charged 248 trafficking defendants, a 210% increase over the previous five fiscal years. In addition, prosecutors with the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices convicted 140 defendants of trafficking-related crimes, a 109% increase over the previous five years.

Traffickers take advantage of the victims' hopes for a better life, preying on or even creating vulnerabilities that they can exploit. For example, in United States v. Satia, Louisa Satia and her husband, Kevin Nanji, used a false passport to bring 14 year-old "R.O." from Cameroon, where R.O. had worked for Satia's mother since the age of 12. R.O. was lured by the promise of an American education. Satia and Nanji refused to send the girl to school, however, and instead forced her to work for them as a maid and as a nanny to their young children. R.O. was not permitted to leave Satia and Nanji's apartment alone, except to take out the trash and walk the children to the school bus stop. Satia hit R.O. routinely, poked R.O. in the eyes, sprayed window cleanser on R.O., poured cola and glue in R.O.'s hair, and threatened her with deportation even though they were the ones who had brought her to the country illegally. Nanji made repeated sexual advances toward the girl. Apart from keeping R.O. in a condition of involuntary servitude, Satia solicited numerous people to sell their identities to her so that she could create false passports and routinely arranged false marriages as part of an immigration fraud scheme. In 2002, after their conviction at trial of involuntary servitude, the defendants were sentenced to 9 years in prison and ordered to pay $105,300 in restitution.[2]

Traffickers may lure their victims into otherwise legitimate labor or into the sex industry. For instance, in a pathbreaking case in Florida, United States v. Cadena, Mexican women and girls as young as 14 years of age were brought to the United States with promises of good jobs as waitresses and landscapers, only to be held as slaves in a high-volume prostitution operation.[3] The Cadena family would hold the women in their service by shooting into the ground at their feet, threatening their families, beating them, and raping them as punishment if they tried to run away. The ringleader and six other men were convicted of involuntary servitude and sentenced to up to 15 years of incarceration. The Cadena case is ongoing, and Federal Bureau of Investigation and Departmental prosecutors and victim-witness specialists have continued to prosecute Cadena family members and assist the survivors. In 2002, one of the family members was apprehended at the United States-Mexico border and pled guilty to conspiracy to enslave the women and girls. With the cooperation of the Mexican Government, the Department secured the conviction of one of the Cadena brothers in Mexico in 2002, where he was sentenced to 24 years of incarceration. In 2005, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department's Office of International Affairs achieved the arrest in 2005 of yet another member of the family; trial is pending in Mexico as of the time of this report and an request for extradition prepared by the Office of International Affairs is pending. The Cadena victims have been assisted by a non-governmental organization that is funded by the Department's Office for Victims of Crime, and with the help of the case agents, prosecutors, and victim/witness staff, they have been able to bring their children and custodial parents to the United States.

---

[2] United States v. Satia, No. 00-590 (D. Md. 2002)

[3] United States v. Cadena, [insert case information].

DOJ_NMG_0008254

Any specific instance of human trafficking may involve a range of other criminal activity that is not limited to federal anti-human trafficking laws, such as inter-state transportation for prostitution, money laundering, and racketeering. Trafficking indictments often reflect this. For instance, in United States v. Zavala, Mariluz Zavala, who in November 2005 received a 15 year prison sentence for enslaving Peruvian workers in Long Island, New York, was charged with a multi-object conspiracy, where the Department alleged that she and her co-conspirators had conspired to commit forced labor and involuntary servitude by withholding immigration documents. The Department also charged her with extortion and falsifying immigration documents, criminal violations that are not found in federal anti-human trafficking law.[4] In forced prostitution cases, such as United States v. Reyes-Rojas,[5] where two brothers were charged with sex trafficking, additional charges often include inter-state transportation for prostitution under the law known commonly as the "The Mann Act,"[6] and harboring people for prostitution. In cases like United States v. Maksimenko, where a Lithuanian man pled guilty to for enslaving Ukranian women in strip clubs through force and threats, trafficking charges are predicate acts under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO) statutes,[7] and accordingly can sustain money laundering charges for transactions carried out with the proceeds of, or in furtherance, of a trafficking scheme.

Sometimes, when a trafficking situation has occurred but there is not sufficient evidence with which to establish a trafficking offense, the Mann Act and immigration statutes can be powerful tools to vindicate the federal interest. The case of United States v. Reddy is a good example of this.[8] In that case, which was uncovered before the passage of the TVPA[9] the investigation revealed that, for over ten years, defendant Lakireddy Bali Reddy, a wealthy San Francisco Bay Area businessman, maintained a number of young girls and women as a quasi-harem for his sexual gratification and to work in his household and business enterprises. These victims were predominantly from families of lower castes in India and were brought into the United States by way of fraudulent employment offers or sham marriages. Members of Reddy's family posed as relatives of the victims to assist in their fraudulent migration. His scheme came to light after a teenage girl died of carbon monoxide poisoning in the apartment where he had sequestered her, her sister, and another girl. In 2001, Reddy pled guilty to transporting his victims in interstate and foreign commerce for illegal sexual activity. He was sentenced to more than 8 years in prison and ordered to pay $2,000,000 in restitution to four of his victims. The victims received benefits and services under the TVPA and today remain safely in the United States.

---

4 United States v. Zavala, [insert case information].

5 United States v. Reyes-Rojas, [insert case information].

6 18 U.S.C. § 2421.

7 Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations (RICO), Pub L. No. 91-452, 84 Stat. 941.

8 United States v. Reddy, [insert case information].

9 TVPA, Pub. L. No. 106-386.

DOJ_NMG_0008255

DOJ_NMG_0008256

II. An Administration Priority

Early in this Administration, the President identified the eradication of human trafficking as a priority. Two particular actions by the President focused Federal resources on trafficking. First, in February 2002, the President issued Executive Order 13257, creating a cabinet-level Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. The President ordered that the Task Force be chaired by the Secretary of State and be comprised of the Attorney General, the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, the Director of Central Intelligence, the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and the Administrator of the United States Agency for International Development.[10] The President took this action to ensure that the TVPA was fully implemented in a coordinated fashion throughout the federal government.[11]

> Slavery, human trafficking, and sexual servitude are crimes that wrench our hearts. They rob human beings of freedom. They strike at our nation's belief in the potential of every life. They are crimes that demand swift and implacable prosecution of the predators. They are crimes that deserve warmth and compassion for the victims.
>
> -Attorney General John Ashcroft, January 29, 2004

Second, also in February 2002, the President issued National Security Presidential Directive 22 (NSPD-22) to identify human trafficking as an important national security matter as well as to instruct federal agencies to strengthen their collective efforts, capabilities, and coordination to support the President's goal of abolishing human trafficking.[12] NSPD-22 states that human trafficking a transnational threat that is an affront to the principles on which this country stands. The relationship of human trafficking to organized crime, especially transnational criminal syndicates, fosters official corruption and threatens the rule of law.[13] The clandestine movement of persons across borders also poses terrorism and public health concerns. The United States Attorney's Office for the District of Montana, for example, treats every border incursion as potentially related to terrorism and, in 2004, was involved in a joint operation with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Canadian Border Services Agency that resulted in the identification of a dozen Korean women believed to be destined for the sex trade, 80% of whom tested positive for tuberculosis. The syndicates that recruit and move these victims are often the same ones that are responsible for other trans-border crimes, like smuggling. Traffickers can and will move any type of cargo, human or otherwise, for profit. The fight against trafficking is

---

[10] Exec. Order No. 13257, 3 C.F.R. 13257 (2002).

[11] The President subsequently issued an Executive Order amending Executive Order 13257 on March 18, 2004, conforming it to the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-193, 117 Stat. 2875.

[12] National Security Presidential Directive Memorandum Regarding Combating Trafficking In Persons, (Feb. 25, 2002) Parts of NSPD-22 are classified and cannot be released to the public.

[13] Id.

DOJ_NMG_0008257

therefore a critical element of United States foreign policy, requiring full use of the tools of diplomacy and the cooperation of American and foreign law enforcement.

Moreover, NSPD-22 views the abolition of prostitution, the driving force behind sex trafficking, as integral to the abolition of human trafficking. Regarding the United States's policy towards prostitution, NSPD-22 states:

> The United States opposes prostitution and any related activities, including pimping, pandering, and/or maintaining brothels as contributing to the phenomenon of trafficking in persons. These activities are inherently harmful and dehumanizing. The United States Government's position is that these activities should not be regulated as a legitimate form of work for any human being.[14]

NSPD-22 created a three-point plan of action:

1. Implementing Training in Federal Agencies

The President required all federal agencies to ensure that their own personnel were trained and equipped to carry out their anti-trafficking responsibilities and that their personnel coordinated with counterparts in other agencies. Further, NSPD-22 stated that the United States has a zero-tolerance policy with regard to trafficking by United States Government employees and contractors, who are to be educated about trafficking and investigated, prosecuted, and punished for engaging in it.

2. Developing Cooperation With State and Local Law Enforcement in the United States

The President recognized that state and local law enforcement are critical to federal efforts to combat human trafficking. NSPD-22 instructs federal agencies to vigorously enforce laws against traffickers, and to provide training and assistance to state and local law enforcement to assist them in recognizing victims and to hold perpetrators accountable for their crimes.

3. Integrating and Coordinating International Programs

The President required all federal agencies to coordinate foreign assistance programs, including funding to governmental and non-governmental organizations and public awareness programs, to combat trafficking in persons. NSPD-22 also required agencies to ensure that contractors receiving United States funding through international programs do not engage in trafficking activities. The President also directed agencies to work to prevent future victimization by reducing the vulnerability of individuals to trafficking, particularly through the expansion of educational and economic opportunities and the protection and promotion of human rights. The President further directed federal agencies to employ diplomatic and foreign policy tools to encourage other nations and multilateral organizations to work with the United States to combat this crime, to draft

---

[14] Id.

DOJ_NMG_0008258

and enforce laws against trafficking, and to hold accountable those who engage in this crime.[15]

In 2003, Congress passed and President Bush signed the reauthorization of the TVPA, known as the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act (TVPRA).[16] The TVPRA of 2003 codified the President's Interagency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons by creating the Senior Policy Operating Group (SPOG), which meets quarterly. The TVPRA slightly expanded the SPOG's authority, particularly as it concerns inter-agency coordination to develop the capacity of foreign nations, both source and destination countries, to combat trafficking; to examine the role of sex tourism in human trafficking; and to foster consultation with governmental and non-governmental organizations regarding implementation of the TVPRA.

The Attorney General has been an engaged member of the SPOG, and the Department supports the committee in a variety of ways. In 2004, for example, the Civil Rights Division and the Office of Justice Programs participated a SPOG subcommittee charged with designing the President's international human trafficking initiative. Currently, the Civil Rights Division, the Criminal Division, Office of Legal Policy, and the Office for Victims of Crime are members of the SPOG Subcommittee on Domestic Trafficking. The National Institute of Justice, a component of the Office of Justice Programs, is a member of the SPOG Subcommittee on Research, which shares information regarding research grants and other activities by each SPOG member agency. This subcommittee is also studying the issue of accurately estimating the number of trafficking victims within the United States. In addition, the Office of Justice Programs, the Department's principal grant-making agency, and the Office on Violence Against Women participate in the interagency grant information-sharing process of the SPOG. The grant information-sharing process is designed to provide SPOG member agencies with an opportunity to review and comment on proposed grant awards, helping to ensure that domestic and international grant programs are coordinated across the federal government. Finally, the Office of Legal Policy chairs the SPOG Subcommittee on Regulations, a working group charged with the development of federal regulations to implement the TVPRA.

---

[15] Id.

[16] Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-193, 117 Stat. 2875 (2003) (signed into law by President Bush on December 19, 2003).

DOJ_NMG_0008259

III. Scope of the Problem

A. How Many Victims and Who are They?

It is extremely difficult to quantify the number of victims trafficked globally and into the United States each year. Some estimates indicate that as many as 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders annually, with up to 17,500 victims trafficked into our country each year.[17] Clearly, the problem is of sufficient magnitude that a continued dedication of substantial resources to this enforcement area is very much in order.

Despite our record number of investigations and prosecutions, there is a noted disparity between the estimated number of victims and those who have been found and assisted. The Department realizes that it must address the incongruity between some estimates and the less than 1,000 victims that have been rescued through the efforts of federal, state, and local law enforcement since 2003, when services for trafficking victims were first made available under the TVPA. Though the possible reasons for this disparity vary, the difference nevertheless signals the need to carefully scrutinize the estimated number of trafficking victims to assure that it reflects as accurately as possible the true number of human trafficking victims within our country.

Some estimates may overstate the extent of the problem and conflate human trafficking with the smuggling and harboring of illegal aliens or with the related crime of migrant prostitution. Trafficking victims are not all illegal aliens; human trafficking is distinct from human smuggling. Trafficking victims may be United States citizens, legal residents, or visitors. For example, United States v. Pipkins was the first case in which the Department successfully prosecuted two pimps for trafficking women and girls, all American citizens.[18] Prostitution alone is not trafficking; but where, as here, it involved the use of force or coercion to prevent people from leaving the enterprise, it becomes trafficking. Human smuggling, on the other hand, is the facilitation, transportation, attempted transportation, or illegal entry of a person or persons across an international border, in violation of American immigration laws. Many of those illegally entering the United States are smuggled, not trafficked.[19] Smuggling may occur clandestinely or through deception, such as the use of fraudulent passports or other immigration documents.[20] Human smugglers enter into a contractual relationship with those they will illegally transport into our country. The smuggler is often paid a considerable amount of money for his services and the relationship normally ends once the smuggled person has entered the United States and the debt is paid.

---

17 U.S. Dept. of Justice, Assessment of U.S. Gov't Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons, Fiscal Year 2003 (2004); Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, U.S. Dept. of State, Ann. Rep. (2005).

18 United States v. Pipkins, 378 F. 3d 1281 (11th Cir. 2004).

19 The Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center, Fact Sheet: Distinctions Between Human Smuggling and Human Trafficking (2005).

20 Id.

DOJ_NMG_0008260

Identifying and assisting victims of human trafficking are difficult tasks, and consequently, the Department does not have reliable figures regarding the number of victims who may be in the United States. Trafficking victims who have been rescued in connection with federal government activities over the past several years have come from more than 50 different countries, with the disproportionate majority coming from Latin America.[21] But several factors contribute to the difficulty of identifying trafficking victims. Human trafficking, like many other crimes, often requires that the victim and the criminal enterprise remain in the shadows of our communities. Moreover, victims often suffer from paralyzing fear and are reluctant to seek help, further exacerbating the problem. Traffickers prey on the meek and destitute, coercing and deceiving them into hiding.

Another explanation for this disparity is that victims may be helped by state and local law enforcement activities that the Department does not know about, or, in some instances, state and local officials may not realize that they have uncovered trafficking victims. Under our federal system of government, state and local governments may prosecute these cases under other criminal laws. Furthermore, although a particular prosecution by the Department may only result in the rescue of one or a few victims, it is reasonable to assume that enterprises that have been in business for several years have victimized hundreds of people.

The Department is committed to discussing and refining methodologies for estimating the number of victims that may yield more reliable results. The enactment of anti-trafficking crimes at the state level, many of which are based on the Department's model anti-trafficking statute, is a heartening trend, as the men and women in state and local law enforcement far outnumber the federal resources available to combat this problem.[22] As with domestic violence and sexual abuse, it is local police and prosecutors who will investigate and prosecute the lion's share of trafficking cases in the coming years. The Department is committed to supporting these partners in expanding the victim-centered approach it has developed.

B. The Department Responds to this Crime with A Victim-Centered Approach

Typically, federal prosecutors learn about a crime from the victim, from the eyewitness, or through an investigation. For traffickers to be successful, they must hide their crime from law enforcement by hiding their victims and their collaborators. Those who benefit from trafficking – men who frequent prostitutes and those who benefit from the low cost labor that the traffickers broker – are often momentary beneficiaries, and may not even know that the victim is being held in compelled service. Thus, the only remaining eyewitness is often the victim. To prevent their workforce from running away and to forestall detection, traffickers have an incentive to instill

---

[21] U.S. Dept. of Justice, Assessment of U.S. Gov't Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons, Fiscal Year 2003 (2004); U.S. Dept. of Justice, Assessment of U.S. Gov't Activities to Combat Trafficking in Persons, Fiscal Year 2004 (2005).

[22] The Department's model state law is discussed below in detail at ____. A copy of the model state law is available as an appendix to this report and on the internet at http://www.usdoj.gov/crt/crim/model_state_law.pdf.

DOJ_NMG_0008261

fear in their victims– fear of American law enforcement, fear of their captors, and fear of anyone they meet in their unfamiliar settings. Many victims are far from their country of origin and their families. They do not speak English and are more likely than not to lack any legal immigration status. Traffickers prey on the unsettled aspects of their lives, playing victims against each other and fostering collaboration.

Victims of trafficking often live and are forced to work in linguistic and social isolation. They fear the threat of exposure and feel shame about the work they are forced to do, particularly when that work includes sexual abuse. They also fear continued violence or the threat of reprisals against loved ones. They can develop a psychological dependence on the trafficker or others. Immigrant victims of human trafficking often face a special set of circumstances that keep them in the shadows of our nation's communities. Traffickers will often withhold from immigrant victims of trafficking their immigration documents. Immigrant victims may have a fear of American law enforcement , do not understand their rights, and fear risking default on monies owed their captors, as well as the collateral effect that may have on their families back home. The result is that victims will rarely self-report and so they must be pro-actively found.

While relying on the victims to give testimony about their suffering – the same duty American law requires of any witness – the Department places a premium on addressing the victims' need for recovery. Agents, prosecutors, and victim/witness staff work with, and are intensifying their relationships with, victim service providers. These groups, often experienced faith or community-based organizations that have previously served immigrant or abused populations, can help keep the victims safe, meet their medical and housing needs, and help them find an equilibrium in their lives through job training, language classes, and life-skills counseling. Victim-centered prosecutions that recognize that the government's interest in these cases stems from the violation of the fundamental right of freedom. Moreover, victim-centered prosecutions are essential to the liberation and care of victims. In vindicating the survivor's right to be free, federal prosecutors must give him or her the opportunity to use that freedom and the support to make it meaningful. The Department's approach flows from our nation's foundational principles – respect for human dignity and one's civil rights.

"It's there fault that I lost my friends, my parents....My story is very long. It took me about a year to reach my parents....They (the defendants) don't repent for everything they did to me, for all the damage they did to me. They hit me....They thought they were big shorts. I tried to defend myself but couldn't. I tried to escape...."

–An in-court statement by S.A.H., a victim in United States v. Jimenez-Calderon

Federal law enforcement are committed to combating human trafficking with a victim-centered approach. Federal investigators and prosecutors, including Federal Bureau of Investigation and Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents and Assistant United States Attorneys, immediately refer a victim to victim-witness specialists who begin to provide the appropriate referrals to victim service providers, often grantees that are funded through the Office for Victims of Crime and the Department of Health and Human Services Office of Refugee Resettlement. The Civil Rights Division and the Office for Victims of Crime work together to ensure that grantees are available to provide services to victims. In addition, because trafficking victims may avail themselves of victim services providers funded through other Departmental components, such as the Office on Violence Against Women and the Bureau of Justice Assistance, grantees of these offices are trained on providing assistance to victims of human trafficking.

DOJ_NMG_0008262

Department components regularly promote a victim-centered response and educate other law enforcement agencies and victim service providers about the dynamics of trafficking and the need for pro-active investigations in an effort to increase awareness and outreach to new partners, with the ultimate goal of preventing victimization. For example:

- Since 2002, Civil Rights Division staff have trained federal, state, and local law enforcement officers and victim service providers about proactive victim-centered investigations. In addition, Criminal Section lawyers are educating prosecutors and other law enforcement officials across the country on the criminal provisions of the new trafficking statute and providing practical guidance on investigating and prosecuting these difficult cases, as well as assisting localities to establish regional working groups to better coordinate and focus anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts. The Section continues to organize and lead training efforts at the Justice Department's national training facility for federal investigators and prosecutors from around the country, as well as victim-witness coordinators from U. S. Attorneys' offices.

- Since January 2003, nearly 40,000 law enforcement officers, attorneys, social service providers, advocates, medical and mental health professionals, and community members have been trained by the Office for Victims of Crime and Bureau of Justice Assistance grantees. Moreover, the Bureau of Justice Assistance's law enforcement training emphasizes that code enforcement officials, fire marshals, and other persons that may have access to where victims are being held should be trained on signs of human trafficking.

- The Federal Bureau of Investigation's Civil Rights Unit and various United States Attorneys' Offices have also participated in dozens of regional Department of Justice sponsored human trafficking training conferences hosted throughout the country, in cities including Los Angeles, California; Houston, Texas; New Haven, Connecticut; Portland, Oregon; St. Louis, Missouri; San Diego, California; San Francisco, California; and Tampa, Florida.

DOJ_NMG_0008263

IV. Tools for Investigating and Prosecuting Human Trafficking

The Prosecutor's Tool Box

Involuntary servitude
Labor wage and hour laws
Mann Act
PROTECT Act
RICO Act
Trafficking Victims Protection Act
Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003
Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005

The Department's meaningful success in combating human trafficking would not be possible without the enactment of several statutes by Congress. Prior to 2000, trafficking cases were prosecuted under a number of federal criminal statutes including the involuntary servitude statutes,[23] the Mann Act,[24] and labor laws concerning workplace conditions and compensation.[25] The Mann Act statutes were formerly thought of as the primary federal anti-trafficking tool, when "trafficking" was perceived as interstate transportation for prostitution, as opposed to the modern definition, which focuses on compelled service. The involuntary servitude statutes set forth a variety of substantive crimes covering the slave trade, involuntary servitude, peonage. Sections 1584 and 1581, of Title 18 of the United States Code, which respectively criminalize involuntary servitude and peonage, are the primary statutes used in involuntary servitude and trafficking prosecutions. Section 1583, which criminalizes kidnaping victims into slavery, likewise remains a useful tool in modern federal prosecutions. Prior to the TVPA, these statutes did not always treat the workers involved as victims and enforcement authority for each of these possible anti-trafficking tools was scattered across the United States Government, leading to differing outcomes depending on which charges were brought or which agency learned of the allegations of abuse.

Today, the centerpiece of United States Government efforts is the TVPA.[26] The TVPA provided for a range of new protections and assistance for victims of trafficking in persons who comply with law enforcement investigations; it expanded the crimes and enhanced the penalties available to federal investigators and prosecutors pursuing traffickers; and it expanded United States activities internationally to prevent victims from being trafficked in the first place.

---

[23] See 18 U.S.C. §§ 1581-1588. These statutes are still used when appropriate and were updated and supplemented by the restitution, forfeiture, and attempt provisions enacted in the TVPA.

[24] See 18 U.S.C. §§ 2421-2424.

[25] E.g., Migrant and Seasonal Agricultural Worker Protection Act, Pub. L. No. 97-470, 96 Stat. 2583 (1983) (codified as amended at 29 U.S.C. § 1851).

[26] TVPA, Pub. L. No. 106-386.

DOJ_NMG_0008264

Protections and Assistance for Victims

The TVPA authorized a dedicated stream of funding for victim services and provides for immigration relief for severe forms of trafficking.[27] Under the TVPA, a victim is certified by the Department of Health and Human Services as eligible for services funded by any federal or state program or activity, such as the Departments of Agriculture, Health and Human Services, and Labor or the Legal Services Corporation. Department of Health and Human Services certification is granted after consultation with the Department's law enforcement officials, including investigators and prosecutors, that the victim meets the statutory definition of a "victim of a severe form of trafficking" and is also cooperating with the federal law enforcement investigation. The TVPA also authorized the Department to fund and provide training and technical assistance to law enforcement agencies and victim service providers.

The Department's Office for Victims of Crime directs its funding to support services for pre-certified victims and may, in special circumstances, fund organizations that provide services to certified victims. Pre-certified victims are those victims who have been identified by law enforcement in connection with an investigation and are awaiting Department of Health and Human Services certification that they are a victim of a severe form of trafficking. This is significant because pre-certified victims are not entitled to the same publicly funded benefits that certified victims are, yet the need for services is most acute at this stage. Secondarily, providing those services enables victims, in most instances, to cooperate with law enforcement to investigate and prosecute their human traffickers. A safe and healthy victim is better able to articulate to investigators and a court what has happened to her. Indeed, a survivor of trafficking can often be one of the most effective anti-trafficking tools as an advocate and a provider of services for victims.

Insert images of trafficker mug-shots

Defined Crimes and Enhanced the Penalties

The TVPA,[28] defined human trafficking as a crime, crated stiff sentences, and provided prosecutors with definitions of terms used to describe the offense such as "coercion," and "commercial sex act."[29] Traffickers that use force, fraud or coercion may be sentenced to up to a term of up to life imprisonment.[30]

Prevention

---

[27] A more detailed discussion about victim services programs administered by the Department of Justice is below in Part VI "The Department's Collateral Attack on Human Traffickers," Section B "Restoring a Victim's Dignity."

[28] See, 18 U.S.C. §§ 1589-1594.

[29] 22 U.S.C.§ 7102.

[30] See, 18 U.S.C. 1591.

DOJ_NMG_0008265

Insert Image of Bilateral Safety Corridor Coalition Public Awareness Calendar

The TVPA has given the Department the tools needed to increase public awareness within our communities, particularly among law enforcement and social services agencies, as well as internationally. The Department's activities, including those undertaken by non-governmental organizations that receive grants from the Office for Victims of Crime, aim to prevent victimization through public awareness and outreach are discussed below in Part VI "The Department's Collateral Attack on Human Traffickers," Section C "Public Awareness Supports Pro-Active Investigations."

Subsequently, in 2003, Congress, with the President's support, re-authorized the TVPA,[31] enhancing penalties and adding responsibilities to the United States Government's anti-trafficking portfolio, such as new public awareness campaigns to combat sex tourism and some refinements to the federal criminal law. Significantly, Congress included trafficking among the terms that constitute money laundering and racketeering, under the RICO statute. Prosecutors have used this effective tool to dismantle trafficking schemes. It also created a mandatory restitution section and a forfeiture provision. These sections work together to ensure that defendants convicted of trafficking in persons receive sentences that reflect the seriousness of their crimes. The TVPRA has produced reals results in the field, yielding penalties three and four times those obtained under smuggling or harboring statutes and under historical servitude and trafficking statutes, as discussed earlier in this section.

Graphic depicting rate of sentences in trafficking cases

It also clarified the provision that victims meet the statutory requirement to comply with law enforcement investigations by allowing victims to assist with law enforcement efforts, such as providing investigators with important factual testimony, and it relieved victims under the age of 18 from meeting this requirement altogether. Congress also created a new civil action that allows trafficking victims to sue their traffickers in federal district court. Specifically, the TVPRA of

---

[31] TVPRA Pub. L. No. 108-193.

DOJ_NMG_0008266

2003 gave victims of human trafficking the right to bring federal civil suits against their traffickers for actual and punitive damages.

The account of a Philippine teacher from a rural village is illustrative of how civil suits are an important aspect in fighting human trafficking when prosecutors are unable or have insufficient evidence to bring forward a criminal prosecution. In August 2004, a Santa Monica jury awarded her $825,000 for her enslavement by Judd Jackson, a Sony Pictures executive, and his wife, Beth.[32] The Philippine teacher thought she was coming to the United States to work as a travel companion to an elderly woman. Instead, her passport was taken away and she was enslaved. The Jacksons made her clean their home, provide meticulous care for their dogs, and sleep on the dining room floor. After a little more than one year of working from 5:30 a.m. to as late as 10 p.m., a neighbor called the police and the victim was referred to the Coalition to Abolish Slavery and Trafficking (CAST), a grantee of the Department's Office for Victims of Crime human trafficking victim services program. The victim is now an advocate on behalf of trafficking victims, speaking publicly about the evils of human trafficking.

On January __, President Bush signed into law the Trafficking Victims' Protection Reauthorization of 2005 (TVPRA of 2005). In addition to reauthorizing the TVPRA, the law enhances our ability to combat trafficking in persons by extending our prosecutorial tools and providing new protections for victims. In important enhancements to prosecutorial tools, the bill establishes extra-territorial authority for prosecution of trafficking in persons offenses committed by federal contractors abroad or persons accompanying them and adds trafficking in persons as predicates for the offense of document servitude, where one's identity papers, such a foreign birth certificate, passport, or immigration documents are withheld by the trafficker and used to coerce or compel the trafficking victim. The TVPRA of 2005 also promotes efforts to fight domestic trafficking in persons. It requires a comprehensive research and statistical review and analysis of incidents of trafficking and commercial sex acts within the United States and annual conferences, to be conducted by the Department for the benefit of state and local law enforcement, other governmental agencies, and non-governmental organizations, on domestic trafficking in fiscal years 2006, 2007, and 2008 and biennially thereafter.

In addition, the TVPRA of 2005 establishes a grant program to develop, expand, and strengthen assistance programs for United States citizens and permanent residents who have been subjected to trafficking and establishes a pilot program to create residential treatment facilities for children subjected to trafficking. It also creates a new grant program for state and local law enforcement authorities to investigate and prosecute trafficking of U.S. citizens and permanent residents, including efforts to reduce demand for commercial sex acts. Furthermore, the TVPRA of 2005 contains new requirements for data collection that will promote effective responses to trafficking. These include study by the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center, an inter-agency program discussed in more detail below, of the relationship between trafficking and terrorism and of the abduction and enslavement of children as soldiers, and development of a mechanism for quantifying the number of victims of trafficking.

---

[32] [Insert case citation.]

DOJ_NMG_0008267

The President, also in 2003, signed into law, the Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to end the Exploitation of Children Today Act of 2003, the law known as the PROTECT Act. The PROTECT Act, developed with the assistance of experts in the Department's Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section of the Criminal Division (CEOS), has given the Department's prosecutors several new tools to combat sex trafficking and child prostitution. The Act makes it a crime for a United States citizen to travel in foreign commerce and engage in illicit sexual activity with minors,[33] and now includes an attempt provision.[34] Moreover, this Act facilitated prosecutions by eliminating the requirement that the Department prove that the traveler-predator intended to have sex with a child prior to traveling.

---

[33] Prosecutorial Remedies and Other Tools to end the Exploitation of Children Today (PROTECT) Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-21, 117 Stat. 650.

[34] PROTECT Act, Pub. L. No. 108-21 (codified as amended at 18 U.S.C. § 2423(c)).

DOJ_NMG_0008268

V. Halting Human Trafficking with a Record Number of Aggressive Investigations and Prosecutions

Since 2001, the Department has achieved a record number of human trafficking investigations and prosecutions through a unique victim-centered approach that focuses on three important themes: sex trafficking, labor trafficking, and child sex trafficking. Prosecutions of sex and labor trafficking depend for their success on the elements of force, fraud, or coercion that render the victim's role involuntary. Because trafficking is modern day slavery, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft designated the Civil Rights Division, in early 2001, as the principal architect of the Department's comprehensive response to human trafficking. The Civil Rights Division has collaborated with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Attorneys' Offices, the Criminal Division, and the Office of Justice Programs to uncover and investigate these criminal enterprises, to prosecute and hold traffickers accountable for their criminal conduct, and, most importantly, to rescue victims and return to them their dignity.

In 2004, the Federal Bureau of Investigation took an important step towards the vigorous investigation of trafficking crimes when it launched the Involuntary Servitude and Slavery/Trafficking in Persons Initiative. This Initiative has achieved important results in the manner in which the Bureau uncovers and investigates these cases in coordination with the Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions. Specifically, the Bureau's Civil Rights Unit, the primary Bureau agency charged with investigating federal civil rights statutes:

- Developed and disseminated a general human trafficking investigative protocol to all FBI field offices;
- Implemented commercial sex trafficking intelligence collection requirements and disseminated those requirements to every Bureau Field Intelligence Group;
- Established a mechanism for the Bureau to properly classify cases as human trafficking, alien smuggling, or child prostitution;
- Expanded the Bureau's outreach to national human trafficking victim advocacy organizations, such as The Freedom Network and the International Justice Mission to establish contacts and leverage partnerships.
- Commenced, in October 2005, human trafficking threat assessments in each of the nation's 56 Bureau Field Offices. The threat assessments are intended to help the Bureau determine the nature and scope of human trafficking and to develop a more informed response to this criminal activity. Field Offices will be guided by this analysis in determining whether to establish or enhance their participation in local anti-human trafficking task forces, including establishing relationships with local non-governmental organizations and more aggressive involvement in investigations by federal, state and local law enforcement;[35] and
- Created, in November 2005, a case tracking database to track and maintain important human trafficking related data from the Bureau's Field Offices regarding the

---

[35] Fed. Bureau of Invest., Human Trafficking Initiative Elec. Commc'n to all Field Offices (Oct. 21, 2005).

DOJ_NMG_0008269

Department's prosecutorial decisions, identifying emerging trends and reporting significant events in the field to the Bureau's Civil Rights Unit.

A. Sex Trafficking

"We have all the ingredients they want....We have a migrant workforce and a legal sex trade."

-Gerald Gardner, Nevada Deputy Attorney General and Las Vegas Office Chief, at a press conference inaugurating the Department's Las Vegas Anti-Human Trafficking Task Force, Las Vegas Sun, September 29, 2004

Human trafficking typically manifests itself in compelled service either for forced labor or in the "sex industry." Sadly, in both areas, sexual abuse of female victims is common.

Sex trafficking is both a crime and phenomenon. The TVPA's "sex trafficking" statute[36] makes it illegal to use force or coercion to obtain persons for commercial sexual activity, with special provisions regarding the involvement of minors. Other activities that the Department considers part of the phenomenon of sex trafficking, such as servitude for non-commercial sexual activity or compelled service in strip clubs or other non-prostitution sectors of the sex industry, are properly prosecuted under traditional slavery statutes or even the forced labor statute, but are no less components of sex trafficking than commercial sexual activity.

The increase in sex trafficking cases filed and prosecuted by the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices over the past five years is staggering. Between fiscal years 2001 and 2005, federal prosecutors filed 68 cases of sex trafficking, a 870% increase over the seven cases the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices filed between fiscal years 1996 and 2000. Also during that same time period, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices charged 187 defendants with sex trafficking, a 450% increase over the 34 defendants` charged between fiscal years 1996 and 2000. In addition to the new records set in investigations and prosecutions of sex trafficking, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices have achieved impressive results in convicting traffickers. From fiscal years 2001 to 2005, federal prosecutors obtained the convictions of 109 sex trafficking defendants, a 445% increase over the 20 defendants convicted during the previous five fiscal year period.

Insert graphic depicting the rate of increase FY '96-'05.

Sex trafficking may occur in any American community–urban, suburban or rural–and involves

[36] 18 U.S.C. § 1591.

DOJ_NMG_0008270

both aliens and United States citizens. Sex trafficking can occur in bars, farm worker camps, and sex entertainment and prostitution enterprises. The traffickers are endlessly inventive. While the public stereotype of these cases involve large scale international organized crime syndicates, forced prostitution cases often involve groups of family members or even individual pimps. In United States v. Jimenez-Calderon, a group of family members recruited women and girls from the Mexican state of Tlaxclala to come to the United States with promises of love, only to hold them in prostitution through force and threats to them and to their families in Mexico.[37] The lead defendant in Jimenez-Calderon received a sentence of 17 years of incarceration following her guilty plea.[38]

Cases involving United States citizen victims that might not have been brought under the Mann Act are now being brought using the TVPA sex trafficking statute, which does not require interstate travel. In United States v. Gates and Heyward, two persons pled guilty in 2004 to sex trafficking for running an internet prostitution business from their home, at times using girls as young as 14 to perform sexual acts. Defendant Gates, who beat the women who disobeyed him and provided drugs to support some of the women's addictions, was sentenced to more than 14 ½ years in prison. His co-defendant girlfriend, Heyward, received a sentence of 9 years of incarceration.[39]

Many cases involving individuals from countries of the former Soviet republic in the past few years have involved compelled service in "exotic dancing." In United States v. Gasanov, a husband and wife were convicted at trial and sentenced to serving five years in prison and paying $516,150 in restitution for bringing Uzbeki women to El Paso, Texas, under the guise of a student researcher exchange program, only to hold them in compelled service in strip clubs by confiscating their immigration documents, known as document servitude, and making threats against their families.[40] In United States v. Maksimenko, five persons have pled guilty as of December 19, 2005, for their roles in a scheme to enslave Ukrainian women in Detroit-area strip clubs through threats and extortion.[41]

Sometimes victims are held in sexual slavery without any commercial aspect. In United States v. Soto, eight men were convicted in 2003 for their roles in an alien smuggling organization that would hold vulnerable alien women as "concubines," forcing them to cook, clean, and submit to the sexual demands of the alien smugglers through force, threats, and punitive rape. The lead defendant in the Soto case was sentenced to 23 years of incarceration following his guilty plea.[42]

In some communities, women are imported to work as "bargirls." While this is not technically sex trafficking under the TVPA, as it does not involve a sex act, the women are treated as sex

---

37 United States v. Jiminez-Calderon, No. 02-00553-3, (D.N.J. 2003).
38 Id.
39 United States v. Gates and Heyward, [insert case information].
40 United States v. Gazanov, [insert case information].
41 United States v. Maksimento, [insert case information].
42 United States v. Soto, [insert case information].

DOJ_NMG_0008271

objects and forced to entertain male bar patrons, dancing and drinking with them at their pleasure. In United States v. Kang, for example, a Korean couple lured Korean women to New York City with promises of good jobs as hostesses in the their nightclub, but subjected them to physical abuse, held them for repayment of a $10,000 debt, and attempted to force them into prostitution.[43] Seven defendants have pled guilty to forced labor and obstruction of justice charges. The defendants include a Federal Air Marshal and a Department of Homeland Security agent, who attempted to force one of the victims to get on a flight to South Korea to keep her from testifying against the Kangs.[44] In another "bargirl" case, United States v. Molina, six Hondurans in Ft. Worth, Texas, received sentences of up to 5 years and 3 months of incarceration following their guilty pleas for harboring the women and making them repay their alien smuggling debts by entertaining the male patrons of the defendants' bars.[45]

B. Labor Trafficking

Labor trafficking occurs when a victim is forced to work in an area of the economy that would otherwise be a legal form of labor, absent the coercion. This phenomenon commonly is found in farms, factories, and households. Similar to sex trafficking, if a person is subjected to coercive force such that he cannot leave his employer's service, he is considered a victim regardless of whether he initially chose to perform that type of work, or even if he receives some pay for his labor. There is no requirement that the victim be transported by the defendant.

The increase in labor trafficking cases brought by the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices over the past five years is also significant. Between fiscal years 2001 and 2005, the Civil Rights Division and United States Attorneys' Offices filed 23 labor trafficking cases, an increase of 110% over the 11 labor trafficking cases the federal prosecutors filed between fiscal years 1996 and 2000. In these cases, 61 defendants were charged with labor trafficking, an increase of 33% over the 46 defendants the charged during the previous five fiscal year period.

Insert graphic depicting the rate of increase FY '96-'05.

As in sex trafficking cases, vulnerable United States citizens may find themselves trapped in a forced labor situation, unable to escape because of threats or coercion. For example, in United States v. Michael Lee, the defendants recruited homeless African-American men for their orange-picking operation. Once employed, the workers were involuntarily retained by beatings, threats, and a "company store" debt run up by short-term loans for rent, food, cigarettes, and cocaine. The defendants were convicted in 2001 and received prison terms of up to 4 ½ years of incarceration.[46]

---

43 United States v. Kang,[insert case information].

44 Id.

45 United States v. Molina, [insert case information].

46 United States v. Michael Lee, [insert case information].

DOJ_NMG_0008272

Forced labor situations often appear in parts of the agricultural sector that require "stoop labor." One such case, United States v. Garcia,[47] involved the first successful defense of the TVPA against a constitutional challenge. In that case, four defendants received sentences of up to nearly 4 years of incarceration in 2005 for recruiting young undocumented Mexican aliens from the Arizona border and transporting them to New York with false promises of good wages, only to force them to work in the fields for little or no pay and house them in overcrowded and filthy conditions through threats to turn them over to the Border Patrol.[48] In their constitutional challenge, the defendants argued that the TVPA was unconstitutionally vague, inviting arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement, and that Congress exceeded its authority in enacting it because it did not involve interstate commerce. A federal district court disagreed and found that the TVPA's terms were clear and provide adequate notice of the conduct it prohibits.[49] It also found that Congress had the power to enact the TVPA under the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution.[50]

Insert Image of "Ramos Van Attack"

