In another example of forced "stoop labor," three brothers were convicted in 2002 in United States v. Ramos[51] for using threats and debt bondage to hold migrant workers in their employment for the duration of the harvesting season, and for assaulting the owner of a transportation service to cut off any avenue of escape the workers might have had from the area. The Ramos brothers were sentenced to 15 years of incarceration and ordered to forfeit $3 million

---

47 United States v. Garcia, No. 02-110, 2003 WL 22938040 (W.D.N.Y. 2003).

48 Garcia, 2003 WL 22938040.

49 Id. at 2.

50 Id.

51 United States v. Ramos, [insert case information].

DOJ_NMG_0008273

in proceeds from their slavery operation.

Domestic servant cases continue to be a regular part of the Department's forced labor portfolio. Sadly, in many of these cases the young female victims are subjected not only to long hours and low pay for their work as nannies and maids, but suffer sexual abuse at the hands of their captors as well.

For instance, in United States v. Mubang,[52] a Cameroonian woman was convicted of bringing an eleven year-old girl to the United States illegally and under false pretenses. Once the girl was in America, she was forced to care for the defendant's two children and perform all the household chores without pay. The defendant forced the victim to comply by beating her with a broken metal broom stick and a cable cord, forbidding her from speaking of her employment conditions to anyone, forbidding her from leaving the house or opening the door to anyone, and interfering with her mail. Mubang fled the country soon after her conviction but was returned to the United States in 2005 through the assistance of the Cameroonian government. She is currently serving a sentence of 17 ½ years of incarceration.

Similarly, in 2004, in United States v. Trisanti, a Los Angeles woman was convicted of involuntary servitude for trafficking two victims into the United States from Indonesia and forcing them to work as domestic servants through threats and physical violence. Trisanti was sentenced to 46 months in prison and ordered to pay $203,000 in restitution.[53]

C. Child Sex Trafficking

"Our society has no place for those who prey on children and no tolerance for child prostitution or sex trafficking."

–Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, December 16, 2005.

Within the Department, CEOS historically has taken the leading role in overseeing the prosecution of cases of sex trafficking of minors. Sex trafficking in children occurs when persons under the age of 18 are provided or obtained for a commercial sex act. Prior to the passage of the TVPA, this aspect of human trafficking was traditionally dealt with by law enforcement under the label "Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children" (CSEC), and all states have statutes criminalizing child prostitution. It is a continuing challenge to incorporate long-established child protective services, family court, and anti-CSEC activities and programs into the anti-trafficking effort.

Usually, when people commit crimes, the best the criminal justice system can do is punish the offender and occasionally have him repay the out-of-pocket expenses of the victims. This plea not only does that, but attempts to give the victims future opportunities for treatment, counseling, and even an education.

-Tim Burgess, United States Attorney for the District of Alaska, announcing the plea agreement in United States v. Boehm on March 19, 2004.

[52] United States v. Mubang, [insert case information].

[53] United States v. Trisanti, [insert case information].

DOJ_NMG_0008274

Like other forms of trafficking, child sex trafficking can occur in any community. The TVPA supplemented the Mann Act, which prohibits the interstate transportation of persons for prostitution, by extending federal jurisdiction to situations in which the pimps did not cross a state line with their minor victims. In recent years, the Department has prosecuted cases of child sex trafficking across the nation. In United States v Boehm,[54] for example, four persons pled guilty to sex trafficking of children, among other charges. In 2001, Boehm, along with his co-defendants, agreed to distribute cocaine and cocaine base to persons under the age of 21 and to recruit minors for sexual purposes in exchange for money and crack cocaine. All five defendants were sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from 3 years to more than 13 years and Boehm, as part of his plea agreement, also forfeited his residence and provided $1.2 million in trust for the future benefit of his victims.[55] The trust fund will compensate Boehm's victims for expenses to drug treatment, counseling and can be used for educational and professional training expenses.

An important vehicle for the Department's efforts to combat child sex trafficking is the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Innocence Lost Initiative. Launched in 2003, the Innocence Lost Initiative is implemented by the Bureau's Violent Crimes and Major Offenders Section, in partnership with CEOS, United States Attorneys' Offices, and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (NCMEC) to address the problem of domestic child prostitution in the United States. The Department's Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention has supported NCMEC's training activities in connection with this Initiative with an approximate total of $126,000 since 2004. The Violent Crimes and Major Offenders Section first identified 14 Bureau Field Offices located in areas where there is a high incidence of prostituted children. The Section then asked each of these offices to establish a task force to address the problem through a variety of federal criminal statutes including the Mann Act, TVPA, and RICO,[56] where appropriate, to neutralize the entire criminal enterprise. The Section asked the remaining 42 Bureau Field Offices to assess whether the localities they serve have a substantial child prostitution problem.

Insert map of Initiative Lost Task Force locations

As of September 30, 2005, Innocence Lost Initiative Task Forces have been instituted in Atlantic City, New Jersey; Boston, Massachusetts; Chicago, Illinois; Detroit, Michigan; Harrisburg, Pennsylvania; Houston, Texas; Indianapolis, Indiana; Los Angeles, California; Miami, Florida; Tampa, Florida; Toledo, Ohio; Portland, Oregon; San Francisco, California; and Washington, D.C. In connection with this initiative, federal law enforcement agencies, prosecutors, and social service providers from were brought to NCMEC's Washington, D.C.-area offices, where the 54 United States v. Boehm, [insert case information].

---

55 Id.

56 RICO, 18 U.S.C. § 1961, et seq.

DOJ_NMG_0008275

groups from the same jurisdiction were trained together in order to cultivate cooperation, partnership, and an effective integration among the critical enforcement entities in each city. To date, more than 350 key personnel have been trained. As a result of the Department's substantial investigatory efforts through this Initiative, CEOS has seen a marked increase in the number of requests from both Assistant United States Attorneys and Bureau agents in the field for advice, guidance, and co-counsel on child prostitution cases.

More importantly, on December 16, 2005, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales announced that more than 30 child victims were recently identified in connection with the latest phase of Innocence Lost, bringing the total of child victims identified to more than 200 since the Innocence Lost Initiative began. This latest effort resulted in the arrest of 19 individuals. Between 2004 and 2005, the Innocence Lost Initiative has resulted in 139 open investigations, 505 arrests, 60 complaints, 70 indictments, and 67 convictions.

Child sex trafficking may also involve child sex tourism, which occurs when individuals travel to foreign countries to engage in sexual acts with children, who are often the victims of trafficking. As with non-coerced child prostitution, CEOS has taken the leading role in overseeing the development of anti-sex tourism policies and resulting prosecutions. United States Attorneys' Offices nationwide, with guidance or co-counsel assistance from CEOS, have obtained at least 50 sex tourism indictments or complaints and a minimum of 29 convictions between 2003 and 2005 under the PROTECT Act, with approximately 60 investigations currently pending.

In 2003, in the first prosecution under the PROTECT Act, Michael Clark, who had been arrested in Cambodia for sexually abusing two Cambodian boys (ages 10 and 13), was charged with attempting to engage in illicit sexual conduct after travel in foreign commerce. Clark pled guilty to the charges and was sentenced to 8 years of imprisonment. In connection with his plea, Clark reserved the right to appeal the constitutionality of the PROTECT Act, arguing that Congress exceeded its power to enact criminal laws that do not involve interstate commerce and that criminalizing activities in a foreign country violate his right to due process and international law. Clarks' appeal is currently pending before the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals.[57]

Also in 2003, in United States v. Russell,[58] an American man was prosecuted when an investigation revealed that he had traveled to the Philippines on numerous occasions over a two-year period in order to engage in sexual acts with children and to produce child pornography for the purpose of importation into the United States. At least three Philippine children have been identified as victims of Russell, who pled guilty and was sentenced to more than 3 years of imprisonment.

D. Inter-Agency Coordination

Implementation of the President's directive to combat human trafficking requires meaningful

---

[57] United States v. Clark, 315 F. Supp. 2d 1127 (W.D. Wash. 2004).

[58] United States v. Russell, [insert case information].

DOJ_NMG_0008276

inter-agency coordination. Much of the coordination has been accomplished through the President's Inter-Agency Task Force to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, and subsequently the Senior Policy Operating Group, discussed above. In connection with these efforts, the Department has engaged with other federal agencies to create additional vehicles of inter-agency coordination.

The most significant achievement in this regard is the Department's support of the Human Smuggling and Trafficking Center, administered by the Department of Homeland Security and led by a steering committee comprised of representatives from the Department, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Department of Homeland Security. The Center provides a mechanism to bring together federal agency representatives from policy, law enforcement, intelligence, and diplomatic areas to work together on a full-time basis to achieve increased effectiveness among federal law enforcement and to convert intelligence about human trafficking, alien smuggling, and clandestine terrorist travel into effective law enforcement activities. Analysts accomplish this function by identifying issues related to migrant smuggling or trafficking in persons and then forward their findings to the relevant federal agencies or interagency organizations for consideration and appropriate action. The Center has been under development since mid-2004 and shortly thereafter started initial operations. It is poised to become fully functional in the very near future.

In addition, the Department in July 2004 entered into a Memorandum of Understanding with the Department of Homeland Security and the Department of Health and Human Services streamlining protocols for the Health and Human Services ("HHS") certification of victims (or in the case of minors, eligibility letters) rescued in connection with Department of Justice or Homeland Security law enforcement efforts. A determination by HHS that victims have suffered a "severe form of trafficking" enables these individuals to qualify for federally funded or administered benefits and services to the same extent as refugees.[59] The agreement also marked an important step towards the coordination of treatment of potential trafficking victims by agents of the Departments of Homeland Security and Justice through better information sharing. It is important to note that at least 30% of the investigations filed by the Department since 2001 were initiated by agents of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

E. Coordination Within the Department of Justice

The Department's anti-trafficking investigative and prosecution strategy requires effective intra-agency collaboration to bring the specialties of each component to bear on these multi-faceted, complex, and labor-intensive criminal cases. The following components are important contributors to the Department's activities in support of the President's directive to combat human trafficking:

- The Civil Rights Division, particularly its Criminal Section
- The Criminal Division, particularly its Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section,

---

[59] TVPA, 22 U.S.C. §§ 7105(b)(1)(A), (B), and (E).

DOJ_NMG_0008277

Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, Domestic Security Section, International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program, Office of International Affairs, Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training, and Organized Crime and Racketeering Section

- The Executive Office of United States Attorneys and United States Attorneys' Offices nationwide
- The Federal Bureau of Investigation, and its Field Offices
- The Office of Community Oriented Policing Services
- The Office of Justice Programs, particularly its Bureau of Justice Assistance, Bureau of Justice Statistics, National Institute of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, and Office for Victims of Crime
- The Office of Legal Policy
- The Office of Legislative Affairs
- The Office on Violence Against Women

Representatives from the Civil Rights Division, the Criminal Division, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation meet periodically to share information and to identify ways to leverage resources to identify and combat trafficking in persons, among other criminal activity. In addition, the Office of Legal Policy convenes regular meetings of Department of Justice components to coordinate the development of policies regarding the Department's anti-human trafficking activities. The Criminal Section of the Civil Rights Division, in early 2003, authored a comprehensive legal monograph on trafficking issues to assist United States Attorney personnel in the field to prosecute trafficking cases more effectively. The monograph has been distributed at the Department's training center, the National Advocacy Center, at human trafficking training workshops.

Both the Civil Rights Division and CEOS publish newsletters that provide valuable information regarding human trafficking prosecutions, case analysis, and developments that are important to the work of other Departmental components and the non-governmental organizations that advocate on behalf of trafficking victims. The Civil Rights Division provides investigators, prosecutors, and victim assistance professionals with technical assistance regarding human trafficking and keeps the field of trafficking victim advocates informed about the Division's efforts to prevent and prosecute this crime. And, since 2003, the quarterly CEOS newsletter has discussed issues of sex tourism and trafficking in all but two editions.

From the time that the TVPA was enacted, the Department recognized that alien smuggling, document fraud, and various forms of human trafficking, while constituting separate offenses, can be integrally related, as discussed above.[60] The trafficking of victims across international borders virtually always involves alien smuggling, also possibly including some type of fraud or misrepresentation. Perhaps the most direct manifestation of cooperation between the Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions is that in 2002 the Civil Rights Division detailed several experienced attorneys to the Criminal Division's Alien Smuggling Task Force for a three-year period. Over the past three years, Civil Rights prosecutors have targeted the criminal infrastructure that makes international trafficking possible. Examples include successful prosecutions involving the fraudulent adoption of Cambodian babies, the sexual exploitation of Estonian women employed in massage parlors, and large-scale fraudulent leasing of foreign workers to major U.S. companies. The three-year details, which recently ended, demonstrate the concrete, effective results that can be obtained through innovative approaches to anti-trafficking cooperation.

---

[60] See, Part I "An Introduction to Human Trafficking."

DOJ_NMG_0008278

The Department has taken a number of steps to ensure that its components are well trained in the Department's strategy of victim-centered, proactive investigations:

- In October 2002, the Civil Rights Division organized comprehensive anti-trafficking training for federal prosecutors and agents at the Department's training facility, the National Advocacy Center, in Columbia, South Carolina. Approximately 150 federal prosecutors and agents attended the training.

- In November 2002 the Attorney General issued "blue sheets" for prosecutors, outlining the new TVPA crimes and adding guidance regarding the prosecution of such crimes to the U.S. Attorneys' Manual. The "blue sheets" highlight human trafficking as a priority and provide a comprehensive source of information and resources within the Department and with related agencies.

- In fiscal year 2003, the Civil Rights Division provided periodic training at the Federal Bureau of Investigation training center in Quantico, Virginia for Bureau and Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents.

- In January 2004, the Civil Rights Division and the Executive Office of United States Attorneys' Office of Legal Education hosted a comprehensive training session for federal agents and prosecutors at the Department's National Advocacy Center. Furthermore, the Civil Rights Division actively participates in human trafficking training sessions at United States Attorneys' Offices as part of the regular curriculum offered to Federal Bureau of Investigation, Department of Homeland Security Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and Department of State Diplomatic Security Service agents.

DOJ_NMG_0008279

VI. The Department's Collateral Attack on Human Traffickers

A. Multi-Disciplinary Task Force Initiative

The Department has designed, developed, and instituted locally based, multi-disciplinary task forces to investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases. These task forces embody the Department's victim-centered approach because they are specifically engineered to aid in uncovering victims, providing them with immediate protection and support, and then working with them to further investigate and prosecute the trafficker.

In July 2004, the Department hosted the first ever National Training Conference on Human Trafficking: Rescuing Women and Children From Slavery, in Tampa, Florida. The National Conference was designed to introduce the model of victim-centered investigations and the concept of human trafficking prosecutions through the creation of local task forces. Hosted by the Department and with a keynote speech by President Bush, the conference brought together more than 500 attendees, consisting of 21 teams of about 20 state, local, and federal officials who were willing to thereafter work together to combat human trafficking in their respective communities across America. Teams included the following members: United States Attorneys or designated Assistant United States Attorneys; Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement Special Agents-In-Charge; Federal Bureau of Investigation Special Agents-In-Charge; local law enforcement agency special crimes and victim units; state and local prosecutors; and governmental and non-governmental organizations, especially faith and community-based victim service providers. The Department invited teams from the following jurisdictions that the Civil Rights Division identified as the most intense trafficking jurisdictions in the country at that time: Atlanta, Charlotte, Chicago, El Paso, Houston, Las Vegas, Long Island, Los Angeles, Miami, Newark, New Orleans, New York City, Washington, D.C., Philadelphia, Phoenix, Richmond, San Diego, San Francisco, St. Louis, Seattle, and Tampa.

President Bush, along with then-Attorney General John Ashcroft, announced this important new initiative on July 16, 2004 at the Department's National Conference on Human Trafficking, where the President condemned human trafficking as an affront to America's fundamental values and committed his Administration to combating trafficking on every level at home and abroad. Regarding domestic efforts to combat trafficking, the President remarked, "We're supporting organizations that rescue the victims, passing stronger anti-trafficking laws, and warning travelers that they will be held to account for supporting this modern form of slavery. Women and children should never be exploited for pleasure or greed, anywhere on Earth."

Then-Attorney General John Ashcroft set forth the Department's comprehensive anti-trafficking strategy: protecting the victims, prosecuting the perpetrators, and partnership-building that addresses, attacks, and prevents human trafficking. The Attorney General also noted that the Bush Administration had, up to that time, provided more than $35 million in funding to community-based service providers that aid trafficking victims, and he announced a further $14 million in support of the Department's task force initiative. Concurrently with the National Conference, the Department issued a funding solicitation, entitled Law Enforcement and Service Provider Multi-disciplinary Anti-Trafficking Task Forces. The solicitation urged applicants to leverage existing federally-funded victim services efforts and to mirror the victim-focused federal, state, and non-governmental partnership that was the theme of the Conference. In the fall of 2004, the Bureau of Justice Assistance and the Office for Victims of Crime issued a joint solicitation for concept papers to continue the coordinated law enforcement task forces and victim services initiatives. Federal funds made available through this solicitation were intended to support task forces or supplemental funding of current trafficking victim service providers in areas with pre-existing Bureau of Justice Assistance-funded task forces.

DOJ_NMG_0008280

"The conference program provided a model of collaboration among service providers and law enforcement and underscored the necessity of teamwork in working to keep victims of trafficking front and center in both the prosecution and service delivery areas-it was a great kick off for the task force initiative."

-Florrie Burke, Senior Director of International Programs, Anti-Trafficking Program, SOLACE Program for Survivors of Torture

Task forces add to the Department's law enforcement resources the intelligence and expertise of locally-based immigration agents, local community- and faith-based social service providers, and local law enforcement, particularly special crimes and vice squads. These task forces recognize that local authorities, often more than federal officials, may be in the best position to find trafficking victims because of their familiarity with their jurisdictions, but might need the training and support of the federal government to recognize this crime for what it is. The Department has too often seen in federal investigations police reports indicating that local officers responded to complaints but failed to stop the ongoing exploitation of trafficking victims simply because they were not trained to recognize trafficking situations. The task force approach leverages local knowledge and staff resources with strong federal statutes. Indeed, victims rescued in United States v. Reddy,[61] United States v. Molina,[62] and United States v. Ramos[63] were brought to the Department's attention through the activities of state and local law enforcement. Moreover, they [61] See, Part I "An Introduction to Human Trafficking" above for a discussion about United States v. Reddy.

---

[62] See, Part V "Halting Human Trafficking with a Record Number of Aggressive Investigations and Prosecutions," section B "Labor Trafficking" above for a discussion about United State v. Molina.

[63] See, Part V "Halting Human Trafficking with a Record Number of Aggressive Investigations and Prosecutions," section B "Labor Trafficking" above for a discussion about United State v. Ramos.

DOJ_NMG_0008281

serve as a way to incorporate the non-governmental crime victim services organizations, funded by federal grant awards, into the law enforcement activities in their area. Local community- and faith-based organizations are essential to reaching those victims in communities that are isolated by geography, culture, or language.

The task force convened by the United States Attorney's Office for the Northern District of Texas presents an illustration. In 2004, the United States Attorney for the Northern District of Texas established a working group consisting of representatives from the police departments of the Dallas-Fort Worth area, including Arlington, Coppell, Garland, Grant, Prarie, Irving, and Richardson, and representatives from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Internal Revenue Service, and Department of Labor. The group's faith and community-based partners include several charitable organizations such as Catholic Charities and Mosaic Family Services, Inc., which received a grant from the Department of provide victim services and to assist with the formation and implementation of this program.

Just prior to the conference, the Department had begun work on eight task forces. Immediately following the National Conference, the Department embarked on a 20-city training initiative designed to reinforce the training received at the National Conference and to institute nearly two dozen task forces. Within a year of the National Conference, 18 task forces were operating with Departmental support. There are now 32 task forces.

Insert graphic of the United States depicting the location of the 32 jurisdictions with task forces.

Each of the 32 task forces, funded in part through $13 million in grants from the Department's Bureau of Justice Assistance and the Office for Victims of Crime since fiscal year 2004, is coordinated through the local United States Attorney's Office and includes representatives of local FBI field offices and Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement as well state and local law enforcement and social services agencies. In order to receive Department of Justice funding support and the assistance of the local United States Attorney, local law enforcement agencies and victim service providers are required to enter into a Memorandum of Understanding with all task force members committing themselves to collaborating together on investigations and assistance to victims. Applicants were invited to design task forces that best suited the needs of their local communities, and many task forces involve faith-based and other community organizations in their work. At their core, task forces include the local United States Attorney's Office; Federal Bureau of Investigation Field Offices; Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents; state and local law enforcement agencies; and social services agencies, including community-based victim services providers. As of June 2005, with reporting based only on the first six months of operation by the 18 task forces that existed at that time, 61 victims of severe trafficking had been identified and many more victims were rescued from environments where trafficking was occurring.

DOJ_NMG_0008282

The Houston (Harris County, Texas) trafficking task force provides a meaningful illustration of the work and potential of the Department's multi-disciplinary task forces. In 2004, concerned that trafficking might fall into the cracks between civil rights and organized crime enforcement programs, the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas formed the Human Trafficking Rescue Alliance with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Harris County Sheriff's Department, and a number of non-governmental organizations who had recently come together on the issue. The Rescue Alliance began with listening sessions of the stakeholders and moved to joint training for law enforcement and other community groups. Rescue Alliance members attended the Department's National Training Conference on Human Trafficking in Florida in July 2004, and pledged themselves to work together to combat trafficking. When the Bureau of Justice Assistance called for grant proposals, the working group was ready with a task force proposal that built upon and solidified their relationships. As the profile of this issue has grown, so has the demand for training on the part of state and local law enforcement, and the most recent training opportunity sponsored by this task force in November 2005 drew more than 300 participants. The United States Attorney's Office worked closely with the Civil Rights Division on training and task force development. As a result, they were able to transition seamlessly into jointly prosecuting cases when they arose. The regular meetings of the Rescue Alliance have solidified the relationship of the law enforcement participants with the Office for Victims of Crime and Health and Human Services victim-services grantees such as the YMCA of Houston and Catholic Charities.

Insert image of Houston Chronicle Article,
8/14/04 regarding creation of task force

One novel aspect of the Rescue Alliance has been to place Harris County Sheriff's Deputies with vice-squad experience in Federal Bureau of Investigation and Immigration and Customs Enforcement Field Offices on the squads tasked with trafficking investigations. Especially in the Federal Bureau of Investigation office, having a full-time investigator with extensive knowledge of the local landscape was invaluable, and his activities served as a catalyst for the other agents on the task force to work pro-actively to identify and dismantle trafficking rings. The inclusion of agents from the Texas Alcohol and Beverage Commission has proven instrumental in the success of the Rescue Alliance.

As a result of operations by the Rescue Alliance, two large-scale trafficking operations resulted in federal human trafficking indictments in the Houston area in the fall of 2005 -- one involving allegations of Mexican women and girls forced into prostitution and another involving allegations that dozens of Central American women and girls were held in peonage in a "bargirl" operation. These prosecutions, which are pending at the time of this report,[64] could not have happened without the interagency approach and close cooperation with non-governmental service providers and advocacy groups that was fostered and intensified through the Bureau of Justice Assistance grant. The Rescue Alliance is an example of an energized and successful task force effort that successfully blends state, local, and federal personnel, across traditional organized crime and civil rights approaches, to work with the non-governmental community to act in the best interests of the victim while seeking justice.

DOJ_NMG_0008283

The Bureau of Justice Assistance, in collaboration with other federal partners, provides ongoing training and technical assistance to task forces. In 2005, the Bureau of Justice Assistance, in collaboration with the Civil Rights Division, the Office for Victims of Crime, and other experts, developed a specific training curriculum for law enforcement officers nationwide who may come into contact with trafficking victims, entitled Human Trafficking in the United States, Promoting Law Enforcement Awareness. The curriculum is a flexible, one-day training course educating law enforcement officers about the basics of the phenomenon of human trafficking and a victim-centered approach to proactive investigation of potential cases. The curriculum provides an introduction to human trafficking, its victims, and offenders; a legal overview with a focus on the TVPA; investigative considerations and techniques; an overview of the role of victim service providers; the need for victim services and the types of services available; and immigration matters, including the role of immigration officials and remedies available to victims. The training program also reviews lessons on understanding the need for a formal multi-disciplinary approach towards human trafficking and an understanding of the important role of the community in law enforcement efforts. The training curriculum is unique in that it incorporates multimedia learning and each participant is provided with multimedia resources to be used in training other officers and building greater community awareness and support. The course is taught by seasoned investigators who have handled trafficking cases as well as national experts on trafficking issues.

In February 2005, the Bureau of Justice Assistance convened a conference of the 22 nascent task forces that had been instituted by that time. More than 115 individuals attended. Federal participants in the conference included representatives from within the Department as well the Departments of Homeland Security and Health and Human Services. The focus of the conference was to explain the degree of collaboration needed among federal, state, and local law enforcement, prosecution, and victim services agencies in order to effectively rescue victims and prosecute traffickers. Task force members

> The Human Trafficking Task Forces are just the approach we need to combat human trafficking. With all of us working as a team we will be more effective in this endeavor than we would be if we tried to combat human trafficking individually.
>
> – Lt. Bill Rule, Collier County Sheriff's Office, Victim Services Bureau

[64] An indictment contains only charges and is not evidence of guilt. The defendants in these and any other cases cited in this report in which convictions have not been obtained are presumed innocent and are entitled to a fair trial at which the government has the burden of proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

DOJ_NMG_0008284

were trained using the Human Trafficking in the United States, Promoting Law Enforcement Awareness curriculum, described above. Future cross-training of task force members will enable the Department to build on that effort by sharing best practices and linking the groups' efforts across geographical lines.

B. Restoring Victims' Dignity

As discussed above[65], the Department places a premium on the recovery of trafficking victims. Federal investigators and prosecutors will therefore immediately refer a victim to victim service professionals for immediate care. In many cases, the referral process and the provision of services is expedited through relationships already established by task force partners. Some task forces have created innovative ways to connect victims identified through law enforcement activity with services. The United States Attorney's Office for the Middle District of Florida, for example, developed a compendium of victim service providers for use by task force members in Fort Myers, Jacksonville, and Tampa. The task force in Indianapolis, Indiana, coordinated through the United States Attorney's Office for the District of Indiana, has as partner the Indianapolis Family Justice Center. The Family Justice Center, created in connection with President Bush's Family Justice Initiative, a program that is administered by the Office on Violence Against Women, co-locates services to families involved in domestic violence. Making this Center the coordinator of services to victims of human trafficking makes the response to victims more efficient and effective.

Once potential cases of trafficking are uncovered, victims may become eligible for important services that help to keep them safe as they recover from their victimization. Trafficking victims, like all crime victims, may be eligible for services and benefits under the Victims of Crime Act, a program administered by the Office for Victims of Crime.[66] The TVPA, as amended, created new protections for alien victims.[67] Under the TVPA, victims are afforded:

---

[65] See, Part III "The Department Responds to this Crime with a Victim-Centered Approach."

[66] The Crime Victims Fund, established by the Victims of Crime Act of 1984 (VOCA), is a major source of funding for victim services throughout the nation. The Office for Victims of Crime administers the Fund and distributes funding to the states on a formula basis to support crime victim assistance and crime victim compensation programs. Victim assistance includes lifeline victim services such as crisis intervention, emergency shelter and transportation, counseling, and criminal justice system advocacy. Crime victim compensation is a direct reimbursement to or on behalf of a crime victim for expenses such as medical costs. Trafficking victims may be eligible for support under the Crime Victims Fund, the TVPA, or both of these programs, depending on the circumstances of their cases and, in the case of the Crime Victims Fund, the specific guidelines of the state agency that administers the program.

[67] TVPA, Pub. L. No. 106-386 § 107(b)(1) (codified at 22 U.S.C. § 7105(b)(1)).

DOJ_NMG_0008285

- Immigration relief, in the form of an administrative change in immigration status known as "continued presence" as well as a temporary, non-immigrant visa known as the "T visa;"
- Access to refugee benefits;
- Adequate shelter, care, and protection;
- Legal assistance;
- Information & translation services; and
- Mandatory restitution.[68]

The TVPA authorizes similar victim services programs to be administered by the Department of Health and Human Services, thus requiring a significant amount of coordination between the Office for Victims of Crime and the Department of Health and Human Services. In 2004, the Office for Victims of Crime initiated regular coordination meetings with the Office of Refugee Resettlement, its counterpart agency at HHS, known as the Human Trafficking Victim Services Coordination Working Group. This coordination is specifically intended to avoid any duplication in services to trafficking victims as both HHS and the Office for Victims crime may fund grantees that provide services to pre-certified victims. Consequently, grantees funded by the Office for Victims of Crime under the TVPA only provide services to victims of trafficking before they are certified as victims of a "severe form of trafficking" by the Department of Health and Human Services.

Insert quote from a victim impact statement

Since fiscal year 2003, the Office for Victims of Crime has funded 20 victim service providers to assist pre-certified victims of trafficking in the United States, one grant to the Headquarters of the Salvation Army to work with their territorial divisions to provide shelter to trafficking victims, and one grant to an organization provide technical assistance. Since January 2003, Office for Victims of Crime-funded grantees have served 741 pre-certified trafficking victims. The Department, in cooperation with other law enforcement agencies, have assisted 687 victims to obtain continued presence immigration status, allowing them to remain in the country and to receive benefits and services.

The period between being rescued and receiving certification is the time when victims are most vulnerable and typically have a host of needs that includes housing, clothing, and food; medical, dental, and psychological care; legal assistance and immigration advocacy; and interpretation services. However, few organizations or communities have the resources to provide or fund these services. The Office for Victims of Crime grant program helps communities fill this critical service gap and, in the process, supports victims' abilities to cooperate with law enforcement. Immigrant victims are offered culturally and linguistically appropriate services and may, if needed, petition for T visas that would allow them to remain in the United States legally. Some organizations are specifically prepared to provide immediate, critical assistance in crisis situations until the services of a local victim service provider can be put in place.

---

[68] Id.

DOJ_NMG_0008286

The Office for Victims of Crime supports the work of the victim service providers it funds with technical assistance that is made available through workshops, on-site consultation, and via the internet. Training and technical assistance includes mentoring guides and safety protocols for both providers and clients. Grantees also provide training to local police and non-governmental organizations. Since fiscal year 2003, approximately 38,635 persons have been trained through the efforts of Office for Victims of Crime grantees. Training topics have included the dynamics of trafficking, the legal definition of trafficking under the TVPA, legal rights and services for trafficking victims, and cultural considerations in serving these victims. More important, the Office for Victims of Crime and the National Institute of Justice are studying effective approaches to victim service delivery and plan to publish an evaluation of field-tested services in 2006.

In addition to the work of the Office for Victims of Crime, the Office on Violence Against Women has, since 2001, funded more than $700,000 for technical assistance projects that assist Office on Violence Against Women grantees in providing services to trafficking victims. For example, Legal Momentum's Immigrant Women Program provides technical assistance to Office on Violence Against Women grantees to foster their ability to serve immigrant victims of domestic violence, sexual assault, and stalking. Because trafficking victims may seek services from Office on Violence Against Women grantees if they have also been a victim of domestic violence, sexual assault, or stalking, the Immigrant Women Program training workshops educate grantees about the availability of T- and U-visas, identifying whether a victim has been trafficked, barriers faced by trafficking victims who seek services, and conducting outreach to potential victims of trafficking. In addition, Legal Momentum has developed a nationwide directory of experts working with immigrant victims of domestic violence, sexual assault and stalking, which may be of use to trafficking victims who are also victims of these crimes. Nearly 950 attorneys and advocates have attended these workshops and another 150 will be trained within the next year. Another example is the Family Violence Prevention Fund, which used Office on Violence Against Women funding in 2003 to establish a project aimed at improving collaborative responses to trafficked victims of domestic violence and sexual assault. The main goal of the project was to build multi-disciplinary collaborations between service providers and law enforcement to effectively and appropriately assist trafficking victims in Georgia and Washington. Plans are underway to expand the project into Alaska.

C. Public Awareness Supports Pro-Active Investigations

Public awareness is essential to proactive investigations that uncover victims. In fact, the prosecutions in United States v. Kil Soo Lee[69], which resulted in the single largest rescue of [69] In this case, the Korean owner of a sweatshop in American Samoa held 200 Vietnamese and Chinese factory workers, who were brought to American Samoa to work as sewing machine operators in the Daewoosa Samoa garment factory in involuntary servitude. The workers were deprived of food, beaten, and physically restrained in order to force them to work for up to two years. Lee was convicted in 2001, and in June 2005 he was sentenced to 40 years in prison.

---

DOJ_NMG_0008287

trafficking victims in the Department's history, and United States v. Soto[70] were brought to the attention of federal law enforcement through referrals by non-governmental organizations that work with populations at risk for trafficking. The Department works to motivate communities, especially anti-human trafficking task forces, to increase awareness among law enforcement, various government inspectors (especially health code, wage and hour, and occupational safety and health agents), hospitals and other medical providers, social services agencies, and community- and faith-based organizations.

Increased outreach and public awareness is critical to the investigation and prosecution of human trafficking cases. Since 2003, the Department has made available a brochure describing its processes and resources to assist non-governmental organizations in dealing with trafficking victims and the Department in a more efficient way. Through outreach, America's communities – particularly immigrant communities – are better educated about this crime and how to report possible cases. Moreover, increased public awareness about this crime and the benefits available to its victims can eliminate important aspects of the leverage that traffickers hold over their victims.

As a result, all components speak publicly about trafficking and the Department's activities to combat this crime to state, local, and foreign legislators, law enforcement officers, prosecutors, and non-governmental victim advocacy and services organizations. The Civil Rights Division, for example, has delivered more than 200 presentations around the nation since fiscal year 2001. Office for Victims of Crime grants to 21 human trafficking victim service providers under the TVPA include funding to increase public awareness in the communities they serve. Civil Rights Division representatives continuously emphasize the important role that faith and community-based organizations can play. Because of their proximity to the communities they serve, they can provide immense intelligence about potential criminal enterprises and trafficking victims, provide immediate, crisis care, and long term programs that help to prevent further victimization. The Federal Bureau of Investigation Civil Rights Unit has appeared on national television and local radio programs which highlight, define, and expose trafficking to the general public, including CNBC, Donny Deutche's The Big Idea, and WMAL AM 630's "Danger Zone" with Richard Carlson, a Washington, D.C.-area radio program. The Civil Rights Unit has also provided human trafficking-related training presentations at various non-governmental conferences, such as the International Association of Labor Standards Annual Conference in

"We must make it as easy as possible for these victims to know that aid and comfort have arrived. The Catholic Coalition to Combat Trafficking...also conducts public outreach and advocates on behalf of victims.... I will also ask our pastors to communicate the goals of this campaign to every active religious and layperson.... There should be no zones where this mission of love and redemption does not reach."

-Archbishop John J. Myers, Archdiocese of Newark, at the National Training Conference on Human Trafficking, July 16, 2004.

---

[70] See, Part V "Halting Human Trafficking with a Record Number of Aggressive Investigations and Prosecutions," section B "Labor Trafficking" above for a discussion about United States v. Soto.

DOJ_NMG_0008288

Memphis, Tennessee, and the National Organization of Women's Annual Conference in Los Angeles, California.

United States Attorneys' Offices are also involved in providing outreach and education about human trafficking within their districts. The United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of California, for example, has hosted five conferences on human trafficking since October 2001. Each of these conferences have provided training about applicable statutes and resources available for victims, including contact information for potential victims, to local law enforcement and non-governmental organizations serving trafficking victims. These conferences have resulted in long-standing relationships between federal prosecutors and law enforcement, state and local police, and numerous local service-providers, such as the Bilateral Safety Corridor Coalition. Another example is the efforts of the United States Attorney's Office for the District of Connecticut, which convened a meeting in May 2004 of federal and state agencies to determine why human trafficking cases has not been prosecuted in this jurisdiction. By September 2004, this office convened a training conference intended to educate federal, state, and local law enforcement and victim service providers about human trafficking and how to identify resources, including federal grant opportunities. The result of these efforts has been the creation of an anti-human trafficking task force that includes the Connecticut State Police, Federal Bureau of Investigation, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Social Security Administration, State Department's Diplomatic Security Service, and United States Coast Guard as well as non-governmental organizations serving trafficking victims.

CEOS participated in a joint project to develop a brochure and posters designed to curb child sex tourism. Its partners include the Department of Homeland Security's Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement; the Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons; and a number of non-governmental organizations, such as the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and the Sexual Exploitation of Children, World Vision, and Rape, Abuse, & Incest National Network. The proposed brochure and poster are intended to be widely distributed both within the United States as well as abroad in an effort to combat the problem. The section is also actively engaged in promoting the Department's strategy of multi-disciplinary cooperation that emphasizes the victim-centered approach to combating domestic child prostitution with non-governmental organizations such as the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The victims of sex trade see little of life before they see the very worst of life -- an underground of brutality and lonely fear. Those who create these victims and profit from their suffering must be severely punished. Those who patronize this industry debase themselves and deepen the misery of others. And governments that tolerate this trade are tolerating a form of slavery.

–President George W. Bush, speaking to the United Nation's General Assembly, September 23, 2003

D. Promoting Foreign Criminalization and Prosecution of Human Trafficking

As discussed above,[71] the President has directed federal agencies to use all diplomatic and foreign assistance tools in the nation's effort to abolish human trafficking. The Department has had an important role in advancing this directive. The Department's primary goal in this regard is to promote the efforts of foreign governments to criminalize human trafficking and to enhance their capacity to investigate and prosecute these crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0008289

In September 2003, in an address to the United Nations General Assembly, President Bush announced a $50 million international initiative to combat human trafficking. This initiative will increase the capacity of several source and destination countries to combat trafficking. Specifically, the President's initiative aims to replicate our victim-centered prosecutions through multi-disciplinary task forces and increased outreach in Cambodia, India, Indonesia, Mexico, Moldova, and Tanzania.

The Department has been actively involved in the design, development, and implementation of this initiative. Working primarily through the Civil Rights Division, the Department coordinated with the Departments of Health and Human Services, Labor, and State, as well as the United States Agency for International Development, to develop the capacity of foreign governments to investigate and prosecute human trafficking cases, and to develop partnerships with non-governmental organizations to prevent the vulnerable from becoming victims through outreach and education as well as to protect and rehabilitate victims. The inter-agency working group found the lessons learned by the Civil Rights Division in its prosecution of trafficking cases and its organization of trafficking task forces a valuable model for the implementation of the President's international initiative. The objective of the initiative thus became the institution of multi-disciplinary efforts to combat human trafficking in particular geographic regions. In practice, this would mean that programs to promote awareness raising, victim shelters, and police and prosecutor training would be established and supported in a collaborative effort by each of the participating federal agencies. The Department designs country assessments to help the United States Government better understand the nature of the trafficking problem in a particular area and to inventory what efforts were currently underway.

Foreign Country
Human Trafficking Assessments By the Department of Justice

- What is the current statutory framework;
- What is the capacity of police to investigate trafficking offenses;
- What is the level of prosecutorial skill and interest in trafficking victims;
- What is the current state of services for victim shelter and restoration by both governmental and non-governmental organizations;
- What is the current level of cooperation between prospective anti trafficking team members, and;
- What is the level of political will and interest among those government officials who would be the implementers of the plan.

The first task is to gain a foundational understanding of human trafficking within the host country by answering such questions as: Who are the victims and where do they come from? What kind of coercion is used to control the victims? What are the historical and cultural factors that

---

[71] See, Part II "An Administration Priority."

DOJ_NMG_0008290

The first task is to gain a foundational understanding of human trafficking within the host country by answering such questions as: Who are the victims and where do they come from? What kind of coercion is used to control the victims? What are the historical and cultural factors that influence trafficking or the response to it? Is there trafficking of minors into sexual exploitation? what industries tend to have labor trafficking? Next, the Department's trafficking experts design a matrix of the necessary tools that would be required to rescue particular victims, place them into restorative care, and hold perpetrators accountable.

Once the assessment is completed, the United States Government, through the local United States Embassy, and the host government enter into a Letter of Agreement (LOA) that states the roles and responsibilities of both parties and the level of funding to be provided in connection with the President's initiative. Department team members then coordinate with the other federal agencies to deploy training and other capacity building and to assign to the host country personnel from the United States Government to provide expertise and mentoring to those working on the anti-trafficking project. A primary goal of every LOA entered into in connection with the President's initiative is the Department's imperative to rescue victims and hold perpetrators accountable. The President's initiative was designed to place a clear emphasis on results that change lives for victims and their families.

The United States Government's work with the Mexican Government in connection with this initiative presents a useful illustration of the Department's work. Since 2003, the Department's Civil Rights Division, along with Criminal Division's International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program, has been actively conducting country planning sessions in both Mexico and Indonesia, and has detailed a Civil Rights Division attorney to the United States Embassy in Moldova, in connection with the President's international human trafficking initiative. In Mexico, a significant number of senior United States law enforcement specialists met repeatedly over the past year with their counterparts from the Mexican Government before a final Letter of Agreement was signed in mid 2005. As a result, both partners have a clear understanding of how the President's program will be implemented. One significant factor in the United States-Mexico anti-trafficking partnership is the agreement to work together on cases that involve criminal trafficking enterprises that are active on both sides for the border.

The Department's experts have also assisted their counterparts in other countries with assistance in developing a victim-centered response to human trafficking through meetings and training workshops. For example, many foreign governments host their own training in partnership with the United States Embassy. Lasting a week to two weeks, the Department's attorneys and investigators teach critical skills such as evidence gathering, pro-active investigations, and victim interviews. Workshops provide an opportunity to practice skills and learn new law enforcement methods that reflect the lessons Department has learned in investigating and prosecuting these cases. The Department's consistent theme in each of these events is to present the crime of human trafficking as a multi-disciplinary challenge requiring collaboration among governmental and non-governmental agencies. The Department has learned that a critical need in many developing countries is the ability to develop a framework for governmental and non-governmental organizations to collaborate, particularly as it concerns the protection of victims and programs to prevent further victimization.

DOJ_NMG_0008291

Department experts also participate in regional, multilateral consultations between law enforcement executives that promote international cooperation between the country of victim origin and the destination country, such as the Southeast European Cooperative Initiative. Attendees at workshops conducted by the Department are often law enforcement executives who can and do take information and put it into practice. In one recent example, Department lawyers relied upon contacts made through these training sessions, to assist a country in arresting recruiters who held the children of trafficking victims as hostages to prevent the victims from providing evidence to assist in a United States prosecution.

Since fiscal year 2003, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has participated in the Southeast European Cooperative Initiative as the lead observer on human trafficking and has detailed agents to Albania, Bulgaria, and Romania to work on trafficking issues. The Regional Center for Combating Trans-Border Crime in Bucharest, Romania, coordinates southeastern European police and customs regional actions for preventing and combating trans-border crime, including trafficking in persons and migrant smuggling. The following twelve countries are actively involved with the Center: Albania, the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Greece, Hungary, Macedonia, Moldova, Romania, Serbia and Montenegro, Slovenia and Turkey.

Another important Departmental component in the international arena is the Office of International Affairs of the Criminal Division, which serves as the link between federal, state, and local anti-trafficking efforts and foreign prosecution and judicial authorities. Good working partnerships with foreign governments have been essential to the Department's efforts to combat human trafficking. The Office of International Affairs' most significant contribution to United States Government anti-trafficking efforts has been to assist in gathering evidence from abroad and to assist foreign prosecutors in gathering evidence located in our country. For example, in United States v. Carreto,[72] Mexican nationals were accused of recruiting uneducated women and girls from impoverished areas of Mexico and compelling them to prostitute themselves in both Mexico and New York. Carreto's victims were forced to service up to 20 men a day as prostitutes and were beaten if they did not make enough money during a single day or if they attempted to hide the money they made. One victim was also forced to have an abortion.[73] The Office of International Affairs, in collaboration with the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of New York, helped secure testimony, as well as documentary and physical evidence, gathered by Mexican authorities in their investigations of the Carretos' transnational operation. Similarly, the Office of International Affairs secured evidence and testimony from Russia in support of a federal prosecution by the United States Attorney's Office for the Eastern District of California of a defendant in California accused of trafficking her niece into the United States and forcing her to be used in prostitution.[74] In another case, the Office of International Affairs assisted a European country investigating a trafficking scheme involving Europe and [72] United States v. Carreto, [insert case information].

---

[73] Id.

[74] Id.

DOJ_NMG_0008292

Eastern Europe. The Department sent to that country evidence obtained pursuant to searches in the United States of locations where the targets were believed to have stored potential evidence of their crimes.

The Office of International Affairs also works to extradite traffickers from foreign nations to the United States or from our country to foreign nations for prosecution. On September 28, YYYY, Mexico provisionally arrested a Mexican national pursued by the United States Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida on charges including conspiracy, alien smuggling, and transporting women and minors for purposes of prostitution between August 1996 and February 1998. The victims, who reportedly did not know their fate until they arrived in the United States, were not allowed to leave the brothels until they paid a smuggling fee to the accused, who allegedly took 70% of the prostitution proceeds.

Dismantling transnational human trafficking networks requires a willingness and ability to work closely with our foreign partners in countries where victims are recruited. Consequently, the Civil Rights and Criminal Divisions are actively involved in outreach and providing technical assistance to foreign governments and non-governmental organizations. Since 2002, Civil Rights Division officials have addressed international gatherings convened in countries such as Guatemala, the Dominican Republic, Suriname, China, Indonesia, Cambodia, Thailand, Azerbaijan, Ukraine, Moldova, El Salvador, Mexico, Canada, Hungary, Philippines, Japan, Colombia, India, South Africa, and Brazil to encourage a coordinated response to human trafficking worldwide. These events are attended by foreign law enforcement executives, prosecutors, judges, and non-governmental organizations that advocate on behalf of or provide assistance to trafficking victims.

Insert graphic depicting the rise in the number of OPDAT/ICITAP programs by fiscal year, FY 2001-2005.

The Criminal Division's Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and its International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program work to build effective partnerships with other law enforcement agencies sharing the goal of eradicating predatory trafficking groups. Between fiscal years 2001 and 2005, these office conducted a total of programs involving 25 countries. Other components of the Department, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Civil Rights Division, and the Office for Victims of Crime, often assist these efforts by providing technical assistance and informational briefings with foreign delegations. Since the passage of the TVPA, Civil Rights Division lawyers have participated in numerous training and outreach programs, speaking at more programs last year and the year before than ever before in countries such as Cambodia, Singapore, Bangkok, Austria, and Mexico.

In addition, some United States Attorney Offices, particularly in connection with their local Task Forces, have been involved in training and educating visitors from foreign governmental and non-governmental organizations about strategies to combat human trafficking. Representatives of the United States Attorney's Office for the Middle District of Florida, for example, along with its task force members from the Collier County Sheriff's Office, the Immigrant Rights Advocacy Center, and the Florida State University Center for the Advancement of Human Rights, traveled to Central America in late 2004 to educate governmental leaders about the efforts of their task force to combat human trafficking and provide assistance to its victims. An additional example is that of the United States Attorney's Office for the Western District of Washington, where the Seattle offices of the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the United States Department of Labor's Office of the Inspector General have worked together to share information about efforts to combat human trafficking with officials and visitors from countries such as Brazil, Germany, Mexico, France, Italy, and Spain, and with organizations like the World Affairs Council.

DOJ_NMG_0008293

The Department also works with foreign governments to adopt legislation that aids in the investigation and prosecution of traffickers and the protection of victims. Through the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training, the Department's trafficking experts in the Civil Rights Division, CEOS and United States Attorneys' Offices assist foreign governments with the development and ratification of anti-human trafficking legislation to help ensure that foreign governments adopt laws that are victim-centered and compliant with Palermo Protocol.[75] For example, in fiscal year 2004 alone, Civil Rights Division attorneys and its victim-witness coordinator have conducted training sessions and have assisted in drafting trafficking legislation in Asia, Africa, Europe, the Caribbean, North America, and South America, in coordination with the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training. These training sessions emphasize the Department's experience in investigating and prosecuting these cases, collecting evidence, and keeping the victim safe. In fiscal year 2004, the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and the International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program assisted 7 foreign nations with legislation that directly or indirectly furthered anti-human trafficking efforts in fiscal year 2004.

The Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training provides substantial technical assistance based on a victim-centered strategy known commonly as the "Three Ps of Trafficking in Persons: Prevention, Protection and Prosecution." Technical assistance by this office includes educating and developing joint projects with foreign law enforcement officials geared to strengthening their capacity to prevent transnational trafficking; protect victim witnesses and thereby encourage their participation in investigations and prosecutions; and effectively investigate and prosecute trafficking cases. This office also works with host countries on developing evidence collection techniques which can generate evidence usable in prosecutions – either here in the United States or in a foreign country.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, working through the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training, has provided training programs in Suriname and Ghana. In fiscal year 2004, the FBI trained 50 international visitors, including officials from Australia,

---

[75] Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime, Dec. 3, 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0008294

India, Pakistan, South Africa, Haiti, and England. In addition, the Bureau's Civil Rights and the Asian Criminal Enterprise and Crimes Against Children Units conducted a training session at the British Embassy in January 2005 during a program jointly sponsored by the British Embassy and Women in Federal Law Enforcement.

Insert Graphic of Globe Showing international efforts

Another component of the President's international human trafficking program are activities to prevent victimization. An important step towards prevention is the Department's efforts to increase international public awareness about human trafficking. Raising the visibility of human trafficking and the efforts of the United States government to combat it encourages foreign governments to take victim-centered action to prevent, uncover, and prosecute cases of human trafficking. International public awareness is increased through activities of the Civil Rights Division, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Office of Justice Programs, the Office on Violence Against Women, and United States Attorneys' Office working through the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training and the International Criminal Investigative Training and Assistance Program, in connection with briefings for foreign delegations and training programs. These training programs provide foreign parties – law enforcement officials, prosecutors, legislators, and non-governmental organizations – with information about the strategies the Department has employed to combat trafficking. Federal investigators and prosecutors, mostly Civil Rights Division attorneys, share lessons learned in prosecuting these cases, building local multi-disciplinary task forces, and providing services and protection for victims.

In addition, to the Department's efforts concerning human trafficking, CEOS has trained attorneys and investigators from numerous countries on sex trafficking of children. CEOS staff have trained individuals from: the Council of Baltic States (11 Baltic nations), Albania, Angola, Armenia, Austria, the Balkans, Belgium, Belize, Bosnia, Brazil, Bulgaria, China, Costa Rica, Croatia, Czech Republic, El Salvador, Ecuador, Georgia, Germany, Guinea, Hungary, Indonesia, Israel, Japan, Korea, Lithuania, Latvia, Macedonia, Mexico, Montenegro, Nigeria, Panama, the Philippines, Poland, Romania, Russia, Senegal, Serbia, Slovenia, South Africa, Suriname, Thailand, the United Kingdom, and Ukraine, among others.

E. Fostering State, Local and Non-Governmental Activities to Combat Human Trafficking

The Department's work with state and local governmental agencies, particularly activities to expand anti-trafficking law enforcement authority, is intended to harness the almost one million state and local law enforcement officers who might come into contact with trafficking

States, governors, and legislatures can help by adopting anti-trafficking laws. The Justice Department has created a model state anti-trafficking law, and I intend to send a copy of it to every governor and legislative leader in those 40-plus states that do not yet have their own anti-trafficking laws.

-Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales at the Hoover Institution Board of Overseers Conference, February 28, 2005 victims. In 2004, the Department developed and introduced a model state law at the National Training Conference on Human Trafficking because many states do not have laws that criminalize this activity. At that time, only four states - Texas, Florida, Missouri, and Washington - had state laws against trafficking. The model state law reflects lessons learned through the Department's prosecutions, especially enforcement of the TVPA by the Civil Rights Division. Adoption of the model statute would promote a uniform national legal strategy to combat human trafficking.

DOJ_NMG_0008295

On July 21, 2004, the United States Senate unanimously passed a resolution, authored by Texas Senator John Cornyn, endorsing the Department's model state anti-trafficking statute and encouraging states to adopt it. The Senate resolution also singled out for praise the Civil Rights Division in its prosecution of human trafficking crimes and lauded the Department's National Conference on Human Trafficking. In March 2005, Attorney General Gonzales sent letters to state governors and legislative leaders explaining the scope of the trafficking problem, pointing to the need for state assistance to the federal government in fighting trafficking, and urging them to adopt the model. Department officials have since promoted the model law, and Civil Rights Division attorneys continue to provide technical assistance regarding the model state law to state legislators and related organizations, such as the National Foundation for Women Legislators. To date, 15 states have enacted anti-trafficking legislation, many of which reflect the Department's model criminal statute.

Insert Graphic of states that have adopted anti-trafficking laws.

As discussed above,[76] outreach and technical assistance are critical to uncovering this insidious crime. The Civil Rights Division, along with the Criminal Division, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Office of Justice Programs, the Office on Violence Against Women, and United States Attorneys' Offices, works actively to increase awareness among local law enforcement and community- and faith-based organizations through training presentations and the provision of technical assistance. The strategy employed by each of these components reinforces a victim-centered approach to prosecutions and the collaborative work of task forces. Examples of the Department's activities to increase awareness of human trafficking among state and local governmental agencies, non-governmental organizations, and in our nation's communities include the following:

---

[76] See, Part III "Scope of the Problem," section B "The Department Responds to the Crime with A Victim-Centered Approach."

DOJ_NMG_0008296

- An attorney in the Civil Rights Division authored an August 2002 article in Police Chief Magazine, entitled Working Together to Stop Modern-Day Slavery. The article outlined ways for local law enforcement during the course of their usual investigations to identify trafficking cases.

Insert Police Chief Magazine Image Here

- In fiscal year 2003, the Civil Rights Division conducted training sessions in the Washington, D.C. metropolitan area, New York City, Chicago, San Diego, Atlanta, Dallas, and several other cities and with numerous non-governmental organizations such as the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Women in Federal Law Enforcement and the National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives.

- An attorney in the Civil Rights Division authored a December 2003 article in Police Chief Magazine, entitled, Human Trafficking: A Guide to Detecting, Investigating, and Punishing Modern-Day Slavery. The article gave an overview of federal anti-trafficking efforts and urged increased cooperation among state, local, and federal law enforcement officials.

- In fiscal year 2004, the Civil Rights Division conducted more than fifty training sessions around the United States at conferences and meetings in cities such as Albuquerque, Baltimore, Chicago, Houston, Los Angeles, Newark, New Jersey, and Salt Lake City.

- With funding from the Office on Violence Against Women, the International Association of Chiefs of Police is developing a training package for local law enforcement officers, including a guidebook on the identification and investigation of human trafficking crimes and a roll call training video with a discussion guide to accompany the guidebook.

- The International Association of Chiefs of Police National Law Enforcement Leadership Initiative, in connection with a $200,000 cooperative agreement with the Office on Violence Against Women, is planning a summit of law enforcement leaders in the summer of 2006 to continue to extend the level of awareness of and commitment to combating human trafficking.

- The Bureau of Justice Assistance, in collaboration with the Office of Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS), initiated, in fiscal year 2005, a program to educate local law enforcement about human trafficking through the COPS Regional Community

DOJ_NMG_0008297

Policing Institutes at a cost of $245,000. In 2005, COPS conducted three "train-the-trainer" sessions for 300 law enforcement trainers, including members of the then-existing 18 multi-disciplinary task forces, with the human trafficking curriculum developed by the Bureau of Justice Assistance. This program will be expanded in 2006 to hold at least five sessions, educating 5,100 law enforcement personnel.

- Also in fiscal year 2005 and independent of the Bureau of Justice Assistance, COPS sponsored an additional 6 training sessions for nearly 700 law enforcement officers, non-law enforcement governmental officials, and community-based organizations.

- The National Institute of Justice is supporting research that will provide a clear perspective on the current state of law enforcement's understanding of human trafficking. The research will identify current law enforcement responses to human trafficking; the implications of such responses for victims; and best practices and lessons learned by law enforcement and the partners with whom they collaborate on trafficking cases (e.g., victims service providers, attorneys, etc.).

- The Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, through the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children and the Fox Valley Technical College, provides training on topics such as child maltreatment, runaway and missing children, the protection of children, and domestic trafficking of children for sexual purposes. Since 1998, this training program has reached more than 64,000 local law enforcement officers, prosecutors, and community service providers.

DOJ_NMG_0008298

VII. Conclusion

The Department has achieved incredible success in carrying out President Bush's directive to combat human trafficking. Under this Administration, the Department has been aggressive and effective in its effort to halt human trafficking. Prosecutorial activity has increased four-fold when compared to the last four years of the previous administration. The Department also has been innovative in its approach, by developing a multi-disciplinary victim-centered approach to uncovering human trafficking schemes, rescuing and protecting victims and working with foreign, governmental and non-governmental partners to prevent further victimization. Moreover, the Department has harnessed the diverse tools found within its components through intra-agency coordination that is primarily driven by the Civil Rights Division. There is however, much work to be done.

Because the fundamental liberties of a human trafficking victim are violated by traffickers, the Civil Rights Division will continue to lead the Department's efforts to combat this heinous crime, working with federal investigators and prosecutors as well as victim services organizations both here and abroad. With the new tools found in the TVPRA of 2005, the Department will continue work with its federal, state and local partners to expand the reach and intensity of anti-human trafficking task forces and encourage states to criminalize sex, labor and child sex trafficking.

DOJ_NMG_0008299

[redacted]@apprisemedia.com

From: [redacted]@apprisemedia.com
Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 3:52 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: Detainee Treatment Roundtable
Attachments: [redacted]CV.doc
Importance: High

Neil
Haven't heard back from you - can you pleas give a call today about our CFR event. I understand that your buddy Waxman has left his prior position - I assume that rules him out for participating.

I spoke with [redacted] who said that given [redacted] departure and the timing of the event, he didn't want to send someone to the event officially. He suggested that we reach out to General [redacted] from the USAF directly. Do you know [redacted] I placed a call but have not heard back.

Col Mansoor, the Council Fellow, suggested pro [redacted] I checked [redacted] out on the internet -- he seems fair and balanced and is sanctioned by both [redacted] Do you know him? I wanted to touch base with you before reaching out to him.

I am around today and tonight although out of pocket 8-9 pm this evening.

[redacted]

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@cfr.org [mailto [redacted]@cfr.org]
Sent: Tuesday, December 06, 2005 10:39 AM
To: [redacted]
Cc: [redacted]@cfr.org
Subject: Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

[redacted]

The JAG Corps and West Point are planning to send [redacted] down for the panel. They just called. Do you want to speak to him directly? Let me know how I can help. Here is the info:

Cheers,
[redacted]

|----------|
| | | [redacted] | | | | | [redacted] | | | | | U.S. Military Academy; 646 Swift Road; West Point, NY 10996-1905 | | | | | Office phone: 845 [redacted] fax: 845 [redacted] office e-mail: | [redacted]@usma.edu | |

(See attached file: Solis CV.doc)

Council on Foreign Relations
58 East 68th Street
New York, NY 10021
(212
@cfr.org
http://www.cfr.org

@appri To semedia.com> <@cfr.org>
cc
12/01/2005 07:47 @cfr.org>,
PM @cfr.org>,
<ngorsuch@khhte.com>
Subject
Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

Thanks for forwarding. These all look like compelling participants, and I believe Neil Gorsuch, (who is coordinating with me), knows some of the presenters listed below.

Should we follow up with or the suggested panelists first?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: @cfr.org <@cfr.org>
To: <@apprisemedia.com>
CC: cquinn@cfr.org <@cfr.org>; @cfr.org <@cfr.org>
Sent: Thu Dec 01 13:06:43 2005

Sent: Thu Dec 01 15:00:45 2005
Subject: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

[redacted]

See e-mail below. I think one of these consultants would be a good possibility for the panel discussion on 12 Dec. I'll let you make contact.

[redacted]

[redacted]

Council on Foreign Relations
58 East 68th Street, New York, NY 10021 Tel (212)[redacted] Fax (212)[redacted] http://www.cfr.org

----- Forwarded by [redacted] n 12/01/2005 03:30 PM -----

[redacted]" <[redacted]@osd.mil>

12/01/2005 03:28 PM
To
"[redacted]@cfr.org'" <[redacted]@cfr.org> cc
"[redacted]@osd.gov'" <[redacted]@osd.gov> Subject
BRIEFING PROPOSAL

[redacted]

Delighted to touch base again after several years being in the trenches.
I'm working as the policy advisor for the Office of Detainee Affairs under the Office of Secretary of Defense. We do policy for the Department of Defense related to detainee issues Part of our charter is outreach and we have an outreach presentation related to our operations in Guantanamo Bay which I believe would be an interesting forum/presentation for the Council.
The four presenters are:

1. [redacted] Office of the Secretary of Defense (DASD-DA) 2. [redacted] Office for the Administrative Review of the Detention of Enemy Combatants (OARDEC) 3. [redacted] Legal Adviser to the Appointing Authority, Office of Military Commissions (OMC)

4 [redacted] oint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) Given the dates of the presentation organizational substitutes may be used, but the format will be the same.
The panel is called "the Guantanamo Bay Detainee Policies, Proceses and Operations brief".
The brief is approximately 50 minutes is length and followed by a 30 minute Q and A session. Of course a closed door non attribution session with the Council experts is also possible.

Please discuss with your colleagues and let's discuss. My telephone number is: [redacted] Hope you are enjoying my favorite town and look forward to seeing you in the near future.

Cheers,
[redacted]

GARY D. SOLIS

Visiting Professor of Law, Department of Law
U.S. Military Academy; 646 Swift Road; West Point, NY 10996-1905
Office phone: 849-[redacted] fax: 845-[redacted] office e-mai[redacted]@usma.edu

EDUCATION

Ph.D.	The London School of Economics & Political Science Overseas Research Student's Award, for "outstanding merit and research potential"	1992	Dissertation: The Uniform Code of Military Justice and the 1949 Geneva Conventions
LL.M.	The George Washington University National Law Center	1978	Criminal Law
J.D.	The University of California at Davis, King Hall Distinguished Alumnus Award, October 2001	1971	Law
B.A.	San Diego State College	1963	Sociology

PROFESSIONAL POSITIONS

Visiting Professor of Law, United States Military Academy, West Point, New York — 2004 – present Program Director, Law of War instruction

Adjunct Professor of Law, Georgetown University Law Center, Washington, D.C. — 2002 – present
Seminar in The Law of Armed Conflict.

Adjunct Professor of Law, Catholic University's Columbus School of Law, Washington, D.C. — 2004
Seminar in the Law of Armed Conflict

Chief of Oral History, History & Museums Division, United States Marine Corps — 2001 – 2004
Responsible for collecting and accessioning interviews of Marine Corps personnel, and others, to support the writing of operational histories. Awarded the Department of the Navy's Meritorious Civilian Service Medal (2004).

Associate Professor of Law, United States Military Academy, West Point, New York — 1996-2001
Program Director, Law of War instruction. Courses taught: Law of War For Commanders; Constitutional and Military Law; International Criminal Law. Awarded 1998 Phi Kappa Phi Distinguished Teaching Award; U.S. Army's Superior Civilian Service Medal (2000); U.S. Army's Meritorious Civilian Service Medal (2001).

Law Teacher, Department of Law, The London School of Economics & Political Science — 1993-1996
Courses taught: British Criminal Law; British Commercial Law

PUBLICATIONS

Books:

Son Thang: An American War Crime (Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 1997) 340 pp., photos, maps, append., notes, index. Bantam paperback edition, 1998. Marine Corps Heritage Foundation's Greene Award as year's best book; U.S. Naval Institute's Author of the Year; nominated: U.K.'s Royal United Services Institute For Defense Studies' Westminster Medal

Marines and Military Law in Vietnam: Trial By Fire (Washington, D.C.: GPO, 1989) 295 pp., photos, maps, append., notes, index. An official U.S. Marine Corps history

Book chapters:

"Military Justice and Civilian Clemency," chapter in John Norton Moore, Robert Turner, eds., The Real Lessons of the Vietnam War (Durham NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2002).

"Military Commissions and Terrorists," chapter in Eugene R. Fidell, Dwight H. Sullivan, eds., Evolving Military Justice (Annapolis, MD: Naval Institute Press, 2002).

"Military Commission Instruction No. 3, Responsibilities of the Chief Prosecutor," chapter in Military Commission Instructions Sourcebook (Nat'l Institute of Military Justice, Washington D.C., 2003).

Peer reviewed articles:

"Obedience to Orders: History and Abuses at Abu Ghraib Prison," 2-4 Journal of International Criminal Justice (Dec. 2004) 988-998.

"Military Justice, Civilian Clemency: The Sentencing of Marine Corps War Crimes in Vietnam," 10:1 Transnational Law & Contemporary Problems, 59-84 (Apr 2001).

"Obedience of Orders and the Law of War: Judicial Application in American Forums," 15:2 American University International Law Review, 481-526 (March 2000).

"CAAF Roping at the Jurisdictional Rodeo: Clinton v. Goldsmith," co-authored with Prof. John Winkle, 162 Military Law Review 219 (Dec. 1999).

"Sub Judice Rules and Perceptions of the Law: Another Viewpoint," 11 Commonwealth Judicial Journal 6 (Dec. 1995)

Other Articles:

"Dialysis for a Prisoner of War." Hastings Center Report, vol. 34, no. 6 (Dec. 2004). Co-authored with Col. Daniel Zupan.

"Duty, Honor, Country and Semper Fidelis." Naval History magazine (Oct., 2003). Nominated, 2004 Marine Corps Heritage Foundation's Heinl Award, for year's best non-fiction article.

"The Last Marine Out of Kosovo," Fortitudine magazine, 20xxx1, Oct. 2003.

Commentary: "'Enemy Combatants' Should Worry Us." U.S. Naval Institute's Proceedings, 2 (Dec. 2002).

The Washington Post, op-ed, "Even A 'Bad Man' Has Rights," A-19, 25 June 2002.

"Terrorists, Due Process, and Military Commissions." Marine Corps Gazette, 46-48 (Feb. 2002)

"Are We Really At War?" U.S. Naval Institute's Proceedings, 34-40 (January, 2002).

The Washington Post, op-ed, "The Law of War," A-17, 30 April 2001.

Recent book reviews:

Commandants of the Marine Corps, Allan Millett, Jack Shulimson, eds. In Jan. 2005 The Journal of Military History.

Judge Advocates in Vietnam: Army Lawyers in Southeast Asia, 1959-1975, by Col. Frederic L. Borch. In July 2004 The Journal of Military History.

Tanks on the Beaches: A Marine Tanker in the Pacific War, by Robert M. Neiman & Kenneth W. Estes. In 33 Military History of the West 63 (2003).

The Vietnam War on Trial: The My Lai Massacre and Court-Martial of Lt. Calley, by Michal R. Belnap. In April 2003 The Journal of Military History.

Law and War: An American Story, by Peter Maguire. In July 2002 On Point, journal of the Army Historical Foundation.

Ungentlemanly Acts, by Louise Barnett. In The Review of Politics, Jan. 2002.

Morals Under the Gun: The Cardinal Virtues, Military Ethics, and American Society, by James H. Toner, in Jan. 2001 Proceedings, journal of the U.S. Naval Institute.

Pursuing Military Justice, by Jonathan Lurie. In American Journal of Legal History, Feb. 2001.

Obeying Orders, by Mark Osiel. In The Review of Politics, Jan 2001.

EXPERT WITNESS TESTIMONY

United States v. Sgt. Gary Pittman, a Marine Corps general court-martial involving charges of dereliction of duty and multiple assaults of Iraqi prisoners at Camp White Horse, Iraq. 22-25 August 2004.

MILITARY EXPERIENCE

Twenty-six years active U.S. Marine Corps commissioned service (1963-1989), eighteen as a judge advocate. Seventeen months Vietnam field duty, including platoon and (twice) company command. As a judge advocate, tried 433 criminal cases. Chief prosecutor, 1st Marine Division and 3d Marine Division. Staff Judge Advocate, Headquarters, Fleet Marine Forces, Atlantic. As general court-martial judge, presided in 330 jury and bench trials. Chief of Military Law Branch at Headquarters, U.S. Marine Corps.

SELECTED PAPERS, SPEECHES, AND LECTURES

Harvard Law School. Conference speaker/panelist. "Humanity Under Fire: Time to Revise the Geneva Conventions?" Boston, Massachusetts. 11 April 2005.

Georgetown University Law Center. Conference speaker/panelist. "Outsourcing Warfare: Defense Contractor Accountability for Human Rights Abuses" Washington D.C. 9 April 2005.

American University's, Washington College of Law. Conference: The Geneva Conventions & the Rules of War in the Post-9/11 World. Panel chair and participant on two panels: "The Role of Private Contractors in 21st Century War," and "Protection of Civilians in Hostilities." Washington D.C., 24 March, 2005.

University of Mississippi. Guest lecturer, Honors seminar, Genocide and Memory: "International Humanitarian Law, War Crimes and Societal Responses. Oxford. 2 March, 2005.

Society for Military History, annual conference. Panel chair and commentator: "Meeting Terrorism: Military Approaches, New and Old. Charleston, S.C. 25 Feb. 2005.

Georgetown University Law Center. Guest lecturer, seminar on Strategic Intelligence and Public Policy. Washington, D.C. 17 Feb. 2005.

The Association of the Bar of the City of New York, Military Law Section. Lecture. "The Law of Armed Conflict, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, and the United States. 1 Dec. 2004.

U.S. Marine Corps Command & Staff College. Lecture: "Command Responsibility in Combat." Quantico, Virginia, 29 Oct. 2004.

American University's Washington School of Law. Seminar instructor, American Intelligence Law and Foreign Policy. Washington, D.C., 28 Oct. 2004.

International Institute of Humanitarian Law, San Remo, Italy. Instructor, Advanced Course, International Human Rights Law. 11-15 Oct. 2004.

Georgetown University Law Center. Lecture to Joint Seminar in Law and Philosophy: War. 13 September 2004.

United States Naval Academy. Lecture, Naval Postgraduate School's Leadership Education and Development Program, "When Things Go Wrong." Annapolis, Maryland, 27 August 2004.

The Smithsonian Institution. Resident Associate Lecture Series. Panelist: "From Pearl Harbor to Tokyo: The Pacific Campaign of World War II." Washington D.C., 24 July 2004.

The Smithsonian Institution. Resident Associate Lecture Series. Six-lecture series, "Battlefield Law of War." Washington D.C., 8 June to 13 July, 2004.

The Library of Congress, Public Affairs Veteran's Forum lecture series. "The Law of War, Abu Ghraib, and War Crimes." Washington, D.C., 10 June, 2004.

U.S. Marine Corps Command & Staff College. Lecture: "Command Responsibility in Combat." Quantico, Virginia, 2 June, 2004.

American Bar Association, International Law Section. Semi-annual Meeting speaker. "Military Commissions in International Law – A Practitioner's Primer." New York City, 16 April, 2004.

United States Naval Academy. Speech: "Military Commissions and Cuban Detentions." 2004 Distinguished Speaker Series. 12 April 2004.

International Institute of Humanitarian Law, San Remo, Italy. Guest lecturer and instructor, 4th Military Academies Law of War competition. 28 March – 2 April 2004.

Stetson University College of Law. Lectures: Military Commissions and the Law; The Constitution and Military Commissions. Gulfport Florida, 23-24 Sept. 2003.

United States Naval Academy. Lecture: Naval Postgraduate School's Leadership Education and Development Program, "Leadership in Military Culture." 10 Sept 2003.

Virginia State Bar Association annual conference. Panel chair and commentator: "Terrorists, Military Commissions and American Law." Virginia Beach, Virginia. 20 June, 2003.

Society of Military History annual conference. Panel chair and commentator: "9-11: A View From the Pentagon," Knoxville, Kentucky. 2 May 2003.

American University, Washington College of Law – Center for Human Rights and Humanitarian Law. "The Legal Standing of the Call to War." Law conference lecture. 3 April 2003.

Georgetown University Law Center. Speech to law faculty: "Why Is the U.S. Afraid of the International Criminal Court?" 27 March 2003.

International Institute of Humanitarian Law, San Remo, Italy. Guest lecturer, 98th Military Officer's Course, 7-13 March 2003.

United States Naval Academy. Lecture: Marine option midshipmen conference: "Decide Now!" 14 Nov., 2002.

Boston College School of Law. Panel: "Military Commissions; Their History and Their Law." Boston, Massachusetts. 17 September, 2002.

U.S. Marine Corps Command & Staff College. Lecture: "Law of War For the Military User." Quantico, Virginia. 29 August, 2002.

Virginia State Bar Association annual conference. Lecture: "Judging Terrorists: Military Tribunals or Criminal Courtrooms?" Virginia Beach, Virginia. 15 June, 2002.

Judicial Conference of the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. Paper and speech: "My Lai and the International Criminal Court," expansion of a paper delivered on 5 April. George Washington University, Washington, D.C. 15 May, 2002.

U.S. Marine Corps Command & Staff College. Lecture: "Son Thang and Senator Kerrey: Vietnam War Crimes." Quantico, Virginia. 2 May, 2002.

New York Military Affairs Society. Paper: "Proportionality: A History," City University of New York, New York City, NY. 26 April, 2002.

University of Richmond School of Law. Speaker and panel participant. Symposium, Political Assassination as an Instrument of National Policy. Richmond, Virginia. 11-12 April, 2002.

Society of Military History annual conference. Paper: "My Lai and the International Criminal Court," Madison, Wisconsin. 5 April, 2002.

United States Military Academy. Paper, "West Point Marines," USMA History Symposium, West Point, New York. 8 March, 2002.

United States Naval Academy. Lecture for Center For the Study of Professional Military Ethics: "Ethics For the Junior Officer." Annapolis, Maryland. 20 Feb., 2002.

United States Naval Academy. Lecture to Naval Postgraduate School course students: "Leadership in Military Culture." Annapolis, Maryland. 19 Feb.2000.

Washington, D.C. Bar Association, Military Law Section. Lecture: Military Commissions in U.S. History. Washington, D.C. 30 Nov., 2001.

Catholic University, School of Law. Lecture: "Trying War Crimes." Washington, D.C. 18 July 2001.

Royal Military College of Canada. Lecture: "My Lai and Its Legal Fallout." Kingston, Ontario, Canada. 5 March 2001.

New York Military Affairs Symposium. City University of New York. Paper: "Proportionality and Major General Barry McCaffrey in Desert Storm." New York City, New York. 3 Nov. 2000.

Center for National Security Law, University of Virginia School of Law. Lecture: "Vietnam War Crimes." Charlottesville, Virginia. 18 October 2000.

United States Military Academy, The Military Ethics Forum. Lecture: "Discipline in Combat." West Point, New York. 4 October, 2000.

Association of the Bar of the City of New York. Speaker: "Teaching the Law of War." New York City, New York. 3 May 2000.

University of Virginia School of Law, Center for National Security Law. Paper/panelist: "Military Justice, Civilian Clemency: Sentences of Marine Corps War Crimes in South Vietnam." Charlottesville, VA. 29 April 2000.

Judicial Conference of the United States Court of Appeals of the Armed Forces. Paper: "Obedience to Orders and the Law of War: The Once and Future War Crimes Defense." Washington, D.C. 7 May 1999.

Texas Tech University. The Vietnam Center's Third Triennial Vietnam Symposium. Paper: "The Punishment of Vietnam War Crimes." Lubbock, Texas. 17 April 1999.

National Institute of Military Justice. Conference on Military Law. Presenter: "Current Topics in American Military Law." London, England. 12 Dec. 1998.

University of Virginia School of Law, Center For National Security Law. Lecture: "My Lai and Hue: Two War Crimes." Charlottesville, Virginia. 19 Oct 1998.

Bard College, Accounting for Atrocities: Prosecuting War Crimes Fifty Years After Nuremberg. Paper and conference panelist: "Yamashita Had It Coming." Norfolk, Virginia. 5 Oct. 1998.

New York Military Affairs Symposium. City University of New York. Lecture: "Changing Currents in Military Law." New York City, New York. 25 Sept. 1998.

Siena College World War II symposium. Paper and conference panelist: "Obedience to Orders: How World War II Changed America's View of the Soldier's Legal Defense." Siena, New York. 4 June 1998.

United States Naval Academy. Phi Alpha Theta annual awards speaker. "The First Amendment and the Military Writer." Annapolis, Maryland. 23 April 1998.

Fordham University School of Law. Lecture: "Humanitarian Law: The Military Viewpoint." New York City, New York. 3 Feb. 1998.

University of Virginia School of Law, Center For National Security Law. Lecture: "Legal and Policy Issues of the Indo-China War." Charlottesville, Virginia. 22 Oct. 1997.

The Judge Advocate General's School, U.S. Army. 45th Graduate Course. Paper: "Military Justice in the Combat Zone." Charlottesville, Virginia. 14 April 1997.

McCormick Foundation Conference. Panel chair, *The Vietnam War, 1965-75,*and speaker: "Cambodia and Laos: the Hidden War." Chicago, Illinois. 6 March 1997.

Columbia University, Department of History. Lecture: "Law of War and Air Warfare in World War II." New York City, New York. 18 Nov. 1996.

PROFESSIONAL MEMBERSHIPS

The Bar of the Supreme Court of Virginia (Vice-chair, Military Law Section's Board of Governors, Virginia State Bar, elected to 1998-2001 and 2001-2004 terms); and the bars of the states of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Texas, and the District of Columbia; also, the bars of the United States Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces, the United States Court of Veterans Appeals, and the Supreme Court of the United States.

National Clearinghouse for Science, Technology and the Law (Advisory Council member)

American Bar Association

American Society of International Law (member, Membership Committee of ASIL's Lieber Society)

Phi Kappa Phi national academic honor society. Elected to membership 1999, U.S. Military Academy.

Associate Member, Association of Graduates of the United States Military Academy

NATIONAL/ INTERNATIONAL MEDIA INVOLVEMENT

National Public Radio (Washington D.C.) Commentary on proving murder in the combat zone. Aired 14 June 2005.
BBC World Service radio. Commentary on women in the Iraqi combat zone. 15 May 2005.
National Public Radio (Boston) "On Point." Discussion of senior accountability for military excesses in Iraq. 29 March 2005.
National Public Radio (Washington D.C.) Commentary on defining torture. Aired 18 March 2005.
National Public Radio (Washington D.C.) Commentary on lack of pervasiveness of criminality in U.S. forces in Iraq. 18 Feb. 2005.
War Stories. Fox Television News channel. "The Nuremberg and Tokyo War Crimes Trials." Aired 13 Feb. 2005.
National Public Radio (Boston) "All Things Considered." Discussion of legal attacks on military homosexual policy. 6 Dec. 2004.
The Association of the Bar of the city of New York. A talk before the Military Affairs Committee on the law applicable in Iraq, and the status of detainees, in light of the November Hamdan decision.
National Public Radio (Washington D.C.) Commentary on progress of Guantanamo military commissions. 23 Oct. 2004.
National Public Radio (Washington D.C.) Commentary on military justice and PFC Lynndie England's Abu Ghraib Article 32 investigation. Aired 3 August 2004.
Fox Daytime News. Televised interview on the trial of Saddam Hussein. 2 July 2004.
Fox Daytime News. Televised interview on Supreme Court's Guantanamo decision. 28 June 2004.
Sky News, London, U.K. Televised interview, on Supreme Court's Guantanamo decision. 28 June 2004.
CNN Late Night News. Televised interview regarding courts-martial of American Abu Ghraib accused. 20 June 2004.
National Public Radio (Washington D.C.) Discussion of torture, in military law and in international law. 21 May 2004.
National Public Radio (Washington D.C.) Discussion of the U.S. court-martial system. 19 May 2004.
"Nightline," ABC Network News. Commentary on the moral basis of the law of war. 19 May 2004.
National Public Radio (Los Angeles) Commentary on application of Geneva Conventions in Iraqi prisons. 18 May 2004.
National Public Radio (Washington D.C.) Commentary on application of the law of war in Iraq. 18 May 2004.
CNN Evening News. Televised discussion of Geneva Convention applicability in Iraq during the war's occupation phase. 7 May 2004.
National Public Radio (Washington D.C.) Commentary on U.S. court-martial procedure. Aired 6 May 2004.
CNBC News, with John Sigenthaler. Televised discussion of Abu Ghraib prison offenses. 3 May 2004
The News Hour, with Jim Lehrer. Televised discussion of Abu Ghraib prison offenses. 3 May 2004.
CBS Late Night News: "Up to the Minute." Televised commentary on applicability of Geneva Conventions in Iraq. 4 May 2004.
National Public Radio (Washington D.C.) Commentary on Marine Corps oral history program in Operation Iraqi Freedom. Aired 19 March 2004.
British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) World News. Televised interview regarding the significance of Vietnam on 2004 presidential election. Aired 5 March 2004.
National Public Radio (Washington D.C.). Commentary regarding the first charges against Guantanamo detainees. 25 Feb. 2004.
Fox Evening News. Televised interview regarding trial of terrorists in federal courts rather than by military commission. 8 Feb. 2004.
National Public Radio (Washington D.C.). Commentary on military lawyers' amicus brief to U.S. Supreme Court in Guantanamo cases. 15 Jan. 2004.
Fox Daytime News. Televised interview, on trying Saddam Hussein. 17 Dec. 2003.
CNN Evening News. Paula Zahn interview, on torture and interrogating Saddam Hussein. 15 Dec. 2003.
Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. News World Today radio interview. LtCol. West Iraqi torture case. 3 Dec. 2003.
ARD Television News, Germany. Morning national news, on U.S. military commissions. Aired 2 Dec. 2003.
The History Channel. Interview: "The Real JAG." Courts-martial in the Vietnam combat zone. Aired 2 Nov. 2003.
ARD Television, Germany. Morning national news, on U.S. military commissions. Aired 3 July 2003.
Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Eleven affiliated radio station interviews: court-martial of U.S. pilot who bombed Canadians. 26 June 2003.
Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. News World Today. Television interview: court-martial of U.S. pilot. 26 June 2003.
Fox Evening News. Televised interview on fragging in military history. Aired 12 April 2003.
National Public Radio. (Los Angeles) "To the Point," on the 1949 Geneva Conventions. 2 April 2003.
National Public Radio. (Washington, D.C.) "Diane Rheme Show," on the 1949 Geneva POW Convention. Aired 24 March 2003.
A&E Television Network. "The Point: Military Law," on military commissions. Aired 2 Feb. 2003.

ABC Television, Australia. Interview: No Gun Ri, Korea, 1950. Washington, D.C. Aired 5 Aug., 2002.

Fox Television News. Washington, D.C. Greta van Susteren: On the Record. 5 July 2002.

National Public Radio. (Boston) "Connections." With Prof. Ruth Wedgewood, on the lawfulness of military commissions. Washington, D.C. 31 January, 2002.

The History Channel. Interview: "The 50th Anniversary of the Uniform Code of Military Justice." New York City. 24 June 2001.

CBS Evening News. Television interview: Bob Kerrey is not a war criminal. From Cornwall, New York. 28 April 2001.

CNN Evening News. Television interview: Bob Kerrey is not a war criminal. From Cornwall, New York. 28 April 2001.

Good Morning America, ABC. Interview: Bob Kerrey is not a war criminal. New York City. 26 April 2001.

Heckerk@dodgc.osd.mil

From:	Heckerk@dodgc.osd.mil
Sent:	Thursday, January 5, 2006 4:18 PM
To:	Henry, Terry (CIV); Loeb, Robert (CIV)
Cc:	Gorsuch, Neil M; jimenezf@dodgc.osd.mil
Subject:	FW: Military Commission Web Site Updates
Attachments:	tmp.htm; al Bahlul delayed to 0900 11 Jan 06 (2 pages).pdf; Khadr delayed to 1430 11 Jan 06 (2 pages).pdf

Karen L. Hecker
Office of the DoD General Counsel (Legal Counsel)

Room 3B652
(703) 571-9349 (DSN 671)
(703) 614-6745 (fax)

This message may contain information protected by the attorney-client, attorney work product, deliberative process, or other privilege. Do not disseminate without prior approval from the Office of the DoD General Counsel.

-----Original Message-----
From: Harvey, Mark, Mr, DoD OGC
Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 16:17
To: Taitt, John, Mr, DoD OGC; Hecker, Karen, Ms DoD OGC
Subject: FW: Military Commission Web Site Updates

Karen and John,

Please inform DoJ that the Presiding Officer has delayed both cases slightly. I have sent the attachments to the DoD PAO. Both the attachments are the same document, just renamed to avoid confusing the DoD PAO web master.

Mark
-----Original Message-----
From: Harvey, Mark, Mr, DoD OGC
Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 16:14
To: Shavers, Michael, Maj, OASD-PA
Cc: Boomer, Jane, MAJ, DoD OGC; Hemingway, Thomas, BG, DoD OGC; Chapman, Michael, Mr, DoD OGC
Subject: Military Commission Web Site Updates

Please update the two web pages as indicated below.

Ali Hamza Ahmed Suleiman AL BAHLUL:
<http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jun2004/d20040629ABCO.pdf> Charge Sheets,
<http://www.defenselink.mil/news/commissions_exhibits_bahlul.html>
Commissions Transcripts, Exhibits, and Allied Papers, <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/presiding_alBahlul.html> Presiding Officer Orders, <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Sep2005/commissions_scheduling_bahlul.html>
Commission Scheduling

Please add the attachment to both the Commissions <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/commissions_exhibits_bahlul.html>
Transcripts, Exhibits, and Allied Papers, and Commission <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Sep2005/commissions_scheduling_bahlul.html>
Scheduling

It should look as follows on the web page:

DATE EVENT
4 Jan 2006 Presiding Officer delays hearing from January 9, 2006 at 10 a.m. to January 10, 2006 at 9 a.m.

Omar Ahmed KHADR; Charge
<http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Nov2005/d20051104khadr.pdf> Sheets, Commissions
<http://www.defenselink.mil/news/commissions_exhibits_khadr.html>
Transcripts, Exhibits, and Allied Papers, Presiding Officer Orders, Commission
<http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jan2006/d20060104khadrhearing.pdf>
Scheduling

Please add the attachment to both
<http://www.defenselink.mil/news/commissions_exhibits_khadr.html>
Commissions Transcripts, Exhibits, and Allied Papers, and Commission <http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jan2006/d20060104khadrhearing.pdf>
Scheduling

It should look as follows on the web page:

DATE EVENT
4 Jan 2006 Presiding Officer delays hearing from January 11, 2006 at 10 a.m. to January 11, 2006 at 2:30 p.m.

Harvey, [redacted] Mr, DoD OGC

From: Hodges, Keith [redacted]

Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 15:14

To: Davis, Morris, COL, DoD OGC; Sullivan, Dwight, COL, DoD OGC; Altenburg, John, Mr, DoD OGC; Hemingw[redacted] Harvey, [redacted] Mr, DoD OGC; Boomer, Jane, MAJ, DoD OGC; [redacted]

Cc: [redacted]

Subject: Rescheduling of Start-Times - Jan 06 Sessions of the Commission

SUBJECT: Rescheduling of Start-Times - Jan 06 Sessions of the Commission

1. The Presiding Officers have been informed by the Staff Judge Advocate, JTF-Guantanamo, that 10 January 2005 is the first day of the Islamic feast of Eid ul-Adha, the Feast of the Sacrifice, and that this is an important Holy day.

2. Though the Presiding Officers are not aware of any request by counsel or an accused that proceedings not be held on that day, the Presiding Officer believes that the significance of this day dictates honoring it even in the absence of a specific request.

3. In recognition of this important Holy day, no session of the Commission will be held on 10 Jan. The session originally scheduled in the case of US v. al Bahlul for 10 Jan will be held at 0900, 11 Jan. The session originally scheduled in the case of US v. Khadr for 11 Jan is moved to 1430, 11 Jan.

3. Counsel and other Commission participants should not change their current travel plans. The Presiding Officers and counsel need the flexibility to hold conferences or conduct additional sessions throughout the period 1300, 9 Jan through the close of business, 12 Jan. Though no session will be held on 10 Jan, counsel may be directed to be present at a conference on that day.

FOR THE PRESIDING OFFICERS
Keith Hodges
Assistant to the Presiding Officers
Military Commission
[redacted]

Harvey, [redacted] Mr, DoD OGC

From: Hodges, Keith [redacted]

Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 15:14

To: Davis, Morris, COL, DoD OGC; Sullivan, Dwight, COL, DoD OGC; Altenburg, John, Mr, DoD OGC; Hemingw[redacted] Harvey, [redacted] Mr, DoD OGC; Boomer, Jane, MAJ, DoD OGC; [redacted]

Cc: [redacted]

Subject: Rescheduling of Start-Times - Jan 06 Sessions of the Commission

SUBJECT: Rescheduling of Start-Times - Jan 06 Sessions of the Commission

1. The Presiding Officers have been informed by the Staff Judge Advocate, JTF-Guantanamo, that 10 January 2005 is the first day of the Islamic feast of Eid ul-Adha, the Feast of the Sacrifice, and that this is an important Holy day.

2. Though the Presiding Officers are not aware of any request by counsel or an accused that proceedings not be held on that day, the Presiding Officer believes that the significance of this day dictates honoring it even in the absence of a specific request.

3. In recognition of this important Holy day, no session of the Commission will be held on 10 Jan. The session originally scheduled in the case of US v. al Bahlul for 10 Jan will be held at 0900, 11 Jan. The session originally scheduled in the case of US v. Khadr for 11 Jan is moved to 1430, 11 Jan.

3. Counsel and other Commission participants should not change their current travel plans. The Presiding Officers and counsel need the flexibility to hold conferences or conduct additional sessions throughout the period 1300, 9 Jan through the close of business, 12 Jan. Though no session will be held on 10 Jan, counsel may be directed to be present at a conference on that day.

FOR THE PRESIDING OFFICERS
Keith Hodges
Assistant to the Presiding Officers
Military Commission
[redacted]

1/5/2006

Karen L. Hecker
Office of the DoD General Counsel (Legal Counsel)

Room 3B652
(703) 571-9349 (DSN 671)
(703) 614-6745 (fax)

This message may contain information protected by the attorney-client, attorney work product, deliberative process, or other privilege. Do not disseminate without prior approval from the Office of the DoD General Counsel.

-----Original Message-----
From: Harvey, Mark, Mr, DoD OGC
Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 16:17
To: Taitt, John, Mr, DoD OGC; Hecker, Karen, Ms DoD OGC
Subject: FW: Military Commission Web Site Updates

Karen and John,

Please inform DoJ that the Presiding Officer has delayed both cases slightly. I have sent the attachments to the DoD PAO. Both the attachments are the same document, just renamed to avoid confusing the DoD PAO web master.

Mark
-----Original Message-----
From: Harvey, Mark, Mr, DoD OGC
Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 16:14
To: Shavers, Michael, Maj, OASD-PA
Cc: Boomer, Jane, MAJ, DoD OGC; Hemingway, Thomas, BG, DoD OGC; Chapman, Michael, Mr, DoD OGC
Subject: Military Commission Web Site Updates

Please update the two web pages as indicated below.

Ali Hamza Ahmed Suleiman AL BAHLUL: Charge Sheets, Commissions Transcripts, Exhibits, and Allied Papers, Presiding Officer Orders, Commission Scheduling

Please add the attachment to both the Commissions Transcripts, Exhibits, and Allied Papers, and Commission Scheduling

It should look as follows on the web page:

DATE	EVENT
4 Jan 2006	Presiding Officer delays hearing from January 9, 2006 at 10 a.m. to January 10, 2006 at 9 a.m.

Omar Ahmed KHADR; Charge Sheets, Commissions Transcripts, Exhibits, and Allied Papers, Presiding Officer Orders, Commission Scheduling

Please add the attachment to both Commissions Transcripts, Exhibits, and Allied Papers, and Commission Scheduling

It should look as follows on the web page:

DATE	EVENT
4 Jan 2006	Presiding Officer delays hearing from January 11, 2006 at 10 a.m. to January 11, 2006 at 2:30 p.m.

WittenSM@state.gov

From:	WittenSM@state.gov
Sent:	Thursday, January 5, 2006 5:23 PM
To:	Gorsuch, Neil M
Cc:	HodgkinsonSL@state.gov
Subject:	FW: Bongo and Abramoff
Attachments:	tmp.htm; Bongo and Abramoff news articles.doc; Bongo and Abramoff NYT.doc

Neil - Thanks for you help on this. Here is the collection of articles I mentioned.

You can reach me on (202) 647-6051. You can reach Sandy Hodgkinson on (202) 647-5543.

> _____
> From: Sherer, Joan M
> Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 11:56 AM
> To: Witten, Samuel M; Hodgkinson, Sandra L
> Subject: Bongo and Abramoff
>
> Sam,
>
> I'm attaching 2 files with articles about President Bongo of Gabon and > Jack Abramoff. If you want additional articles let me know. I culled the > result list down to the articles I thought were more substantive.
>
> <<Bongo and Abramoff news articles.doc>> <<Bongo and Abramoff NYT.doc>>
>
> Joan Sherer
> U.S. Dept. of State
> Ralph J. Bunche Library
> 2201 C St., NW, Room 3239
> Washington, DC 20520
> ph. (202) 647-1146
> fax (202) 647-2971
> shererjm@state.gov
>
>

Copyright 2005 Financial Times Information
All rights reserved
Global News Wire - Asia Africa Intelligence Wire
Copyright 2005 The Statesman Ltd
The Statesman (India)

November 12, 2005

LENGTH: 384 words

HEADLINE: WHEN BONGO MET BUSH

BODY:

Rupert Cornwell in Washington Nov. 11. More trouble swirled around the disgraced Republican lobbyist Mr Jack Abramoff yesterday, after reports that he sought $ 9m from the leader of the west African country of Gabon to organise a White House meeting with President Mr George Bush. The episode was revealed in documents released by a senate committee investigating other dubious dealings of the scandal-battered Mr Abramoff, most vividly a personal letter from the lobbyist to President Mr Omar Bongo, dated 28 July 2003. Mr Abramoff informed the Gabonese leader that his lobbying firm had already been approached by a neighbouring nation which had offered money to launch a major lobbying effort in Washington, its centrepiece a meeting with Mr Bush. But Mr Abramoff wrote that he had been assured that Gabon still wanted to use the services of his firm, and would match its neighbours offer. The documents, obtained by leading US newspapers, show that the lobbyist drew up a draft contract for Gabon to pay $ 9m . There is no evidence that the deal was consummated, and no suggestion that Mr Abramoff had any role in organising the Oval Office meeting between Mr Bush and President Bongo, on 26 May 2004, 10 months after the initial pitch. But the allegation will add to the atmosphere of sleaze now surrounding the Republican party establishment in Washington. It also throws fascinating light on the brazen modus operandi of super-rich lobbyists such as Mr Abramoff, as they traded on their connections. In the letter, according to excerpts in the Washington Post, Mr Abramoff proposed flying to Gabon after a mid-August golfing trip to Scotland with the Congressmen and Senators I take there each year. But, he made clear, Gabon would have pay a part, perhaps 10%, of the agreed fee up front. Most damaging of all perhaps, David Safavian, a former registered agent for President Bongo in Washington, was forced to resign as a White House budget official days before he was charged with lying to federal agents about his own links to the lobby ist. Though there is no evidence that Mr Abramoff set up the meeting between presidents Bush and Bongo, there are plenty of precedents. Mr Billy Carter was a lobbyist for Libya when his brother Jimmy was President in the 1970s. The Independent

JOURNAL-CODE: FSTN

LOAD-DATE: November 11, 2005

Copyright 2005 Financial Times Information
All rights reserved
Global News Wire
Copyright 2005 Voxant Inc
Capitol Hill Press Releases

November 11, 2005

LENGTH: 549 words

HEADLINE: PELOSI AND WAXMAN REQUEST DOCUMENTS RELATING TO ABRAMOFF'S

BODY:

For Immediate Release

Pelosi and Waxman Request Documents Relating to Abramoff's Request for $ 9 Million to Arrange Meeting with Bush

Contact: Brendan Daly, 202-226-7616

November 11, 2005

Washington, D.C. - House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Congressman Henry Waxman, Ranking Member on the Government Reform Committee, sent the a letter this morning to Harriet Miers, Counsel to the President, requesting that she provide Congress with documents relating to lobbyist Jack Abramoff's request for $ 9 million to arrange a meeting between President Bush and Omar Bongo, President of Gabon.

Below is the text of the letter:

November 11, 2005

Ms. Harriet Miers

Counsel to the President

The White House

1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW

Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear Ms. Miers:

Yesterday's New York Times reported that President Bush met with Gabon's President Omar Bongo in May 2004, ten months after lobbyist Jack Abramoff asked President Bongo for $ 9 million to arrange such a meeting. Mr. Abramoff's offer and the size of the requested payment raise questions about what role Mr. Abramoff may have played in the scheduling of this meeting between President Bush and President Bongo.

We are writing to request that you provide us with all White House and State Department documents and correspondence regarding the arrangement of the meeting.

According to the Times, a draft agreement between Mr. Abramoff and Gabon dated August 7, 2003, asked for $ 9 million in lobbying fees to pay for a "public relations effort related to promoting Gabon and securing a visit for President Bongo with the President of the United States."[1] The Times reports that this draft agreement came just 10 days after Mr. Abramoff wrote to President Bongo on July 28, 2003, suggesting that "he had unusual influence to arrange a meeting with President Bush." In that letter, Mr. Abramoff noted: "Without advance resources, I have been cautiously working to obtain a visit for the president to Washington to see President Bush."

White House spokesman Trent Duffy told the Times that arrangements for the visit by the President of Gabon were not unusual and went through "normal staffing channels." However, it is impossible for Congress and the public to assess this assertion without access further documentation from the White House.

We therefore request the following documents:

* All records relating to any contacts or communications between White House staff and Jack Abramoff, the firm Greenberg Traurig, and the firm GrassRoots Interactive regarding a visit by representatives of Gabon.

* All records relating to any contacts or communications between the State Department and Jack Abramoff, the firm Greenberg Traurig, and the firm GrassRoots Interactive regarding a visit by representatives of Gabon.

* All records relating to any direct contacts or communications between White House staff and representatives of Gabon.

* All records relating to any direct contacts or communications between the State Department and representatives of Gabon.

We request that you provide these materials by November 30, 2005.

Sincerely,

Nancy Pelosi Henry A. Waxman

House Democratic Leader Ranking Member,

Government Reform Committee

JOURNAL-CODE: WCAR

LOAD-DATE: November 14, 2005

Copyright 2005 Financial Times Information
All rights reserved
Global News Wire - Europe Intelligence Wire
Copyright 2005 Independent Newspapers (UK) Limited
The Independent

November 11, 2005

LENGTH: 609 words

HEADLINE: THE PRESIDENT, THE DICTATOR AND A $ 9M DEMAND FOR OVAL OFFICE CHAT

BYLINE: Rupert Cornwell in Washington

BODY:

More trouble swirled around the disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff yesterday, after reports that he sought $ 9m from the leader of the west African country of Gabon to organise a White House meeting with President George Bush.

The episode was revealed in documents released by a senate committee investigating other dubious dealings of the scandal- battered Mr Abramoff, most vividly a personal letter from the lobbyist to President Omar Bongo, dated 28 July 2003. Mr Abramoff informed the Gabonese leader that his lobbying firm had already been approached by 'a neighbouring nation' which had offered money to launch a major lobbying effort in Washington, its centrepiece a meeting with Mr Bush.

But Mr Abramoff wrote that he had been assured that Gabon still wanted to use the services of his firm, and would match its neighbour's offer.

The documents, obtained by leading US newspapers, show that the lobbyist drew up a draft contract for Gabon to pay $ 9m to the privilege.

There is no evidence that the deal was consummated, and no suggestion that Mr Abramoff had any role in organising the Oval Office meeting between Mr Bush and President Bongo, on 26 May 2004, 10 months after the initial pitch. But the allegation will add to the atmosphere of sleaze now surrounding the Republican party establishment in Washington.

It also throws fascinating light on the brazen modus operandi of super- rich lobbyists such as Mr Abramoff, as they traded on their connections with senior figures in the administration and Congress to bring in lucrative new business.

In the letter, according to excerpts in the Washington Post, Mr Abramoff proposed flying to Gabon after a mid-August golfing trip to Scotland with 'the Congressmen and Senators I take there each year'. But, he made clear, Gabon would have pay a part, 'perhaps 10%', of the agreed fee up front.

And if the lobbyist did travel to Africa, it would be in a private aircraft 'which bears a substantial cost, unfortunately', also to be paid up front.

Politely, Mr Abramoff made clear that he would take his talents elsewhere if Gabon did put money on the table. 'I would be quite unpopular at my firm if I were to forgo a multimillion-dollar form offer on the hope of a similar opportunity elsewhere.'

The letter ends 'with high regard and much admiration ... sincerely yours, Jack Abramoff, Senior Director, Government Affairs'.

The missive was among documents released by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, which is investigating how Mr Abramoff and an associate extracted more than $ 66m from various native American tribes anxious to protect their gambling businesses. He is said to have described his clients as 'monkeys', 'troglodytes' and 'idiots'.

But the lobbyist's problems do not end there. Months ago, he was charged with wire fraud in connection with a 2000 deal involving floating casinos in Florida.

In the summer, Timothy Flanigan, President Bush's nomination as deputy attorney general, was forced to withdraw after his ties with Mr Abramoff were revealed.

Most damaging of all perhaps, David Safavian, a former registered agent for President Bongo in Washington, was forced to resign as a White House budget official days before he was charged with lying to federal agents about his own links to the lobbyist.

Though there is no evidence that Mr Abramoff set up the meeting between presidents Bush and Bongo, there are plenty of precedents. Billy Carter was a lobbyist for Libya when his brother Jimmy was President in the 1970s. Small countries regularly engage lobbyists to boost their profile in Washington.

JOURNAL-CODE: FIND

LOAD-DATE: November 11, 2005

Copyright 2005 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved
US Fed News

November 11, 2005 Friday 11:51 PM EST

LENGTH: 526 words

HEADLINE: REPS. PELOSI, WAXMAN REQUEST DOCUMENTS RELATING TO ABRAMOFF'S REQUEST FOR $9 MILLION TO ARRANGE MEETING WITH BUSH

BYLINE: US Fed News

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

BODY:

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., issued the text of the following letter:

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Rep. Henry Waxman, Ranking Member on the Government Reform Committee, sent the a letter this morning to Harriet Miers, Counsel to the President, requesting that she provide Congress with documents relating to lobbyist Jack Abramoff's request for $9 million to arrange a meeting between President Bush and Omar Bongo, President of Gabon.

Below is the text of the letter:

November 11, 2005

Ms. Harriet Miers

Counsel to the President

The White House

1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW

Washington, D.C. 20500

Dear Ms. Miers:

Yesterday's New York Times reported that President Bush met with Gabon's President Omar Bongo in May 2004, ten months after lobbyist Jack Abramoff asked President Bongo for $9 million to arrange such a meeting. Mr. Abramoff's offer and the size of the requested payment raise questions about what role Mr. Abramoff may have played in the scheduling of this meeting between President Bush and President Bongo.

We are writing to request that you provide us with all White House and State Department documents a nd correspondence regarding the arrangement of the meeting.

According to the Times, a draft agreement between Mr. Abramoff and Gabon dated August 7, 2003, asked for $9 million in lobbying fees to pay for a "public relations effort related to promoting Gabon and securing a visit for President Bongo with the President of the United States."[1] The Times reports that this draft agreement came just 10 days after Mr. Abramoff wrote to President Bongo on July 28, 2003, suggesting that "he had unusual influence to arrange a meeting with President Bush." In that letter, Mr. Abramoff noted: "Without advance resources, I have been cautiously working to obtain a visit for the president to Washington to see President Bush."

White House spokesman Trent Duffy told the Times that arrangements for the visit by the President of Gabon were not unusual and went through "normal staffing channels." However, it is impossible for Congress and the public to assess this assertion without access further documentation from the White House.

We therefore request the following documents:

* All records relating to any contacts or communications between White House staff and Jack Abramoff, the firm Greenberg Traurig, and the firm GrassRoots Interactive regarding a visit by representatives of Gabon.

* All records relating to any contacts or communications between the State Department and Jack Abramoff, the firm Greenberg Traurig, and the firm GrassRoots Interactive regarding a visit by representatives of Gabon.

* All records relating to any direct contacts or communications between White House staff and representatives of Gabon.

* All records relating to any direct contacts or communications between the State Department and representatives of Gabon.

We request that you provide these materials by November 30, 2005.

Sincerely,

Nancy Pelosi

House Democratic Leader

Henry A. Waxman

Ranking Member,

Government Reform Committee

Contact: Brendan Daly and Jennifer Crider, 202/226-7616.

LOAD-DATE: November 14, 2005

Copyright 2005 Bulletin News Network, Inc.
The Frontrunner

November 10, 2005 Thursday

SECTION: WASHINGTON NEWS

LENGTH: 141 words

HEADLINE: Abramoff Sought $9 Million To Arrange Meeting With Bush

BODY:

Newly disclosed documents show that lobbyist Jack Abramoff asked the President Omar Bongo of Gabon for $9 million to arrange a meeting with President Bush The New York Times (11/10, Shenon, 1.19M) reports that Bongo "met with President Bush in the Oval Office on May 26, 2004, 10 months after Mr. Abramoff made the offer. There has been no evidence in the public record that Mr. Abramoff had any role in organizing the meeting or that he received any money or had a signed contract with Gabon. White House and State Department officials described Mr. Bush's meeting with President Bongo, whose government is regularly accused by the United States of human rights abuses, as routine. The officials said they knew of no involvement by Mr. Abramoff in the arrangements. Officials at Gabon's embassy in Washington did not respond to written questions."

LOAD-DATE: November 10, 2005

Copyright 2005 The New York Times Company
The New York Times

November 10, 2005 Thursday
Late Edition - Final

SECTION: Section A; Column 3; National Desk; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 1361 words

HEADLINE: Lobbyist Sought $9 Million to Set Bush Meeting

BYLINE: By PHILIP SHENON

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, Nov. 9

BODY:

The lobbyist Jack Abramoff asked for $9 million in 2003 from the president of a West African nation to arrange a meeting with President Bush and directed his fees to a Maryland company now under federal scrutiny, according to newly disclosed documents.

The African leader, President Omar Bongo of Gabon, met with President Bush in the Oval Office on May 26, 2004, 10 months after Mr. Abramoff made the offer. There has been no evidence in the public record that Mr. Abramoff had any role in organizing the meeting or that he received any money or had a signed contract with Gabon.

White House and State Department officials described Mr. Bush's meeting with President Bongo, whose government is regularly accused by the United States of human rights abuses, as routine. The officials said they knew of no involvement by Mr. Abramoff in the arrangements. Officials at Gabon's embassy in Washington did not respond to written questions.

"This went through normal staffing channels," said Trent Duffy, a White House spokesman, who said the meeting was "part of the president's outreach to the continent of Africa."

A document from Mr. Abramoff's files that was released last week by a Senate committee shows that in the summer of 2003 he pushed to sign President Bongo as a client, even offering to travel to Gabon immediately after an August golfing vacation to Scotland "with the congressmen and senators I take there each year."

The documents also show that Mr. Abramoff and his colleagues drew up a draft contract that called for $9 million in fees to be paid to GrassRoots Interactive, the small Maryland lobbying company that his former colleagues say he controlled.

Documents, including copies of canceled checks, show that millions of dollars flowed through the company's accounts in 2003, the year it was created, including at least $2.3 million to a California consulting firm that used the same address as the law office of Mr. Abramoff's brother, Robert. A separate check for $400,000 was made out to Kay Gold, another Abramoff family company.

Mr. Abramoff, a Republican fund-raiser who once was one of the most powerful lobbyists in Washington, has been indicted in Florida on federal fraud charges. He is also under investigation by a federal grand jury in Washington and two Senate committees.

The grand jury inquiry initially centered on accusations that Mr. Abramoff had defrauded a group of Indian tribes out of tens of millions of dollars in lobbying fees connected to their gambling operations, including steep fees for work that was never performed.

But federal law enforcement officials say that inquiry has broadened, with prosecutors examining other issues, including Mr. Abramoff's relationship with GrassRoots and other small consulting firms and charities he controlled. Congressional investigators have questioned whether he used them to hide income to avoid paying taxes and to evade disclosure rules for lobbyists. Federal law requires lobbyists for foreign governments to register with the Justice Department.

A spokesman for Mr. Abramoff had no comment on GrassRoots or the lobbyist's contacts with President Bongo. Robert Abramoff did not return repeated phone calls. GrassRoots has no listed telephone number in Silver Spring, Md., where it had been based.

In a draft agreement with Gabon dated Aug. 7, 2003, Mr. Abramoff and his associates asked that $9 million in lobbying fees be paid through wire transfers -- three of them, each for $3 million -- to GrassRoots instead of the Washington offices of Greenberg Traurig, the large lobbying firm where he did most of his work. The agreement promised a "public relations effort related to promoting Gabon and securing a visit for President Bongo with the president of the United States."

In seeking meetings at the White House or on Capitol Hill, foreign leaders, especially those from small nations, regularly turn to Washington lobbyists, especially those who claim connections to the government because of political or family ties.

Billy Carter, President Jimmy Carter's brother, was a registered agent for Libya during his brother's presidency. During the Clinton administration, Anthony Rodham, whose sister, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, was the first lady, acknowledged that he had been offered a six-figure payment by supporters of the president of Paraguay to arrange a meeting with President Bill Clinton.

GrassRoots Interactive came under scrutiny on Capitol Hill in recent months when the Senate Judiciary Committee considered President Bush's nomination of a senior lawyer at Tyco International, a former lobbying client of Mr. Abramoff, as the No. 2 official at the Justice Department.

The lawyer, Timothy E. Flanigan, told the committee that at Mr. Abramoff's suggestion he had directed $2 million to GrassRoots from Tyco for lobbying on the company's behalf.

Instead, Mr. Flanigan said he learned last year that Mr. Abramoff had directed the money to "entities" that the lobbyist controlled and that Tyco was the victim of a "major fraud." After weeks of controversy over his ties to Mr. Abramoff, Mr. Flanigan withdrew his nomination as deputy attorney general last month.

Mr. Abramoff's ties to Gabon were first revealed in a letter that was among hundreds of pages of documents from Mr. Abramoff's files that were released last week by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, which has conducted a year-long investigation of his lobbying for Indian tribes.

When he first approached Gabon, Mr. Abramoff was not new to issues involving West Africa.

He had been a Washington lobbyist for President Mobutu Sese Seko, the repressive leader of neighboring Congo, called Zaire at the time. He also had connections to Gabon through a former business partner, David Safavian, who was a registered agent in Washington for President Bongo. Mr. Safavian, a former White House budget official, was arrested in September on charges of lying about his ties to Mr. Abramoff.

The three-page letter released by the Senate panel was written to Mr. Bongo on Greenberg Traurig stationery and dated July 28, 2003; Mr. Abramoff suggested that he had unusual influence to arrange a meeting with President Bush.

"Without advance resources, I have been cautiously working to obtain a visit for the president to Washington to see President Bush," Mr. Abramoff wrote. "As you know, we were, in advance of the war in Iraq, able to secure a tentative date for this meeting; however, the war canceled all such scheduled visits."

Mr. Abramoff said he was willing to travel to Gabon to meet with Mr. Bongo to discuss the contract if the government would arrange for a private plane.

"It must be on the basis by which I travel anywhere, being in a private aircraft, which bears a substantial cost unfortunately," he said. "I am confident that we will have a long, productive and warm relationship, but good relationships are built on firm understandings at the outset."

Other documents obtained by The New York Times show that Mr. Abramoff and his colleagues prepared two draft agreements, both dated Aug. 7, 2003, that outlined the lobbying plan for Gabon.

One called for GrassRoots to receive $9 million in lobbying fees; the other called for Greenberg Traurig to receive $1 million, all of it in 2003.

A spokeswoman for Greenberg Traurig said the firm had no comment. "We don't comment on whom we do or don't represent," said Jill Perry, a spokeswoman for the firm, which forced Mr. Abramoff to resign last year.

Maryland state records show that GrassRoots were established in 2003 by Edward B. Miller, a Republican lawyer who is now deputy chief of staff to Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. of Maryland. Samuel Hook, a former partner of Mr. Abramoff from Greenberg Traurig, took over it in September 2003.

Mr. Ehrlich's office has said that Mr. Miller is cooperating in the Justice Department investigation. Aron Raskas, a lawyer speaking for Mr. Miller, said Mr. Miller had no knowledge of any project involving Gabon.

Mr. Hook's lawyer, Alyza D. Lewin, said that "Mr. Abramoff solely controlled G.R.I.," a reference to GrassRoots Interactive.

URL: http://www.nytimes.com

GRAPHIC: Photo: President Omar Bongo of Gabon met with President Bush in 2004. (Photo by Shawn Thew/European Pressphoto Agency)(pg. A20)

LOAD-DATE: November 10, 2005

Copyright 2005 The Washington Post
The Washington Post

November 10, 2005 Thursday
Final Edition

SECTION: A Section; A27

LENGTH: 750 words

HEADLINE: August in Libreville?

BODY:

Members of Congress who accompanied former K Street lobbying powerhouse Jack Abramoff on golf trips to Scotland in the summer of 2003 might have looked for another junket instead if they had seen this three-page pitch letter Abramoff wrote on July 28 that year to Gabonese President Omar Bongo.

Abramoff's lobbying activities for his firm Greenberg Traurig LLP, including trips he arranged for members of Congress, are the subject of a criminal investigation as well as an inquiry by the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, which included this letter in documents released last week.

-- Sue Schmidt

Excerpts from Abramoff's letter:

Dear Mr. President,

. . . Our firm is one of the very top lobbying and public affairs law firms in the nation. We have a wealth of powerful corporate and government clients who keep our team of lobbyists very active. Our success rate is exceptional.

. . . I have been cautiously working to obtain a visit for the President . . . to see President Bush, the Congress and policy and opinion makers in the United States. As you know, we were, in advance of the war in Iraq, able to secure a tentative date for this meeting, however, the war cancelled all such scheduled visits, with the exception of the critical US war allies.

Since the time of the war, we have been discussing a rescheduling of the meeting. . . .

Our firm was approached by a neighboring nation which also desired such a meeting, and indeed much more than a meeting. Of course, our firm's main strength is not in just setting up meetings, but in changing and impacting US policy, so to the neighbor, the meeting is important, but merely the tip of the iceberg.

The neighbor has offered to put up the resources which are necessary to not only secure a meeting, but more importantly, to commence a policy effort in Washington which could impact America's Africa policy in limited ways. These resources are substantial and would be used to build a support network for the neighbor which would enable the decision makers to move the neighbor up on the priority list. . . .

Roger [an unidentified friend who suggested this letter] told me not to make a decision yet. . . . [He] told me that Gabon still wished our services and would match the offer of the neighbor. I told him that I am being called incessantly by the neighbor so, if this was a real offer, we needed to confirm it quickly. I have a fiduciary obligation to the firm to confirm possible representations with great certitude.

. . . I suggested that I visit Gabon after my trip to Scotland in mid August, but that in order for me to preserve this and be able to turn down the neighbor's offer, we had to commence the representation, even in small part, perhaps ten percent . . . . Please bear in mind that the neighbor's proposal was to pay the entire amount up front.

. . . [As] with all my clients around the world, if I am required to travel, it must be on the basis by which I travel anywhere, being in a private aircraft, which bears a substantial cost unfortunately. . . . I have always insisted -- even to clients whom I have represented for many years -- that the costs are covered in advance. . . .

. . . I would be quite unpopular at my firm if I were to forego a multi-million dollar firm offer on the hope of a similar opportunity elsewhere.

I suggested again that we commence with a small amount, so that I can secure the firm, and we can commence what will be a very difficult task of achieving the meeting. . . .

I am willing to visit after my visit to Scotland with the Congressmen and Senators I take there each year. It is possible that they will want to join me in Gabon, which would be an extra bonus. . . . [In] order to do this, we must commence the effort as soon as possible and I must know that the extra costs of prolonging my trip can be covered in advance.

I am sorry for all of these logistical details, but we are a firm in high demand and it is my responsibility to ensure that our business approach is prudent. I am confident that we will have a long, productive and warm relationship, but good relationships are built on firm understandings at the outset.

. . . I do need to resolve this one way or another with the neighbor by next week. At that time, I will have delayed them for almost three weeks beyond when they wished to commence the representation. . . .

With high regard and much admiration, I am

Sincerely yours,

Jack Abramoff

Senior Director, Government Affairs

LOAD-DATE: November 10, 2005

Copyright 2005 The New York Times Company
The New York Times

November 16, 2005 Wednesday
Late Edition - Final

SECTION: Section A; Column 1; Editorial Desk; Pg. 22

LENGTH: 309 words

HEADLINE: The Links of Influence Peddling

BODY:

Little did Representative Tom DeLay and other lawmakers dream that in frolicking on the golf junkets of Jack Abramoff, the indicted Republican superlobbyist, the influential politicians might, in effect, be caddying for his avaricious lobbying reach.

It turns out that Mr. Abramoff, the subject of multiple investigations, initiated a typically brazen $9 million proposal that he use his influence to secure a White House visit for President Omar Bongo of Gabon. In an expansive letter to his target, Mr. Abramoff suggested that he could visit President Bongo "after my visit to Scotland with the congressmen and senators I take there each year." He said, "It is possible they will want to join me in Gabon, which will be an extra bonus."

President Gabon did visit President Bush, but there is no evidence so far that Mr. Abramoff actually played the broker or that he packed his lawmaker playmates off to Gabon. There is indisputable evidence, however, that his braggadocio about feting lawmakers on the links was true -- now embarrassingly so, as investigations detail how Mr. Abramoff milked those connections to project an aura of all-purpose political power.

The largely uncontrolled lobbying world of Washington deserves all the attention it is getting by way of Mr. Abramoff, who seems to have styled his shop after "Glengarry Glen Ross." A worthy bill to end the scandalous privately financed junketeering -- $18 million worth by 600 lawmakers in the last five years -- and closely track lobbyists' money and influence has been submitted by two Democratic representatives, Martin Meehan of Massachusetts and Rahm Emanuel of Illinois. As the Republican majority grows anxious about next year's elections and the public's increasing disapproval of Congress, it would be wise to resort to lobbying reform as the last refuge of ex-junketeers.

URL: http://www.nytimes.com

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2005

Copyright 2005 The New York Times Company
The New York Times

November 12, 2005 Saturday
Late Edition - Final

SECTION: Section A; Column 3; National Desk; Pg. 16

LENGTH: 494 words

HEADLINE: Democrats Seek Documents on Lobbyist and Bush Meeting

BYLINE: By PHILIP SHENON

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, Nov. 11

BODY:

House Democratic leaders called on the White House on Friday to release documents showing whether a powerful Republican lobbyist had a role in arranging an Oval Office meeting last year between President Bush and the president of the West African nation of Gabon, whose government had been asked by the lobbyist to pay $9 million to help arrange such a meeting.

In a letter to the White House counsel's office, the House Democratic leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, and the senior Democrat on the Government Reform Committee, Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, said they wanted copies of "all records relating to any connections between White House staff" and the lobbyist, Jack Abramoff, "regarding a visit by representatives of Gabon."

The White House and the State Department have said that the meeting with President Omar Bongo of Gabon on May 26, 2004, was routine and that there was no evidence of any involvement by Mr. Abramoff.

"However," Ms. Pelosi and Mr. Waxman wrote, "it is impossible for Congress and the public to assess this assertion without further documentation from the White House."

The White House has said the meeting had special importance because Gabon held the presidency of the United Nations General Assembly last year and because of the Bush administration's interest in AIDS prevention in Africa. The Gabon Embassy in Washington has not responded to written questions from The New York Times about the meeting.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Abramoff, who is under indictment in Florida and under investigation by a federal grand jury in Washington, would not discuss the lobbyist's approach to President Bongo, whose government has often been criticized by the State Department as having a poor record on human rights.

The White House had no comment Friday on whether it would release documents to the House Democrats, who also requested material from the State Department about President Bongo's meeting.

A White House spokesman, Trent Duffy, said, "President Bush met with President Bongo because he believes in good U.S.-Africa relations, and if Democrats question that, that's their business."

Mr. Abramoff's contacts with Gabon were disclosed last week when the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, which is investigating his lobbying for Indian tribes and their gambling operations, released hundreds of pages of documents from his files, including a July 2003 letter in which Mr. Abramoff wrote to President Bongo to urge Gabon to hire him as a lobbyist.

Other documents obtained by The Times show that Mr. Abramoff and his colleagues drew up a draft contract in August 2003 that called for Gabon to pay $9 million for a "public relations effort related to promoting Gabon and securing a visit for President Bongo with the president of the United States."

There is no evidence in the public record to show that Mr. Abramoff completed a contract with Gabon or received any money from it.

URL: http://www.nytimes.com

LOAD-DATE: November 12, 2005

Neil - Thanks for you help on this. Here is the collection of articles I mentioned.

You can reach me on (202) 647-6051. You can reach Sandy Hodgkinson on (202) 647-5543.

From: Sherer, Joan M

Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 11:56 AM

To: Witten, Samuel M; Hodgkinson, Sandra L

Subject: Bongo and Abramoff

Sam,

I'm attaching 2 files with articles about President Bongo of Gabon and Jack Abramoff. If you want additional articles let me know. I culled the result list down to the articles I thought were more substantive.

<<Bongo and Abramoff news articles.doc>> <<Bongo and Abramoff NYT.doc>>

Joan Sherer
U.S. Dept. of State
Ralph J. Bunche Library
2201 C St., NW, Room 3239
Washington, DC 20520
ph. (202) 647-1146
fax (202) 647-2971
shererjm@state.gov

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Thursday, January 5, 2006 7:07 PM
To: [redacted]@apprisemedia.com'
Subject: RE: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

Sorry. Wild week. Can I call you at 1130 tomorrow?

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@apprisemedia.com [mailto [redacted]@apprisemedia.com]
Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 3:52 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: Detainee Treatment Roundtable
Importance: High

Neil
Haven't heard back from you - can you pleas give a call today about our CFR event. I understand that your buddy [redacted] has left his prior position - I assume that rules him out for participating.

I spoke with [redacted] who said that given [redacted] departure and the timing of the event, he didn't want to send someone to the event officially. He suggested that we reach out to General Hemmingway from the USAF directly. Do you know Hemmingway? I placed a call but have not heard back.

[redacted] suggested pro [redacted] I checked [redacted] out on the internet -- he seems fair and balanced and is sanctioned by both JAG and West Point. Do you know him? I wanted to touch base with you before reaching out to him.

I am around today and tonight although out of pocket 8-9 pm this evening.

[redacted]

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@cfr.org [mailto [redacted]@cfr.org]
Sent: Tuesday, December 06, 2005 10:39 AM
To: [redacted]
Cc: [redacted]@cfr.org
Subject: Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

[redacted]

The JAG Corps and West Point are planning to send [redacted] down for the panel. They just called. Do you want to speak to him directly? Let me know how I can help. Here is the info:

Cheers,
[redacted]

[redacted]

|----------|
| | | [redacted] | | | | | | [redacted] | | | | | | U.S. Military Academy; 646 Swift Road; West Point, NY 10996-1905 | | | | | | Office phone: 845-[redacted] fax: 845[redacted] office e-mail: | | [redacted]@usma.edu | |

(See attached file: Solis CV.doc)

[redacted]

Council on Foreign Relations
58 East 68th Street
New York, NY 10021
(212[redacted]
[redacted]@cfr.org
http://www.cfr.org

[redacted]

<[redacted]@appri To semedia.com> <[redacted]@cfr.org>
cc
12/01/2005 07:47 <[redacted]@cfr.org>,
PM <[redacted]@cfr.org>,
<ngorsuch@khhte.com>
Subject
Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

[redacted]

Thanks for forwarding. These all look like compelling participants, and I believe Neil Gorsuch, (who is coordinating with me), knows some of the presenters listed below.

Should we follow up with [redacted] or the suggested panelists first?

[redacted]

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@cfr.org <[redacted]@cfr.org>
To: [redacted] <[redacted]@apprisemedia.com>
CC: [redacted]@cfr.org <[redacted]@cfr.org>; [redacted]@cfr.org <[redacted]@cfr.org>
Sent: Thu Dec 01 13:06:43 2005
Subject: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

[redacted]

See e-mail below. I think one of these consultants would be a good possibility for the panel discussion on 12 Dec. I'll let you make contact.

[redacted]

[redacted]

Council on Foreign Relations
58 East 68th Street, New York, NY 10021 Tel (212) [redacted] Fax (212) [redacted] http://www.cfr.org

----- Forwarded by Evans Revere/NY/CFR on 12/01/2005 03:30 PM -----

[redacted] <[redacted]@osd.mil>

12/01/2005 03:28 PM
To
"'erevere@cfr.org'" <erevere@cfr.org> cc
'[redacted]@osd.gov'" <[redacted]@osd.gov> Subject
BRIEFING PROPOSAL

[redacted]

Delighted to touch base again after several years being in the trenches.
I'm working as the policy advisor for the Office of Detainee Affairs under the Office of Secretary of Defense. We do policy for the Department of Defense related to detainee issues Part of our charter is outreach and we have an outreach presentation related to our operations in Guantanamo Bay which I believe would be an interesting forum/presentation for the Council.
The four presenters are:

1. [redacted] Office of the Secretary of Defense (DASD-DA) 2. [redacted] Office for the Administrative Review of the Detention of Enemy Combatants (OARDEC) 3. [redacted] Legal Adviser to the Appointing Authority, Office of Military Commissions (OMC)

4 [redacted] Detainee Affairs Division Chief, Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) Given the dates of the presentation organizational substitutes may be used, but the format will be the same. The panel is called "the Guantanamo Bay Detainee Policies, Proceses and Operations brief". The brief is approximately 50 minutes is length and followed by a 30 minute Q and A session. Of course a closed door non attribution session with the Council experts is also possible.

Please discuss with your colleagues and let's discuss. My telephone number is: [redacted] Hope you are enjoying my favorite town and look forward to seeing you in the near future.

Cheers,

[redacted]

[redacted]@apprisemedia.com

From: [redacted]@apprisemedia.com
Sent: Friday, January 06, 2006 7:49 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable
Attachments: tmp.htm

I have a conf call then. But 11 or 12 noon is open.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Neil.Gorsuch@usdoj.gov <Neil.Gorsuch@usdoj.gov>
To [redacted] <[redacted]@apprisemedia.com>
Sent: Thu Jan 05 16:06:12 2006
Subject: RE: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

Sorry. Wild week. Can I call you at 1130 tomorrow?

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@apprisemedia.com [mailto: [redacted]@apprisemedia.com]
Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 3:52 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: Detainee Treatment Roundtable
Importance: High

Neil
Haven't heard back from you - can you pleas give a call today about our CFR event. I understand that your buddy [redacted] has left his prior position - I assume that rules him out for participating.

I spoke with [redacted] who said that given [redacted] departure and the timing of the event, he didn't want to send someone to the event officially. He suggested that we reach out to General [redacted] from the USAF directly. Do you know [redacted] I placed a call but have not heard back.

[redacted] I checked [redacted] out on the internet -- he seems fair and balanced and is sanctioned by both JAG and West Point. Do you know him? I wanted to touch base with you before reaching out to him.

I am around today and tonight although out of pocket 8-9 pm this evening.

[redacted]

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@cfr.org [mailto [redacted]@cfr.org]

Sent: Tuesday, December 06, 2005 10:39 AM
To: [redacted]
Cc: [redacted]@cfr.org
Subject: Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

[redacted]

The JAG Corps and West Point are planning to send [redacted] down for the panel. They just called. Do you want to speak to him directly? Let me know how I can help. Here is the info:

Cheers,
[redacted]

|----------|
| | | [redacted] | | | | | [redacted] | | | | | U.S. Military Academy; 646 Swift Road; West Point, NY 10996-1905 | | | | | Office phone: 845-[redacted] fax: 845-[redacted] office e-mail: | | [redacted]@usma.edu | |

(See attached file: Solis CV.doc)

[redacted]

Council on Foreign Relations
58 East 68th Street
New York, NY 10021
(212)[redacted]
[redacted]@cfr.org
http://www.cfr.org

[redacted]

<[redacted]@appri To
semedia.com> <[redacted]@cfr.org>
cc
12/01/2005 07:47 <[redacted]@cfr.org>,
PM <[redacted]@cfr.org>,
<ngorsuch@khhte.com>
Subject
Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

Thanks for forwarding. These all look like compelling participants, and I believe Neil Gorsuch, (who is coordinating with me), knows some of the presenters listed below.

Should we follow up wit
or the suggested panelists first?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From @cfr.org < @cfr.org>
To @apprisemedia.com>
CC: @cfr.org < @cfr.org>; @cfr.org < @cfr.org>
Sent: Thu Dec 01 13:06:43 2005
Subject: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

See e-mail below. I think one of these consultants would be a good possibility for the panel discussion on 12 Dec. I'll let you make contact.

Council on Foreign Relations
58 East 68th Street, New York, NY 10021 Tel (212) Fax (212) http://www.cfr.org

----- Forwarded by on 12/01/2005 03:30 PM -----

" " < @osd.mil>

12/01/2005 03:28 PM
To
"@cfr.org'" <erevere@cfr.org> cc
"@osd.gov'" @osd.gov> Subject
BRIEFING PROPOSAL

[redacted]

Delighted to touch base again after several years being in the trenches.
I'm working as the policy advisor for the Office of Detainee Affairs under the Office of Secretary of Defense. We do policy for the Department of Defense related to detainee issues Part of our charter is outreach and we have an outreach presentation related to our operations in Guantanamo Bay which I believe would be an interesting forum/presentation for the Council.
The four presenters are:

1. [redacted] Office of the Secretary of Defense (DASD-DA) 2. [redacted] Office for the Administrative Review of the Detention of Enemy Combatants (OARDEC) 3. [redacted] USAF, Legal Adviser to the Appointing Authority, Office of Military Commissions (OMC)

4 [redacted] Detainee Affairs Division Chief, Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) Given the dates of the presentation organizational substitutes may be used, but the format will be the same.
The panel is called "the Guantanamo Bay Detainee Policies, Proceses and Operations brief".
The brief is approximately 50 minutes is length and followed by a 30 minute Q and A session. Of course a closed door non attribution session with the Council experts is also possible.

Please discuss with your colleagues and let's discuss. My telephone number is: [redacted] Hope you are enjoying my favorite town and look forward to seeing you in the near future.

Cheers,
[redacted]

I have a conf call then. But 11 or 12 noon is open.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Neil.Gorsuch@usdoj.gov <Neil.Gorsuch@usdoj.gov>
To: [redacted] [redacted]@apprisemedia.com>
Sent: Thu Jan 05 16:06:12 2006
Subject: RE: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

Sorry. Wild week. Can I call you at 1130 tomorrow?

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@apprisemedia.com [mailto [redacted]@apprisemedia.com]
Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 3:52 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: Detainee Treatment Roundtable
Importance: High

Neil
Haven't heard back from you - can you pleas give a call today about our CFR event. I understand that your buddy [redacted] has left his prior position - I assume that rules him out for participating.

I spoke with [redacted] who said that given [redacted] departure and the timing of the event, he didn't want to send someone to the event officially. He suggested that we reach out to [redacted] directly. Do you know [redacted]? I placed a call but have not heard back.

[redacted] I checked [redacted] out on the internet -- he seems fair and balanced and is sanctioned by both JAG and West Point. Do you know him? I wanted to touch base with you before reaching out to him.

I am around today and tonight although out of pocket 8-9 pm this evening.

[redacted]

-----Original Message-----
From [redacted]@cfr.org [mailt [redacted]@cfr.org]
Sent: Tuesday, December 06, 2005 10:39 AM
To: [redacted]
Cc: [redacted]@cfr.org
Subject: Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

[redacted]

The JAG Corps and West Point are planning to send [redacted] down for the panel. They just called. Do you want to speak to him directly? Let me know how I can help. Here is the info:

Cheers,
[redacted]

[redacted]

[redacted]

U.S. Military Academy; 646 Swift Road; West Point, NY 10996-1905

Office phone: 845 [redacted] fax: 845- [redacted] office e-mail:

| [redacted]@usma.edu |
|

(See attached file: Solis CV.doc)

[redacted]

Council on Foreign Relations
58 East 68th Street
New York, NY 10021
(212) [redacted]
[redacted]@cfr.org
http://www.cfr.org

[redacted]

<[redacted]@appri semedia.com> To <[redacted]@cfr.org>
cc
12/01/2005 07:47 PM <[redacted]@cfr.org>, <[redacted]@cfr.org>, <ngorsuch@khhte.com>
Subject
Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

[redacted]

Thanks for forwarding. These all look like compelling participants, and I believe Neil Gorsuch, (who is coordinating with me), knows some of the presenters listed below.

Should we follow up wit[redacted] or the suggested panelists first?

[redacted]

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From [redacted]@cfr.org <[redacted]@cfr.org>
T[redacted]@apprisemedia.com>
CC[redacted]@cfr.org <cquinn@cfr.org> [redacted]@cfr.org <[redacted]@cfr.org>
Sent: Thu Dec 01 13:06:43 2005
Subject: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

[redacted]

See e-mail below. I think one of these consultants would be a good possibility for the panel discussion on 12 Dec. I'll let you make contact.

Pete

COL Peter R. Mansoor
Senior Military Fellow
Council on Foreign Relations
58 East 68th Street, New York, NY 10021 Tel (212[redacted] Fax (212[redacted] http://www.cfr.org

----- Forwarded by Evans Revere/NY/CFR on 12/01/2005 03:30 PM -----

[redacted] <[redacted]@osd.mil>

12/01/2005 03:28 PM
To
"[redacted]@cfr.org"" <erevere@cfr.org> cc
"[redacted]" <[redacted]@osd.gov> Subject
BRIEFING PROPOSAL

[redacted]

Delighted to touch base again after several years being in the trenches.
I'm working as the policy advisor for the Office of Detainee Affairs under the Office of Secretary of Defense. We do policy for the Department of Defense related to detainee issues Part of our charter is outreach and we have an outreach presentation related to our operations in Guantanamo Bay which I believe would be an interesting forum/presentation for the Council.
The four presenters are:

1 [redacted] Office of the Secretary of Defense (DASD-DA) 2 [redacted] Office for the Administrative Review of the Detention of Enemy Combatants (OARDEC) 3 [redacted] Legal Adviser to the Appointing Authority, Office of Military Commissions (OMC)

4 [redacted]
Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS)
Given the dates of the presentation organizational substitutes may be used, but the format will be the same.
The panel is called "the Guantanamo Bay Detainee Policies, Proceses and Operations brief".
The brief is approximately 50 minutes is length and followed by a 30 minute Q and A session. Of course a closed door non attribution session with the Council experts is also possible.

Please discuss with your colleagues and let's discuss. My telephone number is: [redacted] Hope you are enjoying my favorite town and look forward to seeing you in the near future.

Cheers,
[redacted]

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Friday, January 6, 2006 7:59 AM
To: [redacted]@apprisemedia.com'
Subject: Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

How about 2?

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@apprisemedia.com <[redacted]@apprisemedia.com>
To: Gorsuch, Neil M <Neil.Gorsuch@SMOJMD.USDOJ.gov>
Sent: Fri Jan 06 07:49:12 2006
Subject: Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

I have a conf call then. But 11 or 12 noon is open.

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: Neil.Gorsuch@usdoj.gov <Neil.Gorsuch@usdoj.gov>
To: [redacted] <[redacted]@apprisemedia.com>
Sent: Thu Jan 05 16:06:12 2006
Subject: RE: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

Sorry. Wild week. Can I call you at 1130 tomorrow?

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@apprisemedia.com [mailto [redacted]@apprisemedia.com]
Sent: Thursday, January 05, 2006 3:52 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: FW: Detainee Treatment Roundtable
Importance: High

Neil
Haven't heard back from you - can you pleas give a call today about our CFR event. I understand that your buddy [redacted] has left his prior position - I assume that rules him out for participating.

I spoke with [redacted] who said that given [redacted] departure and the timing of the event, he didn't want to send someone to the event officially. He suggested that we reach out to General [redacted] from the USAF directly. Do you know [redacted] I placed a call but have not heard back.

Col Mansoor, the Council Fellow, suggested pro Gary Solis, Visting Prof of Law at West Point. I checked Solis out on the internet ... he seems fair and balanced and is sanctioned by both JAG and West Point

Solis out on the internet -- he seems fair and balanced and is sanctioned by both JAG and West Point. Do you know him? I wanted to touch base with you before reaching out to him.

I am around today and tonight although out of pocket 8-9 pm this evening.

[redacted]

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@cfr.org [mailto[redacted]@cfr.org]
Sent: Tuesday, December 06, 2005 10:39 AM
To: Michael Behringer
Cc: [redacted]@cfr.org
Subject: Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

[redacted]

The JAG Corps and West Point are planning to send [redacted]down for the panel. They just called. Do you want to speak to him directly? Let me know how I can help. Here is the info:

Cheers,
[redacted]

|----------|
| | | [redacted] | | | | | U.S. Military Academy; 646 Swift Road; West Point, NY 10996-1905 | | | | | Office phone: 845-[redacted] fax: 845-[redacted] office e-mail: | | [redacted]@usma.edu | |

(See attached file: Solis CV.doc)

[redacted]

Council on Foreign Relations
58 East 68th Street
New York, NY 10021
(212)[redacted]
[redacted]@cfr.org
http://www.cfr.org

[redacted]
<[redacted]@appri To semedia.com> <[redacted]@cfr.org>
cc
12/01/2005 07:47 <[redacted]@cfr.org>,
PM <[redacted]@cfr.org>,
<[redacted]@khhte.com>
Subject

Re: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

Thanks for forwarding. These all look like compelling participants, and I believe Neil Gorsuch, (who is coordinating with me), knows some of the presenters listed below.

Should we follow up with or the suggested panelists first?

Sent from my BlackBerry Wireless Handheld

-----Original Message-----
From: @cfr.org < @cfr.org>
To: < @apprisemedia.com>
CC: @cfr.org < @cfr.org>; @cfr.org < @cfr.org>
Sent: Thu Dec 01 13:06:43 2005
Subject: Detainee Treatment Roundtable

See e-mail below. I think one of these consultants would be a good possibility for the panel discussion on 12 Dec. I'll let you make contact.

Council on Foreign Relations
58 East 68th Street, New York, NY 10021 Tel (212) Fax (212) http://www.cfr.org

----- Forwarded by on 12/01/2005 03:30 PM -----

" " < @osd.mil>
12/01/2005 03:28 PM

12/01/2005 05:28 PM
To
"[redacted]@cfr.org'" <[redacted]@cfr.org> cc
"[redacted] <[redacted]> Subject
BRIEFING PROPOSAL

[redacted]

Delighted to touch base again after several years being in the trenches.
I'm working as the policy advisor for the Office of Detainee Affairs under the Office of Secretary of Defense. We do policy for the Department of Defense related to detainee issues Part of our charter is outreach and we have an outreach presentation related to our operations in Guantanamo Bay which I believe would be an interesting forum/presentation for the Council.
The four presenters are:

[redacted] Office of the Secretary of Defense (DASD-DA) 2. [redacted] Office for the Administrative Review of the Detention of Enemy Combatants (OARDEC) 3. [redacted] Legal Adviser to the Appointing Authority, Office of Military Commissions (OMC)

4 [redacted] oint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) Given the dates of the presentation organizational substitutes may be used, but the format will be the same.
The panel is called "the Guantanamo Bay Detainee Policies, Proceses and Operations brief".
The brief is approximately 50 minutes is length and followed by a 30 minute Q and A session. Of course a closed door non attribution session with the Council experts is also possible.

Please discuss with your colleagues and let's discuss. My telephone number is: [redacted] Hope you are enjoying my favorite town and look forward to seeing you in the near future.

Cheers,
[redacted]

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Friday, January 6, 2006 11:03 AM
To: Ames, Andrew; Apisson, Elizabeth M; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Fadely, Kathlynn (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wiggins, Mike; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 1/6/06 Civil Division News

State files for summary judgment on base-closing lawsuit

Yemeni's journey: From bin Laden to Guantánamo

The perils of whistleblowing

AP

1/6/06

State files for summary judgment on base-closing lawsuit

NASHVILLE, Tenn. Copyright 2005 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed. -- The state of Tennessee has filed a motion for summary judgment in its lawsuit against the Department of Defense to keep the 118th Airlift Wing in Nashville, Gov. Phil Bredesen announced Thursday.

The suit seeks to reverse an initial recommendation by the independent Base Realignment and Closure Commission that the Tennessee Air National Guard unit be dissolved and its eight C-130 Hercules planes sent to other states.

But the BRAC panel amended its recommendation in the final version passed by Congress in October, delaying any relocation of the wing's planes for five years.

The state is continuing to pursue the suit, in which Bredesen contends it's against the law for an Air National Guard unit to be relocated or withdrawn from a state without consent or approval from the governor, who acts as commander in chief of the state's Guard forces.

Attorney General Paul Summers filed the motion last week.

"Federal law says the Governor has the final say in whether a unit stays or goes, and I'm doing everything I can to ensure the 118th continues to call Nashville home," Bredesen said Thursday in a statement.

The 118th Airlift Wing's medical squadron aided in the evacuation of medical patients from the Gulf Coast region in the wake of Hurricane Katrina last August. The governor has said the unit is vital to quick disaster response in Tennessee.

END

International Herald-Tribune

1/6/06

Yemeni's journey: From bin Laden to Guantánamo

In 1996, Salim Hamdan, a 26-year-old Yemeni, was working part-time as a taxi driver, dividing his modest income between the mattress he rented in a crowded boardinghouse in the dirty, bustling city of Sana and his daily supply of khat leaves, the stimulant that most Yemeni men chew by the fistful.

Then one day the low-hanging horizon of his life lifted: He was recruited for jihad. He joined about 35 other Muslims, mostly Yemenis, who were preparing to leave for Tajikistan to fight alongside that country's small Islamic insurgency against its Russian-backed government. One of the group's leaders was a self-assured young man named Nasser al-Bahri.

Hamdan, an orphaned only child who had the rough equivalent of a fourth-grade education, wasn't especially religious and had no grand plans for his life other than the hope that he might someday be married, but he nevertheless initially embraced the idea of becoming a holy warrior.

It did not hurt that the trip was to be paid for - Bahri told him that the group had raised money from a handful of Saudi-based Muslim charities - and that Hamdan would also receive a salary.

After six months roaming Afghanistan's mountainous terrain, the jihadis were turned back at the Tajik border. At loose ends, one suggested that they go see a man named Osama bin Laden, a well-known sheik among radical Islamists who led a militant group of itinerant Muslim holy warriors called Al Qaeda.

They made their way to bin Laden's home in Farm Hada, a mountain village outside Jalalabad. Seventeen of the original 35 decided to stay, Hamdan and Bahri among them.

For the next several years, both men worked for bin Laden, first in Farm Hada, then, when he relocated for security reasons in 1997, at a better-fortified compound in the desert outside Kandahar. In 1999, Bahri and Hamdan's lives became further entwined. At bin Laden's urging and with his financial help, they married Yemeni sisters in Sana and returned to Afghanistan with their new wives.

By Sept. 11, 2001, however, Bahri and Hamdan's paths had diverged. Bahri was in prison in Yemen for his suspected links to Al Qaeda's bombing of an American naval destroyer, the Cole, in 2000. Hamdan was still with bin Laden, though not for long.

In late November 2001, with the U.S. military campaign in Afghanistan well under way, Hamdan was picked up near the border of Pakistan by a group of Afghan warlords. They hogtied him with electrical wire and within a matter of days turned him over to the Americans for a $5,000 bounty.

The interrogations started, and Hamdan was soon identified as Saqr al-Jedawi, his alias during his years with bin Laden. He spent the next six months in U.S. prison camps in Bagram and Kandahar before being flown to Guantánamo Bay in May 2002.

Today, he lives in a cell in Guantánamo, 6 by 9 feet, or 2 by 3 meters, awaiting trial by a special military tribunal established by U.S. presidential order in the aftermath of Sept. 11. If everything goes according to the government's plans, the Bush administration will prosecute Hamdan for violating the laws of war by conspiring to commit acts of terrorism against the United States.

The government has revealed little about its case against Hamdan - this portrait is drawn principally from his lawyers, family members, and a former Qaeda operative - but it has charged him with serious offenses, including transporting weapons and serving as a bodyguard to bin Laden. If convicted on all charges, Hamdan could receive a life sentence.

Hamdan's attorneys, a government-appointed U.S. Navy lawyer and a professor at Georgetown University Law Center, do not deny that their client worked directly for bin Laden. But they play down his importance to Al Qaeda, portraying him as an employee, an uneducated and far-from-devout driver and mechanic, who was grateful for a paycheck but generally ignorant of the terrorist enterprise for which he worked.

Also, they say that the tribunals, known officially as military commissions, are illegal - and they have sued the U.S. government to block them from going forward.

This spring, the detainee's lawyers will have the chance to make their case to the Supreme Court, when it hears Hamdan v. Rumsfeld.

The name of the case alone guarantees that it will be one of the most closely watched arguments of the year, and the eventual ruling will have far-reaching implications not just for Hamdan and the rest of the Guantánamo detainees, but also for presidential war powers - and quite possibly for the future of democracy in the Middle East.

If the "war on terror" is, at its heart, a battle to show the Islamic world that there is an alternative to oppressive theocracies and autocratic dictators, nothing is more important than how the U.S. government dispenses justice to detainees like Salim Hamdan.

Until now, America's wartime practice has been to hold on to captured combatants until the end of hostilities, when there is no longer a threat of them returning to the battlefield. In this case, though, the battlefield is unmapped and the hostilities could continue for decades.

For the moment, the government has broadly classified nearly all of the more than 500 detainees at Guantánamo as enemy combatants, but eventually it will to have to start sorting them out.

This will entail answering some difficult questions. Are all Muslim men who answered the call to jihad equally guilty? Which detainees represent a threat to the United States? Who is worth prosecuting, and how?

In a three-page military order issued Nov. 13, 2001, President George W. Bush authorized the special tribunals before which Salim Hamdan and other non-American enemy combatants are to be tried. The trials will be held in Guantánamo before panels of three to seven military officers selected by an administration appointee.

The administration opted for these special tribunals over the U.S. criminal courts for a number of practical reasons. Broadly speaking, certain rights that would be considered fundamental in a civilian court would not apply.

If defendants were suspected terrorists, for instance, they could not very well be permitted to see all the evidence against them, as some of it would no doubt be classified for national security reasons.

Practical considerations aside, the creation of the nation's first war crimes tribunals since World War II sent a symbolic message, putting the war against Islamic extremism in the same class as the war against Nazism.

The tribunals also fit with the Bush administration's larger strategy to reassert and expand presidential authority in the aftermath of Sept. 11.

The executive branch would have complete control. Congress - the body empowered by the Constitution to convene military tribunals - not only was left out of the decision to establish them; it also was not consulted on how the tribunals would work.

Instead, the administration's lawyers wrote all of the rules, from the composition of the panels to the standards for admissible evidence to the definition of a war crime.

The judiciary branch was also cut out of the process: Contested verdicts would be reviewed not by a U.S. court of appeals but by a three-member panel picked by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

The first batch of defendants for the tribunals, Hamdan and three others, were carefully selected and then repeatedly vetted on their journey up the chain of command. Case summaries were passed from the military lawyers assigned to the prosecution team to the Pentagon's adviser for the tribunals to Paul Wolfowitz, then deputy defense secretary, and to Bush.

Hamdan was originally slated to be the first Arab tried. The formal charge being brought against him is conspiracy, which the administration defines as having "joined an enterprise of persons who shared a common criminal purpose."

The government is certainly aware that the first trials will be closely scrutinized, and it seems quite unlikely that it would choose a case that was not airtight.

Whatever evidence the government may have against Hamdan, it is hard to believe he could have worked for bin Laden for five years, through several high-profile terrorist attacks, without the knowledge of Al Qaeda's intentions or bin Laden's trust. And given that he has admitted to being a driver, the progression to transporting weapons is hardly a leap.

Yet it seems clear that Hamdan was not a high-ranking officer of Al Qaeda. By the time the United States decided to try him in 2003, there were certainly people in custody suspected of more serious crimes. Why not prosecute the more heinous offenders first?

Like the government, Hamdan's lawyers see him as much more than a detainee; to them, he represents the pretext for a historic and unconstitutional presidential power grab.

As Hamdan's lawyers and other critics see it, the administration, by unilaterally creating the tribunals, defining the offenses and handpicking the judges and juries, is not only denying detainees fair trials, it is also violating bedrock principles of the American government.

Neal Katyal, the architect of Hamdan's defense, draws a sharp distinction between waging war, an act over which the president should have broad authority, and meting out justice. He has written more than a thousand pages of briefs arguing that the president has neither the authority to create the tribunals without explicit congressional approval nor the right to deny Hamdan status as a prisoner of war, and in so doing strip him of protections guaranteed by the Geneva Conventions.

Katyal's arguments found traction in federal court in Washington in autumn of 2004. Just as Hamdan's second round of preliminary hearings was getting under way at Guantánamo, Judge James Robertson, a former naval officer, ruled in his favor, declaring the tribunals illegal and abruptly halting the proceedings 30 minutes after they had begun.

In July 2005, however, a three-judge appeals panel that included John Roberts Jr., now chief justice of the Supreme Court, overturned the decision.

Katyal and his co-counsel, Lieutenant Commander Charles Swift, petitioned the Supreme Court for review, and in November, after delaying action on the case for several weeks, the court announced that it would hear Hamdan v. Rumsfeld.

This was not the final word. No sooner had the Supreme Court agreed to consider Hamdan's case than a Republican senator from South Carolina, Lindsey Graham, introduced a last-minute amendment to a defense-authorization bill explicitly denying all Guantánamo detainees habeas corpus rights, or access to the U.S. federal courts.

This had been the administration's intent from the moment it started sketching out its legal strategy in the war on terror in the aftermath of Sept. 11, but the last time the issue came before the Supreme Court, in the spring of 2004 in another detainee case, the court ruled against the president (with a loud dissent from Justice Antonin Scalia).

Now Graham was effectively interceding on the administration's behalf in what amounted to an end run around the Supreme Court.

Days later, however, Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat, persuaded Graham to change the wording of the amendment so that it would not derail pending cases, including Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. It has since passed both the House and the Senate and now awaits the president's signature, which is expected any day.

For his part, Hamdan's immediate concerns have more to do with day-to-day life at Guantánamo Bay - how much time detainees are permitted to exercise and at what time of day, what books they are allowed to read, what comfort items they are allowed to keep in their cells - than with the future of his historic lawsuit against the U.S. government.

Shortly after the Supreme Court agreed to hear Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, Swift visited Hamdan's cell armed with several front-page newspaper articles about the development.

When Swift delivered the news, Hamdan smiled. Within a matter of minutes, though, his mood had visibly darkened, Swift says. Then Hamdan asked him, "What is this exactly that I've won?"

END

In-Pharma Trechnologist.com

1/6/06

The perils of whistleblowing

The firing of Dr Peter Rost by Pfizer highlights the position that employees can be faced with if they take a stand on what they believe to be illegal activity in the companies they work for.

The choices in such a situation are limited – quit and find a new job; turn a blind eye and in doing so risk becoming party to the activity; or act, and risk jeopardizing their career.

The outspoken ex-Pfizer exec, who has long been a thorn in Pfizer's side as an advocate of drug re-importation – to which Pfizer is greatly opposed – was fired on 1 December 2005 after a False Claims Act civil case, launched by Dr Rost against Pfizer/Pharmacia on 3 June 2003, was unsealed.

Dr Rost accused Pfizer/Pharmacia of defrauding the Medicare Program by off-label promotion of Genotropin, a prescription growth hormone.

His complaint alleges that Genotropin was promoted for its anti-aging effects in adults and for unapproved genetic disorders in children, and that this off-label marketing produced $50 million in illegal Genotropin sales, 25 per cent of the total.

An email, made available on the Green & Savits' website, sent from Dr Rost to Marie-Caroline Sainpy, senior vice president, Pfizer on 21 January 2003 stated:

"Pharmacia has been actively promoting Genotropin for more than 5 years, mainly for anti-ageing purposes. For growth hormone, this is a felony. Pharmacia sales reps who did not agree to off-label promotion were fired, or other adverse action was taken against them. We also have compliance records from sales reps indicating in writing that they had been forced to do off-label promotion. Pharmacia also actively encouraged off-label promotions by through favourable contracts with distributors and doctors exclusively working in the anti-ageing area. Pharmacia also paid kickbacks, sometimes in the form of "consulting agreements" of up to $50,000."

In the US it can be a federal crime for any growth hormone to be promoted off-label because of the significant abuse potential associated with growth hormones and the harm they can have if taken incorrectly.

According to Dr Rost, filing against his own employer was a matter on which he had "no choice". "I tried for months through meetings and written correspondence to get the company to act but when they did not I had to take matters into my own hands."

"Off-label promotion of growth hormone can carry up to a 5-year jail term. I risked going to jail if I knew about this and did not act," alleged Dr Rost.

This civil claim was kept sealed until November 2005. Once it was opened, the US attorney's office in Boston decided not to intervene. However, Dr Rost now intends to pursue the claim against Pfizer/Pharmacia, funding the legal challenge himself.

According to Dr Rost, the Justice Department does not intervene in 70-80 per cent of these types of cases due to lack of resources. "If they thought it was without merit they could dismiss it, which they haven't," he alleged.

If Dr Rost were to win his civil case, Pfizer would be fined a large sum and the government will retain 75-80 per cent as compensation. The remainder would be paid to Dr Rost as a bonus.

Pfizer has since filed a motion to dismiss Dr Rost's civil case. It argues that it was Pfizer lawyers, not Rost, who were the true whistleblowers - informing federal officials of Genotropin irregularities in letters via email, before Rost filed the proper legal paperwork.

A letter, made available on the Green & Savitt's website, sent by Jeffrey Kindler, Pfizer's vice-chairman and general counsel, dated May 28, 2003, and received by Dr Rost on June 9, 2003, acknowledged and validated Rost's disclosure of the company's illegal marketing conduct, stating:

"I recognize that, with your assistance, Pharmacia examined these issues in 2002 and made significant changes to correct the issues you raised. Nevertheless we are making additional changes to the endocrine care business based on our review, which we are also in the process of disclosing to the relevant government authorities."

The issue that will now be argued in court is whether the general letters sent to the government by Pfizer constitutes sufficient notification to the government or not, Jon Green, Green & Savits' law firm told In-PharmaTechnologist.com.

Rost said that in addition to the civil case that he will be pursuing, a criminal investigation of Genotropin has been underway, led by Susan Winkler, assistant US Attorney, Boston.

"I have testified twice before a grand jury in Boston, and several of my colleagues have also testified," he said.

If the Justice Department decides from this testimony that there is sufficient evidence to pursue the matter further, they will call an indictment against the employees involved, with the risk of large fines and possible jail time. The current status of this criminal case could not, however, be confirmed by In-PharmaTechnologist.com.

Pfizer settled a similar criminal lawsuit, initiated by whistleblower Dr David Franklin, after the company pleaded guilty to criminal fraud in the promotion of Neurontin, and agreed to pay $430 million last year.

In 2003, Dr Rost also settled a whistle-blower lawsuit against Wyeth for an undisclosed amount. He made allegations about wages and unpaid taxes in Wyeth's operations he oversaw in Sweden, Denmark and Norway from 1999 to 2001 before landing at Pharmacia. He would comment no further on the matter.

Dr Rost has also now launched an unfair dismissal case against Pfizer, following the company's decision to fire him last month.

"Whether or not Pfizer have the False Claims Act civil case dismissed has no bearing on the recent unfair dismissal case launched by Rost against Pfizer," said Green.

"The unfair dismissal case is based around the fact that after he began raising these issues of illegal activity to Pfizer in Oct 2003, he was told a few months later that there would be no position for him in the company," said Green.

In New Jersey, there's a statute called the Conscientious employee protection act (CEPA) where if an employee raises concerns pertaining to what they believe are illegal activities conducted by the company, even if these turn out to be unfounded, employees cannot punish them or retaliate in any way, Green explained.

According to the unfair dismissal complaint, when Pfizer acquired Pharmacia in 2002, Rost was then a vice president at Pharmacia who was initially informed by Pfizer that "there is no question whatsoever on our side with your being considered for several positions."

Prior to the takeover in 2002, Dr Rost's supervisor Magriet Gabriel-Regis, group vice president, Pharmacia, met with Marie-Caroline Sainpy, senior vice president, Pfizer and recommended his continued employment.

According to his end of year review in 2002 written by Gabriel-Regis, "Peter brought a tremendous difference to the department. He has effected a major reorganization, reanalyzed many aspects of the business and essentially rebuilt plans from the ground up. His significant role and the energy he has devoted will pay off even more in the future. Peter is a key leader with potential for an even larger senior marketing role or a high-level role within operations."

However, in January 2003 The New York Times published a front-page article describing how Rost had launched a whistleblower lawsuit against his former employee Wyeth. Shortly after, Pfizer informed Dr Rost that it would not be offering him a position within the company, according to the legal complaint on the Green & Savits' website.

Paul Fitzhenry, a Pfizer spokesman claimed that the latest unfair dismissal lawsuit was "baseless" and that Pfizer would "vigorously defend the case."

Pfizer said it had kept Dr Rost on the payroll until this month to avoid any associated complications while the False Claims Act was being investigated against Pfizer.

Had there been no lawsuit, Rost would have been given severance pay and released in 2003, when his vice president's position at Pharmacia was eliminated as part of the merger between the two companies, claimed Fitzhenry.

Commenting on the situation, Dr Rost said "I don't enjoy having to sue people – for 20 years prior to all this mess I have had no contact for lawyers."

"I am now looking for another job so that I can support myself and my family however the big pharma companies are reluctant to interview me for any positions," he said.

END

Williams, Jan

From: Williams, Jan
Sent: Friday, January 06, 2006 4:06 PM
To: Tamargo, Mauricio J; Spagnoli, Deborah A. (USPC); Herraiz, Domingo S.; Flores, Robert; Gillis, John; 'mdavis@who.eop.gov'; /o=USDOJ/ou=USAPAE/cn=Recipients/cn=Mailboxes/cn=SMalloy; Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Akers, Eric J.; Ames, Andrew; Barnett, Thomas O.; Battle, Michael (USAEO); Beach, Andrew; Beck, Cherith (USAARE); Bianco, Joseph F.; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Boardman, Michelle; Boote, John; Bottner, Andrea; Bounds, Ryan W (OLP); Bradbury, Steve; Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Burch, Victoria; Chambers, Shane P; Clinger, James H; Cohen, Brian; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Cook, Elisebeth C; Cook, Marita L. (USAWY); Cooperstein, Theodore M; Coppenger, Chesed L. (TAX); Costigan, Michael; Coughlin, Robert; Curtis, O. Benton; Daley, Cybele; David, Matt; Dhillon, Uttam; Dummermuth, Matt (USAVAE); Eisenberg, John; Elwood, Courtney; Elwood, John; Flaherty, Connor; Freeman, Sharee (CRT); Friedrich, Matthew; Gambatesa, Donald (USMS); Garre, Gregory G; Glut, Martha (USANE); Gober, Chris; Golden, Lois; Goodling, Monica; Gorsuch, Neil M; Greg Harris; Hagle, Timothy; Harris, Gregory; Henke, Tracy (SMO); Hertling, Richard; Hofer, Patrick F. (TAX); Hoisington, Jana; Holland, Eric W; Irving, John (ODAG); Jaffer, Jamil N; Jordan, Theresa (USADE); Jungeblut, Neal P.; Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keehner, Laura; Kessler, Elizabeth A; Korn, Jennifer; Lesch, Jaclyn; Little, Kimani (CRT); Longlet, Benjamin; Lonick, Saundra; Luckinbill, Trent W.; Macklin, Kristi R; MacLean, Alex (CRT); Magnuson, Cynthia; Marshall, C. Kevin; Martinson, Wanda; Masoudi, Gerald; McArthur, Patrick; McDonald, Bruce; McFarland, Steven T (ODAG); McIntosh, Brent; McKee, Cindy (USAKS); McKeown, Matt (ENRD); McKnight, Cynthia M (CRT); McNally, Edward; McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Metcalf, Mark H (CRT); Miranda, Matthew; Monheim, Thomas; Moore, Miriam (ODAG); Morrison, Richard T. (TAX); Murphy, Sean; Neumayr, Mary (ENRD); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nichols, Grant W; Nowacki, John; OConnell, James; Otis, Lee L; Otis, William G.; Pagliocca, Theresa; Parsky, Laura; Peabody, Payson R. (TAX); Peed, Carl; Potter, Janet; Racicot, Tim (USAMT); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Roberts, Crystal; Roe, Price (OCIO); Roehrkasse, Brian; Roper, Matt M; Rosenberg, Chuck; Rowe, Kiri; Sampson, Kyle; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Schmitt, Glenn; Schwartz, Arthur; Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Selim, George (CRS); Sellers, Kiahna (OAG); Smith, Kimberly A; Sours, Raquel; Strug, Kerri; Swenson, Lily F; Taylor, Bruce A.; Tenpas, Ronald J (ODAG); Todd, Gordon (OLP); Tomlinson, Linda (USANH); Turner, Donald J. (USAPAM); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Underhill, Deborah; Vargas, Omar (CRT); Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Warren, Julie; Williams, Jan; Woodruff, William; Boente, Dana J. (TAX); Nash, Stuart (ODAG); Oldham, Jeffrey L; Pacold, Martha M; Purpura, Michael M (ODAG); Rowan, Patrick (ODAG); Senger, Jeffrey M; Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Webb, Lauren; White, Clifford Subject: Breakfast Hosted by the Attorney General

U.S. Department of Justice
Senior Executive Service and Schedule C Appointees

You are Invited to a Breakfast Reception hosted by Attorney General Gonzales

Wednesday, January 18, 2006
10:00 a.m. - 10:45 a.m.
Attorney General's Conference Room
Fifth Floor, RFK Main Building

$5.00 Cost at the Door
R.S.V.P. Required
Please respond by Thursday, January 12, at NOON to Jan Williams

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, January 09, 2006 8:08 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Monday, January 09, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060109.pdf; agnb060109.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, JANUARY 9, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Specter Has Asked Gonzales Testify On Warrantless Eavesdropping 2

Risen Book Filled With Stories From Disgruntled Intelligence Officials 3

Homeland Response:

Goss Redoubling Efforts To Stop CIA Leaks 3

War News:

Bremer Says Bush, Rumsfeld Ignored His Request For More Troops 4

At Least 14 Killed In Suicide Attack At Iraqi Interior Ministry 4

Blackhawk Crash, Insurgent Action Result In 17 US Troop Deaths In Iraq 4

Shiite Iraqis Receiving Militia Training In Iran 5

Study Estimates Iraq War Costs Could Exceed $2 Trillion 5

Iraqi Government Said To Be Vulnerable To Military Coup 5

US Ambassador Outlines Challenges For Iraq 5

Debaathification Committee Divides Iraqis 6

Zarqawi Claims Bin Laden Ordered Rocket Attack Against Israel 6

Retired US Army Officers Endorse Planned Withdrawal Of Forces From Afghanistan 6

Corporate Scandals:

Compliance Panels Add Teeth To Industry's Self-Policing Efforts 6

NYTimes Says SEC Must Remain Serious About Punishing Top Corporate Officers 7

Criminal Law:

Abramoff Case Could Expose Largest Influence-Peddling Scheme In Decades 7

Dean Says No Democrats Took Donations From Abramoff 10

DOJ Said To Have Intensified Anti-Corruption Probes 10

Lawmakers Nervous Over Reports Cunningham Wore FBI Wire 10

Probe Finds Houston DNA Lab Near "Total Breakdown." 10

NYTimes Editor Killed In DC Street Robbery 11

FBI Withdraws From Utah Internet Sex Predator Task Force 11

Virginia Woman Uses DNA To Find Out Who Killed Her Cat 11

Civil Law:

11th Circuit Reinstates $54.6 Million Award To Salvadoran Torture Victims 12

Civil Rights:

San Francisco Police Officer's Video Stirs Ire 12

Crackdown On Worldwide Prostitution Rackets Urged 12

Cato Official Says Florida Voucher Decision Has National Implications 13

Antitrust:

Boston Scientific Makes Formal $25 Billion Guidant Bid 13

Constellation-FPL Merger Caps Shattuck's Rise To Top 14

Banks May Widen Real Estate Role 15

Environment/Indian Affairs:

First Funerals Held For West Virginia Miners 15

Three Tribal Colleges Join Federal Library Program 16

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Marijuana Advocates Push Legalization Initiatives In Colorado, Nevada 16

Convicted Medical Marijuana Activist Ordered To Leave Canada 17

Georgia Protestors Call For End To "Operation Meth Merchant" Prosecution 17

Mexican Drug Cartel Said To Be Weaker But Still In Control Of Trafficking 17

Trial To Begin In March For Doctor Accused Of Giving NFL Players Steroids 18

Immigration:
Kondracke Says Bush Should Have "Frank Chat" With Radio Hosts About Immigration 18

Tax:
Mallaby Argues For Rolling Back Bush Tax Cuts 18

Congress-Administration:
Alito Confirmation Hearings Begin Today 18
Florida Federal Judges Reject Request To End Secret Case Transfers 24
Bush Made 17 More Recess Appointments Last Week 24
Bush Seeks To Revive Compassionate Conservative Reputation 25
DeLay Abandons Effort To Return As Majority Leader 25
In Wake Of Scandals, GOP Leaders Ponder Lobbying Reforms 27
VA Regional Offices Found To Be Giving Incorrect Information 28
Some Pentagon Analysts Said To Be Skeptical About TRICARE Savings 29
Novak Says Rove Appears To Have Blundered With New Medicare Drug Benefit 29
Private Sector Council To Focus On Fixing Federal Procurement System 29
Cost Of Postage Stamp Increases By Two Cents 29

Other News:
Wage Gains Remain Below Pre-2001 Recession Levels 29
Schwarzenegger Aims To Rebuild State, Image With Large Public Works Plan 31
Maryland GOP Hoping To Build On Ehrlich's Election Success 31
Warner Critical Of DC "Partisanship." 32
In Split With Bush, McClellan Backs His Mother For Texas Governor 32
Food Industry Makes Progress In Effort To Ban State Labeling Laws 32
More Companies Phasing Out Pension Plans 32
Charitable Donors Defy Predictions 33
Sharon's Doctors Prepare To Ease Him Out Of Coma 33
Gaza Said To Have Descended Into Near-Anarchy 35
Iran Ready To Resume Nuclear Program 35
Jordan Passes Measure Preventing Surrender Of US Citizens To ICC 36
Georgian President Says Russia Exerts Energy Control Over Former Soviet States 36
Haitian Elections Postponed Again 36
Turkey Says Half-Dozen More May Have Bird Flu 37
Conservatives Continue To Lead In Run-Up To Canadian Elections 37
Man Shot At Border Is Top News In Mexico 37
In Caracas, Belafonte Calls Bush "Greatest Terrorist In The World." 38
Hun Sen Cracking Down On Cambodia's Remaining Opposition Groups 38
Brazil Succeeds In Creating Cost-Effective Ethanol 38
More Than Two Million Muslims In Mecca For Hajj 38
John Paul II's Assailant To Be Freed This Week 38
US, South Korea Urged To Enter Into Free Trade Agreement 38
Multinational Trade Organizations Said To Have Lost Power 38
NYTimes Criticizes US Corporation's Support For Indonesian Military 39

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 39

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 40

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter Has Asked Gonzales Testify On Warrantless Eavesdropping. USA Today/AP (1/9) reports Sen. Arlen Specter, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, "said he has asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to testify publicly on the legality of eavesdropping without warrants on phone conversations between terrorism suspects overseas and in the USA. A prominent conservative on the committee said he is troubled by the legal arguments the Bush administration has given for establishing the National Security Agency (NSA) program. President Bush has pointed to the congressional resolution that authorized him to use force against Iraq as allowing him to order the domestic spying." Sen. Sam Brownback said Sunday, "There was no discussion in anything that I was around that gave the president a broad surveillance authority with that resolution."

DOJ_NMG_0008364

DNC Files FOIA Request On Domestic Spying. The Washington Times (1/9, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "A Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request by the Democratic National Committee (DNC) -- demanding the White House release Justice Department memos outlining whatever authority there is for President Bush, during the war on terrorism, to spy on certain people in the United States without court oversight -- has been hand-delivered to Justice Department headquarters by DNC General Counsel Joe Sandler. Actually, it took three DNC officials to load up, haul and deliver the FOIAs, as there were 160,000 separate requests -- each printed and boxed up -- signed by party supporters in the past two weeks. The Justice Department has 20 days to respond, although the DNC says it could be sooner depending on the outcome of a secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court hearing this week on the legal authority for the domestic-wiretapping program.'

Brownback Says 9/11 Resolution Did Not Give Bush "Broad Surveillance Authority." Asked on ABC's This Week (1/8, Stephanopoulos) if he was "confident that the administration has issued lawfully" in allowing the NSA to conduct domestic surveillance, Sen. Sam Brownback said, ": I think we need to hold hearings on it and we're going to. … I am troubled by what the basis for the grounds that the administration says that they did these on, the legal basis, and I think we need to look at that far more broadly and understand it a great deal. I think this is something that bears looking into and us to be able to establish a policy within constitutional frameworks of what a president can or cannot do." Asked if he thought "the 9/11 resolution gave the president the authority for this program," Brownback answered, "It didn't, in my vote. I voted for that resolution. … There was no discussion in anything that I was around that that gave the president a broad surveillance authority with that resolution."

Risen Commends Those Who Leaked NSA Story. New York Times reporter James Risen, appearing on NBC's Meet the Press (1/8. Russert), was asked how he came to learn of the existence of the NSA's secret domestic surveillance program, Risen responded, "People in the government who had been told about it or were involved in it came to me because they were deeply troubled. They felt that there was something going wrong in the government; they believed that there was illegal activity. And my colleague, Eric Lichtblau of the New York Times, also began to hear the same thing from other people. And we happened to sit next to each other in the Washington bureau of the New York Times, and we began to compare notes, and we realized we were hearing about the same thing. … I think that these people who came forward did so in the best tradition of whistleblowing, and they did so for the best reasons, and that is because they believed that there was illegal activity going on. Whether it was illegal or not is something that will now have to be determined."

Risen Book Filled With Stories From Disgruntled Intelligence Officials. The Financial Times (1/9, Alden) reviews James Risen's "State of War," reporting, "President George W. Bush has his own establishment problem, as reporter James Risen's new book State of War makes clear. Like [Bob] Woodward before him, Risen has been on the receiving end of leaks from career national security officials who are deeply unhappy with the current administration. Mr Bush declared war on the bureaucracy after September 11 2001 and it is fighting back. Risen and his New York Times colleague Eric Lichtblau revealed last month that Mr Bush secretly authorised the National Security Agency to intercept telephone and e-mail communications on US soil, an explosive story that has sparked a national debate over presidential powers. The anonymous sources, who are now the target of a Bush administration leak investigation, were nearly a dozen current and former government officials." Bush "has paid a high price for alienating those institutions." The "biggest reckoning may come at the hands of the CIA, which has been decimated by defections during the Bush years. … The professionals have fought back, revealing more and more of how the intelligence was manipulated." The Times says the book's chapters are filled with stories "from disgruntled spooks who believe the war on terrorism has been badly mishandled from the outset. Such criticisms will not surprise the agency's many neo-conservative detractors, who see it as too hidebound by timidity and bureaucratic inertia to operate in a war in which the old rulebooks no longer apply."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Goss Redoubling Efforts To Stop CIA Leaks. Time (1/16, Waller, Burger, Bennett) reports in its "Notebook" column, "Angered by recent leaks of information about sensitive intelligence operations, CIA Director Porter Goss is redoubling efforts to get his spooks to keep their mouths shut.

DOJ_NMG_0008365

At staff meetings last week, CIA managers at the agency's Langley, Va., headquarters told employees that the leaking had got out of control and needed to stop." Time adds, "The Bush Administration seems apoplectic over the revelations in November about the CIA's secret network of terrorist-interrogation prisons and the disclosure in the New York Times last month that the President authorized the National Security Agency (NSA) to eavesdrop on the phone calls of some Americans without a warrant. The latter report was also in State of War, a book by Times reporter James Risen." Goss "is concerned about the potential effects of books written by those with inside knowledge of agency operations. … Goss has banned current CIA officers from publishing books and ordered stricter reviews of retirees' books." Time adds that "there are efforts within the government to identify leakers. The Justice Department is investigating who gave away the NSA secrets. While such probes rarely succeed, the department's new willingness to subpoena reporters and their records could change that."

Newsweek (1/16) adds in its "Periscope" column that the intelligence community "is also furious over disclosures in New York Times reporter James Risen's 'State of War' about a Clinton-era CIA plot, Operation Merlin. Risen writes that a former Russian nuclear scientist on the agency payroll was to take Russian nuke blueprints (acquired by the CIA) and leak them to Iran. The catch: they contained faulty info that the CIA hoped Iran would incorporate in a bomb design. But the initiative went awry when the scientist noticed the flaws and told the Iranians to look closely at the blueprints." Current and former US intel officials "complain that while the scheme Risen cites may have ended years ago, similar tactics could be used today. They say the book…puts bad guys on guard."

WAR NEWS:

Bremer Says Bush, Rumsfeld Ignored His Request For More Troops. The Los Angeles Times/Reuters (1/9) reports, "L. Paul Bremer III, who led the U.S. civilian occupation authority in Iraq after the 2003 invasion, said he had urged President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to increase postwar troop strength in the country, but his pleas were ignored." In an interview on NBC Television broadcast Sunday night, "Bremer said he sent a memo to Rumsfeld suggesting that half a million soldiers would be needed, three times the number deployed by the Bush administration. 'I never had any reaction from him,' the former diplomat told NBC's Brian Williams on "Dateline." Reuters adds, "Although he never heard back from his direct boss, Bremer said he discussed his concerns with Bush, who told him he would seek troops from other countries, but did not mention increasing US forces."

Bremer Book Hits Stores Today. The Washington Post (1/9, A17, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Today's the day that L. Paul 'Jerry' Bremer 's book, 'My Year in Iraq: The Struggle to Build a Future of Hope,' goes on sale. Early buzz was that the former Iraq reconstruction chief and Medal of Freedom winner is going to say that Washington ordered him to disband the Iraqi military -- widely seen as perhaps the most colossal strategic blunder of the Iraq war. There's also said to be some score-settling with a senior Pentagon official whose last name rhymes with 'held.'"

At Least 14 Killed In Suicide Attack At Iraqi Interior Ministry. Reuters (1/9) reports, "At least 14 people were killed and 20 wounded in an apparent suicide attack on the Iraqi Interior Ministry in Baghdad on Monday, police said. Police told Reuters two suicide bombers appeared to have blown themselves up outside the building. It was not immediately clear how many of the dead and wounded included civilians."

Blackhawk Crash, Insurgent Action Result In 17 US Troop Deaths In Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (1/8, lead story, 3:15, Woodruff) began its broadcast with "the deadliest helicopter crash in Iraq since last January," which it called "the worst incident in a bloody weekend for Americans. Seventeen were killed. Most of them died when a Blackhawk helicopter went down near Tal Afar, killing 12 people including two civilians on the ground. Five Marines died in separate attacks." ABC (Nauert) added, "A senior military official here in Baghdad tells ABC News tonight that hostile fire does not appear to be the cause of the crash. But at this point, they cannot rule anything out."

NBC Nightly News (1/8, story 2, 1:30, Seigenthaler) reported that the Blackhawk "went down eight miles west of town killing for your and eight passengers onboard. The cause of the crash is unknown, but rain and low visibility was reported at the time." Meanwhile, "there were separate incidents in and near the city of Fallujah. Three died from gunshot wounds and two others by homemade bombs.

DOJ_NMG_0008366

Since the beginning of the year 30 servicemen had have been killed in Iraq. … A recent rise in insurgent activity coincides with a rotation of forces in Iraq."

Many newspapers run brief, similar reports on the crash, among them USA Today (1/9, Diamond, 2.31M), Washington Post (1/9, A1, Hernandez, Sebti, 744K), Los Angeles Times (1/9, Kraul, Daragahi, 958K), New York Times (1/9, Oppel Jr., 1.19M), Washington Times/AP (1/9, Quinn). Knight Ridder (1/9, Hannah), Reuters (1/9, Long) and Bloomberg (1/9, Critchlow) also report the story.

Shiite Iraqis Receiving Militia Training In Iran. The Washington Times (1/9, Behn, 90K) reports, "Shi'ite clerics are recruiting young Iraqis to go to neighboring Iran for political indoctrination and militia training, said the uncle of one young man who recently returned from a one-month session. Upon the return of the young man -- whose name has been withheld from this article to protect his family -- he was recruited into the armed wing of the pro-Iranian Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) political party, the uncle said." The claim "is consistent with remarks by U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, who has repeatedly warned about Iranian meddling in Iraq's affairs." The National Council of Resistance of Iran (NCRI), "an exiled opposition group -- also charges that Tehran has been training Iraqi and other nationals in intelligence gathering and terrorist operations at garrisons across Iran."

Study Estimates Iraq War Costs Could Exceed $2 Trillion. A study by Columbia University economist Joseph E. Stiglitz and Harvard lecturer Linda Bilmes to be released today in Boston at a conference of economists and social scientists estimates the cost of the war in Iraq is far higher than the Administration has projected. The Boston Globe (1/9, Bender, 484K) reports, "The cost of the Iraq war could top $2 trillion after factoring in long-term healthcare for wounded US veterans, rebuilding a worn-down military, and accounting for other unforeseen bills and economic losses, according to a new analysis." That "far exceeds projections made by the Bush administration." It "is more than four times what the war was expected to cost through 2006 -- around $500 billion, according to congressional budget data."

The Washington Times/UPI (1/9) quotes Stiglitz saying, "Shortly before the war, when administration economist Larry Lindsey suggested that the costs might range between $100 and $200 billion, administration spokesmen quickly distanced themselves from those numbers. … But in retrospect, it appears that Lindsey's numbers represented a gross underestimate of the actual costs."

Time (1/16, Donnelly) reports in its "Notebook" column, "U.S. Military Officers often complain privately that the American people don't fully appreciate the costs -- human or economic -- of the Iraq war. A new paper by Harvard budget expert Linda Bilmes and Nobel-prizewinning Columbia economist Joseph Stiglitz may help address that. It claims that the final cost to the U.S. could be $2 trillion -- 10 times as high as the worst-case scenario of $200 billion suggested by a White House official before the war. The discrepancy is in part because of Bilmes and Stiglitz's holistic accounting methods. Their tally goes far beyond the traditional budget lines of the Pentagon, which says $173 billion was spent through September 2005. For instance, the paper includes estimates for the lifetime cost of disability payments and health care for some 16,000 injured soldiers, increased recruitment budgets, and -- since the government has not reined in spending or raised taxed -- debt financing for war expenditures. The paper also counts macroeconomic effects like the rising price of oil."

Iraqi Government Said To Be Vulnerable To Military Coup. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (1/9, 958K) Aaron Belkin, associate professor of political science at UC Santa Barbara, writes, "But the mere fact of an election cannot change a fundamental truth about Iraq: Saddam Hussein governed as a brutal dictator not simply because he was cruel but also because of the treacherous political landscape that destabilized his relationship with his own military . Hussein was highly vulnerable to a military coup, and future Iraqi leaders will be just as susceptible. Regardless of the election's outcome, a coup will probably follow a U.S. pullout, and Iraq will again be ruled by a dictator."

US Ambassador Outlines Challenges For Iraq. Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador to Iraq, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/9, 2.11M) that "for Iraq to succeed there must be cross-ethnic and cross-sectarian cooperation that will lead to a national compact on three key issues dividing Iraq's communities and factions. First, as leaders from all communities have agreed, there has to be a government of national unity, which includes all major players

DOJ_NMG_0008367

-- including Sunni Arabs. … Second, the constitution will likely need to be amended in the coming year to broaden support. Iraqi leaders have begun discussing technical adjustments to make the political system resulting from the constitution more workable; compromises on some substantive issues such as federalization in Arab regions of Iraq; and a bill of assurances emphasizing national unity and individual rights. In addition, the outside world is waiting to see how welcoming Iraq will be to much-needed investment that can bring jobs and technology to Iraq. Third, Iraq's leaders will need to work together to reform security institutions and eliminate a number of militias and other armed groups."

Debaathification Committee Divides Iraqis. The Washington Post (1/9, A14, Spinner, 744K) reports from Baghdad on "sculptures" that had been "erected as symbols of prosperity and power under Saddam Hussein," all of which have been removed. Says the Post, "In a decision in October that has polarized residents of the capital, the officially sanctioned Debaathification Committee ordered the removal of memorials and monuments it deemed offensive. The move has brought a sensitive issue into sharp focus: How much of the era of Hussein, now on trial for crimes against humanity, should be preserved for posterity? The committee, which also vets former members of the Hussein government for inclusion in the current government, drew up the edict on the monuments, labeled Document 900, in secret. It has never been made public."

Zarqawi Claims Bin Laden Ordered Rocket Attack Against Israel. AFP (1/9) reports Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, "said in an audio tape put onto the Internet that rockets had been fired at Israel from Lebanon last month 'on the instructions' of the network's overall chief Osama bin Laden. … The tape was placed on the site normally used by his group, the Organization of Al-Qaeda in Mesopotamia, which had claimed responsibility for the rockets in an on-line statement on December 29." AFP notes, "Israel the previous day had carried out an air strike against a base of a Syrian-backed Palestinian group on the southern outskirts of Beirut in retaliation for cross-border Katyusha rocket attacks on northern Israel."

Retired US Army Officers Endorse Planned Withdrawal Of Forces From Afghanistan. Retired Army Lt. Col. Gordon Cucullu and Retired Maj. Gen. Paul E.Vallely write in the Washington Times (1/9, 90K), "In what may be a late Christmas present to some members of the famed 10th Mountain Division headquartered in Camp Drum, N.Y., Pentagon officials announced that the 4th Brigade that had been scheduled to deploy en masse to Afghanistan would now only send a smaller element. At the moment a battalion task force from the 4th Brigade is scheduled to deploy, a considerably smaller number than originally scheduled. Why the cutback? Simple, as Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld has said from the outset, 'we'll stay as long as we're needed, not a day more.' At this point NATO has 'stood up to the mission' in the words of a senior Defense official, and is taking responsibility for the southern area of Afghanistan." They conclude, "Combat commanders consistently recommend a logical, effective strategy that injects common sense and military professionalism into a situation dominated by political gamesmanship, hysteria, disinformation and irrational hatred of the president, the military and the country. To be victorious, America can't yank the rug out, as we did to our Vietnamese allies, but must implement a deliberate, calculated force adjustment of the kind that marked our successful disengagement from other historic battlefields. This is the recipe for victory, and the approach now ongoing in Afghanistan demonstrates and reinforces its validity."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Compliance Panels Add Teeth To Industry's Self-Policing Efforts. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Lublin) reports, "Scott Gilbert, the top compliance cop at Marsh & McLennan Cos., wanted to speed up training about new ethics rules for staffers at one Marsh unit. So he asked the unit's leaders to describe their plans to the board of directors' new compliance committee last September." The Journal continues, "Board-level presentations 'focus the attention of management,' says Mr. Gilbert, whom the New York financial giant hired as its first chief compliance officer in January 2005. A compliance committee 'is a very useful thing,' he adds." The Journal adds, "Others agree. A small but growing number of major corporations are creating board-level compliance panels to oversee how well their companies are obeying legal, regulatory and ethical requirements. Twenty-two Standard & Poor's 500 companies, mainly in the fields of health care and financial services, have board committees primarily focused on compliance and legal issues, up from 15 in 2003, according to an analysis by recruiters Spencer Stuart. … Compliance committees typically seek to ensure that employees don't run afoul of mandates such as antibribery laws, worker-safety rules and whistle-blower protections adopted after business scandals. They enhance the clout of managers who enforce compliance, keep tabs on compliance programs and lighten the load of audit committees."

DOJ_NMG_0008368

NYTimes Says SEC Must Remain Serious About Punishing Top Corporate Officers. An editorial in the New York Times (1/9, 1.19M) says, "The Securities and Exchange Commission, under its chairman, Christopher Cox, took an important step in the fight against corporate malfeasance last week. By issuing guidelines on when and why it would impose fines, the commission added transparency to an oft-criticized process. … The new guidelines say the decision to levy a fine will hinge on whether the corporation and its shareholders were unjustly enriched." The Times adds, "The new guidelines were unanimous, which is good. We're glad that Mr. Cox has the entire commission moving in one direction. … But the new guidelines will work only if the commissioners remain serious about pursuing punishment against top officers."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Case Could Expose Largest Influence-Peddling Scheme In Decades. U.S. News and World Report (1/16, Pound) that the "big question" in Washington is "not what happens to [Jack] Abramoff but whom he'll bring down with him. The list of those with potential problems is long indeed and starts with" former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. After DeLay, "there's a handful of lesser congressional fry, perhaps a senator, and enough current and former congressional aides to field a baseball team." US News adds, "People with knowledge of the federal investigation of Abramoff say prosecutors are focusing on Rep. Bob Ney. … A decision on a Ney indictment could come within weeks, sources say. Ney denies any wrongdoing." US News adds, "Some old Washington hands believe that when the case finally fades from the headlines, it will go down as the biggest influence-peddling scheme to hit the nation's capital in decades."

In its cover package, Time (1/16, Tumulty) adds that the Abramoff investigation "could become one of the biggest corruption probes in U.S. history, possibly putting dozens of lawmakers in legal or political jeopardy." Time continues, "In an internal e-mail obtained by TIME, the director of the FBI's Washington field office, Michael Mason, congratulated some 15 agents and 15 support staff members under him on the case for 'a huge accomplishment' in squeezing Abramoff to make a deal after 18 months of investigation and negotiation, one that made 'a huge contribution to ensuring the very integrity of our government.' But he added that 'the case is far from over.' Another official involved with the probe told TIME that investigators are viewing Abramoff as 'the middle guy,' suggesting there are bigger targets in their sights."

Administration Moves To Account For Every Abramoff Visit To White House. In a separate article in its cover package, Time (1/16, Cooper, Allen) reports, "Bracing for the worst, Administration officials obtained from the Secret Service a list of all the times Abramoff entered the White House complex, and they scrambled to determine the reason for each visit. Bush aides are also trying to identify all the photos that may exist of the two men together. Abramoff attended Hanukkah and holiday events at the White House, according to an aide who has seen the list. Press secretary Scott McClellan said Abramoff might have attended large gatherings with Bush but added, 'The President does not know him, nor does the President recall ever meeting him.'" Time adds, "In the end, Bush may be saved by the textured relationship he has long had with well-heeled donors, who raised $300 million for his 2004 campaign, the most expensive one in the nation's history. When the President is traveling, he does not like to have contributors or local officials in his cars, planes or holding rooms unless they are there for a good reason, and he sometimes questions his underlings sharply if someone he considers extraneous is admitted. To make sure that doesn't happen, chief of staff Andrew Card has set up an elaborate vetting system that keeps people from sidling up to the President to suggest or hand anything to him."

Tension Said To Be "Palpable" As Abramoff Probe Sends "Shudders" Through Washington. Time (1/16, Tumulty) reports in its cover package, "A high-level source tells TIME that prosecutors will…focus much of their energies on the lesser and easier-to-prove charge of 'honest services mail fraud,' for which they have to show only that a lawmaker has acted in his personal interest or that of another individual but not of his constituents in return for improper gain. That lowering of the bar for criminal-corruption cases is sending shudders from the Capitol to the lobbying corridor of K Street. And none of that even begins to address the question of whether those who dined, traveled and socialized with Abramoff might have violated Congress's own loophole-ridden rules." All of which "explains why lobbying and ethics reform suddenly seem so popular on Capitol Hill, with lawmakers vying to outdo one another, as they always do in moments like these, with proposals they insist would clean up the system once and for all." Newsweek (1/16, Isikoff, Bailey, Thomas) adds, "It is not clear how many (if any) solons will wind up in jail because of their friendship with Abramoff. Bribery is very hard to prove. Congressman Ney…says he was duped into performing favors for Abramoff's clients." Newsweek adds that "panic on Capitol Hill was palpable; lawmakers scrambled to give away or return their campaign donations from Abramoff and his clients, led by House Speaker Dennis Hastert ($67,000). All denied any wrongdoing."

DOJ_NMG_0008369

Boehner Challenges Accuracy Of "Abramoff Connection" Database. Roll Call (1/9, Newmyer) reports, "With lawmakers rushing to scrub their images clean by returning or donating to charity campaign money from former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his clients," Rep. John Boehner is "calling for a timeout." On Friday, he "challenged the Center for Responsive Politics to remove his name from a database that the watchdog group had posted on its Web site tallying amounts that Members of Congress have received from Abramoff and his clients. According to the database, Abramoff and his associates had showered $32,400 in campaign contributions on Boehner. The problem, Boehner said, was that 'to the very best of my knowledge, I have never received a penny from Jack Abramoff, directly or indirectly.' Instead, he said the CRP was unfairly crediting to Abramoff's influence all donations the Ohio Republican had received from the former lobbyist's American Indian tribe clients." Boehner wrote, "I suspect there are many other Members of Congress who find themselves in this situation as well, surprised to have been identified publicly as having an 'Abramoff connection' when in fact no such connection exists." But CRP Executive Director Larry Noble "defended the legitimacy of a database he said was produced in response to intense public and media interest. He said the center will refine the database but for the time being would not remove the information about contributions to Boehner."

Abramoff Scandal Has Yet To Affect Political Polls. The Washington Times (1/9, Lambro, 90K) reports that the Abramoff scandal "so far has yielded little political impact, pollsters and campaign strategists say. While one recent poll showed Democrats with a slight edge going into this fall's midterm congressional elections, several observers say there is no indication that the scandal surrounding Abramoff" has "begun to influence voters' perceptions." Pollster John Zogby said, "It's too soon in terms of the story really breaking into the public imagination. It's less than a week old. Prior to that it was purely an inside the Washington Beltway story."

Greenberg Traurig Avoids Abramoff Fallout. Under the headline "Lobbyist's Firm Escapes Fallout From A Scandal," the New York Times (1/9, Glater, Kornblut, 1.19M) reports that Greenberg Traurig, which was a "politically well-connected law firm long before" Abramoff joined it, has "rushed to distance itself from Mr. Abramoff, appease his clients and work closely with prosecutors. In the process it has earned praise for its cooperation" from Sen. John McCain, has "kept alive the possibility of suing Mr. Abramoff for its losses and negotiated financial settlements with most of Mr. Abramoff's victims." Former federal prosecutor David Schertler said, "They have taken the new approach that most corporations or institutions take in today's world, which is just completely cooperate with the investigation."

Abramoff Represented Magazine Publishers Association. The New York Times (1/9, Seelye, 1.19M) reports that while "the press has spilled plenty of ink writing" about Abramoff, "little noticed is that among Mr. Abramoff's many clients was the press itself, at least part of it. In 2000, he represented the Magazine Publishers Association, and it turns out that some of the association's money may have been funneled to Mr. Abramoff's political allies. In documents last week in which Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty to mail fraud and conspiracy to bribe public officials, he revealed that he and an unidentified Congressional aide worked to stave off an increase in postal rates -- a significant benefit for an industry that depends on the postal service." The magazine association "paid at least $1.4 million from 2000 to 2003 to Preston Gates Ellis & Rouvelas Meeds, the lobbying firm where Mr. Abramoff was the chief lobbyist."

Cornyn Says Reed "Apparently" Was "Bilking" Indian Clients. Sen. John Cornyn was asked on NBC's Meet the Press (1/8. Russert) if he intended to return a $1000 contribution he received from "associates of Jack Abramoff…and Ralph Reed," Cornyn replied, "It was a legal contribution. I don't plan on giving it back. … I had no knowledge of where Reed and Abramoff was somehow claiming credit [for actions taken by Cornyn] and then bilking their Indian clients for millions of dollars, apparently. And I certainly disapprove of that, did not know anything about it."

DOJ_NMG_0008370

Lobbyists Continue Practices Despite Abramoff Scandal. The Legal Times (1/9, Palmer) reports, "If Washington lobbyists were feeling abashed last week after Jack Abramoff entered multiple guilty pleas, somebody forgot to tell the power-lunch crowd at the Palm. … Late last week the downtown chophouse, which serves as one of the de facto hubs of the lobbying universe, was alive with back-slapping bonhomie. Kenneth Duberstein held court at a center table for more than two hours, while Hilary Rosen passed by, clenching the end piece of her sunglasses with her teeth, and Grover Norquist worked a circuit at the back tables. It might have been expected that the ghost of Abramoff, Banquo-like, might hover over his former colleagues, but, all in all, it was business as usual." The Times continues, "And why not? Despite Abramoff pleading guilty to three counts of conspiracy, fraud, and tax evasion last week in Washington, and much speechifying on the Hill about fundamental lobbying reforms, it's still the busy season on K Street as lobbyists seek to secure earmarks for the 2007 spending bills. … And while lawmakers and watchdog groups scolded and fretted, the lobbyists themselves were busy working overtime trying to assuage clients' fears and put as much distance as possible between themselves and Abramoff's exploding star. … 'Jack Abramoff is an aberration, more the exception than the rule,' says William Morley, head of MWW Group's lobbying operation. 'On K Street, lobbyists are going to continue to do what they did before.' … That was a sentiment that echoed around Washington's influence community as lobbyists maintain that, so far at least, there hasn't been the lawmaker backlash on Capitol Hill that has been predicted in some circles."

Abramoff Prosecutor Seen As Low-Profile, Detail-Oriented. The Legal Times (1/9, McLure) reports, "After Jack Abramoff stepped before a D.C. federal judge to plead guilty to tax evasion, mail fraud, and a conspiracy 'involving public officials' last week, the face of the Justice Department was Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, who appeared before the cameras at a post-hearing news conference and declared that 'combating public corruption is a top priority of mine.' … But one person the newly appointed Fisher didn't credit during her victory lap was Mary Butler, the lawyer who actually quarterbacked the DOJ team during its 18-month investigation of Abramoff." The Times continues, "Butler, 49, is a career prosecutor with extensive experience handling public corruption cases. The Justice Department denied a request to interview Butler, but friends, former colleagues, and defense lawyers who have squared off against her describe her as a determined and evenhanded prosecutor who immerses herself in her job. … And that may be bad news for anyone caught up in the Abramoff investigation. … 'She's one of the special ones who will turn over every piece of paper, look at every credit card receipt and phone bill,' says Joshua Berman, a partner at Sonnenschein Nath & Rosenthal who worked with Butler at the DOJ's Public Integrity Division. 'She's really good at crossing t's and dotting i's.'" The Times notes, "That meticulousness has helped extract guilty pleas from both Abramoff and his associate Michael Scanlon, a former public relations executive. Those pleas have focused public attention on lawmakers with ties to the pair, a group that, so far, includes Reps. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), Bob Ney (R-Ohio), John Doolittle (R-Calif.), and Dana Rohrbacher (R-Calif.) and Sens. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Harry Reid (D-Nev.). … But Butler's gone after public officials before. She got her start as a prosecutor in 1987, in the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida, a region as rich in corruption cases as it is in saw grass. During her 12-year tenure there, Butler helped run a tax evasion and money laundering case against executives of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International, won the conviction of a Drug Enforcement Administration supervisor for the theft of $1 million in undercover funds, and nailed a local banker for lying to a grand jury about bribes paid to the mayor of Miami Beach."

Abramoff Judge Called Compassionate, Tough. The Legal Times (1/9, Kelley) reports, "Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle has a reputation for compassion in the courtroom, especially when dealing with defendants who confess, cooperate, and convey remorse. But lawyers who know the federal judge say she's not afraid to dole out harsh punishments, either. 'You can't pigeonhole Judge Huvelle,' says Kevin Baine, a partner with Williams & Connolly and a former colleague of Huvelle's from her days at the firm. 'She approaches every case on the merits.'" The Times continues, "In the case of fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff, it's too early to tell how the judge will come down on the one-time king of K Street, who last week pleaded guilty before Huvelle to three felony counts of conspiracy, fraud, and tax evasion in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia." The Times adds, "The deal reached between Abramoff and the Justice Department recommends a prison term of between nine and 11 years and restitution of more than $25 million. In exchange, Abramoff has agreed to cooperate with the government's ongoing investigation, which published reports indicate could include as many as 20 lawmakers as well as their wives and staffers. According to local court rules, Huvelle likely would handle any additional criminal cases related to the Abramoff scandal, which means a number of Washington power players could end up in her courtroom. Huvelle already is overseeing the case of Michael Scanlon, Abramoff's former business partner who pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges in November."

DOJ_NMG_0008371

Dean Says No Democrats Took Donations From Abramoff. DNC Chairman Howard Dean, asked on CNN's Late Edition (1/8, Blitzer) if "Democrats who took money from Jack Abramoff…should give that money to charity or give it back," said, "There are no Democrats who took money from Jack Abramoff, not one, not one single Democrat. Every person named in this scandal is a Republican. Every person under investigation is a Republican. Every person indicted is a Republican. This is a Republican finance scandal. There is no evidence that Jack Abramoff ever gave any Democrat any money. And we've looked through all of those FEC reports to make sure that's true. … Senator Byron Dorgan and some others took money from Indian tribes. They're not agents of Jack Abramoff. There's no evidence that I've seen that Jack Abramoff directed any contributions to Democrats. I know the Republican National Committee would like to get the Democrats involved in this. They're scared. They should be scared. They haven't told the truth. They have misled the American people. And now it appears they're stealing from Indian tribes. The Democrats are not involved in this."

DOJ Said To Have Intensified Anti-Corruption Probes. Roll Call (1/9, Kane, Bresnahan) reports, "The Justice Department's political corruption unit has launched an aggressive effort to better coordinate probes across several agencies, increased training in undercover and surveillance techniques for investigators, and pushed the envelope by pursuing what the unit's top prosecutor calls 'marginal cases.'" In the process, "the Public Integrity Section, as it's formally known, has more than doubled the number of federal corruption cases it has brought to the courts in the past four years, re-energizing an office that watchdog groups complained had grown stale in the previous decade." Moreover, "both in terms of the quantity of cases and the speed with which the prosecutors are moving, Justice's corruption cops have stoked more fear in the halls of Congress and among other public officials than their predecessors had in at least a generation." Roll Call adds, "Congressional Democrats have applauded the aggressive efforts of the Justice Department, contending that more than a decade of GOP control on Capitol Hill and five years of Republican grip on the White House have created an arrogant 'culture of corruption.' Republicans, meanwhile, have countered that the scandals touch both parties. "

Lawmakers Nervous Over Reports Cunningham Wore FBI Wire. Time (1/16, Burger, Bennett) reports in its "Notebook" column that speculation over who ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham spoke with while wearing a wire "is making members of Congress nervous. As TIME.com reported last week, Cunningham…wore a wire to aid the Justice Department investigation just before his plea. The FBI is still probing defense contractors, and a private-sector source says Cunningham was wired while meeting a rep from at least one firm, possibly to get dirt on other members of Congress."

Probe Finds Houston DNA Lab Near "Total Breakdown." The Washington Times (1/9, Aynesworth) reports, "A lengthy investigation into the Houston Police Department's DNA laboratory has concluded that the operation has been 'near a total breakdown' in recent years and still doesn't come close to being acceptable." The Times continues, "Meanwhile, the Harris County district attorney, several defense attorneys and outside investigators are re-examining hundreds of convictions -- some of them death-penalty cases -- to discover how many innocent people have been affected. … Some have called for a federal investigation." The Times adds, "Last week, a team of forensic evidence specialists headed by lawyer Michael R. Bromwich returned a scathing 82-page report to Houston officials. Hired by the city of Houston, the Bromwich team had been examining forensic-driven cases handled by the suspect laboratory between 1987 and 2002. … The investigators reported a 'disturbing and pervasive pattern' wherein lab analysts did not report evidence that would have benefited suspects and even falsified evidence. … A review of 67 cases involving sample DNA resulted in 'major issues' with 40 percent of the original Houston crime-lab analyses. Three of these involved death-row prosecutions."

DOJ_NMG_0008372

NYTimes Editor Killed In DC Street Robbery. David E. Rosenbaum, a retired reporter and editor for The New York Times, died Sunday from injuries suffered when he was struck on the head and robbed Friday night in Northwest Washington. The New York Times (1/9, Purdum, 1.19M) reports, "Mr. Rosenbaum served at various times as chief Congressional correspondent, chief domestic policy correspondent, chief economics correspondent, assistant news editor and business editor in the Washington bureau of The Times."

The Washington Post (1/9, B1, Weil, Lengel, 744K) reports, "Rosenbaum, 63, died at 7:10 p.m. at Howard University Hospital, where he was treated for a head injury suffered during the attack on Gramercy Street NW, said Philip Taubman, chief of the Times's Washington bureau. … D.C. police were canvassing the neighborhood yesterday for clues in the attack, which occurred in a quiet section between Connecticut and Wisconsin avenues. No arrests had been made."

Crime In DC's Adams Morgan Neighborhood Down. The Washington Times (1/9, Doolittle) reports, "Robbery and assault in the District's 3rd Police District, which includes Adams Morgan, jumped last fall, by as much as 46 percent, but new measures have reversed the trend." The Times continues, "Other crimes, such as theft, also spiked in September and October but dropped the last two months of the year. … 'Simple assaults are sort of a way of life at 3 a.m. in the morning in this area,' said Bryan Weaver, a member of Advisory Neighborhood Commission (ANC) 1C whose single-member district includes much of the area in which the crimes occur. 'On any given night, we only have six or seven officers assigned to our [police service area]. But unlike other [police service areas] we are dealing with six or seven thousand people coming in from other parts of the city and Virginia and Maryland to drink or dance.'" The Times adds, "The increase in crime since 2004, police said, is due to a variety of factors, including an increase in visitors to the Adams Morgan area and certain repeat offenders' being on the loose again after serving jail time. … Police Cmdr. Larry McCoy, who is in charge of the 3rd District, blames much of the crime on career criminals released from prison and returning to their old neighborhoods -- neighborhoods that, in many cases, are more affluent than when they left. … Area robberies increased to 141 in September, compared with 96 during the same month in 2004. In October, theft in the area rose from 160 in 2004 to 179 last year. In November, assaults with a deadly weapon climbed from 45 to 55 compared with the same month in 2004."

FBI Withdraws From Utah Internet Sex Predator Task Force. Under the headline "FBI Breaks With Utah Sex-Crime Task Force," The Salt Lake Tribune (1/7, A4, Israelsen, Rosetta) reports, "A territorial spat between the FBI and the Utah Attorney General's Office has effectively killed a highly touted state-federal task force that cracked down on Internet sex predators and child-porn purveyors. The FBI has informed Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff that it will no longer be part of the multi-agency Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, known as ICAC. … Shurtleff said a letter sent to his office by the FBI did not state a reason for the estrangement. He assumed it was because his office recently pulled its ICAC investigators out of the FBI's downtown building, where state investigators complained security was too restrictive." FBI SAC Timothy Fuhrman "acknowledged it was difficult for some of the task force members to get into the FBI building because his agency requires lengthy background checks on anyone who enters. … However, Fuhrman said, his office is not going to reduce its investigation of Internet child sex crimes. 'We're not part of that task force, but we're going to continue working with them,' Fuhrman said. 'They're not going to be side by side with us doing the same things.'"

The AP (1/7) reports, "A territorial spat between the FBI and the Utah Attorney General's Office" caused the split. Fuhrman "acknowledges the security difficulty, but said there were other complications to remaining part of the task force, including the FBI's own federal Internet crime initiative, Innocent Images. 'We just couldn't accommodate the restrictions that exist within Innocent Images with the Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force,' Fuhrman said. 'I wish we could have worked it out.' Although the FBI is dropping out of the joint task force, Fuhrman said that doesn't mean the agency is relaxing its efforts to fight Internet sex crimes." The AP notes, "In 2002, the task was awarded the FBI Director's Award as the best Internet sex crimes unit nationwide. Shurtleff said he's disappointed by the FBI's decision."

Virginia Woman Uses DNA To Find Out Who Killed Her Cat. The Washington Post (1/9, A1, Brulliard)

DOJ_NMG_0008373

reports, "Marylin Christian found Cody under the tree in front of their Loudoun County (VA) home, his white fur covered in saliva. She scooped up the lifeless remains of the cat whose friendship she had counted on for 13 years and sat under the tree, sobbing, for two hours. … The next day, Christian set out to discover what, or who, had killed Cody -- no matter what." The Post continues, "When a veterinarian said the culprit had to be a dog, she canvassed her rural Lovettsville neighborhood in search of a suspect. After she spotted a bouncy 4-year-old German shepherd mix named Lucky, she asked authorities to declare him dangerous. And when Loudoun animal control officials dropped the case, she took a cue from television's legal dramas: She hired a California DNA laboratory to analyze evidence -- dog saliva and fur -- that ultimately linked Lucky to the incident. … Yet despite the strong forensic evidence -- and a five-month saga that has tested the fragility of neighborly relations and pitted motherly instincts against carnivorous ones -- Lucky remains free." The Post adds, "Christian said that since Cody was killed, she has repeatedly asked Lucky's owners, Sean and Janet Daryabeygi, to return the dog to the local animal shelter, where they adopted him in the summer. The Daryabeygis think she is asking too much. They said Lucky would never harm a human, though they do not dispute that he could have been a cat killer."

CIVIL LAW:

11th Circuit Reinstates $54.6 Million Award To Salvadoran Torture Victims. The Miami Daily Business Review (1/9, Jones) reports, "A federal appeals court has reversed its own decision and affirmed a $54.6 million judgment awarded to three immigrants from El Salvador who claimed that members of that country's military kidnapped and tortured them." The Review continues, "A West Palm Beach jury awarded the money in July 2002, but the award hinged on a key ruling, made by U.S. District Judge Daniel T.K. Hurley, that a 10-year statute of limitations for filing claims such as those alleged in the case could be extended if the defendants were somehow prevented or discouraged from filing within the required 10-year period. Such an extension is referred to as 'equitable tolling.' Hurley held that the 10-year statute of limitations should begin in 1992, when El Salvador's civil war ended in a peace agreement. … The panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals made no mention of why it had reversed itself." The Review adds, "In a February 2005 decision, the panel felt conditions in El Salvador did not preclude the defendants from filing their lawsuit within 10 years. Upon further review, the panel said the overwhelming evidence showed conditions did prevent the plaintiffs from seeking justice within the 10-year period."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

San Francisco Police Officer's Video Stirs Ire. The New York Times (1/9, Marshall) reports, "The police officer whose amateur video raised concerns among city officials about racism, sexism and homophobia within the San Francisco Police Department is hoping his filmmaking skills can help undo the damage and refocus the debate. But critics suggest he is making matters worse." The Times continues, "The officer, Andrew Cohen, was temporarily suspended last month along with 23 other officers connected to the video, which depicted uniformed and plainclothes officers in skits that mocked the homeless, gay men and lesbians, African-Americans and others. … Though reinstated, the police officers remain under investigation in the making of the videotape, and Officer Cohen and some others have been reassigned." The Times adds, "Now Officer Cohen has embarked on a one-man public relations effort to promote a 28-minute video - which he started working on two years ago and calls a serious documentary - that shows the difficulties of police work in some of the city's most crime-ridden and violent neighborhoods. … Peter Ragone, a spokesman for Mayor Gavin Newsom, said that Officer Cohen was 'acting unilaterally' in publicizing his new video and that the mayor and Police Chief Heather Fong had no part in the effort. Mr. Ragone said many people, including fellow officers, had asked Officer Cohen to 'stop trying to promote himself.' … Whatever the intent, Mr. Ragone added: 'It doesn't change the fact that we have videos that make fun of Chief Fong's Asian heritage and segments that have a white officer running over a black homeless woman. There is simply nothing funny about it.'"

Crackdown On Worldwide Prostitution Rackets Urged. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/9), Colette De Troy, coordinator of the European Women's Lobby's Policy Action Center on Violence Against Women, based in Brussels, and Mary McPhail, EWL's secretary general, write, "The sex industry is big business, and getting bigger. World-wide profits from prostitution exceed $12 billion annually. Of course, the women generally see very little of this money. The sex traders, whether legal 'sex entrepreneurs' or illegal pimps, are the biggest beneficiaries." De Troy and McPhail continues, "Many countries have tried different approaches to control or limit its growth, from legalization to regulation, with decidedly mixed results. But with the sex 'business" spawning cross-border trafficking in women and children and boosting organized crime across Europe, we can no longer turn a blind eye to this problem. .. Some 'progressive' campaigners have, especially over the past 15 years, argued that the legalization and regulation of prostitution could reduce trafficking and help combat organized crime and money laundering that usually come with it. … But can we consider 'sex work' like any other mainstream economic activity, whose profits should be integrated into the nation's GDP, maybe even giving training for young people or the unemployed? … The answer is a definite no. The sex trade is predominantly in the economic interests of sex traders and takes place at the expense of the prostitutes. What's more, while liberalization may have opened up new revenue sources for the government, it has done little to combat trafficking or organized crime. … Strategies to confront trafficking need to address the needs of the women whose rights are violated as well as targeting the pimps, clients and others who benefit from the sex trade. Saying 'no' to trafficking and exploitation of women by pimps and clients has nothing to do with 'conservative' sexual politics. On the contrary. It is those who legalize the sex industry and legitimize the reduction of women to mere objects who pursue archaic politics -- no matter how 'progressive' they claim to be."

DOJ_NMG_0008374

Cato Official Says Florida Voucher Decision Has National Implications. Andrew J. Coulson, director of the Cato Institute's Center for Educational Freedom, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/9, 2.11M) "If you think kids are all the same, and that monopolies are the key to quality and efficiency, consider moving to Florida. As of this week, a uniform government bureaucracy is the only legal approach to public education in the Sunshine State. For six years, students in Florida's failing public schools have been able to switch to a private school of their parents' choosing, using the state funds allocated for their education. No longer. The 'Opportunity Scholarship' voucher program was struck down last Thursday by the state Supreme Court in a sweeping decision with national implications." The Court ruled that "school vouchers violate the "uniformity" clause of Florida's Constitution. Far from being an arcane and forgotten technicality, this clause was amended and re-approved by voters just eight years ago: It mandates, among other things, 'a uniform, efficient, safe, secure and high quality system of free public schools that allows students to obtain a high quality education.'' Coulson adds, "Every other state with a school choice program and a uniformity clause untested in its courts can expect to feel the heat. Arizona, which has education tax credits and charter schools, is apt to be a prime target. Minnesota, Colorado, Oregon and North Carolina, among others, all have uniformity clauses and at least one school-choice program vulnerable to attack. Meanwhile, come this June, the more than 700 mostly low-income students currently in Florida's Opportunity Scholarship voucher program may be herded back into the very public schools that vouchers allowed them to flee. Unless the Constitution of Florida -- and other states -- is amended, they may not be the only ones."

ANTITRUST:

Boston Scientific Makes Formal $25 Billion Guidant Bid. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Westphal, Burton, Berman) reports, "Boston Scientific Corp. made a formal offer to buy Guidant Corp. for $72 a share, and said it had found a buyer for several Guidant units -- a move that it expects will allow for quicker antitrust clearance if its offer is accepted. The formal bid, valued at $25 billion in cash and stock, takes the…medical-device company one step closer to becoming one of the world's largest cardiac-device makers." J&J's original $25.4 billion offer "was reduced to about $22 billion after Guidant's difficulties," and analysts say a J&J counteroffer of $70 a share "could sway Guidant shareholders to stick with the current merger plan." But, last night, J&J "said it believes it has made 'a better offer,' partly because its deal would be completed more quickly."

USA Today (1/9, Appleby) reports, "The move escalates Boston Scientific's effort to top a pending bid from medical product giant Johnson & Johnson. Both companies are seeking Indianapolis-based Guidant for its stake in the $10 billion-a-year market for heart rhythm devices such as pacemakers and defibrillators. … Under terms of the Boston Scientific agreement, Abbott would pay Boston $3.8 billion for certain Guidant product lines, including catheters, guide wires and other devices used in vascular surgery. Abbott would pay $500 million more if a type of Guidant cardiac stent wins regulatory approval."

DOJ_NMG_0008375

The AP (1/9, Jewell) reports, "Boston Scientific, which is seeking to trump Johnson & Johnson's smaller bid for Guidant, on Sunday presented a definitive proposal that largely mirrors its initial Dec. 5 offer. … But the No. 1 maker of drug-coated heart stents added a twist by announcing a related deal with Abbott Laboratories Inc. Natick, Mass.-based Boston Scientific will sell Guidant's vascular intervention and endovascular businesses to Abbott if its Guidant acquisition is successful." The AP adds, "J&J is a close No. 2 to Boston Scientific in drug-coated stents, and both companies are responding to growing competition in that market by dueling to acquire Guidant's lucrative pacemaker and defibrillator business. … Boston Scientific hopes to derail a process begun more than a year ago when J&J first bid for Guidant. J&J reduced its offer in November after Guidant suffered a spate of product recalls and related lawsuits and investigations."

Dow Jones Newswires (1/8) reports, "Boston Scientific's offer also would quadruple the company's debt load - from about $2.5 billion as of Sept. 30 to about $10.5 - although the company says it has arranged financing. And acceptance of Boston Scientific's proposal would require payment of a $625 million break-up penalty to J&J, the AP reported."

Bloomberg (1/9, Goldstein) reports, "Boston Scientific said it plans a first-quarter closing. The company would pay the $625 million fee that Guidant would owe J&J for terminating their merger agreement. … In July, Guidant recalled 28,000 pacemakers that were subject to failure. Pacemakers implanted in a patient's chest use an electrical signal to regulate a flagging heartbeat. Implanted defibrillators, about the size of an iPod, send electric shocks to restart a faltering heart. Analysts said Guidant may never achieve the market share it had before the recalls."

Abbot Deal Expected To "Satisfy" Regulators. The New York Times (1/9, Sorkin, Feder) adds Boston Scientific agreed to sell two of its units, "its vascular intervention and endovascular businesses, to Abbott Laboratories for $3.8 billion to satisfy regulators if it reaches a merger agreement with Guidant." Such a move is expected to spur criticism by Medtronic. The Financial Times (1/9, Politi) sets the price of Boston Scientific's two businesses at $4.3 billion. Bloomberg (1/7, News) reports that Guidant expects "a proposed $21.5 billion takeover by Johnson & Johnson to be completed in the first quarter."

Constellation-FPL Merger Caps Shattuck's Rise To Top. The Washington Post (1/9, D1, Rosenwald) reports, "Mayo A. Shattuck III is the kind of guy put on earth to run companies and make multibillion-dollar deals, like last month's $11 billion planned merger of the company he runs, Baltimore's Constellation Energy Group, with FPL Group of Florida." The Post continues, "Shattuck was raised near Boston, the descendant of two Mayo A. Shattucks, both of whom attended Harvard. His father was managing partner of State Street Research & Management Co., an old Boston money manager, and he also ran Harvard's endowment. Shattuck III, with his third multibillion-dollar merger under his belt, is now 51. His eldest son works at Goldman Sachs & Co. His name is Mayo A. Shattuck IV. … The lineage is one of New England privilege, but it is also a pedigree that Shattuck III has sometimes chosen to flout. He has a contrarian side, and those who know him well say it accounts for much of his success. It began when Shattuck was a teenager, and he did not do something that everyone in his family expected he would do. He did not, horror of horrors, attend Harvard." The Post adds, "While choosing Williams over Harvard may seem to some like choosing between different patterns of silver spoons, it was a choice that Shattuck's father suffered with some heartbreak. But his father, who died a short time later, acknowledged being proud of his son for having the courage to buck family custom, and Shattuck's decision may have taught him a lesson he would never have learned by following his family through Harvard Yard: When everyone is doing the same thing, advantage might present itself the other way. … As it did when he took over as chief executive of Constellation Energy Group in Baltimore four years ago. Enron Corp., which was one of the pioneers of the deregulated energy business with its high-risk energy trading operations, was collapsing, causing energy companies to dart in the other direction. Not Shattuck. He dove right in, becoming the dominant player in the sector and quickly tripling his company's revenue. … Shattuck's running of Constellation did not hit the mean. Analysts and industry observers say his strategy to buy energy assets and sell power competitively when almost everybody else would not transformed Constellation from something of an also-ran into the country's largest provider of commercial and industrial power, with revenue of $12.5 billion in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0008376

Last month, he capped the turnaround with the deal to merge the firm with FPL Group."

Banks May Widen Real Estate Role. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Schroeder) reports, "Two major banks received the green light from regulators to develop and own large hotel and office properties, potentially opening the door wider for banks to the commercial real-estate business beyond their traditional role as lenders." The Journal continues, "National banking laws generally bar banks from owning and developing commercial real estate unless the buildings are predominantly occupied by employees doing bank business. City skylines are dominated by headquarters buildings owned and financed by banks. Many banks rent out some office and first-floor retail space in their buildings, and such arrangements have been approved as lawful." The Journal adds, "While banks long have been excluded from all but the financing end of the real-estate business, they are trying to enter other aspects, such as developing projects and competing in the housing market. … Regulators have been wary of allowing bank portfolios to have a high concentration of loans in the volatile commercial real-estate market, for fear a sudden economic downturn could impair bank capital. There also are strict rules for real estate acquired by banks through foreclosure to be liquidated quickly. National bank regulators say they will soon publish interagency guidance directing lenders to meet certain capital, underwriting and risk-management standards to match loan growth. … But recently the Comptroller of the Currency, a unit of the Treasury Department that regulates national banks, incrementally broadened its interpretation of permissible development activities. In postings on its Web site, the OCC approved major real-estate projects by two banks that go beyond the scope of typical bank real-estate development. The banks aren't identified by name, but officials say the institutions referenced are PNC Financial Services Group Inc., of Pittsburgh, and Bank of America Corp., of Charlotte, N.C."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

First Funerals Held For West Virginia Miners. NBC Nightly News (1/8, lead story, 2:00, Seigenthaler) and ABC World News Tonight (1/8, story 2, 2:00, Woodruff) both gave prominent coverage to the first funerals of the 12 miners who died following last week's explosion at West Virginia's Sago Mine. Both also reported that survivor Randall McCloy's condition is beginning to improve.

Mining Association Expects Hearings On Mine Safety. Roll Call (1/9, Newmyer, Ackley) reports in its "K Street Files" column, "After the mine explosion in West Virginia last week that killed 12 miners and seriously injured another, the National Mining Association is girding for possible Congressional hearings on mine safety. Carol Raulston, senior vice president of communications for the National Mining Association, said the Mining Safety and Health Administration is conducting an investigation into the Sago mine explosion and her group is waiting on its findings."

Dye Affirms Administration Commitment To Mine Safety. David G. Dye, acting assistant secretary of Labor for Mine Safety and Health, writes in USA Today (1/9, 2.31M), "We deeply grieve the deaths of the 12 miners at the Sago Mine in West Virginia and offer our heartfelt sympathy to their families. … The Mine Safety and Health Administration (MSHA) is staffed by dedicated professionals, many of whom come from mining families and have a passion for protecting miners. Over the past several years, we have expanded enforcement, safety training and partnerships with labor unions and operators to push toward our goal of getting every miner home safely after every shift. This goal is shared by relevant state agencies and inspection professionals, who are also responsible for mine safety enforcement and investigation." Dye adds, "In close coordination with West Virginia, the MSHA's comprehensive investigation will determine what caused the Sago Mine explosion. If any health and safety standards were violated, we would take enforcement action. As always, we will make the full investigative report available to the families and the public. We will take every step — including looking at our own performance — to make sure this tragedy never happens again."

USA Today Blames Complacency For Mine Disaster. In an accompanying editorial, USA Today (1/9, 2.31M) says, "On Sunday, as miners were being laid to rest after an explosion last week that killed 12 at West Virginia's Sago Mine, investigators were seeking the cause of yet another tragedy. But one culprit is clear: complacency. As mining fatalities have dropped in the past decade, federal regulators and judges have failed to use the tools they have to rein in those who don't comply with the law and force needed change." USA adds, "In the past year, government records show, the Sago Mine was cited repeatedly for failing to enforce basic safety precautions. … The number of what the MSHA calls 'high-dollar fines' ($10,000 or more) has dropped since the Bush administration took office in 2001. … Watchdogs muffed other opportunities to ensure safety. In 2003, the Government Accountability Office found that over the past decade, inspectors had often failed to ensure that violations were corrected by deadlines." USA concludes, "Miners deserve the safety level that only strict regulation and tough enforcement can provide. It shouldn't take another Farmington, Scotia or Sago for Washington to make that happen."

DOJ_NMG_0008377

Kurtz Criticizes Media's Handling Of Mine Disaster Story. Howard Kurtz writes in his "Media Notes" column in the Washington Post (1/9, C1, 744K), "It was the most heart-rending and humiliating botch of a life-and-death story in modern memory, yet most journalists, naturally, aren't blaming themselves. It was everyone else's fault, they say. We just published and broadcast what we were told, and it turned out to be wrong. Tragically wrong, as in the Washington Post headline in Wednesday's late editions: '12 Found Alive in W.Va. Coal Mine.' Or USA Today's banner: '"Alive!" Miners Beat the Odds.' Or the Atlanta Journal-Constitution: '12 Miners Alive.' Or Newsday: 'Miracle in the Mine.' All the cable news networks got it wrong as well, such as MSNBC's Rita Cosby: 'We have some stunning news. NBC News and the Associated Press have just confirmed information that the 12 miners, remember 12 were missing, that they are alive. This is incredible news.' Hours later came the chilling confirmation that all but one were dead.' … In this case, a misunderstood or misspoken message from rescuers in the mine was relayed to a command center and then to anxious family members, who told reporters. While the mining company's refusal to correct the misinformation for hours is inexplicable, the situation was exacerbated by the journalistic reluctance to say the facts are unconfirmed and we just don't know. Experienced journalists should have understood that early, fragmentary information in times of crisis is often wrong." Kurtz adds, "The larger issue is that much of the press has abandoned reporting on health and safety regulation until disaster strikes. How many reporters have dug into the Labor Department's Mine Safety and Health Administration, which under the Bush administration was run by a former Utah mine manager until last year? About as many as did pieces, before Hurricane Katrina, on why a former Arabian horse official was running the dysfunctional bureaucracy of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Heck of a job."

Three Tribal Colleges Join Federal Library Program. Roll Call (1/9, Brotherton) reports, "Three tribal college libraries were added last month to the Federal Depository Library Program, which seeks to ensure that the public has free and ready access to federal documents." Roll Call continues, "Little Priest Tribal College in Nebraska, along with Peck Community College and Salish Kootenai College in Montana, are the first American Indian libraries to join more than 1,250 depository institutions in the program, which is run by the Government Printing Office." Roll Call adds, "While the bulk of government information overseen by the GPO is available online, membership in the program will ensure staff at the three libraries will be trained in research, said Judy Russell, superintendent of documents. … 'What they are going to do is make this information more useful and more visible to the average person,' Russell said." Roll Call notes, "The GPO is in charge of the production and distribution of information for the federal government. The agency provides research assistance in locating and using information at its eclectic mix of depository libraries. … Tribal libraries had never applied to become depositories, Russell said. But after the GPO held a strategy session regarding the needs of these libraries this past fall, the three colleges joined the program."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Marijuana Advocates Push Legalization Initiatives In Colorado, Nevada. Marijuana legalization advocates are hoping to use the momentum from their surprise victory in Denver to win statewide ballot initiatives in Colorado and Nevada. The Washington Times (1/9, Richardson, 90K) reports, "Colorado activists announced a drive two weeks ago aimed at bringing a clone of Denver's Initiative 100 before voters statewide in November. Initiative 100 allows adults in the city to possess small amounts of marijuana. And activists in Nevada, who have secured a place for a legalization measure on the state ballot in November, are taking heart in the success of Initiative 100, which captured 54 percent of the vote in the Nov. 1 election. … If the measures pass, Colorado and Nevada would become the first states to win voter approval for marijuana legalization. Alaska allows adults to possess up to 4 ounces of marijuana in their homes, thanks to court decisions upholding privacy rights, but voters defeated a 2004 initiative that would have abolished all penalties for possession and regulated marijuana sales."

DOJ_NMG_0008378

Massachusetts Lawmakers Consider Legalizing Medical Marijuana. According to The Eagle Tribune (1/8, Mason), "Massachusetts could become the fourth New England state to legalize medical marijuana under a plan before state lawmakers. On the heels of Rhode Island's approval last week of medical marijuana use, lawmakers [in Boston] are pushing a measure, with the support of some North of Boston legislators, that would allow doctors to treat patients with marijuana. Backers say people who suffer from debilitating pain and chronic diseases should be able to gain relief without fear of arrest, something 11 states have approved. But the initiative faces high hurdles. It is opposed by the Romney administration. Local lawmakers, aware of the plague of opiate addiction in the Merrimack Valley, want to ensure access to medical marijuana is airtight."

Convicted Medical Marijuana Activist Ordered To Leave Canada. The AP (1/8) reports, "An internationally known medical marijuana activist has been ordered to leave Canada, where he sought refuge after he was convicted in Placer County [California] of possessing peyote and magic mushrooms in 2000. Steve Kubby helped write and pass California's Proposition 215 medical marijuana law — approved by voters in 1996 — was the Libertarian candidate for governor in 1998 and served as national director of the American Medical Marijuana Assn. Kubby said he would suffer and could die of a rare form of adrenal cancer if he returns to Placer County and isn't allowed to smoke marijuana daily while serving a 120-day jail sentence. He could face more jail time for fleeing the country. The conviction came after Placer County deputies said they found small amounts of mescaline and psilocybin, along with 265 marijuana plants, while raiding Kubby's Olympic Valley home in 1999. Canadian Border Services last month ordered Kubby and his family to leave by Thursday. He goes back to a Canadian court Monday to seek a delay."

Georgia Protestors Call For End To "Operation Meth Merchant" Prosecution. The AP (1/8, Gross) reports that several hundred people "rallied Sunday for an end to prosecution in what federal agents have dubbed 'Operation Meth Merchant.' … In June, 49 people and 16 corporations, most of them in northwest Georgia, were charged with supplying everyday items - from antifreeze to cold medicine - to informants who claimed they were using the products to make methamphetamine. … Supporters of the accused, including the American Civil Liberties Union, say the sting was rife with problems. They say several defendants were not even in the country at the time they are accused of illegally selling the ingredients and that informants used obscure drug slang, which the clerks, some of whom speak limited English, did not understand. … Federal prosecutors say race and ethnicity had no role in their investigation. The say Meth Merchant was aimed at curbing a deadly problem in a region that has been inundated with the drug in recent years." Atlanta's WXIA-TV, the Columbus, Georgia Ledger-Enquirer, and India's Press Trust published in newspapers and/or posted on Web sites the AP story.

Mexican Drug Cartel Said To Be Weaker But Still In Control Of Trafficking. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/8, Cearley) reports, "Mexico's top investigator of organized crime has talked about the region's Arellano Félix drug trafficking group as if it were a thing of the past in this border city. But some drug trafficking experts in Mexico and the United States say the cartel still controls the passage of drugs through Tijuana, even if it is weaker after a five-year offensive by Mexican government. 'These things take on a capability to modify and evolve,' said Alan Poleszak, assistant special agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's San Diego office. Tijuana human rights activist Victor Clark, who closely follows drug trends, said a part of the problem is the 20-year-old cartel's continued collaboration with certain members of law enforcement. … The condition of the Arellano cartel is significant to the region because during its heyday, U.S. authorities estimated that it was responsible for 40 percent of all cocaine that entered the United States illegally. The cartel is known to torture and kill people who don't cooperate, such as Mexican police or rival drug trafficking groups that fail to pay them fees. Still, U.S. officials say they are seeing concrete results from years of investigations and collaborative efforts with Mexican authorities. … As of May, the Mexican Attorney General's Office announced that 107 suspected members of organized crime had been arrested in Baja California since President Vicente Fox took office in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0008379

Most of the detained are suspected Arellanos, including much of their top management."

Trial To Begin In March For Doctor Accused Of Giving NFL Players Steroids. The New York Times (1/8, Bernstein) reports in its sports section, "The first full month of the National Football League off-season is March, but it will hardly be a quiet break for the Carolina Panthers or for the league. That is when the trial of Dr. James Shortt is expected to begin in Columbia, S.C., and a potentially damaging connect-the-dots could be revealed involving the Panthers and illegal steroids. The federal investigation of Shortt, who has been indicted on 43 counts involving the distribution of steroids, has already touched the team and the N.F.L. There have been reports, led by The State newspaper in Columbia, that as many as nine former or current Panthers saw Shortt. There have been allegations that some received illegal prescriptions for steroids during the 2003 season. … Marty Hurney, Carolina's general manager, said last March that some Panthers were sought by the Drug Enforcement Administration as witnesses in the investigation. There is no word yet if players will be called to testify during the coming trial. But whatever is revealed about the players and the N.F.L. testing process, Wadler said he did not expect this trial to become a watershed for the sport or steroids testing. 'Do you realize how many watershed moments there have been over the last few years?' he said. 'We're not going through a moment, we're going through a process. And this is an ongoing process. This is just one more notch in the belt.'"

IMMIGRATION:

Kondracke Says Bush Should Have "Frank Chat" With Radio Hosts About Immigration. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (1/9) that President Bush "should call in his radio talk-show supporters for a frank chat about immigration. Bill O'Reilly, Sean Hannity, Rush Limbaugh, Hugh Hewitt and Laura Ingraham…are the ones fueling Republican uproar over illegal immigration. Yet they support Bush ardently and they ought to be open to an argument from him — an argument that happens to be correct — that the only way the United States is truly going to solve the problem of illegal immigration is with a comprehensive plan, like his, that not only controls the borders but creates legal means for immigrants to work. Bush also needs to make the argument to GOP House Members, who voted overwhelmingly last month for an enforcement-only bill that beefed up border security, made it a felony to be an illegal alien and authorized building a fence along some of the border with Mexico. … House Members went home able to tell angry constituents that they'd cracked down on immigration, but the truth is they've done nothing. No bill has passed the Senate and what's in the offing is a stalemate — unless Bush can rally his party to do something sensible." Kondracke adds, "It's up to Bush to avoid stalemate — and there are lots of good arguments he can use to pull his party together. … Doing the right thing is win-win for Republicans, if only Bush can convince Sean Hannity."

TAX:

Mallaby Argues For Rolling Back Bush Tax Cuts. Sebastian Mallaby writes in the Washington Post (1/9, A19, 744K) that the "Bush-Cheney combo" has "gone into chest-thumping overdrive," on the economy, "seizing the latest news on the housing-fueled expansion to say what brilliant boys they are." Mallaby adds, "I want to focus instead on Democrats' response to the Bush chest-thumping. For, much as on the Iraq war, Democrats are muddled. They are letting the administration off the hook." Democrats "should home in on two clearer problems. First, the Bush tax cuts have put the federal government on an unsustainable footing. Running a large budget deficit -- arguably, any budget deficit -- is recklessly imprudent when a roaring economy should be delivering a surplus and when baby boomers are on the eve of retirement. Second, although the squeeze on the middle class may be exaggerated, the squeeze on the unskilled is not. … Democrats should focus their complaints on these two problems, particularly since the obvious solution is politically convenient. To begin grappling with the budget deficit, the nation must repeal most of the Bush tax cuts; to grapple with inequality, it should begin by making the tax system more progressive -- which would again mean rolling back some of the Bush cuts."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Confirmation Hearings Begin Today. The hearings for Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito get underway today. The AP (1/9, Holland) reports, "After receiving some last-minute encouragement from Bush at a White House breakfast Monday, Alito was scheduled to head to Capitol Hill for the start of nomination hearings by the Senate Judiciary Committee. Ten-minute opening statements by the panel's 18 members were likely to consume the session, with direct questioning of Alito beginning Tuesday and expected to last at least two days." Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter "said Sunday he will wrap up the hearings this week. He has called for a committee vote Jan. 17."

DOJ_NMG_0008380

The media consensus this morning appears to be that Alito will be confirmed. Reuters (1/9, Ferraro), for example, predicts the nominee will face "fierce questioning," but he is "is expected to survive…and win confirmation," barring "an unforeseen bombshell." The Financial Times (1/9, Waldmeir) says that "so far at least there are few signs that the Senate confirmation hearings…will prompt the ideological conflagration long predicted by the pundits." In the end, Alito "seems likely to be confirmed because two months of diligent digging have revealed little more than what many Americans have suspected from the beginning: that Mr Alito is a conservative."

The Los Angeles Times (1/9, Reynolds, 958K) reports Jennifer Duffy, "who studies the Senate for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, said she expected Alito to gain confirmation to the high court, but by no more than a handful of votes. 'He's going to have to make a really big mistake, or Democrats are going to have to succeed in turning him into a boogeyman, or he will be confirmed,' Duffy said." Congressional "strategists on both sides said they shared Duffy's view of the vote count." But "with Republicans weakened, most recently by the influence-peddling scandal surrounding former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, some Democrats are mulling whether to try to thwart Alito's confirmation through a filibuster, a tactic in which a minority party can block a vote by refusing to end debate."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, on Fox News Sunday (1/8, Hume), contended that Alito "is the most qualified person to be nominated for the Supreme Court in 70 years in terms of judicial experience. He's been on the court for 15 years, and there's absolutely no indication that he's an ideologue, a person who will ignore the law to enact their own personal agenda. So he's a solid conservative, and I think he'll be confirmed, probably on a party line vote in the committee." Bloomberg (1/9, Larkin) reports Specter "said on CNN's 'Late Edition' program that he has 'not seen any rational basis' for a filibuster." Graham "said a filibuster of a Supreme Court nominee wouldn't be supported in the Senate."

USA Today (1/9, Biskupic, 2.31M) says "some Democratic senators, including Sens. Charles Schumer of New York and Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, have complained about Alito's views against abortion rights and warned that Alito could help roll back a range of civil rights protections." Schumer "recently questioned whether Alito would seek limits on presidential power." Kennedy is quotes sating, "I think there is a steep hill to climb for Judge Alito at the hearings." However, "Democrats who might oppose the nominee have a climb, too. Republicans control 55 votes in the 100-member Senate, close to the 60 votes necessary to shut down a filibuster if Democrats try to block floor action on Alito."

The Washington Times (1/9, Hurt, 90K) says Democrats "said yesterday that they may block the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr., depending on the answers the nominee gives at his Senate Judiciary Committee confirmation hearings, which begin today." Schumer said that if Alito "refuses to answer questions on issues that Democrats deem vital, the party will be more likely to block the nomination." Majority Leader Bill Frist "has said all along that he would employ the 'nuclear option.'"

Sen. Ted. Kennedy, appearing on ABC's This Week (1/8, Stephanopoulos), said, "I think Judge Alito has a lot to respond to in the Judiciary Committee. I think whether his success or failure is really going to be his performance in the Judiciary Committee, not just for the members of the Judiciary Committee but for the American people. … I've had the good opportunity to read through Judge Alito's opinions, more than 300 of those, and no one can read through those opinions and not find out that there's a basic hostility to…individual rights, a welcoming to executive authority and power even when it's excessive, and also the fact that he has so identified with major corporate interests at the expense of individual interests.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, on Fox News Sunday (1/8, Hume), said, "My question is are his views, let's say, on abortion the same as they were in 1985 when he wrote in an application, the Constitution does not protect a woman's rights in this area. Now, if that's true and he still holds to that, this will make him a very difficult nominee for many of us."

DNC Chairman Howard Dean, on CNN's Late Edition (1/8, Blitzer) said, "There are a couple of problems with Judge Alito. First of all, he appears to be outside the mainstream of where most Americans are on privacy for individuals, not just women's issues, but strip searching, OK'ing a strip search of a 10-year-old, these kinds of things. The other thing which is also troubling is the conflict of interest case where he owned $400,000 worth of mutual funds and was willing to sit on a case involving the company. His order was later vacated. Now, he promised the American people when he was confirmed that he would recuse himself."

DOJ_NMG_0008381

Sen. John Cronyn writes in the Washington Times (1/9, 90K), "The Senate judicial confirmation process has, in the recent past, been both emotional and divisive. That should not be the case, and we should certainly not engage in or indulge any debate which distorts or misrepresents the record of an individual with as fine a record as that of Judge Alito. Let us commit ourselves to a fair process -- with full investigation, full questioning, full debate and an up-or-down vote."

The Legal Times (1/9, Mauro) reports, "Even his closest friends say Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito Jr. is a shyer, blander version of Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. -- and Roberts himself was described as shy and bland when he was nominated to the high court." The Times continues, "Be that as it may, Alito's Senate confirmation hearings, which begin this week, will be anything but bland or dull. After a long holiday truce, the battle over Alito's nomination suddenly flared again last week, with dueling D.C. press conferences, partisan advertisements, and e-mail campaigns creating the illusion, if not the real prospect, that Alito is in for a far tougher time than Roberts. Groups ranging from the Hip Hop Caucus to the National Italian American Foundation weighed in, suggesting that at the eleventh hour, the Alito nomination was finally generating strong interest." The Times adds, "What had once shaped up as a one-note debate over Alito's seemingly undeniable personal opposition to abortion rights has been overtaken by a range of other issues, most notably his expansive view of executive branch power -- a suddenly less palatable position in light of President George W. Bush's controversial domestic eavesdropping initiative and his lower popularity poll numbers. … Add to that the fact that Alito is up to replace swing vote Justice Sandra Day O'Connor -- whereas conservative Roberts replaced the late conservative William Rehnquist -- and fireworks are in the offing."

"Strongest Ammunition" Against Alito Could Come From Nominee's Memos. The Washington Post (1/9, A10, Babington, 744K) reports Senate Democrats "are expected to attack…Alito Jr. on multiple fronts at the confirmation hearing that opens at noon today, but their strongest ammunition is likely to come from the nominee's own hand." Alito "wrote two memos in 1985 that rocked political circles when they were made public last November. In one, an application for a promotion in the Reagan administration, Alito wrote that 'the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion.' … The other memo outlined a strategy for attacking the landmark 1973 court ruling that legalized abortion nationwide, asking: 'What can be made of this opportunity to advance the goals of bringing about the eventual overruling of Roe v. Wade and, in the meantime, of mitigating its effects?'"

Abortion, Executive Power Likely To Be Focus Of Alito Hearings. ABC and NBC previewed what ABC World News Tonight (1/8, story 5, :45, Woodruff) said "could be the toughest confirmation hearings for a Supreme Court nominee in decades," adding that abortion "is expected to be the most-contentious issue at the hearings, which begin tomorrow." NBC Nightly News (1/8, story 5, 2:00, Seigenthaler) also said abortion will be a key topic, but added that "judicial liberties" and "executive power" will both be subjects for inquiry. Sen. Sam Brownback: "Presidential authority, he should talk about the Constitution. Specific cases he shouldn't comment on." Jordan: "Another supporter said he should not be expected to make promises about how he would rule on executive power cases." Sen. John Cornyn: "There has been movement long security and civil liberties. I think clearly Judge Alito believes, as we all do, that civil liberties are important." Jordan: "But the top Democrat says documents from his career have already shown he is inclined to expand executive power." Sen. Patrick Leahy: "He has spoken on presidential powers. He has done that since he was a judge. So he has no reason why he can't speak to it now."

Asked on CBS's Face the Nation (1/8, Schieffer) if the "issue of presidential power going to dominate these hearings the way the issue of abortion dominated the Roberts hearings." Sen. Arlen Specter replied, "I believe that presidential power will be very, very important. You have what appears to be a conflict between the president's claim of executive war powers to eavesdrop without a warrant, a conflict with what Congress has done on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, and I think it is a fair inquiry, and I intend to press the question with Judge Alito as to how he would approach these issues on a jurisprudential base. But I do not think that you can put aside the issue of a woman's right to choose. I think that that…is still the bigger question."

DOJ_NMG_0008382

The New York Times (1/9, Liptak, 1.19M) offers "A Primer On The Alito Hearings," contrasting the Alito hearings with those last fall for nominee John Roberts. The Times highlights abortion and the right to privacy, the limits of presidential power, and the scope of congressional authority, as the key questions for Alito. Similarly, the Christian Science Monitor (1/9, Chaddock, 61K) says Alito can expected to be confronted with "issues ranging from the scope of abortion rights and government regulation to how vigorously the federal courts will enforce civil rights. … As he did in the Roberts hearing, Sen. Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, who chairs the Senate Judiciary Committee, will lead off with a question on abortion rights, aides say. But he plans to quickly segue to Alito's views on presidential power during times of war."

NBC Nightly News (1/8, story 6, 2:30, Seigenthaler) also ran an "In Depth" feature on abortion and Supreme Court nominees over the 33 years since Roe v. Wade, reporting that John Paul Stevens "was nominated and over time he became a dependable vote to uphold it. Sandra Day O'Connor took fire from conservatives on abortion," but President Reagan "came to her defense. … But as a Justice she reaffirmed a woman's right to choose. As nominee, Scalia voiced moderation. As a justice he voted to overturn it. Another Reagan nominee, Kennedy, affirmed the very basis of Roe v. Wade. When the first President Bush nominated David Souter, abortion was 'Topic A.' … But as a Justice, he has reaffirmed Roe v. Wade, infuriating conservatives to this day. … Abortion was part of the fight over Clarence Thomas who as a nominee wouldn't talk about it. As a Justice he voted to overturn it. Bill Clinton remains the only Democrat since Roe v. Wade to appoint Supreme Court Justices. Both have supported abortion rights. Now as George W. Bush shapes the court, abortion remains at center states. John Roberts is now Chief Justice Roberts. And it is Samuel Alito's opportunity to answer questions -- or not."

Time (1/16, Bacon, Allen) reports that as Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito's confirmation hearings begin this week "Senators and viewers will be asking, Is this the man of the memos, whose paper trail includes provocative passages against abortion and in favor of Executive power that have given Democrats and liberal interest groups the ammunition to portray him as a dangerous activist? Or would the high court be getting the more opaque and reserved scholar described by friends and co-workers and suggested by some of his later work?" Time adds that amid reports of the NSA's secret domestic surveillance program, "Democrats have shifted their concern to Alito's robust defense of Executive power. In a 2000 speech, for instance, Alito argued that the framers viewed the Executive Branch of government 'as necessary to balance the huge power of the legislature and the factions that may gain control over it.' Massachusetts Senator Ted Kennedy has said he would question Alito about a 1984 memo in which he argued the Attorney General should be immune from lawsuits even if he authorized illegal domestic wiretapping."

Newsweek (1/16) reports in its "Periscope" column that when Alito's confirmation hearings begin "TV viewers are going to need a translator. For example, Sen. Arlen Specter, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, will probably begin by quizzing Alito about stare decisis (rough Latin meaning: 'let the decision stand'), the judicial rule under which the Supreme Court follows its own precedents -- until five or more justices want to junk one of them." Specter "wants Alito to affirm the court's 1973 decision in Roe v. Wade that created a woman's right to an abortion. So Specter's first question might be: 'Judge Alito, could you tell us your philosophy toward stare decisis?' Translation: Can I get you to promise -- or even hint -- that you will leave the abortion ruling alone?" Newsweek adds that Democrats "will try to paint Alito as a slippery character with a 'credibility problem' and a radical conservative agenda." A Democratic senator "might ask: 'Judge Alito, in one dissent you upheld the strip search by police of a 10-year-old girl, even though the other judges, including conservatives, said the search went way too far.' Translation: How can we trust you to protect the civil liberties of all Americans? Alito will say that the "strip search" was not really that, but rather a female police officer asking the girl and her mother to remove selected articles of clothing in a bathroom as part of a search for illegal drugs conducted with a warrant. Translation: You're twisting the context to smear me."

Morning After Pill Shifts Abortion Debate, Likely To Impact Alito Hearings. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Cummings, 2.11M) reports, "The abortion debate in America's courts is shifting into new medical and legal terrain, thanks to the escalating battle over the so-called morning-after pill, and it is likely to become an issue in Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel Alito's confirmation hearings, which start today. The controversy hinges on one of the most elemental questions in the debate: when pregnancy begins. … The distinction is of immense importance in an emerging battle between religious conservatives and some women's groups over access to emergency contraception." The Journal adds, "Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D., Calif.) both are expected to press Judge Alito on his legal analysis of abortion and contraception rights during his confirmation hearings. Ms. Feinstein on Friday cited women's reproductive rights first on a list of issues she plans to explore. … Judge Alito hasn't been asked about whether he considers the morning-after pill an abortifacient."

DOJ_NMG_0008383

"Religious Right" Leaders Rally For Alito. The Washington Post (1/9, A10, Edsall, 744K) reports, "Republicans and leaders of the religious right gathered in a black church," Philadelphia's Greater Exodus Baptist, Sunday night to build support for Alito "as part of their effort to block gay marriage, end abortion and restore religious expression in the public square." Sen. Rick Santorum said the" elevation of Alito to the top court is crucial because 'extremely liberal justices [are] destroying traditional morality.' The battle, he said, is against Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who are determined to 'continue the far left judicial activism on the Supreme Court.'" Greater Exodus pastor Herbert H. Lusk II told the gathering of about 600, "My friends, don't fool with the church because the church has buried a million critics. And those the church has not buried, the church has made funeral arrangement for." Reuters (1/9) reports that the Rev. Jerry Falwell, speaking at the event, said confirming Alito "would be the biggest victory for his constituency in three decades. 'What we've worked on for 30 years, to mobilize people of faith and value in this country, what we've done through these years is coming to culmination right now,' Falwell said.

The Pittsburgh Post Gazette (1/9, Reston) reports that during the program, which organizers said was broadcast to 80 million viewers through Christian broadcast stations and church telecasts, Santorum "said 'extreme liberal judges' are 'destroying traditional morality and creating a new moral code.' 'The Supreme Court has become the supreme branch of the government imposing its unrestrained will on all of the people,' Mr. Santorum said. 'The only way to restore this Republic our founders envisioned is to elevate honorable jurists like Samuel Alito who will help replace the hubris of this court with humility and respect for the common sense of the American people.'"

The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/9, Budoff, 423K) adds Falwell "described…Bush's nomination of Alito as the culmination of a lengthy effort to 'mobilize people of faith and values.'" The event "was billed as an effort to turn around an increasingly secularized society. But it also provided a high-profile forum to tout Alito as a justice who would exercise judicial restraint and halt restrictions on religious expression in public."

Alito First Showed Conservative Stripes In Reagan Justice Department. The Washington Post (1/9, A1, Becker, Russakoff, 744K) looks back at Alito's tenure in the Reagan Justice Department, where he "proved himself" by "distilling their agenda to reshape the nation's civil rights laws and overturn abortion rights into brilliantly analytical legal strategies. Much like his father, who had served both parties in a politically riven New Jersey legislature, he won the trust of the president's most ardent loyalists as well as the career civil servants who were often at war with them."

The New York Times (1/9, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) runs a similar look back at the Reagan era, examining how Alito and Roberts once worked out of "cramped offices along the same hallway on the fifth floor of the Justice Department's headquarters. … A quarter-century later, their contrasting styles will be on display again this week in the Senate hearings on the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Alito." But if Roberts "had the more political job then, it is now Judge Alito who faces more political opposition, in part because of statements he made in 1985 to persuade the administration's leaders that he, too, was a conservative at heart."

Concerned Women For America's LaRue "Battling" Over Court's Future. The Washington Post (1/9, C1, Davis, 744K) profiles Concerned Women for America Chief Counsel Jan LaRue, "a street fighter -- a Christian one, armed with a law degree. Lately, LaRue has been battling over the future of the Supreme Court." LaRue is known "for her legal acumen, assertion of principles over politics, and debating style, which has been described as fierce, tough and even ruthless. LaRue likes to say she believes in being direct without being brutal." She "took the long road to Washington, arriving by way of darkness and light. Her life story is a dramatic one that includes molestation, self-described heavy drinking and promiscuity, and dropping out of high school. And, she will tell you with great regret, she had an illegal abortion. She eventually ended up a divorcee and a single mom before she found another man to love and a God to save her."

Alito Confirmation Battle Goes Far Beyond The Beltway. The Legal Times (1/9, Goldman) reports, "It was

DOJ_NMG_0008384

9:35 in the morning, and after a bad night's sleep in Little Rock (AR)'s best hotel, David Moore was already facing his second interview of the day. … It wasn't the usual routine for the confirmed academic, a former Justice Department lawyer who is now a professor at the University of Kentucky College of Law. … But on this Tuesday morning, the only thing on his résumé that really mattered — and the reason he left his wife and two small children behind in the middle of a vacation in Phoenix — was that he was a former clerk to Samuel Alito Jr." The Times continues, "Moore had flown to Arkansas because it is home to Sen. Mark Pryor, a first-term Democrat who is a member of the 'Gang of 14' and a key vote in Alito's upcoming confirmation battle. … And while Pryor will ultimately make his own decision (which many believe will be to break ranks with his own party and vote to confirm), a little persuasion in that direction from some of Arkansas' 2.7 million citizens couldn't hurt. … And in the hierarchy of vouching for a high court nominee, few have more credibility than a former Alito law clerk. Almost without exception, Alito's 54 former charges have been happy to sing the praises of their former boss, who, after 15 years on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit, has compiled a disparate, but intensely loyal, collection of acolytes. … Last week, in anticipation of Alito's Jan. 9 hearings, 20 former Alito clerks were sent out to stump in 18 states by Progress for America, perhaps the most well-heeled of the pro-Alito groups. There they usually went head-to-head with statewide anti-Alito coalitions organized by left-leaning groups (in Arkansas it was the local chapter of People For the American Way)."

NYTimes Commentators Pose "Thirty Questions For Alito." On its op-ed page, the New York Times runs "Thirty Questions For Alito" from a variety of commentators. Leonard A. Leo of the Federalist Society asks about the fallibility of the High Court and the principle of judicial restraint; Yale Law School's Kenji Yoshino asks about abortion and the constitutional protection of "rights that do not appear in the text of the document itself," University of California at Berkeley's John Yoo asks if the 9/11 attacks put the US "in a state of war with Al Qaeda and its allies," and what Alito feels is the "worst example of constitutional interpretation rendered by the Supreme Court in the last 30 years," author Scott Turow asks for Alito's take on Bush v. Gore; and Florida International University's Stanley Fish inquires about several points of constitutional theory.

Dean Says Alito Should Be Rejected Over Ethics Concerns. Tying his opposition to Alito's nomination to recent allegations of GOP ethical abuses DNC Chairman Howard Dean in an op-ed in the Baltimore Sun (1/9, 296K) writes, "It's been widely acknowledged that President Bush had a bad year in 2005." One problem "America faces as a result is the White House's willingness to make decisions based on what benefits the administration politically rather than what's right for America." Judge Samuel Alito's nomination "is just one example of this. The president hopes to make up ground with his right-wing base instead of appointing someone who will have the confidence of a wide range of Americans." Americans "should shudder at the prospect of an ethically tone-deaf judge sitting on the one institution in Washington not yet in the pocket of the extremists who comprise the right wing of the Republican Party" because a "culture of corruption, arrogance of power and insensitivity to the appearance of conflict of interest has plagued key Republican officeholders for the past five years."

More Commentary On Alito Hearings. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, 2.11M) editorializes, "Alito's Supreme Court confirmation trial finally begins today, and don't look for John Roberts redux. If you listen to the rhetoric coming from liberal Democrats in recent days, it's clear they're spoiling for a fight. … And since they know it will be next to impossible to beat him on credentials or judicial philosophy, the main line of attack looks to be on Judge Alito's integrity. The strategy is to sling mud in the hope that something will stick. … We trust [Senate Republicans] won't let the Kennedy Democrats get away with the borking they clearly would like to attempt. Republicans also have a rare, high-profile chance to make the case for the Constitutional role for judges that the Founders intended. This confirmation is probably the most important thing the Senate will do this election year. Too bad it's shaping up to be more of a character attack than a debate over judicial philosophy."

The Washington Post (1/9, A18, 744K) editorializes, "Alito, in any formal sense, is obviously well qualified -- as the American Bar Association recently recognized. Allegations of impropriety on his part seem trivial, and the ideological questions about him are well known. … It is quite clear already that Judge Alito would be a conservative justice. The question is whether he will emerge in these hearings as one energetically committed to remaking federal law to restrain congressional power, expand presidential authority and read individual constitutional rights narrowly or as a cautious judge who is mindful of the limits of judicial power. Both judicial personalities show up in his writings at times. The question for the Senate will be: Which is the real Samuel Alito?"

DOJ_NMG_0008385

The Los Angeles Times (1/9, 958K) editorializes that while Alito's "position on abortion rights garnered much of the attention in the aftermath of his nomination to the Supreme Court last fall, the top priority of senators at his confirmation hearing this week should be to ascertain whether the judge sufficiently appreciates the proper constitutional balance of power among the three branches of government. It is a timely issue, as President Bush insists on expanding the executive branch's power to conduct the war on terrorism. … In contrast to his willingness to expand the powers of the presidency beyond its constitutional boundaries, Alito has been more traditionally conservative in narrowly defining the powers of Congress as set out in the Constitution. … Senators should ask Alito to expand on his understanding of the federal government's power to regulate interstate commerce, the source of much of its authority. Oh, and yes, they should also ask him about his views on abortion rights."

USA Today (1/9, 2.31M) editorializes, "In a 1985 application for a political promotion at the Justice Department, Alito said that as a student, he developed an interest in constitutional law 'motivated in large part by disagreement with the Warren Court decisions.' He singled out high court rulings involving criminal procedure, separation of church and state, and even the principle of one person/one vote. In the same memo, Alito enthusiastically embraced the argument that the Constitution does not protect a woman's right to an abortion -- a contention that has been consistently rejected by the court for more than 30 years. Alito's paper trail as a government lawyer and federal judge raises doubts as to whether he would respect those and other court precedents. … He needs to provide reassurance that he would not strip away protections the Supreme Court has guaranteed."

Florida Federal Judges Reject Request To End Secret Case Transfers. The Miami Daily Business Review (1/9, Kay) reports, "South Florida's federal judges have declined to change their current system of transferring cases to one another outside the random assignment process, despite concerns raised by the federal public defender that the current system could open the door to forum shopping by litigants." The Review continues, "In a meeting last Wednesday to vote on whether to change their internal operating procedures, the judges blasted a proposal by Federal Public Defender Kathleen M. Williams to impose restrictions on their ability to transfer cases among themselves. … 'You're asking us to change the present policy, which has been in effect for many years ... and to complicate the system,' said U.S. District Judge Donald L. Graham. 'If I'm ill on a Sunday night and I know Judge Moreno is free Monday morning for a trial, why can't I call him and ask him to cover?'" The Review adds, "The judges' informal method of transferring cases among each other came to light when the Daily Business Review discovered that the court had its own unpublished internal operating procedures that allow them to make such transfers. The procedure was discovered while the Review was reporting on the wholesale transfer of his criminal docket by Senior Judge James Lawrence King to another judge so he could avoid a conflict of interest. .. After the Review's article appeared, the court decided to make these so-called 'secret rules' public and post them on its Web site. … A local rules committee, headed by Miami lawyer Thomas Meeks, a partner at Zuckerman Spaeder, was asked by the judges to review the court's unpublished procedures and ensure that they conformed with the published rules that guide attorneys who practice before the court. Meeks suggested minor changes that the judges adopted, but agreed with the judges that their case transfer system should not be changed. … A public hearing was held Wednesday before the court adopted the previously unpublished internal rules. Williams was the only one to speak at the hearing, which was attended by nearly the entire bench that serves the Southern District of Florida."

Bush Made 17 More Recess Appointments Last Week. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Cooper, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush bypassed the Senate to make 17 recess appointments to administration posts last week, relying on a constitutional prerogative that lame-duck presidents have exercised to break political logjams on Capitol Hill." Though he has used the method "less than two-term predecessors Bill Clinton and Ronald Reagan," Bush "has shown a willingness to do so to fill administration ranks. … Including last week's appointments, Mr. Bush has used the device 123 times in the past five years. Mr. Clinton made 140 recess appointments during eight years in office, and Mr. Reagan made 243." The Journal adds, "Last week's appointments include Hans von Spakovsky to the Federal Election Commission, a former Republican Party official who sparked controversy with Democrats for pushing Georgia to require voters to produce government-issued identification before voting -- a requirement critics say is racist." Julie Myers, "who some Republicans and Democrats said lacked experience for the position, was appointed to head the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement." Bush also "installed Gordon England as deputy secretary of defense, bypassing holds that two Republican senators put on the appointment. Some senators had questioned whether Mr. England's former employer presented a conflict: He once worked for defense contractor General Dynamics Corp. Dorrance Smith, a former producer for ABC News, was appointed assistant secretary of defense for public affairs over objections by Democratic senators about an opinion article in which Mr. Smith questioned the patriotism of US television networks that broadcast footage from pan-Arab television network al-Jazeera. Benjamin Powell was appointed general counsel to intelligence chief John Negroponte."

DOJ_NMG_0008386

NYTimes Blasts Bush Recess Appointments. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/9, 1.19M) says, "It is disturbing that…Bush has exhibited a grandiose vision of executive power that leaves little room for public debate, the concerns of the minority party or the supervisory powers of the courts." But "it is just plain baffling to watch him take the same regal attitude toward a Congress in which his party holds solid majorities in both houses. Seizing the opportunity presented by the Congressional holiday break," Bush "announced 17 recess appointments -- a constitutional gimmick that allows a president to appoint someone when Congress is in recess to a job that normally requires Senate approval. The appointee serves until the next round of Congressional elections." Reagan and Clinton "made scores of recess appointments. But both of them faced a Congress controlled by the opposition party, while the Senate has been under Republican control for Mr. Bush's entire five years in office." The Times adds, "Bush's record in this area owes less to unreasonable Democrats than to the low caliber of some of his choices, his disinterest in bipartisan consensus and his aversion to any form of accountability, whether to the Senate, the courts or the public."

Bush Seeks To Revive Compassionate Conservative Reputation. The Boston Globe (1/9 Easton, 484K) says President Bush "is seeking to resurrect his early reputation as a compassionate conservative who reaches across the aisle, according to officials close to the White House. … With his State of the Union address three weeks away, White House policy and speech shops are busily crafting a message that portrays Bush as a bold leader but avoids the kind of far-reaching and divisive reform proposals -- such as turning illegal immigrants into guest workers or overhauling Social Security -- that previously landed him in hot water with key voters. … In the coming weeks, the president will continue to advertise progress in Iraq, and the war on terror, as well as highlighting good economic news. … But the public will also hear the president talk more about education initiatives to bridge the wage gap, as well as conservative ideas to address poverty, especially as New Orleans recovers from Hurricane Katrina, according to officials close to the White House. Meanwhile, Bush will continue to approach unlikely audiences." Republican strategists "say Bush's 2006 agenda will reflect the reality that his party needs to retain control of Congress in the face of burgeoning ethics scandals and continued fallout in public opinion polls over the Iraq war. … President Bush, strategists say, needs to be careful not to anger his conservative base, as he did when he proposed a guest-worker immigrant program. Immigration, officials say, is an issue he will continue to approach gingerly, mostly talking broadly about border security."

DeLay Abandons Effort To Return As Majority Leader. Newsweek (1/16, Isikoff, Bailey, Thomas) says the scandal surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff "will cost Congressman DeLay his post as House Majority leader. DeLay had been hoping to get out from under a weak money-laundering charge in an unrelated Texas prosecution in time to retain his leadership role for the coming year. Now, with the Abramoff inquiry likely to drag on, DeLay has announced he is stepping down."

In its cover package, Time (1/16, Tumulty) reports, "The once feared DeLay, whose office had been Abramoff's biggest claim to access and influence on Capitol Hill, announced he would resign as House majority leader. 'I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land,' DeLay wrote in a letter to his G.O.P. colleagues, but added, 'I cannot allow our adversaries to divide and distract our attention.' Because of his tightfisted regime that rewarded loyalists and punished detractors, his departure is sure to set off not just a fight for his old job but also some ugly score settling."

Bush's Inner Circle Sees DeLay As "Necessary Burden." In a separate article in its cover package, Time

DOJ_NMG_0008387

(1/16, Cooper, Allen) reports on the "longtime chill" between President Bush and DeLay, noting that the distance between the two is "sure to grow with former lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea. Both camps describe the two conservative Texan's relationship as professional 'an alliance, not a friendship.' 'DeLay admires Bush's leadership but still thinks of himself as the strongest conservative on the block,' a DeLay friend says. 'They perceive DeLay as a bull in a china shop. They appreciate him as their protector and retriever.'" Time adds that "top Bush advisers tell TIME, the President's inner circle always treated DeLay as a necessary burden."

Blunt, Boehner Running For House Majority Leader. Reuters (1/9, Zargham) reports US Rep. Roy Blunt, "an ally of Rep. Tom DeLay, sought to permanently replace the indicted Texan as majority leader of the House of Representatives on Sunday but faced a challenge from fellow Republican John Boehner, who has had major differences with DeLay." A leadership election "is expected to be held the week of January 30." Blunt "has served as acting majority leader since DeLay was forced to give up the job in September but Boehner is considered a formidable foe, a leadership aide said." DeLay on Sunday "accused Democrats of 'character assassination' and said they were trying to portray him as guilty by association in the influence-peddling scandal involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff. 'Time was the enemy,' DeLay told Fox News on Sunday when asked what prompted his decision not to try to return as majority leader."

The Financial Times (1/9, Yeager) says Blunt "has close ties to Mr DeLay and to K Street…and has been criticised for a series of mis-steps on the House floor in recent months." Boehner "rose to the Republican leadership ranks with Newt Gingrich, the former speaker, but was ousted from his post in 1998. … Several other congressmen are thought to be considering bids, including Mike Pence, the outspoken leader of a group of about 100 conservatives in the House, and Jerry Lewis, a veteran lawmaker who leads the powerful appropriations committee."

The Washington Times (1/9, Dinan, 90K) says that "already, a difference between" Blunt and Boehner "over lobbying reform, a hot topic among many members in the wake of guilty pleas by lobbyist Jack Abramoff." Boehner "said the current system works and pointed to Abramoff's guilty plea as an indication of that. 'Adding more new rules isn't the answer,' Mr. Boehner told the Fox News Channel." Blunt, however, "has made lobbying reform a key part of his pitch to fellow members."

The New York Times (1/9, Hulse, 1.19M) says "the Bush administration and its Congressional allies braced for a potentially divisive internal battle at the start of a crucial campaign year. … For the White House, the leadership fight will complicate President Bush's efforts to press ahead with his political recovery effort after a difficult 2005. It is also likely to distract attention from the agenda he plans to set out in the State of the Union address, which he is expected to deliver on Jan. 31, in the same week as the leadership vote." Bush "had hoped to use January to accomplish two big goals: win the confirmation battle over Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s nomination to the Supreme Court, and show voters that he is overwhelmingly focused on the war in Iraq and the economy."

However, the Christian Science Monitor (1/9, Chaddock, 61K) reports that "from a public-relations standpoint, the decision by Mr. DeLay not to keep his post as House majority leader may give Republicans a boost ahead of this year's midterm elections. After all, he had gone from whip to whipping boy amid complaints that he embodied corruption in Congress" But "by losing DeLay's leadership, Republicans also lose his fundraising prowess and peerless talent for enforcing party discipline on key bills."

USA Today (1/9, Kiely, 2.31M) also says DeLay's "decision to step aside may make it more difficult for Republicans to win close votes in the House. DeLay had a proven record of being able to obtain a victory in a close vote. But the decision also removes a target for Democrats." On Sunday, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "said a "culture of corruption" among Republicans in Washington remains pervasive, even without DeLay." But "the National Republican Senatorial Committee says Democrats also have taken money from donors linked to Abramoff."

Kristol Recommends Pence Or Shadegg. Bill Kristol of The Weekly Standard, on Fox News Sunday (1/8, Hume), said, "The key for the Republicans now…is not to replace DeLay with someone else who has been, fairly or unfairly -- is viewed as being part of this degeneration of the conservative cause from a movement to a business to a racket. … I think it might be time for a fresh face there, someone like Mike Pence, the young, very conservative -- not very conservative -- conservative and aggressive and articulate congressman from Indiana -- someone to come in and put a fresh face on the Republican majority of the House. … I think someone like Pence or John Shadegg from Arizona would help the Republicans re-seize once again the mantle of reformers."

DOJ_NMG_0008388

Cornyn Hedges When Asked Whether DeLay Ought To Seek Re-Election. Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (1/8. Russert) if it would be "better for the Republican Party if Tom DeLay did not seek re-election," Sen. John Cornyn did not answer yes or no, but said, "I think what would be best if we allow the process to run its course, the charges against him -- there's a lot of informed judgment that he actually will be acquitted of those charges. … But the truth is, right now, all we know is that individuals, like Mr. Abramoff have plead guilty. Others are standing on their right, a presumption of innocence and insisting on a trial."

Texas Columnist Says Earle Prosecution Has Little Impact On DeLay's Fortunes. In a Wall Street Journal (1/9, 2.11M) op-ed, San Antonio Express-News columnist Jonathan Gurwitz writes, "Poor Ronnie Earle. For more than three years, the Democratic district attorney from Travis County has waged a prosecutorial campaign to bring down Tom DeLay. After strong-arming three different grand juries in Austin last fall, Mr. Earle was finally able to obtain a rickety, three-count indictment of Mr. DeLay for violations of state campaign finance laws. … But the indictment, meager as it is, was sufficient under House Republican rules to force Mr. DeLay to step down temporarily from his position as majority leader. … DeLay's political fortunes are in free fall. And until the full extent of the Abramoff scandal is known, it's not at all clear how far that plunge will take him. What is clear is that his re-election bid -- and, in a broader sense, Republican control of Congress -- is likely to have very little to do with Mr. Earle's legal charades in Austin and everything to do with Mr. DeLay's ethical quandary in Washington."

In Wake Of Scandals, GOP Leaders Ponder Lobbying Reforms. The Christian Science Monitor (1/9, Feldmann, 61K) reports, "In the wake of lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea on corruption charges, one point seems clear: Congress is now keenly interested in looking at how lobbyists do business, and may well make reforms by next November's elections. Suddenly, everyone on Capitol Hill wants higher standards." For Republican leaders, "the danger is looking like Johnny-come-latelies on reform." For Democrats, "eager to regain control of at least one chamber of Congress this fall, the Abramoff scandal presents a golden opportunity to hammer home their point about a 'GOP culture of corruption.'" The Monitor adds, "From the lobbying industry's perspective, what's clearly needed -- before anyone changes the rules of the game -- is beefed-up oversight."

Roll Call (1/9, Newmyer) also says Republican lawmakers are "scrambling to lay out their plans for cleaning up Congress and to stanch the political bleeding from a widening election-year scandal." In the Senate, "Conrad Burns (Mont.) became the first Republican to back a measure by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that would impose new disclosure requirements on Members and lobbyists. Burns, locked in a tough re-election fight, is under scrutiny from federal prosecutors for his ties to Abramoff." Meanwhile, "Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) is consulting with colleagues about what shape his own reform package should take."

The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Rogers, 2.11M) adds Speaker Dennis Hastert "returns to the Capitol tomorrow after canceling a trip to India, and he has given House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R., Calif.) a broad mandate to reach out to Democrats and to Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) on overhaul proposals." In an interview, the speaker, "a former high-school civics teacher, spoke of the initiative in personal terms: 'The House needs to exude integrity, and we need to make some changes. ... This is not something that's knee-jerk,' Mr. Hastert said." Hastert also "looks willing to embrace portions of a bipartisan Senate bill introduced by Mr. McCain." The Washington Post (1/9, A2, Weisman, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Hastert Moves To Tighten Rules On Lobbyists," in which it says the Speaker's move "comes months after House Democrats, led by Reps. Martin T. Meehan (Mass.) and Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), and Republican Rep. Christopher Shays (Conn.), unveiled proposals to mandate more disclosure of lobbying contacts, ban most lobbyist-sponsored trips and lengthen the time former House members and staff must wait before taking up lobbying."

Lobbying Reforms Expected To Pass This Year. U.S. News and World Report (1/16, Pound) says the Abramoff scandal "has so unnerved many Republican lawmakers that lobbying reforms are expected to pass this year. Among other changes, such reforms are likely to curb privately funded junkets for lawmakers and require more disclosure by lobbyists of funds spent to influence legislation."

WSJournal Says DeLay Successor Should Reinvigorate GOP's Commitment To Reform. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (1/9, 2.11M) says that by taking himself out of the race for house Majority Leader, Rep. Tom DeLay has "given his GOP colleagues a chance to reinvigorate their leadership, assuming they're alert enough to realize the dangers facing their majority this November. On first glance, we're not sure they are. Speaker Dennis Hastert's response this weekend was to issue a press release declaring his sudden passion for 'lobbying reform.' … The idea seems to be that a ban on lobbyist-paid golf junkets or limits on the House floor privileges of former Members of Congress will prevent the next Jack Abramoff." The Journal adds, "The real House GOP problem isn't about lobbyists so much as it is the atrophying of its principles. As their years in power have stretched on, House Republicans have become more passionate about retaining power than in using that power to change or limit the federal government. … As House Republicans consider replacing Mr. DeLay, they need to choose someone who will reinvigorate their commitment to reforming Washington. And this may mean more change than they'd otherwise prefer entering an election year."

DOJ_NMG_0008389

More Commentary. Jeffrey Birnbaum writes in the Washington Post (1/9, D1, 744K), "In an earlier column I recommended that registered lobbyists be barred from raising money for politicians -- at least during congressional sessions -- and I stand by that suggestion. The notion isn't as crazy as it sounds. Several states already have a similar rule and, as we'll see in spades this year, all sorts of new restrictions will be debated in Congress and some of them will almost surely pass as an antidote to the anti-Washington feelings that the Abramoff affair has stirred. … Wider restrictions on lobbyists are coming as well, and many of them may involve campaign contributions. Both House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) have delegated colleagues to devise new lobbying-disclosure legislation. But the bill to watch is authored by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.). Under it, lobbying firms and organizations would have to disclose each fundraising event they host or sponsor for federal candidates and the total amount raised at each such event. The legislation would also require lobbyists to report on their lobbying forms the donations they make to members of Congress and at events that honor members or entities that they created or support. In addition, the bill would force lobbyists to disclose on quarterly reports any gifts worth more than $20 that they gave to lawmakers or their aides, including meals and tickets to events. Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) has a separate plan that would go much further. He would outright ban gifts to lawmakers and staff and would prohibit lobbyists from financing or attending trips with members of Congress. Don't expect any new law to be that extreme, but the fact that he could even countenance such ideas is an indication how serious the problem has become."

Ruth Marcus writes in the Washington Post (1/9, A19, 744K) notes that lawmakers "with enough clout and party committees" host "getaways all the time: ski weekends in Vail, summer jaunts to Nantucket, Super Bowl outings, golf tournaments with this or that committee chair. … In these heady days after the Jack Abramoff plea and Tom DeLay's departure from the GOP leadership, Democrats like to decry the (as they see it) Republican-only 'culture of corruption.' At least as troubling is the capital's more pervasive, and certainly more bipartisan, culture of coziness, epitomized" by such fundraisers. It is "this latter problem that ought to be foremost in lawmakers' minds as they scramble to write new rules to govern their dealings with lobbyists. Even the strongest rules can't stop a lobbyist or lawmaker bent on corruption; see, e.g., not only Abramoff but also former California congressman Randy Cunningham, who pleaded guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. Certainly, the more disclosure that is required, the fewer temptations that a lobbyist can legally dangle in front of a lawmaker and the less the opportunity for criminal mischief. But where lobbying reform could have its most cleansing effect is not with the crooks in Congress or the private sector but with those who play, more or less, by the rules of a fundamentally flawed system."

VA Regional Offices Found To Be Giving Incorrect Information. Department of Veterans Affairs data indicates that people who call the department's regional offices are more likely to receive completely wrong answers than completely right ones. The Washington Post (1/9, A17, 744K) reports, "To see how well department employees answer typical questions from the public, VA benefits experts in 2004 called each of the 57 regional offices, which process disability claims. The mystery callers, saying they were relatives or friends of veterans inquiring about possible benefits, made 1,089 calls. Almost half the time they got answers that the department said were either completely incorrect or minimally correct. According to an internal memo on the mystery-caller program that is buried deep in the VA Web site, 22 percent of the answers the callers got were 'completely incorrect,' 23 percent were 'minimally correct' and 20 percent were 'partially correct.' Nineteen percent of the answers were 'completely correct,' and 16 percent 'mostly correct.' The program also found that some VA workers were dismissive of some callers and unhelpful or rude to others."

DOJ_NMG_0008390

Some Pentagon Analysts Said To Be Skeptical About TRICARE Savings. Syndicated "Military Update" columnist Tom Philpott writes in the Tacoma News (1/7) about "a few Pentagon analysts" who believe the Bush administration will face "a new credibility" gap if TRICARE officials tell Congress it expects to generate $25 billion in savings from raising fees and deductibles on health plans for retirees under 65. Such a figure may draw "skepticism" because 78% of it hinges on an assumption that 600,000 beneficiaries, "facing the higher fees, would stop using TriCare and shift to employer-provided health plans." But, some TRICARE officials don't subscribe to the expected shift since "most employer plans still will cost more."

Novak Says Rove Appears To Have Blundered With New Medicare Drug Benefit. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (1/9) writes that "a few brave souls in the Bush administration admit" that President Bush's "Medicare drug benefit that went into effect Jan. 1 looks like a political blunder of far-reaching consequences. Furthermore, these critics assign major responsibility to Karl Rove. The hideous complexity of the scheme, which has the effect of discouraging seniors from signing up, is only the beginning of difficulties it entails for the president and his party. It will further swell the budget deficit without commensurate political benefits" and "may prove a severe liability for Republicans facing an increasingly hazardous midterm election in November." Rove's "aim was to entice low-to-middle income seniors who vote heavily Democratic and complain about the cost of prescription drugs. That political maneuver was translated by bureaucrats and health-care technicians into a government program so difficult to understand that someone now receiving any prescription drug care would be inclined to stick with the present program even if it seems inadequate." Novak adds that now, with Bush set "to begin his sixth year in office, Medicare drug benefits come into play, a major new entitlement that offends Bush's friends and does not placate his foes. There is not much at this point that can be done about it, except to try to convince seniors and conservatives that the program is really not that bad."

Private Sector Council To Focus On Fixing Federal Procurement System. The Washington Post (1/9, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "With little fanfare over the past two decades, the Private Sector Council has helped federal agencies -- on a one-on-one basis -- fix their business and management problems. The coming year, however, will see the council adding a new dimension and trying to become a catalyst for change, by focusing on government-wide issues, starting with the federal procurement system. … The Private Sector Council is in the planning stages on how to launch an ambitious project to promote change in federal procurement practices, [president Howard] Weizmann said. Tentative plans call for holding half-day seminars and rounding up experts who can talk about best practices, he said. But the goal is not just to talk about "reformation" but also to identify changes that can improve how the government buys about $320 billion in goods and services annually and then test those changes at agencies willing to serve as models, he said."

Cost Of Postage Stamp Increases By Two Cents. The cost of a US postage stamp rose two cents yesterday, marking the first postal increase in nearly four years. The Washington Post (1/9, A17, Lee, 744K) says the next price jump "may come a lot sooner than that. … The increasing popularity of e-mail and online bill paying has cut into mail volume, while the Postal Service must deliver to an ever-increasing number of addresses (up by 2 million last year). The Postal Service faces competition from United Parcel Service and FedEx, private companies that, unlike the post office, are not legally bound to deliver to every address six days a week. … Although such challenges are expected to drive up postal rates in the future, officials in the Postal Service and in the mailing industry say the current increase is the product of a political impasse in Capitol Hill, not postal operations."

OTHER NEWS:

Wage Gains Remain Below Pre-2001 Recession Levels. American workers are beginning to see wage gains, but USA Today (1/9, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) says the increases are "well below the levels prior to the 2001 recession." USA reports, "Wage growth is starting to pick up, with hourly earnings rising 5 cents in December to $16.34, seasonally adjusted, the Labor Department said Friday. Hourly wages rose 3.1% in the 12 months ended in December, the fastest pace since spring 2003. While improving, wage growth appears to remain below consumer inflation, which advanced 3.5% in the 12 months ended in November."

DOJ_NMG_0008391

Greenspan Credits Globalization With Keeping Inflation, Wage Growth Low. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, lp, 2.11M) reports "Buried in the minutes of the Federal Reserve's Dec. 13 policy meeting, released last week, was this bland observation: Fed officials 'noted that robust competition -- including from foreign producers...[was] helping to contain cost and price pressures.' Markets largely ignored the sentence, but it's one of the most important factors guiding Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan in his final weeks at the helm of the nation's central bank. Mr. Greenspan has marveled at how inflation and wage growth have stayed low even as the economy continues to grow robustly and the jobless rate falls below 5%, a level that has often driven up wages and prices. Searching for an explanation, he has hit on globalization. If the Fed thinks growing imports, outsourcing and international investment are holding a lid on wages and prices, then interest rates can be lower than they otherwise would. Indeed, as the minutes show, this is one reason the Fed seems to think it can stop raising rates soon." The Journal adds, "Greenspan's views are clearly rubbing off on his colleagues. 'Globalization has acted as a tail wind for the Fed's -- and other central banks' -- efforts to hold down inflation,' Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas President Richard Fisher said Friday."

Analysis Says Investors Should Focus On FOMC Pronouncements. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Blackstone, 2.11M) says, "Investors seeking clues about future U.S. monetary policy, as well as big market moves, should focus on pronouncements from the Federal Open Market Committee as a whole and not individual members of the Federal Reserve policy body, according to an analysis by a current and a former Fed economist. 'Our results suggest that committee-wide communications have a larger market effect and are more accurate than speeches by individual FOMC members,' Vincent Reinhart, head of the Fed's Monetary Affairs Division, and Brian Sack of Macroeconomic Advisers LLC, and a former Fed economist, wrote in a paper presented Saturday at the annual meeting of the American Economic Association in Boston."

OECD Predicts Moderate Growth For World's Richest Economies. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Hannon, 2.11M) reports, "The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development said its leading indicator of economic activity rose in November for the sixth straight month, signaling that moderate growth lies ahead in 30 of the world's richest economies. … The indicator is designed to provide early signals of turning points between the expansion and slowdown of industrial activity. The composite leading indicator for the U.S. rose to 105 from 104.3, and its six-month rate of change increased for the second straight month."

Dow Nears Close Above 11,000. The Dow Jones Industrial Average is at a 41/2 year high and is nearing its first close above 11,000 since June 7, 2001. USA Today (1/9, Shell, 2.31M) reports that the ability of the Dow, which is less than 41 points shy of closing above 11,000, "to quickly rebound from its 0.6% loss in 2005 is key. Analysts say the resurgence has the potential to deliver a psychological boost to skeptical investors still smarting over lackluster returns last year and those still gun-shy from the brutal bear market earlier in the decade." According to USA a close above 11,000 could lift investor confidence, signal an end to the trading range which has kept the Dow "trapped in a narrow, 600-point band since July" and confirm broader market strength."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (1/9, Browning, 2.11M) says, "Major indexes, such as the Dow Jones Industrial Average and the Nasdaq Composite Index, have been rallying lately to multiyear highs but haven't reached record highs in almost six years. Small stocks, on the other hand, have been hitting repeated records. So have indexes of foreign stocks, energy stocks, banking stocks, transportation stocks and stocks whose value closely tracks the economy. … Some people see the strength of these less-followed groups as a very bullish sign for the market. It suggests that, even though gains in the big indexes have slowed or even disappeared in the past two years, the underlying market is resilient. Others reach the opposite conclusion: The failure of the major indexes to lead the market is a sign of the continued hangover at big companies after the excesses of the late 1990s, suggesting that the recent bull market may be running its course. Either way, one thing is clear: In general, the place to be over the past year hasn't been with the rich and the famous. Even after their New Year's surge, the Dow industrials are up just 1.6% since the end of 2004. The Standard & Poor's midcap index, tracking midsize stocks, has climbed 15%. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, not including U.S. stocks, has jumped 20%. The Dow Jones Transportation Average, fueled by soaring trucking concerns, has advanced 11%."

DOJ_NMG_0008392

Dollar Gets Off To Slow Start In 2006. In the first two days of trading after last Monday's holiday, the US dollar fell 2.5% against, marking its largest two-decline against the European currency. According to the Wall Street Journal (1/9, Karmin, 2.11M), despite a "surprisingly strong performance in 2005," the dollar has "tumbled out of the gate in what some worry may be an ominous sign for 2006. … The U.S. currency hit three-month lows against the euro and Swiss franc Friday morning, and in late New York trading, the dollar was down 0.4% against the euro at $1.2154. It fell even harder against the yen, sliding 1.3% to 114.4165 yen. That approached a three-month low against the Japanese currency, too."

Schwarzenegger Aims To Rebuild State, Image With Large Public Works Plan. Following up on reports from last week, the Christian Science Monitor (1/9, Wood, 61K) relates that California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) "has decided that the proper path to California's future -- and his own rehabilitation -- is dotted with new bridges, highways, and levees ... and carpool lanes, commuter rails, and crime labs ... and schools and prisons, and ports. Two months after voters rejected a series of Schwarzenegger-backed government reforms, and months before his own reelection primary in June, he has announced a 10-year, $222 billion plan to shore up the state's crumbling infrastructure. … 'The governor is switching from concepts to concrete,' says Jack Pitney, political scientist a Claremont McKenna College. … With approval ratings at 32 percent, Schwarzenegger is recasting himself in a role in which he can point to tangible accomplishments come election time next November, say Pitney and others. … 'He is moving back to the center where he was elected, because voters did not take kindly to his becoming more partisan and going around Democratic opponents to the people,' says Sherry Jeffe, political scientist at the University of Southern California. 'As the incumbent coming up for reelection, he has to produce a record to run on. That's what this is about.'"

Governor, Son Suffer Minor Injuries In Motorcycle Collision With Car. The Los Angeles Times (1/9, Krikorian, 958K) reports that Schwarzenegger "and his 12-year-old son were slightly injured Sunday afternoon when their motorcycle collided with a car near the family's home in Brentwood, his office said. The low-speed collision occurred about 3:15 p.m. when Schwarzenegger was riding his Harley-Davidson with his oldest son, Patrick, traveling in the motorcycle's sidecar, according to Margita Thompson, the governor's press secretary." Schwarzenegger "and his son were taken to St. John's Hospital in Santa Monica. Both were released after being treated for minor cuts and bruises, Thompson said, noting that the governor received 15 stitches in his lip. The governor and his oldest son were wearing helmets at the time of the accident, Thompson said. The other driver, she added, was not injured."

Maryland GOP Hoping To Build On Ehrlich's Election Success. The Washington Post (1/9, A1, Mosk, 744K) reports that Maryland Republicans are hoping to build on Gov. Robert Ehrlich's (R) 2002 election win. The Post relates, "True party realignment remains a distant goal, they say, but the political season that begins as the General Assembly convenes Wednesday will be guided by their desire for lasting influence in state affairs." Maryland GOP officials "said the party is borrowing many of the ideas that started Virginia down the path to realignment three decades ago. In addition to their focus on the Maryland governor's race, they believe the bid by Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) to capture an open U.S. Senate seat could provide inroads into the state's most reliable Democratic voters: African Americans. The GOP is targeting the state's populous blue-collar suburbs and fast-growing exurbs, where party leaders hope to pick up as many as 14 seats in the House of Delegates and seven in the Senate this November. And they're already contemplating 2010, when a win in the governor's column could give them control over redistricting and crack open a state where, just a few years ago, Republicans felt like foreigners."

Ehrlich To Propose 15% Reduction In Property Tax Rate. The Washington Post (1/9, B1, Wagner, 744K) reports that Gov. Ehrlich "today will propose reducing the state property tax rate by 15 percent -- a 2-cent rate cut -- and expanding a tax break that helps low-income homeowners pay their bills. The election-year proposal would roll back part, but not all, of a property tax increase initiated by Ehrlich (R) in 2003 to help fill a gaping budget hole that he inherited upon taking office. Aides said Ehrlich will also call on local leaders to reduce property taxes they collect by similar percentages -- a move that would have a far greater effect on homeowners because localities rely much more heavily on the levy than the state does." Ehrlich "will argue at an event in Baltimore County this morning that a reduction in the state property tax of 2 cents per $100 in assessed value is justified because a reversal in Maryland's fiscal outlook has resulted in a surplus of more than $1 billion." The Post notes, "The move would save the owner of a $400,000 home $80 next year and cost the state about $98 million in lost revenue, Ehrlich's aides said. Given the rise in home values, most tax bills probably would still rise despite the proposed rate cut."

DOJ_NMG_0008393

Warner Critical Of DC "Partisanship." The Washington Times (1/9, Bellantoni, 90K) reports that outgoing Virginia Gov. Mark Warner "thinks President Bush and the U.S. Congress could learn some lessons from Virginia, such as lawmakers putting aside partisanship to get the job done." Warner "said cooperation has led Virginia lawmakers to improve the state's finances and enabled them to fund much-needed projects, such as the cleanup of the Chesapeake Bay. 'In Washington, people are more interested in scoring partisan points than getting things done, and I think there is a real yearning in this country for action,'" Warner said in an interview. Warner added, "To a degree, both parties are guilty. … If it's not absolutely their way, they say they'd rather have no action than their ideologically pure solutions. I think that's crazy." After leaving office on Saturday, Warner "immediately will start working full time on his Northern Virginia-based political action committee called Forward Together. His goal for the PAC is to find and fund candidates who he thinks can move the nation forward." Warner "supporters have no doubt that the PAC is a first step toward Mr. Warner's seeking the U.S. presidency in 2008." But Warner "said he's not sure of his next step. 'I haven't decided what, if anything, I am going to do in politics, I really haven't,' he said."

In Split With Bush, McClellan Backs His Mother For Texas Governor. The New York Times (1/9, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports in its "White House Letter" column that the split between President Bush, who is supporting incumbent Republican Gov. Rick Perry in the Texas governor's race, and White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan, who is supporting his mother, state comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn is "just the latest chapter in Mr. McClellan's nearly four decades in politics with his mother, who is as voluble as her son is restrained. Still, Ms. Strayhorn's most recent endeavor is one of the more bizarre moments in Texas politics and also in the West Wing." The Times adds, "Mr. McClellan, the youngest of Ms. Strayhorn's four sons, was 9 when his mother, then a Democrat, was first elected mayor of Austin, a nonpartisan position. Over the next six years, from 1977 to 1983, she served three terms. In most of that time she was a single mother who wove her children into her public life. … Mr. McClellan went on to graduate from the University of Texas and to run three more successful campaigns for his mother: her election and re-election as a Texas railroad commissioner and her election as comptroller." The Times also reports, "As for the White House press secretary, he said that 'the president considers my mother a friend,' but that he himself had no immediate plans to work in his mother's campaign or, for that matter, to leave his job anytime soon."

Food Industry Makes Progress In Effort To Ban State Labeling Laws. The food industry has made progress in its efforts to urge Congress and the federal government to ban state food labeling laws. According to the Wall Street Journal (1/9, Zhang, 2.11M), state laws "are often tougher than federal Food and Drug Administration rules or cover substances not regulated by federal law. … A bill that would override many such laws sailed through the House Energy and Commerce Committee in December, and its sponsors include more than half the members of the House. A Senate version hasn't been introduced and it's unclear if the bill will move soon, but it already has set off a firestorm, pitting the food industry against consumer activists and state food-safety officials."

More Companies Phasing Out Pension Plans. ABC World News Tonight (1/8, story 6, :45, Woodruff) reported, "More and more American companies are phasing out pension plans for their employees. On Friday, IBM announced it will shift more than 1,000 workers from traditional pensions to 401(k) retirement plans." ABC (Stark) added, "IBM says beginning in 2008, it will freeze the traditional benefits for its thousands of US workers and shift its work force to a less-generous 401(k) plan, saving the company almost $3 billion a year. Last month, it was Verizon; before that, Motorola, Hewlett Packard and Sears. Traditional defined-benefit pension plans are a vanishing piece of the American dream."

Workers May Find Movement Away From Traditional Pensions Difficult. According to the New York Times (1/9, Walsh, 1.19M), "For many workers, the movement away from traditional pensions is going to be difficult. Already there are signs that people are retiring later, or taking other jobs to support themselves in old age. Participation in a pension plan is involuntary, but most 401(k) plans let employees decide whether to contribute any money - or none at all. Research shows that many people fail to put money into their retirement accounts, or invest it poorly once it is there."

DOJ_NMG_0008394

Charitable Donors Defy Predictions. Despite predictions from nonprofit groups that the billions of dollars Americans gave to relief funds last year in the wake of the South Asia tsunami, Hurricane Katrina and the Pakistan earthquake would result in "donor fatigue," the Washington Post (1/9, B1, Salmon, 744K) reports that 2005 "was very good to many nonprofit organizations in the Washington area and elsewhere." Anthony De Cristofaro, executive director of the Combined Federal Campaign of the National Capital Area, the annual fundraising drive among local federal employees, "said he expects the fund drive, which will conclude at the end of the month, to comfortably top last year's total of $56 million. The Jewish Federation of Greater Washington had an exceptional year, said chief executive Misha Galperin. Gifts to the federation's endowment fund doubled to $18.3 million, contributions to its annual fundraising drive climbed by $2 million to $24 million and the federation raised $1.6 million for tsunami and Katrina relief funds, he said." The Post adds,, "The news is also good nationally." According to the Chronicle of Philanthropy, "many of the nation's biggest charities are raising as much or more than they did in the late 1990s, when the strong economy and booming stock market boosted charitable donations a startling 50 percent from 1996 to 2000."

Sharon's Doctors Prepare To Ease Him Out Of Coma. USA Today (1/9, Gutman, 2.31M) reports, "Advisers said Sunday that Ariel Sharon was waging a fierce comeback from a life-threatening stroke. Doctors planned to start easing the Israeli leader out of a medically induced coma today. Shlomo Mor Yosef, director of Hadassah University Hospital, said Sunday that a CT scan of Sharon's brain showed improvement and that his vital signs were normal. He said Sharon, 77, remained in critical condition."

The Washington Post (1/9, A12, Wilson, 744K) reports, "Doctors plan to begin the delicate process of reviving Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon from a medically induced coma Monday and start assessing the scope of any brain damage he might have suffered during a massive stroke last week. Sharon, 77, underwent a scheduled brain scan Sunday so doctors could measure intracranial pressure and look for new bleeding. The results showed the condition of his brain had improved slightly, a determination consistent with two previous scans taken since the last emergency surgery to stop hemorrhaging. The director of Hadassah-Ein Kerem Hospital, where Sharon is being treated, said the most recent test showed that the level of swelling in Sharon's brain had declined overnight. His overall condition remains critical but stable."

The New York Times (1/9, Altman, 1.19M) reports, "As Israeli doctors try to bring Prime Minister Ariel Sharon gradually out of a medically induced coma today, they will be seeking clues to the severity of the damage from the potentially deadly hemorrhagic stroke he suffered last week. The doctors are expected to massage and pinch Mr. Sharon's skin, vigorously rub his chest and ask him to perform simple tasks like blinking as part of their examination to begin to determine the degree of paralysis and impairment of his intellectual skills. Doctors have said they assume there will be some impairment."

Sharon Seen As Unable To Ever Return To Office. NBC Nightly News (1/8, story 3, 2:00, Fletcher) added, "Taking Sharon out of his induced coma will give the nation a better idea whether" Sharon's "60-year career…is over. … Experts agree there is no chance he will return to his job as prime minister." The Washington Times/AP (1/9, Nessman) reports, "One of Mr. Sharon's doctors said that even if the prime minister survives, he would not be able to return to office. Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told the Cabinet he would work to carry on Mr. Sharon's political legacy."

The New York Times (1/9, Erlanger, Kraft, 1.19M) reports, "Israel continued its nervous watch over the sickbed of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Sunday, with television reporters educating the country about his condition using plastic models of brains and exploring hypotheses about whether he should have had different treatment before his devastating stroke on Wednesday. Israeli politicians, normally an obstreperous and aggressive bunch, maintained a self-imposed moratorium on political campaigning out of respect for the stricken prime minister - and out of a sense that the country would not reward those who returned to the normal slash-and-burn style too soon."

DOJ_NMG_0008395

The Christian Science Monitor (1/9, Prusher, Mitnick, 61K) reports, "But Sunday, as Prime Minister Ariel Sharon lay in a drug-induced coma, many here wondered whether Olmert, now acting prime minister, has the leadership qualities to assume Mr. Sharon's mantle, and takeover the newly fashioned centrist party, Kadima. A crucial election for Israel is scheduled for late March."

White House Preparing For Post-Sharon Era. ABC World News Tonight (1/8, story 4, 3:15, Woodruff) reported, "Few expect Sharon to go back to work after his stroke. So, tonight, Washington and Israel are preparing to go back to work without Sharon at its leader." ABC (Reynolds) added, "With Ariel Sharon incapacitated, there is no question that the United States has lost an influential partner in a strategically-important region. And George Bush has lost a friend." Yossi Klein Halevi, Shalem Center: "Bush not only likes Sharon personally, but admires him…as a military hero." Reynolds: "It will be hard, if not impossible, for whomever emerges from Israel's March elections as a successor to Sharon, to approximate that close, personal bond with Bush. Acting Prime Minister, Ehud Olmert, would try to continue Sharon's policies and may enjoy white house support. But he lacks a rapport" with Bush. That "spells more trouble for the road map to peace that the Bush Administration has championed, even though it has, so far, led nowhere."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/9, LaFranchi, 61K) reports, "In its five years, the Bush administration has been reluctant to press for bold steps from the parties, and it's unlikely to alter that pattern now, many experts say. Officially, neither the White House nor the State Department is offering much diplomatic direction for the post-Sharon era, suggesting that doing so would be distasteful as the prime minister fights for his life. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice postponed a trip to Australia in order to be in Washington at a crucial juncture in Middle East affairs, while diplomatic sources said the White House was quietly making contingency plans in the event of Sharon's passing."

Sharon's Accomplishments Recounted. The Washington Post's (1/9) Lally Weymouth writes, "In power, Sharon showed that the charm could often trump the steeliness -- or at least mask it long enough for him to forge both a consensus in Israel and a close relationship with the American government. One of the marks of great leadership is the capacity to undo what one has done if it can contribute to the greater good. Sharon had the courage to dismantle the very settlements he had built."

Arab-Israeli Peace Deal Seen As Unlikely In Bush's Second Term. Time (1/16, McGeary) reports, "The political instability confronting both Israelis and Palestinians jeopardizes Washington's hopes of salvaging some kind of Arab-Israeli peace deal by the end of President George W. Bush's second term. Having hitched their strategy to the success of Sharon's policy of separation from the Palestinians, Administration officials scrambled to put a positive spin on the somber events in Jerusalem. … A senior State Department official says the U.S. believes that 'progress is still possible' without Sharon. Whether that remains true will depend on how Israelis handle a crisis that so few saw coming."

Sharon Called "Bold And Cunning Defender" Of Israel. In its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (1/16, Derfner) examines the legacy of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, noting that "no one in modern times transformed this country as much as Ariel Sharon did. And no Israeli leader transformed himself as did the legendary fighter once he finally, after a half century of great deeds and misdeeds on the battlefield, became prime minister." Sharon "was a bold and cunning defender of his tiny nation in a hostile, dangerous part of the world."

Candidates To Succeed Sharon Quietly Preparing For Campaign. A story in Newsweek's (1/16) cover package says the entrants in Israel's upcoming elections are, as "quietly as possible, not wanting to seem disrespectful," preparing "for the run of their lives." Newsweek provides a short profile of the candidates. Newsweek reports, "Political partnerships don't get much tighter than the team of Ariel Sharon and Ehud Olmert, 60. The two men made a great match, even though their personalities were strikingly different. In contrast to the career warrior, the former Jerusalem mayor is a scholar, with diplomas in philosophy, psychology and law. But the pair worked together seamlessly." The Labor Party "has big dreams of regaining its long-lost ruling-party status, and Peretz, a social democrat, has pledged that if he wins the top job in the March elections, he'll produce a peace agreement within four years." Justice Minister Tzipi Livni "was among the first Likud members who jumped to Kadima. The 47-year-old attorney supports the idea of territorial handovers as the only way to forestall the day when Arabs outnumber Jews in Israel." Former Labor Leader Shimon Peres "is still in the game." Polls "are saying that Peres (despite longstanding public doubts about his toughness on terror) could outdo Olmert as Kadima's pilot in March." Netanyahu "could step into the leadership vacuum—if he can move toward the political center without looking like an abject opportunist."

DOJ_NMG_0008396

Olmert Seen As Sharon's Alter Ego. In a separate story in its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (1/16) says "the closest Ariel Sharon had to an alter ego is the man now taking his place as prime minister, Ehud Olmert. … The electoral question is whether the politicians and voters who had followed Sharon to Kadima will stand by Olmert. The initial indications are yes. All of the politicians who bolted Likud and Labor have declared their loyalty to him as the new party's new leader." US News adds, "Kadima held its lead in the first opinion poll following Sharon's major stroke. It also showed that the only Kadima member more popular than Olmert is Shimon Peres, 82, who left the Labor Party after losing the leadership to Amir Peretz in a November showdown. Peretz has since stumbled."

Observers Say Netanyahu Must Move To Center To Gain Wide Backing. In a separate story in its cover package, Newsweek (1/16, Peraino, Ephron, Bartholet) reports that observers "believe that [Benjamin] Netanyahu will have to move toward the center to garner wide backing, and that is dangerous for him. In some ways, Netanyahu is the anti-Sharon: a slick talker and American-style campaigner who enjoys political theater. He's telegenic, smart and articulate. But he also has a reputation as an opportunist." Newsweek adds, "Yet none of Sharon's potential successors in Kadima has much magnetism, either. Peres certainly has great stature, but he is seen by many as unreliable on security issues. Olmert has been a fixture in Israeli politics for years, and he is a longtime proponent of unilateral action to leave parts of the occupied territories. … But he benefited from being close to Sharon."

Gaza Said To Have Descended Into Near-Anarchy. The New York Times (1/9, Smith, 1.19M) reports, "In Gaza City on Saturday night, one man was killed during a gun battle between armed militants and the police, while elsewhere in town another armed group threatened to destroy the local offices of the satellite television station Al Arabiya, which is based in Dubai. The men were angry at the station for broadcasting a documentary that suggested that female Palestinian suicide bombers had been put under pressure by male relatives. Farther south that same day, gunmen cordoned off a neighborhood in Khan Yunis, Gaza's second largest city, while members of a well-known drug-smuggling family battled with the Palestinian police. Eleven policemen were reported wounded. And in Rafah, along the Egyptian border, armed men from the Abu Taha family stopped cars on Sunday, checking identification papers in hopes of catching members of Al Masri, the rival family with which they have been waging a deadly feud. While the world is watching Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's fight for life and wondering who will govern Israel in his absence, people in Gaza are far more preoccupied with growing lawlessness and tension between armed factions since Israel's withdrawal."

Iran Ready To Resume Nuclear Program. The Washington Times/AP (1/9, Karimi) reports, "Iran said yesterday that inspectors from the U.N. nuclear-watchdog agency would remove seals from some nuclear facilities by today, opening the way for Tehran to resume research on fuel production. The development heightened concerns in the West that Iran was moving toward building atomic weapons. … Inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) arrived in Tehran on Saturday to remove seals they had affixed to the research sites after Iran voluntarily agreed to stop all enrichment-related activities more than two years ago as a confidence-building measure."

Reuters (1/9, Hafezi) reports, "Iran said it was ready to remove U.N. seals at some atomic research and development sites on Monday, a move that would raise the stakes in Tehran's dispute with the West over its nuclear program. European Union and U.S. officials say that, if Iran goes ahead with the move, diplomatic efforts to settle the issue would be endangered and that could lead to Tehran being referred to the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions."

EU, IAEA Urge Iran To Rethink Nuclear Program's Resumption. The Financial Times (1/9, Smyth, Minder) reports, "The move brought predictable condemnation from the European Union, which has led international negotiations with Tehran over its nuclear programme. … Iranian and EU officials are due to meet on January 18 in Vienna. Iran has backed away from a comprehensive suspension of nuclear activities begun two years ago to calm international fears it wanted to develop atomic weapons. It is now approaching the most sensitive suspended part of the programme, the actual enrichment of uranium. The nature and extent of the resumed research and development remained unclear yesterday, with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN watchdog, seeking clarification after Iranian officials failed to appear for a meeting in Vienna last Thursday. Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the agency, urged Iran to co-operate with the UN agency in an interview with the UK's Sky News."

DOJ_NMG_0008397

Iran, Russia To Continue Enrichment Discussions Next Month. The AP (1/9) reports, "Russian officials, meanwhile, conferred with Iranian counterparts here about Moscow's proposal that both countries conduct uranium enrichment, a process that can produce nuclear fuel for reactors or weapons, on Russian territory. They agreed to continue those talks next month."

Jordan Passes Measure Preventing Surrender Of US Citizens To ICC. Reuters (1/9) reports, "Jordan's parliament on Sunday approved a law that prevents Amman handing over U.S. citizens accused of war crimes to the international criminal court, lawmakers said. … Jordan's pro-government 110-seat parliament voted by a large majority in favor of the law which was viewed by rights bodies and some deputies as a violation of Jordan's obligations under the court's founding Rome Statute and eroded its sovereignty. Lawmakers said the law requires Jordan to refuse to hand over to the ICC persons accused of war crimes if they are U.S. nationals and non-nationals working for the U.S. government. Instead, Jordan would be required to surrender them to the custody of the U.S. government, in apparent contravention to Jordan's obligations to the ICC."

King Abdullah To Participate In National Prayer Breakfast. The Washington Times (1/9, Duin, 90K) reports, "Jordan's King Abdullah II, whose interfaith efforts over the past year impressed Catholics, Jews and Muslims alike, will have a supporting role at this year's National Prayer Breakfast, according to a key aide. … Plans are to have the king offer a prayer or say a few words at the Feb. 2 breakfast, then give the keynote speech at a lunch for evangelical leaders that same day."

Georgian President Says Russia Exerts Energy Control Over Former Soviet States. Mikheil Saakashvili, President of the Republic of Georgia, writes in the Washington Post (1/9, A19, 744K), "Last week Russia announced that it would halt and then -- not long after -- that it was restarting natural gas shipments to Ukraine. It was a momentary crisis that should have wide-ranging ramifications for the economic security of Europe and raise questions about any notion of a role for Russia as a reliable energy supplier. Russia's arbitrary cutoff sent a clear message to the European Union: There can be no energy security when an undependable neighbor is willing and able to use its energy resources as a weapon in political influence. … Russia uses not only its energy supplies but also the vast energy transportation network that former Soviet states inherited -- and depend on -- to exercise energy control." Saakashvilli adds, "For Georgians, our path is clear: We are moving aggressively to diversify our energy sources and transportation networks. The recently completed Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan pipeline, which brings natural gas from Azerbaijan to Turkey and crosses Georgia is a critical piece of this effort. For Europe, the Black Sea states hold the key for new routes to bring in energy supplies from the Middle East and Central Asia. We are willing to work closely both with our European partners and with Russia to make the whole system transparent, predictable and immune to -- or insulated from -- political shocks."

Haitian Elections Postponed Again. The Christian Science Monitor (1/9, Harman, 61K) reports, "Sunday was supposed to be election day in Haiti. Only it never happened. Again. … Preparations for the first vote here since a rebellion ousted President Jean-Bertrand Aristide nearly two years ago have fallen short. 'The best you can say is that this process has been a political, technical, logistical, and financial fiasco,' says Mark Schneider, senior vice president of the International Crisis Group in Washington, D.C. Originally scheduled for Nov. 6, and subsequently postponed four times, Sunday's voting day came and went here without a vote being cast. Constitutionally, a new government must be in place by Feb. 7. That will not happen, but officials announced Sunday that Feb. 7 will be the new election date."

Haitian Business Leaders Call For General Strike. USA Today (1/9, Harman, 2.31M) reports, "Business leaders called for a general strike today, two days after the commander of the U.N. peacekeeping force in Haiti was found dead of an apparent suicide. The strike, orchestrated by Haiti's largest business association, was organized before the death of Lt. Gen. Urano Teixeira da Matta Bacellar on Saturday. It was called to protest growing lawlessness and to pressure the multinational United Nations force under Bacellar's command to get tough with gangs. … The Brazilian commander's death comes amid growing anarchy in the capital, particularly in the sprawling Cité Soleil slum."

DOJ_NMG_0008398

Turkey Says Half-Dozen More May Have Bird Flu. ABC World News Tonight (1/8, story 8, 2:30, Woodruff) reported that Turkish health officials "say they believe half a dozen more people may have been infected with the deadly bird flu" in the "first cases from the virus of birds jumping to humans outside of China and Southeast Asia."

The Washington Post (1/9, A16, Sipress, 744K) reports "the preliminary test results, which must still be confirmed by the World Health Organization, came days after a teenage brother and sister from a village in the far east of Turkey died from the H5N1 strain of bird flu in the first confirmed human cases of the disease outside Southeast Asia and China. Bird flu was also suspected in the death of a third sibling, but test results remain inconclusive. Turkish medical authorities reported Sunday that as many as 10 Turks have been infected. Some of these cases have appeared in family clusters, raising concern that the disease might have begun spreading more easily among people. But international health experts said they find it more likely that the human cases in Turkey were caused by contact with infected birds, when children were playing with slaughtered chickens or crawling into henhouses, for example."

The New York Times (1/9, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports, "A flurry of new reports of avian influenza in humans and animals emerged Sunday from various parts of Turkey, and international health officials said they had come to believe that the disease had been simmering in the eastern part of the country for months, even though it was reported there only in late December. A team of experts, including representatives of the World Health Organization, accompanied by the Turkish health minister, was scrambling to determine the full extent of the outbreaks. The group was heading by bus on Sunday to the worst-hit areas in and around the city of Van, where the airport was closed by severe weather."

Russia, Iran Take Steps To Diminish Exposure. The Financial Times (1/9, Boland, Jack) reports, "Iran closed a border crossing with Turkey on Sunday and senior Russian health officials advised holidaymakers against visiting the country as the bird flu virus spread to the outskirts of the capital Ankara. … Turkey has been culling poultry for days to try to contain the bird flu outbreak.'

Conservatives Continue To Lead In Run-Up To Canadian Elections. USA Today (1/9, 2.31M) reports, "After 12 years of Liberal Party rule in Canada, Conservatives are making a contest of national elections Jan. 23. Liberal Prime Minister Paul Martin squares off tonight in a nationally televised debate with Conservative Party leader Stephen Harper. Pollsters say Harper's underdog Conservatives have seized the momentum in the campaign. Canada last had a Conservative-led government under Brian Mulroney in 1993. … Although all the results are within the margins of error, five recent national polls show Conservatives leading by 2-5 percentage points. The latest poll, released Sunday by SES Research, shows Conservatives would get 34% of the vote and Liberals 32% if elections were held now. The far-left New Democratic Party (NDP), the separatist Bloc Quebecois and the Green Party split the remainder. A large number of Canadians — 17% — are undecided and could determine the outcome of the elections, according to the SES poll done for CPAC, a public affairs cable TV channel similar to C-SPAN."

Man Shot At Border Is Top News In Mexico. Under the headline "At Border, Fatal Shot Still Rings," the Los Angeles Times (1/9, Marosi, 958K) reports, "From his rickety apartment in the shanty-lined hills of Colonia Libertad, Giovanni Rubio said he witnessed a Border Patrol agent fatally shoot a man who had crossed onto US soil. 'We want him electrocuted, and we want to watch,' said Rubio, 22, referring to the agent whose actions sparked an international furor. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, visiting San Diego last week, offered his own take on the increasingly volatile situation on the border: 'Anybody who assaults an agent is asking for trouble.' The differing reactions to the shooting on one of the most violence-prone stretches along the 2,000-mile border with Mexico illustrate the deepening cultural gulf between two nations separated by an increasingly fortified frontier." The Times adds, "In Mexico, the Dec. 30 shooting of Guillermo Martinez Rodriguez, 18, topped media coverage all last week — 'Shot in the back,' blared one headline — and prompted President Vicente Fox's administration to make a formal request for an investigation. … Mexican media have portrayed Martinez as a hard-working father of two who had crossed into the US in search of work. But Border Patrol officials said Martinez was a smuggler who had been arrested 11 times on suspicion of guiding migrants across the border."

DOJ_NMG_0008399

In Caracas, Belafonte Calls Bush "Greatest Terrorist In The World." The AP (1/9, James) reports, "The American singer and activist Harry Belafonte called President Bush "the greatest terrorist in the world" on Sunday and said millions of Americans support the socialist revolution of Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez. Belafonte led a delegation of Americans including the actor Danny Glover and the Princeton University scholar Cornel West that met the Venezuelan president for more than six hours late Saturday."

Hun Sen Cracking Down On Cambodia's Remaining Opposition Groups. The New York Times (1/9, Mydans, 1.19M) reports that in Cambodia the "harshest political crackdown in years is under way" with "some analysts" describing it as "the final stage in Prime Minister Hun Sen's drive to consolidate unchallenged power. Over the past year, he has choked off the last effective political opposition while continuing to marginalize the monarchy, manipulate the courts and intimidate labor unions and other civic groups. … Now, with a series of arrests and lawsuits on defamation and related charges, Mr. Hun Sen is for the first time directly attacking the human rights groups that, by default, serve as a de facto democratic opposition."

Brazil Succeeds In Creating Cost-Effective Ethanol. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, A1, Luhnow, Samor, 2.11M) reports, "After nearly three decades of work, Brazil has succeeded where much of the industrialized world has failed: It has developed a cost-effective alternative to gasoline." Ethanol made from sugar cane is "an option that's available at 29,000 gas stations from Rio to the Amazon. A comparable tank of gasoline would have cost him $36. … At current prices, Brazil can make ethanol for about $1 a gallon, according to the World Bank. That compares with the international price of gasoline of about $1.50 a gallon. Even though ethanol gets less mileage than gasoline, in Brazil it's still cheaper per mile driven. As a result, ethanol now accounts for as much as 20% of Brazil's transport fuel market."

More Than Two Million Muslims In Mecca For Hajj. ABC World News Tonight (1/8, story 8, 2:30, Woodruff) reported that "more than two million Muslims" are making the ritual hajj in Mecca. The "pilgrimage has been marred by the deaths of 76 people, when a pilgrims' hostel collapsed."

John Paul II's Assailant To Be Freed This Week. NBC Nightly News (1/8, story 4, 1:00, Seigenthaler) reported that Mehmet Ali Agca, who tried to assassinate Pope John Paul II in 1981, "is expected to be freed from a Turkish prison sometime this week." The Pope "publicly forgave his attacker, who later was pardoned at the Pontiff's urging."

The New York Times (1/9, Arsu, 1.19M) reports Agca "served 19 years in Italy for shooting the pope and then was sent back to Turkey, in 2000, and has been in prison since then for killing Abdi Ipekci, a newspaper editor, in 1979."

The Washington Post (1/9, A12, Hacaoglu, 744K) reports, "His motive for shooting John Paul in the abdomen on May 13, 1981, remains unclear."

US, South Korea Urged To Enter Into Free Trade Agreement. In an op-ed for the Financial Times (1/9) William Rhodes, chairman of the US-Korea Business Council and senior vice-chairman of Citigroup, writes, "In recent months, there has been increasing discussion among business and government leaders in the US and South Korea about launching negotiations for a free trade agreement. This would bring major economic benefits to both the US and South Korea, the world's tenth largest economy, and strengthen one of America's most important Asian alliances. For many years, economic ties between South Korea and the US have been close – it is America's seventh largest trading partner. China recently surpassed the US as South Korea's largest export market, although the US continues to be the largest source of foreign investment into South Korea, mainly in financial services and manufacturing."

Multinational Trade Organizations Said To Have Lost Power. The Washington Post (1/9, A18, 744K) editorializes, "The latest round of tariff-cutting talks under the auspices of the WTO is stalling, not because countries oppose trade but because they do not want to make concessions in this multilateral forum. Ambitions to deepen the WTO's power to settle disputes beyond trade into labor and environmental issues have (fortunately) fizzled, while WTO rulings against protectionist European food regulation or American cotton subsidies don't (unfortunately) cause those policies to be reformed quickly. The same story holds for NAFTA. In the 1990s there was talk of building NAFTA tribunals on labor and the environment into influential voices. It hasn't happened."

DOJ_NMG_0008400

NYTimes Criticizes US Corporation's Support For Indonesian Military. The New York Times (1/9, 1.19M) editorializes, "Freeport-McMoRan, an American company that operates a giant open-pit copper and gold mine in Papua, is a major contributor to Indonesia's economy. The company is also one of Indonesia's most reckless polluters and a source of hard cash - cash the company concedes is protection money - for the Indonesian military, which has one of the worst human rights records anywhere. … Freeport's environmental record and its support for the Indonesian military have caused rumbles in Washington, particularly among human rights advocates like Patrick Leahy." The Times concludes, "Setting aside for the moment Freeport's environmental horror show, the company is not doing Indonesia's civilian authorities any favors by underwriting the generals. Freeport describes its payments as an essential cost of doing business. But it appears not to have measured the costs to democracy."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Linked Charities Bank On The Chavez Name."
"Mission Missing Its Mark."
"Hopes Founder On 'Big Lie'."
"Polar Bears Face New Toxic Threat: Flame Retardants."
"GOP Puts Lobbying Scandal In Bull's-Eye."
"At Border, Fatal Shot Still Rings."
"U.S. Crash In Iraq Kills 12."

USA Today:

"Goodbyes Begin For W.Va. Miners."
"Fatal Crashes."
"'Next frontier' In Heart Disease: Undoing It."
"17 Killed In Crash, Attacks In Iraq."

New York Times:

"Diabetes and Its Awful Toll Quietly Emerge As A Crisis."
"More Companies Ending Promises For Retirement."
"Lobbyist's Firm Escapes Fallout From A Scandal."
"Issues And (Possible) Answers: A Primer On The Alito Hearings."
"A Commitment To Marriage, And To New Orleans."

Washington Post:

"12 Killed In N. Iraq Helicopter Crash."
"Colleges Learn To Be Good Neighbors."
"Cat Owner Turns To DNA In Pet Whodunit, But Case Isn't Closed."
"Hearings Today."
"Proving His Mettle In Reagan Justice Dept.."
"GOP Plots Ascent On Ehrlich's Heels."

Washington Times:

"Boehner Takes On Blunt."
"Iraqis Recieve Training In Iran."
"Schumer Warns Of Filibuster Of Alito."
"Military Academics See Less Harassmanent."
"Adams Morgan Crime Down With More Police."
"Jordan's King To Speak At US Prayer Breakfast."
"Italian Court To Decide If Teaching Jesus Breaks Law."

Detroit Free Press:

"Car Wars '06 Begin."
"New Models Position Lincoln To Chase Cadillac."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"12 Troops Die In Iraq Copter Crash."
"Bill Would Channel Schools' Spending."
"Democrats Threaten Filibuster Alito."
"Shock Jock Boosts Stock Of Burgeoning Satellite Studio."

Dallas Morning News:

"Young's Next Stop Is NFL."
"Alito Memos Likely Targets."
"Letter Confirms Site Of Bluesman's Recordings."
"Copter Crash Caps Bad Week In Iraq."
"Minorities Don't Feel Top-Ticket Excitement."
"DeLay Ends Leadership Fight."

Houston Chronicle:

"Attempt To Bring Sharon Out Of Coma Begins."
"Poll: Most Texans Back Stem Cell Research."
"Bit Of New Orleans For Isle Mardi Gras."
"Patience Only Remedy For Drug Plan Confusion."
"Peer Pressure Shifting Driver's Ed Gears."
"U.S. Helicopter Crash Kills 12 In Iraq."
"Race For GOP Whip Is On."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Iraq Helicopter Crash; WV Miner Funerals; WV Mine Survivor; Sharon Condition; Alito Confirmation; Alito Rally; CO Wildfires; Pension Plans; Healing Prayer Study; Muslim Pilgrimage; Avian Flu-Turkey; Prince William-Military.
CBS: Preempted By NFL Playoffs.

DOJ_NMG_0008401

NBC: WV Mine Accident; Iraqi Violence; Sharon Condition; Pope Assassin; Alito Confirmation; Abortion Stances; Detroit Auto Show; New Orleans Colleges Reopen.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: WV-coal miners' funerals; Israel-Sharon's condition; Alito hearings; Schwarzenegger-motorcycle accident.

CBS: Israel-Sharon's condition; WV-coal miners' funerals; Schwarzenegger-motorcycle accident; Alito hearings; Young-NFL draft.

NPR: Alito hearings; Israel-Sharon's condition; WV-coal miners' funerals; Gas prices; Iran-nuke program; Atlanta-Asians protest meth sting; NFL Playoffs.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH – 7:15 a.m. Breakfast with Supreme Court Nominee Samuel A. Alito.

10:25 a.m. Remarks on No Child Left Behind, North Glen Elementary School, Glen Burnie, Md.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY – No public schedule.

US Senate: JUDICIARY _ 12 p.m. Full Committee. Begins confirmation hearing for Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel Alito. Opening statements by senators, formal introduction of Alito, Alito's opening statement. Location: Room 216, Hart.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other. DISPARITIES-HEALTH _ Health and Human Services' Office of Minority Health convenes a three day national leadership summit on eliminating racial, ethnic and physically challenged disparities in health. With Michael Leavitt, Secretary of Health and Human Services, Jennifer Howse, president, March of Dimes; Sandra Gadsen, president, National Medical Association; and others. 8:30 a.m. - 9:30 a.m. Keynote address by HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt on improving the quality of healthcare for all Americans. 9:30 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. Highlights from Carolyn Clancy, MD, Director, Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, on the National Healthcare Disparities Report. 10:45 a.m. - 12 p.m. Keynote and closing remarks, Dr. Christina Beato, acting assistant Secretary for Health. Location: Grand Hyatt Hotel, 1000 H St. NW. Contacts: Linda Allen, 703-231-3363

ABORTION-ALITO _ 9 a.m. The Traditional Values Coalition holds a news conference where women hurt by abortion speak out on the need for Supreme Court justices who will reverse Roe V. Wade. With Andrea Lafferty, TVC; Anne Newman, Operation Outcry; Karen Bodle, Harrisburg, PA; Luana Stoltenberg, Davenport, IA; and others. Location: In front of the Supreme Court. Contacts: Amy Skeen, 202-547-8570

NEW ORLEANS-KATRINA _ 12 p.m. - 1 p.m. National Press Club newsmaker on "New Orleans and the Nation After Katrina: A Changing Story." With Jason Berry, music columnist, New Orleans Magazine, and Lolis Eric Elie, New Orleans Times-Picayune. Location: National Press Club, 14th and F Sts. NW. Contacts: Ron Baygents, 202-250-1635

JAPAN-POLITICS _ 3 p.m. - 4:30 p.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies hosts remarks on Japanese politics and bureaucracy by Kazuo Aichi, newly returned to office after a 20 year absence, member of the Japanese House of Representatives. Location: B-1 conference room, CSIS, 1800 K St. NW. Contacts: Andrew Schwartz, 202-775-3242

IRAQ-KIMMITT _ 6 p.m. - 7:30 p.m. Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt will discuss the Treasury's view of the Iraqi economy and economic aspects of reconstruction. Part of the Council on Foreign Relations series, "Iraq: The Way Forward." Location: CFR, 1779 Massachusetts Ave., NW. Contacts: n/a, 202-518-3428. Notes: RSVP required. Council members and accredited journalists only. Reception at 6 pm, meeting begins 6:30 pm.

VIETNAM-AWARDS _ 6 p.m. - 8 p.m. 6 p.m. - 8 p.m. Vietnam Dream for Success holds an award ceremony to recognize contributions to educational opportunities for disadvantaged children and women in Vietnam. First Lavang Awards will be presented to Jan Scruggs, Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund founder, for his work for landmine removal and educational support in Vietnam; and Father Vincent Rigdon, director of the Office of the Missions, Archdiocese of Washington. Location: French Embassy, 4101 Reservoir Rd, NW. Contacts: Lisa Gough (VVMF), 202-393-0090 ext 109

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0008403

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, JANUARY 9, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Specter Has Asked Gonzales Testify On Warrantless Eavesdropping ... 2
Risen Book Filled With Stories From Disgruntled Intelligence Officials ... 3

Homeland Response:
Goss Redoubling Efforts To Stop CIA Leaks ... 3

War News:
Bremer Says Bush, Rumsfeld Ignored His Request For More Troops ... 3
At Least 14 Killed In Suicide Attack At Iraqi Interior Ministry ... 4
Blackhawk Crash, Insurgent Action Result In 17 US Troop Deaths In Iraq ... 4
Shiite Iraqis Receiving Militia Training In Iran ... 4
Study Estimates Iraq War Costs Could Exceed $2 Trillion ... 4
Iraqi Government Said To Be Vulnerable To Military Coup ... 5
US Ambassador Outlines Challenges For Iraq ... 5
Debaathification Committee Divides Iraqis ... 5
Zarqawi Claims Bin Laden Ordered Rocket Attack Against Israel 5
Retired US Army Officers Endorse Planned Withdrawal Of Forces From Afghanistan ... 5

Corporate Scandals:
Compliance Panels Add Teeth To Industry's Self-Policing Efforts 6
NYTimes Says SEC Must Remain Serious About Punishing Top Corporate Officers ... 6

Criminal Law:
Abramoff Case Could Expose Largest Influence-Peddling Scheme In Decades ... 6
Dean Says No Democrats Took Donations From Abramoff ... 9
DOJ Said To Have Intensified Anti-Corruption Probes ... 9
Lawmakers Nervous Over Reports Cunningham Wore FBI Wire . 9
Probe Finds Houston DNA Lab Near "Total Breakdown." ... 9
NYTimes Editor Killed In DC Street Robbery ... 9
FBI Withdraws From Utah Internet Sex Predator Task Force ... 10
Virginia Woman Uses DNA To Find Out Who Killed Her Cat ... 10

Civil Law:
11th Circuit Reinstates $54.6 Million Award To Salvadoran Torture Victims ... 10

Civil Rights:
San Francisco Police Officer's Video Stirs Ire ... 11
Crackdown On Worldwide Prostitution Rackets Urged ... 11
Cato Official Says Florida Voucher Decision Has National Implications ... 11

Antitrust:
Boston Scientific Makes Formal $25 Billion Guidant Bid ... 12
Constellation-FPL Merger Caps Shattuck's Rise To Top ... 12
Banks May Widen Real Estate Role ... 13

Environment/Indian Affairs:
First Funerals Held For West Virginia Miners ... 13
Three Tribal Colleges Join Federal Library Program ... 14

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Marijuana Advocates Push Legalization Initiatives In Colorado, Nevada ... 14
Convicted Medical Marijuana Activist Ordered To Leave Canada15
Georgia Protestors Call For End To "Operation Meth Merchant" Prosecution ... 15
Mexican Drug Cartel Said To Be Weaker But Still In Control Of Trafficking ... 15
Trial To Begin In March For Doctor Accused Of Giving NFL Players Steroids ... 15

Immigration:
Kondracke Says Bush Should Have "Frank Chat" With Radio Hosts About Immigration ... 16

Tax:
Mallaby Argues For Rolling Back Bush Tax Cuts ... 16

Congress-Administration:
Alito Confirmation Hearings Begin Today ... 16
Florida Federal Judges Reject Request To End Secret Case Transfers ... 21
Bush Made 17 More Recess Appointments Last Week ... 21
Bush Seeks To Revive Compassionate Conservative Reputation22
DeLay Abandons Effort To Return As Majority Leader ... 22
In Wake Of Scandals, GOP Leaders Ponder Lobbying Reforms 24
VA Regional Offices Found To Be Giving Incorrect Information . 25
Some Pentagon Analysts Said To Be Skeptical About TRICARE Savings ... 25

Novak Says Rove Appears To Have Blundered With New Medicare Drug Benefit ... 25
Private Sector Council To Focus On Fixing Federal Procurement System ... 25
Cost Of Postage Stamp Increases By Two Cents ... 26

Other News:

Wage Gains Remain Below Pre-2001 Recession Levels ... 26
Schwarzenegger Aims To Rebuild State, Image With Large Public Works Plan ... 27
Maryland GOP Hoping To Build On Ehrlich's Election Success . 27
Warner Critical Of DC "Partisanship." ... 28
In Split With Bush, McClellan Backs His Mother For Texas Governor ... 28
Food Industry Makes Progress In Effort To Ban State Labeling Laws ... 28
More Companies Phasing Out Pension Plans ... 28
Charitable Donors Defy Predictions ... 29
Sharon's Doctors Prepare To Ease Him Out Of Coma ... 29
Gaza Said To Have Descended Into Near-Anarchy ... 31
Iran Ready To Resume Nuclear Program ... 31
Jordan Passes Measure Preventing Surrender Of US Citizens To ICC ... 31
Georgian President Says Russia Exerts Energy Control Over Former Soviet States ... 31
Haitian Elections Postponed Again ... 32
Turkey Says Half-Dozen More May Have Bird Flu ... 32
Conservatives Continue To Lead In Run-Up To Canadian Elections ... 32
Man Shot At Border Is Top News In Mexico ... 33
In Caracas, Belafonte Calls Bush "Greatest Terrorist In The World." ... 33
Hun Sen Cracking Down On Cambodia's Remaining Opposition Groups ... 33
Brazil Succeeds In Creating Cost-Effective Ethanol ... 33
More Than Two Million Muslims In Mecca For Hajj ... 33
John Paul II's Assailant To Be Freed This Week ... 33
US, South Korea Urged To Enter Into Free Trade Agreement ... 33
Multinational Trade Organizations Said To Have Lost Power ... 34
NYTimes Criticizes US Corporation's Support For Indonesian Military ... 34

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 34

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 35

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter Has Asked Gonzales Testify On Warrantless Eavesdropping. USA Today/AP (1/9) reports Sen. Arlen Specter, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, "said he has asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to testify publicly on the legality of eavesdropping without warrants on phone conversations between terrorism suspects overseas and in the USA. A prominent conservative on the committee said he is troubled by the legal arguments the Bush administration has given for establishing the National Security Agency (NSA) program. President Bush has pointed to the congressional resolution that authorized him to use force against Iraq as allowing him to order the domestic spying." Sen. Sam Brownback said Sunday, "There was no discussion in anything that I was around that gave the president a broad surveillance authority with that resolution."

DNC Files FOIA Request On Domestic Spying. The Washington Times (1/9, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column, "A Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request by the Democratic National Committee (DNC) -- demanding the White House release Justice Department memos outlining whatever authority there is for President Bush, during the war on terrorism, to spy on certain people in the United States without court oversight -- has been hand-delivered to Justice Department headquarters by DNC General Counsel Joe Sandler. Actually, it took three DNC officials to load up, haul and deliver the FOIAs, as there were 160,000 separate requests -- each printed and boxed up -- signed by party supporters in the past two weeks. The Justice Department has 20 days to respond, although the DNC says it could be sooner depending on the outcome of a secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court hearing this week on the legal authority for the domestic-wiretapping program.'

Brownback Says 9/11 Resolution Did Not Give Bush "Broad Surveillance Authority." Asked on ABC's This Week (1/8, Stephanopoulos) if he was "confident that the administration has issued lawfully" in allowing the NSA to conduct domestic surveillance, Sen. Sam Brownback said, ": I think we need to hold hearings on it and we're going to. … I am troubled by what the basis for the grounds that the administration says that they did these on, the legal basis, and I think we need to look at that far more broadly and understand it a great deal. I think this is something that bears looking into and us to be able to establish a policy within constitutional frameworks of what a president can or cannot do." Asked if he thought "the 9/11 resolution gave the president the authority for this program," Brownback answered, "It didn't, in my vote. I voted for that resolution. … There was no discussion in anything that I was around that that gave the president a broad surveillance authority with that resolution."

DOJ_NMG_0008405

Risen Commends Those Who Leaked NSA Story. New York Times reporter James Risen, appearing on NBC's Meet the Press (1/8. Russert), was asked how he came to learn of the existence of the NSA's secret domestic surveillance program, Risen responded, "People in the government who had been told about it or were involved in it came to me because they were deeply troubled. They felt that there was something going wrong in the government; they believed that there was illegal activity. And my colleague, Eric Lichtblau of the New York Times, also began to hear the same thing from other people. And we happened to sit next to each other in the Washington bureau of the New York Times, and we began to compare notes, and we realized we were hearing about the same thing. … I think that these people who came forward did so in the best tradition of whistleblowing, and they did so for the best reasons, and that is because they believed that there was illegal activity going on. Whether it was illegal or not is something that will now have to be determined."

Risen Book Filled With Stories From Disgruntled Intelligence Officials. The Financial Times (1/9, Alden) reviews James Risen's "State of War," reporting, "President George W. Bush has his own establishment problem, as reporter James Risen's new book State of War makes clear. Like [Bob] Woodward before him, Risen has been on the receiving end of leaks from career national security officials who are deeply unhappy with the current administration. Mr Bush declared war on the bureaucracy after September 11 2001 and it is fighting back. Risen and his New York Times colleague Eric Lichtblau revealed last month that Mr Bush secretly authorised the National Security Agency to intercept telephone and e-mail communications on US soil, an explosive story that has sparked a national debate over presidential powers. The anonymous sources, who are now the target of a Bush administration leak investigation, were nearly a dozen current and former government officials." Bush "has paid a high price for alienating those institutions." The "biggest reckoning may come at the hands of the CIA, which has been decimated by defections during the Bush years. … The professionals have fought back, revealing more and more of how the intelligence was manipulated." The Times says the book's chapters are filled with stories "from disgruntled spooks who believe the war on terrorism has been badly mishandled from the outset. Such criticisms will not surprise the agency's many neo-conservative detractors, who see it as too hidebound by timidity and bureaucratic inertia to operate in a war in which the old rulebooks no longer apply."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Goss Redoubling Efforts To Stop CIA Leaks. Time (1/16, Waller, Burger, Bennett) reports in its "Notebook" column, "Angered by recent leaks of information about sensitive intelligence operations, CIA Director Porter Goss is redoubling efforts to get his spooks to keep their mouths shut. At staff meetings last week, CIA managers at the agency's Langley, Va., headquarters told employees that the leaking had got out of control and needed to stop." Time adds, "The Bush Administration seems apoplectic over the revelations in November about the CIA's secret network of terrorist-interrogation prisons and the disclosure in the New York Times last month that the President authorized the National Security Agency (NSA) to eavesdrop on the phone calls of some Americans without a warrant. The latter report was also in State of War, a book by Times reporter James Risen." Goss "is concerned about the potential effects of books written by those with inside knowledge of agency operations. … Goss has banned current CIA officers from publishing books and ordered stricter reviews of retirees' books." Time adds that "there are efforts within the government to identify leakers. The Justice Department is investigating who gave away the NSA secrets. While such probes rarely succeed, the department's new willingness to subpoena reporters and their records could change that."

Newsweek (1/16) adds in its "Periscope" column that the intelligence community "is also furious over disclosures in New York Times reporter James Risen's 'State of War' about a Clinton-era CIA plot, Operation Merlin. Risen writes that a former Russian nuclear scientist on the agency payroll was to take Russian nuke blueprints (acquired by the CIA) and leak them to Iran. The catch: they contained faulty info that the CIA hoped Iran would incorporate in a bomb design. But the initiative went awry when the scientist noticed the flaws and told the Iranians to look closely at the blueprints." Current and former US intel officials "complain that while the scheme Risen cites may have ended years ago, similar tactics could be used today. They say the book…puts bad guys on guard."

WAR NEWS:

Bremer Says Bush, Rumsfeld Ignored His Request For More Troops. The Los Angeles Times/Reuters (1/9) reports, "L. Paul Bremer III, who led the U.S. civilian occupation authority in Iraq after the 2003 invasion, said he had urged President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to increase postwar troop strength in the country, but his pleas were ignored." In an interview on NBC Television broadcast Sunday night, "Bremer said he sent a memo to Rumsfeld suggesting that half a million soldiers would be needed, three times the number deployed by the Bush administration. 'I never had any reaction from him,' the former diplomat told NBC's Brian Williams on "Dateline." Reuters adds, "Although he never heard back from his direct boss, Bremer said he discussed his concerns with Bush, who told him he would seek troops from other countries, but did not mention increasing US forces."

DOJ_NMG_0008406

Bremer Book Hits Stores Today. The Washington Post (1/9, A17, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "Today's the day that L. Paul 'Jerry' Bremer 's book, 'My Year in Iraq: The Struggle to Build a Future of Hope,' goes on sale. Early buzz was that the former Iraq reconstruction chief and Medal of Freedom winner is going to say that Washington ordered him to disband the Iraqi military -- widely seen as perhaps the most colossal strategic blunder of the Iraq war. There's also said to be some score-settling with a senior Pentagon official whose last name rhymes with 'held.'"

At Least 14 Killed In Suicide Attack At Iraqi Interior Ministry. Reuters (1/9) reports, "At least 14 people were killed and 20 wounded in an apparent suicide attack on the Iraqi Interior Ministry in Baghdad on Monday, police said. Police told Reuters two suicide bombers appeared to have blown themselves up outside the building. It was not immediately clear how many of the dead and wounded included civilians."

Blackhawk Crash, Insurgent Action Result In 17 US Troop Deaths In Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (1/8, lead story, 3:15, Woodruff) began its broadcast with "the deadliest helicopter crash in Iraq since last January," which it called "the worst incident in a bloody weekend for Americans. Seventeen were killed. Most of them died when a Blackhawk helicopter went down near Tal Afar, killing 12 people including two civilians on the ground. Five Marines died in separate attacks." ABC (Nauert) added, "A senior military official here in Baghdad tells ABC News tonight that hostile fire does not appear to be the cause of the crash. But at this point, they cannot rule anything out."

NBC Nightly News (1/8, story 2, 1:30, Seigenthaler) reported that the Blackhawk "went down eight miles west of town killing for your and eight passengers onboard. The cause of the crash is unknown, but rain and low visibility was reported at the time." Meanwhile, "there were separate incidents in and near the city of Fallujah. Three died from gunshot wounds and two others by homemade bombs. Since the beginning of the year 30 servicemen had have been killed in Iraq. … A recent rise in insurgent activity coincides with a rotation of forces in Iraq."

Many newspapers run brief, similar reports on the crash, among them USA Today (1/9, Diamond, 2.31M), Washington Post (1/9, A1, Hernandez, Sebti, 744K), Los Angeles Times (1/9, Kraul, Daragahi, 958K), New York Times (1/9, Oppel Jr., 1.19M), Washington Times/AP (1/9, Quinn). Knight Ridder (1/9, Hannah), Reuters (1/9, Long) and Bloomberg (1/9, Critchlow) also report the story.

Shiite Iraqis Receiving Militia Training In Iran. The Washington Times (1/9, Behn, 90K) reports, "Shi'ite clerics are recruiting young Iraqis to go to neighboring Iran for political indoctrination and militia training, said the uncle of one young man who recently returned from a one-month session. Upon the return of the young man -- whose name has been withheld from this article to protect his family -- he was recruited into the armed wing of the pro-Iranian Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) political party, the uncle said." The claim "is consistent with remarks by U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, who has repeatedly warned about Iranian meddling in Iraq's affairs." The National Council of Resistance of Iran (NCRI), "an exiled opposition group -- also charges that Tehran has been training Iraqi and other nationals in intelligence gathering and terrorist operations at garrisons across Iran."

Study Estimates Iraq War Costs Could Exceed $2 Trillion. A study by Columbia University economist Joseph E. Stiglitz and Harvard lecturer Linda Bilmes to be released today in Boston at a conference of economists and social scientists estimates the cost of the war in Iraq is far higher than the Administration has projected. The Boston Globe (1/9, Bender, 484K) reports, "The cost of the Iraq war could top $2 trillion after factoring in long-term healthcare for wounded US veterans, rebuilding a worn-down military, and accounting for other unforeseen bills and economic losses, according to a new analysis." That "far exceeds projections made by the Bush administration." It "is more than four times what the war was expected to cost through 2006 -- around $500 billion, according to congressional budget data."

The Washington Times/UPI (1/9) quotes Stiglitz saying, "Shortly before the war, when administration economist Larry Lindsey suggested that the costs might range between $100 and $200 billion, administration spokesmen quickly distanced themselves from those numbers. … But in retrospect, it appears that Lindsey's numbers represented a gross underestimate of the actual costs."

Time (1/16, Donnelly) reports in its "Notebook" column, "U.S. Military Officers often complain privately that the American people don't fully appreciate the costs -- human or economic -- of the Iraq war. A new paper by Harvard budget expert Linda Bilmes and Nobel-prizewinning Columbia economist Joseph Stiglitz may help address that. It claims that the final cost to the U.S. could be $2 trillion -- 10 times as high as the worst-case scenario of $200 billion suggested by a White House official before the war. The discrepancy is in part because of Bilmes and Stiglitz's holistic accounting methods. Their tally goes far beyond the traditional budget lines of the Pentagon, which says $173 billion was spent through September 2005. For instance, the paper includes estimates for the lifetime cost of disability payments and health care for some 16,000 injured soldiers, increased recruitment budgets, and -- since the government has not reined in spending or raised taxed -- debt financing for war expenditures. The paper also counts macroeconomic effects like the rising price of oil."

DOJ_NMG_0008407

Iraqi Government Said To Be Vulnerable To Military Coup. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (1/9, 958K) Aaron Belkin, associate professor of political science at UC Santa Barbara, writes, "But the mere fact of an election cannot change a fundamental truth about Iraq: Saddam Hussein governed as a brutal dictator not simply because he was cruel but also because of the treacherous political landscape that destabilized his relationship with his own military . Hussein was highly vulnerable to a military coup, and future Iraqi leaders will be just as susceptible. Regardless of the election's outcome, a coup will probably follow a U.S. pullout, and Iraq will again be ruled by a dictator."

US Ambassador Outlines Challenges For Iraq. Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador to Iraq, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/9, 2.11M) that "for Iraq to succeed there must be cross-ethnic and cross-sectarian cooperation that will lead to a national compact on three key issues dividing Iraq's communities and factions. First, as leaders from all communities have agreed, there has to be a government of national unity, which includes all major players -- including Sunni Arabs. … Second, the constitution will likely need to be amended in the coming year to broaden support. Iraqi leaders have begun discussing technical adjustments to make the political system resulting from the constitution more workable; compromises on some substantive issues such as federalization in Arab regions of Iraq; and a bill of assurances emphasizing national unity and individual rights. In addition, the outside world is waiting to see how welcoming Iraq will be to much-needed investment that can bring jobs and technology to Iraq. Third, Iraq's leaders will need to work together to reform security institutions and eliminate a number of militias and other armed groups."

Debaathification Committee Divides Iraqis. The Washington Post (1/9, A14, Spinner, 744K) reports from Baghdad on "sculptures" that had been "erected as symbols of prosperity and power under Saddam Hussein," all of which have been removed. Says the Post, "In a decision in October that has polarized residents of the capital, the officially sanctioned Debaathification Committee ordered the removal of memorials and monuments it deemed offensive. The move has brought a sensitive issue into sharp focus: How much of the era of Hussein, now on trial for crimes against humanity, should be preserved for posterity? The committee, which also vets former members of the Hussein government for inclusion in the current government, drew up the edict on the monuments, labeled Document 900, in secret. It has never been made public."

Zarqawi Claims Bin Laden Ordered Rocket Attack Against Israel. AFP (1/9) reports Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, "said in an audio tape put onto the Internet that rockets had been fired at Israel from Lebanon last month 'on the instructions' of the network's overall chief Osama bin Laden. … The tape was placed on the site normally used by his group, the Organization of Al-Qaeda in Mesopotamia, which had claimed responsibility for the rockets in an on-line statement on December 29." AFP notes, "Israel the previous day had carried out an air strike against a base of a Syrian-backed Palestinian group on the southern outskirts of Beirut in retaliation for cross-border Katyusha rocket attacks on northern Israel."

Retired US Army Officers Endorse Planned Withdrawal Of Forces From Afghanistan. Retired Army Lt. Col. Gordon Cucullu and Retired Maj. Gen. Paul E.Vallely write in the Washington Times (1/9, 90K), "In what may be a late Christmas present to some members of the famed 10th Mountain Division headquartered in Camp Drum, N.Y., Pentagon officials announced that the 4th Brigade that had been scheduled to deploy en masse to Afghanistan would now only send a smaller element. At the moment a battalion task force from the 4th Brigade is scheduled to deploy, a considerably smaller number than originally scheduled. Why the cutback? Simple, as Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld has said from the outset, 'we'll stay as long as we're needed, not a day more.' At this point NATO has 'stood up to the mission' in the words of a senior Defense official, and is taking responsibility for the southern area of Afghanistan." They conclude, "Combat commanders consistently recommend a logical, effective strategy that injects common sense and military professionalism into a situation dominated by political gamesmanship, hysteria, disinformation and irrational hatred of the president, the military and the country. To be victorious, America can't yank the rug out, as we did to our Vietnamese allies, but must implement a deliberate, calculated force adjustment of the kind that marked our successful disengagement from other historic battlefields. This is the recipe for victory, and the approach now ongoing in Afghanistan demonstrates and reinforces its validity."

DOJ_NMG_0008408

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Compliance Panels Add Teeth To Industry's Self-Policing Efforts. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Lublin) reports, "Scott Gilbert, the top compliance cop at Marsh & McLennan Cos., wanted to speed up training about new ethics rules for staffers at one Marsh unit. So he asked the unit's leaders to describe their plans to the board of directors' new compliance committee last September." The Journal continues, "Board-level presentations 'focus the attention of management,' says Mr. Gilbert, whom the New York financial giant hired as its first chief compliance officer in January 2005. A compliance committee 'is a very useful thing,' he adds." The Journal adds, "Others agree. A small but growing number of major corporations are creating board-level compliance panels to oversee how well their companies are obeying legal, regulatory and ethical requirements. Twenty-two Standard & Poor's 500 companies, mainly in the fields of health care and financial services, have board committees primarily focused on compliance and legal issues, up from 15 in 2003, according to an analysis by recruiters Spencer Stuart. … Compliance committees typically seek to ensure that employees don't run afoul of mandates such as antibribery laws, worker-safety rules and whistle-blower protections adopted after business scandals. They enhance the clout of managers who enforce compliance, keep tabs on compliance programs and lighten the load of audit committees."

NYTimes Says SEC Must Remain Serious About Punishing Top Corporate Officers. An editorial in the New York Times (1/9, 1.19M) says, "The Securities and Exchange Commission, under its chairman, Christopher Cox, took an important step in the fight against corporate malfeasance last week. By issuing guidelines on when and why it would impose fines, the commission added transparency to an oft-criticized process. … The new guidelines say the decision to levy a fine will hinge on whether the corporation and its shareholders were unjustly enriched." The Times adds, "The new guidelines were unanimous, which is good. We're glad that Mr. Cox has the entire commission moving in one direction. … But the new guidelines will work only if the commissioners remain serious about pursuing punishment against top officers."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Case Could Expose Largest Influence-Peddling Scheme In Decades. U.S. News and World Report (1/16, Pound) that the "big question" in Washington is "not what happens to [Jack] Abramoff but whom he'll bring down with him. The list of those with potential problems is long indeed and starts with" former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. After DeLay, "there's a handful of lesser congressional fry, perhaps a senator, and enough current and former congressional aides to field a baseball team." US News adds, "People with knowledge of the federal investigation of Abramoff say prosecutors are focusing on Rep. Bob Ney. … A decision on a Ney indictment could come within weeks, sources say. Ney denies any wrongdoing." US News adds, "Some old Washington hands believe that when the case finally fades from the headlines, it will go down as the biggest influence-peddling scheme to hit the nation's capital in decades."

In its cover package, Time (1/16, Tumulty) adds that the Abramoff investigation "could become one of the biggest corruption probes in U.S. history, possibly putting dozens of lawmakers in legal or political jeopardy." Time continues, "In an internal e-mail obtained by TIME, the director of the FBI's Washington field office, Michael Mason, congratulated some 15 agents and 15 support staff members under him on the case for 'a huge accomplishment' in squeezing Abramoff to make a deal after 18 months of investigation and negotiation, one that made 'a huge contribution to ensuring the very integrity of our government.' But he added that 'the case is far from over.' Another official involved with the probe told TIME that investigators are viewing Abramoff as 'the middle guy,' suggesting there are bigger targets in their sights."

Administration Moves To Account For Every Abramoff Visit To White House. In a separate article in its cover package, Time (1/16, Cooper, Allen) reports, "Bracing for the worst, Administration officials obtained from the Secret Service a list of all the times Abramoff entered the White House complex, and they scrambled to determine the reason for each visit. Bush aides are also trying to identify all the photos that may exist of the two men together. Abramoff attended Hanukkah and holiday events at the White House, according to an aide who has seen the list. Press secretary Scott McClellan said Abramoff might have attended large gatherings with Bush but added, 'The President does not know him, nor does the President recall ever meeting him.'" Time adds, "In the end, Bush may be saved by the textured relationship he has long had with well-heeled donors, who raised $300 million for his 2004 campaign, the most expensive one in the nation's history. When the President is traveling, he does not like to have contributors or local officials in his cars, planes or holding rooms unless they are there for a good reason, and he sometimes questions his underlings sharply if someone he considers extraneous is admitted. To make sure that doesn't happen, chief of staff Andrew Card has set up an elaborate vetting system that keeps people from sidling up to the President to suggest or hand anything to him."

DOJ_NMG_0008409

Tension Said To Be "Palpable" As Abramoff Probe Sends "Shudders" Through Washington. Time (1/16, Tumulty) reports in its cover package, "A high-level source tells TIME that prosecutors will…focus much of their energies on the lesser and easier-to-prove charge of 'honest services mail fraud,' for which they have to show only that a lawmaker has acted in his personal interest or that of another individual but not of his constituents in return for improper gain. That lowering of the bar for criminal-corruption cases is sending shudders from the Capitol to the lobbying corridor of K Street. And none of that even begins to address the question of whether those who dined, traveled and socialized with Abramoff might have violated Congress's own loophole-ridden rules." All of which "explains why lobbying and ethics reform suddenly seem so popular on Capitol Hill, with lawmakers vying to outdo one another, as they always do in moments like these, with proposals they insist would clean up the system once and for all." Newsweek (1/16, Isikoff, Bailey, Thomas) adds, "It is not clear how many (if any) solons will wind up in jail because of their friendship with Abramoff. Bribery is very hard to prove. Congressman Ney…says he was duped into performing favors for Abramoff's clients." Newsweek adds that "panic on Capitol Hill was palpable; lawmakers scrambled to give away or return their campaign donations from Abramoff and his clients, led by House Speaker Dennis Hastert ($67,000). All denied any wrongdoing."

Boehner Challenges Accuracy Of "Abramoff Connection" Database. Roll Call (1/9, Newmyer) reports, "With lawmakers rushing to scrub their images clean by returning or donating to charity campaign money from former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his clients," Rep. John Boehner is "calling for a timeout." On Friday, he "challenged the Center for Responsive Politics to remove his name from a database that the watchdog group had posted on its Web site tallying amounts that Members of Congress have received from Abramoff and his clients. According to the database, Abramoff and his associates had showered $32,400 in campaign contributions on Boehner. The problem, Boehner said, was that 'to the very best of my knowledge, I have never received a penny from Jack Abramoff, directly or indirectly.' Instead, he said the CRP was unfairly crediting to Abramoff's influence all donations the Ohio Republican had received from the former lobbyist's American Indian tribe clients." Boehner wrote, "I suspect there are many other Members of Congress who find themselves in this situation as well, surprised to have been identified publicly as having an 'Abramoff connection' when in fact no such connection exists." But CRP Executive Director Larry Noble "defended the legitimacy of a database he said was produced in response to intense public and media interest. He said the center will refine the database but for the time being would not remove the information about contributions to Boehner."

Abramoff Scandal Has Yet To Affect Political Polls. The Washington Times (1/9, Lambro, 90K) reports that the Abramoff scandal "so far has yielded little political impact, pollsters and campaign strategists say. While one recent poll showed Democrats with a slight edge going into this fall's midterm congressional elections, several observers say there is no indication that the scandal surrounding Abramoff" has "begun to influence voters' perceptions." Pollster John Zogby said, "It's too soon in terms of the story really breaking into the public imagination. It's less than a week old. Prior to that it was purely an inside the Washington Beltway story."

Greenberg Traurig Avoids Abramoff Fallout. Under the headline "Lobbyist's Firm Escapes Fallout From A Scandal," the New York Times (1/9, Glater, Kornblut, 1.19M) reports that Greenberg Traurig, which was a "politically well-connected law firm long before" Abramoff joined it, has "rushed to distance itself from Mr. Abramoff, appease his clients and work closely with prosecutors. In the process it has earned praise for its cooperation" from Sen. John McCain, has "kept alive the possibility of suing Mr. Abramoff for its losses and negotiated financial settlements with most of Mr. Abramoff's victims." Former federal prosecutor David Schertler said, "They have taken the new approach that most corporations or institutions take in today's world, which is just completely cooperate with the investigation."

Abramoff Represented Magazine Publishers Association. The New York Times (1/9, Seelye, 1.19M) reports that while "the press has spilled plenty of ink writing" about Abramoff, "little noticed is that among Mr. Abramoff's many clients was the press itself, at least part of it. In 2000, he represented the Magazine Publishers Association, and it turns out that some of the association's money may have been funneled to Mr. Abramoff's political allies. In documents last week in which Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty to mail fraud and conspiracy to bribe public officials, he revealed that he and an unidentified Congressional aide worked to stave off an increase in postal rates -- a significant benefit for an industry that depends on the postal service." The magazine association "paid at least $1.4 million from 2000 to 2003 to Preston Gates Ellis & Rouvelas Meeds, the lobbying firm where Mr. Abramoff was the chief lobbyist."

Cornyn Says Reed "Apparently" Was "Bilking" Indian Clients. Sen. John Cornyn was asked on NBC's Meet the Press (1/8. Russert) if he intended to return a $1000 contribution he received from "associates of Jack Abramoff…and Ralph Reed," Cornyn replied, "It was a legal contribution. I don't plan on giving it back. … I had no knowledge of where Reed and Abramoff was somehow claiming credit [for actions taken by Cornyn] and then bilking their Indian clients for millions of dollars, apparently. And I certainly disapprove of that, did not know anything about it."

Lobbyists Continue Practices Despite Abramoff Scandal. The Legal Times (1/9, Palmer) reports, "If Washington lobbyists were feeling abashed last week after Jack Abramoff entered multiple guilty pleas, somebody forgot to tell the power-lunch crowd at the Palm. … Late last week the downtown chophouse, which serves as one of the de facto hubs of the lobbying universe, was alive with back-slapping bonhomie. Kenneth Duberstein held court at a center table for more than two hours, while Hilary Rosen passed by, clenching the end piece of her sunglasses with her teeth, and Grover Norquist worked a circuit at the back tables. It might have been expected that the ghost of Abramoff, Banquo-like, might hover over his former colleagues, but, all in all, it was business as usual." The Times continues, "And why not? Despite Abramoff pleading guilty to three counts of conspiracy, fraud, and tax evasion last week in Washington, and much speechifying on the Hill about fundamental lobbying reforms, it's still the busy season on K Street as lobbyists seek to secure earmarks for the 2007 spending bills. … And while lawmakers and watchdog groups scolded and fretted, the lobbyists themselves were busy working overtime trying to assuage clients' fears and put as much distance as possible between themselves and Abramoff's exploding star. … 'Jack Abramoff is an aberration, more the exception than the rule,' says William Morley, head of MWW Group's lobbying operation. 'On K Street, lobbyists are going to continue to do what they did before.' … That was a sentiment that echoed around Washington's influence community as lobbyists maintain that, so far at least, there hasn't been the lawmaker backlash on Capitol Hill that has been predicted in some circles."

Abramoff Prosecutor Seen As Low-Profile, Detail-Oriented. The Legal Times (1/9, McLure) reports, "After Jack Abramoff stepped before a D.C. federal judge to plead guilty to tax evasion, mail fraud, and a conspiracy 'involving public officials' last week, the face of the Justice Department was Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, who appeared before the cameras at a post-hearing news conference and declared that 'combating public corruption is a top priority of mine.' … But one person the newly appointed Fisher didn't credit during her victory lap was Mary Butler, the lawyer who actually quarterbacked the DOJ team during its 18-month investigation of Abramoff." The Times continues, "Butler, 49, is a career prosecutor with extensive experience handling public corruption cases. The Justice Department denied a request to interview Butler, but friends, former colleagues, and defense lawyers who have squared off against her describe her as a determined and evenhanded prosecutor who immerses herself in her job. … And that may be bad news for anyone caught up in the Abramoff investigation. … 'She's one of the special ones who will turn over every piece of paper, look at every credit card receipt and phone bill,' says Joshua Berman, a partner at Sonnenschein Nath & Rosenthal who worked with Butler at the DOJ's Public Integrity Division. 'She's really good at crossing t's and dotting i's.'" The Times notes, "That meticulousness has helped extract guilty pleas from both Abramoff and his associate Michael Scanlon, a former public relations executive. Those pleas have focused public attention on lawmakers with ties to the pair, a group that, so far, includes Reps. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), Bob Ney (R-Ohio), John Doolittle (R-Calif.), and Dana Rohrbacher (R-Calif.) and Sens. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Harry Reid (D-Nev.). … But Butler's gone after public officials before. She got her start as a prosecutor in 1987, in the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida, a region as rich in corruption cases as it is in saw grass. During her 12-year tenure there, Butler helped run a tax evasion and money laundering case against executives of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International, won the conviction of a Drug Enforcement Administration supervisor for the theft of $1 million in undercover funds, and nailed a local banker for lying to a grand jury about bribes paid to the mayor of Miami Beach."

Abramoff Judge Called Compassionate, Tough. The Legal Times (1/9, Kelley) reports, "Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle has a reputation for compassion in the courtroom, especially when dealing with defendants who confess, cooperate, and convey remorse. But lawyers who know the federal judge say she's not afraid to dole out harsh punishments, either. 'You can't pigeonhole Judge Huvelle,' says Kevin Baine, a partner with Williams & Connolly and a former colleague of Huvelle's from her days at the firm. 'She approaches every case on the merits.'" The Times continues, "In the case of fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff, it's too early to tell how the judge will come down on the one-time king of K Street, who last week pleaded guilty before Huvelle to three felony counts of conspiracy, fraud, and tax evasion in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia." The Times adds, "The deal reached between Abramoff and the Justice Department recommends a prison term of between nine and 11 years and restitution of more than $25 million. In exchange, Abramoff has agreed to cooperate with the government's ongoing investigation, which published reports indicate could include as many as 20 lawmakers as well as their wives and staffers. According to local court rules, Huvelle likely would handle any additional criminal cases related to the Abramoff scandal, which means a number of Washington power players could end up in her courtroom. Huvelle already is overseeing the case of Michael Scanlon, Abramoff's former business partner who pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges in November."

DOJ_NMG_0008411

Dean Says No Democrats Took Donations From Abramoff. DNC Chairman Howard Dean, asked on CNN's Late Edition (1/8, Blitzer) if "Democrats who took money from Jack Abramoff…should give that money to charity or give it back," said, "There are no Democrats who took money from Jack Abramoff, not one, not one single Democrat. Every person named in this scandal is a Republican. Every person under investigation is a Republican. Every person indicted is a Republican. This is a Republican finance scandal. There is no evidence that Jack Abramoff ever gave any Democrat any money. And we've looked through all of those FEC reports to make sure that's true. … Senator Byron Dorgan and some others took money from Indian tribes. They're not agents of Jack Abramoff. There's no evidence that I've seen that Jack Abramoff directed any contributions to Democrats. I know the Republican National Committee would like to get the Democrats involved in this. They're scared. They should be scared. They haven't told the truth. They have misled the American people. And now it appears they're stealing from Indian tribes. The Democrats are not involved in this."

DOJ Said To Have Intensified Anti-Corruption Probes. Roll Call (1/9, Kane, Bresnahan) reports, "The Justice Department's political corruption unit has launched an aggressive effort to better coordinate probes across several agencies, increased training in undercover and surveillance techniques for investigators, and pushed the envelope by pursuing what the unit's top prosecutor calls 'marginal cases.'" In the process, "the Public Integrity Section, as it's formally known, has more than doubled the number of federal corruption cases it has brought to the courts in the past four years, re-energizing an office that watchdog groups complained had grown stale in the previous decade." Moreover, "both in terms of the quantity of cases and the speed with which the prosecutors are moving, Justice's corruption cops have stoked more fear in the halls of Congress and among other public officials than their predecessors had in at least a generation." Roll Call adds, "Congressional Democrats have applauded the aggressive efforts of the Justice Department, contending that more than a decade of GOP control on Capitol Hill and five years of Republican grip on the White House have created an arrogant 'culture of corruption.' Republicans, meanwhile, have countered that the scandals touch both parties. "

Lawmakers Nervous Over Reports Cunningham Wore FBI Wire. Time (1/16, Burger, Bennett) reports in its "Notebook" column that speculation over who ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham spoke with while wearing a wire "is making members of Congress nervous. As TIME.com reported last week, Cunningham…wore a wire to aid the Justice Department investigation just before his plea. The FBI is still probing defense contractors, and a private-sector source says Cunningham was wired while meeting a rep from at least one firm, possibly to get dirt on other members of Congress."

Probe Finds Houston DNA Lab Near "Total Breakdown." The Washington Times (1/9, Aynesworth) reports, "A lengthy investigation into the Houston Police Department's DNA laboratory has concluded that the operation has been 'near a total breakdown' in recent years and still doesn't come close to being acceptable." The Times continues, "Meanwhile, the Harris County district attorney, several defense attorneys and outside investigators are re-examining hundreds of convictions -- some of them death-penalty cases -- to discover how many innocent people have been affected. … Some have called for a federal investigation." The Times adds, "Last week, a team of forensic evidence specialists headed by lawyer Michael R. Bromwich returned a scathing 82-page report to Houston officials. Hired by the city of Houston, the Bromwich team had been examining forensic-driven cases handled by the suspect laboratory between 1987 and 2002. … The investigators reported a 'disturbing and pervasive pattern' wherein lab analysts did not report evidence that would have benefited suspects and even falsified evidence. … A review of 67 cases involving sample DNA resulted in 'major issues' with 40 percent of the original Houston crime-lab analyses. Three of these involved death-row prosecutions."

NYTimes Editor Killed In DC Street Robbery. David E. Rosenbaum, a retired reporter and editor for The New York Times, died Sunday from injuries suffered when he was struck on the head and robbed Friday night in Northwest Washington. The New York Times (1/9, Purdum, 1.19M) reports, "Mr. Rosenbaum served at various times as chief Congressional correspondent, chief domestic policy correspondent, chief economics correspondent, assistant news editor and business editor in the Washington bureau of The Times."

The Washington Post (1/9, B1, Weil, Lengel, 744K) reports, "Rosenbaum, 63, died at 7:10 p.m. at Howard University Hospital, where he was treated for a head injury suffered during the attack on Gramercy Street NW, said Philip Taubman, chief of the Times's Washington bureau. … D.C. police were canvassing the neighborhood yesterday for clues in the attack, which occurred in a quiet section between Connecticut and Wisconsin avenues. No arrests had been made."

Crime In DC's Adams Morgan Neighborhood Down. The Washington Times (1/9, Doolittle) reports, "Robbery and assault in the District's 3rd Police District, which includes Adams Morgan, jumped last fall, by as much as 46 percent, but new measures have reversed the trend." The Times continues, "Other crimes, such as theft, also spiked in September and October but dropped the last two months of the year. … 'Simple assaults are sort of a way of life at 3 a.m. in the morning in this area,' said Bryan Weaver, a member of Advisory Neighborhood Commission (ANC) 1C whose single-member district includes much of the area in which the crimes occur. 'On any given night, we only have six or seven officers assigned to our [police service area]. But unlike other [police service areas] we are dealing with six or seven thousand people coming in from other parts of the city and Virginia and Maryland to drink or dance.'" The Times adds, "The increase in crime since 2004, police said, is due to a variety of factors, including an increase in visitors to the Adams Morgan area and certain repeat offenders' being on the loose again after serving jail time. … Police Cmdr. Larry McCoy, who is in charge of the 3rd District, blames much of the crime on career criminals released from prison and returning to their old neighborhoods -- neighborhoods that, in many cases, are more affluent than when they left. … Area robberies increased to 141 in September, compared with 96 during the same month in 2004. In October, theft in the area rose from 160 in 2004 to 179 last year. In November, assaults with a deadly weapon climbed from 45 to 55 compared with the same month in 2004."

DOJ_NMG_0008412

FBI Withdraws From Utah Internet Sex Predator Task Force. Under the headline "FBI Breaks With Utah Sex-Crime Task Force," The Salt Lake Tribune (1/7, A4, Israelsen, Rosetta) reports, "A territorial spat between the FBI and the Utah Attorney General's Office has effectively killed a highly touted state-federal task force that cracked down on Internet sex predators and child-porn purveyors. The FBI has informed Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff that it will no longer be part of the multi-agency Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force, known as ICAC. … Shurtleff said a letter sent to his office by the FBI did not state a reason for the estrangement. He assumed it was because his office recently pulled its ICAC investigators out of the FBI's downtown building, where state investigators complained security was too restrictive." FBI SAC Timothy Fuhrman "acknowledged it was difficult for some of the task force members to get into the FBI building because his agency requires lengthy background checks on anyone who enters. … However, Fuhrman said, his office is not going to reduce its investigation of Internet child sex crimes. 'We're not part of that task force, but we're going to continue working with them,' Fuhrman said. 'They're not going to be side by side with us doing the same things.'"

The AP (1/7) reports, "A territorial spat between the FBI and the Utah Attorney General's Office" caused the split. Fuhrman "acknowledges the security difficulty, but said there were other complications to remaining part of the task force, including the FBI's own federal Internet crime initiative, Innocent Images. 'We just couldn't accommodate the restrictions that exist within Innocent Images with the Internet Crimes Against Children Task Force,' Fuhrman said. 'I wish we could have worked it out.' Although the FBI is dropping out of the joint task force, Fuhrman said that doesn't mean the agency is relaxing its efforts to fight Internet sex crimes." The AP notes, "In 2002, the task was awarded the FBI Director's Award as the best Internet sex crimes unit nationwide. Shurtleff said he's disappointed by the FBI's decision."

Virginia Woman Uses DNA To Find Out Who Killed Her Cat. The Washington Post (1/9, A1, Brulliard) reports, "Marylin Christian found Cody under the tree in front of their Loudoun County (VA) home, his white fur covered in saliva. She scooped up the lifeless remains of the cat whose friendship she had counted on for 13 years and sat under the tree, sobbing, for two hours. … The next day, Christian set out to discover what, or who, had killed Cody -- no matter what." The Post continues, "When a veterinarian said the culprit had to be a dog, she canvassed her rural Lovettsville neighborhood in search of a suspect. After she spotted a bouncy 4-year-old German shepherd mix named Lucky, she asked authorities to declare him dangerous. And when Loudoun animal control officials dropped the case, she took a cue from television's legal dramas: She hired a California DNA laboratory to analyze evidence -- dog saliva and fur -- that ultimately linked Lucky to the incident. … Yet despite the strong forensic evidence -- and a five-month saga that has tested the fragility of neighborly relations and pitted motherly instincts against carnivorous ones -- Lucky remains free." The Post adds, "Christian said that since Cody was killed, she has repeatedly asked Lucky's owners, Sean and Janet Daryabeygi, to return the dog to the local animal shelter, where they adopted him in the summer. The Daryabeygis think she is asking too much. They said Lucky would never harm a human, though they do not dispute that he could have been a cat killer."

CIVIL LAW:

11th Circuit Reinstates $54.6 Million Award To Salvadoran Torture Victims. The Miami Daily Business Review (1/9, Jones) reports, "A federal appeals court has reversed its own decision and affirmed a $54.6 million judgment awarded to three immigrants from El Salvador who claimed that members of that country's military kidnapped and tortured them." The Review continues, "A West Palm Beach jury awarded the money in July 2002, but the award hinged on a key ruling, made by U.S. District Judge Daniel T.K. Hurley, that a 10-year statute of limitations for filing claims such as those alleged in the case could be extended if the defendants were somehow prevented or discouraged from filing within the required 10-year period. Such an extension is referred to as 'equitable tolling.' Hurley held that the 10-year statute of limitations should begin in 1992, when El Salvador's civil war ended in a peace agreement. … The panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals made no mention of why it had reversed itself." The Review adds, "In a February 2005 decision, the panel felt conditions in El Salvador did not preclude the defendants from filing their lawsuit within 10 years. Upon further review, the panel said the overwhelming evidence showed conditions did prevent the plaintiffs from seeking justice within the 10-year period."

DOJ_NMG_0008413

CIVIL RIGHTS:

San Francisco Police Officer's Video Stirs Ire. The New York Times (1/9, Marshall) reports, "The police officer whose amateur video raised concerns among city officials about racism, sexism and homophobia within the San Francisco Police Department is hoping his filmmaking skills can help undo the damage and refocus the debate. But critics suggest he is making matters worse." The Times continues, "The officer, Andrew Cohen, was temporarily suspended last month along with 23 other officers connected to the video, which depicted uniformed and plainclothes officers in skits that mocked the homeless, gay men and lesbians, African-Americans and others. … Though reinstated, the police officers remain under investigation in the making of the videotape, and Officer Cohen and some others have been reassigned." The Times adds, "Now Officer Cohen has embarked on a one-man public relations effort to promote a 28-minute video - which he started working on two years ago and calls a serious documentary - that shows the difficulties of police work in some of the city's most crime-ridden and violent neighborhoods. … Peter Ragone, a spokesman for Mayor Gavin Newsom, said that Officer Cohen was 'acting unilaterally' in publicizing his new video and that the mayor and Police Chief Heather Fong had no part in the effort. Mr. Ragone said many people, including fellow officers, had asked Officer Cohen to 'stop trying to promote himself.' … Whatever the intent, Mr. Ragone added: 'It doesn't change the fact that we have videos that make fun of Chief Fong's Asian heritage and segments that have a white officer running over a black homeless woman. There is simply nothing funny about it.'"

Crackdown On Worldwide Prostitution Rackets Urged. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/9), Colette De Troy, coordinator of the European Women's Lobby's Policy Action Center on Violence Against Women, based in Brussels, and Mary McPhail, EWL's secretary general, write, "The sex industry is big business, and getting bigger. World-wide profits from prostitution exceed $12 billion annually. Of course, the women generally see very little of this money. The sex traders, whether legal 'sex entrepreneurs' or illegal pimps, are the biggest beneficiaries." De Troy and McPhail continues, "Many countries have tried different approaches to control or limit its growth, from legalization to regulation, with decidedly mixed results. But with the sex 'business" spawning cross-border trafficking in women and children and boosting organized crime across Europe, we can no longer turn a blind eye to this problem. .. Some 'progressive' campaigners have, especially over the past 15 years, argued that the legalization and regulation of prostitution could reduce trafficking and help combat organized crime and money laundering that usually come with it. … But can we consider 'sex work' like any other mainstream economic activity, whose profits should be integrated into the nation's GDP, maybe even giving training for young people or the unemployed? … The answer is a definite no. The sex trade is predominantly in the economic interests of sex traders and takes place at the expense of the prostitutes. What's more, while liberalization may have opened up new revenue sources for the government, it has done little to combat trafficking or organized crime. … Strategies to confront trafficking need to address the needs of the women whose rights are violated as well as targeting the pimps, clients and others who benefit from the sex trade. Saying 'no' to trafficking and exploitation of women by pimps and clients has nothing to do with 'conservative' sexual politics. On the contrary. It is those who legalize the sex industry and legitimize the reduction of women to mere objects who pursue archaic politics -- no matter how 'progressive' they claim to be."

Cato Official Says Florida Voucher Decision Has National Implications. Andrew J. Coulson, director of the Cato Institute's Center for Educational Freedom, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/9, 2.11M) "If you think kids are all the same, and that monopolies are the key to quality and efficiency, consider moving to Florida. As of this week, a uniform government bureaucracy is the only legal approach to public education in the Sunshine State. For six years, students in Florida's failing public schools have been able to switch to a private school of their parents' choosing, using the state funds allocated for their education. No longer. The 'Opportunity Scholarship' voucher program was struck down last Thursday by the state Supreme Court in a sweeping decision with national implications." The Court ruled that "school vouchers violate the "uniformity" clause of Florida's Constitution. Far from being an arcane and forgotten technicality, this clause was amended and re-approved by voters just eight years ago: It mandates, among other things, 'a uniform, efficient, safe, secure and high quality system of free public schools that allows students to obtain a high quality education.'' Coulson adds, "Every other state with a school choice program and a uniformity clause untested in its courts can expect to feel the heat. Arizona, which has education tax credits and charter schools, is apt to be a prime target. Minnesota, Colorado, Oregon and North Carolina, among others, all have uniformity clauses and at least one school-choice program vulnerable to attack. Meanwhile, come this June, the more than 700 mostly low-income students currently in Florida's Opportunity Scholarship voucher program may be herded back into the very public schools that vouchers allowed them to flee. Unless the Constitution of Florida -- and other states -- is amended, they may not be the only ones."

DOJ_NMG_0008414

ANTITRUST:

Boston Scientific Makes Formal $25 Billion Guidant Bid. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Westphal, Burton, Berman) reports, "Boston Scientific Corp. made a formal offer to buy Guidant Corp. for $72 a share, and said it had found a buyer for several Guidant units -- a move that it expects will allow for quicker antitrust clearance if its offer is accepted. The formal bid, valued at $25 billion in cash and stock, takes the…medical-device company one step closer to becoming one of the world's largest cardiac-device makers." J&J's original $25.4 billion offer "was reduced to about $22 billion after Guidant's difficulties," and analysts say a J&J counteroffer of $70 a share "could sway Guidant shareholders to stick with the current merger plan." But, last night, J&J "said it believes it has made 'a better offer,' partly because its deal would be completed more quickly."

USA Today (1/9, Appleby) reports, "The move escalates Boston Scientific's effort to top a pending bid from medical product giant Johnson & Johnson. Both companies are seeking Indianapolis-based Guidant for its stake in the $10 billion-a-year market for heart rhythm devices such as pacemakers and defibrillators. … Under terms of the Boston Scientific agreement, Abbott would pay Boston $3.8 billion for certain Guidant product lines, including catheters, guide wires and other devices used in vascular surgery. Abbott would pay $500 million more if a type of Guidant cardiac stent wins regulatory approval."

The AP (1/9, Jewell) reports, "Boston Scientific, which is seeking to trump Johnson & Johnson's smaller bid for Guidant, on Sunday presented a definitive proposal that largely mirrors its initial Dec. 5 offer. … But the No. 1 maker of drug-coated heart stents added a twist by announcing a related deal with Abbott Laboratories Inc. Natick, Mass.-based Boston Scientific will sell Guidant's vascular intervention and endovascular businesses to Abbott if its Guidant acquisition is successful." The AP adds, "J&J is a close No. 2 to Boston Scientific in drug-coated stents, and both companies are responding to growing competition in that market by dueling to acquire Guidant's lucrative pacemaker and defibrillator business. … Boston Scientific hopes to derail a process begun more than a year ago when J&J first bid for Guidant. J&J reduced its offer in November after Guidant suffered a spate of product recalls and related lawsuits and investigations."

Dow Jones Newswires (1/8) reports, "Boston Scientific's offer also would quadruple the company's debt load - from about $2.5 billion as of Sept. 30 to about $10.5 - although the company says it has arranged financing. And acceptance of Boston Scientific's proposal would require payment of a $625 million break-up penalty to J&J, the AP reported."

Bloomberg (1/9, Goldstein) reports, "Boston Scientific said it plans a first-quarter closing. The company would pay the $625 million fee that Guidant would owe J&J for terminating their merger agreement. … In July, Guidant recalled 28,000 pacemakers that were subject to failure. Pacemakers implanted in a patient's chest use an electrical signal to regulate a flagging heartbeat. Implanted defibrillators, about the size of an iPod, send electric shocks to restart a faltering heart. Analysts said Guidant may never achieve the market share it had before the recalls."

Abbot Deal Expected To "Satisfy" Regulators. The New York Times (1/9, Sorkin, Feder) adds Boston Scientific agreed to sell two of its units, "its vascular intervention and endovascular businesses, to Abbott Laboratories for $3.8 billion to satisfy regulators if it reaches a merger agreement with Guidant." Such a move is expected to spur criticism by Medtronic. The Financial Times (1/9, Politi) sets the price of Boston Scientific's two businesses at $4.3 billion. Bloomberg (1/7, News) reports that Guidant expects "a proposed $21.5 billion takeover by Johnson & Johnson to be completed in the first quarter."

Constellation-FPL Merger Caps Shattuck's Rise To Top. The Washington Post (1/9, D1, Rosenwald) reports, "Mayo A. Shattuck III is the kind of guy put on earth to run companies and make multibillion-dollar deals, like last month's $11 billion planned merger of the company he runs, Baltimore's Constellation Energy Group, with FPL Group of Florida." The Post continues, "Shattuck was raised near Boston, the descendant of two Mayo A. Shattucks, both of whom attended Harvard. His father was managing partner of State Street Research & Management Co., an old Boston money manager, and he also ran Harvard's endowment. Shattuck III, with his third multibillion-dollar merger under his belt, is now 51. His eldest son works at Goldman Sachs & Co. His name is Mayo A. Shattuck IV. … The lineage is one of New England privilege, but it is also a pedigree that Shattuck III has sometimes chosen to flout. He has a contrarian side, and those who know him well say it accounts for much of his success. It began when Shattuck was a teenager, and he did not do something that everyone in his family expected he would do. He did not, horror of horrors, attend Harvard." The Post adds, "While choosing Williams over Harvard may seem to some like choosing between different patterns of silver spoons, it was a choice that Shattuck's father suffered with some heartbreak. But his father, who died a short time later, acknowledged being proud of his son for having the courage to buck family custom, and Shattuck's decision may have taught him a lesson he would never have learned by following his family through Harvard Yard: When everyone is doing the same thing, advantage might present itself the other way. … As it did when he took over as chief executive of Constellation Energy Group in Baltimore four years ago. Enron Corp., which was one of the pioneers of the deregulated energy business with its high-risk energy trading operations, was collapsing, causing energy companies to dart in the other direction. Not Shattuck. He dove right in, becoming the dominant player in the sector and quickly tripling his company's revenue. … Shattuck's running of Constellation did not hit the mean. Analysts and industry observers say his strategy to buy energy assets and sell power competitively when almost everybody else would not transformed Constellation from something of an also-ran into the country's largest provider of commercial and industrial power, with revenue of $12.5 billion in 2004. Last month, he capped the turnaround with the deal to merge the firm with FPL Group."

DOJ_NMG_0008415

Banks May Widen Real Estate Role. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Schroeder) reports, "Two major banks received the green light from regulators to develop and own large hotel and office properties, potentially opening the door wider for banks to the commercial real-estate business beyond their traditional role as lenders." The Journal continues, "National banking laws generally bar banks from owning and developing commercial real estate unless the buildings are predominantly occupied by employees doing bank business. City skylines are dominated by headquarters buildings owned and financed by banks. Many banks rent out some office and first-floor retail space in their buildings, and such arrangements have been approved as lawful." The Journal adds, "While banks long have been excluded from all but the financing end of the real-estate business, they are trying to enter other aspects, such as developing projects and competing in the housing market. … Regulators have been wary of allowing bank portfolios to have a high concentration of loans in the volatile commercial real-estate market, for fear a sudden economic downturn could impair bank capital. There also are strict rules for real estate acquired by banks through foreclosure to be liquidated quickly. National bank regulators say they will soon publish interagency guidance directing lenders to meet certain capital, underwriting and risk-management standards to match loan growth. … But recently the Comptroller of the Currency, a unit of the Treasury Department that regulates national banks, incrementally broadened its interpretation of permissible development activities. In postings on its Web site, the OCC approved major real-estate projects by two banks that go beyond the scope of typical bank real-estate development. The banks aren't identified by name, but officials say the institutions referenced are PNC Financial Services Group Inc., of Pittsburgh, and Bank of America Corp., of Charlotte, N.C."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

First Funerals Held For West Virginia Miners. NBC Nightly News (1/8, lead story, 2:00, Seigenthaler) and ABC World News Tonight (1/8, story 2, 2:00, Woodruff) both gave prominent coverage to the first funerals of the 12 miners who died following last week's explosion at West Virginia's Sago Mine. Both also reported that survivor Randall McCloy's condition is beginning to improve.

Mining Association Expects Hearings On Mine Safety. Roll Call (1/9, Newmyer, Ackley) reports in its "K Street Files" column, "After the mine explosion in West Virginia last week that killed 12 miners and seriously injured another, the National Mining Association is girding for possible Congressional hearings on mine safety. Carol Raulston, senior vice president of communications for the National Mining Association, said the Mining Safety and Health Administration is conducting an investigation into the Sago mine explosion and her group is waiting on its findings."

Dye Affirms Administration Commitment To Mine Safety. David G. Dye, acting assistant secretary of Labor for Mine Safety and Health, writes in USA Today (1/9, 2.31M), "We deeply grieve the deaths of the 12 miners at the Sago Mine in West Virginia and offer our heartfelt sympathy to their families. … The Mine Safety and Health Administration (MSHA) is staffed by dedicated professionals, many of whom come from mining families and have a passion for protecting miners. Over the past several years, we have expanded enforcement, safety training and partnerships with labor unions and operators to push toward our goal of getting every miner home safely after every shift. This goal is shared by relevant state agencies and inspection professionals, who are also responsible for mine safety enforcement and investigation." Dye adds, "In close coordination with West Virginia, the MSHA's comprehensive investigation will determine what caused the Sago Mine explosion. If any health and safety standards were violated, we would take enforcement action. As always, we will make the full investigative report available to the families and the public. We will take every step — including looking at our own performance — to make sure this tragedy never happens again."

DOJ_NMG_0008416

USA Today Blames Complacency For Mine Disaster. In an accompanying editorial, USA Today (1/9, 2.31M) says, "On Sunday, as miners were being laid to rest after an explosion last week that killed 12 at West Virginia's Sago Mine, investigators were seeking the cause of yet another tragedy. But one culprit is clear: complacency. As mining fatalities have dropped in the past decade, federal regulators and judges have failed to use the tools they have to rein in those who don't comply with the law and force needed change." USA adds, "In the past year, government records show, the Sago Mine was cited repeatedly for failing to enforce basic safety precautions. … The number of what the MSHA calls 'high-dollar fines' ($10,000 or more) has dropped since the Bush administration took office in 2001. … Watchdogs muffed other opportunities to ensure safety. In 2003, the Government Accountability Office found that over the past decade, inspectors had often failed to ensure that violations were corrected by deadlines." USA concludes, "Miners deserve the safety level that only strict regulation and tough enforcement can provide. It shouldn't take another Farmington, Scotia or Sago for Washington to make that happen."

Kurtz Criticizes Media's Handling Of Mine Disaster Story. Howard Kurtz writes in his "Media Notes" column in the Washington Post (1/9, C1, 744K), "It was the most heart-rending and humiliating botch of a life-and-death story in modern memory, yet most journalists, naturally, aren't blaming themselves. It was everyone else's fault, they say. We just published and broadcast what we were told, and it turned out to be wrong. Tragically wrong, as in the Washington Post headline in Wednesday's late editions: '12 Found Alive in W.Va. Coal Mine.' Or USA Today's banner: '"Alive!" Miners Beat the Odds.' Or the Atlanta Journal-Constitution: '12 Miners Alive.' Or Newsday: 'Miracle in the Mine.' All the cable news networks got it wrong as well, such as MSNBC's Rita Cosby: 'We have some stunning news. NBC News and the Associated Press have just confirmed information that the 12 miners, remember 12 were missing, that they are alive. This is incredible news.' Hours later came the chilling confirmation that all but one were dead.' … In this case, a misunderstood or misspoken message from rescuers in the mine was relayed to a command center and then to anxious family members, who told reporters. While the mining company's refusal to correct the misinformation for hours is inexplicable, the situation was exacerbated by the journalistic reluctance to say the facts are unconfirmed and we just don't know. Experienced journalists should have understood that early, fragmentary information in times of crisis is often wrong." Kurtz adds, "The larger issue is that much of the press has abandoned reporting on health and safety regulation until disaster strikes. How many reporters have dug into the Labor Department's Mine Safety and Health Administration, which under the Bush administration was run by a former Utah mine manager until last year? About as many as did pieces, before Hurricane Katrina, on why a former Arabian horse official was running the dysfunctional bureaucracy of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Heck of a job."

Three Tribal Colleges Join Federal Library Program. Roll Call (1/9, Brotherton) reports, "Three tribal college libraries were added last month to the Federal Depository Library Program, which seeks to ensure that the public has free and ready access to federal documents." Roll Call continues, "Little Priest Tribal College in Nebraska, along with Peck Community College and Salish Kootenai College in Montana, are the first American Indian libraries to join more than 1,250 depository institutions in the program, which is run by the Government Printing Office." Roll Call adds, "While the bulk of government information overseen by the GPO is available online, membership in the program will ensure staff at the three libraries will be trained in research, said Judy Russell, superintendent of documents. … 'What they are going to do is make this information more useful and more visible to the average person,' Russell said." Roll Call notes, "The GPO is in charge of the production and distribution of information for the federal government. The agency provides research assistance in locating and using information at its eclectic mix of depository libraries. … Tribal libraries had never applied to become depositories, Russell said. But after the GPO held a strategy session regarding the needs of these libraries this past fall, the three colleges joined the program."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Marijuana Advocates Push Legalization Initiatives In Colorado, Nevada. Marijuana legalization advocates are hoping to use the momentum from their surprise victory in Denver to win statewide ballot initiatives in Colorado and Nevada. The Washington Times (1/9, Richardson, 90K) reports, "Colorado activists announced a drive two weeks ago aimed at bringing a clone of Denver's Initiative 100 before voters statewide in November. Initiative 100 allows adults in the city to possess small amounts of marijuana. And activists in Nevada, who have secured a place for a legalization measure on the state ballot in November, are taking heart in the success of Initiative 100, which captured 54 percent of the vote in the Nov. 1 election. … If the measures pass, Colorado and Nevada would become the first states to win voter approval for marijuana legalization. Alaska allows adults to possess up to 4 ounces of marijuana in their homes, thanks to court decisions upholding privacy rights, but voters defeated a 2004 initiative that would have abolished all penalties for possession and regulated marijuana sales."

DOJ_NMG_0008417

Massachusetts Lawmakers Consider Legalizing Medical Marijuana. According to The Eagle Tribune (1/8, Mason), "Massachusetts could become the fourth New England state to legalize medical marijuana under a plan before state lawmakers. On the heels of Rhode Island's approval last week of medical marijuana use, lawmakers [in Boston] are pushing a measure, with the support of some North of Boston legislators, that would allow doctors to treat patients with marijuana. Backers say people who suffer from debilitating pain and chronic diseases should be able to gain relief without fear of arrest, something 11 states have approved. But the initiative faces high hurdles. It is opposed by the Romney administration. Local lawmakers, aware of the plague of opiate addiction in the Merrimack Valley, want to ensure access to medical marijuana is airtight."

Convicted Medical Marijuana Activist Ordered To Leave Canada. The AP (1/8) reports, "An internationally known medical marijuana activist has been ordered to leave Canada, where he sought refuge after he was convicted in Placer County [California] of possessing peyote and magic mushrooms in 2000. Steve Kubby helped write and pass California's Proposition 215 medical marijuana law — approved by voters in 1996 — was the Libertarian candidate for governor in 1998 and served as national director of the American Medical Marijuana Assn. Kubby said he would suffer and could die of a rare form of adrenal cancer if he returns to Placer County and isn't allowed to smoke marijuana daily while serving a 120-day jail sentence. He could face more jail time for fleeing the country. The conviction came after Placer County deputies said they found small amounts of mescaline and psilocybin, along with 265 marijuana plants, while raiding Kubby's Olympic Valley home in 1999. Canadian Border Services last month ordered Kubby and his family to leave by Thursday. He goes back to a Canadian court Monday to seek a delay."

Georgia Protestors Call For End To "Operation Meth Merchant" Prosecution. The AP (1/8, Gross) reports that several hundred people "rallied Sunday for an end to prosecution in what federal agents have dubbed 'Operation Meth Merchant.' … In June, 49 people and 16 corporations, most of them in northwest Georgia, were charged with supplying everyday items - from antifreeze to cold medicine - to informants who claimed they were using the products to make methamphetamine. … Supporters of the accused, including the American Civil Liberties Union, say the sting was rife with problems. They say several defendants were not even in the country at the time they are accused of illegally selling the ingredients and that informants used obscure drug slang, which the clerks, some of whom speak limited English, did not understand. … Federal prosecutors say race and ethnicity had no role in their investigation. The say Meth Merchant was aimed at curbing a deadly problem in a region that has been inundated with the drug in recent years." Atlanta's WXIA-TV, the Columbus, Georgia Ledger-Enquirer, and India's Press Trust published in newspapers and/or posted on Web sites the AP story.

Mexican Drug Cartel Said To Be Weaker But Still In Control Of Trafficking. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/8, Cearley) reports, "Mexico's top investigator of organized crime has talked about the region's Arellano Félix drug trafficking group as if it were a thing of the past in this border city. But some drug trafficking experts in Mexico and the United States say the cartel still controls the passage of drugs through Tijuana, even if it is weaker after a five-year offensive by Mexican government. 'These things take on a capability to modify and evolve,' said Alan Poleszak, assistant special agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's San Diego office. Tijuana human rights activist Victor Clark, who closely follows drug trends, said a part of the problem is the 20-year-old cartel's continued collaboration with certain members of law enforcement. … The condition of the Arellano cartel is significant to the region because during its heyday, U.S. authorities estimated that it was responsible for 40 percent of all cocaine that entered the United States illegally. The cartel is known to torture and kill people who don't cooperate, such as Mexican police or rival drug trafficking groups that fail to pay them fees. Still, U.S. officials say they are seeing concrete results from years of investigations and collaborative efforts with Mexican authorities. … As of May, the Mexican Attorney General's Office announced that 107 suspected members of organized crime had been arrested in Baja California since President Vicente Fox took office in 2000. Most of the detained are suspected Arellanos, including much of their top management."

Trial To Begin In March For Doctor Accused Of Giving NFL Players Steroids. The New York Times (1/8, Bernstein) reports in its sports section, "The first full month of the National Football League off-season is March, but it will hardly be a quiet break for the Carolina Panthers or for the league. That is when the trial of Dr. James Shortt is expected to begin in Columbia, S.C., and a potentially damaging connect-the-dots could be revealed involving the Panthers and illegal steroids. The federal investigation of Shortt, who has been indicted on 43 counts involving the distribution of steroids, has already touched the team and the N.F.L. There have been reports, led by The State newspaper in Columbia, that as many as nine former or current Panthers saw Shortt. There have been allegations that some received illegal prescriptions for steroids during the 2003 season. … Marty Hurney, Carolina's general manager, said last March that some Panthers were sought by the Drug Enforcement Administration as witnesses in the investigation. There is no word yet if players will be called to testify during the coming trial. But whatever is revealed about the players and the N.F.L. testing process, Wadler said he did not expect this trial to become a watershed for the sport or steroids testing. 'Do you realize how many watershed moments there have been over the last few years?' he said. 'We're not going through a moment, we're going through a process. And this is an ongoing process. This is just one more notch in the belt.'"

DOJ_NMG_0008418

IMMIGRATION:

Kondracke Says Bush Should Have "Frank Chat" With Radio Hosts About Immigration. Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (1/9) that President Bush "should call in his radio talk-show supporters for a frank chat about immigration. Bill O'Reilly, Sean Hannity, Rush Limbaugh, Hugh Hewitt and Laura Ingraham…are the ones fueling Republican uproar over illegal immigration. Yet they support Bush ardently and they ought to be open to an argument from him — an argument that happens to be correct — that the only way the United States is truly going to solve the problem of illegal immigration is with a comprehensive plan, like his, that not only controls the borders but creates legal means for immigrants to work. Bush also needs to make the argument to GOP House Members, who voted overwhelmingly last month for an enforcement-only bill that beefed up border security, made it a felony to be an illegal alien and authorized building a fence along some of the border with Mexico. … House Members went home able to tell angry constituents that they'd cracked down on immigration, but the truth is they've done nothing. No bill has passed the Senate and what's in the offing is a stalemate — unless Bush can rally his party to do something sensible." Kondracke adds, "It's up to Bush to avoid stalemate — and there are lots of good arguments he can use to pull his party together. … Doing the right thing is win-win for Republicans, if only Bush can convince Sean Hannity."

TAX:

Mallaby Argues For Rolling Back Bush Tax Cuts. Sebastian Mallaby writes in the Washington Post (1/9, A19, 744K) that the "Bush-Cheney combo" has "gone into chest-thumping overdrive," on the economy, "seizing the latest news on the housing-fueled expansion to say what brilliant boys they are." Mallaby adds, "I want to focus instead on Democrats' response to the Bush chest-thumping. For, much as on the Iraq war, Democrats are muddled. They are letting the administration off the hook." Democrats "should home in on two clearer problems. First, the Bush tax cuts have put the federal government on an unsustainable footing. Running a large budget deficit -- arguably, any budget deficit -- is recklessly imprudent when a roaring economy should be delivering a surplus and when baby boomers are on the eve of retirement. Second, although the squeeze on the middle class may be exaggerated, the squeeze on the unskilled is not. … Democrats should focus their complaints on these two problems, particularly since the obvious solution is politically convenient. To begin grappling with the budget deficit, the nation must repeal most of the Bush tax cuts; to grapple with inequality, it should begin by making the tax system more progressive -- which would again mean rolling back some of the Bush cuts."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Confirmation Hearings Begin Today. The hearings for Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito get underway today. The AP (1/9, Holland) reports, "After receiving some last-minute encouragement from Bush at a White House breakfast Monday, Alito was scheduled to head to Capitol Hill for the start of nomination hearings by the Senate Judiciary Committee. Ten-minute opening statements by the panel's 18 members were likely to consume the session, with direct questioning of Alito beginning Tuesday and expected to last at least two days." Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter "said Sunday he will wrap up the hearings this week. He has called for a committee vote Jan. 17."

The media consensus this morning appears to be that Alito will be confirmed. Reuters (1/9, Ferraro), for example, predicts the nominee will face "fierce questioning," but he is "is expected to survive…and win confirmation," barring "an unforeseen bombshell." The Financial Times (1/9, Waldmeir) says that "so far at least there are few signs that the Senate confirmation hearings…will prompt the ideological conflagration long predicted by the pundits." In the end, Alito "seems likely to be confirmed because two months of diligent digging have revealed little more than what many Americans have suspected from the beginning: that Mr Alito is a conservative."

DOJ_NMG_0008419

The Los Angeles Times (1/9, Reynolds, 958K) reports Jennifer Duffy, "who studies the Senate for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, said she expected Alito to gain confirmation to the high court, but by no more than a handful of votes. 'He's going to have to make a really big mistake, or Democrats are going to have to succeed in turning him into a boogeyman, or he will be confirmed,' Duffy said." Congressional "strategists on both sides said they shared Duffy's view of the vote count." But "with Republicans weakened, most recently by the influence-peddling scandal surrounding former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, some Democrats are mulling whether to try to thwart Alito's confirmation through a filibuster, a tactic in which a minority party can block a vote by refusing to end debate."

Sen. Lindsey Graham, on Fox News Sunday (1/8, Hume), contended that Alito "is the most qualified person to be nominated for the Supreme Court in 70 years in terms of judicial experience. He's been on the court for 15 years, and there's absolutely no indication that he's an ideologue, a person who will ignore the law to enact their own personal agenda. So he's a solid conservative, and I think he'll be confirmed, probably on a party line vote in the committee." Bloomberg (1/9, Larkin) reports Specter "said on CNN's 'Late Edition' program that he has 'not seen any rational basis' for a filibuster." Graham "said a filibuster of a Supreme Court nominee wouldn't be supported in the Senate."

USA Today (1/9, Biskupic, 2.31M) says "some Democratic senators, including Sens. Charles Schumer of New York and Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, have complained about Alito's views against abortion rights and warned that Alito could help roll back a range of civil rights protections." Schumer "recently questioned whether Alito would seek limits on presidential power." Kennedy is quotes sating, "I think there is a steep hill to climb for Judge Alito at the hearings." However, "Democrats who might oppose the nominee have a climb, too. Republicans control 55 votes in the 100-member Senate, close to the 60 votes necessary to shut down a filibuster if Democrats try to block floor action on Alito."

The Washington Times (1/9, Hurt, 90K) says Democrats "said yesterday that they may block the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr., depending on the answers the nominee gives at his Senate Judiciary Committee confirmation hearings, which begin today." Schumer said that if Alito "refuses to answer questions on issues that Democrats deem vital, the party will be more likely to block the nomination." Majority Leader Bill Frist "has said all along that he would employ the 'nuclear option.'"

Sen. Ted. Kennedy, appearing on ABC's This Week (1/8, Stephanopoulos), said, "I think Judge Alito has a lot to respond to in the Judiciary Committee. I think whether his success or failure is really going to be his performance in the Judiciary Committee, not just for the members of the Judiciary Committee but for the American people. … I've had the good opportunity to read through Judge Alito's opinions, more than 300 of those, and no one can read through those opinions and not find out that there's a basic hostility to…individual rights, a welcoming to executive authority and power even when it's excessive, and also the fact that he has so identified with major corporate interests at the expense of individual interests.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, on Fox News Sunday (1/8, Hume), said, "My question is are his views, let's say, on abortion the same as they were in 1985 when he wrote in an application, the Constitution does not protect a woman's rights in this area. Now, if that's true and he still holds to that, this will make him a very difficult nominee for many of us."

DNC Chairman Howard Dean, on CNN's Late Edition (1/8, Blitzer) said, "There are a couple of problems with Judge Alito. First of all, he appears to be outside the mainstream of where most Americans are on privacy for individuals, not just women's issues, but strip searching, OK'ing a strip search of a 10-year-old, these kinds of things. The other thing which is also troubling is the conflict of interest case where he owned $400,000 worth of mutual funds and was willing to sit on a case involving the company. His order was later vacated. Now, he promised the American people when he was confirmed that he would recuse himself."

Sen. John Cronyn writes in the Washington Times (1/9, 90K), "The Senate judicial confirmation process has, in the recent past, been both emotional and divisive. That should not be the case, and we should certainly not engage in or indulge any debate which distorts or misrepresents the record of an individual with as fine a record as that of Judge Alito. Let us commit ourselves to a fair process -- with full investigation, full questioning, full debate and an up-or-down vote."

The Legal Times (1/9, Mauro) reports, "Even his closest friends say Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito Jr. is a shyer, blander version of Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. -- and Roberts himself was described as shy and bland when he was nominated to the high court." The Times continues, "Be that as it may, Alito's Senate confirmation hearings, which begin this week, will be anything but bland or dull. After a long holiday truce, the battle over Alito's nomination suddenly flared again last week, with dueling D.C. press conferences, partisan advertisements, and e-mail campaigns creating the illusion, if not the real prospect, that Alito is in for a far tougher time than Roberts. Groups ranging from the Hip Hop Caucus to the National Italian American Foundation weighed in, suggesting that at the eleventh hour, the Alito nomination was finally generating strong interest." The Times adds, "What had once shaped up as a one-note debate over Alito's seemingly undeniable personal opposition to abortion rights has been overtaken by a range of other issues, most notably his expansive view of executive branch power -- a suddenly less palatable position in light of President George W. Bush's controversial domestic eavesdropping initiative and his lower popularity poll numbers. … Add to that the fact that Alito is up to replace swing vote Justice Sandra Day O'Connor -- whereas conservative Roberts replaced the late conservative William Rehnquist -- and fireworks are in the offing."

DOJ_NMG_0008420

"Strongest Ammunition" Against Alito Could Come From Nominee's Memos. The Washington Post (1/9, A10, Babington, 744K) reports Senate Democrats "are expected to attack…Alito Jr. on multiple fronts at the confirmation hearing that opens at noon today, but their strongest ammunition is likely to come from the nominee's own hand." Alito "wrote two memos in 1985 that rocked political circles when they were made public last November. In one, an application for a promotion in the Reagan administration, Alito wrote that 'the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion.' … The other memo outlined a strategy for attacking the landmark 1973 court ruling that legalized abortion nationwide, asking: 'What can be made of this opportunity to advance the goals of bringing about the eventual overruling of Roe v. Wade and, in the meantime, of mitigating its effects?'"

Abortion, Executive Power Likely To Be Focus Of Alito Hearings. ABC and NBC previewed what ABC World News Tonight (1/8, story 5, :45, Woodruff) said "could be the toughest confirmation hearings for a Supreme Court nominee in decades," adding that abortion "is expected to be the most-contentious issue at the hearings, which begin tomorrow." NBC Nightly News (1/8, story 5, 2:00, Seigenthaler) also said abortion will be a key topic, but added that "judicial liberties" and "executive power" will both be subjects for inquiry. Sen. Sam Brownback: "Presidential authority, he should talk about the Constitution. Specific cases he shouldn't comment on." Jordan: "Another supporter said he should not be expected to make promises about how he would rule on executive power cases." Sen. John Cornyn: "There has been movement long security and civil liberties. I think clearly Judge Alito believes, as we all do, that civil liberties are important." Jordan: "But the top Democrat says documents from his career have already shown he is inclined to expand executive power." Sen. Patrick Leahy: "He has spoken on presidential powers. He has done that since he was a judge. So he has no reason why he can't speak to it now."

Asked on CBS's Face the Nation (1/8, Schieffer) if the "issue of presidential power going to dominate these hearings the way the issue of abortion dominated the Roberts hearings." Sen. Arlen Specter replied, "I believe that presidential power will be very, very important. You have what appears to be a conflict between the president's claim of executive war powers to eavesdrop without a warrant, a conflict with what Congress has done on the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, and I think it is a fair inquiry, and I intend to press the question with Judge Alito as to how he would approach these issues on a jurisprudential base. But I do not think that you can put aside the issue of a woman's right to choose. I think that that…is still the bigger question."

The New York Times (1/9, Liptak, 1.19M) offers "A Primer On The Alito Hearings," contrasting the Alito hearings with those last fall for nominee John Roberts. The Times highlights abortion and the right to privacy, the limits of presidential power, and the scope of congressional authority, as the key questions for Alito. Similarly, the Christian Science Monitor (1/9, Chaddock, 61K) says Alito can expected to be confronted with "issues ranging from the scope of abortion rights and government regulation to how vigorously the federal courts will enforce civil rights. … As he did in the Roberts hearing, Sen. Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, who chairs the Senate Judiciary Committee, will lead off with a question on abortion rights, aides say. But he plans to quickly segue to Alito's views on presidential power during times of war."

NBC Nightly News (1/8, story 6, 2:30, Seigenthaler) also ran an "In Depth" feature on abortion and Supreme Court nominees over the 33 years since Roe v. Wade, reporting that John Paul Stevens "was nominated and over time he became a dependable vote to uphold it. Sandra Day O'Connor took fire from conservatives on abortion," but President Reagan "came to her defense. … But as a Justice she reaffirmed a woman's right to choose. As nominee, Scalia voiced moderation. As a justice he voted to overturn it. Another Reagan nominee, Kennedy, affirmed the very basis of Roe v. Wade. When the first President Bush nominated David Souter, abortion was 'Topic A.' … But as a Justice, he has reaffirmed Roe v. Wade, infuriating conservatives to this day. … Abortion was part of the fight over Clarence Thomas who as a nominee wouldn't talk about it. As a Justice he voted to overturn it. Bill Clinton remains the only Democrat since Roe v. Wade to appoint Supreme Court Justices. Both have supported abortion rights. Now as George W. Bush shapes the court, abortion remains at center states. John Roberts is now Chief Justice Roberts. And it is Samuel Alito's opportunity to answer questions -- or not."

Time (1/16, Bacon, Allen) reports that as Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito's confirmation hearings begin this week "Senators and viewers will be asking, Is this the man of the memos, whose paper trail includes provocative passages against abortion and in favor of Executive power that have given Democrats and liberal interest groups the ammunition to portray him as a dangerous activist? Or would the high court be getting the more opaque and reserved scholar described by friends and co-workers and suggested by some of his later work?" Time adds that amid reports of the NSA's secret domestic surveillance program, "Democrats have shifted their concern to Alito's robust defense of Executive power. In a 2000 speech, for instance, Alito argued that the framers viewed the Executive Branch of government 'as necessary to balance the huge power of the legislature and the factions that may gain control over it.' Massachusetts Senator Ted Kennedy has said he would question Alito about a 1984 memo in which he argued the Attorney General should be immune from lawsuits even if he authorized illegal domestic wiretapping."

DOJ_NMG_0008421

Newsweek (1/16) reports in its "Periscope" column that when Alito's confirmation hearings begin "TV viewers are going to need a translator. For example, Sen. Arlen Specter, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, will probably begin by quizzing Alito about stare decisis (rough Latin meaning: 'let the decision stand'), the judicial rule under which the Supreme Court follows its own precedents -- until five or more justices want to junk one of them." Specter "wants Alito to affirm the court's 1973 decision in Roe v. Wade that created a woman's right to an abortion. So Specter's first question might be: 'Judge Alito, could you tell us your philosophy toward stare decisis?' Translation: Can I get you to promise -- or even hint -- that you will leave the abortion ruling alone?" Newsweek adds that Democrats "will try to paint Alito as a slippery character with a 'credibility problem' and a radical conservative agenda." A Democratic senator "might ask: 'Judge Alito, in one dissent you upheld the strip search by police of a 10-year-old girl, even though the other judges, including conservatives, said the search went way too far.' Translation: How can we trust you to protect the civil liberties of all Americans? Alito will say that the "strip search" was not really that, but rather a female police officer asking the girl and her mother to remove selected articles of clothing in a bathroom as part of a search for illegal drugs conducted with a warrant. Translation: You're twisting the context to smear me."

Morning After Pill Shifts Abortion Debate, Likely To Impact Alito Hearings. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Cummings, 2.11M) reports, "The abortion debate in America's courts is shifting into new medical and legal terrain, thanks to the escalating battle over the so-called morning-after pill, and it is likely to become an issue in Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel Alito's confirmation hearings, which start today. The controversy hinges on one of the most elemental questions in the debate: when pregnancy begins. … The distinction is of immense importance in an emerging battle between religious conservatives and some women's groups over access to emergency contraception." The Journal adds, "Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D., Calif.) both are expected to press Judge Alito on his legal analysis of abortion and contraception rights during his confirmation hearings. Ms. Feinstein on Friday cited women's reproductive rights first on a list of issues she plans to explore. … Judge Alito hasn't been asked about whether he considers the morning-after pill an abortifacient."

"Religious Right" Leaders Rally For Alito. The Washington Post (1/9, A10, Edsall, 744K) reports, "Republicans and leaders of the religious right gathered in a black church," Philadelphia's Greater Exodus Baptist, Sunday night to build support for Alito "as part of their effort to block gay marriage, end abortion and restore religious expression in the public square." Sen. Rick Santorum said the" elevation of Alito to the top court is crucial because 'extremely liberal justices [are] destroying traditional morality.' The battle, he said, is against Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee who are determined to 'continue the far left judicial activism on the Supreme Court.'" Greater Exodus pastor Herbert H. Lusk II told the gathering of about 600, "My friends, don't fool with the church because the church has buried a million critics. And those the church has not buried, the church has made funeral arrangement for." Reuters (1/9) reports that the Rev. Jerry Falwell, speaking at the event, said confirming Alito "would be the biggest victory for his constituency in three decades. 'What we've worked on for 30 years, to mobilize people of faith and value in this country, what we've done through these years is coming to culmination right now,' Falwell said.

The Pittsburgh Post Gazette (1/9, Reston) reports that during the program, which organizers said was broadcast to 80 million viewers through Christian broadcast stations and church telecasts, Santorum "said 'extreme liberal judges' are 'destroying traditional morality and creating a new moral code.' 'The Supreme Court has become the supreme branch of the government imposing its unrestrained will on all of the people,' Mr. Santorum said. 'The only way to restore this Republic our founders envisioned is to elevate honorable jurists like Samuel Alito who will help replace the hubris of this court with humility and respect for the common sense of the American people.'"

The Philadelphia Inquirer (1/9, Budoff, 423K) adds Falwell "described…Bush's nomination of Alito as the culmination of a lengthy effort to 'mobilize people of faith and values.'" The event "was billed as an effort to turn around an increasingly secularized society. But it also provided a high-profile forum to tout Alito as a justice who would exercise judicial restraint and halt restrictions on religious expression in public."

Alito First Showed Conservative Stripes In Reagan Justice Department. The Washington Post (1/9, A1, Becker, Russakoff, 744K) looks back at Alito's tenure in the Reagan Justice Department, where he "proved himself" by "distilling their agenda to reshape the nation's civil rights laws and overturn abortion rights into brilliantly analytical legal strategies. Much like his father, who had served both parties in a politically riven New Jersey legislature, he won the trust of the president's most ardent loyalists as well as the career civil servants who were often at war with them."

DOJ_NMG_0008422

The New York Times (1/9, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) runs a similar look back at the Reagan era, examining how Alito and Roberts once worked out of "cramped offices along the same hallway on the fifth floor of the Justice Department's headquarters. … A quarter-century later, their contrasting styles will be on display again this week in the Senate hearings on the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Alito." But if Roberts "had the more political job then, it is now Judge Alito who faces more political opposition, in part because of statements he made in 1985 to persuade the administration's leaders that he, too, was a conservative at heart."

Concerned Women For America's LaRue "Battling" Over Court's Future. The Washington Post (1/9, C1, Davis, 744K) profiles Concerned Women for America Chief Counsel Jan LaRue, "a street fighter -- a Christian one, armed with a law degree. Lately, LaRue has been battling over the future of the Supreme Court." LaRue is known "for her legal acumen, assertion of principles over politics, and debating style, which has been described as fierce, tough and even ruthless. LaRue likes to say she believes in being direct without being brutal." She "took the long road to Washington, arriving by way of darkness and light. Her life story is a dramatic one that includes molestation, self-described heavy drinking and promiscuity, and dropping out of high school. And, she will tell you with great regret, she had an illegal abortion. She eventually ended up a divorcee and a single mom before she found another man to love and a God to save her."

Alito Confirmation Battle Goes Far Beyond The Beltway. The Legal Times (1/9, Goldman) reports, "It was 9:35 in the morning, and after a bad night's sleep in Little Rock (AR)'s best hotel, David Moore was already facing his second interview of the day. … It wasn't the usual routine for the confirmed academic, a former Justice Department lawyer who is now a professor at the University of Kentucky College of Law. … But on this Tuesday morning, the only thing on his résumé that really mattered — and the reason he left his wife and two small children behind in the middle of a vacation in Phoenix — was that he was a former clerk to Samuel Alito Jr." The Times continues, "Moore had flown to Arkansas because it is home to Sen. Mark Pryor, a first-term Democrat who is a member of the 'Gang of 14' and a key vote in Alito's upcoming confirmation battle. … And while Pryor will ultimately make his own decision (which many believe will be to break ranks with his own party and vote to confirm), a little persuasion in that direction from some of Arkansas' 2.7 million citizens couldn't hurt. … And in the hierarchy of vouching for a high court nominee, few have more credibility than a former Alito law clerk. Almost without exception, Alito's 54 former charges have been happy to sing the praises of their former boss, who, after 15 years on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit, has compiled a disparate, but intensely loyal, collection of acolytes. … Last week, in anticipation of Alito's Jan. 9 hearings, 20 former Alito clerks were sent out to stump in 18 states by Progress for America, perhaps the most well-heeled of the pro-Alito groups. There they usually went head-to-head with statewide anti-Alito coalitions organized by left-leaning groups (in Arkansas it was the local chapter of People For the American Way)."

NYTimes Commentators Pose "Thirty Questions For Alito." On its op-ed page, the New York Times runs "Thirty Questions For Alito" from a variety of commentators. Leonard A. Leo of the Federalist Society asks about the fallibility of the High Court and the principle of judicial restraint; Yale Law School's Kenji Yoshino asks about abortion and the constitutional protection of "rights that do not appear in the text of the document itself," University of California at Berkeley's John Yoo asks if the 9/11 attacks put the US "in a state of war with Al Qaeda and its allies," and what Alito feels is the "worst example of constitutional interpretation rendered by the Supreme Court in the last 30 years," author Scott Turow asks for Alito's take on Bush v. Gore; and Florida International University's Stanley Fish inquires about several points of constitutional theory.

Dean Says Alito Should Be Rejected Over Ethics Concerns. Tying his opposition to Alito's nomination to recent allegations of GOP ethical abuses DNC Chairman Howard Dean in an op-ed in the Baltimore Sun (1/9, 296K) writes, "It's been widely acknowledged that President Bush had a bad year in 2005." One problem "America faces as a result is the White House's willingness to make decisions based on what benefits the administration politically rather than what's right for America." Judge Samuel Alito's nomination "is just one example of this. The president hopes to make up ground with his right-wing base instead of appointing someone who will have the confidence of a wide range of Americans." Americans "should shudder at the prospect of an ethically tone-deaf judge sitting on the one institution in Washington not yet in the pocket of the extremists who comprise the right wing of the Republican Party" because a "culture of corruption, arrogance of power and insensitivity to the appearance of conflict of interest has plagued key Republican officeholders for the past five years."

More Commentary On Alito Hearings. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, 2.11M) editorializes, "Alito's Supreme Court confirmation trial finally begins today, and don't look for John Roberts redux. If you listen to the rhetoric coming from liberal Democrats in recent days, it's clear they're spoiling for a fight. … And since they know it will be next to impossible to beat him on credentials or judicial philosophy, the main line of attack looks to be on Judge Alito's integrity. The strategy is to sling mud in the hope that something will stick. … We trust [Senate Republicans] won't let the Kennedy Democrats get away with the borking they clearly would like to attempt. Republicans also have a rare, high-profile chance to make the case for the Constitutional role for judges that the Founders intended. This confirmation is probably the most important thing the Senate will do this election year. Too bad it's shaping up to be more of a character attack than a debate over judicial philosophy."

DOJ_NMG_0008423

The Washington Post (1/9, A18, 744K) editorializes, "Alito, in any formal sense, is obviously well qualified -- as the American Bar Association recently recognized. Allegations of impropriety on his part seem trivial, and the ideological questions about him are well known. … It is quite clear already that Judge Alito would be a conservative justice. The question is whether he will emerge in these hearings as one energetically committed to remaking federal law to restrain congressional power, expand presidential authority and read individual constitutional rights narrowly or as a cautious judge who is mindful of the limits of judicial power. Both judicial personalities show up in his writings at times. The question for the Senate will be: Which is the real Samuel Alito?"

The Los Angeles Times (1/9, 958K) editorializes that while Alito's "position on abortion rights garnered much of the attention in the aftermath of his nomination to the Supreme Court last fall, the top priority of senators at his confirmation hearing this week should be to ascertain whether the judge sufficiently appreciates the proper constitutional balance of power among the three branches of government. It is a timely issue, as President Bush insists on expanding the executive branch's power to conduct the war on terrorism. … In contrast to his willingness to expand the powers of the presidency beyond its constitutional boundaries, Alito has been more traditionally conservative in narrowly defining the powers of Congress as set out in the Constitution. … Senators should ask Alito to expand on his understanding of the federal government's power to regulate interstate commerce, the source of much of its authority. Oh, and yes, they should also ask him about his views on abortion rights."

USA Today (1/9, 2.31M) editorializes, "In a 1985 application for a political promotion at the Justice Department, Alito said that as a student, he developed an interest in constitutional law 'motivated in large part by disagreement with the Warren Court decisions.' He singled out high court rulings involving criminal procedure, separation of church and state, and even the principle of one person/one vote. In the same memo, Alito enthusiastically embraced the argument that the Constitution does not protect a woman's right to an abortion -- a contention that has been consistently rejected by the court for more than 30 years. Alito's paper trail as a government lawyer and federal judge raises doubts as to whether he would respect those and other court precedents. … He needs to provide reassurance that he would not strip away protections the Supreme Court has guaranteed."

Florida Federal Judges Reject Request To End Secret Case Transfers. The Miami Daily Business Review (1/9, Kay) reports, "South Florida's federal judges have declined to change their current system of transferring cases to one another outside the random assignment process, despite concerns raised by the federal public defender that the current system could open the door to forum shopping by litigants." The Review continues, "In a meeting last Wednesday to vote on whether to change their internal operating procedures, the judges blasted a proposal by Federal Public Defender Kathleen M. Williams to impose restrictions on their ability to transfer cases among themselves. … 'You're asking us to change the present policy, which has been in effect for many years ... and to complicate the system,' said U.S. District Judge Donald L. Graham. 'If I'm ill on a Sunday night and I know Judge Moreno is free Monday morning for a trial, why can't I call him and ask him to cover?'" The Review adds, "The judges' informal method of transferring cases among each other came to light when the Daily Business Review discovered that the court had its own unpublished internal operating procedures that allow them to make such transfers. The procedure was discovered while the Review was reporting on the wholesale transfer of his criminal docket by Senior Judge James Lawrence King to another judge so he could avoid a conflict of interest. .. After the Review's article appeared, the court decided to make these so-called 'secret rules' public and post them on its Web site. … A local rules committee, headed by Miami lawyer Thomas Meeks, a partner at Zuckerman Spaeder, was asked by the judges to review the court's unpublished procedures and ensure that they conformed with the published rules that guide attorneys who practice before the court. Meeks suggested minor changes that the judges adopted, but agreed with the judges that their case transfer system should not be changed. … A public hearing was held Wednesday before the court adopted the previously unpublished internal rules. Williams was the only one to speak at the hearing, which was attended by nearly the entire bench that serves the Southern District of Florida."

Bush Made 17 More Recess Appointments Last Week. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Cooper, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush bypassed the Senate to make 17 recess appointments to administration posts last week, relying on a constitutional prerogative that lame-duck presidents have exercised to break political logjams on Capitol Hill." Though he has used the method "less than two-term predecessors Bill Clinton and Ronald Reagan," Bush "has shown a willingness to do so to fill administration ranks. … Including last week's appointments, Mr. Bush has used the device 123 times in the past five years. Mr. Clinton made 140 recess appointments during eight years in office, and Mr. Reagan made 243." The Journal adds, "Last week's appointments include Hans von Spakovsky to the Federal Election Commission, a former Republican Party official who sparked controversy with Democrats for pushing Georgia to require voters to produce government-issued identification before voting -- a requirement critics say is racist." Julie Myers, "who some Republicans and Democrats said lacked experience for the position, was appointed to head the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement." Bush also "installed Gordon England as deputy secretary of defense, bypassing holds that two Republican senators put on the appointment. Some senators had questioned whether Mr. England's former employer presented a conflict: He once worked for defense contractor General Dynamics Corp. Dorrance Smith, a former producer for ABC News, was appointed assistant secretary of defense for public affairs over objections by Democratic senators about an opinion article in which Mr. Smith questioned the patriotism of US television networks that broadcast footage from pan-Arab television network al-Jazeera. Benjamin Powell was appointed general counsel to intelligence chief John Negroponte."

DOJ_NMG_0008424

NYTimes Blasts Bush Recess Appointments. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/9, 1.19M) says, "It is disturbing that…Bush has exhibited a grandiose vision of executive power that leaves little room for public debate, the concerns of the minority party or the supervisory powers of the courts." But "it is just plain baffling to watch him take the same regal attitude toward a Congress in which his party holds solid majorities in both houses. Seizing the opportunity presented by the Congressional holiday break," Bush "announced 17 recess appointments -- a constitutional gimmick that allows a president to appoint someone when Congress is in recess to a job that normally requires Senate approval. The appointee serves until the next round of Congressional elections." Reagan and Clinton "made scores of recess appointments. But both of them faced a Congress controlled by the opposition party, while the Senate has been under Republican control for Mr. Bush's entire five years in office." The Times adds, "Bush's record in this area owes less to unreasonable Democrats than to the low caliber of some of his choices, his disinterest in bipartisan consensus and his aversion to any form of accountability, whether to the Senate, the courts or the public."

Bush Seeks To Revive Compassionate Conservative Reputation. The Boston Globe (1/9 Easton, 484K) says President Bush "is seeking to resurrect his early reputation as a compassionate conservative who reaches across the aisle, according to officials close to the White House. … With his State of the Union address three weeks away, White House policy and speech shops are busily crafting a message that portrays Bush as a bold leader but avoids the kind of far-reaching and divisive reform proposals -- such as turning illegal immigrants into guest workers or overhauling Social Security -- that previously landed him in hot water with key voters. … In the coming weeks, the president will continue to advertise progress in Iraq, and the war on terror, as well as highlighting good economic news. … But the public will also hear the president talk more about education initiatives to bridge the wage gap, as well as conservative ideas to address poverty, especially as New Orleans recovers from Hurricane Katrina, according to officials close to the White House. Meanwhile, Bush will continue to approach unlikely audiences." Republican strategists "say Bush's 2006 agenda will reflect the reality that his party needs to retain control of Congress in the face of burgeoning ethics scandals and continued fallout in public opinion polls over the Iraq war. … President Bush, strategists say, needs to be careful not to anger his conservative base, as he did when he proposed a guest-worker immigrant program. Immigration, officials say, is an issue he will continue to approach gingerly, mostly talking broadly about border security."

DeLay Abandons Effort To Return As Majority Leader. Newsweek (1/16, Isikoff, Bailey, Thomas) says the scandal surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff "will cost Congressman DeLay his post as House Majority leader. DeLay had been hoping to get out from under a weak money-laundering charge in an unrelated Texas prosecution in time to retain his leadership role for the coming year. Now, with the Abramoff inquiry likely to drag on, DeLay has announced he is stepping down."

In its cover package, Time (1/16, Tumulty) reports, "The once feared DeLay, whose office had been Abramoff's biggest claim to access and influence on Capitol Hill, announced he would resign as House majority leader. 'I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land,' DeLay wrote in a letter to his G.O.P. colleagues, but added, 'I cannot allow our adversaries to divide and distract our attention.' Because of his tightfisted regime that rewarded loyalists and punished detractors, his departure is sure to set off not just a fight for his old job but also some ugly score settling."

Bush's Inner Circle Sees DeLay As "Necessary Burden." In a separate article in its cover package, Time (1/16, Cooper, Allen) reports on the "longtime chill" between President Bush and DeLay, noting that the distance between the two is "sure to grow with former lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea. Both camps describe the two conservative Texan's relationship as professional 'an alliance, not a friendship.' 'DeLay admires Bush's leadership but still thinks of himself as the strongest conservative on the block,' a DeLay friend says. 'They perceive DeLay as a bull in a china shop. They appreciate him as their protector and retriever.'"

DOJ_NMG_0008425

Time adds that "top Bush advisers tell TIME, the President's inner circle always treated DeLay as a necessary burden."

Blunt, Boehner Running For House Majority Leader. Reuters (1/9, Zargham) reports US Rep. Roy Blunt, "an ally of Rep. Tom DeLay, sought to permanently replace the indicted Texan as majority leader of the House of Representatives on Sunday but faced a challenge from fellow Republican John Boehner, who has had major differences with DeLay." A leadership election "is expected to be held the week of January 30." Blunt "has served as acting majority leader since DeLay was forced to give up the job in September but Boehner is considered a formidable foe, a leadership aide said." DeLay on Sunday "accused Democrats of 'character assassination' and said they were trying to portray him as guilty by association in the influence-peddling scandal involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff. 'Time was the enemy,' DeLay told Fox News on Sunday when asked what prompted his decision not to try to return as majority leader."

The Financial Times (1/9, Yeager) says Blunt "has close ties to Mr DeLay and to K Street…and has been criticised for a series of mis-steps on the House floor in recent months." Boehner "rose to the Republican leadership ranks with Newt Gingrich, the former speaker, but was ousted from his post in 1998. … Several other congressmen are thought to be considering bids, including Mike Pence, the outspoken leader of a group of about 100 conservatives in the House, and Jerry Lewis, a veteran lawmaker who leads the powerful appropriations committee."

The Washington Times (1/9, Dinan, 90K) says that "already, a difference between" Blunt and Boehner "over lobbying reform, a hot topic among many members in the wake of guilty pleas by lobbyist Jack Abramoff." Boehner "said the current system works and pointed to Abramoff's guilty plea as an indication of that. 'Adding more new rules isn't the answer,' Mr. Boehner told the Fox News Channel." Blunt, however, "has made lobbying reform a key part of his pitch to fellow members."

The New York Times (1/9, Hulse, 1.19M) says "the Bush administration and its Congressional allies braced for a potentially divisive internal battle at the start of a crucial campaign year. … For the White House, the leadership fight will complicate President Bush's efforts to press ahead with his political recovery effort after a difficult 2005. It is also likely to distract attention from the agenda he plans to set out in the State of the Union address, which he is expected to deliver on Jan. 31, in the same week as the leadership vote." Bush "had hoped to use January to accomplish two big goals: win the confirmation battle over Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s nomination to the Supreme Court, and show voters that he is overwhelmingly focused on the war in Iraq and the economy."

However, the Christian Science Monitor (1/9, Chaddock, 61K) reports that "from a public-relations standpoint, the decision by Mr. DeLay not to keep his post as House majority leader may give Republicans a boost ahead of this year's midterm elections. After all, he had gone from whip to whipping boy amid complaints that he embodied corruption in Congress" But "by losing DeLay's leadership, Republicans also lose his fundraising prowess and peerless talent for enforcing party discipline on key bills."

USA Today (1/9, Kiely, 2.31M) also says DeLay's "decision to step aside may make it more difficult for Republicans to win close votes in the House. DeLay had a proven record of being able to obtain a victory in a close vote. But the decision also removes a target for Democrats." On Sunday, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "said a "culture of corruption" among Republicans in Washington remains pervasive, even without DeLay." But "the National Republican Senatorial Committee says Democrats also have taken money from donors linked to Abramoff."

Kristol Recommends Pence Or Shadegg. Bill Kristol of The Weekly Standard, on Fox News Sunday (1/8, Hume), said, "The key for the Republicans now…is not to replace DeLay with someone else who has been, fairly or unfairly -- is viewed as being part of this degeneration of the conservative cause from a movement to a business to a racket. … I think it might be time for a fresh face there, someone like Mike Pence, the young, very conservative -- not very conservative -- conservative and aggressive and articulate congressman from Indiana -- someone to come in and put a fresh face on the Republican majority of the House. … I think someone like Pence or John Shadegg from Arizona would help the Republicans re-seize once again the mantle of reformers."

Cornyn Hedges When Asked Whether DeLay Ought To Seek Re-Election. Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (1/8. Russert) if it would be "better for the Republican Party if Tom DeLay did not seek re-election," Sen. John Cornyn did not answer yes or no, but said, "I think what would be best if we allow the process to run its course, the charges against him -- there's a lot of informed judgment that he actually will be acquitted of those charges. … But the truth is, right now, all we know is that individuals, like Mr. Abramoff have plead guilty. Others are standing on their right, a presumption of innocence and insisting on a trial."

Texas Columnist Says Earle Prosecution Has Little Impact On DeLay's Fortunes. In a Wall Street Journal (1/9, 2.11M) op-ed, San Antonio Express-News columnist Jonathan Gurwitz writes, "Poor Ronnie Earle. For more than three years, the Democratic district attorney from Travis County has waged a prosecutorial campaign to bring down Tom DeLay. After strong-arming three different grand juries in Austin last fall, Mr. Earle was finally able to obtain a rickety, three-count indictment of Mr. DeLay for violations of state campaign finance laws. … But the indictment, meager as it is, was sufficient under House Republican rules to force Mr. DeLay to step down temporarily from his position as majority leader. … DeLay's political fortunes are in free fall. And until the full extent of the Abramoff scandal is known, it's not at all clear how far that plunge will take him. What is clear is that his re-election bid -- and, in a broader sense, Republican control of Congress -- is likely to have very little to do with Mr. Earle's legal charades in Austin and everything to do with Mr. DeLay's ethical quandary in Washington."

DOJ_NMG_0008426

In Wake Of Scandals, GOP Leaders Ponder Lobbying Reforms. The Christian Science Monitor (1/9, Feldmann, 61K) reports, "In the wake of lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea on corruption charges, one point seems clear: Congress is now keenly interested in looking at how lobbyists do business, and may well make reforms by next November's elections. Suddenly, everyone on Capitol Hill wants higher standards." For Republican leaders, "the danger is looking like Johnny-come-latelies on reform." For Democrats, "eager to regain control of at least one chamber of Congress this fall, the Abramoff scandal presents a golden opportunity to hammer home their point about a 'GOP culture of corruption.'" The Monitor adds, "From the lobbying industry's perspective, what's clearly needed -- before anyone changes the rules of the game -- is beefed-up oversight."

Roll Call (1/9, Newmyer) also says Republican lawmakers are "scrambling to lay out their plans for cleaning up Congress and to stanch the political bleeding from a widening election-year scandal." In the Senate, "Conrad Burns (Mont.) became the first Republican to back a measure by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) that would impose new disclosure requirements on Members and lobbyists. Burns, locked in a tough re-election fight, is under scrutiny from federal prosecutors for his ties to Abramoff." Meanwhile, "Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) is consulting with colleagues about what shape his own reform package should take."

The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Rogers, 2.11M) adds Speaker Dennis Hastert "returns to the Capitol tomorrow after canceling a trip to India, and he has given House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R., Calif.) a broad mandate to reach out to Democrats and to Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) on overhaul proposals." In an interview, the speaker, "a former high-school civics teacher, spoke of the initiative in personal terms: 'The House needs to exude integrity, and we need to make some changes. ... This is not something that's knee-jerk,' Mr. Hastert said." Hastert also "looks willing to embrace portions of a bipartisan Senate bill introduced by Mr. McCain." The Washington Post (1/9, A2, Weisman, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Hastert Moves To Tighten Rules On Lobbyists," in which it says the Speaker's move "comes months after House Democrats, led by Reps. Martin T. Meehan (Mass.) and Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), and Republican Rep. Christopher Shays (Conn.), unveiled proposals to mandate more disclosure of lobbying contacts, ban most lobbyist-sponsored trips and lengthen the time former House members and staff must wait before taking up lobbying."

Lobbying Reforms Expected To Pass This Year. U.S. News and World Report (1/16, Pound) says the Abramoff scandal "has so unnerved many Republican lawmakers that lobbying reforms are expected to pass this year. Among other changes, such reforms are likely to curb privately funded junkets for lawmakers and require more disclosure by lobbyists of funds spent to influence legislation."

WSJournal Says DeLay Successor Should Reinvigorate GOP's Commitment To Reform. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (1/9, 2.11M) says that by taking himself out of the race for house Majority Leader, Rep. Tom DeLay has "given his GOP colleagues a chance to reinvigorate their leadership, assuming they're alert enough to realize the dangers facing their majority this November. On first glance, we're not sure they are. Speaker Dennis Hastert's response this weekend was to issue a press release declaring his sudden passion for 'lobbying reform.' … The idea seems to be that a ban on lobbyist-paid golf junkets or limits on the House floor privileges of former Members of Congress will prevent the next Jack Abramoff." The Journal adds, "The real House GOP problem isn't about lobbyists so much as it is the atrophying of its principles. As their years in power have stretched on, House Republicans have become more passionate about retaining power than in using that power to change or limit the federal government. … As House Republicans consider replacing Mr. DeLay, they need to choose someone who will reinvigorate their commitment to reforming Washington. And this may mean more change than they'd otherwise prefer entering an election year."

More Commentary. Jeffrey Birnbaum writes in the Washington Post (1/9, D1, 744K), "In an earlier column I recommended that registered lobbyists be barred from raising money for politicians -- at least during congressional sessions -- and I stand by that suggestion. The notion isn't as crazy as it sounds. Several states already have a similar rule and, as we'll see in spades this year, all sorts of new restrictions will be debated in Congress and some of them will almost surely pass as an antidote to the anti-Washington feelings that the Abramoff affair has stirred. … Wider restrictions on lobbyists are coming as well, and many of them may involve campaign contributions. Both House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) have delegated colleagues to devise new lobbying-disclosure legislation. But the bill to watch is authored by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.). Under it, lobbying firms and organizations would have to disclose each fundraising event they host or sponsor for federal candidates and the total amount raised at each such event. The legislation would also require lobbyists to report on their lobbying forms the donations they make to members of Congress and at events that honor members or entities that they created or support. In addition, the bill would force lobbyists to disclose on quarterly reports any gifts worth more than $20 that they gave to lawmakers or their aides, including meals and tickets to events. Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) has a separate plan that would go much further. He would outright ban gifts to lawmakers and staff and would prohibit lobbyists from financing or attending trips with members of Congress. Don't expect any new law to be that extreme, but the fact that he could even countenance such ideas is an indication how serious the problem has become."

DOJ_NMG_0008427

Ruth Marcus writes in the Washington Post (1/9, A19, 744K) notes that lawmakers "with enough clout and party committees" host "getaways all the time: ski weekends in Vail, summer jaunts to Nantucket, Super Bowl outings, golf tournaments with this or that committee chair. … In these heady days after the Jack Abramoff plea and Tom DeLay's departure from the GOP leadership, Democrats like to decry the (as they see it) Republican-only 'culture of corruption.' At least as troubling is the capital's more pervasive, and certainly more bipartisan, culture of coziness, epitomized" by such fundraisers. It is "this latter problem that ought to be foremost in lawmakers' minds as they scramble to write new rules to govern their dealings with lobbyists. Even the strongest rules can't stop a lobbyist or lawmaker bent on corruption; see, e.g., not only Abramoff but also former California congressman Randy Cunningham, who pleaded guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. Certainly, the more disclosure that is required, the fewer temptations that a lobbyist can legally dangle in front of a lawmaker and the less the opportunity for criminal mischief. But where lobbying reform could have its most cleansing effect is not with the crooks in Congress or the private sector but with those who play, more or less, by the rules of a fundamentally flawed system."

VA Regional Offices Found To Be Giving Incorrect Information. Department of Veterans Affairs data indicates that people who call the department's regional offices are more likely to receive completely wrong answers than completely right ones. The Washington Post (1/9, A17, 744K) reports, "To see how well department employees answer typical questions from the public, VA benefits experts in 2004 called each of the 57 regional offices, which process disability claims. The mystery callers, saying they were relatives or friends of veterans inquiring about possible benefits, made 1,089 calls. Almost half the time they got answers that the department said were either completely incorrect or minimally correct. According to an internal memo on the mystery-caller program that is buried deep in the VA Web site, 22 percent of the answers the callers got were 'completely incorrect,' 23 percent were 'minimally correct' and 20 percent were 'partially correct.' Nineteen percent of the answers were 'completely correct,' and 16 percent 'mostly correct.' The program also found that some VA workers were dismissive of some callers and unhelpful or rude to others."

Some Pentagon Analysts Said To Be Skeptical About TRICARE Savings. Syndicated "Military Update" columnist Tom Philpott writes in the Tacoma News (1/7) about "a few Pentagon analysts" who believe the Bush administration will face "a new credibility" gap if TRICARE officials tell Congress it expects to generate $25 billion in savings from raising fees and deductibles on health plans for retirees under 65. Such a figure may draw "skepticism" because 78% of it hinges on an assumption that 600,000 beneficiaries, "facing the higher fees, would stop using TriCare and shift to employer-provided health plans." But, some TRICARE officials don't subscribe to the expected shift since "most employer plans still will cost more."

Novak Says Rove Appears To Have Blundered With New Medicare Drug Benefit. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (1/9) writes that "a few brave souls in the Bush administration admit" that President Bush's "Medicare drug benefit that went into effect Jan. 1 looks like a political blunder of far-reaching consequences. Furthermore, these critics assign major responsibility to Karl Rove. The hideous complexity of the scheme, which has the effect of discouraging seniors from signing up, is only the beginning of difficulties it entails for the president and his party. It will further swell the budget deficit without commensurate political benefits" and "may prove a severe liability for Republicans facing an increasingly hazardous midterm election in November." Rove's "aim was to entice low-to-middle income seniors who vote heavily Democratic and complain about the cost of prescription drugs. That political maneuver was translated by bureaucrats and health-care technicians into a government program so difficult to understand that someone now receiving any prescription drug care would be inclined to stick with the present program even if it seems inadequate." Novak adds that now, with Bush set "to begin his sixth year in office, Medicare drug benefits come into play, a major new entitlement that offends Bush's friends and does not placate his foes. There is not much at this point that can be done about it, except to try to convince seniors and conservatives that the program is really not that bad."

Private Sector Council To Focus On Fixing Federal Procurement System. The Washington Post (1/9, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "With little fanfare over the past two decades, the Private Sector Council has helped federal agencies -- on a one-on-one basis -- fix their business and management problems. The coming year, however, will see the council adding a new dimension and trying to become a catalyst for change, by focusing on government-wide issues, starting with the federal procurement system. … The Private Sector Council is in the planning stages on how to launch an ambitious project to promote change in federal procurement practices, [president Howard] Weizmann said. Tentative plans call for holding half-day seminars and rounding up experts who can talk about best practices, he said. But the goal is not just to talk about "reformation" but also to identify changes that can improve how the government buys about $320 billion in goods and services annually and then test those changes at agencies willing to serve as models, he said."

DOJ_NMG_0008428

Cost Of Postage Stamp Increases By Two Cents. The cost of a US postage stamp rose two cents yesterday, marking the first postal increase in nearly four years. The Washington Post (1/9, A17, Lee, 744K) says the next price jump "may come a lot sooner than that. … The increasing popularity of e-mail and online bill paying has cut into mail volume, while the Postal Service must deliver to an ever-increasing number of addresses (up by 2 million last year). The Postal Service faces competition from United Parcel Service and FedEx, private companies that, unlike the post office, are not legally bound to deliver to every address six days a week. … Although such challenges are expected to drive up postal rates in the future, officials in the Postal Service and in the mailing industry say the current increase is the product of a political impasse in Capitol Hill, not postal operations."

OTHER NEWS:

Wage Gains Remain Below Pre-2001 Recession Levels. American workers are beginning to see wage gains, but USA Today (1/9, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) says the increases are "well below the levels prior to the 2001 recession." USA reports, "Wage growth is starting to pick up, with hourly earnings rising 5 cents in December to $16.34, seasonally adjusted, the Labor Department said Friday. Hourly wages rose 3.1% in the 12 months ended in December, the fastest pace since spring 2003. While improving, wage growth appears to remain below consumer inflation, which advanced 3.5% in the 12 months ended in November."

Greenspan Credits Globalization With Keeping Inflation, Wage Growth Low. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Ip, 2.11M) reports "Buried in the minutes of the Federal Reserve's Dec. 13 policy meeting, released last week, was this bland observation: Fed officials 'noted that robust competition -- including from foreign producers...[was] helping to contain cost and price pressures.' Markets largely ignored the sentence, but it's one of the most important factors guiding Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan in his final weeks at the helm of the nation's central bank. Mr. Greenspan has marveled at how inflation and wage growth have stayed low even as the economy continues to grow robustly and the jobless rate falls below 5%, a level that has often driven up wages and prices. Searching for an explanation, he has hit on globalization. If the Fed thinks growing imports, outsourcing and international investment are holding a lid on wages and prices, then interest rates can be lower than they otherwise would. Indeed, as the minutes show, this is one reason the Fed seems to think it can stop raising rates soon." The Journal adds, "Greenspan's views are clearly rubbing off on his colleagues. 'Globalization has acted as a tail wind for the Fed's -- and other central banks' -- efforts to hold down inflation,' Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas President Richard Fisher said Friday."

Analysis Says Investors Should Focus On FOMC Pronouncements. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Blackstone, 2.11M) says, "Investors seeking clues about future U.S. monetary policy, as well as big market moves, should focus on pronouncements from the Federal Open Market Committee as a whole and not individual members of the Federal Reserve policy body, according to an analysis by a current and a former Fed economist. 'Our results suggest that committee-wide communications have a larger market effect and are more accurate than speeches by individual FOMC members,' Vincent Reinhart, head of the Fed's Monetary Affairs Division, and Brian Sack of Macroeconomic Advisers LLC, and a former Fed economist, wrote in a paper presented Saturday at the annual meeting of the American Economic Association in Boston."

OECD Predicts Moderate Growth For World's Richest Economies. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, Hannon, 2.11M) reports, "The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development said its leading indicator of economic activity rose in November for the sixth straight month, signaling that moderate growth lies ahead in 30 of the world's richest economies. … The indicator is designed to provide early signals of turning points between the expansion and slowdown of industrial activity. The composite leading indicator for the U.S. rose to 105 from 104.3, and its six-month rate of change increased for the second straight month."

Dow Nears Close Above 11,000. The Dow Jones Industrial Average is at a 41/2 year high and is nearing its first close above 11,000 since June 7, 2001. USA Today (1/9, Shell, 2.31M) reports that the ability of the Dow, which is less than 41 points shy of closing above 11,000, "to quickly rebound from its 0.6% loss in 2005 is key. Analysts say the resurgence has the potential to deliver a psychological boost to skeptical investors still smarting over lackluster returns last year and those still gun-shy from the brutal bear market earlier in the decade." According to USA a close above

DOJ_NMG_0008429

11,000 could lift investor confidence, signal an end to the trading range which has kept the Dow "trapped in a narrow, 600-point band since July" and confirm broader market strength."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (1/9, Browning, 2.11M) says, "Major indexes, such as the Dow Jones Industrial Average and the Nasdaq Composite Index, have been rallying lately to multiyear highs but haven't reached record highs in almost six years. Small stocks, on the other hand, have been hitting repeated records. So have indexes of foreign stocks, energy stocks, banking stocks, transportation stocks and stocks whose value closely tracks the economy. … Some people see the strength of these less-followed groups as a very bullish sign for the market. It suggests that, even though gains in the big indexes have slowed or even disappeared in the past two years, the underlying market is resilient. Others reach the opposite conclusion: The failure of the major indexes to lead the market is a sign of the continued hangover at big companies after the excesses of the late 1990s, suggesting that the recent bull market may be running its course. Either way, one thing is clear: In general, the place to be over the past year hasn't been with the rich and the famous. Even after their New Year's surge, the Dow industrials are up just 1.6% since the end of 2004. The Standard & Poor's midcap index, tracking midsize stocks, has climbed 15%. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, not including U.S. stocks, has jumped 20%. The Dow Jones Transportation Average, fueled by soaring trucking concerns, has advanced 11%."

Dollar Gets Off To Slow Start In 2006. In the first two days of trading after last Monday's holiday, the US dollar fell 2.5% against, marking its largest two-decline against the European currency. According to the Wall Street Journal (1/9, Karmin, 2.11M), despite a "surprisingly strong performance in 2005," the dollar has "tumbled out of the gate in what some worry may be an ominous sign for 2006. … The U.S. currency hit three-month lows against the euro and Swiss franc Friday morning, and in late New York trading, the dollar was down 0.4% against the euro at $1.2154. It fell even harder against the yen, sliding 1.3% to 114.4165 yen. That approached a three-month low against the Japanese currency, too."

Schwarzenegger Aims To Rebuild State, Image With Large Public Works Plan. Following up on reports from last week, the Christian Science Monitor (1/9, Wood, 61K) relates that California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) "has decided that the proper path to California's future -- and his own rehabilitation -- is dotted with new bridges, highways, and levees ... and carpool lanes, commuter rails, and crime labs ... and schools and prisons, and ports. Two months after voters rejected a series of Schwarzenegger-backed government reforms, and months before his own reelection primary in June, he has announced a 10-year, $222 billion plan to shore up the state's crumbling infrastructure. … 'The governor is switching from concepts to concrete,' says Jack Pitney, political scientist a Claremont McKenna College. … With approval ratings at 32 percent, Schwarzenegger is recasting himself in a role in which he can point to tangible accomplishments come election time next November, say Pitney and others. … 'He is moving back to the center where he was elected, because voters did not take kindly to his becoming more partisan and going around Democratic opponents to the people,' says Sherry Jeffe, political scientist at the University of Southern California. 'As the incumbent coming up for reelection, he has to produce a record to run on. That's what this is about.'"

Governor, Son Suffer Minor Injuries In Motorcycle Collision With Car. The Los Angeles Times (1/9, Krikorian, 958K) reports that Schwarzenegger "and his 12-year-old son were slightly injured Sunday afternoon when their motorcycle collided with a car near the family's home in Brentwood, his office said. The low-speed collision occurred about 3:15 p.m. when Schwarzenegger was riding his Harley-Davidson with his oldest son, Patrick, traveling in the motorcycle's sidecar, according to Margita Thompson, the governor's press secretary." Schwarzenegger "and his son were taken to St. John's Hospital in Santa Monica. Both were released after being treated for minor cuts and bruises, Thompson said, noting that the governor received 15 stitches in his lip. The governor and his oldest son were wearing helmets at the time of the accident, Thompson said. The other driver, she added, was not injured."

Maryland GOP Hoping To Build On Ehrlich's Election Success. The Washington Post (1/9, A1, Mosk, 744K) reports that Maryland Republicans are hoping to build on Gov. Robert Ehrlich's (R) 2002 election win. The Post relates, "True party realignment remains a distant goal, they say, but the political season that begins as the General Assembly convenes Wednesday will be guided by their desire for lasting influence in state affairs." Maryland GOP officials "said the party is borrowing many of the ideas that started Virginia down the path to realignment three decades ago. In addition to their focus on the Maryland governor's race, they believe the bid by Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) to capture an open U.S. Senate seat could provide inroads into the state's most reliable Democratic voters: African Americans. The GOP is targeting the state's populous blue-collar suburbs and fast-growing exurbs, where party leaders hope to pick up as many as 14 seats in the House of Delegates and seven in the Senate this November. And they're already contemplating 2010, when a win in the governor's column could give them control over redistricting and crack open a state where, just a few years ago, Republicans felt like foreigners."

DOJ_NMG_0008430

Ehrlich To Propose 15% Reduction In Property Tax Rate. The Washington Post (1/9, B1, Wagner, 744K) reports that Gov. Ehrlich "today will propose reducing the state property tax rate by 15 percent -- a 2-cent rate cut -- and expanding a tax break that helps low-income homeowners pay their bills. The election-year proposal would roll back part, but not all, of a property tax increase initiated by Ehrlich (R) in 2003 to help fill a gaping budget hole that he inherited upon taking office. Aides said Ehrlich will also call on local leaders to reduce property taxes they collect by similar percentages -- a move that would have a far greater effect on homeowners because localities rely much more heavily on the levy than the state does." Ehrlich "will argue at an event in Baltimore County this morning that a reduction in the state property tax of 2 cents per $100 in assessed value is justified because a reversal in Maryland's fiscal outlook has resulted in a surplus of more than $1 billion." The Post notes, "The move would save the owner of a $400,000 home $80 next year and cost the state about $98 million in lost revenue, Ehrlich's aides said. Given the rise in home values, most tax bills probably would still rise despite the proposed rate cut."

Warner Critical Of DC "Partisanship." The Washington Times (1/9, Bellantoni, 90K) reports that outgoing Virginia Gov. Mark Warner "thinks President Bush and the U.S. Congress could learn some lessons from Virginia, such as lawmakers putting aside partisanship to get the job done." Warner "said cooperation has led Virginia lawmakers to improve the state's finances and enabled them to fund much-needed projects, such as the cleanup of the Chesapeake Bay. 'In Washington, people are more interested in scoring partisan points than getting things done, and I think there is a real yearning in this country for action,'" Warner said in an interview. Warner added, "To a degree, both parties are guilty. … If it's not absolutely their way, they say they'd rather have no action than their ideologically pure solutions. I think that's crazy." After leaving office on Saturday, Warner "immediately will start working full time on his Northern Virginia-based political action committee called Forward Together. His goal for the PAC is to find and fund candidates who he thinks can move the nation forward." Warner "supporters have no doubt that the PAC is a first step toward Mr. Warner's seeking the U.S. presidency in 2008." But Warner "said he's not sure of his next step. 'I haven't decided what, if anything, I am going to do in politics, I really haven't,' he said."

In Split With Bush, McClellan Backs His Mother For Texas Governor. The New York Times (1/9, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports in its "White House Letter" column that the split between President Bush, who is supporting incumbent Republican Gov. Rick Perry in the Texas governor's race, and White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan, who is supporting his mother, state comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn is "just the latest chapter in Mr. McClellan's nearly four decades in politics with his mother, who is as voluble as her son is restrained. Still, Ms. Strayhorn's most recent endeavor is one of the more bizarre moments in Texas politics and also in the West Wing." The Times adds, "Mr. McClellan, the youngest of Ms. Strayhorn's four sons, was 9 when his mother, then a Democrat, was first elected mayor of Austin, a nonpartisan position. Over the next six years, from 1977 to 1983, she served three terms. In most of that time she was a single mother who wove her children into her public life. … Mr. McClellan went on to graduate from the University of Texas and to run three more successful campaigns for his mother: her election and re-election as a Texas railroad commissioner and her election as comptroller." The Times also reports, "As for the White House press secretary, he said that 'the president considers my mother a friend,' but that he himself had no immediate plans to work in his mother's campaign or, for that matter, to leave his job anytime soon."

Food Industry Makes Progress In Effort To Ban State Labeling Laws. The food industry has made progress in its efforts to urge Congress and the federal government to ban state food labeling laws. According to the Wall Street Journal (1/9, Zhang, 2.11M), state laws "are often tougher than federal Food and Drug Administration rules or cover substances not regulated by federal law. … A bill that would override many such laws sailed through the House Energy and Commerce Committee in December, and its sponsors include more than half the members of the House. A Senate version hasn't been introduced and it's unclear if the bill will move soon, but it already has set off a firestorm, pitting the food industry against consumer activists and state food-safety officials."

More Companies Phasing Out Pension Plans. ABC World News Tonight (1/8, story 6, :45, Woodruff) reported, "More and more American companies are phasing out pension plans for their employees. On Friday, IBM announced it will shift more than 1,000 workers from traditional pensions to 401(k) retirement plans." ABC (Stark) added, "IBM says beginning in 2008, it will freeze the traditional benefits for its thousands of US workers and shift its work force to a less-generous 401(k) plan, saving the company almost $3 billion a year. Last month, it was Verizon; before that, Motorola, Hewlett Packard and Sears. Traditional defined-benefit pension plans are a vanishing piece of the American dream."

Workers May Find Movement Away From Traditional Pensions Difficult. According to the New York

DOJ_NMG_0008431

Times (1/9, Walsh, 1.19M), "For many workers, the movement away from traditional pensions is going to be difficult. Already there are signs that people are retiring later, or taking other jobs to support themselves in old age. Participation in a pension plan is involuntary, but most 401(k) plans let employees decide whether to contribute any money - or none at all. Research shows that many people fail to put money into their retirement accounts, or invest it poorly once it is there."

Charitable Donors Defy Predictions. Despite predictions from nonprofit groups that the billions of dollars Americans gave to relief funds last year in the wake of the South Asia tsunami, Hurricane Katrina and the Pakistan earthquake would result in "donor fatigue," the Washington Post (1/9, B1, Salmon, 744K) reports that 2005 "was very good to many nonprofit organizations in the Washington area and elsewhere." Anthony De Cristofaro, executive director of the Combined Federal Campaign of the National Capital Area, the annual fundraising drive among local federal employees, "said he expects the fund drive, which will conclude at the end of the month, to comfortably top last year's total of $56 million. The Jewish Federation of Greater Washington had an exceptional year, said chief executive Misha Galperin. Gifts to the federation's endowment fund doubled to $18.3 million, contributions to its annual fundraising drive climbed by $2 million to $24 million and the federation raised $1.6 million for tsunami and Katrina relief funds, he said." The Post adds,, "The news is also good nationally." According to the Chronicle of Philanthropy, "many of the nation's biggest charities are raising as much or more than they did in the late 1990s, when the strong economy and booming stock market boosted charitable donations a startling 50 percent from 1996 to 2000."

Sharon's Doctors Prepare To Ease Him Out Of Coma. USA Today (1/9, Gutman, 2.31M) reports, "Advisers said Sunday that Ariel Sharon was waging a fierce comeback from a life-threatening stroke. Doctors planned to start easing the Israeli leader out of a medically induced coma today. Shlomo Mor Yosef, director of Hadassah University Hospital, said Sunday that a CT scan of Sharon's brain showed improvement and that his vital signs were normal. He said Sharon, 77, remained in critical condition."

The Washington Post (1/9, A12, Wilson, 744K) reports, "Doctors plan to begin the delicate process of reviving Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon from a medically induced coma Monday and start assessing the scope of any brain damage he might have suffered during a massive stroke last week. Sharon, 77, underwent a scheduled brain scan Sunday so doctors could measure intracranial pressure and look for new bleeding. The results showed the condition of his brain had improved slightly, a determination consistent with two previous scans taken since the last emergency surgery to stop hemorrhaging. The director of Hadassah-Ein Kerem Hospital, where Sharon is being treated, said the most recent test showed that the level of swelling in Sharon's brain had declined overnight. His overall condition remains critical but stable."

The New York Times (1/9, Altman, 1.19M) reports, "As Israeli doctors try to bring Prime Minister Ariel Sharon gradually out of a medically induced coma today, they will be seeking clues to the severity of the damage from the potentially deadly hemorrhagic stroke he suffered last week. The doctors are expected to massage and pinch Mr. Sharon's skin, vigorously rub his chest and ask him to perform simple tasks like blinking as part of their examination to begin to determine the degree of paralysis and impairment of his intellectual skills. Doctors have said they assume there will be some impairment."

Sharon Seen As Unable To Ever Return To Office. NBC Nightly News (1/8, story 3, 2:00, Fletcher) added, "Taking Sharon out of his induced coma will give the nation a better idea whether" Sharon's "60-year career…is over. … Experts agree there is no chance he will return to his job as prime minister." The Washington Times/AP (1/9, Nessman) reports, "One of Mr. Sharon's doctors said that even if the prime minister survives, he would not be able to return to office. Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told the Cabinet he would work to carry on Mr. Sharon's political legacy."

The New York Times (1/9, Erlanger, Kraft, 1.19M) reports, "Israel continued its nervous watch over the sickbed of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Sunday, with television reporters educating the country about his condition using plastic models of brains and exploring hypotheses about whether he should have had different treatment before his devastating stroke on Wednesday. Israeli politicians, normally an obstreperous and aggressive bunch, maintained a self-imposed moratorium on political campaigning out of respect for the stricken prime minister - and out of a sense that the country would not reward those who returned to the normal slash-and-burn style too soon."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/9, Prusher, Mitnick, 61K) reports, "But Sunday, as Prime Minister Ariel Sharon lay in a drug-induced coma, many here wondered whether Olmert, now acting prime minister, has the leadership qualities to assume Mr. Sharon's mantle, and takeover the newly fashioned centrist party, Kadima. A crucial election for Israel is scheduled for late March."

White House Preparing For Post-Sharon Era. ABC World News Tonight (1/8, story 4, 3:15, Woodruff) reported, "Few expect Sharon to go back to work after his stroke. So, tonight, Washington and Israel are preparing to go back to work without Sharon at its leader." ABC (Reynolds) added, "With Ariel Sharon incapacitated, there is no question that the United States has lost an influential partner in a strategicallyimportant region. And George Bush has lost a friend." Yossi Klein Halevi, Shalem Center: "Bush not only likes Sharon personally, but admires him…as a military hero." Reynolds: "It will be hard, if not impossible, for whomever emerges from Israel's March elections as a successor to Sharon, to approximate that close, personal bond with Bush. Acting Prime Minister, Ehud Olmert, would try to continue Sharon's policies and may enjoy white house support. But he lacks a rapport" with Bush. That "spells more trouble for the road map to peace that the Bush Administration has championed, even though it has, so far, led nowhere."

DOJ_NMG_0008432

The Christian Science Monitor (1/9, LaFranchi, 61K) reports, "In its five years, the Bush administration has been reluctant to press for bold steps from the parties, and it's unlikely to alter that pattern now, many experts say. Officially, neither the White House nor the State Department is offering much diplomatic direction for the post-Sharon era, suggesting that doing so would be distasteful as the prime minister fights for his life. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice postponed a trip to Australia in order to be in Washington at a crucial juncture in Middle East affairs, while diplomatic sources said the White House was quietly making contingency plans in the event of Sharon's passing."

Sharon's Accomplishments Recounted. The Washington Post's (1/9) Lally Weymouth writes, "In power, Sharon showed that the charm could often trump the steeliness -- or at least mask it long enough for him to forge both a consensus in Israel and a close relationship with the American government. One of the marks of great leadership is the capacity to undo what one has done if it can contribute to the greater good. Sharon had the courage to dismantle the very settlements he had built."

Arab-Israeli Peace Deal Seen As Unlikely In Bush's Second Term. Time (1/16, McGeary) reports, "The political instability confronting both Israelis and Palestinians jeopardizes Washington's hopes of salvaging some kind of Arab-Israeli peace deal by the end of President George W. Bush's second term. Having hitched their strategy to the success of Sharon's policy of separation from the Palestinians, Administration officials scrambled to put a positive spin on the somber events in Jerusalem. … A senior State Department official says the U.S. believes that 'progress is still possible' without Sharon. Whether that remains true will depend on how Israelis handle a crisis that so few saw coming."

Sharon Called "Bold And Cunning Defender" Of Israel. In its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (1/16, Derfner) examines the legacy of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, noting that "no one in modern times transformed this country as much as Ariel Sharon did. And no Israeli leader transformed himself as did the legendary fighter once he finally, after a half century of great deeds and misdeeds on the battlefield, became prime minister." Sharon "was a bold and cunning defender of his tiny nation in a hostile, dangerous part of the world."

Candidates To Succeed Sharon Quietly Preparing For Campaign. A story in Newsweek's (1/16) cover package says the entrants in Israel's upcoming elections are, as "quietly as possible, not wanting to seem disrespectful," preparing "for the run of their lives." Newsweek provides a short profile of the candidates. Newsweek reports, "Political partnerships don't get much tighter than the team of Ariel Sharon and Ehud Olmert, 60. The two men made a great match, even though their personalities were strikingly different. In contrast to the career warrior, the former Jerusalem mayor is a scholar, with diplomas in philosophy, psychology and law. But the pair worked together seamlessly." The Labor Party "has big dreams of regaining its long-lost ruling-party status, and Peretz, a social democrat, has pledged that if he wins the top job in the March elections, he'll produce a peace agreement within four years." Justice Minister Tzipi Livni "was among the first Likud members who jumped to Kadima. The 47-year-old attorney supports the idea of territorial handovers as the only way to forestall the day when Arabs outnumber Jews in Israel." Former Labor Leader Shimon Peres "is still in the game." Polls "are saying that Peres (despite longstanding public doubts about his toughness on terror) could outdo Olmert as Kadima's pilot in March." Netanyahu "could step into the leadership vacuum—if he can move toward the political center without looking like an abject opportunist."

Olmert Seen As Sharon's Alter Ego. In a separate story in its cover package, U.S. News and World Report (1/16) says "the closest Ariel Sharon had to an alter ego is the man now taking his place as prime minister, Ehud Olmert. … The electoral question is whether the politicians and voters who had followed Sharon to Kadima will stand by Olmert. The initial indications are yes. All of the politicians who bolted Likud and Labor have declared their loyalty to him as the new party's new leader." US News adds, "Kadima held its lead in the first opinion poll following Sharon's major stroke. It also showed that the only Kadima member more popular than Olmert is Shimon Peres, 82, who left the Labor Party after losing the leadership to Amir Peretz in a November showdown. Peretz has since stumbled."

Observers Say Netanyahu Must Move To Center To Gain Wide Backing. In a separate story in its cover package, Newsweek (1/16, Peraino, Ephron, Bartholet) reports that observers "believe that [Benjamin] Netanyahu will have to move toward the center to garner wide backing, and that is dangerous for him. In some ways, Netanyahu is the anti-Sharon: a slick talker and American-style campaigner who enjoys political theater. He's telegenic, smart and articulate. But he also has a reputation as an opportunist." Newsweek adds, "Yet none of Sharon's potential successors in Kadima has much magnetism, either. Peres certainly has great stature, but he is seen by many as unreliable on security issues. Olmert has been a fixture in Israeli politics for years, and he is a longtime proponent of unilateral action to leave parts of the occupied territories. … But he benefited from being close to Sharon."

DOJ_NMG_0008433

Gaza Said To Have Descended Into Near-Anarchy. The New York Times (1/9, Smith, 1.19M) reports, "In Gaza City on Saturday night, one man was killed during a gun battle between armed militants and the police, while elsewhere in town another armed group threatened to destroy the local offices of the satellite television station Al Arabiya, which is based in Dubai. The men were angry at the station for broadcasting a documentary that suggested that female Palestinian suicide bombers had been put under pressure by male relatives. Farther south that same day, gunmen cordoned off a neighborhood in Khan Yunis, Gaza's second largest city, while members of a well-known drug-smuggling family battled with the Palestinian police. Eleven policemen were reported wounded. And in Rafah, along the Egyptian border, armed men from the Abu Taha family stopped cars on Sunday, checking identification papers in hopes of catching members of Al Masri, the rival family with which they have been waging a deadly feud. While the world is watching Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's fight for life and wondering who will govern Israel in his absence, people in Gaza are far more preoccupied with growing lawlessness and tension between armed factions since Israel's withdrawal."

Iran Ready To Resume Nuclear Program. The Washington Times/AP (1/9, Karimi) reports, "Iran said yesterday that inspectors from the U.N. nuclear-watchdog agency would remove seals from some nuclear facilities by today, opening the way for Tehran to resume research on fuel production. The development heightened concerns in the West that Iran was moving toward building atomic weapons. … Inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) arrived in Tehran on Saturday to remove seals they had affixed to the research sites after Iran voluntarily agreed to stop all enrichment-related activities more than two years ago as a confidence-building measure."

Reuters (1/9, Hafezi) reports, "Iran said it was ready to remove U.N. seals at some atomic research and development sites on Monday, a move that would raise the stakes in Tehran's dispute with the West over its nuclear program. European Union and U.S. officials say that, if Iran goes ahead with the move, diplomatic efforts to settle the issue would be endangered and that could lead to Tehran being referred to the U.N. Security Council for possible sanctions."

EU, IAEA Urge Iran To Rethink Nuclear Program's Resumption. The Financial Times (1/9, Smyth, Minder) reports, "The move brought predictable condemnation from the European Union, which has led international negotiations with Tehran over its nuclear programme. … Iranian and EU officials are due to meet on January 18 in Vienna. Iran has backed away from a comprehensive suspension of nuclear activities begun two years ago to calm international fears it wanted to develop atomic weapons. It is now approaching the most sensitive suspended part of the programme, the actual enrichment of uranium. The nature and extent of the resumed research and development remained unclear yesterday, with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN watchdog, seeking clarification after Iranian officials failed to appear for a meeting in Vienna last Thursday. Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the agency, urged Iran to co-operate with the UN agency in an interview with the UK's Sky News."

Iran, Russia To Continue Enrichment Discussions Next Month. The AP (1/9) reports, "Russian officials, meanwhile, conferred with Iranian counterparts here about Moscow's proposal that both countries conduct uranium enrichment, a process that can produce nuclear fuel for reactors or weapons, on Russian territory. They agreed to continue those talks next month."

Jordan Passes Measure Preventing Surrender Of US Citizens To ICC. Reuters (1/9) reports, "Jordan's parliament on Sunday approved a law that prevents Amman handing over U.S. citizens accused of war crimes to the international criminal court, lawmakers said. … Jordan's pro-government 110-seat parliament voted by a large majority in favor of the law which was viewed by rights bodies and some deputies as a violation of Jordan's obligations under the court's founding Rome Statute and eroded its sovereignty. Lawmakers said the law requires Jordan to refuse to hand over to the ICC persons accused of war crimes if they are U.S. nationals and non-nationals working for the U.S. government. Instead, Jordan would be required to surrender them to the custody of the U.S. government, in apparent contravention to Jordan's obligations to the ICC."

King Abdullah To Participate In National Prayer Breakfast. The Washington Times (1/9, Duin, 90K) reports, "Jordan's King Abdullah II, whose interfaith efforts over the past year impressed Catholics, Jews and Muslims alike, will have a supporting role at this year's National Prayer Breakfast, according to a key aide. … Plans are to have the king offer a prayer or say a few words at the Feb. 2 breakfast, then give the keynote speech at a lunch for evangelical leaders that same day."

Georgian President Says Russia Exerts Energy Control Over Former Soviet States. Mikheil Saakashvili, President of the Republic of Georgia, writes in the Washington Post (1/9, A19, 744K), "Last week Russia announced that it would halt and then -- not long after -- that it was restarting natural gas shipments to Ukraine. It was a momentary crisis that should have wide-ranging ramifications for the economic security of Europe and raise questions about any notion of a role for Russia as a reliable energy supplier. Russia's arbitrary cutoff sent a clear message to the European Union: There can be no energy security when an undependable neighbor is willing and able to use its energy resources as a weapon in political influence. … Russia uses not only its energy supplies but also the vast energy transportation network that former Soviet states inherited -- and depend on -- to exercise energy control." Saakashvilli adds, "For Georgians, our path is clear: We are moving aggressively to diversify our energy sources and transportation networks. The recently completed Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan pipeline, which brings natural gas from Azerbaijan to Turkey and crosses Georgia is a critical piece of this effort. For Europe, the Black Sea states hold the key for new routes to bring in energy supplies from the Middle East and Central Asia. We are willing to work closely both with our European partners and with Russia to make the whole system transparent, predictable and immune to -- or insulated from -- political shocks."

DOJ_NMG_0008434

Haitian Elections Postponed Again. The Christian Science Monitor (1/9, Harman, 61K) reports, "Sunday was supposed to be election day in Haiti. Only it never happened. Again. … Preparations for the first vote here since a rebellion ousted President Jean-Bertrand Aristide nearly two years ago have fallen short. 'The best you can say is that this process has been a political, technical, logistical, and financial fiasco,' says Mark Schneider, senior vice president of the International Crisis Group in Washington, D.C. Originally scheduled for Nov. 6, and subsequently postponed four times, Sunday's voting day came and went here without a vote being cast. Constitutionally, a new government must be in place by Feb. 7. That will not happen, but officials announced Sunday that Feb. 7 will be the new election date."

Haitian Business Leaders Call For General Strike. USA Today (1/9, Harman, 2.31M) reports, "Business leaders called for a general strike today, two days after the commander of the U.N. peacekeeping force in Haiti was found dead of an apparent suicide. The strike, orchestrated by Haiti's largest business association, was organized before the death of Lt. Gen. Urano Teixeira da Matta Bacellar on Saturday. It was called to protest growing lawlessness and to pressure the multinational United Nations force under Bacellar's command to get tough with gangs. … The Brazilian commander's death comes amid growing anarchy in the capital, particularly in the sprawling Cité Soleil slum."

Turkey Says Half-Dozen More May Have Bird Flu. ABC World News Tonight (1/8, story 8, 2:30, Woodruff) reported that Turkish health officials "say they believe half a dozen more people may have been infected with the deadly bird flu" in the "first cases from the virus of birds jumping to humans outside of China and Southeast Asia."

The Washington Post (1/9, A16, Sipress, 744K) reports "the preliminary test results, which must still be confirmed by the World Health Organization, came days after a teenage brother and sister from a village in the far east of Turkey died from the H5N1 strain of bird flu in the first confirmed human cases of the disease outside Southeast Asia and China. Bird flu was also suspected in the death of a third sibling, but test results remain inconclusive. Turkish medical authorities reported Sunday that as many as 10 Turks have been infected. Some of these cases have appeared in family clusters, raising concern that the disease might have begun spreading more easily among people. But international health experts said they find it more likely that the human cases in Turkey were caused by contact with infected birds, when children were playing with slaughtered chickens or crawling into henhouses, for example."

The New York Times (1/9, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports, "A flurry of new reports of avian influenza in humans and animals emerged Sunday from various parts of Turkey, and international health officials said they had come to believe that the disease had been simmering in the eastern part of the country for months, even though it was reported there only in late December. A team of experts, including representatives of the World Health Organization, accompanied by the Turkish health minister, was scrambling to determine the full extent of the outbreaks. The group was heading by bus on Sunday to the worst-hit areas in and around the city of Van, where the airport was closed by severe weather."

Russia, Iran Take Steps To Diminish Exposure. The Financial Times (1/9, Boland, Jack) reports, "Iran closed a border crossing with Turkey on Sunday and senior Russian health officials advised holidaymakers against visiting the country as the bird flu virus spread to the outskirts of the capital Ankara. … Turkey has been culling poultry for days to try to contain the bird flu outbreak.'

Conservatives Continue To Lead In Run-Up To Canadian Elections. USA Today (1/9, 2.31M) reports, "After 12 years of Liberal Party rule in Canada, Conservatives are making a contest of national elections Jan. 23. Liberal Prime Minister Paul Martin squares off tonight in a nationally televised debate with Conservative Party leader Stephen Harper. Pollsters say Harper's underdog Conservatives have seized the momentum in the campaign. Canada last had a Conservative-led government under Brian Mulroney in 1993. … Although all the results are within the margins of error, five recent national polls show Conservatives leading by 2-5 percentage points. The latest poll, released Sunday by SES Research, shows Conservatives would get 34% of the vote and Liberals 32% if elections were held now. The far-left New Democratic Party (NDP), the separatist Bloc Quebecois and the Green Party split the remainder. A large number of Canadians — 17% — are undecided and could determine the outcome of the elections, according to the SES poll done for CPAC, a public affairs cable TV channel similar to C-SPAN."

DOJ_NMG_0008435

Man Shot At Border Is Top News In Mexico. Under the headline "At Border, Fatal Shot Still Rings," the Los Angeles Times (1/9, Marosi, 958K) reports, "From his rickety apartment in the shanty-lined hills of Colonia Libertad, Giovanni Rubio said he witnessed a Border Patrol agent fatally shoot a man who had crossed onto US soil. 'We want him electrocuted, and we want to watch,' said Rubio, 22, referring to the agent whose actions sparked an international furor. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, visiting San Diego last week, offered his own take on the increasingly volatile situation on the border: 'Anybody who assaults an agent is asking for trouble.' The differing reactions to the shooting on one of the most violence-prone stretches along the 2,000-mile border with Mexico illustrate the deepening cultural gulf between two nations separated by an increasingly fortified frontier." The Times adds, "In Mexico, the Dec. 30 shooting of Guillermo Martinez Rodriguez, 18, topped media coverage all last week — 'Shot in the back,' blared one headline — and prompted President Vicente Fox's administration to make a formal request for an investigation. … Mexican media have portrayed Martinez as a hard-working father of two who had crossed into the US in search of work. But Border Patrol officials said Martinez was a smuggler who had been arrested 11 times on suspicion of guiding migrants across the border."

In Caracas, Belafonte Calls Bush "Greatest Terrorist In The World." The AP (1/9, James) reports, "The American singer and activist Harry Belafonte called President Bush "the greatest terrorist in the world" on Sunday and said millions of Americans support the socialist revolution of Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez. Belafonte led a delegation of Americans including the actor Danny Glover and the Princeton University scholar Cornel West that met the Venezuelan president for more than six hours late Saturday."

Hun Sen Cracking Down On Cambodia's Remaining Opposition Groups. The New York Times (1/9, Mydans, 1.19M) reports that in Cambodia the "harshest political crackdown in years is under way" with "some analysts" describing it as "the final stage in Prime Minister Hun Sen's drive to consolidate unchallenged power. Over the past year, he has choked off the last effective political opposition while continuing to marginalize the monarchy, manipulate the courts and intimidate labor unions and other civic groups. … Now, with a series of arrests and lawsuits on defamation and related charges, Mr. Hun Sen is for the first time directly attacking the human rights groups that, by default, serve as a de facto democratic opposition."

Brazil Succeeds In Creating Cost-Effective Ethanol. The Wall Street Journal (1/9, A1, Luhnow, Samor, 2.11M) reports, "After nearly three decades of work, Brazil has succeeded where much of the industrialized world has failed: It has developed a cost-effective alternative to gasoline." Ethanol made from sugar cane is "an option that's available at 29,000 gas stations from Rio to the Amazon. A comparable tank of gasoline would have cost him $36. … At current prices, Brazil can make ethanol for about $1 a gallon, according to the World Bank. That compares with the international price of gasoline of about $1.50 a gallon. Even though ethanol gets less mileage than gasoline, in Brazil it's still cheaper per mile driven. As a result, ethanol now accounts for as much as 20% of Brazil's transport fuel market."

More Than Two Million Muslims In Mecca For Hajj. ABC World News Tonight (1/8, story 8, 2:30, Woodruff) reported that "more than two million Muslims" are making the ritual hajj in Mecca. The "pilgrimage has been marred by the deaths of 76 people, when a pilgrims' hostel collapsed."

John Paul II's Assailant To Be Freed This Week. NBC Nightly News (1/8, story 4, 1:00, Seigenthaler) reported that Mehmet Ali Agca, who tried to assassinate Pope John Paul II in 1981, "is expected to be freed from a Turkish prison sometime this week." The Pope "publicly forgave his attacker, who later was pardoned at the Pontiff's urging."

The New York Times (1/9, Arsu, 1.19M) reports Agca "served 19 years in Italy for shooting the pope and then was sent back to Turkey, in 2000, and has been in prison since then for killing Abdi Ipekci, a newspaper editor, in 1979."

The Washington Post (1/9, A12, Hacaoglu, 744K) reports, "His motive for shooting John Paul in the abdomen on May 13, 1981, remains unclear."

US, South Korea Urged To Enter Into Free Trade Agreement. In an op-ed for the Financial Times (1/9) William Rhodes, chairman of the US-Korea Business Council and senior vice-chairman of Citigroup, writes, "In recent months, there has been increasing discussion among business and government leaders in the US and South Korea about launching negotiations for a free trade agreement. This would bring major economic benefits to both the US and South Korea, the world's tenth largest economy, and strengthen one of America's most important Asian alliances. For many years, economic ties between South Korea and the US have been close – it is America's seventh largest trading partner. China recently surpassed the US as South Korea's largest export market, although the US continues to be the largest source of foreign investment into South Korea, mainly in financial services and manufacturing."

DOJ_NMG_0008436

Multinational Trade Organizations Said To Have Lost Power. The Washington Post (1/9, A18, 744K) editorializes, "The latest round of tariff-cutting talks under the auspices of the WTO is stalling, not because countries oppose trade but because they do not want to make concessions in this multilateral forum. Ambitions to deepen the WTO's power to settle disputes beyond trade into labor and environmental issues have (fortunately) fizzled, while WTO rulings against protectionist European food regulation or American cotton subsidies don't (unfortunately) cause those policies to be reformed quickly. The same story holds for NAFTA. In the 1990s there was talk of building NAFTA tribunals on labor and the environment into influential voices. It hasn't happened."

NYTimes Criticizes US Corporation's Support For Indonesian Military. The New York Times (1/9, 1.19M) editorializes, "Freeport-McMoRan, an American company that operates a giant open-pit copper and gold mine in Papua, is a major contributor to Indonesia's economy. The company is also one of Indonesia's most reckless polluters and a source of hard cash - cash the company concedes is protection money - for the Indonesian military, which has one of the worst human rights records anywhere. … Freeport's environmental record and its support for the Indonesian military have caused rumbles in Washington, particularly among human rights advocates like Patrick Leahy." The Times concludes, "Setting aside for the moment Freeport's environmental horror show, the company is not doing Indonesia's civilian authorities any favors by underwriting the generals. Freeport describes its payments as an essential cost of doing business. But it appears not to have measured the costs to democracy."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Linked Charities Bank On The Chavez Name."
"Mission Missing Its Mark."
"Hopes Founder On 'Big Lie'."
"Polar Bears Face New Toxic Threat: Flame Retardants."
"GOP Puts Lobbying Scandal In Bull's-Eye."
"At Border, Fatal Shot Still Rings."
"U.S. Crash In Iraq Kills 12."

USA Today:
"Goodbyes Begin For W.Va. Miners."
"Fatal Crashes."
"'Next frontier' In Heart Disease: Undoing It."
"17 Killed In Crash, Attacks In Iraq."

New York Times:
"Diabetes and Its Awful Toll Quietly Emerge As A Crisis."
"More Companies Ending Promises For Retirement."
"Lobbyist's Firm Escapes Fallout From A Scandal."
"Issues And (Possible) Answers: A Primer On The Alito Hearings."
"A Commitment To Marriage, And To New Orleans."

Washington Post:
"12 Killed In N. Iraq Helicopter Crash."
"Colleges Learn To Be Good Neighbors."
"Cat Owner Turns To DNA In Pet Whodunit, But Case Isn't Closed."
"Hearings Today."
"Proving His Mettle In Reagan Justice Dept.."
"GOP Plots Ascent On Ehrlich's Heels."

Washington Times:
"Boehner Takes On Blunt."
"Iraqis Recieve Training In Iran."
"Schumer Warns Of Filibuster Of Alito."
"Military Academics See Less Harassmanent."
"Adams Morgan Crime Down With More Police."
"Jordan's King To Speak At US Prayer Breakfast."
"Italian Court To Decide If Teaching Jesus Breaks Law."

Detroit Free Press:
"Car Wars '06 Begin."
"New Models Position Lincoln To Chase Cadillac."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"12 Troops Die In Iraq Copter Crash."
"Bill Would Channel Schools' Spending."
"Democrats Threaten Filibuster Alito."
"Shock Jock Boosts Stock Of Burgeoning Satellite Studio."

Dallas Morning News:
"Young's Next Stop Is NFL."
"Alito Memos Likely Targets."
"Letter Confirms Site Of Bluesman's Recordings."
"Copter Crash Caps Bad Week In Iraq."
"Minorities Don't Feel Top-Ticket Excitement."
"DeLay Ends Leadership Fight."

Houston Chronicle:
"Attempt To Bring Sharon Out Of Coma Begins."
"Poll: Most Texans Back Stem Cell Research."
"Bit Of New Orleans For Isle Mardi Gras."
"Patience Only Remedy For Drug Plan Confusion."
"Peer Pressure Shifting Driver's Ed Gears."

DOJ_NMG_0008437

"U.S. Helicopter Crash Kills 12 In Iraq."
"Race For GOP Whip Is On."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Iraq Helicopter Crash; WV Miner Funerals; WV Mine Survivor; Sharon Condition; Alito Confirmation; Alito Rally; CO Wildfires; Pension Plans; Healing Prayer Study; Muslim Pilgrimage; Avian Flu-Turkey; Prince William-Military.
CBS: Preempted By NFL Playoffs.
NBC: WV Mine Accident; Iraqi Violence; Sharon Condition; Pope Assassin; Alito Confirmation; Abortion Stances; Detroit Auto Show; New Orleans Colleges Reopen.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: WV-coal miners' funerals; Israel-Sharon's condition; Alito hearings; Schwarzenegger-motorcycle accident.
CBS: Israel-Sharon's condition; WV-coal miners' funerals; Schwarzenegger-motorcycle accident; Alito hearings; Young-NFL draft.
NPR: Alito hearings; Israel-Sharon's condition; WV-coal miners' funerals; Gas prices; Iran-nuke program; Atlanta-Asians protest meth sting; NFL Playoffs.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH – 7:15 a.m. Breakfast with Supreme Court Nominee Samuel A. Alito.

10:25 a.m. Remarks on No Child Left Behind, North Glen Elementary School, Glen Burnie, Md.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY – No public schedule.

US Senate: JUDICIARY _ 12 p.m. Full Committee. Begins confirmation hearing for Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel Alito. Opening statements by senators, formal introduction of Alito, Alito's opening statement. Location: Room 216, Hart.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other. DISPARITIES-HEALTH _ Health and Human Services' Office of Minority Health convenes a three day national leadership summit on eliminating racial, ethnic and physically challenged disparities in health. With Michael Leavitt, Secretary of Health and Human Services, Jennifer Howse, president, March of Dimes; Sandra Gadsen, president, National Medical Association; and others. 8:30 a.m. - 9:30 a.m. Keynote address by HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt on improving the quality of healthcare for all Americans. 9:30 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. Highlights from Carolyn Clancy, MD, Director, Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, on the National Healthcare Disparities Report. 10:45 a.m. - 12 p.m. Keynote and closing remarks, Dr. Christina Beato, acting assistant Secretary for Health. Location: Grand Hyatt Hotel, 1000 H St. NW. Contacts: Linda Allen, 703-231-3363

ABORTION-ALITO _ 9 a.m. The Traditional Values Coalition holds a news conference where women hurt by abortion speak out on the need for Supreme Court justices who will reverse Roe V. Wade. With Andrea Lafferty, TVC; Anne Newman, Operation Outcry; Karen Bodle, Harrisburg, PA; Luana Stoltenberg, Davenport, IA; and others. Location: In front of the Supreme Court. Contacts: Amy Skeen, 202-547-8570

NEW ORLEANS-KATRINA _ 12 p.m. - 1 p.m. National Press Club newsmaker on "New Orleans and the Nation After Katrina: A Changing Story." With Jason Berry, music columnist, New Orleans Magazine, and Lolis Eric Elie, New Orleans Times-Picayune. Location: National Press Club, 14th and F Sts. NW. Contacts: Ron Baygents, 202-250-1635

JAPAN-POLITICS _ 3 p.m. - 4:30 p.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies hosts remarks on Japanese politics and bureaucracy by Kazuo Aichi, newly returned to office after a 20 year absence, member of the Japanese House of Representatives. Location: B-1 conference room, CSIS, 1800 K St. NW. Contacts: Andrew Schwartz, 202-775-3242

IRAQ-KIMMITT _ 6 p.m. - 7:30 p.m. Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt will discuss the Treasury's view of the Iraqi economy and economic aspects of reconstruction. Part of the Council on Foreign Relations series, "Iraq: The Way Forward." Location: CFR, 1779 Massachusetts Ave., NW. Contacts: n/a, 202-518-3428. Notes: RSVP required. Council members and accredited journalists only. Reception at 6 pm, meeting begins 6:30 pm.

VIETNAM-AWARDS _ 6 p.m. - 8 p.m. 6 p.m. - 8 p.m. Vietnam Dream for Success holds an award ceremony to recognize contributions to educational opportunities for disadvantaged children and women in Vietnam. First Lavang Awards will be presented to Jan Scruggs, Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund founder, for his work for landmine removal and educational support in Vietnam; and Father Vincent Rigdon, director of the Office of the Missions, Archdiocese of Washington. Location: French Embassy, 4101 Reservoir Rd, NW. Contacts: Lisa Gough (VVMF), 202-393-0090 ext 109

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0008438

DOJ_NMG_0008439

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, January 9, 2006 8:37 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Sunday, January 08, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060108.pdf; dojclips060108.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JANUARY 8, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Poll: Most Want Court OK For Gov't Taps (AP-Y2) 3
Eavesdropping Poll Quotes (AP-Y2) 4
Our Presidential Era: Who Can Check The President? (NYT) .4
While Congress Slept (LAT) 10
Secret's Out: NSA Is Listening To America (BSUN) 11
The Wiretappers That Couldn't Shoot Straight (NYT) 13
Report On FBI May Strengthen Lawsuit Against Agency (AP) 15
Intelligence Bill's Passage Not Guaranteed In Senate (WT) .. 17
The Bush Administration Vs. Salim Hamdan (NYT) 17
Germany's Merkel Says Guantanamo Should Be Shut (REU) 27
Learning Languages (WP) 28

Patriot Act:

Time To Ask: Who Are We? (WP) 28
Editorial: How To Fix The Patriot Act: Maintain Checks And Balances On Government (DMN) 29

Homeland Response:

Hurricane Fraud Suspects Held (WT) 30
All Parts Of New Orleans Included In Rebuilding Plan (NYT) 31
Evacuees' Hotel Bill $19 Million FEMA Paid For Housing At Over 650 State Lodges (AJC) 33
Katrina Evacuees Seek Jobs, Anchors (LAT) 34

War News:

Iraq's Shiites And Kurds Said To Need Sunnis For Coalition (NYT) 37
Diplomats Protest Iraq Violence (WP) 38
Unity Government At Hand, Iraqi Says (WT/AP) 38
Lawmakers Call On Iraq To Shape Up (LAT) 39
The Real Choice In Iraq (WP) 40
Saddam's Terror Training Camps (WKLYSTD) 42
U.S. Soldiers Question Use Of More Armor (AP-Y2) 46
Marines Without Armor (NYT) 47
For Returning Unit In Iraq, A Battle With Doubts (BOS) 48
Marine Battalion Taking 3rd Tour To Iraq (LAT) 51
Army Captain Employed Daring, Intellect (WP) 52
Case Dropped Against U.S. Officer In Beating Deaths Of Afghan Inmates (NYT) 52
A Man Does Not Ask A Man About His Wife (NYT) 53
This Isn't Called The [Blank] Era For Nothing (WP) 55

DOJ:

S.D. Judges' Actions May Set National Precedent (SFAL) 57

Corporate Scandals:

Call It The Deal Of A Lifetime (NYT) 58
Nacchio Could Point To Board's Actions (DENP) 61
G.O.P. Finds Hope In Spitzer's Hard Edge (NYT) 63

Criminal Law:

Dems Charge GOP Has Corrupted Congress (AP-Y2) 65
Democrats Want Sweeping House Ethics Investigation (REU-Y2) 66
DeLay Ends Bid To Regain Post As G.O.P. Leader (NYT) 66
DeLay Steps Down Permanently As House Majority Leader (KRT) 68
Republicans Seek Elections To Replace DeLay (FT) 69
Democratic Leader Takes Anti-Corruption Message To GOP Turf (WP) 70
Scandal Exposes Washington's Underside (AP-Y2) 71
White House Watch: (PPG) 72
Can I Lobby You? (WP) 73
Go Ahead, Try To Stop K Street (NYT) 76
Returning 'Good' Money After Bad Misses Point On Ethics (LAT) 77
Reputed Mob Enforcer Gives Not Guilty Plea (CHIT) 79
Feds, Family Come Out To See 'The German' (CHIST) 79
Reputed Mob Enforcer Pleads Not Guilty In Federal Court (AP) 80
Mob Mentality En Mass: (BOSH) 81
Crackdown Exposes Toledo As A Hub Of Teen Prostitution (TOLB) 81

Young Duo Put Waltz In Motion (MCA) 84

Civil Law:

Cigarette Company Profits Are Still Smoking (MH) 87

Civil Rights:

10 Held In Alleged Prostitution Ring (LAT) 88
Governor Sticks By Vouchers (ORS) 89

Antitrust:

Pentagon Said To OK Rocket-launch Joint Venture (REU-Y2) 90
Funeral Industry Conspiring To Keep Prices High, Suit Says (HC) 91
Realtors' Bubble May Be Bursting (LAT) 93

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Sago Puts Spotlight On Safety Strategy (WP) 93
Miners Steering Next Generation To Different Jobs (NYT) 95
Under Strain, Towns Prepare For 12 Funerals (NYT) 97
Tribe Seeks Land N.J. Sold In 1801 (PHI) 98

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Guns Flow Easily Into Mexico From The U.S. (LAT) 100
Anti-drug Task Force Funding Slashed (RPE) 102

Immigration:

Texas Tangle (TWNHLL) 103
Few Drawn To Illegal Immigration Protests (AP) 104
Rallies Draw Dueling Protesters In Clashes Over Illegal Immigration (LAT) 105
The Silence In Herndon (WP) 106
Democrats Criticize Appointment At Immigration Agency (NYT) 106

Tax:

Bush Urges Congress To Save Tax Cuts (AP-Y2) 108
Bush Pressures Congress On Spending, Tax Cuts (REU-Y2) 109
Hot Tubs And Cold Moralizing (WP) 109

Congress-Administration:

Hearings A Test For Democrats And Alito (NYT) 111
Alito's Future Hinges On Past (HCHRON) 112
A Guide To The Hearings (MINNST) 114
In Alito Battle, Issues Of Presidential Power Thrust To Forefront (LAT) 116
CAP Critic Dropped From Alito Witness List (DP) 118
Alito Advocacy Fills Air Of Swing States (WP) 119
Among Evangelicals, A Kinship With Jews (WP) 121
A Search For Order, An Answer In The Law (WP) 123
Alito's Challenge (WP) 127
Alito's Moment (LAT) 129
Judging Samuel Alito (NYT) 130
Our Legal Guardians (LAT) 131
DeLay Ends Bid To Regain Post As GOP Leader (WP) 132
DeLay Ends Leadership Fight (DMN) 134
1 Fix, More Problems For GOP (LAT) 137
DeLay Halts Bid To Regain House Post (BOS) 139
DeLay Gives Up Bid To Reclaim House Post (AP-Y2) 141
DeLay Ends Bid To Reclaim Majority Leader Post (REU-Y2) 142
DeLay Says He Won't Seek To Return As Majority Leader (Update4) (BLOOM) 143
Reaction To DeLay Announcement (AP-Y2) 145
Analysis: GOP Woes Don't End With DeLay (AP-Y2) 146
Tenacious Tom DeLay Has Had Wild Ride (AP-Y2) 147
DeLay Ends His Drive To Regain Post (LAT) 149
Ethics Issues Snared GOP's Champion (WP) 151
Ties To Abramoff Weave Intricate Web (HCHRON) 152
Officials Focus On A 2nd Firm Tied To DeLay (NYT) 155
DeLay's War At Home (TIME) 157
DeLay Won't Reclaim House Post (HCHRON) 158
Supporters Point To DeLay's Impact On 22nd District (HCHRON) 160
DeLay Likely To Win Party Nomination In 22nd District (HCHRON) 161
DeLay Ends Bid To Regain Leader's Post (WT) 163
DeLay's Own Tactics May Have Hurt Him (HCHRON) 164
Possible Successors To Tom Delay (AP-Y2) 165
After Tom DeLay (WP) 166
States Intervene After Drug Plan Hits Early Snags (NYT) 167
Seniors Aided In Medicare Drug Plan Changes (FREEP) 169

Other News:

U.S. Plans For Future Without Sharon (AP-Y2) 170
Scan Shows Slight Improvement In Condition Of Israel's Sharon (WP) 171
Arabs Ponder Life After Sharon (WT) 173
With Sharon Ill, Palestinians Face Own Travails (NYT) 174
His Condition Slightly Improved, A Comatose Sharon Faces The Risk Of Serious Infections (NYT) 176
Ten Voices On The New Era (NYT) 177
History Interrupted (NYT) 178
Specialists To Plan Next Step For Sharon (LAT) 180
Even Pat Robertson's Friends Are Wondering... (NYT) 181
US Concerned Over Violence Flare-up In Sri Lanka (AFP-Y2) 182
Bomb Kills 13 On Navy Boat In Sri Lanka (NYT) 183
Russians Visit Iran On Nuclear Plan (NYT) 183

DOJ_NMG_0008442

Iran's Top Mullah May Be On Our Side (LAT) 184
Assad Said To Reject Questioning In U.N. Inquiry (LAT/REU) 185
Europe Comes To Terms With Need For Russian Gas (NYT) 185
British Liberal Quits As Party Leader (NYT) 187
Leader Of British Political Party Steps Down (LAT).....187
Gandhi-Quoting Yuppie Shakes Stuffiness From Britain's Tories (WP) 188
Denmark Is Unlikely Front In Islam-West Culture War (NYT) 189
The French Disconnection (NYT).....191
Bird Flu Appeal To Turks (NYT/REU).....192
Aid Suspended To Two Pakistan Quake Areas (AP-Y2).....192
Kashmir Quake Survivors Bemoan Lack Of Aid (NYT/AP)....193
India Digitizes Age-Old Wisdom (WP).....194
China Takes Aim At Corruption (WP).....195
Appeals Court, Reversing Itself, Holds 2 Salvadoran Generals Liable In Torture Case (NYT).....196
Chief Of U.N. Troops In Haiti Is Found Dead In Hotel Room (NYT).....197
UN Commander In Haiti Dies In Apparent Suicide (REU-Y2) 198
U.N. Chief In Haiti Found Dead (LAT) 199
Spain Holds General After Remarks (NYT).....200
Serbia Begins Prosecuting Some War Crimes Cases (NYT) 200
Bosnian Was Killed After Firing Shots, Peacekeepers Say (NYT).....202
In Kenya, 'Why Does This Keep Happening?' (WP).....202
A Paradise Drowning (NYT) 204
Northern Ire (WP).....205

TERRORISM NEWS:

Poll: Most Want Court OK For Gov't Taps (AP-Y2)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, January 8, 2006

A majority of Americans want the Bush administration to get court approval before eavesdropping on people inside the United States, even if those calls might involve suspected terrorists, an AP-Ipsos poll shows.

Over the past three weeks, President Bush and top aides have defended the electronic monitoring program they secretly launched shortly after Sept. 11, 2001, as a vital tool to protect the nation from al-Qaida and its affiliates.

Yet 56 percent of respondents in an AP-Ipsos poll said the government should be required to first get a court warrant to eavesdrop on the overseas calls and e-mails of U.S. citizens when those communications are believed to be tied to terrorism.

Agreeing with the White House, some 42 percent of those surveyed do not believe the court approval is necessary.

"We're at war," Bush said during a New Year's Day visit to San Antonio. "And as commander in chief, I've got to use the resources at my disposal, within the law, to protect the American people. ... It's a vital, necessary program."

According to the poll, age matters in how people view the monitoring. Nearly two-thirds of those between age 18 to 29 believe warrants should be required, while people 65 and older are evenly divided.

Party affiliation is a factor, too. Almost three-fourths of Democrats and one-third of Republicans want to require court warrants.

Cynthia Ice-Bones, 32, a Republican from Sacramento, Calif., said knowing about the program made her feel a bit safer. "I think our security is so important that we don't need warrants. If you're doing something we shouldn't be doing, then you ought to be caught," she said.

But Peter Ahr of Caldwell, N.J., a religious studies professor at Seton Hall University, said he could not find a justification for skipping judicial approvals. Nor did he believe the administration's argument that such a step would impair terrorism investigations.

"We're a nation of laws. ... That means that everybody has to live by the law, including the administration," said Ahr, 64, a Democrat who argues for checks and balances. "For the administration to simply go after wiretaps on their own without anyone else's say-so is a violation of that principle."

The eavesdropping is run by the secretive National Security Agency, the government's code-makers and code-breakers.

DOJ_NMG_0008443

Charles Franklin, a political science professor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, said most people think that the eavesdropping is aimed at foreign terrorists, even when the surveillance is conducted inside the country.

"They are willing to give the president quite a lot of leeway on this when it comes to the war on terror," said Franklin, who closely follows public opinion.

Some members of Congress have raised concerns about the president's actions, but none of those lawmakers who have been briefed on the program has called for its immediate halt.

The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, GOP Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, has promised hearings this year. Five members of the Senate Intelligence Committee, including GOP Sens. Olympia Snowe of Maine and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, have called for immediate inquiries.

On top of that, a memorandum circulated Friday from two legal analysts at the Congressional Research Service concluded that the justification for the monitoring may not be as strong as the administration has argued.

The NSA's activity "may present an exercise of presidential power at its lowest ebb," the 44-page memo said.

Bush based his eavesdropping orders on his presidential powers under the Constitution and a September 2001 congressional resolution authorizing him to use military force in the fight against terrorism.

The administration says the program is reviewed every 45 days and that Bush personally reauthorizes it. His top legal advisers argue its justification is sound.

The issue is full of grays for some people interviewed for the poll, including homebuilder Harlon Bennett, 21, a political independent from Wellston, Okla. He does not think the government should need warrants for suspected terrorists.

"Of course," he added, "we all could be suspected terrorists."

___

Associated Press writers Will Lester and Elizabeth White contributed to this report.

Eavesdropping Poll Quotes (AP-Y2)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 8, 2006

Comments from some of the people interviewed last week for an Associated Press-Ipsos poll on public attitudes about eavesdropping on communications between people in the U.S. and suspected terrorists:

"I believe in people's privacy but I believe in protection, too. If something's not right I think he'd (Bush) have a right to do it. If there's a dangerous situation I don't think he's got to ask anybody." — Tanya Fowler, 46, of Rock Hill, S.C.

"One thing as an American is: I value my freedom. That's guaranteed to me in the Constitution. President Bush has clearly violated at least two articles of the Constitution. He's no better than the terrorists he's supposedly fighting." — Scott Smith, 41, of Gloucester, Mass.

"We've got people that are attacking our country and we can't just let them do so without resisting them and trying to figure out what they're doing." — Gordon Tanner, 70, of Somerville, Ala.

"I think the laws apply to him like they do to everybody else. Controls are in place for a reason, they should be abided by. The wiretapping was warranted, but there's a right way to do things. Rules apply to everybody." — Diane Nardone, 50, of Westerly, R.I.

"There should be an investigation first before shutting it down — they might be in the middle of discovering something." — Dee Fowler, 39, of Iowa City, Iowa.

"I think they should have to get warrants. There are pros and cons to both sides. It's hard to tell who would be potential bad guys." — Harlon Bennett, 21, of Wellston, Okla.

Our Presidential Era: Who Can Check The President? (NYT)

By Noah Feldman

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

I. OUR PRESIDENTIAL ERA

DOJ_NMG_0008444

Not since Watergate has the question of presidential power been as salient as it is today. The recent revelation that President George W. Bush ordered secret wiretaps in the United States without judicial approval has set off the latest round of arguments over what the president can and cannot do in the name of his office. Over the past few years, the war on terror has led to the use of executive orders to authorize renditions and the detention of enemy combatants without trial - for which the Bush administration has been called to account by our European allies. The treatment of detainees has also given rise to concerns in Congress about the prerogatives of the chief executive: both houses recently voted to limit the president's authority to employ C.I.A. or other executive agents to engage in cruel and inhumane interrogations. The limits of presidential power will almost surely be a major topic of discussion during Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s Supreme Court confirmation hearings, which are scheduled to begin this week.

The stakes of the debate could hardly be higher: nothing is more basic to the operation of a constitutional government than the way it allocates power. Yet in an important sense, the debate is already long over. By historical standards, even the Bush administration's critics subscribe to the idea of a pre-eminent president. Administrative agencies at the president's command are widely understood to be responsible for everything from disaster relief to drug approval to imposing clean-air standards; and the president can unleash shock and awe on his own initiative. Such "presidentialism" seems completely normal to most Americans, since it is the only arrangement most of us have ever known.

For better or worse, though, this is not the system envisioned by the framers of the Constitution. The framers meant for the legislative branch to be the most important actor in the federal government: Congress was to make the laws and the president was empowered only to execute them. The very essence of a republic was that it would be governed through a deliberative legislature, composed carefully to reflect both popular will and elite limits on that will. The framers would no sooner have been governed by a democratically elected president than by a king who got his job through royal succession.

The transformation of the United States from a traditional republic to a democratic nation run in large measure by a single executive took a couple of hundred years. Constitutional evolution, like its counterpart in the natural world, has occurred sometimes gradually and sometimes in catastrophic jolts, like those brought about by war or economic crisis. The process has not been entirely linear: presidential power grabs have often been followed by a Congressional backlash, as in the wake of Richard Nixon's presidency. But the overall winner has unquestionably been the president, who has reached heights of power that the framers would scarcely have imagined. The modern presidency, as expressed in the policies of the administration of George W. Bush, provides the strongest piece of evidence that we are governed by a fundamentally different Constitution from that of the framers. While any constitution must evolve over time to meet new circumstances and challenges, there is reason to think that, when it comes to presidential power over national security, the latest developments have gone too far.

The rise of the presidency began with the Louisiana Purchase, which in 1803 doubled the landmass of the United States. History taught the framers that, just as Rome changed from republic to empire with conquest of new lands, territorial acquisition would lead to the centralization of political power. Sure enough, Thomas Jefferson's decision to buy the territory without seeking a constitutional amendment or advance Congressional approval amounted to a huge expansion of presidential authority. Jefferson entered office as a skeptic of the national government's power and even privately suggested that the purchase was unconstitutional. In overcoming his own republican instincts and arranging the purchase secretly, he demonstrated how the office of the presidency would come to serve its own interests, swaying the men holding it to strengthen not simply their own authority but also that of the institution itself.

Three decades later, Andrew Jackson's presidency marked another leap forward in presidential power. His contribution was his claim to represent the country, in its entirety, more directly and democratically than the congeries of local politicians who made up Congress. This rhetorical stance, coupled with the expansion of voting rights to white men without property, gave him the political muscle to veto the national bank and stand up to Congress in the name of the common men who had voted for him.

By the middle of the 19th century, with the admission to the Union of Florida, Texas and California, the United States became a continental empire. Such an empire called for an "imperial presidency," as Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr. suggested in his classic 1973 book of the same name. With the onset of the Civil War, the threat to the nascent empire led Abraham Lincoln to govern without Congress and to suspend access to the courts. When in 1898 William McKinley conquered the Philippines and chose to rule it, the imperial metaphor became still more apt: the United States had become, for the first time, the proprietor of whole nations whose peoples would never vote in its elections and whose governors reported directly to the president.

DOJ_NMG_0008445

In the 20th century, the Great Depression helped propel the presidency to its current level of dominance. The administrative agencies that were created during Franklin Delano Roosevelt's New Deal were a response to the tremendous complexity and growth of the national economy. An overwhelmingly Democratic Congress went along with the Roosevelt administration, giving the agencies broad discretion in regulating the economy and addressing workers' welfare. Over time, as the agencies expanded to administer health and safety regulations, Congress realized that it was more convenient to pass the buck to agencies than to deal with hard policy questions on its own. A congressman could take credit for an agency's action when it was convenient and blame the agencies when they adopted policies that his constituents disliked. It is now taken for granted that the president is in charge of the vast administrative apparatus that makes most of the important domestic-policy decisions in the country.

Today, of course, the main arena for the extension of presidential power is the realm of national security. The president's power to use force has grown enormously since the founding. The framers worried that a standing army at the president's beck and call would encourage him to subvert legislative independence by force, and so the Second Amendment gave Americans a right to bear arms in order to form well-ordered militias that would protect "a free state" - not only from the incursions of foreign powers but also from an overweening central government. Until the 20th century, a president who called the military into action did not have much to work with.

But as America emerged as a world power, Congress began to ignore the framers' concern, enhancing the size and might of the regular army until presidents could enter even major conflicts on their own. Presidents from both parties used the ongoing hostilities of the cold war to strengthen their military prerogatives during the conflicts in Korea and Vietnam. Despite the passage of the War Powers Act of 1973, which tried to reassert Congress's role in going to war, the presidency ended up more powerful than it had been before; no president has acknowledged the act's constitutionality. Even Bill Clinton was able to bomb Kosovo without asking Congress for permission.

The administration of George W. Bush, emboldened by the Sept. 11 attacks and the backing of a Republican Congress, has sought to further extend presidential power over national security. Most of the expansion has taken place in secret, making Congressional or judicial supervision particularly difficult. Administration lawyers have gone so far as to claim that the president as commander in chief is not bound by laws that ban torture because he is empowered by the Constitution to fight the nation's wars however he sees fit. A memo from the Department of Justice to the White House counsel dated Aug. 1, 2002, argued that any attempt to apply Congress's anti-torture law "in a manner that interferes with the president's direction of such core war matters as detention and interrogation of enemy combatants thus would be unconstitutional."

The administration has also suggested, in other memos, that the president may violate international treaties if necessary to fight the war on terror. By these lights, the United Nations Convention Against Torture, the leading anti-torture treaty, could constitutionally be violated even though the United States signed and ratified it, and even though the Constitution declares treaties to be "the supreme law of the land." Meanwhile, the administration takes the view that the anti-torture treaty does not apply to its actions outside the United States as a matter of law, but only, as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice recently stated on a trip to Europe, "as a matter of U.S. policy." When added to the newly declared presidential right to arrest American citizens wherever they might be and detain them without trial as enemy combatants, these claims add up to what is easily the most aggressive formulation of presidential power in our history.

For the last four years, a Republican Congress has done almost nothing to rein in the expansion of presidential power. This abdication of responsibility has been even more remarkable than the president's assumption of new powers. In recent months, though, Bush's relative unpopularity, as reflected in opinion polls, has emboldened Congress to take some steps toward reasserting its oversight role. In addition to the new anti-torture legislation, there is talk of requiring regular reports on secret detentions; and last month Congress nearly allowed the U.S.A. Patriot Act to lapse, granting only a five-week extension instead of the full renewal sought by the administration. Still, political logic dictates that, as long as Republicans control Congress, its oversight will be cautiously managed so as not to harm the party or the party's next presidential candidate. And even accounting for a legislative backlash, history suggests that the presidency ultimately emerges stronger after a president makes new claims of his constitutional authority.

DOJ_NMG_0008446

So what, if anything, should be done? If presidential power has been taken too far, who, if anyone, can impose limits on it?

II. WHAT THE COURT HAS DONE - AND MAY DO

The Supreme Court would seem to be the natural place to look for a restoration of the constitutional balance of powers. While Congress sat on its hands for most of the last five years, the court took on some of the most contentious problems of presidential power in a set of landmark decisions concerning detainees being held as enemy combatants. These cases were not just about civil liberties. They were also about the relative powers of Congress and the president under wartime conditions, and the court treated them as such.

The court's response to these crucial issues was to propose what is in effect a compromise between presidential power and Congressional authority. The most significant case concerned the detention of Yaser Esam Hamdi, an American citizen captured in Afghanistan and then held without trial in the United States. In June 2004, the court rejected the administration's view that it was authorized to arrest an enemy combatant anywhere and hold him indefinitely without trial. (The administration's argument was endorsed by Justice Clarence Thomas.) But the court also did not adopt the opposing view, expressed in a stinging dissent written by Justice Antonin Scalia, that an American citizen may not be detained without trial in the United States so long as the courts are open and Congress has not exercised its power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus.

Instead, the court concluded - over the disagreement of Justice David Souter - that Congress had in fact authorized the detention of enemy combatants, including American citizens. Yet at the same time, the court held that a suspected enemy combatant must be afforded the basic right to due process: to be given notice of the accusation against him and an opportunity to rebut that accusation before "a neutral decision maker." When push came to shove, however, the administration never gave Hamdi the hearing that the court promised him: he was "released" to Saudi Arabia without a hearing of any kind, on the condition that he renounce his United States citizenship.

The court's opinion in Hamdi's case seemed to exert a gravitational pull on the status and rights of the detainees at Guantánamo Bay. In a parallel case, the court addressed the Guantánamo issue only to say that those detainees - who are not United States citizens - were covered by the legal right to seek habeas corpus. The administration argued that since Guantánamo was part of Cuba, the habeas corpus statute did not apply there. When the court rejected this argument, the administration seemed to draw the lesson that it had better provide some sort of hearings for the Guantánamo detainees, as the court required for Hamdi. The administration decided to give those detainees hearings before commissions made up of military officers for the limited purpose of deciding whether they were, in fact, enemies of the United States. Not surprisingly, almost all these hearings have resulted in continued detention: only 38 of the more than 500 detainees were found not to be enemy combatants

Whatever their practical shortcomings, the court's decisions regarding Hamdi and the Guantánamo detainees still registered as a limitation on the unbridled presidential power that the administration asserted. But today, the Supreme Court that decided the detention cases is no more. Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist has since died and been replaced by John G. Roberts Jr.; and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor has offered her resignation contingent on the confirmation of her successor. If Samuel Alito takes her place, he and Roberts could change the balance significantly.

The change in the court's makeup is potentially significant, for the litigation of presidential power is just gathering steam. In addition to the likelihood that the court will hear a third prominent case concerning detention - that of Jose Padilla, an American citizen arrested at O'Hare Airport in 2002 and then detained in the United States without trial - it may well consider cases concerning the tapping of private conversations between terror suspects in the United States and persons abroad.

The revelation that President Bush directed the National Security Agency to eavesdrop (and use data-mining technology) on such communications without seeking warrants has raised the question of whether the president had the power to do so. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, prohibits surveillance of this sort without a special warrant, so the administration has proffered several other justifications of its policy. It has argued that when Congress authorized the president to use force after Sept. 11, it implicitly repealed FISA's ban on warrantless surveillance. And it has also maintained that the president had the inherent constitutional authority to intercept the communications of foreign powers and their agents - regardless of whether

DOJ_NMG_0008447

Congress prohibited it. Reminiscent of the administration's position regarding torture, this argument relies upon the idea that the Constitution assigns certain foreign-affairs responsibilities to the president that exclude Congress from having any say in how he might exercise them.

As with the use of torture, the use of secret intelligence outside of the ordinary legal process makes it difficult even to discover the violation, much less challenge it legally. But that does not mean that the issue will not come before the Supreme Court. Although you would imagine that prosecutors are not using secret evidence in criminal trials in which defendants could invoke their Fourth Amendment rights against unlawful search and seizure, defendants in terror trials are now asking courts to force the government to disclose whether such illegal surveillance occurred. Released detainees have already filed civil suits against the government charging torture, detentions and renditions to foreign countries by United States personnel. Such suits could now include claims for unlawful surveillance. Civil-liberties advocates will also bring challenges to the surveillance practices that the president has now acknowledged. And when a new administration is elected, it is not impossible that criminal prosecutions could be brought against the intelligence officials who illegally authorized the wiretaps.

If the issue does reach the court by one or more of these avenues, there is good reason to suspect that both Roberts and Alito, should he be confirmed, will be operating under the influence of an expansive conception of presidential power. Both are products of a conservative movement that has provided the legal justifications for various aspects of the Bush revolution, and both held intensely political jobs in previous Republican administrations. Two decades ago, as a deputy assistant attorney general, Alito argued in a memo that the president should issue "signing statements" when approving legislation - an effort to give the president influence over the courts' power to say what the laws mean. And Roberts, while serving as an appeals court judge, joined an opinion in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld upholding the military commissions being used to try Guantánamo detainees. The court held that the Geneva Convention does not, on its own, create a private right that can be litigated in the courts - a position consistent with wide presidential authority but also conventional wisdom among United States courts dealing with treaty issues. (I submitted a friend-of the-court brief in that case on the right to confront witnesses and evidence.) Past experience does not, of course, necessarily determine a justice's views on the court. But given their profiles and clues from their writings, it is in any case extremely unlikely that the combination of Roberts and Alito would be less deferential to presidential power than the combination of O'Connor and Rehnquist.

III. HOW CONGRESS CAN REDEEM ITSELF

Even if the Supreme Court were inclined to resist efforts to expand presidential power, the truth is that the court cannot do much to restore Congressional authority. We often imagine that the court serves as a sort of neutral umpire controlling the warring political branches. But this is mostly myth. The justices of the Supreme Court are themselves actors in the struggle for power, and when they intervene, they think carefully about how their decisions will affect the court's own legitimacy and authority. Even when the court weighs in on the side of Congress, it often elevates its own powers at Congress's expense. By the very act of interpreting existing laws and declaring something to be within Congress's power (and not the president's), the court affirms that it, not Congress, is the entity capable of making the president listen. Likewise, when Congress allows the court to resolve a power struggle between itself and the executive branch, it effectively concedes that it lacks the will to use its own arsenal of tools to pressure the president.

Consider what happens when Congress actually tries to engage in oversight - for instance, demanding that the president turn over documents concerning prewar intelligence about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. The president refuses, citing "executive privilege" - a term, by the way, absent in the text of the Constitution. What can Congress do when the president ignores its dictates? One option would be to stop cooperating with the presidential agenda on other issues. Another would be to suspend financing for some relevant program. Holding hearings would be a way to possibly broaden public awareness (though hearings are difficult to carry off without relevant documentation). The ultimate sanction, of course, would be to initiate impeachment proceedings. All of these approaches have costs, though. They would require coordinated action by the Congress and would draw public scrutiny to the issue. By going to the court and asking it to enforce a subpoena - or better, waiting for public-interest groups to do so, as with Vice President Dick Cheney's energy advisory commission - Congress avoids most of these costs.

Once the Supreme Court hears a case involving the balance of powers, the situation actually becomes worse for Congress. The court may find for the president. And even if the court does find that Congress's powers trump those of the president, and the president complies with its ruling, the logical implication is that the president is listening to the court when he was not willing to listen to Congress. This concern was evident in Scalia's dissent in the Hamdi case, in which he asserted that an American citizen in his home country is always entitled to a judicial hearing justifying detention - unless Congress suspends the writ of habeas corpus. To Scalia, the case was about Congress and the president: the former had not authorized the latter to detain citizens without a hearing. Yet far from functioning as a vote of confidence in Congress, Scalia's dissent made Congress look like the patsies that they had been throughout the Guantánamo detentions. Scalia was clearly angry at the president for violating a basic constitutional principle, to be sure. But his anger also reflected his frustration with Congress's reluctance to stand up for its rights.

DOJ_NMG_0008448

So how can Congress redeem itself? It could start by clarifying that, in authorizing the president to use force after Sept. 11, it did not mean to give him a blank check to violate existing laws without even telling Congress about the violations. Then it could pass new laws that leave no doubt that it intends to bind the president and his staff on matters relating, for example, to the conduct of war. Senator John McCain's torture bill, for instance, seeks to do just that. In the face of repeated presidential assertions that inhumane treatment does not count as torture and that the president cannot be constrained when it comes to interrogation, the law expressly prohibits cruel interrogation techniques.

But laws that bind the president are, on their own, not enough. Congress must also create meaningful oversight programs with bite to make sure the laws on the books are actually obeyed. The recent proposed bill demanding regular reports from the director of national intelligence about detentions abroad is a step in this direction, but only a step. Without specific provisions stating the content of the testimony that the executive branch must provide, Congress is just asking for the president to elicit an opinion from his lawyers permitting him to ignore the law and then to violate the law secretly. Lest that seem far-fetched, recall that such memos were in fact elicited in the war on terror, and that the violations of our anti-torture laws that took place (according to any reasonable reading of those laws) occurred in facilities whose very existence was classified as a matter of national security. Indeed, even McCain's bill, which prohibits "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment," could be gutted in practice by an interpretation limiting the meaning of those terms so as to permit existing interrogation techniques.

The chief advantage of oversight hearings is that officials must appear and testify under oath as to what the administration is in fact doing. A lie to a Congressional committee constitutes perjury. Disillusioning as it may be to admit, the threat of prison is probably the only sanction that can reliably assure that executive-branch officials, protected by secrecy laws and presidential orders that may themselves be classified, will come clean about what is going on in the war on terror. Even the most conscientious officials may make ambiguous statements that disclose only part of the truth, and that misleadingly - as when Condoleezza Rice answered questions about rendition and torture at a press conference in Ukraine in December.

Beyond oversight, a newly assertive Congress would also have to create ways to sanction the president if laws were violated. Ordinary criminal prosecution will rarely do the trick, since Congress cannot expect the president to initiate proceedings against himself or his employees for violating a law that he thinks is unconstitutional. The steps for enforcement should therefore come in part, at least, from Congress itself, which could specify upfront, for instance, that if a president were to violate the law, Congress would withdraw financing from certain programs or initiate impeachment proceedings.

With midterm elections coming in the fall, and the president's popularity having fallen, Congress may already be gearing up to take some such steps, as with the request for regular reporting on detention and Iraq and McCain's torture bill. A future Congress controlled by the Democrats would doubtless do much more. But the War Powers Act of 1973 provides a cautionary tale. Without strong and credible evidence that Congress will follow through, the laws Congress passes to limit the president can enter constitutional limbo, their status unknown and their effect uncertain.

The Supreme Court can do little to help Congress along this path, but the court could make the work of restoration harder for Congress were it to rule in favor of the Bush administration's theories of executive power. The judicial approval of an inherent executive power to torture or eavesdrop, laws to the contrary notwithstanding, would be a huge blow to Congress.

The allocation of power within the government is not determined simply by reading the Constitution and figuring out what it says. To the contrary, the balance of powers is established through a game of give and take, a struggle in which each branch fends for itself. An excellent example is the Supreme Court's ruling in Bush v. Gore. The important fact about that decision was not that in assuring President Bush's election, it inaugurated a period of single-party government. It was, rather, that the court deliberately chose to intervene in a process laid out in the Constitution for dealing with electoral disputes - a process according to which Congress, not the court, was given the power to choose the president. Bush would likely have ended up president in either case; but once the court wrested from Congress the constitutional power to decide who won, few in Congress seriously disputed the legitimacy of its actions. The court had spoken, and its decision was treated as final.

DOJ_NMG_0008449

The lesson for the balance of powers is a deep one: the prize of power goes to the bold. Right now, the presidency and its supporters have the upper hand. For Congress to regain some of its constitutional prominence, the court will have to keep a level head, and the representatives themselves will have to be willing to take some chances. Such an effort need not be restricted to national security issues - it would be nice if Congress also took more responsibility for making many of the hard domestic policy choices that it currently leaves to administrative agencies. But the national security problem is more pressing, and for the moment it offers Congress the best chance to redeem itself from its recent inaction.

It is customary, when making a plea on behalf of Congress, to give the legislature special consideration because it is the branch originally designed to represent the people. But this is not wholly justified: after all, nowadays the people directly elect the president, and the politicization of Supreme Court nominations ensures a fair amount of popular input into the composition of the court. It is also not certain that a rejuvenated Congress would be more effective in supervising the president than the Supreme Court. The real reason, then, to hope that Congress will resurrect its lost powers is that the balance of powers remains, as the framers thought, the best guarantor of liberty in a constitutional government. The basic fact of presidential power is now irreversible. No one denies that a strong executive is needed to respond to the threat of terrorism. But this just means that the presidency requires greater vigilance than ever to prevent violations of liberty.

No court alone can do the job of protecting liberty from the exercise of executive power. For that most important of tasks, the people's elected representatives need to be actively involved. When we let them abdicate this role, the violations start to multiply, and we get the secret surveillance and the classified renditions and the unnamed torture that we all recognize as un-American. Our Constitution has changed enormously over the last two centuries, and it is sure to change much more in the future. Just how it changes, though, is up to us.

While Congress Slept (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

THE PERFORMANCE OF CONGRESS during much of the Bush administration has been, to put it kindly, undistinguished. But revelations that the National Security Agency may have violated the law by secretly eavesdropping on U.S. citizens offer Republican congressional leaders a chance to redeem themselves — and their institution.

It remains to be seen whether the spymasters were merely overzealous in their efforts to track international terrorists or deliberately snooped on Americans. Congressional hearings on the NSA affair may answer that question. What is alarmingly clear, however, is that President Bush has consistently overreached in his claim to expanded powers as commander in chief during wartime. It is up to Congress to restrain those powers. His duty to protect the nation does not place him above the law.

Bush's claim to disturbingly broad wartime powers first surfaced in the infamous 2002 "torture memo" written by John Yoo, then a lawyer in the Justice Department and now a professor at UC Berkeley's Boalt Hall School of Law.

The most quoted part of the memo is its definition of torture as only the extreme standard of pain accompanying "serious physical injury such as death or organ failure." The much scarier part comes a dozen pages earlier, with this assertion of unfettered presidential wartime power: "In light of the president's complete authority over the conduct of war, without a clear statement otherwise, we will not read a criminal statute as infringing on the president's ultimate authority in these areas." Translation: Fighting a war is more important than obeying the law. If a law interferes with our strategy, we can ignore it.

Was Bush chastened by the political repudiation of a 90-9 vote in the Senate in favor of Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain's amendment banning torture? Not in the least. When he signed the law, Bush announced that "the executive branch shall construe [the law] in a manner consistent with the constitutional authority of the president … as commander in chief" to further the goal "of protecting the American people from further terrorist attacks." Translation: We can override this law whenever necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0008450

Congress also stood by when the administration overreached with its novel definition of enemy combatants, who are not entitled to challenge their own detention. Congress could have intervened, but instead the courts have had to sort out the mess. Even after the bipartisan outrage that greeted the NSA spying, the only official protest Congress could muster was a short delay in the renewal of the Patriot Act.

Now the president claims that even the special court set up to issue secret warrants to authorize wiretapping for national security purposes gives him insufficient powers to fight terrorists. Translation: When the courts are inconvenient, we will bypass that branch of government too.

Terrorism presents the U.S. with an enemy unlike any we have seen before. Most Americans agree with Bush that intelligence-gathering on Al Qaeda and its spawn may require more extensive investigative authorities. But the more sweeping the powers granted the executive branch, the more vital it is that Congress provide meaningful oversight. The irony is that the Republican-dominated Congress would likely grant Bush the extraordinary powers he seeks — if only the president would request them through legislation, instead of trying to claim them by fiat.

The struggle against terrorism will not end soon, and the choices we make in fighting it will help define us as a nation for decades. To allow any president to invent the law as he goes along is to invite contempt for the law for many presidencies to come.

Secret's Out: NSA Is Listening To America (BSUN)

By Douglas Birch, Sun Staff

The Baltimore Sun, January 8, 2006

Several years ago, officials at the National Security Agency, the secretive "Puzzle Palace" on the Baltimore-Washington Expressway, sought to reassure taxpayers that the agency had long since repudiated its Vietnam-era spying on U.S. citizens.

They insisted that the movie Enemy of the State, which portrayed NSA as using its formidable technology to track and eavesdrop on Americans, was the stuff of Hollywood fantasy.

Now NSA stands accused of abetting the White House in what civil liberties activists and others describe as a frontal assault on the constitutional right to privacy.

The program reportedly traced thousands of calls from phones linked to terror suspects to and from locations in the United States, and then listened in on many of those conversations - all without seeking warrants from a special foreign intelligence court. E-mails were also tracked and read, according to news reports.

"I've stuck up for NSA innumerable times, saying I didn't believe they were engaged in illegal activity," said James Bamford, author of two acclaimed books on the NSA, The Puzzle Palace and Body of Secrets. But now, he said, there is no question that after the Sept. 11 attacks the agency broke the law.

Revelations about the warrantless surveillance effort, he said, have thrown the nation's largest and most secretive intelligence-gathering organization into turmoil.

"Most of the people I've dealt with there had no idea this was going on, and they were very shocked and disappointed that suddenly they're back to where they were 30 years ago, dealing with questions of domestic spying," he said.

Don Weber, an NSA spokesman, said in a telephone interview last week that the agency can't comment on operational issues in the interests of national security.

The surveillance effort will be subject to congressional hearings, expected to begin in the next several weeks.

Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the Republican chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, told The New York Times that he planned to hold hearings on the surveillance program after confirmation hearings for Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court. Those hearings are expected to stretch into late January or early February.

According to reports in The New York Times and elsewhere, NSA launched the program almost immediately after the September 2001 attacks, before President Bush issued a secret order authorizing it.

Bamford and others contend that, with or without presidential approval, the program was conducted in violation of the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

DOJ_NMG_0008451

That law prohibits NSA from intercepting calls or other electronic communications to or from a U.S. citizen or resident alien without a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

Bamford, who holds a law degree, said the statute was written "to prevent exactly what just happened." Some critics are calling the president's authorization of the program an impeachable offense.

"The eventual outcome will be a special prosecutor," predicted Bamford. "Of course it's an impeachable offense."

The Bush administration, meanwhile, has stood stalwartly by the program, saying that president had the authority to authorize it based on his powers as commander in chief of the armed forces.

Not only has the White House refused to cancel the program, the government has launched an investigation against the whistle-blowers who leaked the story to the Times.

To its defenders, the NSA program was not just legal. It was a vital and necessary part of the efforts to prevent another Sept. 11-style attack.

"It was an integral and important part of the nation's counter-terrorism toolkit," said John E. McLaughlin, who served as deputy director of the CIA from 2000 to 2004 and was briefed on the program.

"People should understand this wasn't a huge drift net hanging over Detroit or Florida or California, scooping up communications," said McLaughlin, now retired from the CIA and a visiting scholar at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies.

"There had to be a foreign connection, and there had to be a reasonable belief that one of the parties involved had to be in contact with a terrorist or was a terrorist. So the whole idea that this was the NSA pawing through great volumes of information among Americans was not right."

Vice President Dick Cheney, in a speech at the Heritage Foundation last week, said that the program was "fully consistent with the constitutional responsibilities and legal authority of the president and with the civil liberties of the American people."

If it had been in place before Sept. 11, he said, two of the hijackers who flew a jet into the Pentagon might have been captured.

But to critics, the alleged abuses are so serious that they eclipse even concerns of future terror attacks.

"What makes this such an urgent matter is that it calls into question the rule of law," said Steven Aftergood, the director of the Project on Government Secrecy at the Federation of American Scientists.

"If the president is at liberty to circumvent the law, then where does his authority stop?" he said. "We have already seen American citizens detained as enemy combatants. We have seen international conventions against torture reinterpreted to permit extreme forms of interrogation. We are in the process of undermining the rules which define us as a democracy. And that makes this scary."

The upcoming hearings, planned for the intelligence and judiciary committees in the Senate and House, will lead lawmakers into the NSA's arcane world of electronic eavesdropping, where information is measured in billions of bits and data is mined like veins of precious metal.

Congress will focus on a few key questions: What kinds of surveillance did the agency conduct? Were legislators fully informed about the program? Were abuses committed? And, of course: Was the program legal?

The search for answers might be difficult.

For one thing, the strategies and hardware NSA uses are among the American government's most closely held secrets, and it is not clear to what extent the administration will be willing to discuss them.

"If someone insists on going into the details of how this was done and precisely what was done, it will become harder to chase and capture terrorists and deter them," McLaughlin said.

The mere disclosure of the program's existence, he said, has harmed the war against terror. "I'm a little surprised that there has been so little concern about the impact on our counter-terrorism capabilities," he said. "It will be less effective, because the bad guys are on notice."

Another key issue is whether Congress was fully informed about the surveillance efforts. The administration insists it was. Some legislators aren't so sure.

DOJ_NMG_0008452

"Leaders of Congress have been briefed more than a dozen times" on the NSA program, Cheney said last week. "I have personally presided over most of those briefings."

Yet critics say the highly technical briefings may have left some Congressional leaders more confused than enlightened, perhaps as part of a deliberate White House strategy.

"As you know, I am neither a technician nor an attorney," Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, a West Virginia Democrat, wrote Cheney hours after a July 2003 briefing on the NSA surveillance program. "Given the security restrictions associated with this information, and my inability to consult staff or counsel on my own, I feel unable to fully evaluate, much less endorse these activities."

One former senior administration official familiar with NSA issues rejected this criticism. "I was in at least one of those briefings, and what I recall is that the program was very thoroughly explained to them," said the official, who commented on condition that he not be identified.

Ruth Wedgewood of Johns Hopkins' School of Advanced International Studies, who sits on Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld's Defense Policy Advisory Board, said the White House probably felt it had no choice but to limit access to the information.

"It really is a problem of, how do you inform people and not have stuff leak immediately?" she said.

Civil liberties advocates ask why, if expanded NSA surveillance powers were needed, the White House didn't simply seek them.

The Foreign Intelligence Service Act has been expanded twice since Sept. 11, once in the original Patriot Act and a second time in December 2004.

But McLaughlin said that any effort to change the law "would probably have involved a debate that would have risked exposing the methods and techniques of the program, and would therefore have rendered it" less effective.

Others asked how the NSA could possibly have asked for court permission to track thousands of calls in real time, as it may have done.

Wedgewood pointed out that the 1978 surveillance act, known as FISA, was written in an era before e-mail, the Internet and the widespread use of desktop computers.

"The new technology was something the FISA wasn't necessarily designed to encompass," she said.

Congress may look at possible connections between the NSA's surveillance effort and the Total Information Awareness program, created by the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, or DARPA, in January 2002.

DARPA set out to perfect the tools of "data mining" - the trolling of public computer databases in a hunt for suspicious patterns that could point to terrorist activity. At the time, the agency insisted it was merely a research project.

The DARPA program was led by Adm. John M. Poindexter, a key figure in the Iran-Contra scandal of the 1980s, in which the proceeds from the secret sale of arms to Iran were diverted to right-wing Nicaraguan rebels.

Shortly after The New York Times disclosed existence of the program, DARPA abandoned it. Poindexter later left the government.

No matter what the hearings find, they will almost certainly draw the veil a little further from the secretive agency.

"The facts of the operation are still obscure, and every day we seem to learn something new," said Aftergood of the Federation of American Scientists.

Now, he said, it is up to the government to justify what it has done. "The burden really falls on the NSA and the administration to re-establish its credibility," Aftergood said. "Because this whole operation is at odds with what they have been telling us for years."

douglas.birch@baltsun.com

The Wiretappers That Couldn't Shoot Straight (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008453

ALMOST two weeks before The New York Times published its scoop about our government's extralegal wiretapping, the cable network Showtime blew the whole top-secret shebang. In its mini-series "Sleeper Cell," about Islamic fundamentalist terrorists in Los Angeles, the cell's ringleader berates an underling for chatting about an impending operation during a phone conversation with an uncle in Egypt. "We can only pray that the N.S.A. is not listening," the leader yells at the miscreant, who is then stoned for his blabbing.

If fictional terrorists concocted by Hollywood can figure out that the National Security Agency is listening to their every call, guess what? Real-life terrorists know this, too. So when a hyperventilating President Bush rants that the exposure of his warrant-free wiretapping in a newspaper is shameful and puts "our citizens at risk" by revealing our espionage playbook, you have to wonder what he is really trying to hide. Our enemies, as America has learned the hard way, are not morons. Even if Al Qaeda hasn't seen "Sleeper Cell" because it refuses to spring for pay cable, it has surely assumed from the get-go that the White House would ignore legal restraints on eavesdropping, just as it has on detainee jurisprudence and torture.

That the White House's over-the-top outrage about the Times scoop is a smokescreen contrived to cover up something else is only confirmed by Dick Cheney's disingenuousness. In last week's oration at a right-wing think tank, he defended warrant-free wiretapping by saying it could have prevented the 9/11 attacks. Really? Not with this administration in charge. On 9/10 the N.S.A. (lawfully) intercepted messages in Arabic saying, "The match is about to begin," and, "Tomorrow is zero hour." You know the rest. Like all the chatter our government picked up during the president's excellent brush-clearing Crawford vacation of 2001, it was relegated to mañana; the N.S.A. didn't rouse itself to translate those warnings until 9/12.

Given that the reporters on the Times story, James Risen and Eric Lichtblau, wrote that nearly a dozen current and former officials had served as their sources, there may be more leaks to come, and not just to The Times. Sooner or later we'll find out what the White House is really so defensive about.

Perhaps it's the obvious: the errant spying ensnared Americans talking to Americans, not just Americans talking to jihadists in Afghanistan. In a raw interview transcript posted on MSNBC's Web site last week - and quickly seized on by John Aravosis of AmericaBlog - the NBC News foreign affairs correspondent Andrea Mitchell asked Mr. Risen if he knew whether the CNN correspondent Christiane Amanpour might have been wiretapped. (Mr. Risen said, "I hadn't heard that.") Surely a pro like Ms. Mitchell wasn't speculating idly. NBC News, which did not broadcast this exchange and later edited it out of the Web transcript, said Friday it was still pursuing the story.

If the Bush administration did indeed eavesdrop on American journalists and political opponents (Ms. Amanpour's husband, Jamie Rubin, was a foreign policy adviser to the Kerry campaign), it's déjà Watergate all over again. But even now we can see that there's another, simpler - and distinctly Bushian - motive at play here, hiding in plain sight.

That motive is not, as many liberals would have it, a simple ideological crusade to gut the Bill of Rights. Real conservatives, after all, are opposed to Big Brother; even the staunch Bush ally Grover Norquist has criticized the N.S.A.'s overreaching. The highest priority for the Karl Rove-driven presidency is instead to preserve its own power at all costs. With this gang, political victory and the propaganda needed to secure it always trump principles, even conservative principles, let alone the truth. Whenever the White House most vociferously attacks the press, you can be sure its No. 1 motive is to deflect attention from embarrassing revelations about its incompetence and failures.

That's why Paul Wolfowitz, in a 2004 remark for which he later apologized, dismissed reporting on the raging insurgency in Iraq as "rumors" he attributed to a Baghdad press corps too "afraid to travel." That's also why the White House tried in May to blame lethal anti-American riots in Afghanistan and Pakistan on a single erroneous Newsweek item about Koran desecration - as if 200-odd words in an American magazine could take the fall for the indelible photos from Abu Ghraib.

Such is the blame-shifting game Mr. Cheney was up to last week. By dragging 9/11 into his defense of possibly unconstitutional bugging, he was hoping to rewrite history to absolve the White House of its bungling. And no wonder. He knows all too well that the timing of Mr. Bush's signing of the secret executive order to initiate the desperate tactic of warrant-free N.S.A. eavesdropping - early 2002, according to Mr. Risen's new book, "State of War" - is nothing if not a giant arrow pointing to one of the administration's most catastrophic failures. It was only weeks earlier, in December 2001, that we had our best crack at nailing Osama bin Laden in Tora Bora and blew it.

DOJ_NMG_0008454

What went down that fateful December is recalled in particularly gripping fashion in a just published book, "Jawbreaker," which, like Mr. Risen's book, is rising on the best-seller list at an inopportune moment for this White House. "Jawbreaker" is the self-told story of a veteran clandestine officer, Gary Berntsen, who was the pivotal C.I.A. field commander in the hunt for bin Laden. Mr. Berntsen is a fervent Bush loyalist, but his honest account doesn't do the president any favors. "We needed U.S. soldiers on the ground!" he writes, to "block a possible Al Qaeda escape into Afghanistan!" But his request to Centcom for 800 Army Rangers to do the job went unheeded.

We don't know whether the Bush order relaxing legal controls on the N.S.A. was in part a Hail Mary pass to help compensate for that disaster. Either way, all the subsequent wiretaps in the world have not brought bin Laden back dead or alive. Though the White House says that its warrantless surveillance has saved lives by stopping other terrorists since then, Mr. Bush has exaggerated victories against Al Qaeda as often as he has the battle-readiness of Iraqi troops. After he claimed in an October speech that America and its allies had foiled 10 Qaeda plots since 9/11, USA Today reported that "at least" 6 of the 10 had been preliminary ideas for attacks rather than actual planned attacks.

The louder the reports of failures on this president's watch, the louder he tries to drown them out by boasting that he has done everything "within the law" to keep America safe and by implying that his critics are unpatriotic, if not outright treasonous. Mr. Bush certainly has good reason to pump up the volume now. In early December the former 9/11 commissioners gave the federal government a report card riddled with D's and F's on terrorism preparedness.

The front line of defense against terrorism is supposed to be the three-year-old, $40-billion-a-year Homeland Security Department, but news of its ineptitude, cronyism and no-bid contracts has only grown since Katrina. The Washington Post reported that one Transportation Security Administration contract worth up to $463 million had gone to a brand-new company that (coincidentally, we're told) contributed $122,000 to a powerful Republican congressman, Harold Rogers of Kentucky. An independent audit by the department's own inspector general, largely unnoticed during Christmas week, found everything from FEMA to border control in some form of disarray.

Yet even as this damning report was released, the president forced cronies into top jobs in immigration enforcement and state and local preparedness with recess appointments that bypassed Congressional approval. Last week the department had the brilliance to leave Las Vegas off its 2006 list of 35 "high threat" urban areas - no doubt because Mohammed Atta was so well behaved there when plotting the 9/11 attacks.

THE warrantless eavesdropping is more of the same incompetence. Like our physical abuse of detainees and our denial of their access to due process, this flouting of the law may yet do as much damage to fighting the war on terrorism as it does to civil liberties. As the First Amendment lawyer Martin Garbus wrote in The Huffington Post, every defense lawyer representing a terrorism suspect charged in the four years since Mr. Bush's N.S.A. decree can challenge the legality of the prosecution's evidence. "The entire criminal process will be brought to a standstill," Mr. Garbus explains, as the government refuses to give the courts information on national security grounds, inviting the dismissal of entire cases, and judges "up and down the appellate ladder" issue conflicting rulings.

Far from "bringing justice to our enemies," as Mr. Bush is fond of saying, he may once again be helping them escape the way he did at Tora Bora. The president who once promised to bring a "culture of responsibility" to Washington can and will blame The Times and the rest of the press for his failures. But maybe, if only for variety's sake, the moment has come to find a new scapegoat. I nominate Showtime.

Report On FBI May Strengthen Lawsuit Against Agency (AP)

By WILLIAM McCALL

AP, January 8, 2006

A Justice Department report that faulted the FBI for sloppy work may strengthen a lawsuit filed against the agency by a Portland man who was arrested after his fingerprints were mistakenly identified during the investigation into the 2004 Madrid train bombings.

Attorneys for Brandon Mayfield "don't have to argue a particular violation of Mayfield's religious rights or First Amendment rights," said Robert Precht, who represented defendants in the 1994 World Trade Center bombing in New York.

DOJ_NMG_0008455

"They only have to argue the government engaged in blatant misconduct," said Precht.

Other legal experts agree that the Justice Department report does not undercut Mayfield's lawsuit — and may help it.

In the report released on Friday, Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine faulted the FBI for mistakenly matching a fingerprint found on a bag of detonators near the Madrid bombing site to those of Mayfield.

The report said no "intentional misconduct by FBI employees" was found, but said there were "performance issues by various FBI employees ... that helped cause the errors in the Mayfield case."

Mayfield was jailed for two weeks in May 2004 — even though Spanish investigators disagreed with the FBI's fingerprint analysis. The FBI acknowledged the mistake on May 24 and apologized to Mayfield.

He sued the Justice Department and the FBI in October 2004, claiming he was singled out because of his Muslim faith and that searches of his home and other locations were in violation of the Fourth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, which protects against unreasonable search and seizure.

If Mayfield can show that FBI experts were under pressure to make an identification without being certain — which the FBI and the Justice Department have denied — then he may be able to establish a pattern of misconduct, Precht said.

He said the Justice Department report leaves open questions about the possibility of pressure on forensic experts.

"Once the government or the prosecutor's office or an (FBI) supervisor says we think this guy may be guilty, the whole machinery of government goes to work to find the evidence that supports that," Precht said. "People do these things naturally. That's why we have safeguards about the presumption of innocence."

Michael Greenberger, a University of Maryland law professor and director of its Center for Health and Homeland Security, said the delay in correcting the mistake may be ammunition for Mayfield to argue there was pressure.

"They should have figured out sooner those were not his fingerprints," Greenberger said.

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman in Washington, D.C., said the agency could not comment on the pending lawsuit and he referred questions about the report to the FBI.

The agency, in a statement released with the inspector general's report, said Mayfield's mistaken arrest "was based on an extremely unusual confluence of events."

The FBI said it has changed its procedures at the recommendation of an international panel of experts in order to prevent a similar mistake.

Precht, who recently left the University of Michigan to return to private practice in New York, said the pressure on investigators and prosecutors is enormous once they believe they have the right suspect.

"This is a textbook example of people having assumed a person's guilt, and then they look for evidence to confirm it," Precht said.

Veteran trial lawyer Gerry Spence, who is representing Mayfield, has argued the FBI targeted the former Army officer because he is a convert to Islam.

The inspector general's report concluded that religion played no role in the initial, mistaken fingerprint identification because the FBI experts did not know Mayfield was a Muslim, or that his wife is Egyptian or that he represented other Muslims as an attorney.

The report noted, however, that "whether Mayfield's religion was a factor in the (FBI) laboratory's failure to revisit its identification and discover the error in the weeks following the initial identification is a more difficult question."

Elden Rosenthal, a Portland lawyer also representing Mayfield, said the case raises important issues of protecting constitutional rights during the government's war on terrorism.

"Those of us concerned about civil liberties always sound like we're talking about abstract concepts," Rosenthal said. "Here is a concrete example of why civil liberties should not be allowed to take a back seat to the war on terror."

In Mayfield's case, Rosenthal said the FBI won approval from a secret court established by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, to plant electronic "bugs" in the Mayfield home and his law office, execute repeated "sneak and peek" searches of his home and office, and place wiretaps on his phones.

DOJ_NMG_0008456

Despite the inspector general's conclusion the FBI could have gotten FISA approval for surveillance without the Patriot Act, the report found that changes made by the act permitted access to more information about Mayfield than could have been obtained without it, said Dave Fidanque, executive director of the Oregon chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union.

"The inspector general's report confirms for the first time that Mayfield's home, and probably his office, were 'bugged,'" Fidanque said.

Greenberger said the Mayfield case may provide the first opportunity to test whether Patriot Act provisions on surveillance and searches violate the Constitution.

"Everybody has been waiting for a case where these kinds of searches under the Patriot Act can be brought to a court's attention by somebody who has standing to raise it — and Mayfield has that standing," Greenberger said.

"There's a big, big constitutional issue here," he said.

Intelligence Bill's Passage Not Guaranteed In Senate (WT)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, January 8, 2006

For the first time in 27 years, congressional officials fear that an Intelligence Authorization Act will not be passed before the session ends.

Lawmakers and staff from both parties said the bill was blocked in the Senate before the holiday recess by a Republican lawmaker involved in a dispute about amendments that would require reports on secret detention facilities and access to prewar intelligence briefings on Iraq.

Now some fear that further efforts to pass the bill will become captive to the debate over the Bush administration's use of warrantless national security wiretaps.

"I think we might have missed an opportunity at the end of last year," said one Democratic Senate aide who deals with intelligence issues. "The window might have closed by now."

The annual authorization bill, which has passed every year since the establishment of the House and Senate committees on intelligence in 1978, provides the framework within which intelligence agencies carry out their missions and spend the money Congress appropriates for them.

Congressional officials say that if the bill fails this year, several important reforms and innovations will be shelved.

Its authors say this year's bill would set up an inspector general for the nation's new spy chief, strengthen counterterrorism information-sharing by temporarily suspending parts of the Privacy Act, and make the directors of the three biggest-spending military intelligence agencies subject to Senate confirmation.

The bill has been blocked by a senator who exercised the right to remain anonymous, Republican staff said.

Because of the way Senate rules are designed to ensure that debate is difficult to curtail, moving a bill through the chamber expeditiously requires a parliamentary procedure known as unanimous consent. A single objection can force Senate managers to contemplate a lengthy floor debate and effectively preclude consideration of a bill altogether if they think the legislative agenda is too crowded.

Before the recess, Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the senior Democrat on the Select Committee on Intelligence, said the bill was blocked to prevent passage of three amendments added with the consent of committee Chairman Pat Roberts, Kansas Republican.

Two of the amendments deal with reports to Congress about the purported overseas network of secret CIA detention facilities. Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte would submit a report about the facilities, and intelligence agency inspectors general would describe the welfare of individual detainees. These classified reports would be submitted to the intelligence committees of both chambers.

The third amendment requires the White House to give the two committees copies of presidential daily briefing items about Iraq from Jan. 20, 1997 -- the beginning of President Clinton's second term -- to March 19, 2003 -- the date of the U.S. invasion.

The Bush Administration Vs. Salim Hamdan (NYT)

By Jonathan Mahler

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

In 1996, Salim Hamdan, a 26-year-old Yemeni with a thick mustache and kinky black hair, was working part time as a taxi driver, dividing his modest income between the mattress he rented in a crowded boardinghouse in the dirty, bustling city of Sana and his daily supply of khat leaves, the stimulant that most Yemeni men chew by the fistful. Then one day the low-hanging horizon of his life lifted: he was recruited for jihad. He joined about 35 other Muslims, mostly Yemenis, who were preparing to leave for Tajikistan to fight alongside that country's small Islamic insurgency against its Russian-backed government.

One of the group's leaders was a self-assured young man named Nasser al-Bahri. Hamdan, an orphaned only child from a rural tribal village in southern Yemen, was naturally drawn to strong personalities. Although two years his junior, al-Bahri, who grew up in an upper-middle-class family in Jidda, Saudi Arabia, was far more worldly and sophisticated than Hamdan and was without question the most educated person he had ever met. Al-Bahri had studied business in college, but he was also deeply steeped in the Koran, having become a devout Muslim as a teenager in rebellion against his bourgeois upbringing. He spoke comfortably and forcefully about the plight of Muslims all over the world, and he had traveled extensively, to places as far as Bosnia and Somalia, to defend his oppressed Islamic brethren.

Hamdan, who had the rough equivalent of a fourth-grade education, wasn't especially religious and had no grand plans for his life other than the hope that he might someday be married, but he nevertheless embraced the idea of becoming a holy warrior. It didn't hurt that the trip was to be paid for - al-Bahri told him that the group had raised money from a handful of Saudi-based Muslim charities - and that Hamdan would also receive a salary.

The jihadis convened in Jalalabad, Afghanistan, and started working their way north toward Tajikistan, first by jeep and then, when the roads were impassable, on foot. After six months traversing Afghanistan's mountainous, often snow-covered terrain, they were turned back at the Tajik border.

At loose ends, one of the jihadis suggested that they go see a man named Osama bin Laden, a well-known sheik among radical Islamists who led a militant group of itinerant Muslim holy warriors called Al Qaeda. Having only recently been expelled from Sudan, bin Laden had relocated to Afghanistan, where he planned to rebuild Al Qaeda with the help of his new hosts, the Taliban. Bin Laden earned his reputation during the anti-Soviet campaign in Afghanistan in the 1980's, but he was now enlisting soldiers for his new crusade to drive the United States from the Arabian Peninsula.

Al-Bahri, Hamdan and the rest of the group made their way back through Afghanistan to bin Laden's home in Farm Hada, a village outside Jalalabad, not far from the Khyber Pass. They arrived in late 1996 shortly before Ramadan, the holiest time of year. For three days, bin Laden preached to his prospective recruits about the religious imperative of reversing America's corrosive presence in the gulf. Seventeen of the original 35 jihadis decided to stay; Hamdan and al-Bahri were among them.

For the next several years, both men worked for bin Laden, first in Farm Hada, then, when he relocated for security reasons in 1997, to a better-fortified compound in the desert outside Kandahar. In 1999, al-Bahri and Hamdan's lives became further entwined. At bin Laden's urging and with his financial help, they married Yemeni sisters in Sana and returned to Afghanistan with their new wives.

By Sept. 11, 2001, however, al-Bahri and Hamdan's paths had diverged. Al-Bahri was in prison in Yemen for his suspected links to Al Qaeda's bombing of an American Naval destroyer, the U.S.S. Cole, in 2000. Hamdan was still with bin Laden, though not for long. In late November 2001, with America's military campaign in Afghanistan well under way, he was picked up near the border of Pakistan by a group of Afghan warlords. They hogtied him with electrical wire and within a matter of days turned him over to the Americans for a $5,000 bounty. The interrogations started, and Hamdan was soon identified as Saqr al-Jedawi, his alias during his years with bin Laden. He spent the next six months in U.S. prison camps in Bagram and Kandahar, before being flown to Guantánamo Bay in May 2002.

Today, Salim Hamdan lives in a 6-by-9-foot cell in Guantánamo, awaiting trial by a special military tribunal established by presidential order in the aftermath of 9/11. If everything goes according to the government's plans, the Bush administration will prosecute Hamdan for violating the laws of war by conspiring to commit acts of terrorism against the United States. The government has revealed little about its case against Hamdan - my portrait is drawn principally from his lawyers, family members and al-Bahri - but it has charged him with serious offenses, including transporting weapons and serving as a bodyguard to bin Laden. If convicted on all charges, Hamdan could receive a life sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0008458

Hamdan's attorneys, a government-appointed Navy lawyer and a professor at Georgetown University Law Center, don't deny that their client worked directly for bin Laden, but they play down his importance to Al Qaeda, portraying him as an employee, an uneducated and far-from-devout driver and mechanic who was grateful for a paycheck but generally ignorant of the terrorist enterprise for which he worked. Moreover, they say that the tribunals, known officially as military commissions, are illegal and have sued the American government to block them from going forward.

This spring, the detainee's lawyers will have the chance to make their case to the Supreme Court, when it hears Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. The name alone guarantees that it will be one of the most closely watched arguments of the year, and the eventual ruling will have far-reaching implications not just for Hamdan and the rest of the Guantánamo detainees, but also for presidential war powers and quite possibly for the future of democracy in the Middle East. If the war on terror is, at its heart, a battle to show the Islamic world that there is an alternative to oppressive theocracies and autocratic dictators, nothing is more important than how the United States government dispenses justice to detainees like Salim Hamdan. Until now, America's wartime practice has been to hold onto captured combatants until the end of hostilities, when there is no longer a threat of them returning to the battlefield. In this case, though, the battlefield is unmapped and the hostilities could continue for decades. For the moment, the government has broadly classified nearly all of the more than 500 detainees at Guantánamo as enemy combatants, but eventually it's going to have to start sorting them out. This will entail answering some difficult questions. Are all Muslim men who answered the call to jihad equally guilty? Which detainees represent a threat to the United States? Who is worth prosecuting, and how?

Just outside the Old City of Sana, a maze of densely packed, intricately adorned stone houses and centuries-old shops that rise like drip castles from narrow cobblestone streets, sits the modern Martyrs' Mosque. If the Old City evokes Yemen's prosperous, cosmopolitan days at the center of the world's spice trade, the Martyrs' Mosque, an imposing, ash-colored monolith, speaks to its present as the poorest and most primitive of the Arabian Peninsula states.

The big open square that fronts the mosque is a gathering place for the dispossessed. Homeless people lie on flattened cardboard boxes with gasoline cans repurposed as water jugs beside them. Dababs, minivans stuffed with passengers, career around Sana's crowded streets, jockeying for fares. Drivers struggle to be heard above the music issuing from loudspeakers on the three-wheeled cycles pedaled by cassette vendors. The smells of grilling meat and corn on the cob commingle with perfumed oil, urine and exhaust.

There are no women in sight here, only young men and boys, a reflection of Yemen's conservative Islamic culture. And although roughly 40 percent of all Yemeni men are unemployed, everyone here seems to be in a big hurry, hustling around, often holding hands, always in standard Yemeni dress: sandals, white robes and Western-style blazers with the labels showing on the outside of the left sleeve, just above the cuff. Long curved daggers known as jambiyas, reminders of the country's enduring tribal culture, hang from belts. Cheeks bulge with khat, which brightens the mood and sends the mind in every direction, an apt emblem of the combination of aimlessness and restlessness on display.

Ten years ago, Salim Hamdan was one of these men. He was born in about 1970 (no one, including Hamdan himself, knows for sure), hundreds of miles from Sana in the Wadi Hadhramaut, a 100-mile oasis in the mountainous desert of southeastern Yemen. His father was a farmer and shopkeeper, and the family lived modestly in a small, mud-brick home in a cliff town overhanging the fertile valley below. He was still a child when his parents died from illness, one a few years after the other. With no other family nearby, Hamdan went to live with relatives in Mukalla, a bleak port city of about 150,000 on Yemen's southern coast. By that point, Hamdan had already quit school, which is not unusual in Hadhramaut, where the imperatives of helping your family earn money far outweigh the comparatively abstract virtues of an education.

Within a few years he was on his own, living on the streets of Mukalla and working odd jobs. In 1990, Yemen, which had long been divided into two separate nations, the Islamic north and Marxist south, was officially unified. Hamdan, who was then 20, joined the mass migration north in search of work. There was a widespread sense that Sana, the new nation's capital, would soon be booming. As it turned out, the job prospects were not so promising, particularly for someone with Hamdan's limited qualifications. He soon found his way to the Martyrs' Mosque - where he picked up work driving a dabab - and then, six years later, to jihad.

DOJ_NMG_0008459

Jihad - literally, "struggle" - is a slippery concept, one that has been subjected to almost endless interpretation, violent and nonviolent alike, emanating from a Muslim's basic religious duty to encourage the spread of Islam. In recent years, though, it often has come to be understood as a violent religious crusade against the United States. Hamdan and al-Bahri's routes to jihad could not have been more different, but in many ways each is emblematic of the men's respective countries, which represent the two biggest contingents at Guantánamo. In Saudi Arabia, jihad resonated with particular force with the educated, affluent and devout; in Yemen, it exerted an especially strong pull on the country's poor. Nearly half of the country's population lives below the poverty line; unlike its neighbors in the gulf, Yemen has very little oil, and what it does have is hoarded by the government. "Unless they are the sons of sheiks or political leaders, the young people have no way to use their energies," Nabil al-Sofee, a former spokesman for Islah, Yemen's Islamic party, told me recently in his office in Sana. "The one option that is in front of anyone who wants to achieve anything is jihad."

Jihad has an almost mythic appeal in Yemen. Its roots run all the way back to the seventh century, when the Prophet Muhammad is said to have declared, "Allah, give me fighters from behind me," his back turned conspicuously to Yemen. In its more modern incarnation, jihad can be traced to 1967, when Yemen was still divided and the British withdrew from its southern half. Finally free of its longtime occupiers, South Yemen quickly established ties to the Soviet Union, Cuba and China, and in 1970 became the Arab world's first Communist state.

South Yemen's new identity inaugurated two decades of hostilities with North Yemen, a Muslim state whose allegiances were to Saudi Arabia and Egypt. It didn't take long for North Yemen's rulers - including the president of today's unified Yemen, Ali Abdullah Saleh - to exploit the conflict's religious undertones. By the time the Soviets invaded Afghanistan in 1979, many young North Yemenis already accepted that it was their duty as Muslims to confront Communist unbelievers. And so, over the next several years, scores of young Yemeni men answered their clerics' calls for jihad. Afghanistan's mujahedeen received support from many Arab countries, in addition to the United States, but the Yemenis were among the fiercest of the so-called Afghan-Arab fighters. Unlike the jihadis from wealthier states in the Persian Gulf, they were accustomed to hard living, and the rugged, mountainous terrain of Afghanistan was similar to that of Yemen.

When the Soviets withdrew from Afghanistan in 1989, the leaders of many Arab countries, understandably worried about the combustible mix of religious zealotry and combat experience in which these men had been steeped, discouraged the jihadis from returning home. North Yemen, for its part, not only welcomed back its own fighters, it opened its borders to jihadis from other Arab countries as well. The heroic stature of these fighters was cemented in 1994, when the still-simmering tensions between Yemen's Islamists and Marxists erupted into a full-fledged civil war and President Saleh called on the ex-jihadis to help defeat the Communists. The north emerged victorious, and Saleh rewarded many of these men for their efforts. For his help mobilizing the troops, Sheik Abdul Majid al-Zindani, an ex-Arab-Afghan warrior and bin Laden's onetime spiritual mentor, was awarded the chancellorship of Iman University in Sana, a platform from which he has since steered countless young Yemeni men toward the path of jihad.

The Yemeni government did little to stanch the flow of jihadis, even in the face of increasing international pressure. A consummate pragmatist, President Saleh gave the U.S. permission to use its ports to refuel in the 1990's, but to the Arab world he presented himself as a leader who was not afraid to stand up to the West. In the wake of the attack on the U.S.S. Cole in Yemen in 2000, Saleh scoffed at rumors that the U.S. was planning to intensify its military presence in the country: "Yemen is a graveyard for the invaders," he told Al Jazeera. After 9/11, however, President Saleh went to Washington to pledge his support for the war on terror. But having spent so many years nurturing and exploiting the country's culture of jihad, he had to be careful about how he went about dismantling it. Extraditing Islamic radicals, or even putting them in jail for more than a couple of years, would provoke the country's powerful extremist element.

The centerpiece of Saleh's solution was to appoint a respected jurist and cleric, Hamoud al-Hitar, to meet with imprisoned extremists and persuade them that Islam does not, in fact, condone acts of terrorism. When I visited al-Hitar at his heavily guarded home in Sana one night last fall, he explained to me how the so-called Committee on Thoughtful Dialogue works. He called it "intellectual surgery" and described it as a simple process: he leads radicals through a series of questions about their beliefs, using the Koran or the hadith, a collection of the Prophet Muhammad's teachings, to show them how they have been misled. At the end of the program, those participants who vow not to take part in future acts of terrorism are granted presidential pardons and set free. To the obvious question - Why believe that they'll honor the vow? - Judge al-Hitar gave the obvious answer: These are men who take their ideology seriously; they would never sign a pledge renouncing their beliefs if they didn't mean it. A couple of years ago, President Saleh released hundreds of men with connections to Al Qaeda under the auspices of Judge al-Hitar's dialogue program. One of those men was Nasser al-Bahri.

DOJ_NMG_0008460

Al-Bahri declined to see me for the better part of the two weeks I spent in Yemen. Then, the night before I was scheduled to fly home, he agreed to meet me the following evening at a relative's home in Sana. A tall, rangy man with a receding hairline and a neatly trimmed beard, al-Bahri looked older than his 33 years. He sat on a floor cushion, his long legs extending from the bottom of his creaseless white robe. Early in our conversation, which lasted more than five hours, the power failed. For the rest of the night, the narrow room was illuminated by two candles. Al-Bahri apologized for excusing himself repeatedly to urinate, explaining that he was diabetic.

According to al-Bahri, his decision to renounce Al Qaeda and terrorism had nothing to do with Judge al-Hitar's dialogue program, which he doubts has truly changed any minds. Rather, he said that during his two years in prison in Yemen, almost half of which was spent in solitary confinement, he had the chance to do a lot of reading and thinking. He continues to believe that America is oppressing and exploiting Muslims, but he no longer accepts that the random murder of innocent people is a legitimate expression of jihad, which, he said, "has its time and place, like prayer." There was also the issue of maturity. "When we reach our 30's, we come to regret what we did in our 20's," he told me matter-of-factly, like an ex-campus radical reflecting on a minor act of civil disobedience in his distant past.

Al-Bahri was not eager to talk about Hamdan; because he feels responsible for his brother-in-law's fate, he said that discussing him was too depressing. Not surprisingly, what he did say distanced Hamdan from the military operations of Al Qaeda. Al-Bahri described Hamdan as almost childlike, a cheerful, simple-minded man. According to al-Bahri, Hamdan at first seemed excited about jihad, but he lacked both the zeal of a holy warrior and the religious grounding or inclination to grasp the ideology of the movement. As al-Bahri tells it, Hamdan went to Tajikistan for jihad but stayed in Afghanistan because working as a driver and mechanic in bin Laden's motor pool paid better than driving a dabab in Sana.

If al-Bahri was quick to exonerate Hamdan, he showed no hesitation implicating himself as a senior member of what may be the most notorious terrorist organization the world has ever known. Al-Bahri sounded neither nostalgic nor remorseful talking about his years as one of bin Laden's chief bodyguards; he could have been a retired executive dispassionately recollecting his years with the firm. Yet he was, in one sense, cautious: while he was willing to answer any question I asked, he explicitly disassociated himself from each specific attack that took place during his time with bin Laden.

Al-Bahri's future had come into focus as a teenager in Jidda, when he first fell under the influence of radical Saudi clerics. "I saw that my function was to carry guns and defend Muslims wherever they were," he told me. "That was the holy work that would lead me to paradise." Having grown up in Saudi Arabia, Islam's holiest land, he responded personally when he heard bin Laden describe his country as an agent of the Americans and pledge to drive America from the Arabian Peninsula. What's more, al-Bahri had left Saudi Arabia for Bosnia in the early 90's and had been without the guidance of a religious leader ever since. In bin Laden, al-Bahri said, he had found "a new spiritual father."

Al-Bahri rose quickly through the ranks of Al Qaeda. Under the alias Abu Jandal, he helped create new training camps that bore little resemblance to the kind he attended as a young man in Bosnia, where jihadis learned such conventional skills as assembling and firing weapons and reading maps. The focus now was on fighting in cities and preparing for martyrdom operations, which meant learning how to blend in with local populations and attack civilian targets. Bin Laden was clear about the goals. "He would say over and over again that we must carry out painful attacks on the United States until it becomes like an agitated bull," al-Bahri recalled, "and when the bull comes to our region, he won't be familiar with the land, but we will." During the late 90's, al-Bahri fought with the Taliban against the Northern Alliance and served as one of bin Laden's personal bodyguards during his frequent tours of Qaeda training camps around Afghanistan.

After the attacks on the U.S. embassies in East Africa in the summer of 1998, al-Bahri said, bin Laden placed him in charge of the organization's guest houses in Kabul and Kandahar, where it was his duty to help inspire and train new recruits to undertake terrorist operations against the United States. It was at this point, al-Bahri says, that he started having second thoughts about Al Qaeda, not because he doubted its mission, but because he wasn't convinced these recruits were prepared to carry it out.

DOJ_NMG_0008461

Jihad, it occurred to al-Bahri, had evolved from a genuine religious mission to a cattle call for any and all Muslims. Even years later, having renounced terrorism, he seemed irritated by what he characterized as Al Qaeda's failures of management. "We were getting young people who were not committed to jihad, also very young people, 15 or 16 years old," he told me. "What could we do with them? I said we should accept only religious young people. Only the religious understand what jihad means. But my voice was not being heard." Al-Bahri told me that bin Laden knew he was becoming disillusioned, and that's why he encouraged him and Hamdan to marry sisters in 1999; in al-Bahri's interpretation, by tying him to Hamdan, who had fewer options and was thus less likely to leave, bin Laden would have a better chance of keeping al-Bahri in the fold.

During the summer of 2000, Hamdan and al-Bahri came back to Sana for a brother-in-law's wedding. Within a matter of weeks, several Qaeda operatives in a small boat filled with explosives rammed the U.S.S. Cole, which was on a refueling stop in Yemen. Shortly after the attack, Yemeni intelligence agents started rounding up suspected extremists. Al-Bahri tried to flee but was arrested at the airport trying to return to Afghanistan. Hamdan had already taken his wife and her parents on a pilgrimage to Mecca, and word quickly reached him in Saudi Arabia that if he came back to Yemen he'd be picked up, too. Instead, he went back to bin Laden, taking his wife with him.

In the wake of Sept. 11, al-Bahri told me, three F.B.I. agents came to the prison where he was being held in Yemen to interrogate him. The transcripts from their interviews are classified, but al-Bahri says they were mainly interested in the structure and ideology of Al Qaeda. Asked if bin Laden had access to chemical or nuclear weapons, al-Bahri replied that bin Laden had something far more powerful: men who are determined to complete their covenant with God and carry out martyrdom operations against the United States.

Detainees' lawyers estimate that there are currently about 100 Yemeni prisoners in Guantánamo. If even a fraction of this many Americans had been imprisoned in a foreign country for four years, the vast majority without charges, there would be a national outcry. In Yemen, however, most of the detainees' families are completely in the dark. Half of the people in the country are illiterate. Those who can read find few stories about Guantánamo. Many of the papers are state-run, and the rest are under intense pressure to toe the government line. President Saleh knows that drawing attention to the detainees would only further inflame anti-American sentiments and in so doing create more problems for him.

A Yemeni human rights group called HOOD has a rough list of Yemenis who are being held at Guantánamo and has made contact with some of their relatives, but the families are not in communication with anyone in the U.S. government. The detainees' defense lawyers periodically come to Yemen to meet with the families who have authorized them to represent their relatives, though in some cases the detainees themselves doubt their American lawyers' good intentions. While I was in Yemen, I spent several days visiting the families of detainees with David H. Remes, a partner at the Washington firm Covington & Burling, which represents 17 of the Yemenis at Guantánamo. Remes prefaced several of his meetings by saying that their sons, brothers or husbands would be very angry if they knew he was there.

Hamdan, too, sent word through his lawyers that he didn't want me to contact his family, but I was able to get in touch with his wife's brother, Muhammad al-Qala, through HOOD. Al-Qala, a staff sergeant in the Yemeni army, invited me to his home to meet his sister, Hamdan's wife, Um Fatima. Since her husband's arrest, she and her two daughters have been living with her brother, his family and their mother in a cramped two-story stone house in central Sana. Hamdan's lawyers came to Yemen about a year and a half ago to see her, and the lawyer's interpreter is in fairly regular contact with al-Qala, but no one whom Hamdan left behind seems to have any real sense of the gravity of his situation or the significance of his case: what could a superpower like the United States possibly want with Salim?

Sitting perfectly straight on the shiny, floral-patterned blue floor cushions that lined the small upstairs living room in her brother's home, Um Fatima spoke for three hours through an interpreter about her husband. Al-Qala, a stocky man with a dark mustache and glassy, expressionless eyes, sat beside her chain-smoking Marlboros and working on a big wad of khat. Um Fatima and Hamdan's two daughters, 6 and 4, raced in and out in T-shirts and sweatpants. Um Fatima's full-length covering revealed only her eyes, but the difficulty of talking about her husband was evident; several times, she became so upset that she had to excuse herself and leave the room.

DOJ_NMG_0008462

Um Fatima and Hamdan were married in Sana in 1999. She had not met him before their wedding day but was nevertheless a happy bride. They stayed in Sana for a few months before returning to Afghanistan. Um Fatima was reluctant to go, and was shocked at the conditions once they arrived. Their mud-brick home had dirt floors and no running water or electricity. It was also remote: Tarnak Farms, the walled Qaeda complex in which they lived, was tucked into a vast expanse of treeless desert and brush about 30 minutes outside Kandahar. Um Fatima's days were spent alone inside the house with her infant daughter. Hamdan, she told me, would return in the early evenings, often with clothes stained with grease from his work fixing the various cars and trucks used on the farm. Um Fatima said she would occasionally complain to him about their life there. "Salim would always tell me to be patient, that someday we would return to Yemen," she said.

In her telling, Um Fatima was doing hardship duty for a few years so that her husband could earn good money working for a sheik she'd never heard of. Even now, years later, the fact that she had lived inside the walls of a heavily fortified Qaeda compound while her husband worked for the most infamous terrorist of our time does not seem to have penetrated her version of reality.

Um Fatima last saw her husband on Nov. 24, 2001. She was eight months pregnant. At the time, U.S. forces were closing in on Kandahar, the Taliban's last stronghold in Afghanistan. Hamdan, who had been away for a couple of months with bin Laden, had recently returned to take Um Fatima and their daughter to Pakistan. In a borrowed car, with American B-52's circling the skies overhead, they made their way through the Maruf mountains toward the border. Hamdan decided to let Um Fatima cross into Pakistan alone; security was tight, and even if the border guards had no idea that he worked for bin Laden, being a Yemeni man trying to leave was enough to cause suspicion. He told her he would find another way through and come find her in a few days.

Over the course of the next few weeks, as Um Fatima traveled deeper into Pakistan in the back of a pickup truck with a group of Afghan refugees, she gradually lost hope that she would ever see her husband again. Entering her ninth month of pregnancy, she became so hysterical, she told me, that some sympathetic strangers in Karachi bought her a plane ticket home. At the airport in Sana, she was interrogated for five hours about her husband's whereabouts. Um Fatima said she assumed he was dead.

Two and a half months later, she received a letter from him on International Committee of the Red Cross stationery. "My sweetheart, peace and blessings be upon you," it began. "I did not die. Allah prescribed a new life for me. Now I am a detainee with the Americans.. . ."

Um Fatima showed me all of the letters she has received from Hamdan since then. Later that night, the interpreter who read the dozen or so letters to me told me how unusual they were. Yemeni men tend to be commanding and aloof with their wives. Hamdan's letters were emotive, like those of a longing schoolboy. There are drawings of his dagger ("please take care of my jambiya for me"), simple poems ("the bird danced and the bird sang. . .") and the promise to "see each other very, very, very, very, very soon, God willing."

In a three-page military order issued on Nov. 13, 2001, President Bush authorized the special tribunals before which Salim Hamdan and other non-American enemy combatants are to be tried. The trials will held in Guantánamo before panels of three to seven military officers selected by an administration appointee. Two-thirds of a majority will be required for non-death-penalty convictions. (A death sentence requires unanimity.) These are war-crimes tribunals, though unlike the recent international tribunals in Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia, the list of offenses pertain to acts of terrorism rather than genocide.

The administration opted for these special tribunals over the U.S. criminal courts for a number of practical reasons. Broadly speaking, certain rights that would be considered fundamental in a civilian court wouldn't apply. If defendants were suspected terrorists, for instance, they couldn't very well be permitted to see all the evidence against them as some of it would no doubt be classified for national-security reasons.

Practical considerations aside, the creation of the nation's first war-crimes tribunals since World War II sent a symbolic message, putting the war against Islamic extremism in the same class as the war against Nazism. Moreover, the tribunals fit with the Bush administration's larger strategy to reassert and expand presidential authority in the aftermath of 9/11. The executive branch would have complete control. Not only was Congress - the body empowered by the Constitution to convene military tribunals - left out of the decision to establish them, but it also wasn't consulted on how the tribunals would work. Instead, the administration's lawyers wrote all of the rules, from the composition of the panels to the standards for admissible evidence to the definition of a war crime. The judiciary branch was also cut out of the process: contested verdicts would be reviewed not by a federal court of appeals but by a three-member panel picked by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

DOJ_NMG_0008463

The first batch of defendants for the tribunals, Hamdan and three others, were carefully selected and then repeatedly vetted on their journey up the chain of command. Case summaries were passed from the military lawyers assigned to the prosecution team to the Pentagon's adviser for the tribunals to Paul D. Wolfowitz, then deputy defense secretary, to President Bush. Hamdan was originally slated to be the first Arab tried.

While the government has not accused Hamdan of being a member of Al Qaeda per se, it does say that he picked up and delivered weapons for use by Qaeda associates, trained at a Qaeda camp and served as a bodyguard and driver for bin Laden. The formal charge being brought against him is conspiracy, which the administration defines as having "joined an enterprise of persons who shared a common criminal purpose." In a sense, the conspiracy charge is a logical one for prosecuting members of organizations like Al Qaeda that deliberately subdivide tasks and inform very few people about operations. "To capture the nature of some enterprises, to deconstruct what makes them effective, you have to focus on the different kinds of contributions, from the target spotter to the weapons transporter to the financier," says Ruth Wedgwood, a law professor at Johns Hopkins who helped the Pentagon revise some of the rules for the tribunals.

In the U.S. criminal courts, conspiracy is especially popular among prosecutors going after organized-crime rings; it gives them leverage to lean on foot soldiers to testify against their superiors. In the context of war-crimes tribunals, however, conspiracy becomes more complicated. Because it can be applied to people at every level, it can create a moral equivalence between low-level players and leaders. This very issue came up at Nuremberg, when an assistant attorney general in the Roosevelt administration attacked a Pentagon proposal to file conspiracy charges against German foot soldiers because it might, in the world's eyes, weaken the impact of the charges against the Nazi leaders. (The proposal was never adopted.) What's more, because conspiracy is such a broad, catch-all charge, it's an easy one for prosecutors to fall back on when their proof of guilt is thin. The U.S. criminal-court system has numerous protections against this - jury trials, judges who are insulated from politics, access to an independent court of appeals - most of which are absent from the tribunals. "In the American criminal system, we can have a conspiracy doctrine because we have this unique set of vibrant protections," says Neal Katyal, a Georgetown law professor, the architect of Hamdan's lawsuit against the Bush administration and a champion of the conspiracy charge in the criminal context. "But when it comes to war-crimes trials, the international consensus is that conspiracy is a no-no. When the U.S. Congress itself defined war crimes in two statutes in 1996 and 1997, it didn't include conspiracy."

Brig. Gen. Thomas L. Hemingway, an Air Force judge advocate general who is currently serving as the Pentagon's adviser on the tribunals, wouldn't discuss the government's evidence against Hamdan other than to point out that the prosecution has already given the defense 18,000 pages of discovery, including incriminating photographs and summaries of Hamdan's numerous statements to interrogators. "You want a one-word characterization of the case against Hamdan?" General Hemingway asked me. "Solid."

The government is certainly aware that the first trials will be closely scrutinized, and it seems improbable that it would choose a case that wasn't airtight. Hamdan's story also has narrative appeal. Unlike the vast majority of enemy combatants, who came to Afghanistan with the cresting wave of jihadis after 1999, he worked for bin Laden from 1996 until his capture in November 2001, a stretch of time that spanned not just 9/11 but also the 1998 attacks on two U.S. embassies in East Africa and the 2000 bombing of the U.S.S. Cole. And while many jihadis never even met bin Laden, Hamdan has not disputed working directly for him. A skilled prosecutor could turn his trial into the history of Al Qaeda's decade-long war against America and in so doing illuminate the nature of our enemy; the tribunals will be open to the press, except for when classified evidence is presented. Whatever evidence the government may have against Hamdan, it's hard to believe he could have worked for bin Laden for five years, through several high-profile terrorist attacks, without the knowledge of Al Qaeda's intentions or bin Laden's trust. And given that he has admitted to being a driver, the progression to transporting weapons is hardly a leap.

Yet it seems clear that Hamdan was not a high-ranking officer of Al Qaeda. By the time the United States decided to try him in 2003, there were certainly people in custody suspected of more serious crimes. Why not prosecute the more heinous offenders first? The government won't discuss how it settled on Hamdan, but it's easy to make some logical inferences. It stands to reason that the more hard-core the suspected terrorist, the more useful the information he possessed. The government may not have been done questioning the "highest value" detainees when it decided to issue its first indictments. (Hamdan's once-regular interrogations, which started almost immediately after his arrest and continued for the better part of two years, ceased in early 2004, shortly before the government announced that he'd been selected for trial.) The United States was also entering uncharted waters with the tribunals; terrorism is not yet codified as a war crime in international law. It's possible that the government wanted to wait to try its most prized detainees until it had the opportunity to test its legal theories on smaller players.

DOJ_NMG_0008464

The treatment of the prisoners may have been a factor as well. Lawyers for the administration had long since built their legal defense of coercive interrogations. Nevertheless, for the first tribunals the government may have wanted "clean" - as in not mistreated or tortured - defendants, both to avoid embarrassment and to prevent issues about the veracity of their statements to interrogators. This, however, is not a point that Hamdan's lawyers intend to concede. Hamdan has already implied in an affidavit that some of his statements were coerced. He says he was punched and kicked after failing to answer certain questions, and that one of his interrogators placed a pistol on the table between them during their sessions.

In late November, a few weeks after the Supreme Court agreed to hear Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, Hamdan was moved from his regular cellblock in Camp Delta to a separate, smaller cellblock called Tango. When his lawyers learned about the development in early December, they were not pleased. Not only had Hamdan's relocation violated the explicit order of a federal judge that he be kept among the general population at Delta, but he also would be right next to Ali Hamza Ahmed Sulayman al-Bahlul, a supposed Qaeda propagandist with a reputation for turning other detainees against their U.S. attorneys. "He's getting put with a known advocate for firing lawyers - against a federal order - and I don't even get told about it?" Katyal's co-counsel, Navy Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift, told me after Hamdan's move. Swift and Katyal promptly filed an emergency motion to have their client returned to a normal cellblock, and the authorities at Guantánamo complied.

Many detainees assume that their lawyers are American spies, a suspicion fed by the fact that nearly every document or letter that they bring in or take out of the camp has to pass through military censors. Hamdan's lawyers say they have a good relationship with him; still, they worry about losing him to what they consider to be the prison's more radical element. So while Katyal plots strategy from his office near Capitol Hill in Georgetown, Swift, a voluble, boyish-looking 44-year-old Navy JAG, shuttles back and forth to Guantánamo Bay with their interpreter, Charles Schmitz, a soft-spoken professor of geography and an expert in Yemeni culture, to reassure their client that they are on his side and to persuade him to have faith in a legal system that he doesn't understand.

It was hard enough for Swift, who was appointed by the government, to earn Hamdan's confidence when he first started meeting with him - in his Navy uniform - in early 2004; he now finds himself having to constantly earn it back. As the indefinite detentions of hundreds of Muslim men, many of whom were already predisposed to Islamic extremism, enters its fifth year, Guantánamo is turning into an anti-American hothouse. For the government, the radicalization of Guantánamo is a complicated issue. The main form of protest in the camps is the hunger strike, and a prisoner's starving himself to death would turn Guantánamo, already a public-relations problem, into a full-scale disaster. (As of Dec. 30, more than 30 detainees had been hospitalized and were being force-fed.) Radicalization also undermines one of the principal goals of imprisonment: deterrence. As Guantánamo's critics like to say, "If you weren't a terrorist when you went in, you will be when you're let out."

But radicalization has its advantages for the Bush administration too. Last summer, some detainees told their American lawyers that they would no longer meet with them, and a number went so far as to formally fire them. The government considers the legions of adversarial defense attorneys working pro bono for the detainees - from corporate lawyers to human-rights lawyers to law professors - to be an impediment to their ability to prosecute the war on terror. Among other things, the lawyers have filed hundreds of habeas corpus petitions in order to challenge their clients' continued detention without recourse.

More broadly, radicalization helps validate Guantánamo's existence. The more anti-American the detainees become, the greater the danger they pose and thus the more necessary it is to continue to detain them. So when Swift first heard about the decision to move Hamdan next to al-Bahul, he wondered whether it wasn't deliberate. "If they succeed in radicalizing Salim," he said, "then they've justified his trial." (The Pentagon would not comment on why an individual detainee might have been moved.)

Last August, Hamdan joined a prisonwide hunger strike to protest the conditions on Guantánamo. The detainees' numerous demands included the return of religious books that had been taken from them. When Swift next visited Hamdan in late August, he found him unusually intransigent. For two days, Hamdan refused to meet with him altogether. Not long after Swift returned home to Northern Virginia, he got a call from another lawyer at Guantánamo informing him that Hamdan, a slight man to begin with, had passed out from dehydration in his cell and was taken to the medical clinic at Delta and put on an IV drip. Swift flew back down to Guantánamo Bay almost immediately and managed to persuade Hamdan to start eating again by appealing to the same sense of solidarity that he says prompted him to join the strike in the first place. The best way to help his fellow detainees, Swift told him, was not to martyr himself but to follow through on their challenge to the system.

DOJ_NMG_0008465

Like the government, Hamdan's lawyers also see him as much more than a detainee; to them, he represents the pretext for a historic and unconstitutional presidential power grab. As Hamdan's lawyers and other critics see it, the administration, by unilaterally creating the tribunals, defining the offenses and handpicking the panels, is not only denying detainees fair trials, it is also violating bedrock principles of the American government. To put an even finer point on it, they say the Bush administration is undermining the very values it purports to be defending in its war against Islamic extremism. They would like to see Hamdan and other enemy combatants tried before a traditional military court, a pre-existing legal system approved by Congress with built-in provisions for the complications that arise during wartime.

Katyal, who served as Vice President Gore's co-counsel in the suit over the 2000 election, draws a sharp distinction between waging war, an act over which the president should have broad authority, and meting out justice. And so, working at his own expense with research support from a loose network of law students from Georgetown, Yale and the University of Michigan along with attorneys from the law firm Perkins Coie, Katyal has written more than a thousand pages of briefs arguing that the president has neither the authority to create the tribunals without explicit Congressional approval nor the right to deny Hamdan status as a prisoner of war, and in so doing strip him of protections guaranteed by the Geneva Conventions. "The Geneva Conventions were written precisely to make it difficult for political leaders facing political pressure to suspend basic rights and P.O.W. protections," Katyal says. "The moment we let a president say he can determine whether someone is a prisoner of war, other countries are going to start doing it back to us."

Katyal's arguments found traction in federal court in Washington in the fall of 2004. Just as Hamdan's second round of preliminary hearings were getting under way at Guantánamo, Judge James Robertson, a former Naval officer, ruled in his favor, declaring the tribunals illegal and abruptly halting the proceedings 30 minutes after they had begun. In July 2005, however, a three-judge appeals panel that included John G. Roberts Jr., now chief justice of the Supreme Court, overturned the decision. Katyal and Swift petitioned the Supreme Court for review, and in November, after delaying action on the case for several weeks, the court announced that it would hear Hamdan v. Rumsfeld.

This was not the final word, though. No sooner had the Supreme Court agreed to consider Hamdan's case than a Republican senator from South Carolina, Lindsey Graham, introduced a last-minute amendment to a defense-authorization bill explicitly denying all Guantánamo detainees habeas corpus rights, or access to the U.S. federal courts. This had been the administration's intent from the moment it started sketching out its legal strategy in the war on terror in the aftermath of 9/11, but the last time the issue came before the Supreme Court, in the spring of 2004 in another detainee case, the court ruled against the president (with a loud dissent from Justice Scalia). Now Graham was effectively interceding on the administration's behalf in what amounted to an end run around the Supreme Court.

Days later, however, Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat, persuaded Graham to change the wording of the amendment so that it would not derail pending cases, including Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. It has since passed both the House and the Senate and at press time awaited the president's signature.

What about the hundreds of detainees who have not yet filed suits protesting their imprisonments? Aside from trial or continuing detention, the only option for the United States is to send them back to their respective nations. To date, it has released about 260 men, including a handful of Yemenis, all of whom remain in prison in Yemen, no doubt at the behest of the Bush administration. But Yemen is an unpredictable ally. In November, the United States suspended it from an aid program worth hundreds of millions of dollars, citing enduring governmental corruption, fiscal irresponsibility and the failure to enact democratic reform. Meanwhile, Islamic fundamentalism continues to gather strength in Yemen. Recently, three of the country's best-known extremists, including al-Zindani, one of bin Laden's spiritual mentors, called for a new coalition dedicated to confronting Islam's enemies and promoting Muslim values. The ongoing detention of 100 Yemenis at Guantánamo Bay may only help their cause and increase their leverage with President Saleh. So the United States finds itself trapped between two unappealing choices: hold these men as the potentially endless war against terrorism goes on, or return them to a breeding ground for Islamic radicalism in Yemen.

DOJ_NMG_0008466

For his part, Hamdan's immediate concerns have more to do with day-to-day life at Guantánamo Bay - how much time detainees are permitted to exercise and at what time of day, what books they are allowed to read, what comfort items they are allowed to keep in their cells - than with the future of his historic lawsuit against the United States government. As Schmitz, his interpreter, told me recently, "The most important thing to him is what we can deliver in the camp, and that is zip."

Shortly after the Supreme Court agreed to hear Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, Swift visited Hamdan's cell armed with several front-page newspaper articles about the development. When Swift delivered the news, Hamdan smiled. Within a matter of minutes, though, his mood had visibly darkened, Swift says. Then Hamdan asked him, "What is this exactly that I've won?"

Germany's Merkel Says Guantanamo Should Be Shut (REU)

By Karin Strohecker

Reuters, January 8, 2006

BERLIN (Reuters) - German Chancellor Angela Merkel, in an interview published days before her first visit to the United States, said Washington should close its Guantanamo Bay prison camp and find other ways of dealing with terror suspects.

"An institution like Guantanamo can and should not exist in the longer term," Merkel said in an interview with the weekly magazine Der Spiegel published on Saturday. "Different ways and means must be found for dealing with these prisoners."

Merkel has vowed to repair ties with the United States, severely strained over the U.S.-led Iraq invasion, which her predecessor Gerhard Schroeder strongly opposed.

But her comments to Der Spiegel -- also covering ties with Moscow and the European Union -- suggested she would not shy away from speaking out on issues where disagreement exists.

There is widespread skepticism in Germany about the way the United States is fighting its "war on terror", compounded by the recent scandal over the CIA's abduction and detention of German citizen Khaled el-Masri -- later acknowledged to be a mistake.

Guantanamo Bay, the U.S. detention center in Cuba denounced by human rights activists and many governments, is deeply unpopular in Germany.

Merkel travels to Washington next week for her first visit since becoming chancellor in November, and will meet U.S. President George W. Bush on Friday.

Merkel told Der Spiegel she expected to speak to Bush about the fight against terrorism. "But I want to accentuate that our relationship with the U.S. will not be reduced to talking about fighting terrorism and the Iraq war," she added.

NO FRIENDSHIP WITH RUSSIA

Merkel described relations with the United States as a "friendship", but said the term "strategic partnership" would be more fitting to describe Germany's relationship with Moscow.

"I don't think we share as many of the same values yet with Russia as we do with the United States," she said. "But we have a huge interest in seeing Russia develop in a sensible way."

Merkel, who will meet President Vladimir Putin in Moscow days after her Washington trip, often criticized Schroeder when she was in opposition for forging "exclusive" ties with Russia at the expense of relations with smaller EU countries.

In the interview she said developments like the new law giving the Kremlin more control over non-governmental organizations worried her, while the recent row between Ukraine and Russia over gas prices, which has made Germans question their own heavy reliance on Russia for gas, had reinforced the need for stable relations.

"We need to do everything to save as much energy as possible and diversify our sources," she said, adding that Germany would avoid letting Russia be its only supplier.

Supplies to the 25-nation EU, which imports a quarter of its gas from Russia, were hit after Russian gas monopoly Gazprom cut deliveries to Ukraine on January 1 to push its demand for a fourfold price rise. The two neighbors reached a compromise 5-year supply deal earlier this week.

DOJ_NMG_0008467

On the European Union, Merkel said the issue of the bloc's constitution could be tackled when Germany took over the EU presidency in 2007, though much groundwork was needed.

"We need to have an all-encompassing discussion again," Merkel said. "I think it would be good if Europe stayed with the thought of having a constitution. I will lobby for that."

Learning Languages (WP)

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

WITH A CERTAIN amount of fanfare Thursday, President Bush launched the National Security Language Initiative, designed to expand Americans' knowledge of critical foreign languages such as Arabic, Chinese, Russian, Hindi and Farsi. Before a group of 120 university presidents, he described learning foreign languages as a "kind gesture" toward other cultures, as well as an important facet of American security: "We need intelligence officers who, when somebody says something in Arabic or Farsi or Urdu, knows what they're talking about."

We applaud Mr. Bush's sentiments, though the lateness and modesty of this initiative are perplexing. It has been clear for more than four years, since Sept. 11, 2001, that Americans are horrifically deficient in knowledge about those parts of the world that now most threaten us, as well as about those that may pose important security challenges in the future. Yet the initiative will receive funding only in the 2007 budget -- if, of course, Congress approves. Although the State Department issued a fact sheet describing the new program's impressive goals, department officials conceded that only 15 public schools in this country teach Arabic at the moment. Although 200 million Chinese students study English, there are also only about 2,000 teachers of Chinese in the United States. There's a long way to go.

Department officials also referred to the launch of Sputnik, the first Soviet satellite, whose appearance in the sky inspired national concern about the "knowledge gap" between the United States and the Soviet Union and a new emphasis on science and Russian-language education in this country. Sputnik was launched in 1957. President Dwight D. Eisenhower signed the National Defense Education Act, which funded science education, in 1958. He also set up the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in 1958 -- a year after Sputnik, not four or five. The administration should move as fast as possible to make up for lost time.

PATRIOT ACT:

Time To Ask: Who Are We? (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

President Bush concentrated in recent speeches on answering a question key to his war on global terrorism: Who is the enemy? But events and institutions conspire now to force Bush and all Americans to address a different question: Who are we?

Are we a nation in which the rule of law prevails even in times of emergency? Or has the coming of a new millennium, new technologies and the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, altered the underlying values and norms of American society in ways we have not had time to understand, much less codify?

Such broad questions peek out of the rising challenges from Congress, the courts, the media and others to Bush's insistence on the need for greater secrecy and far-reaching presidential powers to counter wartime dangers.

The Supreme Court is not likely to address those societal questions directly when it decides in the near future on the imprisonment, without access to the courts, of Jose Padilla, an American citizen as well as an al Qaeda suspect. And newspaper exposs on secret CIA prisons abroad and warrantless surveillance by the National Security Agency at home don't pose those big thoughts upfront. But the undercurrent of a historic identity check runs through those and other recent events.

The sense of a restoring of balance could be glimpsed even in the case of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, which in its own squalid way suggests the ending of a particularly self-indulgent moment in Washington history.

Eras flash by with startling velocity in today's hyper-connected, hyper-informed global society. The first five-year slice of the 21st century came to an end last weekend as Abramoff was striking a bargain with prosecutors to plead guilty to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy charges. Coincidence? Or a wave of excess cresting and starting to recede? Here's why I think it is the latter:

DOJ_NMG_0008468

A millennium mentality -- a psychological bubble in which people convince themselves that things are suddenly and irrevocably different, that old rules and laws don't apply to this particular moment/decade/generation -- dominated and helped corrupt the years on both sides of the changing of the century. Think of it as the too-many-zeroes syndrome.

That attitudinal matrix -- Germans call it zeitgeist -- spread across and out of the U.S. stock market and then hung on longer in global politics and business, especially after Sept. 11 and the U.S. response suggested that the world had spun onto a different, far more threatening axis.

Americans demanded that President Bush change the world and the nation, with Congress forcing an ill-conceived Department of Homeland Security on the administration and passing the USA Patriot Act in a whatever-it-takes rush. Bush and Vice President Cheney, it must be said, were eager to go in that direction anyway -- and have stayed on it longer than many in Congress, the media or the courts seem able or willing to sustain in the absence of new attacks at home.

Laws are not immutable. What is reasonable behavior, by the state or by individuals, changes as circumstances change. Courts exist to decide that. But the acceptance of the rule of law serves to root societies in their most innate and entrenched values. In times of significant upheaval -- such as these times -- the rule of law anchors what should not be changed in haste and superficiality.

The Padilla case is a good illustration of what I mean. Padilla was arrested in 2002 under suspicion of plotting to set off a "dirty" radioactive device in Chicago. Designated by Bush as an enemy combatant, he was held for three years without charges and for much of that time without access to counsel.

He turns out to have been a much smaller and less dangerous fish, according to charges finally filed against him in late November. That the Justice Department did not move much more quickly -- and less grudgingly -- to extend him his constitutional rights undercuts the administration's claim that it does everything in its power to respect the rule of law consistent with national security.

What happened in the Padilla case amounts to disrespect for the rule of law -- as does the failure over four years to amend the 1978 federal statute that prohibits warrantless eavesdropping.

Such disrespect for established legal tradition is a clear if implicit statement from the president and his aides about whom they think Americans are becoming in this stressful era of change and danger. But it is a question they alone will not get to settle.

jimhoagland@washpost.com

Editorial: How To Fix The Patriot Act: Maintain Checks And Balances On Government (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, January 8, 2006

President Bush assembled an impressive coterie of federal prosecutors at the White House last week to step up pressure on Congress to reauthorize the Patriot Act and to chide lawmakers for postponing a decision on the anti-terror legislation to early next month.

Make no mistake. The Patriot Act is an essential tool in this nation's defense strategy, particularly because it gives intelligence agencies the authority to share vital information about suspected terrorists and their activities. The president is right to push for Congress to do more than kick the can down the road.

But House leadership and the president are pushing a version of the legislation that fails to strike a proper balance between protecting America and infringing on civil liberties. These significant shortcomings must – and can – be fixed.

To its credit, the current version would allow the most controversial provisions to lapse again in four years, giving Congress and the American public another opportunity to assess the Patriot Act's impact on the war on terror and civil liberties. A periodic discussion about the scope and effectiveness of emergency anti-terror powers is a crucial part of maintaining checks on the power of the executive branch.

That's why Congress included the review provision when it authorized the Patriot Act in the shadow of the 9-11 attacks. The recent controversy over domestic spying illustrates why these checks and balances are mandatory.

DOJ_NMG_0008469

In other areas, the legislation doesn't meet the bar on protecting civil liberties. These changes should be made before passage:

Section 213

The current Patriot Act allows the government to conduct sneak-and-peek searches (also known, along with section 215, as the library provision) of homes and businesses without notice. The version the House leadership and the president are pushing would require notification within 30 days of the search and require the government to provide the court with updates before the notification delay can be extended. The government would be required to publicly report on the use of delayed-notice search warrants.

We recommend requiring the government to notify a person of a search within seven days, subject to special circumstance extensions, to better protect civil liberties.

Section 215

Under the Patriot Act, the government can use a secret court order to obtain copies of private medical, financial, educational and other records without connecting that person to terrorism. The government has only to assert that the information sought is relevant; the organization receiving the request is effectively barred from challenging the order or talking about it.

The version that the House leadership wants requires high-level approval for requests for sensitive categories of records such as library records and medical records, and it permits a judge to deny or modify a government request.

The measure also requires public reporting of the number of section 215 orders; certain additional classified reporting to congressional committees; and auditing by the Inspector General of the Justice Department's use of section 215.

We recommend also adding a provision requiring the government to connect a person to terrorism before combing through records and finding a more effective way for targets to challenge government assertions. These additional safeguards will discourage far-reaching fishing expeditions that could entangle innocent Americans.

National Security Letters

Most criminal investigations require a judge to authorize law enforcement to obtain documents or conduct searches. Not so with the National Security Letter, which allows government investigators to examine the records of suspected threats without first obtaining court approval.

We recommend meaningful court oversight of this process, to avoid the potential for abuse.

Extraneous provisions

The version that the House and president are backing includes new anti-drug policies and ex post facto changes to death penalty law that in some instances are unrelated to terrorism.

We recommend removing these changes, which are controversial on their face. The Patriot Act should be a clean, unfettered bill, not a repository for pet legislation.

Most of the Patriot Act should not worry Americans, who understand that civil liberties – especially in a time of national emergency – aren't without limits.

The common-sense revisions outlined here to provide clear and fair due process would shore up the concerns of all but the most ideologically driven civil libertarians.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Hurricane Fraud Suspects Held (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 8, 2006

A federal task force has arrested 143 persons nationwide for bribery, extortion and fraudulent claims on hurricane disaster funding, and at least 1,000 investigations are ongoing in New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0008470

"Unfortunately, we see it with every disaster, but we're working very closely with the inspector general and Homeland Security and U.S. attorneys to prosecute every single case we come across," said Nicol Andrews, Federal Emergency Management Agency spokeswoman.

Most of the cases involve false claims to aid earmarked for victims of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, but several extortion cases already are in the court system.

In St. Tammany Parish outside New Orleans, Councilman Joe Impastato was indicted last month on charges of extortion and money laundering.

Federal officials say Mr. Impastato pressured one debris removal contractor to hire a second contractor with whom he would share in half the profits. When the prime contractor declined, the official threatened to withhold parish payments for other work.

U.S. Attorney Jim Letten called the indictment "a clear and unambiguous signal of federal law enforcement's commitment to seek out, punish and deter corrupt and self-serving conduct by public officials who use their positions to unjustly enrich themselves at the expense of the citizens they serve."

In Georgia, three persons have been indicted by a grand jury for pretending to be Red Cross officials to solicit donations, and in a related gambling operation to sell tickets for a fake lottery to raise money for Katrina victims.

The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force created by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales after the storms devastated the Gulf Coast is investigating and prosecuting disaster-related federal crimes such as identity theft, procurement, insurance and charity fraud.

A Justice Department spokesman said arrests in 117 separate cases spanned 22 different districts.

In addition, the Homeland Security Inspector General's office is reviewing an estimated 350 contracts worth nearly $5 billion, and investigating more than 300 possible criminal cases, which so far have netted 51 arrests, 67 indictments and five convictions.

More than 7,000 calls have been logged on the inspector's general hot line to report fraud.

All Parts Of New Orleans Included In Rebuilding Plan (NYT)

By Gary Rivlin

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 7 - The city's official blueprint for redevelopment after Hurricane Katrina, to be released on Wednesday, will recommend that residents be allowed to return and rebuild anywhere they like, no matter how damaged or vulnerable the neighborhood, according to several members of the mayor's rebuilding commission.

The proposal appears to put the city's rebuilding panel on a collision course with its state counterpart, which will control at least some of the flow of federal rebuilding money to the city.

The primary author of the plan, Joseph C. Canizaro, said teams of outside experts would try to help residents of each neighborhood decide whether to rebuild or relocate. Those teams would help increase the odds of success for those residents who decided to return, Mr. Canizaro said.

The commission will propose that the city should discourage homeowners from rebuilding in the hardest hit areas until a plan can be hammered out, but will not forbid them from doing so.

But ultimately, the areas that fail to attract a critical mass of residents in 12 months will probably not survive as residential neighborhoods, Mr. Canizaro said, and are likely to end up as marshland as the city's population declines and its footprint shrinks.

People who rebuild in those areas will be forced to leave, according to the proposal. Though such a requirement would be emotionally wrenching, the commission will propose a buyout program to compensate those people at the market price before Hurricane Katrina, but it is not clear whether there will be federal financing for such a program.

Assuming the commission's recommendations are formally adopted by Mayor C. Ray Nagin, the plan will defer for a year one of the most contentious issues in the city's struggle to recover from the flooding that followed the hurricane: the fate of the most heavily damaged and flood-prone neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0008471

Many residents of low-lying neighborhoods like the Lower Ninth Ward and New Orleans East have said they are determined to rebuild their ravaged blocks, while some experts have argued that such areas are better returned to marshland for safety and economic reasons. Some civic leaders who had hoped the mayor's panel, the 17-member Bring Back New Orleans Commission, would take a firm stand on the issue expressed disappointment.

"There are some very tough decisions that have to be made here, and no one relishes making them," said Janet R. Howard, chief executive of the Bureau of Governmental Research, a nonprofit policy organization based in New Orleans. "But to say that people should invest their money and invest their energies and put all their hope into rebuilding and then in a year we'll re-evaluate, that's no plan at all."

At least one member of the state panel, the Louisiana Recovery Authority, has echoed that sentiment.

"Someone has to be tough, to stand up and to tell the truth," Sean Reilly, a member of the state commission, said in a speech this week. "Every neighborhood in New Orleans will not be able to come back safe."

Andy Kopplin, executive director of the state commission, declined to comment on the specifics of the city's report, which "hasn't been formally presented to us."

But he said his agency, when doling out federal dollars, would favor plans that emphasized safety and the wise use of precious resources.

"We want to make sure they invest in a smart way that provides a good return on investment," Mr. Kopplin said, adding that at the same time plans should be "true to the aspirations of local communities."

Mr. Canizaro, a prominent real estate developer here, acknowledged the possibility that Hurricane Katrina could spell the death of more than one New Orleans neighborhood. He cited a study by the Rand Corporation that estimated that in three years the city would have a population of no more than 275,000, down more than 40 percent from its pre-hurricane population of 465,000.

"It doesn't take a genius to figure if you're only going to have 40 or 50 percent of your original population, then there's going to be shrinking in the amount of land that's going to be needed," Mr. Canizaro said.

Yet deciding which neighborhoods should not be rebuilt involves far more than the cold rationale of geographic and demographic data, Mr. Canizaro said, especially considering the historic racial tensions in New Orleans. The hurricane devastated the lives of white and black alike, but the waters that roared though much of the city disproportionately flooded its predominantly black eastern half.

"Unfortunately, a lot of poor African-Americans had everything they own destroyed here," Mr. Canizaro said. "So we have to be careful about dictating what's going to happen, especially me as a white man. What's important is we give people an opportunity to determine their future, as best we can."

It is not clear, though, that people who choose to return to devastated neighborhoods will find much to surround them. The city has not promised full services to every neighborhood, and there may be no grocery stores or schools for miles.

It is not even certain that lenders will agree to grant mortgages in those neighborhoods without some guarantees that residents will be there for longer than a year.

The final report, as described by several commissioners, will include several ideas designed to stimulate the city's economy and culture, including a proposal to construct a light rail system and a plan to establish New Orleans as a world center of neuroscience research.

The commission will also recommend that the city create a redevelopment authority to serve as a land bank for blighted or abandoned properties and a vehicle through which federal funds will flow.

By creating an independent authority appointed by elected officials in all levels of government, several commissioners said, the hope is to insulate the redevelopment process from politics.

The most contentious issue, however, will be the redevelopment of neighborhoods. That battle began in earnest in November, when the Urban Land Institute, a prominent planning group based in Washington, proposed that the city temporarily ban redevelopment of properties in those areas hardest hit by flooding, including large tracts of New Orleans East, the Lower Ninth Ward and Lakeview.

DOJ_NMG_0008472

The suggestion was rejected by residents of those neighborhoods and their political representatives. Last month, the City Council passed a nonbinding resolution stating that residents should be free to rebuild immediately wherever they choose.

The notion that residents have a right to rebuild anywhere proved too starry-eyed for Alden J. McDonald Jr., a member of the mayor's commission and the chief executive of Liberty Bank and Trust, the city's largest black-owned bank. Though most of the bank's customers lived in the most damaged parts of town, and though Mr. McDonald himself owns a home in New Orleans East, he said it would be cruel to encourage people to move back "without first giving them all the facts."

"We really need to ask what kind of community it will be if there aren't adequate services," he said.

Mr. Canizaro, who as chairman of the commission's planning committee has found himself at the center of this debate, floated a compromise proposal at a commission meeting in mid-December: let people rebuild anywhere they want, then re-evaluate progress in three years. That way the market, and not planners, would determine which neighborhoods would come back.

The general sentiment, however, was that three years was too long, so Mr. Canizaro countered by shrinking the evaluation period to a year.

Critics of his plan say that if the city floods again in the near future, damaging rebuilt neighborhoods in the same places, there will be little sympathy and few federal dollars. But Mr. Canizaro said the prospect of a fortified flood control system, promised by the Bush administration, made him confident that the city would not suffer the same devastation from a storm similar to Hurricane Katrina.

That confidence, however, is not universal. Michael M. Liffmann, the associate executive director of the Louisiana Sea Grant College at Louisiana State University, which studies land-use issues along the Gulf Coast, said most experts agreed that the roughly one-quarter to one-third of the city located dangerously below sea level should not be rebuilt.

"There are parts of New Orleans that are not fit for human habitation," Mr. Liffmann said. "They never were and never will be. But these are as much social calls as they are scientific ones."

Evacuees' Hotel Bill $19 Million FEMA Paid For Housing At Over 650 State Lodges (AJC)

By Yolanda Rodríguez

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 8, 2006

Georgia hotels have billed taxpayers more than $19 million to house evacuees who fled after hurricanes Katrina and Rita ravaged the Gulf Coast last year.

And taxpayers will continue to foot the bill for as long as the Federal Emergency Management Agency continues its policy of housing evacuees in hotels.

So far, the federal agency has spent $325 million on hotel rooms across the nation, and it has been sharply criticized for the high cost of the hotels and for how it has handled the emergency.

Federal officials once hoped to have all evacuees out of hotels by Saturday, but under a federal judge's ruling, FEMA is required to keep the hotel program running until at least Feb. 7.

In Georgia, FEMA paid for rooms at more than 650 hotels — from the Ritz-Carlton in Atlanta, to the Econo Lodge in Decatur, to a $35-a-night room in Lowndes County.

Records obtained by The Atlanta Journal-Constitution through a federal Freedom of Information Act request provide the first public accounting of the local spending.

The records show the rooms averaged $67.47 a night (or more than $2,000 a month) and were booked in Georgia between Oct. 27, when FEMA took over housing evacuees from the American Red Cross, and Dec. 23. Most of the money was spent in metro Atlanta, and FEMA paid for 286,000 bookings.

Those records also show evacuees who arrived in the state were housed just about everywhere:

Some stayed at the Butler Street YMCA in Atlanta, with rooms costing an average $18.12 nightly. FEMA was billed about $1,015 for rooms at the YMCA.

The Ritz-Carlton on Peachtree Road in Buckhead billed FEMA $1,190 for rooms. But those rooms weren't nearly as expensive as one might think. They cost an average of $132.25 nightly, according to the records.

DOJ_NMG_0008473

The most expensive rooms were at the Embassy Suites on Peachtree Road in Buckhead. It charged an average $159.46 per room.

According to the FEMA records, the full-service hotel billed the federal government about $81,485.

Gretchen Demetrops, general manager of the Embassy Suites, would not comment on the room charges and referred all questions to the Hilton Hotels Corp. office in Memphis.

In an e-mailed response, Dawn Ray, senior manager for brand communications for Embassy Suites Hotels/Hilton Hotels Corp., said the Embassy Suites "is an upscale hotel brand, and that is a competitive rate for the Atlanta market, particularly in the Buckhead area."

"The hotel did in fact charge a $159 rate for some guests, among a variety of other rates. That was not a discounted rate."

But who decided where evacuees would stay — and how much taxpayers would spend to foot the bill?

Tara Inn tops list

At the Tara Inn & Suites in Jonesboro, the first evacuees began arriving at the hotel Sept. 10, nearly two weeks after Hurricane Katrina hit.

Often, they learned of the 126-room hotel through word of mouth, said Jeff Kashani, the owner.

By Dec. 23, according to the records, FEMA had spent more at the Tara Inn & Suites than at any other hotel in the state.

The independently owned hotel billed FEMA about $312,728 — or about $78 per night per room.

According to the hotel's Web site, rooms there start at $59 for a single queen for a Sunday-Thursday stay.

The most expensive room starts at $129 for a king Jacuzzi suite for stays on Fridays and Saturdays.

Kashani said he was surprised to hear that the Tara Inn & Suites topped the list.

He said the hotel, which began operating in January 2003, charged FEMA the best rates it could — between $59 and $99. He noted that the rooms are suites and have kitchenettes.

Hotel employees also cooked Thanksgiving dinner for the evacuees, and the hotel and its staff donated Christmas gifts for the families, he said.

"We try to be nice," Kashani said.

Felecia Perry, the general manager, said 116 adults and 42 children are still staying at the Tara Inn.

The hotel was packed with evacuees from September through November, Perry said. It maxed out on hurricane evacuees with about 200 people in 60 rooms.

"Our rates are good," Perry said. "We go overboard with extras. We buy groceries and clothing if people are in need."

While some evacuees stayed at the Tara Inn & Suites, others were making reservations at hotels across the state, painting a somewhat disorganized picture of the scramble to suddenly house some of the 43,500 people who arrived in Georgia after they were displaced

Evacuees "were making reservations just like you and me," said Ray, of the Embassy Suites Hotels/Hilton Hotels Corp.

Ray said her hotels charged the federal government "pretty competitive" rates — and the price of the rooms did not go down once FEMA began paying for them.

Cost variation

But what about the wide disparity in room rates?

Mark Woodworth, executive vice president of PKF Consulting, a hotel advisory firm, said that disparity is based on several factors.

"The quality of the property goes a long way to explain the difference in prices and just how full or empty the hotels were at the time these rooms were needed," Woodworth said.

— Staff writers Craig Schneider and Leon Stafford and database editor David A. Milliron contributed to this article.

Katrina Evacuees Seek Jobs, Anchors (LAT)

By Tomas Alex Tizon

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008474

HOUSTON — The two women never met but probably crossed paths in an abandoned supermarket — now a disaster recovery center — on the south side of town where railroad tracks crisscross the terrain.

Monique Moses and Pauline Gallien spend lots of time at the center, on opposite sides of the partition. Moses is a Hurricane Katrina evacuee from New Orleans. She is looking for a job. Gallien is a longtime Houstonian whose job is to find jobs for people like Moses. Right now, neither is having much success.

Their frustration embodies the question now facing this East Texas metropolis, which took in more evacuees — an estimated 200,000 — than any city outside of Louisiana: What is to be done with the thousands who, with their basic needs met, face the most vital step in their long-term recovery?

"I need to work," says Moses, 26. "I can't be like them that sit on their butts all day. I gotta have something to do. I just don't know if this is the place I can do it."

Before Katrina wrecked her hometown, Moses worked as a shift manager at a Radley's restaurant. Both her apartment and the restaurant were destroyed.

Four months after Katrina, she and her two daughters are resettled in southwest Houston. Her girls, ages 5 and 6, are enrolled in school, and their apartment has most of the accouterments of a home. The only missing piece is a livelihood to keep it all together.

Moses says she has pounded the pavement and filled out applications everywhere: McDonald's, Wendy's and the Home Depot, to name a few places. She has worn her best "customer service" face, smiling until her cheeks hurt. Day after day.

Only one employer, a Jack-in-the-Box, gave her an interview. The manager offered $6 an hour, and Moses told him she needed at least $8 an hour to survive. He never called back.

Her only lifeline has been the disaster-recovery center operated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. She has come to know the building well: a flat, sprawling, swarming place where workers from dozens of organizations stand by to help evacuees on almost every aspect of reestablishing their lives.

Moses has gone there seeking help on numerous fronts — housing, transportation, insurance claims — but never stopped at the cluster of tables devoted to placing people in jobs. Moses, like many evacuees, has never used an employment service.

If she had stopped, she probably would have met Gallien.

Gallien, 40, works for a nonprofit employment agency called the WorkSource, whose main service is matching clients with jobs listed in a database. Gallien's station sits near the front entrance of the FEMA center.

From 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Saturday, WorkSource staffers sit behind folding tables, equipped with the barest of tools — a notepad, telephone and computer — greeting every evacuee with, "How can I help you?"

Even now, Gallien and her three colleagues see 100 to 130 evacuees a day. Some need help filling out unemployment forms or putting together a resume; many have just moved into more stable housing and are beginning to seek work.

"The typical person we're seeing now is lower-skilled, a menial worker or restaurant worker, with a lower education level, not as strong in the communication skills," Gallien says. "A lot of times they got by doing odd jobs and got paid on the side, so they don't have an employment history."

Gallien says these clients "face a real challenge" in Houston, where about 20% of residents live below the poverty line.

"Houston was full of people with the same backgrounds before the evacuees got here," she says. "For every low-skilled evacuee, there are two Houston people with the same skill level competing for the same job."

A recent federal survey suggests that 21% of Katrina evacuees actively seeking work are still unemployed.

The proportion could be higher in Houston, where the job market, so tied to energy production, remains tight. The city's unemployment rate, roughly 6% in November, has consistently hovered above the national average.

"The folks with skills in the oil and gas industry found jobs," says M. Ray Perryman, head of a Texas economics analysis company. "People who fill low-wage, service- and retail-type jobs — it might take awhile for the economy to absorb them."

A reciprocal relationship has long existed between New Orleans and Houston, 327 miles apart. Houstonians traveled to New Orleans for culture and cuisine; New Orleanians went to Houston for jobs and better schools.

So when the storm hit, and New Orleanians needed a place to go, Houston put out the welcome mat and busloads of evacuees headed in this direction.

DOJ_NMG_0008475

Houston, population 2 million, offered the most generous resettlement program of any large U.S. city.

An enormous city-led task force, using a voucher program, paid for 12 months of housing for more than 100,000 evacuees.

In mid-December, Mayor Bill White declared that Houston was "full."

It's not clear whether FEMA will help pay for proposed expansion of city services to handle the increase in population.

The Houston Police Department has requested 400 new officers, school districts have pleaded for additional teachers, and social service agencies have outlined the need for more funding.

But all the talk of expansion may be moot if evacuees don't stay.

As many as 50,000 evacuees have already left the city, according to city officials.

"How many stay depends a lot on how many find jobs," Gallien says. "The answer to that question nobody knows yet."

Moses is mulling over a Plan B. "I can't find work, we can't stay," she says.

She has no emotional tie to Houston — a government-hired bus driver brought her and 50 other evacuees to the Astrodome a day after Katrina. She has been here ever since. She's not sure she even likes this city, which seems to have no real center.

In fact, this flat, humid, sprawling metropolis is the largest U.S. city without zoning laws, and the lack thereof has created numerous indistinct commercial districts and helter-skelter neighborhoods.

The Moses family moved into an apartment complex in the southwest, a once middle-class area turning into a lower-middle-class neighborhood of small, sagging houses. The Pines of Westbury is made up of 940 units divided among cubic two-story brick buildings evenly spaced over 5 acres. Most residents are black or Latino. Katrina evacuees occupy about 90 units.

It's 2:30 in the afternoon, and Moses keeps glancing at her watch.

Her apartment is a hangout for evacuees at the Pines, and she's expecting a small group to come over. She sinks into her couch, lets out a sigh and wonders out loud what happened to all her FEMA money.

"It went fast," she says incredulously.

Aside from the housing voucher that allowed her to move into this complex, she got $2,000 in emergency funds and another $2,358 for move-in costs. The money went toward furniture, clothing and groceries. Then she rented a car for a month to look for work. That cost a grand.

Since then, job-hunting by bus has worn her out.

There's a knock at the door. It's her boyfriend, Lionel Robinson, 35, just back from Laredo, Texas. He lives at the Pines too, just around the corner. Like Moses, Robinson is a New Orleans native who lost everything to Katrina, including a job he treasured. He was a city bus driver making close to $50,000 a year.

Recently Robinson landed a job as a long-haul truck driver making 37 cents a mile. One recent week, he drove only 1,200 miles, including the trip to Laredo, earning $444 before taxes. "Not enough," he says.

He, too, is looking for another job.

Within minutes, Moses' girls come through the door with a neighbor and two young cousins. One of Moses' aunts arrives with a teenage daughter. Hugs and how-are-yous are exchanged. Soon the apartment bustles with chatter.

The adults gather around the dining table, and the subject quickly turns to the future.

They are all in the same boat: dislocated, scratching for income and feeling uncertain about everything.

"We can't stay here," says evacuee Rosezina Jefferson, Moses' oldest friend from New Orleans. She moved into the Pines with Moses' help. "I might stay here for a minute, but one way or another, I'm going back home."

"There is no more home," Moses says. "Home ain't home no more."

Moses has another idea: road trip.

The others turn silent.

Moses says if she and Robinson don't have good jobs by next summer, she'll take the insurance money she's been waiting for — her car was destroyed by the flood — and use it to pay for a job-seeking, home-finding road trip all over Louisiana.

She'd leave the kids with their father, and she and Jefferson and Robinson would hit the highway for a month. They'd go to smaller cities like Lafayette and Lake Charles, places closer to New Orleans.

"A road trip? For a month?" Jefferson says.

"A road trip," says Robinson, considering the idea.

DOJ_NMG_0008476

You must have a plan, Moses says.

And the plan is, "Come June, July, August, we're getting in a car and going. If there's nothing for us here, we'll have to find it somewhere else."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq's Shiites And Kurds Said To Need Sunnis For Coalition (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 7 - The leading Kurdish and Shiite political groups probably did not win enough seats in last month's national parliamentary elections to form a governing coalition on their own, and will have to persuade some Sunni Arab legislators to join their alliance, a Western diplomat here said Saturday.

It will take a two-thirds majority in the 275-seat Iraqi Parliament to form a new government and appoint an executive branch. Final results from the Dec. 15 election are not expected until later this month, but the dominant Shiite alliance is thought to have won less than half the seats in the new Parliament. The Kurds and Sunni Arabs are believed to have won roughly 20 percent each.

The popular view among political parties here and the Iraqi news media has been that the Shiites and Kurds will likely have enough seats to form a government on their own, if by only a very small margin.

However, the Western diplomat said Saturday that an analysis of preliminary election results indicated that the Shiites and Kurds would need to include others to reach a two-thirds majority.

The preliminary results, the diplomat said, "suggest that together the Shia and the Kurds cannot reach two-thirds by themselves."

"I emphasize those are unofficial returns," the diplomat said. "So far, the trend that you can extrapolate out of the unofficial returns is that it doesn't look like they got it. They need the Sunni votes to get to their two-thirds majority."

Sunni Arabs are not the only non-Kurdish and non-Shiite alliances to gain seats in Parliament. The political slate put together by the former interim prime minister, Ayad Allawi, a secular Shiite, is believed to have won close to 10 percent of the seats.

Even though he is a Shiite, Mr. Allawi has often been at odds with the more conservative and Islamist Shiite leadership, and he is also a former member of the Baath Party. Some members of the governing Shiite coalition have said they would include Sunnis in their government before agreeing to carve out a place for Mr. Allawi.

American officials say that the best hope to stabilize Iraq's shaky security and political situation and help deflate the insurgency is for Sunni Arabs to have a meaningful role in the new government that convinces the Sunni population that they have a voice in how the country is run.

Tensions between Sunni Arabs and the ruling Shiite groups remain high, however. Shiites have accused Sunni political leaders of encouraging violence, while Sunni groups say Shiite-controlled security forces have been carrying out torture and assassinations against Sunnis.

In fact, the Western diplomat said some Sunni political leaders had discussed setting up "neighborhood self-defense forces" - armed local Sunni militias - to protect Sunni residents against assaults from Shiite policemen and troops. The diplomat said he was not aware of any such Sunni forces being put into action, however.

President Jalal Talabani said Saturday that he believed it would not take nearly as long as the three months it took last spring to reach agreement on the composition of a new government.

Mr. Talabani said the Kurds had held productive meetings in recent days with the Shiites, with Mr. Allawi's party and with the largest Sunni Arab party, the Iraqi Consensus Front.

Mr. Talabani, who met Saturday with Foreign Minister Jack Straw of Britain, said that once the final election results were released, "forming the next government will not take a long time."

DOJ_NMG_0008477

Diplomats Protest Iraq Violence (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Jan. 7 -- In a series of public statements Saturday, Western officials condemned a wave of recent attacks in Iraq, saying the violence was intended to derail Iraqi efforts to form a government based on national unity.

At the same time, Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, said that Shiite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish political groups were working toward that end. In a meeting in the capital with Jack Straw, the British foreign secretary, he said Iraqi parties had agreed in principle on a coalition of national unity, the Associated Press reported.

But a Western diplomat who briefed reporters here said he expected a "complicated negotiation" involving several sides now that Sunni Arab parties appear to have won enough seats in recent elections to play a role in the process of forming a government.

It was a change, he said, from the two-sided political environment that followed elections last January. In that election, Sunni Arabs, who represent about 20 percent of Iraq's population, turned out in very small numbers, yielding the political initiative to Shiite and Kurdish parties.

"Last spring, it was the Shia and the Kurds. It was a very straightforward negotiation," said the diplomat, who gave the briefing on condition he not be named. "This time it may have three, four, even five sides to it."

He said that talks about a coalition government were now in an "exploratory" stage and that once final election results were announced near the end of the month, negotiations would shift "from second to fifth gear sort of overnight."

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who was in Iraq Saturday as part of a visiting congressional delegation, also stressed the importance of forming a government quickly.

"It seems to me you've got a six-month window in which a national unity government has to be formed," in addition to finalizing the country's constitution, making major progress in repairing its infrastructure and improving security, Obama said in an interview. "Time is not necessarily on our side."

Ultimately, Obama said, "there has to be a recognition on the part of the Sunnis that they're a minority of the population." In turn, he said, the Shiite majority needs to recognize the rights of Sunni Arabs.

But the Western diplomat said the insurgent attacks Wednesday and Thursday, which killed nearly 200 Iraqis and 11 U.S. service members, were intended to drive a wedge between Sunni Arabs and Shiites.

Two attacks on Saturday appeared to fit the same pattern. A suicide car bomber blew himself up next to an Interior Ministry police patrol, killing one officer and wounding 11 people, the Associated Press reported. A few hours later, gunmen fired on a car in Baghdad, killing a woman and wounding two men, the news service reported.

The Western diplomat noted, however, that one recent attack -- on a police recruiting station in Ramadi on Thursday -- killed dozens of Sunni Arabs and appeared to have broken the patience of tribal leaders who have provided support to insurgent groups.

People in the region are "now publicly calling for an end to the violence," he said. "I don't want to declare victory, because there's a long way to go, but something different is happening."

Special correspondent Omar Fekeiki contributed to this report.

Unity Government At Hand, Iraqi Says (WT/AP)

By Jason Straziuso, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 8, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraq's fractious political groups are moving ahead to shape a national-unity government, progress that should help stop the carnage of the past several days, the prime minister and other leaders said yesterday.

Iraq's Kurdish president, Jalal Talabani, predicted that a new government could be formed within weeks. He made the comments after meeting with visiting British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, who said Iraqis remain optimistic about their future despite suffering through a violent week, when nearly 200 people were killed in two days, including 11 U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0008478

In an effort to help draw Sunni Arabs into the political process as a way to dampen the violence, U.S. officials for months have been communicating directly or through channels with members of the disaffected minority connected to the insurgency.

A Western diplomat yesterday reported a recent "uptick" in those contacts. Those insurgents "sense that the political process does protect the Sunni community's interest," the diplomat said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. A similar "uptick" in communication occurred after parliamentary elections last year, he said.

A U.S. official said the coalition does not talk to foreign terrorists or supporters of Saddam Hussein's ousted regime, but said it was important to isolate extremists from the broader Sunni Arab community. He also spoke only on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the topic.

Meeting with Mr. Straw in Baghdad, Mr. Talabani said Shi'ite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish political groups had agreed in principle on a national-unity government that could be formed within a few weeks. Western diplomats in Baghdad have speculated that a government could be in place by the second half of February.

"Everyone is expecting to have it as soon as possible, but you know the devil is in the details," Mr. Talabani said.

He said it should be easier to form a new government than it was after the Jan. 30 elections last year, when it took nearly three months.

"We are expecting within weeks, God willing, we will be able to form the government," he said.

Mr. Talabani and other Kurdish leaders met over the New Year's holiday with Sunni Arab and Shi'ite political leaders. The meetings in northern Irbil helped shape agreement on the general outlines of a broad-based coalition government.

Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a member of the Shi'ite alliance and head of the Dawa party, said in a separate meeting with Mr. Straw that the Shi'ite "alliance and the coalition of Kurdistan and the other tickets, fortunately, are keen to make a national unity government."

"That common feeling will make the process easier," he said.

Mr. Straw said earlier that the situation in Iraq remained violent, but its politicians were optimistic.

"I was trying to avoid any kind of pretense about the situation here in Iraq," Mr. Straw told British Broadcasting Corp. radio. "It is very difficult. People are being killed by terrorism."

Violence was greatly diminished yesterday. Four persons were killed in attacks around the country, and police found the bodies of four females, blindfolded and handcuffed, who apparently had been shot to death in Baghdad, officials said.

Almost 200 people were killed in attacks Wednesday and Thursday.

Thousands of angry Shi'ites also demonstrated against the wave of bloodshed and what they claimed was American support for Sunni Arab politicians in Baghdad's Sadr City slum on Friday.

Final results from the elections could be released this week and could be fully certified by the end of the month after any appeals are heard. Some Sunni Arabs have protested that the vote was tainted by fraud.

The results are expected to show the religious Shi'ite United Iraqi Alliance with a strong lead. The Shi'ites will need to form a coalition government, however, with support from Kurdish and Sunni Arab political groups.

Lawmakers Call On Iraq To Shape Up (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

BAGHDAD — A bipartisan congressional delegation that included Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) had a blunt assessment Saturday for Iraq's political leaders: Shape up, or America will ship out.

The continued U.S. commitment to Iraq is becoming a tougher sell back home, said the four lawmakers, and unless Iraqis start showing signs of progress by creating a broad-based government and security forces that incorporate all of Iraq's ethnic and sectarian groups, Americans will lose patience, they said.

"It's going to be hard to convince American taxpayers to pour water into a leaky bucket," said Obama, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He spoke briefly with a small group of reporters inside former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's Republican Palace, which is now used as an annex for the U.S. Embassy.

DOJ_NMG_0008479

Obama, with Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.), Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) and Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.), arrived in Iraq on Saturday for a whirlwind trip that included meetings with American intelligence and reconstruction specialists and Iraqi election officials in the capital's U.S.-protected Green Zone. They plan visits today with troops in outlying provinces.

Although the lawmakers said their constituents were proud of America's accomplishments in Iraq, they were loath to commit further U.S. money and troops if the Iraqi government elected last month did not include all the country's ethnic and political factions.

"We are willing to continue to help them as long as they are willing to move forward toward a national unity government," said Bond, known as a backer of the U.S. military. "We are not here to participate in something that is dominated by one particular party or one particular sect."

To date, Congress has approved more than $300 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to the Congressional Research Service. And lawmakers say the Pentagon is drafting a request for as much as $100 billion more.

With 2006 midterm elections on the horizon and American opinion polls showing wavering enthusiasm for involvement in Iraq, pressure has been building on members of Congress and President Bush to demonstrate progress or to craft an exit plan.

Bayh, who is eyeing a 2008 White House bid, outlined half a dozen milestones that he and his colleagues said they would like to see Iraqis achieve over the next six months to be able to convince American voters that the continued commitment to Iraq was worthwhile.

Among the goals were the quick formation of a government, signs of economic progress, acceptance of the political process by Sunni Arabs and the formation of a civil service and security forces that reflect Iraq's various ethnic and sectarian groups.

Iraqis must ask themselves some tough questions, Bayh said: "Do the Iraqis want to live together in one country? Are they willing to make the tough political compromises necessary to bring that about? If they don't, in spite of all our help [the conflict] will not end."

It remains unclear how much sway U.S. officials will have over the new Iraqi government, which appears set to be dominated Shiite Islamists with ties to Iran and by autonomy-minded Kurds.

After a week marked by major insurgent attacks, little violence was reported Saturday. Police special forces on patrol in eastern Baghdad were hit by a car bomb, injuring four commandos and five civilians.

The Real Choice In Iraq (WP)

By Zbigniew Brzezinski

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

"Bring 'em on."

-- President Bush on Iraqi insurgents, summer 2003

The insurgency is "in its last throes."

-- Vice President Cheney,

summer 2005

" . . . there are only two options before our country: victory or defeat."

-- President Bush, Christmas 2005

The administration's rhetorical devolution speaks for itself. Yet, with some luck and with a more open decision-making process in the White House, greater political courage on the part of Democratic leaders and even some encouragement from authentic Iraqi leaders, the U.S. war in Iraq could (and should) come to an end within a year.

"Victory or defeat" is, in fact, a false strategic choice. In using this formulation, the president would have the American people believe that their only options are either "hang in and win" or "quit and lose." But the real, practical choice is this: "persist but not win" or "desist but not lose."

Victory, as defined by the administration and its supporters -- i.e., a stable and secular democracy in a unified Iraqi state, with the insurgency crushed by the American military assisted by a disciplined, U.S.-trained Iraqi national army -- is unlikely. The U.S. force required to achieve it would have to be significantly larger than the present one, and the Iraqi support for a U.S.-led counterinsurgency would have to be more motivated. The current U.S. forces (soon to be reduced) are not large enough to crush the anti-American insurgency or stop the sectarian Sunni-Shiite strife. Both problems continue to percolate under an inconclusive but increasingly hated foreign occupation.

DOJ_NMG_0008480

Moreover, neither the Shiites nor the Kurds are likely to subordinate their specific interests to a unified Iraq with a genuine, single national army. As the haggling over the new government has already shown, the two dominant forces in Iraq -- the religious Shiite alliance and the separatist Kurds -- share a common interest in preventing a restoration of Sunni domination, with each determined to retain a separate military capacity for asserting its own specific interests, largely at the cost of the Sunnis. A truly national army in that context is a delusion. Continuing doggedly to seek "a victory" in that fashion dooms America to rising costs in blood and money, not to mention the intensifying Muslim hostility and massive erosion of America's international legitimacy, credibility and moral reputation.

The administration's definition of "defeat" is similarly misleading. Official and unofficial spokesmen often speak in terms that recall the apocalyptic predictions made earlier regarding the consequences of American failure to win in Vietnam: dominoes falling, the region exploding and U.S. power discredited. An added touch is the notion that the Iraqi insurgents will then navigate the Atlantic and wage terrorism on the American homeland.

The real choice that needs to be faced is between:

An acceptance of the complex post-Hussein Iraqi realities through a relatively prompt military disengagement -- which would include a period of transitional and initially even intensified political strife as the dust settled and as authentic Iraqi majorities fashioned their own political arrangements.

An inconclusive but prolonged military occupation lasting for years while an elusive goal is pursued.

It is doubtful, to say the least, that America's domestic political support for such a futile effort could long be sustained by slogans about Iraq's being "the central front in the global war on terrorism."

In contrast, a military disengagement by the end of 2006, derived from a more realistic definition of an adequate outcome, could ensure that desisting is not tantamount to losing. In an Iraq dominated by the Shiites and the Kurds -- who together account for close to 75 percent of the population -- the two peoples would share a common interest in Iraq's independence as a state. The Kurds, with their autonomy already amounting in effect to quasi-sovereignty, would otherwise be threatened by the Turks. And the Iraqi Shiites are first of all Arabs; they have no desire to be Iran's satellites. Some Sunnis, once they were aware that the U.S. occupation was drawing to a close and that soon they would be facing an overwhelming Shiite-Kurdish coalition, would be more inclined to accommodate the new political realities, especially when deprived of the rallying cry of resistance to a foreign occupier.

In addition, it is likely that both Kuwait and the Kurdish regions of Iraq would be amenable to some residual U.S. military presence as a guarantee against a sudden upheaval. Once the United States terminated its military occupation, some form of participation by Muslim states in peacekeeping in Iraq would be easier to contrive, and their involvement could also help to cool anti-American passions in the region.

In any case, as Iraqi politics gradually become more competitive, it is almost certain that the more authentic Iraqi leaders (not handpicked by the United States) -- to legitimate their claim to power -- will begin to demand publicly a firm date for U.S. withdrawal. That is all to the good. In fact, they should be quietly encouraged to do so, because that would increase their popular support while allowing the United States to claim a soberly redefined "Mission Accomplished."

The requisite first step to that end is for the president to break out of his political cocoon. His policymaking and his speeches are the products of the true believers around him who are largely responsible for the mess in Iraq. They have a special stake in their definition of victory, and they reinforce his convictions instead of refining his judgments. The president badly needs to widen his circle of advisers. Why not consult some esteemed Republicans and Democrats not seeking public office -- say, Warren Rudman or Colin Powell or Lee Hamilton or George Mitchell -- regarding the definition of an attainable yet tolerable outcome in Iraq?

Finally, Democratic leaders should stop equivocating while carping. Those who want to lead in 2008 are particularly unwilling to state clearly that ending the war soon is both desirable and feasible. They fear being labeled as unpatriotic. Yet defining a practical alternative would provide a politically effective rebuttal to those who mindlessly seek an unattainable "victory." America needs a real choice regarding its tragic misadventure in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0008481

The writer was national security adviser to President Jimmy Carter.

Saddam's Terror Training Camps (WKLYSTD)

By Stephen F. Hayes

Weekly Standard, January 16, 2006

THE FORMER IRAQI REGIME OF Saddam Hussein trained thousands of radical Islamic terrorists from the region at camps in Iraq over the four years immediately preceding the U.S. invasion, according to documents and photographs recovered by the U.S. military in postwar Iraq. The existence and character of these documents has been confirmed to THE WEEKLY STANDARD by eleven U.S. government officials.

The secret training took place primarily at three camps--in Samarra, Ramadi, and Salman Pak--and was directed by elite Iraqi military units. Interviews by U.S. government interrogators with Iraqi regime officials and military leaders corroborate the documentary evidence. Many of the fighters were drawn from terrorist groups in northern Africa with close ties to al Qaeda, chief among them Algeria's GSPC and the Sudanese Islamic Army. Some 2,000 terrorists were trained at these Iraqi camps each year from 1999 to 2002, putting the total number at or above 8,000. Intelligence officials believe that some of these terrorists returned to Iraq and are responsible for attacks against Americans and Iraqis. According to three officials with knowledge of the intelligence on Iraqi training camps, White House and National Security Council officials were briefed on these findings in May 2005; senior Defense Department officials subsequently received the same briefing.

The photographs and documents on Iraqi training camps come from a collection of some 2 million "exploitable items" captured in postwar Iraq and Afghanistan. They include handwritten notes, typed documents, audiotapes, videotapes, compact discs, floppy discs, and computer hard drives. Taken together, this collection could give U.S. intelligence officials and policymakers an inside look at the activities of the former Iraqi regime in the months and years before the Iraq war.

The discovery of the information on jihadist training camps in Iraq would seem to have two major consequences: It exposes the flawed assumptions of the experts and U.S. intelligence officials who told us for years that a secularist like Saddam Hussein would never work with Islamic radicals, any more than such jihadists would work with an infidel like the Iraqi dictator. It also reminds us that valuable information remains buried in the mountain of documents recovered in Afghanistan and Iraq over the past four years.

Nearly three years after the U.S. invasion of Iraq, only 50,000 of these 2 million "exploitable items" have been thoroughly examined. That's 2.5 percent. Despite the hard work of the individuals assigned to the "DOCEX" project, the process is not moving quickly enough, says Michael Tanji, a former Defense Intelligence Agency official who helped lead the document exploitation effort for 18 months. "At this rate," he says, "if we continue to approach DOCEX in a linear fashion, our great-grandchildren will still be sorting through this stuff."

Most of the 50,000 translated documents relate directly to weapons of mass destruction programs and scientists, since David Kay and his Iraq Survey Group--who were among the first to analyze the finds--considered those items top priority. "At first, if it wasn't WMD, it wasn't translated. It wasn't exploited," says a former military intelligence officer who worked on the documents in Iraq.

"We had boxloads of Iraqi Intelligence records--their names, their jobs, all sorts of detailed information," says the former military intelligence officer. "In an insurgency, wouldn't that have been helpful?"

How many of those unexploited documents might help us better understand the role of Iraq in supporting transregional terrorists? How many of those documents might provide important intelligence on the very people--Baathists, former regime officials, Saddam Fedayeen, foreign fighters trained in Iraq--that U.S. soldiers are fighting in Iraq today? Is what we don't know literally killing us?

ON NOVEMBER 17, 2005, Michigan representative Pete Hoekstra wrote to John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence. Hoekstra is chairman of the House Intelligence Committee. He provided Negroponte a list of 40 documents recovered in postwar Iraq and Afghanistan and asked to see them. The documents were translated or summarized, given titles by intelligence analysts in the field, and entered into a government database known as HARMONY. Most of them are unclassified.

DOJ_NMG_0008482

For several weeks, Hoekstra was promised a response. He finally got one on December 28, 2005, in a meeting with General Michael Hayden, principal deputy director of national intelligence. Hayden handed Hoekstra a letter from Negroponte that promised a response after January 1, 2006. Hoekstra took the letter, read it, and scribbled his terse response. "John--Unacceptable." Hoekstra told Hayden that he would expect to hear something before the end of the year. He didn't.

"I can tell you that I'm reaching the point of extreme frustration," said Hoekstra, in a phone interview last Thursday. His exasperated tone made the claim unnecessary. "It's just an indication that rather than having a nimble, quick intelligence community that can respond quickly, it's still a lumbering bureaucracy that can't give the chairman of the intelligence committee answers relatively quickly. Forget quickly, they can't even give me answers slowly."

On January 6, however, Hoekstra finally heard from Negroponte. The director of national intelligence told Hoekstra that he is committed to expediting the exploitation and release of the Iraqi documents. According to Hoekstra, Negroponte said: "I'm giving this as much attention as anything else on my plate to make this work."

Other members of Congress--including Rep. Dana Rohrabacher and Senators Rick Santorum and Pat Roberts--also demanded more information from the Bush administration on the status of the vast document collection. Santorum and Hoekstra have raised the issue personally with President Bush. This external pressure triggered an internal debate at the highest levels of the administration. Following several weeks of debate, a consensus has emerged: The vast majority of the 2 million captured documents should be released publicly as soon as possible.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has convened several meetings in recent weeks to discuss the Pentagon's role in expediting the release of this information. According to several sources familiar with his thinking, Rumsfeld is pushing aggressively for a massive dump of the captured documents. "He has a sense that public vetting of this information is likely to be as good an astringent as any other process we could develop," says Pentagon spokesman Larry DiRita.

The main worry, says DiRita, is that the mainstream press might cherry-pick documents and mischaracterize their meaning. "There is always the concern that people would be chasing a lot of information good or bad, and when the Times or the Post splashes a headline about some sensational-sounding document that would seem to 'prove' that sanctions were working, or that Saddam was just a misunderstood patriot, or some other nonsense, we'd spend a lot of time chasing around after it."

This is a view many officials attributed to Undersecretary of Defense for Intelligence Steve Cambone. (Cambone, through a spokesman, declined to be interviewed.) For months, Cambone has argued internally against expediting the release of the documents. "Cambone is the problem," says one former Bush administration official who wants the documents released. "He has blocked this every step of the way." In what is perhaps a sign of a changing dynamic within the administration, Cambone is now saying that he, like his boss, favors a broad document release.

Although Hoekstra, too, has been pushing hard for the quick release of all of the documents, he is currently focusing his efforts simply on obtaining the 40 documents he asked for in November. "There comes a time when the talking has to stop and I get the documents. I requested these documents six weeks ago and I have not seen a single piece of paper yet."

Is Hoekstra being unreasonable? I asked Michael Tanji, the former DOCEX official with the Defense Intelligence Agency, how long such a search might take. His answer: Not long. "The retrieval of a HARMONY document is a trivial thing assuming one has a serial number or enough keyword terms to narrow down a search [Hoekstra did]. If given the task when they walked in the door, one person should be able to retrieve 40 documents before lunch."

Tanji should know. He left DIA last year as the chief of the media exploitation division in the office of document exploitation. Before that, he started and managed a digital forensics and intelligence fusion program that used the data obtained from DOCEX operations. He began his career as an Army signals intelligence [SIGINT] analyst. In all, Tanji has worked for 18 years in intelligence and dealt with various aspects of the media exploitation problem for about four years.

We discussed the successes and failures of the DOCEX program, the relative lack of public attention to the project, and what steps might be taken to expedite the exploitation of the documents in the event the push to release all of the documents loses momentum.

DOJ_NMG_0008483

TWS: In what areas is the project succeeding? In what areas is the project failing?

Tanji: The level of effort applied to the DOCEX problems in Iraq and Afghanistan to date is a testament to the will and work ethic of people in the intelligence community. They've managed to find a number of golden nuggets amongst a vast field of rock in what I would consider a respectable amount of time through sheer brute force. The flip side is that it is a brute-force effort. For a number of reasons--primarily time and resources--there has not been much opportunity to step back, think about a smarter way to solve the problem, and then apply various solutions. Inasmuch as we've won in Iraq and Saddam and his cronies are in the dock, now would be a good time to put some fresh minds on the problem of how you turn DOCEX into a meaningful and effective information-age intelligence tool.

TWS: Why haven't we heard more about this project? Aren't most of the Iraqi documents unclassified?

Tanji: Until a flood of captured material came rushing in after the start of Operation Enduring Freedom [in October 2001], DOCEX was a backwater: unglamorous, not terribly career enhancing, and from what I had heard always one step away from being mothballed.

The classification of documents obtained for exploitation varies based on the nature of the way they were obtained and by whom. There are some agencies that tend to classify everything regardless of how it was acquired. I could not give you a ratio of unclassified to classified documents.

In my opinion the silence associated with exploitation work is rooted in the nature of the work. In addition to being tedious and time-consuming, it is usually done after the shooting is over. We place a higher value on intelligence information that comes to us before a conflict begins. Confirmation that we were right (or proof that we were wrong) after the fact is usually considered history. That some of this information may be dated doesn't mean it isn't still valuable.

TWS: The project seems overwhelmed at the moment, with a mere 50,000 documents translated completely out of a total of 2 million. What steps, in your view, should be taken to expedite the process?

Tanji: I couldn't say what the total take of documents or other forms of media is, though numbers in the millions are probably not far off.

In a sense the exploitation process is what it is; you have to put eyes on paper (or a computer screen) to see what might be worth further translation or deeper analysis. It is a time-consuming process that has no adequate mechanical solution. Machine translation software is getting better, but it cannot best a qualified human linguist, of which we have very few.

Tackling the computer media problem is a lot simpler in that computer language (binary) is universal, so searching for key words, phrases, and the names of significant personalities is fairly simple. Built to deal with large-scale data sets, a forensic computer system can rapidly separate wheat from chaff. The current drawback is that the computer forensics field is dominated by a law-enforcement mindset, which means the approach to the digital media problem is still very linear. As most of this material has come to us without any context ("hard drives found in Iraq" was a common label attached to captured media) that approach means our great-grandchildren will still be dealing with this problem.

Dealing with the material as the large and nebulous data set that it is and applying a contextual appliqué after exploitation--in essence, recreating the Iraqi networks as they were before Operation Iraqi Freedom began--would allow us to get at the most significant data rapidly for technical analysis, and allow for a political analysis to follow in short order. If I were looking for both a quick and powerful fix I'd get various Department of Energy labs involved; they're used to dealing with large data sets and have done great work in the data mining and rendering fields.

TWS: To read some of the reporting on Iraq, one might come away with the impression that Saddam Hussein was something of a benign (if not exactly benevolent) dictator who had no weapons of mass destruction and no connections to terrorism. Does the material you've seen support this conventional wisdom?

Tanji: I am subject to a nondisclosure agreement, so I would rather not get into details. I will say that the intelligence community has scraped the surface of much of what has been captured in Iraq and in my view a great deal more deep digging is required. Critics of the war often complain about the lack of "proof"--a term that I had never heard used in the intelligence lexicon until we ousted Saddam--for going to war. There is really only one way to obtain "proof" and that is to carry out a thorough and detailed examination of what we've captured.

DOJ_NMG_0008484

TWS: I've spoken with several officials who have seen unclassified materials indicating the former Iraqi regime provided significant support--including funding and training--to transregional terrorists, including Palestinian Islamic Jihad, Ansar al Islam, Algeria's GSPC, and the Sudanese Islamic Army. Did you see any of this?

Tanji: My obligations under a nondisclosure agreement prevent me from getting into this kind of detail.

Other officials familiar with the captured documents were less cautious. "As much as we overestimated WMD, it appears we underestimated [Saddam Hussein's] support for transregional terrorists," says one intelligence official.

Speaking of Ansar al Islam, the al Qaeda-linked terrorist group that operated in northern Iraq, the former high-ranking military intelligence officer says: "There is no question about the fact that AI had reach into Baghdad. There was an intelligence connection between that group and the regime, a financial connection between that group and the regime, and there was an equipment connection. It may have been the case that the IIS [Iraqi Intelligence Service] support for AI was meant to operate against the [anti-Saddam] Kurds. But there is no question IIS was supporting AI."

The official continued: "[Saddam] used these groups because he was interested in extending his influence and extending the influence of Iraq. There are definite and absolute ties to terrorism. The evidence is there, especially at the network level. How high up in the government was it sanctioned? I can't tell you. I don't know whether it was run by Qusay [Hussein] or [Izzat Ibrahim] al-Duri or someone else. I'm just not sure. But to say Iraq wasn't involved in terrorism is flat wrong."

STILL, some insist on saying it. Since early November, Senator Carl Levin has been spotted around Washington waving a brief excerpt from a February 2002 Defense Intelligence Agency assessment of Iraq. The relevant passage reads: "Saddam's regime is intensely secular and is wary of Islamic revolutionary movements. Moreover, Baghdad is unlikely to provide assistance to a group it cannot control."

Levin treats these two sentences as definitive proof that Bush administration officials knew that Saddam's regime was unlikely to work with Islamic fundamentalists and ignored the intelligence community's assessment to that effect. Levin apparently finds the passage so damning that he specifically requested that it be declassified.

I thought of Levin's two sentences last Wednesday and Thursday as I sat in a Dallas courtroom listening to testimony in the deportation hearing of Ahmed Mohamed Barodi, a 42-year-old Syrian-born man who's been living in Texas for the last 15 years. I thought of Levin's sentences, for example, when Barodi proudly proclaimed his membership in the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood, and again when Barodi, dressed in loose-fitting blue prison garb, told Judge J. Anthony Rogers about the 21 days he spent in February 1982 training with other members of the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood at a camp in Iraq.

The account he gave in the courtroom was slightly less alarming than the description of the camp he had provided in 1989, on his written application for political asylum in the United States. In that document, Barodi described the instruction he received in Iraq as "guerrilla warfare training." And in an interview in February 2005 with Detective Scott Carr and special agent Sam Montana, both from the federal Joint Terrorism Task Force, Barodi said that the Iraqi regime provided training in the use of firearms, rocket-propelled grenades, and document forgery.

Barodi comes from Hama, the town that was leveled in 1982 by the armed forces of secular Syrian dictator Hafez Assad because it was home to radical Islamic terrorists who had agitated against his regime. The massacre took tens of thousands of lives, but some of the extremists got away.

Many of the most radical Muslim Brotherhood refugees from Hama were welcomed next door--and trained--in Saddam Hussein's Iraq. Spanish investigators believe that Ghasoub Ghalyoun, the man they have accused of conducting surveillance for the 9/11 attacks, who also has roots in the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood, was trained in an Iraqi terrorist camp in the early 1980s. Ghalyoun mentions this Iraqi training in a 2001 letter to the head of Syrian intelligence, in which he seeks reentry to Syria despite his long affiliation with the Muslim Brotherhood.

Reaching out to Islamic radicals was, in fact, one of the first moves Saddam Hussein made upon taking power in 1979. That he did not do it for ideological reasons is unimportant. As Barodi noted at last week's hearing, "He used us and we used him."

Throughout the 1980s, including the eight years of the Iran-Iraq war, Saddam cast himself as a holy warrior in his public rhetoric to counter the claims from Iran that he was an infidel. This posturing continued during and after the first Gulf war in 1990-91. Saddam famously ordered "Allahu Akbar" (God is Great) added to the Iraqi flag. Internally, he launched "The Faith Campaign," which according to leading Saddam Hussein scholar Amatzia Baram included the imposition of sharia (Islamic law). According to Baram, "The Iraqi president initiated laws forbidding the public consumption of alcohol and introduced enhanced compulsory study of the Koran at all educational levels, including Baath Party branches."

DOJ_NMG_0008485

Hussein Kamel, Saddam's son-in-law who defected to Jordan in 1995, explained these changes in an interview with Rolf Ekeus, then head of the U.N. weapons inspection program. "The government of Iraq is instigating fundamentalism in the country," he said, adding, "Every party member has to pass a religious exam. They even stopped party meetings for prayers."

And throughout the decade, the Iraqi regime sponsored "Popular Islamic Conferences" at the al Rashid Hotel that drew the most radical Islamists from throughout the region to Baghdad. Newsweek's Christopher Dickey, who covered one of those meetings in 1993, would later write: "Islamic radicals from all over the Middle East, Africa and Asia converged on Baghdad to show their solidarity with Iraq in the face of American aggression." One speaker praised "the mujahed Saddam Hussein, who is leading this nation against the nonbelievers." Another speaker said, "Everyone has a task to do, which is to go against the American state." Dickey continued:

Every time I hear diplomats and politicians, whether in Washington or the capitals of Europe, declare that Saddam Hussein is a "secular Baathist ideologue" who has nothing do with Islamists or with terrorist calls to jihad, I think of that afternoon and I wonder what they're talking about. If that was not a fledgling Qaeda itself at the Rashid convention, it sure was Saddam's version of it.

In the face of such evidence, Carl Levin and other critics of the Iraq war trumpet deeply flawed four-year-old DIA analyses. Shouldn't the senator instead use his influence to push for the release of Iraqi documents that will help establish what, exactly, the Iraqi regime was doing in the years before the U.S. invasion?

Stephen F. Hayes is a senior writer at The Weekly Standard.

U.S. Soldiers Question Use Of More Armor (AP-Y2)

By Ryan Lenz

AP, January 8, 2006

U.S. soldiers in the field were not all supportive of a Pentagon study that found improved body armor saves lives, with some troops arguing Saturday that more armor would hinder combat effectiveness.

The unreleased study examined 93 fatal wounds to Marines from the start of the Iraq war in March 2003 through June 2005. It concluded 74 of them were bullet or shrapnel wounds to shoulders or torso areas unprotected by traditional ceramic armor plating.

Soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division's 3rd Brigade "Rakkasans" are required to wear an array of protective clothing they refer to as their "happy gear," ranging from Kevlar drapes over their shoulders and sides, to knee pads and fire-resistant uniforms.

But many soldiers say they feel encumbered by the weight and restricted by fabric that does not move as they do. They frequently joke as they strap on their equipment before a patrol, and express relief when they return and peel it off.

Second Lt. Josh Suthoff, 23, of Jefferson City, Mo., said he already sacrifices enough movement when he wears the equipment. More armor would only increase his chances of getting killed, he said.

"You can slap body armor on all you want, but it's not going to help anything. When it's your time, it's your time," said Suthoff, a platoon leader in the brigade's 1st Squadron, 33rd Cavalry Regiment. "I'd go out with less body armor if I could."

The study and their remarks highlight the difficulty faced by the Army and Marine Corps in providing the best level of body armor protection in a war against an insurgency whose tactics are constantly changing.

Both the Army and the Marines have weighed the expected payoff in additional safety from extra armor against the measurable loss of combat effectiveness from too much armor.

According to a summary of the Armed Forces Medical Examiner's study obtained Friday evening by The Associated Press, the 93 Marines who died from a primary lethal injury of the torso were among 401 Marines who died from combat injuries in Iraq between the start of the war and June 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0008486

A military advocacy group, Soldiers for Truth, posted an article about the study on its Web site this week. On Friday evening, The New York Times reported in its online edition that the study for the first time shows the cost in lives lost from inadequate armor.

Autopsy reports and photographic records were analyzed to help the military determine possible body armor redesign.

Of 39 fatal torso wounds in which the bullet or shrapnel entered the Marine's body outside of the ceramic armor plate protecting the chest and back, 31 were close to the plate's edge, according to the study, which was conducted last summer.

Some soldiers felt unhappy that ceramic plates to protect their sides and shoulders were available, but not offered, when they deployed for Iraq in September.

"If it's going to protect a soldier or save his life, they definitely should have been afforded the opportunity to wear it," said Staff Sgt. Shaun Benoit, 26, of Conneaut, Ohio. "I want to know where there was a break in communication."

Others questioned the effectiveness of additional body armor.

"It's the Army's responsibility to get soldiers the armor they need. But that doesn't mean those deaths could have been prevented," said Spc. Robert Reid, 21, of Atlanta.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who was in Iraq on Saturday, said military leaders told him that body armor has improved since the initial invasion in 2003 and that the military hoped to gradually transition to the improved armor.

The debate between protection versus mobility has dominated military doctrine since the Middle Ages, when knights wrapped themselves in metal suits for battle, said Capt. Jamey Turner, 35, of Baton Rouge, La., a commander in the 1st Squadron, 33rd Cavalry Regiment.

The issue comes up daily on the battlefield in Iraq, and soldiers need to realize there is no such thing as 100 percent protection, he said.

"You've got to sacrifice some protection for mobility," he added. "If you cover your entire body in ceramic plates, you're just not going to be able to move."

Others in the regiment said the issue of protecting soldiers with more body armor is of greater concern at home than among soldiers in Iraq, who have seen firsthand how life and death hang on a sliver of luck when an improvised explosive device hits a Humvee.

"These guys over here are husbands, sons and daughters. It's understandable people at home would want all the protection in the world for us. But realistically, it just don't work," said Sgt. Paul Hare, 40, of Tucumcari, N.M.

___

AP Military Writer Robert Burns in Washington contributed to this report.

Marines Without Armor (NYT)

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

American marines are a proud, tough bunch. They expect to be sent into the most dangerous battles and expect enemy fighters to come at them with everything they have. But they also expect, and have every right to expect, the Pentagon to provide them with the most effective armor available to maximize their chances of staying alive and in one piece. An investigative article in Saturday's Times by our colleague Michael Moss makes painfully clear that the Pentagon has let these brave warriors down.

A secret Defense Department study reveals that more extensive armor, of a kind available since 2003, could have saved the lives of some 80 percent of the marines killed by upper body wounds in Iraq between 2003 and 2005. That amounts to scores of needlessly lost lives - hundreds if Army deaths attributable to inadequate armor are counted as well. The ceramic armor plates in question cost about $260 a set.

Marines in the field have been clamoring for additional body armor (and vehicle armor) almost since the Iraq war began. Military officials initially turned them down because of concerns that the added weight might constrict movement. Once the study results came in last summer, Marine Corps leaders belatedly reversed themselves and started speeding armor to the troops.

Still, as of last month, less than 10 percent of the 28,000 sets of armor plates on order had actually reached the Marines in Iraq. Similar delays have plagued deliveries of improved vehicle armor. And the much larger Army contingent in Iraq has faced even more extensive delays.

DOJ_NMG_0008487

The Pentagon buys some truly wondrous space-age weaponry with its half-trillion-dollar annual budgets. If the cold war ever resumes, the American military will certainly be prepared. Meantime, surely enough spare change can be found in that vast budget to accelerate deliveries of lifesaving armor to the marines and soldiers coming under fire today, and every day, in Iraq.

For Returning Unit In Iraq, A Battle With Doubts (BOS)

By Thanassis Cambanis

The Boston Globe, January 8, 2006

KIRKUK, Iraq -- Captain John McLaughlin's company of combat veterans has returned to Iraq. They have brought far fewer illusions this time around, exchanging unalloyed enthusiasm for Operation Iraqi Freedom in the spring of 2003 for a mix of professionalism, resignation, and cynicism.

The enlisted men from the 101st Airborne Division now know much more about the country, confidently factoring in competing ethnic agendas as they navigate the claims of Kurds, Arab Sunnis and Shi'ites, and Turkomen.

Most dismiss the American debate over the merits of the war as irrelevant, many of them saying they fight out of loyalty to the Army even if they think its mission in Iraq is unrealistic. Most profess no love for Iraq and its people.

When these air assault paratroopers returned to Iraq in October, the theater of battle was barely recognizable to them.

In April 2003, the Second Battalion 327th Infantry of the 101st fought its way through the nastiest combat of the Iraq invasion, leaping out of helicopters to fight Saddam Hussein loyalists in Najaf and Mosul, where they eventually established a forward-fire base south of the city and stayed until February 2004.

The division suffered 59 deaths that year. They returned to their post at Fort Campbell, Ky., for a year and a half before returning to Iraq in October.

But 2003 seems like ages ago to the young veterans.

The battalion that arrived in Kirkuk -- about two-thirds of them veterans of Iraq or Afghanistan -- found a base so cushy that commanders worry the soldiers will go soft, forgetting they're stationed in a war zone. Instead of sleeping on the floors of gutted warehouses, eating military rations, and burning their own sewage in trenches behind their quarters, soldiers now benefit from the infrastructure of a long occupation.

FOB Warrior, as the air base is known, boasts hot showers, a dining hall, a gym, a swimming pool, two barbershops, and a beauty parlor that gives massages. There's a Burger King and a 24-hour Green Beans Coffee shop, where soldiers line up for chai lattes and brownies in the middle of the night.

The permanence of facilities at the Kirkuk base also hints of a mission without end.

The surrounding city is still a deadly place -- less lethal than Fallujah but more so than the Shi'ite south. On this tour, 26 soldiers from the 101st had been killed by mid-December.

After the 2003 invasion, US troops had clear marching orders: Catch Hussein and his lieutenants and stabilize Iraq. During the first few months, criminal gangs posed the greatest law-and-order challenge, not insurgents.

Some returning soldiers said that while they once believed they could quickly train Iraqi police to replace American troops, they've now set their sights much lower, hoping perhaps to set a decent example for police and soldiers they train but don't entirely trust.

"Regardless of whether this is the great march of democracy or protecting the shores of America, whether I bought into that or not, it doesn't matter," McLaughlin said late one night at his command post after returning from a long day of meetings with Iraqi police chiefs and army commanders. "My obligation as a soldier, as an officer, as a leader is to do the mission to the best of my ability. That's the only saving grace out of the whole thing."

During a four-day visit by a Globe reporter to the Kirkuk base, soldiers and their commanders -- most of them returning veterans -- said they see the Iraq mission as less ambitious, less achievable, and more stressful than they did almost three years ago.

The soldiers still work at battle rhythm, always on call and with no days off. And while still dangerous, their daily routine involves patrolling between Kirkuk's police stations and army bases, investigating assassinations and bomb attacks against Iraqis -- and, often, investigating the very Iraqi security forces they're trying to train.

DOJ_NMG_0008488

An unclear enemy

Everywhere he looks, McLaughlin sees ambiguity. As he and his troops see it, most Iraqis don't like the Americans and tolerate their presence only when American interests coincide with their own.

In that sea of doubt, there are a few safe harbors.

For McLaughlin's Charlie Company, one is the putrid settlement they call the Gypsy Camp, an abandoned factory inhabited by squatters that doubles as a brothel.

McLaughlin enjoys the company of his soldiers, trading jokes delivered in his thick Boston accent. But he's intense while on the job, which is most of the time. While riding in his Humvee, he listens to updates from southern Kirkuk through an earpiece while chatting with the driver, gunner, sergeant, and interpreter who ride with him.

All of the city's major ethnic groups -- Kurds, Arabs, Turkomen -- share contempt for the gypsies. To McLaughlin, they represent the most blameless victims of the complex conflict in Iraq, and their mistreatment at the hands of Iraq's American-trained security forces reflects the greatest pitfall of the US Army's new mission: that Iraqi authorities might abuse their growing powers.

Many of the Iraqi soldiers and police McLaughlin trains violate the ban on visiting the brothel. In mid-December, Iraqi soldiers allegedly beat several of the women and burned the tents the squatters had pitched behind the dingy, half-finished shell of a building.

"If we aren't here to protect these people, who are we here for?" McLaughlin asked during a visit to the camp.

Families live in a row of tents, while the prostitutes, wearing heavy makeup, magenta scarves, and velveteen pantaloons, stand in the factory entryway.

When McLaughlin pulled up in his Humvee to investigate the day after the Iraqi raid, four Iraqi soldiers tried to flee down a side road. McLaughlin's driver blocked their way.

The incident exemplifies the military's new mission in Iraq: The top priority is no longer to kill insurgents and search neighborhoods. Now, US troops are supposed to pour their energy into training Iraqi forces to do the job.

McLaughlin's superiors in Kirkuk boast that two-thirds of all patrols combine US and Iraqi forces and that within three months Iraqi units -- like the one that McLaughlin suspects routinely raids the brothel -- will be ready to take the lead policing Kirkuk.

The soldiers in the 101st Airborne have taken on this training mission with an arsenal they didn't have the first time they fought in Iraq. Most of the officers know rudimentary Arabic and have learned to spend time developing personal relationships with local police and army officers who can provide intelligence. They drink tea with their Iraqi counterparts and encourage them to concentrate on their mission.

On one Saturday morning patrol, McLaughlin grilled two police chiefs about an array of attacks and insurgent cells, prompting them to follow up specific leads and steering them back on track when they tried to shift the conversation away from crime and toward meaningless platitudes about Iraqi politics.

He also confronted the Iraqi Army company about the gypsies.

"We -- you, me, police -- we're all here to secure everybody within the city, and that includes the gypsies," McLaughlin thundered at a young Iraqi Army lieutenant. "By going down there and slapping them around, burning down their tent, it makes you look no better than a criminal."

Boredom and bureaucracy

Sergeant Matt Somma and Private Gregory Miller patrol together in a heavily armored Humvee that's prone to roll over. It's a much safer cocoon than the doorless Humvees that Somma patrolled in at the beginning of the Iraq war in the northern city of Mosul.

Both men came to Kirkuk in October with a vivid sense of Iraq.

Somma, 22, fought his way through some of the worst battles of 2003 and stayed until the end of February 2004. He sees no other life for himself but the army.

The Iraq war in its present phase, however, bores him: There's too much politics and not enough shooting for his taste.

DOJ_NMG_0008489

As a team leader within his platoon, Somma spends much of his time enforcing new safety regulations for soldiers, making sure they're wearing goggles, they unload their guns when they return to base, and they don't let down their guard just because the conflict doesn't summon so much adrenaline.

"It kind of sucks sometimes," Somma said of the bureaucratic aspects of his job.

Tall, skinny, with a hooked nose, Somma towers over the other men in his platoon. He walks with a swagger and keeps up a constant verbal patter like a stage musician -- the only other career he says appeals to him. On patrol, he plays a game called "What are you thinking?" with the other sergeants on the radio, mixing absurd observations about the Iraqis in their area of operations, lyrics, and references to American television shows.

Somma also focuses much of his energy on the video game "Age of Empires III," which he plays on his laptop while huddled in his wooden bunk. Somma dedicates most waking hours when he's not on patrol to the game, in which he directs a civilization trying to conquer 17th-century America.

Miller, his platoon's old man at 27, quit his job as a diving instructor last year to fulfill a promise he made to his best childhood friend, Matt Brown, whom he refers to as his brother. Brown, an Army officer deployed in central Iraq a year ago, lost an eye when insurgents ambushed his convoy.

"I promised my brother that if he got hurt, I would join the Army," Miller said. "Eight months later, here I am. I knew what I was getting into."

The pace of life on deployment is draining, but it's also addictive. Somma said he wants a break from the Army to go to college but can't imagine blending back into civilian society. He and Miller both said they feel alienated by a society where they believe people don't take individual responsibility.

In Iraq, despite the murkiness of the mission, they have found crystal clarity in their relationship to their own unit -- so much so that on his last deployment Somma didn't take any of the leave to which he was entitled.

Somma said the Iraq war is slowly becoming like Korea or Germany for career military personnel, a grueling ticket that everyone committed to the Army will have to punch. Even though this deployment has seen more soldiers from the 101st killed per month than in 2003, the mission feels more like work and less like war to Somma.

"There's not much contact" with the enemy, Somma said while driving his Humvee late one night down a rutted dirt road in the Arab section of Kirkuk. "Nothing's 100 percent safe, but Kirkuk is a pretty safe city."

He compared it wistfully to Mosul, where he was stationed last time and where his division won accolades for killing top Ba'athists, including Hussein's sons. "Mosul was just chaotic when we were there," he said with a smile.

A false sense of security

At Kirkuk Air Base, combat soldiers live on the far end of the airstrip. The support units and contractors -- the majority of whom never go "outside the wire" -- live on the other side.

A flier posted in nearly every building warns soldiers against taking false comfort from the amenities: "Quality of Life Warning!!!" it reads. "Quality of life on FOB Warrior is excellent. DO NOT get complacent and get lulled into a false sense of security. We are in a dangerous place and there are people outside of the FOB who want to kill you. Stay alert, stay alive!"

"Last time, we got here and there was nothing. It was weird coming back and seeing all this," Somma said.

On his last tour, Captain McLaughlin lived in an ammunition bunker with no power and no air conditioning. Now he has his own room with a door, a desk, a cot, and a shelf for his book of Tennyson poems and a library of other tomes he still hasn't gotten to -- "Don Quixote," a history of Islam, a polemic about reform in the Arab world.

Soldiers in Somma's platoon inherited a wireless Internet network set up by an Iraqi contractor. Commanders ordered it dismantled after Christmas, in part because it seemed too cushy.

Sophisticated soldiers and an Iraq mission no longer geared toward the climactic moment of national elections constitute a tough challenge for McLaughlin's company leadership: how to keep soldiers motivated when their success can be measured only through the goal of improving Iraqi security forces?

The answer, they say, is to think narrow.

"The guys look for small, incremental little victories," said the company's first lieutenant, Brett Bean.

DOJ_NMG_0008490

First Sergeant Jason Larson, who turned 35 on Christmas Day and has spent 15 years in the Army, said he had always thought the Army would be his last job. But the inevitability of returning to Iraq, he said, has persuaded him to leave the military when his contract runs out in five years.

"I won't stay a day longer, even if I have to go work as a greeter at Wal-Mart," Larson said.

In a war without any benchmarks coming up, he said, commanders have to constantly refine their message to soldiers, billing small turning points like the improvement of an Iraqi battalion as major victories. "For us, the challenge will be to keep everyone focused," he said.

Thanassis Cambanis can be reached at tcambanis@globe.com.

Marine Battalion Taking 3rd Tour To Iraq (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON — In the predawn chill of Saturday morning, Anna Plank of Huntington Beach was here to see her 21-year-old son, Marine Cpl. Jason Plank, begin the trip back to Iraq for his third tour of duty.

The waiting and worrying never get easier for the families of Marines, particularly those of the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, which has a reputation for drawing the most dangerous of assignments.

"You pray a lot and you stay busy, and you wait for those phone calls and letters to arrive," Anna Plank said.

But there is something else that family members pray never arrives: an official car with an officer or senior enlisted man, possibly accompanied by a chaplain. That's how the Marine Corps notifies families that a loved one has been killed.

"During his last deployment, I saw an official car in the neighborhood, and I immediately ran upstairs and closed the door as if that could stop it," said Plank, a tear on her cheek at the memory. "But it wasn't that, thank God."

Among the hundreds of family members who gathered to see 300 Marines and sailors board buses that would take them to a nearby airport, fear of the "knock on the door" was a shared experience.

"I remember one day an officer came to our office complex and my heart stopped; it just stopped," said Julie Galaviz of Whittier, whose son, Lance Cpl. Joshua Tallis, 21, is returning to Iraq for a third tour.

The 3-5, as it is known, is the first battalion from Camp Pendleton to depart for Iraq as the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force begins to relieve troops from Camp Lejeune, N.C., in violence-plagued Al Anbar province west of Baghdad.

In 2003, three Marines from the battalion were killed in Iraq. In 2004, 19 were killed, most in the November fight to wrest control of Fallouja from the insurgents. The 3-5 was one of the lead units in the assault.

Now the battalion is returning to Fallouja for a seven-month deployment to help train Iraqi security forces, although that assignment could change if U.S. commanders order an assault on insurgent strongholds.

An estimated two-thirds of the battalion's 1,000 Marines have made at least one deployment to Iraq. Like the Marines, family members have developed strategies for survival.

"You need to surround yourself with friends and family, and stay focused," said Lauren Maricic, 23, of Ontario whose boyfriend, Cpl. Miles Nelson, 21, is returning for a third tour.

"And the friends and family members have to be ready to get a phone call at 2 o'clock in the morning if you need support," she said.

Anna Goad, 23, of Irvine and her husband, Cpl. Michael Goad, 25, were sharing a last hug as the buses rolled into sight and Marines began grabbing their rifles. Sergeants began barking orders, and the tears and tension among family members increased.

"Everybody is afraid of the knock on the door," Anna Goad said. "But it's absolutely not going to happen to us. I know that."

Donna Meyers, 72, and her husband, A.J., 76, drove from their home in Riverbank, Calif., near Modesto, to say goodbye to their grandson Rich, making his third tour. She wears his picture on a chain around her neck.

"We lost one boy from his group last time, and it was hard, real hard," Donna Meyers said. "Rich met his mother."

On Thursday night, Tallis' family met at his grandmother's house in Pico Rivera for a dinner with his favorite foods: barbecued ribs, rice pilaf, scalloped potatoes, strawberry ice cream and more.

DOJ_NMG_0008491

On Friday, Tallis visited with the family priest at St. Bruno's Catholic Church in Whittier for a blessing.

Hayley Lynn, 18, of La Crescenta married Lance Cpl. Chad Lynn, 19, on Tuesday at a chapel in Las Vegas. As his departure to Iraq for his first tour grew closer, she extracted a promise.

"He promised me that he wouldn't die," she said.

Army Captain Employed Daring, Intellect (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

Christopher P. Petty barely squeaked by as a high school student in Virginia, his father said, but he thrived amid the rigors of military culture, rising to the rank of captain and commanding an artillery battalion in Iraq.

"It's just kind of a typical American story where . . . the combination of life and experience in the military turns him completely around to where he's a model officer," said Paul R. Petty, a retired CIA officer.

Petty, 33, was killed in Najaf on Thursday along with four other soldiers when an improvised explosive detonated near their Humvee, the Defense Department said. He was three weeks into his second tour of duty in Iraq.

Petty was a father of two -- Oliver, 3, and Owen, 3 months -- and he and his wife, Deborah, had lived near Fort Hood, Tex., where he was assigned to the 4th Infantry Division.

Because of his father's work, Petty grew up overseas. He was born in Berlin and lived in Austria, Finland and Jamaica. He was a graduate of James Madison High School in Vienna and attended Marshall University in Huntington, W.Va., where he was enrolled in the ROTC program.

He was commissioned in the Army upon graduation. Ed Petty, an artillery officer in World War II, pinned his own second lieutenant's bars and crossed cannon artillery insignia on his grandson at the commissioning.

Petty's unit entered Iraq just days after the initial invasion, engaging some of the last Republican Guard elements near Tikrit in the north.

Stationed not far from the Iranian border, his father said, Petty served informally as a civil affairs officer with the responsibility of running local elections and formally as the artillery coordinator for his battalion. Petty devised a clever method, one that he employed daringly, for responding to frequent mortar attacks, his father said. Petty would calculate the mortars' trajectories by examining impact craters and tail fins, then determine from where the rounds had been fired.

"He'd go out where they were impacting, sometimes while they were still coming in," Petty said.

During that year-long deployment, his battalion suffered only one casualty, his father said. The insurgency has since grown stronger, and Petty was aware that he would return to a more dangerous country, his father said.

Yesterday, he recalled when his son, in middle school, was on a Vienna soccer team with the son of Redskins coach Joe Gibbs.

The soccer coach didn't show up one day. Gibbs stepped in, leading the underdog team to victory. "They trounced these other guys, who were touted to win by huge margins," Paul Petty said. "Those boys -- they were on cloud nine."

Staff researcher Magda Jean-Louis contributed to this report.

Case Dropped Against U.S. Officer In Beating Deaths Of Afghan Inmates (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

The Army has dropped its case against the only officer to face criminal charges in connection with the beating deaths of two prisoners held by the United States in Afghanistan, military officials said yesterday.

The officer, Capt. Christopher M. Beiring, led a reservist military police company that was guarding the main American detention center in Afghanistan when the two men were killed within days of each other in December 2002. The prisoners died after guards kneed them repeatedly in the legs while each was shackled to the ceiling of his cell.

Captain Beiring, 39, had been charged with lying to investigators and being derelict in his duties, in part by neglecting after the first death to order his soldiers to stop chaining up prisoners by the arms at the behest of military interrogators who wanted to deprive them of sleep before questioning.

DOJ_NMG_0008492

"They certainly had a case to investigate - two guys died," Captain Beiring said yesterday in an interview. "And, obviously, some soldiers did some stuff wrong and needed to be punished. But I think it got blown out of proportion. At some point, they were just playing politics."

The collapse of the case is the latest and most embarrassing of several setbacks for the team of Army prosecutors that has been working for more than a year on the deaths, which occurred at the military detention center in Bagram, 40 miles north of Kabul.

Captain Beiring is the third member of the 377th Military Police Company, based in Cincinnati and Bloomington, Ind., to have had charges dismissed before trial. Four enlisted soldiers in the unit have been acquitted, two others pleaded guilty to assault and one was convicted of assault, maiming and other charges.

Four former interrogators from the 519th Military Intelligence Battalion, based at Fort Bragg, N.C., have pleaded guilty to charges including assault, maltreatment and dereliction of duty.

In Captain Beiring's case, the decision by the commander of the Army's Air Defense Artillery Center at Fort Bliss, Tex., where the Bagram cases are being tried, followed the recommendation of an investigating judge that it not proceed to a court-martial.

A spokeswoman for Fort Bliss, Jean Offutt, said Captain Beiring was issued a letter of reprimand on Friday. Captain Beiring said that the letter contained accusations of dereliction of duty and that he would formally rebut them.

The judge who oversaw the pretrial inquiry, Lt. Col. Thomas S. Berg, sharply criticized the prosecutors' case, concluding in a 22-page report that they had failed to present sufficient evidence to support any of the charges.

The accusation that Captain Beiring lied about his efforts to train his soldiers after they arrived in Afghanistan was based on "one slightly ambiguous response" in one of the half-dozen sworn statements he gave to various military investigators, Colonel Berg noted. He added that Captain Beiring's response was then "significantly misquoted" by the prosecutors in the charges they filed.

Colonel Berg, the investigating judge, also dismissed two charges of dereliction of duty against Captain Beiring. In those charges, prosecutors had argued that the captain had failed to properly train his soldiers to handle the detainees and to order them to stop chaining prisoners overhead after the first one died.

Though Colonel Berg noted that the company had scarcely been trained for its specific mission at Bagram, he said Captain Beiring had sought and was denied more training before his company deployed. The unit spent barely a day learning from the company it replaced before that unit left Afghanistan.

Colonel Berg said that "substantial evidence" also showed that Captain Beiring did, in fact, instruct his junior and noncommissioned officers to stop the overhead chaining of detainees after two more senior officers insisted that he do so. The fact that a second prisoner died while similarly shackled "only shows that someone else either did not get the word about standing restraints or, more likely, got the word and chose to disregard it."

"Captain Beiring was sorely challenged at every step," Colonel Berg concluded. "He may not have done his duty perfectly, but he did it well."

Ms. Offutt, the Fort Bliss spokeswoman, said charges of abuse and other crimes against another former Bagram interrogator, Pfc. Damien M. Corsetti, would go forward to a general court-martial. One more reservist from Captain Beiring's company, Sgt. Alan J. Driver Jr., is scheduled to be tried next month.

A Man Does Not Ask A Man About His Wife (NYT)

By Eric Schmitt

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan

FOR the United States military here, there is the daily fight against Taliban rebels and there is perhaps the even more challenging task of winning the trust and confidence of the Afghan people.

DOJ_NMG_0008493

So when American soldiers burned the bodies of two dead Taliban fighters in a village near here in October and then used their charred and smoking corpses in an impromptu propaganda campaign against the insurgents and their sympathizers, senior commanders and Pentagon officials scrambled to head off a backlash against the United States in the Islamic world.

Two junior officers who had the bodies burned for what they said were hygienic reasons were reprimanded for showing a lack of cultural and religious understanding. The operational commander in Afghanistan, Maj. Gen. Jason K. Kamiya, said the officers had been unaware that Islamic tenets banned cremation and considered the burning of human bodies to be a desecration.

Two noncommissioned officers who used a loudspeaker to harangue nearby Taliban militants while standing over the bodies were also disciplined.

American forces receive some cultural sensitivity training before arriving here, but with new troops rotating through every 7 to 12 months, the instruction can be spotty and inconsistent.

In an effort to prevent incidents like the body burnings, the military command here has distributed cultural sensitivity cards to the 19,000 American troops in Afghanistan. Each wallet-size card is a laminated, fold-up guide of cultural dos and don'ts. The military distributed similar cards in Iraq last year. Excerpts from the Afghanistan version follow.

•

Death and Burial

A non-Muslim must not perform the burial rites for a dead Muslim.

One should not allow the remains to be eaten by birds or animals.

One should not remove the clothes of a Muslim including a Muslim fighter K.I.A. (killed in action).

One should not allow the remains to be left unburied beyond 72 hours at a maximum.

In the event that no one claims the remains after three days, consider what course of action would be most respectful of the dead and Muslim sensibilities. You may put the remains in a plastic body bag.

Islam and Prayer

Treat the Koran as a sacred book by handling it with utmost respect. (The Koran is usually wrapped in an attractive cloth and put in a high, prominent position in the home.)

Respect such religious objects as prayer rugs and prayer beads.

Respect those at prayer by not playing music or making noise during prayer time.

Do not walk in front of someone at prayer.

Remove your shoes when visiting a mosque when on any official tour approved by military authorities and the host nation.

Do not initiate religious discussions or judge the beliefs and practices of Muslims. Do not enter into debates about religion.

Absolutely do not proselytize.

Do not ask a Muslim if he is a Sunni or Shiite.

Interest in Islam can best be shown by simply listening to any Muslim informant.

Refrain from derogatory comments about any religion.

Do not call an Afghan "Hajji," "Mullah," or "Akhund" unless it is a known honorific of the person in question.

Searching and Questioning

Identify, show respect to and communicate with elders. Work with elders to accomplish your mission.

When searching houses or compounds put at least one elder with the women of his household.

Do not unnecessarily humiliate men by forcing them onto the ground in front of their families.

Males must not touch or search women. Only female soldiers or police may search women.

Males may never ask a man about his wife, daughters or sisters. Females can.

Do not yell or use profanity. It is a sign of weakness, poor upbringing and lack of discipline.

Manners and Gestures

Use common courtesy: say "please" (lutfan) and "thank you" (tushakor), address women as "mother" (mader) or "sister" (khwahar), and address elders as "sir" (agha sahib).

DOJ_NMG_0008494

When entering a room full of men shake hands and greet everyone. When you do not recognize a person, he will feel slighted.

When offered a seat of honor, decline graciously and accept only when offered again.

If someone brings you a chair to sit on, accept it even if you would rather stand. He is honoring you.

Do not argue, but strive for consensus. Majority rule is not the norm for solving issues or problems.

When a guest do not focus complimentary comments on your host's possessions as he/she will feel culturally obligated to give them to you. Do not, for example, over-compliment the quality of needlework, rugs, pictures, etc., in the host's home.

Do not stare at women, touch them or try to shake a woman's hand (unless she extends her hand first).

Do not react negatively if Afghan men kiss, embrace or hold hands. This is polite behavior in Afghan society.

Show kindness to children. You may praise them by saying, "In the name of God. ..." (naam-i-Khuda. ...)

Speak about your families. Afghans like to know you have them.

Food, Drink and Dress

If you are eating something, offer to share.

Eat with your right hand as much as possible.

When visiting a home or office, if someone brings you hot tea and snacks, accept graciously.

If a stranger offers you food, say "No, thank you" and only accept if he continues to offer the item.

Do not offer Afghans/Muslims pork or shellfish products.

Do not drink alcoholic beverages in front of Afghans/Muslims. General Order No. 1 prohibits alcohol.

Dress modestly. Do not wear shorts. Men should not go shirtless.

Do not show the soles of your shoes to Afghans. Tuck your feet under you legs. ...

Miscellany

When purchasing items in the bazaar, bargain with the vendor. You lose respect when you pay exorbitant prices.

Do not display sexually explicit pictures.

This Isn't Called The [Blank] Era For Nothing (WP)

By Richard N. Haass

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

"Why do they call us the Middle Ages when nothing yet comes after us?" This is the plaintive question King Arthur asks in the hit Broadway musical comedy "Spamalot."

The frustrated monarch has a point. Those living in what we now call the Middle Ages did not describe their time that way, any more than those who came before them saw their period as "dark" or those who came after them woke up every morning cheering their good fortune for being alive in the middle of a renaissance.

But in modern times, eras aren't always named in hindsight. People in the 1930s knew they were living through the Great Depression. The Cold War came into vogue as a phrase several decades before it ended. The Sixties weren't even in the history books yet when people began using the name of the decade to describe those tumultuous times.

What about our era then? Here we are, more than 16 years after the Berlin Wall began to crumble, and this period still lacks a name. Calling it the post-Cold War era is an admission that we know what came before but not where we are, much less where we are heading.

It's not that people haven't tried to name this era. Books have dubbed it an "age of anxiety," an "age of sacred terror," an "information age" or the "genomics age," to name just a few. But these names often seem as much a matter of marketing as a true description of our times.

The names that truly stick to past eras are those that capture a defining characteristic: A breakthrough technology (the Stone, the Bronze or the nuclear age); political features (the age of reform, revolution, world war or empire); philosophical outlook (the age of enlightenment, reason or innocence); or economic trends (the Gilded Age, the Roaring Twenties or the Great Depression).

DOJ_NMG_0008495

That this era lacks a name suggests that it still lacks a defining characteristic. Perhaps globalization comes closest, encompassing the increasing volume, speed and importance of flows across borders of people, ideas, greenhouse gases, manufactured goods, dollars, euros, television and radio signals, drugs, germs, e-mails, weapons and a good deal else. But globalization does not describe many features of the contemporary world, be they technological, political, religious or philosophical.

All of these things will help shape our era, but none will have greater impact on how we view it, and what we call it, than relations between the United States and other great powers.

The United States emerged from the Cold War as the world's most powerful country, the first among unequals. And that has prompted some people in my field to call ours the unipolar era. But this is a misreading of the current international context. Primacy is not the same as unipolarity. We are the preeminent power, but hardly the only one. There may not be a single alternative pole as was the case during the Cold War, but there are multiple, independent actors, not only countries but groups of individuals, some of whom are hostile and virtually all of whom resist U.S. designs. The result is that the United States on its own cannot stave off terrorism, force North Korea and Iran to eschew nuclear weapons, bring democracy to Iraq or the rest of the Arab world, deliver or impose peace between Israelis and Palestinians, or sustain its standard of living without importing oil and dollars.

So if this is an era defined fully by neither globalization nor American control, what is it then? There are three main possibilities.

Ideally, this would turn out to be an era of prolonged peace and prosperity, in which great power conflict becomes a thing of the past. Free markets and democracy would spread, and the energies of governments would be devoted to combating challenges to international order rather than combating one another. Each power's recognition that its own self-interest requires it to work with others would give birth to unprecedented cooperation. Call it the Age of Integration.

In such an epoch, nations would rally together and intervene to prevent or stop genocides and combat terrorism. Major powers would provide other countries with access to enriched uranium and plutonium for peaceful nuclear energy purposes as long as these raw materials were not diverted for military ends. The World Trade Organization would be extended to cover virtually all aspects of manufacturing, agriculture and services; tariffs, quotas and subsidies would be eliminated. Cooperation would be extended to deal with disease and global warming.

A second possibility is that this moment in history will later be seen as the inter-Cold War era, bracketed on one end by a four-decade struggle between the United States and the Soviet Union, and on the other by a struggle between the United States and China. This is the prediction of latter-day cold warriors who see a clash between today's principal power and a rising China as all but inevitable.

Subscribers to this theory predict a clash over Taiwan or a clash arising from the mismanagement of relations between two powerful and dynamic countries. A U.S.-China Cold War, like the previous one, would be dangerous, costly and distracting from other priorities. The United States needs China's assistance to deal with regional challenges (such as North Korea's nuclear aspirations) and global ones (such as avian flu and climate change). China, for its part, needs diplomatic calm so that it can focus on economic modernization.

A third possibility is even worse: a Second Dark Ages, characterized by the spread of nuclear weapons to North Korea, Iran and beyond; terrorism that increases in frequency and destructiveness; virulent infectious disease; mounting protectionism; and a substantially warmer planet. Conflict would become more common, as would the failure of states and a rise in poverty.

The United States could not wall itself off from such a world; we cannot become a gated country. As was the case during the world wars in the last century, even before globalization became a phenomenon, isolation would not be an option. Our standard of living would decline as trade withered and investment dried up. Civil liberties would be curtailed so that Americans could better cope with the threat from within. The world would become a more dangerous place and American society would be worse off.

Therefore, working out the name and nature for our era is an exercise in strategy, not taxonomy. We can help determine how the future turns out. Looking back on the inter-war period during the middle of the 20th century, World War II seems unavoidable. But it took the rise of National Socialism and the failure of appeasement to bring about the second global conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0008496

More recently, the Cold War may have been all but inevitable given the nature of the Soviet and Communist challenge. But neither the course nor the outcome of the Cold War was fated; it could have turned hot, it could have been lost, or it could still be going on.

This tells us that history remains anything but ordained. What individuals and countries choose to do matters, none more so than the United States. There is a great deal of discretion in foreign policy. Iraq was a textbook example -- it was a war of choice. Tax cuts and increased spending are also matters of choice, as is the absence of an energy policy that limits American dependence on imported oil and gas.

It is not clear how President Bush will use the remaining three years of his presidency, much less who will succeed him. The good news is that the United States, more than any other country, has the power to make this an era of cooperation and avoid the start of a new cold war -- or worse. The worrisome news is that, 16 years after the Cold War's end, the United States has done more to squander than exploit the opportunity at hand.

Author's e-mail:president@cfr.org

Richard Haass, director of the State Department's policy planning staff from 2001 to 2003, is president of the Council on Foreign Relations and author of "The Opportunity: America's Moment to Alter History's Course" (Public Affairs).

DOJ:

S.D. Judges' Actions May Set National Precedent (SFAL)

By DAN HAUGEN

Sioux Falls (SD) Argus Leader, January 8, 2006

The appointment of an interim U.S. attorney for South Dakota last month is raising complex questions about whether a federal agency overstepped its authority.

The naming of Steven K. Mullins to the position has fueled a politically charged dispute about who serves in a key role as the state's chief prosecutor for federal crimes.

Mullins, an Oklahoma lawyer, was appointed to the position Dec. 22 by the U.S. Department of Justice. But three federal judges in South Dakota say a judge from this state - not the Justice Department - should name the interim U.S. attorney.

If a legal challenge about Mullins' appointment goes far enough, the rule that allows judges to appoint interim lawyers could be thrown out as unconstitutional, according to experts in constitutional law.

"This is no different than the legislature endowing the justice branch to appoint the secretary of defense on an interim basis," said Bruce Fein, a constitutional lawyer and consultant in Washington. He served as deputy attorney general under President Reagan.

Fein said the Justice Department acted properly in the South Dakota appointment, and larger concerns are created by judges appointing prosecutors.

"This is quite unusual for a judge to say, hell, I want my own man in there as U.S. attorney. Yes, then you should run for president," Fein said.

Meierhenry choice 'not acceptable' Mullins replaces Michelle Tapken, another interim attorney whose term was set to expire Dec. 24.

Federal rules say when an interim U.S. attorney's term expires, it's up to a district's chief judge to make an appointment.

But Tapken resigned before her 120-day term was up, and the Justice Department immediately swore in Mullins for the job.

"All this sounds like it's trying to circumvent the statutes," said Robert Bennett, a professor and former dean of the Northwestern University School of Law.

Other legal observers offered dramatically different opinions this week on the unusual skirmish going on between South Dakota's federal judges and executive branch officials in Washington, D.C.

Chief Judge Lawrence Piersol attempted to appoint attorney Mark Meierhenry to the interim U.S. attorney role. A Justice Department executive told Piersol, though, that "this was not acceptable to the Attorney General," according to court documents.

Another federal judge, Karen Schreier of Rapid City, then intervened and ordered Mullins to appear in court Jan. 17 to explain why Meierhenry should not serve as interim U.S. attorney instead.

Whose judicial authority is valid? Judge Charles Kornmann of Aberdeen said the conditions leading up to Mullins' hiring leave some uncertainty about whether his authority is valid and whether cases he prosecuted could later be called into question.

Kornmann's concerns surfaced last week during an unrelated criminal case.

"Everybody wants to make sure that this appointment is proper for the administration of justice and that actions can't be attacked by people who have been convicted. It's not any big battle. It's a legal matter," Meierhenry said.

Meierhenry added that he has no aspirations to permanently fill the position.

John Eastman, director of the Center of Constitutional Jurisprudence in Claremont, Calif., said cases tried under Mullins are not at risk because of his authority.

"It might be challenged, but I would think the challenge would not succeed," Eastman said. "It's perfectly acceptable for a person in that role to resign, and for the Justice Department to appoint somebody new."

Questions about the intent of the law The Justice Department followed the letter of the law when it appointed Mullins over Judge Piersol's selection, Eastman said.

It's possible, though, a court could decide the Justice Department violated the intent of the law, said Bennett of Northwestern University.

"I could imagine a court saying the whole point (of the 120-day interim term limit) was to limit executive appointment without Senate approval," Bennett said.

The U.S. Constitution gives presidents the power to appoint federal attorneys to head each of the nation's 94 district offices.

No Bush appointment creates void, debate The president's appointments become official only after the Senate gives its approval. Appointing consecutive interim attorneys "is a way of filling the gap when you haven't got that," Bennett said.

Elizabeth Smith, a political science professor at the University of South Dakota, said it's an unusual situation that the code doesn't appear to anticipate.

"It's a situation that I've never seen before," Smith said.

The rules assume by the end of one interim appointment, the president will have made a permanent appointment.

President Bush has not appointed anybody to fill the position, so the U.S. Department of Justice and the district court are left trying to decide which one is in charge.

"As I look at the situation, it seems the clearest resolution is the political branches get together and make an appointment," she said.

Brian Roehrkasse, a spokes-man for the Department of Justice, said the department does not comment on such issues.

"We are working hard with the court to reach an accommodation," he said.

Reach Dan Haugen at 331-2335.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Call It The Deal Of A Lifetime (NYT)

By Landon Thomas Jr.

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

MOST mornings these days, Michael J. Kopper wakes up early, slips on a pair of khakis and hops into his Nissan sport utility vehicle for the short commute from his duplex in a Houston suburb to his job at Legacy Community Health Services, a community clinic. The Prada suits gather lint in his closet, and the shiny BMW 530 has been sold.

Mr. Kopper's work is different now: At Enron, he was a financial sophisticate who manufactured a series of arcane partnerships that paid him millions and helped to sink the company, which filed for bankruptcy in 2001. At Legacy, which provides health care and counseling services to H.I.V. patients and other chronically ill people, Mr. Kopper is a salaried grant writer who solicits financial support for the clinic.

DOJ_NMG_0008498

It has been a wrenching professional and personal reversal for Mr. Kopper, who three years ago became the first Enron executive to plead guilty to criminal charges and cut a deal with the government. Mr. Kopper was also the first high-ranking Enron employee to publicly admit to lying and stealing - in his case, more than $16 million - from the company.

Mr. Kopper's money-making schemes, hatched together with Andrew S. Fastow, the former chief financial officer, lie at the root of the mercenary culture that propelled Enron to unforeseen heights while also paving the way for its Icarus-like descent.

The partnerships were feats of financial alchemy that became a dumping ground for Enron's flagging assets and helped sustain the growing fabulism of the company's accounting as a wide-eyed investing world watched in wonder. The partnerships also transformed Mr. Kopper from a by-the-books child of the New York suburbs with an expertise in accounting into a high-stepping Texas deal maker with a hankering for fast cars and big houses.

Despite all of this, there is a possibility that Mr. Kopper, who just turned 41, could end up spending not one day in prison, because of the crucial role he has played in helping the government build its case against more senior executives, such as Mr. Fastow; Kenneth L. Lay, the former chairman; Jeffrey K. Skilling, the former chief executive; and Richard A. Causey, the former chief accounting officer. Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling are scheduled to stand trial on fraud and conspiracy charges later this month.

Certainly, Mr. Kopper's circumstances have changed in the last three years. A year ago, he moved out of the $1.5 million dream house with its glass stairways and its contemporary Japanese motif that he had designed with his longtime partner, William D. Dodson. Mr. Kopper has recently pegged his net worth at around $100,000, and he now lives on the second story of a modest duplex for which he paid $380,000; he rents out the bottom floor to help meet his expenses.

Even so, Mr. Kopper manages to lead a bit of the good life. Despite spending hundreds of hours in conference rooms in Houston and Washington briefing government prosecutors on Enron's inner workings, Mr. Kopper, known as a compulsive jet-setter during his Enron days, has remained an enthusiastic traveler. He has visited Phoenix and played golf in Boca Raton, Fla., with his father, a former magazine publisher at Times Mirror, and has gone on ski vacations in Colorado.

Mr. Kopper and Mr. Dodson, who has not been charged, declined to comment for this article, although friends and former colleagues did.

Mr. Kopper's deal with the government and the chance that he might have a reduced term or serve no jail time at all - he has not yet been sentenced - have angered people who blame him and Mr. Fastow for destroying the life savings of many former Enron employees and sending to prison others who had just the briefest brush with the company.

"Of all the deals Kopper made, his best was the plea deal," said Richard J. Schaeffer, a defense lawyer who cross-examined him during the trial of the Enron and Merrill Lynch executives who were convicted of bolstering Enron's earnings by letting the company fraudulently appear to sell barges in Nigeria for a profit. "He was the magician behind these deals," Mr. Schaeffer added. "His sense of greed had overtaken him. He had this brilliant mind and dedicated it to this partnership of evil."

This public caricature of Mr. Kopper as a malevolent financial sorcerer seems at odds with his middle-class roots. Indeed, his road to the heart of the Enron scandal was unusual. Born in Brooklyn and reared in Woodmere on Long Island, Mr. Kopper was always driven by an extra spurt of ambition and yearning for the big time that for years seemed to lie just beyond his grasp, people who know him say. Writing in his yearbook at Lawrence High School in 1982, his aspiration seemed simple, if not a bit vague: "To be successful in all my endeavors."

HE first enrolled at tiny Muhlenberg College in Allentown, Pa., but transferred to Duke, where he earned a bachelor's degree in economics. He also earned a degree in accounting and finance from the London School of Economics, and then began working as a loan officer at Chemical Bank in New York.

But his appetite for deal-making lead him to Toronto Dominion Bank, where he cut his teeth as a financier, working on a number of project-finance deals with energy companies - including, in the early 1990's, Enron. It was then that he met Mr. Fastow. The two men hit it off immediately. Both were young, hard-working and ambitious numbers guys with an appetite for deals and a desire to strike it rich as soon as possible, people who know both men say. It did not take long for Mr. Kopper, an eager Nick Carraway susceptible to the lure of Mr. Fastow's Gatsby, to join his mentor in Houston in 1994.

Enron was developing a reputation as a freewheeling, innovative company, and its aggressive, meritocratic culture seemed the perfect fit for Mr. Kopper, who was looking to unleash his own pent-up professional and materialistic ambitions, former colleagues say. Once there, he became even closer to Mr. Fastow, going to temple with him and his wife, Leah, and socializing with them after work.

DOJ_NMG_0008499

It was not until 1996 that Mr. Fastow and Mr. Kopper created their first off-balance-sheet partnership, which they called Alpine Investors. Mr. Kopper would make no money from this partnership, which was designed to buy underperforming power plants from Enron, but he would make money in 1997 with RADR, another off-the-books deal formed to buy wind farms that Enron wanted to sell.

Supposedly independent, RADR was financed with Enron money and controlled by Mr. Kopper and Mr. Fastow. They and some of their friends got payouts from the partnership, ultimately at Enron's expense. In that way, RADR was a template for more fraudulent schemes.

Mr. Kopper had begun dating Mr. Dodson, who worked in the finance department at Continental Airlines and also wanted to become an investor. But he was making only about $100,000 a year at Continental, so Mr. Kopper borrowed some money from Mr. Fastow - the amount has not been made public - and lent it to Mr. Dodson, according to Mr. Kopper's own testimony.

RADR was remarkably lucrative. In just four months, at virtually no risk, Mr. Kopper took in $40,000 from the deal. Mr. Fastow's $419,000 loan generated $62,850 in interest - an annualized return of 45 percent. It is not clear how much Mr. Dodson made. Enron's shareholders, meanwhile, footed the bill for the enterprise, which was designed to deceive them about the precarious state of Enron's balance sheet.

But it would be the next partnership, Chewco, also started in 1997, that would pay Mr. Kopper and Mr. Dodson an even more munificent return. "We made, after taxes, roughly $10.5 million," Mr. Kopper recounted to a defense lawyer during the trial in September 2004 on the separate Nigerian deal. (Mr. Kopper would collect more than $16 million from at least five partnerships that he and Mr. Fastow created over six years; with help from Mr. Dodson, he has paid $12 million back to the government, according to Creed C. Black Jr., Mr. Dodson's lawyer. Mr. Fastow collected more than $40 million, according to court documents.)

As the money rolled in, Mr. Kopper indulged his taste for sleek foreign cars and exotic vacations and cultivated a more risqué demeanor in and about the company. He wore expensive suits and shirts with zippers that seemed to creep lower and lower the more successful he became, his former colleagues at Enron remember. He told one colleague that he had a collection of 20 designer eyeglasses. Generally aloof with his colleagues, he made more of an effort to fit in, serving on an Enron diversity committee.

Of all the partnerships, it was perhaps Southampton, named after the opulent Houston suburb in which he lived, that came the closest to defining the corruptive, get-rich-quick and risk-free spirit of the off-balance-sheet entities at Enron. With three bankers from Greenwich NatWest, a British investment bank that did work for Enron, Mr. Kopper and Mr. Fastow created the partnership in 2000 to buy out the interests of Enron and NatWest in another entity, inserting themselves in the middle and deceiving both Enron and NatWest as to what they needed to pay.

ON the stand last year, Mr. Kopper described the essence of the deal in a flat, analytical style. "We stood between the two parties in order to skim money off of it," Mr. Kopper said, his face blank and voice devoid of emotion. How much did he make on the deal? "Four and a half million dollars," he said.

"That's a pretty good return on $25,000, isn't it?" a defense lawyer responded.

Yes, it was, Mr. Kopper said.

The lawyer asked how long it took to cobble together such a rich, efficient transaction. "Not that many hours," Mr. Kopper said. "Maybe 10 to 12 hours of work."

Honing in, the lawyer asked, "You wanted to make just a ton of money."

In a monotone, Mr. Kopper said simply, "Yes."

By 2001, Mr. Kopper had his ton of money and was starting work on a new house in a wealthy Houston suburb with Mr. Dodson. Mr. Kopper had also bought out Mr. Fastow for full control of yet another off-balance-sheet entity created at Enron, LJM2. No longer would he be just another accounting executive; as general partner of LJM2, he would preside over a fast-growing private equity fund with some of the best names in high finance as investors.

DOJ_NMG_0008500

But Mr. Kopper's time in the sun would be short-lived. With Enron's collapse in December 2001, he quickly came under the scrutiny of prosecutors and regulators who immediately questioned the propriety and legality of the myriad funds. The pressure became intense. Always a slender man, he began to lose weight, and when he pleaded guilty in 2002, he said he was taking medication for stress and anxiety.

As a government witness, Mr. Kopper, by all accounts, has been a success. At the barge trial last year, he powerfully evoked the financial cravings of Mr. Fastow, calling him "very greedy" and recounting examples of him giggling with childlike glee as he closed various deals.

The government has not put Mr. Kopper on the list of witnesses it expects to call in the trial of Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, but the defense has. Lawyers involved in the case say that Mr. Kopper may not even be called, given his lack of direct interaction with Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay. While the partnerships are expected to be a centerpiece of the trial, Mr. Fastow will be in a better position to discuss them and how they connect to Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling.

Friends of Mr. Kopper say he rarely speaks of Enron matters these days. He has ignored the imprecations cast at him by Mr. Lay, who has said that Enron was destroyed by the rogue actions of Mr. Fastow and Mr. Kopper - a view expressed by many members of Houston's business elite.

Always a bit of an outsider, Mr. Kopper is now even more of one. He is precluded by his plea agreement from speaking with Mr. Fastow and spends most of his time with Mr. Dodson and a small circle of friends from Enron.

And while he declined to comment for this article, his departing words in his 1982 high school yearbook seem to hold true today. Quoting from the song "Summer, Highland Falls" by Billy Joel, he wrote:

"We are always what our situations hand us. It's either sadness or euphoria."

Nacchio Could Point To Board's Actions (DENP)

By Andy Vuong, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, January 8, 2006

Former Qwest chief executive Joe Nacchio - accused of criminal insider trading for selling $100.8 million worth of Qwest stock in 2001 - may have a simple yet powerful defense for the sales: The board made him do it.

Qwest publicly stated on several occasions between September 2000 and February 2001 that its board of directors had ordered Nacchio to unload millions' worth of company shares.

Legal experts say the board's actions and company statements at the time could be vital to Nacchio's defense.

"He would argue that what he was doing was with full knowledge and authorization of the board," said Douglas McNabb, senior principal of McNabb Associates, a Washington, D.C.-based criminal defense law firm not involved in the Nacchio case. "That's huge."

Federal prosecutors are expected to argue that even if Nacchio was told to unload Qwest stock, the 42 stock sales he made between January and May 2001 were illegal because he was aware of key information about the company's financial condition that wasn't publicly available.

They likely will also assert that Nacchio accelerated his stock sales instead of following the board's order to systematically divest his position. To obtain a conviction, prosecutors would have to convince a jury beyond a reasonable doubt that Nacchio dumped stock while he knew Qwest's financial condition was much weaker than he claimed publicly.

Nacchio, of Mendham, N.J., has pleaded not guilty. A discovery hearing - where the prosecution and defense may disclose to each other additional details about their cases - is scheduled for Jan. 20.

The stakes are high for both sides as the case unfolds.

For the Justice Department, the Nacchio prosecution is the culmination of a sweeping probe of Qwest that has spanned four years.

If convicted, Nacchio faces up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine on each of the 42 counts against him. The government is also seeking the $100.8 million Nacchio grossed on the stock sales - plus other fines.

The dollar amount and number of counts against Nacchio make it one of the single largest criminal insider-trading cases.

Federal prosecutors and Nacchio's defense attorneys declined comment for this story.

Nacchio stopped selling

In August 2000, after Qwest had acquired Denver-based Baby Bell US West, Nacchio exercised 550,000 stock options at $5.50 apiece and sold the shares at prices ranging from $49.05 to $53.34.

In September 2000, when those sales were disclosed publicly, a company spokesman said that the Qwest board had directed Nacchio to sell some of his shares every quarter because it didn't want his ownership stake to get too large.

"Joe has no choice - he is required to sell a portion of his position," Tyler Gronbach, Qwest's spokesman at the time, said in a Denver Post article on Sept. 15, 2000.

Nacchio held 18 million stock options throughout 2000.

Gronbach, who left Qwest last October to work for R.H. Donnelley Corp. in Cary, N.C., did not return calls for comment.

The Denver Post last week asked Qwest for minutes of board meetings that would shed light on Nacchio's stock sales. The company declined but gave this statement: "We continue in our efforts to cooperate with the government in connection with the investigation."

In February 2001, the company issued a news release announcing a program in which Nacchio would systematically sell 6.1 million shares over the next 28 months at the board's behest.

Under the program, Nacchio was to exercise and sell 11,500 stock options daily from Feb. 20, 2001, to June 30, 2003, the date when the stock options would have expired. He was to sell the stock regardless of its price.

"The Qwest board asked Nacchio to commit to the program to avoid the bunching of sales during and at the end of the exercise period," according to the Feb. 16, 2001, news release.

Experts say such programs are a common way for insiders to sell stock systematically without raising concerns on Wall Street and among the investing public.

On eight trading days, Nacchio exercised

Advertisement

11,500 stock options each day at a price of $5.50 apiece and sold those shares at a price ranging from $34.84 to $38.12. However, he scrapped the sales program two weeks after it was announced - reportedly because Qwest's stock was slipping below $35.

"I will not continue to sell shares daily at these prices given the current uncertainty in the markets," Nacchio said in a statement on March 2, 2001.

Nacchio's statements and actions in this period are critical.

Between Jan. 2, 2001, and May 29, 2001, the government alleges, Nacchio committed illegal insider trading by selling more than 2.5 million Qwest shares for $100.8 million while he knew the company's financial condition was weaker than disclosed.

Insiders at public companies - such as Nacchio at Qwest during that time - are required to sign Securities and Exchange Commission disclosures that they knew of no "material adverse information" about the company when selling stock.

Nacchio was forced out of Qwest in June 2002 as the company's deteriorating financial condition became known. Qwest stock traded as low as $1.11 in August 2002. It was later forced to restate $2.5 billion in revenues.

What he knew is critical

The board's mandate to Nacchio to sell shares is "a good fact for the defense," said Jay Brown, a former Securities and Exchange attorney and law professor at the University of Denver.

Brown added that Nacchio can still be convicted for insider trading on stock sales made under the board's mandate if he had knowledge of material, nonpublic information at the time.

"Certainly the defense would use any information that tends to negate Nacchio's intent to commit any wrongful activity," said Eric Yaffe, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice with Gray Plant Mooty in Washington, D.C.

"But the question is, are there other issues or factors and other evidence of which the government is aware of" that would counteract the information, Yaffe said.

Former Qwest chief financial officer Robin Szeliga has pleaded guilty to one count of illegal insider trading and agreed to help with the prosecution's case against Nacchio.

The government charged Szeliga with illegal insider trading for an April 30, 2001, stock sale in which she sold 10,000 Qwest shares at $41 a share. On the same day, Nacchio sold 110,000 shares for $41.12, a transaction cited in his criminal indictment.

Last month, former Qwest executive vice president Marc Weisberg reached a plea deal on one charge of wire fraud and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors.

Former Qwest president Afshin Mohebbi also may testify for the government.

In October 2004, Qwest agreed to pay $250 million to settle SEC charges alleging financial fraud. In November 2005, the company agreed to pay $400 million to settle a class-action shareholder lawsuit.

No past or present Qwest board member has been charged as part of the federal government's probe into Qwest.

Several former board members who served during Nacchio's tenure didn't return calls seeking comment.

Staff writer Andy Vuong can be reached at 303-820-1209 or avuong@denverpost.com.

G.O.P. Finds Hope In Spitzer's Hard Edge (NYT)

By Patrick D. Healy

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

Attorney General Eliot Spitzer entered 2006 with huge advantages in his race to become the first Democratic governor of New York in 12 years: nearly $18 million on hand, a 70 percent popularity rating, and so much success fighting corporate fraud that he is one of the nation's most powerful prosecutors.

Yet for the first time since Mr. Spitzer declared for office a year ago, New York Republican leaders are now expressing hope that they can exploit what they view as a weak spot in the armor: his temperament, or, more precisely, his temper.

And, for the first time in a long time, some Democrats appear worried for Mr. Spitzer, and are trying to portray his tough style as an asset. Meanwhile, Mr. Spitzer is expressing new regret about his behavior.

Stories about Mr. Spitzer's blunt, brash style have circulated in business and political circles for years. Yet few spilled into the news media until last month, when John C. Whitehead, a Wall Street power broker whom Gov. George E. Pataki named as chairman of the Lower Manhattan Redevelopment Commission, said that Mr. Spitzer had told him that there was "a war between us" because he had criticized Mr. Spitzer as an overzealous, overreaching prosecutor.

Mr. Whitehead made his complaints known in a letter to The Wall Street Journal, and The New York Post ran articles on the dispute last month, including one with a front-page headline that said Mr. Spitzer was a "Liar!"

Since then, the issue of Mr. Spitzer's personality has begun to emerge in political circles, with Republicans circulating reports of his behavior in several disagreements over the last several years.

A spokesman for Representative Sue Kelly, a Republican, said Mr. Spitzer had acted like a thug during one argument by saying that he would cause trouble for her in her district if she continued to oppose legislation he favored.

Three fellow Democrats confirmed that he turned hot-tempered when they challenged him.

And in a quarrel with the attorney general of California, Mr. Spitzer told him that he was a kid from the Bronx who was willing to "step outside" to settle fights, according to a magazine article.

Democrats have sought to portray the encounters as simply reflecting the tough, no-nonsense approach that Mr. Spitzer takes toward his work.

Mr. Spitzer disputed some aspects of these anecdotes. But he also expressed his first measure of doubt about his aggressive manner since he was elected in 1998.

"On occasion, I look back and say, 'I wish I could take some of my words back,' " Mr. Spitzer said in an interview. He declined to list instances in which he thought he had been intemperate or overreacted, but said: "Have my answers or responses sometimes been disproportionate? I guess I'd be disingenuous - there have been moments, there are times I would look back and say, maybe that didn't merit that kind of response."

Mr. Spitzer stood by his actions in his legal cases. Yet describing himself, he used a range of words: passionate, intense, vociferous and sensitive. He used the phrase "kids in a sandbox" to describe a heated argument last spring with a possible

DOJ_NMG_0008503

Republican rival in the governor's race, Tom Golisano. But Mr. Spitzer said he had never threatened people, nor made his disputes personal.

He also said for the first time that he regretted his exchange with Mr. Whitehead. The two men disagree on whether Mr. Spitzer used the word war: Mr. Whitehead stood by it in an interview, while Mr. Spitzer said he was at war with some people whom Mr. Whitehead was defending, but not with the man himself.

"I have enormous respect for John Whitehead," Mr. Spitzer said. "So I absolutely regret that he and I, at this moment, are seeing things a bit differently, and I will work to repair that." Asked if he had handled the exchange badly, Mr. Spitzer said, "Looking at how it is played out, I think it would be hard to say this was wisely handled."

Temperament has rarely surfaced as an issue in Mr. Spitzer's past races. But when he was running for attorney general in 1998, he and former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani tangled after Mr. Spitzer said that Mr. Giuliani governed like "a dictator." Mr. Spitzer narrowly won that race, against Dennis C. Vacco, the Republican.

Mr. Spitzer was re-elected overwhelmingly in 2002, in a race that drew scant attention and preceded some of his most contentious lawsuits and that came at a time when his enemies were not so numerous.

Republican politicians said they planned to make his temperament an issue in the 2006 campaign, hoping to portray him as unlikable, arrogant, and a poor coalition-builder.

"He has never been challenged like he will be in this race for governor," said William F. Weld, a Republican candidate for governor, in a recent interview. "I think once the case is made against him, voters will see a very different Eliot Spitzer."

Some Democratic office-holders in Albany, meanwhile, were swapping tales of their own about Mr. Spitzer as they prepared for Gov. George E. Pataki's final legislative session. Their main concern is that Republican adversaries will portray Mr. Spitzer as thin-skinned; privately, some worry that the hothouse of the governor's race could bring out rough edges of his personality.

Steven Sanders, a former Democratic assemblyman and an ally of Mr. Spitzer's, recalled that when he challenged Mr. Spitzer's tactics on a lawsuit over equity in public school financing, Mr. Spitzer turned sharp and said he was not interested in "a back-and-forth discussion." Mr. Sanders recounted the anecdote to suggest that Mr. Spitzer "really has that direct, relentless quality that Rudy Giuliani has, and maybe at times that comes across as too brusque, too abrupt, maybe even threatening in some ways. He simply takes his responsibilities and standing his ground seriously."

Assemblyman Richard L. Brodsky, who confirmed fighting with Mr. Spitzer because the attorney general pressed him to back off a legal dispute before the state, said that Mr. Spitzer's successes were more important than personality issues.

"Let's be fair: We all have rough edges, but this is a guy who has fundamentally altered international markets for the good," said Mr. Brodsky, who is running for attorney general this year.

Mr. Spitzer acknowledged that he has argued with Democratic allies - Assemblywoman Catherine Nolan also confirmed a shouting match over a local issue - but he said that the disagreements were substantive, and that they all were friends at the end of the day. Mr. Sanders, Mr. Brodsky and Ms. Nolan all concurred.

Of the occasions that turned contentious, Mr. Spitzer said: "I've always tried - and not always succeeded after the fact - to patch up the relationship. This is never personal to me, never."

Some Democrats were far more critical of Mr. Spitzer's behavior, though none were willing to speak on the record because they said they did not want to anger the man they believe will be the next New York governor. The party has largely united around Mr. Spitzer's candidacy, and he is preparing to announce a large fund-raising war chest on Jan. 15 - at least $18 million - that rivals his poll numbers in impressiveness.

Yet at least one Democrat, Nassau County Executive Thomas R. Suozzi, is taking heart from the anecdotes about Mr. Spitzer, as he prepares to announce an exploratory committee for governor, according to party members who have spoken to him. Mr. Suozzi's political aide declined to comment.

Mr. Suozzi is drawing help from Spitzer adversaries like Kenneth G. Langone, a co-founder of Home Depot, who said in an interview that he has raised about $1 million for Mr. Suozzi in just the last few weeks. Mr. Spitzer's office has accused Mr. Langone and others of misleading fellow New York Stock Exchange members about the compensation paid to Richard A. Grasso, the former stock exchange chairman.

DOJ_NMG_0008504

Beyond the charges, Mr. Langone says he is furious over a remark that Mr. Spitzer made about him in 2004 to Jack Welch, the former General Electric leader.

Mr. Spitzer said in the interview that he told Mr. Welch, "Ken's kind of like a vampire - you kind of have to put a stake through his heart to stop him."

Mr. Langone said Mr. Welch told him that Mr. Spitzer wanted to drive a stake through his heart; Mr. Spitzer denied that he used those words, and Mr. Welch did not respond to a message left on his cellphone.

Mr. Spitzer is under intense scrutiny right now because polls show him as the leading candidate. His advisers also acknowledged that they wanted to boost his favorability ratings among women, and that his image now cuts both ways: strong and tough, but aggressive and stern, too.

The argument with Representative Kelly occurred in 2003, when she and Mr. Spitzer sparred over the phone about a piece of legislation that would have hampered Mr. Spitzer's white-collar investigations. Her spokesman at the time, Rob Ostrander, told The Poughkeepsie Journal that Mr. Spitzer acted like a "thug" by threatening to come into her Westchester district and cause problems for her.

Her current spokesman, Kevin Callahan, said Mrs. Kelly stands by the "thug" description, but added that she and Mr. Spitzer had worked together since then. Mrs. Kelly declined to comment.

Mr. Spitzer said the thug characterization was unfair. He said the conversation grew heated because he thought "her position was really bad for consumers." He added: "I said something like, 'I really disagree with you, and I'll tell the voters about it.'"

Mr. Spitzer's warnings may seem like threats to some, said Stephen Cutler, the former director of enforcement with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

He recalled how Mr. Spitzer was "very, very angry" when the S.E.C. settled a securities fraud lawsuit against Putnam Investments, the mutual fund giant, without the sort of fines or monetary penalties that Mr. Spitzer wanted.

"He said, 'Look, I'm going to have to do what I'm going to have to do. I'm going to go out publicly and make life uncomfortable for you and the S.E.C.,' " said Mr. Cutler, who clashed frequently with Mr. Spitzer but said they remained friendly.

While arguments have usually been over policy, Mr. Spitzer said his sense of humor could backfire on him, too. In another incident, he said he was "joking" when, according to The American Lawyer magazine, his argument with the California attorney general, Bill Lockyer over a financial dispute turned heated and Mr. Spitzer said: "You want to step outside, that's fine! I grew up in the Bronx!"

"Of all the anecdotes, that has been the most misconstrued," Mr. Spitzer said. "It was more joking, fun." The magazine said its account was based on several unnamed people who witnessed the exchange. Mr. Lockyer did not return a phone message.

A breakfast last spring at the Waldorf-Astoria with Mr. Golisano also turned sour as he accused Mr. Spitzer, both sides confirm, of being "in the pocket" of Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver and the Albany Democratic establishment.

According to an aide to Mr. Golisano, Mr. Spitzer replied that he would "crush" him in an election. "I didn't say, 'I'll crush you,' I said 'I think I'll beat you, let's put a bet on it,'" Mr. Spitzer recalled. "It's like kids in a sandbox."

Mr. Spitzer said he believed that voters would ultimately appreciate that his results in office - hundreds of millions of dollars recouped for New York - required a certain intensity.

He said a similar intensity was needed to overhaul Albany, and besides, he said, it would be pointless to try to deny who he was.

"I don't want to strip my personality so far down to be neutered and I don't seem human," he said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Dems Charge GOP Has Corrupted Congress (AP-Y2)

AP, January 8, 2006

Democrats accused Republican congressional leaders of corrupting the government, claiming on Saturday that their party has higher ethical standards.

"Under Republican guidance, America has truly been put up for sale to the highest bidder," Rep. Louise Slaughter, D-N.Y., said in her party's weekly radio address.

Congress was consumed this week by the corruption scandal around lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty and is cooperating in a wide-ranging probe that could involve up to 20 members of Congress and their aides.

Politicians from both parties have rushed to unload donations from Abramoff or his clients, while others have decided to keep such donations, insisting they did nothing wrong.

Slaughter painted the Abramoff case and an earlier guilty plea by former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., as part of a broader pattern of misconduct by Republicans under the sway of highly paid lobbyists.

"Sadly, the legacy of Republican rule has been the fundamental degradation of our democratic institutions and the abandonment of our core principles," Slaughter said.

"Lobbyists are now writing the bills passed by Congress," she contended. "They have infiltrated every aspect of our government. Their money and donations shape the opinions of corrupt lawmakers in a way that public opinion no longer does."

Slaughter said the unethical influence of lobbyists has affected everything from the Iraq war to energy policy to the new Medicare prescription drug plan.

The 10-term congresswoman said her party will "uphold the highest standards of integrity."

Repeating a Democratic tag line, Slaughter said, "Together, America can do better."

Democrats Want Sweeping House Ethics Investigation (REU-Y2)

Reuters, January 8, 2006

Democrats seized on a mushrooming scandal involving a disgraced lobbyist on Saturday to call for sweeping ethics probes in the Republican-led House of Representatives.

Rep. Louise Slaughter, a New York Democrat, said lobbyists had multiplied by the thousands in recent years to the point where there were now 63 of them for every lawmaker. She said they were using their campaign donations to influence policy and even write laws.

Slaughter called on the House ethics committee to investigate corruption cases involving lawmakers with links to Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist who pleaded guilty this week in a U.S. corruption probe.

"The House ethics committee, after a year of inaction, must get to work immediately to investigate pending ethics and corruption cases in the House, including those involving members with ties to Jack Abramoff," she said in the Democrats' weekly radio address.

"This is a necessary first step to restore a high ethical standard to the Congress," Slaughter said.

There was no immediate comment from a spokesman for the ethics committee, chaired by Rep. Doc Hastings, a Washington Republican.

But Republicans have sought to cast the Abramoff case as a bipartisan scandal, noting that some Democrats also received donations from Abramoff's clients and associates.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to fraud charges and admitted that he gave golf trips, sports tickets and other gifts to lawmakers in return for special treatment.

The case has deepened the woes of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, a Texas Republican whom Abramoff describes as a close friend. It has spurred a debate in the Republican Party over whether DeLay should return to his leadership post even if cleared of money-laundering charges in a separate case in Texas.

Democrats hope to turn the Abramoff scandal into a major election-year issue that could help them win back control of the House in the November elections.

DeLay Ends Bid To Regain Post As G.O.P. Leader (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008506

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 - Representative Tom DeLay, under pressure from colleagues and swept into an election-year lobbying scandal, abandoned his effort to remain House majority leader on Saturday. The move touched off a battle for the House Republican leadership in a campaign season tinged by corruption.

In letters sent Saturday to fellow House Republicans and Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Mr. DeLay said he supported the call for an election of a new leader and was stepping aside to avoid becoming a political liability as Republicans face a determined Democratic challenge to their majority.

"The job of majority leader and the mandate of the Republican majority are too important to be hamstrung, even for a few months, by personal distractions," Mr. DeLay said in the letter to Mr. Hastert, the man he personally picked to take the speaker's job in a previous round of leadership turmoil in 1998. In his letter to the Republican conference, Mr. DeLay said he had "always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land."

Though his allies just hours earlier had suggested Mr. DeLay would resist moves to oust him, his aides said he came to a different conclusion on his own Saturday morning in Texas as he assessed his waning support and the potential damage to House Republicans. He then telephoned Mr. Hastert to deliver his decision, according to a House leadership aide who did not want to be identified discussing private conversations.

Mr. Hastert said Republicans would hold a leadership election after they return for the State of the Union address on Jan. 31. "It is an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican conference," he said of Mr. DeLay's announcement. Mr. DeLay acted after a group of House Republicans on Friday began circulating a petition calling for an election to bar him from the post. The move came after the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, a former DeLay ally, pleaded guilty on Tuesday to criminal corruption charges in a case that could also involve other former senior DeLay aides.

Mr. DeLay intends to seek re-election to his seat representing the Houston suburbs and reclaim his position on the Appropriations Committee, but he will no longer wield the power that for years made him one of the most influential Republicans in the capital.

His decision immediately kicked off a potentially divisive fight over who should become the new leader - a chief face of the party as well as the senior floor strategist.

Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, the No. 3 elected Republican who has been filling in for Mr. DeLay since his September indictment in Texas in a campaign-finance case, began rounding up support by telephone, arguing that his success in pushing through difficult budget and spending legislation in the past few months had proved his abilities and earned him the job permanently.

But Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, a well-liked lawmaker who has served in the leadership before, was expected to announce his own candidacy as early as Sunday.

Others could also throw in their names, including Representatives Mike Pence of Indiana, Mike Rogers of Michigan and Jerry Lewis of California. Should Mr. Blunt prevail in the majority leader's fight, that would create a vacancy for majority whip and lawmakers were also preparing for a potential contest for that post. Mr. Rogers was seen as a possible candidate along with Representatives Eric Cantor of Virginia, the appointed deputy whip, and Zach Wamp of Tennessee. Lawmakers and top aides said there seemed to be no mounting challenge to either Mr. Hastert or Representative Deborah Pryce of Ohio, the chairwoman of the party conference.

A White House spokeswoman, Erin Healy, reading from an official statement, said, "We respect Congressman DeLay's decision to put the interests of the American people, the House of Representatives and the Republican Party first. We look forward to continuing to work with Speaker Hastert and all House Republicans to build upon the important accomplishments we have achieved on behalf of the American people to make America safer and more prosperous."

It was not clear whether Bush administration officials played any role in pushing Mr. DeLay out, and Republicans who consulted with the White House and leadership on Capitol Hill said events had unfolded strictly within Congress.

Mr. DeLay stepped down from the post in the fall after his indictment in Texas on campaign-related charges of money laundering. But he was aggressively battling those accusations, and many of his colleagues considered the case partisan. But the Abramoff plea and the potential involvement in that case of others who had been close to Mr. DeLay shifted the political dynamic.

House Republicans have stood by Mr. DeLay, who became majority leader in 2002 after serving for years as the party whip, despite a series of rebukes by the House ethics committee and a ferocious courtship of the lobbying industry that brought him under attack for having too heavy a hand in encouraging firms to hire favored Republican lobbyists. Democrats have complained for years about Mr. DeLay's iron control of the House, his unwillingness to engage the minority party and his ethical conduct. One Democratic leader said Saturday that his decision to step down would not spare Republicans from attacks over ethics.

"The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress," said Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader.

Those backing the petition drive for a new leader had hoped that Mr. DeLay would take himself out of the fight rather than have to be forced out by his colleagues. Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Mr. DeLay, said he made his choice after talking with his staff and other advisers and weighing his options.

"He doesn't see this as being broken," Mr. Madden said. "I think it is something that he sees as being best for the conference."

DeLay Steps Down Permanently As House Majority Leader (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - Tom DeLay, the pugnacious Texas Republican dogged by ethics complaints, stepped down permanently as House majority leader Saturday, the first political casualty of a blossoming Washington lobbying scandal.

Maintaining that he has "always acted in an ethical manner," DeLay nonetheless told House Republican lawmakers in a letter that he was permanently stepping down because "I cannot allow our adversaries to divide and distract our attention."

DeLay was forced to step down temporarily as leader in September when he was indicted by a Texas grand jury on charges that he broke state campaign finance laws. But the final straw came last week when Jack Abramoff, a once-powerful Republican lobbyist with close ties to DeLay, pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

DeLay reached his decision Saturday in Texas, a day after two House Republicans initiated a drive to keep DeLay from reclaiming his leadership post and to hold elections to replace him permanently.

DeLay will keep a seat on the powerful House Appropriations Committee, which distributes government money, and plans to run for re-election. But the departure from the leadership of a key figure in pushing President Bush's agenda for the past five years could hobble the White House in the future. DeLay's stepping down may be some help to House Republicans, who've benefited from DeLay's tactical and fundraising prowess, but have also seen their popularity plummet nationally amid headline-making scandals in which he often had a role.

An Associated Press-Ipsos poll released Friday showed the American public favored Democrats over Republicans 49 percent to 36 percent for Congress. Democrats need 15 seats in the 435-member House of Representatives to win control.

Delay's resignation from the leadership threw the House into an unpredictable phase that will test House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill. Hastert is well regarded by his colleagues, but the House Republican caucus was already stirring with demands for greater leadership changes.

"We don't just need new leaders, we need a major course correction," Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., one of the two lawmakers who prompted the effort to replace DeLay, said in an interview Saturday.

Even before DeLay reached his decision, Rep. Melissa Hart, R-Pa., demanded Friday in a statement that the Republican House membership "needs the ability to reassess the leadership team as a whole."

Hastert, who abruptly canceled a foreign trip he was to embark upon Monday, said he would schedule leadership elections for the week of Jan. 31. A top leadership aide, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the elections, said current plans are only to fill DeLay's vacancy, not other leadership posts.

A leadership fight could disrupt the House's handling of some important upcoming legislative issues. Among them are the renewal of the anti-terrorism Patriot Act, which expires Feb. 3, reductions in planned spending for anti-poverty programs and billions of dollars in tax cuts.

DOJ_NMG_0008508

DeLay, in a letter to Hastert, indicated that it was best for the party if he stepped aside. "The job of majority leader and the mandate of the Republican majority are too important to be hamstrung, even for a few months, by personal distractions," he wrote.

Hastert, in a statement, said Delay's was "an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican Conference."

Democrats showed no signs of relenting after DeLay stepped down.

"By forcing out Tom DeLay, Republicans have addressed a party problem but not the institutional problem of corruption that most troubles the American people," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., the chairman of the campaign arm of the House Democrats.

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said: "The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress."

Flake said rank-and-file Republicans will insist on elections that force leadership candidates to propose fundamental changes in the ways that legislators work. Flake has called for an end to targeted legislative provisions, called earmarks, that lawmakers insert into bills to help their congressional districts or special interests. Earmarks are a favorite of lobbyists seeking special legislative treatment.

Flake said even Hastert's fate could hang on the elections. "It really depends on how willing the speaker is to align himself with a reform agenda," Flake said.

Among the leading candidates to replace DeLay are Roy Blunt of Missouri and John Boehner of Ohio. Blunt stepped in to become acting majority leader after DeLay was indicted in Texas. Boehner is chairman of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce and was once a member of the leadership team.

In statements issued Saturday, Blunt and Boehner both praised DeLay as one of the party's most effective leaders. But while Boehner noted that he and DeLay "have had our differences over the years," Blunt described DeLay as "my good friend."

Republicans Seek Elections To Replace DeLay (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Washington

Financial Times, January 8, 2006

As Washington assesses the impact of the lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea this week to charges of bribery, tax evasion and fraud, one early casualty has emerged: Tom DeLay, the former majority leader of the House of Representatives.

Mr DeLay, a central figure in the conservative movement, was forced to step down from his leadership post in September after a Texas prosecutor indicted him on unrelated money-laundering charges. He had hoped to resolve that matter quickly and resume his duties.

But the case against Mr Abramoff, who has close ties to Mr DeLay, along with a guilty plea to corruption charges by Michael Scanlon, a former DeLay aide, and the potential involvement of other former aides – as well as the continuing legal battle in Texas – appear to have scuppered that plan.

Several rank-and-file Republicans in the House said on Friday they would circulate a petition in the next few days calling for leadership elections to formally replace Mr DeLay, who many fear could become a liability in the November 2006 mid-term elections.

Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker who led the Republican takeover of Congress in 1994, said this week that while Mr DeLay must defend himself in court, “the House Republican party has a different set of interests and [they] involve having a new majority leader”.

The Wall Street Journal editorial page weighed in on Friday, saying Mr DeLay and the Republicans “should move on separately”.

John Green, director of the Bliss Institute of Applied Politics at the University of Akron, said: “Just for purely practical reasons, the Republicans are not going to want him back in the leadership position.”

Just as the high costs of Hurricane Katrina prompted a backlash among fiscal conservatives in the Republican party, the Abramoff scandal is prompting a broader self-examination among Republicans. “The party that swept to power on term limits, spending restraint and reform has become the party of incumbency, 6,371 highway-bill 'earmarks', and K Street [the site of many lobbyists' offices]," the Journal said.

DOJ_NMG_0008509

But replacing Mr DeLay poses challenges."Whatever one may think of his politics, he was very good at rounding up votes," said Mr Green.

Roy Blunt, who has filled in for Mr DeLay since September, is considered the frontrunner to succeed him. But Mr Blunt has been criticised for what are seen as mis-steps on the House floor.

A leadership campaign threatens to expose divisions within the Republican caucus, between Mr DeLay's allies and other factions, and between fiscal conservatives and moderates.

Republicans have pointed out that politicians from both parties had ties to Mr Abramoff. Dozens of lawmakers, as well as President George W. Bush, have said they will return political contributions from Mr Abramoff or donate the funds to charity.

Charlie Cook, a political analyst, says the full impact of the case will depend on how many, and which, politicians Mr Abramoff implicates. "So far, the vast majority of voters have no earthly idea who Abramoff is, and they don't see his troubles as primarily a Republican problem."

Democratic Leader Takes Anti-Corruption Message To GOP Turf (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

Harry M. Reid is heading into the belly of the beast.

The Senate minority leader will spend much of this week traveling to "red states" -- those that voted for George W. Bush in 2004 -- to campaign for candidates, raise cash and bash Republicans on the issue of corruption.

Dubbed by his office "Reid's Red State Tour," the three-day journey will take the Nevada senator through Arizona, Colorado, Utah, Idaho and Nebraska. He will be in Phoenix and Denver on Tuesday, Salt Lake City and Pocatello on Wednesday and Omaha on Thursday. It is one of several such campaign swings Reid has planned between now and the November midterm elections, according to his office.

In each state Reid will conduct events seeking to highlight the need to "restore honest leadership in Washington, D.C.," said his spokesman Jim Manley.

But Reid also has a pecuniary motive. He plans to raise money for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee at each of his five stops.

Take, for example, his jaunt to Nebraska. According to an itinerary of the visit, Reid will join Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) to "send a strong message that Americans don't have to accept more of the same corruption and cronyism that pervades Washington today." Left off the itinerary is a DSCC event in Omaha hosted by Reid that Nelson plans to attend.

With official Washington clamoring to deal with the fallout from last week's plea agreement by fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Reid's trip comes at an opportune time for a party whose members are seeking to cast themselves as outsiders to corruption.

"Americans everywhere want elected officials who will fight for them," Reid said. "We're ready to clean up Washington, and we're going to make our case across this country."

Republican National Committee spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt drew a different conclusion when informed of Reid's travels.

"You can take Harry Reid out of Washington, but you can't take the Washington out of Harry Reid," Schmitt said. "Does he plan to brag about killing the Patriot Act or shutting down the United States Senate?"Vegas Mayor Ready to Gamble on Senate Bid?

Meanwhile, back in Sin City, the Senate minority leader confirmed last week that he has spoken to Las Vegas Mayor Oscar Goodman (D) about possibly challenging Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) in 2006.

Harry M. Reid told the Associated Press that he was "happy to give [Goodman] any advice or counsel that he needs or wants." Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, has also spoken with Goodman about a potential candidacy. Jack Carter, son of former president Jimmy Carter, is also considering a bid against Ensign.

DOJ_NMG_0008510

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer said Goodman and Carter are "quality" candidates, and pointed to a Zogby International poll conducted online last fall that showed Ensign with a 45 percent to 42.5 percent edge over Goodman. "If Ensign thought he'd have an easy ride in 2006, he was mistaken," Singer added.

"We're very confident that Senator Ensign will be reelected based on his strong record in the Senate and the great work he has done for the state of Nevada," responded National Republican Senatorial Committee spokesman Brian Nick.

A Goodman Senate bid would set off a political circus worthy of a Vegas casino.

Long before being elected mayor in 1999, Goodman was a high-profile -- and controversial -- figure in Las Vegas as the lead attorney for a number of high-profile Mafia figures, including Meyer Lansky and Tony "The Ant" Spilotro. Goodman has embraced the "what happens here stays here" motto of his city as its mayor -- he is regularly accompanied by showgirls and has a weak spot for Elvis impersonators.

Putting aside Goodman's flamboyant personality, if Reid is seen as advocating a bid by the mayor it could signal a break in the unstated truce that has been in effect between him and Ensign since Ensign won a Senate seat in 2000. Asked whether Reid was encouraging Goodman to enter the race, spokeswoman Tessa Hafen said -- carefully -- that the minority leader "was not trying to convince Goodman to run."Frist Looks Northward for Rebound

Seeking to right his presidential bid after a calamitous 2005, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist will headline the Lincoln-Reagan Day Dinner in Hampstead, N.H., on Feb. 3.

The visit to the Granite State -- home of the first-in-the-nation presidential primary -- will be the Tennessee Republican's second since early December, when he made stops in Manchester, Concord and Portsmouth.

With Frist beginning his final year in the Senate, expect his attentions to turn more and more to the presidential race. In an e-mail sent last week from his Volunteer PAC leadership committee, Frist urged supporters to attend a presidential 2008 straw poll to be at the Southern Republican Leadership Conference in Memphis in March.

Cillizza is a staff writer for washingtonpost.com. His online column on politics, The Fix, appears daily athttp://www.washingtonpost.com/thefix.

Scandal Exposes Washington's Underside (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, January 8, 2006

A luxury skybox for sports fans in Congress. A dinner party that raises thousands of dollars for a political candidate. Helpful suggestions on how the guest of honor might phrase a letter to the president or a Cabinet secretary.

Alone and even in modest combinations, all are examples of business as usual in Washington's billion-dollar world of government, lobbying and campaign finance.

What makes it work is discretion.

What's blown the lid on it now is lobbyist Jack Abramoff's excesses.

It's the unwritten rules as much as the written ones that Abramoff broke: Don't gloat, don't be too greedy, don't say out loud what you're doing, and don't ever, ever, put in writing what you don't have to.

There is one other clear difference between Abramoff's actions and those of other lobbyists.

"He defrauded his clients. That's a big difference," said Kathleen Clark, a government ethics expert at the Washington University law school in St. Louis.

Abramoff, who faces up to 11 years in prison after pleading guilty last week to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion charges, also got caught. A maze of campaign finance laws and lobbying rules makes it hard to prove a lawmaker took an official action under a "quid pro quo" agreement with a generous lobbyist.

"The scandal with Abramoff is just the enormity of it," said Roberta Baskin, executive director of the Center for Public Integrity, a private ethics watchdog group. "Who knows if there are others like him out there or not."

If so, it's unlikely they had all of Abramoff's trappings:

_Foreign golf trips arranged for former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, and the chairman of the House Administration Committee, Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio.

_Fundraisers at his skybox or at his upscale Signatures restaurant on Pennsylvania Avenue exactly half way between the Capitol and the White House.

_Job offers for top Bush administration officials and senior aides of congressional leaders and committee chairmen.

"He's exceptional in that he was pushing so many levers at once," said Frank Clemente, director of Public Citizen's Congress Watch.

More may be known soon.

Under a plea deal with federal prosecutors, Abramoff's e-mails and other documents will be the stuff of federal court proceedings that will expose the mysterious and protected world of Washington lobbying.

Because the law requires limited transparency of lobbyist-lawmaker dealings, the differences between Abramoff and other lobbyists are not entirely clear.

Lobbyists, legislators, campaign fundraisers and presidential appointees frequently wear different hats over the course of their careers. It's been pretty much that way since the nation's beginning. Even public integrity watchdogs acknowledge that lobbyists, properly regulated, are important advocates in the American system of government.

The ethical boundaries get blurred when people play two or more parts, often in the same day.

Rainmakers raise colossal amounts of money that candidates need to wage and win campaigns. Lobbyists try to persuade lawmakers and presidentially appointed officials to take actions that benefit their clients. Often they are one and the same.

What is hard to prove is whether lobbyists press officials — and whether the officials agree — to pony up these official acts out of gratitude for campaign money or other gifts of value, such as skybox seats and exotic trips. The law says such a quid pro quo only can be proved when explicitly uttered or written down.

Hence, the unwritten rules: Whatever events or contributions might have preceded a public policy decision that benefits the lobbyist's clients, don't talk about it and don't put anything in writing that isn't required.

Abramoff violated both, and the law, in vivid detail.

"Is life great or what!!" he exulted in an e-mail to an associate with whom he pocketed $66 million from six American Indian tribes seeking influence in Washington.

In a series of e-mails and other documents, Abramoff explained that in 2002 he and an associate secretly funneled millions of dollars to consultant Ralph Reed, a former Christian Coalition leader, to help shut down a Texas casino operated by the Tigua Indians.

Then Abramoff persuaded the Tiguas to hire him and his associate, public relations consultant Michael Scanlon, to help reopen the casino.

"The annoying losers are the only ones which have this kind of money and part with it so quickly," Abramoff wrote to Scanlon.

Abramoff also explained how some of the money would be doled out: "He (Scanlon) divided the $5 million into three piles: $1 million for actual expenses and $2 million for each of us."

White House Watch: (PPG)

By Ann McFeatters

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Tempting as it is to say a pox on all their houses, we are confronted with the question of the extent of corruption in Washington's political circles.

Are government officials and actions, in fact, for sale?

The once-flamboyant, multi-hatted Jack Abramoff, whose name is now synonymous with political turpitude, survived and thrived because many powerful members of Congress eagerly accepted his contributions to their re-election campaigns.

Politicians from President Bush on down through the ranks of Congress took the Abramoff largess because they wanted to be re-elected. To stay in power, pols raise millions of dollars to defeat opponents.

DOJ_NMG_0008512

There are no vicuna coats in this scandal, as far as we know (fur being politically incorrect at the moment). No call-girl ring has been busted on Capitol Hill (albeit the aphrodisiac of power will be with us until the end of time). But this latest spate of revealed corruption will do far more harm because it is so entrenched, so sophisticated and so sickening.

What lobbyists such as Mr. Abramoff seek is a seat at the table when laws are written and regulations are finalized so that their clients' interests hold sway.

There is not one aspect of human life untouched by congressional hands. The air we breathe, the food we eat, the cars we drive, the medicines we take, how we invest our money, the way we die, the care we get when we're sick or old -- it all is regulated, and Congress has oversight over everything.

We do not yet know whether the latest West Virginia coal-mine tragedy was caused by violation of safety rules. We do know that the Bush administration has not issued one significant coal-mine safety regulation in five years. We do know that despite promising mammoth increases in penalties for safety violations, the administration has yet to act to demand them. We do know that the first person the administration put in charge of mine safety came from the mining industry and had vehement views on the need to get government off its back. We do know that congressional oversight on mine safety has been abysmal.

There is a line between excessive regulation, which stultifies business expansion, and too light a federal hand on business, which means the worker and the consumer get shafted.

This administration has worked hard to lift the heavy hands of federal regulators off the shoulders of big business (less so off small business). Strident voices such as Ralph Nader's have been loudly complaining, but for many reasons have been ignored.

Sometimes critics cried wolf too often. Sometimes the intricacies of the issues they raised were too daunting for all but the most dedicated zealots to unravel. And when fewer people buy newspapers, there are fewer reporters paid to dig into mounds of arcane records searching for evidence of fraud and abuse. (TV sometimes tries, but is woefully unable to commit the needed manpower to investigative reporting.)

There is a noble purpose to lobbying. No legislator can be adequately familiar with every aspect of every bill. Lobbyists from all sides of an issue -- for example, for the coal company, for the worker and for the environmental group -- compete to get their interests written into legislation. What is unfair and illegal is when lobbyists with big bucks spread them around in a way calculated to get the votes of lawmakers.

Some lawmakers refuse to have anything to do with the bad lobbyists who lurk on Capitol Hill. They are the good guys. The legislators who took money from Mr. Abramoff and his ilk convinced themselves they were just doing what "everybody else does" to stay in office so they can "do good" and pass legislation that matters. Most of them did not take the money to get rich -- for one thing, that's too easily traced. Many of them passionately believe in what they are doing.

But what these witless co-conspirators have done is further undermine public confidence, chisel away at the credibility of government and give comfort to enemies convinced the democratic system is no better than any other and maybe even worse.

Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said the Abramoff pleas of guilty to felonious bribing of lawmakers, evasion of taxes and bilking of clients show that "government officials and government action are not for sale."

But as the investigation continues into how many webs Jack Abramoff has spun, we have no confidence her statement is true.

Can I Lobby You? (WP)

By Jan Witold Baran

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

If you typed the word "lobbyist" into the Google News search engine last week, the first page of 8,670 search results would have included dozens of headlines that screamed out "Lobbyist's Guilty Plea Sends Out Shock Waves Through US Congress," "Bush Campaign Getting Rid of Lobbyist's Money" and "Kennedy Among Leading Recipients of Convicted Lobbyist's Clients." The referenced lobbyist is, of course, Jack Abramoff. In spreading the news to America and the world, most news organizations deemed it sufficient to simply inform the public in headlines that a "lobbyist" had pleaded guilty. The insinuation is that there must be something inherently sinister because a lobbyist is involved. The nature of his guilt is treated as self-evident.

DOJ_NMG_0008513

Perhaps this scandal will eventually be called the Abramoff affair, but for now it is a lobbying scandal. If Shakespeare lived today, perhaps he would write, "First shoot all the lobbyists." Yet in the midst of the current furor, reports do not mention that there are thousands of lobbyists in Washington who are honorable and honest people and who render a service that is both critical to a democratic society and enshrined in our Constitution.

There is irony here. The same constitutional provision that ensures the press may proclaim a lobbyist's guilty plea also protects the act of lobbying. The First Amendment is well-known for guaranteeing freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of assembly and freedom of religion. Often overlooked in its litany of fundamental civil liberties is the right "to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." It is this distinct clause that prevents Congress and the president from enacting a law that bans lobbying. It is a right that should not be taken lightly and that should not be eroded by the fraudulent acts of a single lobbyist.

The Washington lobbying community was aghast to learn of Abramoff's methods and practices . Bilking a handful of Native American tribes of more than $80 million in four years is shocking. Mocking those same clients in e-mails is unconscionable and disrespectful. Renting suites or skyboxes in at least three professional sports arenas is exceptional even among the most prosperous D.C. firms. Firms typically do not rent such suites because the price of tickets now regularly exceeds the limits on gifts to legislators. Most corporate offices in Washington have instituted compliance systems to ensure that their lobbyists do not exceed gift limits. For all these reasons, lobbyists are appalled at Abramoff's practice of extravagant wining and dining (at his own restaurant!), orchestrating lavish trips and offering campaign contributions in exchange for specific official acts. There may be others who bend the rules, but Abramoff retired the cup for outrageous conduct in the name of lobbying.

We have laws to prevent such corruption. If members of Congress were caught breaking those laws, they would be prosecuted and punished -- but we wouldn't abolish their seats and deprive their constituents of representation.

The framers of the Constitution recognized that citizens must be free to make appeals to those who govern and who make policies, laws and regulations that affect the citizenry. Obviously, most citizens are not physically located at the seat of government, may not know how government works, and are busy doing things other than lobbying. For those reasons, when they need help in making their petitions, they retain representatives who can more effectively seek redress on their behalf. In other words, ordinary folks need representatives to talk to their representatives.

While officials may prefer to legislate without being importuned by those affected or by their representatives, that is not the way laws should be made in an open democratic society. The founders sought to ensure the public interest by promoting pluralism and protecting the participation of all. How then can it be surprising that there are now more than 27,000 registered lobbyists petitioning on behalf of business, labor, the environment, education, abortion rights, the elderly, the poor, ethnic groups and more?

Daniel Webster may have become America's first lobbyist when he was retained as an attorney by business interests while also serving as the U.S. senator from New Hampshire. Legislators could wear two hats in those days. But the practice of employing lobbyists did not gain steam until the Grant administration. It was then that agents of private interests lingered in the lobby of the Willard Hotel a short walk from the Treasury Department and the White House in the hopes of buttonholing residing government officials and members of Congress to seek redress of some grievance. Hence the term "lobbyist." That certainly is easier to say than "grievance petitioner."

The size of the lobbyist population is proportional to the size of government. During the Civil War, the White House staff consisted of two personal secretaries to President Abraham Lincoln. Today the Executive Office of the President budgets for more than 900 employees. Lincoln was lobbied, but usually for a job in the postal service. There were many fewer legislators than today and the members had no staff. Currently there are more than 30,000 employees in Congress -- not coincidentally, that's just slightly more than the number of registered lobbyists. As the size and functions of government have grown, society has discovered more "grievances" to petition. In particular, spending by government has led to more petitions for one's perceived fair share.

Lobbying was not subject to any regulation until 1946, when the first lobbying law was passed. That initial effort required registration and reporting by lobbyists and the organizations that employed them. However, the legislation was poorly drafted. By 1954, the Supreme Court interpreted the statute so narrowly (in order to avoid violating the First Amendment right to lobby) that the law no longer provided meaningful reporting and could not be enforced. During the era of Lyndon B. Johnson, lobbyists and legislators formed an increasingly symbiotic relationship. According to biographer Robert Caro, then-Senate majority leader Johnson freely availed himself of the corporate aircraft of a major Texas construction firm, and to the extent that he relaxed, he did so at the Middleburg estate of the firm's lobbyist.

DOJ_NMG_0008514

Eventually, attempts were made to tame the gift-giving and to subject lobbyists to public disclosure. Congress adopted ethics rules in the late 1950s and gradually tightened them. In 1995 the Lobbying Disclosure Act (LDA) for the first time implemented clear requirements for registration and reporting. One major reason we know that Jack Abramoff was a lobbyist and who his clients were is the information on his lobbying reports.

Just because we have laws and ethics rules, however, doesn't guarantee that people, including lobbyists, will abide by them. Nor will lobbying laws prevent a lobbyist from committing crimes such as Abramoff's. He defrauded his Indian tribe clients, law firms and financial institutions, and the American taxpayer (by not paying taxes). He also admitted to conspiring to bribe a public official. That crime is the most reprehensible in that it betrays both honest government and his profession. It is like a lawyer paying off a judge or a jury. A lobbyist, like a lawyer, must ply his profession with advocacy and facts, not with gratuities or bribes.

While laws and rules do not stop crimes and rule breakers, both are vital to establishing and maintaining public confidence in the lobbying process. Congress, in particular, must take steps to reduce the excesses that Abramoff represents while preserving the right of effective lobbying. Here are four places to start:

Enforce current House and Senate ethics rules. After reading about Abramoff's wining, dining and entertaining, many Americans would be surprised to learn that both the House and the Senate have rules that generally limit gifts, including meals, to $49.99. However, neither congressional offices nor the ethics committees actually enforce those rules, thus making a mockery of them. Congressional officials, particularly staff, should be required to certify annually that they have not received improper gifts and such certifications should be subject to laws that make false statements a crime.

Tighten up those rules . There has been much attention paid to the expensive foreign trips taken by some officials at private expense. In Congress, but not in the executive branch, officials may accept luxurious travel, accommodations and meals anywhere in the world as long the trip has some official purpose, such as giving a speech or participating in a conference. This practice must be modified or eliminated. If a trip is justified and necessary for official reasons, then it should be modest and financed by the government. If some trips continue to be privately financed, there should be limits and officials must make prompt, complete and public disclosure, preferably on a government Web site.

Require lobbyists to itemize gifts and entertainment on lobbying reports. The current LDA requires the reporting of the total amount of money spent by lobbyists, but no itemization of expenses. Itemizing gifts and entertainment over, let's say, $20 would highlight which government officials accept such blandishments and whether they are adhering to their own ethics rules. Lobbyists and their clients are not subject to the congressional ethics rules but are subject to the LDA and other statutes that prohibit bribes and gratuities.

Promote an ethical culture. The character and leadership of government officials are the most important ingredients in setting examples and demanding ethical behavior. There are, however, additional steps. Any manager working at a major corporation will tell you that he or she must participate in mandatory educational compliance programs. Workers are required to know what the rules are, what the company policies are and to demonstrate that they know. No less should be expected of government officials. Congress needs to implement a mandatory annual compliance education program and no one should receive a paycheck unless he or she has completed the program.

The above steps will not eliminate the possibility of another future lobbyist who is determined to bribe or an official who seeks emoluments. Renegades and schemers unfortunately exist. But these suggestions would help increase consciousness about the rules, encourage ethical behavior and perhaps reduce the possibility of another Abramoff operating on his scale for so long without someone blowing the whistle.

The targets of my suggestions are government officials, our leaders. It is incumbent upon them to pay their share of a dinner check and to decline a ticket to a sporting event that violates any gift limit. If they seek the social company of lobbyists they should abide by the rules or go Dutch. By the same token lobbyists must abide by the laws and act ethically, as most do, even in the era of Jack Abramoff's excesses.

DOJ_NMG_0008515

Author's e-mail: jbaran@wrf.com

Jan Witold Baran is a lawyer and former general counsel of the Republican National Committee. He served on the President's Commission on Federal Ethics Law Reform. He is not a lobbyist, but he does advise clients on the campaign finance and lobbying laws.

Go Ahead, Try To Stop K Street (NYT)

By Todd S. Purdum

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON

IN 1872, some Republican elders, revolted by the rampant influence peddling of Ulysses S. Grant's administration, challenged him for re-election. "He has used the public service of the government as a machinery of corruption and personal influence," they complained, and "shown himself deplorably unequal to the task imposed on him by the necessities of the country."

Jack Abramoff's trading room was his Signatures restaurant, not the front of the old Willard Hotel, where favor seekers so besieged Grant that he helped popularize the label - lobbyist - that still clings to their descendants with a pejorative sting. But Mr. Abramoff's guilty plea last week to charges of fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials prompted similar revulsion among some of the Grand Old Party's canniest hands.

"I think as this thing unfolds, it'll be so disgusting, and the Republicans will be under such pressure from their base, that they will have to undertake substantial reform," said Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker (who himself had to pay $300,000 to settle a 1997 ethics case). "This is like Watergate."

But will things really change? After all, Grant himself won a second term, despite the failings that would eventually leave his legacy forever tainted, and his chief Republican antagonist, Horace Greeley, died defeated and insane three weeks after the election. Is corruption just a part of Washington's DNA? What else explains the grim resignation of Washington veterans who wonder when, not whether, some scandal will arise?

"The history of civilization, for starters," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, an ethics group. "This kind of problem is faced by all societies throughout all of history. It comes and goes in cycles, and becomes most prevalent when the activities are viewed as O.K. by the society where it's taking place."

For watchdogs like Mr. Wertheimer, and for many Democrats, such tolerance dates to the Republican takeover of Congress in the mid-1990's, when new leaders like Representative Tom DeLay of Texas began a campaign to fill the capital's K Street corridor with Republican lobbyists, and made it plain that those seeking to influence legislation would have to "pay to play," in the form of political contributions and other largesse.

Mr. DeLay, who was himself indicted last year in Texas on unrelated campaign finance charges and forced to step down from his post as House majority leader, has long had close ties to Mr. Abramoff. Now Mr. Abramoff's guilty plea increases the likelihood that Mr. DeLay will lose his leadership post for good, and raises the prospect that he - and other lawmakers - may be enmeshed in new legal troubles. The sheer scale of Mr. Abramoff's misdeeds - millions of dollars in kickbacks from Indian tribes, a luxury golf outing for politicians to Scotland, misuse of a tax-exempt foundation - make this an extraordinary case.

"There are all sorts of things that have gone on of the same generic kind," said Harry C. McPherson, who came to Washington 50 years ago this month as a Senate aide to Lyndon B. Johnson and has plied his trade as a lawyer-lobbyist since leaving the White House in 1969. "But this is truly a situation where the degree changes everything. It converts something that purists about government would find unpleasant into the utterly unacceptable - into crime."

But the problem is broader than Mr. Abramoff, Mr. DeLay or even the inherent potential for abuse in one-party rule of all three branches of government. It also has to do with the astounding growth of the lobbying industry, a growth that has tracked the growth of the federal government itself. The rise of government regulation - first in the New Deal and then in the 1960's and 70's - spawned a parallel rise in the private sector's efforts to master the new system. Between the early 1970's and the mid-1980's, the number of trade associations doubled; in the first half of the 1980's alone, the number of registered lobbyists quadrupled, according to The Washington Monthly.

DOJ_NMG_0008516

A study by the Center for Public Integrity found that in the early 1990's, political donations from 19 major industries - including pharmaceuticals, defense, commercial banking and accounting - were split about evenly between the two parties.

By 2003, the Republicans held a 2-to-1 advantage. Since 1998, the center found, more than 2,200 former federal employees had registered as federal lobbyists, as had nearly 275 former White House aides and nearly 250 former members of Congress. Many rules governing their conduct remain deliberately vague, and the House Ethics Committee has been paralyzed because of dysfunction and partisan disputes.

"The scandal here is not that the rules were broken; the scandal is the rules themselves," said Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, who with a Republican colleague, Christopher Shays of Connecticut, and Senators John McCain and Russell D. Feingold, has been a leader in pressing to overhaul campaign finance and ethics rules. "Lobbying is part of our system, but there is a set of ethical standards and rules that ought to be followed."

Together with Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois and Mr. Feingold, Mr. Meehan has introduced legislation that would, among other things, require lobbyists to file quarterly financial disclosures, instead of semiannual ones and to disclose just whom in the government they lobbied. Former members of Congress would also not be able to lobby their colleagues for two years, as opposed to the current one year. Members would be required to submit detailed itineraries and descriptions of expenses for privately sponsored travel.

Mr. Gingrich has offered more ideas. He would allow unlimited fund-raising in members' states or districts, but bar fund-raising within the District of Columbia, and would require that all contacts between lobbyists and elected and appointed officials be posted weekly on the Internet. And he would shrink a government that has only grown further with post Sept. 11, 2001, spending.

"There is $2.6 trillion spent in Washington, with the authority to regulate everything in your life," he said. "Guess what? People will spend unheard-of amounts of money to influence that. The underlying problems are big government and big money."

Of course, the record suggests that for every loophole any new law might close, lobbyists will find a way to open another. The ban on so-called "soft money" contributions to political parties led to the rise of new special-interest spending groups, for example. Entrenched industries - and entrenched incumbents of both parties - can be expected to resist change that would threaten the way they know how to do business.

For their part, some lobbyists hope legislators intent on reform resist painting with too broad a brush.

"A lot of what we do is an enormous educational effort, to avoid what we consider even well-meaning but wrong-headed legislation," said Joseph Tasker, senior vice president for government affairs of the Information Technology Association of America, which represents companies like I.B.M. and Microsoft, on issues including privacy, piracy and Internet security.

"Congressmen don't know things; they're not experts in technology," he said. "In the mid-1990's, we were meeting with a Congressman about high-definition TV standards and we were talking about pixels and so on, and he said, 'Fellas, look, I'm trying to stay with you here, but one of the first times I ever took a ride on an airplane was when I came to Washington to take my seat and I remember looking out the window and I thought part of the wing was falling off when we landed, because the flaps came up.' "

And, this being Washington, even the best-intentioned efforts to stick to the rules can lead to overreaching silliness.

In 2004, David McKean, a veteran Senate aide, published a critically praised book on Thomas "Tommy the Cork" Corcoran, perhaps the most successful Washington lobbyist of the 20th century. But the Senate ethics committee advised him not to disclose on the dust jacket the name of the senator he worked for, John Kerry, lest he be seen as using his position for commercial gain.

The restriction hampered his ability to promote his book. Indeed, when a Washington bookstore inadvertently identified Mr. McKean's position in an advertisement, he had to cancel an appearance there. A very small victory, one would guess, for the capital's reputation.

Returning 'Good' Money After Bad Misses Point On Ethics (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

DOJ_NMG_0008517

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

Not to be excessively contrarian, but why exactly are members of Congress rushing to return campaign contributions from the clients of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff?

It's easy to see why many recipients of the $204,253 Abramoff has personally donated since 1999, all to Republicans, are sending back the money after the lobbyist pleaded guilty last week to multiple felony counts. No one likes their name in a ledger with an admitted crook.

But the rationale is less apparent for returning contributions from Abramoff clients, primarily Indian tribes, who haven't been accused of breaking any laws and are mostly, if somewhat excessively, portrayed as victims in the scandal.

Sending back the tribes' money isn't only silly, it's destructive to the cause of reforming Washington. It perpetuates the fiction that "bad" contributions can be segregated from "good" contributions in some orderly fashion that allows politicians to raise millions without compromising their independence.

It's important to understand what was unique, and what more conventional, about Abramoff's activities. The unique aspect of his operation — the portion central to his criminal plea — was his exorbitant charges to his clients and the kickbacks he took from their payments to his partner, Michael P.S. Scanlon. But the way he advised his clients to advance their political causes differed more in degree than kind from the capital's business as usual.

According to testimony before the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, Indian tribes came to Abramoff with a variety of interests, mostly revolving around gambling. In the mid-1990s, the Mississippi Choctaws hired him to kill federal legislation taxing Indian casinos. The Louisiana Coushattas hired him to block potential competitors, both by encouraging Texas officials to bar Indian gambling in that state and by pressuring the U.S. Interior Department to refuse authorization for casinos from rival tribes. The Tiguas hired him to pass federal legislation specifically reopening their El Paso casino — after the campaign Abramoff ran in Texas for the Coushatta tribe supported its closure.

These Indian tribes were not innocents. Most of the money they paid Abramoff apparently went to block potential competition from rival casinos. The Tiguas turned to Washington to evade Texas' clear desire to bar Indian casino gambling inside its borders.

And yet, in the manner they pursued these goals, the tribes weren't much different from anyone else operating in Washington. As a parade of tribal officials told the Indian Affairs Committee, they contributed money not only to dozens of legislators, but also to an assortment of conservative groups — such as Grover Norquist's Americans for Tax Reform and the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy — because Abramoff told them the donations would win them friends in high places.

"Sometimes [Abramoff] did say that we need to make these contributions" in order to advance causes, one tribal official told the Senate committee last summer. "Other times, [Abramoff said] it was just a good organization, and [donating] will make somebody else happy."

Every day, in offices all around Washington, lobbyists provide exactly that advice to clients representing virtually every economic and social interest imaginable. As Abramoff told the New Republic magazine last year: "I didn't create the system. This is the system we have."

That's too self-serving: The ongoing investigation will determine whether legislators crossed the line of bribery by undertaking specific actions as a quid pro quo for contributions or other favors from Abramoff. (In one of his pleas, he essentially admitted attempting to bribe one House member, who has been identified as Republican Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio.) But the vast majority of contributions legislators in both parties received from Abramoff's Indian clients looks no different, legally or even morally, than the money they collect from all other interests jostling on Capitol Hill.

That's why the rush to refund the money is so misguided. By returning the Indian money, the recipients are trying to claim vigilance against suspect contributions.

But political money doesn't sort itself into black and white categories of appropriate and inappropriate; much of it, like the money from the tribes, is gray. It usually comes not with explicit demands but with implied expectations that every legislator must weigh. Is the Indian money really more suspect than the massive pharmaceutical contributions that influenced a prescription drug law that barred Medicare from bargaining for lower drug prices? In practice, the choices are not as clear-cut as legislators imply by returning the Indian dollars while keeping so many other donations that could provoke similar ethics questions.

DOJ_NMG_0008518

The problems of special-interest influence in Washington can't be resolved through selective spasms of morality when a scandal erupts. Nor are tougher restrictions on lobbying or campaign contributions likely to eliminate abuses. Money flows toward power like a river to the ocean; no dam can be built high enough to permanently separate them. A century of often valuable, but inevitably porous, political reform makes that clear.

Because so many of the ethics choices in Washington are gray, they most often raise questions not about politicians' honesty, but about their judgment in balancing contributors' priorities against the public interest. And the key to promoting good judgment isn't new lobbying rules, or even criminal indictments, but electoral consequences for bad judgment.

Ultimately, the responsibility for policing Washington belongs not to prosecutors but to voters. The surest way for Americans to discourage elected officials from providing undue favors to special interests is to vote out some of those who do. The verdict that could transform Washington most won't come from a jury box — but from voters at the ballot box.

*

Ronald Brownstein's column appears every Sunday. See current and past Brownstein columns on The Times' website at latimes.com/brownstein.

Reputed Mob Enforcer Gives Not Guilty Plea (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporter. Tribune Staff Reporter Matthew Walberg Contributed To This Report

Chicago Tribune, January 8, 2006

Walking with a cane and reportedly suffering diabetes and skin cancer, reputed mob enforcer Frank "The German" Schweihs pleaded not guilty Friday in his first court appearance in Chicago since he was captured Dec. 16.

Schweihs, 75, was a fugitive for eight months before the FBI arrested him and saw him returned here to face racketeering charges linked to murder and extortion. With Schweihs, 12 other men are charged in a sweeping mob case that sprung from a federal investigation dubbed Operation Family Secrets. The case ties the men to 18 unsolved Outfit murders as well as loan sharking and illegal gambling charges spanning four decades, authorities said.

All of those charged are in custody except alleged mob boss Joey "The Clown" Lombardo. An agent from Louisville arrested Schweihs outside an apartment in the small town of Berea, Ky. FBI agents are trying to piece together what Schweihs did and where he hid while on the run, authorities said.

Lombardo and Schweihs are accused of the 1974 murder of Daniel Seifert, a Bensenville businessman who had been scheduled to testify.

---

rbush@tribune.com

Feds, Family Come Out To See 'The German' (CHIST)

By STEVE WARMBIR AND NATASHA KORECKI, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, January 7, 2006

Aging reputed Outfit hitman Frank "The German" Schweihs could once inspire shudders of fear by entering a room.

On Friday, as he hobbled with a cane into a federal courtroom in Chicago after eight months on the lam, he was more of a curiosity.

A row of FBI agents observed him from the back row.

His daughter, Barbara, gave him an anxious smile from her courtroom seat.

And sitting beside her were two men who eyed him with disgust. The men were family members of a man Schweihs is accused of killing more than three decades ago -- government witness Daniel Seifert, who was shotgunned to death in front of his family.

The family members declined to comment later, not wanting to jeopardize the case.

Pleads not guilty to murder

DOJ_NMG_0008519

Schweihs, who turns 76 next month, was arrested last month, found living with his girlfriend in a small town outside Lexington, Ky. He had been in hiding since April, when federal prosecutors charged him and other alleged mobsters, including the reputed head of the Chicago Outfit, James Marcello, in a racketeering conspiracy involving 18 mob hits. Still at large is Joey "The Clown" Lombardo.

Schweihs, wearing an orange jail jumpsuit, sat down and wisecracked to his attorney, feigning puzzlement over how many reporters were packed into the courtroom.

"Slow day for news," quipped his prominent Loop attorney, Dennis Berkson.

Schweihs pleaded not guilty to the charges against him. He is being held without bond and faces life in prison if convicted.

"First I'm seeing this judge," Schweihs said as he looked over the indictment against him. "I've never seen this before."

'A lot of rumor'

The man once considered an alleged rising star in the Outfit cupped his hand to his ear at times to hear the judge better.

Besides bad hearing, Schweihs has skin cancer, a bad heart and diabetes, his attorney said. But his mind is still sharp.

"There are a lot of things said about him," Berkson said outside the courtroom. "There's a lot of rumor and innuendo which are absolutely ridiculous. He believes when all the evidence comes in, he'll be acquitted."

Reputed Mob Enforcer Pleads Not Guilty In Federal Court (AP)

By MIKE ROBINSON, Associated Press

AP, January 6, 2006

CHICAGO - A reputed mob enforcer who eluded a federal manhunt for eight months before FBI agents swooped down on him in central Kentucky three weeks ago pleaded not guilty Friday to racketeering and extortion charges.

"Why is all the news media here?" Frank "The German" Schweihs asked as he waited for U.S. Magistrate Judge Arlander Keys to call his case.

"I don't know, slow day," defense attorney Dennis Berkson said with a straight face.

Schweihs, 75, the craggy, tough-looking alleged enforcer who according to prosecutors squeezed "street-tax" payments out of strip joints, leaned on a cane as he stood in court.

He is one of 14 reputed mob figures under indictment in the FBI's Operation Family Secrets investigation of long-unsolved murders.

Schweihs is also one of two defendants who slipped out of sight eight months ago just before federal prosecutors unveiled the indictment, which outlines an alleged 15-year racketeering conspiracy that included at least 19 slayings.

The other fugitive, Joseph "Joey the Clown" Lombardo, is still on the lam.

Chicago FBI agents got a tip in mid-December concerning the whereabouts of Schweihs and agents arrested him without incident Dec. 16 outside his Berea, Ky., apartment about 40 miles south of Lexington.

Schweihs' homecoming was attended by Robert D. Grant, special agent in charge of the FBI's Chicago office and about a dozen other agents, including members of the FBI's organized-crime squad who spent years working on the Family Secrets investigation.

Keys ordered Schweihs to appear before U.S. District Judge James B. Zagel on Jan. 17 when the other defendants are also due in court for a status hearing.

Schweihs was shown a copy of the indictment and he said it was the first time that he had seen it. After Assistant U.S. Attorney Mitchell A. Mars read the charges, Keys asked Schweihs if he had understood them.

"I didn't understand it but I heard what he said," Schweihs said.

Schweihs was then taken back to the Metropolitan Correctional Center where he is to be held pending trial. Schweihs could get life in prison if convicted of the racketeering charges.

Several female friends including his sister Barbara were on hand for the hearing.

"Good-bye, Frank," one said as husky marshals led Schweihs out the door in handcuffs.

Berkson told reporters after the hearing that Schweihs was eager for his day in court and "believes that when all of the evidence is in he will be acquitted."

DOJ_NMG_0008520

Mob Mentality En Mass: (BOSH)

By Michele McPhee

Boston Herald, January 8, 2006

The Genovese crime family - the nation's most powerful underworld enterprise - has put the city of Springfield in a lethal stranglehold, corrupting local politicians, draining federal funds from city coffers and operating a chain of strip joints, according to 32 indictments handed up since 2001 and interviews with local law enforcement.

Indeed, investigators believe there are more wiseguys and mob associates in the Springfield area - roughly 50 in all - than in any other part of the country, including Genovese family strongholds in Brooklyn and the Bronx. The buttonmen live in bucolic Hamden County communities like Chicopee and Ware, and ply their underworld trade on seedy Springfield streets, investigators said.

"The influence of the mob contributed to the demise, or the downfall, of a once flourishing city. Our goal is to bring the city back through investigating the corruption and ensuring that federal funds go to the entities or individuals that the monies were intended to go to," Special Agent Michael O'Reilly, head of the Springfield's FBI office, said in an interview last week. "Not lining the pockets of wiseguys or corrupt politicians."

Genovese influence has been the target of several FBI raids on Springfield City Hall and administrative offices, investigators say. At least a dozen former city employees have been indicted, and five of them have been convicted since 2001 on federal charges ranging from racketeering to money laundering to influence peddling, O'Reilly said.

The city is on the verge of receivership and its coffers are under the control of a special board appointed by Gov. Mitt Romney. Springfield's new mayor, Charles Ryan, says he's working to root out public corruption.

In October, former Mayor Michael Albano's chief of staff, Anthony Ardolino, 36, was busted on federal tax and witness tampering charges, said U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan. His brother Chester, 39, a former Springfield cop, also was indicted in the case. [continue]

Crackdown Exposes Toledo As A Hub Of Teen Prostitution (TOLB)

By ROBIN ERB and ROBERT A de BOER, BLADE STAFF WRITERS

Toledo Blade (OH), January 8, 2006

First of three parts

If the brutal world of teenage prostitution were a legitimate business, Toledo would be among its top employment agencies.

It has supplied top management — iron-fisted pimps who demanded worker productivity and loyalty.

It has supplied middle management — adult hookers under orders to beat discipline into underearning or renegade prostitutes.

And, most shocking of all, Toledo supplied the product — girls as young as 12, sometimes kidnapped, always sold for sex.

"I know the FBI is concentrating on Toledo, and I know Toledo is one of the top cities in the country for teen prostitution," said Celia Williamson, a University of Toledo professor known nationally for research of prostitutes.

Deb Hodges, a top Lucas County Juvenile Court official, agreed: "We had one of the federal investigators tell us that Toledo was the No. 1 recruiting spot in the United States. ... It was mind-boggling."

Until recently, it was also largely undetected.

"We here in Toledo had no idea that this was going on," said Dave Bauer, an assistant U.S. attorney in Toledo. One big problem, he said, is that underage prostitution is "a mobile business."

Recruited here, the girls didn't stay long. Pimps quickly shuttled them across the country, and "they would quite easily fly under our radar screens," Mr. Bauer said.

Federal investigators last month charged 31 men and women with herding teens - including at least nine girls from the metro Toledo area - across state lines as sex slaves in a highly profitable and violent prostitution ring.

These were neither street- walkers nor escort-service girls, authorities said. Instead, the teens were rotated among motels, truck stops, and highway welcome centers.

DOJ_NMG_0008521

But while the feds are able to lay out the inner workings of the Toledo-based prostitution ring, they can't explain why a handful of local pimps became such big players on the national scene, providing girls to more than a dozen states stretching from California to the nation's capital.

"Everybody has been saying, 'Why Toledo? Why Toledo?' And we don't know why," said John Stossel, one of the FBI agents leading the investigation.

The indictments, part of a massive child-prostitution crackdown the feds called "Innocence Lost," spelled out the sophistication and high level of organization among pimps who managed the business: setting prices, establishing work schedules, and negotiating turf.

Zoom | Photo Reprints Gordon Zubrod, an assistant federal prosecutor in Harrisburg, Pa., called it a "loose confederacy" of pimps, each with his own turf but enough reason to get along.

"They're all homeboys from Toledo, and it's to their benefit to cooperate," he said.

The local network expanded two years ago, after the feds cracked down on another national sex-for-hire operation in Oklahoma City.

The Toledo defendants, many of whom had operated the sex trade for years, "stepped into the vacuum," Mr. Zubrod said. "This opened the door."

Brutal business

It's a business that traffics in human misery.

"The cruelty has been astounding," Mr. Zubrod said. "Most of the women will have testimony [ranging] from having been pistol-whipped to having bones broken."

It's clear how pimps benefit: The indictments track coast-to-coast wire transfers totaling hundreds of thousands of dollars. But what lures girls too young for admission to R-rated movies into this Triple-X world?

A few are kidnapped and forced into the sex trade by violence. For many others, "prostitution is a continuation of the victim's sexual exploitation, not the beginning," FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker said at a Justice Department news conference last month in Washington announcing the arrests.

For these girls, he and others said, it's a simple trade-off: Prostitution looks better than a home life of neglect or abuse. A man who seems kind and attentive - at least at first - can be irresistible.

Still other girls leave home "for the thrill of it," stumbling into forced prostitution along the way, said Jim Anderson, one of the Toledo Police Department's missing-persons detectives. "They're 14, 15 years old. What do they really know at that age?"

Rebellion

Denise was 14 then. She knew.

A girlfriend told Denise, whose real name is not being used at her request.

"She said, 'I met this guy and he's a pimp … He's got all these ho's and they work for him and they give him their money.' "

To the South Toledo teen, the scenario sounded "fascinating" - or at least like an escape hatch from a home she said she shared with a hooker mother who was often drunk or high. Maybe, Denise speculated, that's why her mother never noticed that two family friends had molested the teen for years.

One day Denise found her mother crying at the kitchen table. "Why didn't you tell me?" she asked her child.

But in Denise's mind, the better question was: How could you not have known?

"I think I was hardened. I didn't cry," Denise recalled. "I think that's when the resentment began toward my mother."

She skipped school. She smoked dope. She was "deep into rebelling."

And one day, she simply didn't come home.

Standing at a pay phone at a church festival, she punched in the phone number for the pimp she got from her girlfriend.

"He was in Harrisburg. I tell him about the [latest] altercation with my mom. I said, 'Can I come out with you?' He said, 'You know what you'll be doing?' "

She knew.

"He said, 'You know you'll be prostituting?' "

She knew.

DOJ_NMG_0008522

"He said, 'You know you're going to have to give me the money?' I said, 'Yeah, I want to be there.' "

A smack in the face

Hours after Denise stepped off the bus in Harrisburg, Pa., it wasn't the transactional sex that surprised her.

It was the violence.

Even now, seven years out of the business and removed from the control of any pimp, she still regards split lips and black eyes as mere occupational hazards.

"He was pretty good to me," she said of her pimp. "I can count on two hands the times he hit me."

Other girls, she added, had less merciful pimps and less luck with johns.

"I know girls who didn't make it out alive," she said.

Denise's story wasn't outlined in the recent indictments, but it might as well have been. In the world of paid sex, brutality is a standard means of maintaining a business structure - or, as prostitution researcher Ms. Williamson described it, "the rapes and the beatings and the stabbings and the brandings."

Ironically, investigators said it was the pimps who complained about working conditions.

"Both my hands were swelled up because I beat the bitch so much," the feds quoted one accused pimp as saying. That same man ended another beating only when he fractured his own hand, authorities said.

Another defendant confided to a fellow pimp that he beat a hooker for pulling in only $700 for a night's work.

Still another, authorities said, broke a woman's nose - an assault he'd been accused of twice before in Toledo. And in 2004, under investigation for a hooker's murder for which he was later exonerated, he talked bluntly with authorities in Indiana about pimp discipline.

"He said, 'Sometimes the only thing to get her attention is to hit her in the face,' " said Lt. Clarke Fine of the Hendricks County Sheriff's Office, near Indianapolis.

The brutality outlined in the indictments could indeed represent a long-standing practice of controlling women through force.

At least four of the Toledo men previously were accused of violence. In separate court cases, local police said these men, acting independently of one another:

Locked a minor behind an "iron door" and raped her.

Used a chain to beat another woman's face and body "for approximately three hours."

Kidnapped a female and forced her to perform oral sex until she finally managed to leap "from [the] moving auto at Summit and Cherry."

Smashed a bottle against a young girl's head.

The latest indictments claimed violence was sometimes even delegated to veteran prostitutes.

In another business setting, they might be called executive assistants. In the sex trade, they're known as "bottom bitches" - part enforcer, part cashier, and part recruiter.

Prosecutor Zubrod said these women will, "under orders, attack another prostitute and beat [her] with their fists or stab her or any number of things."

Fake IDs, real money

If Toledo was a recruitment hot spot, Harrisburg was its distribution center. Like no place else in the country, five major highways meet in the city, delivering an unending supply of paying customers.

"You can't do that in Chicago or L.A. or Atlanta," Mr. Zubrod said.

Wire transfers of tens of thousands of dollars - for food, fuel, clothes, and lodging - allowed the girls to crisscross the country.

Outfitted with fake identities, they remained as invisible as the underground economy in which they operated.

Denise picked up the routine quickly once she arrived in Harrisburg. Arrested? Never give your real name or age.

"You go to grown-up jail. You go to grown-up court. And you pay grown-up money. Then you're back to work," she said.

In one case last spring, a pimp turned to rote memorization to train two kidnapped Toledo teens.

DOJ_NMG_0008523

"I know as far as the Social Security numbers and the IDs, both of the girls had to write on seven pieces of paper, front and back, on every single line, all their false information," the mother of one of the girls told The Blade.

Pimps monitored each other's product and services, purchasing women from one another and sharing trade secrets.

One inquired about another pimp's profits, according to the affidavit, which said "[he] replied that he had made a $10,000 down payment on a Cadillac and still had $17,000 left."

It was the "sophistication and the organization of the whole network" that stunned Mike Brennan, a longtime Lucas County juvenile probation officer.

"I was blind-sided by the magnitude of it. When I got a call from a federal prosecutor [about the network], I was like, 'Yeah, yeah, it's probably some overzealous prosecutor.' "

Now, he said, he has a keener understanding of how these men exploit children for a living.

"These aren't dummies we're dealing with," he said.

Too old for this

Now 26, Denise relaxed in her living room recently, her two girls playing on the floor and a Christmas tree in the corner.

In the end, she said, it was the gun pressed to the back of her neck that pushed her out of the business for good. The night it happened, she was six months' pregnant and tired.

She'd climbed into the tractor-trailer too willingly, relaxing her guard after the driver offered $60 for a $50 sex act.

Instead, she saw the flash of a silver handgun. He sneered. She pleaded for her life.

"You know what? I'm pregnant. Please don't do this."

He raped her and said she was lucky.

"I killed bitches," she remembered him saying. "I'm going to let you live.'"

Screaming, she ran from the truck.

She knew her pimp would find her. He did. She knew he would beat her. He did.

"He found me at a hotel. It was the worst he ever beat me."

From a hospital later that night, the battered mother-to-be sneaked out a back exit. If he found her again, she'd deal with it then. For now, she wanted out.

Anyway, she reasoned, she was getting too old for all this.

She was 18.

Young Duo Put Waltz In Motion (MCA)

By Marc Perrusquia, Contact

Memphis Commercial Appeal, January 8, 2006

They look like a pair of fraternity brothers off to toilet paper the chancellor's yard.

Fresh-faced FBI agents Brian Burns and Mark Jackson are young -- neither is over 35 -- but they are no pranksters.

They are the case agents on the Tennessee Waltz, the undercover FBI sting that leveled corruption charges against 10 current and former public officials.

Together with a veteran prosecutor, they've changed the political landscape in Tennessee.

"I'll never forget that Thursday morning when the arrests happened,'' said Ron Ramsey, the state Senate Republican leader. Ramsey watched last May as, one by one, colleagues were led away in handcuffs from hotels and offices surrounding Nashville's Legislative Plaza.

"The FBI spread their net pretty wide ... That was one elaborate sting operation."

Ripples from the Waltz will be felt this week in Nashville when the General Assembly meets in special session to consider unprecedented ethics reforms, and again in Memphis where a series of criminal trials are scheduled over the coming year.

Pieces of the secretive FBI investigation continue to dribble out, but the story of its birth remains largely untold.

For years, insiders had complained of systemic, entrenched political corruption in Memphis and across Tennessee, yet despite occasional news media exposes, authorities were unable or unwilling to rein it in.

DOJ_NMG_0008524

That began to change three years ago after two young, idealistic FBI agents arrived in Memphis. And when the local U.S. Attorney's Office agreed for the first time in years to put a prosecutor full-time on political corruption, things began to happen.

Still, it took a little luck -- chancing upon a political insider who agreed to wear a wire -- before authorities got the OK from the U.S. Justice Department in Washington to launch an undercover sting unprecedented in Tennessee.

FBI stings have effectively countered corruption in places such as Chicago and Mississippi, where 55 county supervisors went to jail in a sting called Operation Pretense in the 1980s.

Corruption stings are clandestine operations in which agents pose as crooks and bait public officials with bribes. By their very nature they can be messy, ethically and legally, and consequently are used sparingly.

In the Waltz's aftermath, complaints about unfairness and race -- nearly all the defendants are black -- are bubbling up. And recent articles on an Internet news site pose questions about the case's key informant.

So far, three Waltz defendants have pleaded guilty. With seven more awaiting trial, the case's ultimate impact remains to be seen.

Reforms like those before the legislature are a typical consequence of corruption probes, yet, ultimately, a society must change its culture to have true impact, experts say.

"It works at least for a little while," said James R. Crockett, a University of Southern Mississippi professor who wrote a book on Operation Pretense and his state's legendary corruption.

"Without vigilance, (corruption) gradually creeps back in."

The FBI's lead agent on the Tennessee Waltz, Brian Burns, 35, first tried his hand as a pharmacist before a radical career change led him to join the FBI seven years ago.

His Waltz partner, Mark Jackson, 32, was a Naval intelligence officer, who likewise changed paths, joined the FBI and landed in Memphis.

Reporters who converged on Memphis last May to cover the indictments of five leading state legislators got a taste of the clean-cut Jackson when he testified in initial hearings.

Jackson told how the FBI had set up a bogus company called E-Cycle Management and paid lawmakers cash bribes to draw up legislation favorable to the company. Jackson testified that he was within a block when undercover agents met with and secretly taped lawmakers.

Emerging from that hearing was a surveillance tape of then State Sen. John Ford allegedly stuffing cash into his pocket and bragging, "You're talking to the guy that makes the deals."

Records soon revealed Burns' role was managing the case's key informant, political insider Tim Willis, paid $6,000 a month to pose as a lobbyist for E-Cycle.

FBI spokesman George Bolds said Burns and Jackson would not give interviews for this story, and as long as the Tennessee Waltz prosecutions remain open, no one at the FBI would comment on the case.

Yet, for all its growth and aspirations for the big league, Memphis remains at heart a small town, a gossipy place where secrets are hard to keep. In pursuing corruption here in recent years, Burns and Jackson have crossed paths with scores of citizens and public figures, many whose lips aren't nearly as tightly sealed.

Interviews and available public records show the FBI agents, often working closely with veteran federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza, have pursued crooks in Shelby County government, the Memphis Police Department's evidence room and subsidized day care.

"If I had a son, I'd want him to be just like Brian -- and Mark," said County Commissioner John Willingham, who said he's had encounters with the agents that he can't publicly discuss.

"They're young. They're brilliant. They're the kind of people who can take a thread, turn it into a rope, and hang you with it."

Brian Burns had just turned 30 and was as lanky as a teenager when he began showing up at federal court hearings in Memphis five years ago.

An FBI agent with just two years of experience under his belt, he'd relocated from his native New York and was trying to find his way in a southern city known for its peculiar variety of back-slapping public corruption as well as its famous music and barbecue.

DOJ_NMG_0008525

More often than not, Burns could be seen toting a bulky box of records under one arm as he slipped into a back row and listened as lawyers argued over a pressing case of the day, the Cherokee day care scandal.

No one knew it then, but Burns was on a path to the Tennessee Waltz and a collision with Ford, who has pleaded not guilty to taking $55,000 in Waltz bribes.

In 2001, Cherokee Children and Family Services, a private, nonprofit company, signed an exclusive state contract within months of its formation and began handling millions of government dollars intended to pay for day care for poor children in Shelby County.

Ford's sister and girlfriend quickly found jobs at Cherokee, and centers opened by Ford's brother quickly filled with state-subsidized children. Ford sold insurance to Cherokee and even co-signed on loans at one state-funded center -- all the while chairing a Senate committee that oversaw the state's day care operations.

With Burns doing much of the legwork, an FBI and Internal Revenue Service probe ended in convictions against five Cherokee associates, including executive director WillieAnn Madison, who was found guilty of embezzlement, money laundering and tax evasion.

Though called before a grand jury, Ford was never charged.

When Ford's conduct was questioned in Nashville, Doug Henry, the senate's cigar-chomping ethics chairman, said he could do nothing because he'd received no written complaints.

How much of this was filed away in Burns' head or in FBI files can't be known.

But as Burns fanned out in pursuit of local corruption, it became clear to those who saw him in action that he was thorough, idealistic and committed to his work.

"I honestly felt like this was a young man who was legitimately concerned about cleaning up the state of affairs," said former Juvenile Court Clerk C.R. 'Bob' Martin, who crossed paths with Burns on the case that led to Tim Willis, the Waltz informant.

"He really seemed to feel the public was due a report on these things."

Invariably, those who agreed to talk about Burns described him as decent and easy-going, though tough when needed. One individual who went to jail after a Burns investigation said he couldn't help but like him, describing him as non-threatening, a manner that worked well in etiquette-conscious Memphis.

On a warm June day in 2002, 14 state and federal agents poured into then-Juvenile Court Clerk Shep Wilbun's office, investigating allegations of theft and fraudulent billing.

Authorities eventually charged -- then cleared -- Wilbun of a scheme to pay hush money to a female employee.

But when Darrell Catron, one of Wilbun's top aides, pleaded guilty to an embezzlement scheme, the FBI hit the jackpot. That led agents to Willis, a politically connected felon who had received more than $30,000 from Juvenile Court for dubious consulting services.

By February 2003, Willis, who maintained close ties to the politically prominent Ford and Hooks families and had friends at all levels of government, was working for the FBI.

Because eight of the 10 Waltz defendants are black -- nine of 10 are Democrats -- there are claims that the operation unfairly targeted minorities.

The Chattanooga Times-Free Press quoted African-American leaders in October as saying the probe was one-sided -- an accusation denied by federal authorities.

Sentiments flared after the first arrests. The Economist of London reported the development in its U.S. edition under the headline, "Tennesleaze: Southern Politics." In a prayer in the Senate chamber, Lt. Gov. John Wilder called the FBI's sting tactics "wrong, and that's not Your way."

Defense attorney Micheal Scholl, who represented Wilbun and is now representing Ford -- both are black -- said he couldn't comment on the ongoing case.

But he's argued strenuously that Wilbun never broke any laws, and he vows an aggressive defense for Ford, saying he's not ruling out any defense strategy.

Accusations of unfair targeting -- or entrapment -- often ensue after undercover investigations, though none of the Waltz defendants has raised it as a legal defense yet.

DOJ_NMG_0008526

To prevent such claims, Justice Department rules require agents passing bribes to public officials to first document "predication" -- evidence that an official was predisposed to corruption.

A Justice Department Inspector General report last September found that the FBI did a good job nationwide adhering to rules governing predication, yet lacked adequate controls to ensure that FBI headquarters and U.S. Attorneys are notified on a timely basis.

In the landmark Mississippi sting, Operation Pretense, in which agents posing as corrupt businessmen paid bribes to county supervisors across the state, predication was established when a cooperating witness identified as many as 35 supervisors to whom he'd personally paid kickbacks.

Confidential informants pose another source of worry when running stings, and the September Inspector General's report found guideline violations in 87 percent of informant files reviewed.

An Internet news site, NashvillePost.com, published interviews in December with Waltz informant Willis, painting the portrait of a man seemingly out of control -- cursing, bragging of supposed payoffs to another official and openly discussing sensitive details.

Recognizing that informants, who are often criminals, pose special concerns, the Justice Department ramped up protections in 2001, requiring greater oversight by supervisors.

Regardless of how the Tennessee Waltz saga ends, Southern Mississippi's Crockett said any reform will be worthless unless values change.

"The culture here was a good ol' boy culture," said Crockett, an accounting professor who wrote the 2003 book "Operation Pretense: The FBI's Sting on County Corruption in Mississippi."

"The good ol' boys will say (to newly elected officials), 'Look, this is how it works.' They just get sucked right into it."

CIVIL LAW:

Cigarette Company Profits Are Still Smoking (MH)

By Thomas Mulier And Chris Burritt

The Miami Herald, January 8, 2006

Tobacco companies worldwide faced tighter government restrictions on smoking and cigarette advertisements last year, as well as declining numbers of smokers and higher taxes.

Yet shares of the three biggest companies -- Altria Group, British American Tobacco and Japan Tobacco -- are surging to records. Profits are rising as cigarette makers expand in poorer countries such as Indonesia and Russia, where smokers are switching to more expensive brands.

The addictive nature of nicotine also helped manufacturers raise prices, something most consumer-goods companies are struggling to do.

"These companies have a nice exposure to emerging markets," said Concepcion Moreno, who helps Brussels-based Petercam Asset Management oversee $14.2 billion, including shares in Altadis, British American and Imperial Tobacco Group. ``This is also an industry with very inelastic demand. The pricing power is strong."

Tobacco stocks probably will extend their gains in 2006, even if they fail to outperform the market as much as they did last year, she and other investors said.

New York-based Altria's shares returned 28 percent last year including dividends. London-based British American advanced 52 percent and Japan Tobacco of Tokyo jumped 49 percent, also including dividends. The stocks outperformed the respective benchmark indexes for their countries.

Sweden banned smoking in restaurants in June and Spain approved a workplace smoking ban that took effect yesterday. The U.K. and Germany raised tobacco taxes in 2005.

Nine U.S. states, including the two that grow the most tobacco -- North Carolina and Kentucky -- also increased cigarette levies, according to Bonnie Herzog, a Citigroup Inc. analyst.

TARGETING SMOKERS

DOJ_NMG_0008527

A European Union ban on tobacco ads and sports sponsorships by cigarette companies took effect in July. The percentage of adults smoking in Japan fell for a 10th year.

"Even though governments have been attacking tobacco companies, there's still a hard core of smokers," said David Liston, who helps Barclays Private Clients in London manage about $34.5 billion. He prefers British American ``because it's the biggest emerging markets play."

British American, whose brands include Lucky Strike and Kent, has said earnings growth has been beating its forecast because it's selling more cigarettes in Russia, Pakistan and Bangladesh.

Japan Tobacco, the maker of Mild Seven and Peace cigarettes, said profit in the first half of its fiscal year was boosted by its expansion in Russia, Iran and Ukraine.

Altria's Philip Morris International in May bought Indonesia's third-largest cigarette maker, PT HM Sampoerna, for about $5 billion. Altria also announced plans to start a joint venture to sell its Marlboro cigarettes across China.

At the same time, legal risk in the United States is dropping and investors are realizing consumers often respond to public smoking bans by smoking in different places rather than quitting, said Michael Smith, an analyst at JPMorgan Chase & Co. in London.

Altria may split off its tobacco businesses from its Kraft Foods business this year once the biggest remaining lawsuits against Philip Morris are concluded, analysts predict.

COURT CASES

The Illinois Supreme Court in December reversed the verdict in the Price "lights" case, one of the major cases against Philip Morris USA. The prior decision was that the company should pay $10.1 billion to smokers of "light" cigarettes who claimed the company misled them about health risks.

"This was the major litigation case they had to get through," said David Dreman, who oversees $15 billion at Dreman Value Management in Jersey City, N.J., including 14.6 million Altria shares as of Sept. 30. The company probably is worth between $90 and $95 a share broken up into units, he said, versus a current price of $74.72. ``That's still a fair amount of upside."

The number of suits against Philip Morris USA has declined from 10-year highs, Altria Chief Executive Louis Camilleri told analysts on Nov. 9 at a Morgan Stanley conference in New York.

With the Illinois ruling reversed, Altria's breakup hinges on the resolution of the Justice Department's racketeering suit against U.S. tobacco companies and the Engle class-action suit in Florida, analysts said.

Camilleri declined to speculate when a breakup might happen.

BIG SURPRISE

Tobacco companies have surprised investors who expected cigarette makers would struggle more with anti-tobacco laws in Western Europe and U.S. litigation.

Altria in October forecast that 2005 earnings per share would rise as much as 12 percent to $5.10, as it reported third-quarter profit that beat analysts' expectations. British American Chief Executive Paul Adams said the same month that 2005 would be a "vintage" year as the company was on track to post record profit. Nine-month earnings per share rose 23 percent.

Japan Tobacco on Oct. 31 raised its full-year profit target and said it expects a record $1.6 billion.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

10 Held In Alleged Prostitution Ring (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

Ten people have been arrested in what police called a prostitution ring that involved women smuggled from Asia.

Among those taken into custody late Friday at a house in the 5000 block of Progresso Street were Duc Tuan Dinh, 34, of Santa Ana, suspected of operating 10 brothels throughout Orange County, two alleged associates, six suspected prostitutes and a suspected customer, police said.

The Westminster Police Department spearheaded the seven-month investigation that culminated in Friday's arrests.

DOJ_NMG_0008528

Governor Sticks By Vouchers (ORS)

By John Kennedy And Jim Stratton

The Orlando Sentinel, January 8, 2006

A day after the Florida Supreme Court struck down a key part of Gov. Jeb Bush's school-voucher program, Bush said Friday that he would support a constitutional amendment to salvage the plan that gives tax money to students attending private schools.

He said elected officials have every right to look for new ways to accomplish the goals of the voucher program, which provides state scholarships to students who wish to leave struggling public schools for private ones.

"I think they [Supreme Court justices] got it wrong," said Bush, who was in Orlando speaking to the Tiger Bay political club. "The Legislature has every right" to craft a law or ask voters to "modify the constitution if it's appropriate."

"That's the way the system works," Bush said.

Before defending his voucher program, the governor unveiled a $565 million plan to boost hurricane preparedness in the state. Among the plan's provisions are a $5.3 million public-information campaign, $30 million to install permanent generators at special-needs shelters and almost $70 million to ensure that county emergency management centers can withstand hurricanes.

The plan, financed with state and federal money, also would again allow for a sales tax holiday for hurricane supplies.

Hurricane readiness "has to be the first priority, the first priority before anything else," the governor said.

On Friday, however, attention was focused on the court decision that struck down the voucher program. The ruling overturned one of the governor's prized programs and suggested two larger voucher programs might also be open to legal attack.

About 700 students are on so-called opportunity scholarships, but the two others cover more than 30,000 children.

The decision has left Bush and Republican legislative leaders looking for a way to keep alive the first-in-the-nation statewide voucher plan.

"It's way too early to write the obituary for opportunity scholarships in Florida," said Senate President Tom Lee, R-Brandon. "But we've got to have some time to deliberate what step to take next."

Bush and lawmakers say they have essentially two options for saving the program: Pursue a constitutional amendment, or expand the state's $88 million corporate tax-credit program for student scholarships.

Current law allows corporations to receive tax credits for providing private-school scholarships to low-income students. Legislators might seek to expand that program though it too may ultimately be challenged in court -- to cover the more than 700 students in the program affected by this week's ruling. Preliminary estimates have put the expansion at $3 million.

Senate Judiciary Chairman Daniel Webster, R-Winter Garden, is among those wrestling with how to craft a voucher program that will meet constitutional muster.

Webster said that asking voters in November to approve private-school vouchers is a possibility and may be the likely course taken by supporters. He conceded that "it may be a tough sell" with voters.

Webster also acknowledged that at the moment he didn't see any clear state law changes that could accommodate the court's 5-2 ruling.

"It was a pretty broad decision," he said.

Bush has criticized the process to amend the constitution, saying it ties the Legislature's hands.

For Bush, the voucher defeat is part of a string of setbacks dealt him by the state's highest court, including the 2000 presidential election, abortion issues, budget matters, the death penalty and even the case of Terri Schiavo, the brain-damaged Clearwater woman whose case roiled Congress and the U.S. Supreme Court last spring.

The most recent decision, however, may undo a program that had been shaping up as a central part of the governor's legacy.

"The Supreme Court of Florida has effectively reached up and poked [Bush] in the eye, and that's wrong," said John Thrasher, a Tallahassee lobbyist who was House speaker during Bush's first year in office.

Bush has already revived the Foundation for Florida's Future, the nonprofit organization he used to advance his public policies and political career before being elected governor in 1998.

Thrasher said that rallying support for vouchers would be a task suited to the group, which is being led by Bush allies, including his former campaign finance director, Ann Herberger.

DOJ_NMG_0008529

But the foundation's executive director, Mandy Fletcher, said Friday that, like others involved in the voucher issue, the organization had not yet decided on its immediate goals.

"It was very unfortunate what happened," Fletcher said of the court ruling. "But at this point, I don't really know what we might be looking to do."

John Kennedy, who reported from Tallahassee, can be reached at jkennedy@orlandosentinel.com or 850-222-5564. Jim Stratton, who reported from Orlando, can be reached at jstratton@orlandosentinel.com or 407-420-5379.

ANTITRUST:

Pentagon Said To OK Rocket-launch Joint Venture (REU-Y2)

By Jim Wolf

Reuters, January 8, 2006

The U.S. Defense Department has conditionally approved a controversial plan that would let Lockheed Martin Corp. and Boeing Co. -- its top suppliers -- merge their struggling government-rocket launch ventures, a well-placed industry consultant said on Saturday.

In exchange, the Pentagon is demanding anti-trust protections sought by Northrop Grumman Corp. among others, said Loren Thompson of the Lexington Institute, an Arlington, Virginia, research group with close ties to the Pentagon and industry.

Final federal approval must come from the Federal Trade Commission, which has been awaiting a recommendation from the Pentagon, normally loath to endorse a quasi-monopoly.

A Pentagon spokesman, Army Major Paul Swiergosz, had no immediate comment on the conditional approval, first reported by the Wall Street Journal.

Bethesda, Maryland-based Lockheed, the Pentagon's number one supplier, said it was continuing to give the government information about what it called the very complex proposal.

"We're very optimistic about the deal and the benefits it will bring to our customers, to our shareholders and to our employees," said Jeff Adams, a spokesman.

Chicago-based Boeing, the Pentagon's second-biggest supplier, said it had not received any official word that a go-ahead was imminent.

"We continue to work with the government to answer lingering questions and are optimistic that we'll be given the approval to move forward with the joint venture," said Dan Beck, a spokesman.

Los Angeles-based Northrop did not immediately return phone calls seeking comment. Northrop does not build rockets but competes for U.S. government satellite business and is eager to make sure that a Lockheed-Boeing link-up does not give them unfair advantages in satellite competitions.

Thompson, citing officials from the companies, said safeguards being sought by the Pentagon were not "showstoppers."

He said the deal was tentatively approved by Kenneth Krieg, the Pentagon's acquisition chief, after a December 16 meeting with Ronald Sega, the Air Force undersecretary who is the Pentagon's executive agent for space.

Lockheed and Boeing, fierce rivals for rocket launches, agreed in May 2005 to create a 50-50 venture that would combine the production, engineering, test and launch operations for U.S. government launches of Boeing Delta and Lockheed Atlas rockets, subject to government approval.

They said at the time that the merger would save the government $100 million to $150 million annually and projected it would have closed by the end of last year.

To be known as the United Launch Alliance, the venture would end a drawn-out legal battle over the theft of internal Lockheed rocket documents that allegedly helped Boeing win rocket-launch work in the 1990s.

Closely held Space Exploration Technologies Corp. (SpaceX) of El Segundo, California, a rocket startup, has sued Boeing and Lockheed, charging they conspired to corner the market on U.S. government launches, and sought to block the merger.

DOJ_NMG_0008530

At issue is competition to launch weather satellites for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, science satellites for the National Atmospheric and Space Administration, spy satellites for the National Security Agency and communications satellites for the Air Force.

Funeral Industry Conspiring To Keep Prices High, Suit Says (HC)

By HARVEY RICE, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

Chip Beresford says he feels torn.

On one hand, he feels loyalty to the business in which he has prospered: the funeral industry.

On the other, he thinks he has suffered an injustice from funeral homes that he says have hurt him because they consider his prices too low.

Now Beresford — owner of The Pine Box in Houston, one of the largest distributors of caskets in Texas — is considering whether to join an antitrust lawsuit that aims to reduce funeral prices nationwide. The lawsuit, if it succeeds, could force the nation's largest funeral businesses to refund billions of dollars to consumers.

Beresford says he has been on the receiving end of some of the anticompetitive behavior alleged in the lawsuit. Some funeral homes that are unhappy about his prices, which often are hundreds of dollars less than theirs, refuse to use his caskets, he says.

"They disparaged me," he said. "They disparaged my product."

Nevertheless, he is reluctant to join casket retailer Pioneer Valley Casket Co., Inc. of Whately, Mass., in a lawsuit that has been combined with lawsuits filed by consumers.

The combined lawsuits accuse the world's largest funeral-service company, Houston-based Service Corp. International, of conspiring with competitors, independent funeral homes and the country's largest casket maker to fix prices and drive independent retailers such as Beresford out of business.

It alleges that the defendants have overcharged consumers by "hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars."

Beresford, a licensed funeral director who once ran a funeral home, said joining the lawsuit would feel like "suing my brother."

"I've been through the same school, the same experiences," he said. "Yet, I open this business up — which is legal to do, according to the rules of the industry — and they fight me, tooth and nail. And it's all over greed."

The consumers and Pioneer Valley are asking U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt of Houston to declare their lawsuits class actions, on behalf of consumers and independent casket retailers, respectively.

The nonprofit watchdog group Funeral Consumers Alliance, headquartered in Burlington, Vt., is the lead plaintiff in the consumer lawsuits. It alleges a conspiracy to fix casket prices by SCI, competing funeral-home chain operators Alderwoods Group Inc. and Stewart Enterprises Inc., and the country's largest casket maker, the Batesville Casket Co.

"I would expect and hope (the lawsuits) would open that market and it would make competition for the sale of caskets more open and free," said Joshua Slocum, Funeral Consumers Alliance executive director.

SCI spokesman Terry Hemeyer said, "The allegations in the case are contrary to SCI's policies and training, and we expect to vigorously defend this matter."

Alderwoods and Stewart did not respond to requests for comment. A spokeswoman for Batesville parent company Hillenbrand Industries, also a defendant, declined to comment.

Pressure tactics allegedThe lawsuits allege that the three national chains and independent funeral homes are pressuring Batesville to allow only licensed funeral homes to sell its caskets. Matthew Cantor, one of the lead attorneys for the consumer lawsuits, says Batesville's restrictions prevent retailers from selling its caskets, the most popular brand, thus making it easier for funeral homes to mark up casket prices by as much as 650 percent.

Doggett Whitaker — past president of the National Funeral Directors Association, which the retailers' lawsuit accuses of aiding the conspiracy — said Batesville has a long-standing policy of selling only to licensed funeral directors.

DOJ_NMG_0008531

"I can't say whether it's a good policy or a bad policy, but I can say these companies have a right to decide who they want to sell to," Whitaker said.

He also questioned whether the Batesville brand is important to consumers. "I have never had an individual walk into my funeral home and specifically ask for a named casket," he said.

The lawsuits also accuse funeral homes of disparaging caskets sold by independent retailers, telling customers the handles will fall off or the bottoms drop out.

The funeral industry suffered a blow to its reputation after Jessica Mitford wrote The American Way of Death in 1963, accusing many funeral homes of taking advantage of grieving families to pile on expensive and unneeded services.

In The American Way of Death Revisited, published in 1998, two years after her death, Mitford described a largely unreformed industry that had outfoxed the Federal Trade Commission.

She singled out SCI, accusing it of pumping up prices for caskets and funerals.

The consumer lawsuits mirror some of Mitford's claims, saying many funeral homes are violating the FTC's "funeral rule" to pile on expensive services.

Refrigeration fees

Plaintiffs Gloria Jaccarino Bender and Anthony Jaccarino accuse a Staten Island, N.Y., funeral home of selling them a casket for $2,095 even though they asked to have their mother's body cremated.

Slocum, the Funeral Consumers Alliance director, said some funeral homes charge $75 to $400 per day for refrigerating a body, although the cost to a funeral home is about $3 per day.

He said he still finds numerous violations of the FTC funeral rule, designed to halt such practices, that went into effect in 1984.

"There is no excuse, 20 years after the funeral rule, for these rampant violations," Slocum said.

Consumers are finding similar practices in Houston, said Derrick Wayne, a board member of the Funeral Consumers Alliance of Houston.

Corporate and independent funeral homes alike engage in practices such as charging as much as $1,495 for embalming, although it can be done for $200, Wayne said.

He noted that, in many cases, funeral directors fail to mention that Texas law does not require embalming.

'An old accusation'In response to lower prices offered by independent casket retailers, funeral homes are charging less for caskets but boosting the prices of other services to make up the difference, Wayne said.

Scott Gilligan, National Funeral Directors Association general counsel, said most funeral homes do not take advantage of their customers.

"It's an old accusation," he said. "It's just not true. The funeral-home industry depends on repeat business. No industry is impacted more by reputation than the funeral industry."

He also denied funeral homes make unfair profits.

"The fact of the matter is that funeral-home profits have fallen steadily," Gilligan said. "They used to be 9 percent. Now they are down to around 7 percent."

Profits are falling because there are too many funeral homes, said Lamar Hankins, a San Marcos lawyer and Funeral Consumer Alliance board member who helped prepare the antitrust lawsuit.

"The death rate just doesn't support the funeral homes that we have," Hankins said. "They are apt to charge these big prices for everything to pay the bills they get."

Moved to HoustonBefore landing in Houston, the antitrust lawsuit was filed in San Francisco earlier this year. SCI successfully moved to consolidate cases and transfer them to Houston after five nearly identical lawsuits were filed in other parts of the country.

At SCI's request, Judge Hoyt agreed to add two cases recently: another from San Francisco and one from Brownsville, the only Texas lawsuit.

Attorneys say the legal wrangling probably will drag on for years before coming to trial. Jenelle Welling, an attorney for Pioneer Valley, says the lawsuits strike so directly at SCI's core business practices that a settlement is unlikely.

"They think their business model is critical to their survival, and I'm essentially asking them to change their business model," Welling said.

harvey.rice@chron.com

Realtors' Bubble May Be Bursting (LAT)

Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

IF YOU HAVE ever sold your house, chances are you had to pay somewhere around 6% to real estate agents. You were robbed. And the people who robbed you are, naturally, determined to keep on robbing you and everybody else for as long as possible. But some people are starting to push back.

The purported reason we have real estate agents is that they perform needed services. To some extent, they do. If you're selling, they show your house to buyers. If you're buying, they advise you what to look for.

For both, they navigate you through a complex transaction. That's all well and good.

The trouble is that in most places, the agents have formed a quasi-monopoly by agreeing within the industry to charge a fixed commission. It's almost impossible to find a real estate agent who will offer to sell your house for less than the going rate.

In most contexts this practice is called price fixing, and it's illegal. The agents usually have more subtle ways of doing it. Regulations are usually set by state boards, which themselves usually consist of real estate agents. They typically pass regulations barring rebates or forbidding agents from offering a la carte services or flat fees.

In most cases, regulation isn't needed. Agents may compete with one another for customers, but they need one another to drum up business. If you're selling a house, you need other agents to bring customers to your door.

"One can get ostracized very easily," says Albert Foer of the American Antitrust Institute, "if one is seen as a price cutter."

Some of the fees collected by agents are legitimate. But some represent pure parasitic leeching. Comparing the fees charged in countries with less-powerful real estate agents suggests that fees in the United States ought to be about half as high as they are. Given that these commissions amount to at least $60 billion a year, that's a lot of blood being sucked out of the home market.

OVER THE LAST couple of years, there have been signs that the customers aren't willing to hand over thousands of dollars anymore. Why? One reason is the hot housing market. As prices get higher and higher, agents earn more and more without having to do more.

The second is the rise of the Internet. In most markets, broadening access to information has increased competition and reduced prices. Think about, say, the way you can search for used books online, or buy plane tickets without going to a travel agent. The Internet revolution has left real estate mostly untouched.

Some online competitors are trying to cut the real estate agents out of the action. The Realtors association is fighting back by denying those firms access to its databases of homes for sale. In some cases, the consumers are taking matters into their own hands. Last week, Jeff Bailey of the New York Times reported that some good folk in Madison, Wis., have taken it upon themselves to create a thriving for-sale-by-owner website and an alternative listing service. Sellers can list a house for a rock-bottom fee of $150.

Real estate agents are naturally furious. "It's a commission-avoidance scheme," sputtered one who works for Wisconsin's largest real estate broker. As if when I sell my house I have some patriotic duty to fork over a chunk of the sale to a third party.

The phrase itself — "commission-avoidance scheme" — is revealing. You've heard of mobsters hitting up store owners, but rarely do they have the gall to complain that merchants who go to the police are running a "protection-money-avoidance scheme." In the real estate agents' minds, they're not the ones running a scheme. The schemers are the people buying and selling houses to one another. A free market, in other words. How sinister!

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Sago Puts Spotlight On Safety Strategy (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0008533

By Joby Warrick

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

Two winters ago, what had been a mediocre safety record at West Virginia's Sago Mine grew dramatically worse. Over 23 months beginning in February 2004, two dozen miners were hurt in a string of accidents, some of them caused by rock chunks falling from the mine ceiling. Federal safety inspectors slapped the mine with citations 273 times, or an average of once every 2 1/2 days.

Despite this record, the price paid by Sago's operators was light. Government regulators never publicly discussed shutting down the mine and never sought criminal sanctions. The biggest single fine was $440, about 0.0004 percent of the $110 million net profit reported last year by the mine's current owner, International Coal Group Inc.

Whether the mine's documented safety problems played a role in Monday's fatal accident is still unknown. But Sago's recent history illustrates what mine-safety experts say is a long-standing flaw in enforcement of federal mining regulations. While inspectors issue a blizzard of paper citations each year, these violations rarely translate into serious penalties, even for the worst offenders, according to government records and interviews with current and former regulators. Large fines are rare, and the most serious sanctions -- such as mine closure -- are almost never used, documents show.

This pattern has been even more pronounced under the Bush administration, which came into office with a promise to forge cooperative ties between regulators and the mining industry. During the past five years, the number of mines referred to the Justice Department for criminal prosecution has dropped steadily, from 38 in 2000 to 12 last year.

Meanwhile, inspectors who sought to impose large fines on coal companies have seen those penalties whittled down by agency negotiators and administrative law judges. Last year, the operator of a Brookwood, Ala., coal mine, where 13 miners were killed in a September 2001 explosion, saw its fine reduced from $435,000 to $3,000 -- a 99 percent reduction. The Alabama disaster was the nation's deadliest coal-mining accident in the past two decades, nearly equaled by Monday's Sago explosion that left 12 miners dead.

"There are simply not enough incentives for safety built into the regulatory and compensation system," said Emily A. Spieler, an occupational safety expert and dean of Northeastern University's School of Law. "Pressure on regulatory agencies to allow unsafe businesses to operate is enormous, and the incentives to comply with regulations are small if the regulatory agency does not issue large fines."

The chief enforcer of federal mining laws, the U.S. Mine Safety and Health Administration, defends its performance, pointing to a steady decline in the number of deaths and injuries in coal mines in recent years. Some of the decline has been attributed to increased mechanization, though both industry and union officials acknowledge improvements in safety practices.

"While MSHA has also pursued cooperative health and safety partnerships with labor unions, mine operators and industry associations, it has consistently backed up those compliance assistance efforts with strong enforcement against unsafe operators," agency spokesman Dirk Fillpot said in a prepared statement. Reporters inquiring about the agency's record were referred to the statement.

MSHA contends that its oversight is as least as robust as that of previous administrations, but the record is mixed. The total number of hours spent by inspectors inside coal mines has gone up, but the percentage of violations classified by inspectors as serious -- "significant and substantial," in agency jargon -- has declined.

Comparisons with previous administrations are complex, because mining methods have changed and the number of underground mines has steadily decreased.

But agency critics, including several former MSHA officials, say relatively light sanctions, coupled with the current administration's more collegial approach to regulation, make it harder for inspectors to force noncompliant companies to change.

"There was a dramatic shift in MSHA's philosophy in 2001, with a new emphasis on cooperation by the enforcers," said J. Davitt McAteer, who headed the agency under the Clinton administration, "and it came at a cost of less enforcement of the statute."

MSHA enforces safety laws through the efforts of more than 350 inspectors who review safety plans for individual mines and conduct inspections to ensure the rules are followed. Penalties can range from a warning for minor offenses, such as incomplete paperwork, to fines for "significant and substantial" infractions. More serious violations can potentially result in escalating fines, criminal prosecution or even the shut-down of all, or parts, of a mine.

At the Sago Mine, near the central West Virginia town of Tallmansville, the increase in safety violations in early 2004 quickly drew the attention of agency inspectors. During the two years that followed, regulators dramatically increased their oversight, writing citations for such problems as falling rocks and excessive levels of highly flammable coal dust. The 273 violations recorded in two years included 16 that were labeled "unwarrantable failures," a designation generally reserved for the most serious safety infractions, or those for which the operator had previously been warned.

The operator of the mine during most of the period was Anker West Virginia Mining Co., which was acquired in November by International Coal Group Inc. ICG officials say they have worked with MSHA to correct safety problems since acquiring the mine. A spokesman declined to comment further, saying the company's focus remains the Sago accident.

According to agency records, federal inspectors issued a total of 18 "withdrawal records" against Sago, forcing the company to temporarily suspend some operations. But in each case, mining was allowed to resume after Sago officials took steps to correct the problems, MSHA documents show. Over two years, the company racked up more than $24,000 in fines, although the individual penalties were all less than $450, and many were $60. The average fine was $150.

Former agency officials say the MSHA regional office that oversees West Virginia mines was unusually aggressive and might eventually have forced the mine to clean up or face a shutdown. But ultimately the agency's response was too little, too late, said Jack Spadaro, a retired agency inspector and engineer in West Virginia.

"The mine should have simply been closed," said Spadaro, who was granted federal whistle-blower status after being demoted four years ago because of what Spadaro says were disagreements with MSHA officials over his aggressive enforcement of safety laws. "The fines were absolutely absurd, but that's all the inspectors can do. The only other option they have is a closure order, and the managers in Washington won't let them close a mine."

Weaknesses in enforcement were the subject of criticism long before the Sago accident. In 2003, the Government Accountability Office faulted MSHA for failing to follow through when it found violations. Moreover, the agency's Washington leadership did "not provide adequate oversight" to ensure that inspectors were enforcing compliance, the GAO concluded.

Former MSHA officials and leaders of the United Mine Workers of America, which represents unionized coal miners, have accused the agency's Bush-appointed leaders of being too closely allied with the industry. They note that MSHA's first leader under President Bush, David D. Lauriski, was a former coal industry executive who advocated a less confrontational style and gave inspectors a less-intimidating job title: "compliance assistance specialists."

Under Bush, 17 of 26 regulations proposed by the Clinton administration were dropped or withdrawn, and the agency began a series of high-profile "cooperative alliance" agreements with industry to promote safety through education, posters and other voluntary programs. Bush-appointed officials leaders say they withdrew the Clinton proposals to pursue their own regulatory agenda.

The agency eliminated or scaled back programs favored by unions and watchdog groups that allowed public access to records related to safety performance and accident investigations. For example, MSHA halted the release of notes from mine inspections, which the agency had routinely released under the Freedom of Information Act for a quarter-century. It also shifted many routine accident investigations into closed-door proceedings, in some cases denying entry even to union officials and lawyers representing injured mineworkers, say union officials and former agency employees.

Joseph Main, a retired UMW health and safety official, said he worried that MSHA's investigation of the Sago accident would focus only on the source of the initial explosion -- instead of seeking answers to the broader questions about mine safety.

"The explosion is just one piece of it," Main said. "They should investigate all the factors that led to the deaths of these men, including the failure of the safety net that was supposed to be in place. If those other questions aren't answered, we will have more Sagos in the future."

Staff writer Cindy Skrzycki, researcher Alice Crites and database editor Sarah Cohen contributed to this report.

Miners Steering Next Generation To Different Jobs (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

DOJ_NMG_0008535

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

SAGO, W.Va., Jan. 7 - Mark Rankin worked in the deep mines for 23 years until a back injury put him on disability, and he said that if he ever had a son, he sure would not have wanted him to follow his father into the precarious ground.

As it was, his daughter's husband, 28-year-old David Lewis, was the youngest of the 12 men found dead this week, huddled together behind a makeshift barricade to keep out the toxic fumes in Sago Mine No. 1.

"He was only working in the mines for a while, to help my girl get through graduate school," said Mr. Rankin, 48.

"If I had a son, I'd have told him, if you can find something else, anything else, you should do it. It's a dangerous world down there."

For those not intimate with the realities of modern coal mining, the ages of the men who died at Sago may have come as a surprise - one in his 20's, one in his 30's, one in his 40's, eight in their 50's and a 61-year-old - a crew of mostly aging veterans, a majority of whom had first put on their miner's hats around the time the Vietnam War was ending.

But that, government and union officials say, is typical for a mining crew these days.

Despite a sharp rise in mining employment, spurred by a doubling in coal prices since 2002, most of the men went into the mines during the last big coal-price surge, in the 1970's, and then struggled through three decades of roller-coaster prices, layoffs and mine closings.

Interviews with more than a dozen current and former West Virginia coal miners - almost all of them middle-aged - revealed a common story line: parents who had urged them to stay out of the mines matching their own reluctance to see their children go underground.

But there is more than reluctance behind the aging of the mine work force.

Many of those West Virginia coal miners hired in the 70's lost their jobs in subsequent downturns. But their names remained on lists, called panels, and the requirement was that those miners be given first shot at any new jobs that opened at union mines.

"The result was that most of the guys hired back first were from that same age group who came into the mines in the 70's," said Terry Osborne, an international vice president at large of the United Mine Workers who is based in nearby Morgantown. "Only recently have we gotten to the point where some mines have exhausted their panels and are free to hire younger men."

With higher coal prices, more mines are being opened and more crews put into existing mines. The federal Energy Information Administration said employment in the industry grew 7.5 percent last year.

Coal mine owners understand that it is a tough industry, and that their aging work force requires them to attract younger employees. Certainly, they say, the images and stories coming out of West Virginia this week will not make that task any easier.

Nick Helms, 25, said his 50-year-old father, Terry, whose body was the first found in Sago No. 1, did not like the harsh conditions underground and wanted better for his son, urging him to pursue his dream of becoming a professional golfer.

"He told me bluntly that I would never step foot in a coal mine," said Mr. Helms, who has moved to South Carolina to try to carve out a golf career. "He didn't want me to do what he did."

And after hearing their parents talk about cave-ins and fires and generally dangerous conditions - there have been 150 coal-mine deaths since 2000, though the records had been improving, with only 21 deaths in 2005 - and living through round after round of layoffs and mine closings, many young people are less than eager to join the parade.

"I love my job," said Joe Reynolds, 48, who works underground at Federal Mine No. 2 in Fairview. "If I was 19 again, I'd take it again. But it's not for everyone."

Mr. Osborne thinks it is generational. "These Pac-Man kids, with their video games, they don't want to get dirty," he said. "I can't blame them, I guess. Truth is, that's what you do with your kids from Day 1, is tell them, 'Don't go into the mines.' "

The Census Bureau puts the average age for workers in the mining industry at 46, but union officials say that is a little misleading, as it includes management personnel and those working in offices and other above-ground support jobs, who are often younger.

"I'd say, around here at least, the age of the average miner you'd see actually working underground is in his mid-50's," Mr. Osborne said.

DOJ_NMG_0008536

Only about half of the nation's coal miners are unionized, and nonunion mine owners are under no obligation to hire laid-off union workers, said David Kameras, a union spokesman. But they often do, the miners said, if only to avoid the cost and delay of training inexperienced men.

In addition, under mining regulations, trainees, known as "red hats" for their protective headgear, must have at least one certified miner, known as "black hats," with them as they learn the job underground.

"When I started in the mines, back in the 1975, we were mostly all red hats," said John Palmer, 50, a general laborer at Federal No. 9 in Fairview. "Now you're seeing some young red hats again, but you've got one group of new guys in their late 20's and a bigger group of older guys, like me, in their 50's. We missed a generation in there somewhere."

Mr. Palmer is a big, blustery man with a booming voice who wore a sweatshirt reading "This is what the world's greatest grandpa looks like." He said he was glad he went into coal mining and would do it again.

"When I was a boy, growing up with nothing, my family never even got out of Carolina," he said, referring to a nearby mining town. "Now I make $50,000 a year, give or take, and I can take my family to the ocean."

But he has a 19-year-old son who is not in the mines. "He works for the gas company, and I thank God," Mr. Palmer said.

Census figures show that the median wage for coal miners in construction and extraction jobs in 2004 was $38,550, and $41,280 for those in more specialized maintenance and repair jobs.

But for those in the bigger mines who are willing to put in overtime, union officials said, wages closer to Mr. Palmer's are common.

It is quite an incentive for young men growing up in a sparsely populated region like rural West Virginia, where comparable paying jobs are hard to find.

"My grandfather was a miner, my uncles were miners, my father-in-law was a miner and my great-uncle was a miner," said Mr. Rankin, who was injured in 2000 and left the mines on disability in 2002. "But when I was a boy, my great-grandmother kept telling me, over and over, 'Promise me that you won't go down into the mines.' I promised her, but I didn't keep my promise."

Mr. Rankin dropped out of high school in the middle of the hiring surges of the 1970's and first tried to find work outside the mines. But in the end, he went to the mines, and he says he is glad he did, though he does have regrets about his great-grandmother.

"She'd have rolled over in her grave if she knew I was working in the mines," he said.

Under Strain, Towns Prepare For 12 Funerals (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

BUCKHANNON, W.Va., Jan. 7 - Daisies, carnations and black ribbons, arranged in baskets, vases and wreaths, covered the floor of Anita's Flowers on South Florida Street here on Saturday - tributes to the family of Jerry Groves, one of the 12 miners who died in the Sago Mine.

Two women, faces drawn, moved between the ringing phone and the back room, taking orders and trying to fulfill them at the same time. They did not have time to talk.

Flowers are the universal language of remembrance, and when grief is not just personal and communal, but public and national, florists' fingers cannot position stems fast enough.

Here in Buckhannon and in nearby Sago, Tallmansville and Philippi, family and friends made final preparations Saturday for the first of the funerals on Sunday for the 12 men whose deaths have focused national attention on these small places, straining them to the utmost.

"Most funeral homes in our area will not be able to accommodate the abundance of people," said Bruce Tomblyn, an owner of the Tomblyn-Whitescarver funeral home in Buckhannon, as he prepared for services for one miner, Jesse Jones. At least six funerals will be held tomorrow.

At the Stemple-Forman Funeral Home in Philippi, Gov. Joe Manchin III, who lost his uncle in a mining accident, was an early visitor on Saturday, said Gary E. Schoonover, the owner of the funeral home.

Amid the mourning, there was a glimmer of good news.

DOJ_NMG_0008537

Physicians treating Randal McCloy Jr., 27, the lone survivor of the mine accident, said on Saturday that his condition had improved enough to transfer him from a hospital in Pittsburgh to a hospital closer to home in Morgantown, W.Va.

"He has gotten consistently better," said Dr. Richard Shannon, chairman of medicine at Allegheny General Hospital in Pittsburgh. But Dr. Shannon quickly added, "He is not yet out of the woods."

Mr. McCloy was taken to the Pittsburgh hospital on Thursday to receive special hyperbaric oxygen treatments to alleviate the effects of oxygen deprivation on his heart, brain and other organs.

Also Saturday, another miner's note was made public.

James Bennett, a shuttle-car operator in the group of trapped miners, gave a chronology of his final hours, writing that he was alive but losing air at least 10 hours after the underground explosion.

"Each time he documented, you could tell it was getting worse," Mr. Bennett's daughter, Anne Merideth, told The Associated Press. "Later on down the note, he said that it was getting dark. It was getting smoky. They were losing air."

The final entry was made at 4:25 p.m. Another 31 hours passed before a rescue team arrived.

Tribe Seeks Land N.J. Sold In 1801 (PHI)

By Troy Graham

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 8, 2006

Two centuries later, a band of Native Americans want back the land they say the state of New Jersey sold out from under them in 1801.

In a federal lawsuit filed last month in Camden, they demanded that everyone now living on the former Brotherton Reservation be evicted.

The only problem: The 3,044-acre reservation now makes up about 85 percent of Shamong Township, Burlington County.

Since no one wants to bulldoze a community of 6,500 people, the tribe is offering a compromise. Instead, it will accept two 1,500-acre plots of state land - one in Bergen County and one in Burlington County.

On each site, the Unalachtigo Band of the Nanticoke-Lenni Lenape Nation proposes building casinos with 45,000 slot machines, then sharing the revenue with the state and other tribes.

"Some people tell us there's no way in the world we'll get it," said Brent Thomas, the tribal chairman. "I have to be cautiously optimistic; otherwise, I wouldn't be able to get up in the morning."

Thomas, who used to publish an art investors' guide, has devoted himself full-time to tribal government since 1998, when the Unalachtigo Band was reorganized with the express purpose of pursuing Indian gambling, now a $19 billion industry.

Relying on some of the nation's earliest laws, Thomas and his 108-member band, many of whom live in poverty in and around Bridgeton, Cumberland County, are chasing billions of dollars of development in an industry full of heavyweight players.

Despite the odds against the band, Thomas sees gambling as the best way to maintain the tribe, salvage the remnants of its culture, and provide for elders living in squalor.

"We can't sit idly by while people in our community are dying," he said. "We can help ourselves if they would just get out of our way."

•

Thomas likes to take visitors to the windswept spot on the Delaware River where his ancestors crossed into New Jersey in 1634, fleeing war with the Susquehanna.

The council fire - the seat of tribal government for the Lenape people - was situated in nearby Fairton, where Thomas was raised. It's now a golf course.

But, like many Native Americans in the region, Thomas didn't grow up with a strong sense of his heritage. His older relatives recall a time when they were encouraged to hide their ethnicity, fearing the government would force them to move out West.

"The hardest thing in our community is to be open about your identity," he said.

Then, in the late 1990s, Thomas made a business trip to the museum at the Foxwoods casino, run by the Mashantucket Pequot Tribal Nation, in Connecticut.

DOJ_NMG_0008538

"I go up there for a meeting with these guys, and they look like me," he said. "To see the living standards, the health care, the housing, of course we want it... . Not because we want it, but because we need it."

With the coming explosion of Pennsylvania slot machines in 2007, Thomas hopes New Jersey won't be able to take a pass on the allure of Indian gambling.

"For New Jersey to regain its prominence, it needs the next wave of gaming, which is what we offer," he said.

And when people ask how a small tribe, struggling to pay for basic necessities, is going to build a gambling empire, Thomas points across the river.

"The state of Pennsylvania isn't investing a dime, and look at the development they're getting," he said.

But not everyone agrees that gambling is the best way for tribes to flourish. A larger, 2,500-member tribe of Nanticoke Lenni-Lenape, who have established a cultural center and make appearances at local schools, adamantly opposes gambling. In fact, this tribe's laws ban any business that "profits from the promotion of vice."

"We are absolutely, 100 percent separate from the Unalachtigo Band," said the Rev. John Norwood, a Nanticoke Lenni-Lenape tribal member. "Our goal has never been gaming, nor is it to seize property and throw people off the land."

Mark Gould, the chief, said casinos have been a divisive force in many gaming tribes.

"We are a very spirituality-based tribe," he said. "We have been a very poor tribe all our lives, but if we're going to keep the families together, we have to follow the spiritual line."

He said Thomas' pursuit of gambling had injured "every Native American in New Jersey," and had made his tribe's efforts to win grants and work with local governments more difficult.

"We're very insulted when people believe that just because you're Indian, you want a casino," Norwood said.

•

Under a 1758 treaty, the Brotherton Reservation was to be held in trust for the Lenape Indians. When New Jersey sold the land in 1801, the state violated the treaty and a 1790 law that gave the federal government authority over Indian land transactions, the lawsuit alleges.

In 1996, the Delaware Tribe of Western Oklahoma - descendants of the inhabitants of the Brotherton Reservation - began investigating a claim to the land. U.S. Rep. Jim Saxton (R., N.J.) took the matter seriously enough to introduce legislation in 1999 that would have retroactively ratified the Brotherton sale. The bill never passed.

The Unalachtigo entered the fray by suing the state in 2001. Last year, a state appellate court ruled that the case must be heard in federal court.

Nonetheless, the three-judge panel offered the opinion that, under New Jersey law, the sale of the reservation would have been valid.

"There is no question here that the Lenni Lenape not only assented to the sale of their land, but requested it, and... received full value," the court said.

Thomas said that was not correct. He argues that the land was actually sold by members of the Stockbridge-Munsee Band of the Mohican Nation, not the Lenape for whom the land was to be reserved.

"They tried to lump us all in together, and you can't do that," he said.

Either way, the journey from a land claim to a Foxwoods-scale operation could be arduous.

Blake Watson, an Indian-law expert at the University of Dayton School of Law in Ohio, said some courts have begun to rule that Indian land claims are too old, even though there is no statute of limitations.

Even if the Lenape won state land - in court or through a settlement - that doesn't mean they can open casinos. Tribes that want gambling have to be federally recognized, Watson said. The Lenapes are not.

Thomas argued - and Watson agreed - that the process is so badly broken that it could take more than 20 years to become recognized.

Thomas points to two other options: A U.S. District Court judge in New York recently recognized the Shinnecock Nation as legitimate even though that tribe had not gone through the recognition bureaucracy. It's still unclear, however, whether the Shinnecocks can now have gaming, Watson said. And, the Pequots won federal recognition through an act of Congress - the only tribe to do so.

DOJ_NMG_0008539

"The odds of winning these land claims are increasingly problematic. They've got a lot of hurdles," Watson said. "It's possible for them to win a land claim and still not get gaming."

To Thomas, the issue of proving the tribe's legitimacy should be moot. But, just in case, he has an affidavit from a University of Pennsylvania archaeologist tracing the tribe's lineage back to the Brotherton Reservation.

"Everyone knows who we are," Thomas said. "The question is: What does the state want us to be?"

Thomas paused before answering his own question.

"Quiet."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Guns Flow Easily Into Mexico From The U.S. (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

NUEVO LAREDO, Mexico — The most popular instruments of robbery, torture, homicide and assassination in this violence-racked border city are imported from the United States.

"Warning," reads the sign greeting motorists on the U.S. side as they approach the Rio Grande that separates the two countries here. "Illegal to carry firearms/ammunition into Mexico. Penalty, prison."

The signs have done little to stop what U.S. and Mexican officials say is a steady and growing commerce of illicit firearms in Mexico — 9-millimeter pistols, shotguns, AK-47s, grenade launchers. An estimated 95% of weapons confiscated from suspected criminals in Mexico were first sold legally in the United States, officials in both countries say.

Guns are the essential tools of a war among underworld crime syndicates that claimed between 1,400 and 2,500 lives in 2005, according to tallies by various newspapers and magazines.

The biggest criminals in Mexico are engaged in an arms race, with an armor-piercing machine gun as the new must-have weapon for the cartels fighting one another for control of the lucrative trade in narcotics, U.S. and Mexican officials say.

In 2005, Nuevo Laredo residents endured the specter of more than 100 suspected drug-cartel executions in their city, and the release of a horrific videotape in which a suspected drug-cartel gunman executes a "prisoner." The city has become a tragic symbol of the gun violence sweeping through the entire country.

"It's obvious where all the arms are coming from," said Higenio Ibarra Murillo, a Nuevo Laredo business owner in the city's historic downtown district. "We don't make any guns or rifles here" in Mexico.

Buying a weapon legally is extremely difficult in Mexico. The country's defense secretary issues all gun licenses — the wait is a year or more, and the cost about $1,900. Licenses must be renewed every two years.

There are fewer than 2,500 registered gun owners in the entire country. Yet Mexican police confiscate an average of 256 weapons every day from suspects, officials from the attorney general's office said recently.

Javier Ortiz Campos of Mexico's Federal Preventive Police says traces by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives on weapons confiscated in Mexico often lead to the gun shops, gun shows and flea markets of Texas. The U.S. state has some of the most liberal gun laws in the country and a porous, 1,240-mile-long border with Mexico.

"Over there they even sell guns at Wal-Mart," Ortiz Campos said. The weapons confiscated in Mexico come mostly from U.S. border cities such as Laredo, El Paso and Brownsville, he said. But many come also from Houston and San Antonio.

"We're finding a lot of weapons from Houston, because the buyers get a better price there than at the border," Ortiz Campos said.

Organized-crime groups in Mexico often buy their weapons in bulk via "straw purchasers" in Texas, where there is no limit on the number of firearms a resident can purchase, said a U.S. official who asked not to be named.

Typically, the Mexican buyer will pay a Texas resident $50 to $100 to acquire the weapons, the official said.

In one case, Mexican and U.S. authorities working together traced 80 confiscated firearms to a Mexican national who paid Texas residents to buy weapons on his behalf, the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0008540

Police recovered one 9-millimeter handgun last year at the scene of a shootout between officers and suspected drug-cartel hit men outside the Mexican border town of Reynosa. A trace of the weapon by ATF agents led to another Texas man who had bought 160 weapons. That man is facing gun-trafficking charges in the U.S.

Last year, ATF officials in Arizona arrested a man trying to buy 30 U.S. military hand grenades. The man told undercover agents the grenades were intended for drug traffickers in the northern Mexican state of Sonora. In August, a Tucson man was charged with smuggling AK-47s and AK-47 parts into Mexico.

Large caches of weapons routinely turn up here and in other border communities. Twenty assault rifles were seized in Tijuana on Dec. 20; that same day, Mexican army troops in the state of Sinaloa detained a group of men who were armed with five AK-47 rifles and one AR-15 rifle.

In Nuevo Laredo last month, Mexican police stumbled upon an arsenal in the hands of suspected organized crime members that included grenades, semiautomatic handguns and seven AR-15 assault rifles.

No store in Nuevo Laredo sells handguns or rifles over the counter. But if you take a 15-minute walk over the border to Laredo, you'll find the Bushmaster AR-15 rifle on sale at one gun store for $1,199.

The salespeople at the store speak Spanish, but the sign over a display case of semiautomatic handguns is in English: "If guns are outlawed, only outlaws will have guns."

The slogan, popular with U.S. gun-rights activists, certainly seems to apply on the other side of the border. Only one person has a private gun permit in the entire Mexican state of Tamaulipas, which includes Nuevo Laredo. Yet guns seem to be everywhere.

On the impoverished edges of the city, small-time drug dealers protect their investments with semiautomatics. And many law-abiding citizens can tell of an encounter with armed bandits.

Businessman Jose Luis Ortiz Cardenas witnessed an attempted carjacking by armed robbers last year outside a grocery store he owns. And he'll never forget the notorious 2003 shootout a few blocks from the cantina he operates downtown — the shooting spread to the bridge leading to the United States.

"It was a hail of bullets, federal agents firing at other federal agents, hit men firing at other hit men, with bazookas and everything," the cantina owner said.

Mexican police have, in recent years, confiscated a handful of bazookas from organized-crime groups. Mexican and U.S. officials say a very small amount of military surplus from recent wars in Central America has found its way into Mexico. But U.S. officials say a bazooka recovered recently from suspected drug cartel hit men in Mexico was traced to an Army depot in Arkansas — the weapon had been deposited there and last accounted for in 1967.

Assault rifles such as the AR-15 and the AK-47 are by far the most popular weapons imported into Mexico by the drug cartels, police official Ortiz Campos said.

The AR-15 is the civilian, semiautomatic equivalent of the M-16 used by U.S. troops since the Vietnam War. The AK-47 was designed by Mikhail Kalashnikov for the Soviet army in 1947. In Mexican street slang both are known as "el cuerno de chivo" — "the goat's horn" — for the distinctive shape of their bullet clips.

"For the narco-traffickers, it's like their good-luck charm," Ortiz Campos said. The drug cartels favor the AK-47 for the same reason the Soviet army did: its ruggedness and versatility.

"With that weapon, you can do incredible things," Ortiz Campos said. The AK-47 is not only powerful, it's also idiot-proof, he added. "It will fire underwater. It will fire when it's covered with mud."

The AK-47 appears in several narcocorrido songs about bad men and their adventures. The song "The Terrifying Cuerno de Chivo" by the group Los Incomparables de Tijuana was made into a movie of the same name.

"Its barrel is decorated, the butt and the trigger too," the lyrics say. "Inlaid with silver all around, it's a weapon fit for a man of courage…. It's an instrument of death."

Assault rifles that are sold legally in the U.S. are not fully automated. But officials say that there are gunsmiths in Mexico who are adapting the weapons to make them fully automatic.

"We have found a few in Mexico that have been converted by a machinist," the U.S. official said. "This tells us someone with vast experience in weaponry is working here."

DOJ_NMG_0008541

U.S. and Mexican officials say they are also concerned by the presence of .50-caliber machine guns in Mexico. Originally designed as antiaircraft weapons, the guns are used by cartels because they can penetrate armor.

"We think these weapons are used by the cartels to attack each other" rather than the police, Ortiz Campos said.

"Ten or 15 years ago, you rarely saw a .50-caliber weapon" in Mexico, the U.S. official said. "Now they're popping up everywhere."

U.S. officials say their Mexican counterparts are working harder than ever to fight the weapons trafficking. Mexican federal officials cooperate extensively with the ATF in tracing illicit weapons.

"The Mexicans are eager to see prosecutions for gun trafficking go forward in the U.S.," the American official said. "It's a different attitude than in the past."

Still, the gun violence continues to take on new, disturbing dimensions. Television viewers across Mexico were horrified last month by the airing of a video in which members of the one cartel competing for control of the drug trade in Nuevo Laredo torture hit men from another cartel. The video, obtained by the Dallas Morning News, ends with one of the hit men being executed with a shot to the head from a 9-millimeter pistol.

As Nuevo Laredo becomes a war zone, its streets are increasingly empty. For the most part, tourists are avoiding the city, frightened by the kidnapping and disappearance of several Americans here.

"The one consolation we have is that we know it can't get any worse than it is right now," business owner Ortiz Cardenas said. "We've hit rock bottom."

Anti-drug Task Force Funding Slashed (RPE)

By CLAIRE VITUCCI, Washington Bureau

Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - Law-enforcement agencies across the nation and Inland area could find it tougher to crack down on methamphetamine due to cuts in a popular federal grant program.

Funding for Byrne Grants, which help finance drug task forces that often focus on methamphetamine, was cut by $200 million.

The Bush Administration had eliminated funding for the program, saying it and other grant programs were ineffective. But Congress restored $606 million for Byrne Grants in the 2006 fiscal year as part of a Justice Department spending bill. The grant program received $804 million in fiscal 2005. That amount was also a reduction from the previous year.

California received $31.6 million in Byrne Grant funding in 2004. It's not yet clear how much the state will receive in 2006, but law enforcement officials say they're bracing for a big reduction -- as much as 35 percent, said Rick Oules, Director of Law Enforcement for the California Department of Justice.

Oules said the state is already planning to cut 20 positions and trim some crime-lab services. He said officials are concerned about how the cuts will affect local anti-drug task forces, which receive a majority of funding from the Byrne Grant program. There are 44 drug task forces throughout California.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-California, and co-chairwoman of the new Senate Anti-Meth Caucus, said cutting the Byrne grant program is short-sighted.

"It means fewer cops on the street, less money to combat the nation's drug epidemic, and a heavier burden on local law enforcement," Feinstein said in a statement. Task forces "make thousands of arrests each year. But these task forces will most likely be cut as a result of these cuts."

Leaders of task forces in Riverside and San Bernardino counties say they've already been hurt by past cuts.

Last year the Coachella Valley Narcotics Task Force lost 37 percent of its grant money, which it uses to pay partial salaries for detectives from nearby police agencies and for a deputy district attorney who prosecutes narcotics cases.

Because of the cuts, the task force had to use asset forfeiture money to pay for surveillance and other operations. Also, local law-enforcement agencies had to pay more of the personnel costs, said Cmdr. Fred Fierro, who heads the task force.

Lt. Greg Garland of the San Bernardino County Sheriff's Department Narcotics Division, said the county's drug task force received $823,532 last year, which was down from $1.25 million received the year before.

DOJ_NMG_0008542

The task force had to redistribute people and resources, Garland said.

"If we get cut, somebody's got to go," he said.

Garland said if all of the federal money were to go away it would likely mean the end of the task force. The federal funds are used to pay for criminalists, salaries, surveillance, overtime, training and district attorney services.

This year's Byrne Grant funding from Congress was part of a $57.9 billion spending bill for the federal departments of Commerce, Justice and State.

The bill has $20 million for the Drug Enforcement Administration to help local jurisdictions to clean up toxic meth labs. Another $63.59 million would go toward investigation, interdiction and dismantling drug laboratories in meth "hot spots" across the country where the drug is most prevalent.

But with growing attention on the methamphetamine epidemic there needs to be more funding made available to fight it, said Joe Dunn, associate legislative director with the National Association of Counties, who is based in Washington.

Tom Ackerman with the Belo Capital Bureau contributed to this report.

IMMIGRATION:

Texas Tangle (TWNHLL)

By Robert Novak

Novak Column, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The decision by State Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn to run for governor of Texas as an independent requires President Bush to oppose her and support Gov. Rick Perry. Strayhorn is the mother of two trusted Bush aides, while Perry's relationship with the president has been cool.

The White House had signaled it would not take sides in a Republican primary between Strayhorn and Perry. White House press secretary Scott McClellan and Bush administration Medicare and Medicaid administrator Mark McClellan are sons of Strayhorn.

Strayhorn decided to go independent when it became clear she could not win a Republican primary, according to Texas sources. Her opposition to Perry in the general election evoked outrage from state Republican leaders who claimed betrayal by Strayhorn, who in 1985 moved from the Democratic to the Republican Party.

ALITO CAMPAIGN MIX-UP

A new fund-raising appeal by the Committee for Justice (CFJ) on behalf of Judge Samuel Alito's confirmation for the Supreme Court mistakenly contained the name of former White House counsel C. Boyden Gray, President Bush's nominee for U.S. ambassador to the European Union (EU).

Gray's nomination is in trouble in the Senate, partly because of Democratic protest over his activities as founder of the CFJ. He had resigned from the group, and consequently his name on the fund-raising letter raised eyebrows.

When this column pointed out to CFJ executive director Sean Rushton that Gray's name was still on the money appeal, Rushton replied he was unaware of that and it must have been a case of the fund-raising contractor using old stationery. He later said the letter has been withdrawn and any money raised with Gray's name on the appeal was being returned.

REPUBLICAN LOYALTY

The White House is dispatching Vice President Dick Cheney to raise money for embattled Republican Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio, who has voted against President Bush on key legislative issues.

Cheney will address a $1,000-a-ticket Capitol Hill Club reception on Jan. 26 that is intended to raise $100,000 for DeWine's campaign for a third term. DeWine most recently opposed Bush and Senate Republican leaders on the budget bill and on drilling for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. Invitations to the fund-raiser have been mailed to major Bush contributors.

With Republican control of the Senate at stake, DeWine faces potential difficulty for re-election. Democratic candidates include Rep. Sherrod Brown and Iraq War veteran Paul Hackett, who last year ran a close race in a heavily Republican congressional district.

SURGEON GENERAL POLITICIAN

DOJ_NMG_0008543

National Republican leaders are recruiting Vice Adm. Richard Carmona, surgeon general of the United States, to cut off a congressional bid in a closely contested Arizona district by a foe of President Bush's immigration policies.

The Tucson district was put up for grabs when moderate Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe announced recently he would not seek a 12th term. The leading Republican candidate has been former State Rep. Randy Graf, who in 2004 took 43 percent of the primary vote while spending only $90,000 by advocating a hard-line immigration policy.

Kolbe is not expected to support Graf if he is nominated in an evenly balanced district that Bush carried with 53 percent. Dr. Wayne Peate, a fellow physician and friend of Carmona, filed his candidacy Monday and raised speculation that Carmona will not run.

IMMIGRATION SPLIT

A bipartisan guest worker proposal being worked on in the Western Governors' Association (WGA) promises to expose further the split over immigration in both political parties, but particularly among Republicans.

Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat, and Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman, a Republican, are working on the WGA proposal. In addition to the guest worker initiative, the proposal is expected to include increased border enforcement and reimbursements to states of expenses resulting from illegal immigration.

This Napolitano-Huntsman plan, if finished in time, will be presented at the WGA's annual Washington breakfast late in February. It would immediately be attacked by Republican immigration hard-liners in Congress.

Robert Novak is a television personality and a columnist who writes Inside Report.

Few Drawn To Illegal Immigration Protests (AP)

By MICHAEL R. BLOOD

Associated Press, January 8, 2006

Illegal immigration protests organized across the country Saturday drew small numbers, and some were outnumbered and out-shouted by those who support immigrant rights.

The so-called "Stop the Invasion" protests were organized in 19 states, demanding the government increase border security and penalize employers who hire illegal workers.

"We are keeping the debate on illegal immigration in the forefront of the American consciousness," said Joseph Turner of Save Our State, who was among about two dozen protesters who waved American flags outside a home-supply store in a Los Angeles suburb.

But Turner's group in Glendale was surrounded by more than 100 drum-beating supporters who chanted, "Racists go home." The two groups traded shouts and obscene gestures for more than an hour. One man was arrested for assault, police said.

In Farmingville, N.Y., where immigration-related violence erupted several times in recent years, only about a dozen protesters showed up and argued against the growing number of day laborers on eastern Long Island.

Paul Streitz, who organized the demonstrations, said members believe illegal immigrants are taking jobs from citizens while driving down property values.

"This is not a racist thing," said Daniel Anastasia, 46, a construction worker from Westchester, N.Y. "We pay taxes, they don't. I get paid what the union says. The contractor pays them cash. It's not fair to me."

In Framingham, Mass., near Boston, a small group protesting illegal immigration was met by a much larger group of counter-demonstrators, some of whom surrounded them and temporarily disrupted the protest.

"What they are doing is just harassing people who are out here to go to work every day, and they're doing it in a hateful manner, which is against everything this country stands for," said Manuel Olivera, pastor of the nearby New Life Presbyterian Community Church.

In Danbury, Conn., about 50 people calling themselves the Connecticut Citizens for Immigration Control spent about two hours chanting and holding signs that read "Arrest Illegal Employers." Several dozen people held a counterprotest across the street.

DOJ_NMG_0008544

In Las Vegas, John Holiday, 43, and his son, Conner, 9, held signs near a convenience store where undocumented workers are picked up by employers. The boy, who held a sign that read "Our lawmakers encourage lawbreaking," said illegal immigration has divided the country.

"Do you think the problem will be over when I grow up?" Conner asked.

___

Associated Press writer Ken Ritter in Las Vegas contributed to this report.

Rallies Draw Dueling Protesters In Clashes Over Illegal Immigration (LAT)

By Rich Connell And David Haldane

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

Hundreds of protesters squared off in tense and boisterous confrontations Saturday at Southern California day laborer sites, as activists opposing illegal immigration stepped up a nationwide effort to cut off jobs for undocumented workers.

The protests pitted members of the Minuteman Project and similar groups that seek tighter borders against counter-demonstrators outside home improvement stores in Glendale, Lake Forest, Laguna Beach and Rancho Cucamonga. The demonstrations included drum thumping, shouting and dueling efforts to videotape the opposition.

But the protests were largely peaceful. A protester was arrested in Glendale on suspicion of misdemeanor assault after allegedly shoving an anti-illegal immigration organizer.

The National Day of Protest, planned by a coalition fighting illegal immigration, included demonstrations in several other states. It was the latest in a series aimed at cities that support day laborer hiring sites, as well as contractors, homeowners and others who hire undocumented workers.

In Glendale, at one of the largest protests, about 150 people carrying signs and banners lined the street outside a Home Depot.

The city helped create a day laborer hiring center next to the store where dozens of men, many of them undocumented, regularly gather looking for work.

"They're aiding and abetting … a crime," said Joseph Turner, executive director of Save Our State. The hiring center operates legally and is needed to address a community problem, city officials say.

Turner carried a large American flag and was accompanied by about 25 supporters. But his group was far outnumbered by opponents, some of whom loudly chanted, "Racists, go home."

"They want to kick whites out of our country," Turner said of some counter-protesters. "Millions of illegal aliens is not good for our society."

Members of the Mexica Movement, which contends that North America's indigenous people were robbed of their land and culture by 16th century immigrants from Europe, engaged in heated nose-to-nose exchanges with Turner and his supporters.

In south Orange County's Lake Forest, across the street from a Ganahl Lumber store where laborers look for work, protesters and counter-protesters in roughly equal numbers engaged in similar sidewalk debates.

"It's immoral to blame people of color" for economic problems, shouted Sharon Tipton of Trabuco Canyon, holding a sign featuring a swastika and the slogan "Heil Gilchrist." It was a reference to Jim Gilchrist, co-founder of the anti-illegal immigrant Minuteman Project. "That's what they did in Nazi Germany, blaming a particular group," she said.

A man who identified himself only as Kelly, and who said he was a Minuteman, shouted back: "The issue has nothing to do with race, but with following the law."

Deborah, an illegal immigration opponent who declined to give her last name because she said she feared reprisals, complained about the laborers who gather near the store.

"You can't walk by here without being harassed," she said, describing herself as a 42-year-old single mother. "I have to warn my kids to stay away."

In Laguna Beach, the two sides — one of which included Gilchrist — hurled a steady steam of insults and taunts at each other across Laguna Canyon Road.

DOJ_NMG_0008545

Gilchrist, surrounded by about 50 supporters, said the porous border "is an invitation to terrorists who would bring us harm. It's a matter of losing security and losing the rule of law as a governing mechanism. We are literally being invaded and colonized."

Gilchrist drew 25% of the vote last month in an Orange County congressional race, running under the banner of the American Independent Party.

Many day laborers were quiet and frustrated observers of the clashes.

"Hopefully, it will be over soon so we can go back to work," David Gonzalez, a father of two watching the Glendale protest from inside the hiring center, said in Spanish. "I don't understand a lot about politics, but I know we don't come here to hurt anyone."

He said employers "need us. We do the most difficult jobs."

The Silence In Herndon (WP)

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

MAYBE IT WAS just the holiday season. But in the three weeks since a day-laborer center opened in the town of Herndon -- the same center that elicited the wrath of anti-illegal-immigrant forces from coast to coast -- the main vibe coming from the town is . . . silence. True, three weeks is too brief a period to draw ironclad conclusions. But signs suggest that the center has brought calm to a situation previously marked by disorder.

It's important to remember how it was in Herndon: scores of day laborers milling about the parking lot of a 7-Eleven, jostling around the cars and pickup trucks of prospective employers -- a survival-of-the-fittest scrum masquerading as an employment bazaar. Because the site lacked any procedure to determine who would be picked for work, mayhem broke out sporadically as workers competed for jobs. In the absence of public toilets, some of them urinated outdoors. There were complaints of drunkenness, rowdy behavior and harassment of women.

At the new day-laborer center at a former police station about a mile from the 7-Eleven, 100 or so workers make their way early each morning, sign in and are issued lottery-style tickets. An orderly drawing of the tickets determines which workers get priority for the jobs available each day. A code of conduct, drawn up by the workers themselves, sets out 30 rules governing behavior and procedures. Disciplinary action, including banishment from the center, can be imposed for trespassing, drunkenness, drugs, weapons, theft, noise, trash, vandalism, sexual harassment, lack of cleanliness, fighting and disorderly conduct, among other sins. English lessons are planned. And the 7-Eleven? It's back to being just a convenience store, and its parking lot is now used only for parking.

Contrast that with the situation across the Potomac in Gaithersburg, where a burst of citizen opposition -- and bungling by local authorities -- has at least temporarily derailed plans for a similar center. That has left several dozen immigrant day workers to gather each day at the town's Grace United Methodist Church, where the arrival of prospective employers, and the lack of any established rules, sometimes provokes scenes reminiscent of the bad old days at Herndon's 7-Eleven. A Gaithersburg task force is studying what to do next and where to locate a proposed center. Most important, the task force is soliciting public input.

The real test for Herndon's new center will come in a few months, with the spring surge in demand for day labor. The center is surely not a panacea for Northern Virginia's dilemma of dealing with undocumented immigrants, nor has it eliminated all opposition. Even now, a handful of vigilantes calling themselves "Minutemen" arrive at the Herndon center each morning to take photographs and shoot video footage and otherwise harass the workers and employers there.

Still, the experience in Herndon, as well as in Silver Spring, Wheaton, Arlington and other places with established day-laborer shelters, suggests the obvious: Dedicated centers are far preferable to chaotic spectacles in the parking lots of convenience stores and churches. Many of the workers at the centers are illegal immigrants, whose swelling numbers attest to the federal failure to control the nation's borders and enact sensible laws. But it is equally true that there is enormous demand for low-wage workers in the Washington area's booming suburban labor markets. As long as that is the reality, day-laborer centers are a big improvement on the alternative.

Democrats Criticize Appointment At Immigration Agency (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008546

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 - Senate Democrats this week sharply criticized President Bush's decision to install Julie L. Myers, a White House official, as head of the nation's immigration enforcement agency despite concerns on the part of some about her qualifications for the job.

Ms. Myers, a 36-year-old lawyer, will be sworn in on Monday. She currently serves as the president's special assistant for personnel and previously worked as an assistant secretary at the Department of Commerce. She has never managed a large department or dealt extensively with immigration issues.

When Mr. Bush nominated Ms. Myers last year, Democratic and Republican senators raised concerns about her lack of experience, and her Senate confirmation appeared to be in doubt. Some critics said they feared that her political connections, rather than her qualifications, had driven the decision to select her to lead the bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, which has 15,000 employees and a budget of about $4 billion.

On Wednesday, Mr. Bush bypassed the Senate confirmation process and used his power of recess appointment to install Ms. Myers as director of the bureau, which is part of the Department of Homeland Security. The department's secretary, Michael Chertoff, praised Ms. Myers, saying that she possessed "the experience, judgment and determination" necessary for the job.

But some Senate Democrats said they were still concerned about her ability to manage the bureau. The agency has been beset by controversies, including accusations of mismanagement of its budget and questions about its effectiveness in enforcing immigration laws.

At the Department of Commerce, Ms. Myers supervised a unit of 170 employees.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut, said on Friday that Ms. Myers "really was not qualified for the position." Mr. Lieberman said Congress had intended the position to be held by someone with at least five years' management experience.

"In my opinion, she lacks the management background," he said. "And one of her key responsibilities is to enforce immigration laws, and she has virtually no immigration experience."

Daniel K. Akaka, Democrat of Hawaii, echoed those concerns. "The head of I.C.E. should be an individual who has demonstrated extensive executive-level leadership and the ability to manage a budget through reorganizations and budget cycles," Mr. Akaka said. "Ms. Myers has not demonstrated this ability."

Erin Healy, a spokeswoman for the White House, countered that Ms. Myers had "extensive law enforcement experience," noting that she had also served as chief of staff for the criminal division in the Justice Department and as a federal prosecutor in New York.

"She's tried criminal cases and worked with customs agents on everything from drug smuggling to money laundering," Ms. Healy said. "So to say that Julie does not have the prerequisite experience to lead I.C.E., it simply ignores her extensive background working with law enforcement, immigration and customs.

"This position has been vacant for far too long," Ms. Healy continued. "It's essential that the agency has the leadership it needs."

Mr. Bush nominated Ms. Myers for the position in June, but the decision first stirred a furor in September after Hurricane Katrina, as the administration faced criticism about the performance of Michael D. Brown, then the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Mr. Brown, a Republican without prior experience in managing disasters, was brought to Washington by a friend, Joe M. Allbaugh, his predecessor at FEMA.

Ms. Myers, who has held a variety of federal jobs over the last four years, drew attention because of her ties to the White House and some senior officials. She is a niece of Gen. Richard B. Myers, who recently stepped down as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the wife of John Wood, Mr. Chertoff's chief of staff.

Criticism of her nomination was not limited to the comments of Democrats. In September, National Review, an influential conservative publication, urged Mr. Bush to withdraw Ms. Myers's nomination. In an editorial, the magazine compared her to Mr. Brown and called her "another unqualified nominee for a vital position in the Department of Homeland Security."

"The president's supporters can look forward to serving in his administration, but certain key jobs ought to be reserved for candidates whose personal connections don't outweigh their professional qualifications," the editorial said.

DOJ_NMG_0008547

Russ Knocke, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, said that Ms. Myers's critics were ignoring her experience in pursuing financial, narcotics and weapons crimes, experience that he said would be critical to an agency that is increasingly focused on breaking sophisticated smuggling rings.

Several Senate Republicans also voiced support for Ms. Myers on Friday, though not without raising some concerns about her qualifications and the appointment process.

Senator George V. Voinovich, Republican of Ohio, who had raised sharp questions about Ms. Myers's qualifications in September, said on Friday that she was "intelligent and highly driven" with "the potential to be an effective leader."

"Though I would have preferred that Ms. Myers had more management experience," Mr. Voinovich said that "as a former mayor and governor, I feel strongly that managers should have the flexibility to hire their own team, and then be held accountable for the results."

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, has also praised Ms. Myers, saying that she "would bring experience and the confidence of Secretary Chertoff to this mission." But on Friday, Ms. Collins expressed concern about Mr. Bush's decision to bypass the Senate confirmation process.

"It was disappointing to her that the White House circumvented the normal nomination process," said Jen Burita, a spokeswoman for Ms. Collins.

TAX:

Bush Urges Congress To Save Tax Cuts (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 8, 2006

Boasting that the economy is strong and growing, President Bush urged Congress on Saturday to save tax cuts from expiring and adopt the first spending restraints in nearly a decade on such benefit programs as Medicaid, Medicare and student loans.

In his weekly radio address, Bush said the federal budget faces the challenge of long-term deficits driven by mandatory spending on those entitlement programs.

"We do not need to cut entitlements, but we do need to slow their growth," he said.

Before leaving for the holidays, the Republican-controlled Senate passed legislation to cut federal deficits by $39.7 billion. The measure passed by the narrowest of margins, 51-50, with Vice President Dick Cheney casting the deciding vote.

The legislation, the product of a year's labors by the White House and congressional Republicans, imposes the first restraints in nearly a decade in benefit programs.

"Congress needs to finish its work on this important bill," Bush said. "By passing the first reduction in the growth of entitlement spending in nearly a decade, Congress will send a clear signal that the people's representatives can be good stewards of the people's money."

The bill would take on, for the first time since 1997, the growth of federal benefit programs such as Medicaid, Medicare for the elderly and student loan subsidies.

It is part of a campaign by Republican leaders to burnish their party's budget-cutting credentials as they try to reduce a deficit swelled by spending on the Iraq war, Hurricane Katrina and an earlier round of tax cuts.

Opponents said the bill will hurt the middle class.

The GOP is advancing "an ideologically driven, extreme, radical budget," Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said after the bill passed. "It caters to lobbyists and an elite group of ultraconservative ideologues here in Washington, all at the expense of middle-class Americans."

In his broadcast, Bush also called on Congress to make permanent all the tax cuts passed at his urging earlier in his administration. Most are due to expire before or at the end of 2010.

With GOP leaders having had little success making the cuts permanent, the House and Senate are debating bills to extend some through the end of the decade.

DOJ_NMG_0008548

Democrats particularly oppose extending the lower rates for capital gains and dividends.

"Some people in Washington said these tax cuts would hurt the economy," Bush said. "The day the House voted for tax relief in May 2003, one Democratic leader declared it a 'reckless and irresponsible tax plan that will undermine opportunity in our country.'

"Since those words were spoken, our economy has added more than 4.6 million new jobs for the American people," Bush said.

The president was referring to a comment made by House minority leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., during a floor debate.

Bush Pressures Congress On Spending, Tax Cuts (REU-Y2)

By Steve Holland

Reuters, January 8, 2006

President George W. Bush pressed the U.S. Congress on Saturday to cut nearly $40 billion in spending and extend tax cuts, steps he said will help keep the U.S. economy on track.

"To keep our economy strong and secure the American Dream for future generations, leaders in Washington must make sound decisions," Bush said in his weekly radio address.

With Vice President Dick Cheney casting a tie-breaking vote in a hectic pre-holiday session, the U.S. Senate last month approved a bill that would cut spending on social welfare and other programs by $39.7 billion.

But small, last-minute changes pushed by Democrats mean the bill must go back to the U.S. House of Representatives for another vote, delaying final approval until late January or February.

"By passing the first reduction in the growth of entitlement spending in nearly a decade, Congress will send a clear signal that the people's representatives can be good stewards of the people's money," Bush said.

Democrats criticize Bush for seeking cuts in spending on programs that help poorer Americans, while seeking to extend tax cuts that they contend help mostly the rich.

At the same time, Bush is putting finishing touches on a new budget blueprint for fiscal 2007 starting October 1 that White House budget director Joshua Bolten has said will emphasize restraint.

Bush's Republicans and opposition Democrats disagree on the strength of the U.S. economy. The White House says economic growth is strong, job growth is steady and consumer confidence is up.

Democrats complain the average American is suffering from stagnant wages while costs for gasoline, health care and housing have have soared.

The two sides are divided over extending some of the tax cuts that Bush pushed through Congress in his first term, The White House disputes the Democrats' contention that the cuts unfairly favor the wealthiest Americans.

The Republican-controlled House voted last month to extend for two years 15 percent tax rates for capital gains and dividends and are set to expire in 2008.

But the battle over tax cuts is far from over and likely to be debated on the campaign trail during the 2006 midterm elections.

Bush said letting tax cuts expire would amount to a tax increase.

"Inaction by the Congress will mean a tax increase on the American people. When you hear people in Washington say we don't need to make the tax relief permanent, what they're really saying is they're going to raise your taxes," Bush said.

Democrats said Bush was ignoring signs the economy was not working for average Americans.

"It's obvious that at the start of this election year, the Bush economy is an albatross for the administration and Republicans in Congress," said Massachusetts Sen. Edward Kennedy. "People are anxious about their standard of living."

Hot Tubs And Cold Moralizing (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

"The taxing power of government must be used to provide revenues for legitimate government purposes. It must not be used to regulate the economy or bring about social change."

DOJ_NMG_0008549

-- President Ronald Reagan State of the Union Message Feb. 18, 1981

"(b) no portion of the proceeds of such issue is to be used to provide (including the provision of land for) any private or commercial golf course, country club, massage parlor, hot tub facility, sun-tan facility, racetrack or other facility used for gambling, or any store the principal business of which is the sale of alcoholic beverages for consumption off premises."

-- Title 26 Internal Revenue Code (tax exemption requirements for qualified redevelopment bonds)

Well, yes, certainly no massage parlors. Or hot tubs, of course; one shudders to think what happens in those. And tanning facilities, too, are the devil's playgrounds. As for racetracks, although state governments promoting their lotteries are America's most energetic advocates of gambling, government should err on the side of caution when protecting whatever this tax provision protects by frowning on racetracks, hot tubs and other things.

This peculiar wrinkle in the tax code, first approved the year after President Reagan said the tax code should not be used to leverage social change, makes certain projects ineligible to be financed by industrial redevelopment bonds that are subsidized by preferential tax treatment. This provision recently popped back into the news, thanks to Hurricane Katrina.

That ill wind blew some (barely) offshore casinos onto the shores of the Gulf Coast. As part of the plan to "rebuild," as the saying goes, the damaged coast, such bonds are going to be issued. But not promiscuously. Some legislators do not want tax-subsidized bonds to finance the rebuilding of casinos.

Not that the casinos need help: They are rebounding briskly, even expanding. Still, government has a sorry record of dispensing billions in corporate welfare for flourishing businesses.

It is mysterious why states or localities that want casinos operating nearby -- and providing jobs and tax revenue -- also want them afloat, a few feet from a riverbank or ocean shore. (Mississippi has just decided to let them come ashore.) Does the narrow band of water provide a prophylactic against sin? The communities already have weighed the sin against the jobs and revenue and found the sin congenial.

But such awkward questions arise when government begins moralizing, especially about the minutiae of life, such as hot tubs. Which brings us to Reagan's 1981 statement about inappropriate uses of the tax code.

He disliked government's using the code to conduct industrial policy, picking commercial winners and losers, which is a recipe for what is called "lemon socialism" -- tax subsidies for failing businesses that the market says should fail. Regarding the second part of Reagan's statement, any tax code is going to shape society. But he opposed manipulating the tax code to stigmatize this or that consumer preference. Which is what the code's anti-hot-tub provision does.

One wonders: Why did the social improvers who used the code to put the government, in its majesty, on record against hot tubs and tanning facilities not extend their list of disapproved choices? Their list looks morally lax.

Really stern social conservatives probably favor explicitly proscribing government assistance to lots of things, most of them somehow involving sex. Government could preen about being too moral to subsidize, with tax-preferred bonds, economic projects that include bookstores that sell Judy Blume novels, or hotels that offer in-room pornography. And wouldn't it be fun to find the words "lap dance" in the nation's tax code?

As strongly as social conservatives deplore commercialized sex, liberals deplore cigarettes, Big Macs, firearms, fur coats, SUVs, pornography not printed on recycled paper, pornographic movies produced by nonunion studios, holiday trees provocatively labeled "Christmas trees" and much more.

But do we really want to march down this road paved with moral pronouncements? When government uses subsidies to moralize, as with tax preferences for bonds that can be used to finance this but not that, government is speaking. It is expressing opinions about what is and is not wholesome. And once government starts venting such opinions, how does it stop?

Government could spare itself the stress of moralizing about so many things if it decided that the choices people make with their money is their, not its, business. And government could avoid having opinions about so many things if it would quit subsidizing so many things.

When, for example, the valuation and allocation of money through bonds is left to the market, government can be reticent. And reticent government sounds wonderful.

georgewill@washpost.com

DOJ_NMG_0008550

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Hearings A Test For Democrats And Alito (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 - The showdown begins Monday at high noon.

Even before Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. arrives on Capitol Hill for his Supreme Court confirmation hearings, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee appear lined up solidly against him. The big question is whether they will try to block the nomination by filibuster, and if so, which side will be left standing when the political dust settles.

For Judge Alito, the son of an Italian immigrant who grew up in the New Jersey suburbs with a dream of being a major league baseball pitcher, the hearings are a hurdle between him and an even bigger dream.

After months of meeting senators privately and staying mum before the press, the hearings will provide him with a forum to emerge from the shadow of the previous nominee, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

The hearings, expected to last four days or more, will also give Judge Alito his first opportunity to confront Democratic critics, who plan to spotlight the issue of domestic spying as much as abortion. How he answers their questions, on topics like his 1985 statement that the Constitution does not protect a right to abortion, will determine whether Democrats try to keep him from the job.

The Democrats, hoping to pick up seats in this year's midterm elections, have almost as much at stake as the nominee himself. They are under intense pressure from liberal advocacy groups to oppose Judge Alito, and they are acutely aware that if he is confirmed to succeed Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a critical swing vote, he could tilt American jurisprudence in a more conservative direction for decades.

Yet a filibuster would be risky business, and Democrats know it.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat and a member of the Judiciary Committee, said there was a consensus among Democrats that although "it's hard to block a nominee, blocking this nominee is a possibility." But Mr. Schumer said no decision would be made until the hearings were over.

"Because he has had some very strong statements, he is under an obligation to accept or refute those, and if he just tries to avoid them the assumption will be made that he still believes them. That puts him in a difficult position," Mr. Schumer said. "On the other hand, blocking a nominee is a big deal. So who knows? Everyone's waiting."

The hearings before the 18-member Judiciary Committee - 10 Republicans and 8 Democrats - will unfold against a political landscape that is vastly changed since last fall, when Chief Justice Roberts was confirmed by a Senate vote of 78 to 22.

Washington today is consumed with the revelation that President Bush authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on Americans, and the issue of domestic spying will be a prominent feature of the Alito hearings, perhaps as much so as abortion.

For Mr. Bush, who needs the kind of victory on Capitol Hill that an Alito confirmation could provide, the hearings may offer a welcome distraction from the troubles of the Republican Party, which has been buffeted by criticism over the economy, the war in Iraq, the domestic spying program, the Jack Abramoff scandal and, on Saturday, the decision by Representative Tom DeLay to step down permanently as House majority leader.

Norman Ornstein, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute who studies Congress, said Mr. Bush would benefit from a "sharp-edged ideological battle" over Judge Alito. "He wants something that rallies his base with more enthusiasm," Mr. Ornstein said.

And nothing rallies the bases of both parties like the issue of judges. For conservatives, who have fought for decades to curb what they regard as the liberal activism of the judiciary, the Alito nomination is a sweet reward. For liberals, it is terrifying.

Republicans, outside observers like Mr. Ornstein and even some Democrats say the odds are in favor of Judge Alito, unless he performs badly or a bombshell is dropped. Yet if history is any guide, there are no guarantees.

DOJ_NMG_0008551

"It's amazing how often the conventional wisdom in this town is wrong," said Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, a liberal advocacy group that led the opposition to the 1987 nomination of Robert Bork and is leading the opposition to Judge Alito. "Going into the Bork hearings, Bork was favored to win confirmation. He was decisively rejected, 58 to 42."

Though no Democrats have announced how they will vote, it is clear that Judge Alito will attract even less support from them than Judge Roberts did. On the Judiciary Committee, three Democrats - Senators Russell D. Feingold and Herb Kohl of Wisconsin and Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the panel's senior Democrat - voted to confirm Chief Justice Roberts.

In a recent interview, Mr. Leahy made clear that he was far less comfortable with Judge Alito.

"Judge Alito, who are you?" Senator Leahy said in mock conversation with the nominee, after explaining that he spent nearly three hours with Chief Justice Roberts before his hearings but had had only one brief meeting with Judge Alito. "You're going to be on there, taking the seat of the one person who has demonstrated that she's willing to be a swing vote. To what extent are you willing to show the same kind of independence?"

But the polls work in Judge Alito's favor; they have found that a majority of Americans support his confirmation. The midterm elections could also help his chances, because Democrats facing re-election in Republican-leaning states will be loath to oppose the nomination or join a filibuster. With 44 Democrats and one independent in the Senate, and 41 votes required to sustain a filibuster, the margins are slim.

At the same time, the Senate has already fought a filibuster battle. Last year, when Democrats were blocking some of President Bush's judicial nominees, the Republican leadership threatened to change Senate rules to bar filibusters of judges. Democrats, in turn, threatened to grind business to a halt. A meltdown was averted when a group of seven Democrats and seven Republicans signed a pact saying they would filibuster judicial nominees only under "extraordinary circumstances."

Republicans say they expect that pact to hold.

"I really have some doubts, now that everyone has backed away from the table and taken their guns away, whether there is sufficient support of a filibuster, particularly in light of this nominee and his qualifications," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas.

And even some Democrats argue privately that a filibuster fight would not be worth it. They say the party should focus on issues that resonate more strongly with voters. To that end, Democrats intend to use the Alito hearings to put a spotlight on domestic spying.

A string of Democratic senators, including Mr. Schumer, Mr. Leahy, Mr. Feingold and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, have signaled their intention to question Judge Alito on the spying issue. They will try to draw a link between the program and a 1984 memo in which Judge Alito, then a lawyer for the Reagan administration, argued that the attorney general should be immune from lawsuits for ordering wiretaps without a court order.

"There is no question that the question of executive powers in time of war, in the context of the terrorist threat, will be central to the Alito hearings," Mr. Feingold said, adding, "I would be surprised if it wasn't one of the most important topics."

On that score, Democrats will get a boost from the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, who intends to hold hearings on the domestic spying program and who intends to question Judge Alito about whether Congress should have been informed.

But Mr. Specter, an ardent supporter of abortion rights, said in an interview that the spying issue will be second on his agenda; as was the case with the Roberts hearings, the chairman will raise his first questions about abortion.

"I intend to begin the hearing with the question of his 1985 statement that the Constitution does not protect the right to abortion," Mr. Specter said, adding, "I think in the popular mind, the woman's right to choose is still the dominant issue."

Alito's Future Hinges On Past (HCHRON)

By PATTY REINERT

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008552

WASHINGTON - Since President Bush nominated Judge Samuel Alito to the U.S. Supreme Court in October, lawyers and journalists have pored over hundreds of his court decisions and thousands of pages from his work as a Reagan administration lawyer.

Activists have spent heavily on TV, radio and Internet ads opposing or supporting Alito to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Liberal groups petitioned senators last week to reject the nominee while Christian conservatives backing the judge gathered on Capitol Hill in prayer for him and to consecrate the Hart Senate Office Building room where his confirmation hearings will take place.

When Alito enters the room Monday, members of the Senate Judiciary Committee will greet him with promised civility — and a week's worth of intense questioning.

Alito's confirmation hearings are expected to be much more contentious than those held last fall for Chief Justice John Roberts, in part because more is at stake.

Roberts replaced a fellow conservative on the court, the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist. But Alito, a reliable conservative, could move the court dramatically to the right because he would succeed centrist O'Connor. She has been the court's most active swing voter, often siding with court liberals to provide the decisive vote on abortion rights, affirmative action, the death penalty and privacy.

No one is saying Alito's nomination is in any trouble. The American Bar Association has given the 55-year-old conservative appeals-court judge its highest rating, "well-qualified." The committee screening him is composed of 10 Republicans and eight Democrats, and Republicans dominate the full Senate, which will have the final say.

With 15 years on the federal bench, Alito is the most experienced judge to be nominated to the high court in decades. Supporters and colleagues praise his intellect, his careful legal reasoning and his allegiance to the law and to Supreme Court precedent.

"The portrait that is drawn of him by those who know him and know his writings is of a man of great intelligence, integrity, fairness, humility and justice," said Wendy Wright of the conservative group Concerned Women for America, which supports the nomination.

Even Alito's most strident detractors, including Seth Rosenthal of the liberal group Alliance for Justice, concede he has a brilliant legal mind and is technically well-qualified to do the job.

Regardless, Democrats have warned that they might delay a committee vote on Alito's confirmation or mount a filibuster to block a vote on the Senate floor. Their decision, they said, will depend on how forthcoming the nominee is during the hearings and how well he is able to explain his court rulings and a handful of 20-year-old memos on the volatile issues of abortion rights, voting rights and affirmative action.

"Many Democrats, and even some Republicans, and certainly a large number of the American people want to hear his views on these issues," said committee member Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "We don't want to see him duck."

Republicans and Democrats said they intend to grill Alito on those issues as well as on a key question that could quickly come before the high court: How much power should a president have in times of war?

The question, prompted in part by Bush's acknowledgment that he authorized spying on U.S. citizens without obtaining court warrants, is expected to dominate the hearings.

"The role of executive power is of enormous importance and consequence in this hearing," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., another Judiciary Committee member, and Alito's record shows he has given a "virtually unlimited green light to authorities."

"The question is: Is there any limit to executive authority and power that this nominee will recognize?" Kennedy said.

Tough questions expectedJudiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, a moderate Republican from Pennsylvania who supports abortion rights and has expressed outrage over the Bush administration's spying activities, has warned Alito to expect extensive questioning on those topics.

Alito, a Princeton- and Yale-educated lawyer who worked in the Reagan Justice Department before becoming a U.S. attorney in New Jersey and later a judge, has a long paper trail, giving senators plenty to ask about.

DOJ_NMG_0008553

Perhaps most troubling to members of both parties are Alito's Reagan-era writings, in which he expressed support for chipping away at, and eventually overturning, the Supreme Court's landmark ruling in Roe v. Wade, the 1973 case that legalized abortion nationwide.

In memos and a 1985 job application for a promotion within the Justice Department, Alito said he was particularly proud of his work on the abortion issue, as well as his efforts to limit affirmative action.

Later, as a federal appeals judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Alito said a Pennsylvania abortion law was valid even though it required women seeking abortion to first inform their husbands. He compared the law's spousal notification to parental notification in cases in which minors seek abortion. The Supreme Court threw out the spousal notification provision, with O'Connor writing that women should not be equated with minors and do not lose their constitutional rights because they marry.

Alito will be closely questioned on his Reagan-era writings on executive power, in which he embraced what he called the supremacy of the executive and legislative branches and criticized the judiciary's attempts to be a check on the presidency.

Alito urged then-President Reagan to include "signing statements" whenever he signed a bill into law, arguing that the president could use the documents to lay out his interpretation to counter the Congressional Record, which explains Congress' intentions.

Executive powerIn a 1986 memo, Alito wrote that the attorney general should be immune from prosecution for authorizing illegal wiretaps, a position that likely will draw many questions this week in the context of Bush's authorization of controversial wiretaps.

Since the 1950s, the Supreme Court has held that the Constitution's balance of powers among the three branches of government should not give way to the president's commander-in-chief powers, even in wartime. In the most recent case, in which the high court said detainees at a Navy prison camp in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, could challenge their detentions in federal courts, O'Connor wrote that "a state of war is not a blank check for the President."

Another issue could be voting rights. The young Alito, working in the U.S. Solicitor General's Office, said his interest in constitutional law was sparked, in part, by his disagreement with the Supreme Court's decisions on reapportionment, which established the principle of "one person, one vote."

Before those decisions, there was no requirement that every vote counted equally, and many state voting maps were drawn to give ballots cast by voters in one district more weight than voters in other parts of a state.

patty.reinert@chron.com

A Guide To The Hearings (MINNST)

By Eric Black

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 8, 2006

Here is a look at some of the legal issues and language likely to take center stage when the Senate Judiciary Committee starts questioning Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito on Monday.

The future of Roe

Roe vs. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court ruling that established a woman's right to choose whether to have an abortion is the 600-pound gorilla looming over Supreme Court nomination battles. Activists on both sides none too subtly seek evidence that a prospective justice will vote for or against the fundamental Roe ruling.

Alito will not provide the vote necessary to reverse Roe. But he may provide the fourth vote, leaving Roe opponents one vote short.

Two justices are out-of-the-closet Roe opponents. Chief Justice John Roberts left court-watchers in doubt about how he would vote. Alito will almost certainly try to likewise leave us in doubt. This may be tougher for him, because, in a 1985 letter seeking a promotion in the Reagan-era Justice Department, he stated flatly: "The Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion."

Lesser restrictions on abortion rights

Alito is widely expected to have an immediate impact on court rulings affecting restrictions on abortion rights.

DOJ_NMG_0008554

The current Supreme Court doctrine is that laws limiting abortions cannot place an "undue burden" on a woman's right to choose. The court has picked and chosen among potential restrictions, often on 5-4 decisions with the swing vote coming from Sandra Day O'Connor, whom Alito would replace.

For example, in 2000, O'Connor cast the fifth vote and wrote the opinion that struck down a Nebraska effort to ban the late-term abortion procedure that opponents call "partial-birth abortion."

Alito has, in some cases during his judicial career, been more sympathetic than O'Connor to abortion restrictions. In a 1991 dissent, he voted to uphold a Pennsylvania law requiring a woman to inform her husband before getting an abortion. The Supreme Court in 1992, with O'Connor opining that the husband notification requirement was an undue burden, struck down that requirement on a 5-4 vote.

In 2003, President Bush signed a law outlawing partial-birth abortion nationwide. The Supreme Court will consider a court challenge to it this term. If Alito has replaced O'Connor by the time that case is argued, it is widely predicted that the court will uphold the ban on the late-term procedure.

Church and state

An analysis of Alito's record on First Amendment cases shows strong support for religious expression and less concern for the wall between church and state.

"I expect that a Justice Alito would be a strong voice for religious liberty," said Prof. Michael Stoke Paulsen of the University of Minnesota Law School.

Paulsen, a conservative who has known Alito since 1984, said Alito "has vigorously defended the equal free speech rights of religious persons and groups and has resisted efforts to discriminate against them based on their religious identity or the religious content of what they have to say."

In one case, a New Jersey kindergartner wanted to put up a poster in the classroom on which he had drawn a picture of Jesus. As a first grader, the same child wanted to read to the class from a book of Bible stories. The school took down the poster and prevented the boy from reading the stories.

The majority of Alito's appellate court colleagues upheld the school's action. Alito dissented, arguing that the school was violating the boy's First Amendment freedom to express his religion.

"I do not see him striking down government displays of the Ten Commandments, as Justice O'Connor has done," Paulsen said.

Warrantless wiretaps

The controversy over the Bush administration's policy of eavesdropping on domestic conversations without a judge's approval in hopes of finding terrorists could spill into the Alito hearings.

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter has expressed alarm over the practice and seems likely to ask Alito whether he agrees with Bush that, in the context of the terrorism threat, a president's status as commander in chief provides constitutional authorization for warrantless wiretaps that would otherwise violate the Fourth Amendment.

Alito doesn't have much of a record on national security issues. As a judge, he has shown an overwhelming tendency to favor the powers of police and prosecutors against claims by defendants.

But as a government lawyer, Alito did write a 1984 memo arguing that government officials who order warrantless wiretaps in a terrorism-related case should be immune from lawsuits.

From Bork to Miers

The history of Supreme Court nominees appearing at Senate confirmation hearings is shorter than you might think. The practice became common only in the mid-1950s, and the history relevant to this week's hearing is even shorter.

The conventional wisdom is that Judge Robert Bork's 1987 hearing wrote the book on how to not to get confirmed. Bork was too feisty, outspoken, controversial and too clear about his opposition to Roe.

The 1990 nomination of David Souter taught conservatives a different lesson. Souter, who spent years as a state judge in New Hampshire, had said and written little about federal issues. Conservatives were encouraged to take it on faith that he would be a conservative justice.

He was confirmed with 90 votes. But Souter has become part of the court's liberal wing and is a solid Roe supporter.

DOJ_NMG_0008555

That precedent helps explain the conservative revolt against Bush's nomination of his longtime associate Harriet Miers. Because Miers had a scanty public record, many conservatives decided they needed more than a wink and nod, even from a conservative president.

Roberts got rave reviews and won easy confirmation. Some of his attributes seemed to be a humble, easygoing style, a solid résumé and a deft balance that left people who prefer different outcomes all thinking he might see things their way.

It's widely expected that Alito will try to display many of the same qualities, and that if he does, he will be confirmed fairly easily.

University of Minnesota Law Prof. David Stras, a former clerk for Justice Clarence Thomas, agrees that Alito will try to follow "the Roberts playbook" and will probably be confirmed. But Stras is bothered by how hearings have become empty exercises.

"Confirmation is turning into such a song and dance, post-Bork," he said. "You really learn nothing because there's this playbook that allows you to get confirmed by saying nothing."

In Alito Battle, Issues Of Presidential Power Thrust To Forefront (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Twenty years ago, a Reagan administration lawyer proposed that when the president signed a bill passed by Congress, he should use the occasion to declare how he interpreted it.

"The president's understanding of the bill should be just as important as that of Congress," wrote Samuel A. Alito Jr. in a 1986 memo. Spelling out those thoughts "would increase the power of the executive to shape the law," he added.

President Bush put that idea to work two weeks ago in a little-noticed statement that followed his signing of the muchcelebrated McCain amendment, which forbids cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment of prisoners here and abroad.

His words appeared to turn a legislative defeat into a White House victory. Bush said he would back the torture ban so long as it didn't conflict with his "constitutional authority" as commander in chief and his need to "protect the American people from further terrorist attacks."

Moreover, Bush asserted that the measure would preclude federal courts from hearing all claims of mistreatment from prisoners abroad, a point disputed by some Senate Democrats.

This week, as Alito goes before the Senate Judiciary Committee, it will be seen whether Bush's boldness in asserting powers of the presidency has complicated the confirmation prospects for his nominee to the Supreme Court. Along with abortion rights, executive power has moved to the forefront in the battle over Alito's confirmation.

Democrats are questioning whether the prospective justice could be trusted to enforce the rule of law when the president says he is not bound by it. Bush's lawyers assert the commander in chief has an "inherent authority" to act despite the law when he is seeking to defend the nation's security during wartime.

"Does he believe in any checks on presidential power?" asked Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) in previewing his questions. "Does he believe that warrantless wiretapping of Americans is constitutional?"

This surveillance issue was thrust onto the agenda last month when Bush acknowledged that he had authorized the National Security Agency, without seeking court permission, to intercept international phone calls or computer messages of people in the United States who had "known links" to terrorists abroad.

In 1978, Congress made it illegal for the government to conduct electronic surveillance in the U.S. without a judicial warrant. Bush's lawyers did not explain why the NSA did not seek warrants from the special court created to weigh such requests.

Some computer experts familiar with the NSA operations say they believe the agency is regularly scanning thousands of calls and messages. In that event, it would be impractical, perhaps impossible, for officials to obtain individual warrants.

The secret NSA wiretapping order is not the only time Bush has said he stands above Congress and the courts.

In 2002, Bush said he could order the military to arrest and indefinitely detain Americans who were "enemy combatants" without charging them with a crime or giving them a chance to assert their innocence.

DOJ_NMG_0008556

That same year, his lawyers said that as commander in chief, the president was free to order harsh treatment, even torture, to obtain crucial information from prisoners. This was so, they said, despite federal laws and U.S. treaties that prohibited the use of torture in all circumstances.

That White House position, along with widespread reports of abuse of terrorism suspects in U.S. military prisons, gave rise to the McCain amendment banning torture. Initially, the measure was strongly opposed by Bush, who decided to sign it after meeting with McCain and in the face of overwhelming support by Congress.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said Alito would be quizzed about Bush's apparent willingness to defy Congress even as he signed the McCain amendment into law.

"The president goes ahead and signs it, and then says he retains the inherent power to go out and torture just like before," Kennedy said. "It reflects an arrogance of power and a contemptuous attitude toward Congress."

For his part, McCain issued a terse statement saying the new law did not include "a presidential waiver on the restrictions" against torture and inhumane treatment. "We believe the president understands Congress' intent," said McCain and Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee. "Our committee intends through strict oversight to monitor the administration's implementation of the law."

Though Alito will be caught up in the dispute over the NSA wiretapping and the McCain amendment, it is not clear whether he shares the view that the president has a nearly unchecked power to protect national security.

For the last 15 years, Alito has been a judge on the U.S. 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia. That court does not get many cases that test the limits of the president's power.

A revealing statement came in November 2000 when Alito spoke at a Federalist Society meeting, reflecting on his time in the Reagan administration.

"We were strong proponents of the theory of the unitary executive, that all federal executive power is vested by the Constitution in the president," Alito said. "And I thought then, and I still think, that this theory best captures the meaning of the Constitution's text and structure."

In a sense, the "unitary executive" theory states the obvious. There is only one president. But many of its Reagan-era proponents applied this theory to say independent government agencies were unconstitutional because they were not under the direct control of the president.

Since the New Deal of the 1930s, Congress has created such independent agencies to regulate certain industries. The agencies include the Securities and Exchange Commission, which regulates the stock market; the Federal Communications Commission, which regulates broadcasters and the telecommunications industry; and the Federal Election Commission, which regulates campaigns. The most influential independent body may be the Federal Reserve Board, which regulates banking and the money supply.

Alito did not say whether he believes such independent agencies violate the Constitution, but senators say they intend to ask him about how he would apply the unitary executive theory.

Neil Kinkopf, a law professor at Georgia State University in Atlanta who served in the Clinton administration, said he hoped the senators would ask Alito about the president's power to shape the law through the use of bill-signing statements.

Kinkopf described Bush's statement on the McCain amendment as "cryptic, but ominous. It threatens our basic constitutional structure if the executive can make the law in the guise of executing the law," he said.

But Alito's supporters say it is unfair to link his Reagan-era memos to the current controversies.

"In every administration — Democratic and Republican — the lawyers believe in a robust understanding of the president's powers," said Charles J. Cooper, who recruited Alito in 1986 to be his deputy director to his legal staff under Atty. Gen. Edwin M. Meese III. "That doesn't begin to answer the legal separation-of-powers question he would face as a justice. And his habit of mind is to be careful, neutral and very balanced."

Another big issue probably facing Alito at this week's hearings is abortion.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the Judiciary Committee chairman, is a supporter of abortion rights, and he said he was troubled to learn in November that Alito had voiced strong opposition to Roe vs. Wade, the ruling that legalized abortion nationwide.

DOJ_NMG_0008557

In 1985, Alito filed a job application with the Reagan White House in which he said he was "particularly proud" of the role he had played in the administration's effort to persuade the Supreme Court "that the Constitution does not protect a right to abortion."

This forthright statement will make it hard for Alito to avoid discussing his views on abortion. In September, then-nominee John G. Roberts Jr. steered around the topic by asserting that he was simply a lawyer representing his client when he served in the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations.

By contrast, Alito's memo made clear that he agreed with the Reagan administration's public position that Roe vs. Wade should be overruled.

That effort to overturn the ruling ultimately fell short by one vote when two Reagan appointees — Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Anthony M. Kennedy — joined a 5-4 majority to affirm the abortion right in 1992.

If confirmed, Alito would succeed O'Connor.

CAP Critic Dropped From Alito Witness List (DP)

By Mark Stefanski

Daily Princetonia, January 8, 2006

An alumnus tapped by Democrats to testify in next week's Senate hearings on Samuel Alito '72 will no longer appear, removing the only witness slated to speak specifically about a controversial conservative alumni group of which Alito was a member.

Stephen Dujack '76, an environmental writer, had been outspoken in his condemnation of the group, Concerned Alumni of Princeton, which during the 1970s criticized the University's move to coeducation and adoption of affirmative action. Opponents of Alito's nomination to the Supreme Court had seized on his membership in the group to show that he is out-of-step with mainstream America on core issues.

Though it wasn't immediately clear why Dujack was removed from the Democrats' witness list, some observers believe he was vulnerable to attacks over an April 2003 Los Angeles Times column he wrote that compared animals killed in slaughterhouses with victims of the Holocaust.

On Friday, the office of Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), a strong Alito backer, circulated copies of the column. By that evening, Dujack's name had been removed from a full list of witnesses released by the judiciary committee.

The column has not been specifically cited as the reason for Dujack's removal from the witness list, and he said he still plans to submit written testimony about the alumni group to the judiciary committee to tell senators "how awful this organization was."

"I'm going to want to explain why those of us who know the organization can be filled with revulsion at hearing that a person who was selected to go our nation's high court was proud of his membership in that organization," Dujack said in an email.

Politics professor and prominent conservative constitutional scholar Robert George described Dujack as "an example of a witness Republicans would be able to beat up pretty badly."

"I noticed conservative websites were just salivating because [Dujack] just seemed like such an obvious target," George said. "They could use him to say, 'Look these people against Alito are just these extreme people on the left.' "

Spokesmen for senior senators on the judiciary committee could not be reached for comment.

Dujack said in an email interview that the column has since brought him great grief and that he was only trying to defend something his late grandfather, Nobel laureate Isaac Bashevis Singer, had said about animal rights. Singer was a vegetarian and an advisory board member of a group called "Concern for Helping Animals in Israel."

"I haven't read any of the critiques thus far that mention my grandfather or anything about all of that stuff — just this short sound-bite stuff," Dujack said.

He added, "I regret very much having written that article. It's caused so much pain to people that I didn't intend to, so many who suffered like my family and worse ... That's the only thing I've written that I wish I could pull back. We all make mistakes sometimes."

DOJ_NMG_0008558

Dujack has been replaced by two speakers who will discuss other topics, leaving nobody to speak about the alumni group, which has caused a storm of controversy since a 1985 application for a job at the Justice Department listing Alito's membership in the group was released in November.

But Dujack and other opponents believe that his CAP membership will still be an issue. "The issue is 'in play,' which was all that I had tried to accomplish when I set out — and I seem to have succeeded," Dujack said.

Judith Schaeffer '74, deputy legal director for People for the American Way, a liberal advocacy group that opposes Alito's confirmation, agreed that the issue will not soon disappear.

"It shouldn't at all," she said. "What [Dujack's] had to say is there and in writing. It's not just him, but the record is demonstrable."

This latest development follows a string of criticisms and questions from the press and Democrats about Alito and CAP, which was founded in 1972 and had become largely defunct by 1987.

Two weeks ago, Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.), a judiciary committee member who has described CAP as "anti-black" and "anti-women," asked committee chairman Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pen.) to make a formal request for access to the archives of one of CAP's founders, hoping to learn more about Alito's involvement in the group. (See full story.)

On Friday, the Drudge Report citied anonymous Senate Democratic aides as saying that tying Alito to CAP was a Democratic strategy to derail his nomination. The report said the aides would make mention of racist comments in Prospect, the alumni group's magazine, and that it didn't matter that Alito had no part in writing them or any connection to them.

Drudge also reported that "Alito will testify that he joined CAP as a protest over Princeton policy that would not allow the ROTC on campus," but did not cite a source.

Opinion pieces in The New York Times and The Washington Post this weekend, including one by Kennedy, again make mention of CAP to raise questions about Alito's nomination.

Arguing that the Senate should "explore Judge Alito's honesty" because of suggestions that "he will bend the truth when it suits his purposes," an editorial in Sunday's New York Times said: "Judge Alito has said he does not recall being in an ultraconservative group called Concerned Alumni of Princeton, which opposed coeducation and affirmative action. That is odd, since he boasted of his membership in that same 1985 job application."

Trying to rebuff concerns about his involvement with CAP, Alito said in a statement last month to the judiciary committee that despite his Justice Department job application, "I have no recollection of being a member, of attending meetings, or otherwise participating in the activities of the group."

Supporters of CAP say the group was dedicated to increasing alumni involvement in University governance and tempering Nassau Hall's left-wing tendencies.

Fox News analyst and former New Jersey superior court judge Andrew Napolitano '72, a former CAP board member, said last month that he has "zero recollection" of Alito participating in the group. "His recollection and mine — which is that there's no recollection of him attending any of this stuff — are the same," Napolitano said.

Supporters of Alito's nomination inside and outside of the Senate have praised his intelligence and experience, among other factors. The nonpartisan American Bar Association this week gave Alito a unanimous "well qualified" rating.

"The President has selected a man with impeccable qualifications to serve on the Supreme Court," Cornyn has said previously of the nomination. "Judge Alito has served as a federal court of appeals judge for the last 15 years — giving him more judicial experience than any Supreme Court nominee in more than 70 years."

Dujack, a former associate editor at the Princeton Alumni Weekly, has publicly written about CAP in The Daily Princetonian and the Newark Star-Ledger since news of Alito's nomination.

In a Nov. 22 op-ed for The Daily Princetonian, he wrote that Alito "will have to explain how he permitted himself to belong to an organization that was overtly racist and sexist for its entire 14-year existence — at times passionately so, too." (See full story.)

Dujack is scheduled to speak on campus Jan. 13 at an event sponsored by the College Democrats.

Alito Advocacy Fills Air Of Swing States (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

DOJ_NMG_0008559

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

Three days before Thanksgiving, a trio of former law clerks to Samuel A. Alito Jr. did a "fly-in" to Portland, Maine, to tout the Supreme Court nominee in a strategy organized by the conservative group Progress for America. Two weeks later, a minivan filled with Mainers who oppose Alito traveled the coast from Bar Harbor to Kittery, gathering petition signatures as part of a "Rolling Justice Tour" coordinated by a coalition of left-leaning national groups.

Maine's newspapers have carried dozens of letters to the editor about the nomination, the result of choreographed media campaigns. And this weekend, the last before Alito's Senate confirmation hearing begins tomorrow, the state's television stations are airing ads paid for by Washington-based organizations that portray Alito as a "man of honor, integrity, principle" -- or, alternately, as part of a dangerous right-wing takeover of the Supreme Court.

With two moderate Republican senators who support abortion rights -- senators whose views of this nominee, in other words, are especially uncertain -- Maine is one of several states that the dueling forces in the debate over Alito have targeted for what Brookings Institution scholar Thomas E. Mann calls an artificial grass-roots -- or "Astroturf" -- campaign.

On both sides, organizations based in the nation's capital are pouring money, manpower and advocacy expertise into these states, trying to stir up authentic passions among constituents who might influence Senate votes.

"We don't fire the guns. We are just positioning them," said Chris Myers, executive director of Progress for America, which is spending $100,000 for several days of ads in Maine as well as in Louisiana and North Dakota, two other swing states. As part of the indirect strategy of mobilizing local opinion leaders, the group has enlisted in Maine a popular radio talk show host, a longtime local lawyer and the campaign treasurer of the senior senator, Olympia J. Snowe (R).

Local groups for or against Alito have been created in many states. In addition to Maine, much of the advocacy is being aimed at moderate Republicans including Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (Pa.) and Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.), as well as Democrats from relatively conservative states, including Mary Landrieu (La.), Ken Salazar (Colo.), Bill Nelson (Fla.), Blanche Lincoln and Mark Pryor of Arkansas, and Kent Conrad and Byron L. Dorgan of North Dakota.

Whether the funds and energy national organizations are investing in the Alito debate will prove effective is unclear. Traditionally, public attention on Supreme Court nominations crests once a confirmation hearing begins.

On the eve of Alito's hearing, the intense advocacy efforts in Maine so far are not "having much impact at all," according to Steve Abbott, chief of staff to Sen. Susan Collins (R). "I don't hear the chatter, when I go out to eat, when I go to the gym," said Abbott, who lives in Portland and commutes to work on Capitol Hill. As television ads have proliferated in the days before Alito's hearing, Collins has been out of earshot on a trip to Antarctica.

In part, the campaigns for and against Alito are getting muffled because Maine, like other swing states in inexpensive media markets, is saturated with advocacy. "One week, it's ANWR [Alaskan oil-drilling] up here, the next week it's prescription drugs. Everything that comes up, the groups take to the airways in Maine," Abbott said. "We've reached the point it's just turned to clutter."

This winter, the future of the Supreme Court is a back-seat issue in Maine, according to several state politics-watchers who say residents are more focused on the immediate problems of high fuel oil prices and possible electricity shortages.

"The reality is, there are people who are on the far sides of the debate who are using this nomination as a battle over a whole host of issues and a lot of sort of tangential issues," said Richard A. Bennett, a former state Senate president who is treasurer of Snowe's reelection campaign this year and has been speaking out on Alito's behalf. "I really doubt that most ordinary citizens in Maine -- certainly the ones I've spoken to -- I really doubt they are being really attentive right now."

Senators, meanwhile, bristle at the suggestion that their vote can be influenced by Washington-directed issue campaigns. "As far as I am concerned, they are wasting their money," Conrad said.

Snowe and Collins pride themselves on being heirs to a long independent streak in their state's politics, unswayable by interest groups, said Christian P. Potholm, a professor of government at Bowdoin College. "For the two Maine senators, both sides would be better off if they just took the money and threw it into the Potomac River," Potholm said. "The advocacy groups don't care, but it's likely to be counterproductive."

Leaders of the most visible such groups dispute the sentiment that their efforts may prove ineffective.

DOJ_NMG_0008560

Starting with the failed nomination of Robert H. Bork in 1987, interest groups have applied campaign-style techniques to Supreme Court confirmations, and both sides had been waiting more than a decade to release their pent-up forces. No vacancy on the court had materialized for 11 years until last summer's nomination of John G. Roberts Jr., now the chief justice.

"This is a splendid example of shoe-leather democracy," said Ralph G. Neas, president of the liberal group People for the American Way, who has worked on every Supreme Court confirmation debate for three decades.

Neas said a coalition of about 70 groups opposing Alito has accomplished important steps in the pre-hearing phase. He said the coalition has defined the issues in the nomination, encouraged senators to remain undecided until the hearing, and raised money -- in addition to mobilizing its base.

In Maine, the scores of people who signed anti-Alito petitions along the route of the Rolling Justice tour included many who knew of the project because they already were on e-mail lists of MoveOn.org.

"I travel in a very politically engaged circle of people, and I think that people are very concerned" about his nomination, said Susan Dorr, a real estate broker who is a former state legislator and town selectman in Camden. She said she was one of about a dozen people who turned out when the tour passed through there.

Mike Duddy, a Portland lawyer and co-chairman of Mainers for Judge Alito, said that he offered to work with national groups, believing, "if there is not some presence on the ground to keep a level-headed voice, the opponents would completely occupy what would otherwise be a vacuum."

So far, he has been taking reporters' calls or appearing on talk radio perhaps once a week, but he has not attended any large pro-Alito events. "From my point of view . . . the level of interest seems to be muted," Duddy said. "I don't think it's completely ignored. Neither do I think it's the first thing people are thinking about."

Among Evangelicals, A Kinship With Jews (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

DANVILLE, Va. -- Everyone who worships at the Tabernacle quickly learns three facts about its deeply conservative pastor. He comes from a broken home. He rides a canary-yellow Harley. And he loves the Jews.

There is some murmuring about the motorcycle. But the 2,500 members of this Bible-believing, tradition-respecting Southern Baptist church in southern Virginia have embraced everything else about the Rev. Lamarr Mooneyham.

Out of his painful childhood experiences, Mooneyham, 57, preaches passionately about the importance of home. Out of his reading of the Bible, he preaches with equal passion about God's continuing devotion to the Jewish people.

"I feel jealous sometimes. This term that keeps coming up in the Old Book -- the Chosen, the Chosen," says the minister, who has made three trips to Israel and named his sons Isaac, Jacob and Joseph. "I'm a pardoned gentile, but I'm not one of the Chosen People. They're the apple of his eye."

Scholars of religion call this worldview "philo-Semitism," the opposite of anti-Semitism. It is a burgeoning phenomenon in evangelical Christian churches across the country, a hot topic in Jewish historical studies and a wellspring of support for Israel.

Yet many Jews are nervous about evangelicals' intentions. In recent weeks, leaders of three of the nation's largest Jewish groups -- the Anti-Defamation League, the American Jewish Committee and the Union for Reform Judaism -- have decried what they see as a mounting threat to the separation of church and state from evangelicals emboldened by the belief that they have an ally in the White House and an opportunity to shift the Supreme Court.

"Make no mistake: We are facing an emerging Christian right leadership that intends to 'Christianize' all aspects of American life, from the halls of government to the libraries, to the movies, to recording studios, to the playing fields and locker rooms . . . from the military to SpongeBob SquarePants," the ADL's national director, Abraham H. Foxman, said in a Nov. 3 speech.

Julie Galambush, a former American Baptist minister who converted to Judaism 11 years ago, has seen both sides of the divide. She said many Jews suspect that evangelicals' support for Israel is rooted in a belief that the return of Jews to the promised land will trigger the Second Coming of Jesus, the battle of Armageddon and mass conversion.

DOJ_NMG_0008561

"That hope is felt and expressed by Christians as a kind, benevolent hope," said Galambush, author of "The Reluctant Parting," a new book on the Jewish roots of Christianity. "But believing that someday Jews will stop being Jews and become Christians is still a form of hoping that someday there will be no more Jews."

The result is a paradox -- warming evangelical attitudes toward Jews at a time of rising Jewish concern about evangelicals -- that could be a turning point in the uneasy alliance between Jewish and Christian groups that ardently back Israel but disagree on much else.

The Rev. Donald E. Wildmon, chairman of the evangelical American Family Association, warned in a Dec. 5 radio broadcast that Foxman was "in a bind" because the "strongest supporters Israel has are members of the religious right -- the people he's fighting."

"The more he says that 'you people are destroying this country,' you know, some people are going to begin to get fed up with this and say, 'Well, all right then. If that's the way you feel, then we just won't support Israel anymore,' " Wildmon said.

Philo-Semitism is far from universal among the 60 million to 90 million U.S. adults who identify themselves as born-again or evangelical Christians. But it has strong roots, not only in the Hebrew scriptures shared by both faiths but also in the belief that today's Jews and Christians have common antagonists, such as secularism, consumerism and militant Islam.

In his sermons, Mooneyham returns again and again to God's promise to Abraham in Genesis 12: "I will bless those who bless you, and curse him who curses you."

It is a theme echoed in many conversations at the Tabernacle, a plain red-brick church in a community that has seen one factory after another close, yet where the congregation made a Christmas offering of $25,000 to help pay for the immigration of Russian Jews to Israel.

"I believe everyone in this church felt it was the best thing we've ever done with missionary money, to help the Jewish people go home," said Dorothy Pawlowski, 72, who tithes to the church.

And it is a message being passed to the next generation. On Thursday nights, J.J. Vogltanz, a deacon, uses a Christian textbook to lead his three home-schooled children in science experiments designed to illustrate Bible verses. One of the first things he taught them about Jesus, he said, was that "he was a Jew."

Asked whether he also taught his children that the Jews rejected Jesus, Vogltanz, 34, paused. "I'm not sure it's constructive to assign blame," he said.

Mark A. Noll, a professor of Christian thought at Wheaton College, a center of evangelical scholarship in Illinois, said evangelicals are beginning to move away from supersessionism -- the centuries-old belief that with the coming of Jesus, God ended his covenant with the Jews and transferred it to the Christian church.

Since the 1960s, the Roman Catholic Church and some Protestant denominations have renounced supersessionism and stressed their belief that the covenant between God and the Jewish people remains in effect.

Evangelicals generally have not taken that step, but "among what you might call the evangelical intelligentsia, questions of supersessionism have come onto the table," Noll said. "It's in play among evangelicals in the way that it was in mainline Protestantism and Catholicism -- but wasn't among evangelicals -- 30 or 40 years ago."

At Fuller Theological Seminary, an evangelical training ground in Pasadena, Calif., President Richard J. Mouw hosted a kosher breakfast for 20 rabbis a week before Christmas. "More and more, we're inviting Jews as guest lecturers," Mouw said. "We're looking at rabbinic literature and how we can better understand the Bible through rabbinic eyes. That's a real push for us."

Jacques Berlinerblau, a visiting professor of Jewish civilization at Georgetown University, said the rise of philo-Semitism in the United States has led Jewish scholars to look back at previous periods of philo-Semitism, such as in Amsterdam in the mid-17th century. He said revisionists are increasingly challenging the standard "lachrymose version" of Jewish history, questioning whether persecution has been the norm and tolerance the exception, or vice versa.

Still, some Jews think that philo-Semitism is just the flip side of anti-Semitism.

"Both are Semitisms: That is, both install the Jews at the center of history. One regards this centrality positively, the other regards it negatively. But both are forms of obsession about the Jews," said Leon Wieseltier, a Jewish scholar and literary editor of the New Republic.

DOJ_NMG_0008562

The Southern Baptist Convention, to which the Tabernacle belongs, passed a resolution in 1867 calling on its members to convert Jews and renewed that call as recently as 1996. Its former president, Bailey Smith, declared in 1980 that "God Almighty does not hear the prayer of a Jew," and it currently supports about 15 congregations of messianic Jews, who are popularly associated with the organization Jews for Jesus.

So Mooneyham has a ready answer for Jews who doubt his motives: "I think they have a right to be suspicious of just about everybody, given the history."

He also has a personal story. The pivotal moment of Mooneyham's childhood came at age 7 when his parents, in the middle of a divorce, took him and his three sisters to a church parking lot in Burlington, N.C., and parceled them out to relatives for a few weeks. Those few weeks turned into years. The family never came together again.

Nearly 45 years later, the pastor was watching television before a Sunday morning church service when he came upon an infomercial by Rabbi Yechiel Z. Eckstein, founder of a group called the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews. Eckstein was standing in Israel with an elderly woman from Russia who said she was finally home.

"She started crying, he started crying, and I started crying," Mooneyham said. "Then I said, 'Lord, help me, because I'm really going to throw my congregation a curveball today. We're going to help Jews -- we're not going to witness to them, we're just going to help them. Because I know what home means.' "

Since that day five years ago, according to Eckstein, the Tabernacle has sent more than $175,000 to the fellowship, which has a donor base of 400,000 Christians and has contributed more than $100 million to Israeli causes.

"I can only say that what we've done should speak for itself, because we've given and we've asked nothing in return," Mooneyham said. "And that's the way it will stay."

A Search For Order, An Answer In The Law (WP)

By Dale Russakoff And Jo Becker

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

It was May 3, 1971, the crest of the antiwar movement, and Washington was clogged with thousands of denim-and-fatigues-clad protesters demanding an end to the Vietnam War. Blocks from the Capitol, but far from the action, a handful of Princeton University undergraduates in sport coats found themselves in the wood-paneled chambers of Justice John M. Harlan.

Most saw the visit as a detour from their real purpose: to meet generals, lawmakers and diplomats and debate the justness of the war. One young man even dozed off.

But not Samuel A. Alito Jr. Harlan was the one person he wanted to meet when Princeton's politics society arranged the trip. Now the clean-cut young man with dark-rimmed glasses was transfixed by the justice whose dissents from landmark liberal rulings of the Supreme Court had become his guideposts.

"The rest of us didn't grasp Harlan's significance," said George Pieler, then president of the politics society. "The only reason I did was that Sam had told me."

Years later, Alito would write that his distress over the court's liberal activism under Chief Justice Earl Warren in the 1960s had propelled him to study constitutional law. Along the way, he would embrace Harlan's view that the court was usurping power that the Constitution had reserved for lawmakers.

At the time of the visit, this vision was hardly in vogue. After all, it was the Warren Court that had stepped in when legislators would not and declared segregated schools unconstitutional.

But Alito was not one to be swayed by fashion. As protest movements shook the world around him in the 1960s and 1970s, he held fast to the respect for authority he learned growing up in a New Jersey suburb in the 1950s.

Like many conservatives of his generation, Alito was inspired by the presidential campaign of Sen. Barry M. Goldwater (R-Ariz.), stimulated by William F. Buckley Jr.'s National Review, alarmed by the discord over the war in Vietnam and disenchanted with the liberal bias of college campuses.

But rather than turn to activism, he found in the study of law a framework for what troubled him. The early years of his journey were deeply private and intellectual. But he later found company, particularly in the Reagan Justice Department, incubator of scores of leading conservative legal practitioners, including Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0008563

In articles today and tomorrow, The Washington Post will explore the forces, people and ideas that helped shape Alito and hastened his rise in the law. The articles are based on Alito's writings, government documents and more than 100 interviews, including the first extensive one with his family. Like other Supreme Court nominees, Alito did not comment.

The Senate confirmation hearings that begin tomorrow on President Bush's nomination of Alito to the seat of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor represent a milestone not only for him but also for the conservative movement that grew up as he did.Like Father, Like Son

He was born at mid-century to Italian Americans from the proud, immigrant enclave of Chambersburg in Trenton, N.J.

"When the first baby came, I said, 'Sam, our children are going to be the smartest children in Hamilton Township,' " Rose Alito, now 91, recalled in an interview at the two-story, red-brick home in the Trenton suburb where she and Samuel Alito Sr. raised a Supreme Court nominee.

From the beginning, she said, the boy took after his father, a scholarly and reserved man who directed New Jersey's nonpartisan Office of Legislative Services. Perennially pipe-puffing, with thick white hair that gave him a look of distinction, the elder Alito spoke reverentially of the importance of exhaustive, bias-free research in the making of law.

"It was never about what he felt; it was what the law was," recalled former New Jersey governor Thomas H. Kean (R).

The father ingrained exacting standards in his children. "My father would assist us in learning how to write well," said Rosemary Alito, the nominee's sister. "He'd say, 'No, this is wrong, this is wrong, this is wrong. Go write it again.' And I'd go write it again. And he'd look at it again. And he'd review it and give me corrections until he'd find it to be perfect."

The elder Alito was tight-lipped about his own leanings. Some published reports have said he was a Republican; others, a Democrat. Co-workers said he joked that he was "a political eunuch." Asked for the real story, Rose Alito -- a Republican who was a Democrat until 1987 -- and Rosemary Alito, a Republican and a leading employment lawyer, looked blankly at each other, answering with shrugs.

Alito Senior, whose death in 1987 left his son too distraught to deliver a eulogy, had always vacuumed up knowledge. Before working for the legislature, he taught ancient history, physics, math and English at Trenton Central High and had scored so high on an Army aptitude test it raised suspicions of cheating. Similarly, the younger Alito was so far ahead of peers at Hamilton-East Steinert High School that he skewed the grade curve. And, like his father, he kept a lot to himself.

"He was always listening to students' comments, my comments -- analyzing, evaluating, but silently. Kind of inscrutable at times," said Elaine Tarr, his 10th-grade English teacher.

Classmates still speak of his unusual blend of braininess, modesty and quietly hilarious wit. He played baseball, was a star debater, edited the school paper and was elected student council president with an uncharacteristically wacky campaign using posters of women having their hair colored and the slogan "I'll just DYE if Sam isn't elected. Alito for President."

Behind the gentle demeanor was a boy bent on winning. "Oh yes, very competitive!" said his mother. His rivalry with a champion debater at Trenton Central High named Jeffrey Laurenti was so fierce that Alito would not say his opponent's full name -- a relationship highlighted by the caption beside Alito's yearbook photograph: "Jeffrey Who?"

Friends and family members say Alito embraced the respect for authority that was ubiquitous in the 1950s from home to school to Our Lady of Sorrows Catholic Church. Asked if he ever rebelled, Rosemary Alito exclaimed, "Oh my goodness, he never did anything rebellious at all!"

His middle school Latin teacher, Grace Bolge, said she saw in his passion for that language a love of order and rules. "He liked structure and rigidity," she said. "I think that's why he liked debate. It was timed, it was regulated, there were rules for when you could speak and how you spoke."

The order that defined Alito's early years began to give way in the 1960s. Rose Alito does not remember her reaction as the Second Vatican Council loosened the top-down authority of the Roman Catholic Church. But she made clear her displeasure at another change in religious practice: the 1963 Supreme Court decision banning public school Bible reading and prayer, which began Alito's school days through sixth grade.

"I was teaching then, and it used to irk me," she said. "I read poems that had something to do with the atmosphere and the trees when we were not permitted to read the Bible."

As a federal appellate judge, Alito would repeatedly rule for more religious expression in public spheres.

DOJ_NMG_0008564

In 1964, the Supreme Court transformed the legislature that Sam Alito Sr. served, ruling in Reynolds v. Sims that the Constitution required individual legislative districts to have essentially equal numbers of voters -- one man, one vote. The opinion prompted a dissent from Harlan that, according to a friend and former colleague Douglas W. Kmiec, is one of the nominee's favorites.

"The Constitution is not a panacea for every blot upon the public welfare, nor should this Court, ordained as a judicial body, be thought of as a general haven for reform movements," Harlan wrote. "This Court . . . does not serve its high purpose when it exceeds its authority, even to satisfy justified impatience with the political process."

The elder Alito became the New Jersey legislature's redistricting expert, drawing district lines that shifted power from sparsely populated rural counties to cities and suburbs. In the process, the state Senate turned Democratic for the first time in 52 years. As always, Alito Senior expressed no opinion of the result.

At about this time, politics and government became a fascination for his son, and, according to a job application to the Reagan administration, he was impressed by Goldwater's 1964 presidential campaign, a crusade against communism and Washington's dictates to the states in areas including civil rights and public school prayer. Alito became a regular viewer of Buckley's "Firing Line" television program.

Fellow high school debater James Castranova remembers Alito speaking with enthusiasm about reading Buckley's National Review, the opinion journal credited with helping to launch the modern conservative movement. He also recalled Alito's excitement when then-California Gov. Ronald Reagan, a rising conservative star, was roundly deemed the winner of a 1967 televised debate with then-Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (D-N.Y.).

"He was just fascinated that Reagan was able to get the better of Bobby Kennedy," Castranova said.

Castranova emphasized that Alito never trumpeted his views, lest he jeopardize his father's reputation for impartiality. In the 1968 yearbook of Victor McDonald, a vocal supporter of Richard M. Nixon, Alito teased: "Who will replace you next year as Steinert High School's biggest reactionary? I doubt anybody can be as FAR RIGHT as you."'Tradition, Order and Authority'

Former Princeton professor Dennis F. Thompson, now at Harvard, remembers a freshman named Sam Alito from 37 years ago for one reason: He was a conservative.

Thompson assigned students in his political theory class to develop a world view of their own, drawing on philosophers. A tide of liberal and left-wing visions rolled in, with a notable exception. "It wasn't conservative in terms of political issues of the day," Thompson recalled of Alito's paper. "It was more about principles -- a respect for tradition, order and authority."

As the antiwar movement engulfed Princeton, Alito stood outside the fray, finding mentors in books and journals of ideas. In the spring of 1970, after the United States invaded Cambodia, students voted overwhelmingly to postpone classes to campaign against the war.

Classmate Richard R. Clifton, now a 9th Circuit appellate judge, remembers Alito had a different concern. Alito thought that a majority vote to suspend classes would be unfair to a minority who wanted to study. "He was very frustrated," Alito's wife, Martha, said he told her. "He wanted his education."

Many students joined selective-admissions dining clubs dominated by sons of the rich, but Alito chose instead the anti-elitist Stevenson Hall (named for Democrat Adlai E. Stevenson), which welcomed all comers. Friends knew Alito as a confirmed anti-snob, flashing a dry, acerbic wit at any sign of pomposity.

He immersed himself in the study of law, history and politics -- and again debate. His closest friends were all, like him, studious majors in Princeton's Woodrow Wilson School who dined at Stevenson, where they were more likely to debate John Rawls's "A Theory of Justice" than Vietnam. Still, "I knew he was greatly bothered by all the upheaval of the '60s," said Ken Burns, now a lawyer in San Francisco.

Alito had a ringside seat on an ambitious student-faculty effort to make Princeton's decision making more responsive to change, to head off student protest. The chairman of the project, professor Stanley Kelley, who knew Alito's academic work, hired him to take notes and do research while passions flared.

The university approved the group's recommendations, giving students much more influence over tenure, curriculum, dorm curfew and other policies. (A conservative alumni group that Alito listed among his affiliations in a 1985 job application, Concerned Alumni of Princeton, would later say the effort had turned Princeton over to left-wing students.) Kelley said Alito never expressed a view of the deliberations.

DOJ_NMG_0008565

Samuel Lipsman, an outspoken leftist who headed Princeton's debate panel, knew Alito's leanings, but only because he asked him directly. "I knew he was conservative and he supported the president and defended the war, but he didn't carry signs even metaphorically," said Lipsman, who nominated Alito to succeed him as debate panel president. "He never antagonized."

Alito's good friend and fellow debater, Andrew P. Napolitano, a self-described "notorious campus conservative" and now a Fox News commentator, said Lipsman knew more than he did: "I do not recall hearing a conservative peep out of Sam's mouth."

But in Alito's mind, he would later write, a conservative legal philosophy was forming by his junior year when he read the works of Yale law professor Alexander M. Bickel, a pioneering critic of the Warren Court. At a time when many intellectuals embraced liberal judicial activism as a force for good, Bickel announced in a book titled "The Supreme Court and the Idea of Progress" that the Warren Court's most sacrosanct rulings -- including Brown v. Board of Education and one man, one vote -- were badly reasoned, based not on the Constitution, but on the egalitarian visions of individual justices. A moderate to liberal Democrat, Bickel wrote that no matter how noble the result, this unelected branch was threatening democracy.

Bickel's views ignited profound unease and even fury in intellectual circles, where the Warren Court was seen as having protected individual rights from being trampled by the majority. Yale activists burned Bickel in effigy in 1969.

For Alito, however, discovering Bickel proved a seminal moment. He would write later that he had objected even as a young man to the Warren Court's rulings, particularly on reapportionment, criminal procedure and public school prayer. Bickel specifically critiqued these decisions, arguing that legislatures, not courts, should execute complex social changes, even if they came more slowly. His vision meshed with Alito's desire for orderly change.

His senior year, Alito crossed paths again with his old debating rival, Jeffrey Laurenti, then a graduate student at Princeton. From similar beginnings as Italian American Catholics raised with moral certainty and respect for authority, they had taken different roads. Laurenti had turned against the Vietnam War and the president. "The scales were falling slowly from my eyes. I was groping," he said. "I don't know that Sam was."

Alito was delving into the history and workings of the Supreme Court. Charles A. Miller, then a Princeton assistant professor of constitutional law, said Alito so loved reading Supreme Court opinions that he persuaded the teacher to completely revise the syllabus of one seminar so that he could take it again.

Alito wrote his research paper for Miller on Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, who once famously had summed up his philosophy of judicial restraint: "If my fellow citizens want to go to hell, I will help them. It's my job."

Miller was amazed by the college senior's ability "to embrace historical, philosophical and political material and modes of reasoning," according to the 1972 law school recommendation he wrote. "The logic and precision that Mr. Alito uses in both oral and written presentation is almost palpable. None of it is aggressive, indeed sometimes it is self-effacing," Miller wrote, using adjectives Alito's admirers use today.

"It's easy to say I'm prescient," said Miller, now retired, "but I think what's more true is this guy is very consistent."The Calling of the Law

Yale Law School in 1972 was a temple of legal liberalism, and Alito soon began to feel that some professors were giving him an incomplete view of the law. He would later tell his friend Kmiec that he turned to reading extensively on his own.

"There was this note of regret in his voice that very few of them [professors] seemed to be saying things that he could readily agree with," said Kmiec, now a professor at Pepperdine University Law School.

Bickel soon became gravely ill, unable to teach. His devoted friend on the faculty, Robert H. Bork, was carrying the conservative torch, arguing that the only principled way to interpret the Constitution was to stick to the precise words of the Framers and what they meant at that time.

Bork taught that there was no constitutional basis for rights to privacy, abortion, or one man, one vote, and he criticized court-ordered busing to achieve school desegregation as judicial meddling. Classmates do not recall Alito's reaction to Roe v. Wade in 1973, but he would later write that the decision had no basis in the Constitution. Alito's mother has told reporters that he personally opposes abortion; Alito has not commented on his personal views.

DOJ_NMG_0008566

Bork said in an interview that he remembers only one student -- John R. Bolton, now the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations -- who then expressed conservative views openly. "The rest of them kept their heads down," Bork said.

Alito's Yale roommate and Princeton classmate Mark Dwyer said his friend had hoped to have Bork for constitutional law, but ended up with Charles Reich, author of an unofficial bible of the protest movement, "The Greening of America."

Alito applied to be a Supreme Court clerk after law school. But, said his wife, Martha, "it was not to be at that time in his life." Instead, he went home to New Jersey to clerk for Appeals Court Judge Leonard I. Garth in Newark, a 3rd Circuit judicial craftsman in the mold of Alito's hero, Justice Harlan.

In contrast to his intellectual estrangement from Yale, Alito found in Garth a sort of father in the law. Former clerks describe him as a judge who asks himself before deciding any case whether an elected branch of government could resolve it instead.

"Judge Garth and Sam had the same philosophy, and they spoke the same language," said Kenneth Prochnow, Alito's co-clerk in 1976 and 1977.

There was another link. Alito's father had testified before Garth as a demographic expert in a 1972 New Jersey reapportionment case. "It was an extraordinary circumstance because rarely do you remember witnesses," Garth said. "But I was terribly impressed with him. I told Sam about it, and I think he was justifiably proud."

Garth, who once rated Alito 16 1/2 out of 10 as a clerk, said they used to buy a bag of peanuts and "take long walks in Newark, just the two of us, hashing out cases."

Alito was back in an orderly world after seven years in liberal cauldrons. He moved home with his parents and assumed the role of lector, or reader, at Sunday Mass at Our Lady of Sorrows.

Prochnow remembers his surprise when he realized after the 1976 presidential election that his co-clerk was a Republican. "Sam was disappointed that Jimmy Carter won," Prochnow said. "That was very strange for me, because in the environment I'd been in since 1968, I don't think I'd met any Republicans," he said, referring to his time at Columbia University and New York University Law School. "I can only imagine what it was like for Sam to have developed and held his philosophy, which must have been a minority and unpopular position, in the environments he'd been in."

Comfortable in the monastic, intellectual world of appeals -- a more solitary and research-oriented practice than the free-for-all of trial work -- Alito went to work after his clerkship in the appellate section of the U.S. attorney's office in Newark. His skills quickly made him the go-to lawyer on the most sensitive cases. One involved a top-secret exchange of two convicted Russian spies for five Russian dissidents. The intricacies kept him in the library for days, plumbing law books, as well as a Russian dictionary.

Near the end of the process, another staffer breezed by him in the library stacks, calling out offhandedly, "Hey, Sam, I heard you learned Russian over the weekend."

Martha Bomgardner, a young librarian in the U.S. attorney's office, overheard his quiet and upright-sounding answer: "I don't think that's something to talk about."

"Oh, this is a smart one," she thought.

She told friends she would marry him by the following April. But he was uncommonly shy, and despite multiple daily trips to the library, did not ask her out for 13 months. "He is judicious," she said recently with a laugh.

They had dated about a year when he got an offer from the U.S. solicitor general. The office is arguably the most respected law firm in the country, representing the U.S. government before the Supreme Court. Alito left for Washington in August 1981. "I thought that would be the end," Bomgardner said.

Four years later, Martha Bomgardner would become Martha Alito and Samuel Alito Jr. would be on a very different course.

Research editor Lucy Shackelford and researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

Alito's Challenge (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008567

The two names uppermost on the minds of official Washington at this moment represent polar extremes of reputation. Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff is an admitted felon and a certified sleaze. Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel Alito is an upright, ethical and highly respected jurist, as modest in his habits as Abramoff is flamboyant.

Abramoff's operations have been thoroughly exposed by the reporting of my colleagues at The Post and in the plea agreements he signed with federal prosecutors, sending tremors of anxiety through the ranks of congressional Republicans and a few Democrats as well.

Alito's work, as a member of the Philadelphia-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 3rd Circuit, will become much more familiar to the nation when the Senate Judiciary Committee holds its hearings this week on his nomination to succeed Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

The question that confronts the senators is whether Alito has an agenda that is every bit as well-defined as that for which the Indian tribes and others hired Abramoff -- but vastly larger in significance.

The goals for which Abramoff connived were petty -- a gambling license here, a contract there. The issues with which Alito has wrestled in his 15 years on the federal bench are much more consequential: the relationship between individuals and the state, the regulatory authority of the federal government, the balance of power between the president and Congress, the protection of civil rights.

On all these issues, Alito has compiled a record that can be read -- and is read by many legal scholars -- as reflecting a consistent and reasoned preference for governmental authority, especially presidential power, and a restrictive view of individual rights.

University of Chicago law professor Cass Sunstein, for example, concluded a study of Alito's dissents with the observation that "there is a good chance that Alito will be with Justices [Antonin] Scalia and [Clarence] Thomas in their attempts to move constitutional law in some respects to what it was a long time ago."

If that reading is correct, then the confirmation of Alito as O'Connor's successor would shift the current Supreme Court balance decisively to the right.

For senators who share President Bush's often-expressed desire to see that happen, the confirmation of Alito presents no conflict. Moreover, his "highly qualified" rating from the American Bar Association underlines the near-universal belief that his intellect and temperament commend him for the bench.

But others face a harder task in weighing the Alito nomination. They may well ask: At a time when the administration is asserting a broad right to conduct warrantless wiretaps of Americans' phone calls, do we really need a Supreme Court that takes an expansionist view of presidential authority? In an era of corporate corruption, do we want to restrict consumers' and workers' ability to turn to the courts for help?

But the evidence on Alito's motivations is not one-sided. At the suggestion of White House allies, I spoke with two of his former colleagues who presented compelling personal testimony that he is not a man driven by a personal or ideological agenda.

Robert Del Tufo was the Jimmy Carter-appointed U.S. attorney in New Jersey who employed Alito in the 1970s to handle difficult appellate cases. "There is no ideological bent that I can perceive," he told me. "He is a balanced human being with great sensitivity for human values and a scholar who analyzes the law and always stays with it."

Susan Sullivan of San Francisco clerked for Alito during the year he wrote his controversial Casey opinion, upholding portions of a Pennsylvania statute restricting abortion, a decision later overturned by the Supreme Court. Sullivan, who describes herself as "a social progressive who is pro-choice and anti-death penalty," says, "In general I would react with suspicion to any nominee of this administration. But having worked with him, I know he does not work toward a specific result. He is not intent on advancing his own agenda. He approaches cases in a very impartial way."

When John Roberts came before the Judiciary Committee for confirmation as chief justice, with barely more than two years of judicial opinions behind him, he was thoroughly believable in disclaiming any particular agenda. All Republicans and half the Democrats saw him, as I did, as an embodiment of judicial impartiality.

Maybe Alito can establish a similar claim for himself in these hearings. But he has a lot of convincing to do.

davidbroder@washpost.com

DOJ_NMG_0008568

Alito's Moment (LAT)

By Edward Lazarus

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

SUPREME COURT nominations are as old as the republic, but the modern history of the battles over court appointments begins in 1987. That's when the Senate rejected Robert H. Bork, the conservative appellate judge who President Reagan nominated to replace Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., the swing-voting centrist on what was then, as now, a closely divided court.

Nominees had failed to win Senate approval before Bork. The Senate turned down Clement Haynsworth in 1969 and G. Harold Carswell a year later, President Nixon's first two choices to replace Justice Abe Fortas.

Nor was Bork's nomination unprecedented in the dramatic political shift it portended if he had been confirmed. In 1962, President Kennedy's choice of liberal Arthur J. Goldberg to replace conservative Felix Frankfurter moved an already fairly progressive Warren court significantly to the left, clearing the way for a civil rights and civil liberties revolution.

Still, the Bork hearings were the first in which political-interest groups, recognizing the huge importance of controlling the federal judiciary, defeated a potentially court-altering nominee by using campaign-style tactics to turn the confirmation proceedings into a popularity contest and a national referendum on the Constitution's meaning.

Bork never knew what hit him. He lost because Senate Democrats successfully cast him as an arrogant hyper-intellectual who espoused a judicial philosophy — in particular, his rejection of a constitutional "right to privacy" — out of tune with mainstream America. Every Supreme Court nomination since reflects the lessons that each side drew from the experience.

This was especially true in the fight, one-sided as it was, over John G. Roberts Jr.'s nomination to replace William H. Rehnquist as chief justice. Some Senate Democrats and liberal interest groups tried mightily to reprise the 1987 strategy and portray Roberts as an out-of-the-mainstream, anti-privacy ideologue. But Republicans were ready with an effective counterstrategy that quickly quelled any nascent opposition.

Indeed, Roberts, by design, was the archetypical "reverse Bork" — a congenial, telegenic nominee with an impressive pedigree but as slim a track record as feasible on hot-button issues. And he arrived at his confirmation hearings armed with a reverse-Bork strategy:

• Ameliorate past criticisms of popular liberal precedents, especially Roe vs. Wade, by emphasizing respect for precedent;

• neutralize previous expressions of personal opinion on controversial issues by drawing a bright line between personal beliefs and judicial philosophy;

• avoid an ideological battle by declining to answer problematic questions on grounds that the issues raised might be the subject of future cases;

• and mount a public-relations campaign of your own.

With Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s confirmation hearings Monday, it remains unclear whether either side has made significant strategic adjustments based on Roberts' experience.

The administration has stuck with the winning Roberts playbook, albeit this time with a nominee who, thanks to 15 years on the federal bench, has a more extensive track record. For instance, Alito's handlers have tried to overcome the nominee's deeply felt and repeated hostility toward Roe vs. Wade by emphasizing his reverence for precedent and modest conception of the judicial role.

More generally, they've attempted to downplay his record as a sometimes hard-edged conservative on such issues as race and gender discrimination, states' rights and the separation of church and state by casting Alito as congenial, open-minded and keenly aware of the need to divorce personal beliefs from legal interpretations. No doubt Alito will seek to exhibit these qualities when refusing, as did Roberts, to answer problematic questions.

Senate Democrats have not revealed any new strategies after completely failing to force Roberts to elaborate on his judicial ideology or otherwise penetrate the nominee's carefully crafted and beautifully delivered responses. They certainly have more to work with this time.

Early in his career, Alito did not hide his sometimes radical legal views, including hostility toward the now universally accepted one-person/one-vote standard for voting apportionment. He wrote several judicial decisions that are easily caricatured, such as a dissent supporting the legality of a strip-search of a 10-year-old girl and another arguing that Congress does not have authority under the "commerce clause" to restrict the transfer and possession of machine guns.

DOJ_NMG_0008569

And no one expects Alito to be as effective testifying as Roberts was.

But to defeat Alito, Senate Democrats will need more than a clutch of 20-year-old policy memos and unsettling judicial opinions. They will have to portray Alito as a genuine threat to some core American value — and not merely to the right to privacy, on which all the moves and countermoves are already choreographed.

President Bush's decision to engage in warrantless wiretapping of Americans in apparent violation of the statute regulating spying for national-security purposes raises a constitutional issue of staggering importance. In undertaking this program — and other policies on the use of torture, detention and the designation of enemy combatants — in its prosecution of the war on terror, the administration asserts an inherent constitutional authority to commit acts that Congress has explicitly deemed criminal.

The question of whether the president is, to put it bluntly, above ordinary law whenever he invokes his constitutional authority as commander in chief will have to be decided by the Supreme Court. Whether it will transform the political landscape remains unclear. But it may be the only issue on which Alito is truly vulnerable. He is on record supporting a very broad view of presidential authority and, as a judge, has shown great deference to the acts of executive branch officials, including advocating legal immunity for the attorney general against lawsuits charging him with illegal wiretapping.

Alito will resist questions on these matters on grounds that presidential authority will be the subject of cases on which he would sit.

But the president's power to flout the will of Congress in secret, and solely on his say-so, should be an issue of transcendent importance. If Senate Democrats pursue it, Alito may face the prospect of separating himself from the president who nominated him or risk a filibuster.

Judging Samuel Alito (NYT)

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

Judicial nominations are not always motivated by ideology, but the nomination of Judge Samuel Alito certainly was. President Bush's previous choice to fill Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's seat on the Supreme Court, Harriet Miers, was hounded into withdrawing by the far right, primarily because she appeared to hold moderate views on a variety of legal issues. President Bush placated Ms. Miers's conservative critics by nominating Judge Alito, who has long been one of their favorites.

Judge Alito's confirmation hearings begin tomorrow. He may be able to use them to reassure the Senate that he will be respectful of rights that Americans cherish, but he has a lengthy and often troubling record he will have to explain away. As a government lawyer, he worked to overturn Roe v. Wade. He has disturbing beliefs on presidential power - a critical issue for the country right now. He has worked to sharply curtail Congress's power to pass laws and protect Americans. He may not even believe in "one person one vote."

The White House has tried to create an air of inevitability around Judge Alito's confirmation. But the public is skeptical. In a new Harris poll, just 34 percent of those surveyed said they thought he should be confirmed, while 31 percent said he should not, and 34 percent were unsure. Nearly 70 percent said they would oppose Judge Alito's nomination if they thought he would vote to make abortion illegal - which it appears he might well do.

If President Bush had chosen a pragmatic, mainstream conservative like Justice O'Connor to fill the seat, these confirmation hearings would be a breeze. But now, the Senate has a duty to delve into the many areas in which Judge Alito's record suggests he is an extremist, including:

ABORTION Judge Alito has not only opposed Roe v. Wade, he has also worked to overturn it. When he applied for a promotion in the Reagan administration in 1985, he wrote that he was "particularly proud" of his legal arguments "that the Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion." In meetings with senators, Judge Alito has talked about his respect for Roe, but he has said nothing to discourage his supporters on the religious right who back him because they believe he will vote to overturn it. The American people have a right to know, unambiguously, where Judge Alito stands on Roe.

PRESIDENTIAL POWER The continuing domestic wiretapping scandal shows that the Bush administration has a dangerous view of its own powers, and the Supreme Court is the most important check on such excesses. But Judge Alito has some disturbing views about handing the president even more power. He has argued that courts interpreting statutes should consider the president's intent when he signed the law to be just as important as Congress's intent in writing and passing the law. It is a radical suggestion that indicates he has an imperial view of presidential power.

DOJ_NMG_0008570

CONGRESSIONAL POWER While Judge Alito seems intent on expanding the president's power, he has called for sharply reducing the power of Congress. In United States v. Rybar, he wrote a now-infamous dissent arguing that Congress exceeded its power in passing a law that banned machine guns. As a Reagan administration lawyer, he argued that Congress did not have the power to pass the Truth in Mileage Act to protect consumers from odometer fraud.

ONE PERSON ONE VOTE Judge Alito said in his 1985 application that he had become interested in constitutional law as a student partly because of his opposition to the Warren court's reapportionment rulings, which created the "one person one vote" standard. He seems to still have believed as a 35-year-old lawyer that these cases, which made legislative districts much more fair, came out the wrong way. •

There are other areas - including civil rights, sex discrimination, the environment and criminal law - where Judge Alito's record appears extreme. The Senate should question him closely on all of them.

The Senate should also explore Judge Alito's honesty. According to a senator he met with, he tried to dismiss his statement about the Constitution's not protecting abortion as merely part of a job application, which suggests he will bend the truth when it suits his purposes. Judge Alito has said he does not recall being in an ultraconservative group called Concerned Alumni of Princeton, which opposed co-education and affirmative action. That is odd, since he boasted of his membership in that same 1985 job application. The tortuous history of his promise to Congress to recuse himself in cases involving the Vanguard companies, which he ultimately failed to do, should also be explored.

Judge Alito's nomination is often presented as an abortion rights showdown, but it is much more than that. Those who care about the broad range of rights and liberties that Americans now have, and about honesty in government, should tune into the hearings starting tomorrow - and call their senators with their reactions to what they hear.

Our Legal Guardians (LAT)

By Cass R. Sunstein

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

THE QUESTION underpinning all others at Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s confirmation hearings Monday involves the role of the court in our society. Should it be "active" or "passive"? Should it defer to the president or to Congress?

Although such questions can be rephrased in many ways, the answer to them all should be straightforward: The Supreme Court's most important function is to vindicate the law and, in that way, to commit the United States to the rule of law, rather than of individual human beings. That means holding government — legislative and executive — accountable. This role matters in ordinary times, but it is crucial when the political pressure on the court is most intense. Consider:

• One of the nation's greatest presidents, Abraham Lincoln, suspended the writ of habeas corpus in the midst of the Civil War. The nation's chief justice, Roger B. Taney, invalidated the suspension on grounds that only Congress could do that.

• During the Depression, another great president, Franklin D. Roosevelt, fired a member of the Federal Trade Commission. The Supreme Court ruled that Roosevelt acted illegally and in violation of Congress' will.

• During the Korean War, President Truman seized the country's steel mills on grounds that the war effort would be jeopardized if the steel industry went on strike. The top court struck down Truman's action, ruling that the president needed Congress' authorization and that even the president must obey the law.

• In 2004, the court rejected President Bush's claim that in the war on terror, enemy combatants may be detained without a hearing. Carefully holding the president to the Constitution's requirements, it said that the founding document "most assuredly envisions a role for all three branches when individual liberties are at stake."

In protecting the rule of law, the Supreme Court's mere existence is every bit as important as its rulings. Government officials at all levels know the court might hold them to account if they discriminate on the basis of race, sex or religion, or violate the nation's environmental laws, or implement policies that infringe on free speech or the right to private property.

DOJ_NMG_0008571

It is important to recognize that many of the court's most important decisions involve ordinary law, not the Constitution (except indirectly). During the Cold War, the court ruled that the secretary of State could not deny a passport to a communist because Congress had not granted the secretary the power to deny a passport on political grounds. More recently, it unanimously endorsed a broad reading of the Clean Air Act that required pollution controls that some members of the Bush administration didn't like. In areas involving consumer protection, energy policy, national security, animal welfare, automobile safety, telecommunications and much more, the Supreme Court greatly increases the likelihood that government will obey the law.

In all this, the court performs an indispensable democratic function simply because the law has been enacted by the people's representatives. But when it is working well, the court does much more to promote democracy. Most important, it safeguards freedom of speech and the right to vote, thus protecting what could be called the internal morality of democracy. A well-functioning system of self-government does not simply follow the majority's desires. At a minimum, it also immunizes political dissent and ensures the right of citizens to select their representatives.

To say this is not to say that the court has always performed its role well. In two different ways, it can sometimes badly serve the nation. The first — and the worse — is by striking down the decisions of the elected branches of government through judgments that reflect the justices' own views on public policy. The second is to capitulate to political will and allow the elected branches to violate the law.

In 1857, the court ruled, wrongly, that the Constitution entrenched slavery and thus banned freeing slaves in the Louisiana Territory. In the early decades of the 20th century, it held, wrongly, that the Constitution bans minimum-wage laws, maximum-hour laws and other government efforts to assist workers. The question of reproductive choice is much more controversial. But many people believe, not implausibly, that the court also was wrong to protect the right to choose abortion.

Since 1995, the Supreme Court has struck down more than 30 acts of Congress, including provisions of the Violence Against Women Act, the Americans with Disabilities Act and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. In taking these stands and in striking down affirmative action programs and campaign finance regulation, the court has probably exceeded its proper bounds.

Nor is it difficult to find cases in which the court did not take the Constitution seriously enough. In 1896, it ruled that the Constitution permits racial segregation. In 1944, it allowed Japanese Americans on the West Coast to be placed in internment camps. Many people believe, not implausibly, that the court was wrong to uphold a Georgia law banning same-sex sodomy in 1986 — and that the court was right to overrule that ruling in 2003.

But more often than not, the court's independent role has served U.S. government exceedingly well.

The more important point is far broader. The rule of law cannot maintain itself on the goodwill of officials, even those who are democratically elected and accountable to the public. The rule of law is an immense but fragile achievement. In our system, the Supreme Court's most crucial role is to protect that achievement.

DeLay Ends Bid To Regain Post As GOP Leader (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay (Tex.), one of the most powerful and feared Republican leaders in Washington, abandoned his quest to regain his House majority leader post yesterday, bowing to pressure from fellow Republicans worried about the growing corruption and campaign finance scandals linked to his office.

DeLay's announcement in his home town of Sugar Land ends his decade-long tenure as a legislative juggernaut and conservative ideologue who revolutionized the relationship between power and money in Washington. It also cleared the way for a leadership contest that could further shake up the House GOP team going into an uncertain election year. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) said Republicans will choose a new majority leader and other officers the week of Jan. 30, when members return for President Bush's State of the Union address.

DOJ_NMG_0008572

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.), who has served as acting majority leader since September, when DeLay was forced to step down after his indictment on campaign finance charges, will ask his colleagues to make his post permanent. Sources close to House Education and the Workforce Committee Chairman John A. Boehner (Ohio) confirmed he will challenge Blunt.

But dark horse candidates are likely to emerge, including the ideological conservative Rep. Mike Pence (Ind.) and veteran House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (Calif.).

"There has been this desperate plea for someone to take charge," said Charles Cook, an independent political analyst. Republicans "are looking for some leadership, someone that has some sense of what they ought to be doing."

DeLay, 58, who served as House majority whip for eight years before becoming majority leader in late 2002, had resolved to return to the leadership since he was indicted by a Texas grand jury on charges of money laundering and conspiracy linked to his efforts to finance state political campaigns. DeLay contended the indictments were a political vendetta by the Democratic Travis County prosecutor, Ronnie Earle, and until recently most Republicans supported that view.

But last week's guilty pleas by Republican lobbyist and DeLay ally Jack Abramoff dramatically changed the political climate, according to many lawmakers and political experts. A source close to the Republican leadership said DeLay was counseled by senior Republicans, including House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (Calif.), but that DeLay ultimately made the decision, calling Hastert yesterday morning.

"I am writing to inform you of my decision to permanently step aside as majority leader, and of my belief that the best interests of the conference would be served by the election of a new leader as soon as possible," DeLay wrote in a letter to Hastert. "The job of majority leader and the mandate of the Republican majority are too important to be hamstrung, even for a few months, by personal distractions."

He vowed to reclaim his seat on the Appropriations Committee and to run for reelection in what appears to be a difficult race against a former House member, Democrat Nick Lampson, and possibly a primary challenger in former representative Steve Stockman.

In a second letter to his colleagues calling for a leadership election, DeLay said, "During my time in Congress, I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land. I am fully confident time will bear this out. However, we live in serious times and the United States House of Representatives must be focused on the job of protecting our nation and meeting the daily challenges facing the American people. History has proven that when House Republicans are united and focused, success follows."

DeLay has maintained he has nothing to fear from the Abramoff corruption and bribery inquiry. But federal investigators signaled they are inching closer to his office when, on Tuesday, they highlighted the activities of his former deputy chief of staff, Tony C. Rudy, in Abramoff's plea agreement.

Although DeLay's hard-edged political style and tactics frequently drew complaints over the years, his political and legal problems first began to emerge in 2004. At that time, he was admonished by the House ethics committee for holding a social event with energy industry officials as the House was considering an energy bill and for enlisting the Federal Aviation Administration to track down Texas Democratic lawmakers fleeing the state to avoid a vote on a congressional redistricting bill DeLay helped draft.

DeLay's court fight in Texas, which he had hoped would be quickly resolved, has been dragging on, complicating any return to the GOP leadership, but it was Abramoff's plea agreement with prosecutors that ultimately forced DeLay's downfall.

"DeLay is the first political casualty of Abramoff affair," said Republican political strategist Rich Galen. "I don't think there's any question about that."

DeLay's departure deprives House Republicans of their strongest leader and an unparalleled political tactician, said Stuart Rothenberg, a congressional expert. Since he stepped down in late September, the party has had a series of high-profile embarrassments in failing to pass legislation. Republican moderates split with conservatives on the key issues of immigration, social policy and spending. The ensuing sense of drift, as much as the scandals, fueled a rank-and-file desire for change, Cook said.

"Republicans never drifted aimlessly while Tom DeLay was in charge, and the last three months have just been a horror show," Cook said.

DOJ_NMG_0008573

DeLay's decision also deprives Democrats of the political villain they have been cultivating since the departure of House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) in 1998, Cook and Rothenberg said. Democrats will try to keep the public focused on DeLay, Rothenberg said, and yesterday they did just that, giving the departing leader an unfriendly farewell.

"For years, at the expense of the American people, the House Republicans have enabled and benefited from the Republican culture of corruption engineered by Tom DeLay," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). "The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress."

Just how anxious Republicans are to avoid such charges could determine the next leadership team, political analysts said. Blunt enters the race as the favorite, with the current chief deputy whip, Rep. Eric I. Cantor (Va.), expected to take over as House majority whip. But some members question Blunt's effectiveness in passing legislation, while some conservatives doubt his commitment to a strong GOP policy agenda, House members and GOP strategists said. If members think that the departure of DeLay from the scene is not enough to satisfy voters that the party is taking the scandals seriously enough, then Blunt's bid to become leader might be threatened.

The other likely candidate, Boehner, is a former member of the House leadership with close ties to Washington's lobbying community and may have difficulty picking up the banner of reform, Rothenberg said.

That could give an opening to a dark horse, perhaps Pence, the chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee, or Rep. John Shadegg (Ariz.), another conservative seen by many as a more collegial candidate than Pence.

"Congressman Shadegg has been approached by a number of members, including both conservatives and moderates, who have encouraged him to consider seeking this position," Shadegg spokesman Michael Steel said of the majority leader's post. "He is, of course, honored and flattered. However, there are a lot factors involved. There are others who are interested in the position, some of whom may already have substantial support. He is seeking further input from his colleagues in the conference, and has not made any decision."

Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.) may have signaled his bid for a leadership post when he issued a statement on DeLay's departure before anyone else, GOP political strategists said. Rogers, formerly an FBI agent who focused on public corruption, would be attractive to members looking for a new image.

"It all depends on how frightened the members are, how much of a statement they need to make that they're shaking up their leadership and embracing a statement of change and reform," Rothenberg said.

DeLay Ends Leadership Fight (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON – Unable to shake his legal troubles and with colleagues in open revolt over a widening corruption scandal, Rep. Tom DeLay gave up his claim Saturday to the powerful job of House majority leader.

FILE Tom DeLay

Mr. DeLay had been forced to temporarily step aside in September after his indictment on state money laundering and campaign finance charges, but he defiantly hung on until events spun beyond his control. Jack Abramoff, a lobbyist he once called a close friend, cut a deal last week to tell the FBI everything he knows about bribery in Congress. And Friday, dozens of GOP House members mounted a revolt by demanding elections to replace Mr. DeLay permanently.

"The job of majority leader is too important to be hamstrung by personal distractions," Mr. DeLay told supporters at a hastily called event Saturday afternoon at Sugar Land City Hall, with his wife, Christine, at his side. "In the 21 years I have been in Congress, I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of the House and the laws of our land, and time once again will bear out that truth."

He vowed to continue to seek re-election to his Houston-area district despite the lobbying scandal and his impending state trial.

The decision will mean a scramble among House Republicans, who will choose a successor Jan. 31 when they return to work. But analysts and Democrats said it won't let the party off the hook.

DOJ_NMG_0008574

"It takes a little of bit of the taint of scandal away from the Republicans ... but we'll see who gets caught up in Abramoff's web," said James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University.

The Fallout

Rep. Tom DeLay has decided he won't try to reclaim his job as majority leader of the House. The following are some of the things that could affect.

His re-election campaign: Mr. DeLay says he'll seek a 12th term from his Houston-area district. Three Republicans have filed to run against him in the March 7 primary, and they've made ethics a central theme. So has Democrat Nick Lampson, a former congressman who lost his Beaumont-based seat after redistricting and will run for Mr. DeLay's seat. Former GOP Rep. Steve Stockman said last week that he'll run as an independent, and if he makes it onto the November ballot, he could siphon conservative support from Mr. DeLay, who won with just 55 percent in 2004 against an unknown Democrat. Because Mr. DeLay is no longer majority leader, it's unclear how much money will pour into the race on either side.

His criminal charges: The decision is unlikely to affect the charges he faces in Travis County. Mr. DeLay's attorneys had wanted a quick trial to clear the way for him to return as majority leader.

Republicans: Mr. DeLay's decision may help House Republicans, who've benefited from his tactical and fundraising prowess but have also seen their popularity plummet nationally amid headline-making scandals in which he often had a role.

Democrats: They no longer can target Mr. DeLay as a top Republican leader, but his troubles still give them ammo for the midterm elections.

Texas: The Lone Star State loses some congressional clout, but it still has President Bush and plenty of other Texans throughout the administration.

From staff and wire reports

Democrats were hardly willing to accept the news and move on.

"For years, at the expense of the American people, the House Republicans have enabled and benefited from the Republican culture of corruption engineered by Tom DeLay. ... A single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress," said House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi.

Abramoff's shadow

When Mr. Abramoff's ex-partner, former DeLay aide Michael Scanlon, agreed a few weeks ago to cooperate with prosecutors, the pressure began to grow exponentially. Lawmakers focused on the likelihood that Mr. Abramoff would seek a plea deal and cooperate with investigators, which he did. Tuesday, he pleaded guilty to fraud, bribery of another House member and tax evasion.

Mr. Abramoff provided lavish overseas trips and a great deal of campaign cash to Mr. DeLay, and federal authorities are reportedly looking at the ties between the lobbyist and Mr. DeLay, other lawmakers and congressional aides.

"When you get photographs of Abramoff coming out of court, it just drives home to members how immediate the threat is," said Stuart Rothenberg, publisher of the nonpartisan Rothenberg Political Report , calling Mr. DeLay's decision "an attempt obviously to remove him as a major issue from the midterm elections."

A host of Republicans issued laudatory statements, but few had tried to talk him out of quitting.

Speaker Dennis Hastert had prolonged Mr. DeLay's survival for months, tamping down demands for an election to replace him permanently after his indictment Sept. 28 and scheduling an unusually long six-week winter recess to give Mr. DeLay time to fight the Travis County money laundering charges.

No details have emerged about whether Mr. Hastert eventually urged Mr. DeLay to quit. But when a coalition of moderates and some conservatives began circulating a petition Friday to force a leadership election when the House returns to work Jan. 31, the speaker made no effort to discourage them.

"I respect Congressman Tom DeLay's judgment to step down as majority leader of the House of Representatives. It is an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican Conference," Mr. Hastert said Saturday.

Wielding clout

Mr. DeLay has been admonished by the House ethics committee three times for ethical lapses.

DallasNews.com/extra

DOJ_NMG_0008575

Letter: DeLay to Speaker Hastert

Timeline: DeLay's career in Congress

Who's next?

Video: Tom DeLay addresses questions of ethics surrounding his staff

In 2004, he drew two admonishments, for appearing to provide "special access" to a Kansas utility firm in exchange for a $25,000 political contribution and for offering to help the candidacy of Michigan lawmaker's son if the lawmaker provided a crucial vote on Medicare.

In 1999, the panel chastised Mr. DeLay for threatening a major trade group that hired a former Democratic congressman as its top executive.

For DeLay watchers, it was all part of the lawmaker's push-the-envelope style.

As majority leader for just over three years, Mr. DeLay became more powerful in the view of many historians than any predecessor since Texan Sam Rayburn in the 1930s, or perhaps Joseph Cannon in the early 1900s. Both became House speakers.

But Mr. DeLay was always too hot for that post, too in-your-face and in the modern age, not quite telegenic enough. He rarely made himself available for the Sunday talk show circuit, though he excelled as a strategist.

His signal institutional effect was in transforming the balance of power within the House. Committee chairmen now face term limits and owe their jobs to a handful of party leaders. The close alliance he forged with K Street – the army of well-paid lobbyists, many of them former lawmakers and aides – allowed him to steer money toward favored candidates, maintaining the GOP majority and ensuring personal loyalty.

"He was stronger than Jim Wright, stronger than Tip O'Neill, stronger than others," Dr. Thurber said. "He couldn't be speaker, but he became a very influential figure. And controversial. ... That is ultimately his downfall."

One colleague who joined Mr. DeLay at his announcement Saturday, Rep. Kevin Brady, R-The Woodlands, called Mr. DeLay "a force of nature" and said he will "remain a true conservative leader," though "Texas will miss his influence as majority leader."

Redrawing the lines

Mr. DeLay also orchestrated the mid-decade redrawing of the Texas political landscape.

Redistricting flipped six House districts from Democrats to Republicans, bolstering the GOP's slim majority but touching off legal fights on many fronts. Redistricting required the skills of a chessmaster or a Napoleon – selling donors on an untested stratagem, electing enough new Republicans to the Texas Legislature, pressuring a reluctant governor and lieutenant governor to take on the issue, and ultimately winning.

But the tactics drew the attention of Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, a Democrat, and Mr. DeLay and several aides face felony charges stemming from their efforts. Mr. DeLay has denied the charges.

"He was his own worst enemy," Dr. Thurber said. "His arrogance with respect to his power and the power of the money he was bringing in for the campaigns to helped people and hurt people – I think he lost sight of sound judgment."

Before his days as a politician, Mr. DeLay owned a pest exterminating business. The red tape and taxes drove him to distraction, he has said, and he ended up running for the Texas House, where he made friends easily with colleagues in both parties, and acquired the nickname "Hot Tub Tom." Along the way he realized he was neglecting his family and partying too much. He went to Congress 21 years ago, taking on a far more partisan edge and moving up GOP ranks quickly.

Newt Gingrich led the GOP takeover in 1994 and became speaker. Mr. DeLay ran for the No. 3 job, majority whip. Mr. Hastert ran Mr. DeLay's campaign and became his chief deputy.

Over the next eight years as whip, Mr. DeLay collected and exercised growing clout through a network of more than 60 deputy and assistant whips. During late-night sessions, he served meals to members, and he lent his office for hundreds of meetings. No one catered to the rank and file better, and no one had a better sense of their needs, moods and pressure points.

He took on a new nickname, "The Hammer," because those who crossed him learned to regret it. Moderates were passed over for chairmanships. Critics lost pork-barrel projects.

DOJ_NMG_0008576

When Mr. Gingrich was forced out after electoral setbacks in 1998, the speaker's job went to Mr. DeLay's lieutenant, the affable Mr. Hastert. Naturally, Mr. DeLay was seen as the power behind the speaker.

And when Dallas-area Rep. Dick Armey retired as majority leader, the post went easily to Mr. DeLay.

AP Surrounded by supporters in Sugar Land, Rep. Tom DeLay announced his decision to abandon his bid to remain as House majority leader Saturday.

Political scientist Earl Black of Rice University in Houston called Mr. DeLay the last of a breed: the Southern Republicans who led the House since 1994, with bases in safe districts that gave them maneuvering room to push conservative causes without political risk.

"It's just an example of the ferocious nature of national politics. Any mistakes that leaders make are certainly going to be pounced on," Dr. Black said.

Many foes

Mr. DeLay certainly made enemies along the way. Democrats despised him as an unyielding and extremely effective opponent who preferred a one-vote victory on a divisive bill to a wide margin on a piece of compromise legislation.

And Mr. Gingrich never forgot that in 1997, Mr. DeLay was an active plotter in an attempt to oust the speaker. Mr. DeLay was contrite when the plot failed. But last week, after Mr. Abramoff's guilty plea, Mr. Gingrich was the most prominent Republican to call for Mr. DeLay's resignation.

"It's obvious that Gingrich played a major role in this. He disliked DeLay and was just laying in wait to even the score," said Martin Frost, a Dallas Democrat who lost his House seat after 24 years because of redistricting.

He said the combination of Mr. DeLay's legal troubles and the prospect of what Mr. Abramoff might tell prosecutors pushed Mr. DeLay past the point of survival.

But Mr. DeLay was more effective than any likely successor, and it will be hard for the party to shake off the taint he's brought.

"He held them together through intimidations and threats," Mr. Frost said. "They're going to have to do a lot more than this. The entire Republican Party is in trouble."

But Rep. John Carter, R-Round Rock, one of Mr. DeLay's staunchest defenders, said he was disappointed that "some weak sisters" in the House GOP let their worries spin out of control.

"Without any evidence, people were hanging Abramoff around his neck," Mr. Carter said. "It's a sad day for Texas to lose the majority leader, but there were a lot of people who thought he ought to leave. I'm very disappointed. He's losing this over something that, when this issue is resolved in Austin, he will be exonerated."

Rep. Michael Burgess, R-Flower Mound, called the decision "one of innumerable selfless acts on his part. ... Leadership is not merely a position but an innate quality that Tom has in spades."

1 Fix, More Problems For GOP (LAT)

By Janet Hook, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rep. Tom DeLay's decision to stop battling for his former House leadership job helps remove a huge distraction from Republican efforts to recover from a stormy 2005 that put President Bush and the party on the defensive.

But DeLay's Saturday announcement that he was giving up his bid may create as many problems as it solves.

It has set off a divisive power struggle to succeed him as the House's permanent majority leader — and could spark the overthrow of other leaders.

Also, whoever is picked to succeed DeLay will be thrust into a job that, now more than ever, requires the kind of iron-fisted leadership that was the Texas Republican's trademark.

Bush's second-term priorities — overhauling Social Security and rewriting the tax code — have faltered, and Republicans are struggling to refocus on an agenda of cutting taxes, reducing federal spending and cracking down on illegal immigration. But the fate of these initiatives is cloudy.

DOJ_NMG_0008577

House Republicans had shown signs of splintering late last year, after DeLay was forced to temporarily give up his leadership post because of his indictment in Texas on money laundering charges.

"While Tom DeLay was a public-relations nightmare, he also was a strong leader, a talented vote counter, arm twister and strategist," said Charlie Cook, a Washington political analyst who publishes the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "Since he stepped down three months ago, it's been a horror show for House Republicans."

DeLay was clearly missed by his colleagues, but he also had become damaged goods. And after former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who had close ties to DeLay, pleaded guilty last week to corruption charges and sent many Republicans running for political cover, it became clear to some that DeLay would have to go if the GOP had any hope of changing the subject in this year's congressional campaigns.

"You don't want that kind of distraction moving forward in 2006," said Bill McInturff, a Republican pollster. Now, every Republican House member "doesn't have to go around answering the question, 'Do you think Tom DeLay should resign?' "

Instead, Republicans face another political question: How much more do they need to do — in making leadership changes and embracing legislative initiatives such as tighter rules for lobbyists — to truly distance their party from the taint of the Abramoff scandal?

Some Republicans believe an aggressive anti-corruption agenda is needed. They argue that although DeLay may no longer loom as a leadership figure, his imprint will remain on the way the party raises money and conducts legislative strategy.

Over the last decade, DeLay built powerful new connections between the party and Washington's "K Street" lobbying corridor, harnessing the finances and political support of various interest groups behind a conservative agenda. His skill in doing so gave the GOP strong fundraising advantages, but it created an atmosphere of coziness that Abramoff was able to exploit.

Some of the House's junior Republican members are saying that if the GOP wants to burnish its image with the public, perhaps fresh faces should be brought into the leadership ranks. Although House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) appeared secure in his post, other leaders might be challenged.

Rep. Thaddeus McCotter (R-Mich.) called Saturday for a "potential housecleaning" and full disclosure of GOP leaders' relationships with lobbyists.

"We have to reaffirm that the people who are in positions of leadership have the credentials, the moral credibility, to lead," he said.

Still, the Republicans initially being mentioned as contenders for majority leader have been close to DeLay and are skilled players in the political fundraising machine he established.

Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, the majority whip temporarily serving as majority leader, is a DeLay protege who received $8,500 in campaign contributions linked to Abramoff. Last week, he announced he would give that amount to charity.

In June 2003, the Washington Post reported that Blunt had tried to insert into legislation a provision benefiting Philip Morris USA Co. at a time when he had a close personal relationship with its lobbyist and when his son worked for the cigarette maker.

Another possible candidate for majority leader, Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, also had financial links to Abramoff.

According to the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics, he received $32,500 in campaign contributions from Abramoff and the lobbyist's clients — more than DeLay did.

And in the mid-1990s, Boehner was criticized by public interest groups for passing out campaign contributions from tobacco companies to lawmakers on the House floor.

If Blunt or Boehner became majority leader, it would leave them open to Democratic charges that they remain steeped in a "culture of corruption" in Washington.

"Neither [Blunt nor Boehner] presents a stark change in the leadership," said a Republican strategist who asked not to be named when discussing the two lawmakers. "There is a certain amount of sympathy for generation-skipping, for reaching outside the leadership circle entirely" in finding a successor to DeLay.

That approach, however, would risk delegating power to a lawmaker with less experience in the complex business of running the House.

The challenges of that job became clear when Blunt took over temporarily from DeLay. The House struggled to pass crucial budget bills and postponed final action on Bush's tax cut proposals.

DOJ_NMG_0008578

"There is a lot of concern about who can actually do the job," said former Rep. Vin Weber (R-Minn.), who remains in close touch with party leaders. "It has become clear that DeLay was the centerpiece holding the [House] Republican majority together. People understand they have to run the place. It's not just about PR."

Some Republicans believe that Bush might have to step into the breach and play a more aggressive role in advancing his legislative agenda.

"He may have to take a little bit more time and a little bit more involvement in getting some of the tough part of this agenda through," said Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Ga.).

Whatever Republicans do in their new leadership elections, the team that emerges probably will benefit from shedding the shaky status of the temporary leadership structure that has been in place.

"It's very sad for [DeLay], but I think it's an opportunity for clarity and a sense of mission for an election year," said Mark Isakowitz, a Republican lobbyist close to House leaders.

DeLay Halts Bid To Regain House Post (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Faced with increasing anger from his fellow Republicans, Representative Tom DeLay of Texas announced yesterday that he will no longer seek to regain his post as majority leader. The decision brought an end to the leadership career of one of the most powerful and polarizing members of Congress.

DeLay's announcement was made less than 24 hours after moderate and conservative lawmakers began circulating a petition demanding that he be permanently replaced as majority leader. That effort was launched after the indictment of Jack Abramoff, in a scandal that threatens to envelop a wide range of lawmakers.

The move sets the stage for a potentially divisive vote next month in which Republicans will choose a new majority leader, the second-ranking leadership post in the House of Representatives, as November's congressional elections approach. Within hours of DeLay's announcement, several candidates were reported to be contacting colleagues to line up support.

In a letter to his fellow Republicans, DeLay said he remains confident that he would be cleared of wrongdoing. But he said he recognized that Republicans must choose a new majority leader to move beyond the distractions that his legal woes have brought.

"The United States House of Representatives must be focused on the job of protecting our nation and meeting the daily challenges facing the American people," DeLay wrote.

"History has proven that when House Republicans are united and focused, success follows," DeLay continued. "While we wage these important battles, I cannot allow our adversaries to divide and distract our attention."

DeLay's ties to Abramoff are drawing close scrutiny, and the Texas Republican is also under indictment in an unrelated matter involving allegations of money laundering in a campaign-financing plan. Under House Republican rules, that indictment forced him to resign as majority leader on a temporary basis, but until yesterday DeLay had insisted that he would return after being cleared.

The New York Times reported on its website yesterday that prosecutors are also looking at questions of influence-peddling by a lobbying firm founded by Edwin A. Buckham, a close DeLay friend and his former chief of staff. The firm promoted the idea that it could deliver access to DeLay, and paid DeLay's wife $115,000 in consulting fees, the Times reported.

DeLay said he would continue to serve in his suburban Houston district. He will seek a 12th term this fall, in what promises to be a tough campaign against Nick Lampson, a Democrat and a former congressman.

The move robs Republicans of one of their most talented and aggressive vote-counters, as the GOP agenda has begun to stall and as President Bush and congressional leaders wrestle with sagging approval ratings.

While members pushed to oust DeLay in part out of fear about their own reelection prospects this fall, the revolt that led DeLay to step aside could send the opposite message to voters. DeLay's decision to resign on the heels of the Abramoff plea might suggest a "hint of guilt," said Julian Zelizer, a congressional historian at Boston University.

DOJ_NMG_0008579

"The dam has broken," Zelizer said. "Democrats clearly have a big opportunity to develop the theme of Republicans and the culture of corruption. This is a big blow to the Republican Party."

But rank-and-file Republicans had a different read on the political landscape. Selecting a new majority leader will allow Republicans to distance themselves from the scandals that swirled around DeLay, and to develop changes in ethics laws that would show a renewed commitment to responsible governance, said Representative Charles F. Bass, a New Hampshire Republican who has led efforts to hold new elections.

"The person who replaces Tom DeLay as permanent majority leader needs to define an agenda for the party that works, and have some specific ideas about what we need to do with ethics," Bass said.

"It's bad news for the Democrats and good news for Republicans and the integrity of the political process," added Bass.

The House speaker, J. Dennis Hastert had tried to keep the party's divisions under wraps by keeping the majority leader's post open for DeLay while he sought to weather his legal storm. After DeLay was indicted in September, Hastert orchestrated a power-sharing arrangement in which the majority whip, Roy Blunt of Missouri, took over DeLay's job temporarily, and in which other members assumed Blunt's responsibilities.

But with the 2006 elections looming, in which all 435 House seats are on the ballot, moderate Republicans grew increasingly concerned about being tarred by their association with DeLay. They teamed with a younger crop of conservative House members who have chafed at DeLay's hard-nosed leadership style and what they viewed as straying from the party's goals of fiscal discipline and high ethical standards.

The frustrations culminated in the petition drive demanding new leadership elections, launched Friday morning by Bass, a moderate, and Representative Jeff Flake of Arizona, a conservative.

Within hours, Flake and Bass had gathered more than half of the 50 signatures they needed to force a meeting to discuss new elections, and word quickly spread among GOP House members that they would gather 50 by early this week.

DeLay initially dismissed talk of a new election. His spokesman issued a statement Friday afternoon expressing DeLay's confidence that he continued to enjoy the support of a majority of House Republicans.

But any chance that DeLay might have had of hanging on seemed to evaporate by Friday evening. Mindful of the dissension within his caucus, a Hastert aide issued a statement saying that the speaker had always said he would allow members to revisit the leadership situation in early 2006.

It was not an endorsement of a new election. But the statement was an unmistakable signal that Hastert would not lend his political weight to helping his lieutenant regain the post.

"The speaker knew that a leadership election was going to happen," Flake said. "I was happy to see that Tom DeLay did the right thing, and I applaud him for it. This is the best thing for the party."

Hastert said yesterday that a new majority leader would be elected in the week of Jan. 31, when the House is scheduled to begin its 2006 session. He applauded DeLay's move.

"It is an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican Conference," Hastert said in a statement. "We expect that Tom will continue to help House Republicans succeed with our agenda as we move forward this year."

Democrats served notice that they still intend to use DeLay as an election issue, along with other high-profile ethics-related cases.

Representative Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said the GOP cannot run from what he described as a philosophy' that caters to special interests.

"By forcing out Tom DeLay, Republicans have addressed a party problem, but not the institutional problem of corruption that most troubles the American people," said Emanuel, an Illinois Democrat.

"With the permanence of their special-interest philosophy, a change in the Republican cast of characters simply doesn't matter," Emanuel added in a statement.

Hastert is expected to back Blunt for majority leader, but the race could be a free-for-all. Representative John A. Boehner an Ohio Republican and chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee, is expected to be a front-runner. Boehner made calls to his supporters yesterday, and a source close to the congressman said he is likely to run.

Other potential candidates are Representatives Mike Pence, of Indiana and chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee; Jerry Lewis, of California and chairman of the House Appropriations Committee; and John B. Shadegg, of Arizona, chairman of the House Republican Policy Committee.

Flake said the party needs a full debate about its future and the caucus would benefit from electing a leader who represents a clean break with the current regime. He said he has made no commitments.

"Speaker Hastert wants a united front," Flake said. "But we really can't have that here, because we need the candidates to put together a reform agenda, and say, 'Here's the course correction that I envision.' We don't just need new leaders; we need a course correction, and unless we have it, we're going to be in the minority."

DeLay Gives Up Bid To Reclaim House Post (AP-Y2)

By David Espo

AP, January 8, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay, the defiant face of a conservative revolution in Congress, stepped down as House majority leader on Saturday under pressure from Republicans staggered by an election-year corruption scandal.

"During my time in Congress, I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land," the Texas lawmaker told fellow Republicans in a letter informing them of his decision.

Still, referring to criminal charges he faces in his home state, he added, "I cannot allow our adversaries to divide and distract our attention."

DeLay temporarily gave up his leadership post after he was charged, but always insisted he would reclaim his duties after clearing his name.

His turnabout cleared the way for leadership elections among Republicans buffeted by poor polls and by lobbyist Jack Abramoff's confessions of guilt on corruption charges in connection with congressional wining and dining.

The race to replace Delay as majority leader began taking shape immediately, with Reps. Roy Blunt of Missouri, the GOP whip, and John Boehner of Ohio, a former member of the leadership, making clear their intentions to run. Rep. Jerry Lewis of California declined to say whether he would join them.

Speaker Dennis Hastert, his own grip on power secure, said he expects elections to be held when lawmakers return to the Capitol the week of Jan. 31. That set the stage for several weeks of political maneuvering, and the possibility of a wholesale shuffle in the leadership lineup 10 months before midterm elections.

Democrats, eager to take control of the House in November, reacted to DeLay's announcement with studied indifference.

"The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress," said Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader.

Added Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the House Democratic campaign organization: "With the permanence of their special interest philosophy, a change in the Republican cast of characters simply doesn't matter."

Democrats must gain 15 seats in November to win control of the 435-member House.

At a news conference in Texas, DeLay said he had called Hastert, R-Ill., on Saturday to inform him of his decision. "Our success in lowering taxes, creating jobs, growing the economy and providing effective national security was helped by Tom Delay's leadership," the speaker said in a statement.

The 58-year-old DeLay, an exterminator before his election to Congress in 1984, said he intends to seek re-election next fall. "I plan to run a very vigorous campaign and I plan to win it," he told reporters in Texas.

The voters aside, his political future will hinge not only on the outcome of the Texas allegations, but on the future of the Abramoff investigation.

Michael Scanlon, a former DeLay aide and an Abramoff business partner, pleaded guilty in the fall to corruption charges. In court papers, the lobbyist said he had once paid $50,000 to the wife of another former DeLay aide to help kill legislation opposed by his clients.

DeLay has been a fixture in the Republican leadership since the GOP won its majority in the 1994 election landslide.

DOJ_NMG_0008581

An outsider at first, he muscled his way up the hierarchy when he won election as whip over the hand-picked choice of then-Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga.

When Gingrich nearly fell in a coup more than three years later, DeLay went before fellow Republicans at a private meeting and emotionally confessed his role in the plotting. He prospered politically, moving up to become majority leader, the No. 2 post, in 1999.

Contrition was never a quality he displayed to his adversaries — Democrats, outside interest groups and others who sought to check the advance of the conservative GOP agenda he promoted.

DeLay raised millions of dollars for the campaigns of fellow House Republicans, conservatives and moderates alike, earning their gratitude regardless of their ideology. He courted controversy almost reflexively, including his involvement in an attempt to force corporations and industry groups to hire more Republican lobbyists.

He rarely backed down.

DeLay was the driving force behind President Clinton's impeachment in 1999, weeks after Republicans lost seats at the polls in a campaign in which they tried to make an issue of Clinton's personal behavior.

DeLay's downfall began at home in Texas, when he led a drive to redraw the state's congressional district boundaries and increase the number of GOP seats in the U.S. House. He succeeded, but was soon ensnared in an investigation involving the use of corporate funds in the campaigns of Texas legislators who had participated in the redistricting.

Flashing his trademark defiance, DeLay attacked prosecutor Ronnie Earle as an "unabashed partisan zealot." He pledged repeatedly to clear his name and said he would reclaim his duties as majority leader by the end of January.

The scandal spawned by Abramoff intervened, though.

Within two days of the lobbyist's appearances in federal court last week, GOP lawmakers began circulating petitions calling for elections. Hastert immediately made clear he would not stand in the way.

`After the Abramoff thing we got critical mass," said Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., who long had advocated new leadership.

While Flake is a conservative in a safe congressional district, others suddenly calling for change were more moderate Republicans who could face difficult re-election campaigns this fall.

New Mexico's Heather Wilson was among them.

She said three of DeLay's "former senior staff members have admitted or have been implicated in corrupt and illegal activities to get money for themselves by influencing legislation. Whether or not Mr. DeLay was involved himself or knew this was going on, he is responsible for his office."

DeLay Ends Bid To Reclaim Majority Leader Post (REU-Y2)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, January 8, 2006

U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay, now under indictment in Texas and tainted by a corruption scandal, told fellow House of Representatives Republicans on Saturday that he will not try to reclaim his job as majority leader.

"Today I have asked Speaker (Dennis) Hastert to convene our conference for the purpose of electing a new majority leader," DeLay, a close ally of President George W. Bush and one of the most powerful conservatives in Congress, said in a letter to House Republican leaders.

Later, at a Sugar Land, Texas, appearance surrounded by supporters, DeLay said he would remain in Congress and campaign for re-election in November. "In 21 years in Congress I have always acted in an ethical manner ... and time once again will bear out that truth."

"The job of majority leader is too important to be hamstrung by personal distractions," he said.

DeLay's decision to resign after three years of tumultuous reign as majority leader set off a scramble among at least a handful of Republicans who want to capture the second most powerful post in the House.

Whoever wins will face the difficult job of steering the party past the influence-peddling scandal involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff that has rocked Washington just as all 435 members of the House gear up for November elections.

DOJ_NMG_0008582

Abramoff earlier this week pleaded guilty to fraud charges and admitted that he gave golf trips, sports tickets and other gifts to lawmakers in return for special treatment.

His potential cooperation with federal investigators left lawmakers rattled and many returned campaign contributions from Abramoff clients.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat, said DeLay had "engineered" a "culture of corruption ... so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress."

The White House, which earlier in the week said it would be shedding some Abramoff campaign contributions, supported DeLay's action. "We respect Congressman DeLay's decision to put the interests of the American people, the House of Representatives and the Republican Party first," said spokeswoman Erin Healy.

HOUSE JOB OPEN

Acting Majority Leader Roy Blunt of Missouri is expected to seek DeLay's job on a more permanent basis. Blunt took over the job in September when DeLay was forced to temporarily resign after being indicted in his home state of Texas in a campaign finance case. Those charges were unrelated to the Abramoff scandal.

At the time, DeLay insisted that he would be cleared in the Texas case and would retake the powerful majority leader job.

Ohio Republican John Boehner, chairman of an education and labor committee, is also expected to mount a strong challenge for majority leader.

Hastert, an Illinois Republican, said the elections likely will held during the week of January 31 when the House reconvenes after a long winter break.

Some House Republicans have talked about the need to elect all new leaders, but key lawmakers this week said they did not think Hastert would be challenged.

DeLay, 58, known around Washington as "The Hammer" for his tight control of the House and ability to vanquish political opponents, said in a letter to Hastert he will "work to clear my name of the baseless charges leveled against me."

He also said he will reclaim his seat on the powerful House Appropriations Committee, which controls much of federal spending, including a major NASA space center in his district.

DeLay's decision to leave the Republican leadership came after a group of moderate and conservative House Republicans abandoned their leader and called for elections to replace him.

DeLay's support among rank-and-file Republicans evaporated after Abramoff's guilty pleas this week. At least two former aides of DeLay are entangled in the Abramoff scandal and DeLay has referred to the former lobbyist as a close friend.

In his resignation letter, DeLay said he had "always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land. I am fully confident time will bear this out."

DeLay, who has blamed his legal troubles on partisan Democrats, said he "cannot allow our adversaries to divide and distract our attention" from legislative work.

DeLay Says He Won't Seek To Return As Majority Leader (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Laura Litvan

Bloomberg, January 8, 2006

Jan. 7 (Bloomberg) -- Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay said he will abandon his drive to return to the post of No. 2 House Republican, bowing to the growing clamor in his party for elections to replace him and setting up a succession battle.

In a letter to House Speaker Dennis Hastert and a separate letter to all House Republican colleagues, DeLay for the first time acknowledged that a legal battle in Texas is unlikely to be resolved anytime soon, and said it is time for his party to move ahead without him.

``The job of majority leader and the mandate of the Republican majority are too important to be hamstrung, even for a few months, by personal distractions," DeLay wrote in his letter to Hastert.

DeLay, a Texas Republican, said he will seek re-election and return to a seat on the House Appropriations Committee. DeLay said he will continue to work to clear his name ``of the baseless charges leveled against me."

``I will continue to serve my constituents," DeLay said in comments this afternoon to reporters and about 60 supporters in his district at Sugar Land City Hall in Sugar Land, Texas, about 20 miles southwest of Houston. ``I plan to run a very vigorous campaign. I plan to win it."

Hastert said in a statement that House Republicans will hold elections the week of Jan. 31, when the House returns to work for 2006.

``It is an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican Conference," Hastert said of DeLay's decision.

Federal Investigation

DeLay faces money-laundering charges in Texas, and a guilty plea Jan. 3 by Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff threatens to draw DeLay and other lawmakers into a federal corruption probe. DeLay was forced under House Republican caucus rules to step aside as majority leader in late September after his indictment by a Texas grand jury, and House Majority Whip Roy Blunt has been holding both roles temporarily.

Blunt has indicated that he would like to run in leadership elections to replace DeLay. Both Blunt and another candidate, House Education and Workforce Committee Chairman John Boehner of Ohio, put out statements praising DeLay, a Republican leader since 1992 and majority leader for three years.

``My belief is that Tom will eventually be cleared and exonerated, and my hope is that our conference will one day again benefit from Tom's rare commitment to the principles of smaller government and freedom for which all Republicans fight," Boehner said in an e-mailed statement.

Midterm Elections

Republicans, who control the White House and both houses of Congress, face midterm elections in November. All 435 seats in the U.S. House of Representatives are up for grabs and a third of the U.S. Senate. Democrats are angling to use DeLay's legal troubles and ethics questions involving other Republicans as an issue in this year's elections.

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said DeLay's decision shouldn't resolve concerns of those who question whether the Republican party is ensnared in a ``culture of corruption."

``For years, at the expense of the American people, the House Republicans have enabled and benefited from the Republican culture of corruption engineered by Tom DeLay," Pelosi said. ``The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress."

New Poll

A new poll released today by AP-Ipsos suggests Democrats may have an opening. The Jan. 3-5 poll of 1,001 adults found that 49 preferred to see Democrats control Congress, while 36 percent want to see Republicans stay in charge. The poll had a margin of error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

DeLay made his decision a day after two House Republicans -- Charles Bass of New Hampshire and Jeff Flake of Arizona -- began circulating a petition among House Republicans needed to start the election process.

DeLay had requested a speedy trial in Texas in an effort to resolve that case, which stems from allegations of illegal fundraising to help elect more Republicans to the Texas statehouse in 2002. Still, he faces a second potential problem after Abramoff pleaded guilty this week to tax evasion, wire fraud and conspiring to corrupt public officials in cases in Washington and Miami.

Golfing Trip

Abramoff is cooperating as prosecutors investigate possible corruption of members of Congress, their aides and former staffers. While DeLay has not been directly implicated, he went on a golfing trip to the U.K. with the lobbyist in 2000. In October, investigators questioned the staff of former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher over a visit DeLay made to her office while on the U.K. trip.

DeLay's former deputy chief of staff, Tony Rudy, has been identified by people close to the investigation as one of the subjects of the probe. DeLay's attorney, Robert Cullen, insists that his client has little to fear in the Justice Department's corruption probe.

Once employed as a pest exterminator, DeLay entered Congress two decades ago after six years in the Texas statehouse. He is the only remaining House leader who served with former Speaker Newt Gingrich after Republicans retook the House in 1994. He initially served as the party's vote-counting ``whip," and his arm-twisting skills earned him the nickname ``The Hammer."

Top Fundraiser

DeLay has been one of the top fundraisers for his party, and consolidated his party's power by demanding that corporations and trade associations hire more Republicans as lobbyists. The tide began to turn against him after his efforts to help Republicans control the statehouse in Texas to redraw congressional district boundaries to favor Republicans. While Republicans picked up five additional U.S. House seats in that state in 2004 as a result of his effort, it triggered charges related to allegedly illegal use of corporate donations to elect statehouse candidates.

DeLay's re-election to his Houston-area district isn't assured. He won his 2004 re-election with 55 percent of the vote. He faces three Republican primary challengers and a general election against former Democratic Representative Nick Lampson. Lampson is one of the Democrats who lost his seat after the DeLay-directed redistricting, and the campaign is becoming a national cause for Democratic donors.

Chris Bell, a former Democratic Congressman who filed one of the original ethics complaints against DeLay and lost his seat after the Texas districts were redrawn, said in a telephone interview that ``today's announcement represents a victory for ethics reform."

``While Tom DeLay was in power there was no way ethics reform would have been possible," said Bell, who is a candidate for governor in the Texas Democratic primary in March. ``You can't put partisanship above everything else."

Reaction To DeLay Announcement (AP-Y2)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 8, 2006

Reaction to Rep. Tom DeLay's announcement Saturday that he will abandon his bid to reclaim his post as majority leader:

"We respect Congressman DeLay's decision to put the interests of the American people, the House of Representatives and the Republican Party first." — White House spokeswoman Erin Healy.

"It is an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican Conference ... We expect that Tom will continue to help House Republicans succeed with our agenda as we move forward this year." — House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

"For years, at the expense of the American people, the House Republicans have enabled and benefited from the Republican culture of corruption engineered by Tom DeLay. The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress." — House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California.

"My belief is that Tom will eventually be cleared and exonerated, and my hope is that our conference will one day again benefit from Tom's rare commitment to the principles of smaller government and freedom for which all Republicans fight." — Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, who is considered likely to seek the job of majority leader.

"Tom DeLay bears much of the responsibility for the culture of corruption Republicans have created in Washington, D.C., but his removal from House leadership alone will not end the pervasive cronyism and corruption that he and Washington Republicans created." — Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

"My good friend Tom DeLay has made a very difficult decision. ... It is my firm belief that he will beat these baseless charges and will continue to be a strong, effective and committed leader in our efforts to protect our country, limit the scope of government, and win the battle of ideas. ... I know Tom's legacy as one of the most effective Republican leaders in history is assured." — Rep. Roy Blunt, R-Mo, the GOP whip who temporarily has filled in for DeLay and is likely to run for the job.

"I look forward to the democratic process of choosing a new majority leader who will ensure that integrity, honesty, and ethical accountability are central tenants of government operations in Washington." — Rep. Charlie Bass, R-N.H., one of the leaders of the effort to have a new election for majority leader.

DOJ_NMG_0008585

"We don't just need new leaders, we need a course correction. This is deeper than just who stands at the head of the party. We have created a system here ... that just breeds corruption. ... We just cannot continue with this trend." — Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., who worked with Bass on pressing for a new election.

"I applaud his decision. It's a good decision. When we return in January, I look forward to a newly elected leadership team." — Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va.

"Tom really has been an effective leader, but he's always been very controversial. It's a decision he feels that is in the best interest of the conference." — Rep. Paul Gillmor, R-Ohio.

"I think it was inevitable. The momentum in the House Republican conference was moving that way. It was presenting problems in moving the agenda forward." — Rep. Pat Tiberi, R-Ohio.

"Cleaning up the pervasive culture of corruption in Washington requires more than shuffling the Republican leadership. It requires cleaning the House. As long as DeLay 'wanna-be's' are in control, America will suffer from their arrogance." — Rep. Lloyd Doggett, D-Texas

"Today's decision, although difficult, continues Tom DeLay's commitment to put his nation, his constituents, his colleagues and his party first." — RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman.

"Tom DeLay is doing the right thing by permanently stepping down. It's time for a more mainstream leader that reflects the views and ethics of the American people and will make restoring Americans' faith in government their top priority." — Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn.

Analysis: GOP Woes Don't End With DeLay (AP-Y2)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, January 8, 2006

Republicans worried about their party's future have succeeded in pushing embattled former Majority Leader Tom DeLay off the stage. Even so, the Republicans' election-year troubles are far from over.

Need a reminder?

President Bush, the titular head of the GOP, is waging an unpopular war in Iraq and presiding over a nation with lingering economic anxieties. He suffers from approval ratings around 40 percent — near record lows for his presidency. Questionable stock transactions by the top Republican in the Senate, Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, are under investigation. A special prosecutor's probe continues into whether Bush administration officials outed a CIA operative in retribution for her husband's Iraq war criticism. A secret anti-terror program that Bush approved to eavesdrop on people inside the United States without warrants is raising concerns about overly broad presidential powers.

Potentially most damaging is an influence-peddling scandal on Capitol Hill.

Last week's guilty pleas to corruption and tax evasion charges by the central figure in the scandal, disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, are anything but the last chapter. Abramoff is cooperating in a wide-ranging investigation that could ensnare dozens of lawmakers with close ties to the generous and powerful lobbyist, including DeLay and House Administration Committee Chairman Bob Ney, R-Ohio.

Ross Baker, a political science professor at Rutgers University, called it a "partywide crisis" that the GOP has problems with its leadership in all three areas of the federal government that it controls.

"The removal of DeLay from the leadership doesn't end their problems with scandal and, more broadly, with running the House," said Norm Ornstein with the conservative American Enterprise Institute. "That's their challenge, is to begin to get their policy act together. And they're going to have to do it with just Republicans because Democrats are going to be against them."

Republican domination of Congress is at stake in the November elections. Indeed, a new Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that 49 percent of those surveyed said they would prefer to see Democrats take control of Congress, compared with 36 percent who want a continued Republican majority.

With that in mind, Saturday's decision by DeLay to abandon his bid to resume his No. 2 post in the House was welcomed by Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0008586

The man Democrats love to hate is battling campaign finance charges in Texas that had forced him to step aside as majority leader. Maintaining his innocence, he had said he intended to take his leadership position back once cleared of the charges. DeLay changed his tune under pressure from fellow Republicans that only grew as the Abramoff case mushroomed.

At the White House, where aides had insisted for weeks that the famously effective DeLay retained the president's support, there was a sharp pivot. "We respect Congressman DeLay's decision to put the interests of the American people, the House of Representatives and the Republican Party first," Bush spokeswoman Erin Healy said.

Democrats have made clear they plan to make GOP corruption a centerpiece campaign theme. They pounced.

"Tom DeLay bears much of the responsibility for the culture of corruption Republicans have created in Washington, D.C., but his removal from House leadership alone will not end the pervasive cronyism and corruption that he and Washington Republicans created," said Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

The anti-corruption tact gives Democrats the opportunity to overcome bad fractures within their party as well as their lack of a cohesive message. An AP-Ipsos poll last month showed that 88 percent of Americans say that corruption reaching into all levels of government is a serious problem.

Bush had hoped to rescue both his and his party's political fortunes by turning a new page in 2006 and focusing on immigration reform, good economic news and turning around public opinion on Iraq.

But I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is expected to stand trial in the CIA leak case this summer, just ahead of the midterm elections. The special prosecutor's inquiry continues, leaving the fate of other senior White House officials, notably Bush's deputy chief of staff and political guru Karl Rove, in doubt.

And the election for a new House majority leader will serve as a reminder of the GOP's troubles right when Bush is unveiling his election-year agenda. The House reconvenes the week of Jan. 30, with the election likely to be held right away. Bush's annual State of the Union address is tentatively scheduled for that week.

Missouri Rep. Roy Blunt, the GOP whip who temporarily has filled in for DeLay and is expected to run to permanently take his place, also could suffer from his association with Abramoff. He was among many lawmakers who refunded or gave to charity some or all of the donations they received from Abramoff, his associates or clients.

Though House Speaker Dennis Hastert's position seems secure, some are calling for a wider leadership shake up that would be messy and distracting. "The conference needs the ability to reassess the leadership team as a whole," said Rep. Melissa Hart, R-Pa.

___

EDITOR'S NOTE: Jennifer Loven has reported from Washington for nine years. Associated Press writer Douglass K. Daniel contributed to this analysis.

Tenacious Tom DeLay Has Had Wild Ride (AP-Y2)

By Donna Cassata And Laurie Kellman

AP, January 8, 2006

Ever disciplined, Tom DeLay even stage-managed one of the lowest moments of his life.

Summoned to a Texas court last fall, DeLay was fingerprinted and photographed like a common criminal. But what a mug shot.

Immaculately groomed in jacket and tie, DeLay grinned from ear to ear, looking more like he had just won the lottery, rather than someone who was facing charges of money laundering.

That was the point: control the message and your enemies can't use it against you.

Democrats gleefully have sought to make the Texas Republican the poster boy for bad Republican behavior. They sorely will miss DeLay's departure from the national stage.

DeLay often operated close to the ethical edge in his ascension to the powerful job of House majority leader.

Relying on political prowess, arm-twisting and devotion to his GOP majority, DeLay tightened the Republican grip on the House in his seven years as Republican whip, the party's No. 3 leadership post. And he delivered for President Bush. The fellow Texans were political partners, but never were close.

DOJ_NMG_0008587

DeLay first harnessed his acrimony for government regulations in the late 1970s and rode it into the Texas House and Congress. During his stint in the Texas Legislature, he was known as "Hot Tub Tom" for his partying ways.

Now he is a born-again Christian whose skill as a tenacious political strategist has allowed him to outmaneuver Democrats, pack Congress with more Republicans and push through some major pieces of Bush's legislative agenda.

When he rose to majority leader in 2003, DeLay sought to soften his image. He dumped his "wet look" hairstyle, filled a gap in his teeth and opened up more with the media.

Called "the Hammer" for his hard-nosed approach — his Capitol office has two leather bullwhips — the 58-year-old former pest exterminator has ensured House passage of much of Bush's legislative agenda, including tax cuts, trade agreements and a Medicare prescription drug plan.

His brass-knuckle tactics drew the ire of Democrats, Washington lobbyists and good-government types.

The House ethics committee admonished DeLay on three separate occasions in 2004. In addition to the Texas charges, a federal investigation is pursuing DeLay's ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

DeLay has denied any wrongdoing, telling fellow House Republicans in a letter Saturday, "During my time in Congress, I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land. I am fully confident time will bear this out."

In an April letter to supporters, DeLay borrowed a phrase coined by a long-ago besieged President Clinton, arguing his opponents' only agenda "is the politics of personal destruction." To which DeLay added, "and the criminalization of politics."

DeLay has come through for Bush even though DeLay once assailed the first President Bush for breaking his pledge not to increase taxes in 1990, and took heat from George W. Bush in the 2000 campaign for House efforts to disperse earned income tax payments to low-income families monthly instead of in one lump sum.

If DeLay has to hold a 15-minute vote open for the better part of an hour to twist arms, he will do it, as he did in securing House approval of Bush's Central American Free Trade Agreement in July by a razor-thin margin of two votes.

Lobbyists do not escape his version of hardball politics.

DeLay complained to the Electronic Industries Alliance over its hiring of former Democratic Rep. Dave McCurdy of Oklahoma as its president. DeLay subsequently was rebuked by the ethics committee for badgering a lobbying organization.

To win passage of the Medicare prescription drug bill, DeLay promised a lawmaker that if he would vote for the measure, DeLay would back a run for Congress by the lawmaker's son. The lawmaker refused, but DeLay was admonished again by the ethics committee for making the offer.

"His devotion to the cause has led him to push the envelope as hard as possible and not hold back," said Gary C. Jacobson, a professor of political science at the University of California at San Diego.

DeLay has worked tirelessly to increase the Republican majority in the House since the GOP swept out the Democrats in 1994. He has raised tens of millions for Republican candidates and used his own leadership political action committee to shower cash on GOP hopefuls.

In 2002, he helped buck the historic trend of midterm congressional election losses for the party controlling the White House; instead Republicans gained in the House.

He strong-armed a redistricting plan for Texas that led to the defeat of five Democrats in the state in 2004. The ethics panel rebuked DeLay for using the Federal Aviation Administration in the search for Texas Democratic lawmakers trying to avoid a vote on the redistricting proposal.

DeLay was unabashed. "I'm the majority leader and we want more seats," he said.

Elected to the House in 1984 from the Houston suburbs, DeLay chafed under Democratic rule for a decade before the GOP seized control. Then, in 1998, he led the charge in impeaching Clinton over the sex scandal involving a White House intern.

He might have been House speaker in 1998 after Rep. Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., stepped down and Rep. Bob Livingston, R-La., stunningly bowed out, but DeLay acknowledged that he was "too nuclear" to take the top job. He instead ensured that his deputy, Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., became speaker.

DOJ_NMG_0008588

A fierce conservative, DeLay energized the Republican base last year when he pushed for Congress to intervene in the case of a brain-damaged Florida woman, Terri Schiavo, in a direct challenge to a Florida court's authority. For the most part, the general public questioned the congressional action and the GOP took a hit in opinion polls.

DeLay has raised one daughter and three foster children with his wife, Christine.

DeLay Ends His Drive To Regain Post (LAT)

By Mary Curtius And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, indicted in Texas last fall and under scrutiny in a blossoming political scandal on Capitol Hill, abandoned on Saturday his effort to regain his leadership post.

His decision touched off a race to succeed him in a Republican Party beset by ethics problems. And it followed days of political turmoil and soul-searching within the GOP, sparked by Tuesday's guilty pleas to corruption-related charges by lobbyist Jack Abramoff, once a close DeLay associate.

In a letter released Saturday, DeLay said he agreed with growing calls among Republicans for a new, permanent majority leader to be chosen soon.

"The job of majority leader is too important to be hamstrung by personal distractions," a tired-looking DeLay said later in the day during a public appearance in his hometown of Sugar Land, Texas.

He also pledged to stay in Congress and run a "vigorous" campaign for reelection in November for the Houston-area seat he has held since 1984.

DeLay, for years widely viewed as Congress' most influential Republican, stepped down as majority leader after he was charged in September with violating campaign finance laws in Texas. Insisting he expected to be found not guilty early this year, DeLay said he would then seek to reclaim the post.

House Republicans — many of whom agreed with DeLay's assertion that the Texas charges were politically motivated — had been willing to give him time to resolve that case. Instead of naming a permanent successor in September, they appointed Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri to be temporary majority leader.

One reason the party so supported him was his work over the last decade to increase campaign contributions to Republican coffers. Key to that was the "K Street Project," an initiative through which Washington's lobbying community was persuaded to increase their donations to the GOP.

Another reason was his ability to deliver unified votes for the party's legislative agenda — he has long has been known in Washington as "The Hammer," a testament to his brass-knuckles political style.

But the Abramoff guilty pleas transformed DeLay-related political calculations. By the end of last week, pressure within GOP ranks was growing for him to relinquish any claim on the majority leader post.

Among the crimes Abramoff acknowledged were bilking Indian tribal clients out of tens of millions of dollars and attempting to influence congressional lawmakers with lavish trips, gifts and campaign contributions. He is cooperating with federal investigators who are examining his ties to DeLay, other lawmakers, and current and former congressional staff members.

As a result, many House Republicans up for reelection this year began worrying about the political fallout of keeping alive DeLay's leadership hopes.

"You know how people talk about the captain being willing to go down with the ship?" said one Republican lawmaker, speaking on condition of anonymity because the issue is politically sensitive.

"Well, in this case, it would have been the ship going down with the captain."

Among those pressuring DeLay to support the selection of a new majority leader was House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), DeLay's longtime political ally.

According to a lawmaker close to the speaker, Hastert dispatched emissaries to Sugar Land — where DeLay, 58, was hunkered down with family members and his closest advisors — to urge him to give up for the good of the party. The lawmaker spoke on condition of anonymity when discussing Hastert's role in the matter.

Ron Bonjean, Hastert's spokesman, said DeLay phoned the speaker Saturday morning to tell him of his decision.

DOJ_NMG_0008589

Hastert, in a statement, said DeLay's decision was "honorable … and the right decision for the House Republican Conference."

A White House statement expressed "respect" for DeLay's decision "to put the interests of the American people, the House of Representatives and the Republican Party first."

Hastert canceled plans to lead a congressional delegation to Asia and the Egypt starting Monday. The vote on a new majority leader is to be held the first week of February.

Several Republicans said Saturday that Hastert's position as speaker remains secure but that other leadership jobs could be contested as part of the battle for majority leader.

The campaign for that post was in full swing by Saturday afternoon. Senior staff members for several lawmakers opened their Capitol Hill offices and the political horse-trading commenced.

At least one GOP congressman received a call from Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) seeking support to become majority leader. Boehner (pronounced BAY-ner), 56, chairman of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, helped win passage of President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act. Before being elected to Congress in 1990, he ran a plastics and packing company.

He was elected House Republican Conference chairman, the chamber's No. 4 GOP spot, in 1994. An ally of ex-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), he lost the conference post in 1998 to a DeLay-backed candidate.

Blunt, 55, the acting majority leader, is expected to seek the job on a permanent basis.

First elected to Congress in 1996, the low-key Blunt is less combative than DeLay. It was with DeLay's support in late 2002 that he won the No. 3 House post, majority whip — the person responsible for corralling the votes to promote the party's agenda. Blunt is a former Missouri secretary of state who was for four years president of his alma mater Southwest Baptist University in Bolivar, Mo.

Others who are considered possible contenders include Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

"This is a workday," said a delighted Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.). "I'm already getting calls from candidates seeking my support, and there are conference calls going on everywhere."

Bass, a moderate, had joined with Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), a conservative, in circulating a letter Friday seeking an election for a permanent majority leader.

He and Flake normally are at far ends of the political spectrum, Bass noted, but they agreed that the party needed to take bold action to rid itself of the taint of scandal.

"I just didn't want to be any part of a caucus that was supporting, in any way, the kind of behavior that is alleged to have occurred between Jack Abramoff and perhaps a number of members of Congress," Bass said.

Bass and other Republicans said they would question candidates for the majority post closely about ethics concerns.

"The criteria for me and the litmus test for me is going to be [that] we have to elect leaders who are not tainted by the Abramoff scandal," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), who is close to Hastert. "The last thing we need is to elect new leaders and then a few months down the road have them under investigation for being involved with Jack Abramoff."

Amid such comments, Hastert was expected to announce as early as today proposals to tighten the rules governing lobbying of Congress.

Democrats are gearing up for a major challenge to DeLay in November's election. He won reelection in 2004 with 55% of the vote — a relatively poor showing for a longtime incumbent — and Democrats are prepared to pour money into this year's race.

"He's losing Republican support here in the district, and he's apparently lost it in Washington, D.C., as well," said Mike Malaise, campaign manager for Democrat Nick Lampson, a former congressman who is DeLay's likely opponent.

DeLay, the former owner of a pest extermination business, served as House majority whip for seven years and became majority leader in 2002. DeLay forged a highly disciplined coalition that focused on cutting taxes and promoting causes dear to the party's social conservative base.

DOJ_NMG_0008590

Although they were not personally close, Delay and President Bush forged an effective political partnership, with DeLay playing a key role in pushing through much of the administration's first-term legislative agenda.

But DeLay's hard-charging tactics sometimes brought him close to — or over — the ethical line. In 2004, he was rebuked three times by the House Ethics Committee for ethics lapses. Then, in 2005, a series of stories in the Washington Post and other newspapers detailed DeLay's ties to Abramoff, a flamboyant lobbyist who boasted of his ties to the Republican leadership.

It was disclosed that Delay had taken a trip to an expensive Scottish golf resort with Abramoff that was funded by the lobbyist's tribal clients, in violation of House ethics rules. DeLay said he thought the trip was financed by a conservative think tank, and he denied any wrongdoing.

*

Times staff writer Janet Hook contributed to this report.

Ethics Issues Snared GOP's Champion (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith And Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

Standing before a crowd of applauding House Republicans in the Capitol Hill Club last March, then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (Tex.) inscribed $1.8 million on a giant check and signed his name at the bottom with the flourish of a game show host. The tally, representing funds to be given to the campaigns of 10 Republican lawmakers, was yet another cache collected by one of the premier money machines ever to function on Capitol Hill.

It worked simply. On one side of the machine, a hose vacuumed the pockets of large corporations, wealthy individuals and legions of lobbyists on K Street, all instructed by DeLay to contribute only to Republicans. Out the other side, at some later date, came legislation of interest to many of the donors. Inside the machine, twisting its knobs and pulling its levers, was DeLay -- who was unabashed about his pay-to-play philosophy and relentless in enforcing his political rules.

DeLay's tenure in the congressional leadership, which came to a decisive end with his announcement yesterday that he would not try to regain the leadership post, was marked by an extraordinary record of political accomplishment. From Dec. 6, 1994, until last year, the former pest exterminator from a Houston suburb was the go-to guy in the House for legislative favors, perks, committee chairmanships and election cash.

"Tom DeLay and I have had our differences over the years, but he is one of the most effective and gifted leaders the Republican Party has ever known," said Rep. John A. Boehner (Ohio), who served in the leadership just below DeLay when the GOP, for the first time in recent years, won a majority in the House. He is likely to run for DeLay's now vacated slot as majority leader.

As President Bush noted recently, when DeLay was in the saddle, the administration's priorities were enacted by the House. Under his prodding, that body became in effect a single-party institution, with negligible Democratic influence in any aspect of its operations, from hearings to appropriations.

But DeLay's leadership was undermined over time by a blurring of ethical lines in the handling of money by his aides and advisers, his taste for the lifestyle of the super-rich, and his take-no-prisoners approach to political disputes in a town built on compromise. A lawmaker who cast himself as an icon of moral conservatism, DeLay came increasingly to be regarded as a symbol of special-interest lawmaking. With an election looming in 11 months, his colleagues began to fear the consequences.

Although DeLay was admonished by the House ethics committee as early as 1999 for retaliating against a trade association that hired a Democrat, for the most part his rigidly partisan style was welcomed by Republicans. Not until 2004 did the first major cracks in the DeLay political edifice appear. In three reports, the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct rebuked him for asking federal aviation officials to intervene in a Texas political spat, for improperly pressuring a fellow Republican to vote for a Medicare drug bill, and for creating the appearance that Westar Energy Inc. received special consideration in exchange for campaign donations.

The committee called on him to "temper your future actions to assure you are in compliance" with House ethics rules. But DeLay blamed the rebukes on malevolent Democrats, and his supporters retaliated by ousting the Republican chairman of the committee and tying up its operations in a prolonged dispute over staffing.

DOJ_NMG_0008591

More serious damage was done by an ethics inquiry in DeLay's home state, which led last September to his felony indictment and forced him to step aside temporarily under party rules. At issue was one of DeLay's more brilliant achievements, hailed by his fellow Republicans for solidifying their control of the House -- orchestrating a party takeover in the Texas legislature that led to an extraordinary redrawing of congressional districts and the election of five more Texas Republicans to Congress in 2004.

Charges of DeLay's involvement in money laundering associated with that state Republican victory in 2002 are unproved, and many campaign finance lawyers consider the Texas case to be weak. But DeLay's name has also figured prominently in a second ethics probe -- this one in Washington, under the aegis of a federal task force looking at the links between money and favors associated with lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Abramoff, whom DeLay once termed "one of my closest and dearest friends," pleaded guilty Tuesday to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion and promised to cooperate with investigators. Michael Scanlon, DeLay's former spokesman, pleaded guilty Nov. 21 to conspiracy to bribe public officials and likewise promised cooperation. Prosecutors are meanwhile looking at actions taken by ex-DeLay aides Tony C. Rudy and Edwin A. Buckham on behalf of Abramoff's clients. No one knows where these inquiries will lead, and uncertainty is always the enemy of political strength.

DeLay, now 58, gained a biology degree at the University of Houston and pursued a political career out of opposition to regulation of the pesticide industry. He first came to Congress in 1985, but it was not until a decade later that Buckham, Rudy, Scanlon, and Abramoff played key roles in DeLay's ascent in the GOP hierarchy, a rise underpinned by the steady infusion of corporate cash into Republican political campaigns.

DeLay was blunt about his emphasis on fundraising from the outset -- he and then-Rep. Richard K. Armey (Tex.) each promised in a leadership meeting before the 1994 election to raise half a million dollars for party hopefuls, and DeLay traveled to dozens of House districts, cementing ties to many challengers who won office that fall.

After the historic 1994 elections, when many like-minded conservatives swept into the House, DeLay capitalized on his fundraising prowess in a successful race for majority whip against Rep. Robert S. Walker (Pa.). Walker, who was Rep. Newt Gingrich's best friend and an expert in parliamentary maneuvering, was initially favored to win the contest -- at a time when Gingrich was poised to win election as speaker. But DeLay had distributed so much money that he overtook Walker, securing the votes of 52 out of the 73 freshmen in the Class of 1994.

Walker later decried what he considered the excessive influence of fundraising committees such as DeLay's Americans for a Republican Majority Political Action Committee (ARMPAC), which, he said, caused the outcome to be determined by money, not talent. But his colleagues largely shrugged their shoulders. Over the next decade, they accepted nearly $4.5 million in contributions from ARMPAC, which drew its funds heavily from tobacco, energy, railroad and communications interests.

Throughout his tenure in the leadership, DeLay frequently traveled to golf resorts and costly hotels for meetings with lobbyists at ARMPAC's expense; he also preferred traveling on corporate jets instead of commercial airlines. But DeLay was not selfish -- he earned the gratitude of many colleagues by extending the same perquisites to them in exchange for their votes.

According to his former colleagues, DeLay's office functioned at times like a hotel concierge, arranging corporate jets, private cars, fishing trips and other expense-paid travel during congressional breaks, key votes and party conventions, all financed by wealthy donors with interests before Congress.

DeLay's own travel has played a role in his undoing, as investigators have begun delving into the circumstances of trips that DeLay took with Abramoff to Moscow in 1997 and to Scotland and London in 2000. The first trip preceded an unusual million-dollar donation -- which former associates say originated with Russian energy executives -- to a group linked to DeLay; on the second trip, Abramoff and Buckham -- both registered lobbyists -- used their credit cards to pay for some of DeLay's expenses, in apparent conflict with ethics rules. DeLay says he was unaware of the precise financial arrangements for the travel.

Research database editor Derek Willis and researcher Magda Jean-Louis contributed to this report.

Ties To Abramoff Weave Intricate Web (HCHRON)

By MICHAEL HEDGES

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008592

WASHINGTON - When a top Justice Department official outlined the public corruption allegations against lobbyist Jack Abramoff, she almost seemed to be describing his cozy relationship with Rep. Tom DeLay.

Abramoff provided public officials with overseas trips, campaign contributions and excessive meals "with the intent ... that the public official would act to benefit Abramoff or his clients," Alice Fisher, head of the department's criminal division, said last week.

Partly to clear his name in the Abramoff affair, DeLay gave up on Saturday his quest to be reinstated as House majority leader. But federal prosecutors' outline of the scandal does not fit DeLay in one crucial respect:

So far, there is no known conclusive evidence that DeLay, the Republican from Sugar Land, performed political favors for Abramoff in return.

Establishing a quid pro quo is necessary to prove political bribery.

To make a case against DeLay, who is among the lawmakers said to be under investigation now that the lobbyist is cooperating with federal authorities, prosecutors must first piece together his complicated relationship with Abramoff, which grew on trips to Pacific islands, Russia and a golf course in Scotland.

The men were introduced in 1994 by conservative Rabbi Daniel Lapin, co-chair of the American Alliance of Jews and Christians, which he created with former GOP presidential candidate Gary Bauer.

DeLay, with strong ties to the Christian right, and Abramoff, an Orthodox Jew, apparently hit it off. Within a few years, DeLay would refer to Abramoff as one of his closest friends.

As a prominent lobbyist in Washington, Abramoff had much to gain from ties to lawmakers such as DeLay. Likewise, as prosecutors, records and news accounts show, Abramoff had lots to offer, including a nearly endless stream of money provided by his clients.

In the mid-1990s, Abramoff persuaded Russian oil and gas clients to donate $1 million to a conservative advocacy group called the U.S. Family Network, which was set up by former DeLay chief of staff Edwin Buckham and collected $2.5 million in its five years of operation.

According to the Washington Post, Buckham told the former head of the U.S. Family Network — the organization had a single full-time employee — that the Russians gave the money to influence DeLay's vote on international aid to Russia. DeLay has denied that his vote was influenced improperly.

The U.S. Family Network received a half-million dollars from garment manufacturers in the Northern Mariana Islands with ties to Abramoff and a quarter-million dollars from Indian tribes he represented.

The money was used to buy radio ads attacking Democrats and to purchase a town house on Capitol Hill near DeLay's office that, according to the Post, DeLay associates called the "safe house." DeLay used it for his own campaign fundraising, the newspaper reported.

Trip to Russia

DeLay's wife, Christine, worked for three years for a lobbying firm run by Buckham, receiving a monthly salary of $3,200, a total of $115,200.

The firm, the Alexander Strategy Group, received hundreds of thousands of dollars in fees from the U.S. Family Network, money almost entirely derived from Abramoff clients.

Christine DeLay compiled a list of favorite charities of members of Congress, according to DeLay's attorney.

DeLay maintained contacts with Russian executives connected to the energy firm NaftaSib, who were paying Abramoff huge sums to promote their interests in Washington.

In August 1997, DeLay took a trip to Russia that, according to his financial disclosure statements, was underwritten by the National Center for Public Policy Research. Abramoff was an officer on the center's board, and during the trip DeLay met with the Russians who were paying large fees to Abramoff.

Although the president of the policy center said the group funded the trip, she conceded that an international law firm working to promote the interests of Abramoff's Russian clients covered its costs with a payment of about $165,000.

DOJ_NMG_0008593

The Russian businessmen were eager to assure that their country's economy was supported by International Monetary Fund loans made from funds contributed by the United States. In 1998, DeLay voted for a foreign aid bill that included funds to replenish the IMF. DeLay has said that vote was based on his determination of what was best for his constituents.

Toasting Abramoff

Four months after the Russian trip, DeLay, accompanied by his wife and three aides, visited Saipan, in the Northern Marianas. There DeLay made the widely quoted toast to Abramoff as "one of my closest and dearest friends." The visit was funded by the U.S. territory's government and a trade group representing clothing manufacturers.

The Marianas government had paid Abramoff millions of dollars to lobby Congress in a successful fight to preserve the islands' exemption from U.S. minimum-wage and immigration laws while still being able to claim that clothes produced there were "made in the U.S.A."

DeLay sided with the Marianas government's position — a vote that a spokesman said was consistent with his long-held views on trade.

About two years later, DeLay and Abramoff went to the British Isles. The travel party included DeLay's wife, his chief of staff Susan Hirschmann and her husband, and DeLay aide Tony Rudy.

The weeklong tour included a meeting in London with former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, but it was largely recreational, with a four-day golfing trip to Scotland, where DeLay played at the famed St. Andrews course.

The trip also provided Abramoff's Russian client, NaftaSib general manager Alex Koulakovsky, a chance to spend time with DeLay.

The lavish tour cost about $70,000 for the officials, according to House documents. Among the expenses: a suite at the Four Seasons in London for the DeLays (total cost $4,285), along with thousands of dollars' worth of meals and golf fees.

Again, the National Center for Public Policy Research picked up the tab. Indian tribes who were Abramoff clients because of their interest in gambling legislation donated $50,000 to the NCPPR on the day the trip commenced.

Investigators are looking into whether that was a veiled effort to influence DeLay on Indian gaming bills. DeLay has said he thought the trip was an appropriate fact-finding mission funded by a legal nonprofit group.

Looking at staff members

A DeLay-Abramoff tie that has investigators' attention involves Rudy, the former DeLay deputy chief of staff.

Rudy is reportedly working with federal investigators probing Abramoff's web of corruption.

In court documents, Rudy is described as "Staffer A," who helped Abramoff stop legislation on Internet gambling and postal rate increases that would have hurt Abramoff clients. Rudy at the time was working on DeLay's staff.

In return, Abramoff funneled $50,000 to Rudy's wife, court documents said. The money was "obtained from [Abramoff's] clients who would and did benefit from Staffer A's official actions," prosecutors said. Rudy left Congress in 2000 to work directly for Abramoff.

DeLay attorney Richard Cullen denies wrongdoing by the Sugar Land Republican and said the lawmaker had no knowledge of Rudy's activities on behalf of Abramoff's clients.

Bill Mateja, a former senior Justice Department lawyer involved in corporate fraud cases in Washington and now in private practice in Dallas, said staffers such as Rudy would be of keen interest to prosecutors.

Pleading guilty

"They are the one who makes things run. And clearly [prosecutors] will want to know whether they were ordered by members of Congress to kill these bills," Mateja said. "You would certainly think the member would know. It would be unusual for a staff member to work to kill a bill without the member ordering that."

Abramoff's lobbying for Indian tribes led to his convictions on the fraud and conspiracy charges. Michael Scanlon, a former DeLay spokesman and later an Abramoff business partner, also has pleaded guilty to fraud charges connected to the bilking of the tribes.

The two men played a con game on the tribes, with Abramoff claiming to work for free while steering them to Scanlon for public relations work. The men then secretly split fees of at least $80 million.

DOJ_NMG_0008594

Investigators are looking into why four Indian tribes were willing to pay so much to Abramoff and Scanlon to win gambling rights. In testimony before congressional committees and e-mail released by Congress, Abramoff said he told the tribes they were buying the influence of important congressional leaders, including DeLay.

Contributing to DeLay

Bernie Sprague, of the Saginaw Chippewa tribe, testified that he had told federal investigators that Abramoff instructed him to make large contributions to a charity controlled by Abramoff as a way to "impress Tom DeLay."

To buttress his ties to DeLay, Abramoff frequently contributed to the former majority leader's projects, giving about $60,000 to political committees controlled by DeLay since 2000. Abramoff clients also donated a total of $22,500 to a DeLay foundation set up to help abused children.

Some donations went to Texans for a Republican Majority, the political action committee whose spending on Texas legislative races led to indictments against DeLay. He was forced to step aside as majority leader when a grand jury lodged the charges in September.

Was money buying favors?

Now prosecutors in Washington have to determine whether the donations by Abramoff and his clients were part of a con job by Abramoff to secure big fees or whether the lobbyist used the money in an effort to buy favors.

"To charge a public official requires a certain level of intent and knowledge by the public official" that they are being bribed, said Noel Hillman, head of the Justice Department's public corruption section. Hillman described an official's "mental state" as being crucial to the decision by prosecutors to bring criminal charges.

Cullen said DeLay has made a formal offer to cooperate with investigators. So far, they have not approached DeLay for any records or asked him any questions, Cullen said. That is in contrast with Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, who has been described in court proceedings in a way that makes it clear he is a target of the investigation.

For prosecutors in the bewilderingly complex investigation, one of the legal hurdles is proving a crime occurred in the time frame when it can be prosecuted. A statute of limitations of five years for most white-collar fraud offenses limits liability to actions after early 2001. The only exception would be if prosecutors can show an ongoing conspiracy.

michael.hedges@chron.com

Officials Focus On A 2nd Firm Tied To DeLay (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Glen Justice

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 - Having secured a guilty plea from the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, prosecutors are entering a new phase of the corruption investigation in Washington and are focusing on a lobbying firm that has even closer ties to Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader who is under scrutiny in the scandal.

The firm, Alexander Strategy Group, is of particular interest to investigators because it was founded by Edwin A. Buckham, a close friend of Mr. DeLay's and his former chief of staff, and has been a lucrative landing spot for several former members of the DeLay staff, people who are directly involved in the case have said.

Although the firm's name has circulated in connection with the case for many months, prosecutors' questions about Mr. Buckham and Alexander Strategy - which did not respond to requests for comment - have intensified recently, participants in the case said.

The firm openly promoted the idea that it could deliver access to Mr. DeLay, who has denied any wrongdoing but abruptly announced Saturday that he would not try to regain his leadership post. Now the very connections with Mr. DeLay that formed the backbone of Alexander Strategy, put together with Mr. Abramoff's help, have put the future of the firm in doubt.

While doing business with lobbyists is routine for most lawmakers, investigators are looking at the extent to which Mr. DeLay and other lawmakers may have accepted trips, campaign donations and other favors from Alexander Strategy, and in turn tried to help the business.

DOJ_NMG_0008595

Still, prosecutors may have a difficult time reaching the high legal threshold required in a bribery case, in which it must be established that lawmakers performed official acts in exchange for specific favors, rather than as a result of an ongoing relationship with an outside lobbyist.

It is unclear whether any single action by the firm has caught investigators' attention so much as its overall pattern of activity.

Details of the ties between Alexander Strategy, Mr. DeLay and Mr. Abramoff - who pleaded guilty last week in federal court and is cooperating with investigators - have already begun to trickle out. Alexander Strategy paid Mr. DeLay's wife $115,000 in consulting fees while conducting business with Mr. Abramoff's firm. Mr. Abramoff also referred clients to Mr. Buckham.

Mr. Buckham and the firm also shared clients - among them an entity in Malaysia and the Choctaw Indian tribe in Mississippi - with Mr. Abramoff, who in his plea agreement admitted to using corrupting tactics with lawmakers on behalf of his clients. Mr. Abramoff also admitted to having defrauded his Indian clients of millions of dollars. At one point, Mr. Buckham even sought to hire Mr. Abramoff himself, participants in the case said.

Mr. Buckham and at least one member of his firm worked with domestic and overseas clients who prosecutors suspect helped funnel money and perks to Mr. DeLay, his fund-raising operations and other lawmakers in ways intended to curry favor with the Republican leadership.

And at one time, Americans for a Republican Majority, or Armpac, the leadership committee that raised money for Mr. DeLay, was run out of the offices of Alexander Strategy.

But the firm's web of contacts on Capitol Hill reaches past Mr. DeLay, making Alexander Strategy a potentially useful resource as investigators examine other lawmakers.

The firm's name surfaced at the periphery of the corruption investigation into Representative Randy Cunningham, Republican of California. Mr. Cunningham resigned after pleading guilty to accepting bribes from a defense contractor that did business with Alexander Strategy.

For years, Alexander Strategy was one of the crown jewels of the so-called K Street project, an effort Republicans began after taking control of Congress in 1994 to dominate the lobbying industry. The hope, exemplified by Mr. Buckham's company, was for Republican lobbyists to harness the power of their corporate clients to help keep the party in power for years to come.

The successful history of Alexander Strategy since its founding in the late 1990's offers a window into the nexus of Mr. Abramoff, Mr. DeLay and the lobbying world over the last decade or so of Republican control of Congress.

As Mr. DeLay grew more powerful in Congress, the lobbying firm rose in prominence on K Street, building an impressive roster of clients for such a young company and earning, according to records, about $8.8 million lobbying in 2004. That ranked it in the middle of the pack among Washington's largest lobbying firms, but its client list - including Microsoft, United Parcel Service, Time Warner, Freddie Mac and Eli Lilly & Company - suggests what was, at least at one time, a powerful and well-connected operation.

And Mr. DeLay, so intertwined with the lobbying world that his extensive network of allies and former aides scattered throughout town is nicknamed "DeLay Inc.," responded more quickly to calls from Alexander Strategy than he did for any other firm, former aides of his said.

One element prosecutors are trying to understand is what role Mr. DeLay played in sending business to the company. There is evidence, one participant in the case said, that it was "you hire these guys because Tom DeLay tells you to."

Mr. Buckham also ran the U.S. Family Network, a self-styled grassroots organization tied to Mr. DeLay that, according to The Washington Post, was financed almost entirely by clients and associates of Mr. Abramoff. People involved in the case said they expected investigators to examine whether Mr. DeLay cast a vote in Congress in exchange for donations to the network.

Another critical component of the investigation is the activities of Tony C. Rudy, a former DeLay deputy chief of staff who went to work with Mr. Abramoff as a lobbyist before joining Mr. Buckham at Alexander Strategy, where he still works. Mr. Rudy is mentioned - named only as "Staffer A" - in Mr. Abramoff's plea agreement, and investigators are looking into whether he helped secure legislative favors for Mr. Abramoff's clients in exchange for gifts and the promise of a future job while he was still on the DeLay staff.

DOJ_NMG_0008596

Mr. Buckham and others from the firm have not responded to inquiries, and Mr. DeLay, through his spokesman, has said he is innocent of wrongdoing. Although investigators are looking at as many as a dozen lawmakers in the inquiry, they have not brought charges against them.

Richard Cullen, a lawyer for Mr. DeLay, pointed out that Mr. Rudy had not been named outright in any court documents.

"But if it turns out to be Mr. Rudy," Mr. Cullen said, "and if what Mr. Rudy did turns out to have been in any way improper, Tom DeLay is going to be very sad and very disappointed. Because he will feel betrayed, and he expects much, much more from his staff than activities like that."

As a result of Mr. Buckham's ties with Mr. DeLay and Mr. Abramoff, investigators are "keenly interested" in him, especially in connection with deals he may have brokered with Mr. DeLay and other lawmakers after going into the private sector, one participant in the case said.

"He allows the connection to be made to DeLay," another participant said of Mr. Buckham. All participants in the case were granted anonymity in interviews because Justice Department officials do not want people talking about it publicly.

Alexander Strategy's name has also surfaced in the course of a corruption investigation that implicates the defense lobbyist Brent Wilkes, who is an unnamed co-conspirator in the criminal case against former Representative Cunningham. Mr. Cunningham pleaded guilty in December to accepting $2.4 million in bribes from Mr. Wilkes and others. Mr. Wilkes's firm, Group W, also hired Alexander Strategy to do lobbying work, and Mr. DeLay used a plane partly owned by Mr. Wilkes.

The scandals swirling around the Alexander franchise, composed of roughly two dozen lobbyists at its offices on the waterfront in Georgetown, have delighted its former rivals while triggering concerns in the lobbying community that the entire business may be tarred.

Dick Armey, the former Republican House majority leader, who now works for the firm DLA Piper Rudnick Gray Cary and who clashed with Mr. DeLay in the House, invoked Charles Dickens, likening Mr. DeLay to Fagin and Mr. Buckham to the Artful Dodger in "Oliver Twist."

"Tom DeLay sent Buckham downtown to set up shop and start a branch office on K Street," Mr. Armey said. "The whole idea was, 'What's in it for us?' That's what I thought at the time, and I've seen nothing in the way they've conducted themselves since then to dissuade me from that point of view."

Mr. DeLay and a group of like-minded Republicans have spent years promoting Republicans for top lobbying positions in an attempt to counter decades in which Democrats controlled both Congress and K Street. The effort has caused several dustups over the years.

Mr. DeLay was rebuked by the House ethics committee in 1999 after allegedly badgering a trade association that chose a Democrat as its president, rather than the Republican candidate he favored.

Mr. DeLay's political action committee paid Alexander Strategy more than $300,000 for fund-raising and consulting services from 2000 to 2003, according to the Center for Public Integrity, a nonprofit group that tracks money in politics. In addition to Mr. Rudy, the firm also employed Karl Gallant, who headed Mr. DeLay's political action committee.

The firm has already been dropped by one client, MGM Mirage, the casino and resort giant, which retained it in 2004, paying about $350,000 to help block a maneuver by an Indian tribe in Michigan.

At the end of last year, MGM ended the relationship. Alan Feldman, a spokesman for MGM, said that the project had ended and that the firm's services were no longer needed. But Mr. Feldman acknowledged that the scrutiny surrounding Alexander Strategy was a concern. "It would be dishonest to say that it didn't come up in discussions," he said.

Other lobbyists and participants in the case said it would be difficult for the firm to survive this type of scrutiny with all of its clients and relationships intact.

"It's a double-edged sword, being known as DeLay Inc.," said one Republican lobbyist. "They are on the sharp edge of the sword now."

DeLay's War At Home (TIME)

By HILARY HYLTON

Time, January 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008597

As Tom DeLay steps into the shadows of the congressional leadership in Washington, the spotlight on his fight for survival shifts to his legal battle and reelection effort in Texas. Unless the 11-term congressman and former House GOP leader wins an unexpected victory in the state's highest court in the next few weeks, he'll spend the next year facing off against a zealous prosecutor and Republican and Democratic challengers for his House seat.

Even as Washington on Friday awaited DeLay's relinquishment of the majority leader's role, Texas tea leaf readers saw more trouble ahead. A new Republican challenger, already dubbed the "dragonslayer" by one Houston political columnist, launched his campaign for the part's nomination in Delay's hometown of Sugarland. Coincidentally, Delay reportedly signaled his intention to reclaim his seat on the powerful Appropriations Committee, a valued position for a congressman seeking reelection.

Attorney Tom Campbell, a Bob Dole campaign leader and administration appointee and backer of President George H.W. Bush announced he would run as a fiscal and social conservative. Campbell, a Mormon and self-styled environmentalist who voted for DeLay in 2004, has deep party connections and access to heavyweight fundraisers that make him a credible threat to the embattled former Majority Leader. "Tom DeLay's 'win at all cost' brand of politics has cost us far too much to let it continue," Campbell says on his campaign website.

DeLay also faces a Democratic challenge from former congressman Nick Lampson, who lost his seat after his district was redrawn during the 2004 DeLay-inspired redistricting of Texas congressional seats. Although Lampson is unopposed in the Democratic primary, the field is further crowded by the entry of an independent in the form of former GOP Congressman and DeLay supporter Steve Stockman, a far-right conservative defeated after a single term by Lampson. Stockman told the conservative Human Events magazine this week that by running as an independent he would attack Lampson "like a pit bull" and criticize Lampson's "ethical lapses....that's something Tom can't do under the present circumstances."

DeLay opponents cite recent polls showing that the former Majority Leader's support in his district has fallen below 50%, but that is exactly where his numbers stood in 2004, in a widely touted poll just days before he won reelection with 55 percent of the vote.

DeLay's attorney, Dick DeGuerin, accuses prosecutor Ronnie Earle, a Democrat, of seeking advantage from national trends by subpoenaing representatives of law firms and Indian tribes connected to lobbyist Jack Abramoff and records from lobbyists connected to disgraced Republican congressman Duke Cunningham — individuals, says DeGuerin, who have no direct ties to the campaign finance charges against his client.

DeGuerin told TIME his client is in fighting spirit."He's very upbeat, he's going about his business." Right now, his best hopes lie an appeal to the state's highest court to throw out the charges or order the trial judge to go forward with a speedy trial, but University of Texas law professor George Dix said that, while DeGuerin's motions are "very good, very interesting, ...with some sophisticated arguments and some really good bull*," intervention by the high court would be very unusual. Word from the court will likely come before the new GOP House leadership vote in late January. If DeLay fails to end the case there, the hope of a trial before the March Texas primary is a long shot, and in a state with no party registration, that primary will be open to disenchanted Republicans and disgruntled Democrats alike.

DeLay Won't Reclaim House Post (HCHRON)

By BENNETT ROTH and SAMANTHA LEVINE

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - Entangled in criminal investigations of political activities in Texas and Washington, U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay abandoned claims to his House majority leader's post Saturday, a dramatic reversal for the former pest-control company owner who rose to the height of power in Congress.

DeLay reached the decision Saturday morning after consulting in the past two days with family and advisers, according to a spokesman, then announced his plans in separate letters to House Speaker Dennis Hastert and his GOP colleagues, and to supporters and reporters at Sugar Land City Hall.

"The job of majority leader and the mandate of the Republican majority are too important to be hamstrung, even for a few months, by personal distractions," he wrote Hastert.

DOJ_NMG_0008598

DeLay's release of any hold on a House leadership role capped a tumultuous week in which GOP lawmakers increasingly voiced concerns that he has become an election-year liability because of ties to former lobbyist Jack Abramoff. As part of a plea bargain unveiled in federal court Tuesday, Abramoff agreed to testify against members of Congress and their aides in the Washington corruption probe stemming from his representation of Indian tribes and other clients.

In Fort Bend County, DeLay told supporters he will continue to seek re-election this year in his suburban Houston district, where he faces competition in the March party primary and the November general election.

"I plan to run a vigorous campaign, and I plan to win it," DeLay told the crowd.

In the letter to Republican lawmakers, DeLay proclaimed his innocence of any impropriety.

"During my time in Congress, I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land. I am fully confident time will bear this out," he said.

He has been scolded multiple times by the House ethics panel, however.

In Houston, civic and business leaders increasingly relied on DeLay to deliver federal funds and political favors for area projects and programs such as those at the Johnson Space Center. However, he tangled with city officials because of his opposition, until recently, to using federal money for Metro's rail projects.

Diminished ability

In a telephone interview with the Houston Chronicle, DeLay said Saturday that his absence from the leadership could diminish his ability to help the region.

"The majority leader controls what comes to the floor, and the Houston-Galveston area has benefited from that. That changes now," he said.

Critics who "never gave me an even shake ought to think about that," he remarked.

He said he would reclaim his seat on the powerful Appropriations Committee, where he first honed the legislative skills that brought him to the pinnacle of the House.

DeLay blamed Travis County prosecutor Ronnie Earle for forcing him to give up his post temporarily, saying the Democrat used legal maneuvers to postpone DeLay's trial on campaign-finance violations.

"It became quite evident that Ronnie Earle was successful in delaying the process," DeLay said. "The longer I was hanging out there, the more trouble he was causing."

DeLay stepped aside as majority leader in September, in accordance with House rules, after a Travis County grand jury indicted him. Until Saturday, he sought a quick acquittal or dismissal of the charges on the way to reclaiming the top job.

DeLay told the Chronicle on Saturday that in recent days he discussed his situation with GOP leaders, including Hastert, and considered several options, including resigning from Congress.

In the end he decided against quitting Congress because "I still have a lot to contribute to the Houston-Galveston area," he said.

His decision is expected to trigger a fierce succession battle for leadership, with several GOP lawmakers expected to challenge Rep. Roy Blunt, the Missouri Republican who replaced DeLay on a temporary basis.

Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, chairman of the House Education Committee, is expected to announce his candidacy for majority leader today. DeLay said he won't endorse anyone as a successor.

House Republican leaders, who as recently as last month refused to consider replacing DeLay permanently, praised his decision to step down.

"It is an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican Conference," Hastert remarked. He said he expects to schedule the majority-leader election for the first week of February.

Other Republicans who were openly critical of DeLay in recent weeks expressed relief that they could install a new leader unshaded by an ethical cloud.

"I look forward to the democratic process of choosing a new majority leader who will ensure that integrity, honesty and ethical accountability are central tenets of government operations in Washington," Rep. Charlie Bass, R-N.H., said.

GOP petition drive

DOJ_NMG_0008599

Bass, along with Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., spearheaded a petition drive among Republican lawmakers late last week to force a new leadership election.

DeLay dismissed the significance of the criticism within the GOP, saying it reflected the views of only 20 or 30 members.

"I enjoyed incredibly strong support," he said.

In recent statements, President Bush defended DeLay, who has been a crucial ally in pushing the White House legislative agenda. But the administration signaled Saturday that it is ready to move on.

"We respect Congressman DeLay's decision to put the interests of the American people, the House of Representatives and the Republican Party first," Bush spokeswoman Erin Healy said.

For Democrats, DeLay's absence from the leadership is a double-edged sword. His skill at rounding up congressional votes frequently deprived the minority party of legislative successes, but Democrats also had made him their poster child for an emerging campaign theme attacking a "culture of corruption" in the GOP-run Congress.

"The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress," House Democratic leader Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Saturday.

DeLay's Texas criminal case probably will remain pending by the time Congress resumes business at the end of the month. But for many lawmakers, the turning point for DeLay's fate as a leader came when the Justice Department announced the plea agreement with Abramoff.

He is expected to provide incriminating information about members of Congress and their staffers who were involved in his lobbying schemes.

DeLay, never mentioned as a target of the investigation before the lobbyist admitted guilt, has been closely associated with Abramoff for more than a decade. The lawmaker took three foreign trips with the lobbyist, who used his clients' funds to defray a sizable portion of the costs in a way that DeLay has said was legal.

Former DeLay staffers figure prominently in the investigation. For instance, Michael Scanlon, his former spokesman, worked with Abramoff, agreed to a plea deal in November and is cooperating with investigators. DeLay's former deputy chief of staff, Tony Rudy, is referred to as "Staffer A" in the Abramoff case and reportedly is cooperating with authorities.

DeLay's support among Republicans at home will remain strong, said Jared Woodfill, chairman of the Harris County Republican Party.

"Ultimately, it is not good for him to be outside of the leadership," Woodfill said, "but politically, I think he will be just fine. The people of the district know him quite well, and they will send him back to D.C."

However, recent polls show that DeLay is likely to face a bruising and expensive re-election battle in a redrawn district that includes many voters who are relatively unfamiliar with him.

He faces a well-financed Democratic opponent, Nick Lampson, who lost his Beaumont-area congressional seat in 2004 as a result of DeLay's redistricting scheme. Former Republican U.S. Rep. Steve Stockman of Friendswood has signed up for the November ballot as an independent candidate for DeLay's job.

Chronicle reporter Eric Hanson contributed to this report from Sugar Land.

bennett.roth@chron.com

samantha.levine@chron.com

Supporters Point To DeLay's Impact On 22nd District (HCHRON)

By ERIC HANSON

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

SUGAR LAND - After using a letter to tell his congressional colleagues about his new political plans, U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay surrounded himself with supporters Saturday on the sun-drenched steps of his hometown's City Hall as he read a similar statement to reporters.

About 70 other people turned out to show solidarity with their veteran congressman. A few held DeLay re-election-campaign signs as the congressman delivered prepared remarks with his wife, Christine, at his side.

DOJ_NMG_0008600

DeLay explained to the news media that he is abandoning hopes of being House majority leader again. But first there was a procession of sorts and speeches by other politicians.

Having gathered inside Sugar Land City Hall with DeLay, his supporters started the event by lining up outside on the steps. DeLay followed, with other elected officials.

Sugar Land Mayor David Wallace took the podium and credited DeLay with advancing mobility projects such as the renovation of U.S. 59 and improvements at Sugar Land Regional Airport.

"You are very effective in fighting for the city of Sugar Land, for Fort Bend County and for this region, and we want to say thank you," Wallace said.

Wallace was followed by U.S. Rep. Kevin Brady, R-The Woodlands, who said DeLay will remain a fixture of power in the House of Representatives.

"I would caution those to not write this political obituary just yet," Brady said.

"Tom DeLay is a force of nature. He is a true conservative leader and will remain a conservative and effective leader in the U.S. House of Representatives," Brady said to loud applause.

Brady also said DeLay has a profound impact on getting federal funds for highways, NASA and the area's medical and science communities.

"We are not losing a majority leader. We are gaining a member of Congress who can devote full-time as he has for so long to expanding freedoms, to strengthening families, to delivering for Texas and delivering the most effective voice for this congressional district in Houston," Brady said. "Tom, we love you."

DeLay said he would continue to work for the people of the 22nd District, which stretches across Fort Bend, Harris, Brazoria and Galveston counties.

"I have worked very hard to meet their needs and serve their values in Washington," DeLay said. "Those needs and values will now best be served by allowing House Republicans to set a new course and to unite behind a new and focused leader."

DeLay also reminded supporters of this year's election.

"As you know, I am still a candidate for re-election this November, and I plan to run a very vigorous campaign, and I plan to win it," he said.

He has opposition in the Republican primary in March and the general election in the fall.

The only reference DeLay made to the Texas indictments he is facing was a statement that he has always obeyed the law.

"In the 21 years I have been in Congress, I have always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of the House and the laws of our land. And time once again will bear out that truth," he said.

However, DeLay has been scolded several times by the House Ethics Committee.

After his remarks, he and the crowd went back into City Hall without taking questions.

eric.hanson@chron.com

DeLay Likely To Win Party Nomination In 22nd District (HCHRON)

By KRISTEN MACK

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay's departure from the House leadership shrinks his national stature, but he is still likely to win his party's nomination in the 22nd District and will be a formidable candidate for re-election, supporters and a key opponent said Saturday.

"He had to take a position for the betterment of the Republican Party and to the detriment of the Houston area," said Fort Bend County Republican Party Chairman Eric Thode. "There's never been a question about his re-election. It's only been fomented by those that are delusional."

DeLay was forced to step aside as House majority leader last year when he was indicted in Travis County on charges relating to campaign fundraising for 2002 legislative races.

On Saturday, under mounting pressure from Republican House members, he abandoned his bid to regain the post, setting the stage for GOP House leadership elections.

DeLay faces three opponents in the March 7 Republican primary.

Biggest challenge

In November, he also may face former Republican Rep. Steve Stockman, who has filed as an independent. Stockman will need to petition for a place on the ballot — which also will include the Libertarian Party nominee and possibly one other independent who has already filed. It is too late for anyone else to file as an independent.

But DeLay's biggest challenge comes from former U.S. Rep. Nick Lampson, who is unopposed in the Democratic primary.

Lampson and GOP leaders expect that DeLay easily will win his party's nomination over challengers Pat Baig, Tom Campbell and Michael Fjetland.

"Not one has any money, following or name ID," Thode said. "We are 100 percent behind DeLay and will continue to stand behind him."

In an unusual move last summer, the Fort Bend and Harris County Republican parties passed resolutions supporting DeLay. Traditionally party leaders remain publicly neutral about contests in their party primaries.

DeLay's situation presents a special circumstance, Harris County GOP Chairman Jared Woodfill said Saturday.

"Because of the circumstances and all DeLay has done for our agenda, principles and values, we are going to stand with him while he is under attack," Woodfill said.

Woodfill said the 22nd Congressional District will suffer because DeLay has lost his position of power, a fall Woodfill blames on a "politically motivated partisan prosecutor who has been able to shake up our leadership."

Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, whose office is prosecuting DeLay, is a Democrat.

But DeLay will continue to be an effective representative of the district, Woodfill said, predicting DeLay will win the primary and the November general election.

Primary opponent Campbell, a lawyer, said DeLay did the right thing by ending his bid for the House majority-leader position.

"Tom has become preoccupied with a whole series of issues that make it difficult for him to continue to serve in leadership positions," Campbell said. "If he hadn't made the decision, he would not have enough votes to become the majority leader. Tom's days as a Washington power broker are coming to a close."

Internal party pressure

DeLay should withdraw from the race and focus on his own issues while the Republican Party focuses on returning to its roots, Campbell said.

"We need to clean our house in March, and if we don't, we run the risk of losing the House in November," Campbell said.

Lampson, who expects DeLay to be his Republican opponent, said he anticipates a tough race but thinks the residents of the district are ready for new leadership.

DeLay can no longer use the "partisan witch-hunt argument" to explain his problems, Lampson said.

Although the state case is prosecuted by a Democrat, an unrelated federal investigation by the Republican administration's Justice Department has touched DeLay and others in Congress. It centers on lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has a long history of ties to DeLay and other Republicans.

And fellow Republicans in Congress began pushing late last week for DeLay to abandon efforts to regain his leadership position.

"There had to have been a great deal of pressure from his own party, whose members lost confidence in him, to make him step down," Lampson said.

Rice University political scientist Bob Stein said DeLay's hopes to be part of the House leadership unraveled in the past 24 hours under pressure from within his party.

"Republicans are worried about midterm elections," Stein said.

The question now, he said, is whether residents of the district view DeLay's departure from the leadership as a significant political liability.

"The only thing that's ironic about it, is it leaves the state without a single member of the delegation, on either side, as part of the leadership," Stein said. "The very thing DeLay sought to provide, a place at the table for Texas, is all lost now. Texas is just as hurt by this as the Republican Party."

kristen.mack@chron.com

DeLay Ends Bid To Regain Leader's Post (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 8, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay permanently gave up leadership of House Republicans yesterday, setting off a new leadership race that is shaping up as a referendum on the direction of the Republican Party in Congress.

"The job of majority leader is too important to be hamstrung by personal distractions," the Texas Republican told reporters after he sent letters to his colleagues and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert informing them of his decision. He said he will remain in Congress and seek re-election in his district in November.

Mr. Hastert said leadership elections will be held the week of Jan. 30, giving candidates about three weeks to campaign to fill Mr. DeLay's former position.

Both the acting majority leader, Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, and Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio, the chairman of the Education and the Workforce Committee, are expected to run. Unidentified sources close to Mr. Blunt last night released a list of six members who will publicly campaign for him, and a source close to Mr. Boehner countered with seven Republicans who will actively campaign on his behalf.

By running for the leader's spot, Mr. Blunt leaves open the majority whip's slot, and candidates were lining up to run for it as well.

A spokesman for Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona, also a potential candidate, said yesterday that members have been asking him to run, though he has made no decision.

Democrats said Mr. DeLay's announcement doesn't end Republicans' political peril over charges of corruption.

"By forcing out Tom DeLay, Republicans have addressed a party problem, but not the institutional problem of corruption that most troubles the American people," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

To prepare for the leadership elections, Mr. Blunt and Mr. Hastert both bowed out of a congressional delegation scheduled to leave tomorrow for a two-week trip to Asia.

Mr. DeLay had stepped aside temporarily as House Republicans' floor leader after he was indicted in Texas on Sept. 28. He said he would clear his name and reclaim his leader's post within months, but his situation worsened last week after lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty to corruption charges and agreed to tell prosecutors about his connections to members of Congress.

Mr. DeLay said he has always acted within ethics rules, but he faced falling support among the conservative activists who had been his biggest boosters. Moreover, two other Republican members of Congress -- Rep. Charles Bass of New Hampshire and Rep. Jeff Flake of Arizona -- began to gather petition signatures to force new leadership elections.

"Today's been a very good day for Republicans and our conference and Congress," Mr. Bass said yesterday. He said the recent ethical and criminal charges have not helped Republicans or Democrats, and the leadership elections are healthy for everyone.

"This is a serious problem, this Abramoff thing, for Republicans and Democrats. But it's not the Democrats that are leading the country right now," he said, adding that the ethics issues will be paramount in the new leadership elections. "The standards all members should look for in the replacement leadership need to be high."

Mr. Flake said the new elections must be about more than just new faces.

"We need to make sure this is a proper election and not just an affirmation of the interim structure," he said, calling for a "course correction."

DOJ_NMG_0008603

While the ethics charges may have been the latest issue, Mr. Flake said there had been a growing realization among some members that under Mr. DeLay, the party had lost its way on other issues.

"I think for a lot of people they're thinking, 'Why are we trying so hard to keep him?' His view has obviously changed over the years about government," Mr. Flake said in a telephone interview before Mr. DeLay made his announcement.

Republican strategist Michael McKenna said resentment against some of Mr. DeLay's comments last year on federal spending and the 2003 vote on adding a prescription-drug program to Medicare hurt Mr. DeLay among his conference.

"Tom DeLay's legal problem simply provided an opportunity for that resentment to come to the front," he said, adding that the upcoming elections will be a battle for the fundamental direction House Republicans will take.

Mr. McKenna said one figure to watch in the elections is Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana, who is chairman of the Republican Study Committee (RSC), a group of 100 conservatives. As chairman of the RSC, Mr. Pence has become a major political force.

"A large chunk of that caucus is going to be looking to him for cues about how to think about this choice," Mr. McKenna said.

Mr. Pence and many other Republicans released statements yesterday that praised Mr. DeLay for his three years as majority leader and eight years as majority whip and for putting the interests of the party first by stepping down.

DeLay's Own Tactics May Have Hurt Him (HCHRON)

By JULIE MASON

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - In his nearly 20-year climb to the No. 2 job in the House, U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay has deployed a cunning and toughness that may have cost him friends but often won the battle — until now.

In his announcement that he would step down as House majority leader permanently, the vaunted counter of House floor votes may have calculated that this time, he lacked the votes to remain viable as a candidate for restoration to leadership.

In many ways, the Sugar Land Republican has been brought up short by the partisan, no-holds-barred political culture he helped create in the House, observers said.

"He shifted the game of politics from one of comity to one of ruling from an ironclad, 'with-us-or-against-us' philosophy," said Bob Stein, Rice University political scientist and pollster. "He felt you had to choose sides, and being neutral wasn't allowed. Over time, he just accrued too many enemies."

In 1984, DeLay shaved his mustache after a study by developer Bob Perry found Republicans with facial hair were not electable. He won a seat in Congress soon after, and a career of doing what it took to win was off and running.

DeLay's pugnacious style quickly earned him a reputation in the House, where Texans such as former House Speaker Sam Rayburn, also a onetime Democratic majority leader, generally had made a trademark of forging coalitions and building bridges across the aisle.

But DeLay's preferred method was different. As a campaigner and on the House floor, DeLay spoke with firebrand contempt for Democrats, especially liberals.

Although fiercely partisan, DeLay has rarely flinched from holding prominent members of his own party accountable when they violated what he believed were key tenets of conservatism.

In 1990, DeLay was among the most vocal critics of former President George H.W. Bush's decision to relent on a campaign pledge to create no new taxes. He also turned on former ally Newt Gingrich in a failed plot to oust the then-speaker.

DeLay, who denies wrongdoing in political activities that have brought criminal investigations, has been under a near-constant ethical cloud since 1993, when he was shown on national TV wearing knickers and playing golf on a trip paid for by lobbyists.

In 1995, DeLay was central to launching the K Street Project, an effort to pressure lobbying and trade organizations, generally headquartered on Washington's K Street, to hire more Republicans.

His tough gamesmanship on the lobbying issue drew notice in 1998, when DeLay led House Republicans in holding up a vote on intellectual property rights, apparently to punish a trade association supporting the bill for its plans to hire a top Democratic lobbyist.

DOJ_NMG_0008604

The incident earned him an admonishment from the House Ethics Committee. It was just one of the many probes and investigations into DeLay's fundraising and political activities through the years.

Largely undaunted, DeLay raised $15 million in 1999 for GOP candidates, which helped pave his path to House leadership. He was sued the next year by Democratic leaders claiming he was extorting funds from donors. The case was dropped with both sides declaring victory.

Throughout, DeLay has remained defiant and seemingly unconcerned by criticism, saying in 2003, shortly after he was elected majority leader, "I have just never worried about what people think of me or what the critics say."

He added, "I don't see myself as mean-spirited. I'm just passionate."

His most recent years spent as majority leader brought some of DeLay's more high-profile moments in Congress as he proved indispensable to the advancement of President Bush's legislative agenda and helped obtain — or block — funding for Houston projects, depending on his view of them.

When the House took up major Medicare changes in 2003, DeLay encouraged fiscal conservatives to hold out for a law that would give private health-insurance companies incentives to compete for Medicare dollars.

The House passed the bill to provide a prescription-drug benefit by one vote after some controversial arm-twisting on wavering GOP members by DeLay and other House leaders.

The next year, DeLay was admonished again by the House Ethics Committee, which found he offered to support the House candidacy of Michigan Republican Nick Smith's son in return for the lawmaker's vote on the Medicare drug benefit.

Last year DeLay's interest was drawn by the case of Terri Schiavo, a Florida woman in a brain-dead state whose husband was seeking permission from the courts to take her off life support.

DeLay led an effort in Congress to pass an emergency law granting a federal court review of the Schiavo case, only to see the U.S. Supreme Court refuse to intervene.

Her feeding tube was removed by court order, and Schiavo died 13 days later. DeLay, in remarks he later apologized for, essentially threatened the judges who allowed it to happen.

"The time will come for the men responsible for this to answer for their behavior," DeLay said.

Last year it was also DeLay's turn to be reminded by conservatives about party tenets of fiscal responsibility. After saying that hurricane-relief funds should be provided generously, DeLay later joined the move to cut the federal budget to allow it.

julie.mason@chron.com

Possible Successors To Tom Delay (AP-Y2)

AP, January 8, 2006

A look at two Republicans who may seek the House majority leader post vacated by Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas:

ROY BLUNT of MISSOURI:

Low key and affable in public, Blunt presents a marked contrast to the hard-driving DeLay, whom Blunt succeeded as House Republican whip in 2003 and now may seek to ascend to the second-ranking post of majority leader.

Blunt, 56, has risen rapidly through his party's ranks since winning election to Missouri's 7th District in 1996. DeLay, who was the GOP whip at the time, tapped Blunt as his top deputy in 1999. Blunt became whip, in charge of counting and nailing down votes, when DeLay became majority leader in 2003.

Blunt took over as acting majority leader in September when DeLay, indicted by a Texas grand jury on charges of conspiring to violate political fundraising laws, was forced to step aside.

Blunt's early tenure was marked by uneven success as Republicans struggled to pass a deficit-cutting bill, then suffered the defeat of a bill to cut spending on social programs.

Republicans rebounded quickly, passing the deficit bill after making changes to mollify party moderates, then resurrecting the spending measure.

While different in style from the stridently partisan DeLay, Blunt is equally conservative and took a leading role in moving President Bush's tax cut packages through the House. As whip, Blunt took the lead last year in the uphill struggle to secure votes needed to pass the Central America Free Trade Agreement.

Blunt was raised on a farm near Springfield, Mo., the son of a dairy farmer and a state legislator. After teaching high school government and history, Blunt became involved in Republican politics. In 1984, Blunt became his state's first Republican secretary of state in more than 50 years.

Blunt lost in the GOP primary for governor in 1992. For the next four years, he was president of his alma mater, Southwest Baptist University. In 1996, when the Republican incumbent retired, Blunt easily captured a seat in Congress from his solidly Republican district.

Blunt garnered some controversy when he unsuccessfully tried to slip a measure into the 2002 bill creating the Homeland Security Department that would have benefited tobacco giant Philip Morris. At the time Blunt had a personal relationship with a lobbyist for the company, Abigail Perlman. Blunt divorced his wife of 35 years and married Perlman in 2003.

Blunt has three children, including Matt Blunt, who was elected Missouri governor last year.

___

JOHN BOEHNER OF OHIO:

Boehner came to Congress 15 years ago as a crusader against what he saw as the excesses of Democratic power. He was elected to the leadership when Republicans gained a majority in the 1994 election landslide. Boehner lost his post in the hierarchy four years later amid internal struggles following a coup attempt against then-Speaker Newt Gingrich.

As chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee, Boehner helped shepherd Bush's No Child Left Behind education bill through the House. In 2002, Bush traveled to Boehner's district on Ohio's western border to sign the measure into law.

Boehner has a strong conservative record, but has also shown an ability to reach across party lines. He pushed pension legislation through the House last year, attracting nearly 300 votes after a last-minute accommodation with the United Auto Workers.

Boehner, 56, was born in Cincinnati to a family of 12 children. He ran a successful plastics and packaging company before winning local and state elections in the 1980s and capturing his seat in Congress in 1990.

During his freshmen year, Boehner became part of the "Gang of Seven" that went after the ethical lapses, mainly of the Democratic majority, including the House Bank scandal. It turned out that lawmakers were writing checks to the House's internal bank without the money to back them up.

Boehner and his wife, Debbie, have two daughters.

After Tom DeLay (WP)

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

TEXAS REPUBLICAN Tom DeLay's decision yesterday to permanently relinquish the majority leader's post was necessary but not sufficient for the health of the House majority he dominated for so long.

It's necessary because, notwithstanding his assertion yesterday that "I have always acted in an ethical manner," Mr. DeLay is an ethical recidivist unfit to lead. If the repeated admonishments of the House ethics committee weren't enough to convince his colleagues, consider some of the latest disclosures: The Post's R. Jeffrey Smith reported on a DeLay-linked group, the U.S. Family Network, that appears to have secretly received $1 million from Russian oil and gas executives seeking to induce Mr. DeLay to support a loan bailout for Russia. Foreign companies and individuals aren't permitted to make campaign contributions; such back-door influence buying is especially pernicious.

In addition, according to the guilty plea entered by Jack Abramoff, the former lobbyist arranged for payments totaling $50,000 to the wife of "Staffer A" -- identified as Tony C. Rudy, Mr. DeLay's former deputy chief of staff -- in exchange for Mr. Rudy's help in defeating an Internet gambling bill. The stench surrounding Mr. DeLay had been growing more pungent daily; his decision had the air of inevitability.

But House Republicans need not only to shed Mr. DeLay; they also need to change the way their party has operated under his leadership and that of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert

(R-Ill.) and others. For a start, Congress should strengthen the rules governing lobbying, requiring fuller disclosure of the ties between lawmakers and lobbyists. Mr. DeLay did all he could to thicken those bonds, with his K Street project to install more

DOJ_NMG_0008606

Republicans in key lobbying jobs and his bullying lists of how much lobbyists were giving to each side. More sunlight -- disclosure of the amounts of money steered to lawmakers, the gifts lavished on members and staff -- would have gone a long way to disinfect Mr. Abramoff and to diminish the impact of Mr. DeLay's political hammer.

As Mr. DeLay's golf outings and other excursions demonstrated, the prohibition on travel paid for by an individual lobbyist makes little sense when corporations and other groups that lobby Congress can foot the bill and send their lobbyists along for the ride. The rules about privately funded travel should be tightened to bar lawmakers and staff from accepting reimbursement for trips underwritten, directly or indirectly, by entities that engage in lobbying.

Nor should these changes be limited to the House; the systemic vulnerabilities exploited by Mr. Abramoff are equally evident in the Senate. It is time to consider whether, in this age of partisan division, the existing congressional ethics process can be made to work or whether a different model is required.

Further, earmarks inserted in the dead of night to fund lawmakers' pet projects -- and secure their votes for measures -- are an invitation to abuse. So is, in violation of House rules, unveiling mammoth bills just hours before a scheduled vote. So, too, is the all-too-routine habit of making significant changes to legislation after it emerges from committee and then eliminating, or drastically limiting, lawmakers' ability to offer amendments on the floor. Representative democracy can't function when these practices prevail.

And there is a more fundamental question that the Abramoff mess, and the DeLay departure, ought to prompt House leaders to ask themselves -- or that voters may ask, and answer, for them: What is the purpose of the Republican majority? Is it simply, as some of the leadership's behavior would suggest, to amass, cement and retain power by whatever means necessary? Or, as Republicans claimed when they came to power a decade ago, do they stand for something: a different method of doing business, a belief in limited government, commitment to spending restraint? If there is a role for the Republican machine other than self-perpetuation, it's awfully hard to discern right now. That, as much as anything, ought to be what the upcoming leadership elections are about.

States Intervene After Drug Plan Hits Early Snags (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 - Low-income Medicare beneficiaries around the country were often overcharged, and some were turned away from pharmacies without getting their medications, in the first week of Medicare's new drug benefit. The problems have prompted emergency action by some states to protect their citizens.

Although there are no hard numbers, concerns expressed by state officials and complaints from pharmacists suggest a widespread pattern of problems.

At least four states - Maine, New Hampshire, North Dakota and Vermont - acted this week to make sure poor people received the drugs they were promised but could not obtain through the federal Medicare program.

Gov. Jim Douglas of Vermont, a Republican, said the state would pay drug claims for low-income people until the federal government fixed problems in the new program, known as Part D of Medicare. Michael K. Smith, the state's secretary of human services, said, "The federal system simply is not working."

On Thursday, the Vermont Legislature passed a bill declaring, "There is a public health emergency due to the federal implementation of Medicare Part D, which has resulted in serious operational problems, causing Vermonters to be turned away at the pharmacy without the drugs they need."

Many factors contributed to the initial chaos. Some people who enrolled in Medicare drug plans did not have any proof of coverage. Pharmacists could not get the information needed to verify eligibility for drug benefits and low-income subsidies. Insurance companies and their pharmacy benefit managers were swamped with calls, so pharmacists often had to wait an hour or more on telephone help lines.

Federal officials promised improvements, but state officials were growing impatient.

In Maine, Gov. John Baldacci, a Democrat, agreed to pay drug claims to provide medications for those in need. Since Tuesday, the state has incurred $2 million of expenses for Medicare beneficiaries.

DOJ_NMG_0008607

On Friday, Gov. John Hoeven of North Dakota, a Republican, said he had to act because "some low-income elderly and disabled individuals can't get their prescriptions filled through their Medicare drug plans."

In New Hampshire, Gov. John Lynch, a Democrat, signed an executive order authorizing the state to pay drug claims that he said should have been covered by Medicare. Republican leaders of the state legislature called a special session to provide the money. The start of the Medicare drug program "has been a nightmare for many of our citizens," Governor Lynch said.

"Many are being charged unaffordable co-payments for prescription drugs - co-pays much higher than they are supposed to be. Too many of them are leaving pharmacies without their prescriptions."

Thomas T. Noland Jr., a spokesman for Humana Inc., a major national insurer, said that some problems were "to be expected in a new program with lots of new enrollment taking effect all at once."

Cynthia G. Tudor, a senior Medicare official, told insurers on Wednesday that they must "immediately make improvements" to "ensure that all beneficiaries get their prescriptions filled at the point of sale."

In a memorandum to insurers, Ms. Tudor said she had received "numerous reports" that they were "inappropriately denying some scripts," or claims. In many cases, she said, insurers are not providing the data that pharmacies need to file claims and get paid.

Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said on Saturday that he was working closely with states to address their concerns and to help individual patients. "We are filling close to a million prescriptions a day, including hundreds of thousands for low-income beneficiaries," Dr. McClellan said. "Many, many people are getting the prescriptions they need."

But in an interview on Friday, Stan Rosenstein, the Medicaid director in California, said: "We are hearing more and more complaints. A significant number of people are not getting their prescriptions. That has us very troubled."

Drug benefits are delivered by private insurers under contract to Medicare. The federal government is supposed to compute the subsidy available to each low-income beneficiary. But Michael Polzin, a spokesman for Walgreens drug stores, said that, in many cases, that information had not been shared with insurers or pharmacists.

Under Medicare rules, each drug plan is supposed to have a transition policy, providing a temporary supply - typically 30 days - of any prescription that a person was previously taking. But customer service representatives at Medicare's toll-free telephone number said they knew nothing of this requirement, and beneficiaries said it had been virtually impossible to take advantage of it.

Nationwide, 6.2 million low-income people receive both Medicare and Medicaid. About 1.1 million of them live in California. They tend to have many chronic illnesses and high drug costs. Cheryl Meronk, manager of the health insurance counseling program in Orange County, Calif., said she was referring people to hospital emergency rooms because they had been unable to get urgently needed medications through Medicare.

Under the standard Medicare drug benefit, which took effect on Jan. 1, the patient pays a $250 deductible and 25 percent of the next $2,000 in annual drug costs.

Over the last year, Medicare officials repeatedly assured poor people that they would receive extra help, so they would not have to pay any deductible and their co-payments would not exceed $5 a prescription.

But Carol A. Herrmann-Steckel, commissioner of the Alabama Medicaid Agency, said that Medicare beneficiaries with very low incomes had often been required to pay the full $250 deductible and co-payments far exceeding $5. "One beneficiary borrowed the money," she said. "Another charged the $250 on a credit card because she was in such dire need of the medicine."

Beverly R. Churchwell, an aide to the Alabama commissioner, said: "Some Medicare beneficiaries have not been able to get their medications. They are being turned away at the pharmacy."

John J. Morris, 42, of Ware, Mass., who has diabetes and multiple sclerosis, signed up for a Medicare drug plan on Nov. 16. The insurer told him his co-payments would not exceed $5, he said, but at the pharmacy this week, he was told he had to pay $23 for each of three drugs.

"I could not afford it," Mr. Morris said, "so I was not able to get my insulin or my M.S. drug."

DOJ_NMG_0008608

In Oregon, Sandy K. Hata, a field manager for the State Department of Human Services, said: "We've had calls from people in tears who could not get their medications. These people were being asked to pay a $250 deductible and hundreds of dollars in co-payments."

Jane-ellen A. Weidanz, the Medicare project manager at the Oregon Department of Human Services, said, the $250 deductible "is hitting people very hard," adding: "People are very angry and very upset. They are yelling at us. They feel that we lied to them. They feel Medicare lied to them. They feel they cannot trust anything we say about this program."

Texas reported a similar problem. Low-income beneficiaries are "being charged incorrect (high) co-payments," the state's Health and Human Services Commission said in an e-mail message to the Dallas office of the federal Medicare agency.

In Oklahoma, low-income Medicare beneficiaries were often charged the $250 deductible. "They are being treated as if they were in a higher income bracket," said Mike Fogarty, chief executive of the Oklahoma Health Care Authority. "It's a common problem."

Steven E. Hahn, a spokesman for AARP, which offers a drug plan insured by UnitedHealth Group, said he knew that some low-income people had had difficulty getting medications. "We are taking this very seriously," he said. "This is a global problem, a systemwide problem, for all plan sponsors."

Elizabeth L. Stone, 86, who lives alone in an apartment in Manchester, N.H., is enrolled in both Medicare and Medicaid, has arthritis and a thyroid ailment and is in a wheelchair. She tried to use the new Medicare benefit to fill a prescription this week, but failed.

"I did not get any medication," Ms. Stone said. "People at the pharmacy would not give it to me because they do not know how they will be reimbursed."

Another low-income beneficiary, Terence J. Stevens, 65, of Lakeland, Fla., said he signed up for the drug plan on Nov. 15, the first day on which enrollment was allowed. His plan tried to charge him a $47 co-payment for a drug to treat irregular heartbeats and high blood pressure. Mr. Stevens said he was unable to pay and did not get the drug.

In Alabama, William M. Beasley, a pharmacist and a Democratic member of the State House of Representatives, said, "I have had more difficulty trying to process claims for Medicare recipients than I've had with any other insurer in 43 years as a pharmacist."

Seniors Aided In Medicare Drug Plan Changes (FREEP)

By KATIE MERX

Detroit Free Press, January 8, 2006

Isaac Penson signed up for a Medicare prescription drug plan before the new year with help from someone at his church, but he didn't realize he'd have to pay a $250 out-of-pocket deductible before the plan he chose would pay for any drugs or that the plan he chose wouldn't cover his blood-pressure medicine.

The 84-year-old Detroiter doesn't have $250. And he ran out of his blood-pressure medicine, Norvasc, earlier this week. He takes it to keep his high blood pressure from causing a heart attack, stroke or kidney problems.

The cash price for 30 Norvasc tablets is about $50. He can't afford that, either.

Now, with help from the Michigan Medicare Medicaid Assistance Program this week, Penson was able to change to a plan he can afford.

The new plan doesn't have a $250 deductible and allows him to fill each of his prescriptions for a $15 co-pay. The catch is that he can't use the new plan until next month.

Penson is one of a large number of seniors who are going without vital medicines or paying for them out of pocket because of glitches in the new Medicare drug benefit system and confusion over how it works. The good news, though, is there is time and assistance to help seniors switch to a plan that works for them.

The Medicare drug benefit, which took effect on Jan. 1, is supposed to improve access to prescription drugs for seniors and disabled people by helping them pay for their medication. Enrollment without a penalty of higher premiums continues through May 15.

It's the first time Medicare has offered to help pay for prescription drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0008609

More than 1.5 million Michiganders and 40 million other Americans are eligible for the new benefit. The Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services says more than half of all eligible people nationwide have enrolled.

But implementation of the new benefit has Medicare beneficiaries and pharmacists twirling in a sea of confusion and frustration.

"Some people with Medicare -- seniors and people with disabilities -- are experiencing challenges in that they selected a plan and didn't realize it had a $250 deductible," said Mary Johnson, executive director of the Michigan Medicare Medicaid Assistance Program.

More than half of the new Medicare drug plans carry $250 deductibles.

Other enrollees believed the plans they signed up for covered their specific medications, but now are finding the prescriptions aren't covered or that their doctors have to file a special application before the drug plan will pay for them.

The new benefits have overwhelmed many enrollees because they've had to choose from among dozens of plans provided by a slew of private companies. Each plan covers a different mix of drugs, is affiliated with its own network of pharmacies, and charges its own monthly premiums and co-pays.

The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services reports that more than 1 million people have received prescriptions through the drug benefit since it took effect on Sunday.

But pharmacists report that many people who believe they enrolled haven't been so lucky.

Many people enrolled before the end of the year, but never received confirmation or a benefits card, pharmacists said.

In many cases, couples that sent their applications in on the same day find that one spouse already has received a benefits card and the other hasn't.

And the national computer system that's supposed to verify Medicare drug plan enrollment is so overloaded that pharmacists have been unable to verify benefits for many of their patients, said Al Knaak, head pharmacist and a part owner at Village Pharmacy II in Ann Arbor.

Pharmacists also report that they're having difficulty getting through by computer or telephone to the insurance companies running the drug plans.

"The wait on line with some of the insurance companies is up to 30 minutes now," Knaak said. "Sometimes you can't get through. It's becoming more chaotic as the week goes on."

"Our call volume has gone up during the course of the week," said Louanne Bakk, director of access and benefits assistance at the Area Agency on Aging in Southfield. The agency has been fielding calls from dozens of seniors and disabled people trying to navigate the new Medicare drug benefit.

Village Pharmacy, like many small and large pharmacies, is providing patients with two or three days of medication while they attempt to verify benefits.

"Sometimes if we call first thing in the morning or late in the evening, we're able to get through," Knaak said. If they're lucky, the patients receive their card before they run out of the emergency supply, he said. That's the easiest way to verify enrollment.

Walgreen Co. spokeswoman Tiffani Bruce said the system was overwhelmed by the initial demand, but the situation seemed to be improving by the second half of the week.

"I'm really looking for it to get better next week," Knaak said.

Contact KATIE MERX at 313-222-8762 or kmerx@freepress.com.

OTHER NEWS:

U.S. Plans For Future Without Sharon (AP-Y2)

By Barry Schweid

AP, January 8, 2006

In deference to an ailing ally, the Bush administration is saying little publicly about how it intends to fan flickering Mideast peace hopes if Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon remains incapacitated or does not survive.

Privately, American officials are gathering their thoughts and making some tentative moves despite uncertainty about who would succeed the 77-year-old prime minister.

Sharon remained in serious condition Saturday after undergoing his second brain operation in two days on Friday, two days after suffering a major stroke and bleeding in his brain.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice cleared her schedule, canceling visits to Indonesia and Australia to remain in Washington and on top of the situation.

"She thought it was the right thing to do, to be here with her foreign policy team," said State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

And even as administration officials awaited developments in Jerusalem, they were trying to address the deteriorating security situation in Gaza. The U.S. security coordinator, Maj. Gen. Keith Dayton, has returned to the region to try to get a handle on violence in the Palestinian territory.

"There is no central authority," said Edward S. Walker, a former U.S. ambassador to Israel and to Egypt. "It is not a question of terrorism, but pure, outright criminal behavior."

Administration officials decline to acknowledge that they inevitably have to look beyond Sharon. Spokesman McCormack said only that "our focus is on our solidarity with the Israeli people in what is a tough time."

But Walker, a longtime diplomat in the Middle East and Washington, said in an interview that the first thing U.S. officials must be thinking about is what President Bush would say at a funeral. And Bush's attendance is essential, he said.

"They are mapping out a strategy," Walker said. "They have to be ready to move."

U.S. officials "are going to have to pin down" Ehud Olmert, who temporarily took the reins of power from Sharon and could be a top contender for prime minister in a previously scheduled March 28 election.

Before Sharon was stricken, polls pointed to victory for Kadima, the centrist political party Sharon founded after he broke with many of his longtime supporters in the hard-line Likud.

Benjamin Netanyahu, a former prime minister generally placed to the right of Sharon, is a likely contender for the top job.

Walker said he thought the administration favored Kadima, but added: "They cannot get too enmeshed in the election campaign."

Daniel Kurtzer, also a former U.S. ambassador to Israel and to Egypt, said there were probably two things on the minds of administration officials.

One is how to stabilize the situation, Kurtzer said in an interview. He said that means "ensuring that the leadership that emerges in the post-Sharon era continues along the line Sharon has laid out — a tough response to terrorism, but flexibility and creativity in peacemaking."

The second, Kurtzer said, is that the administration would be "laying down markers on the Arab side, particularly with the Palestinians, not to take advantage of what they might perceive to be a period of instability in Israel."

The retired diplomat added, "My guess is that the administration is working on both to try to prevent a downward spiral."

Mideast history is instructive, with predictions often off the mark. But there are constants: U.S. efforts to maintain order and keep Israel and the Arabs on a peace track.

Sharon illustrates how events in the Middle East often defy expectations. The tough, unyielding ex-general wound up endorsing Palestinian statehood and withdrawing all Jewish settlers from Gaza and part of the West Bank.

Nearly three decades ago, Menachem Begin, another dedicated hardliner, agreed to relinquish Sinai to Egypt in exchange for a peace treaty.

The Arab leader he negotiated with, Anwar Sadat, had vowed only months before the accord that peace with Israel was a worthy objective, but not until the next generation.

___

EDITOR'S NOTE: Barry Schweid has reported on the Middle East since 1973.

Scan Shows Slight Improvement In Condition Of Israel's Sharon (WP)

By Scott Wilson

DOJ_NMG_0008611

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 7 -- Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon remained in critical condition Saturday, but a new round of tests revealed a slight improvement in the physical state of his brain.

Despite some positive signs, including evidence suggesting that the side of his brain controlling speech remains unharmed, doctors cautioned that it was too soon to tell whether Sharon would survive the massive stroke and extensive hemorrhaging he has endured in recent days.

"We as people are optimists," said Shlomo Mor-Yosef, director of the Hadassah-Ein Kerem Hospital, where Sharon is being treated. "But I can't say that he is out of danger. His condition is still serious. But the scan shows slight improvement."

Sharon, 77, suffered a stroke Wednesday night caused by a blood clot that went to his brain. Doctors have performed three rounds of surgery struggling to control the resulting hemorrhaging, likely caused in part by blood-thinning medication Sharon was taking for a stroke he suffered last month.

The report by Mor-Yosef Saturday evening was the second consecutive assessment of the prime minister's condition that announced no new bleeding and a reduction in dangerous swelling that could cause permanent brain damage.

But whether Sharon, who has dominated Israeli's politics since becoming prime minister nearly five years ago, will recover and do so with his faculties intact remains uncertain.

"The team at Hadassah Hospital, along with the prime minister and the Sharon family, are fighting to save the prime minister's life," Mor-Yosef said.

Sharon's doctors were to meet Sunday morning to decide when to begin rousing him from a coma, medically induced to give his brain a chance to recover from the trauma of the stroke and repeated surgeries.

Only when he is conscious, Mor-Yosef said, will doctors be able to evaluate Sharon's brain function and any possible damage he has sustained.

Sharon underwent a scheduled brain scan Saturday morning to check for bleeding and to measure pressure inside his skull. A day earlier, a CT scan -- a special multiple X-ray screening process that allows viewing of interior body parts -- revealed fresh hemorrhaging and a spike in pressure. Sharon was rushed into five hours of emergency surgery.

The operation, in which a catheter was inserted to drain fluid from his skull, stanched the bleeding and reduced swelling. Mor-Yosef said the swelling declined further Saturday and that the prime minister's vital signs, including blood pressure and urine production, were within "normal ranges."

The tests also revealed that the left side of Sharon's brain appeared to be undamaged, a potentially auspicious sign for his recovery.

Sharon's hemorrhaging occurred on the right side of his brain, meaning he will likely suffer at least some paralysis on the left side of his body if he survives.

But doctors had also feared that the swelling caused by the bleeding may have squeezed the left side of the brain against the skull, causing damage to areas that control speech, faculties of analysis, and fine motor skills such as writing in a right-handed person. Sharon is right handed, according to one of the doctors treating him.

"The only thing we can say is that the left side of the prime minister's brain remains intact," Mor-Yosef said. "We will only know what this means when they wake the prime minister up gradually."

Much of the country paused for the Jewish Sabbath on a rain-blown Saturday, and many of Israel's rabbis continued calling on the nation to pray for Sharon's recovery.

His stroke has caused upheaval in Israel's political system, and his grave but stable condition has frozen many of the decisions that will determine who might replace him should he be unable to return to office.

"It looks as if his acute state is moving to what we'd call the sub-acute state," said Avi Cohen, a neurosurgeon at Soroka Medical Center in the southern Israeli city of Beersheba who is not directly involved in Sharon's case. "Given the picture of the left side of his brain, he might be able to speak and to write."

Cohen echoed Mor-Yosef, however, in saying it was still hard to know what injury Sharon's brain has suffered. He said doctors would wake him up very slowly and may only keep him conscious long enough to run initial tests to measure brain function.

DOJ_NMG_0008612

"They are not in a hurry," Cohen said. "That's just the way it should be."

Arabs Ponder Life After Sharon (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, January 8, 2006

TEL AVIV -- With Prime Minister Ariel Sharon lying in critical condition over the weekend after suffering a stroke on Wednesday, Palestinians and the broader Arab world have looked on with apprehension.

A brain scan on Mr. Sharon yesterday showed a slight easing of swelling, said Dr. Shlomo Mor-Yosef, director of Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem.

Dr. Jose Cohen, one of the neurosurgeons treating the prime minister, was quoted by Israeli radio as saying he thought Mr. Sharon would recover from the massive stroke he suffered and emerge in relatively good shape, but that after such a shock there would undoubtedly be cognitive damage.

Doctors were to decide today when to lift the prime minister's medically induced coma to examine the extent of the neurological damage.

The incapacitation of Mr. Sharon has stunned Israel's Arab neighbors. Yesterday, King Abdullah of Jordan telephoned acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to express his concern about Mr. Sharon's health, and a day earlier Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak called to say that bilateral relations would continue to improve, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported.

To be sure, most throughout the Arab world aren't forgiving Mr. Sharon for his tough response to the latest Palestinian uprising, or the massacre of Palestinian refugees in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps during Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon.

Video of Gazans passing out candy in response to the news of Mr. Sharon's stroke reflected widely shared sentiment that considers the Israeli prime minister to be a war criminal, analysts said.

And yet, the rehabilitation of Mr. Sharon's international reputation during his five years in office has also affected Palestinian views of the Israeli leader. Writing in the Palestinian daily Al-Ayyam, editor Abdel Nasser A-Najar compared Mr. Sharon to Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and bemoaned the rising insecurity left behind by the two.

"The political map in both Israel and Palestine looks very complicated, with their borders intertwined and unclear. Even the road map looks like it is hibernating towards its death," he said.

"After Sharon, the Israeli people will live in a state of vacuum and confusion not different from the state that the Palestinians had undergone after Yasser Arafat's death. It will take years before both the Israelis and the Palestinians find leaders like Arafat and Sharon."

Mr. Sharon's stature as the chief political patron who helped the spread of Jewish settlements will probably overshadow, among Palestinians, his decision to relinquish Gaza.

Palestinians complain that the Gaza withdrawal has left residents cooped up in the tiny coastal strip while freeing Israel's hand to complete the construction of its separation barrier through the West Bank and bolstering existing Jewish settlements there. At the same time, they don't believe Mr. Sharon was prepared to renew peace negotiations that were halted just after he entered office five years ago.

"The Palestinians look at him as the master of unilateralism," said Palestinian legislator Hanan Ashrawi.

And yet, Mr. Sharon retains a special status among Palestinians for being the first Israeli prime minister able to evacuate Jewish settlements in Gaza and the West Bank.

"He hasn't negotiated, but he has dismantled the settlements, which was a precedent, and we can't ignore that. To people who look at it as a precedent, it's important that the settlements be dismantled to prove that settlements aren't a permanent feature of the landscape."

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat expressed concern that the political vacuum in Israel would contribute to tension on the eve of a Palestinian parliamentary election scheduled for Jan. 25.

The transition from Mr. Sharon to Mr. Olmert may allow a dispute over the voting status of Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem to fester, and ultimately delay the election, Mr. Erekat warned.

DOJ_NMG_0008613

"Sharon's illness will affect us more than anyone else as Palestinians. He is the one occupying our land," Mr. Erekat said. "I am worrying that the competition that will replace Sharon will build more settlements and more walls."

With Sharon Ill, Palestinians Face Own Travails (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 7 - The sudden political disappearance of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, struggling for life after a massive stroke, has thrown the future of any peace process with the Palestinians into question. But the Palestinian Authority itself is in such disarray that it may be incapable of negotiating on terms any Israeli leader could accept.

There is spreading chaos, a sense of deterioration and growing concern among both Palestinians and Israelis that the Palestinian Authority, nearly bankrupt and facing a huge budget deficit, may look like a failed state even before it becomes one.

Life for ordinary Palestinians is becoming harder, with less security and optimism than a year ago. The Israelis pulled out of Gaza - a thrilling moment for many Palestinians - but the territory has become practically lawless, not a model for a future state, and Palestinian voters seem set to punish the divided Fatah movement that monopolizes the Palestinian Authority.

Legislative elections on Jan. 25 are expected to bring the radical Islamic group Hamas, dedicated to a continuing armed struggle against Israeli occupation, into a significant share of power in the authority.

"All the chaos is coming from inside the Palestinian Authority and Fatah," said Khaled Duzdar, a Palestinian analyst at the Israel/Palestine Center for Research and Information. "Fatah almost seems to be working on behalf of Hamas. This is the lowest the Palestinian Authority has reached."

The splitting of the main Palestinian faction Fatah and the participation of Hamas and its militants in the authority are serious questions that any new Israeli leader will have to confront right away.

By itself, the victory of Hamas or its achievement of a blocking minority within the authority could be enough to put an end to the long-moribund "road map," the peace plan drafted and endorsed by the United States, as well as the Israelis and the Palestinians. Hamas is committed to keeping its armed wing and its weapons, and says it is running in this campaign "to protect the resistance." One of the road map's first requirements is that the authority disarm all militants, including Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, which is affiliated with Fatah itself.

The Palestinian Authority's president, Mahmoud Abbas, has promised Israel and Washington to disarm the militants after the elections, but no American or Israeli policy maker or intelligence analyst interviewed over the last two months believes that he will be able to do so, and most think he is unlikely even to try.

So, outside of considerations of Israeli leadership, progress toward peace seems unlikely. That can only add to the Israeli inclination to sit tight and manage the current situation while continuing unilateral disengagement from the Palestinians, like the construction of the separation barrier.

"We have an ailing prime minister and the Palestinians have an ailing Authority, and both are on life support," said a senior Israeli intelligence officer, who could not be identified because of the nature of his work. "We have never been through such a period of anarchy in the Palestinian Authority. As far as security is concerned, the Authority is nominal - anyone in the territories does what they please."

In Gaza City recently, Ahmad el-Balawi, 20, said he had turned to Hamas from Fatah because of the corruption of the authority, the lack of jobs and the deterioration of ordinary life. "We are Muslims, and we need change," he said at his father's toy shop festooned with plastic guns. "We've had experience with Fatah, unfortunately."

Bashir el-Balawi, 46, his father, said: "The majority of them are Hamas now. It's because of the current situation, with no jobs and no safety and the corruption." Asked why he sells so many toy rifles, he threw up his hands. "The kids have fallen in love with weapons, it's just weapons they want, no other toys, they think they will fight against Israel." Does that depress him? "Not really," he said. "They want to feel powerful and free."

There are problems for Israel's interim leadership, too. Mr. Abbas has promised Hamas that the elections will not be postponed, but he has also said that if Israel will not allow Palestinians to vote in East Jerusalem, annexed by Israel after the 1967 war, the elections would be impossible. Israel does not want to be blamed for postponing the elections, especially since the Bush administration has called for them to go ahead.

DOJ_NMG_0008614

Mr. Sharon had the stature to stand up to Washington on this issue, if he chose. It may be a harder choice for the acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, whose performance will be watched closely by Israeli voters. He may want to show his independence from Washington and make a symbolic stand against Hamas participation by banning voting in East Jerusalem, but he would do that only if Mr. Abbas privately wanted him to.

The Palestinian Authority is in deep financial trouble regardless of how the elections proceed. It is spending almost its entire yearly revenue of some $1 billion on salaries, which were recently raised despite cries of alarm from donor countries and the World Bank. According to the authority's former finance minister, Salam Fayad, who quit in protest to run for election, it is essentially out of money, and unable to raise more funds from banks.

Donor countries at an aid meeting in London in mid-December refused to release a semiannual $60 million in aid because, said Nigel Roberts, the regional director of the World Bank, the Palestinians had broken their commitments to fiscal responsibility. "The Palestinian Authority is in imminent functional bankruptcy," Mr. Roberts said. "In any given month now, they might find themselves unable to pay their basic salaries and minimal operational costs."

In 2006, the Palestinian Authority is facing a deficit of about $900 million. It can hope for about $300 million to $350 million in additional funds from the Arab world and donor countries this year - presuming that they can work out another restructuring program with an authority run or dominated by Hamas. But even that would leave a net deficit of around $600 million.

The combination of the security chaos in Gaza and in large parts of the West Bank, the involvement of Hamas and the accumulated troubles of the Palestinian Authority is likely to drive off foreign investors, Mr. Roberts said. Yet it is only investment and job creation that can offer enough jobs for the growing population of young men.

Overall Palestinian unemployment is about 23 percent, but some 75 percent of young men from 16 to 25 years old in refugee camps are unemployed. Hiring some of them into the security services, which Mr. Abbas has done, makes political sense. The checkpoints and the barrier cost the Palestinian economy about 5 percent real growth every year, Mr. Roberts said. That is a major toll, given that 10 percent real growth would be needed to solve the unemployment problem.

In 1999, before this intifada and the Israeli response, the Palestinian Authority had a balanced budget and needed no outside support. Now, even though revenues have recovered to where they were in 1999, the deficit has ballooned. "You can't hire all these people and then increase their wages, that's what's broken the bank," Mr. Roberts said. "The salary bill is so high in relation to resources there are only two options, and both are unsavory. They have to cut salaries or cut staff."

Maj. Gen. Aharon Zeevi-Farkash, the departing director of Israeli military intelligence, said bluntly, "We are facing a real revolution in the Palestinian Authority." The clash of generations - the older group like Mr. Abbas, who went into exile with the late Yasir Arafat; the middle generation like Mahmoud Dahlan and Marwan Barghouti, who grew up under occupation; and the young generation of gunmen empowered by five years of armed conflict - is pulling Fatah apart, he said.

Fatah's divisions are accelerated by a reputation for corruption, arrogance and cronyism, and an inability - despite 70,000 men listed as part of the official Palestinian security services - to provide law and order. This has been fertile ground for Hamas, which is running under the slogan "Change and Reform."

Khalil Shikaki, director of the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, the most respected polling agency in the territories, said, "There is tremendous fragmentation evident in Fatah, with Fatah candidates competing with each other and the Fatah leadership impotent in stopping it."

Hamas, he said, "wants to win and is running like it wants to win," partly to resolve an old battle with the secular Fatah, partly "as a defeat for the accommodationists who want peace with Israel and follow the American lead, and partly as a victory for Islam everywhere."

Hamas wants to respond to demands for reform in the Palestinian Authority, Mr. Shikaki said. "Hamas wants to rise to the challenge. They've built a tremendous constituency and need to deliver."

But on the issue of Israel, neither Mr. Shikaki nor Mr. Duzdar, the Palestinian analyst, thinks Hamas will change its spots. "Anyone who thinks Hamas will become pragmatic if they win and it will be easier to settle the conflict is unrealistic," Mr. Duzdar said. "Hamas will never shift or change its charter or agenda. They want to have an impact on the Palestinian Authority from the inside, to be a tough opposition within the legislature and maybe cripple Abu Mazen and the Palestinian Authority in future negotiations," he said, referring to Mr. Abbas.

DOJ_NMG_0008615

The Israeli intelligence officer said: "Hamas wants Israel gone and they want to keep the means of terror. Yet they are allowed into the political process by those who believe that afterwards, for some unknown reason, Hamas will change its soul or that Abu Mazen can deal with them. Hamas wants to enter the Palestinian Authority to promote its goals, not to change them."

Mr. Shikaki's latest poll, which incorporates constituency voting as well as votes for party lists, indicates that Fatah should win half the 132 seats at stake, with Hamas winning some 39 percent of them. About 14 seats will go to independents, some of them Hamas supporters, he said.

Mr. Duzdar and the senior Israeli intelligence officer say they think Hamas will do better than Mr. Shikaki's polls indicate and will get 45 percent or more of the seats - if the election is allowed to proceed. Senior Fatah members do not want to hand over so much power to Hamas, and there is a wide expectation that election day could be violent.

Israel and its policies in the occupied territories are partly to blame for Mr. Abbas's troubles, Mr. Shikaki said. "Israel could have helped him more," he said. "He did after all put the cease-fire in place. Wasn't this sufficient for Israelis to take more risks? To remove checkpoints, ease the economy, dismantle illegal outposts, freeze settlements, help Abu Mazen rebuild the security forces? But Israelis decided to take as little risk as possible."

Mr. Abbas showed little resolve himself, Mr. Shikaki admits, and embraced the old Fatah bosses rather than bringing along the next generation. "Israel certainly shares some responsibility and blame," Mr. Duzdar said. "But after they withdrew from Gaza, there is no reason for the Palestinian Authority to blame Israel for failing to provide law and order there."

Mr. Shikaki said: "If I were Israeli, I'd be very, very worried watching the rise of Hamas and the fragmentation of Fatah. It limits Israel's options in the West Bank in a big way. Even the simple task of unilateral withdrawal would be a nightmare without Fatah and a reliable Palestinian partner. With Hamas in control, unilateral withdrawals from the West Bank would be seen as a victory for Hamas."

His Condition Slightly Improved, A Comatose Sharon Faces The Risk Of Serious Infections (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger And Lawrence K. Altman

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

JERUSALEM, Jan. 7 - A scan of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's brain on Saturday showed "very slight signs of improvement" but no real change in his condition, which remains stable but critical, a hospital official said Saturday evening.

After three days of a medically induced coma and three operations to stop bleeding and reduce pressure that arose in his brain from a major stroke on Wednesday, Mr. Sharon, 77, is facing a new set of risks.

The risks, which stem from his immobility since the stroke, include development of life-threatening infections like pneumonia, urinary tract infections and bed sores.

It is standard care to move the arms and legs of stroke patients to prevent muscle atrophy and contractions. Hospital workers also move patients and use special mattresses to prevent bed sores.

But Mr. Sharon's bulk would make such care more difficult and increase his risks for complications, according to stroke experts not involved in his care.

Dr. Shlomo Mor-Yosef, the director of Hadassah Ein Kerem Hospital, said Saturday that Mr. Sharon's blood pressure, heart rate and other "vital signs were within normal limits." Mr. Sharon is breathing with the aid of a mechanical respirator.

The hospital has disclosed only limited information about Mr. Sharon's care, making it difficult for independent stroke experts to estimate the severity of brain damage and to follow the case. In addition, conflicting reports form the hospital have added to the confusion.

On Saturday, for example, Dr. Mor-Yosef said that a CT scan obtained earlier in the day showed further reduction in the swelling of Mr. Sharon's brain and said that the pressure had returned to normal.

But on Friday, he had said Mr. Sharon's brain pressure had returned to normal after a third operation to stop bleeding in the brain.

DOJ_NMG_0008616

On Saturday, he made no mention of continued bleeding. He also said the left side of Mr. Sharon's brain "looked better" than the right. But he did not say whether he meant that the structure of the left brain seemed normal or whether it was only less damaged than the right.

Later on Saturday, Dr. Jose Cohen, a member of the team monitoring Mr. Sharon, rated his prospects of survival as "very high," Israel's Channel 2 television reported, according to Reuters. "I am pretty optimistic about it. We are praying there won't be complications, like catching an infection," Dr. Cohen was quoted as saying. But he stressed that Mr. Sharon would not be unscathed, saying, "To say that after a severe impact like this one there would not be cognitive problems is just not acknowledging reality."

On Sunday, Mr. Sharon's medical team will consider when to try to wake him from the induced coma. Until that effort is made, doctors cannot determine how much damage the stroke has caused in terms of paralysis and intellectual functions.

Many Israelis prayed for Mr. Sharon on the Jewish Sabbath while his two sons, Omri and Gilad, kept a vigil by his bedside.

Separately, the imprisoned Palestinian politician Marwan Barghouti warned against any move to use Mr. Sharon's illness as a reason to postpone Palestinian legislative elections scheduled for Jan. 25.

"The Palestinian Authority should avoid making any connection between the health of Sharon and the election date," he said in a statement published in Palestinian newspapers. "The election is a national Palestinian issue and it must not be linked to any foreign concerns such as what is happening in Israel with Sharon."

Mr. Barghouti, who heads the list of Fatah Party candidates despite serving multiple life sentences in Israel for his role in the killing of five Israeli civilians, also criticized the conduct of members of Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, an armed offshoot of Fatah, who carried out violent protests in the Gaza Strip this week.

The gunmen were ultimately successful in forcing the Palestinian Authority to release Alaa al-Hams, who had been arrested for kidnapping a British family.

On Saturday in Gaza, 10 Palestinians were wounded, including 8 police officers, in gun battles in Deir al Balah, when the police tried to make an arrest. One wounded police officer was said to be in serious condition.

In the West Bank, clashes flared briefly between Palestinian gunmen and Israeli soldiers in the northern city of Jenin. Also in Jenin, Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades ordered international observers overseeing this month's Palestinian election to leave the city. "We are sorry to tell you that you must leave Jenin as soon as possible," said a statement to the observers, most of them European.

Ten Voices On The New Era (NYT)

By Peter Edidin

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

ONE constant, in calls to the Middle East on Thursday and Friday, was the background noise of a television, set to a program that was reporting on the condition of Ariel Sharon.

Whether the person being called was a Palestinian or an Israeli, to the left or right on the political spectrum, Mr. Sharon's sudden and unexpected removal from power and to a critical care ward in a Jerusalem hospital had focused them all on the magnitude of his influence and the enormous gap left by his absence.

In Washington, too, the prime minister's incapacitation managed to overshadow even a looming Supreme Court nomination fight and major controversies over influence peddling and domestic spying.

One reason for the extraordinary degree of interest is simply historical. Mr. Sharon is one of the last of the legendary generation - which included Moshe Dayan, David Ben-Gurion, Yitzhak Rabin and others - who founded Israel in 1948. And he has figured in virtually every major event in the nation's history.

Mr. Sharon fought in every Israeli war, led the invasion of Lebanon, was judged indirectly responsible for the massacre of Palestinian men, women and children by Lebanese Christian forces in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in 1982, masterminded the settlement movement in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, helped to bring the conservative Likud Party to power under Menachem Begin, overturning the long dominance of the Labor Party.

DOJ_NMG_0008617

The point is, he has always been there - large, outspoken, sure of himself and infuriating to many, including many Israelis. When he came to power as prime minister in 2001, much of world opinion assumed that the peace process between the Palestinians and Israel was simply at an end.

And yet, in an astonishing act, Mr. Sharon, the most resolute opponent of Arab demands, decided that the nation's security and its future required that Israel relinquish control over the Gaza Strip to the Palestinians. Most observers believe he would have soon followed by withdrawing from parts of the West Bank, too.

To carry out his vision of disengagement and partition, Mr. Sharon created, out of little beyond the force of his personality, a new centrist party called Kadima. And until his stroke, polls showed him - and the array of prominent politicians who had flocked to his banner - well ahead in the parliamentary elections scheduled for March.

How much further he would have gone in pursuing a comprehensive, final peace with the Palestinians is unclear, but many believe that is precisely what he hoped to achieve.

The question now, again assuming that Mr. Sharon is unable to return to power, is what his legacy will be. Will Kadima survive without him, prosper in the elections and, under the leadership of Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister, go on to realize Mr. Sharon's plans? Or will Likud, under the leadership of the hard-right former prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, return to power? Will the Labor Party make new gains?

And will the Palestinians and the Arab nations, deprived of Mr. Sharon as a useful bogeyman, begin to put their own houses in order and deal more constructively with Israel?

A number of Middle East experts and policy makers were asked in phone interviews to offer their own initial, off-the-cuff answers to these and other questions. If nothing else, their responses illustrate how large is the space that Mr. Sharon occupied until last week.

History Interrupted (NYT)

By James Bennet

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

"LOOK, the Jews are not easy people," Ariel Sharon, one of the least easy of people, said late one evening in 2004 on his farm in southern Israel. "Maybe that's the reason they managed to exist, I would say, for thousands of years." He chuckled.

"You cannot defeat Jews," Israel's prime minister went on. "You can maneuver them. You maneuver them, they maneuver you. I would say it's endless maneuvers."

It is hard to imagine Mr. Sharon's own gambits at an end. Having outmaneuvered Jew and gentile, enemy and ally alike, Mr. Sharon at 77 was losing ground at this writing to the invincible opponent he had also cheated more than once. It should have surprised no one - though it did - that he was caught, in this struggle, in mid-maneuver. Having torn up the Jewish settlements he founded in the Gaza Strip, he had been on his way to tearing apart the right-wing party he founded, Likud, in favor of a new, centrist party that was going to do - well, it may be that only Mr. Sharon knew exactly what, and some wondered if even he did.

He almost certainly planned to pull some Israeli settlers out of parts of the West Bank, but how soon, and from which areas? Did he envision signing a peace agreement with the Palestinians from behind the West Bank barrier he mapped out? One that would provide them sovereignty in a viable state? Or did he want to cage the Palestinians in barricaded enclaves like Gaza? Its ends still unknown, its ultimate achievements still uncertain, one of the most audacious exercises of leadership in Israel's history came to an abrupt close at a moment of resounding ambiguity.

"We will never know the real answer," said Tzaly Reshef, a founder of the left-wing Israeli group Peace Now. He said that his own feelings about Mr. Sharon were mixed. "Some good friends who share my views remember only the last two years," he said. "I remember the whole history of Sharon."

"He didn't have a lot of limitations, moral or otherwise," Mr. Reshef said. Yet - partly because of those qualities - Mr. Reshef did not have mixed emotions about the loss of Mr. Sharon as a leader. "I think it is a big tragedy that we lose him now," he said. The same "power and personality," he said, that caused Mr. Sharon to command the bloody invasion of Lebanon in 1982 "could maybe have made him the savior of Israel in the next four years."

DOJ_NMG_0008618

Maybe Mr. Sharon had confided all in his deputy prime minister, Ehud Olmert. Maybe, in a locked chest on the farm, he had squirreled away a map of his planned disposition of territory. But, Mr. Sharon being Mr. Sharon, no one could rule out another feint. Besides, the interplay of Israeli and Palestinian blows and posturing has proved resistant to fixed road maps of any one's devising; prospects for changing the pattern had come to rest more on the creative leadership of the brutal, cunning figure who just exited, stage center.

What Mr. Sharon might have done is a question of more than academic interest. Lacking his credentials, politicians who follow will compete for his legacy and so contest its interpretation. "Everybody's going to fight for the mantle of Ariel Sharon," said Jon Alterman, director of the Middle East program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "I think partly because he covered such a wide swath of the middle of Israeli politics there are going to be innumerable theories of what he might have done."

Israel has never fought a war without Ariel Sharon in the front lines or in command, or both. Even Israelis who held him responsible for the massacre of Palestinians at Sabra and Shatila during the Lebanon War or the deaths of Arab civilians during his commando raids of the 1950's trusted him to concede territory because they believed that, as he often said, he would never take a risk with their security.

As a leader, Mr. Sharon - his first name means "Lion of God" - was everything he seemed, and its opposite. He was blunt in speech and subtle in aim, sloppy in appearance and meticulous in preparation, grandfatherly in demeanor and ruthless in reality. In their 1973 study, "The Israeli Army," Edward Luttwak and Dan Horowitz concluded that he "concealed one of the finest tactical minds in the Army behind the carefully cultivated image of a simple fighting soldier."

It is the effort to conceal that is telling. His nickname, "the Bulldozer," reflected only his most obvious features - the fists, not the brain. He was underestimated even when he ran for prime minister five years ago, when potential opponents, including Benjamin Netanyahu, stood aside in the expectation that Mr. Sharon would keep the seat warm, quickly fall from power, and make a successor look good by comparison.

Those entangled by his tactics often came away revolted. "The biggest liar this side of the Mediterranean," the American diplomat Philip Habib, who on behalf of Ronald Reagan tried to end Israel's 1982 Lebanon invasion, said of Mr. Sharon, who was then defense minister. Mr. Sharon was a man of fixed ends - Israel's security, as he saw it, and its inextricable adjuncts, his own military and political success - and infinitely flexible means. That was the bitter lesson learned by Israeli settlers who moved into Gaza on his encouragement and out of it on his orders.

Mr. Sharon called his new party Kadima, or Forward, without ever saying just where it was headed. Both the indefatigable dove, Shimon Peres, and hawks like Shaul Mofaz, the defense minister, flocked to him. A poll released just before Mr. Sharon was stricken Wednesday showed Kadima crushing the established Likud and Labor Parties. Mr. Sharon had not even prepared a parliamentary list for elections, ranking his party leaders in order of importance. They must now sort it all out on their own.

Mr. Sharon was no mere blur, of course. He used ambiguity to hold the political center but he held that political center in order to shape it. He reversed the logic for ending the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that was adopted by his predecessors Yitzhak Rabin and Ehud Barak: While those prime ministers sought security through peace agreements, Mr. Sharon insisted, as he put it, that only security could bring peace. The Palestinians would have to lay down arms before negotiations could begin.

As a result, Israelis endorsed Mr. Sharon's conviction that the Palestinian leadership, unable or unwilling to crack down on militants, could not now be a peace partner. And so they overwhelmingly backed his approach of unilaterally setting Israel's boundaries, withdrawing from Gaza in what he assured voters was their own interest.

Palestinians and Mr. Sharon's left-wing critics said his approach was calculatedly self-fulfilling. In their eyes, his refusal to talk undermined Palestinian pragmatists, who needed negotiated achievements to build domestic support. To them, Israeli incursions and blockades crippled the very security forces that were supposed to act against terrorists. Mr. Sharon's unilateralism, they said, empowered militants, who pointed to it in arguing that the violence of the second intifada had achieved something that 10 years of negotiations never did - the evacuation of Israeli settlements.

Mr. Sharon was fairly clear about whether he saw this unilateralism leading to a peace agreement. He wanted an agreement, he said, provided the Palestinians could meet his demands for his security. His senior aides used to joke that, to do so, the Palestinians would have to become Swedes. For years, Mr. Sharon said he wanted a long-term interim agreement, a sort of standstill arrangement that would end the fighting, reduce the friction between the two peoples and help them, somehow, become comfortable with each other. Only after many years, he argued, would there be enough trust for real peace. In any final deal, he wanted to hold all of Jerusalem and Israel's biggest West Bank settlements.

DOJ_NMG_0008619

Mr. Sharon liked to quote advice his mother gave him in the early 1980's, when he was negotiating with the Egyptians: "Do not trust them! You cannot trust a piece of paper!"

In that conversation at his farm, in the summer of 2004, Mr. Sharon cautioned, "Here, in this region here, declarations, speeches, words, are worthless." It was, he said, "an empire of lies." Yet even Mr. Reshef said Mr. Sharon would ultimately have been open to negotiating peace with the Palestinians, if they pulled themselves together.

Rather than words, Mr. Sharon believed in action, in land, and in history as he saw it, and he saw it all around him. That evening at his farm, he described riding through the terraced West Bank hills near the city of Ramallah. He would narrow his eyes, he said, to block out the electrical lines and imagine warriors of the ancient Israeli tribe of Benjamin "with spears, running there on those terraces."

Arabs, he added, did not build the terraces. "Those terraces are old Jewish terraces," he said.

Mr. Sharon has earned his own place in that glorious, sad story, and in the debate that may never die.

Specialists To Plan Next Step For Sharon (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

JERUSALEM — Doctors said Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon remained in critical condition in a medically induced coma Saturday as fresh tests showed that swelling in his brain had eased slightly after a massive stroke three days earlier.

Dr. Shlomo Mor-Yosef, director of Hadassah University Medical Center, said during an evening briefing that specialists at the hospital in various medical fields would gather today to plan a course of action.

Sharon's life remained in danger after the severe bleeding of the hemorrhagic stroke. One matter to be decided is when doctors will begin trying to wake the prime minister from the coma by gradually reducing the dosage of anesthetics. Only then can they get a clear idea of the extent of brain damage the 77-year-old Sharon has suffered as a result of the stroke, his second in a month.

Assessing the extent of damage, and to what degree Sharon will be able to function, "is indeed the question we would all like answered," Mor-Yosef said during a briefing that was somewhat more detailed than previous ones.

Sharon underwent a CT scan early Saturday to allow his physicians to check for swelling or renewed bleeding after the cerebral hemorrhage and three operations since Wednesday night.

Mor-Yosef said the scan showed a "slight improvement" in swelling, adding that the left side of the brain appeared to have been spared the damage caused to the right side. Speech functions are centered in the left side.

Mor-Yosef said various vital signs — intracranial pressure, blood pressure and pulse rate — were within "normal limits." But he cautioned that Sharon's condition remained grave.

"It's still critical and stable," he said in English.

He said that after today's meeting among medical specialists, "we will decide about management for the next 24 hours."

Later, one of Sharon's surgeons told Israel's Channel Two that Sharon's chances of survival were "very high," but that cognitive damage was likely, Associated Press reported.

The briefing was the hospital's first since Friday, when Sharon was rushed into surgery for a third time to stanch new bleeding. Doctors performed back-to-back operations after Sharon suffered the stroke late Wednesday.

He had been scheduled for surgery at Hadassah the following day to repair a small hole in his heart that is thought to have contributed to a minor stroke on Dec. 18.

Doctors said the earlier stroke had caused no lasting damage. He was sent home two days later and was taking blood-thinning medications, which made it more difficult for doctors to stop hemorrhaging during the subsequent episode.

Doctors have described the most recent damage as extensive, and the reports have left little hope that Sharon would ever return to office. His deputy, Vice Premier Ehud Olmert, has filled in as prime minister since Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0008620

Olmert joined Sharon in bolting from the conservative Likud Party two months ago to form a centrist movement that supports steps to resolve the conflict with the Palestinians.

Olmert is considered the person most likely to lead the new party, Kadima, in national elections scheduled to take place in March. But it is not clear whether Olmert or anyone else in Kadima can muster the same support that the party commanded under Sharon. Polls have shown the party with large leads over the left-leaning Labor Party and Likud.

A pair of surveys taken since Sharon's latest stroke indicated that the party would suffer only a minor dip in support under Olmert, but those findings may be an unreliable gauge because public sympathy for the prime minister remains high.

Olmert was reportedly planning to meet again with Shimon Peres in an effort to persuade him to stay with Kadima and to ignore Labor's calls for him to return to the party he once led. Peres is said to be seeking assurances for a senior post if he stays with Kadima and Olmert becomes prime minister.

Peres, 82, joined Kadima after losing the Labor leadership post to Amir Peretz, a fiery union leader. Analysts say Olmert would gain much from an endorsement by Peres, who is widely respected in Israel and abroad despite repeatedly losing elections.

Even Pat Robertson's Friends Are Wondering... (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

EVERY day, two people pay particularly close attention to Pat Robertson's religious news and variety show, "The 700 Club." They have notepads in hand, and the VCR set on "record."

They work in Washington at two of the nation's most ardent enemies of the Christian right: People for the American Way and Americans United for Separation of Church and State. They lay in wait for Mr. Robertson to say something truly jaw-dropping - like his suggestion on Thursday that Ariel Sharon's stroke was divine punishment for "dividing God's land," and giving away Gaza to the Palestinians.

Within hours of such comments, the remarks are disseminated by e-mail to journalists around the country, and soon video clips of Mr. Robertson are the subject of news broadcasts and nationwide ridicule.

Mr. Robertson, who has made provocative comments since he first came on the scene, has in recent months made news repeatedly. Last August, he suggested that the United States assassinate Hugo Chávez, the leftist Venezuelan president. "It's a whole lot cheaper than starting a war, and I don't think any oil shipments will stop," he said.

In September he mused about whether the abortion rate in America could have provoked Hurricane Katrina and the terrorist attacks on the United States.

The news media avidly reported his comments, but are they worthy of attention? Do conservative Christians still follow Mr. Robertson in large numbers?

Certainly, his following seems to have diminished. Mr. Robertson's political machine, the Christian Coalition, once a powerhouse at mobilizing voters, is limping along since he resigned as president five years ago, fending off a long waiting list of creditors, its presence in the capital reduced to a post office box.

His old friends and allies in the conservative Christian movement are cringing with embarrassment, giving interviews ruing his remarks. "He speaks for an ever-diminishing number of American evangelicals, and that process accelerates every time he makes a statement like this," said Richard Land, president of the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission.

Os Guinness, a prominent Christian writer and social critic, said: " I know hundreds of people who are just terminally frustrated with the idiotic public statements of Jerry Falwell and Pat Robertson and the idea that these people represent us. They don't."

Donald Wildmon, the founder and head of American Family Association and American Family Radio, said: "Pat's comments were most unfortunate. I don't think this served our cause very well."

DOJ_NMG_0008621

But dismissing Mr. Robertson at this point in his long career would be wrong. Whether his colleagues wish it or not, he remains a force among religious conservatives. At 75, Mr. Robertson still regularly appears on his show. And he remains connected to both Regent University and the American Center for Law and Justice, growing institutions that he founded.

"Among the elites in the movement, they're getting impatient with him and probably are past the point of being able to take him anymore," said Mark J. Rozell, a professor of public policy at George Mason University who has followed Mr. Robertson for years. "But there is a real strong core of activists throughout the country who support and like Pat Robertson, might even agree with some of the things he says, though they might like him to express his views a little more delicately."

For instance, many conservative Christians agree in principle with his comments about the Middle East - the Scriptures, they agree, call for a unified Israel.

Mr. Robertson's daily program, "The 700 Club," is carried in most markets nationwide on ABC Family and the Trinity Broadcasting networks, and drew an average audience of 828,000 viewers in the last quarter of 2005, according to Nielsen Media Research. While he cannot compete with "American Idol," he had more viewers than CNBC or MSNBC in prime time.

As a host, Mr. Robertson regularly draws guests like Republican leaders Bill Frist, Rick Santorum, Tom DeLay and Sam Brownback. Last week, he bantered with Fred Barnes, a Fox commentator and executive editor of The Weekly Standard. The show is also a prime advertising vehicle for Christian books, music and other products.

Mr. Guinness, the writer, said that while he has refused invitations to appear on Mr. Robertson's program, out of principle, "I know a good number who go on because they want to sell their books."

Those who know him say they are puzzled why Mr. Robertson continues to discredit himself - and the cause - with the kind of intemperate remarks that play in media roundups alongside those from the president of Iran.

Mr. Robertson refused interview requests on Friday. The Christian Broadcasting Network issued a statement defending Mr. Robertson, and accusing People for the American way of taking his comments out of context "on an ongoing basis" and circulating them "in an attempt to discredit him."

Mr. Robertson did not appear on "The 700 Club" on Friday. Instead it was hosted, as it often is, by his son, Gordon. He prayed for God to heal Mr. Sharon.

US Concerned Over Violence Flare-up In Sri Lanka (AFP-Y2)

AFP, January 8, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has voiced concern over a flare-up of violence in Sri Lanka, and hopes Colombo and Tamil Tiger rebels will resume talks to reinforce their fragile truce, the State Department said.

Washington plans to dispatch a senior official to the troubled tropical Indian Ocean island soon to discuss the conflict, the department said Friday.

Rice "expressed concern over the recent upsurge in violence in northern and eastern Sri Lanka" during talks with visiting Sri Lankan Foreign Minister Mangala Samaraweera on Thursday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

In the latest violence, at least five Sri Lankan sailors were killed and 10 others were missing and presumed dead early Saturday following the sinking of a navy gunboat in a suspected suicide bombing.

The attack was the first sinking of a high-powered naval gunboat since a Norwegian-brokered truce between Colombo and the rebel Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) went into effect from February 2002.

Rice and Samaraweera discussed the current status of the Sri Lankan peace process and the importance of strengthening the ceasefire, McCormack said.

"Secretary Rice reiterated the United States hope that talks between the Sri Lankan government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam on ways to strengthen the ceasefire could resume soon," he said.

"She also lauded the Sri Lankan government for its restraint in the face of the Tamil Tigers' provocations."

Rice said the United States, co-chair of the Sri Lanka Donors Group along with Japan, the European Union and Norway, remained committed to working with Sri Lanka "to defeat terrorism and to promote peace."

Washington has tagged the LTTE as a terrorist organization.

DOJ_NMG_0008622

Rice told her Sri Lankan counterpart that State Department Undersecretary Nicholas Burns "does intend to travel" to Sri Lanka to discuss prospects of restoring peace.

"I think he's (Burns) going to talk about a number of different issues: talk about facilitating the peace between the government and the LTTE, as well as other issues of regional concern," McCormack said.

Amid the upsurge in violence, many are concerned Sri Lanka would descend again into civil war.

President Mahinda Rajapakse won November polls promising a brand new peace process that would have sidelined Norwegian peacebrokers. But he has now invited Oslo to continue its role, despite staunch opposition by his allies.

LTTE chief Velupillai Prabhakaran had warned that unless Colombo -- which has already ruled out a separate homeland for minority Tamils -- gives them wide autonomy, the Tigers would "intensify their struggle."

Rice praised Norway's "important role" in trying to facilitate the peace process even as Oslo struggled to bring the two parties to the table following a dispute over the venue of potential peace talks.

Citing the most recent attack, Samaraweera appealed for concerted international pressure on Tamil Tiger rebels to bring them back to the negotiating table.

"They are a brutal terror machine but having said that, we must bring them (the rebels) into the mainstream and terrorism must be wiped out," he said.

Asked on the possibility of retaliation, Samaraweera said, "there will come a point when the public could be provoked into action and the government may not be able to control."

The three-decade-old ethnic conflict between the majority Sinhalese and minority Tamils has claimed over 60,000 lives. Four major peace attempts and several ceasefires have collapsed in the past.

Bomb Kills 13 On Navy Boat In Sri Lanka (NYT)

By Shimali Senanayake And Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, Jan. 7 - A suicide bomber destroyed a Sri Lankan gunboat early Saturday, the authorities said, and European cease-fire monitors warned that such an expansion of violence could lead to a return of full-scale war between the government and Tamil Tiger rebels.

The incident, in which 13 of the 15 sailors aboard are believed to have been killed, was the most lethal attack at sea here since a 2002 cease-fire agreement between the government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, who have been fighting for a separate homeland for more than 20 years.

"If the L.T.T.E. is behind this, then they are pushing the situation closer to war," said Hagrup Haukland of Norway, the chief monitor of the truce brokered by Norway in 2002. "I am very worried. I have never been so worried about the situation."

A speedboat laden with explosives rammed the Israeli-built gunboat shortly after midnight, the navy said, sinking the vessel, which carried a 15-member crew. Fishermen plucked 2 sailors from the water, but the 13 others were feared dead.

The Tamil Tigers denied responsibility for the attack.

Sri Lanka's foreign minister, Mangala Samaraweera, in Washington for talks with Secretary of State of State Condoleezza Rice, told reporters that such incidents risked a major expansion of the conflict, Agence France-Presse reported. "There will come a point when the public could be provoked into action and the government may not be able to control," he said.

The boat sank amid spiraling violence; nearly 50 police officers and soldiers were killed in December alone, the bloodiest month since the truce began. On Monday, five ethnic Tamil students were killed in Trincomalee in eastern Sri Lanka. The military said they died in a botched grenade explosion, but the rebels accused the military of shooting them.

The attack on Saturday was the first time a navy gunboat had been sunk since the 2002 cease-fire agreement. "It's almost like an undeclared war," a military spokesman, Brig. Prasad Samarasinghe, said.

Russians Visit Iran On Nuclear Plan (NYT)

By Agence France-presse

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008623

TEHRAN, Jan. 7 (Agence France-Presse) - Russian envoys met with Iranian officials on Saturday to try to persuade Tehran to accept a compromise for ending a standoff with the West over Iran's plans to press ahead with its nuclear development program, state television said.

Moscow is proposing that Iran carry out uranium enrichment on Russian territory to allay Western fears that the work could lead to Iran's producing a nuclear bomb. Both the European Union and the United States have backed the proposal in principle, but it has so far been rebuffed by Iran.

The spokesman for Iran's top security body, Hossein Entezami, was quoted by state television as saying that the talks involved "joint enrichment on Russian territory and also enrichment on Iranian soil."

Mr. Entezami also said that inspectors from the United Nations' International Atomic Energy Agency had arrived here to monitor Iran's resumption of nuclear research next week, though it was not clear what that research would entail.

In Vienna, a spokesman for the agency said that it had still not received details of Iran's plans and that until such clarification was provided, the inspectors' presence in Tehran should be considered routine.

In recent weeks, Iranian officials first hinted that they might consider the Russian plan but later insisted that any deal recognize Iran's right to carry out enrichment in Iran. "If it says that enrichment can only happen in Russia, it's not acceptable," a Foreign Ministry spokesman, Hamid Reza Asefi, said Tuesday.

Iran's Top Mullah May Be On Our Side (LAT)

By Dariush Zahedi And Ali Ezzatyar

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

THE UNITED STATES has a surprising ally in its impatience with the new Iranian president. Since his inauguration, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's pugnacious demeanor has not only roiled the international community but also a significant portion of Iran's ruling elite. A coalition of traditional conservatives, pragmatists and reformists is emerging within the government to oppose Ahmadinejad's brand of governance. With Iran saying it will resume nuclear fuel research, the U.S. should do all in its power to boost the bargaining power of these more moderate Iranian leaders.

The rise of the anti-Ahmadinejad faction defies the expectations of Iran analysts, who believed that the post-Khatami era would produce a monolithic conservative bloc in control of most major levers of power. Instead, the coalition is strengthening and attracting many of the regime's powerful personalities, perhaps even the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Evidence of the latter is Khamenei's recent decree giving the Expediency Council, a non-elected body headed by former President Hashemi Rafsanjani, oversight of the presidency.

Ahmadinejad's primary supporters have always been the rank and file of the country's paramilitary forces. Renowned for their fearlessness and passionate commitment to the populist ideals of the Islamic revolution, they had not dominated government before or since Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's death in 1989.

The political struggle of Iran's security establishment has come full circle with Ahmadinejad's rise, which makes dealing with Tehran more difficult. The paramilitaries are the ultimate guarantors of the regime's survival. Their leaders wield enormous influence in the Islamic Republic's coercive security establishment, particularly those associated with the Revolutionary Guards. The militants also dominate the volunteer, or Basiji, militia force, believed to have more than 1 million members.

The paramilitaries are not fully tied to any one of the groups vying for power in Iran. Rather, they seek to influence domestic and foreign policy through their numbers and martial strength. They know international tensions that heighten security threats to Iran enhance their status in the power struggle. Although Ahmadinejad owes his presidency to allies in the guards and the Basiji forces, they are not totally beholden to him.

The unlikely counterbalance to Ahmadinejad could be Khamenei. He has frequently cultivated the paramilitaries since his elevation and relied on them to consolidate his power. But should the radicals attempt to direct policy without his explicit consent, Khamenei could move toward pragmatists allied with Rafsanjani and reformist supporters of former President Mohammad Khatami. The two former presidents don't want one of their few achievements in the last 16 years — Iran's moderately improved relations with the outside world — to disappear.

DOJ_NMG_0008624

Contrary to popular belief, the traditional conservative clerical establishment is apprehensive about the possibility of violence inside and outside Iran. It generally opposes an aggressive foreign policy and, having some intimate ties with Iran's dependent capitalist class, is appalled at the rapid slide of the economy since Ahmadinejad's inauguration. The value of Tehran's stock market has plunged $10 billion, the nation's vibrant real estate market has withered and capital outflows are increasing.

Khamenei has intimated his readiness to distance himself from the radicals. Apart from authorizing nonpresidential bodies to supervise the three branches of government, he has instructed the Supreme Council for National Security to more fully cooperate with the International Atomic Energy Agency in the development of Iran's nuclear program. These moves have strengthened his institutional power and helped prevent Ahmadinejad's administration from undermining the regime's credibility.

Here is where the United States comes in. The history of U.S.-Iran relations shows that the more Washington chastises Tehran for its nuclear ambitions, the more it plays into the hands of the radicals by riling up fear and nationalist sentiment. Instead, the U.S. needs to offer Iran an acceptable face-saving mechanism to allow it to master, under appropriate international supervision, the nuclear fuel cycle. A seed planted now could even grow into the long-awaited detente between the two countries and help the U.S. extricate itself from Iraq.

Assad Said To Reject Questioning In U.N. Inquiry (LAT/REU)

From Reuters

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

BEIRUT — Syrian President Bashar Assad has rejected a request to be interviewed by a United Nations commission investigating the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, diplomatic sources said Saturday.

Syria told the U.N. commission the request violates the country's sovereignty, the sources said.

The decision is likely to intensify international pressure on the Damascus regime, given a U.N. Security Council resolution in October threatening to take unspecified action if Syria failed to fully cooperate with the inquiry.

A spokeswoman for the U.N. investigation confirmed that Syria had replied to a request to meet Assad and Foreign Minister Farouq Shara, among other officials, but refused to elaborate.

Asked whether Syria had rejected the request to meet Assad, one diplomatic source said, "Yes, that's true." The source added, "The main point is that Syria said the request violates the principles of sovereignty."

The diplomats, who asked not to be named, said Damascus has responded positively to "one part of the request" but declined to give further details. Diplomats said earlier that Syria had agreed to allow the commission to meet with Shara.

In an interview published Saturday by Egyptian weekly newspaper El Osboa, Assad hinted that he would be immune from questioning by U.N. investigators.

"There was a previous request, when the committee proposed to come to Syria at the end of last summer to listen to Syrian witnesses, as they call them. At that time, they requested to meet with President Bashar, and the president of the republic has international immunity," Assad said in the interview.

The inquiry has implicated senior Syrian officials and their Lebanese allies in the Feb. 14 killing of Hariri and 22 others in Beirut. Syria has denied any role, but the assassination sparked mass protests in Beirut, forcing Damascus to bow to world pressure and end its 29-year military presence in Lebanon in April.

Europe Comes To Terms With Need For Russian Gas (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

FRANKFURT, Jan. 7 - President Vladimir V. Putin's decision to switch off Russia's natural gas spigot to Ukraine on New Year's Day is being widely judged a ham-handed miscalculation, because in the end it only proved how much Europe was prepared to help an independent-minded Ukraine resist Russian bullying. But realists here argue that Europe needs to draw some lessons as well.

There is plenty of evidence that Mr. Putin overplayed his hand and was humiliated when Europe forced him to turn the gas back on. He underestimated Ukraine's leverage as the primary conduit for Russian gas exports to Europe, and Europe's influence as the major consumer of Russian gas. He also misjudged how much his decision would erode the confidence Germany, France, Italy and other countries had in Russia's trustworthiness as a supplier.

DOJ_NMG_0008625

But now that the gas is flowing again - under a tenuous new deal on pricing in which Ukraine and Russia each gave a little ground - the experts are saying another lesson is becoming clear.

Since Europe, they say, still has no alternative to Russia's gas, it must learn to live with Russia's peculiar habits as a political and commercial partner.

Despite its demise as a superpower, Russia is not content to be an economic player that follows the West's lead in political matters. It insists on acting like a global power with a mind of its own, and it views its natural resources as a tool for furthering its political goals - perhaps its last best tool, now that its military and its decrepit industrial base have proved so poorly matched to the West's.

"Europe has to recalibrate itself, not to the idea of a growing, democratic Russia, but to a Russia that is behaving according to its sense of its national interests," said John C. Kornblum, a former American ambassador to Germany who is now a banker in Berlin. "It is not concerned about winning prizes in the West."

That does not mean giving in to Russian threats. It means expecting Russia to put political spin on an economic policy, and being ready to resist, if necessary. It also means that Europe should feel free to link politics to its own economic bargaining - for example, prodding Russia on human rights or democracy as part of the price of remaining a customer.

Lecturing Russia on the evils of using energy as a political weapon makes little sense, given that it derives so much of its hard currency from oil and gas, and Europe's dependence is only likely to increase.

Europe can strengthen its hand by exploring how to curb its dependency, either by finding other gas suppliers or developing alternative fuel sources. Germany is already talking about extending the life of nuclear plants. Last week, President Jacques Chirac said France would build the prototype for a fourth generation of nuclear plants. The goal, he said, is that by 2020, French trains will not use a drop of gasoline.

But such a strategy has limits. Nuclear plants supply only 14 percent of Europe's energy, compared with 23 percent for gas, and the role of gas is expected to increase. Windmills, solar panels and the like are long-term solutions; for the foreseeable future, households from Munich to Milan will rely on Russian gas to ward off the winter cold.

Since Europe's current relationship with Russia has been shaped in large part by Germany - it pioneered economic ties with Moscow during the cold war, and is by far the largest consumer of Russian gas - any new understanding between Russia and Europe will probably have to begin with Germany.

"Germany had the idea that energy could be the guarantor of good relations," said Wolfgang Eichwede, an expert on Russia at the University of Bremen. "The lesson is that relations have to be not only reliable but balanced."

The new German government spoke openly last week about the first part of that formula, when its economics minister, Michael Glos, raised questions about Russia's dependability and said the time had come for Germany to explore other sources of energy.

Chancellor Angela Merkel is expected to discuss the matter when she has her first meeting with Mr. Putin on Jan. 16. Mrs. Merkel, a conservative who was raised in the former East Germany and speaks Russian, is believed to be more of a pessimist about how much to expect from Russia than was her Socialist predecessor, Gerhard Schröder.

"She does not have a romantic view of Russia," said Alexander Rahr, an expert on Russia at the German Council on Foreign Relations. "I don't think she especially likes Russia, but she understands it."

Mr. Schröder cultivated a friendship with Mr. Putin and adopted a Russian child, which became a metaphor for the cozy links he wanted between Germany and Russia. Last month, he became the chairman of a Russian-German consortium that is building a $5 billion gas pipeline from Russia to Germany, a deal he had brokered as chancellor.

Depending on one's perspective, this pipeline is either a shrewd way to avoid the complications of receiving Russian gas via middle countries like Ukraine or Poland, or a mistake that would make Germany even more dependent on Russia.

Skeptics argue that it would be a good thing, not just for Europe but for the relationship, to keep a country like Ukraine as a buffer between the supplier and ultimate customer.

DOJ_NMG_0008626

"The more flags that are planted in a pipeline, the harder it is to cut off," said William C. Ramsay, the deputy executive director of the International Energy Agency in Paris.

In the end, few experts here believe that Europe is in genuine danger of having Russia turn off the tap. The European market is too vital for Russia, and both sides have already invested too much in the plants and pipes that carry the gas. Managing the relationship is the issue.

"Pipelines are like kids in a marriage," said Jérôme Guillet, a French banker and an expert in natural gas. "The seller cannot sell his gas elsewhere; the buyer cannot buy gas elsewhere. The two sides are welded together."

Such marriages work best, the realists argue, when both partners have no illusions about changing the other.

British Liberal Quits As Party Leader (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

LONDON, Jan. 7 - The leader of the Liberal Democratic Party, Charles Kennedy, who admitted last week that he had a drinking problem, resigned as party leader on Saturday in the face of growing criticism in his own party.

Mr. Kennedy, who is not giving up his seat in Parliament, had vowed to fight for his job as party leader, declaring that his drinking was under control and that he had been sober for two months. But his position became increasingly untenable as more and more party members, in Parliament and in the country at large, publicly declared their opposition to his continuing as leader.

On Friday, 25 of Mr. Kennedy's parliamentary colleagues said they would resign from their policy positions if Mr. Kennedy remained as party leader. A poll conducted by the BBC television program "Newsnight" found that more than half the Liberal Democrats in Parliament said that Mr. Kennedy's position as leader had become unsustainable.

Britain is a hard-drinking country, and voters generally find nothing to complain about if politicians enjoy a glass or two. But Mr. Kennedy, sometimes called Champagne Charlie, has long been dogged by rumors that he drank to excess, particularly when he missed important debates in Parliament. His aides have invariably blamed illness or scheduling conflicts for such lapses.

After becoming party leader in 1999, Mr. Kennedy repeatedly and publicly denied that he had trouble with alcohol. He finally admitted that he had been receiving help for a drinking problem after being confronted with damning evidence from Channel 4 News. The Liberal Democrats - Britain's third-largest party. after Labor and the Conservatives - won 62 seats in Parliament in the 2005 election, the party's largest representation since the 1920's.

Party officials said Mr. Kennedy's deputy, Sir Menzies Campbell, would serve as acting leader until the party decided how to go about selecting a permanent leader.

Leader Of British Political Party Steps Down (LAT)

By John Daniszewski

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

LONDON — Charles Kennedy, leader of Britain's third-largest political party, gave in to demands of colleagues and resigned Saturday, two days after being forced to acknowledge a drinking problem.

Kennedy, 46, who had helped raise the Liberal Democrats to the highest level of any third party in British politics since the 1920s, saw his career brought down after a weeks-long campaign by colleagues, who insisted that they were doing it for his good and the good of their party.

Although he said he had not had a drink in two months and was receiving professional help, an ultimatum came in the form of a letter signed by 25 of the 62 Liberal Democrat members of Parliament. They said they would not support him as leader after Monday.

"I am standing down as leader," Kennedy told reporters Saturday at the party's headquarters. "When nominations open for the leadership of the party, I shall not now be putting my name forward."

He said he had received support from rank and file party members but recognized that it was insufficient. "It has become clear that such support is not reflected strongly enough across the parliamentary party."

In 2003, Kennedy was the only British opposition leader to protest Prime Minister Tony Blair's decision to go to war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0008627

Although Kennedy's resignation was not expected to bring about any major shift in British politics, his slow political demise has dominated headlines here for a week.

Alcohol abuse and the penchant of many young Britons to engage in binge drinking have become a serious social issue in recent years. British politicians often were known to be heavy drinkers, but the case of Kennedy indicates that such behavior is no longer to be countenanced.

Liberal Democrats began speaking anonymously against Kennedy a few weeks before the Christmas holiday. Using euphemisms, they said such things as he had been "off his game, "tired" or "unfocused" recently.

The attacks began immediately after the Conservatives chose a new leader: charismatic 39-year-old David Cameron, who gave the party a fresh look and political boost. That led some senior Liberal Democrats to think that that their party should change as well to position itself for the next elections, likely to be held in 2009 or 2010.

After insisting that he intended to remain in his post, Kennedy called a news conference Thursday when his office learned that broadcast reporters were about to break the news that he had sought treatment for alcohol abuse. His acknowledgment contradicted earlier denials that he drank excessively.

At that stage, Kennedy said he intended to fight to retain his post, but he agreed to schedule a leadership election if anyone wished to challenge him.

That stance did not satisfy critics, many of whom came out against him more openly Friday, insisting that he spare himself and the party by agreeing to step down.

Kennedy said he would spend the weekend reflecting, but gave in late Saturday, apparently concluding that his position was irrevocably damaged.

A red-haired Scotsman and Roman Catholic from the Highlands near Inverness, Kennedy was the youngest member of Parliament when he was elected to the House of Commons 22 years ago.

Although under Kennedy the Liberal Democrats increased their representation in Parliament, many thought the party should have done better in last year's election, in light of widespread disillusionment with the war in Iraq, which had been backed by both by the Labor and the Conservative parties. To many voters, it seemed, Kennedy lacked the gravity to be considered a potential prime minister.

The Liberal Democrats were formed in 1987 when the Liberal Party, which traced its history to the 19th century, merged with the Social Democratic Party, made up of moderates who had broken away from the Labor Party a few years earlier.

Gandhi-Quoting Yuppie Shakes Stuffiness From Britain's Tories (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

LONDON -- He's a 39-year-old young urban professional who quotes Gandhi, fights poverty with activist rocker Bob Geldof, wants to stand up to big business and is so worried about global warming that he's planning to erect a wind turbine on his roof.

Meet David Cameron, Conservative.

Since his election last month as Conservative Party leader, Cameron has shaken up his party like a man beating a carpet with a stick. Sitting atop an organization that has been sputtering since no-nonsense Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher left office in 1990, Cameron has startled Britain with policy pronouncements and stylistic flourishes rare for a leader of the Tories, as the party is known.

His supporters are betting that combination will make him a formidable challenger to succeed Prime Minister Tony Blair. While some Conservatives worry that he has abandoned their party's "middle England" core values, many more said Cameron is a shot of adrenaline for a party disheartened after three consecutive elections losses to Blair's Labor Party.

"Because of Cameron, there's a new sort of feel -- there's an excitement, there's a feeling we can win," said Laurence Robertson, a Tory member of Parliament. "The man in the pub, the man in the street, they are taking an interest for the first time in a long time in what we are doing."

DOJ_NMG_0008628

Robertson and other Conservatives said Labor was frightened by Cameron, but several Labor MPs said they were closer to amused. "He's making all these touchy-feely statements, but none of it is backed up," said Labor MP Fraser Kemp. "The British Tory party is still a pretty right-wing organization. The new-gloss paint is going to fade."

Since taking over, Cameron has worked frenetically to stay in the public eye, turning an annual British cultural phenomenon to his advantage.

From just before Christmas until just after New Year's, virtually every business in Britain shuts down. While Blair decamped to a vacation at Sharm el-Sheikh, a resort in Egypt, Cameron worked during the holiday lull and kept public attention focused squarely on himself.

One day he signed up Geldof as an anti-poverty adviser, the next he demanded that employers address the "morally wrong" gender gap in pay, and then he distanced himself from Thatcher -- a venerated Tory icon -- by saying he "will not be the prisoner of an ideological past."

He rode a bike to work. He surveyed endangered waterways. Then came full-page advertisements in New Year's Day newspapers trumpeting his political call to arms:

"As the world is changing, so must we," Cameron wrote, calling change "the central objective in 2006 of a modern, compassionate Conservative Party." He said he wanted "every single member and supporter of the Conservative Party to remember that personal commitment is the most powerful way to bring about change: As Gandhi said, 'We must be the change we want to see in the world.' "

Labor MP Stephen Byers predicted that Cameron's positions would "melt like snow on a summer day" after the initial excitement about his leadership wore off. "It's not terribly clear the values and principles that have led him to the positions where they are at the moment," Byers said. "It looks like short-term political expediency is driving him."

Michael Gove, a Tory MP, said Cameron was using his "modern, informal, accessible and relaxed" style to refocus the party's image. He said the Conservatives in recent years have tended to accentuate the "grim, tough, efficient, austere, no-nonsense" aspects of their economic policies, while underplaying party policies that are "inclusive, compassionate and socially concerned."

Another Tory MP, John Hayes, said Conservative positions have often been misinterpreted: "The problem is that people see us as self-interested and greedy and uninterested in their needs. People see David Cameron as a regular guy who puts their interests first."

Cameron has said that many of his proposals are designed to challenge Labor for the political middle ground. He has already abandoned party positions he helped draft before last May's general elections. During the campaign, the Tories ran ads on immigration that critics said bordered on xenophobic, but Cameron has now called for a more welcoming stance.

In a speech Wednesday, he scrapped another proposal he helped draft, a health care plan that would allow some people to opt out of the National Health Service. Now, calling that essentially a taxpayer-funded perk for the wealthy, Cameron is advocating a strengthening of the health service for all -- a position much closer to Labor's.

Britain's next general election will take place in 2010 at the latest, and perhaps sooner if Blair decides to step aside, as many political analysts have predicted.

A recent Ipsos Mori poll showed the Conservatives leading Labor 37 to 35 percent when voters were asked which party they would support if the general election were held immediately. But on an individual basis, the poll showed Cameron trailing Chancellor Gordon Brown, Labor's most likely candidate for prime minister, by four points, 31 to 27 percent.

Cameron's blitz of activity over the holidays finally seemed to get to Blair. Even before he returned from the beach, his office posted a "day in the life" video on its official Web site. The folksy, 3 1/2 -minute clip shows Blair kicking a soccer ball with schoolchildren, mugging with foreign heads of state, visiting a hospital. Blair narrates from his desk and discusses the rigors of the job.

While he has said little about Cameron directly, he appears to be taking at least a gentle shot at him when he says: "Being leader of the opposition does not prepare you quite adequately for the difficulty of doing the prime minister's job."

Denmark Is Unlikely Front In Islam-West Culture War (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0008629

By Dan Bilefsky

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

COPENHAGEN - When the Danish newspaper Jyllands-Posten published 12 cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad, including one in which he is shown wearing a turban shaped as a bomb with a burning fuse, it expected a strong reaction in this country of 5.4 million people.

But the paper was unprepared for the global furor that ensued, including demonstrations in the Indian-controlled part of Kashmir, death threats against the artists, condemnation from 11 Muslim countries and a rebuke from the United Nations.

"The cartoons did nothing that transcends the cultural norms of secular Denmark, and this was not a provocation to insult Muslims," said Flemming Rose, cultural editor of Jyllands-Posten, Denmark's largest newspaper, which has declined to apologize for the drawings.

"But if we talk of freedom of speech, even if it was a provocation, that does not make our right to do it any less legitimate before the law," he added in an interview from Miami. He spent months living under police protection in Denmark.

As countries across Europe grapple with how to assimilate their growing Muslim populations in the post-9/11 world, Denmark has become an unlikely flashpoint in the escalating culture wars between Islam and the West. The publication of the cartoons in late September has provoked a fierce national debate over whether Denmark's famously liberal laws on free speech have gone too far.

It also has tested the patience of Denmark's 200,000 Muslims. Many of them say the cartoons reflect an intensifying anti-immigrant climate that is stigmatizing minorities and radicalizing young Muslims.

In Norrebro, an ethnically mixed neighborhood of Copenhagen where the philosopher Soren Kierkegaard is buried and where kebab stands dot the tree-lined streets, Imam Ahmed Abu-Laban, a leader among Denmark's Muslims, bristles at what he calls the "Islam phobia" gripping the country. He asserted that the cartoons had been calculated to incite Muslims because it was well known that in Islam depictions of the prophet were considered blasphemy.

"We are being mentally tortured," Imam Ahmed said at his mosque, an anonymous building that looks more like an apartment complex than a house of worship. "The cartoons are an insult against Islam, an attempt by right-wing forces in this country to get a rise out of the Muslim community and so portray us as against Danish values."

Mr. Rose, once a journalist in Iran, said he decided to commission the cartoons for Jyllands-Posten when he heard that Danish cartoonists were too scared of Muslim fundamentalists to illustrate a new children's biography of Muhammad.

Annoyed at the self-censorship he said had overtaken Europe since the Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh was murdered last year by a Muslim radical for criticizing Islam's treatment of women, Mr. Rose said he decided to test Denmark's free speech norms.

The cartoons were published amid the growth of an anti-immigrant sentiment in Denmark, reflected in the rise of the far-right Danish People's Party. The party, which holds 13 percent of the seats in the Danish Parliament, has helped to push through the toughest anti-immigration rules on the Continent, including a rule preventing Danish citizens age 24 or younger from bringing in spouses from outside Denmark.

Soren Krarup, a retired priest and leading voice in the party, said the Muslim response to the cartoons showed that Islam was not compatible with Danish customs. He said Jesus had been satirized in Danish literature and popular culture for centuries - including a recent much-publicized Danish painting of Jesus with an erection - so why not Muhammad? He also argues that Muslims must learn to integrate.

"Muslims who come here reject our culture," he said. "Muslim immigration is a way for Muslims to conquer us, just as they have done for the past 1,400 years."

Muslim leaders say that such talk helped create the atmosphere that allowed the cartoons to be published. And they contend that it is alienating the people the Danish People's Party says it wants to assimilate.

In a sign that some Muslims are becoming radicalized, Danish counterterrorism officials say more young Danish Muslims are being drawn to Hizb ut-Tahrir, or the Party of Liberation, which seeks the unification of all Muslim countries under one leader and Shariah, the Islamic legal code. The group, which distributes literature at mosques and on the Internet, is banned in most of the Muslim world, as well as in Russia and Germany.

DOJ_NMG_0008630

But because its main weapon is ideology rather than explosives, Danish officials say, it is allowed to operate in Denmark under the same permissive rules that allowed the publication of the cartoons. Under Danish law, inciting someone to commit an act of terror is illegal, but spouting vitriol against the West or satirizing Muhammad is not. The State Prosecutor's Office investigated the group in spring 2004 and decided not to ban it because it had not broken the law.

The free speech debate and the concerns over Hizb ut-Tahrir swept through Denmark's public schools last month when the imam's 17-year-old son, Taim, was expelled from Vester Borgerdyd School, after teachers overheard him giving sermons calling for the destruction of Israel and assailing Danish democracy during Friday Prayer at the school. The imam said his son became radicalized after being recruited by Hizb ut-Tahrir.

He said he opposed his son's sermons and had told his son to leave the house for defying him. But he also criticized the ruling that followed: a committee of mostly Christian rectors banned Friday Prayer at public schools across Denmark.

"They are trying to turn Denmark into a banana republic," said Imam Ahmed. "How is it O.K. to publish the cartoons, yet my son is portrayed as an ayatollah?"

At Vester Borgerdyd School, where the walls are lined with photographs of smiling students in Muslim dress, the headmistress, Anne Birgitte Rasmussen, said that Taim Abu-Laban had attracted a following and that she had feared his sermons would raise tensions among the school's more moderate Muslims.

"The tone of the political debate in this country, the talk about Muslims and immigrants, is making it very difficult for us," she said.

Mr. Rose, the editor, said free speech, no matter how radical, should be allowed to flourish, from all varieties of perspectives.

"Muslims should be allowed to burn the Danish flag in a public square if that's within the boundaries of the law," he said. "Though I think this would be a strange signal to the Danish people who have hosted them."

The French Disconnection (NYT)

By Corinne Maier

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

Paris

WHAT'S going on over there?" my foreign friends have been asking me, concerned about the news coming from France. A justified worry: our impoverished suburbs, or banlieues, were the scene, starting on Oct. 27 and stretching into November, of an urban agitation that turned to a riot. There were thousands of burned cars, public buildings looted, confrontations with the police, a state of emergency that ended only on Wednesday. Paris and then the provinces were affected; we hadn't seen anything like these disturbances since the famous uprising of May 1968. What has happened to the picture-postcard Paris that was the setting for "Amélie"?

The experience has put all of France into a funk, even with the lifting of the state of emergency after New Year's passed relatively peacefully (cars were set afire, but not substantially more than in previous years). In truth, though, people, who - like me - live in the center of Paris, didn't really see that much; they watched the spectacle of the disorder on television. They discovered places they ordinarily wouldn't even be able to find on a map: ghettoes where France has relegated immigrants and their descendants, gloomy blocks that resemble bombed-out sections of Chechnya. They learned that high unemployment (close to 40 percent in some places), racism, drugs, disastrous urban policy and police brutality were making everything worse.

But no one has been truly astonished by the violence. "It was bound to happen," as my local bookseller, who lives in the suburbs, says. What surprised - and relieved - Parisians was that Paris proper was mostly spared: the Eiffel Tower is still there, the Arc de Triomphe hasn't budged, thank goodness.

The reality is that Paris and its "difficult" banlieues are two worlds that are completely foreign to each other. They don't even speak the same language: polished, accent-free French on one side, the verlan, or "reversed" speech, of the housing projects on the other. The suburbs are on fire? So? The Left Bank intellectuals didn't have much to do with these rioters without demands and without leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0008631

Away from the banlieues, everything stayed calm, in contrast with the image of France portrayed in the foreign news media. "Paris Is Burning!" was a common headline; a major German newspaper predicted that the intifada was imminent. The Americans and the British covered the violence with as much avidity as some of them had denounced the French decision not to fight in Iraq; was France, they asked with glee, going to be forced to wage its own battle with Islam? We French expected a little more empathy considering the 1992 Los Angeles riots, when the authorities responded in force, and the city experienced curfews, 8,000 arrests, and scores of deaths.

In France, the death toll was almost nonexistent, perhaps because, as the saying goes, "Here, everything ends with songs" - that is, it all works out in the end. Still, an arsenal of repression was put in place. It has a rather unpleasant name, the state of emergency, established by a 1955 law that sought to restore order in French-controlled Algeria, racked by violence in the years before it won independence.

This legal parenthesis brought searches without warrants, curfews, restrictions on comings and goings. All in all, though, the authorities were prudent in the use of these extraordinary powers, even in the banlieues; to say that France suffered under the yoke of oppression during the state of emergency would be an exaggeration, and the French, fatalists for the most part, protested little.

Nonetheless, those few weeks of violence left us bitter. The riots were undoubtedly a reflection of French failure. Failure of the politicians, yes: Jacques Chirac, president since 1995, has been unable to reform society. But also failure of the "French model," which asserts that all inequalities, all differences, can be resolved in that shopworn religion called the Republic. Today all France, even the middle classes, suffers from a feeling that things won't get better, from an inability to make plans for the future. It's the big topic at dinner parties.

Fortunately, in Paris there is always something to do when one is feeling blue. Everyone in town has been talking about an exhibition at the Grand Palais consecrated to ... melancholy. Whether called melancholy, or ennui, depression or "spleen," this sensation was wonderfully defined by Victor Hugo as "the enjoyment of being sad." Welcome to Paris, city of melancholy. You have until Jan. 16 to visit the exhibition. Otherwise, you'll have to go to, well, the suburbs.

Bird Flu Appeal To Turks (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

DOGUBAYAZIT, Turkey, Jan. 7 (Reuters) - Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan urged Turks on Friday not to hide poultry to avoid bird flu culls, and promised that the government would spend what was necessary to fight the spread of the disease and to compensate farmers for slaughtered stocks.

"We should not panic," CNN-Turk reported him as saying. "Our people should not be making efforts to hide chickens, turkeys or geese."

The European Commission said it had confirmed that the bird flu in Turkey was the deadly H5N1 strain. A World Health Organization team is headed for eastern Turkey, where three people have died and 26 are under observation, an unusual cluster of cases that raises the possibility that the virus has become more contagious for humans.

Aid Suspended To Two Pakistan Quake Areas (AP-Y2)

By Burt Herman

AP, January 8, 2006

The United Nations said Saturday it has suspended aid missions to two parts of Pakistan's quake-hit Kashmir region where dozens of survivors stormed two U.N. helicopters and forced an airlift out of the devastated area.

The U.N. said it canceled planned flights into Bana Mula and Leepa, both more than 60 miles southwest of Muzaffarabad. It was investigating the incident and evaluating the possibility of relocating villagers to lower-lying areas.

On Friday, more than 50 survivors forced the pilots of two U.N. helicopters to take them to Muzaffarabad and Abbottabad, a hub for relief activities. One air safety officer was assaulted, the U.N. said, without elaborating.

Pakistan, meanwhile, said it had prepared several contingency relief camps stocked with food to cope with any wave of refugees heading to lower ground during the harsh Himalayan winter.

DOJ_NMG_0008632

Days of heavy storms have dumped up to 9 feet of snow in some areas of Kashmir and northwestern Pakistan, forcing the suspension of helicopter flights and aid deliveries. The Pakistan Meteorological Department warned of more snowfall over the next 72 hours.

"It's a bitter winter," said Maj. Gen. Khalid Nawaz Khan, the commander of the Pakistan military in Kashmir. "Things are being taken care of. We are prepared for any contingency."

Officials and aid agencies have warned the weather could cause a second wave of deaths or force more evacuations from higher up in the Himalayas.

The Oct. 8 quake killed some 87,000 people and left 3.5 million homeless, mostly in Kashmir and Pakistan's northwestern region. Control over Kashmir is divided between India and Pakistan, both of which claim it in its entirety.

Helicopters are vital for the mammoth relief effort, particularly since this week's heavy snows blocked roads, hampering aid delivery for several days. All roads into the Kaghan and Siran Valleys in Pakistan's Northwestern Frontier Province are blocked, the U.N. said late Friday.

"We're going to hit more bad weather, no question," said Keith Ursel, the World Food Program quake operations manager. "We have to send specialist teams to clear up the snow before we can land our choppers too."

The World Food Program is feeding 400,000 survivors.

Kashmir Quake Survivors Bemoan Lack Of Aid (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

CHIKAR, Kashmir, Jan. 5 (AP) - The terraced paths through this mountain town are slick with ice. Tents crammed with families have collapsed under the snow. A truck mired in a muddy landslide recently blocked the main road into town. And winter has just barely begun.

Camped on a steep hillside, the five members of the Butt family are surviving after the loss of their patriarch. Their shelter is a tarp propped up by branches, and they spend nights shivering under a single blanket each.

Three months after an earthquake killed more than 80,000 people and left 3.5 million homeless in the region, families across Pakistani-controlled Kashmir are coping with winter's first brush in the Himalayas. Health officials say illnesses are on the rise, but insist the situation has not yet become alarming.

For now, the weather has improved. The sun shone brilliantly Thursday in Chikar, a town of 6,000 people where residents say about 700 people died in the quake on Oct. 8. Water from melting snow dripped flowed down paths through the town, which is draped across several hillsides at an about 5,100 feet.

There were signs of normalcy. The market set up near the rubble of buildings that slid off a hilltop when the quake hit was bustling with spices and baked goods. And preparations were under way for a wedding, one of about 30 that locals say have taken place since the quake.

Getting into the town was complicated by a truck stuck in mud from a landslide caused by recent rain and snow. Residents placed dry straw under its back wheels to get traction, while others pulled on a rope from the front - all to no avail. The truck was finally towed out by several vans.

Residents said they had lost electricity for four days since the bad weather struck, and many tents collapsed under the snow, including one belonging to the family of Muhammad Younas, 15, who was staying with four relatives on Sunday night when their tarp tumbled down. No one was injured and they found shelter with other relatives.

Next to their collapsed tent stood a bare wooden frame intended to be a weatherproof home, but it stood in the snow without metal siding. Similar uncompleted shelters could be seen across the town, and residents complained freely about what they said was a lack of aid.

Azher Bukhari, 35, a shopkeeper whose home and business were destroyed, was walking the snowy paths wearing sandals. He said it was a form of protest against the Pakistani Army's failure to provide aid. "The government isn't paying attention to this area," Mr. Bukhari said.

DOJ_NMG_0008633

The military has given out more than 50,000 shelters in Kashmir areas that lie above 5,000 feet, said Maj. Farooq Nasir, an army spokesman in Muzaffarabad. Families where the men have died will also get help assembling the temporary structures, he said.

But families in which men survived are required to build their own shelters with materials provided.

Among those yet to receive shelter are the Butt family - a mother, three daughters and a son. They were camped near their former home, which collapsed on the family's patriarch, 50, killing him.

The family huddled inside a dark makeshift shelter provided by former neighbors. The mother, Mehrfazoon, 45, said she had spent a day at the nearby military camp, waiting for supplies. "We were given nothing," said a daughter, Nayab, 13. "We are living from hand to mouth."

U.N. Cuts Quake Aid Missions

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Jan. 7 (AP) - The United Nations said Saturday that it had halted quake aid missions to two parts of Pakistani-controlled Kashmir, where more than 50 survivors had stormed two helicopters, forcing an airlift out of the area. The United Nations said it was evaluating the possibility of relocating villagers to lower-lying areas.

India Digitizes Age-Old Wisdom (WP)

By John Lancaster

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

NEW DELHI -- In a drafty government institute, Nighat Anjum reads from a dog-eared textbook on traditional Indian medicine and acquaints herself with the miracle fruit known as aamla, which is said to be useful in treating heart palpitations, immune disorders, bed-wetting and memory lapses.

Tapping on a computer keyboard, the 27-year-old physician enters its properties in a database that eventually will contain more than 100,000 such traditional remedies -- the collective wisdom of the ancient healing arts known as ayurveda , unani and siddha , the latter based on the teachings of the Hindu god Shiva.

Other entries include powdered nightingale droppings (a skin lightener and laxative), nightingale flesh (an aphrodisiac), ostrich fat (for aches and pains), ostrich blood (for inflammation), charred sea crab (constipation, ulcers, cataracts and dental stains), honey (for improving vision), tumeric (for treating wounds and rashes) and coconut milk (urinary tract infections).

Employing about 150 doctors and technicians, the four-year, $2 million effort is aimed at protecting India's traditional remedies from theft by multinational drug companies in a practice known here as bio-piracy. The database will also include hundreds of yoga poses so that foreigners cannot copyright them as their own.

Though Indian officials can point to just a handful of such intellectual-property cases involving traditional medicine, they say the threat is bound to grow as foreign drug companies seek to cut soaring research-and-development costs by finding new products among natural remedies that have been used in India, China and other developing countries for millennia.

More broadly, the compilation of the Traditional Knowledge Digital Library reflects a nationalistic pride in India's ancient scientific heritage as well as its citizens' continuing faith in herbal and other natural treatments that often are viewed with skepticism in the West.

Indian officials say the data-collection effort will promote the commercialization of traditional Indian remedies, help validate their scientific underpinnings and encourage collaboration between Indian and foreign pharmaceutical companies.

In doing so, they say, the project will spur the development of a uniquely Indian health-care industry that blends 21st-century technology with spirituality and the wisdom of ages in the same way that Brahmin traditions of Sanskrit and mathematics helped set the stage for India's information-technology boom.

"India's strength is civilization, and its culture and knowledge," said V.K. Gupta, the director of the National Institute of Science Communication and Information Resources in New Delhi, which is overseeing the project. "The moment we revisit that, the power of India is unimaginable."

In a telephone interview from Washington, Mark Grayson, a spokesman for Pharmaceutical Researchers and Manufacturers of America, the drug-industry lobbying group, described the Indian project as "a solution in search of a problem."

DOJ_NMG_0008634

He said "there is no evidence of bio-piracy," noting that most modern drugs are developed from chemicals with the aid of computers, rather than from natural substances.

At the same time, he said, the Indian effort could "inhibit drug development" by discouraging companies from developing new cures from plants whose medicinal uses India now claims as protected intellectual property. The drug industry is opposing India's efforts to amend World Trade Organization rules to protect such ancient remedies.

The most popular traditional medical system in India is ayurveda, which is rooted in Hinduism -- its original Sanskrit formulations were recorded 2,000 years ago on palm leaves -- and aims to restore the "balance" between body and spirit. Despite the growing influence of Western medicine, ayurveda remains the dominant form of treatment in many parts of rural India, where access to conventional care is often limited.

Even in such major cities as New Delhi, which boasts several world-class medical facilities, ayurveda is widely embraced. Pharmacies stock ayurvedic remedies alongside antibiotics and other conventional treatments. Bollywood stars hawk ayurvedic medicines from billboards. And a generation of middle-class children has grown up on morning spoonfuls of Chyvanprasam, a jam-like ayurvedic supplement.

"Ayurvedic medicine has no side effects," said Sheema Rajesh, a 31-year-old soldier's wife from southern India who was seeking treatment for jaundice the other day at an ayurvedic clinic in the capital. "It's made from natural things, and from the time we were small, we've been taking these medicines, so we believe in them."

A politician's charge last week that a line of ayurvedic cures peddled by one of India's most popular television gurus had been adulterated with human bone made the front pages of Indian newspapers -- and sparked an attack by the guru's followers on the politician's Communist Party office in New Delhi.

Besides ayurvedic medicine, the database also is recording remedies from unani, a system that was introduced to the subcontinent 4,000 years ago by the Greeks. Unani is based on the theory that sickness is caused by an imbalance in "the four humors" -- black bile, yellow bile, blood and phlegm -- that define human temperament, according to Anjum, the unani doctor who was entering the data on the aamla fruit.

The system relies heavily on herbs and is "very effective," she said.

Siddha, which was first practiced in southern India by followers of Lord Shiva, employs medicines made from herbs, animal parts, metals and minerals. "Even though it is coming from supernatural power, so much is scientifically proved," said Muthu Kumar, a Siddha expert who is working for the database project.

Gupta, the project director, said the need for the database became apparent in 1995, when two Indian-born scientists in Mississippi were granted a U.S. patent on the use of tumeric, a common spice, to heal wounds. The move sparked protests from the Indian government, which cited ancient Sanskrit texts describing the use of tumeric for the same purpose. The patent was revoked.

To create the database, Gupta's team since 2001 has been poring over ancient texts in Sanskrit, Urdu, Persian and Arabic in search of traditional formulas. Working in drab cubicles and enduring frequent power cuts, the specialists enter the formulas in alphanumeric code, which is then translated automatically into English, Japanese, French, German and Spanish.

Sometime this year, the complete library will be made available to foreign patent offices on a secure Web site. Indian officials hope the patent offices will use the database in evaluating whether to grant patents on natural remedies.

"This traditional knowledge has been validated in the laboratory of life," Gupta said, with the zeal of a true believer. "It has been nurtured and grown in India for 4,000 years."

China Takes Aim At Corruption (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

BEIJING, Jan. 7 -- In the face of rising discontent over corruption, China's senior Communist Party leaders called on members Saturday to work harder to stop bribery among businessmen and local officials in the country's thousands of cities, counties and villages.

DOJ_NMG_0008635

The appeal, in a communique issued after a two-day meeting of the party's Central Discipline Inspection Committee that was attended by President Hu Jintao, seemed to take particular aim at corrupt rural officials whose illegal dealings have helped generate a wave of riots and peasant unrest over the past two years. Much of the violence has stemmed from anger over land confiscations in which, farmers allege, village or county officials took money from business developers in return for favorable deals.

"More anti-corruption education will be carried out among grass-roots officials, while the procedures for selecting officials for promotion will be stricter," the official New China News Agency quoted the communique as saying.

As China moves from socialism toward a market economy, local party officials have adopted economic growth as their main goal, creating a de facto alliance with private businessmen. In the shared race for profits, opportunities for corruption have become numerous. As a result, the party officials called upon to fight the corruption are in most instances the very ones involved in it.

Hu warned his fellow Communist leaders that "the fight against corruption is a long-term, complicated and arduous task," the news agency reported.

The committee also singled out the spread of bribery in China's health system, a source of increasingly angry grumbling among people in the city and countryside alike. Doctors and hospitals have taken to demanding payoffs, above and beyond normal fees, before proceeding with medical care, Chinese complain. Among people who once enjoyed free medical coverage, this practice has produced particular outrage.

Li Xi, the Health Ministry's discipline inspection leader, said 1,248 people in the medical profession were punished during 2005 for malfeasance that involved payments totaling more than $1.3 million, the agency reported.

Appeals Court, Reversing Itself, Holds 2 Salvadoran Generals Liable In Torture Case (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

A federal appeals court has reversed its own ruling and upheld a $54.6 million jury verdict against two retired generals from El Salvador who were held responsible in a 2002 trial for the torture of three Salvadorans during the country's civil war in the 1980's.

The opinion, issued Wednesday by the United States Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit in Atlanta, was a surprising turn in decade-long efforts by American human rights groups to punish abuses that occurred during the conflict between the United States-backed security forces and leftist guerrillas in El Salvador.

A three-judge appeals panel acted without prompting from lawyers for either side to overturn a ruling it issued on Feb. 28. 2005, that nullified the trial verdict against the two generals, José Guillermo García and Carlos Eugenio Vides Casanova.

The new appeals opinion seems likely to be the decisive step in years of litigation against the generals. During the war, Mr. García and Mr. Vides Casanova served as defense minister, the highest post in the military, with strong support from the United States.

They have been living in South Florida since 1989. In a separate civil trial in Florida in 2000, they were acquitted of responsibility for the killings of four American churchwomen by soldiers in El Salvador in 1980.

The three plaintiffs in the second trial, held in West Palm Beach, suffered lasting injuries from torture by troops under the generals' command.

In its initial ruling, the appeals panel threw out the jury verdict, finding that the district court had improperly extended the 10-year statute of limitations that applied in the case. The claims were brought under the Torture Victim Protection Act, a controversial law that human rights groups have used to bring notoriously violent foreign leaders to face justice in American courts.

But on June 24, 2005, the appeals judges announced in a letter that they had made two factual errors in their opinion, incorrectly recording both the date when the case was first filed - actually May 11, 1999 - and the date when General Vides Casanova stepped down as defense minister - May 31, 1989.

DOJ_NMG_0008636

Using the correct dates and re-examining the trial record, the judges decided to agree with the district court that the case was filed within the statute of limitations. The panel concluded that the statute should begin to run in 1992, when the government and the rebels signed a peace accord that ended the war.

Before that, the judges wrote, "the very regime against whom the plaintiffs leveled their accusations remained intent on maintaining its power at any cost and acted with impunity to so do." The three judges were Gerald B. Tjoflat, Edward E. Carnes, and Anne C. Conway.

Kurt Klaus Jr., who represented both retired generals, said he was dumbfounded by the reversal. "I have never, ever heard of such a thing," he said. "I am so shocked, I feel like quitting my practice and moving to El Salvador to grow coca and coffee."

He said he would consult with the former generals to see if they wanted to pursue further appeals. He said both clients had been left essentially bankrupt by legal costs.

"In the war against communism, they did what the United States government wanted them to do and paid them to do," Mr. Klaus said.

Mr. Vides Casanova has placed about $270,000 in an escrow account awaiting the outcome of the appeals, said Moira Feeney, a spokeswoman for the Center for Justice and Accountability in San Francisco, which represented the defendants.

Neris González, a Salvadoran Roman Catholic church worker who testified at the trial that she endured 12 days of torture, said in a statement that the decision showed "that the Salvadoran military bears responsibility for what we, as a people, suffered."

Chief Of U.N. Troops In Haiti Is Found Dead In Hotel Room (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 7 - The commander of the United Nations peacekeeping force in Haiti was found shot to death in his hotel room early Saturday, casting more doubt on the beleaguered mission's capacity to restore order in crime-plagued Haiti as authorities struggle to organize presidential elections.

Initial reports indicated that the commander, Gen. Urano Teixeira Da Matta Bacellar, had committed suicide. He was found wearing shorts and a T-shirt, and his gun was in his hand, the authorities said. The body was found in the general's hotel room at the Hotel Montana in Port-au-Prince, the capital.

Chief Mario Andresol of the Haitian National Police said he could not confirm the death was a suicide until after an investigation. "The general died a violent death," he said. "At this time I can't go into more detail." An unidentified official at the United Nations mission in Haiti later confirmed that the general had died from a self-inflicted gunshot wound, The Associated Press reported.

The shooting came at the end of a week of intense public criticism of the Brazilian-led United Nations Mission in Haiti, commissioned nearly two years ago after an armed rebellion, months of violent political clashes and heavy pressure by the United States that forced President Jean-Bertrand Aristide from office. Since that time, critics of the mission have complained that the violence and political fighting have gotten worse.

Kidnappings peaked over the Christmas holiday to as many as 12 a day, authorities reported, including attacks against journalists and aid workers. Some 10 United Nations soldiers and police officers have died in the line of duty. Haitian business leaders have blamed the United Nations for failing to use the force necessary to stop the street gangs and drug-trafficking organizations responsible for much of the violence.

The security problems have had a devastating impact on Haiti's ability to overcome its latest political crisis. The first round of the presidential elections, already postponed three times and then set for Sunday, were put off again. United Nations authorities have cited persistent fighting within Haiti's electoral council for the delays.

Meanwhile, leaders of Haiti's interim government, which was installed by the United States, have blamed the postponements on failures by international agencies to meet deadlines to distribute voter identification cards and to establish polling places.

Preparations for the elections have already cost an estimated $60 million, most of it from the European Union, Canada and the United States. The authorities estimate they will need at least $14 million more.

DOJ_NMG_0008637

On Friday, the United Nations Security Council urged Haiti to set Feb. 7 as the date for the first round of elections. It was unclear Saturday whether the general's death would force the United Nations to withdraw that demand.

David Wimhurst, a United Nations spokesman in Haiti, refused to answer questions by telephone on Saturday. A statement by the agency praised General Bacellar's 39 years of service to the Brazilian Armed Forces and to the United Nations mission in Haiti, known in official shorthand as Minustah.

"His untimely death and sacrifice in the cause of peace," the statement read, "will not weaken the resolve of Minustah and the international community to ensure the will of the Haitian people prevails and Haiti joins the democratic community of nations."

UN Commander In Haiti Dies In Apparent Suicide (REU-Y2)

By Joseph Guyler Delva

Reuters, January 8, 2006

The commander of the United Nations' peacekeeping force in Haiti was found dead in his hotel room on Saturday after apparently shooting himself in the head, U.N. officials said.

Brazilian Lt. Gen. Urano Teixeira Da Matta Bacellar's death comes as the troubled Caribbean country struggles to organize its first presidential election since a monthlong armed revolt ousted then-president Jean-Bertrand Aristide in February 2004.

The general, 58, who had been in command of the 9,000-strong U.N. force in Haiti since the end of August, appeared to have been alone in his suite at the Montana hotel in the capital Port-au-Prince at the time of the shooting.

His gun was found near his body, which was dressed in shorts and a white T-shirt, witnesses said.

"It is unfortunate and devastating to see such a good and honorable general killed in such circumstances," Brazil's ambassador to Haiti, Paulo Cordeiro de Andrade Pinto, told Reuters as he left the hotel.

The Brazilian army initially referred to the incident as a "firearm accident." The army later released a statement saying the armed forces "profoundly lamented" the death of the general, who was a career military officer, and that it would cooperate with the police investigation.

The general's sister, Bartira Bacellar, told TV Band in his home state of Rio Grande do Sul that the family was devastated. "We always accompanied his career, for which he had lots of enthusiasm," she said.

Brazil was expected to send an air force aircraft to pick up his body on Sunday.

A spokesman for U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Annan was "shocked and saddened" and that an investigation was under way.

PERSISTENT VIOLENCE

The U.N. mission, known by its acronym MINUSTAH, was sent to Haiti to keep the peace between supporters and foes of Aristide after the 2004 revolt.

But the country of 8.5 million people has continued to be afflicted by political violence and a wave of kidnappings has swept through Port-au-Prince despite the presence of the Brazilian-led U.N. troops and police.

The business sector, which vigorously opposed Aristide, and the interim government have called on the U.N. force to be more aggressive in taking on street gangs that control many of the sprawling slums in Port-au-Prince. Many of the gangs are seen as supporters of the exiled Aristide.

In contrast, civil and leftist groups in Brazil have criticized the U.N. force for being too aggressive in patrolling the slums. Dozens of civilians have been caught in the cross-fire during gunfights between U.N. troops and gangs.

U.N. mission head Juan Gabriel Valdes announced on Friday that U.N. troops would occupy the Cite Soleil slum, the capital's most dangerous ghetto, and warned that civilians could be harmed.

"We are going to intervene in the coming days. I think there'll be collateral damage but we have to impose our force, there is no other way," Valdes told a local radio station. His comments on collateral damage alarmed civic groups in Haiti.

Bacellar had opposed Valdes' plan for Cite Soleil, some U.N. officials said.

The presidential election was originally scheduled for November but has been put off repeatedly and now is expected to take place in February.

DOJ_NMG_0008638

Haiti's interim authorities have blamed the U.N. mission and the Organization of American States for the delays, a charge both organizations refute.

(Additional reporting by Terry Wade in Sao Paulo)

U.N. Chief In Haiti Found Dead (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

MIAMI — The commander of the U.N. peacekeeping force in Haiti was found dead at an upscale hotel in the country's capital early Saturday with an apparently self-inflicted gunshot wound to the head, officials in Port-au-Prince said.

The death of Lt. Gen. Urano Teixeira Da Matta Bacellar, a Brazilian, seemed likely to further complicate the world body's long-thwarted efforts to bring stability to violence-racked Haiti and to organize elections.

Haiti has been without an elected leader since President Jean-Bertrand Aristide fled an armed rebellion in February 2004. Presidential and parliamentary elections were to have been held in November but have been repeatedly delayed by the U.S.-backed interim leadership.

Bacellar, 58, was found in his suite at the Hotel Montana with a gunshot wound to the head and his service revolver nearby, according to Radio Metropole and other news agencies at the scene. Reuters quoted unidentified diplomats, Haitian police and U.N. sources as saying the general was alone at the time of the shooting and that they believed it was a suicide.

In a dispatch from Sao Paulo, the Brazilian army initially said the general's death was the result of a "firearms accident." In a later statement, the army said Brazilians "profoundly lamented" Bacellar's death and that army investigators would travel to Haiti today to conduct their own review of the shooting.

Chilean Gen. Eduardo Aldunate was put in charge of the military mission until Brazil replaces the commander of its 1,200 troops in Haiti, the largest contingent of the 7,265-strong U.N. military deployment.

The contemplative soldier with snow-white hair and black eyebrows inherited command Aug. 31 and had witnessed a recent deterioration of security in the capital's teeming, gang-controlled slums.

An official of Haiti's Provisional Electoral Council, Rosemond Pradel, last week blamed the U.N. mission for the latest postponement of elections, citing its failure to halt escalating slum violence and a rash of kidnappings. Pradel confirmed that the vote scheduled for today was being called off but said no new election date could be set because of persistent security and organizational problems.

Alarmed by the delays, the U.N. Security Council and the Organization of American States convened special sessions Friday during which they instructed Haitian officials to cease infighting and to hold elections no later than Feb. 7.

The OAS said in a statement that it saw "no valid technical reasons to continue postponing the elections" and that security issues "in no way justify further delay."

A U.S. diplomat in Port-au-Prince said the State Department considered the Feb. 7 deadline feasible and did not believe Bacellar's death would affect the electoral calendar.

"In my view, the technical answers to elections are all fairly clear and should pose no impediment. Neither should the unfortunate demise of Gen. Bacellar," said Elizabeth Spehar, the OAS elections coordinator in Port-au-Prince.

But Haitians point to the daily gunfights in gang-controlled neighborhoods such as Cite Soleil and Bel Air and abductions for ransom as dangers preventing the set-up of polling places in the most populous areas. Almost half of the 3.4 million who registered to vote still haven't received their ID cards or been told where they will cast their ballots.

Expressing the international community's mounting impatience, U.N. mission chief Juan Gabriel Valdes warned Friday that the troops under Bacellar's command and some of the 1,700-plus U.N. police in Haiti would occupy Cite Soleil to break up the crime and kidnapping rings.

Bacellar, as well as his Brazilian predecessor in the mission's command, had been on record as opposing any use of U.N. force that could endanger bystanders. In an October interview with The Times, Bacellar said his troops stayed out of certain areas of the capital "to avoid collateral damage."

DOJ_NMG_0008639

A serious and outwardly serene career soldier, Bacellar described his mission in strictly military terms, discussing deployments, patrolling and readiness while professing little knowledge of the United Nations' longer-term political objectives of seating a legitimate government.

Spain Holds General After Remarks (NYT)

By Renwick McLean

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

MADRID, Jan. 7 - A Spanish Army general was put under house arrest on Saturday after he suggested that military intervention might be necessary to quell demands for greater autonomy from the northeastern region of Catalonia, the Defense Ministry said.

Recalling the dispute over Catalan autonomy that was a partial cause of the Spanish Civil War in the 1930's, Lt. Gen. José Mena Aguado, 63, said on Friday night that history appeared to be repeating itself as the nation debated Catalonia's recent requests for more self-government, and that the military was ready to act.

"It is our obligation to warn that there could be serious consequences for the armed forces as an institution and for its members if the Statute of Catalonia is approved in its proposed form," he said during a speech to members of the military in Seville.

"The Constitution establishes a series of impassable limits for any statute of autonomy," he said, referring to the type of law that describes the relationship between Spain's regional governments and Madrid. "But if those limits are exceeded, which thankfully is unthinkable at this time, it would be necessary to apply Article 8 of the Constitution."

Article 8 establishes that the armed forces are responsible for defending Spain's "territorial integrity" and "the constitutional order."

The proposed statute, which was approved overwhelmingly by the Catalan regional Parliament in September, says that Catalonia is a nation unto itself whose powers of self-government are not restricted by the Spanish Constitution.

Critics of the proposal, who include both liberal and conservative politicians, say it could set the stage for an eventual declaration of independence if it were passed in its current form.

Although democracy has taken root in Spain since the death of Gen. Francisco Franco in 1975, the military's history of intervening to settle political disputes continues to cast a shadow over Spanish politics. Today, many Spaniards remain wary of a strong military, and refuse to support significant increases in military spending.

Most political parties immediately condemned General Mena's comments, although a spokesman for the conservative Popular Party, the main opposition group in Parliament, said that statements like his were inevitable because Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero had failed to vigorously oppose the Catalan proposal.

In comments to the Spanish news agency Europa Press, the spokesman, Gabriel Elorriaga, said that Mr. Zapatero had stood idle while the Catalan proposal created a "serious constitutional crisis."

Mr. Zapatero has said that the proposal is unconstitutional and must be modified before he will support it.

Catalonia, a region of about seven million people in Spain's northeastern corner, has been home to a potent separatist movement for more than 100 years.

The region is one of Spain's economic engines, and supporters of more autonomy say that it provides Spain with much more than it gets in return, particularly in taxes that go to support poorer regions, like Andalucia and Extremadura.

In announcing the detention of General Mena on Saturday, the Defense Ministry said it would propose to Mr. Zapatero that the general, who is scheduled to retire in March, be relieved of his command.

During his speech on Friday, Mr. Mena, who was scheduled to retire in March, suggested that others in the military shared his views.

"I have an obligation to know the feelings, concerns, and preoccupations of my subordinates," he said. "It is their express wish that I transmit them to the top authorities of the Army and to make them public."

Serbia Begins Prosecuting Some War Crimes Cases (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

DOJ_NMG_0008640

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

BELGRADE, Serbia - Slowly, Serbia is prosecuting some of the war crimes cases from the Kosovo fighting of 1999 and the 1992-95 conflict in Bosnia, even while it has failed to deliver major suspects to the tribunal in The Hague.

Seven cases have been brought to trial so far. In the past two years, five of them in a war crimes court that has been financed partly by the United States. Prosecutors say they have plans to bring dozens more cases to trial. They and others following the cases say the trials suggest that the country is beginning, at least tentatively, to acknowledge its recent history.

These trials have highlighted some of the most brutal acts reportedly carried out by Serbian forces during wars in Croatia, Bosnia and Kosovo.

The accusations include the massacre of 192 Croatian men taken from a hospital where they were seeking refuge in the town of Vukovar in 1991 and the killing of an extended Albanian family in Kosovo in 1999, when 45 people, including 14 children, a pregnant woman and a 90-year-old woman, were attacked with grenades and then shot.

"It points to the readiness of the state and judiciary to face the past," said Dragoljub Stankovic, one of five deputy prosecutors assigned to Serbia's war crimes department.

Despite such claims and praise from some of the victims' families and human rights groups, there have been notable omissions.

While The Hague tribunal has indicted senior Serbian police and army officers for crimes committed during the 1999 Kosovo conflict, the Serbian courts have focused on midranking officers, human rights groups and diplomats here say. As a result, they say a large number of senior officers have not been challenged about their role in the war.

Also, one prominent case, involving the killing of three American brothers in 1999, appears to be stuck.

"In my opinion, many commanders of police stations were involved in or ordered killings in Kosovo," said Natasa Kandic, a lawyer and the director of the Humanitarian Law Center, a human rights group based in Belgrade.

Some senior police and army officers accused by human rights groups of ordering the crimes, or failing to prevent them, have remained at their posts.

The officers include Goran Radosavljevic, who was the commander of Serbia's special units during the Kosovo fighting and was recently the commander of the Serbian gendarmerie. In addition, the senior police officer in charge of war crimes investigations, Vozdan Gagic, was a member of the joint police and army command during the Kosovo campaign, a position in which he would have known about war crimes taking place, Ms. Kandic said.

"It was impossible for him not to know," she said.

Both Mr. Radosavljevic and Mr. Gagic have denied any involvement in war crimes.

"The army and the police are powerful, and barely reformed, institutions," said Bogdan Ivanisevic, the Human Rights Watch representative in Belgrade. "Addressing the responsibility of the senior officers would be quite a bite for the prosecutors, something they could do only if they felt supported by the government."

The case of the Americans involves the Bytyqi brothers, ethnic Albanians from Long Island who had been among 400 or so Albanian-Americans who had gone to join the fighting in Kosovo in 1999. Their bodies were found in a mass grave near a police training camp in 2001. Their hands were bound behind their backs and they had bullet wounds in the back of the head.

Prosecutors believe they know most of the details about the days leading up to their killing. They say the brothers were held by the Serbian police after they strayed across Kosovo's boundary on June 26, 1999, just weeks after the end of the Kosovo conflict. The three, Ylli, Agron and Mehmet Bytyqi, were in their 20's. They were ordered jailed for 15 days.

While they were serving their sentences, two members of a special police unit came to move them from jail to their training camp, according to testimony given to prosecutors by Sreten Popovic, then deputy commander of the camp. Mr. Popovic said he acted after hearing from Serbia's assistant minister for internal affairs, Gen. Vlastimir Djordjevic.

Mr. Popovic, who is currently the commander of the gendarmerie in Nis, Serbia's third-largest city, has so far escaped prosecution. The investigation into the brothers' deaths shows little sign of reaching trial soon.

Officials at the United States Embassy in Belgrade said they believed that the brothers had been killed because they were American and members of the Kosovo Liberation Army. They say prosecutors have sufficient evidence to bring the case to trial.

DOJ_NMG_0008641

R. Nicholas Burns, the State Department's under secretary for political affairs, said in a recent interview that the outcome of the investigation into the Bytyqi brothers' deaths would influence the United States government's view as to Serbia's willingness to handle domestic war crimes cases.

"The authorities already have collected substantial evidence relating to the illegal detention and/or killings," he said. "It is time to bring the perpetrators to justice."

Bosnian Was Killed After Firing Shots, Peacekeepers Say (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

LJUBLJANA, Slovenia, Jan. 7 - A woman killed by peacekeeping troops in Bosnia on Thursday was shot after she and her 11-year-son fired on soldiers seeking the arrest of her husband, a Bosnian Serb war crimes suspect, a military official in the Bosnian capital, Sarajevo, said Friday.

The woman, Rada Abazovic, was declared dead shortly after she was taken to a hospital in Rogatica in southeastern Bosnia on Thursday, several hours after the gun battle outside the Abazovic family home in nearby Bjelogorci, in which her son, Dragoljub, was wounded.

Her husband, Dragomir Abazovic, who stands accused by a Bosnian court of committing war crimes during the 1992-95 Bosnian conflict, had tried to flee but was cornered by troops and shot himself in the head, the official said. Hospital officials said he was in serious condition.

The shooting of Mrs. Abazovic and her son was widely criticized by Serbian politicians in Bosnia and Serbia, including the Serbian member of Bosnia's tripartite presidency, Dragan Cavic, who accused the European Union-led peacekeeping force of using indiscriminate force resulting in the death and injury of innocent victims.

The nationality of the troops involved has not been disclosed. Italian carabinieri, military police officers who are part of the United Nations peacekeeping force, were photographed later at the scene of the shooting.

But on Friday, a spokesman for the European Union-led mission, which took over from NATO troops at the end of 2004, said Mrs. Abazovic had opened fire on the commander of the unit seeking her husband's arrest as he tried to escape.

"She fired short bursts from an automatic weapon, a Kalashnikov AK-47," said the spokesman, Lt. Cmdr. Jem Thomas, in a telephone interview, giving an account based on a debriefing of the unit's commander, whom he did not name. "Soon after, she was joined by a boy."

"When she was about to run out, she gave the weapon to her son, who continued shooting while she looked for more ammunition."

He said troops were then ordered to shoot both Mrs. Abazovic and her son. "She was immobilized," he said, "with one shot." The boy, he said, was also "shot and immobilized."

Mrs. Abazovic was estimated to have used four magazines of ammunition, Commander Thomas said.

A Bosnian Serb police spokesman would not comment on that account, or say whether the autopsy on Mrs. Abazovic had provided evidence that she had fired a gun. "I am unable to talk about it," said the spokesman, Radovan Pejic. "All the evidence has been given to the prosecutor."

In Kenya, 'Why Does This Keep Happening?' (WP)

By Emily Wax

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

NAIROBI, Jan. 7 -- On New Year's Day, groups of angry Masai herders attempted to drive their emaciated cattle onto the manicured lawns of the presidential residence so their animals could graze on the thick carpets of green grass in the morning sun.

With a drought turning their fields and pastures into dusty gray wastelands, and with millions of people in the region facing a food shortage, the herders wanted to make a point, organizers of the action said.

"Africa is not so poor that it doesn't have enough food or grazing land to feed itself. There's plenty of food here," said Ben Ole Koissaba, a leader of the Masai, one of the largest and most powerful tribes in Kenya. "Many countries around the world face drought, but people don't starve. We think it's ludicrous for the government to treat its citizens this way. Why does this keep happening?"

DOJ_NMG_0008642

Many are asking that question as yet another drought threatens lives and destroys crops and livestock here. About 11 million people in Kenya, Ethiopia, Djibouti and Somalia are "on the brink of starvation," the United Nations said this week. In northeastern Kenya, at least 40 people, most of them children, have died from malnutrition and related illnesses since December, according to the Kenya Red Cross.

Enough food is grown in Kenya to feed all of its population of 33 million, but many citizens, especially the country's poor subsistence farmers, cannot afford it. When the rains ceased last year, the farmers were left with parched crops, hungry livestock and nothing to eat.

"The month of December 2005 will be remembered for a long time to come by Kenyans as a time when people were starving to death while others were feasting," said Gullet Abbas, secretary general of the Kenya Red Cross Society.

Feeding centers for children younger than 5 are filling up in northern Kenya, Abbas said. Cattle, goats and camels are growing thin. On Thursday, 3,000 herdsmen moved their 20,000 head of cattle across the border into Uganda to look for green pastures, according to reports on national television. Governments have warned that power shortages are possible because of lower water levels at Kenyan and Tanzanian dams, which the countries depend on to generate electricity.

"The current drought is more severe at most locations than the droughts of 1984, 1999 and 2000," Joseph Mukabana, director of the Kenya Meteorological Department, said in a full-page paid commentary in the Daily Nation, Kenya's largest newspaper. "Food relief efforts may need to go beyond December 2006 in some parts of the country."

Late Friday, President Mwai Kibaki ordered the government to purchase "all available" corn in the country in an emergency operation to stave off more deaths. The cabinet has "termed as the country's current number one priority the provision of food for Kenyans," Kibaki's office said in a statement.

The Kenya Red Cross Society and the Famine Early Warning Systems Network, a monitoring group, have criticized the government for failing to do more to prepare for the drought, saying that officials knew more than a year ago that such conditions would develop.

Some experts predict that the cycles of drought and food shortages will continue on the world's poorest continent until governments here develop more permanent, sustainable solutions.

"During these emergencies, we don't talk enough about development and what really needs to happen here," said Nancy Mutunga, the country director for the Famine Early Warning group. "Shouldn't we be building more water irrigation systems and developing more long-term solutions so this doesn't keep happening every few years?"

"If we don't talk about underdevelopment, we may just carry on with these cycles affecting herding and farming households every few years," she said. "These families are poor and live on the edge. Their wealth is dependent only on their livestock and crops. They have to diversify that."

Kibaki has asked the international community for more food aid. The U.S. Embassy, which contributed 62,890 metric tons of relief food last year, said it was eager to help again.

Too much food aid, however, can cause the price of locally grown food to fall, leaving farmers without enough income to purchase seeds for the next season, experts say.

"Making food available for the farmers, though welcome, is short-term and short-lived," said Tom Kagwe, who writes about famines and development in Africa for the Daily Nation. "It cannot provide the long-term solutions to the country's food shortage."

There are many reasons for food shortages in Africa. Sometimes war plays a role. In rebel-controlled eastern Congo, for instance, thousands of banana and mango trees produce more fruit than local people can consume. But the excess food never makes it to markets or drought-stricken regions because the roads are destroyed and armed militiamen loot the supplies or tax them heavily.

In northern Uganda, people displaced by fighting between the government and the Lord's Resistance Army, a rebel group, languish in camps, looking out at the land they used to farm. Fields that once produced abundant amounts of yams, peanuts and corn are barren.

DOJ_NMG_0008643

In Kenya, a peaceful and stable country, development has been hindered by corruption and mismanagement, according to Transparency International, a watchdog group that ranks Kenya as one of the most corrupt countries in the world.

Ole Koissaba, the Masai leader, said he was furious that the president turned the herders away from his residence. Even former president Daniel arap Moi, an authoritarian leader who ruled for 24 years, allowed the Masai to graze their cattle near the state house during a drought of 2002, Ole Koissaba pointed out.

"The new leadership cares more about politics than pastoralists, and now it can't do the correct things to save the lives, long term, of its own citizens," he said, adding there should be more international pressure on African governments to develop sound agricultural policies. "No African wants things to stay in this cycle of dysfunction."

A Paradise Drowning (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

MALE, Maldives

When President Bush visits India next month, he should add a whistle-stop at this gorgeous chain of tropical islands southwest of India, for they are a window into the future if we continue to spew carbon into the environment.

These palm-lined islands, where colored fish and small sharks play in the coral reefs, are a paradise. But old-timers point to myriad changes wrought by the rising seas, and the government is already moving some inhabitants from the lowest atolls to those that are a bit more elevated.

Alas, the high point in this entire nation of 1,200 islands is only eight feet above sea level. So people here worry that eventually the entire nation may have to move, making the Maldives perhaps the first country in the world to be destroyed by global warming. (Tuvalu and Kiribati, both small Pacific island nations, are other contenders for the title of the first modern nation to be drowned.)

"There is a realistic threat that we could be the first environmental refugees in the world," said Mohamed H. Shareef, the chief government spokesman.

He notes that some scientific models have suggested that the seas may rise in this century by two or three feet, as polar ice caps melt and seawater warms and expands. He adds, "As 75 percent of the total land area of the Maldives is under three and a half feet, our islands would be submerged to such an extent that we would have to relocate."

The tsunami a year ago offered a glimpse of what may come: when the waters reached their peak, most of the Maldives disappeared under the Indian Ocean for a few minutes.

One reason for Mr. Bush to drop by is that the Maldives may be the most pro-American Muslim country in the world. Local tolerance and pragmatism are exemplified by the attitude toward liquor: don't drink it, but overcharge foreigners for it.

But the more important reason for Mr. Bush to come is not geopolitical but environmental. He should witness a paradise that is gravely threatened by irresponsible environmental policies in the U.S. - the world's leading source of greenhouse gases - and other major carbon emitters. As evidence mounts that climate change is real, is caused by humans and is accelerating because of feedback loops in nature, I find it astonishing that the U.S. still refuses to adopt serious measures to curb greenhouse gases.

Granted, there is considerable uncertainty about the scale of the damage we are inflicting on the earth. But that's no reason to play Russian roulette with our biosphere.

So we must encourage conservation and fuel efficiency, support alternative forms of energy like wind, solar and biofuels, and - I'll get hate mail about this - grudgingly accept nuclear power, because it doesn't produce greenhouse gases. We should also adopt a carbon tax, and join the Kyoto process of binding curbs on emissions.

A visit to the Maldives is sobering because it juxtaposes extraordinary beauty and extraordinary fragility. The islands have perfect white sand beaches, and the most exclusive resorts here charge several thousand dollars per room per night. And yet the luxury rooms are on sandbars barely peeking above the horizon. When the tide is coming in, you have the creepy feeling that unless it stops very quickly, you'll be left treading water in the middle of the Indian Ocean.

DOJ_NMG_0008644

Local people say that the rising seas have already led to severe erosion on some islands, to wells filling with saltwater, and to storms' becoming more violent.

"My island sits lower in the water now, because of rising seas," said Hasan Ibraahim, a fisherman from the island of Kandholhudhoo. Twice a year, he said, waves now wash over the island - and so, after the tsunami, the government decided to relocate the island's entire population.

He's sad to say goodbye to the land of his ancestors, but after the tsunami it was three days before he found his 8-year-old daughter and 5-year-old son - and he doesn't want to live through that nightmare again.

So Mr. Bush should come and talk to fishermen who endure the mutating climate every day - and then he should ponder the implications of rising seas for Florida, the Carolinas, Long Island. The Maldives may be the canary in the world's coal mine.

"Our message to the U.S. is as simple as this," said Mr. Shareef, the government spokesman. "Sea level rise is not just a phenomenon which is just going to engulf the Maldives and then stop. If it affects us tomorrow, it will affect you the day after."

Northern Ire (WP)

By Anna Morgan

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

TORONTO Barely 18 months ago, Canadian party leaders were out campaigning for better health care policies, a cure for Quebec's nationalist aspirations and an end to government corruption scandals. But since the minority government put in place in June 2004 lost a no-confidence vote late last November, the politicians have been back out on the stump, preparing for a new election on Jan. 23. This time, though, running in the two coldest months of winter, they've been using that familiar demon -- the United States and all its evils -- as the fuel to heat Canadian voters to a frenzy.

There's no denying that Canadians are in an even more anti-American mood than usual, thanks to the Iraq war and the Bush administration's perceived arrogance. And politicians here are playing to that mood. In a blatant appeal for votes, candidates of every stripe, led by Prime Minister Paul Martin and his ruling Liberal Party, are taking aim at Washington, blasting it for taxing Canadian lumber imports, for failing to fight global warming, for lax gun-control laws, for dealing inappropriately with the war on terrorism. And all the while, they're studiously ignoring Canada's own homegrown issues.

America-bashing became such a central part of the election landscape last month that U.S. ambassador David H. Wilkins warned that Canadian-American relations could take a turn for the worse if party leaders didn't back off. But his words only prompted Canadian politicians to lash back with admonitions of their own. Even Stephen Harper, leader of the Conservatives, the party generally most sympathetic to the United States, declared: "I don't think foreign ambassadors should be expressing their views or intervening in an election."

In keeping with a long political tradition, the United States ignores Canada whenever possible. Nonetheless, the issues between the two countries just keep piling up. Leading the way is the softwood lumber dispute. Three years ago, the United States began imposing import duties on Canadian lumber after American producers complained that the Canadian government was all but subsidizing the lumber industry. Canada objected, and last August, arbitrators for the North American Free Trade Agreement decided in its favor. But Americans still have not fully complied with the NAFTA ruling to lift the duties, so Prime Minister Martin has made confronting Washington on this score a main issue of his campaign, even though lumber represents less than 3 percent of Canadian exports to the United States.

While American non-compliance with NAFTA may be a legitimate beef for Canadians, politicians have also been indulging in some inflated rhetoric on other fronts where Canada isn't on such solid ground. The specific attack to which Wilkins responded, for example, had to do with the Kyoto environmental accord. In welcoming a United Nations conference on global warming in Montreal last month, Martin criticized the United States for not signing the agreement and urged it to pay attention to the "global conscience."

In doing so, he conveniently neglected to mention that Canada, which is one of the accord's major promoters, so far hasn't complied with its emission reduction requirements. The United States, in fact, has done a better job in dealing with greenhouse gases. A U.S. Department of Energy report released in December noted that American emissions for 2004 were 16 percent higher than in 1990. A similar study prepared by Environment Canada reported that greenhouse gas emissions rose 24 percent here between 1990 and 2003. But in the current election environment, the prime minister knows that it is hot air that really counts.

DOJ_NMG_0008645

The Liberal Party has been determined to divert attention from a corruption scandal that has left it weakened in every province. It is using its anti-American foreign policy as an election tool, continuously reminding Canadians that the Liberal government kept the country out of the Iraq war and the North American missile defense system. Some pundits say that Martin, with no ammunition against opposition candidates, has decided to run against George W. Bush.

The opposition has also played the America card. The Conservatives, who support deep tax cuts, Thatcheresque deregulation of the economy and a set of family values that could attract the vote of any evangelical minister, are sympathetic with Bush's foreign policies but vow never to mimic them. At the other end of the spectrum, the quasi-socialist New Democratic Party has candidates who are so anti-American that they sometimes sound like an undergraduate student forum, performing stunts such as conducting "citizens' weapons inspections" of American military bases in Washington state. The one thing all the candidates have in common is their strenuous assertions that they will not tolerate being bullied, even if they have to make up the bullying.

Although the government boasts about its non-cooperation with the Americans on Iraq, it is desperate to keep quiet its cooperation on the war on terrorism. Under the Liberals, Canada enacted Patriot Act-style legislation with the Anti-Terrorism Act of 2001. Recently, it resisted calls to repeal provisions for increased police surveillance and far-reaching powers of arrest and detention. Federal authorities are currently holding five suspects under so-called security certificates, which allow non-Canadians to be held indefinitely if a judge is convinced they are a threat. These policies, however, have been kept low-key, for fear of an anti-government backlash in public opinion.

The problem is that silence on these issues during the campaign plays into the growing anti-American sentiment and may eventually hinder attempts to deal with terrorism. The best example of this is the case of Abdullah Khadr, the Canadian media's current cause celebre. Khadr is one of several Toronto-born sons of an Egyptian terrorist who was killed in a shootout with police in Pakistan. U.S. authorities suspect Abdullah of being a weapons supplier for al Qaeda and part of a group that planned to assassinate Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. On Dec. 2, he came back to Canada after 14 months in a Pakistani prison and was soon arrested on an extradition warrant, issued at the request of the United States, for conspiracy to murder Americans abroad.

Abdullah's 19-year-old brother, Omar, has also been in the news, as the youngest person held in Guantanamo Bay, for allegedly throwing a grenade that killed a U.S. Army medic in Afghanistan. The clan's mother has given interviews saying she detests Western values and that the only reason the family has returned to Canada is for the subsidized health care. One would think few families could be less popular with the liberal-minded Canadian public.

And yet in his current extradition battle, Abdullah is clearly winning in the court of public opinion, if not in the court of law. A number of prominent columnists and CBC News are questioning whether Canada should cooperate with the U.S. government in this or any other terrorism case.

Politicians here know that Canadians love to read, talk and debate about U.S. transgressions. Newspaper articles point to ethnic profiling at airports and long border waits as evidence that the war on terrorism is a sham, and that Americans are simply looking for excuses to harass Canadians for the country's multicultural society. But just as it chooses to ignore weaknesses in Canada's environmental policy, the public is also disinclined to take seriously the country's problems with terrorism. Those problems may not be as exaggerated as some Americans think they are -- just recently Montana's Sen. Conrad Burns reiterated, then retracted, the popular myth that the 9/11 hijackers got into the United States through Canada -- but they are certainly real.

The so-called millennium bomber, Ahmed Ressam, who planned to bomb Los Angeles airport on New Year's Eve 2000, did come from Canada. In another notorious case, Mohammed Zeki Mahjoub was arrested in Toronto after being accused of belonging to a militant group with ties to an Egyptian Islamic Jihad organization. Though he denied those links, Mahjoub admitted he worked closely with Osama bin Laden himself during his years in Sudan. The judge at Mahjoub's first hearing quoted from a report issued by the Canadian Security Intelligence Services that "there are more terrorist cells operating in Canada than in any other country outside the Middle East."

DOJ_NMG_0008646

Worry about alienating key constituencies in a hairline election has silenced politicians here on these important issues. But Canada-U.S. relations could reach a turning point if they're not addressed. Over the past five years, Canada has stopped extraditing people to the United States if they face the death penalty. The increasing popularity of the notion that international terrorism suspects also should not be extradited have led to some serious concerns about the heavily trafficked border.

It's not just that Canada is starting to look like a safe haven for America's Most Wanted; it's that America may be starting to view Canada as a less-than-benign neighbor. U.S. Customs and Immigration this year imposed passport requirements on visiting Canadians for the first time, and there is talk of fingerprinting at the border as well. At some point, the truck traffic that carries up to 70 percent of Canadian exports south will start to bog down in security inspections. That's when Canadians' anti-American bark will really start to bite.

In this electoral season, the public is looking for bellicose rhetoric, but Canada's security cries out for sober management. Whoever is elected will have to work publicly with the United States, not just against it, to reduce anti-American sentiment while addressing the problem of terrorism and cross-border control. If the real need for cooperation with Canada's southern neighbor can't temper the public's demand for criticism, the nation will be in for some stormy weather in the next few years.

Author's e-mail:

amorganews@hotmail.com

Anna Morgan is a freelance journalist and author in Canada.

DOJ_NMG_0008647

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JANUARY 8, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Poll: Most Want Court OK For Gov't Taps (AP-Y2) ... 3
Eavesdropping Poll Quotes (AP-Y2) ... 4
Our Presidential Era: Who Can Check The President? (NYT) ... 4
While Congress Slept (LAT) ... 9
Secret's Out: NSA Is Listening To America (BSUN) ... 9
The Wiretappers That Couldn't Shoot Straight (NYT) ... 12
Report On FBI May Strengthen Lawsuit Against Agency (AP) ... 13
Intelligence Bill's Passage Not Guaranteed In Senate (WT) ... 14
The Bush Administration Vs. Salim Hamdan (NYT) ... 15
Germany's Merkel Says Guantanamo Should Be Shut (REU) ... 23
Learning Languages (WP) ... 24

Patriot Act:
Time To Ask: Who Are We? (WP) ... 24
Editorial: How To Fix The Patriot Act: Maintain Checks And Balances On Government (DMN) ... 25

Homeland Response:
Hurricane Fraud Suspects Held (WT) ... 26
All Parts Of New Orleans Included In Rebuilding Plan (NYT) ... 27
Evacuees' Hotel Bill $19 Million FEMA Paid For Housing At Over 650 State Lodges (AJC) ... 29
Katrina Evacuees Seek Jobs, Anchors (LAT) ... 30

War News:
Iraq's Shiites And Kurds Said To Need Sunnis For Coalition (NYT) ... 32
Diplomats Protest Iraq Violence (WP) ... 33
Unity Government At Hand, Iraqi Says (WT/AP) ... 33
Lawmakers Call On Iraq To Shape Up (LAT) ... 34
The Real Choice In Iraq (WP) ... 35
Saddam's Terror Training Camps (WKLYSTD) ... 36
U.S. Soldiers Question Use Of More Armor (AP-Y2) ... 40
Marines Without Armor (NYT) ... 41
For Returning Unit In Iraq, A Battle With Doubts (BOS) ... 41
Marine Battalion Taking 3rd Tour To Iraq (LAT) ... 44
Army Captain Employed Daring, Intellect (WP) ... 45
Case Dropped Against U.S. Officer In Beating Deaths Of Afghan Inmates (NYT) ... 46
A Man Does Not Ask A Man About His Wife (NYT) ... 46
This Isn't Called The [Blank] Era For Nothing (WP) ... 48

DOJ:
S.D. Judges' Actions May Set National Precedent (SFAL) ... 49

Corporate Scandals:
Call It The Deal Of A Lifetime (NYT) ... 51
Nacchio Could Point To Board's Actions (DENP) ... 53
G.O.P. Finds Hope In Spitzer's Hard Edge (NYT) ... 55

Criminal Law:
Dems Charge GOP Has Corrupted Congress (AP-Y2) ... 57
Democrats Want Sweeping House Ethics Investigation (REU-Y2) ... 57
DeLay Ends Bid To Regain Post As G.O.P. Leader (NYT) ... 58
DeLay Steps Down Permanently As House Majority Leader (KRT) ... 59
Republicans Seek Elections To Replace DeLay (FT) ... 60
Democratic Leader Takes Anti-Corruption Message To GOP Turf (WP) ... 61
Scandal Exposes Washington's Underside (AP-Y2) ... 62
White House Watch: (PPG) ... 63
Can I Lobby You? (WP) ... 64
Go Ahead, Try To Stop K Street (NYT) ... 66
Returning 'Good' Money After Bad Misses Point On Ethics (LAT) 67
Reputed Mob Enforcer Gives Not Guilty Plea (CHIT) ... 69
Feds, Family Come Out To See 'The German' (CHIST) ... 69
Reputed Mob Enforcer Pleads Not Guilty In Federal Court (AP) 69
Mob Mentality En Mass: (BOSH) ... 70
Crackdown Exposes Toledo As A Hub Of Teen Prostitution (TOLB) ... 71
Young Duo Put Waltz In Motion (MCA) ... 73

Civil Law:
Cigarette Company Profits Are Still Smoking (MH) ... 76

Civil Rights:
10 Held In Alleged Prostitution Ring (LAT) ... 77
Governor Sticks By Vouchers (ORS) ... 77

Antitrust:
Pentagon Said To OK Rocket-launch Joint Venture (REU-Y2) ... 78
Funeral Industry Conspiring To Keep Prices High, Suit Says (HC) ... 79
Realtors' Bubble May Be Bursting (LAT) ... 81

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Sago Puts Spotlight On Safety Strategy (WP) 82
Miners Steering Next Generation To Different Jobs (NYT) 83
Under Strain, Towns Prepare For 12 Funerals (NYT) 85
Tribe Seeks Land N.J. Sold In 1801 (PHI) 85

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Guns Flow Easily Into Mexico From The U.S. (LAT) 87
Anti-drug Task Force Funding Slashed (RPE) 89

Immigration:

Texas Tangle (TWNHLL) 90
Few Drawn To Illegal Immigration Protests (AP) 91
Rallies Draw Dueling Protesters In Clashes Over Illegal Immigration (LAT) 91
The Silence In Herndon (WP) 92
Democrats Criticize Appointment At Immigration Agency (NYT) 93

Tax:

Bush Urges Congress To Save Tax Cuts (AP-Y2) 94
Bush Pressures Congress On Spending, Tax Cuts (REU-Y2) ... 95
Hot Tubs And Cold Moralizing (WP) 96

Congress-Administration:

Hearings A Test For Democrats And Alito (NYT) 97
Alito's Future Hinges On Past (HCHRON) 98
A Guide To The Hearings (MINNST) 100
In Alito Battle, Issues Of Presidential Power Thrust To Forefront (LAT) 101
CAP Critic Dropped From Alito Witness List (DP) 103
Alito Advocacy Fills Air Of Swing States (WP) 104
Among Evangelicals, A Kinship With Jews (WP) 106
A Search For Order, An Answer In The Law (WP) 107
Alito's Challenge (WP) 111
Alito's Moment (LAT) 112
Judging Samuel Alito (NYT) 113
Our Legal Guardians (LAT) 114
DeLay Ends Bid To Regain Post As GOP Leader (WP) 115
DeLay Ends Leadership Fight (DMN) 117
1 Fix, More Problems For GOP (LAT) 120
DeLay Halts Bid To Regain House Post (BOS) 121
DeLay Gives Up Bid To Reclaim House Post (AP-Y2) 123
DeLay Ends Bid To Reclaim Majority Leader Post (REU-Y2) ... 124
DeLay Says He Won't Seek To Return As Majority Leader (Update4) (BLOOM) 125
Reaction To DeLay Announcement (AP-Y2) 126
Analysis: GOP Woes Don't End With DeLay (AP-Y2) 127
Tenacious Tom DeLay Has Had Wild Ride (AP-Y2) 128
DeLay Ends His Drive To Regain Post (LAT) 129
Ethics Issues Snared GOP's Champion (WP) 131
Ties To Abramoff Weave Intricate Web (HCHRON) 133
Officials Focus On A 2nd Firm Tied To DeLay (NYT) 135
DeLay's War At Home (TIME) 137
DeLay Won't Reclaim House Post (HCHRON) 138
Supporters Point To DeLay's Impact On 22nd District (HCHRON) 140
DeLay Likely To Win Party Nomination In 22nd District (HCHRON) 140
DeLay Ends Bid To Regain Leader's Post (WT) 142
DeLay's Own Tactics May Have Hurt Him (HCHRON) 143
Possible Successors To Tom Delay (AP-Y2) 144
After Tom DeLay (WP) 145
States Intervene After Drug Plan Hits Early Snags (NYT) 145
Seniors Aided In Medicare Drug Plan Changes (FREEP) 147

Other News:

U.S. Plans For Future Without Sharon (AP-Y2) 148
Scan Shows Slight Improvement In Condition Of Israel's Sharon (WP) 149
Arabs Ponder Life After Sharon (WT) 150
With Sharon Ill, Palestinians Face Own Travails (NYT) 151
His Condition Slightly Improved, A Comatose Sharon Faces The Risk Of Serious Infections (NYT) 153
Ten Voices On The New Era (NYT) 154
History Interrupted (NYT) 155
Specialists To Plan Next Step For Sharon (LAT) 157
Even Pat Robertson's Friends Are Wondering... (NYT) 158
US Concerned Over Violence Flare-up In Sri Lanka (AFP-Y2). 159
Bomb Kills 13 On Navy Boat In Sri Lanka (NYT) 159
Russians Visit Iran On Nuclear Plan (NYT) 160
Iran's Top Mullah May Be On Our Side (LAT) 160
Assad Said To Reject Questioning In U.N. Inquiry (LAT/REU) . 161
Europe Comes To Terms With Need For Russian Gas (NYT) . 161
British Liberal Quits As Party Leader (NYT) 163
Leader Of British Political Party Steps Down (LAT) 163
Gandhi-Quoting Yuppie Shakes Stuffiness From Britain's Tories (WP) 164
Denmark Is Unlikely Front In Islam-West Culture War (NYT) ... 165
The French Disconnection (NYT) 166
Bird Flu Appeal To Turks (NYT/REU) 167
Aid Suspended To Two Pakistan Quake Areas (AP-Y2) 167
Kashmir Quake Survivors Bemoan Lack Of Aid (NYT/AP) 168
India Digitizes Age-Old Wisdom (WP) 169
China Takes Aim At Corruption (WP) 170
Appeals Court, Reversing Itself, Holds 2 Salvadoran Generals Liable In Torture Case (NYT) 171
Chief Of U.N. Troops In Haiti Is Found Dead In Hotel Room (NYT) 171
UN Commander In Haiti Dies In Apparent Suicide (REU-Y2) ... 172
U.N. Chief In Haiti Found Dead (LAT) 173
Spain Holds General After Remarks (NYT) 174
Serbia Begins Prosecuting Some War Crimes Cases (NYT) 175
Bosnian Was Killed After Firing Shots, Peacekeepers Say (NYT)176
In Kenya, 'Why Does This Keep Happening?' (WP) 176
A Paradise Drowning (NYT) 177
Northern Ire (WP) 178

DOJ_NMG_0008649

TERRORISM NEWS:

Poll: Most Want Court OK For Gov't Taps (AP-Y2)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, January 8, 2006

A majority of Americans want the Bush administration to get court approval before eavesdropping on people inside the United States, even if those calls might involve suspected terrorists, an AP-Ipsos poll shows.

Over the past three weeks, President Bush and top aides have defended the electronic monitoring program they secretly launched shortly after Sept. 11, 2001, as a vital tool to protect the nation from al-Qaida and its affiliates.

Yet 56 percent of respondents in an AP-Ipsos poll said the government should be required to first get a court warrant to eavesdrop on the overseas calls and e-mails of U.S. citizens when those communications are believed to be tied to terrorism.

Agreeing with the White House, some 42 percent of those surveyed do not believe the court approval is necessary.

"We're at war," Bush said during a New Year's Day visit to San Antonio. "And as commander in chief, I've got to use the resources at my disposal, within the law, to protect the American people. ... It's a vital, necessary program."

According to the poll, age matters in how people view the monitoring. Nearly two-thirds of those between age 18 to 29 believe warrants should be required, while people 65 and older are evenly divided.

Party affiliation is a factor, too. Almost three-fourths of Democrats and one-third of Republicans want to require court warrants.

Cynthia Ice-Bones, 32, a Republican from Sacramento, Calif., said knowing about the program made her feel a bit safer. "I think our security is so important that we don't need warrants. If you're doing something we shouldn't be doing, then you ought to be caught," she said.

But Peter Ahr of Caldwell, N.J., a religious studies professor at Seton Hall University, said he could not find a justification for skipping judicial approvals. Nor did he believe the administration's argument that such a step would impair terrorism investigations.

"We're a nation of laws. ... That means that everybody has to live by the law, including the administration," said Ahr, 64, a Democrat who argues for checks and balances. "For the administration to simply go after wiretaps on their own without anyone else's say-so is a violation of that principle."

The eavesdropping is run by the secretive National Security Agency, the government's code-makers and code-breakers.

Charles Franklin, a political science professor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, said most people think that the eavesdropping is aimed at foreign terrorists, even when the surveillance is conducted inside the country.

"They are willing to give the president quite a lot of leeway on this when it comes to the war on terror," said Franklin, who closely follows public opinion.

Some members of Congress have raised concerns about the president's actions, but none of those lawmakers who have been briefed on the program has called for its immediate halt.

The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, GOP Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, has promised hearings this year. Five members of the Senate Intelligence Committee, including GOP Sens. Olympia Snowe of Maine and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, have called for immediate inquiries.

On top of that, a memorandum circulated Friday from two legal analysts at the Congressional Research Service concluded that the justification for the monitoring may not be as strong as the administration has argued.

The NSA's activity "may present an exercise of presidential power at its lowest ebb," the 44-page memo said.

Bush based his eavesdropping orders on his presidential powers under the Constitution and a September 2001 congressional resolution authorizing him to use military force in the fight against terrorism.

The administration says the program is reviewed every 45 days and that Bush personally reauthorizes it. His top legal advisers argue its justification is sound.

The issue is full of grays for some people interviewed for the poll, including homebuilder Harlon Bennett, 21, a political independent from Wellston, Okla. He does not think the government should need warrants for suspected terrorists.

"Of course," he added, "we all could be suspected terrorists."

___

Associated Press writers Will Lester and Elizabeth White contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0008650

Eavesdropping Poll Quotes (AP-Y2)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 8, 2006

Comments from some of the people interviewed last week for an Associated Press-Ipsos poll on public attitudes about eavesdropping on communications between people in the U.S. and suspected terrorists:

"I believe in people's privacy but I believe in protection, too. If something's not right I think he'd (Bush) have a right to do it. If there's a dangerous situation I don't think he's got to ask anybody." — Tanya Fowler, 46, of Rock Hill, S.C.

"One thing as an American is: I value my freedom. That's guaranteed to me in the Constitution. President Bush has clearly violated at least two articles of the Constitution. He's no better than the terrorists he's supposedly fighting." — Scott Smith, 41, of Gloucester, Mass.

"We've got people that are attacking our country and we can't just let them do so without resisting them and trying to figure out what they're doing." — Gordon Tanner, 70, of Somerville, Ala.

"I think the laws apply to him like they do to everybody else. Controls are in place for a reason, they should be abided by. The wiretapping was warranted, but there's a right way to do things. Rules apply to everybody." — Diane Nardone, 50, of Westerly, R.I.

"There should be an investigation first before shutting it down — they might be in the middle of discovering something." — Dee Fowler, 39, of Iowa City, Iowa.

"I think they should have to get warrants. There are pros and cons to both sides. It's hard to tell who would be potential bad guys." — Harlon Bennett, 21, of Wellston, Okla.

Our Presidential Era: Who Can Check The President? (NYT)

By Noah Feldman

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

I. OUR PRESIDENTIAL ERA

Not since Watergate has the question of presidential power been as salient as it is today. The recent revelation that President George W. Bush ordered secret wiretaps in the United States without judicial approval has set off the latest round of arguments over what the president can and cannot do in the name of his office. Over the past few years, the war on terror has led to the use of executive orders to authorize renditions and the detention of enemy combatants without trial - for which the Bush administration has been called to account by our European allies. The treatment of detainees has also given rise to concerns in Congress about the prerogatives of the chief executive: both houses recently voted to limit the president's authority to employ C.I.A. or other executive agents to engage in cruel and inhumane interrogations. The limits of presidential power will almost surely be a major topic of discussion during Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s Supreme Court confirmation hearings, which are scheduled to begin this week.

The stakes of the debate could hardly be higher: nothing is more basic to the operation of a constitutional government than the way it allocates power. Yet in an important sense, the debate is already long over. By historical standards, even the Bush administration's critics subscribe to the idea of a pre-eminent president. Administrative agencies at the president's command are widely understood to be responsible for everything from disaster relief to drug approval to imposing clean-air standards; and the president can unleash shock and awe on his own initiative. Such "presidentialism" seems completely normal to most Americans, since it is the only arrangement most of us have ever known.

For better or worse, though, this is not the system envisioned by the framers of the Constitution. The framers meant for the legislative branch to be the most important actor in the federal government: Congress was to make the laws and the president was empowered only to execute them. The very essence of a republic was that it would be governed through a deliberative legislature, composed carefully to reflect both popular will and elite limits on that will. The framers would no sooner have been governed by a democratically elected president than by a king who got his job through royal succession.

The transformation of the United States from a traditional republic to a democratic nation run in large measure by a single executive took a couple of hundred years. Constitutional evolution, like its counterpart in the natural world, has occurred sometimes gradually and sometimes in catastrophic jolts, like those brought about by war or economic crisis. The process has not been entirely linear: presidential power grabs have often been followed by a Congressional backlash, as in the wake of Richard Nixon's presidency. But the overall winner has unquestionably been the president, who has reached heights of power that the framers would scarcely have imagined. The modern presidency, as expressed in the policies of the administration of George W. Bush, provides the strongest piece of evidence that we are governed by a fundamentally different Constitution from that of the framers. While any constitution must evolve over time to meet new circumstances and challenges, there is reason to think that, when it comes to presidential power over national security, the latest developments have gone too far.

DOJ_NMG_0008651

The rise of the presidency began with the Louisiana Purchase, which in 1803 doubled the landmass of the United States. History taught the framers that, just as Rome changed from republic to empire with conquest of new lands, territorial acquisition would lead to the centralization of political power. Sure enough, Thomas Jefferson's decision to buy the territory without seeking a constitutional amendment or advance Congressional approval amounted to a huge expansion of presidential authority. Jefferson entered office as a skeptic of the national government's power and even privately suggested that the purchase was unconstitutional. In overcoming his own republican instincts and arranging the purchase secretly, he demonstrated how the office of the presidency would come to serve its own interests, swaying the men holding it to strengthen not simply their own authority but also that of the institution itself.

Three decades later, Andrew Jackson's presidency marked another leap forward in presidential power. His contribution was his claim to represent the country, in its entirety, more directly and democratically than the congeries of local politicians who made up Congress. This rhetorical stance, coupled with the expansion of voting rights to white men without property, gave him the political muscle to veto the national bank and stand up to Congress in the name of the common men who had voted for him.

By the middle of the 19th century, with the admission to the Union of Florida, Texas and California, the United States became a continental empire. Such an empire called for an "imperial presidency," as Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr. suggested in his classic 1973 book of the same name. With the onset of the Civil War, the threat to the nascent empire led Abraham Lincoln to govern without Congress and to suspend access to the courts. When in 1898 William McKinley conquered the Philippines and chose to rule it, the imperial metaphor became still more apt: the United States had become, for the first time, the proprietor of whole nations whose peoples would never vote in its elections and whose governors reported directly to the president.

In the 20th century, the Great Depression helped propel the presidency to its current level of dominance. The administrative agencies that were created during Franklin Delano Roosevelt's New Deal were a response to the tremendous complexity and growth of the national economy. An overwhelmingly Democratic Congress went along with the Roosevelt administration, giving the agencies broad discretion in regulating the economy and addressing workers' welfare. Over time, as the agencies expanded to administer health and safety regulations, Congress realized that it was more convenient to pass the buck to agencies than to deal with hard policy questions on its own. A congressman could take credit for an agency's action when it was convenient and blame the agencies when they adopted policies that his constituents disliked. It is now taken for granted that the president is in charge of the vast administrative apparatus that makes most of the important domestic-policy decisions in the country.

Today, of course, the main arena for the extension of presidential power is the realm of national security. The president's power to use force has grown enormously since the founding. The framers worried that a standing army at the president's beck and call would encourage him to subvert legislative independence by force, and so the Second Amendment gave Americans a right to bear arms in order to form well-ordered militias that would protect "a free state" - not only from the incursions of foreign powers but also from an overweening central government. Until the 20th century, a president who called the military into action did not have much to work with.

But as America emerged as a world power, Congress began to ignore the framers' concern, enhancing the size and might of the regular army until presidents could enter even major conflicts on their own. Presidents from both parties used the ongoing hostilities of the cold war to strengthen their military prerogatives during the conflicts in Korea and Vietnam. Despite the passage of the War Powers Act of 1973, which tried to reassert Congress's role in going to war, the presidency ended up more powerful than it had been before; no president has acknowledged the act's constitutionality. Even Bill Clinton was able to bomb Kosovo without asking Congress for permission.

The administration of George W. Bush, emboldened by the Sept. 11 attacks and the backing of a Republican Congress, has sought to further extend presidential power over national security. Most of the expansion has taken place in secret, making Congressional or judicial supervision particularly difficult. Administration lawyers have gone so far as to claim that the president as commander in chief is not bound by laws that ban torture because he is empowered by the Constitution to fight the nation's wars however he sees fit. A memo from the Department of Justice to the White House counsel dated Aug. 1, 2002, argued that any attempt to apply Congress's anti-torture law "in a manner that interferes with the president's direction of such core war matters as detention and interrogation of enemy combatants thus would be unconstitutional."

The administration has also suggested, in other memos, that the president may violate international treaties if necessary to fight the war on terror. By these lights, the United Nations Convention Against Torture, the leading anti-torture treaty, could constitutionally be violated even though the United States signed and ratified it, and even though the Constitution declares treaties to be "the supreme law of the land." Meanwhile, the administration takes the view that the anti-torture treaty does not apply to its actions outside the United States as a matter of law, but only, as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice recently stated on a trip to Europe, "as a matter of U.S. policy." When added to the newly declared presidential right to arrest American citizens wherever they might be and detain them without trial as enemy combatants, these claims add up to what is easily the most aggressive formulation of presidential power in our history.

DOJ_NMG_0008652

For the last four years, a Republican Congress has done almost nothing to rein in the expansion of presidential power. This abdication of responsibility has been even more remarkable than the president's assumption of new powers. In recent months, though, Bush's relative unpopularity, as reflected in opinion polls, has emboldened Congress to take some steps toward reasserting its oversight role. In addition to the new anti-torture legislation, there is talk of requiring regular reports on secret detentions; and last month Congress nearly allowed the U.S.A. Patriot Act to lapse, granting only a five-week extension instead of the full renewal sought by the administration. Still, political logic dictates that, as long as Republicans control Congress, its oversight will be cautiously managed so as not to harm the party or the party's next presidential candidate. And even accounting for a legislative backlash, history suggests that the presidency ultimately emerges stronger after a president makes new claims of his constitutional authority.

So what, if anything, should be done? If presidential power has been taken too far, who, if anyone, can impose limits on it?

II. WHAT THE COURT HAS DONE - AND MAY DO

The Supreme Court would seem to be the natural place to look for a restoration of the constitutional balance of powers. While Congress sat on its hands for most of the last five years, the court took on some of the most contentious problems of presidential power in a set of landmark decisions concerning detainees being held as enemy combatants. These cases were not just about civil liberties. They were also about the relative powers of Congress and the president under wartime conditions, and the court treated them as such.

The court's response to these crucial issues was to propose what is in effect a compromise between presidential power and Congressional authority. The most significant case concerned the detention of Yaser Esam Hamdi, an American citizen captured in Afghanistan and then held without trial in the United States. In June 2004, the court rejected the administration's view that it was authorized to arrest an enemy combatant anywhere and hold him indefinitely without trial. (The administration's argument was endorsed by Justice Clarence Thomas.) But the court also did not adopt the opposing view, expressed in a stinging dissent written by Justice Antonin Scalia, that an American citizen may not be detained without trial in the United States so long as the courts are open and Congress has not exercised its power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus.

Instead, the court concluded - over the disagreement of Justice David Souter - that Congress had in fact authorized the detention of enemy combatants, including American citizens. Yet at the same time, the court held that a suspected enemy combatant must be afforded the basic right to due process: to be given notice of the accusation against him and an opportunity to rebut that accusation before "a neutral decision maker." When push came to shove, however, the administration never gave Hamdi the hearing that the court promised him: he was "released" to Saudi Arabia without a hearing of any kind, on the condition that he renounce his United States citizenship.

The court's opinion in Hamdi's case seemed to exert a gravitational pull on the status and rights of the detainees at Guantánamo Bay. In a parallel case, the court addressed the Guantánamo issue only to say that those detainees - who are not United States citizens - were covered by the legal right to seek habeas corpus. The administration argued that since Guantánamo was part of Cuba, the habeas corpus statute did not apply there. When the court rejected this argument, the administration seemed to draw the lesson that it had better provide some sort of hearings for the Guantánamo detainees, as the court required for Hamdi. The administration decided to give those detainees hearings before commissions made up of military officers for the limited purpose of deciding whether they were, in fact, enemies of the United States. Not surprisingly, almost all these hearings have resulted in continued detention: only 38 of the more than 500 detainees were found not to be enemy combatants

Whatever their practical shortcomings, the court's decisions regarding Hamdi and the Guantánamo detainees still registered as a limitation on the unbridled presidential power that the administration asserted. But today, the Supreme Court that decided the detention cases is no more. Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist has since died and been replaced by John G. Roberts Jr.; and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor has offered her resignation contingent on the confirmation of her successor. If Samuel Alito takes her place, he and Roberts could change the balance significantly.

The change in the court's makeup is potentially significant, for the litigation of presidential power is just gathering steam. In addition to the likelihood that the court will hear a third prominent case concerning detention - that of Jose Padilla, an American citizen arrested at O'Hare Airport in 2002 and then detained in the United States without trial - it may well consider cases concerning the tapping of private conversations between terror suspects in the United States and persons abroad.

The revelation that President Bush directed the National Security Agency to eavesdrop (and use data-mining technology) on such communications without seeking warrants has raised the question of whether the president had the power to do so. The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, prohibits surveillance of this sort without a special warrant, so the administration has proffered several other justifications of its policy. It has argued that when Congress authorized the president to use force after Sept. 11, it implicitly repealed FISA's ban on warrantless surveillance. And it has also maintained that the president had the inherent constitutional authority to intercept the communications of foreign powers and their agents - regardless of whether Congress prohibited it. Reminiscent of the administration's position regarding torture, this argument relies upon the idea that the Constitution assigns certain foreign-affairs responsibilities to the president that exclude Congress from having any say in how he might exercise them.

DOJ_NMG_0008653

As with the use of torture, the use of secret intelligence outside of the ordinary legal process makes it difficult even to discover the violation, much less challenge it legally. But that does not mean that the issue will not come before the Supreme Court. Although you would imagine that prosecutors are not using secret evidence in criminal trials in which defendants could invoke their Fourth Amendment rights against unlawful search and seizure, defendants in terror trials are now asking courts to force the government to disclose whether such illegal surveillance occurred. Released detainees have already filed civil suits against the government charging torture, detentions and renditions to foreign countries by United States personnel. Such suits could now include claims for unlawful surveillance. Civil-liberties advocates will also bring challenges to the surveillance practices that the president has now acknowledged. And when a new administration is elected, it is not impossible that criminal prosecutions could be brought against the intelligence officials who illegally authorized the wiretaps.

If the issue does reach the court by one or more of these avenues, there is good reason to suspect that both Roberts and Alito, should he be confirmed, will be operating under the influence of an expansive conception of presidential power. Both are products of a conservative movement that has provided the legal justifications for various aspects of the Bush revolution, and both held intensely political jobs in previous Republican administrations. Two decades ago, as a deputy assistant attorney general, Alito argued in a memo that the president should issue "signing statements" when approving legislation - an effort to give the president influence over the courts' power to say what the laws mean. And Roberts, while serving as an appeals court judge, joined an opinion in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld upholding the military commissions being used to try Guantánamo detainees. The court held that the Geneva Convention does not, on its own, create a private right that can be litigated in the courts - a position consistent with wide presidential authority but also conventional wisdom among United States courts dealing with treaty issues. (I submitted a friend-of the-court brief in that case on the right to confront witnesses and evidence.) Past experience does not, of course, necessarily determine a justice's views on the court. But given their profiles and clues from their writings, it is in any case extremely unlikely that the combination of Roberts and Alito would be less deferential to presidential power than the combination of O'Connor and Rehnquist.

III. HOW CONGRESS CAN REDEEM ITSELF

Even if the Supreme Court were inclined to resist efforts to expand presidential power, the truth is that the court cannot do much to restore Congressional authority. We often imagine that the court serves as a sort of neutral umpire controlling the warring political branches. But this is mostly myth. The justices of the Supreme Court are themselves actors in the struggle for power, and when they intervene, they think carefully about how their decisions will affect the court's own legitimacy and authority. Even when the court weighs in on the side of Congress, it often elevates its own powers at Congress's expense. By the very act of interpreting existing laws and declaring something to be within Congress's power (and not the president's), the court affirms that it, not Congress, is the entity capable of making the president listen. Likewise, when Congress allows the court to resolve a power struggle between itself and the executive branch, it effectively concedes that it lacks the will to use its own arsenal of tools to pressure the president.

Consider what happens when Congress actually tries to engage in oversight - for instance, demanding that the president turn over documents concerning prewar intelligence about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. The president refuses, citing "executive privilege" - a term, by the way, absent in the text of the Constitution. What can Congress do when the president ignores its dictates? One option would be to stop cooperating with the presidential agenda on other issues. Another would be to suspend financing for some relevant program. Holding hearings would be a way to possibly broaden public awareness (though hearings are difficult to carry off without relevant documentation). The ultimate sanction, of course, would be to initiate impeachment proceedings. All of these approaches have costs, though. They would require coordinated action by the Congress and would draw public scrutiny to the issue. By going to the court and asking it to enforce a subpoena - or better, waiting for public-interest groups to do so, as with Vice President Dick Cheney's energy advisory commission - Congress avoids most of these costs.

Once the Supreme Court hears a case involving the balance of powers, the situation actually becomes worse for Congress. The court may find for the president. And even if the court does find that Congress's powers trump those of the president, and the president complies with its ruling, the logical implication is that the president is listening to the court when he was not willing to listen to Congress. This concern was evident in Scalia's dissent in the Hamdi case, in which he asserted that an American citizen in his home country is always entitled to a judicial hearing justifying detention - unless Congress suspends the writ of habeas corpus. To Scalia, the case was about Congress and the president: the former had not authorized the latter to detain citizens without a hearing. Yet far from functioning as a vote of confidence in Congress, Scalia's dissent made Congress look like the patsies that they had been throughout the Guantánamo detentions. Scalia was clearly angry at the president for violating a basic constitutional principle, to be sure. But his anger also reflected his frustration with Congress's reluctance to stand up for its rights.

DOJ_NMG_0008654

So how can Congress redeem itself? It could start by clarifying that, in authorizing the president to use force after Sept. 11, it did not mean to give him a blank check to violate existing laws without even telling Congress about the violations. Then it could pass new laws that leave no doubt that it intends to bind the president and his staff on matters relating, for example, to the conduct of war. Senator John McCain's torture bill, for instance, seeks to do just that. In the face of repeated presidential assertions that inhumane treatment does not count as torture and that the president cannot be constrained when it comes to interrogation, the law expressly prohibits cruel interrogation techniques.

But laws that bind the president are, on their own, not enough. Congress must also create meaningful oversight programs with bite to make sure the laws on the books are actually obeyed. The recent proposed bill demanding regular reports from the director of national intelligence about detentions abroad is a step in this direction, but only a step. Without specific provisions stating the content of the testimony that the executive branch must provide, Congress is just asking for the president to elicit an opinion from his lawyers permitting him to ignore the law and then to violate the law secretly. Lest that seem far-fetched, recall that such memos were in fact elicited in the war on terror, and that the violations of our anti-torture laws that took place (according to any reasonable reading of those laws) occurred in facilities whose very existence was classified as a matter of national security. Indeed, even McCain's bill, which prohibits "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment," could be gutted in practice by an interpretation limiting the meaning of those terms so as to permit existing interrogation techniques.

The chief advantage of oversight hearings is that officials must appear and testify under oath as to what the administration is in fact doing. A lie to a Congressional committee constitutes perjury. Disillusioning as it may be to admit, the threat of prison is probably the only sanction that can reliably assure that executive-branch officials, protected by secrecy laws and presidential orders that may themselves be classified, will come clean about what is going on in the war on terror. Even the most conscientious officials may make ambiguous statements that disclose only part of the truth, and that misleadingly - as when Condoleezza Rice answered questions about rendition and torture at a press conference in Ukraine in December.

Beyond oversight, a newly assertive Congress would also have to create ways to sanction the president if laws were violated. Ordinary criminal prosecution will rarely do the trick, since Congress cannot expect the president to initiate proceedings against himself or his employees for violating a law that he thinks is unconstitutional. The steps for enforcement should therefore come in part, at least, from Congress itself, which could specify upfront, for instance, that if a president were to violate the law, Congress would withdraw financing from certain programs or initiate impeachment proceedings.

With midterm elections coming in the fall, and the president's popularity having fallen, Congress may already be gearing up to take some such steps, as with the request for regular reporting on detention and Iraq and McCain's torture bill. A future Congress controlled by the Democrats would doubtless do much more. But the War Powers Act of 1973 provides a cautionary tale. Without strong and credible evidence that Congress will follow through, the laws Congress passes to limit the president can enter constitutional limbo, their status unknown and their effect uncertain.

The Supreme Court can do little to help Congress along this path, but the court could make the work of restoration harder for Congress were it to rule in favor of the Bush administration's theories of executive power. The judicial approval of an inherent executive power to torture or eavesdrop, laws to the contrary notwithstanding, would be a huge blow to Congress.

The allocation of power within the government is not determined simply by reading the Constitution and figuring out what it says. To the contrary, the balance of powers is established through a game of give and take, a struggle in which each branch fends for itself. An excellent example is the Supreme Court's ruling in Bush v. Gore. The important fact about that decision was not that in assuring President Bush's election, it inaugurated a period of single-party government. It was, rather, that the court deliberately chose to intervene in a process laid out in the Constitution for dealing with electoral disputes - a process according to which Congress, not the court, was given the power to choose the president. Bush would likely have ended up president in either case; but once the court wrested from Congress the constitutional power to decide who won, few in Congress seriously disputed the legitimacy of its actions. The court had spoken, and its decision was treated as final.

The lesson for the balance of powers is a deep one: the prize of power goes to the bold. Right now, the presidency and its supporters have the upper hand. For Congress to regain some of its constitutional prominence, the court will have to keep a level head, and the representatives themselves will have to be willing to take some chances. Such an effort need not be restricted to national security issues - it would be nice if Congress also took more responsibility for making many of the hard domestic policy choices that it currently leaves to administrative agencies. But the national security problem is more pressing, and for the moment it offers Congress the best chance to redeem itself from its recent inaction.

DOJ_NMG_0008655

It is customary, when making a plea on behalf of Congress, to give the legislature special consideration because it is the branch originally designed to represent the people. But this is not wholly justified: after all, nowadays the people directly elect the president, and the politicization of Supreme Court nominations ensures a fair amount of popular input into the composition of the court. It is also not certain that a rejuvenated Congress would be more effective in supervising the president than the Supreme Court. The real reason, then, to hope that Congress will resurrect its lost powers is that the balance of powers remains, as the framers thought, the best guarantor of liberty in a constitutional government. The basic fact of presidential power is now irreversible. No one denies that a strong executive is needed to respond to the threat of terrorism. But this just means that the presidency requires greater vigilance than ever to prevent violations of liberty.

No court alone can do the job of protecting liberty from the exercise of executive power. For that most important of tasks, the people's elected representatives need to be actively involved. When we let them abdicate this role, the violations start to multiply, and we get the secret surveillance and the classified renditions and the unnamed torture that we all recognize as un-American. Our Constitution has changed enormously over the last two centuries, and it is sure to change much more in the future. Just how it changes, though, is up to us.

While Congress Slept (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

THE PERFORMANCE OF CONGRESS during much of the Bush administration has been, to put it kindly, undistinguished. But revelations that the National Security Agency may have violated the law by secretly eavesdropping on U.S. citizens offer Republican congressional leaders a chance to redeem themselves — and their institution.

It remains to be seen whether the spymasters were merely overzealous in their efforts to track international terrorists or deliberately snooped on Americans. Congressional hearings on the NSA affair may answer that question. What is alarmingly clear, however, is that President Bush has consistently overreached in his claim to expanded powers as commander in chief during wartime. It is up to Congress to restrain those powers. His duty to protect the nation does not place him above the law.

Bush's claim to disturbingly broad wartime powers first surfaced in the infamous 2002 "torture memo" written by John Yoo, then a lawyer in the Justice Department and now a professor at UC Berkeley's Boalt Hall School of Law.

The most quoted part of the memo is its definition of torture as only the extreme standard of pain accompanying "serious physical injury such as death or organ failure." The much scarier part comes a dozen pages earlier, with this assertion of unfettered presidential wartime power: "In light of the president's complete authority over the conduct of war, without a clear statement otherwise, we will not read a criminal statute as infringing on the president's ultimate authority in these areas." Translation: Fighting a war is more important than obeying the law. If a law interferes with our strategy, we can ignore it.

Was Bush chastened by the political repudiation of a 90-9 vote in the Senate in favor of Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain's amendment banning torture? Not in the least. When he signed the law, Bush announced that "the executive branch shall construe [the law] in a manner consistent with the constitutional authority of the president … as commander in chief" to further the goal "of protecting the American people from further terrorist attacks." Translation: We can override this law whenever necessary.

Congress also stood by when the administration overreached with its novel definition of enemy combatants, who are not entitled to challenge their own detention. Congress could have intervened, but instead the courts have had to sort out the mess. Even after the bipartisan outrage that greeted the NSA spying, the only official protest Congress could muster was a short delay in the renewal of the Patriot Act.

Now the president claims that even the special court set up to issue secret warrants to authorize wiretapping for national security purposes gives him insufficient powers to fight terrorists. Translation: When the courts are inconvenient, we will bypass that branch of government too.

Terrorism presents the U.S. with an enemy unlike any we have seen before. Most Americans agree with Bush that intelligence-gathering on Al Qaeda and its spawn may require more extensive investigative authorities. But the more sweeping the powers granted the executive branch, the more vital it is that Congress provide meaningful oversight. The irony is that the Republican-dominated Congress would likely grant Bush the extraordinary powers he seeks — if only the president would request them through legislation, instead of trying to claim them by fiat.

The struggle against terrorism will not end soon, and the choices we make in fighting it will help define us as a nation for decades. To allow any president to invent the law as he goes along is to invite contempt for the law for many presidencies to come.

Secret's Out: NSA Is Listening To America (BSUN)

By Douglas Birch, Sun Staff

DOJ_NMG_0008656

The Baltimore Sun, January 8, 2006

Several years ago, officials at the National Security Agency, the secretive "Puzzle Palace" on the Baltimore-Washington Expressway, sought to reassure taxpayers that the agency had long since repudiated its Vietnam-era spying on U.S. citizens.

They insisted that the movie Enemy of the State, which portrayed NSA as using its formidable technology to track and eavesdrop on Americans, was the stuff of Hollywood fantasy.

Now NSA stands accused of abetting the White House in what civil liberties activists and others describe as a frontal assault on the constitutional right to privacy.

The program reportedly traced thousands of calls from phones linked to terror suspects to and from locations in the United States, and then listened in on many of those conversations - all without seeking warrants from a special foreign intelligence court. E-mails were also tracked and read, according to news reports.

"I've stuck up for NSA innumerable times, saying I didn't believe they were engaged in illegal activity," said James Bamford, author of two acclaimed books on the NSA, The Puzzle Palace and Body of Secrets. But now, he said, there is no question that after the Sept. 11 attacks the agency broke the law.

Revelations about the warrantless surveillance effort, he said, have thrown the nation's largest and most secretive intelligence-gathering organization into turmoil.

"Most of the people I've dealt with there had no idea this was going on, and they were very shocked and disappointed that suddenly they're back to where they were 30 years ago, dealing with questions of domestic spying," he said.

Don Weber, an NSA spokesman, said in a telephone interview last week that the agency can't comment on operational issues in the interests of national security.

The surveillance effort will be subject to congressional hearings, expected to begin in the next several weeks.

Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the Republican chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, told The New York Times that he planned to hold hearings on the surveillance program after confirmation hearings for Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court. Those hearings are expected to stretch into late January or early February.

According to reports in The New York Times and elsewhere, NSA launched the program almost immediately after the September 2001 attacks, before President Bush issued a secret order authorizing it.

Bamford and others contend that, with or without presidential approval, the program was conducted in violation of the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

That law prohibits NSA from intercepting calls or other electronic communications to or from a U.S. citizen or resident alien without a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

Bamford, who holds a law degree, said the statute was written "to prevent exactly what just happened." Some critics are calling the president's authorization of the program an impeachable offense.

"The eventual outcome will be a special prosecutor," predicted Bamford. "Of course it's an impeachable offense."

The Bush administration, meanwhile, has stood stalwartly by the program, saying that president had the authority to authorize it based on his powers as commander in chief of the armed forces.

Not only has the White House refused to cancel the program, the government has launched an investigation against the whistle-blowers who leaked the story to the Times.

To its defenders, the NSA program was not just legal. It was a vital and necessary part of the efforts to prevent another Sept. 11-style attack.

"It was an integral and important part of the nation's counter-terrorism toolkit," said John E. McLaughlin, who served as deputy director of the CIA from 2000 to 2004 and was briefed on the program.

"People should understand this wasn't a huge drift net hanging over Detroit or Florida or California, scooping up communications," said McLaughlin, now retired from the CIA and a visiting scholar at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies.

"There had to be a foreign connection, and there had to be a reasonable belief that one of the parties involved had to be in contact with a terrorist or was a terrorist. So the whole idea that this was the NSA pawing through great volumes of information among Americans was not right."

Vice President Dick Cheney, in a speech at the Heritage Foundation last week, said that the program was "fully consistent with the constitutional responsibilities and legal authority of the president and with the civil liberties of the American people."

If it had been in place before Sept. 11, he said, two of the hijackers who flew a jet into the Pentagon might have been captured.

But to critics, the alleged abuses are so serious that they eclipse even concerns of future terror attacks.

"What makes this such an urgent matter is that it calls into question the rule of law," said Steven Aftergood, the director of the Project on Government Secrecy at the Federation of American Scientists.

"If the president is at liberty to circumvent the law, then where does his authority stop?" he said. "We have already seen American citizens detained as enemy combatants. We have seen international conventions against torture reinterpreted to permit extreme forms of interrogation. We are in the process of undermining the rules which define us as a democracy. And that makes this scary."

The upcoming hearings, planned for the intelligence and judiciary committees in the Senate and House, will lead lawmakers into the NSA's arcane world of electronic eavesdropping, where information is measured in billions of bits and data is mined like veins of precious metal.

Congress will focus on a few key questions: What kinds of surveillance did the agency conduct? Were legislators fully informed about the program? Were abuses committed? And, of course: Was the program legal?

The search for answers might be difficult.

For one thing, the strategies and hardware NSA uses are among the American government's most closely held secrets, and it is not clear to what extent the administration will be willing to discuss them.

"If someone insists on going into the details of how this was done and precisely what was done, it will become harder to chase and capture terrorists and deter them," McLaughlin said.

The mere disclosure of the program's existence, he said, has harmed the war against terror. "I'm a little surprised that there has been so little concern about the impact on our counter-terrorism capabilities," he said. "It will be less effective, because the bad guys are on notice."

Another key issue is whether Congress was fully informed about the surveillance efforts. The administration insists it was. Some legislators aren't so sure.

"Leaders of Congress have been briefed more than a dozen times" on the NSA program, Cheney said last week. "I have personally presided over most of those briefings."

Yet critics say the highly technical briefings may have left some Congressional leaders more confused than enlightened, perhaps as part of a deliberate White House strategy.

"As you know, I am neither a technician nor an attorney," Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, a West Virginia Democrat, wrote Cheney hours after a July 2003 briefing on the NSA surveillance program. "Given the security restrictions associated with this information, and my inability to consult staff or counsel on my own, I feel unable to fully evaluate, much less endorse these activities."

One former senior administration official familiar with NSA issues rejected this criticism. "I was in at least one of those briefings, and what I recall is that the program was very thoroughly explained to them," said the official, who commented on condition that he not be identified.

Ruth Wedgewood of Johns Hopkins' School of Advanced International Studies, who sits on Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld's Defense Policy Advisory Board, said the White House probably felt it had no choice but to limit access to the information.

"It really is a problem of, how do you inform people and not have stuff leak immediately?" she said.

Civil liberties advocates ask why, if expanded NSA surveillance powers were needed, the White House didn't simply seek them.

The Foreign Intelligence Service Act has been expanded twice since Sept. 11, once in the original Patriot Act and a second time in December 2004.

But McLaughlin said that any effort to change the law "would probably have involved a debate that would have risked exposing the methods and techniques of the program, and would therefore have rendered it" less effective.

Others asked how the NSA could possibly have asked for court permission to track thousands of calls in real time, as it may have done.

Wedgewood pointed out that the 1978 surveillance act, known as FISA, was written in an era before e-mail, the Internet and the widespread use of desktop computers.

"The new technology was something the FISA wasn't necessarily designed to encompass," she said.

Congress may look at possible connections between the NSA's surveillance effort and the Total Information Awareness program, created by the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, or DARPA, in January 2002.

DARPA set out to perfect the tools of "data mining" - the trolling of public computer databases in a hunt for suspicious patterns that could point to terrorist activity. At the time, the agency insisted it was merely a research project.

The DARPA program was led by Adm. John M. Poindexter, a key figure in the Iran-Contra scandal of the 1980s, in which the proceeds from the secret sale of arms to Iran were diverted to right-wing Nicaraguan rebels.

Shortly after The New York Times disclosed existence of the program, DARPA abandoned it. Poindexter later left the government.

DOJ_NMG_0008658

No matter what the hearings find, they will almost certainly draw the veil a little further from the secretive agency.

"The facts of the operation are still obscure, and every day we seem to learn something new," said Aftergood of the Federation of American Scientists.

Now, he said, it is up to the government to justify what it has done. "The burden really falls on the NSA and the administration to re-establish its credibility," Aftergood said. "Because this whole operation is at odds with what they have been telling us for years."

douglas.birch@baltsun.com

The Wiretappers That Couldn't Shoot Straight (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

ALMOST two weeks before The New York Times published its scoop about our government's extralegal wiretapping, the cable network Showtime blew the whole top-secret shebang. In its mini-series "Sleeper Cell," about Islamic fundamentalist terrorists in Los Angeles, the cell's ringleader berates an underling for chatting about an impending operation during a phone conversation with an uncle in Egypt. "We can only pray that the N.S.A. is not listening," the leader yells at the miscreant, who is then stoned for his blabbing.

If fictional terrorists concocted by Hollywood can figure out that the National Security Agency is listening to their every call, guess what? Real-life terrorists know this, too. So when a hyperventilating President Bush rants that the exposure of his warrant-free wiretapping in a newspaper is shameful and puts "our citizens at risk" by revealing our espionage playbook, you have to wonder what he is really trying to hide. Our enemies, as America has learned the hard way, are not morons. Even if Al Qaeda hasn't seen "Sleeper Cell" because it refuses to spring for pay cable, it has surely assumed from the get-go that the White House would ignore legal restraints on eavesdropping, just as it has on detainee jurisprudence and torture.

That the White House's over-the-top outrage about the Times scoop is a smokescreen contrived to cover up something else is only confirmed by Dick Cheney's disingenuousness. In last week's oration at a right-wing think tank, he defended warrant-free wiretapping by saying it could have prevented the 9/11 attacks. Really? Not with this administration in charge. On 9/10 the N.S.A. (lawfully) intercepted messages in Arabic saying, "The match is about to begin," and, "Tomorrow is zero hour." You know the rest. Like all the chatter our government picked up during the president's excellent brush-clearing Crawford vacation of 2001, it was relegated to mañana; the N.S.A. didn't rouse itself to translate those warnings until 9/12.

Given that the reporters on the Times story, James Risen and Eric Lichtblau, wrote that nearly a dozen current and former officials had served as their sources, there may be more leaks to come, and not just to The Times. Sooner or later we'll find out what the White House is really so defensive about.

Perhaps it's the obvious: the errant spying ensnared Americans talking to Americans, not just Americans talking to jihadists in Afghanistan. In a raw interview transcript posted on MSNBC's Web site last week - and quickly seized on by John Aravosis of AmericaBlog - the NBC News foreign affairs correspondent Andrea Mitchell asked Mr. Risen if he knew whether the CNN correspondent Christiane Amanpour might have been wiretapped. (Mr. Risen said, "I hadn't heard that.") Surely a pro like Ms. Mitchell wasn't speculating idly. NBC News, which did not broadcast this exchange and later edited it out of the Web transcript, said Friday it was still pursuing the story.

If the Bush administration did indeed eavesdrop on American journalists and political opponents (Ms. Amanpour's husband, Jamie Rubin, was a foreign policy adviser to the Kerry campaign), it's déjà Watergate all over again. But even now we can see that there's another, simpler - and distinctly Bushian - motive at play here, hiding in plain sight.

That motive is not, as many liberals would have it, a simple ideological crusade to gut the Bill of Rights. Real conservatives, after all, are opposed to Big Brother; even the staunch Bush ally Grover Norquist has criticized the N.S.A.'s overreaching. The highest priority for the Karl Rove-driven presidency is instead to preserve its own power at all costs. With this gang, political victory and the propaganda needed to secure it always trump principles, even conservative principles, let alone the truth. Whenever the White House most vociferously attacks the press, you can be sure its No. 1 motive is to deflect attention from embarrassing revelations about its incompetence and failures.

That's why Paul Wolfowitz, in a 2004 remark for which he later apologized, dismissed reporting on the raging insurgency in Iraq as "rumors" he attributed to a Baghdad press corps too "afraid to travel." That's also why the White House tried in May to blame lethal anti-American riots in Afghanistan and Pakistan on a single erroneous Newsweek item about Koran desecration - as if 200-odd words in an American magazine could take the fall for the indelible photos from Abu Ghraib.

Such is the blame-shifting game Mr. Cheney was up to last week. By dragging 9/11 into his defense of possibly unconstitutional bugging, he was hoping to rewrite history to absolve the White House of its bungling. And no wonder. He knows all too well that the timing of Mr. Bush's signing of the secret executive order to initiate the desperate tactic of warrant-free N.S.A.

DOJ_NMG_0008659

eavesdropping - early 2002, according to Mr. Risen's new book, "State of War" - is nothing if not a giant arrow pointing to one of the administration's most catastrophic failures. It was only weeks earlier, in December 2001, that we had our best crack at nailing Osama bin Laden in Tora Bora and blew it.

What went down that fateful December is recalled in particularly gripping fashion in a just published book, "Jawbreaker," which, like Mr. Risen's book, is rising on the best-seller list at an inopportune moment for this White House. "Jawbreaker" is the self-told story of a veteran clandestine officer, Gary Berntsen, who was the pivotal C.I.A. field commander in the hunt for bin Laden. Mr. Berntsen is a fervent Bush loyalist, but his honest account doesn't do the president any favors. "We needed U.S. soldiers on the ground!" he writes, to "block a possible Al Qaeda escape into Afghanistan!" But his request to Centcom for 800 Army Rangers to do the job went unheeded.

We don't know whether the Bush order relaxing legal controls on the N.S.A. was in part a Hail Mary pass to help compensate for that disaster. Either way, all the subsequent wiretaps in the world have not brought bin Laden back dead or alive. Though the White House says that its warrantless surveillance has saved lives by stopping other terrorists since then, Mr. Bush has exaggerated victories against Al Qaeda as often as he has the battle-readiness of Iraqi troops. After he claimed in an October speech that America and its allies had foiled 10 Qaeda plots since 9/11, USA Today reported that "at least" 6 of the 10 had been preliminary ideas for attacks rather than actual planned attacks.

The louder the reports of failures on this president's watch, the louder he tries to drown them out by boasting that he has done everything "within the law" to keep America safe and by implying that his critics are unpatriotic, if not outright treasonous. Mr. Bush certainly has good reason to pump up the volume now. In early December the former 9/11 commissioners gave the federal government a report card riddled with D's and F's on terrorism preparedness.

The front line of defense against terrorism is supposed to be the three-year-old, $40-billion-a-year Homeland Security Department, but news of its ineptitude, cronyism and no-bid contracts has only grown since Katrina. The Washington Post reported that one Transportation Security Administration contract worth up to $463 million had gone to a brand-new company that (coincidentally, we're told) contributed $122,000 to a powerful Republican congressman, Harold Rogers of Kentucky. An independent audit by the department's own inspector general, largely unnoticed during Christmas week, found everything from FEMA to border control in some form of disarray.

Yet even as this damning report was released, the president forced cronies into top jobs in immigration enforcement and state and local preparedness with recess appointments that bypassed Congressional approval. Last week the department had the brilliance to leave Las Vegas off its 2006 list of 35 "high threat" urban areas - no doubt because Mohammed Atta was so well behaved there when plotting the 9/11 attacks.

THE warrantless eavesdropping is more of the same incompetence. Like our physical abuse of detainees and our denial of their access to due process, this flouting of the law may yet do as much damage to fighting the war on terrorism as it does to civil liberties. As the First Amendment lawyer Martin Garbus wrote in The Huffington Post, every defense lawyer representing a terrorism suspect charged in the four years since Mr. Bush's N.S.A. decree can challenge the legality of the prosecution's evidence. "The entire criminal process will be brought to a standstill," Mr. Garbus explains, as the government refuses to give the courts information on national security grounds, inviting the dismissal of entire cases, and judges "up and down the appellate ladder" issue conflicting rulings.

Far from "bringing justice to our enemies," as Mr. Bush is fond of saying, he may once again be helping them escape the way he did at Tora Bora. The president who once promised to bring a "culture of responsibility" to Washington can and will blame The Times and the rest of the press for his failures. But maybe, if only for variety's sake, the moment has come to find a new scapegoat. I nominate Showtime.

Report On FBI May Strengthen Lawsuit Against Agency (AP)

By WILLIAM McCALL

AP, January 8, 2006

A Justice Department report that faulted the FBI for sloppy work may strengthen a lawsuit filed against the agency by a Portland man who was arrested after his fingerprints were mistakenly identified during the investigation into the 2004 Madrid train bombings.

Attorneys for Brandon Mayfield "don't have to argue a particular violation of Mayfield's religious rights or First Amendment rights," said Robert Precht, who represented defendants in the 1994 World Trade Center bombing in New York.

"They only have to argue the government engaged in blatant misconduct," said Precht.

Other legal experts agree that the Justice Department report does not undercut Mayfield's lawsuit — and may help it.

In the report released on Friday, Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine faulted the FBI for mistakenly matching a fingerprint found on a bag of detonators near the Madrid bombing site to those of Mayfield.

DOJ_NMG_0008660

The report said no "intentional misconduct by FBI employees" was found, but said there were "performance issues by various FBI employees ... that helped cause the errors in the Mayfield case."

Mayfield was jailed for two weeks in May 2004 — even though Spanish investigators disagreed with the FBI's fingerprint analysis. The FBI acknowledged the mistake on May 24 and apologized to Mayfield.

He sued the Justice Department and the FBI in October 2004, claiming he was singled out because of his Muslim faith and that searches of his home and other locations were in violation of the Fourth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, which protects against unreasonable search and seizure.

If Mayfield can show that FBI experts were under pressure to make an identification without being certain — which the FBI and the Justice Department have denied — then he may be able to establish a pattern of misconduct, Precht said.

He said the Justice Department report leaves open questions about the possibility of pressure on forensic experts.

"Once the government or the prosecutor's office or an (FBI) supervisor says we think this guy may be guilty, the whole machinery of government goes to work to find the evidence that supports that," Precht said. "People do these things naturally. That's why we have safeguards about the presumption of innocence."

Michael Greenberger, a University of Maryland law professor and director of its Center for Health and Homeland Security, said the delay in correcting the mistake may be ammunition for Mayfield to argue there was pressure.

"They should have figured out sooner those were not his fingerprints," Greenberger said.

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman in Washington, D.C., said the agency could not comment on the pending lawsuit and he referred questions about the report to the FBI.

The agency, in a statement released with the inspector general's report, said Mayfield's mistaken arrest "was based on an extremely unusual confluence of events."

The FBI said it has changed its procedures at the recommendation of an international panel of experts in order to prevent a similar mistake.

Precht, who recently left the University of Michigan to return to private practice in New York, said the pressure on investigators and prosecutors is enormous once they believe they have the right suspect.

"This is a textbook example of people having assumed a person's guilt, and then they look for evidence to confirm it," Precht said.

Veteran trial lawyer Gerry Spence, who is representing Mayfield, has argued the FBI targeted the former Army officer because he is a convert to Islam.

The inspector general's report concluded that religion played no role in the initial, mistaken fingerprint identification because the FBI experts did not know Mayfield was a Muslim, or that his wife is Egyptian or that he represented other Muslims as an attorney.

The report noted, however, that "whether Mayfield's religion was a factor in the (FBI) laboratory's failure to revisit its identification and discover the error in the weeks following the initial identification is a more difficult question."

Elden Rosenthal, a Portland lawyer also representing Mayfield, said the case raises important issues of protecting constitutional rights during the government's war on terrorism.

"Those of us concerned about civil liberties always sound like we're talking about abstract concepts," Rosenthal said. "Here is a concrete example of why civil liberties should not be allowed to take a back seat to the war on terror."

In Mayfield's case, Rosenthal said the FBI won approval from a secret court established by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, to plant electronic "bugs" in the Mayfield home and his law office, execute repeated "sneak and peek" searches of his home and office, and place wiretaps on his phones.

Despite the inspector general's conclusion the FBI could have gotten FISA approval for surveillance without the Patriot Act, the report found that changes made by the act permitted access to more information about Mayfield than could have been obtained without it, said Dave Fidanque, executive director of the Oregon chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union.

"The inspector general's report confirms for the first time that Mayfield's home, and probably his office, were 'bugged,'" Fidanque said.

Greenberger said the Mayfield case may provide the first opportunity to test whether Patriot Act provisions on surveillance and searches violate the Constitution.

"Everybody has been waiting for a case where these kinds of searches under the Patriot Act can be brought to a court's attention by somebody who has standing to raise it — and Mayfield has that standing," Greenberger said.

"There's a big, big constitutional issue here," he said.

Intelligence Bill's Passage Not Guaranteed In Senate (WT)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, January 8, 2006

For the first time in 27 years, congressional officials fear that an Intelligence Authorization Act will not be passed before the session ends.

Lawmakers and staff from both parties said the bill was blocked in the Senate before the holiday recess by a Republican lawmaker involved in a dispute about amendments that would require reports on secret detention facilities and access to prewar intelligence briefings on Iraq.

Now some fear that further efforts to pass the bill will become captive to the debate over the Bush administration's use of warrantless national security wiretaps.

"I think we might have missed an opportunity at the end of last year," said one Democratic Senate aide who deals with intelligence issues. "The window might have closed by now."

The annual authorization bill, which has passed every year since the establishment of the House and Senate committees on intelligence in 1978, provides the framework within which intelligence agencies carry out their missions and spend the money Congress appropriates for them.

Congressional officials say that if the bill fails this year, several important reforms and innovations will be shelved.

Its authors say this year's bill would set up an inspector general for the nation's new spy chief, strengthen counterterrorism information-sharing by temporarily suspending parts of the Privacy Act, and make the directors of the three biggest-spending military intelligence agencies subject to Senate confirmation.

The bill has been blocked by a senator who exercised the right to remain anonymous, Republican staff said.

Because of the way Senate rules are designed to ensure that debate is difficult to curtail, moving a bill through the chamber expeditiously requires a parliamentary procedure known as unanimous consent. A single objection can force Senate managers to contemplate a lengthy floor debate and effectively preclude consideration of a bill altogether if they think the legislative agenda is too crowded.

Before the recess, Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the senior Democrat on the Select Committee on Intelligence, said the bill was blocked to prevent passage of three amendments added with the consent of committee Chairman Pat Roberts, Kansas Republican.

Two of the amendments deal with reports to Congress about the purported overseas network of secret CIA detention facilities. Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte would submit a report about the facilities, and intelligence agency inspectors general would describe the welfare of individual detainees. These classified reports would be submitted to the intelligence committees of both chambers.

The third amendment requires the White House to give the two committees copies of presidential daily briefing items about Iraq from Jan. 20, 1997 -- the beginning of President Clinton's second term -- to March 19, 2003 -- the date of the U.S. invasion.

The Bush Administration Vs. Salim Hamdan (NYT)

By Jonathan Mahler

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

In 1996, Salim Hamdan, a 26-year-old Yemeni with a thick mustache and kinky black hair, was working part time as a taxi driver, dividing his modest income between the mattress he rented in a crowded boardinghouse in the dirty, bustling city of Sana and his daily supply of khat leaves, the stimulant that most Yemeni men chew by the fistful. Then one day the low-hanging horizon of his life lifted: he was recruited for jihad. He joined about 35 other Muslims, mostly Yemenis, who were preparing to leave for Tajikistan to fight alongside that country's small Islamic insurgency against its Russian-backed government.

One of the group's leaders was a self-assured young man named Nasser al-Bahri. Hamdan, an orphaned only child from a rural tribal village in southern Yemen, was naturally drawn to strong personalities. Although two years his junior, al-Bahri, who grew up in an upper-middle-class family in Jidda, Saudi Arabia, was far more worldly and sophisticated than Hamdan and was without question the most educated person he had ever met. Al-Bahri had studied business in college, but he was also deeply steeped in the Koran, having become a devout Muslim as a teenager in rebellion against his bourgeois upbringing. He spoke comfortably and forcefully about the plight of Muslims all over the world, and he had traveled extensively, to places as far as Bosnia and Somalia, to defend his oppressed Islamic brethren.

Hamdan, who had the rough equivalent of a fourth-grade education, wasn't especially religious and had no grand plans for his life other than the hope that he might someday be married, but he nevertheless embraced the idea of becoming a holy warrior. It didn't hurt that the trip was to be paid for - al-Bahri told him that the group had raised money from a handful of Saudi-based Muslim charities - and that Hamdan would also receive a salary.

DOJ_NMG_0008662

The jihadis convened in Jalalabad, Afghanistan, and started working their way north toward Tajikistan, first by jeep and then, when the roads were impassable, on foot. After six months traversing Afghanistan's mountainous, often snow-covered terrain, they were turned back at the Tajik border.

At loose ends, one of the jihadis suggested that they go see a man named Osama bin Laden, a well-known sheik among radical Islamists who led a militant group of itinerant Muslim holy warriors called Al Qaeda. Having only recently been expelled from Sudan, bin Laden had relocated to Afghanistan, where he planned to rebuild Al Qaeda with the help of his new hosts, the Taliban. Bin Laden earned his reputation during the anti-Soviet campaign in Afghanistan in the 1980's, but he was now enlisting soldiers for his new crusade to drive the United States from the Arabian Peninsula.

Al-Bahri, Hamdan and the rest of the group made their way back through Afghanistan to bin Laden's home in Farm Hada, a village outside Jalalabad, not far from the Khyber Pass. They arrived in late 1996 shortly before Ramadan, the holiest time of year. For three days, bin Laden preached to his prospective recruits about the religious imperative of reversing America's corrosive presence in the gulf. Seventeen of the original 35 jihadis decided to stay; Hamdan and al-Bahri were among them.

For the next several years, both men worked for bin Laden, first in Farm Hada, then, when he relocated for security reasons in 1997, to a better-fortified compound in the desert outside Kandahar. In 1999, al-Bahri and Hamdan's lives became further entwined. At bin Laden's urging and with his financial help, they married Yemeni sisters in Sana and returned to Afghanistan with their new wives.

By Sept. 11, 2001, however, al-Bahri and Hamdan's paths had diverged. Al-Bahri was in prison in Yemen for his suspected links to Al Qaeda's bombing of an American Naval destroyer, the U.S.S. Cole, in 2000. Hamdan was still with bin Laden, though not for long. In late November 2001, with America's military campaign in Afghanistan well under way, he was picked up near the border of Pakistan by a group of Afghan warlords. They hogtied him with electrical wire and within a matter of days turned him over to the Americans for a $5,000 bounty. The interrogations started, and Hamdan was soon identified as Saqr al-Jedawi, his alias during his years with bin Laden. He spent the next six months in U.S. prison camps in Bagram and Kandahar, before being flown to Guantánamo Bay in May 2002.

Today, Salim Hamdan lives in a 6-by-9-foot cell in Guantánamo, awaiting trial by a special military tribunal established by presidential order in the aftermath of 9/11. If everything goes according to the government's plans, the Bush administration will prosecute Hamdan for violating the laws of war by conspiring to commit acts of terrorism against the United States. The government has revealed little about its case against Hamdan - my portrait is drawn principally from his lawyers, family members and al-Bahri - but it has charged him with serious offenses, including transporting weapons and serving as a bodyguard to bin Laden. If convicted on all charges, Hamdan could receive a life sentence.

Hamdan's attorneys, a government-appointed Navy lawyer and a professor at Georgetown University Law Center, don't deny that their client worked directly for bin Laden, but they play down his importance to Al Qaeda, portraying him as an employee, an uneducated and far-from-devout driver and mechanic who was grateful for a paycheck but generally ignorant of the terrorist enterprise for which he worked. Moreover, they say that the tribunals, known officially as military commissions, are illegal and have sued the American government to block them from going forward.

This spring, the detainee's lawyers will have the chance to make their case to the Supreme Court, when it hears Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. The name alone guarantees that it will be one of the most closely watched arguments of the year, and the eventual ruling will have far-reaching implications not just for Hamdan and the rest of the Guantánamo detainees, but also for presidential war powers and quite possibly for the future of democracy in the Middle East. If the war on terror is, at its heart, a battle to show the Islamic world that there is an alternative to oppressive theocracies and autocratic dictators, nothing is more important than how the United States government dispenses justice to detainees like Salim Hamdan. Until now, America's wartime practice has been to hold onto captured combatants until the end of hostilities, when there is no longer a threat of them returning to the battlefield. In this case, though, the battlefield is unmapped and the hostilities could continue for decades. For the moment, the government has broadly classified nearly all of the more than 500 detainees at Guantánamo as enemy combatants, but eventually it's going to have to start sorting them out. This will entail answering some difficult questions. Are all Muslim men who answered the call to jihad equally guilty? Which detainees represent a threat to the United States? Who is worth prosecuting, and how?

Just outside the Old City of Sana, a maze of densely packed, intricately adorned stone houses and centuries-old shops that rise like drip castles from narrow cobblestone streets, sits the modern Martyrs' Mosque. If the Old City evokes Yemen's prosperous, cosmopolitan days at the center of the world's spice trade, the Martyrs' Mosque, an imposing, ash-colored monolith, speaks to its present as the poorest and most primitive of the Arabian Peninsula states.

The big open square that fronts the mosque is a gathering place for the dispossessed. Homeless people lie on flattened cardboard boxes with gasoline cans repurposed as water jugs beside them. Dababs, minivans stuffed with passengers, career around Sana's crowded streets, jockeying for fares. Drivers struggle to be heard above the music issuing from loudspeakers on the three-wheeled cycles pedaled by cassette vendors. The smells of grilling meat and corn on the cob commingle with perfumed oil, urine and exhaust.

DOJ_NMG_0008663

There are no women in sight here, only young men and boys, a reflection of Yemen's conservative Islamic culture. And although roughly 40 percent of all Yemeni men are unemployed, everyone here seems to be in a big hurry, hustling around, often holding hands, always in standard Yemeni dress: sandals, white robes and Western-style blazers with the labels showing on the outside of the left sleeve, just above the cuff. Long curved daggers known as jambiyas, reminders of the country's enduring tribal culture, hang from belts. Cheeks bulge with khat, which brightens the mood and sends the mind in every direction, an apt emblem of the combination of aimlessness and restlessness on display.

Ten years ago, Salim Hamdan was one of these men. He was born in about 1970 (no one, including Hamdan himself, knows for sure), hundreds of miles from Sana in the Wadi Hadhramaut, a 100-mile oasis in the mountainous desert of southeastern Yemen. His father was a farmer and shopkeeper, and the family lived modestly in a small, mud-brick home in a cliff town overhanging the fertile valley below. He was still a child when his parents died from illness, one a few years after the other. With no other family nearby, Hamdan went to live with relatives in Mukalla, a bleak port city of about 150,000 on Yemen's southern coast. By that point, Hamdan had already quit school, which is not unusual in Hadhramaut, where the imperatives of helping your family earn money far outweigh the comparatively abstract virtues of an education.

Within a few years he was on his own, living on the streets of Mukalla and working odd jobs. In 1990, Yemen, which had long been divided into two separate nations, the Islamic north and Marxist south, was officially unified. Hamdan, who was then 20, joined the mass migration north in search of work. There was a widespread sense that Sana, the new nation's capital, would soon be booming. As it turned out, the job prospects were not so promising, particularly for someone with Hamdan's limited qualifications. He soon found his way to the Martyrs' Mosque - where he picked up work driving a dabab - and then, six years later, to jihad.

Jihad - literally, "struggle" - is a slippery concept, one that has been subjected to almost endless interpretation, violent and nonviolent alike, emanating from a Muslim's basic religious duty to encourage the spread of Islam. In recent years, though, it often has come to be understood as a violent religious crusade against the United States. Hamdan and al-Bahri's routes to jihad could not have been more different, but in many ways each is emblematic of the men's respective countries, which represent the two biggest contingents at Guantánamo. In Saudi Arabia, jihad resonated with particular force with the educated, affluent and devout; in Yemen, it exerted an especially strong pull on the country's poor. Nearly half of the country's population lives below the poverty line; unlike its neighbors in the gulf, Yemen has very little oil, and what it does have is hoarded by the government. "Unless they are the sons of sheiks or political leaders, the young people have no way to use their energies," Nabil al-Sofee, a former spokesman for Islah, Yemen's Islamic party, told me recently in his office in Sana. "The one option that is in front of anyone who wants to achieve anything is jihad."

Jihad has an almost mythic appeal in Yemen. Its roots run all the way back to the seventh century, when the Prophet Muhammad is said to have declared, "Allah, give me fighters from behind me," his back turned conspicuously to Yemen. In its more modern incarnation, jihad can be traced to 1967, when Yemen was still divided and the British withdrew from its southern half. Finally free of its longtime occupiers, South Yemen quickly established ties to the Soviet Union, Cuba and China, and in 1970 became the Arab world's first Communist state.

South Yemen's new identity inaugurated two decades of hostilities with North Yemen, a Muslim state whose allegiances were to Saudi Arabia and Egypt. It didn't take long for North Yemen's rulers - including the president of today's unified Yemen, Ali Abdullah Saleh - to exploit the conflict's religious undertones. By the time the Soviets invaded Afghanistan in 1979, many young North Yemenis already accepted that it was their duty as Muslims to confront Communist unbelievers. And so, over the next several years, scores of young Yemeni men answered their clerics' calls for jihad. Afghanistan's mujahedeen received support from many Arab countries, in addition to the United States, but the Yemenis were among the fiercest of the so-called Afghan-Arab fighters. Unlike the jihadis from wealthier states in the Persian Gulf, they were accustomed to hard living, and the rugged, mountainous terrain of Afghanistan was similar to that of Yemen.

When the Soviets withdrew from Afghanistan in 1989, the leaders of many Arab countries, understandably worried about the combustible mix of religious zealotry and combat experience in which these men had been steeped, discouraged the jihadis from returning home. North Yemen, for its part, not only welcomed back its own fighters, it opened its borders to jihadis from other Arab countries as well. The heroic stature of these fighters was cemented in 1994, when the still-simmering tensions between Yemen's Islamists and Marxists erupted into a full-fledged civil war and President Saleh called on the ex-jihadis to help defeat the Communists. The north emerged victorious, and Saleh rewarded many of these men for their efforts. For his help mobilizing the troops, Sheik Abdul Majid al-Zindani, an ex-Arab-Afghan warrior and bin Laden's onetime spiritual mentor, was awarded the chancellorship of Iman University in Sana, a platform from which he has since steered countless young Yemeni men toward the path of jihad.

DOJ_NMG_0008664

The Yemeni government did little to stanch the flow of jihadis, even in the face of increasing international pressure. A consummate pragmatist, President Saleh gave the U.S. permission to use its ports to refuel in the 1990's, but to the Arab world he presented himself as a leader who was not afraid to stand up to the West. In the wake of the attack on the U.S.S. Cole in Yemen in 2000, Saleh scoffed at rumors that the U.S. was planning to intensify its military presence in the country: "Yemen is a graveyard for the invaders," he told Al Jazeera. After 9/11, however, President Saleh went to Washington to pledge his support for the war on terror. But having spent so many years nurturing and exploiting the country's culture of jihad, he had to be careful about how he went about dismantling it. Extraditing Islamic radicals, or even putting them in jail for more than a couple of years, would provoke the country's powerful extremist element.

The centerpiece of Saleh's solution was to appoint a respected jurist and cleric, Hamoud al-Hitar, to meet with imprisoned extremists and persuade them that Islam does not, in fact, condone acts of terrorism. When I visited al-Hitar at his heavily guarded home in Sana one night last fall, he explained to me how the so-called Committee on Thoughtful Dialogue works. He called it "intellectual surgery" and described it as a simple process: he leads radicals through a series of questions about their beliefs, using the Koran or the hadith, a collection of the Prophet Muhammad's teachings, to show them how they have been misled. At the end of the program, those participants who vow not to take part in future acts of terrorism are granted presidential pardons and set free. To the obvious question - Why believe that they'll honor the vow? - Judge al-Hitar gave the obvious answer: These are men who take their ideology seriously; they would never sign a pledge renouncing their beliefs if they didn't mean it. A couple of years ago, President Saleh released hundreds of men with connections to Al Qaeda under the auspices of Judge al-Hitar's dialogue program. One of those men was Nasser al-Bahri.

Al-Bahri declined to see me for the better part of the two weeks I spent in Yemen. Then, the night before I was scheduled to fly home, he agreed to meet me the following evening at a relative's home in Sana. A tall, rangy man with a receding hairline and a neatly trimmed beard, al-Bahri looked older than his 33 years. He sat on a floor cushion, his long legs extending from the bottom of his creaseless white robe. Early in our conversation, which lasted more than five hours, the power failed. For the rest of the night, the narrow room was illuminated by two candles. Al-Bahri apologized for excusing himself repeatedly to urinate, explaining that he was diabetic.

According to al-Bahri, his decision to renounce Al Qaeda and terrorism had nothing to do with Judge al-Hitar's dialogue program, which he doubts has truly changed any minds. Rather, he said that during his two years in prison in Yemen, almost half of which was spent in solitary confinement, he had the chance to do a lot of reading and thinking. He continues to believe that America is oppressing and exploiting Muslims, but he no longer accepts that the random murder of innocent people is a legitimate expression of jihad, which, he said, "has its time and place, like prayer." There was also the issue of maturity. "When we reach our 30's, we come to regret what we did in our 20's," he told me matter-of-factly, like an ex-campus radical reflecting on a minor act of civil disobedience in his distant past.

Al-Bahri was not eager to talk about Hamdan; because he feels responsible for his brother-in-law's fate, he said that discussing him was too depressing. Not surprisingly, what he did say distanced Hamdan from the military operations of Al Qaeda. Al-Bahri described Hamdan as almost childlike, a cheerful, simple-minded man. According to al-Bahri, Hamdan at first seemed excited about jihad, but he lacked both the zeal of a holy warrior and the religious grounding or inclination to grasp the ideology of the movement. As al-Bahri tells it, Hamdan went to Tajikistan for jihad but stayed in Afghanistan because working as a driver and mechanic in bin Laden's motor pool paid better than driving a dabab in Sana.

If al-Bahri was quick to exonerate Hamdan, he showed no hesitation implicating himself as a senior member of what may be the most notorious terrorist organization the world has ever known. Al-Bahri sounded neither nostalgic nor remorseful talking about his years as one of bin Laden's chief bodyguards; he could have been a retired executive dispassionately recollecting his years with the firm. Yet he was, in one sense, cautious: while he was willing to answer any question I asked, he explicitly disassociated himself from each specific attack that took place during his time with bin Laden.

Al-Bahri's future had come into focus as a teenager in Jidda, when he first fell under the influence of radical Saudi clerics. "I saw that my function was to carry guns and defend Muslims wherever they were," he told me. "That was the holy work that would lead me to paradise." Having grown up in Saudi Arabia, Islam's holiest land, he responded personally when he heard bin Laden describe his country as an agent of the Americans and pledge to drive America from the Arabian Peninsula. What's more, al-Bahri had left Saudi Arabia for Bosnia in the early 90's and had been without the guidance of a religious leader ever since. In bin Laden, al-Bahri said, he had found "a new spiritual father."

Al-Bahri rose quickly through the ranks of Al Qaeda. Under the alias Abu Jandal, he helped create new training camps that bore little resemblance to the kind he attended as a young man in Bosnia, where jihadis learned such conventional skills as assembling and firing weapons and reading maps. The focus now was on fighting in cities and preparing for martyrdom operations, which meant learning how to blend in with local populations and attack civilian targets. Bin Laden was clear about the goals. "He would say over and over again that we must carry out painful attacks on the United States until it becomes like an agitated bull," al-Bahri recalled, "and when the bull comes to our region, he won't be familiar with the land, but we will." During the late 90's, al-Bahri fought with the Taliban against the Northern Alliance and served as one of bin Laden's personal bodyguards during his frequent tours of Qaeda training camps around Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0008665

After the attacks on the U.S. embassies in East Africa in the summer of 1998, al-Bahri said, bin Laden placed him in charge of the organization's guest houses in Kabul and Kandahar, where it was his duty to help inspire and train new recruits to undertake terrorist operations against the United States. It was at this point, al-Bahri says, that he started having second thoughts about Al Qaeda, not because he doubted its mission, but because he wasn't convinced these recruits were prepared to carry it out.

Jihad, it occurred to al-Bahri, had evolved from a genuine religious mission to a cattle call for any and all Muslims. Even years later, having renounced terrorism, he seemed irritated by what he characterized as Al Qaeda's failures of management. "We were getting young people who were not committed to jihad, also very young people, 15 or 16 years old," he told me. "What could we do with them? I said we should accept only religious young people. Only the religious understand what jihad means. But my voice was not being heard." Al-Bahri told me that bin Laden knew he was becoming disillusioned, and that's why he encouraged him and Hamdan to marry sisters in 1999; in al-Bahri's interpretation, by tying him to Hamdan, who had fewer options and was thus less likely to leave, bin Laden would have a better chance of keeping al-Bahri in the fold.

During the summer of 2000, Hamdan and al-Bahri came back to Sana for a brother-in-law's wedding. Within a matter of weeks, several Qaeda operatives in a small boat filled with explosives rammed the U.S.S. Cole, which was on a refueling stop in Yemen. Shortly after the attack, Yemeni intelligence agents started rounding up suspected extremists. Al-Bahri tried to flee but was arrested at the airport trying to return to Afghanistan. Hamdan had already taken his wife and her parents on a pilgrimage to Mecca, and word quickly reached him in Saudi Arabia that if he came back to Yemen he'd be picked up, too. Instead, he went back to bin Laden, taking his wife with him.

In the wake of Sept. 11, al-Bahri told me, three F.B.I. agents came to the prison where he was being held in Yemen to interrogate him. The transcripts from their interviews are classified, but al-Bahri says they were mainly interested in the structure and ideology of Al Qaeda. Asked if bin Laden had access to chemical or nuclear weapons, al-Bahri replied that bin Laden had something far more powerful: men who are determined to complete their covenant with God and carry out martyrdom operations against the United States.

Detainees' lawyers estimate that there are currently about 100 Yemeni prisoners in Guantánamo. If even a fraction of this many Americans had been imprisoned in a foreign country for four years, the vast majority without charges, there would be a national outcry. In Yemen, however, most of the detainees' families are completely in the dark. Half of the people in the country are illiterate. Those who can read find few stories about Guantánamo. Many of the papers are state-run, and the rest are under intense pressure to toe the government line. President Saleh knows that drawing attention to the detainees would only further inflame anti-American sentiments and in so doing create more problems for him.

A Yemeni human rights group called HOOD has a rough list of Yemenis who are being held at Guantánamo and has made contact with some of their relatives, but the families are not in communication with anyone in the U.S. government. The detainees' defense lawyers periodically come to Yemen to meet with the families who have authorized them to represent their relatives, though in some cases the detainees themselves doubt their American lawyers' good intentions. While I was in Yemen, I spent several days visiting the families of detainees with David H. Remes, a partner at the Washington firm Covington & Burling, which represents 17 of the Yemenis at Guantánamo. Remes prefaced several of his meetings by saying that their sons, brothers or husbands would be very angry if they knew he was there.

Hamdan, too, sent word through his lawyers that he didn't want me to contact his family, but I was able to get in touch with his wife's brother, Muhammad al-Qala, through HOOD. Al-Qala, a staff sergeant in the Yemeni army, invited me to his home to meet his sister, Hamdan's wife, Um Fatima. Since her husband's arrest, she and her two daughters have been living with her brother, his family and their mother in a cramped two-story stone house in central Sana. Hamdan's lawyers came to Yemen about a year and a half ago to see her, and the lawyer's interpreter is in fairly regular contact with al-Qala, but no one whom Hamdan left behind seems to have any real sense of the gravity of his situation or the significance of his case: what could a superpower like the United States possibly want with Salim?

Sitting perfectly straight on the shiny, floral-patterned blue floor cushions that lined the small upstairs living room in her brother's home, Um Fatima spoke for three hours through an interpreter about her husband. Al-Qala, a stocky man with a dark mustache and glassy, expressionless eyes, sat beside her chain-smoking Marlboros and working on a big wad of khat. Um Fatima and Hamdan's two daughters, 6 and 4, raced in and out in T-shirts and sweatpants. Um Fatima's full-length covering revealed only her eyes, but the difficulty of talking about her husband was evident; several times, she became so upset that she had to excuse herself and leave the room.

DOJ_NMG_0008666

Um Fatima and Hamdan were married in Sana in 1999. She had not met him before their wedding day but was nevertheless a happy bride. They stayed in Sana for a few months before returning to Afghanistan. Um Fatima was reluctant to go, and was shocked at the conditions once they arrived. Their mud-brick home had dirt floors and no running water or electricity. It was also remote: Tarnak Farms, the walled Qaeda complex in which they lived, was tucked into a vast expanse of treeless desert and brush about 30 minutes outside Kandahar. Um Fatima's days were spent alone inside the house with her infant daughter. Hamdan, she told me, would return in the early evenings, often with clothes stained with grease from his work fixing the various cars and trucks used on the farm. Um Fatima said she would occasionally complain to him about their life there. "Salim would always tell me to be patient, that someday we would return to Yemen," she said.

In her telling, Um Fatima was doing hardship duty for a few years so that her husband could earn good money working for a sheik she'd never heard of. Even now, years later, the fact that she had lived inside the walls of a heavily fortified Qaeda compound while her husband worked for the most infamous terrorist of our time does not seem to have penetrated her version of reality.

Um Fatima last saw her husband on Nov. 24, 2001. She was eight months pregnant. At the time, U.S. forces were closing in on Kandahar, the Taliban's last stronghold in Afghanistan. Hamdan, who had been away for a couple of months with bin Laden, had recently returned to take Um Fatima and their daughter to Pakistan. In a borrowed car, with American B-52's circling the skies overhead, they made their way through the Maruf mountains toward the border. Hamdan decided to let Um Fatima cross into Pakistan alone; security was tight, and even if the border guards had no idea that he worked for bin Laden, being a Yemeni man trying to leave was enough to cause suspicion. He told her he would find another way through and come find her in a few days.

Over the course of the next few weeks, as Um Fatima traveled deeper into Pakistan in the back of a pickup truck with a group of Afghan refugees, she gradually lost hope that she would ever see her husband again. Entering her ninth month of pregnancy, she became so hysterical, she told me, that some sympathetic strangers in Karachi bought her a plane ticket home. At the airport in Sana, she was interrogated for five hours about her husband's whereabouts. Um Fatima said she assumed he was dead.

Two and a half months later, she received a letter from him on International Committee of the Red Cross stationery. "My sweetheart, peace and blessings be upon you," it began. "I did not die. Allah prescribed a new life for me. Now I am a detainee with the Americans.. . ."

Um Fatima showed me all of the letters she has received from Hamdan since then. Later that night, the interpreter who read the dozen or so letters to me told me how unusual they were. Yemeni men tend to be commanding and aloof with their wives. Hamdan's letters were emotive, like those of a longing schoolboy. There are drawings of his dagger ("please take care of my jambiya for me"), simple poems ("the bird danced and the bird sang. . .") and the promise to "see each other very, very, very, very, very soon, God willing."

In a three-page military order issued on Nov. 13, 2001, President Bush authorized the special tribunals before which Salim Hamdan and other non-American enemy combatants are to be tried. The trials will held in Guantánamo before panels of three to seven military officers selected by an administration appointee. Two-thirds of a majority will be required for non-death-penalty convictions. (A death sentence requires unanimity.) These are war-crimes tribunals, though unlike the recent international tribunals in Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia, the list of offenses pertain to acts of terrorism rather than genocide.

The administration opted for these special tribunals over the U.S. criminal courts for a number of practical reasons. Broadly speaking, certain rights that would be considered fundamental in a civilian court wouldn't apply. If defendants were suspected terrorists, for instance, they couldn't very well be permitted to see all the evidence against them as some of it would no doubt be classified for national-security reasons.

Practical considerations aside, the creation of the nation's first war-crimes tribunals since World War II sent a symbolic message, putting the war against Islamic extremism in the same class as the war against Nazism. Moreover, the tribunals fit with the Bush administration's larger strategy to reassert and expand presidential authority in the aftermath of 9/11. The executive branch would have complete control. Not only was Congress - the body empowered by the Constitution to convene military tribunals - left out of the decision to establish them, but it also wasn't consulted on how the tribunals would work. Instead, the administration's lawyers wrote all of the rules, from the composition of the panels to the standards for admissible evidence to the definition of a war crime. The judiciary branch was also cut out of the process: contested verdicts would be reviewed not by a federal court of appeals but by a three-member panel picked by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

The first batch of defendants for the tribunals, Hamdan and three others, were carefully selected and then repeatedly vetted on their journey up the chain of command. Case summaries were passed from the military lawyers assigned to the prosecution team to the Pentagon's adviser for the tribunals to Paul D. Wolfowitz, then deputy defense secretary, to President Bush. Hamdan was originally slated to be the first Arab tried.

DOJ_NMG_0008667

While the government has not accused Hamdan of being a member of Al Qaeda per se, it does say that he picked up and delivered weapons for use by Qaeda associates, trained at a Qaeda camp and served as a bodyguard and driver for bin Laden. The formal charge being brought against him is conspiracy, which the administration defines as having "joined an enterprise of persons who shared a common criminal purpose." In a sense, the conspiracy charge is a logical one for prosecuting members of organizations like Al Qaeda that deliberately subdivide tasks and inform very few people about operations. "To capture the nature of some enterprises, to deconstruct what makes them effective, you have to focus on the different kinds of contributions, from the target spotter to the weapons transporter to the financier," says Ruth Wedgwood, a law professor at Johns Hopkins who helped the Pentagon revise some of the rules for the tribunals.

In the U.S. criminal courts, conspiracy is especially popular among prosecutors going after organized-crime rings; it gives them leverage to lean on foot soldiers to testify against their superiors. In the context of war-crimes tribunals, however, conspiracy becomes more complicated. Because it can be applied to people at every level, it can create a moral equivalence between low-level players and leaders. This very issue came up at Nuremberg, when an assistant attorney general in the Roosevelt administration attacked a Pentagon proposal to file conspiracy charges against German foot soldiers because it might, in the world's eyes, weaken the impact of the charges against the Nazi leaders. (The proposal was never adopted.) What's more, because conspiracy is such a broad, catch-all charge, it's an easy one for prosecutors to fall back on when their proof of guilt is thin. The U.S. criminal-court system has numerous protections against this - jury trials, judges who are insulated from politics, access to an independent court of appeals - most of which are absent from the tribunals. "In the American criminal system, we can have a conspiracy doctrine because we have this unique set of vibrant protections," says Neal Katyal, a Georgetown law professor, the architect of Hamdan's lawsuit against the Bush administration and a champion of the conspiracy charge in the criminal context. "But when it comes to war-crimes trials, the international consensus is that conspiracy is a no-no. When the U.S. Congress itself defined war crimes in two statutes in 1996 and 1997, it didn't include conspiracy."

Brig. Gen. Thomas L. Hemingway, an Air Force judge advocate general who is currently serving as the Pentagon's adviser on the tribunals, wouldn't discuss the government's evidence against Hamdan other than to point out that the prosecution has already given the defense 18,000 pages of discovery, including incriminating photographs and summaries of Hamdan's numerous statements to interrogators. "You want a one-word characterization of the case against Hamdan?" General Hemingway asked me. "Solid."

The government is certainly aware that the first trials will be closely scrutinized, and it seems improbable that it would choose a case that wasn't airtight. Hamdan's story also has narrative appeal. Unlike the vast majority of enemy combatants, who came to Afghanistan with the cresting wave of jihadis after 1999, he worked for bin Laden from 1996 until his capture in November 2001, a stretch of time that spanned not just 9/11 but also the 1998 attacks on two U.S. embassies in East Africa and the 2000 bombing of the U.S.S. Cole. And while many jihadis never even met bin Laden, Hamdan has not disputed working directly for him. A skilled prosecutor could turn his trial into the history of Al Qaeda's decade-long war against America and in so doing illuminate the nature of our enemy; the tribunals will be open to the press, except for when classified evidence is presented. Whatever evidence the government may have against Hamdan, it's hard to believe he could have worked for bin Laden for five years, through several high-profile terrorist attacks, without the knowledge of Al Qaeda's intentions or bin Laden's trust. And given that he has admitted to being a driver, the progression to transporting weapons is hardly a leap.

Yet it seems clear that Hamdan was not a high-ranking officer of Al Qaeda. By the time the United States decided to try him in 2003, there were certainly people in custody suspected of more serious crimes. Why not prosecute the more heinous offenders first? The government won't discuss how it settled on Hamdan, but it's easy to make some logical inferences. It stands to reason that the more hard-core the suspected terrorist, the more useful the information he possessed. The government may not have been done questioning the "highest value" detainees when it decided to issue its first indictments. (Hamdan's once-regular interrogations, which started almost immediately after his arrest and continued for the better part of two years, ceased in early 2004, shortly before the government announced that he'd been selected for trial.) The United States was also entering uncharted waters with the tribunals; terrorism is not yet codified as a war crime in international law. It's possible that the government wanted to wait to try its most prized detainees until it had the opportunity to test its legal theories on smaller players.

The treatment of the prisoners may have been a factor as well. Lawyers for the administration had long since built their legal defense of coercive interrogations. Nevertheless, for the first tribunals the government may have wanted "clean" - as in not mistreated or tortured - defendants, both to avoid embarrassment and to prevent issues about the veracity of their statements to interrogators. This, however, is not a point that Hamdan's lawyers intend to concede. Hamdan has already implied in an affidavit that some of his statements were coerced. He says he was punched and kicked after failing to answer certain questions, and that one of his interrogators placed a pistol on the table between them during their sessions.

In late November, a few weeks after the Supreme Court agreed to hear Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, Hamdan was moved from his regular cellblock in Camp Delta to a separate, smaller cellblock called Tango. When his lawyers learned about the development in early December, they were not pleased. Not only had Hamdan's relocation violated the explicit order of a federal judge that he be kept among the general population at Delta, but he also would be right next to Ali Hamza Ahmed Sulayman al-Bahlul, a supposed Qaeda propagandist with a reputation for turning other detainees against their U.S. attorneys. "He's getting put with a known advocate for firing lawyers - against a federal order - and I don't even get told about it?" Katyal's co-counsel, Navy Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift, told me after Hamdan's move. Swift and Katyal promptly filed an emergency motion to have their client returned to a normal cellblock, and the authorities at Guantánamo complied.

DOJ_NMG_0008668

Many detainees assume that their lawyers are American spies, a suspicion fed by the fact that nearly every document or letter that they bring in or take out of the camp has to pass through military censors. Hamdan's lawyers say they have a good relationship with him; still, they worry about losing him to what they consider to be the prison's more radical element. So while Katyal plots strategy from his office near Capitol Hill in Georgetown, Swift, a voluble, boyish-looking 44-year-old Navy JAG, shuttles back and forth to Guantánamo Bay with their interpreter, Charles Schmitz, a soft-spoken professor of geography and an expert in Yemeni culture, to reassure their client that they are on his side and to persuade him to have faith in a legal system that he doesn't understand.

It was hard enough for Swift, who was appointed by the government, to earn Hamdan's confidence when he first started meeting with him - in his Navy uniform - in early 2004; he now finds himself having to constantly earn it back. As the indefinite detentions of hundreds of Muslim men, many of whom were already predisposed to Islamic extremism, enters its fifth year, Guantánamo is turning into an anti-American hothouse. For the government, the radicalization of Guantánamo is a complicated issue. The main form of protest in the camps is the hunger strike, and a prisoner's starving himself to death would turn Guantánamo, already a public-relations problem, into a full-scale disaster. (As of Dec. 30, more than 30 detainees had been hospitalized and were being force-fed.) Radicalization also undermines one of the principal goals of imprisonment: deterrence. As Guantánamo's critics like to say, "If you weren't a terrorist when you went in, you will be when you're let out."

But radicalization has its advantages for the Bush administration too. Last summer, some detainees told their American lawyers that they would no longer meet with them, and a number went so far as to formally fire them. The government considers the legions of adversarial defense attorneys working pro bono for the detainees - from corporate lawyers to human-rights lawyers to law professors - to be an impediment to their ability to prosecute the war on terror. Among other things, the lawyers have filed hundreds of habeas corpus petitions in order to challenge their clients' continued detention without recourse.

More broadly, radicalization helps validate Guantánamo's existence. The more anti-American the detainees become, the greater the danger they pose and thus the more necessary it is to continue to detain them. So when Swift first heard about the decision to move Hamdan next to al-Bahul, he wondered whether it wasn't deliberate. "If they succeed in radicalizing Salim," he said, "then they've justified his trial." (The Pentagon would not comment on why an individual detainee might have been moved.)

Last August, Hamdan joined a prisonwide hunger strike to protest the conditions on Guantánamo. The detainees' numerous demands included the return of religious books that had been taken from them. When Swift next visited Hamdan in late August, he found him unusually intransigent. For two days, Hamdan refused to meet with him altogether. Not long after Swift returned home to Northern Virginia, he got a call from another lawyer at Guantánamo informing him that Hamdan, a slight man to begin with, had passed out from dehydration in his cell and was taken to the medical clinic at Delta and put on an IV drip. Swift flew back down to Guantánamo Bay almost immediately and managed to persuade Hamdan to start eating again by appealing to the same sense of solidarity that he says prompted him to join the strike in the first place. The best way to help his fellow detainees, Swift told him, was not to martyr himself but to follow through on their challenge to the system.

Like the government, Hamdan's lawyers also see him as much more than a detainee; to them, he represents the pretext for a historic and unconstitutional presidential power grab. As Hamdan's lawyers and other critics see it, the administration, by unilaterally creating the tribunals, defining the offenses and handpicking the panels, is not only denying detainees fair trials, it is also violating bedrock principles of the American government. To put an even finer point on it, they say the Bush administration is undermining the very values it purports to be defending in its war against Islamic extremism. They would like to see Hamdan and other enemy combatants tried before a traditional military court, a pre-existing legal system approved by Congress with built-in provisions for the complications that arise during wartime.

Katyal, who served as Vice President Gore's co-counsel in the suit over the 2000 election, draws a sharp distinction between waging war, an act over which the president should have broad authority, and meting out justice. And so, working at his own expense with research support from a loose network of law students from Georgetown, Yale and the University of Michigan along with attorneys from the law firm Perkins Coie, Katyal has written more than a thousand pages of briefs arguing that the president has neither the authority to create the tribunals without explicit Congressional approval nor the right to deny Hamdan status as a prisoner of war, and in so doing strip him of protections guaranteed by the Geneva Conventions. "The Geneva Conventions were written precisely to make it difficult for political leaders facing political pressure to suspend basic rights and

DOJ_NMG_0008669

P.O.W. protections," Katyal says. "The moment we let a president say he can determine whether someone is a prisoner of war, other countries are going to start doing it back to us."

Katyal's arguments found traction in federal court in Washington in the fall of 2004. Just as Hamdan's second round of preliminary hearings were getting under way at Guantánamo, Judge James Robertson, a former Naval officer, ruled in his favor, declaring the tribunals illegal and abruptly halting the proceedings 30 minutes after they had begun. In July 2005, however, a three-judge appeals panel that included John G. Roberts Jr., now chief justice of the Supreme Court, overturned the decision. Katyal and Swift petitioned the Supreme Court for review, and in November, after delaying action on the case for several weeks, the court announced that it would hear Hamdan v. Rumsfeld.

This was not the final word, though. No sooner had the Supreme Court agreed to consider Hamdan's case than a Republican senator from South Carolina, Lindsey Graham, introduced a last-minute amendment to a defense-authorization bill explicitly denying all Guantánamo detainees habeas corpus rights, or access to the U.S. federal courts. This had been the administration's intent from the moment it started sketching out its legal strategy in the war on terror in the aftermath of 9/11, but the last time the issue came before the Supreme Court, in the spring of 2004 in another detainee case, the court ruled against the president (with a loud dissent from Justice Scalia). Now Graham was effectively interceding on the administration's behalf in what amounted to an end run around the Supreme Court.

Days later, however, Senator Carl Levin, a Michigan Democrat, persuaded Graham to change the wording of the amendment so that it would not derail pending cases, including Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. It has since passed both the House and the Senate and at press time awaited the president's signature.

What about the hundreds of detainees who have not yet filed suits protesting their imprisonments? Aside from trial or continuing detention, the only option for the United States is to send them back to their respective nations. To date, it has released about 260 men, including a handful of Yemenis, all of whom remain in prison in Yemen, no doubt at the behest of the Bush administration. But Yemen is an unpredictable ally. In November, the United States suspended it from an aid program worth hundreds of millions of dollars, citing enduring governmental corruption, fiscal irresponsibility and the failure to enact democratic reform. Meanwhile, Islamic fundamentalism continues to gather strength in Yemen. Recently, three of the country's best-known extremists, including al-Zindani, one of bin Laden's spiritual mentors, called for a new coalition dedicated to confronting Islam's enemies and promoting Muslim values. The ongoing detention of 100 Yemenis at Guantánamo Bay may only help their cause and increase their leverage with President Saleh. So the United States finds itself trapped between two unappealing choices: hold these men as the potentially endless war against terrorism goes on, or return them to a breeding ground for Islamic radicalism in Yemen.

For his part, Hamdan's immediate concerns have more to do with day-to-day life at Guantánamo Bay - how much time detainees are permitted to exercise and at what time of day, what books they are allowed to read, what comfort items they are allowed to keep in their cells - than with the future of his historic lawsuit against the United States government. As Schmitz, his interpreter, told me recently, "The most important thing to him is what we can deliver in the camp, and that is zip."

Shortly after the Supreme Court agreed to hear Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, Swift visited Hamdan's cell armed with several front-page newspaper articles about the development. When Swift delivered the news, Hamdan smiled. Within a matter of minutes, though, his mood had visibly darkened, Swift says. Then Hamdan asked him, "What is this exactly that I've won?"

Germany's Merkel Says Guantanamo Should Be Shut (REU)

By Karin Strohecker

Reuters, January 8, 2006

BERLIN (Reuters) - German Chancellor Angela Merkel, in an interview published days before her first visit to the United States, said Washington should close its Guantanamo Bay prison camp and find other ways of dealing with terror suspects.

"An institution like Guantanamo can and should not exist in the longer term," Merkel said in an interview with the weekly magazine Der Spiegel published on Saturday. "Different ways and means must be found for dealing with these prisoners."

Merkel has vowed to repair ties with the United States, severely strained over the U.S.-led Iraq invasion, which her predecessor Gerhard Schroeder strongly opposed.

But her comments to Der Spiegel -- also covering ties with Moscow and the European Union -- suggested she would not shy away from speaking out on issues where disagreement exists.

There is widespread skepticism in Germany about the way the United States is fighting its "war on terror", compounded by the recent scandal over the CIA's abduction and detention of German citizen Khaled el-Masri -- later acknowledged to be a mistake.

Guantanamo Bay, the U.S. detention center in Cuba denounced by human rights activists and many governments, is deeply unpopular in Germany.

DOJ_NMG_0008670

Merkel travels to Washington next week for her first visit since becoming chancellor in November, and will meet U.S. President George W. Bush on Friday.

Merkel told Der Spiegel she expected to speak to Bush about the fight against terrorism. "But I want to accentuate that our relationship with the U.S. will not be reduced to talking about fighting terrorism and the Iraq war," she added.

NO FRIENDSHIP WITH RUSSIA

Merkel described relations with the United States as a "friendship", but said the term "strategic partnership" would be more fitting to describe Germany's relationship with Moscow.

"I don't think we share as many of the same values yet with Russia as we do with the United States," she said. "But we have a huge interest in seeing Russia develop in a sensible way."

Merkel, who will meet President Vladimir Putin in Moscow days after her Washington trip, often criticized Schroeder when she was in opposition for forging "exclusive" ties with Russia at the expense of relations with smaller EU countries.

In the interview she said developments like the new law giving the Kremlin more control over non-governmental organizations worried her, while the recent row between Ukraine and Russia over gas prices, which has made Germans question their own heavy reliance on Russia for gas, had reinforced the need for stable relations.

"We need to do everything to save as much energy as possible and diversify our sources," she said, adding that Germany would avoid letting Russia be its only supplier.

Supplies to the 25-nation EU, which imports a quarter of its gas from Russia, were hit after Russian gas monopoly Gazprom cut deliveries to Ukraine on January 1 to push its demand for a fourfold price rise. The two neighbors reached a compromise 5-year supply deal earlier this week.

On the European Union, Merkel said the issue of the bloc's constitution could be tackled when Germany took over the EU presidency in 2007, though much groundwork was needed.

"We need to have an all-encompassing discussion again," Merkel said. "I think it would be good if Europe stayed with the thought of having a constitution. I will lobby for that."

Learning Languages (WP)

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

WITH A CERTAIN amount of fanfare Thursday, President Bush launched the National Security Language Initiative, designed to expand Americans' knowledge of critical foreign languages such as Arabic, Chinese, Russian, Hindi and Farsi. Before a group of 120 university presidents, he described learning foreign languages as a "kind gesture" toward other cultures, as well as an important facet of American security: "We need intelligence officers who, when somebody says something in Arabic or Farsi or Urdu, knows what they're talking about."

We applaud Mr. Bush's sentiments, though the lateness and modesty of this initiative are perplexing. It has been clear for more than four years, since Sept. 11, 2001, that Americans are horrifically deficient in knowledge about those parts of the world that now most threaten us, as well as about those that may pose important security challenges in the future. Yet the initiative will receive funding only in the 2007 budget -- if, of course, Congress approves. Although the State Department issued a fact sheet describing the new program's impressive goals, department officials conceded that only 15 public schools in this country teach Arabic at the moment. Although 200 million Chinese students study English, there are also only about 2,000 teachers of Chinese in the United States. There's a long way to go.

Department officials also referred to the launch of Sputnik, the first Soviet satellite, whose appearance in the sky inspired national concern about the "knowledge gap" between the United States and the Soviet Union and a new emphasis on science and Russian-language education in this country. Sputnik was launched in 1957. President Dwight D. Eisenhower signed the National Defense Education Act, which funded science education, in 1958. He also set up the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in 1958 -- a year after Sputnik, not four or five. The administration should move as fast as possible to make up for lost time.

PATRIOT ACT:

Time To Ask: Who Are We? (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

President Bush concentrated in recent speeches on answering a question key to his war on global terrorism: Who is the enemy? But events and institutions conspire now to force Bush and all Americans to address a different question: Who are we?

DOJ_NMG_0008671

Are we a nation in which the rule of law prevails even in times of emergency? Or has the coming of a new millennium, new technologies and the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, altered the underlying values and norms of American society in ways we have not had time to understand, much less codify?

Such broad questions peek out of the rising challenges from Congress, the courts, the media and others to Bush's insistence on the need for greater secrecy and far-reaching presidential powers to counter wartime dangers.

The Supreme Court is not likely to address those societal questions directly when it decides in the near future on the imprisonment, without access to the courts, of Jose Padilla, an American citizen as well as an al Qaeda suspect. And newspaper exposs on secret CIA prisons abroad and warrantless surveillance by the National Security Agency at home don't pose those big thoughts upfront. But the undercurrent of a historic identity check runs through those and other recent events.

The sense of a restoring of balance could be glimpsed even in the case of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, which in its own squalid way suggests the ending of a particularly self-indulgent moment in Washington history.

Eras flash by with startling velocity in today's hyper-connected, hyper-informed global society. The first five-year slice of the 21st century came to an end last weekend as Abramoff was striking a bargain with prosecutors to plead guilty to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy charges. Coincidence? Or a wave of excess cresting and starting to recede? Here's why I think it is the latter:

A millennium mentality -- a psychological bubble in which people convince themselves that things are suddenly and irrevocably different, that old rules and laws don't apply to this particular moment/decade/generation -- dominated and helped corrupt the years on both sides of the changing of the century. Think of it as the too-many-zeroes syndrome.

That attitudinal matrix -- Germans call it zeitgeist -- spread across and out of the U.S. stock market and then hung on longer in global politics and business, especially after Sept. 11 and the U.S. response suggested that the world had spun onto a different, far more threatening axis.

Americans demanded that President Bush change the world and the nation, with Congress forcing an ill-conceived Department of Homeland Security on the administration and passing the USA Patriot Act in a whatever-it-takes rush. Bush and Vice President Cheney, it must be said, were eager to go in that direction anyway -- and have stayed on it longer than many in Congress, the media or the courts seem able or willing to sustain in the absence of new attacks at home.

Laws are not immutable. What is reasonable behavior, by the state or by individuals, changes as circumstances change. Courts exist to decide that. But the acceptance of the rule of law serves to root societies in their most innate and entrenched values. In times of significant upheaval -- such as these times -- the rule of law anchors what should not be changed in haste and superficiality.

The Padilla case is a good illustration of what I mean. Padilla was arrested in 2002 under suspicion of plotting to set off a "dirty" radioactive device in Chicago. Designated by Bush as an enemy combatant, he was held for three years without charges and for much of that time without access to counsel.

He turns out to have been a much smaller and less dangerous fish, according to charges finally filed against him in late November. That the Justice Department did not move much more quickly -- and less grudgingly -- to extend him his constitutional rights undercuts the administration's claim that it does everything in its power to respect the rule of law consistent with national security.

What happened in the Padilla case amounts to disrespect for the rule of law -- as does the failure over four years to amend the 1978 federal statute that prohibits warrantless eavesdropping.

Such disrespect for established legal tradition is a clear if implicit statement from the president and his aides about whom they think Americans are becoming in this stressful era of change and danger. But it is a question they alone will not get to settle.

jimhoagland@washpost.com

Editorial: How To Fix The Patriot Act: Maintain Checks And Balances On Government (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, January 8, 2006

President Bush assembled an impressive coterie of federal prosecutors at the White House last week to step up pressure on Congress to reauthorize the Patriot Act and to chide lawmakers for postponing a decision on the anti-terror legislation to early next month.

Make no mistake. The Patriot Act is an essential tool in this nation's defense strategy, particularly because it gives intelligence agencies the authority to share vital information about suspected terrorists and their activities. The president is right to push for Congress to do more than kick the can down the road.

But House leadership and the president are pushing a version of the legislation that fails to strike a proper balance between protecting America and infringing on civil liberties. These significant shortcomings must – and can – be fixed.

DOJ_NMG_0008672

To its credit, the current version would allow the most controversial provisions to lapse again in four years, giving Congress and the American public another opportunity to assess the Patriot Act's impact on the war on terror and civil liberties. A periodic discussion about the scope and effectiveness of emergency anti-terror powers is a crucial part of maintaining checks on the power of the executive branch.

That's why Congress included the review provision when it authorized the Patriot Act in the shadow of the 9-11 attacks. The recent controversy over domestic spying illustrates why these checks and balances are mandatory.

In other areas, the legislation doesn't meet the bar on protecting civil liberties. These changes should be made before passage:

Section 213

The current Patriot Act allows the government to conduct sneak-and-peek searches (also known, along with section 215, as the library provision) of homes and businesses without notice. The version the House leadership and the president are pushing would require notification within 30 days of the search and require the government to provide the court with updates before the notification delay can be extended. The government would be required to publicly report on the use of delayed-notice search warrants.

We recommend requiring the government to notify a person of a search within seven days, subject to special circumstance extensions, to better protect civil liberties.

Section 215

Under the Patriot Act, the government can use a secret court order to obtain copies of private medical, financial, educational and other records without connecting that person to terrorism. The government has only to assert that the information sought is relevant; the organization receiving the request is effectively barred from challenging the order or talking about it.

The version that the House leadership wants requires high-level approval for requests for sensitive categories of records such as library records and medical records, and it permits a judge to deny or modify a government request.

The measure also requires public reporting of the number of section 215 orders; certain additional classified reporting to congressional committees; and auditing by the Inspector General of the Justice Department's use of section 215.

We recommend also adding a provision requiring the government to connect a person to terrorism before combing through records and finding a more effective way for targets to challenge government assertions. These additional safeguards will discourage far-reaching fishing expeditions that could entangle innocent Americans.

National Security Letters

Most criminal investigations require a judge to authorize law enforcement to obtain documents or conduct searches. Not so with the National Security Letter, which allows government investigators to examine the records of suspected threats without first obtaining court approval.

We recommend meaningful court oversight of this process, to avoid the potential for abuse.

Extraneous provisions

The version that the House and president are backing includes new anti-drug policies and ex post facto changes to death penalty law that in some instances are unrelated to terrorism.

We recommend removing these changes, which are controversial on their face. The Patriot Act should be a clean, unfettered bill, not a repository for pet legislation.

Most of the Patriot Act should not worry Americans, who understand that civil liberties – especially in a time of national emergency – aren't without limits.

The common-sense revisions outlined here to provide clear and fair due process would shore up the concerns of all but the most ideologically driven civil libertarians.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Hurricane Fraud Suspects Held (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 8, 2006

A federal task force has arrested 143 persons nationwide for bribery, extortion and fraudulent claims on hurricane disaster funding, and at least 1,000 investigations are ongoing in New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0008673

"Unfortunately, we see it with every disaster, but we're working very closely with the inspector general and Homeland Security and U.S. attorneys to prosecute every single case we come across," said Nicol Andrews, Federal Emergency Management Agency spokeswoman.

Most of the cases involve false claims to aid earmarked for victims of hurricanes Katrina and Rita, but several extortion cases already are in the court system.

In St. Tammany Parish outside New Orleans, Councilman Joe Impastato was indicted last month on charges of extortion and money laundering.

Federal officials say Mr. Impastato pressured one debris removal contractor to hire a second contractor with whom he would share in half the profits. When the prime contractor declined, the official threatened to withhold parish payments for other work.

U.S. Attorney Jim Letten called the indictment "a clear and unambiguous signal of federal law enforcement's commitment to seek out, punish and deter corrupt and self-serving conduct by public officials who use their positions to unjustly enrich themselves at the expense of the citizens they serve."

In Georgia, three persons have been indicted by a grand jury for pretending to be Red Cross officials to solicit donations, and in a related gambling operation to sell tickets for a fake lottery to raise money for Katrina victims.

The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force created by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales after the storms devastated the Gulf Coast is investigating and prosecuting disaster-related federal crimes such as identity theft, procurement, insurance and charity fraud.

A Justice Department spokesman said arrests in 117 separate cases spanned 22 different districts.

In addition, the Homeland Security Inspector General's office is reviewing an estimated 350 contracts worth nearly $5 billion, and investigating more than 300 possible criminal cases, which so far have netted 51 arrests, 67 indictments and five convictions.

More than 7,000 calls have been logged on the inspector's general hot line to report fraud.

All Parts Of New Orleans Included In Rebuilding Plan (NYT)

By Gary Rivlin

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 7 - The city's official blueprint for redevelopment after Hurricane Katrina, to be released on Wednesday, will recommend that residents be allowed to return and rebuild anywhere they like, no matter how damaged or vulnerable the neighborhood, according to several members of the mayor's rebuilding commission.

The proposal appears to put the city's rebuilding panel on a collision course with its state counterpart, which will control at least some of the flow of federal rebuilding money to the city.

The primary author of the plan, Joseph C. Canizaro, said teams of outside experts would try to help residents of each neighborhood decide whether to rebuild or relocate. Those teams would help increase the odds of success for those residents who decided to return, Mr. Canizaro said.

The commission will propose that the city should discourage homeowners from rebuilding in the hardest hit areas until a plan can be hammered out, but will not forbid them from doing so.

But ultimately, the areas that fail to attract a critical mass of residents in 12 months will probably not survive as residential neighborhoods, Mr. Canizaro said, and are likely to end up as marshland as the city's population declines and its footprint shrinks.

People who rebuild in those areas will be forced to leave, according to the proposal. Though such a requirement would be emotionally wrenching, the commission will propose a buyout program to compensate those people at the market price before Hurricane Katrina, but it is not clear whether there will be federal financing for such a program.

Assuming the commission's recommendations are formally adopted by Mayor C. Ray Nagin, the plan will defer for a year one of the most contentious issues in the city's struggle to recover from the flooding that followed the hurricane: the fate of the most heavily damaged and flood-prone neighborhoods.

Many residents of low-lying neighborhoods like the Lower Ninth Ward and New Orleans East have said they are determined to rebuild their ravaged blocks, while some experts have argued that such areas are better returned to marshland for safety and economic reasons. Some civic leaders who had hoped the mayor's panel, the 17-member Bring Back New Orleans Commission, would take a firm stand on the issue expressed disappointment.

"There are some very tough decisions that have to be made here, and no one relishes making them," said Janet R. Howard, chief executive of the Bureau of Governmental Research, a nonprofit policy organization based in New Orleans. "But to say that people should invest their money and invest their energies and put all their hope into rebuilding and then in a year we'll re-evaluate, that's no plan at all."

DOJ_NMG_0008674

At least one member of the state panel, the Louisiana Recovery Authority, has echoed that sentiment.

"Someone has to be tough, to stand up and to tell the truth," Sean Reilly, a member of the state commission, said in a speech this week. "Every neighborhood in New Orleans will not be able to come back safe."

Andy Kopplin, executive director of the state commission, declined to comment on the specifics of the city's report, which "hasn't been formally presented to us."

But he said his agency, when doling out federal dollars, would favor plans that emphasized safety and the wise use of precious resources.

"We want to make sure they invest in a smart way that provides a good return on investment," Mr. Kopplin said, adding that at the same time plans should be "true to the aspirations of local communities."

Mr. Canizaro, a prominent real estate developer here, acknowledged the possibility that Hurricane Katrina could spell the death of more than one New Orleans neighborhood. He cited a study by the Rand Corporation that estimated that in three years the city would have a population of no more than 275,000, down more than 40 percent from its pre-hurricane population of 465,000.

"It doesn't take a genius to figure if you're only going to have 40 or 50 percent of your original population, then there's going to be shrinking in the amount of land that's going to be needed," Mr. Canizaro said.

Yet deciding which neighborhoods should not be rebuilt involves far more than the cold rationale of geographic and demographic data, Mr. Canizaro said, especially considering the historic racial tensions in New Orleans. The hurricane devastated the lives of white and black alike, but the waters that roared though much of the city disproportionately flooded its predominantly black eastern half.

"Unfortunately, a lot of poor African-Americans had everything they own destroyed here," Mr. Canizaro said. "So we have to be careful about dictating what's going to happen, especially me as a white man. What's important is we give people an opportunity to determine their future, as best we can."

It is not clear, though, that people who choose to return to devastated neighborhoods will find much to surround them. The city has not promised full services to every neighborhood, and there may be no grocery stores or schools for miles.

It is not even certain that lenders will agree to grant mortgages in those neighborhoods without some guarantees that residents will be there for longer than a year.

The final report, as described by several commissioners, will include several ideas designed to stimulate the city's economy and culture, including a proposal to construct a light rail system and a plan to establish New Orleans as a world center of neuroscience research.

The commission will also recommend that the city create a redevelopment authority to serve as a land bank for blighted or abandoned properties and a vehicle through which federal funds will flow.

By creating an independent authority appointed by elected officials in all levels of government, several commissioners said, the hope is to insulate the redevelopment process from politics.

The most contentious issue, however, will be the redevelopment of neighborhoods. That battle began in earnest in November, when the Urban Land Institute, a prominent planning group based in Washington, proposed that the city temporarily ban redevelopment of properties in those areas hardest hit by flooding, including large tracts of New Orleans East, the Lower Ninth Ward and Lakeview.

The suggestion was rejected by residents of those neighborhoods and their political representatives. Last month, the City Council passed a nonbinding resolution stating that residents should be free to rebuild immediately wherever they choose.

The notion that residents have a right to rebuild anywhere proved too starry-eyed for Alden J. McDonald Jr., a member of the mayor's commission and the chief executive of Liberty Bank and Trust, the city's largest black-owned bank. Though most of the bank's customers lived in the most damaged parts of town, and though Mr. McDonald himself owns a home in New Orleans East, he said it would be cruel to encourage people to move back "without first giving them all the facts."

"We really need to ask what kind of community it will be if there aren't adequate services," he said.

Mr. Canizaro, who as chairman of the commission's planning committee has found himself at the center of this debate, floated a compromise proposal at a commission meeting in mid-December: let people rebuild anywhere they want, then re-evaluate progress in three years. That way the market, and not planners, would determine which neighborhoods would come back.

The general sentiment, however, was that three years was too long, so Mr. Canizaro countered by shrinking the evaluation period to a year.

DOJ_NMG_0008675

Critics of his plan say that if the city floods again in the near future, damaging rebuilt neighborhoods in the same places, there will be little sympathy and few federal dollars. But Mr. Canizaro said the prospect of a fortified flood control system, promised by the Bush administration, made him confident that the city would not suffer the same devastation from a storm similar to Hurricane Katrina.

That confidence, however, is not universal. Michael M. Liffmann, the associate executive director of the Louisiana Sea Grant College at Louisiana State University, which studies land-use issues along the Gulf Coast, said most experts agreed that the roughly one-quarter to one-third of the city located dangerously below sea level should not be rebuilt.

"There are parts of New Orleans that are not fit for human habitation," Mr. Liffmann said. "They never were and never will be. But these are as much social calls as they are scientific ones."

Evacuees' Hotel Bill $19 Million FEMA Paid For Housing At Over 650 State Lodges (AJC)

By Yolanda Rodríguez

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 8, 2006

Georgia hotels have billed taxpayers more than $19 million to house evacuees who fled after hurricanes Katrina and Rita ravaged the Gulf Coast last year.

And taxpayers will continue to foot the bill for as long as the Federal Emergency Management Agency continues its policy of housing evacuees in hotels.

So far, the federal agency has spent $325 million on hotel rooms across the nation, and it has been sharply criticized for the high cost of the hotels and for how it has handled the emergency.

Federal officials once hoped to have all evacuees out of hotels by Saturday, but under a federal judge's ruling, FEMA is required to keep the hotel program running until at least Feb. 7.

In Georgia, FEMA paid for rooms at more than 650 hotels — from the Ritz-Carlton in Atlanta, to the Econo Lodge in Decatur, to a $35-a-night room in Lowndes County.

Records obtained by The Atlanta Journal-Constitution through a federal Freedom of Information Act request provide the first public accounting of the local spending.

The records show the rooms averaged $67.47 a night (or more than $2,000 a month) and were booked in Georgia between Oct. 27, when FEMA took over housing evacuees from the American Red Cross, and Dec. 23. Most of the money was spent in metro Atlanta, and FEMA paid for 286,000 bookings.

Those records also show evacuees who arrived in the state were housed just about everywhere:

Some stayed at the Butler Street YMCA in Atlanta, with rooms costing an average $18.12 nightly. FEMA was billed about $1,015 for rooms at the YMCA.

The Ritz-Carlton on Peachtree Road in Buckhead billed FEMA $1,190 for rooms. But those rooms weren't nearly as expensive as one might think. They cost an average of $132.25 nightly, according to the records.

The most expensive rooms were at the Embassy Suites on Peachtree Road in Buckhead. It charged an average $159.46 per room.

According to the FEMA records, the full-service hotel billed the federal government about $81,485.

Gretchen Demetrops, general manager of the Embassy Suites, would not comment on the room charges and referred all questions to the Hilton Hotels Corp. office in Memphis.

In an e-mailed response, Dawn Ray, senior manager for brand communications for Embassy Suites Hotels/Hilton Hotels Corp., said the Embassy Suites "is an upscale hotel brand, and that is a competitive rate for the Atlanta market, particularly in the Buckhead area."

"The hotel did in fact charge a $159 rate for some guests, among a variety of other rates. That was not a discounted rate."

But who decided where evacuees would stay — and how much taxpayers would spend to foot the bill?

Tara Inn tops list

At the Tara Inn & Suites in Jonesboro, the first evacuees began arriving at the hotel Sept. 10, nearly two weeks after Hurricane Katrina hit.

Often, they learned of the 126-room hotel through word of mouth, said Jeff Kashani, the owner.

By Dec. 23, according to the records, FEMA had spent more at the Tara Inn & Suites than at any other hotel in the state.

The independently owned hotel billed FEMA about $312,728 — or about $78 per night per room.

According to the hotel's Web site, rooms there start at $59 for a single queen for a Sunday-Thursday stay.

The most expensive room starts at $129 for a king Jacuzzi suite for stays on Fridays and Saturdays.

Kashani said he was surprised to hear that the Tara Inn & Suites topped the list.

DOJ_NMG_0008676

He said the hotel, which began operating in January 2003, charged FEMA the best rates it could — between $59 and $99. He noted that the rooms are suites and have kitchenettes.

Hotel employees also cooked Thanksgiving dinner for the evacuees, and the hotel and its staff donated Christmas gifts for the families, he said.

"We try to be nice," Kashani said.

Felecia Perry, the general manager, said 116 adults and 42 children are still staying at the Tara Inn.

The hotel was packed with evacuees from September through November, Perry said. It maxed out on hurricane evacuees with about 200 people in 60 rooms.

"Our rates are good," Perry said. "We go overboard with extras. We buy groceries and clothing if people are in need."

While some evacuees stayed at the Tara Inn & Suites, others were making reservations at hotels across the state, painting a somewhat disorganized picture of the scramble to suddenly house some of the 43,500 people who arrived in Georgia after they were displaced

Evacuees "were making reservations just like you and me," said Ray, of the Embassy Suites Hotels/Hilton Hotels Corp.

Ray said her hotels charged the federal government "pretty competitive" rates — and the price of the rooms did not go down once FEMA began paying for them.

Cost variation

But what about the wide disparity in room rates?

Mark Woodworth, executive vice president of PKF Consulting, a hotel advisory firm, said that disparity is based on several factors.

"The quality of the property goes a long way to explain the difference in prices and just how full or empty the hotels were at the time these rooms were needed," Woodworth said.

— Staff writers Craig Schneider and Leon Stafford and database editor David A. Milliron contributed to this article.

Katrina Evacuees Seek Jobs, Anchors (LAT)

By Tomas Alex Tizon

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

HOUSTON — The two women never met but probably crossed paths in an abandoned supermarket — now a disaster recovery center — on the south side of town where railroad tracks crisscross the terrain.

Monique Moses and Pauline Gallien spend lots of time at the center, on opposite sides of the partition. Moses is a Hurricane Katrina evacuee from New Orleans. She is looking for a job. Gallien is a longtime Houstonian whose job is to find jobs for people like Moses. Right now, neither is having much success.

Their frustration embodies the question now facing this East Texas metropolis, which took in more evacuees — an estimated 200,000 — than any city outside of Louisiana: What is to be done with the thousands who, with their basic needs met, face the most vital step in their long-term recovery?

"I need to work," says Moses, 26. "I can't be like them that sit on their butts all day. I gotta have something to do. I just don't know if this is the place I can do it."

Before Katrina wrecked her hometown, Moses worked as a shift manager at a Radley's restaurant. Both her apartment and the restaurant were destroyed.

Four months after Katrina, she and her two daughters are resettled in southwest Houston. Her girls, ages 5 and 6, are enrolled in school, and their apartment has most of the accouterments of a home. The only missing piece is a livelihood to keep it all together.

Moses says she has pounded the pavement and filled out applications everywhere: McDonald's, Wendy's and the Home Depot, to name a few places. She has worn her best "customer service" face, smiling until her cheeks hurt. Day after day.

Only one employer, a Jack-in-the-Box, gave her an interview. The manager offered $6 an hour, and Moses told him she needed at least $8 an hour to survive. He never called back.

Her only lifeline has been the disaster-recovery center operated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. She has come to know the building well: a flat, sprawling, swarming place where workers from dozens of organizations stand by to help evacuees on almost every aspect of reestablishing their lives.

Moses has gone there seeking help on numerous fronts — housing, transportation, insurance claims — but never stopped at the cluster of tables devoted to placing people in jobs. Moses, like many evacuees, has never used an employment service.

If she had stopped, she probably would have met Gallien.

Gallien, 40, works for a nonprofit employment agency called the WorkSource, whose main service is matching clients with jobs listed in a database. Gallien's station sits near the front entrance of the FEMA center.

DOJ_NMG_0008677

From 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Saturday, WorkSource staffers sit behind folding tables, equipped with the barest of tools — a notepad, telephone and computer — greeting every evacuee with, "How can I help you?"

Even now, Gallien and her three colleagues see 100 to 130 evacuees a day. Some need help filling out unemployment forms or putting together a resume; many have just moved into more stable housing and are beginning to seek work.

"The typical person we're seeing now is lower-skilled, a menial worker or restaurant worker, with a lower education level, not as strong in the communication skills," Gallien says. "A lot of times they got by doing odd jobs and got paid on the side, so they don't have an employment history."

Gallien says these clients "face a real challenge" in Houston, where about 20% of residents live below the poverty line.

"Houston was full of people with the same backgrounds before the evacuees got here," she says. "For every low-skilled evacuee, there are two Houston people with the same skill level competing for the same job."

A recent federal survey suggests that 21% of Katrina evacuees actively seeking work are still unemployed.

The proportion could be higher in Houston, where the job market, so tied to energy production, remains tight. The city's unemployment rate, roughly 6% in November, has consistently hovered above the national average.

"The folks with skills in the oil and gas industry found jobs," says M. Ray Perryman, head of a Texas economics analysis company. "People who fill low-wage, service- and retail-type jobs — it might take awhile for the economy to absorb them."

A reciprocal relationship has long existed between New Orleans and Houston, 327 miles apart. Houstonians traveled to New Orleans for culture and cuisine; New Orleanians went to Houston for jobs and better schools.

So when the storm hit, and New Orleanians needed a place to go, Houston put out the welcome mat and busloads of evacuees headed in this direction.

Houston, population 2 million, offered the most generous resettlement program of any large U.S. city.

An enormous city-led task force, using a voucher program, paid for 12 months of housing for more than 100,000 evacuees.

In mid-December, Mayor Bill White declared that Houston was "full."

It's not clear whether FEMA will help pay for proposed expansion of city services to handle the increase in population.

The Houston Police Department has requested 400 new officers, school districts have pleaded for additional teachers, and social service agencies have outlined the need for more funding.

But all the talk of expansion may be moot if evacuees don't stay.

As many as 50,000 evacuees have already left the city, according to city officials.

"How many stay depends a lot on how many find jobs," Gallien says. "The answer to that question nobody knows yet."

Moses is mulling over a Plan B. "I can't find work, we can't stay," she says.

She has no emotional tie to Houston — a government-hired bus driver brought her and 50 other evacuees to the Astrodome a day after Katrina. She has been here ever since. She's not sure she even likes this city, which seems to have no real center.

In fact, this flat, humid, sprawling metropolis is the largest U.S. city without zoning laws, and the lack thereof has created numerous indistinct commercial districts and helter-skelter neighborhoods.

The Moses family moved into an apartment complex in the southwest, a once middle-class area turning into a lower-middle-class neighborhood of small, sagging houses. The Pines of Westbury is made up of 940 units divided among cubic two-story brick buildings evenly spaced over 5 acres. Most residents are black or Latino. Katrina evacuees occupy about 90 units.

It's 2:30 in the afternoon, and Moses keeps glancing at her watch.

Her apartment is a hangout for evacuees at the Pines, and she's expecting a small group to come over. She sinks into her couch, lets out a sigh and wonders out loud what happened to all her FEMA money.

"It went fast," she says incredulously.

Aside from the housing voucher that allowed her to move into this complex, she got $2,000 in emergency funds and another $2,358 for move-in costs. The money went toward furniture, clothing and groceries. Then she rented a car for a month to look for work. That cost a grand.

Since then, job-hunting by bus has worn her out.

There's a knock at the door. It's her boyfriend, Lionel Robinson, 35, just back from Laredo, Texas. He lives at the Pines too, just around the corner. Like Moses, Robinson is a New Orleans native who lost everything to Katrina, including a job he treasured. He was a city bus driver making close to $50,000 a year.

Recently Robinson landed a job as a long-haul truck driver making 37 cents a mile. One recent week, he drove only 1,200 miles, including the trip to Laredo, earning $444 before taxes. "Not enough," he says.

He, too, is looking for another job.

Within minutes, Moses' girls come through the door with a neighbor and two young cousins. One of Moses' aunts arrives with a teenage daughter. Hugs and how-are-yous are exchanged. Soon the apartment bustles with chatter.

DOJ_NMG_0008678

The adults gather around the dining table, and the subject quickly turns to the future.

They are all in the same boat: dislocated, scratching for income and feeling uncertain about everything.

"We can't stay here," says evacuee Rosezina Jefferson, Moses' oldest friend from New Orleans. She moved into the Pines with Moses' help. "I might stay here for a minute, but one way or another, I'm going back home."

"There is no more home," Moses says. "Home ain't home no more."

Moses has another idea: road trip.

The others turn silent.

Moses says if she and Robinson don't have good jobs by next summer, she'll take the insurance money she's been waiting for — her car was destroyed by the flood — and use it to pay for a job-seeking, home-finding road trip all over Louisiana.

She'd leave the kids with their father, and she and Jefferson and Robinson would hit the highway for a month. They'd go to smaller cities like Lafayette and Lake Charles, places closer to New Orleans.

"A road trip? For a month?" Jefferson says.

"A road trip," says Robinson, considering the idea.

You must have a plan, Moses says.

And the plan is, "Come June, July, August, we're getting in a car and going. If there's nothing for us here, we'll have to find it somewhere else."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq's Shiites And Kurds Said To Need Sunnis For Coalition (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Jan. 7 - The leading Kurdish and Shiite political groups probably did not win enough seats in last month's national parliamentary elections to form a governing coalition on their own, and will have to persuade some Sunni Arab legislators to join their alliance, a Western diplomat here said Saturday.

It will take a two-thirds majority in the 275-seat Iraqi Parliament to form a new government and appoint an executive branch. Final results from the Dec. 15 election are not expected until later this month, but the dominant Shiite alliance is thought to have won less than half the seats in the new Parliament. The Kurds and Sunni Arabs are believed to have won roughly 20 percent each.

The popular view among political parties here and the Iraqi news media has been that the Shiites and Kurds will likely have enough seats to form a government on their own, if by only a very small margin.

However, the Western diplomat said Saturday that an analysis of preliminary election results indicated that the Shiites and Kurds would need to include others to reach a two-thirds majority.

The preliminary results, the diplomat said, "suggest that together the Shia and the Kurds cannot reach two-thirds by themselves."

"I emphasize those are unofficial returns," the diplomat said. "So far, the trend that you can extrapolate out of the unofficial returns is that it doesn't look like they got it. They need the Sunni votes to get to their two-thirds majority."

Sunni Arabs are not the only non-Kurdish and non-Shiite alliances to gain seats in Parliament. The political slate put together by the former interim prime minister, Ayad Allawi, a secular Shiite, is believed to have won close to 10 percent of the seats.

Even though he is a Shiite, Mr. Allawi has often been at odds with the more conservative and Islamist Shiite leadership, and he is also a former member of the Baath Party. Some members of the governing Shiite coalition have said they would include Sunnis in their government before agreeing to carve out a place for Mr. Allawi.

American officials say that the best hope to stabilize Iraq's shaky security and political situation and help deflate the insurgency is for Sunni Arabs to have a meaningful role in the new government that convinces the Sunni population that they have a voice in how the country is run.

Tensions between Sunni Arabs and the ruling Shiite groups remain high, however. Shiites have accused Sunni political leaders of encouraging violence, while Sunni groups say Shiite-controlled security forces have been carrying out torture and assassinations against Sunnis.

In fact, the Western diplomat said some Sunni political leaders had discussed setting up "neighborhood self-defense forces" - armed local Sunni militias - to protect Sunni residents against assaults from Shiite policemen and troops. The diplomat said he was not aware of any such Sunni forces being put into action, however.

DOJ_NMG_0008679

President Jalal Talabani said Saturday that he believed it would not take nearly as long as the three months it took last spring to reach agreement on the composition of a new government.

Mr. Talabani said the Kurds had held productive meetings in recent days with the Shiites, with Mr. Allawi's party and with the largest Sunni Arab party, the Iraqi Consensus Front.

Mr. Talabani, who met Saturday with Foreign Minister Jack Straw of Britain, said that once the final election results were released, "forming the next government will not take a long time."

Diplomats Protest Iraq Violence (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

BAGHDAD, Jan. 7 -- In a series of public statements Saturday, Western officials condemned a wave of recent attacks in Iraq, saying the violence was intended to derail Iraqi efforts to form a government based on national unity.

At the same time, Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, said that Shiite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish political groups were working toward that end. In a meeting in the capital with Jack Straw, the British foreign secretary, he said Iraqi parties had agreed in principle on a coalition of national unity, the Associated Press reported.

But a Western diplomat who briefed reporters here said he expected a "complicated negotiation" involving several sides now that Sunni Arab parties appear to have won enough seats in recent elections to play a role in the process of forming a government.

It was a change, he said, from the two-sided political environment that followed elections last January. In that election, Sunni Arabs, who represent about 20 percent of Iraq's population, turned out in very small numbers, yielding the political initiative to Shiite and Kurdish parties.

"Last spring, it was the Shia and the Kurds. It was a very straightforward negotiation," said the diplomat, who gave the briefing on condition he not be named. "This time it may have three, four, even five sides to it."

He said that talks about a coalition government were now in an "exploratory" stage and that once final election results were announced near the end of the month, negotiations would shift "from second to fifth gear sort of overnight."

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), who was in Iraq Saturday as part of a visiting congressional delegation, also stressed the importance of forming a government quickly.

"It seems to me you've got a six-month window in which a national unity government has to be formed," in addition to finalizing the country's constitution, making major progress in repairing its infrastructure and improving security, Obama said in an interview. "Time is not necessarily on our side."

Ultimately, Obama said, "there has to be a recognition on the part of the Sunnis that they're a minority of the population." In turn, he said, the Shiite majority needs to recognize the rights of Sunni Arabs.

But the Western diplomat said the insurgent attacks Wednesday and Thursday, which killed nearly 200 Iraqis and 11 U.S. service members, were intended to drive a wedge between Sunni Arabs and Shiites.

Two attacks on Saturday appeared to fit the same pattern. A suicide car bomber blew himself up next to an Interior Ministry police patrol, killing one officer and wounding 11 people, the Associated Press reported. A few hours later, gunmen fired on a car in Baghdad, killing a woman and wounding two men, the news service reported.

The Western diplomat noted, however, that one recent attack -- on a police recruiting station in Ramadi on Thursday -- killed dozens of Sunni Arabs and appeared to have broken the patience of tribal leaders who have provided support to insurgent groups.

People in the region are "now publicly calling for an end to the violence," he said. "I don't want to declare victory, because there's a long way to go, but something different is happening."

Special correspondent Omar Fekeiki contributed to this report.

Unity Government At Hand, Iraqi Says (WT/AP)

By Jason Straziuso, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 8, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraq's fractious political groups are moving ahead to shape a national-unity government, progress that should help stop the carnage of the past several days, the prime minister and other leaders said yesterday.

Iraq's Kurdish president, Jalal Talabani, predicted that a new government could be formed within weeks. He made the comments after meeting with visiting British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, who said Iraqis remain optimistic about their future despite suffering through a violent week, when nearly 200 people were killed in two days, including 11 U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0008680

In an effort to help draw Sunni Arabs into the political process as a way to dampen the violence, U.S. officials for months have been communicating directly or through channels with members of the disaffected minority connected to the insurgency.

A Western diplomat yesterday reported a recent "uptick" in those contacts. Those insurgents "sense that the political process does protect the Sunni community's interest," the diplomat said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. A similar "uptick" in communication occurred after parliamentary elections last year, he said.

A U.S. official said the coalition does not talk to foreign terrorists or supporters of Saddam Hussein's ousted regime, but said it was important to isolate extremists from the broader Sunni Arab community. He also spoke only on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the topic.

Meeting with Mr. Straw in Baghdad, Mr. Talabani said Shi'ite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish political groups had agreed in principle on a national-unity government that could be formed within a few weeks. Western diplomats in Baghdad have speculated that a government could be in place by the second half of February.

"Everyone is expecting to have it as soon as possible, but you know the devil is in the details," Mr. Talabani said.

He said it should be easier to form a new government than it was after the Jan. 30 elections last year, when it took nearly three months.

"We are expecting within weeks, God willing, we will be able to form the government," he said.

Mr. Talabani and other Kurdish leaders met over the New Year's holiday with Sunni Arab and Shi'ite political leaders. The meetings in northern Irbil helped shape agreement on the general outlines of a broad-based coalition government.

Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a member of the Shi'ite alliance and head of the Dawa party, said in a separate meeting with Mr. Straw that the Shi'ite "alliance and the coalition of Kurdistan and the other tickets, fortunately, are keen to make a national unity government."

"That common feeling will make the process easier," he said.

Mr. Straw said earlier that the situation in Iraq remained violent, but its politicians were optimistic.

"I was trying to avoid any kind of pretense about the situation here in Iraq," Mr. Straw told British Broadcasting Corp. radio. "It is very difficult. People are being killed by terrorism."

Violence was greatly diminished yesterday. Four persons were killed in attacks around the country, and police found the bodies of four females, blindfolded and handcuffed, who apparently had been shot to death in Baghdad, officials said.

Almost 200 people were killed in attacks Wednesday and Thursday.

Thousands of angry Shi'ites also demonstrated against the wave of bloodshed and what they claimed was American support for Sunni Arab politicians in Baghdad's Sadr City slum on Friday.

Final results from the elections could be released this week and could be fully certified by the end of the month after any appeals are heard. Some Sunni Arabs have protested that the vote was tainted by fraud.

The results are expected to show the religious Shi'ite United Iraqi Alliance with a strong lead. The Shi'ites will need to form a coalition government, however, with support from Kurdish and Sunni Arab political groups.

Lawmakers Call On Iraq To Shape Up (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

BAGHDAD — A bipartisan congressional delegation that included Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) had a blunt assessment Saturday for Iraq's political leaders: Shape up, or America will ship out.

The continued U.S. commitment to Iraq is becoming a tougher sell back home, said the four lawmakers, and unless Iraqis start showing signs of progress by creating a broad-based government and security forces that incorporate all of Iraq's ethnic and sectarian groups, Americans will lose patience, they said.

"It's going to be hard to convince American taxpayers to pour water into a leaky bucket," said Obama, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He spoke briefly with a small group of reporters inside former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's Republican Palace, which is now used as an annex for the U.S. Embassy.

Obama, with Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.), Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) and Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.), arrived in Iraq on Saturday for a whirlwind trip that included meetings with American intelligence and reconstruction specialists and Iraqi election officials in the capital's U.S.-protected Green Zone. They plan visits today with troops in outlying provinces.

Although the lawmakers said their constituents were proud of America's accomplishments in Iraq, they were loath to commit further U.S. money and troops if the Iraqi government elected last month did not include all the country's ethnic and political factions.

DOJ_NMG_0008681

"We are willing to continue to help them as long as they are willing to move forward toward a national unity government," said Bond, known as a backer of the U.S. military. "We are not here to participate in something that is dominated by one particular party or one particular sect."

To date, Congress has approved more than $300 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to the Congressional Research Service. And lawmakers say the Pentagon is drafting a request for as much as $100 billion more.

With 2006 midterm elections on the horizon and American opinion polls showing wavering enthusiasm for involvement in Iraq, pressure has been building on members of Congress and President Bush to demonstrate progress or to craft an exit plan.

Bayh, who is eyeing a 2008 White House bid, outlined half a dozen milestones that he and his colleagues said they would like to see Iraqis achieve over the next six months to be able to convince American voters that the continued commitment to Iraq was worthwhile.

Among the goals were the quick formation of a government, signs of economic progress, acceptance of the political process by Sunni Arabs and the formation of a civil service and security forces that reflect Iraq's various ethnic and sectarian groups.

Iraqis must ask themselves some tough questions, Bayh said: "Do the Iraqis want to live together in one country? Are they willing to make the tough political compromises necessary to bring that about? If they don't, in spite of all our help [the conflict] will not end."

It remains unclear how much sway U.S. officials will have over the new Iraqi government, which appears set to be dominated Shiite Islamists with ties to Iran and by autonomy-minded Kurds.

After a week marked by major insurgent attacks, little violence was reported Saturday. Police special forces on patrol in eastern Baghdad were hit by a car bomb, injuring four commandos and five civilians.

The Real Choice In Iraq (WP)

By Zbigniew Brzezinski

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

"Bring 'em on."

-- President Bush on Iraqi insurgents, summer 2003

The insurgency is "in its last throes."

-- Vice President Cheney,

summer 2005

" . . . there are only two options before our country: victory or defeat."

-- President Bush, Christmas 2005

The administration's rhetorical devolution speaks for itself. Yet, with some luck and with a more open decision-making process in the White House, greater political courage on the part of Democratic leaders and even some encouragement from authentic Iraqi leaders, the U.S. war in Iraq could (and should) come to an end within a year.

"Victory or defeat" is, in fact, a false strategic choice. In using this formulation, the president would have the American people believe that their only options are either "hang in and win" or "quit and lose." But the real, practical choice is this: "persist but not win" or "desist but not lose."

Victory, as defined by the administration and its supporters -- i.e., a stable and secular democracy in a unified Iraqi state, with the insurgency crushed by the American military assisted by a disciplined, U.S.-trained Iraqi national army -- is unlikely. The U.S. force required to achieve it would have to be significantly larger than the present one, and the Iraqi support for a U.S.-led counterinsurgency would have to be more motivated. The current U.S. forces (soon to be reduced) are not large enough to crush the anti-American insurgency or stop the sectarian Sunni-Shiite strife. Both problems continue to percolate under an inconclusive but increasingly hated foreign occupation.

Moreover, neither the Shiites nor the Kurds are likely to subordinate their specific interests to a unified Iraq with a genuine, single national army. As the haggling over the new government has already shown, the two dominant forces in Iraq -- the religious Shiite alliance and the separatist Kurds -- share a common interest in preventing a restoration of Sunni domination, with each determined to retain a separate military capacity for asserting its own specific interests, largely at the cost of the Sunnis. A truly national army in that context is a delusion. Continuing doggedly to seek "a victory" in that fashion dooms America to rising costs in blood and money, not to mention the intensifying Muslim hostility and massive erosion of America's international legitimacy, credibility and moral reputation.

The administration's definition of "defeat" is similarly misleading. Official and unofficial spokesmen often speak in terms that recall the apocalyptic predictions made earlier regarding the consequences of American failure to win in Vietnam: dominoes falling, the region exploding and U.S. power discredited. An added touch is the notion that the Iraqi insurgents will then navigate the Atlantic and wage terrorism on the American homeland.

DOJ_NMG_0008682

The real choice that needs to be faced is between:

An acceptance of the complex post-Hussein Iraqi realities through a relatively prompt military disengagement -- which would include a period of transitional and initially even intensified political strife as the dust settled and as authentic Iraqi majorities fashioned their own political arrangements.

An inconclusive but prolonged military occupation lasting for years while an elusive goal is pursued.

It is doubtful, to say the least, that America's domestic political support for such a futile effort could long be sustained by slogans about Iraq's being "the central front in the global war on terrorism."

In contrast, a military disengagement by the end of 2006, derived from a more realistic definition of an adequate outcome, could ensure that desisting is not tantamount to losing. In an Iraq dominated by the Shiites and the Kurds -- who together account for close to 75 percent of the population -- the two peoples would share a common interest in Iraq's independence as a state. The Kurds, with their autonomy already amounting in effect to quasi-sovereignty, would otherwise be threatened by the Turks. And the Iraqi Shiites are first of all Arabs; they have no desire to be Iran's satellites. Some Sunnis, once they were aware that the U.S. occupation was drawing to a close and that soon they would be facing an overwhelming Shiite-Kurdish coalition, would be more inclined to accommodate the new political realities, especially when deprived of the rallying cry of resistance to a foreign occupier.

In addition, it is likely that both Kuwait and the Kurdish regions of Iraq would be amenable to some residual U.S. military presence as a guarantee against a sudden upheaval. Once the United States terminated its military occupation, some form of participation by Muslim states in peacekeeping in Iraq would be easier to contrive, and their involvement could also help to cool anti-American passions in the region.

In any case, as Iraqi politics gradually become more competitive, it is almost certain that the more authentic Iraqi leaders (not handpicked by the United States) -- to legitimate their claim to power -- will begin to demand publicly a firm date for U.S. withdrawal. That is all to the good. In fact, they should be quietly encouraged to do so, because that would increase their popular support while allowing the United States to claim a soberly redefined "Mission Accomplished."

The requisite first step to that end is for the president to break out of his political cocoon. His policymaking and his speeches are the products of the true believers around him who are largely responsible for the mess in Iraq. They have a special stake in their definition of victory, and they reinforce his convictions instead of refining his judgments. The president badly needs to widen his circle of advisers. Why not consult some esteemed Republicans and Democrats not seeking public office -- say, Warren Rudman or Colin Powell or Lee Hamilton or George Mitchell -- regarding the definition of an attainable yet tolerable outcome in Iraq?

Finally, Democratic leaders should stop equivocating while carping. Those who want to lead in 2008 are particularly unwilling to state clearly that ending the war soon is both desirable and feasible. They fear being labeled as unpatriotic. Yet defining a practical alternative would provide a politically effective rebuttal to those who mindlessly seek an unattainable "victory." America needs a real choice regarding its tragic misadventure in Iraq.

The writer was national security adviser to President Jimmy Carter.

Saddam's Terror Training Camps (WKLYSTD)

By Stephen F. Hayes

Weekly Standard, January 16, 2006

THE FORMER IRAQI REGIME OF Saddam Hussein trained thousands of radical Islamic terrorists from the region at camps in Iraq over the four years immediately preceding the U.S. invasion, according to documents and photographs recovered by the U.S. military in postwar Iraq. The existence and character of these documents has been confirmed to THE WEEKLY STANDARD by eleven U.S. government officials.

The secret training took place primarily at three camps--in Samarra, Ramadi, and Salman Pak--and was directed by elite Iraqi military units. Interviews by U.S. government interrogators with Iraqi regime officials and military leaders corroborate the documentary evidence. Many of the fighters were drawn from terrorist groups in northern Africa with close ties to al Qaeda, chief among them Algeria's GSPC and the Sudanese Islamic Army. Some 2,000 terrorists were trained at these Iraqi camps each year from 1999 to 2002, putting the total number at or above 8,000. Intelligence officials believe that some of these terrorists returned to Iraq and are responsible for attacks against Americans and Iraqis. According to three officials with knowledge of the intelligence on Iraqi training camps, White House and National Security Council officials were briefed on these findings in May 2005; senior Defense Department officials subsequently received the same briefing.

DOJ_NMG_0008683

The photographs and documents on Iraqi training camps come from a collection of some 2 million "exploitable items" captured in postwar Iraq and Afghanistan. They include handwritten notes, typed documents, audiotapes, videotapes, compact discs, floppy discs, and computer hard drives. Taken together, this collection could give U.S. intelligence officials and policymakers an inside look at the activities of the former Iraqi regime in the months and years before the Iraq war.

The discovery of the information on jihadist training camps in Iraq would seem to have two major consequences: It exposes the flawed assumptions of the experts and U.S. intelligence officials who told us for years that a secularist like Saddam Hussein would never work with Islamic radicals, any more than such jihadists would work with an infidel like the Iraqi dictator. It also reminds us that valuable information remains buried in the mountain of documents recovered in Afghanistan and Iraq over the past four years.

Nearly three years after the U.S. invasion of Iraq, only 50,000 of these 2 million "exploitable items" have been thoroughly examined. That's 2.5 percent. Despite the hard work of the individuals assigned to the "DOCEX" project, the process is not moving quickly enough, says Michael Tanji, a former Defense Intelligence Agency official who helped lead the document exploitation effort for 18 months. "At this rate," he says, "if we continue to approach DOCEX in a linear fashion, our great-grandchildren will still be sorting through this stuff."

Most of the 50,000 translated documents relate directly to weapons of mass destruction programs and scientists, since David Kay and his Iraq Survey Group--who were among the first to analyze the finds--considered those items top priority. "At first, if it wasn't WMD, it wasn't translated. It wasn't exploited," says a former military intelligence officer who worked on the documents in Iraq.

"We had boxloads of Iraqi Intelligence records--their names, their jobs, all sorts of detailed information," says the former military intelligence officer. "In an insurgency, wouldn't that have been helpful?"

How many of those unexploited documents might help us better understand the role of Iraq in supporting transregional terrorists? How many of those documents might provide important intelligence on the very people--Baathists, former regime officials, Saddam Fedayeen, foreign fighters trained in Iraq--that U.S. soldiers are fighting in Iraq today? Is what we don't know literally killing us?

ON NOVEMBER 17, 2005, Michigan representative Pete Hoekstra wrote to John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence. Hoekstra is chairman of the House Intelligence Committee. He provided Negroponte a list of 40 documents recovered in postwar Iraq and Afghanistan and asked to see them. The documents were translated or summarized, given titles by intelligence analysts in the field, and entered into a government database known as HARMONY. Most of them are unclassified.

For several weeks, Hoekstra was promised a response. He finally got one on December 28, 2005, in a meeting with General Michael Hayden, principal deputy director of national intelligence. Hayden handed Hoekstra a letter from Negroponte that promised a response after January 1, 2006. Hoekstra took the letter, read it, and scribbled his terse response. "John--Unacceptable." Hoekstra told Hayden that he would expect to hear something before the end of the year. He didn't.

"I can tell you that I'm reaching the point of extreme frustration," said Hoekstra, in a phone interview last Thursday. His exasperated tone made the claim unnecessary. "It's just an indication that rather than having a nimble, quick intelligence community that can respond quickly, it's still a lumbering bureaucracy that can't give the chairman of the intelligence committee answers relatively quickly. Forget quickly, they can't even give me answers slowly."

On January 6, however, Hoekstra finally heard from Negroponte. The director of national intelligence told Hoekstra that he is committed to expediting the exploitation and release of the Iraqi documents. According to Hoekstra, Negroponte said: "I'm giving this as much attention as anything else on my plate to make this work."

Other members of Congress--including Rep. Dana Rohrabacher and Senators Rick Santorum and Pat Roberts--also demanded more information from the Bush administration on the status of the vast document collection. Santorum and Hoekstra have raised the issue personally with President Bush. This external pressure triggered an internal debate at the highest levels of the administration. Following several weeks of debate, a consensus has emerged: The vast majority of the 2 million captured documents should be released publicly as soon as possible.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has convened several meetings in recent weeks to discuss the Pentagon's role in expediting the release of this information. According to several sources familiar with his thinking, Rumsfeld is pushing aggressively for a massive dump of the captured documents. "He has a sense that public vetting of this information is likely to be as good an astringent as any other process we could develop," says Pentagon spokesman Larry DiRita.

The main worry, says DiRita, is that the mainstream press might cherry-pick documents and mischaracterize their meaning. "There is always the concern that people would be chasing a lot of information good or bad, and when the Times or the Post splashes a headline about some sensational-sounding document that would seem to 'prove' that sanctions were working, or that Saddam was just a misunderstood patriot, or some other nonsense, we'd spend a lot of time chasing around after it."

DOJ_NMG_0008684

This is a view many officials attributed to Undersecretary of Defense for Intelligence Steve Cambone. (Cambone, through a spokesman, declined to be interviewed.) For months, Cambone has argued internally against expediting the release of the documents. "Cambone is the problem," says one former Bush administration official who wants the documents released. "He has blocked this every step of the way." In what is perhaps a sign of a changing dynamic within the administration, Cambone is now saying that he, like his boss, favors a broad document release.

Although Hoekstra, too, has been pushing hard for the quick release of all of the documents, he is currently focusing his efforts simply on obtaining the 40 documents he asked for in November. "There comes a time when the talking has to stop and I get the documents. I requested these documents six weeks ago and I have not seen a single piece of paper yet."

Is Hoekstra being unreasonable? I asked Michael Tanji, the former DOCEX official with the Defense Intelligence Agency, how long such a search might take. His answer: Not long. "The retrieval of a HARMONY document is a trivial thing assuming one has a serial number or enough keyword terms to narrow down a search [Hoekstra did]. If given the task when they walked in the door, one person should be able to retrieve 40 documents before lunch."

Tanji should know. He left DIA last year as the chief of the media exploitation division in the office of document exploitation. Before that, he started and managed a digital forensics and intelligence fusion program that used the data obtained from DOCEX operations. He began his career as an Army signals intelligence [SIGINT] analyst. In all, Tanji has worked for 18 years in intelligence and dealt with various aspects of the media exploitation problem for about four years.

We discussed the successes and failures of the DOCEX program, the relative lack of public attention to the project, and what steps might be taken to expedite the exploitation of the documents in the event the push to release all of the documents loses momentum.

TWS: In what areas is the project succeeding? In what areas is the project failing?

Tanji: The level of effort applied to the DOCEX problems in Iraq and Afghanistan to date is a testament to the will and work ethic of people in the intelligence community. They've managed to find a number of golden nuggets amongst a vast field of rock in what I would consider a respectable amount of time through sheer brute force. The flip side is that it is a brute-force effort. For a number of reasons--primarily time and resources--there has not been much opportunity to step back, think about a smarter way to solve the problem, and then apply various solutions. Inasmuch as we've won in Iraq and Saddam and his cronies are in the dock, now would be a good time to put some fresh minds on the problem of how you turn DOCEX into a meaningful and effective information-age intelligence tool.

TWS: Why haven't we heard more about this project? Aren't most of the Iraqi documents unclassified?

Tanji: Until a flood of captured material came rushing in after the start of Operation Enduring Freedom [in October 2001], DOCEX was a backwater: unglamorous, not terribly career enhancing, and from what I had heard always one step away from being mothballed.

The classification of documents obtained for exploitation varies based on the nature of the way they were obtained and by whom. There are some agencies that tend to classify everything regardless of how it was acquired. I could not give you a ratio of unclassified to classified documents.

In my opinion the silence associated with exploitation work is rooted in the nature of the work. In addition to being tedious and time-consuming, it is usually done after the shooting is over. We place a higher value on intelligence information that comes to us before a conflict begins. Confirmation that we were right (or proof that we were wrong) after the fact is usually considered history. That some of this information may be dated doesn't mean it isn't still valuable.

TWS: The project seems overwhelmed at the moment, with a mere 50,000 documents translated completely out of a total of 2 million. What steps, in your view, should be taken to expedite the process?

Tanji: I couldn't say what the total take of documents or other forms of media is, though numbers in the millions are probably not far off.

In a sense the exploitation process is what it is; you have to put eyes on paper (or a computer screen) to see what might be worth further translation or deeper analysis. It is a time-consuming process that has no adequate mechanical solution. Machine translation software is getting better, but it cannot best a qualified human linguist, of which we have very few.

Tackling the computer media problem is a lot simpler in that computer language (binary) is universal, so searching for key words, phrases, and the names of significant personalities is fairly simple. Built to deal with large-scale data sets, a forensic computer system can rapidly separate wheat from chaff. The current drawback is that the computer forensics field is dominated by a law-enforcement mindset, which means the approach to the digital media problem is still very linear. As most of this material has come to us without any context ("hard drives found in Iraq" was a common label attached to captured media) that approach means our great-grandchildren will still be dealing with this problem.

Dealing with the material as the large and nebulous data set that it is and applying a contextual appliqué after exploitation--in essence, recreating the Iraqi networks as they were before Operation Iraqi Freedom began--would allow us to get at the most significant data rapidly for technical analysis, and allow for a political analysis to follow in short order. If I were looking for both a quick and powerful fix I'd get various Department of Energy labs involved; they're used to dealing with large data sets and have done great work in the data mining and rendering fields.

DOJ_NMG_0008685

TWS: To read some of the reporting on Iraq, one might come away with the impression that Saddam Hussein was something of a benign (if not exactly benevolent) dictator who had no weapons of mass destruction and no connections to terrorism. Does the material you've seen support this conventional wisdom?

Tanji: I am subject to a nondisclosure agreement, so I would rather not get into details. I will say that the intelligence community has scraped the surface of much of what has been captured in Iraq and in my view a great deal more deep digging is required. Critics of the war often complain about the lack of "proof"--a term that I had never heard used in the intelligence lexicon until we ousted Saddam--for going to war. There is really only one way to obtain "proof" and that is to carry out a thorough and detailed examination of what we've captured.

TWS: I've spoken with several officials who have seen unclassified materials indicating the former Iraqi regime provided significant support--including funding and training--to transregional terrorists, including Palestinian Islamic Jihad, Ansar al Islam, Algeria's GSPC, and the Sudanese Islamic Army. Did you see any of this?

Tanji: My obligations under a nondisclosure agreement prevent me from getting into this kind of detail.

Other officials familiar with the captured documents were less cautious. "As much as we overestimated WMD, it appears we underestimated [Saddam Hussein's] support for transregional terrorists," says one intelligence official.

Speaking of Ansar al Islam, the al Qaeda-linked terrorist group that operated in northern Iraq, the former high-ranking military intelligence officer says: "There is no question about the fact that AI had reach into Baghdad. There was an intelligence connection between that group and the regime, a financial connection between that group and the regime, and there was an equipment connection. It may have been the case that the IIS [Iraqi Intelligence Service] support for AI was meant to operate against the [anti-Saddam] Kurds. But there is no question IIS was supporting AI."

The official continued: "[Saddam] used these groups because he was interested in extending his influence and extending the influence of Iraq. There are definite and absolute ties to terrorism. The evidence is there, especially at the network level. How high up in the government was it sanctioned? I can't tell you. I don't know whether it was run by Qusay [Hussein] or [Izzat Ibrahim] al-Duri or someone else. I'm just not sure. But to say Iraq wasn't involved in terrorism is flat wrong."

STILL, some insist on saying it. Since early November, Senator Carl Levin has been spotted around Washington waving a brief excerpt from a February 2002 Defense Intelligence Agency assessment of Iraq. The relevant passage reads: "Saddam's regime is intensely secular and is wary of Islamic revolutionary movements. Moreover, Baghdad is unlikely to provide assistance to a group it cannot control."

Levin treats these two sentences as definitive proof that Bush administration officials knew that Saddam's regime was unlikely to work with Islamic fundamentalists and ignored the intelligence community's assessment to that effect. Levin apparently finds the passage so damning that he specifically requested that it be declassified.

I thought of Levin's two sentences last Wednesday and Thursday as I sat in a Dallas courtroom listening to testimony in the deportation hearing of Ahmed Mohamed Barodi, a 42-year-old Syrian-born man who's been living in Texas for the last 15 years. I thought of Levin's sentences, for example, when Barodi proudly proclaimed his membership in the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood, and again when Barodi, dressed in loose-fitting blue prison garb, told Judge J. Anthony Rogers about the 21 days he spent in February 1982 training with other members of the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood at a camp in Iraq.

The account he gave in the courtroom was slightly less alarming than the description of the camp he had provided in 1989, on his written application for political asylum in the United States. In that document, Barodi described the instruction he received in Iraq as "guerrilla warfare training." And in an interview in February 2005 with Detective Scott Carr and special agent Sam Montana, both from the federal Joint Terrorism Task Force, Barodi said that the Iraqi regime provided training in the use of firearms, rocket-propelled grenades, and document forgery.

Barodi comes from Hama, the town that was leveled in 1982 by the armed forces of secular Syrian dictator Hafez Assad because it was home to radical Islamic terrorists who had agitated against his regime. The massacre took tens of thousands of lives, but some of the extremists got away.

Many of the most radical Muslim Brotherhood refugees from Hama were welcomed next door--and trained--in Saddam Hussein's Iraq. Spanish investigators believe that Ghasoub Ghalyoun, the man they have accused of conducting surveillance for the 9/11 attacks, who also has roots in the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood, was trained in an Iraqi terrorist camp in the early 1980s. Ghalyoun mentions this Iraqi training in a 2001 letter to the head of Syrian intelligence, in which he seeks reentry to Syria despite his long affiliation with the Muslim Brotherhood.

DOJ_NMG_0008686

Reaching out to Islamic radicals was, in fact, one of the first moves Saddam Hussein made upon taking power in 1979. That he did not do it for ideological reasons is unimportant. As Barodi noted at last week's hearing, "He used us and we used him."

Throughout the 1980s, including the eight years of the Iran-Iraq war, Saddam cast himself as a holy warrior in his public rhetoric to counter the claims from Iran that he was an infidel. This posturing continued during and after the first Gulf war in 1990-91. Saddam famously ordered "Allahu Akbar" (God is Great) added to the Iraqi flag. Internally, he launched "The Faith Campaign," which according to leading Saddam Hussein scholar Amatzia Baram included the imposition of sharia (Islamic law). According to Baram, "The Iraqi president initiated laws forbidding the public consumption of alcohol and introduced enhanced compulsory study of the Koran at all educational levels, including Baath Party branches."

Hussein Kamel, Saddam's son-in-law who defected to Jordan in 1995, explained these changes in an interview with Rolf Ekeus, then head of the U.N. weapons inspection program. "The government of Iraq is instigating fundamentalism in the country," he said, adding, "Every party member has to pass a religious exam. They even stopped party meetings for prayers."

And throughout the decade, the Iraqi regime sponsored "Popular Islamic Conferences" at the al Rashid Hotel that drew the most radical Islamists from throughout the region to Baghdad. Newsweek's Christopher Dickey, who covered one of those meetings in 1993, would later write: "Islamic radicals from all over the Middle East, Africa and Asia converged on Baghdad to show their solidarity with Iraq in the face of American aggression." One speaker praised "the mujahed Saddam Hussein, who is leading this nation against the nonbelievers." Another speaker said, "Everyone has a task to do, which is to go against the American state." Dickey continued:

Every time I hear diplomats and politicians, whether in Washington or the capitals of Europe, declare that Saddam Hussein is a "secular Baathist ideologue" who has nothing do with Islamists or with terrorist calls to jihad, I think of that afternoon and I wonder what they're talking about. If that was not a fledgling Qaeda itself at the Rashid convention, it sure was Saddam's version of it.

In the face of such evidence, Carl Levin and other critics of the Iraq war trumpet deeply flawed four-year-old DIA analyses. Shouldn't the senator instead use his influence to push for the release of Iraqi documents that will help establish what, exactly, the Iraqi regime was doing in the years before the U.S. invasion?

Stephen F. Hayes is a senior writer at The Weekly Standard.

U.S. Soldiers Question Use Of More Armor (AP-Y2)

By Ryan Lenz

AP, January 8, 2006

U.S. soldiers in the field were not all supportive of a Pentagon study that found improved body armor saves lives, with some troops arguing Saturday that more armor would hinder combat effectiveness.

The unreleased study examined 93 fatal wounds to Marines from the start of the Iraq war in March 2003 through June 2005. It concluded 74 of them were bullet or shrapnel wounds to shoulders or torso areas unprotected by traditional ceramic armor plating.

Soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division's 3rd Brigade "Rakkasans" are required to wear an array of protective clothing they refer to as their "happy gear," ranging from Kevlar drapes over their shoulders and sides, to knee pads and fire-resistant uniforms.

But many soldiers say they feel encumbered by the weight and restricted by fabric that does not move as they do. They frequently joke as they strap on their equipment before a patrol, and express relief when they return and peel it off.

Second Lt. Josh Suthoff, 23, of Jefferson City, Mo., said he already sacrifices enough movement when he wears the equipment. More armor would only increase his chances of getting killed, he said.

"You can slap body armor on all you want, but it's not going to help anything. When it's your time, it's your time," said Suthoff, a platoon leader in the brigade's 1st Squadron, 33rd Cavalry Regiment. "I'd go out with less body armor if I could."

The study and their remarks highlight the difficulty faced by the Army and Marine Corps in providing the best level of body armor protection in a war against an insurgency whose tactics are constantly changing.

Both the Army and the Marines have weighed the expected payoff in additional safety from extra armor against the measurable loss of combat effectiveness from too much armor.

According to a summary of the Armed Forces Medical Examiner's study obtained Friday evening by The Associated Press, the 93 Marines who died from a primary lethal injury of the torso were among 401 Marines who died from combat injuries in Iraq between the start of the war and June 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0008687

A military advocacy group, Soldiers for Truth, posted an article about the study on its Web site this week. On Friday evening, The New York Times reported in its online edition that the study for the first time shows the cost in lives lost from inadequate armor.

Autopsy reports and photographic records were analyzed to help the military determine possible body armor redesign.

Of 39 fatal torso wounds in which the bullet or shrapnel entered the Marine's body outside of the ceramic armor plate protecting the chest and back, 31 were close to the plate's edge, according to the study, which was conducted last summer.

Some soldiers felt unhappy that ceramic plates to protect their sides and shoulders were available, but not offered, when they deployed for Iraq in September.

"If it's going to protect a soldier or save his life, they definitely should have been afforded the opportunity to wear it," said Staff Sgt. Shaun Benoit, 26, of Conneaut, Ohio. "I want to know where there was a break in communication."

Others questioned the effectiveness of additional body armor.

"It's the Army's responsibility to get soldiers the armor they need. But that doesn't mean those deaths could have been prevented," said Spc. Robert Reid, 21, of Atlanta.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who was in Iraq on Saturday, said military leaders told him that body armor has improved since the initial invasion in 2003 and that the military hoped to gradually transition to the improved armor.

The debate between protection versus mobility has dominated military doctrine since the Middle Ages, when knights wrapped themselves in metal suits for battle, said Capt. Jamey Turner, 35, of Baton Rouge, La., a commander in the 1st Squadron, 33rd Cavalry Regiment.

The issue comes up daily on the battlefield in Iraq, and soldiers need to realize there is no such thing as 100 percent protection, he said.

"You've got to sacrifice some protection for mobility," he added. "If you cover your entire body in ceramic plates, you're just not going to be able to move."

Others in the regiment said the issue of protecting soldiers with more body armor is of greater concern at home than among soldiers in Iraq, who have seen firsthand how life and death hang on a sliver of luck when an improvised explosive device hits a Humvee.

"These guys over here are husbands, sons and daughters. It's understandable people at home would want all the protection in the world for us. But realistically, it just don't work," said Sgt. Paul Hare, 40, of Tucumcari, N.M.

___

AP Military Writer Robert Burns in Washington contributed to this report.

Marines Without Armor (NYT)

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

American marines are a proud, tough bunch. They expect to be sent into the most dangerous battles and expect enemy fighters to come at them with everything they have. But they also expect, and have every right to expect, the Pentagon to provide them with the most effective armor available to maximize their chances of staying alive and in one piece. An investigative article in Saturday's Times by our colleague Michael Moss makes painfully clear that the Pentagon has let these brave warriors down.

A secret Defense Department study reveals that more extensive armor, of a kind available since 2003, could have saved the lives of some 80 percent of the marines killed by upper body wounds in Iraq between 2003 and 2005. That amounts to scores of needlessly lost lives - hundreds if Army deaths attributable to inadequate armor are counted as well. The ceramic armor plates in question cost about $260 a set.

Marines in the field have been clamoring for additional body armor (and vehicle armor) almost since the Iraq war began. Military officials initially turned them down because of concerns that the added weight might constrict movement. Once the study results came in last summer, Marine Corps leaders belatedly reversed themselves and started speeding armor to the troops.

Still, as of last month, less than 10 percent of the 28,000 sets of armor plates on order had actually reached the Marines in Iraq. Similar delays have plagued deliveries of improved vehicle armor. And the much larger Army contingent in Iraq has faced even more extensive delays.

The Pentagon buys some truly wondrous space-age weaponry with its half-trillion-dollar annual budgets. If the cold war ever resumes, the American military will certainly be prepared. Meantime, surely enough spare change can be found in that vast budget to accelerate deliveries of lifesaving armor to the marines and soldiers coming under fire today, and every day, in Iraq.

For Returning Unit In Iraq, A Battle With Doubts (BOS)

By Thanassis Cambanis

The Boston Globe, January 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008688

KIRKUK, Iraq -- Captain John McLaughlin's company of combat veterans has returned to Iraq. They have brought far fewer illusions this time around, exchanging unalloyed enthusiasm for Operation Iraqi Freedom in the spring of 2003 for a mix of professionalism, resignation, and cynicism.

The enlisted men from the 101st Airborne Division now know much more about the country, confidently factoring in competing ethnic agendas as they navigate the claims of Kurds, Arab Sunnis and Shi'ites, and Turkomen.

Most dismiss the American debate over the merits of the war as irrelevant, many of them saying they fight out of loyalty to the Army even if they think its mission in Iraq is unrealistic. Most profess no love for Iraq and its people.

When these air assault paratroopers returned to Iraq in October, the theater of battle was barely recognizable to them.

In April 2003, the Second Battalion 327th Infantry of the 101st fought its way through the nastiest combat of the Iraq invasion, leaping out of helicopters to fight Saddam Hussein loyalists in Najaf and Mosul, where they eventually established a forward-fire base south of the city and stayed until February 2004.

The division suffered 59 deaths that year. They returned to their post at Fort Campbell, Ky., for a year and a half before returning to Iraq in October.

But 2003 seems like ages ago to the young veterans.

The battalion that arrived in Kirkuk -- about two-thirds of them veterans of Iraq or Afghanistan -- found a base so cushy that commanders worry the soldiers will go soft, forgetting they're stationed in a war zone. Instead of sleeping on the floors of gutted warehouses, eating military rations, and burning their own sewage in trenches behind their quarters, soldiers now benefit from the infrastructure of a long occupation.

FOB Warrior, as the air base is known, boasts hot showers, a dining hall, a gym, a swimming pool, two barbershops, and a beauty parlor that gives massages. There's a Burger King and a 24-hour Green Beans Coffee shop, where soldiers line up for chai lattes and brownies in the middle of the night.

The permanence of facilities at the Kirkuk base also hints of a mission without end.

The surrounding city is still a deadly place -- less lethal than Fallujah but more so than the Shi'ite south. On this tour, 26 soldiers from the 101st had been killed by mid-December.

After the 2003 invasion, US troops had clear marching orders: Catch Hussein and his lieutenants and stabilize Iraq. During the first few months, criminal gangs posed the greatest law-and-order challenge, not insurgents.

Some returning soldiers said that while they once believed they could quickly train Iraqi police to replace American troops, they've now set their sights much lower, hoping perhaps to set a decent example for police and soldiers they train but don't entirely trust.

"Regardless of whether this is the great march of democracy or protecting the shores of America, whether I bought into that or not, it doesn't matter," McLaughlin said late one night at his command post after returning from a long day of meetings with Iraqi police chiefs and army commanders. "My obligation as a soldier, as an officer, as a leader is to do the mission to the best of my ability. That's the only saving grace out of the whole thing."

During a four-day visit by a Globe reporter to the Kirkuk base, soldiers and their commanders -- most of them returning veterans -- said they see the Iraq mission as less ambitious, less achievable, and more stressful than they did almost three years ago.

The soldiers still work at battle rhythm, always on call and with no days off. And while still dangerous, their daily routine involves patrolling between Kirkuk's police stations and army bases, investigating assassinations and bomb attacks against Iraqis -- and, often, investigating the very Iraqi security forces they're trying to train.

An unclear enemy

Everywhere he looks, McLaughlin sees ambiguity. As he and his troops see it, most Iraqis don't like the Americans and tolerate their presence only when American interests coincide with their own.

In that sea of doubt, there are a few safe harbors.

For McLaughlin's Charlie Company, one is the putrid settlement they call the Gypsy Camp, an abandoned factory inhabited by squatters that doubles as a brothel.

McLaughlin enjoys the company of his soldiers, trading jokes delivered in his thick Boston accent. But he's intense while on the job, which is most of the time. While riding in his Humvee, he listens to updates from southern Kirkuk through an earpiece while chatting with the driver, gunner, sergeant, and interpreter who ride with him.

All of the city's major ethnic groups -- Kurds, Arabs, Turkomen -- share contempt for the gypsies. To McLaughlin, they represent the most blameless victims of the complex conflict in Iraq, and their mistreatment at the hands of Iraq's American-trained security forces reflects the greatest pitfall of the US Army's new mission: that Iraqi authorities might abuse their growing powers.

DOJ_NMG_0008689

Many of the Iraqi soldiers and police McLaughlin trains violate the ban on visiting the brothel. In mid-December, Iraqi soldiers allegedly beat several of the women and burned the tents the squatters had pitched behind the dingy, half-finished shell of a building.

"If we aren't here to protect these people, who are we here for?" McLaughlin asked during a visit to the camp.

Families live in a row of tents, while the prostitutes, wearing heavy makeup, magenta scarves, and velveteen pantaloons, stand in the factory entryway.

When McLaughlin pulled up in his Humvee to investigate the day after the Iraqi raid, four Iraqi soldiers tried to flee down a side road. McLaughlin's driver blocked their way.

The incident exemplifies the military's new mission in Iraq: The top priority is no longer to kill insurgents and search neighborhoods. Now, US troops are supposed to pour their energy into training Iraqi forces to do the job.

McLaughlin's superiors in Kirkuk boast that two-thirds of all patrols combine US and Iraqi forces and that within three months Iraqi units -- like the one that McLaughlin suspects routinely raids the brothel -- will be ready to take the lead policing Kirkuk.

The soldiers in the 101st Airborne have taken on this training mission with an arsenal they didn't have the first time they fought in Iraq. Most of the officers know rudimentary Arabic and have learned to spend time developing personal relationships with local police and army officers who can provide intelligence. They drink tea with their Iraqi counterparts and encourage them to concentrate on their mission.

On one Saturday morning patrol, McLaughlin grilled two police chiefs about an array of attacks and insurgent cells, prompting them to follow up specific leads and steering them back on track when they tried to shift the conversation away from crime and toward meaningless platitudes about Iraqi politics.

He also confronted the Iraqi Army company about the gypsies.

"We -- you, me, police -- we're all here to secure everybody within the city, and that includes the gypsies," McLaughlin thundered at a young Iraqi Army lieutenant. "By going down there and slapping them around, burning down their tent, it makes you look no better than a criminal."

Boredom and bureaucracy

Sergeant Matt Somma and Private Gregory Miller patrol together in a heavily armored Humvee that's prone to roll over. It's a much safer cocoon than the doorless Humvees that Somma patrolled in at the beginning of the Iraq war in the northern city of Mosul.

Both men came to Kirkuk in October with a vivid sense of Iraq.

Somma, 22, fought his way through some of the worst battles of 2003 and stayed until the end of February 2004. He sees no other life for himself but the army.

The Iraq war in its present phase, however, bores him: There's too much politics and not enough shooting for his taste.

As a team leader within his platoon, Somma spends much of his time enforcing new safety regulations for soldiers, making sure they're wearing goggles, they unload their guns when they return to base, and they don't let down their guard just because the conflict doesn't summon so much adrenaline.

"It kind of sucks sometimes," Somma said of the bureaucratic aspects of his job.

Tall, skinny, with a hooked nose, Somma towers over the other men in his platoon. He walks with a swagger and keeps up a constant verbal patter like a stage musician -- the only other career he says appeals to him. On patrol, he plays a game called "What are you thinking?" with the other sergeants on the radio, mixing absurd observations about the Iraqis in their area of operations, lyrics, and references to American television shows.

Somma also focuses much of his energy on the video game "Age of Empires III," which he plays on his laptop while huddled in his wooden bunk. Somma dedicates most waking hours when he's not on patrol to the game, in which he directs a civilization trying to conquer 17th-century America.

Miller, his platoon's old man at 27, quit his job as a diving instructor last year to fulfill a promise he made to his best childhood friend, Matt Brown, whom he refers to as his brother. Brown, an Army officer deployed in central Iraq a year ago, lost an eye when insurgents ambushed his convoy.

"I promised my brother that if he got hurt, I would join the Army," Miller said. "Eight months later, here I am. I knew what I was getting into."

The pace of life on deployment is draining, but it's also addictive. Somma said he wants a break from the Army to go to college but can't imagine blending back into civilian society. He and Miller both said they feel alienated by a society where they believe people don't take individual responsibility.

In Iraq, despite the murkiness of the mission, they have found crystal clarity in their relationship to their own unit -- so much so that on his last deployment Somma didn't take any of the leave to which he was entitled.

DOJ_NMG_0008690

Somma said the Iraq war is slowly becoming like Korea or Germany for career military personnel, a grueling ticket that everyone committed to the Army will have to punch. Even though this deployment has seen more soldiers from the 101st killed per month than in 2003, the mission feels more like work and less like war to Somma.

"There's not much contact" with the enemy, Somma said while driving his Humvee late one night down a rutted dirt road in the Arab section of Kirkuk. "Nothing's 100 percent safe, but Kirkuk is a pretty safe city."

He compared it wistfully to Mosul, where he was stationed last time and where his division won accolades for killing top Ba'athists, including Hussein's sons. "Mosul was just chaotic when we were there," he said with a smile.

A false sense of security

At Kirkuk Air Base, combat soldiers live on the far end of the airstrip. The support units and contractors -- the majority of whom never go "outside the wire" -- live on the other side.

A flier posted in nearly every building warns soldiers against taking false comfort from the amenities: "Quality of Life Warning!!!" it reads. "Quality of life on FOB Warrior is excellent. DO NOT get complacent and get lulled into a false sense of security. We are in a dangerous place and there are people outside of the FOB who want to kill you. Stay alert, stay alive!"

"Last time, we got here and there was nothing. It was weird coming back and seeing all this," Somma said.

On his last tour, Captain McLaughlin lived in an ammunition bunker with no power and no air conditioning. Now he has his own room with a door, a desk, a cot, and a shelf for his book of Tennyson poems and a library of other tomes he still hasn't gotten to -- "Don Quixote," a history of Islam, a polemic about reform in the Arab world.

Soldiers in Somma's platoon inherited a wireless Internet network set up by an Iraqi contractor. Commanders ordered it dismantled after Christmas, in part because it seemed too cushy.

Sophisticated soldiers and an Iraq mission no longer geared toward the climactic moment of national elections constitute a tough challenge for McLaughlin's company leadership: how to keep soldiers motivated when their success can be measured only through the goal of improving Iraqi security forces?

The answer, they say, is to think narrow.

"The guys look for small, incremental little victories," said the company's first lieutenant, Brett Bean.

First Sergeant Jason Larson, who turned 35 on Christmas Day and has spent 15 years in the Army, said he had always thought the Army would be his last job. But the inevitability of returning to Iraq, he said, has persuaded him to leave the military when his contract runs out in five years.

"I won't stay a day longer, even if I have to go work as a greeter at Wal-Mart," Larson said.

In a war without any benchmarks coming up, he said, commanders have to constantly refine their message to soldiers, billing small turning points like the improvement of an Iraqi battalion as major victories. "For us, the challenge will be to keep everyone focused," he said.

Thanassis Cambanis can be reached at tcambanis@globe.com.

Marine Battalion Taking 3rd Tour To Iraq (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON — In the predawn chill of Saturday morning, Anna Plank of Huntington Beach was here to see her 21-year-old son, Marine Cpl. Jason Plank, begin the trip back to Iraq for his third tour of duty.

The waiting and worrying never get easier for the families of Marines, particularly those of the 3rd Battalion, 5th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, which has a reputation for drawing the most dangerous of assignments.

"You pray a lot and you stay busy, and you wait for those phone calls and letters to arrive," Anna Plank said.

But there is something else that family members pray never arrives: an official car with an officer or senior enlisted man, possibly accompanied by a chaplain. That's how the Marine Corps notifies families that a loved one has been killed.

"During his last deployment, I saw an official car in the neighborhood, and I immediately ran upstairs and closed the door as if that could stop it," said Plank, a tear on her cheek at the memory. "But it wasn't that, thank God."

Among the hundreds of family members who gathered to see 300 Marines and sailors board buses that would take them to a nearby airport, fear of the "knock on the door" was a shared experience.

"I remember one day an officer came to our office complex and my heart stopped; it just stopped," said Julie Galaviz of Whittier, whose son, Lance Cpl. Joshua Tallis, 21, is returning to Iraq for a third tour.

The 3-5, as it is known, is the first battalion from Camp Pendleton to depart for Iraq as the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force begins to relieve troops from Camp Lejeune, N.C., in violence-plagued Al Anbar province west of Baghdad.

In 2003, three Marines from the battalion were killed in Iraq. In 2004, 19 were killed, most in the November fight to wrest control of Fallouja from the insurgents. The 3-5 was one of the lead units in the assault.

DOJ_NMG_0008691

Now the battalion is returning to Fallouja for a seven-month deployment to help train Iraqi security forces, although that assignment could change if U.S. commanders order an assault on insurgent strongholds.

An estimated two-thirds of the battalion's 1,000 Marines have made at least one deployment to Iraq. Like the Marines, family members have developed strategies for survival.

"You need to surround yourself with friends and family, and stay focused," said Lauren Maricic, 23, of Ontario whose boyfriend, Cpl. Miles Nelson, 21, is returning for a third tour.

"And the friends and family members have to be ready to get a phone call at 2 o'clock in the morning if you need support," she said.

Anna Goad, 23, of Irvine and her husband, Cpl. Michael Goad, 25, were sharing a last hug as the buses rolled into sight and Marines began grabbing their rifles. Sergeants began barking orders, and the tears and tension among family members increased.

"Everybody is afraid of the knock on the door," Anna Goad said. "But it's absolutely not going to happen to us. I know that."

Donna Meyers, 72, and her husband, A.J., 76, drove from their home in Riverbank, Calif., near Modesto, to say goodbye to their grandson Rich, making his third tour. She wears his picture on a chain around her neck.

"We lost one boy from his group last time, and it was hard, real hard," Donna Meyers said. "Rich met his mother."

On Thursday night, Tallis' family met at his grandmother's house in Pico Rivera for a dinner with his favorite foods: barbecued ribs, rice pilaf, scalloped potatoes, strawberry ice cream and more.

On Friday, Tallis visited with the family priest at St. Bruno's Catholic Church in Whittier for a blessing.

Hayley Lynn, 18, of La Crescenta married Lance Cpl. Chad Lynn, 19, on Tuesday at a chapel in Las Vegas. As his departure to Iraq for his first tour grew closer, she extracted a promise.

"He promised me that he wouldn't die," she said.

Army Captain Employed Daring, Intellect (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

Christopher P. Petty barely squeaked by as a high school student in Virginia, his father said, but he thrived amid the rigors of military culture, rising to the rank of captain and commanding an artillery battalion in Iraq.

"It's just kind of a typical American story where . . . the combination of life and experience in the military turns him completely around to where he's a model officer," said Paul R. Petty, a retired CIA officer.

Petty, 33, was killed in Najaf on Thursday along with four other soldiers when an improvised explosive detonated near their Humvee, the Defense Department said. He was three weeks into his second tour of duty in Iraq.

Petty was a father of two -- Oliver, 3, and Owen, 3 months -- and he and his wife, Deborah, had lived near Fort Hood, Tex., where he was assigned to the 4th Infantry Division.

Because of his father's work, Petty grew up overseas. He was born in Berlin and lived in Austria, Finland and Jamaica. He was a graduate of James Madison High School in Vienna and attended Marshall University in Huntington, W.Va., where he was enrolled in the ROTC program.

He was commissioned in the Army upon graduation. Ed Petty, an artillery officer in World War II, pinned his own second lieutenant's bars and crossed cannon artillery insignia on his grandson at the commissioning.

Petty's unit entered Iraq just days after the initial invasion, engaging some of the last Republican Guard elements near Tikrit in the north.

Stationed not far from the Iranian border, his father said, Petty served informally as a civil affairs officer with the responsibility of running local elections and formally as the artillery coordinator for his battalion. Petty devised a clever method, one that he employed daringly, for responding to frequent mortar attacks, his father said. Petty would calculate the mortars' trajectories by examining impact craters and tail fins, then determine from where the rounds had been fired.

"He'd go out where they were impacting, sometimes while they were still coming in," Petty said.

During that year-long deployment, his battalion suffered only one casualty, his father said. The insurgency has since grown stronger, and Petty was aware that he would return to a more dangerous country, his father said.

Yesterday, he recalled when his son, in middle school, was on a Vienna soccer team with the son of Redskins coach Joe Gibbs.

The soccer coach didn't show up one day. Gibbs stepped in, leading the underdog team to victory. "They trounced these other guys, who were touted to win by huge margins," Paul Petty said. "Those boys -- they were on cloud nine."

Staff researcher Magda Jean-Louis contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0008692

Case Dropped Against U.S. Officer In Beating Deaths Of Afghan Inmates (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

The Army has dropped its case against the only officer to face criminal charges in connection with the beating deaths of two prisoners held by the United States in Afghanistan, military officials said yesterday.

The officer, Capt. Christopher M. Beiring, led a reservist military police company that was guarding the main American detention center in Afghanistan when the two men were killed within days of each other in December 2002. The prisoners died after guards kneed them repeatedly in the legs while each was shackled to the ceiling of his cell.

Captain Beiring, 39, had been charged with lying to investigators and being derelict in his duties, in part by neglecting after the first death to order his soldiers to stop chaining up prisoners by the arms at the behest of military interrogators who wanted to deprive them of sleep before questioning.

"They certainly had a case to investigate - two guys died," Captain Beiring said yesterday in an interview. "And, obviously, some soldiers did some stuff wrong and needed to be punished. But I think it got blown out of proportion. At some point, they were just playing politics."

The collapse of the case is the latest and most embarrassing of several setbacks for the team of Army prosecutors that has been working for more than a year on the deaths, which occurred at the military detention center in Bagram, 40 miles north of Kabul.

Captain Beiring is the third member of the 377th Military Police Company, based in Cincinnati and Bloomington, Ind., to have had charges dismissed before trial. Four enlisted soldiers in the unit have been acquitted, two others pleaded guilty to assault and one was convicted of assault, maiming and other charges.

Four former interrogators from the 519th Military Intelligence Battalion, based at Fort Bragg, N.C., have pleaded guilty to charges including assault, maltreatment and dereliction of duty.

In Captain Beiring's case, the decision by the commander of the Army's Air Defense Artillery Center at Fort Bliss, Tex., where the Bagram cases are being tried, followed the recommendation of an investigating judge that it not proceed to a court-martial.

A spokeswoman for Fort Bliss, Jean Offutt, said Captain Beiring was issued a letter of reprimand on Friday. Captain Beiring said that the letter contained accusations of dereliction of duty and that he would formally rebut them.

The judge who oversaw the pretrial inquiry, Lt. Col. Thomas S. Berg, sharply criticized the prosecutors' case, concluding in a 22-page report that they had failed to present sufficient evidence to support any of the charges.

The accusation that Captain Beiring lied about his efforts to train his soldiers after they arrived in Afghanistan was based on "one slightly ambiguous response" in one of the half-dozen sworn statements he gave to various military investigators, Colonel Berg noted. He added that Captain Beiring's response was then "significantly misquoted" by the prosecutors in the charges they filed.

Colonel Berg, the investigating judge, also dismissed two charges of dereliction of duty against Captain Beiring. In those charges, prosecutors had argued that the captain had failed to properly train his soldiers to handle the detainees and to order them to stop chaining prisoners overhead after the first one died.

Though Colonel Berg noted that the company had scarcely been trained for its specific mission at Bagram, he said Captain Beiring had sought and was denied more training before his company deployed. The unit spent barely a day learning from the company it replaced before that unit left Afghanistan.

Colonel Berg said that "substantial evidence" also showed that Captain Beiring did, in fact, instruct his junior and noncommissioned officers to stop the overhead chaining of detainees after two more senior officers insisted that he do so. The fact that a second prisoner died while similarly shackled "only shows that someone else either did not get the word about standing restraints or, more likely, got the word and chose to disregard it."

"Captain Beiring was sorely challenged at every step," Colonel Berg concluded. "He may not have done his duty perfectly, but he did it well."

Ms. Offutt, the Fort Bliss spokeswoman, said charges of abuse and other crimes against another former Bagram interrogator, Pfc. Damien M. Corsetti, would go forward to a general court-martial. One more reservist from Captain Beiring's company, Sgt. Alan J. Driver Jr., is scheduled to be tried next month.

A Man Does Not Ask A Man About His Wife (NYT)

By Eric Schmitt

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0008693

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan

FOR the United States military here, there is the daily fight against Taliban rebels and there is perhaps the even more challenging task of winning the trust and confidence of the Afghan people.

So when American soldiers burned the bodies of two dead Taliban fighters in a village near here in October and then used their charred and smoking corpses in an impromptu propaganda campaign against the insurgents and their sympathizers, senior commanders and Pentagon officials scrambled to head off a backlash against the United States in the Islamic world.

Two junior officers who had the bodies burned for what they said were hygienic reasons were reprimanded for showing a lack of cultural and religious understanding. The operational commander in Afghanistan, Maj. Gen. Jason K. Kamiya, said the officers had been unaware that Islamic tenets banned cremation and considered the burning of human bodies to be a desecration.

Two noncommissioned officers who used a loudspeaker to harangue nearby Taliban militants while standing over the bodies were also disciplined.

American forces receive some cultural sensitivity training before arriving here, but with new troops rotating through every 7 to 12 months, the instruction can be spotty and inconsistent.

In an effort to prevent incidents like the body burnings, the military command here has distributed cultural sensitivity cards to the 19,000 American troops in Afghanistan. Each wallet-size card is a laminated, fold-up guide of cultural dos and don'ts. The military distributed similar cards in Iraq last year. Excerpts from the Afghanistan version follow.

.

Death and Burial

A non-Muslim must not perform the burial rites for a dead Muslim.

One should not allow the remains to be eaten by birds or animals.

One should not remove the clothes of a Muslim including a Muslim fighter K.I.A. (killed in action).

One should not allow the remains to be left unburied beyond 72 hours at a maximum.

In the event that no one claims the remains after three days, consider what course of action would be most respectful of the dead and Muslim sensibilities. You may put the remains in a plastic body bag.

Islam and Prayer

Treat the Koran as a sacred book by handling it with utmost respect. (The Koran is usually wrapped in an attractive cloth and put in a high, prominent position in the home.)

Respect such religious objects as prayer rugs and prayer beads.

Respect those at prayer by not playing music or making noise during prayer time.

Do not walk in front of someone at prayer.

Remove your shoes when visiting a mosque when on any official tour approved by military authorities and the host nation.

Do not initiate religious discussions or judge the beliefs and practices of Muslims. Do not enter into debates about religion.

Absolutely do not proselytize.

Do not ask a Muslim if he is a Sunni or Shiite.

Interest in Islam can best be shown by simply listening to any Muslim informant.

Refrain from derogatory comments about any religion.

Do not call an Afghan "Hajji," "Mullah," or "Akhund" unless it is a known honorific of the person in question.

Searching and Questioning

Identify, show respect to and communicate with elders. Work with elders to accomplish your mission.

When searching houses or compounds put at least one elder with the women of his household.

Do not unnecessarily humiliate men by forcing them onto the ground in front of their families.

Males must not touch or search women. Only female soldiers or police may search women.

Males may never ask a man about his wife, daughters or sisters. Females can.

Do not yell or use profanity. It is a sign of weakness, poor upbringing and lack of discipline.

Manners and Gestures

Use common courtesy: say "please" (lutfan) and "thank you" (tushakor), address women as "mother" (mader) or "sister" (khwahar), and address elders as "sir" (agha sahib).

When entering a room full of men shake hands and greet everyone. When you do not recognize a person, he will feel slighted.

When offered a seat of honor, decline graciously and accept only when offered again.

If someone brings you a chair to sit on, accept it even if you would rather stand. He is honoring you.

Do not argue, but strive for consensus. Majority rule is not the norm for solving issues or problems.

DOJ_NMG_0008694

When a guest do not focus complimentary comments on your host's possessions as he/she will feel culturally obligated to give them to you. Do not, for example, over-compliment the quality of needlework, rugs, pictures, etc., in the host's home.

Do not stare at women, touch them or try to shake a woman's hand (unless she extends her hand first).

Do not react negatively if Afghan men kiss, embrace or hold hands. This is polite behavior in Afghan society.

Show kindness to children. You may praise them by saying, "In the name of God. ..." (naam-i-Khuda. ...)

Speak about your families. Afghans like to know you have them.

Food, Drink and Dress

If you are eating something, offer to share.

Eat with your right hand as much as possible.

When visiting a home or office, if someone brings you hot tea and snacks, accept graciously.

If a stranger offers you food, say "No, thank you" and only accept if he continues to offer the item.

Do not offer Afghans/Muslims pork or shellfish products.

Do not drink alcoholic beverages in front of Afghans/Muslims. General Order No. 1 prohibits alcohol.

Dress modestly. Do not wear shorts. Men should not go shirtless.

Do not show the soles of your shoes to Afghans. Tuck your feet under you legs. ...

Miscellany

When purchasing items in the bazaar, bargain with the vendor. You lose respect when you pay exorbitant prices.

Do not display sexually explicit pictures.

This Isn't Called The [Blank] Era For Nothing (WP)

By Richard N. Haass

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

"Why do they call us the Middle Ages when nothing yet comes after us?" This is the plaintive question King Arthur asks in the hit Broadway musical comedy "Spamalot."

The frustrated monarch has a point. Those living in what we now call the Middle Ages did not describe their time that way, any more than those who came before them saw their period as "dark" or those who came after them woke up every morning cheering their good fortune for being alive in the middle of a renaissance.

But in modern times, eras aren't always named in hindsight. People in the 1930s knew they were living through the Great Depression. The Cold War came into vogue as a phrase several decades before it ended. The Sixties weren't even in the history books yet when people began using the name of the decade to describe those tumultuous times.

What about our era then? Here we are, more than 16 years after the Berlin Wall began to crumble, and this period still lacks a name. Calling it the post-Cold War era is an admission that we know what came before but not where we are, much less where we are heading.

It's not that people haven't tried to name this era. Books have dubbed it an "age of anxiety," an "age of sacred terror," an "information age" or the "genomics age," to name just a few. But these names often seem as much a matter of marketing as a true description of our times.

The names that truly stick to past eras are those that capture a defining characteristic: A breakthrough technology (the Stone, the Bronze or the nuclear age); political features (the age of reform, revolution, world war or empire); philosophical outlook (the age of enlightenment, reason or innocence); or economic trends (the Gilded Age, the Roaring Twenties or the Great Depression).

That this era lacks a name suggests that it still lacks a defining characteristic. Perhaps globalization comes closest, encompassing the increasing volume, speed and importance of flows across borders of people, ideas, greenhouse gases, manufactured goods, dollars, euros, television and radio signals, drugs, germs, e-mails, weapons and a good deal else. But globalization does not describe many features of the contemporary world, be they technological, political, religious or philosophical.

All of these things will help shape our era, but none will have greater impact on how we view it, and what we call it, than relations between the United States and other great powers.

The United States emerged from the Cold War as the world's most powerful country, the first among unequals. And that has prompted some people in my field to call ours the unipolar era. But this is a misreading of the current international context. Primacy is not the same as unipolarity. We are the preeminent power, but hardly the only one. There may not be a single alternative pole as was the case during the Cold War, but there are multiple, independent actors, not only countries but groups of individuals, some of whom are hostile and virtually all of whom resist U.S. designs. The result is that the United States on its own cannot stave off terrorism, force North Korea and Iran to eschew nuclear weapons, bring democracy to Iraq or the rest of the Arab world, deliver or impose peace between Israelis and Palestinians, or sustain its standard of living without importing oil and dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0008695

So if this is an era defined fully by neither globalization nor American control, what is it then? There are three main possibilities.

Ideally, this would turn out to be an era of prolonged peace and prosperity, in which great power conflict becomes a thing of the past. Free markets and democracy would spread, and the energies of governments would be devoted to combating challenges to international order rather than combating one another. Each power's recognition that its own self-interest requires it to work with others would give birth to unprecedented cooperation. Call it the Age of Integration.

In such an epoch, nations would rally together and intervene to prevent or stop genocides and combat terrorism. Major powers would provide other countries with access to enriched uranium and plutonium for peaceful nuclear energy purposes as long as these raw materials were not diverted for military ends. The World Trade Organization would be extended to cover virtually all aspects of manufacturing, agriculture and services; tariffs, quotas and subsidies would be eliminated. Cooperation would be extended to deal with disease and global warming.

A second possibility is that this moment in history will later be seen as the inter-Cold War era, bracketed on one end by a four-decade struggle between the United States and the Soviet Union, and on the other by a struggle between the United States and China. This is the prediction of latter-day cold warriors who see a clash between today's principal power and a rising China as all but inevitable.

Subscribers to this theory predict a clash over Taiwan or a clash arising from the mismanagement of relations between two powerful and dynamic countries. A U.S.-China Cold War, like the previous one, would be dangerous, costly and distracting from other priorities. The United States needs China's assistance to deal with regional challenges (such as North Korea's nuclear aspirations) and global ones (such as avian flu and climate change). China, for its part, needs diplomatic calm so that it can focus on economic modernization.

A third possibility is even worse: a Second Dark Ages, characterized by the spread of nuclear weapons to North Korea, Iran and beyond; terrorism that increases in frequency and destructiveness; virulent infectious disease; mounting protectionism; and a substantially warmer planet. Conflict would become more common, as would the failure of states and a rise in poverty.

The United States could not wall itself off from such a world; we cannot become a gated country. As was the case during the world wars in the last century, even before globalization became a phenomenon, isolation would not be an option. Our standard of living would decline as trade withered and investment dried up. Civil liberties would be curtailed so that Americans could better cope with the threat from within. The world would become a more dangerous place and American society would be worse off.

Therefore, working out the name and nature for our era is an exercise in strategy, not taxonomy. We can help determine how the future turns out. Looking back on the inter-war period during the middle of the 20th century, World War II seems unavoidable. But it took the rise of National Socialism and the failure of appeasement to bring about the second global conflict.

More recently, the Cold War may have been all but inevitable given the nature of the Soviet and Communist challenge. But neither the course nor the outcome of the Cold War was fated; it could have turned hot, it could have been lost, or it could still be going on.

This tells us that history remains anything but ordained. What individuals and countries choose to do matters, none more so than the United States. There is a great deal of discretion in foreign policy. Iraq was a textbook example -- it was a war of choice. Tax cuts and increased spending are also matters of choice, as is the absence of an energy policy that limits American dependence on imported oil and gas.

It is not clear how President Bush will use the remaining three years of his presidency, much less who will succeed him. The good news is that the United States, more than any other country, has the power to make this an era of cooperation and avoid the start of a new cold war -- or worse. The worrisome news is that, 16 years after the Cold War's end, the United States has done more to squander than exploit the opportunity at hand.

Author's e-mail:president@cfr.org

Richard Haass, director of the State Department's policy planning staff from 2001 to 2003, is president of the Council on Foreign Relations and author of "The Opportunity: America's Moment to Alter History's Course" (Public Affairs).

DOJ:

S.D. Judges' Actions May Set National Precedent (SFAL)

By DAN HAUGEN

DOJ_NMG_0008696

Sioux Falls (SD) Argus Leader, January 8, 2006

The appointment of an interim U.S. attorney for South Dakota last month is raising complex questions about whether a federal agency overstepped its authority.

The naming of Steven K. Mullins to the position has fueled a politically charged dispute about who serves in a key role as the state's chief prosecutor for federal crimes.

Mullins, an Oklahoma lawyer, was appointed to the position Dec. 22 by the U.S. Department of Justice. But three federal judges in South Dakota say a judge from this state - not the Justice Department - should name the interim U.S. attorney.

If a legal challenge about Mullins' appointment goes far enough, the rule that allows judges to appoint interim lawyers could be thrown out as unconstitutional, according to experts in constitutional law.

"This is no different than the legislature endowing the justice branch to appoint the secretary of defense on an interim basis," said Bruce Fein, a constitutional lawyer and consultant in Washington. He served as deputy attorney general under President Reagan.

Fein said the Justice Department acted properly in the South Dakota appointment, and larger concerns are created by judges appointing prosecutors.

"This is quite unusual for a judge to say, hell, I want my own man in there as U.S. attorney. Yes, then you should run for president," Fein said.

Meierhenry choice 'not acceptable' Mullins replaces Michelle Tapken, another interim attorney whose term was set to expire Dec. 24.

Federal rules say when an interim U.S. attorney's term expires, it's up to a district's chief judge to make an appointment.

But Tapken resigned before her 120-day term was up, and the Justice Department immediately swore in Mullins for the job.

"All this sounds like it's trying to circumvent the statutes," said Robert Bennett, a professor and former dean of the Northwestern University School of Law.

Other legal observers offered dramatically different opinions this week on the unusual skirmish going on between South Dakota's federal judges and executive branch officials in Washington, D.C.

Chief Judge Lawrence Piersol attempted to appoint attorney Mark Meierhenry to the interim U.S. attorney role. A Justice Department executive told Piersol, though, that "this was not acceptable to the Attorney General," according to court documents.

Another federal judge, Karen Schreier of Rapid City, then intervened and ordered Mullins to appear in court Jan. 17 to explain why Meierhenry should not serve as interim U.S. attorney instead.

Whose judicial authority is valid? Judge Charles Kornmann of Aberdeen said the conditions leading up to Mullins' hiring leave some uncertainty about whether his authority is valid and whether cases he prosecuted could later be called into question.

Kornmann's concerns surfaced last week during an unrelated criminal case.

"Everybody wants to make sure that this appointment is proper for the administration of justice and that actions can't be attacked by people who have been convicted. It's not any big battle. It's a legal matter," Meierhenry said.

Meierhenry added that he has no aspirations to permanently fill the position.

John Eastman, director of the Center of Constitutional Jurisprudence in Claremont, Calif., said cases tried under Mullins are not at risk because of his authority.

"It might be challenged, but I would think the challenge would not succeed," Eastman said. "It's perfectly acceptable for a person in that role to resign, and for the Justice Department to appoint somebody new."

Questions about the intent of the law The Justice Department followed the letter of the law when it appointed Mullins over Judge Piersol's selection, Eastman said.

It's possible, though, a court could decide the Justice Department violated the intent of the law, said Bennett of Northwestern University.

"I could imagine a court saying the whole point (of the 120-day interim term limit) was to limit executive appointment without Senate approval," Bennett said.

The U.S. Constitution gives presidents the power to appoint federal attorneys to head each of the nation's 94 district offices.

No Bush appointment creates void, debate The president's appointments become official only after the Senate gives its approval. Appointing consecutive interim attorneys "is a way of filling the gap when you haven't got that," Bennett said.

Elizabeth Smith, a political science professor at the University of South Dakota, said it's an unusual situation that the code doesn't appear to anticipate.

"It's a situation that I've never seen before," Smith said.

The rules assume by the end of one interim appointment, the president will have made a permanent appointment.

President Bush has not appointed anybody to fill the position, so the U.S. Department of Justice and the district court are left trying to decide which one is in charge.

"As I look at the situation, it seems the clearest resolution is the political branches get together and make an appointment," she said.

Brian Roehrkasse, a spokes-man for the Department of Justice, said the department does not comment on such issues.

"We are working hard with the court to reach an accommodation," he said.

Reach Dan Haugen at 331-2335.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Call It The Deal Of A Lifetime (NYT)

By Landon Thomas Jr.

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

MOST mornings these days, Michael J. Kopper wakes up early, slips on a pair of khakis and hops into his Nissan sport utility vehicle for the short commute from his duplex in a Houston suburb to his job at Legacy Community Health Services, a community clinic. The Prada suits gather lint in his closet, and the shiny BMW 530 has been sold.

Mr. Kopper's work is different now: At Enron, he was a financial sophisticate who manufactured a series of arcane partnerships that paid him millions and helped to sink the company, which filed for bankruptcy in 2001. At Legacy, which provides health care and counseling services to H.I.V. patients and other chronically ill people, Mr. Kopper is a salaried grant writer who solicits financial support for the clinic.

It has been a wrenching professional and personal reversal for Mr. Kopper, who three years ago became the first Enron executive to plead guilty to criminal charges and cut a deal with the government. Mr. Kopper was also the first high-ranking Enron employee to publicly admit to lying and stealing - in his case, more than $16 million - from the company.

Mr. Kopper's money-making schemes, hatched together with Andrew S. Fastow, the former chief financial officer, lie at the root of the mercenary culture that propelled Enron to unforeseen heights while also paving the way for its Icarus-like descent.

The partnerships were feats of financial alchemy that became a dumping ground for Enron's flagging assets and helped sustain the growing fabulism of the company's accounting as a wide-eyed investing world watched in wonder. The partnerships also transformed Mr. Kopper from a by-the-books child of the New York suburbs with an expertise in accounting into a high-stepping Texas deal maker with a hankering for fast cars and big houses.

Despite all of this, there is a possibility that Mr. Kopper, who just turned 41, could end up spending not one day in prison, because of the crucial role he has played in helping the government build its case against more senior executives, such as Mr. Fastow; Kenneth L. Lay, the former chairman; Jeffrey K. Skilling, the former chief executive; and Richard A. Causey, the former chief accounting officer. Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling are scheduled to stand trial on fraud and conspiracy charges later this month.

Certainly, Mr. Kopper's circumstances have changed in the last three years. A year ago, he moved out of the $1.5 million dream house with its glass stairways and its contemporary Japanese motif that he had designed with his longtime partner, William D. Dodson. Mr. Kopper has recently pegged his net worth at around $100,000, and he now lives on the second story of a modest duplex for which he paid $380,000; he rents out the bottom floor to help meet his expenses.

Even so, Mr. Kopper manages to lead a bit of the good life. Despite spending hundreds of hours in conference rooms in Houston and Washington briefing government prosecutors on Enron's inner workings, Mr. Kopper, known as a compulsive jet-setter during his Enron days, has remained an enthusiastic traveler. He has visited Phoenix and played golf in Boca Raton, Fla., with his father, a former magazine publisher at Times Mirror, and has gone on ski vacations in Colorado.

Mr. Kopper and Mr. Dodson, who has not been charged, declined to comment for this article, although friends and former colleagues did.

Mr. Kopper's deal with the government and the chance that he might have a reduced term or serve no jail time at all - he has not yet been sentenced - have angered people who blame him and Mr. Fastow for destroying the life savings of many former Enron employees and sending to prison others who had just the briefest brush with the company.

"Of all the deals Kopper made, his best was the plea deal," said Richard J. Schaeffer, a defense lawyer who cross-examined him during the trial of the Enron and Merrill Lynch executives who were convicted of bolstering Enron's earnings by letting the company fraudulently appear to sell barges in Nigeria for a profit. "He was the magician behind these deals," Mr. Schaeffer added. "His sense of greed had overtaken him. He had this brilliant mind and dedicated it to this partnership of evil."

This public caricature of Mr. Kopper as a malevolent financial sorcerer seems at odds with his middle-class roots. Indeed, his road to the heart of the Enron scandal was unusual. Born in Brooklyn and reared in Woodmere on Long Island, Mr. Kopper was always driven by an extra spurt of ambition and yearning for the big time that for years seemed to lie just beyond his grasp, people who know him say. Writing in his yearbook at Lawrence High School in 1982, his aspiration seemed simple, if not a bit vague: "To be successful in all my endeavors."

HE first enrolled at tiny Muhlenberg College in Allentown, Pa., but transferred to Duke, where he earned a bachelor's degree in economics. He also earned a degree in accounting and finance from the London School of Economics, and then began working as a loan officer at Chemical Bank in New York.

But his appetite for deal-making lead him to Toronto Dominion Bank, where he cut his teeth as a financier, working on a number of project-finance deals with energy companies - including, in the early 1990's, Enron. It was then that he met Mr. Fastow. The two men hit it off immediately. Both were young, hard-working and ambitious numbers guys with an appetite for deals and a desire to strike it rich as soon as possible, people who know both men say. It did not take long for Mr. Kopper, an eager Nick Carraway susceptible to the lure of Mr. Fastow's Gatsby, to join his mentor in Houston in 1994.

Enron was developing a reputation as a freewheeling, innovative company, and its aggressive, meritocratic culture seemed the perfect fit for Mr. Kopper, who was looking to unleash his own pent-up professional and materialistic ambitions, former colleagues say. Once there, he became even closer to Mr. Fastow, going to temple with him and his wife, Leah, and socializing with them after work.

It was not until 1996 that Mr. Fastow and Mr. Kopper created their first off-balance-sheet partnership, which they called Alpine Investors. Mr. Kopper would make no money from this partnership, which was designed to buy underperforming power plants from Enron, but he would make money in 1997 with RADR, another off-the-books deal formed to buy wind farms that Enron wanted to sell.

Supposedly independent, RADR was financed with Enron money and controlled by Mr. Kopper and Mr. Fastow. They and some of their friends got payouts from the partnership, ultimately at Enron's expense. In that way, RADR was a template for more fraudulent schemes.

Mr. Kopper had begun dating Mr. Dodson, who worked in the finance department at Continental Airlines and also wanted to become an investor. But he was making only about $100,000 a year at Continental, so Mr. Kopper borrowed some money from Mr. Fastow - the amount has not been made public - and lent it to Mr. Dodson, according to Mr. Kopper's own testimony.

RADR was remarkably lucrative. In just four months, at virtually no risk, Mr. Kopper took in $40,000 from the deal. Mr. Fastow's $419,000 loan generated $62,850 in interest - an annualized return of 45 percent. It is not clear how much Mr. Dodson made. Enron's shareholders, meanwhile, footed the bill for the enterprise, which was designed to deceive them about the precarious state of Enron's balance sheet.

But it would be the next partnership, Chewco, also started in 1997, that would pay Mr. Kopper and Mr. Dodson an even more munificent return. "We made, after taxes, roughly $10.5 million," Mr. Kopper recounted to a defense lawyer during the trial in September 2004 on the separate Nigerian deal. (Mr. Kopper would collect more than $16 million from at least five partnerships that he and Mr. Fastow created over six years; with help from Mr. Dodson, he has paid $12 million back to the government, according to Creed C. Black Jr., Mr. Dodson's lawyer. Mr. Fastow collected more than $40 million, according to court documents.)

As the money rolled in, Mr. Kopper indulged his taste for sleek foreign cars and exotic vacations and cultivated a more risqué demeanor in and about the company. He wore expensive suits and shirts with zippers that seemed to creep lower and lower the more successful he became, his former colleagues at Enron remember. He told one colleague that he had a collection of 20 designer eyeglasses. Generally aloof with his colleagues, he made more of an effort to fit in, serving on an Enron diversity committee.

Of all the partnerships, it was perhaps Southampton, named after the opulent Houston suburb in which he lived, that came the closest to defining the corruptive, get-rich-quick and risk-free spirit of the off-balance-sheet entities at Enron. With three bankers from Greenwich NatWest, a British investment bank that did work for Enron, Mr. Kopper and Mr. Fastow created the partnership in 2000 to buy out the interests of Enron and NatWest in another entity, inserting themselves in the middle and deceiving both Enron and NatWest as to what they needed to pay.

ON the stand last year, Mr. Kopper described the essence of the deal in a flat, analytical style. "We stood between the two parties in order to skim money off of it," Mr. Kopper said, his face blank and voice devoid of emotion. How much did he make on the deal? "Four and a half million dollars," he said.

"That's a pretty good return on $25,000, isn't it?" a defense lawyer responded.

Yes, it was, Mr. Kopper said.

The lawyer asked how long it took to cobble together such a rich, efficient transaction. "Not that many hours," Mr. Kopper said. "Maybe 10 to 12 hours of work."

Honing in, the lawyer asked, "You wanted to make just a ton of money."

DOJ_NMG_0008699

In a monotone, Mr. Kopper said simply, "Yes."

By 2001, Mr. Kopper had his ton of money and was starting work on a new house in a wealthy Houston suburb with Mr. Dodson. Mr. Kopper had also bought out Mr. Fastow for full control of yet another off-balance-sheet entity created at Enron, LJM2. No longer would he be just another accounting executive; as general partner of LJM2, he would preside over a fast-growing private equity fund with some of the best names in high finance as investors.

But Mr. Kopper's time in the sun would be short-lived. With Enron's collapse in December 2001, he quickly came under the scrutiny of prosecutors and regulators who immediately questioned the propriety and legality of the myriad funds. The pressure became intense. Always a slender man, he began to lose weight, and when he pleaded guilty in 2002, he said he was taking medication for stress and anxiety.

As a government witness, Mr. Kopper, by all accounts, has been a success. At the barge trial last year, he powerfully evoked the financial cravings of Mr. Fastow, calling him "very greedy" and recounting examples of him giggling with childlike glee as he closed various deals.

The government has not put Mr. Kopper on the list of witnesses it expects to call in the trial of Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, but the defense has. Lawyers involved in the case say that Mr. Kopper may not even be called, given his lack of direct interaction with Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay. While the partnerships are expected to be a centerpiece of the trial, Mr. Fastow will be in a better position to discuss them and how they connect to Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling.

Friends of Mr. Kopper say he rarely speaks of Enron matters these days. He has ignored the imprecations cast at him by Mr. Lay, who has said that Enron was destroyed by the rogue actions of Mr. Fastow and Mr. Kopper - a view expressed by many members of Houston's business elite.

Always a bit of an outsider, Mr. Kopper is now even more of one. He is precluded by his plea agreement from speaking with Mr. Fastow and spends most of his time with Mr. Dodson and a small circle of friends from Enron.

And while he declined to comment for this article, his departing words in his 1982 high school yearbook seem to hold true today. Quoting from the song "Summer, Highland Falls" by Billy Joel, he wrote:

"We are always what our situations hand us. It's either sadness or euphoria."

Nacchio Could Point To Board's Actions (DENP)

By Andy Vuong, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, January 8, 2006

Former Qwest chief executive Joe Nacchio - accused of criminal insider trading for selling $100.8 million worth of Qwest stock in 2001 - may have a simple yet powerful defense for the sales: The board made him do it.

Qwest publicly stated on several occasions between September 2000 and February 2001 that its board of directors had ordered Nacchio to unload millions' worth of company shares.

Legal experts say the board's actions and company statements at the time could be vital to Nacchio's defense.

"He would argue that what he was doing was with full knowledge and authorization of the board," said Douglas McNabb, senior principal of McNabb Associates, a Washington, D.C.-based criminal defense law firm not involved in the Nacchio case. "That's huge."

Federal prosecutors are expected to argue that even if Nacchio was told to unload Qwest stock, the 42 stock sales he made between January and May 2001 were illegal because he was aware of key information about the company's financial condition that wasn't publicly available.

They likely will also assert that Nacchio accelerated his stock sales instead of following the board's order to systematically divest his position. To obtain a conviction, prosecutors would have to convince a jury beyond a reasonable doubt that Nacchio dumped stock while he knew Qwest's financial condition was much weaker than he claimed publicly.

Nacchio, of Mendham, N.J., has pleaded not guilty. A discovery hearing - where the prosecution and defense may disclose to each other additional details about their cases - is scheduled for Jan. 20.

The stakes are high for both sides as the case unfolds.

For the Justice Department, the Nacchio prosecution is the culmination of a sweeping probe of Qwest that has spanned four years.

If convicted, Nacchio faces up to 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine on each of the 42 counts against him. The government is also seeking the $100.8 million Nacchio grossed on the stock sales - plus other fines.

The dollar amount and number of counts against Nacchio make it one of the single largest criminal insider-trading cases.

Federal prosecutors and Nacchio's defense attorneys declined comment for this story.

Nacchio stopped selling

DOJ_NMG_0008700

In August 2000, after Qwest had acquired Denver-based Baby Bell US West, Nacchio exercised 550,000 stock options at $5.50 apiece and sold the shares at prices ranging from $49.05 to $53.34.

In September 2000, when those sales were disclosed publicly, a company spokesman said that the Qwest board had directed Nacchio to sell some of his shares every quarter because it didn't want his ownership stake to get too large.

"Joe has no choice - he is required to sell a portion of his position," Tyler Gronbach, Qwest's spokesman at the time, said in a Denver Post article on Sept. 15, 2000.

Nacchio held 18 million stock options throughout 2000.

Gronbach, who left Qwest last October to work for R.H. Donnelley Corp. in Cary, N.C., did not return calls for comment.

The Denver Post last week asked Qwest for minutes of board meetings that would shed light on Nacchio's stock sales. The company declined but gave this statement: "We continue in our efforts to cooperate with the government in connection with the investigation."

In February 2001, the company issued a news release announcing a program in which Nacchio would systematically sell 6.1 million shares over the next 28 months at the board's behest.

Under the program, Nacchio was to exercise and sell 11,500 stock options daily from Feb. 20, 2001, to June 30, 2003, the date when the stock options would have expired. He was to sell the stock regardless of its price.

"The Qwest board asked Nacchio to commit to the program to avoid the bunching of sales during and at the end of the exercise period," according to the Feb. 16, 2001, news release.

Experts say such programs are a common way for insiders to sell stock systematically without raising concerns on Wall Street and among the investing public.

On eight trading days, Nacchio exercised

Advertisement

11,500 stock options each day at a price of $5.50 apiece and sold those shares at a price ranging from $34.84 to $38.12. However, he scrapped the sales program two weeks after it was announced - reportedly because Qwest's stock was slipping below $35.

"I will not continue to sell shares daily at these prices given the current uncertainty in the markets," Nacchio said in a statement on March 2, 2001.

Nacchio's statements and actions in this period are critical.

Between Jan. 2, 2001, and May 29, 2001, the government alleges, Nacchio committed illegal insider trading by selling more than 2.5 million Qwest shares for $100.8 million while he knew the company's financial condition was weaker than disclosed.

Insiders at public companies - such as Nacchio at Qwest during that time - are required to sign Securities and Exchange Commission disclosures that they knew of no "material adverse information" about the company when selling stock.

Nacchio was forced out of Qwest in June 2002 as the company's deteriorating financial condition became known. Qwest stock traded as low as $1.11 in August 2002. It was later forced to restate $2.5 billion in revenues.

What he knew is critical

The board's mandate to Nacchio to sell shares is "a good fact for the defense," said Jay Brown, a former Securities and Exchange attorney and law professor at the University of Denver.

Brown added that Nacchio can still be convicted for insider trading on stock sales made under the board's mandate if he had knowledge of material, nonpublic information at the time.

"Certainly the defense would use any information that tends to negate Nacchio's intent to commit any wrongful activity," said Eric Yaffe, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice with Gray Plant Mooty in Washington, D.C.

"But the question is, are there other issues or factors and other evidence of which the government is aware of" that would counteract the information, Yaffe said.

Former Qwest chief financial officer Robin Szeliga has pleaded guilty to one count of illegal insider trading and agreed to help with the prosecution's case against Nacchio.

The government charged Szeliga with illegal insider trading for an April 30, 2001, stock sale in which she sold 10,000 Qwest shares at $41 a share. On the same day, Nacchio sold 110,000 shares for $41.12, a transaction cited in his criminal indictment.

Last month, former Qwest executive vice president Marc Weisberg reached a plea deal on one charge of wire fraud and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors.

Former Qwest president Afshin Mohebbi also may testify for the government.

In October 2004, Qwest agreed to pay $250 million to settle SEC charges alleging financial fraud. In November 2005, the company agreed to pay $400 million to settle a class-action shareholder lawsuit.

No past or present Qwest board member has been charged as part of the federal government's probe into Qwest.
Several former board members who served during Nacchio's tenure didn't return calls seeking comment.
Staff writer Andy Vuong can be reached at 303-820-1209 or avuong@denverpost.com.

G.O.P. Finds Hope In Spitzer's Hard Edge (NYT)

By Patrick D. Healy
The New York Times, January 8, 2006

Attorney General Eliot Spitzer entered 2006 with huge advantages in his race to become the first Democratic governor of New York in 12 years: nearly $18 million on hand, a 70 percent popularity rating, and so much success fighting corporate fraud that he is one of the nation's most powerful prosecutors.

Yet for the first time since Mr. Spitzer declared for office a year ago, New York Republican leaders are now expressing hope that they can exploit what they view as a weak spot in the armor: his temperament, or, more precisely, his temper.

And, for the first time in a long time, some Democrats appear worried for Mr. Spitzer, and are trying to portray his tough style as an asset. Meanwhile, Mr. Spitzer is expressing new regret about his behavior.

Stories about Mr. Spitzer's blunt, brash style have circulated in business and political circles for years. Yet few spilled into the news media until last month, when John C. Whitehead, a Wall Street power broker whom Gov. George E. Pataki named as chairman of the Lower Manhattan Redevelopment Commission, said that Mr. Spitzer had told him that there was "a war between us" because he had criticized Mr. Spitzer as an overzealous, overreaching prosecutor.

Mr. Whitehead made his complaints known in a letter to The Wall Street Journal, and The New York Post ran articles on the dispute last month, including one with a front-page headline that said Mr. Spitzer was a "Liar!"

Since then, the issue of Mr. Spitzer's personality has begun to emerge in political circles, with Republicans circulating reports of his behavior in several disagreements over the last several years.

A spokesman for Representative Sue Kelly, a Republican, said Mr. Spitzer had acted like a thug during one argument by saying that he would cause trouble for her in her district if she continued to oppose legislation he favored.

Three fellow Democrats confirmed that he turned hot-tempered when they challenged him.

And in a quarrel with the attorney general of California, Mr. Spitzer told him that he was a kid from the Bronx who was willing to "step outside" to settle fights, according to a magazine article.

Democrats have sought to portray the encounters as simply reflecting the tough, no-nonsense approach that Mr. Spitzer takes toward his work.

Mr. Spitzer disputed some aspects of these anecdotes. But he also expressed his first measure of doubt about his aggressive manner since he was elected in 1998.

"On occasion, I look back and say, 'I wish I could take some of my words back,' " Mr. Spitzer said in an interview. He declined to list instances in which he thought he had been intemperate or overreacted, but said: "Have my answers or responses sometimes been disproportionate? I guess I'd be disingenuous - there have been moments, there are times I would look back and say, maybe that didn't merit that kind of response."

Mr. Spitzer stood by his actions in his legal cases. Yet describing himself, he used a range of words: passionate, intense, vociferous and sensitive. He used the phrase "kids in a sandbox" to describe a heated argument last spring with a possible Republican rival in the governor's race, Tom Golisano. But Mr. Spitzer said he had never threatened people, nor made his disputes personal.

He also said for the first time that he regretted his exchange with Mr. Whitehead. The two men disagree on whether Mr. Spitzer used the word war: Mr. Whitehead stood by it in an interview, while Mr. Spitzer said he was at war with some people whom Mr. Whitehead was defending, but not with the man himself.

"I have enormous respect for John Whitehead," Mr. Spitzer said. "So I absolutely regret that he and I, at this moment, are seeing things a bit differently, and I will work to repair that." Asked if he had handled the exchange badly, Mr. Spitzer said, "Looking at how it is played out, I think it would be hard to say this was wisely handled."

Temperament has rarely surfaced as an issue in Mr. Spitzer's past races. But when he was running for attorney general in 1998, he and former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani tangled after Mr. Spitzer said that Mr. Giuliani governed like "a dictator." Mr. Spitzer narrowly won that race, against Dennis C. Vacco, the Republican.

Mr. Spitzer was re-elected overwhelmingly in 2002, in a race that drew scant attention and preceded some of his most contentious lawsuits and that came at a time when his enemies were not so numerous.

Republican politicians said they planned to make his temperament an issue in the 2006 campaign, hoping to portray him as unlikable, arrogant, and a poor coalition-builder.

DOJ_NMG_0008702

"He has never been challenged like he will be in this race for governor," said William F. Weld, a Republican candidate for governor, in a recent interview. "I think once the case is made against him, voters will see a very different Eliot Spitzer."

Some Democratic office-holders in Albany, meanwhile, were swapping tales of their own about Mr. Spitzer as they prepared for Gov. George E. Pataki's final legislative session. Their main concern is that Republican adversaries will portray Mr. Spitzer as thin-skinned; privately, some worry that the hothouse of the governor's race could bring out rough edges of his personality.

Steven Sanders, a former Democratic assemblyman and an ally of Mr. Spitzer's, recalled that when he challenged Mr. Spitzer's tactics on a lawsuit over equity in public school financing, Mr. Spitzer turned sharp and said he was not interested in "a back-and-forth discussion." Mr. Sanders recounted the anecdote to suggest that Mr. Spitzer "really has that direct, relentless quality that Rudy Giuliani has, and maybe at times that comes across as too brusque, too abrupt, maybe even threatening in some ways. He simply takes his responsibilities and standing his ground seriously."

Assemblyman Richard L. Brodsky, who confirmed fighting with Mr. Spitzer because the attorney general pressed him to back off a legal dispute before the state, said that Mr. Spitzer's successes were more important than personality issues.

"Let's be fair: We all have rough edges, but this is a guy who has fundamentally altered international markets for the good," said Mr. Brodsky, who is running for attorney general this year.

Mr. Spitzer acknowledged that he has argued with Democratic allies - Assemblywoman Catherine Nolan also confirmed a shouting match over a local issue - but he said that the disagreements were substantive, and that they all were friends at the end of the day. Mr. Sanders, Mr. Brodsky and Ms. Nolan all concurred.

Of the occasions that turned contentious, Mr. Spitzer said: "I've always tried - and not always succeeded after the fact - to patch up the relationship. This is never personal to me, never."

Some Democrats were far more critical of Mr. Spitzer's behavior, though none were willing to speak on the record because they said they did not want to anger the man they believe will be the next New York governor. The party has largely united around Mr. Spitzer's candidacy, and he is preparing to announce a large fund-raising war chest on Jan. 15 - at least $18 million - that rivals his poll numbers in impressiveness.

Yet at least one Democrat, Nassau County Executive Thomas R. Suozzi, is taking heart from the anecdotes about Mr. Spitzer, as he prepares to announce an exploratory committee for governor, according to party members who have spoken to him. Mr. Suozzi's political aide declined to comment.

Mr. Suozzi is drawing help from Spitzer adversaries like Kenneth G. Langone, a co-founder of Home Depot, who said in an interview that he has raised about $1 million for Mr. Suozzi in just the last few weeks. Mr. Spitzer's office has accused Mr. Langone and others of misleading fellow New York Stock Exchange members about the compensation paid to Richard A. Grasso, the former stock exchange chairman.

Beyond the charges, Mr. Langone says he is furious over a remark that Mr. Spitzer made about him in 2004 to Jack Welch, the former General Electric leader.

Mr. Spitzer said in the interview that he told Mr. Welch, "Ken's kind of like a vampire - you kind of have to put a stake through his heart to stop him."

Mr. Langone said Mr. Welch told him that Mr. Spitzer wanted to drive a stake through his heart; Mr. Spitzer denied that he used those words, and Mr. Welch did not respond to a message left on his cellphone.

Mr. Spitzer is under intense scrutiny right now because polls show him as the leading candidate. His advisers also acknowledged that they wanted to boost his favorability ratings among women, and that his image now cuts both ways: strong and tough, but aggressive and stern, too.

The argument with Representative Kelly occurred in 2003, when she and Mr. Spitzer sparred over the phone about a piece of legislation that would have hampered Mr. Spitzer's white-collar investigations. Her spokesman at the time, Rob Ostrander, told The Poughkeepsie Journal that Mr. Spitzer acted like a "thug" by threatening to come into her Westchester district and cause problems for her.

Her current spokesman, Kevin Callahan, said Mrs. Kelly stands by the "thug" description, but added that she and Mr. Spitzer had worked together since then. Mrs. Kelly declined to comment.

Mr. Spitzer said the thug characterization was unfair. He said the conversation grew heated because he thought "her position was really bad for consumers." He added: "I said something like, 'I really disagree with you, and I'll tell the voters about it.'"

Mr. Spitzer's warnings may seem like threats to some, said Stephen Cutler, the former director of enforcement with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

He recalled how Mr. Spitzer was "very, very angry" when the S.E.C. settled a securities fraud lawsuit against Putnam Investments, the mutual fund giant, without the sort of fines or monetary penalties that Mr. Spitzer wanted.

"He said, 'Look, I'm going to have to do what I'm going to have to do. I'm going to go out publicly and make life uncomfortable for you and the S.E.C.,' " said Mr. Cutler, who clashed frequently with Mr. Spitzer but said they remained friendly.

While arguments have usually been over policy, Mr. Spitzer said his sense of humor could backfire on him, too. In another incident, he said he was "joking" when, according to The American Lawyer magazine, his argument with the California attorney general, Bill Lockyer over a financial dispute turned heated and Mr. Spitzer said: "You want to step outside, that's fine! I grew up in the Bronx!"

"Of all the anecdotes, that has been the most misconstrued," Mr. Spitzer said. "It was more joking, fun." The magazine said its account was based on several unnamed people who witnessed the exchange. Mr. Lockyer did not return a phone message.

A breakfast last spring at the Waldorf-Astoria with Mr. Golisano also turned sour as he accused Mr. Spitzer, both sides confirm, of being "in the pocket" of Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver and the Albany Democratic establishment.

According to an aide to Mr. Golisano, Mr. Spitzer replied that he would "crush" him in an election. "I didn't say, 'I'll crush you,' I said 'I think I'll beat you, let's put a bet on it,'" Mr. Spitzer recalled. "It's like kids in a sandbox."

Mr. Spitzer said he believed that voters would ultimately appreciate that his results in office - hundreds of millions of dollars recouped for New York - required a certain intensity.

He said a similar intensity was needed to overhaul Albany, and besides, he said, it would be pointless to try to deny who he was.

"I don't want to strip my personality so far down to be neutered and I don't seem human," he said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Dems Charge GOP Has Corrupted Congress (AP-Y2)

AP, January 8, 2006

Democrats accused Republican congressional leaders of corrupting the government, claiming on Saturday that their party has higher ethical standards.

"Under Republican guidance, America has truly been put up for sale to the highest bidder," Rep. Louise Slaughter, D-N.Y., said in her party's weekly radio address.

Congress was consumed this week by the corruption scandal around lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty and is cooperating in a wide-ranging probe that could involve up to 20 members of Congress and their aides.

Politicians from both parties have rushed to unload donations from Abramoff or his clients, while others have decided to keep such donations, insisting they did nothing wrong.

Slaughter painted the Abramoff case and an earlier guilty plea by former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., as part of a broader pattern of misconduct by Republicans under the sway of highly paid lobbyists.

"Sadly, the legacy of Republican rule has been the fundamental degradation of our democratic institutions and the abandonment of our core principles," Slaughter said.

"Lobbyists are now writing the bills passed by Congress," she contended. "They have infiltrated every aspect of our government. Their money and donations shape the opinions of corrupt lawmakers in a way that public opinion no longer does."

Slaughter said the unethical influence of lobbyists has affected everything from the Iraq war to energy policy to the new Medicare prescription drug plan.

The 10-term congresswoman said her party will "uphold the highest standards of integrity."

Repeating a Democratic tag line, Slaughter said, "Together, America can do better."

Democrats Want Sweeping House Ethics Investigation (REU-Y2)

Reuters, January 8, 2006

Democrats seized on a mushrooming scandal involving a disgraced lobbyist on Saturday to call for sweeping ethics probes in the Republican-led House of Representatives.

Rep. Louise Slaughter, a New York Democrat, said lobbyists had multiplied by the thousands in recent years to the point where there were now 63 of them for every lawmaker. She said they were using their campaign donations to influence policy and even write laws.

Slaughter called on the House ethics committee to investigate corruption cases involving lawmakers with links to Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist who pleaded guilty this week in a U.S. corruption probe.

DOJ_NMG_0008704

"The House ethics committee, after a year of inaction, must get to work immediately to investigate pending ethics and corruption cases in the House, including those involving members with ties to Jack Abramoff," she said in the Democrats' weekly radio address.

"This is a necessary first step to restore a high ethical standard to the Congress," Slaughter said.

There was no immediate comment from a spokesman for the ethics committee, chaired by Rep. Doc Hastings, a Washington Republican.

But Republicans have sought to cast the Abramoff case as a bipartisan scandal, noting that some Democrats also received donations from Abramoff's clients and associates.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to fraud charges and admitted that he gave golf trips, sports tickets and other gifts to lawmakers in return for special treatment.

The case has deepened the woes of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, a Texas Republican whom Abramoff describes as a close friend. It has spurred a debate in the Republican Party over whether DeLay should return to his leadership post even if cleared of money-laundering charges in a separate case in Texas.

Democrats hope to turn the Abramoff scandal into a major election-year issue that could help them win back control of the House in the November elections.

DeLay Ends Bid To Regain Post As G.O.P. Leader (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 - Representative Tom DeLay, under pressure from colleagues and swept into an election-year lobbying scandal, abandoned his effort to remain House majority leader on Saturday. The move touched off a battle for the House Republican leadership in a campaign season tinged by corruption.

In letters sent Saturday to fellow House Republicans and Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Mr. DeLay said he supported the call for an election of a new leader and was stepping aside to avoid becoming a political liability as Republicans face a determined Democratic challenge to their majority.

"The job of majority leader and the mandate of the Republican majority are too important to be hamstrung, even for a few months, by personal distractions," Mr. DeLay said in the letter to Mr. Hastert, the man he personally picked to take the speaker's job in a previous round of leadership turmoil in 1998. In his letter to the Republican conference, Mr. DeLay said he had "always acted in an ethical manner within the rules of our body and the laws of our land."

Though his allies just hours earlier had suggested Mr. DeLay would resist moves to oust him, his aides said he came to a different conclusion on his own Saturday morning in Texas as he assessed his waning support and the potential damage to House Republicans. He then telephoned Mr. Hastert to deliver his decision, according to a House leadership aide who did not want to be identified discussing private conversations.

Mr. Hastert said Republicans would hold a leadership election after they return for the State of the Union address on Jan. 31. "It is an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican conference," he said of Mr. DeLay's announcement. Mr. DeLay acted after a group of House Republicans on Friday began circulating a petition calling for an election to bar him from the post. The move came after the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, a former DeLay ally, pleaded guilty on Tuesday to criminal corruption charges in a case that could also involve other former senior DeLay aides.

Mr. DeLay intends to seek re-election to his seat representing the Houston suburbs and reclaim his position on the Appropriations Committee, but he will no longer wield the power that for years made him one of the most influential Republicans in the capital.

His decision immediately kicked off a potentially divisive fight over who should become the new leader - a chief face of the party as well as the senior floor strategist.

Representative Roy Blunt of Missouri, the No. 3 elected Republican who has been filling in for Mr. DeLay since his September indictment in Texas in a campaign-finance case, began rounding up support by telephone, arguing that his success in pushing through difficult budget and spending legislation in the past few months had proved his abilities and earned him the job permanently.

But Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, a well-liked lawmaker who has served in the leadership before, was expected to announce his own candidacy as early as Sunday.

Others could also throw in their names, including Representatives Mike Pence of Indiana, Mike Rogers of Michigan and Jerry Lewis of California. Should Mr. Blunt prevail in the majority leader's fight, that would create a vacancy for majority whip and lawmakers were also preparing for a potential contest for that post. Mr. Rogers was seen as a possible candidate along with Representatives Eric Cantor of Virginia, the appointed deputy whip, and Zach Wamp of Tennessee. Lawmakers and top aides said there seemed to be no mounting challenge to either Mr. Hastert or Representative Deborah Pryce of Ohio, the chairwoman of the party conference.

A White House spokeswoman, Erin Healy, reading from an official statement, said, "We respect Congressman DeLay's decision to put the interests of the American people, the House of Representatives and the Republican Party first. We look forward to continuing to work with Speaker Hastert and all House Republicans to build upon the important accomplishments we have achieved on behalf of the American people to make America safer and more prosperous."

It was not clear whether Bush administration officials played any role in pushing Mr. DeLay out, and Republicans who consulted with the White House and leadership on Capitol Hill said events had unfolded strictly within Congress.

Mr. DeLay stepped down from the post in the fall after his indictment in Texas on campaign-related charges of money laundering. But he was aggressively battling those accusations, and many of his colleagues considered the case partisan. But the Abramoff plea and the potential involvement in that case of others who had been close to Mr. DeLay shifted the political dynamic.

House Republicans have stood by Mr. DeLay, who became majority leader in 2002 after serving for years as the party whip, despite a series of rebukes by the House ethics committee and a ferocious courtship of the lobbying industry that brought him under attack for having too heavy a hand in encouraging firms to hire favored Republican lobbyists. Democrats have complained for years about Mr. DeLay's iron control of the House, his unwillingness to engage the minority party and his ethical conduct. One Democratic leader said Saturday that his decision to step down would not spare Republicans from attacks over ethics.

"The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress," said Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader.

Those backing the petition drive for a new leader had hoped that Mr. DeLay would take himself out of the fight rather than have to be forced out by his colleagues. Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Mr. DeLay, said he made his choice after talking with his staff and other advisers and weighing his options.

"He doesn't see this as being broken," Mr. Madden said. "I think it is something that he sees as being best for the conference."

DeLay Steps Down Permanently As House Majority Leader (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - Tom DeLay, the pugnacious Texas Republican dogged by ethics complaints, stepped down permanently as House majority leader Saturday, the first political casualty of a blossoming Washington lobbying scandal.

Maintaining that he has "always acted in an ethical manner," DeLay nonetheless told House Republican lawmakers in a letter that he was permanently stepping down because "I cannot allow our adversaries to divide and distract our attention."

DeLay was forced to step down temporarily as leader in September when he was indicted by a Texas grand jury on charges that he broke state campaign finance laws. But the final straw came last week when Jack Abramoff, a once-powerful Republican lobbyist with close ties to DeLay, pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

DeLay reached his decision Saturday in Texas, a day after two House Republicans initiated a drive to keep DeLay from reclaiming his leadership post and to hold elections to replace him permanently.

DeLay will keep a seat on the powerful House Appropriations Committee, which distributes government money, and plans to run for re-election. But the departure from the leadership of a key figure in pushing President Bush's agenda for the past five years could hobble the White House in the future. DeLay's stepping down may be some help to House Republicans, who've benefited from DeLay's tactical and fundraising prowess, but have also seen their popularity plummet nationally amid headline-making scandals in which he often had a role.

An Associated Press-Ipsos poll released Friday showed the American public favored Democrats over Republicans 49 percent to 36 percent for Congress. Democrats need 15 seats in the 435-member House of Representatives to win control.

Delay's resignation from the leadership threw the House into an unpredictable phase that will test House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill. Hastert is well regarded by his colleagues, but the House Republican caucus was already stirring with demands for greater leadership changes.

"We don't just need new leaders, we need a major course correction," Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., one of the two lawmakers who prompted the effort to replace DeLay, said in an interview Saturday.

Even before DeLay reached his decision, Rep. Melissa Hart, R-Pa., demanded Friday in a statement that the Republican House membership "needs the ability to reassess the leadership team as a whole."

DOJ_NMG_0008706

Hastert, who abruptly canceled a foreign trip he was to embark upon Monday, said he would schedule leadership elections for the week of Jan. 31. A top leadership aide, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the elections, said current plans are only to fill DeLay's vacancy, not other leadership posts.

A leadership fight could disrupt the House's handling of some important upcoming legislative issues. Among them are the renewal of the anti-terrorism Patriot Act, which expires Feb. 3, reductions in planned spending for anti-poverty programs and billions of dollars in tax cuts.

DeLay, in a letter to Hastert, indicated that it was best for the party if he stepped aside. "The job of majority leader and the mandate of the Republican majority are too important to be hamstrung, even for a few months, by personal distractions," he wrote.

Hastert, in a statement, said Delay's was "an honorable decision and the right decision for the House Republican Conference."

Democrats showed no signs of relenting after DeLay stepped down.

"By forcing out Tom DeLay, Republicans have addressed a party problem but not the institutional problem of corruption that most troubles the American people," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., the chairman of the campaign arm of the House Democrats.

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said: "The culture of corruption is so pervasive in the Republican conference that a single person stepping down is not nearly enough to clean up the Republican Congress."

Flake said rank-and-file Republicans will insist on elections that force leadership candidates to propose fundamental changes in the ways that legislators work. Flake has called for an end to targeted legislative provisions, called earmarks, that lawmakers insert into bills to help their congressional districts or special interests. Earmarks are a favorite of lobbyists seeking special legislative treatment.

Flake said even Hastert's fate could hang on the elections. "It really depends on how willing the speaker is to align himself with a reform agenda," Flake said.

Among the leading candidates to replace DeLay are Roy Blunt of Missouri and John Boehner of Ohio. Blunt stepped in to become acting majority leader after DeLay was indicted in Texas. Boehner is chairman of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce and was once a member of the leadership team.

In statements issued Saturday, Blunt and Boehner both praised DeLay as one of the party's most effective leaders. But while Boehner noted that he and DeLay "have had our differences over the years," Blunt described DeLay as "my good friend."

Republicans Seek Elections To Replace DeLay (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Washington

Financial Times, January 8, 2006

As Washington assesses the impact of the lobbyist Jack Abramoff's guilty plea this week to charges of bribery, tax evasion and fraud, one early casualty has emerged: Tom DeLay, the former majority leader of the House of Representatives.

Mr DeLay, a central figure in the conservative movement, was forced to step down from his leadership post in September after a Texas prosecutor indicted him on unrelated money-laundering charges. He had hoped to resolve that matter quickly and resume his duties.

But the case against Mr Abramoff, who has close ties to Mr DeLay, along with a guilty plea to corruption charges by Michael Scanlon, a former DeLay aide, and the potential involvement of other former aides – as well as the continuing legal battle in Texas – appear to have scuppered that plan.

Several rank-and-file Republicans in the House said on Friday they would circulate a petition in the next few days calling for leadership elections to formally replace Mr DeLay, who many fear could become a liability in the November 2006 mid-term elections.

Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker who led the Republican takeover of Congress in 1994, said this week that while Mr DeLay must defend himself in court, “the House Republican party has a different set of interests and [they] involve having a new majority leader”.

The Wall Street Journal editorial page weighed in on Friday, saying Mr DeLay and the Republicans “should move on separately”.

John Green, director of the Bliss Institute of Applied Politics at the University of Akron, said: “Just for purely practical reasons, the Republicans are not going to want him back in the leadership position.”

Just as the high costs of Hurricane Katrina prompted a backlash among fiscal conservatives in the Republican party, the Abramoff scandal is prompting a broader self-examination among Republicans. “The party that swept to power on term limits, spending restraint and reform has become the party of incumbency, 6,371 highway-bill 'earmarks', and K Street [the site of many lobbyists' offices]," the Journal said.

DOJ_NMG_0008707

But replacing Mr DeLay poses challenges."Whatever one may think of his politics, he was very good at rounding up votes," said Mr Green.

Roy Blunt, who has filled in for Mr DeLay since September, is considered the frontrunner to succeed him. But Mr Blunt has been criticised for what are seen as mis-steps on the House floor.

A leadership campaign threatens to expose divisions within the Republican caucus, between Mr DeLay's allies and other factions, and between fiscal conservatives and moderates.

Republicans have pointed out that politicians from both parties had ties to Mr Abramoff. Dozens of lawmakers, as well as President George W. Bush, have said they will return political contributions from Mr Abramoff or donate the funds to charity.

Charlie Cook, a political analyst, says the full impact of the case will depend on how many, and which, politicians Mr Abramoff implicates. "So far, the vast majority of voters have no earthly idea who Abramoff is, and they don't see his troubles as primarily a Republican problem."

Democratic Leader Takes Anti-Corruption Message To GOP Turf (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

Harry M. Reid is heading into the belly of the beast.

The Senate minority leader will spend much of this week traveling to "red states" -- those that voted for George W. Bush in 2004 -- to campaign for candidates, raise cash and bash Republicans on the issue of corruption.

Dubbed by his office "Reid's Red State Tour," the three-day journey will take the Nevada senator through Arizona, Colorado, Utah, Idaho and Nebraska. He will be in Phoenix and Denver on Tuesday, Salt Lake City and Pocatello on Wednesday and Omaha on Thursday. It is one of several such campaign swings Reid has planned between now and the November midterm elections, according to his office.

In each state Reid will conduct events seeking to highlight the need to "restore honest leadership in Washington, D.C.," said his spokesman Jim Manley.

But Reid also has a pecuniary motive. He plans to raise money for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee at each of his five stops.

Take, for example, his jaunt to Nebraska. According to an itinerary of the visit, Reid will join Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) to "send a strong message that Americans don't have to accept more of the same corruption and cronyism that pervades Washington today." Left off the itinerary is a DSCC event in Omaha hosted by Reid that Nelson plans to attend.

With official Washington clamoring to deal with the fallout from last week's plea agreement by fallen lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Reid's trip comes at an opportune time for a party whose members are seeking to cast themselves as outsiders to corruption.

"Americans everywhere want elected officials who will fight for them," Reid said. "We're ready to clean up Washington, and we're going to make our case across this country."

Republican National Committee spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt drew a different conclusion when informed of Reid's travels.

"You can take Harry Reid out of Washington, but you can't take the Washington out of Harry Reid," Schmitt said. "Does he plan to brag about killing the Patriot Act or shutting down the United States Senate?"Vegas Mayor Ready to Gamble on Senate Bid?

Meanwhile, back in Sin City, the Senate minority leader confirmed last week that he has spoken to Las Vegas Mayor Oscar Goodman (D) about possibly challenging Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) in 2006.

Harry M. Reid told the Associated Press that he was "happy to give [Goodman] any advice or counsel that he needs or wants." Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, has also spoken with Goodman about a potential candidacy. Jack Carter, son of former president Jimmy Carter, is also considering a bid against Ensign.

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer said Goodman and Carter are "quality" candidates, and pointed to a Zogby International poll conducted online last fall that showed Ensign with a 45 percent to 42.5 percent edge over Goodman. "If Ensign thought he'd have an easy ride in 2006, he was mistaken," Singer added.

"We're very confident that Senator Ensign will be reelected based on his strong record in the Senate and the great work he has done for the state of Nevada," responded National Republican Senatorial Committee spokesman Brian Nick.

A Goodman Senate bid would set off a political circus worthy of a Vegas casino.

Long before being elected mayor in 1999, Goodman was a high-profile -- and controversial -- figure in Las Vegas as the lead attorney for a number of high-profile Mafia figures, including Meyer Lansky and Tony "The Ant" Spilotro. Goodman has embraced the "what happens here stays here" motto of his city as its mayor -- he is regularly accompanied by showgirls and has a weak spot for Elvis impersonators.

DOJ_NMG_0008708

Putting aside Goodman's flamboyant personality, if Reid is seen as advocating a bid by the mayor it could signal a break in the unstated truce that has been in effect between him and Ensign since Ensign won a Senate seat in 2000. Asked whether Reid was encouraging Goodman to enter the race, spokeswoman Tessa Hafen said -- carefully -- that the minority leader "was not trying to convince Goodman to run."Frist Looks Northward for Rebound

Seeking to right his presidential bid after a calamitous 2005, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist will headline the Lincoln-Reagan Day Dinner in Hampstead, N.H., on Feb. 3.

The visit to the Granite State -- home of the first-in-the-nation presidential primary -- will be the Tennessee Republican's second since early December, when he made stops in Manchester, Concord and Portsmouth.

With Frist beginning his final year in the Senate, expect his attentions to turn more and more to the presidential race. In an e-mail sent last week from his Volunteer PAC leadership committee, Frist urged supporters to attend a presidential 2008 straw poll to be at the Southern Republican Leadership Conference in Memphis in March.

Cillizza is a staff writer for washingtonpost.com. His online column on politics, The Fix, appears daily athttp://www.washingtonpost.com/thefix.

Scandal Exposes Washington's Underside (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, January 8, 2006

A luxury skybox for sports fans in Congress. A dinner party that raises thousands of dollars for a political candidate. Helpful suggestions on how the guest of honor might phrase a letter to the president or a Cabinet secretary.

Alone and even in modest combinations, all are examples of business as usual in Washington's billion-dollar world of government, lobbying and campaign finance.

What makes it work is discretion.

What's blown the lid on it now is lobbyist Jack Abramoff's excesses.

It's the unwritten rules as much as the written ones that Abramoff broke: Don't gloat, don't be too greedy, don't say out loud what you're doing, and don't ever, ever, put in writing what you don't have to.

There is one other clear difference between Abramoff's actions and those of other lobbyists.

"He defrauded his clients. That's a big difference," said Kathleen Clark, a government ethics expert at the Washington University law school in St. Louis.

Abramoff, who faces up to 11 years in prison after pleading guilty last week to conspiracy, mail fraud and tax evasion charges, also got caught. A maze of campaign finance laws and lobbying rules makes it hard to prove a lawmaker took an official action under a "quid pro quo" agreement with a generous lobbyist.

"The scandal with Abramoff is just the enormity of it," said Roberta Baskin, executive director of the Center for Public Integrity, a private ethics watchdog group. "Who knows if there are others like him out there or not."

If so, it's unlikely they had all of Abramoff's trappings:

_Foreign golf trips arranged for former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, and the chairman of the House Administration Committee, Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio.

_Fundraisers at his skybox or at his upscale Signatures restaurant on Pennsylvania Avenue exactly half way between the Capitol and the White House.

_Job offers for top Bush administration officials and senior aides of congressional leaders and committee chairmen.

"He's exceptional in that he was pushing so many levers at once," said Frank Clemente, director of Public Citizen's Congress Watch.

More may be known soon.

Under a plea deal with federal prosecutors, Abramoff's e-mails and other documents will be the stuff of federal court proceedings that will expose the mysterious and protected world of Washington lobbying.

Because the law requires limited transparency of lobbyist-lawmaker dealings, the differences between Abramoff and other lobbyists are not entirely clear.

Lobbyists, legislators, campaign fundraisers and presidential appointees frequently wear different hats over the course of their careers. It's been pretty much that way since the nation's beginning. Even public integrity watchdogs acknowledge that lobbyists, properly regulated, are important advocates in the American system of government.

The ethical boundaries get blurred when people play two or more parts, often in the same day.

DOJ_NMG_0008709

Rainmakers raise colossal amounts of money that candidates need to wage and win campaigns. Lobbyists try to persuade lawmakers and presidentially appointed officials to take actions that benefit their clients. Often they are one and the same.

What is hard to prove is whether lobbyists press officials — and whether the officials agree — to pony up these official acts out of gratitude for campaign money or other gifts of value, such as skybox seats and exotic trips. The law says such a quid pro quo only can be proved when explicitly uttered or written down.

Hence, the unwritten rules: Whatever events or contributions might have preceded a public policy decision that benefits the lobbyist's clients, don't talk about it and don't put anything in writing that isn't required.

Abramoff violated both, and the law, in vivid detail.

"Is life great or what!!" he exulted in an e-mail to an associate with whom he pocketed $66 million from six American Indian tribes seeking influence in Washington.

In a series of e-mails and other documents, Abramoff explained that in 2002 he and an associate secretly funneled millions of dollars to consultant Ralph Reed, a former Christian Coalition leader, to help shut down a Texas casino operated by the Tigua Indians.

Then Abramoff persuaded the Tiguas to hire him and his associate, public relations consultant Michael Scanlon, to help reopen the casino.

"The annoying losers are the only ones which have this kind of money and part with it so quickly," Abramoff wrote to Scanlon.

Abramoff also explained how some of the money would be doled out: "He (Scanlon) divided the $5 million into three piles: $1 million for actual expenses and $2 million for each of us."

White House Watch: (PPG)

By Ann McFeatters

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Tempting as it is to say a pox on all their houses, we are confronted with the question of the extent of corruption in Washington's political circles.

Are government officials and actions, in fact, for sale?

The once-flamboyant, multi-hatted Jack Abramoff, whose name is now synonymous with political turpitude, survived and thrived because many powerful members of Congress eagerly accepted his contributions to their re-election campaigns.

Politicians from President Bush on down through the ranks of Congress took the Abramoff largess because they wanted to be re-elected. To stay in power, pols raise millions of dollars to defeat opponents.

There are no vicuna coats in this scandal, as far as we know (fur being politically incorrect at the moment). No call-girl ring has been busted on Capitol Hill (albeit the aphrodisiac of power will be with us until the end of time). But this latest spate of revealed corruption will do far more harm because it is so entrenched, so sophisticated and so sickening.

What lobbyists such as Mr. Abramoff seek is a seat at the table when laws are written and regulations are finalized so that their clients' interests hold sway.

There is not one aspect of human life untouched by congressional hands. The air we breathe, the food we eat, the cars we drive, the medicines we take, how we invest our money, the way we die, the care we get when we're sick or old -- it all is regulated, and Congress has oversight over everything.

We do not yet know whether the latest West Virginia coal-mine tragedy was caused by violation of safety rules. We do know that the Bush administration has not issued one significant coal-mine safety regulation in five years. We do know that despite promising mammoth increases in penalties for safety violations, the administration has yet to act to demand them. We do know that the first person the administration put in charge of mine safety came from the mining industry and had vehement views on the need to get government off its back. We do know that congressional oversight on mine safety has been abysmal.

There is a line between excessive regulation, which stultifies business expansion, and too light a federal hand on business, which means the worker and the consumer get shafted.

This administration has worked hard to lift the heavy hands of federal regulators off the shoulders of big business (less so off small business). Strident voices such as Ralph Nader's have been loudly complaining, but for many reasons have been ignored.

Sometimes critics cried wolf too often. Sometimes the intricacies of the issues they raised were too daunting for all but the most dedicated zealots to unravel. And when fewer people buy newspapers, there are fewer reporters paid to dig into mounds of arcane records searching for evidence of fraud and abuse. (TV sometimes tries, but is woefully unable to commit the needed manpower to investigative reporting.)

DOJ_NMG_0008710

There is a noble purpose to lobbying. No legislator can be adequately familiar with every aspect of every bill. Lobbyists from all sides of an issue -- for example, for the coal company, for the worker and for the environmental group -- compete to get their interests written into legislation. What is unfair and illegal is when lobbyists with big bucks spread them around in a way calculated to get the votes of lawmakers.

Some lawmakers refuse to have anything to do with the bad lobbyists who lurk on Capitol Hill. They are the good guys. The legislators who took money from Mr. Abramoff and his ilk convinced themselves they were just doing what "everybody else does" to stay in office so they can "do good" and pass legislation that matters. Most of them did not take the money to get rich -- for one thing, that's too easily traced. Many of them passionately believe in what they are doing.

But what these witless co-conspirators have done is further undermine public confidence, chisel away at the credibility of government and give comfort to enemies convinced the democratic system is no better than any other and maybe even worse.

Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher said the Abramoff pleas of guilty to felonious bribing of lawmakers, evasion of taxes and bilking of clients show that "government officials and government action are not for sale."

But as the investigation continues into how many webs Jack Abramoff has spun, we have no confidence her statement is true.

Can I Lobby You? (WP)

By Jan Witold Baran

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

If you typed the word "lobbyist" into the Google News search engine last week, the first page of 8,670 search results would have included dozens of headlines that screamed out "Lobbyist's Guilty Plea Sends Out Shock Waves Through US Congress," "Bush Campaign Getting Rid of Lobbyist's Money" and "Kennedy Among Leading Recipients of Convicted Lobbyist's Clients." The referenced lobbyist is, of course, Jack Abramoff. In spreading the news to America and the world, most news organizations deemed it sufficient to simply inform the public in headlines that a "lobbyist" had pleaded guilty. The insinuation is that there must be something inherently sinister because a lobbyist is involved. The nature of his guilt is treated as self-evident.

Perhaps this scandal will eventually be called the Abramoff affair, but for now it is a lobbying scandal. If Shakespeare lived today, perhaps he would write, "First shoot all the lobbyists." Yet in the midst of the current furor, reports do not mention that there are thousands of lobbyists in Washington who are honorable and honest people and who render a service that is both critical to a democratic society and enshrined in our Constitution.

There is irony here. The same constitutional provision that ensures the press may proclaim a lobbyist's guilty plea also protects the act of lobbying. The First Amendment is well-known for guaranteeing freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of assembly and freedom of religion. Often overlooked in its litany of fundamental civil liberties is the right "to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." It is this distinct clause that prevents Congress and the president from enacting a law that bans lobbying. It is a right that should not be taken lightly and that should not be eroded by the fraudulent acts of a single lobbyist.

The Washington lobbying community was aghast to learn of Abramoff's methods and practices . Bilking a handful of Native American tribes of more than $80 million in four years is shocking. Mocking those same clients in e-mails is unconscionable and disrespectful. Renting suites or skyboxes in at least three professional sports arenas is exceptional even among the most prosperous D.C. firms. Firms typically do not rent such suites because the price of tickets now regularly exceeds the limits on gifts to legislators. Most corporate offices in Washington have instituted compliance systems to ensure that their lobbyists do not exceed gift limits. For all these reasons, lobbyists are appalled at Abramoff's practice of extravagant wining and dining (at his own restaurant!), orchestrating lavish trips and offering campaign contributions in exchange for specific official acts. There may be others who bend the rules, but Abramoff retired the cup for outrageous conduct in the name of lobbying.

We have laws to prevent such corruption. If members of Congress were caught breaking those laws, they would be prosecuted and punished -- but we wouldn't abolish their seats and deprive their constituents of representation.

The framers of the Constitution recognized that citizens must be free to make appeals to those who govern and who make policies, laws and regulations that affect the citizenry. Obviously, most citizens are not physically located at the seat of government, may not know how government works, and are busy doing things other than lobbying. For those reasons, when they need help in making their petitions, they retain representatives who can more effectively seek redress on their behalf. In other words, ordinary folks need representatives to talk to their representatives.

While officials may prefer to legislate without being importuned by those affected or by their representatives, that is not the way laws should be made in an open democratic society. The founders sought to ensure the public interest by promoting pluralism and protecting the participation of all. How then can it be surprising that there are now more than 27,000 registered lobbyists petitioning on behalf of business, labor, the environment, education, abortion rights, the elderly, the poor, ethnic groups and more?

DOJ_NMG_0008711

Daniel Webster may have become America's first lobbyist when he was retained as an attorney by business interests while also serving as the U.S. senator from New Hampshire. Legislators could wear two hats in those days. But the practice of employing lobbyists did not gain steam until the Grant administration. It was then that agents of private interests lingered in the lobby of the Willard Hotel a short walk from the Treasury Department and the White House in the hopes of buttonholing residing government officials and members of Congress to seek redress of some grievance. Hence the term "lobbyist." That certainly is easier to say than "grievance petitioner."

The size of the lobbyist population is proportional to the size of government. During the Civil War, the White House staff consisted of two personal secretaries to President Abraham Lincoln. Today the Executive Office of the President budgets for more than 900 employees. Lincoln was lobbied, but usually for a job in the postal service. There were many fewer legislators than today and the members had no staff. Currently there are more than 30,000 employees in Congress -- not coincidentally, that's just slightly more than the number of registered lobbyists. As the size and functions of government have grown, society has discovered more "grievances" to petition. In particular, spending by government has led to more petitions for one's perceived fair share.

Lobbying was not subject to any regulation until 1946, when the first lobbying law was passed. That initial effort required registration and reporting by lobbyists and the organizations that employed them. However, the legislation was poorly drafted. By 1954, the Supreme Court interpreted the statute so narrowly (in order to avoid violating the First Amendment right to lobby) that the law no longer provided meaningful reporting and could not be enforced. During the era of Lyndon B. Johnson, lobbyists and legislators formed an increasingly symbiotic relationship. According to biographer Robert Caro, then-Senate majority leader Johnson freely availed himself of the corporate aircraft of a major Texas construction firm, and to the extent that he relaxed, he did so at the Middleburg estate of the firm's lobbyist.

Eventually, attempts were made to tame the gift-giving and to subject lobbyists to public disclosure. Congress adopted ethics rules in the late 1950s and gradually tightened them. In 1995 the Lobbying Disclosure Act (LDA) for the first time implemented clear requirements for registration and reporting. One major reason we know that Jack Abramoff was a lobbyist and who his clients were is the information on his lobbying reports.

Just because we have laws and ethics rules, however, doesn't guarantee that people, including lobbyists, will abide by them. Nor will lobbying laws prevent a lobbyist from committing crimes such as Abramoff's. He defrauded his Indian tribe clients, law firms and financial institutions, and the American taxpayer (by not paying taxes). He also admitted to conspiring to bribe a public official. That crime is the most reprehensible in that it betrays both honest government and his profession. It is like a lawyer paying off a judge or a jury. A lobbyist, like a lawyer, must ply his profession with advocacy and facts, not with gratuities or bribes.

While laws and rules do not stop crimes and rule breakers, both are vital to establishing and maintaining public confidence in the lobbying process. Congress, in particular, must take steps to reduce the excesses that Abramoff represents while preserving the right of effective lobbying. Here are four places to start:

Enforce current House and Senate ethics rules. After reading about Abramoff's wining, dining and entertaining, many Americans would be surprised to learn that both the House and the Senate have rules that generally limit gifts, including meals, to $49.99. However, neither congressional offices nor the ethics committees actually enforce those rules, thus making a mockery of them. Congressional officials, particularly staff, should be required to certify annually that they have not received improper gifts and such certifications should be subject to laws that make false statements a crime.

Tighten up those rules . There has been much attention paid to the expensive foreign trips taken by some officials at private expense. In Congress, but not in the executive branch, officials may accept luxurious travel, accommodations and meals anywhere in the world as long the trip has some official purpose, such as giving a speech or participating in a conference. This practice must be modified or eliminated. If a trip is justified and necessary for official reasons, then it should be modest and financed by the government. If some trips continue to be privately financed, there should be limits and officials must make prompt, complete and public disclosure, preferably on a government Web site.

Require lobbyists to itemize gifts and entertainment on lobbying reports. The current LDA requires the reporting of the total amount of money spent by lobbyists, but no itemization of expenses. Itemizing gifts and entertainment over, let's say, $20 would highlight which government officials accept such blandishments and whether they are adhering to their own ethics rules. Lobbyists and their clients are not subject to the congressional ethics rules but are subject to the LDA and other statutes that prohibit bribes and gratuities.

Promote an ethical culture. The character and leadership of government officials are the most important ingredients in setting examples and demanding ethical behavior. There are, however, additional steps. Any manager working at a major corporation will tell you that he or she must participate in mandatory educational compliance programs. Workers are required to know what the rules are, what the company policies are and to demonstrate that they know. No less should be expected of government officials. Congress needs to implement a mandatory annual compliance education program and no one should receive a paycheck unless he or she has completed the program.

DOJ_NMG_0008712

The above steps will not eliminate the possibility of another future lobbyist who is determined to bribe or an official who seeks emoluments. Renegades and schemers unfortunately exist. But these suggestions would help increase consciousness about the rules, encourage ethical behavior and perhaps reduce the possibility of another Abramoff operating on his scale for so long without someone blowing the whistle.

The targets of my suggestions are government officials, our leaders. It is incumbent upon them to pay their share of a dinner check and to decline a ticket to a sporting event that violates any gift limit. If they seek the social company of lobbyists they should abide by the rules or go Dutch. By the same token lobbyists must abide by the laws and act ethically, as most do, even in the era of Jack Abramoff's excesses.

Author's e-mail: jbaran@wrf.com

Jan Witold Baran is a lawyer and former general counsel of the Republican National Committee. He served on the President's Commission on Federal Ethics Law Reform. He is not a lobbyist, but he does advise clients on the campaign finance and lobbying laws.

Go Ahead, Try To Stop K Street (NYT)

By Todd S. Purdum

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON

IN 1872, some Republican elders, revolted by the rampant influence peddling of Ulysses S. Grant's administration, challenged him for re-election. "He has used the public service of the government as a machinery of corruption and personal influence," they complained, and "shown himself deplorably unequal to the task imposed on him by the necessities of the country."

Jack Abramoff's trading room was his Signatures restaurant, not the front of the old Willard Hotel, where favor seekers so besieged Grant that he helped popularize the label - lobbyist - that still clings to their descendants with a pejorative sting. But Mr. Abramoff's guilty plea last week to charges of fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials prompted similar revulsion among some of the Grand Old Party's canniest hands.

"I think as this thing unfolds, it'll be so disgusting, and the Republicans will be under such pressure from their base, that they will have to undertake substantial reform," said Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker (who himself had to pay $300,000 to settle a 1997 ethics case). "This is like Watergate."

But will things really change? After all, Grant himself won a second term, despite the failings that would eventually leave his legacy forever tainted, and his chief Republican antagonist, Horace Greeley, died defeated and insane three weeks after the election. Is corruption just a part of Washington's DNA? What else explains the grim resignation of Washington veterans who wonder when, not whether, some scandal will arise?

"The history of civilization, for starters," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, an ethics group. "This kind of problem is faced by all societies throughout all of history. It comes and goes in cycles, and becomes most prevalent when the activities are viewed as O.K. by the society where it's taking place."

For watchdogs like Mr. Wertheimer, and for many Democrats, such tolerance dates to the Republican takeover of Congress in the mid-1990's, when new leaders like Representative Tom DeLay of Texas began a campaign to fill the capital's K Street corridor with Republican lobbyists, and made it plain that those seeking to influence legislation would have to "pay to play," in the form of political contributions and other largesse.

Mr. DeLay, who was himself indicted last year in Texas on unrelated campaign finance charges and forced to step down from his post as House majority leader, has long had close ties to Mr. Abramoff. Now Mr. Abramoff's guilty plea increases the likelihood that Mr. DeLay will lose his leadership post for good, and raises the prospect that he - and other lawmakers - may be enmeshed in new legal troubles. The sheer scale of Mr. Abramoff's misdeeds - millions of dollars in kickbacks from Indian tribes, a luxury golf outing for politicians to Scotland, misuse of a tax-exempt foundation - make this an extraordinary case.

"There are all sorts of things that have gone on of the same generic kind," said Harry C. McPherson, who came to Washington 50 years ago this month as a Senate aide to Lyndon B. Johnson and has plied his trade as a lawyer-lobbyist since leaving the White House in 1969. "But this is truly a situation where the degree changes everything. It converts something that purists about government would find unpleasant into the utterly unacceptable - into crime."

But the problem is broader than Mr. Abramoff, Mr. DeLay or even the inherent potential for abuse in one-party rule of all three branches of government. It also has to do with the astounding growth of the lobbying industry, a growth that has tracked the growth of the federal government itself. The rise of government regulation - first in the New Deal and then in the 1960's and 70's - spawned a parallel rise in the private sector's efforts to master the new system. Between the early 1970's and the mid-1980's, the number of trade associations doubled; in the first half of the 1980's alone, the number of registered lobbyists quadrupled, according to The Washington Monthly.

A study by the Center for Public Integrity found that in the early 1990's, political donations from 19 major industries - including pharmaceuticals, defense, commercial banking and accounting - were split about evenly between the two parties.

By 2003, the Republicans held a 2-to-1 advantage. Since 1998, the center found, more than 2,200 former federal employees had registered as federal lobbyists, as had nearly 275 former White House aides and nearly 250 former members of Congress. Many rules governing their conduct remain deliberately vague, and the House Ethics Committee has been paralyzed because of dysfunction and partisan disputes.

"The scandal here is not that the rules were broken; the scandal is the rules themselves," said Representative Martin T. Meehan, Democrat of Massachusetts, who with a Republican colleague, Christopher Shays of Connecticut, and Senators John McCain and Russell D. Feingold, has been a leader in pressing to overhaul campaign finance and ethics rules. "Lobbying is part of our system, but there is a set of ethical standards and rules that ought to be followed."

Together with Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois and Mr. Feingold, Mr. Meehan has introduced legislation that would, among other things, require lobbyists to file quarterly financial disclosures, instead of semiannual ones and to disclose just whom in the government they lobbied. Former members of Congress would also not be able to lobby their colleagues for two years, as opposed to the current one year. Members would be required to submit detailed itineraries and descriptions of expenses for privately sponsored travel.

Mr. Gingrich has offered more ideas. He would allow unlimited fund-raising in members' states or districts, but bar fund-raising within the District of Columbia, and would require that all contacts between lobbyists and elected and appointed officials be posted weekly on the Internet. And he would shrink a government that has only grown further with post Sept. 11, 2001, spending.

"There is $2.6 trillion spent in Washington, with the authority to regulate everything in your life," he said. "Guess what? People will spend unheard-of amounts of money to influence that. The underlying problems are big government and big money."

Of course, the record suggests that for every loophole any new law might close, lobbyists will find a way to open another. The ban on so-called "soft money" contributions to political parties led to the rise of new special-interest spending groups, for example. Entrenched industries - and entrenched incumbents of both parties - can be expected to resist change that would threaten the way they know how to do business.

For their part, some lobbyists hope legislators intent on reform resist painting with too broad a brush.

"A lot of what we do is an enormous educational effort, to avoid what we consider even well-meaning but wrong-headed legislation," said Joseph Tasker, senior vice president for government affairs of the Information Technology Association of America, which represents companies like I.B.M. and Microsoft, on issues including privacy, piracy and Internet security.

"Congressmen don't know things; they're not experts in technology," he said. "In the mid-1990's, we were meeting with a Congressman about high-definition TV standards and we were talking about pixels and so on, and he said, 'Fellas, look, I'm trying to stay with you here, but one of the first times I ever took a ride on an airplane was when I came to Washington to take my seat and I remember looking out the window and I thought part of the wing was falling off when we landed, because the flaps came up.' "

And, this being Washington, even the best-intentioned efforts to stick to the rules can lead to overreaching silliness.

In 2004, David McKean, a veteran Senate aide, published a critically praised book on Thomas "Tommy the Cork" Corcoran, perhaps the most successful Washington lobbyist of the 20th century. But the Senate ethics committee advised him not to disclose on the dust jacket the name of the senator he worked for, John Kerry, lest he be seen as using his position for commercial gain.

The restriction hampered his ability to promote his book. Indeed, when a Washington bookstore inadvertently identified Mr. McKean's position in an advertisement, he had to cancel an appearance there. A very small victory, one would guess, for the capital's reputation.

Returning 'Good' Money After Bad Misses Point On Ethics (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

Not to be excessively contrarian, but why exactly are members of Congress rushing to return campaign contributions from the clients of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff?

It's easy to see why many recipients of the $204,253 Abramoff has personally donated since 1999, all to Republicans, are sending back the money after the lobbyist pleaded guilty last week to multiple felony counts. No one likes their name in a ledger with an admitted crook.

But the rationale is less apparent for returning contributions from Abramoff clients, primarily Indian tribes, who haven't been accused of breaking any laws and are mostly, if somewhat excessively, portrayed as victims in the scandal.

Sending back the tribes' money isn't only silly, it's destructive to the cause of reforming Washington. It perpetuates the fiction that "bad" contributions can be segregated from "good" contributions in some orderly fashion that allows politicians to raise millions without compromising their independence.

It's important to understand what was unique, and what more conventional, about Abramoff's activities. The unique aspect of his operation — the portion central to his criminal plea — was his exorbitant charges to his clients and the kickbacks he took from their payments to his partner, Michael P.S. Scanlon. But the way he advised his clients to advance their political causes differed more in degree than kind from the capital's business as usual.

According to testimony before the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, Indian tribes came to Abramoff with a variety of interests, mostly revolving around gambling. In the mid-1990s, the Mississippi Choctaws hired him to kill federal legislation taxing Indian casinos. The Louisiana Coushattas hired him to block potential competitors, both by encouraging Texas officials to bar Indian gambling in that state and by pressuring the U.S. Interior Department to refuse authorization for casinos from rival tribes. The Tiguas hired him to pass federal legislation specifically reopening their El Paso casino — after the campaign Abramoff ran in Texas for the Coushatta tribe supported its closure.

These Indian tribes were not innocents. Most of the money they paid Abramoff apparently went to block potential competition from rival casinos. The Tiguas turned to Washington to evade Texas' clear desire to bar Indian casino gambling inside its borders.

And yet, in the manner they pursued these goals, the tribes weren't much different from anyone else operating in Washington. As a parade of tribal officials told the Indian Affairs Committee, they contributed money not only to dozens of legislators, but also to an assortment of conservative groups — such as Grover Norquist's Americans for Tax Reform and the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy — because Abramoff told them the donations would win them friends in high places.

"Sometimes [Abramoff] did say that we need to make these contributions" in order to advance causes, one tribal official told the Senate committee last summer. "Other times, [Abramoff said] it was just a good organization, and [donating] will make somebody else happy."

Every day, in offices all around Washington, lobbyists provide exactly that advice to clients representing virtually every economic and social interest imaginable. As Abramoff told the New Republic magazine last year: "I didn't create the system. This is the system we have."

That's too self-serving: The ongoing investigation will determine whether legislators crossed the line of bribery by undertaking specific actions as a quid pro quo for contributions or other favors from Abramoff. (In one of his pleas, he essentially admitted attempting to bribe one House member, who has been identified as Republican Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio.) But the vast majority of contributions legislators in both parties received from Abramoff's Indian clients looks no different, legally or even morally, than the money they collect from all other interests jostling on Capitol Hill.

That's why the rush to refund the money is so misguided. By returning the Indian money, the recipients are trying to claim vigilance against suspect contributions.

But political money doesn't sort itself into black and white categories of appropriate and inappropriate; much of it, like the money from the tribes, is gray. It usually comes not with explicit demands but with implied expectations that every legislator must weigh. Is the Indian money really more suspect than the massive pharmaceutical contributions that influenced a prescription drug law that barred Medicare from bargaining for lower drug prices? In practice, the choices are not as clear-cut as legislators imply by returning the Indian dollars while keeping so many other donations that could provoke similar ethics questions.

The problems of special-interest influence in Washington can't be resolved through selective spasms of morality when a scandal erupts. Nor are tougher restrictions on lobbying or campaign contributions likely to eliminate abuses. Money flows toward power like a river to the ocean; no dam can be built high enough to permanently separate them. A century of often valuable, but inevitably porous, political reform makes that clear.

Because so many of the ethics choices in Washington are gray, they most often raise questions not about politicians' honesty, but about their judgment in balancing contributors' priorities against the public interest. And the key to promoting good judgment isn't new lobbying rules, or even criminal indictments, but electoral consequences for bad judgment.

DOJ_NMG_0008715

Ultimately, the responsibility for policing Washington belongs not to prosecutors but to voters. The surest way for Americans to discourage elected officials from providing undue favors to special interests is to vote out some of those who do. The verdict that could transform Washington most won't come from a jury box — but from voters at the ballot box.

*

Ronald Brownstein's column appears every Sunday. See current and past Brownstein columns on The Times' website at latimes.com/brownstein.

Reputed Mob Enforcer Gives Not Guilty Plea (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporter. Tribune Staff Reporter Matthew Walberg Contributed To This Report

Chicago Tribune, January 8, 2006

Walking with a cane and reportedly suffering diabetes and skin cancer, reputed mob enforcer Frank "The German" Schweihs pleaded not guilty Friday in his first court appearance in Chicago since he was captured Dec. 16.

Schweihs, 75, was a fugitive for eight months before the FBI arrested him and saw him returned here to face racketeering charges linked to murder and extortion. With Schweihs, 12 other men are charged in a sweeping mob case that sprung from a federal investigation dubbed Operation Family Secrets. The case ties the men to 18 unsolved Outfit murders as well as loan sharking and illegal gambling charges spanning four decades, authorities said.

All of those charged are in custody except alleged mob boss Joey "The Clown" Lombardo. An agent from Louisville arrested Schweihs outside an apartment in the small town of Berea, Ky. FBI agents are trying to piece together what Schweihs did and where he hid while on the run, authorities said.

Lombardo and Schweihs are accused of the 1974 murder of Daniel Seifert, a Bensenville businessman who had been scheduled to testify.

---

rbush@tribune.com

Feds, Family Come Out To See 'The German' (CHIST)

By STEVE WARMBIR AND NATASHA KORECKI, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, January 7, 2006

Aging reputed Outfit hitman Frank "The German" Schweihs could once inspire shudders of fear by entering a room.

On Friday, as he hobbled with a cane into a federal courtroom in Chicago after eight months on the lam, he was more of a curiosity.

A row of FBI agents observed him from the back row.

His daughter, Barbara, gave him an anxious smile from her courtroom seat.

And sitting beside her were two men who eyed him with disgust. The men were family members of a man Schweihs is accused of killing more than three decades ago -- government witness Daniel Seifert, who was shotgunned to death in front of his family.

The family members declined to comment later, not wanting to jeopardize the case.

Pleads not guilty to murder

Schweihs, who turns 76 next month, was arrested last month, found living with his girlfriend in a small town outside Lexington, Ky. He had been in hiding since April, when federal prosecutors charged him and other alleged mobsters, including the reputed head of the Chicago Outfit, James Marcello, in a racketeering conspiracy involving 18 mob hits. Still at large is Joey "The Clown" Lombardo.

Schweihs, wearing an orange jail jumpsuit, sat down and wisecracked to his attorney, feigning puzzlement over how many reporters were packed into the courtroom.

"Slow day for news," quipped his prominent Loop attorney, Dennis Berkson.

Schweihs pleaded not guilty to the charges against him. He is being held without bond and faces life in prison if convicted.

"First I'm seeing this judge," Schweihs said as he looked over the indictment against him. "I've never seen this before."

'A lot of rumor'

The man once considered an alleged rising star in the Outfit cupped his hand to his ear at times to hear the judge better.

Besides bad hearing, Schweihs has skin cancer, a bad heart and diabetes, his attorney said. But his mind is still sharp.

"There are a lot of things said about him," Berkson said outside the courtroom. "There's a lot of rumor and innuendo which are absolutely ridiculous. He believes when all the evidence comes in, he'll be acquitted."

Reputed Mob Enforcer Pleads Not Guilty In Federal Court (AP)

By MIKE ROBINSON, Associated Press

AP, January 6, 2006

CHICAGO - A reputed mob enforcer who eluded a federal manhunt for eight months before FBI agents swooped down on him in central Kentucky three weeks ago pleaded not guilty Friday to racketeering and extortion charges.

"Why is all the news media here?" Frank "The German" Schweihs asked as he waited for U.S. Magistrate Judge Arlander Keys to call his case.

"I don't know, slow day," defense attorney Dennis Berkson said with a straight face.

Schweihs, 75, the craggy, tough-looking alleged enforcer who according to prosecutors squeezed "street-tax" payments out of strip joints, leaned on a cane as he stood in court.

He is one of 14 reputed mob figures under indictment in the FBI's Operation Family Secrets investigation of long-unsolved murders.

Schweihs is also one of two defendants who slipped out of sight eight months ago just before federal prosecutors unveiled the indictment, which outlines an alleged 15-year racketeering conspiracy that included at least 19 slayings.

The other fugitive, Joseph "Joey the Clown" Lombardo, is still on the lam.

Chicago FBI agents got a tip in mid-December concerning the whereabouts of Schweihs and agents arrested him without incident Dec. 16 outside his Berea, Ky., apartment about 40 miles south of Lexington.

Schweihs' homecoming was attended by Robert D. Grant, special agent in charge of the FBI's Chicago office and about a dozen other agents, including members of the FBI's organized-crime squad who spent years working on the Family Secrets investigation.

Keys ordered Schweihs to appear before U.S. District Judge James B. Zagel on Jan. 17 when the other defendants are also due in court for a status hearing.

Schweihs was shown a copy of the indictment and he said it was the first time that he had seen it. After Assistant U.S. Attorney Mitchell A. Mars read the charges, Keys asked Schweihs if he had understood them.

"I didn't understand it but I heard what he said," Schweihs said.

Schweihs was then taken back to the Metropolitan Correctional Center where he is to be held pending trial. Schweihs could get life in prison if convicted of the racketeering charges.

Several female friends including his sister Barbara were on hand for the hearing.

"Good-bye, Frank," one said as husky marshals led Schweihs out the door in handcuffs.

Berkson told reporters after the hearing that Schweihs was eager for his day in court and "believes that when all of the evidence is in he will be acquitted."

Mob Mentality En Mass: (BOSH)

By Michele McPhee

Boston Herald, January 8, 2006

The Genovese crime family - the nation's most powerful underworld enterprise - has put the city of Springfield in a lethal stranglehold, corrupting local politicians, draining federal funds from city coffers and operating a chain of strip joints, according to 32 indictments handed up since 2001 and interviews with local law enforcement.

Indeed, investigators believe there are more wiseguys and mob associates in the Springfield area - roughly 50 in all - than in any other part of the country, including Genovese family strongholds in Brooklyn and the Bronx. The buttonmen live in bucolic Hamden County communities like Chicopee and Ware, and ply their underworld trade on seedy Springfield streets, investigators said.

"The influence of the mob contributed to the demise, or the downfall, of a once flourishing city. Our goal is to bring the city back through investigating the corruption and ensuring that federal funds go to the entities or individuals that the monies were intended to go to," Special Agent Michael O'Reilly, head of the Springfield's FBI office, said in an interview last week. "Not lining the pockets of wiseguys or corrupt politicians."

Genovese influence has been the target of several FBI raids on Springfield City Hall and administrative offices, investigators say. At least a dozen former city employees have been indicted, and five of them have been convicted since 2001 on federal charges ranging from racketeering to money laundering to influence peddling, O'Reilly said.

The city is on the verge of receivership and its coffers are under the control of a special board appointed by Gov. Mitt Romney. Springfield's new mayor, Charles Ryan, says he's working to root out public corruption.

In October, former Mayor Michael Albano's chief of staff, Anthony Ardolino, 36, was busted on federal tax and witness tampering charges, said U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan. His brother Chester, 39, a former Springfield cop, also was indicted in the case. [continue]

DOJ_NMG_0008717

Crackdown Exposes Toledo As A Hub Of Teen Prostitution (TOLB)

By ROBIN ERB and ROBERTA de BOER, BLADE STAFF WRITERS

Toledo Blade (OH), January 8, 2006

First of three parts

If the brutal world of teenage prostitution were a legitimate business, Toledo would be among its top employment agencies.

It has supplied top management — iron-fisted pimps who demanded worker productivity and loyalty.

It has supplied middle management — adult hookers under orders to beat discipline into underearning or renegade prostitutes.

And, most shocking of all, Toledo supplied the product — girls as young as 12, sometimes kidnapped, always sold for sex.

"I know the FBI is concentrating on Toledo, and I know Toledo is one of the top cities in the country for teen prostitution," said Celia Williamson, a University of Toledo professor known nationally for research of prostitutes.

Deb Hodges, a top Lucas County Juvenile Court official, agreed: "We had one of the federal investigators tell us that Toledo was the No. 1 recruiting spot in the United States. ... It was mind-boggling."

Until recently, it was also largely undetected.

"We here in Toledo had no idea that this was going on," said Dave Bauer, an assistant U.S. attorney in Toledo. One big problem, he said, is that underage prostitution is "a mobile business."

Recruited here, the girls didn't stay long. Pimps quickly shuttled them across the country, and "they would quite easily fly under our radar screens," Mr. Bauer said.

Federal investigators last month charged 31 men and women with herding teens - including at least nine girls from the metro Toledo area - across state lines as sex slaves in a highly profitable and violent prostitution ring.

These were neither street- walkers nor escort-service girls, authorities said. Instead, the teens were rotated among motels, truck stops, and highway welcome centers.

But while the feds are able to lay out the inner workings of the Toledo-based prostitution ring, they can't explain why a handful of local pimps became such big players on the national scene, providing girls to more than a dozen states stretching from California to the nation's capital.

"Everybody has been saying, 'Why Toledo? Why Toledo?' And we don't know why," said John Stossel, one of the FBI agents leading the investigation.

The indictments, part of a massive child-prostitution crackdown the feds called "Innocence Lost," spelled out the sophistication and high level of organization among pimps who managed the business: setting prices, establishing work schedules, and negotiating turf.

Zoom | Photo Reprints Gordon Zubrod, an assistant federal prosecutor in Harrisburg, Pa., called it a "loose confederacy" of pimps, each with his own turf but enough reason to get along.

"They're all homeboys from Toledo, and it's to their benefit to cooperate," he said.

The local network expanded two years ago, after the feds cracked down on another national sex-for-hire operation in Oklahoma City.

The Toledo defendants, many of whom had operated the sex trade for years, "stepped into the vacuum," Mr. Zubrod said. "This opened the door."

Brutal business

It's a business that traffics in human misery.

"The cruelty has been astounding," Mr. Zubrod said. "Most of the women will have testimony [ranging] from having been pistol-whipped to having bones broken."

It's clear how pimps benefit: The indictments track coast-to-coast wire transfers totaling hundreds of thousands of dollars. But what lures girls too young for admission to R-rated movies into this Triple-X world?

A few are kidnapped and forced into the sex trade by violence. For many others, "prostitution is a continuation of the victim's sexual exploitation, not the beginning," FBI Assistant Director Chris Swecker said at a Justice Department news conference last month in Washington announcing the arrests.

For these girls, he and others said, it's a simple trade-off: Prostitution looks better than a home life of neglect or abuse. A man who seems kind and attentive - at least at first - can be irresistible.

Still other girls leave home "for the thrill of it," stumbling into forced prostitution along the way, said Jim Anderson, one of the Toledo Police Department's missing-persons detectives. "They're 14, 15 years old. What do they really know at that age?"

Rebellion

Denise was 14 then. She knew.

DOJ_NMG_0008718

A girlfriend told Denise, whose real name is not being used at her request.

"She said, 'I met this guy and he's a pimp … He's got all these ho's and they work for him and they give him their money.' "

To the South Toledo teen, the scenario sounded "fascinating" - or at least like an escape hatch from a home she said she shared with a hooker mother who was often drunk or high. Maybe, Denise speculated, that's why her mother never noticed that two family friends had molested the teen for years.

One day Denise found her mother crying at the kitchen table. "Why didn't you tell me?" she asked her child.

But in Denise's mind, the better question was: How could you not have known?

"I think I was hardened. I didn't cry," Denise recalled. "I think that's when the resentment began toward my mother."

She skipped school. She smoked dope. She was "deep into rebelling."

And one day, she simply didn't come home.

Standing at a pay phone at a church festival, she punched in the phone number for the pimp she got from her girlfriend.

"He was in Harrisburg. I tell him about the [latest] altercation with my mom. I said, 'Can I come out with you?' He said, 'You know what you'll be doing?' "

She knew.

"He said, 'You know you'll be prostituting?' "

She knew.

"He said, 'You know you're going to have to give me the money?' I said, 'Yeah, I want to be there.' "

A smack in the face

Hours after Denise stepped off the bus in Harrisburg, Pa., it wasn't the transactional sex that surprised her.

It was the violence.

Even now, seven years out of the business and removed from the control of any pimp, she still regards split lips and black eyes as mere occupational hazards.

"He was pretty good to me," she said of her pimp. "I can count on two hands the times he hit me."

Other girls, she added, had less merciful pimps and less luck with johns.

"I know girls who didn't make it out alive," she said.

Denise's story wasn't outlined in the recent indictments, but it might as well have been. In the world of paid sex, brutality is a standard means of maintaining a business structure - or, as prostitution researcher Ms. Williamson described it, "the rapes and the beatings and the stabbings and the brandings."

Ironically, investigators said it was the pimps who complained about working conditions.

"Both my hands were swelled up because I beat the bitch so much," the feds quoted one accused pimp as saying. That same man ended another beating only when he fractured his own hand, authorities said.

Another defendant confided to a fellow pimp that he beat a hooker for pulling in only $700 for a night's work.

Still another, authorities said, broke a woman's nose - an assault he'd been accused of twice before in Toledo. And in 2004, under investigation for a hooker's murder for which he was later exonerated, he talked bluntly with authorities in Indiana about pimp discipline.

"He said, 'Sometimes the only thing to get her attention is to hit her in the face,' " said Lt. Clarke Fine of the Hendricks County Sheriff's Office, near Indianapolis.

The brutality outlined in the indictments could indeed represent a long-standing practice of controlling women through force.

At least four of the Toledo men previously were accused of violence. In separate court cases, local police said these men, acting independently of one another:

Locked a minor behind an "iron door" and raped her.

Used a chain to beat another woman's face and body "for approximately three hours."

Kidnapped a female and forced her to perform oral sex until she finally managed to leap "from [the] moving auto at Summit and Cherry."

Smashed a bottle against a young girl's head.

The latest indictments claimed violence was sometimes even delegated to veteran prostitutes.

In another business setting, they might be called executive assistants. In the sex trade, they're known as "bottom bitches" - part enforcer, part cashier, and part recruiter.

Prosecutor Zubrod said these women will, "under orders, attack another prostitute and beat [her] with their fists or stab her or any number of things."

Fake IDs, real money

If Toledo was a recruitment hot spot, Harrisburg was its distribution center. Like no place else in the country, five major highways meet in the city, delivering an unending supply of paying customers.

"You can't do that in Chicago or L.A. or Atlanta," Mr. Zubrod said.

Wire transfers of tens of thousands of dollars - for food, fuel, clothes, and lodging - allowed the girls to crisscross the country.

Outfitted with fake identities, they remained as invisible as the underground economy in which they operated.

Denise picked up the routine quickly once she arrived in Harrisburg. Arrested? Never give your real name or age.

"You go to grown-up jail. You go to grown-up court. And you pay grown-up money. Then you're back to work," she said.

In one case last spring, a pimp turned to rote memorization to train two kidnapped Toledo teens.

"I know as far as the Social Security numbers and the IDs, both of the girls had to write on seven pieces of paper, front and back, on every single line, all their false information," the mother of one of the girls told The Blade.

Pimps monitored each other's product and services, purchasing women from one another and sharing trade secrets.

One inquired about another pimp's profits, according to the affidavit, which said "[he] replied that he had made a $10,000 down payment on a Cadillac and still had $17,000 left."

It was the "sophistication and the organization of the whole network" that stunned Mike Brennan, a longtime Lucas County juvenile probation officer.

"I was blind-sided by the magnitude of it. When I got a call from a federal prosecutor [about the network], I was like, 'Yeah, yeah, it's probably some overzealous prosecutor.' "

Now, he said, he has a keener understanding of how these men exploit children for a living.

"These aren't dummies we're dealing with," he said.

Too old for this

Now 26, Denise relaxed in her living room recently, her two girls playing on the floor and a Christmas tree in the corner.

In the end, she said, it was the gun pressed to the back of her neck that pushed her out of the business for good. The night it happened, she was six months' pregnant and tired.

She'd climbed into the tractor-trailer too willingly, relaxing her guard after the driver offered $60 for a $50 sex act.

Instead, she saw the flash of a silver handgun. He sneered. She pleaded for her life.

"You know what? I'm pregnant. Please don't do this."

He raped her and said she was lucky.

"I killed bitches," she remembered him saying. "I'm going to let you live.'"

Screaming, she ran from the truck.

She knew her pimp would find her. He did. She knew he would beat her. He did.

"He found me at a hotel. It was the worst he ever beat me."

From a hospital later that night, the battered mother-to-be sneaked out a back exit. If he found her again, she'd deal with it then. For now, she wanted out.

Anyway, she reasoned, she was getting too old for all this.

She was 18.

Young Duo Put Waltz In Motion (MCA)

By Marc Perrusquia, Contact

Memphis Commercial Appeal, January 8, 2006

They look like a pair of fraternity brothers off to toilet paper the chancellor's yard.

Fresh-faced FBI agents Brian Burns and Mark Jackson are young -- neither is over 35 -- but they are no pranksters.

They are the case agents on the Tennessee Waltz, the undercover FBI sting that leveled corruption charges against 10 current and former public officials.

Together with a veteran prosecutor, they've changed the political landscape in Tennessee.

"I'll never forget that Thursday morning when the arrests happened," said Ron Ramsey, the state Senate Republican leader. Ramsey watched last May as, one by one, colleagues were led away in handcuffs from hotels and offices surrounding Nashville's Legislative Plaza.

"The FBI spread their net pretty wide ... That was one elaborate sting operation."

Ripples from the Waltz will be felt this week in Nashville when the General Assembly meets in special session to consider unprecedented ethics reforms, and again in Memphis where a series of criminal trials are scheduled over the coming year.

Pieces of the secretive FBI investigation continue to dribble out, but the story of its birth remains largely untold.

DOJ_NMG_0008720

For years, insiders had complained of systemic, entrenched political corruption in Memphis and across Tennessee, yet despite occasional news media exposes, authorities were unable or unwilling to rein it in.

That began to change three years ago after two young, idealistic FBI agents arrived in Memphis. And when the local U.S. Attorney's Office agreed for the first time in years to put a prosecutor full-time on political corruption, things began to happen.

Still, it took a little luck -- chancing upon a political insider who agreed to wear a wire -- before authorities got the OK from the U.S. Justice Department in Washington to launch an undercover sting unprecedented in Tennessee.

FBI stings have effectively countered corruption in places such as Chicago and Mississippi, where 55 county supervisors went to jail in a sting called Operation Pretense in the 1980s.

Corruption stings are clandestine operations in which agents pose as crooks and bait public officials with bribes. By their very nature they can be messy, ethically and legally, and consequently are used sparingly.

In the Waltz's aftermath, complaints about unfairness and race -- nearly all the defendants are black -- are bubbling up. And recent articles on an Internet news site pose questions about the case's key informant.

So far, three Waltz defendants have pleaded guilty. With seven more awaiting trial, the case's ultimate impact remains to be seen.

Reforms like those before the legislature are a typical consequence of corruption probes, yet, ultimately, a society must change its culture to have true impact, experts say.

"It works at least for a little while," said James R. Crockett, a University of Southern Mississippi professor who wrote a book on Operation Pretense and his state's legendary corruption.

"Without vigilance, (corruption) gradually creeps back in."

The FBI's lead agent on the Tennessee Waltz, Brian Burns, 35, first tried his hand as a pharmacist before a radical career change led him to join the FBI seven years ago.

His Waltz partner, Mark Jackson, 32, was a Naval intelligence officer, who likewise changed paths, joined the FBI and landed in Memphis.

Reporters who converged on Memphis last May to cover the indictments of five leading state legislators got a taste of the clean-cut Jackson when he testified in initial hearings.

Jackson told how the FBI had set up a bogus company called E-Cycle Management and paid lawmakers cash bribes to draw up legislation favorable to the company. Jackson testified that he was within a block when undercover agents met with and secretly taped lawmakers.

Emerging from that hearing was a surveillance tape of then State Sen. John Ford allegedly stuffing cash into his pocket and bragging, "You're talking to the guy that makes the deals."

Records soon revealed Burns' role was managing the case's key informant, political insider Tim Willis, paid $6,000 a month to pose as a lobbyist for E-Cycle.

FBI spokesman George Bolds said Burns and Jackson would not give interviews for this story, and as long as the Tennessee Waltz prosecutions remain open, no one at the FBI would comment on the case.

Yet, for all its growth and aspirations for the big league, Memphis remains at heart a small town, a gossipy place where secrets are hard to keep. In pursuing corruption here in recent years, Burns and Jackson have crossed paths with scores of citizens and public figures, many whose lips aren't nearly as tightly sealed.

Interviews and available public records show the FBI agents, often working closely with veteran federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza, have pursued crooks in Shelby County government, the Memphis Police Department's evidence room and subsidized day care.

"If I had a son, I'd want him to be just like Brian -- and Mark," said County Commissioner John Willingham, who said he's had encounters with the agents that he can't publicly discuss.

"They're young. They're brilliant. They're the kind of people who can take a thread, turn it into a rope, and hang you with it."

Brian Burns had just turned 30 and was as lanky as a teenager when he began showing up at federal court hearings in Memphis five years ago.

An FBI agent with just two years of experience under his belt, he'd relocated from his native New York and was trying to find his way in a southern city known for its peculiar variety of back-slapping public corruption as well as its famous music and barbecue.

More often than not, Burns could be seen toting a bulky box of records under one arm as he slipped into a back row and listened as lawyers argued over a pressing case of the day, the Cherokee day care scandal.

No one knew it then, but Burns was on a path to the Tennessee Waltz and a collision with Ford, who has pleaded not guilty to taking $55,000 in Waltz bribes.

DOJ_NMG_0008721

In 2001, Cherokee Children and Family Services, a private, nonprofit company, signed an exclusive state contract within months of its formation and began handling millions of government dollars intended to pay for day care for poor children in Shelby County.

Ford's sister and girlfriend quickly found jobs at Cherokee, and centers opened by Ford's brother quickly filled with state-subsidized children. Ford sold insurance to Cherokee and even co-signed on loans at one state-funded center -- all the while chairing a Senate committee that oversaw the state's day care operations.

With Burns doing much of the legwork, an FBI and Internal Revenue Service probe ended in convictions against five Cherokee associates, including executive director WillieAnn Madison, who was found guilty of embezzlement, money laundering and tax evasion.

Though called before a grand jury, Ford was never charged.

When Ford's conduct was questioned in Nashville, Doug Henry, the senate's cigar-chomping ethics chairman, said he could do nothing because he'd received no written complaints.

How much of this was filed away in Burns' head or in FBI files can't be known.

But as Burns fanned out in pursuit of local corruption, it became clear to those who saw him in action that he was thorough, idealistic and committed to his work.

"I honestly felt like this was a young man who was legitimately concerned about cleaning up the state of affairs," said former Juvenile Court Clerk C.R. 'Bob' Martin, who crossed paths with Burns on the case that led to Tim Willis, the Waltz informant.

"He really seemed to feel the public was due a report on these things."

Invariably, those who agreed to talk about Burns described him as decent and easy-going, though tough when needed. One individual who went to jail after a Burns investigation said he couldn't help but like him, describing him as non-threatening, a manner that worked well in etiquette-conscious Memphis.

On a warm June day in 2002, 14 state and federal agents poured into then-Juvenile Court Clerk Shep Wilbun's office, investigating allegations of theft and fraudulent billing.

Authorities eventually charged -- then cleared -- Wilbun of a scheme to pay hush money to a female employee.

But when Darrell Catron, one of Wilbun's top aides, pleaded guilty to an embezzlement scheme, the FBI hit the jackpot. That led agents to Willis, a politically connected felon who had received more than $30,000 from Juvenile Court for dubious consulting services.

By February 2003, Willis, who maintained close ties to the politically prominent Ford and Hooks families and had friends at all levels of government, was working for the FBI.

Because eight of the 10 Waltz defendants are black -- nine of 10 are Democrats -- there are claims that the operation unfairly targeted minorities.

The Chattanooga Times-Free Press quoted African-American leaders in October as saying the probe was one-sided -- an accusation denied by federal authorities.

Sentiments flared after the first arrests. The Economist of London reported the development in its U.S. edition under the headline, "Tennesleaze: Southern Politics." In a prayer in the Senate chamber, Lt. Gov. John Wilder called the FBI's sting tactics "wrong, and that's not Your way."

Defense attorney Micheal Scholl, who represented Wilbun and is now representing Ford -- both are black -- said he couldn't comment on the ongoing case.

But he's argued strenuously that Wilbun never broke any laws, and he vows an aggressive defense for Ford, saying he's not ruling out any defense strategy.

Accusations of unfair targeting -- or entrapment -- often ensue after undercover investigations, though none of the Waltz defendants has raised it as a legal defense yet.

To prevent such claims, Justice Department rules require agents passing bribes to public officials to first document "predication" -- evidence that an official was predisposed to corruption.

A Justice Department Inspector General report last September found that the FBI did a good job nationwide adhering to rules governing predication, yet lacked adequate controls to ensure that FBI headquarters and U.S. Attorneys are notified on a timely basis.

In the landmark Mississippi sting, Operation Pretense, in which agents posing as corrupt businessmen paid bribes to county supervisors across the state, predication was established when a cooperating witness identified as many as 35 supervisors to whom he'd personally paid kickbacks.

Confidential informants pose another source of worry when running stings, and the September Inspector General's report found guideline violations in 87 percent of informant files reviewed.

DOJ_NMG_0008722

An Internet news site, NashvillePost.com, published interviews in December with Waltz informant Willis, painting the portrait of a man seemingly out of control -- cursing, bragging of supposed payoffs to another official and openly discussing sensitive details.

Recognizing that informants, who are often criminals, pose special concerns, the Justice Department ramped up protections in 2001, requiring greater oversight by supervisors.

Regardless of how the Tennessee Waltz saga ends, Southern Mississippi's Crockett said any reform will be worthless unless values change.

"The culture here was a good ol' boy culture," said Crockett, an accounting professor who wrote the 2003 book "Operation Pretense: The FBI's Sting on County Corruption in Mississippi."

"The good ol' boys will say (to newly elected officials), 'Look, this is how it works.' They just get sucked right into it."

CIVIL LAW:

Cigarette Company Profits Are Still Smoking (MH)

By Thomas Mulier And Chris Burritt

The Miami Herald, January 8, 2006

Tobacco companies worldwide faced tighter government restrictions on smoking and cigarette advertisements last year, as well as declining numbers of smokers and higher taxes.

Yet shares of the three biggest companies -- Altria Group, British American Tobacco and Japan Tobacco -- are surging to records. Profits are rising as cigarette makers expand in poorer countries such as Indonesia and Russia, where smokers are switching to more expensive brands.

The addictive nature of nicotine also helped manufacturers raise prices, something most consumer-goods companies are struggling to do.

"These companies have a nice exposure to emerging markets," said Concepcion Moreno, who helps Brussels-based Petercam Asset Management oversee $14.2 billion, including shares in Altadis, British American and Imperial Tobacco Group. ``This is also an industry with very inelastic demand. The pricing power is strong."

Tobacco stocks probably will extend their gains in 2006, even if they fail to outperform the market as much as they did last year, she and other investors said.

New York-based Altria's shares returned 28 percent last year including dividends. London-based British American advanced 52 percent and Japan Tobacco of Tokyo jumped 49 percent, also including dividends. The stocks outperformed the respective benchmark indexes for their countries.

Sweden banned smoking in restaurants in June and Spain approved a workplace smoking ban that took effect yesterday. The U.K. and Germany raised tobacco taxes in 2005.

Nine U.S. states, including the two that grow the most tobacco -- North Carolina and Kentucky -- also increased cigarette levies, according to Bonnie Herzog, a Citigroup Inc. analyst.

TARGETING SMOKERS

A European Union ban on tobacco ads and sports sponsorships by cigarette companies took effect in July. The percentage of adults smoking in Japan fell for a 10th year.

"Even though governments have been attacking tobacco companies, there's still a hard core of smokers," said David Liston, who helps Barclays Private Clients in London manage about $34.5 billion. He prefers British American ``because it's the biggest emerging markets play."

British American, whose brands include Lucky Strike and Kent, has said earnings growth has been beating its forecast because it's selling more cigarettes in Russia, Pakistan and Bangladesh.

Japan Tobacco, the maker of Mild Seven and Peace cigarettes, said profit in the first half of its fiscal year was boosted by its expansion in Russia, Iran and Ukraine.

Altria's Philip Morris International in May bought Indonesia's third-largest cigarette maker, PT HM Sampoerna, for about $5 billion. Altria also announced plans to start a joint venture to sell its Marlboro cigarettes across China.

At the same time, legal risk in the United States is dropping and investors are realizing consumers often respond to public smoking bans by smoking in different places rather than quitting, said Michael Smith, an analyst at JPMorgan Chase & Co. in London.

Altria may split off its tobacco businesses from its Kraft Foods business this year once the biggest remaining lawsuits against Philip Morris are concluded, analysts predict.

DOJ_NMG_0008723

COURT CASES

The Illinois Supreme Court in December reversed the verdict in the Price "lights" case, one of the major cases against Philip Morris USA. The prior decision was that the company should pay $10.1 billion to smokers of "light" cigarettes who claimed the company misled them about health risks.

"This was the major litigation case they had to get through," said David Dreman, who oversees $15 billion at Dreman Value Management in Jersey City, N.J., including 14.6 million Altria shares as of Sept. 30. The company probably is worth between $90 and $95 a share broken up into units, he said, versus a current price of $74.72. ``That's still a fair amount of upside."

The number of suits against Philip Morris USA has declined from 10-year highs, Altria Chief Executive Louis Camilleri told analysts on Nov. 9 at a Morgan Stanley conference in New York.

With the Illinois ruling reversed, Altria's breakup hinges on the resolution of the Justice Department's racketeering suit against U.S. tobacco companies and the Engle class-action suit in Florida, analysts said.

Camilleri declined to speculate when a breakup might happen.

BIG SURPRISE

Tobacco companies have surprised investors who expected cigarette makers would struggle more with anti-tobacco laws in Western Europe and U.S. litigation.

Altria in October forecast that 2005 earnings per share would rise as much as 12 percent to $5.10, as it reported third-quarter profit that beat analysts' expectations. British American Chief Executive Paul Adams said the same month that 2005 would be a "vintage" year as the company was on track to post record profit. Nine-month earnings per share rose 23 percent.

Japan Tobacco on Oct. 31 raised its full-year profit target and said it expects a record $1.6 billion.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

10 Held In Alleged Prostitution Ring (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

Ten people have been arrested in what police called a prostitution ring that involved women smuggled from Asia.

Among those taken into custody late Friday at a house in the 5000 block of Progresso Street were Duc Tuan Dinh, 34, of Santa Ana, suspected of operating 10 brothels throughout Orange County, two alleged associates, six suspected prostitutes and a suspected customer, police said.

The Westminster Police Department spearheaded the seven-month investigation that culminated in Friday's arrests.

Governor Sticks By Vouchers (ORS)

By John Kennedy And Jim Stratton

The Orlando Sentinel, January 8, 2006

A day after the Florida Supreme Court struck down a key part of Gov. Jeb Bush's school-voucher program, Bush said Friday that he would support a constitutional amendment to salvage the plan that gives tax money to students attending private schools.

He said elected officials have every right to look for new ways to accomplish the goals of the voucher program, which provides state scholarships to students who wish to leave struggling public schools for private ones.

"I think they [Supreme Court justices] got it wrong," said Bush, who was in Orlando speaking to the Tiger Bay political club. "The Legislature has every right" to craft a law or ask voters to "modify the constitution if it's appropriate."

"That's the way the system works," Bush said.

Before defending his voucher program, the governor unveiled a $565 million plan to boost hurricane preparedness in the state. Among the plan's provisions are a $5.3 million public-information campaign, $30 million to install permanent generators at special-needs shelters and almost $70 million to ensure that county emergency management centers can withstand hurricanes.

The plan, financed with state and federal money, also would again allow for a sales tax holiday for hurricane supplies.

Hurricane readiness "has to be the first priority, the first priority before anything else," the governor said.

On Friday, however, attention was focused on the court decision that struck down the voucher program. The ruling overturned one of the governor's prized programs and suggested two larger voucher programs might also be open to legal attack.

About 700 students are on so-called opportunity scholarships, but the two others cover more than 30,000 children.

DOJ_NMG_0008724

The decision has left Bush and Republican legislative leaders looking for a way to keep alive the first-in-the-nation statewide voucher plan.

"It's way too early to write the obituary for opportunity scholarships in Florida," said Senate President Tom Lee, R-Brandon. "But we've got to have some time to deliberate what step to take next."

Bush and lawmakers say they have essentially two options for saving the program: Pursue a constitutional amendment, or expand the state's $88 million corporate tax-credit program for student scholarships.

Current law allows corporations to receive tax credits for providing private-school scholarships to low-income students. Legislators might seek to expand that program though it too may ultimately be challenged in court -- to cover the more than 700 students in the program affected by this week's ruling. Preliminary estimates have put the expansion at $3 million.

Senate Judiciary Chairman Daniel Webster, R-Winter Garden, is among those wrestling with how to craft a voucher program that will meet constitutional muster.

Webster said that asking voters in November to approve private-school vouchers is a possibility and may be the likely course taken by supporters. He conceded that "it may be a tough sell" with voters.

Webster also acknowledged that at the moment he didn't see any clear state law changes that could accommodate the court's 5-2 ruling.

"It was a pretty broad decision," he said.

Bush has criticized the process to amend the constitution, saying it ties the Legislature's hands.

For Bush, the voucher defeat is part of a string of setbacks dealt him by the state's highest court, including the 2000 presidential election, abortion issues, budget matters, the death penalty and even the case of Terri Schiavo, the brain-damaged Clearwater woman whose case roiled Congress and the U.S. Supreme Court last spring.

The most recent decision, however, may undo a program that had been shaping up as a central part of the governor's legacy.

"The Supreme Court of Florida has effectively reached up and poked [Bush] in the eye, and that's wrong," said John Thrasher, a Tallahassee lobbyist who was House speaker during Bush's first year in office.

Bush has already revived the Foundation for Florida's Future, the nonprofit organization he used to advance his public policies and political career before being elected governor in 1998.

Thrasher said that rallying support for vouchers would be a task suited to the group, which is being led by Bush allies, including his former campaign finance director, Ann Herberger.

But the foundation's executive director, Mandy Fletcher, said Friday that, like others involved in the voucher issue, the organization had not yet decided on its immediate goals.

"It was very unfortunate what happened," Fletcher said of the court ruling. "But at this point, I don't really know what we might be looking to do."

John Kennedy, who reported from Tallahassee, can be reached at jkennedy@orlandosentinel.com or 850-222-5564. Jim Stratton, who reported from Orlando, can be reached at jstratton@orlandosentinel.com or 407-420-5379.

ANTITRUST:

Pentagon Said To OK Rocket-launch Joint Venture (REU-Y2)

By Jim Wolf

Reuters, January 8, 2006

The U.S. Defense Department has conditionally approved a controversial plan that would let Lockheed Martin Corp. and Boeing Co. -- its top suppliers -- merge their struggling government-rocket launch ventures, a well-placed industry consultant said on Saturday.

In exchange, the Pentagon is demanding anti-trust protections sought by Northrop Grumman Corp. among others, said Loren Thompson of the Lexington Institute, an Arlington, Virginia, research group with close ties to the Pentagon and industry.

Final federal approval must come from the Federal Trade Commission, which has been awaiting a recommendation from the Pentagon, normally loath to endorse a quasi-monopoly.

A Pentagon spokesman, Army Major Paul Swiergosz, had no immediate comment on the conditional approval, first reported by the Wall Street Journal.

Bethesda, Maryland-based Lockheed, the Pentagon's number one supplier, said it was continuing to give the government information about what it called the very complex proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0008725

"We're very optimistic about the deal and the benefits it will bring to our customers, to our shareholders and to our employees," said Jeff Adams, a spokesman.

Chicago-based Boeing, the Pentagon's second-biggest supplier, said it had not received any official word that a go-ahead was imminent.

"We continue to work with the government to answer lingering questions and are optimistic that we'll be given the approval to move forward with the joint venture," said Dan Beck, a spokesman.

Los Angeles-based Northrop did not immediately return phone calls seeking comment. Northrop does not build rockets but competes for U.S. government satellite business and is eager to make sure that a Lockheed-Boeing link-up does not give them unfair advantages in satellite competitions.

Thompson, citing officials from the companies, said safeguards being sought by the Pentagon were not "showstoppers."

He said the deal was tentatively approved by Kenneth Krieg, the Pentagon's acquisition chief, after a December 16 meeting with Ronald Sega, the Air Force undersecretary who is the Pentagon's executive agent for space.

Lockheed and Boeing, fierce rivals for rocket launches, agreed in May 2005 to create a 50-50 venture that would combine the production, engineering, test and launch operations for U.S. government launches of Boeing Delta and Lockheed Atlas rockets, subject to government approval.

They said at the time that the merger would save the government $100 million to $150 million annually and projected it would have closed by the end of last year.

To be known as the United Launch Alliance, the venture would end a drawn-out legal battle over the theft of internal Lockheed rocket documents that allegedly helped Boeing win rocket-launch work in the 1990s.

Closely held Space Exploration Technologies Corp. (SpaceX) of El Segundo, California, a rocket startup, has sued Boeing and Lockheed, charging they conspired to corner the market on U.S. government launches, and sought to block the merger.

At issue is competition to launch weather satellites for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, science satellites for the National Atmospheric and Space Administration, spy satellites for the National Security Agency and communications satellites for the Air Force.

Funeral Industry Conspiring To Keep Prices High, Suit Says (HC)

By HARVEY RICE, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

Chip Beresford says he feels torn.

On one hand, he feels loyalty to the business in which he has prospered: the funeral industry.

On the other, he thinks he has suffered an injustice from funeral homes that he says have hurt him because they consider his prices too low.

Now Beresford — owner of The Pine Box in Houston, one of the largest distributors of caskets in Texas — is considering whether to join an antitrust lawsuit that aims to reduce funeral prices nationwide. The lawsuit, if it succeeds, could force the nation's largest funeral businesses to refund billions of dollars to consumers.

Beresford says he has been on the receiving end of some of the anticompetitive behavior alleged in the lawsuit. Some funeral homes that are unhappy about his prices, which often are hundreds of dollars less than theirs, refuse to use his caskets, he says.

"They disparaged me," he said. "They disparaged my product."

Nevertheless, he is reluctant to join casket retailer Pioneer Valley Casket Co., Inc. of Whately, Mass., in a lawsuit that has been combined with lawsuits filed by consumers.

The combined lawsuits accuse the world's largest funeral-service company, Houston-based Service Corp. International, of conspiring with competitors, independent funeral homes and the country's largest casket maker to fix prices and drive independent retailers such as Beresford out of business.

It alleges that the defendants have overcharged consumers by "hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars."

Beresford, a licensed funeral director who once ran a funeral home, said joining the lawsuit would feel like "suing my brother."

"I've been through the same school, the same experiences," he said. "Yet, I open this business up — which is legal to do, according to the rules of the industry — and they fight me, tooth and nail. And it's all over greed."

The consumers and Pioneer Valley are asking U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt of Houston to declare their lawsuits class actions, on behalf of consumers and independent casket retailers, respectively.

DOJ_NMG_0008726

The nonprofit watchdog group Funeral Consumers Alliance, headquartered in Burlington, Vt., is the lead plaintiff in the consumer lawsuits. It alleges a conspiracy to fix casket prices by SCI, competing funeral-home chain operators Alderwoods Group Inc. and Stewart Enterprises Inc., and the country's largest casket maker, the Batesville Casket Co.

"I would expect and hope (the lawsuits) would open that market and it would make competition for the sale of caskets more open and free," said Joshua Slocum, Funeral Consumers Alliance executive director.

SCI spokesman Terry Hemeyer said, "The allegations in the case are contrary to SCI's policies and training, and we expect to vigorously defend this matter."

Alderwoods and Stewart did not respond to requests for comment. A spokeswoman for Batesville parent company Hillenbrand Industries, also a defendant, declined to comment.

Pressure tactics allegedThe lawsuits allege that the three national chains and independent funeral homes are pressuring Batesville to allow only licensed funeral homes to sell its caskets. Matthew Cantor, one of the lead attorneys for the consumer lawsuits, says Batesville's restrictions prevent retailers from selling its caskets, the most popular brand, thus making it easier for funeral homes to mark up casket prices by as much as 650 percent.

Doggett Whitaker — past president of the National Funeral Directors Association, which the retailers' lawsuit accuses of aiding the conspiracy — said Batesville has a long-standing policy of selling only to licensed funeral directors.

"I can't say whether it's a good policy or a bad policy, but I can say these companies have a right to decide who they want to sell to," Whitaker said.

He also questioned whether the Batesville brand is important to consumers. "I have never had an individual walk into my funeral home and specifically ask for a named casket," he said.

The lawsuits also accuse funeral homes of disparaging caskets sold by independent retailers, telling customers the handles will fall off or the bottoms drop out.

The funeral industry suffered a blow to its reputation after Jessica Mitford wrote The American Way of Death in 1963, accusing many funeral homes of taking advantage of grieving families to pile on expensive and unneeded services.

In The American Way of Death Revisited, published in 1998, two years after her death, Mitford described a largely unreformed industry that had outfoxed the Federal Trade Commission.

She singled out SCI, accusing it of pumping up prices for caskets and funerals.

The consumer lawsuits mirror some of Mitford's claims, saying many funeral homes are violating the FTC's "funeral rule" to pile on expensive services.

Refrigeration fees

Plaintiffs Gloria Jaccarino Bender and Anthony Jaccarino accuse a Staten Island, N.Y., funeral home of selling them a casket for $2,095 even though they asked to have their mother's body cremated.

Slocum, the Funeral Consumers Alliance director, said some funeral homes charge $75 to $400 per day for refrigerating a body, although the cost to a funeral home is about $3 per day.

He said he still finds numerous violations of the FTC funeral rule, designed to halt such practices, that went into effect in 1984.

"There is no excuse, 20 years after the funeral rule, for these rampant violations," Slocum said.

Consumers are finding similar practices in Houston, said Derrick Wayne, a board member of the Funeral Consumers Alliance of Houston.

Corporate and independent funeral homes alike engage in practices such as charging as much as $1,495 for embalming, although it can be done for $200, Wayne said.

He noted that, in many cases, funeral directors fail to mention that Texas law does not require embalming.

'An old accusation'In response to lower prices offered by independent casket retailers, funeral homes are charging less for caskets but boosting the prices of other services to make up the difference, Wayne said.

Scott Gilligan, National Funeral Directors Association general counsel, said most funeral homes do not take advantage of their customers.

"It's an old accusation," he said. "It's just not true. The funeral-home industry depends on repeat business. No industry is impacted more by reputation than the funeral industry."

He also denied funeral homes make unfair profits.

"The fact of the matter is that funeral-home profits have fallen steadily," Gilligan said. "They used to be 9 percent. Now they are down to around 7 percent."

Profits are falling because there are too many funeral homes, said Lamar Hankins, a San Marcos lawyer and Funeral Consumer Alliance board member who helped prepare the antitrust lawsuit.

DOJ_NMG_0008727

"The death rate just doesn't support the funeral homes that we have," Hankins said. "They are apt to charge these big prices for everything to pay the bills they get."

Moved to HoustonBefore landing in Houston, the antitrust lawsuit was filed in San Francisco earlier this year. SCI successfully moved to consolidate cases and transfer them to Houston after five nearly identical lawsuits were filed in other parts of the country.

At SCI's request, Judge Hoyt agreed to add two cases recently: another from San Francisco and one from Brownsville, the only Texas lawsuit.

Attorneys say the legal wrangling probably will drag on for years before coming to trial. Jenelle Welling, an attorney for Pioneer Valley, says the lawsuits strike so directly at SCI's core business practices that a settlement is unlikely.

"They think their business model is critical to their survival, and I'm essentially asking them to change their business model," Welling said.

harvey.rice@chron.com

Realtors' Bubble May Be Bursting (LAT)

Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

IF YOU HAVE ever sold your house, chances are you had to pay somewhere around 6% to real estate agents. You were robbed. And the people who robbed you are, naturally, determined to keep on robbing you and everybody else for as long as possible. But some people are starting to push back.

The purported reason we have real estate agents is that they perform needed services. To some extent, they do. If you're selling, they show your house to buyers. If you're buying, they advise you what to look for.

For both, they navigate you through a complex transaction. That's all well and good.

The trouble is that in most places, the agents have formed a quasi-monopoly by agreeing within the industry to charge a fixed commission. It's almost impossible to find a real estate agent who will offer to sell your house for less than the going rate.

In most contexts this practice is called price fixing, and it's illegal. The agents usually have more subtle ways of doing it. Regulations are usually set by state boards, which themselves usually consist of real estate agents. They typically pass regulations barring rebates or forbidding agents from offering a la carte services or flat fees.

In most cases, regulation isn't needed. Agents may compete with one another for customers, but they need one another to drum up business. If you're selling a house, you need other agents to bring customers to your door.

"One can get ostracized very easily," says Albert Foer of the American Antitrust Institute, "if one is seen as a price cutter."

Some of the fees collected by agents are legitimate. But some represent pure parasitic leeching. Comparing the fees charged in countries with less-powerful real estate agents suggests that fees in the United States ought to be about half as high as they are. Given that these commissions amount to at least $60 billion a year, that's a lot of blood being sucked out of the home market.

OVER THE LAST couple of years, there have been signs that the customers aren't willing to hand over thousands of dollars anymore. Why? One reason is the hot housing market. As prices get higher and higher, agents earn more and more without having to do more.

The second is the rise of the Internet. In most markets, broadening access to information has increased competition and reduced prices. Think about, say, the way you can search for used books online, or buy plane tickets without going to a travel agent. The Internet revolution has left real estate mostly untouched.

Some online competitors are trying to cut the real estate agents out of the action. The Realtors association is fighting back by denying those firms access to its databases of homes for sale. In some cases, the consumers are taking matters into their own hands. Last week, Jeff Bailey of the New York Times reported that some good folk in Madison, Wis., have taken it upon themselves to create a thriving for-sale-by-owner website and an alternative listing service. Sellers can list a house for a rock-bottom fee of $150.

Real estate agents are naturally furious. "It's a commission-avoidance scheme," sputtered one who works for Wisconsin's largest real estate broker. As if when I sell my house I have some patriotic duty to fork over a chunk of the sale to a third party.

The phrase itself — "commission-avoidance scheme" — is revealing. You've heard of mobsters hitting up store owners, but rarely do they have the gall to complain that merchants who go to the police are running a "protection-money-avoidance scheme." In the real estate agents' minds, they're not the ones running a scheme. The schemers are the people buying and selling houses to one another. A free market, in other words. How sinister!

DOJ_NMG_0008728

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Sago Puts Spotlight On Safety Strategy (WP)

By Joby Warrick

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

Two winters ago, what had been a mediocre safety record at West Virginia's Sago Mine grew dramatically worse. Over 23 months beginning in February 2004, two dozen miners were hurt in a string of accidents, some of them caused by rock chunks falling from the mine ceiling. Federal safety inspectors slapped the mine with citations 273 times, or an average of once every 2 1/2 days.

Despite this record, the price paid by Sago's operators was light. Government regulators never publicly discussed shutting down the mine and never sought criminal sanctions. The biggest single fine was $440, about 0.0004 percent of the $110 million net profit reported last year by the mine's current owner, International Coal Group Inc.

Whether the mine's documented safety problems played a role in Monday's fatal accident is still unknown. But Sago's recent history illustrates what mine-safety experts say is a long-standing flaw in enforcement of federal mining regulations. While inspectors issue a blizzard of paper citations each year, these violations rarely translate into serious penalties, even for the worst offenders, according to government records and interviews with current and former regulators. Large fines are rare, and the most serious sanctions -- such as mine closure -- are almost never used, documents show.

This pattern has been even more pronounced under the Bush administration, which came into office with a promise to forge cooperative ties between regulators and the mining industry. During the past five years, the number of mines referred to the Justice Department for criminal prosecution has dropped steadily, from 38 in 2000 to 12 last year.

Meanwhile, inspectors who sought to impose large fines on coal companies have seen those penalties whittled down by agency negotiators and administrative law judges. Last year, the operator of a Brookwood, Ala., coal mine, where 13 miners were killed in a September 2001 explosion, saw its fine reduced from $435,000 to $3,000 -- a 99 percent reduction. The Alabama disaster was the nation's deadliest coal-mining accident in the past two decades, nearly equaled by Monday's Sago explosion that left 12 miners dead.

"There are simply not enough incentives for safety built into the regulatory and compensation system," said Emily A. Spieler, an occupational safety expert and dean of Northeastern University's School of Law. "Pressure on regulatory agencies to allow unsafe businesses to operate is enormous, and the incentives to comply with regulations are small if the regulatory agency does not issue large fines."

The chief enforcer of federal mining laws, the U.S. Mine Safety and Health Administration, defends its performance, pointing to a steady decline in the number of deaths and injuries in coal mines in recent years. Some of the decline has been attributed to increased mechanization, though both industry and union officials acknowledge improvements in safety practices.

"While MSHA has also pursued cooperative health and safety partnerships with labor unions, mine operators and industry associations, it has consistently backed up those compliance assistance efforts with strong enforcement against unsafe operators," agency spokesman Dirk Fillpot said in a prepared statement. Reporters inquiring about the agency's record were referred to the statement.

MSHA contends that its oversight is as least as robust as that of previous administrations, but the record is mixed. The total number of hours spent by inspectors inside coal mines has gone up, but the percentage of violations classified by inspectors as serious -- "significant and substantial," in agency jargon -- has declined.

Comparisons with previous administrations are complex, because mining methods have changed and the number of underground mines has steadily decreased.

But agency critics, including several former MSHA officials, say relatively light sanctions, coupled with the current administration's more collegial approach to regulation, make it harder for inspectors to force noncompliant companies to change.

"There was a dramatic shift in MSHA's philosophy in 2001, with a new emphasis on cooperation by the enforcers," said J. Davitt McAteer, who headed the agency under the Clinton administration, "and it came at a cost of less enforcement of the statute."

MSHA enforces safety laws through the efforts of more than 350 inspectors who review safety plans for individual mines and conduct inspections to ensure the rules are followed. Penalties can range from a warning for minor offenses, such as incomplete paperwork, to fines for "significant and substantial" infractions. More serious violations can potentially result in escalating fines, criminal prosecution or even the shut-down of all, or parts, of a mine.

DOJ_NMG_0008729

At the Sago Mine, near the central West Virginia town of Tallmansville, the increase in safety violations in early 2004 quickly drew the attention of agency inspectors. During the two years that followed, regulators dramatically increased their oversight, writing citations for such problems as falling rocks and excessive levels of highly flammable coal dust. The 273 violations recorded in two years included 16 that were labeled "unwarrantable failures," a designation generally reserved for the most serious safety infractions, or those for which the operator had previously been warned.

The operator of the mine during most of the period was Anker West Virginia Mining Co., which was acquired in November by International Coal Group Inc. ICG officials say they have worked with MSHA to correct safety problems since acquiring the mine. A spokesman declined to comment further, saying the company's focus remains the Sago accident.

According to agency records, federal inspectors issued a total of 18 "withdrawal records" against Sago, forcing the company to temporarily suspend some operations. But in each case, mining was allowed to resume after Sago officials took steps to correct the problems, MSHA documents show. Over two years, the company racked up more than $24,000 in fines, although the individual penalties were all less than $450, and many were $60. The average fine was $150.

Former agency officials say the MSHA regional office that oversees West Virginia mines was unusually aggressive and might eventually have forced the mine to clean up or face a shutdown. But ultimately the agency's response was too little, too late, said Jack Spadaro, a retired agency inspector and engineer in West Virginia.

"The mine should have simply been closed," said Spadaro, who was granted federal whistle-blower status after being demoted four years ago because of what Spadaro says were disagreements with MSHA officials over his aggressive enforcement of safety laws. "The fines were absolutely absurd, but that's all the inspectors can do. The only other option they have is a closure order, and the managers in Washington won't let them close a mine."

Weaknesses in enforcement were the subject of criticism long before the Sago accident. In 2003, the Government Accountability Office faulted MSHA for failing to follow through when it found violations. Moreover, the agency's Washington leadership did "not provide adequate oversight" to ensure that inspectors were enforcing compliance, the GAO concluded.

Former MSHA officials and leaders of the United Mine Workers of America, which represents unionized coal miners, have accused the agency's Bush-appointed leaders of being too closely allied with the industry. They note that MSHA's first leader under President Bush, David D. Lauriski, was a former coal industry executive who advocated a less confrontational style and gave inspectors a less-intimidating job title: "compliance assistance specialists."

Under Bush, 17 of 26 regulations proposed by the Clinton administration were dropped or withdrawn, and the agency began a series of high-profile "cooperative alliance" agreements with industry to promote safety through education, posters and other voluntary programs. Bush-appointed officials leaders say they withdrew the Clinton proposals to pursue their own regulatory agenda.

The agency eliminated or scaled back programs favored by unions and watchdog groups that allowed public access to records related to safety performance and accident investigations. For example, MSHA halted the release of notes from mine inspections, which the agency had routinely released under the Freedom of Information Act for a quarter-century. It also shifted many routine accident investigations into closed-door proceedings, in some cases denying entry even to union officials and lawyers representing injured mineworkers, say union officials and former agency employees.

Joseph Main, a retired UMW health and safety official, said he worried that MSHA's investigation of the Sago accident would focus only on the source of the initial explosion -- instead of seeking answers to the broader questions about mine safety.

"The explosion is just one piece of it," Main said. "They should investigate all the factors that led to the deaths of these men, including the failure of the safety net that was supposed to be in place. If those other questions aren't answered, we will have more Sagos in the future."

Staff writer Cindy Skrzycki, researcher Alice Crites and database editor Sarah Cohen contributed to this report.

Miners Steering Next Generation To Different Jobs (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

SAGO, W.Va., Jan. 7 - Mark Rankin worked in the deep mines for 23 years until a back injury put him on disability, and he said that if he ever had a son, he sure would not have wanted him to follow his father into the precarious ground.

As it was, his daughter's husband, 28-year-old David Lewis, was the youngest of the 12 men found dead this week, huddled together behind a makeshift barricade to keep out the toxic fumes in Sago Mine No. 1.

"He was only working in the mines for a while, to help my girl get through graduate school," said Mr. Rankin, 48.

"If I had a son, I'd have told him, if you can find something else, anything else, you should do it. It's a dangerous world down there."

DOJ_NMG_0008730

For those not intimate with the realities of modern coal mining, the ages of the men who died at Sago may have come as a surprise - one in his 20's, one in his 30's, one in his 40's, eight in their 50's and a 61-year-old - a crew of mostly aging veterans, a majority of whom had first put on their miner's hats around the time the Vietnam War was ending.

But that, government and union officials say, is typical for a mining crew these days.

Despite a sharp rise in mining employment, spurred by a doubling in coal prices since 2002, most of the men went into the mines during the last big coal-price surge, in the 1970's, and then struggled through three decades of roller-coaster prices, layoffs and mine closings.

Interviews with more than a dozen current and former West Virginia coal miners - almost all of them middle-aged - revealed a common story line: parents who had urged them to stay out of the mines matching their own reluctance to see their children go underground.

But there is more than reluctance behind the aging of the mine work force.

Many of those West Virginia coal miners hired in the 70's lost their jobs in subsequent downturns. But their names remained on lists, called panels, and the requirement was that those miners be given first shot at any new jobs that opened at union mines.

"The result was that most of the guys hired back first were from that same age group who came into the mines in the 70's," said Terry Osborne, an international vice president at large of the United Mine Workers who is based in nearby Morgantown. "Only recently have we gotten to the point where some mines have exhausted their panels and are free to hire younger men."

With higher coal prices, more mines are being opened and more crews put into existing mines. The federal Energy Information Administration said employment in the industry grew 7.5 percent last year.

Coal mine owners understand that it is a tough industry, and that their aging work force requires them to attract younger employees. Certainly, they say, the images and stories coming out of West Virginia this week will not make that task any easier.

Nick Helms, 25, said his 50-year-old father, Terry, whose body was the first found in Sago No. 1, did not like the harsh conditions underground and wanted better for his son, urging him to pursue his dream of becoming a professional golfer.

"He told me bluntly that I would never step foot in a coal mine," said Mr. Helms, who has moved to South Carolina to try to carve out a golf career. "He didn't want me to do what he did."

And after hearing their parents talk about cave-ins and fires and generally dangerous conditions - there have been 150 coal-mine deaths since 2000, though the records had been improving, with only 21 deaths in 2005 - and living through round after round of layoffs and mine closings, many young people are less than eager to join the parade.

"I love my job," said Joe Reynolds, 48, who works underground at Federal Mine No. 2 in Fairview. "If I was 19 again, I'd take it again. But it's not for everyone."

Mr. Osborne thinks it is generational. "These Pac-Man kids, with their video games, they don't want to get dirty," he said. "I can't blame them, I guess. Truth is, that's what you do with your kids from Day 1, is tell them, 'Don't go into the mines.' "

The Census Bureau puts the average age for workers in the mining industry at 46, but union officials say that is a little misleading, as it includes management personnel and those working in offices and other above-ground support jobs, who are often younger.

"I'd say, around here at least, the age of the average miner you'd see actually working underground is in his mid-50's," Mr. Osborne said.

Only about half of the nation's coal miners are unionized, and nonunion mine owners are under no obligation to hire laid-off union workers, said David Kameras, a union spokesman. But they often do, the miners said, if only to avoid the cost and delay of training inexperienced men.

In addition, under mining regulations, trainees, known as "red hats" for their protective headgear, must have at least one certified miner, known as "black hats," with them as they learn the job underground.

"When I started in the mines, back in the 1975, we were mostly all red hats," said John Palmer, 50, a general laborer at Federal No. 9 in Fairview. "Now you're seeing some young red hats again, but you've got one group of new guys in their late 20's and a bigger group of older guys, like me, in their 50's. We missed a generation in there somewhere."

Mr. Palmer is a big, blustery man with a booming voice who wore a sweatshirt reading "This is what the world's greatest grandpa looks like." He said he was glad he went into coal mining and would do it again.

"When I was a boy, growing up with nothing, my family never even got out of Carolina," he said, referring to a nearby mining town. "Now I make $50,000 a year, give or take, and I can take my family to the ocean."

But he has a 19-year-old son who is not in the mines. "He works for the gas company, and I thank God," Mr. Palmer said.

Census figures show that the median wage for coal miners in construction and extraction jobs in 2004 was $38,550, and $41,280 for those in more specialized maintenance and repair jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0008731

But for those in the bigger mines who are willing to put in overtime, union officials said, wages closer to Mr. Palmer's are common.

It is quite an incentive for young men growing up in a sparsely populated region like rural West Virginia, where comparable paying jobs are hard to find.

"My grandfather was a miner, my uncles were miners, my father-in-law was a miner and my great-uncle was a miner," said Mr. Rankin, who was injured in 2000 and left the mines on disability in 2002. "But when I was a boy, my great-grandmother kept telling me, over and over, 'Promise me that you won't go down into the mines.' I promised her, but I didn't keep my promise."

Mr. Rankin dropped out of high school in the middle of the hiring surges of the 1970's and first tried to find work outside the mines. But in the end, he went to the mines, and he says he is glad he did, though he does have regrets about his great-grandmother.

"She'd have rolled over in her grave if she knew I was working in the mines," he said.

Under Strain, Towns Prepare For 12 Funerals (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

BUCKHANNON, W.Va., Jan. 7 - Daisies, carnations and black ribbons, arranged in baskets, vases and wreaths, covered the floor of Anita's Flowers on South Florida Street here on Saturday - tributes to the family of Jerry Groves, one of the 12 miners who died in the Sago Mine.

Two women, faces drawn, moved between the ringing phone and the back room, taking orders and trying to fulfill them at the same time. They did not have time to talk.

Flowers are the universal language of remembrance, and when grief is not just personal and communal, but public and national, florists' fingers cannot position stems fast enough.

Here in Buckhannon and in nearby Sago, Tallmansville and Philippi, family and friends made final preparations Saturday for the first of the funerals on Sunday for the 12 men whose deaths have focused national attention on these small places, straining them to the utmost.

"Most funeral homes in our area will not be able to accommodate the abundance of people," said Bruce Tomblyn, an owner of the Tomblyn-Whitescarver funeral home in Buckhannon, as he prepared for services for one miner, Jesse Jones. At least six funerals will be held tomorrow.

At the Stemple-Forman Funeral Home in Philippi, Gov. Joe Manchin III, who lost his uncle in a mining accident, was an early visitor on Saturday, said Gary E. Schoonover, the owner of the funeral home.

Amid the mourning, there was a glimmer of good news.

Physicians treating Randal McCloy Jr., 27, the lone survivor of the mine accident, said on Saturday that his condition had improved enough to transfer him from a hospital in Pittsburgh to a hospital closer to home in Morgantown, W.Va.

"He has gotten consistently better," said Dr. Richard Shannon, chairman of medicine at Allegheny General Hospital in Pittsburgh. But Dr. Shannon quickly added, "He is not yet out of the woods."

Mr. McCloy was taken to the Pittsburgh hospital on Thursday to receive special hyperbaric oxygen treatments to alleviate the effects of oxygen deprivation on his heart, brain and other organs.

Also Saturday, another miner's note was made public.

James Bennett, a shuttle-car operator in the group of trapped miners, gave a chronology of his final hours, writing that he was alive but losing air at least 10 hours after the underground explosion.

"Each time he documented, you could tell it was getting worse," Mr. Bennett's daughter, Anne Merideth, told The Associated Press. "Later on down the note, he said that it was getting dark. It was getting smoky. They were losing air."

The final entry was made at 4:25 p.m. Another 31 hours passed before a rescue team arrived.

Tribe Seeks Land N.J. Sold In 1801 (PHI)

By Troy Graham

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 8, 2006

Two centuries later, a band of Native Americans want back the land they say the state of New Jersey sold out from under them in 1801.

In a federal lawsuit filed last month in Camden, they demanded that everyone now living on the former Brotherton Reservation be evicted.

The only problem: The 3,044-acre reservation now makes up about 85 percent of Shamong Township, Burlington County.

DOJ_NMG_0008732

Since no one wants to bulldoze a community of 6,500 people, the tribe is offering a compromise. Instead, it will accept two 1,500-acre plots of state land - one in Bergen County and one in Burlington County.

On each site, the Unalachtigo Band of the Nanticoke-Lenni Lenape Nation proposes building casinos with 45,000 slot machines, then sharing the revenue with the state and other tribes.

"Some people tell us there's no way in the world we'll get it," said Brent Thomas, the tribal chairman. "I have to be cautiously optimistic; otherwise, I wouldn't be able to get up in the morning."

Thomas, who used to publish an art investors' guide, has devoted himself full-time to tribal government since 1998, when the Unalachtigo Band was reorganized with the express purpose of pursuing Indian gambling, now a $19 billion industry.

Relying on some of the nation's earliest laws, Thomas and his 108-member band, many of whom live in poverty in and around Bridgeton, Cumberland County, are chasing billions of dollars of development in an industry full of heavyweight players.

Despite the odds against the band, Thomas sees gambling as the best way to maintain the tribe, salvage the remnants of its culture, and provide for elders living in squalor.

"We can't sit idly by while people in our community are dying," he said. "We can help ourselves if they would just get out of our way."

.

Thomas likes to take visitors to the windswept spot on the Delaware River where his ancestors crossed into New Jersey in 1634, fleeing war with the Susquehanna.

The council fire - the seat of tribal government for the Lenape people - was situated in nearby Fairton, where Thomas was raised. It's now a golf course.

But, like many Native Americans in the region, Thomas didn't grow up with a strong sense of his heritage. His older relatives recall a time when they were encouraged to hide their ethnicity, fearing the government would force them to move out West.

"The hardest thing in our community is to be open about your identity," he said.

Then, in the late 1990s, Thomas made a business trip to the museum at the Foxwoods casino, run by the Mashantucket Pequot Tribal Nation, in Connecticut.

"I go up there for a meeting with these guys, and they look like me," he said. "To see the living standards, the health care, the housing, of course we want it... . Not because we want it, but because we need it."

With the coming explosion of Pennsylvania slot machines in 2007, Thomas hopes New Jersey won't be able to take a pass on the allure of Indian gambling.

"For New Jersey to regain its prominence, it needs the next wave of gaming, which is what we offer," he said.

And when people ask how a small tribe, struggling to pay for basic necessities, is going to build a gambling empire, Thomas points across the river.

"The state of Pennsylvania isn't investing a dime, and look at the development they're getting," he said.

But not everyone agrees that gambling is the best way for tribes to flourish. A larger, 2,500-member tribe of Nanticoke Lenni-Lenape, who have established a cultural center and make appearances at local schools, adamantly opposes gambling. In fact, this tribe's laws ban any business that "profits from the promotion of vice."

"We are absolutely, 100 percent separate from the Unalachtigo Band," said the Rev. John Norwood, a Nanticoke Lenni-Lenape tribal member. "Our goal has never been gaming, nor is it to seize property and throw people off the land."

Mark Gould, the chief, said casinos have been a divisive force in many gaming tribes.

"We are a very spirituality-based tribe," he said. "We have been a very poor tribe all our lives, but if we're going to keep the families together, we have to follow the spiritual line."

He said Thomas' pursuit of gambling had injured "every Native American in New Jersey," and had made his tribe's efforts to win grants and work with local governments more difficult.

"We're very insulted when people believe that just because you're Indian, you want a casino," Norwood said.

.

Under a 1758 treaty, the Brotherton Reservation was to be held in trust for the Lenape Indians. When New Jersey sold the land in 1801, the state violated the treaty and a 1790 law that gave the federal government authority over Indian land transactions, the lawsuit alleges.

In 1996, the Delaware Tribe of Western Oklahoma - descendants of the inhabitants of the Brotherton Reservation - began investigating a claim to the land. U.S. Rep. Jim Saxton (R., N.J.) took the matter seriously enough to introduce legislation in 1999 that would have retroactively ratified the Brotherton sale. The bill never passed.

The Unalachtigo entered the fray by suing the state in 2001. Last year, a state appellate court ruled that the case must be heard in federal court.

DOJ_NMG_0008733

Nonetheless, the three-judge panel offered the opinion that, under New Jersey law, the sale of the reservation would have been valid.

"There is no question here that the Lenni Lenape not only assented to the sale of their land, but requested it, and... received full value," the court said.

Thomas said that was not correct. He argues that the land was actually sold by members of the Stockbridge-Munsee Band of the Mohican Nation, not the Lenape for whom the land was to be reserved.

"They tried to lump us all in together, and you can't do that," he said.

Either way, the journey from a land claim to a Foxwoods-scale operation could be arduous.

Blake Watson, an Indian-law expert at the University of Dayton School of Law in Ohio, said some courts have begun to rule that Indian land claims are too old, even though there is no statute of limitations.

Even if the Lenape won state land - in court or through a settlement - that doesn't mean they can open casinos. Tribes that want gambling have to be federally recognized, Watson said. The Lenapes are not.

Thomas argued - and Watson agreed - that the process is so badly broken that it could take more than 20 years to become recognized.

Thomas points to two other options: A U.S. District Court judge in New York recently recognized the Shinnecock Nation as legitimate even though that tribe had not gone through the recognition bureaucracy. It's still unclear, however, whether the Shinnecocks can now have gaming, Watson said. And, the Pequots won federal recognition through an act of Congress - the only tribe to do so.

"The odds of winning these land claims are increasingly problematic. They've got a lot of hurdles," Watson said. "It's possible for them to win a land claim and still not get gaming."

To Thomas, the issue of proving the tribe's legitimacy should be moot. But, just in case, he has an affidavit from a University of Pennsylvania archaeologist tracing the tribe's lineage back to the Brotherton Reservation.

"Everyone knows who we are," Thomas said. "The question is: What does the state want us to be?"

Thomas paused before answering his own question.

"Quiet."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Guns Flow Easily Into Mexico From The U.S. (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

NUEVO LAREDO, Mexico — The most popular instruments of robbery, torture, homicide and assassination in this violence-racked border city are imported from the United States.

"Warning," reads the sign greeting motorists on the U.S. side as they approach the Rio Grande that separates the two countries here. "Illegal to carry firearms/ammunition into Mexico. Penalty, prison."

The signs have done little to stop what U.S. and Mexican officials say is a steady and growing commerce of illicit firearms in Mexico — 9-millimeter pistols, shotguns, AK-47s, grenade launchers. An estimated 95% of weapons confiscated from suspected criminals in Mexico were first sold legally in the United States, officials in both countries say.

Guns are the essential tools of a war among underworld crime syndicates that claimed between 1,400 and 2,500 lives in 2005, according to tallies by various newspapers and magazines.

The biggest criminals in Mexico are engaged in an arms race, with an armor-piercing machine gun as the new must-have weapon for the cartels fighting one another for control of the lucrative trade in narcotics, U.S. and Mexican officials say.

In 2005, Nuevo Laredo residents endured the specter of more than 100 suspected drug-cartel executions in their city, and the release of a horrific videotape in which a suspected drug-cartel gunman executes a "prisoner." The city has become a tragic symbol of the gun violence sweeping through the entire country.

"It's obvious where all the arms are coming from," said Higenio Ibarra Murillo, a Nuevo Laredo business owner in the city's historic downtown district. "We don't make any guns or rifles here" in Mexico.

Buying a weapon legally is extremely difficult in Mexico. The country's defense secretary issues all gun licenses — the wait is a year or more, and the cost about $1,900. Licenses must be renewed every two years.

There are fewer than 2,500 registered gun owners in the entire country. Yet Mexican police confiscate an average of 256 weapons every day from suspects, officials from the attorney general's office said recently.

Javier Ortiz Campos of Mexico's Federal Preventive Police says traces by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives on weapons confiscated in Mexico often lead to the gun shops, gun shows and flea markets of Texas. The U.S. state has some of the most liberal gun laws in the country and a porous, 1,240-mile-long border with Mexico.

"Over there they even sell guns at Wal-Mart," Ortiz Campos said. The weapons confiscated in Mexico come mostly from U.S. border cities such as Laredo, El Paso and Brownsville, he said. But many come also from Houston and San Antonio.

"We're finding a lot of weapons from Houston, because the buyers get a better price there than at the border," Ortiz Campos said.

Organized-crime groups in Mexico often buy their weapons in bulk via "straw purchasers" in Texas, where there is no limit on the number of firearms a resident can purchase, said a U.S. official who asked not to be named.

Typically, the Mexican buyer will pay a Texas resident $50 to $100 to acquire the weapons, the official said.

In one case, Mexican and U.S. authorities working together traced 80 confiscated firearms to a Mexican national who paid Texas residents to buy weapons on his behalf, the official said.

Police recovered one 9-millimeter handgun last year at the scene of a shootout between officers and suspected drug-cartel hit men outside the Mexican border town of Reynosa. A trace of the weapon by ATF agents led to another Texas man who had bought 160 weapons. That man is facing gun-trafficking charges in the U.S.

Last year, ATF officials in Arizona arrested a man trying to buy 30 U.S. military hand grenades. The man told undercover agents the grenades were intended for drug traffickers in the northern Mexican state of Sonora. In August, a Tucson man was charged with smuggling AK-47s and AK-47 parts into Mexico.

Large caches of weapons routinely turn up here and in other border communities. Twenty assault rifles were seized in Tijuana on Dec. 20; that same day, Mexican army troops in the state of Sinaloa detained a group of men who were armed with five AK-47 rifles and one AR-15 rifle.

In Nuevo Laredo last month, Mexican police stumbled upon an arsenal in the hands of suspected organized crime members that included grenades, semiautomatic handguns and seven AR-15 assault rifles.

No store in Nuevo Laredo sells handguns or rifles over the counter. But if you take a 15-minute walk over the border to Laredo, you'll find the Bushmaster AR-15 rifle on sale at one gun store for $1,199.

The salespeople at the store speak Spanish, but the sign over a display case of semiautomatic handguns is in English: "If guns are outlawed, only outlaws will have guns."

The slogan, popular with U.S. gun-rights activists, certainly seems to apply on the other side of the border. Only one person has a private gun permit in the entire Mexican state of Tamaulipas, which includes Nuevo Laredo. Yet guns seem to be everywhere.

On the impoverished edges of the city, small-time drug dealers protect their investments with semiautomatics. And many law-abiding citizens can tell of an encounter with armed bandits.

Businessman Jose Luis Ortiz Cardenas witnessed an attempted carjacking by armed robbers last year outside a grocery store he owns. And he'll never forget the notorious 2003 shootout a few blocks from the cantina he operates downtown — the shooting spread to the bridge leading to the United States.

"It was a hail of bullets, federal agents firing at other federal agents, hit men firing at other hit men, with bazookas and everything," the cantina owner said.

Mexican police have, in recent years, confiscated a handful of bazookas from organized-crime groups. Mexican and U.S. officials say a very small amount of military surplus from recent wars in Central America has found its way into Mexico. But U.S. officials say a bazooka recovered recently from suspected drug cartel hit men in Mexico was traced to an Army depot in Arkansas — the weapon had been deposited there and last accounted for in 1967.

Assault rifles such as the AR-15 and the AK-47 are by far the most popular weapons imported into Mexico by the drug cartels, police official Ortiz Campos said.

The AR-15 is the civilian, semiautomatic equivalent of the M-16 used by U.S. troops since the Vietnam War. The AK-47 was designed by Mikhail Kalashnikov for the Soviet army in 1947. In Mexican street slang both are known as "el cuerno de chivo" — "the goat's horn" — for the distinctive shape of their bullet clips.

"For the narco-traffickers, it's like their good-luck charm," Ortiz Campos said. The drug cartels favor the AK-47 for the same reason the Soviet army did: its ruggedness and versatility.

"With that weapon, you can do incredible things," Ortiz Campos said. The AK-47 is not only powerful, it's also idiot-proof, he added. "It will fire underwater. It will fire when it's covered with mud."

The AK-47 appears in several narcocorrido songs about bad men and their adventures. The song "The Terrifying Cuerno de Chivo" by the group Los Incomparables de Tijuana was made into a movie of the same name.

DOJ_NMG_0008735

"Its barrel is decorated, the butt and the trigger too," the lyrics say. "Inlaid with silver all around, it's a weapon fit for a man of courage…. It's an instrument of death."

Assault rifles that are sold legally in the U.S. are not fully automated. But officials say that there are gunsmiths in Mexico who are adapting the weapons to make them fully automatic.

"We have found a few in Mexico that have been converted by a machinist," the U.S. official said. "This tells us someone with vast experience in weaponry is working here."

U.S. and Mexican officials say they are also concerned by the presence of .50-caliber machine guns in Mexico. Originally designed as antiaircraft weapons, the guns are used by cartels because they can penetrate armor.

"We think these weapons are used by the cartels to attack each other" rather than the police, Ortiz Campos said.

"Ten or 15 years ago, you rarely saw a .50-caliber weapon" in Mexico, the U.S. official said. "Now they're popping up everywhere."

U.S. officials say their Mexican counterparts are working harder than ever to fight the weapons trafficking. Mexican federal officials cooperate extensively with the ATF in tracing illicit weapons.

"The Mexicans are eager to see prosecutions for gun trafficking go forward in the U.S.," the American official said. "It's a different attitude than in the past."

Still, the gun violence continues to take on new, disturbing dimensions. Television viewers across Mexico were horrified last month by the airing of a video in which members of the one cartel competing for control of the drug trade in Nuevo Laredo torture hit men from another cartel. The video, obtained by the Dallas Morning News, ends with one of the hit men being executed with a shot to the head from a 9-millimeter pistol.

As Nuevo Laredo becomes a war zone, its streets are increasingly empty. For the most part, tourists are avoiding the city, frightened by the kidnapping and disappearance of several Americans here.

"The one consolation we have is that we know it can't get any worse than it is right now," business owner Ortiz Cardenas said. "We've hit rock bottom."

Anti-drug Task Force Funding Slashed (RPE)

By CLAIRE VITUCCI, Washington Bureau

Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - Law-enforcement agencies across the nation and Inland area could find it tougher to crack down on methamphetamine due to cuts in a popular federal grant program.

Funding for Byrne Grants, which help finance drug task forces that often focus on methamphetamine, was cut by $200 million.

The Bush Administration had eliminated funding for the program, saying it and other grant programs were ineffective. But Congress restored $606 million for Byrne Grants in the 2006 fiscal year as part of a Justice Department spending bill. The grant program received $804 million in fiscal 2005. That amount was also a reduction from the previous year.

California received $31.6 million in Byrne Grant funding in 2004. It's not yet clear how much the state will receive in 2006, but law enforcement officials say they're bracing for a big reduction -- as much as 35 percent, said Rick Oules, Director of Law Enforcement for the California Department of Justice.

Oules said the state is already planning to cut 20 positions and trim some crime-lab services. He said officials are concerned about how the cuts will affect local anti-drug task forces, which receive a majority of funding from the Byrne Grant program. There are 44 drug task forces throughout California.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-California, and co-chairwoman of the new Senate Anti-Meth Caucus, said cutting the Byrne grant program is short-sighted.

"It means fewer cops on the street, less money to combat the nation's drug epidemic, and a heavier burden on local law enforcement," Feinstein said in a statement. Task forces "make thousands of arrests each year. But these task forces will most likely be cut as a result of these cuts."

Leaders of task forces in Riverside and San Bernardino counties say they've already been hurt by past cuts.

Last year the Coachella Valley Narcotics Task Force lost 37 percent of its grant money, which it uses to pay partial salaries for detectives from nearby police agencies and for a deputy district attorney who prosecutes narcotics cases.

Because of the cuts, the task force had to use asset forfeiture money to pay for surveillance and other operations. Also, local law-enforcement agencies had to pay more of the personnel costs, said Cmdr. Fred Fierro, who heads the task force.

Lt. Greg Garland of the San Bernardino County Sheriff's Department Narcotics Division, said the county's drug task force received $823,532 last year, which was down from $1.25 million received the year before.

The task force had to redistribute people and resources, Garland said.

DOJ_NMG_0008736

"If we get cut, somebody's got to go," he said.

Garland said if all of the federal money were to go away it would likely mean the end of the task force. The federal funds are used to pay for criminalists, salaries, surveillance, overtime, training and district attorney services.

This year's Byrne Grant funding from Congress was part of a $57.9 billion spending bill for the federal departments of Commerce, Justice and State.

The bill has $20 million for the Drug Enforcement Administration to help local jurisdictions to clean up toxic meth labs. Another $63.59 million would go toward investigation, interdiction and dismantling drug laboratories in meth "hot spots" across the country where the drug is most prevalent.

But with growing attention on the methamphetamine epidemic there needs to be more funding made available to fight it, said Joe Dunn, associate legislative director with the National Association of Counties, who is based in Washington.

Tom Ackerman with the Belo Capital Bureau contributed to this report.

IMMIGRATION:

Texas Tangle (TWNHLL)

By Robert Novak

Novak Column, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The decision by State Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn to run for governor of Texas as an independent requires President Bush to oppose her and support Gov. Rick Perry. Strayhorn is the mother of two trusted Bush aides, while Perry's relationship with the president has been cool.

The White House had signaled it would not take sides in a Republican primary between Strayhorn and Perry. White House press secretary Scott McClellan and Bush administration Medicare and Medicaid administrator Mark McClellan are sons of Strayhorn.

Strayhorn decided to go independent when it became clear she could not win a Republican primary, according to Texas sources. Her opposition to Perry in the general election evoked outrage from state Republican leaders who claimed betrayal by Strayhorn, who in 1985 moved from the Democratic to the Republican Party.

ALITO CAMPAIGN MIX-UP

A new fund-raising appeal by the Committee for Justice (CFJ) on behalf of Judge Samuel Alito's confirmation for the Supreme Court mistakenly contained the name of former White House counsel C. Boyden Gray, President Bush's nominee for U.S. ambassador to the European Union (EU).

Gray's nomination is in trouble in the Senate, partly because of Democratic protest over his activities as founder of the CFJ. He had resigned from the group, and consequently his name on the fund-raising letter raised eyebrows.

When this column pointed out to CFJ executive director Sean Rushton that Gray's name was still on the money appeal, Rushton replied he was unaware of that and it must have been a case of the fund-raising contractor using old stationery. He later said the letter has been withdrawn and any money raised with Gray's name on the appeal was being returned.

REPUBLICAN LOYALTY

The White House is dispatching Vice President Dick Cheney to raise money for embattled Republican Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio, who has voted against President Bush on key legislative issues.

Cheney will address a $1,000-a-ticket Capitol Hill Club reception on Jan. 26 that is intended to raise $100,000 for DeWine's campaign for a third term. DeWine most recently opposed Bush and Senate Republican leaders on the budget bill and on drilling for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. Invitations to the fund-raiser have been mailed to major Bush contributors.

With Republican control of the Senate at stake, DeWine faces potential difficulty for re-election. Democratic candidates include Rep. Sherrod Brown and Iraq War veteran Paul Hackett, who last year ran a close race in a heavily Republican congressional district.

SURGEON GENERAL POLITICIAN

National Republican leaders are recruiting Vice Adm. Richard Carmona, surgeon general of the United States, to cut off a congressional bid in a closely contested Arizona district by a foe of President Bush's immigration policies.

The Tucson district was put up for grabs when moderate Republican Rep. Jim Kolbe announced recently he would not seek a 12th term. The leading Republican candidate has been former State Rep. Randy Graf, who in 2004 took 43 percent of the primary vote while spending only $90,000 by advocating a hard-line immigration policy.

DOJ_NMG_0008737

Kolbe is not expected to support Graf if he is nominated in an evenly balanced district that Bush carried with 53 percent. Dr. Wayne Peate, a fellow physician and friend of Carmona, filed his candidacy Monday and raised speculation that Carmona will not run.

IMMIGRATION SPLIT

A bipartisan guest worker proposal being worked on in the Western Governors' Association (WGA) promises to expose further the split over immigration in both political parties, but particularly among Republicans.

Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat, and Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman, a Republican, are working on the WGA proposal. In addition to the guest worker initiative, the proposal is expected to include increased border enforcement and reimbursements to states of expenses resulting from illegal immigration.

This Napolitano-Huntsman plan, if finished in time, will be presented at the WGA's annual Washington breakfast late in February. It would immediately be attacked by Republican immigration hard-liners in Congress.

Robert Novak is a television personality and a columnist who writes Inside Report.

Few Drawn To Illegal Immigration Protests (AP)

By MICHAEL R. BLOOD

Associated Press, January 8, 2006

Illegal immigration protests organized across the country Saturday drew small numbers, and some were outnumbered and out-shouted by those who support immigrant rights.

The so-called "Stop the Invasion" protests were organized in 19 states, demanding the government increase border security and penalize employers who hire illegal workers.

"We are keeping the debate on illegal immigration in the forefront of the American consciousness," said Joseph Turner of Save Our State, who was among about two dozen protesters who waved American flags outside a home-supply store in a Los Angeles suburb.

But Turner's group in Glendale was surrounded by more than 100 drum- beating supporters who chanted, "Racists go home." The two groups traded shouts and obscene gestures for more than an hour. One man was arrested for assault, police said.

In Farmingville, N.Y., where immigration-related violence erupted several times in recent years, only about a dozen protesters showed up and argued against the growing number of day laborers on eastern Long Island.

Paul Streitz, who organized the demonstrations, said members believe illegal immigrants are taking jobs from citizens while driving down property values.

"This is not a racist thing," said Daniel Anastasia, 46, a construction worker from Westchester, N.Y. "We pay taxes, they don't. I get paid what the union says. The contractor pays them cash. It's not fair to me."

In Framingham, Mass., near Boston, a small group protesting illegal immigration was met by a much larger group of counter-demonstrators, some of whom surrounded them and temporarily disrupted the protest.

"What they are doing is just harassing people who are out here to go to work every day, and they're doing it in a hateful manner, which is against everything this country stands for," said Manuel Olivera, pastor of the nearby New Life Presbyterian Community Church.

In Danbury, Conn., about 50 people calling themselves the Connecticut Citizens for Immigration Control spent about two hours chanting and holding signs that read "Arrest Illegal Employers." Several dozen people held a counterprotest across the street.

In Las Vegas, John Holiday, 43, and his son, Conner, 9, held signs near a convenience store where undocumented workers are picked up by employers. The boy, who held a sign that read "Our lawmakers encourage lawbreaking," said illegal immigration has divided the country.

"Do you think the problem will be over when I grow up?" Conner asked.

___

Associated Press writer Ken Ritter in Las Vegas contributed to this report.

Rallies Draw Dueling Protesters In Clashes Over Illegal Immigration (LAT)

By Rich Connell And David Haldane

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

Hundreds of protesters squared off in tense and boisterous confrontations Saturday at Southern California day laborer sites, as activists opposing illegal immigration stepped up a nationwide effort to cut off jobs for undocumented workers.

DOJ_NMG_0008738

The protests pitted members of the Minuteman Project and similar groups that seek tighter borders against counter-demonstrators outside home improvement stores in Glendale, Lake Forest, Laguna Beach and Rancho Cucamonga. The demonstrations included drum thumping, shouting and dueling efforts to videotape the opposition.

But the protests were largely peaceful. A protester was arrested in Glendale on suspicion of misdemeanor assault after allegedly shoving an anti-illegal immigration organizer.

The National Day of Protest, planned by a coalition fighting illegal immigration, included demonstrations in several other states. It was the latest in a series aimed at cities that support day laborer hiring sites, as well as contractors, homeowners and others who hire undocumented workers.

In Glendale, at one of the largest protests, about 150 people carrying signs and banners lined the street outside a Home Depot.

The city helped create a day laborer hiring center next to the store where dozens of men, many of them undocumented, regularly gather looking for work.

"They're aiding and abetting … a crime," said Joseph Turner, executive director of Save Our State. The hiring center operates legally and is needed to address a community problem, city officials say.

Turner carried a large American flag and was accompanied by about 25 supporters. But his group was far outnumbered by opponents, some of whom loudly chanted, "Racists, go home."

"They want to kick whites out of our country," Turner said of some counter-protesters. "Millions of illegal aliens is not good for our society."

Members of the Mexica Movement, which contends that North America's indigenous people were robbed of their land and culture by 16th century immigrants from Europe, engaged in heated nose-to-nose exchanges with Turner and his supporters.

In south Orange County's Lake Forest, across the street from a Ganahl Lumber store where laborers look for work, protesters and counter-protesters in roughly equal numbers engaged in similar sidewalk debates.

"It's immoral to blame people of color" for economic problems, shouted Sharon Tipton of Trabuco Canyon, holding a sign featuring a swastika and the slogan "Heil Gilchrist." It was a reference to Jim Gilchrist, co-founder of the anti-illegal immigrant Minuteman Project. "That's what they did in Nazi Germany, blaming a particular group," she said.

A man who identified himself only as Kelly, and who said he was a Minuteman, shouted back: "The issue has nothing to do with race, but with following the law."

Deborah, an illegal immigration opponent who declined to give her last name because she said she feared reprisals, complained about the laborers who gather near the store.

"You can't walk by here without being harassed," she said, describing herself as a 42-year-old single mother. "I have to warn my kids to stay away."

In Laguna Beach, the two sides — one of which included Gilchrist — hurled a steady steam of insults and taunts at each other across Laguna Canyon Road.

Gilchrist, surrounded by about 50 supporters, said the porous border "is an invitation to terrorists who would bring us harm. It's a matter of losing security and losing the rule of law as a governing mechanism. We are literally being invaded and colonized."

Gilchrist drew 25% of the vote last month in an Orange County congressional race, running under the banner of the American Independent Party.

Many day laborers were quiet and frustrated observers of the clashes.

"Hopefully, it will be over soon so we can go back to work," David Gonzalez, a father of two watching the Glendale protest from inside the hiring center, said in Spanish. "I don't understand a lot about politics, but I know we don't come here to hurt anyone."

He said employers "need us. We do the most difficult jobs."

The Silence In Herndon (WP)

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

MAYBE IT WAS just the holiday season. But in the three weeks since a day-laborer center opened in the town of Herndon -- the same center that elicited the wrath of anti-illegal-immigrant forces from coast to coast -- the main vibe coming from the town is . . . silence. True, three weeks is too brief a period to draw ironclad conclusions. But signs suggest that the center has brought calm to a situation previously marked by disorder.

It's important to remember how it was in Herndon: scores of day laborers milling about the parking lot of a 7-Eleven, jostling around the cars and pickup trucks of prospective employers -- a survival-of-the-fittest scrum masquerading as an employment bazaar. Because the site lacked any procedure to determine who would be picked for work, mayhem broke out sporadically as workers competed for jobs. In the absence of public toilets, some of them urinated outdoors. There were complaints of drunkenness, rowdy behavior and harassment of women.

DOJ_NMG_0008739

At the new day-laborer center at a former police station about a mile from the 7-Eleven, 100 or so workers make their way early each morning, sign in and are issued lottery-style tickets. An orderly drawing of the tickets determines which workers get priority for the jobs available each day. A code of conduct, drawn up by the workers themselves, sets out 30 rules governing behavior and procedures. Disciplinary action, including banishment from the center, can be imposed for trespassing, drunkenness, drugs, weapons, theft, noise, trash, vandalism, sexual harassment, lack of cleanliness, fighting and disorderly conduct, among other sins. English lessons are planned. And the 7-Eleven? It's back to being just a convenience store, and its parking lot is now used only for parking.

Contrast that with the situation across the Potomac in Gaithersburg, where a burst of citizen opposition -- and bungling by local authorities -- has at least temporarily derailed plans for a similar center. That has left several dozen immigrant day workers to gather each day at the town's Grace United Methodist Church, where the arrival of prospective employers, and the lack of any established rules, sometimes provokes scenes reminiscent of the bad old days at Herndon's 7-Eleven. A Gaithersburg task force is studying what to do next and where to locate a proposed center. Most important, the task force is soliciting public input.

The real test for Herndon's new center will come in a few months, with the spring surge in demand for day labor. The center is surely not a panacea for Northern Virginia's dilemma of dealing with undocumented immigrants, nor has it eliminated all opposition. Even now, a handful of vigilantes calling themselves "Minutemen" arrive at the Herndon center each morning to take photographs and shoot video footage and otherwise harass the workers and employers there.

Still, the experience in Herndon, as well as in Silver Spring, Wheaton, Arlington and other places with established day-laborer shelters, suggests the obvious: Dedicated centers are far preferable to chaotic spectacles in the parking lots of convenience stores and churches. Many of the workers at the centers are illegal immigrants, whose swelling numbers attest to the federal failure to control the nation's borders and enact sensible laws. But it is equally true that there is enormous demand for low-wage workers in the Washington area's booming suburban labor markets. As long as that is the reality, day-laborer centers are a big improvement on the alternative.

Democrats Criticize Appointment At Immigration Agency (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 - Senate Democrats this week sharply criticized President Bush's decision to install Julie L. Myers, a White House official, as head of the nation's immigration enforcement agency despite concerns on the part of some about her qualifications for the job.

Ms. Myers, a 36-year-old lawyer, will be sworn in on Monday. She currently serves as the president's special assistant for personnel and previously worked as an assistant secretary at the Department of Commerce. She has never managed a large department or dealt extensively with immigration issues.

When Mr. Bush nominated Ms. Myers last year, Democratic and Republican senators raised concerns about her lack of experience, and her Senate confirmation appeared to be in doubt. Some critics said they feared that her political connections, rather than her qualifications, had driven the decision to select her to lead the bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, which has 15,000 employees and a budget of about $4 billion.

On Wednesday, Mr. Bush bypassed the Senate confirmation process and used his power of recess appointment to install Ms. Myers as director of the bureau, which is part of the Department of Homeland Security. The department's secretary, Michael Chertoff, praised Ms. Myers, saying that she possessed "the experience, judgment and determination" necessary for the job.

But some Senate Democrats said they were still concerned about her ability to manage the bureau. The agency has been beset by controversies, including accusations of mismanagement of its budget and questions about its effectiveness in enforcing immigration laws.

At the Department of Commerce, Ms. Myers supervised a unit of 170 employees.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, Democrat of Connecticut, said on Friday that Ms. Myers "really was not qualified for the position." Mr. Lieberman said Congress had intended the position to be held by someone with at least five years' management experience.

"In my opinion, she lacks the management background," he said. "And one of her key responsibilities is to enforce immigration laws, and she has virtually no immigration experience."

Daniel K. Akaka, Democrat of Hawaii, echoed those concerns. "The head of I.C.E. should be an individual who has demonstrated extensive executive-level leadership and the ability to manage a budget through reorganizations and budget cycles," Mr. Akaka said. "Ms. Myers has not demonstrated this ability."

DOJ_NMG_0008740

Erin Healy, a spokeswoman for the White House, countered that Ms. Myers had "extensive law enforcement experience," noting that she had also served as chief of staff for the criminal division in the Justice Department and as a federal prosecutor in New York.

"She's tried criminal cases and worked with customs agents on everything from drug smuggling to money laundering," Ms. Healy said. "So to say that Julie does not have the prerequisite experience to lead I.C.E., it simply ignores her extensive background working with law enforcement, immigration and customs.

"This position has been vacant for far too long," Ms. Healy continued. "It's essential that the agency has the leadership it needs."

Mr. Bush nominated Ms. Myers for the position in June, but the decision first stirred a furor in September after Hurricane Katrina, as the administration faced criticism about the performance of Michael D. Brown, then the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Mr. Brown, a Republican without prior experience in managing disasters, was brought to Washington by a friend, Joe M. Allbaugh, his predecessor at FEMA.

Ms. Myers, who has held a variety of federal jobs over the last four years, drew attention because of her ties to the White House and some senior officials. She is a niece of Gen. Richard B. Myers, who recently stepped down as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the wife of John Wood, Mr. Chertoff's chief of staff.

Criticism of her nomination was not limited to the comments of Democrats. In September, National Review, an influential conservative publication, urged Mr. Bush to withdraw Ms. Myers's nomination. In an editorial, the magazine compared her to Mr. Brown and called her "another unqualified nominee for a vital position in the Department of Homeland Security."

"The president's supporters can look forward to serving in his administration, but certain key jobs ought to be reserved for candidates whose personal connections don't outweigh their professional qualifications," the editorial said.

Russ Knocke, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, said that Ms. Myers's critics were ignoring her experience in pursuing financial, narcotics and weapons crimes, experience that he said would be critical to an agency that is increasingly focused on breaking sophisticated smuggling rings.

Several Senate Republicans also voiced support for Ms. Myers on Friday, though not without raising some concerns about her qualifications and the appointment process.

Senator George V. Voinovich, Republican of Ohio, who had raised sharp questions about Ms. Myers's qualifications in September, said on Friday that she was "intelligent and highly driven" with "the potential to be an effective leader."

"Though I would have preferred that Ms. Myers had more management experience," Mr. Voinovich said that "as a former mayor and governor, I feel strongly that managers should have the flexibility to hire their own team, and then be held accountable for the results."

Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, has also praised Ms. Myers, saying that she "would bring experience and the confidence of Secretary Chertoff to this mission." But on Friday, Ms. Collins expressed concern about Mr. Bush's decision to bypass the Senate confirmation process.

"It was disappointing to her that the White House circumvented the normal nomination process," said Jen Burita, a spokeswoman for Ms. Collins.

TAX:

Bush Urges Congress To Save Tax Cuts (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, January 8, 2006

Boasting that the economy is strong and growing, President Bush urged Congress on Saturday to save tax cuts from expiring and adopt the first spending restraints in nearly a decade on such benefit programs as Medicaid, Medicare and student loans.

In his weekly radio address, Bush said the federal budget faces the challenge of long-term deficits driven by mandatory spending on those entitlement programs.

"We do not need to cut entitlements, but we do need to slow their growth," he said.

Before leaving for the holidays, the Republican-controlled Senate passed legislation to cut federal deficits by $39.7 billion. The measure passed by the narrowest of margins, 51-50, with Vice President Dick Cheney casting the deciding vote.

The legislation, the product of a year's labors by the White House and congressional Republicans, imposes the first restraints in nearly a decade in benefit programs.

DOJ_NMG_0008741

"Congress needs to finish its work on this important bill," Bush said. "By passing the first reduction in the growth of entitlement spending in nearly a decade, Congress will send a clear signal that the people's representatives can be good stewards of the people's money."

The bill would take on, for the first time since 1997, the growth of federal benefit programs such as Medicaid, Medicare for the elderly and student loan subsidies.

It is part of a campaign by Republican leaders to burnish their party's budget-cutting credentials as they try to reduce a deficit swelled by spending on the Iraq war, Hurricane Katrina and an earlier round of tax cuts.

Opponents said the bill will hurt the middle class.

The GOP is advancing "an ideologically driven, extreme, radical budget," Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said after the bill passed. "It caters to lobbyists and an elite group of ultraconservative ideologues here in Washington, all at the expense of middle-class Americans."

In his broadcast, Bush also called on Congress to make permanent all the tax cuts passed at his urging earlier in his administration. Most are due to expire before or at the end of 2010.

With GOP leaders having had little success making the cuts permanent, the House and Senate are debating bills to extend some through the end of the decade.

Democrats particularly oppose extending the lower rates for capital gains and dividends.

"Some people in Washington said these tax cuts would hurt the economy," Bush said. "The day the House voted for tax relief in May 2003, one Democratic leader declared it a 'reckless and irresponsible tax plan that will undermine opportunity in our country.'

"Since those words were spoken, our economy has added more than 4.6 million new jobs for the American people," Bush said.

The president was referring to a comment made by House minority leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., during a floor debate.

Bush Pressures Congress On Spending, Tax Cuts (REU-Y2)

By Steve Holland

Reuters, January 8, 2006

President George W. Bush pressed the U.S. Congress on Saturday to cut nearly $40 billion in spending and extend tax cuts, steps he said will help keep the U.S. economy on track.

"To keep our economy strong and secure the American Dream for future generations, leaders in Washington must make sound decisions," Bush said in his weekly radio address.

With Vice President Dick Cheney casting a tie-breaking vote in a hectic pre-holiday session, the U.S. Senate last month approved a bill that would cut spending on social welfare and other programs by $39.7 billion.

But small, last-minute changes pushed by Democrats mean the bill must go back to the U.S. House of Representatives for another vote, delaying final approval until late January or February.

"By passing the first reduction in the growth of entitlement spending in nearly a decade, Congress will send a clear signal that the people's representatives can be good stewards of the people's money," Bush said.

Democrats criticize Bush for seeking cuts in spending on programs that help poorer Americans, while seeking to extend tax cuts that they contend help mostly the rich.

At the same time, Bush is putting finishing touches on a new budget blueprint for fiscal 2007 starting October 1 that White House budget director Joshua Bolten has said will emphasize restraint.

Bush's Republicans and opposition Democrats disagree on the strength of the U.S. economy. The White House says economic growth is strong, job growth is steady and consumer confidence is up.

Democrats complain the average American is suffering from stagnant wages while costs for gasoline, health care and housing have have soared.

The two sides are divided over extending some of the tax cuts that Bush pushed through Congress in his first term, The White House disputes the Democrats' contention that the cuts unfairly favor the wealthiest Americans.

The Republican-controlled House voted last month to extend for two years 15 percent tax rates for capital gains and dividends and are set to expire in 2008.

But the battle over tax cuts is far from over and likely to be debated on the campaign trail during the 2006 midterm elections.

Bush said letting tax cuts expire would amount to a tax increase.

"Inaction by the Congress will mean a tax increase on the American people. When you hear people in Washington say we don't need to make the tax relief permanent, what they're really saying is they're going to raise your taxes," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0008742

Democrats said Bush was ignoring signs the economy was not working for average Americans.

"It's obvious that at the start of this election year, the Bush economy is an albatross for the administration and Republicans in Congress," said Massachusetts Sen. Edward Kennedy. "People are anxious about their standard of living."

Hot Tubs And Cold Moralizing (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, January 8, 2006

"The taxing power of government must be used to provide revenues for legitimate government purposes. It must not be used to regulate the economy or bring about social change."

-- President Ronald Reagan State of the Union Message Feb. 18, 1981

"(b) no portion of the proceeds of such issue is to be used to provide (including the provision of land for) any private or commercial golf course, country club, massage parlor, hot tub facility, sun-tan facility, racetrack or other facility used for gambling, or any store the principal business of which is the sale of alcoholic beverages for consumption off premises."

-- Title 26 Internal Revenue Code (tax exemption requirements for qualified redevelopment bonds)

Well, yes, certainly no massage parlors. Or hot tubs, of course; one shudders to think what happens in those. And tanning facilities, too, are the devil's playgrounds. As for racetracks, although state governments promoting their lotteries are America's most energetic advocates of gambling, government should err on the side of caution when protecting whatever this tax provision protects by frowning on racetracks, hot tubs and other things.

This peculiar wrinkle in the tax code, first approved the year after President Reagan said the tax code should not be used to leverage social change, makes certain projects ineligible to be financed by industrial redevelopment bonds that are subsidized by preferential tax treatment. This provision recently popped back into the news, thanks to Hurricane Katrina.

That ill wind blew some (barely) offshore casinos onto the shores of the Gulf Coast. As part of the plan to "rebuild," as the saying goes, the damaged coast, such bonds are going to be issued. But not promiscuously. Some legislators do not want tax-subsidized bonds to finance the rebuilding of casinos.

Not that the casinos need help: They are rebounding briskly, even expanding. Still, government has a sorry record of dispensing billions in corporate welfare for flourishing businesses.

It is mysterious why states or localities that want casinos operating nearby -- and providing jobs and tax revenue -- also want them afloat, a few feet from a riverbank or ocean shore. (Mississippi has just decided to let them come ashore.) Does the narrow band of water provide a prophylactic against sin? The communities already have weighed the sin against the jobs and revenue and found the sin congenial.

But such awkward questions arise when government begins moralizing, especially about the minutiae of life, such as hot tubs. Which brings us to Reagan's 1981 statement about inappropriate uses of the tax code.

He disliked government's using the code to conduct industrial policy, picking commercial winners and losers, which is a recipe for what is called "lemon socialism" -- tax subsidies for failing businesses that the market says should fail. Regarding the second part of Reagan's statement, any tax code is going to shape society. But he opposed manipulating the tax code to stigmatize this or that consumer preference. Which is what the code's anti-hot-tub provision does.

One wonders: Why did the social improvers who used the code to put the government, in its majesty, on record against hot tubs and tanning facilities not extend their list of disapproved choices? Their list looks morally lax.

Really stern social conservatives probably favor explicitly proscribing government assistance to lots of things, most of them somehow involving sex. Government could preen about being too moral to subsidize, with tax-preferred bonds, economic projects that include bookstores that sell Judy Blume novels, or hotels that offer in-room pornography. And wouldn't it be fun to find the words "lap dance" in the nation's tax code?

As strongly as social conservatives deplore commercialized sex, liberals deplore cigarettes, Big Macs, firearms, fur coats, SUVs, pornography not printed on recycled paper, pornographic movies produced by nonunion studios, holiday trees provocatively labeled "Christmas trees" and much more.

But do we really want to march down this road paved with moral pronouncements? When government uses subsidies to moralize, as with tax preferences for bonds that can be used to finance this but not that, government is speaking. It is expressing opinions about what is and is not wholesome. And once government starts venting such opinions, how does it stop?

Government could spare itself the stress of moralizing about so many things if it decided that the choices people make with their money is their, not its, business. And government could avoid having opinions about so many things if it would quit subsidizing so many things.

When, for example, the valuation and allocation of money through bonds is left to the market, government can be reticent. And reticent government sounds wonderful.

DOJ_NMG_0008743

georgewill@washpost.com

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Hearings A Test For Democrats And Alito (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 - The showdown begins Monday at high noon.

Even before Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. arrives on Capitol Hill for his Supreme Court confirmation hearings, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee appear lined up solidly against him. The big question is whether they will try to block the nomination by filibuster, and if so, which side will be left standing when the political dust settles.

For Judge Alito, the son of an Italian immigrant who grew up in the New Jersey suburbs with a dream of being a major league baseball pitcher, the hearings are a hurdle between him and an even bigger dream.

After months of meeting senators privately and staying mum before the press, the hearings will provide him with a forum to emerge from the shadow of the previous nominee, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

The hearings, expected to last four days or more, will also give Judge Alito his first opportunity to confront Democratic critics, who plan to spotlight the issue of domestic spying as much as abortion. How he answers their questions, on topics like his 1985 statement that the Constitution does not protect a right to abortion, will determine whether Democrats try to keep him from the job.

The Democrats, hoping to pick up seats in this year's midterm elections, have almost as much at stake as the nominee himself. They are under intense pressure from liberal advocacy groups to oppose Judge Alito, and they are acutely aware that if he is confirmed to succeed Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a critical swing vote, he could tilt American jurisprudence in a more conservative direction for decades.

Yet a filibuster would be risky business, and Democrats know it.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, a New York Democrat and a member of the Judiciary Committee, said there was a consensus among Democrats that although "it's hard to block a nominee, blocking this nominee is a possibility." But Mr. Schumer said no decision would be made until the hearings were over.

"Because he has had some very strong statements, he is under an obligation to accept or refute those, and if he just tries to avoid them the assumption will be made that he still believes them. That puts him in a difficult position," Mr. Schumer said. "On the other hand, blocking a nominee is a big deal. So who knows? Everyone's waiting."

The hearings before the 18-member Judiciary Committee - 10 Republicans and 8 Democrats - will unfold against a political landscape that is vastly changed since last fall, when Chief Justice Roberts was confirmed by a Senate vote of 78 to 22.

Washington today is consumed with the revelation that President Bush authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on Americans, and the issue of domestic spying will be a prominent feature of the Alito hearings, perhaps as much so as abortion.

For Mr. Bush, who needs the kind of victory on Capitol Hill that an Alito confirmation could provide, the hearings may offer a welcome distraction from the troubles of the Republican Party, which has been buffeted by criticism over the economy, the war in Iraq, the domestic spying program, the Jack Abramoff scandal and, on Saturday, the decision by Representative Tom DeLay to step down permanently as House majority leader.

Norman Ornstein, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute who studies Congress, said Mr. Bush would benefit from a "sharp-edged ideological battle" over Judge Alito. "He wants something that rallies his base with more enthusiasm," Mr. Ornstein said.

And nothing rallies the bases of both parties like the issue of judges. For conservatives, who have fought for decades to curb what they regard as the liberal activism of the judiciary, the Alito nomination is a sweet reward. For liberals, it is terrifying.

Republicans, outside observers like Mr. Ornstein and even some Democrats say the odds are in favor of Judge Alito, unless he performs badly or a bombshell is dropped. Yet if history is any guide, there are no guarantees.

"It's amazing how often the conventional wisdom in this town is wrong," said Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, a liberal advocacy group that led the opposition to the 1987 nomination of Robert Bork and is leading the opposition to Judge Alito. "Going into the Bork hearings, Bork was favored to win confirmation. He was decisively rejected, 58 to 42."

DOJ_NMG_0008744

Though no Democrats have announced how they will vote, it is clear that Judge Alito will attract even less support from them than Judge Roberts did. On the Judiciary Committee, three Democrats - Senators Russell D. Feingold and Herb Kohl of Wisconsin and Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the panel's senior Democrat - voted to confirm Chief Justice Roberts.

In a recent interview, Mr. Leahy made clear that he was far less comfortable with Judge Alito.

"Judge Alito, who are you?" Senator Leahy said in mock conversation with the nominee, after explaining that he spent nearly three hours with Chief Justice Roberts before his hearings but had had only one brief meeting with Judge Alito. "You're going to be on there, taking the seat of the one person who has demonstrated that she's willing to be a swing vote. To what extent are you willing to show the same kind of independence?"

But the polls work in Judge Alito's favor; they have found that a majority of Americans support his confirmation. The midterm elections could also help his chances, because Democrats facing re-election in Republican-leaning states will be loath to oppose the nomination or join a filibuster. With 44 Democrats and one independent in the Senate, and 41 votes required to sustain a filibuster, the margins are slim.

At the same time, the Senate has already fought a filibuster battle. Last year, when Democrats were blocking some of President Bush's judicial nominees, the Republican leadership threatened to change Senate rules to bar filibusters of judges. Democrats, in turn, threatened to grind business to a halt. A meltdown was averted when a group of seven Democrats and seven Republicans signed a pact saying they would filibuster judicial nominees only under "extraordinary circumstances."

Republicans say they expect that pact to hold.

"I really have some doubts, now that everyone has backed away from the table and taken their guns away, whether there is sufficient support of a filibuster, particularly in light of this nominee and his qualifications," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas.

And even some Democrats argue privately that a filibuster fight would not be worth it. They say the party should focus on issues that resonate more strongly with voters. To that end, Democrats intend to use the Alito hearings to put a spotlight on domestic spying.

A string of Democratic senators, including Mr. Schumer, Mr. Leahy, Mr. Feingold and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, have signaled their intention to question Judge Alito on the spying issue. They will try to draw a link between the program and a 1984 memo in which Judge Alito, then a lawyer for the Reagan administration, argued that the attorney general should be immune from lawsuits for ordering wiretaps without a court order.

"There is no question that the question of executive powers in time of war, in the context of the terrorist threat, will be central to the Alito hearings," Mr. Feingold said, adding, "I would be surprised if it wasn't one of the most important topics."

On that score, Democrats will get a boost from the Republican chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, who intends to hold hearings on the domestic spying program and who intends to question Judge Alito about whether Congress should have been informed.

But Mr. Specter, an ardent supporter of abortion rights, said in an interview that the spying issue will be second on his agenda; as was the case with the Roberts hearings, the chairman will raise his first questions about abortion.

"I intend to begin the hearing with the question of his 1985 statement that the Constitution does not protect the right to abortion," Mr. Specter said, adding, "I think in the popular mind, the woman's right to choose is still the dominant issue."

Alito's Future Hinges On Past (HCHRON)

By PATTY REINERT

Houston Chronicle, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON - Since President Bush nominated Judge Samuel Alito to the U.S. Supreme Court in October, lawyers and journalists have pored over hundreds of his court decisions and thousands of pages from his work as a Reagan administration lawyer.

Activists have spent heavily on TV, radio and Internet ads opposing or supporting Alito to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Liberal groups petitioned senators last week to reject the nominee while Christian conservatives backing the judge gathered on Capitol Hill in prayer for him and to consecrate the Hart Senate Office Building room where his confirmation hearings will take place.

When Alito enters the room Monday, members of the Senate Judiciary Committee will greet him with promised civility — and a week's worth of intense questioning.

Alito's confirmation hearings are expected to be much more contentious than those held last fall for Chief Justice John Roberts, in part because more is at stake.

Roberts replaced a fellow conservative on the court, the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist. But Alito, a reliable conservative, could move the court dramatically to the right because he would succeed centrist O'Connor. She has been the court's most active swing voter, often siding with court liberals to provide the decisive vote on abortion rights, affirmative action, the death penalty and privacy.

DOJ_NMG_0008745

No one is saying Alito's nomination is in any trouble. The American Bar Association has given the 55-year-old conservative appeals-court judge its highest rating, "well-qualified." The committee screening him is composed of 10 Republicans and eight Democrats, and Republicans dominate the full Senate, which will have the final say.

With 15 years on the federal bench, Alito is the most experienced judge to be nominated to the high court in decades. Supporters and colleagues praise his intellect, his careful legal reasoning and his allegiance to the law and to Supreme Court precedent.

"The portrait that is drawn of him by those who know him and know his writings is of a man of great intelligence, integrity, fairness, humility and justice," said Wendy Wright of the conservative group Concerned Women for America, which supports the nomination.

Even Alito's most strident detractors, including Seth Rosenthal of the liberal group Alliance for Justice, concede he has a brilliant legal mind and is technically well-qualified to do the job.

Regardless, Democrats have warned that they might delay a committee vote on Alito's confirmation or mount a filibuster to block a vote on the Senate floor. Their decision, they said, will depend on how forthcoming the nominee is during the hearings and how well he is able to explain his court rulings and a handful of 20-year-old memos on the volatile issues of abortion rights, voting rights and affirmative action.

"Many Democrats, and even some Republicans, and certainly a large number of the American people want to hear his views on these issues," said committee member Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "We don't want to see him duck."

Republicans and Democrats said they intend to grill Alito on those issues as well as on a key question that could quickly come before the high court: How much power should a president have in times of war?

The question, prompted in part by Bush's acknowledgment that he authorized spying on U.S. citizens without obtaining court warrants, is expected to dominate the hearings.

"The role of executive power is of enormous importance and consequence in this hearing," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., another Judiciary Committee member, and Alito's record shows he has given a "virtually unlimited green light to authorities."

"The question is: Is there any limit to executive authority and power that this nominee will recognize?" Kennedy said.

Tough questions expectedJudiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, a moderate Republican from Pennsylvania who supports abortion rights and has expressed outrage over the Bush administration's spying activities, has warned Alito to expect extensive questioning on those topics.

Alito, a Princeton- and Yale-educated lawyer who worked in the Reagan Justice Department before becoming a U.S. attorney in New Jersey and later a judge, has a long paper trail, giving senators plenty to ask about.

Perhaps most troubling to members of both parties are Alito's Reagan-era writings, in which he expressed support for chipping away at, and eventually overturning, the Supreme Court's landmark ruling in Roe v. Wade, the 1973 case that legalized abortion nationwide.

In memos and a 1985 job application for a promotion within the Justice Department, Alito said he was particularly proud of his work on the abortion issue, as well as his efforts to limit affirmative action.

Later, as a federal appeals judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Alito said a Pennsylvania abortion law was valid even though it required women seeking abortion to first inform their husbands. He compared the law's spousal notification to parental notification in cases in which minors seek abortion. The Supreme Court threw out the spousal notification provision, with O'Connor writing that women should not be equated with minors and do not lose their constitutional rights because they marry.

Alito will be closely questioned on his Reagan-era writings on executive power, in which he embraced what he called the supremacy of the executive and legislative branches and criticized the judiciary's attempts to be a check on the presidency.

Alito urged then-President Reagan to include "signing statements" whenever he signed a bill into law, arguing that the president could use the documents to lay out his interpretation to counter the Congressional Record, which explains Congress' intentions.

Executive powerIn a 1986 memo, Alito wrote that the attorney general should be immune from prosecution for authorizing illegal wiretaps, a position that likely will draw many questions this week in the context of Bush's authorization of controversial wiretaps.

Since the 1950s, the Supreme Court has held that the Constitution's balance of powers among the three branches of government should not give way to the president's commander-in-chief powers, even in wartime. In the most recent case, in which the high court said detainees at a Navy prison camp in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, could challenge their detentions in federal courts, O'Connor wrote that "a state of war is not a blank check for the President."

DOJ_NMG_0008746

Another issue could be voting rights. The young Alito, working in the U.S. Solicitor General's Office, said his interest in constitutional law was sparked, in part, by his disagreement with the Supreme Court's decisions on reapportionment, which established the principle of "one person, one vote."

Before those decisions, there was no requirement that every vote counted equally, and many state voting maps were drawn to give ballots cast by voters in one district more weight than voters in other parts of a state.

patty.reinert@chron.com

A Guide To The Hearings (MINNST)

By Eric Black

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 8, 2006

Here is a look at some of the legal issues and language likely to take center stage when the Senate Judiciary Committee starts questioning Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito on Monday.

The future of Roe

Roe vs. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court ruling that established a woman's right to choose whether to have an abortion is the 600-pound gorilla looming over Supreme Court nomination battles. Activists on both sides none too subtly seek evidence that a prospective justice will vote for or against the fundamental Roe ruling.

Alito will not provide the vote necessary to reverse Roe. But he may provide the fourth vote, leaving Roe opponents one vote short.

Two justices are out-of-the-closet Roe opponents. Chief Justice John Roberts left court-watchers in doubt about how he would vote. Alito will almost certainly try to likewise leave us in doubt. This may be tougher for him, because, in a 1985 letter seeking a promotion in the Reagan-era Justice Department, he stated flatly: "The Constitution does not protect a right to an abortion."

Lesser restrictions on abortion rights

Alito is widely expected to have an immediate impact on court rulings affecting restrictions on abortion rights.

The current Supreme Court doctrine is that laws limiting abortions cannot place an "undue burden" on a woman's right to choose. The court has picked and chosen among potential restrictions, often on 5-4 decisions with the swing vote coming from Sandra Day O'Connor, whom Alito would replace.

For example, in 2000, O'Connor cast the fifth vote and wrote the opinion that struck down a Nebraska effort to ban the late-term abortion procedure that opponents call "partial-birth abortion."

Alito has, in some cases during his judicial career, been more sympathetic than O'Connor to abortion restrictions. In a 1991 dissent, he voted to uphold a Pennsylvania law requiring a woman to inform her husband before getting an abortion. The Supreme Court in 1992, with O'Connor opining that the husband notification requirement was an undue burden, struck down that requirement on a 5-4 vote.

In 2003, President Bush signed a law outlawing partial-birth abortion nationwide. The Supreme Court will consider a court challenge to it this term. If Alito has replaced O'Connor by the time that case is argued, it is widely predicted that the court will uphold the ban on the late-term procedure.

Church and state

An analysis of Alito's record on First Amendment cases shows strong support for religious expression and less concern for the wall between church and state.

"I expect that a Justice Alito would be a strong voice for religious liberty," said Prof. Michael Stoke Paulsen of the University of Minnesota Law School.

Paulsen, a conservative who has known Alito since 1984, said Alito "has vigorously defended the equal free speech rights of religious persons and groups and has resisted efforts to discriminate against them based on their religious identity or the religious content of what they have to say."

In one case, a New Jersey kindergartner wanted to put up a poster in the classroom on which he had drawn a picture of Jesus. As a first grader, the same child wanted to read to the class from a book of Bible stories. The school took down the poster and prevented the boy from reading the stories.

The majority of Alito's appellate court colleagues upheld the school's action. Alito dissented, arguing that the school was violating the boy's First Amendment freedom to express his religion.

"I do not see him striking down government displays of the Ten Commandments, as Justice O'Connor has done," Paulsen said.

Warrantless wiretaps

DOJ_NMG_0008747

The controversy over the Bush administration's policy of eavesdropping on domestic conversations without a judge's approval in hopes of finding terrorists could spill into the Alito hearings.

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter has expressed alarm over the practice and seems likely to ask Alito whether he agrees with Bush that, in the context of the terrorism threat, a president's status as commander in chief provides constitutional authorization for warrantless wiretaps that would otherwise violate the Fourth Amendment.

Alito doesn't have much of a record on national security issues. As a judge, he has shown an overwhelming tendency to favor the powers of police and prosecutors against claims by defendants.

But as a government lawyer, Alito did write a 1984 memo arguing that government officials who order warrantless wiretaps in a terrorism-related case should be immune from lawsuits.

From Bork to Miers

The history of Supreme Court nominees appearing at Senate confirmation hearings is shorter than you might think. The practice became common only in the mid-1950s, and the history relevant to this week's hearing is even shorter.

The conventional wisdom is that Judge Robert Bork's 1987 hearing wrote the book on how to not to get confirmed. Bork was too feisty, outspoken, controversial and too clear about his opposition to Roe.

The 1990 nomination of David Souter taught conservatives a different lesson. Souter, who spent years as a state judge in New Hampshire, had said and written little about federal issues. Conservatives were encouraged to take it on faith that he would be a conservative justice.

He was confirmed with 90 votes. But Souter has become part of the court's liberal wing and is a solid Roe supporter.

That precedent helps explain the conservative revolt against Bush's nomination of his longtime associate Harriet Miers. Because Miers had a scanty public record, many conservatives decided they needed more than a wink and nod, even from a conservative president.

Roberts got rave reviews and won easy confirmation. Some of his attributes seemed to be a humble, easygoing style, a solid résumé and a deft balance that left people who prefer different outcomes all thinking he might see things their way.

It's widely expected that Alito will try to display many of the same qualities, and that if he does, he will be confirmed fairly easily.

University of Minnesota Law Prof. David Stras, a former clerk for Justice Clarence Thomas, agrees that Alito will try to follow "the Roberts playbook" and will probably be confirmed. But Stras is bothered by how hearings have become empty exercises.

"Confirmation is turning into such a song and dance, post-Bork," he said. "You really learn nothing because there's this playbook that allows you to get confirmed by saying nothing."

In Alito Battle, Issues Of Presidential Power Thrust To Forefront (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Twenty years ago, a Reagan administration lawyer proposed that when the president signed a bill passed by Congress, he should use the occasion to declare how he interpreted it.

"The president's understanding of the bill should be just as important as that of Congress," wrote Samuel A. Alito Jr. in a 1986 memo. Spelling out those thoughts "would increase the power of the executive to shape the law," he added.

President Bush put that idea to work two weeks ago in a little-noticed statement that followed his signing of the muchcelebrated McCain amendment, which forbids cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment of prisoners here and abroad.

His words appeared to turn a legislative defeat into a White House victory. Bush said he would back the torture ban so long as it didn't conflict with his "constitutional authority" as commander in chief and his need to "protect the American people from further terrorist attacks."

Moreover, Bush asserted that the measure would preclude federal courts from hearing all claims of mistreatment from prisoners abroad, a point disputed by some Senate Democrats.

This week, as Alito goes before the Senate Judiciary Committee, it will be seen whether Bush's boldness in asserting powers of the presidency has complicated the confirmation prospects for his nominee to the Supreme Court. Along with abortion rights, executive power has moved to the forefront in the battle over Alito's confirmation.

Democrats are questioning whether the prospective justice could be trusted to enforce the rule of law when the president says he is not bound by it. Bush's lawyers assert the commander in chief has an "inherent authority" to act despite the law when he is seeking to defend the nation's security during wartime.

"Does he believe in any checks on presidential power?" asked Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) in previewing his questions. "Does he believe that warrantless wiretapping of Americans is constitutional?"

DOJ_NMG_0008748

This surveillance issue was thrust onto the agenda last month when Bush acknowledged that he had authorized the National Security Agency, without seeking court permission, to intercept international phone calls or computer messages of people in the United States who had "known links" to terrorists abroad.

In 1978, Congress made it illegal for the government to conduct electronic surveillance in the U.S. without a judicial warrant. Bush's lawyers did not explain why the NSA did not seek warrants from the special court created to weigh such requests.

Some computer experts familiar with the NSA operations say they believe the agency is regularly scanning thousands of calls and messages. In that event, it would be impractical, perhaps impossible, for officials to obtain individual warrants.

The secret NSA wiretapping order is not the only time Bush has said he stands above Congress and the courts.

In 2002, Bush said he could order the military to arrest and indefinitely detain Americans who were "enemy combatants" without charging them with a crime or giving them a chance to assert their innocence.

That same year, his lawyers said that as commander in chief, the president was free to order harsh treatment, even torture, to obtain crucial information from prisoners. This was so, they said, despite federal laws and U.S. treaties that prohibited the use of torture in all circumstances.

That White House position, along with widespread reports of abuse of terrorism suspects in U.S. military prisons, gave rise to the McCain amendment banning torture. Initially, the measure was strongly opposed by Bush, who decided to sign it after meeting with McCain and in the face of overwhelming support by Congress.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said Alito would be quizzed about Bush's apparent willingness to defy Congress even as he signed the McCain amendment into law.

"The president goes ahead and signs it, and then says he retains the inherent power to go out and torture just like before," Kennedy said. "It reflects an arrogance of power and a contemptuous attitude toward Congress."

For his part, McCain issued a terse statement saying the new law did not include "a presidential waiver on the restrictions" against torture and inhumane treatment. "We believe the president understands Congress' intent," said McCain and Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), chairman of the Armed Services Committee. "Our committee intends through strict oversight to monitor the administration's implementation of the law."

Though Alito will be caught up in the dispute over the NSA wiretapping and the McCain amendment, it is not clear whether he shares the view that the president has a nearly unchecked power to protect national security.

For the last 15 years, Alito has been a judge on the U.S. 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia. That court does not get many cases that test the limits of the president's power.

A revealing statement came in November 2000 when Alito spoke at a Federalist Society meeting, reflecting on his time in the Reagan administration.

"We were strong proponents of the theory of the unitary executive, that all federal executive power is vested by the Constitution in the president," Alito said. "And I thought then, and I still think, that this theory best captures the meaning of the Constitution's text and structure."

In a sense, the "unitary executive" theory states the obvious. There is only one president. But many of its Reagan-era proponents applied this theory to say independent government agencies were unconstitutional because they were not under the direct control of the president.

Since the New Deal of the 1930s, Congress has created such independent agencies to regulate certain industries. The agencies include the Securities and Exchange Commission, which regulates the stock market; the Federal Communications Commission, which regulates broadcasters and the telecommunications industry; and the Federal Election Commission, which regulates campaigns. The most influential independent body may be the Federal Reserve Board, which regulates banking and the money supply.

Alito did not say whether he believes such independent agencies violate the Constitution, but senators say they intend to ask him about how he would apply the unitary executive theory.

Neil Kinkopf, a law professor at Georgia State University in Atlanta who served in the Clinton administration, said he hoped the senators would ask Alito about the president's power to shape the law through the use of bill-signing statements.

Kinkopf described Bush's statement on the McCain amendment as "cryptic, but ominous. It threatens our basic constitutional structure if the executive can make the law in the guise of executing the law," he said.

But Alito's supporters say it is unfair to link his Reagan-era memos to the current controversies.

"In every administration — Democratic and Republican — the lawyers believe in a robust understanding of the president's powers," said Charles J. Cooper, who recruited Alito in 1986 to be his deputy director to his legal staff under Atty. Gen. Edwin M. Meese III. "That doesn't begin to answer the legal separation-of-powers question he would face as a justice. And his habit of mind is to be careful, neutral and very balanced."

DOJ_NMG_0008749

Another big issue probably facing Alito at this week's hearings is abortion.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the Judiciary Committee chairman, is a supporter of abortion rights, and he said he was troubled to learn in November that Alito had voiced strong opposition to Roe vs. Wade, the ruling that legalized abortion nationwide.

