Rogelio Ramirez de la O, an economist who advised Lopez Obrador's campaign, said Calderon must take on the oligarchy where Mexico's wealth is concentrated, as well as corrupt unions and vested interests at state-owned oil monopoly Pemex.

"If he presents himself like Teddy Roosevelt going up against the robber barons, that would be a sign that would create a positive environment," he said. "But if he doesn't govern for the other half of Mexico, then Mexico will be increasingly partitioned."

Tens of thousands of anti-Calderon protesters gathered in Mexico City's central plaza on Friday to voice their displeasure with the inauguration. Among them was Lilia Gomez, a 42-year-old housewife from the southern state of Veracruz who took not a little joy in seeing Calderon have to squirrel himself into Congress.

"He never thought he would have to go in the back door," she said.

Amid Catcalls, Mexico's President Is Sworn In (NYT)

By James C. McKinley

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 1 — It was not pretty, but Felipe Calderón, the new president of Mexico, managed to take the oath of office in Congress Friday, as opposition lawmakers whistled and catcalled and the losing leftist candidate staged a massive march down the central avenue of the capital.

Never before in modern Mexican history has a president been sworn in under such chaotic and divisive conditions. At midnight, as President Vicente Fox's term ran out, the government took the step of broadcasting the private swearing-in of Mr. Calderón at the presidential residence, a legal necessity usually not publicized.

Minutes later, Mr. Calderón spoke on national television to urge lawmakers to "respect the Constitution" and let the ceremony take place.

The call went unheeded. Mr. Calderón's opponents from the leftist Democratic Revolution Party tried to block the entrances to Congress to prevent him from being publicly sworn in. But with his conservative National Action Party supporters ringing the podium, he and Mr. Fox were spirited in by bodyguards through a door near the dais at the front of the chamber at 9:50 a.m.

Mr. Calderón quickly took the oath of office, and Mr. Fox handed over the traditional presidential sash, then both left the chamber. The entire ceremony lasted four minutes. Opposition politicians blew whistles, screamed insults and displayed banners saying Mr. Calderón was "a traitor to democracy."

The tug of war over the ceremony provoked fistfights and pushing matches between lawmakers. It was the culmination of months of bitter disagreement over Mexico's hotly contested July 2 election, which the courts determined Mr. Calderón had won by a mere 240,000 votes out of 41 million ballots cast.

His leftist rival, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the former Mexico City mayor, has never conceded defeat, and just before the swearing-in Friday morning, he held a rally in the city's historic central square, the Plaza of the Constitution, with more than 100,000 supporters.

Then he led a march down Paseo de la Reforma, the city's main avenue, toward the National Auditorium, where President Calderón spoke at noon to several thousand invited guests as hundreds of police officers in riot gear ringed the building and blocked roads for miles around.

While on the street Mr. López Obrador's supporters chanted slogans and waved banners, inside the auditorium the atmosphere was more like the Academy Awards than a political rally, with smooth-voiced announcers praising Mr. Calderón to a well-dressed crowd while a big-screen television showed a rosy biography of him.

As he has many times in the last two months, Mr. Calderón reached out to his leftist adversaries and called on them to put the national interest above partisan differences.

"To those who voted for other political options, I will not ignore the reasons and causes for your votes," he said. "And I ask you to let me gain your confidence with acts."

"It's clear that Mexico is living through tense times between the main political forces but, conscious of the seriousness of the disagreements, I assume completely the responsibility to resolve them and reunify Mexico," he added.

He went on to announce he would immediately push for two proposals near and dear to Mr. López Obrador. He promised to cut the salaries of the president and high government officials (a staple in his adversary's stump speech), as well as to provide universal health care to children.

Those gestures were not likely to make peace. Speaking to his supporters, Mr. López Obrador charged that the election was fraudulent and that Mr. Calderón's victory was engineered by a "neofascist oligarchy." He claimed the "imposition" of Mr. Calderón as president amounted to a "coup d'état."

"We are not rebels without a cause," he said. "Sometimes they forget the heart of the matter, which is that they robbed us of the election."

He also hinted darkly that he and his party might resort to violent protests in their efforts to "defend democracy."

He said: "We don't want to generate problems, but they have to understand for once and for all, we are going to defend the democracy of this country. We have always acted in a responsible manner, but understand me well, everything has its limit."

In Congress, the left and right seemed as entrenched as ever after the donnybrooks and yelling matches of the morning, boding ill for any agreements on important changes that economists say the country needs to remain competitive.

In the end, the conservative legislative leaders were successful not only in getting Mr. Calderón to the podium, but also in ensuring that dignitaries like former President George H. W. Bush, who represented the United States, were able to attend.

The raucous behavior of the lawmakers of the Democratic Revolution Party, known by its Spanish initials as the P.R.D., provoked strong reactions. "The Democratic Revolution Party should lose its party registration because they don't respect institutions," said Héctor Larios, the National Action Party leader in the Chamber of Deputies. "We have put a stop to the continual threats and extortions of the P.R.D., and that's the way it must be, because this should not happen. We cannot respect people who don't respect institutions."

But the leftists, for their part, continued to lob verbal grenades at the new president, suggesting his refusal to accept a recount in the general election had pushed the country to the brink of revolution.

"Felipe Calderón does not enjoy legitimacy in his position, even when he has the law on his side," said Senator Carlos Navarrete of the P.R.D. said. "Calderón's government has started its rule by throwing matches everywhere, on dry straw."

Mexico's Calderón Is Sworn In Amid Protests (WSJ)

By David Luhnow and John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- President Felipe Calderón took office yesterday, facing down leftist lawmakers who had vowed to block his inauguration and putting the country on notice that he won't retreat as easily in the face of opposition as his predecessor did.

Opposition lawmakers had warned Mr. Calderón, who won a disputed victory in July, that there could be trouble if he took his oath of office in Congress, as called for by the Constitution. But the conservative said he wanted to make a point of abiding by the law. While there were some fistfights among lawmakers from both sides -- which visiting California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger called "good action" -- the ceremony ended quickly and without major incident.

The symbolic gesture sent a loud message in Mexico, a country that only saw its first fully democratic transition in 2000, but that has been slowly becoming more violent and ungovernable since that year's election of President Vicente Fox, who repeatedly backed down in the face of protests and opposition demands. The resulting drift has let Mexico fall ever further behind its Asian rivals in attracting investment to create jobs and ease poverty.

"This suggests a leader who isn't afraid to do his duty. It's positive in that it reflects a firmness that was absent under Fox," said Jorge Chabat, a professor who follows the presidency at the CIDE research university in Mexico City.

Mr. Calderón called for reconciliation in a country divided over the election. His opponent, populist Andrés Manuel López Obrador, still hasn't accepted the result, and recently held his own inauguration as the "legitimate" president. While a third of Mexicans believe there was fraud of some kind in the election, which was deemed clean by international observers, about 85% say they accept Mr. Calderón as leader.

In his first speech as president, Mr. Calderón made fighting crime, reducing poverty and overhauling a clubby political system his first priorities. Taking a page from his left-wing rival's playbook, the new president said he would reduce his pay and that of his senior staff -- posing a challenge to Congress to approve broader legislation that would reduce salaries of elected officials, as well as to cut state funding for political parties and shorten campaign periods. Mexico's democracy is one of the world's most expensive.

Seeking to reach out to his rival's supporters, Mr. Calderón said he would boost social-welfare spending to expand health-care coverage for poor children, increase cash subsidies for poor families and provide more scholarships. Addressing Mr. López Obrador's supporters, he said, "I don't ignore the causes and reasons for your discontent. But I ask you to give me a chance to win you over through my actions."

Chaos Reigns For Mexican Inauguration (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

Felipe Calderon is sworn in amid battles in the legislative palace. He promises to reach out to mend rifts.

Leaders of the largest opposition party in Congress, the leftist Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD, say Calderon's election was illegitimate, and they battled conservative congressional deputies and senators on the floor most of the week. But the leftists failed in their attempt to keep legislators out of the chambers to prevent a quorum for the joint session of Congress.

Friday morning, after leftist lawmakers barricaded most of the doors with chairs in a last-ditch attempt to keep the president-elect out, Calderon emerged through a back entrance. He squeezed into a phalanx of bodyguards and loyalist legislators, and took the oath of office.

With European princes, Latin American leaders, former U.S. President George H.W. Bush, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and other dignitaries looking on from two balconies, Calderon raised his hand and sometimes shouted as he recited the 62-word oath amid a chorus of derisive whistles.

The swearing-in ceremony lasted less than two minutes.

"Felipe will fall! Felipe will fall!" leftist legislators chanted.

"Yes we did it! Yes we did it!" the legislators of Calderon's National Action Party, or PAN, shouted as Calderon exited.

In a speech later before a friendly audience of invited dignitaries and political leaders at the city's National Auditorium, Calderon said he would reach out to his rivals and try to heal the wounds of a long and bitter fight over the election.

"It's obvious that Mexico is living moments of tension between its leading political movements," Calderon said. "I am aware of the seriousness of our differences, and I assume full responsibility to resolve them and reunify Mexico."

Calderon's rival, leftist Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, had declared himself Mexico's legitimate president in his own swearing-in ceremony Nov. 20 before 100,000 people in this city's central square, the Zocalo.

On Friday, a much smaller crowd came to the Zocalo to hear Lopez Obrador speak.

"We are not rebels without a cause," Lopez Obrador said. "People forget that they stole the election from us. People forget that a neofascist oligarchy blocked our path. That minority is the one responsible for the political crisis in this country."

Sen. Rosario Ibarra of Lopez Obrador's PRD drew laughter from the crowd when she described how Calderon had entered the legislative palace.

"That spurious man had to take the stage with an escort of PAN members and guarded by the presidential guard," Ibarra said. "He came in through the back door and left through the back door."

"Like a dog!" people in the crowd shouted back.

Lopez Obrador had suggested his followers would stage a mass march on the legislative palace, which was sealed off with steel barriers and protected by navy commandos and police. Despite the heated rhetoric, the march never reached Congress and ended peacefully.

The day's events marked the end of a battle that began just hours after the polls closed July 2, with both Calderon and Lopez Obrador declaring victory.

The often nasty campaign had laid bare Mexico's profound economic and regional divisions. Lopez Obrador won among the poor and in southern Mexico. Calderon was favored in northern Mexico and among its affluent and middle class.

After partial recounts and legal battles that stretched into September, Mexico's highest electoral court declared Calderon the winner by less than 1 percentage point. Calderon's come-from-behind victory was the closest in the nation's history.

The ambivalence many Mexicans feel toward Calderon's presidency was evident in a poll released Friday by the newspaper El Universal. Seven in 10 respondents said they opposed efforts to block the inauguration, although 42% said they believed Calderon's victory was fraudulent.

The political battle took on new life as the inauguration approached.

Conservative and leftist legislators Tuesday began to fight over the dais where Calderon would take the oath. Part wrestling match, part sit-in, the struggle endured for three days and ended with the conservatives in control of the better part of the stage.

Lawmakers on both sides were protected from arrest by the legal immunity granted to legislators here, which also prevented police from entering the chambers to restore order.

On Friday morning, while leftist members used heavy chairs to barricade the entrances, conservative lawmakers built a barrier on the dais with other chairs to protect the back door.

"What we are doing is defending the institutions of democracy," said Congressman Luis Xavier Maawad of the PAN.

If Calderon had failed to take the oath in Congress as mandated by a century of tradition and the Mexican Constitution, his tenure could have faced legal challenges, analysts said.

"It was his obligation to be here, and it was ours too," Sen. Santiago Creel of the PAN told reporters after the inauguration — not long after the senator had narrowly avoided being bowled over by a charge of leftist legislators. "This is our house. And no one wants violence in their house."

Calderon's defiant appearance on the dais was in sharp contrast with the attitude of his predecessor, Vicente Fox, during his final months in office. In September, Fox backed down in the face of protests by Lopez Obrador supporters, who prevented him from giving his last state of the union address before Congress and his traditional "shout of independence" in the Zocalo.

Earlier in the day, the threats of protest inside and outside Congress caused part of the transfer-of-power ritual to be held in private for the first time. In the presidential residence Los Pinos, Fox handed over a ceremonial flag and sash to the new president in an awkward, apparently improvised televised scene just after midnight.

After the inauguration, leftist legislators said the PANcontrolled congressional leadership had trampled the rules to have Calderon inaugurated.

"There is no quorum here," said Congressman Raymundo Cardenas of the PRD. "They made up the quorum. They never called the roll. This is a complete farce."

Calderon will face many challenges, including a dissident movement in the southern state of Oaxaca and drug cartels that appear to operate with impunity.

In his speech at the National Auditorium, Calderon promised to crack down on crime and address the country's rampant poverty. And he embraced a theme of the Lopez Obrador campaign, saying he would move to cut the salaries of top bureaucrats.

"I know that we have to find real solutions to the inequality among Mexicans, and especially the inequality between north and south, between the city and the countryside, and between those who are Indians and those who are not," he said.

In handling those problems, Calderon may be helped by the scenes of his first day, analysts said.

Taking the stage Friday was "an act of political symbolism that could end up defining his presidency on the first day of his term," said Armand Peschard-Sverdrup, a Mexico expert with the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "It's the difference between a president who is going to be seen as politically strong or politically frail from Day One."

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Felipe Calderon took the oath of office as Mexico's president yesterday amid jeers and whistles, in a lightning-fast ceremony before lawmakers who exchanged punches and insults over the conservative leader's narrow victory.

Mr. Calderon entered through a back door and appeared suddenly on the speaker's platform, the site of three days of fistfights and sit-ins by lawmakers seeking to control the stage.

Physically protected by sympathetic lawmakers and flanked by outgoing President Vicente Fox, Mr. Calderon ignored the chaos around him and calmly raised his arm as he swore to uphold the constitution in a voice almost inaudible over the noise.

Congress' leader ordered the national anthem played, momentarily stilling the catcalls and shouting, before Mr. Calderon made a quick exit and Congress adjourned.

"It's good action," said California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger as he arrived to join other foreign dignitaries -- including the first President George Bush, Colombian President Alvaro Uribe and Spanish Prince Felipe of Asturias.

"He did it. He did it," chanted ruling party lawmakers, who danced and embraced each other in celebration.

The new Mexican leader called on his adversaries to negotiate, but indicated his confidence of governing with or without them.

"I will always be willing to talk, but I won't await dialogue in order to get to work," Mr. Calderon told a large and carefully screened crowd of supporters and dignitaries several hours after assuming the presidency.

Mr. Calderon outlined an ambitious agenda to combat underworld violence and poverty, create good-paying jobs, improve Mexico's global competitiveness and reform the country's political party system. To do that, he will need the cooperation of Congress, where his political opponents hold the majority.

Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, of the Democratic Revolution Party (PRD), asserts he was robbed of the presidency and has declared himself Mexico's "legitimate president."

After the inauguration, Mr. Lopez Obrador led tens of thousands of supporters down Mexico City's elegant Reforma Avenue, the same boulevard they occupied for weeks this past summer to protest Mr. Calderon's victory.

Carrying banners that read "Lopez Obrador is president," the sea of people marched toward the heavily guarded National Auditorium, where Mr. Calderon was to address the nation.

Later in the day, Mr. Calderon was to attend a military ceremony in which army commanders swear allegiance to him.

Mr. Lopez Obrador said he would never recognize Mr. Calderon as president because that "would be accepting fraud."

"If we don't protest and we remain silent, there will never be democracy in our country," he said.

After camping out in Congress for three days in an attempt to control the speaker's podium and prevent Mr. Calderon from taking office, leftist lawmakers seized the chamber's entrances yesterday morning.

They draped a giant banner across the chamber reading, "Mexico doesn't deserve a traitor to democracy as president," exchanged punches with ruling-party lawmakers and erected barricades of chairs as Calderon supporters chanted, "Mexico wants peace."

"I have never been in such an exciting session," said Sen. Santiago Creel, who was Mr. Fox's former interior secretary.

Mr. Calderon acknowledged the political chaos during an unusual midnight ceremony Thursday in which he took control of the presidential residence from Mr. Fox."I am not unaware of the complexity of the political times we are living through, nor of our differences," he said. "But I am convinced that today we should put an end to our disagreements and from there, start a new stage whose only aim would be to place the interests of the nation above our differences."

Pomp And Punches (HC)

By Dudley Althaus, Marion Lloyd

Houston Chronicle, December 2, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Mexico has a new president. But whether he has the country remains an open question.

Having taken office Friday in a tumult, Felipe Calderon called again on his adversaries to negotiate but made clear he's confident of governing with or without them.

"I will always be willing to talk but I won't await dialogue in order to get to work," Calderon, 44, told a large and carefully screened crowd of supporters and dignitaries several hours after assuming the presidency.

"We politicians are obliged to resolve citizens' problems, not oppress them with our disagreements," he said. "Conflicts between politicians only harm the people, especially the neediest."

Calderon outlined an ambitious agenda to combat underworld violence and extreme poverty, create good-paying jobs and improve Mexico's global competitiveness and reform the country's political party system. To do that, he'll need the cooperation of Congress, where his political opponents hold the majority.

But leftist politician Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, who narrowly lost to Calderon in July's elections, vowed again never to bargain with him. Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party holds the second largest block of seats in the lower chamber of Congress.

"We are not going to sell out," Lopez Obrador told supporters before leading tens of thousands on a protest march through the heart of the Mexican capital. "We will never betray the confidence of the people."

Bizarre developmentThe fashion in which Calderon was forced to claim his office Friday suggests that the next six years of his presidency could prove a bumpy ride indeed.

In what will rank among the more bizarre Mexican inaugurations in a history full of them, Calderon symbolically assumed the presidency at midnight Friday in Los Pinos, the presidential compound.

But he was constitutionally bound to take the oath of office before a joint session of Congress. So Calderon and outgoing President Vicente Fox sneaked into Congress at 9:45 a.m. for a besieged ceremony that lasted less than four minutes.

As opposition lawmakers screamed abuse and his loyalists physically shielded him from attack, Calderon quickly swore to uphold the constitution and joined in the national anthem. Then he and Fox slipped away through the same back door through which they had sauntered in.

"Felipe Calderon just faced the first day of his nightmare," said Luis Hernandez, a columnist for the leftist newspaper La Jornada, which has been supportive of Lopez Obrador's movement.

"Felipe has a very tough job ahead, while Lopez Obrador retains an unmistakable capacity for mobilization," he said. "He can make life miserable for Felipe Calderon, and I'm sure he'll do it."

Fistfights broke out earlier Friday morning on the floor of Congress between dozens of legislators loyal to Calderon and those who support Lopez Obrador.

Following the brief brawl, Calderon supporters formed a human wall around the podium while Lopez Obrador's backers moved to block the building's entrances, futilely trying to prevent Calderon's arrival.

"It's a great, great victory," Gustavo Madero, a PAN senator from northern Chihuahua state said afterward. "The president managed to take his oath and not subject himself to blackmail and threats."

But as Calderon was slipping into power, Lopez Obrador and his supporters filled the Mexico City's sprawling central plaza, the Zocalo, for yet another rally and then marched down its main boulevard.

The protesters were stopped by metal barricades and riot police lined up four rows deep across the Paseo de la Reforma a few blocks from the U.S. Embassy.

"I feel insulted more than anything by the president who just left and by the one they are about to put in power," Alejandro Rivera, 37, owner of a Mexico City grocery, said of Fox and Calderon. "That is not the will of the people.

"This is the will of the people," Rivera said, gesturing toward the protesting throng.

But Friday's protest march was much smaller than those in the past. And how Lopez Obrador's continued opposition plays with the Mexican public at large might greatly determine Calderon's fortunes as president.

A voice of optimismJasmin Diaz, 26, who was walking near the protest with her 7-year-old daughter, said she voted for Lopez Obrador but had come to regret it during the endless protests of last summer.

"I think that there are people who don't accept that they lost," she said. Diaz said she now thinks Calderon will be a good president because "he's a studious person.

"Let's hope he takes the country forward," she said.

An opinion poll published Friday in the newspaper Reforma — which Lopez Obrador accuses of being biased against him — reported that 52 percent of Mexicans have a favorable opinion of Calderon while 18 percent don't like him. The rest are undecided.

The poll showed respondents evenly split about whether Calderon would be a good president. Sixty percent said they had yet to hear any specific proposals from him.

Though the way Calderon took office might project an image of weakness, some analysts said, the fact he was able to at all is a major setback for Lopez Obrador.

"The ceremony lasted just three minutes, but it happened," said political scientist Marcela Bobadilla. "Institutions are still working."

Challenges aheadThough the presidency remains Mexico's premier political institution, power has become more evenly distributed in the past decade, especially since Fox's election in 2000 ended the 71-year rule of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI.

Fox was unable to get many of his bigger proposals through a congress dominated by the PRI and Lopez Obrador's party. But some analysts think Calderon, who spent years in Congress, will have an easier time, especially since he has made alliances with the PRI.

"Calderon is going to have a lot of maneuvering room because expectations are so low," said political scientist Federico Estevez. "No one can expect much. That's perfect for him."

Still, if his larger policy initiatives have a chance, Calderon's congressional allies will have to somehow forge agreements with Lopez Obrador's camp.

Those are tomorrow's worries.

"I'll talk to whoever is willing to talk and I'll build with whoever wants to build," Calderon said in what amounted to his inaugural speech, given at the National Auditorium across the city from the Congress.

"If we have to change the rules," the new president said, "let's change the rules."

Protesters Can't Stop Calderón (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado, Laurence Iliff

The Dallas Morning News, December 2, 2006

MEXICO CITY – President Felipe Calderón outmaneuvered opposition lawmakers vowing to disrupt his inauguration and took the oath of office before Congress on Friday. He quickly vowed to crack down on drug cartels while creating jobs to slow illegal immigration to the United States.

"One of the three priorities of the government that I am going to head is, precisely, the fight to restore public security and legality," Mr. Calderón said before members of his conservative National Action Party, or PAN, and foreign dignitaries in a speech at the National Auditorium. "The institutions responsible for public security require profound transformations."

He said his Cabinet has 90 days to come up with a plan.

Deaths related to the drug trade reached 2,000 this year, and common crime is on the rise in Mexico.

Mr. Calderón, 44, also said that illegal immigration to the United States is detrimental to Mexican families and their communities and that job creation at home, with the help of foreign investment, is the ultimate goal of his economic program.

"Rather than our labor leaving for the United States in search of investment, it would be better for the investment to come here where our labor is and no longer divide our families and our communities," Mr. Calderón said.

Mr. Calderón said that his government's third priority, in addition to restoring security and creating jobs to reduce immigration, will be fighting poverty.

Earlier, Mr. Calderón slipped into the lower house of Congress, the Chamber of Deputies, through a back door to avoid opposition legislators who had vowed to block him from reaching the congressional podium.

PAN members had fought for control of the podium area with their fists three days earlier and camped out in Congress to guarantee that Mr. Calderón could say the oath of office there. Opposition legislators also camped out but were outnumbered and were unable to dislodge the ruling party.

Mexico's constitution requires the new president to declare the brief oath of office "before Congress" on his first day as president. Failure to do so can result in an interim president being named, although legal experts disagreed on whether that would have happened in Mr. Calderón's case.

As Mr. Calderón quickly read the oath and promised to uphold the Mexican constitution, opposition legislators tried to shout him down. The new president, standing next to outgoing President Vicente Fox, then put on the presidential sash and sang the national anthem along with legislators.

The ceremony lasted less than five minutes, and Mr. Calderón headed for the National Auditorium and a friendlier crowd.

Lawmakers fight

Earlier, foreign dignitaries appeared taken aback when opposing lawmakers broke into a fistfight shortly before the ceremony. One lawmaker threatened to throw a chair. But Texas Gov. Rick Perry said the drama inside Congress was a sign that Mexican democracy was progressing.

"I was pretty excited about a little fisticuff, a little protest ... kind of like our own elections, and in a sense a good progression ... for Mexico. ... [They're] really feeling comfortable about expressing their opinions," Mr. Perry said later at the residence of U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza. "It's not like we haven't seen a house fight in Texas. Just not sure there was a chair involved."

Outside the National Auditorium, as Mr. Calderón spoke inside, losing presidential candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador protested with thousands of supporters, who chanted "fraud" and "illegitimate." Mr. López Obrador, who lost the July 2 election by 0.5 percent of the vote, claimed the election was stolen from him. But independent electoral authorities ruled that the vote was clean.

During a rally in the central Zócalo plaza, Mr. López Obrador sought to justify his quixotic "parallel" presidency and months of protests that have cost his leftist Party of the Democratic Revolution, or PRD, dearly in terms of public opinion. Only about 20 percent of voters support the PRD cause, opinion polls show, down from the 35 percent of the vote Mr. López Obrador received on July 2.

"We are here protesting the electoral fraud of July 2, we are here because we don't accept this imposition.We are here because we want democracy in our country," said Mr. López Obrador, a former mayor of Mexico City and a fiery orator. "We are not rebels without a cause."

Supporters of Mr. López Obrador vowed to become a thorn in the side of Mr. Calderón until the last day of his term.

"What we're witnessing here is an imposition against the will of the people," said María Dolores Uribe, 61, a homemaker. "Calderón will always be seen as a false president. And we won't let him forget that, ever."

Mr. Calderón has been a democracy activist during much of his life. Before the PAN came to power in 2000, Mexico had been ruled by the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, for 71 years.

According to his autobiography, Mr. Calderón and girlfriend Margarita Zavala, now his wife, tried to sneak into the presidential residence of Los Pinos by hiding in the trunk of a car. That was in the late 1980s. The trunk was opened by secret service agents, and Mr. Calderón, with considerably more hair than he has now, stood up and held a sign that read, "Long Live Democracy."

Now the police agents are protecting him from demonstrators.

Along the route taken by the protesters' from the Zócalo to the National Auditorium, thousands of riot police lined the Reforma thoroughfare, and special-forces troops toting high-powered weapons ringed the auditorium. Aside from scuffles among lawmakers inside the legislative palace, there were no reports of violence or arrests.

Mr. Calderón said he would reach out to the opposition, but would not wait indefinitely.

No party has majority control of either house of Congress, although Mr. Calderón has made overtures to the PRI to form a loose coalition.

"I will always be open to dialogue, but I will not wait for dialogue in order to get to work," Mr. Calderón said. "Beyond the interests of group or party, there is a society ready to work."

The inauguration day ceremonies began at 12:01 a.m., when Mr. Fox handed over the presidential residence of Los Pinos to Mr. Calderón in a symbolic but unusual ceremony. Legally, that is the moment in which Mr. Calderón became president.

Mr. Fox removed the presidential sash and handed it to a military cadet for later transfer to Mr. Calderón before Congress.

"I have received the presidential offices from President Vicente Fox, the start of the process of taking possession of the presidency," Mr. Calderón said. "Later, I will appear before Congress to take the constitutional oath."

Extensive coverage

The week's events were covered extensively on Mexican TV, especially the fistfights, the lawmakers' three-day vigil in the Chamber of Deputies, and the tense situation before Mr. Calderón's arrival Friday.

But just before Mr. Calderón's arrival at Congress, television and radio stations were required to carry an official broadcast of the event produced by the president's office, causing chatter on radio talk shows about whether the government was imposing its version of events and trying to minimize the protests.

Along the Reforma thoroughfare, Elsa Martínez, 70, sat and watched the drama unfold. A tear ran down her wrinkled face. Asked why she was crying, Ms. Martínez responded, "I'm not crying for any of these fools, that's for sure. I'm shedding a tear for Mexico, poor Mexico."

She listened to the radio with earphones, following the inauguration ceremony and waiting for supporters of Mr. López Obrador to march by. "They're like little boys fighting for their marbles," she said. "What a shame."

Mexico's New President (NYT)

For virtually all of Mexico's history, whoever has ruled the country has done so with unchecked power. Then came Vicente Fox — elected president in 2000 — a decent man with many good ideas who lacked the skill and appetite to muscle his programs through. To some, his passivity was just what Mexico needed after 71 years of dictatorship. For others, his failures began to give democracy a bad name.

This week marked Mr. Fox's departure and the inauguration of Felipe Calderón. Like Mr. Fox, Mr. Calderón favors modernizing a corrupt and antiquated energy sector, simplifying the tax system, taking on dinosaur unions, creating jobs and improving education. The difference is that Mr. Calderón may have the political savvy to succeed.

The political challenges he's up against were made clear yesterday, as leftist lawmakers whistled and catcalled through his brief inaugural ceremony. Mr. Calderón won a disputed election with less than 36 percent of the vote, and his party controls only 41 percent of Congress. His defeated leftist opponent, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, still insists he won, although he has lost sympathy by vowing to block Mr. Calderón's efforts. Mr. Calderón has gained approval, seeking reconciliation.

The new president's biggest challenges will be fighting poverty and crime and reforming the economy. Mr. Calderón has chosen a mostly good cabinet and a steady economic team. But he has already flinched on one huge challenge: breaking up big phone, television and cement monopolies, apparently allowing them to veto his choice of an anti-monopoly reformer for his cabinet.

Mr. Calderón announced yesterday that he would push for universal health insurance for children and an expansion of the country's antipoverty programs. He is taking a page from Mr. López Obrador's agenda — which is good for Mexico and might win the new president some of the political capital he will need to push through reforms.

Crisis Intensifies In Lebanon As Hezbollah Takes To Streets (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

BEIRUT, Dec. 1 -- Hezbollah and its allies escalated Lebanon's month-long political crisis into a popular confrontation Friday, sending hundreds of thousands of supporters into the streets, parking lots and sidewalks of downtown Beirut, vowing to topple the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and reorient the country.

The city's stylish downtown, to some a symbol of recovery from the 15-year civil war that ended in 1990, was awash in red-white-and-green Lebanese flags, interspersed with banners in the colors of various sectarian and political leaders. The winter sun glinted off coils of wire and barricades encircling the colonnaded government headquarters nearby, where Siniora and other ministers have taken up residence. But the crowd was more festive than angry, more celebratory than militant, as the theater of the moment intersected, perhaps a little dissonantly, with the drama of a struggle as decisive as any in Lebanon's history.

"I wish that our prime minister and his ministers were here among us today, rather than hiding behind army tanks and barbed wire," Michel Aoun, an influential Christian leader allied with Hezbollah, told the crowd. "The one who has support of his people does not need barbed wire." Moments later, he added, "I call on the prime minister and his ministers to resign."

In symbolism, numbers and aims, the protest marked a collision between two countries that have coexisted uneasily inside Lebanon following the assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in February 2005, when dueling protests convened in downtown Beirut over Syria's 29-year military presence here. They share almost no common ground: the culture of resistance to Israel celebrated by Hezbollah or the accommodation promoted by Siniora's government; the influence of Hezbollah's patrons in Iran and Syria or that of the government's French and American allies; a divided social perspective, one more religiously traditional, one more liberal. Also at issue is the extent of power due the long-disenfranchised Shiite Muslim community, the country's single largest, that Hezbollah and its militia largely represent.

"One Lebanon, one voice!" some people shouted Friday. But the question playing out across downtown Beirut, under the statue of one of Lebanon's founders, Riyad es-Solh, was the same question asked at Lebanon's independence in 1943 and so often since: What kind of Lebanon?

What is happening is more than just a political struggle unleashed by Hezbollah's demand in October for a share of the cabinet that would give it an effective veto over government decisions. Competing narratives of the country's past and future are on display.

Both sides utter the same words -- independence, sovereignty, national unity -- yet they hold two visions of what those words represent. In broadcasts, both Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, and Siniora urged their supporters to fly the Lebanese flag, either at the protest or, for the prime minister's supporters, from their homes. Each man speaks with sincerity underlined by the desperate conviction that the other side poses an existential threat. Both claim legitimacy from a long list of martyrs, whether Hezbollah's dead in this summer's war with Israel or Hariri and other anti-Syrian figures assassinated in Beirut since his death.

And both speak with certainty of a majority they claim to represent in Lebanon.

"Us," sign after sign read Friday. In Arabic, the consonants used can also mean, "We want a clean government."

"The government ruling us right now is dictatorial. It's a minority claiming to be a majority," said Boudy Mbarak, 24, a Christian supporter of Aoun from the village of Balouneh. "And I think we're showing today who's the majority."

Behind him, chants cascaded across the crowd: "Siniora out! We want a free government!" Drums added a cadence to the slogans thundering from banks of speakers. Youths danced in circles: "Hey, hey, you government of thieves!"

With Friday's protest, the crisis now gains momentum. Hezbollah has said the demonstrations will be open-ended. Long after nightfall, white tents went up in the downtown area, where thousands of people were expected to stay indefinitely, and speakers blared Hezbollah anthems. Groups lit fires with placards, one reading, "All of us for the nation." Others played cards or smoked water pipes in a carnival-like atmosphere.

"I'm staying until the year 2100 or until Sayyid Hasan speaks again," vowed Hassan Karnib, a 20-year-old protester, using an honorific for the Hezbollah leader.

If the protests fail to force the government's resignation, flatly ruled out by Siniora in a speech Thursday, Hezbollah's supporters have talked about resignations from parliament, work stoppages or civil disobedience to shut down ministries.

The group's opponents, sensing that Friday's mass demonstration was the biggest card it had to play, promised to wait.

"They decided to go to the streets. Let them do that, and let them stay there as long as they want," said Walid Jumblatt, the leader of the Druze community, who has shifted alliances since the civil war and is now one of Hezbollah's most outspoken opponents. "We will stay in our homes, raise our flags and wait one month, two months, as long as they want."

Hezbollah announced the protest Thursday, and by early morning the movement, among the best-organized in the Middle East, was in full swing. The southern suburbs, devastated by Israeli bombing this summer, were almost frenetic, with buses plying roads and flags of Hezbollah and Lebanon flying from windows. Mopeds sped through streets plastered with portraits of Nasrallah, who has inspired a cult of personality among his followers and others in the Arab world. "I promise you victory always," read one of his posters near a warren of shops along a street snarled with traffic.

Protesters ventured downtown along streets adorned with the iconography of Hezbollah's opponents. One sign read in French, "I love life." Another, written in red, said in Arabic, "We want to live." Both were critiques of Hezbollah's celebration of martyrdom.

"They don't love life; they love the throne," quipped Maha Kanj, 16.

A Hezbollah placard read: "Because we love life."

Each side boasted of the numbers, or lack thereof, at the protest. Hezbollah's television station, al-Manar, put the figure at 1.5 million. Future Television, loyal to Hariri's son, Saad, who has inherited leadership of the Sunni community, estimated tens of thousands. Although it was larger than last week's funeral for assassinated cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel, it appeared smaller, according to anecdotal impressions, than the March 14 protest that climaxed last year's demonstrations.

While al-Manar provided minute-by-minute coverage of the protest's early hours, Future broadcast a cooking show. During the protest's peak, Future broadcast a split screen. On one side were images of an empty Martyrs' Square, with troops, armored personnel carriers and firetrucks barring demonstrators from entering. On the other were images of protests the night before in support of the prime minister. On al-Manar, the numbers themselves were the message: "This is probably the view Siniora had of the demonstrations," the announcer said as footage rolled. "We wonder whether he heard and saw."

Hezbollah went to lengths to portray the demonstration as less its own and more an expression of what it calls the national opposition. No Hezbollah speakers appeared; Aoun, a Christian, gave the main address, although the number of his supporters paled in comparison to Hezbollah's. The demonstrators themselves were eclectic, from sober-looking clerics in traditional robes to supporters of Aoun who had dyed their hair his group's trademark orange. Others had donned orange wigs and cowboy hats. Some of the slogans were sectarian: "God, Nasrallah and all the southern suburbs." At times, though, the crowd aimed for chants with broader appeal: "Green, yellow, orange," the colors of Hezbollah, an allied movement and Aoun, "we want to topple the government."

The slogans played on themes that Hezbollah and its allies have pushed relentlessly since the crisis began. Corruption was a key complaint. Many chants were directed at Siniora, some ridiculing him for crying in public during the war. "We've had enough lies and tears," one went.

Often the language was directed against the United States' sway in Lebanon. Nasrallah has called the government more loyal to U.S. Ambassador Jeffrey D. Feltman than Siniora himself, and in conversation after conversation, protesters, occasionally even Aoun's supporters, cast the protest as a way to deflect U.S. influence, usually ignoring the roles played by Iran and neighboring Syria as Hezbollah's allies.

"No, he's an American," Sleiman answered. He paused. "There's no difference!"

In some ways, the most poignant theme was the legacy of this summer's war: Hezbollah's opponents blame it for starting the conflict; Hezbollah celebrates it as a victory, with anger at what it sees as the government's lack of support as it fought. The war's imagery suffused the conversations and message of the protest. In Lebanese politics, the conflict left Hezbollah emboldened, and the sequence of events has proved an unbroken chain, with Hezbollah now pressing for unprecedented power.

As Ali Younis sat with his three sons, he used the words heard so often among Hezbollah's supporters in southern Lebanon during the war: pride and empowerment.

Behind them a banner played on a slogan from the conflict: "As with victory, change is coming, coming, coming." Younis spoke with the fervor of a man who wants to be listened to.

"I'm staying until the government falls," he said, narrowing his eyes. "Dignity is more important than anything else."

In Beirut, High Spirits And Demand For Change (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 1 — The official goal was to overthrow the government, but the atmosphere was bizarrely festive on Friday as hundreds of thousands of Hezbollah supporters poured into the center of Beirut, banging drums, chanting slogans, pressing shoulder to shoulder as they surged past army troops seeking to keep order.

Families with little children, old people and young people, all heeded the call of Hezbollah, the Shiite Muslim party and militia, packing buses and cars all over the country. By nighttime, however, only several thousand demonstrators remained, smoking water pipes, playing music and vowing to stay, some in tents, until the Western-backed government fell.

“We are having fun, yes,” said Hussein Hanoum, 27, of Hermil in the Bekaa Valley of eastern Lebanon, as he lay across a sidewalk in the midst of a huge crowd. “We have no work. We have nothing else to do, so we came to overthrow the government.”

The mood was lighthearted, but the turnout underscored the challenge this politically divided and fragile country faces as it confronts its most dangerous political crisis since the end of a 15-year civil war in 1990. The government was holed up in the Grand Serail, an Ottoman-era building on a hill overlooking the demonstrations. The prime minister, Fouad Siniora, said that the people could stay in the streets as long as they liked, but that neither he nor the other ministers would resign.

The political crisis threatens to undermine a donors conference scheduled for January in Paris to help rebuild the nation’s infrastructure after the 34-day war between Hezbollah and Israel. The crisis has already hurt a ploddingly slow effort to rebuild the mainly Shiite areas that were severely damaged in the war.

But that did not seem to matter as anger spilled out, carnival style.

“Tut, tut, tut, Shiites are in Beirut,” crowds chanted in a rhyme as they marched through the streets.

People started to jam into the city well before the demonstration’s scheduled 3 p.m. start. The army closed off Martyrs Square, a symbolic site, blocking it with swirls of razor wire and guarding it with armored personnel carriers and heavily armed troops. Hezbollah security guards made a barrier between the crowds and the razor wire, ready to head off any potential clash between their supporters and the military.

So the crowds poured into two squares, one named for the prime minister who served in 1943 when Lebanon won its independence, the second in the shadow of a popular symbol of the civil war, a bubble-shaped theater riddled with bullet holes rising over Martyrs Square.

A recorded message by Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the leader of Hezbollah, echoed over the square: “As I’ve always promised you victory, I promise you victory again.”

In this fight, the battle lines are not so much ideologically driven as leader driven. Many said they were present because their leaders had asked them to participate, including the few noticeable followers of Gen. Michel Aoun, the Christian whose party is allied with Hezbollah.

“Maybe Michel Aoun has made a mistake with this alliance, but the March 14 forces have made many mistakes over the years,” said Bernadette Chemail, of Kesrun, using the name for the governing coalition. “The Shiites are Lebanese; we cannot throw them away.”

"We seek to return to power — not to rest on the seats of authority, but for the sake of our participation," General Aoun told the crowd.

On one side of this fight are Hezbollah, its Shiite ally, the Amal party, and its Christian ally, General Aoun and his Free Patriotic Movement. Their alliance, which is considered pro-Iranian and pro-Syrian, wants veto power over all government actions. On the other side are the March 14 coalition: Sunni, Druse and Christian parties aligned with the United States and France who control the largest bloc in Parliament, and therefore the government.

General Aoun's alliance with Hezbollah caused a huge split within the Christian community and may have cost him some political support. It was also clear that the Sunni Muslim community, one of the largest in Lebanon, was clearly in support of this government. In a rare show of support, the grand mufti, Muhammad Qabbani, gave the Friday Prayer from inside the Grand Serail.

The protest demonstration came after six government ministers aligned with Hezbollah resigned — and a seventh minister, Pierre Gemayel, from the March 14 coalition, was assassinated.

The question hanging over Lebanon is, What next? Hezbollah has promised its followers it will force the government to resign, and the government has promised that it will not. The fear is the next escalation, whatever that is, could prompt violence.

Nevertheless, the spirit of the Hezbollah-allied protest on Friday was a stark contrast to the political gathering held on the day Mr. Gemayel, the minister, was buried last week. On that day, hundreds of thousands of Sunni, Christian and Druse supporters of the government condemned Hezbollah and General Aoun with harsh and confrontational slogans.

There were moments on Friday when the protesters did offer personal attacks on members of the government. Crowds mocked the prime minister because he cried on Aug. 7 while giving a speech to Arab foreign ministers during Hezbollah's war with Israel. "We do not want someone who defends us with tears," said Alaa Shahine, a 12-year-old who was repeating a common Hezbollah refrain.

Others chanted, "Ahmed Fatfat is a Jew," referring to the minister of sports and youth, who had been acting interior minister.

Hezbollah Sit-in Has Beirut At A Standstill (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

The Shiite party and its allies say they're staying until the U.S.-backed government falls.

BEIRUT — Hundreds of thousands of Hezbollah supporters and their allies poured into the capital Friday in a mass protest that paralyzed the city center, laid siege to the prime minister's office and threatened an escalating campaign of civil disobedience until the U.S.-backed government collapses.

After sunset, thousands of men encircled the government palace where Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and his political allies have been holed up for days, fearful of assassination.

Shouting for Siniora to resign, the men pushed right up to the security checkpoints of razor wire, armed guards and tanks. Then they pitched tents, carried in water tanks and portable toilets and spread out prayer mats.

The men, who moved under strict directives from hundreds of Hezbollah security agents with walkie-talkies and matching baseball caps, vowed to keep up their siege until the government falls.

The declaration of an open-ended sit-in has pushed the Shiite organization and the government into a precarious standoff, raising fears of street violence. Both sides say they are defending the nation against nefarious forces: Hezbollah and its allies say they have launched a peaceful revolution to overthrow an illegitimate government; the government says it faces a Syria-backed coup d'etat and that Lebanon's hard-won independence is at stake.

The scene was uncannily reminiscent of anti-Syria demonstrations that erupted here after the 2005 assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, father of today's leader of Lebanon's Sunni Muslims. The assassination was widely blamed on Syria.

Then, weeks of demonstrations in downtown Beirut felled Lebanon's Syria-backed government and forced Damascus to pull its soldiers out of Lebanon. An anti-Syria coalition led by Saad Hariri swept to power in national elections.

Now the onetime demonstrators are on the receiving end of a similar uprising.

Friday's demonstration was peaceful, but Hezbollah is a powerful Shiite Muslim party with a heavily armed militia — and its campaign is just getting started. Hezbollah members have threatened to block major highways and seize control of ports and airports if the government doesn't step down.

"We will make disorder in this country," said Nabil Malim, a 29-year-old Shiite who took the bus north from the southern town of Nabatiyeh.

Hezbollah bused in supporters from all corners of the country; they were joined by followers of Gen. Michel Aoun, who is arguably Lebanon's most popular Christian leader, and members of Amal, another Shiite party.

Up to a quarter of the nation's population of about 4 million packed the streets of Beirut.

In a country where political factions compete bitterly to turn out larger crowds, the outpouring was an embarrassing challenge to the government's legitimacy. The opposition calls Siniora's government a tool of the U.S. Embassy and says Shiites and Christians are not fairly represented.

"I wish our prime minister and his ministers were here among us today rather than hiding behind army tanks and barbed wire," Aoun told the cheering crowd. "We consider that the only way out is the resignation of the Cabinet."

Siniora and his ministers remained steadfast.

"No matter how long they stay in the street … this will not bring down the government," Hariri said.

For hours, the roads that run from the tony seaside city center to Beirut's scruffy southern suburbs were choked with people. They kept coming, down blacktop roads gleaming in the glare of afternoon sun, through a corridor of drab apartment blocks with laundry flapping from the balconies.

"We want to topple the government!" they yelled as they marched.

Flocks of women marching in black robes and head scarves; schoolgirls holding hands; groups of young men with the Lebanese flag knotted over their heads as bandannas; fathers who tucked their children behind the handlebars of their mopeds — all were greeted by members of Hezbollah's security forces, who wore clipped-on badges that read, simply, "discipline."

The guards rifled through bags in search of weapons and, keen to prove the rally was inter-religious, ordered marchers to hide Hezbollah's yellow militia flags and pictures of Hezbollah chief Sheik Hassan Nasrallah. Lebanese security forces guarded government buildings but steered clear of the demonstrators, leaving security in the hands of Hezbollah.

Members of the newly beefed-up Internal Security Forces, believed to be loyal to the Sunni-dominated government, were jeered and taunted by Hezbollah supporters.

Thousands of people, virtually all men, jammed the squares and parking lots overnight, sleeping in tents or huddled in thin blankets on the ground. Hezbollah anthems boomed from massive speakers; demonstrators banged on drums, burned their political signs to keep warm and smoked apple-flavored tobacco from water pipes they'd lugged from home.

"These men in the government were warlords during the civil war. They might do anything to disturb the stability of the demonstration," said Jihad Ali Farhat, a Shiite cleric who had traveled from the south Lebanon town of Zahrane.

"If I die here it will be for the sake of the country," he said. "This is a peaceful, social and cultural revolution."

The calls for Siniora's ouster tapped into the festering animosities against Sunni Muslims, as Shiite and Christian demonstrators complained that Sunnis held too much power in the government.

"We think the government only represents one faith, and that's Sunni," said Aboud Aboud, a 32-year-old Christian who sported a button with Nasrallah and Aoun's faces juxtaposed. "We won't leave until the government falls."

Common threads ran through the speech of the demonstrators, much of it gleaned directly from Nasrallah's instructions: They spoke about the need for a "national unity government" to replace Siniora's government.

Many insisted there would be no street violence, saying they were out to prove that Hezbollah, contrary to its militant image, was a sophisticated movement that could pull off a peaceful revolution.

"We have commands from Nasrallah saying that even if they attack us, we should not attack them back," said Youssef Ezzedinne, a carpenter who traveled with his family from the southern port city of Tyre. "We should show how civilized we are."

But other young men shrugged off Nasrallah's orders.

"He says this, but the people decide. Can he stop all the people?" said Awad Abanoun, 22, a student from Beirut's southern suburbs.

Protesters Seek Lebanon PM Resignation (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 2, 2006

Hundreds of thousands of protesters from Hezbollah and its pro-Syrian allies massed Friday in downtown Beirut seeking to force the resignation of Western-backed Prime Minister Fuad Saniora, who was holed up in his office ringed by hundreds of police and combat troops.

The protest, which police estimated at 800,000, created a sea of Lebanese flags that blanketed downtown and spilled onto the surrounding streets. Hezbollah officials put the number at 1 million — one-fourth of Lebanon's population.

"Saniora out! We want a free government!" protesters shouted through loudspeakers. The crowd roared in approval amid the deafening sound of Hezbollah revolutionary and nationalist songs. "We want a clean government," read one placard, in what has become the opposition's motto.

Launching a long-threatened campaign to force Lebanon's U.S.-backed government from office, Hezbollah and its pro-Syrian allies said the demonstration would be followed by a wave of open-ended protests. Hezbollah had threatened demonstrations unless it and its allies obtained a veto share of the Cabinet — a demand Saniora and Lebanon's anti-Syrian parties rejected. The protests now aim to generate enough popular pressure to paralyze the Saniora government and force it out.

"People have a right to express their political opinions, but in terms of this being part of the Iran-Syria inspired coup d'etat against the government of Lebanon, we're obviously quite concerned about it," said U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton.

State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said U.S. diplomats in Beirut had telephoned Lebanese government officials to offer their support.

"The demonstrations ... are aimed at toppling Lebanon's legitimate and democratically elected government," Casey said. "And certainly threats of intimidation or violence isn't something that I think anyone would consider democratic or a constitutional mechanism for changing government."

Heavily armed soldiers and police had closed all roads to downtown, feverishly unfurling barbed wire and placing barricades.

Despite Hezbollah's assurances the protests will be peaceful, the heavy security came amid fears the protests may turn into clashes between pro- and anti-Syrian factions or that Hezbollah supporters could try to storm Saniora's government headquarters.

Hezbollah's security men, donning caps, formed two lines between the protesters and the security forces to prevent clashes.

"I wish that the prime minister and his ministers were among us today, not hiding behind barbed wire and army armored carriers. He who has his people behind him does not need barbed wire," Michel Aoun, a Christian leader and Hezbollah ally, told the crowd.

Hezbollah's leader Hassan Nasrallah, who has not made a public appearance since a September rally for the militant group, could not be seen Friday. But his speeches, blared through loudspeakers, drove the crowd wild with cheers.

At the rally, some protesters occasionally cried "Death to Israel" and "We want Feltman's government to go," in reference to Lebanon's U.S. Ambassador Jeffrey Feltman.

"We don't want the (U.S.) Embassy inside the prime ministry," said one demonstrator, Mahmoud Zeineddin.

Inside, Saniora went about his schedule, in what appeared to be a tactic to ignore the throngs outside. A day earlier, he vowed his government would not fall but warned that "Lebanon's independence is threatened and its democratic system is in danger."

A demonstration last week for a slain anti-Syrian politician also drew hundreds of thousands of people downtown, filling Martyr's Square. But Friday's appeared larger, as protesters swarmed not only that square but others, as well as nearby streets and parking lots.

Supporters planned to set up camp around the clock in tents erected on a road outside Saniora's office and in a downtown square.

Hezbollah has tried to depict the protest as rallying all Lebanese, not just its supporters. It urged demonstrators to wave only the red and white Lebanese flag with its green cedar tree, in contrast to past protests that featured the group's yellow flag with a fist and Kalashnikov rifle.

The battle is a fallout from the summer war between Hezbollah and Israel that ravaged parts of Lebanon. The guerrilla force's strong resistance against Israeli troops sent its support among Shiites skyrocketing, emboldening it to grab more political power. Hezbollah also feels Saniora did not do enough to support it during the fight.

Pro-government groups, in turn, resent Hezbollah for sparking the fight by snatching two Israeli soldiers, dragging Lebanon into war with Israel.

French presidential candidate Segolene Royal, on a Middle East tour, called Friday for the soldiers' release.

"The liberation of the two soldiers is absolutely vital," Royal told reporters. She said she might bring the subject up in meetings later Friday with Hezbollah officials, though "perhaps not publicly."

Government supporters accuse Syria of being behind the Hezbollah campaign, trying to regain its lost influence in its smaller neighbor. Hezbollah and its allies, in turn, say the country has fallen under U.S. domination and that they have lost their rightful portion of power.

Tension have been running high between Sunni Muslims, who generally support the anti-Syrian government, and Shiites, who lead the pro-Syrian opposition, and Lebanon's Christians, who are divided between the two.

In a stark sign of the divide, the spiritual leader of Lebanon's Sunnis, Grand Mufti Mohammed Rashid Kabbani, gave Friday prayers at the prime minister's headquarters in a show of support for Saniora, a Sunni.

"Fear has gripped the Lebanese," Kabbani said, appealing for the protests to end. "The constitution guarantees freedom of expression, but trying to overthrow the government in the street is a call for stirring up discord among people, and we will not accept this."

Hezbollah's deputy leader, Sheik Naim Kassim, made it clear the fight is against "American tutelage" and said the protest action will continue until the government falls.

"We will not let you sell Lebanon, we will protect the constitution and people of Lebanon," Kassim said on television Friday, addressing Saniora.

The United States has made Lebanon a key front in its attempts to rein in Syria and its ally, regional powerhouse Iran. President Bush warned earlier this week that the two countries were trying to destabilize Lebanon.

Lebanon has witnessed a string of assassinations of anti-Syrian figures over the past two years, including a prominent Christian government minister gunned down last week and former prime minister Rafik Hariri, who was killed in a February 2005 bombing.

Protesters Set Up Camp In Beirut (BBC)

BBC.com, December 2, 2006

Thousand of supporters of Hezbollah and its pro-Syrian allies in Lebanon have spent the night camped out in Beirut, to protest against the government.

Demonstrators slept in tents outside the office of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, who they say is hostile to Syria and must resign.

Hezbollah supporters staged a mass rally in Beirut on Friday.

Lebanon's government has been weakened by resignations and the assassination of a leading anti-Syrian politician.

The opposition says it will keep up the pressure until the government steps down.

The BBC's Kim Ghattas in Beirut says there is no sign that either side is giving up.

Demonstrators had earlier temporarily blocked all roads leading to the prime minister's office, although the blockade eased after a flurry of late-night diplomacy.

The opposition has now promised to carry out more surprise moves to bring down the cabinet.

A Hezbollah member of parliament Ali Ammar said: "We won't leave these squares until this authority complies with the will of the majority of the people - most of whom want to escape this crisis and form a unity government."

Mr Siniora has said he will not be forced from office by mass protests.

His government has vowed to stand firm against what he has called an attempted coup.

"Lebanon's independence is threatened and its democratic system is in danger," he said on Thursday.

The US denounced what it described as "threats of intimidation violence" in Lebanon.

Demonstrators waved red and white Lebanese flags A state department spokesman, Tom Casey, accused Syria and Iran of instigating the protests which he said were aimed at toppling the democratically elected government.

US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton called the Hezbollah demonstration "part of the Iran-Syria inspired coup".

Under Lebanon's constitution, the death or resignation of another two ministers will automatically topple it.

Police estimated its size at 800,000 people, but Hezbollah claimed it was larger.

Speaking from behind a bullet-proof glass screen, Christian opposition leader Michel Aoun told cheering supporters that the government was unconstitutional and should resign.

He said they had "made corruption a daily affair".

Hezbollah has been demanding a bigger share in the cabinet that would give it the power to veto government decisions.

Mr Siniora warned any attempt to topple his government would fail The government came to office last year in the first election held after the withdrawal of Syrian troops originally stationed in Lebanon during the civil war.

Syria was forced to withdraw its military presence after massive street protests and international pressure, triggered by the February 2005 assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

A UN investigation has implicated several Syrian officials in the killing, although Syria has denied any involvement.

The government in Beirut has also accused Damascus of ordering the assassination on 21 November of anti-Syrian cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel.

Israeli Overflights Continue, U.N. Says (NYT)

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 1 — Secretary General Kofi Annan said Friday that the cease-fire that ended fighting between Israel and Hezbollah fighters on Aug. 14 was holding, but that Israeli overflights in the border area were occurring almost daily.

In a periodic report to the Security Council, Mr. Annan said that Israel saw the incursions as a “necessary security measure.”

He said the United Nations continued to receive reports of illegal arms smuggling across the Syrian border but had been unable to verify them. An assessment team, he added, found “significant deficiencies” in border control.

About 60,000 cluster bomblets have been cleared, but 17 people have died in accidents from unexploded ordnance, with 135 wounded. Israel had not yet furnished promised maps that Mr. Annan said “would significantly assist operators on the ground.”

P.L.O. Panel Is Convened Amid Standoff With Hamas (NYT)

By Greg Myre

JERUSALEM, Dec. 1 — The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, convened the Palestine Liberation Organization's top decision-making group on Friday amid growing signs of a possible political showdown with Hamas, the faction that currently leads the Palestinian government.

Negotiations between Mr. Abbas's Fatah faction and its main rival, Hamas, toward a Palestinian unity government have been going on for months. But Mr. Abbas told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday that the negotiations had reached a "dead end." Fatah is the dominant faction in the Palestine Liberation Organization and its executive committee, the body that held talks Friday in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

It is expected to meet for several days before deciding what action to take, if any. After the session Friday, one member, Samir Ghosheh, said that Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, who is from Hamas, a militant Islamic group, should resign to make way for a new unity government.

"The dialogue has stopped and there is no chance of resuming it in the same manner," the P.L.O. executive committee said in a statement.

However, Nizar Rian, a senior Hamas leader, called on Mr. Abbas "to be rational and return to the negotiating table," adding, "We are serious about a national unity government, but that doesn't mean getting rid of Hamas."

With the Palestinian government broke and isolated, Fatah and Hamas had agreed in principle on a unity government made up of professionals and technocrats. But they have not been able to agree on how to divide up important ministerial positions. There is no clear way out of the political standoff if they cannot reach an agreement.

Mr. Abbas could dismiss the current government, led by Mr. Haniya and Hamas, and install a new one. But a new government would need approval from the parliament, which is dominated by Hamas.

Mr. Abbas could also call for a referendum on early elections, but it is far from clear whether Palestinians would support such a move so soon after the last vote. Hamas came to power following the parliamentary elections in January.

Meanwhile, Palestinian militants fired a rocket from the Gaza Strip into southern Israel on Friday, and Israel said the shaky truce in Gaza would have to prove successful before it could be extended to the West Bank.

"At the moment, the Palestinians are in less than full compliance with the cease-fire," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry. "We can't seriously consider duplicating the cease-fire in the West Bank, if the Gaza cease-fire is not a success. The jury is still out."

Ms. Rice met separately with Palestinian and Israeli leaders on Thursday and encouraged them to expand the cease-fire to the West Bank, where Israeli troops and Palestinian militants have clashed almost daily.

But in the West Bank, Israeli forces arrested 29 suspected militants overnight, all but one of them members of Hamas, the Israeli military said.

In the West Bank town of Hebron, Israeli border policemen shot and killed a Palestinian who threw a firebomb, lightly wounding one policeman, Israeli officials said.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's cabinet plans to discuss the Gaza cease-fire, which took effect last Sunday, and the prospects for including the West Bank, at a session on Sunday, Mr. Regev said.

In Gaza, the Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades claimed responsibility for firing the rocket into Israel on Friday and said they would not abide by the truce unless Israel met a series of demands. "We cannot just give this truce as a present," said Khaled al-Jabari, one Al Aksa leader in Gaza.

Lofty Goals Are Scaled Down At Meetings On Mideast Democracy (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

DEAD SEA, Jordan, Dec. 1 — Two years ago, when Western governments conjured a conference on democracy in the Middle East and North Africa, an air of optimism and promise held sway. The Iraqis and Afghans soon held elections. So did the Palestinians, who voted in the moderate Mahmoud Abbas as their president. Change was on its way to Egypt and Lebanon, too.

But with the recent setbacks to democracy throughout the region, the goals at this year's conference here on Friday were often smaller and, presumably, a bit more attainable.

"They actually have a paragraph in there that says, 'We support increasing literacy for women,' " said Sanem Gunes, a program officer for a Turkish advocacy group, rolling her eyes and dismissing the line as "almost like a beauty pageant answer." She added, "It doesn't take scores of foreign ministers coming from all over the region to come up with 'education for women.' "

Such was the Forum for the Future's third annual meeting. When the Group of 8 summit meeting took place a few years ago in Sea Island, Ga., the Bush administration and its European allies came up with the idea for the conference. An offspring of the Sept. 11 attacks, the idea was to prod the Arab and Muslim world's autocratic governments toward democracy and stronger civil society, as sort of a bulwark against the hopelessness and disenchantment that could lead to extremism.

It was an ambitious goal, and things seemed promising at first. Democracy protests pushed Syria out of Lebanon. In Egypt, President Hosni Mubarak allowed opposition candidates on the ballot.

But that was the new Middle East, before the old one quickly reasserted itself. After the Muslim Brotherhood won a lot of seats in Egypt's parliamentary elections last year, Mr. Mubarak's government put off municipal elections for another two years. Parliamentary elections in Qatar were postponed.

Iraq, Afghanistan and Lebanon? All are struggling desperately against violence or sectarian division.

The Palestinians had another election and voted in Hamas, promptly setting off a Western aid boycott. Yemen's government cracked down on the news media that had criticized the government. Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah refused calls to have the country's consultative council be elected. This summer, Bahrain, host to the conference last year, unceremoniously kicked out of the country a representative of an American democracy advocacy group.

On Friday, security was ultratight, the road in front of the King Hussein Bin Talal Convention Center virtually empty. After making their scheduled — and brief — speeches in the convention hall to the 40 or so nongovernmental representatives who showed up, most of the foreign dignitaries quickly retired to private salons to talk to one another.

A session on political participation, elections and the news media was under way in the main hall, while in a nearby hall, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice held talks with a steady succession of her counterparts from Britain, Italy and the European Union on matters like how to rein in Iran's nuclear ambitions.

On the other side of the convention center, in front of the darkened and empty Aqaba Hall, Foreign Minister Sergey V. Lavrov of Russia, a host of the conference, and his retinue of six dark-suited aides chatted among themselves, then sauntered to the terrace for a smoking break.

A few yards away, under a giant framed photo of the conference's other host, King Abdullah II of Jordan — who skipped the festivities and flew to India — Mansour Ahmad Khan, representing Pakistan's foreign ministry, was talking up his country's democratic record to a reporter.

Mr. Khan had just gotten to the part about how much Pakistan's military dictator, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, has been doing to encourage democracy and women's rights when his boss, Khusro Bakhtyar, the foreign affairs minister, appeared, interrupting the conversation to expound further. "Reform is not just an option, but a necessity in this part of the world," Mr. Bakhtyar said. "Our governments are heeding the winds of change."

Ms. Rice had been diplomatic the night before when a reporter asked her whether it was incongruous that Russia, which passed a law restricting nongovernmental organizations, was a host of a democracy conference in Jordan. "We're using this international forum to push political change," she said, delicately. "It doesn't mean everybody that's sitting around the table is a perfect example of democratic development."

As much as they criticized the lack of progress at the conference, the nongovernmental organizations were quick to say that they were glad to be there and supported its ideals, though some were unable to speak with the foreign dignitaries. "We don't get too much access to the officials, actually," said Jamil Mouawad, a youth organizer and program manager for the Lebanese Center for Policy Studies. "And an action plan would be nice." The conference did not issue such a plan.

"Hey, is that Elliott Abrams?" asked Khalil Gebara, an executive director of No Corruption, a Lebanese organization, pointing to Mr. Abrams, the top White House adviser for Middle East affairs, who was standing near the coffee-and-Danish table talking to two fellow American officials. "Can you introduce me to him? He's a big guy, I hear."

But the Abrams retinue quickly swept around the corner, back into the embrace of the American officials and accompanying Secret Service agents outside the hall where Ms. Rice was holding her meetings.

Mr. Gebara shook his head. “They all just walk around in groups, so you have to chase after them, but you can never catch them,” he said. “This is supposed to be the venue where people actually get heard.”

Perhaps another time. Diplomats said Qatar, Yemen and the United Arab Emirates are jostling to be the host of next year’s conference.

At Dead Sea Forum, Incongruities Abound (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

DEAD SEA, Jordan, Dec. 1 -- The official purpose of the third annual session of the U.S.-promoted Forum for the Future was to promote rule of law, press freedom and greater attention to nongovernmental organizations in the Arab world. But the official co-host of the meeting was Russia -- which under President Vladimir Putin has backtracked on democracy, curtailed the news media and cracked down on NGOs.

This uncomfortable irony was apparent to many people who attended the meeting set in a vast conference center with a spectacular view over the Dead Sea. But with the Bush administration's push to promote democracy in the Middle East facing setbacks in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, irony was not in short supply.

"The whole scenario is full of contradictions and a lot of double standards," said Salam Mansour, executive director of a Cairo-based democracy youth group who took part in a presentation at the meeting. "Some people don't recognize the U.S. as a full democracy."

Russia became co-host because the forum is officially sanctioned by the Group of Eight major industrial democracies, and Moscow this year was host of the annual G-8 meeting, despite objections that it doesn't belong in the group. The forum was launched at the 2004 G-8 meeting in Sea Island, Ga., and the United States has pushed for the fledging organization to take root.

Arab nations have been skeptical from the start. The Saudi foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, told the gathering here that democracy cannot be imposed and cited Africa as an example of where Western notions of democracy have led to turmoil and conflict, according to a Saudi official.

Last year's meeting, held in Bahrain, dissolved into bickering over the wording of the final communique, so organizers this year decided to dispense with such a statement.

By all accounts, Jordan -- a moderate Arab monarchy eager to curry favor with the United States -- took responsibility for organizing the conference. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in her remarks to the conference, cited King Abdullah as a "champion of reform and tolerance" but did not mention Russia.

"There are enormous problems and there have been real setbacks in terms of Russian democracy," Rice acknowledged to reporters traveling with her. But she said it would be a mistake to think that "we were going to be better off by isolating Russia somehow from democratic fora."

ITAR-Tass, the Russian news agency, never mentioned democracy in a report on the meeting, quoting Foreign Ministry spokesman Mikhail Kamynin as saying, "The forum plans to discuss key regional problems, such as the Middle East settlement, the situation around Iraq, the situation in Lebanon."

Khalil Gebara, co-executive director of the Lebanese Transparency Association, a group that tries to promote good government, said: "The Russians are the least interested in this conference. They are hard to reach and are just not talking to anyone."

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov seemed to spend most of his time out of the main hall, smoking on a sunny terrace surrounded by a retinue of aides.

Rice also held a series of bilateral meetings -- for instance, with a Sudanese official for a tough talk on the crisis in Darfur -- and skipped the final news conference to fly back to Washington when the sessions ran late.

Mansour, an 18-year-old activist, said the youth groups had met for two days to brainstorm ideas to present to ministers to encourage greater participation by young people in promoting good government.

But she said that the ministers had arrived with prepared remarks and that they did not engage in any real discussion. "It was typical," she said. "They applauded our presentations. But there were no promises -- as usual."

Russian Minister Says Iran Talks Coming (AP)

AP, December 2, 2006

Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Friday that talks on proposed sanctions against Iran's nuclear program could take place early next week, Russian news agencies reported.

He said the meeting, suggested by France, would focus on the draft U.N. resolution on Iran and would take place at a top diplomatic level, the ITAR-Tass news agency reported from Jordan, where he was on an official visit.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns will attend a European conference in Brussels next week, probably on Tuesday, and will confer there with European diplomats about the resolution.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett and German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier all agreed Friday to the meeting, Lavrov said, according to the Interfax news agency. China also might attend, although it is not clear if it will.

Lavrov said Russia was ready to vote for a U.N. ban on exports of nuclear materials and sensitive technologies to Iran. But he said Moscow was opposed "to such sanctions and steps that could affect the International Atomic Energy Agency's activities in Iran," ITAR-Tass reported.

Russia has said it will agree only to more narrowly focused sanctions.

In Washington, the State Department said it remained confident that a resolution imposing sanctions on Iran would ultimately be adopted.

"No action is not acceptable," spokesman Tom Casey said. "We have to do something."

Russia and China, who have major commercial ties with Iran, have urged the U.N. to seek talks rather than sanctions, despite the failure of a European Union effort to draw Iran to the negotiating table.

The Europeans circulated a draft U.N. Security Council resolution in October that would order all countries not to sell Iran materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs.

The draft resolution would also impose a travel ban and asset freeze on any companies, individuals and organizations involved in those programs.

The draft sanctions would not halt construction of a nuclear power plant at Bushehr, Iran, being built by the Russians. They would bar the sale of nuclear fuel needed for the reactor.

Russia proposed major changes that would limit sanctions solely to measures that would keep Iran from developing nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles. Russia wants to eliminate any travel ban, asset freeze, or mention of Bushehr.

A Limited Time Offer To Iran (NYT)

By George Perkovich, Pierre Goldschmidt

IN October, Iran began operating a second group of 164 uranium enrichment centrifuges, violating a legally binding demand by the United Nations Security Council that Iran suspend such activities until the international community is confident that the country's nuclear program "is for exclusively peaceful purposes." Iran's response was that a suspension would abrogate its rights under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty — even though under international law, it has temporarily surrendered these rights by violating the obligations that condition them.

Beneath the legalese, Iran is moving as fast as it can to master uranium enrichment, while threatening its neighbors and refusing to provide transparency that the International Atomic Energy Agency requires. Tehran bets that Russia will continue to buy it time by slowing and diluting Security Council sanctions. Once Iran has fully mastered enrichment, it will have gained confidence that it can produce weapons-grade uranium quickly if it decides to do so.

With this confidence, Iran would assess the costs and benefits of continuing the construction of a large-scale uranium enrichment plant. If Russia were prepared to join the United States, Europe and others in imposing significant costs, Iran might choose to negotiate a handsome benefits package in exchange for suspending enrichment-related activities. If the Security Council were to remain lenient, on the other hand, Iran would have complete freedom to maneuver.

International interlocutors must disabuse Iran that it can have its uranium cake and eat it, too. The vital security objective all along has been to prevent Iran from acquiring the capacity to make nuclear weapons fuel. Once Iran has mastered uranium enrichment, this objective will have been largely lost. At that point, it would make no further sense to offer Iran exceptional nuclear energy cooperation, political benefits or access to international markets, capital and technology.

Thus, Iran's interlocutors should clarify now that the positive incentives the world wishes to negotiate with Iran will be withdrawn if it does not immediately accede to the binding Security Council demand for suspension.

The message from the Security Council, including Russia and China, should be: "You can get the uranium enrichment capacity you seek, even though, because you have violated your Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and International Atomic Energy Agency Safeguards obligations, it threatens international peace and security. But you will lose the prospects of many benefits. The International Atomic Energy Agency and the Security Council will continue to press for the greater transparency required to verify 'that there are no undeclared nuclear materials or activities in Iran.' Maybe we can tighten the sanctions you will face, maybe we can't, but the case won't be closed, and you will not become an acceptable nuclear trade partner."

Failure to clarify the limited duration of positive incentives only encourages those in Iran who argue that there are no real costs to defying the Security Council and continuing the enrichment program. Conversely, if Iran suspends enrichment while it is still meaningful, interlocutors should be willing to negotiate generously to meet the country's nuclear energy, economic and security interests. This could ultimately include helping Iran develop its nuclear fuel cycle, if and when doubts about the peacefulness of its nuclear ambitions have been durably allayed.

Russia, China and perhaps others will be tempted to argue that pressing Iran this way could be an American attempt to precipitate a crisis and set the stage for military action. To pre-empt such charges, President Bush should clarify that if Iran complies with the Security Council's demands, suspends its fuel-cycle activities and gives up its unjust support for organizations that commit violence against unarmed civilians, the United States will commit not to threaten Iran's sovereignty or territorial integrity. Such a security guarantee, perhaps expressed in the Security Council, would facilitate not only longer-term nuclear negotiations with Iran, but also broader rapprochement.

Iranian national security decisions are made collectively. A precarious consensus emerged in 2005 to defy international demands and press on with enrichment. This consensus will not be reconsidered as long as the policy appears cost-free and the option of cashing in on restraint seems so open-ended that it could be still available after enrichment has been mastered.

The Iranian people, their neighbors and the world deserve a more considered debate of Iran's options and of their consequences. Iran will never be in a better position than it is now to obtain a favorable deal that would improve its economy, employment and quality of life.

George Perkovich is the director of the nonproliferation program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Pierre Goldschmidt is a non-resident scholar there and a former deputy director of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

For Chávez, A Feisty Electoral Challenger (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's exasperated opponents got a gleeful surprise at a rally ahead of Sunday's election, when a giant inflatable figure of the nation's fiery and famously voluble leader inexplicably began to deflate.

"It's a sign! A premonition!" cheered Irene Alvarado, a 50-year-old realtor, as embarrassed Chávistas dragged away the melting figure while the crowd chanted "This government is already down and out!" and set off fireworks.

"He's going to lose," Ms. Alvarado said.

While that looks unlikely -- most polls show Mr. Chávez with a comfortable edge -- Venezuela's often fractured and famously inept opposition is at least putting up a respectable fight this time. They are marching into electoral battle united behind Manuel

Rosales, 54, a hard-nosed and experienced professional politician who has, by all accounts, mounted a feisty challenge to Mr. Chávez. That challenge, to be sure, is fueled by desperation.

Mr. Chávez, 52, is a fervent admirer of Cuban leader Fidel Castro and has vowed to accelerate what he calls his "Bolivarian revolution" if he wins. Most foes take him at his word, and believe Mr. Chávez would do everything possible to reshape Venezuela along Cuban lines.

The stakes have the country bracing for trouble: Grocery stores have been denuded of food in expectation of possible violence, especially if the election is close.

Mr. Rosales, a governor of oil-rich Zulia state, faces long odds in his quest to oust the incumbent, who has been in power since 1998 and is seeking another six-year term. Mr. Chávez's administration retains a strong following among the majority of poor Venezuelans, on whom he has showered uncounted billions to subsidize health, education and employment programs.

Mr. Chávez also has fear on his side: His minions haven't shrunk from firing employees from government jobs or state companies for showing opposition leanings. Last month, Rafael Ramírez, who is both energy minister and president of the state oil company, Petroleos de Venezuela SA, was secretly videotaped before an auditorium full of company workers, declaiming there shouldn't be any doubt that PDVSA "was 100% supporting President Chávez."

Potential voters also fear a fingerprint machine that will be used in some Venezuelan states -- ostensibly to avoid electoral fraud -- could be used to identify opposition voters, making them susceptible to government retribution. State companies and government use lists culled from ballot records to blackball applicants for everything from jobs to loans.

Mr. Rosales has pledged to continue many popular Chávez programs, while making them more effective. What's more, he has pledged to give all poor Venezuelans a bank card, called "Mi Negra," which will allow them to draw a monthly stipend, directly tapping into the country's oil wealth.

The opposition argues that polls are meaningless in the Venezuelan context, and that impatience with presidential tirades against the U.S., disgust with epidemic crime and wariness of a Castro-type regime will help voters overcome the fear factor and pull the lever for their man.

But Chávez support runs deep. "Poor people have never had a president who has cared about them," says Yelitza Ojeda, a maid who works in a Caracas luxury hotel. Rattling off an exhaustive list of brothers, cousins and sisters, Ms. Ojeda says her whole family, which lives in a poor sector of the capital, plans to vote for Mr. Chávez.

Polls On Chavez Range From Huge Victory To Dead Heat (WT)

By Kelly Hearn

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez heads into tomorrow's election with some polls showing a victory margin of more than 30 percent while others show a dead heat for the fiery leftist who calls President Bush the devil.

His conservative rival, Manuel Rosales, has managed to unite a fragmented opposition and made inroads into Mr. Chavez's base by attacking the president's lavish spending on leftist causes throughout Latin America and his support for Cuba's Fidel Castro.

"Let's not forget that we are facing the very devil," Mr. Chavez said in one of his final speeches before campaigning officially ended. "On Dec. 3, we face at the ballot box the imperialist government of the United States of America. That is our real adversary."

A state-funded poll by the Evans/McDonough Co. Wednesday gave Mr. Chavez 57 percent of the vote, a 19-point lead. On Nov. 23 an Ipsos/Associated Press opinion poll said Mr. Chavez held a 32 percentage-point advantage.

But Penn, Schoen & Berland, another U.S.-based pollster, recently gave Mr. Chavez only 52 percent while reporting a strong 48 percent for Mr. Rosales. Another firm, ASKA Partners, has reported similar numbers.

"This is a very close race, with what appears to be an evenly divided electorate," said Douglas Schoen of Penn, Schoen & Berland.

Opposition leaders have attacked the credibility of state-sponsored pollsters and accused international news outlets of reporting polls that favor Mr. Chavez to the exclusion of others.

Diego Arrias, a former Venezuelan ambassador to the United Nations, said the government has contracted "fly-by-night" polling companies.

He also said international news outlets have been "resistant to quote serious pollsters" that show Mr. Rosales gaining support.

On Wednesday the U.S. Embassy advised Americans to limit their travel and stock up on food, water and medications in the event of postelection protests.

"In light of recent history of street disturbances occasioned by political activity, and current levels of anti-U.S. Government sentiment on the part of the Venezuelan government, American citizens in Venezuela should maintain a high level of personal security awareness, especially during the election period," the embassy stated.

A win for Mr. Chavez would further embolden his so-called "Bolivarian" revolution, which he claims has taken hold in Bolivia, Nicaragua, Cuba and elsewhere. Ecuador joined those ranks in recent days when Rafael Correa, a leftist colleague of Mr. Chavez, was elected president.

U.S. officials say Mr. Chavez is a destabilizing force in the region, pursuing what they say is an unjustified military buildup, largely with Russian-made planes and weapons.

As Crime Soars For Venezuela, Chávez Coasts (NYT)

By Simon Romero

CARACAS, Venezuela, Dec. 1 — Walk into an emergency room in many poor parts of this booming, oil-rich nation on a weekend night and you will be overwhelmed — victims of gunshot wounds and drunken clashes line the corridors. Homicides are up 67 percent since 1999, and violent crime is the top concern of Venezuela's voters as they head to the polls on Sunday.

Yet the man in charge since then, President Hugo Chávez, rarely addresses the problem publicly and is sailing toward an easy election for a third time. Analysts say Mr. Chávez is able to ignore the issue by governing through a system of extensive handouts that eases the purchase of basic goods but does little to ensure public order.

"Chávez has shielded himself from the issue because people see his government as an important arbiter in their daily life," said Miguel Tinker-Salas, an expert on Venezuelan history at Pomona College in Claremont, Calif. "Chávez's policies have made a difference among the poor, and that's what is recognized." He pointed to subsidized groceries, health care and literacy, in particular.

Crime analysts say part of the problem is that the government and its allies have politicized police forces throughout the country, marginalizing officers viewed as disagreeing with Mr. Chávez's "Bolivarian Revolution," which uses militaristic and nationalistic rhetoric in an attempt to reconfigure society with vague socialist ideals.

A similar process has taken place in government ministries, the national oil company and the armed forces after the coup that briefly removed Mr. Chávez from the presidency in 2002.

Analysts say police forces have also largely been urged to tread lightly in poor neighborhoods, turning a blind eye to small demonstrations and petty crime like burning tires. Critics say it is part of Mr. Chávez's efforts to maintain support in poor neighborhoods.

Meanwhile, crime has exploded. According to human rights groups and a Unesco study, Venezuela has the highest rate of gun-related deaths of 57 countries surveyed — far surpassing Brazil, one of the most violent nations in Latin America.

"Venezuela has undeniably become one of the most violent countries in the world," said Julio Jacobo Waiselfisz, the researcher who conducted the Unesco study.

Though he trails badly in most polls, Mr. Chávez's opponent, Manuel Rosales, 53, governor of Zulia State in western Venezuela, has been pounding the crime issue, questioning why murders have surged since Mr. Chávez entered office in 1999, to 9,962 in 2005 from 5,974 in 1999, according to figures from the Criminal Investigations Police.

Officials in the Justice Ministry did not respond to repeated requests for comment on the government's crime policies. The National Assembly, controlled by supporters of Mr. Chávez, is considering legislation to diminish police corruption by centralizing more authority in a national police force.

Mr. Rosales, the candidate of a coalition of opposition parties, laid the blame squarely at the feet of the president, saying his confrontational style and tendency to turn the courts, military and the police into tools of his own power, are feeding the crime epidemic.

"Chávez nourishes the anarchic forces that are tearing Venezuela apart with a discourse advocating aggression on all fronts," the candidate has said. Polls show Mr. Rosales trailing Mr. Chávez, though his approval ratings have inched up since the start of the campaign several months ago.

Concern over crime has jumped this year after a series of brutal episodes pierced even the relatively sheltered existence of the upper middle class and the diplomatic and international business communities. Street protests broke out in April after three brothers with Canadian citizenship, John Faddoul, 17, Kevin Faddoul, 13, and Jason Faddoul, 12, were kidnapped and found executed.

Around the same time, burglars shot Walter Rehberger, a consul at the Austrian Embassy here, during a break-in. Diplomats were singled out again this month, when thieves broke into the trade office for the Chinese Embassy and stole $14,000.

The highway from the international airport in Maiquetía to Caracas has also proved particularly dangerous, with armed gangs rear-ending cars and robbing passengers of their belongings. Carlos Colina, a consultant for Hewlett-Packard, was shot to death on the route in July, one of several incidents that led the United States Embassy in Caracas to issue a warning against traveling on the road after nightfall.

While much of the recent attention has focused on killings among the privileged, the vast majority of homicides in Venezuela occur in the country's poorest communities — Mr. Chávez's strongest base.

Killings tend to spike during weekends and around paydays in the middle and end of the month, when robberies are also common, according to criminologists. The large majority of incidents involve boys and men ages 15 to 25.

Mr. Waiselfisz, the Unesco researcher, found that gun-related deaths in Venezuela were surging, to 41.4 per 100,000 inhabitants in 2002, the last year for which figures are available, from 34.3 in 2000.

One of the most unsettling aspects of the spike in killings is that it has developed as Venezuela's economy has boomed — thanks to high oil prices. Gross domestic product climbed 10.2 percent last quarter, making Venezuela the fastest-growing economy in Latin America.

Previous economic booms helped Venezuela avoid the crippling violence and social conflict that plagued neighboring Andean countries like Colombia and Peru.

Though the accuracy of official statistics is sometimes questioned by the government's opponents, the channeling of oil revenues seems to have alleviated poverty somewhat in recent years. The Venezuelans living in poverty has fallen to 34 percent from 44 percent in 1998, the year before Mr. Chávez took office, according to government figures.

Some of that decline has clearly happened as Mr. Chávez has used oil revenues to finance a broad range of social welfare programs, like adult literacy programs, subsidized basic foodstuffs and medical care in poor areas provided by Cuban doctors.

"We're witnessing a reduction in infant mortality rates only to see our boys killed when they turn 16," said Ana María Sanjuán, a sociologist at Central University in Caracas and an official with Provea, a nongovernmental organization that monitors human rights issues.

Citing figures from the Criminal Investigations Police, Ms. Sanjuán said the number of homicides in Venezuela climbed 23 percent from January to August of this year, to 7,616. "The politicization and decrepitude of our policing structures may have more to do with our culture of violence than just poverty," Ms. Sanjuán said.

Pedro Ure, chief inspector for the municipal police in Sucre, a sprawling district of Caracas, led a visitor on a nighttime patrol of slum streets and said tolerant policing methods were part of an attempt to instill respect among his officers for human rights.

"This means a citizen can enjoy his rum on the street if he wishes, even though this could be an infraction," he said, though he acknowledged that many homicides occurred when suspects were drinking.

Meanwhile, however, a history of far graver abuses by the police has gone unchecked, some crime analysts note. Last year, the attorney general's office said it was investigating 5,520 presumed executions by the police between 2000 and 2005, involving 6,127 victims. Of the police officials implicated, prosecutors have filed charges against 517, and fewer than 100 had been convicted, according to Human Rights Watch.

"We're experiencing the worst crime wave in modern Venezuelan history," said Marcos Tarre Briceño, director of the nongovernmental organization Secure Venezuela, "and the government barely acknowledges its inability to control its own police forces."

Plan For South American Pipeline Has Ambitions Beyond Gas (NYT)

By Jens Erik Gould

GÜIRIA, Venezuela — President Hugo Chávez is not modest about his energy plans. He wants to build a 5,000-mile natural gas pipeline that stretches from this remote northern tip of South America to the bottom end of the continent.

Erecting possibly the longest pipeline in the world is the centerpiece of a broader effort by Mr. Chávez to strengthen ties among Latin America's economies and shrink their dependence on the United States.

But from the outset, the $20 billion "great gas pipeline of the south," planned to be more than twice as long as the United States border with Mexico, has generated political and environmental controversy at home and abroad.

Mr. Chávez, who deeply distrusts the United States and has raised the prospect that it may invade Venezuela to seize its oil, is seeking to diversify his country's energy exports away from its biggest client and toward countries as far away as China and as close as Brazil.

Mr. Chávez has strengthened political ties with Brazil and Argentina in recent years.

And these days, he is dangling Venezuela's significant reserves as an incentive as he asks his neighbors for a long-term natural gas commitment.

During a recent visit to the pipeline's projected starting point, as oil workers and local residents crowded just outside this fishing town in Venezuela's northeast, Mr. Chávez proclaimed, as he stood next to a row of national flags: "Here in this South America, from the Caribbean to Patagonia, we'll build a great bloc of political, economic and social power to seek world equilibrium this century, where we don't have one policeman who wants to be the owner of the world."

That geopolitical aim is, in fact, the project's biggest hurdle, energy analysts maintain. They say that the decision by Mr. Chávez to give his ideological goals priority over profit jeopardizes the success of the project.

"You don't build a pipeline for political reasons," said Robert E. Ebel, energy analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "It should be a financially viable operation."

Though Venezuela could reap higher profit margins by exporting liquefied natural gas to higher-price markets like the United States, Venezuelan officials acknowledge that is not their goal.

"It's not that the economic part doesn't matter," said Ángel González, general director of exploration and production at the Energy Ministry, "but it's really not the most important part of this project."

Venezuela is not the only country to use gas pipelines for political influence. Critics in the United States accused Russia of using energy politics after its giant company Gazprom stopped supplying Ukraine in an effort to raise prices at the start of the year.

Still, it is not clear that Mr. Chávez can muster long-term support in South America for a huge pipeline that would take at least a decade to complete. There is already skepticism and bickering over other energy deals, analysts say.

"Does political will last that long?" asked Michelle Billig of the PIRA Energy Group in New York, a consulting firm.

Brazil, for instance, may be wary of committing itself to a pipeline with Venezuela after Mr. Chávez applauded Bolivia's nationalization of energy industries in 2006. That move jeopardized the natural gas investments of Petrobras, Brazil's state-owned oil company, in Bolivia, said Anne Korin, co-director of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security in Washington.

Argentina and Brazil, expected to be the project's largest users, would find themselves dependent for supplies of gas on Venezuela and Bolivia, nations that have shown themselves to be politically volatile. Venezuela halted oil exports during a two-month national strike starting late in 2002, and tensions in Bolivia over how to manage energy resources have helped topple two recent presidents. Paraguay and Uruguay would also take part in the pipeline.

"In South America there is no project more challenging than this one in its history," said Ricardo Savini, a business development manager for Petrobras. He said his company could take part in the pipeline if feasibility studies turned out favorable.

Venezuela's natural gas reserves are largely undeveloped, and over the years, gas has taken a back seat to petroleum in Venezuela, one of the world's leading oil exporters.

The Chávez government has made laws more attractive for investors in gas. That contrasts sharply with the blunt measures that have wrested control from foreign companies producing oil. Chevron has already found enough gas in the Plataforma Deltana area in the east for Venezuela to begin processing liquefied natural gas. Chevron expects to export liquefied gas to the United States and European markets through a $5.6 billion complex that the state oil company, Petróleos de Venezuela, plans to build outside Güiria.

Now, the state company also wants the complex to feed the transcontinental pipeline and says those plans are a higher priority than exporting liquefied gas.

Energy analysts say it will be a tall order for Venezuela's budding gas industry to produce enough for both the L.N.G. plant and the pipeline, especially when current output does not even satisfy domestic demand for natural gas.

The pipeline also faces resistance from environmental groups because it would cut through the Brazilian Amazon and cross several large rivers to reach its destinations. Watchdog groups, like Greenpeace, say it could devastate some of the least-developed and least-studied areas in the dense rainforest and that the influx of laborers could bring diseases to remote indigenous communities.

"It will be terrible," said Paulo Adario, Amazon campaign coordinator for Greenpeace. "The environmental impact seems very high."

There is concern in Güiria, too, a city of 35,000 people. A month after Mr. Chavez broke ground for the gas complex on the environmentally sensitive Paria peninsula in September, the monument built for his nationally televised speech was still littered with the empty water bottles and soda cans of those who attended. "You manage a project that you supposedly consider won't create any environmental impact on an international level — and then you do this," said Rodolfo Foucault, a Güiria resident, when he saw the trash on an otherwise unspoiled coastline.

Still, many locals welcome Petróleos de Venezuela's promise to spend more than $1 billion on infrastructure and local industries in Sucre, the northeastern state where Güiria is situated. "We want the development for our community," said Antonio Calazán, who fishes mackerel and shark in the waters off Güiria.

While even critics are optimistic that the state oil company will keep its promise to build the liquefied natural gas plant, many say that the pipeline will be the latest in a long line of Venezuelan energy plans that never got off the ground or have been significantly delayed. For example, Mariscal Sucre, a promising offshore natural gas project, has been stalled for more than a decade.

Government officials have yet to disclose details on its routes or costs, saying that technical teams are performing preliminary studies. A model of the complex in Güiria's airport does not offer any clues either, nor does it illustrate what part of the plant's terminal will feed the transcontinental line.

There was no actual construction to be seen along the main road cutting through the plant site in Güiria other than the monument that Mr. Chávez opened — and even that appeared abandoned. The wind had torn down the young coconut trees that provided the president's television backdrop.

Yet Mr. Chávez and his energy officials continue to champion the proposal. They have even devised a slogan for Güiria on the plaque, which Carlos Figueredo, Petróleos de Venezuela's general manager for offshore natural gas, repeated at an industry conference in October in Sucre state.

"We have called Güiria the place where the gas is born that unites the people," he said. "That gives you an idea of the magnitude that we're looking at."

China To Allow More Freedom For Journalists From Abroad (WP)

By Edward Cody

BEIJING, Dec. 1 -- China has decided to substantially liberalize restrictions on coverage by foreign journalists ahead of the 2008 Olympic Games in Beijing, the government announced Friday.

A decree from Premier Wen Jiabao's government said foreign reporters, whether assigned here permanently or visiting for the Olympics, will be allowed to roam most of the country freely and report without interference by local police or propaganda officials from Jan. 1, 2007, until Oct. 17, 2008. The Games are in August 2008.

As explained by Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao, the new rules departed clearly -- if temporarily -- from long-standing orders. They also marked a significant watershed for China, where information has long been treated as government property to be manipulated and controlled by propaganda officials.

The new rules apply only to foreign reporters, Liu said, and restrictions on Chinese journalists remain in effect, including Communist Party censorship of all publications and broadcasts. In addition, travel restrictions in Tibet and Xinjiang will continue to apply to foreign correspondents, effectively limiting coverage of those restive areas.

If followed by authorities across the country, the decree nevertheless would for more than 21 months eliminate some major barriers to accurate reporting about China: regulations that legally oblige foreign correspondents to work through local propaganda officials when gathering news. Those restrictions, when followed, have limited frank conversation with Chinese people and emphasized the official version of news.

In practice, foreign reporters in recent years frequently have managed to report on their own, speaking directly with Chinese people while using subterfuge and stealth to avoid getting caught by local police. Those who have been spotted, however, often have been detained, lectured and forced to write confessions that they broke the law. In many cases, their notes and camera equipment have been confiscated. At times, they have been shoved around by police.

In seeking to bring the 2008 Olympics to Beijing, the government had pledged to the International Olympic Committee that the situation would change. In effect, it said reporting in China would be as free as it has been in previous Olympics elsewhere.

But doubts persisted among diplomats, journalists and other foreigners because of China's long history of rigid controls. In particular, they said, Chinese security officials were unlikely to allow free reporting on anti-government groups, such as the banned Falun Gong spiritual movement, that might try to take advantage of the Olympics to advertise their dissatisfaction.

Bob Ctvrtlik, a member of the IOC, said Friday that China's announcement debunked the notion that authorities would not adapt to welcome the Games.

"This is a very important step for us," Ctvrtlik said. "The IOC and the IOC membership received criticism for the decision six years ago" to award the Games to Beijing, "and I think many people at the time said significant changes could not occur. I think this action proves that not to be the case."

Even so, there have been indications recently that officials might not be so flexible. The deputy director of the Beijing Public Security Bureau, Liu Shaowu, told reporters last week that the three main threats to Olympic security were terrorism, organized crime and "mass disturbances," a term officials use to describe protests.

A manual published by the Public Security Ministry and handed out to Beijing police, who are studying English in preparation for the Olympics, contained a dialogue making clear how ministry officials believe reporting should be approached. It described a hypothetical situation in which a policeman comes upon a foreign reporter inquiring about Falun Gong:

"But Falun Gong has nothing to do with the games," the policeman says.

"What does that matter?" the reporter replies.

"It's beyond the permit."

"What permit?"

"But I'm interested in Falun Gong."

"It's beyond the limit of your coverage and illegal. As a foreign reporter in China, you should obey China law and do nothing against your status."

DOJ_NMG_0100900

"Oh, I see. May I go now?"

"No. Come with us."

A Beijing policeman said the manual was distributed to him and his colleagues, along with a tape recording of the various dialogues, as practice material to supplement three-month-long formal English courses that have been underway since 2002.

Asked how that fit in with the new rules, Liu said that in the coming month there will be briefings on the changes for Chinese government departments, including the Public Security Ministry and provincial, municipal and county propaganda officials who routinely seek to impede coverage of news in their areas. Beginning Jan. 1, those officials will no longer have the right to detain foreign reporters seeking to interview people, he said, and the Foreign Ministry can be called on to intercede if they try.

"To interview organizations or individuals in China, foreign journalists need only to obtain their prior consent," said the sixth of nine regulations.

As published, the decree changed foreign reporting rules only until Oct. 17, 2008. But Liu suggested at a news conference that the changes might be extended after the Olympics. Conditions for foreign correspondents in China will get "better and better," he said.

China Plans Temporary Easing Of Curbs On Foreign Journalists (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

BEIJING, Dec. 1 — China announced temporary regulations on Friday loosening restrictions on foreign journalists, a step intended to fulfill the country's promise to allow visiting reporters to work freely in advance of the 2008 Beijing Olympics.

The rules, announced by the Foreign Ministry, will supersede existing restrictions that require journalists to obtain government approval before traveling or conducting interviews. Under the new rules, a foreign journalist will only need to obtain the permission of the person being interviewed.

"It is crystal clear that as long as the interviewee agrees, you can do your reporting," the ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, told reporters at a briefing.

The Foreign Correspondents' Club of China, a Beijing-based association of international news bureaus, applauded the new rules and singled out the Foreign Ministry for praise. But the group also called on the government to make the regulations permanent. The rules take effect on Jan. 1 and end Oct. 17, 2008, after the conclusion of the Paralympics.

"Depending on how they are implemented, we hope they'll one day be looked back upon as a major step in bringing correspondents' reporting conditions in China much closer to international standards," the group said in a statement.

Reporters Without Borders, the international press advocacy group, also praised the new rules but noted that the announcement came on the same day that a Beijing appeals court upheld a fraud conviction against Zhao Yan, a Chinese researcher for The New York Times.

Mr. Zhao's case has brought international criticism; some analysts considered his conviction an implicit warning to foreign journalists and their Chinese news assistants. According to the Reporters Without Borders Web site, at least 32 Chinese journalists were jailed in China as of January. The new rules will not apply to Chinese journalists, who still face heavy censorship.

For China, the relaxed reporting rules for foreigners are an important public relations gesture as Beijing prepares for the Olympic Games in August 2008. More than 20,000 journalists are expected to attend the Games, and Beijing promised the International Olympic Committee that reporters would be allowed to report freely.

Historically, China has tightly monitored foreign reporting and censored the Chinese news media on issues deemed politically delicate. In an earlier era, state security agents often tried to intercede or follow foreign reporters who tried to travel without permission.

Currently, foreign journalists work in something of a gray zone. Journalists are rarely followed, though many reporters assume that their e-mail messages, telephones, offices and possibly homes are monitored with listening devices. Many journalists now travel without government permission and also conduct interviews without applying for approval. Often such trips are completed without incident.

But the restrictions create a tense atmosphere that leaves reporters vulnerable to official scrutiny and, in some cases, arrest. Journalists can be identified by a special "J" designation on their visas. Hotel clerks are supposed to notify local public security bureaus anytime someone with a "J" visa registers for a room.

In addition, foreign journalists visiting remote areas sometimes attract suspicion if they are not ethnic Chinese. Reporters caught traveling without permission are sometimes detained and questioned by the local police. In some cases Chinese residents have been harassed or even arrested after being quoted in news articles.

Jonathan Watts, the Beijing bureau chief for The Guardian, the British newspaper, applauded the new rules but also noted that the proof would come in how they were carried out. "As with everything in China, it is going to depend on implementation," Mr. Watts said. "But the fact is that they have set a precedent."

The new regulations apply to reporting about the Olympics and "related matters." But Mr. Liu, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, said the regulations could be broadly interpreted and "actually expands the areas on which foreign journalists can report."

"Foreign journalists will not limit their activities to the Games themselves," Mr. Liu said, according to The Associated Press. "They will also cover politics, science, technology and the economy."

He added that the police would maintain the right to intervene with reporters during emergencies or protests. That caveat raised questions about what barriers journalists would face if they should try to cover events like the numerous protests and riots that have occurred throughout China in recent years.

US Urges Opec Not To Cut Output Further (FT)

By Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, December 2, 2006

The US on Friday urged the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries not to make further cuts to its oil production.

Samuel Bodman, US energy secretary, said: "I encourage them to keep markets well-supplied."

But almost simultaneously in Cairo Ali Naimi, Saudi Arabia's oil minister, indicated that the cartel needed to give serious consideration to further reducing its production when it met in Abuja, Nigeria's capital, on December 14. He told reporters that demand was "okay", US inventories were high, and 100m barrels of oil would have to be removed from the market to achieve a balance.

Several of Opec's most hawkish members, including Venezuela and Nigeria, have called on the group to reduce its production by at least another 500,000 barrels a day. Libya, Algeria and Kuwait, more moderate Opec members, have been more guarded about whether further cuts are needed.

In late October, Opec agreed to reduce its output by 1.2m b/d to stem a 25 per cent fall in oil prices since the summer and to try to enforce a minimum price level of $60 a barrel. Even though the cartel has not fully stuck to its agreement, its decision has been largely successful. So far Opec's 10 active members have reduced their output by only 785,000 barrels a day, according to a [news organization's] poll. Even so, oil prices are again above $60 a barrel.

Crude oil futures traded on the New York Mercantile Exchange on Friday moved slightly lower after hitting a two-month high of $63.77 a barrel on Thursday. In London Brent crude futures were also down slightly, trading between $63.35 and $64.30.

Opec this week also saw success in its long-term expansion strategy as Angola, Africa's second largest oil producer, agreed to join the group and Sudan said it was working towards joining.

Together the two countries, among the world's fastest-growing energy suppliers, produce almost 2m barrels of oil a day.

The deep waters off Angola's coast are a particularly important new investment sphere for the world's biggest listed energy groups, while Sudan is critical to China, which has invested heavily there despite international pressure not to do so.

Speaking at an African oil and gas forum in the US, Mr Bodman acknowledged Africa's growing clout, saying that increasing oil demand put Africa "in an position of increasing strategic importance to the US and global markets".

Two Others Test Positive For Radiation, British Officials Say (WP)

By Mary Jordan, Sarah Delaney

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 1 -- The radioactive substance that killed former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko has contaminated his wife and an Italian security consultant he met the day he fell ill, British officials and a Litvinenko family friend said Friday.

Officials said that neither was showing symptoms of poisoning from the substance, polonium-210. Although thousands of people have called hotlines worried about possible exposure, Mario Scaramella and Marina Litvinenko are the only two who have tested positive for the radiation since Litvinenko's mysterious death on Nov. 23.

British authorities have detected traces of polonium-210 in at least 12 sites around London and on two British Airways jetliners. A third plane was returning to Moscow on Friday for checks. Investigators are trying to use those findings to determine where the poison came from and who transported it.

Scaramella, who met with Litvinenko at a sushi restaurant on Nov. 1, was the more severely affected. Health officials said he had "significant" amounts of radiation in his body, and he was hospitalized Friday awaiting further tests this weekend.

"He is currently well and shows no symptoms of radiation poisoning," Keith Patterson, a doctor at University College Hospital, told reporters outside the hospital Friday night. "Tests have detected polonium-210 in Mr. Scaramella's body, but at a considerably lower level than Mr. Litvinenko."

Alex Goldfarb, a family friend of the Litvinenkos, said in an interview that Marina Litvinenko, 44, a ballet teacher, was told by doctors that "minuscule levels" of polonium-210 had been found in her urine.

"For three days when he was home and vomiting, she was taking care of him," Goldfarb said. He said she was not particularly worried about her health, but noted that because the poison is "so unique, its long-term effects are not known."

"The levels are not significant enough to result in any illness in the short term," the Health Protection Agency said in a statement that identified the contaminated person only as an "adult family member" of Litvinenko. It added, "The results are reassuring in that any increased risk in the long term is likely to be very small."

Nick Priest, a British scientist and expert in polonium-210, said in an interview that "everyone has a different resistance to radiation." He said the worry is that it might cause "a depletion of bone marrow" and an increased risk of cancer.

Litvinenko's unexplained death has created Cold War-like tensions between London and Moscow. Litvinenko was an outspoken critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin, and his friends say that before his death he accused Putin of ordering his murder. The Kremlin has dismissed those allegations as "nonsense."

In Moscow, a former KGB agent who met Litvinenko on Nov. 1 at the Millennium Hotel in Grosvenor Square, within sight of the U.S. Embassy, denied any involvement in Litvinenko's death.

Scaramella said at a news conference in Rome last week that he showed Litvinenko e-mails during their meeting that warned their lives might be in danger.

Sergio Rastrelli, a lawyer for Scaramella, was asked in a televised interview in Italy on Friday whether Scaramella was a witness or suspect in the case. "He is absolutely a witness, and now, unfortunately, he is also a person who has been offended by a crime committed by a third party."

In Russia, human rights activists said a letter written by a former Russian intelligence agent claimed that the Federal Security Service, or FSB, had established death squads to kill Litvinenko and other critics of the Kremlin.

"Back in 2002, I warned Litvinenko that they had formed a team to kill him," the letter said. Activists said the letter was written by Mikhail Trepashkin, a former officer of the KGB and its successor, the FSB.

Trepashkin was sentenced to four years in prison in 2005 for divulging state secrets. Before his arrest, Trepashkin was investigating the possible role of the FSB in a series of apartment bombings in 1999 in which hundreds of people died -- a subject about which Litvinenko had written a book. Amnesty International and other human rights groups have said Trepashkin was jailed to prevent further investigation into the bombings.

Police in Sussex, south of London, said they assisted Scotland Yard and the Health Protection Agency in an investigation at the Ashdown Park Hotel in East Sussex on Friday. British and Italian media said Scaramella had stayed at the hotel recently and that authorities were looking for traces of radiation.

Matthew Long, deputy general manager at the Ashdown Park Hotel, said in an interview that police found "no evidence of radiation" after searching for hours. Long said the investigation was started because of concern that "we had a guest who might have been suffering from radiation."

Pathologists in protective gear conducted a postmortem exam on Litvinenko's body Friday. Results are not expected to be announced for several days. The BBC reported that because of the radiation, his remains will be buried in a sealed coffin.

Pat Troop, chief executive of the Health Protection Agency, said the risk to others who came into casual contact with Litvinenko remains negligible.

Radiation Detected In Man Who Met With Ex-Spy (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

LONDON, Dec. 1 — One of three men who last met the former K.G.B. officer Alexander V. Litvinenko before he fell fatally ill with radiation poisoning was himself admitted to a London hospital on Friday, the authorities said, after tests showed that he had a significant amount of radioactive material in his body.

The hospitalization of the man, an Italian investigator named Mario Scaramella, adds a further layer of confusion to the puzzle surrounding the death of Mr. Litvinenko, a vocal critic-in-exile of the Russian government. Although tests have been conducted on dozens of people who came into contact with Mr. Litvinenko after he fell ill, including his doctors, Mr. Scaramella is so far the only one to show more than a negligible amount of radiation in his body.

The Health Protection Agency, which deals with public health issues in Britain, also said Friday that “an adult member of Mr. Litvinenko’s family” who was in close contact with him during his illness — a description that apparently applies only to his wife — had tested positive for low levels of radiation exposure. But the agency added, “The levels are not significant enough to result in any illness in the short term.”

Mr. Scaramella has said all along that he felt fine, that he was suffering from none of the debilitating symptoms that characterized Mr. Litvinenko’s illness and that earlier tests for polonium 210, the isotope that killed Mr. Litvinenko, had turned up negative. University College Hospital, where he was admitted Friday, said Mr. Scaramella was “currently well and shows no symptoms of radiation poisoning.”

Dr. Keith Patterson, a consulting hematologist at the hospital, said that while tests had shown the presence of polonium 210 in Mr. Scaramella’s body, they were “at considerably lower levels than Mr. Litvinenko.”

The health agency would not say how much radiation Mr. Scaramella had ingested, only that he had “a significant quantity” of polonium 210 in his body. Mr. Scaramella’s lawyer, Sergio Rastrelli, said in Rome that his client was undergoing more tests.

Mr. Litvinenko’s body underwent an autopsy on Friday at the Royal London Hospital in Whitechapel, a hospital spokeswoman said. The autopsy, which might help disclose how the radiation entered his system and in what quantities, was presided over by a forensic pathologist appointed by the Home Office. Also present were an independent pathologist and a third who had been hired by Mr. Litvinenko’s family.

The results of the autopsy may not be available until next week.

All the pathologists wore protective clothing. Alex Goldfarb, a close friend of Mr. Litvinenko’s who has emerged as a family spokesman, said that he had been told that his friend’s body would have to be sealed in an airtight container and that it was so contaminated that it could not be cremated for 22 years.

With each new development, there are more mysteries to be solved in the case, which has still not been characterized as a murder by the London police. Who gave Mr. Litvinenko the polonium 210? Where did they get it? How much was he given? How did he ingest it? What is the significance of the traces of radiation that have been found in at least a dozen places, including on two British Airways jets? Two Russians who also met with Mr. Litvinenko on the day he fell ill had traveled on the planes.

Mr. Scaramella’s role is also something of a mystery.

Mr. Scaramella was a consultant for the Mitrokhin Commission, a parliamentary panel in Italy looking into reported connections between the K.G.B. and Italian politicians. It was disbanded this year.

Mr. Litvinenko also worked for the Mitrokhin Commission, Mr. Goldfarb said, and had known Mr. Scaramella for a decade. The two met regularly in London. Their last meeting took place at the Piccadilly branch of the Itsu sushi restaurant on Nov. 1, the day Mr. Litvinenko became sick.

Flanked by bodyguards in Rome last month, Mr. Scaramella told reporters that during the meeting — in which he drank water and Mr. Litvinenko ate sushi and soup — he presented Mr. Litvinenko with e-mailed documents showing their names on a list of people whose lives were in danger from Russian criminals. Mr. Scaramella said the same criminals had killed Anna Politkovskaya, a Russian investigative journalist, in Moscow in October.

Mr. Scaramella has been in London for the last week. He said that he and Mr. Litvinenko were friends and that he was not a suspect. Mr. Litvinenko said on his deathbed that he believed forces working for the government of President Vladimir V. Putin were responsible, a charge the Kremlin has dismissed as ridiculous.

Mr. Goldfarb said that his friend was certain he had been poisoned during one of two meetings on Nov. 1 — either the one at Itsu, or another, with the two Russian men, at the Millennium Hotel in Mayfair.

"It's mystery over mystery over mystery," he said. Of the news that Mr. Scaramella had tested positive for radiation, Mr. Goldfarb said, "Obviously he received a much lower dose than Alexander. He might have been an innocent bystander; he might have been a target; he might have been someone who the perpetrators contaminated after the fact; or he may himself be involved. Nobody knows."

Poison Also Found In Italian (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

LONDON — An Italian KGB expert who had warned poisoned Russian dissident Alexander Litvinenko that his life might be in danger has a "significant quantity" of radioactive polonium-210 in his body, authorities said Friday.

British health officials also said they had detected a small quantity in a close relative of Litvinenko. Neither has shown signs of illness.

The announcements came as police zeroed in on radiation found on British Airways jets that flew between Moscow and London, one of which might have transported suspects carrying the poison.

After days of investigation, police have begun to trace a radiation trail across flight manifests and London hotels and offices that security experts said could eventually pinpoint how the radioactive substance was brought to London and possibly by whom.

The exposure of Italian academic Mario Scaramella increases the likelihood that the poison was administered at the sushi restaurant in central London where the two men met briefly Nov. 1 — hours before Litvinenko became sick — especially since the radiation trail appears to follow Litvinenko's movements across London after that rendezvous.

Scaramella has done exhaustive research into the archives of Vasili Mitrokhin, a KGB major who defected to the West in 1992 and took along numerous secret files. Scaramella became acquainted with several former KGB agents, including Litvinenko, who had accused his former colleagues of involvement in several killings and assaults and had obtained political asylum in Britain.

The Italian asked Litvinenko to meet with him after he received an e-mail suggesting that criminals in St. Petersburg, Russia, were behind the recent slaying of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya in Moscow and were preparing to strike against Litvinenko and Scaramella.

Litvinenko discounted the threat, and the meeting was brief. Scaramella, who had already eaten, had only a glass of water. Litvinenko ate lunch. He died 22 days later in a London hospital.

Scaramella has cooperated in the investigation, and authorities have not identified him as a suspect. After he arrived at London's University College Hospital on Friday wearing a mask, hospital officials said he had been admitted for examination.

"Tests have detected polonium-210 in Mr. Scaramella's body, but at a considerably lower level than Mr. Litvinenko. He is currently well and shows no symptoms of radiation poisoning," hospital spokesman Dr. Keith Patterson said in a statement.

Meanwhile, in another possible poisoning, former acting Prime Minister Yegor T. Gaidar remained hospitalized in Moscow with a still-undiagnosed ailment. He fell ill suddenly a week ago during an academic conference in Ireland.

British police are investigating whether there are any links between the two cases.

After meeting with Scaramella, Litvinenko had tea with his former partner in the KGB, Andrei Lugovoy — who was on Gaidar's security detail in the early 1990s, a Gaidar aide confirmed Friday. After Lugovoy left the KGB, he became head of security at the Russian television network ORT. He remained friends with Litvinenko.

Lugovoy was in London with his family and numerous other Russian soccer fans for a match between Moscow's CSKA team and London's Arsenal, according to the Moscow newspaper Kommersant.

Russian businessman Dmitry Kovtun accompanied Lugovoy to the Litvinenko meeting at London's elite Millennium Hotel, where several traces of polonium-210 reportedly have been found.

Litvinenko, who left a note blaming Russian President Vladimir V. Putin for his impending death, was convinced he was poisoned at one of the two meetings but was not sure which, close friend Alex Goldfarb said in an interview.

"He clearly said that he knows it's one of them, but he didn't want to accuse anybody because he would hate to put a shadow on an innocent person," Goldfarb said. He works for a foundation funded by exiled Russian billionaire Boris Berezovsky, whose offices, visited by Litvinenko after his poisoning, also showed traces of polonium-210.

And another finger pointed at Russian security services. According to a Nov. 18 letter to Litvinenko from former KGB agent Mikhail Trepashkin: In 2002, Trepashkin reported a meeting with a Russian agent who spoke of "a very serious group" that would be "snuffing out everybody connected with Berezovsky and Litvinenko."

Trepashkin's letter said the agent worked for the Federal Security Service, the KGB's successor, and sought details about Litvinenko's family.

Trepashkin was the primary source for a book by Litvinenko accusing Russia's government of organizing several apartment-building explosions across Russia before the second Chechen war. A copy of his letter to Litvinenko was provided Friday to The Times by sources in Russia.

Goldfarb released a similar letter from Trepashkin, dated the day of Litvinenko's death. He called on British authorities to question Trepashkin, who is in prison in Russia on charges of revealing state secrets.

Trepashkin "names names," Goldfarb said.

The Guardian newspaper, quoting unidentified British intelligence sources, reported that London police were coming closer to the view that "rogue elements" within or formerly with the Federal Security Service probably were involved in the killing.

It said police were "closing in on" five or more men who arrived on soccer fans' flight and returned to Moscow soon after.

Prodi To Sue Over Allegations Of KGB Links (FT)

By Tony Barber

Financial Times, December 2, 2006

The suspicious death of a former Russian agent in London was enmeshed in alleged dirty tricks in Italian politics on Friday after Romano Prodi, Italy's prime minister, announced legal action against people linking him to the KGB, the former Soviet intelligence service.

The main person who has made this accusation, which Mr Prodi rejects as utterly unfounded, is Mario Scaramella, a self-styled expert on Soviet espionage in Italy.

Before he died on November 23 of poisoning from polonium 210, a rare radioactive substance, Litvinenko accused Vladimir Putin, Russia's president and a former KGB agent, of ordering his death. The Kremlin dismissed his charge as nonsense.

The Litvinenko affair has spilled into Italian politics because Mr Scaramella was appointed in 2003 as a consultant to a parliamentary inquiry, known as the Mitrokhin commission, which was investigating KGB activities in Italy.

The commission wound up its work before Mr Prodi's victory in Italy's general election last April. But Mr Scaramella reported to the commission's chairman in January that he had been looking into alleged links between Mr Prodi and the KGB.

He told the chairman, Paolo Guzzanti, a member of then prime minister Silvio Berlusconi's Forza Italia party, that there was no evidence Mr Prodi was a KGB agent, but that some signs pointed to "friendly relations" between Mr Prodi and the KGB.

Mr Prodi was so offended by Mr Scaramella's allegations, which appeared in the Italian press this week, that he announced on Thursday night that he planned legal action against the people behind them. He named no one in particular.

Mr Scaramella had no background as a specialist in Soviet affairs before 2003, and Massimo D'Alema, Italy's foreign minister, said on Wednesday that Mr Scaramella "has had and has no organic relationship with the Italian secret services".

Politicians in Mr Prodi's centre-left coalition suspect that one purpose of the Mitrokhin commission, which was set up under Mr Berlusconi, was to plant material to discredit the centre-left, especially ahead of the April election. Mr Berlusconi's party has ridiculed the idea of a smear campaign.

"They have tried to upset the country's democracy," said Piero Fassino, leader of the Democrats of the Left, the largest party in Mr Prodi's government. "A campaign of personal denigration and institutional destabilisation has been pursued."

Mr Prodi's camp contends that there have been other attempts to destroy his reputation. Prosecutors said in October that several members of the Italian tax police and other state employees had illegally broken into the financial records of Mr Prodi and his wife Flavia.

During Mr Berlusconi's five-year premiership, Mr Prodi was plagued by allegations – which he denied adn were never proven – that, when he was prime minister from 1996 to 1998, he took kickbacks in the purchase by Telecom Italia, the Italian telecommunications group, of a stake in Telekom Serbia, the Serbia telecoms company.

Last month Mr Prodi's government shook up Italy's espionage services by dismissing the country's three top intelligence officers.

Russia's Hidden Power Struggle (WP)

By Masha Lipman

MOSCOW -- "Give the elections back to the people, bastards!" These words were emblazoned on a bright yellow banner more than 30 feet long that hung over the Moscow River facing the Kremlin. A couple of young activists positioned themselves in the ropework holding up the banner for about 30 minutes, until they were taken off and delivered to a police station.

Such extravagant political performances may be typical at, say, a Greenpeace protest but not over something that has in fact become increasingly common: a government encroachment on voting rights.

Russia is undergoing yet another round of election-rule tightening -- as usual, a product of the country's rubber-stamp legislature. The protesters see it as marking the "virtual elimination of the system of free elections" in Russia, as they said in their statement. Over the past two years, election rules have been repeatedly refashioned and readjusted so that no undesired forces or figures can slip through the process.

Meanwhile, the Kremlin has managed to obstruct the financing of unwelcome political projects. Russian businessmen, while afraid to sponsor autonomous political activity, have given generously to pro-Kremlin political groups, movements and initiatives. With the best and biggest companies increasingly coming under the Kremlin's control, pro-Kremlin political forces are assured of virtually unlimited budgets. In addition, political loyalists can draw on what's called the "administrative resource" -- a network of administrators at various levels who are eager to do the regime's bidding.

In such a political environment, election results are preordained. There is a flatness about campaigns -- a lack of enthusiasm and emotion. Which is the way the Kremlin likes it.

One of the innovations of the new election bill is a ban on creating a "negative image" of political opponents. This is one way of depriving a campaign of any meaning whatsoever, as just challenging the policies of the incumbent authorities can now be interpreted as a violation of the law.

So while there is always a constituency that dutifully turns out on Election Day to vote "as the bosses say," a great many others will choose to stay home, since they assume their vote will make no difference.

Of course, a low turnout might call into question the legitimacy of the representative branch, but apparently the Kremlin thinks it can live with this image problem. Another provision of the new bill eliminates the minimum percentage turnout requirement for an election to be valid. The ruling elite thus largely reduces its power base to the core of Soviet-style voters who accept a no-choice vote -- while alienating the more advanced and entrepreneurial elements of the population.

Essentially, the protesters hanging on the ropes with their banner over the Moscow River can do nothing about all this. A boycott of elections -- proposed in their statement as the "only real means of political struggle left in the opposition's arsenal" -- will make no sense if there is no minimum-turnout requirement. The authority of the Kremlin, on the other hand, is unconstrained.

And thus the encroachment on political rights will continue. One recent initiative has been to abolish mayoral elections. With gubernatorial elections already replaced by Kremlin appointments, this is a logical next step in the dismantling of representative democracy.

A common argument has it that President Vladimir Putin may have cracked down on freedoms and democracy and recentralized power in the Kremlin, but at least he has ensured order and stability. In fact, Putin may have "stabilized" public politics, but there's no more law or order about his regime than there was in Boris Yeltsin's "chaotic" Russia.

The political scene has been fully cleared of genuine competition, and the executive and legislative branches filled with loyalists who need not worry about public accountability. As a result, the members of this greedy bureaucracy have become a privileged circle in which they seek to amass power, which in Russia is closely linked to property and wealth. In the process, they force those with less clout to sell their lucrative properties, as happened not long ago with a Urals titanium factory. If the owner doesn't accept the deal, he can expect the tax police to "discover" huge instances of evasion, the environmental agency to reveal improper use of his lands or the prosecutor's office to begin proceedings against him. All these government agencies would be working on behalf of the powerful buyer. This is hardly law and order.

Meanwhile, the regime's loyalists are themselves engaged in a fierce struggle, especially as the crucial 2007-08 elections draw near. All are wondering what the power shifts that Putin has in mind will mean for them personally. Thus, disputes among them grow ever more intense and vicious, creating an atmosphere of rampant corruption and crime. Court rulings are commonly twisted as a result of bribery or pressure from the executive. Contract killings are used to settle scores with rivals and adversaries.

Aside from the recent high-profile assassinations, there have been the killings, in a period of less than three months, of three bankers, one of them deputy chairman of the central bank. All were slain by contract murderers. A contender for the mayoralty in a Far Eastern town was killed at the height of the election campaign. A pro-Moscow Chechen commander was shot by a group of Chechen law enforcers in broad daylight in the middle of Moscow -- in front of passersby and a group of Moscow militiamen who, according to newspaper reports, watched from across the street. None of the perpetrators was arrested.

Real competitive politics, if they were ever allowed, might be a threat to the ruling elite. Fierce infighting within the regime is a threat to the entire nation and its future.

Pope Wins Over Muslims With Nod To Mecca, Message (WT)

By John Phillips

ISTANBUL -- Pope Benedict XVI concluded a historic trip to the Muslim world yesterday after soothing an outraged Islamic population with his Christian message of peace and reconciliation.

The Roman Catholic pontiff wound up his triumphant four-day visit to Turkey with a parting message of good will to Muslims as Turkish clerics and commentators lauded the German-born pope for facing Mecca as he prayed alongside a top Islamic clergyman in Istanbul's Blue Mosque on Thursday.

"You know well that the church wishes to impose nothing on anyone, and that she merely asks to live in freedom," Benedict said at the Holy Spirit Cathedral in Istanbul.

In the last of several gestures aimed at healing the rift with the Orthodox Church -- the original theme of a trip that was overshadowed by Muslim rage -- the pope was joined in the church by Patriarch Bartholomew I.

Benedict looked pleased as he entered the cathedral after doing much to repair the uproar he started two months ago by criticizing Islam in a speech in Germany.

The grand mufti of Istanbul, Mustafa Cagrici, who prayed side by side with the pope at the mosque on Thursday, said Benedict had faced Mecca while praying, like a Muslim would.

"These were very nice gestures," he told NTV television. "I allocated 30, 40 seconds for [the prayer]. I finished my prayer. But the pope must have been so overcome that he took much longer."

The Turkish daily Askam agreed. "The pope's dreaded visit was concluded with a wonderful surprise," it reported.

The mass-circulation Hurriyet newspaper joined in the chorus of approval. "He turned toward Mecca and prayed like Muslims," said the daily, which dubbed Benedict "the congenial pope."

Throughout his trip, however, the pope also gently stressed Rome's concept of reciprocity in which respect for Muslims in the West warrants respect for religious minorities such as Christians and Jews in majority Muslim lands, including the beleaguered community of 90,000 Christians in Turkey.

"Your communities walk the humble path of daily companionship with those who do not share our faith," the pope told the congregation filling a 160-year-old cathedral that contains the relics of a 1st-century Christian martyr.

"I would compare the pope's visit to the mosque to Pope John Paul's gesture at the Western Wall [in Jerusalem], said Cardinal Roger Etchegaray, the veteran French Vatican diplomat who frequently is a trouble-shooter for the Holy See in the Middle East.

In his last moments in Turkey, the 79-year-old pope walked down a red carpet before boarding a special Turkish Airlines jetliner to Rome.

"I hope this visit contributes to peace and dialogue between faiths," Benedict told the governor of Istanbul, Muammer Guler, at Istanbul's international airport.

Pope Ends Visit Of Conciliation (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

Even his critics give praise for the pontiff's outreach to Muslims in Turkey.

ISTANBUL, TURKEY — Just as the Bible speaks of converting swords into plowshares, Pope Benedict XVI has used his extraordinary pilgrimage to Turkey this week to transform outrage over provocative remarks he made about Islam into an emerging image of conciliation and outreach.

His efforts have been hailed by many here and could have crucial influence on the future of the troubled relations between Islam and Christianity.

During his four-day visit, which ended Friday, the pope faced Mecca and prayed shoulder to shoulder with an Islamic cleric in Turkey's most important mosque. He shook the hand of one of his sternest Muslim critics. He even hoisted a Turkish flag bearing the Islamic symbol of a crescent moon.

By most accounts, Benedict was successful in winning over begrudging hearts and minds in the Islamic world.

It was, as one Italian commentator put it, the theological Benedict replaced by the diplomatic Benedict, an infrequently seen facet of this complex and deeply intellectual pope.

"People here were worried about the message he would give, what he would say about Islam and whether he would show respect," said Mustafa Akyol, a Turkish writer who specializes in interfaith issues and who considers himself a devout Muslim. "He did way better than expected. This was very fruitful for him."

Turkish newspapers, some of which had harshly criticized the pope just days earlier, on Friday gave generally positive coverage to the pontiff's visit to the majestic 17th century Blue Mosque. A photograph of him praying silently Thursday along side the grand mufti of Istanbul dominated almost every front page.

"The whole world watched this historic moment," the centrist Milliyet newspaper said. "Sympathetic pope … continued to surprise the world," declared the top-selling Hurriyet daily.

Cardinal Roger Etchegaray, who accompanied the pope and is a recognized expert in diplomacy, compared Benedict's gesture at the mosque to the historic moment in 2000 when his predecessor, Pope John Paul II, stood and prayed at the Western Wall in Jerusalem.

At the stone wall that is among Judaism's holiest sites, John Paul wrote a note seeking forgiveness for centuries of abuse of Jews by Catholics, in what became a seminal act signaling a new era in the Roman Catholic Church's relationship with its predecessor faith.

"These are two very important symbolic moments," Etchegaray said Friday. "Benedict XVI did with the Muslims yesterday what John Paul II did with the Jews."

It was a speech that Benedict gave in September that ended up setting the agenda for his first trip to a predominantly Muslim country. In that speech in Regensburg, Germany, Benedict linked Islam to violence and quoted a Byzantine emperor who saw only evil in the faith founded by the prophet Muhammad.

The remarks enraged the Muslim world and threatened to destroy bridges built during the 26-year papacy of John Paul.

Father Federico Lombardi, the Vatican's chief spokesman, has maintained the hope that the silver lining of the uproar would be the opening of a frank and sincere dialogue between the largest Christian faith and Islam. As the Turkey trip ended, he said he believed that process had been launched.

"I think we have moved beyond Regensburg, and, in a way, Regensburg has borne positive fruit," Lombardi said.

The pope, as he departed Istanbul for the flight home to Rome, told the regional governor who saw him off that he hoped his visit would bring the religions closer together.

"As a pastor of the Catholic Church, I think it is my duty to contribute to the understanding and dialogue among cultures and religions," he said.

Nationalist Turks found fault, especially with his overtures to Turkey's Christian minorities. He engaged in hours of prayer and celebration with Patriarch Bartholomew I, the titular head of the world's 250 million Orthodox Christians. He saluted him as the "ecumenical patriarch," a term loathed by Turks because it suggests authority elevated beyond the Turkish state.

Additional criticism came from the Christian side of the aisle, with some suggesting that, in his eagerness to appease the Muslims, the pope failed to adequately lobby on behalf of the beleaguered Christian community.

But if the Christians whom the pope came to support felt slighted, most did not indicate it.

Bartholomew, a sprightly man with a bushy white beard, expressed satisfaction with the pope's visit. He combined a little Italian and English to say he was "happisimo" — "very happy" with the pope's presence.

"He brought the attention of the world on the problems we suffer," said Anthony Limberakis, national commander of the Order of St. Andrew, one of numerous Greek-American delegations in Istanbul to support their religious brethren.

Benedict made a final gentle plea on behalf of Christians during the Mass he said Friday at the Catholic Holy Spirit Cathedral.

He noted that the Christian minorities in Turkey "walk the humble path of daily companionship with those who do not share our faith" but who belong to the brotherhood of monotheistic descendants of Abraham.

"You know well that the church wishes to impose nothing on anyone, and that she merely asks to live in freedom, in order to reveal the one whom she cannot hide, Christ Jesus," he said.

Another important gesture that won favor for Benedict was the softening of his opposition to Turkey's long-sought membership in the European Union.

In a reversal of sorts, the pope told Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan that he would support EU membership for Turkey. He previously had maintained that Turkey, as a Muslim nation, was "in permanent contrast" with Europe and did not belong.

Some Turkish commentators said they thought Benedict backtracked toward the end of his visit when he spoke of the need to preserve Europe's Christian roots. But another reading of those comments suggests that he was stating the conditions under which Turkey could join the EU, conditions such as respect for religious freedom that the EU itself is demanding.

Turkey Holds Firm On Foreign Policy (WT)

By Andrew Borowiec

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

NICOSIA, Cyprus -- The Turkish government this week tried to minimize the impact of the European Union's threat to partially freeze accession talks, saying its foreign policy remained unchanged.

The watchword in Ankara's official circles is "continuation in the same direction," said a senior official, who rejected EU insistence that Turkey must open its airports and harbors to traffic from Cyprus.

In Cyprus, the Greek Cypriot government said the bloc was giving Turkey too much leeway, thus damaging efforts to find a solution to the Mediterranean island's partition.

Despite the EU threat to freeze eight key aspects of the accession talks, Turkish officials said the Greek Cypriot air and maritime traffic would be allowed only after an economic boycott of the Turkish Cypriot zone in the north of the island is lifted.

On Wednesday, the European Commission, the EU executive body, rejected Turkey's condition, stressing that all candidates for membership in the 25-nation bloc must conform to its rules.

"It's Turkey, which should adjust to EU regulations, and not vice versa," an EU official said, stressing that Turkey was a signatory to the protocol governing trade relations with the 10 latest EU members, including Cyprus.

EU officials said the proposed halt in discussions of eight of the 35 "accession chapters" would be applied only after approval at the EU summit meeting in mid-December. Some EU heads of government, including British Prime Minister Tony Blair, say the bloc should refrain from "sending a negative signal" to Turkey, a predominantly Muslim nation of 70 million.

Nonetheless, the EU Commission's recommendation was a significant warning and a blow to Turkey's ambition to join what some in the Turkish press call "the Christian Europe." EU membership is the cornerstone of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan's foreign policy.

The Turkish press was comforted by a statement attributed to visiting Pope Benedict XVI saying he "encourages the passage of dialogue for inserting Turkey in the EU, on the basis of specific common values." The pontiff, earlier this year, opposed Turkey's EU membership.

Meanwhile, Greek Cypriot officials and politicians described the European Commission's warning as inadequate, saying it reduced the pressure on Turkey and consequently prolonged the long-lasting political stalemate on the island.

"We disagree and we insist that the EU should send a clear message to Turkey that it can't ignore its obligations under EU law," said Andros Kyprianou, spokesman for the Progressive Party of Working People, the dominant communist party known by its acronym AKEL.

Since the beginning of its EU negotiations a year ago, Turkey has been warning that there is no question of compromise in its attitude toward Cyprus, where Ankara maintains an expeditionary force and backs a separate government of the Turkish Cypriots.

U.S. Proposing Regional Force To Monitor Somalia Violence (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 1 — The United States circulated a draft resolution on Somalia on Friday, urging a regional peacekeeping force to monitor a struggle for control between the country's embattled government and its powerful Islamist foes, and calling for a partial lifting of an arms embargo to enable the equipping of local security units.

The 8,000-member force would come from seven East African nations but not from neighboring states of Kenya, Djibouti and Ethiopia. This restriction was added out of concern that the proposed United Nations move, aimed at calming tensions, might end up provoking wider hostilities.

The International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based study group with expertise in the area, raised alarm this week by predicting that deploying a force, particularly one that included soldiers from neighboring countries, “could trigger all-out war in Somalia and destablize the entire Horn of Africa region.”

John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, expressed annoyance with this view. “You know, people criticize us when we take action on the ground, that our taking action makes the situation worse,” he said. “O.K., so what is the answer, not to take action?”

He said, “What we want to do is endorse the insertion of the regional peacekeeping force, which many of the African states have called for, in order to provide some measure of stability there to permit a political solution.”

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew the president and then turned on each other.

The interim government, formed two years ago and supported by the United Nations, controls only Baidoa, the provincial town where it is headquartered, while the Islamic alliance, known as the Union of Islamic Courts, has taken over Mogadishu, the capital, and increased its grip on the rest of the country.

Ethiopia supports the interim government and has sent troops into the country. Washington earlier backed a coalition of warlords to try to combat the Islamists, who the United States believed harbored terrorists.

The draft urged the Islamists to “cease any further military expansion and reject those with an extremist agenda or links with international terrorism.” It noted the Security Council’s willingness “to engage with all parties in Somalia, including the Union of Islamic Courts, if they are committed to achieving a political settlement through peaceful and inclusive dialogue.”

There is fear that Ethiopia and Eritrea, which are in a tense faceoff over their disputed border, are fighting a proxy war in Somalia. Eritrea also would most likely be barred from participating in the peacekeeping force under the resolution.

The United Nations arms embargo on Somalia, which has been notoriously porous, began in 1992.

Mr. Bolton said that the text would be circulated to various capitals over the weekend, and that he hoped that reactions could start to be incorporated into the document at drafters’ meetings beginning Monday. “And then we’ll proceed as rapidly as we can after that,” he said.

U.S. Calls For Regional Somalia Force (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 2, 2006

The United States circulated a U.N. Security Council draft resolution Friday that would authorize a regional force to protect Somalia's weak government and threaten Security Council action against those who block peace efforts and attempt to overthrow it.

The draft, obtained by The Associated Press, would lift a 1992 arms embargo against Somalia so that troops in the "protection and training mission" could be militarily equipped.

It would ban Somalia's neighbors from sending soldiers — a demand by a seven-nation East African group expected to contribute soldiers to the force, as well as European members of the Security Council who want to ensure the force's aim is to promote peace.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said he expects Security Council experts to discuss the draft on Monday "and then we'll proceed as rapidly as we can after that."

The move comes after a veiled woman and two other suicide bombers exploded cars Thursday outside the western Somali town of Baidoa, the only area under the government's control. Ten people were killed in the attack.

No one claimed responsibility for the attack but the government blamed the Islamic movement vying for control of the country. The Islamic group denied any involvement.

Police questioned six suspects Friday, but declined to provide details about them.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and then turned on one another. A government was formed with the help of the U.N. two years ago, but has struggled to assert its authority. Islamic militants, meanwhile, have been rising up since June and now control the capital and most of the country's south.

A confidential U.N. report obtained recently by the AP said 6,000 to 8,000 Ethiopian troops were in Somalia or along the border, supporting the transitional government. It also said 2,000 soldiers from Eritrea were inside Somalia, supporting the Islamic militia.

There are fears that Somalia could become a proxy battleground for Ethiopia and Eritrea, which fought a border war in 1998-2000. Eritrea denies having any troops in Somalia, while Ethiopia insists it has sent only a few hundred advisers.

There was no mention of troops already in Somalia in the U.S. draft resolution.

The draft resolution emphasizes the council's "willingness to engage with all parties in Somalia, including the Islamic courts movement, if they are committed to achieving a political settlement through peaceful and inclusive dialogue."

The regional force would protect the U.N.-backed transitional government and train some of the local forces. Council diplomats said the seven-nation East African group envisions a force of eight battalions, each with 700 to 800 troops, but only two would be deployed in the first phase.

"It's very limited," said Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry. "The situation in Somalia ... remains very difficult and complex, and there isn't a simple solution, and there certainly isn't a massive imposed military solution from outside."

Bolton said Somalia's stability is in "grave peril" because of the pressure being placed on the government by the Islamic movement.

"What we want to do is introduce this regional peacekeeping force ... in order to provide some measure of stability there to permit a political solution," he said.

The goal is to eventually persuade the Islamists that a military victory is impossible, thus creating conditions for a negotiated settlement between the two sides, council diplomats said, speaking on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly.

In the draft, the council said it would consider taking measures "against those that seek to prevent or block a peaceful dialogue process, overthrow the transitional federal institutions by force, or take action that further threatens regional stability."

The U.S. did not specify what measures might be considered but the resolution was drafted under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which deals with threats to international peace and security and authorizes a range of measures from breaking diplomatic and trade relations to military intervention.

Bolton circulated the resolution two days after the Security Council adopted a resolution asking Secretary-General Kofi Annan to re-establish a monitoring group to investigate violations of the arms embargo for a six-month period.

A report earlier this month by the last monitoring group accused 10 countries of providing weapons, money and training to rival sides in Somalia. Many of those named denied any involvement and complained about being on the list.

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Agent Describes Group's Jihad Plot (HC)

By Thomas Korosec

Houston Chronicle, December 2, 2006

DALLAS — An FBI agent testified in federal court Friday that at least four aspiring jihadists conducted firearms training and discussed going to war against the United States on two weekend camping trips near Willis earlier this year.

"The group had discussions about traveling to Pakistan to engage (the) United States and coalition forces," Special Agent John McKinley, who is assigned to an international counterterrorism squad in Houston, told a federal judge.

McKinley, testifying during a detention hearing for 19-year-old Syed Maaz Shah, described how the group conducted paramilitary training, fired high-powered guns such as AR-15s, and referred to themselves as mujahedeen, or Muslims involved in a fight or struggle.

The group included two Houston-area men who were arrested and charged earlier this week with conspiracy to aid the Taliban.

During the first weekend gathering, which began Jan. 13, Shah held up his passport, which shows he has traveled to Oman, the United Arab Emirates, Pakistan and Great Britain and asked the group "if they wanted to see the passport of a terrorist," McKinley testified.

Shah, a sophomore electrical engineering student at the University of Texas at Dallas who lists Islam as his religion in several Web postings, lectured the group on jihad and criticized certain Islamic imams for "what he described as weak sermons on jihad," the agent said. A second weekend training session began March 10.

Judge denies bailFBI counterterrorism agents in Houston and Dallas have been investigating Shah since September 2005, Special Agent Melinda Tilton, with the Dallas office, said during the hearing.

Shah was arrested Tuesday on two charges of illegal possession of a firearm by an alien. On Friday, U.S. Magistrate Judge Jeff Kaplan ordered Shah held without bail.

During the hearing, McKinley testified the property at Willis — a Montgomery County city on the opposite side of Interstate 45 from Lake Conroe — is owned by the Islamic Society of Greater Houston.

In one photo, Shah is seen with Adnan Mirza, 29, who is holding a shotgun, and Kobie Williams, 33, who is holding a rifle. Those are the two men arrested this week in Houston.

Williams pleaded guilty to the conspiracy charge Tuesday and has been cooperating with authorities, his attorneys have said.

A fourth man seen in the photos had not been arrested or charged in the case "so far," the agent testified. U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle in Houston hinted further charges were unlikely.

"We believe the most serious conduct has already been addressed," he said. "We believe that (the investigation) is at an end and is not ongoing. But, until people are sentenced, it is safe to assume some measure of investigation continues. This investigation is not as active as it perhaps might be otherwise."

McKinley said his testimony about the group's activities and discussions was based on interviews with participants at the two training sessions. Because of a prosecutor's objection, he was not required to answer a question about the origin of the photos.

In country illegallyRobina Shah, Shah's aunt, testified that Shah was a "straight A" student who never has harmed anybody.

After the hearing, his aunt was asked if her nephew was a terrorist. "No, he's not," said Shah, who with her husband owns a convenience store franchise in New York.

Shah listened intently and stared at the defense table through much of the hearing. He did not address the court.

Tilton said Shah is in the country illegally. He obtained a student visa in September 2005, when he began college, but the U.S. State Department revoked it last January.

He lived in Houston for nine years with his parents, who work in the oil industry and are living in Nigeria, she said. He was living on the UTD campus at Richardson, where a scholarship pays his tuition and some of his living expenses.

Shah reportedly was on his way to take a final exam when he was arrested.

Strong beliefsAccording to some of his Internet postings, Shah was born in Karachi, Pakistan. He listed his interests as "Islam, basketball and computer gaming."

In a 2003 posting on Young Muslims of North America Forum, he agreed with a blogger's view of the Sept. 11, 2001, attack that read, "I felt that America was getting wat (sic) was comin (sic) to them (600,000 dead Iraqi children, forget the 3000 Americans)"

Shah's defense attorney, Donald Fulton, said he did not know the extent of his client's involvement in jihad. "I only know what I heard in court today," he said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Stokes said Shah will likely be held in a federal jail in Seagoville and eventually transferred to Houston, where the two-count indictment against him was returned.

UTD Student Accused Of Jihadist Ties (DMN)

By Sergio Chapa, Jason Trahan

The Dallas Morning News, December 2, 2006

A federal judge in Dallas on Friday ordered a 19-year-old University of Texas at Dallas student to remain in custody on a firearms charge after prosecutors said he was linked to two Houston men who wanted to fight for the Taliban.

Federal authorities allege that Syed Maaz Shah joined the other men over several days in January to train with assault rifles in a rural area near Willis, Texas, north of Houston. The goal of the two Houston men was to "hone their skills with weapons to assist fighters engaging United States forces in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iraq," according to conspiracy indictments for Kobie Williams, 33, and Adnan Babar Mirza, 29.

Mr. Shah's indictment, handed down Tuesday and sealed until Wednesday, accuses the Pakistani native only of illegally possessing an assault weapon – believed to be an Armalite assault rifle. His indictment makes no mention of the Taliban conspiracy.

Mr. Shah's attorney denied that his client was involved in any illegal activities.

"The facts are that he has not been shown to be a violent person here or to harm anyone here," Mr. Shah's attorney, Donald T. Fulton, said at Friday's bail hearing.

The conspiracy indictments unsealed Tuesday in Houston only apply to Mr. Williams, a U.S. citizen and University of Houston student, and Mr. Mirza, a Pakistani citizen who entered the U.S. on a student visa in 2001. Mr. Williams has pleaded guilty to the charges.

Records showed Friday that Mr. Shah and Mr. Mirza have yet to enter pleas.

At Mr. Shah's hearing Friday, authorities said he is a close associate of the Houston men, who they said were trying to form a mini- mujahedeen aimed ultimately at fighting against U.S. forces with the Taliban.

John McKinley, an FBI counterterrorism agent from Houston, testified that Mr. Shah was photographed participating in guerrilla combat training and using assault weapons.

In a secretly recorded conversation, federal officials say, the group talked about jihad, or Islamic holy war.

"The group had a discussion where they considered themselves to be mujahedeen, and they planned to travel to Pakistan and to fight U.S. forces there," the agent said in court.

Agent McKinley said Mr. Shah was recorded giving a fiery sermon supporting jihad and denouncing some local clerics as weak.

"He displayed his passport to another member of the group and asked him if he wanted to see what the passport of a terrorist looked like," the agent testified in court. "His passport had stamps from Oman, the United Arab Emirates, London and the United States."

The government said the Houston men trained with weapons several times between mid-2005 and March. Indictments also accused Mr. Williams of making two payments totaling $350 in the summers of 2005 and 2006 for the use of Taliban "fighters and their families," but court documents don't elaborate.

Earlier this week, U.S. Attorney Donald J. DeGabrielle Jr., from the Southern District of Texas in Houston, said neither Mr. Williams nor Mr. Mirza had any real contact with terrorist groups. He said the investigation was nearly two years old and began with a referral from the U.S. Border Patrol.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Jeff Kaplan denied bail for Mr. Shah.

"The evidence presented by the prosecution shows the defendant traveled to Houston to participate in the training. ... While there might be a perfectly reasonable explanation, the court has heard none," Judge Kaplan said in court.

Mr. Shah could face 10 years in federal prison on two separate counts of illegally possessing a weapon. Mr. Williams faces a maximum sentence of five years in federal prison. Mr. Mirza's maximum sentence would be 35 years in prison if he's convicted.

Melinda Tilton, an FBI agent from Dallas, testified that the agency began investigating Mr. Shah in September 2005. Agent Tilton said his visa was revoked in January.

Mr. Shah is an electrical engineering major who has been a student at UTD for about a year. According to the student newspaper, The UTD Mercury, he also is secretary of the school's Muslim Students' Association and a student government senator.

Mr. Shah is expected to be transferred to Houston, where the other two men remain in federal custody.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Threats To Celebrities Bring Charges (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

A federal grand jury indicted a Woodland Hills man Friday on charges of sending threatening letters with white powder to half a dozen politicians and celebrities, including incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and television personalities Jon Stewart and Keith Olbermann.

The 14-count indictment accuses Chad Conrad Castagana, 39, of sending the letters from Sept. 7 through Nov. 9 to those three as well as Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, comedian and late-night talk show host David Letterman and Viacom Inc. Chairman Sumner Redstone. The powder turned out to be harmless.

According to an affidavit by Los Angeles FBI Agent Mary Hogan, the investigation began Sept. 6 when agents in New York were called to the apartment of comedian Jon Stewart and found a threatening letter, postmarked from Santa Clarita with an unknown white powder.

The letter, the affidavit says, included a reference to Alan Berg, a Jewish talk radio host who was assassinated by white supremacists in Denver in 1984.

Three weeks later, FBI agents in New York were called to the apartment of Olbermann, an MSNBC commentator, and found a similarly threatening letter also containing an unknown powder. "There are too many demagogues in America," it read. "All of you are poisoning the well! Time to give your kind a taste of your own medicine."

Subsequent letters were sent to "The Daily Show" host Stewart, Olbermann and Letterman before the first threats were mailed to Redstone's office in New York, Schumer's New York City office, and Pelosi's district office in San Francisco, according to the affidavit. The indictment alleges that six letters were sent to Stewart, four to Olbermann and one each to Letterman, Pelosi, Schumer and Redstone.

During the investigation by the FBI, California Highway Patrol and postal inspectors, authorities determined that a money order in the case was made out to "Friends of Katherine Harris," the former Republican secretary of state in Florida who recently lost a bid for U.S. Senate in that state. That money order, according to the affidavit, was traced to Castagana's address in Woodland Hills.

"It appears the individuals were targeted based on what he described as their liberal politics," Assistant U.S. Atty. Donald Gaffney said Friday after the indictment was returned.

"He described himself as a compulsive voter who voted conservatively or Republican and he did not like the politics of these individuals."

The powder in the envelopes, Gaffney said, turned out to be laundry detergent, household cleansers or other products commonly found in the home.

"We have had a number of cases where we have had these hoaxes, whether it was sending fake anthrax in the mail or making a fake bomb threat to a plane," Gaffney said. "These hoaxes consume an enormous amount of investigative time and energy so we take them very seriously, especially when you are talking about a [threatened] chemical or a biological weapon."

Castagana remains in custody in lieu of $350,000 bail.

Man Indicted In Letters Sent To Celebs (MERCN)

By Jeremiah Marquez

The San Jose Mercury News, December 2, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A man was indicted Friday on charges that he sent more than a dozen threatening letters laced with white powder to celebrities, politicians and other high-profile figures. Chad Conrad Castagana, 39, was being held in federal custody in lieu of $350,000 bail, authorities said.

Prosecutors allege Conrad sent letters bearing fake return addresses to Democratic Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California; comedians Jon Stewart and David Letterman; Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer of New York; MSNBC host Keith Olbermann; and Viacom Inc. Chairman Sumner Redstone.

The powder in the letters was harmless, authorities have said.

Castagana was charged with 14 federal counts of threats and hoaxes, one for each letter he is accused of sending. Each count carries a 5-year sentence.

Alicia Blanco, a public defender who has represented Castagana, did not immediately return a call seeking comment. She has said previously Castagana has no criminal history.

The letters were sent from September to November, according to the indictment. Six were sent to Stewart, four to Olbermann and one each to the other recipients.

In court documents, an FBI agent who questioned Castagana said the letters contained "whatever household items were available such as baking soda, Borax/laundry detergent, and Ajax."

The letters were stuffed inside Ready Post envelopes sold from a Los Angeles post office.

Investigators determined that someone who bought envelopes from that post office also bought a money order, the identification number of which was registered to Castagana. Assistant U.S. Attorney Donald Gaffney said the money order was for a contribution to benefit a political cause for Republican Rep. Katherine Harris of Florida.

Castagana has described himself as a regular voter who favors Republicans, Gaffney said.

The FBI has said federal agents watched Castagana walk from his home to a public mailbox and deposit several letters. One was addressed to someone previously targeted and contained the white powder.

U.S. Gov't Terror Ratings Draw Outrage (AP)

By Michael Sniffin

AP, December 2, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A leader of the new Democratic Congress, business travelers and privacy advocates expressed outrage Friday over the unannounced assignment of terrorism risk assessments to American international travelers by a computerized system managed from an unmarked, two-story brick building in Northern Virginia.

Incoming Senate Judiciary Chairman Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont pledged greater scrutiny of such government database-mining projects after reading that during the past four years millions of Americans have been evaluated without their knowledge to assess the risks that they are terrorists or criminals.

"Data banks like this are overdue for oversight," said Leahy, who will take over Judiciary in January. "That is going to change in the new Congress."

The Associated Press reported Thursday that Americans and foreigners crossing U.S. borders since 2002 have been assessed by the Homeland Security Department's computerized Automated Targeting System, or ATS.

The travelers are not allowed to see or directly challenge these risk assessments, which the government intends to keep on file for 40 years. Some or all data in the system can be shared with state, local and foreign governments for use in hiring, contracting and licensing decisions. Courts and even some private contractors can obtain some of the data under certain circumstances.

"It is simply incredible that the Bush administration is willing to share this sensitive information with foreign governments and even private employers, while refusing to allow U.S. citizens to see or challenge their own terror scores," Leahy said. This system "highlights the danger of government use of technology to conduct widespread surveillance of our daily lives without proper safeguards for privacy."

The concerns spread beyond Congress.

"I have never seen anything as egregious as this," said Kevin Mitchell, president of the Business Travel Coalition, which advocates for business travelers. It's "evidence of what can happen when there isn't proper oversight and accountability."

By late Friday, the government had received 22 written public comments about its after-the-fact disclosure of the program last month in the Federal Register, a fine-print compendium of federal rules. All either opposed it outright or objected to the lack of a direct means for people to correct any errors in the database about themselves.

"As a U.S. citizen who spends much time outside the U.S., I can understand the need for good security," wrote one who identified himself as Colin Edmunds. "However, just as I would not participate in a banking/credit card system where I have no recourse to correct or even view my personal data, I cannot accept the same of my government."

Privacy advocates also were alarmed.

"Never before in American history has our government gotten into the business of creating mass `risk assessment' ratings of its own citizens," said Barry Steinhardt, a lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union. "We are stunned" the program has been undertaken "with virtually no opportunity for the public to evaluate or comment on it."

The Homeland Security Department says the nation's ability to spot criminals and other security threats "would be critically impaired without access to this data."

And on Friday as the normal daily flow of a million or more people entered the United States by air, sea and land, the ATS program's computers continued their silent scrutiny. At that Virginia building with no sign, the managers of the National Targeting Center allowed an Associated Press photographer to briefly roam their work space.

But he couldn't reveal the building's exact location. None of the dozens of workers under the bright fluorescent lights could be named. Some could not be photographed.

The only clue he might have entered a government building was a montage of photos in the reception area of President Bush's visit to the center. But there was only one guard and a sign-in book.

Inside, red digital clocks on the walls showed the time in Istanbul, Baghdad, Islamabad, Bangkok, Singapore, Tokyo, and Sydney. Although billboard-size video screens on the walls showed multiple cable news shows, there was little noise in the basketball-court-sized main workroom. Each desk had dual computer screens and earphones to hear the video soundtrack. Conferences were held in smaller workrooms divided by glass walls from the windowless main room.

Round the clock, the targeters from Homeland Security's Customs and Border Protection agency analyze information from multiple sources, not just ATS. They compare names to terrorist watch lists and mine the Treasury Enforcement Communications System and other automated systems that bring data about cargo, travelers and commercial workers entering or leaving the 317 U.S. ports, searching for suspicious people and cargo.

Almost every person entering and leaving the United States by air, sea or land is assessed based on ATS' analysis of their travel records and other data, including items such as where they are from, how they paid for tickets, their motor vehicle records, past one-way travel, seating preference and what kind of meal they ordered.

Government officials could not say whether ATS has apprehended any terrorists. Based on all the information available to them, federal agents turn back about 45 foreign criminals a day at U.S. borders, according to Homeland Security's Customs and Border Protection spokesman Bill Anthony. He could not say how many were spotted by ATS.

Officials described how the system works: applying rules learned from experience with the activities and characteristics of terrorists and criminals to the traveler data. But they would not describe in detail the format in which border agents see the results or in which the databases store the results of the ATS risk assessments.

Acting Assistant Homeland Security Secretary Paul Rosenzweig told reporters Friday they could call it scoring. "It can be reduced to a number," he said, but he clearly preferred the longer description about how the rules are used.

Times Asks End To Suit On Anthrax Inquiry (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis, David Johnston

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1 — The New York Times filed a motion with a federal judge on Friday asking him to dismiss a suit by a germ-warfare scientist who said a series of columns by Nicholas D. Kristof about the deadly anthrax mailings of 2001 defamed him.

The scientist, Stephen J. Hatfill, who formerly worked in the Army laboratories at Fort Detrick, Md., has said Mr. Kristof's columns about the slow pace of the anthrax investigation defamed him because they suggested that he was responsible for the attacks.

In the motion filed Friday, lawyers for The Times asked Judge Claude M. Hilton of Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va., to dismiss the suit. The motion said Dr. Hatfill was a public figure because of his role in administering bioterrorism programs and speaking publicly about the issue.

As a public figure, The Times's lawyers argued, Dr. Hatfill has a high burden to establish that he was defamed, including showing that the newspaper knowingly conveyed the idea that he was responsible for the attacks.

"No evidence indicates that The Times ever intended to imply plaintiff was in fact guilty of the anthrax mailings, and overwhelming evidence exists to the contrary," the filing said.

The pleading also said that Dr. Hatfill could not demonstrate that the columns were published with "actual malice," a standard for defaming public figures, because Mr. Kristof did not know whether Dr. Hatfill was responsible for the attacks, only that he was worthy of investigation.

Dr. Hatfill's lawyers are scheduled to file a response this month in which they may well argue that he is not a public figure.

The legal papers filed by The Times included dozens of exhibits that made public for the first time internal F.B.I. memorandums about the inquiry, along with e-mail messages sent to and from Mr. Kristof.

One undated memorandum, apparently prepared to answer questions posed by the Senate Judiciary Committee, appears to have been written in the fall of 2002. It said that investigators interviewed Dr. Hatfill on four occasions in 2002 and that he consented to a polygraph examination in January 2002. Subsequently, the memorandum said, he declined additional polygraph examinations.

Another memorandum from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, dated Dec. 3, 2001, showed how the bureau investigated "persons of interest" in the case. The memorandum said the bureau had a three-tier system. Some people would "deserve the most active investigative attention" and others would be "screened out of consideration by the most reasonable and expedient manner available to include an interview."

A brief in support of the motion to dismiss the case was also filed Friday, but its contents were not made public because it included material that parties in the case agreed to keep sealed. In addition, volumes of supplementary exhibits were filed but not released. The brief and some of the exhibits could be made public as early as Monday.

Five people died in the anthrax attacks. Although the federal authorities identified Dr. Hatfill as a "person of interest" in the case, they have not charged him with any crimes.

Mr. Kristof wrote about a government scientist he initially referred to as Mr. Z, saying he had become the overwhelming focus of the investigation. In August 2002, Mr. Kristof wrote that Dr. Hatfill had acknowledged that he was Mr. Z at a news conference in which he said the news media had mistreated him.

The case was initially dismissed by a trial judge who said the columns did not defame Dr. Hatfill but merely reported on the investigation. An appeals court reversed that ruling, saying a jury should decide the issue of defamation.

After the case went back to the trial court, a federal judge magistrate ruled that The Times had no basis to refuse to identify all of Mr. Kristof's confidential sources. After The Times refused to identify two F.B.I. officials who were among the many sources, Magistrate Judge Liam O'Grady, also in Alexandria, ruled last month that The Times could not rely in any way on information from those sources in defending against Dr. Hatfill's suit.

Kafka And Katrina (NYT)

One of the many victims of Hurricane Katrina may turn out to be the hospitality that American cities, particularly Houston, showed to people fleeing the storm. Thanks largely to the Bush administration's catastrophic handling of the relocation crisis, Houston endured much more civic strain than it should have in caring for the tens of thousands of Louisianans who landed on its doorstep.

The administration's mishandling of the crisis has often looked like a calculated attempt to discourage displaced people from seeking housing aid, even if it means leaving them vulnerable to homelessness. A federal district court judge implied as much this week, when he found that the Federal Emergency Management Agency's aid application process was so convoluted and confusing as to be unconstitutional — and likened it to something out of a horror story by Kafka.

Judge Richard Leon ruled that FEMA had unconstitutionally denied housing aid to thousands of residents who were displaced by hurricanes Katrina and Rita. He ordered the government to resume payments immediately, pointing to blind alleys and contradictory information that often led vulnerable families to lose aid without understanding why or having reasonable recourse to appeal.

In Houston, people are at least being housed now in apartments rather than remote trailer camps where other displaced Louisianans have now been trapped for more than a year . But throughout this saga, FEMA has whipsawed the survivors and their host communities with unpredictable policy changes that have hindered the resettlement process and kept everyone on edge. Despite those obstacles, many have managed to get on their feet.

But Houston must still worry about impoverished and hard-to-employ refugees who represent an enormous burden in health care, law enforcement and education costs. City officials also say that the federal government has been unpredictably late and tightfisted with badly needed aid.

The administration made its most disastrous misstep when it failed to enlist the Department of Housing and Urban Development, which was created to deal with just these kinds of situations. If the administration had provided Section 8 housing vouchers through HUD, families could have been directed to affordable housing all over the country. No one city would have been asked to absorb tens of thousands of people.

Congress needs to make sure that its housing application process is rendered intelligible. But it needs to go much further. It has to make sure that the survivors who qualify are given aid through programs like Section 8 that allow them to pick up their lives quickly, and that there will be no more Houstons in the American history of disaster response.

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Plan Strives To Bridge Divide (WP)

By Peter Baker, Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

The emerging plan by the Iraq Study Group tries to find a middle road between President Bush's adamant refusal to leave Iraq until the job is done and Democratic demands to pull out U.S. troops. But in achieving unanimity among its Republican and Democratic members, the commission has outlined a strategy with its own political and military risks.

If they choose, leaders in both parties could embrace the plan in the interest of putting aside the polarizing differences of the past three years. This post-election moment, many say, presents the best and perhaps last chance for consensus. And some military experts say the commission's plan to pull out combat units by early 2008 and shift remaining troops into a supporting role may be a logical response to the sectarian violence.

But there are already signs of discord over the plan, as Bush on one side and the fiercest war opponents on the other stake out positions suggesting they may not come together after all. Some military and diplomatic veterans warn that the commission's plan may not be the magic solution so many hope for. It could, they say, even open the door to a broader and ever more brutal civil war between radical Shiite and Sunni forces competing for power in the resulting vacuum.

Even before its release next week, the report, which comes after the midterm elections and Bush's subsequent dismissal of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, has taken on an enormous role in the debate in Washington because leaders in both parties are eager for a resolution of the war. The fact that the five Republicans and five Democrats on the congressionally chartered commission all supported the recommendations has sparked hope that the report could bridge the debate over the war.

The details that have leaked out so far arguably contain something for both sides, depending on interpretation. The commission's recommendation to pull out combat units by early 2008 seems to track Democratic plans for a phased withdrawal. But the report, according to sources familiar with it, also says commanders should decide whether such a pullout is feasible, which echoes Bush's insistence that troop levels be determined by conditions on the ground rather than by an artificial timeline.

The question then becomes whether the sides will focus on elements of the plan they support and declare it acceptable, or dwell on differences and reject it. With a new defense secretary coming in, the administration conducting its own policy review and Democrats, soon to be the majority party in Congress, taking some ownership of the issue, some see hope.

"The political stars may be aligned in the right way," said a senior administration official, who discussed the politically sensitive subject on the condition of anonymity. "Prevailing in Iraq is in the national interest . . . and I think people on both sides of the aisle know that, so there is an opening there. Probably more than any time in recent times, we've got a chance for the two parties to come together and adopt a common approach to Iraq."

So far, though, Bush's language suggests he is resisting. During a trip to the Middle East to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki this week, he stuck by his position that remaining in Iraq is important and scoffed at the notion of a "graceful exit." Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a leader of the antiwar forces in Congress, yesterday called the Iraq Study Group's plan "unacceptable to me" because it would not withdraw troops immediately. "If it depends on circumstances on the ground, it's not a lot different than what President Bush is saying," he said on CNN.

Richard N. Haass, a former top Bush State Department official who now heads the Council on Foreign Relations, said expectations that the Iraq Study Group can solve the problem have grown too high. "The idea that the ISG is going to deliver a report and the administration's going to say, 'Thank you very much' and substitute it for U.S. foreign policy is not realistic," he said in a recent interview.

The commission, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), plans to recommend that the U.S. military mission shift to advising, training and supporting Iraqi forces, who would take the lead in securing their country. As part of that, U.S. soldiers would increasingly embed with Iraqi troops to guide them.

"Baker-Hamilton is doable, and is probably the course we would have followed anyway," said retired Army Col. Robert Killebrew, a military strategist and Vietnam War veteran. But he said the outcome in Iraq may largely be determined before the recommendations can be implemented. Within a year or so, he predicted, Iraqi security forces either will be able to hold their own or will have fallen apart.

Retired Army Lt. Gen. Jay M. Garner, the first head of the U.S. occupation effort in Iraq, said that he has long advocated a more robust training effort but that it could be dangerous to withdraw combat troops before building up that program. "The moment you start pulling troops out, Maliki will hedge his bets by crawling up closer to al-Sadr," he said, referring to radical Shiite cleric and militia leader Moqtada al-Sadr.

And those troops who remain in a diminished role may face new risks. "To scatter troops around amongst the Iraqis sounds like a low-profile way to keep some presence on the ground, but that will backfire the moment a captured trainer shows up on one of those Islamic kill videos on the Internet," said military historian James Bartlett. "Then we'll hear cries to pull them out as well."

Experts debated whether the plan resembled the "Vietnamization" program that the United States used to get out of the Vietnam War, gradually withdrawing its combat forces. "It does look like Vietnamization to me," said James H. Willbanks, who was an adviser to the Vietnamese army and has written histories of the time, including "Abandoning Vietnam." In Iraq, he said, "my fear is that there will be a precipitous pullout while leaving advisers holding the bag."

But Terry Daly, a counterinsurgency expert who also served in Vietnam, said he thinks the Iraq plan has little in common with Vietnamization because the situation in Iraq is far more dire. "Vietnam had a functioning government, even though it was corrupt and inefficient," he said.

Some say it is too late for the United States to determine the outcome of the war in Iraq either way. "For all the excitement in Washington, this will be decided on the ground in Baghdad," said Richard C. Holbrooke, the former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations who brokered the Dayton peace accords, which ended the Bosnian war in the 1990s. "The United States has lost its capacity to shape the events on the ground, regardless of what's recommended by the commission, regardless of what's done by the U.S. military and the president."

Study Group To Echo Bush (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

President Bush and the Iraq Study Group are not far apart when it comes to a final plan for getting U.S. troops out of Iraq.

A senior commander in Iraq said yesterday the group's idea to shift more duties to Iraqis and gradually pull out forces is current Pentagon policy.

"It certainly reflects what we're doing now," Army Maj. Gen. Benjamin Mixon, who commands U.S. forces in northern Iraq, told reporters at the Pentagon when asked to comment on the study group. "I can certainly see great opportunity to reduce the amount of combat forces on the ground in Multinational Division North and turn more responsibility over to Iraqi security forces."

Noting that it took time to train an army in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Gen. Mixon added, "We need to allow the Iraqis the same time to get their security forces on the ground, to get their government working and then have a gradual withdrawal of American security forces, but continue to partner with them over the long term."

Meanwhile in Baghdad yesterday, the Associated Press reported that U.S. and Iraqi forces launched six raids against insurgents, including one that killed at least three Iraqis in house-to-house fighting and another in which American forces wounded a female Iraqi who the U.S. command said was being used as a "human shield."

In some of the fiercest fighting, Iraqi soldiers backed by U.S. helicopters swept through Fadhil, one of Baghdad's oldest areas, in house-to-house combat, police Lt. Ali Muhsin said.

Concerning the Iraq Study Group report expected Wednesday, Mr. Bush opposes an immediate troop pullout, as some Democrats have suggested. He is also against a date-certain timeline for bringing out the current 15 brigades, unit by unit, as Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, is pushing.

On those two points, the study group essentially agrees with Mr. Bush.

It does, however, seek a goal of 18 months to pull out most combat troops, leaving support units for the Iraqi army and police. But it says the withdrawal could be delayed because of battlefield conditions. Mr. Bush has said conditions in the war should dictate a gradual withdrawal, not a rigid timeline.

Nonetheless, the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, Indiana Democrat, does put more pressure on the White House to act. The Pentagon, State Department and National Security Council are doing their own strategy reviews.

The study group's idea is similar to a plan announced in October by Army Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq. He said he was accelerating the training of Iraq's 300,000-plus army and police forces and targeting mid-2008 as the time they would take over the security "lead" in all 18 Iraqi provinces.

Gen. Casey did not say specifically the takeover would lead to U.S. troops coming home. But Army Gen. John Abizaid, the regional commander, told Congress last month that the idea is for a gradual withdrawal of U.S. forces. And, instead of 18 months, said he thought the handoff could be achieved in late 2007.

A defense source told The Washington Times this week that the Joint Chiefs of Staff oppose a pullout now and a date-certain timeline for withdrawals.

"Under the current circumstances, I would not recommend troop withdrawals," Gen. Abizaid told the Senate Armed Services Committee last month.

A second defense source said some Democratic Iraq Study Group members wanted specific timelines and numbers, but Republicans did not want to go against the president. To gain a 10-0 vote, the group reached a compromise for staged withdrawal if conditions are met.

Meanwhile, Gen. Mixon explained how Gen. Casey's plan is working. Gen. Mixon said that within four months, he will turn over lead security duties to four Iraqi army divisions in the six provinces under his control. That shift, he said, should result in fewer American soldiers in Iraq next summer.

"There will be decisions made, I'm sure above my level, where we may see a reduction in the numbers of forces that are on the ground," Gen. Mixon said, adding there would be an increase in U.S. trainers.

As a comparison, he said in May only half of 40 Iraqi battalions could conduct counterinsurgency missions with little support from Americans. Today, the number is 35.

Gen. Mixon did not dodge the poor security situation. He singled out Diyala province as the worst, saying it is infested with al Qaeda terrorists, criminals and Sunni and Shi'ite gangs that take turns killing each other and civilians.

"This has locked Diyala into a cycle of sectarian violence," he said.

Iraq A Plethora Of Plans About What's Next (WSJ)

By Gerald F. Seib

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

When an independent commission led by former Secretary of State James Baker issues its report Wednesday, the event is likely to be portrayed as the end of a broad review of the mess in Iraq.

In reality, the long-awaited Baker report will be only the beginning of a Washington rethink.

Though the Baker group has soaked up all the attention, several other efforts to devise a new approach in Iraq are under way, some perhaps equally important. Inside the Pentagon, a team of three colonels has been outlining a series of options for Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The group, which has been working since October, is likely to continue to meet through mid- to late December.

While the outside panel led by Mr. Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton is expected to call for a gradual redeployment of American forces in Iraq, Gen. Pace's group has looked far more favorably on temporarily increasing the size of the U.S. force in Baghdad in an effort to get the city under control. It also is pushing a far more robust program of American military advisers in the hopes that improving the competence of Iraqi Army forces will allow a reduction in U.S. troops.

More intriguingly, President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, has been quietly canvassing around Washington for advice about where to go next in Iraq. With Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld gone, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice increasingly drawn to a broader effort to revive Arab-Israeli peace talks, Mr. Hadley is emerging as a kind of presidential fix-it man on Iraq.

Then, of course, the new Democratic majority in Congress is about to try to put its own stamp on Iraq policy. There is no one Democratic plan for Iraq. But the approach that probably has attracted the most support is one put forth by Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, who is about to become chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. Sen. Levin proposes that the U.S. tell Iraq that it will begin a phased withdrawal within four to six months, a step that would be accompanied by a much more intense effort to train Iraqi security forces and an international conference to generate support for a political settlement within Iraq.

The Baker group has strained to portray its coming report as a statement of bipartisan "consensus" about what to do in Iraq. But whether there really is a consensus within Washington, or only a cacophony of divergent voices, will be clear only when these other juries are in. It isn't obvious yet that there is agreement on even the most basic steps -- whether the number of American troops should go up or down in the short run, for example, or whether talking directly to Iran and Syria about their role in Iraq is wise.

The risk for the White House is that the situation could shift rapidly from too few ideas on Iraq to too many disjointed ones.

Officials Expect No Big Changes, No Matter What Panel Advises (WP)

By Robin Wright

With the Iraq Study Group report due on Wednesday, the Bush administration has notified allies that it will not budge on certain aspects of Iraq policy, whatever recommendations are put forth by the independent panel of 10 prominent Republicans and Democrats.

At a private briefing for diplomats this past Wednesday, State Department and National Security Council officials said they do not expect any major policy shifts to emerge from either a White House review or the bipartisan panel, led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), according to diplomats familiar with the meeting. The diplomats spoke on the condition of anonymity because the briefing was private.

The officials also said any recommendations for policy shifts would have to fit in with long-term U.S. strategic objectives for Iraq, including ensuring that the nation can govern and defend itself and that it is stable, not a threat to neighbors, and an ally in the fight against terrorism.

In a further indication that the White House may be digging in its heels, the U.S. officials told the diplomats that President Bush looks forward to seeing the Iraq Study Group report, but they stressed that he will have the last word on what happens next and will not succumb to outside pressure, the sources said.

On the study group's reported recommendation of a withdrawal of most combat troops by early 2008, the U.S. officials said that any withdrawal would depend on conditions on the ground -- and that they would resist the imposition of an arbitrary date.

Anticipating a recommendation that Washington should adopt a regional approach to the Iraq crisis, however, the officials told the diplomats that the administration might be interested in pressing for action on the Arab-Israeli dispute as a way of defusing Arab anger and showing peaceful U.S. intent in the region.

Iraq Panel Co-chairmen Face Uphill Task (AP)

By Hope Yen

WASHINGTON - One is a Bush family loyalist who served four presidents and guided George W. Bush to legal victory in the disputed 2000 election. The other is a resolute Democrat, a 34-year congressman who steered a divided 9/11 commission to unanimity.

Former GOP Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., are known as two of Washington's age-old fixers - wise men who can rise above the fray in critical moments of history.

As co-chairmen of a 10-member bipartisan panel on Iraq, Baker, 76, and Hamilton, 75, face a Herculean task of extricating the U.S. from an increasingly unpopular war. Preliminary details of their unanimous report, which calls for a gradual troop pullback without setting firm timetables and more regional diplomacy, are already generating fire from some Democrats in Congress, while President Bush is deriding the notion of a graceful exit as having "no realism to it whatsoever."

Ultimately, it may be the co-chairmen's diplomatic powers and cache of bipartisan goodwill that bring disgruntled players together over a conflict that has killed more than 2,880 Americans and many more Iraqis, cost taxpayers more than $300 billion and left Iraq near civil war.

Their long-awaited 100-page report will be released Wednesday.

"Americans are waiting for them to come down from Mt. Sinai bearing tablets of the law," said Steven Simon, an expert on Middle East relations at the Council on Foreign Relations. "But it's not so much what they bring to the table. It's more about who they are.

"They may serve as a kind of deus ex machina that provides a path to a resolution," he said.

The co-chairs have no illusions about their mission.

"This war has split the American people very badly," Hamilton typically says in interviews. "What has to happen here, no matter what you do, is a lot of things have to go right. And I don't know if a lot of things can go right."

"We're not going to wring our hands over the past," adds Baker, a longtime friend and tennis partner of the first President Bush who has criticized the current president's military strategy. "We're here, what do we do now?"

The Iraq Study Group, whose formation was spurred last year by Rep. Frank Wolf, R-Va., began with little notice in March. Wolf said the goal was to provide a "fresh look" at U.S. policies in Iraq.

The members include five Republicans and five Democrats - Baker, retired Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, former Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger, former Attorney General Edwin Meese and former Sen. Alan Simpson; and

Hamilton, former Clinton aide Leon Panetta, lobbyist Vernon Jordan, former Defense Secretary William Perry and former Sen. Charles Robb of Virginia.

In the beginning, some Republicans hoped the group's cache could foster support for Bush's "stay the course" strategy.

Now, with voters restive over growing sectarian violence and rising U.S. casualties, both parties are looking to the commission for political cover as a wide-open 2008 presidential race begins.

Enter Baker, a Houston lawyer who started a life in politics 36 years ago to run the unsuccessful Senate campaign of the elder George Bush.

Baker is no stranger to foreign affairs: as a former secretary of State under the elder Bush, he presided over the end of the Cold War and organized the U.S., European and Arab coalition that supported the U.S. invasion of Iraq in the 1990-91 Gulf War.

He also served in three administrations as undersecretary of Commerce (Ford), secretaries of Treasury (Reagan) and State (the elder Bush) as well as White House chief of staff (Reagan and the elder Bush). He then delivered the White House to the younger Bush in the disputed 2000 election.

Baker's influence with the younger Bush is murky. Baker argued against ousting Saddam Hussein in 1991 and isn't shy about saying the current administration made "costly mistakes" in the Mideast. Bush, meanwhile, has made clear the White House will conduct its own crash policy review on Iraq.

Still, friends say Baker's loyal service remains an undeniable asset.

"Jim is someone who is affable and fun, but very focused when the time comes," said former Commerce Secretary Robert Mosbacher, a fellow Texan who is a close friend of Baker and the Bush family. He described Baker as a "Mr. Reliable" who time and again got the job done under extraordinary pressure.

"In my view, there isn't any magic bullet here. But if anyone can find one, he can," said Mosbacher, 79.

It is spring 2004, and Hamilton, a bespectacled man with a 50s-style crew cut, is helping lead a meeting of the Sept. 11 commission. That day, members are in a heated discussion about particularly contentious topics: Iraq and a former counterterror chief's charge that the Bush administration ignored the al-Qaida threat.

Tempers flare, and members threaten to leave. But Hamilton, the panel's vice chairman, stands up, regaling the group with stories of his early days in Congress when bipartisanship was king. Soon enough, the members calm down and are back to work.

"When you go into a discussion, he is always prepared, always has his own opinion but is always looking for the middle ground," said former Republican New Jersey Gov. Thomas Kean, who chaired the 9/11 panel. "It is very very difficult to reach consensus. But with Lee, it was always a pleasure."

Hamilton has plenty of experience to draw on. First elected in 1965, he later became chairman of the House Foreign Affairs and Intelligence committees. He quickly established a reputation for independence, breaking with Democratic President Lyndon Johnson in 1967 to sponsor the first amendments to scale back the U.S. presence in Vietnam.

He also co-chaired the committee that investigated the Iran-Contra scandal and was influential in bipartisan talks between the White House and Congress on issues such as the U.S. deployment in Lebanon.

Bernard Aronson, who as former assistant secretary of state served under Baker and worked with Hamilton in Congress, said the two co-chairmen share a common bond of pragmatism. While that approach might balance competing political interests, it risks pleasing no one.

"There are no good choices, given where we are," Aronson said. "They're trying to reach some consensus to avoid a disaster, a debacle. But the danger with that is they will be criticized from both the left and right."

Bush To Meet With Head Of Iraq Shiite Party (NYT)

By David E. Sanger, Edward Wong

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1 — The White House said Friday that President Bush would meet next week with Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the head of one of the most powerful Shiite parties in Iraq, the latest step in a burst of new administration attempts to try different approaches to bolstering the fragile Iraqi government.

The effort is part of a White House strategy that calls for reaching out to a wider circle of Iraqi politicians to give greater support to the weak government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, and lessen his dependence on Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric.

But it immerses Washington even deeper into Baghdad's byzantine coalition politics, and it risks being interpreted in Baghdad as a sign that Mr. Bush is hedging his bets.

"If you think Maliki may not survive," said one senior administration official, "you'd want to make sure that the president is talking to the guy who might well form the next government."

Mr. Hakim heads a party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, that is closely tied to Iran, so much so that just a few years ago, Washington shunned it. The party, usually referred to by its acronym, Sciri, was founded in Iran and its armed wing, the Badr Brigade, fought against Iraq in the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980s.

The meeting comes at a time when the administration is overhauling its approach to dealing with Iraq's leadership, though there are arguments over how deeply Washington can involve itself in the politics of a country in such political turmoil. One question is whether to tilt American support more heavily toward the majority Shiite government, rather than the minority Sunnis.

A senior Pentagon official said Friday that the Bush administration was also weighing whether to back away from efforts to reach out to Sunni extremists because the approach had not worked, and was alienating moderate Shiite groups.

But other administration officials insisted in interviews on Friday that they were not abandoning two years of efforts at reconciliation with the Sunnis, including former backers of Saddam Hussein.

Several officials involved in the many-layered internal discussions within the administration described its complex calculations about how to engage the various rivals in Baghdad; their common theme was that the White House needed to preserve its flexibility at a time of great flux in the administration's policy, but none claimed to have a definitive explanation or would agree to be identified.

On Wednesday, Mr. Bush will receive the report of the Iraq Study Group, which includes a diplomatic strategy that calls on Mr. Bush to reverse policy and deal with the Iranians in an effort to stabilize Iraq. By meeting Mr. Hakim, Mr. Bush has a chance to open a channel to the Iranians and to pre-empt the study group's criticism that he has been too slow to deal with American rivals in the region. Or, he could try to woo Mr. Hakim away from Tehran.

While administration officials suggested it was Mr. Hakim who sought the meeting, Mr. Hakim's son, Amar al-Hakim, said in a telephone interview that the invitation came from Mr. Bush. The elder Hakim will discuss the Iraq situation with the president, conduct negotiations and visit Iraqis living in the United States, his son said, but he declined to talk in more detail. When asked whether Mr. Hakim was going to discuss matters related to Iran, with which Mr. Hakim has very close ties, his son said, "They're only talking about Iraqi matters."

The announcement of Mr. Hakim's visit comes as the administration and American commanders are trying to get Mr. Maliki to distance himself from Mr. Sadr, whose militia, the Mahdi Army, has rebelled twice against the Americans and is widening the country's sectarian rift through the killings of Sunni Arabs.

Mr. Maliki is beholden to Mr. Sadr because he lacks Mr. Hakim's support. The Maliki-Sadr alliance was forged last spring when the religious Shiite coalition, which dominates the 275-member Parliament, held an internal vote to pick a candidate for prime minister. Mr. Sadr, who controls 30 seats in Parliament, threw his votes behind Mr. Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party, to keep Mr. Hakim's candidate from the top job. Mr. Sadr and Mr. Hakim are fierce rivals, stretching back to the days when their fathers, both prominent clerics, competed for influence.

Mr. Hakim ceded the fight, mostly because the senior Shiite ayatollahs in Najaf, led by Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, have stressed the importance of unity to Shiite politicians.

The American reasoning, mentioned last month in a memorandum to Mr. Bush from his national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, was that if Mr. Hakim backed Mr. Maliki, then Mr. Maliki would not need Mr. Sadr. Mr. Hakim and Mr. Sadr, controlling 30 parliamentary seats each, have equal power in the Shiite coalition. While Mr. Hakim's party is well organized, Mr. Sadr commands much greater popular support.

Though Mr. Hakim may want to undermine Mr. Sadr's power, there are indications that he still wants his party to hold the position of prime minister, and so he might balk at supporting Mr. Maliki. In a recent interview, Mr. Hakim's candidate for prime minister, Adel Abdul Mehdi, now a vice president, criticized Mr. Maliki's soft approach to the problem of the Mahdi Army.

"The government should say they are going to take things into their own hands," Mr. Abdul Mehdi said. "If it's not going to, it should say, 'I am weak,' " and, he implied, step aside for another Shiite leader.

American commanders rarely mention Mr. Hakim's Badr Organization as a threat. In the first couple of years after the American invasion, many Sunni Arabs complained of abductions and killings by both it and the Mahdi Army. These days, the Sunnis and the Americans attribute militia violence almost exclusively to the Mahdi Army. Both Mr. Hakim and the Sunni leaders see Mr. Sadr as the biggest threat right now, and though they distrust each other deeply, they could decide to work together to oust Mr. Sadr.

Next month, President Bush is scheduled to meet with Tariq al-Hashemi, the Sunni Arab vice president and leader of the most powerful Sunni Arab party, a senior administration official said. Mr. Hashemi is a religious conservative and fiercely pro-Sunni. His political group, the Iraqi Islamic Party, often issues reports of atrocities by Shiite militants.

A wild card in any power struggle among the Shiites would be Ayatollah Sistani. The elderly cleric has generally remained silent in recent months, apparently reluctant to involve himself too deeply in the political quagmire of Iraq. But if it looked like a severe Shiite split might take place, the ayatollah could step in and force the parties to make peace.

This week, though, Ayatollah Sistani said nothing when Mr. Sadr withdrew officials loyal to him — 30 parliamentarians and six ministers — from Mr. Maliki's government. Baha al-Aaraji, a leader of the parliamentarians, said the Sadr officials would not return until Mr. Maliki had wrested more control of Iraqi forces from the Americans and improved basic services. In a news conference after his meeting with Mr. Bush, Mr. Maliki urged the Sadr followers to rejoin the government.

Bush Set To Meet Iraqi Shiite Leader With Ties To Iran (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — One day after returning from Middle East meetings that defined anew the depths of his administration's problems in Iraq, President Bush invited two key Iraqi leaders to the White House in the coming weeks, expanding his contacts among the Shiite and Sunni Arab communities.

Bush plans to meet Monday with Abdelaziz Hakim, leader of one of the main two parties in the United Iraqi Alliance, the majority Shiite Muslim governing bloc, and in January with Iraqi Vice President Tariq Hashimi, the head of the largest party representing Iraq's Sunni Muslim minority.

The meetings, following the president's session Thursday in Amman, Jordan, with Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, a Shiite, reflect the many factions often working at cross-purposes in Iraq and the difficulty the Bush administration faces as it seeks to gain cooperation from competing power centers and sects.

Hashimi was chosen to fill the Sunni seat in a power-sharing arrangement that puts Sunni Arabs and Kurds in senior government positions under Maliki.

In the last seven months, Hashimi has lost a sister and a brother to Iraq's civil war.

Hakim heads the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI. It was established in Iran in 1982, providing a political home for Iraqi Shiite exiles there during the rule of Saddam Hussein, which favored Sunnis. SCIRI today is part of the United Iraqi Alliance.

Hakim will be part of a delegation of Iraqi politicians visiting the United States.

Given his role in SCIRI, his meeting with Bush represents a reaching out to a leader with ties to Iran, even as the administration steadfastly refuses to deal directly with the government in Tehran.

Members of an armed wing of Hakim's organization, the Badr Brigade, have been accused of engaging in criminal activity under the cover of official Iraqi security forces.

But Hakim, a Shiite cleric, is thought to follow a more mainstream approach.

He is scheduled to visit Bush shortly before the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, an Indiana Democrat, is expected to make public a report proposing shifts in the administration's Iraq policy.

Gordon D. Johndroe, spokesman for the White House National Security Council, noted that Bush had met with other senior Iraqi officials during tours of Washington.

He said Bush was "not specifically looking for anything from them," but that he wanted "to hear how they see things in Iraq."

U.S. Rethinking Iraqi Unification Goal (AP)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, December 2, 2006

The Bush administration is re-evaluating its efforts to unite Iraq's fractious sectarian and political factions in an attempt to preserve U.S. options in Iraq no matter what happens, officials familiar with an internal administration review of Iraq policy said Friday.

A senior U.S. official said that as part of that examination, the administration has debated whether to abandon U.S. efforts to bring Sunni insurgents into the political process to stabilize Iraq and instead leave that outreach to the majority Shiites and Iraq's third major group, the Kurds. No decision has been made.

Some U.S. officials have argued that the outreach to Sunni dissidents has failed and may be alienating Shiites, who dominate the government and are the country's largest sect.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the debate, said senior State Department officials have countered that ending U.S. attempts to increase the Sunni stake in government would leave the root causes of the insurgency unaddressed. Opponents of the strategy say that it could also appear the United States is taking sides in Iraq's sectarian divide and could alienate close U.S. allies in the region.

The administration has watched as its stated goal of helping the Iraqis erect a model democracy grew increasingly remote this year. Sectarian violence has intensified and thousands of Iraqis have fled their neighborhoods or left the country to escape tit-for-tat killings and kidnappings.

The administration's internal review may recommend a revamped U.S. approach that focuses less on the major Shiite and Sunni political factions in the Baghdad government and more on identifying U.S. interests across a diffuse power structure and reducing the U.S. role as middleman in some of the most contentious Iraqi political fights.

The administration also does not plan to alter its strategy of isolating adversaries Iran and Syria, despite mounting pressure to enlist those influential Middle East nations in a diplomatic push to stabilize Iraq, officials said. They spoke on condition of anonymity because the internal review is still under way.

Leaders of the internal administration review presented their incomplete conclusions to Bush on Sunday. A final report is expected in about two weeks and will reflect the views of senior officials at the State Department, White House National Security Council, Pentagon and other agencies.

The group's work parallels that of a congressionally chartered bipartisan commission whose recommendations are due next week. The commission, known as the Iraq Study Group, will recommend engaging Iran and Syria as part of a larger group and perhaps one-on-one, officials familiar with the panel's findings have said.

The Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, D-Ind., will also recommend gradually phasing out the mission of U.S. troops in Iraq from combat to training and supporting Iraqi units. However, the report due Wednesday sets no timetable, according to officials familiar with the group's deliberations.

Expanding on previous reports that the commission would urge troop withdrawals beginning early next year, a U.S. official said the report also recommends a "conditions-based" goal of completing combat troop withdrawals by early 2008. That is short of a firm timetable, and would leave in place troops needed to train and support the Iraqis.

The commander of coalition forces in northern Iraq said Friday that four Iraqi army divisions in his area will be put under Baghdad's control by next March.

"I can certainly see great opportunity to reduce the amount of combat forces on the ground" in the north "and turn more responsibility over to Iraqi security forces," Maj. Gen. Benjamin Mixon told Pentagon reporters in a videoconference from his headquarters near Tikrit.

Some U.S. commanders in Iraq already are shifting some troops from combat to support roles while giving the Iraqi Defense Ministry more control over Iraq troops.

Bush repeatedly has rejected a wholesale troop withdrawal or what he calls artificial deadlines. There are about 140,000 American troops are in Iraq.

Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice are to meet Monday in Washington with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite politicians, in a bid to find a new approach. One official said the president will meet in Washington in January with a Sunni leader — Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi.

Maliki Criticized As Violence Flares (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

BAGHDAD — Violence flared in the Iraqi capital Friday, adding to sectarian tensions as raids and shootings erupted in the streets and bombs exploded in crowded marketplaces.

Throughout the day, Iraqi and U.S. troops conducted raids and traded gunfire with insurgents, including a daylong raid in Baghdad's Fadhil neighborhood, a Sunni Muslim area.

Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has attempted to reassert his authority in recent weeks, confronting U.S. leaders, demanding more control over national security and weighing plans to reconfigure his Cabinet. In a meeting with President Bush on Thursday, Maliki had promised that Iraqi security forces would be able to protect citizens without U.S. military support by June.

But Iraqi leaders and citizens were skeptical Friday that the prime minister could fight the rising tide of civil war.

Abdelaziz Hakim, leader of Iraq's largest Shiite Muslim party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, attempted to reach out to opponents Friday, speaking at a mosque in neighboring Jordan and appealing to Sunnis for national unity.

The week before, Hakim had warned Sunnis that they would suffer most if Iraq's civil war worsened. This time, he appealed for an end to violence. "All of us, Sunnis and Shiites, should stand in the way of this sickness that is manifesting [itself in] the body of our nation," he said. Hakim is scheduled to meet with Bush in Washington on Monday.

On Friday, however, those gathering at mosques across Iraq, Sunni and Shiite, said they saw Maliki's meeting with Bush as largely unproductive, and yet another sign their country was falling apart.

"The wicked American administration is the basic reason for these seditions happening among our peoples," Sheik Abdul Zahra Swaidi told worshipers at Hikma Mosque in Sadr City, the capital's largest Shiite neighborhood, where car bombs killed more than 150 people last week. Iraqi officials must choose between loyalty to the U.S. government and to the Iraqi people, he added. If they choose the U.S., he said, they can expect more rebellion.

Sheik Abdullah Hassan, a Sunni preacher in Fallouja, told worshipers the Iraqi government had become dysfunctional, its leaders divided by ethnic and religious ties and under the sway of foreign powers.

"We have reached a point where we are required to tell the government that you have failed to provide services and security to Iraqis," he said. " … What I see is that the politicians are helping the occupier and putting their hands between the hands of foreigners to create sectarian sedition."

Iraq's Interior Ministry reported Friday that 1,862 civilians had been killed in violence in November. The figure is based on deaths registered at police stations and morgues. United Nations figures put the civilian death toll higher.

On Friday, at least 14 more Iraqi civilians were killed across the country in sectarian violence, including a woman who was used as a human shield by insurgents in Baghdad and two people killed by a suicide bomber in the northern city of Kirkuk.

The U.S. military announced Friday that a soldier had been killed Thursday, bringing the total of U.S. troops killed since the conflict began more than three years ago to 2,885, according to http://www.icasualties.org . The military also reported that a detainee at Baghdad's Camp Cropper died of natural causes late Thursday after being admitted to the hospital Nov. 2 for treatment of a preexisting condition.

Also in the capital Friday, the manager of a professional Baghdad soccer team was reported kidnapped. Hadib Majhoul, 52, a Sunni father of two from a wealthy family who managed the Talaba soccer club, was abducted Thursday, according to Malaib newspaper, published by Iraq's National Olympic Committee.

In the fighting in and around the Fadhil neighborhood, an Iraqi soldier was killed and eight soldiers and six civilians injured. An Interior Ministry source said 28 insurgents had been arrested during the raid; the Ministry of Defense reported 43 people detained.

Police said seven people were killed and 33 wounded in separate Baghdad explosions early Friday — a car bomb in the Ghazil pet market and a roadside bomb in Wathba Square, two Friday gathering places in central Baghdad. Four people were killed and three injured by shelling in the mainly Sunni area of Rashdiya in northern Baghdad.

Shooting continued late Friday in alleys near Wathba Square, where a charred metal telephone cable box marked the site of the morning's explosion.

"Watch out — there is a sniper," a boy cried as he darted across the dusty road leading to Ghazil and Fadhil.

A nearby grocer said the only reason to travel the road these days would be "if you want to die."

A beggar in a wheelchair pointed to the site of the roadside bomb, littered with ashes and glass from car windows.

"It seems that Fadhil is burning up," he said.

Facts And Body Language Bring Clues And Questions At Bush-Maliki Meeting (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1 — Nobody expected a love fest when President Bush and Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq met in Jordan this week. As they wrapped up their breakfast at the Four Seasons hotel in Amman on Thursday morning, aides warned that reporters, dozens of whom were packed inside a brightly lit ballroom for a news conference, would be on the lookout for any sign of bad blood.

That's when the president hugged the prime minister.

"Somebody said, 'They're going to try to see if there's any tension between you,' " one senior administration official said. "So the president did a big hug, and put his cheek right next to Maliki's. He started laughing, like, 'See how close we are.' "

The question of how close Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki are — or are not — was the subject of much speculation in Jordan this week. The official story line at the White House is that the two are comfortable and candid with each other, and that Mr. Bush, as he himself told reporters on Thursday, believes that Mr. Maliki is "the right guy for Iraq."

The facts, though, raise questions.

Mr. Maliki, after all, scrubbed a meeting on Wednesday night between himself, Mr. Bush and King Abdullah II of Jordan, and did not see the president until Thursday morning, even though the two were staying at the same hotel. Mr. Bush, for his part, had to face Mr. Maliki after the leak of a memorandum written by Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, who raised doubts about the prime minister's leadership.

The fates of these two politicians have been intertwined ever since Mr. Maliki, a taciturn 56-year-old Shiite who was an opposition leader when Saddam Hussein was still in power, became prime minister in April. The breakfast in Amman was their third face-to-face rendezvous.

It is a complicated entanglement. Mr. Bush, who has staked his presidency on success in Iraq, needs the Maliki government as an ally. But Mr. Maliki's survival depends, in part, on his ability to demonstrate that he is his own man, not an American puppet. The president's "right guy for Iraq" line might have gone over well in the United States, but it might not have done Mr. Maliki much good at home.

"It's very clear that Bush needs Maliki. Period, end of sentence," said Kenneth M. Pollack, an expert on Iraq at the Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institution. "I don't think it's clear that Maliki needs Bush."

Theories abound as to why Mr. Maliki backed out on the Wednesday night meeting. The quickie pop analysis, by the ever-skeptical White House press corps, was that Mr. Maliki was irked by the Hadley memo. In the press center of the Amman Sheraton, after two White House officials struggled to put a positive spin on the surprise change of schedule, Mark Knoller, the longtime CBS News correspondent, summed up the sentiment with a catchy rhyme.

"The White House," Mr. Knoller proclaimed, his voice booming into a microphone, "insists the scrubbing of the meeting was not a snubbing!"

The inherent hazards of challenging the official version of events meant that people who offered alternative accounts, like the senior administration official who described the presidential hug, would do so only on condition of anonymity.

Some suggested that if anyone was being snubbed by Mr. Maliki, it was the Jordanian king, who had irritated the Iraqi leader by meeting with Sunni Arab leaders in Iraq before the summit meeting.

A Kurdish official offered yet another theory — that Mr. Maliki spent the night trying to quell a political uproar in Baghdad, where followers of Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric, had announced earlier in the day that they were boycotting the Maliki government over the meeting with Mr. Bush.

"By leaving it open that he had canceled a meeting with Bush, even though it was for one day, it could help him with street cred," the Kurdish official said.

Whatever the reason, the Hadley memo clearly hovered over the summit meeting, enough that Mr. Bush opened the breakfast meeting with a little ice-breaker at the expense of Mr. Hadley, who was by his side. "He said, 'Mr. Prime Minister, do you know Steve Hadley?' " the senior administration official said of Mr. Bush. "He kind of looked back and smirked at Steve, and everybody laughed. It obviously served his purpose."

Mr. Maliki, though, did not look very happy with Mr. Bush at the news conference. When the president heaped praise upon the prime minister, lauding him for his courage, Mr. Maliki barely looked Mr. Bush's way. Though much was made afterward of the body language, White House officials blamed the language barrier, saying each man was listening intently into his earpiece for a translation of the other's words.

But there did not seem to be any translation lag when the president asked if Mr. Maliki wanted to take a few extra questions from reporters. In an instant, Mr. Maliki's head swiveled toward Mr. Bush, his eyes wide open in a glare as he blurted out, "We said six questions, now this is the seventh — this is the eighth — eight questions."

Mr. Bush, who had promised minutes earlier that there would be no "graceful exit" from Iraq, quickly found a graceful exit from the news conference, grabbing Mr. Maliki's hand for the obligatory handshake picture, before the two leaders disappeared behind a curtain of flags.

Saudis' Worst Nightmare (WT)

By Claude Salhani

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

A precipitous withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq will result in an immediate and massive Saudi Arabian military intervention to stop Iranian-backed Shi'ite militias from "butchering Iraqi Sunnis."

Nawaf Obaid, a Saudi security expert who is managing director of the Saudi National Security Assessment Project in Riyadh and an adjunct fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, says that over the past year much has changed. What was then unthinkable is now feared. A sudden departure of U.S. forces will place the future of Iraq's Sunnis in serious jeopardy from well-armed Shi'ite militias backed by Tehran. Numerous voices, says Mr. Obaid, have called for Saudi Arabia to protect the Sunni community in Iraq and to counter Iran's growing influence.

Mr. Obaid told United Press International that the Saudi leadership feels it would have no choice but to intervene militarily in Iraq in the event of a premature American pullout. But, adds Mr. Obaid, "I don't think they will withdraw any time soon, not any time soon." But in politics saying one thing and following through is not always a guarantee.

And when it comes to pulling U.S. forces out of Iraq there are two opposing schools of thought. The first is that the United States will not withdraw from Iraq until the security void can be filled (by Iraqis) to prevent further deterioration in what is already being called a civil war. If the Bush administration still refuses to admit the violence tearing that country apart is in fact a civil war, a number of major media outlets in the United States have applied that label to it.

President Bush has reiterated numerous times he would not pull out U.S. troops and leave the ground open to terrorists and pro-Ba'athist insurgents. But again, things change.

The second school of thought -- albeit a rather Machiavellian one -- sees a unique "opportunity" to entangle the Muslim world in a fratricidal war that would keep Islamic forces occupied for years, if not decades, to come. Should in fact the U.S. choose to remove its troops from Iraq and in the process leave that country's Sunni community in harm's way, there is no doubt Saudi Arabia will intervene, as it said it would, by sending its military in great force to protect their co-religionists. What could ensue is a protracted Shi'ite-Sunni war.

This could turn out to be the worst case or worst nightmare for Saudi Arabia and other countries in the region. But for some policymakers it could provide the answer to what they perceive as a rising threat that three years of continued all-out war by the world's best-armed, best-trained, best-equipped and most motivated army could not resolve.

Under this scenario, Saudi troops, along with billions of Saudi petro-dollars, would be tied up for years fighting Iranian-backed insurgents in Iraq. Chances are that the fighting might very well spill over into neighboring countries such as Saudi Arabia itself, Jordan, Iran and possibly beyond. In fact chances of this happening would be very high.

The thinking supporting that theory is that this would tie down fundamentalist forces on both sides for years to come. Saudi Arabia would be funneling large sums to sustain Iraq's Sunnis and their troops in that country. That would be money diverted from other Saudi projects, such as financing Islamic schools and mosques in Europe and North America.

Intra-Muslim fighting would also weaken the Shi'ites in Iraq as well as in neighboring Iran. As a result, a weakened Iran would be less inclined -- and certainly less financially inclined -- to pursue its nuclear program or to foment revolts beyond its borders. Or even be too preoccupied by what is going on its own front yard to continue its active support for Lebanon's Hezbollah Party.

Saudi King Abdullah is worried enough by this concept that he asked for an urgent meeting with Vice President Dick Cheney, prompting the vice president to fly an 18,000-mile round-trip for a two-hour meeting with the Saudi sovereign.

For the moment, Mr. Obaid says President Bush told King Abdullah that U.S. troops would stand fast in Iraq. In return, the Saudi king gave his word that Saudi Arabia would not meddle in Iraq, despite repeated requests from Sunni tribesmen that they do so. But as Mr. Obaid notes, these requests will be heeded if American troops are withdrawn and the Sunnis find themselves under fire and threat of ethnic cleansing.

U.S., Iraq Stage Raids In Capital (WP/AP)

By Thomas Wagner

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 1 -- U.S. and Iraqi forces launched six raids against insurgents Friday, including one that killed at least three Iraqis and another in which American forces wounded an Iraqi female who the U.S. command said was being used as a "human shield."

The U.S. military also reported that an American soldier was killed in combat in the capital Thursday.

In some of the fiercest fighting Friday, Iraqi soldiers backed by U.S. helicopters swept through Fadhil, one of the oldest areas of Baghdad, and engaged in house-to-house combat, police Lt. Ali Muhsin said. The neighborhood is about a mile from the heavily fortified Green Zone, where Iraq's parliament and foreign diplomatic facilities are based.

Fighting in the narrow streets and alleys, suspected insurgents with rifles and machine guns killed one Iraqi soldier and two civilians, Muhsin said. U.S. helicopter gunships hovered overhead but did not open fire on the crowded neighborhoods of one-story homes, he said.

State-run al-Iraqiya television said 43 suspected insurgents were taken into custody. Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a U.S. military spokesman, said 28 people were detained in an operation aimed at capturing insurgents.

U.S. forces killed two insurgents and detained 27 Iraqis in five other raids. The sweeps took place in Baghdad, the town of Yusufiyah to the south, and two locations to the north: near Taji, the U.S. Air Force base, and the town of Tarmiyah.

In the Taji area, soldiers killed one insurgent and wounded "a female local national who was being used as human shield by the terrorist," the U.S. command said. The female, whose name and age were not given, was hospitalized, it said.

It was the fourth time this week that a female Iraqi civilian has been killed or wounded in crossfire between U.S. forces and insurgents.

"Terrorists continue to deliberately place innocent Iraqi women and children in danger by their actions and presence," the U.S. statement said.

Meanwhile, a U.S. official announced that President Bush will meet with Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite Muslim politicians. The meeting, to take place Monday, will focus on the continued bid to find a new approach to ending sectarian violence, said National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

Next month, Bush will meet with a Sunni Arab leader, Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, according to a senior administration official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The bullet-riddled bodies of 14 Kurdish farmers were found in a village 28 miles west of the Syrian border, said Dekhel Qasim, a provincial official.

Gunmen also kidnapped the Sunni head of one of Iraq's leading soccer clubs on Thursday and, in separate incidents Friday, abducted two Iraqi women, ages 17 and 20.

Iraq Takes Over Army Division From US (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, December 2, 2006

Iraq's government on Friday took command over another army division in the north, a US general announced, in an apparent demonstration of the US's commitment to accelerate the handover of military control to Nouri al-Maliki, prime minister.

Mr Maliki said after his summit with President George W. Bush in Amman that all Iraqi security forces would be ready to come under his command by next June. Mr Bush said he had listened to Mr Maliki's "frustration" at not having the tools to do his job.

Washington has refused to confirm Mr Maliki's timeline in public, saying the transfer is complex and depends on conditions on the ground.

Nonetheless the announcement by General Benjamin Mixon, commander of US forces in northern Iraq, that a second division had been handed over and the remaining two northern divisions would follow by February 2007, appeared intended to demonstrate that the US was making progress and would be able to scale back its own combat operations.

Adoption by the US of a background role focused more on support and training, combined with the gradual withdrawal of the 15 US combat brigades possibly by early 2008, is expected to form one of the core recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which will publish its findings next Wednesday.

Officials accompanying Mr Bush in Amman on Thursday said only two of Iraq's 10 divisions – totalling some 140,000 troops – were under Mr Maliki's full command at that point. Control of most of the Iraqi military is shared with General George Casey, overall commander of US forces in Iraq.

US officials have expressed concern over too rapid a transfer of authority, because of a lack of training and fears that some Iraqi troops uphold their sectarian allegiances above their loyalty to the state.

Rogue units of Iraq's police forces – which are not under US control – have been accused of carrying out extrajudicial killings and torture.

Gen Mixon, speaking by satellite from a base near Tikrit, north of Baghdad, said US troops in the north would take a more indirect security role and focus on combating al-Qaeda forces as Iraqi troops became more capable.

He said that within three to six months, Iraqi forces in the six northern provinces would assume full responsibility for the security of civilians.

"I can certainly see great opportunity to reduce the amount of [US] combat forces on the ground," Gen Mixon said.

Chris Dodd, a Democrat senator, said Mr Bush should listen carefully to the Iraq Study Group, which is led by James Baker, a former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, a former congressman.

Senators in both parties wanted a change of direction in Iraq, he said. "The administration can find themselves very, very isolated on this," he warned.

Stephen Hadley, national security adviser, has said the president will probably decide on a "new direction" within weeks after the completion of various internal strategic reviews.

Mr Bush said on Thursday that he would not respond to the pressure of reports calling for a "graceful exit" from Iraq.

Coalition Head: Iraq Transfer Under Way (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor,

DOJ_NMG_0100933

AP, December 2, 2006

The commander of coalition forces in northern Iraq said Friday the transfer of responsibility for security from U.S. to Iraqi forces, reportedly among the recommendations of a special study group, already is under way.

"I think it certainly reflects what we're doing now" in northern Iraq, Army Maj. Gen. Benjamin Mixon told reporters at the Pentagon through a videoteleconference from his headquarters near Tikrit.

In the report the bipartisan Iraq Study Group is expected to release next Wednesday, the U.S. government would be called upon to rely more on diplomacy than deadlines in its Iraq policy. But that would rob many war critics of the impetus they wanted to force a speedy, sizable U.S. troop withdrawal from the battlefield.

The study team recommends a gradual reduction of U.S. forces and a more aggressive regional diplomacy, but sets no timetable, according to officials familiar with the group's deliberations. The report could give President Bush political cover to shift tactics in the increasingly unpopular war.

Some media reports suggested that the commission would recommend withdrawing nearly all U.S. combat forces from Iraq by early 2008, leaving behind only those troops needed to train and support the Iraqis. The reports described the recommendation as goal rather than a firm timetable.

At least some U.S. commanders in Iraq already are shifting a growing number of their troops from combat to support roles, while giving the Iraqi Ministry of Defense more control over Iraq troops.

Mixon spoke to this, specifically, on Friday.

He said he is on track to place all four Iraqi army divisions in his area under Iraqi control by March. Mixon was asked about the study group's expected recommendation to transition to Iraqi security control within a year or so.

"I can certainly see great opportunity to reduce the amount of combat forces on the ground" in the north "and turn more responsibility over to Iraqi security forces," he said. Mixon also said that even after that transition is complete in his area, U.S. troops would continue to support Iraqi forces and conduct U.S. combat operations against al-Qaida "operatives."

White House national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley noted on Thursday that the president has solicited a separate in-house review of Iraq policy. Bush probably would make any changes or decisions arising from the various reports in "weeks rather than months," Hadley said.

"It's really going to be when the president is comfortable in his own mind as to where he wants to go" and has coordinated with Iraqi leaders on a "common plan," Hadley said.

Members of Congress seized on the report as their own benchmark for success.

"The fact that they reached a consensus poses a challenge to the Congress to try and reach its own consensus with the president," outgoing Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner, R-Va., said.

Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., said the report could foster "growing bipartisan support in this country."

Under the panel's recommendations, U.S. troops could be pulled back slowly from the front lines, acting as more of a support structure for the Iraqi security forces, officials said. Several officials spoke about the report on condition of anonymity because the panel's deliberations were private.

Yet advisers to the panel and others aware of its work also noted that many of the recommendations will not differ greatly from either current policy or from ideas already under debate within the administration.

Bush repeatedly has rejected a wholesale troop withdrawal or what he calls artificial deadlines, vowing that he would not "pull the troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete."

"This business about a graceful exit just simply has no realism to it at all," Bush said Thursday.

Congressional Democrats were thrust back into power in the House and Senate in midterm elections last month widely viewed as voters calling for change in Iraqi policy. Democrats hoped the commission's report would give them leverage in seeking a new course in Iraq. They generally want troop withdrawals to begin sometime in 2007 but are divided over how many troops to withdraw, and when and where to reassign them.

The Washington Post, meanwhile, reported Friday that the U.S. was considering whether to abandon efforts to bring Sunni insurgents into the political process to stabilize Iraq. The concern is that the outreach to Sunni dissidents has failed and may be alienating the country's majority Shiites, who dominate the government. The report cited unidentified sources familiar with the proposal.

The Iraq Study Group's approximately 100-page report will indicate the presence of U.S. troops is part of the problem in Iraq, one official said. The panel will demand more accountability from the Iraqi government, although it is not clear how progress would be measured, the official said.

The congressionally chartered panel, whose recommendations are not binding, will encourage Bush to engage U.S. adversaries Syria and Iran to improve regional dialogue, several officials said. That outreach could include a regional conference among all of Iraq's neighbors or a wider gathering of Middle East nations that also would address separate Middle East peace issues.

A senior U.S. official who participated in the deliberations said the recommendations would include resumption of Mideast peace talks.

The administration has not completely ruled out diplomacy with Iran and Syria, but has been reluctant to enter talks that could be seen as reward for what Washington calls bad behavior.

The report suggests that Bush give Iraqi leaders notice that America's military commitment is not open-ended. The panel's Republican and Democratic members could not agree on bolder proposals. Options to quickly bring home a large percentage of the 140,000 U.S. forces supporting the fragile government in Baghdad or set a clear timeline for withdrawal were on the table.

Without firm benchmarks for a U.S. military withdrawal, the recommendations would essentially back up Bush's policy of using security conditions in Iraq, not a calendar, to guide battlefield decisions. The administration long has said U.S. forces will stand down as Iraqi forces are able to stand up.

Soldiers In Iraq Take On New Role (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Normally, U.S. soldiers train to fight, not to train. But these are not normal times — not in a chaotic Iraq where President Bush is banking on improving Iraqi security forces so the American military can begin to pull out, or at least pull back.

U.S. soldiers and Marines are being plucked out of combat positions to be "embedded" with Iraqi army and police units as trainers and advisers.

They face numerous obstacles, including language, a lack of resources and loose linkages between the Iraqi security forces and their civilian leaders. But U.S. commanders see this effort as the key to winding down American combat action in a country wracked by internal strife.

In Washington, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group examining new courses of action in the war is planning to recommend next week that thousands more advisers be sent to accelerate the development of Iraqi security forces.

Pentagon officials are studying ways to expand the adviser corps. But in the view of some who have studied the problem, fielding substantially more advisers — and making them effective — may be more difficult than commonly believed.

"Training is a specialty. Training of foreign forces is an art," said Daniel Goure, a military analyst at the private Lexington Institute. "That's the difficulty here, and compound that difficulty by the language barrier."

Goure on Friday described the training and advising effort as "better than nothing, but not great."

Thus far, at least 3,500 U.S. advisers are operating inside Iraqi army and police units, and more are arriving weekly. Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander for the Middle East, told Congress recently that he would like to expand the number but was studying how many could be added without enlarging the overall U.S. forces in Iraq, now numbering about 140,000.

Maj. Gen. Benjamin Mixon, commander of coalition forces in northern Iraq, said Friday he had discussed with Abizaid a plan to add about 2,000 advisers to the roughly 2,500 he already has in his region. He said he believed he could accomplish that without having to increase the size of his force.

Teams of 10 to 15 advisers live and work with Iraqi army, national police and border agent units. They go on raids and other missions to coach the Iraqis and assess weaknesses, and they act as role models, steering them away from corruption, human rights abuses and other problems.

So far, U.S. advisers are giving the program mixed reviews. Some of them complain they spend much of their time making sure Iraqi soldiers are paid and have the equipment they need.

"Most of the time we can't advise. We are too busy running around protecting ourselves from attack or just making sure the army has the basics," one Marine adviser, Sgt. Thomas Ciccarelli, 37, of South Lake Tahoe, Calif., said last month.

American commanders concede they have had to upgrade how they train U.S. advisers, with less time studying slide presentations and more emphasis on cultural awareness and hands-on work with weapons and communications.

"As an Army we were not doing this as well as we needed to do it" even a year ago, Army Maj. Gen. Carter Ham said in a recent interview. He is commander of the 1st Infantry Division, which has been pulled out of the Iraq combat rotation in order to put prospective U.S. trainers through a 60-day training program at Fort Riley, Kan.

The idea is to coach the Iraqis, but that's not a role most American troops are used to performing. U.S. military officials acknowledge that soldiers have to change their mindset to perform as advisers.

"We are asking American (combat) leaders to do what is not natural, and that is leading from behind," Ham said.

Serving as advisers is not entirely foreign to the Army, which fielded thousands of combat advisers in the early years of the Vietnam War. In Vietnam the advising gave way to the introduction of hundreds of thousands of U.S. combat forces, whereas in Iraq the advisers are seen as a way to get combat forces out.

"This is a business we were kind of out of for a number of years — we're not obviously back into it big time," Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security adviser, told reporters Thursday after Bush met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in Jordan.

On the other hand, Army leaders say they foresee a future in which soldiers can more readily adapt to non-traditional roles — be it training of foreign forces or conducting humanitarian or other non-combat missions.

"These are true pentathletes we are creating," Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, said recently.

This sort of work has traditionally been the province of Army Special Forces, the elite Green Berets who are fluent in the language of a particular region and spend time there training indigenous forces. There are simply too few Special Forces available to accomplish the training and advising in Iraq that is deemed necessary.

Spy Chief: Unlike Vietnam War, Iraqi Capital Among Most Insecure Spots (AP)

WASHINGTON (AP) — National Intelligence Director John Negroponte says Iraq's cities are less secure and the enemy harder to identify in comparison to the situation in much of Vietnam when he served as a U.S. diplomat there in the 1960s.

An expert on Vietnam and one-time adviser to former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, Negroponte said he sees more differences than similarities between the two conflicts. In Vietnam, for example, there was a clear enemy, given Soviet support of the North Vietnamese. "We didn't have has as many debates about the nature of the enemy as we seem to be having with respect to Iraq," Negroponte said.

Additionally, "in Vietnam, the cities were secure. The province capitals were secure. I walked around that country as an unarmed civilian for almost four years without ever having any serious brushes," said Negroponte, who served in the U.S. Embassy in Saigon. "In Iraq, even the capital is highly insecure — perhaps one of the most insecure places in the country."

Negroponte made the remarks in a wide-ranging interview that airs Sunday evening on C-SPAN's Q&A program. A transcript was made available to The Associated Press.

Negroponte took over as the nation's top intelligence official last year, assuming a post created to unify the 16 intelligence agencies. He indicated in the interview that he wants to stay on through the Bush administration. Many associates have expected Negroponte to return to his diplomatic roots, perhaps serving as deputy secretary of state, a position open since July.

His answer to the question — will he "stay with it for a while?" — didn't completely close to door to a new assignment. "In my own mind at least, I visualize staying with it through the end of this administration and, then I think, probably that'll be about the right time to pack it in," he said.

Negroponte, a former U.S. ambassador to Baghdad, said Iraqis must take more responsibility for their security and defense. The key, he said, is Baghdad, where the violence is greatest. His comments closely tracked the conclusions of an independent group led by former secretary of state James Baker that is advising the administration as it redraws its Iraq policy.

"This has really got to become more and more of an Iraqi problem, and less and less of a U.S. one," he said. "I would hope that our forces can take more of a support role and a training role, and fall more into the background rather than being in the lead in the months ahead."

Negroponte said he wasn't certain of the impact should an Iraq court follow through with its Nov. 5 sentence to hang former dictator Saddam Hussein for ordering the execution of nearly 150 Shiite Muslims. The sentence triggered an automatic appeal.

"There are a lot of the Iraqis that want some kind of closure in this situation," Negroponte said. "There are probably also some insurgents, some Sunni extremist insurgents, who are fighting in the belief that — under the illusion that — they may be fighting to bring Mr. Saddam back to power, so it could have the effect of actually discouraging some of the Sunni extremists."

Negroponte voiced one regret about the nine months he served as ambassador to Iraq: that the United States wasn't able to convince Sunni politicians to scrap their boycott of the January 2005 elections. "I think that that was a real setback for the political process," he said.

Italian Troops Leave As Iraq Says Army Could Take Over In 2007 (AFP)

By Jay Deshmukh

AFP, December 2, 2006

The last Italian troops in Iraq have headed home as Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki said his forces could take over the battered nation's security by June 2007.

Despite the optimism, violence raged unabated across the country with at least 13 people killed Friday, highlighting the difficulties faced by the embattled premier.

Baghdad itself echoed to the sound of machine gun fire as insurgents clashed with Iraqi troops in the Fadhel neighbourhood, killing one soldier and wounding nine people, including five civilians.

Iraqi state television described the clashes as an operation against "terrorist hideouts" in the central Baghdad district.

The British military told AFP that the last Italian troops were set to leave the southern Dhi Qar province Friday, ending their three-year mission as part of the US-led coalition forces.

Earlier this year they handed over the province's security to Iraqi forces.

"The last of the Italians are leaving today to Kuwait and from there they will go to Italy," British military spokesman Major Charlie Burbridge said, adding that the troops had ended military operations in the past six weeks.

"All of them will be gone by the afternoon," he said.

On Monday Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi said the remaining 70 troops of the 3,000 sent to Iraq in 2003 would return home in the first few days of December.

Italy's centre-left parties, backing Prodi's government which replaced the conservative administration of Silvio Berlusconi after April elections, made withdrawal from Iraq one of the centrepieces of their election campaign.

The Italians were deployed in Iraq's south along with British, Australians and Romanian forces. At least 31 Italian soldiers have been killed in Iraq since 2003.

The troops were stationed in Nasiriyah, the provincial seat of Dhi Qar, a relatively peaceful region compared with Iraq's central and western regions where US forces are battling a raging insurgency and a brutal sectarian conflict.

Maliki told the US television network ABC Thursday that his forces will be ready to take charge of Iraq's security in June 2007.

"I can say that Iraqi forces will be ready, fully ready to receive this command and to command its own forces, and I can tell you that by next June our forces will be ready," Maliki said.

His statement came a few hours after his meeting with Bush in Jordan where the two leaders discussed Iraq's ability to secure the country on its own and whether it could curb the current sectarian bloodshed.

Upon his return to Baghdad from Amman, Maliki told reporters that Bush was "responsive" to his government, wishing "success to his government so that we could ultimately be ready to gradually do away with the foreign forces".

Maliki said he had won an agreement from Bush that he will take control of Iraq's security forces more quickly than planned, to allow him to fight the insurgency in his own way and also stop the communal bloodletting.

Currently most of the fledgling Iraqi army comes under the day-to-day control of a US-led coalition, which also has 150,000 American troops.

Meanwhile powerful Iraqi Shiite leader Abdel Aziz al-Hakim said Iraq's sectarian conflict could "burn everyone" and threaten the security of the entire region.

Calling for Iraqi unity in Jordan's largest mosque of King Hussein, Hakim said "we do not want a Shiite government that sidelines the Sunnis and we don't want a Sunni government that marginalises the Shiites". Hakim's Supreme Council of Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) is a key part of the ruling coalition government in Baghdad.

After the meeting the royal palace quoted him as saying "if a civil war were to take place, the biggest losers will be our brothers in the Sunni community".

But on Thursday, a statement from the SCIRI delegation to Amman described reports of the meeting as "inaccurate".

In continued unrest across Iraq, 12 more people were killed, including six in two bomb attacks in and around Baghdad, security officials said.

The US military also announced the deaths of two more soldiers in the capital, taking its losses since the war to 2,883, according to an AFP count based on Pentagon figures.

Iraqi Professor Urges Dialogue (LAT)

SAN DIEGO — Forced to flee her homeland and her teaching post at the University of Baghdad, Naba Saleem Hamid has spent three years speaking in the United States and Europe about the chaos and pain in her country.

Her message is simple: While life under Saddam Hussein was horrible, because of the violence and power struggles, life since the U.S. invasion is worse. "My people live in misery and poverty, struggling for basic survival," Hamid told an audience at San Diego State University on Thursday night.

In her many speeches, she implores Americans to think of Iraq not as a military target but as an ancient country of 27 million people.

Governments have failed, she said, and so it is time for the citizens of the U.S. and Iraq to begin communicating. Both countries are suffering from the mess in Iraq.

"We are all victims, we are all losers," she said as students nodded.

Hamid said she is not calling for the U.S. to pull out its troops: "Their presence is part of the problem and of the solution."

But she feels it is imperative for President Bush to work with leaders in Iran and Syria to cobble together a regional solution to suppressing the violence and repairing the massive damage. So far, Bush has ruled out such discussions.

Her speaking voice is soft, causing audience members on Thursday to push forward in their seats to hear her. She took questions politely and later said she was satisfied with the students' curiosity: that younger Americans seem more willing to learn about Iraq than older ones.

Hamid, who is in her mid-50s, has come to San Diego three times and has a fourth trip planned in February. Her supporters, working through the Scholars at Risk network based at New York University, hope to help her and her husband, an architectural professor, find teaching jobs in San Diego and get the appropriate visas to move here.

She has been able to make only brief, unannounced visits to her home and job as a biology professor. Six months ago, on one such trip, she had an experience that left her shaken: A man sternly upbraided her for not covering her head.

When she spoke to her department chairman at the university, he replied only that Baghdad is not safe now for women, as gangs of ultraconservatives roam the streets trying to enforce a Taliban-esque domination.

"I am floating," Hamid said in an interview Friday as she prepared to leave San Diego. "I do not know where I am going to land."

Three weeks ago, while she was on her speaking tour, Hamid received word that a massive car bomb had detonated near her home in Baghdad. She expects to find the home ransacked the next time she is able to return.

Her latest trip to San Diego was sponsored by Voices of Women, a group dedicated to finding nonviolent solutions to global conflicts.

In addition to San Diego State, she has lectured at the Joan B. Kroc Institute for Peace and Justice at the University of San Diego.

In 2003, Hamid founded New Horizons for Women, dedicated to helping Iraqi women and girls assert their rights and become politically involved, a threatening proposition to some sectarians.

Although she said she would like to take up residence in San Diego — if visa and other complications can be worked out — she said her heart will forever be in Baghdad.

"I am like a fish," she said. "If this fish leaves water, I will die."

Civilian Iraq Death Up 43 Pct. In Nov. (AP)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 2, 2006

An Interior Ministry official said Friday that 1,846 civilians were killed in Iraq in November, a 43 percent increase from the estimated toll in October.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity for security reasons, did not elaborate on the monthly figure, which was up from an estimated 1,289 civilians killed in October.

According to a count by The Associated Press, 1,923 civilians were killed in Iraq in November.

Rising sectarian tensions have pushed the country toward the verge of civil war. Last month saw the worst attack of the war when suspected Sunni insurgents killed at least 215 people in Sadr City, Baghdad's Shiite slum, on Nov. 23.

The United Nations put the number of civilian deaths in October at 3,709, the highest monthly toll since the 2003 U.S. invasion. The figure, based on reports from the Iraqi Health Ministry, hospitals and the Medico-Legal Institute in Baghdad, was three times higher than the Iraqi Interior Ministry figure for that month.

There was no explanation for the discrepancy between the two figures and it was not immediately known whether the figures on Friday from the Interior Ministry used all of the sources cited by the U.N.

Chessboard Endgame (WSJ)

By Garry Kasparov

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

For the past few years, the dictators and terrorists have been gaining ground, and with good reason. The deepening catastrophe in Iraq has distracted the world's sole superpower from its true goals, and weakened the U.S. politically as well as militarily. With new congressional leadership threatening to make the same mistake -- failing to see Iraq as only one piece of a greater puzzle -- it is time to return to the basics of strategic planning.

Thirty years as a chess player ingrained in me the importance of never losing sight of the big picture. Paying too much attention to one area of the chessboard can quickly lead to the collapse of your entire position. America and its allies are so focused on Iraq they are ceding territory all over the map. Even the vague goals of President Bush's ambiguous war on terror have been pushed aside by the crisis in Baghdad.

The U.S. must refocus and recognize the failure of its post-9/11 foreign policy. Pre-emptive strikes and deposing dictators may or may not have been a good plan, but at least it was a plan. However, if you attack Iraq, the potential to go after Iran and Syria must also be on the table. Instead, the U.S. finds itself supervising a civil war while helplessly making concessions elsewhere.

This dire situation is a result of the only thing worse than a failed strategy: the inability to recognize, or to admit, that a strategy has failed. Since the invasion of Iraq in March 2003, North Korea has tested a nuclear weapon. Iran is openly boasting of its uranium enrichment program while pouring money into Hezbollah and Hamas. A resurgent Taliban is on the rise in Afghanistan. Nearly off the radar, Somalia is becoming an al Qaeda haven. Worst of all is the answer to the question that ties all of these burning fuses together: No, we are not safer now than we were before.

The seeds for this situation were sown in the one real success the West has had. The attack on the Taliban and al Qaeda in Afghanistan went so well that the U.S. and its allies did not appreciate all the reasons for the success. Almost every player on the world stage benefited from the attack on Afghanistan. The rout of the Sunni Taliban delighted Iran. Russia and China have no love for religious extremism near their borders. India was happy to see the U.S. launch a direct attack on Muslim terrorists.

Only Pakistan was put under uncomfortable pressure, although even there, Pervez Musharraf has been able to play both sides well enough to appear to be an essential ally to the West, while terrorists and weapons cross his borders freely. Gen. Musharraf has perfected the formula of holding himself up as the last defense against the extremists in order to gain immunity for his dictatorship. Not only was there a confluence of world opinion aided by sympathy for the U.S. after 9/11, but the proverbial bad guys were undoubtedly bad, and we knew where they were. As subsequent events have shown, effectively bombing terrorists is a rare opportunity.

Learning from our defeats is obvious, but too often we fail to appreciate the reasons for our successes; we take them for granted. The U.S. charged into Iraq without appreciating the far greater difficulty of the postwar task there, and how it would be complicated by the increasingly hostile global opinion of America's military adventures.

America's role as "bad cop" has been a flop on the global stage. Without the American presence in Iraq as a target and scapegoat, Iraqis would be forced to make the hard political decisions they are currently avoiding. We won't know if Iraq can stand on its own until the U.S. forces leave. Meanwhile, South Korea and China refuse to take action on North Korea while accusing the U.S. of provocative behavior. How quickly would their attitudes change if the U.S. pulled its troops out of the Korean Peninsula? Or if Japan -- not to mention Taiwan -- announced nuclear weapon plans?

From Caracas to Moscow to Pyongyang, everyone follows their own agenda while ignoring President Bush and the U.N. Here in Russia, for example, Vladimir Putin gets Mr. Bush's endorsement for membership to the World Trade Organization while selling advanced air defense missile systems to Iran and imposing sanctions on Georgia, itself a WTO member. WTO membership is not going to benefit ordinary Russians, but it will provide more cover for Mr. Putin and his gang of oligarchs to continue to loot the country and launder the money abroad with no resistance from a distracted, discredited and enfeebled West.

We might not know what works, but we have many fine examples of what doesn't work and we cannot continue to ignore them. As the world's sole superpower, the U.S. has become a lightening rod. Any intervention causes resentment and even many traditional allies oppose U.S. plans almost out of hand. America's overly proactive foreign policy has also allowed other nations to avoid responsibility for their own safety, and to avoid making the tough decisions that come with that responsibility.

At the same time, the U.N. has become a perfect example of a broken institution. When leaders are afraid to take real action they go to the U.N., where they know nothing tangible will be achieved. Resolutions are routinely ignored without consequences and, in fact, are openly flouted. Hezbollah proudly waved weapons as the Israeli army left Lebanon and the kidnapped Israeli soldiers have yet to be released.

So what then, to do? "Mission accomplished" jokes aside, the original goals in Iraq -- deposing Saddam Hussein and holding elections -- have been achieved. Nation-building was never on the agenda and it should not be added now. All the allied troops in the world aren't going to stop the Iraqi people from continuing their civil war if this is their choice. As long as Muslim leaders in Iraq and elsewhere are unwilling to confront their own radical elements, outsiders will be spectators in the line of fire.

As for stability, if allied troops leave Iraq:What stability? I won't say things can't get worse -- if we've learned anything, it's that things in the Middle East can always get worse;but at least the current deadly dynamic would be changed. And with change there is always hope for improvement. Without change, we are expecting a different result from the same behavior, something once defined as insanity.

Afghan District Makes Own Deal With The Taliban (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall, Abdul Waheed Wafa

KABUL, Afghanistan, Nov. 29 — After a series of bruising battles between British troops and Taliban fighters, the Afghan government struck a peace deal with tribal elders in Helmand Province, arranging for a cease-fire and the withdrawal of both sides from one southern district. A month later, the ripples are still being felt in the capital and beyond.

The accord, reached with virtually no public consultation and mediated by the local governor, has brought some welcome peace for residents of the district, Musa Qala, and a reprieve for British troops, who had been under siege by the Taliban in a compound there for three months.

But it has sharply divided former government officials, legislators and ordinary Afghans.

Some say the agreement points the way forward in bringing peace to war-torn parts of the country. Others warn that it sets a dangerous precedent and represents a capitulation to the Taliban and a potential reversal of five years of American policy to build a strong central government. They say the accord gives up too much power to local leaders, who initiated it and are helping to enforce it.

“The Musa Qala project has sent two messages: one, recognition for the enemy, and two, military defeat,” said Mustafa Qazemi, a member of Afghanistan’s Parliament and a former resistance fighter with the Northern Alliance, which fought the Taliban for seven years.

“This is a model for the destruction of the country,” he said, “and it is just a defeat for NATO, just a defeat.”

As part of the deal, the district has been allowed to choose its own officials and police officers, something one member of Parliament warned would open a Pandora’s box as more districts clamored for the right to do the same.

Some compare the deal to agreements that Pakistan has struck with leaders in its tribal areas along the Afghan border, which have given those territories more autonomy and, critics say, empowered the Taliban who have taken sanctuary there and allowed them to regroup.

Even President Hamid Karzai, who sanctioned the deal, has admitted to mixed feelings. “There are some suspicions in society about this,” he said in a recent radio interview with Radio Free Europe.

“I trust everything these elders say,” Mr. Karzai said, but he added that two recent episodes in the area — of killing and intimidation — gave pause and needed investigation.

For their part, foreign military officials and diplomats expressed cautious optimism, saying the accord had at least opened a debate over the virtues of such deals and time is needed to see if it will work. “If it works, and so far it appears to work, it could be a pointer to similar understandings elsewhere,” said one diplomat, who would speak on the topic only if not identified.

The governor of Helmand, Mohammad Daud, brokered the deal and defended it strongly as a vital exercise to unite the Pashtun tribes in the area and strengthen their leaders so they could reject the Taliban militants.

Appointed at the beginning of the year, Mr. Daud has struggled to win over the people and control the lawlessness of his province, which is the largest opium-producing region as well as a Taliban stronghold.

Some 5,000 British soldiers deployed in the province this year as part of an expanding NATO presence have come under repeated attack. Civilians have suffered scores of casualties across the south as NATO troops have often resorted to airstrikes, even on residential areas, to defeat the insurgents.

It was the civilians of Musa Qala who made the first bid for peace, Mr. Daud explained.

“They made a council of elders and came to us saying, ‘We want to make the Taliban leave Musa Qala,’ ” he said in a telephone interview from the provincial capital, Lashkar Gah. “At first we did not accept their request, and we waited to see how strong the elders were.”

But the governor and the British forces soon demanded a cease-fire, and when it held for more than a month, they negotiated a withdrawal of British troops from the district, as well as the Afghan police who had been fighting alongside them. The Taliban then also withdrew.

Eventually the governor agreed on a 15-point accord with the elders, who pledged to support the government and the Afghan flag, keep schools open, allow development and reconstruction, and work to ensure the security and stability of the region. That included trying to limit the arming of people who do not belong to the government, namely the Taliban insurgents.

They drew up a list of local candidates for the posts of district chief and police chief, from which the governor appointed the new officials. They also chose 60 local people to serve as police officers in the district, sending the first 20 to the provincial capital for 20 days of basic training, according to provincial officials.

One energetic supporter of the deal is Abdul Ali Seraj, a nephew of King Amanullah, who ruled in the 1920s, and leader of the Coalition for National Dialogue With the Tribes of Afghanistan, which is working to bring peace through the tribal structures.

"Musa Qala is the way to do it," Mr. Seraj said. "Sixty days since the agreement, and there has not been a shot fired."

The agreement has been welcomed by residents of Musa Qala, who said in interviews by telephone or in neighboring Kandahar Province that people were rebuilding their houses and shops and planting winter crops, including the ubiquitous poppy, the source of opium.

The onset of the lucrative poppy planting season may have been one of the incentives behind their desire for peace, diplomats and government officials admitted.

Elders and residents of the area say the accord has brought calm, at least for now. "There is no Taliban authority there," said Haji Shah Agha, 55, who led 50 members of the Musa Qala elders' council to Kabul recently to counter criticism that the district was in the hands of the Taliban.

"The Taliban stopped fighting because we convinced them that fighting would not be to our benefit," he said. "We told the Taliban, 'Fighting will kill our women and children, and they are your women and children as well.' "

What the Taliban gained was the withdrawal of the British forces without having to risk further fighting. Meantime, the Taliban presence remains strong in the province, so much so that road travel to Musa Qala for a foreign journalist is not advised by United Nations security officials. While residents are happy with the peace, they do not deny that the militants who were fighting British forces all summer have neither disbanded nor been disarmed.

According to a local shopkeeper, Haji Bismillah, 40, who owns a pharmacy in the center of Musa Qala, the Taliban have pulled back to their villages and often come into town, but without their weapons.

"The Taliban are not allowed to enter the bazaar with their weapons," he said in a telephone interview. "If they resist with guns, the tribal elders will disarm them," he said.

He said the elders had temporarily given the Taliban "some kind of permission to arrest thieves and drug addicts and put them in their own prison," since the elders did not yet have a police force of their own.

The district's newly appointed police chief, Haji Malang, said the Taliban and the police had agreed not to encroach on each other's territory. "They have their place which we cannot enter, and we have our place and they must not come in," he said in a telephone interview this week.

Some residents said the deal would benefit the Taliban. "This is a very good chance for the Taliban," said Abdul Bari, 33, a farmer who accompanied a sick relative to a hospital in neighboring Kandahar province.

"The people now view the Taliban as a force, since without the Taliban, the government could not bring peace in the regions." he said. "It is not sure how this agreement will work, but maybe the Taliban will get more strength and then move against the elders."

Opponents of the agreement warned that the elders were merely doing the bidding of the Taliban and would never be strong enough to face down Taliban commanders.

"The Taliban reappeared by the power of the gun, and the only way to defeat them is fighting, not dealing," said Haji Aadil Khan, 47, a former police chief from Gereshk, another district of Helmand.

One event that has alarmed all sides was the killing and beheading of Haji Ahmad Shah, the former chief of a neighboring district, who returned to his home after the agreement was signed. Beheading is a tactic favored by some Taliban groups, and his friends say it is a clear sign that the Taliban are in control of the area. Elders of Musa Qala said that Mr. Shah had personal enemies and that they were behind the killing.

The governor, Mr. Daud, and the elders said a number of the opponents to the agreement were former militia leaders who did not want peace. "The people of Musa Qala took a step for peace with this agreement," said the chief elder, Haji Shah Agha. "The Taliban are sitting calmly in their houses."

Another elder, Amini, who uses only one name, said: "For four months we had fighting in Musa Qala and now we have peace. What is wrong with it, if we have peace?"

Afghanistan Opium Crop Sets Record (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

Opium production in Afghanistan, which provides more than 90 percent of the world's heroin, broke all records in 2006, reaching a historic high despite ongoing U.S.-sponsored eradication efforts, the Bush administration reported yesterday.

In addition to a 26 percent production increase over past year -- for a total of 5,644 metric tons -- the amount of land under cultivation in opium poppies grew by 61 percent. Cultivation in the two main production provinces, Helmand in the southwest and Oruzgan in central Afghanistan, was up by 132 percent.

The administration has cited resurgent Taliban forces as the main impediment to stabilization and reconstruction efforts in Afghanistan, and the U.S. military investment has far exceeded anti-narcotic and development programs. But U.S. military and intelligence officials have increasingly described the drug trade as a problem that rivals and in some ways exceeds the Taliban, threatening to derail other aspects of U.S. policy.

"It is truly the Achilles' heel of Afghanistan," Gen. James L. Jones, the supreme allied commander for NATO, said in a recent speech at the Council on Foreign Relations. Afghanistan is NATO's biggest operation, with more than 30,000 troops. Drug cartels with their own armies engage in regular combat with NATO forces deployed in Afghanistan, he said. "It would be wrong to say that this is just the Taliban. I think I need to set that record straight," he added.

"They have their own capability to inflict damage, to make sure that the roads and the passages stay open and they get to where they want to go, whether it's through Pakistan, Iran, up through Russia and all the known trade routes. So this is a very violent cartel," Jones said. "They are buying their protection by funding other organizations, from criminal gangs to tribes, to inciting any kind of resistance to keep the government off of their back."

Any disruption of the drug trade has enormous implications for Afghanistan's economic and political stability. Although its relative strength in the overall economy has diminished as other sectors have expanded in recent years, narcotics is a $2.6 billion-a-year industry that this year provided more than a third of the country's gross domestic product. Farmers who cultivate opium poppies receive only a small percentage of the profits, but U.S. officials estimate the crop provides up to 12 times as much income per acre as conventional farming, and there is violent local resistance to eradication.

"It's almost the devil's own problem," CIA Director Michael V. Hayden told Congress last month. "Right now the issue is stability. . . . Going in there in itself and attacking the drug trade actually feeds the instability that you want to overcome."

"Attacking the problem directly in terms of the drug trade . . . would undermine the attempt to gain popular support in the region," agreed Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency. "There's a real conflict, I think."

The Afghan government has prohibited the aerial herbicide spraying used by U.S. anti-narcotic programs in Latin America. Instead, opium poppy plants in Afghanistan are destroyed by tractors dragging heavy bars. But only 38,500 of nearly 430,000 acres under cultivation were eradicated this year.

Because of security concerns and local sensibilities, all eradication is done by Afghan police, and corruption is a major problem at every level from cultivation to international trafficking. Although the drug trade is believed to provide some financing to the Taliban, most experts believe it is largely an organized criminal enterprise. According to a major report on the Afghan drug industry jointly released last week by the World Bank and the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, key narcotics traffickers "work closely with sponsors in top government and political positions."

The report drew specific attention to the Afghan Interior Ministry, saying its officials were increasingly involved in providing protection for and facilitating consolidation of the drug industry in the hands of leading traffickers. "At the lower levels," the report said, "payments to police to avoid eradication or arrest reportedly are very widespread. At higher levels, provincial and district police chief appointments appear to be a tool for key traffickers and sponsors to exercise control and favor their proteges at middle levels in the drug industry."

Opium cultivation was outlawed during Taliban rule in the late 1990s and was nearly eliminated by 2001. After the overthrow of the Taliban government by U.S. forces in the fall of that year, the Bush administration said that keeping a lid on production was among its highest priorities. But corruption and alliances formed by Washington and the Afghan government with anti-Taliban tribal chieftains, some of whom are believed to be deeply involved in the trade, undercut the effort.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai recently noted that "once we thought terrorism was Afghanistan's biggest enemy" but said that now "poppy, its cultivation and drugs are Afghanistan's major enemy."

Eradication and alternative development programs have made little discernible headway. Cultivation -- measured annually with high-resolution satellite imagery that is then parsed by analysts using specialized computer software -- is nearly double its highest pre-Karzai level.

"There is supposed to be a tremendous energy associated with this," Jones said of the counter-narcotics programs, "but it needs a fresh look because . . . we're losing ground.

Buchanan Named To New Post (PTR)

By Chris Buckley

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, December 2, 2006

Mary Beth Buchanan has been named acting director of the Justice Department's Office on Violence Against Women.

This Washington, D.C.-based office administers financial and technical assistance to communities around the country that are creating programs, policies and practices aimed at ending domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault and stalking.

OVW's mission is to provide leadership in developing the nation's capacity to reduce violence against women through implementation of the Violence Against Women Act. The Office's ultimate goal is to change perceptions about violence against women so that those crimes are considered unacceptable and no longer tolerated in our society.

As director, Buchanan will oversee the administration of approximately $400 million in grant funding. One of the program areas the grants will go to is the Campus Program.

The Grants to Reduce Violent Crimes Against Women on Campus program is designed to encourage institutions of higher education to adopt comprehensive, coordinated responses to violent crimes against women on campuses, including sexual assault, stalking, domestic violence, and dating violence.

Working in partnership with community-based nonprofit victim advocacy organizations and local criminal justice or civil legal agencies, campuses must adopt protocols and policies that treat violence against women as a serious offense and develop victim services and programs in which victim safety, offender accountability, and the prevention of such crimes are central.

Many campuses are beginning to address violent crimes against women by developing campus-based responses that include campus victim services, campus law enforcement, health services, housing authorities, campus administration, student organizations, and disciplinary boards.

Buchanan will continue to serve as United States Attorney for Western Pennsylvania in addition to her new challenges leading the OVW.

Appointed by President George W. Bush Sept. 5, 2001, and confirmed by the United States Senate Sept. 14, 2001, Buchanan is the first woman and youngest person in Pennsylvania's history to be presidentially appointed to this position.

As United States Attorney, Buchanan oversees the prosecution of all federal crimes, and the litigation of civil matters in which the federal government has an interest, throughout the 25 counties in Western Pennsylvania.

Buchanan also served from June 2004 until June 2005 as the director of the Executive Office for United States Attorneys. This Washington D.C.-based office provides administrative support to the 94 United States Attorneys' Offices nationwide.

A native of Roscoe, Buchanan is a 1984 graduate of California University of Pennsylvania, and a 1987 graduate of the University of Pittsburgh School of Law. In March 1999, she received California University of Pennsylvania's Alumni Professional Achievement Award.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Tries To Force The Mother Of Ex-Fidelity Trader To Testify (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission is trying to force the mother of a former Fidelity Investments trader to testify about purchase of shares made in her account at about the time the mutual-fund titan was buying the same security.

Under securities laws, money managers and traders are forbidden from making a personal profit from their inside market knowledge of what their company is buying or selling, or from passing that information to others. Using that advance knowledge -- a practice often called "front-running" -- can be valuable because stocks often rise after big firms like Fidelity make a purchase.

In a filing in U.S. District Court in Boston, the SEC says it wants to compel testimony from Concetta Donovan, mother of former Fidelity trader David Donovan Jr. Along with testimony, the SEC also wants both of Mr. Donovan's parents to produce documents in connection with the purchase of Covad Communications Group Inc. stock in Ms. Donovan's brokerage account in 2003. The SEC's filing says it is also investigating trading based on "material nonpublic information" in the shares of Comverse Technology Inc., and CellStar Corp. and certain other unidentified securities, though it provided few details.

Richard E. Nicolazzo, a spokesman for Mr. Donovan, said "he never took any actions that violated company policies and procedures" while at Fidelity and "remains confident that when the inquiries are completed he will be vindicated."

A lawyer for Concetta Donovan has said her client has been unable to testify because she is on pain medications "that affect her ability to think clearly and process information," the SEC filing said.

Fidelity spokeswoman Anne Crowley said the Boston firm alerted regulators to matters concerning Mr. Donovan in early 2005. He left the company in December 2004, according to National Association of Securities Dealers records.

Since late 2004, the SEC and the NASD have also been probing whether Fidelity traders improperly accepted gifts from brokerage houses doing business with the company, the nation's largest mutual-fund firm. Ms. Crowley said the company had conducted its own review of these matters and sanctioned about 20 employees on Fidelity's equity-trading desk.

Many of them left the company. This week's filing also says that the SEC is investigating the Jefferies & Co. unit of Jefferies Group Inc., which bought and sold stocks for Fidelity and whose employees paid for expensive dinners, golf outings, and private airplane travel for Fidelity traders, people familiar with the matter say. Neither the SEC or NASD has charged Fidelity, Jefferies, Mr. Donovan or members of his family.

S.E.C. Asks Court To Force Parents Of Former Trader To Cooperate (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission asked a federal court to force the parents of a former Fidelity Investments trader to cooperate in an investigation of whether they bought stock based on nonpublic information from their son.

The parents, Concetta and David Donovan Sr., failed to comply with subpoenas issued in April 2005 in connection with their purchase of Covad Communications shares in 2003, according to a filing made by the S.E.C. Thursday in Federal District Court in Boston. Their son, David Donovan Jr., was a trader at Fidelity until March 2005, when he left the company.

The S.E.C. asserts in an affidavit that 55,000 Covad shares were purchased by a brokerage account owned by Concetta Donovan in August 2003 and were sold a month later for a profit of $89,775.

Richard Nicolazzo, a spokesman for David Donovan Jr., said his client “never took any action that violated company policies or procedures,” and he intends to cooperate with regulators. David Bergers, head of the S.E.C.’s Boston office, declined to comment.

The commission’s filings do not allege that either Mr. Donovan or his parents engaged in illegal trading, and do not accuse Fidelity of wrongdoing. A telephone message left for Valerie Carter, a lawyer for Concetta and David Donovan Sr., was not immediately returned.

Shares of Covad, a provider of Internet and network services, tripled in August 2003. Fidelity, the world’s largest mutual-fund company, bought 3.2 million shares for its clients in the preceding month, the S.E.C. filings say.

The S.E.C. asked the court to order Concetta and David Donovan Sr. to provide documents and testify, and to show why they cannot comply with the subpoenas.

A Fidelity spokeswoman, Anne Crowley, said “to our knowledge” the Donovan investigation is a separate incident and not part of any larger investigation of insider trading at the money manager.

Lerach's Enron Lawsuit Against AllianceBernstein Is Dismissed (WSJ)

By Peter Lattman

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

The federal judge overseeing the Enron Corp. shareholders' class-action lawsuit has dismissed a $1 billion claim brought by plaintiffs' lawyer William Lerach against investment firm Alliance Capital Management LP, now known as AllianceBernstein LP.

In a step unusual in securities class-action cases, U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon in Houston ordered the plaintiffs to pay Alliance's attorney's fees. She also stated that the payment of attorney's fees would be "more appropriate" to "be borne" by plaintiffs' counsel.

"We're disappointed in her ruling but Judge Harmon calls 'em as she sees 'em," said Mr. Lerach of Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins LLP. He added that he hopes the judge may change her view or that the plaintiffs may prevail on the issue on appeal, but he says that if attorney's fees "are going to be paid, we're the ones who are going to pay them."

The class-action lawsuit was brought against investment firms for alleged fraud related to their underwriting of Enron securities.

This particular claim concerned the service of an Alliance executive, Frank Savage, on Enron's board of directors and his signing of a false registration statement for the issuance of $1 billion of Enron bonds.

The shareholders alleged that Alliance had placed Mr. Savage on Enron's board to serve its own interest or, at the very least, approved Mr. Savage's Enron board service and thus controlled his actions on the board.

The judge rejected the shareholders' claim, saying, "There is no evidence that Alliance had any authority to influence, supervise or determine Savage's actions at Enron, nor any evidence that Alliance induced Savage to watch out for Alliance's interests while on Enron's board, nor that Savage did watch out for Alliance's interest after joining the Enron board."

She also noted that the shareholders provided no evidence that Mr. Savage "knew or should have known or suspected" that the registration statement was false and misleading at the time he signed it.

Mr. Savage was also named as a defendant in the shareholders' class action and, along with other directors, settled the claim against him without admitting wrongdoing.

"From a public-policy perspective, what we were really litigating here was whether an employer can be held liable for the acts of its employee serving on the board of another company independently," said Alliance's lawyer, Mark Kirsch of Clifford Chance LLP.

Mr. Lerach's firm has secured more than $7 billion in civil settlements for Enron shareholders.

In Unusual Ruling, Law Firm Is Told To Pay Opponent's Legal Fees In Enron Case (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

In a decision that she conceded flies in the face of previous rulings by other courts, a federal judge in Houston has ordered the law firm of William S. Lerach, a leading class-action lawyer, to pay the legal fees and costs of a company he sued.

The company, Alliance Capital, a money management firm, was sued by Mr. Lerach's firm as part of a large Enron class-action case. The lawsuit argued that Alliance should be held responsible for the Enron fraud because an Alliance official was also a director of Enron.

In a decision issued late Thursday, Judge Melinda Harmon of Federal District Court issued a summary judgment dismissing the case against Alliance, and also invoked a rule requiring the payment of Alliance's legal fees by the plaintiff's lawyer, on the ground that the case was pursued after it became clear it was without merit. The decision appears to be the first in which a law firm, and not the plaintiff, has been ordered to pay under that section of the securities law.

It is not clear how much the ruling will cost the Lerach firm, Lerach, Coughlin, Stoia, Geller, Rudman & Robbins of San Diego. Alliance, now known as AllianceBernstein, was directed to submit its bills for the months since Mr. Lerach's firm should have known the case was unreasonable.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Lerach said he would appeal the ruling. "I think we are a long way from paying anybody's legal fees," he said. "At the end of the day, I'll be very surprised if we have to pay."

What was most unusual about the decision was that the penalty was assessed against the law firm. The judge noted that one appellate court — the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in New York — had held that the part of the law permitting such rulings, known as Section 11(e) of the Securities Act of 1933, "was not intended to authorize an award against the parties' attorney."

But Judge Harmon said that no other circuit had adopted that rule, and that "it appears to this court more appropriate that an award of fees and costs under Section 11(e) should be borne by counsel: non-attorney clients more likely than not would not have the ability to determine at what point, based on what evidence, an action becomes legally 'frivolous,' while its licensed counsel should be and is held to such a standard."

The ruling did not cite any other case in which a law firm was held to be liable under the section.

Judge Harmon, who was appointed to the bench by President George H. W. Bush in 1989, said the plaintiff's suspicions about Alliance "were not unreasonable" when the case was filed. But at some point after Mark Savage, the former Enron director and Alliance official, gave a deposition in January 2005, it should have been clear to the Lerach firm that the case had no merit, she said. She said the costs Alliance incurred in preparing for an argument over summary judgment should be paid by the Lerach firm.

"The crux of the judge's order," said Mark Kirsch, a partner in the Clifford Chance law firm, which represented Alliance, "is that after all the facts were known, plaintiffs should have dropped what was clearly an innocent party. They refused to do that.

And by assessing fees, the judge said in no uncertain terms that that's wrong, that's not how class-action litigation is supposed to work." Alliance was ordered to submit itemized costs that the Lerach firm should pay.

Mr. Kirsch said Alliance, in asking for Section 11(e) penalties, had not specified whether the law firm or the investors who were plaintiffs in the class-action suit should be held responsible. The plaintiffs were led by the University of California Board of Regents.

Alliance, one of the largest money managers in the country, was thoroughly humiliated by the Enron collapse. It bought shares as they fell in 2001, believing that the market was overreacting to reports about Enron's accounting problems, and its clients suffered large losses.

Mr. Savage, who was an Alliance executive while he served on the Enron board from 1999 to 2001, was named in the suit because he had signed a registration statement for a bond issue that included false financial statements.

For Alliance to be liable, the judge wrote, it would have had to control Mr. Savage at the time he signed the statement. The judge ruled that there was no evidence of such control, adding that in any case the plaintiffs did not offer evidence "that Alliance or Savage knew or should have known or suspected that the registration statement was false and misleading at the time Savage signed it."

Mr. Lerach's firm was formed in 2004 after he split off from Milberg Weiss, a New York law firm active in class-action suits. Milberg Weiss and two of its partners are now under indictment in connection with what the government contends are illegal payments to class-action plaintiffs, but no charges have been filed against Mr. Lerach or his firm.

Mr. Kirsch, the Clifford Chance partner, said all five lawsuits filed against Alliance over Enron had now been dismissed, including a case filed by the State of Florida, which used Alliance as a money manager for a pension fund. That case ended in a jury verdict in favor of Alliance.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Rabbi Sentenced In Internet Sex Sting (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

A Maryland rabbi caught in a television sting operation was sentenced to 6 1/2 years in prison yesterday for trying to solicit sex from a 13-year-old boy over the Internet.

David A. Kaye, 56, told the judge that he traveled to Herndon for what he thought would be sex with a boy "as a cry out for help to fight my personal demons." Sobbing as he acknowledged his father, who sat in the courtroom in a wheelchair, Kaye said his conviction had made him face "the reality of who I am. . . . I know I need help. I pray that God allows me to get that help."

Kaye's attorney, Peter D. Greenspun, said the rabbi, who was featured last year on the "To Catch a Predator" series on "Dateline NBC," kept his sexuality secret and spent thousands of hours chatting online in search of liaisons.

Kaye thought that he was chatting online with a young adult, Greenspun said. He said Kaye, who is divorced, is in therapy, and he urged a sentence on the low end of federal guidelines, which recommended a term of 63 to 78 months in prison.

"There is a very decent core to this man," Greenspun said.

But U.S. District Judge James C. Cacheris in Alexandria settled on 78 months and said Kaye would then face 10 years of supervised release. The judge said that during that time, Kaye will be forbidden to accept any job involving children, and he ordered him to never be around children younger than 18 without an adult present.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Ed Power had called for a tough sentence and said Kaye's conduct was "a crime of violence in which he essentially tried to rape a 13-year-old boy."

U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg said the lesson of the case "is pretty simple: Stay away from our children."

Kaye, of Potomac, is the former vice president of program at Rockville-based PANIM: The Institute for Jewish Leaders and Values, an educational foundation that trains Jewish leaders. He resigned last year after informing the organization that he would be on "Dateline."

Kaye was convicted in September after a two-day bench trial in which prosecutors presented evidence of sexually graphic chats between him and the boy. In reality, the boy was a 26-year-old man working for Perverted Justice, a group that tries to expose adults who use the Internet for sexual activity with children.

Perverted Justice was working with "Dateline," which paid the watchdog group to create a pedophile sting that ran as a series of TV reports. When Kaye arrived at the Herndon house that the group had set up, he was confronted on camera by NBC correspondent Chris Hansen.

"You know I'm in trouble. I know I'm in trouble," Kaye told Hansen, according to Cacheris's opinion. The judge convicted Kaye on one count of coercion and enticement and one count of travel with intent to engage in illicit sexual conduct.

Other men lured to the Herndon home included a schoolteacher from Prince George's County and a physician from the Eastern Shore.

Some defense lawyers have challenged the TV sting operations as entrapment, and experts in media ethics have questioned NBC's decision to pay Perverted Justice, because mainstream news organizations typically do not pay sources for their cooperation. NBC has defended the arrangement, saying that the programs have raised public awareness of Internet pedophilia.

Cacheris's opinion said that NBC paid Perverted Justice $100,000.

During the trial, prosecutors presented outtakes from the NBC show and a log of Kaye's chats with the person posing as a 13-year-old. Using the screen name "REDBD," Kaye initiated the chats, Cacheris wrote.

Rabbi Sentenced In Web Sex Sting (AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press

AP, December 2, 2006

A Rockville rabbi ensnared in a nationally televised sex sting was sentenced to 61/2 years in prison yesterday for attempting to have sex with someone whom he thought to be a 13-year-old boy.

David A. Kaye, 56, was convicted in U.S. District Court in Alexandria in September of enticement and traveling across state lines to engage in illegal sexual conduct.

Most of the evidence came from a televised sting on "Dateline NBC" that was conducted in conjunction with an Internet watchdog group called Perverted Justice.

A Perverted Justice member posing as a 13-year-old boy met Kaye in an online chat room in August 2005, and Kaye solicited sex acts.

When Kaye drove to what he thought was the boy's home in Herndon, he was instead confronted by a television reporter and camera crew and conceded he was there for "not something good."

During yesterday's hearing, prosecutors said Kaye's crime was not an isolated incident and submitted affidavits from others who claimed Kaye engaged in improper conduct, including one incident at a youth camp as far back as 1974.

Details of that incident were not discussed, and the affidavits are under seal. Kaye denied any improper conduct.

The 78-month sentence from U.S. District Judge James Cacheris was at the high end of federal sentencing guidelines, and will be followed by an unusually long period of supervised release -- 10 years.

Kaye also will be required to register as a sex offender and is barred from having unsupervised contact with minors.

Kaye yesterday said that he thinks his actions last year were "a cry out for help."

"I do accept responsibility for my actions last year, and I know I need help," said Kaye, who broke down sporadically throughout the hearing, usually when he turned back to the courtroom gallery and made eye contact with his elderly father.

Kaye testified at his trial that he led a double life and frequently used the Internet to facilitate homosexual liaisons.

He said he knew the person he was chatting with was older than 13 and assumed he was an adult, but played along with what he assumed to be role playing.

Judge Cacheris, who convicted Kaye following the bench trial, wrote in his opinion that Kaye's testimony was not credible in "veracity, demeanor, cadence, tenor and inflection of his voice as well as the consistency of his answers on cross examination."

Kaye was a rabbi at a congregation in Potomac for 16 years and at the time of the sting he was vice president of a Rockville-based Jewish youth organization called PANIM: the Institute for Jewish Leaders and Values.

The Perverted Justice sting at the Herndon home, which ensnared 19 men over a three-day period, has resulted in multiple convictions and prison sentences.

Perverted Justice says its stings have resulted in more than 100 convictions nationwide since 2004. The group has an ongoing partnership with NBC to produce additional shows, titled "To Catch a Predator."

Last month in Texas, a man about to be arrested after being caught in a Perverted Justice sting shot and killed himself when police tried to arrest him.

Consultant Pleads Guilty In Bridge Commission Scam (PHI)

By Toni Callas

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0100947

Robert Stears, a consultant and lobbyist, pleaded guilty today to defrauding the Burlington County Bridge Commission of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and failing to pay federal taxes for six years.

During his plea hearing before U.S. District Judge Jerome B. Simandle, Stears, 51, answered "yes" to 31 allegations, holding his head in his hands as the list continued.

He admitted that he submitted inflated and fraudulent bills to the bridge commission from 1997 to 2003. He also did not file income tax forms from 1999 to 2004.

In pleading guilty, Stears gave up his right to an appeal. His sentencing date is scheduled for March 30, and he faces up to 25 years in prison.

Stears told the court he created the Strategy Group, a Trenton consulting firm that performed lobbying and public relations work for the commission from 1997 to 2002. Stears admitted that he was the sole liaison between the commission and the consulting group and was aware of "virtually all transactions," the U.S. Justice Department said. Stears also said he prepared the invoices submitted to the commission monthly.

The company paid the group $300,000 a year from 1997-1999 and more than $500,000 a year from 2000 to 2002.

In 2002, Stears received more than $300,000 in taxable income on which he did not pay income taxes; he owes $112,863 in taxes on that alone. He admitted that he tried to hide that money from the government in a checking account under the name of his new venture: Governmental Strategies. He did not file federal income taxes from 1999 to 2004, the justice department said.

In 2003, Stears left Strategy Group and started the new firm, of which he was the sole owner. Subsequently, the commission parted with Strategy Group and signed on with Stears' new venture.

He collected more than $100,000 from the commission under this business.

In the first four months after starting the new company, Stears admitted, he handed in false invoices, stating that his employees did work that they did not perform.

Voting Machine Firm Denies Tax, Bribery Allegations (MH)

By Alfonso Chardy And Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, December 2, 2006

Smartmatic, an international company with offices in Boca Raton, has contacted the Justice Department to deny allegations that its Venezuelan owners paid a bribe to secure a $91 million contract to supply electronic voting machines in Venezuela, an attorney for the firm said Friday.

"We have informally told the Justice Department that there is no basis for these allegations," said Jeffrey Bialos, a Washington, D.C. attorney retained by Smartmatic.

He said Justice officials told the company this fall that it was not the target of a criminal investigation, nor has it received any subpoenas.

The company, incorporated in Delaware, also denied allegations that it failed to pay U.S. income taxes.

Smartmatic's denials mark yet another chapter in the convoluted saga of the Boca Raton firm that last year bought Sequoia Voting Systems of Oakland, Calif., one of the nation's leading suppliers of electronic voting machines. Sequoia machines operate in Washington, D.C. and 16 states, including four counties in Florida: Palm Beach, Indian River, Hillsborough and Pinellas. Smartmatic machines will be used in Sunday's presidential election in Venezuela.

Smartmatic also is being investigated by a Treasury-led panel over whether the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, increasingly at odds with President Bush, is a secret business partner. Smartmatic has denied any link to the Chávez government.

In another development, Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y., who helped spark the Smartmatic probe by the Treasury-led Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, sent a letter Thursday to Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson Jr. to urge his agency to publicize its findings as soon as the review is completed.

The Wall Street Journal reported Friday that the Justice Department has been probing Smartmatic for possible violations of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and possible tax evasion. A Justice Department spokesman on Friday refused to comment.

El Nuevo Herald reported Thursday that agents from the Internal Revenue Service and the Federal Bureau of Investigation are investigating allegations involving tax evasion, an excessive commission to a lobbyist in Caracas and alleged death threats by Smartmatic President Antonio Mugica.

In a statement sent to El Nuevo Herald, a copy of which the company sent Friday to The Miami Herald, Smartmatic said Mugica ``has never threatened any employee."

The statement said the company has concluded that the allegations came from two former employees who ``appear to be acting in a manner inconsistent with their separation and confidentiality agreements."

Bialos said Smartmatic sent the ex-employees -- a chief financial officer and comptroller -- "cease and desist" letters, reminding them of the confidential nature of their "voluntary termination" agreements. He said Smartmatic would take legal action, if necessary, but was not attempting to stop them from talking with authorities.

Smartmatic raised suspicions among Chávez's critics after The Miami Herald revealed in May 2004 that two of its main owners, Mugica and Alfredo Anzola, also owned Bizta Corp. -- a small software company in Caracas in which the Venezuelan government had a 28 percent ownership stake.

The disclosure sparked concern among Chávez's political opponents because Bizta, Smartmatic and Venezuelan telephone giant CANTV had won the $91 million contract to supply electronic voting machines before the 2004 referendum that Chávez won. Just before the referendum took place, Bizta announced it would buy back the government shares.

Concern resurfaced after Smartmatic acquired Sequoia last year and Maloney asked the Treasury-led group to investigate. The Miami Herald reported in October that the interagency panel had begun a full-fledged investigation into whether the Chávez government played a behind-the-scenes role in Smartmatic. Smartmatic later confirmed that it had "voluntarily submitted" to the review.

Brookly McLaughlin, a Treasury spokeswoman, said Friday there was nothing new to report on the investigation.

The panel determines whether a particular foreign investment "threatens to impair the national security of the United States." The panel has an initial 30 days to review a transaction but can extend the probe 45 more days if at least one member of the committee determines that a particular investment threatens to impair national security. Though no one would say whether the probe is now in the 45-day stage, all indications are that it is. The Miami Herald reported on the original review in July.

According to procedures, the panel can recommend that the president suspend or prohibit the investment in question or offer another recommendation or none at all.

El Nuevo Herald said Thursday that federal investigators were reviewing Smartmatic payments to Morris Loyo, a retired Venezuelan air force captain with "ample connections" to the Chávez government, as commissions for helping to obtain the voting machine contract.

Smartmatic confirmed employing Loyo "as a lobbyist/salesperson and independent contractor to assist in securing election contracts in Venezuela" but would not say how much he was paid.

Getting 40 Gold Coins, And A Role In A Corrupt Governor's Downfall (NYT)

By Alison Leigh Cowan

To many people, Lawrence E. Alibozek epitomized much that was wrong with the ill fated administration of Gov. John G. Rowland of Connecticut.

From the moment Mr. Alibozek joined the governor's office as his deputy chief of staff in the fall of 1997, the improper favors flowed. It started with $9,500 from a state contractor so that he could buy a new car. Later, Mr. Alibozek's boss, Peter N. Ellef, handed him an envelope stuffed with cash in the Capitol parking lot with a promise of more to come.

After five years, enough money and gifts had changed hands at the highest levels of state government that federal prosecutors needed 22 pages to list everything that was taken and to tell a bit of the stories behind them.

In the case of Mr. Alibozek, there were limousine rides to hotels in Boston and New York, vacations in Maine and Florida, the use of a 65-foot yacht, and dinners and getaways for him and his mistress, a state official. There were the 40 gold coins he buried in his backyard — a symbol of corruption at its most blatant — that he had accepted in exchange for steering a contract.

But what the public did not know was how much the government's successful prosecution of Mr. Rowland on bid-rigging charges, which drove him from office in his third term, depended on Mr. Alibozek's cooperation, and the price he has paid.

"I can tell you this," said Hugh F. Keefe, the lawyer who represented Mr. Ellef, the governor's co-chief of staff, "he was a significant part of the prosecution's case, in my case, in Ellef's case."

Federal prosecutors advised Mr. Alibozek not to comment because they needed his testimony at a trial of his former associates. His own sentencing was put off until their cases were resolved so that the value of his assertions could be assessed. His lawyer, William T. Gerace, said yesterday: "He's in limbo right now. He can't move on, and he'd like to."

But now that those cases have been successfully prosecuted, Mr. Alibozek's own sentencing is scheduled for January, suggesting that the impasse may be ending. It will be a cathartic end to a long-running investigation in which he was derided as an unstable informer and a symbol for much of the misconduct, and later was the subject of harassment.

"Let's hope so," said Hope Seeley, a Hartford lawyer who has represented several figures in the investigation, including Kristine Ragaglia, Mr. Alibozek's former mistress. "It's a sad chapter in Connecticut."

The public will also get a more complete portrait of a man who feasted on improper favors, but who belatedly tried to distance himself from his co-conspirators.

Mr. Alibozek, 61, grew up in Torrington, Conn., graduated from what is now Central Connecticut State University, and spent four years in the Air Force, rising to staff sergeant. "He's no fancy-pants Republican," said Tom D'Amore, a neighbor in New Hartford who was once the head of the state Republican Party.

Soon after taking office in 1995, Mr. Rowland, a Republican, hired Mr. Ellef, a Cigna executive, to head his economic development team. Mr. Ellef, in turn, recruited Mr. Alibozek, a colleague at Cigna.

In 1997, Mr. Ellef became a chief of staff for the governor, and Mr. Alibozek was named the deputy. At Cigna, the two executives had become acquainted with William A. Tomasso, a contractor with ambitions for his family's construction and property-management business. Once Mr. Ellef and Mr. Alibozek joined the governor's inner circle, Mr. Tomasso's share of state business increased by tens of millions of dollars.

Court papers detail many of their secret arrangements. In one, Mr. Alibozek told prosecutors that in 1998 Mr. Ellef handed him a cash-filled envelope in the Capitol parking lot. He said he was told the money from Mr. Tomasso was theirs to split — with the understanding that Mr. Ellef would steer business his way.

Mr. Alibozek also told of receiving the $9,500 from Mr. Tomasso for a car and the 40 American Eagle gold coins worth $10,800; the coins were given to him because as the year 2000 approached, there were widespread fears that computer problems could bring the economy to a halt.

Mr. Alibozek also described how Mr. Tomasso bought him expensive dinners, gave him limousine rides and provided him with cash — perks he often shared with Ms. Ragaglia, at the time the head of the State Department of Children and Families.

In November 1998, when the state decided to build a juvenile prison, Mr. Ellef and Mr. Alibozek saw to it that Mr. Tomasso was the only potential bidder to accompany state officials to an Ohio correctional facility that was emerging as the model for the project.

In addition, Ms. Ragaglia — who told investigators last summer that she and Mr. Alibozek were romantically involved at the time — admitted in a sworn statement that she used her influence, at Mr. Alibozek's behest, to help steer the contract to Mr. Tomasso by telling a subordinate to make sure that his company was on the short list of bidders.

Later, when she was serving on a panel that selected the contractor, she said she heeded Mr. Ellef's instructions and voted for Mr. Tomasso. Although never charged with a crime, Ms. Ragaglia resigned from state government in July. Her lawyers declined to comment about her.

Once the juvenile prison was on track, Mr. Alibozek left the governor's office in July 1999 and spent several months running a lawn-and-garden business that prosecutors later described as yet another way for Mr. Tomasso to funnel money to Mr. Alibozek and his former colleagues.

With Connecticut reeling from the news in September 1999 that a former state treasurer, Paul Silvester, pleaded guilty to corrupt acts while in office, court papers show that Mr. Alibozek informed his partners in the landscaping business "shortly thereafter" that he wanted to pull out. They obliged him by dissolving the business, he told prosecutors, and he then "walked away" for good and ended his friendship with Mr. Ellef.

Three years later, investigators, emboldened by their prosecution of Mr. Silvester on corruption charges, came calling on Mr. Alibozek at his home in August 2002. By September, Mr. Alibozek had reached a formal agreement with prosecutors to cooperate in the investigation of Mr. Rowland and his aides.

Less than two months later, Mr. Rowland was handily elected to a third term, so Connecticut residents hardly knew what to make of the announcement the following spring by the United States attorney that Mr. Alibozek had pleaded guilty to accepting "cash, gold, and other items and services" in exchange for steering contracts to an unidentified contractor when he was the governor's deputy chief of staff.

Governor Rowland insisted he was not under investigation. Yet behind the scenes, Mr. Alibozek's cooperation was credited by many lawyers in the case with providing the road map used to convict Mr. Ellef and Mr. Tomasso on conspiracy charges and the governor on charges he deprived the public of honest services.

Mr. Rowland pleaded guilty in December 2004 and has already completed the year-and-a-day sentence handed down by Judge Peter C. Dorsey. Mr. Ellef and Mr. Tomasso are still serving the 30-month sentences they received in October 2005.

And Mr. Alibozek waits. Still married, he keeps busy by helping neighbors with their landscaping and caring for his two teenage children.

Mr. D'Amore, a friend of 30 years, said Mr. Alibozek was under great strain because of the publicity, exacerbated by a heart condition and efforts by Mr. Tomasso's lawyers to refute or shake Mr. Alibozek's testimony.

Investigators, for instance, have examined whether someone associated with Mr. Tomasso was involved in tapping Mr. Alibozek's phone, slashing his tires, or stealing his mail. Mr. Alibozek's family has also complained of being followed in their cars and even being bumped. Federal agents at one point seized surveillance equipment belonging to Mr. Tomasso's private investigators, but a spokesman for the United States attorney declined to comment.

Mr. Gerace, Mr. Alibozek's lawyer, said his client "has suffered greatly."

A sign that the investigation into the role of Mr. Alibozek was nearing an end emerged recently when he was scheduled for sentencing next month before Judge Dorsey.

The plea agreement calls for a sentence of 24 to 30 months, but some defense lawyers and friends say a reduced sentence is warranted.

But how much is a matter of dispute.

Feds Indict Daley Campaign Worker (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Dan Mihalopoulos, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, December 2, 2006

HDO coordinator charged in hiring probe

Pressing forward with their investigation of Mayor Richard Daley's political machine, federal prosecutors unsealed an indictment Friday against a campaign coordinator in the powerful Hispanic Democratic Organization.

John Resa, 48, an employee with the city's Water Management Department, was charged with lying when he told a grand jury that he had not sought city jobs to reward campaign workers for HDO.

Prosecutors alleged that Resa regularly lobbied his superiors in HDO--including a former high-ranking city official--to get jobs, promotions and other benefits for his political workers. He pleaded not guilty Friday morning.

Resa's indictment offered a new glimpse into how authorities are homing in on HDO, which for years was the most potent street army in Daley's political organization.

Authorities say HDO was deeply involved in a long-running scheme to rig city hiring for Daley loyalists, in violation of court decrees restricting political influence in City Hall hiring. The mayor's patronage chief, Robert Sorich, and three other former city officials were sentenced to prison in November for their roles in the scheme.

In Sorich's trial last summer, prosecutors described HDO leaders and former Daley aides Victor Reyes and Al Sanchez as co-schemers. Neither man has been charged with a crime.

Resa is the first HDO member to be indicted in the hiring investigation and the first person charged in the hiring scheme since Sorich's arrest in July 2005.

Investigation heats up

Resa was granted immunity from prosecution in exchange for his testimony in front of the grand jury in October. In recent months, investigators have scoured the Southeast Side--where Resa and Sanchez are from--questioning other HDO members about the group's activities and leaders.

Resa testified that he told the campaign workers that he would pass along their requests only as a ploy to "keep them coming to campaigns," according to the indictment.

"Once you tell them they ain't nothing in there, they're going to take off on you," the indictment quoted him as saying.

Resa acknowledged to the grand jury that many of his campaign workers got jobs as city truck drivers, but he claimed that he did not lobby on their behalf, prosecutors alleged.

During Sorich's trial, prosecutors tracked the hiring scheme to 1989, the year Daley became mayor. Under Daley, patronage spoils at City Hall shifted from Democratic ward organizations to new political groups.

HDO became the largest patronage army in the new Daley machine, growing particularly powerful after Reyes joined the mayor's office and Daley appointed Sanchez as his Streets and Sanitation commissioner.

At election time, HDO workers fanned out across the city's burgeoning Latino neighborhoods to help elect Daley, Gov. Rod Blagojevich, U.S. Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) and other politicians. Hundreds of HDO campaign workers won coveted blue-collar spots on the city payroll, even as the group's leaders denied that they promised public employment to reward political help.

Fresh details of clout

Resa's indictment offers fresh details of HDO's clout. High-ranking Daley administration officials engineered entry-level city jobs, promotions, "increased overtime opportunities," transfers to preferred job sites and raises for HDO members, prosecutors alleged.

Resa was part of HDO Southeast, which had as many as 500 campaign workers, and Resa commanded the largest unit, with as many as 70, prosecutors said.

From 1994 until early 2005, Resa's superiors in HDO were a high-ranking city official and another Daley administration official. Although the indictment does not name those two individuals, Sanchez fits the description of the high-ranking city official who led HDO Southeast. Sources said the city official who assisted him was George Esquivel, now an assistant Streets and Sanitation commissioner.

Esquivel said Friday he had spoken with federal investigators but declined to comment further.

Asked about Resa's indictment, Sanchez's lawyer, Daniel Pierce, said, "I have no idea what they are talking about."

Sanchez was Resa's political sponsor when he sought a city hoisting engineer job in the early 1990s, according to a clout list maintained by Daley's office. Resa and his family members have contributed $4,075 to HDO and HDO-backed candidates, public records show.

The city put Resa on paid administrative leave after his indictment Friday. Resa went on disability leave in April 2003 and returned to work Nov. 15 as a watchman.

City Worker Charged With Lying, Sign Of More To Come (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI And TIM NOVAK, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, December 2, 2006

A city worker with ties to the Hispanic Democratic Organization was charged Friday with lying to a federal grand jury — a clear signal federal authorities are tearing into the powerful political group.

John Resa, 48, was accused of lying to a grand jury probing HDO activities by denying he helped get political campaign workers city jobs through his ties with the organization.

The indictment lays out the HDO structure and its active voter outreach efforts, in a sign there's more to come.

When Resa wanted to get jobs for workers, he went to a former high-ranking city official for help, identified as "Individual A" in the indictment.

Resa, who worked in the water department, was featured in October in the Sun-Times investigation of clout-backed city workers on sick leave. Resa missed more than 1,100 days of work since 2003 because of injuries he reported to his neck, back and left arm suffered while riding in a city truck on Feb. 6, 2003.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins said Resa headed a political army made up of 70 to 80 volunteers.

"This is part of a bigger investigation that does allege a scheme," Collins said.

Resa, a Southeast Side political coordinator for HDO, appeared in court this morning with his lawyer John Callahan Jr. and pleaded not guilty.

Prosecutors call the charges against Resa an outgrowth of the Hired Truck federal probe, initially spurred by a comprehensive 2004 Sun-Times investigation into waste and mismanagement in that program. Resa is the 45th person charged in the investigation.

FBI Taps Cell Phone Mic As Eavesdropping Tool (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh And Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News.com, December 2, 2006

Agency used novel surveillance technique on alleged Mafioso: activating his cell phone's microphone and then just listening.

The FBI appears to have begun using a novel form of electronic surveillance in criminal investigations: remotely activating a mobile phone's microphone and using it to eavesdrop on nearby conversations.

The technique is called a "roving bug," and was approved by top U.S. Department of Justice officials for use against members of a New York organized crime family who were wary of conventional surveillance techniques such as tailing a suspect or wiretapping him.

Nextel cell phones owned by two alleged mobsters, John Ardito and his attorney Peter Peluso, were used by the FBI to listen in on nearby conversations. The FBI views Ardito as one of the most powerful men in the Genovese family, a major part of the national Mafia.

The surveillance technique came to light in an opinion published this week by U.S. District Judge Lewis Kaplan. He ruled that the "roving bug" was legal because federal wiretapping law is broad enough to permit eavesdropping even of conversations that take place near a suspect's cell phone.

Kaplan's opinion said that the eavesdropping technique "functioned whether the phone was powered on or off." Some handsets can't be fully powered down without removing the battery; for instance, some Nokia models will wake up when turned off if an alarm is set.

While the Genovese crime family prosecution appears to be the first time a remote-eavesdropping mechanism has been used in a criminal case, the technique has been discussed in security circles for years.

The U.S. Commerce Department's security office warns that "a cellular telephone can be turned into a microphone and transmitter for the purpose of listening to conversations in the vicinity of the phone." An article in the Financial Times last year said mobile providers can "remotely install a piece of software on to any handset, without the owner's knowledge, which will activate the microphone even when its owner is not making a call."

Nextel and Samsung handsets and the Motorola Razr are especially vulnerable to software downloads that activate their microphones, said James Atkinson, a counter-surveillance consultant who has worked closely with government agencies. "They can be remotely accessed and made to transmit room audio all the time," he said. "You can do that without having physical access to the phone."

Because modern handsets are miniature computers, downloaded software could modify the usual interface that always displays when a call is in progress. The spyware could then place a call to the FBI and activate the microphone--all without the owner knowing it happened. (The FBI declined to comment on Friday.)

"If a phone has in fact been modified to act as a bug, the only way to counteract that is to either have a bugsweeper follow you around 24-7, which is not practical, or to peel the battery off the phone," Atkinson said. Security-conscious corporate executives routinely remove the batteries from their cell phones, he added.

FBI's physical bugs discovered

The FBI's Joint Organized Crime Task Force, which includes members of the New York police department, had little luck with conventional surveillance of the Genovese family. They did have a confidential source who reported the suspects met at restaurants including Brunello Trattoria in New Rochelle, N.Y., which the FBI then bugged.

But in July 2003, Ardito and his crew discovered bugs in three restaurants, and the FBI quietly removed the rest. Conversations recounted in FBI affidavits show the men were also highly suspicious of being tailed by police and avoided conversations on cell phones whenever possible.

That led the FBI to resort to "roving bugs," first of Ardito's Nextel handset and then of Peluso's. U.S. District Judge Barbara Jones approved them in a series of orders in 2003 and 2004, and said she expected to "be advised of the locations" of the suspects when their conversations were recorded.

Details of how the Nextel bugs worked are sketchy. Court documents, including an affidavit (p1) and (p2) prepared by Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Kolodner in September 2003, refer to them as a "listening device placed in the cellular telephone." That phrase could refer to software or hardware.

One private investigator interviewed by CNET News.com, Skipp Porteous of Sherlock Investigations in New York, said he believed the FBI planted a physical bug somewhere in the Nextel handset and did not remotely activate the microphone.

"They had to have physical possession of the phone to do it," Porteous said. "There are several ways that they could have gotten physical possession. Then they monitored the bug from fairly near by."

But other experts thought microphone activation is the more likely scenario, mostly because the battery in a tiny bug would not have lasted a year and because court documents say the bug works anywhere "within the United States"--in other words, outside the range of a nearby FBI agent armed with a radio receiver.

In addition, a paranoid Mafioso likely would be suspicious of any ploy to get him to hand over a cell phone so a bug could be planted. And Kolodner's affidavit seeking a court order lists Ardito's phone number, his 15-digit International Mobile Subscriber Identifier, and lists Nextel Communications as the service provider, all of which would be unnecessary if a physical bug were being planted.

A BBC article from 2004 reported that intelligence agencies routinely employ the remote-activiation method. "A mobile sitting on the desk of a politician or businessman can act as a powerful, undetectable bug," the article said, "enabling them to be activated at a later date to pick up sounds even when the receiver is down."

For its part, Nextel said through spokesman Travis Sowders: "We're not aware of this investigation, and we weren't asked to participate."

Other mobile providers were reluctant to talk about this kind of surveillance. Verizon Wireless said only that it "works closely with law enforcement and public safety officials. When presented with legally authorized orders, we assist law enforcement in every way possible."

A Motorola representative said that "your best source in this case would be the FBI itself." Cingular, T-Mobile, and the CTIA trade association did not immediately respond to requests for comment. Mobsters: The surveillance vanguard

This isn't the first time the federal government has pushed at the limits of electronic surveillance when investigating reputed mobsters.

In one case involving Nicodemo S. Scarfo, the alleged mastermind of a loan shark operation in New Jersey, the FBI found itself thwarted when Scarfo used Pretty Good Privacy software (PGP) to encode confidential business data.

So with a judge's approval, FBI agents repeatedly snuck into Scarfo's business to plant a keystroke logger and monitor its output.

Like Ardito's lawyers, Scarfo's defense attorneys argued that the then-novel technique was not legal and that the information gleaned through it could not be used. Also like Ardito, Scarfo's lawyers lost when a judge ruled in January 2002 that the evidence was admissible.

This week, Judge Kaplan in the southern district of New York concluded that the "roving bugs" were legally permitted to capture hundreds of hours of conversations because the FBI had obtained a court order and alternatives probably wouldn't work.

The FBI's "applications made a sufficient case for electronic surveillance," Kaplan wrote. "They indicated that alternative methods of investigation either had failed or were unlikely to produce results, in part because the subjects deliberately avoided government surveillance."

Bill Stollhans, president of the Private Investigators Association of Virginia, said such a technique would be legally reserved for police armed with court orders, not private investigators.

There is "no law that would allow me as a private investigator to use that type of technique," he said. "That is exclusively for law enforcement. It is not allowable or not legal in the private sector. No client of mine can ask me to overhear telephone or strictly oral conversations."

Surreptitious activation of built-in microphones by the FBI has been done before. A 2003 lawsuit revealed that the FBI was able to surreptitiously turn on the built-in microphones in automotive systems like General Motors' OnStar to snoop on passengers' conversations.

When FBI agents remotely activated the system and were listening in, passengers in the vehicle could not tell that their conversations were being monitored.

Malicious hackers have followed suit. A report last year said Spanish authorities had detained a man who write a Trojan horse that secretly activated a computer's video camera and forwarded him the recordings.

New Hampshire: Phone-Jamming Settlement (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

The New Hampshire Democratic Party, which had sought compensation in an Election Day 2002 phone-jamming scheme, settled its lawsuit against the Republican Party for an undisclosed sum, state Republicans said. The case had been expected to go to trial Monday. Republicans had hired a telemarketing firm to place hundreds of hang-up calls to phone banks for the Democrats and the Manchester firefighters' union, a nonpartisan group offering rides to the polls. Service was disrupted for nearly two hours. Wayne Semprini, the Republican state committee chairman, said the party deplored the phone-jamming that took place.

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

Las Vegas police said they would recommend that no criminal charges be filed against Republican Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons, who was accused by a cocktail waitress of assaulting her in a parking garage three weeks before election day.

The investigation into Chrissy Mazzeo's accusation has been completed and sent to Clark County Dist. Atty. David Roger, police said. Roger has the final say as to whether the five-term congressman, who defeated his Democratic opponent, Dina Titus, by 4 percentage points, will be charged. Roger said he would review the file before reaching a decision.

L.A. Archdiocese To Pay $60 Million To Settle 45 Sex Abuse Cases (WP)

By John Pomfret, Washington Post Staff Writer

LOS ANGELES, Dec. 1 -- Almost five years after a sex scandal erupted within the Roman Catholic Church, the nation's largest archdiocese announced Friday that it will pay $60 million to settle 45 lawsuits alleging sex abuse by priests.

The deal, which involves incidents alleged to have occurred before 1955 and after 1986, constitutes the largest settlement made by the archdiocese and follows years of legal battles waged under the leadership of Cardinal Roger Mahony. The archdiocese still faces more than 500 lawsuits by other individuals alleging sexual abuse.

In a statement, Mahony called the settlement "a positive step forward in the Church's efforts to promote healing and reconciliation for those who have suffered abuse by members of the clergy."

"The sexual abuse of minors is both a sin and a crime, and there is no place in the priesthood for those who have abused children," Mahony said. "I pray that the settlement of the initial group of cases will help the victims involved to move forward with their lives and to build a brighter future for themselves and their families."

Ray Boucher, the lead plaintiff's attorney, said the settlement involved 22 priests who were accused of a broad spectrum of sexual behavior, including impregnating a woman and multiple acts of sodomy against young boys. "You have serial pedophiles and priests accused of one or two acts," he said. The archdiocese will pay $52 million and religious orders $8 million, he said.

Jeff Anderson, another attorney in the case, said a main sticking point between the victims and the archdiocese was not so much the money but the victims' demands that documents held by the church related to sexual abuse be released to the public.

"There is no doubt that there are documents there that are extremely incriminating to the hierarchy of the archdiocese of L.A., to the cardinal and his lieutenants and his predecessor," Anderson said, adding that the diocese had fought victims' demands that the documents be released all the way to the Supreme Court.

Substantial allegations of sexual abuse by priests surfaced in early 2002 focusing on the Archdiocese of Boston. Victims groups sprang up around the country, and lawsuits rolled in. In California, the state legislature passed a law in 2002 suspending for one year the statute of limitations for sex crimes. As such, more than 1,000 cases alleging sexual abuse by priests were filed in California, the highest in the nation by a factor of five.

Sex abuse by Roman Catholic priests has cost the U.S. church at least $1.5 billion since 1950. According to research commissioned by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, more than 5,000 priests, close to 5 percent of all priests who have served in the country, have been credibly accused of abusing more than 12,500 people. Four dioceses -- Tucson; Spokane, Wash.; Portland, Ore.; and Davenport, Iowa -- sought bankruptcy protection from a flood of lawsuits. Only Tucson has emerged from the process.

The payout announced Friday will constitute one of the highest per capita awards nationwide. In total value, it will be the second-largest in California, behind the Diocese of Orange's 2004 agreement to spend $100 million to settle 90 abuse claims.

William F. McMurry, a lawyer from Louisville who won a $26 million settlement from the Archdiocese of Louisville in 2003, called Mahony's decision the wise and moral thing to do and predicted it would help to heal the church's reputation.

But David Clohessy, the national director of the Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, charged that no diocese had dragged the process out longer than Los Angeles. Clohessy said all U.S. bishops or archbishops embraced legal maneuvers, such as citing the First Amendment or the statute of limitations, to protect their dioceses and themselves against lawsuits and criminal proceedings. But, he said, Mahony was the most aggressive.

"He's exhausted the full panoply of delay tactics, and he's gone beyond to invent others," Clohessy said. Among those tactics, Mahony has claimed that any communication between a priest and his superiors must be interpreted as a confession and therefore is protected under the law. And, his attorneys have argued, any communication made by a seminarian is privileged as well.

Tod M. Tamberg, director of media relations for the archdiocese, countered that what Mahony should be known for is his attempts to help victims heal. "Cardinal Mahony has been unique among American bishops in conducting private meetings with victims," he said. "He prays for the victims every day in Mass. He prays in his personal chapel."

Archdiocese In Los Angeles Settles Claims Of Sex Abuse (NYT)

By Cindy Chang

LOS ANGELES, Dec. 1 — The Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Los Angeles has agreed to a $60 million settlement of claims by 45 people against clergymen who had sexually abused them as children, the archdiocese announced Friday.

The average payment of about $1.3 million to each plaintiff is among the highest in a sexual abuse settlement involving clergy members. In October, the archdiocese settled seven other claims for a total of $10 million.

The archdiocese will pay $40 million of the settlement from its central operations fund with the rest coming from insurance money and the religious orders of the 25 accused clergymen. The money will not be taken from individual parishes, Cardinal Roger M. Mahony, the head of the archdiocese, said in a telephone interview.

Over 500 sexual abuse lawsuits are still pending against the archdiocese, the country's largest. Payouts in those cases would come mostly from insurance, but the archdiocese may have to sell property or reduce ministry services to make up the difference, Cardinal Mahony said.

"Is it going to hurt? Oh sure, we could have used the money for other pastoral works," he said. "But it's also an acknowledgment and a recognition of our responsibility, that the church failed these people. The church accepts responsibility, and I accept responsibility."

The settlement also involves the release of some documents related to the abuse cases, in a manner to be determined by a judge.

Raymond P. Boucher, a lawyer for 31 of the plaintiffs, criticized the archdiocese for announcing the settlement before the details were final, but he did not dispute its general terms. Payments to individual plaintiffs range from about $500,000 to as much as $3.5 million, Mr. Boucher said.

"You look at the 45 victims, and you see that almost all of them would have lived normal lives and normal healthy lives and had wonderful childhoods if the church had taken responsibility to stop these priests from molesting these children," Mr. Boucher said. "It's a clear indictment of the church and the pattern of cover-up they've engaged in for years and years."

The earliest of the accusations dates from the 1940s and the most recent from the late 1990s. Many of the accused were repeat offenders, Mr. Boucher said, including Michael Wempe, a retired priest who was sentenced in May to three years in prison for molesting a boy.

Another accused priest in the settlement, according to Mr. Boucher, was the Rev. Michael Baker, who confessed to then-Archbishop Mahony in 1986 that he had had a sexual relationship with two young boys. After undergoing counseling, Father Baker was assigned to parishes where he still had access to young boys, according to files released by the archdiocese.

Prosecutors have charged Mr. Baker, who was removed from the priesthood in 2000, with sexually abusing a boy for 12 years beginning in 1984 when the victim was 7.

"Many years ago, we really believed that these offenders could be cured and we acted on that information," Cardinal Mahony said in the interview. "We found out in the early 1990s that that was not true."

Barbara Blaine, president of the Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests, said the archdiocese made "a business decision" to avoid the expense of going to trial. She said of the victims, "I don't believe any amount of money can restore their shattered childhoods, the innocence that was destroyed or the emotional scars that haunt them today."

L.A. Catholic Sex Suits Settled (AP)

LOS ANGELES (AP) -- The nation's largest Roman Catholic archdiocese said yesterday it will pay $60 million to settle 45 sex abuse lawsuits, the largest payout yet by the Archdiocese of Los Angeles and among the biggest resulting from the molestation crisis that has plagued the church.

"It's a day of healing and reconciliation as we move forward with these 45 cases," Cardinal Roger Mahony said. "This is very special for these victims in their moment of healing."

The claims settled yesterday involve 22 priests and include accusations from two periods when the archdiocese had limited or no insurance against sexual abuse claims -- prior to the mid-1950s and after 1987.

Cardinal Mahony said $40 million of the payment would come from the archdiocese, while $20 million would be from religious orders plus a small amount of independent insurance coverage.

Negotiations on the deal had been in progress for at least a year but were held up because attorneys for the plaintiffs wanted the church to release the accused priests' private files.

The agreement calls for an independent judge to review those files and decide which documents can be released to the victims. That process is expected to take several months.

Ray Boucher, the lead plaintiffs' attorney, said the settlement was the largest the Los Angeles Archdiocese had reached "by far." Mr. Boucher said at least two plaintiffs had died while awaiting the resolution.

"I wasn't certain we would ever get it done, but thankfully 45 very injured people will have a chance to begin to heal, particularly at this time of the year," he said. "The big concern is the 700 or 800 victims who are out there who still have claims pending."

Mr. Boucher said that not all of the plaintiffs' attorneys had signed off on the finalized documents, but that process was expected to be completed by Monday.

David Clohessy, national director for the Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, said he was happy for the victims who were part of the settlement but remained angry at Cardinal Mahony and other church leaders.

"We recognize it for what it is, which is a purely business move designed to keep Mahony out of depositions and off the witness stand. That's what every bishop fears the most and that's why they settled," Mr. Clohessy said.

Sex abuse by Roman Catholic priests has cost the U.S. church at least $1.5 billion since 1950.

CIVIL LAW:

Justices To Decide If Citizens May Challenge White House's Religion-Based Initiative (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1 — The Supreme Court agreed Friday to decide whether private citizens are entitled to go to court to challenge activities of the White House office in charge of the Bush administration's religion-based initiative.

A lower court had blocked a lawsuit challenging conferences the White House office holds for the purpose of teaching religious organizations how to apply and compete for federal grants. That constitutional challenge, by a group advocating the strict separation of church and state, was reinstated by an appeals court; the administration in turn appealed to the Supreme Court.

The case is one of three appeals the justices added to their calendar for argument in February. A question in one of the other cases is whether a public school principal in Juneau, Alaska, violated a student's free-speech rights by suspending him from school for displaying, at a public off-campus event, a banner promoting drug use.

Together with a third new case, on whether federal land-management officials can be sued under the racketeering statute for actions they take against private landowners, the additions to the court's docket raised the metabolism of what had begun to look like an unusually quiet term. It had been just short of a month since the justices accepted any new cases.

As in the case the justices heard on Wednesday on the administration's refusal to regulate automobile emissions that contribute to climate change, the question in the White House case is the technical one of "standing to sue." And as the argument on Wednesday demonstrated, standing is a crucially important aspect of litigation against the government.

In its lawsuit challenging the White House conferences, filed in Federal District Court in Madison, Wis., in 2004, an organization called the Freedom From Religion Foundation named as defendants more than a dozen administration officials who oversaw or participated in the conferences.

The lawsuit alleged that the officials were using tax dollars in ways that violated the separation of church and state required by the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment. For example, the complaint quoted Rod Paige, then the secretary of education, as telling the audience at a 2002 White House conference that "we are here because we have a president, who is true, is a true man of God" and who wanted to enable "good people" to "act on their spiritual imperative" by running social service programs with federal financial support.

Judge John C. Shabaz of Federal District Court dismissed the lawsuit for lack of standing, finding that the officials' activities were not sufficiently tied to specific Congressional appropriations. Taxpayers' objections to the use of general appropriations could not be a basis for standing, he said. The president's Faith-Based and Community Initiative was created through a series of executive orders and not by Congress, he noted.

The decision was overturned, and the lawsuit reinstated, in a 2-to-1 ruling by the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in Chicago. Writing for the majority, Judge Richard A. Posner said the distinction cited by Judge Shabaz made no difference. Judge Posner said the plaintiffs were entitled to challenge the conferences "as propaganda vehicles for religion," even if they were neither financed through a specific Congressional appropriation nor made grants directly to religious groups.

As a general matter, people do not have standing, based solely on their status as taxpayers, to challenge the expenditure of federal money. The Supreme Court's precedents have carved out religion cases as an exception to this general rule.

In its appeal, Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation, No. 06-157, the administration is arguing the exception is a narrow one, "designed to prevent the specific historic evil of direct legislative subsidization of religious entities," a definition that the administration says does not apply to the conferences. For the federal courts to permit such a lawsuit, its brief asserts, would upset "the delicate balance of power between the judicial and executive branches" and open the courthouse door to anyone with a "generalized grievance."

The student free-speech case the justices accepted, Morse v. Frederick, No. 06-278, is an appeal by a high school principal, Deborah Morse, who suspended a student, Joseph Frederick, after an incident during the Olympic Torch Relay that came through Juneau in 2002. Students were allowed to leave class to watch the parade. Mr. Frederick and some friends unfurled a 20-foot-long banner proclaiming “Bong hits 4 Jesus,” a reference to smoking marijuana.

When the student refused to take down the banner, claiming a First Amendment right to display it off school property, the principal confiscated it and eventually suspended him for 10 days. Mr. Frederick filed a lawsuit, which the Federal District Court in Juneau dismissed.

But the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that the punishment violated the student’s First Amendment rights and, further, that the principal was liable for damages, in an amount to be determined by the district court. Ms. Morse’s Supreme Court appeal challenges both the appeals court’s interpretation of the First Amendment and its refusal to shield her from financial liability through a doctrine known as qualified immunity.

The third new case, Wilkie v. Robbins, No. 06-219, is a government appeal on behalf of employees of the Bureau of Land Management in a dispute with a Wyoming landowner who charged them with using tactics amounting to extortion to get him to grant public access to his property. The federal appeals court in Denver held that a racketeering suit based on the extortion charge could proceed.

Blind Welcome Change In Bills (PTR)

By Andrew Johnson, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, December 2, 2006

In a world where trust is in short supply, the kindness of strangers has always worked for Korene Kegg.

"The five's on top," said Lori Waleslagle, 26, of Debbie's Diner in Greenfield, as she handed back $9 in change to Kegg.

Kegg, who has been blind since she was 5, can't possibly know if Waleslagle is telling the truth; still, the Greenfield woman instinctively folds what she believes to be that five neatly in half and then in half again, and keeps it separate from what presumably are four ones, after purchasing a hot tea from Waleslagle.

After living 22 years on Greenfield Avenue, Kegg, 49, said she knows the neighborhood well enough to trust most people.

Kegg's need for others to distinguish paper money might end if a recent court ruling holds.

The American Council of the Blind filed a lawsuit four years ago in U.S. District Court in Washington, charging that the U.S. Treasury Department discriminates against the blind by not distinguishing denominations of paper money by size or feel.

The currency violates Section 504 of the federal Rehabilitation Act, which says the federal government shall not discriminate, said Day Al-Mohamed, director of advocacy and governmental affairs for the council.

U.S. District Judge James Roberston this week ordered the government to fix the problem.

"It's great," Al-Mohamed said.

The Treasury Department had no comment, spokeswoman Jennifer Zuccarelli said.

The Justice Department has until Friday to decide whether to appeal to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, said Charles Miller, spokesman for the Justice Department's civil division, which is defending the Treasury Department in the case.

If it chooses not to appeal, Miller said, the government has 30 days from Tuesday's decision to discuss how to fix the problem.

Al-Mohamed said the ruling could benefit the estimated 7 million visually impaired or blind Americans.

"It sounds like such a small thing," she said. But, "it's going to lead to more independence, and it's going to lead to more jobs" for the blind. At the very least, it will benefit those already working.

Mike Matthews, 27, has operated the cash register at the State Office Building's snack bar, Downtown, for nearly five years. He was born with glaucoma and is legally blind.

Still, "I think it would help," he said, when it comes to doing his job.

Matthews said he struggles to read the "fives" and "tens" on crisp new bills. When he's dealing with faded bills, Matthews will ask a colleague for help.

A change in the size of bills won't help with the worst problem, though, Matthews said.

"I don't like dollar coins," he said, explaining they feel like Kennedy half-dollars.

John Cicchitello, 38, of Swissvale, the snack bar's owner -- who is blind -- said he knows that a change wouldn't be a cure-all.

"If you're in a hurry, you're not going to have time to tell," he said about different bill sizes, especially a business like his that serves about 200 people a day. "There's still going to be a problem."

Cicchitello guesses that he has been cheated twice in the two years he has owned the luncheonette.

Some merchants said any change in paper currency wouldn't radically alter their relationship with blind customers.

Sabrina Pasparage, 27, human resources manager at the Giant Eagle in Greenfield, said Kegg is one of seven blind people who regularly shop there. Many of them call ahead, asking if an employee can help them shop.

Kegg said most blind people develop a cash-folding system. Her $1 bills are folded once in half. Her 20s are folded once, but the long way. On the rare occasion she gets 50s and 100s, she might put them in a different pocket.

Kegg said she's never been cheated.

"The overwhelming majority of people are nice," she said.

Still, a change in bills would be exciting, Kegg said.

"You used to have disabled (people) adapt to the environment," she said. "Now, you see a lot of the environment adapting to the disabled."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

The Bradenton Herald, December 2, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. - The FBI has begun a civil rights investigation into the case of unarmed black man shot dead by police while driving a carjacked sport utility vehicle, authorities said.

Troy Eddines, 21, was killed and Travis Jackson was wounded when the officers fired on the stolen vehicle they were riding in Tuesday. Two officers had pulled over the SUV, which reversed as they approached and hit one of them in the leg, authorities said.

The officers fired fewer than eight shots, said Detective Kathy Collins, a Fort Lauderdale police spokeswoman.

The FBI opened its investigation Thursday after receiving phone calls from City Commissioner Carlton Moore and the NAACP, FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said.

The death is the fourth fatal shooting by Fort Lauderdale police this year, authorities said.

Fort Lauderdale NAACP leaders have called for a reform of the police department's internal oversight system, saying the department had lost the ability to police itself.

The Fort Lauderdale Police Department and an NAACP spokesman did not return phone calls Saturday to The Associated Press.

Legislators And Black Leaders Urge State Action (FLSUNSEN)

By Akilah Johnson And Gregory Lewis, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, December 2, 2006

Fort Lauderdale · Two state legislators on Friday joined the chorus of black leaders calling for greater scrutiny of the Fort Lauderdale Police Department following this week's fatal police shooting, the fourth for the department this year.

State Rep. Perry Thurston Jr., D-Fort Lauderdale, wrote a letter asking the Florida Department of Law Enforcement to investigate the three shootings that involved black men, saying his constituents "question the tactics of our police department."

State Sen. Mandy Dawson, D-Fort Lauderdale, said she would ask Senate leaders to take a statewide look at police-involved shootings to determine such factors as how often they occur and the age of officers involved.

The FBI has already begun a civil rights investigation into Tuesday's fatal shooting of Troy Eddines and the wounding of Travis Jackson, both 21.

Marsha Ellison, president of the Fort Lauderdale branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said her office plans to ask federal officials to broaden that investigation. She wants them to look at all recent Fort Lauderdale police shootings, along with the department's policies, procedures and practices, particularly when it comes to use of force.

"We believe that the Fort Lauderdale Police Department cannot police itself," Ellison said. "Sadly, a few bad apples can spoil the efforts of those men and women who put their lives on the line to serve and protect the community."

Eddines and Jackson were shot in the 500 block of Northwest 17th Avenue on Tuesday afternoon, after police pulled them over in a Mistubishi that had been carjacked a few days earlier in Coconut Creek. Police said that when officers pulled over the SUV, Eddines put the car in reverse and accelerated.

Adora Obi Nweze, state NAACP president, said officers need better training to be more culturally sensitive to the people in the minority neighborhoods they patrol.

"The NAACP is going to build profiles on each officer," Nweze said. "We want to know who they arrest, by age, race and gender; who is involved when they are discharging their weapons, by age, race and gender; and who they are killing, by age, race and gender."

At a chaotic community meeting at the Mizell Center on Thursday night, Police Chief Bruce Roberts told the crowd that each officer receives 40 hours of diversity training each year. Capt. Gregory Salters said the department is increasing recruitment efforts to improve diversity.

Some in the community remain skeptical.

"It is not felt by the community that our Police Department is making an effort to find out what took place," City Commissioner Carlton Moore said Friday.

Moore said the department seems more concerned with highlighting Eddines' and Jackson's criminal records. Eddines has been arrested 10 times since 2003 and Jackson 26 times since 1999, state criminal records show.

"It doesn't matter if he stole a Popsicle the day before," Moore said. "What matters is he's dead, and there was not a weapon at the site to show the public that there was a need for this type of use of force."

Officers fired "less than" eight bullets, officials said Thursday night. But exactly why the officers fired is not known because Hill and Norvis have not, yet, been interviewed. Such delays are not unusual because officers in such shootings are allowed to secure legal representation first.

The NAACP said Friday that they also planned to become a conduit by which members of the northwest community can file complaints against the police. Often, Ellison said, people are too intimidated to file complaints with the city.

"When we file a complaint, the one we file a complaint on comes back and harasses us," Sharanda Morgan, 37, said Thursday night.

To help combat this, Ellison said the organization will collect complaints at the Mizell Center, file complaints on a citizen's behalf, or NAACP members will accompany people to the Police Department to file complaints.

Court Takes 'Bong Hits 4 Jesus' Free Speech Case (AP)

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court stepped into a dispute over free speech Friday involving a suspended high school student and his banner that proclaimed "Bong Hits 4 Jesus."

The justices agreed to hear the appeal by the Juneau, Alaska, school board and principal Deborah Morse of a lower court ruling that allowed the student's civil rights lawsuit to proceed. The school board hired former Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth Starr to argue its case to the high court.

Morse suspended Joseph Frederick after he displayed the banner, with its reference to marijuana use, when the Olympic torch passed through Juneau in 2002 on its way to the Winter Games in Salt Lake City.

Frederick, then a senior, was off school property when he hoisted the banner but was suspended for violating the school's policy of promoting illegal substances at a school-sanctioned event.

The Alaska case was one of three appeals the court accepted Friday.

ON DEADLINE: Your thoughts?

It will also consider a request from the Bush administration to kill a lawsuit challenging the White House's promotion of federal financing for faith-based charities.

The program has been a staple of President Bush's political agenda since 2001, when he created the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives.

The Freedom from Religion Foundation, based in Madison, Wis., claims that the administration is violating a constitutional ban on state-supported religions by singling out particular faith-based organizations as worthy of federal funding.

Over administration objections, a federal appeals court earlier said the foundation's members could mount a court challenge to a program funded by Congress.

The court also agreed to hear an appeal from federal Bureau of Land Management officials who are trying to stop a lawsuit by Wyoming ranch owner Harvey Frank Robbins. Robbins accuses the federal officials of persecuting him in an effort to get him to give the government access to roads that cut across his land.

In the banner case, the school board upheld the suspension, and a federal judge initially dismissed Frederick's lawsuit. The 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals said the banner was vague and nonsensical and Frederick's civil rights had been violated.

At that point, the school board retained Starr, who investigated President Clinton's relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky. He took the case free of charge.

The appeals court said that even if the banner could be construed as a positive message about marijuana use, the school could not punish or censor a student's speech because it promotes a social message contrary to one the school favors.

Frederick said his motivation for unfurling the banner, at least 14 feet long, was simple: He wanted it seen on television since the torch relay event was being covered by local stations. When Morse saw it, she crossed the street from the school, grabbed the banner and crumpled it. She later suspended Frederick for 10 days.

The court is expected to hear arguments in the case in late February. In addition to the First Amendment issue, the court also will consider whether Morse can be held personally liable for monetary damages.

Morse, now the Juneau district's coordinator of facilities planning, said: "I think it's important for school administrators all across the country to have some guidance in how to enforce school rules at school activities without risking liability."

Frederick, who had been attending the University of Idaho, is teaching abroad this semester, said Michael Macleod-Ball of the ACLU of Alaska Foundation. An ACLU lawyer has been representing Frederick.

"I suppose we are a little surprised" that the court took the case," Macleod-Ball said. "The facts are so unique that I don't think they lend themselves well to crafting significant new law."

The cases are Juneau School Board v. Frederick, 06-278, Grace v. Freedom From Religion Foundation, 06-157, and Wilkie et al v. Robbins, 06-219.

Federal Oversight Of Mental Health System Ends (AP)

AP, December 2, 2006

U.S. District Judge David Ezra has signed an order ending more than 15 years of federal oversight of the state's mental health system.

The oversight, which began in 1991 with a U.S. Justice Department lawsuit alleging violations of the constitutional rights of patients at Hawai'i State Hospital, ended Thursday, state officials announced yesterday.

"This is a historic moment in the reform of state services for persons in our community with severe and persistent mental illness who need hospital care and community-based follow-up," state Department of Health Director Chiyome Fukino said.

"The state has made tremendous improvements in our mental health system, and ... we will continue to move forward to build on and improve the way these services are provided," she said.

The hospital emerged from oversight in late 2004, but the federal government kept watch over how the state provided services to the mentally ill in the community. On Oct. 24, Ezra cleared the way for the federal oversight to end when he essentially approved the latest federal magistrate's status report.

Cops I.D. 4th Man - But Vics Rip Their Story (NYDN)

By Alison Gendar, Ethan Rouen And Corky Siemaszko, Daily News Staff Writers

New York Daily News, December 2, 2006

A confidental NYPD document providing the most detailed account of the police shooting that plunged the city into crisis was obtained yesterday by the Daily News - as sources unmasked the mystery man who cops say fled the scene. High-ranking law enforcement sources identified Jean Nelson, a 27-year-old Queens man known on the streets as M.O., as the so-called fourth man.

Investigators believe Nelson ran off just before the 50-shot police barrage that killed Sean Bell on his wedding day - a claim Nelson's lawyer and the two survivors reject as absurd.

In the confidential police report obtained by The News, Lt. Gary Napoli, the highest-ranking officer at the shooting, references the mystery man - and says he believes Bell knew the plainclothes lieutenant was a cop before shots were fired.

Napoli says that he "may have observed a male attempting to get into the passenger side" of Bell's car early Saturday outside a strip club in Jamaica, Queens, although he was unsure if the man was trying to get into the front- or backseat - or even if he got into the car.

Napoli also says that when his unmarked car passed Bell's Nissan Altima a "male with whom he had made eye contact . . . knew that he was a police officer."

"Lt. Napoli could not fully verbalize why he felt this way," the report states, although Napoli is white and the neighborhood is largely black.

DOJ_NMG_0100961

Napoli, who ducked for cover when the shooting erupted, was not one of the five cops who fired, killing Bell, 23, and wounding Trent Benefield, 23, and Joseph Guzman, 31.

The three men were not armed. Napoli's account is significant because Benefield and Guzman say Bell hit the gas thinking they were about to be carjacked - and insist they didn't know the plainclothes officers were cops.

Benefield, who was wounded by three bullets, and Guzman, who was hit 11 times, both say there was no fourth man.

Napoli does not mention Nelson by name. But if there was a fourth man and cops can prove he had a gun, the shooting could be viewed differently by the grand jury probing Bell's death.

A police source said cops have figured out which officer or officers fired the rounds that killed Bell. But NYPD brass refused to comment last night.

The city's medical examiner recovered all four bullets that hit Bell. Three were intact - including the shots to his neck and right hip, which killed him. The fourth shattered in his arm, but all fragments were recovered.

Bell, Benefield and Guzman were shot after an undercover cop followed them out of the Kalua Cabaret. Believing Guzman had a gun, the undercover tailed the men to Bell's car and says he fired the opening salvo after Bell clipped him with the car and Guzman reached toward his waistband.

Nelson, who attended Bell's bachelor bash at the club, was taken into custody Thursday during a series of police raids, as The News revealed yesterday. But he was released after he called his lawyer, Charlie King.

King and attorneys for other witnesses blasted the police tactics, charging that cops were running a "parallel" investigation to the grand jury probe in a bid to rattle witnesses. King said Nelson had already agreed to testify before the grand jury before cops grabbed him Thursday night outside his apartment.

"It is almost as if there are two investigations," King said. "I don't know who is authorizing their investigation, but it seems hellbent on trying to find a phantom gunman."

King leveled the charges as hundreds crowded a Queens church for the wrenching wake and funeral for Bell. King said he wasn't blaming Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly or Mayor Bloomberg for ratcheting up tensions in Jamaica. King even credited Bloomberg, who called the shooting excessive, for setting "the right tone."

"The real problem from my vantage point is on the low level of the police, at the precinct level," King said. "This kind of police conduct is frightening."

The National Urban League called for immediate intervention by the U.S. Justice Department's Civil Rights Division. But Deputy Police Commissioner Paul Browne insisted there was no parallel investigation. The NYPD is assisting the Queens district attorney's investigation, he said. The NYPD raids began early Wednesday and led to the arrests of three people on gun charges unrelated to last Saturday's shooting. One of the men picked up, Eric Kellam, a 29-year-old Bronx man with a rap sheet, told The News cops busted his nose.

"They were screaming, 'Where's the f-----g gun!' " he said. "I'm like, 'What are you talking about? What gun?' " Kellam - who said he does not know Bell, the wounded men or Nelson - was not charged with a crime.

The cops who shot Bell - two black, two white and one dark-skinned Hispanic - have been placed on paid leave and told to give up their guns, pending the grand jury probe.

Slaughter surrenders documents

Southern University System President Ralph Slaughter is cooperating with a federal grand jury investigating sexual harassment allegations against governor's aide Johnny Anderson, who also is head of Southern's governing body, the lawyer representing Slaughter said Friday.

Slaughter responded to a subpoena and turned over all documentation of the claims Southern employees made against Anderson, said attorney Liz Craft of Baton Rouge.

The request came through the U.S. Department of Justice this week, said Craft, who personally represents Slaughter.

The information could not be confirmed through the Justice Department late Friday.

Slaughter has declined commenting all week.

"He (Slaughter) wants to protect the women who were courageous enough to come forward," Craft said.

The Governor's Office received the allegations Oct. 31, Craft said.

Anderson is Gov. Kathleen Blanco's assistant chief of staff. He also is chairman of the Southern University System Board, which makes him Slaughter's boss.

Falcon had expressed his frustration throughout the week at the lack of progress he made in getting records of the accusations from the university.

But Falcon said he received a letter Friday from Southern Board of Supervisors Vice Chairman Myron Lawson stating that the university will begin cooperating fully.

Anderson has maintained his innocence and argued that the allegations are politically motivated, while criticizing Slaughter for not handling the matter internally.

Knowledge of the accusations against Anderson were first publicized a month after Slaughter sent a letter to state Sen. Charles D. Jones, D-Monroe, who is chairman of the Senate and Governmental Affairs Committee, asking for a confidential investigation.

Meanwhile, at news conference Friday, more than 100 people heard several pastors offer support to Anderson, including Southern Chancellor Ed Jackson, Athletics Director Greg LaFleur, former Attorney General Richard Ieyoub and Metro Councilman Byron Sharper.

Sharper said he could relate to Anderson since he had a sexual harassment complaint against him earlier this year that was later dropped.

Ieyoub, for whom Anderson worked in the attorney general's office, said he is disappointed that it seems politics has come into play too much.

Friday's news conference at Greater Mount Olive Baptist Church was organized by local pastors the Rev. S.C. Dixon of Greater Mount Olive Missionary Baptist Church, the Rev. Gerard Robinson of McKowen Baptist Church and Rev. Leo Cyrus of New Hope Baptist Church and Second Baptist Church.

Cyrus said he wanted to support Anderson, who he said would never do anything to hurt Southern. He described the accusations and the way they were publicized as a politically-motivated "power struggle," declining to name names.

Profiled In Prince George's (WP)

By Leonard Pitts Jr.

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

I have a question for Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson and Police Chief Melvin C. High.

It concerns my youngest son, who is 21. He was walking to his car at Bowie Town Center after working a shift at one of the stores there Sunday night when a police officer met him at his car and asked if he had seen anything "suspicious." Bryan said no. The officer asked where he was coming from. Bryan told him. The officer asked for his license and registration. Bryan gave them to him.

After 20 minutes my son was allowed to drive away. Less than two minutes later he was pulled over, still at the mall. He asked why. "I'll ask the questions," said this officer. The questions were: Where are you going, where are you coming from? Again, Bryan answered. Again, he was asked for his license and registration. A few minutes later, he was ordered out of his car with his hands up, and police began to search the vehicle.

Six police cars converged on this scene. Having received a call from a friend who happened to be at the mall, I went, too.

I went because there are periods when Prince George's police pull one or another of my sons over about once a week. I went because a police officer once Maced my middle son in the face -- five people saw this -- for no reason. I went because that son was once punched in the face by a Prince George's officer while handcuffed. I went because of the time that police, looking for a 5-foot-7 suspect, arrested Bryan, who is 6-foot-3. I went because a police officer cursed my 16-year-old daughter one night after she refused to leave the safe and lighted area where she was waiting for her mom to pick her up from the movies. I went because I am sick and tired of being sick and tired.

And I went because of the obstructed windshield.

That's what it said on the citation when Bryan was pulled over last year. He went to court and took the "obstruction" with him: one of those air fresheners in the shape of a Christmas tree. The judge barely bothered to hide her contempt while dismissing the charges.

Sunday night at the mall, I got into an argument with a couple of officers and mentioned that incident as an example of blatant, oppressive harassment. One officer responded that "technically" the citation was correct.

I found that a telling defense. I mean, "technically," you can probably be arrested for spitting on the sidewalk. How can citizens have confidence in police who justify such transparent harassment with such flimsy excuses? That's what I asked those officers and, receiving no satisfactory reply, now ask their superiors.

One police officer answered my question with a question: "What does a drug dealer look like?" he asked. The implication being that, because you can never tell who the bad guy is on sight, police must sometimes be creative in finding reasons to stop people they have suspicions about.

I might find it easier to buy that argument if the people who are being stopped didn't always seem to look pretty much the same -- that is, pretty much like my son: young, black and male. Maybe I'm wrong, but I suspect there aren't all that many white women who have to show up in court because of air fresheners. No, when you go to the courthouse, virtually all the people you see telling it to the judge (and "virtually all" is an overwhelming percentage, even in a county that is 65 percent African American) are black.

If somebody commits a crime -- my son or anybody else's son -- he or she should pay the price. I mean that. And I respect police who do that difficult and often thankless job with honor. I mean that, too. But the price my sons pay in being stopped with such regularity has nothing to do with crime, and I cannot respect arrogance, rudeness, wrongness and racial profiling that hide behind a badge.

It's no accident that this department spent years under investigation by the Justice Department for federal civil rights violations. Or that a 2001 government study found Prince George's police more brutal in dealing with black suspects than white ones. Or that a 2001 report in The Post found that Prince George's police shoot more people -- half of them unarmed -- than virtually any other urban department in the country.

For years we have been promised that all this will change. Yet there sits my son on the ground while police write up a citation. Windows too darkly tinted and an open-container violation -- which my son strongly denies -- are the latest excuses.

How can I respect a police force that operates like this? Until the county executive and the police chief give a better answer than their officer did Sunday, I'll assume they don't know either.

Fallout From Racial Bias Case Forces L.A. Fire Chief To Quit (WP)

By Sonya Geis

LOS ANGELES, Dec. 1 -- The Los Angeles fire chief was forced to resign yesterday amid a political firestorm sparked when the City Council offered a huge legal settlement to a black firefighter whose colleagues served him dog food.

The ouster of the fire chief capped weeks of racially divisive controversy over the dog-food incident, which some called a prank and others a humiliating racial attack. After the Los Angeles City Council offered the firefighter a $2.7 million settlement last month, local radio talk show hosts ridiculed the size of the award and urged listeners to send cans of dog food to council members.

Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa (D) vetoed the proposed settlement but also began distancing himself from Chief William Bamattre, who is white. In response to a question at a news conference Wednesday, Villaraigosa said he would be proud to have the department headed by an African American, a woman or a Latino.

Bamattre was recruited in 1995 to transform a department bashed by repeated discrimination lawsuits from women and minorities. Earlier this week he called his revisions in the department "an organizational failure" and "a personal failure." Bamattre said with no harsher punishment than a 30-day suspension at his disposal, he could not force the changes he sought.

The recent action is just one in a string of lawsuits by female and minority Los Angeles firefighters, 12 percent of whom are black, 53 percent white and 29 percent Latino.

In his lawsuit, firefighter Tennie Pierce, a 6-foot-5-inch 19-year veteran of the department, alleged that in 2004 fellow firefighters served him a plate of spaghetti laced with dog food, laughed as he ate it and barked at him for a year afterward. Pierce, 51, sued alleging racial discrimination, retaliation and intentional infliction of emotional distress.

Pierce nearly wept as he told the city council this week: "This is wrong. If four black firemen did it to a white fireman, I would stand up [with] the white fireman and say it was wrong."

Pierce admitted he took part in hazing rituals himself after photos publicized by radio hosts John Kobylt and Ken Chiampou showed Pierce and others spraying a bound firefighter with water and helping shave a firefighter's groin. Pierce told the City Council he considered those pranks that did not rise to the level of what he suffered.

The firefighters who served Pierce the dog food said they were trying to humble Pierce, who called himself "Big Dog."

Council member Herb Wesson said yesterday that he thinks the city will lose money by allowing Pierce's case to go to trial. An audit last year, which would likely be admissible in court, describes a culture of racism and sexism in the Los Angeles Fire Department, Wesson noted.

"If I were his attorney, I'd be salivating right now," he said. "She goes in with so much ammo, I'm flabbergasted that we're not settling."

Wesson added: "When the fire alarms go off in the fire stations in L.A., our guys, and ladies, do a great job. It's when they get back to the dormitories, I just don't know what the heck happens."

Fire Chief Submits Resignation (LAT)

By Duke Helfand, Steve Hymon

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

Los Angeles Fire Chief William Bamattre submitted his resignation to Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa today, announcing that he will leave his post on Jan. 1.

A Villaraigosa aide said the mayor spoke with Bamattre this morning and accepted his resignation.

The fire chief, a 31-year veteran of the department and a former mayor of Dana Point, will be replaced by Villaraigosa over allegations of racial harassment and bias that have plagued the fire department for years.

"I have always placed the interest of the department above my own personal interest," Bamattre said, reading from prepared remarks at his afternoon news conference where he was flanked by about 50 uniformed officers. "I am also a political realist. Over the past few days I have come to appreciate that these current issues have political implications beyond the scope of the Fire Department.

"I have become the focus of the debate," Bamattre added, "and that is to the detriment of the LAFD. I will not allow that to continue. This is my decision and the appropriate time. I have spoken with the mayor and he is in agreement."

Bamattre kept his composure nearly all the way through his remarks. He departed only briefly from his prepared comments at the end, when he said "I would like to thank all of the firefighters" — as he began choking up — "and my family."

He did not take any questions and was escorted to his Toyota Prius by firefighters. His sister then leaned inside the car window and kissed him.

Standing nearby was Councilman Dennis Zine, who had driven to the fire station after the council's meeting in Van Nuys had ended. Zine said he wanted to personally thank Bamattre for his service, but didn't have a chance.

Zine has been the council's leading opponent of settling the case that ultimately brought down the chief.

Bamattre's departure has been the subject of discussions between the mayor's office and the chief for several months.

The two sides began talking about needed changes and the best time for the chief to leave in the aftermath of an audit released earlier this year by City Controller Laura Chick. The audit found that many minority recruits reported either experiencing or hearing of harassment within the department.

Villaraigosa did not ask Bamattre directly for his resignation. Instead, his chief of staff, Robin Kramer, met with Bamattre earlier this week to convey the mayor's view that it was time for a change in leadership to address the ongoing allegations of bias and harassment in the fire department.

"She sat down with him and they agreed that a change in leadership was in the best interest of firefighters in the department and the city at large," said a City Hall source who spoke on condition of anonymity. "They had a frank discussion. The mutual conclusion was that now was the time to make a change, and if you're gong to change the culture of the department, you have to make a change at the top."

Bamattre is the seventh fire chief in the past 50 years, and only the second since 1983. He was promoted to the top job in 1995, a 43-year-old agent of reform charged with the difficult task of cleaning up a department then reeling from allegations that female and African American firefighters were being pushed of the department by their own peers.

But Bamattre's position grew shaky in recent months with the arrival of Chick's audit and amid escalating tensions over the case of former firefighter Tennie Piece, an African American who sued the city alleging that he had been fed a spaghetti dinner laced with dog food as part of a racist stunt.

The City Council agreed to a $2.7-million settlement with Pierce, but Villaraigosa vetoed the deal after a public uproar ensued and photos of Pierce engaging in hazing came to light. The council upheld the mayor's veto on Wednesday.

As the drama played out at City Hall, the Piece case became a tipping point for Bamattre.

"I think it's the right move," said Pat McOsker, the outgoing president of United Firefighters of Los Angeles, the city's firefighter's union. "We appreciate his service for the last 11 years, but he was hired to fix these issues in the fire service and here we are again."

"We need someone who has a stake in the outcome and who will be around and can be held accountable for the changes that need to be made," McOsker added.

Asked what criteria he wants to see in a fire chief, Villaraigosa said:

"I want a change agent. Whether that chief is white, black, a woman, gay, lesbian. Whatever it is. We want a change agent. Someone who will not tolerate discrimination….If there were a vacancy, make no mistake, we would want someone from within, from without, who wants to address this issue."

Villaraigosa's office tried to carefully choreograph Bamattre's departure, allowing the chief to hold his news conference before the mayor weighed in. Villaraigosa has scheduled a 3 p.m. news conference at City Hall.

One Villaraigosa aide said the idea was to let Bamattre "be a man," allowing the chief to announce his departure on his own terms.

Many leaders in the black community implored the Council this week to defy the mayor and override his veto of the $2.7-million settlement. The council fell four votes short, but the issue deeply divided the 15-member body.

Fire Chief Steps Down In Los Angeles In Bias Case (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

LOS ANGELES, Dec. 1 — The chief of the Los Angeles Fire Department resigned Friday under pressure from Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa, after a hazing scandal in which a black firefighter sued the city, claiming his dinner was laced with dog food by his white colleagues.

The chief, William Bamattre, who was hired in 1996, had been given responsibility for overhauling the culture of a department dogged by charges of discrimination. On Friday, Chief Bamattre did not discuss the reasons for his resignation in the prepared statement announcing his departure.

The incident involving the Los Angeles firefighter, Tennie Pierce, elucidated the complex culture of the urban firehouse, in which hazing rituals are common and gender and race remain underlying tinderboxes of departmental relationships. In January, the city's controller released a report documenting a long pattern of harassment and discrimination in the department.

In his suit, Mr. Pierce described a dinner in his Westchester neighborhood firehouse, during which he realized that his meal had been tainted with dog food, while other firefighters looked on, laughing. At the city attorney's urging, the City Council voted to pay the firefighter $2.7 million to settle the suit quietly.

But that settlement, which would have been among the largest of its kind in the city's history, was vetoed by Mayor Villaraigosa when it was revealed by a local radio program that the firefighter himself had participated in numerous fire station pranks over the years.

Among them were spraying colleagues with mustard and in one instance helping to shave the genital area of a firefighter who had been bound to a gurney.

On Wednesday, the Council upheld the mayor's veto — the only veto he has issued during 17 months in office — in a 9-to-6 vote. Among the six who voted to overturn the veto were the Council's three African-American members.

In emotional testimony before the Council, Mr. Pierce argued that the prank perpetrated against him was different from other hazing rituals because it was delivered with a racial subtext, something some civil rights groups concurred with.

Hazing has long been a tradition in fire departments around the nation, and one that has come under increased scrutiny as firehouses have become more racially diverse and hired more women.

While some of the rituals clearly have sexual and racial overtones, others are more ambiguous, and the punishments can seem arbitrary.

"The thing that is interesting about firefighter culture is that the whole hazing and practical joking and slamming and all that stuff that goes on serves a purpose among firefighters," said Carol Chetkovich, an associate professor of public policy at Mills College in Oakland and the author of a book about gender and race in the fire service. "The firefighters are concerned with personal qualities of people they work with, because lives depend on each other."

This week, the Los Angeles Fire Commission has unanimously approved departmentwide disciplinary guidelines, which outline harsher penalties for hazing.

Councilman Dennis Zine, a former police officer and the lone vote against the original settlement, said Friday that he felt the fire chief was being scapegoated, and that the department needed to overhaul its internal practices.

"This whole issue here is the rituals they go through," he said, "which turns a firehouse into a nursery school."

Los Angeles Fire Chief Retires Amid Racial, Hazing Flaps (AP)

AP, December 1, 2006

LOS ANGELES, California (AP) -- The city's fire chief announced his retirement Friday amid a racially charged furor involving a black firefighter who was served spaghetti mixed with dog food.

Chief William Bamattre, 54, said the scandal had "political implications beyond the scope of the Fire Department."

"I have become the focus of the debate and that is to the detriment of the LAFD," he said. He planned to step down January 1.

The firefighter who was fed the spaghetti claimed that it was racial discrimination and that he was harassed after reporting it. But other firefighters insisted it was an ordinary firehouse prank with no racist intent. A department investigation suggested the prank was prompted by the way firefighter Tennie Pierce called himself the "Big Dog" during a volleyball game.

Bamattre, whose predecessor left abruptly a decade ago during a similar crisis, was given charge of the 3,900-member department in the mid-1990s with a mandate to stamp out racism and sexism.

But the city controller released an audit almost a year ago that concluded discrimination, hazing and harassment persisted in the department despite a zero-tolerance policy for such behavior.

Pierce, 51, said his 20-year career was destroyed after he broke a code of silence and spoke out against the spaghetti prank. The department disciplined two white captains and one Latino firefighter.

The issue blew up last month after the City Council approved a $2.7 million settlement to Pierce.

The council approved the settlement on advice of the city attorney before photos surfaced showing that Pierce himself engaged in crude firehouse hazing, smearing mustard and dumping water on colleagues.

The mayor vetoed the settlement, and a council majority refused to override it despite an emotional plea by Pierce, backed by black community leaders. Pierce's lawsuit is now headed to trial.

Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa said Bamattre's departure was "a joint decision."

"It's not about changing the leadership at the top -- it's about changing the culture," he said. In the search for a successor, the mayor said he would look for "a change agent."

Pat McOsker, president of the city's firefighter union, said the Pierce case reflected a heavy-handed management style that has emphasized discipline over addressing problems in departmental culture.

"As of right now, morale is very low. People are pitted against one another, broken up into camps," McOsker said. "We need a culture in the Fire Department that values subordinate employees, instead of devaluing them."

Bamattre, a firefighter for 31 years, moved up from battalion chief to chief in 1995 when predecessor Donald Manning suddenly resigned. In his decision to step down, Manning cited "false allegations and innuendoes" about claims of discrimination in the department.

Democrats Face Pressure To Pass Minorities' Bills (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

Democratic leaders will face pressure from minority voters to pass legislation during the next two years on many issues that have stalled in Congress, particularly those designed to close racial disparities.

Voters will expect swift results from House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi of California and Senate Majority Leader-elect Harry Reid of Nevada on legislation to balance the budget, fix Social Security and the Medicare prescription-drug program and reform immigration.

But there are other, older issues that minorities and civil rights groups have fought for years to get passed with few results. A lack of progress on those issues could reflect poorly on Democrats in the run-up to the 2008 presidential election.

"The question people -- African-Americans, Latinos, Asians -- will be asking after two years will be what difference has been made by having Pelosi as the speaker and Reid as majority leader for minorities, and really all Americans will be asking that," said a senior Democratic aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

The top lobbyist for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) said two of the priorities are raising the minimum wage and extending a new version of the Ryan White Act, which provides funding for research and treatment for HIV/AIDS patients.

"That bill must be dealt with very quickly, and we are working to get it done this month," said Hilary Shelton, NAACP-D.C. bureau director. "The problem is that while the bill did increase funding for rural and suburban communities, the formula hurt cities, and it isn't like the problem with HIV in cities is any less."

Mr. Shelton said laws setting a federal standard for appropriate use of force by police and punishments for racial profiling are also priorities, especially in light of a shooting of three unarmed men by New York police on Nov. 25. One of the men, Sean Bell, 23, died.

Universal health care, particularly for children "born and unborn" is also a top issue for the NAACP, as well as a measure to reduce mandatory minimum sentences for drug offenses.

"These are not new issues, and Speaker Pelosi and Leader Reid have either authored or co-signed on many of these bills in the past. What we need is a strategy to organize the Congress towards passage," Mr. Shelton said.

Mrs. Pelosi has said the Democratic-controlled Congress will increase the minimum wage and impose strict pay-as-you-go budget rules in the first 100 hours, and that ethics reform will be the first major bill negotiated.

Some individual Congressional Black Caucus members also are talking about the issues they think should be at the forefront.

"The unforgivable reality is that more Americans than ever find themselves in need of food, shelter, clothing and health care," said Rep. G.K. Butterfield, North Carolina Democrat, who represents the 15th-poorest congressional district in the country.

He said Congress should close the Medicare prescription drug "doughnut hole," or gap in coverage, which occurs after the first $2,250 of coverage.

Mr. Butterfield said the farm bill also should be written, and not be delayed until 2008 or beyond, as some suggest. He said the nation must extend subsidy-support prices for American farmers facing a tough competition from foreign entities.

Checking The Vote (WP)

FLORIDA AND Katherine Harris are forever linked with American skepticism about the integrity of the voting system. So it is strangely appropriate that six years after a controversy over hanging chads ended with George W. Bush in the White House, a fight over election results to fill Ms. Harris's 13th Congressional District seat is raising new questions about voting.

A state audit is underway to determine why some 18,000 ballots in Sarasota County did not show votes in a race ultimately decided, by a mere 369 votes, in favor of the Republican candidate. Did voters intentionally opt not to cast a vote? Did the electronic voting machines malfunction? Or, was it simply, as many believe, a case of a badly designed ballot that made it easy to overlook the Democratic candidate? It's important that these questions be answered, not just to determine the outcome of this race but to maintain the integrity of voting for contests where more than one congressional district could be at stake.

Unfortunately, the chances of finding a definitive reason for the "missing" votes are diminished because of Florida's failure to require a way to verify and audit votes recorded by touch-screen voting machines. A new alarm about the consequences of not having such a backup for the machines -- which are used not just in Sarasota but in the Washington area and much of the nation -- was sounded this week by an influential group that gives advice to the federal government. The U.S. Election Assistance Commission will review the draft report next week and, we hope, add its voice to the growing chorus for some type of paper trail that voters can use to verify their vote and that election officials can audit in close and disputed races.

Our support for a paper trail is not rooted in any belief that machines are to be mistrusted. Nor are we inclined to credit the theories about how election machines can be rigged. There is no evidence that any such fraud has occurred, and while there were scattered problems in the recent midterm election, overall the system functioned well.

It's only prudent that there be additional safeguards. It's likely that when the Democratic-led Congress convenes next year, there will be a renewed push to mandate paper trails, as well as a broader discussion of election reform.

The sooner this conversation occurs, the better. The next presidential election is not that far off, and the last thing this country needs is more lingering questions from Florida.

ANTITRUST:

AMD, Nvidia In Antitrust Investigation (SFC)

By Benjamin Pimentel, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, December 2, 2006

Federal probe is focusing on PC graphics card industry

The Justice Department is investigating Advanced Micro Devices Inc. and Nvidia Corp. in a federal probe of possible antitrust violations in the computer graphics card industry.

Both Silicon Valley companies, the two leading makers of PC graphics cards, said they have received subpoenas from the Justice Department, although the agency has not made any specific allegations.

In separate statements, AMD and Nvidia said they were cooperating with the investigation.

Michael Hara, vice president of corporate communications at Nvidia, said the Justice Department requested documents going back eight or nine years.

"It's a broad range of documents relating to customers, competitors, product stack, prices, market studies -- everything, pretty much," he said. "Our position now is to comply with their request and get them what they need."

Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the agency does not comment on specific companies under investigation.

"I will confirm that the antitrust division is investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices involving the graphics processing units and cards industry," she said in an e-mail.

Founded in 1993, Nvidia of Santa Clara is one of the top sellers of programmable graphics processors, many of which are used in video games.

AMD is one of the biggest makers of semiconductors and the main rival of Intel Corp., the dominant player in the chip industry.

The Sunnyvale company became a stronger competitor in the graphics card processor industry after its $5.4 billion acquisition of ATI Technologies, one of the leading makers of computer graphics cards.

The merger was completed in October.

Although the nature of the federal probe is still unclear, analyst Crawford Del Prete of International Data Corp. said the investigation is not surprising.

"I am not surprised that (the Justice Department) is looking into this as there are few suppliers left, which aggregates pricing power," he said in an e-mail.

But another IDC analyst, Bob O'Donnell, said he is puzzled by the Justice Department probe.

"What's behind this? That's really the question everyone is trying to make sense of," he said. "Based on very limited information, it does not make a great deal of sense. There's been no dramatic change in the market, except for the purchase of ATI by AMD."

AMD shares dipped 88 cents, or 4.08 percent, to $20.69 in after-hours trading Friday.

Nvidia stock dropped $1.45, or 3.92 percent, to $35.54.

Nvidia Gets Subpoena In Antitrust Probe (MERCN)

By Therese Poletti

The San Jose Mercury News, December 2, 2006

A federal probe of possible antitrust activity in the computer graphics chip industry has widened beyond Advanced Micro Devices to include Santa Clara-based Nvidia.

Nvidia issued a statement Friday stating it had received a subpoena from the Department of Justice as part of an investigation into antitrust violations in the graphics processors and card business. Advanced Micro Devices of Sunnyvale acknowledged Thursday it had received a similar subpoena in connection with a company it recently acquired, ATI Technologies.

Both companies said they will cooperate with the investigation.

This is the second Justice Department investigation in the semiconductor industry in the past two months. In October, Justice officials said they were looking into the static random access memory (SRAM) chip business. Cypress Semiconductor of San Jose, a maker of SRAMs used in cell phones and digital music players, said it was cooperating with the investigation.

AMD entered the graphics business in October when it completed a $5.4 billion acquisition of ATI, a Markham, Ontario, developer of graphics chips. Analysts said they did not think AMD's acquisition of ATI was the cause or the target of the review by the Justice Department.

ATI and Nvidia are fierce competitors in the PC graphics chip business, where they develop the chips and add-on cards that boost graphics performance in PCs, especially the high-end systems favored by video gamers. Their chips render two- and three-dimensional graphics, making video games more lifelike with each new generation.

Michael Hara, a spokesman for Nvidia in Santa Clara, said that the request for documents goes back to the late 1990s.

``It's a fairly broad request," Hara said. He said the Justice Department is asking for documents involving customers, product lines, competition, pricing of products, prices of competitors' products, market studies and product volumes. Nvidia has until early next year to comply.

The companies did not provide any further details. A spokeswoman for the Department of Justice would not confirm it was looking at individual companies, only the industry.

``The antitrust division is investigating the possibility of anti-competitive practices involving the graphics processing units and cards industry," said Gina Talmona, a Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington.

Analysts who follow the chip industry speculated that the investigation is looking into some sort of price collusion or other collusive behavior.

``I have to believe this stuff traces back into history," said Doug Freeman, an analyst with American Technology Research. ``As a consumer, I have noticed that the price points of video cards have always been pretty equal. The first mover comes out with a product that is $500 and the follower comes out with a product that is $500. They tend not to be in price wars."

Ashok Kumar, an analyst with Raymond James, said the Justice Department was possibly alerted by customers, such as PC makers or the so-called white-box clone PC makers based in Taiwan who try to keep their prices as low as possible.

Shares of both companies slipped on the news. Shares of AMD fell 88 cents, or 4.08 percent, to close at $20.69 on the New York Stock Exchange and Nvidia eased $1.45, or 3.92 percent, to close at $35.54 on the Nasdaq.

Leading Graphic Card Maker Nvidia Hit With Federal Subpoena (AP)

By Paul Elias

AP, December 2, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - Nvidia Corp. said Friday it has been subpoenaed by federal investigators who are probing possible anticompetive practices among makers of computer graphics chips.

The Department of Justice investigators asked Nvidia for pricing documents, customer agreements and other documents, company spokesman Michael Hara said Friday.

"They have asked for a pretty big data dump that goes back to the late '90s," Hara said. "It's a fairly broad request."

The Santa Clara-based company said no "specific allegations have been against Nvidia" and said it plans to cooperate with the investigation.

On Thursday, Advanced Micro Devices Inc. - Nvidia's chief rival - announced it had received a subpoena. The Sunnyvale-based company, which recently bought graphics chip.m.aker ATI Technologies, said the government has not made "specific allegations" and that it intends to cooperate with the probe.

An AMD spokesman said the government demanded the company turn over documents related to graphic processors, but declined further comment.

Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona confirmed Friday the government is investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices involving the graphics processing units and cards industry.

Shares of Nvidia dropped $1.45 a share to close at $35.54 in Friday trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

The AMD and Nvidia subpoenas come on the heels of a 4-year-old price-fixing probe among memory chip makers. To date, four companies and 17 people have been charged, and the Justice Department has secured fines totaling more that $731 million in the probe of the dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, industry.

Government investigators also have demanded Sony Corp., Cypress Semiconductor Inc., Samsung Electronics and Toshiba Corp. turn over information related to another flavor of memory chip - static random access memory, or SRAM.

Nvidia Receives Subpoena In Federal Antitrust Probe (Update3) (BLOOM)

By John Stebbins

Bloomberg, December 2, 2006

Dec. 1 (Bloomberg) -- Nvidia Corp., the third-largest maker of graphics chips for computers, received a subpoena from U.S. Justice Department antitrust prosecutors who are conducting a criminal price-fixing investigation of the industry.

The subpoena made no specific allegations, Santa Clara, California-based Nvidia said today in a statement. The company said it's cooperating. Nvidia shares fell $1.45, or 3.9 percent, to $35.54 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading.

Federal investigators may be looking at the fact that Nvidia and larger rival ATI Technologies Inc. have similar pricing among some competing product lines, Doug Freedman, an American Technology Research analyst, said today in an interview. Advanced Micro Devices Inc., which bought ATI in October for $5.4 billion, was subpoenaed Nov. 29.

``When looking on the outside, it does seem suspect that the prices are similar,'' Freedman said. The Greenwich, Connecticut-based analyst rates the shares of Nvidia and Advanced Micro ``buy'' and doesn't own them.

ATI is the second-largest maker of computer-graphics chips behind Intel Corp. The combination of Advanced Micro and ATI puts the merged company in direct competition with Intel and Nvidia for sales of graphics chips. Intel hasn't received a subpoena, said Chuck Mulloy, spokesman for the Santa Clara, California-based company.

Probe Confirmed

Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona said the agency ``is investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices involving the graphics processing units and cards industry.'' She declined to comment on subpoenas to specific companies.

Nvidia spokesman Michael Hara said the graphics industry is ``controlled by outside forces.''

``Intel controls how the hardware works and Microsoft controls how the software works, and we have to work within those parameters,'' he said, referring to Microsoft Corp., the world's largest software company.

Hara said Nvidia is ``playing by everyone else's rules,'' and that the Justice Department wants to ``make sure the playing field is level and fair.'' He said he couldn't be more specific about the information requested.

Back to 1990s

``We don't know a lot -- only that they asked for a lot of documents that go back to the late 1990s," Hara said. ``It's really broad in scope."

Drew Prairie, an Advanced Micro spokesman, declined to comment beyond saying the company received a subpoena.

Unlike ATI and Nvidia, Intel doesn't make stand-alone graphics chips, Mulloy said. Its graphics semiconductors are combined with its other products. Intel also competes with Advanced Micro in computer processors.

Nvidia has been beating ATI to market with faster graphics chips and other technologies, Freedman said. ``It usually goes that the technology leader gets to set the price, and followers try to meet that price," he said. ``But, if you look closely, Nvidia's profit margins on those products are usually better than ATI's."

U.S. antitrust investigators have examined the market for memory chips used in computers and opened a probe in October into possible price-fixing for another type of memory chip used in cell phones, Freedman said.

In the second quarter, Intel got 40 percent of global sales of graphics chips, according to Tiburon, California-based Jon Peddie Research. ATI had 28 percent, and Nvidia had 20 percent.

In sales of stand-alone graphics chips used in desktop computers, Nvidia had 52 percent and ATI had 48 percent, according to Jon Peddie.

AMD Being Investigated By Justice Department (ATU)

By Larry Rulison, Business writer

Albany Times-Union, December 2, 2006

Advanced Micro Devices Inc., the California computer chip manufacturer that plans to build a $3.2 billion chip factory in Saratoga County, is being investigated by the U.S. Department of Justice for possible antitrust violations.

AMD says it has received a subpoena from the Justice Department's antitrust division in connection with the department's investigation into "potential antitrust violations related to graphics processors and cards."

AMD recently got into the graphics processor business, which is key to video game and multimedia devices, by acquiring ATI Technologies Inc., a company located near Toronto.

AMD said in a press release that the Justice Department has not made any specific allegations against the company and that it will cooperate with the investigation.

Stock analysts have said that AMD's decision to build its chip fab in Saratoga County will hinge upon the success of the ATI merger. AMD paid $5.4 billion for the company.

AP, December 2, 2006

CHICAGO - The parent companies of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the Chicago Board of Trade said Friday that the Justice Department has requested additional information about their pending $8 billion deal to combine operations into a single unit.

Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc., which has agreed to be bought by its longtime crosstown rival, both said they plan to respond promptly and expect the transaction to close by mid-2007. They did not discuss specifics of the request, which they said was not unexpected.

The two exchanges announced an agreement in October to combine both the electronic and floor trading platforms of their more than century-old operations. The $8 billion deal will create the world's largest futures market.

The Justice Department, which must sign off on the deal, is assessing any potential anti-competitive impact formed by the powerhouse combination. Officials of the exchanges have said they don't expect it to encounter antitrust problems.

If approved, the exchanges located six blocks apart will move to a single trading location at the Chicago Board of Trade. Retaining both historic names, the combined company will be named CME Group Inc., a Chicago Board of Trade company.

Shares of CBOT Holdings fell $2.50 to close at $156.44 on the New York Stock Exchange. CME shares fell $4.20 to $531.40.

FCC Chief Tries To Break Telecom Deal Deadlock (AP)

By Bruce Meyerson

AP, December 2, 2006

NEW YORK - FCC Chairman Kevin Martin on Friday initiated a process that may break the deadlock in the agency's vote on AT&T's proposed acquisition of BellSouth by allowing a fifth commissioner who had recused himself to participate.

Martin asked the general counsel for the Federal Communications Commission to consider whether Robert McDowell ought to be authorized to participate in the deliberations on the $81.6 billion deal, FCC officials said Friday.

The chairman sent letters to the relevant committees in Congress advising them of the request, according to McDowell's office and an FCC official who spoke on condition of anonymity because Martin's office had not issued a public statement.

McDowell, one of three Republicans on the five-person commission, had recused himself because he is a former lobbyist for a trade group that opposes the merger.

Without McDowell, the vote has been deadlocked at 2-2, with Martin and another Republican appointee favoring approval of the deal, and the two Democrats demanding the companies offer additional concessions to ensure it doesn't harm consumers.

The Antitrust Division of the Justice Department cleared the deal Oct. 11, declaring that there were no competitive concerns and opting not to require the combined company to divest any assets or make any other concessions. The takeover, the biggest ever in U.S. telecommunications history, also has been approved by regulators in 18 states, leaving the FCC as the final hurdle.

A copy of Martin's letter to congressional leaders viewed by the Associated Press expressed frustration with the holdup.

McDowell issued a short statement saying he looks forward to the general counsel's analysis ``regarding my potential participation."

McDowell once worked for the trade association Comptel. Federal ethics regulations permit the FCC's general counsel to clear McDowell to vote as long as the ``interest of the government in the employee's participation" outweighs any concerns about how the vote may affect the agency's integrity.

FCC Chairman Moves To End AT&T Impasse (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

Kevin Martin asks that a commissioner's recusal be overridden to break a tie over the telecom deal.

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the Federal Communications Commission moved Friday to break an impasse over approval of AT&T Inc.'s purchase of BellSouth Corp. by trying to force a commissioner who recused himself to cast the tie-breaking vote.

In a letter to congressional leaders, Chairman Kevin J. Martin said he had asked the FCC's general counsel to review Commissioner Robert M. McDowell's recusal. A fellow Republican, McDowell has declined to participate in the review of the deal because he had worked for a trade association of smaller phone companies that opposes the roughly $80-billion merger.

With McDowell on the sideline, the commission has been split evenly between Republicans and Democrats. Martin said he wanted the FCC to approve the deal unconditionally, and Republican Deborah Taylor Tate was expected to back him.

But upset that the Justice Department gave unconditional approval to the deal in October, the two Democratic commissioners, Michael J. Copps and Jonathan S. Adelstein, have pressed for the FCC to impose strong conditions. They are concerned about the clout that would be created by the merger. A more muscular AT&T would dominate the market in California and 21 other states.

Among the sticking points are requirements that the Democrats would like to impose to prevent AT&T from charging some websites for higher-speed delivery of their content, an issue known as network neutrality.

Negotiations have been going on for seven weeks and Martin has postponed scheduled votes three times. With another commission meeting set for Dec. 20 and AT&T and BellSouth pushing for approval before the end of the year, Martin is trying to bring McDowell into the process.

"Given the commission's inability to reach consensus on this matter, I have asked the general counsel to consider whether the government's interest would be served by permitting Commissioner McDowell … to participate," Martin wrote.

Martin also could be motivated to secure approval of the deal before Democrats take control of Congress in January. Some Democrats, including the incoming chairmen of the House and Senate commerce committees, have been critical of large industry mergers and could hold hearings on the deal.

McDowell said he had received a copy of the letter. "I look forward to receiving the general counsel's analysis regarding my potential participation," he said.

AT&T has been frustrated by the delays, but did not comment directly on Martin's move.

"We've been at this for a long time," said Jim Cicconi, AT&T's senior executive vice president for external and legislative affairs. "It's unfortunate, but after months of intense effort on our part, we remain at an impasse."

Before joining the FCC in June, McDowell served as senior vice president and assistant general counsel for Comptel, an association of small phone companies and suppliers. Federal law calls for government employees to recuse themselves whenever "a reasonable person" might question impartiality. The law specifically refers to conflicts involving companies for which a federal employee has worked within the last year.

But the law allows those conflict-of-interest concerns to be overridden if they are outweighed by the government's interest in resolving a deadlock.

Microsoft Accused Of Overcharging Iowans (BLOOM)

By Bob Van Voris, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, December 2, 2006

Microsoft Corp. used its monopoly position to overcharge Iowans for software products including Windows, Word and Excel, a lawyer told jurors Friday at the opening of an antitrust trial in Des Moines.

Roxanne Conlin, representing statewide buyers of Microsoft products since 1994, said the company violated Iowa antitrust law by taking advantage of monopolies in personal computer operating systems and software applications to charge inflated prices.

"The law requires of Microsoft what it requires of all companies: that they compete fair and square," Conlin told a jury of seven men and five women. "Microsoft did not."

The lawsuit is one of only two such cases Microsoft hasn't settled or persuaded judges to dismiss. The customers claim $329 million in damages, and a jury award can be tripled under Iowa antitrust law.

The Iowa case and one in Mississippi are the last of dozens filed by groups of consumers after an antitrust suit against Microsoft brought by the U.S. government and several states, including Iowa, in 1998.

The company settled the case, agreeing to give computer makers the freedom to promote competing software programs, such as Web browsers and media players, for prominent display on Windows-powered personal computers.

In the Iowa case, District Judge Scott Rosenberg ruled Nov. 2 that Conlin may call Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates and Chief Executive Steve Ballmer as witnesses.

Conlin said the trial may last at least six months.

The company claims it didn't limit competition and says the company is successful because it offers high-quality software at low prices. Microsoft lawyers will make their opening statements next week.

"At the end of this, we're confident the record will show that Iowans received high-quality products from Microsoft at a reasonable price," Microsoft lawyer Rich Wallis said in an interview. "These allegations are 15, 20 years old. This is ancient history."

Conlin began her opening after the judge spent Thursday and part of Friday morning reading instructions to the jury.

The attorney showed jurors selections from the more than 25 million documents she said she has collected from Microsoft in the case.

They included memorandums from senior company executives starting in the 1980s that Conlin said show the company's attempts to block competition from another operating system made by Digital Research Inc.

She said Microsoft's monopoly allowed it to raise the price of Windows by an average of $42.49 and $10.55 for Word.

The case was filed in 2000 by Joe Comes, a Des Moines businessman.

It was certified in 2003 as a class-action suit on behalf of indirect buyers of Microsoft software from May 1994 to June 2006 -- people and businesses that bought computers loaded with Microsoft software or that bought the software from sources other than the company.

Before the trial, Rosenberg adopted many of the findings from the Justice Department trial, including the conclusion that Microsoft held illegal monopoly power in the market for Intel-compatible personal computer operating systems before June 1999.

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

House Republicans agreed yesterday to move a compromise offshore-drilling bill passed by the Senate this summer that would open new territory in the Gulf Coast area to oil rigs and create a cash cow for nearby states.

But it wasn't clear whether party leaders could summon enough votes to pass it quickly before lawmakers adjourn in the coming weeks.

With time running out on the party's majority rule, Republican leaders will send the measure to the floor Tuesday as a "suspension" bill requiring a two-thirds majority to pass, said Kevin Madden, a spokesman for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio.

House leaders previously had blocked the bill, hoping for more ambitious legislation that would allow drilling in coastal waters across the country unless a state objects. But industry groups have lobbied heavily for Republicans to take what they can get and pass the Senate bill.

Mr. Madden said Republican leaders would support the compromise measure and work to pass it. Moving it as a "suspension" bill will speed the process and block amendments, lawmakers said.

Dave Parker, president and chief executive of the American Gas Association, said the hurdle of winning a two-thirds majority could prove difficult but that he was optimistic.

"We're pleased that this bill is going to move ... you take what you can get," Mr. Parker said.

President Bush has offered lukewarm support, at best, for the measure. He has said he supports new offshore exploration but has criticized revenue-sharing provisions that would divert money from federal coffers.

The bill would allow new oil and natural gas development in 8.3 million acres of federally controlled waters in the eastern-central Gulf of Mexico, with backers saying it would help ease tight markets, particularly for natural gas. The Senate passed the bill 71-25 in August.

With opening new territory, the bill would sharply increase royalty shares for Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Texas from less than 2 percent to 37.5 percent. In 2017, the new royalty formula would apply to all oil and gas produced in the Gulf, not just from the 8.3 million acres newly opened.

"We're obviously working hard to make sure that we have the necessary votes," said Rep. Bobby Jindal, Louisiana Republican, who has pushed the proposal. "We're optimistic this time. It's a compromise approach, and I think it's done in a way that can get that supermajority."

At least one lawmaker who previously opposed the compromise, Rep. John E. Peterson, Pennsylvania Republican, said he would support it as an incremental improvement even though he thinks it accomplishes too little.

Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican, said the bill would send a positive signal to voters as Republicans transition into the minority.

"It would be good if we could get a few things done on the way out the door and show people that ... we really can govern."

Wasted Energy (WP)

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

EVER SINCE President Bush lamented the nation's addiction to oil in his State of the Union address, energy policy has been on the rhetorical agenda. But neither the administration nor Congress has shown much appetite for action beyond subsidies for research on alternative fuels. A new analysis of the energy market from the McKinsey Global Institute offers a reminder that inventing technologies can matter less than ensuring they are used. If the world were to adopt existing technologies that pay for themselves within 10 years, the growth of energy consumption could be cut by about three-quarters, according to McKinsey. But such technologies aren't going to be adopted unless governments embrace regulatory and tax incentives. Market forces aren't powerful enough to do the job alone.

Consider electricity generation: Switching from old-fashioned generators to new ones can almost halve the amount of energy needed for a given level of output. Oil refineries and steel producers could implement similar changes, and there are even greater savings to be had from construction techniques. Better insulation, wider use of low-energy compact fluorescent lighting and more efficient water heating would slow the growth of residential energy demand worldwide from 1.4 percent to 0.5 percent a year.

The reality, however, is that optimizing energy efficiency is not the first thing that consumers think about when they get out of bed. Some may not realize that an energy-saving investment can pay for itself in 10 years or less. Some may lack capital to finance the investment. Most just have other stuff to worry about: They want comfort, hence larger houses; they want convenience, hence more appliances; they want sex appeal, hence fast cars. Because the savings from energy conservation are marginal to the budgets of most households, they don't carry much weight.

This is not a reason to give up on price signals, but it is an argument for strengthening them with taxes and regulations that drive conservation. Japan, which has both high energy prices and strict efficiency standards, consumes less energy per unit of output than any other country; its gas and coal power plants are more than 70 percent more efficient than Russian ones, and its standards for air conditioners are nearly 50 percent stricter than China's. Europe's experiment with gasoline taxes also shows that policy can make a difference. Its vehicles are 15 percent more efficient than U.S. cars in the same class.

The McKinsey report drives home one further point: No strategy can control the growth in energy consumption unless it includes developing countries. An estimated 13 percent of the growth in global energy demand between now and 2020 will come from new Chinese power plants, with Chinese vehicles and buildings adding to the load. Meanwhile fuel subsidies in many oil-exporting countries encourage careless consumption, while the lack of metering of Russian residential gas usage creates an all-you-can-eat attitude. Energy policy is hard enough when it's confined to Washington, but there's no escaping the imperative to pursue it internationally, too.

In West, Conservatives Emphasize The "Conserve" (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

SEATTLE -- Nearly a decade ago, historian Patricia Nelson Limerick set the modern American West to verse:

The West has been lucky, it's true.

It did not grow old -- it grew new.

As it grew older, it got fresher and bolder.

Don't you wish it could happen to you?

Limerick and others said in the 1990s that the New West was shedding its slavish reliance on mining, logging, ranching and dams. They prophesied that it would become a region where the economy, politics and popular culture were dominated by urban people who went outdoors not to chop down trees, punch cows or pour concrete but to recreate, appreciate and preserve.

That prophecy proved premature. Working-class indignation exploded in the Interior West against environmentalists, Democrats and outside agitators, stalling efforts by the Clinton administration to rewrite grazing, mining and forestry laws. Republicans shrewdly harnessed the populist anger and consolidated political control, and in 2000 they began an aggressive push for oil, gas and mineral extraction on public land.

Last month's elections, though, may signal the end of Republican dominance and fierce resistance to many conservation measures. Profound demographic and economic change seems finally to be asserting itself across the region. Westerners cast votes suggesting that the protection of their natural surroundings is not a negotiable condition for living well.

"Self-interest has intersected with reality," said Limerick, chair of the board of the Center of the American West at the University of Colorado at Boulder. "To have open spaces and nice places, people realize, they cannot be a bunch of individuals pursuing self-indulgence. They have to act collectively."

To that end, much of the West rejected ballot measures that could have shredded state and local land-use rules limiting growth, controlling sprawl and ensuring open space. Voters in Idaho, Washington and California soundly defeated "takings" measures, intended to compensate individual owners whose land is devalued by land-use or zoning laws. Arizona voters approved their law. Courts had earlier tossed out the measures in Montana and Nevada.

At the same time, Democrats consolidated gains from 2004, picking up the governorship in Colorado, a Senate seat in Montana and two House seats in Arizona. Democrats already controlled governor's seats in Arizona, Montana, New Mexico, Oregon, Washington and Wyoming.

Perhaps more significant, Democratic and Republican politicians from New Mexico to Montana have found common ground with hunters and anglers in opposing widespread energy development on wild public lands, halting drilling in several areas where the public felt that wildlife and scenic values trumped economic consideration. In the past year, bipartisan grass-roots opposition has also killed off a number of proposals to sell federal land and use the revenue to pay for governmental operations.

There has been widespread change, too, in state attitudes toward the Clinton-era roadless rule, a broad land-protection measure that put nearly a third of the national forests off-limits to most development. The 2001 rule, which was overturned by the Bush administration but reinstated by a federal judge in September, initially had almost no public support from state fish and game agencies or from Western governors.

Now, fish and game agencies in Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Washington, Oregon, Colorado and Montana all support protecting the forests from roads, as do the governors of those states.

Even in Idaho, probably the most conservative and solidly Republican Western state, the Fish and Game Department advocates keeping wild areas roadless, and Gov. James E. Risch (R) said he intends to manage 8.5 million acres of the state's roadless forests in a way that is consistent with the conservation spirit of the Clinton rule.

"Idahoans care about how these roadless areas are managed," Risch told a panel in Washington, D.C., this week. "These are places where they hunt, fish and hike."

Like many politicians across the West, Risch is responding to changing public attitudes, said Rick Johnson, executive director of the Idaho Conservation League.

"It used to be that the West was big enough that you could pretty much do anything you wanted," Johnson said. He lives in Boise, the largest city in Idaho, a state outpaced in growth by only Nevada and Arizona. "The natural surroundings are now being lost, and we sit in traffic like everyone else. We want to protect what's left," he said. "We just don't like Washington, D.C., telling us how to do it."

While it remains the most rural part of the country in terms of land use, the West has also become the most densely urban in terms of where people live. Compared with new neighborhoods in the East or South, houses in new developments in the West tend to be planted much closer together.

"The New West is best understood as islands of urban economics in a rural setting," said Ray Rasker, executive director of Headwaters Economics, a think tank in Bozeman, Mont. "They are made possible by a combination of environmental amenities combined with the presence of transportation, especially good airports."

Newcomers with deep pockets populate many of these islands. Retirement and investment money accounts for about a third of total personal income across the Rocky Mountain West, according to federal figures. In some states, this money dwarfs the personal income from mining, forestry, farming and energy extraction.

"What had been seen as a 'war on the West' by outside forces is not seen that way anymore," said Thomas Michael Power, chairman of the economics department at the University of Montana in Missoula.

"It is more visible to everyone now that the economy has changed fundamentally," he said. "The people who are ranching and farming know these things, and that is why they are willing to be bought out, why they are willing to sell part of their water rights."

There is widespread agreement among economists, demographers and politicians that the region's moneyed newcomers tend to be conservative when it comes to government involvement in their lives. But they also want government to protect and preserve the natural beauty that lured them to the Rocky Mountain West.

"Folks don't want a whole lot of government, but they want things like clean water, and they want us to be careful," Jon Tester, the Democratic senator-elect from Montana, said in an interview before the election.

A final key piece in the long-awaited emergence of the New West as a place inclined to support land and water conservation has to do with how environmental groups work with local people.

In the 1990s, environmental groups rarely bothered to listen to the concerns of farmers, ranchers or business leaders, according to Chris Wood, vice president for conservation programs at Trout Unlimited.

"We thought we didn't need to, that we could ride these demographic changes to a better regulatory outcome for the environment," Wood said. "Now we are recognizing that we can still achieve good outcomes by sitting and listening to people, without landowners feeling like we forced it down their throats."

THE BALCO CASE Chronicle Appeals Order To Imprison Reporters Court Asked To Adopt Test To Weigh Effects Of Grand Jury Leaks (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, December 2, 2006

The Chronicle, challenging a judge's order to imprison two of its reporters for refusing to reveal who leaked grand jury testimony about athletes and steroids, told a federal appeals court Friday that the public interest and evolving legal doctrines require recognition of a journalist's right to protect confidential sources.

"Confidentiality is essential for the reporters to sustain the relationships they need with sources and to obtain sensitive information from them," Jonathan Donnellan, a lawyer for the newspaper and the reporters, said in papers filed with the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco. "Without it, the press cannot effectively serve the public by keeping it informed."

The contempt-of-court order against the two reporters, if upheld, would be "an unprecedented extension of subpoena power against the press," the brief argued, saying the only comparable cases in the past have involved national security.

The brief said the reporting in this case did no harm to the prosecution, which had long since concluded, and had served the public interest by exposing steroid use by prominent athletes and triggering a national debate.

The court should adopt a new standard for evaluating reporters' claims of confidentiality in cases of grand jury leaks, the newspaper argued -- weighing the value of information revealed by the reporting against the damage, if any, caused by the leak. Such a balancing test has not yet been accepted by federal courts, which have upheld grand juries' power to compel testimony from journalists.

The brief also argued that the judge who ordered the reporters confined for up to 18 months in September gave too little weight to a 1996 U.S. Supreme Court ruling that allowed psychotherapists to refuse to disclose information from their patients. That decision compels federal courts to extend the same rights to journalists, the brief said.

The reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, remain free while their case is considered by the appeals court, which has scheduled a hearing Feb. 12 in San Francisco. The court will also review the judge's contempt order and fine of up to $1,000 a day against The Chronicle, likewise on hold until the case is decided.

The case stems from a federal grand jury investigation of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO, and its supplying of illegal performance-enhancing drugs to professional athletes.

Five defendants, including BALCO founder Victor Conte, have pleaded guilty to drug distribution charges. One defendant, Greg Anderson, Barry Bonds' trainer, served a sentence in the BALCO case last year and is back in prison for refusing to testify against Bonds. The Giants outfielder is being investigated by a separate grand jury for possible perjury in his denial that he knowingly used steroids.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams, two veteran reporters, broke a number of stories on the case, including articles in 2004 that quoted grand jury testimony by Bonds, Gary Sheffield and Jason Giambi of the New York Yankees, and track star Tim Montgomery. All but Bonds admitted using steroids from BALCO.

The articles led to a congressional investigation and a new steroid testing policy for professional baseball. They also prompted a federal judge to order an investigation of the leaks, resulting in subpoenas to the reporters and the newspaper in May demanding the source or sources of the grand jury transcripts.

U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White upheld the subpoenas in August and, a month later, ordered Fainaru-Wada and Williams imprisoned until they testified or for up to 18 months, the maximum term of the grand jury. He rejected their claims of a constitutional right to withhold their sources, saying a 1972 Supreme Court ruling had established that journalists have no special privilege to withhold information from a federal grand jury in a criminal investigation.

In a statement Friday, Fainaru-Wada and Williams said the case jeopardized "the people's right to independent information about the federal government."

"The Justice Department claims it has the absolute right to force reporters to betray their confidential sources any time prosecutors choose," they said. "If reporters can no longer promise confidentiality to a news source, whistle-blowers won't come forward, injustices will never be exposed, and the public will be less informed."

Chronicle Editor Phil Bronstein noted that President Bush had commended both reporters, telling them at a White House reception that they had "performed a service."

"If the public was served by these two journalists, how much is the public harmed if these and other stories of value cannot be published?" he asked.

Friday's filing argued that the customary need for grand jury secrecy was diminished in this case -- the transcripts had been disclosed to the BALCO defendants with the expectation that the information would be aired publicly at a trial, and the prosecution had concluded long before the leak investigation started.

It also said the 1972 Supreme Court decision was far less ironclad than White portrayed it, and must be reinterpreted in light of the court's 1996 ruling that recognized psychotherapists' privilege to protect confidential information supplied by their patients.

In the 1996 case, the brief said, the court said other professions may be entitled to similar rights, and listed factors for lower courts to consider: the public interest, the impact on evidence-gathering, and recognition of those rights by the states.

All those factors weigh in favor of a reporter's privilege of confidentiality, the newspaper's brief said, noting that 49 states -- all except Wyoming -- have a shield law or court rulings protecting journalists from state prosecution, and that California's law is one of the strongest. That law does not apply in federal court but should be taken into account by a federal judge in a California case, the brief said.

Although the right of confidentiality should not be absolute, the brief said, it should be honored in a case like this, where the leak caused minimal harm -- "there is no breach of national security, no act of terrorism, no violent crime that would go unpunished" -- and enabled important news coverage.

"The Chronicle's articles focused public attention on an issue of great importance and transformed what was principally a debate among policymakers into a national dialogue which led to real reform," it said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Reyes To Head House Intelligence Panel (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, December 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - A Border Patrol agent-turned-congressman will take over as chairman of the House Intelligence Committee next month, pledging to keep a closer eye on the nation's spy agencies and the Bush administration.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, D-Texas, chosen Friday by House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi, said in El Paso, "For the first time in about six years, there's going to be some checks and balances. We will see true oversight, real consequences."

Pelosi's announcement ended weeks of speculation within the party about who would get the key position, a question that had created political turmoil for her before she takes her new leadership post.

The California Democrat chose Reyes over two more senior committee Democrats - Jane Harman of California and Alcee Hastings of Florida. Harman's supporters included nearly two dozen moderate Democrats known as Blue Dogs. Hastings had the support of the NAACP and the Congressional Black Caucus. Reyes will be the first Hispanic to chair the panel.

The Texan has said he will demand more information on the Bush administration's most classified programs, including the detention of enemy combatants and the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance of domestic communications.

He also plans to focus on the war in Iraq, threats from terrorists, the spread of weapons, diversity at U.S. intelligence agencies and civil liberties.

Known as "Silver" to friends, Reyes came to Congress after Army service that included 13 months in Vietnam, and then 26 years of work in the U.S. Border Patrol. He won his El Paso congressional seat in 1996.

Pelosi said his experience gives him an understanding of the needs of both troops and policymakers. "His appreciation for the dangers inherent in the operation of secret activities in a democracy ensures that he will be a zealous protector of the civil liberties," she said.

In a recent interview, Reyes said Republicans have made a habit of rubber-stamping the Bush administration's programs. Democrats, he said, must act quickly to show they will dig deeply into the government's actions.

Overseeing the 16 U.S. spy agencies is among the most challenging - and thankless - tasks in Congress. Given the committee's inherently secret nature, much of the work is done behind closed doors. Few members of Congress have a significant constituency in the spy world, and one presidential commission weighing recent intelligence changes called the agencies "headstrong."

Harman is currently the committee's top Democrat, and her term on the panel expires this year. She could have been reappointed by Pelosi, but the two are said to have differences. In a statement, Harman congratulated Reyes and offered him her "full and enthusiastic support."

As for Hastings, some critics and ethics watchdogs had questioned whether the Florida lawmaker - who was impeached as a federal judge - was the right person for a post that has access to some of the nation's top secrets.

In a sign that not all hard feelings are gone, a Hastings statement this week announcing he would not get the job closed with: "Sorry, haters, God is not finished with me yet."

Pelosi passed over a member of the Black Caucus for a second time. In 2000, she allowed Harman to leapfrog Rep. Sanford Bishop of Georgia for the intelligence panel's top Democratic slot. By choosing Reyes, she elevated the panel's No. 3 Democrat and gained favor with Hispanic groups who represent the fastest growing demographic classification in America.

Janet Murguia, president of the National Council of La Raza, called Reyes' new assignment "an important breakthrough for the Latino community." Her civil rights group has been seeking more Hispanics in leadership positions.

Nowhere in Congress have relations between Republicans and Democrats been more publicly nasty than on the House Intelligence Committee, which saw partisan spats in October over the release of information about a corrupt GOP congressman and the leak of a high-level intelligence estimate on terrorism.

In an interview last month, Reyes said the situation among committee members "can't get worse. It has gotten as bad as it could."

The current House intelligence chairman - Rep. Peter Hoekstra, R-Mich. - said committee Republicans will work with the Democrats. "The threats and challenges facing our great nation know no political bounds," he said in a statement congratulating Reyes.

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte and CIA Director Michael Hayden both issued statements welcoming Reyes' selection. "His comprehensive understanding of the intelligence community and the challenges it faces, ideally qualifies him for this important chairmanship," Negroponte said.

Texas' Reyes To Lead Intelligence Panel (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

Houston Chronicle, December 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — Rep. Silvestre Reyes was tapped Friday to chair the House Intelligence Committee, putting the El Paso lawmaker and former Border Patrol supervisor in the center of the national security debate and giving the Texas congressional delegation a boost.

Politicians from both parties welcomed incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's appointment of the Democrat, whose 26-year career in the Border Patrol and Vietnam combat experience give him a unique vantage point on security matters.

The Reyes selection ended a messy process for Pelosi, who snubbed two senior Intelligence Committee members, Jane Harman of California and Alcee Hastings of Florida, before settling on the Texan.

Reyes may have helped himself by not lobbying Pelosi directly for the chairmanship because, he said, she knew him well from their prior service together on the Intelligence Committee.

Pelosi, who has strained relations with Harman, was reportedly angered when her fellow Californian launched an aggressive campaign for the job. Pelosi this week bypassed Hastings, who was impeached as a federal judge, after critics questioned his suitability for the sensitive job.

Reyes "has impeccable national security credentials," Pelosi said. "When tough questions are required, whether they relate to intelligence shortcomings before the 9/11 attacks or the war in Iraq, or to the quality on intelligence on Iran or North Korea, he does not hesitate to ask them."

The 62-year-old congressman pledged vigorous oversight of the 17 agencies that comprise the U.S. intelligence community, as well as the classified counterterror strategies of the Bush administration.

Looking aheadCritics contend that the Republican congressional majority, which dissolves in January, failed to conduct serious oversight of the intelligence community's faulty prewar intelligence on Iraq, and didn't challenge the administration on post-9/11 surveillance, interrogation and detention programs that were criticized.

"One of the things that's going to change dramatically will be the fact that for the first time in about six years we'll have some checks and balances," Reyes said at a news conference in El Paso. "The administration and the different agencies that work for the administration will see what I believe will be true oversight.

"And there will be real consequences that perhaps haven't been there the last six years," he added.

"I think our time is better spent looking at how we can be more effective, how we can be more accountable through oversight, in terms of what's going on in the Middle East and really other critical parts of the world as well."

Texas Republicans and Democrats alike praised Reyes, saying his experience and bipartisan nature would be important assets.

"He is the perfect choice," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas. "He will not be partisan. He will be independent."

Rep. Chet Edwards, D-Waco, said Reyes' elevation benefits the GOP-dominated Texas delegation, which will suffer something of a power drain with Democrats assuming control of Congress in January. Reyes will be the only full committee chairman in the 34-member delegation.

"This is a tremendous appointment for our country, the state of Texas, and the new Congress," Edwards said.

While welcoming the selection, fellow Intelligence Committee member Mac Thornberry, R-Clarendon, voiced concern that Reyes and the committee may come under political pressure from Pelosi. He noted that Harman was criticized by Pelosi for being insufficiently critical of the administration.

"If I've got one concern, which is not related to him specifically but in general, it is whether the committee will be able to do its job in an independent way," Thornberry said. "I worry that Ms. Pelosi is going to expect not only the chairman but all the members to do what she says. If that's the case, then the country is not going to be very well served."

Strong supportFormer 9/11 Commission member Tim Roemer, a former Democratic congressman from Indiana who served with him on the Intelligence Committee, praised Reyes' experience, background and work ethic, and said he has "the intestinal fortitude, the tenacity and the strong will" to withstand pressure.

Referring to his friend by his nickname, Ortiz said that "Silver will serve the House and the nation with excellence, bringing all sides of an issue together and standing up to anyone who is not candid with the Congress."

Roemer and others praised Reyes' focus on rebuilding human intelligence capabilities and diversifying the operative and analyst ranks to bring in people with greater expertise in the Middle East, Asia and other regions of interest to U.S. intelligence.

Reyes To Lead Intelligence Panel (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi yesterday named a former Border Patrol agent to lead the powerful House intelligence panel, sidestepping two more senior choices and ending an internal party struggle over the post.

Rep. Silvestre Reyes, Texas Democrat who has served a decade in the House, will take over the committee in January as his party prepares to step up scrutiny of the Bush administration on a range of issues, including intelligence gathering.

"When tough questions are required, whether they relate to intelligence shortcomings before the 9/11 attacks or the war in Iraq, or to the quality on intelligence on Iran or North Korea, he does not hesitate to ask them," said Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, who praised Mr. Reyes' "impeccable national security credentials."

The decision had been a tough test for the speaker-elect because the top two Democrats currently on the panel -- Reps. Jane Harman of California and Alcee L. Hastings of Florida -- also had been vying for the post.

Mrs. Pelosi was widely expected to skip over Mrs. Harman, since the two reportedly have political differences. That left Mr. Hastings, who was backed by the powerful Congressional Black Caucus but who was tainted by his impeachment and removal as a federal judge in 1989.

This week, Mrs. Pelosi announced she wouldn't choose Mr. Hastings -- a wise move some said, especially if Democrats want access to more intelligence information.

"Pelosi has dodged a bullet here," said Loren Thompson, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute. "The intelligence people I talked to were saying they were going to pull the wagons tight around them if it were Hastings."

Known as "Silver" to his friends, Mr. Reyes will be the first Hispanic chairman of the committee. After serving in Vietnam, he spent nearly 27 years with the Border Patrol, rising to sector chief of El Paso and McAllen, Texas, during his tenure.

"It's a historic moment for the Hispanic community," said Janet Murguia, president of the National Council of La Raza, a Hispanic civil rights group.

Mr. Thompson said Mrs. Harman was clearly the most experienced for the post, but Mr. Reyes is "solid" and "people will be inclined to trust [him] because he has been on the other side of the table" as a border agent.

Mr. Reyes said in an interview last month that he will require more information than Republicans did from the administration regarding their most classified programs, and he'll also look at the role of intelligence three years after the invasion of Iraq and the state of traditional spy craft, the Associated Press reported.

"We haven't required or haven't had the administration give us the details, evaluation or plan of how these classic programs are functioning," he said.

Mrs. Pelosi noted yesterday that Mr. Reyes' "appreciation for the dangers inherent in the operation of secret activities in a democracy ensures that he will be a zealous protector of the civil liberties that define us as a nation."

Yesterday, she praised both Mrs. Harman and Mr. Hastings.

Mrs. Harman "served with distinction" in her four years as the top Democrat on the panel and "worked tirelessly under difficult circumstances" to ensure intelligence agencies had needed resources, direction and leadership. Mr. Hastings "has brought foreign affairs expertise, deep patriotism, and dedication to the work of the committee," Mrs. Pelosi said.

Mrs. Harman, who won't be reassigned to the panel next year, congratulated Mr. Reyes on his appointment, offering him her "full and enthusiastic support."

The outgoing intelligence panel chairman offered his good wishes as well, even as he urged a bipartisan atmosphere next year.

"The threats and challenges facing our great nation know no political bounds," said Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Michigan Republican. "It is this reality that I hope will guide current and incoming members of the House intelligence committee in its work to secure America's future."

Mr. Reyes has made some bipartisan moves in the past, including praising the nomination of former CIA Director Robert M. Gates to be the next defense secretary.

Pelosi Picks Reyes For Intelligence Panel Chairman (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, December 1, 2006

Pleasing Hispanic lawmakers and ending weeks of speculation, Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) named Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) chairman of the House intelligence committee Friday morning.

A veteran and former border patrol agent, Reyes ranked third on the committee behind Reps. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) and Alcee Hastings (D-Fla.), both of whom Pelosi had already ruled out.

"Congressman Silvestre Reyes has impeccable national security credentials…When tough questions are required, whether they relate to intelligence shortcomings before the 9/11 attacks or the war in Iraq, or to the quality on intelligence on Iran or North Korea, he does not hesitate to ask them," Pelosi said in a statement.

In his own statement, Reyes said he would tackle the tough issues.

"I am honored by the serious responsibility that has been placed on my shoulders," said Reyes. "The Intelligence Committee oversees many activities that play a critical role in safeguarding our nation, and will address many of the challenges we are facing in Iraq and Afghanistan. It is important for the committee to ask the tough questions and enact strong policies to keep us safe while protecting the constitutionally guaranteed rights of Americans."

Reyes is the second Hispanic slated to lead a committee in the 110th Congress. Rep. Nydia Velazquez (D-N.Y.) is in line to chair the Small Business Committee.

Pelosi Names Reyes Intel Chair (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, December 1, 2006

Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) tapped Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) on Friday morning to chair the House Intelligence Committee in the 110th Congress.

"Congressman Silvestre Reyes has impeccable national security credentials. He has served our country as a soldier in combat, a senior law enforcement officer on our southern border, and in Congress as a member of the Select Intelligence, Armed Services, and Veterans' Affairs Committees," Pelosi said of Reyes, who retired from the Immigration and Naturalization Services' U.S. Border Patrol in 1995.

The Texas lawmaker, who had been the third-ranking Democrat on the panel, will move ahead of current ranking member Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) and Rep. Alcee Hastings (D-Fla.).

Democratic observers had widely expected Pelosi to pass over Harman for the chairmanship, giving the a tumultuous relationship between the California lawmakers in recent times.

"I offer my sincere congratulations to my friend and colleague Silver Reyes on being named Chair of the House Intelligence Committee," Harman said in a statement, and later added: "I will do everything I can to make the transition a smooth one. I remain passionate about the issues, and will stay actively involved in security matters on the Homeland Security and Energy and Commerce Committees, as well as with Secure U.S. — the political action committee I established last year to train candidates and elected officials on national security policies and messages."

"I leave this position with incredible respect for the women and men of the Intelligence Community. They operate in austere places often under cover and under fire, and I have visited with them in virtually every corner of the world," Harman said. "I pledge to them that I will continue to look after their interests and the interests of the intelligence industrial base that is largely centered in my congressional district in California."

The Speaker-to-be announced Tuesday that Hastings, the second-ranking Democrat on the panel, would not ascend to the chairmanship. Although she did not offer a specific reason, the decision came as Hastings had sought to quell concerns over his 1988 impeachment as a federal judge, which was the subject of numerous media reports in recent weeks.

In her statement, Pelsoi praised both Harman and Hastings: "All of the Democrats who serve on the Intelligence Committee in the 109th Congress will continue to be great resources on national security matters to the Democratic Caucus, the Congress, and the country."

Texas Democrat To Head House Intelligence Panel (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) named Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Tex.) to chair the House intelligence committee yesterday, skipping over the two most senior Democrats on the panel to hand the sensitive post to a Vietnam War veteran and former U.S. Border Patrol agent.

Pelosi signaled weeks ago that she would not elevate the panel's top Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), to the chairmanship and announced this past week that she would also pass over Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.), who could not overcome the stigma of his 1988 impeachment and 1989 removal from a federal judgeship.

Reyes, a five-term House member from El Paso, is a well-liked Democrat. And now, as a key party spokesman on national defense issues, he becomes perhaps the most visible Latino in Congress.

"Congressman Silvestre Reyes has impeccable national security credentials," Pelosi said. "When tough questions are required, whether they relate to intelligence shortcomings before the 9/11 attacks or the war in Iraq, or to the quality of intelligence on Iran or North Korea, he does not hesitate to ask them."

Reyes signaled that he will use his post to confront the Bush administration on national security and intelligence issues that he said Republicans have shied away from.

"On warrantless tapping, on their policy on detention and interrogation, their policy on secret prisons, all of those have undermined our position in the world," Reyes said in an interview yesterday. "And we have been complicit in Congress by rubber-stamping everything the administration has proposed."

"It's a good, solid appointment," said former congressman Timothy J. Roemer (D-Ind.), a member of the bipartisan commission that examined the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

But Reyes has been linked to past controversies. The inspector general of the government's General Services Administration looked into the serious failures of a $239 million network of cameras and sensors along the Mexican and Canadian borders, an investigation that focused in part on the contractor's employment of Reyes's daughter Rebecca.

Reyes has been a key backer of the system and its contractor, International Microwave Corp. Shortly after its 1999 contract award, the firm hired Rebecca Reyes to serve as a liaison to what was then the Immigration and Naturalization Service. She ultimately became IMC's vice president for contracts. IMC also hired her brother, Silvestre Reyes Jr., as a technician on the program, known as the Integrated Surveillance Intelligence System, or ISIS.

Rep. Reyes said that he never interceded on his daughter's behalf or with U.S. officials to help her company win a contract, and that he backed the firm's search for funding only because he supports the system of border sensors and cameras. And, he said, the investigation was concluded with no charges of improprieties by the company, his daughter or himself.

The choice of a House intelligence chairman has been a difficult one for Democrats. Pelosi's decision to skip over Hastings angered the Congressional Black Caucus, prompting some consideration of Rep. Sanford Bishop (D-Ga.). Bishop, an African American, had been bumped from the committee in 2001 to make room for Harman, who returned to the House after an unsuccessful gubernatorial bid.

The Congressional Hispanic Caucus launched its own campaign for Reyes, a past caucus chairman. While African Americans will chair four House committees next year, including the powerful Ways and Means and Judiciary committees, Latinos were slated to head only one, the small-business panel.

"We felt we needed more of a presence than that," said Rep. Raul M. Grijalva (D-Ariz.). "What the leadership has to understand is, as more of us are integrated into high-profile leadership positions, the more we can help in the long run to solidify this constituency with the party. That can only help the Democratic Party."

After the Vietnam War, Reyes served with the Border Patrol for a quarter of a century, from Texas to Georgia, rising to chief patrol agent in El Paso, where he cut the flow of illegal immigrants by more than half, an achievement that propelled him to the House.

Reyes's task now will be to balance the need for bipartisanship on a sensitive committee with the demands of many Democrats, including Pelosi, to push the Bush administration hard on its program of warrantless wiretapping of terrorism suspects, its network of secret CIA prisons and the scandals left largely unexplored by Republicans, such as the role of intelligence officials in Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison.

"How do you make a committee that's supposed to work in a bipartisan way work that way and keep the support of the caucus?" Roemer asked. "That is a delicate balance."

Next Chairman For Intelligence Opposed War (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti, Jeff Zeleny

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1 — Representative Nancy Pelosi, the incoming House speaker, sent a strong new signal on Friday that Democrats intend to confront the White House by naming a Texas congressman who opposed the war in Iraq as the next chairman of the House intelligence committee.

This choice, of Representative Silvestre Reyes to head one of Congress's most important committees, ended weeks of closed-door lobbying and public posturing among Democrats who had been competing for the post. By choosing Mr. Reyes, a former Border Patrol agent and Vietnam combat veteran, Mrs. Pelosi passed over the panel's top Democrat, Representative Jane Harman of California, a more hawkish figure who voted to authorize the war in Iraq and a political rival with whom Mrs. Pelosi has long had a stormy relationship.

Mr. Reyes, an affable West Texan, has a far lower profile in national security circles than does Ms. Harman, an outspoken and strong-willed centrist who has become a regular guest on Sunday talk shows since the Sept. 11 attacks.

But Mrs. Pelosi chose him over Ms. Harman in part because he has repeatedly taken a more combative stance toward Bush administration policies like the invasion of Iraq, military tribunals for terrorist suspects, and the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program.

Mr. Reyes voted against authorizing President Bush to go to war with Iraq, and in June he said that the failures in Iraq "cry out for oversight."

In September, Mr. Reyes blasted the White House's justifications for the National Security Agency wiretapping program.

"I take very seriously our obligation to provide the president with the tools that he needs to provide for national security," he said, "but I also reject the notion that the authorization for use of military force allows the president to ignore the Fourth Amendment and conduct warrantless surveillance on American citizens."

The choice of an intelligence committee chairman had emerged as the second controversial decision in the early leadership tenure of Mrs. Pelosi. Committee chairmanships are normally decided by seniority, but it is Mrs. Pelosi's prerogative to choose someone else.

Last month, the Democratic caucus soundly rejected Mrs. Pelosi's choice for majority leader, electing Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland over John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania. Then, the signal by Mrs. Pelosi that she intended to bypass Ms. Harman for the intelligence post stirred dissent among moderate Democrats, particularly members of the conservative Blue Dog Coalition, who mounted a campaign for Ms. Harman.

Ms. Harman made the case publicly that the centrist course she had taken on national security issues would be crucial to the Democrats maintaining a majority in Congress. Alcee L. Hastings, a liberal Florida congressman who was one of Ms. Harman's competitors for the position, had also been marshaling support to his side, and had the backing of the powerful Congressional Black Caucus.

But Mr. Hastings, who was impeached and removed from a federal judgeship in 1989 because of a bribery scandal, was opposed by conservative Democrats and ultimately deemed by Mrs. Pelosi to be too controversial for the position.

Mrs. Pelosi called Ms. Harman on Friday morning to deliver the news, and the two Californians spoke for about 10 minutes, according to people familiar with both sides of the conversation. Mrs. Pelosi thanked Ms. Harman for her "service and intellectual contribution."

Ms. Harman, though, beat Mrs. Pelosi to the punch in announcing the news. In a break of political protocol, she sent out a statement congratulating Mr. Reyes before Mrs. Pelosi's office had even made the appointment official. In a statement on Friday, Ms. Harman gave her "full and enthusiastic support" for Mr. Reyes and pledged to "stay actively involved in security matters."

Representative Lincoln Davis, Democrat of Tennessee, was one of the Blue Dog Democrats who signed a letter to Mrs. Pelosi last month urging her to select Ms. Harman. It was Ms. Harman's instruction on intelligence matters, he said, that helped several Democrats win election and defuse the charge that Democrats are soft on national security.

"Obviously, some of us would have been happier with Jane Harman. She has a grasp of national intelligence issues," Mr. Davis said in a telephone interview on Friday from his district in Middle Tennessee.

"I really don't know what the problem is," he added. "They are both from California, you know."

But Mr. Davis also said that Mr. Reyes was an excellent compromise and he predicted the storm would quickly blow over inside the Democratic caucus.

Representative Anna G. Eshoo, a California Democrat who sits on the Intelligence Committee and is close to Mrs. Pelosi, said that Mr. Reyes's low profile would serve him well in the new job.

"He doesn't shoot from the lip. He's not a showboat," Ms. Eshoo said in a telephone interview Friday from California. "He doesn't alienate people when he offers his views. He's firm, yet he's open-minded."

Born and raised in Canutillo, Tex., a town on the outskirts of El Paso, Mr. Reyes was drafted into the army and spent 13 months in Vietnam as a helicopter crew chief. He lost hearing in his right ear when an explosion rocked his bunker there. Shortly after returning from Vietnam he began what would become a 26-year career in the Border Patrol.

After retiring from the Border Patrol in 1995, he was elected to Congress the next year and has served on the Intelligence Committee since 2001. He will become the seventh Hispanic representative to lead a full House committee.

But he will inherit a committee that in recent years has become one of Congress's most dysfunctional and partisan panels.

The past two months have been particularly rancorous, beginning in October when Ms. Harman released the findings of a committee investigation over the objection of the panel's chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan.

Soon afterward, Mr. Hoekstra suspended the access of a Democratic staff member to classified material on the suspicion that he was the source of a leaked National Intelligence Estimate on global terrorism.

The staff member, Larry Hanauer, was later cleared of wrongdoing.

Pelosi Hopes Pick Will End Turmoil (WSJ)

By David Rogers, Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In picking Texas Rep. Silvestre Reyes to lead the House Intelligence Committee, Democrats hope to have found both a solid chairman and an end to weeks of speculation that have roiled the party.

John Negroponte, director of National Intelligence for the Bush administration, said Mr. Reyes's background, including six years on the panel, "ideally qualifies him for this important chairmanship." But the selection process has been a distraction for future House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. Even now, her choice faces some skepticism in the intelligence community -- ironically, because of Mr. Reyes's travels with a Republican.

A helicopter crew chief and door gunner in Vietnam, Mr. Reyes won a seat on the House Armed Services Committee early in his career before also being named to Intelligence in 2001. As a member of Armed Services, he has frequently traveled overseas as part of delegations led by one of the panel's most senior and controversial Republicans, Pennsylvania Rep. Curt Weldon.

Mr. Weldon, who was defeated in last month's midterm elections, has made high-profile stops in North Korea, Libya and Russia in recent years, and has been outspoken about the threat posed by Iran. An August 2003 trip included a stopover in Paris that drew the ire of the Central Intelligence Agency, according to two recently retired members of the agency's Directorate of Operations.

Included was a meeting at a Paris hotel with group of Iranian exiles to discuss Iran's alleged role in terrorism and developing weapons of mass destruction. Among the leaders of the Iranian delegation was Manucher Ghorbanifar, a central figure in the Reagan administration's Iran-Contra scandal and a man the CIA had accused of providing bogus intelligence to the Americans.

In an interview Friday, William Murray, who was the CIA's station chief in Paris at the time, said he tried to prevent the lawmakers from going to the meeting after he learned that Mr. Ghorbanifar would be attending. But he said that his advice went unheeded. "Reyes was one of the guys who met with Ghorbanifar," Mr. Murray said.

Mr. Reyes's office said Friday that he has never met with Mr. Ghorbanifar, and didn't attend the hotel meeting during the Paris stopover.

The significance of the trip, in any case, is a matter of dispute. Some critics argue that going against the advice of a CIA station chief is naive. Others say Democrats on a Republican-led delegation have a responsibility to attend all meetings, and going against a local CIA officer's advice isn't without precedent for traveling lawmakers.

With his elevation, Mr. Reyes vaults past two more senior members of the Intelligence panel who had openly campaigned for the post: Reps. Jane Harman of California and Alcee Hastings of Florida. Both had liabilities for Ms. Pelosi.

Ms. Harman has exhausted the customary time allowed for service on the panel, and as the top Democrat in recent years, her tenure was marked by frequent turnover in staff. Mr. Hastings, next in line, was impeached as a federal judge and removed from the bench before being elected to Congress.

In announcing her choice, Ms. Pelosi took care Friday to praise both Reps. Harman and Hastings. But the weeks of speculation had become a costly distraction for Ms. Pelosi, and especially aggravating for her, given her own history of serving on the Intelligence Committee.

No modern leader of the House has ever served as long on the panel as Ms. Pelosi, and as the future speaker, she is empowered to single-handedly appoint the chair and members for the new Congress. Yet she found her discretion being challenged by many in the Washington establishment, where Ms. Harman has her own following.

This pressure has increased since Ms. Pelosi defied expectations last month by publicly interceding on behalf of Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.) in his uphill and ultimately unsuccessful contest against Rep. Steny Hoyer (D., Md.) to become House majority leader.

Ms. Pelosi said she was backing Mr. Murtha out of friendship and in recognition of his speaking out against the war in Iraq. But in going against the establishment and then losing, she opened herself to more pressure from the Harman camp, which backed Mr. Hoyer.

Reyes To Lead House Panel On Intelligence (LAT)

By Greg Miller, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0100984

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

He is widely seen as a compromise candidate for Speaker-to-be Pelosi, who bypassed two more-senior members.

WASHINGTON — Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi on Friday tapped Texas Congressman and former Border Patrol agent Silvestre Reyes to be the next chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, ending what had become a distracting fight among Democrats over who should get the influential post.

Reyes will occupy a key position for Democrats seeking to use their newfound majority status to challenge the Bush administration on a range of national security issues including conduct of the Iraq war, and the capture and interrogation of terrorism suspects abroad.

"One of the frustrations that I have felt has been a propensity for Congress to be a rubber stamp to just about anything the [Bush] administration has proposed," Reyes said in a telephone interview Friday. "I intend to be much more aggressive."

His appointment comes amid signs of a shake-up on the Senate Intelligence Committee. Senate aides said GOP leaders planned to remove Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) as the top Republican on the panel. Possible replacements include Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) and Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the outgoing chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. A spokeswoman for Roberts declined to comment.

In selecting Reyes — widely viewed as a compromise candidate — Pelosi sought to quiet a controversy over her handling of personnel issues in assembling her leadership team. Pelosi, of San Francisco, had drawn criticism from some of her Democratic colleagues for deciding to bypass two more-senior members of the panel — Reps. Jane Harman (D-Venice) and Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.) — who had lobbied for the job.

Harman, currently the senior Democrat on the intelligence committee, was pushed aside in part because of a political feud with Pelosi. Hastings was rejected largely over ethics concerns. In the 1980s, Hastings was forced to step down as a federal judge in Florida after being impeached by the House and convicted by the Senate of conspiring to accept a bribe from two defendants convicted in his court of racketeering.

Harman was viewed by some Democrats as being too reluctant to criticize the Bush administration over Iraq. Reyes, unlike Harman, voted against the war in a key 2002 vote.

In a sign that Democrats are eager to shift the focus away from the acrimonious competition for the job, Harman praised the selection of Reyes, saying he brings "great experience" to the position because of his years on the intelligence and armed services committees as well as in border enforcement.

Reyes, 62, has served on the intelligence committee since 2001, earning a reputation for diligence in focusing on border security and domestic threats. But current and former congressional aides said Reyes had yet to acquire a deep understanding of the issues and inner workings of the sprawling U.S. intelligence community.

"He's a thoughtful member, well respected by other members and staff," said a former senior Republican aide on the committee who spoke on condition of anonymity. "He's a solid guy. But he's still in the process of learning the business."

Reyes will be expected by Democrats to carry out an aggressive oversight agenda, and to bring fresh scrutiny to an array of classified intelligence operations and programs launched by the Bush administration after the Sept. 11 attacks. He also faces the challenge of leading a panel that has become increasingly partisan.

In recent years, the House Intelligence Committee has been less aggressive than its Senate counterpart in investigating intelligence failures including erroneous prewar claims about Iraq's alleged stockpiles of biological and chemical weapons.

At the same time, a series of highly classified intelligence operations authorized by President Bush have been exposed in the media — including the secret transfers of terrorism suspects overseas and the wiretapping of international phone calls made by U.S. citizens.

Reyes said he intended to examine these intelligence programs and others.

"I think in general terms we have seen the erosion of what our traditional American values are in terms of techniques that are used to interrogate, secret prisons, wiretapping of American citizens," he said.

In a statement, Pelosi said Reyes "has impeccable national security credentials" and would serve as a "zealous protector of the civil liberties that define us as a nation."

Reyes was elected to Congress in 1996 after a 26-year career in the U.S. Border Patrol, where he was sector chief in El Paso. He is also a Vietnam War veteran who earned a Purple Heart for injuries that left him without hearing in his right ear.

Defense Nominee's Business Ties Raise Concerns (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — In the 14 years since he left government, former CIA director Robert M. Gates has jetted cross-country to advise 10 different companies, assessing issues as varied as Saudi oil drilling, mutual fund performance and restaurant sales at Romano's Macaroni Grill.

"I first sought him out because I considered him to be of exceptional good judgment and intelligence," said Rodney B. Mitchell, president of the Mitchell Group, a Houston investment firm that used Gates as a senior advisor. Impressed with Gates' recent performance as president of Texas A&M University, Mitchell believed Gates offered "pragmatism" to a firm that aims "to exploit the rapidly changing dynamics of world energy markets."

But as Gates awaits Senate confirmation as President Bush's secretary of Defense, ethics watchdogs worry about the revolving door between government and private business that allowed Gates to align himself with defense contractors, investment houses and a global drilling company involved with Vice President Dick Cheney's former employer, Halliburton Co.

Companies with which Gates has been affiliated have secured hefty no-bid Pentagon contracts, and "you have to wonder if these companies will continue to get around bidding requirements once Gates is secretary," said Alex Knott, political director of the Center for Public Integrity, a Washington-based watchdog group.

Common Cause, another nonprofit watchdog, believes Gates should take steps now to insulate himself, including placing his stock holdings — some of which he acquired in return for board service — in a blind trust to avoid conflicts of interest with companies seeking federal work.

A criticized administration

The Bush administration has been dogged by allegations that past corporate affiliations of administration officials led to favored treatment in federal contract awards. Much of the criticism has focused on Cheney's relationship with Houston oil services giant Halliburton, which has secured $1.5 billion in no-bid contracts for reconstruction in Iraq. Cheney was the firm's chief executive and retained Halliburton stock when he became vice president.

The Senate Armed Services Committee required outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to divest himself of defense-related stocks to avoid conflicts. But it allowed him to keep holdings worth as much as $25 million in Gilead Sciences Inc., a California company that developed a drug used to treat bird flu.

Gilead, for which Rumsfeld served as board chairman, has seen its stock prices soar with sales to the Pentagon and other government customers. Rumsfeld, who through the Pentagon has denied any conflict, reported $5 million in Gilead capital gains in 2005.

In preparation for hearings set to begin next week, the armed services panel has asked Gates to complete a standard questionnaire about his corporate affiliations and stock holdings. Gates, in a 1994 opinion piece, compared the process of Senate confirmation to a "root canal," warning prospective public officials to prepare for scrutiny of every aspect of their personal finances and corporate relationships.

Financial disclosure forms filed in recent years with the Texas Ethics Commission show that Gates juggled various corporate relationships with his job as Texas A&M president. The university last year paid him $525,000 in salary, and he nearly doubled his income through outside directorships, Securities and Exchange Commission documents show.

Gates' personal holdings have grown substantially since he left government, when he had no more than $165,000 in savings and retirement accounts. Now, he has $1.1 million in holdings with Fidelity Investments, as well as stock holdings in some of the companies where he has served as director.

Links to contractors

Gates' relationships with defense companies date to 1993, soon after he left government after 27 years in intelligence work. He joined the board of SAIC, which is a contractor for the Pentagon, CIA and other federal agencies. Gates' brief tenure came as the company weathered a Justice Department investigation into defense contract irregularities that it eventually settled for $2.5 million.

Gates later served on the advisory board for VoteHere, an electronic voting machine firm tied to SAIC, and on the boards of defense contractors TRW, now part of Northrop Grumann Corp., and the Massachusetts-based Charles Stark Draper Laboratory.

Gates' knowledge of international issues won him a place on the board of Houston-based Parker Drilling Co., a global firm with 3,000 employees and operations in 10 countries. Gates earned $52,000 last year from the company, which values his "unique background and experience," spokeswoman Rose Bratton said. A Parker proxy statement reports that Gates owns 12,000 shares — worth more than $115,000 at Friday's stock price — with rights to acquire 60,000 more.

Parker reports that Halliburton is a "significant customer," often leasing equipment for international projects. Parker has partnered with Halliburton in a major drilling project in southern Mexico and in smaller efforts, such as a rig worker training program in Russia.

Gates' largest source of outside income last year, at $373,000, was from Boston-based Fidelity Investments, one of the world's largest investment houses. Gates' Fidelity holdings are described as deferred compensation, according to his disclosures.

Gates said recently that he would resign from Fidelity's board, on which he has served for nine years. Elected last year as chairman of the board's independent directors, Gates and his group oversee 345 mutual funds, including ones featuring U.S. defense and energy stocks.

He commuted from Texas for 11 board meetings a year, once noting that he had missed only one meeting because of a conflict with a college event. Gates' Fidelity salary was set by the independent directors.

Independent directors are charged with protecting the interests of individual investors, but, Fidelity spokesman Vin Loporchio said, the directors "are not involved in stock selection."

Gates also is on the board of Ohio-based NACCO Industries Inc., which has a mining division and manufactures forklift trucks and household appliances. Gates holds at least 1,000 shares of NACCO stock, according to his disclosures, worth about $149,000 Friday.

Gates reports other fees as a board member of Brinker International, a food service company with 1,400 family-style restaurants, including Chili's and Macaroni Grill.

Key Rumsfeld Aide Resigns (AFP)

AFP, December 2, 2006

WASHINGTON (AFP) - The Defense Department's top intelligence official will resign at the end of the year, the Pentagon announced.

Stephen Cambone, undersecretary of defense for intelligence, is the most senior Pentagon official to announce he is leaving since US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld tendered his resignation last month.

Cambone, who came to the Pentagon with Rumsfeld in January 2001, has been a key player in his efforts to transform the US military into a lighter, high tech force and in carving out a larger role for US military intelligence.

The Defense Department expanded espionage and other covert intelligence gathering activities under Cambone, drawing criticism from some in Congress that it was intruding on turf traditionally dominated by the CIA.

General Michael Hayden, the CIA director, said in a radio interview November 22 that reports of tension between the CIA and the Pentagon over its intelligence gathering programs were exaggerated.

"There is a bit of an urban legend out there, that the distance between here and the Pentagon, which is about seven miles down the river, is the line of confrontation," Hayden told WTOP radio. "That's simply not true."

"The Defense Department performing additional intelligence tasks is good news for America; it brings more resources to a problem we have discussed as being very, very difficult," he said.

"The only question, of course, is like any team, that the performance and activities of the new players are coordinated with the squad already out there on the field. And I have to tell you, that activity is coordinated."

Hayden said Robert Gates, a former CIA director who has been tapped to replace Rumsfeld, would reinforce "the success that we've had under Secretary Rumsfeld, and frankly, with Under Secretary for Intelligence Steve Cambone."

In its announcement, the Pentagon said Cambone had no specific plans after his departure December 31 but "looks forward to spending more time with his family."

Cambone is one of the last members of the original team that came to the Pentagon with Rumsfeld, who announced his resignation November 8.

Pentagon Intelligence Chief To Step Down (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor,

AP, December 2, 2006

Stephen A. Cambone, the Pentagon's top intelligence official and a close ally of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, will step down at the end of the year, becoming the first key department member to leave in the wake of Rumsfeld's resignation.

It had been widely speculated that Cambone, the undersecretary of defense for intelligence, would resign as the Pentagon prepares for the expected Senate confirmation of a new defense chief — former CIA director Robert Gates.

The Pentagon's intelligence-gathering has come under fire during Cambone's tenure, with critics accusing the Defense Department of trying to take expanded control over the nation's intelligence activities.

Cambone was in charge of intelligence when it was disclosed a year ago that a Pentagon database of suspicious activities contained the names of anti-war groups that had been found not be security risks. Cambone ordered a review of the program.

Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Todd Vician said Gates did not request Cambone's resignation.

"This was an independent decision," said Vician. "Dr. Cambone decided that now is a good time for a change to enable him to spend more time with his family."

Cambone came to the Pentagon with Rumsfeld in January 2001, and served in three other top level posts before taking over the intelligence job in March 2003.

The Red State Of The Holiday White House (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger, Roxanne Roberts

George and Laura Bush hosted the first of 24 White House holiday-season parties last night (nah, we didn't get an invite, either), just hours after the first lady unveiled this year's decorations, inspired by the mansion's Red Room.

The look: Two 12-foot trees covered in poinsettias greeted guests in the Grand Foyer, along with vases of red carnations, lots of candy canes, cranberry topiaries and 4,638 shiny red balls on the trees and garlands. The 18-foot Douglas fir in the Blue Room is decorated in glass, crystal and that cottony kind of fake snow, as well as tiny red bows.

The showstopper: Because she hasn't found a replacement for pastry chef Thaddeus DuBois, the first lady persuaded his predecessor, Roland Mesnier, to make the 300-pound gingerbread White House on display in the State Dining Room. Tiny renderings of Barney and Miss Beazley sit in Santa's sleigh on the rooftop; Willie the cat lies under a small birdhouse; 800 icing snowflakes cover the house.

The menu: New executive chef Cristeta Comerford added some Bush favorites to the traditional holiday buffets -- mini-chicken-fried steaks with white onion gravy, sweet potato souffle and tamales, which the Texans always eat on Christmas Eve.

During a round of early-morning interviews, the first lady said the tree upstairs in the private residence is covered with family ornaments. No word whether the twins will be home for Christmas, but they'll open presents that morning. "George's family has a very strict rule that it's Christmas Day," she told ABC. "My family always opened on Christmas Eve. But he's the president, so he gets his way on Christmas Day."Gearing Up for Honorable Mentions

It's time for the annual Hollywood-on-the-Potomac schmoozefest -- this weekend's Kennedy Center Honors, where a cluster of A-list stars will line up for Sunday's red-carpet tribute. It's always fun to guess which celebs will show up to salute the honorees -- this year, the awards go to Dolly Parton, Steven Spielberg, Smokey Robinson, Andrew Lloyd Webber and Zubin Mehta. The list of presenters is super-secret, but be on the lookout for Reese Witherspoon, Jessica Simpson, George Lucas, Berry Gordy, Barbara Cook, Sarah Brightman, Barbara Walters, Ron Silver, Arthur Mitchell and Christine Ebersole. (Alas, newly single Kid Rock, a member of the "artists committee" for the honors and a guest in previous years, is not scheduled to attend.)

Write us at reliablesource@ washpost.com if you spot them around town; bonus points if you catch Reese or Jessica with hot new boy toys.

LOVE, ETC.

Engaged: "Desperate Housewives" star Eva Longoria, 31, and her San Antonio Spur sweetie of two years, Tony Parker, 24. Her rep says we should look for a big wedding next summer in Parker's homeland of France, "with lots of family and friends" -- and paparazzi in helicopters.

Born: A daughter, to acclaimed hipster filmmaker Sofia Coppola and her French rock-star boyfriend, Thomas Mars, Tuesday in Paris. They named her Romy, and you just know she's going to be the coolest kid in pre-K.

SURREAL ESTATE

Buyer: Evan and Cindy Jones

Price: $16 million

Details: The chief executive of Maryland biotech giant Digene and his socially prominent wife just purchased a four-acre waterfront lot on Nantucket -- one of the highest prices ever paid for a property on the exclusive Massachu- setts island. Jones, 49, just gave up day-to-day operations of the company to spend more time doing fun things such as sailing. A 100-year-old house on the land will become a guesthouse, and the couple are building a new home for themselves overlooking the harbor -- all the better to keep an eye on their 44-foot-long sailboat.

Bush Says AIDS Can Be Defeated (AP)

WASHINGTON — President Bush marked Worlds AIDS Day on Friday by declaring: "The pandemic of HIV/AIDS can be defeated."

Bush and first lady Laura Bush met in the Roosevelt Room with Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt, U.S. Global AIDS Coordinator Mark Dybul and community leaders from the U.S. and Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0100988

"It's a day for the world to recognize the fact that there are 39 million people living with HIV/AIDS," Bush said. "And a day to remember the fact that 25 million people have died of AIDS."

Bush's AIDS initiative, announced in 2003, is the largest international health initiative dedicated to a single disease.

It targets 15 countries that are home to about half of the world's 39 million people who are HIV-positive. The countries are: Botswana, Cote d'Ivoire, Ethiopia, Guyana, Haiti, Kenya, Mozambique, Namibia, Nigeria, Rwanda, South Africa, Tanzania, Uganda, Vietnam and Zambia.

The Bush initiative committed $15 billion over five years to support treatment for 2 million people, prevention for 7 million and care for 10 million. The White House says that today, more than 800,000 people are receiving lifesaving drugs.

Adding the 770,000 people treated with the drugs through the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria means that more than 1 million people living with AIDS are being treated worldwide. The Global Fund is a public-private partnership that has committed $6.8 billion to fight the three diseases in 136 countries.

"Four years ago, almost nobody in Africa and elsewhere in the developing world was receiving treatment," said Richard Feachem, director of the Global Fund. "That well over 1 million people with AIDS are on now on treatment through the support of Global Fund and PEPFAR is a remarkable achievement. We must now build on this progress to reach the millions more who are still in urgent need."

While the president's treatment program is widely praised, critics of Bush's initiative complain that not enough is being done to prevent people from contracting HIV.

Richard Holbrooke, former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations who now leads the Global Business Coalition on HIV/AIDS, said the treatment program might not be sustainable, because the number of people with HIV continues to grow. According to the U.N. agency on AIDS, there will be 4.3 million new infections this year.

Proponents of the Bush initiative argue that a three-pronged HIV prevention strategy — emphasizing abstinence, fidelity and condom use — offers people the best options to protect themselves from AIDS. Democrats in Congress have condemned a provision in the Bush initiative that requires that 33 percent of all money committed to prevention programs be spent to promote abstinence. That restriction, they say, has more to do with conservative ideology than scientifically proven programs.

Bush also urged Congress to reauthorize the $2.1 billion Ryan White Care Act, the largest federal program specifically for people with HIV/AIDS.

Supporters say changes are needed in the act because AIDS has moved beyond urban centers into rural areas. But in September, they failed to overcome objections from senators in New York and New Jersey, states that stand to lose AIDS money under proposed revisions to the act.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid said that in America, infection rates are skyrocketing in minority communities. HIV/AIDS is the leading cause of death for African American women ages 25-34 and the fourth leading cause of death for both African American and Hispanic women ages 45-54, he said.

"We can — and we must — do more to address this ongoing crisis," Reid said.

GSA Chief Seeks To Cut Budget For Audits (WP)

By Scott Higham, Robert O'Harrow

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

The new chief of the U.S. General Services Administration is trying to limit the ability of the agency's inspector general to audit contracts for fraud or waste and has said oversight efforts are intimidating the workforce, according to government documents and interviews.

GSA Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan, a Bush political appointee and former government contractor, has proposed cutting $5 million in spending on audits and shifting some responsibility for contract reviews to small, private audit contractors.

Doan also has chided Inspector General Brian D. Miller for not going along with her attempts to streamline the agency's contracting efforts. In a private staff meeting Aug. 18, Doan said Miller's effort to examine contracts had "gone too far and is eroding the health of the organization," according to notes of the meeting written by an unidentified participant from the Office of Inspector General (OIG).

The GSA is responsible for managing about $56 billion worth of contracts each year for the departments of Defense and Homeland Security and other agencies.

"There are two kinds of terrorism in the US: the external kind; and, internally, the IGs have terrorized the Regional Administrators," Doan said, according to the notes.

Through a spokesman, Doan said she respects the inspector general's role and is not doing anything to undercut his independence. She also denied that she had referred to Miller, a former terrorism prosecutor, or his staff as terrorists.

"She's trying to reduce wasteful spending," said GSA spokesman David Bethel. "Just like any other office within GSA, she has asked the OIG to live within his budget, and she's hopeful that the IG is going to embrace that concept. She is not singling him out for this attention. She's not challenging the IG's independence. This is about fiscal discipline and reducing wasteful spending and creating a business environment that can be embraced by everyone.

"By law, she can't reduce the IG's independence, and she's aware of that."

Doan, who was confirmed as administrator May 26, has publicly criticized Miller on other occasions. In her Nov. 10 annual report, Doan stated there was only one GSA manager unwilling to "confront programs and policies that had outlived their usefulness and were wasting taxpayer money." She later told Miller that she was referring to him, according to officials familiar with Doan's statement who asked not to be identified for fear of retribution.

Doan also complained in the annual report that Miller was being "unsupportive of recent changes" and said vendors and government contracting officials had reported that his auditors and investigators were exerting "undue pressure."

Bethel said yesterday that Doan's statement in her annual report "speaks for itself," and he declined to elaborate.

"Let's keep our eyes on the larger picture, which is that GSA's $60 billion operations need to have objective and independent scrutiny," Miller said. "My office provides that public scrutiny. Not everyone is happy with this level of scrutiny. Nevertheless, my task is to keep our office focused on fulfilling our mission of working with GSA to enhance the quality and effectiveness of the services it provides, protect the integrity of GSA operations, and to keep fraud, waste and abuse away from its doorstep."

Before joining the GSA in August 2005, Miller served as a federal prosecutor and worked on the government's case against al-Qaeda terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, has written to Doan expressing his concerns.

"The primary mission of the IG in your agency and every other government agency is to be a sentry standing guard against fraud, waste, and abuse wherever it occurs regardless of circumstances," Grassley wrote on Oct. 20. "This cannot be accomplished if the IG's independence is impaired or hindered by the agency in any way, shape, or form."

Doan responded by acknowledging his concerns and saying she was mainly focusing on balancing her agency's budget.

"Please be assured that I do not -- and should not -- decide which audits or investigations the IG pursues," she wrote to Grassley. "That would be inappropriate."

Inspector general's offices were given by Congress a mandate to operate as independent watchdogs in the executive branch, working on behalf of taxpayers to guard against wasteful spending. The Inspector General Act of 1978 stated: "Neither the head of the establishment nor the officer next in rank below such head shall prevent or prohibit the Inspector General from initiating, carrying out, or completing any audit or investigation."

The GSA inspector general's office's audits have helped the agency recover billions of dollars in recent years from flawed or fraudulent contracts. Some vendors and government workers have complained that the audits have made contracting more cumbersome than necessary.

Soon after Doan was nominated to lead the GSA this spring, she promised outside vendors that she would make contracting with the agency much easier for both government bureaucrats and corporations. After she assumed the post, she began trimming the budget proposal of the inspector general's office. She wrote in her annual report that the office's budget and staff had "grown annually and substantially" in the past five years.

Since 2000, the number of employees in the inspector general's office has grown from 297 to 309, according to the office.

In August, a budget official in the inspector general's office described Doan's efforts to cut funding and to limit the number of audits as "unprecedented," according to an e-mail obtained by The Post. The official, John C. Lebo, said that "for the first time in memory, the Budget Office changed or deleted portions of our budget without notifying us prior to their changes."

Lebo, who has since left the agency, said the changes were troubling.

"The Administrator's Office wants to change the IG's overall approach from independently rooting out crime, fraud and abuse, to one in which the OIG is a team player working with GSA," he wrote.

Remark By Webb Arouses Passions (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

RICHMOND, Dec. 1 -- An icy exchange between President Bush and Virginia Sen.-elect James Webb that was made public this week has turned Webb into something of a folk hero among critics of the president, who have longed for someone to challenge his bravado.

At the same time, Webb's refusal to play the gentlemanly political games so common in Washington has angered conservatives and renewed questions about how well he fits with other politicians in a sharply divided Congress, where compromise will be key.

"He already has become what Washington did not need another of, a subtraction from the city's civility and clear speaking," conservative columnist George Will wrote Thursday.

On the campaign trail, Webb rarely minced words about Bush, repeatedly calling the Iraq war "a blunder of historic proportions." At the White House reception last month, Webb said, he tried to avoid interacting with the president. But when Bush walked up to Webb to ask about his son, a Marine in Iraq, Webb hinted at the campaign criticism.

"I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President," Webb said, according to a description of the conversation by several people familiar with the exchange. Webb confirmed the account this week.

"That's not what I asked you," Bush replied. "How's your boy?"

"That's between me and my boy, Mr. President," Webb responded.

Norman J. Ornstein, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, said that in the short run, the incident will boost Webb's standing among the part of the electorate that is angry about the Iraq war and eager to see Bush blamed for it.

"People will see he deeply cares about this issue and is willing to stand up to the president," Ornstein said. "He's not going to be driven by the normal proprieties in this business."

Virginia Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R), whose daughter was stationed in Iraq this year, said it was Webb who turned the president's question into an issue.

"I understand having a child over in harm's way in Iraq. You take the situation over there much more personally," McDonnell said. "The problem for Mr. Webb is he's got to learn a little bit better about having a sense of decorum. To be an effective U.S. senator, you have to deal in a collegial manner."

But Webb chief of staff Paul J. Reagan said the senator-elect is going to be effective once he takes office next month.

"Sen.-elect Webb is looking forward to a successful term working with the administration and his colleagues in the Senate from both sides of the aisle on the critical issues facing the country," Reagan said. "He does not consider the incident two weeks ago to be consequential."

Ornstein said he doubts whether there will be any long-lasting impact for either Bush or Webb. The president has vetoed only one bill in the six years he has been in office, so it is unlikely he would veto Webb legislation just because of the brief conversation, Ornstein said.

And Webb's influence is likely to extend beyond individual bills. His military background -- and now his reputation for speaking bluntly -- will give him more power in the Senate on the Iraq war and foreign policy, Ornstein said. Webb will serve on the foreign relations and armed services committees.

"The Senate always has a few iconoclasts," he said. "I think the president was trying to be a nice guy. It was classic Webb, in a way, because he feels so strongly about the war."

That is clearly how some people saw it this week.

Among hundreds of comments posted on The Washington Post Web site, many Virginia residents and others praised Webb's courage in standing up to Bush.

"Webb is someone who is going to bring things to [Bush's] attention and let him know that not all these fawning bureaucrats represent what's going on in the nation," said Robert A. Brunner, 79, a retired chef in Fossil, Ore.

"You get the impression that these are all back-slapping cronies and wheeling dealing" in Washington, Brunner said. "I really think he needs someone to pull him up short and say, 'Hey, this is reality.' "

John Zemler, 45, a retired Army captain who teaches scripture and theology at Marquette University, said he was impressed by Webb's rejection of the niceties of Capitol Hill politics.

"I hate when someone campaigns on being different, and then they go to Washington and they're just another gray suit with a red or blue tie," he said. "I don't see that in Jim Webb."

But the conversation rankled others in the country, who said the president was trying to be kind by asking about Webb's son. Many said Webb's responses violated basic tenets of politeness and respect for the presidency.

In an opinion piece published Friday in the Washington Times, R. Emmett Tyrrell Jr., a founder of the conservative American Spectator newspaper, compared Webb to Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and John F. Kerry (Mass.), National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, former vice president Al Gore and "so many other Democratic notables as a rebarbative blowhard with whom you would not want to share a gondola."

Tyrrell accused Webb of "boorish behavior" and said he "is going to be a vast source of amusement, and he will fit in nicely with the unpleasant pols whose political base is the Angry Left."

Teri Meintel, 47, a health-care worker from Richmond, was equally critical of Webb.

DOJ_NMG_0100991

A single mother of six and the daughter of a military father, she said that she was embarrassed for Virginians and that Webb treated the president with disrespect.

"It was such a Dixie Chick thing to do," she said, referring to the band whose lead singer was ridiculed for insulting Bush in 2003. "Nothing personal against the Dixie Chicks. But you can have all the opinion you want that he's wrong. But he's still the president."

Meintel, whose son is in the military serving in Kosovo, said Webb's reaction to Bush's question seemed designed to make a point.

"I think that 'How's your son doing?' is the most bipartisan thing the president could ask him," Meintel said Friday. "What else is he supposed to say?"

Grace Under Pressure (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

We're going to need grace. We are going to need a great outbreak of grace to navigate the next difficult months.

America is turning against a war it supported, for the essential reason that no one is able to promise a believable path to a successful outcome, and Americans are a practical people. It is not true that Americans are historical romantics. They are patriots who, once committed, commit on all levels, including emotionally. But they don't wake up in the morning looking for new flags to follow over old cliffs. They want to pay the mortgage, protect their children, and try to be better parents in a jittery time. They are not isolationist. They want to help where they can, and feel called to support the poor and the sick wherever they are. They are also, still, American exceptionalists, meaning they believe the creation of America -- the long journey across the sea, the genius cluster that invented the republic, the historic codifying of freedom -- was providential, and good news not only for us but the world. "And the glow from that fire can truly light the world."

Much has been strained. We were all concussed by 9/11 -- we reeled -- and came down where we came down. For the administration, extreme events prompted radical thinking. American exceptionalism was yesterday. They would be universalists, their operating style at once dreamy and aggressive: All men want the same thing, and we're giving it to them whether they want it or not. Now the dreamers hope to be saved by men -- James Baker, Vernon Jordan -- they once dismissed as cynics. And the two truest statements on Iraq are, still, Colin Powell's "You break it, you own it" and Pat Buchanan's "A constitution doesn't make a country, a country makes a constitution." Iraq has a constitution but not a country.

When history runs hot, bitterness bubbles. Democrats who should be feeling happy are, from what I've observed in New York and Washington, not. The closest they come to joy is a more energetic smugness. Republicans are fighting among themselves -- or, rather, grumbling. They haven't, amazingly, broken out in war, and if they did, no one would be debating if it were a civil war. It would be like Iraq, like a dropped pane of glass that is jagged, shattered, dangerous.

We will need grace to get through this time: through the discussion of the Baker-Hamilton report, through debate on the war, through a harmonious transfer of legislative power in January, through the beginning of the post-Bush era.

People often speak of an absence of civility in Washington, but that's not quite the problem. Faking civility is a primary operating style: "My esteemed colleague."

What is needed is grace -- sensitivity, mercy, generosity of spirit, a courtesy so deep it amounts to beauty. We will have to summon it. And the dreadful thing is you can't really fake it.

A very small theory, but my latest, is that many politicians and journalists lack a certain public grace because they spent their formative years in the American institution most likely to encourage base assumptions and coldness toward the foe. Yes, boarding school, and tony private schools in general. The last people with grace in America are poor Christians and religiously educated people of the middle class. The rich gave it up as an affectation long ago. Too bad, since they stayed in power.

The latest example of a lack of grace in Washington is the exchange between Jim Webb and President Bush at a White House Christmas party. Mr. Webb did not want to pose with the president and so didn't join the picture line. Fair enough, everyone feels silly on a picture line. Mr. Bush approached him later and asked after his son, a Marine. Mr. Webb said he'd like his son back from Iraq. Mr. Bush then, according to the Washington Post, said: "That's not what I asked you. How's your son?" Mr. Webb replied that's between him and his son.

For this Mr. Webb has been roundly criticized. And on reading the exchange I thought it had the sound of the rattling little aggressions of our day, but not on Mr. Webb's side. Imagine Lincoln saying, in such circumstances, "That's not what I asked you." Or JFK. Or Gerald Ford!

"That's not what I asked you" is a sentence straight from cable TV, from which many Americans are acquiring an attitude toward public and even private presentation.

Our interviewers and anchors have been taught, or learned, that they must show who's in charge, who's demanding answers, who's uncompromising in his search for truth. But of course they're not in search of truth; they're on a search for dominance.

Interviewers now always, as you have noticed, interrupt the person they're interviewing. Yes, they are trying to show who's in control of this conversation, and yes, they're trying to catch the interviewee off guard in hope of making news. They are attempting to keep trained and practiced politicians from launching unfruitful filibusters and boring everyone.

But interviewers also interrupt their subjects because they don't want the camera on the subject. They want the camera on themselves. They interrupt to keep the camera where it belongs. If they don't, the camera will stay on the interviewee and not the journalist, which will not help the journalist rise. They know their bosses, after all. They do not want the boss to say, "What an enlightening interview, who did it?" They want him to say, "You looked great, you were all over that guy, you grilled him!"

The Dominance of the Face leads to the inevitability of the interruption:

"Why did you vote 'no'?"

"I felt -- "

"But why'd you do it?"

"Well, the implications of the question, and the merits of the arguments seemed -- "

"That's not what I asked you!"

Because of this style, no one in America has been allowed to finish a sentence in the past 10 years. And it is not confined to cable but has spread to the networks, to government, and is starting to affect regular people, encouraging in them a conversational style that is not friendly or graceful, but depositional.

This has not contributed to the presence of grace in our public life. And too bad, because right now and for the next few months we'll need grace more than ever.

Coast Guard Finds Flaws In Converted Patrol Boats (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

Months after a whistle-blower took to the popular Web site YouTube to warn of communications problems with converted patrol boats, the Coast Guard says it has stopped using the ships after finding structural problems that made them potentially dangerous.

In August, Michael De Kort, a former engineer at Bethesda-based Lockheed Martin, posted a 10-minute video saying there were blind spots in the ships' security cameras, equipment that malfunctioned in cold weather and other problems.

But the Coast Guard said yesterday that the problems that prompted the sidelining of the ships were structural. "They had nothing to do with secure communications," said Cmdr. Jeff Carter, the Coast Guard's chief spokesman.

The ships were part of a massive modernization program run by Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman to replace the service's aging ships and helicopters. But the four-year-old program has seen cost increases -- from $17 billion to $24 billion -- and run into technical and management problems. In an August report, the Homeland Security Department's inspector general said the department's oversight of the modernization was hampered by funding limitations and lack of experience with this type of program.

As part of the Lockheed-Northrop program, the Coast Guard initially planned to upgrade 49 patrol boats but stopped in 2005 after noticing problems with the hull and cracks in the deck. At that time, the eight ships already converted were put on restrictive duty that forbade them operating where the waves were higher than eight feet.

Then earlier this month, the Coast Guard's chief engineer, Rear Adm. Dale Gabel, began inspecting the ships after buckling in the structure underneath the main engine was reported on one of them. He found similar problems on other patrol boats as well as signs of hull weakness, Carter said. The Coast Guard was "not willing to put the crew's safety in jeopardy," he said.

The Coast Guard is studying how to fix the ships, which would incur additional costs for the modernization program, he said.

"We're confident that we can manage this," Carter said. "There will be some pain involved, of course, but we will continue to execute our mission."

Integrated Coast Guard Systems, the Lockheed-Northrop consortium that runs the program, said in a statement that it will assist the Coast Guard in "developing a cost effective solution that addresses their current patrol boat hours gap as well as understand the underlying reasons for the problems on the 123-foot cutters."

De Kort had posted his video on YouTube after complaining to his bosses, government investigators and congressmen.

His allegations are still under investigations by the Homeland Security Department's inspector general, said spokeswoman Tamara Faulkner.

"I believe I am going to be told soon that my issues had merit, and that the majority if not all of them have not been taken care of," De Kort said in an interview yesterday. "However, it appears that with the hull and propeller issues, maybe some of my issues were second fiddle to the fact that the boat can't be operated."

How To Make College More Affordable (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

COLLEGE AFFORDABILITY was one of the Democrats' main campaign promises this year. It was a pledge calculated as much to frustrate Republicans as to please working- and middle-class families. Who wants to oppose giving more students a chance at college?

The outgoing Congress had made itself curiously vulnerable on the issue, cutting funding for Pell Grants, which go to the most impoverished students, and moving too slowly to end unnecessary subsidies to private lenders, though the worst were eventually eliminated. To ease the situation, Democrats are suggesting four remedies. Three of them have merit.

· Increasing funding for Pell Grants and raising the maximum annual grant, which hasn't increased in four years, to $5,100 from $4,050. Only students in families that earn less than $45,000 a year qualify for Pell Grants. Last year, the average grant was lower than in 2003-04. Because many Pell students attend public colleges, the grants go a long way toward covering their expenses.

· Increasing to $12,000 from $4,000 the amount of college tuition that families can deduct from their taxes. Tax deductions are one of the few ways to make college more affordable for middle-class families, which often get insufficient financial aid and have difficulty paying for college costs that can hit $40,000 a year.

· Reviving the so-called Star program proposed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), which foundered in Congress last year. Under this program, the federal government would expand its direct-loan program by offering loans through universities that choose to join, rather than through private banks. Much of the savings from this less-costly system would allow these universities to give more students financial aid.

Currently, about a fourth of federal loans are made through the direct program; increasing that to half would save up to $1 billion a year. But eliminating the subsidized private-lending program altogether isn't desirable either. Competition has made both programs more efficient. Kennedy's proposal strikes the proper balance.

The Star program should eliminate any need for the fourth Democratic proposal: cutting the interest rate for federal student loans in half, to 3.4%. The cut would cost about $3 billion a year but would reduce a graduate's monthly payment by only about 14%. The difference won't keep anyone from attending college.

Some Republicans have made the argument that giving students more financial assistance will only encourage colleges to raise their fees. This has it backward. Students need more financial assistance to cope with rising college fees. At any rate, Republicans would be better off working with Democrats to help make college more affordable for working families — of any political stripe.

Politician, Police Thyself (NYT)

By Josh Chafetz

WITH three-quarters of voters in the recent election saying that corruption and scandals helped determine how they cast their ballots, one of the first items of business for the Democrats in January should be putting their Congressional houses in order. Indeed, at the orientation sessions for members-elect last month, they were taught, in the words of incoming Representative Michele Bachmann, “how to hire a chief of staff, how to hire other staff, how to stay out of jail.”

But if the new leadership is going to get serious about ethics, it should think less about the legal system and more about its own internal disciplinary procedures. This has been a year of high-profile Congressional scandals — the names Cunningham, Jefferson and Foley spring to mind — but the reason discontent spreads beyond these members’ districts is a belief that their colleagues simply do not care to police themselves.

The Constitution, however, provides for internal discipline as a major check on Congressional corruption — indeed, a check second in importance only to elections. Article I states that each house may “determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member.”

For the founders, this was no idle threat. In England, Parliamentary self-discipline had always been the norm, and to this day it is the House of Commons itself, not the courts, that punishes members for bribery. (The same was true in America until a 1972 Supreme Court decision.) Members of the House of Commons found to have behaved corruptly were frequently expelled and sometimes imprisoned.

From 1690 to 1710, six members were expelled for corruption, and in 1695 the House sent the powerful Henry Guy, a royal favorite, to the Tower of London for more than two months for taking a bribe. In 1721, seven members were expelled for their role in the South Sea Company scandal, and two — including Chancellor of the Exchequer John Aislabie — were sent to the Tower.

In the United States, neither house of Congress has ever imprisoned a member, but it's clear that they have the power to do so. After all, the chambers have proven quite willing to imprison non-members for contempt (including, as early as the Fourth Congress, in 1795, for attempting to bribe a member of Congress). And the Houses' power to punish members is explicit, whereas their power to punish non-members — a power upheld by the Supreme Court in 1821 — is inferred from constitutional structure and parliamentary history. If Congress can imprison a non-member despite the lack of clear textual basis, then surely it can imprison a member, over whom it has explicit punishment powers.

Imprisonment aside, the houses have the powers of expulsion (with a two-thirds vote), censure or reprimand, fine and the stripping of seniority. Perhaps more important, they have the power to investigate — to bring corruption to light and thereby shame the member into resigning. If the member proves shameless, the investigation will, at the very least, provide fodder for opponents in the next election.

The two chambers do sometimes use these powers, but their use has been in decline since the courts started hearing cases related to Congressional misconduct in the 1970s. Dan Rostenkowski, who served 15 months in prison for his role in the House Post Office scandal in the 1990s, was never disciplined by the House. Although Tom DeLay was admonished by the House ethics committee, the House never took any action against him, either. Nor has any action yet been taken against William Jefferson, and the House ethics committee did not even open an investigation until after the Department of Justice made clear its interest in him.

Indeed, in the last 20 years, the two houses combined have reprimanded or "denounced" only four members and expelled only one. For three of the members (Representatives Austin Murphy, Barney Frank and Newt Gingrich), the punishments were so weak as to have no appreciable effect on their subsequent political fortunes. And James Traficant was expelled from the House of Representatives only after his conviction in federal court on charges including bribery and racketeering.

At a time when the public has routinely perceived Congress as corrupt, the House and Senate clearly are doing almost nothing to dispel that perception.

The leaders of the 110th Congress should prove that they are serious about governing in a more responsible way by reinvigorating Congressional self-discipline. Each chamber's ethics committee should have a regular and well-publicized system by which anyone can bring complaints against members.

These complaints should be taken seriously, and if initial investigation turns up evidence sufficient to warrant rational suspicion, the committee should hold open hearings. The hearings should not be dependent on or derivative of criminal investigations launched by the Justice Department. A good model might be the procedures used by the British Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards, an office created in 1995 and given the job of standardizing complaint procedures and conducting initial investigations into allegations of improprieties by members of Parliament.

Perhaps most important, in light of the Mark Foley page scandal, a member who knows of wrongdoing by a colleague and fails to file a complaint should be held in contempt of Congress. Members' first responsibility is to the American people, not to their colleagues, and they have a duty to us to report any misconduct.

The Republican leadership lost the confidence of voters in part because they were seen to care more about the perks of power than about the duty of representation. The new Democratic leadership can get off on the right foot by making a serious and sustained effort at self-regulation, even if that means some uncomfortable moments around the caucus table.

Cracks Widen In U.S. Economy (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0100995

Economic weakness spread beyond the stricken housing and auto sectors last month, with reports showing U.S. manufacturing shrank for the first time in 31/2 years and construction dropped the most since the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

U.S. industries broadly cut back production, adding to factory shutdowns caused by deepening recessions in auto- and housing-related industries such as wood, furniture and appliances, according to a report yesterday from the Institute for Supply Management.

An unexpected decline in construction of offices and other business facilities in October added to a record string of drops in housing construction of more than 1 percent in the last seven months to cause the biggest drop in construction spending in six years, the Commerce Department said yesterday.

"Industry is clearly going through a rough patch" that few anticipated, said Daniel Jester, analyst at Moody's Economy.com. Outside housing and autos, the Federal Reserve had expected business to pick up rather than decline this fall, supporting a so-called "soft landing" in the economy.

The weakness in manufacturing started with autos, was compounded by housing, and recently has spread to big-ticket capital goods such as technology and telecommunications equipment, Mr. Jester said. In addition, a broad array of manufacturers are cutting back because of an unexpected buildup of inventories this fall that has to be worked off, he said.

"It is clear that several segments of the industrial base have weakened measurably over the past few months. This may now be spilling over to heretofore healthy segments related to business investment," he said.

"The signal of declining production should not come as a surprise," said Daniel J. Meckstroth, chief economist at the Manufacturers Alliance. "Two major manufacturing markets are declining -- motor vehicles and housing -- and many other industries are trying to adjust inventories to adjust for a period of much slower growth ahead in 2007."

The "awful" collapse of the construction market in October means that sector is likely to be a major drag on economic growth for the fourth straight quarter in the final quarter of 2006, according to Economy.com estimates.

David Wyss, economist at Standard & Poor's Corp., noted that the downbeat tone of recent economic news contrasts sharply with upbeat assessments this week coming from Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke and other Fed officials. Mr. Wyss said there is cause for worry.

"Weak retail sales and a drop in consumer confidence in November create worries about the consumer," he said, adding that "home sales and prices are dropping and the manufacturing sector appears to be retreating for the first time in over three years."

While Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials maintain that the economy can avoid recession even with the critical housing and car industries in decline, many economists disagree.

"Housing slowdowns tend to lead recessions rather than result from them," said John Makin, economist with the American Enterprise Institute. "An annual drop in the growth rate of residential investment of more than 10 percent has coincided with a recession five of the seven times it has occurred since 1965."

Housing, the biggest contributor to a halving of economic growth this year, plummeted at an 11 percent rate in the spring, 18 percent in the summer, and an estimated 9 percent in the fall.

"The intensity of the fall in U.S. residential investment during the middle two quarters of 2006 is approaching potential recession territory," Mr. Makin said, but whether a downturn occurs depends on whether the Fed changes its stance and starts to cut interest rates.

Interest rates declined in the bond market yesterday in expectation that the Fed will reverse course and start cutting rates by March.

Roger M. Kubarych, economist with Unicredit Markets, said the Fed will reconsider its position at a meeting later this month. Mr. Bernanke signaled that the central bank is starting to become concerned about the housing market in a speech this week that for the first time designated a housing collapse as the biggest risk to economic growth.

"It seems the Fed is beginning to get nervous about the economic outlook," he said.

Shares Drop On Manufacturing Data (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

Wall Street stumbled yesterday after a survey showed manufacturing unexpectedly contracted in November for the first time in more than three years, raising concerns that the economy will not be able to achieve a soft landing.

Stocks and the dollar were hurt after the Institute for Supply Management said its index of manufacturing fell to 49.5 from 51.2 in October. Economists had been expecting 51.5. Anything under 50 indicates that the manufacturing sector is contracting.

The report, based on a survey of corporate purchasing managers, was seen by some on Wall Street as a sign that the Federal Reserve might have overshot the mark in more than two years of interest rate increases that ended in June. Wall Street had been expecting that the Fed would hold interest rates steady at its Dec. 12 meeting, and now there is a growing belief that the central bank may soon cut rates because of economic weakness.

"This is just additional confirmation that the economy is not only slowing but quite possibly going into a recession," said Hugh Moore, a partner with the investment firm Guerite Advisors. "It's not just the housing and auto industry any longer, now we're finding out that manufacturing in general is slowing."

Mr. Moore said a number below 50 in the institute's manufacturing index has preceded every recession in the United States since the 1960s.

The Big Board was led lower in volatile trading by the shares of manufacturers like 3M, Caterpillar and United States Steel.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 27.80 points, or 0.23 percent, to 12,194.13.

Broader stock indicators also declined. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index dropped 3.92 points, or 0.28 percent, to 1,396.71, and the Nasdaq composite index fell 18.56 points, or 0.76 percent, to 2,413.21.

The drop does not bode well for Wall Street hopes to finish the year with double-digit growth. The Dow is up 13.78 percent so far this year, while the S.&P. 500 has gained 11.89 percent and the Nasdaq is up 9.43 percent.

The news about the manufacturing index had a big effect on other markets. Bonds rose, with the benchmark 10-year Treasury note gaining 7/32, to 101 17/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, fell to an 11-month low of 4.43 percent from 4.46 percent late Thursday.

The dollar continued its slide against major currencies, except the yen. The dollar was also hit by a Commerce Department report that construction spending posted its biggest decline in five years during October.

Yesterday's news focused attention on afternoon speeches by the presidents of several regional banks of the Federal Reserve system though the comments ultimately seemed to have little effect. The Fed chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, made no comment on the economic outlook during a speech yesterday morning, although on Tuesday he said that risks from inflation could further complicate an economy suffering from a general slowdown.

Michael Moskow, president of the Chicago Fed, said yesterday that inflation was moving in the right direction but that further interest rate increases could be necessary.

The weak manufacturing snapshot came after a report Thursday from Chicago-area corporate purchasing managers that indicated business activity in the Midwest slowed faster than anticipated. It also follows a bigger-than-expected decline in home sales for October.

Manufacturers were among the biggest decliners, touching sectors from chip makers to steel companies. Caterpillar fell 84 cents, to $61.19. Intel declined 47 cents, or 2.2 percent, to $20.93. United States Steel fell $1.79, or 2.4 percent, to $73. 3M was off $1.48, to $79.98.

Automakers were also in focus as they reported November car and truck sales. Ford fell 9 cents, to $8.04, after it reported sales in the United States slipped 9.6 percent, while DaimlerChrysler dropped 29 cents, to $57.99, after posting a 4.7 percent rise. Toyota's monthly sales surpassed Ford's for only the second time ever.

General Motors rose 46 cents, to $29.69, in heavy volume after a report that the financier Kirk Kerkorian shed his stake in the automaker for more than $800 million. Investors seemed little moved by the company's November auto sales report, which showed an increase of 5.8 percent.

Home Depot shares surged $1, or 2.6 percent, to $38.97 on speculation the home improvement chain might be an acquisition target by several private equity firms.

H&R Block declined after it reported a wider-than-expected loss during the second quarter as its mortgage lending arm continues to lose money. H&R Block fell 25 cents, to $23.75.

Warner Music Group fell 62 cents, to $24.80, after third-quarter results fell short of Wall Street projections.

Investors Question The Fed's Outlook (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

Many investors aren't buying the Federal Reserve's forecast for a mild economic slowdown, worrying that a series of recently released figures might signal the onset of a sharper, more prolonged slump.

Stock prices fell yesterday and the dollar extended its recent decline after reports showing that construction spending fell in October at the steepest rate in five years, while the nation's factories produced less in November -- the first monthly drop in manufacturing activity in more than three years.

Those reports followed others last week showing the holiday shopping season got off to a tepid start and that new orders for big-ticket durable goods like airplanes and automobiles fell sharply in October.

The data prompted many analysts to challenge Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's upbeat assessment Tuesday that most of the economy outside of the housing market "appears to be expanding at a solid rate," and his forecast for moderate economic growth through next year.

Investors also boosted their bets yesterday that the Fed, wary of the possibility of a recession, will cut interest rates early next year. They apparently gave little credence to Bernanke's warning that the Fed is more likely to raise rates to tamp down inflation than to lower borrowing costs anytime soon.

Financial markets "are paying more attention to the latest data, which largely contradict what Bernanke was saying," Paul Ashworth, senior economist at Capital Economics, wrote in an analysis for clients yesterday. "It is getting harder for the Fed to argue that the housing slump is not affecting the wider economy. It clearly is."

Some analysts were even harsher. Bernanke is "in denial" about the depth of the economy's slowdown, Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist for High Frequency Economics, told clients on Thursday. Yesterday, he expressed hope the lousy data would push the Fed to consider cutting interest rates by March, if not before.

"The sooner the Fed is shaken out of its complacency about growth, the better," Shepherdson said. "The Fed hiked too far, and has already left it too late to avert a deeper slowdown than was needed."

Some optimists remained unshaken, sharing the Fed's view that consumer spending, which accounts for two-thirds of economic activity, will hold up fine because of low unemployment, rising wages and lower fuel prices.

"I think the markets are way overreacting," said Richard A. Yamarone, director of economic research at Argus Research Corp. "The economy is still moving, but maybe just not at a speed we've been accustomed to in recent years."

Yamarone pointed to the nation's low 4.4 percent unemployment rate in October, saying, "this economy is fully employed. Everybody who wants a job has a job, and that's what determines spending."

A Commerce Department report this week showed greater economic momentum in the summer than previously thought, with the nation's total output of goods and services rising at a moderate 2.2 percent annual rate from July through September.

But pessimists dwelt yesterday on more recent, and grimmer, numbers. Construction spending fell 1 percent in October, for a second consecutive monthly drop, the Census Bureau said. The 1.9 percent drop in homebuilding was the seventh consecutive monthly decline and was widely expected. More troubling was the lack of growth in non-residential construction, which was flat in October and September after more than a year of growth.

"Strength in non-residential construction was supposed to offset the recession in housing. Now that assumption is in question," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight.

Many economists had also expected factories to continue cranking out enough goods to more than make up for falling production of lumber, nails, roof tiles and other residential building materials. But the Institute for Supply Management said yesterday that its index of total manufacturing activity fell to 49.5 last month from 51.2. A number at 50 or above signifies expansion. It was the first time since April 2003 the index had dropped below 50.

Stock prices slid yesterday, leaving all the major indexes down for the day. The Dow Jones industrial average lost 27.80 points, or 0.2 percent, to close at 12,194.13.

To some observers, the recent softness appeared uncomfortably reminiscent of the economy's sudden sputtering in late 2000, which gave way to a recession the next year. As late as their meeting in November 2000, Fed policymakers believed the technology sector's sharp downturn would not seriously weaken the broader economy, which still had a very low unemployment rate, 3.9 percent. They remained more worried about inflation and indicated they were more likely to raise than reduce interest rates.

Seven weeks later, on Jan. 3, 2001, the Fed cut its benchmark overnight interest rate to 6 percent from 6.5 percent, expressing concern about the economy's strength. The recession began in March and lasted through November.

The experience in late 2000 demonstrated how quickly the economic outlook can turn, said Laurence H. Meyer, who was a Fed board member then.

Meyer, now vice chairman of Macroeconomic Advisers, said his firm was lowering its forecasts for economic growth this year and next but doesn't foresee the current slowdown snowballing into a recession.

His optimism partly reflects another lesson he draws from the 2000 episode: Fed policy "can equally change quickly."

Bernanke's latest comments do not mean the Fed won't cut interest rates quickly if the economy deteriorates, Meyer said. "Obviously, the beauty of monetary policy is you can turn on a dime."

Manufacturing May Be Slowing, Fueling Forecasts For Fed Rate Cuts (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

Fresh data suggest the manufacturing sector is beginning to contract, giving new ammunition to those who view the Federal Reserve's upbeat economic outlook as overly optimistic.

The Institute for Supply Management, an Arizona-based group of corporate purchasing managers, Friday said its index of manufacturing activity slid to 49.5 in November from 51.2 in October. Readings below 50 indicate contraction, and the decline ended a 41-month expansion among manufacturers.

"November was a defining month," said Norbert Ore, who oversees the survey and also serves as procurement director for paper manufacturer Georgia-Pacific Corp. "Since April we've seen a pretty consistent decline in the growth of manufacturing. Now we've moved into a no-growth position."

If sustained, it could spell more trouble for the economy at a time when the housing market is in a major slump. The critical question is how soon these impediments to economic growth -- brought on in large part by excessive inventories and scaled-back production of cars and houses -- can be reversed.

There is much debate among economists on this score, and a big divide between bond-market investors and Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke over the next move on interest rates. The bond market is pessimistic about the prospects for near-term economic growth and views inflation as contained. It expects the Fed to lower interest rates early next year in an effort to reignite the economy. Mr. Bernanke has struck a more sanguine note, saying the weakness is primarily confined to the housing market. In a speech earlier this week, he also reiterated the need to stand guard against inflation and suggested that rate cuts are unlikely in the months ahead.

Friday's data strengthened the gloomy outlook in the bond market and among other pessimists. Bond prices continued to rally, pushing the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note down to 4.437%. Stocks fell on the news, as did the dollar. (See related story1.)

Futures-market traders, mulling the prospect of a manufacturing recession and slower economic growth, increased the probability that the Fed would cut interest rates by April to roughly 74% from 51% earlier in the day. And many economists lowered their outlook for economic growth this quarter after the ISM report's release.

Many economists still argue the economy will rebound by mid-2007, as excess inventories of cars and houses ease. They say a competitive labor market and low unemployment rate are helping to lift incomes and provide support for the all-important factor of consumer spending. "The fundamentals are still not bad," said Daniel Jester, an economist with Moody's Economy.com.

Fisher Barton Inc., a Wisconsin-based manufacturer of blades for agricultural and lawn and garden equipment, sees good and bad. The company has seen revenue grow 10% so far this year compared with last year, but expects sales to be flat next year.

Demand "has really gone south," due to the weakening housing market and the broader slowdown in economic growth, said company President Dick Wilkey. "It's possible we might have to cut our staff, but it's too early to tell."

Another worrisome sign for the economy surfaced Friday in a Commerce Department report on construction spending. According to the report, nonresidential construction fell in October for the second consecutive month, partially affected by a 3.1% drop in private manufacturing construction. Until recently, a surge in commercial construction had helped offset some of the pain caused by the downturn in residential construction.

Residential construction retreated for the seventh consecutive month. Overall, construction spending fell 1% in October from September, the biggest drop in five years.

Santa Or Scrooge? Holidays Worry Investors (WSJ)

By Justin Lahart

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

With less than a month left to the year, the question for investors is whether they should be singing "Deck the Halls" or worrying that the economy is about to get decked.

Stocks fell for the second week in a row and Treasury yields dropped to their lowest level in more than 10 months, after reports from the malls suggested that holiday shopping over the Thanksgiving weekend wasn't as strong as investors had hoped and a closely watched manufacturing gauge unexpectedly fell.

"Clearly, the focus here is on underlying economic weakness," said hedge-fund manager Seth Tobias, general partner at the Circle T family of funds.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average ended Friday down 27.80 points, or 0.2%, to 12194.13, after falling as much as 120 points during the day. The Institute for Supply Management said its manufacturing index slipped to 49.5 in November -- its lowest level in more than three years -- from 51.2 in October. Anything below 50 represents contracting manufacturing activity.

The Dow fell 86.04 points, or 0.7%, for the week but is still up 14% for the year.

The week got off to a bad start after Wal-Mart Stores said it expected to post a drop in same-store sales in November and reports filtered out that other retailers' post-Thanksgiving holiday sales were weaker than what investors had expected.

Since retailers garner a large portion of their annual sales during the holiday season, investor interest in retailers during this time of the year is always keen. Amid worries that housing weakness could sap consumers' spending, investors are even more focused on how the retailers are doing.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.3% Friday, or 3.92 points, to 1396.71, down 0.3% for the week. It is up 12% for the year. The Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.8%, or 18.56 points, to 2413.21 and was off 1.9% for the week. For the year it is up 9.4%.

The dollar took a beating throughout the week, falling to its lowest level against the euro in nearly 21 months, which also took a toll on stocks amid worries that the U.S. could become a less attractive place to invest.

Todd Clark, director of stock trading at Nollenberger Capital Partners in San Francisco, thinks investors may have overreacted to reports of sales weakness. "I don't think the consumer is going to roll over and play dead," he said. "To get concerned when Wal-Mart says one thing, I think, misses the point."

Mr. Clark did find Friday's manufacturing report disconcerting. He worries that even if the economy is slowing, the threat of inflation is still too strong for Federal Reserve policy makers to cut short-term interest rates. This could put a damper on the stock market as lower rates cut borrowing costs for businesses and consumers and tend to boost share prices.

"I'm not bearish, but more along the lines of what we've seen this week is not going to help," he said.

Still, stocks could have closed out the week in worse shape than they did, if it hadn't been for the late-day recovery Friday. Behind that comeback: speculation that, after a break for Thanksgiving, next week could see another round of merger-and-acquisition news.

With many deals struck lately, such speculation has been a big driver behind the market, said Brett Gallagher, an equity portfolio manager with Julius Baer Investment Management in New York. That's one reason that even though he's cautious on the economy, he's not sure the stock market is done going up for the year yet. But at the same time, he reckons that there are only a couple of weeks left before the deal makers head home for the holidays.

"If the market is going to do anything, I think it has to do it in the next week or two," he said.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks fell, and bond prices rose. The 10-year note rose 8/32 point, or $2.50 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.437%.

The dollar fell. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 115.47 yen compared with 115.75 yen. The euro rose to $1.3336 compared with $1.3244.

As Their End-of-Year Results Near, Stock-Market Skeptics Fall In Line (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

Late in October, senior money managers from J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. met in a Park Avenue office and discussed the billions of dollars they were holding out of the quickly rising stock market. Stocks had surprised them by soaring 13% since mid-July, and their clients were missing the party.

Some at the meeting still were nervous a Democratic victory in November's congressional elections would cause a slide. Nevertheless, the bankers took note of improving economic indicators and changed course, shifting half their cash into U.S. stocks. "The momentum we have now could carry us through to the end of the year," says Peter Wall, chief investment officer for J.P. Morgan Private Client Services, which alone shifted more than $1.5 billion. "It is hard to see what would stop it except surprising economic data."

Similar meetings have been happening across the country -- and the urgency is increasing this month as the end of the year approaches. Money managers are judged, and compensated, based largely on how well they do as of Dec. 31 -- especially at hedge funds, which typically keep 20% of each year's profit for themselves. Mutual funds also live and die on their ability to show strong annual returns. Those who have kept betting against the stock market face real pain if they fall too far behind their more bullish competitors.

The stock market's four-month rally, marked by 18 record closes in the Dow Jones Industrial Average since the start of October, isn't being driven primarily by bullish investors -- but by still-skeptical former bears who increasingly see no choice but to join in. (See related article1.) Hedge-fund managers, who can change course more quickly than their rule-bound mutual-fund counterparts, have been steadily reversing their bets on a downturn since the summer. That has increased the pressure on remaining holdouts as money managers' year-end performance figures loom and their fear of clients' wrath heightens.

Although stocks have pulled back slightly in the past two weeks and the DJIA fell 27.80 points yesterday, the average still finished at 12194.13, a little less than 150 points off the record 12342.56 set Nov. 17.

If enough investors capitulate and start chasing the market, it could be a signal that stocks are nearing a top, since there would be little free money left to move into the market. That doesn't seem to be happening yet. Even some of the big investors who have shifted money to stocks still have held out some extra cash, debating whether to move that into the market as well. And one key group hasn't succumbed yet: Individual investors, many still bruised from the 2000-2002 bear market, have been almost as likely to withdraw money from U.S. stock mutual funds as to put new money in this year.

Some pros view the little guys' doubts as an indication of the market's strength. In the sometimes-perverse logic of the market, as long as a significant number of bears remain, there still is potential for fresh money to push stocks higher. Wall Street rallies often don't falter until Main Street investors finally jump in.

"We still get an awful lot of calls from older clients who are skeptical of this market advance," says Paul Desmond, president of market-research service Lowry's Reports in North Palm Beach, Fla.

The gains have come despite a steady stream of unsettling news from Iraq, Iran, Lebanon and North Korea, which once might have driven oil prices up and stocks down. Many professional investors have been ignoring these international distractions. Like the Dow industrial average, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index and the Nasdaq Composite Index have posted strong gains, though they remain well short of their own March 2000 records. Less prominent small-stock indexes have set records, propelled by money from hedge funds looking for quick gains before the year ends.

"There are a fair number of hedge funds that have underperformed and there is a sense that they need to catch up, or chase the market here," says Seth Tobias, who manages $250 million at hedge fund Circle T Partners in midtown Manhattan. He figures he alone has shifted around $75 million into stocks since August, much of it formerly bet against the market.

He compares today to 1995, the first year of a five-year run of double-digit gains for major stock indexes. "Earnings have continued to come through. The cycle of interest-rate hikes is ending. The economy is growing. Energy prices have tempered. You have taken a fair amount of inflationary pressure out of the economy. I am very bullish on stocks," he says.

There still are plenty of doubters. December and January are usually strong months because of the year-end push for gains and contributions to yearly investment and retirement plans after the first of the year. Some investment managers believe the market already has racked up those gains, leaving it to stagnate or decline in December.

Money manager Brett Gallagher at Julius Baer Investment Management notes that the July-October period typically is soft, but it was the rally period this time. He considers U.S. stocks overpriced, and his investments are tilted toward Europe.

Veteran Wall Street analyst Louise Yamada worries that the current run could end badly -- but she also compares the current period, in which China and other developing countries are expanding rapidly, to the long boom period from 1942 to 1966, when the world was rebuilding after World War II. Her question is whether the DJIA is more likely to go to 13000, or as far as 16000, before reversing course.

Investors have absorbed several rounds of news that often would hurt stocks but had little impact this time. Long-running trouble spots such as Iraq, and the generally higher oil prices that accompany them, seem already priced in to the stock market. Even the Democratic election victory, which made some investors worry government will be less friendly to business, didn't rock investors in the end. They concluded it won't affect corporate profits or interest rates, the two things they care most about.

Some investors also are concluding that the Federal Reserve and its chairman, Ben Bernanke, are bringing off a rarity -- a slower-growing economy that will keep inflation under control but avoid a recession.

In recent decades, when the Fed has tamed inflation, it often has clamped down too hard and thrown the economy into recession. Some expected a recession to start by now, especially with the air going out of the housing-market bubble. But it hasn't, and some experts contend the worst of the housing slide may be over. Growth, while slowed, still is healthy. Corporate profits, expected to rise 14% in the third quarter, instead surged 19%, according to Thomson First Call, which tracks those numbers.

Meanwhile, Treasury bond yields have been plunging since June, as hopes have spread that the Fed could begin cutting interest rates early next year -- despite Mr. Bernanke's recent warnings about possibly resuming rate increases. Low interest rates make it cheap to borrow money and buy stocks, and they also support investment, borrowing and spending by businesses and consumers alike.

Back in May, when stocks peaked and suddenly went into a swoon, the widespread expectation was that they were headed down at least 10%, probably 15%. It was viewed as a healthy shakeout that would leave stocks cheaply priced. Many savvy investors pulled money out of stocks, waiting to buy them back at bargain-basement prices.

By the time the DJIA began its rampaging gains on July 14, it was down only 7.8% from its May 10 closing high. Many pros figured it hadn't finished its decline. They were caught off guard and, as the industrial average surged over the following months, more and more were forced to dive back into stocks against their better judgment.

So-called global macro hedge funds that make broad market bets -- a category managing an estimated $115 billion -- were huge buyers of stock futures from July to late October, according to a study by Merrill Lynch & Co. That meant they were betting on higher prices. They initially used their big cash positions to buy large stocks and lately have shifted toward higher-octane small stocks and technology stocks.

"Hedge funds started buying in earnest in mid-September. Then they stampeded," says Cam Hui, a Merrill analyst who tracks hedge-fund trading. By early November, hedge funds held positions controlling about $20 billion of S&P 500 futures contracts, a record level for these investors, Merrill says. They have since trimmed their holdings to a still-high $17.6 billion.

As autumn wore on, even on days when the news wasn't particularly positive, the unwinding of bearish positions kept pushing stocks higher. It became self-fulfilling. The higher the market went, the more skeptics had to throw in the towel or risk finishing the year behind the competition.

Individual stocks have benefited from the rising tide. Early in November, for example, Fort Myers, Fla., clothing retailer Chico's FAS Inc. reported a sales decline for October and said quarterly earnings would miss analysts' expectations. Some hedge-fund managers bet against the stock. After an initial decline, Chico's rebounded. Many of those who sold it short had to race to cover their bets.

Analysts at Minneapolis money-management firm Leuthold Weeden Research, which manages mutual funds and other investment accounts, were among the market skeptics. This summer, about 22% of the firm's $2.4 billion in core accounts was sold short, meaning it bet on stock declines. Short-sellers borrow shares from a broker and sell them, hoping to profit by replacing those shares with cheaper ones bought later. If stocks become more expensive instead, short sellers can lose a lot of money fast.

In September, somewhat to Leuthold's surprise, indicators including inflation, oil prices, interest rates, economic growth and market sentiment all started giving positive signals. The firm covered its short positions by buying new shares to replace the borrowed ones, which pumped money back into the stock market. Leuthold managers had placed cash with its broker as collateral for the borrowed stock and invested most of that money as well, partly in developing-country stocks and partly in U.S. stocks. All told, they shifted more than $800 million into stocks.

Senior Leuthold analyst Eric Bjorgen says he remains skeptical and is watching the market closely, ready to become more bearish if stocks seem to be topping out. He thinks that moment could come as soon as January. "You haven't seen Main Street dial in yet," he said. "When you get to a market peak, you get that as a red-flag indicator."

Hard Landing Fears Hit Dollar (FT)

By Peter Garnham, Christopher Brown-Humes, Krishna Guha

Financial Times, December 2, 2006

The dollar fell further on Friday as weak US economic data heightened investor fears that the country's economy could be heading for a hard landing.

The latest sell-off, which was particularly sharp against the euro and sterling, came after data suggested US manufacturing contracted for the first time in 3½ years in November.

The US currency fell as much as 0.8 per cent to a new 20-month low of $1.3348 against the euro and 1 per cent to $1.9847 against the pound, a new 14-year trough.

In afternoon trade in New York, the euro was worth $1.3322 and the pound $1.9798. During the week, the dollar lost 1.7 per cent against the euro and more than 2 per cent against sterling, taking its drop for the year to about 13 per cent and 15 per cent respectively.

The fall in the Institute for Supply Management's factory index to 49.5 from 51.2 in October – a reading below 50 indicates that manufacturing is contracting – followed US data releases showing weakness in house prices and business activity.

Some economists said the ISM survey proves the slowdown is spreading from housing to other parts of the economy.

"Combined with other soft US data, the ISM data will reinforce fears of a hard landing and will add to the momentum behind the dollar sell-off," said Martin Slaney at GFT Global Markets.

Ashraf Laidi of CMC Markets said: "Traders are going to be less cautious about selling the dollar against the euro and sterling going into next week."

Private sector analysts have been predicting a 2.5 per cent rise in US gross domestic product in 2007. While there is no direct relationship between ISM data and GDP, James Knightley at ING Financial Markets said the ISM figures were consistent with growth slowing below 2 per cent.

Other economists, however, believe manufacturing is going through an inventory correction, and will recover next year. Ben Bernanke, Federal Reserve chairman, said this week he believed manufacturing remained in reasonably good shape.

The dollar's fall helped push European shares down 2 per cent this week, while the S&P 500 index of leading US shares lost 0.3 per cent. But Federal Reserve have remained hawkish on interest rates.

Marc Chandler, currency strategist at Brown Brothers Harriman in New York, said the Fed and the market differed over the outlook for the US economy.

Volatile Dollar May Not Be Scary To Washington (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1 — As the dollar tumbled against the euro this week, reflecting fresh concern about a possible weakening of the American economy, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. issued the usual phrase from the catechism: "A strong dollar is clearly in our nation's best interest."

Treasury secretaries since Robert E. Rubin in the 1990s have, with rare exceptions, offered precisely that formula whenever the subject comes up.

But many economists say that Mr. Paulson's statement does not reflect what the United States actually seeks right now. For one thing, the Bush administration is in active pursuit of a weaker dollar against China's currency, which would probably encourage similar changes with other Asian competitors. The goal would be making American exports there less expensive, and imports more expensive, helping to spur an industrial revival at home.

And though there are high risks if the dollar were to continue to fall rapidly against the euro and the British pound, the United States is generally seen as hoping for the economic gains delivered by a lower dollar as American exports become more competitive against planes, machinery and other goods produced in Europe.

"Paulson has got to like a euro that's appreciating in value," said C. Fred Bergsten, director of the Peterson Institute of International Economics and a longtime advocate of a weak dollar. "He came into office facing an overall American trade deficit that is close to $1 trillion a year. He's got to welcome something that shows the trade deficit likely to go down."

Still, the fluctuations of the dollar have unsettled many in the world of finance this last week, when it sagged about 2 percent against the euro, bringing its decline this year to more than 12 percent. On Friday, the dollar fell to 1.33 euros; it dropped against the British pound as well, with it now taking $1.98 to buy a pound.

By contrast, against the Japanese currency, the dollar has slipped much less, closing Friday at 115.35 yen.

In Europe, the French finance minister, Thierry Breton, has expressed concern about a weakening dollar, noting that exports have helped Europe's recent economic recovery. But other European finance ministers said this week that at least for now, gains in the euro do not appear to threaten prospects for growth in Europe.

The gyrations of the dollar highlight the sensitivity of Mr. Paulson's role at this particular moment, as he prepares for his biggest overseas trip so far as Treasury chief: a veritable expedition to China, accompanied by five cabinet members and by Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman.

The goal of the trip, which starts Dec. 14, is to engage China on a range of economic issues but most particularly to press Beijing to let its currency, the yuan, rise in value against the dollar. That would help, American officials hope, to narrow a Chinese trade surplus with the United States that soared past $200 billion last year.

As a former investment banker who lived and breathed the logic of international markets for decades at Goldman Sachs, Mr. Paulson is trying to engineer a kind of correction in which China would cease what American officials say have been currency manipulations aimed at pumping out exports.

Against the background of the rise of the euro, the China trip illustrates the three-cornered complexities of the world economy and of Mr. Paulson's dollar diplomacy.

Suddenly with a declining dollar, Europeans are stepping up their purchases of American goods, and it has become more expensive for Americans to visit Europe as tourists or business officials. American investors overseas, meanwhile, are enjoying the extra kick that a falling dollar delivers on their foreign profits.

The decline of the dollar against the euro, while the dollar-to-yuan ration remains stable, also has the effect of increasing tensions between Europe and China. European businesses, like their American counterparts, are already upset about cheap Chinese exports to Europe. Now these goods are even cheaper because the yuan is declining against the euro, pulled down by the dollar.

The Chinese, meanwhile, are likely to get more nervous than ever that a decline in the dollar against the yuan will damp their exports and reduce the value of their dollar-denominated assets, putting pressure on Chinese banks that are holding those assets.

China has resisted American appeals to let the yuan rise in value, arguing that China is already undertaking painful economic reforms — writing off bad loans and closing money-losing state enterprises — and cannot afford further social disturbance brought on by new difficulties in exports.

"We are committed to a market-based exchange-rate mechanism," said a senior Chinese official, speaking anonymously under Chinese ground rules. "But we will do it in a responsible way — responsible to the health of our country, the United States, Asia and beyond."

Part of the reason for the dollar sell-off, many analysts say, has been a recent sense of disappointment about the American economy even as Europe has picked up some momentum, prompting traders to look for more promising investments in markets overseas. The prospect of higher interest rates in Europe while rates remain stuck or drift lower in the United States has also drawn funds out of the dollar.

Some analysts also say that the dollar decline has been partly seasonal — that there is always a decline in investment in dollar-denominated investments at the end of the year, despite the huge need by the United States to finance its current-account and budget deficits.

"There's always a little seasonal weakening of the dollar at year-end," said Robert Sinche, head of global currency research and strategy at Bank of America. "With its large imbalances, the United States needs to attract capital every day. Capital flows tend to slow down at this time, because people go on holidays or are closing their books."

"It's like musical chairs," he added. "When the music stops, those who have deficits are going to suffer."

If American policy makers are pleased about the prospect of the dollar's providing a kick for exports, they fear a dollar falling so far and fast that it fuels inflation in the United States. Higher inflation might force the Federal Reserve, which is still concerned that price increases are outside its comfort zone, to raise interest rates, slowing the American economy further.

"The fall of the dollar has both benefits and risks," said Nouriel Roubini, chairman of Roubini Global Economics. "The danger is that the willingness of foreign investors to buy dollars is shrinking. If the fall of the dollar accelerates, investors could start dumping U.S. assets, and you'll get a hard landing for the economy."

The fear of a loss in the value of its assets is a factor in China's rebuffing American imprecations to let its currency float more flexibly against the dollar, many analysts say. China has amassed $1 trillion in foreign exchange reserves after years of trade surpluses with Europe and the United States.

About $700 billion of those reserves are said by many economists to be in dollars. One reason China does not want a cheaper dollar against the yuan, these economists say, is that the value of its holdings would decrease, limiting the lending ability of its banks.

Nevertheless, Mr. Paulson's trip is organized around the principle that China needs a bit of a weaker dollar now because its current path of binging on exports will overheat the Chinese economy — it is growing at 10 percent a year — and cause a collapse sooner or later if it is not cooled off slowly.

The dollar has declined about 5 percent against the yuan in the last year and a half, but American policy makers say that the yuan is still artificially low. That is also the view of leading members of Congress, especially Representative Nancy Pelosi, the California Democrat who becomes the speaker of the House in January.

Not all economists agree that am upward revaluation of the yuan will benefit the American economy. They note that cheap exports from China are desired by American consumers, and that Chinese imports have not led to rising unemployment, as critics charge.

"Let's say China revalues by 10 percent overnight," Mr. Sinche said. "Then prices at Wal-Mart go up by 10 percent. So we then see worse inflation numbers, the Fed tightens monetary policies, and we end up with higher inflation, higher prices and higher interest rates. Remind me again why that's what we want."

U.S. Auto Sales Turn In A Sluggish November (WSJ)

By Terry Kosdrosky, John D. Stoll

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

U.S. auto sales downshifted in November to the slowest seasonally adjusted pace since October 2005, and General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. said they will cut North American production in the first quarter of 2007 amid signs of flattening demand.

The sluggish market didn't slow down all auto makers. For the second month this year, long-time No. 2 auto maker Ford was outsold by Toyota Motor Corp., whose sales rose 15.9%.

With mixed signals coming from the broader U.S. economy, sales of cars and light trucks in the U.S. rose 2.9% in November, compared with relatively weak year-earlier levels. That translated to a seasonally adjusted annual selling rate of 16.01 million vehicles. In October 2005, the sales pace fell to 14.8 million vehicles following the end of heavily promoted sales by the Detroit Big Three. U.S. consumers and businesses bought 16.9 million cars and light trucks in 2005.

The planned production cuts at GM and Ford reflect a consensus among industry forecasters that overall 2007 U.S. car and truck demand will likely be flat or down from this year. Further, Detroit's Big Three auto makers are still wrestling to sell down excess inventories of unsold vehicles.

At Nov. 30, GM, Ford and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group had a total of more than 2.2 million cars and trucks in stock, equivalent to the total amount of vehicles that the trio sold in the first quarter of 2006, according to Ward's Automotive Reports. Dealers, led by No. 1 auto retailer AutoNation Inc., have increasingly resisted the Detroit auto makers' pleas for them to warehouse more cars on their lots, pushing instead for auto makers to reduce stocks to 60 days' supply or less.

GM, the world's largest auto maker by global sales volume, said its U.S. sales rose 6.1% in November from a year earlier. But GM said it plans to cut first-quarter North American production by 9% from a year earlier to 1.14 million vehicles. The majority of the production cut in the first quarter is to reduce daily rental-fleet sales, GM said, and the rest is to shift production to the company's new full-size pickups and to cut inventory levels. GM has about 120,000 large sport-utility vehicles in stock, which is roughly four months' supply at current sales rates. "We'd like to be more along the lines of 100,000," said Paul Ballew, GM's director of sales and industry analysis. Overall, GM shaved 50,000 vehicles from its inventory during November, with the unsold dealer stock sitting at about 1.1 million vehicles, Mr. Ballew said.

GM, like its domestic competitors, has been trying to both cut sales to fleet customers, including rental-car companies, and reduce reliance on sales incentives to retail customers. GM relied on a "Red Tag" sale launched in mid-November to help boost the month's sales. GM is offering discounts of as much as $2,000 on many of its vehicles through year end.

GM shares were up 46 cents at $29.69 at 4 p.m. Friday in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, following billionaire investor Kirk Kerkorian's move Thursday to sell his entire 7.4% remaining stake in GM.

Ford, citing concerns about weakness in the housing market and a plan to suspend minivan production, cut its previous fourth-quarter North American production forecast by another 15,000 vehicles and said first-quarter 2007 North American production will fall 14.4% to 750,000 vehicles. Ford, which earlier this past week announced that 38,000 hourly workers have agreed to leave the company as it restructures, had a 10% drop in sales in November from a year earlier.

Ford's sales analyst, George Pipas, called November's result disappointing and warned that the company's sales in 2007 will be lower as it scales back deliveries to rental fleets and closes plants. As for total industry-wide vehicle sales in 2007, Mr. Pipas said Ford expects total car and light-truck volume to slow "somewhat," compared with 2006. Ford expects between 16.9 million and 17 million vehicle sales in 2006, including medium-duty and heavy-duty vehicles, while GM expects about 16.5 million light vehicles to be sold. Ford shares fell nine cents Friday to close at $8.04 in NYSE trading.

Separately, DaimlerChrysler said sales at its Chrysler unit rose 2.9% in November, and Chrysler said it had cut inventories of unsold vehicles to 499,000.

Toyota's November Numbers Eclipse Ford For A Second Time (WP/AP)

By Joseph Altman

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

DETROIT, Dec. 1 -- Toyota sold more vehicles than Ford in the United States in November, the second time that the No. 2 domestic automaker was outsold by its Japanese rival.

Ford reported Friday that its U.S. sales in November fell 9.6 percent from November 2005. Toyota sold 196,695 vehicles in November, a 15.9 percent increase, compared with Ford's 182,259.

General Motors's sales rose 6.1 percent, while DaimlerChrysler's were up 4.7 percent.

GM sold 293,558 vehicles last month, the most of any manufacturer. It sold 109,985 cars, a 7.9 percent decline from November 2005, but truck sales rose 16.6 percent, to 183,573. GM's figures include the Swedish Saab brand.

Sales at DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group rose 2.9 percent from November 2005, to 164,556, while Mercedes-Benz sold 22,079 vehicles, its third-highest performance and 21 percent higher than a year earlier.

Toyota's sales, including its Lexus luxury brand, included a 17.8 percent increase in light truck sales. Sales of the RAV4 compact sport-utility vehicle rose 156.9 percent, to 11,425. Toyota's car sales were up 14.5 percent, to 109,126.

Ford's light-truck sales fell 12.9 percent, to 120,407, including a 16.1 percent drop in sales of F-Series pickups. Ford's car sales fell 2.6 percent, to 61,852, reflecting lower deliveries to fleet customers.

In a conference call with industry analysts and reporters, Ford sales analyst George Pipas blamed the company's monthly sales performance in part on a late start on advertising improvements to its 2007 models and promoting its year-end sale.

"It was disappointing," Pipas said. "We missed our own internal sales target for the month."

But Ford said sales of the Fusion, Mercury Milan and Lincoln MKZ mid-size sedans to individual retail customers were up. Ford's figures include the Ford, Lincoln, Mercury, Jaguar, Volvo and Land Rover brands.

Ford's share of the domestic market has declined from about 26 percent in the early 1990s to 17.6 percent at the end of October, when Toyota's share was 15.5 percent. In July, Ford sold fewer vehicles in the United States than Toyota for the first time, but Ford's U.S. sales surpassed the Japanese company's in August through October.

Toyota spokesman Xavier Dominicis said the company isn't focused on market share.

"Our ranking within the industry is really driven by actions our competitors take or don't take," he said. "Our fundamental approach remains unabated. We supply consumers with the right product at the right time."

Ford Dropped To 4th Place In Market Share Last Month (NYT)

By Nick Bunkley

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

DETROIT, Dec. 1 — Sales by the Ford Motor Company declined even more last month than its management had expected.

The company fell into fourth place in November for the first time in its history, behind Toyota Motor of Japan and the German-American automaker DaimlerChrysler, figures released Friday show.

Ford sold 10 percent fewer vehicles than it did a year ago, sending its market share in the United States down to 14.8 percent from 16.9 percent last November, according to Ward's AutoInfoBank.

By contrast, Toyota's sales increased 16 percent, giving it a market share of 16.5 percent, while DaimlerChrysler, which includes the Chrysler Group and Mercedes-Benz, sold 5 percent more vehicles to earn a share of 15.6 percent. General Motors is the largest automaker, with a share of 24.6 percent.

Ford's numbers were particularly disappointing because they were being compared with last November, one of the worst months in company history, when Hurricanes Katrina and Rita cut demand for trucks as gas prices spiked.

The results capped a bleak few days for Ford in which it revealed plans to mortgage its factories and other assets to raise $18 billion in cash, then projected that in the next year it would spend much of that in payments to the 40 percent of its hourly workers who are taking company buyouts and leaving their jobs.

"It was disappointing," Ford's chief sales analyst, George Pipas, said on a conference call with reporters and Wall Street analysts. "We missed our own internal sales targets for the month."

G.M. reported a 6 percent sales increase in November, and the Chrysler Group ended a long streak of declines and placed No. 3 for the first time since March by posting a gain of 3 percent. Both sold fewer passenger cars but more trucks than a year ago, while Ford's sales declined in both categories.

Ford and G.M. said they would reduce production in the first quarter of 2007 — Ford by 14.4 percent and G.M. by 9 percent — to help clear inventories and to prepare for planned cuts in sales to rental car agencies. Ford said it expected to produce 620,000 vehicles in the fourth quarter. That is 15,000 below prior estimates, which already reflected a 20 percent cut because of a temporary halt in building the Freestar minivan.

Ford attributed much of its sales decline in November to fewer rental agency sales, which are significantly less profitable than transactions at dealerships. In October, Ford stopped building the Taurus, a midsize sedan that was sold exclusively as a rental car in its final years.

Ford's turnaround plan calls for more emphasis on retail sales in a bid to regain profitability even at the expense of some market share. The company has said that it expects its market share to stabilize at a level of 14 to 15 percent.

"We'd like to sell as much as the next person or more," Mr. Pipas said. "We're much more interested in returning our business to profitability."

Although Toyota passed Ford in November, analysts expect Ford to do better through the winter, when sales of the sport utility vehicles that make up much of its lineup tend to be higher. But Ford's plan to close plants and reduce its production capacity means it cannot fend off Toyota for long.

"By the time we get to July of next year, Toyota will permanently replace Ford as the No. 2 automaker," said Jesse Toprak, director of industry analysis at Edmunds.com, a Web site that gives consumers advice about buying cars. "By that time, Ford will never be able to catch up with Toyota."

Ford is hoping for good news in December, when its long-awaited crossover vehicle, the Edge, goes on sale. The Edge was to reach dealerships in November but was delayed while Ford addressed supply problems.

But Ford could face tougher competition than it has expected in the lucrative pickup truck segment, which its F-Series has long dominated. Sales of the F-Series fell 16 percent in November, while G.M.'s redesigned Chevrolet Silverado and GMC Sierra pickups increased 21 percent. Toyota will add considerable pressure in early 2007 with a new version of its Tundra pickup.

All three Detroit automakers managed to shrink their inventories of unsold vehicles somewhat in November, but their dealership lots are still far more crowded than those of their Asian competitors.

Chrysler, which lost $1.5 billion in the third quarter because of slumping sales, had more than 500,000 unsold vehicles at the end of November: 499,000 in what it calls dealer inventory and thousands more that were built without an order from a specific dealer.

Chrysler's vice president for sales, Steven J. Landry, would not say how many cars were in the order bank — there were nearly 100,000 earlier this year — but he said "we are on track" to reach zero by year's end.

But reducing inventory has come at a steep cost. In November, Chrysler spent $4,224 a vehicle on incentives, nearly double the national average, according to Edmunds.com. And the discounts have failed to persuade shoppers to buy 2006 models, which were replaced by new versions around September and typically are almost sold out this late in the year.

About a third of the vehicles Chrysler has on hand are 2006 models, compared with 15 percent for Ford and 14 percent for G.M.

G.M., whose market share rose to 24.6 percent because of a 16 percent increase in truck sales, said it was pleased with its performance. After losing $10.6 billion in 2005, G.M. has posted an operating profit for three consecutive quarters.

"We feel very good about our product cadence, and we feel very good about our progress the last six months," said G.M.'s chief sales analyst, Paul Ballew.

Besides the cutback in rental sales, Ford said it hurt itself in November by starting its year-end marketing campaign later than competitors after focusing on unloading 2006 models since the summer.

"We probably paid the price for that," Mr. Pipas said.

Ford Sales Slip In November (FT)

By Bernard Simon

Financial Times, December 2, 2006

Ford Motor lost its traditional second spot in US vehicle sales last month, slumping to fourth place behind General Motors, Toyota and DaimlerChrysler.

The troubled Detroit-based carmaker's sales fell by 9.6 per cent in November from a year earlier, due partly to an unexpectedly steep 16 per cent drop in demand for its F-Series pick-up truck, north America's top-selling vehicle and one of the biggest contributors to Ford's bottom line.

By contrast, GM's sales grew by 6.1 per cent while Toyota reported its best-ever November, with a 15.9 per cent improvement. DaimlerChrysler, including the Detroit-based Chrysler group and Mercedes Benz, posted a 5 per cent increase.

Paul Ballew, GM's sales analyst, said that overall vehicle demand remained weaker than expected. According to preliminary estimates, light-vehicle sales totaled 16.3m vehicles last month at a seasonally-adjusted annual rate, unchanged from October.

Toyota pulled ahead of Ford for the first time in July, but slipped back for the next three months. The Japanese carmaker's star performer has been the small RAV4 sports-utility vehicle, whose sales have more than doubled in the past year.

George Pipas, Ford's sales analyst, described November's performance as disappointing, adding that the company had missed internal sales targets.

Besides the fall in pick-up sales, Mr Pipas said that the Ford had lagged in advertising new features on its mid-sized sedans.

Ford's sales to car-rental and other fleet operators also fell markedly in line with a drive by all three Detroit-based carmakers to lower their dependence on these low-margin customers. GM reported a "a fairly substantial" improvement in prices on its rental-car sales.

Ford, which posted a $5.2bn third-quarter loss, has warned that its market share is likely to continue dropping for some time, partly reflecting lower fleet sales.

The sagging US housing market has dampened demand for pick-up trucks, many of which are used in construction work. But the launch of new GM and Toyota models are expected to buoy sales at Ford's expense. Sales of big Chevrolet big pick-ups grew by 22.9 per cent last month.

Meanwhile, Chrysler unveiled plans this week to mail $1,000 coupons to 3m prospective customers in a continuing drive to bring down swollen inventories and generate interest in a slew of new models.

Edmunds.com, an online pricing service, estimates that Chrysler's Jeep brand offered an average of $5,398 in perks for each vehicle last month, the highest of any brand.

One Threat Averted But More Await G.M. (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0101007

By Micheline Maynard

DETROIT, Dec. 1 — Top executives of General Motors, wrestling with one of the biggest financial crises in its history, have not had much to celebrate this year.

But they scored a big victory late Thursday when the billionaire Kirk Kerkorian retreated, selling off the last of $1.2 billion in shares he bought last year in a bid to shake up the company's strategy and possibly its management ranks.

He had caused them no end of consternation in the last 18 months, trying to push G.M. into an alliance with two foreign automakers, Renault of France and Nissan of Japan.

In many respects, this city has felt under siege from outsiders and, to many, Mr. Kerkorian's departure could not come too soon. "Goodbye and don't let the door hit you in the tushie," said one reader comment posted Friday on the Web site of The Detroit Free Press after an article about Mr. Kerkorian's decision.

But seen from another perspective, Mr. Kerkorian's departure represents not so much a surrender as a lack of faith in the future of G.M.

And he has a lot of company. About 35,000 workers decided last summer to take G.M.'s incentive packages to leave or retire early from jobs that have been a ticket to prosperity for generations of blue-collar workers. This week, Ford Motor disclosed a preliminary tally that 36,000 of its workers were taking similar deals to leave the company.

With these buyouts, too, there is some good news for leaders at G.M. and Ford. In a matter of months, they have been able to drastically reduce their long-term labor-cost structure.

That is a big boost in both companies' efforts to transform themselves in the face of another siege, by foreign competitors, who are wresting market share from them every month.

But the successes are tinged with defeat — of a way of doing business that built G.M. and Ford into symbols of American industrial power. In a sense, they are a vote of no-confidence from both a big investor and thousands of men and women who worked in their factories.

"Kerkorian's going away puts a brighter spotlight on G.M. management to prove that it can fix the company," said John Casesa, an auto industry analyst with Casesa Shapiro Partners.

Auto workers, meanwhile, are "sending a message that these businesses will not return to the level of prosperity that they once had," Mr. Casesa added.

Indeed, the bad news for Detroit continued this week.

On Friday, November sales figures showed that Toyota pushed past Ford for the second month this year to rank as the country's No. 2 carmaker, behind G.M. Ford, in fact, fell below DaimlerChrysler to fourth place.

This week, Ford had to mortgage virtually all its most valuable assets — including its factories, the Swedish automaker Volvo and even its blue oval trademark — to guarantee $18 billion in loans that will pay for its turnaround efforts.

It was a high-stakes version of a home equity loan, and it was a significant gamble by the company's new chief executive, Alan R. Mulally, who joined Ford in September from Boeing.

To be sure, Mr. Mulally has reassured employees that Ford's turnaround program, the Way Forward, will save the company.

G.M. executives are also confident that they are making the right moves to help their company return to prosperity.

In Los Angeles this week, G.M.'s chief executive, Rick Wagoner, announced that his company was developing a hybrid-electric vehicle that could be plugged in to be recharged, giving G.M. a step up on Toyota, which is only studying the idea despite having a broad lineup of hybrid models.

Appearing with Tiger Woods alongside another new model, a sport utility vehicle called the Buick Enclave that is built on a car chassis, Mr. Wagoner said he was confident the turnaround efforts he was leading were taking hold but he said more work remained.

David Cole, chairman of the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor, Mich., said Mr. Kerkorian's retreat essentially provided more short-term security for Mr. Wagoner. Now the company can continue to carry out its turnaround plan, seemingly without the threat that Mr. Kerkorian might try to gain control.

"It was the shootout at the O.K. Corral that never materialized," Mr. Cole said.

Recent improvements in G.M.'s financial situation hurt Mr. Kerkorian's case that the company needed new leadership, and he apparently decided he could not afford the time it would take to get his way, Mr. Cole said.

Even so, it was a surprise that Mr. Kerkorian backed away so quickly, especially since G.M. gave a board seat in February to his representative, Jerome B. York, said Charles Elson, a professor at the University of Delaware and an expert in corporate governance.

Mr. York left the G.M. board in October, after G.M. broke off talks with Renault and Nissan that Mr. Kerkorian had encouraged.

"I'm sorry Mr. York didn't stay," Professor Elson said. "The lesson you learn is you stick it out; you might not win on first blush, but you might win the next time."

If Mr. Kerkorian returns for a next round, however, it could mean that Mr. Wagoner has not succeeded in his primary task of overhauling G.M. so that it can withstand competition from Toyota, which is on track to pass G.M. to become the world's biggest carmaker, perhaps as soon as next year.

Should that happen, the global industry would be led by a company with solid profit and billions of cash to reinvest in itself, said Jonathan Steinmetz, an industry analyst with Morgan Stanley.

In a research report Friday, Mr. Steinmetz said Mr. Kerkorian's departure could turn out to be another loss for G.M. ""Having somebody chase after you often makes you run faster than you otherwise would," Mr. Steinmetz wrote.

Indeed, no one in the industry should become complacent. ""The uncertainties are just enormous out there, between gas prices and the Middle East," said Michael Useem, a professor at the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania.

No matter how tempting it might be to celebrate, he added, "For the moment, it is tough times in Detroit."

Capital Flight (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

It won't be news to readers of these columns that increased regulatory burdens and litigation costs are undermining the competitive position of America's capital markets. But this week's interim report from the blue-ribbon Committee on Capital Markets Regulation performs a public service by marshaling evidence of the decline that is hard to refute.

The committee, directed by Hal Scott of Harvard Law School and co-chaired by Glenn Hubbard and the Brookings Institution's John Thornton, is a privately funded, bipartisan group of executives and academics who have put their heads together to assess the state of our capital markets. Its first report is detailed and analytical, which may explain why Eliot Spitzer immediately attacked it.

It's well known that more large global IPOs are happening outside the United States, and the report notes this fact. But most regulators have chosen to explain away this trend rather than confront it. Charles Niemeier, a board member of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board -- created by Sarbanes-Oxley -- even made the case in a prominent September speech that U.S. financial-market regulation was an optimal mix of costs and benefits. He said companies choosing to list abroad may do so because their managers or controlling shareholders prefer to engage in self-dealing that would be prohibited in the U.S.

Mr. Niemeier also argued that U.S. capital costs are lower than elsewhere in the world, implying that investors are still willing to pay a premium for companies that subject themselves to U.S. regulations. And U.S. capital costs are lower than elsewhere. But as the new report documents, that premium has been shrinking. What's more, it's been shrinking faster vis-a-vis other developed countries -- such as Japan and the U.K. -- than it has against developing-world markets.

This suggests that it is stiff competition from relatively well-regulated markets, not from shifty, nontransparent Third World markets, that is taking the biggest toll. This could mean that overseas regulation is improving, not that U.S. regulation is getting more onerous. But even if this were the case, it would not change the main point: Global capital markets are becoming more competitive, and the U.S. is now more likely to be punished for over-regulation than it was in the past.

The report also sheds light on some other significant financial trends. For example, the vast majority of those global IPOs -- over 90% -- that bypass the U.S. public markets still elect to sell their shares to so-called "qualified" U.S. investors. Qualified investors are institutions and individuals rich enough to buy stakes in these companies outside of the publicly traded equity markets. Like a hedge fund, a company that markets only to the very rich is not subject to most securities laws or Sarbox. So in other words, non-U.S. companies are still raising billions in the U.S. through IPOs. They're just doing it in a way that skirts most of our capital-market regulation.

Another warning sign is venture capital, long an engine of American economic growth. Traditionally, VC firms have used the U.S. IPO market as their exit strategy; in the 1990s, IPOs accounted for 90% of VC investment "exits." Today, however, nearly 90% of those venture-capital-backed startups are sold to strategic buyers in private transactions.

This has serious repercussions for the venture capitalist business model. For one thing, valuations are lower in private transactions and liquidity is poorer. Finding a strategic buyer can also prove more difficult than taking a company public, which is why private-equity firms have been increasingly scooping up startups incubated by VCs. "From 2001 to 2005," the report observes, "VC-backed private equity exits reaped a total of $94.85 billion, while VC-backed IPO exits raised only $12.06 billion." This is not a purely profit-driven trend, because valuations are generally lower in the less-liquid private markets. Rather, it is a reflection of where the money increasingly can be found.

Defenders of current regulation claim that the rise in private equity has been driven by low interest rates globally, and there's some truth in this. But that doesn't explain why so much of this global liquidity has gone into private equity rather than, say, the stock markets. The Hubbard-Scott report makes the case that overregulation and litigation risk are a big part of that reason.

Finally, it's worth noting that this report is not, despite some of the media sniping, a laissez-faire manifesto. It recommends no legislative changes to Sarbanes-Oxley, for example, only more rational regulatory interpretation of that misbegotten statute. We don't have the space today to discuss all of its many useful recommendations, 32 in all. But the report's best contribution is the seriousness with which it examines the evidence of U.S. competitive decline -- evidence that defenders of the status quo should now be obliged to answer.

AP, December 1, 2006

LAKE FOREST, California (AP) -- Potential presidential candidate Barack Obama stood before one of the country's largest evangelical churches Friday and declared that condoms should be made more widely available to fight AIDS.

The Democratic senator's appearance at Saddleback megachurch was a source of dispute among evangelical leaders, with some of the most conservative saying that a politician who supports abortion rights should not have been allowed to speak at such a prominent church.

Obama urged unity despite political differences to fight the disease that has killed 25 million people since the first case was reported in 1981. About 40 million currently are infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS.

"We are all sick because of AIDS," Obama said. "We are all challenged by this crisis."

In a show of political unity, Obama took an AIDS test with a potential White House rival on the Republican side -- Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas. Brownback draws his support from the conservative evangelical community, but Obama has been urging liberals not to allow the Republican Party to claim it is the party of Christians. Warren also was tested.

After addressing Brownback as his friend and applauding his efforts on issues such as AIDS, Obama said: "There is one thing I've got to say, Sam, though: This is my house too. This is God's house. So I just want to be clear."

In another show of bipartisanship, the Illinois senator said President Bush doesn't get enough credit for committing $15 million against HIV and AIDS over five years.

He called the dispute over condoms a "false argument."

"I also believe we can't ignore the fact that abstinence and fidelity, although the ideal, may not always be the reality, that we're dealing with flesh-and-blood men and women and not abstractions, and that if condoms and potentially things like microbicides can prevent millions of deaths, then they should be made more widely available," Obama said. "That's my belief."

He said men and women often are "contracting HIV because sex was no longer part of a sacred covenant, but a mechanical physical act." He said government programs cannot solve that problem, but churches can make a real difference by providing people with a moral framework to make better choices.

"I don't care whether you're conservative or liberal, you've got to lift up that aspect of this struggle," said Obama, who at times drew applause.

Obama repeated a story he had read in the Chicago Tribune about a South African woman named Hlengiwe Leocardia Mchunu who lost five of her seven siblings to AIDS. He said he couldn't imagine what it would be like to have AIDS affect his family, but "here's the thing -- my faith tells me that Leo's family is my family."

The summit came on World AIDS Day and the 25th anniversary of the discovery of the disease.

AIDS Fight Needs Churches, Obama Says (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

U.S. Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois told more than 2,000 evangelical leaders in Orange County on Friday that he "respectfully but unequivocally" disagrees with those who oppose condom distribution to fight the AIDS pandemic. But he said a solution to the worldwide spread of AIDS would also come from churches guiding people to make moral decisions.

Obama, a Democrat weighing a run for the White House, made his remarks at an evangelical AIDS conference sponsored by Saddleback Church in Lake Forest.

Some conservatives, offended by Obama's support for legal abortion, had called on the mega-church's pastor, Rick Warren, to rescind his invitation to the senator.

Yet Obama drew a standing ovation from the 2,072 pastors and others who came from 39 states and 18 nations to explore church solutions to the AIDS pandemic, which has killed 25 million people worldwide. In measured words, he dismissed the notion that simply discouraging promiscuity could stop the spread of HIV, the virus that causes AIDS.

"We can't ignore the fact that abstinence and fidelity, although the ideal, may not always be the reality — that we're dealing with flesh and blood men and women and not abstractions, and that if condoms and, potentially, things like microbicides, can prevent millions of deaths, then they should be made more widely available," he said.

He recalled traveling last summer to Kenya and South Africa, where he said he heard "stories of men and women contracting HIV because sex was no longer part of a sacred covenant, but a mechanical physical act; because men had visited prostitutes and then brought the disease home to their wives, or young girls had been subjected to rape and abuse. These are issues of prevention we can't walk away from."

But Obama also noted the power of religion to slow the spread of HIV. Churches, he said, must offer "a moral framework with a faith basis to make better choices."

"Let me say this loud and clear: I don't think that we can deny that there is a moral and spiritual component to prevention, that in too many places all over the world where HIV/AIDS is prevalent — including, by the way, right here in the United States — the relationship between men and women, between sexuality and spirituality, has broken down, and needs to be repaired," he said.

For Obama, the Saddleback appearance offered a high-profile venue to highlight the role of religious faith in his life as he steps into a more prominent role on the national political stage. A parishioner at Trinity United Church of Christ on Chicago's South Side, he has described religion as an important moral force in politics and urged fellow Democrats to reach out to evangelicals.

Evangelicals, particularly those who are white, have strongly favored Republicans in national elections for decades. The Saddleback event also enabled Obama to spotlight his efforts to find common ground with Republicans on AIDS and other matters. Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist, said that after years of fierce partisan combat in Washington, D.C., voters were likely to look favorably on a presidential candidate who champions efforts to work together for the common good.

"At a political level, it's a very smart thing for him to do," he said of Obama's improbable stop at a mega-church in Republican-leaning Orange County.

In his speech at Saddleback's cavernous worship center in the foothills of the Santa Ana Mountains, Obama applauded the Bush administration for spending billions on AIDS programs abroad.

"I don't do that that often," he said to laughter, "and sometimes unfairly so, because this is an area where I think the Bush administration has not gotten enough credit. The administration and this Congress have been serious about putting resources in contributing to the fight against HIV and AIDS."

Before Obama spoke, Warren, leader of Saddleback's 20,000-strong congregation and author of the best-seller "The Purpose Driven Life," called on church leaders around the world to unite in efforts to fight AIDS. The pastor, dressed in blue jeans, cited the millions of African children from families afflicted with HIV.

"Friends, that's a continent sliding into the ocean," he told the crowd. "It is a race against time," he said. "People are dying."

Warren referred indirectly to the criticism that followed his invitation to Obama, saying people should listen respectfully to Democrats like Obama and Republicans like fellow speaker and Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.).

"I've got two friends here, a Republican and a Democrat. Why?" Warren asked. "Because you've got to have two wings to fly."

Brownback seconded the sentiment when he spoke to the crowd, saying Democrats and Republicans need to "reach across the aisle" to combat AIDS.

"There's nothing political about dealing with malaria and global HIV," he said.

The Kansas senator, a conservative and also a potential presidential candidate, recalled his travels to Sudan and other parts of Africa, where he witnessed people suffering from AIDS and malaria and saw regions that had experienced genocide.

"If we'll just give them the crumbs off our table, they can live, and we can save our souls," Brownback said.

At a news conference after their speeches, Obama, Brownback and Warren were each administered HIV tests with a cheek swab — a gesture aimed at lifting the stigma of HIV. Each tested negative.

Asked about the objections to his visit, Obama said: "I don't demonize other folks."

"I found that I've never learned anything from refusing to listen to other people or refusing to engage in conversation with them," he said, "and that surely can't be the basis for healthy politics in our society."

Obama and Brownback declined to discuss their potential candidacies for the U.S. presidency, saying that would distract from the summit's focus on AIDS.

What's In A Name, Barry? (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

If you call Barack Obama's office to check the spelling of his middle name, the reply comes back: "Like the dictator."

In the first rush of our blind date with the young senator from Illinois, we are still discovering things that are going to take some getting used to. Like his middle name: Hussein.

There were already a few top Democrats scoffing at the idea that a man whose surname sounded like a Middle East terrorist could get elected president. Now it turns out that his middle name sounds like a Middle East dictator. So with one moniker, he evokes both maniacal villains of the Bush administration. And to top it off, as Jennifer Senior noted in New York magazine, Barack rhymes with Iraq.

The middle name — the first name of his Muslim grandfather, a Kenyan farmer, and the middle name of his father, a Kenyan goatherd — had been cited in a few places, like Ms. Senior's piece. But there hadn't been much focus on the unfortunate coincidence of the senator from the city known as the Hog Butcher to the World having the same name as the Butcher of Baghdad until a Republican operative dropped the H-bomb on "Hardball" this week.

Ed Rogers, a Bush 41 official, said he was underwhelmed with "Barack Hussein Obama," dismissing him as "a blank canvas where people project their desires."

This set off indignation among liberal bloggers and in the Obama camp, where the middle name has not been hidden, but has not been mentioned much, either, even on the senator's August odyssey to his paternal home in Africa. The hush-hush on Hussein is a bit odd given that Mr. Inclusive is presenting himself as the American dream in human form, a multiethnic quilt whose journey is his qualification for higher office.

"It wasn't a slip of the tongue, I know that," said Robert Gibbs, the senator's director of communications. "The 2006 election proved that people are far smarter than the spin and fearmongering. You can't solve Iraq with a campaign about people's middle names."

He said that when Mr. Obama was running for the Senate, there were conservative Web sites that crowned the Democrat's picture with a turban and tried to make an issue of Obama and Osama sounding alike — just as G.O.P. strategists shamefully linked Max Cleland with Osama in 2002, and claimed in 2004 and 2006 that a win for the Democrats counted as a win for the terrorists.

Mr. Gibbs said some had suggested to Mr. Obama early in his pursuit of a Senate seat that, given 9/11, he might want to go by his childhood nickname, Barry. (Then it could have been Barry! vs. Hillary!)

In his book "The Audacity of Hope," the senator describes a lunch with a media consultant in late September 2001. Looking down at a newspaper picture of Osama, the politico shook his head and said: "Really bad luck. You can't change your name, of course. Voters are suspicious of that kind of thing. Maybe if you were at the start of your career, you know, you could use a nickname or something. But now ..."

The senator wrote: "His voice trailed off and he shrugged apologetically before signaling the waiter to bring us the check. I suspected he was right, and that realization ate away at me."

The Republicans are expert at tying Democrats to villains. Mr. Rogers's bad-boy mentor, Lee Atwater, yoked Willie Horton to Michael Dukakis. Mr. Atwater and his successors also liked to present their side as being more American. Traveling on the campaign trail with Bush Senior in '88, Loretta Lynn made fun of Mr. Dukakis's ethnicity, noting, "Why, I can't even pronounce his name." And in 2004, a Bush 43 campaign adviser trashed John Kerry for looking French.

Names can be fraught in politics. Hillary Rodham felt she had to switch to Mrs. Clinton after her husband lost the Arkansas statehouse in 1980.

Mr. Rogers denies he was playing hardball when he lobbed "Hussein" on "Hardball."

"No, I wasn't trying to say he is Saddam-like," he laughed. "The context was, this guy's a lightweight. Never have I seen so much swoon for so little biography. If he can make something out of this, it proves he's very thin-skinned and he ain't ready. Hillary will beat him like a rented mule." That would be Hillary Diane Rodham Clinton to you, Ed.

Bayh Moves Toward Presidential Bid (AP)

By David Espo

AP, December 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101012

WASHINGTON -- Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, a Democrat with a record of political success in a Republican-leaning state, intends to take the first official step toward a 2008 presidential campaign early next week, officials said Friday.

Bayh's plans include creation of a presidential exploratory committee, as well as appearances Monday in Iowa and next weekend in New Hampshire, two early states on the campaign calendar.

Bayh would be the second Democrat to take a formal step toward a presidential campaign. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is already in the race. Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois are among numerous other potential rivals who are expected to decide within a few weeks whether to run.

Republicans also are likely to have a crowded field of contenders. So far, only Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani have created exploratory committees, which permit fundraising to finance a candidate's travels.

The officials who described Bayh's plans did so on condition of anonymity, saying they had not been authorized to discuss them.

Bayh has been pointing toward a run for the White House for months, and had $10.5 million in his Senate campaign bank account as of Sept. 30. The money can be transferred to his exploratory committee.

In addition, the senator recently hired his first paid organizer for Iowa, the state whose caucuses will be the opening competition of the campaign. The aide, Chris Haylor, worked in Iowa for Sen. John Kerry in the 2004 campaign.

As a member of the Senate Intelligence and Armed Services committees, Bayh was one of the first Democrats to support military action in Iraq. But in December 2005, he changed his position, saying he would not have supported legislation authorizing the invasion if the facts the Bush administration used to support the move had been presented to him accurately.

Bayh, 50, has charted a centrist's course throughout his political career, including two terms as governor and eight years in the Senate. He also has served as chairman of the Democratic Leadership Council, which is a prominent voice for moderation within the party, and has helped establish the centrist New Democrat Coalition.

Elected governor in 1988, he was the first Democrat in 20 years to hold that office and -- at 33 -- the youngest state chief executive in the United States.

Bayh was often referred to as a "Republicrat" who courted the middle. He never raised taxes and he left office with a humming state economy, low unemployment and a record budget surplus.

His approval rating was an astonishing 79 percent in a state that hasn't voted for a Democratic presidential nominee since Lyndon Johnson's 1964 landslide.

He drew national notice, too, as his tenure neared an end. Bayh was tapped to give the keynote address at the 1996 Democratic National Convention.

He was elected to the Senate two years later.

In recent years, Bayh voted against confirmation of Chief Justice John Roberts as well as Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito; opposed legislation to open a portion of an Arctic wildlife refuge to oil drilling; supported a comprehensive immigration bill that included a path to citizenship for millions of men and women in the country illegally.

Bayh is the son of Birch Bayh, who won three terms in the Senate from Indiana before losing his seat to Dan Quayle in the Republican landslide of 1980.

Ross Baker, a political science professor at Rutgers University who once worked for Bayh's father, said Bayh's having been a popular governor was a plus. But he said Bayh's campaign would face a challenge to gain support in Democratic primaries. "He has been identified as a centrist, whereas the primary Democratic electorate is comprised of fairly liberal voters," Baker said.

Morris Reid, a Democratic strategist, said Bayh has made a good start on his campaign, having traveled extensively to key primary states and stumped for candidates lower on the ladder, including state legislative candidates in Iowa and New Hampshire.

"People expect so much of him," Reid said. "Evan Bayh has been bred to run for the presidency, and that is a lot of pressure."

With two years until the presidential election, potential candidates from both parties have been busy ramping up their organizations. Vilsack is in the midst of a cross-country tour to launch his campaign, and Obama discussed a possible bid with his top advisers during a meeting in his hometown of Chicago on Wednesday.

On the Republican side, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney has scheduled a trip to Asia next week to beef up his foreign policy credentials. Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback is expected to announce soon whether he will move forward with his presidential ambitions.

Workers A Thorny Issue For Romney (LAT)

By Elizabeth Mehren

DOJ_NMG_0101013

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

BOSTON — Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a 2008 GOP presidential aspirant and an outspoken critic of illegal immigration, apparently employed undocumented landscape workers at his home near Boston.

Responding to a report in Friday's Boston Globe, the governor's communications director said Friday that Romney was unaware that several of the landscapers who kept up his suburban Belmont property were in this country illegally.

"Gov. Romney has no information or knowledge to corroborate the Globe's allegations," Eric Fehrnstrom said Friday. "He hired a legitimate lawn service company and he knows the owner as a decent, hardworking person who is a legal resident."

As he explores a run for the presidency in 2008, Romney has made illegal immigration a priority issue, urging stiff penalties for employers who knowingly hire undocumented workers.

The governor has endorsed construction of a 700-mile fence along the U.S. border with Mexico and has advocated that National Guard troops be stationed along the border until the fence is finished. After Romney declared his support for the fence on a Fox television show in September, host Bill O'Reilly christened the barrier "the Mitt Romney Memorial Wall."

After receiving a tip that illegal workers were tending the governor's 2½-acre property, the Globe sent a team of reporters to Guatemala to interview four current and former employees of Community Lawn Service With a Heart. The small company, based in Chelsea, Mass., had maintained Romney's grounds for a decade. The company is owned by Ricardo Saenz, a legal immigrant from Colombia.

Only one of the landscapers interviewed by the Globe said he had proper documentation to work in the United States. Another told Globe reporters that he had paid smugglers about $5,000 to take him across the U.S-Mexican border.

The Guatemalan laborers told the Globe that the governor sometimes greeted them by saying buenos dias.

The same landscaping service also maintained the nearby property of the governor's son Taggart, the Globe reported.

In California's 1994 U.S. Senate election, GOP Rep. Michael Huffington was defeated after admitting that an illegal immigrant had worked as his children's nanny for five years.

Mormon Political Clout Grows (GAN)

By Diana Marrero

Gannett, December 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — When Sen. Harry Reid becomes Senate majority leader next year, he will be the most powerful Mormon in Washington.

But that reign could be short-lived if Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney makes a bid for the presidency in 2008 and wins. Romney is considering a run in what is expected to be a wide-open field.

Reid is a Democrat from Nevada and Romney is a Republican. Though they have chosen different political stripes, they are bonded in a faith whose leaders encourage members to become active in public life.

Mormons are heeding the call. Typically conservative, they are more politically active than average Americans, according to a recent study. And the 15 Mormons in Congress is a slightly greater representation than the religious group's percentage of the general population.

"From the pulpit, they talk about the importance of being involved in the community, being involved in politics," said Dean Heller, a Mormon who was just elected to represent Nevada in the House. "They want members of the church to be integrated into society."

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, as the church is officially called, believes the nation's founders were men of God and that the U.S. Constitution was divinely inspired.

But as politically active as Mormons may be, their faith is largely misunderstood by most Americans.

Some evangelical Christians consider the faith a cult, and 35% of Americans say they would not vote for a Mormon for president, according to a recent poll.

That presents a particular challenge for Romney, who so far has steered clear of any public discussion about his religion.

"Because religion matters in politics, it represents opportunities and challenges for candidates," said John Green, at the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life. "Candidates have to be very cautious when it comes to talking about their faith."

A Time magazine story set to hit the news stands next week features an article titled "Can a Mormon be president?"

Quin Monson, a political science professor at Brigham Young University in Provo, Utah, says Romney's faith would likely matter to only a minority of voters.

"If a Mormon can be elected as governor of Massachusetts and a Mormon can be Senate majority leader, certainly a Mormon can be president," he said.

A religious minority, Mormons represent less than 2% of the American population with 5.5 million members across the country. The church, which claims a total of 12 million members, is one of the fastest growing faiths in the world.

DOJ_NMG_0101014

Roughly 80% of Americans consider themselves Christians, with Protestants making up about half of that group. About a quarter are Catholic.

Like Mormons, Jews and Episcopalians are also overrepresented in Congress. For example, Episcopalians make up less than 1% of the American population but 8% of Congress.

John M. Haddow, a former legislative director for Utah Sen. Orrin Hatch, said the senator was always open about his Mormon faith. Hatch briefly ran for the GOP presidential nomination six years ago.

Mormons have come a long way since Joseph Smith founded the church in upstate New York in the early 1800s. An angry mob killed Smith shortly after he announced his candidacy for president in 1844.

Sixty years later, Utah Republican Reed Smoot became the first Mormon elected to the Senate. His arrival sparked congressional hearings on polygamy, a practice officially banned by Mormon leaders in 1890. Smoot, who was not a polygamist, served five terms.

Mormons still face questions about polygamy — fueled in part by the HBO show Big Love about a Utah man and his multiple wives. Recent news coverage of a rape trial against the leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Latter-day Saints, has also kept the issue in the public arena.

But church members and others say these associations are unfair.

They point to John F. Kennedy, who overcame questions about his religion to become the first Catholic elected president in 1960.

"He broke the ground for people like Romney to run without regard to their specific faith tradition," said the Rev. Bob Edgar, of the National Council of Churches and a former Pennsylvania congressman.

Reid, who attends a Mormon church just outside Washington and keeps the Book of Mormon in his office, was not born into the faith. He joined the church in college and raised his five children in the church.

"The church has been a wonderful thing in my life," he said. "It helps me try to always do the right thing, understand that what you do has consequences."

Still, he recently drew sharp criticism from church leaders by voting against a constitutional amendment against gay marriage. He thinks gay marriage is a states' rights issue.

Although Mormon religious leaders do not endorse specific candidates, the church has at times expressed its opinion on issues such as gambling and same-sex marriage, said church spokeswoman Kim Farah.

"We believe we have an obligation as members of the communities in which we live and as citizens of the nation to engage in the political process in an informed way," she said in an e-mail. "However, church members are to make their own choices and affiliations in partisan politics."

Kerry Assessing Impact Of "Botched Joke" On '08 Prospects (AP)

There's before The Joke, when the Massachusetts senator appeared to be well on his way toward making a political comeback, laying the groundwork for a White House bid despite losing the 2004 presidential election.

Then there's after The Joke, when even fellow Democrats and former supporters question whether Kerry is still politically viable.

Kerry's quip just before the November 7 midterm elections that those who don't study hard "get stuck in Iraq" not only forced him into isolation in the campaign's final days, it rekindled criticism about his failure to beat a war-plagued president two years ago. It also highlighted a shallowness to what he and his aides still considered to be widespread public support.

"The joke stopped that momentum in its track," said Jerry Crawford, a Des Moines attorney who was chairman of Kerry's Iowa campaign in 2004. "I don't think it was fair the way it was used against him, but it's nevertheless the reality. And it knocks him back to the place where he was shortly after the '04 election."

Crawford will be supporting Tom Vilsack, Iowa's outgoing governor, as he makes a run for the Democratic nomination in 2008. He said that is based on their longstanding relationship, not any falling out with Kerry.Just a joke

Kerry dismissed the education comment as a "botched joke" directed at President Bush, who was two years behind him at Yale. He said Republicans inflamed the issue to try to curtail expected Democratic gains on Election Day.

Since then, Kerry has said it will be up to voters to decide what effect it may have on his presidential prospects.

"That was a slip-up of one word," he said Thursday on CNN's "The Situation Room." "I really think people have made much too much out of it."

DOJ_NMG_0101015

Behind the scenes, Kerry apparently has been having doubts, calling current and former Democratic confidantes to inquire just how much his gaffe hurt his presidential chances, according to several Democrats who spoke on condition of anonymity because the conversations were private.

Kerry, who turns 63 next month, had been planning to announce a comeback campaign in December or January. He had thrown himself into helping his party reclaim Congress in the midterm election, campaigning for roughly 80 House, Senate and gubernatorial candidates.

He also has a political account of $14 million -- about the same as New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, the Democratic front-runner.Democrats' victory a factor

Two things have delayed Kerry's plans: fallout from the joke, and the Democrats' newfound control over the House and Senate.

As a member of the incoming majority party, come January Kerry will be chairman of the Senate Small Business Committee and the Foreign Relations East Asian and Pacific affairs subcommittee. He will be in attendance when the new Foreign Relations Committee chairman, Sen. Joe Biden, D-Delaware, convenes hearings on the future of U.S. military action in Iraq.

These responsibilities will impede Kerry's ability to jet around the country, attending fundraisers and courting political operatives, as he did in 2002 and 2003 when Democrats were in the congressional minority and largely powerless.

"Everybody's clock's been slowed down by the move into the majority," said Edward Reilly, Kerry's top political consultant. "Clearly the election was about Iraq and people want change -- and this new Congress to deliver it."

Nonetheless, "We're still very much in a go-mode on this thing," Reilly said. Kerry and his wife, Teresa Heinz Kerry, hope to boost their public reemergence with a book about the environment slated for publication next April.

The senator faces other challenges in mounting a second presidential campaign. No Democrat other than an incumbent president has won his party's nomination twice since Adlai Stevenson failed in back-to-back campaigns in 1952 and 1956.

First, Kerry is up for re-election in 2008, which means he will have to simultaneously run for president and the Senate if he doesn't want to take an all-or-nothing chance on the White House.

He is helped by the anemic Massachusetts Republican Party, which is in tatters after losing the governor's office on November 7. The party's most prominent candidate, Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, was trounced, and another potential Senate candidate, Republican Gov. Mitt Romney, is preparing for his own presidential campaign.

Potential Democratic challengers, including several members of the Massachusetts House delegation, are also rethinking strategy after their party's wins win gave them newfound power in Congress.Next best thing to Clinton

The bigger threat is to Kerry's principal campaign rationale that he is the most viable alternative to Clinton. The former first lady leads polls among potential Democratic presidential candidates, although she has not committed to a 2008 campaign.

Among some Democratic operatives, including former Kerry campaign staffers who would only speak on the condition of anonymity to avoid angering the senator, the joke and Kerry's response undercut his claim to that distinction. Kerry finished last in a Quinnipiac University poll released Monday that asked voters to rate 20 politicians. (Full story)

"I don't think it's personality; I think it's strategic," said Jeffrey Berry, a political science professor at Tufts University. "The reason John Kerry won the nomination in 2004 was that Democrats in Iowa calculated that the best chance to beat George Bush was to nominate someone with military experience, who could be effective in fighting off Republican criticism that Democrats are 'soft on terror.'"

Berry added: "The war has become such a catastrophe for the Republicans, the Democrats don't need a war hero. The Republicans are going to be on the defensive next time."

At the same time, other Democrats are offering a fresh face.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Illinois, one of the party's most popular figures, has changed course and now says he is considering a campaign even though he has served in the Senate only two years. Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Indiana, a former Midwestern governor, has $10 million he can use on a campaign.

And Kerry's 2004 running mate, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, is touring the country, promoting a new book and laying the groundwork for his own 2008 campaign.

William Shaheen, a veteran New Hampshire activist whose wife, Jeanne, served as the state's governor and Kerry's campaign chairwoman, said the senator remains viable as a presidential candidate because he has a clear strategy on Iraq, a plan for improving health care nationwide and an outline for energy independence.

"John Kerry is a very complicated guy who offers a lot," he said.

As for whom he will support going forward, Shaheen replied: "I'm certainly leaning toward him, because he's done nothing to violate my trust. I appreciate the race he ran in '04 and I appreciated what he did this fall."

With An Eye Cast To 2008, Pataki Hires A Chief Aide (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

Gov. George E. Pataki hired a former aide to Vice President Dick Cheney yesterday as the chief fund-raiser for the political operation that is laying groundwork for Mr. Pataki's possible bid for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008.

Mr. Pataki, who will leave office at the end of the month, is now preparing to move into new offices in his hometown of Peekskill, N.Y., where he will oversee his political action committee, the 21st Century Freedom PAC.

The new aide, Kara Ahern, is joining PAC as the national finance director to raise money for Republican allies of Mr. Pataki — and for the governor himself if he makes a bid for president or perhaps vice president.

Ms. Ahern worked with Mr. Pataki when she was the Northeast finance director for President Bush's campaign in 2004. Afterward, she was political director to Mr. Cheney, and this year she was a fund-raiser for the Republican nominee for governor of Massachusetts, Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey. (Ms. Healey lost last month.)

Mr. Pataki is viewed in Republican circles as a long shot for his party's nomination in 2008, given his moderate stance on social issues — he supports abortion rights, for instance — and given his unpopularity in New York as his third term winds down.

Even the newly elected chairman of the New York Republican Party, Joseph N. Mondello, has been openly skeptical of Mr. Pataki's prospects.

While three top Republican operatives in Iowa recently resigned from the Pataki PAC, re-enforcing uncertainty about his 2008 chances, Ms. Ahern said in an interview that she was excited about Mr. Pataki's future, and added that she was drawn to his sunny nature.

"What I like about him is he's very positive," she said. "He looks to what's right with the country, and the things we're doing right, and the things we need to change. He's very positive."

Despite her work in Massachusetts, Ms. Ahern said she had not considered working for the state's governor, Mitt Romney, another presidential hopeful.

Steele Takes Active Role In Maryland Politics, Eyes 2010 (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele has rebounded from his election loss by returning to an active role in state Republican politics, positioning himself for a potential run for governor in four years.

"I'm just trying to make sure our party gets back on its feet and stands tall," Mr. Steele told The Washington Times. "If we don't do the groundwork now and pull ourselves up, 2010 won't matter and 2008 won't matter, either."

Since his loss Nov. 7 in the U.S. Senate race, Mr. Steele has helped recruit and promote candidates for state party chairman and members of the central executive committee, who will be elected today at the state party convention in Annapolis.

Mr. Steele, who served as state party chairman from 2000 to 2002, said it was "too soon" to commit to a run for governor, but he did not rule out the possibility.

"I'll always be prepared for opportunities," he said.

He also said that after the re-election loss of Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., the state's first Republican governor in more than 30 years, the party must rebuild the way it did after 1998. That year, Republican Ellen R. Sauerbrey narrowly lost a second gubernatorial election to Gov. Parris N. Glendening, a Democrat.

"We struck gold right out of the box," Mr. Steele said of his 2002 win with Mr. Ehrlich. "I think we can do it again."

Senate Minority Whip Andrew P. Harris said he was "encouraged that [Mr. Steele] wants to have influence" in party elections.

"That means Michael Steele is here to stay with us as a political force in Maryland," said Mr. Harris, Baltimore County Republican.

Carol L. Hirschburg, a Republican political consultant in Maryland, said Mr. Steele remains a "rallying point" for the party even after it suffered major setbacks in the election.

The nation's anti-Republican mood helped restore the Democratic Party's almost complete control of state government in Maryland, where Democrats outnumber Republicans nearly 2 to 1.

Mrs. Hirschburg joined Mr. Harris and other party insiders who anticipate a 2010 gubernatorial run by Mr. Steele, who entered the Senate race as a rising star in the party and continues to attract national attention.

"It was always assumed ... that he would run for governor," Mrs. Hirschburg said.

DOJ_NMG_0101017

Mr. Steele's involvement in the party elections is a stark contrast to Mr. Ehrlich, who has assumed a low profile since his loss to Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley, a Democrat.

The governor "is busy governing and making his transition to private life," said Ehrlich spokesman Henry Fawell.

Mr. Steele has aggressively lobbied central committee members to elect as chairman Jim Pelura, a Davidsonville veterinarian who served as state chairman of President Bush's 2004 campaign and as the Anne Arundel County chairman of Mr. Ehrlich's 2006 campaign.

However, a nomination for party chairman also went to Annapolis businessman John White, a political newcomer who last month lost the race for the 3rd Congressional District seat by a large margin to Democrat John P. Sarbanes.

Candidates had to be nominated by at least three county chairmen before the 7:30 p.m. deadline yesterday.

Mr. Steele's efforts helped establish Mr. Pelura as the frontrunner heading into the vote today by the party's 238 central committee members.

Maryland Republican Party Chairman John M. Kane, who is stepping down after one four-year term, said Mr. Steele's endorsement of Mr. Pelura is expected to "sway a lot of voters."

Mr. Steele, who lost the U.S. Senate race to Sen.-elect Benjamin L. Cardin, a Democrat, was expected to land somewhere on the national stage.

He was briefly rumored to be the next RNC chairman before the post was offered to Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida, a former member of Mr. Bush's Cabinet.

Mr. Steele said he plans to stay involved in state and national politics, including supporting the party's congressional and presidential candidates.

"I'm going to try to play at both levels," he said. "I'm going to continue the message I struck a chord with over the last year."

The lieutenant governor's interest in the party elections has Maryland Republicans continuing to pin their hopes on him. Mr. Steele's Senate run demonstrated his ability to appeal to swing voters and voters who traditionally back Democrats.

"That's where the future of the Republican Party in Maryland lies," Mr. Harris said.

New President Takes Helm Of Divided Mexico (WP)

By Lorraine Orlandi

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 1 -- Felipe Calderon, a free-trade booster and career politician, was sworn in as president of Mexico on Friday in a ceremony undercut by lawmakers' jeers and fisticuffs, a chaotic scene that reflected the country's deep political and economic divisions.

Calderon, 44, slipped through a side door into the congressional chamber to recite the oath of office, as opposition legislators made a final push to barricade the entrances and block his inauguration. Moments earlier, rival lawmakers had brawled briefly on the assembly's floor, shoving each other and throwing chairs.

The perfunctory ceremony lasted less than five minutes and was nearly drowned out by whistling and catcalls from opponents who said Calderon had stolen the July election through fraud.

It was an unprecedented departure from the typical somber pageantry of Mexico's transfer of power and a long way from the mass euphoria that greeted Vicente Fox's 2000 election victory, which ended 71 years of single-party rule. It was also an indication of the challenges that await Calderon.

In a speech at the National Auditorium a few hours after the inauguration, the new president acknowledged the turmoil, but he also called on rivals to put aside political differences.

"To those who voted for other political options, I say I will not ignore the reasons behind your vote, and I ask you to let me win your confidence through action," he said, speaking from the vast stage where he was briefly joined by his wife and three young children.

"Clearly, Mexico is living through tense times. . . . I am aware of the seriousness of our differences and take full responsibility to solve them and reunite Mexico."

Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, the popular former mayor of Mexico City who lost the election to Calderon, has declared himself the "legitimate" president. He mobilized mass street protests that paralyzed the city center for weeks after the election. On Friday, he led a march against Calderon through the capital's downtown and pledged to "defend democracy."

"We will not accept a democratic farce," he told cheering supporters.

Calderon, of the National Action Party, won the election by less than one percentage point. The nation's top electoral court found no evidence to support allegations of widespread fraud and rejected Lopez Obrador's calls for a vote-by-vote recount, instead certifying Calderon the winner after a recount of about 9 percent of returns.

That left a bitter taste among some Mexican voters, especially those disappointed with Fox's failure to close the gap between rich and poor, rein in rampant drug-related violence and street crime, and create new jobs in a nation where 40 percent of the population lives in poverty.

Such social inequalities have recently helped feed unrest in parts of the country. Violent protests in the historic southern city of Oaxaca have claimed several lives in the past few months and left the tourist center damaged. A handful of bombs apparently placed by groups sympathetic to the Oaxaca protesters exploded across Mexico City recently. And a turf war among drug gangs has produced gory headlines daily.

"Fox is bequeathing to Calderon a country without government," said Homero Aridjis, a 66-year-old poet, commentator and environmentalist who attended Calderon's speech.

"The political parties are in a pitched battle, it's like lucha libre," or freestyle wrestling, said Aridjis. "In Oaxaca, a historic city has been ruined by negligence and social and labor unrest. We have drug executions daily. At breakfast you read in the paper how many people were killed today."

Calderon pledged to fight crime with an overhaul of the police and the justice system, to combat poverty and to repay Mexico's "enormous debt to the poor" with more, and more efficient, social spending. He also promised to create jobs and attract investment to stem illegal migration.

He has used strong language to denounce Washington's plan to extend a wall along the border to stop illegal immigrants, but he has said he believes there is "room for improvement" on immigration and other bilateral issues after Democratic gains in the U.S. Congress.

In perhaps his most dramatic gesture and one that echoed Lopez Obrador's calls for government austerity, Calderon on Friday promised to immediately slash salaries of the president and high-ranking officials and asked Congress to review the pay scales for all public officials.

Fox's 2006 salary was 2.7 million pesos, or about $245,000. In Peru, a similar gesture by center-left President Alan Garcia boosted his approval ratings soon after he took office in July.

Like Fox, Calderon will face a divided Congress. His party holds the largest voting bloc, but Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolutionary Party, or PRD, makes up the second-largest force.

Among Calderon's first challenges may be confronting Mexico's privileged business elite -- seen by many as the pillar of his support base but which benefits from tax and regulatory breaks that economists say squeeze ordinary Mexicans with high prices for basic services.

"Mexican capitalists, the big ones, were protected by the old PRI system, and Fox didn't touch that," said Marifeli PÃ©rez-Stable, an analyst with the Washington-based Inter-American Dialogue, referring to the Institutional Revolutionary Party, which lost power in 2000.

Rogelio Ramirez de la O, an economist who advised Lopez Obrador's campaign, said Calderon must take on the oligarchy where Mexico's wealth is concentrated, as well as corrupt unions and vested interests at state-owned oil monopoly Pemex.

"If he presents himself like Teddy Roosevelt going up against the robber barons, that would be a sign that would create a positive environment," he said. "But if he doesn't govern for the other half of Mexico, then Mexico will be increasingly partitioned."

Tens of thousands of anti-Calderon protesters gathered in Mexico City's central plaza on Friday to voice their displeasure with the inauguration. Among them was Lilia Gomez, a 42-year-old housewife from the southern state of Veracruz who took not a little joy in seeing Calderon have to squirrel himself into Congress.

"He never thought he would have to go in the back door," she said.

Amid Catcalls, Mexico's President Is Sworn In (NYT)

By James C. McKinley

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 1 — It was not pretty, but Felipe Calderón, the new president of Mexico, managed to take the oath of office in Congress Friday, as opposition lawmakers whistled and catcalled and the losing leftist candidate staged a massive march down the central avenue of the capital.

Never before in modern Mexican history has a president been sworn in under such chaotic and divisive conditions. At midnight, as President Vicente Fox's term ran out, the government took the step of broadcasting the private swearing-in of Mr. Calderón at the presidential residence, a legal necessity usually not publicized.

Minutes later, Mr. Calderón spoke on national television to urge lawmakers to "respect the Constitution" and let the ceremony take place.

The call went unheeded. Mr. Calderón's opponents from the leftist Democratic Revolution Party tried to block the entrances to Congress to prevent him from being publicly sworn in. But with his conservative National Action Party supporters ringing the podium, he and Mr. Fox were spirited in by bodyguards through a door near the dais at the front of the chamber at 9:50 a.m.

Mr. Calderón quickly took the oath of office, and Mr. Fox handed over the traditional presidential sash, then both left the chamber. The entire ceremony lasted four minutes. Opposition politicians blew whistles, screamed insults and displayed banners saying Mr. Calderón was "a traitor to democracy."

The tug of war over the ceremony provoked fistfights and pushing matches between lawmakers. It was the culmination of months of bitter disagreement over Mexico's hotly contested July 2 election, which the courts determined Mr. Calderón had won by a mere 240,000 votes out of 41 million ballots cast.

His leftist rival, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the former Mexico City mayor, has never conceded defeat, and just before the swearing-in Friday morning, he held a rally in the city's historic central square, the Plaza of the Constitution, with more than 100,000 supporters.

Then he led a march down Paseo de la Reforma, the city's main avenue, toward the National Auditorium, where President Calderón spoke at noon to several thousand invited guests as hundreds of police officers in riot gear ringed the building and blocked roads for miles around.

While on the street Mr. López Obrador's supporters chanted slogans and waved banners, inside the auditorium the atmosphere was more like the Academy Awards than a political rally, with smooth-voiced announcers praising Mr. Calderón to a well-dressed crowd while a big-screen television showed a rosy biography of him.

As he has many times in the last two months, Mr. Calderón reached out to his leftist adversaries and called on them to put the national interest above partisan differences.

"To those who voted for other political options, I will not ignore the reasons and causes for your votes," he said. "And I ask you to let me gain your confidence with acts."

"It's clear that Mexico is living through tense times between the main political forces but, conscious of the seriousness of the disagreements, I assume completely the responsibility to resolve them and reunify Mexico," he added.

He went on to announce he would immediately push for two proposals near and dear to Mr. López Obrador. He promised to cut the salaries of the president and high government officials (a staple in his adversary's stump speech), as well as to provide universal health care to children.

Those gestures were not likely to make peace. Speaking to his supporters, Mr. López Obrador charged that the election was fraudulent and that Mr. Calderón's victory was engineered by a "neofascist oligarchy." He claimed the "imposition" of Mr. Calderón as president amounted to a "coup d'état."

"We are not rebels without a cause," he said. "Sometimes they forget the heart of the matter, which is that they robbed us of the election."

He also hinted darkly that he and his party might resort to violent protests in their efforts to "defend democracy."

He said: "We don't want to generate problems, but they have to understand for once and for all, we are going to defend the democracy of this country. We have always acted in a responsible manner, but understand me well, everything has its limit."

In Congress, the left and right seemed as entrenched as ever after the donnybrooks and yelling matches of the morning, boding ill for any agreements on important changes that economists say the country needs to remain competitive.

In the end, the conservative legislative leaders were successful not only in getting Mr. Calderón to the podium, but also in ensuring that dignitaries like former President George H. W. Bush, who represented the United States, were able to attend.

The raucous behavior of the lawmakers of the Democratic Revolution Party, known by its Spanish initials as the P.R.D., provoked strong reactions. "The Democratic Revolution Party should lose its party registration because they don't respect institutions," said Héctor Larios, the National Action Party leader in the Chamber of Deputies. "We have put a stop to the continual threats and extortions of the P.R.D., and that's the way it must be, because this should not happen. We cannot respect people who don't respect institutions."

But the leftists, for their part, continued to lob verbal grenades at the new president, suggesting his refusal to accept a recount in the general election had pushed the country to the brink of revolution.

"Felipe Calderón does not enjoy legitimacy in his position, even when he has the law on his side," said Senator Carlos Navarrete of the P.R.D. said. "Calderón's government has started its rule by throwing matches everywhere, on dry straw."

MEXICO CITY -- President Felipe Calderón took office yesterday, facing down leftist lawmakers who had vowed to block his inauguration and putting the country on notice that he won't retreat as easily in the face of opposition as his predecessor did.

Opposition lawmakers had warned Mr. Calderón, who won a disputed victory in July, that there could be trouble if he took his oath of office in Congress, as called for by the Constitution. But the conservative said he wanted to make a point of abiding by the law. While there were some fistfights among lawmakers from both sides -- which visiting California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger called "good action" -- the ceremony ended quickly and without major incident.

The symbolic gesture sent a loud message in Mexico, a country that only saw its first fully democratic transition in 2000, but that has been slowly becoming more violent and ungovernable since that year's election of President Vicente Fox, who repeatedly backed down in the face of protests and opposition demands. The resulting drift has let Mexico fall ever further behind its Asian rivals in attracting investment to create jobs and ease poverty.

"This suggests a leader who isn't afraid to do his duty. It's positive in that it reflects a firmness that was absent under Fox," said Jorge Chabat, a professor who follows the presidency at the CIDE research university in Mexico City.

Mr. Calderón called for reconciliation in a country divided over the election. His opponent, populist Andrés Manuel López Obrador, still hasn't accepted the result, and recently held his own inauguration as the "legitimate" president. While a third of Mexicans believe there was fraud of some kind in the election, which was deemed clean by international observers, about 85% say they accept Mr. Calderón as leader.

In his first speech as president, Mr. Calderón made fighting crime, reducing poverty and overhauling a clubby political system his first priorities. Taking a page from his left-wing rival's playbook, the new president said he would reduce his pay and that of his senior staff -- posing a challenge to Congress to approve broader legislation that would reduce salaries of elected officials, as well as to cut state funding for political parties and shorten campaign periods. Mexico's democracy is one of the world's most expensive.

Seeking to reach out to his rival's supporters, Mr. Calderón said he would boost social-welfare spending to expand health-care coverage for poor children, increase cash subsidies for poor families and provide more scholarships. Addressing Mr. López Obrador's supporters, he said, "I don't ignore the causes and reasons for your discontent. But I ask you to give me a chance to win you over through my actions."

Chaos Reigns For Mexican Inauguration (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

Felipe Calderon is sworn in amid battles in the legislative palace. He promises to reach out to mend rifts.

Leaders of the largest opposition party in Congress, the leftist Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD, say Calderon's election was illegitimate, and they battled conservative congressional deputies and senators on the floor most of the week. But the leftists failed in their attempt to keep legislators out of the chambers to prevent a quorum for the joint session of Congress.

Friday morning, after leftist lawmakers barricaded most of the doors with chairs in a last-ditch attempt to keep the president-elect out, Calderon emerged through a back entrance. He squeezed into a phalanx of bodyguards and loyalist legislators, and took the oath of office.

With European princes, Latin American leaders, former U.S. President George H.W. Bush, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and other dignitaries looking on from two balconies, Calderon raised his hand and sometimes shouted as he recited the 62-word oath amid a chorus of derisive whistles.

The swearing-in ceremony lasted less than two minutes.

"Felipe will fall! Felipe will fall!" leftist legislators chanted.

"Yes we did it! Yes we did it!" the legislators of Calderon's National Action Party, or PAN, shouted as Calderon exited.

In a speech later before a friendly audience of invited dignitaries and political leaders at the city's National Auditorium, Calderon said he would reach out to his rivals and try to heal the wounds of a long and bitter fight over the election.

"It's obvious that Mexico is living moments of tension between its leading political movements," Calderon said. "I am aware of the seriousness of our differences, and I assume full responsibility to resolve them and reunify Mexico."

Calderon's rival, leftist Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, had declared himself Mexico's legitimate president in his own swearing-in ceremony Nov. 20 before 100,000 people in this city's central square, the Zocalo.

On Friday, a much smaller crowd came to the Zocalo to hear Lopez Obrador speak.

DOJ_NMG_0101021

"We are not rebels without a cause," Lopez Obrador said. "People forget that they stole the election from us. People forget that a neofascist oligarchy blocked our path. That minority is the one responsible for the political crisis in this country."

Sen. Rosario Ibarra of Lopez Obrador's PRD drew laughter from the crowd when she described how Calderon had entered the legislative palace.

"That spurious man had to take the stage with an escort of PAN members and guarded by the presidential guard," Ibarra said. "He came in through the back door and left through the back door."

"Like a dog!" people in the crowd shouted back.

Lopez Obrador had suggested his followers would stage a mass march on the legislative palace, which was sealed off with steel barriers and protected by navy commandos and police. Despite the heated rhetoric, the march never reached Congress and ended peacefully.

The day's events marked the end of a battle that began just hours after the polls closed July 2, with both Calderon and Lopez Obrador declaring victory.

The often nasty campaign had laid bare Mexico's profound economic and regional divisions. Lopez Obrador won among the poor and in southern Mexico. Calderon was favored in northern Mexico and among its affluent and middle class.

After partial recounts and legal battles that stretched into September, Mexico's highest electoral court declared Calderon the winner by less than 1 percentage point. Calderon's come-from-behind victory was the closest in the nation's history.

The ambivalence many Mexicans feel toward Calderon's presidency was evident in a poll released Friday by the newspaper El Universal. Seven in 10 respondents said they opposed efforts to block the inauguration, although 42% said they believed Calderon's victory was fraudulent.

The political battle took on new life as the inauguration approached.

Conservative and leftist legislators Tuesday began to fight over the dais where Calderon would take the oath. Part wrestling match, part sit-in, the struggle endured for three days and ended with the conservatives in control of the better part of the stage.

Lawmakers on both sides were protected from arrest by the legal immunity granted to legislators here, which also prevented police from entering the chambers to restore order.

On Friday morning, while leftist members used heavy chairs to barricade the entrances, conservative lawmakers built a barrier on the dais with other chairs to protect the back door.

"What we are doing is defending the institutions of democracy," said Congressman Luis Xavier Maawad of the PAN.

If Calderon had failed to take the oath in Congress as mandated by a century of tradition and the Mexican Constitution, his tenure could have faced legal challenges, analysts said.

"It was his obligation to be here, and it was ours too," Sen. Santiago Creel of the PAN told reporters after the inauguration — not long after the senator had narrowly avoided being bowled over by a charge of leftist legislators. "This is our house. And no one wants violence in their house."

Calderon's defiant appearance on the dais was in sharp contrast with the attitude of his predecessor, Vicente Fox, during his final months in office. In September, Fox backed down in the face of protests by Lopez Obrador supporters, who prevented him from giving his last state of the union address before Congress and his traditional "shout of independence" in the Zocalo.

Earlier in the day, the threats of protest inside and outside Congress caused part of the transfer-of-power ritual to be held in private for the first time. In the presidential residence Los Pinos, Fox handed over a ceremonial flag and sash to the new president in an awkward, apparently improvised televised scene just after midnight.

After the inauguration, leftist legislators said the PANcontrolled congressional leadership had trampled the rules to have Calderon inaugurated.

"There is no quorum here," said Congressman Raymundo Cardenas of the PRD. "They made up the quorum. They never called the roll. This is a complete farce."

Calderon will face many challenges, including a dissident movement in the southern state of Oaxaca and drug cartels that appear to operate with impunity.

In his speech at the National Auditorium, Calderon promised to crack down on crime and address the country's rampant poverty. And he embraced a theme of the Lopez Obrador campaign, saying he would move to cut the salaries of top bureaucrats.

"I know that we have to find real solutions to the inequality among Mexicans, and especially the inequality between north and south, between the city and the countryside, and between those who are Indians and those who are not," he said.

In handling those problems, Calderon may be helped by the scenes of his first day, analysts said.

DOJ_NMG_0101022

Taking the stage Friday was "an act of political symbolism that could end up defining his presidency on the first day of his term," said Armand Peschard-Sverdrup, a Mexico expert with the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "It's the difference between a president who is going to be seen as politically strong or politically frail from Day One."

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Felipe Calderon took the oath of office as Mexico's president yesterday amid jeers and whistles, in a lightning-fast ceremony before lawmakers who exchanged punches and insults over the conservative leader's narrow victory.

Mr. Calderon entered through a back door and appeared suddenly on the speaker's platform, the site of three days of fistfights and sit-ins by lawmakers seeking to control the stage.

Physically protected by sympathetic lawmakers and flanked by outgoing President Vicente Fox, Mr. Calderon ignored the chaos around him and calmly raised his arm as he swore to uphold the constitution in a voice almost inaudible over the noise.

Congress' leader ordered the national anthem played, momentarily stilling the catcalls and shouting, before Mr. Calderon made a quick exit and Congress adjourned.

"It's good action," said California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger as he arrived to join other foreign dignitaries -- including the first President George Bush, Colombian President Alvaro Uribe and Spanish Prince Felipe of Asturias.

They barely warmed their seats in a balcony overlooking the scene before Mr. Calderon departed.

"He did it. He did it," chanted ruling party lawmakers, who danced and embraced each other in celebration.

The new Mexican leader called on his adversaries to negotiate, but indicated his confidence of governing with or without them.

"I will always be willing to talk, but I won't await dialogue in order to get to work," Mr. Calderon told a large and carefully screened crowd of supporters and dignitaries several hours after assuming the presidency.

Mr. Calderon outlined an ambitious agenda to combat underworld violence and poverty, create good-paying jobs, improve Mexico's global competitiveness and reform the country's political party system. To do that, he will need the cooperation of Congress, where his political opponents hold the majority.

Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, of the Democratic Revolution Party (PRD), asserts he was robbed of the presidency and has declared himself Mexico's "legitimate president."

After the inauguration, Mr. Lopez Obrador led tens of thousands of supporters down Mexico City's elegant Reforma Avenue, the same boulevard they occupied for weeks this past summer to protest Mr. Calderon's victory.

Carrying banners that read "Lopez Obrador is president," the sea of people marched toward the heavily guarded National Auditorium, where Mr. Calderon was to address the nation.

Later in the day, Mr. Calderon was to attend a military ceremony in which army commanders swear allegiance to him.

Mr. Lopez Obrador said he would never recognize Mr. Calderon as president because that "would be accepting fraud."

"If we don't protest and we remain silent, there will never be democracy in our country," he said.

After camping out in Congress for three days in an attempt to control the speaker's podium and prevent Mr. Calderon from taking office, leftist lawmakers seized the chamber's entrances yesterday morning.

They draped a giant banner across the chamber reading, "Mexico doesn't deserve a traitor to democracy as president," exchanged punches with ruling-party lawmakers and erected barricades of chairs as Calderon supporters chanted, "Mexico wants peace."

"I have never been in such an exciting session," said Sen. Santiago Creel, who was Mr. Fox's former interior secretary.

Mr. Calderon acknowledged the political chaos during an unusual midnight ceremony Thursday in which he took control of the presidential residence from Mr. Fox."I am not unaware of the complexity of the political times we are living through, nor of our differences," he said. "But I am convinced that today we should put an end to our disagreements and from there, start a new stage whose only aim would be to place the interests of the nation above our differences."

Pomp And Punches (HC)

Houston Chronicle, December 2, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Mexico has a new president. But whether he has the country remains an open question.

Having taken office Friday in a tumult, Felipe Calderon called again on his adversaries to negotiate but made clear he's confident of governing with or without them.

"I will always be willing to talk but I won't await dialogue in order to get to work," Calderon, 44, told a large and carefully screened crowd of supporters and dignitaries several hours after assuming the presidency.

"We politicians are obliged to resolve citizens' problems, not oppress them with our disagreements," he said. "Conflicts between politicians only harm the people, especially the neediest."

Calderon outlined an ambitious agenda to combat underworld violence and extreme poverty, create good-paying jobs and improve Mexico's global competitiveness and reform the country's political party system. To do that, he'll need the cooperation of Congress, where his political opponents hold the majority.

But leftist politician Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador, who narrowly lost to Calderon in July's elections, vowed again never to bargain with him. Lopez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party holds the second largest block of seats in the lower chamber of Congress.

"We are not going to sell out," Lopez Obrador told supporters before leading tens of thousands on a protest march through the heart of the Mexican capital. "We will never betray the confidence of the people."

Bizarre developmentThe fashion in which Calderon was forced to claim his office Friday suggests that the next six years of his presidency could prove a bumpy ride indeed.

In what will rank among the more bizarre Mexican inaugurations in a history full of them, Calderon symbolically assumed the presidency at midnight Friday in Los Pinos, the presidential compound.

But he was constitutionally bound to take the oath of office before a joint session of Congress. So Calderon and outgoing President Vicente Fox sneaked into Congress at 9:45 a.m. for a besieged ceremony that lasted less than four minutes.

As opposition lawmakers screamed abuse and his loyalists physically shielded him from attack, Calderon quickly swore to uphold the constitution and joined in the national anthem. Then he and Fox slipped away through the same back door through which they had sauntered in.

"Felipe Calderon just faced the first day of his nightmare," said Luis Hernandez, a columnist for the leftist newspaper La Jornada, which has been supportive of Lopez Obrador's movement.

"Felipe has a very tough job ahead, while Lopez Obrador retains an unmistakable capacity for mobilization," he said. "He can make life miserable for Felipe Calderon, and I'm sure he'll do it."

Fistfights broke out earlier Friday morning on the floor of Congress between dozens of legislators loyal to Calderon and those who support Lopez Obrador.

Following the brief brawl, Calderon supporters formed a human wall around the podium while Lopez Obrador's backers moved to block the building's entrances, futilely trying to prevent Calderon's arrival.

"It's a great, great victory," Gustavo Madero, a PAN senator from northern Chihuahua state said afterward. "The president managed to take his oath and not subject himself to blackmail and threats."

But as Calderon was slipping into power, Lopez Obrador and his supporters filled the Mexico City's sprawling central plaza, the Zocalo, for yet another rally and then marched down its main boulevard.

The protesters were stopped by metal barricades and riot police lined up four rows deep across the Paseo de la Reforma a few blocks from the U.S. Embassy.

"I feel insulted more than anything by the president who just left and by the one they are about to put in power," Alejandro Rivera, 37, owner of a Mexico City grocery, said of Fox and Calderon. "That is not the will of the people.

"This is the will of the people," Rivera said, gesturing toward the protesting throng.

But Friday's protest march was much smaller than those in the past. And how Lopez Obrador's continued opposition plays with the Mexican public at large might greatly determine Calderon's fortunes as president.

A voice of optimismJasmin Diaz, 26, who was walking near the protest with her 7-year-old daughter, said she voted for Lopez Obrador but had come to regret it during the endless protests of last summer.

"I think that there are people who don't accept that they lost," she said. Diaz said she now thinks Calderon will be a good president because "he's a studious person.

"Let's hope he takes the country forward," she said.

An opinion poll published Friday in the newspaper Reforma — which Lopez Obrador accuses of being biased against him — reported that 52 percent of Mexicans have a favorable opinion of Calderon while 18 percent don't like him. The rest are undecided.

The poll showed respondents evenly split about whether Calderon would be a good president. Sixty percent said they had yet to hear any specific proposals from him.

Though the way Calderon took office might project an image of weakness, some analysts said, the fact he was able to at all is a major setback for Lopez Obrador.

"The ceremony lasted just three minutes, but it happened," said political scientist Marcela Bobadilla. "Institutions are still working."

Challenges aheadThough the presidency remains Mexico's premier political institution, power has become more evenly distributed in the past decade, especially since Fox's election in 2000 ended the 71-year rule of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI.

Fox was unable to get many of his bigger proposals through a congress dominated by the PRI and Lopez Obrador's party. But some analysts think Calderon, who spent years in Congress, will have an easier time, especially since he has made alliances with the PRI.

"Calderon is going to have a lot of maneuvering room because expectations are so low," said political scientist Federico Estevez. "No one can expect much. That's perfect for him."

Still, if his larger policy initiatives have a chance, Calderon's congressional allies will have to somehow forge agreements with Lopez Obrador's camp.

Those are tomorrow's worries.

"I'll talk to whoever is willing to talk and I'll build with whoever wants to build," Calderon said in what amounted to his inaugural speech, given at the National Auditorium across the city from the Congress.

"If we have to change the rules," the new president said, "let's change the rules."

Protesters Can't Stop Calderón (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado, Laurence Iliff

The Dallas Morning News, December 2, 2006

MEXICO CITY – President Felipe Calderón outmaneuvered opposition lawmakers vowing to disrupt his inauguration and took the oath of office before Congress on Friday. He quickly vowed to crack down on drug cartels while creating jobs to slow illegal immigration to the United States.

"One of the three priorities of the government that I am going to head is, precisely, the fight to restore public security and legality," Mr. Calderón said before members of his conservative National Action Party, or PAN, and foreign dignitaries in a speech at the National Auditorium. "The institutions responsible for public security require profound transformations."

He said his Cabinet has 90 days to come up with a plan.

Deaths related to the drug trade reached 2,000 this year, and common crime is on the rise in Mexico.

Mr. Calderón, 44, also said that illegal immigration to the United States is detrimental to Mexican families and their communities and that job creation at home, with the help of foreign investment, is the ultimate goal of his economic program.

"Rather than our labor leaving for the United States in search of investment, it would be better for the investment to come here where our labor is and no longer divide our families and our communities," Mr. Calderón said.

Mr. Calderón said that his government's third priority, in addition to restoring security and creating jobs to reduce immigration, will be fighting poverty.

Earlier, Mr. Calderón slipped into the lower house of Congress, the Chamber of Deputies, through a back door to avoid opposition legislators who had vowed to block him from reaching the congressional podium.

PAN members had fought for control of the podium area with their fists three days earlier and camped out in Congress to guarantee that Mr. Calderón could say the oath of office there. Opposition legislators also camped out but were outnumbered and were unable to dislodge the ruling party.

Mexico's constitution requires the new president to declare the brief oath of office "before Congress" on his first day as president. Failure to do so can result in an interim president being named, although legal experts disagreed on whether that would have happened in Mr. Calderón's case.

As Mr. Calderón quickly read the oath and promised to uphold the Mexican constitution, opposition legislators tried to shout him down. The new president, standing next to outgoing President Vicente Fox, then put on the presidential sash and sang the national anthem along with legislators.

The ceremony lasted less than five minutes, and Mr. Calderón headed for the National Auditorium and a friendlier crowd.

Lawmakers fight

Earlier, foreign dignitaries appeared taken aback when opposing lawmakers broke into a fistfight shortly before the ceremony. One lawmaker threatened to throw a chair. But Texas Gov. Rick Perry said the drama inside Congress was a sign that Mexican democracy was progressing.

DOJ_NMG_0101025

"I was pretty excited about a little fisticuff, a little protest ... kind of like our own elections, and in a sense a good progression ... for Mexico. ... [They're] really feeling comfortable about expressing their opinions," Mr. Perry said later at the residence of U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza. "It's not like we haven't seen a house fight in Texas. Just not sure there was a chair involved."

Outside the National Auditorium, as Mr. Calderón spoke inside, losing presidential candidate Andrés Manuel López Obrador protested with thousands of supporters, who chanted "fraud" and "illegitimate." Mr. López Obrador, who lost the July 2 election by 0.5 percent of the vote, claimed the election was stolen from him. But independent electoral authorities ruled that the vote was clean.

During a rally in the central Zócalo plaza, Mr. López Obrador sought to justify his quixotic "parallel" presidency and months of protests that have cost his leftist Party of the Democratic Revolution, or PRD, dearly in terms of public opinion. Only about 20 percent of voters support the PRD cause, opinion polls show, down from the 35 percent of the vote Mr. López Obrador received on July 2.

"We are here protesting the electoral fraud of July 2, we are here because we don't accept this imposition.We are here because we want democracy in our country," said Mr. López Obrador, a former mayor of Mexico City and a fiery orator. "We are not rebels without a cause."

U.S. delegation points to Mexico's important role

Supporters of Mr. López Obrador vowed to become a thorn in the side of Mr. Calderón until the last day of his term.

"What we're witnessing here is an imposition against the will of the people," said María Dolores Uribe, 61, a homemaker. "Calderón will always be seen as a false president. And we won't let him forget that, ever."

Mr. Calderón has been a democracy activist during much of his life. Before the PAN came to power in 2000, Mexico had been ruled by the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, for 71 years.

According to his autobiography, Mr. Calderón and girlfriend Margarita Zavala, now his wife, tried to sneak into the presidential residence of Los Pinos by hiding in the trunk of a car. That was in the late 1980s. The trunk was opened by secret service agents, and Mr. Calderón, with considerably more hair than he has now, stood up and held a sign that read, "Long Live Democracy."

Now the police agents are protecting him from demonstrators.

Along the route taken by the protesters' from the Zócalo to the National Auditorium, thousands of riot police lined the Reforma thoroughfare, and special-forces troops toting high-powered weapons ringed the auditorium. Aside from scuffles among lawmakers inside the legislative palace, there were no reports of violence or arrests.

Mr. Calderón said he would reach out to the opposition, but would not wait indefinitely.

No party has majority control of either house of Congress, although Mr. Calderón has made overtures to the PRI to form a loose coalition.

"I will always be open to dialogue, but I will not wait for dialogue in order to get to work," Mr. Calderón said. "Beyond the interests of group or party, there is a society ready to work."

The inauguration day ceremonies began at 12:01 a.m., when Mr. Fox handed over the presidential residence of Los Pinos to Mr. Calderón in a symbolic but unusual ceremony. Legally, that is the moment in which Mr. Calderón became president.

Mr. Fox removed the presidential sash and handed it to a military cadet for later transfer to Mr. Calderón before Congress.

"I have received the presidential offices from President Vicente Fox, the start of the process of taking possession of the presidency," Mr. Calderón said. "Later, I will appear before Congress to take the constitutional oath."

Extensive coverage

The week's events were covered extensively on Mexican TV, especially the fistfights, the lawmakers' three-day vigil in the Chamber of Deputies, and the tense situation before Mr. Calderón's arrival Friday.

But just before Mr. Calderón's arrival at Congress, television and radio stations were required to carry an official broadcast of the event produced by the president's office, causing chatter on radio talk shows about whether the government was imposing its version of events and trying to minimize the protests.

Along the Reforma thoroughfare, Elsa Martínez, 70, sat and watched the drama unfold. A tear ran down her wrinkled face. Asked why she was crying, Ms. Martínez responded, "I'm not crying for any of these fools, that's for sure. I'm shedding a tear for Mexico, poor Mexico."

She listened to the radio with earphones, following the inauguration ceremony and waiting for supporters of Mr. López Obrador to march by. "They're like little boys fighting for their marbles," she said. "What a shame."

Mexico's New President (NYT)

For virtually all of Mexico's history, whoever has ruled the country has done so with unchecked power. Then came Vicente Fox — elected president in 2000 — a decent man with many good ideas who lacked the skill and appetite to muscle his programs through. To some, his passivity was just what Mexico needed after 71 years of dictatorship. For others, his failures began to give democracy a bad name.

This week marked Mr. Fox's departure and the inauguration of Felipe Calderón. Like Mr. Fox, Mr. Calderón favors modernizing a corrupt and antiquated energy sector, simplifying the tax system, taking on dinosaur unions, creating jobs and improving education. The difference is that Mr. Calderón may have the political savvy to succeed.

The political challenges he's up against were made clear yesterday, as leftist lawmakers whistled and catcalled through his brief inaugural ceremony. Mr. Calderón won a disputed election with less than 36 percent of the vote, and his party controls only 41 percent of Congress. His defeated leftist opponent, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, still insists he won, although he has lost sympathy by vowing to block Mr. Calderón's efforts. Mr. Calderón has gained approval, seeking reconciliation.

The new president's biggest challenges will be fighting poverty and crime and reforming the economy. Mr. Calderón has chosen a mostly good cabinet and a steady economic team. But he has already flinched on one huge challenge: breaking up big phone, television and cement monopolies, apparently allowing them to veto his choice of an anti-monopoly reformer for his cabinet.

Mr. Calderón announced yesterday that he would push for universal health insurance for children and an expansion of the country's antipoverty programs. He is taking a page from Mr. López Obrador's agenda — which is good for Mexico and might win the new president some of the political capital he will need to push through reforms.

Crisis Intensifies In Lebanon As Hezbollah Takes To Streets (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

BEIRUT, Dec. 1 -- Hezbollah and its allies escalated Lebanon's month-long political crisis into a popular confrontation Friday, sending hundreds of thousands of supporters into the streets, parking lots and sidewalks of downtown Beirut, vowing to topple the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and reorient the country.

The city's stylish downtown, to some a symbol of recovery from the 15-year civil war that ended in 1990, was awash in red-white-and-green Lebanese flags, interspersed with banners in the colors of various sectarian and political leaders. The winter sun glinted off coils of wire and barricades encircling the colonnaded government headquarters nearby, where Siniora and other ministers have taken up residence. But the crowd was more festive than angry, more celebratory than militant, as the theater of the moment intersected, perhaps a little dissonantly, with the drama of a struggle as decisive as any in Lebanon's history.

"I wish that our prime minister and his ministers were here among us today, rather than hiding behind army tanks and barbed wire," Michel Aoun, an influential Christian leader allied with Hezbollah, told the crowd. "The one who has support of his people does not need barbed wire." Moments later, he added, "I call on the prime minister and his ministers to resign."

In symbolism, numbers and aims, the protest marked a collision between two countries that have coexisted uneasily inside Lebanon following the assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in February 2005, when dueling protests convened in downtown Beirut over Syria's 29-year military presence here. They share almost no common ground: the culture of resistance to Israel celebrated by Hezbollah or the accommodation promoted by Siniora's government; the influence of Hezbollah's patrons in Iran and Syria or that of the government's French and American allies; a divided social perspective, one more religiously traditional, one more liberal. Also at issue is the extent of power due the long-disenfranchised Shiite Muslim community, the country's single largest, that Hezbollah and its militia largely represent.

"One Lebanon, one voice!" some people shouted Friday. But the question playing out across downtown Beirut, under the statue of one of Lebanon's founders, Riyad es-Solh, was the same question asked at Lebanon's independence in 1943 and so often since: What kind of Lebanon?

What is happening is more than just a political struggle unleashed by Hezbollah's demand in October for a share of the cabinet that would give it an effective veto over government decisions. Competing narratives of the country's past and future are on display.

Both sides utter the same words -- independence, sovereignty, national unity -- yet they hold two visions of what those words represent. In broadcasts, both Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, and Siniora urged their supporters to fly the Lebanese flag, either at the protest or, for the prime minister's supporters, from their homes. Each man speaks with sincerity underlined by the desperate conviction that the other side poses an existential threat. Both claim legitimacy from a long list of martyrs, whether Hezbollah's dead in this summer's war with Israel or Hariri and other anti-Syrian figures assassinated in Beirut since his death.

And both speak with certainty of a majority they claim to represent in Lebanon.

"Us," sign after sign read Friday. In Arabic, the consonants used can also mean, "We want a clean government."

"The government ruling us right now is dictatorial. It's a minority claiming to be a majority," said Boudy Mbarak, 24, a Christian supporter of Aoun from the village of Balouneh. "And I think we're showing today who's the majority."

Behind him, chants cascaded across the crowd: "Siniora out! We want a free government!" Drums added a cadence to the slogans thundering from banks of speakers. Youths danced in circles: "Hey, hey, you government of thieves!"

With Friday's protest, the crisis now gains momentum. Hezbollah has said the demonstrations will be open-ended. Long after nightfall, white tents went up in the downtown area, where thousands of people were expected to stay indefinitely, and speakers blared Hezbollah anthems. Groups lit fires with placards, one reading, "All of us for the nation." Others played cards or smoked water pipes in a carnival-like atmosphere.

"I'm staying until the year 2100 or until Sayyid Hasan speaks again," vowed Hassan Karnib, a 20-year-old protester, using an honorific for the Hezbollah leader.

If the protests fail to force the government's resignation, flatly ruled out by Siniora in a speech Thursday, Hezbollah's supporters have talked about resignations from parliament, work stoppages or civil disobedience to shut down ministries.

The group's opponents, sensing that Friday's mass demonstration was the biggest card it had to play, promised to wait.

"They decided to go to the streets. Let them do that, and let them stay there as long as they want," said Walid Jumblatt, the leader of the Druze community, who has shifted alliances since the civil war and is now one of Hezbollah's most outspoken opponents. "We will stay in our homes, raise our flags and wait one month, two months, as long as they want."

Hezbollah announced the protest Thursday, and by early morning the movement, among the best-organized in the Middle East, was in full swing. The southern suburbs, devastated by Israeli bombing this summer, were almost frenetic, with buses plying roads and flags of Hezbollah and Lebanon flying from windows. Mopeds sped through streets plastered with portraits of Nasrallah, who has inspired a cult of personality among his followers and others in the Arab world. "I promise you victory always," read one of his posters near a warren of shops along a street snarled with traffic.

Protesters ventured downtown along streets adorned with the iconography of Hezbollah's opponents. One sign read in French, "I love life." Another, written in red, said in Arabic, "We want to live." Both were critiques of Hezbollah's celebration of martyrdom.

"They don't love life; they love the throne," quipped Maha Kanj, 16.

A Hezbollah placard read: "Because we love life."

Each side boasted of the numbers, or lack thereof, at the protest. Hezbollah's television station, al-Manar, put the figure at 1.5 million. Future Television, loyal to Hariri's son, Saad, who has inherited leadership of the Sunni community, estimated tens of thousands. Although it was larger than last week's funeral for assassinated cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel, it appeared smaller, according to anecdotal impressions, than the March 14 protest that climaxed last year's demonstrations.

While al-Manar provided minute-by-minute coverage of the protest's early hours, Future broadcast a cooking show. During the protest's peak, Future broadcast a split screen. On one side were images of an empty Martyrs' Square, with troops, armored personnel carriers and firetrucks barring demonstrators from entering. On the other were images of protests the night before in support of the prime minister. On al-Manar, the numbers themselves were the message: "This is probably the view Siniora had of the demonstrations," the announcer said as footage rolled. "We wonder whether he heard and saw."

Hezbollah went to lengths to portray the demonstration as less its own and more an expression of what it calls the national opposition. No Hezbollah speakers appeared; Aoun, a Christian, gave the main address, although the number of his supporters paled in comparison to Hezbollah's. The demonstrators themselves were eclectic, from sober-looking clerics in traditional robes to supporters of Aoun who had dyed their hair his group's trademark orange. Others had donned orange wigs and cowboy hats. Some of the slogans were sectarian: "God, Nasrallah and all the southern suburbs." At times, though, the crowd aimed for chants with broader appeal: "Green, yellow, orange," the colors of Hezbollah, an allied movement and Aoun, "we want to topple the government."

The slogans played on themes that Hezbollah and its allies have pushed relentlessly since the crisis began. Corruption was a key complaint. Many chants were directed at Siniora, some ridiculing him for crying in public during the war. "We've had enough lies and tears," one went.

Often the language was directed against the United States' sway in Lebanon. Nasrallah has called the government more loyal to U.S. Ambassador Jeffrey D. Feltman than Siniora himself, and in conversation after conversation, protesters, occasionally even Aoun's supporters, cast the protest as a way to deflect U.S. influence, usually ignoring the roles played by Iran and neighboring Syria as Hezbollah's allies.

"This is the government of Feltman!" shouted Zein Sleiman, 16.

"Siniora is an Israeli," added his friend Samer Salim.

"No, he's an American," Sleiman answered. He paused. "There's no difference!"

In some ways, the most poignant theme was the legacy of this summer's war: Hezbollah's opponents blame it for starting the conflict; Hezbollah celebrates it as a victory, with anger at what it sees as the government's lack of support as it fought. The war's imagery suffused the conversations and message of the protest. In Lebanese politics, the conflict left Hezbollah emboldened, and the sequence of events has proved an unbroken chain, with Hezbollah now pressing for unprecedented power.

As Ali Younis sat with his three sons, he used the words heard so often among Hezbollah's supporters in southern Lebanon during the war: pride and empowerment.

Behind them a banner played on a slogan from the conflict: "As with victory, change is coming, coming, coming." Younis spoke with the fervor of a man who wants to be listened to.

"I'm staying until the government falls," he said, narrowing his eyes. "Dignity is more important than anything else."

In Beirut, High Spirits And Demand For Change (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 1 — The official goal was to overthrow the government, but the atmosphere was bizarrely festive on Friday as hundreds of thousands of Hezbollah supporters poured into the center of Beirut, banging drums, chanting slogans, pressing shoulder to shoulder as they surged past army troops seeking to keep order.

Families with little children, old people and young people, all heeded the call of Hezbollah, the Shiite Muslim party and militia, packing buses and cars all over the country. By nighttime, however, only several thousand demonstrators remained, smoking water pipes, playing music and vowing to stay, some in tents, until the Western-backed government fell.

“We are having fun, yes,” said Hussein Hanoum, 27, of Hermil in the Bekaa Valley of eastern Lebanon, as he lay across a sidewalk in the midst of a huge crowd. “We have no work. We have nothing else to do, so we came to overthrow the government.”

The mood was lighthearted, but the turnout underscored the challenge this politically divided and fragile country faces as it confronts its most dangerous political crisis since the end of a 15-year civil war in 1990. The government was holed up in the Grand Serail, an Ottoman-era building on a hill overlooking the demonstrations. The prime minister, Fouad Siniora, said that the people could stay in the streets as long as they liked, but that neither he nor the other ministers would resign.

The political crisis threatens to undermine a donors conference scheduled for January in Paris to help rebuild the nation’s infrastructure after the 34-day war between Hezbollah and Israel. The crisis has already hurt a ploddingly slow effort to rebuild the mainly Shiite areas that were severely damaged in the war.

But that did not seem to matter as anger spilled out, carnival style.

“Tut, tut, tut, Shiites are in Beirut,” crowds chanted in a rhyme as they marched through the streets.

People started to jam into the city well before the demonstration’s scheduled 3 p.m. start. The army closed off Martyrs Square, a symbolic site, blocking it with swirls of razor wire and guarding it with armored personnel carriers and heavily armed troops. Hezbollah security guards made a barrier between the crowds and the razor wire, ready to head off any potential clash between their supporters and the military.

So the crowds poured into two squares, one named for the prime minister who served in 1943 when Lebanon won its independence, the second in the shadow of a popular symbol of the civil war, a bubble-shaped theater riddled with bullet holes rising over Martyrs Square.

A recorded message by Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the leader of Hezbollah, echoed over the square: “As I’ve always promised you victory, I promise you victory again.”

In this fight, the battle lines are not so much ideologically driven as leader driven. Many said they were present because their leaders had asked them to participate, including the few noticeable followers of Gen. Michel Aoun, the Christian whose party is allied with Hezbollah.

“Maybe Michel Aoun has made a mistake with this alliance, but the March 14 forces have made many mistakes over the years,” said Bernadette Chemail, of Kesrun, using the name for the governing coalition. “The Shiites are Lebanese; we cannot throw them away.”

General Aoun was the special guest at the rally and gave a brief speech from a lectern protected by bulletproof glass.

“We seek to return to power — not to rest on the seats of authority, but for the sake of our participation,” General Aoun told the crowd.

DOJ_NMG_0101029

On one side of this fight are Hezbollah, its Shiite ally, the Amal party, and its Christian ally, General Aoun and his Free Patriotic Movement. Their alliance, which is considered pro-Iranian and pro-Syrian, wants veto power over all government actions. On the other side are the March 14 coalition: Sunni, Druse and Christian parties aligned with the United States and France who control the largest bloc in Parliament, and therefore the government.

General Aoun's alliance with Hezbollah caused a huge split within the Christian community and may have cost him some political support. It was also clear that the Sunni Muslim community, one of the largest in Lebanon, was clearly in support of this government. In a rare show of support, the grand mufti, Muhammad Qabbani, gave the Friday Prayer from inside the Grand Serail.

The protest demonstration came after six government ministers aligned with Hezbollah resigned — and a seventh minister, Pierre Gemayel, from the March 14 coalition, was assassinated.

The question hanging over Lebanon is, What next? Hezbollah has promised its followers it will force the government to resign, and the government has promised that it will not. The fear is the next escalation, whatever that is, could prompt violence.

Nevertheless, the spirit of the Hezbollah-allied protest on Friday was a stark contrast to the political gathering held on the day Mr. Gemayel, the minister, was buried last week. On that day, hundreds of thousands of Sunni, Christian and Druse supporters of the government condemned Hezbollah and General Aoun with harsh and confrontational slogans.

There were moments on Friday when the protesters did offer personal attacks on members of the government. Crowds mocked the prime minister because he cried on Aug. 7 while giving a speech to Arab foreign ministers during Hezbollah's war with Israel. "We do not want someone who defends us with tears," said Alaa Shahine, a 12-year-old who was repeating a common Hezbollah refrain.

Others chanted, "Ahmed Fatfat is a Jew," referring to the minister of sports and youth, who had been acting interior minister.

Hezbollah Sit-in Has Beirut At A Standstill (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

The Shiite party and its allies say they're staying until the U.S.-backed government falls.

BEIRUT — Hundreds of thousands of Hezbollah supporters and their allies poured into the capital Friday in a mass protest that paralyzed the city center, laid siege to the prime minister's office and threatened an escalating campaign of civil disobedience until the U.S.-backed government collapses.

After sunset, thousands of men encircled the government palace where Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and his political allies have been holed up for days, fearful of assassination.

Shouting for Siniora to resign, the men pushed right up to the security checkpoints of razor wire, armed guards and tanks. Then they pitched tents, carried in water tanks and portable toilets and spread out prayer mats.

The men, who moved under strict directives from hundreds of Hezbollah security agents with walkie-talkies and matching baseball caps, vowed to keep up their siege until the government falls.

The declaration of an open-ended sit-in has pushed the Shiite organization and the government into a precarious standoff, raising fears of street violence. Both sides say they are defending the nation against nefarious forces: Hezbollah and its allies say they have launched a peaceful revolution to overthrow an illegitimate government; the government says it faces a Syria-backed coup d'etat and that Lebanon's hard-won independence is at stake.

The scene was uncannily reminiscent of anti-Syria demonstrations that erupted here after the 2005 assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, father of today's leader of Lebanon's Sunni Muslims. The assassination was widely blamed on Syria.

Then, weeks of demonstrations in downtown Beirut felled Lebanon's Syria-backed government and forced Damascus to pull its soldiers out of Lebanon. An anti-Syria coalition led by Saad Hariri swept to power in national elections.

Now the onetime demonstrators are on the receiving end of a similar uprising.

Friday's demonstration was peaceful, but Hezbollah is a powerful Shiite Muslim party with a heavily armed militia — and its campaign is just getting started. Hezbollah members have threatened to block major highways and seize control of ports and airports if the government doesn't step down.

"We will make disorder in this country," said Nabil Malim, a 29-year-old Shiite who took the bus north from the southern town of Nabatiyeh.

Hezbollah bused in supporters from all corners of the country; they were joined by followers of Gen. Michel Aoun, who is arguably Lebanon's most popular Christian leader, and members of Amal, another Shiite party.

Up to a quarter of the nation's population of about 4 million packed the streets of Beirut.

In a country where political factions compete bitterly to turn out larger crowds, the outpouring was an embarrassing challenge to the government's legitimacy. The opposition calls Siniora's government a tool of the U.S. Embassy and says Shiites and Christians are not fairly represented.

"I wish our prime minister and his ministers were here among us today rather than hiding behind army tanks and barbed wire," Aoun told the cheering crowd. "We consider that the only way out is the resignation of the Cabinet."

Siniora and his ministers remained steadfast.

"No matter how long they stay in the street … this will not bring down the government," Hariri said.

For hours, the roads that run from the tony seaside city center to Beirut's scruffy southern suburbs were choked with people. They kept coming, down blacktop roads gleaming in the glare of afternoon sun, through a corridor of drab apartment blocks with laundry flapping from the balconies.

"We want to topple the government!" they yelled as they marched.

Flocks of women marching in black robes and head scarves; schoolgirls holding hands; groups of young men with the Lebanese flag knotted over their heads as bandannas; fathers who tucked their children behind the handlebars of their mopeds — all were greeted by members of Hezbollah's security forces, who wore clipped-on badges that read, simply, "discipline."

The guards rifled through bags in search of weapons and, keen to prove the rally was inter-religious, ordered marchers to hide Hezbollah's yellow militia flags and pictures of Hezbollah chief Sheik Hassan Nasrallah. Lebanese security forces guarded government buildings but steered clear of the demonstrators, leaving security in the hands of Hezbollah.

Members of the newly beefed-up Internal Security Forces, believed to be loyal to the Sunni-dominated government, were jeered and taunted by Hezbollah supporters.

Thousands of people, virtually all men, jammed the squares and parking lots overnight, sleeping in tents or huddled in thin blankets on the ground. Hezbollah anthems boomed from massive speakers; demonstrators banged on drums, burned their political signs to keep warm and smoked apple-flavored tobacco from water pipes they'd lugged from home.

"These men in the government were warlords during the civil war. They might do anything to disturb the stability of the demonstration," said Jihad Ali Farhat, a Shiite cleric who had traveled from the south Lebanon town of Zahrane.

"If I die here it will be for the sake of the country," he said. "This is a peaceful, social and cultural revolution."

The calls for Siniora's ouster tapped into the festering animosities against Sunni Muslims, as Shiite and Christian demonstrators complained that Sunnis held too much power in the government.

"We think the government only represents one faith, and that's Sunni," said Aboud Aboud, a 32-year-old Christian who sported a button with Nasrallah and Aoun's faces juxtaposed. "We won't leave until the government falls."

Common threads ran through the speech of the demonstrators, much of it gleaned directly from Nasrallah's instructions: They spoke about the need for a "national unity government" to replace Siniora's government.

Many insisted there would be no street violence, saying they were out to prove that Hezbollah, contrary to its militant image, was a sophisticated movement that could pull off a peaceful revolution.

"We have commands from Nasrallah saying that even if they attack us, we should not attack them back," said Youssef Ezzedinne, a carpenter who traveled with his family from the southern port city of Tyre. "We should show how civilized we are."

But other young men shrugged off Nasrallah's orders.

"He says this, but the people decide. Can he stop all the people?" said Awad Abanoun, 22, a student from Beirut's southern suburbs.

"Because peacefully, the government is not changing. Only violence will do it."

Protesters Seek Lebanon PM Resignation (AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 2, 2006

Hundreds of thousands of protesters from Hezbollah and its pro-Syrian allies massed Friday in downtown Beirut seeking to force the resignation of Western-backed Prime Minister Fuad Saniora, who was holed up in his office ringed by hundreds of police and combat troops.

The protest, which police estimated at 800,000, created a sea of Lebanese flags that blanketed downtown and spilled onto the surrounding streets. Hezbollah officials put the number at 1 million — one-fourth of Lebanon's population.

"Saniora out! We want a free government!" protesters shouted through loudspeakers. The crowd roared in approval amid the deafening sound of Hezbollah revolutionary and nationalist songs. "We want a clean government," read one placard, in what has become the opposition's motto.

Launching a long-threatened campaign to force Lebanon's U.S.-backed government from office, Hezbollah and its pro-Syrian allies said the demonstration would be followed by a wave of open-ended protests. Hezbollah had threatened demonstrations unless it and its allies obtained a veto share of the Cabinet — a demand Saniora and Lebanon's anti-Syrian parties rejected. The protests now aim to generate enough popular pressure to paralyze the Saniora government and force it out.

"People have a right to express their political opinions, but in terms of this being part of the Iran-Syria inspired coup d'etat against the government of Lebanon, we're obviously quite concerned about it," said U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton.

State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey said U.S. diplomats in Beirut had telephoned Lebanese government officials to offer their support.

"The demonstrations ... are aimed at toppling Lebanon's legitimate and democratically elected government," Casey said. "And certainly threats of intimidation or violence isn't something that I think anyone would consider democratic or a constitutional mechanism for changing government."

Heavily armed soldiers and police had closed all roads to downtown, feverishly unfurling barbed wire and placing barricades.

Despite Hezbollah's assurances the protests will be peaceful, the heavy security came amid fears the protests may turn into clashes between pro- and anti-Syrian factions or that Hezbollah supporters could try to storm Saniora's government headquarters.

Hezbollah's security men, donning caps, formed two lines between the protesters and the security forces to prevent clashes.

"I wish that the prime minister and his ministers were among us today, not hiding behind barbed wire and army armored carriers. He who has his people behind him does not need barbed wire," Michel Aoun, a Christian leader and Hezbollah ally, told the crowd.

Hezbollah's leader Hassan Nasrallah, who has not made a public appearance since a September rally for the militant group, could not be seen Friday. But his speeches, blared through loudspeakers, drove the crowd wild with cheers.

At the rally, some protesters occasionally cried "Death to Israel" and "We want Feltman's government to go," in reference to Lebanon's U.S. Ambassador Jeffrey Feltman.

"We don't want the (U.S.) Embassy inside the prime ministry," said one demonstrator, Mahmoud Zeineddin.

Inside, Saniora went about his schedule, in what appeared to be a tactic to ignore the throngs outside. A day earlier, he vowed his government would not fall but warned that "Lebanon's independence is threatened and its democratic system is in danger."

A demonstration last week for a slain anti-Syrian politician also drew hundreds of thousands of people downtown, filling Martyr's Square. But Friday's appeared larger, as protesters swarmed not only that square but others, as well as nearby streets and parking lots.

Supporters planned to set up camp around the clock in tents erected on a road outside Saniora's office and in a downtown square.

Hezbollah has tried to depict the protest as rallying all Lebanese, not just its supporters. It urged demonstrators to wave only the red and white Lebanese flag with its green cedar tree, in contrast to past protests that featured the group's yellow flag with a fist and Kalashnikov rifle.

The battle is a fallout from the summer war between Hezbollah and Israel that ravaged parts of Lebanon. The guerrilla force's strong resistance against Israeli troops sent its support among Shiites skyrocketing, emboldening it to grab more political power. Hezbollah also feels Saniora did not do enough to support it during the fight.

Pro-government groups, in turn, resent Hezbollah for sparking the fight by snatching two Israeli soldiers, dragging Lebanon into war with Israel.

French presidential candidate Segolene Royal, on a Middle East tour, called Friday for the soldiers' release.

"The liberation of the two soldiers is absolutely vital," Royal told reporters. She said she might bring the subject up in meetings later Friday with Hezbollah officials, though "perhaps not publicly."

Government supporters accuse Syria of being behind the Hezbollah campaign, trying to regain its lost influence in its smaller neighbor. Hezbollah and its allies, in turn, say the country has fallen under U.S. domination and that they have lost their rightful portion of power.

Tension have been running high between Sunni Muslims, who generally support the anti-Syrian government, and Shiites, who lead the pro-Syrian opposition, and Lebanon's Christians, who are divided between the two.

In a stark sign of the divide, the spiritual leader of Lebanon's Sunnis, Grand Mufti Mohammed Rashid Kabbani, gave Friday prayers at the prime minister's headquarters in a show of support for Saniora, a Sunni.

"Fear has gripped the Lebanese," Kabbani said, appealing for the protests to end. "The constitution guarantees freedom of expression, but trying to overthrow the government in the street is a call for stirring up discord among people, and we will not accept this."

Hezbollah's deputy leader, Sheik Naim Kassim, made it clear the fight is against "American tutelage" and said the protest action will continue until the government falls.

"We will not let you sell Lebanon, we will protect the constitution and people of Lebanon," Kassim said on television Friday, addressing Saniora.

The United States has made Lebanon a key front in its attempts to rein in Syria and its ally, regional powerhouse Iran. President Bush warned earlier this week that the two countries were trying to destabilize Lebanon.

Lebanon has witnessed a string of assassinations of anti-Syrian figures over the past two years, including a prominent Christian government minister gunned down last week and former prime minister Rafik Hariri, who was killed in a February 2005 bombing.

Protesters Set Up Camp In Beirut (BBC)

BBC.com, December 2, 2006

Thousand of supporters of Hezbollah and its pro-Syrian allies in Lebanon have spent the night camped out in Beirut, to protest against the government.

Demonstrators slept in tents outside the office of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, who they say is hostile to Syria and must resign.

Hezbollah supporters staged a mass rally in Beirut on Friday.

Lebanon's government has been weakened by resignations and the assassination of a leading anti-Syrian politician.

The opposition says it will keep up the pressure until the government steps down.

Protesters pitched tents in central Beirut, on streets leading to the government's headquarters.

The BBC's Kim Ghattas in Beirut says there is no sign that either side is giving up.

The demonstrators brought their water pipes, small radios and even musical instruments for entertainment.

Soldiers cordoned off the office complex with barbed wire and armoured vehicles.

Demonstrators had earlier temporarily blocked all roads leading to the prime minister's office, although the blockade eased after a flurry of late-night diplomacy.

The opposition has now promised to carry out more surprise moves to bring down the cabinet.

A Hezbollah member of parliament Ali Ammar said: "We won't leave these squares until this authority complies with the will of the majority of the people - most of whom want to escape this crisis and form a unity government."

Mr Siniora has said he will not be forced from office by mass protests.

His government has vowed to stand firm against what he has called an attempted coup.

"Lebanon's independence is threatened and its democratic system is in danger," he said on Thursday.

The US denounced what it described as "threats of intimidation violence" in Lebanon.

Demonstrators waved red and white Lebanese flags A state department spokesman, Tom Casey, accused Syria and Iran of instigating the protests which he said were aimed at toppling the democratically elected government.

US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton called the Hezbollah demonstration "part of the Iran-Syria inspired coup".

Under Lebanon's constitution, the death or resignation of another two ministers will automatically topple it.

Police estimated its size at 800,000 people, but Hezbollah claimed it was larger.

Speaking from behind a bullet-proof glass screen, Christian opposition leader Michel Aoun told cheering supporters that the government was unconstitutional and should resign.

He said they had "made corruption a daily affair".

Hezbollah has been demanding a bigger share in the cabinet that would give it the power to veto government decisions.

Mr Siniora warned any attempt to topple his government would fail The government came to office last year in the first election held after the withdrawal of Syrian troops originally stationed in Lebanon during the civil war.

Syria was forced to withdraw its military presence after massive street protests and international pressure, triggered by the February 2005 assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

A UN investigation has implicated several Syrian officials in the killing, although Syria has denied any involvement.

The government in Beirut has also accused Damascus of ordering the assassination on 21 November of anti-Syrian cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel.

Israeli Overflights Continue, U.N. Says (NYT)

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 1 — Secretary General Kofi Annan said Friday that the cease-fire that ended fighting between Israel and Hezbollah fighters on Aug. 14 was holding, but that Israeli overflights in the border area were occurring almost daily.

In a periodic report to the Security Council, Mr. Annan said that Israel saw the incursions as a "necessary security measure."

He said the United Nations continued to receive reports of illegal arms smuggling across the Syrian border but had been unable to verify them. An assessment team, he added, found "significant deficiencies" in border control.

About 60,000 cluster bomblets have been cleared, but 17 people have died in accidents from unexploded ordnance, with 135 wounded. Israel had not yet furnished promised maps that Mr. Annan said "would significantly assist operators on the ground."

P.L.O. Panel Is Convened Amid Standoff With Hamas (NYT)

By Greg Myre

JERUSALEM, Dec. 1 — The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, convened the Palestine Liberation Organization's top decision-making group on Friday amid growing signs of a possible political showdown with Hamas, the faction that currently leads the Palestinian government.

Negotiations between Mr. Abbas's Fatah faction and its main rival, Hamas, toward a Palestinian unity government have been going on for months. But Mr. Abbas told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday that the negotiations had reached a "dead end." Fatah is the dominant faction in the Palestine Liberation Organization and its executive committee, the body that held talks Friday in the West Bank city of Ramallah.

It is expected to meet for several days before deciding what action to take, if any. After the session Friday, one member, Samir Ghosheh, said that Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, who is from Hamas, a militant Islamic group, should resign to make way for a new unity government.

"The dialogue has stopped and there is no chance of resuming it in the same manner," the P.L.O. executive committee said in a statement.

However, Nizar Rian, a senior Hamas leader, called on Mr. Abbas "to be rational and return to the negotiating table," adding, "We are serious about a national unity government, but that doesn't mean getting rid of Hamas."

With the Palestinian government broke and isolated, Fatah and Hamas had agreed in principle on a unity government made up of professionals and technocrats. But they have not been able to agree on how to divide up important ministerial positions. There is no clear way out of the political standoff if they cannot reach an agreement.

Mr. Abbas could dismiss the current government, led by Mr. Haniya and Hamas, and install a new one. But a new government would need approval from the parliament, which is dominated by Hamas.

Mr. Abbas could also call for a referendum on early elections, but it is far from clear whether Palestinians would support such a move so soon after the last vote. Hamas came to power following the parliamentary elections in January.

Meanwhile, Palestinian militants fired a rocket from the Gaza Strip into southern Israel on Friday, and Israel said the shaky truce in Gaza would have to prove successful before it could be extended to the West Bank.

"At the moment, the Palestinians are in less than full compliance with the cease-fire," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry. "We can't seriously consider duplicating the cease-fire in the West Bank, if the Gaza cease-fire is not a success. The jury is still out."

Ms. Rice met separately with Palestinian and Israeli leaders on Thursday and encouraged them to expand the cease-fire to the West Bank, where Israeli troops and Palestinian militants have clashed almost daily.

But in the West Bank, Israeli forces arrested 29 suspected militants overnight, all but one of them members of Hamas, the Israeli military said.

In the West Bank town of Hebron, Israeli border policemen shot and killed a Palestinian who threw a firebomb, lightly wounding one policeman, Israeli officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0101034

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's cabinet plans to discuss the Gaza cease-fire, which took effect last Sunday, and the prospects for including the West Bank, at a session on Sunday, Mr. Regev said.

In Gaza, the Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades claimed responsibility for firing the rocket into Israel on Friday and said they would not abide by the truce unless Israel met a series of demands. "We cannot just give this truce as a present," said Khaled al-Jabari, one Al Aksa leader in Gaza.

Lofty Goals Are Scaled Down At Meetings On Mideast Democracy (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

DEAD SEA, Jordan, Dec. 1 — Two years ago, when Western governments conjured a conference on democracy in the Middle East and North Africa, an air of optimism and promise held sway. The Iraqis and Afghans soon held elections. So did the Palestinians, who voted in the moderate Mahmoud Abbas as their president. Change was on its way to Egypt and Lebanon, too.

But with the recent setbacks to democracy throughout the region, the goals at this year's conference here on Friday were often smaller and, presumably, a bit more attainable.

"They actually have a paragraph in there that says, 'We support increasing literacy for women,' " said Sanem Gunes, a program officer for a Turkish advocacy group, rolling her eyes and dismissing the line as "almost like a beauty pageant answer." She added, "It doesn't take scores of foreign ministers coming from all over the region to come up with 'education for women.' "

Such was the Forum for the Future's third annual meeting. When the Group of 8 summit meeting took place a few years ago in Sea Island, Ga., the Bush administration and its European allies came up with the idea for the conference. An offspring of the Sept. 11 attacks, the idea was to prod the Arab and Muslim world's autocratic governments toward democracy and stronger civil society, as sort of a bulwark against the hopelessness and disenchantment that could lead to extremism.

It was an ambitious goal, and things seemed promising at first. Democracy protests pushed Syria out of Lebanon. In Egypt, President Hosni Mubarak allowed opposition candidates on the ballot.

But that was the new Middle East, before the old one quickly reasserted itself. After the Muslim Brotherhood won a lot of seats in Egypt's parliamentary elections last year, Mr. Mubarak's government put off municipal elections for another two years. Parliamentary elections in Qatar were postponed.

Iraq, Afghanistan and Lebanon? All are struggling desperately against violence or sectarian division.

The Palestinians had another election and voted in Hamas, promptly setting off a Western aid boycott. Yemen's government cracked down on the news media that had criticized the government. Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah refused calls to have the country's consultative council be elected. This summer, Bahrain, host to the conference last year, unceremoniously kicked out of the country a representative of an American democracy advocacy group.

On Friday, security was ultratight, the road in front of the King Hussein Bin Talal Convention Center virtually empty. After making their scheduled — and brief — speeches in the convention hall to the 40 or so nongovernmental representatives who showed up, most of the foreign dignitaries quickly retired to private salons to talk to one another.

A session on political participation, elections and the news media was under way in the main hall, while in a nearby hall, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice held talks with a steady succession of her counterparts from Britain, Italy and the European Union on matters like how to rein in Iran's nuclear ambitions.

On the other side of the convention center, in front of the darkened and empty Aqaba Hall, Foreign Minister Sergey V. Lavrov of Russia, a host of the conference, and his retinue of six dark-suited aides chatted among themselves, then sauntered to the terrace for a smoking break.

A few yards away, under a giant framed photo of the conference's other host, King Abdullah II of Jordan — who skipped the festivities and flew to India — Mansour Ahmad Khan, representing Pakistan's foreign ministry, was talking up his country's democratic record to a reporter.

Mr. Khan had just gotten to the part about how much Pakistan's military dictator, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, has been doing to encourage democracy and women's rights when his boss, Khusro Bakhtyar, the foreign affairs minister, appeared, interrupting the conversation to expound further. "Reform is not just an option, but a necessity in this part of the world," Mr. Bakhtyar said. "Our governments are heeding the winds of change."

Ms. Rice had been diplomatic the night before when a reporter asked her whether it was incongruous that Russia, which passed a law restricting nongovernmental organizations, was a host of a democracy conference in Jordan. "We're using this international forum to push political change," she said, delicately. "It doesn't mean everybody that's sitting around the table is a perfect example of democratic development."

As much as they criticized the lack of progress at the conference, the nongovernmental organizations were quick to say that they were glad to be there and supported its ideals, though some were unable to speak with the foreign dignitaries. "We don't get too much access to the officials, actually," said Jamil Mouawad, a youth organizer and program manager for the Lebanese Center for Policy Studies. "And an action plan would be nice." The conference did not issue such a plan.

"Hey, is that Elliott Abrams?" asked Khalil Gebara, an executive director of No Corruption, a Lebanese organization, pointing to Mr. Abrams, the top White House adviser for Middle East affairs, who was standing near the coffee-and-Danish table talking to two fellow American officials. "Can you introduce me to him? He's a big guy, I hear."

But the Abrams retinue quickly swept around the corner, back into the embrace of the American officials and accompanying Secret Service agents outside the hall where Ms. Rice was holding her meetings.

Mr. Gebara shook his head. "They all just walk around in groups, so you have to chase after them, but you can never catch them," he said. "This is supposed to be the venue where people actually get heard."

Perhaps another time. Diplomats said Qatar, Yemen and the United Arab Emirates are jostling to be the host of next year's conference.

At Dead Sea Forum, Incongruities Abound (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

DEAD SEA, Jordan, Dec. 1 -- The official purpose of the third annual session of the U.S.-promoted Forum for the Future was to promote rule of law, press freedom and greater attention to nongovernmental organizations in the Arab world. But the official co-host of the meeting was Russia -- which under President Vladimir Putin has backtracked on democracy, curtailed the news media and cracked down on NGOs.

This uncomfortable irony was apparent to many people who attended the meeting set in a vast conference center with a spectacular view over the Dead Sea. But with the Bush administration's push to promote democracy in the Middle East facing setbacks in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, irony was not in short supply.

"The whole scenario is full of contradictions and a lot of double standards," said Salam Mansour, executive director of a Cairo-based democracy youth group who took part in a presentation at the meeting. "Some people don't recognize the U.S. as a full democracy."

Russia became co-host because the forum is officially sanctioned by the Group of Eight major industrial democracies, and Moscow this year was host of the annual G-8 meeting, despite objections that it doesn't belong in the group. The forum was launched at the 2004 G-8 meeting in Sea Island, Ga., and the United States has pushed for the fledging organization to take root.

Arab nations have been skeptical from the start. The Saudi foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, told the gathering here that democracy cannot be imposed and cited Africa as an example of where Western notions of democracy have led to turmoil and conflict, according to a Saudi official.

Last year's meeting, held in Bahrain, dissolved into bickering over the wording of the final communique, so organizers this year decided to dispense with such a statement.

By all accounts, Jordan -- a moderate Arab monarchy eager to curry favor with the United States -- took responsibility for organizing the conference. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in her remarks to the conference, cited King Abdullah as a "champion of reform and tolerance" but did not mention Russia.

"There are enormous problems and there have been real setbacks in terms of Russian democracy," Rice acknowledged to reporters traveling with her. But she said it would be a mistake to think that "we were going to be better off by isolating Russia somehow from democratic fora."

ITAR-Tass, the Russian news agency, never mentioned democracy in a report on the meeting, quoting Foreign Ministry spokesman Mikhail Kamynin as saying, "The forum plans to discuss key regional problems, such as the Middle East settlement, the situation around Iraq, the situation in Lebanon."

Khalil Gebara, co-executive director of the Lebanese Transparency Association, a group that tries to promote good government, said: "The Russians are the least interested in this conference. They are hard to reach and are just not talking to anyone."

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov seemed to spend most of his time out of the main hall, smoking on a sunny terrace surrounded by a retinue of aides.

Rice also held a series of bilateral meetings -- for instance, with a Sudanese official for a tough talk on the crisis in Darfur -- and skipped the final news conference to fly back to Washington when the sessions ran late.

Mansour, an 18-year-old activist, said the youth groups had met for two days to brainstorm ideas to present to ministers to encourage greater participation by young people in promoting good government.

But she said that the ministers had arrived with prepared remarks and that they did not engage in any real discussion. "It was typical," she said. "They applauded our presentations. But there were no promises -- as usual."

Russian Minister Says Iran Talks Coming (AP)

AP, December 2, 2006

Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Friday that talks on proposed sanctions against Iran's nuclear program could take place early next week, Russian news agencies reported.

He said the meeting, suggested by France, would focus on the draft U.N. resolution on Iran and would take place at a top diplomatic level, the ITAR-Tass news agency reported from Jordan, where he was on an official visit.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns will attend a European conference in Brussels next week, probably on Tuesday, and will confer there with European diplomats about the resolution.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett and German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier all agreed Friday to the meeting, Lavrov said, according to the Interfax news agency. China also might attend, although it is not clear if it will.

Lavrov said Russia was ready to vote for a U.N. ban on exports of nuclear materials and sensitive technologies to Iran. But he said Moscow was opposed "to such sanctions and steps that could affect the International Atomic Energy Agency's activities in Iran," ITAR-Tass reported.

The Europeans and Americans pushed for tough, broad sanctions against Iran after it ignored a U.N.-imposed Aug. 31 deadline to halt uranium enrichment.

Russia has said it will agree only to more narrowly focused sanctions.

In Washington, the State Department said it remained confident that a resolution imposing sanctions on Iran would ultimately be adopted.

"No action is not acceptable," spokesman Tom Casey said. "We have to do something."

Russia and China, who have major commercial ties with Iran, have urged the U.N. to seek talks rather than sanctions, despite the failure of a European Union effort to draw Iran to the negotiating table.

The Europeans circulated a draft U.N. Security Council resolution in October that would order all countries not to sell Iran materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs.

The draft resolution would also impose a travel ban and asset freeze on any companies, individuals and organizations involved in those programs.

The draft sanctions would not halt construction of a nuclear power plant at Bushehr, Iran, being built by the Russians. They would bar the sale of nuclear fuel needed for the reactor.

Russia proposed major changes that would limit sanctions solely to measures that would keep Iran from developing nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles. Russia wants to eliminate any travel ban, asset freeze, or mention of Bushehr.

A Limited Time Offer To Iran (NYT)

By George Perkovich, Pierre Goldschmidt

IN October, Iran began operating a second group of 164 uranium enrichment centrifuges, violating a legally binding demand by the United Nations Security Council that Iran suspend such activities until the international community is confident that the country's nuclear program "is for exclusively peaceful purposes." Iran's response was that a suspension would abrogate its rights under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty — even though under international law, it has temporarily surrendered these rights by violating the obligations that condition them.

Beneath the legalese, Iran is moving as fast as it can to master uranium enrichment, while threatening its neighbors and refusing to provide transparency that the International Atomic Energy Agency requires. Tehran bets that Russia will continue to buy it time by slowing and diluting Security Council sanctions. Once Iran has fully mastered enrichment, it will have gained confidence that it can produce weapons-grade uranium quickly if it decides to do so.

With this confidence, Iran would assess the costs and benefits of continuing the construction of a large-scale uranium enrichment plant. If Russia were prepared to join the United States, Europe and others in imposing significant costs, Iran might choose to negotiate a handsome benefits package in exchange for suspending enrichment-related activities. If the Security Council were to remain lenient, on the other hand, Iran would have complete freedom to maneuver.

International interlocutors must disabuse Iran that it can have its uranium cake and eat it, too. The vital security objective all along has been to prevent Iran from acquiring the capacity to make nuclear weapons fuel. Once Iran has mastered uranium enrichment, this objective will have been largely lost. At that point, it would make no further sense to offer Iran exceptional nuclear energy cooperation, political benefits or access to international markets, capital and technology.

Thus, Iran's interlocutors should clarify now that the positive incentives the world wishes to negotiate with Iran will be withdrawn if it does not immediately accede to the binding Security Council demand for suspension.

The message from the Security Council, including Russia and China, should be: "You can get the uranium enrichment capacity you seek, even though, because you have violated your Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and International Atomic Energy Agency Safeguards obligations, it threatens international peace and security. But you will lose the prospects of many benefits. The International Atomic Energy Agency and the Security Council will continue to press for the greater transparency required to verify 'that there are no undeclared nuclear materials or activities in Iran.' Maybe we can tighten the sanctions you will face, maybe we can't, but the case won't be closed, and you will not become an acceptable nuclear trade partner."

Failure to clarify the limited duration of positive incentives only encourages those in Iran who argue that there are no real costs to defying the Security Council and continuing the enrichment program. Conversely, if Iran suspends enrichment while it is still meaningful, interlocutors should be willing to negotiate generously to meet the country's nuclear energy, economic and security interests. This could ultimately include helping Iran develop its nuclear fuel cycle, if and when doubts about the peacefulness of its nuclear ambitions have been durably allayed.

Russia, China and perhaps others will be tempted to argue that pressing Iran this way could be an American attempt to precipitate a crisis and set the stage for military action. To pre-empt such charges, President Bush should clarify that if Iran complies with the Security Council's demands, suspends its fuel-cycle activities and gives up its unjust support for organizations that commit violence against unarmed civilians, the United States will commit not to threaten Iran's sovereignty or territorial integrity. Such a security guarantee, perhaps expressed in the Security Council, would facilitate not only longer-term nuclear negotiations with Iran, but also broader rapprochement.

Iranian national security decisions are made collectively. A precarious consensus emerged in 2005 to defy international demands and press on with enrichment. This consensus will not be reconsidered as long as the policy appears cost-free and the option of cashing in on restraint seems so open-ended that it could be still available after enrichment has been mastered.

The Iranian people, their neighbors and the world deserve a more considered debate of Iran's options and of their consequences. Iran will never be in a better position than it is now to obtain a favorable deal that would improve its economy, employment and quality of life.

George Perkovich is the director of the nonproliferation program at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Pierre Goldschmidt is a non-resident scholar there and a former deputy director of the International Atomic Energy Agency.

For Chávez, A Feisty Electoral Challenger (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, December 2, 2006

Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's exasperated opponents got a gleeful surprise at a rally ahead of Sunday's election, when a giant inflatable figure of the nation's fiery and famously voluble leader inexplicably began to deflate.

"It's a sign! A premonition!" cheered Irene Alvarado, a 50-year-old realtor, as embarrassed Chávistas dragged away the melting figure while the crowd chanted "This government is already down and out!" and set off fireworks.

"He's going to lose," Ms. Alvarado said.

While that looks unlikely -- most polls show Mr. Chávez with a comfortable edge -- Venezuela's often fractured and famously inept opposition is at least putting up a respectable fight this time. They are marching into electoral battle united behind Manuel Rosales, 54, a hard-nosed and experienced professional politician who has, by all accounts, mounted a feisty challenge to Mr. Chávez. That challenge, to be sure, is fueled by desperation.

Mr. Chávez, 52, is a fervent admirer of Cuban leader Fidel Castro and has vowed to accelerate what he calls his "Bolivarian revolution" if he wins. Most foes take him at his word, and believe Mr. Chávez would do everything possible to reshape Venezuela along Cuban lines.

The stakes have the country bracing for trouble: Grocery stores have been denuded of food in expectation of possible violence, especially if the election is close.

Mr. Rosales, a governor of oil-rich Zulia state, faces long odds in his quest to oust the incumbent, who has been in power since 1998 and is seeking another six-year term. Mr. Chávez's administration retains a strong following among the majority of poor Venezuelans, on whom he has showered uncounted billions to subsidize health, education and employment programs.

Mr. Chávez also has fear on his side: His minions haven't shrunk from firing employees from government jobs or state companies for showing opposition leanings. Last month, Rafael Ramírez, who is both energy minister and president of the state oil company, Petroleos de Venezuela SA, was secretly videotaped before an auditorium full of company workers, declaiming there shouldn't be any doubt that PDVSA "was 100% supporting President Chávez."

Potential voters also fear a fingerprint machine that will be used in some Venezuelan states -- ostensibly to avoid electoral fraud -- could be used to identify opposition voters, making them susceptible to government retribution. State companies and government use lists culled from ballot records to blackball applicants for everything from jobs to loans.

Mr. Rosales has pledged to continue many popular Chávez programs, while making them more effective. What's more, he has pledged to give all poor Venezuelans a bank card, called "Mi Negra," which will allow them to draw a monthly stipend, directly tapping into the country's oil wealth.

The opposition argues that polls are meaningless in the Venezuelan context, and that impatience with presidential tirades against the U.S., disgust with epidemic crime and wariness of a Castro-type regime will help voters overcome the fear factor and pull the lever for their man.

But Chávez support runs deep. "Poor people have never had a president who has cared about them," says Yelitza Ojeda, a maid who works in a Caracas luxury hotel. Rattling off an exhaustive list of brothers, cousins and sisters, Ms. Ojeda says her whole family, which lives in a poor sector of the capital, plans to vote for Mr. Chávez.

Polls On Chavez Range From Huge Victory To Dead Heat (WT)

By Kelly Hearn

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez heads into tomorrow's election with some polls showing a victory margin of more than 30 percent while others show a dead heat for the fiery leftist who calls President Bush the devil.

His conservative rival, Manuel Rosales, has managed to unite a fragmented opposition and made inroads into Mr. Chavez's base by attacking the president's lavish spending on leftist causes throughout Latin America and his support for Cuba's Fidel Castro.

"Let's not forget that we are facing the very devil," Mr. Chavez said in one of his final speeches before campaigning officially ended. "On Dec. 3, we face at the ballot box the imperialist government of the United States of America. That is our real adversary."

A state-funded poll by the Evans/McDonough Co. Wednesday gave Mr. Chavez 57 percent of the vote, a 19-point lead. On Nov. 23 an Ipsos/Associated Press opinion poll said Mr. Chavez held a 32 percentage-point advantage.

But Penn, Schoen & Berland, another U.S.-based pollster, recently gave Mr. Chavez only 52 percent while reporting a strong 48 percent for Mr. Rosales. Another firm, ASKA Partners, has reported similar numbers.

"This is a very close race, with what appears to be an evenly divided electorate," said Douglas Schoen of Penn, Schoen & Berland.

Opposition leaders have attacked the credibility of state-sponsored pollsters and accused international news outlets of reporting polls that favor Mr. Chavez to the exclusion of others.

Diego Arrias, a former Venezuelan ambassador to the United Nations, said the government has contracted "fly-by-night" polling companies.

He also said international news outlets have been "resistant to quote serious pollsters" that show Mr. Rosales gaining support.

Many say a surprise showing by Mr. Rosales could cause political disturbances.

On Wednesday the U.S. Embassy advised Americans to limit their travel and stock up on food, water and medications in the event of postelection protests.

"In light of recent history of street disturbances occasioned by political activity, and current levels of anti-U.S. Government sentiment on the part of the Venezuelan government, American citizens in Venezuela should maintain a high level of personal security awareness, especially during the election period," the embassy stated.

A win for Mr. Chavez would further embolden his so-called "Bolivarian" revolution, which he claims has taken hold in Bolivia, Nicaragua, Cuba and elsewhere. Ecuador joined those ranks in recent days when Rafael Correa, a leftist colleague of Mr. Chavez, was elected president.

U.S. officials say Mr. Chavez is a destabilizing force in the region, pursuing what they say is an unjustified military buildup, largely with Russian-made planes and weapons.

As Crime Soars For Venezuela, Chávez Coasts (NYT)

By Simon Romero

CARACAS, Venezuela, Dec. 1 — Walk into an emergency room in many poor parts of this booming, oil-rich nation on a weekend night and you will be overwhelmed — victims of gunshot wounds and drunken clashes line the corridors. Homicides are up 67 percent since 1999, and violent crime is the top concern of Venezuela's voters as they head to the polls on Sunday.

Yet the man in charge since then, President Hugo Chávez, rarely addresses the problem publicly and is sailing toward an easy election for a third time. Analysts say Mr. Chávez is able to ignore the issue by governing through a system of extensive handouts that eases the purchase of basic goods but does little to ensure public order.

"Chávez has shielded himself from the issue because people see his government as an important arbiter in their daily life," said Miguel Tinker-Salas, an expert on Venezuelan history at Pomona College in Claremont, Calif. "Chávez's policies have made a difference among the poor, and that's what is recognized." He pointed to subsidized groceries, health care and literacy, in particular.

Crime analysts say part of the problem is that the government and its allies have politicized police forces throughout the country, marginalizing officers viewed as disagreeing with Mr. Chávez's "Bolivarian Revolution," which uses militaristic and nationalistic rhetoric in an attempt to reconfigure society with vague socialist ideals.

A similar process has taken place in government ministries, the national oil company and the armed forces after the coup that briefly removed Mr. Chávez from the presidency in 2002.

Analysts say police forces have also largely been urged to tread lightly in poor neighborhoods, turning a blind eye to small demonstrations and petty crime like burning tires. Critics say it is part of Mr. Chávez's efforts to maintain support in poor neighborhoods.

Meanwhile, crime has exploded. According to human rights groups and a Unesco study, Venezuela has the highest rate of gun-related deaths of 57 countries surveyed — far surpassing Brazil, one of the most violent nations in Latin America.

"Venezuela has undeniably become one of the most violent countries in the world," said Julio Jacobo Waiselfisz, the researcher who conducted the Unesco study.

Though he trails badly in most polls, Mr. Chávez's opponent, Manuel Rosales, 53, governor of Zulia State in western Venezuela, has been pounding the crime issue, questioning why murders have surged since Mr. Chávez entered office in 1999, to 9,962 in 2005 from 5,974 in 1999, according to figures from the Criminal Investigations Police.

Officials in the Justice Ministry did not respond to repeated requests for comment on the government's crime policies. The National Assembly, controlled by supporters of Mr. Chávez, is considering legislation to diminish police corruption by centralizing more authority in a national police force.

Mr. Rosales, the candidate of a coalition of opposition parties, laid the blame squarely at the feet of the president, saying his confrontational style and tendency to turn the courts, military and the police into tools of his own power, are feeding the crime epidemic.

"Chávez nourishes the anarchic forces that are tearing Venezuela apart with a discourse advocating aggression on all fronts," the candidate has said. Polls show Mr. Rosales trailing Mr. Chávez, though his approval ratings have inched up since the start of the campaign several months ago.

Concern over crime has jumped this year after a series of brutal episodes pierced even the relatively sheltered existence of the upper middle class and the diplomatic and international business communities. Street protests broke out in April after three brothers with Canadian citizenship, John Faddoul, 17, Kevin Faddoul, 13, and Jason Faddoul, 12, were kidnapped and found executed.

Around the same time, burglars shot Walter Rehberger, a consul at the Austrian Embassy here, during a break-in. Diplomats were singled out again this month, when thieves broke into the trade office for the Chinese Embassy and stole $14,000.

The highway from the international airport in Maiquetía to Caracas has also proved particularly dangerous, with armed gangs rear-ending cars and robbing passengers of their belongings. Carlos Colina, a consultant for Hewlett-Packard, was shot to death on the route in July, one of several incidents that led the United States Embassy in Caracas to issue a warning against traveling on the road after nightfall.

While much of the recent attention has focused on killings among the privileged, the vast majority of homicides in Venezuela occur in the country's poorest communities — Mr. Chávez's strongest base.

Killings tend to spike during weekends and around paydays in the middle and end of the month, when robberies are also common, according to criminologists. The large majority of incidents involve boys and men ages 15 to 25.

Mr. Waiselfisz, the Unesco researcher, found that gun-related deaths in Venezuela were surging, to 41.4 per 100,000 inhabitants in 2002, the last year for which figures are available, from 34.3 in 2000.

One of the most unsettling aspects of the spike in killings is that it has developed as Venezuela's economy has boomed — thanks to high oil prices. Gross domestic product climbed 10.2 percent last quarter, making Venezuela the fastest-growing economy in Latin America.

Previous economic booms helped Venezuela avoid the crippling violence and social conflict that plagued neighboring Andean countries like Colombia and Peru.

Though the accuracy of official statistics is sometimes questioned by the government's opponents, the channeling of oil revenues seems to have alleviated poverty somewhat in recent years. The Venezuelans living in poverty has fallen to 34 percent from 44 percent in 1998, the year before Mr. Chávez took office, according to government figures.

Some of that decline has clearly happened as Mr. Chávez has used oil revenues to finance a broad range of social welfare programs, like adult literacy programs, subsidized basic foodstuffs and medical care in poor areas provided by Cuban doctors.

"We're witnessing a reduction in infant mortality rates only to see our boys killed when they turn 16," said Ana María Sanjuán, a sociologist at Central University in Caracas and an official with Provea, a nongovernmental organization that monitors human rights issues.

Citing figures from the Criminal Investigations Police, Ms. Sanjuán said the number of homicides in Venezuela climbed 23 percent from January to August of this year, to 7,616. "The politicization and decrepitude of our policing structures may have more to do with our culture of violence than just poverty," Ms. Sanjuán said.

Pedro Ure, chief inspector for the municipal police in Sucre, a sprawling district of Caracas, led a visitor on a nighttime patrol of slum streets and said tolerant policing methods were part of an attempt to instill respect among his officers for human rights.

"This means a citizen can enjoy his rum on the street if he wishes, even though this could be an infraction," he said, though he acknowledged that many homicides occurred when suspects were drinking.

Meanwhile, however, a history of far graver abuses by the police has gone unchecked, some crime analysts note. Last year, the attorney general's office said it was investigating 5,520 presumed executions by the police between 2000 and 2005, involving 6,127 victims. Of the police officials implicated, prosecutors have filed charges against 517, and fewer than 100 had been convicted, according to Human Rights Watch.

"We're experiencing the worst crime wave in modern Venezuelan history," said Marcos Tarre Briceño, director of the nongovernmental organization Secure Venezuela, "and the government barely acknowledges its inability to control its own police forces."

Plan For South American Pipeline Has Ambitions Beyond Gas (NYT)

By Jens Erik Gould

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

GÜIRIA, Venezuela — President Hugo Chávez is not modest about his energy plans. He wants to build a 5,000-mile natural gas pipeline that stretches from this remote northern tip of South America to the bottom end of the continent.

Erecting possibly the longest pipeline in the world is the centerpiece of a broader effort by Mr. Chávez to strengthen ties among Latin America's economies and shrink their dependence on the United States.

But from the outset, the $20 billion "great gas pipeline of the south," planned to be more than twice as long as the United States border with Mexico, has generated political and environmental controversy at home and abroad.

Mr. Chávez, who deeply distrusts the United States and has raised the prospect that it may invade Venezuela to seize its oil, is seeking to diversify his country's energy exports away from its biggest client and toward countries as far away as China and as close as Brazil.

Mr. Chávez has strengthened political ties with Brazil and Argentina in recent years.

And these days, he is dangling Venezuela's significant reserves as an incentive as he asks his neighbors for a long-term natural gas commitment.

During a recent visit to the pipeline's projected starting point, as oil workers and local residents crowded just outside this fishing town in Venezuela's northeast, Mr. Chávez proclaimed, as he stood next to a row of national flags: "Here in this South America, from the Caribbean to Patagonia, we'll build a great bloc of political, economic and social power to seek world equilibrium this century, where we don't have one policeman who wants to be the owner of the world."

That geopolitical aim is, in fact, the project's biggest hurdle, energy analysts maintain. They say that the decision by Mr. Chávez to give his ideological goals priority over profit jeopardizes the success of the project.

"You don't build a pipeline for political reasons," said Robert E. Ebel, energy analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "It should be a financially viable operation."

Though Venezuela could reap higher profit margins by exporting liquefied natural gas to higher-price markets like the United States, Venezuelan officials acknowledge that is not their goal.

"It's not that the economic part doesn't matter," said Ángel González, general director of exploration and production at the Energy Ministry, "but it's really not the most important part of this project."

Venezuela is not the only country to use gas pipelines for political influence. Critics in the United States accused Russia of using energy politics after its giant company Gazprom stopped supplying Ukraine in an effort to raise prices at the start of the year.

Still, it is not clear that Mr. Chávez can muster long-term support in South America for a huge pipeline that would take at least a decade to complete. There is already skepticism and bickering over other energy deals, analysts say.

"Does political will last that long?" asked Michelle Billig of the PIRA Energy Group in New York, a consulting firm.

Brazil, for instance, may be wary of committing itself to a pipeline with Venezuela after Mr. Chávez applauded Bolivia's nationalization of energy industries in 2006. That move jeopardized the natural gas investments of Petrobras, Brazil's state-owned oil company, in Bolivia, said Anne Korin, co-director of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security in Washington.

Argentina and Brazil, expected to be the project's largest users, would find themselves dependent for supplies of gas on Venezuela and Bolivia, nations that have shown themselves to be politically volatile. Venezuela halted oil exports during a two-month national strike starting late in 2002, and tensions in Bolivia over how to manage energy resources have helped topple two recent presidents. Paraguay and Uruguay would also take part in the pipeline.

"In South America there is no project more challenging than this one in its history," said Ricardo Savini, a business development manager for Petrobras. He said his company could take part in the pipeline if feasibility studies turned out favorable.

Venezuela's natural gas reserves are largely undeveloped, and over the years, gas has taken a back seat to petroleum in Venezuela, one of the world's leading oil exporters.

The Chávez government has made laws more attractive for investors in gas. That contrasts sharply with the blunt measures that have wrested control from foreign companies producing oil. Chevron has already found enough gas in the Plataforma Deltana area in the east for Venezuela to begin processing liquefied natural gas. Chevron expects to export liquefied gas to the United States and European markets through a $5.6 billion complex that the state oil company, Petróleos de Venezuela, plans to build outside Güiria.

Now, the state company also wants the complex to feed the transcontinental pipeline and says those plans are a higher priority than exporting liquefied gas.

Energy analysts say it will be a tall order for Venezuela's budding gas industry to produce enough for both the L.N.G. plant and the pipeline, especially when current output does not even satisfy domestic demand for natural gas.

The pipeline also faces resistance from environmental groups because it would cut through the Brazilian Amazon and cross several large rivers to reach its destinations. Watchdog groups, like Greenpeace, say it could devastate some of the least-developed and least-studied areas in the dense rainforest and that the influx of laborers could bring diseases to remote indigenous communities.

"It will be terrible," said Paulo Adario, Amazon campaign coordinator for Greenpeace. "The environmental impact seems very high."

There is concern in Güiria, too, a city of 35,000 people. A month after Mr. Chavez broke ground for the gas complex on the environmentally sensitive Paria peninsula in September, the monument built for his nationally televised speech was still littered with the empty water bottles and soda cans of those who attended. "You manage a project that you supposedly consider won't create any environmental impact on an international level — and then you do this," said Rodolfo Foucault, a Güiria resident, when he saw the trash on an otherwise unspoiled coastline.

Still, many locals welcome Petróleos de Venezuela's promise to spend more than $1 billion on infrastructure and local industries in Sucre, the northeastern state where Güiria is situated. "We want the development for our community," said Antonio Calazán, who fishes mackerel and shark in the waters off Güiria.

While even critics are optimistic that the state oil company will keep its promise to build the liquefied natural gas plant, many say that the pipeline will be the latest in a long line of Venezuelan energy plans that never got off the ground or have been significantly delayed. For example, Mariscal Sucre, a promising offshore natural gas project, has been stalled for more than a decade.

Government officials have yet to disclose details on its routes or costs, saying that technical teams are performing preliminary studies. A model of the complex in Güiria's airport does not offer any clues either, nor does it illustrate what part of the plant's terminal will feed the transcontinental line.

There was no actual construction to be seen along the main road cutting through the plant site in Güiria other than the monument that Mr. Chávez opened — and even that appeared abandoned. The wind had torn down the young coconut trees that provided the president's television backdrop.

Yet Mr. Chávez and his energy officials continue to champion the proposal. They have even devised a slogan for Güiria on the plaque, which Carlos Figueredo, Petróleos de Venezuela's general manager for offshore natural gas, repeated at an industry conference in October in Sucre state.

"We have called Güiria the place where the gas is born that unites the people," he said. "That gives you an idea of the magnitude that we're looking at."

China To Allow More Freedom For Journalists From Abroad (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 1 -- China has decided to substantially liberalize restrictions on coverage by foreign journalists ahead of the 2008 Olympic Games in Beijing, the government announced Friday.

A decree from Premier Wen Jiabao's government said foreign reporters, whether assigned here permanently or visiting for the Olympics, will be allowed to roam most of the country freely and report without interference by local police or propaganda officials from Jan. 1, 2007, until Oct. 17, 2008. The Games are in August 2008.

As explained by Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao, the new rules departed clearly -- if temporarily -- from long-standing orders. They also marked a significant watershed for China, where information has long been treated as government property to be manipulated and controlled by propaganda officials.

The new rules apply only to foreign reporters, Liu said, and restrictions on Chinese journalists remain in effect, including Communist Party censorship of all publications and broadcasts. In addition, travel restrictions in Tibet and Xinjiang will continue to apply to foreign correspondents, effectively limiting coverage of those restive areas.

If followed by authorities across the country, the decree nevertheless would for more than 21 months eliminate some major barriers to accurate reporting about China: regulations that legally oblige foreign correspondents to work through local propaganda officials when gathering news. Those restrictions, when followed, have limited frank conversation with Chinese people and emphasized the official version of news.

In practice, foreign reporters in recent years frequently have managed to report on their own, speaking directly with Chinese people while using subterfuge and stealth to avoid getting caught by local police. Those who have been spotted, however, often have been detained, lectured and forced to write confessions that they broke the law. In many cases, their notes and camera equipment have been confiscated. At times, they have been shoved around by police.

In seeking to bring the 2008 Olympics to Beijing, the government had pledged to the International Olympic Committee that the situation would change. In effect, it said reporting in China would be as free as it has been in previous Olympics elsewhere.

But doubts persisted among diplomats, journalists and other foreigners because of China's long history of rigid controls. In particular, they said, Chinese security officials were unlikely to allow free reporting on anti-government groups, such as the banned Falun Gong spiritual movement, that might try to take advantage of the Olympics to advertise their dissatisfaction.

Bob Ctvrtlik, a member of the IOC, said Friday that China's announcement debunked the notion that authorities would not adapt to welcome the Games.

"This is a very important step for us," Ctvrtlik said. "The IOC and the IOC membership received criticism for the decision six years ago" to award the Games to Beijing, "and I think many people at the time said significant changes could not occur. I think this action proves that not to be the case."

Even so, there have been indications recently that officials might not be so flexible. The deputy director of the Beijing Public Security Bureau, Liu Shaowu, told reporters last week that the three main threats to Olympic security were terrorism, organized crime and "mass disturbances," a term officials use to describe protests.

A manual published by the Public Security Ministry and handed out to Beijing police, who are studying English in preparation for the Olympics, contained a dialogue making clear how ministry officials believe reporting should be approached. It described a hypothetical situation in which a policeman comes upon a foreign reporter inquiring about Falun Gong:

"But Falun Gong has nothing to do with the games," the policeman says.

"What does that matter?" the reporter replies.

"It's beyond the permit."

"What permit?"

"You're a sports reporter. You should only cover the games."

"But I'm interested in Falun Gong."

DOJ_NMG_0101043

"It's beyond the limit of your coverage and illegal. As a foreign reporter in China, you should obey China law and do nothing against your status."

"Oh, I see. May I go now?"

"No. Come with us."

A Beijing policeman said the manual was distributed to him and his colleagues, along with a tape recording of the various dialogues, as practice material to supplement three-month-long formal English courses that have been underway since 2002.

Asked how that fit in with the new rules, Liu said that in the coming month there will be briefings on the changes for Chinese government departments, including the Public Security Ministry and provincial, municipal and county propaganda officials who routinely seek to impede coverage of news in their areas. Beginning Jan. 1, those officials will no longer have the right to detain foreign reporters seeking to interview people, he said, and the Foreign Ministry can be called on to intercede if they try.

"To interview organizations or individuals in China, foreign journalists need only to obtain their prior consent," said the sixth of nine regulations.

As published, the decree changed foreign reporting rules only until Oct. 17, 2008. But Liu suggested at a news conference that the changes might be extended after the Olympics. Conditions for foreign correspondents in China will get "better and better," he said.

China Plans Temporary Easing Of Curbs On Foreign Journalists (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 1 — China announced temporary regulations on Friday loosening restrictions on foreign journalists, a step intended to fulfill the country's promise to allow visiting reporters to work freely in advance of the 2008 Beijing Olympics.

The rules, announced by the Foreign Ministry, will supersede existing restrictions that require journalists to obtain government approval before traveling or conducting interviews. Under the new rules, a foreign journalist will only need to obtain the permission of the person being interviewed.

"It is crystal clear that as long as the interviewee agrees, you can do your reporting," the ministry spokesman, Liu Jianchao, told reporters at a briefing.

The Foreign Correspondents' Club of China, a Beijing-based association of international news bureaus, applauded the new rules and singled out the Foreign Ministry for praise. But the group also called on the government to make the regulations permanent. The rules take effect on Jan. 1 and end Oct. 17, 2008, after the conclusion of the Paralympics.

"Depending on how they are implemented, we hope they'll one day be looked back upon as a major step in bringing correspondents' reporting conditions in China much closer to international standards," the group said in a statement.

Reporters Without Borders, the international press advocacy group, also praised the new rules but noted that the announcement came on the same day that a Beijing appeals court upheld a fraud conviction against Zhao Yan, a Chinese researcher for The New York Times.

Mr. Zhao's case has brought international criticism; some analysts considered his conviction an implicit warning to foreign journalists and their Chinese news assistants. According to the Reporters Without Borders Web site, at least 32 Chinese journalists were jailed in China as of January. The new rules will not apply to Chinese journalists, who still face heavy censorship.

For China, the relaxed reporting rules for foreigners are an important public relations gesture as Beijing prepares for the Olympic Games in August 2008. More than 20,000 journalists are expected to attend the Games, and Beijing promised the International Olympic Committee that reporters would be allowed to report freely.

Historically, China has tightly monitored foreign reporting and censored the Chinese news media on issues deemed politically delicate. In an earlier era, state security agents often tried to intercede or follow foreign reporters who tried to travel without permission.

Currently, foreign journalists work in something of a gray zone. Journalists are rarely followed, though many reporters assume that their e-mail messages, telephones, offices and possibly homes are monitored with listening devices. Many journalists now travel without government permission and also conduct interviews without applying for approval. Often such trips are completed without incident.

But the restrictions create a tense atmosphere that leaves reporters vulnerable to official scrutiny and, in some cases, arrest. Journalists can be identified by a special "J" designation on their visas. Hotel clerks are supposed to notify local public security bureaus anytime someone with a "J" visa registers for a room.

In addition, foreign journalists visiting remote areas sometimes attract suspicion if they are not ethnic Chinese. Reporters caught traveling without permission are sometimes detained and questioned by the local police. In some cases Chinese residents have been harassed or even arrested after being quoted in news articles.

Jonathan Watts, the Beijing bureau chief for The Guardian, the British newspaper, applauded the new rules but also noted that the proof would come in how they were carried out. "As with everything in China, it is going to depend on implementation," Mr. Watts said. "But the fact is that they have set a precedent."

The new regulations apply to reporting about the Olympics and "related matters." But Mr. Liu, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, said the regulations could be broadly interpreted and "actually expands the areas on which foreign journalists can report."

"Foreign journalists will not limit their activities to the Games themselves," Mr. Liu said, according to The Associated Press. "They will also cover politics, science, technology and the economy."

He added that the police would maintain the right to intervene with reporters during emergencies or protests. That caveat raised questions about what barriers journalists would face if they should try to cover events like the numerous protests and riots that have occurred throughout China in recent years.

US Urges Opec Not To Cut Output Further (FT)

By Carola Hoyos

Financial Times, December 2, 2006

The US on Friday urged the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries not to make further cuts to its oil production.

Samuel Bodman, US energy secretary, said: "I encourage them to keep markets well-supplied."

But almost simultaneously in Cairo Ali Naimi, Saudi Arabia's oil minister, indicated that the cartel needed to give serious consideration to further reducing its production when it met in Abuja, Nigeria's capital, on December 14. He told reporters that demand was "okay", US inventories were high, and 100m barrels of oil would have to be removed from the market to achieve a balance.

Several of Opec's most hawkish members, including Venezuela and Nigeria, have called on the group to reduce its production by at least another 500,000 barrels a day. Libya, Algeria and Kuwait, more moderate Opec members, have been more guarded about whether further cuts are needed.

In late October, Opec agreed to reduce its output by 1.2m b/d to stem a 25 per cent fall in oil prices since the summer and to try to enforce a minimum price level of $60 a barrel. Even though the cartel has not fully stuck to its agreement, its decision has been largely successful. So far Opec's 10 active members have reduced their output by only 785,000 barrels a day, according to a [news organization's] poll. Even so, oil prices are again above $60 a barrel.

Crude oil futures traded on the New York Mercantile Exchange on Friday moved slightly lower after hitting a two-month high of $63.77 a barrel on Thursday. In London Brent crude futures were also down slightly, trading between $63.35 and $64.30.

Opec this week also saw success in its long-term expansion strategy as Angola, Africa's second largest oil producer, agreed to join the group and Sudan said it was working towards joining.

Together the two countries, among the world's fastest-growing energy suppliers, produce almost 2m barrels of oil a day.

The deep waters off Angola's coast are a particularly important new investment sphere for the world's biggest listed energy groups, while Sudan is critical to China, which has invested heavily there despite international pressure not to do so.

Speaking at an African oil and gas forum in the US, Mr Bodman acknowledged Africa's growing clout, saying that increasing oil demand put Africa "in an position of increasing strategic importance to the US and global markets".

Two Others Test Positive For Radiation, British Officials Say (WP)

By Mary Jordan, Sarah Delaney

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 1 -- The radioactive substance that killed former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko has contaminated his wife and an Italian security consultant he met the day he fell ill, British officials and a Litvinenko family friend said Friday.

Officials said that neither was showing symptoms of poisoning from the substance, polonium-210. Although thousands of people have called hotlines worried about possible exposure, Mario Scaramella and Marina Litvinenko are the only two who have tested positive for the radiation since Litvinenko's mysterious death on Nov. 23.

British authorities have detected traces of polonium-210 in at least 12 sites around London and on two British Airways jetliners. A third plane was returning to Moscow on Friday for checks. Investigators are trying to use those findings to determine where the poison came from and who transported it.

Scaramella, who met with Litvinenko at a sushi restaurant on Nov. 1, was the more severely affected. Health officials said he had "significant" amounts of radiation in his body, and he was hospitalized Friday awaiting further tests this weekend.

"He is currently well and shows no symptoms of radiation poisoning," Keith Patterson, a doctor at University College Hospital, told reporters outside the hospital Friday night. "Tests have detected polonium-210 in Mr. Scaramella's body, but at a considerably lower level than Mr. Litvinenko."

Alex Goldfarb, a family friend of the Litvinenkos, said in an interview that Marina Litvinenko, 44, a ballet teacher, was told by doctors that "minuscule levels" of polonium-210 had been found in her urine.

"For three days when he was home and vomiting, she was taking care of him," Goldfarb said. He said she was not particularly worried about her health, but noted that because the poison is "so unique, its long-term effects are not known."

"The levels are not significant enough to result in any illness in the short term," the Health Protection Agency said in a statement that identified the contaminated person only as an "adult family member" of Litvinenko. It added, "The results are reassuring in that any increased risk in the long term is likely to be very small."

Nick Priest, a British scientist and expert in polonium-210, said in an interview that "everyone has a different resistance to radiation." He said the worry is that it might cause "a depletion of bone marrow" and an increased risk of cancer.

Litvinenko's unexplained death has created Cold War-like tensions between London and Moscow. Litvinenko was an outspoken critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin, and his friends say that before his death he accused Putin of ordering his murder. The Kremlin has dismissed those allegations as "nonsense."

In Moscow, a former KGB agent who met Litvinenko on Nov. 1 at the Millennium Hotel in Grosvenor Square, within sight of the U.S. Embassy, denied any involvement in Litvinenko's death.

Scaramella said at a news conference in Rome last week that he showed Litvinenko e-mails during their meeting that warned their lives might be in danger.

Sergio Rastrelli, a lawyer for Scaramella, was asked in a televised interview in Italy on Friday whether Scaramella was a witness or suspect in the case. "He is absolutely a witness, and now, unfortunately, he is also a person who has been offended by a crime committed by a third party."

In Russia, human rights activists said a letter written by a former Russian intelligence agent claimed that the Federal Security Service, or FSB, had established death squads to kill Litvinenko and other critics of the Kremlin.

"Back in 2002, I warned Litvinenko that they had formed a team to kill him," the letter said. Activists said the letter was written by Mikhail Trepashkin, a former officer of the KGB and its successor, the FSB.

Trepashkin was sentenced to four years in prison in 2005 for divulging state secrets. Before his arrest, Trepashkin was investigating the possible role of the FSB in a series of apartment bombings in 1999 in which hundreds of people died -- a subject about which Litvinenko had written a book. Amnesty International and other human rights groups have said Trepashkin was jailed to prevent further investigation into the bombings.

Police in Sussex, south of London, said they assisted Scotland Yard and the Health Protection Agency in an investigation at the Ashdown Park Hotel in East Sussex on Friday. British and Italian media said Scaramella had stayed at the hotel recently and that authorities were looking for traces of radiation.

Matthew Long, deputy general manager at the Ashdown Park Hotel, said in an interview that police found "no evidence of radiation" after searching for hours. Long said the investigation was started because of concern that "we had a guest who might have been suffering from radiation."

Pathologists in protective gear conducted a postmortem exam on Litvinenko's body Friday. Results are not expected to be announced for several days. The BBC reported that because of the radiation, his remains will be buried in a sealed coffin.

Pat Troop, chief executive of the Health Protection Agency, said the risk to others who came into casual contact with Litvinenko remains negligible.

Radiation Detected In Man Who Met With Ex-Spy (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 1 — One of three men who last met the former K.G.B. officer Alexander V. Litvinenko before he fell fatally ill with radiation poisoning was himself admitted to a London hospital on Friday, the authorities said, after tests showed that he had a significant amount of radioactive material in his body.

The hospitalization of the man, an Italian investigator named Mario Scaramella, adds a further layer of confusion to the puzzle surrounding the death of Mr. Litvinenko, a vocal critic-in-exile of the Russian government. Although tests have been conducted on dozens of people who came into contact with Mr. Litvinenko after he fell ill, including his doctors, Mr. Scaramella is so far the only one to show more than a negligible amount of radiation in his body.

The Health Protection Agency, which deals with public health issues in Britain, also said Friday that "an adult member of Mr. Litvinenko's family" who was in close contact with him during his illness — a description that apparently applies only to his wife — had tested positive for low levels of radiation exposure. But the agency added, "The levels are not significant enough to result in any illness in the short term."

Mr. Scaramella has said all along that he felt fine, that he was suffering from none of the debilitating symptoms that characterized Mr. Litvinenko's illness and that earlier tests for polonium 210, the isotope that killed Mr. Litvinenko, had turned up negative. University College Hospital, where he was admitted Friday, said Mr. Scaramella was "currently well and shows no symptoms of radiation poisoning."

Dr. Keith Patterson, a consulting hematologist at the hospital, said that while tests had shown the presence of polonium 210 in Mr. Scaramella's body, they were "at considerably lower levels than Mr. Litvinenko."

The health agency would not say how much radiation Mr. Scaramella had ingested, only that he had "a significant quantity" of polonium 210 in his body. Mr. Scaramella's lawyer, Sergio Rastrelli, said in Rome that his client was undergoing more tests.

Mr. Litvinenko's body underwent an autopsy on Friday at the Royal London Hospital in Whitechapel, a hospital spokeswoman said. The autopsy, which might help disclose how the radiation entered his system and in what quantities, was presided over by a forensic pathologist appointed by the Home Office. Also present were an independent pathologist and a third who had been hired by Mr. Litvinenko's family.

The results of the autopsy may not be available until next week.

All the pathologists wore protective clothing. Alex Goldfarb, a close friend of Mr. Litvinenko's who has emerged as a family spokesman, said that he had been told that his friend's body would have to be sealed in an airtight container and that it was so contaminated that it could not be cremated for 22 years.

With each new development, there are more mysteries to be solved in the case, which has still not been characterized as a murder by the London police. Who gave Mr. Litvinenko the polonium 210? Where did they get it? How much was he given? How did he ingest it? What is the significance of the traces of radiation that have been found in at least a dozen places, including on two British Airways jets? Two Russians who also met with Mr. Litvinenko on the day he fell ill had traveled on the planes.

Mr. Scaramella's role is also something of a mystery.

Mr. Scaramella was a consultant for the Mitrokhin Commission, a parliamentary panel in Italy looking into reported connections between the K.G.B. and Italian politicians. It was disbanded this year.

Mr. Litvinenko also worked for the Mitrokhin Commission, Mr. Goldfarb said, and had known Mr. Scaramella for a decade. The two met regularly in London. Their last meeting took place at the Piccadilly branch of the Itsu sushi restaurant on Nov. 1, the day Mr. Litvinenko became sick.

Flanked by bodyguards in Rome last month, Mr. Scaramella told reporters that during the meeting — in which he drank water and Mr. Litvinenko ate sushi and soup — he presented Mr. Litvinenko with e-mailed documents showing their names on a list of people whose lives were in danger from Russian criminals. Mr. Scaramella said the same criminals had killed Anna Politkovskaya, a Russian investigative journalist, in Moscow in October.

Mr. Scaramella has been in London for the last week. He said that he and Mr. Litvinenko were friends and that he was not a suspect. Mr. Litvinenko said on his deathbed that he believed forces working for the government of President Vladimir V. Putin were responsible, a charge the Kremlin has dismissed as ridiculous.

Mr. Goldfarb said that his friend was certain he had been poisoned during one of two meetings on Nov. 1 — either the one at Itsu, or another, with the two Russian men, at the Millennium Hotel in Mayfair.

"It's mystery over mystery over mystery," he said. Of the news that Mr. Scaramella had tested positive for radiation, Mr. Goldfarb said, "Obviously he received a much lower dose than Alexander. He might have been an innocent bystander; he might have been a target; he might have been someone who the perpetrators contaminated after the fact; or he may himself be involved. Nobody knows."

Poison Also Found In Italian (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

LONDON — An Italian KGB expert who had warned poisoned Russian dissident Alexander Litvinenko that his life might be in danger has a "significant quantity" of radioactive polonium-210 in his body, authorities said Friday.

British health officials also said they had detected a small quantity in a close relative of Litvinenko. Neither has shown signs of illness.

The announcements came as police zeroed in on radiation found on British Airways jets that flew between Moscow and London, one of which might have transported suspects carrying the poison.

After days of investigation, police have begun to trace a radiation trail across flight manifests and London hotels and offices that security experts said could eventually pinpoint how the radioactive substance was brought to London and possibly by whom.

The exposure of Italian academic Mario Scaramella increases the likelihood that the poison was administered at the sushi restaurant in central London where the two men met briefly Nov. 1 — hours before Litvinenko became sick — especially since the radiation trail appears to follow Litvinenko's movements across London after that rendezvous.

Scaramella has done exhaustive research into the archives of Vasili Mitrokhin, a KGB major who defected to the West in 1992 and took along numerous secret files. Scaramella became acquainted with several former KGB agents, including Litvinenko, who had accused his former colleagues of involvement in several killings and assaults and had obtained political asylum in Britain.

The Italian asked Litvinenko to meet with him after he received an e-mail suggesting that criminals in St. Petersburg, Russia, were behind the recent slaying of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya in Moscow and were preparing to strike against Litvinenko and Scaramella.

Litvinenko discounted the threat, and the meeting was brief. Scaramella, who had already eaten, had only a glass of water. Litvinenko ate lunch. He died 22 days later in a London hospital.

Scaramella has cooperated in the investigation, and authorities have not identified him as a suspect. After he arrived at London's University College Hospital on Friday wearing a mask, hospital officials said he had been admitted for examination.

"Tests have detected polonium-210 in Mr. Scaramella's body, but at a considerably lower level than Mr. Litvinenko. He is currently well and shows no symptoms of radiation poisoning," hospital spokesman Dr. Keith Patterson said in a statement.

Meanwhile, in another possible poisoning, former acting Prime Minister Yegor T. Gaidar remained hospitalized in Moscow with a still-undiagnosed ailment. He fell ill suddenly a week ago during an academic conference in Ireland.

British police are investigating whether there are any links between the two cases.

Lugovoy was in London with his family and numerous other Russian soccer fans for a match between Moscow's CSKA team and London's Arsenal, according to the Moscow newspaper Kommersant.

Russian businessman Dmitry Kovtun accompanied Lugovoy to the Litvinenko meeting at London's elite Millennium Hotel, where several traces of polonium-210 reportedly have been found.

Litvinenko, who left a note blaming Russian President Vladimir V. Putin for his impending death, was convinced he was poisoned at one of the two meetings but was not sure which, close friend Alex Goldfarb said in an interview.

"He clearly said that he knows it's one of them, but he didn't want to accuse anybody because he would hate to put a shadow on an innocent person," Goldfarb said. He works for a foundation funded by exiled Russian billionaire Boris Berezovsky, whose offices, visited by Litvinenko after his poisoning, also showed traces of polonium-210.

And another finger pointed at Russian security services. According to a Nov. 18 letter to Litvinenko from former KGB agent Mikhail Trepashkin: In 2002, Trepashkin reported a meeting with a Russian agent who spoke of "a very serious group" that would be "snuffing out everybody connected with Berezovsky and Litvinenko."

Trepashkin's letter said the agent worked for the Federal Security Service, the KGB's successor, and sought details about Litvinenko's family.

Trepashkin was the primary source for a book by Litvinenko accusing Russia's government of organizing several apartment-building explosions across Russia before the second Chechen war. A copy of his letter to Litvinenko was provided Friday to The Times by sources in Russia.

Goldfarb released a similar letter from Trepashkin, dated the day of Litvinenko's death. He called on British authorities to question Trepashkin, who is in prison in Russia on charges of revealing state secrets.

Trepashkin "names names," Goldfarb said.

The Guardian newspaper, quoting unidentified British intelligence sources, reported that London police were coming closer to the view that "rogue elements" within or formerly with the Federal Security Service probably were involved in the killing.

It said police were "closing in on" five or more men who arrived on soccer fans' flight and returned to Moscow soon after.

Prodi To Sue Over Allegations Of KGB Links (FT)

By Tony Barber

Financial Times, December 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101048

The suspicious death of a former Russian agent in London was enmeshed in alleged dirty tricks in Italian politics on Friday after Romano Prodi, Italy's prime minister, announced legal action against people linking him to the KGB, the former Soviet intelligence service.

The main person who has made this accusation, which Mr Prodi rejects as utterly unfounded, is Mario Scaramella, a self-styled expert on Soviet espionage in Italy.

Before he died on November 23 of poisoning from polonium 210, a rare radioactive substance, Litvinenko accused Vladimir Putin, Russia's president and a former KGB agent, of ordering his death. The Kremlin dismissed his charge as nonsense.

The Litvinenko affair has spilled into Italian politics because Mr Scaramella was appointed in 2003 as a consultant to a parliamentary inquiry, known as the Mitrokhin commission, which was investigating KGB activities in Italy.

The commission wound up its work before Mr Prodi's victory in Italy's general election last April. But Mr Scaramella reported to the commission's chairman in January that he had been looking into alleged links between Mr Prodi and the KGB.

He told the chairman, Paolo Guzzanti, a member of then prime minister Silvio Berlusconi's Forza Italia party, that there was no evidence Mr Prodi was a KGB agent, but that some signs pointed to "friendly relations" between Mr Prodi and the KGB.

Mr Prodi was so offended by Mr Scaramella's allegations, which appeared in the Italian press this week, that he announced on Thursday night that he planned legal action against the people behind them. He named no one in particular.

Mr Scaramella had no background as a specialist in Soviet affairs before 2003, and Massimo D'Alema, Italy's foreign minister, said on Wednesday that Mr Scaramella "has had and has no organic relationship with the Italian secret services".

Politicians in Mr Prodi's centre-left coalition suspect that one purpose of the Mitrokhin commission, which was set up under Mr Berlusconi, was to plant material to discredit the centre-left, especially ahead of the April election. Mr Berlusconi's party has ridiculed the idea of a smear campaign.

"They have tried to upset the country's democracy," said Piero Fassino, leader of the Democrats of the Left, the largest party in Mr Prodi's government. "A campaign of personal denigration and institutional destabilisation has been pursued."

Mr Prodi's camp contends that there have been other attempts to destroy his reputation. Prosecutors said in October that several members of the Italian tax police and other state employees had illegally broken into the financial records of Mr Prodi and his wife Flavia.

During Mr Berlusconi's five-year premiership, Mr Prodi was plagued by allegations – which he denied adn were never proven – that, when he was prime minister from 1996 to 1998, he took kickbacks in the purchase by Telecom Italia, the Italian telecommunications group, of a stake in Telekom Serbia, the Serbia telecoms company.

Last month Mr Prodi's government shook up Italy's espionage services by dismissing the country's three top intelligence officers.

Russia's Hidden Power Struggle (WP)

By Masha Lipman

The Washington Post, December 2, 2006

MOSCOW -- "Give the elections back to the people, bastards!" These words were emblazoned on a bright yellow banner more than 30 feet long that hung over the Moscow River facing the Kremlin. A couple of young activists positioned themselves in the ropework holding up the banner for about 30 minutes, until they were taken off and delivered to a police station.

Such extravagant political performances may be typical at, say, a Greenpeace protest but not over something that has in fact become increasingly common: a government encroachment on voting rights.

Russia is undergoing yet another round of election-rule tightening -- as usual, a product of the country's rubber-stamp legislature. The protesters see it as marking the "virtual elimination of the system of free elections" in Russia, as they said in their statement. Over the past two years, election rules have been repeatedly refashioned and readjusted so that no undesired forces or figures can slip through the process.

Meanwhile, the Kremlin has managed to obstruct the financing of unwelcome political projects. Russian businessmen, while afraid to sponsor autonomous political activity, have given generously to pro-Kremlin political groups, movements and initiatives. With the best and biggest companies increasingly coming under the Kremlin's control, pro-Kremlin political forces are assured of virtually unlimited budgets. In addition, political loyalists can draw on what's called the "administrative resource" -- a network of administrators at various levels who are eager to do the regime's bidding.

In such a political environment, election results are preordained. There is a flatness about campaigns -- a lack of enthusiasm and emotion. Which is the way the Kremlin likes it.

One of the innovations of the new election bill is a ban on creating a "negative image" of political opponents. This is one way of depriving a campaign of any meaning whatsoever, as just challenging the policies of the incumbent authorities can now be interpreted as a violation of the law.

So while there is always a constituency that dutifully turns out on Election Day to vote "as the bosses say," a great many others will choose to stay home, since they assume their vote will make no difference.

Of course, a low turnout might call into question the legitimacy of the representative branch, but apparently the Kremlin thinks it can live with this image problem. Another provision of the new bill eliminates the minimum percentage turnout requirement for an election to be valid. The ruling elite thus largely reduces its power base to the core of Soviet-style voters who accept a no-choice vote -- while alienating the more advanced and entrepreneurial elements of the population.

Essentially, the protesters hanging on the ropes with their banner over the Moscow River can do nothing about all this. A boycott of elections -- proposed in their statement as the "only real means of political struggle left in the opposition's arsenal" -- will make no sense if there is no minimum-turnout requirement. The authority of the Kremlin, on the other hand, is unconstrained.

And thus the encroachment on political rights will continue. One recent initiative has been to abolish mayoral elections. With gubernatorial elections already replaced by Kremlin appointments, this is a logical next step in the dismantling of representative democracy.

A common argument has it that President Vladimir Putin may have cracked down on freedoms and democracy and recentralized power in the Kremlin, but at least he has ensured order and stability. In fact, Putin may have "stabilized" public politics, but there's no more law or order about his regime than there was in Boris Yeltsin's "chaotic" Russia.

The political scene has been fully cleared of genuine competition, and the executive and legislative branches filled with loyalists who need not worry about public accountability. As a result, the members of this greedy bureaucracy have become a privileged circle in which they seek to amass power, which in Russia is closely linked to property and wealth. In the process, they force those with less clout to sell their lucrative properties, as happened not long ago with a Urals titanium factory. If the owner doesn't accept the deal, he can expect the tax police to "discover" huge instances of evasion, the environmental agency to reveal improper use of his lands or the prosecutor's office to begin proceedings against him. All these government agencies would be working on behalf of the powerful buyer. This is hardly law and order.

Meanwhile, the regime's loyalists are themselves engaged in a fierce struggle, especially as the crucial 2007-08 elections draw near. All are wondering what the power shifts that Putin has in mind will mean for them personally. Thus, disputes among them grow ever more intense and vicious, creating an atmosphere of rampant corruption and crime. Court rulings are commonly twisted as a result of bribery or pressure from the executive. Contract killings are used to settle scores with rivals and adversaries.

Aside from the recent high-profile assassinations, there have been the killings, in a period of less than three months, of three bankers, one of them deputy chairman of the central bank. All were slain by contract murderers. A contender for the mayoralty in a Far Eastern town was killed at the height of the election campaign. A pro-Moscow Chechen commander was shot by a group of Chechen law enforcers in broad daylight in the middle of Moscow -- in front of passersby and a group of Moscow militiamen who, according to newspaper reports, watched from across the street. None of the perpetrators was arrested.

Real competitive politics, if they were ever allowed, might be a threat to the ruling elite. Fierce infighting within the regime is a threat to the entire nation and its future.

Pope Wins Over Muslims With Nod To Mecca, Message (WT)

By John Phillips

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

ISTANBUL -- Pope Benedict XVI concluded a historic trip to the Muslim world yesterday after soothing an outraged Islamic population with his Christian message of peace and reconciliation.

The Roman Catholic pontiff wound up his triumphant four-day visit to Turkey with a parting message of good will to Muslims as Turkish clerics and commentators lauded the German-born pope for facing Mecca as he prayed alongside a top Islamic clergyman in Istanbul's Blue Mosque on Thursday.

"You know well that the church wishes to impose nothing on anyone, and that she merely asks to live in freedom," Benedict said at the Holy Spirit Cathedral in Istanbul.

In the last of several gestures aimed at healing the rift with the Orthodox Church -- the original theme of a trip that was overshadowed by Muslim rage -- the pope was joined in the church by Patriarch Bartholomew I.

Benedict looked pleased as he entered the cathedral after doing much to repair the uproar he started two months ago by criticizing Islam in a speech in Germany.

DOJ_NMG_0101050

The grand mufti of Istanbul, Mustafa Cagrici, who prayed side by side with the pope at the mosque on Thursday, said Benedict had faced Mecca while praying, like a Muslim would.

"These were very nice gestures," he told NTV television. "I allocated 30, 40 seconds for [the prayer]. I finished my prayer. But the pope must have been so overcome that he took much longer."

The Turkish daily Askam agreed. "The pope's dreaded visit was concluded with a wonderful surprise," it reported.

The mass-circulation Hurriyet newspaper joined in the chorus of approval. "He turned toward Mecca and prayed like Muslims," said the daily, which dubbed Benedict "the congenial pope."

Vatican officials described the stop at the massive mosque, one of the main tourist attractions in Istanbul, as a vital moment of reconciliation.

Throughout his trip, however, the pope also gently stressed Rome's concept of reciprocity in which respect for Muslims in the West warrants respect for religious minorities such as Christians and Jews in majority Muslim lands, including the beleaguered community of 90,000 Christians in Turkey.

"Your communities walk the humble path of daily companionship with those who do not share our faith," the pope told the congregation filling a 160-year-old cathedral that contains the relics of a 1st-century Christian martyr.

Strengthening Christian bonds should be "at the forefront," Benedict told the throng.

"I would compare the pope's visit to the mosque to Pope John Paul's gesture at the Western Wall [in Jerusalem], said Cardinal Roger Etchegaray, the veteran French Vatican diplomat who frequently is a trouble-shooter for the Holy See in the Middle East.

In his last moments in Turkey, the 79-year-old pope walked down a red carpet before boarding a special Turkish Airlines jetliner to Rome.

"I hope this visit contributes to peace and dialogue between faiths," Benedict told the governor of Istanbul, Muammer Guler, at Istanbul's international airport.

Pope Ends Visit Of Conciliation (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 2, 2006

Even his critics give praise for the pontiff's outreach to Muslims in Turkey.

ISTANBUL, TURKEY — Just as the Bible speaks of converting swords into plowshares, Pope Benedict XVI has used his extraordinary pilgrimage to Turkey this week to transform outrage over provocative remarks he made about Islam into an emerging image of conciliation and outreach.

His efforts have been hailed by many here and could have crucial influence on the future of the troubled relations between Islam and Christianity.

During his four-day visit, which ended Friday, the pope faced Mecca and prayed shoulder to shoulder with an Islamic cleric in Turkey's most important mosque. He shook the hand of one of his sternest Muslim critics. He even hoisted a Turkish flag bearing the Islamic symbol of a crescent moon.

By most accounts, Benedict was successful in winning over begrudging hearts and minds in the Islamic world.

It was, as one Italian commentator put it, the theological Benedict replaced by the diplomatic Benedict, an infrequently seen facet of this complex and deeply intellectual pope.

"People here were worried about the message he would give, what he would say about Islam and whether he would show respect," said Mustafa Akyol, a Turkish writer who specializes in interfaith issues and who considers himself a devout Muslim. "He did way better than expected. This was very fruitful for him."

Turkish newspapers, some of which had harshly criticized the pope just days earlier, on Friday gave generally positive coverage to the pontiff's visit to the majestic 17th century Blue Mosque. A photograph of him praying silently Thursday alongside the grand mufti of Istanbul dominated almost every front page.

"The whole world watched this historic moment," the centrist Milliyet newspaper said. "Sympathetic pope … continued to surprise the world," declared the top-selling Hurriyet daily.

Cardinal Roger Etchegaray, who accompanied the pope and is a recognized expert in diplomacy, compared Benedict's gesture at the mosque to the historic moment in 2000 when his predecessor, Pope John Paul II, stood and prayed at the Western Wall in Jerusalem.

At the stone wall that is among Judaism's holiest sites, John Paul wrote a note seeking forgiveness for centuries of abuse of Jews by Catholics, in what became a seminal act signaling a new era in the Roman Catholic Church's relationship with its predecessor faith.

"These are two very important symbolic moments," Etchegaray said Friday. "Benedict XVI did with the Muslims yesterday what John Paul II did with the Jews."

It was a speech that Benedict gave in September that ended up setting the agenda for his first trip to a predominantly Muslim country. In that speech in Regensburg, Germany, Benedict linked Islam to violence and quoted a Byzantine emperor who saw only evil in the faith founded by the prophet Muhammad.

The remarks enraged the Muslim world and threatened to destroy bridges built during the 26-year papacy of John Paul.

Father Federico Lombardi, the Vatican's chief spokesman, has maintained the hope that the silver lining of the uproar would be the opening of a frank and sincere dialogue between the largest Christian faith and Islam. As the Turkey trip ended, he said he believed that process had been launched.

"I think we have moved beyond Regensburg, and, in a way, Regensburg has borne positive fruit," Lombardi said.

The pope, as he departed Istanbul for the flight home to Rome, told the regional governor who saw him off that he hoped his visit would bring the religions closer together.

"As a pastor of the Catholic Church, I think it is my duty to contribute to the understanding and dialogue among cultures and religions," he said.

The praise for Benedict was by no means universal.

Nationalist Turks found fault, especially with his overtures to Turkey's Christian minorities. He engaged in hours of prayer and celebration with Patriarch Bartholomew I, the titular head of the world's 250 million Orthodox Christians. He saluted him as the "ecumenical patriarch," a term loathed by Turks because it suggests authority elevated beyond the Turkish state.

Additional criticism came from the Christian side of the aisle, with some suggesting that, in his eagerness to appease the Muslims, the pope failed to adequately lobby on behalf of the beleaguered Christian community.

But if the Christians whom the pope came to support felt slighted, most did not indicate it.

Bartholomew, a sprightly man with a bushy white beard, expressed satisfaction with the pope's visit. He combined a little Italian and English to say he was "happisimo" — "very happy" with the pope's presence.

"He brought the attention of the world on the problems we suffer," said Anthony Limberakis, national commander of the Order of St. Andrew, one of numerous Greek-American delegations in Istanbul to support their religious brethren.

Benedict made a final gentle plea on behalf of Christians during the Mass he said Friday at the Catholic Holy Spirit Cathedral.

He noted that the Christian minorities in Turkey "walk the humble path of daily companionship with those who do not share our faith" but who belong to the brotherhood of monotheistic descendants of Abraham.

"You know well that the church wishes to impose nothing on anyone, and that she merely asks to live in freedom, in order to reveal the one whom she cannot hide, Christ Jesus," he said.

Another important gesture that won favor for Benedict was the softening of his opposition to Turkey's long-sought membership in the European Union.

In a reversal of sorts, the pope told Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan that he would support EU membership for Turkey. He previously had maintained that Turkey, as a Muslim nation, was "in permanent contrast" with Europe and did not belong.

Some Turkish commentators said they thought Benedict backtracked toward the end of his visit when he spoke of the need to preserve Europe's Christian roots. But another reading of those comments suggests that he was stating the conditions under which Turkey could join the EU, conditions such as respect for religious freedom that the EU itself is demanding.

Turkey Holds Firm On Foreign Policy (WT)

By Andrew Borowiec

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

NICOSIA, Cyprus -- The Turkish government this week tried to minimize the impact of the European Union's threat to partially freeze accession talks, saying its foreign policy remained unchanged.

The watchword in Ankara's official circles is "continuation in the same direction," said a senior official, who rejected EU insistence that Turkey must open its airports and harbors to traffic from Cyprus.

In Cyprus, the Greek Cypriot government said the bloc was giving Turkey too much leeway, thus damaging efforts to find a solution to the Mediterranean island's partition.

Despite the EU threat to freeze eight key aspects of the accession talks, Turkish officials said the Greek Cypriot air and maritime traffic would be allowed only after an economic boycott of the Turkish Cypriot zone in the north of the island is lifted.

On Wednesday, the European Commission, the EU executive body, rejected Turkey's condition, stressing that all candidates for membership in the 25-nation bloc must conform to its rules.

"It's Turkey, which should adjust to EU regulations, and not vice versa," an EU official said, stressing that Turkey was a signatory to the protocol governing trade relations with the 10 latest EU members, including Cyprus.

EU officials said the proposed halt in discussions of eight of the 35 "accession chapters" would be applied only after approval at the EU summit meeting in mid-December. Some EU heads of government, including British Prime Minister Tony Blair, say the bloc should refrain from "sending a negative signal" to Turkey, a predominantly Muslim nation of 70 million.

Nonetheless, the EU Commission's recommendation was a significant warning and a blow to Turkey's ambition to join what some in the Turkish press call "the Christian Europe." EU membership is the cornerstone of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan's foreign policy.

The Turkish press was comforted by a statement attributed to visiting Pope Benedict XVI saying he "encourages the passage of dialogue for inserting Turkey in the EU, on the basis of specific common values." The pontiff, earlier this year, opposed Turkey's EU membership.

Meanwhile, Greek Cypriot officials and politicians described the European Commission's warning as inadequate, saying it reduced the pressure on Turkey and consequently prolonged the long-lasting political stalemate on the island.

"We disagree and we insist that the EU should send a clear message to Turkey that it can't ignore its obligations under EU law," said Andros Kyprianou, spokesman for the Progressive Party of Working People, the dominant communist party known by its acronym AKEL.

Government spokesman Christodoulos Pashiardis described the EU action as the "ratification of the ease that only Turkey enjoys by not fulfilling its obligations."

Since the beginning of its EU negotiations a year ago, Turkey has been warning that there is no question of compromise in its attitude toward Cyprus, where Ankara maintains an expeditionary force and backs a separate government of the Turkish Cypriots.

U.S. Proposing Regional Force To Monitor Somalia Violence (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 1 — The United States circulated a draft resolution on Somalia on Friday, urging a regional peacekeeping force to monitor a struggle for control between the country's embattled government and its powerful Islamist foes, and calling for a partial lifting of an arms embargo to enable the equipping of local security units.

The 8,000-member force would come from seven East African nations but not from neighboring states of Kenya, Djibouti and Ethiopia. This restriction was added out of concern that the proposed United Nations move, aimed at calming tensions, might end up provoking wider hostilities.

The International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based study group with expertise in the area, raised alarm this week by predicting that deploying a force, particularly one that included soldiers from neighboring countries, "could trigger all-out war in Somalia and destablize the entire Horn of Africa region."

John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, expressed annoyance with this view. "You know, people criticize us when we take action on the ground, that our taking action makes the situation worse," he said. "O.K., so what is the answer, not to take action?"

He said, "What we want to do is endorse the insertion of the regional peacekeeping force, which many of the African states have called for, in order to provide some measure of stability there to permit a political solution."

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew the president and then turned on each other.

The interim government, formed two years ago and supported by the United Nations, controls only Baidoa, the provincial town where it is headquartered, while the Islamic alliance, known as the Union of Islamic Courts, has taken over Mogadishu, the capital, and increased its grip on the rest of the country.

Ethiopia supports the interim government and has sent troops into the country. Washington earlier backed a coalition of warlords to try to combat the Islamists, who the United States believed harbored terrorists.

The draft urged the Islamists to "cease any further military expansion and reject those with an extremist agenda or links with international terrorism." It noted the Security Council's willingness "to engage with all parties in Somalia, including the Union of Islamic Courts, if they are committed to achieving a political settlement through peaceful and inclusive dialogue."

There is fear that Ethiopia and Eritrea, which are in a tense faceoff over their disputed border, are fighting a proxy war in Somalia. Eritrea also would most likely be barred from participating in the peacekeeping force under the resolution.

The United Nations arms embargo on Somalia, which has been notoriously porous, began in 1992.

Mr. Bolton said that the text would be circulated to various capitals over the weekend, and that he hoped that reactions could start to be incorporated into the document at drafters' meetings beginning Monday. "And then we'll proceed as rapidly as we can after that," he said.

U.S. Calls For Regional Somalia Force (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 2, 2006

The United States circulated a U.N. Security Council draft resolution Friday that would authorize a regional force to protect Somalia's weak government and threaten Security Council action against those who block peace efforts and attempt to overthrow it.

The draft, obtained by The Associated Press, would lift a 1992 arms embargo against Somalia so that troops in the "protection and training mission" could be militarily equipped.

It would ban Somalia's neighbors from sending soldiers — a demand by a seven-nation East African group expected to contribute soldiers to the force, as well as European members of the Security Council who want to ensure the force's aim is to promote peace.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said he expects Security Council experts to discuss the draft on Monday "and then we'll proceed as rapidly as we can after that."

The move comes after a veiled woman and two other suicide bombers exploded cars Thursday outside the western Somali town of Baidoa, the only area under the government's control. Ten people were killed in the attack.

No one claimed responsibility for the attack but the government blamed the Islamic movement vying for control of the country. The Islamic group denied any involvement.

Police questioned six suspects Friday, but declined to provide details about them.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and then turned on one another. A government was formed with the help of the U.N. two years ago, but has struggled to assert its authority. Islamic militants, meanwhile, have been rising up since June and now control the capital and most of the country's south.

A confidential U.N. report obtained recently by the AP said 6,000 to 8,000 Ethiopian troops were in Somalia or along the border, supporting the transitional government. It also said 2,000 soldiers from Eritrea were inside Somalia, supporting the Islamic militia.

There are fears that Somalia could become a proxy battleground for Ethiopia and Eritrea, which fought a border war in 1998-2000. Eritrea denies having any troops in Somalia, while Ethiopia insists it has sent only a few hundred advisers.

There was no mention of troops already in Somalia in the U.S. draft resolution.

The draft resolution emphasizes the council's "willingness to engage with all parties in Somalia, including the Islamic courts movement, if they are committed to achieving a political settlement through peaceful and inclusive dialogue."

The regional force would protect the U.N.-backed transitional government and train some of the local forces. Council diplomats said the seven-nation East African group envisions a force of eight battalions, each with 700 to 800 troops, but only two would be deployed in the first phase.

"It's very limited," said Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry. "The situation in Somalia ... remains very difficult and complex, and there isn't a simple solution, and there certainly isn't a massive imposed military solution from outside."

Bolton said Somalia's stability is in "grave peril" because of the pressure being placed on the government by the Islamic movement.

"What we want to do is introduce this regional peacekeeping force ... in order to provide some measure of stability there to permit a political solution," he said.

The goal is to eventually persuade the Islamists that a military victory is impossible, thus creating conditions for a negotiated settlement between the two sides, council diplomats said, speaking on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly.

In the draft, the council said it would consider taking measures "against those that seek to prevent or block a peaceful dialogue process, overthrow the transitional federal institutions by force, or take action that further threatens regional stability."

The U.S. did not specify what measures might be considered but the resolution was drafted under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which deals with threats to international peace and security and authorizes a range of measures from breaking diplomatic and trade relations to military intervention.

Bolton circulated the resolution two days after the Security Council adopted a resolution asking Secretary-General Kofi Annan to re-establish a monitoring group to investigate violations of the arms embargo for a six-month period.

A report earlier this month by the last monitoring group accused 10 countries of providing weapons, money and training to rival sides in Somalia. Many of those named denied any involvement and complained about being on the list.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Three-month Roundup Nets 136 Terror Suspects (WT/AFP)

By Suleiman Nimr

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia -- The government yesterday announced the arrest of 136 suspected al Qaeda terrorists over the past three months in one of the largest crackdowns since it began battling Islamist extremists.

The Interior Ministry said the suspects, most of them Saudis, were rounded up during a series of raids across the vast oil-rich kingdom, where al Qaeda militants waged a series of shootings and bombings in May 2003, many targeting Westerners.

Those detained were 115 Saudis and 21 foreigners, and included a cell that had been plotting a suicide bombing, abductions and killings, the ministry said in a statement carried by the official SPA news agency.

That cell consisted of 31 suspects, including four foreign residents, who were detained during a "pre-emptive" security operation in Riyadh on Sept. 12, the ministry said.

The cell had been "on the verge of acting, after issuing fatwas legitimizing the abduction of innocent people, bargaining over them, killing them and raiding [shops] and banks," the ministry said.

"They included one [suspect] who wrote his will, to be publicized after he has carried out a suicide operation targeting innocent people and the nation's resources," the ministry said.

Another 44 Saudis were detained Oct. 26 in a series of simultaneous security operations in Riyadh, the oil-rich Eastern Province and the northern regions of Al-Qassim and Hail, the ministry said.

Six more Saudis had been detained earlier in October in the northern Al-Jawf region, near the borders with Iraq and Jordan, for forming a cell that "used their families to hide wanted [militants] and smuggle them outside" the country, the ministry said.

Other swoops netted a group of 16 suspects, including two foreigners, who were linked to outside "go-betweens" with the purpose of training militants abroad and sending them back to operate inside the kingdom, the ministry said.

Saudi Arabia announced in February it had thwarted a bid to blow up an oil processing plant, the world's largest, at Abqaiq in the Eastern Province.

Western coalition forces said in October they feared possible attacks on oil installations in Saudi Arabia and other Gulf countries.

The Saudi Interior Ministry said security forces seized "weapons, money in various currencies, documents," and communications and electronic equipment during the raids.

It did not specify the nationalities of the foreigners detained.

Saudis Arrest 139 "Sleeper Cell" Suspects (CNN)

CNN.com, December 2, 2006

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia (CNN) -- Saudi security officials said Saturday they foiled a planned terrorist suicide attack and arrested 139 suspected Islamist militants who were in "sleeper cells" believed to be affiliated with al Qaeda.

A senior official in the Saudi Interior Ministry told CNN that the suspects, who are from several Arab nations, were monitored by Saudi security agents for several months. They rounded the men up just before the expected attack was launched.

The suspects, arrested in different areas of Saudi Arabia, were being interrogated Saturday, the official said.

In October 2005, King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia called the threat of al Qaeda in his country "madness and evil" and vowed to "eliminate this scourge" of terrorism. Fifteen of the 19 al Qaeda terrorists participating in the September 11, 2001, attacks were Saudis.

There has been a series of deadly bombings in Saudi Arabia since then, including Western targets, further aligning the Saudi government with the United States in the war against terror.

In 2003, suicide bombings at residential compounds housing Westerners in Riyadh killed 23 people, and a car bombing in a mostly Arab neighborhood near Riyadh's diplomatic quarter killed at least 17. Both attacks were blamed on al Qaeda.

In December 2004 a Saudi-based al Qaeda group claimed responsibility for an armed raid on the U.S. consulate in Jeddah that left nine people dead.

Last year Saudi security forces, carrying out raids targeting suspected al Qaeda members, killed a man in Medina they said was the leader of al Qaeda on the Arab Peninsula.

"Militants" Held In Saudi Arabia (BBC)

BBC.com, December 2, 2006

The Saudi authorities say they have detained 136 suspected militants, including a potential suicide bomber.

The arrests were made over the past few months in several cities, and those held include members of al-Qaeda-type cells, the interior ministry said.

A ministry spokesman told the BBC that 115 of the suspects were Saudi nationals - the rest were foreigners.

They are accused of planning to bring down the Saudi royal family and attack Western targets.

Militants began a campaign in Saudi Arabia in 2003 with attacks on Western housing compounds.

However violence has declined in recent years in the face of tough security measures.

The only known attempted operation by Islamic militants this year was a foiled attack against the country's largest and most important oil facility.

Religious decrees

The interior ministry spokesman, General Mansoor al-Turki, said some of the militant groups had been about to carry out attacks in Saudi Arabia while others were still in the preparatory stages.

He said the authorities had withheld the announcement of the arrests until all the suspects had been rounded up.

"We're talking about eight different cells that were caught all over the kingdom, in almost all areas," Mr Turki told the BBC.

Some of those arrested were recruiting others to fight in "unstable countries", he added.

Others were allegedly recruiting militants to be trained abroad and then sent back to Saudi Arabia to carry out attacks.

The War On Terror, Under New Scrutiny (NYT)

By James Risen

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

IN the frantic first few months after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the Bush administration created what amounted to a new secret side of the government, based on an expansive view of the president's authority to wage the war on terror. From secret C.I.A. prisons and harsh interrogation tactics overseas to warrantless eavesdropping at home, the new counterterror structure was established with little Congressional oversight or legal scrutiny.

For several years after 9/11, President Bush was given broad latitude by the legislative and judicial branches to fight terrorism as he saw fit. But 2006 has seen the American government's system of checks and balances slowly clicking back into place, forcing the Bush White House to confront new limits and more scrutiny.

A series of developments last week reflected that changed reality. The Justice Department inspector general's office announced that it had begun an internal investigation into the department's role in the National Security Agency's domestic spying program, after the administration agreed to give the office's staff the necessary security clearances.

Separately, the federal government agreed to pay $2 million to a settle a lawsuit brought by an Oregon lawyer wrongly arrested after the F.B.I. mistakenly linked him to the 2004 Madrid train bombings based on a faulty fingerprint match.

In a third case, a German man abducted in 2003 and held in a C.I.A. secret prison in Afghanistan urged a federal appeals court to allow him to pursue a lawsuit against the United States that had been dismissed for national security reasons. He then went to Washington to meet with Congressional aides about his case.

DOJ_NMG_0101061

Those actions followed much more consequential changes in the legal and political landscape this year. The Supreme Court set the tone in June, with its landmark ruling in the case of Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which struck at the heart of President Bush's assertion of executive power to wage the war on terror.

The court repudiated the president's plan to put detainees at Guantánamo Bay on trial before military commissions, ruling that the panels were unauthorized by federal statute and violated international law.

The ruling forced Congress to set up a system of military commissions, with lawmakers agreeing with the president that evidence could be withheld from terror suspects in some instances, and detainees could be barred from going to court to challenge their confinement.

But the Hamdan ruling also raised questions about the legality of other counterterrorism programs. Two months after the decision, a federal judge in Detroit ruled that the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping was unconstitutional, rejecting among other arguments that the president's constitutional authority allowed the program. The ruling set the stage for what seems likely to be a prolonged legal battle.

The impact of the Hamdan ruling was followed by the political impact of last month's Democratic electoral victory. With both the House and Senate now under Democratic control, greater Congressional oversight of the war on terror seems certain, a climate that the administration says will hamper its efforts to protect national security.

"The administration probably feels like it is under attack on all fronts, but I think it is just the fact that the checks and balances in our democracy are beginning to reassert themselves," said Jeffrey Smith, former general counsel of the Central Intelligence Agency and now a Washington lawyer.

"The president was probably correct in the days after 9/11 when he saw that the laws on the books were inadequate to deal with the threat we faced," Mr. Smith added. "But he was very wrong to thus conclude that he could act as he saw fit. The failure to get legal authority meant that he didn't have the legal basis and public support to make these programs sustainable legally and politically."

Suzanne Spaulding, a former Congressional intelligence staffer and now a Washington lawyer, said she believed that the midterm elections and the Hamdan decision have substantially changed the climate in Washington for the war on terror.

"I think the ability of the Justice Department inspector general to get clearances to investigate the N.S.A. program may very well reflect the administration's responses to the changes on the Hill," Ms. Spaulding said.

"And the judiciary is not always impervious to the mood of the country. At the same time, it does have a trickle-down effect when the Supreme Court expresses its opinion."

Representative Jane Harman, the moderate California Democrat who just lost her bid to become chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, told a Washington conference of experts on national security law on Friday that President Bush missed opportunities to establish a stronger basis for the war on terror by refusing to work with Congress and the courts early on.

"When faced with difficult questions of executive authority, the response of the president has been to claim that the Constitution allows exactly what his office of legal counsel says it does," Ms. Harman said. "This just isn't a good way to run a country."

The Bush administration, meanwhile, continues to assert that it has operated legally, has broad authority to wage the war on terror, and will continue to use that authority to protect Americans.

Desperate Guantanamo Detainees Turn To Each Other For Legal Help (AP)

By John Heilprin

AP, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Like more than a hundred enemy combatants held without charges at the Navy's Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, Hamid Al Razak of Afghanistan turned to a fellow prisoner for legal help.

His bid for help unleashed a federal judge's condemnation of the U.S. government's detention policies.

Dozens more held at Guantanamo, cut off from the outside world and lacking English language skills or any knowledge of the justice system, are still seeking representation from other detainees -- who are either free now or have access to an attorney.

"It is often said that 'justice delayed is justice denied.' Nothing could be closer to the truth with reference to the Guantanamo Bay cases," U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler of Washington D.C. wrote in a ruling Friday, spurning the Pentagon's attempt to deny Bisher Al Rawi, another Afghan man held at Guantanamo, from representing his friend Al Razak.

Al Rawi would represent his friend with the help of the Center for Constitutional Rights, which has aided several hundred Guantanamo detainees, and New York lawyer Alan Sussman.

Al Razak's legal filings say he is not a member of the Taliban, al-Qaida or any terrorist group, but has been kept in isolation, repeatedly interrogated and severely beaten, put in cages without privacy, shackled with heavy chains and irons, exposed to extreme temperatures, sexually humiliated and subjected to violent behavior and psychological abuse.

Kessler wrote that Al Razak has been cut off from family, friends and indeed all of the outside world for more than three years, can't speak English, doesn't know the criminal justice system, lacks access to a law library, and has no criminal charges filed against him.

"He has every reason to distrust his captors and keepers. He has every reason to rely on the friendship of other detainees, who speak his language and suffer the same disabilities. He has every reason to challenge his detainment," Kessler wrote. "He cannot communicate with his attorney, nor does he even know at present that he has an attorney. He has no expectation of release, ever."

The Bush administration has argued that it has made numerous efforts to make lawyers available and that more than 200 of the detainees have filed a petition that allows a civilian judge to consider their cases.

A Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey D. Gordon, on Saturday defended the detention policies at Guantanamo and said multiple reviews have been conducted for each of the people held there. More than 400 detainees remain at Guantanamo; several hundred were allowed to leave the prison for other countries, according to the Pentagon.

Gordon said that "humane treatment is the standard" at Guantanamo, which represents the culmination of a major undertaking to pick up hundreds of military combatants found in Afghanistan or trying to flee into Pakistan, among other places. A U.S. Army colonel is investigating allegations of prisoner abuse at Guantanamo Bay.

"Now they're going to face justice," said Gordon, who lacked an explanation for why the Pentagon had sought to block the dozens of prisoners from being represented from fellow detainees whom they considered friends.

Not so, according to Kessler, who wrote that just because "some of the unfortunate petitioners who have been detained for many years in the terrible conditions at Guantanamo Bay" were able to file a writ of habeus corpus doesn't show that Al Razak should have been able to do it for himself.

William Goodman, legal director for the center, said the judge's insights are universal for all the detainees, particularly those like Al Razak who need a friend to represent them.

"Many of these people are isolated, they do not know English, they do not know the Western legal system and they are intentionally kept in the dark by the Department of Defense," Goodman said. "There are probably well over 100 who have been in his situation, who have to clear this hurdle."

Warrantless Surveillance Issue Demands Scrutiny (CCCT)

Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times, December 3, 2006

The Bush administration's warrantless domestic surveillance program came to light a year ago this December. The president had authorized what was then a secret program that allowed the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on calls and e-mails between the United States and foreign countries.

Since then, President Bush has strongly defended the program, saying that the nation's security depends on allowing government agents to tap phone calls or troll for information relating to terrorism.

But many legal experts believe the president's program violates the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, enacted in 1978 to regulate domestic wiretapping. Under this act, the NSA must obtain warrants from a judicial panel before it can engage in wiretap operations.

The 11-member FISA court has approved thousands of wiretap operations, often retroactively. But this court's actions are geared toward specific cases. The spying authorized by the president apparently involves "trolling" for data by listening in on thousands or hundreds of thousands of phone calls and e-mail communications. This involves super computers programmed to search the data base for patterns of information, which makes it difficult to seek FISA court approval.

Critics of President Bush's action said that even if the broader surveillance program could be justified in this post-9/11 world, the president erred by not asking Congress to change the FISA law to make the operation legal and constitutional.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor ruled in August that the NSA program is in violation of both statutory and constitutional law. After Taylor's decision, the House passed a measure to overhaul the rules to allow wiretaps without warrants. In the Senate, Arlen Specter drafted legislation to allow the program to continue with legal review. Such efforts to codify the program are considered dead following the November elections.

This week, the Justice Department's inspector general said he will conduct an investigation to determine how the information obtained by the wiretap program has been used. He will also look at compliance with the FISA law.

The 110th Congress, soon after it takes office in January, must deal with this issue. If the Bush White House is right that new tools are needed to permit "data mining" to fight the war on terrorism, then those tools should be incorporated into law, with judicial oversight to protect the rights of American citizens.

If the NSA wiretap program violates the law, as Judge Taylor ruled, then Congress has the authority to direct the president to curtail it until legal oversight is provided. The FISA framework would simply need to be reworked. Oversight of U.S. intelligence operations is a responsibility of Congress. It must act to 1) protect our national security and, 2) protect Americans' constitutional liberties. Neither of these should trump the other.

Better Signs On Wiretaps (TENN)

Nashville Tennessean, December 3, 2006

A decision by the inspector general of the Justice Department to look into the controversial wiretapping program used in the war on terror could restore some public trust, although the scope of the probe is limited.

Inspector General Glenn Fine says investigators will look into how Justice used information gathered from the wiretapping at the National Security Agency.

Fine had previously said no to a review, claiming the role should fall to the department's Office of Professional Responsibility. President Bush did not allow security clearance for investigators from that office.

Concerns were raised when word got out that the NSA was monitoring phone calls between people in the U.S. and other countries without court oversight. The news drew criticism from civil liberties groups. It did not build trust when the Bush administration reacted so strongly that even the existence of the program had become known to the public.

It is important to note that the Justice probe will not deal specifically with whether the NSA program breaks the law or violates the Constitution, but it was also notable recently that members of a special board appointed to examine privacy concerns expressed satisfaction with the way eavesdropping had been conducted.

The developments do suggest that a greater measure of accountability is in store.

The administration may find that with a reasonable amount of disclosure, more Americans will feel comfortable with the techniques being used. But anytime programs are cloaked in secrecy, they invite the very sort of skepticism and scrutiny the program has received. •

Rumsfeld's Memo Of Options For Iraq War (NYT)

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

Following is the text of a classified Nov. 6 memorandum that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld sent to the White House suggesting new options in Iraq. The memorandum was sent one day before the midterm Congressional elections and two days before Mr. Rumsfeld resigned.

Nov. 6, 2006

SUBJECT: Iraq — Illustrative New Courses of Action

DOJ_NMG_0101064

The situation in Iraq has been evolving, and U.S. forces have adjusted, over time, from major combat operations to counterterrorism, to counterinsurgency, to dealing with death squads and sectarian violence. In my view it is time for a major adjustment. Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough. Following is a range of options:

ILLUSTRATIVE OPTIONS

Above the Line: (Many of these options could and, in a number of cases, should be done in combination with others)

¶Publicly announce a set of benchmarks agreed to by the Iraqi Government and the U.S. — political, economic and security goals — to chart a path ahead for the Iraqi government and Iraqi people (to get them moving) and for the U.S. public (to reassure them that progress can and is being made).

¶Significantly increase U.S. trainers and embeds, and transfer more U.S. equipment to Iraqi Security forces (ISF), to further accelerate their capabilities by refocusing the assignment of some significant portion of the U.S. troops currently in Iraq.

¶Initiate a reverse embeds program, like the Korean Katusas, by putting one or more Iraqi soldiers with every U.S. and possibly Coalition squad, to improve our units' language capabilities and cultural awareness and to give the Iraqis experience and training with professional U.S. troops.

¶Aggressively beef up the Iraqi MOD and MOI, and other Iraqi ministries critical to the success of the ISF — the Iraqi Ministries of Finance, Planning, Health, Criminal Justice, Prisons, etc. — by reaching out to U.S. military retirees and Reserve/National Guard volunteers (i.e., give up on trying to get other USG Departments to do it.)

¶Conduct an accelerated draw-down of U.S. bases. We have already reduced from 110 to 55 bases. Plan to get down to 10 to 15 bases by April 2007, and to 5 bases by July 2007.

¶Retain high-end SOF capability and necessary support structure to target Al Qaeda, death squads, and Iranians in Iraq, while drawing down all other Coalition forces, except those necessary to provide certain key enablers for the ISF.

¶Initiate an approach where U.S. forces provide security only for those provinces or cities that openly request U.S. help and that actively cooperate, with the stipulation being that unless they cooperate fully, U.S. forces would leave their province.

¶Stop rewarding bad behavior, as was done in Fallujah when they pushed in reconstruction funds, and start rewarding good behavior. Put our reconstruction efforts in those parts of Iraq that are behaving, and invest and create havens of opportunity to reward them for their good behavior. As the old saying goes, "If you want more of something, reward it; if you want less of something, penalize it." No more reconstruction assistance in areas where there is violence.

¶Position substantial U.S. forces near the Iranian and Syrian borders to reduce infiltration and, importantly, reduce Iranian influence on the Iraqi Government.

¶Withdraw U.S. forces from vulnerable positions — cities, patrolling, etc. — and move U.S. forces to a Quick Reaction Force (QRF) status, operating from within Iraq and Kuwait, to be available when Iraqi security forces need assistance.

¶Begin modest withdrawals of U.S. and Coalition forces (start "taking our hand off the bicycle seat"), so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country.

¶Provide money to key political and religious leaders (as Saddam Hussein did), to get them to help us get through this difficult period.

¶Initiate a massive program for unemployed youth. It would have to be run by U.S. forces, since no other organization could do it.

¶Announce that whatever new approach the U.S. decides on, the U.S. is doing so on a trial basis. This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not "lose."

¶Recast the U.S. military mission and the U.S. goals (how we talk about them) — go minimalist.

Below the Line (less attractive options):

¶Continue on the current path.

¶Move a large fraction of all U.S. Forces into Baghdad to attempt to control it.

¶Increase Brigade Combat Teams and U.S. forces in Iraq substantially.

¶Set a firm withdrawal date to leave. Declare that with Saddam gone and Iraq a sovereign nation, the Iraqi people can govern themselves. Tell Iran and Syria to stay out.

DOJ_NMG_0101065

¶Assist in accelerating an aggressive federalism plan, moving towards three separate states — Sunni, Shia, and Kurd.

¶Try a Dayton-like process.

Rumsfeld Memo On Iraq Proposed "Major" Change (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon, David S. Cloud

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 2 — Two days before he resigned as defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld submitted a classified memo to the White House that acknowledged that the Bush administration's strategy in Iraq was not working and called for a major course correction.

"In my view it is time for a major adjustment," wrote Mr. Rumsfeld, who has been a symbol of a dogged stay-the-course policy. "Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough."

Nor did Mr. Rumsfeld seem confident that the administration would readily develop an effective alternative. To limit the political fallout from shifting course, he suggested the administration consider a campaign to lower public expectations.

"Announce that whatever new approach the U.S. decides on, the U.S. is doing so on a trial basis," he wrote. "This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not 'lose.' "

"Recast the U.S. military mission and the U.S. goals (how we talk about them) — go minimalist," he added. The memo suggests frustration with the pace of turning over responsibility to the Iraqi authorities; in fact, the memo calls for examination of ideas that roughly parallel troop withdrawal proposals presented by some of the White House's sharpest Democratic critics. [Text, Page 28.]

The memo's discussion of possible troop reduction options offers a counterpoint to Mr. Rumsfeld's frequent public suggestions that discussions about force levels are driven by requests from American military commanders.

It also puts on the table several ideas for troop redeployments or withdrawals, even as there have been recent pronouncements from American commanders emphasizing the need to maintain troop levels for the time being.

The memorandum sometimes has a finger-wagging tone, as Mr. Rumsfeld says that the Iraqis must "pull up their socks," and suggests that reconstruction aid should be withheld in violent areas to avoid rewarding "bad behavior."

Other options called for shrinking the number of bases, establishing benchmarks that would mark the Iraqis' progress toward political, economic and security goals and conducting a "reverse embeds" program to attach Iraqi soldiers to American squads.

The memo was finished one day after President Bush interviewed Robert M. Gates, the president of Texas A&M University, as a potential successor to Mr. Rumsfeld and one day before the midterm elections. By then it was clear that the Republicans appeared likely to suffer a setback at the polls and that the administration was poised to begin reconsidering its Iraq strategy.

The memo provides no indication that Mr. Rumsfeld intended to leave his Pentagon post. It is unclear whether he knew at that point that he was about to be replaced, though the White House has said that Mr. Bush and Mr. Rumsfeld had a number of conversations on the matter.

Told that The New York Times had obtained a copy of it, a Pentagon spokesman, Eric Ruff, confirmed its authenticity. "As it became clear that people were considering options for the way forward, the secretary had some views on the subject, and this memo reflects those views," he said.

At the Pentagon, Mr. Rumsfeld has been famous for his "snowflakes" — memos that drift down to the bureaucracy from on high and that are used to ask questions, stimulate debate and shape policy. Mr. Rumsfeld's Nov. 6 memorandum, circulated as part of the administration's review of Iraq policy, is written in that spirit and with the same blunt aphorisms that Mr. Rumsfeld frequently uses in public.

Unlike the lawyerly memo on Iraq policy submitted Nov. 8 by Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, Mr. Rumsfeld's listed more than a dozen "illustrative options" that the defense secretary did not endorse, but suggested merited serious consideration. "Many of these options could, and in a number of cases, should be done in combination with others," Mr. Rumsfeld advised.

With Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation, the options no longer have the same weight. In recent weeks, some have been discarded as the Bush administration tries to adjust its military and political strategy in Iraq. But others, like increasing the number of advisers attached to Iraqi forces, live on and have also been recommended by others.

Mr. Rumsfeld, who has presided over two wars and is one of the longest-serving Pentagon chiefs, is scheduled to leave when his designated successor, Mr. Gates, is confirmed by the Senate, expected later this month.

Titled "Iraq — Illustrative New Courses of Action," the memo reflects mounting concern over a war that, as Mr. Rumsfeld put it, has evolved from "major combat operations to counterterrorism, to counterinsurgency, to dealing with death squads and sectarian violence."

The first section of the memo contains two pages of options that Mr. Rumsfeld describes as "above the line" ideas worthy of consideration. Some that Mr. Rumsfeld found intriguing appear to reflect his long-held view that the United States should use relatively modest force in intervening in foreign countries to avoid creating a dependency on American power. That approach, critics have charged, left the United States unprepared to deal with the chaos that followed the ouster of Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Rumsfeld has frequently emphasized the difficulty of stabilizing Iraq and the need to turn over responsibility to Iraqi authorities as quickly as possible. But he has also been a forceful, even cantankerous, defender of American policy, often insisting his critics were unduly pessimistic. On Oct. 31, just a week before finishing the memo, Mr. Rumsfeld told a radio interviewer, "I feel that we are making good progress with the piece of it the Defense Department has."

One option Mr. Rumsfeld offered calls for modest troop withdrawals "so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country."

Another option calls for redeploying American troops from "vulnerable positions" in Baghdad and other cities to safer areas in Iraq or Kuwait, where they would act as a "quick reaction force." That idea is similar to a plan suggested by Representative John P. Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat, a plan that the White House has soundly rebuffed.

Still another option calls for consolidating the number of American bases in Iraq to 5 from 55 by July 2007, a considerable shrinking of the American footprint. At the same time, Mr. Rumsfeld all but dismisses the idea of setting a firm date for removing forces from Iraq, listing it as one of the less palatable ideas.

One of the more provocative options would punish provinces that failed to cooperate with the Americans by withdrawing economic assistance and security. "Stop rewarding bad behavior, as was done in Falluja when they pushed in reconstruction funds, and start rewarding good behavior," the option reads. "No more reconstruction assistance in areas where there is violence."

Some military officers have said that the idea of denying assistance in some areas ignores the fact that many Iraqis are afraid to cooperate with the Americans for fear of retaliation by insurgents.

Falluja has been the focus of reconstruction efforts following an offensive by Americans that crippled city services and damaged scores of buildings, leaving the United States few options beyond rebuilding or evacuating the city. Now, it is considered by the Marines to be one of the few relatively stable areas in the dangerous Anbar Province. Many of the other towns in the region have become even more hostile because the economic assistance has been minimal, leaving the residents feeling neglected by the authorities in Baghdad, military officers say.

Then, too, work on infrastructure that sprawls across the country, like the electrical grid and the oil pipelines, network, cannot be limited to nonviolent areas.

"There is an element of throwing in the towel and effectively giving up on at least some areas of the country," said James Dobbins, a former State Department official and director of the International Security and Defense Policy Center at RAND.

In any case, administration officials indicated this week that withholding assistance was not under serious consideration.

Reflecting exasperation with much of the American government, another option in the memo raises the possibility of using military reservists to "beef up" the Iraqi government's ministries. "Give up on trying to get other USG Departments to do it," he writes, referring to other United States government agencies.

Taking a leaf out of Mr. Hussein's book, Mr. Rumsfeld seemed to see some merit in the former dictator's practice of paying Iraqi leaders. "Provide money to key political and religious leaders (as Saddam Hussein did), to get them to help us get through this difficult period," one option reads.

The list of favored options notably does not mention the “clear, hold and build” approach that the White House has touted as its strategy for waging counterinsurgency. That is a troop-intensive approach that calls for clearing contested areas with American and Iraqi troops, holding them with American and Iraqi forces and then carrying out reconstruction programs to win support. Nor does the list make the withdrawal of American forces explicitly contingent on improving conditions in Iraq.

The final page of the memo is a brief list of six “less attractive” options, which Mr. Rumsfeld describes as “below the line.” They include an “aggressive federalism plan,” an international conference modeled on the Dayton accords that produced an agreement on Bosnia and an idea that is currently being seriously discussed by senior administration officials: temporarily sending 20,000 additional American forces or more to Baghdad to try to improve security there and regain momentum.

Rumsfeld Called For Change In War Plan (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Two days before he resigned from the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld sent to the White House a classified memo recommending "a major adjustment" in Iraq strategy and acknowledging slow progress there.

"Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough," Rumsfeld wrote in the Nov. 6 memo.

Rumsfeld has made similar comments in public about insufficient progress in Iraq, both before and immediately after his resignation on Nov. 8.

But the defense secretary's unusually expansive memo also laid out a series of 21 possible courses of action regarding Iraq strategy, including many that would transform the U.S. occupation.

Michael O'Hanlon, a defense analyst at the Brookings Institution, said the revelation of the memo would undercut any attempt by President Bush to defend anything resembling a "stay the course" policy in Iraq.

"When you have the outgoing secretary of defense, the main architect of Bush's policy, saying it's failing, that puts a lot more pressure on Bush," he said.

The memo makes clear that Rumsfeld understood acutely the political implications of changing strategy.

"Announce that whatever new approach the U.S. decides on, the U.S. is doing so on a trial basis," he wrote in one of the bulleted options. "This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not 'lose.' "

He next advised: "Recast the U.S. military mission and the U.S. goals (how we talk about them) -- go minimalist."

Similarly, Rumsfeld advocated announcing "a set of benchmarks" for the Iraqi government -- "to get them moving," he added parenthetically, as well as to "reassure" the U.S. public that progress can be made.

The existence of the memo was first reported last night by the New York Times, which posted it on its Web site. The Pentagon confirmed the memo's authenticity.

Asked about the memo, White House spokeswoman Eryn Witcher said: "The president has said he's been dissatisfied with the progress in Iraq, so the right thing to do is reevaluate our tactics. There are a number of reviews underway, and the president is open to listening to a wide array of options."

Rumsfeld's ideas did not depart radically from the alternative strategies emerging so far from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group or from other military and governmental Iraq policy reviews initiated in recent weeks.

For example, Rumsfeld called for significantly increasing the number of U.S. military trainers embedded with Iraqi forces, and, in a twist, for "a reverse embeds program" that would place Iraqi soldiers with American squads, partly to boost the Arabic-language skills of U.S. troops.

Several options Rumsfeld raised involve withdrawing or pulling back the 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq as a way to pressure the Iraqi government to take greater responsibility for its own security. This idea, favored by many Democrats in Congress, has not been publicly embraced by Rumsfeld to such a degree. Still, Rumsfeld wrote that he opposed setting a firm withdrawal date.

"Begin modest withdrawals of U.S. and Coalition forces (start 'taking our hand off the bicycle seat'), so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up, and take responsibility for their country," Rumsfeld wrote.

Rumsfeld suggested using the security provided by U.S. troops in a carrot-and-stick approach, providing security only for provinces and cities that fully cooperate with U.S. forces. Similarly, reconstruction aid should go only to "those parts of Iraq that are behaving," he wrote, adding: "No more reconstruction assistance in areas where there is violence."

Options the defense secretary characterized as "less attractive" involved U.S. troop increases, such as a surge in U.S. forces into Baghdad or substantially increasing the number of American combat brigades in Iraq. The only place he recommended a U.S. troop increase was along Iraq's borders with Syria and Iran.

Rumsfeld's well-known frustration with other branches of the U.S. government comes through repeatedly in the memo and is far blunter than the secretary has been in public. He called for reaching out to U.S. military retirees and reservists to "aggressively beef up" Iraqi ministries, adding, "i.e. give up on trying to get other USG Departments to do it."

Similarly, he called for a "massive program for unemployed youth" but said it would have to be run by U.S. forces, "since no other organization could do it."

Retired Army Col. Andrew Bacevich, now a professor of international relations at Boston University, said his impression of the memo is that it is a "laundry list" of current ideas entirely lacking in analysis.

"The memo is a tacit admission of desperation and of impending failure," said Bacevich, who has been critical of the conduct of the war.

People in Washington familiar with the workings of the Pentagon and the media were suspicious of the motives behind the leak of the memo.

Retired Army Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton, an Iraq veteran who has been critical of Rumsfeld, said he was bothered by both the timing and the substance of the memo.

"For Mr. Rumsfeld to write this leaked memo, saying things aren't going well, is disingenuous and self-serving," said Eaton.

But he added that he did not think it would affect the morale of troops or officers serving in Iraq, saying he thought they would dismiss it as irrelevant "high-level politics."

Rumsfeld Memo Called For New Iraq Strategy (LAT)

By Josh Meyer, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

Days before resigning, the secretary urged new strategies, including troop reductions.

WASHINGTON — Two days before he resigned as secretary of Defense, Donald H. Rumsfeld sent a rambling memo to the White House in which he acknowledged that the current U.S. strategy in Iraq was not working and offered several diverging scenarios for reversing course.

In the classified, three-page document, Rumsfeld offered several options for reducing troop presence in Iraq, including some that were similar to proposals by Democratic critics of the war in Iraq and that have been sharply opposed by the Bush administration.

And he suggested one potentially controversial plan of action that had been used in a different form by deposed dictator Saddam Hussein — paying off "key political and religious leaders" so they would be more compliant with U.S. occupying forces in the war-torn country and its capital, Baghdad.

"In my view it is time for a major adjustment," Rumsfeld wrote in the Nov. 6 memo. "Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough."

Until his resignation, Rumsfeld frequently had said that the overall course of action in Iraq was working, even if it needed adjustments. And while he has said he bases his decisions on input from commanders, his memo is peppered with proposals that run counter to the advice of officers, most of whom have opposed redeployments or withdrawals.

Critics immediately seized on the memo as an admission of failure by one of the administration's primary architects of the Iraq war and its aftermath.

"This is an unbelievable memo. It is an admission of failure. It is more frank than anything that any [administration] official has said publicly in the three years of the war," said Joseph Cirincione, senior vice president for national security at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank.

In the memo, first reported Saturday by the New York Times on its website and titled "Illustrative New Courses of Action," Rumsfeld describes a "range of options" for the White House to consider. Many of them involve sharply drawing down U.S. troop presence in Iraq by mid-2007.

"Recast the U.S. military mission and the U.S. goals (how we talk about them) — go minimalist," Rumsfeld suggested. For instance, he proposed an accelerated shuttering or consolidation of most U.S. military bases in Iraq.

"We have already reduced from 110 to 55 bases," he wrote. "Plan to get down to 10 to 15 bases by April 2007, and to 5 bases by July 2007."

Another option: withdrawing U.S. forces from vulnerable positions, such as cities and patrols, and moving them to a "Quick Reaction Force" status, in which they would operate from within Iraq and neighboring Kuwait.

Rumsfeld also proposed keeping high-end special operations forces in Iraq to target Al Qaeda, death squads and Iranians, but "drawing down all other Coalition forces," except for key U.S. advisors.

He suggested a new approach in which U.S. forces would only provide security for those provinces or cities that openly request it — "and that actively cooperate, with the stipulation being that unless they cooperate fully, U.S. forces would leave their province."

In areas where there is continued violence, Rumsfeld proposed that U.S. forces stop helping Iraqis, particularly with reconstruction efforts.

"As the old saying goes, 'If you want more of something, reward it; if you want less of something, penalize it,' " he wrote.

All told, such drawdown efforts would send a strong signal to Iraqis, Rumsfeld said. He described it as " 'taking our hand off the bicycle seat,' so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country."

Eric Ruff, the senior Pentagon spokesman, said the formulation of the memo evolved over a period of several weeks.

"There had been a lot of discussion over a period of several weeks; people were discussing different options and various approaches, and the secretary had some views on the matter, and the memo reflects those views," Ruff said.

The White House said President Bush was reviewing Rumsfeld's proposals, along with many others. "The president has said he's been dissatisfied with the progress in Iraq. So the right thing to do is reevaluate our tactics," said spokeswoman Eryn Witcher.

The memo was sent one day after Bush had interviewed Rumsfeld's appointed successor, Robert M. Gates, the former CIA director and president of Texas A&M University. But Pentagon and White House officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said they believed that the timing was coincidental, and that the memo had nothing to do with Rumsfeld's impending departure or any efforts on his behalf to keep his job.

In the memo, Rumsfeld offered alternatives to troop reductions. He proposed stepping up the public relations campaign in Iraq by announcing a set of benchmarks that would reassure the U.S. public and give the appearance "that progress can and is being made."

Even so, Rumsfeld cautioned that the administration should take steps to lower expectations and keep its options open.

"Announce that whatever new approach the U.S. decides on, the U.S. is doing so on a trial basis," he wrote. "This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not 'lose.' "

Lawrence Di Rita, Rumsfeld's press secretary from 2001 until May, said the memo shows how his former boss operates.

"He is always throwing things out there for people to consider. That is what good leaders do," Di Rita said. "This is his way of recognizing that our policy is in need of adapting to the realities" in Iraq.

A senior administration official said the memo should not be seen as Rumsfeld abdicating his long-held beliefs about the administration's strategy in Iraq. Instead, it shows how the defense secretary was trying to present the White House with all available options to consider when deciding how to go forward with the war in Iraq, he said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the memo had not been formally made public.

"This is vintage Rumsfeld," the senior administration official said.

EXCERPTS FROM RUMSFELD MEMO

`It is time for a major adjustment'

The situation in Iraq has been evolving, and U.S. forces have adjusted, over time, from major combat operations to counterterrorism, to counterinsurgency, to dealing with death squads and sectarian violence. In my view it is time for a major adjustment. Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough. Following is a range of options:

Illustrative options

Above the Line (many of these options could and, in a number of cases, should be done in combination with others):

• Publicly announce a set of benchmarks agreed to by the Iraqi government and the U.S. — political, economic and security goals — to chart a path ahead for the Iraqi government and Iraqi people (to get them moving) and for the U.S. public (to reassure them that progress can and is being made).

• Significantly increase U.S. trainers and embeds, and transfer more U.S. equipment to Iraqi security forces (ISF), to further accelerate their capabilities by refocusing the assignment of some significant portion of the U.S. troops currently in Iraq.

• Conduct an accelerated draw-down of U.S. bases.

• Initiate an approach where U.S. forces provide security only for those provinces or cities that openly request U.S. help and that actively cooperate, with the stipulation being that unless they cooperate fully, U.S. forces would leave their province.

• Stop rewarding bad behavior, as was done in Fallouja when they pushed in reconstruction funds, and start rewarding good behavior. Put our reconstruction efforts in those parts of Iraq that are behaving, and invest and create havens of opportunity to reward them for their good behavior. As the old saying goes, "If you want more of something, reward it; if you want less of something, penalize it." No more reconstruction assistance in areas where there is violence.

• Withdraw U.S. forces from vulnerable positions — cities, patrolling, etc. — and move U.S. forces to a Quick Reaction Force (QRF) status, operating from within Iraq and Kuwait, to be available when Iraqi security forces need assistance.

• Begin modest withdrawals of U.S. and coalition forces (start "taking our hand off the bicycle seat"), so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country.

• Provide money to key political and religious leaders (as Saddam Hussein did), to get them to help us get through this difficult period.

Below the Line (less attractive options):

• Continue on the current path.

• Move a large fraction of all U.S. forces into Baghdad to attempt to control it.

• Increase Brigade Combat Teams and U.S. forces in Iraq substantially.

• Set a firm withdrawal date to leave. Declare that with Saddam gone and Iraq a sovereign nation, the Iraqi people can govern themselves. Tell Iran and Syria to stay out.

• Assist in accelerating an aggressive federalism plan, moving toward three separate states — Sunni, Shia, and Kurd.

Rumsfeld Memo: Iraq Tactics Not Working (AP)

By Robert Burns,

AP, December 3, 2006

President Bush said Saturday he wants to hear all advice before making decisions about changes in Iraq strategy, even as it was disclosed that Donald H. Rumsfeld called for major changes in tactics two days before he resigned as defense secretary.

"In my view it is time for a major adjustment," Rumsfeld wrote in a Nov. 6 memo to the White House. "Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough."

Existence of the classified memo was first reported by The New York Times on its Internet site Saturday evening in a story for the paper's Sunday editions.

DOJ_NMG_0101071

Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff said he was not the source of the leak to the Times, but confirmed the memo's authenticity to The Associated Press late Saturday.

"The formulation of these ideas evolved over a period of several weeks," Ruff said in a telephone interview.

He said the options presented in the paper were Rumsfeld's personal ideas developed in conversations with a variety of people, not part of a formal Pentagon review that also is under way. Rumsfeld had previously said publicly that he believed U.S. efforts in Iraq were not working well enough or fast enough, but he has not called for a "major adjustment" in the U.S. approach to stabilizing Iraq.

Ruff also emphasized that Rumsfeld does not endorse any one particular recommendation, and that he notes in the memo that "many of these options could and, in a number of cases, should be done in combination with others."

Lawrence Di Rita, who was Rumsfeld's chief spokesman before he left the Pentagon last spring, said in a telephone interview Saturday evening that the broad range of options presented by Rumsfeld belies the notion, often cited by his critics, that he is inflexible and reluctant to consider alternative approaches.

"I see this thing as classic Rumsfeld," Di Rita said. "This is the way he operates."

The president acknowledged the difficulties in Iraq in his Saturday radio address and said: "I recognize that the recent violence in Iraq has been unsettling. Many people in our country are wondering about the way forward. The work ahead will not be easy, yet by helping Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki strengthen Iraq's democratic institutions and promote national reconciliation, our military leaders and diplomats can help put Iraq on a solid path to liberty and democracy."

Bush added: "The decisions we make in Iraq will be felt across the broader Middle East."

The president is under pressure to decide a new blueprint for U.S. involvement in Iraq. A bipartisan commission headed by James A. Baker III, a former Republican secretary of state and Bush family friend from Texas, and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana is to present its recommendations to Bush in the coming week.

There is no hint in the memo Rumsfeld sent to the White House a day before the Nov. 7 elections that he intended to resign. However, a person familiar with the sequence of those events told the AP that Rumsfeld did know when he wrote it that he would be leaving. The person discussed the matter on condition of anonymity.

Bush announced Rumsfeld's impending departure the day after Democrats won control of the House and Senate. The president has designated Robert Gates to replace Rumsfeld.

Before listing options for change — many of which are similar to various proposals by people in and out of government, including Democratic critics in Congress — Rumsfeld noted that the situation in Iraq "has been evolving" and said U.S. forces have adjusted from "major combat operations, to counterterrorism, to counterinsurgency, to dealing with death squads and sectarian violence."

Rumsfeld said the administration should "announce that whatever new approach the U.S. decides on, the U.S. is doing so on a trial basis. This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not `lose.'"

Specifics on his options checklist:

_"Publicly announce a set of benchmarks agreed to by the Iraqi government and the U.S. ... to chart a path ahead for the Iraqi government and Iraqi people (to get them moving) and for the U.S. public (to reassure them that progress can and is being made)."

_"Significantly increase U.S. trainers and embeds, and transfer more U.S. equipment to Iraqi security forces."

_"Initiate a reverse embeds program ... by putting one or more Iraqi soldiers with every U.S. and possibly coalition squad."

_Conduct an accelerated drawdown of U.S. bases, noting they have already been reduced from 110 to 55. "Plan to get down to 10 to 15 bases by April 2007, and to 5 bases by July 2007."

_"Retain high-end ... capability ... to target al-Qaida, death squads, and Iranians in Iraq, while drawing down all other coalition forces, except those necessary to provide certain key enablers" for Iraqi forces.

_Provide U.S. security forces "only for those provinces or cities that openly request U.S. help and that actively cooperate."

_Stop rewarding "bad behavior" with reconstruction funds and start rewarding "good behavior."

_"Position substantial U.S. forces near the Iranian and Syrian borders to reduce infiltration and, importantly, reduce Iranian influence on the Iraqi government."

_Withdraw U.S. forces from vulnerable positions and move to a quick reaction force status, operating from within Iraq and Kuwait, to be available when Iraqi security forces need assistance.

_"Begin modest withdrawals of U.S. and coalition forces (start `taking our hand off the cycle seat') so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country."

Rumsfeld also listed a handful of "below the line" (less attractive) options that included continuing on the current path, moving a large fraction of all U.S. forces in Iraq into Baghdad, increasing U.S. forces substantially, setting a firm withdrawal date and pushing "an aggressive federalism plan" that would lead to three separate states — Sunni, Shia and Kurd.

Baghdad Market Is Hit By 3 Bombs (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec 2 -- A triple car bombing struck a busy shopping district Saturday, killing at least 51 people and wounding more than 90 in an attack timed to inflict as many casualties as possible, according to Iraqi officials.

Three parked cars exploded just before dinnertime as shoppers were buying meat, fruit and vegetables in the bustling majority Shiite neighborhood of Sadriyah. Columns of black smoke hovered above buildings.

The bombing occurred a day after U.S. and Iraqi forces raided the nearby Sunni neighborhood of Fadhil, capturing dozens of suspected Sunni Arab insurgents. It was the deadliest attack since a barrage of car bombs, mortars and missiles hit the Shiite slums of Sadr City on Nov. 23, killing more than 200 people.

And in a pattern indicative of sectarian violence, the Interior Ministry said 44 bodies had been found in Baghdad in a 24-hour period, most of them shot.

Meanwhile, U.S. and Iraqi forces on Saturday launched an offensive in Baqubah, the provincial capital of Diyala province, about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. The operation resulted in the arrest of 44 insurgents and the release of a 16-year-old kidnapping victim who was held for ransom for 25 days.

The offensive also led to the seizure of several car bombs that were ready to detonate as well as weapons and posters that encouraged sectarian violence, Iraqi army officials said. Saturday's operation came two days after the U.S. military said in a statement that Baqubah was fully operational.

As the fierce clashes occurred, gunmen opened fire on a man and his son in Aswad district, west of Khalis, 10 miles northwest of Baqubah, killing them both, Lt. Ali Khayyam said.

Elsewhere, a roadside bomb killed a driver in Musayyib and armed men attacked a criminal intelligence commissioner's house in the pre-dawn hours of Saturday in the town of Iskandariyah. The assailants injured the commissioner and shot a missile at the house, but he started shooting back, killing two of the assailants. The gun battle continued until Iraqi forces arrived.

In al-Wahada, 22 miles south of Baghdad, a truck rammed into a bus stop, killing about 20 people, wounding 15 and crushing several cars, police said.

Clashes also broke out Saturday between insurgents and U.S. troops in the predominantly Sunni city of Duluiyah, 45 miles north of Baghdad, police Capt. Qassim Mohammed told the Associated Press.

In Anbar province, a U.S. soldier assigned to 1st Battalion, 1st Armored Division, died Friday from "wounds sustained due to enemy action," the military said Saturday.

In the west Baghdad neighborhood of Jihad, special Iraqi army forces, along with U.S. advisers, captured a member of an insurgent cell believed to have directed car bombing attacks, the military said. The Iraqi forces detained five additional suspects during the raid and confiscated several assault rifles.

At Least 51 Killed In Baghdad (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101073

BAGHDAD — Car bombs and mortar attacks killed at least 51 people in Baghdad on Saturday as Prime Minister Nouri Maliki met with tribal leaders from a Shiite stronghold in an attempt to mend his fractured government.

"The enemies are trying to disperse us, but they will not be able to," Maliki said, appearing on state-run Al Iraqiya television with 65 representatives of the Sadr City slum who reportedly asked Maliki for more police to patrol the neighborhood.

Sadr City is the stronghold of anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada Sadr. Thirty legislators and six Cabinet ministers loyal to Sadr suspended participation in parliament and Maliki's government Wednesday to protest the prime minister's meeting with President Bush last week in Amman, Jordan.

As Saturday's meeting took place, violence continued in the capital and beyond. The Interior Ministry said 44 bodies were discovered in Baghdad during the previous 24 hours. Most of the victims were middle-aged and had been shot and stripped of identification.

At least half a dozen other Iraqis died in clashes across the country. The U.S. military reported the death of a soldier who had been injured in combat in western Al Anbar province.

In Baghdad, two car bombs exploded Saturday afternoon in the market area of Sadriya and one in the market at Hafidh Qadhi, about 100 yards away, said police Lt. Haitham Kamil. Three mortar attacks followed soon afterward in the same areas, police said.

By nightfall, no one had claimed responsibility for the attacks. Firefighters were still battling flames near the charred remains of numerous victims, a witness said.

The injured filled the hallways at three hospitals.

"We are so overwhelmed that we have left many of the injured in the hallways due to lack of space," a medical assistant at Kindi Hospital said.

Deputy Prime Minister Salam Zikam Ali Zubaie, a member of the major Sunni legislative bloc, was targeted by gunmen while his convoy was traveling in Ghazaliya, a majority Sunni area of Baghdad, police said. He was unharmed, but one of his bodyguards was injured.

Rockets struck near the office of Adnan Dulaimi, leader of a major Sunni party within Zubaie's bloc.

Dulaimi said he was meeting with Sunni and Shiite leaders at a northwest Baghdad mosque to discuss local security at the time of the attack. They watched five rockets strike the area, hitting a school and a mosque, then a nearby house, killing two men and injuring a third.

Dulaimi said he believed that he was targeted by Shiites and that Maliki's government has not protected him.

"I think today is part of the latest escalation, every day hurting and disastrous events that destroy the country and especially Baghdad," he said, urging Shiite politicians who are boycotting Maliki's government to return.

Maliki met Bush a week after bombings and mortar attacks in Sadr City killed at least 215 people and left more than 200 wounded.

The Sadr City tribal leaders who met with Maliki for a half hour Saturday asked him to hire more local people to patrol their Baghdad neighborhood, increasing the police force from 1,460 to 7,000 officers, said Samir Awad, an Iraqi journalist who helped arrange the meeting.

Awad said the Sadr City representatives also proposed a nationwide meeting of tribal leaders from various groups.

In Jordan, Abdelaziz Hakim, a prominent Iraqi Shiite figure who leads a parliamentary bloc comparable in size to Sadr's, spoke out against suggestions that an international summit could address sectarian divisions. Hakim insisted that Iraq's conflicts are political, not sectarian, and could be resolved internally. U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan had suggested the meeting.

"It is illogical, unacceptable and incorrect for the Iraqi people that issues related to their self-determination and destiny be decided and molded through international conferences," said Hakim, who leads the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. He is scheduled to meet with Bush on Monday.

Meanwhile, Iraqi and U.S. troops launched a joint operation in Baqubah, a city about 35 miles northwest of Baghdad that has been under curfew since Friday morning because of insurgent attacks.

Gunmen were walking the streets Saturday, attacking homes and killing residents, witnesses said.

DOJ_NMG_0101074

"This military operation is designed to separate the terrorists from the honorable people of Baqubah and better enable the Iraqi security forces to maintain a secure and stable environment," said Col. David Sutherland, commander of 3rd Brigade Combat Team of the U.S. Army's 1st Cavalry Division.

Military officials said three suspected insurgents were killed in Baqubah and 44 were detained. Soldiers also freed a 16-year-old captive who had been held for 25 days.

U.S. forces in helicopters, jets, scout planes and 20 vehicles launched another assault late Saturday in Duluiya, about 55 miles north of Baghdad, clashing with gunmen, police said.

Baghdad's Yarmouk Hospital came under fire from attackers with machine guns.

They traded fire with police and soldiers at the front gate for half an hour, killing a police officer and injuring three people before the attackers escaped, police said. Staff members said the hospital manager had earlier received anonymous threats that the building would be hit with mortar rounds or bombs if it continued to treat police and soldiers.

Among the other Iraqis killed Saturday were two people on their way to a funeral in the holy city of Najaf, a contractor in the northern city of Mosul who supplied food to U.S. troops, and two people in the southern city of Iskandariya — a driver killed by a roadside bomb and a 25-year-old man shot by U.S. troops while he was attempting to plant a bomb.

51 Dead In Bombings In Iraq Shiite Area (AP)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 3, 2006

A triple car bombing struck a food market in a predominantly Shiite area in central Baghdad on Saturday, killing at least 51 people a day after a U.S.-Iraqi raid against Sunni insurgents in a nearby neighborhood.

Three parked cars blew up nearly simultaneously as shoppers were buying fruit, vegetables, meat and other items in the busy al-Sadriyah district.

The blasts sent clouds of black smoke over concrete high-rises in the area, which has narrow alleys that made it difficult for ambulances and fire trucks to navigate. At least 51 people were killed and 90 wounded, said police Lt. Mohammed Khayoun and hospital officials.

A cheese vendor who was wounded said the market was full of people shopping on their way home from work.

"We heard a big explosion from the western side of the area and the second from the eastern side. After one minute the third explosion took place near us," Ahmed Salman said from a hospital bed.

It was one of the worst incidents since a bombing and mortar attack killed 215 people and wounded more than 200 in the Shiite district of Sadr City in Baghdad on Nov. 23 amid escalating sectarian conflict.

Nobody claimed responsibility for the attack, but it followed a Friday raid by Iraqi forces backed by U.S. helicopters targeting Sunni insurgents in al-Fadhil, less than a half mile away.

The Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars in Iraq condemned the al-Fadhil raid in a statement Saturday, alleging six people were killed and 13 detained.

Iraqi police said Friday that one Iraqi soldier and two civilians were killed in the fighting, and the U.S. military said 28 people were detained.

Separately, U.S. and Iraqi forces began an offensive Saturday in Baqouba, capital of Diyala province about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, where fighting has raged for a week between Sunni insurgents and police, the U.S. command said.

At least 36 suspected militants were detained during one pre-dawn raid in Baqouba, police said. Later in the day, state-run Iraqiya television said one al-Qaida in Iraq insurgent was killed and 43 detained, including two foreigners.

Ahmed Fuad, a senior morgue official in Baqouba, said the morgue had received 102 bodies since Nov. 22, only 20 of which had been retrieved by their families.

"We do believe that there are many bodies in some areas of Diyala province, but neither police nor ambulance could fetch them," he said.

Clashes broke out Saturday between insurgents and U.S. troops in the predominantly Sunni city of Duluiyah 45 miles north of Baghdad, police Capt. Qassim Mohammed said.

Elsewhere, a truck driving at high speed slammed into a bus stop in al-Wahada, 22 miles south of Baghdad, killing about 20 people, wounding 15 and crushing several cars, police said.

Police Lt. Muhammed Al-Shemari said the crash did not appear to be accidental because the truck, an empty fuel tanker, had no obvious mechanical problems.

The driver fled the overturned truck but was caught by witnesses and turned over to police, al-Shemari said, adding that other witnesses found a body in the vehicle's cabin.

Another police officer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the probe, said the driver blamed brake failure.

A U.S. Army soldier was reported killed in fighting in the volatile Anbar province on Friday, the military said, raising to at least 2,887 the number of American military personnel who have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003.

Eight other people were killed in attacks nationwide, including a driver and his assistant who were shot to death as they were delivering soft drinks to stores in Baghdad's volatile Sunni neighborhood of Dora.

Iraqi police also found at least 46 bodies of apparent victims of sectarian death squads in Baghdad and three other towns. Forty-two were handcuffed, blindfolded and marked with signs of torture.

Meanwhile, the last of Italy's troops in Iraq returned to Rome on Saturday, a few weeks earlier than the date promised by Italian Premier Romano Prodi. Italy at one point was Washington's second largest coalition partner in Iraq, after Britain, during reconstruction efforts after Saddam Hussein was ousted nearly four years ago.

Whose War Is It? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

AMERICAN TROOPS must not be allowed to become helpless bystanders in Iraq's civil war. Nor can they become co-conspirators with a government intent on taking sides in this civil war. These two axioms should guide the Bush administration's Iraq policy in the weeks and months ahead.

The endgame to the administration's Mesopotamian adventure may be in sight, but the timeline cannot be dictated by U.S. electoral politics — whether the triumph of the Democrats last month or the needs of Republican presidential hopefuls in 2008. It should depend on the military and political situation on the ground in Iraq.

U.S. troops should remain in that country, but only as long as the Iraqi government is willing and able to stay above the sectarian fray. Indeed, despite talk in Washington of troop reductions, a short-term increase in the number of U.S. troops may be necessary to help turn the tide on the streets of Baghdad and elsewhere in the country. U.S. troops may have to become even more involved in fighting the Sunni/Al Qaeda insurgency directly and in disarming Shiite militias. But they should only do so if the fledgling Iraqi government proves itself an ally committed to building a state that represents all Iraqi factions.

Iraq's commitment, and America's

That question — what exactly is Iraq's government willing and able to do? — provided the dramatic backdrop to last week's meeting in Jordan between President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki. Bush's insistence that Maliki is the "right guy" to lead Iraq was belied by his own national security advisor, Stephen Hadley, who, in a memo leaked to the New York Times, wondered whether Maliki is simply too weak to crack down on the Shiite death squads run by his supporters, or whether he is unwilling to so do.

It's time to find out the answer. We don't know exactly what Bush told Maliki in private, but we hope he told him to clean up his Interior Ministry and to start arresting Shiite death squad leaders. U.S. forces might also execute — or at least threaten to execute — the outstanding arrest warrant on murder charges for Muqtada Sadr, who controls one of the largest Shiite militias and is now boycotting the government. Maliki needs to break with Sadr if he is to be a credible leader in the eyes of moderate Sunnis, and the U.S. needs to take on Sadr if it is to continue imploring neighboring Sunni nations to help bring stability to Iraq.

At the same time, U.S. forces must redouble their efforts to arrest the Sunni terrorists whose atrocities have so provoked the Shiites. Their leaders should be tried and punished; an end to impunity on both sides could help quell vigilantism and help erase the perception that U.S. forces are becoming bystanders to sectarian slaughter.

Security remains the necessary condition to the political development of a representative government, and an all-out civil war may soon make Iraqis yearn for the terrible old days of Saddam Hussein. Time is running out for the U.S. and Maliki to restore order.

Maliki has promised that Iraqi troops will be ready to take over from the U.S. within six months. Whether that's realistic or not, it's hard to imagine that the U.S. has any more time than that to improve matters. Bush needs to use the leverage gained by those 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq to pressure Sunnis and Shiites into peace.

Meanwhile, Bush could make the best use of the growing calls for withdrawal from Iraq to hint to Iran and Syria, very privately, that he might do just that. At the moment, Damascus and Tehran can afford to be spoilers, watching the U.S. bleed in Iraq while (so far) being spared the potentially chaotic consequences of a U.S. withdrawal. Suggestions that Saudi Arabia and Jordan might intervene to protect their Sunni brethren if an Iranian-backed Shiite Iraqi government were to rise in Baghdad, possibly triggering a regional conflagration, should give all sides pause.

These steps could bring pressure to bear on Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds to hammer out a new internal political compact that would keep Iraq intact but provide more local autonomy to deal with sectarian tensions. It would necessarily include a long-overdue deal to divide up the nation's oil wealth. Civil wars rarely end at the negotiating table until one side is defeated, or realizes it soon will be, or until stalemate or exhaustion sets in. That may also prove true in Iraq. But there is still time for the living to change history.

We recognize that none of this adds up to a tidy, satisfying road map; there are no easy exits from a quagmire. The quandary for Bush, in some senses ironic, is that the mission of removing Hussein and of turning the nation of Iraq over to its people has been accomplished — but the outcome is still disastrous.

What is the U.S. to do if a sovereign government that represents the nation's long-oppressed majority is intent on settling scores by engaging in sectarian violence? Having dealt with the international dimensions of the threats posed by Hussein's regime (while continuing to worry about the international threat posed by anarchy within Iraq), Washington cannot indefinitely be held responsible for Iraq's domestic travails.

Which is not to say that it cannot be held responsible now. The Bush administration, let's be clear, did botch the postwar occupation of Iraq. Its poorly planned, arrogant and ahistoric approach to the aftermath of the invasion has been a blow to U.S. prestige and will earn Bush a prominent place among the roll call of failed presidents.

The (mis)uses of history

Decades from now, historians will still be debating whether a more competent occupation would have succeeded in building the peaceful, model democracy the administration once talked about, or whether sectarian violence and civil war were inevitable regardless. For now, we can ask how the most powerful nation in the world squandered billions of dollars and tens of thousands of (mostly Iraqi) lives in such a fiasco.

It is often noted that George Marshall had more than three years to develop his occupation plans for Japan and Germany, while retired Lt. Gen. Jay Garner had 60 days to develop his for Iraq. Yet the fault lies not merely in the short time span but in the erratic nature of the planning, which was yanked from the State Department to the National Security Council to the Pentagon and from Garner to J. Paul Bremer III.

Each team spurned the work of its bureaucratic predecessors, and each refused to listen to their country's leading Middle East experts, whose warnings were interpreted as proof of ideological incorrectness. Each also turned a deaf ear to their British allies, whose experiences occupying Iraq after World War I were to prove shockingly relevant.

Historians may identify April 12, 2003, as the day the United States began to lose the peace in Iraq. That's when Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, responding to reports of widespread looting, declined to order up more U.S. troops to keep order and protect Iraqi lives and property. Instead, an irritated Rumsfeld asserted that the looting wasn't as bad as media reports made it seem, that it was an understandable result of the pent-up frustration of decades of repression and that "stuff happens."

"Stuff was tolerated" is more like it — and, as anyone familiar with the "broken windows" theory of crime prevention knows, failure to enforce law and order in small ways tends to encourage more brazen provocations. Veterans of conflicts past warned that day that if more troops did not arrive, terrified Iraqis would turn to their own ethnic kin for self-protection. No one was listening.

The administration's overreaching de-Baathification policy was another terrible blunder. Garner wanted to fire the top three layers of Hussein loyalists and leave Iraqis to deal with the rest, keeping some semblance of a civilian government in place; the Pentagon's Iraqi siren, Ahmad Chalabi, wanted to gut the ancien regime. Chalabi won, and thousands of low-level Sunnis were sacked and replaced by Shiites who saw no need to provide services to Sunni areas.

The senseless disbanding of the Iraqi army also helped bolster the insurgency. Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz erroneously claimed that the Iraqi army had melted away; without consulting the Joint Chiefs of Staff, he and Bremer scrapped the military's plans to order the Iraqi rank and file back for vetting, in exchange for a $20 bonus (six months' pay).

By the time the U.S. military got that order countermanded, it was July. The armed, unemployed and alienated Sunni soldiers didn't wait for Washington to make a decision. Some joined the insurgency. By the time Al Qaeda began to foment attacks on Shiites in August 2003, Sunnis distrusted and disdained the U.S. and had ample motive to make common cause.

The disbanding of the Iraqi civil service and military was especially damaging in light of the administration's haste to transfer sovereignty to a new government. To this day, Washington is paying the price for relying on governmental institutions that it essentially dismantled at the outset of the occupation.

Tempering hope with realism

The history is instructive and, as usual, the road to the present from the past is more apparent than the road ahead, which can at times feel like the quest for the least-disastrous outcome. Iraq can't be a threat to its neighbors. It can't be a trigger for a regional war. It can't become a hollow, failed state that plays host to international terrorists. That much is clear.

U.S. troops should minimize the bloodshed while there is a pluralistic government in place; widespread ethnic cleansing must be averted. These are murkier goals, harder to pursue.

As for the model shining democracy setting an example for the entire Middle East — well, Iraq's realities may have gotten in the way of this particular Washington fantasy.

And Now, Plan B (WP)

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

THE IRAQ Study Group appears likely to recommend a new course for U.S policy this week that, in important respects, corresponds with what the Bush administration, leading members of Congress and the Iraqi government already are proposing. The elements of that emerging consensus begin with a commitment to greatly increase the U.S. training and advisory mission for the Iraqi army. During the coming months, command of the army would be steadily transferred to the government, which would then lead the fight against insurgents and renegade militias. As that process went forward, a substantial reduction of U.S. combat troops would take place.

Both the study group and the Pentagon are reportedly considering a halving of the force of 140,000 American troops during 2007, though without adopting a rigid timetable; that's close to what Democratic Sens. Carl M. Levin (Mich.) and Jack Reed (R.I.) have called for. While it's not clear where President Bush stands, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said Thursday that he believed that Iraqi forces would be ready for the beginning of a U.S. withdrawal by June.

Mr. Bush is more likely to resist the study group's proposal for a new U.S. diplomatic offensive in the region. That's because it would include contacts with Iran and Syria, along with Iraq's other neighbors, possibly through an international conference. We believe that such a diplomatic initiative, aimed above all at encouraging an accord among Iraq's warring parties, is long overdue. But whether it occurs ultimately is less important than what happens inside Iraq: Outside actors, including the United States, cannot impose order or broker a political solution unless and until the warring Sunni, Shiite and Kurd factions choose to do so.

That's where the potential trouble for a new U.S. policy may begin. The study group proposals, like those being developed by the Bush administration, assume that the army and government of Mr. Maliki are worth a continued, if slowly diminishing, commitment of U.S. military support -- with an inevitable cost in American lives. But are they? Mr. Bush has made his bet: After meeting with Mr. Maliki on Thursday, he called him a "strong leader" and "the right guy for Iraq." Yet a leaked memo by Mr. Bush's national security adviser spells out doubts shared by many Iraqis and Americans. Though Mr. Maliki has frequently committed himself to a pluralistic and democratic Iraq, he has been either unable or unwilling to rein in Shiite militias or prevent his own government from pursuing a sectarian agenda. In fact, it may be that Mr. Maliki's government, the army or the political system as a whole are headed toward dissolution; the Bush administration needs a plan for that possibility.

But writing off the government now is not in the U.S. interest. The best remaining option for the United States lies in a long-term effort to bolster Iraq's political administration and army so that it defends the current constitution and slowly gains the ability to take on the enemies of the United States. First among those are the Sunni extremists linked to the Baath Party and al-Qaeda, which continue to inflict more than 70 percent of American casualties.

Giving up on the government, as advocates of a rapid withdrawal suggest, would simply concede the country to those enemies, as well as to Shiite extremists, and betray those Iraqis who believed in the U.S. vision of a democracy at peace with its neighbors. It would mean the destruction of American allies in Iraq and throughout the region. Mr. Bush, who commonly is accused of being out of touch with reality, made one statement last week that struck us as pretty rational: "This business about a graceful exit," the president said, "simply has no realism to it at all."

6 Militants, 3 Others Die In Iraq Raids (AP)

Associated Press, December 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- U.S. soldiers destroyed two buildings being used by insurgents in a town in Anbar province, killing six militants, two women and a child, the military said Sunday.

It was the latest of several recent raids during which women or children have been killed or wounded by U.S. forces as they attacked insurgents in residential areas. In some of the attacks, the U.S. command accused the militants of using civilians as "human shields" or buildings as "safe houses."

On Saturday night in the town of Karmah, coalition ground and air forces killed six insurgents while destroying two buildings that militants were using, the military said. Searching through one of the destroyed buildings, coalition forces also found a weapons cache and the bodies of two women and a child, the military said, without providing the age of the women or the age and sex of the child. Three suspected insurgents also were detained.

Karmah, 50 miles west of Baghdad, is in Anbar province, the large area of western Iraq where many of the country's Sunni Arab insurgent groups operate.

"Coalition forces take precautions to mitigate risks to civilians while in pursuit of terrorists. However, terrorists continue to put innocent civilians in danger by operating among them," the U.S. military statement said.

On Friday, near Taji, just north of Baghdad, American soldiers killed one insurgent and wounded a woman in her 50s "who was being used as human shield by the terrorist," the U.S. command said. "Terrorists continue to deliberately place innocent Iraqi women and children in danger by their actions and presence," it said.

On Wednesday, two Iraqi women died when U.S. forces backed by aircraft killed eight al-Qaida in Iraq insurgents during a raid near Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, the military said.

The day before, American soldiers fought with suspected insurgents in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province, killing six Iraqis: one man and five girls, ages 7 months, 12, 14, 15 and 17, the U.S. command said. Another Iraqi woman was wounded. The military quoted residents as saying the building attacked "was a known anti-Iraqi force safe house."

Historic Task For A Top Negotiator (HC)

By Anne Belli

Houston Chronicle, December 3, 2006

James A. Baker III is sitting in his law office above downtown Houston, taking a rare break from his role as co-chair of the Iraq Study Group.

The former U.S. secretary of state is bristling at depictions of him as a sort of magician who will somehow make the nation's Iraq problems disappear.

"It's unfortunate," he says, a bit annoyed. "Expectations are totally out of control. There is no magic formula for our difficulties in Iraq."

That may be true.

DOJ_NMG_0101079

But if anticipation has been great, it's because the 76-year-old Baker — a Republican who was also secretary of state and chief of staff for two presidents — has spent much of the past 35 years pulling rabbits out of hats.

Brokering Middle East peace talks. Winning bipartisan support for tax reform. And galvanizing international support for the first Gulf War, which booted Iraqi troops out of Kuwait.

"He has an extraordinary ability to look at a problem and get to the essence of it," said former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger. "He couples that with an ability to find an operational means to deal with it. ... Everybody knows how effective Baker was when he was operating in Washington."

'Critical moment'Indeed, the man now at the center of what Kissinger and others call a "critical moment in our history" is known as a master negotiator who often solves problems by forging bipartisan support and by turning enemies into friends.

Said former President George H.W. Bush, whose life and career have been entwined with Baker's for decades: "The expectations are indeed high on this latest assignment, the Iraq Study Group. I do not know how all that will come out. I do know that the country is very lucky to have this tough, able, seasoned man as so-called head of the group."

No matter what the panel's recommendations when formally released Wednesday, those who have known Baker well say his legacy as a statesman already has been sealed.

Looking out the window of his office, Baker gives an easy smile while recalling a time in his life when — as a Democratic lawyer and occasional voter in Houston — politics was the last thing on his mind.

"I never dreamed I would do all this," he said. "I was programmed to be a lawyer. I came from a long line of lawyers."

To prove his point, he walks to the wall beside his desk and points out old newspaper clippings and photographs of his grandfather, Capt. James A. Baker. The headline, "Work Hard, Study and Keep out of Politics," was his grandfather's advice and the title of Baker's recent memoir.

As he has recently joked during a speech before the Houston World Affairs Council, "For the first 40 years of my life, that's what I did."

Baker's great-grandfather, a friend of Sam Houston's, founded the law firm Baker Botts. And both his grandfather and father were well-known lawyers.

Baker calls his father a "wonderful man," a stern disciplinarian who instilled in him a strong work ethic, a deep discipline, a healthy sense of competition and a love for the outdoors.

But perhaps the most important advice, Baker says, was what his workaholic father called the "Five P's" — Prior Preparation Prevents Poor Performance.

"People are often surprised to hear a man my age recite it, and without embarrassment," Baker writes in his memoir. "But this was a gift from my father that has helped me in one way or another almost every day of my adult life."

Baker attended Princeton University, where he began honing his political views.

He wrote his senior thesis about the clash in the 1930s between two powerful members of Great Britain's Parliament — Aneurin Bevan, an idealist, and Ernest Bevin, a realist. He argued in favor of the pragmatist Bevin.

The nepotism policy at Baker Botts, where his father still practiced, prevented Baker from joining the family firm after he graduated from the University of Texas Law School. So he took a job with Andrews, Kurth, Campbell & Bradley, where he built a career as a general business lawyer.

The father of four sons, he was living the good life in 1968 when tragedy struck — his wife, Mary Stuart, was diagnosed with breast cancer. She passed away just two years later when Baker was 40. The event was even more difficult because neither Baker nor his wife had told their sons she was dying — "a mistake I now profoundly regret," he writes in his book.

Finding a friendThe path out of deep depression was laid by his friend and tennis partner, George H.W. Bush, who asked Baker to help run his 1970 campaign for Senate.

Though Baker was a Democrat and had no political experience, he agreed to switch parties and aid his good friend. They lost the race, but their partnership would endure.

In 1973, Baker married Susan Winston, a family friend and divorcee with three children of her own. Their blended family now included seven children — six boys and a girl.

Baker was tapped in 1975 to be undersecretary of the U.S. Commerce Department. It was there, he says, that he made his first big mistake in Washington.

Believing a comment to reporters was off the record, Baker remarked that it was unlikely that the controversial Secretary of State Kissinger would remain in the Cabinet if President Ford was elected the next November.

When the statement was printed in an Oklahoma paper, Kissinger was steamed.

"There have been better beginnings to a relationship," Kissinger said in a recent interview.

Nonetheless, President Ford asked Baker to first become his chief delegate hunter in the primary against Ronald Reagan, then-manager of his general election against Jimmy Carter.

Baker was pinching himself.

"Here I was only seven years away from being a Democratic lawyer in Houston and running a campaign for an incumbent president in a very, very close election," he said.

The next year, after President Ford lost, the Bakers added an eighth child to their brood. Baker, hooked on politics, ran for Texas attorney general in 1978 and lost.

Soon after, his old tennis partner turned to Baker for help again, this time to help him run his first campaign for president. Bush lost the primary to California's then-Gov. Ronald Reagan. But Reagan asked Baker to become his chief of staff, joining Counselor to the President Edwin Meese and Deputy Chief of Staff Michael Deaver in a famous troika of power.

Shortly after Reagan's second term began, Baker and Treasury Secretary Don Regan decided to switch jobs and took the idea to Reagan, who approved it.

Top of his gameThe pinnacle of his Washington career, said Baker, came in 1988. After successfully running Bush's presidential campaign, he was named secretary of state.

During that time, he witnessed the end of the Cold War and the reunification of Germany, and made strides in the Arab-Israeli peace process and the coalition-building diplomatic initiative that preceded entering Kuwait to drive out Iraqi forces.

He also burnished his reputation for being one of the world's most influential negotiators, forging diplomatic ties through his realist policies.

"He was a master at being able to size up the domestic political situation in whatever foreign land he happened to be in order to accomplish something," said Margaret Tutwiler, who served as assistant secretary of state for public affairs and is one of Baker's closest advisers.

"After all," she added, "this is the man who got the parties in the Middle East to come to Madrid and sit at the same table, something that had never happened over 40 years."

Real nerve, and the willingness to exercise power the moment he's given it, also are Baker trademarks.

As deputy secretary of commerce under President Ford in 1976, he one-upped Kissinger just as the president was about to make a key speech.

Kissinger, who pushed for unlimited import of Chinese textiles at the time, wanted wording taken out of Ford's speech and called Air Force One hours before the address and successfully lobbied to remove it. But Baker, suspecting the play, had asked to be called if that happened. He was, and he made an even more successful appeal. The wording was restored.

Years later, hours after President Reagan's inaugural parade — and Baker's first day as chief of staff — he fended off then-Secretary of State Al Haig.

As work crews swept up confetti, Baker, Meese and Deaver were meeting in the White House when Haig suddenly confronted them with a 20-page document naming him the person in charge of crisis management in the administration. The three balked, and Haig accused them of blocking an agreement he already had made with the president. Such a document was approved by the president a year later — but it put Vice President Bush in charge.

One more challengeAs President Bush's term was coming to an end, he asked Baker to run his troubled re-election campaign. Baker said that although his retirement speech from the State Department was one of the hardest things he's ever done, he owed it to Bush to try and help him win another term.

"When the president asks you to do something, you do it," he said. "But it was more than that. He was more than that. He was my friend."

Still, managing a friend's campaign is thorny business.

"Being a campaign manager for a friend is tough. It's tough," he said. "You always have families who have their own ideas about what ought to be happening."

Said his wife, Susan Baker, "It says an awful lot about George Bush and my man that they survived intact."

For his part, Bush says the two men are lifelong friends whose special relationship weathered highs and lows but endured.

"Over the years, there have been stories of a Bush-Baker rivalry," he said. "Those were nonsense stories. ... We remain good friends because I respect his service to our country, and I just enjoy being with him and Susan. He is almost a brother to me. We are close. Very close family friends. He cares about my family. I care about his."

Baker says unequivocally that without his old friend, he would not have been as successful.

"I tell you one thing with certainty, that I would never have done what I did in public service and politics without him," said Baker, who calls his former tennis partner "jefe," which means "chief" in Spanish.

After Bush's re-election defeat, Baker returned to Houston, accepting a job with Baker Botts, where the nepotism policy was no longer a problem. Then-managing partner Bill Barnett recalls how Baker warned that his name would be worth much less in two or three years.

"He wanted to make sure we understood that," Barnett said.

But that never really happened. Baker helped form the James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy at Rice University and re-entered the national arena when he flew to Florida and helped George W. Bush secure victory there after the contentious 2000 election.

Last year, he agreed to head a panel reviewing the safety culture at troubled oil giant British Petroleum, and most notably, to co-chair the Iraq Study Group and take a fresh look at the nation's war plan.

Baker insists he agreed to help because the current president asked — not as a favor to his father. "It was 43 who asked me to do this, not 41," he said.

Slowing downLongtime friends and aides say the Baker of today is mellower than he was while at the height of his political career.

"All of us who worked closely with him have noticed how at peace, relaxed and happy he is," Tutwiler said.

Baker agrees.

"Life is so good now," he said. "My schedule is my own."

And he fills that schedule with hunting, fishing and golfing — often with his wife and other family members by his side.

"I was not as good a father as my father," he said. "I was so busy trying to make it in a competitive atmosphere."

His family got bigger a couple of years ago, when Baker discovered a whole new branch of the Baker family tree — an African-American branch, living in Huntsville.

Baker was in that town just north of Houston for the dedication of his great-grandfather's grave when a man walked up to him and identified himself as James Baker, his cousin.

"Boy, was I surprised," he said.

Although he later had the lineage researched, Baker took the man's word for it, and even introduced him and others in his family as long-lost relatives at several public appearances he made that day.

"He was such a gracious person," said Wendell Baker, 84, the former secretary's third cousin. They later met again at a family reunion, and are planning to do so again this summer.

Baker's wife says she has watched her husband's faith grow deeper and broader over the past several years, as has his acceptance of life's curveballs.

"He has learned to take life as it comes," she said. "

But while her husband has what she calls "a great capacity for relaxing," Baker said he would go "stir-crazy" if he retired.

For now, though, all eyes are on him and the report he and others will deliver to the president next week.

Baker insists the main goal is simply to reach a consensus.

DOJ_NMG_0101082

"The one thing we can do is present a report that will represent a unified approach on the part of both Democrats and Republicans — a bipartisan approach to the problems in Iraq," he said.

Is Baker A "Wise Man" Or A Wannabe? (LAT)

By Walter Isaacson

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

JAMES A. BAKER III has one great goal left as he hones his legacy: trying to make sure that the words "American statesman" appear in his newspaper obituary before the words "Florida recount." That's one reason he's so eager to make the findings of the Iraq Study Group, which he co-chairs, sagacious and bipartisan enough to ensconce him firmly in the pantheon of American "Wise Men."

I applaud the instinct. The Wise Men were a clubby, Cold War coterie; polished gents from a more statesmanlike era for whom sagacity was synonymous with bipartisanship. John J. McCloy was a Wall Street lawyer who helped run the War Department and then became U.S. high commissioner for Germany; Dean Acheson had been President Truman's secretary of State; W. Averell Harriman was a railroad heir who became President Franklin Roosevelt's special envoy; and Robert Lovett was a banker who became secretary of Defense.

The members of the group maintained their influence through much of the postwar 20th century. After they had grayed into elder statesmen, they were summoned back to the White House to advise Lyndon B. Johnson on what to do about the Vietnam War. At first, they suggested that he should stay the course, but by early 1968, they had generally come to the pragmatic and realistic conclusion that the U.S. had to disengage. Throughout their careers and into their old age, they were above all practical and realistic, beholden to no ideology or partisan agenda.

The question facing Baker today is whether he will end up being remembered as a latter-day Lovett, the most emblematic of the Wise Men, or whether he will fall on the other side of a subtle divide and be seen as more like Clark Clifford, who was a skilled statesman but remained a Wise Man wannabe because he could never quite shake his reputation as a partisan wheeler-dealer and manipulator.

By heritage and breeding, Baker most resembles Lovett. They had similar, indeed intertwined, backgrounds as scions of patrician Texas families. In the 1890s, Lovett's father and Baker's grandfather helped build the Houston-based railway law firm then called Baker, Botts, Baker and Lovett (the present James Baker is now a senior partner at the firm).

Like Lovett, Baker approaches issues with a cool yet vinegary pragmatism. Problems are meant to be solved, usually with a blend of firmness and negotiability devoid of emotion, ideology or sentimentality. There's one salient difference, however: Lovett was devoid of any partisanship. When Truman once made a political remark to him, he responded, "Remember, Mr. President, I'm a Republican." Truman replied, "Damn it, I keep forgetting." That's not a line likely to be uttered about Baker (who, among other things, oversaw the Florida recount in the 2000 election for George W. Bush).

Nor would it have been said about Clifford, who began his public career as Truman's counsel and campaign strategist. He was as smooth a Democratic operator as Baker has been a Republican one. Like Baker, Clifford had a velvet manner and the ability to touch his fingertips together in a way that could seem either sagacious or scheming, depending on who was watching.

When Johnson fired his controversial Defense secretary, Robert S. McNamara, in the midst of the Vietnam War, Clifford was called from semi-retirement to replace him. But as hard as he tried to appear like a wise old statesman, he continued to be dogged by his reputation as a political fix-it man and corporate operative whose hands, as time went on, seemed faintly soiled by partisan maneuvers and Arab money.

It is, unfortunately, easy to understand why Baker — and Lee H. Hamilton, Vernon E. Jordan Jr., Sandra Day O'Connor and the other estimables in his study group — have a difficult time achieving Lovett-like status in this day and age. The foremost reason is that foreign policy, like just about everything else in the age of blogs and cable TV and Florida recounts, is far more partisan.

In addition, politicians and the press play a substantially more aggressive gotcha game now than they used to. If he were around today, even a saintly gent like Lovett might have found himself on the defensive about the dealings of his partners and clients at Brown Brothers Harriman & Co., Union Pacific Railroad and Pan American Airways.

Yet there is a fundamental way in which Baker and his study group members resemble the wise elders of earlier eras. It is not in their nature to be transformationalists or radical visionaries, the way that the neoconservatives and democracy crusaders have been. When they congregate to stroke their chins and reach consensus, not a whole lot of crockery is in danger of being broken. Instead, they will generally tend to be cautious, pragmatic and (yes) wise.

This is partly institutional: Blue-ribbon consensus-seekers tend not to embrace radical or bold visions. It is also personal, especially in the case of the pragmatic realist Baker. He was the secretary of State who urged President George H.W. Bush not to try to occupy Baghdad during the Persian Gulf War in 1991, and he cautioned against the invasion of Iraq in 2003 before it even began.

Having been slammed for these positions by the neocons, he had a difficult time in his recent memoir suppressing his smug awareness that their transformationalist dreams are now seen to have produced what may be the worst foreign policy disaster in U.S. history.

If Baker and his posse can come up with a plan that salvages some threads of our national interest from the debacle of Iraq, and if he stays around to help implement it, that would be such an awesome magic trick that those of us who dabble with the first drafts of history should reward him by carving a niche in the pantheon for him somewhere between Lovett and Acheson.

It's easy to disparage stability and containment as foreign policy goals (as the neocons like to do) and to make fun of blue-ribbon chin-strokers. But the aspiration to be statesmanlike, even if it is partly motivated by the desire to polish a legacy, is a welcome trait these days. So too is the courage to be cautious and the confidence to be humble when it comes to foreign policy.

In our search for contemporary Wise Men, there is one irony that the builders of the original Pantheon would have noted. The closest person we have to a true Wise Man is someone who should be the easiest for the president to tap but, for reasons that only Sophocles or Shakespeare (or perhaps Freud) could explain, is actually the hardest: President Bush the elder.

He was a great realist who choreographed the end of the Cold War and the prudent execution of the first Gulf War. In lieu of him, his consigliere, James Baker, will have to serve as proxy. Fortunately, he is eager to don the mantle.

Even The Wise Men Can't Save Us In Iraq (WP)

By Daniel L. Byman

Washington is abuzz as reports about the findings of the Iraq Study Group grow from a trickle to a flow. Doves hope that the group's endorsement of troop withdrawals will be the first step in a speedy exit from Iraq. Hawks hope that the study group will leave enough wiggle room to support President Bush's commitment to remain in Iraq as long as necessary "to get the job done." All sides, in short, are looking to James A. Baker III, Lee H. Hamilton and the other commissioners to evaluate current policies and chart a path forward -- a job that normally should be carried out by, well, Congress and the White House.

Unfortunately, the bipartisan study group is almost certain to disappoint these high and contradictory expectations. This is not a statement on the abilities or intentions of the panel's members; rather, it is the simple realization of the potential pitfalls -- tepid recommendations, partisan divisions, little follow-up and eventual irrelevance -- that have beset countless commissions, study groups and blue ribbon panels since the nation's founding.

Indeed, commissions are nearly as old as the United States. In 1794, George Washington created one to help mediate the Whiskey Rebellion; it flopped, setting a sorry precedent for many of its successors.

Commissions do not come about by accident. Most are created after a disaster or tragedy, such as the Warren Commission investigating the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, or the 9/11 commission, on whose staff I served. Others come about in anticipation of a long-term crisis, such as the 1983 National Commission on Social Security Reform. Often special panels exist because Congress or outsiders do not trust the executive branch to investigate itself, as in the case of the Tower Commission, which examined the Iran-contra scandal. Still other commissions enable leaders to feign decisiveness while they kick the can down the road, such as the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence, which helped policymakers appear responsive to the assassinations of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and Sen. Robert F. Kennedy.

Finally, administrations create commissions because they want cover for an already planned change of course. "When it is hopeless," one veteran of several investigations put it to me, "people turn to a commission."

The Iraq Study Group has a touch of all these elements. It is investigating an ongoing policy disaster and proposing long-term solutions; Congress doesn't trust the administration to shift course alone; and all parties hope the commission will show that it is seeking new solutions and will provide cover for their preferred options. A tall order, and one unlikely to be met.

Just as politics leads to the creation of commissions, so, too, does it shape their membership. Political leaders of both parties often try to stack the ranks with their own people, and commissions are thus packed with inside-the-Beltway denizens. For example, Brent Scowcroft, the independent-minded national security adviser under President George H.W. Bush, is the quintessential commission member. Scowcroft has led or served on commissions on strategic forces, arms control and defense management; he was on the Tower Commission; and he has headed groups such as the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board. Such people bring gravitas and knowledge of Beltway realities to commissions, but overall, the overrepresentation of Washington insiders seldom promotes fresh thinking.

Once formed, commissions must find and propose something -- almost anything. Imagine if the Iraq Study Group concludes that there are few good options for Iraq. Such a conclusion would be patently true, but would disappoint everyone and also lead to questions about why the panel existed at all.

In reaching their findings, commission leaders strive to unify their members; otherwise they risk seeing their recommendations swallowed up by Washington's partisan politics. But consensus has its price. As Philip D. Zelikow and Ernest May, the executive director and a senior adviser, respectively, of the 9/11 commission, have written, "Keeping peace within a large and diverse staff and avoiding the appearance of partisan tilt sometimes requires muting interpretation." Unsurprisingly, Bush and Bill Clinton emerged largely unscathed from the 9/11 commission report, while bureaucracies that are not tied to either party -- such as the CIA -- took the lion's share of the blame.

Commissions don't want their findings leaked piecemeal and criticized preemptively, so secrecy is at a premium. As a result, some of their suggestions are not fully vetted, making it more likely that a panel will issue a proposal that is less sound or is unnecessarily contentious. As Hamilton and Thomas H. Kean wrote in their book on the 9/11 commission, "Secrecy is a precursor to cynicism and conspiracy theories."

By their very nature, commissions are temporary creations, often lacking the ability to follow up on their own recommendations. In congressional investigations, hearings can continue as long as a problem lingers unresolved, but commissions are like bees: They sting once and then die. They can make a splash with their recommendations, but savvy bureaucrats know that even widely publicized findings are often forgotten within weeks. How many in Washington, for instance, can remember the good ideas buried in the 2000 report of the National Commission on Terrorism, led by Ambassador L. Paul Bremer?

One of the innovations of the 9/11 commission was a follow-up effort -- known as the 9/11 Public Discourse Project -- that watchdogged the implementation of the panel's recommendations and gave various bureaucracies lousy grades in a widely publicized report card. Yet even that effort has fallen short at times. Democrats in Congress, who have long campaigned on implementing the 9/11 commission report, quickly abandoned that pledge upon recapturing the majority. The leadership has deciding against reorganizing congressional oversight of the intelligence community -- one of the panel's key recommendations. Reform, it seems, is for the other guy.

Indeed, commissions' greatest influence often comes years later, when another disaster leads congressional staffers or mid-level bureaucrats to blow the dust off the old tomes. For example, recommendations from the Hart-Rudman Commission on U.S. national security in the 21st century and the Gilmore Commission on U.S. preparedness for terrorist attacks involving weapons of mass destruction eventually helped create the Department of Homeland Security. But it took the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, when the government began casting about for ways to protect the nation from further terrorism, for these commission reports to seem relevant again.

Of all the hurdles ahead for the Baker-Hamilton group, the most daunting may prove strictly political. Many commissions have addressed technical policy issues -- say, how to better protect vulnerable U.S. embassies or other facilities worldwide. But the Iraq Study Group exists not just to solve a policy problem, but also to fill a political vacuum. To date, neither the administration nor Democrats have admitted the horrific costs of either staying in Iraq or withdrawing troops. For more than a year now, some of the top minds in the military have thought hard about how to change course in Iraq and still win, and some improvements in doctrine and training have emerged. But broadly speaking, there is no technical fix to Iraq that is lying in a musty drawer in the Pentagon. And technical answers don't address the most difficult political questions: What are U.S. interests in Iraq? How would a pullout affect U.S. interests beyond Iraq? And how many more American lives and taxpayer dollars will we risk to protect those interests?

Commissions at times fall back on politically easy answers, or simply bypass the most important questions. Despite the centrality of Iraq to the fight against terrorism, the 9/11 commission basically dodged the war altogether, but it did have time to make a host of recommendations on intelligence restructuring and first-responder radio spectrums. Similarly, the otherwise hard-hitting Robb-Silberman investigation of the intelligence community's performance with regard to Iraq's WMD programs took a dive on the key political question in the public mind: whether the White House manipulated the prewar intelligence.

For the Iraq Study Group, a similarly easy answer would be an uncritical endorsement of "handing off" security to Iraqi forces -- a policy that the Bush administration and Democrats support, and one too often discussed as a nearly magical way to prevent a collapse in Iraq while drawing down U.S. forces. Yet the Iraqi army and police are corrupt, poorly trained, and penetrated by insurgents and militias. Reforming Iraqi security forces is vital, but it is a decade-long effort. They will not be ready to assume responsibility for security in troubled areas or otherwise ease the U.S. burden in the near-term.

The two leaders of the Iraq Study Group are experienced Washington hands who do not need to worry about their findings hurting their popularity or future job prospects. They are respected across the political aisle, and each is willing to criticize his own party's positions. But because they are unlikely to find a technical fix to the Iraq war's political problems, their greatest contribution will be initiating, rather than concluding, a broader debate on how to proceed. In such a debate, the best choices will not (and should not) earn unanimity. A serious escalation is probably necessary to "win" in Iraq, and this will require hundreds of billions more dollars and hundreds of thousands more U.S. troops. If winning is too demanding and politically unfeasible, then the United States must think creatively about ways to draw down significantly while still maintaining some influence in the Iraqi snake pit.

Washington has dithered long enough rather than face these hard, unpalatable choices. At best, the Iraq Study Group will catalyze our leadership and help foster the political will to accept this painful reality. But salvation? Forget about it.

Iraqi Shiite Leader To Prod Bush On Iran (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi And Qassim Abdul-Zahra, Associated Press Writers

AP, December 3, 2006

A Shiite powerbroker reviled by Sunni Arabs for his ties to Iran and a militia linked to sectarian violence will ask President Bush to seek Iran's help in their upcoming White House meeting and try to allay U.S. concerns over Iranian influence in Iraq.

Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who is due to meet with Bush on Monday, on Saturday dismissed speculation that his trip to the United States threatened the authority of beleaguered Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who came under criticism for meeting with Bush last week in Jordan.

"This trip to Washington was planned a long time ago and has nothing to do with the meetings that took place in Amman," al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, Iraq's largest Shiite party, told reporters in Amman, Jordan, before his departure.

Al-Hakim is arguably the most powerful Shiite politician in Iraq, but he prefers to work behind the scenes. He wanted a close SCIRI associate, Adil Abdul-Mahdi, to be prime minister after elections in December, but grudgingly accepted al-Maliki as a compromise. The two men have since maintained a public image of cooperation to safeguard the ruling coalition.

Speculation in Iraq that al-Hakim was emerging as a rival for Washington's attention was fueled in part by an internal White House memo that questioned al-Maliki's authority and his ability to handle Iraq's worsening security.

Written by National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley after he met al-Maliki in Baghdad, the memo also spoke of the need for the Iraqi leader to end his alliance with the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose militia, the Mahdi Army, is blamed for much of Iraq's sectarian violence.

The timing of al-Hakim's meeting with Bush raised the possibility that Washington may also be looking for additional sources of help as it tries to stabilize Iraq, allowing a drawdown on U.S. forces to begin.

Bush's pledges of support for al-Maliki and his Monday meeting with al-Hakim also coincide with an ongoing debate within his administration on whether to abandon efforts to persuade Sunni Arabs to halt their insurgency and instead leave that task to the Shiites and Kurds, according to U.S. officials familiar with the re-evaluation process.

Two al-Maliki aides and third close to al-Hakim said the prime minister and the SCIRI leader had discussed the White House visit. The aides, who spoke on condition of anonymity in exchange for disclosing confidential information, said al-Hakim was expected to try to persuade Bush to enlist Iran's help in quelling violence in Iraq. In return, they said, al-Hakim would pledge not to allow Iran to use him to promote its own interests, said by analysts to be "controlled chaos" that keeps the United States preoccupied with Iraq.

Al-Hakim has close links with Shiite Iran, where he lived in exile for years before he returned to Iraq after the 2003 ouster of Saddam Hussein's Sunni-led regime. His Badr Brigade militia, trained and armed by the Iranians, is blamed for some of Iraq's sectarian violence.

Badr, however, has mostly stayed out of the limelight, leaving the focus on another Shiite militia, the less disciplined and less secretive Mahdi Army.

Al-Hakim's militia links and close ties to Iran, however, have gone unmentioned by Washington, perhaps in recognition of his political leverage.

The two al-Maliki aides, meanwhile, said the Iraqi prime minister won a pledge from Bush to avoid directly involving Washington's Sunni Arab allies — like Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia — who have become alarmed at the rise of Iraq's majority Shiites.

The two aides, who were both briefed by al-Maliki on his meeting, also said Bush again demanded assurances from the Iraqi leader that he would deal swiftly with the Mahdi Army.

Al-Maliki, they said, countered that the militia would cease to be a problem when Iraq's security forces take over from the U.S. military, which al-Maliki said will happen by June.

Al-Maliki has yet to take any concrete action against the Mahdi Army. Al-Sadr's support ensured al-Maliki's election to his job and many in Iraq believe that beholds him to the radical cleric.

The aides, however, said al-Maliki remained committed to diplomacy in dealing with al-Sadr and his militia for the time being and sought to play down the boycott of the government and parliament by 30 lawmakers and five Cabinet members loyal to al-Sadr.

The boycott was announced Wednesday to protest against al-Maliki's meeting with Bush, an encounter the Sadrists said amounted to an insult to Iraqis. They said a timetable for the withdrawal of foreign troops in Iraq and an improvement in public services like electricity were their condition to end the boycott.

"We have not abandoned al-Maliki, but we ask that he too does not abandon us," said Sadrist lawmaker Nasser al-Saadi. "We are an important part of the government and if al-Maliki took our boycott to be an embarrassment to him, so be it. We don't care."

Hendawi was reporting in Baghdad; Abdul-Zahra was in Amman, Jordan.

Exodus From Iraq Unsettles Mideast (BOS)

By Thanassis Cambanis

The Boston Globe, December 3, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan -- As Iraq's bloodshed worsens, the tide of refugees fleeing the country is straining the region's resources and inflaming fears that Iraq's sectarian conflict might spread to neighboring countries.

A new United Nations report says Iraq is "hemorrhaging" refugees in staggering numbers. Anywhere from 2,000 to 3,000 people are fleeing the country every day.

After 3 1/2 years of nearly constant warfare, at least 1.5 million Iraqi refugees have moved to neighboring countries, reshaping the already complex demographic mosaics of Jordan, Syria, and Lebanon. The influx has prompted government crackdowns and anger from local populations who feel refugees are grabbing scarce jobs and resources.

Another 1.5 million people are displaced inside Iraq, many of them clamoring to leave but lacking the resources. Humanitarian agencies fear this group will drive a continued exodus that could quickly double the already massive refugee population in the region.

The mass migration out of the country is transforming the region's culture, a diaspora rivaled in size only by the 3 million Palestinian refugees, including descendants of those who fled conflicts with Israel since 1948. With no end in sight to the fighting in Iraq, governments in Syria and Jordan worry that Iraqis are becoming the new Palestinians -- a permanent refugee population that will import its sectarian and religious squabbles into the host countries.

But what makes this spiraling refugee crisis different, and uniquely unsettling to Iraq's neighbors, is that a great proportion of those with the resources to flee are rich and well-educated -- and thus able to command more influence than migrants with no resources.

Iraq's refugee crisis has had the most pronounced effect on Jordan, a US-allied kingdom with a population of only 4 million, as many as half of whom are Palestinian refugees.

An estimated 700,000 Iraqis are living in Jordan in a semi-legal limbo. The richest and most powerful Iraqis have long had offices and second homes in Amman, from where they can conduct business and politics with far more safety than in Baghdad.

Until recently, when Jordan began turning away Iraqis at the border, the poorest also poured into Amman -- the most convenient major city, with relatively convenient access to Iraq.

In the first two years of the war, Jordan admitted the refugees with few restrictions. But when Iraqi suicide bombers struck three Amman hotels a year ago, the kingdom reversed course, limiting the number of residency permits, turning away men between the ages of 18 and 35, and rounding up and deporting Iraqis.

Mustafa Ahmed, 29, an unemployed blacksmith, roams Amman's poor downtown, a warren of cheap clothing stores, flophouses, and street corners where day laborers seek jobs.

Ahmed said he's terrified that he'll be deported like his cousin, who was put on a bus from Amman to Baghdad two months ago when police caught him in a roundup. Halfway home, Sunni insurgents in Anbar Province pulled the cousin from the bus; when they saw his Shi'ite name on his identity card, Ahmed said, they executed him.

"If I go back, I will be killed on the road," Ahmed said, drawing a finger across his throat. Dressed in ratty workman's clothes, soiled jeans, and a dirty jacket, he spends his time drinking tea at a restaurant in downtown Amman frequented by other poor Iraqi refugees.

Syria is schooling the children of the 600,000 Iraqi refugees who live there. But Jordan has barred its already inadequate school system to Iraqis; only those Iraqis rich enough to afford private school can educate their children in Jordan.

Kristele Younes, a researcher who tracks displaced Iraqis in Lebanon, Syria, and Jordan for the nonprofit advocacy group Refugees International, said Syria has been the most welcoming country for Iraqis, but like other Arab countries was running out of resources.

"Very slowly but surely, Iraqis are starting to be treated like Palestinians," Younes said in a telephone interview from Washington, where her group is based. "There is a complete lack of political will in the region to admit that these people are not going home any time soon."

Another group, Human Rights Watch, issued a scathing report last week, calling on Jordan to treat displaced Iraqis as refugees, allowing them to stay until the conflict in Iraq subsided and granting them basic rights, including public education for children.

Jordan and Syria are wary of Iraqis spreading that country's sectarian strife. Most countries face their own version of Shi'ite-Sunni rivalry and work hard to keep it from becoming violent.

UN agencies and human rights groups said they have gathered anecdotal evidence, based on interviews with refugees, that Jordan is seeking to buttress its own Sunni Arab population by allowing Iraqi Sunnis across its borders but denying haven to Shi'ites.

The organizations have no hard data on the demographics of the refugees, and none of the host governments will release any information about the refugee populations inside their borders.

Syria, meanwhile, is ruled by a small minority of Alawites, a small breakaway Shi'ite sect. The same observers believe that Syria has allowed Shi'ites and Christians who will support the regime to settle, but made it hard for Sunni Arabs. An outer ring of predominantly Shi'ite suburbs around the Syrian capital, Damascus, has exploded in population over the last three years, absorbing most of the Iraqi refugees.

Bill Frelick, refugee policy director at Human Rights Watch, who researched and wrote the report on Jordan's treatment of Iraqi refugees, said Jordanians had recently started to block entry by young men and poor Iraqis.

"The people they're admitting are better off," he said.

Most refugees haven't officially registered with the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, which normally handles refugee crises, because the agency has no resources to handle the influx and has stopped processing claims for refugee status. Aid groups have called on international donors -- in particular the United States and Britain, which led the invasion of Iraq -- to help host countries cover the costs of refugees.

But according to the UN estimates, Iraq is the second-greatest producer of refugees in the world, after Afghanistan. The actual number of refugees could easily top 2 million, UN officials said. About 10 percent of Iraq's prewar population of 26 million has fled the country over the last three years.

"Iraq is hemorrhaging. The humanitarian crisis which the international community had feared in 2003 is now unfolding," the UN High Commissioner for Refugees said in its November update. And because of insufficient resources in countries like Jordan and Syria, "tolerance is growing thin," the report added.

In Jordan, a population already suffering from high unemployment has begun to turn against the wealthy Iraqis who have snapped up apartments, created jobs -- usually for other Iraqis -- and created an investment boom that only benefits the very rich.

"They have driven up the prices of everything. They have brought nothing good here," said Nawruz Abida, who delivers tea and water pipes to downtown Amman shops. His family's rent has doubled since the influx of Iraqi refugees, Abida said.

Host countries are all too aware of Iraq's history of conflict.

Amman has become a home away from home for many Sunni Arabs sympathetic to the nationalist insurgency. Even before the fall of Saddam Hussein, Ba'athists and wealthy supporters of the regime had long had business and political ties to the elite in Jordan and Syria, and many now have taken refuge there.

"Only bringing back Saddam can restore stability," said Saleh Jabouri, a merchant who fled Baghdad six months ago and now moves between Damascus and Amman whenever his tourist visa expires.

Abbas F. Shamara, an Iraqi Shi'ite whose company builds power plants in Iraq, runs millions of dollars worth of construction projects in Jordan and the rest of the Middle East. He has homes in Amman and Baghdad and is nominally a refugee -- but he has residency in Jordan and has enrolled his three children in school there.

Shamara, 53, advises a senior Shi'ite cleric in Baghdad and commands the ear of many influential Americans and Iraqis because of the money at his disposal. His holding company has created several hundred jobs for Jordanians, and is building a new office tower in Amman, in part to blunt criticism that Iraqi migrants do nothing for their host countries.

"We've put millions of dollars into Jordan's economy," Shamara said in his Amman office. In contrast with Jordan, Shi'ites fit more comfortably in Syria, whose government is battling its own growing fundamentalist Sunni population. Syria has close ties to Iran, and last month restored diplomatic ties with the Baghdad government after a 24-year rupture.

With wealth and swagger unusual for a refugee population, the Iraqi exodus is already changing the fashion and the culture of the Middle East. That's no more apparent than in the nightlife of the cities the refugees now call home.

At 1 a.m. on a Tuesday at Amman's Al Zawyeh music club, a traditional Iraqi tribal singer belts out heart-rending folk songs about the nation, family, and war. It's a slow night; an older Iraqi couple sings along, and the woman rises from her table to dance slowly on the stage in front of the singer, Fadil Zeidan.

The club started out five years ago as a gallery for Iraqi artists, with Saddam Hussein as an investor. After the US invasion, however, and the flood of Iraqis to Amman, the gallery owners shuttered their restaurant chain in Iraq and turned Zawyeh into a music club.

Saif Ghariba, 24, the owner's son, said Baghdad's elite quickly reassembled in Amman and sought its old entertainments. The club has a distinctly Sunni and Ba'athist style, decorated with the heavy wood panels and well-lit whiskey bar characteristic of the haunts in Baghdad neighborhoods like Mansour and Jadriya that were fancied by the ruling Ba'athist class before the US invasion.

"Iraqis fled here and wanted to hear their music," Ghariba said. "Our music is full of poetry and emotion."

In Iraq, An Obligation Coming Due (WP)

By Michael Goldfarb

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Every time I read about the United States pulling out while Iraq takes the final step into the abyss of civil war, I find myself thinking of a conversation I had with my translator and my driver in April 2003 as the first phase of the war was reaching its climax.

We were coming back from inspecting the damage caused by American airstrikes in a small town at the edge of Saddam Hussein's control in northern Iraq. My translator, Ahmad Shawkat, and driver, Sami Abdul Qader, were chatting in Kurdish.

"What are you guys talking about?" I asked.

"Sami wants to know if you will help him and his family get out of Iraq if Saddam comes back."

"Is he joking?" I said with a casual laugh. "Tell him, yeah, sure, no problem."

"No, he is very serious," Ahmad said. "He cannot believe Saddam will go without a fight. Sami's afraid that because he works with Americans he will be killed."

"Really?"

"Really."

It took me a second to absorb this. Sami was absolutely fearless. Several days earlier we'd come under artillery fire while watching Green Berets and Kurdish pesh merga trying to secure a bridge on the road from Irbil to Mosul. Ahmad and I were roaming through pastureland with the Green Berets and Sami was with the car when the artillery piece opened up. All the other drivers working with reporters on the scene pulled well back. Sami stayed right down by the bridge as the shells came in, refusing to leave us behind.

That he was now genuinely afraid seemed odd, because what he feared was quite improbable. Baghdad was on the verge of falling. As we were having this conversation, American troops were preparing to pull down the statue of Hussein in Firdaus Square.

But my driver's fear was not without basis. I've seen what happens when the "international community" precipitously pulls out of conflict zones. To have had an American job -- working for journalists or for nongovernmental organizations -- is not a good thing at those times.

This is the way things work in war zones: We go, they stay. If the whole escapade falls apart, American journalists and relief workers are evacuated and can be swimming in a hotel pool, all expenses paid, by evening. Our translators, drivers and office managers return to their houses and wait in fear of reprisal against those who collaborate with the Great Satan.

And this is the thought that nags me now. I call a friend in northern Iraq (I'll omit his identification; bad people read this newspaper online at Internet cafes in Iraq). He works for an American nongovernmental organization as a trainer, trying to help people in Iraq relearn the "democratic mentality" gouged out of Iraqi civil society by a quarter-century of totalitarian rule.

We chat about the U.S. midterm elections, and he asks if it's really possible that America will leave Iraq. I assure him it is. Not overnight, I tell him, although I can see a dramatic reduction in troops by the end of 2007.

But they are building the biggest embassy in the world in Baghdad, he says, and what about the businesses Americans have started, and the oil?

I reply: My friend, you have no idea what will be left behind once the decision is made.

I think of this brave young man traveling all over his country offering seminars on democracy and wonder what will happen to him and those who have attended his training sessions when the United States draws down its force and says to whatever government is in place in Baghdad, "Fellas, it's on you." Provision needs to be made for their safety.

On the drive back to Irbil that hopeful afternoon 3 1/2 years ago, as the metaphorical noose was tied around the neck of Hussein's statue in Baghdad, I reached across into the front seat and put my hand on my driver's shoulder. I looked at my translator. "Tell Sami he has nothing to fear." I paused so he could translate that sentence. "Saddam is finished, but if anything happens, I will make sure he is safe. And his family."

When Ahmad finished translating, I turned to Sami, who spoke some English and said, "Okay?" It was an easy promise to make, since I believed I would never have to honor it. Now I fear I may have to.

"About Five Minutes Into It, We Had To Take Over" (WP)

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 2 -- The bullets flew from every direction -- from rooftops, windows, alleys and doorways.

Soldiers from the Iraqi army's 9th Division were pinned against a wall. They were under a covered sidewalk. According to accounts from U.S. forces who were with them on Friday, a suspected insurgent with an AK-47 assault rifle aimed at them from a doorway. Pieces of concrete fell as the insurgent's fire ripped into the wall above the Iraqi soldiers.

That's when they froze.

U.S. Army Sgt. 1st Class Kent McQueen, 37, arrived to help. As he tried to get them out, he was hit. The night-vision goggles perched on his helmet fell down his face. They were dented. He had been shot in the head. "God was definitely on my side," McQueen said Saturday.

The scene played out during Operation Lion Strike, the U.S. soldiers recalled. The goal was to capture insurgents in the Fadhil district of central Baghdad. It was the first time the Iraqi army's 9th Division was to be in complete control of an operation in the two years it has been training under the Americans. Teams of U.S. advisers remained close, but planned to leave the fighting to the Iraqis.

"It started out that way. But about five minutes into it, we had to take over," Staff Sgt. Michael Baxter, 35, said.

While the battle was in progress, U.S. military leaders had called it an "outstanding" example of Iraqi forces taking charge. They said the Iraqis captured 43 insurgents while suffering few casualties.

But interviews the following day with U.S. and Iraqi soldiers at Camp al-Rashid in Rustimayah, where they are based, painted a more complex picture.

Strengthening Iraq's police and army is the key to the eventual withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq, American commanders say. The bipartisan Iraq Study Group, in its report due to be released next week, is expected to recommend pulling out nearly all U.S. combat units from Iraq by early 2008 and leaving behind troops such as those involved in Friday's fight in Fadhil to train, advise and support Iraqi forces.

Although the Iraqis in the 9th Division have become more effective in the two years since they formed, American soldiers and some Iraqi leaders at Camp al-Rashid said they are not yet ready to operate on their own.

"They're basically a baby army," Baxter said. "They're just now starting up. It's going to take them a while to get the experience."

The unit, the only mechanized division in the Iraqi army, has about 4,000 soldiers.

They are typically older soldiers, recruited from across the country, said Col. Douglass S. Heckman, the senior adviser for the 9th Division Military Transition Team, whose members are part of the 1st Cavalry Division. When U.S. troops first began rebuilding the Iraqi army after the 2003 invasion, recruits would drop out if they were deployed away from their homes, Heckman said. "These guys are not afraid to go anywhere," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0101091

The U.S. military is increasingly ceding more authority to Iraqi leaders, Heckman said. For example, personnel decisions are now up to Iraqi leaders. "It inspires a lot of confidence to have Iraqi units with Iraqi flags," he said.

That confidence appeared to have been shaken on Friday. In one three-block section of Fadhil in a neighborhood known as Jumhuriya, 35 Iraqi soldiers came under fire as soon as they arrived at 6 a.m., their American advisers recalled.

For any army, however well trained, the Jumhuriya battle would have been a difficult one. There were empty shops and tall buildings where snipers could easily hide. The streets were narrow, preventing easy movement of tanks.

The Iraqis knew little about their enemy. They could not quantify them. They couldn't distinguish between a civilian and an insurgent because everyone dressed alike, the Americans and Iraqis said.

Their enemy, however, appeared to know a lot about them. Somehow, they knew where the Americans and Iraqis had set up one of two field headquarters and fired mortar shells at it, said Maj. Thomas J. Boczar.

The Jumhuriya battle was just one small part of Friday's operation, which involved about 500 Iraqis conducting searches and 60 Americans advising them. Other parts of the operation ran smoothly, high-ranking American officers said.

But it was a window on the challenges U.S. forces face in training the Iraqis.

Sitting in a conference room at Camp al-Rashid, American soldiers described Iraqi troops with inadequate training, resources or motivation. When they shoot, they "pray and spray" and do not aim for targets, the soldiers said. They either lack equipment or are not well trained in new equipment. On the battlefield on Friday, the Iraqis communicated by cellphone because their walkie-talkies did not work, the U.S. soldiers said.

The way the Americans see it, the Iraqis are fierce fighters. But they have been depleted of their energy after so many years of war, first against Iran in the 1980s, then against the United States during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, the American soldiers said.

By about 11 a.m. on Friday, the Americans decided it was time to pull out of that part of Jumhuriya.

The sniper bullets kept flying, not just from the rooftops, but from the second and third floors of apartment buildings, they recalled. Grenades flew out the windows. Machine guns fired. It was an all-out ambush, unusual in that it was such a coordinated effort by the insurgents, the Americans said.

While some Iraqis froze in indecision, others fired wildly as they ran across streets. Hollywood heroics, one soldier called it.

"I'm just thinking to myself, oh God, get me out of this because these guys are going to get me killed if we stay here," Baxter said.

The Americans called in helicopters to shoot at the snipers, but it was too chaotic of a scene for the aircraft to make clear shots, they said.

Still pinned against the wall underneath the covered sidewalk, McQueen decided it was time to make a run for his Humvee, he recalled. In Arabic, he told the Iraqis to go.

They gave him a puzzled look. Follow me, he told them. This time they complied.

McQueen got into the Humvee first, then opened the back door. Bullets whizzed by. He pulled the soldiers inside as the Humvee drove away. They squeezed in under the gunner. They jumped on top of one another. "It looked like Twister," McQueen said.

Top Iraqi leaders at the base said the mission proved that they can someday secure their own country without interference from American forces. What they lack is not training, not motivation, not confidence, but equipment, they said. They need better tanks and spare parts, Iraqi officials said. And they really need aircraft.

"Give us the aviation and leave us alone," Brig. Gen. Kasim Maliki, a 25-year veteran of the army, said through an interpreter.

Friday's operation was planned over the course of 48 hours, in consultation with the Defense Ministry, Maliki said.

He scoffed at the idea that the Iraqi army needs better training to carry out such missions. "We have been through wars," he said over a cup of sweet tea.

Lt. Col. Bassim Mohammed, who joined the Iraqi army in 1987, said he did not believe his men were prepared for Friday's operation because they had so little notice. He said he found out about the mission at midnight, and they left at 3:30 a.m. That was not enough time to secure the perimeter, he said.

They encountered more than 100 insurgents, he said, and killed or wounded about 20 of them. He said he believes his soldiers could have better handled so many insurgents with more notice.

"We've never suffered the way we did yesterday," he said.

Behind the official reports proclaiming steady progress, U.S. officers involved in training Iraqi security forces have found it a difficult and even puzzling process. Below are two excerpts from official debriefing interviews conducted by historians at the Army's Combat Studies Institute at Fort Leavenworth, Kan. Both illustrate the cultural chasm between U.S. and Iraqi soldiers.

"I think they looked at us as a necessary annoyance. . . . When we arrived, the main CP [Command Post] was a TV watching room for Lebanese music videos and soccer games. . . . There were no communications. After about a month or two, they actually pulled the [military] radio out of the CP because it was hard to listen to the TV with the radio on. So we launched a full-court press to change that and actually build a main CP. They fought us and resisted because it was hard work and they didn't see the need for it. This was common with the Arab and Kurdish soldiers and leadership. But after we trained them on it and we got it running, it became a point of pride."

Army Maj. Jeffrey Allen, who advised the Iraqi army in 2004, recalls how an Iraqi battalion commander demanded that he possess one of two available computers -- even though he didn't know how to use it:

"They were authorized ten and two laptops or something like that. Ten computers overall. They had two. We're trying to build this battalion, so I wanted one to go to the S-3 [operations officer] for doing training calendars and all those types of things, and one for the S-1 [personnel officer] for all his accountability, but it would have to be shared amongst the staff. One of those two computers sat on the battalion commander's desk for weeks, not turned on, collecting dust. It was a status symbol for him: he had a computer on his desk. He had no idea how to even turn it on, but it didn't matter -- it was sitting on his desk."

Review Finds Army Mishandled Friendly-Fire Case (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Army officials destroyed critical evidence that could have determined who shot and killed Pfc. Jesse R. Buryj at an Iraq checkpoint in May 2004, one of several problems with the friendly-fire inquiry that may permanently shroud Buryj's death in mystery, according to an Army inspector general's review.

The lengthy inquiry found that criminal investigators destroyed bullet fragments, agents failed to collect ballistic evidence from weapons at the checkpoint, medical personnel made incorrect notations on Buryj's records and military officials knew his death was a friendly-fire case months before they officially notified his family.

As a result, Buryj's family buried him believing he was killed when his vehicle was rammed by a dump truck. They did not learn that he was shot by friendly forces until nine months after his death, and a lack of physical evidence means it is nearly impossible to know what happened that night.

Buryj's death -- which came just days after the high-profile friendly-fire killing of former football player Pat Tillman in Afghanistan -- also exposed a rift between U.S. and Polish forces. A group of Polish allied troops was also manning the checkpoint, and U.S. officials sought to blame them for the soldier's death.

The inspector general found no specific effort to cover up the incident. The review shows, however, that initial investigators believed there was a need for international sensitivity. One unnamed investigator told the inspector general that there was a sense that U.S. investigators could not "say anything bad about the Poles," even though they were convinced Polish shots killed Buryj (pronounced BOO-dee). Investigators ultimately ruled that the Poles probably fired the fatal shot.

Peggy Buryj of Canton, Ohio, has long believed that details of her son's death were obscured or delayed to protect members of his unit or Polish troops in 2004, an election year during which President Bush often praised Poland's contribution to the fight against terrorism. Buryj said she is still furious about the way the Army has handled her son's case, and she feels it has now slammed the door.

"They said that anything that could go wrong did go wrong, that it was a series of unfortunate mistakes," she said after an Army briefing. "They apologized, and I think they were sincere in their apology. But the whole thing just shows incompetence, from the notification to the very end."

Jesse Buryj, 21, of Canton was killed on May 5, 2004, when an Iraqi dump truck sped through a coalition military checkpoint in Karbala and ultimately crashed into his vehicle, sending him tumbling to the ground. Soldiers initially believed that the fall injured Buryj, but he actually took fire from either the U.S. troops around him or the Polish troops nearby. A bullet pierced his back and caused massive internal injuries.

Later, when Buryj's family learned that a gunshot killed him, they believed it was hostile fire, though the people found in the dump truck were not carrying weapons.

The 47-page report, presented to Buryj's family by the Army's inspector general, Lt. Gen. Stanley E. Green, found that criminal investigators failed to conduct ballistic tests on four U.S. weapons fired that night and did not collect Polish weapons for testing.

Because the case was incorrectly labeled a hostile death, criminal investigators inadvertently destroyed the only evidence that could be used to identify a weapon -- a 5.56mm bullet fragment -- in the fall of 2005. At that time, criminal investigators destroyed evidence in a number of hostile-death cases in which evidence could not be matched to individual weapons, and Buryj's case was mistakenly among them, the report said.

"Before September 2005, CID kept the bullet extracted from PFC Buryj as evidence," the report said, referring to the Criminal Investigations Division. "Had the four U.S. weapons been tested, this might have eliminated doubts over whether U.S. weapons fired the fatal round."

The report also exposed a casualty reporting system marred by gaps and inconsistencies. The Buryj case, along with others, prompted major changes in the way the Army notifies families of war casualties. Those new policies were put into effect in April, three months after Buryj's story was reported publicly and after the secretary of the Army asked for a review.

Col. Patrick Gawkins, director of the Army Casualty and Mortuary Affairs Operation Center, said mistakes in the case "prevented a more timely, accurate notification" of the family. He noted that the complexity of the situation added to the confusion and that a vast majority of cases are reported correctly.

"Providing accurate casualty circumstances when you are attempting to rapidly notify a family of a loss is an extremely challenging task," Gawkins said. "We have continued to improve all aspects of casualty support because this is precisely what we owe our fallen soldiers and our families. We have definitely analyzed the Buryj case and other publicized cases to identify problems and fix the system."

Typically, casualty officials in the United States track such deaths via medical records, investigative reports and official notifications from the field. Though Army officials claimed to have notified the family about the nature of Buryj's death not long after it occurred, there are no records of such a conversation, according to the report. Incorrect medical records led to incorrect entries in Buryj's casualty report, which in turn led to incorrect information getting to the family.

"The casualty reporting in the PFC Buryj case was often inaccurate and untimely," leading to errors and delays, according to the inspector general's report.

One of the delays that particularly bothers Peggy Buryj concerns the final investigative report, which places responsibility on the Polish troops. It was completed by Multi-National Corps-Iraq on Sept. 6, 2004, 124 days after the incident. It was then forwarded to the U.S. Central Command weeks before the U.S. elections but stayed there until Feb. 18, 2005 -- a total of 165 additional days.

Polish officials have repeatedly disputed the U.S. findings, saying their troops were not responsible for Buryj's death. The inspector general found that U.S. criminal investigative agents were aware of the international sensitivities and the fact that the loose military coalition was losing members at the time.

Peggy Buryj said she is resigned to the idea that she may never know what happened to her son.

"I feel like I gave them my son and they've done nothing but dishonor him," she said.

From Skies To Streets, Woman Warriors Face The Enemy And Change Military Landscape (AP)

By Sharon Cohen

AP, December 2, 2006

A goodwill mission to deliver kerosene heaters to Iraqi schools erupts into the fiery chaos of a roadside bombing — and Maj. Mary Prophit shields a comrade so he can rescue a critically burned Iraqi soldier.

A convoy outside Baghdad is ambushed by machine-gun wielding Iraqi insurgents — and Spc. Ashley Pullen races down a road to save an injured sergeant.

A Black Hawk helicopter is struck by a rocket-propelled grenade in Iraq — and co-pilot Tammy Duckworth, bloody and severely wounded, struggles to stay conscious until the damaged aircraft is down and her crew is safe.

In Iraq and Afghanistan, women warriors are writing a new chapter in military history, serving by the tens of thousands, fending off enemy fire and taking on — and succeeding in — high-profile roles in the battlefield and the skies as never before.

"The American public is beginning to realize that women are playing an equal part in this war and that they are facing the same risks," says Duckworth, who lost both legs in the 2004 insurgent attack. "This is the first time in our nation's history ... when it's normal to see female names as part of the war wounded or those killed in action."

More than 155,000 women have been deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan since 2002, according to the Pentagon, nearly four times the number during the Persian Gulf War. Females now account for 15% of the active duty force.

The number of women casualties — 68 dead and more than 430 injured — represents a tiny fraction of the total. Still, by one estimate, the deaths exceed the number of military women who lost their lives in Korea, Vietnam and the Gulf War combined.

The public, long accustomed to seeing disabled male veterans and grieving widows clutching folded U.S. flags, has adjusted to a new set of somber images: women soldiers coming home with life-changing injuries and tearful farewells to mothers, wives and daughters.

In just two weeks in September, bombs killed four military women in Iraq and Afghanistan. Among them: Sgt. 1st Class Merideth Howard, a 52-year-old former firefighter with a master's degree in marine biology, and 2nd Lt. Emily J.T. Perez, a 23-year-old West Point graduate of the "Class of 9-11" who played the clarinet, spoke fluent German, read the Bible daily and helped start an AIDS ministry at her church.

There is no shared experience that binds together the women of war. Each has a different story, a reason why they're in uniform, an explanation of how their lives have changed.

Some feel pressured to prove themselves as women. Others don't. Some never fire their weapons. Others engage in life-and-death battles. Some are professional soldiers. Others enlist for college money. A few are grandmothers; many more are in their 20s.

Almost all serve anonymously, though a few have captured headlines back home. Former Brig. Gen. Janis Karpinski made news as the highest-ranking officer punished in the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal. Jessica Lynch, the former prisoner of war, rocketed onto the nation's TV screens when she was portrayed as a guns-blazing, all-American heroine — a depiction she herself disavowed.

But Lynch's job — Army supply clerk in a maintenance company — illustrates one of the realities of the war: No place is safe. As the insurgency took hold, that grew even more apparent. Front lines don't exist. Combat troops still face the heaviest losses and while women are mostly in support roles, a mortar or bomb can strike anywhere from a mess hall to a supply convoy.

"My dad has friends who constantly tell him, 'Oh, your daughter's fine in Iraq. She's not in harm's way or she's not involved in combat,'" says Capt. Mary Caruso, who served two tours in Iraq, one as a platoon leader in the 194th Military Police Company.

"I don't think the general public really sees what females are doing over there," she says. "We don't have a linear battlefield anymore. The enemy's everywhere."

Women are barred from units assigned to direct ground combat — the infantry, armor and artillery, for example. While many remain in traditional jobs, such as health care, they've also served as translators and mechanics, commanded police companies and support battalions, flown jet fighters and attack helicopters.

They've been heroes, too.

In the Kentucky National Guard's 617th Military Police Company, Army Sgt. Leigh Ann Hester became the first woman since World War II to win the Silver Star for heroism. After a supply convoy was ambushed, she and others counterattacked, killing more than two dozen insurgents.

Spc. Ashley Pullen, another member of the unit, received a Bronze Star for valor, risking her life to help save a wounded soldier in the same attack. In recommending her for a medal, her company commander praised her "incredible courage."

"We now know women can hold their own, they're brave, they do have the physical and mental stamina to face combat-like situations," says retired Navy Capt. Lory Manning, director of the Women in the Military Project at the Women's Research and Education Institute in Washington, D.C. "We now know that men don't go to pieces and the American public doesn't go to pieces if women are killed. And we know that women, in fact, can defend men."

Manning says that represents a change in perceptions.

"I used to get a lot of guff that women can't do this, that women are weakening the military, women are feminizing the military — that's gone with the wind," she says. "The debate about whether they belong there seems to be over."

Not quite. Though women are widely viewed as essential with the nation's fighting forces stretched thin and they perform jobs off-limits to men for cultural reasons — searching Iraqi females, for instance — the critics have not been silenced.

"Engaging the enemy in this uncivilized thing we call war is a job for men, not women," Kate O'Beirne, a conservative pundit and Washington editor of the National Review, said in a radio interview this spring. She likened it to a man sending his wife or daughter to check out a possible home break-in.

Martin van Creveld, a prominent military historian and Iraq war critic, argues the contribution of females in the conflict has been dramatically exaggerated. "They're not occupying any particularly important positions or fighting in the front ... If there were not a single woman (deployed), the war would be the same," he says.

The Center for Military Readiness, a conservative think tank, contends that the Army has ignored its rules that prevent female soldiers from being in units that "physically collocate and remain with" ground combat troops.

Elaine Donnelly, the center's president, says that creates the potential for romantic involvement, morale problems and physical hazards. A woman, she says, might not be strong enough to rescue a wounded male soldier.

"All these social issues do matter," she says. "Cohesion is what lives depend on. It's all about survival. If you start causing doubts, you make the job more difficult or dangerous for everybody."

Last year, some members of Congress tried to curb the role of women in combat zones, but retreated after running into opposition from the Pentagon and lawmakers from both parties.

Capt. Christine Roney was tangled in the debate in 2004 when she was about to take command of a forward support company that would accompany a combat battalion.

She says she was told several male captains fired off e-mails to members of Congress and the Center for Military Readiness opposing the move. One captain, she says, messaged one of her peers asking: "What are you guys doing sending a female over here?"

DOJ_NMG_0101096

When plans changed and a man was chosen to take command, Roney says she was disappointed at first, then reconsidered. "I probably did think having a female would have been disruptive in some sense," she says. "They might think they have to act differently with a woman."

Roney, who ended up commanding a logistics company that conducted more than 500 missions in the streets of Baghdad, thinks gender walls will crumble as more women and men work together.

"Sometimes," she says, "they need to get females in the unit to see they have some of the same abilities, the same competencies as the male soldiers."

Some of that already has happened.

Capt. Tara Stiles was a platoon leader in the 194th Military Police Company supporting the First Marine Expeditionary Force. "At first, they were kind of leery," she says. But after a few weeks "they'd rather have my platoon vs. one of the others led by males. .. They needed their backs covered and we were there. And vice versa."

Stiles' company was commanded by Capt. Terri Dorn, who says she noticed some Marines were uncomfortable dealing with females, but she didn't detect resentment.

"I never felt like someone was trying to tell me we're in the wrong place," she says. "It was, 'Oh my God, what do we do?' ... Really what you're doing is teaching that person how to deal with a female."

Dorn says when men would tell her they'd never had a woman in their unit, she'd reply: "Don't think of them as females. Talk to them as soldiers."

It was advice she, too, found useful. "I wasn't a female," she says. "I was a company commander."

Dorn says some Iraqi military leaders proved a far bigger obstacle. There were those, she says, who refused to shake her hand. "It didn't hinder our conversation," she says. "It didn't hurt my feelings ... I proved myself by not allowing them NOT to speak with me."

For decades there have been questions about men and women bunking in the same quarters and whether they could serve together without distractions. While problems such as sexual harassment and assault remain, some say that gender lines blur when lives are on the line.

"Traditionally, the front is the most sexless place in the world. Behind the lines is where trouble happens," says Joshua Goldstein, a professor emeritus of international relations at American University and author of "War and Gender."

Lt. Col. Cheri Provancha, who commanded a Stryker Brigade Support Battalion in Iraq with 700 soldiers, says she didn't detect a gender gap among her troops.

"It didn't matter if you were male or female," she says. "You're going through the same thing as your buddy. That creates a bond."

Provancha also says she has noticed firsthand how attitudes toward women have changed in her 23 years in the Army.

"In the 1980s when a male soldier walks in the door, the expectation is they are competent. The woman on the other hand, it was 'I've got to see what you have before I give you that level of confidence,'" she says. "Now when I walk in the door, I feel like the guys do."

But other officers say the military is far from having an even playing field.

Janis Karpinski, who was demoted to colonel after the scandal at the Abu Ghraib prison, says she was a scapegoat — and she blames many of her problems on being a woman.

When the prison conditions started unraveling, she says, "there was not a good ole boy network to support me. They wouldn't let me in. ... There was not a male commander to say, 'Hey, Janis, you better watch out.' Had I been a man, I would have been aware of it all along."

Karpinski says the military is still regarded by many men in uniform — especially the older ones — as the "last bastion of male dominance and they're very reluctant to give up this turf to women."

And yet, some see progress, partly because younger men are moving up in the ranks along with women.

"Gender integration is not perfect by any stretch, but it's a heck of lot better than it was 30 years ago when women entered the military academy," says Mady Wechsler Segal, professor of sociology at the University of Maryland and an expert on the military.

DOJ_NMG_0101097

Women have a long history of military service going back to the Revolutionary War, when they sometimes disguised themselves as men to defend their country. Through the many wars, they've been spies and soldiers, nurses and pilots — and prisoners.

Relatively few, however, have fallen from enemy fire. In World War I, for example, nearly 360 servicewomen died, mostly nurses stricken by influenza, according to the Women's Memorial Foundation.

And in World War II, more than 330,000 women served both domestically and abroad, and more than 540 died, mostly from vehicle accidents, air crashes and illness, according to the foundation. Sixteen Army nurses died by enemy fire, the group says.

In the Persian Gulf War, about two-thirds of the 15 women who died lost their lives in non-hostile incidents. (In Iraq and Afghanistan, more than a third of the deaths have been non-combat fatalities.)

After the Gulf War, the Army opened thousands more jobs to women, including piloting attack and scout helicopters.

Maj. Tammy Duckworth — who recently lost a bid for Congress — says when she joined the Illinois Army National Guard, she picked aviation because it was a combat position open to women. "I wanted to be treated equally to the males in my unit ... and I felt part of that was accepting the same kind of risks," she says.

Early on, she says she adapted to being a woman in a man's world. "I tried to be one of the boys, to be tough or tougher," she says. But her attitude changed as she was promoted. "I knew I was a good enough officer on my own and I stopped trying to be extra-macho," she says.

Besides, she adds, some of the guys were already teasing her that she had "ovaries of brass."

But other women say they're mindful of being a minority and feel pressure — some of it self-imposed — to demonstrate their physical strength and their mental toughness so no one thinks they'll crumble when bullets start flying or bombs start exploding.

Alicia Flores says she earned the respect of male comrades in the Army's 92nd Chemical Company by hauling bodies, cleaning up feces, doing everything men did. "I had a lot of guys look up to me and say, 'How could you be out here doing this?' "

Flores says she was determined not to show weakness.

"I saw a lot of guys break down," she says. "Most of the times I did a lot better than they did. ... I wasn't going to break down and cry. Crying wasn't going to get me anywhere. It was just going to get me dirtier."

Aneta Urban stood out as the only women in her Marine police company during training in Camp Pendleton, Calif. She could feel all eyes on her.

"When it's 100 guys and you're the only girl, it's like proving yourself every day," she says. "When you're doing rifle training, close combat training, they're looking at you a lot more closely. They're wondering: Can she do it? Can she handle it? You don't want to be laughed at."

Two years later, when she was deployed, she felt she had measured up.

"They knew they could depend on me," she says. "They knew I could pull my own weight. They knew they could trust me if something happened."

Even so, Urban, a native of Poland who served as translator on a second tour, says she would never complain about "stupid girly issues" such as the lack of bathrooms.

"We were under enough stress as it is ... without worrying about finding a place to go pee," she says.

Some women say hygiene issues, whether it's going to the bathroom in a hole in the ground or not being able to wash your hair for a month, tend to be harder on females than men. Some find creative solutions.

Maj. Mary Prophit, for instance, secured her own shower, trading a Benchmade knife in exchange.

Prophit was part of a four-member Civil Affairs team and one of three women among a task force of 700. If that didn't set her apart, her age did. "I was old enough to be their mother," says the 42-year-old mother of three who is a library assistant in Glenoma, Wash. "I thought it was kind of cool."

Despite two decades in the Army Reserve, Prophit says she felt internal pressures to be a good model. "I knew if I screwed up, someone would say, 'That's why we shouldn't have women in the military,'" she says. "I want to make sure that no one thinks the mission dragged on because I'm there."

In January 2005, Prophit demonstrated her skills when the convoy she was in was attacked by a roadside bomb, ripping into the truck behind her that was carrying Iraqi soldiers.

With ammunition exploding from the blazing truck, Prophit used her body as a shield so a medic could tend to one of the badly burned Iraqis. Later, she laid down fire at a mosque where insurgents were hiding.

Prophit then propped up the critically wounded Iraqi with her body in the tight quarters of the Stryker armored vehicle, placed his head in her lap and tried to keep him conscious as they raced to the hospital.

"My performance was a testament that women can be in combat," she says. But she draws a line. "I definitely don't think women should be in the infantry. It's not because they're not mentally strong enough or physically strong enough. If you mix genders, that alters the dynamic of the group."

After the war ends, the military and Congress will evaluate these kinds of experiences and there will be renewed discussion about what combat is, but any changes will probably be incremental, not dramatic, says Manning, the military expert.

For now, though, she says, "the public accepts that women are in the military, that there are going to be shootings, that they're going to be dying, and that's fine — with most people."

Homemade Memorial Is Stirring Passions On Iraq (NYT)

By Jesse McKinley

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

LAFAYETTE, Calif., Nov. 30 — The tranquil suburb of Lafayette hardly seems the most likely place in the Bay Area for a battle over the First Amendment and the war in Iraq. Liberal Berkeley is just over the hill, after all, and nearby San Francisco is always spoiling for a fight.

But over the last few weeks, it is Lafayette — an affluent bedroom community 20 miles east of downtown San Francisco — that has become the scene of a passionate debate over the place of political speech in suburbia.

At issue is a hillside memorial, made up of some 450 small white crosses and a 5-by-16-foot sign that reads: "In Memory of 2,867 U.S. Troops Killed in Iraq." The memorial was created by Jeff Heaton, a building contractor and antiwar activist, who said it was meant "to get people involved on a local level" and talking about Iraq.

Sure enough, people here have become involved, including more than 200 people and a half-dozen television news crews and reporters who crammed into the usually sparsely attended City Council meeting last week to voice their opinions about the memorial. And while many there said they found the crosses deeply moving, others called the memorial unpatriotic, disrespectful or just plain ugly.

That camp included Jean Bonadio, a former Marine sergeant who said she was so offended that she stopped her car and climbed the hill to dismantle the sign, which sits with the crosses on private property of a fellow advocate just north of Highway 24, a major Bay Area thoroughfare, and the Lafayette light-rail station.

"My first reaction was, 'What a disgrace to those who have sacrificed,' " said Ms. Bonadio, 53, a dog trainer. "I had no tools with me, so I removed it with my bare hands and feet."

The sign was repaired, but Ms. Bonadio is not the only one trying to take down the sign. Shortly after the memorial was erected, the city government called on Mr. Heaton to remove the accompanying sign, citing a municipal code forbidding anything larger than four square feet to be posted on private property.

That, however, prompted some supporters of the memorial to suggest that the city was engaging in censorship, accusations Mayor Ivor Samson denied. "The content of the sign is not an issue," Mr. Samson said. "If the sign was that size and said 'I love my mom,' it would still be in violation."

Mr. Samson also said that the memorial had drawn attention here precisely because Lafayette, where the median cost of a home is over $1 million, was traditionally apolitical. "I think had this been in Berkeley or Santa Cruz, a community with a greater history of political activism, this wouldn't be news," he said.

No action was taken at Monday's meeting, after the city's attorney said he needed more time to study the issue. But Louise Clark, who owns the property the memorial sits on, said that if the sign had to go, the meaning would be lost.

"If it's just crosses, it's a cemetery," said Ms. Clark, 81. "It's not a cemetery, nobody is buried there. It's a memorial."

But some Lafayette residents question whether the memorial actually meant to remember the dead troops. "There's no American flag flying, it's just very stark and shock value," said Lyn Zusman, 53, whose son is a marine just back from Iraq. "If you want to make it a memorial, you personalize it. But if it's a protest, call it that. That's why we live in America, so we can spout our views off."

This is not the first time Mr. Heaton, a longtime Lafayette resident, has tried to erect a memorial in his hometown. Three years ago, he tried to mount a smaller display of crosses on the same hillside. The night after he planted them, however, someone stole them. The next day, he planted the crosses again, and the next night, they disappeared again.

But this time, Mr. Heaton says he feels that the mood about the war has shifted, both nationwide and in Lafayette.

"There's been a real change in the tide of feeling about the war," said Mr. Heaton, 53, who said the inspiration for the crosses came from a visit to the Vietnam Memorial in Washington. "It is much more acceptable now to question the reasons for the war."

He added that Lafayette would be a good place to make a statement because "it is pretty sleepy and conservative and not that much happens there."

City officials in Lafayette also say their city has been slowly changing, with an influx of former Berkeley and San Francisco residents looking for a place with good public schools for their children. Lafayette, Mr. Samson said, now has "people who are very interested in the larger world."

The Lafayette crosses are not the only grass-roots remembrance around, or the only one to stir controversy. Veterans for Peace, a nonprofit antiwar group based in St. Louis, has regularly planted similar arrays of crosses on beaches in Santa Monica and Santa Barbara. Since 2004, the American Friends Service Committee, a Quaker group based in Philadelphia, has sponsored a traveling exhibit called Eyes Wide Open, which features a pair of empty boots for every American solider killed in Iraq.

Michael T. McPhearson, executive director of Veterans for Peace, which also has fields of crosses planted in four other cities, admitted that the displays sometimes provoked angry reactions. "They say we're not supporting the troops, and they say we shouldn't be doing these vigils," said Mr. McPhearson, 42, who served in the first gulf war. "But we feel that especially because we're veterans and we've served, we have the right."

Mr. Samson said he did not know when the city attorney would rule on whether the sign in Lafayette had to go. In the meantime, however, Mr. Heaton and Ms. Clark say they will continue to add crosses — and update the numbers on the sign.

"It's overwhelming just looking at that small number, and that's nowhere near the number of the ones we lost," said Ms. Clark, speaking of the dead in Iraq. "When we get all those crosses up there, everybody will gasp."

As The War Drags On, She Keeps On Wrapping (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

It did not begin as Luz Mercado's Christmas tradition.

Instead, it began two years ago as something at once desperate and mundane — a mother's obsessive campaign to make Christmas seem like Christmas for her son in Iraq and the Marines serving under him.

With the holidays coming and her son, Marine Sgt. Luis Mercado Jr., requesting a Santa suit for himself and assorted goodies for the Marines in his unit, Mrs. Mercado turned her garage into a warehouse and herself into a nonprofit foundation called Support Our Heroes. Before long the donations poured in, the gift baskets were stuffed and mailed off, and it was Christmas in Iraq in a war she hoped, prayed and believed would soon be over.

When the next Christmas came, he was home, serving as a Marine drill inspector on Parris Island, S.C. But his buddies were still in Iraq, and she figured she owed it to other moms to do for their children what she had done for her own. So there was a second Christmas blitz, more gift baskets, more bags from Sam's Club and Wal-Mart, more stacks of Big Red gum, Red Bull energy drink and black socks to send to Iraq.

Now the war limps on, and the pictures at www.supportourheroes.net are of Army Pfc. Matt Harvey from Cornwall, N.Y., and Marine Lance Cpl. Chris Smolinski from Newburgh, N.Y., whose platoons will be the recipients of this year's 125 gift bags of snacks, sweets, toiletries and clothes. She also sends packages of supplies throughout the year.

It feels different from when she began. Most of the flags and yellow ribbons are gone from nearby homes. The war feels like the ailing elephant in the room of American life, too big to ignore, too grim to discuss much. The garage is pretty empty and the fund-raising is a struggle. We need new product in America, and this war feels like something long since marked down and ready to be moved. In September, she sent out 125 letters to previous donors asking for contributions. She got responses from about 10.

But it would feel wrong to move on while the soldiers are still there, so Mrs. Mercado pushed on like someone walking uphill into a stiff wind.

"It's just hard," she said. "People are busy. They only have so much money. I understand that. But I made a promise to keep doing this until all the soldiers are home, and that's what I plan to do."

It's not what she bargained for. When the war began, she thought it would last a few months, a year and a half at the most. Who expected this? It didn't help when she had to have surgery over the summer or when the war news kept getting worse.

But Mrs. Mercado, who sells jewelry and has a 15-year-old son at home, has the laser focus of the woman who manages to get the kids to every event, bake the perfect peach pie and make the trains run on time at home. So she has managed to cook up events, raise money, buy things herself when she finds good sales.

She has help from Pat Smolinski, an occupational therapist, and Linda Harvey, who runs a Montessori school, both of whom come across as modern war moms — terrified and slightly ironic at the same time.

When Mrs. Harvey stopped over on her way to yoga class the other night, Mrs. Mercado was excited to hear that Matt was due home for two weeks in January.

"Don't let him go back," Mrs. Mercado said urgently.

"What am I supposed to do, shoot him?"

"Break his leg or something. There must be a way."

It's not that people don't care. There was a bake sale at the Newburgh auto auction and, a tango dance fund-raiser. People are generous in dropping off things at the yoga studio Mrs. Harvey attends.

Still, it's a struggle.

"People are tired of the war," Mrs. Smolinski said. "And look at our economy. People tend to forget unless you're in their face constantly, and if you're in their face all the time, you're going to alienate them."

She sends her own CARE packages to her son two or three times a week, car magazines, Chef Boyardee ravioli, Skittles, Twizzlers, and tries to keep an even keel. "He seems to be doing wonderfully," she said. "His mother, on the other hand, is a basket case."

Mrs. Mercado has been there. She cried every day her son was away, followed war news intently, shivered over every casualty report. That should be over. It's not.

She still gets that cold chill from the casualty reports, even if her son is safe in South Carolina. She still fusses over those gift bags. She prays this is a tradition that won't last past this year, but figures if it's still needed, she'll be ready to do it again.

In Afghanistan, Lessons In The Face Of Violence (LAT)

By Paul Watson

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

THE teacher had been warned.

Mohammed Aref was on duty near the front gate of his school. The children were at recess, playing volleyball without a net.

The throaty rumble of a motorcycle broke through their playful shrieks and laughter. The lone rider, a man wearing a traditional shalwar kameez with his face obscured by the long tail of his turban, called Aref over to talk. Then he pulled an AK-47 from under his baggy shirt and fired six bullets into the teacher.

Aref had no way to defend himself. His only weapons were his faith in knowledge, some tattered books and a piece of chalk. He died in the dirt in front of horrified pupils.

Fifteen days earlier, Taliban guerrillas had come in the darkness and posted a "night letter" on the door of his farmhouse, telling the 50-year-old teacher to stay away from the school if he wanted to stay alive.

Aref, who earned just $50 a month, stood his ground. One of the first victims in the resurgent Taliban's dirty war on education, he gave his life trying to teach Afghan children that there is more to theirs than endless war.

After the U.S. joined with anti-Taliban militias five years ago to bring down the Islamist government, one of the biggest changes was in education. The Taliban, whose name means "students," regard Western-style education as a direct threat to the vision of a pure Islamic state. Its followers regard modern education as a morally toxic force of Western colonialism.

The Taliban's founders learned their disdain for most things modern in radical religious schools in Pakistan, where the only legitimate subject is study of the Koran. Extremist mullahs teach a harsh version of Islam that professes to be a return to traditions established by the prophet Muhammad.

A decade ago, when the Taliban swept across southern Afghanistan to seize the capital, Kabul, the mullahs issued edicts closing the women's university and most girls' schools. A collapsing infrastructure made it difficult for many boys to attend school as well.

When schools reopened in 2002 after the ouster of the Taliban regime, only about a third of Afghanistan's school-age children were in class. Today, the World Bank says, the figure is 87%, about 6.5 million pupils, a reflection of the hope of Afghan parents that the U.S.-backed government will be able to bring their country into the modern world. Some aid workers estimate the figure is much lower.

The United States has distributed textbooks and supplies, trained 50,000 teachers and rebuilt 672 schools.

But once again, education is under pressure from the Taliban. The militants are active once more across at least half of the country, including the southern province of Helmand, where Aref died in December 2005. Afghanistan's corrupt police and weak army are unable to provide much security.

Over the last year, insurgents have burned at least 146 schools, and insecurity has forced 215 others to close, the Afghan Education Ministry says. Zuhoor Afghan, an advisor to Education Minister Mohammed Hanif Atmar, says about 220,000 students have quit school because they fear for their lives.

To his wife and their seven children, and the many villagers who respected him, Aref was a mujahid, a courageous man engaged in a holy struggle to defeat ignorance and hatred so Afghanistan might know peace.

"He loved teaching," said his brother, Mohammed Rafiq Mohammedi. "It was important to him because he wanted students to learn what he knew and build the nation, to work for the people."

Continuing threats

The day after Aref died, none of his school's 1,300 students or their teachers showed up for class.

Their principal, Noor Mohammed, spent weeks trying to undo the damage, sitting with parents for hours, trying to convince them they had to keep the school open.

"They said, 'Unless you guarantee the security of our children, we will not allow them to go to school,' " he recalled outside the deserted school recently. "I said, 'I cannot guarantee the lives of your children, but they must study as much as they can.' "

As he desperately tried to reassure parents and children, Mohammed received his own night letter, which was posted on the gate of the local mosque for all to see.

"Drop this business of teaching and the school or you will be responsible for your own death," it warned. "If you continue, you will have to wash your hands of your life."

Like Aref, the principal kept going, but he couldn't vanquish the terror sown by the Taliban or protect his school.

Even where Taliban violence isn't threatening schools, Afghanistan's other problems are. Across the country, schools are in crisis because of corrupt contractors, shoddy building practices and a chronic shortage of textbooks and trained teachers, said Afghan, the Education Ministry official.

"If they have teachers, they don't have books," he said. "If they have books, they have no chairs. If they have fancy buildings, they have no toilets."

The government doesn't even know how many teachers there are because it is still awaiting the results of a head count started early this year. Despite the progress in many areas, every district in the country is reporting a shortage of qualified teachers, Afghan said.

"We need thousands of professional teachers, and we also need to train most of our professional teachers who are teaching now," he said. "There are students who have not even finished their schooling yet, but they are teaching. For example, students in grade 10 and 11 are teaching grade 3 or 4, and in some places it's even worse than that."

The situation is likely to improve under Atmar, the education minister, who has a strategic plan to improve the system, said Wagma Battoor Hassan Zumati, education program coordinator for CARE, a U.S.-based aid agency. Atmar won praise from foreign aid donors for his management of the rural reconstruction and development ministry.

But many Afghans are losing patience. Encouraged by the promises of Western leaders, they believed the Taliban's defeat meant the dawn of a new age of rapid progress, in which all children could get a good education. The plodding advances, even relapses to the more familiar rot of war and corruption in large parts of the country, feed a growing cynicism toward foreign governments and aid agencies.

"The optimism has died because these people are not honest with each other or with us," Afghan said. "They are working for their own benefit."

Woman of defiance

FATIMA MUSHTAQ put her life on the line long ago to help educate Afghanistan.

When the Taliban's mullahs ruled, she ran a secret school for women. Now, as head of education for Ghazni province in central Afghanistan, she is defying the extremists' efforts to turn back the clock. And, as a woman in a deeply conservative region, she also fights entrenched sexism and sclerotic bureaucracy.

Mushtaq does not hide her elegant face in public. She dares to adorn it with makeup. She covers her hair with a sheer white scarf, embroidered with delicate flowers, draped over her shoulders. Her voice is soft, but uncompromising.

And she packs a pistol.

"I can use it," she said with a steely smile.

She may have to. Last fall, Mushtaq received a night letter warning that she would be killed if she didn't quit her job and stay home.

"I said, 'Go ahead. Everything that you can do, I'm ready for it.' "

Friends and colleagues have tried to persuade her to give in to the threats. But Mushtaq feels the burden of a nation on her shoulders. She's afraid that if she surrenders, other women will give up too, and then everything they've gained will be lost.

And she has so much left to fight for.

"When we go to people and tell them, 'You should send your daughters to school,' they tell us, 'First you build a school, then we will send you our daughters,' " she said.

Over the last year, insurgents have killed a principal and one of his office staffers and burned more than a dozen of Ghazni's schools. Taliban threats have shut down at least 13 more, forcing their students to study in homes and mosques.

About half the province's schools have no buildings or tents, and 100,000 Ghazni students attend class in the open, many of them sitting in the broiling desert, Mushtaq said. Textbooks are in short supply everywhere.

But she insists on seeing the bright side.

"It's a bad situation with a good future," she said.

It takes a lot of optimism to see good things ahead for Ghazni villages such as Chaghatu, in a patch of windblown desert almost 100 miles southwest of Kabul. It is surrounded by barren, black mountains, a forbidding sanctuary for Taliban insurgents and their allies.

The villagers are ethnic Hazaras, who by one theory are descendants of Genghis Khan's Mongol army that invaded central Afghanistan in the 12th century. They have suffered persecution for generations, but after the Taliban's fall, they enjoyed a brief period of peace.

That changed a year ago when the insurgents suddenly grew stronger here. About 4 a.m. on May 29, marauders came down from the mountains and attacked Chaghatu's small school, just down the road from an Afghan army checkpoint.

A bomb placed in a storage room failed to explode, but ignited a fire that destroyed most of the books and part of the school. Villagers doused the flames with shovels of dirt and buckets of water, Principal Gul Mohammed said.

"There are a lot of motorcycles and cars passing us, and they are mostly Taliban or their informers," he said, with a worried eye to the dirt track that passes in front of his office window.

Twelve days before the attempted bombing, two men on a motorcycle passed by close to the gate about 5 p.m. One got off to warn the watchman that "girls should not go to school."

Some were moved the next day to a mosque. Several older girls remained in their regular classroom, where on a recent morning they still were studying. Sitting on floor mats, they were learning English.

"They are afraid of suicide attackers," the principal said. "They are afraid that someone might come into their class and explode or throw a grenade."

About 20 first-grade boys filled the scorched remains of the storage room, studying arithmetic under a burned-out ceiling, sitting on the floor in front of a blackboard propped against a charred wall. Other boys had their lessons in the hallway or outside on the hard dirt in the shade of a rear wall.

"Even though the school was burned, our students and teachers are more enthusiastic and they are still coming," said Mohammed Hassan, 25, the girls' cheery English teacher. "We won't be afraid of a single incident. A small warning cannot prevent us from teaching."

Mushtaq runs a department staffed by men, many of whom don't like working under a woman.

On a recent morning, one of her male staff members leaned over her large wooden desk and tried to browbeat her into returning a clerk she had shifted temporarily to another department. An elderly man in a turban demanded tents for his students. Several others reported new threats from the Taliban to kill teachers or burn schools and wanted to know what Mushtaq was going to do to protect them.

"It's the people's duty to protect their schools," she answered repeatedly, urging them to volunteer to guard the schools against Taliban attacks. "People have tried to persuade me to quit. I tell them, 'I'm a lady, but I'm strong and I'm brave.' "

Mushtaq had spent the morning fielding school security alerts on her cellphone, or from officials who traveled from remote villages.

Syed Dilawar, a 60-year-old clerk, joined the scrum of men pressing in around her desk. He had come more than 40 miles from a village in the desert of Qarah Bagh, to plead for protection from insurgents who were threatening to destroy his school.

He had traveled in a car with a woman and two other elderly men. Four Taliban guerrillas stopped them, and when they searched the car, they spotted the belt of Dilawar's satchel poking out from under the seat where he had tried to hide it. They found reports addressed to Mushtaq inside.

Dilawar acknowledged that the bag was his, and as the Taliban led him toward a nearby mountain, the female passenger, a stranger to him, fell at their feet, begging them not to kill him. The two male passengers added their appeals for mercy.

"I told them that I am the servant of the children of this country, and I am the servant of Afghan Muslims and I am the servant of Islam. I am the clerk that brings the salaries to the poor teachers of Ghazni," Dilawar said.

"Then they replied, 'You are not serving Islam, you are serving America, you are serving the infidels. You are misleading our children and you want them to become infidels too.' "

But the woman continued to cry, and on a forsaken stretch that some of the world's most powerful armies could not make safe, her tears were enough to spare Dilawar's life.

"She was the one who saved me," he said.

Challenges ahead

ONE of the children who saw Aref die was Saifullah, a 13-year-old third-grader with a gold pillbox Kandahari cap covered with tiny round mirrors that glint in the midday sun. Aref was his Pashto-language teacher.

Standing in the dirt yard where the educator was killed, the boy stretched his right arm behind his back, nervously clutching the crook of his left, and paid his slain teacher a simple tribute. "I liked him because he did not beat us," he said, adding almost as an afterthought: "And he was teaching very well."

Saifullah wants to be a doctor. His friend, Samidullah, 12, hopes to become an engineer. But the futures of millions of children, and of Afghanistan itself, in some measure depend on whether their schools continue to function.

Without education, the two boys here are more likely to be sucked back down into Helmand's swamp of war and drug trafficking.

Aref's own son, 10-year-old Mohammed Asif, goes to a nearby school that was recently renovated by an Afghan subcontractor working for the U.S. military. But within weeks, the paint was peeling again, the windowpanes were broken, and the concrete was cracking. The rebuilt road outside was also crumbling.

Afghans accuse the Americans of failing to keep their promise to fix the schools. "And then people think of them as real infidels," said the principal, Mohammed Rahim. The U.S. military said it was assigning engineers to repair teams to make sure it didn't happen again.

But engineering can't protect a school from a determined arsonist or bomber.

A few months after killing Aref, the Taliban guerrillas returned and set his school on fire. The flames destroyed the roof, melted window screens and blackened the mud-and-wattle walls.

In a hallway, an attacker used a piece of charcoal to write a lesson in bold Pashto.

"This is the country of betrayers," it said. "What good will it do you? We will discuss this in the next life and on doomsday."

Nearby, someone scrawled an apparent reply in smaller script: "Do you have hope for the country?"

And, as if to remove any doubt about his defiance, the writer added: "My country."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Alleged Underboss Of New England Mafia Is Arrested (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy And Raja Mishra, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, December 3, 2006

Reputed Mafia underboss Carmen "The Big Cheese" DiNunzio was arrested on extortion and illegal gambling charges as he emerged from a North End social club yesterday, potentially ending the reign of an underworld leader credited with uniting the fractured Boston mob into a low-key, profit-focused machine.

After State Police removed $6,000 in cash from his pockets and led the portly mobster away in cuffs, officials predicted his arrest would further weaken an organized-crime syndicate already diminished from decades of investigations and infighting.

DiNunzio, 49, ascended to second in command of all New England mobsters around 2002, according to law enforcement officials, after winning the favor of New England godfather Luigi "Baby Shanks" Manocchio of Providence. Law-enforcement officials allege he set about refocusing the mob on money-making crimes, such as extortion and gambling.

"He's a low-key underboss who has been trying to keep the mob's activities under the radar of law enforcement and the media," said one law enforcement official.

According to a source briefed on the investigation, DiNunzio's extortion and gambling operation had been collecting "hundreds of thousands" of dollars per week and involved a "ton" of operatives.

Many of the crimes date to 2001, when the investigation began, and the statute of limitations was going to expire this month, triggering yesterday's arrest at the Gemini social club at the corner of Lynn and Cooper streets.

DiNunzio will be held on $250,000 bail at the Danvers State Police barracks pending arraignment in Salem Superior Court on Monday.

Thomas J. Foley, a longtime organized-crime investigator who retired as superintendent of the State Police in 2004, said the indictment of a Mafia underboss is always significant.

"It puts definite stress on their organization and their leadership," Foley said.

DiNunzio's arrest stems from a State Police investigation that led to the indictment last February of reputed mob soldier William Angelesco on gambling and conspiracy charges. State prosecutors announced in court last February that the State Police had seized about $800,000 since the investigation began in September 2001. Angelesco's case is still pending.

A State Police officer testified in federal court last year that Arthur Gianelli, a Lynnfield bookmaker and brother-in-law of former FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., was paying $2,000 a month to DiNunzio for permission to operate his gambling business. Gianelli is awaiting trial on federal racketeering charges.

DOJ_NMG_0101105

An Essex County grand jury indicted DiNunzio yesterday on charges of extortion, maintaining or organizing a gaming operation, and conspiracy to maintain or organize gaming operations, according to the Essex district attorney's office.

DiNunzio faces up to 15 years in prison if convicted.

Law enforcement officials said DiNunzio had been shaking down bookmakers, forcing them to pay his syndicate to stay in business, and running a gambling operation that focused on sports betting.

The State Police Special Service Section's organized crime unit launched the investigation in 2001 and secretly recorded local mobsters, using bugs and wiretaps . It was unclear whether DiNunzio was heard on surveillance.

Law enforcement officials predicted that DiNunzio's arrest would disrupt the activities of the New England family, which remains the dominant organized crime group in the region, despite two decades of prosecutions.

DiNunzio, whose nickname comes from his ownership of the Fresh Cheese shop on Endicott Street, owns an interest in Carmen's Kitchen restaurant in East Boston.

DiNunzio, an East Boston native, rose through the ranks to become the underboss and has helped quell infighting in a family splintered into two factions during the bloody reign of former New England Mafia boss Francis "Cadillac Frank" Salemme, according to law enforcement officials.

DiNunzio left Boston in the late 1980s and lived in California. In 1993, while he was there, he was sentenced to four years in federal prison on a charge of extortion for shaking down a Las Vegas gambler for $27,000. He later returned to Boston.

DiNunzio has modeled himself after the old guard of the Boston mob, the Angiulo brothers, who quietly operated the rackets like a business from the 1960s to the early 1980s, making gambling, loan - sharking, and extortion the bread and butter of the organization , officials said.

Whether DiNunzio retains his alleged leadership position while he is under indictment depends on the current structure of the family and whether anyone is willing to step forward to assume control, Foley said.

Citing the wave of federal and state prosecutions that have weakened the Mafia, Foley said, "There's been so much pressure on [La Cosa Nostra] and the people holding those positions that as soon as you take one of those positions, you have to know that you are going to be a target of law enforcement."

But despite the prosecutions, Foley said the local Mafia remains a sophisticated and violent organization that could easily regain the power it had on the region a decade ago if law enforcement doesn't keep up pressure on it.

"There's always that romantic -- unfortunately -- aspect to the mob, and people are still interested in that part of things," Foley said. "There are always certain people looking for the notoriety or the publicity or the power when they try to step into these positions."

FBI Has Establishes Bribe Tip Line (AP)

AP, December 3, 2006

BOZEMAN (AP) — The FBI has established a tip line for people to report individuals working in public offices whom they believe are corrupt.

People can call in to report suspected shady public officials working for school districts, law-enforcement agencies, government offices or in any other public position funded by taxpayers.

The Public Corruption Tip Line, 1-866-50-BRIBE, was established for Montana, Idaho and Utah residents through the FBI's Salt Lake City field office.

In addition, tips regarding public corruption can be made at the FBI's Web site, www.fbi.gov by going to the Web site and clicking on the link to the Salt Lake City field office.

People reporting a tip are encouraged to provide contact information, although anonymous tips can be made.

The FBI announced the establishment of the tip line after charges were filed against three employees of a Utah school district. The employees were accused of misappropriating $4.5 million in public funds, according to an FBI press release.Butte businessmen host Chinese officials

FIGHT TO THE FINISH William Jefferson Takes Page Out Of Nagin's Playbook In Political Battle With Karen Carter (NOTP)

By Frank Donze, And Michelle Krupa%%par%%staff Writers

New Orleans Times-Picayune, December 3, 2006

Accomplishing a feat widely considered impossible, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin managed to get re-elected in May by stitching together an unlikely coalition of working-class black voters and white conservatives.

Now, a few months later, it appears that U.S. Rep. William Jefferson is trying to replicate Nagin's feat, or at least compose a variation on the same theme.

In the fight of his political life, the embattled congressman is running to both the political left and the right of state Rep. Karen Carter.

The two New Orleans Democrats face off Saturday for the 2nd Congressional District seat in a runoff expected to turn on their ability to broaden their established bases along racial lines and to appeal to Jefferson Parish voters, whose influence in the district has expanded since last year's flood emptied New Orleans neighborhoods.

On one hand, Jefferson, for the first time in his long career in public office, is touting his conservative votes in Congress against same-sex marriage and late-term abortions. And he is attacking Carter for having "sold out our family values" through her avowedly abortion-rights stance in the Legislature and her opposition to scheduling a statewide vote on a constitutional amendment that sought to define marriage as the union of "one man and one woman."

At the same time, the eight-term congressman also has been trotting out his liberal credentials as an outspoken advocate of displaced public housing residents and out-of-work public school teachers and hammering away at the campaign contributions Carter has collected from Republicans.

For her part, Carter has focused on telling voters that she would be better respected in Congress and would land a committee assignment from the majority Democratic leadership. It was the Democrats who tossed Jefferson off the House Ways and Means Committee after an unsealed federal affidavit revealed FBI agents had found $90,000 in marked bills in the congressman's freezer during a bribery investigation. Jefferson's attacks on her character are simply an effort to deflect legitimate questions about his integrity raised by the investigation, she says.

Last week, the Carter campaign launched a series of television ads that feature children competing in a spelling bee. They spell words such as "corruption," "unscrupulous" and "deceitful" as a narrator ticks of details of the federal investigation and business deals involving Jefferson and his relatives.

The Carter campaign also claims that Jefferson's focus on conservative "family values" contradicts the perfect score he received for his support of equal rights for homosexuals in 2002 from the Human Rights Campaign, a prominent gay-rights organization.

Stepped-up attacks

Jefferson also is using every opportunity to sully Carter's image by raising questions about the money she has earned from professional service contracts, labeled by Jefferson as "no-bid public contracts." He has also assailed her tenure as chairwoman of the House Insurance Committee, which he describes as the "best-fed, best campaign-financed" panel in Baton Rouge. Carter has said her work as a lawyer on public bond deals and energy regulation, as well as her leadership of the insurance panel, were proper.

Jefferson's gambit appears to have a two-fold purpose: to deflect attention from a federal investigation that has made headlines for more than a year and to paint an unflattering picture of his rival.

The incumbent's likely goal, pollster Bernie Pinsonat said, is to "persuade Carter's voters that she is no better than he is. The idea is to turn off her voters so they won't vote. That's why he's attacking her on anything and everything.

"When you have high negatives, you trash your opponents in an effort to make them as unpopular as you are," Pinsonat said. "You learn that in Politics 101."

Carter, a two-term legislator, entered the contest at a distinct disadvantage in name recognition compared with Jefferson, who has been a fixture on the local political stage for three decades, including the past 16 years in Congress. But in light of Jefferson's legal problems, Carter's lack of recognition might not be all bad, said Ed Renwick, the longtime director of Loyola University's Institute of Politics.

"Not many people know her," Renwick said. "But that might be all she needs. Being 'anybody but Jefferson' could do it for her."

If financial support is any indication, Jefferson's strategy has not persuaded potential campaign contributors.

According to the most recent campaign finance reports, Carter has raked in $320,000 during the past month, more than four times Jefferson's total in the same period. She is spending the money freely on radio and television ads that pound Jefferson on the criminal probe.

Jefferson responded with a commercial of his own in which he criticizes Carter for her "shameless exploitation" of the children featured in her spelling bee ad before unleashing yet another attack on her "values." He also takes his long-standing claim of innocence to a new level, peering squarely at the camera and telling voters: "I have never taken a bribe from anyone."

Carter, meanwhile, returned Jefferson's attacks on the issue of same-sex marriage. Carter spokeswoman Cheron Brylski charged last week that Jefferson is engaging in hypocrisy, noting that the incumbent has a long history of supporting gay rights.

Brylski said that in addition to his perfect score from the gay-rights group, Jefferson, in his failed 1999 bid for governor, offered this response to a question about job protection for gay workers: "I don't think anyone should be discriminated against because of any status they have. . . . You treat people differently for what they do and how they act, but not who they are. That would be wrong."

Jefferson spokeswoman Melanie Roussell said the incumbent's positions are not inconsistent.

"For him, banning same-sex marriage was a matter of religious conviction," Roussell said. "On the other hand, he does not support discrimination in housing, employment and other areas just because of a person's sexual orientation, which is why he has received high marks from human rights organizations."

The campaign's temperature undoubtedly has heated up in recent days. Though they lobbed a few bombs leading up to the Nov. 7 primary, the candidates mainly limited their attacks to scattershot references in campaign messages that primarily crowed about their own strengths.

Jefferson insisted that despite his ejection from Ways and Means, he alone has the Capitol Hill connections to make sure recovery money keeps flowing to the flood-ravaged district.

Carter, meanwhile, touted support from former U.S. Sens. John Breaux and J. Bennett Johnston, as well as strong ties to such rising Democratic stars as Jesse Jackson Jr., as allies who will bolster her effectiveness as a freshman lawmaker. She also did not miss opportunities to describe her record in public office as unblemished.

Nagin comparisons

If Jefferson's strategy is modeled on Nagin's successful campaign against Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu -- a campaign in which the mayor simultaneously portrayed himself as the black voter's friend but as the conservative alternative to Landrieu liberalism -- the congressman also has had to adjust the playbook.

For one thing, Jefferson lacks key assets on which Nagin was able to capitalize: Nagin's record as a fiscal conservative, for example, and his relatively scandal-free first term. Jefferson's attention to a conservative social agenda substitutes for Nagin's market-friendly approach to fiscal conservatism, a self-image that Jefferson could not honestly pull off.

If there was a cloud over Nagin, it was not the thunderhead that hangs over the Jefferson camp. Critics accused Nagin of being a feckless leader at a time of catastrophe and invoked unflattering comparisons with New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani after the Sept. 11 attacks. But Jefferson aides and associates have pleaded guilty to bribery charges, and the cash found in his freezer is a powerful issue with voters.

"It's hard to outdo an FBI investigation and money in your freezer," University of New Orleans political science professor Susan Howell said.

Further, Nagin faced a white opponent whom many black voters viewed as an opportunist seeking to exploit the displacement of tens of thousands of African-Americans after the flood. Though Jefferson has highlighted Carter's backing by two of the city's most potent white Republicans -- developer Joe Canizaro and shipbuilder Boysie Bollinger -- the fact remains that both candidates are black.

DOJ_NMG_0101108

And whereas Landrieu soft-shoed around his assertion that Nagin had flubbed the city's near-term recovery, Carter has taken direct aim at Jefferson's legal problems, accusing him of focusing on his legal defense at a time when the district should be the top priority.

Slim turnout predicted

In light of the primary-election results, Jefferson faces yet another challenge that he has not encountered since entering Congress in 1990. Though he ran first in a 13-candidate field, Jefferson mustered only 30 percent of the vote, a dismal showing for an incumbent who two years ago won with support from more than eight in 10 voters.

Results from the Nov. 7 election show that Jefferson won nearly 50 percent of the vote in precincts where black voter registration is 75 percent or more, according to an analysis by University of New Orleans political scientist Ed Chervenak. But in precincts where white registration is 75 percent and higher, he picked up less than 6 percent.

Carter, meanwhile, carried precincts where voters are predominantly white with more than 30 percent of the vote. In predominantly black precincts, Carter won 14 percent.

Nagin, in his re-election bid, made huge strides because of a coast-to-coast effort featuring the Rev. Jesse Jackson and former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial, now president of the National Urban League, to make sure displaced voters -- a majority of them African-Americans -- were not disenfranchised in the first post-Katrina election.

In that race, about 113,600 people cast a ballot for mayor, or about 38 percent of the city's 298,500 eligible voters. Nearly 25,000 of those -- almost one-quarter of voters -- mailed or faxed in an absentee ballot or voted in person at one of 10 balloting centers set up around the state for early voting.

Even so, Nagin's margin of victory was a mere 5,000 votes.

Interest in the November congressional primary, which did not feature satellite centers, was only a fraction of that total, with about 3,600 Orleans Parish voters voting early. By late Friday, the runoff numbers were even lower, with about 1,800 voters casting ballots early or by mail. Early voting ended Saturday afternoon.

Given Katrina's virtual emptying of the Central City and 9th Ward neighborhoods that have been Jefferson's traditional base, the lack of substantial out-of-town voting last month could bode poorly for his re-election. So could Saturday turnout, which political handicappers expect will not climb beyond the 24 percent of voters who went to the polls in the primary.

"With each passing day, Christmas gets closer and the calendars get filled up," Renwick said. "It's a terrible time to have an election."

Jefferson Parish key

Given lackluster voter interest, the key to victory lies in which candidate can get his or her base -- black voters in Jefferson's case, white voters for Carter -- to go to the polls.

The real battleground on Saturday will take place on Jefferson Parish's West Bank and a sliver of south Kenner, home to about a third of the district' registered voters. Historically, the Jefferson Parish electorate has had little impact on the outcome of 2nd District races. But Katrina appears to have altered that dynamic.

About 270,000 of the district's voters are registered in Orleans Parish, though many remain displaced by the storm. Jefferson Parish, which houses 12,000 of the district's registered voters, saw about 28 percent turnout in the race, 5 percent more than in New Orleans.

The incumbent enjoyed a significant edge in Jefferson Parish in the primary. More than 31,000 parish residents cast ballots in the race, with the congressman getting 23 percent of those votes, compared with Carter's 8 percent.

But both trailed the only well-known Jefferson Parish entry, state Sen. Derrick Shepherd, a Marrero Democrat who received nearly 11,000, or 34 percent, of the votes on his home turf.

Shepherd, who placed third in the primary with 18 percent, was backed by much of the Jefferson Parish political establishment.

While he has endorsed Jefferson, speculation is rampant in political circles that there might be more to his support than meets the eye: If the incumbent is re-elected and then indicted and forced to resign, Shepherd could make another run at the seat.

While Carter has attracted the endorsement of some of the elected officials who got behind Shepherd -- notably his close political allies, Jefferson Parish Councilman Byron Lee and state Rep. Terrell Harris -- most of the big names are still neutral, including Assessor Lawrence Chehardy and Gretna Mayor Ronnie Harris. A spokeswoman for Parish President Aaron Broussard said Friday that he is staying out of the endorsement game.

Meanwhile, heavyweights such as District Attorney Paul Connick and Parish Council Chairman John Young, who took no position in the primary, have remained on the sidelines. Councilman-at-large Tom Capella has backed Carter, a former House colleague of his.

Carter's efforts to gain a foothold in Jefferson Parish have been hampered by comments she made to Spike Lee in the filmmaker's Katrina documentary. Carter labeled as unjust, inhumane and un-American the decision by Jefferson Parish law enforcement officials to block New Orleans evacuees from walking across the Crescent City Connection in an effort to flee the flooded city.

Sheriff Harry Lee, who has said the comments were a personal vilification, is expected to send a direct-mail piece Monday to homes across Jefferson Parish encouraging voters to oppose Carter. Though Lee would not discuss the ad, sources close to the sheriff said it asserts that Carter's criticism of law enforcement officials is an insult to all Jefferson Parish residents.

"For some reason, she's ducking the bridge incident," the sheriff said. "If she's not going to say something about it, I'm going to say something about it."

Lee has not endorsed Jefferson, and he said Friday that that he did not coordinate with the Jefferson campaign on the ad.

La. Rep. Tries To Save Political Career (AP)

By Cain Burdeau, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, December 3, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- Embattled U.S. Rep. William Jefferson hunted for votes among churchgoers Sunday as he headed into the final week of a campaign to hold onto his seat and salvage his political fortunes.

FBI raids on his homes and his congressional office, including allegations in an FBI affidavit that he hid $90,000 in bribe money in a freezer, have left Jefferson vulnerable for the first time since he won the seat in 1990.

In the Nov. 7 open multiparty primary, the Democratic congressman netted 30 percent of the vote, considered a poor showing for an incumbent.

In Saturday's runoff, Jefferson faces a stiff challenge from state Rep. Karen Carter, a Democrat and well-financed and energetic lawyer hoping to become the first black female from Louisiana to ever hold a seat in Congress. The runoff is one of the nation's last unresolved elections.

Carter, 37, who picked up 22 percent of the vote in the primary, has outpaced Jefferson handily in fundraising but she's had a harder time convincing the political establishment of her worthiness.

"It's going to be very competitive," said Gary Clark, a political science professor at Dillard University. "There are those who may wish he may lose, but it will take more than wishing. He's a veteran politician and there are those who benefit by his being in office."

Jefferson's legal troubles surfaced shortly before Hurricane Katrina hit Aug. 29, 2005. Though he has not been charged with a crime, the allegations led to his loss of a spot on the House Ways and Means Committee.

Two of Jefferson's associates pleaded guilty to bribery-related charges; one, a Kentucky businessman, admitted paying more than $400,000 in bribes to a phony company headed by Jefferson's wife and family to obtain favors from the congressman.

Jefferson has denied any wrongdoing, and said he would explain his side in due course. So far he has not done that.

Jefferson, 59, has tried to soften voters' opinions of his legal troubles, invoking stories about how he has turned to God in these "difficult times." He has also cast Carter in attack ads as a socially liberal Democrat who supports same-sex marriages and late-term abortions.

Carter's spokeswoman, Cheron Brylski, said he had distorted her record and his own record of support for same-sex marriages and some forms of abortion.

For her part, Carter has hammered away at Jefferson, calling him a "hypocrite" and "unscrupulous" in a series of ads depicting children at a spelling bee who correctly spell the words used to denigrate Jefferson.

The bitter tone will likely be on full display Thursday night when the two candidates take part in their first head-to-head televised debate.

Cold Cash Congressman Says He Has 'Never Taken A Bribe' In New Campaign Ad (ABC)

ABC News' The Blotter, December 3, 2006

Louisiana Congressman William Jefferson (D-La.) has taken to the airwaves to unequivocally deny the allegations that have plagued him for months. "I have never taken a bribe from anyone," he asserts in a new campaign ad.

Jefferson is running for re-election despite being at the center of a federal bribery investigation. He faces a run-off against fellow Democrat State Rep. Karen Carter on Dec. 9.

Carter has seized on the probe in her campaign against Jefferson, and recently ran an ad quoting a Washington Post article that said the FBI had caught Jefferson accepting a bribe on videotape. In this latest ad, Jefferson responds by saying that Carter's "newspaper source got the facts wrong."

A search warrant issued in May alleged that Jefferson had accepted $100,000 in cash from an FBI informant on behalf of a high-ranking foreign government official in exchange for help with securing a telecommunications contract in Africa. The affidavit states that Jefferson's handling of the briefcase containing the cash was "videotaped by the FBI from several vantage points." Most of the cash was later found in a freezer in Jefferson's house.

Jefferson has not yet been charged with a crime. Two of his associates pled guilty to bribery-related charges earlier in the year.

Is Race A Factor In Corruption Charges? (MCA)

By Michael Erskine

Memphis Commercial Appeal, December 3, 2006

The FBI says absolutely not; others, given the history lately, aren't so sure

When Johnnie R. Turner first heard about the arrests of Memphis City Councilmen Edmund Ford and Rickey Peete last week, it stopped her cold in her tracks.

"Not again," she said to herself in disbelief. Turner's next thought turned to a question of fairness.

"Where are the others?"

Turner, executive director of the Memphis branch of the NAACP, said recent public corruption investigations have given citizens the impression that African-American politicians are "inherently more crooked, and that is not true."

"If you did it, and you're wrong, then you should be punished. But it should be done to other groups just as it's done to ours."

In a city where Old South racial wounds still fester, Ford and Peete joined the dubious ranks of black Memphis elected officials charged in the past two years with taking bribes.

The pair have been accused of pocketing thousands of dollars in cash from a government informant to influence their votes as part of a federal probe dubbed Main Street Sweeper.

Since the first indictments were handed down in the FBI's Tennessee Waltz sting in 2005, not one sitting white elected official from Memphis has been charged. Seven current or former black Memphis elected officials have been.

Out of 15 public officials and their associates charged statewide, three have been white: state Sen. Ward Crutchfield of Chattanooga, former state Rep. Chris Newton of Cleveland and now Memphis businessman Joe Cooper.

Newton, a Republican, was the first elected official to plead guilty last year to Waltz charges and is serving a one-year prison term. Crutchfield, a Democrat, has pleaded not guilty and is awaiting trial set for July.

Cooper, a former Shelby County official, was charged last week with money laundering. Sources say Cooper is the informant who paid bribes to Ford and Peete.

The last time a high-profile white Memphis elected official was convicted for taking bribes was in 1982.

Edgar Gillock, then a state senator, was convicted of taking more than $130,000 in kickbacks for his influence in helping a company sell computers to the state and Shelby County.

His arrest came at a time when most elected officials from the area were white men, a factor that's changed over time.

A spokesman for U.S. Atty. David Kustoff's office declined comment for this story.

But George Bolds, spokesman for the local FBI office, said he understands the race of those charged in recent public corruption cases is an element some people examine.

"It is what it is. We don't attempt to explain it or attach any sociological significance to it. Other people do, and they are entitled to do that," he said.

But Bolds said race by no means is a factor in how the FBI investigates cases.

"We, the FBI, go where the investigation leads us. Race is not a consideration for us. Our job is to investigate credible allegations related to violations of federal statutes, and that's what we do," Bolds said.

The NAACP's Turner said white officials who are abusing the public's trust have escaped prosecution because they've made their money through more legitimate means, by getting lucrative government jobs or contracts.

"Their methods of dishonesty are more sophisticated," she said, adding that investigators need to look for more "viable" strategies to find elected crooks other than black people.

Turner is not the first to suggest the issue of race has been at play with recent corruption charges.

Former state senator Roscoe Dixon, who started his five-year prison term last week for his bribery conviction, sought a dismissal of his Waltz case earlier this year claiming race-based selective prosecution.

U.S. Dist. Judge Jon McCalla rejected Dixon's motion in May, saying it was not supported by evidence that there were non-black individuals who could have been prosecuted for similar offenses but were not.

"It is not enough for Defendant to simply point out that the majority or even all of the individuals prosecuted for a particular offense are of the same race," McCalla wrote.

Later, outside the courthouse, demonstrators marched and carried placards such as "Tennessee Waltz is a Government Conspiracy against Black Democrats."

State Sen. Paul Stanley, a white Republican from Germantown, said he knows all too well that undercover agents cast a wide net in the Waltz.

"They laid a trap with bait in it, and they said, 'Come one, come all.' "

Stanley, at the time a state representative, was approached by agents posing as officials of E-Cycle Management. The sham company, set up by federal investigators, promoted fake legislation to channel surplus state electronic equipment to the company for resale.

Although Stanley was one of seven House members who signed onto E-Cycle's "bill" as a co-sponsor, Stanley said he never received anything from its backers. He said he asked to see financial data from E-Cycle and never heard back.

Stanley said he thinks complaints about racial targeting are nothing more than an excuse.

"The head of the FBI here is an African-American woman," Stanley said, referring to FBI Special Agent in Charge My Harrison. "She's just saying, 'We're going to go and get you if you've done something wrong.' "

The Department of Justice allows agents to offer bribes to a public official only after first establishing predication, or evidence of a predisposition to corruption.

The federal complaint against Peete lists his prior conviction in 1989 for soliciting a bribe as a City Council member. It also alleges that in the new case, the informant, a lobbyist for clients with business before the council, "periodically made cash payments for Peete's influence."

The complaint against Ford says the informant told agents he had performed favors for Ford, including assisting him in acquiring a Cadillac with financing in the name of a third person. The informant said he also helped Ford get a loan to remodel his mortuary.

Sidney Chism, a longtime local black Democratic leader who now sits on the Shelby County Commission, said the recent string of allegations stemmed from black officials being too dependent on the system for their economic survival.

DOJ_NMG_0101112

"I don't think you're going to find a majority of politicians, white or black, that are going to accept money from anybody for doing what they've been elected to do. ... The very few that tend to want to do that is because of their economic positions in life," Chism said.

As a result, Chism said he's long been an advocate that politicians should be financially independent of the system.

Meanwhile, Chism said he "wouldn't dare say" at this point that African-Americans are being targeted in federal stings.

"I'm not sympathetic to anybody that gets caught with his hand in the till," Chism said.

"My concern is that if you find it, be it black or white, it should be stamped out."

DA's Critics Ask Bar, Feds To Intervene (RN&O)

By Joseph Neff, Anne Blythe And Benjamin Niolet

Raleigh News & Observer, December 3, 2006

In the war that is the Duke lacrosse case, Mike Nifong's fierce fight will not end with the trial.

Durham's district attorney will face a barrage of attacks on the federal and state level from foes who are determined to have Nifong investigated, punished and disbarred for his actions in the rape case against three Duke University lacrosse players.

Dozens of people, some connected to the accused, have asked the governor and the state attorney general to intervene. Many have complained to the N.C. State Bar, the agency that licenses and disciplines lawyers. And a lawyer for one of the indicted players has urged members of Congress to have the U.S. Department of Justice open a civil rights investigation.

The request for federal intervention is aggressive and rare, said Richard Myers, a UNC-Chapel Hill law professor and former federal prosecutor.

"It's a fairly strong indication the defense has nothing to hide if they want more eyes on the ground," Myers said. "How effective it's going to be, who knows? You cast a wide net and hope someone gets interested."

The attacks are a sign of the long and vicious battle ahead in the Duke lacrosse controversy.

Three former players, Dave Evans, 23, of Bethesda, Md.; Collin Finnerty, 20, of Garden City, N.Y.; and Reade Seligmann, 20, of Essex Fells, N.J., are charged with rape, kidnapping and sexual offense. They are accused of gang-raping a woman hired though an escort service to dance at a team party in March.

Nifong has been criticized for statements he made in the week after the investigation became public, when he called the players "hooligans" and said he was certain a racially motivated rape had occurred.

After that first week, Nifong's torrent of comments slowed to a trickle. In his silence, the players and their attorneys have attacked Nifong, using his own documents and statements to accuse the veteran prosecutor of misconduct and to highlight weaknesses in the case.

Nifong declined to comment for this report. But in court, news releases and at news conferences, the prosecutor has responded to the criticisms against him, at times using language that sounds like an opening argument he might make to the State Bar in his defense.

At a July news conference, Nifong explained his early statements to the media by saying he was trying to inform the public that an investigation was in progress and to encourage cooperation from witnesses. Bar rules specifically allow prosecutors to make public statements for those reasons.

The request for a federal investigation came from Michael Cornacchia of New York, one of Finnerty's attorneys. He wrote to the U.S. attorney general, the FBI director, the congressional delegations of North Carolina and Long Island and others, saying Nifong had violated the civil rights of the three players. The case merits an immediate investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice, wrote Cornacchia, a former prosecutor who recently served as chief investigative counsel for the probe of the United Nation's oil-for-food program.

N.C. Attorney General Roy Cooper and Gov. Mike Easley received scores of letters requesting that they take over the case, something North Carolina law does not allow. These letters ranged from well-researched, artfully composed missives to profane rants from phony e-mail addresses. They came from family friends and business colleagues of the accused. Some were from outside observers. Many were sent from out of state, and a good number came from Durham.

Although State Bar complaints are confidential, at least 17 became public records when they were copied to the governor or state attorney general.

"I would think of this as misconduct by a DA and that for some reason, maybe political, he has painted a fabricated picture," wrote Edwin G. Beusse, a New York developer who works with Finnerty's father, in a letter Aug. 9. "Isn't there a check or balance for situations like this that are so far out there, that they're obviously false?"

Molly M. Maguire of Darien, Conn., wrote June 13, "It is frightening to think of any American being victimized by our own legal system and devastating to know that three promising lives are held hostage to a not-so-hidden political agenda." Maguire is a friend of the Finnerty family.

The chances of a federal investigation are unknown; a State Bar investigation is more likely. The bar complaints accuse Nifong of violating the ethics rules governing pretrial publicity and bringing disrepute to the justice system. The complaints cite specific actions by Nifong throughout the investigation as violations of State Bar rules.

Bar officials have responded in writing to the complainants, saying they take the matter seriously. State law prohibits them from saying whether an investigation is under way.

Whatever happens at the State Bar, the organization will be under pressure. The bar has been smarting from its handling of two high-profile cases involving prosecutorial misconduct over the past two years.

In 2004, David Hoke and Debra Graves were reprimanded for withholding evidence during the trial of Alan Gell, who spent nine years behind bars, half of that on death row, for a murder he did not commit. The withheld evidence included statements showing that the murder occurred while Gell was in jail on a petty charge and a tape-recording of the star witness talking about "making up a story" for police.

Bar sharply criticized

The State Bar came under withering criticism for its prosecution of Hoke and Graves. During its investigation, the bar interviewed only Hoke and Graves and did not talk to key witnesses such as detectives or other lawyers. The uproar prompted the bar to conduct an unprecedented public self-examination, which found deficiencies and flawed practices in the case. One of the ensuing conclusions was that the bar should consider hiring outside prosecutors in high-profile cases.

In the second case, also involving a death penalty trial, the bar's prosecutor went after Kenneth Honeycutt and Scott Brewer aggressively, charging them with lying, cheating and withholding evidence. The bar alleged that the former Union County prosecutors had committed a string of felonies, including hiding evidence from the judge and jury, altering documents and lying to the trial judge.

The State Bar's Disciplinary Hearing Commission, a separate entity that acts as judge and jury in such cases, twice dismissed the case on technicalities. The bar has appealed; a special prosecutor is investigating the criminal case against the two lawyers.

The State Bar's charter is not to punish lawyers but to protect the public. The bar has intervened on an emergency basis in some situations, said general counsel Katherine Jean. For example, the State Bar can freeze a lawyer's trust account if it thinks the lawyer has been stealing money. And the bar can suspend the license of a lawyer in prison.

Mary Ann Tally, a defense lawyer who has followed the State Bar's misconduct cases, said that if a complaint against Nifong is later pursued by the grievance committee, there could be questions about why there was not immediate action.

"If they are complaints that have to do with what is going on right now and will continue to go on until this case is resolved, I guess the question I have is why isn't the bar doing anything about it right now?" Tally said. "It seems to me there's a tremendous amount of pressure on the bar and a lot of public expectation on, 'Can you do the right thing, and can you do it in a timely fashion?' "

If It Feels Like A Dollar... (NYT)

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

Anybody who has ever handed over a $10 bill thinking it was a dollar knows the problem. Unlike the currency in 180 other countries, the American greenback comes in one size, and one dominant color — green. That can be so confusing for the 3.3 million Americans who are either blind or have very poor sight that a United States District Court judge in the District of Columbia ruled last week that the government had unlawfully denied them access to the nation's paper money.

Changing United States legal tender would be expensive — the government says that redesigning its currency would cost hundreds of millions of dollars. It would also pose problems for those who make or use machines that take money for tickets or soft drinks, or change at the Laundromat. And the government's lawyers have argued that some changes could make it easier to counterfeit United States cash.

Judge James Robertson's opinion makes it clear that the American government simply has not tried very hard to help those Americans who cannot see their money. The Treasury Department has revamped United States currency design twice in the last 10 years without making any real adaptation for the blind — despite numerous pleas. None of the other objections seem convincing. The machines that take dollars could be adapted; in Europe, they work with currency that comes in a variety of sizes. And some of the additions to bills that help the blind, like embossed dots or raised numerals, are used elsewhere as extra safeguards against counterfeiting.

Judge Robertson wisely resisted telling the Bureau of Engraving and Printing exactly how to make its bills more accessible to the visually impaired. He merely wants officials to return soon to his court and offer a plan. United States currency might come in slightly different sizes or textures for each denomination. Perhaps the money-printing machines in Washington could start on the larger-denomination bills first, leaving the most numerous ones — the singles — the same as ever. However it happens, the change could also be a boon to Americans who are not blessed with 20-20 vision.

Supreme Court To Review Two School-Integration Plans (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Louisville Mayor Jerry E. Abramson is not sure whether it qualifies as irony or not.

For 25 years, his home town was under federal court order to integrate its public schools. Now that the painful and bitter chapter is closed, and the school board has come up with its own plan to make sure the schools remain racially diverse, Louisville could find itself under federal court order to stop.

"You just sort of scratch your head when you think about that," Abramson said.

More than 50 years after the Supreme Court decided in Brown v. Board of Education that separate schools are inherently unequal, the court will consider tomorrow whether race can still be a factor when school systems design programs to promote racial integration. A broadly written decision on Louisville's plan, and on a related one from Seattle, could have a profound impact on school systems across the country.

It is the first time in more than a decade that the Supreme Court will consider what is proper for school systems to do to promote desegregation, and it is the first test on the issue for two new justices who in the past have been skeptical about the use of racial classifications.

Both sides have circled Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.'s dissenting opinion in a voting rights case decided in the last term that "it is a sordid business, this divvying us up by race."

Because of the high stakes perceived by both sides of the argument, the cases have produced a blizzard of studies and conflicting legal briefs.

More than 50 groups and organizations have filed friend-of-the-court briefs on behalf of the Louisville and Seattle school systems, which use race as one factor in assigning students under their school-choice plans. The small harm done to a few students who do not get their first choice of schools, Louisville argued in its brief, is outweighed by the value of an integrated school system that "significantly advances the goal of teaching students how to participate in a democracy that has formed a single society out of many diverse people."

DOJ_NMG_0101115

Among the school systems' eclectic band of supporters: The American Psychological Association, a coalition of historians, the NCAA and a group of former professional basketball players, and 10 former high-ranking Defense Department officials.

On the other side, the Bush administration and a number of conservative legal organizations have joined the white parents in the two cities who brought the suits. Children were denied entrance to the schools of their choice, at least initially, for no reason other than the color of their skin, they say.

"School districts have an unquestioned interest in reducing minority isolation through race-neutral means," Solicitor General Paul D. Clement said in his brief to the court. "But the solution to addressing racial imbalance in communities or student bodies is not to adopt race-conscious measures."

It is unclear how many school systems across the country use race as a determining factor, or a "tiebreaker," in school assignments or how many use racial and ethnic breakdowns to help fashion school boundaries that foster integrated schools. Some have already altered their plans because of lower-court decisions.

Montgomery County in Maryland, for instance, has not considered race in assigning students to schools since 2000, when the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit declared that the school system's race-based student transfer policy was unconstitutional, according to Judith Bresler, general counsel to the county school board. Arlington County school officials no longer give extra credit to minorities when deciding admission to the popular Arlington Traditional Elementary School.

Even Seattle, which used race as a tiebreaker in its "open choice" assignment plan for ninth-graders entering high school, ended the practice in 2001, despite an appeals court finding that its plan was constitutional.

Louisville's plan has also survived lower-court challenges. It requires elementary school parents to rank their preferences from among a group of schools in their geographic area. In more than 90 percent of the cases, officials say, parents and students get their first or second choice. If not, they can apply for a transfer. But the Jefferson County Public Schools in Louisville, where African Americans make up 34 percent of the student body, wants to limit the black student population of each school to no less than 15 percent and no more than 50 percent. So in 2002, Joshua McDonald's kindergarten transfer was denied because it would have reduced the number of white students at the school to which he was assigned.

Joshua's mother, Crystal Meredith, joined in a lawsuit with other parents, even though the boy's transfer to his preferred school was approved the following year. In an unusually compact nine-page brief, Teddy B. Gordon, her attorney, asserts that the system violates the child's right to equal protection and "denigrates a five-year-old's self-worth and self-esteem by comporting him to be color-coded throughout his educational career."

Abramson, who, along with the local chamber of commerce, has filed a brief supporting the schools, said he sees the region's integrated schools as a key component of future prosperity. Even with the case before the Supreme Court, he said, the school-choice plan was not an issue in the recent elections, either in his campaign or in the campaigns of those running for the school board.

"Parents feel positive about it; the business community feels positive about it," Abramson said.

But that does not make it constitutional, the Justice Department says. And Terence J. Pell, whose Center for Individual Rights has filed a brief supporting the parents, said local officials can be ham-handed in using race. In Seattle, for instance, students are classified as either "white" or "nonwhite," he said.

That means, he noted, that a school with equal numbers of white, black, Hispanic, Asian American and Native American students would not be considered racially balanced because of the goal that each school must have a white population of at least 25 percent.

What opponents of the plans are really objecting to, said Theodore M. Shaw, president of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, is using race at all. To him, that is not a natural outgrowth of the Brown decision but a perversion of it.

"The core question is whether efforts to integrate schools on a voluntary basis are going to be treated like [past] efforts to segregate public schools," he said.

Despite the obvious attention given Brown, the Supreme Court may be more likely to look to its decision three years ago in a case involving the admission policies of the University of Michigan. In that case, the court held that diversity in higher education is a compelling state interest but that remedies involving race must be "narrowly tailored."

DOJ_NMG_0101116

There are obvious differences between an affirmative action policy at a selective law school and university and a public school system that guarantees a spot to every student. But the most important difference may be the makeup of the court.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was the deciding fifth vote that upheld the constitutionality of the law school's affirmative action plan. After her retirement, she was replaced by Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who as a government lawyer was critical of race-based plans.

Last year, while O'Connor was still on the court, justices declined to hear a school-choice plan from Massachusetts that was nearly identical to Louisville's. But with Alito on board, the court in June decided that the issue was ripe for review.

Supreme Court To Rule On School Diversity (NSDY)

By Tom Brune

Newsday, December 3, 2006

SEATTLE -- Five years after the Seattle School District suspended the use of race as a tie-breaker in assigning students to high schools, the most dramatic result can be seen at Franklin High School.

Located in a landmark 1911 building on a hill above Martin Luther King Jr. Way in Seattle's south-end where most Asians, blacks and Latinos live, Franklin lost 206 of its 339 white students, a drop from 21 percent to 9 percent of enrollment.

"You don't see many white students in the halls," Asian-American 10th grader Genevieve Saarenas said on a rainy day after school last month.

Whether Seattle or any district can voluntarily use race to assign students to create integrated schools -- and avoid that predictable decline in diversity -- will be argued before the Supreme Court Monday.

Based on lawsuits by white parents against the Seattle district and the Jefferson County School Board in Louisville, the case is the latest in a series of key school rulings going back to the historic Brown v. Topeka Board of Education in 1954.

The parents argue that when a child is denied assignment to a nearby school because of race to achieve a racial balance -- not to remedy past discrimination -- it violates the equal treatment guaranteed by the 14th Amendment.

The districts respond that the goal of school integration, and the educational and social benefits that come with it, justifies a careful, limited use of race in deciding where a student should go to school.

How the court rules could affect not only hundreds of public school systems with voluntary integration plans, but also those facing demographic change, including Long Island's 124 racially stratified districts.

"Striking down [integration] policies in public schools," Hofstra University's Jonathan Becker said, "would effectively end any possibility of desegregation efforts on Long Island."

Revisiting 2003 case

The lawsuits also require the court to revisit its 2003 Grutter v. Bollinger 5-4 decision, in which it upheld diversity and the use of race by the selective University of Michigan Law School in choosing students.

Since then, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, whose swing vote saved diversity, has been replaced by Justice Samuel Alito, an affirmative action foe. That leaves the districts searching for a new fifth vote, possibly Justice Anthony Kennedy.

The case, one of the most significant this term, has stirred widespread interest.

Dozens of civil rights, education and other groups filed 98 legal briefs in support of diversity and the districts. Several lawyers and scholars opposed to affirmative action filed 17 briefs backing the parents.

The Bush administration also weighed in on the side of the parents, arguing race-based student assignments can be used only to "eliminate the vestiges of past discrimination," not to maintain integration.

If the court accepts that argument, said Theodore Shaw of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, which pioneered school desegregation by winning the Brown decision, "it will be a repudiation of Brown."

Nearly all court-ordered desegregation plans for school districts have been lifted -- Louisville's 25 years under court order ended in 2000 -- and many once-integrated schools, particularly in the South, have since resegregated, he said.

Some still seek diversity

But as many as 1,000 districts nationally still voluntarily pursue integration using race in some form, according to the Sacramento-based Pacific Legal Foundation, which seeks to end race-based diversity policies. Seattle and Louisville are among them.

In 2000, Seattle's plan kept the children of Jill Kurfirst and Winnie Bachwitz from getting into their first choice, nearby Ballard High School.

With a new building and biotech program, the mostly white and popular Ballard is flooded with applications by students who can go to any of the 10 high schools if there is room.

When too many apply, the district used four tiebreakers; the second is race. It aimed to meet the board's goal of each school falling within 10 percentage points of the system's 40 percent white enrollment.

Kurfirst's son and Bachwitz's daughter, who are white, lost the tiebreaker and were placed at a mostly non-white school.

On their behalf, the nonprofit Parents Involved In Community Schools sued.

Two years later, across the country in Louisville, Crystal Meredith's request for a transfer for her son, who is white, was also denied because of an integration plan.

It assigns students to schools in clusters, then permits requests for transfers within the areas, with a goal of making each school fall within 15 percentage points of the district's overall 34 percent black enrollment, or 15 percent to 50 percent black.

Meredith also sued.

The legal cases of both the parents and the school districts have vulnerabilities.

Cases could get tossed

The Supreme Court could throw out each suit because of lack of standing -- Meredith's son is at the school requested, the Seattle students left the district.

The court also could decide not to use strict scrutiny to analyze the plans, and defer to the expertise of elected school boards and educators, as counseled by conservative Ninth Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski.

But most observers believe the court will require strict scrutiny, which requires the schools to prove they have a compelling state interest in using race and that their programs are narrowly tailored to avoid unneccesary harm.

Louisville's plan could fall if the court decides the numerical goals are quotas. Seattle's use of non-white as a category, instead of more specific categories of Asians, blacks and Latinos, could be a problem.

It's all about neighborhood schools to Kathleen Brose, president of the PIICs which sued the Seattle school district.

Saying it's unfair and inconvenient to ship a student across town to a school he didn't choose because of race, she spread out a city map to show long routes and bad traffic.

Brose acknowledged white enrollment has dropped at Franklin because her neighborhood no longer has to send students there. "We have options now."

When the board suspended the race tie-breaker it had no idea the case would last six years, Seattle schools attorney Shannon McMinimee said. Or that it would create an experiment about what would happen without it.

The legal record, frozen in the 2000-01 school year, will not show that. If justices ask, Seattle's attorney will tell them that diversity remains but is slipping.

Three mostly white schools are whiter, and the two schools with the most black students have become more black, figures show. Then there is Franklin.

But McMinimee said the principle of Brown remains: "'Separate but not equal' remains true. When you have racially isolated schools, you have something missing."

High Court To Look Anew At Race In School Admissions (WT)

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

The Supreme Court tomorrow will confront the issue of whether race can be used in deciding where students go to school.

In a pair of cases that could affect millions of students nationwide, the high court will consider whether the Constitution's guarantee of equality allows public schools to use race as a factor in admissions.

DOJ_NMG_0101118

The Supreme Court ruling might hinge on the court's newest member, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who replaced Sandra Day O'Connor in January.

A year ago, Justice O'Connor and her colleagues refused to hear a similar school-diversity challenge from Massachusetts. After Justice Alito's arrival, however, the court surprised many observers by agreeing to hear the appeals from Louisville, Ky., and Seattle. Federal appeals courts had ruled in favor of both school systems.

The challenges could prove among the most significant K-12 desegregation cases since the landmark Brown v. Board of Education ruling in 1954 that banned racial segregation in public schools.

Civil rights advocates are not optimistic.

The new cases "put on the table, in a very clear way, the question of how far society, how far government, should go in terms of trying to promote diversity in education in America," said Ellis Cose, the author of a study on affirmative action.

"The core issue of whether the government should be in the business of helping to promote diversity in some way in education is at the heart of all these cases," he said.

The Bush administration is siding with parents against the school districts, arguing the policies are an unconstitutional, albeit well-meaning, "racial balancing" without a compelling justification.

"A well-intentioned quota is still a quota," the administration said in a brief submitted on the Kentucky case.

Civil rights advocates said a ruling that bars schools from taking race into account would deal a devastating blow to the promotion of diversity in schools.

If the court issues a sweeping ruling against using race, "we will be witnessing a reversal of historic proportions," said Ted Shaw, president of the Legal Defense and Educational Foundation of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"Race-neutral" alternatives such as lotteries or socioeconomic sorting often end up segregating school populations again and hurting black students, according to Mr. Shaw's organization.

About 400 of the nation's 15,000 school districts are under court orders to desegregate. Hundreds more school districts may voluntarily take race into account, but there are no firm figures on how many do.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights said banning the voluntary consideration of race in school assignments could result in an "absurd" situation, in which districts are not allowed to promote the diversity they formerly were under order to achieve.

In one case before the high court, Seattle used race as a tie-breaking factor in deciding who can attend which of the city's public high schools when too many students seek admission to the same school.

School officials there aim for each school to have about 40 percent white students and 60 percent racial minorities, reflecting the city's overall racial composition.

In the other case, the Louisville-area school district used racial guidelines to keep black student enrollment at most elementary, middle and high schools at 15 percent to 50 percent to maintain diversity.

School Integration Back Before Supreme Court (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, December 3, 2006

More than 50 years after the U.S. Supreme Court outlawed racial segregation in public schools, the justices are about to consider whether a school district can voluntarily integrate by considering race in campus assignments.

In cases from Seattle and Louisville, Ky., to be argued Monday, the justices will address the question left unanswered by the Brown vs. Board of Education ruling in 1954: What can the government do when the last vestiges of state-sponsored segregation are erased and schools nevertheless remain racially isolated because of housing patterns, parental choice and perhaps societal discrimination?

Facing that situation, officials in Seattle installed a system that allowed race to be considered as one of several factors in determining enrollment in popular high schools. In Jefferson County, Ky., which includes Louisville, the school district was once under a court desegregation order, and officials tried to avoid resegregating by setting minimum minority and white populations at each school.

"Jefferson County housing is substantially segregated along racial lines," attorney Frances Mellen said in a brief to the court. "The assignment of all (district) students to 'neighborhood schools' would result in a substantial number of racially segregated schools."

After the court desegregation order was lifted in 2000, Mellen said, the 97,000-student district concluded the only way it could prevent resegregation was to seek African American enrollment of 15 to 50 percent at each school. The proportion of blacks in the district was 36 percent.

The student assignment process, she wrote, "is flexible and uses race in a limited and permissible manner."

But Teddy Gordon, the attorney for a white woman whose 5-year-old son was assigned to a more distant Louisville school rather than his neighborhood school, said the district's program was "nothing more than a hard-core, mechanized quota."

The Bush administration agrees. In papers filed with the court, Solicitor General Paul Clement outlined the administration's position: A district can assign students by race when necessary to make up for its own intentional discrimination, but not to integrate schools that were never deliberately segregated.

Allowing "the use of a racial classification to achieve a desired racial balance ... would remove the critical requirement that individuals be considered as individuals," Clement said. Such a program, he said, is just as unconstitutional as the segregated school systems that the Supreme Court struck down in 1954.

The administration is supporting white parents challenging both the Louisville and Seattle programs. The Seattle plan -- suspended since 2002, when it came under legal attack -- gave officials in the city's 46,000-student high school district a list of factors to consider when a school had more applicants than space. Second on the list, after the presence of a brother or sister at the school, was whether the student's race would move the school closer to the district population of 40 percent white and 60 percent nonwhite.

A UC Berkeley law professor who supports school districts' right to consider race in enrollment described the cases as the final chapter of Brown vs. Board of Education.

In the last few decades, "the court has basically ended the business of judicially enforced racial integration," said Goodwin Liu, who filed arguments in the case on behalf of 19 former University of California campus chancellors. "Now the only question is whether school districts on their own accord can integrate. If not, it's fair to say that from the constitutional law standpoint, we've given up on racial integration of public schools."

A report by the Civil Rights Project at Harvard University illustrated the persistence of racial separation in public schools, despite the long-standing ban on intentional segregation.

In 2003, the project said, whites made up 58 percent of the nation's public school enrollment, but the average white student attended a school that was nearly 80 percent white. African Americans accounted for 17 percent of all students, but the average black student attended a school that was 53 percent black. Latinos made up 19 percent of total enrollment, but attended schools that typically were 55 percent Latino.

But another report, by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, questioned whether integrated schools were better for students.

Social science studies provide "little evidence that racial and ethnic diversity in elementary and secondary schools results in significant improvements in academic performance," the commission, controlled by appointees of President Bush, said last week.

The case also arises at a time of uncertainty about the constitutional status of race in government programs.

Three years ago, after a series of decisions condemning preferential programs for minorities and women, the Supreme Court was widely expected to forbid the use of race as a factor in admission to public universities.

Instead, over the opposition of the Bush administration, the court left the door open a crack. In a 5-4 decision, the justices said an applicant's race was one of several criteria a public university could consider in the interest of promoting a diverse student body.

The outcome may be different this time. The author of the 2003 ruling, now-retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, has been replaced by Justice Samuel Alito, a reliable member of the conservative bloc since his appointment by President Bush in January. In a 1985 application for a promotion in President Ronald Reagan's Justice Department, Alito said he was particularly proud of his work against "racial and ethnic quotas."

DOJ_NMG_0101120

The Supreme Court's agreement to review the Seattle and Louisville cases, after lower courts upheld the districts' integration plans, was a likely signal that Chief Justice John Roberts and his colleagues are preparing to ban racial considerations in public school enrollment, said Pepperdine University law Professor Douglas Kmiec, a Justice Department official under Reagan and President George H.W. Bush.

"Racial balancing is patently unconstitutional, and the Roberts court should -- and will likely -- say so," Kmiec said.

He also said the court probably would leave intact its 2003 decision on college admissions. The Bush administration argues that the school district programs are closer to racial quotas than the university program the court upheld and lack the justification for racial diversity that the court found in higher education.

"In the second grade, you're learning the multiplication tables, not discussing the effects of slavery in the 20th century," said Pacific Legal Foundation attorney Paul Beard, who filed arguments opposing the Louisville program. "The court recognizes a special niche in the First Amendment for universities and colleges to determine their own educational mission."

Supporters of the school districts disagree. "The historic purpose of the public schools is to provide common ground for people in all walks of life," said Berkeley's Liu.

Some analysts say it is possible that Justice Anthony Kennedy, who voted with the dissenters in 2003 to strike down race-conscious admissions at the University of Michigan Law School, will switch sides and provide the decisive vote for the school district plans.

"I think Kennedy is an idealist about American society and the issue of race," said attorney Edward Lazarus, a former Supreme Court clerk and author of a book on the court. Lazarus, who supports racial considerations in enrollment but is not involved in the cases, noted that while Kennedy has been critical of affirmative action, he has never ruled it out altogether.

The ruling, due by the end of June, will have a broad impact, though the exact contours of the case are difficult to measure.

The government has no official figures for the number of school districts with voluntary integration programs. Sharon Browne, a Pacific Legal Foundation lawyer who filed arguments supporting a group of white parents in Seattle, said two conservative scholars estimated in a recent study that nearly 1,000 districts nationwide have some type of race-based enrollment policy.

It's also unclear whether the ruling will affect California. The prevailing view among attorneys and academics is that racial considerations in school admissions are prohibited by Proposition 209, the 1996 initiative that outlawed racial preferences in state and local government programs, regardless of what the Supreme Court finds constitutionally permissible nationwide.

"Even if the case goes the other way, it won't have any effect on California or Michigan," where voters adopted a measure identical to Prop. 209 last month, said Paul Beard, another Pacific Legal Foundation lawyer.

Although the state Supreme Court has not yet ruled on Prop. 209's application to education, he said, an appeals court made it clear that the measure banned "(student) assignments on the basis of race."

The foundation has sued to challenge race-based programs in Los Angeles and Berkeley and is poised to sue San Francisco if the school board tries to reintroduce race as a factor in admissions. Since a court-approved settlement in 2001 ended the use of race for desegregation in San Francisco, single-race enrollment at some schools has risen above 80 percent.

Liu said, however, that a Supreme Court ruling upholding school district integration programs might convince California courts that race-based student assignments are not "preferences" forbidden by Prop 209. He said enrollment at public schools, where attendance is mandatory, could be viewed differently than decisions on hiring, contracting or admission to selective universities, where there are clear winners and losers.

That was the view of Judge Alex Kozinski of the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco in an October 2005 opinion that has been widely cited by supporters of the school districts -- in part because Kozinski is a Reagan appointee who once clerked for Kennedy.

In an enrollment plan intended to preserve racial diversity, "there is no competition between the races, and no race is given a preference over another," Kozinski said in a ruling upholding the Seattle program. "That a student is denied the school of his choice may be disappointing, but it carries no racial stigma."

Not so, said Harry Korrell, lawyer for the white parents challenging the Seattle program.

DOJ_NMG_0101121

"Racial balancing prefers one individual to another for no reason other than race," he said in a Supreme Court brief, "and thereby violates the heart of the equal protection clause -- the principle that our Constitution is color-blind."

Supreme Court To Consider Race-based School Assignments (SLPD)

By Adam Sichko, POST-DISPATCH WASHINGTON BUREAU

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court will hear arguments in two cases Monday that challenge the ability of public school systems to consider race when assigning students to schools.

The appeals, involving the school districts of Seattle and Louisville, Ky., are the most significant race-related cases the court has heard in several years. The court's ruling, expected in late spring or early summer, could restrict the ways schools pursue integration, said Gary Orfield, director of the Civil Rights Project at Harvard University.

"The stakes are rising," Orfield said. "We're now talking about if the Supreme Court will find plans that were rejected as not enough in 1968 to be too much in 2006." He said a ban on race-based school assignment aimed at integration would likely lead to "a significant increase in racial segregation across the country."

Critics of Louisville's plan disagree.

"Our communities have come (a) long way since the segregated days of the '40s and the '50s and on into the '70s," wrote attorneys for a Louisville parent whose white child was denied a transfer due to desegregation standards. "There is no going back. We will not turn back the clock,".

The court's ruling is unlikely to affect the St. Louis magnet-school program, attorneys and legal experts said, because it was part of a federal court settlement.

The Seattle and Louisville school systems voluntarily adopted desegregation programs that use race as a factor in admissions and cap how many white or black students can be enrolled at a school.

Parents sued the school districts, saying the programs were unconstitutional. Federal appeals courts ruled in favor of the districts, and the parents appealed.

St. Louis is watching

The Bush administration has weighed in on the side of parents, arguing that race-based school assignments violate the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment, ratified in 1868 in part to guarantee equal legal rights to blacks.

Such race-based systems "contravene the fundamental liberties guaranteed to each citizen by the Equal Protection Clause," wrote officials from the Justice Department and the Department of Education in a brief filed in the case. "The District's plan is not to assemble a genuinely diverse student body; to the contrary, the plan crudely lumps students into 'white' and 'nonwhite' categories and provides for no individualized, holistic consideration of students."

The other side includes 17 state attorney-generals' offices, including those in Missouri and Illinois. They defend the school districts' desegregation plans and say the districts, not the courts, should decide what's best for their constituents.

A ruling to the contrary "would severely limit their (school boards') ability to seek for children in their district the benefits of learning in an integrated environment," the attorneys general wrote. "The state's interest in integrating schools is consistent with the principles of equality that animate the Fourteenth Amendment."

St. Louis' 27 magnet schools use race as a variable in admissions; each must maintain an enrollment ratio of 60 percent black students and 40 percent others. Students who live in St. Louis or a St. Louis County school district that participates in the desegregation program can attend a magnet school.

The school district's attorney, Ken Brostron, said he hadn't read the Seattle and Louisville cases in-depth but that he doubted their outcome would have any affect on St. Louis' situation.

Christine Rossell, a professor at Boston University who testified as an expert during St. Louis' desegregation case, agreed.

"It's a whole separate ballgame," she said. "The court decision ... won't affect St. Louis at all. (It) was deliberately designed so they could use race forever."

DOJ_NMG_0101122

But merely the fact that the high court agreed to hear the two cases makes William Taylor uneasy. A lawyer with the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, he led the legal effort in St. Louis that ultimately created the area's magnet school program.

He said the court's action "caused a certain degree of apprehension among civil rights advocates like myself, because they didn't take these cases when (former Associate Justice) Sandra Day O'Connor was on the court."

O'Connor is gone

O'Connor was the swing vote in a landmark 2003 decision maintaining that affirmative action was acceptable in state-funded higher education institutions, if the school was considering a potential student's race as part of an effort to strive for diversity. But her retirement, and the death last year of Chief Justice William Rehnquist, created two court openings that were filled by conservative justices who may have a different view.

In that 5-4 opinion, the court also said race quotas were unconstitutional. Yet that's precisely what the Seattle system amounts to, the Bush administration argued.

Seattle's plan is "indistinguishable from a quota," government officials wrote. "It is clear that this program is driven by the numbers."

Supporters argue that "race-neutral" programs have led to racial isolation, and that yanking away a school district's ability to establish race-conscious measures would quickly lead to re-segregation. That has happened in school districts in Nashville, Tenn., and Charlotte, N.C., said panelists at a discussion Friday sponsored by the American Education Research Association, which supports the Seattle and Louisville plans.

"It's not going to cure itself. It's not going to happen by accident," Orfield said. He argued that there would be "very little desegregation" if communities were left to their own devices.

Making their case

Attorneys for the Louisville parents argued that race-based assignments aren't the answer.

"No community can tolerate any longer the public education system that makes race the determining factor of educational outcomes," they wrote. "As long as race consciousness is enforced then our children will continue to be treated differently."

The court could agree with that stance and toss out the Seattle and Louisville desegregation programs as unconstitutional. Such a decision is more likely to have an impact on small school districts that have similar approaches, Orfield said.

Taylor said even if the court limits the weight that race can hold in such plans, so long as it still allows school districts to use it as a variable in admissions, "then we're OK in St. Louis."

"I think the court will understand that there are a number of places around the country trying to preserve desegregation plans, and that if they sweep widely, they could create a lot of havoc," he said.

Can Affirmative Action Survive The New Supreme Court? (LAT)

By Edward Lazarus, Edward Lazarus, A Lawyer In Private Practice, Is The Author Of "Closed Chambers: The Rise, Fall And

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

A case being argued this week over racial balance in public schools could determine the future of affirmative action programs.

AT THE START of his first full term on the Supreme Court, Justice Anthony Kennedy weighed a legal challenge to a policy in Richmond, Va., that reserved 10% of the city's contracts for minority-owned businesses (Richmond vs. Croson). At the time, Kennedy was thought to be a potential swing vote on a court deeply riven by its views on affirmative action.

The court's liberal wing believed that in light of the nation's racist past, the Constitution's promise of "equal protection of the laws" permitted — indeed, almost mandated — some degree of minority racial preferences. As Justice Harry Blackmun wrote in the Bakke case, in which the court cautiously ratified the concept of affirmative action in graduate school admissions, "To get beyond racism, we must first take account of race."

The most conservative justices rallied around the opposite view. To get beyond racism, they contended, it was essential not to perpetuate a 200-plus-year mistake of letting government classify individuals according to race. Under their reading of the equal protection clause, the Constitution morally demanded colorblindness.

Kennedy struggled to find a middle ground. Although uncomfortable with affirmative action (and disdainful of Richmond's program, which the court struck down), Kennedy, siding with the majority, rejected the argument that the Constitution categorically bars government from using race-conscious means to achieve such compelling policy objectives as remedying past discrimination. With respect to affirmative action, Kennedy suggested, the Constitution's answer was not "never" but "almost never."

Eighteen years later, on the eve of the court hearing its first set of affirmative action cases under Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., the battle over racial preferences continues. On the federal level, former President Clinton's "mend it, don't end it" approach remains essentially in place, though in several states, California and Michigan most notably, anti-affirmative action forces have imposed their version of colorblindness.

Inside the court, although some of the players have changed, the justices remain deeply divided about the means for achieving racial equality. And Kennedy has become even more pivotal to the fate of affirmative action.

Since Croson, the Supreme Court has upheld only one race-based program. Three years ago, to the surprise of many court watchers, it upheld the University of Michigan Law School's program for using race as one non-predominant factor in admissions. Split 5 to 4, the court condemned racial quotas (as it had in Bakke) but ruled that the school's "holistic" one-factor-among-many approach was a barely permissible way to advance what school officials had identified as the compelling interest in maintaining diversity in their classrooms.

The Michigan case, however, preceded Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement. She had provided the fifth vote (together with Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer) to uphold the law school's use of race as a plus in admissions.

Few expect O'Connor's replacement, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., to follow her lead. From his days in the Justice Department of the Reagan administration, Alito has been a firm opponent of affirmative action. And much the same can be said of Roberts, who took over after William H. Rehnquist's death and is thought to share his predecessor's affinity for colorblindness.

As a consequence, all eyes are on Kennedy. In voting to strike down the Michigan Law School's admissions program, he again rejected the standard of pure colorblindness and endorsed the idea that schools could seek racial diversity through a narrow, only-as-a-last-resort program of racial preferences. In his view, however, Michigan had failed this stringent test — just as every other affirmative action program had since Croson.

The critical question is whether the programs challenged in the cases scheduled to be heard this week can somehow meet Kennedy's thus-far unmeetable standard.

These cases concern the efforts of two public school districts — one in Seattle and another in Louisville, Ky. — to achieve a reasonable level of racial diversity in their classrooms while also allowing students to attend either neighborhood schools or schools of their choice.

High school students in Seattle initially get to select which of the district's 10 schools they want to attend. Race comes into play when the school district evens out enrollment among oversubscribed and undersubscribed schools, with the goal of keeping the racial makeup of each school within 15% of the district's overall racial makeup. To achieve this, the district uses race as one of several "tie-breaking" factors in reassigning students.

The Louisville program covers elementary school as well as higher grades and starts from the premise that students will attend neighborhood schools. But its basic idea is the same as Seattle's: To ensure that education takes place in a racially diverse setting, the district uses race as one of several criteria for reassigning students.

For example, because the minority student population in the Louisville district is 35%, officials aim to keep black student enrollment in each school between 15% and 50%.

These cases raise a familiar problem. In Brown vs. Board of Education, the Supreme Court outlawed segregated schools but gave no definitive answers to many vexing questions. For example, is it enough for the government simply to stop imposing segregation, or does the Constitution require school districts (or at least formerly segregated districts) to achieve integration? And if the Constitution does not require integrated schools, does it at least permit school officials to create integrated ones because they think racial diversity in the classroom is a social good?

Our wars over affirmative action in school admissions arose from the last of these questions. Disappointed white applicants rebelled at the idea that public schools could award highly competitive slots in colleges and graduate schools to "less qualified" minority students by adopting racial quotas or by using race as a "plus" factor in evaluating applicants.

The critical question in the Seattle and Louisville cases is whether their school assignment programs are sufficiently different from typical affirmative action programs that Kennedy will find their use of race, while problematic, sufficiently benign to satisfy his "almost never" approach. There is some reason to believe that the answer may be yes.

As several prominent federal appellate judges have observed, the reason the Constitution is skeptical of racial classifications is that, historically, they have been used to oppress minorities (the Jim Crow laws), to stigmatize racial groups (laws enforcing racial separation) or to give members of one racial group a leg up over another (typical affirmative action programs).

The Seattle and Louisville pupil-assignment programs spread none of these poisons. They do not oppress, stigmatize or elevate. True, the plans require state officials to think about individuals in racial terms, and they use race as one factor in making an important choice about where students will go to school. Inevitably, some students will be disappointed by the results. But disappointment will visit white and minority students alike because every student runs a risk of reassignment, and it will not stem from school officials placing greater value on membership in one racial group as opposed to another.

The stakes in how Kennedy views these distinctions are high indeed. Hundreds of school districts, confronting largely segregated neighborhoods, use similar plans to ensure that their classrooms reflect their communities' racial balance and teach by example about a common humanity that can transcend racial or ethnic divides.

In terms of education, how the court decides this week's cases may well determine whether the resegregation of our public schools — a creeping process for years — will take permanent hold because school districts will be effectively barred from stopping it. More broadly still, if the Seattle and Louisville programs do not satisfy Kennedy and a court majority, we will have to wonder, whether the justices say so explicitly or not, whether any use of race to further diversity ever will.

Clueless In Seattle (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

SEATTLE -- This city's school district decided in 2000 that because the son of Jill Kurfirst and the daughter of Winnie Bachwitz are white, they should be assigned to an inferior and distant high school. If they had not left the Seattle school system, this would have required them to rise at 5 a.m. in order to leave home by 5:30 a.m., alone and in the dark, to take the first of three buses, returning home between 8 p.m. and 9 p.m., with almost no time left for homework, family activities and adequate sleep.

The parents argue that the racial school assignments -- actually, assignments by pigmentation -- that so injured their children violate the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection of the laws. The reliably unreliable U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit -- often reversed but never in doubt -- predictably ruled, with interesting indifference to pertinent Supreme Court precedents, against the parents. Soon -- oral arguments are tomorrow -- the Supreme Court can remind the 9th Circuit of the Constitution's limits on what schools can do in the name of "diversity."

Students can seek admission to any of Seattle's high schools. But the Seattle School District decided to engineer a precise racial balance in its most popular -- because much better -- high schools, which are chosen by more students than they can accommodate. The district wanted each oversubscribed school to reflect the entire system's ratio of 40 percent whites and 60 percent nonwhites. So it adopted a race-based admission plan to shape the schools' "diversity."

The district gave preference to certain applicants, using considerations it called "tiebreakers." One, which benefited about 10 percent of applicants, was whether the student had a sibling at the desired school. Another was whether the student's race would produce or maintain a 40-60 balance.

When registering children for high school, parents were asked to specify each child's race. If parents did not specify, the district did so based on visual inspection of the parents' or child's pigmentation. The school board president has said that "skin tone matters."

The two children wanted to attend Ballard High School because of its biotech academy. In the 2000-01 school year, when 82 percent of the city's students sought admission to the five best schools, the children were among the 300 students denied admission to the school of their choice because their race interfered with racial balancing.

Although Seattle never had segregated schools, the district discusses its racial preferences with reference to "segregation" and "integration." But a statement by the district reveals that racial preferences are supposed to serve social engineering: "Diversity in the classroom increases the likelihood that children will discuss racial or ethnic issues and be more likely to socialize with people of different races." Or different skin tones.

Is that a "compelling government interest," sufficient to justify race-based school assignments? The 9th Circuit, siding with the district, argued two propositions, both of which conflict with Supreme Court precedents.

One was that racial preferences are benign if they do not " unduly harm any students" or " uniformly benefit any race or group of individuals to the detriment of another" (emphases added). But the Supreme Court has rejected this idea that the equal protection clause protects group rights rather than individual rights.

Second, the 9th Circuit said broad deference is owed to the judgments of local school districts. But no line of cases has established that high schools enjoy even the limited latitude that universities have in treating race as a factor when deciding who may be admitted. Rather, the Supreme Court has held that public secondary education "must be available to all on equal terms." And here are samples of the Seattle district's judgments which the 9th Circuit thinks deserve deference:

Until June, the school district's Web site declared that "cultural racism" includes "emphasizing individualism as opposed to a more collective ideology," "having a future time orientation" (planning ahead) and "defining one form of English as standard." The site also asserted that only whites can be racists, and disparaged assimilation as the "giving up" of one's culture. After this propaganda provoked outrage, the district, saying it needed to "provide more context to readers" about "institutional racism," put up a page saying that the district's intention is to avoid "unsuccessful concepts such as a melting pot or colorblind mentality."

The Supreme Court has said that all racial classifications by government are "presumptively invalid" unless narrowly tailored to serve a compelling government interest. The district's repellent Web site revealed the interest that the district considers so compelling that it justifies racial preferences. Supreme Court deference to such race-mongering would make a mockery of the equal protection guarantee.

Gay-rights Activists Hopeful About Agenda's New Prospects (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — The gay-rights movement suffered a setback in last month's midterm election when seven states passed initiatives banning same-sex marriage or domestic partnerships. But with Democrats about to take control of Congress, some of its other legislative goals appear within reach — including making violence against gays a hate crime and outlawing workplace discrimination.

For the last 12 years of Republican control of Congress, gay-rights organizations set aside their push for legal protections in order to defend against conservative measures such as same-sex marriage bans.

With the realignment of the House and Senate next month, gay and lesbian groups say they are tantalizingly close to having enough votes to ensure passage of at least the hate crimes bill, and perhaps the discrimination measure, which once failed in the Senate by one vote.

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), who is gay, said the hate crimes bill had a "very good chance of going to George Bush's desk … in the first half of the year."

He said the discrimination measure might be further off, noting that Democrats may not want to push for too much too soon.

Nevertheless, prospects for change are sufficiently improved that social conservatives are gearing up for battle.

"We're very concerned," said Tom McClusky, lobbyist for the Family Research Council, a prominent conservative group. "We see blocking those pieces of legislation as one of our top priorities."

DOJ_NMG_0101126

The hate crimes bill would provide federal resources to local law enforcement officials; it has the backing of 175 organizations, including the National Sheriffs' Assn., the International Assn. of Chiefs of Police and the U.S. Conference of Mayors. The legislation — prompted by the 1998 killing of Matthew Shepard, a gay man who was beaten and left for dead outside Laramie, Wyo. — has passed the Republican Senate three times and the GOP House once but has never reached the president's desk.

Some gay-rights activists now are demanding that the bill include transgender individuals, which could complicate passage.

And social conservatives contend that hate crimes bills in Sweden and Canada have squelched religious expression. "Pastors have been prosecuted for saying these things [about homosexuality] from the Bible, in their own churches," said Jan LaRue, chief counsel for the conservative Concerned Women for America.

The bill to ban workplace discrimination because of sexual orientation failed by one vote in the Senate 10 years ago. Such discrimination is legal in 33 states; conservatives say businesses should be free to hire employees who reflect their values.

Gay-rights activists say they expect the Democratic leadership to allow just one of their issues to get attention soon after the party takes control, for fear of alienating conservative Democrats. The hate crimes bill has the best chance of early passage, advocates say, because it has support of law enforcement groups.

Rep. Tammy Baldwin (D-Wis.), who is a lesbian, said one advantage of Democratic control was the power to hold hearings to educate the public — and the president — about the importance of the hate crimes bill.

"For 12 years, hearings were not held on these issues," she said. "If you use the hearing process well, it would be hard not to be moved and influenced by the stories from victims of hate crimes or from families of victims of hate crimes who have died.

"If we want to move the president to sign a hate crimes bill, we'll have to move the public."

With a Democratic majority in the House and Senate, social conservatives will be looking to the White House for help. "We'll likely be relying on the president to veto," McClusky said.

Gay-rights activists acknowledge that President Bush could be a problem, given his base of religious conservatives, but are not convinced he would use his veto power.

"Given the broad, broad public support, I'd be very surprised if President Bush would actually veto" the hate crimes bill, said Matt Foreman, executive director of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force, a civil rights group.

Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, said of Bush: "Until now he's been beholden to the radical right wing. I hope coming out of this election cycle, he will think more deeply about his legacy."

At the White House, Deputy Press Secretary Dana Perino demurred when asked what Bush would do.

"A lot of ideas are being discussed for the new Congress," she said. "We'll take a look at the details of legislation when it's introduced and moving through the legislative process."

Some gay-rights activists want to press for the hate crimes and workplace discrimination bills simultaneously.

"This seems ultimately doable," Solmonese said. "The public overwhelmingly supports the fact that gay and lesbian people shouldn't be fired just because of who they are and supports more tools for law enforcement."

Still, the Human Rights Campaign has learned from past misfires — including President Clinton's effort to banish discrimination against gays in the military on his first day in office — not to be overly ambitious so early on.

And with Americans listing the war in Iraq and corruption in Congress as their main reasons for voting for Democrats, Solmonese is reminding members that lawmakers will have to focus on those issues first.

"The surest way for this new Congress to go away is if they ignore that tidal wave. It would be shortsighted for us to demand things," he said.

But gay-rights groups say they have already won an important victory: They can now play offense instead of defense.

"One of the most welcome changes with the new Congress is not being on defensive every single minute of the day, which we've been for 12 years," Foreman said. "We've spent so many scarce resources over the years just trying to not lose. It's thrilling to be able to move forward."

New Programs Help Mentally Ill Ex-Cons (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0101127

By Angela Delli Santi, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 3, 2006

Trenton, N.J. (AP) -- Larry Lamb has lived a half-century of failures: three stints in New Jersey state prison, four psych ward confinements, drug and alcohol abuse dating back to adolescence, and more time in county lockups than he can count.

A year ago, he began racking up successes.

Lamb, 50, hasn't had a drug-tainted urine sample since he enrolled in an intensive program for mentally ill inmates as he was being released from jail. He's taking antidepressants, keeping appointments with his therapist, working when he can find a job and paying off court-imposed fines from his prior life of crime and homelessness.

"I knew I needed help," said Lamb, who traces his troubled and isolated life back to a day when he was 7 and he watched as his 9-year-old brother was run over and killed by a truck. "I never let anybody get close to me."

Advocates for the mentally ill say Lamb's situation is common among the nation's inmates, 55 percent of whom suffer from a mental health problem, according to a study released in September by the Justice Department's Office of Justice Programs.

Yet, the availability and intensity of mental health services for people in the nation's criminal justice system varies greatly, said Karen Bower, a lawyer with the Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law, a Washington-based group advocating for the rights of the mentally ill.

A similar disparity in post-incarceration services exists nationally, with some people receiving comprehensive discharge planning before they leave prison or jail, others being offered limited mental health or social services, and some getting none.

"You are much more likely now than you were 10 years ago to get some sort of assistance at discharge," said Tammy Seltzer, director of state policy with the National Council for Community Behavioral Healthcare, a nonprofit association representing community mental health and addiction providers. "Nationally, we're still very far from where we need to be. There are some wonderful programs, but there are not enough programs to serve everybody who is in this situation."

Services are severely lacking for those with dual diagnoses, like mental illness and drug dependence, said Bower. In one class-action lawsuit filed by Bazelon in New York, mentally ill parolees are suing for access to chemical addiction programs. A prior suit brought by a mentally ill inmate in New Jersey forced the state to revamp its prison psychiatric programs to replace the practice of segregating inmates whose psychiatric disorders made them disruptive.

Without adequate support, or access to medication and counseling, those discharged or paroled with serious mental illness — defined as schizophrenia, bipolar or major depression — often wind up cycling back through the criminal justice system, Bower said.

Lamb is among a small group of ex-inmates in New Jersey participating in pilot programs for such parolees. The programs offer comprehensive services — housing and job assistance, medication management, counseling and education — aimed at reducing recidivism among this high-risk, high-maintenance population.

Until this year, New Jersey had no services for the mentally ill after they left state prison, and only nine of the 21 counties have any post-incarceration services for those leaving county jails.

"The dilemma was, 'Where do I put a person like this?'" said Kevin McHugh, director of community programs and grant management for the New Jersey Parole Board. "We don't want to keep them in jail, and the likelihood for them to fail on the outside was high."

In New Jersey, a mental health task force created by former Gov. Richard J. Codey last year brought the oft-forgotten mentally ill inmate population into focus and highlighted the need for new partnerships between state agencies such as mental health and parole, said John Monahan, a task force member and president of Greater Trenton Behavioral HealthCare, a mental health services provider.

Two pilot programs have started since the task force issued its report. PROMISE, or Program for Returning Offenders with Mental Illness Safely and Effectively, provides up to six months of post-incarceration services to paroled inmates who have a history of criminal behavior related to untreated mental illness.

The program began in the spring, now has 16 parolees and can accommodate a maximum of 30. So far, five people have completed the program, and two committed parole violations and returned to prison.

Monahan's company runs a second pilot project, called Coming Home, which relies on state, county and grant funding to provide outreach services to state and county inmates. Counselors begin working with inmates three months before discharge to develop a plan for living on the outside and continue to work with parolees until they are self-sufficient.

A three-year, $300,000 grant from the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation funds the portion of the project dealing with state prisoners. The money will pay for services for 60 state prisoners and underwrites efforts to amend state policy so such services can become widespread and permanent.

"We have to see to it that people who have serious mental illness get the help that they need so they don't wind up incarcerated and they get help before problems happen for them," Monahan said.

Lamb, who is among the ex-Mercer County Jail inmates in Greater Trenton Behavioral HealthCare's Corrections Project, credits his counselor, Anthony Towns, with his success. But Towns says Lamb is modest.

"I haven't done anything more for Larry than I've done for any other client," Towns said. "In any therapeutic relationship, the client and the counselor should have some type of bond. Larry came to me with motivation to succeed. It just so happens that Larry connected with me."

Lamb just moved into his first apartment, is re-establishing a relationship with his teenage son and says he's hoping, one day, to find someone to share his new life.

Ban On Saucy Beer Labels Brings A Free-Speech Suit (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

Santa Claus will not be coming to Maine this year, at least not on a beer label, if state officials have their way.

The state's Bureau of Liquor Enforcement in September rejected three beer labels proposed by Shelton Brothers, a Massachusetts beer importer, including one for "Santa's Butt Winter Porter" that depicts St. Nick from behind, checking a list and drinking a beer, his ample posterior on a wooden barrel.

The bureau said the labels violated a regulation stating that alcohol advertisements cannot contain "undignified or improper illustrations."

The Maine Civil Liberties Union sued the bureau on Thursday in Federal District Court in Portland on behalf of Shelton Brothers, claiming that its right to free speech was being violated.

One of the other rejected labels, for Rose de Gambrinus, a raspberry lambic beer, depicts a watercolor commissioned by its maker, Cantillon of Belgium, of a nude woman sitting on a person's lap. The third, for Les Sans Culottes French blonde ale, uses Delacroix's "Liberty Leading the People," which hangs in the Louvre.

"The illustrations on these labels are artistic, and art is entitled to the protection of the First Amendment," said Zachary Heiden, a staff lawyer with the Maine Civil Liberties Union.

The state told The Associated Press that it feared the Santa label would appeal to children. It said it rejected the others because they depicted bare breasts.

Shelton Brothers has sued at least four other states, including New York, after their labels were rejected, said an owner, Daniel Shelton. The states allowed the labels to be sold after the publicity surrounding the lawsuits, Mr. Shelton said.

Ho Ho Ho? State Says No No No! To Beer Label With Pint-wielding Santa Claus (AP)

AP, December 3, 2006

PORTLAND, Maine (AP) — A beer distributor says Maine is being a Scrooge by barring it from selling a beer with a label depicting Santa Claus enjoying a pint of brew.

In a complaint filed in federal court, Shelton Brothers accuses the Maine Bureau of Liquor Enforcement of censorship for denying applications for labels for Santa's Butt Winter Porter and two other beers it wants to sell in Maine.

The dispute recalls a similar squabble last year when Connecticut told Shelton Brothers it had problems with its Seriously Bad Elf ale.

"Last year it was elves. This year it's Santa. Maybe next year it'll be reindeer," said Daniel Shelton, owner of the company in Belchertown, Mass.

DOJ_NMG_0101129

The lawsuit, filed Thursday, contends the state's action violates the First Amendment by censoring artistic expression.

But the state says it's within its rights. The label with Santa might appeal to children, said Maine State Police Lt. Patrick Fleming. The other two labels are considered inappropriate because they show bare-breasted women.

"We stand by our decision and at some point it'll go through the court system and somebody will make the decision on whether we are right or wrong," he said.

The lawsuit was brought by the Maine Civil Liberties Union, which says the beer labels are entitled to First Amendment protection.

"There is no good reason for the state to censor art, even art found on a beer label," said Zachary Heiden, staff attorney for the MCLU.

The label for the English-made Santa's Butt Winter Porter features a rear view of a beer-drinking Santa Claus sitting atop a barrel. The beer's name refers not only to Santa's ample backside, but also to the barrel. In England, brewers once used a large barrel called a "butt" to store beer.

Maine also denied label applications for Les Sans Culottes, a French ale, and Rose de Gambrinus, a Belgian fruit beer.

Les Sans Culottes' label is illustrated with detail from Eugene Delacroix's 1830 painting "Liberty Leading the People," which hangs in the Louvre and once appeared on the 100-franc bill. Rose de Gambrinus shows a bare-breasted woman in a watercolor painting commissioned by the brewery.

In a letter to Shelton Brothers, the state denied the applications for the labels because they contained "undignified or improper illustration."

The state reviews between 10,000 and 12,000 applications a year for beer and wine labels. It typically denies about a dozen a year because they contain inappropriate language or nudity, or might appeal to children, Fleming said.

"Basically, the standard we use is what are people going to see walking up and down a store aisle," he said.

Shelton said his company filed a lawsuit against the New York State Liquor Authority last month after it denied his applications for six holiday-themed beer labels, including Santa's Butt Winter Porter. The state changed its mind but the lawsuit is going forward, he said.

In years past, the company has had labels challenged in a few states, including Ohio, North Carolina and Missouri, he said.

States have the power to regulate alcohol through the 21st Amendment, which repealed Prohibition in 1933. "But I don't know where they get the idea they can ignore the rest of the Constitution," Shelton said.

European antitrust chief says large energy companies need to be broken up

BRUSSELS, BELGIUM — Europe needs to split control of the energy supply chain to stimulate investment and lower prices, European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said last week in a signal that regulators are determined to break up large companies that generate and distribute power.

"I see only one way forward if we are to restore credibility and faith in the market. Europe needs a structural solution that once and for all separates infrastructure from supply and generation," she said.

"A clear separation of interests between the network operators, energy producers and energy companies is imperative," she said at Les Mandarins, France's interconnector facility that feeds energy supplies across the English Channel. "Then we will finally see an end to discrimination, and we will also have laid the ground for a system of proper investment incentives."

Her Brussels office distributed her prepared remarks.

EU regulators say they have identified fundamental problems with the way Europe's gas and electricity sectors work that could best be tackled by "ownership unbundling" that would force large integrated energy companies such as Germany's E.On to focus on either power generation or supply, selling off other units.

DOJ_NMG_0101130

"If we are not solving that one, one way or another, we are running away from our responsibility," Kroes said in Brussels.

Regulators are scheduled to publish their recommendations on Jan. 10.

Kroes said there are major problems connecting energy from one European country to another, mainly caused by the "slow pace of investment in infrastructure under the current vertically integrated regime."

These problems caused blackouts in Europe last month and a natural gas price spike in Britain last winter. Tackling supply bottlenecks would help prevent these issues by allowing suppliers to send power quickly to where it is needed.

But regulators, citing an Italian antitrust ruling against Eni, say that big companies that own infrastructure see no incentive to upgrade pipelines and create more supply when that could bring down prices and give an advantage to rivals in the retail business.

"Chinese walls" forcing a degree of separation between companies in the same group are not working, they said.

Europe's worries over its future energy supplies means it must act, Kroes said.

"We need an expansion of European transmission networks, because more capacity should give Europe more security of supply and more competition," she said. "Where there is vertical integration ... it often seems that investment in new infrastructure is low on the list of priorities for the group as a whole.

"Europe's energy consumers are paying a high price for this lack of initiative," she said.

The European Commission said in February that antitrust problems in the energy sector kept prices too high and let former state-owned energy monopolies keep control of the market.

Blowing The Whistle On Big Oil (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

DURING a 22-year career, Bobby L. Maxwell routinely won accolades and awards as one of the Interior Department's best auditors in the nation's oil patch, snaring promotions that eventually had him supervising a staff of 120 people.

He and his team scrutinized the books of major oil producers that collectively pumped billions of dollars worth of oil and gas every year from land and coastal waters owned by the public. Along the way, the auditors recovered hundreds of millions of dollars from companies that shortchanged the government on royalties.

"Mr. Maxwell's career has been characterized by exceptional performance and significant contributions," wrote Gale A. Norton, then the secretary of the interior, in a 2003 citation. Ms. Norton praised Mr. Maxwell's "perseverance and leadership" while cataloguing his "many outstanding achievements."

Less than two years later, the Interior Department eliminated his job in what it called a "reorganization." That came exactly one week after a federal judge in Denver unsealed a lawsuit in which Mr. Maxwell contended that a major oil company had spent years cheating on royalty payments.

"When I got this citation, they told me this would be very good for my career," said Mr. Maxwell, smiling during an interview here. "Next thing I knew, they fired me." Today, at 53, Mr. Maxwell lives on a $44,000 annual pension in a two-bedroom bungalow in the hills outside the Hawaiian capital.

But Mr. Maxwell has hardly disappeared. Instead, he is at the center of an escalating battle with both the oil industry and the Bush administration over how the federal government oversees about $60 billion worth of oil and gas produced every year on federal property. In the process, he has become one of the most nettlesome whistle-blowers Big Oil has ever encountered, a face-off that offers an inside look at how the industry and the government do business together.

Invoking a law that rewards private citizens who expose fraud against the government, Mr. Maxwell has filed a suit in federal court in Denver against the Kerr-McGee Corporation. The suit accuses the company, which was recently acquired by Anadarko Petroleum, of bilking the government out of royalty payments. It also contends that the Interior Department ignored audits indicating that Kerr-McGee was cheating. Three other federal auditors, who once worked for Mr. Maxwell and still work at the Interior Department, have since filed similar suits of their own against other energy companies.

Several of the nation's biggest oil producers, including Exxon Mobil, Chevron, Shell and ConocoPhillips, failed in an effort to block Mr. Maxwell's suit, arguing before an appellate judge that his case would "open the floodgates" to suits by other federal auditors. But the court rejected their pleas, and a trial is set to start on Jan. 16.

Mr. Maxwell's self-interest is as much in play in the suit as is the public interest. If he wins, Kerr-McGee could be forced to pay more than $50 million in unpaid royalties and penalties, Mr. Maxwell said. Mr. Maxwell and his lawyers could be entitled to keep as much as 30 percent of any funds the government recovers — enough to make him a wealthy man.

Anadarko says that the government's rules were followed and that it owes no money because the Interior Department never asked it to pay more. But it is now trying to negotiate a settlement before the trial begins.

"We believe the case is without merit," said John Christiansen, an Anadarko spokesman. "However, as is a fairly common practice, both sides have agreed to meet with a mediator prior to trial."

THE actions of Mr. Maxwell and the other auditors have coincided with broader investigations by Congress and the Interior Department's own inspector general into whether the agency properly collects the money for oil and gas pumped from public land. Investigators say they have found evidence of myriad problems at the department: cronyism and cover-ups of management blunders; capitulation to oil companies in disputes about payments; plunging morale among auditors; and unreliable data-gathering that often makes it impossible to determine how much money companies actually owe.

In February, the Interior Department admitted that energy companies might escape more than $7 billion in royalty payments over the next five years because of errors in leases signed in the 1990s that officials are now scrambling to renegotiate. The errors were discovered in 2000, but were ignored for the next six years and have yet to be fixed.

Congressional investigators are worried about other problems, as well. The Interior Department's inspector general told a House subcommittee in September that senior officials at the agency had repeatedly glossed over ethical lapses and bungling. "Short of crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior," declared Earl E. Devaney, the inspector general.

The Interior Department, which has described Mr. Maxwell as a renegade former employee motivated by the riches his lawsuit might bring, said its auditing efforts received a clean bill of health from an outside accounting firm in 2005. "The results are clear and irrefutable," the agency said in a statement, adding that it was "accomplishing its job on behalf of the American public."

But Republican leaders on the House Government Reform Committee, which has been reviewing the flawed leases, recently accused Interior officials of perpetuating a "culture of irresponsibility and lack of accountability" at the agency.

The committee ordered the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, to begin a broad examination of issues ranging from the agency's rules and enforcement practices to the accuracy of its most rudimentary data.

The Interior Department "clearly doesn't view their responsibility as maximizing revenue to the American people for resources that belong to the American people," said Representative Darrell E. Issa, a California Republican who oversaw hearings on the flawed leases. "We don't have a system that accurately tells us how much oil is being taken out of the ground."

No one, says Mr. Maxwell, knows that better than he does.

BORN "Bobby," not "Robert," Mr. Maxwell is bald, burly and speaks with a back-country drawl that is occasionally punctuated by a cackling laugh. He said he thrived in the world of wells, pipelines and offshore rigs and meshed comfortably with the oil cultures of Texas and Oklahoma. Genial and unflappable, he describes his politics as "very conservative" and cringes at being labeled a rebel.

"I like the oil and gas industry," he said, as he reminisced about his years as a federal auditor. "We are neither for nor against the profits they make. Our job is to make sure the American public gets a fair return on its assets."

Mr. Maxwell grew up in a poor family in rural Tennessee. After serving in the Army in Hawaii, he earned a bachelor's degree in business at Chaminade University here. He later became a certified public accountant and earned a master's degree in business from Texas A&M. In 1983, after stints as an auditor with the Air Force and the Department of Energy, he joined the Minerals Management Service of the Interior Department.

The M.M.S. is responsible for collecting and overseeing the royalties for all the oil, gas, timber and coal that is produced on federal property. Last year, companies paid nearly $10 billion in royalties on oil and gas alone.

"I loved going to the oil companies," Mr. Maxwell recalled, saying he spent about half of his time on the road — some of it at offshore drilling rigs. "Sometimes, there would be nothing more than a room and a helicopter pad to land on. But it was an education, and it was highly practical."

Despite Mr. Maxwell's placid demeanor, friends and former colleagues say he was a dogged auditor who sometimes rankled his own bosses. In 1988, he visited a coal mine on federal land in Montana even though, he says, his supervisors scoffed at the trip because they thought that the mine was too small to scrutinize. When Mr. Maxwell arrived, he found that the mine only looked small because it had been underpaying royalties for years. Within months, the company agreed to pay $43 million in back royalties, and it eventually paid more than $100 million.

In 1993, during the Clinton administration, officials in Washington told him to drop a complex dispute with ARCO because they thought his reasoning was dubious. But just as he was about to back down, ARCO executives volunteered to pay $20 million.

The Interior Department gave Mr. Maxwell an award that year, noting that he had "vehemently pressed his position" even though "support seemed lacking." It attributed his success to both his "measured combatant style" and his personal rapport with ARCO executives.

"If he thought there was a case, he had a reason," said Barbara Rothway, a retired Interior Department auditor. But, she added, "I could see how he might sometimes bother the people he worked for."

Patient and stubborn, Mr. Maxwell spent years poring over the accounts of the Jicarilla Apache Tribe in New Mexico, which had long complained that companies were underpaying them for natural gas extracted on their tribal lands. Tribal officials said Interior Department officials had paid little heed until Mr. Maxwell came along. He collected and organized data going back 30 years and found pervasive errors by both oil companies and the government. The tribe eventually recovered more than $20 million in back royalties.

"Anyone knowledgeable about the way Interior processes payments knows there are all sorts of ways for companies to underpay," said Alan R. Taradash, a lawyer in Albuquerque who has represented the tribe for years. "Bobby was one of the few who stood up with us and demanded that the auditing be done properly."

MR. MAXWELL says his first serious doubts about the Interior Department originated in 1998, when the agency reluctantly began to investigate accusations of systematic cheating on royalties for oil.

Several of the nation's biggest oil companies eventually settled that investigation by paying nearly $440 million. The investigation occurred only after outside whistle-blowers argued for years that the government was losing billions.

The cases had been sparked in part by a former oil trader at ARCO named J. Benjamin Johnson Jr., known as Benji, who contended that oil companies had used elaborate swapping schemes to cheat on royalties owed to private and state landowners, as well as the federal government.

Mr. Johnson and another former ARCO trader quit their jobs and became expert witnesses for landowners and state governments who wanted to sue oil companies for back payments. The two traders soon realized that the biggest case by far belonged to the federal government. But no federal officials were interested.

"It was unbelievably difficult," Mr. Johnson recalled in a recent interview. "They brought me to Denver, to the M.M.S. office, in a room with about 30 auditors and managers from the solicitor's office. Their reaction was that I was crazy, that it was impossible, that there was no way they could have actually missed this."

But Mr. Johnson found a way to recover the federal royalties on his own. In 1995, he filed suit under the False Claims Act, a longstanding law intended to encourage whistle-blowers. Under the act, best known for its use against overbilling by military contractors, a private citizen can sue a company, contending that it defrauded the federal government. Companies found guilty have to pay as much as three times the amount of their fraudulent gains, and any person who files a suit is entitled to keep up to 30 percent of the money recovered.

The Justice Department initially refused to join Mr. Johnson's suit, but it eventually did so, in 1998 after concluding that he and other whistle-blowers — including a nonprofit group called the Project on Government Oversight — were on to something. That was when Mr. Maxwell became involved. Working for the Interior Department, he collected data on a number of oil companies, pooling his material with that of Mr. Johnson.

"Bobby was with us," Mr. Johnson recalled. "He was a straight-shooter, and he saw it." Mobil was the first to settle and paid more than $40 million in 1998. Chevron paid $95 million. Shell paid $110 million. By 2002, 15 oil companies had paid a total of almost $440 million.

The Johnson lawsuit taught Mr. Maxwell three lessons. One was that Mr. Johnson became a wealthy man. (The oil trader and his lawyers received more than $30 million, while two other groups of whistle-blowers received more than $40 million.) The second was that top Interior officials had been obstinately blind to the oil industry's practices. The third was about the power of the False Claims Act. Until Mr. Johnson came along, no one had used it to go after royalty underpayments.

Created in 1849 to manage the nation's publicly owned natural resources, from national forests to parks and waterways, the Interior Department oversees timber, grazing, mining and oil drilling operations over many tens of millions of acres. And while the agency has often tried to increase drilling and mining under Democrats and Republicans alike, current and former officials say the Bush administration elevated that goal above almost all of the department's other mandates.

Mr. Maxwell says his frustrations with the Interior Department escalated after the Bush administration took office in 2001. The Interior Department's top priorities became increasing domestic oil and gas production, offering more incentives to drillers in the Gulf of Mexico and pushing to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and other wilderness areas to drilling. The department trimmed spending on enforcement and cut back on auditors, and sped up approvals for drilling applications.

The agency's senior ranks also became more heavily populated with officials friendly to the energy industry. For example, its new deputy secretary, J. Steven Griles, worked as an oil industry lobbyist before joining the department, and Chevron and Shell had paid him as an expert witness on their behalf in the Benji Johnson case. Mr. Griles declined to comment.Auditors, according to Mr. Maxwell and many others, were told to devote less energy to time-consuming audits and rely more on a computerized monitoring system called "compliance review." Auditors complained that the new system was superficial and riddled with technical problems. Even when the new system flagged potential underpayments, Mr. Maxwell said, it often failed to supply conclusive information.

"We were getting shut down on all kinds of cases," he said. "We started to wish that someone would come along and file a False Claims suit, so we could jump onboard."

Auditing and compliance review had generated an average of about $176 million annually in the 1990s, with an extraordinary peak of $331 million in 2000, according to data from the Congressional Budget Office and the Interior Department. But from 2001 through 2005, a period when energy prices soared to new highs, enforcement revenue averaged about $46 million a year.

In 2004, the Interior Department's inspector general issued a blistering report about the auditing system, saying that many auditors were unqualified, that essential documents were being lost and that the internal review process was "ineffective."

BY 2002, Mr. Maxwell was fed up. He and a team of auditors had worked for months to dissect a complicated marketing deal by Kerr-McGee that they believed was cheating the government. He concluded that Kerr-McGee was selling all its oil at below-market prices to another company that compensated Kerr-McGee by assuming many of its marketing and administrative costs.

Simply put, Kerr-McGee seemed to be getting paid in both cash and services, but it was calculating its royalties only on the cash it received. Mr. Maxwell calculated that the company had underpaid the government by as much as $12 million between 1997 and 2002. State auditors in Louisiana had been investigating exactly the same issue in 2001, and ordered Kerr-McGee to pay an extra $2 million in royalties on oil from state lands.

According to Mr. Maxwell and Interior Department officials, when Mr. Maxwell presented his findings to his superiors, agency lawyers told him to drop the case. When he continued to argue, he recounts in his lawsuit, the agency's chief of enforcement warned him that the director of the M.M.S., Johnnie M. Burton, would be "very upset" if he persisted.

"The word came down from the top, not to issue this order," Mr. Maxwell said in an interview, speaking about the Interior Department. "There have always been people who don't want to pursue things. But now it's grown into a major illness. It's dysfunctional."

In a written response to questions from The New York Times, the Minerals Management Service said it was "rare" to overrule an auditor but that Mr. Maxwell's contentions involved a "questionable application of M.M.S. regulations."

DOJ_NMG_0101134

The matter might have ended there, except that Mr. Maxwell decided to retire in June 2003. As soon as he left the agency, he began researching the possibility of emulating Benji Johnson and filing his own suit under the False Claims Act. As it happened, Mr. Maxwell's "retirement" was brief. In October, the Interior Department rehired him to fill a management gap in its Denver office, and it put him in charge of a 120-person auditing team monitoring the Gulf of Mexico.

Despite rejoining the government, Mr. Maxwell filed his suit against Kerr-McGee in June 2004. The case was unsealed on Jan. 20, 2005; a week later, Mr. Maxwell lost his job.

Arriving at his office shortly before 8 a.m. on Jan. 27, Mr. Maxwell said he was summoned to a meeting with a senior M.M.S. official, who had flown in from Washington. The official handed him a memo, explaining that his job responsibilities were being moved to Houston and that his position would be eliminated.

To this day, Interior officials say they never fired Mr. Maxwell. They say, according to court papers, that he was merely a "re-employed annuitant" who was no longer needed. "The position disappeared," said Ms. Burton, the M.M.S. director, in a meeting with energy reporters in September.

Mr. Maxwell protested. He said he would have relocated or taken a different job. He added that he was a certified public accountant and had a master's degree in business administration; his successor lacked those degrees. But the fight did not last long. When Interior officials offered Mr. Maxwell a confidential financial settlement to leave without a fight, he took the deal and moved to Hawaii.

And he continued to press his case against Kerr-McGee. The company tried and failed to have the suit dismissed, arguing that a federal auditor should not be allowed to take information from work and file a lawsuit under the False Claims Act. In October, eight major oil companies including Chevron and Exxon Mobil weighed in on Kerr-McGee's side.

"Government employees who uncover suspected fraud in the course of carrying out their jobs will receive a tacit invitation" to sue as private citizens, the companies argued in their brief. After the appellate court rejected the industry's plea, Mr. Maxwell's trial was rescheduled for January. Settlement talks are scheduled to begin in Denver this week.

Interior officials contend that Mr. Maxwell and other auditors have a conflict of interest when they stand to gain personally from their enforcement work. "These people could be entitled to collect 30 percent of the money that is owed to the government, for work they were already being paid to do," Ms. Burton told reporters in September.

If Mr. Maxwell had not acted, of course, the government would have had no chance of recovering any money at all. James W. Moorman, president of Taxpayers Against Fraud, a nonprofit organization that specializes in the False Claims Act, acknowledged that it was less than ideal for federal investigators to have a financial stake in rebelling against their bosses. But he said the alternatives might be worse.

"You're talking about a situation where there seems to be complete breakdown in the system," Mr. Moorman said. "If they've got evidence of fraud, why shouldn't a court hear it?"

STANDING in his garage recently, Mr. Maxwell pointed to six big cartons stacked along the wall. They contained 60,000 pages of documents that Kerr-McGee and the Interior Department had provided as part of the discovery process in his lawsuit. Mr. Maxwell, true to form, has gone through every page, and distilled his case into seven modestly sized binders he keeps in his living room. He says he is ready for trial, and even for the possibility of losing.

If he does lose, his lawyers will not charge for their work but he will have to pay about $125,000 to expert witnesses he has hired. "I can manage it," he said. He has saved money all his life, he said, and can live on his savings and his pension.

"He's thought about all the options, and none of them seem life-threatening to him," said his daughter, Angela Maxwell Horn. "What can they do him? They've already fired him."

States Hope To Skirt Forest Protections (LAT)

By Bettina Boxall

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

The future of some of the West's most unspoiled national forestlands remains in flux more than two months after a federal judge reinstated protections on nearly 50 million acres of backcountry.

Nowhere is that uncertainty more in evidence than in Idaho, which has the largest and wildest assemblage of roadless national forest in the Lower 48 states.

In October, shortly after a district court in California restored President Clinton's ban on most road-building and logging in the backcountry, Idaho petitioned the federal government to loosen the restrictions on its 9.3 million roadless acres.

Then, at a hearing in Washington last week, Idaho Gov. James E. Risch put a much greener spin on his state's intentions, saying he wanted to honor the Clinton prohibitions.

The testimony by Risch, a Republican, not only raised questions, but underscored the degree to which the roadless forest issue remains in play.

Clinton's 2001 road ban placed about a third of the country's national forestlands off-limits to most natural resource development, a move that was immediately divisive.

Environmentalists hailed the protections for guarding what they call "the last best places" — strongholds for wildlife and clean water. But the limits infuriated officials in many conservative Western states with strong timber and mining lobbies.

Lawsuits were filed. The Clinton rule was put on hold by a Wyoming federal court. Then last year the Bush administration dropped the Clinton ban in favor of new regulations giving states an unprecedented role in deciding whether to open their roadless U.S. forestlands to development.

The Bush rule was overturned in September. But that did not put an end to state involvement. States can still use the long-standing Administrative Procedures Act to ask the federal government to alter the Clinton restrictions. Idaho and Colorado have filed petitions, and Utah plans to.

"Our general concern for the overall process is that at the end of the day, we'll have something that praises the value of roadless areas but doesn't do a lot to actually limit the destructive activities that could take place," said Mat Jacobson, deputy director of the Heritage Forests Campaign.

The Idaho petition, for instance, would allow timber-cutting and road-building in the bulk of the state's roadless acreage to maintain "forest health."

Though Risch said roads would be temporary and only dead or dying trees would be cut, the petition language appears much more permissive.

"We have to reconcile the two," acknowledged Dale Harris, co-chairman of the Roadless Area Conservation National Advisory Committee, before which Risch appeared. "We have to take the governor at his word, and we were encouraged by what he said. It made our job easier," Harris said. But the petition is "a work in progress."

The roadless forest committee will forward its recommendations to the U.S. secretary of Agriculture, who will have the final say in whether to grant the states' requests.

Colorado's petition, affecting 4.4 million acres, would drop coal-mining lands and ski areas from the road ban and allow timber-cutting to reduce the wildfire threat around communities.

Utah has indicated it will ask the federal government to jettison the Clinton restrictions on all 4 million acres.

If the petitions are granted, it will take one to two years for them to take effect through the federal rule-making process.

In the meantime, Wyoming is seeking to reopen its lawsuit against the Clinton regulations. And the September ruling could be appealed.

More Farmers Seek Subsidies As U.S. Eats Imported Produce (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

FRESNO COUNTY, Calif. — For decades, the fiercely independent fruit and vegetable growers of California, Florida and other states have been the only farmers in America who shunned federal subsidies, delivering produce to the tables of millions of Americans on their own.

DOJ_NMG_0101136

But now, in the face of tough new competition primarily from China, even these proud groups are buckling. Produce farmers, their hands newly outstretched, have joined forces for the first time, forming a lobby group intended to pressure politicians over the farm bill to be debated in Congress in January.

Nobody disputes that competitive pressures from abroad are squeezing fruit and vegetable growers, whose garlic, broccoli, lettuce, strawberries and other products are a mainstay of world kitchens. But the issue of whether the United States ought to broaden farm subsidies beyond the commodity crops like corn and cotton, which have historically been protected, is a big flashpoint.

"This is like the tectonic plates of farm policy shifting, because you have a completely new player coming in and demanding money," said Kenneth A. Cook, president of Environmental Working Group, a research group in Washington that has been critical of farm subsidies, which are mandated by federal laws that date to the Great Depression.

Although some farmers may be suffering, American consumers have been big beneficiaries of cheap food imports. On the United States wholesale market, for example, Chinese garlic costs almost half the price of garlic that is grown domestically.

Existing American farm subsidy policies have been the subject of violent protests outside some World Trade Organization meetings, with detractors calling them an antique way of subsidizing United States farmers at the expense of poorer ones. American fruit and vegetable growers, with their much smaller farms, have never been part of this debate, in part because their crops yielded higher returns, did not need much support, and were never organized around a single policy goal.

But times have changed.

Here in the fertile San Joaquin Valley, Mike Mantelli has seen firsthand the substantial changes forced by the rising tide of Chinese garlic into the United States. As the general manager of the largest American garlic company, Christopher Ranch, he remembers when there were 1,200 acres of garlic planted on a 6,000-acre farm here a decade ago.

Today the company plants less than 300 acres because of lower demand for California garlic, he said.

"The Chinese garlic totally caught us off-guard and knocked us down," Mr. Mantelli said recently as he checked on newly planted garlic bulbs. "I think our industry has hit rock bottom. Maybe now we can figure out how to make it a level playing field."

So Mr. Mantelli has joined the coalition of about 75 growers of specialty crops who have united to grab a much bigger slice of the federal subsidy pie.

The group, representing growers of everything from broccoli to strawberries to nuts and flowers and wine, submitted a bill in September asking for what most likely would amount to more than $1 billion for programs they say could help their crops compete better in a tougher global marketplace.

The farmers are not asking for the kind of direct subsidies that have been accused of distorting trade and hurting developing countries' agricultural industries. Hoping to avoid a nasty battle with powerful farm-state politicians in the Midwest and Southeast, they are asking instead for money to help market their products at home and overseas, as well as for research and conservation.

But whatever money the fruit and vegetable farmers might get would probably have to come out of the allocation that already goes to other sorts of farmers. As things stand, the federal farm subsidy program supplies more than $15 billion a year, primarily to growers of five crops: corn, cotton, rice, wheat and soybeans. Those crops are considered interchangeable commodities and are traded on world markets, unlike fruits and vegetables, which are called specialty crops because their taste and quality are viewed as being highly variable.

While some vegetable and fruit groups have previously requested more funds, they have never before mounted a united challenge. "This is the first time these groups have weighed in with a sense of organization and commitment," said Clayton Yeutter, a former agriculture secretary and United States trade representative.

The current agriculture secretary, Mike Johanns, looks favorably on the produce growers' bill. The legislation also has the advantage that the farmers come from states with sizable representation in Congress.

Still, the proposal is likely to face a tough road. There are many other federal budget priorities, and farm experts say there will probably be less money allocated to the farm bill next year than in 2002, when there was a huge increase.

Further, while commodity growers are making courteous noises about the fruit and vegetable farmers' requests, they have historically enjoyed a near monopoly on federal subsidies.

But fruit and vegetable farmers have been gaining influence. The group's combined cash receipts of $52.2 billion rival or exceed those of the five major commodity crops, which are expected to generate $52 billion this year.

The produce farmers can also point to the competitive situation. California growers once dominated the garlic industry in the United States, but imports from China and Hong Kong have increased from less than 1 million pounds in 2000 to 112 million pounds last year. This year, for the first time, more Chinese garlic will be sold in the United States than California produces, Commerce Department figures show.

China's farmers, who are broadly subsidized, have the advantage in that their nation's currency, the yuan, is tightly regulated to maximize trade opportunities. And the country has a glut of workers for the labor-intensive jobs of growing and harvesting fruits and vegetables.

"Of course consumers are benefiting now," said Peter Morici, an economist at the University of Maryland business school and a former chief economist at the United States International Trade Commission. "But competition should not be based on subsidies."

Other specialty crop groups are also struggling with foreign competition, in particular from China, which has geared its agriculture industry towards labor-intensive, higher-value fruits and vegetables. China has begun to dominate everything from apples to onions. Chinese exports have also eaten into American growers' share of markets in Japan and Hong Kong for items like broccoli and lettuce.

Fruit and vegetable growers have the political advantage of being in states like California, Florida and Arizona, which are likely to be critical in the 2008 presidential election. But it is unclear how important the farm vote will be to the Democrats in the next election.

Under the proposed bill, an overseas marketing program would rise 75 percent, to $350 million a year. An existing specialty crop block-grant program would leap tenfold to $500 million a year. And the government would buy at least $400 million worth of fruits and vegetables annually for school lunch programs.

While the total cost of the proposed bill has yet to be tallied, it will probably reach a few billion dollars, coalition officials said. Whether the fruit and vegetable farmers can win that much will depend in large part on just how much money Congress allocates to farm spending next year.

If the farmers get what they want, consumers could benefit from more information and choice at the grocery store, said Professor Morici of the University of Maryland. At the same time, American growers could become more efficient and competitive.

"Things that help farmers band together and compete are not inherently protectionist or harmful," Professor Morici said. "It is not an unreasonable thing for a fragmented industry to ask the government for assistance to make the virtues of their industry better known."

He added, "Whatever money they put for research would benefit the consumer. That would run down their price, and eventually that information would get around the world."

Mr. Johanns, the agriculture secretary, said in a speech last month that American farm policy needed to be "equitable, predictable and beyond challenge." Noting the fruit and vegetable farmers' proposal, he said that farm programs could no longer be decided among a few commodities in a few parts of the country. "That day has changed," Mr. Johanns said.

The vegetable and fruit growers stood by silently for decades in large part because they did not need government assistance to be successful. While generating close to half of farm receipts, the specialty crops are grown on just 11 million acres of farmland, versus 215 million for the major commodity crops.

In California, new financing could not come soon enough for garlic farms like the Christopher Ranch. The Christophers, fourth-generation farmers in the state, have struggled to hold their market share, and it is not hard to see why: On the wholesale market, Chinese garlic recently cost $15 to $16 for a 30-pound box, compared with $28 for a box of California garlic.

In the late 1990s the Christopher Ranch's garlic production peaked at about 100 million pounds. Since then sales and acreage have fallen by more than 40 percent. In 2001 China began flooding the market with garlic, after managing to find ways around an import tariff of 377 percent.

As the demand for their garlic has fallen, the Christophers have turned to growing crops like pearl onions and shallots. The family hired a trade lawyer in Washington to try to battle tariff violations. Now they hope that the proposed crop bill will give them a chance to educate consumers and pay for more research into crop diseases.

"We don't want handouts," Mr. Mantelli said. "You don't want to just give people subsidies, because nobody learns from subsidies. But you want to give them opportunities and resources and tools to make their industry better."

Grand Old Protectionists (WP)

By Daniel Gross

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Since the midterm elections, concerned internationalists have fretted that the incoming Democratic Congress will curtail the nation's free-trade policies. In Slate, Jacob Weisberg identified the new breed of protectionist Lou Dobbs Democrats. "So is America headed for a bout of protectionist class warfare?" worried the Economist. "With the Democrats having won a majority in Congress, and disquiet over globalization growing, a party faction that has been powerless -- the economic populists -- is emerging," Louis Uchitelle wrote in the New York Times. Washington Post columnist Sebastian Mallaby, reflecting the consensus, concluded that "the two parties have opposing attitudes on the subject of trade: Republicans see it as a source of growth, Democrats as a source of inequality."

However, these arguments misunderstand the new politics of trade. It's not a left-right split. Since 2000, Bush Republicans have done as much as Democrats, if not more, to erect trade barriers and tariffs. President Bush has talked a good game about free trade, and his administration has negotiated bilateral free trade agreements with Australia, Colombia, Morocco and several other countries. But just as free trade was a bipartisan project in the 1990s, this decade's anti-trade backlash has been bipartisan as well. Sens. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) and Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) share little in common besides a desire to slap huge protective tariffs on Chinese goods. And all by themselves, Republicans have done great damage to the cause of free trade in the past several years.

In March 2002, for example, Bush proudly signed "temporary safeguards" that imposed tariffs of 8 percent to 30 percent on most steel imports for three years. This was a classic Karl Rove option play: Advance the Republican cause in formerly Democratic strongholds of Ohio, Pennsylvania and West Virginia at the expense of the companies and workers in industries nationwide that consume steel. When the World Trade Organization ruled the tariffs illegal, and retaliatory tariffs were set to be imposed on goods produced in Florida and other politically sensitive states, Bush ended the so-called safeguards in December 2003.

In May 2002, Bush signed the Farm Security and Rural Investment Act, which Republicans passed without much help from Democrats. Just six years after President Bill Clinton signed the 1996 Farm Bill, which slashed agricultural subsidies, Bush jacked up federal payments by as much as 80 percent for cash crops such as soybeans and corn and offered new subsidies for crops such as peanuts and lentils. He even revived the subsidies on honey, wool and mohair that Clinton had killed. Bush's signing of this bill led the Economist to brand him just about the worst thing the magazine can call anybody: an anti-globalizer.

The bill inspired threats of retaliation from aggrieved trading partners and contributed to a perception that Washington wasn't serious about making the tough decisions required to further free trade. In fact, some analysts have blamed the failure of the Doha Round of global trade talks this year on the U.S. refusal to alter its expensive anti-consumer, anti-free trade farm policy.

There's more. Earlier this year, Bush proposed dropping the absurd 54 cent-per-gallon tariff on imported ethanol, first enacted in 1980 (although he didn't recommend cutting the 51 cent-per gallon tax credit for domestic ethanol producers). The Republican Congress, filled with members from big corn-producing states, said no.

Even as lame ducks, Republicans in Congress haven't been unanimous voices for free trade. In mid-November, more than 60 Republicans voted against a proposed free-trade deal with Vietnam, supplying the margin of defeat and embarrassing the president on the eve of a state visit. The Wall Street Journal noted that a vote had been delayed in part because Graham and fellow GOP Sen. Elizabeth Dole (N.C.) had put the bill on hold, pending measures protecting U.S. textile companies.

With the GOP base now shrunk to the Old Confederacy (sugar, cotton, peanuts) and the Great Plains (corn, wheat, soy), look for more of the same protectionism. Senate Minority Whip-elect Trent Lott (Miss.) doesn't like free trade in agricultural products any more than he likes affirmative action.

There's one other critical Republican failure when it comes to free trade. Encouraging the spread of trade means more than receiving cheap goods from China. It's about creating the social and political conditions favorable to the continued expansion of trade. Free trade has exposed U.S. workers to global competition on an unprecedented scale. In recent years, wages have stagnated (despite massive increases in corporate profits and steady economic growth), jobs have become more insecure, and benefits such as pensions and health care are being wiped out. Is free trade the cause of all these woes? Not necessarily. Does free trade coincide with all these woes? Absolutely.

Rightly or wrongly, many Americans, even those who reap the gains of trade daily, identify free trade and globalization with their declining financial security. And the response of Bush and congressional Republicans has essentially been: tough. Companies facing ferocious overseas competition won't provide health care benefits anymore? Open a health savings account. Companies won't provide pensions? Privatize Social Security and cut benefits.

This you're-on-your-own attitude has ultimately been more damaging to the cause of free trade than anything the Democrats could do. Yet, in coming months, we're sure to hear a great deal of talk tarring Sen. Harry M. Reid (Nev.) and Rep. Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) as the present-day incarnations of Sen. Reed Smoot and Rep. Willis C. Hawley, the sponsors of the disastrous Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930. By slapping massive tariffs on a vast range of imported goods, Smoot-Hawley helped turn a recession into the Great Depression.

But Smoot and Hawley were Republicans. And so was President Herbert Hoover, who signed that disastrous legislation into law. Today, the protectionist gene may no longer be dominant among Republicans, but it's still an important part of the GOP's DNA.

Death Toll Rises As Winter Storm Sweeps Across The Northeast (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

CHICAGO, Dec. 2 (AP) — The death toll from the Midwest's first big snowstorm of the season rose to 11 as the system blew through the Northeast late Friday and early Saturday.

Two women were killed in Pennsylvania, one by a falling tree and another by a 30-foot-wide section of roof carried by the wind, state and local officials said.

In Ellenville, N.Y., about 100 miles north of New York City, another falling tree landed on a house and killed one person, the authorities said.

Winds of more than 50 miles per hour were recorded in parts of western Pennsylvania, and they hit 67 m.p.h. in western New York, according to the National Weather Service.

At Mr. Z's Food Mart in Mountain Top, Pa., about a half-dozen people suffered minor injuries when windows were blown out and ceiling tiles ripped down, fire officials said.

"The windows were shaking, and they just exploded," said Breanne Ralston, 17, a cashier at the store. "Everybody was screaming."

Earlier, the shoveling of heavy snow was linked to the deaths of two people in Wisconsin. In Affton, Mo., a suburb of St. Louis, an 87-year-old woman died Friday in a house fire that started after an ice-laden tree limb fell on a power line, fire officials said.

Near Paducah, Tex., a vehicle carrying a high school girls' basketball team overturned on an icy highway, killing a 14-year-old player and injuring seven others. Also on the highways, two storm-related deaths were reported Thursday in Missouri, one on Wednesday in Kansas, and one on Thursday in Oklahoma.

Many areas of Illinois, Wisconsin and Missouri got more than a foot of snow, including Racine, Wis., which saw 14.5 inches. As far south as Tulsa, Okla., accumulations measured more than 10 inches. Schools and businesses across the region were closed, and hundreds of airline passengers were stranded.

The combination of sleet, rain and snow made travel treacherous. The police in Oklahoma urged people not to drive Friday night and early Saturday because snow had melted and was refreezing overnight.

Crews Work To Restore Power After Storm (AP)

AP, December 2, 2006

CHICAGO (AP) — Utility crews worked overtime Saturday to restore electrical service to thousands of customers still blacked out by the Midwest's first big snowstorm of the season.

As temperatures plummeted below freezing in the storm's aftermath, officials said some people could be without power for days. Missouri National Guard teams went door-to-door in the St. Louis area to make sure residents were surviving the cold.

The storm was blamed for at least 13 deaths as it spread ice and deep snow from Texas to Michigan and then blew through the Northeast late Friday and early Saturday. Schools and businesses were shuttered and hundreds of airline passengers had been stranded by canceled flights.

Trees were blown onto homes and cars, and a big Christmas tree in front of the New Hampshire Statehouse was toppled.

Truck driver David Huwe just got his 18-wheeler and load of frozen food back on the road Saturday after being stuck for more than 12 hours at a rest stop near Princeton, Ill., on Interstate 80, which was blocked by scores of trucks and cars that slid off the icy highway.

"I was supposed to be (in California) Sunday night," Huwe said by cellphone Saturday morning. He had revised his arrival time and hoped he'd make it by Monday.

Red Cross volunteers at Decatur had helped out some of those stranded I-80 travelers by ordering 100 McDonald's hamburgers, which were then airlifted by the National Guard.

"We had 35 minutes from the time we got the call to the airlift," Deb Helm said. McDonald's "was what was available."

Many areas of Illinois, Wisconsin and Missouri got more than a foot of snow, including 16 inches in parts of central Missouri and 17 at Manistee, Mich. Fifteen inches fell as far south as Bartlesville, Okla.

Airlines were recovering from the widespread cancellations caused by the storm; delays at Lambert Airport in St. Louis were generally 15 minutes or less Saturday, according to the Federal Aviation Administration. There were no measurable delays Saturday at Chicago's two major airports, said Wendy Abrams, a spokeswoman for the Chicago Department of Aviation.

Highways were mostly clear but still had icy spots. "Nobody really should travel unless you absolutely have to get out," Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt said.

Chicago sent out about 170 snow-removal trucks Saturday morning to clear the city's side streets, after clearing main roads Friday.

About 427,000 Ameren Corp. customers were without power in Missouri and Illinois on Saturday afternoon, along with about 150 customers of ComEd in the greater Chicago area.

"It could be days before it's fully restored because it's really treacherous out there," Ameren spokeswoman Susan Gallagher said.

Blunt dispatched 150 Missouri National Guardsmen to the St. Louis region, along with 30 Humvees and a number of trucks. "We want to make sure our citizens are safe, warm and well cared-for," said Ed Martin, the governor's chief of staff.

As the storm moved east, gusty wind blacked out more customers from Tennessee to New York. About 12,000 homes and businesses were still without power Saturday across upstate New York. About 1,500 waited for power in Michigan. In Pennsylvania, more than 19,000 homes, mostly in the western part of the state, had no electricity, state Emergency Management Agency spokesman Justin Fleming said.

Two tornadoes were reported in Pennsylvania, with one blowing out the windows of Mr. Z's Food Mart in Mountain Top. About a half-dozen people suffered minor injuries, fire officials said.

"The windows were shaking and they just exploded. Everybody was screaming," said Food Mart cashier Breanne Ralston, 17.

Two women were killed in Pennsylvania, one by a falling tree and another by a wind-blown section of roof, and another falling tree landed on a house and killed one person in New York, authorities said. Two men over the age of 60 died after shoveling snow in Wisconsin, and an 87-year-old woman died in the St. Louis areas in a house fire that started when an ice-laden tree limb fell on a power line, fire officials said.

Storm-related traffic deaths included two in Missouri, one in Kansas and one in Oklahoma. Near Paducah, Texas, a vehicle carrying high school girls' basketball players overturned on an icy highway, killing a 14-year-old player and injuring seven other people.

In Illinois, a woman died after being struck by a snow plow that was backing up, and a 67-year-old man collapsed died of complications from heart disease after trimming tree limbs with a hand saw.

A Dream Blown Away (WP)

By Joel Garreau

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

A place near the water has been an American dream for a very long time. Fifty-four percent of Americans live within 50 miles of a coast.

This is the year, however, in which the big boys in global finance got religion about climate change. As a result, this American dream -- as far north as the Washington area, and even New York and New England -- is under attack.

Follow the money. Insurance doesn't sound like a world-changer. It seems so banal and prosaic, like reliable electricity or clean water.

Yet without it -- you want a place to live? You cannot get a mortgage without insurance.

You want a job? A commercial enterprise cannot run without insurance.

Never want a drink of water / Til the well runs dry. / Never miss a real good thing / Til he says good-bye.

Turns out you don't have to wait for the waves to lap around your ankles. The climate is changing, Lord knows exactly how fast. But the money is moving pretty quickly.

Call 2006 the Batten Down the Hatches Moment.

When Peg and Ronald Buchanan left Silver Spring two years ago for retirement, they saw as their nest egg the house they'd built right on the ocean in the North Carolina Outer Banks.

It's a big place -- eight bedrooms, nine baths, three stories, 5,000 square feet, heated pool, kiddie pool, wild horses out back, dolphins out front. "It sits like a palace in the sky," Peg says. The front door is 12 feet above sea level. They figured on selling it for $2 million. The proceeds would pay for the rest of their lives.

Now they're wondering if they will ever be able to sell it. The map of their part of Carova Beach has been redrawn as a high-risk flood area by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. As a result, it may not be possible for any new buyer to get a mortgage.

Even on their existing loan, the Buchanans are having a hard time getting flood insurance. On a house that cost $700,000 to build and furnish, their lender has been able to get them only a $250,000 policy, with a $50,000 deductible.

The thought of losing their retirement reserve "really makes me mad," Peg says. "I feel like going over with a shotgun."

Emotion, however, does not drive insurance writers. By definition, they are the world's most serious futurists. When it comes to life insurance, for example, they pride themselves on their ability to routinely and accurately predict when a whole lot of people are going to die. If their models are wrong, and they have to pay out too much money too quickly, they go bankrupt.

As a result, these fiduciaries have a long and distinguished history of driving social change. Passion-laden causes move beyond the realm of hand-waving activists when large gray men in large gray suits decide they must.

Highway fatalities dropped when insurance companies started financially punishing unsafe drivers, as well as makers of unsafe cars. Cigarette smokers saw their life insurance premiums skyrocket.

The big buzz in the insurance industry today is climate change.

Lloyd's of London's June report is titled: "Climate Change: Adapt or Bust."

DOJ_NMG_0101142

The 2005 hurricane season gave the United States supposedly once-in-a-century storms, one right after the other. Katrina, Rita and Wilma were among the seven most expensive hurricanes ever to hit the country. Companies that had to eat too much of the $51.5 billion in insured losses went under.

The big problem with climate change for the insurance companies is not the risk. Their whole business is getting paid to accept risks.

The trouble is that their traditional means of calculating what is an acceptable risk -- and how much to charge for it -- is based on history.

It assumes that tomorrow will pretty much behave like yesterday.

Now they think that when it comes to the weather, the world is moving.

Wind and flood seem to be playing by new rules.

Batten down the hatches.Fear of Buying

When insurance companies refuse your trade, it's nothing personal. It's just business.

You can tell by the marvelously emotion-free language the industry uses: "Cat coverage," for example, is about catastrophe. "Wind" means hurricane. "Insufficient capacity" and "the market won't clear" refer to climate risks so difficult to calculate that traditional commercial providers won't sell you new insurance or renew your old insurance at any price.

At any price.

This spring, "astonishingly, the capital markets were full up on Florida wind," says Peter Nakada, managing director of RMS Consulting -- short for Risk Management Solutions, one of the industry's foremost risk modeling firms. "That capacity shut down in the frenzy prior to this wind season. People were scrambling to get coverage. That was brand-new. We saw the market saturate.

"People couldn't renew."

Some of those people facing insurance crises have a hard time understanding why.

"I feel sorry for Katrina victims -- it was a terrible thing," Peg Buchanan says. "But I don't see why the rest of the world should be punished because we like oceanfront."

Bill Hogan, with Twiddy & Co. Realtors in the Outer Banks, explains: "What's happened is that there is a stretch of land north of Corolla with no federally subsidized flood insurance. It's called, locally, the Four Wheel Drive Area. No hard-surface roads. It includes Swan Beach, North Swan Beach and Carova Beach. There are houses up there -- 14-bedroom oceanfronts -- for about $2 million," Hogan says. "Buy a lot for about a million. Build a house for about a million."

But then FEMA redrew the flood map. "All of a sudden, the lenders are requiring flood insurance where they did not in the past." The only source "for the kind of insurance the lender requires is somebody like Lloyd's of London. It might have a $50,000 deductible, and still be prohibitively expensive."

Hogan says he's now seeing "$100,000 lots plummeting in value. I don't know what they're worth. Nothing is selling. Buyers are afraid to buy. All kinds of rumors are flying around -- insurance companies are pulling out. The net effect is you bought property and it was in a good zone, and all of a sudden you sit there and it's deemed to be bad. Right now people are scrambling. Getting letters from banks -- 'We have no record of your flood insurance.' Just the kiss of death for the owner of the lot," Hogan says.

In Delaware, Westfield Insurance has canceled all coastal policies, and "we've been told that there are others who are starting to restrict their coastal writings next year -- bigger players in the market," says Michael Vild, deputy state insurance commissioner. He adds, plaintively, "There have never been hurricane-force winds in the state of Delaware in recorded weather history. We think companies restricting coastal coverage are overreacting. Although if we have a couple more years like 2005, it's going to be extremely difficult to get coverage."

There are 438,000 people living in low-lying Virginia Beach. It is marked by high-rise hotels smack on the water, without even dunes between the boardwalk and the surf.

In October, State Farm stopped writing new insurance on businesses within 2,500 feet of the ocean there. In November, Traveler's Insurance refused to sell or renew residential insurance there without a 3 percent hurricane deductible. On a $500,000 house -- no longer uncommon -- that means if you get hit by a hurricane, the first $15,000 comes out of your pocket.

DOJ_NMG_0101143

In Ocean City, new construction has become formidably fortified. Almost all of the island is expected to be underwater in a major blow. But on the ocean side, which will take the brunt of a storm surge -- a wind-driven wall of a water -- local government requires homes to be built on pilings driven perhaps 20 feet into the ground, sticking up some seven feet. Sixteen-inch bolts then attach the beams on which the house is built to the pilings, and each floor joist is attached to the beams with steel straps. The walls and roof are then held onto the beams and each other with more steel.

"I don't know of any other jurisdiction in the state of Maryland that runs the hurricane system we run," says Mike Richardson, Ocean City's chief building official. It is designed to withstand sustained winds of 90 miles per hour with three-second gusts to 110.

Will such fortifications become common around Washington? "Katrina showed us that inland areas are susceptible to flooding," Richardson says. "We're not just talking about the ocean -- we're talking about Chesapeake Bay, talking about Deep Creek Lake flooding. The Potomac has flooded before. So has the James."Dire Forecasts

So far, climate change has shaken the market most notably in high-value coastal areas. But if weather losses get worse, upheaval will become more common.

There is no question that the insurance industry is focused on how weather losses are getting worse.

In early September, when the leaders of the big European reinsurance companies had their annual gathering -- called the Rendez-Vous, in the posh principality of Monte Carlo -- one of the big discussion points was the gap between supply and demand for reinsurance in U.S. wind-affected areas, according to the industry journal, Reactions.

Reinsurers are the big boys who can throw around numbers with nine or 10 zeroes at the end and still sleep at night. They insure the insurers, buying risk beyond the appetite of ordinary companies. The most romanticized is Lloyd's of London. However, when Swiss Re and Munich Re talk, all conversation in the room ends until whatever is on their minds stops reverberating.

Today, what's on their mind is climate change.

"There are horror stories about the frequency and severity of hurricanes increasing," Reactions reported in September. That plus the skyrocketing number and value of properties on the U.S. coastline "has prompted many to question whether it is possible to write catastrophe business profitably."

At all.

"If you feel the price is not right, you pull out," matter-of-factly acknowledges Kurt Karl, head of economic research and consulting with Swiss Re in New York.

Since 1971, "Insured U.S. weather-related losses are growing 10 times faster than premiums and the overall economy," reports Ceres, a coalition whose observations get attention from the big boys in part because they've built a climate-risk network that includes 50 institutional investors managing more than $3 trillion.

Unacceptable Risk

Insurance companies approach climate change bracingly free of theory. They take only an academic interest in whether the wind blows because of increases in carbon dioxide in the atmosphere, or cyclical fluctuations in the Atlantic, or the huffing and puffing of the Big Bad Wolf.

They just want to calculate the odds. They want to know how many chips to put on the table.

And where.

"Two effects are going on," says Nakada, of the risk modeling firm RMS. "Hurricane activity rates have gone up." But also, "Hurricanes are perceived to be longer-lived. These longer-lived hurricanes have a better chance of sneaking up the coast. The view of vulnerability has changed."

The specter looms of the big hurricanes of 1938 and 1954. Those Category 3 hurricanes devastated New England. Storm surges of 13 and 12 feet, respectively, swept through Providence, R.I. Historic markers demonstrate how high the water rose downtown. They are over your head. Photos show seas crashing over the top of a harbor lighthouse. It is 70 feet tall. Beach homes were swept out to sea.

"Our view is that there are some events that have the potential to be so large as to exceed the capabilities of the insurance industry, as well as the funding and financing capability of individual states," says Michael Trevino, the spokesman for Allstate, one of the nation's largest home insurance companies. "Those are events that have the potential to be $100 billion. These events are so enormous, no entity has the ability to manage it."

Some require little imagination, such as a Category 4 hitting Miami or a Category 4 coming up the Houston Ship Channel aimed at the center of the U.S. oil industry, and America's fourth-largest city.

But the one Allstate is focused on is a Category 3 funneling straight north up New York Harbor. Pushing a wall of water perhaps 15 feet tall up Broadway toward the second-story windows of Wall Street.

This is why Allstate has decided not to write new homeowners insurance in the five boroughs of New York City -- Manhattan, Brooklyn, the Bronx, Queens and Staten Island -- plus Westchester County, just north of the city, and the counties that make up Long Island -- Nassau and Suffolk. In the most vulnerable parts of that market, they are also not renewing existing insurance.

"What we decided was that the total insured property values in New York State are about $1.9 trillion. We have a big share of the homes in that state" -- in the eight counties, Allstate's market share was 26 percent.

"Fundamentally, we've got enough exposure, thank you."

To Move or Not to Move

What does this mean for the future of beautiful areas around Washington near big bad bodies of water, from Duck to Rehoboth and from Alexandria to Annapolis?

"If you have a ton of money and don't mind paying three times the insurance as two years ago, you're probably happy," Nakada says. "There'll be all sorts of property available on the coast in warm weather places if the market gets more efficient."

But what about for the rest of us?

"In terms of affecting where people live and do business, three things have to happen: The risk has to go up a lot. And it just did. Number two, the market needs to allow that cost to be passed on to customers, or not. In which case, number three, either the price goes up, or the availability goes down in insurance.

"At that point you would think hard about whether you want to move."

Batten down the hatches.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

How The FBI Took Down A Deadly Jersey Gang (NSL)

By JOHN P. MARTIN, Star-Ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), December 3, 2006

Details of 4-year effort reveal depth of problem still facing state

The depth of New Jersey's gang problem dawned on John Havens on a steamy Sunday four years ago as he parked along Ninth Street in Newark.

Havens, a 32-year-old FBI agent, had his eyes on a two-story corner house where nearly 50 young men had gathered for a barbecue. One wore a hidden microphone that piped the proceedings to the agent's vehicle.

Havens and a Newark detective had waited for five hours with the engine off and windows up. Finally, the man known as "Massacre" began to preach.

"I'm the same as you! We Blood," Tewhan Butler thundered to the backyard crowd. "Blood ain't got sh-- to do with how much money you got, how fresh your clothes is! ... It's dealing with Blood, what you gonna live for, what you gonna die for."

Havens had been in law enforcement for a decade and never heard anything like it. Butler, 22, was surprisingly charismatic; his audience was rapt.

"It's no room for ego!" Butler said, in a rant that lasted more than an hour. "Everybody put that big man sh-- to the side! Whether y'all like it or not, I'm running the motherf-- show. I'm gonna stay running this motherf-- show."

The FBI agent suddenly understood why youngsters idolized Butler and why older teens lined up to join his East Orange set. And he realized why New Jersey's gang problem was probably more dangerous than many knew.

The Double ii Bloods, as they were called, brought gangs to a new level. They met weekly to discuss business and Blood codes, and to break in members. Over the years, they absorbed a generation from the same neighborhood.

Their discipline was matched only by their numbing penchant for violence. Double ii members were responsible for at least 27 murders, countless shootings, assaults and drug deals. Crimes were like merit badges -- earned and worn proudly.

Their victims included an East Orange father gunned down in front of his family because he warned gang members to stay away from his 8-year-old son, and a Newark teen killed by a Blood who wanted to try out his new guns.

The meeting recorded that afternoon on Ninth Street marked a turning point in the FBI investigation. Dismantling the set would take four more years, testing agents' ability to follow the trail of violence, entangling informants who risked death, and allowing prosecutors for the first time to pursue gangs as organized enterprises with a single purpose: crime.

It ended last month with the 42nd federal conviction, a guilty verdict against Preston "Death" Jones. Butler and four others took plea deals that will send them to jail for at least 25 years.

A look at the case -- from court documents, transcripts, and interviews with agents, prosecutors, attorneys, a Bloods member -- presents a window into the state's still ripe gang problem.

The crime rate in East Orange plunged after the demise of the Double ii Bloods, with 500 fewer violent offenses last year than in 2002. An ongoing crackdown by local police is pushing that rate even lower.

But investigators aren't fooling themselves. The Double ii's weren't the only gang; drugs are still available in East Orange. And in a recent trip through the set's turf, Havens noticed a boy, probably not more than 12, throwing up hand signals that meant just one thing:

Bloods.

OPERATION CRIMSON TIDE

Like many East Orange residents, LaQuan Brooks had watched as the gangs took control of pockets of his city.

On July 25, 2002, he heard news that sent him over the edge: The corner dealers had taken an interest in his 8-year-old son and namesake, letting little LaQuan handle their cash and jewelry.

Brooks, 29, stormed to 15th Street, where the boy lived with his mother. Witnesses said he began screaming at the crimson-clad young men, warning them to leave his son alone.

One ran off to Amir Winn, a 19-year-old Blood known as "Young Gangster," and reported that the irate father was "disrespecting" the set.

Winn had stashed a weapon in a nearby house. "Take me to get my gun," he told the underling, who later recounted the conversation for agents. "I'm going to show you how to murder someone."

Armed with a .380-caliber weapon, Winn arrived at 15th Street and asked aloud who was looking for him. Brooks stepped forward. As a crowd of children watched, Winn fired a single shot into his chest.

The 8-year-old rushed to his fallen father, witnesses reported. Then he turned to Winn. "Y.G., why you kill my daddy?" the boy asked.

Winn pointed the gun toward the child, paused and strolled away.

He was captured a week later. In the apartment where he had been hiding, police found the murder weapon and photos of Winn posing with it.

Brooks' death was one of 18 killings in East Orange in 2002, the city's highest murder toll in a dozen years. Aggravated assaults and robberies hit eight-year peaks. No one disputed gangs were behind the surge.

What was happening in East Orange had been unfolding across the nation. A 1996 Justice Department study warned gang-related crime had doubled in the previous two decades and was rising in cities of all sizes. Gangs were blamed for more than 580,000 serious crimes a year.

New Jersey was no different. In the early 1990s, under the FBI's new Safe Streets Violent Crime Initiative, the Newark division was among the first nationwide to team agents with local officers to battle street crime and find fugitives. As the problem worsened, the task force was split so one unit, the Violent Crime Criminal Enterprise Task Force, could focus on gangs.

Much of the crime was blamed on pockets of aimless young men who sold drugs and banded together simply because they grew up on the same blocks.

DOJ_NMG_0101146

Toward the end of the decade, task-force members began noticing the widening presence of what some call super-gangs, structured groups that demand discipline from their members but promise strength in numbers. They had officers, codes and a network for guns, drugs and support.

Once confined to California and the Southwest, the Bloods and their rivals, the Crips, had arrived on the East Coast.

Authorities say local prisons did as much to feed the problem as to cure it. Criminals discovered that joining a gang became necessary for survival behind bars. And after being freed, ex-cons brought the gang mentality back to the neighborhoods.

Urban settings like East Orange, where more than a third of the households earn less than $25,000 a year, were fertile ground.

"If you're a poor kid growing up in East Orange, what do you really have?" said Marc Agnifilo, the assistant U.S. attorney who headed the office's gang unit. "You have the neighborhood you're from."

For years, police and prosecutors used a narrow approach when it came to gang members, charging individual criminals with individual crimes. The result meant shorter jail sentences and no real effect on the organizations that groomed gangsters.

But the gang's military-like hierarchy presented a new opportunity.

Racketeering, a charge previously reserved for Mafia cases, allowed the government to pursue gangs as criminal enterprises. By bundling together crimes committed over years, prosecutors would dim the chances for gangsters to return quickly to the streets. If gang members chose to act like mobsters, the thinking went, they should be prosecuted like mobsters.

"What we try to do is dismantle the business of a gang," said Leslie Wiser, special agent in charge of the FBI's Newark division.

Such a strategy had been tried by federal prosecutors in other parts of the country, but never in New Jersey.

In 2001, Agnifilo met with FBI Special Agent Ronald Lyman, a veteran agent supervising the gang task force. Gangs were among the state's most pressing threats, Lyman told the prosecutor. He had first started looking at the local Bloods sets two years earlier; they were ripe for a racketeering prosecution.

Late that year, Lyman assigned the investigation to Havens, a rookie agent who had joined the FBI's Newark division a year earlier after a decade as a cop in Phoenix and Syracuse, N.Y. Serina Vash, another assistant U.S. attorney, also joined the case.

Lyman had already given the investigation a code name, Operation Crimson Tide.

Now they needed to get inside the Double ii's.

THE MONEY, THE BLING

By 1993, East Orange had its share of street gangs, groups with names like the Gutter Ratz, the Drama Lords, the Steel Click crew. But an unlikely pair of visitors consolidated them all.

At the time, Naughty By Nature, the East Orange-based rap group, had climbed the music charts. Fans swarmed as their tour bus pulled into the old neighborhood one day that summer.

Within the tour entourage were two California men, decked out in red Bloods garb. The visitors were aspiring rappers who went by the names True G and Love Child. They were also Bloods members.

At a cookout that week, the two men began preaching Bloods platitudes to the local teens. They promised solidarity, security, an identity. They weren't prominent Bloods back in California, agents later learned, but they had money, they had bling. The East Orange kids were awed.

"We was in love with the thing, ya know what I mean?" said one gang member, who was there at the time, and spoke on the condition of anonymity because he later cooperated with the FBI. "It was just the fact that we was young, we had nothing to grab onto in the neighborhood. We were so accustomed to the same ol' thing every day. And these dudes were really gang-banging. That was something was gonna bring us all together."

They came up with a set name -- the Double ii -- to tie together Inglewood, birthplace of the Bloods, and Illtown, the street nickname for East Orange.

Over the next few years, 15th and William streets transformed into ground zero for the Double ii. Bloods symbols and red spray paint sprouted on sidewalks and walls. Red shirts and bandannas were everywhere. Tired of the endless graffiti, one merchant gave in and painted his entire storefront red.

DOJ_NMG_0101147

Teens studied Blood histories, codes and the 31 rules. Members learned that "031" represents love for Bloods, "235" is shorthand for the Double ii set and that a "550" is a civilian. A gang member marked for punishment became "food." Killing a rival was "puttin' in work."

They identified allies -- sets like the nearby Gangsta Killa Bloods, and Brick City Brims -- and agreed not to cross each others' turfs. They found their enemies -- the North Side Killer Gangstas, a Crips set blocks away.

The most disciplined Double ii's changed their everyday speech, replacing the letter c with b. Words like "cause" and "comfortable" became "bause" and "bomfortable." Crips are Brips; cars are bars.

The Double ii's sold heroin from the street 24 hours a day, splitting it up into four six-hour shifts, the former member said, stashing guns and drugs in an abandoned house dubbed the Rathole. He earned up to $2,500 a shift, but it quickly melted away, spent on clothes, jewelry, concerts, even a new car.

"As quick as you make it, you blow it," he said.

The operation got a boost, he said, when one gang member, Quadree "Trouble" Smith, established a connection with a New York trafficker. Smith was among the older and more experienced gangsters; besides a criminal record, he had scars from nearly a half-dozen bullet wounds.

But if Smith emerged as the set's business brains, Butler, the man they called Massacre, was its soul.

A LEADER EMERGES

Slight, about 5-foot-7 and barely 140 pounds, Butler lived with his mother. Agents learned that he had once been a target for school bullies. Now he was deadly passionate.

Tattoos covered almost every visible patch of Butler's arms and neck. Two teardrops were stenciled under one eye; a single drop under the other. He dyed his dreadlocks red.

"Mass is the only people I can honestly say really, really, really believed in his heart," said his one-time associate. "His tongue was like a sword."

Butler cemented his reputation in October 2000. About 4 a.m. one day, he drove to an East Orange gas station where a rival, Robin Dwayne "Jabb" Thompson, was selling drugs. Butler covered his face, walked up behind Thompson and fired two shots into the back of his head.

The next summer, True G returned to East Orange and officially anointed Butler the set's leader, or 101, during a ceremony in Oval Park, the member said. Nine others were named to so-called "status" posts, with titles like ministers of defense and information.

"Once it became gang-affiliated, it was just like we had a chain of command -- orders was being given, orders had to be followed," the member said.

The gang grew steadily. At the May 26, 2002, barbecue -- the first recorded by agents -- seven more came to join. Butler gathered them together.

"Start from this man, go all the way around," he said, according to a recording and transcript of the meeting introduced at Jones' trial. "Let everybody know who y'all be, why y'all wanna bang."

What followed was something that sounded almost like a 12-step group.

"I be Bloody Mass, I be 101, I be that big homie," Butler told them. "I bang for you, you bang for me. That's how it's gonna go down."

After introductions, Butler asked every gang member to air grievances or share with the group. Holler at the world, he directed.

They did. They complained that some were breaking the rules, missing meetings, using drugs. One challenged how some acted in front of girls.

Then came the beatings.

Butler called on prospective inductees to come forward. To join, each knew, they had to withstand an attack for 31 seconds.

The agent and police detective listened as each young man stepped up to be battered. "Blood 31, Blood 30, Blood 29..." went the chant.

DOJ_NMG_0101148

Not everyone passed the test. One crumbled to the ground under a torrent of punches and kicks.

"Whip his ass!" Butler commanded. "He ain't Blood! Make him never wanna walk back in here!"

As the wannabe lay bleeding and motionless, some began to question whether he was alive. The meeting began to break up. "Put that n-- in the bar, take him somewhere," an unidentified voice said.

Butler seemed less interested in the injured man than in the scattering crowd. He ordered an associate to get the "new breeds" their induction paperwork. And he reminded everyone about the next meeting.

"Hey, yo! Sunday, 2:35, Oval Park," he said. "Sunday, 2:35, Oval Park."

The recording, by a low-level gang member who has never been publicly identified, gave investigators the foundation for a racketeering charge. Membership, a leadership structure, discussion of criminal activity -- it was all there. Butler even admitted that he had "pushed" people, code for murder. Surveillance video helped them match names to faces and voices.

But they needed proof of specific crimes. They needed witnesses. And they needed some luck.

A DEADLY PIPELINE

Infiltrating a gang of young men who use brutal violence and tattoos to identify themselves was a high hurdle. Havens was typical of a newer agent -- a thirtysomething former cop, white, with light hair, a boyish face and a trace of his upstate New York roots in his voice. All of which meant he had no shot of getting inside the Double ii's.

Their first informant had been an unexpected gift, introduced months earlier to Lyman and Havens by an FBI agent in North Carolina. The young man, an East Orange native, had been convicted in a case down there and was coming home for a final visit before prison. The Carolina agent proposed that he help the FBI in New Jersey.

Lyman and Havens met with the prospective cooperator. Over the next few months, before he went to jail, he recorded more than 100 meetings, transactions and conversations with gang members.

A veteran East Orange police detective, Nick Martinez, joined Havens on the investigation. Martinez was one of a handful of local officers detailed to the FBI task force. He knew the neighborhoods and some of the suspects by name, having arrested them over the years.

At the same time, the prosecutors caught another break. Agnifilo and one of his office's investigators, Joe Greco, had been poring over Newark police reports on guns that had been recovered or confiscated in crimes. They were looking for names and patterns when Greco noticed three guns purchased from the same store in Xenia, Ohio, about 20 miles east of Dayton.

Agents traced the gun registrations to students at Wilberforce University in Ohio. Those students told agents that a classmate from Newark, Seon Peton, paid them to act as straw buyers. Confronted, Peton admitted selling the weapons to an Essex County man he knew only as Jay.

From a photo lineup, Peton picked out Jay: It was Quadree Smith.

Shutting the gun pipeline became a priority. The Double ii's insisted that ranking members carry weapons, and few seemed reluctant to use them.

Jamal Coward, known as J-Rock, bought several of the Ohio guns. One was a Leinad semiautomatic, a favorite among gang members because it looked like an Uzi. The other was a .45-caliber handgun.

On a Monday morning in April 2002, Coward told Anthony Ward he wanted to play with his new toys. The pair climbed into a red Acura and drove to 22nd Street in Irvington -- a Crips neighborhood. With weapons in both hands, Coward began spraying the block with gunfire.

Erron Lewin, 19, lived on the street but wasn't a Crip. He was standing near his driveway when a bullet pierced his neck. Lewin collapsed and died. Three others were wounded.

Witnesses had little to offer police; one recalled the shooter yelling out something that sounded like "Bla-dat." What they probably heard was "Blatt," shorthand for "Blood Love All The Time," the Bloods' rallying cry. There were no suspects.

The next day, gang members later told agents, Coward found a reference to the shooting in The Star-Ledger and took the newspaper clip to the set leaders. He wanted credit for "putting in work."

He got it.

Two years would pass before Havens would be able to return to the neighborhood and tell Lewin's aunt they had finally solved the murder. The meeting turned out to be a low point for the agent.

DOJ_NMG_0101149

The aunt explained that her nephew had been looking forward to an upcoming job interview when he was killed. She had even bought the teen a new suit for the occasion.

Instead, she buried him in it.

ENLISTING AN INSIDER

Cultivating confidential informants is among the most important -- and draining -- tasks for federal agents, something akin to adopting troubled children. Many have criminal records, addictions, no real jobs. They need attention, cash, reinforcement.

Approaching the wrong one at the wrong time can be fatal to a case.

For months, Havens and the task force had relied on outsiders to build their case. Some were paid, some cooperated to save themselves.

They bought drugs and guns from lower-level gang members in "controlled buys," transactions that were recorded and monitored by teams of agents and police officers. These were the building blocks for the case, crimes that could be charged at any time. But to flesh out the criminal enterprise, they needed to get closer.

Investigators learned Smith and one of his associates, Michael Harris, had a falling out over money and that Double ii members later robbed Harris. Agents and prosecutors believed that if they could turn Harris, they could get valuable insight into the Double ii's. If they failed, however, they might expose the investigation.

They sent an informant to buy guns and drugs from Harris. Then they waited. In early 2003, they picked up Harris on the minor charges. Quickly, he began cooperating. He laid out the history of the Double ii's, explained to them where Smith bought heroin in New York and how the drugs were distributed and stashed.

Prosecutors now had pieces of both a gun and a drug network.

They had evidence against many of their targets, but decided against a flashy roundup. They wanted to protect informants and keep their wide-ranging case a secret. They also still hoped to flip a ranking gang member and penetrate the Double ii's leadership.

So they began picking up suspects one at a time, waiting until they were alone and quietly hustling them into a minivan driven by Martinez. Most were charged with drug distribution or gun charges, enough to isolate and jail them.

Other agencies also got involved. The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives had already been investigating the Ohio gun store. And federal prosecutors met regularly with their Essex County counterparts to identify unsolved murders and help build a case.

As the lead agent, Havens increasingly spent most of his days -- and many of his nights -- on the Double ii's. His laptop held thousands of photos, documents and files about gang member and their crimes. Sources called at all hours of the night. His Sundays fell into an unsettling pattern: sitting in church in the morning, sitting in an unmarked car outside a Bloods meeting in the afternoon.

His stable of informants had expanded and key Bloods were being jailed.

In October 2002, county prosecutors had jailed Butler, charging him with a double homicide in Newark. FBI agents participated in the arrest, but didn't let on about their racketeering investigation.

In 2003, Smith pleaded guilty to manslaughter charges in Superior Court in Essex County, but he was released on bail and went on the lam.

A confidential informant told Havens and Martinez they could find him in the Bronx, living around a stretch of apartment buildings along Pelham Parkway. The tip was rather broad, but the agents headed to the neighborhood hopeful for any clue, like a car with New Jersey plates.

As they pulled onto the block, they got something even better: Smith crossed the street right in front of them. He had changed his hairstyle, and wore a Boston Celtics jersey and a baseball cap, but couldn't hide his pride. Wrapped around his wrist was a $32,000 diamond-studded watch.

Martinez slipped out of the car and, gun drawn, inched up behind his target. As he lunged for Smith, the stunned gang member fell to the ground. He looked up almost relieved that he was being arrested, not ambushed.

Butler continued to direct the gang's activities from jail. In late 2003, with many of the gang's status members behind bars, he declared a new, two-tiered hierarchy for the Double ii's, one to oversee the set in prison and a second group to continue running operations in East Orange. He spelled out the plan in a letter delivered back to the neighborhood.

By then the feds had found their insider. Havens had persuaded a ranking Double ii member to secretly cooperate.

Becoming an informant could be deadly. Bloods rules demanded cooperators on the street be killed and that those in prison be slashed in the face, marked in a way all Bloods members would recognize.

But the new informant, the same one who had been awed by the Bloods as a teen in the 1990s, decided cooperating was more appealing that dying behind bars. "I really wanted a way out," he said in a telephone interview last month. "I saw a way out. I saw a light under the tunnel."

Freed from prison, he returned to the neighborhood and discovered the Double ii's had become more aware of law enforcement and more cautious. At least once, he ditched his recording device before a meeting because he feared being strip-searched.

But he resumed his role as a status member. And when the new leaders decided they needed a new hide-out to discuss business, the informant offered a solution.

His "cousin," he said, had moved to tiny one-bedroom apartment just a block from 15th and William streets. For a few bucks, he said, she might let them congregate there.

They agreed. The cousin was slightly older and the gang members took an instant liking to her. One even helped her hang drapes.

But in reality she was no cousin. She was an undercover FBI agent. The apartment was wired, with a hidden camera in the living room. It gave investigators the glimpse inside the Double ii that they had long been seeking.

In one conversation, they heard status members plot the death of a rival Crip who had strayed too often into their turf. (Agents scrambled to warn him of the death threat.) The camera was running when J-Rock admitted to the shooting spree that killed Erron Lewin. It's also how investigators discovered Anthony Copeland's murderer.

Copeland, 16, lived in a Crips neighborhood in East Orange. Prosecutors never found proof he belonged to a gang.

Samir Moses, on the other hand, wanted to join the Double ii's but had been turned down. On a Saturday night in April 2004, he tried to earn his way in.

Cruising in a stolen car in East Orange with two Double ii members, Moses saw Copeland outside his house. He jumped from the car, pointed a .357-caliber snub-nose handgun toward the teen and uttered the Bloods salutation, "What's poppin'?"

Then he shot Copeland in the chest.

The killing wasn't too different from other random gang murders. But as Vash, the assistant U.S. Attorney, pored over the evidence, she was stung in particular by a photo of the victim's clothes. It suddenly reminded her how young he was.

"His socks," she said, "had little puppies on them."

Not long after the shooting, Moses admitted to the killing in a recorded conversation at the apartment. Days later, he was arrested.

By late summer 2004, nearly all the gang members had been jailed on drug or other charges. Prosecutors settled in to finalize their racketeering indictment.

Havens had one thing to do: He went to see Massacre.

SHOW AND TELL

With nearly all of the gang members locked up on drug or other charges, Havens visited Butler for the first time that fall at Trenton State Prison. It was Butler's 25th birthday, Oct. 1, 2004.

The two men had never spoken, but they knew of each other and knew why Havens was there. A racketeering indictment was looming; some members were cooperating. Both men knew many of the defendants would follow Butler's lead. If he took a plea, the rest would, too.

He chose not to.

"I know I'm never going home," Butler said, according to the agent. "I'm Mass. I'm 101."

DOJ_NMG_0101151

But he agreed to exert his influence on one other gang member, his younger brother, Steven Butler. Massacre scrawled a note for Havens to deliver. In it, he gave his brother permission to cooperate and negotiate a plea.

Tell them "about me -- only me," Butler wrote.

Two weeks later, a federal grand jury indicted 19 Double ii members for racketeering. The 94-page charging document laid out the history of the gang set and spelled out five murders, 14 attempted murders and a list of other crimes.

Over the next 15 months, prosecutors twice revised the indictment. Some were crimes the defendants had already been charged with or convicted of in state courts, but were folded in as proof of the criminal enterprise. The last indictment, this past January, added murder allegations against Butler for the 2000 execution of Thompson.

By that time, many lower-ranking Double ii's had pleaded out. The leaders, however, wouldn't budge, perhaps wary of crossing each other. They were slated for a September trial under heavy security and with an anonymous jury.

The logjam broke one morning last April, when Agnifilo and Vash called the attorneys for the remaining defendants to federal court in Newark for a conference. When they arrived, some of the defenders were surprised to see their clients sitting, handcuffed, side by side in the jury box.

Armed U.S. marshals lined the courtroom and hallway. The doors were closed and locked.

The prosecutors began to spell out their case to the defendants, a group "show and tell" designed to push them toward a plea.

The defense attorneys had never seen anything like it. One stormed out. Others objected to the format and huddled in the hallway. But when they asked the gang members if they wanted to continue, all said yes.

Over the next several hours, Agnifilo and Vash let the defendants see what a jury would see. They played audio from the backyard barbecue and aired video from the apartment. They passed around photos of victims.

Vash read from transcripts of their secretly recorded conversations. Agnifilo promised that jurors would hear little LaQuan describe his father's murder.

As the prosecutors spoke, some of the gang members squirmed, turning to see how Butler responded or whispering about who the informants might be. Some asked questions.

"What's in it for us?" Amir Winn finally said. It seemed to be a bold question from the man accused of gunning down the 8-year-old's father.

The reply was terse: You might not spend the rest of your life in prison.

Within weeks, half of the defendants agreed to plead guilty. The rest, including Butler and Smith, held out for five more months. On Sept. 21, as their trial was about to begin, the pair struck a deal.

Butler acknowledged being the set leader, selling heroin, killing Thompson and ordering gang members to commit murders. At one point, Vash asked him if the Double ii's functioned with a chain of command.

"I was the chain of command," Butler told U.S. District Judge Katharine Hayden.

The judge scheduled the sentencings for early next year. Butler is expected to get at least 30 years in prison without parole.

A BATTLE, NOT THE WAR

The gang problem has not disappeared in East Orange. A few days before the pleas in September, the city's civilian police director, Jose Cordero, announced the arrests of 76 gang members in the previous two months. Some identified themselves as Double ii members.

"What we're seeing now is a lot of folks coming out of prison after doing some time," said Cordero, a former New York City anti-gang coordinator.

But it's a far cry from when he arrived two years ago, Cordero said. At that time, he was stunned to see gangs operating brazenly on city streets.

The FBI's Violent Crime Criminal Enterprise task force has other major gang prosecution cases in its pipeline. Last month, agents and local police arrested 22 Crips members in East Orange, Irvington and Newark.

Wiser, the head of the FBI's Newark division, cautioned: "Law enforcement is not the answer to the gang problem. No one should make the mistake in thinking that it is."

DOJ_NMG_0101152

Havens still hears from Double ii informants and witnesses several times a week. Some were relocated for their safety. After living with the case for the past four years, sometimes 24 hours a day, he's grateful it's over.

"I could investigate this case for the rest of my career," he said.

In a recent drive past the Double ii's old neighborhood in East Orange, Vash said she noticed how quiet it was, compared with three years ago. One defense attorney in the case marveled at the same thing.

"You've got all these people who are simply gone," said the attorney, who asked not to be named because he didn't want to antagonize what's left of the gang. "Gone. The whole set is gone."

IMMIGRATION:

HOLOCAUST JUSTICE HITS A WALL: Exile Or Mercy For Old Nazi Guards? (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, December 3, 2006

As U.S. pushes to deport suspected killers, others say it should just let 3 aging men die at home in Michigan

John Kalymon, Johann Leprich and Iwan Mandycz are old men now, hobbled by the same aches and pains that plague many senior citizens in their 80s.

Only these men are not ordinary senior citizens.

In the 1940s, the U.S. Department of Justice says, they helped the Nazi killing machine as it steamrolled across Europe, exterminating millions of people deemed enemies of Adolf Hitler's Third Reich.

As it has in scores of similar cases, the government has gone to court to strip all three metro Detroit men of their U.S. citizenship so they can be deported.

But getting rid of them has created a moral, legal and diplomatic dilemma.

Their families and neighbors regard them as harmless old men who were victims, forced to choose between the Nazi juggernaut or death. Detroit-area survivors of the Holocaust regard them as tormentors who helped mercilessly kill their loved ones and friends. And the federal government, which is racing to expel them from the country before they die, is having a tough time finding European countries to take them.

"If their mothers and fathers had been killed and if they saw what I saw, they would feel differently," William Weiss, a Holocaust survivor from metro Detroit who lost his mother, father and two sisters during the war, said last week in response to suggestions that the government should let bygones be bygones.

Eli Rosenbaum, head of the Justice Department's Nazi-hunting Office of Special Investigations, is mainly concerned about making travel arrangements for the men.

"Right now, we have six people who we could put on a plane tomorrow," Rosenbaum said, adding that Leprich is one of the six.

"In recent years, we've had great difficulty persuading European nations to take these people back," Rosenbaum said. "And in some cases, we've hit a brick wall."

Rosenbaum said many European countries are too embarrassed to take back people they can't prosecute because they lack the laws or the desire to do so.

Jonathan Drimmer, a former deputy director of the OSI and lead prosecutor in the Mandycz case, said many countries don't want the old men because they don't want to take care of them. And leaning on foreign governments to take them back isn't high on Washington's priority list because of other pressing international issues.

An impassioned defense ...

The problem became apparent in October when the OSI reluctantly agreed to release Leprich to his family on an electronic tether after 39 months in federal custody because Romania, Hungary and Germany wouldn't accept him. Kalymon and Mandycz are free.

DOJ_NMG_0101153

Leprich, an ethnic German born in Romania, served as an SS Death's Head Battalion guard in 1943-44 at the Mauthausen concentration camp in Nazi-held Austria. An estimated 119,000 Jews, Gypsies, Jehovah's Witnesses and others died at the camp.

A federal judge in Detroit stripped Leprich of his citizenship in 1987 for concealing his wartime service to the Nazis before coming to the United States. After losing his citizenship, Leprich went to Canada before the government could initiate deportation proceedings.

Federal agents arrested him in 2003 as he hid in a secret compartment under a stairwell in the home he shared with his wife in Clinton Township. The agents had a judge lock him up as a flight risk.

Leprich, like Kalymon, declined to be interviewed or photographed for this story. Mandycz's lawyer didn't return calls and no one answered the door of Mandycz's home.

Kalymon and Leprich admitted working for the Nazis during the war, but said they did so because they had to and never persecuted anyone. Mandycz denied working for the Nazis, but a judge found otherwise. Leprich and Mandycz were concentration camp guards. Kalymon worked for a Nazi-run auxiliary police force in wartime Poland.

Leprich's lawyer, Joseph McGinness of Cleveland, has defended several people whom the government calls "Nazi persecutors" and accused the government of heavy-handed tactics. He said men like Leprich were compelled to work for the Nazis. He said they merely guarded camp perimeters and were never allowed to enter areas where prisoners were kept.

"The man isn't guilty of anything," McGinness said of Leprich. "Do you have any idea how little influence a 17-year-old private ... in the Waffen SS had? The only influence they had was to go out and get their head shot off on the Eastern Front."

... and skeptical response

But McGinnis' argument doesn't go down well with Holocaust experts like Professor Sidney Bolkosky of the University of Michigan-Dearborn.

"You couldn't guard one of those camps and not have some degree of complicity in brutality," Bolkosky said, adding that decades of research have failed to produce a single case of anyone being shot or shipped to the Eastern Front for refusing to help persecute Jews.

He said there are many instances of people being shot or imprisoned for helping rescue Jews. He said there must be consequences -- such as deportation -- for Nazi persecutors.

For years, the U.S. government did little to prevent them from immigrating to the United States or to make them leave.

From the end of the war until the late 1970s, only one person was stripped of citizenship for helping the Nazis -- Hermine Braunsteiner Ryan, a Queens, N.Y., homemaker and Austrian-born concentration camp guard who was extradited to Germany in 1973. Former prisoners called her "the Stomping Mare" because they said she stomped old women to death with steel-studded jackboots.

U.S. officials began taking an interest in Nazi persecutors in the early 1970s, after then-U.S. Rep. Elizabeth Holtzman, D-N.Y., was shocked to discover that federal immigration officials maintained a list of suspected Nazi persecutors living in the United States but did nothing to remove them.

She persuaded Congress to pass legislation in 1978 to denaturalize and deport participants in wartime persecution. The Office of Special Investigations was created the next year.

Since then, OSI lawyers have investigated 1,700 suspected Nazi persecutors, stripped 84 of their citizenship and deported 63. The office has 50 open Nazi-era investigations and 15 cases in litigation. It has lost only nine cases.

One of its targets was Kalymon, who in 1942-44 served in the Nazi-run Ukrainian Auxiliary Police. The government says the force helped the Germans round up nearly all of the 100,000 Jewish residents of L'viv, Poland, to be killed.

The government asked a federal judge in Detroit in January 2004 to strip Kalymon of his citizenship after discovering captured wartime documents from the former Soviet Union showing that he repeatedly shot at Jews who tried to escape during roundups. Kalymon killed one Jew and wounded another, the reports said.

During 3 1/2 hours of trial testimony in September, Kalymon insisted he never shot his rifle, never persecuted any Jews and never saw any Jews being mistreated or killed in L'viv.

He also denied submitting a handwritten report showing that an Ivan Kalymun fired four shots during a roundup of Jews at 7 p.m. Aug. 14, 1942, wounding one and killing another.

Kalymon and his lawyer, David Domina of Birmingham, insisted Kalymon is a victim of mistaken identity. They said the shooting reports, which officers submitted to account for ammunition, were created by a precinct commander who was stealing ammunition to sell on the black market.

Kalymon admitted lying to U.S. authorities about his wartime activities on his visa application in 1949. Kalymon, who was born in Poland, said he was afraid of winding up in the hands of the Soviets, who he said killed his wife's father, a Greek Orthodox priest.

They're 'wonderful neighbors'

After arriving in the United States, Kalymon and his wife, Lubow, moved to Detroit, where he worked as a draftsman for Chrysler. He retired in 1989 after 25 years of service.

His son, Alexander Kalymon of Troy, said the past two years have been hard for his family.

"Can you imagine how difficult it is to prove your innocence when no one from that time period is still alive?" Alexander Kalymon said.

"Where do you get the resources to even find out? The government has almost unlimited resources."

He said he doesn't know what his family will do if U.S. District Judge Marianne Battani strips his father of citizenship, paving the way for deportation proceedings.

John Kalymon's neighbor Eleanor Rink, who worked with Kalymon's wife years ago, said she feels bad for the couple.

"They're absolutely wonderful neighbors," Rink said.

She said John Kalymon helps remove snow from her sidewalks since her husband died 10 years ago.

But Weiss, the Holocaust survivor, was skeptical of Kalymon's court testimony.

"How could he not have known what was going on?" said Weiss, 81, who was born in L'viv and lost both sisters and his mother during roundups of Jews conducted by the Ukrainian Auxiliary Police.

Weiss, who survived several concentration camps and prisons and watched his father die when the Nazis forced them to march to a camp, said Ukrainian Auxiliary Police officers were a constant and brutal presence in the L'viv ghetto.

Weiss testified last year in Chicago in a similar court case against another former Ukrainian Auxiliary Police officer and at one point was asked to testify at Kalymon's trial.

Meanwhile, Rosenbaum warns the suspects not to get too comfortable with the idea of remaining in the United States.

"The message I would have for Leprich and the others is this: I suggest you keep your bags packed because we don't give a lot of notice when it's time to go," Rosenbaum said. "The time will come."

Do Immigrants Make Us Safer? (NYT)

By Eyal Press

The New York Times Magazine, December 3, 2006

Although the midterm election failed to render a clear verdict on illegal immigration, the new Democratic Congress may enact sweeping legislation tightening border controls and allowing more guest workers next year. If that happens, the rancorous debate about how undocumented workers affect jobs and wages in the United States will be rejoined. So, too, will an equally rancorous, if less prominent, debate: Do immigrants make the U.S. more crime-ridden and dangerous?

In an age of Latino gangs and Chinese criminal networks, the notion that communities with growing immigrant populations tend to be unsafe is fairly well established, at least in the popular imagination. In a national survey conducted in 2000, 73 percent of Americans said they believe that immigrants are either “somewhat” or “very” likely to increase crime, higher than the 60 percent who fear they are “likely to cause Americans to lose jobs.” Cities like Avon Park, Fla., have considered ordinances recently to dissuade businesses from hiring illegal immigrants, whose presence “destroys our neighborhoods.” Even President Bush, whose perceived generosity to undocumented workers has earned him vilification on the right, commented in a speech this May that illegal immigration “strains state and local budgets and brings crime to our communities.”

So goes the conventional wisdom. But is it true? In fact, according to evidence cropping up in various places, the opposite may be the case. Ramiro Martinez Jr., a professor of criminal justice at Florida International University, has sifted through homicide records in border cities like San Diego and El Paso, both heavily populated by Mexican immigrants, both places where violent crime has fallen significantly in recent years. "Almost without exception," he told me, "I've discovered that the homicide rate for Hispanics was lower than for other groups, even though their poverty rate was very high, if not the highest, in these metropolitan areas." He found the same thing in the Haitian neighborhoods of Miami. In his book "New York Murder Mystery," the criminologist Andrew Karmen examined the trend in New York City and likewise found that the "disproportionately youthful, male and poor immigrants" who arrived during the 1980s and 1990s "were surprisingly law-abiding" and that their settlement into once-decaying neighborhoods helped "put a brake on spiraling crime rates."

The most prominent advocate of the "more immigrants, less crime" theory is Robert J. Sampson, chairman of the sociology department at Harvard. A year ago, Sampson was an author of an article in The American Journal of Public Health that reported the findings of a detailed study of crime in Chicago. Based on information gathered on the perpetrators of more than 3,000 violent acts committed between 1995 and 2002, supplemented by police records and community surveys, it found that the rate of violence among Mexican-Americans was significantly lower than among both non-Hispanic whites and blacks.

In June, Sampson and I drove out to a neighborhood in Little Village, Chicago's largest Hispanic community. The area we visited is decidedly poor: in terms of per capita income, 84 percent of Chicago neighborhoods are better off and 99 percent have a greater proportion of residents with a high-school education. As we made our way down a side street, Sampson noted that many of the residents make their living as domestic workers and in other low-wage occupations, often paid off the books because they are undocumented. In places of such concentrated disadvantage, a certain level of violence and social disorder is assumed to be inevitable. As we strolled around, Sampson paused on occasion to make a mental note of potential trouble signs: an alley strewn with garbage nobody had bothered to pick up; a sign in Spanish in several windows, complaining about the lack of a park in the vicinity where children can play. Yet for all of this, the neighborhood was strikingly quiet. And, according to the data Sampson has collected, it is surprisingly safe. The burglary rate in the neighborhood is in the bottom fifth of the city. The overall crime rate is nearly in the bottom third.

The safety of neighborhoods like these has received little attention in the debate about immigration — or, for that matter, the debate about crime. Ever since cities like New York began cracking down on panhandling and loitering in the mid-1990s, a move that coincided with a precipitous drop in violence, policy makers have embraced the so-called broken-windows theory, which emphasizes the deterrent effects of punishing such minor offenses. Lately, though, scholars have begun to question whether "broken windows" deserves all the credit for diminishing crime after all. Some researchers have linked progress to the cessation of the crack epidemic. Others point to an improved economy, community-policing initiatives or even the legalization of abortion, which reduced the number of poor, unwanted children growing up in high-risk neighborhoods.

Sampson's theory may be the most provocative yet. Could America's cities be safer today not because fewer unwanted children live in them but because a lot more immigrants do? Could illegal immigration be making the nation a more law-abiding place?

There are, to be sure, scholars who take issue with this rosy picture. Wesley Skogan, a political scientist at Northwestern University, has spent the past 13 years tracking violence and social disorder in the white, black and Latino communities in Chicago. In a new book, "Police and Community in Chicago: A Tale of Three Cities," just out from Oxford University Press, Skogan concludes that the big success story took place not in immigrant areas but in African-American ones, where participation in community-policing programs was highest and violence fell the most. "About two-thirds of the crime decline in Chicago since 1991 took place in black neighborhoods," Skogan says. In Hispanic communities, by contrast, Skogan found that the fear of crime, as measured in surveys of residents, and real social disorder — gang activity, loitering — actually became worse as the foreign-born population increased. Skogan acknowledges that Hispanic immigrants don't show up much in arrest records, but he says he believes part of the explanation for this rests in the fact that those who are undocumented go to enormous lengths to "stay off the radar." Many also come from a country, Mexico, where distrust of law enforcement is endemic, which is why he suspects they underreport crime and participate less in community-policing programs, as his study found.

Sampson doesn't deny that crime may be underreported in immigrant neighborhoods. Nonetheless, he is quick to note that as the ranks of foreigners in the United States boomed during the 1990s — increasing by more than 50 percent to 31 million — America's cities became markedly less dangerous. That these two trends might be related has been overlooked, he says, in part because immigrants, like African-Americans, often trigger negative associations regardless of how they actually behave. Not long ago, Sampson and Stephen W. Raudenbush, a sociologist who teaches at the University of Chicago, conducted an experiment to test this idea. The experiment drew on interviews with more than 3,500 Chicago residents, each of whom was asked how serious problems like loitering and public drinking were where they lived. The responses were compared with the actual level of chaos in the neighborhood, culled from police data and by having researchers drive along hundreds of blocks to document every sign of decay and disorder they could spot.

The social and ethnic composition of a neighborhood turned out to have a profound bearing on how residents of Chicago perceived it, irrespective of the actual conditions on the streets. "In particular," Sampson and Raudenbush found, "the proportion of blacks and the proportion of Latinos in a neighborhood were related positively and significantly to perceived disorder." Once you adjusted for the ethnic, racial and class composition of a community, "much of the variation in levels of disorder that appeared to be explained by what residents saw was spurious."

In other words, the fact that people think neighborhoods with large concentrations of brown-skinned immigrants are unsafe makes sense in light of popular stereotypes and subliminal associations. But that doesn't mean there is any rational basis for their fears. Such a message hasn't sat well with everyone. As the debate about immigration has grown more heated and polarized, Sampson has found himself barraged with hate mail. "Vicious stuff," he told me, "you know, thinly veiled threats, people saying, 'You should just come and look at the Mexican gangs here.' " But Sampson has also won some far-flung admirers. In Mexico, one of the nation's leading dailies, La Reforma, published a story hailing his findings, under the triumphal heading, "Son barrios de paisanos menos violentos que los blancos " ("Neighborhoods of our countrymen are less violent than white ones").

If immigrants really are making America safer, why is this so? "That," Sampson says, "is the $64,000 question." In discussing the persistence of poverty and the causes of crime, sociologists on the left often emphasize the importance of "structural" factors like unemployment and racism, while scholars on the right tend to focus on individual behavior like having an illegitimate child and using drugs. Sampson prefers to focus on the nature of the social interactions taking place in particular neighborhoods. At one point in Little Village, we strolled past a house where a couple of young girls were playing outside. It didn't seem that anybody was supervising them. Next door, however, an elderly woman was standing just inside the window. The window was open, and as Sampson and I passed by, her eyes did not leave us. "Did you notice that?" asked Sampson as we proceeded down the block. She was making sure the two strangers who had appeared weren't dangerous. It was an example of the kind of informal social control that Sampson says can prevent even the poorest neighborhoods from spiraling into chaos and that he suspects may distinguish many tightknit immigrant communities.

But Sampson also notes the importance of another factor, one often stressed by conservatives: Mexicans in Chicago, his study found, are more likely to be married than either blacks or whites. "The family dynamic is very noticeable here," Sampson remarked as we passed a girl with long braided hair clutching her mother's hand. Her father followed a few steps behind. Sampson does not believe family structure explains everything: the data showed that in immigrant neighborhoods, even individuals who are not in married households are 15 percent less likely to engage in crime. Yet neither did he discount its significance.

To the extent a strong family structure does play a role, it has left Sampson understandably mystified why the most strident opponents of immigration so often come from the right. Shouldn't conservatives concerned about the breakdown of traditional values be celebrating these family-oriented newcomers? This is indeed what David Brooks argued not long ago in a column in The New York Times, gently chiding his fellow conservatives for reflexively assuming foreigners have had a corrosive impact on the nation's moral fiber. "As immigration has surged, violent crime has fallen 57 percent," Brooks noted in the column, which was titled "Immigrants to Be Proud Of."

Sampson wrote Brooks a note complimenting him on the piece. But he is under no illusions that his views on crime and immigration will endear him to Republicans clamoring for America's borders to be sealed. On the other hand, it might not make his colleagues on the left any happier. The flip side of the impulse to demonize immigrants is, after all, the tendency to romanticize them as hard-working Horatio Alger types who valiantly lift themselves out of poverty — with the implication that if they can avoid falling victim to drugs, gangs and other inner-city scourges, those who succumb to these forces have only themselves to blame. In calling attention to the virtues of immigrant communities, there is a risk that Sampson's work will be taken by some as a commentary on the high crime rate in some poor African-American communities.

Of course, comparing the experiences of Mexican immigrants and African-Americans may seem grossly unfair, not least because studies have shown that many employers are willing to hire foreigners (on the assumption they work hard) but not blacks (on the assumption they don't). Yet the fact that it is unfair hardly means such comparisons won't be made — even though immigrants commit less crime not only than African-Americans in inner-city neighborhoods but less than American-born white people as well.

Before anyone rushes to conclude that crime would vanish from America's cities if only more foreigners moved here, it is worth considering something else Sampson's study uncovered. It is a finding as troubling as his basic thesis about immigrants is hopeful. Second-generation immigrants in Chicago were significantly more likely to commit crimes than their parents, it turns out, and those of the third generation more likely still.

Opponents of immigration frequently charge that Mexican immigrants threaten America's national identity because of their failure to assimilate. A more reasonable concern might be the opposite of this: not that foreigners in low-income neighborhoods refuse to adopt the norms of the native culture but that their children and grandchildren do.

The sociologists Alejandro Portes and Rubén G. Rumbaut conducted a multiyear longitudinal study of immigrant children in Miami and San Diego. The offspring of foreigners who grow up in impoverished ghettos, they have argued, particularly Mexican-Americans exposed to racial as well as economic discrimination, often lose the drive and optimism their parents had and come to share the widespread attitude among their inner-city peers that survival depends on brandishing an oppositional stance toward school authorities and, more broadly, a culture that looks down on them. "The learning of new cultural patterns and entry into American social circles does not lead in these cases to upward mobility but to exactly the opposite," Portes and Rumbaut contend, a process of "downward assimilation" that has created a new "rainbow underclass." Astoundingly, in a recent paper, Rumbaut and several doctoral students found that the incarceration rate among second-generation Mexicans was eight times higher than for the first generation; among Vietnamese, it was more than 10 times higher. Where the first-generation immigrants in their data were less likely to wind up in prison than native-born whites, the second (with the exception of Filipinos and Chinese) were more likely.

Such findings suggest the class and race divisions that cleave America's social landscape may prove decisive after all. In Sweden, a country with markedly less inequality and more generous social welfare policies — and far less violent crime — studies have shown the rate of offending tends to be lower for the second generation of immigrants than for the first. Of course, America has historically done an admirable job of assimilating newcomers, and the theory of "downward assimilation" has not gone unchallenged. Recently, a team of researchers completed a study in New York of more than 2,200 second-generation immigrants and 1,200 native-born Americans that allowed them to compare the rate of offending among various groups, West Indians versus African-Americans, for instance, or Russians versus American-born whites. According to John Mollenkopf, a political scientist at the CUNY Graduate Center, the arrest rates among the children of immigrants were the same or lower in every case. "The second-generation immigrants are doing better, on the whole, than the native-born," he said.

Clearly, the debate over assimilation will continue, as Sampson acknowledges. When I asked him why he thought the positive trends he and his colleagues had discovered in Chicago seemed to become diluted by the second and third generations, he paused.

"That's another $64,000 question," he said, chuckling softly. Part of the explanation, he went on to speculate, may rest in the exposure subsequent generations have to the things that often lure young people in America's cities to engage in illicit activities: drugs, cash, cars, contraband. Part of it, as well, might be the adoption of streetwise attitudes that lead people to react quickly to insults in the United States. One thing it is difficult for Americans to realize, he said, is how unusually violent their country is, particularly in light of its inordinate wealth. Recently, scholars have become increasingly interested in the historical origins of American violence. Richard Nisbett of the University of Michigan and others have traced our "culture of violence" back to the valorization of retribution and dueling among Scotch-Irish immigrants in the American South, suggesting that antique folkways have become encoded into the nation's DNA.

It is a dark view, perhaps, but Sampson is hopeful that the good news about crime in recent years can continue, albeit under certain conditions, among them less alarmism about the supposedly dangerous foreigners in our midst. Sampson shook his head when describing some of the correspondence he has received from people absolutely certain that immigrants are sowing mayhem in our streets. In the last few years, he noted, such people have had somewhat less cause for worry, since the numbers show the flow of newcomers has subsided a bit. Meanwhile, the crime rate in some cities has begun to creep back up. Sampson, for one, does not think this is a mere coincidence. Those clamoring for America to close its borders in order to prevent violence-prone strangers from flooding our shores may well get their way, he acknowledged, but they ought to be careful what they wish for.

Georgia Legislator's Wife Battles Deportation Order (NYT)

By Brenda Goodman

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

ATLANTA, Dec. 1 — The wife of a Georgia legislator known for his strong support of immigrants' rights is in hiding after federal agents came to their home on Tuesday with an order to deport her to her native Colombia, her lawyer said.

In a written statement issued on Wednesday, State Senator Curt Thompson, 37, a Democrat, said his wife, Sascha Herrera, 28, missed an immigration-related court hearing in February 2005. Mr. Thompson said notices about an asylum application that had been mistakenly filed on her behalf had been sent to the wrong address, causing her to miss the hearing.

Because Ms. Herrera did not appear in court, a federal judge issued a deportation order in February 2005, Charles H. Kuck, Ms. Herrera's immigration lawyer, said on Friday.

Mr. Kuck said Mr. Thompson told him that his wife was not at the couple's home when Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents arrived on Tuesday to take her into custody. Mr. Kuck would say only that Ms. Herrera was in a safe place.

"We're making an arrangement, we hope, for her to come in Monday morning," Mr. Kuck said, adding that he would try to persuade an immigration judge to reopen Ms. Herrera's case.

It is usually difficult to get an immigration case reopened, several experts said.

Advocates of immigrants' rights say Ms. Herrera's situation is another indication of how byzantine is the system for applying for legal residency in this country.

"It's a very, very onerous system," said State Senator Sam Zamarripa, a Democrat who was the first Hispanic elected to the Georgia Senate. "If the wife of a state senator can't handle it, how can we expect people who are working in our labor force to handle the bureaucracy?"

"This is going to take a U.S. congressman or a senator to step in," Mr. Zamarripa said. "To say, let's wait a minute. Let's think about this. This is a good person who deserves to be in this country."

Marc Raimondi, a spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Washington, said he could not comment on the specifics of Ms. Herrera's case. Generally, Mr. Raimondi said, "People who are here legally are very, very careful about their immigration status." Of the couple's claims of ignorance about the notices, he said, "It sounds like a lot of song and dance."

In his statement, Mr. Thompson also said his wife was the victim of an unscrupulous "notario." In some Spanish-speaking countries, a "notario publico" is a highly regarded lawyer with special power to negotiate with the government. In the United States, however, a "notario" is often a notary public with no special expertise in immigration law. Some notaries, however, advertise themselves within Latino communities and take advantage of the similarity between the two titles to charge high fees to file immigration paperwork with the government.

Mr. Kuck said Ms. Herrera originally paid $1,300 to the notary, whom he identified as Tomas Vilela, to help her file paperwork to extend her visitor's visa so she could take classes at Kennesaw State University, just north of Atlanta.

Mr. Vilela recommended that she apply for asylum, Mr. Kuck said, and had her sign the last page of an application. But after she received an F-1 student visa, for which university officials had helped her apply, Ms. Herrera instructed Mr. Vilela not to file the application, Mr. Kuck said.

DOJ_NMG_0101159

Mr. Kuck said that Mr. Vilela filed the forms anyway, and that because the paperwork listed the address of his business, all subsequent letters from immigration officials were sent there, not to Ms. Herrera's home. Mr. Thompson's statement said the notary did not forward the letters to Ms. Herrera.

She did not know about the filing and never received notices about the hearing, Mr. Kuck said, adding that the deportation order "hit the couple completely out of the blue."

Mr. Vilela did not return several messages left at his office.

Though Ms. Herrera was in the country legally on the student visa, once she missed the date for the asylum hearing and the deportation order was issued, "it trumped all other legal status," Mr. Kuck said.

Mr. Thompson represents parts of DeKalb and Gwinnett Counties, in a district where about one in four residents is foreign born.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution quoted him as saying that he asked immigration officials about Ms. Herrera's status before their marriage in April 2006 — more than a year after the deportation order was issued — and was told that she was in the country legally. Because her husband is a United States citizen, after their marriage, Ms. Herrera also applied for an adjustment of her status to become a permanent resident and obtain a green card. But the approval process is lengthy, Mr. Kuck said.

If she is deported, Ms. Herrera could be barred from re-entering the United States for 10 years, Mr. Kuck said, "so we have to work with extreme speed to try to fix this."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Editorial: Leahy Has Historic Opportunity (BMTA)

Barre-Montpelier (VT) Times Argus, December 3, 2006

Friends and staff of Sen. Patrick Leahy are already talking about the opportunity now before him to establish a legacy that will place him among the most important senators in Vermont history.

It will not be about the pork he is able to secure from his position on the Appropriations Committee or his long-term work for the interests of the state's dairy farmers. It will be his legacy as a defender of the U.S. Constitution.

Leahy has been almost giddy since the elections last month, with the prospect that he will become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. But the challenges before him are serious indeed.

As chairman he will have the power to focus on the numerous ways that the Bush administration has worked to skirt and undermine the constitutional limits on executive power, straying into activities that might be judged illegal or even criminal. A successful effort to rein in the abuses of the Bush administration will place Leahy in the history books alongside Sen. Ralph Flanders of Vermont, who was instrumental in challenging the abuses of Sen. Joseph McCarthy — except Leahy's challenge is even greater and the abuses more serious than those of the senator from Wisconsin whose name has become synonymous with an era of thuggery and paranoia.

Leahy appears to understand what he is up against. Already he has sent letters to the Justice Department renewing numerous requests for information on a variety of programs and activities that are constitutionally dubious. President Bush has promised to foster a spirit of bipartisanship in his dealings with the new Democratic Congress, but so far the Justice Department and the White House show every sign that they will resist Leahy's efforts to let the sun shine on the doings of the federal government.

Leahy will have to focus both on the specifics of administration activities and on the broader legal and political philosophy the administration has offered in its own defense.

Thus, Leahy has sought documents that would shed light on the administration's decisions related to the detention of prisoners and on unauthorized domestic spying. Of broader concern is the claim of sweeping executive power used by the administration to place itself virtually above the law. Leahy's greatest contribution would be to expose the danger to our constitutional system of Bush's claims and to help re-establish proper limits on the reach of executive power.

This work requires the perspicacity and determination of a statesman. The work of the Judiciary Committee in investigating these issues must not be seen by the public as an effort to settle political scores. The Bush administration will try to cloak its practices in secrecy on the basis of national security, and Leahy will have the job of discerning the difference between legitimate national security concerns and bogus claims designed for political self-protection. There is plenty of precedent for the bogus, going all the way back to the Pentagon Papers.

The struggle over Bush administration abuses will be of the utmost seriousness. It is likely that Bush has sought legal justification for secret detention and "alternative" interrogation methods as a way to cover up torture and illegal imprisonment that could put members of the administration in legal jeopardy. A policy of torture, which apparently received approval at high levels of government, brings the administration close to the territory of war crimes. As Leahy and his committee get close to that territory, the political warfare will not be pretty.

It will be important for Leahy to maintain a focus on the legal and constitutional issues at stake: that the United States stands for human rights, the rule of law and a system of checks and balances that applies to the president even in a time of war. The American people will be grateful to him if he can establish that a democracy need not resort to the ruthless, lawless methods of a panicked bully. And Vermonters will remember him among the handful of Vermont's greatest statesmen.

Lame-Duck Congress May Run Out The Clock (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) wants legislation on President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program. Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.) is sure the time has come for Congress to declare that aborted fetuses feel pain. And Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) still insists that the District of Columbia should be granted a vote in the House while the Republicans control Congress.

They shouldn't count on it.

Congress will convene on Tuesday for what some fear will be the lamest of lame-duck sessions, and GOP leaders have decided to take a minimalist approach before turning over the reins of power to the Democrats. Rather than a final surge of legislative activity, Congress will probably wrap up things after a single, short week of work. They have even decided to punt decisions on annual government spending measures to the Democrats next year.

"There is a lot of battle fatigue among members, probably on both sides of the aisle," said Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), usually a reliable conservative firebrand. "Contrary to popular belief, members of Congress are human beings. They have a certain shelf life and a certain amount of energy to be drawn on. We're tired."

Before the midterm elections, GOP leaders had dismissed the Democrats' "do-nothing" label for the 109th Congress as political posturing, promising that a robust post-election session would put the accusation to rest. Instead, Republican lawmakers will have met for one week in November, devoted almost exclusively to leadership elections for next year, and one week in December, largely to pick committee assignments, move offices and pass a measure to keep the government operating through February.

That will mean this Congress will have spent the least time in session of any in at least half a century, according to Thomas E. Mann and Norman J. Ornstein, congressional historians and the authors of "The Broken Branch," a critical look at recent Congresses. In the time they have met, lawmakers have failed to approve a budget resolution or pass at least eight of the 11 annual spending bills.

Other significant pieces of legislation will be hard to find. Bush's push for a comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws produced a partially funded measure to build a border fence. His calls to restructure Social Security, rewrite the tax code and ease the cost of health insurance went unheeded. And GOP lawmakers' pledge to tighten ethics regulations in the wake of the indictments or resignations of four members fell flat.

"Harry Truman's 'do-nothing' Congress passed the Marshall Plan," Mann pointed out.

To be sure, Congress will do something this week. Lawmakers have routinely extended a number of business tax breaks every year or so, including a tax credit for research and development and a break for hiring welfare recipients. But that routine was broken this year when GOP leaders decided to link those business-tax-cut extensions to a deep and permanent cut to the estate tax, a link that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) had declared inviolable.

This week, the inviolable link will be broken. The tax extensions will be passed on their own after all, according to legislative aides, perhaps with a multibillion-dollar provision staving off scheduled cuts to physician reimbursements under Medicare.

The House has scheduled a vote on Smith's fetal-pain bill, which, among other things, would require abortion providers to inform patients of the controversial assertion that the procedure may cause pain. Providers would also have to offer anesthesia for the fetus, which the patient would have to accept or reject in writing. But GOP leaders put the measure on the fast track to passage, which means it will need the vote of two-thirds of the House. Even if the bill wins that much support, it will go nowhere in the Senate, Republicans concede.

Likewise, House Republicans on Friday relented on their opposition to a Senate-passed measure opening new territories off the Gulf Coast to oil drilling, with much of the royalty proceeds to be dedicated to Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Texas. That, too, will go on the expedited calendar, where it could be sunk by environmentalist lawmakers and Republicans who believe that the bill does not go nearly far enough to open up new frontiers for oil exploration.

Beyond that, there is little in the offing. Anguished over the Democrats' victory on Nov. 7 and the tumult that has followed, GOP lawmakers want to get out of town. One senior Senate Republican aide called hopes for substantive legislation "delusional."

Much of the problem is as prosaic as office space, GOP aides said. Lawmakers were forced to vacate their offices on Friday, and few of them want to hang around Washington with no place to sit. Retiring House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) got angry during a meeting of committee chairmen, demanding to know how he was supposed to complete work on the business tax extension bill without an office, according to one GOP aide present in the meeting.

And attendance is expected to be light. House Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.) may be crucial to passage of the offshore-oil-drilling bill, since he had led the charge to broaden the Senate's approach. But he may not have his heart in it, GOP leadership aides conceded. He was defeated on Nov. 7.

Besides, with committee assignments, chairmanships and ranking Republican posts up for grabs next week, there will be campaigns to run, presentations to make and alliances to form. Legislating may be far down the list of priorities.

Some members say they are willing to stick around, but with limits. "Most members feel we ought to stay in as long as we need to get done as much as we can do realistically," said Rep. Tom Price (R-Ga.). "If that's a week, fine. If that's four weeks, fine."

But what's realistic is very limited, and even the firebrands have turned into coldhearted realists.

"If we had a chance to make law before the Democrats took over, I'd be interested in sticking around. If we have the opportunity just to make a point, only to see the Senate stop it, I'm disinclined," Pence said. "The time for Pyrrhic victories has passed."

Revival Of Tax Breaks Tied To Lame-duck Session (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

Millions of entrepreneurs, teachers and parents with children in college have a financial stake in whether Congress, in the waning hours of Republican rule, revives tax breaks that expired 11 months ago.

If Congress fails to act, teachers no longer will be able to deduct up to $250 for the books and supplies they pay for out of their own pockets.

Residents of Alaska, Florida, Nevada, South Dakota, Texas, Washington and Wyoming -- each without an income tax -- will miss out on an average $1,500 deduction for state and local sales taxes.

Lawmakers have tried all year to renew the diverse mix of targeted tax breaks. The breaks, which expired Jan. 1, enjoy wide support in both parties. Precisely because of this support, lawmakers have sought to add them as a "sweetener" to contentious legislation in hopes of getting that legislation through.

Before the election, Republicans tried unsuccessfully to link the tax cuts to a bill that would reduce the estate tax. Most Democrats find that bill unacceptable.

DOJ_NMG_0101162

Lawmakers will take one more shot at the tax bill when they return this week to wrap up their work for the year, but they might not have the time or the will to agree on a compromise.

Aides in both the House and the Senate said a deal is possible, with prospects best if the tax bill is not combined with other measures.

Negotiators say they have agreed that the proposal will cover two years, retroactive to 2006 and through 2007.

Businesses could be big losers if Congress fails to renew the research-and-development tax credit, which offers a 20 percent credit for new activities. One estimate puts the value of the credit to businesses at $16.5 billion.

"There are some expenditures by the U.S. government that should really be called investments," William Archey, head of the American Electronics Association, said recently.

Also important, said Philip Beram, chief tax counsel with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, are provisions that allow employers to claim a tax credit of up to $3,500 for the first year of a worker who received public welfare for an extended time. Businesses also benefit from the provision allowing people from the seven states without income taxes to deduct state and local sales taxes.

The Internal Revenue Service said that on 2004 returns, 11.1 million taxpayers in those states claimed $17.3 billion in deductions from state and local sales taxes.

Also in 2004, an estimated 4.7 million families claimed $10.7 billion in deductions for college tuition and fees. In the legislation that Congress failed to pass before the November election, taxpayers could claim above-the-line deductions of up to $4,000, depending on their income, for higher-education expenses.

In 2004, the full deduction was available to a taxpayer earning up to $65,000, or $130,000 for a couple filing jointly. A person earning up to $80,000, or $160,000 for a couple, could claim up to $2,000.

Meanwhile, 3.4 million teachers took advantage of the $250 deduction for personal costs incurred to purchase supplies for their classrooms.

McConnell's Unlikely Role Models (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Ask Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky to name his role models for his responsibilities as Senate minority leader in the next Congress, and the answer is surprising. "Mike Mansfield and George Mitchell," he replied the other day. "I know they're both Democrats, but I admire the way they ran things here."

Mansfield, who was Senate majority leader from 1961 to 1977, took over from Lyndon Johnson and, as McConnell noted, erased Johnson's almost-dictatorial regime and substituted a much more collegial style. Mitchell, who was majority leader from 1989 to 1995, brought down from Maine the studied, judicious approach he had learned as a federal judge.

Both men were effective leaders of their party but were notable also for their willingness to reach across party lines to accomplish legislative goals. Mansfield allowed Everett McKinley Dirksen, his Republican counterpart, to claim most of the credit for the civil rights bills of the 1960s, and he famously began his days by sharing breakfast in the Senate dining room with his close friend George Aiken, the Republican senator from Vermont. Mitchell as majority leader engineered bipartisan agreements on the savings and loan bailout, a minimum wage increase, a major clean air bill and far-reaching immigration reform -- all while Republicans held the White House.

Mansfield and Mitchell shared one other trait. Both were intensely aware of the special role of the Senate and its place in the Constitution. Neither was in any way deferential to the president. Mansfield challenged President Johnson publicly and repeatedly on his Vietnam policy, and Mitchell was often a thorn in the side of President George H.W. Bush.

When McConnell was asked, during a visit to The Post last week, what obligation he felt toward the current President Bush, he replied, "I was elected by Senate Republicans, and they are the ones to whom I am responsible." While emphasizing that he was in "philosophical agreement" with the president, he clearly sees his role differently than did his predecessor, retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee.

Frist was installed in the leadership job with major help from the Bush White House and often appeared to be more the president's liaison to the Senate than the Senate's leader.

McConnell is in the odd -- and potentially awkward -- position of having his wife, Elaine Chao, serving as secretary of labor in the president's Cabinet. But he is much more a creature of the Senate than Frist was, and he seems determined to set his own course.

In the interview, McConnell repeatedly stressed his belief that divided government -- a Democratic Congress confronting a Republican president -- need not produce gridlock. He cited a wide range of issues, from raising the minimum wage to revising ethics rules to immigration and Social Security reform, where he sees good prospects of legislative agreement.

In judging these words, realists will quickly note McConnell's reputation as a hard-nosed politician and crafty campaign tactician. No one who knows him doubts that high on his agenda is overthrowing the Democrats' shaky two-seat majority in the 2008 Senate elections so that he can become majority leader.

McConnell is no reformer. He has fought Sen. John McCain and other campaign-finance legislation supporters who have tried to rein in fundraising by members of Congress. Earlier this fall the Lexington Herald-Leader described in a lengthy series of investigative reports how McConnell has raised nearly $220 million for himself and other Republicans and how he has served the interests of those who furnished the money.

Cigarette makers, coal mine operators, casinos and a welter of others have found him with hand out, ready to listen to their legislative needs.

But the same practicality that drives his politics may make him a willing partner in dealmaking that can move bills to passage in the closely divided Senate. He is well aware of the power he will wield, with 49 votes, in a Senate where Democrats will have to find help across the aisle to pass any controversial bills.

He will undoubtedly block them on some issues, but he is smart enough to recognize the risks if he is solely an obstructionist for the next two years.

When you think of notable Senate leaders, you don't automatically think of "Three M's" -- Mansfield, Mitchell and McConnell. But if Mitch McConnell makes that linkage in his own mind, it's not a bad start.

He's The Worst Ever (WP)

By Eric Foner

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Ever since 1948, when Harvard professor Arthur Schlesinger Sr. asked 55 historians to rank U.S. presidents on a scale from "great" to "failure," such polls have been a favorite pastime for those of us who study the American past.

Changes in presidential rankings reflect shifts in how we view history. When the first poll was taken, the Reconstruction era that followed the Civil War was regarded as a time of corruption and misgovernment caused by granting black men the right to vote. As a result, President Andrew Johnson, a fervent white supremacist who opposed efforts to extend basic rights to former slaves, was rated "near great." Today, by contrast, scholars consider Reconstruction a flawed but noble attempt to build an interracial democracy from the ashes of slavery -- and Johnson a flat failure.

More often, however, the rankings display a remarkable year-to-year uniformity. Abraham Lincoln, George Washington and Franklin D. Roosevelt always figure in the "great" category. Most presidents are ranked "average" or, to put it less charitably, mediocre. Johnson, Franklin Pierce, James Buchanan, Warren G. Harding, Calvin Coolidge and Richard M. Nixon occupy the bottom rung, and now President Bush is a leading contender to join them. A look at history, as well as Bush's policies, explains why.

At a time of national crisis, Pierce and Buchanan, who served in the eight years preceding the Civil War, and Johnson, who followed it, were simply not up to the job. Stubborn, narrow-minded, unwilling to listen to criticism or to consider alternatives to disastrous mistakes, they surrounded themselves with sycophants and shaped their policies to appeal to retrogressive political forces (in that era, pro-slavery and racist ideologues). Even after being repudiated in the midterm elections of 1854, 1858 and 1866, respectively, they ignored major currents of public opinion and clung to flawed policies. Bush's presidency certainly brings theirs to mind.

Harding and Coolidge are best remembered for the corruption of their years in office (1921-23 and 1923-29, respectively) and for channeling money and favors to big business. They slashed income and corporate taxes and supported employers' campaigns to eliminate unions. Members of their administrations received kickbacks and bribes from lobbyists and businessmen. "Never before, here or anywhere else," declared the Wall Street Journal, "has a government been so completely fused with business." The Journal could hardly have anticipated the even worse cronyism, corruption and pro-business bias of the Bush administration.

Despite some notable accomplishments in domestic and foreign policy, Nixon is mostly associated today with disdain for the Constitution and abuse of presidential power. Obsessed with secrecy and media leaks, he viewed every critic as a threat to national security and illegally spied on U.S. citizens. Nixon considered himself above the law.

Bush has taken this disdain for law even further. He has sought to strip people accused of crimes of rights that date as far back as the Magna Carta in Anglo-American jurisprudence: trial by impartial jury, access to lawyers and knowledge of evidence against them. In dozens of statements when signing legislation, he has asserted the right to ignore the parts of laws with which he disagrees. His administration has adopted policies regarding the treatment of prisoners of war that have disgraced the nation and alienated virtually the entire world. Usually, during wartime, the Supreme Court has refrained from passing judgment on presidential actions related to national defense. The court's unprecedented rebukes of Bush's policies on detainees indicate how far the administration has strayed from the rule of law.

One other president bears comparison to Bush: James K. Polk. Some historians admire him, in part because he made their job easier by keeping a detailed diary during his administration, which spanned the years of the Mexican-American War. But Polk should be remembered primarily for launching that unprovoked attack on Mexico and seizing one-third of its territory for the United States.

Lincoln, then a member of Congress from Illinois, condemned Polk for misleading Congress and the public about the cause of the war -- an alleged Mexican incursion into the United States. Accepting the president's right to attack another country "whenever he shall deem it necessary," Lincoln observed, would make it impossible to "fix any limit" to his power to make war. Today, one wishes that the country had heeded Lincoln's warning.

Historians are loath to predict the future. It is impossible to say with certainty how Bush will be ranked in, say, 2050. But somehow, in his first six years in office he has managed to combine the lapses of leadership, misguided policies and abuse of power of his failed predecessors. I think there is no alternative but to rank him as the worst president in U.S. history.

He's Only Fifth Worst (WP)

By Michael Lind

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

It's unfair to claim that George W. Bush is the worst president of all time. He's merely the fifth worst. In the White House Hall of Shame, Bush comes behind four other Oval Officers whose policies were even more disastrous: James Buchanan, Andrew Johnson, Richard M. Nixon and James Madison.

What makes a president horribly, immortally bad? Poor luck is not enough. Some of the greatest presidents, such as Abraham Lincoln and Franklin D. Roosevelt, have inherited crises and risen to the occasion. The damage must be largely self-inflicted. And there's another test: The damage to the nation must be substantial. Minor blunders and petty crimes do not land a president in the rogues' gallery.

Doing nothing can be even worse than doing something wrong. Take the worst president of all time, Buchanan. In office when Lincoln's election in 1860 triggered the secession of one Southern state after another, Buchanan sat by as the country crumbled. In his December 1860 message to Congress, three months before Lincoln was inaugurated, he declared that the states had no right to secede, but that the federal government had no right to stop them. By the time he left office, seven states had left the Union, and the Confederates had looted the arsenals in the South. If Buchanan had exercised his powers as commander in chief, the rebels might have been stopped at far less than the eventual cost of the Civil War -- more than half a million American dead and the ruin of the South for generations. (After he left the White House, Buchanan explained that he did not stop secession for fear that hostile blacks would overrun the North.)

The Civil War era also gave us the second-worst president: Johnson, Lincoln's vice president and successor, a Tennessean who vetoed civil rights acts and blocked the 14th Amendment because he didn't like blacks, of whom he declared, "It is vain to deny that they are an inferior race -- very far inferior to the European variety." Johnson's policies led to his impeachment and forced the Republicans in Congress to create a quasi-parliamentary system marginalizing the president. While Lincoln had his own racial prejudices, he was a model of enlightenment next to Johnson and Buchanan.

The third-worst president is Nixon, a criminal in the White House who is still the only commander in chief ever to resign. Many presidents have abused their power, and the "imperial presidency" existed long before Nixon. But he was the only president to run a criminal gang out of the Oval Office engaging in spying and burglary while he sought to corrupt the Justice Department, the FBI and the CIA. (By contrast, Bush's misguided authorization of torture, secret CIA prisons and illegal eavesdropping were at least directed at suspected terrorists, not at his personal and political opponents.)

The damage Nixon inflicted might have endured had he established the principle that the president is above the law. As he told David Frost in a famous 1977 television interview, "Well, when the president does it, that means that it is not illegal." Because of the exposure of Nixon's criminality during Watergate, we still live in a constitutional republic rather than a banana republic with an elective dictatorship.

Refusing to enforce the law while the country disintegrates, trying to re-enslave emancipated blacks, and doubling as chief magistrate and gangster -- what could rival these presidential misdeeds? Well, how about unnecessary and catastrophic wars?

To qualify a president for the Worst of All Time list, a war must be catastrophic as well as unnecessary. Ronald Reagan's invasion of Grenada, George H.W. Bush's invasion of Panama and Bill Clinton's invasion of Haiti don't cut it -- they were unnecessary, but minor. And presidents can be forgiven costly wars that were necessary or hard to avoid, such as Harry S. Truman's stalemated war in Korea and Lyndon B. Johnson's failed war in Vietnam, each of which was a Cold War battle more than a separate conflict. After 1950, U.S. strategy required Washington to go to war to prevent Soviet bloc proxies from taking over South Korea, Indochina and Taiwan -- the amazing thing is that the Cold War ended without a battle for Taiwan, too. Future historians are likely to be as kind to LBJ as they have been to Truman.

The two big, unjustified wars on my list are the War of 1812 and the current conflict in Iraq, and the first was far worse than the second. Madison, the "Father of the Constitution," was a great patriot, a brilliant intellectual -- and an absolutely abysmal president. In his defense, the world situation during the Napoleonic Wars was grim. The United States was a minor neutral nation that was frequently harassed by both of the warring empires, Britain and France. But cold geopolitics should have led Washington to prefer a British victory, which would have preserved a balance of power in Europe, to a French victory that would have left France an unchecked superpower. Instead, eager to conquer Spanish Florida and seize British Canada, Madison sided with the more dangerous power against the less dangerous. It is as though, after Pearl Harbor, FDR had joined the Axis and declared war on Britain, France and the Soviet Union.

It might have been worse. In 1812, Madison wrote Thomas Jefferson to ask what the former president thought of waging war simultaneously against Britain and France. Alarmed, Jefferson replied that this was "a solecism worthy of Don Quixote." Instead, the United States fought only the British, who torched Washington, D.C., while Madison and first lady Dolley fled to Virginia. Gen. Andrew Jackson's victory in the Battle of New Orleans (waged two weeks after the United States and Britain, unknown to Jackson, had signed a peace treaty) helped Americans pretend that the War of 1812 was something other than a total wipe-out.

By contrast, George W. Bush has inadvertently destroyed only Baghdad, not Washington, and the costs of the Iraq war in blood and treasure are far less than those of Korea and Vietnam. Yet he will be remembered for the Iraq conflict for generations, long after tax-cut-driven deficits, No Child Left Behind and comprehensive immigration reform are forgotten. The fact that Bush followed the invasion of Afghanistan, which had sheltered al-Qaeda, with the toppling of Saddam Hussein, will puzzle historians for centuries. It is as though, after Japan had bombed Pearl Harbor, FDR had asked Congress to declare war on Argentina.

Why did Bush do it? Did he really believe that Hussein had weapons of mass destruction? Was it about oil? Israel? Revenge for Hussein's alleged attempt on Bush's father's life? The war will join the sinking of the USS Maine and the grassy knoll among the topics to exercise conspiracy theorists for generations, and the photos of torture at Abu Ghraib will join images of the napalmed Vietnamese girl and executed Filipino rebels in the gallery of U.S. atrocities.

Like all presidents, George W. Bush wants to be remembered. He will get his wish -- as the fifth-worst president in U.S. history.

Move Over, Hoover (WP)

By Douglas Brinkley

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Shortly after Thanksgiving I had dinner in California with Ronald Reagan's best biographer, Lou Cannon. Like many historians these days, we discussed whether George W. Bush is, conceivably, the worst U.S. president ever. Cannon bristled at the idea.

Bush has two more years to leave his mark, he argued. What if there is a news flash that U.S. Special Forces have killed Osama bin Laden or that North Korea has renounced its nuclear program? What if a decade from now Iraq is a democracy and a statue of Bush is erected on Firdaus Square where that famously toppled one of Saddam Hussein once stood?

There is wisdom in Cannon's prudence. Clearly it's dangerous for historians to wield the "worst president" label like a scalp-hungry tomahawk simply because they object to Bush's record. But we live in speedy times and, the truth is, after six years in power and barring a couple of miracles, it's safe to bet that Bush will be forever handcuffed to the bottom rungs of the presidential ladder. The reason: Iraq.

Some presidents, such as Bill Clinton and John F. Kennedy, are political sailors -- they tack with the wind, reaching difficult policy objectives through bipartisan maneuvering and pulse-taking. Franklin D. Roosevelt, for example, was deemed a "chameleon on plaid," changing colors regularly to control the zeitgeist of the moment. Other presidents are submariners, refusing to zigzag in rough waters, preferring to go from Point A to Point B with directional certitude. Harry S. Truman and Reagan are exemplars of this modus operandi, and they are the two presidents Bush has tried to emulate.

The problem for Bush is that certitude is only a virtue if the policy enacted is proven correct. Most Americans applaud Truman's dropping of bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki because they achieved the desired effect: Japan surrendered. Reagan's anti-communist zeal -- including increased defense budgets and Star Wars -- is only now perceived as positive because the Soviet Union started to unravel on his watch.

Nobody has accused Bush of flinching. After 9/11, he decided to circumvent the United Nations and declare war on Iraq. The principal pretext was that Baghdad supposedly was stockpiling weapons of mass destruction. From the get-go, the Iraq war was a matter of choice. Call it Mr. Bush's War. Like a high-stakes poker player pushing in all his chips on one hand, he bet the credibility of the United States on the notion that Sunnis and Shiites wanted democracy, just like the Poles and the Czechs during the Cold War.

Bush wasn't operating in a historical bubble. Other presidents had gambled on wars of choice and won. James K. Polk, for example, begged Gen. Zachary Taylor to start a border war with Mexico along the Rio Grande. An ardent expansionist, he wanted to annex land in what are now Arizona, California and New Mexico. Nearly half of the American population in 1846 screamed foul, including Henry David Thoreau, who refused to pay taxes for an unjust war. Yet in short order, Polk achieved his land-grab objective with a string of stunning military successes. Mr. Polk's War was a success, even if the pretext was immoral. On virtually every presidential rating poll, Polk is deemed a "near great" president.

Half a century later, William McKinley also launched a war of choice based on the bogus notion that the USS Maine, anchored in Cuba, had been sabotaged by Spain. The Maine, in truth, was crippled by a boiler explosion. An imperialist, McKinley used the Maine as a pretext to fight Spain in the Caribbean and in the Philippines. A group of anti-imperialists led by Mark Twain and William James, among others, vehemently objected, rightfully accusing McKinley of warmongering. But McKinley had the last word in what his secretary of state, John Hay, deemed "a splendid little war." In just six months, McKinley had achieved his objectives. History chalks up Mr. McKinley's War as a U.S. win, and he also polls favorably as a "near great" president.

Mr. Bush's War, by contrast, has not gone well. When you don't achieve a stealth-like victory in a war of choice, then you're seen as being stuck in a quagmire. Already the United States has fought longer in the Iraq war than in World War II. As the death toll continues to rise, more and more Americans are objecting. The pending Democratic takeover of Congress is only one manifestation of the spiraling disapproval of Bush.

At first, you'd want to compare Bush's Iraq predicament to that of Lyndon B. Johnson during the Vietnam War. But LBJ had major domestic accomplishments to boast about when leaving the White House, such as the Civil Rights Act and Medicare/Medicaid. Bush has virtually none. Look at how he dealt with the biggest post-9/11 domestic crisis of his tenure. He didn't rush to help the Gulf region after Hurricane Katrina because the country was overextended in Iraq and had a massive budget deficit. Texas conservatives always say that LBJ's biggest mistake was thinking that he could fund both the Great Society and Vietnam. They believe he had to choose one or the other. They call Johnson fiscally irresponsible. Bush learned this lesson: He chose Iraq over New Orleans.

So Bush's legacy hinges on Iraq, which is an unmitigated disaster. Instead of being forgiven, like Polk and McKinley, for his phony pretext for war (WMD and al-Qaeda operatives in Baghdad), he stands to be lambasted by future scholars. What once were his two best sound bites -- "Wanted dead or alive" and "Mission accomplished" -- will be used like billy clubs to shatter his legacy every time it gets a revisionist lift. The left will keep battering him for warmongering while the right will remember its outrage that he didn't send enough battalions to Iraq.

There isn't much that Bush can do now to salvage his reputation. His presidential library will someday be built around two accomplishments: that after 9/11, the U.S. homeland wasn't again attacked by terrorists (knock on wood) and that he won two presidential elections, allowing him to appoint conservatives to key judicial posts. I also believe that he is an honest man and that his administration has been largely void of widespread corruption. This will help him from being portrayed as a true villain.

This last point is crucial. Though Bush may be viewed as a laughingstock, he won't have the zero-integrity factors that have kept Nixon and Harding at the bottom in the presidential sweepstakes. Oddly, the president whom Bush most reminds me of is Herbert Hoover, whose name is synonymous with failure to respond to the Great Depression. When the stock market collapsed, Hoover, for ideological reasons, did too little. When 9/11 happened, Bush did too much, attacking the wrong country at the wrong time for the wrong reasons. He has joined Hoover as a case study on how not to be president.

At Least He's Not Nixon (WP)

By David Greenberg

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

In 1950, President Harry S. Truman was under fire for "losing" China to communist forces, engaging in deficit spending and seeking to expand unemployment insurance. Harold E. Stassen, a prominent Republican, blasted him as "the worst president ever to occupy the White House."

Four years later, under Dwight D. Eisenhower, job growth had slowed and wages were down. West Virginia Sen. Matthew M. Neely declared Ike "the worst president in United States history."

In 1973, as Richard M. Nixon foundered amid the worsening Watergate scandal, crippling stagflation and increasing social strife, labor leader George Meany asserted, "He will go down in history as one of our worst presidents."

Six years into Ronald Reagan's presidency, the Iran-contra scandal broke and his approval ratings fell into the 40s. Ted Sorensen, who was a speechwriter for John F. Kennedy, suggested that Reagan could well be remembered "as one of our worst presidents."

Considering these moments from history, how likely is it that George W. Bush, as many now assert, is our all-time worst president? Yes, many of us can easily tick off our own lists of Bush policies that we believe have done the United States significant harm. But any declarations that history will consign him to the bottom tier of presidents are premature. As the now-flourishing reputations of Truman, Eisenhower and Reagan attest, the antipathy a president elicits from his contemporaries usually fades over time.

And as Nixon's still-dismal reputation also attests, in the contest for the dubious title of "worst president," Bush faces stiff competition.

Comparisons of presidents across different eras are typically the stuff of parlor games, not serious historical study. But if anyone can be said to deserve the mantle of the worst, it's Nixon. Indeed, looking at his disastrous presidency may help put Bush's failures in perspective.

Like Bush, Nixon fancied himself a "wartime" president in the manner of Franklin D. Roosevelt and therefore entitled to deference in the face of a national emergency -- a view at odds with how most Americans see these controversial, far-off conflicts. And while the oft-cited analogies between the Vietnam and Iraq wars tend to be glib, each conflict has significantly determined its president's reputation. Like Nixon, Bush has heeded Henry Kissinger's advice not to withdraw from a quagmire, preferring to brand critics cowards or traitors. Like Nixon, Bush has also sought to conceal from the public the full scope of the U.S. commitment. Under blanket assertions of "national security" meant to end public debate, he has used Nixonian wiretapping to achieve his ends. These decisions will surely stain his legacy.

But can we conclude that Bush's war policy is worse than Nixon's? However toxic the fallout from Iraq, it's hard to imagine that it could greatly exceed the damage wrought by Vietnam, the wounds from which are still raw 30 years later, as its role in the 2004 presidential election showed. (On the other hand, Nixon can't be blamed for starting his war, whereas Bush initiated his -- albeit with substantial backing from Democrats.) Bush's view of power and his iron-fisted manner of governance also come from the Nixon playbook. Karl Rove, who headed the College Republicans during Watergate, sought to complete Nixon's mission of building a permanent Republican majority. In Nixonian fashion, the Bush-Rove strategy has been to use bullying to stifle opposition: demonizing the news media, discrediting policy experts, disdaining the separation of powers. Bush's theory of a "unitary" executive power is little more than a restatement of a Nixon utterance: "When the president does it, that means that it is not illegal."

But again, if Bush has given Nixon good chase when it comes to undemocratic hardball politics, he hasn't surpassed the master. Nixon's belief in the inherent legality of his own actions led him to authorize burglaries and approve criminal acts -- paying hush money, trying to get the CIA to lie to the FBI -- to thwart the Watergate investigation. And these were only the most well-known and well-documented of the counts against him in the articles of impeachment approved by the House Judiciary Committee in 1974.

While Nixon had his diehard defenders, something close to a national consensus emerged over the idea that his crimes were unprecedented and required his removal from office. Barry Goldwater conservatives and Lowell Weicker Republicans, libertarians and liberals, Main Streeters and Wall Streeters all agreed that Nixon was, if not necessarily the worst president in U.S. history, deserving of the most extreme reprimand ever visited on a commander in chief. Instead of being impeached and removed from office, Nixon resigned.

No such consensus exists for a Bush impeachment. On the contrary, in this fall's election campaign, Democrats pointedly quashed any talk of seeking his ouster if they were to win control of Congress. One can argue that Bush's sanctioning of illegal wiretapping by the National Security Agency constitutes an impeachable offense. His policy of depriving suspected terrorists and POWs of Geneva Convention protections may also strike some people as grounds for removal -- although Congress, by acquiescing in Bush's military detention policy last fall, made the latter argument a tougher sell.

Either way, judgments about the impeachability of Bush for such offenses are far less clear than those rendered in 1974 about Nixon's law-breaking. Many presidents skirt the edges of unconstitutionality. Only Nixon transgressed it so blatantly that impeachment became, to use a Bush-era phrase, a slam dunk.

Bush has two years left in his presidency and we don't know what they'll hold. They may be as dismal as the first six. Future investigations may bear out many people's worst fears about this administration's violations of civil liberties. And it's conceivable that the consequences of the invasion of Iraq may prove more destructive than those of Nixon's stubborn continuation of the Vietnam War. Should those things happen, Bush will be able to lay a claim to the mantle of U.S. history's worst president. For now, though, I'm sticking with Dick.

Time's On His Side (WP)

By Vincent J. Cannato

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

After the 2004 election, a number of terribly depressed people at my university told me what a shame it was that President Bush had been reelected. If only people knew history, they lamented, they would never have voted for him.

It must be a comforting thought that this abstract thing called "history" can give us the wisdom to choose the right president, as if history books were Ouija boards and historians were modern-day oracles.

Certainly, some historians see themselves that way. In early 2004, just three years into the Bush administration, an "informal, unscientific survey of historians" by the History News Network found that more than 80 percent believed that the president was already a failure. And a miserable one at that.

Earlier this year, Princeton University historian Sean Wilentz took to the pages of Rolling Stone to ponder whether Bush is the "worst president in history" and concluded that he "appears headed for colossal historical disgrace."

So, case closed? Not yet. I long ago learned to look with suspicion when members of the left-leaning historical profession delve into contemporary politics or profess near unanimity. Today's pronouncements that Bush is the "worst president ever" are too often ideology masquerading as history.

Historical and popular judgments about presidents are always in flux. Dwight D. Eisenhower used to be considered a banal and lazy chief executive who embodied the "conformist" 1950s. Today, his reputation has improved because of more positive appraisals of his Cold War stewardship. Ronald Reagan, whom many historians dismissed as an amiable dunce, has also had his stock rise. On the flip side, Bill Clinton's presidency looks somewhat different after Monica Lewinsky, the bursting of the dot-com bubble and 9/11 than it did in 1997.

Perhaps Bush can take solace in the case of Harry S. Truman, who was reviled at the end of his presidency, with approval numbers hovering around 30 percent. Too liberal for conservatives and too conservative for liberals, Truman was saddled with an unpopular stalemate in the Korean War and accusations of corruption at home. Many saw him as a belligerent rube, too unsophisticated for the White House.

Today, however, many historians have revised their estimate of his presidency upward. There certainly are echoes of Truman in the current carping about Bush.

Most clearly, the Iraq war colors every judgment about Bush these days -- and increasingly, that color is dark. Weakened by the conflict, the administration is now stymied on challenges such as North Korea and Iran. And while focusing most of its energies on terrorism and Iraq, the Bush administration -- for which I worked briefly as a speechwriter in 2001 -- has been less energetic on the domestic front. Attempts at entitlement reform and tax reform have stalled, as has immigration reform. But there have been domestic policy successes: tax cuts, the No Child Left Behind Act, the prescription drug plan and housing policies that have expanded home ownership. All have their critics, but they represent some semblance of a domestic policy.

Any appraisal of Bush's record must consider that he took over in difficult times. By most objective measures, the economy is doing well: Inflation, interest rates and unemployment are low, economic growth is steady, and the stock market is climbing. Complaints about income inequality are legitimate, but the issue has long-term structural roots, and neither party has done much to address it.

What is disheartening is the tendency of many historians to rate presidents based on their support for liberal social policies. Just as frustrating is the inability to acknowledge the deep debates over law enforcement measures, such as the USA Patriot Act, enacted after 9/11. Rather than acknowledge the tough tradeoffs between security and privacy, we are left with the hyperbole that this administration is "trampling on civil liberties." Sometimes wisely and sometimes rashly, Bush has steered the nation through the post-9/11 world. It has been an uneven trip so far, but the country has not suffered another attack in more than five years.

Much of Bush's legacy will rest on the future trajectory of the fight against terrorism, the nation's continued security and the evolving direction of the Middle East. Things may look grim today, but that doesn't ensure a grim future.

No one expects historians to be perfectly objective. But history should at least teach us humility. Time will cool today's political passions. As years pass, more documents will be released, more insights gleaned and the broader picture of this era will be painted. Only then will we begin to see how George W. Bush fares in the pantheon of U.S. presidents.

I don't know how history will judge him. My guess is that, like most presidents, he will bequeath a mixed record. We can debate policies and actions now, but honesty should force us to acknowledge that real judgments will have to wait.

Conflict Management (WP)

By Joel Achenbach

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

The columnist George Will recently wrote that the Republicans were routed in the November elections because of "war leadership even worse than during the War of 1812." Mr. Will's words carry great weight, because he is among our leading conservative thinkers and was on record opposing both the Iraq war and the War of 1812 from the beginning.

But let's be frank: Most of us don't know anything about the War of 1812 other than the approximate date and the fact that one of the two sides was probably the United States of America (because why else would we have heard of it?). Let me divulge details of this conflict, so that the next time the War of 1812 comes up at a party, you'll be so knowledgeable that the other partygoers will refer to you as the War of 1812 Expert, which will, in turn, make you the object of feverish sexual fantasies.

Our opponent, or perhaps "enemy" is the technical term, was Great Britain. Perversely, the War of 1812 also took place in 1813, 1814 and early 1815, and thus should really be called the "War of 1812ish."

The war was arguably unnecessary. At the very least, it was an optional war, a war of choice -- if you can imagine such a thing. We'd fought the enemy before, and won, but somehow got the notion that we needed to fight the enemy again. The British were hardly blameless -- they had a nasty habit of kidnapping our sailors -- but the "war hawks" in America greatly exaggerated the threat posed by the enemy.

The fools.

How bad was our war management? Well, until recently there were three levels of wartime incompetence: Bad, Very Bad and War of 1812 Bad. Contemplate the fact that, in August 1814, the very refined first lady of the United States was forced to flee the White House and spend the night on the lam, hauled by carriage on dark country roads and finally deposited in a tavern to be hectored by fellow refugees from Washington.

Dolley Madison was, in truth, a hero, having stuck it out at the White House to the last possible moment (and having saved the famous portrait of a grim, humorless George Washington). Not so brilliant was the performance of the general assigned to protect the capital, William Winder, who had a gift for dithering around and running away. Historian Henry Adams wrote, "When he might have prepared defences, he acted as scout; when he might have fought, he still scouted; when he retreated, he retreated in the wrong direction; when he fought, he thought only of retreat; and whether scouting, retreating, or fighting, he never betrayed an idea."

Our leaders lacked a winnable strategy. Worse, they failed to anticipate what might go wrong. (The mind reels.) As British ships sailed up the Chesapeake Bay, someone warned the commander of the Army, John Armstrong Jr., that the Brits might sack Washington. "No, no! Baltimore is the place, sir; that is of so much more consequence," Armstrong responded. He never bothered to erect a single battery to protect the capital, not even a sign saying "Keep Out" or "Bad Dog."

We fought the war without enough troops. (!) We relied mostly on militiamen, which is to say, farmers with hunting rifles. A British officer described them as "country-people, who would have been much more appropriately employed in attending to their agricultural occupations than in standing with muskets in their hands."

His forces smashed, Winder retreated past the capital, deep into Montgomery County, and would have kept going to the Pacific if his men had not been exhausted.

President James Madison, more suited to desk work (he helped write a little thing we call the Constitution), did his best to gallop around the front lines to avert catastrophe, but he finally fled to the country, while the British marched into Washington, ate all the food on his dining room table, drank his wine and burned down his house. That wasn't the rocket's red glare that lighted up the sky; that was his furniture on fire.

"Before midnight the flames of three great conflagrations made the whole country light," Adams wrote, "and from the distant hills of Maryland and Virginia the flying President and Cabinet caught glimpses of the ruin their incompetence had caused."

That's rock bottom. That's what we mean by War of 1812 Bad. And maybe in a few years, historians will be able to tell us if there's a new standard.

Has He Started Talking To The Walls? (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

IT turns out we've been reading the wrong Bob Woodward book to understand what's going on with President Bush. The text we should be consulting instead is "The Final Days," the Woodward-Bernstein account of Richard Nixon talking to the portraits on the White House walls while Watergate demolished his presidency. As Mr. Bush has ricocheted from Vietnam to Latvia to Jordan in recent weeks, we've witnessed the troubling behavior of a president who isn't merely in a state of denial but is completely untethered from reality. It's not that he can't handle the truth about Iraq. He doesn't know what the truth is.

The most startling example was his insistence that Al Qaeda is primarily responsible for the country's spiraling violence. Only a week before Mr. Bush said this, the American military spokesman on the scene, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, called Al Qaeda "extremely disorganized" in Iraq, adding that "I would question at this point how effective they are at all at the state level." Military intelligence estimates that Al Qaeda makes up only 2 percent to 3 percent of the enemy forces in Iraq, according to Jim Miklaszewski of NBC News. The bottom line: America has a commander in chief who can't even identify some 97 percent to 98 percent of the combatants in a war that has gone on longer than our involvement in World War II.

But that's not the half of it. Mr. Bush relentlessly refers to Iraq's "unity government" though it is not unified and can only nominally govern. (In Henry Kissinger's accurate recent formulation, Iraq is not even a nation "in the historic sense.") After that pseudo-government's prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, brushed him off in Amman, the president nonetheless declared him "the right guy for Iraq" the morning after. This came only a day after The Times's revelation of a secret memo by Mr. Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, judging Mr. Maliki either "ignorant of what is going on" in his own country or disingenuous or insufficiently capable of running a government. Not that it matters what Mr. Hadley writes when his boss is impervious to facts.

In truth the president is so out of it he wasn't even meeting with the right guy. No one doubts that the most powerful political leader in Iraq is the anti-American, pro-Hezbollah cleric Moktada al-Sadr, without whom Mr. Maliki would be on the scrap heap next to his short-lived predecessors, Ayad Allawi and Ibrahim al-Jaafari. Mr. Sadr's militia is far more powerful than the official Iraqi army that we've been helping to "stand up" at hideous cost all these years. If we're not going to take him out, as John McCain proposed this month, we might as well deal with him directly rather than with Mr. Maliki, his puppet. But our president shows few signs of recognizing Mr. Sadr's existence.

In his classic study, "The Great War and Modern Memory," Paul Fussell wrote of how World War I shattered and remade literature, for only a new language of irony could convey the trauma and waste. Under the auspices of Mr. Bush, the Iraq war is having a comparable, if different, linguistic impact: the more he loses his hold on reality, the more language is severed from its meaning altogether.

When the president persists in talking about staying until "the mission is complete" even though there is no definable military mission, let alone one that can be completed, he is indulging in pure absurdity. The same goes for his talk of "victory," another concept robbed of any definition when the prime minister we are trying to prop up is allied with Mr. Sadr, a man who wants Americans dead and has many scalps to prove it. The newest hollowed-out Bush word to mask the endgame in Iraq is "phase," as if the increasing violence were as transitional as the growing pains of a surly teenager. "Phase" is meant to drown out all the unsettling debate about two words the president doesn't want to hear, "civil war."

When news organizations, politicians and bloggers had their own civil war about the proper usage of that designation last week, it was highly instructive — but about America, not Iraq. The intensity of the squabble showed the corrosive effect the president's subversion of language has had on our larger culture. Iraq arguably passed beyond civil war months ago into what might more accurately be termed ethnic cleansing or chaos. That we were fighting over "civil war" at this late date was a reminder that wittingly or not, we have all taken to following Mr. Bush's lead in retreating from English as we once knew it.

It's been a familiar pattern for the news media, politicians and the public alike in the Bush era. It took us far too long to acknowledge that the "abuses" at Abu Ghraib and elsewhere might be more accurately called torture. And that the "manipulation" of prewar intelligence might be more accurately called lying. Next up is "pullback," the Iraq Study Group's reported euphemism to stave off the word "retreat" (if not retreat itself).

In the case of "civil war," it fell to a morning television anchor, Matt Lauer, to officially bless the term before the "Today" show moved on to such regular fare as an update on the Olsen twins. That juxtaposition of Iraq and post-pubescent eroticism was only too accurate a gauge of how much the word "war" itself has been drained of its meaning in America after years of waging a war that required no shared sacrifice. Whatever you want to label what's happening in Iraq, it has never impeded our freedom to dote on the Olsen twins.

I have not been one to buy into the arguments that Mr. Bush is stupid or is the sum of his "Bushisms" or is, as feverish Internet speculation periodically has it, secretly drinking again. I still don't. But I have believed he is a cynic — that he could always distinguish between truth and fiction even as he and Karl Rove sold us their fictions. That's why, when the president said that "absolutely, we're winning" in Iraq before the midterms, I just figured it was more of the same: another expedient lie to further his partisan political ends.

But that election has come and gone, and Mr. Bush is more isolated from the real world than ever. That's scary. Neither he nor his party has anything to gain politically by pretending that Iraq is not in crisis. Yet Mr. Bush clings to his delusions with a near-rage — watch him seethe in his press conference with Mr. Maliki — that can't be explained away by sheer stubbornness or misguided principles or a pat psychological theory. Whatever the reason, he is slipping into the same zone as Woodrow Wilson did when refusing to face the rejection of the League of Nations, as a sleepless L.B.J. did when micromanaging bombing missions in Vietnam, as Ronald Reagan did when checking out during Iran-Contra. You can understand why Jim Webb, the Virginia senator-elect with a son in Iraq, was tempted to slug the president at a White House reception for newly elected members of Congress. Mr. Bush asked "How's your boy?" But when Mr. Webb replied, "I'd like to get them out of Iraq," the president refused to so much as acknowledge the subject. Maybe a timely slug would have woken him up.

Or at least sounded an alarm. Some two years ago, I wrote that Iraq was Vietnam on speed, a quagmire for the MTV generation. Those jump cuts are accelerating now. The illusion that America can control events on the ground is just that: an illusion. As the list of theoretical silver bullets for Iraq grows longer (and more theoretical) by the day — special envoy, embedded military advisers, partition, outreach to Iran and Syria, Holbrooke, international conference, NATO — urgent decisions have to be made by a chief executive who is in touch with reality (or such is the minimal job description). Otherwise the events in Iraq will make the Decider's decisions for him, as indeed they are doing already.

The joke, history may note, is that even as Mr. Bush deludes himself that he is bringing "democracy" to Iraq, he is flouting democracy at home. American voters could not have delivered a clearer mandate on the war than they did on Nov. 7, but apparently elections don't register at the White House unless the voters dip their fingers in purple ink. Mr. Bush seems to think that the only decision he had to make was replacing Donald Rumsfeld and the mission of changing course would be accomplished.

Tell that to the Americans in Anbar Province. Back in August the chief of intelligence for the Marines filed a secret report — uncovered by Thomas Ricks of The Washington Post — concluding that American troops "are no longer capable of militarily defeating the insurgency in al-Anbar." That finding was confirmed in an intelligence update last month. Yet American troops are still being tossed into that maw, and at least 90 have been killed there since Labor Day, including five marines, ages 19 to 24, around Thanksgiving.

Civil war? Sectarian violence? A phase? This much is certain: The dead in Iraq don't give a damn what we call it.

Presidential Crisis Management (WP)

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

I think the American public is very forgiving. The admission that you were on the wrong track and you're changing works well in this country.

We've taken on companies when for one reason or another polls showed that regard for them wasn't very high. You have to change behavior and then communicate that change. The classic example is what Johnson & Johnson did in the Tylenol crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0101173

Six people in Chicago died after taking Tylenol that had been tampered with. The chief executive of Johnson & Johnson took charge of the crisis, and he followed a policy of being as transparent as he possibly could be to protect the public. He implemented a large-scale recall of Tylenol even though he wasn't forced to do it, because he thought it would give greater assurances to Tylenol consumers. The message: Johnson & Johnson is interested in your welfare and will do everything it can to protect you and the product it sells to you.

Another situation I worked on was when Coca-Cola changed its formula and introduced what's referred to now as "New Coke." The public just did not accept it. When the original Coke was reintroduced as Coca-Cola Classic, the president of the company went on television to apologize to the American people for his bad judgment, and Coca-Cola went on to post higher sales than before. It got a hole in one after the ball hit the tree.

The number one lesson for people in government and business: If something bad happens on your watch, the sooner and the more comprehensively you disclose it, the less likely you will be to suffer from it.

Harold Burson,

founder and chairman of the public relations firm Burson Marsteller

The president should prepare America to compassionately welcome all of our troops now in harm's way as they return home, and advocate a plan to help them reenter private life. Soldiers depart to bands playing and colors flying; they return to national silence. He also needs to find those three or four key areas where he can agree with the new Congress and push for legislation that unites the country. In both of these tasks, he must avoid business school solutions. Very few of the solutions our country needs are productively measurable or usefully countable. Besides, we are suffering through one of the worst eras in our history regarding business leadership and ethics. Could Bush even find an executive free of back-dated options? Business and government are very different, and must remain so.

James E. Lukaszewski, crisis management consultant

What the president should be focusing on right now is saying, "I've had some wins, I've had some losses. What do I want to accomplish for the American people? I know I'm taking a risk in Iraq and Iran and Afghanistan. But here are two or three smaller initiatives that will help the American people." What better way than to get the first lady involved? Laura Bush is still incredibly popular in this country -- getting her more involved in domestic initiatives (such as health care) would be extremely important for his legacy.

Mike Paul,

"The Reputation Doctor" blog

The first two rules of crisis management are: 1) Think clearly; and 2) Take the pain. Think clearly means define the problem to be solved, and understand the consequences of doing nothing, doing something and doing something more. Take the pain means doing what has to be done when it can do you the most good, whether you like it or not.

George W. Bush's presidency risks being defined by his failure to think clearly or to take the pain. From Abu Ghraib (silence followed by dissembling, allowing adversaries to define us) to Hurricane Katrina (delay, denial and delusion) to Iraq (insisting things are fine when they're not), this president has allowed wishful thinking to define his reaction to crises. If he is to have any chance of turning his presidency around, he'll need to follow Winston Churchill's advice: You must look at the facts, for the facts are looking at you.

Helio Fred Garcia,

crisis communications consultant

It's surprising that in the face of the Iraq crisis, the president hasn't embraced time-tested strategies to better manage public expectations or to speak to the fears that attentive audiences are feeling. I think this president has a lingering problem from Hurricane Katrina -- that is, that he is seen as slow to take ownership of thorny problems. Let the American people know that he is absolutely, completely and totally responsible for the prosecution, effects and outcome of the war in Iraq. No question.

Restate the war's objectives and why it is still relevant to Americans and the war on terror. Let America know what victory will look like and what will allow the war to be brought to a close. Exhibit understanding and compassion for the human toll the war is taking on soldiers, their families and innocent civilians. There's an adage in crisis communications: They don't care that you know until they know that you care. I'm not sure the president's compassion is showing through, and it's hurting his stature and credibility.

National Intelligence Director Says He'll Stay On (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte, who had been rumored to be going over to the State Department as deputy secretary, said last week that he plans to remain in his current position through the end of the Bush administration.

"In my own mind at least, I visualize staying . . . through the end of this administration, and then I think probably that'll be about the right time to pack it in," he told Brian Lamb in an interview done Wednesday that will be shown on C-SPAN today.

Concerns had been raised, on Capitol Hill and within the 16 agencies that make up the intelligence community, that Negroponte would leave the newly created position after having assembled a staff from other agencies that now totals 1,200.

"I've pulled together a very good team, and they've stayed with me for the past 18 months," he said, "and I hope they'll stay with me as long as I'm in the job."

Negroponte, 67, said anyone who holds his position has to have a good relationship with the defense secretary. He said he was looking forward to working with Robert M. Gates, President Bush's nominee to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon.

At the end of the Reagan administration, Negroponte was the deputy national security adviser in the White House under Colin L. Powell and worked with Gates when he was CIA deputy director. "I had worked with him very closely . . . and look forward very much to working with him again," he said.

When Gates later came to the White House under President George H.W. Bush, he replaced Negroponte on the National Security Council staff as deputy director.

"One can't be responsible for overseeing the nation's intelligence activities without having a very good, cooperative and strong relationship with the Pentagon," Negroponte said.

Ironically, Gates, a former CIA director and longtime agency analyst, was openly opposed to the legislation that created the national intelligence director position and turned down the job before it was given to Negroponte.

Under Rumsfeld, the Defense Department's intelligence gathering and analysis activities have increased dramatically, as has overall government spending on intelligence. Rumsfeld also created the job of undersecretary of defense for intelligence in 2003 to coordinate all Pentagon activities. He gave the job to one of his top longtime aides, Stephen A. Cambone.

On Friday, the Pentagon announced that Cambone would be resigning at the end of the month. A Pentagon spokesman said that Gates had not requested Cambone's resignation.

Gates, whose confirmation hearings before the Senate Armed Services Committee are to begin tomorrow, is expected to be questioned about Pentagon intelligence activities. In his responses to the committee's questionnaire, Gates said he did not believe the Defense Department's role was "fundamentally changed" with establishment of the national intelligence director. But he added that he wanted to see "how the program is working in actual practice."

Asked about an earlier article in which Gates had written that "for the last decade, intelligence authority has been quietly leaching from the CIA and to the Pentagon," Gates responded that it was "an area I would look into."

As Trucking Rules Are Eased, A Debate On Safety Grows (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 2 — As Dorris Edwards slowed for traffic near Kingdom City, Mo., on her way home from a Thanksgiving trip in 2004, an 18-wheeler slammed into her Jeep Cherokee.

The truck crushed the sport-utility vehicle and shoved it down an embankment off Interstate 70. Ms. Edwards, 62, was killed.

DOJ_NMG_0101175

The truck driver accepted blame for the accident, and Ms. Edwards's family filed a lawsuit against the driver and the trucking company.

In the course of pursuing its case, the family broached a larger issue: whether the Bush administration's decision to reject tighter industry regulation and instead reduce what officials viewed as cumbersome rules permitted a poorly trained trucker to stay behind the wheel, alone, instead of resting after a long day of driving.

After intense lobbying by the politically powerful trucking industry, regulators a year earlier had rejected proposals to tighten drivers' hours and instead did the opposite, relaxing the rules on how long truckers could be on the road. That allowed the driver who hit Ms. Edwards to work in the cab nearly 12 hours, 8 of them driving nonstop, which he later acknowledged had tired him.

Government officials had also turned down repeated requests from insurers and safety groups for more rigorous training for new drivers. The driver in the fatal accident was a rookie on his first cross-country trip; his instructor, a 22-year-old with just a year of trucking experience, had been sleeping in a berth behind the cab much of the way.

Federal officials, while declining to comment about the Edwards accident, have dismissed the assertion that deregulation has reduced safety and have maintained that in fact it has helped, though the Edwards family and many other victims of accidents have come to the opposite conclusion.

In loosening the standards, the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration was fulfilling President Bush's broader pledge to free industry of what it considered cumbersome rules. In the last six years, the White House has embarked on the boldest strategy of deregulation in more than a generation. Largely unchecked by the Republican-led Congress, federal agencies, often led by former industry officials, have methodically reduced what they see as inefficient, outdated regulations and have delayed enforcement of others. The Bush administration says those efforts have produced huge savings for businesses and consumers.

Those actions, though, have provoked fierce debate about their benefits and risks. The federal government's oversight of the trucking industry is a case study of deregulation, as well as the difficulty of determining an exact calculus of its consequences. Though Ms. Edwards's family and the industry disagree on whether the motor carrier agency's actions contributed to her death, her accident illuminates crucial issues in regulating America's most treacherous industry, as measured by overall deaths and injuries from truck accidents.

The loosened standards, supporters say, have made it faster and cheaper to move goods across the country. They also say the changes promote safety; without longer work hours, the industry would be forced to put more drivers with little experience behind the wheel. Regulators and industry officials point out that the death toll of truck-related accidents — about 5,000 annually — has not increased, while the fatality rate, the number of deaths per miles traveled, has continued a long decline. The number of annual injuries has also been dropping slowly, falling to 114,000 last year.

"This administration has done a good job, and the agency has done a good job, in advancing safety issues in a manner that takes into account all the important factors of our industry," said the top lobbyist for the American Trucking Associations, Timothy P. Lynch.

But advocates of tighter rules say the administration's record of loosening standards endangers motorists. The fatality rate for truck-related accidents remains nearly double that involving only cars, safety and insurance groups say. They note that weakening the rules has reversed a course set by the Clinton administration and has resulted in the federal government repeatedly missing its own targets for reducing the death rate.

"It is a frustrating disappointment that has led to a tragic era," said David F. Snyder, an assistant general counsel at the American Insurance Association who follows the trucking industry closely. "The losses continue to pile up at a high rate. There has been a huge missed opportunity."

An Industry's Influence

In decisions that had the support of the White House, the motor carrier agency has eased the rules on truckers' work hours, rejected proposals for electronic monitoring to combat widespread cheating on drivers' logs and resisted calls for more rigorous driver training.

While applauded by the industry, those decisions have been subject to withering criticism by federal appeals court panels in Washington who say they ignore government safety studies and put the industry's economic interests ahead of public safety.

To advance its agenda, the Bush administration has installed industry officials in influential posts.

DOJ_NMG_0101176

Before Mr. Bush entered the White House, he selected Duane W. Acklie, a leading political fund-raiser and chairman of the American Trucking Associations, and Walter B. McCormick Jr., the group's president, to serve on the Bush-Cheney transition team on transportation matters.

Mr. Bush then appointed Michael P. Jackson, a former top official at the trucking associations, as deputy secretary of the Department of Transportation. To lead the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration, the president picked Joseph M. Clapp, the former chairman of Roadway, a trucking company, and the leader of an industry foundation that sponsored research claiming fatigue was not a factor in truck accidents, a conclusion at odds with government and academic studies.

And David S. Addington, a former trucking industry official who led an earlier fight against tougher driving limits, became legal counsel and later chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, an advocate of easing government regulations.

In addition to supplying prominent administration officials, the trucking industry has provided some of the Republican party's most important fund-raisers. From 2000 to 2006, the industry directed more than $14 million in campaign contributions to Republicans. Its donations and lobbying fees — about $37 million from 2000 to 2005 — led to rules that have saved what industry officials estimate are billions of dollars in expenses linked to tougher regulations.

But to the families of accident victims, the motor carrier agency has failed to fulfill a promise to significantly reduce fatalities, exacting a tragic personal price.

"They are not getting much done in Washington," said Daphne Izer of Maine, who founded Parents Against Tired Truckers in 1994 after a Wal-Mart driver fell asleep at the wheel of his rig, killing her son and three other teenagers in the car with him. "As a result, more people will continue to die."

Federal regulators disagree with that assessment of their performance. "We have made significant progress, yet much work remains to achieve our vision," said David H. Hugel, the new deputy administrator of the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration. "Our challenges also are increasing because our nation maintains the most extensive and complex transportation system in the world, and that system and number of people who use it continues to grow."

The federal government began overseeing the trucking industry in the 1930s, setting rates, limiting competition and regulating safety practices. From the start, companies won important concessions from Washington, including exemptions from minimum wage and other labor laws. The industry also resisted efforts to impose tougher safety standards, saying it could police itself.

In 1937, the first driving hour limits were set. Truckers were allowed drive up to 10 continuous hours but were required to rest for a minimum of 8 hours. The remaining six hours could be used for other work activities, like loading, or for breaks or meals. Truckers could drive up to 60 hours over 7 consecutive days, or 70 hours over 8 days. To enforce those rules, the government required drivers to keep logs.

Repeated efforts over the years to tighten the rules were blocked, often as a result of vigorous industry lobbying.

Trucking companies have long argued that tougher standards are not necessary to promote safety, and that they would cause devastating economic pressures. Profit margins in the industry are thin, particularly after economic deregulation in 1980 prompted competition. Long hours and low pay for drivers have led to high turnover, and carriers struggle to find replacements. Those conditions, safety experts say, have contributed to widespread safety problems.

The practice of falsifying driver hours is an open secret in the industry; truckers routinely refer to their logs as "comic books." Fines are small. The federal motor carrier agency does not have the staff to monitor closely 700,000 businesses and almost eight million trucks.

Timothy L. Unrine, a 41-year-old driver from Virginia, said in a recent interview that he was taught to conceal excessive driving hours during training last January by his former employer, Boyd Brothers Transportation of Birmingham, Ala. Mr. Unrine said his orientation instructor told his class that government inspectors were allowed to examine a monthly logbook if it was bound. But if the staples were removed, the log was considered "loose leaf" and inspectors could require an examination of only those pages from the most recent seven days, Mr. Unrine said the drivers were told.

Company officials advised drivers to use fuel credit cards that recorded only the date, not the time, of the fuel stop, he said.

Mr. Unrine added that the company pushed him to work longer hours than permitted, and that his logbooks were "adjusted" many times to make it appear he was within the limits. Several times, when he told a dispatcher he was too tired to make another trip, he said, he was ordered to do so after just a few hours' sleep.

"I never felt safe driving under these conditions," said Mr. Unrine, who left Boyd last June because of a legal dispute over medical bills from a fall. "I talked to many drivers on the fuel islands, truck stops and rest areas. Logbooks are so fake; it scares me that there aren't more accidents on the road."

Richard Bailey, the chief operating officer at Boyd Brothers, and Wayne Fiquett, the company's vice president for safety, disputed Mr. Unrine's claims. They said that drivers might have been instructed to keep only seven days of log entries, but denied that they were encouraged to violate the rules.

"Nobody here will tell someone to do something unsafe," Mr. Fiquett said. "If a driver is tired or over his hours, the system will not allow that driver to continue driving."

In 1995, Congress directed regulators to study truck driver fatigue and its safety consequences and to consider new rules. But the agency then charged with truck safety, the Federal Highway Administration, never did so. Two years later, the Clinton administration vowed to cut the annual death toll of truck-related accidents in half within a decade. In 1999, Congress created the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration in response to what lawmakers considered ineffectual regulation and high casualties.

A year later, the agency proposed tighter service hour rules. They would allow long-haul drivers to work a maximum of 12 hours a day, and require them to take 10-hour breaks between shifts. They also required installation of electronic devices to replace driver logs.

Advocates of tighter standards said the rules did not go far enough, while the industry said cutting driver hours could raise costs by $19 billion over a decade, five times more than government estimates. Action stalled when trucking lobbyists inserted language into a spending bill that forced the motor carrier agency to delay action until after the presidential election that November.

Rewriting the Rules

Industry leaders overwhelmingly supported the candidacy of George W. Bush, confident that his administration would be friendlier than one led by his opponent, Al Gore. On the campaign trail, Mr. Bush accused his Democratic rival of wanting to expand government, while Mr. Bush repeatedly expressed his desire to reduce federal regulations.

During the 2000 election cycle, trucking executives and political action committees gave more than $4.3 million in donations to the Republicans and less than $1 million to Democrats, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan research organization.

In the months before and after the election, a leading industry figure in the campaign against tighter driving rules was Mr. Acklie, who became chairman of the American Trucking Associations in the fall of 2000. A longtime Bush family friend and Republican fund-raiser, he led one of nation's largest trucking companies, Crete Carrier, based in Nebraska. Mr. Acklie, who stepped down from the post about a year after his appointment, did not return telephone calls seeking comment.

Another important advocate was Mr. Addington, then general counsel to the Trucking Associations. In August 2000, when two top transportation officials complained in a press release about the industry's "raw use of political power," he demanded that they be investigated for possibly violating a federal law that prohibits officials from lobbying and issuing propaganda. In January 2001, he joined Mr. Cheney's office, where he is now chief of staff. Lea Anne McBride, the vice president's spokeswoman, said Mr. Addington had not been involved in issues related to his trucking activities.

Other industry officials also joined the administration. Mr. Jackson, a former colleague of Mr. Acklie and Mr. Addington at the trucking group, became the No. 2 official at the Transportation Department, which oversees the industry. Mr. Clapp, the former head of Roadway trucking, took over the motor carrier agency and soon became involved in rewriting the rules.

The insurance industry and safety groups provided studies showing a high percentage of accidents were caused by tired truck drivers. But after the Trucking Associations produced a study concluding that only 2 percent of accidents were caused by fatigued truckers, while more than 80 percent were caused by passenger cars, the agency decided to loosen the hourly restrictions.

In April 2003, the agency issued rules that increased the maximum driving hours to 77 from 60 over 7 consecutive days and to 88 hours from 70 over 8 consecutive days. It capped daily work hours at 14, which included driving as well as waiting for loading and unloading. The agency also decided not to require truck companies to install electronic monitoring devices.

The agency said the new rules would modestly decrease the number of fatalities by increasing the required time off for drivers, to 10 hours from 8. A year later, the agency set training standards for new drivers: 10 hours of training, none of it on the road.

Congress has provided little scrutiny of the trucking standards.

"There has not been the kind of in-depth examination of these issues that should have occurred," said Representative James L. Oberstar of Minnesota, the ranking Democrat on the House Committee on Transportation and Infrastructure. Mr. Oberstar and others blamed the failure on the political muscle of the industry. From 2000 to 2004, the American Trucking Associations donated $2 million to lawmakers, mostly to Republicans who served on committees with jurisdiction over trucking issues.

The courts have played a more significant role. In July 2004, a three-judge panel from the federal appeals court in Washington issued a harsh opinion in a lawsuit brought by several safety organizations over the trucking work rules.

Judge David B. Sentelle, a conservative Republican appointed by President Ronald Reagan, wrote the opinion, faulting the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration for "ignoring its own evidence that fatigue causes many truck accidents."

The opinion continued, "The agency admits that studies show that crash risk increases, in the agency's words, 'geometrically' after the eighth hour on duty." The judges said they could not understand why the agency had not estimated the benefits of electronic monitoring, saying the agency's "passive regulatory approach" probably did not comply with the law. The panel struck down the hour and service rules.

But a year later, in August 2005, the agency issued virtually identical rules, which the safety groups and the Teamsters union are again challenging in court. Oral arguments are set for Monday before another three-judge federal appeals panel here. The agency had a similar legal setback on driver training. A three-member appeals court panel called the regulation "baffling" and criticized the agency for ignoring its own studies on the need for more comprehensive training.

The agency has not responded to the court's decision by issuing any new rules.

Meanwhile, the agency has failed, by growing margins, to meet its annual targets for lowering the death rate for truck-related accidents.

Mr. Hugel, the agency's deputy administrator, blames increasing traffic for the agency's inability to meet its goals. "More trucks, combined with even more passenger vehicles," he said, "leads to more roadway congestion, increased risk and a larger number of fatalities."

In a budget submission to Congress last February, though, the Transportation Department noted its repeated failure to cut the death rate and conceded that the agency "has difficulty demonstrating how its regulatory activities contribute to reaching its safety goal."

Safety experts, for their part, say the numbers reflect the agency's failings.

"The fatalities speak to the agency's lackluster performance," said Jacqueline S. Gillan, vice president of Advocates for Highway and Auto Safety, an alliance of consumer, health and insurance organizations. "These truck crashes happen one at a time in communities across the country and get little attention," Ms. Gillan said. "Can you imagine what the outcry would be at the F.A.A. if we had 25 major airplane crashes a year, which is the equivalent of what is happening with trucks?"

A Family's Lawsuit

After Ms. Edwards's death, her only son, Steve, a professional musician in Chicago, sued the trucking company, Werner Enterprises of Omaha, and the driver involved in the accident, John L. McNeal, 36. Mr. McNeal was dismissed shortly after the accident.

Mr. McNeal said in a sworn deposition that he had been tired from driving all day from Tennessee without a break. He had been in the cab for about 12 hours, including about 8 hours at the wheel. Because he had been driving trucks professionally for only a month, he was assigned a trainer, who had slept much of the trip.

After Mr. McNeal acknowledged he was at fault, Werner Enterprises settled the lawsuit for $2.4 million. Werner's general counsel, Richard S. Reiser, said that the company had a strong safety record and that its training program far exceeded the federal requirements. Mr. Reiser said that Mr. McNeal was in compliance with both the old and new work hour rules but acknowledged he was unfamiliar with the proposals by safety groups that would have prevented the driver from working as long as he did that day. He also said that any driver who was tired should stop, regardless of how long he had been on the road.

"The driver should be the one who says, 'If I'm tired, I should pull over,' " Mr. Reiser said.

Mr. Edwards, though, thinks responsibility for safety goes beyond individual drivers, and links his mother's death to the Bush administration's decisions against imposing tighter driving limits. "These drivers are working hard every day on the road to make a living," he said. "They are overtired and underpaid."

Mr. Edwards said his mother, who had worked at a Procter & Gamble Company factory before her weakened knees forced her to retire, had been looking forward to traveling, gardening and playing with her grandchildren.

"If there is any silver lining, it is that he hit her so hard she never saw it coming," Mr. Edwards said of the accident. "She probably was happy that she was going to be home soon."

$10M CDC Deal Raises Questions (AJC)

By Alison Young

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 3, 2006

It began when a prominent Atlanta business leader introduced Dr. Julie Gerberding to a man who wanted to be her free management adviser, to help her transform operations at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Now the agency is scrambling to explain the gyrations it used to give $10 million in business without competition to a consulting firm associated with and recommended by CDC director Gerberding's free adviser.

A CDC public relations risk-management analysis obtained by The Atlanta Journal-Constitution identified several "threats" to the agency, including "significant procurement mistakes" and an "inappropriately backdated" contract document.

The circumstances described in that risk analysis â€" which CDC officials now seek to discredit as merely "conjecture" â€" raise questions about serious and potentially criminal violations of federal procurement law, according to government contract experts.

And an explanation offered late Friday by CDC officials appears to illustrate questionable practices that experts say are designed to award contracts to favored companies, denying others the opportunity to compete and taxpayers the assurance that the government is paying a fair price.

Gerberding and CDC officials have refused repeated requests to release documents involving the firm Celerant Consulting, which worked at the agency from 2003 through 2005. The agency also has refused to release documents relating to whether a conflict of interest existed when James W. Down, Gerberding's volunteer business adviser, recommended Celerant to overhaul CDC's procurement and grants office. He made the recommendation around October 2003, four months after Celerant sent out a press release announcing Down as a new member of the firm's U.S. Advisory Board.

Celerant and Down contend the press release was mistakenly issued and that he never accepted the firm's position.

Down, who lives in Winchester, Mass., and has been a member of the CDC Foundation board of directors since 2004, declined to be interviewed. His attorney, former Massachusetts Attorney General Scott Harshbarger, said Saturday that Down never had a conflict of interest and was only trying to help the CDC. He praised Down's integrity.

"Candidly, I am defending Jim Down here, I'm not defending some of the issues CDC and the foundation need to address," Harshbarger said. He said volunteers like Down are put at risk of questions of impropriety because the agency and the foundation are lax in having procedures for them to make formal disclosures of even potential conflict of interest issues.

Celerant, a global consulting firm with its U.S. headquarters in Lexington, Mass., declined to grant interviews. In a brief statement, the company said: "Celerant's business relationship with the CDC was legal and proper."

And the company said it never had any relationship with Down, despite the 2003 press release. Harshbarger said that while Down had a discussion with Celerant, he never agreed to work for the firm. He said he doesn't know why Celerant never issued a correction.

CDC officials said Friday that while some mistakes were made in the contracting process, their only intent was to get the agency the expertise it needed to revamp its sluggish contracting office. The agency believed it followed proper procedures, they said, and that taxpayers were well-served, regardless of the process used.

"The procurement and grants office at CDC is a completely different entity than it was a few short years ago," said Alan Kotch, the office's acting director, citing dramatic drops in processing times and increases in productivity as a result of Celerant's help.

Sen. Charles Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said late Friday that he will be asking the CDC to provide information on its contracting with Celerant. He also said he will ask the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, to examine the CDC's contracting procedures.

Fear of bad publicity

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution has been seeking records about Celerant and Down under the federal Freedom of Information Act since Oct. 3.

After the FOIA request was made, a CDC employee from the Office of the Director performed a risk analysis of issues facing the agency if and when information about its dealings with Celerant became public.

The analysis, obtained by the AJC, said there was "No assurance that CDC received the best value solution to its concerns because [of the] inappropriate procurement process used." It states that the agency "inappropriately backdated a contract document" and notes a "potential conflict of interest between external individual serving as adviser to CDC and Celerant."

The analysis was prepared by Martin Landry, who is listed in an agency directory as a management adviser in Gerberding's office.

Among the "threats" identified by Landry in the document: "Negative publicity will further question top CDC management, as it was so involved in the early process."

And among the top four questions Landry posed â€" without an answer â€" in the memo were: "Why did CDC's top management collude to provide a generous, $10 million, sole-source contract to Celerant, primarily based on the recommendation of another CDC contractor who was discussing potential employment with Celerant at the same time?"

Landry did not respond to interview requests.

Donna Garland, chief of CDC's Office of Enterprise Communications, an arm of the director's office that specializes in risk communications, did not respond to an interview request about Landry's analysis.

She sent an e-mail to all CDC employees and contractors Friday evening, in anticipation of this report, saying the analysis was "an internal document that was not using the facts, but conjecture."

She wrote: "CDC's core values of accountability, respect, and integrity count. When we get it wrong we must own it. The fictitious questions that someone could possibly ask when pursuing a story about PGO [the procurement and grants office] were written down, and I own that this was not a good idea. I apologize for this."

'This is a common abuse'

The road that led to the CDC's hiring of Celerant began with an introduction made by Atlanta businessman Kent "Oz" Nelson, who at the time was board chairman of the CDC Foundation, a nonprofit that supports the agency.

Nelson, former chairman and chief executive officer of United Parcel Service, became a key Gerberding adviser after she was named CDC director in July 2002. Nelson, among other things, worked to identify business consulting expertise to help Gerberding chart a new strategic vision and reorganization of the agency.

"I told her I'd be glad to help and began searching for someone. Coincidentally, around the same time, I got a phone call from Jim Down," said Nelson in an article in the CDC Foundation's 2002-2003 annual report.

In an interview, Nelson said he knew and respected Down from Down's work years earlier as a UPS consultant. Down "was extremely effective in strategic planning," he said.

Nelson said he set up a meeting between Down and Gerberding. "They hit it off very well," he said. And Down agreed to provide his help and expertise for free, flying between Massachusetts and Atlanta nearly every week, Nelson said. The CDC reimbursed Down only for expenses, Nelson added.

DOJ_NMG_0101181

Nelson said he feels "horrible" that Down is facing scrutiny. He added that when the issue first surfaced within the government in 2004, he was so comfortable that Down had done nothing wrong that he added Down to the CDC Foundation board.

"I think he is a very fine, moral man who has made a huge personal sacrifice to try to help the CDC," Nelson said.

In June 2003, while Down was serving as Gerberding's adviser, Celerant Consulting issued the press release announcing that Down had been appointed to the company's advisory board.

Around October 2003, CDC officials began discussing the need to overhaul the operations in its procurement and grants office. Down recommended Celerant for the job to CDC Chief Operating Officer Bill Gimson, said James Seligman, the CDC's chief information officer, in an interview Friday.

Gimson said Down did not mention any potential conflict of interest when he recommended Celerant. "Jim's conversation, as a matter of fact, was extremely brief," Gimson recalled Saturday. "He said 'I would like to introduce you to a company I think would do great work for CDC.' " After the agency became interested, Gimson said, Down had no further involvement.

After examining Celerant and interviewing company officials, CDC decided to hire the firm, CDC officials said.

Rather than open up the consulting contract to competitive bidding, CDC executives went looking for an existing contract elsewhere in the federal government that would allow them to hire Celerant directly. Seligman, Kotch and Gimson said this is a common and accepted practice. "Government agencies are encouraged to use government-wide contracts when they're available and appropriate," said Seligman.

Seligman called contracting officials at the National Institutes of Health, who he said identified a pre-existing contract that would work. According to the NIH Web site, this particular contract, called ECS III, is for the purchase of computer hardware and software "to satisfy your agency's desktop computing needs." CDC officials said it also allowed for the purchase of "services."

And, most important for achieving the agency's goal of hiring Celerant, one of the prime contractors had as a listed vendor Novell, the computer software giant, which at the time owned Celerant.

"This is a common abuse of IT hardware and software contracts," said Christopher Yukins, associate professor of government contracts law at the George Washington University Law School in Washington. "In this case you have an information technology â€" really a hardware/software contract â€" being used for consulting services that have little to do with information technology."

It's called "out-of-scope contracting," and in the wake of revelations that some interrogators at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq were paid under an IT contract, "this has been a matter of acute concern in the government," Yukins said.

Regardless, the NIH contract is the mechanism CDC used from about December 2003 to February 2004 to hire Celerant to do an initial assessment of how to fix the agency's procurement and grants office. The cost of this initial phase was about $580,000, Seligman said.

The CDC was pleased with Celerant's initial work and wanted the company to go ahead and implement its overhaul plan, at a cost of $10 million. Although the first contract had ended, Seligman said CDC let Celerant continue working and incurring costs while the agency sought NIH approval to again link to the IT contract.

Celerant worked without a contract in place for three months, Kotch said.

Yukins, the government contract law expert, said: "The federal government takes work done without a contract very seriously. ... It's a violation of federal law, [and] technically speaking it is a criminal violation of law." While prosecutions are rare, he said, it is a very serious matter.

A scramble to fix things

In April 2004, an anonymous letter arrived at the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, the parent agency of both the CDC and the NIH, alleging improprieties in the Celerant contracting process. Gimson said that when HHS notified him of the letter, he immediately sent a memo to HHS asking that it conduct an independent inquiry.

By July 2004, HHS officials were sufficiently concerned about the appropriateness of the contract that they issued a formal stop-work order. HHS officials would not grant interviews on the matter.

In September 2004, the CDC said HHS officials allowed the Celerant contract to be reinstated, but required the CDC to take over managing it. They also required the CDC to renegotiate the terms, which resulted in Celerant reducing its costs by $500,000, to $9.5 million. And the CDC set the effective date back to cover the February-May period when Celerant was working without a contract, the agency said.

In a brief statement, HHS spokeswoman Christina Pearson said: "Through internal and independent reviews, we found that CDC entered into what it believed to be an acceptable contracting arrangement through an NIH contract."

The statement noted that HHS identified the need for stronger contracting controls at both the CDC and the NIH and both agencies promptly addressed those issues.

A spokesman for the NIH did not respond to an interview request.

Funding Continues For Illness Scientists Dismiss (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Fifteen years after the end of the 1991 war with Iraq, a Texas researcher is in line to get as much as $75 million in federal funding to press his studies of "Gulf War syndrome," even though most other scientists long ago discounted his theories.

Epidemiologist Robert W. Haley has been trying for 10 years to prove that thousands of Persian Gulf War troops were poisoned by a combination of nerve gas, pesticides, insect repellents and a nerve-gas antidote. With the help of $16 million in past funding obtained by his backers in Congress and the Pentagon, Haley has argued that his "toxicity hypothesis" is the best explanation for the constellation of physical complaints that many veterans reported after returning from the Gulf.

Haley and his supporters, who also include a powerful cluster of veterans and government advisers, are undeterred by the scientific consensus against him.

As recently as September, a panel of the National Academy of Science's Institute of Medicine reached the same conclusion that half a dozen other expert groups had: Gulf War syndrome does not exist. After reviewing 850 studies -- essentially all the scientific literature on the topic -- the 13 scientists wrote that "the nature of the symptoms suffered by many Gulf War veterans does not point to an obvious diagnosis, etiology [cause], or standard treatment."

"Gulf War syndrome" became a catchall name for a spectrum of non-life-threatening complaints that up to 30 percent of the conflict's veterans say they have experienced at some point since the end of the war in 1991. The most commonly cited symptoms are fatigue, memory loss, poor sleep, mood changes, digestive troubles and rashes.

The ground war lasted four days and resulted in 147 battlefield deaths, but almost 199,000 of the 698,000 people who were deployed have since qualified for some degree of service-related disability. Of those, 3,317 people are disabled by "undiagnosed conditions."

From 1994 through 2003, the departments of defense, veterans affairs, and health and human services sponsored 256 studies of Gulf War syndrome, at a total cost of $316 million.Scientists Cry Foul

The size, timing and purpose of the latest appropriation has elicited muffled outrage among scientists who say there is little more to gain from pursuing Haley's ideas.

"This is a tremendously egregious misuse of government funding," said Gregory C. Gray, who headed the Navy's Gulf War illness research center in San Diego before retiring in 2001. He now directs the Center for Emerging Infectious Diseases at the University of Iowa's College of Public Health.

"After hundreds of millions of dollars and a decade or better of research, we really haven't made any significant findings," said John R. Feussner, who was VA's chief research officer from 1996 to 2002 and is now chairman of medicine at the Medical University of South Carolina. "What is the chance we will find something now? Not as high as zero."

At VA, people will not talk on the record about the appropriateness of Haley's grants -- almost all awarded outside the usual competitive routes.

"This is a very sensitive topic around here right now, in part because this might be seen as an apparent shift in how VA selects and funds research," said one official, speaking anonymously so as not to offend members of Congress. A former VA official, also unwilling to be quoted by name, was more straightforward: "Everyone is dismayed."

DOJ_NMG_0101183

Haley's research was originally underwritten by billionaire H. Ross Perot. It later gained the support of VA's Research Advisory Committee on Gulf War Veterans' Illnesses, on which Haley sat until recently, and of a politically diverse group of legislators that includes Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), Bernard Sanders (I-Vt.) and Dennis J. Kucinich (D-Ohio).

Haley's chief congressional patron is Texas's senior senator, Kay Bailey Hutchison (R), who chairs the Appropriations Committee's subcommittee on military construction and veterans affairs. A year ago, she inserted an earmark in the 2007 federal budget that will channel $15 million to the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center, where Haley is a professor and chief of epidemiology. The grant can be renewed four times, for a total of $75 million over five years.

VA cemented the arrangement Nov. 14 when it signed a contract saying UT Southwestern will "conduct and manage research projects in order to answer central questions on the nature, causes and treatments of Gulf War veterans' illnesses," said VA spokeswoman Karen Fedele.

Hutchison twice declined a request to talk to The Washington Post for this article, as did Haley.

Just how much money will go to Haley's research is unknown. Other scientists will be able to apply for funding, but the awarding of grants will bypass VA's usual mechanisms and instead go through "a process established by and headed by the dean of the medical school" at UT Southwestern, Fedele said.

Haley's backers say a lack of focus and money are the chief reasons a cause and treatment for the Gulf veterans' ailments have not been found. Hutchison spokesman Marc Short said the senator "doesn't want people to stop doing Gulf War illness research as long as there are symptoms out there that we don't understand."The Conventional Wisdom

Outside Haley's circle, most experts think the syndrome is rooted more in medicine, psychology and culture than in toxicology.

They have concluded that it is the product of a medley of factors, including the stress of the war and the fear that Saddam Hussein might use chemical or biological weapons. For some people -- particularly reservists, in whom the symptoms are more common -- it may be a physical expression of the disruption that deployment caused in their lives. Some of the physical complaints may simply be the ordinary ups and downs of people's health, magnified by public and media attention. Gulf War syndrome may also be the military manifestation of something long seen in civilian medicine: symptoms whose cause is never found despite extensive testing and diagnostic studies.

Haley adamantly rejects that view, especially the stress argument. In three papers published in the Journal of the American Medical Association in January 1997, he outlined six distinct neurological syndromes he identified in several dozen former members of the Navy Reserve "Seabees" construction unit who served in the Gulf. He has spent much of the past decade studying them, focusing on the three most disabling syndromes. For one series of papers, he took 165 measures of neurological function.

Among the things he and his colleagues reported was that in 12 veterans with the most severe complaints, a deep-brain structure called the left basal ganglion was smaller than usual. (The right one was normal.) He also found that some ill veterans tended to have a less active version of the enzyme paraoxonase-1, which breaks down the nerve agent sarin. Veterans with symptoms were also more likely to have abnormal eye reflexes and subtle changes in the daily variation of heart rate. What remains unclear is the significance of these results.Poisoned on the Battlefield

Haley's most controversial claim is that many veterans suffering from the syndromes were probably exposed to a nerve agent during the war.

Nerve gas was released after the war, during the destruction of 816 pounds of sarin and cyclosarin at a storage complex in Khamisiyah, Iraq, in March 1991. The Defense Department modeled the "plume zone" from this explosion and in 1997 notified 98,910 veterans that they may have been briefly exposed downwind of Khamisiyah. That number was later increased to about 102,000.

Haley's backers consider those letters proof that the veterans were exposed to nerve gas. That is the view of James H. Binns Jr., a retired businessman and former deputy assistant secretary in the Defense Department who chairs the VA Gulf War illnesses research panel. "There is no contradicting that there was low-level exposure to sarin gases as a result of destruction of Iraqi weapons depots," he said in an interview.

Defense officials, however, have always been careful to talk of "potential exposures," not definite ones.

No one doing the demolition reported any symptoms of sarin poisoning at the time. Neither did anyone in the plume zone. Few doubt that air containing the vaporized compound drifted over troops, but there is no evidence that anyone actually came in contact with sarin. Furthermore, the Seabees Haley studied were far outside the plume zone, as were most other soldiers who later complained of persistent symptoms. For sarin to be part of the mix of toxins causing Haley's syndromes, there would had to have been other releases -- something experts say is extremely unlikely.

"I haven't spoken to anyone in the military or in intelligence who believes it is credible that there was deliberate use of sarin and nobody noticed," said Simon Wessely, a psychiatrist and leading British researcher of Gulf War illness.

Evidence that low-level exposure to sarin can lead to chronic illness is equally sparse.

Brain-wave tracings of monkeys exposed to low doses sometimes show changes, although the animals' behavior does not change. Rats exposed to low doses of nerve agent and pesticide perform worse in mazes, but most are back to normal in three months. The relevance of those findings to human illness that includes symptoms as diverse as joint pain and chronic diarrhea is unknown.

The few studies of people who were exposed and survived are also not very enlightening. American and British soldiers exposed to non-fatal doses of nerve gas as human guinea pigs decades ago suffered no chronic illness, but some survivors of two sarin attacks by terrorists in Japan in the 1990s reported tiredness, headaches and vision changes up to five years later.

There is also little evidence that simultaneous exposure to toxins -- even without nerve gas -- has lasting effects. A study published in October found that, properly used, DEET insect repellant, the anti-nerve-gas pill pyridostigmine bromide and insecticide-impregnated uniforms did not cause physical or mental impairment.

Overall, most scientists who have investigated the question share the same conclusion: The chance that thousands of people suffered poisoning they did not recognize at the time, and are now ill with a disease that has never been seen before, is close to nil.

But while the scientific establishment has always been skeptical of Haley's findings, 10 years ago Pentagon officials saw them as possibly the key to the mystery of Gulf War syndrome.Support Lost, and Regained

"In my opinion, Haley was researching the very essence of Gulf War illness," recalled Bernard Rostker, an economist who headed the Defense Department office devoted to that subject. In 1997, his office provided $3 million to Haley out of discretionary funds when the Dallas scientist failed to win a grant through the military's usual competitive funding mechanism.

They money was to give Haley a chance to confirm his findings in a larger, representative sample of veterans. But he did not do that, which became clear when Rostker toured the Dallas research ward in 1998 and encountered only previously examined veterans.

"I thought Dr. Rostker was going to blow a gasket right then and there," recalled Michael E. Kilpatrick, deputy director of deployment health support at the Pentagon, who was on the visit.

Haley eventually did test 336 additional veterans reached through the Dallas VA hospital, identifying 29 with one of his six syndromes. Among the 249 Seabees he had examined earlier, he found 25.

"Basically, Haley stiffed the government," Rostker said recently. He refused to give Haley more money, and Hutchison began inserting budget earmarks to fund Haley's work.

Pentagon and VA officials still say the crucial question that needs answering is whether Haley's syndromes can be found in a larger group of veterans.

To that end, the government is spending more than $10 million to ask a random sample of 10,000 veterans about symptoms, and to study the brains of several hundred who are clearly ill, using MRI scanners. Along with the new appropriation, that will extend efforts to examine Haley's theory to almost the 20th anniversary of the conflict.

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

Fewer Americans are wearing seat belts compared with last year, but usage continues to be higher in states where motorists can be pulled over solely because they are not wearing a safety belt, a new federal study shows.

DOJ_NMG_0101185

Seat-belt use climbed from 58 percent in 1994 to 81 percent this year. It reached an all-time high in 2005 at 82 percent, according to a report released last week by the Department of Transportation.

"A seat belt doesn't work if it isn't on," Transportation Secretary Mary E. Peters said in announcing the findings. "Whatever it takes, we all need to do a better job making sure everyone chooses to buckle up" to help reduce rising highway fatalities.

The study gave Western states the highest marks, with usage in that region increasing from 85 percent to 90 percent in the past year.

Seat-belt use in the South edged up from 82 percent in 2005 to 83 percent this year. But it fell from 78 percent to 74 percent in the Northeast and from 79 percent to 77 percent in the Midwest during the same 12-month period, the report showed.

Data released in August by the department's National Highway Traffic Safety Administration revealed that 43,443 persons died in traffic accidents in the United States in 2005. It was the highest level in 15 years and 1.4 percent ahead of 2004, according to NHTSA.

Maryland is one of 24 states, along with the District of Columbia, that have so-called primary-prevention seat-belt laws, which allows drivers to be pulled over and ticketed solely because they are not wearing a safety belt.

Data shows these laws promote seat-belt use, and that was the case again this year, Mrs. Peters said. States with primary-prevention seat-belt laws had a combined seat-belt use rate of 85 percent in 2006, compared with 74 percent in other states.

Mrs. Peters said the department rewarded states with primary-prevention seat-belt laws incentive grants totaling $123 million this year and will continue working with states to encourage use of safety belts.

Data for the study was obtained from the National Occupant Protection Use Survey, which observes seat-belt usage on selected roadways, and by NHTSA's National Center for Statistics and Analysis.

This year's findings were based on a two-week period of observation of seat-belt use by occupants in 126,000 vehicles at about 1,900 sites.

The study found significant jumps in the proportion of front-seat passengers using safety belts between 2005 and this year and in the number of motorists wearing them while driving in heavy traffic and light fog.

The percentage of front-seat passengers who buckled up climbed from 78 percent to 97 percent during the 12-month period. The proportion of drivers wearing seat belts while traveling in light fog rose from 81 percent to 94 percent during the same period. The percentage of drivers using safety belts when traveling in heavy traffic climbed from 87 percent to 96 percent.

Pickup truck drivers are the least likely to use seat belts, the study showed. Only 74 percent currently use them, up from 73 percent last year.

The New, Soft Paternalism (NYT)

By Jim Holt

The New York Times Magazine, December 3, 2006

When the government tells you that you can't smoke marijuana or that you must wear a helmet when you ride your motorcycle even if you happen to like the feeling of the wind in your hair, it is being paternalistic. It is largely treating you the way a parent treats a child, restricting your liberty for what it deems to be your own good. Paternalistic laws aren't very popular in this country. We hew to the principle that, children and the mentally ill apart, an individual is a better judge of what's good for him than the state is and that people should be free to do what they wish as long as their actions don't harm others. Contrary to what many people believe, you can even commit suicide legally (although if you don't live in Oregon, you should think twice about seeking assistance).

But what if it could be shown that even highly competent, well-informed people fail to make choices in their best interest? And what if the government could somehow step in and nudge them in the right direction without interfering with their liberty, or at least not very much? Welcome to the new world of "soft paternalism." The old "hard" paternalism says, We know what's best for you, and we'll force you to do it. By contrast, soft paternalism says, You know what's best for you, and we'll help you to do it.

Here's an example. In some states with casino gambling, like Missouri and Michigan, compulsive gamblers have the option of putting their names on a blacklist, or "self-exclusion" list, that bars them from casinos. Once on the list, they are banned for life. If they violate the ban, they risk being arrested and having their winnings confiscated. In Missouri, more than 10,000 people have availed themselves of this program. In Michigan, the first person to sign up for it was, as it happens, also the first to be arrested for violating its terms when he couldn't resist sneaking back to the blackjack tables; he was sentenced to a year's probation, and the state kept his winnings of $1,223.

The voluntary gambling blacklist is an example of what's called a self-binding scheme. It is a way of restructuring the external world so that when future temptations arise, you will have no choice but to do what you've judged to be best for you. The classic case is that of Ulysses, who ordered his men to tie him to the mast of his ship so that he could hear the song of the Sirens without being lured to his destruction. As a freely chosen hedge against weakness of the will, self-binding would seem to enlarge individual liberty, not reduce it. So what is there to object to in a program like Missouri's or Michigan's?

Plenty, say libertarian critics. To begin with, they don't like soft paternalism when it involves the state's coercive power; they are much happier with private self-binding schemes, like alcoholism clinics, Christmas savings clubs and Weight Watchers. They also worry that soft paternalism can be a slippery slope to the harder variety, as when campaigns to discourage smoking give way to "sin taxes" and outright bans. But some libertarians have deeper misgivings. What bothers them is the way soft paternalism relies for its justification on the notion that each of us contains multiple selves — and that one of those selves is worth more than the others.

You might naïvely imagine that you are one person, the same entity from day to day. To the 18th-century philosopher David Hume, however, the idea of a permanent "I" was a fiction. Our mind, Hume wrote, "is nothing but a bundle or collection of different perceptions, which succeed each other with an inconceivable rapidity, and are in a perpetual flux and movement." According to this way of thinking, the self that inhabits your body today is only similar to, not identical with, the self that is going to inhabit your body tomorrow. And the self that will inhabit your body decades hence? A virtual stranger.

The idea of multiple selves may seem like a stoner's fantasy, but economists who study human decision-making have found it surprisingly useful. Consider: Most people, if given a choice today between doing seven hours of irksome work on May 1, 2007, versus eight hours on May 15, 2007, opt for the former. When May 1 arrives, however, they will find that their preference has flipped: they now wish to put off the work for a couple of weeks, even at the cost of having to do the extra hour's worth. Why this inconsistency, if the self calling the shots is one and the same?

Further evidence for the fragmented self comes from neuroscience. Brain scans show that the emotional part of the brain, the limbic system, is especially active when the prospect of immediate gratification presents itself. But choice among longer-term options triggers more activity in the "reasoning" part of the brain, located (suitably enough) higher up in the cortex. Now suppose you're tempted by a diet-violating Twinkie. Which part of your brain — the shortsighted emotional part or the farsighted reasoning part — gets to be the decider? There may be no built-in hierarchy here, just two autonomous brain modules in competition. That is why you might find yourself eating the Twinkie even while knowing it's bad for you. (A similar disconnect between two parts of your brain occurs when a visual illusion doesn't go away even after you learn it's an illusion.)

The short-run self cares only about the present. It is perfectly happy to indulge today and offload the costs onto future selves. For example, recent studies show that teenage smokers do not underestimate the risk of getting lung cancer as an adult (if anything, they tend to overestimate it); they simply don't mind making the future self suffer for the pleasure of the moment. The long-run self may deplore this ruinous behavior, but its prudent resolutions are continually ignored. Yet it can enforce its will indirectly by shaping the environment to constrain some short-run selves from exploiting others — by, say, putting a time lock on the refrigerator.

But why, some skeptics ask, should the government side with your prudent long-run self against your hedonistic short-run selves? What's so great about the long-run self, anyway? As the economist Glen Whitman has observed in a shrewd critique of soft paternalism, the harms that selves impose on one another are reciprocal: "The long-run self can harm the short-run self by adopting self-control devices — such as flushing cigarettes down the toilet, refusing to allow ice cream in the house, checking into a clinic and so on." It is not good to be profligate, lazy and obese, but neither is to good to be a miser, a workaholic or an anorexic.

If the goal is to promote freedom, though, there is an interesting argument favoring the long-run self. A distinctive quality of humans, as the third earl of Shaftesbury observed three centuries ago, is that we do not simply have desires; we also have feelings about our desires. Take the unhappy heroin addict: he gives himself an injection because he desires the drug, but he also has a desire to be rid of this desire. The philosopher Harry Frankfurt has given such "second order" desires a central role in his analysis of free will: we act freely, he submits, when we act on a desire that we actually desire to have, one that we endorse as our own. Beings that do not reflect on the desirability of their desires — like animals and infants and, perhaps, our short-run selves — are what Frankfurt calls "wantons."

People have fashioned a wide range of techniques for keeping their inner wantons under control — like buying a pint of ice cream instead of the more economical quart because they know they would end up consuming the latter in one sitting. So why can't soft paternalism be left to the private sector, as some libertarians prefer? The problem is that private self-binding schemes are easily subverted when someone can make a buck off your weakness of will. One Michigan man who signed up for a casino's private self-blacklisting program found the owners all too accommodating when he had a change of heart. "Within a half an hour, I was back in," he said.

Editorializing against soft paternalism earlier this year, The Economist warned that "life would be duller if every reckless spirit could outsource self-discipline to the state." There are certainly more exalted ways to achieve mastery over unwelcome impulses. Thinkers of an existentialist kidney, like Jean-Paul Sartre, used to insist that each of us is free to redefine his character through an act of radical choice. For the religiously inclined, an access of divine grace might be what is needed to stiffen the will.

But what if you are one of those people who rely on more mundane stratagems, like self-binding? The general problem you face (as put by the political theorist Jon Elster) is this: For a given uphill goal and a given strength of will, does there exist a path, however circuitous, that will get you to the top of the hill? By adding a new path here and there, state soft paternalism makes it more likely that the answer will be yes.

Is The New Congress To Be Believed? (NYT)

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

Well before Election Day, the smart-money lobbyists of K Street were already shifting campaign donations to safe Democratic incumbents, greasing access to the next Congressional majority. That should be warning enough to the incoming speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, and Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, to deliver quickly and credibly on their campaign vows to attack the corrupt, quid-pro-quo culture that besotted the Republican-controlled Capitol.

Yet even before the new Congress arrives, there is disquieting talk of advance compromises on what will be done — or not done. It's fortunate the incoming members will be in the Capitol this week, preparing for January and, not incidentally, observing the lame-duck finale of the Congress that failed on this vital issue.

There will be only one good chance to get this right. Once the new year begins, any feeling of urgency will fade, replaced by a determination to acquire, and protect, whatever power and turf are available. At a minimum, the reforms must include:

Creation of a public integrity office to do more than merely audit lobbyists' filings. If Congress is to regain the public's respect, both houses must create an independent office to investigate the behavioral lapses of lawmakers themselves, not just their sycophants. Anything less, and the ethics issue falls back into the lap of the moribund internal policing machinery that has long protected wayward members.

An enforceable ban, with penalties, on all meals, gifts and travel — not just from lobbyists, but also from the organizations that hire them. The ban should cover staff members as well. Privately financed "fact-finding" junkets should at long last be banned, along with lawmakers' riding as fat cats' chattel on corporate jets for token fares.

Restraints on the revolving-door horde of Congressional alumni turned backslapping lobbyists. Former lawmakers should be required to wait two years, not one, before cashing in on their nice-to-see-you cachet. No lobbyists, even former members, should have access to the floor, gym or cloakroom of either house. If a sitting member of Congress or a staff member starts negotiating for a job in the private sector, he or she should be required to disclose it. The public cannot be expected to tolerate replays of the low moment when architects of the new Medicare drug subsidy plan were secretly working to land lucrative jobs in the pharmaceutical industry while they devised the legislation.

Detailed disclosure of costly and undebated "earmarks" — amendments passed as pork-barrel favors to backdoor pleaders. The secretive spending and midnight conference games should be brought into the sunlight via Internet technology.

Transparency will not stop lawmakers from trying to get funding for pet projects back home. But it might at least discourage them from doing the same thing on behalf of special interest lobbyists.

The new Congress must realize the ethics issue will test its mettle in the opening hours, and signal if real change is possible. A field general of the incoming majority, Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, is already warning that failure to deliver on ethics reform will be "devastating to our standing" in the very first moment of Democratic power.

He is absolutely right.

Seeking Clarity On Inflation (NYT)

By Condrad De Aenlle

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

IS inflation getting a second wind?

If you look at bond yields and economic reports like one on Friday that showed weakness in manufacturing, you may not think so. But other evidence may be more worrisome.

Economic growth and inflation often go hand in hand. Some recent reports have shown a bit of resilience in the housing market and an upward revision to the calculation of third-quarter economic output.

Plainly spelling out the risks, Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, said in a speech last week that inflation remained "uncomfortably high."

None of this has lifted rates on 10-year Treasury notes, which yield less than 4.5 percent, versus short-term rates above 5 percent.

John Lynch, chief market analyst at Evergreen Investments, attributes the strength in Treasuries to investors' faith in Mr. Bernanke and his ability to curb growth enough to keep inflation in check.

That faith will be tested on Friday, when November jobs data is announced. It is a test that Mr. Lynch expects him to pass. A Bloomberg News poll of economists estimates that the economy added 100,000 jobs last month, up from 92,000 in October, with unemployment rising to 4.5 percent from 4.4 percent. Mr. Lynch sees a gain of 100,000 to 125,000 net new jobs.

The number of Americans filing claims for unemployment benefits has been running high, he noted. "Claims have started to creep up in the last several weeks," he said.

He added that the unemployment rate was anything but indicative of a more severe slump that would send bond yields even lower. "It's hard to have a recession if 95 percent-plus of us are working," he said.

A soft landing may not push bond yields much lower or help stocks much, either. Earnings growth is likely to slow with the economy, and that should limit percentage gains in share prices, to the high single digits next year, Mr. Lynch predicted.

DATA WATCH The Bloomberg poll forecasts a dip in the November reading of the Institute for Supply Management's survey of the service economy, to 55.5 from 57.1; that report is due Tuesday. The University of Michigan's first reading of consumer sentiment in December, due Friday, is predicted to show a slight drop to 92, down from 92.1.

Gender Pay Gap Narrows -- For Unexpected Reasons (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — Marie White is a healthcare aide who looks after patients in their homes in Sonoma County, Calif. There's a shortage in her female-dominated profession, which has helped workers unionize and command better pay over the last five years — driving the pay ceiling from $6.75 to $10.50 an hour.

"By organizing, a good many of us have been able to get out of the minimum-wage category," White said.

John Wilson of Los Angeles, meanwhile, is still trying to find a job that pays as much as he earned 12 years ago. Laid off in 1994 from a software programming job that paid $50,000 a year with full health benefits, Wilson went to work as a security officer earning minimum wage.

DOJ_NMG_0101189

Now he works at the Lantana Media Campus in Santa Monica, providing security for such celebrities as Ben Affleck and Cameron Diaz. He has worked his way up to $12.25 an hour, but pays about $100 a month for health insurance for his 15-year-old daughter.

Even though Wilson is making half of what he did before, he feels lucky: Many security guards he knows, mostly men, earn minimum wage without benefits.

White's and Wilson's experiences illustrate a noteworthy trend in the 21st century economy: Women are closing in on men when it comes to wages, but not for the reasons anticipated — or hoped for — when gender pay equity became a rallying cry in the 1970s.

Data show that the pay gap has been narrowing not because women have made great strides, labor experts say, but because men's wages are eroding.

The disparity in median hourly pay between men and women narrowed to 18.3% in August from 21.5% five years earlier, according to recently released census figures. In addition, the U.S. Labor Department noted recently that the wage differential in 2005 was the smallest since the department began tracking it 33 years ago, when it was 36.9%.

Even when men's and women's work patterns are taken into account — men tend to work more hours — the pay gap is narrowing. The difference between men's and women's median annual earnings shrank between 2000 and 2005 from 26.3% to 23%, or 77 cents on each dollar earned by men. Women earned an average $31,858 and men $41,386.

The gap was even smaller in California: 17.8%, with women earning $37,076 and men $45,126.

However — as the economy expanded, profits rose and unemployment fell — men's hourly wages declined a total of 2% from 2000 to 2005 while women's rose 3%, census records show. Women's gains were barely enough to keep up with inflation.

"Wages generally have been depressed, but men's have been more depressed," said Michele Leber, chair of the Washington-based National Committee on Pay Equity, who called the trend "discouraging."

Economists say the forces behind these trends show that men and women are experiencing the economy in different ways.

In the U.S., men have tended to dominate in blue-collar and manufacturing jobs, which have been disappearing — or seeing downward wage pressure — for the last few decades.

Women, on the other hand, have been more prevalent in service jobs such as healthcare, which historically have been lower-paying but have seen wages rise in recent years.

Indeed, economists note that among those with a high school education or less, men's wages have been falling while women's have been rising due to increased demand for service-sector jobs.

Meanwhile, better-educated women have seen their pay rise — but not as much as their male counterparts have. So women's gains relative to men's appear to be coming mostly in lower-wage jobs.

The gap started narrowing in the 1980s due largely to women's increased access to education and better-paying jobs. In the 1990s, their gains leveled out while men's wages rose at all skill levels, thanks to the economic expansion fueled by the dot-com boom, economists say.

Women lost some ground in the recession after 2001, said Heather Boushey, an economist at the Washington-based Center for Economic and Policy Research, and have seen their wage gains resume only recently.

"This year [women's relative pay] reached a new peak, but I don't think it was much to get excited about, especially since the only reason was because men's wages fell faster," Boushey said.

Some say a vanishing pay gap should be celebrated as good news, no matter what the reason.

"All we care about is the ratio," said Claudia Goldin, a Harvard University economics professor who has studied women in the workforce.

While men may be earning less, women are earning more on average than they used to, which is in itself an achievement, said Francine D. Blau, the Frances Perkins professor of Industrial and Labor Relations and Labor Economics at Cornell University.

Indeed, she said, achieving pay equity almost requires a slowdown in men's wage growth. "You can't have it both ways," Blau said. "For women to catch up, their wages have to grow more."

But other economists and pay equity advocates say the whole idea of narrowing the gap was to help women and their families earn substantively more.

"We're closing the wage gap in exactly the wrong way," said Rebecca Blank, dean of the University of Michigan's Gerald R. Ford School of Public Policy. "The idea was that women's wages were supposed to rise, not that men's wages would fall to women's level."

Economist Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute in Washington said: "Low-wage men have just been taking it on the chin. What you would like to see, especially during a period when the economy is growing at a good clip, is men's wages rising but women's wages rising more as they move toward equal pay for equal work."

Blank said that men and women's wages would probably stabilize and then rise during the next two decades as baby boomers retire and the labor supply dwindles.

White, the home health worker, said she hoped something could be done sooner to help workers — both men and women — who had seen their pay suffer. She noted that although her pay had risen in recent years, "it's still not a living wage."

"You have loads of people down at the bottom and super jobs at the top and the middle class in between being really squeezed," she said. "It's got to get better because we can't survive on these wages. It's scary."

Downsized, But Not Out Of Demand (LAT)

By P.j. Huffstutter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

Former autoworkers find themselves courted by industries elsewhere.

DEARBORN, MICH. — After spending most of his working life on an assembly floor at Ford Motor Co., Harold Jackson wasn't expecting many offers as he trudged into a job fair at the union hall.

Here he was, a 40-year-old factory worker in a state that has lost about 110,000 auto jobs over the last six years.

But John Riddle, a recruiter for CSX Transportation Inc., pressed forward out of the crowd to shake his hand. "Ever thought about moving to the East Coast? Ever wanted to be a train conductor?"

After Riddle finished his spiel, a recruiter from the U.S. Secret Service stepped up, touting the wonder of government service, pointing out that such jobs couldn't be outsourced to India and that no Japanese competitor could underbid the work.

Soon, instructors who train casino dealers were courting Jackson with visions of fat tips and flexible hours.

"I had no idea there were so many options," Jackson said.

After decades of being kicked around by foreign competitors and laid off by the hundreds of thousands by their U.S. employers, the autoworker has unexpectedly become one of the hottest commodities in industrial America.

Last week, Ford announced that 38,000 factory workers had agreed to take buyout and early retirement offers to leave their jobs as soon as January, walking away with payouts of as much as $140,000 each. Nearly 35,000 General Motors employees took buyouts over the summer.

Michigan is suffering through the longest stretch of job losses since the Great Depression, and the outlook for autoworkers is expected to remain grim, according to a recent report by the Research Seminar in Quantitative Economics at the University of Michigan.

From now through the end of 2008, the state's manufacturing sector is expected to lose 11.5% of its remaining workforce, seven in 10 of these jobs from the auto industry, the report said.

But for employers outside the Rust Belt, the bounty of former autoworkers is pure gold. For generations, these workers have epitomized the industrial work ethic, putting in long hours on often mind-numbing tasks involving complex machinery.

"There's a huge pool of people that know how to work hard, have enough skills that they can be retrained and are hungry for a job," said Kathryn Blackwell, a corporate spokeswoman for Union Pacific Railroad. Company recruiters have attended several Midwestern job fairs in search of replacements for its own aging work force.

"Considering the economy's doing well in other parts of the country, what company needing workers wouldn't see this as a prime opportunity?" Blackwell said.

DOJ_NMG_0101191

Squeezing through a dirt-streaked crowd of fellow autoworkers freshly clocked out of their factory shifts, Corey Wilson wandered the packed United Auto Workers Local 600 hall. Every few steps, recruiters stuffed tchotchkes into his hands — along with job applications.

Have a free mug. By the way, electricians are wanted in Florida. Take this pen. Did you know that welders are needed in Wyoming? How about a slice of pizza? You can use your Ford buyout money to open a Little Caesars franchise in the Southwest.

Overwhelmed, Wilson — who has worked on a Ford assembly line for five years — stepped away from the crowd and found a quiet corner.

Framed black-and-white photographs hung along the walls around him: autoworkers marching in 1932 to demand jobs and emergency relief from Ford; police attacking the protesters; and bodies littering the streets.

Suddenly, a recruiter stepped up, blocking Wilson's view.

"What are you looking for?" asked Robert Gale, who was seeking students for Home Building Workshops Inc. "What do you want?"

Wilson, 36, will leave his Ford assembly line job next year with $100,000 in buyout money, no health insurance and no idea of what to do with the rest of his life.

His reply was simple: "Opportunity."

But leaving Michigan to take advantage of job offers sometimes isn't easy.

Couples find themselves scrambling to land jobs in the same city. And cuts in the workforce here have dragged down property values and slowed home sales.

Blackwell — who worked in media relations at Ford and DaimlerChrysler AG before she and her husband headed to Omaha in 2001 so she could take the Union Pacific job — said she has tried over the years to sell friends back home on the idea of following her.

Few have been willing to make the jump.

"I've really had to talk up Nebraska. We don't have any lines at restaurants. We don't have traffic. There's a lot of money here, so there's heavy support for cultural things," Blackwell said. "Sure, the salaries aren't as high as you can make in the auto industry. But there's stability.

"But when you're working for an auto company," she said, "you consider yourself part of a family that built the American dream. Leaving that dream behind is too much for a lot of people."

Other recruiters have enjoyed more success. Campbell County, a rural part of northeast Wyoming where natural gas and coal production is booming, has hosted several job fairs in Michigan this year. More than 100 residents have left the Wolverine State for the Great Plains, said Ruth Benson, executive director of the Campbell County Economic Development Corp.

She's planning another Michigan fair in March, as well as trips next year to Indiana, Wisconsin and Ohio.

"The Midwesterners are hearty, blue-collared folks. They're our kind of people," Benson said. "Now that we're getting them here, the question for us is whether they'll stay here for the long term, or whether the draw back home will be too strong to ignore."

Health Hazard: Computers Spilling Your History (NYT)

By Milt Freudenheim And Robert Pear

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

BILL CLINTON'S identity was hidden behind a false name when he went to NewYork-Presbyterian Hospital two years ago for heart surgery, but that didn't stop computer hackers, including people working at the hospital, from trying to get a peek at the electronic records of his medical charts.

The same hospital thwarted 1,500 unauthorized attempts by its own employees to look at the patient records of a famous local athlete, said J. David Liss, a vice president at NewYork-Presbyterian.

And just last September, the New York City public hospital system said that dozens of workers at one of its Brooklyn medical centers, including doctors and nurses, technicians and clerks, had improperly looked at the computerized medical records of Nixzmary Brown, a 7-year-old who prosecutors say was beaten to death by her stepfather last winter.

DOJ_NMG_0101192

Powerful forces are lobbying hard for government and private programs that could push the nation's costly and inefficient health care system into the computer age. President Bush strongly favors more use of health information technology. Health insurance and medical device companies are eager supporters, not to mention technology companies like I.B.M. and Google. Furthermore, Intel and Wal-Mart Stores have both said they intend to announce plans this week to embrace electronic health records for their employees.

Others may soon follow. Bills to speed the adoption of information technology by hospitals and doctors have passed both chambers of Congress.

But the legislation has bogged down, largely because of differences over how to balance the health care industry's interest in efficiently collecting, studying and using data with privacy concerns for tens of millions of ordinary Americans — not just celebrities and victims of crime.

Advocates of such legislation, including Representative Joe L. Barton, the Texas Republican who is the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said that concern about snooping should not freeze progress on adopting technology that could save money and improve care.

"Privacy is an important issue," said Mr. Barton, who will lose the chairman's post when the Democrats take over next year, "but more important is that we get a health information system in place." Congress can address privacy later "if we need to," he said.

Democrats, however, have made it clear that they are determined to address the issue of medical-records privacy once they take command of both houses of Congress next month. "There is going to be much more emphasis placed upon privacy protections in the next two years than we have seen in the last 12 years," said Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts and a longtime privacy advocate.

Mr. Markey, a member of the Energy and Commerce committee, said he supported legislation that would allow individuals to keep their medical records out of electronic databases, and require health care providers to notify patients when health information is "lost, stolen or used for an unauthorized purpose."

Representative John D. Dingell of Michigan, the ranking Democrat who is expected to become chairman of the Energy and Commerce committee next month, said that expanding electronic health care systems "clearly has great potential benefit." But he added that "it also poses serious threats to patients' privacy by creating greater amounts of personal information susceptible to thieves, rascals, rogues and unauthorized users." Members of his committee, as well as the House Ways and Means Committee, have been struggling with such issues.

Academic medical centers like NewYork-Presbyterian have considerable experience with electronic records. But many other hospitals have been slow to jump on board, as have doctors and patients. Only one in four doctors used electronic health records in 2005, according to a recent study by researchers at Massachusetts General Hospital and George Washington University, and fewer than 1 in 10 doctors used the technology for important tasks like prescribing drugs, ordering tests and making treatment decisions.

Cathy Schoen, a senior researcher at the Commonwealth Fund, a nonprofit foundation, said primary-care doctors in the United States were far less likely than doctors in other industrialized countries to use electronic records. In Britain, 89 percent of doctors use them, according to a recent report in the online edition of the journal Health Affairs; in the Netherlands, 98 percent do.

Technology experts have many explanations for the slow adoption of the technology in the United States, including the high initial cost of the equipment, difficulties in communicating among competing systems and fear of lawsuits against hospitals and doctors that share data.

But the toughest challenge may be a human one: acute public concern about security breaches and identity theft. Even when employers pay workers to set up computerized personal health records, many bridle, fearing private information will fall into the wrong hands and be used against them.

"When I talk to employees, the top concern they have is: 'What happens to my information? What about the Social Security numbers on my employee insurance, as well as the identity threat now appearing in health care?' " Harriett P. Pearson, I.B.M.'s chief privacy officer, said in a recent interview. "We have to be proactive about addressing privacy issues."

Dr. J. Brent Pawlecki, associate medical director at Pitney Bowes, the business services company, said that people in the United States are most concerned that they could lose their health insurance, based on something in their health records. Pitney Bowes is weighing the pros and cons of electronic personal health records for its employees.

The worries are widely held. Most Americans say they are concerned that an employer might use their health insurance records to limit job opportunities, according to several surveys, including a recent one by the nonprofit Markle Foundation.

Some patients are so fearful that they make risky decisions about their health. One in eight respondents in a survey last fall by the California HealthCare Foundation said they had tried to hide a medical problem by using tactics like skipping a prescribed test or asking the doctor to "fudge a diagnosis."

Dr. Stephen J. Walsh, a psychiatrist and former president of the San Francisco Medical Society, said, "I see many patients who don't want any information about their seeing a psychiatrist on a record anywhere."

CONGRESS addressed some of these concerns in 1996, when it passed the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act. That made it a federal crime, albeit rarely punished, to disclose private medical information improperly.

But critics say that the law has some worrisome loopholes, that infractions are rarely prosecuted, and that violators have almost never been punished. The law, for example, lets company representatives review employees' medical records in order to process health insurance claims.

Critics say that it would not be unusual in some companies for the same supervisor to be in charge both of insurance claims and of hiring and firing decisions; this could allow companies to comb their ranks for people with expensive illnesses and find some reason to fire them as a way to keep health costs under control. Easily accessible computerized files would make the job that much easier, the critics say.

Joy L. Pritts, a health policy analyst at Georgetown University, said that in developing and promoting health information technology, the government seemed to assume that it could "tack on privacy protections later." But she warned: "That attitude can really backfire. If you don't have the trust of patients, they will withhold information and won't take advantage of the new system."

Executives can hire private tutors who specialize in teaching how to stay on the right side of the rules. But based on the experience so far, there is little chance that executives will be punished if they break them.

The Office for Civil Rights in the Department of Health and Human Services has received more than 22,000 complaints under the portability law since the federal privacy standards took effect in 2003; allegations of "impermissible disclosure" have been among the most common complaints. But the civil rights office has filed only three criminal cases and imposed no civil fines. Instead, it said, it has focused on educating violators about the law and encouraging them to obey it in the future.

With federal enforcement so weak, privacy advocates say they are also concerned about recent efforts in Congress to preempt state consumer protection laws. They often provide stronger privacy rights and remedies, particularly for information on H.I.V. infection, mental illness and other specific conditions.

State laws, unlike the federal law, have resulted in some stiff penalties. Last April, a California state appeals court approved a malpractice award of $291,000 to Nicholas Francies, a San Francisco restaurant manager, who lost his job after his doctor disclosed his H.I.V.-positive status in a worker's compensation notice to Mr. Francies's employer. He also got $160,000 from his employer in a settlement.

Dr. Deborah C. Peel, a psychiatrist and privacy advocate in Austin, Tex., has assembled a broad group called the Patient Privacy Rights Foundation, to lobby in Washington. Members span the political spectrum, from the American Civil Liberties Union and the U.S. Public Interest Research Group to the American Conservative Union and the Family Research Council.

Newt Gingrich, the Republican former House speaker, has called for "a 21st-century intelligent health system" based on electronic records. He also says individuals "must have the ability to control who can access their personal health information."

"People do have a legitimate right to control their records," said Mr. Gingrich, who has worked closely with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, on the issue of computerized records. On their own, they have also advocated strict rules to protect privacy.

Mr. Gingrich noted that the Senate had twice passed bills to prohibit discrimination based on personal genetic information; the House did not vote on them. Democrats say the outlook for such legislation will improve when they take control of Congress.

EVEN without new federal laws to guide them, some companies have begun to encourage their employees to embrace electronic medical records. At Pitney Bowes, employees are paid a bonus if they store a copy of their personal health records on WebMD.com, the medical Web site.

"We haven't pushed that, except to make an offering," Dr. Pawlecki said. But for those without electronic records, he added, "any time you go to a different system or a different doctor, the chances are that your records will not be able to follow you." As a result, there is a risk of "harmful care," like drug interactions or side effects, he said, as well as risks of omitting needed care and conducting duplicate tests.

Pitney Bowes and WebMD Health are among a group of 25 companies meeting with Ms. Pearson of I.B.M. to develop a set of principles and best practices that she said would help persuade people that their employers really did not look at private information stored online.

Ms. Pearson's group is working with Janlori Goldman, director of the Health Privacy Project in Washington. Employers need to adopt standards for personal health records that address their workers' privacy, confidentiality and security concerns, Ms. Goldman said.

WebMD, which manages employees' health records for dozens of companies, had discussions earlier this year with Google, which is developing a Web site called Google Health, according to people familiar with the project. Google has not commented on its plans. But commenting generally on the issues, Adam Bosworth, the vice president for engineering at Google, said that privacy is a hurdle for technology companies addressing health care problems.

"There is a huge potential for technology to improve health care and reduce its cost," Mr. Bosworth said in a statement. "But companies that offer products and services must vigorously protect the privacy of users, or adoption of very useful new products and services will fail."

Even before the theft this year of a Veterans Affairs official's laptop that contained private medical records of 28 million people, a consumer survey found that repeated security breaches were raising concerns about the safety of personal health records.

About one in four people were aware of those earlier breaches, according to a national telephone survey of 1,000 adults last year for the California HealthCare Foundation. The margin of error was plus or minus 3 percentage points.

The survey, conducted by Forrester Research, also found that 52 percent were "very concerned" or "somewhat concerned" that insurance claims information might be used by an employer to limit their job opportunities.

The Markle survey, to be published this week, will report even greater worry — 56 percent were very concerned, 18 percent somewhat concerned — about abuse by employers. But despite their worries, the Markle respondents were eager to reap the benefits of Internet technology — for example, having easy access to their own health records.

Companies that have tried to use computers to increase the efficiency of medical care say their success has hinged on security. "The privacy piece was critical," said Al Rapp, corporate health care manager at United Parcel Service, which recently introduced a health care program built on computerizing the records of 80,000 nonunion employees.

U.P.S. offers to add $50 each to workers' flexible spending accounts if they agree to supply information for a personal "health risk appraisal." They can receive another $50 if spouses also participate. More than half accepted, Mr. Rapp said, with the understanding that the information would go to data archives at UnitedHealth Group and Aetna. "We are not involved in any way," he said, referring to U.P.S.'s managers.

Aetna and UnitedHealth combine these appraisals with each person's history of medical claims and prescription drug purchases. When the software signals a personal potential for costly conditions like diabetes, heart problems and asthma, an insurance company nurse, or health coach, telephones the employee with suggestions for preventive care and reminders for checkups, taking medications and the like.

"The employee can tell the nurse who calls that they don't want to participate," Mr. Rapp said. "Thus far, it has been very well accepted."

Last week, he said, the health coach reached out to the spouse of an employee after noting that her condition and weight suggested a potential risk for a heart attack.

DOJ_NMG_0101195

“She asked this person, ‘Are you taking your cholesterol medication, Lipitor?’ She said, ‘I won’t take Lipitor,’ ” and went on to mention the side effects she had read about on the Internet, Mr. Rapp said.

The nurse informed the woman’s doctor, who changed her prescription to a similar drug, Mr. Rapp said. He added that he was one of “a very few select people in the human resources department” who are permitted to see personal health records, under the federal privacy rules.

“I can see the names, to see the issues,” Mr. Rapp said. “I manage the program. I have responsibility for the success of the program.” But he added that he was prohibited under the law from sharing the employee’s data with other U.P.S. managers. “Generally speaking, U.P.S. would have no knowledge of it,” Mr. Rapp said.

Still, worries linger across the health care system. Hospital executives say that private investigators have often tried to bribe hospital employees to obtain medical records that might be useful in court cases, including battles over child custody, divorce, property ownership and inheritance.

But computer technology — the same systems that disseminate data at the click of a mouse — can also enhance security.

Mr. Liss, of NewYork-Presbyterian, said that when unauthorized people tried to gain access to electronic medical records, hospital computers were programmed to ask them to explain why they were seeking the information.

Moreover, Mr. Liss said, the computer warns electronic intruders: “Be aware that your user ID and password have been captured.”

Reality Check For Stem Cell Optimism (LAT)

By Mary Engel

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

The meeting was almost over when Roman Reed steered his wheelchair to the microphone.

On the table before him sat a 149-page book of budget charts and timetables, the first concrete outline of what California's voter-approved stem cell institute plans to accomplish in its 10-year lifespan.

"I want to thank you from the bottom of my heart," Reed said to the institute's staff and 29-member oversight board in October. "I promised my son that one day I would be able to walk, stand next to him and go hold my wife's hand. And seeing this road map to cures, I know that this will come true."

The room at Los Angeles' Luxe Hotel thundered with applause for the Fremont resident, who broke his neck while playing college football in 1994.

Despite the enthusiasm of Reed and his audience, the book offered no promise of a cure for his paralysis.

Two years after California voters authorized $3 billion in bonds to fund stem cell research, the institute created to oversee the enterprise has just begun what experts see as a long and slow scientific journey. Even with the $150-million state loan approved recently to kick-start work stalled by legal challenges, there are no breakthroughs in sight. Gone are the allusions to healing such afflictions as spinal cord injuries and Parkinson's and Alzheimer's diseases that dominated the 2004 campaign for Proposition 71. In fact, scientists say, there is no guarantee of cures — certainly not any time soon — from the measure that was optimistically titled the California Stem Cell Research and Cures Act.

Set for final approval at UC Irvine this week, the draft plan is clear: "It is unlikely that [the California Institute of Regenerative Medicine] will be able to fully develop stem cell therapy for routine clinical use during the 10 years of the plan."

Instead, the top goal is to establish, in principle, that a therapy developed from human embryonic stem cells can "restore function for at least one disease."

That would be only the first step toward persuading pharmaceutical or biotech companies to fund expanded clinical trials, a process that takes years and millions of dollars. Fewer than 20% of potential therapies that enter trials make it to market.

In addition, the institute hopes to have treatments for two to four more diseases in development within the decade.

"We picked a goal that we thought was realistic, that, with some luck, would be achieved," institute President Zach Hall said. "The field will go on beyond 10 years. We want to have a whole pipeline of things that are in movement."

Honesty appreciated

DOJ_NMG_0101196

Jesse Reynolds of the Oakland-based Center for Genetics and Society, a watchdog group that supports stem cell research but advocates better public accountability, called the goals "refreshingly honest."

"The Prop. 71 campaign went beyond the line of responsible political rhetoric," he said. "If there are therapies, they're decades out."

One TV ad, for instance, showed an unidentified young mother beside a child strapped in a wheelchair and breathing through a tube.

"I will vote 'yes' on Prop. 71, definitely," the woman said. "I believe that it's something that can cure spinal cord injuries."

State Senate Health Committee Chairwoman Deborah Ortiz (D-Sacramento), another research backer, was philosophical about the campaign's optimism.

"A campaign requires a message to be driven home," she said. "You can't raise those hopes and then say, 'Oh by the way, it may take us 10 or 15 years.' That's just the nature of campaigns."

California's attempt to cure diseases by referendum is unique. But touting dramatic cures in exchange for research dollars has become "the American way" of doing medical research, said Robert Blendon, professor of health policy and management at the Harvard School of Public Health.

The Nixon-era "war on cancer" suggested that a country that could put a man on the moon — in less than a decade — could surely find a cure within the same time frame. Now, Blendon said, "You can't just talk about investing in research without the equivalent of the trip to the moon."

Such campaigns appeal to an American public that expresses great faith in science but shows little understanding of the plodding nature of most scientific research. Blendon doesn't see downplaying the time frame as dishonest as long as the research truly holds potential.

Proposition 71 came about in response to President Bush's August 2001 mandate restricting federal funding to only a handful of human embryonic stem cell lines, prompted by moral concerns about destruction of embryos during such research. When the measure passed in November 2004, jubilant supporters had predicted that $350 million a year from bond sales would start flowing to scientists by May 2005.

The first reality check came in the form of lawsuits by taxpayer and antiabortion groups.

A loan from the state

Today, the bonds remain tied up in litigation, though stem cell institute officials are confident that an appellate court will uphold a favorable ruling from a Superior Court judge. To tide over the institute, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in July promised a $150-million state loan. A state finance committee formally approved the loan Nov. 20, and the institute is gearing up to award its first research grants in January.

Even if researchers hit the ground running, the field is young and progress is likely to be slow. Scientists at the University of Wisconsin derived the first human embryonic stem cells just eight years ago, using donated embryos left over from in vitro fertilization clinics.

Dana Cody, executive director of Life Legal Defense Foundation, which represents two of the groups that sued, said the plan's modest ambitions are a sign that the initiative's promise was overblown.

"I just don't understand the fascination with embryonic stem cell research other than that it's something supported by Hollywood," said Cody, whose organization supports research using adult stem cells. "Even proponents say it's going to be years before any breakthroughs are made, if at all."

Those who support the research — especially those whose lives could depend on it — see the institute's plan through a lens of hope.

The science "is coming along fast, in my opinion," said John Ames, whose son David was diagnosed with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis, or Lou Gehrig's disease, four years ago. "I'm not trying to contradict the position of the strategic plan, but we have hope. We're going to win."

The life expectancy of someone diagnosed with the devastatingly progressive neuromuscular disease is three to five years.

"The thing that drives these individuals and their families is hope," said Christopher Thomas Scott, executive director of the Stanford Program on Stem Cells in Society. "Without that hope, it's very difficult to get yourself going."

DOJ_NMG_0101197

Joan Samuelson prefers to call it determination. The Napa Valley attorney founded the Parkinson's Action Network 18 years ago, two years after being diagnosed with early onset Parkinson's disease. She now sits on the institute's oversight board.

"I care deeply about how urgently we pursue the mission of Prop. 71," she said. "I wake up every day with a disorder that gets worse with the passage of time."

To Samuelson, the campaign was about potential. The institute's plan is about day-to-day implementation. They may sound different, she said, but they are steps toward the same goal.

"I read the realism, if you will, as a statement of the fact that this isn't going to be easy," she said. "Nothing great is easy."

Cells' unique ability

What makes embryonic stem cells unique — and so full of potential — is their ability to become any type of cell in the body.

Some researchers envision someday transplanting such cells into patients whose own cells have been damaged by injury or disease, with the hope that the transplanted cells develop into new spinal cord or pancreas cells. But scientists don't yet understand the cues that trigger an undifferentiated embryonic stem cell to become, say, an insulin-secreting pancreas cell.

The plan more accurately reflects what most scientists studying human embryonic stem cells are actually doing, at least in this early stage of the research: not so much curing a disease as studying it.

Scientists, for instance, can introduce the gene for Lou Gehrig's or Parkinson's into a human embryonic stem cell and unravel some of the mysteries of how such diseases develop. They can use such cells to quickly test thousands of drugs.

"What's happening even now is that human embryonic stem cells and their derivatives are being used for models for developing therapies," said Dr. Arnold Kriegstein, who runs the stem cell research program at UC San Francisco. "It allows us for the first time in a petri dish to have a human disease, not an animal disease. It brings us so much closer to coming up with a therapy that really will work."

Who knows? advocates say. Treatments — even cures — sometimes crop up unexpectedly.

Jeff Sheehy, who represents HIV and AIDS patients on the institute's citizen oversight board, tells the story of his friend Jeff Getty, who died in October of complications from AIDS. In 1995, Getty volunteered for a controversial bone marrow transplant from a baboon.

The transplant didn't take, but Getty, who had been near death, experienced a then-amazing remission that lasted more than 10 years. It turned out that the drugs used to prepare him for the transplant anticipated the antiretroviral cocktail that, a year later, would turn AIDS from a death sentence to an often manageable, chronic disease.

Similarly, Sheehy asked, if scientists fail to successfully transplant embryonic stem cells but along the way discover drugs or other treatments that work, wouldn't the research be considered a success?

"My thing is just not to get obsessed with what was presented in the campaign," Sheehy said. "Science is a very complex business. It's full of failure. It's full of opportunity. And failure often equals opportunity."

National Health Care? We're Halfway There (NYT)

By Daniel Gross

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

WHEN Democrats assume control of Congress next month, they may be dusting off some long-dormant proposals on how to deal with the growing disconnect between health insurance and employment. From 2000 to 2005, the proportion of workers aged 18 to 64 with employment-based health benefits fell to 70.6 percent from 74.5 percent, according to the Employee Benefits Research Institute. A record 46.6 million Americans lacked health insurance last year; of them, more than 82 percent lived in households headed by someone holding a job.

Any efforts to expand government's role in providing insurance will likely be opposed by the Bush administration, which says it opposes excessive direct government involvement in an industry that constitutes about 14 percent of the gross domestic product. Michael O. Leavitt , the secretary of health and human services, recently dismissed a proposal to have the government negotiate drug prices for the Medicare benefit, arguing that "it's a surrogate for a much larger issue, which is really government-run health care."

While the administration may oppose government-run health care in principle, the government's role in the vast health industry has been expanding. By various measures, the United States is about halfway toward a system in which the government and taxpayers fully fund health care. And trends are pushing the government to become more involved each year.

Out of a total population of about 300 million, 35.6 million elderly Americans were on Medicare in 2005. Of the working-age population, which reached 257.8 million in 2005, some 45.5 million were covered by Medicare, Medicaid or military health programs, according to the benefits institute. An additional 18.2 million workers had health insurance through jobs in the public sector, which includes state, federal and local governments, public schools and state universities, according to Paul Fronstin, director of the institute's health research and education program. Millions of those workers' dependents are covered as well. Even if those dependents are not included in the tally, taxpayers paid the bill for almost two-fifths of all Americans with insurance in 2005.

But that's not the full extent of government and taxpayer involvement. Employer-provided health insurance premiums are a form of compensation, yet are not subject to federal payroll or income taxes and are exempt from many state and local taxes. Economists consider these exemptions a form of subsidy. Thomas M. Selden, economist at the federal Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, estimates that the tax subsidy for employment-related coverage at $208.6 billion in 2006, or 35.4 percent of the amount spent on premiums.

"The tax subsidy is one of the largest public expenditures on health care," Mr. Selden said. In fiscal 2006, by comparison, spending on Medicare was $378.7 billion and federal spending on Medicaid was $180.6 billion.

Viewed strictly in terms of dollars and cents, the government already accounts for more than half of the nation's health care spending. Mining data from the National Health Expenditures Accounts, Mr. Selden found that public expenditures on health care — Medicare, Medicaid, military health care and federal employee benefits — accounted for $888 billion of the $1.96 trillion spent on health care in 2004. Adding in the aforementioned subsidies, and premiums paid for public-sector employees, the total comes to $1.2 trillion, or 61 percent.

Uwe E. Reinhardt, the James Madison professor of political economy at Princeton, suggests adding 5 percent for the federal mandate that hospitals provide free health care to the uninsured. "So government accounts for about two-thirds of health care spending," Mr. Reinhardt said.

The government spends money as if there were a national health insurance program. In 2004, government spending on health care equaled 9.6 percent of the gross domestic product, compared with 6.9 percent in Canada, which has a single-payer universal health care program, said David Himmelstein, associate professor of medicine at Harvard Medical School. And yet some significant components of federal support are not efficient methods of providing health insurance to the people who most need it. Higher-income workers are likely to have higher rates of coverage, higher premiums and higher taxes, all of which means that the tax break for compensation disproportionately helps the well-off.

"We're paying for national health insurance, but we're not getting it," Dr. Himmelstein added.

Taxpayers also don't get as much bang for their bucks because the government guarantees coverage for the elderly and the poor, groups that account for a disproportionately large amount of expenditures.

"A rough rule holds that private insurance covers two-thirds of the population and pays for only one-third of all health care," Mr. Reinhardt said.

THE raw figures may be worrisome, but the trends behind the data are clearly troubling. Despite five consecutive years of economic growth, the private sector has continued to reduce its role in providing insurance. As the population ages, the ranks of Medicare recipients grow. And if the price of health insurance keeps rising at a much faster rate than the average earnings of lower-income people, more and more of the working poor will be priced out of the market.

So even as politicians rail against the pernicious effects of government-run health care, taxpayers, one way or another, are likely to be footing more of the nation's huge and mounting medical bills.

Clinton's Talks With Democrats May Signal Bid For President (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101199

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has begun a calculated series of meetings with top New York Democratic officials to signal that she is likely to run for the presidency in 2008 and to ask for their support if she does, according to one state Democratic official who spoke with her and two others who have been briefed on her plans.

Senator Clinton met last week with Charles B. Rangel, the dean of the New York Congressional delegation, in what her advisers said was an effort to meet with most New York Congressional Democrats by the end of this month to discuss her plans.

On Friday, she also spoke with Herman D. Farrell Jr., the chairman of the State Democratic Party, Mr. Farrell said, and she plans to meet with Governor-elect Eliot Spitzer as early as today. Mr. Farrell confirmed that Senator Clinton briefed him on her 2008 intentions; Mr. Rangel declined to describe their conversation.

Senator Clinton's outreach was disclosed and confirmed yesterday by three New York Democratic officials, all on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized by the Clinton camp to release the information. One of the officials said he was contacted by Senator Clinton directly about her plans. The two others said they were informed by senior Clinton advisers that she was entering a new phase of contacting officials to line up support for a possible presidential bid.

Her maneuvering comes at a time of growing speculation about a hard-fought contest for the Democratic presidential nomination between her and another possible hopeful, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois.

Mr. Obama's political profile has been rising as an antiwar Democrat who proved wildly popular on the campaign trail, aiding candidates in the 2006 elections. With Mr. Obama scheduled this month to visit New Hampshire, the site of the first presidential primary, some Clinton allies see him as the single biggest obstacle to her nomination.

There has been little doubt that Senator Clinton was likely to mount a presidential bid. Her discussion marks a new phase of her exploration, as she seeks to build a united bench of Democratic support in her home state and then reach out for support nationally from elected officials, major donors and allies of both her and her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

Asked yesterday evening about Senator Clinton's conversations with New York Democratic officials, a senior adviser, Howard Wolfson, said, "Senator Clinton made clear that after the election she would begin seriously considering a presidential run, and that process involves reaching out and talking to her colleagues."

Another top adviser to Senator Clinton described the conversations with elected officials in exchange for anonymity because the adviser did not want to be quoted talking about internal deliberations.

"The message is, 'Everybody keep their powder dry,' " the adviser said. "She is seriously looking at it. She's not making any decision yet."

The three Democratic officials said that Senator Clinton was strongly inclined to run for the presidency and was eager to do so, and that her outreach was an important new chapter that was likely to end with her declaration of a candidacy. The one Democrat who described his conversation with her said that Senator Clinton sounded enthusiastic and energized about undertaking a presidential campaign, and that she did not sound equivocal or unsure.

All three Democrats said the Clinton team was clearly moving ahead on a path to a candidacy; Senator Clinton was not seeking advice to make a decision on running, they said, but rather was lining up support so her candidacy was on the strongest possible footing.

While Senator Clinton, in her private conversations with Democrats, is not declaring her candidacy, her outreach is significant because so little had been known until now about her true intentions. And she has been coy at times about whether she would run.

Lengthy magazine articles have speculated about a possible Clinton candidacy, but only now has she taken the affirmative step of asking key officials to support her if she does run.

Such signals, in the political world, are generally interpreted as a sign that a well-positioned politician like Senator Clinton is going to run, barring an unforeseen event or change of heart.

The meetings and telephone calls have involved only Senator Clinton and the elected officials, and not their staffs.

Mr. Rangel, who was instrumental in first recruiting Senator Clinton to run for Senate in 2000, said the two of them had breakfast in New York on Wednesday and discussed her plans.

Mr. Farrell said he received a telephone call directly from her. "I had a discussion with her about her decision to run for president — I'm not telling you what the decision was, only that we had the discussion," he said in an interview yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0101200

He did note that he has been encouraging Senator Clinton to run, and that her news pleased him.

"And I'm positive that if she runs, the people of the United States will elect her as our next president," Mr. Farrell said.

Other Democratic elected officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the Clinton camp has asked them to stay silent, said that Senator Clinton had spent the past week calling allies to describe her plans and her thinking. Somewhat conspicuously, Senator Clinton had no schedule of public events last week, instead holing up at her homes in Washington and in Chappaqua, N.Y., and in private meetings.

Allies of Senator Clinton say that she wants to run for the White House but is weighing whether she can in fact become the first woman to win the presidency. Her advisers appear confident that Senator Clinton could build the sort of broad support among Democrats, independents and women that she had this fall in her landslide re-election victory in New York.

Yet Senator Clinton remains a highly divisive figure for many Americans from her eight years as first lady, her leading role in the failed effort to overhaul the nation's health care system, and the multiple investigations of her husband's administration.

Public polls indicate that Senator Clinton would be the front-runner for the Democratic nomination, were she to run, but they also suggest that a majority of Democrats would prefer to support other party figures — Mr. Obama, former Vice President Al Gore or former United States Senator John Edwards.

Democrats familiar with Senator Clinton's strategy said she had planned to brief New York officials first and then reach out to national party leaders. These Democrats emphasized that she was not declaring her candidacy for the presidency, but they also said that she was expected to become more definitive in her comments about her intentions by the start of the new year.

Senator Clinton also planned to speak with, or had already spoken with, Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver and other members of the Congressional delegation. Senator Charles E. Schumer, Senator Clinton's Democratic colleague, could not be reached for comment through his spokeswoman last night.

The senior Clinton adviser who spoke on condition of anonymity noted that the Clinton camp, with the political and financial assets accrued during Mr. Clinton's presidency and Senator Clinton's own career, was a powerful political force that did not have to hew to any timetable. At the same time, the adviser acknowledged, she cannot wait too long to assemble a campaign operation.

"She can relax through the holidays and into the beginning of next year," the adviser said. "But beginning of next year, she and everybody else who is thinking about this has to start signaling that you are serious. At some point, you have to start locking down political operatives."

Senator Clinton has also kept her political operation well tuned, with a veteran staff of aides and advisers on hand and more than $10 million left in the bank from her 2006 re-election campaign.

Edwards, Clark Carry Debt From Unsuccessful 2004 White House Bids (AP)

AP, December 2, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — Democrats John Edwards and Wesley Clark have debts of several hundred thousand dollars from their unsuccessful White House bids in 2004, a burden as they consider presidential runs in 2008.

Edwards, the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee, had about $2,200 in his campaign account at the end of September and more than $300,000 in unpaid bills from his failed campaign for his party's nomination.

Clark, who has said he will decide in the next few months whether to run again, had about $390,000 left from the last campaign and debts totaling more than $260,000.

According to the Federal Election Commission, candidates are not obligated to pay off debts from a past presidential campaign before starting a new one.

In the case of Edwards and Clark, their 2004 committees will stay open until the debts are retired, but the men are free to begin fundraising for 2008.

Federal law does prohibit them from rolling whatever is left in their 2004 accounts into a 2008 campaign until outstanding bills are paid.

"The campaign wouldn't be able to transfer any assets to a new committee before the debt is retired," said Michelle Ryan, a spokeswoman for the Federal Election Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0101201

It is not uncommon for losing political campaigns to delay paying their bills or sometimes default on payments entirely. But the notion that Edwards and Clark may run again has angered some of their unpaid 2004 vendors, many of whom run relatively small operations with tight cash flow.

"We'd like to be paid and since Clark is considering running for president again, we hope he'd pay us before the next campaign," said Marty Stone of Stones' Phones, which runs political telephone banks and is owed $10,000.

Both the Edwards and Clark campaigns insist they are waiting for the outcome of a federal audit before retiring their debts. Legally, presidential campaigns that receive federal matching funds are subject to audit by the FEC — a process that can take many years.

"The campaign decided to halt payments and keep a positive balance of cash in reserve just in case there are penalties to be paid once the FEC review is complete. At that time the cash will be expended to satisfy these debts," said Erick Mullen, a spokesman for WesPAC, Clark's political committee.

Edwards, generally considered part of the top tier of potential Democratic presidential contenders, is in a significantly weaker financial position than several other leading hopefuls.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, and Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the Democrats' 2004 presidential nominee, each has more than $10 million in their political accounts.

Edwards, the former North Carolina senator, owes $200,000 to a Washington law firm and $64,000 to David Axelrod, a Chicago-based media consultant.

"Campaigns are not businesses. They end abruptly," Axelrod said. "We've been working with them to reconcile the books."

The Clark campaign owed money to nearly two dozen creditors, including $38,500 to pollster Geoff Garin and nearly $19,000 to a Little Rock, Arkansas-based accounting firm.

Separately, Edwards raised more than $2.4 million for the One America Committee, his political action committee formed to fight poverty and promote Democratic candidates in the recent elections. The committee ended the 2006 campaign season with just $23,000 in the bank. Clark raised about $877,000 for WesPAC, his political action committee, and had $49,000 left.

Money from PACs, however, cannot be transferred to presidential campaign committees.

Other would-be presidential contenders over the years have found themselves hamstrung in campaign debt. Former Ohio Democratic Sen. John Glenn took years to pay off $3 million in debt from his failed 1984 presidential campaign.

A Rarity: No Lone Star Candidates In 2008 Presidential Race (COX)

By Ken Herman

Cox News Service, December 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — There's a Texas-sized hole in the crowded field of candidates hanging around the starting line for the 2008 presidential nominations.

The hole? No Texans.

Depending on how and who you count, there are 24 potential candidates, including three from New York and two each from Arkansas and Massachusetts.

Even Delaware, South Dakota and New Mexico have one apiece.

Texas, the Land of the Big Ego, has none, zilch, nada.

Depending again on how you count, 2008 could be the first time in a third- or a half-century in which there might not be a Texan involved in the presidential race.

And Texans are used to having one of their kind not only in the race for the White House but actually in the White House. When President Bush leaves office in 2009, a Texan will have served as president (if you count Dwight Eisenhower, born in Texas, raised in Kansas) or vice president for 36 of the previous 56 years.

Why no Texans in 2008? Nothing personal against the state, observers say, noting instead that Texas, for once, is short on candidates of presidential caliber.

"I don't think it's anti-Texan," Texas A&M political scientist George Edwards said of the absence of home state contenders. "It's more about not having the right people."

DOJ_NMG_0101202

None of the state's top three elected Republicans (Gov. Rick Perry, Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison and John Cornyn) are potential 2008 presidential contenders. Hutchison, however, gets mentions as a potential vice presidential candidate, especially if the Democrats nominate New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and the GOP feels pressured to put a woman on the ticket.

Hutchison could be a tough sell to the GOP's social conservative base because of her support for abortion rights before a fetus is viable outside the womb.

Some of Perry's aides like to see his name added when vice presidential speculation percolates, but that's about as far as that discussion goes.

"The governor is not an impressive figure," said Edwards.

On the other side, there hasn't been serious speculation about a Texas Democrat on a national ticket since the late Lloyd Bentsen did time as Michael Dukakis' running mate in 1988. A Texas Democrat has not won a statewide race since 1994.

The fact that Texas lacks a candidate ready for a presidential race might be fortuitous because the nation probably is not ready for back-to-back Texans in the White House.

"Everyone assumes that there will never be two Texans in a row in the White House," said David Beckwith, a Cornyn aide and longtime GOP political operative who once worked for Vice President Quayle. "So in all likelihood it would be a non-starter even if someone was running."

The last state to have back-to-back presidents was New York, with Chester Allen Arthur elected 1880 and Grover Cleveland in 1884.

Political scientist Edwards, a professor at Texas A&M's Bush School of Government and Public Service, believes the specific Texan now in the White House would be a negative for any Texan who ran in 2008.

"Any association with Bush is not likely to be helpful, certainly in a general election," Edwards said in a nod to Bush's low favorability ratings.

In New Hampshire, a state that prides itself on its pivotal role in picking presidents, veteran GOP operative Tom Rath does not sense any anti-Texan sentiment after six years of Bush, who ran a poor second to Arizona Sen. John McCain in the 2000 GOP primary in the Granite State.

"I don't think it has anything to do with Texas," said Rath, a senior adviser to Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's presidential campaign. "There were those days when there were signs in Texas that said, 'Drive fast. Freeze a Yankee.' Those regional differences have gone away now. We're pretty cosmopolitan here in acceptance of people from all over the country."

The lack of a Texas contender?

"I don't see anything inherently off the mark about Texas other than that in their gestation of candidates they don't have one that's as fully developed" as Bush and other Texans have been, Rath said.

"There's not a New Hampshire person either," he added about the 2008 field. "We haven't has one since Franklin Pierce."

Beckwith, a native of Washington state, acknowledged that the Texas mystique has its upside and downside.

"People are proud to say they are from Texas, and it conjures up an image," he said. "If you say, 'I'm from Illinois,' it conjures up almost nothing. Though I'm sure that periodically the happiness people have in identifying themselves as Texans wears on other people."

Democrats Face A Tough Job, Leader Says (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 2 — The Democratic National Committee chairman, Howard Dean, warned party leaders on Saturday not to revel too long in the victories from last month's midterm elections or treat their Congressional majorities as a permanent directive from voters.

"The other party made mistakes in the past claiming that elections are mandates," Mr. Dean said. "Elections are not mandates. The voters of this country loaned the Democrats the power of the country for two years. Now it's our job to earn it back again."

DOJ_NMG_0101203

In a speech to the party's executive committee here, Mr. Dean said "governing is more difficult than campaigning," and declared that Democrats must not squander opportunities to keep building the party. The modest gains winning over evangelical voters, he said, should be strengthened by asserting that "moral values are an important part of foreign policy."

"If George Bush made any single huge mistake," Mr. Dean said, "it's that he thought he could be president by being president for half of America and by treating the rest of us with contempt. That is not a mistake I ever want Democrats to make."

In the celebratory aftermath of the November elections, Democrats have rushed to seize credit for winning control of the House, the Senate and the majority of governor's offices. But despite the jubilation, many longtime party leaders have criticized Mr. Dean's 50-state strategy, saying Democrats could have won even more seats had he not dispatched money and personnel to states that typically favor Republicans.

"Everybody had a huge contribution to make — including some of the participants in all the feuding that was going on," Mr. Dean told reporters. To make his point on Saturday, Mr. Dean invited two newly elected members of the House to address the gathering of a few dozen party officials. The representatives-elect, Tim Walz of Minnesota and Nancy Boyda of Kansas, said they defeated Republican incumbents with the help of Mr. Dean's on-the-ground strategy to reorganize and rebuild the party.

In an interview, Ms. Boyda said it was time to look forward. She said that she and the other Democrats who defeated Republican candidates would face a difficult burden winning re-election if the party did not follow through on pledges made in the midterm elections.

"My personal concern is that the presidential campaign is going to dominate the conversation," Ms. Boyda said. "If that happens and Democrats can't get anything done, we will get kicked out of office just as fast as the Republicans."

Democratic Chairman Says Party Must Show Results (AP)

By Will Lester

AP, December 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats face a challenge defending their gains in the 2006 congressional elections because "now it's what we do and not what we say," national chairman Howard Dean told party leaders.

Dean told members of the Democratic Party's executive committee on Saturday: "Governing is more difficult than campaigning" — noting the big job the Democrats will face when they take control of Congress in January.

Also on Saturday, a Democratic National Committee rules panel gave preliminary approval to a plan to give bonus delegates to states that hold their presidential contests in April 2008 or later. That plan is intended to discourage states from jamming up the early weeks of presidential voting by moving their contests up.

Democrats, who will take control of both the House and the Senate, have outlined an agenda that includes overhauling ethics, raising the minimum wage and making college more affordable.

Dean said Democrats must prove to people in conservative and swing districts that they can earn the voters' trust.

"Elections are not mandates. Elections are power being loaned to politicians for a two-year period by the voters of this country," Dean said. "Now it's our job to earn it back again in '08." The next presidential vote is in November 2008.

That approach is critical if Democrats are to build on their majority in Congress and retake the White House, said Dean, who said Democrats did well in November because they appealed to all types of voters.

"George Bush made a huge mistake by representing half of America, while treating the rest of us with contempt," Dean said. "We need to reach out to everybody whether they agree with us or not."

Republicans said they will be watching Democrats closely.

"We have already learned the Democrat agenda of raising taxes and surrendering key fronts in the war on terror," said Republican National Committee spokesman Danny Diaz. "Republicans over the next two years will focus on holding Democrats accountable and recommitting to reforms that deliver for hardworking families."

Dean said he was pleased that Democrats drew more support than in the past from "faith voters." Democrats gained among religious voters, including those considered evangelical Christians, because they talked about their values and competed in all parts of the country, Dean said.

Members of the Democrats' rules panel gave preliminary approval to an incentive system of bonus delegates to the party's national convention to persuade states not to move their presidential nominating contents too early in the 2008 calendar.

The idea is to discourage jamming the primary calendar after moving up Nevada and South Carolina into the first wave of contests to increase diversity in voting. The full Democratic National Committee will consider the bonus plan at their winter meeting in Washington.

Jim Roosevelt, co-chair of the rules panel, said the incentive plan could cause enough big states to hold contests later and keep the presidential competition going until late spring. Some states are already mulling moving their contests up, however.

Two Democrats who defeated Republican incumbents in House races this year told Democratic leaders that the party's commitment to candidates around the country was crucial.

"We have to quit seeing these things as David and Goliath fights and start seeing them as opportunities," said Tim Walz, a high school geography teacher who beat Republican Congressman Gil Gutknecht in Minnesota. "We have the opportunity to extend this to policy and in two years we can extend our majority. There was no controversy to how this was done. It was a great use of resources."

Nancy Boyda, who defeated Republican Congressman Jim Ryun in Kansas, said, "The difference in organization and execution (between the two parties) was so marked, it was startling."

Dean dismissed his critics within the party, who had said his 50-state strategy wouldn't work.

"I think the best thing to do is say 'Look we won,'" he said "Everybody had a huge contribution to make, including some of the participants in all the feuding that was going on."

Denver Tries To Sell New Look To Democrats (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

DENVER, Dec. 2 — In the competition between Denver and New York City to play host to the Democratic Party's presidential nominating convention in 2008, Denver officials readily admit to being the new kids on the block.

New York, they say, has advantages in fund-raising, experience in running national conventions and a track record of success for the Democrats. The last two Democratic presidents, Jimmy Carter in 1976 and Bill Clinton in 1992, both strode onto the big stage in New York. Denver last held a convention in 1908, and the nominee, William Jennings Bryan, a Democrat, was trounced by William Howard Taft.

But if Denver prevails this time — a decision is expected by the end of the year — party members from around the country say it will probably be by virtue of a polished and highly organized effort to turn the city's lemons into lemonade. A new location, Denver's convention-bid organizers have argued to the party hierarchy, is precisely what the Democrats need.

The Rocky Mountain West, they say, is competitive politically and could decide the next presidency, with ranks of disaffected Republicans ripe for the picking and resurgent Democrats ready to be mobilized.

New and newly empowered Democrats across the region, like Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, who vaulted to majority leader with last month's election, and Senator-elect Jon Tester of Montana, whose election helped swing the chamber, have been enlisted to cheer for Denver as well. A Western convention, they say, would bring recognition to a part of the country long taken for granted as the parties focused on the Midwest and the South.

Some political experts question whether the traditionally Republican West is really up for grabs. Frustration with the Iraq war and the big budget deficits run up by Republicans in Washington in recent years, they say, may have made the Democrats a temporary fling for Western voters in the last few elections rather than a permanent love.

And New York has some powerful allies, including both its Democratic senators, Charles E. Schumer and Hillary Rodham Clinton. Mrs. Clinton has said she favors the city because it is the best choice for the party and the economy of her state, not because it might be a nice place for a nomination. Technical issues, including transportation, security and the size of the hotels will weigh heavily on the decision too, and could come down in New York's favor.

But party members across the country say that there is no doubt that Denver has hit on a potent combination of economic development goals and political ambition. A convention with 30,000 eating, drinking, hotel-room-using Democratic partiers and journalists would inject perhaps $160 million into the local economy, organizers say, and at the same time crown the city as an unquestioned capital of the interior West — and the two goals are in sync.

"A convention can provide a stage to introduce the nominee in a way that gets the country's attention and tells a story," said Debbie Willhite, a longtime Democratic strategist who came here earlier this year to run Denver's bid as executive director. "And the networks can't come in here without showing the broad plains and Rocky Mountains — that's a very big stage."

A spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee, Karen Finney, said the final decision would be based on many factors.

"Logistics, fund-raising, the political questions — these are all factors that go into the decision, all of which are important," Ms. Finney said. "Our end goal is to have the best convention possible."

Money is probably Denver's biggest hurdle. Running a national political convention costs about $80 million, of which the host city must raise about $55 million. Denver bid officials believe they are close to that, including more than $12.5 million in cash and in-kind corporate donations just this week, and $5 million to $10 million more that Democratic governors in nearby states have said they could draw from local contributors.

Party members say that last month's election probably bolstered Denver's hopes by underscoring the political argument about a Western realignment and thus making it easier to raise money.

Democrats made gains in Montana, in Mr. Tester's election, and here in Colorado, where the election of Bill Ritter as governor put Democrats in charge of the executive and legislative branches of state government for the first time since 1960. The state's junior senator, Ken Salazar, a Democrat who was elected in 2004, has also become a standard-bearer for Hispanic voters, especially in the Southwest.

"It would be a mistake to have it in New York," Mr. Salazar said. "The Rocky Mountain West and the Southwest are key parts of the new direction for the Democratic Party, so if it's just on the merits, there's no question that it should be held in Denver."

Not too surprisingly, Mr. Schumer disagreed. "The West is an important region," he said. I wouldn't deny that. But we ought to have the city that's best for the convention, and I think New York is it."

Troopers Can Arrest Illegal Immigrants In Romney Deal (BOS)

By Michael Levenson, Jonathan Saltzman

The Boston Globe, December 3, 2006

Governor Mitt Romney has reached an agreement with federal authorities that allows the Massachusetts State Police to arrest immigrants who are in the state illegally, his spokesman said.

Currently, state troopers have no power to detain people for violations of their immigration status alone, said the spokesman, Eric Fehrnstrom. If troopers stop people who they suspect are illegal immigrants, they can call a US Immigration and Customs Enforcement office in Vermont to check on their status and detain them if federal officials request it, he said.

Under the deal, brokered after months of negotiations, troopers can detain people they determine are illegal immigrants during regular police duties, Fehrnstrom said. This authority will be given to two dozen or three dozen troopers who undergo 4 1/2 weeks of training in immigration laws, civil rights, and ways to avoid racial profiling, he said. The troopers will probably be members of special units that pursue violent fugitives or combat street gangs.

Ferhnstrom said the troopers would not go on patrols aimed at rounding up illegal immigrants. But they will be able to arrest, for example, a motorist they stop for a broken tail light if they determine the motorist has violated immigration law. Fehrnstrom, speaking Friday, said the pact would be announced publicly this week. He declined to provide more details yesterday.

Immigration advocates and civil libertarians blasted the agreement yesterday, saying it would lead to racial profiling and foster mistrust of the police in communities with large numbers of immigrants. The deal, reached in the final days of Romney's administration, also sets up a potential conflict with Governor-elect Deval L. Patrick, who has expressed strong opposition to granting the State Police such powers.

Through a spokesman, Patrick declined to say yesterday whether he might rescind the agreement when he takes office in January.

DOJ_NMG_0101206

"This is another last-minute move by Governor Romney that is more about his presidential campaign than about sound public policy for the people of Massachusetts," said Richard Chacon, Patrick's spokesman. "The last election showed that people can tell the difference between the two."

During the campaign, Patrick dismissed as a political gimmick the idea of granting State Police such powers.

"I think the State Police has a lot to do already right now . . . and I think asking the State Police to take on a federal responsibility is not their job," Patrick said on WGBH-TV in June. In September, he told the Globe a "more constructive" approach would be to support federal legislation proposed by US senators John McCain and Edward M. Kennedy that would toughen border enforcement and allow some illegal immigrants to apply for legal status.

Romney's new agreement with Immigration and Customs Enforcement comes at a sensitive time for the governor, who has been sharpening his views on immigration as he prepares a probable run for the presidency in 2008. In September, Romney told Fox TV's "The O'Reilly Factor" that the border must be secured, and affirmed his support for the construction of a fence along the Mexican border.

Last week, however, the Globe reported that illegal immigrants had maintained the grounds around Romney's home in Belmont, as workers for a lawn service company Romney had employed. Romney said after the report that he had dealt only with the owner of the company, Ricardo Saenz, a legal immigrant from Colombia.

In approving the new powers for State Police troopers, Massachusetts joins a handful of states and localities that have entered into such pacts since they were first authorized in 1996. The list includes Florida, Alabama, and a few counties in California and North Carolina, where a limited number of officers have been trained to enforce immigration laws.

Ali Noorani , executive director of the Massachusetts Immigrant and Refugee Advocacy Coalition, yesterday called the pact a "gross mismanagement of public safety resources."

"Now, if you look or sound like an immigrant and are pulled over for any type of minor infraction, you're going to be profiled; there's no way around that," Noorani said. "This will have an incredibly chilling effect on the relationship between all law enforcement -- whether it's Boston police or State Police -- and the immigrant community. Most people don't see the difference between a state trooper and a local officer. A cop is a cop."

State Senator Jarrett T. Barrios , a Cambridge Democrat who is cochairman of the Public Safety and Homeland Security Committee, predicted the plan would add millions to the costs to train troopers and to jail detainees. He said the deal seemed calculated to help Romney's presidential ambitions.

In June, when Romney announced he was seeking the deal, he said it would give the State Police a way of "finding and detaining illegal aliens in the ordinary course of business."

Noorani made clear that Patrick would face pressure to rescind the pact. "Patrick was very strong and steadfast in his opposition to this," Noorani said. "We hope that one of his first actions as governor is to terminate this and restore the Commonwealth's public safety."

Fundraising Beat Goes On For Gov. (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Reelection is behind him, but Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is keeping his fundraising operation at full throttle, asking donors to pay for a stylish inauguration and seeing to it that he continues to fly private jets and stage public appearances worthy of a Hollywood celebrity.

The governor's political team has approached Chevron Corp., PG&E, Blue Cross of California, AT&T and other businesses, asking for tens of thousands of dollars to pay for a two-day celebration surrounding his Jan. 5 inauguration.

As a newly elected governor taking office in 2003 amid a fiscal crisis, Schwarzenegger staged a relatively modest inauguration. But with the economy improving, his aides said a more festive event is in order. The occasion even has its own "executive producer" — Carl Bendix, a friend of California First Lady Maria Shriver.

A copy of the invitation shows that for $50,000, donors can purchase a "gold" sponsorship that includes 10 tickets to a reception Jan. 4, four reserved seats for the inaugural ceremony the next day and a table for 10 at a legislative luncheon.

"Silver" sponsorship is $15,000 and buys a pair of tickets to the reception, two for the swearing-in and two for the luncheon, among other perks.

The money goes to a nonprofit committee that can take donations of any size.

At the same time, Schwarzenegger is taking advantage of a new fundraising law he signed three months ago meant for politicians like himself who, for the time being, don't have another race to run. His attorneys have set up a special "office holder" account that allows him to collect up to $200,000 a year for assorted expenses (though not for a political campaign); donors can give $20,000 apiece per year.

As a lame duck, Schwarzenegger is barred from raising money through a reelection fund and wants the new account to underwrite the professional-quality lighting and sound, private air travel and satellite feeds that are fixtures of his operation, aides said. Contributions to the fund must be publicly disclosed.

Another political account is devoted to what Schwarzenegger's aides call "legislative advocacy." If the governor wants to travel around the state urging passage of a particular bill, he intends to use that fund to cover the costs, aides said. Donors must be disclosed.

The fund is not new; the governor has used it to wage ballot campaigns. But he sees less need for that in his second term and plans to use the fund to push his legislative agenda.

The fundraising drive comes as the Schwarzenegger administration is setting a second-term agenda being watched closely by some of the companies paying into the governor's accounts.

One of Schwarzenegger's priorities in the next term, for example, is implementing a new law meant to curb emissions that contribute to global warming. Chevron and other energy companies that must comply with the law have a stake in how it is put into effect.

Campaign watchdog groups said the officeholder account in particular, with its $200,000 threshold, amounts to another vehicle for donors to influence the governor.

"It's designed to enable officeholders to get money from people who want something from them," said Robert Stern, president of the nonpartisan Center for Governmental Studies in Los Angeles and former general counsel to the state's Fair Political Practices Commission.

"I have no problem with a limited officeholder account," Stern said. "But $200,000 is way too high. They are … taking advantage of people coming before them."

The bill authorizing such accounts languished in the Legislature for a year. At midnight in the final hours of the last legislative session, the measure, by Sen. Kevin Murray (D-Culver City), was revived and passed. The governor signed it Sept. 29.

As Schwarzenegger bolsters his fundraising, aides insist he wants to make campaign finance reform part of his 2007 agenda. One idea the governor is considering is a ban on fundraising in the months when state officials are negotiating a new budget, the aides said.

Schwarzenegger, who has raised a record-setting $114 million since jumping into the recall campaign in 2003, has not embraced proposals that would lower caps on what politicians can accept.

"The governor has always said that the issue is stopping the practice of money in, favors out," said Schwarzenegger's communications director, Adam Mendelsohn.

Organizers of the governor's inauguration say they do not yet know how much the events will cost; activities are still being planned. But the invitation that went to donors mentions a reception for sponsors at the California Museum for History, Women and the Arts; the legislative luncheon in the Capitol rotunda; and a party in the ballroom of the Sacramento Convention Center the night of the inauguration.

The centerpiece is the swearing-in, set for 11 a.m. at Sacramento's Memorial Auditorium.

Writing the governor's speech for the occasion is Landon Parvin, who also worked for President Reagan. Schwarzenegger will use the forum to lay out a long-term vision for the state, Mendelsohn said.

He will talk about "how he will spend his final term building the California for 20 years from now that he wants for the people of this state," according to Mendelsohn.

DOJ_NMG_0101208

So far, Southern California Edison has pledged $15,000 for the inaugural events. PG&E, Chevron and AT&T have said they will probably help. Schwarzenegger aides said that although they're not required by law to reveal the names of donors, they will do so voluntarily on the governor's campaign website: http://www.joinarnold.com .

Other parts of the fundraising apparatus are murkier.

A nonprofit jobs commission that underwrites some of the governor's public events here and abroad also raises money from California businesses. The group last disclosed contributors more than a year ago.

Mark Mosher, acting executive director of the commission, said donors would be revealed at an unspecified date "in the future, on a timeline that works for our accountants."

Mosher is principal of a San Francisco consulting and lobbying firm, whose website says that "when you need a decision or vote to go your way, [the company] can get you direct access to the decision-makers."

A special nonprofit residence foundation pays for Schwarzenegger's 1,800-square-foot hotel suite at the Hyatt Regency, across the street from the Capitol. George Kieffer, president of the foundation, said the group has raised $90,500 over the last year from 14 individuals and companies. Donors' identities may remain secret by law.

Kieffer disclosed their names voluntarily. They include Lowe Enterprises, a Los Angeles real estate firm; Herzog Contracting Corp., a Missouri construction contractor with offices in California; and Mercury Air Group Inc., a Los Angeles aviation services firm. Kieffer's list did not say how much each donor gave.

With money coming in from so many sources, and with no uniform method for disclosing donations, it is hard for people to keep track of who is supporting Schwarzenegger and whether they're profiting from the relationship, watchdog groups said.

Sheila Krumholz, acting executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics in Washington, D.C., said Schwarzenegger "should be credited with disclosing donors" to his inauguration fund.

But she added: "Providing lots of additional avenues for donors to seek access and influence makes it difficult for voters to understand the facts behind how policy is decided. It's important that this information be made available so that you can draw the most accurate conclusions about how policy is formed."

Md. GOP Urged To Stick Together (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

ANNAPOLIS -- Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. called for Republican unity yesterday at the state convention, where the selection of party chairman revealed divisions within the party after last month's widespread election defeats.

"The hard left is in firm control of the state, and we don't have the votes to stop them," Mr. Ehrlich told party leaders in a ballroom at the Doubletree Hotel in Annapolis. "That's not the fate of Maryland in the long term. It's just where we are today."

His remarks were more upbeat than those he made earlier in the day during his last appearance on the "Stateline" program on WBAL-AM radio in Baltimore.

"You just have to ask yourself a really frank, blunt question: Do your views really comport with the majority views in the state of Maryland?" he said. "In this case, clearly at this time, the answer is no, because we got fired."

Mr. Ehrlich also predicted that legislation to legalize slot-machine gambling -- one of his chief goals rejected by Democratic lawmakers -- will pass the General Assembly either next year or in 2008, but that it likely would be tied to a package of tax increases.

"We hear about a graduated income tax," he said. "Given the philosophical foundation of the folks coming into office, that would not surprise me at all. A cigarette tax, potentially a sales tax and, I guess, a gas tax is also being floated. It's various sin taxes wrapped with a slots bill."

Mr. Ehrlich also said party members should not "whine" or play "Monday-morning quarterback" about election losses that restored Democrats almost complete control of state government in Maryland, where they outnumber Republicans nearly 2 to 1.

Mr. Ehrlich, the state's first Republican governor in 36 years, said his party must continue to engage the Democrats in political debate and point out the successes of his administration, including turning an inherited $4 billion deficit into a $2 billion surplus without raising state sales or income taxes.

He lost re-election to Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley, a Democrat.

Mr. Ehrlich also urged party leaders to be "disciplined and loyal."

"Our party leaders must be respected and supported ... in order to accomplish what we need to accomplish over the next two years," he said.

The governor's remarks followed the election of a party chairman, in which Dr. Jim Pelura, an ally of outgoing Republican officials, beat political upstart John White, who blamed current party leaders for the election losses and advocated retooling the organization.

Mr. White, who last month lost the race for the 3rd Congressional District seat by a large margin to Democrat John P. Sarbanes, said the 70 votes he received for chairman out of the 204 votes cast by central committee members reflected "a desire for change within the party."

After the election, Dr. Pelura told the convention that it was "wonderful to see [different] opinions."

"We are a group now that will work together and see that we are back in the State House in 2011," said Dr. Pelura, a Davidsonville veterinarian who served as state chairman for President Bush's 2004 campaign and as the Anne Arundel County chairman for Mr. Ehrlich's 2006 campaign.

Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican who lost the U.S. Senate race but is the early favorite of party leaders for a 2010 gubernatorial run, also addressed the convention.

"When I walk in this room, I don't see losers," he said. "I don't see quitters. I see the Maryland Republican Party: strong, viable, energized, excited and relevant, very relevant."

Mr. Steele, who actively supported Dr. Pelura in the chairman contest, said he was "excited to work with the new leadership."

Mr. Ehrlich told the convention that party members faced an uphill battle to regain political power and that fundraising would become more difficult.

However, the governor said, he has given the party a foothold by advancing an agenda that included policies not traditionally associated with Republicans, such as focusing on environmental protection, education and transportation. "That is progress at the policy level that people have paid attention to," he said.

On the radio, Mr. Ehrlich said the failure to legalize slots was one of the two biggest disappointments of his term. The other, he said, was "the failure to pass structural reform with respect to medical malpractice [insurance]." The General Assembly imposed a premium tax on HMOs to help reduce the cost of malpractice insurance in 2005, overriding Mr. Ehrlich's veto.

The Governor Cops a Role on 'The Wire'

Bob Ehrlich hasn't said yet what he'll do after he leaves the Maryland governor's mansion next month -- but we hear he looks hot in a state trooper's uniform.

See for yourself. Tonight, HBO will air an episode of the gritty Baltimore-based crime-and-politics drama "The Wire" with a mind-bending scene in which Ehrlich cameos as -- stay with us, here -- a trooper on security detail for the show's fictional governor of Maryland.

Even trippier: The scene -- filmed this summer, months before Ehrlich's reelection loss -- portrays the (fictional) suave young Democratic mayor of Baltimore, Tommy Carcetti, coming to Annapolis to beg for more school funding from the Republican governor whose job he hopes to steal one day. Sound familiar? Carcetti (played by Aiden Gillen) is kept waiting for hours until finally Trooper Ehrlich tells him the governor "will see you now."

When producers called offering a speaking role, Ehrlich jumped at the chance. "He's a huge fan of the show," said spokeswoman Shareese DeLeaver.

Producer David Simon notes that he offered Ehrlich challenger Martin O'Malley an equal-time cameo, though the episodes were slated to run well after the election. But the Baltimore mayor declined. Whether that had anything to do with the assumption of many local fans that Carcetti is a stand-in for O'Malley -- well, Simon will entertain no such notions. "Carcetti is not O'Malley; I can't say it enough. Story editor Bill Zorzi covered politics in Maryland [for the Baltimore Sun] for 20 years. There are elements of lots of people in Carcetti."

Several other prominent folks have had parts in the series -- former mayor Kurt Schmoke as a city health commissioner, singer Steve Earle as an addiction counselor, convicted drug kingpin Melvin Williams as a church deacon -- a trick that Simon says enhances the distance between truth and fiction.

"Once you have Ehrlich play a state trooper on the security detail, then he is not the [show's] governor. Therefore, the governor is a fictional character."

Episcopalians Warned Against Leaving Diocese (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

Virginia Episcopal Bishop Peter J. Lee is threatening to sue conservative Episcopal churches that soon will vote on whether to leave his diocese, saying individual members of each congregation's governing board will be liable.

In a four-page letter released late Friday, the bishop of the country's largest diocese, with 90,000 members, sent a letter to parishes conducting a 40-day period of discernment on whether to leave the Episcopal Church.

Thousands of Episcopalians already have left the 2.2 million-member denomination over arguments about biblical authority and the 2003 consecration of New Hampshire Bishop V. Gene Robinson, an active homosexual.

"I believe your successors in the future will regret that decision and its destructive consequences to the whole church," the bishop wrote of congregations threatening to leave the diocese. Any congregation attempting to leave without a negotiated settlement with the diocese "will have repercussions and possible civil liability for individual vestry members."

The letter was aimed at a handful of Northern Virginia congregations sitting on millions of dollars' worth of real estate. The members of those congregations will vote starting Dec. 10 on whether to leave the church. Leaders of two of them -- Truro Episcopal Church in Fairfax and the Falls Church Episcopal in Falls Church -- met for about five hours yesterday in an emergency session.

Bishop Lee's decision to play hardball with dissenting churches didn't shock Bishop Martyn Minns, rector of Truro, whose governing board voted unanimously Nov. 11 to leave the denomination.

"I'm disappointed, but not surprised," Bishop Minns said yesterday. "This is bizarre because we are following a protocol we worked on with him and his leadership for over a year."

The "Protocol for Departing Congregations," posted on the diocese's Web site (www.thediocese.net), lists several steps a congregation must take, including a stipulation that at least 70 percent of the members agree to leave.

If they do, the diocese and parish must negotiate a sum for the church's property and assets. Truro's assets, including its property in downtown Fairfax, has been estimated at $10 million. The Falls Church's property and assets, which include two sanctuaries and a Colonial cemetery, has been estimated to be worth $17 million to $27 million.

However, Bishop Lee added a new provision in his letter -- that the 40-member executive board of Episcopal Church headquarters in New York could intervene to prevent a church from leaving with its property.

He also reminded conservatives that he has the power to relegate dissenting parishes to mission status, to declare their property "abandoned" and to take custody of it. Episcopal canon law mandates that departing parishes leave their property to the diocese, and with very few exceptions, U.S. courts have upheld it.

Bishop Minns, who expects that Truro will keep its property, said the matter will be discussed today at a parish meeting between morning services. A member of the diocese's standing committee, which advises the bishop, also will speak.

"We are operating in line with Virginia law," Bishop Minns said.

Packets containing the bishop's letter and other documents will be given out during today's services at the Falls Church Episcopal, whose governing board voted 15-2 on Nov. 13 to leave the diocese. Sentiment at the nearly 275-year-old church tilts toward leaving the denomination. Last Sunday, one of the classes listed in its bulletin was titled "Letting Go ... of the Episcopal Church?"

DOJ_NMG_0101211

The Rev. Robert Watkin, an assistant priest at the church, urged members to cast their ballots Dec. 10.

"It'll be the most important vote you'll ever cast -- at least in church," he said.

Elsewhere in the country, a majority of the clergy and lay delegates at the annual meeting of the Diocese of San Joaquin in Central California voted yesterday to identify themselves as members of the worldwide Anglican Communion rather than as a diocese of the Episcopal Church. They stopped short of splitting from the denomination, which would have touched off a huge legal battle over millions of dollars in real estate.

Diocese Nears Break With Episcopal Church (AP)

AP, December 2, 2006

FRESNO, California (AP) -- In a rebuke of the Episcopal Church, a conservative diocese voted Saturday to affirm its membership in the worldwide Anglican Communion after distancing itself from the national church over the ordination of gays and women.

San Joaquin, California, Bishop John-David Schofield called it a first step toward a formal break with the U.S. Anglican denomination, though the proposal makes just minor changes to the diocese's status.

"We have given a signal as to what direction we intend to take," Schofield said Saturday. "We are now in a position to take seriously any offer the archbishops around the world should come up with."

Delegates also approved rewriting the Diocese of San Joaquin's constitution to bring its trust fund under the bishop's control, a move immediately questioned by Episcopal leaders.

The denomination's canons don't give local dioceses sole ownership of church property, said Robert Williams, a spokesman for the Episcopal Church.

"The hope of many is that reconciling dialogue will continue," he said.

Divisions erupted in 2003 when the Episcopal Church, the U.S. wing of the 77 million-member Anglican family, consecrated the first openly gay bishop, V. Gene Robinson of New Hampshire. Traditionalists contend that gay partnerships violate Scripture.

Schofield, who refuses to ordain women and gays, has publicly accused the church's first female leader, Presiding Bishop Katharine Jefferts Schori, of promoting heresy. Under his leadership, the Fresno-based diocese has cut back funds sent to the national church and considered a plan to affiliate with an Anglican diocese in Argentina.

The San Joaquin diocese's proposal to distance itself from the American denomination was approved by a majority of the 204 clergy and lay delegates. It formalizes the diocese's identity as a member of the Anglican Communion, rather than a member of the Episcopal Church, but it and other resolutions approved Saturday won't become final unless they receive a two-thirds majority vote at a meeting at a diocesan convention next year.

The amendment was noticeably weaker than one pulled this week that proposed a formal split with the U.S. denomination, which would have set off a legal battle over the diocese's millions of dollars in real estate throughout central California.

National church leaders had been putting pressure on Schofield and other conservatives to ease off their threats to break with the denomination. They proposed creating a leadership position called a "primatial vicar," who would work with conservative dioceses, performing functions that normally fall to Jefferts Schori, including consecrating local bishops.

Schofield called that offer "absolutely inadequate," but suggested a truce was not off the table.

Six other conservative dioceses also have rejected Jefferts Schori's authority but have stopped short of secession. The 2.2 million-member Episcopal Church estimates that nearly 115,000 people left the church from 2003 to 2005. At least one-third of those departures stemmed from parish conflicts over Robinson.

Episcopal Diocese Votes To Secede From Church (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein, Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

An Episcopal diocese in California overwhelmingly passed a series of resolutions yesterday that position it to secede from the Episcopal Church and affiliate with conservatives in the global Anglican Communion.

DOJ_NMG_0101212

If the Diocese of San Joaquin affirms the move in a second vote next year, the small diocese, with 48 parishes and 7,000 members, would be the first to try to break from the Episcopal Church, which has been torn by conflict since the consecration of a gay bishop in 2003. Until now, only individual parishes have severed ties.

The vote by the diocese is one more step in a carefully planned strategy by conservative Episcopalians in the United States and primates of Anglican provinces, many in the developing world, to unite the conservatives, claim the mantle of Anglicanism and isolate the Episcopal Church, the 2.3-million-member American branch in the Anglican communion, which claims 77 million members worldwide.

The San Joaquin diocese, which does not ordain women, has long been one of the most conservative of the church's 110 dioceses. It is among seven dioceses that were so disturbed by the church's decision to consecrate a gay bishop that they have refused to accept the authority of the church and its presiding bishop. They have also appealed for "alternative oversight" to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who as head of the Church of England is considered the "first among equals" among the Anglican primates.

"This is the separation," said Craig Petz, a lay delegate to the diocese's convention in Fresno, Calif., where the vote took place. "It's done. There's no equivocating."

Mr. Petz, from St. Mary's Church in Manteca, Calif., said he was delighted by the resolutions, but an active caucus of clergy members and laity who strongly oppose separation from the church were despondent.

"There is a schism, and it's a sin," said the Rev. Rick Matters, a co-founder of Remain Episcopal, the caucus favoring unity. "To secede, we are like one of the Southern states that led to the Civil War."

The step is likely to provoke legal battles in civil and ecclesiastical courts over whether the diocese has the right to divorce itself from the denomination and over who owns the diocese's assets. Another pressing issue is what will happen to parishes and clergy members in the diocese who do not want to disassociate from the church.

"This is unprecedented territory and will take the careful consideration of all parties involved," a spokesman for the Episcopal Church, Bob Williams, said yesterday.

Mr. Williams said one possibility was that the church's presiding bishop, Katharine Jefferts Schori, could declare the diocese vacant, and have it elect a new bishop and other leaders.

One resolution passed yesterday changes the diocese's constitution, removing a line about membership in the Episcopal Church and replacing it with, "The diocese shall be a constituent member of the Anglican Communion and in full communion with the See of Canterbury."

Other references to the church throughout the diocese's constitution are removed, and replaced with "the Anglican Communion."

The Bishop of San Joaquin, John-David Schofield, told the convention on Thursday, "This amending process is the first step in the removal from our constitution of any reference to the Episcopal Church because, in our opinion, they have decided to walk apart from the Anglican Communion."

The wording of the resolutions was changed at the last minute, leading to widespread confusion among the delegates. But Bishop Schofield told the convention that the wording was changed after a recent meeting in Virginia between conservative American bishops and other leaders and conservative primates from other provinces in the Anglican Communion. The global primates advised the Americans to "remain flexible and allow them to provide the necessary leadership for us," by holding off on specifying what structure, or bishop or province, would replace the church's relationship with the diocese.

One crucial amendment effectively erases the borders of the diocese so that it could eventually absorb parishes in other parts of the state or elsewhere in the country that wish to break with the church, Mr. Petz said.

Another amendment says that if the bishop and his coadjutor bishop are absent, unable to act or removed, the standing committee, a lay group, would become the "ecclesiastical authority." The thinking behind this provision, Mr. Petz said, is that it could prevent the church from taking over the diocese by removing the bishop and coadjutor.

Last week, before the vote, the church offered a compromise for "alternative primatial oversight" to the seven disaffected dioceses. After lengthy talks, a committee of bishops proposed that these dioceses could answer to a "primatial vicar," and not the presiding bishop, but that vicar would be appointed by and answerable to the presiding bishop.

DOJ_NMG_0101213

The conservatives, however, immediately rejected the proposal and called it a ploy by Presiding Bishop Jefferts Schori to give them an offer they would have to refuse.

“It’s dead on arrival,” said the Rev. Canon David Anderson, president of the American Anglican Council. “It’s a nonstarter. First of all, who picks the primatial vicar? She does.

“She holds onto all the power, all the authority, and the people who are finding her ministry impossible to remain under are left still under her total thumb.”

But the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Most Rev. Rowan Williams, greeted the proposal for alternative oversight with cautious enthusiasm, saying it represents “a very significant development” and that he would give it “careful consideration.”

Mideast Allies Near A State Of Panic (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush and his top advisors fanned out across the troubled Middle East over the last week to showcase their diplomatic initiatives to restore strained relationships with traditional allies and forge new ones with leaders in Iraq.

But instead of flaunting stronger ties and steadfast American influence, the president's journey found friends both old and new near a state of panic. Mideast leaders expressed soaring concern over upheavals across the region that the United States helped ignite through its invasion of Iraq and push for democracy — and fear that the Bush administration may make things worse.

President Bush's summit in Jordan with the Iraqi prime minister proved an awkward encounter that deepened doubts about the relationship. Vice President Dick Cheney's stop in Riyadh, the Saudi capital, yielded a blunt warning from the kingdom's leaders. And Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's swing through the West Bank and Israel, intended to build Arab support by showing a new U.S. push for peace, found little to work with.

In all, visits designed to show the American team in charge ended instead in diplomatic embarrassment and disappointment, with U.S. leaders rebuked and lectured by Arab counterparts. The trips demonstrated that U.S. allies in the region were struggling to understand what to make of the difficult relationship, and to figure whether, with a new Democratic majority taking over Congress, Bush even had control over his nation's Mideast policy.

The allies' predicament was described by Jordan's King Abdullah II last week, before Bush arrived in Amman, the capital. Abdullah, one of America's steadiest friends in the region, warned that the Mideast faced the threat of three simultaneous civil wars — in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories. And he made clear that the burden of dealing with it rested largely with the United States.

"Something dramatic" needed to come out of Bush's meetings with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to defuse the three-way threat, Abdullah said, because "I don't think we're in a position where we can come back and visit the problem in early 2007."

The only regional leader to voice unqualified support for the Bush administration has been Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who has gone so far as to say that the Iraq invasion contributed to regional stability.

To Middle East observers, Bush can no longer speak for the United States as he did before because of the domestic pressure for a change of course in Iraq, said Nathan Brown, a specialist on Arab politics at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

"He can talk all he wants about 'staying until the job is done,' but these leaders can read about the American political scene and see that he may not be able to deliver that," Brown said.

The Bush-Maliki meeting Thursday, closely watched around the world in anticipation of a possible change in U.S. strategy, produced no shift in declared aims. Rather, it resulted in diplomatic stumbles that seemed to belie the leaders' claims that their relationship was intact.

DOJ_NMG_0101214

On the eve of the summit, a leaked memo written by Bush's national security advisor, Stephen Hadley, showed that U.S. officials questioned Maliki's abilities. But the memo also was a reminder of dwindling U.S. influence over Iraq. Some of the steps that Hadley said the Iraqis should take, such as providing public services to Sunni Arabs as well as Shiites, were moves that the Americans had demanded for many months, without success.

The leak of the memo cast a shadow over the summit, and Maliki abruptly canceled the first scheduled meeting, a conversation among Bush, Maliki and Abdullah. White House aides insisted that the cancellation was not a snub.

One Middle East diplomat said later in an interview that Maliki had canceled the meeting to put distance between him and Bush at a time when Iraq's Shiite lawmakers and Cabinet ministers with ties to militant cleric Muqtada Sadr had halted their participation in the government to protest the summit.

On Saturday, in his regular radio address, Bush said that his relationship with Maliki was, in fact, improving.

"With each meeting, I'm coming to know him better, and I'm becoming more impressed by his desire to make the difficult choices that will put his country on a better path," Bush said.

During the trip, Bush was unable to distance himself from the fierce debate about Iraq policy back home. The president felt the need to respond to news accounts saying that an advisory panel on Iraq would urge a gradual withdrawal of combat troops from the region. He insisted that suggestions for such a "graceful exit" were not realistic.

Despite this, Bush repeated in his radio address that he intended to look for a bipartisan solution to the war, and would listen to the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, which is scheduled to present its findings Wednesday.

He also said that his own internal review, coming from Pentagon and White House officials, among others, was near completion, suggesting that he may be discussing the options before him over the next several days.

"I want to hear all advice before I make any decisions about adjustments to our strategy in Iraq," Bush said.

Cheney's trip to talk to Saudi King Abdullah was far less visible than Bush's mission, but helped to make painfully clear the gap between U.S. goals and those of its Arab allies.

U.S. officials said Cheney initiated the trip. But foreign diplomats said that Saudi leaders sought the visit to express their concern about the region, including fears of a U.S. departure and what they see as excessive American support for the Shiite faction in Iraq.

After the meeting with Cheney, Saudi officials released an unusual statement pointedly highlighting American responsibility for deterioration of stability in the region.

The Saudi officials cited "the direct influence of … the United States on the issues of the region" and said it was important for U.S. influence "to be in accord with the region's actual condition and its historical equilibrium," an apparent reference to the Sunni-Shiite balance.

The Saudi statement also said the U.S. in the Middle East should "pursue equitable means that contribute to ending its conflicts," pointing to the Israeli-Palestinian situation.

The statement "came pretty close to a rebuke, by Saudi standards," said Charles W. Freeman Jr., a former U.S. ambassador to Saudi Arabia. "It said, in effect, that the United States needs to behave responsibly."

There have been other signals of Saudi anxiety recently.

On Wednesday, an advisor to the Saudi government wrote in the Washington Post that if the United States pulled out of Iraq, "massive Saudi intervention" would ensue to protect Sunnis from Shiite militias.

The Saudi ambassador to the United States, Prince Turki al Faisal, warned in a speech in October against an American withdrawal, saying that "since the United States came into Iraq uninvited, it should not leave Iraq uninvited."

Rice encountered the limits of U.S. influence when she visited Jerusalem and the West Bank town of Jericho last week, trying to entice Arab confidence by displaying a renewed interest in Israeli-Palestinian peace.

But Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas was gloomy about the prospects for a deal between his Fatah party and the militant group Hamas that would allow formation of a nonsectarian government and open the way for increased aid and, potentially, peace talks with Israel.

Rice said afterward that the administration "cannot create the circumstances" for peace.

"This is the kind of thing that takes time," she said. "You don't expect great leaps forward."

DOJ_NMG_0101215

Expressing deeper unhappiness with the United States, leaders from Jordan, Egypt and Persian Gulf countries told Rice during her trip to an economic development conference in Jordan on Friday that the U.S. had a responsibility to solve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which they and many analysts viewed as the key to regional stability.

Amr Moussa, secretary-general of the Arab League, urged greater U.S. action, warning that the Middle East was becoming "an abyss…. The region is facing real failure."

Massive Anti-government Protests Continue In Lebanon (MCT)

By Tom Lasseter

McClatchy Newspapers, December 3, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon - A siege on Lebanon's American-backed government continued Saturday with tens of thousands of demonstrators sympathetic to the Shiite Muslim Hezbollah militia and its allies packing downtown Beirut and calling for the resignation of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora and his cabinet.

The demonstrators filled the roads surrounding the center of Beirut, where the prime minister's office is located, effectively shutting down the capital. Hezbollah gave every indication that it is prepared for the long haul: setting up long rows of tents, portable bathrooms and handing out cups of water and sandwiches. Groups of men tended charcoal pits to keep a regular supply for their hookah pipes.

"We have a target, ending the government, and we must achieve it," said Mohammed Khalil, a Hezbollah representative who was sitting with a group of men, all monitoring their walkie-talkies.

Asked if he expected the crowd to turn to violence, Khalil shrugged his shoulders and said, "it is up to them (Lebanese government troops), we want to demonstrate peacefully."

Saniora's government, mostly Christians and Sunni Muslims, has showed no sign of acquiescing.

While Lebanon is a sliver of a nation with a relatively small population of about 4 million, it has long been a battlefield for competing powers in the region. Between Beirut's glittering office buildings, there are still walls pocked by mortar shells, a reminder of the civil war that lasted from 1975 to 1990.

As is true in many other parts of the Middle East, there is in Lebanon an underlying friction: Will the country follow the American model of governance - preferred by Saniora - in which secular administrations pursue free market economies and work toward accommodation with Israel, or will it pursue something closer to Syria and Iran - preferred by Hezbollah - nations that resist U.S. influence and actively oppose Israel.

It is a question that shaped the comments of most Lebanese interviewed Saturday.

Many of those at the demonstration spoke not only about ending Saniora's government, but also of countering U.S. influence. And pro-Saniora officials interviewed Saturday said that they are trying to resist Syrian and Iranian influence.

Both sides agreed that there is potential for violence.

"I don't think the government will resign. I think we are going to see hard times in this country," said Mohammed Kabani, a Sunni Muslim parliament member who backs Saniora. "Whenever you have people in the streets, you cannot disregard the possibility of violence."

Leaning against a tent, and wearing a green ball cap, demonstration organizer Mohammed Marji said that the sooner the government resigns, the better.

"Our prime minister is doing the bidding of the Americans . . . he should leave as soon as possible," said Marji, a member of Amal, a Shiite organization aligned with Hezbollah. "If he doesn't, he will destroy this country, things will deteriorate badly."

The protests are the latest in a round of standoffs between Lebanon's U.S.-backed government and Hezbollah and other supporters of the Syrian government.

Syria was forced to withdraw its troops from Lebanon in 2005 after former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri was killed in a massive bombing downtown. Anti-Syrian factions in Lebanon immediately blamed Syria for the killing and called for an international inquiry.

More assassinations of anti-Syrian figures followed.

Hezbollah's hand was strengthened in the Shiite community after a 34-day war with Israel this summer that ended in something of stalemate - counted by Hezbollah as a victory because it was able, with less advanced weaponry, to withstand Israel's missile and bombing strikes.

Saniora, on the other hand, appeared ineffectual during the combat, pleading on TV - weeping at one point - for both sides to stop.

Early last month, a White House spokesman said there was evidence that Syria and Iran were planning to overthrow Saniora's government.

Hezbollah cabinet members and their allies had been protesting against Lebanese government plans to approve a United Nations tribunal to investigate Hariri's death. They also agitated for more cabinet seats, wanting the power to veto government action.

When it became apparent they were not going to have their way, all five Hezbollah and Amal cabinet members resigned on Nov. 11, and about a week later, Hezbollah's leader, Hassan Nasrallah, called for street protests to bring down the government.

After Nasrallah's call to action, Pierre Gemayel, a high-profile cabinet member who opposed Syria, was killed in a hail of gunfire in broad daylight.

A protest of hundreds of thousands of Christians and Sunni Muslims followed, and late last month, the remaining 18 cabinet members of the original 24 approved the United Nations measure.

On Friday, Hezbollah and its allies responded in kind, flooding Beirut's downtown streets and bringing the government and businesses to a standstill.

At the demonstration Saturday, a set of loud speakers played recorded speeches by Hezbollah officials and their allies, and thousands of people waved their Lebanese flags and cheered. When Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah's voice boomed out, "we will stand side by side," a roar went through the crowd that shook the air.

Wandering through the crowd, a McClatchy reporter was approached by young men dressed in black who seemed very eager to discuss Hezbollah's merits.

One of them, Fouad Assaf, explained: "During the war we fled our house and Hezbollah gave us food and money"

Lebanese troops stood nearby, behind two rows of concertina wire and flanked by armored personnel carriers.

Interviewed by phone later in the evening, Hezbollah parliament member Ali Mokdad said the demonstrations were only the beginning.

"We have many plans for the future," Mokdad said. "This is just our first step. It has been planned out, day-by-day."

Shiite Sit-in Brings A New Flavor To Beirut (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

The poor demonstrators are not the usual denizens of the capital's glitzy downtown.

BEIRUT — The massive sit-in staged by Hezbollah supporters so far has done little to dislodge the U.S.-backed government, but it has managed to turn the Lebanese capital inside out — literally.

Some of the poorest and most marginalized people in the country, Shiite Muslims, have abandoned their homes in suburban slums to camp out on the nation's priciest bit of real estate. Though they often have trudged through Lebanese history as war refugees, now they have managed to displace Lebanon's wealthiest shop owners. They also have surrounded Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, barricaded in his office.

The demonstrators are not the usual frequenters of Beirut's glitzy and freewheeling downtown. Their clothes are scruffier; their food is cheaper; out of modesty, virtually all women melt away before midnight. The men link arms and dance in the streets, wave Lebanese flags in a round-the-clock rally and hunch over backgammon boards.

Mostly, they sit around and wait for the government to fall; they have vowed to stage escalating protests until Siniora and his ministers resign.

DOJ_NMG_0101217

The scene is a snapshot of Lebanon's internal contradictions, and a scrambled glimpse of the two distinct groups that coexist in a single nation. The message of Hezbollah and allies of the powerful Shiite organization is clear: We are here. We are Lebanese too. And we are numerous enough to demand political change.

"My parents are sleeping in a tent in the south, and I'm sleeping here in a tent," said Issa Fallah, a 38-year-old Hezbollah supporter who said his family home was destroyed during the summer war between Israel and Hezbollah. "This land is for all Lebanese. We have paid for it with our blood."

Flooded by tens of thousands of Hezbollah followers and their allies, downtown Beirut has acquired the trappings of a shabby, pious neighborhood. Near shuttered French bistros, vendors hawk kaak, cheap slabs of bread. Young men roast tomatoes over fires built from garbage.

Shops selling Cuban cigars, Rolex watches and Gucci dresses stand dark and deserted, metal grates tugged down over the windows. Stained tents clutter the parking lots where luxury cars usually sit. Men pray near the locked door of the Buddha Bar, a high-end nightclub where, on an ordinary weekend, scantily dressed women drink champagne and dance the night away.

"This place is usually where the rich are," said Ali Rida, a 20-year-old supermarket employee from the southern city of Sidon. "Beirut symbolizes everything for the Lebanese."

That symbolism cuts deep: This neighborhood was razed by religious fighting during Lebanon's 15-year civil war. When Prime Minister Rafik Hariri led the stone-by-stone reconstruction of the crushed downtown, it was a deliberate metaphor for the country — an expression of optimism that Lebanon could leave its bloody past behind.

After the 2005 assassination of Hariri, widely blamed on Syria, it was here that hundreds of thousands of Lebanese flocked to demand independence from the military and political influence of the government in Damascus. The demonstrators were rewarded with the collapse of the Syria-backed government and the withdrawal of Syrian troops.

Hezbollah and its followers were not really a part of that history. The Shiites were the gaping contradiction, undercutting the heady talk of religious unity that bubbled in these streets during the anti-Syria protests.

Shiites have languished for generations in the impoverished east and south of the country. Even when they poured into the capital to escape poverty and war, they ended up squatting on the fringes of the city.

Neglect of their plight provided the fertile ground in which Hezbollah took root, not only as a band of fighters that stood up to Israel, but also as an efficient welfare network. The group built schools, founded clinics and helped squatters win the right to stay in their homes.

Now Hezbollah has led its masses into the center of the capital, and it has pledged to stay there, crippling the economic life of downtown, until the government resigns.

To Siniora and his allies, the open-ended campaign of civil disobedience is an attempted coup.

"This part of town is for the French, for the Americans, for the rich," said Ali Hamdan, 30, a member of the Shiite Amal party. "It's not for us anymore. It's not really Lebanon. This is only on a map."

In a mockery of the nightclubs around them, a band of young men from the southern suburbs pitched an enormous tent of clear plastic on the sidewalk. Inside, they pounded on a drum and pranced to the beats. Outside, wistful would-be partyers were turned away by stern bouncers.

"We want to stay here only to sing, dance, have fun," said Bilal Khazen, a 20-year-old student who had tied a Hezbollah flag over his shoulders like a cape. "This place will help us overthrow the government."

Jad Salim, an 18-year-old engineering student, huddled in a hooded sweatshirt near the razor wire, soldiers and tanks blocking off the hill leading to the prime minister's office.

"We were all attacked by Israel, and this government didn't do anything. If it weren't for Hezbollah, Israel might be here now," Salim said. "Now they are the ones responsible for what might happen tomorrow."

Beirut Protest Blocks Office Of Premier For A 2nd Day (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101218

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 2 — The center of this city remained paralyzed and shuttered on Saturday as thousands of pro-Hezbollah protesters entered the second day of a sit-in aimed at forcing the Western-backed government to resign.

The atmosphere remained festive, almost joyous, though, as protesters emerged from tents pitched in empty lots and chanted slogans, banged drums and appeared to dig in for a long stay.

A small group of mostly young men pressed close to the swirls of razor wire that blocked the entrance to the Grand Serail, the offices of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora. On the other side were a large number of soldiers and armored vehicles.

"Siniora must go," the protesters yelled.

A day earlier, on Friday, hundreds of thousands of protesters from around the country poured into two areas of the city center, one south of Martyrs Square and the other in a square near the Grand Serail, in a great show of defiance to the government. But most left after sundown.

On Saturday, many returned to join the thousands who had camped out. Still, the city center was calmer than on Friday.

The sit-in is happening as Hezbollah and its allies, which are aligned with Syria and Iran, struggle to wrest control of the government from a collection of Sunni, Druse and Christian parties aligned with the United States and France. The government has said that it will not resign and that Hezbollah and its allies are trying to carry out what amounts to a coup.

On Saturday, rumors abounded about what Hezbollah and its alliance, which includes the Christian Free Patriotic Movement, might be planning to escalate the conflict further. There has been talk about blocking roads and members of Parliament resigning en masse.

While the protest had a clear political goal, it also appeared to be making a sharp social statement, highlighting a class conflict that also fuels this political showdown. A majority of the protesters appeared to be Hezbollah supporters from the south — poor, religious Shiites — who seemed delighted to be occupying the wealthy center of the capital, more closely associated with the Sunni Muslims. Groups of people chanted, "Shiites are in Beirut."

The battle in Lebanon for control of the government reverberates far beyond this nation's borders as well, with the outcome determining whether Lebanon will tilt toward Iran and Syria or toward the United States and Europe. Words of support for the government came in from some regional leaders in Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan, leaders who themselves are desperate to preserve the status quo as a way to hold back Iran's growing influence.

At Barricades In Downtown Beirut, Lebanon's Fault Lines Grow Deeper (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

BEIRUT, Dec. 2 -- In a city of frontiers, Beirut built another border Saturday.

On one side of coiled barbed wire and metal barricades were armored personnel carriers manned by soldiers in red berets toting U.S.-made M-16 rifles and guarding the colonnaded, stone government headquarters where Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and other ministers have taken up residence. On the other were the fervent young men of Hezbollah and its allies, who have turned a downtown tailored for the rich into the site of an open-ended protest to force the government's fall.

"This is the point of confrontation between us and them," said Khodr Hassan, who walked 12 hours from his southern village to the protest with 30 other youths. He pointed at his friends at the barricade, some surging forward, others lolling about.

"This is the line of separation," said one of them, Ali Aitawi.

Long divided by the Christian east and largely Muslim west of its 15-year civil war, Beirut is a city snarled today by far more numerous boundaries of sect, perspective and ideology, intersecting and tangling across a capital and country wrestling with a question still unanswered since independence more than 60 years ago: What is Lebanon's identity?

In today's crisis, those fault lines tell the story of the struggle underway between the country's two camps, divided by past and present, with vastly different visions of Lebanon's future: on one side Hezbollah, supported by Iran and Syria, and on the other the government, backed by the United States and France. The fault lines tell, too, of an impasse that perhaps can't be broken.

The borders are drawn by color, flag, portrait and symbol, a claustrophobic contest to lay claim to identity never solely Lebanese. They are defined by ideology: the culture of resistance to Israel celebrated by the Shiite Muslim movement of

Hezbollah, for instance, or the Christian separatism of civil war-era militias with fascist roots. They follow the contours of leaders who command loyalty through personality over politics. And they offer protection in a country where survival can feel precarious.

In downtown Beirut, Hezbollah's protest, with its backers vowing to stay in the streets until the government is brought down, is subsumed in a broader story of the empowerment of Lebanon's Shiite community, the country's largest. Along an axis stretching from downtown, across tense borders between Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods, are the ingredients of another civil war whose prospect comes up almost casually in conversation. Segregated neighborhoods themselves exude an identity of politics, history and faith so suffocating that even someone living a few blocks away can feel a stranger within them.

"The fault lines are in the minds of the people. It's much more than just the geography of Beirut," said Robert Saliba, a 56-year-old architect and urban planner. "I think the mental geography is more important than what happens on the ground."A Proliferation of Borders

Saliba grabbed a piece of bread filled with spice and made his way Saturday from a trendy cafe to nearby downtown, where thousands had pitched tents as part of the protest. Chants erupted every so often: "Siniora out!" At the barricade, boisterous men held up the front page of the daily as-Safir newspaper: "With its masses, the opposition besieges the government in crisis." Cheers erupted when recordings of speeches by Hezbollah's leader, Hasan Nasrallah, were played.

"People here are boiling," Saliba said, surveying the scene. He gestured back at the cafe. "And over there, they are drinking coffee?" The words were sharp, even surprised, a divergence from the sometimes abstract language of his academic training. A Greek Orthodox Christian, he was more observer than partisan. "Just across the road? It's awful."

He looked out at the barbed wire that coiled along the city's sleek, rebuilt downtown.

"You have a fault line again," he said. "When you cross it, you get an electric shock."

In a day, Beirut's downtown was transformed from a hub of half-million-dollar apartments and designer stores into a far more humble and modest place. Vendors sold bread with melted cheese for 65 cents from rickety wooden stands propped up on rusting bicycles. "Tastiest cheese," one promised. From a battered orange van, popcorn went for half that. "That's the price for Sayyid Hasan," the vendor shouted, using an honorific for the Hezbollah leader. Men hung out in circles, sitting in plastic chairs, tugging listlessly on water pipes.

Portable toilets went up in the streets, next to the fashionable Buddha Bar. Alongside them were white canvas tents where wool blankets were still spread for the protesters, their sandals and shoes left outside. In a carnival-like atmosphere, men from the Shiite-dominated southern suburbs shouted fealty to Hezbollah's leader. "God, Nasrallah and all the suburbs!" Others ridiculed Siniora, calling him "tanoura," Arabic for skirt. Some held signs that read, "Until victory." A few chatted with stern-faced soldiers. "You should leave and let us go in," one suggested, pointing to the government headquarters a shout away.

At a construction site along the street, an advertisement read, "Beirut Gate: The New Heart of the City."

As he walked, Saliba recalled the vision for the downtown of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri, who was assassinated in 2005. His detractors were plenty, seeing corruption and questioning whom the downtown was serving. But Hariri viewed it as a crossroads for Beirut's east and west, entertainment and commerce bringing them together. Instead, Saliba said, downtown has become contested space, another border: in March 2005, when Hezbollah's supporters and foes organized mass demonstrations over the Syrian presence here and, in this crisis, as both have mobilized their loyalists in a show of strength.

"It has become a place where power is proven," he said. "It has become the place where things are stated."

He watched crowds barrel down the streets, waving Lebanese flags and Hezbollah banners. Before him was probably the Shiite community's greatest assertion of political power in Lebanese history: seizing the downtown of a capital, in a country where Shiites have historically been disenfranchised. The chants cascaded, uttered with the authority that comes with confidence in numbers and the strength delivered by Hezbollah's organization, its discipline and, unsettling to many other Lebanese, its weapons.

The community's moment? Saliba shrugged.

"This will decide," he said. "It's definitely something that says, 'We are here and for good.' "

"We have this fake notion of coexistence. Now it's being tested the hard way. It's popping up," he said. "Now, in a very decisive way, because they're asking for power. If you want to coexist, then give us power."

DOJ_NMG_0101220

He walked past the St. George Cathedral, a Maronite Catholic church, past the sprawling blue-domed mosque built by Hariri, a Sunni Muslim. The face of Nasrallah, a Shiite cleric by training, peered from posters on the walls and in the streets.

"I always say to my students, you have this segregation everywhere. It's part of any geography," he said, as troops lined the boundary between the protest and the rest of downtown. "It becomes a problem through politics and power struggles."Fears of Neighbors' Intentions

A 15-minute drive away, Saad Fakhran sat in his Internet cafe, a button with Hariri's face pinned to his lapel. Around the corner were posters of Hariri and his son and successor, Saad. "Your words are commands," one banner read. On Fakhran's door was another picture of the former prime minister. "They destroyed the country," it read. "Where are you, Rafiq Hariri?"

Fakhran took a break from a crossword puzzle in a pro-Hariri newspaper that compared Hezbollah's protests to a coup attempt. Sharply dressed in a suit, his hair graying and his moustache trimmed, he raised his hand and pointed toward the borders that delimit his Sunni Muslim neighborhood of Tariq Jdideh, one of the tenser these days in Beirut. You go to the Khashaqji Mosque, he said, then the Qasqas Highway, a traffic circle, the Martyrs' Cemetery ("For us") and the Cemetery of the Two Martyrs ("For them"). "Who are the two martyrs? Only God knows what they mean," Fakhran said.

Shiite neighborhoods, he said, were in both directions.

"And in the middle is Tariq Jdideh, and we're afraid they'll enter," he said. "We're ready. We're ready by all means."

At 42, Fakhran is too young to remember Beirut's earlier incarnation, as a sleepy Mediterranean port dominated by the country's Sunni and Greek Orthodox communities. As he came of age, a far larger city was undergoing another transformation, as Israeli invasions, economic opportunity and civil war drove Shiites from southern Lebanon toward Beirut. For a time, their settlements on the capital's outskirts were known as "the belt of misery." Today, the southern suburbs, known as the Dahiya in Arabic, represent one of Hezbollah's strongholds -- its name uttered in chants -- and a distinctly Shiite part of the city.

Where these suburbs intersect with the Sunni parts of town, trouble has broken out during the month-long crisis. Several clashes erupted after the funeral last month of Pierre Gemayel, a pro-government minister assassinated in an ambush. Sometimes, gangs of youth incite each other; other times, it starts over the placement of banners, posters or flags of the wrong faction. Slogans shouted too loud caused a fight with Shiites in the traditionally Sunni neighborhood of Museitbeh last week. On Thursday night, Fakhran recalled, a few dozen Shiite residents entered Tariq Jdideh on mopeds, flying flags, and yet another fight broke out.

"More of them were hurt," he said with a nod.

Even in the Christian neighborhood of Ashrafiyeh, scores of supporters and opponents of Michel Aoun, a former general allied with Hezbollah, clashed Monday in Sassin Square over putting up his poster. The police and army intervened.

Beirut was never simply divided between east and west, but the surge of trouble along so many fault lines in the city -- fraying, tense and multiplying as they are -- has worried residents old enough to recall the civil war's start in two local ambushes in 1975 that soon spiraled into chaos. A columnist, Darine Helwe, compared the streets, with police posted every so often, to "a military barracks."

"I'm not a little scared," Fakhran said. "I'm scared a lot, a lot, a lot, a lot, a lot."

His fear is not violence, though. It is more existential, he said: worry about his neighbors' intentions. In complaints that echo nearly 1,400 years of history, he wondered why Shiites insulted successors of the prophet Muhammad whom Sunnis revere. He worried about Hezbollah's arsenal. "Who are the missiles for?" he asked. He suggested Hezbollah is more loyal to Iran than Lebanon: "If Iran told them to sit, they would sit." And he is sure Nasrallah has in mind a Shiite Islamic republic.

"In my heart, I think they want to wreck the country," he said. "They don't want to rule it -- they want to wreck it.

"How else could you see it?" he asked.

He talked a little longer, then offered advice: Don't go past the Two Martyrs' Cemetery, the border with the Dahiya.

"Go to Tariq Jdideh, all over the place. But don't go over there. No, no," he said, shaking his head. "Trust me."What About Being Lebanese?

A little before dusk, Zeina el-Zein, a slight, smartly dressed 26-year-old Shiite with long dark hair, walked through the Christian neighborhood of Ashrafiyeh. She lives a short drive away, her neighborhood and the next partitioned by their catalogue of colors, banners and portraits. There is the yellow of Hezbollah, its flags and pictures marking Shiite territory. Hariri's portraits stake his family's claim. In Ashrafiyeh, there are other markers: the green and brown of the Phalangist Party, the red of the Lebanese Forces, the orange of Aoun. Each of the leaders has a nickname. Samir Geagea, a Christian, is "the Doctor," Aoun "the General," Nasrallah "the Sayyid."

"We need to remind you this is our neighborhood, our territory," Zein said. She shook her head in disgust. "We do whatever we feel like. This is our territory. If you don't like it, then leave."

"Any wall they can find, anywhere in Beirut, you'll find a poster or a message," she said.

She walked along Monot Street, a fashionable nightspot district.

"Here is a cedar," she said, the symbol of the right-wing Phalangist Party that commanded the largest Christian militia in the civil war. "This is, you know, Bashir," she said, pointing to a picture of Bashir Gemayel, the militia's leader who was elected president after the 1982 Israeli invasion, then assassinated. "We're here to stay in Lebanon," it read.

She walked a little father, past a church, then the neighborhood's sole mosque, as the muezzin's call to prayer drifted across the narrow, winding streets. It reminded her of her days at St. Joseph University, when the mosque's call to prayer and the church's bells would pour through the window of her sociology class, each time forcing the lecturer to stop.

"We were laughing," she recalled. "This is Lebanon."

A little farther were pro-government portraits of anti-Syrian figures assassinated since last year.

"We will never forget," they read.

"You keep nurturing memory," she said. "Everything works in this country so that you cannot forget any single detail of Lebanese history. They don't want us to forget. They really don't, or at least they're not working to let us forget."

Zein is insistently secular, and in a country where being Maronite, Greek Orthodox, Sunni, Shiite or Druze almost immediately imposes a notion of perspective, outlook and politics, she feels alienated.

At the university, she was expected to defend her community's politics. With Christians, she sometimes has to explain why she might hew to a more socially liberal lifestyle.

What about being Lebanese? she asked.

"I could stay up all night, eating and drinking with them, spending a beautiful evening, and in the end, I'm still Zeina el-Zein, a Muslim Shiite who's from the south," she said. "I will always have this identity, whatever I do."

She sat in a cafe in Sassin Square, drinking coffee. The waiter greeted her in French. Draped over the wall of one building was the flag of Geagea's Lebanese Forces. There was a banner for Aoun across the street. Another sign hung nearby: "Ashrafiyeh is the heart of the Lebanese Forces." More pictures were on light poles: Bashir Gemayel, Pierre Gemayel.

"It has never changed, and I don't think it's ever going to change," she said.

She thought for a moment. "They use, they really use the vulnerability of the people here," she said. "I'm disgusted. Really, I am. I cannot even think about the option of civil war. It was one of the most horrible civil wars, the Lebanese one. It was disgusting, really. Really. I cannot believe after all we've seen, read and lived, we can even think about another civil war."

"Shame on us," she said.

She looked at the posters, the men's portraits peering at the traffic, claiming their territory.

She shook her head. "They're not giving us a choice."

Cabinet Shuns Pro-Syria Groups' Call To Quit (WT/AFP)

By Nayla Razzouk

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

BEIRUT -- Lebanon's Western-backed Cabinet yesterday vowed not to cave in to calls to resign after a massive demonstration led by the pro-Syrian group Hezbollah, as protesters camped outside government offices.

The show of force in central Beirut Friday and smaller demonstrations yesterday tightened the political deadlock in the country, which has been nearly paralyzed because of a fierce struggle for supremacy between pro- and anti-Syrian camps within the power-sharing regime.

Nearly 1 million, or one in four Lebanese, thronged the streets of the capital on Friday, calling for the ouster of the "corrupt" leadership and temporarily blocking access to Prime Minister Fuad Siniora's government headquarters.

DOJ_NMG_0101222

"The massive demonstration ... has given Lebanon one of the most difficult tests that the country has known in a long while," warned the pro-Syrian newspaper Al-Akhbar yesterday.

The Siniora government, which has received strong public backing from Western and some Arab states, pledged not to bow to the opposition led by the Syrian- and Iranian-backed Hezbollah.

"The Syrian-Iranian camp, led by Hezbollah, has begun to implement a plot for a coup" in Lebanon, said the pro-government Al-Mustqabal daily, echoing charges made by the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton.

The newspaper is owned by the family of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, whose 2005 murder, blamed on Syrian officials and their Lebanese allies, led to massive street protests that forced Damascus to end a three-decade military presence in Lebanon last year.

Parliamentary Majority Leader Saad Hariri, the slain prime minister's son, vowed that "the Siniora government will not fall because of pressure from the street. However long they continue their protest, it will not fall."

Hezbollah-led demonstrators set up tents and several thousand protesters were still camping yesterday on at least two main roads leading to Mr. Siniora's offices, after the blockade was eased to allow access from side streets.

The rally continued into last night, as mainly Shi'ite demonstrators waved Lebanese flags to the tune of Hezbollah war hymns and most Christian protesters lingered around a camp a short distance away on Martyrs Square.

The Syrian government daily Tishrin called the rally a "message from the Lebanese people to the individual who is monopolizing power and carrying out the orders of the ambassadors of superpowers, whose only concern is to make Israel an unwieldy power capable of defeating all Arab states combined."

The prime minister appealed yesterday for renewed talks with the opposition over a deadlock that threatens to block the government's legislative program, including its centerpiece plans for an international tribunal to try the suspects in Mr. Hariri's slaying.

Only the pro-Syrian parliament speaker Nabih Berri, whose supporters joined the opposition protest, has the authority to present draft legislation to parliament.

"The sole way of resolving our problems is by sitting down together," Mr. Siniora said. "I appeal to Mr. Berri to call for a resumption of dialogue."

Palestinian Prime Minister Won't Resign (AP)

AP, December 3, 2006

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh on Saturday rejected demands that his Hamas-led government resign and called for the resumption of talks to form a national unity government with the Fatah Party.

Tensions between the two parties have grown in recent days, with President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah saying that coalition talks — aimed at ending a crippling foreign aid boycott against the Hamas-led government — had reached a "dead end."

On Friday, the PLO's Executive Committee, which is dominated by Fatah, called on Haniyeh to step down to make way for a new premier who could resume talks with Abbas.

Speaking at a news conference during a trip to Qatar, Haniyeh said that demand was "only creating chaos in the street."

"(Abbas) cannot make any decision regarding this without consulting Hamas, because Hamas is the main party in parliament," he said.

Hamas spokesman Fawzi Barhoum said the call for Haniyeh's resignation amounted to "a coup."

The militant Islamic group won an overwhelming majority in parliamentary elections in January, while Abbas was elected separately last year, setting up government paralysis and leading to tensions in the street.

Hamas denied coalition talks had collapsed, and said Abbas was simply trying to pressure them into making concessions.

"Anyone who is saying that the dialogue among the Palestinian factions is over should take full responsibility for the consequences," Haniyeh said.

On Saturday, Abbas met with top European diplomats in Gaza to brief them on the domestic disagreements.

DOJ_NMG_0101223

EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana said the collapse of the talks killed hopes of ending the international economic sanctions on the Palestinian government, adding that Hamas missed its opportunity.

"Very sadly, I have to say the chance has been lost," he said after meeting with Abbas.

Abbas' choices for breaking the impasse with Hamas are limited. He has the authority to fire the government, but would not win confirmation for a replacement Cabinet from the Hamas-dominated parliament.

Palestinian law does not allow the president to call early elections, though there could be a referendum on whether such elections should be held, Abbas aides said.

A member of a panel Abbas appointed to guide him in the impasse said its members were leaning toward recommending early elections, both for president and parliament.

"This choice, the early election, will be much better than the current situation, even if Fatah lost both the presidential and parliament elections," said Azzam al-Ahmed, leader of the Fatah bloc in parliament.

Pro-government Sunnis Win In Bahrain (AP)

AP, December 3, 2006

Islamic hardliners dominated the Sunni supporters of Bahrain's government who defeated an opposition led by the kingdom's majority Shiites in parliamentary elections, according to official results broadcast Sunday on state television.

The election Saturday for the lower house of parliament reinforced sectarian divisions between Shiites and Sunnis and witnessed a deepening Islamic conservatism in the U.S. ally, considered among the most liberal of Gulf Arab states.

The majority Shiites, who make up about 60 percent of Bahrain's 700,000 residents, have long complained they are squeezed out of power by the Sunni monarchy, which dominates government.

Even though they lost, the vote was hailed as a major step forward for democracy and Bahrain's Shiites. It was the first in which the opposition made a strong run in parliament after boycotting 2002 elections — the first after 26 years of direct rule by the al-Khalifa royal family.

The Shiite al-Wefaq party won 16 of the house's 40 seats in the first round of voting a week ago. It needed five of the 11 seats up for grabs Saturday for a majority but gained only two, giving it a total of 18, state-run Bahrain TV, citing official results.

Conservative Sunni Muslim candidates allied with the government took 13 seats in the first round and nine in the runoff, for a total of 22.

The voting gave a sweeping victory to hard-liners from both of Islam's chief branches who bulldozed challenges by progressive candidates and women. Twelve of the 22 pro-government winners were hardliners.

Ali Fakhro, a political scientist and former government minister, said the liberals were hurt by an ideological association with the United States. The Bush administration's deep unpopularity in the Gulf has strengthened the religious right, he said.

"This is part of the reason the Islamists are heading for control of Bahrain's parliament," Fakhro said before the official results were announced. "The Americans say they are encouraging democratic politicians in the region, but the truth is they are harming them."

Regardless of who controls the lower house, the key levers to power in Bahrain lie with King Hamad bin Isa Al Khalifa, a Sunni who appoints parliament's upper chamber and can veto any legislation.

Officials reported high turnout on Saturday. But the campaign and election were marred by widespread allegations of fraud, and the government did not allow international observers to monitor the vote.

Though several women ran in the elections, only Latifa al-Gaoud, a pro-government female candidate who ran unopposed, was able to win a seat during the election's first round. She became the first-ever female parliamentarian in any Arab Gulf country.

Ukraine PM Aims To Mend Fences With U.S. (AP)

He was cast by critics as the Russian-backed bad guy during Ukraine's Orange Revolution two years ago, the burly politician who almost stole the presidential election from the pro-Western leader Viktor Yushchenko. But Prime Minister Viktor

DOJ_NMG_0101224

Yanukovych, scheduled to arrive in Washington Sunday for a four-day visit, says he hopes to renovate his image in the West during his meetings with U.S. officials.

According to his Web site, Yanukovych will meet Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman. He also plans to meet with business leaders in New York.

As for all the news reports that portray him as a tool of the Kremlin, a foe of reform? Spin, Yanukovych said. "As for my party and my myself, we adhere and will adhere to policies that are pro-Ukrainian, and will always defend the national interests of Ukraine," he said.

The Orange Revolution began hours after polls closed in the Nov. 21, 2004, presidential election between Yanukovych, the Kremlin's favorite, and Yushchenko, who called for closer ties to the West. As the Central Election Commission began churning out fraudulent vote counts in favor of Yanukovych, Yushchenko summoned his supporters to Independence Square for night after night of protests.

Twelve days later, the Supreme Court declared the vote count fraudulent and ordered a rerun, which Yushchenko won.

Yanukovych and his supporters complained bitterly that the mass protests, supported by many political leaders in Europe and the U.S., robbed him of the presidency.

But now Yanukovych praises the demonstrators. "On the question of democracy and freedom of speech, no one can deny the country changed for the better," he said. "There is more freedom of speech, more democracy, more freedom."

His political resurrection began in March, when he was the top vote-getter in a parliamentary vote described as Ukraine's freest and fairest. It climaxed in August, when he was named prime minister in a political deal with his former foes.

Yushchenko and Yanukovych share power in the awkward arrangement that was initially billed as an effort to unite Ukraine but instead has turned into a tug-of-war for influence, with the president largely on the losing end.

In the latest battle, lawmakers on Friday fired a key ally of the president, the pro-Western Foreign Minister Borys Tarasyuk, along with Interior Minister Yuriy Lutsenko, one of the leaders of the Orange Revolution. Yushchenko said Tarasyuk's dismissal will be challenged before the nation's Constitutional Court.

Yanukovych is still regarded as the Kremlin's friend in Ukraine — and it has paid off for him. He helped strike a deal on gas prices for next year that, while still a significant increase for the ex-Soviet republic, is lower than what Russia proposed to neighboring states.

Of late, Yanukovych has tried not to overtly antagonize the West. For instance, while delaying Ukraine's membership bid into NATO, he does support continuing cooperation with the alliance. On Tuesday, he called the U.S. "a strategic partner of Ukraine."

The prime minister is trying to improve his soft powers along with his hard-nosed political moves. Before the Orange Revolution, he came across as stiff and grumpy when he met journalists, and when interviews ended, he simply stood up and left.

Now, he smiles and mingles. Meeting with reporters on Tuesday, he loitered long enough to autograph copies of a book celebrating his first 100 days in office. Heading out the door, Yanukovych stopped suddenly, as if remembering something, and spun around to say goodbye.

Political analyst Mykhailo Pohrebinsky said that Yanukovych clearly had changed his presentation.

"We see that he says democratic things and poses himself as a protector of the freedom of speech," Pohrebinsky said. "Whether this is sincere, I can't say."

Who Succeeds Putin? Ask Putin (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

MOSCOW — By showing up together at a Deep Purple concert here this fall, First Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev and Defense Minister Sergei B. Ivanov presumably were reliving more carefree days.

Ivanov was a teenager and Medvedev just a child when the British hard-rock group burst onto the international scene, a time when a clutch of Western bands gained near-iconic status among Soviet youths as symbols of social freedom.

The buzz here is that the two men are the leading contestants in a competition to be President Vladimir V. Putin's anointed successor when his second term expires in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0101225

So these were not just any two high-ranking officials, and their shared enthusiasm for "Smoke on the Water" may signal that they want to be viewed as friends and allies, not competitors.

They could, after all, end up as partners in a new power structure, with one serving as president and the other as prime minister.

"I am, of course, saddened by the fact that I have been made a contestant in some race, but it does not in any way affect my relations with Sergei Borisovich Ivanov," Medvedev told an interviewer for Russia's NTV news channel the day after the concert. The interviewer asked whether the two men had joined in the dancing.

"Well, we just applauded," the 41-year-old Medvedev replied.

What a missed opportunity, mused a columnist for the newspaper Nezavisimaya Gazeta. "You must be thinking that shaking to Deep Purple is no big deal," the columnist wrote. "Yes, it is a big deal, sirs, if the problem of 2008 could be resolved quite easily by such a dance. The one who dances better becomes president."

With Putin enjoying popularity ratings above 70% and holding ever greater centralized power, a presidential endorsement is widely seen here as key to succeeding him. That means the current contest among Medvedev, Ivanov and other potential candidates for the big man's nod may well prove more crucial than the 2008 election in determining Russia's course.

The personality and goals of the winner could nudge the country toward greater authoritarianism or toward a more decentralized and democratic political system.

Russia's constitution bars the president from a third consecutive term, and Putin has repeatedly said he does not favor revising it to allow him to continue in office past 2008. But in nationally televised comments in October, he suggested he might continue to wield influence after he leaves the job.

That comment was taken by some as an indication that Putin might seek to exercise power from another position, such as prime minister, or that he envisioned a role like that played by Deng Xiaoping after the late Chinese leader retired from his official positions.

Putin, 54, has support from more than two-thirds of parliament, so speculation remains that a way may be found for him to stay on as president. One scenario has him giving in to a groundswell of public opinion and allowing the constitution to be revised.

But if he does step down, as most observers think he will, it is clear that whomever he backs as successor will stand a very good chance of being elected. A July survey by the respected Levada Center polling agency found that 40% of respondents said they would vote for a candidate proposed by Putin, compared with 14% who would favor someone else.

As long as the Kremlin elite stays united around one candidate, that person can expect strongly favorable coverage on all nationwide TV channels, which are either state-run or owned by state-controlled businesses. Few observers think an opposition candidate would have much chance of overcoming that advantage.

"If Putin names a successor and backs him, his chances of winning the presidency will be extremely high provided there are no huge surprises," said Sergei Markov, director of the Institute of Political Studies, a Moscow think tank with ties to the Kremlin. "Practically, we are talking about 99% probability here."

Markov said he believed Medvedev and Ivanov had the inside track.

Other possible candidates, he said, include Russian Railways President Vladimir Yakunin; parliamentary speaker Boris Gryzlov; Georgy Poltavchenko and Dmitry Kozak, influential presidential representatives to the southern and central federal districts; Mikhail Prusak, governor of the Novgorod region; and presidential Chief of Staff Sergei Sobyanin.

Markov also suggested the two presumed leading contenders might work as a team: Ivanov, 53, running for president with the understanding that Medvedev would be prime minister.

"This question has not been resolved yet, and this is just one of the possible options," Markov said.

Medvedev and Ivanov were thrust into the limelight as potential successors when they were appointed deputy prime ministers in November 2005. Medvedev was previously Putin's chief of staff, and Ivanov added the new title and broader responsibilities to his job as defense minister.

Ivanov, like Putin, worked for the KGB for many years. An early career with Soviet intelligence has generally been a plus for ambitious officials since Putin became president in 2000.

Medvedev began his career as a St. Petersburg law professor and legal affairs advisor.

"Medvedev's strength is that he is a pro-Western manager," Markov said.

"His weak side is that he is not connected with the people from the security apparatus, and so far he hasn't shown himself to be a strong leader able to make strong decisions. So far he appears too soft for the job."

Some skeptics question whether all the attention paid to Medvedev and Ivanov since their promotions is just a sideshow, with Putin's real pick likely to be someone with a lower profile.

"I am quite confident that neither Medvedev nor Ivanov will be chosen as a successor," said Dmitry Oreshkin, an analyst at the Russian Academy of Science's Institute of Geography. "The fuss around them is nothing but, to use the KGB terminology, the Kremlin's 'cover operation' to hide the preparation of the real plans.

"If a real successor gets appointed, he will appear some six months before the election like a rabbit from a hat or a devil from a box," Oreshkin said. "The real successor will immediately commit some heroic deed, like defeating Georgia in a lightning military operation, for example, or something on that scale, and thus will get elected by a landslide."

Oreshkin suggested that Yakunin, the railways president, who is considered personally close to Putin, may be a strong contender for that scenario.

Although Yakunin's official biography makes no mention of ties to the KGB, his early career path, which included a stint with the Soviet mission to the United Nations, suggests such links.

Yakunin "can be quite reasonable and demanding as a manager, and he is also a strong proponent of a powerful state," Oreshkin said. "In some ways he may become an even harder and tougher president than Putin himself."

Mikhail G. Delyagin, chairman of the Institute of Globalization Studies, a Moscow think tank, cited the common analysis that the Kremlin is broadly divided into two competing groups: the siloviki, or "powerful ones," and the liberals, with that label used in its classic free-market sense, not in its political-left meaning.

The siloviki have KGB backgrounds or are otherwise associated with security and defense, and are typically more politically hard-line. The liberals are composed largely of economic technocrats who do not have security backgrounds.

Medvedev is widely viewed as the standard-bearer of the liberal camp within the Kremlin, while Putin's deputy chief of staff, Igor Sechin, 46, is seen as leader of the siloviki.

Delyagin noted that most analysts do not consider Sechin a candidate for successor. But he argued that precisely because Sechin is not included on such lists, his chances may be quite good.

"He is the second in command in the country now," Delyagin said. "He is very smart and very influential. Moscow intellectuals like to laugh at him, but that only shows how shortsighted Moscow intellectuals are."

Delyagin, a prominent Putin critic, also offered another scenario for the election.

Putin can yield the throne, but the anointed successor "can quickly get sick after the election," he said, noting that the constitution bars Putin not from a third term, but from a third consecutive term.

Putin, he suggested, could allow "Comrade Medvedev" to be elected president — but with an understanding that he will resign almost immediately, claiming ill health.

In that case, he said, "new elections will be held and Putin will be able to take part in them."

Russian Ex-Spy Lived In A World Of Deceptions (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 2 — The tangled tale of Alexander V. Litvinenko, the maverick Russian K.G.B. agent turned dissident who died of radiation poisoning last week, has seized the headlines recently, but its roots can be traced to a late spring evening in Moscow in 1994.

At just after 5 p.m. on June 7, Boris A. Berezovsky, one of Russia's most powerful oligarchs, was leaving the offices of his car dealership in a chauffeured Mercedes 600. According to Russian news accounts at the time, he and his bodyguard were sitting in the rear seat behind the driver. As the car drove by a parked vehicle, a remote-controlled bomb detonated, decapitating the driver but somehow leaving Mr. Berezovsky unscathed.

As a high-ranking officer in the organized crime unit of the F.S.B., the successor to the K.G.B., Mr. Litvinenko "was the investigating officer of the assassination attempt," said Alex Goldfarb, a Berezovsky associate and a spokesman for the Litvinenko family, in an interview conducted, fittingly, in the rear seat of a parked Mercedes in central London with a heavyset driver at the wheel. "They became friends."

It was a friendship that was to shape Mr. Litvinenko's career, which began in the roller-coaster politics and self-enrichment of post-Soviet Russia, spanned his desperate flight from Russia through Turkey and then on to Britain to seek asylum. It ended spectacularly and mysteriously, with the British police saying the only thing they knew for sure was that he was dead, poisoned after ingesting an obscure radioactive isotope called polonium 210.

After Mr. Litvinenko's death, sketchy facts and abundant speculation unfolded like some lost chapter of the cold war. But unlike those days of East-West division and the half-light of shadowy, underground conflicts, this saga played out in the bright glare of newspaper headlines and 24-hour news channels.

Although the precise circumstances of his death remain hidden, Mr. Litvinenko lived the last years of his life as a public critic of President Vladimir V. Putin and the Russian government. Assigned to investigate the assassination attempt on Mr. Berezovsky, he ended up accusing the F.S.B. of involvement in a later conspiracy, a charge that severed his ties with the agency. Once in exile in London, his contacts with Mr. Berezovsky and a circle of other Russian émigrés and former agents flourished, even as his criticism of Mr. Putin grew more vigorous. In the weeks before his death, he had begun looking into the shooting death in Moscow of the journalist Anna Politkovskaya, a fierce critic of Mr. Putin and his policies in Chechnya.

Mr. Litvinenko began his lingering decline on Nov. 1, when he met an Italian academic, Mario Scaramella, in a sushi bar and linked up with former K.G.B. colleagues in a five-star hotel. Then he fell ill, wasting away over 22 excruciating days from a muscular, almost boyish figure to a gaunt shadow. Investigators followed a radioactive trail around London and, through British Airways planes found to have traces of radiation, to Moscow. British Airways said 221 flights, carrying 33,000 people, might have been affected. In a bizarre sideshow, a former Russian prime minister, Yegor Gaidar, a quiet critic of the Kremlin, fell ill with symptoms of poisoning.

The episode left Britain's relations with Russia strained: no matter how much Mr. Putin denied it, British officials faced a barrage of newspaper speculation that a supposedly friendly power, or its disaffected agents, had reached onto the streets of London for nefarious purposes.

From his deathbed, Mr. Litvinenko accused Mr. Putin of responsibility for his plight, but that conclusion was far from certain. One thing, though, was abundantly clear: Mr. Litvinenko's death matched his life in a world of conspiracy and betrayal as a former spy.

Links to a Tycoon

Mr. Litvinenko's role in the investigation of the assassination attempt against Mr. Berezovsky, who fled into exile in London in 2000, is not widely chronicled, although it was alluded to in an Associated Press report in 1998, which said the case was never solved.

Nonetheless, it appears to have provided the starting point for an association between Mr. Berezovsky, then one of Russia's richest men and most influential power brokers, and Mr. Litvinenko, who was rapidly acquiring a reputation at the Russian spy agency as a rebel and whistleblower.

Mr. Berezovsky declined to be interviewed for this article, saying through a spokesman that he was not prepared to offer further comment until after the police investigation of Mr. Litvinenko's death.lin a book he published in 2004, "Lubyanka Criminal Group," Mr. Litvinenko referred to a turning point in his life as an agent. In December 1997, he said his superior in the F.S.B. called him into his office with staggering orders: "You, Litvinenko, you know Berezovsky? You have to liquidate him," he said his superior told him.

That claim resurfaced sensationally in the public eye in November 1998, after Mr. Berezovsky accused the F.S.B. of plotting to assassinate him. Mr. Litvinenko and other disaffected agents called a news conference to confirm Mr. Berezovsky's allegations. It was a bizarre spectacle, even by the conspiratorial standards of the time: one dissident F.S.B. officer appeared in a ski mask, another in dark glasses. Mr. Litvinenko did not conceal his identity.

Mr. Putin, who led the agency at the time, reacted angrily, threatening to dismiss Mr. Litvinenko and the other officers who had spoken out.

According to a transcript published by the Kremlin International News Broadcast, Mr. Litvinenko began with a forthright attack on corruption within the agency. He said some of its units "have been used by certain officials not for constitutional purposes of state and personal security but for their own private political and material purposes, to settle accounts with undesirable persons, to carry out private political and criminal orders for a fee and sometimes simply as an instrument to earn money."

The remarks led to Mr. Litvinenko's suspension from the F.S.B. and a series of criminal court cases on five counts of abuse of power and other charges. In 1999, he spent eight months in pretrial detention in Lefortovo Prison in Moscow. When charges were dropped in November 1999 for lack of evidence, he was rearrested the instant the acquittal was read out, according to an account in Izvestia in 2001. He was released again in December 1999 and ordered not to leave town.

But the weeks and months went by with no indication that the investigations against him would be dropped.

Mr. Litvinenko, his wife, Marina, and son, Anatoly, fled Moscow in October 2000. According to accounts by Mr. Litvinenko at the time, and by others including Mr. Goldfarb and Viktor Suvorov, a former Soviet military intelligence officer and defector, his trail led from Russia to the town of Antalya in southern Turkey, possibly via Ukraine.

But once in Turkey, no one, it seemed, wanted to deal with a renegade Russian agent.

"I brought him to the U.S. Embassy at the end of October in Ankara," said Mr. Goldfarb, by his own account an American citizen who fled the Soviet Union 31 years ago and spent many years in exile working for, among others, the financier George Soros. "We just walked in and said here's the F.S.B. colonel, and they are not interested."

Finally, Mr. Litvinenko left Turkey using a ticket allowing him to transit, but not stay, in London. In November 2000, he arrived at Heathrow airport, surrendered to the British police and claimed asylum, according to accounts by Mr. Litvinenko and in the British press. But he was still not treated as a high-level defector.

Mr. Suvorov, an agent from Russian military intelligence, G.R.U., who defected in 1978, said: "I raised the question, 'Look, there's a man who has lots of information about organized crime' — no one else had so much information — but no one questioned him about it, British, French, Americans. He had incredible knowledge." Neither Turkish nor American officials confirmed this account.

But, to judge from what happened later, Mr. Litvinenko was determined to put his knowledge of Russia's intelligence networks to use.

Émigrés in London

From the minute he landed in Britain, Mr. Litvinenko resumed his association with Mr. Berezovsky, who had arrived some months earlier also seeking asylum. From a modest row house in white-collar Muswell Hill in north London, he appears to have moved easily in security and former espionage circles, frequently visiting Mr. Berezovsky's offices in Mayfair — one of London's most upscale districts.

He was part, too, of a population of an estimated 300,000 Russians in London, including political émigrés, old-time defectors and wealthy tycoons who spend their time in nightclubs and boutiques and buying up real estate and soccer clubs. He was granted British citizenship earlier this year.

But he also maintained contact with his former F.S.B. colleagues, like Mikhail Trepashkin, who was jailed in October 2003 for betraying state secrets while investigating apartment bombings in Moscow and elsewhere in 1999 that killed scores of people. Those bombings formed the basis of a book published in English the same year by Mr. Litvinenko accusing Russia's security services of staging the bombings as a pretext for the second Chechen war.

In a letter released Friday and dated Nov. 23, Mr. Trepashkin said in a reference to the F.S.B., "Back in 2002, I warned Alexander Litvinenko that they set up a special team to kill him."

But Mr. Litvinenko also registered increasing concerns about his safety. "A secret service is designed to fight another secret service," he told The New York Times in a telephone interview in 2004 during the inquiry into the poisoning of Viktor A. Yushchenko, then a Ukrainian presidential candidate. "When a secret service goes after an individual, they have no chance."

DOJ_NMG_0101229

Mr. Litvinenko said his supporters arranged for him to address British legislators, whom he told that members of the Russian secret services were "getting more aggressive, threatening my relatives." He said he knew of 32 Russian spies working in England. "They follow us and prepare provocations and our liquidation," he said.

In September 2004, two weeks after his appeal to Parliament, Mr. Litvinenko said in the interview, bottles containing burning liquid were thrown at his apartment at 1 a.m.

Some of his associates bridled at the idea that he was Mr. Berezovsky's personal agent or go-between. "He was not just someone who came from Russia and said to Berezovsky: give me some money," said Mr. Suvorov, the former G.R.U. agent.

But Mr. Litvinenko nonetheless displayed a knack for confidential business. According to a report in The Times of London in November, he traveled to Israel weeks before he died to hand over a dossier on the Yukos oil affair — in which the company's former chairman, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, has been imprisoned for tax evasion — to Leonid Nevzlin, an exiled oil tycoon. Mr. Nevzlin was quoted as confirming the article. On the fateful day when he first took ill, the radiation trail of his movement led to the offices of Erinys, an international security company in Mayfair.

It was in that upscale district on Nov. 1 that he met his former Russian security service colleagues, Andrei Lugovoi and Dmitri Kovtun, in the Millennium Mayfair hotel, and Mr. Scaramella, the Italian consultant and academic, in the sushi bar on nearby Piccadilly. All three men have denied poisoning him.

A Mystery Deepens

But the saga was not over. One week after the police reported that Mr. Litvinenko had been poisoned, Mr. Scaramella himself was hospitalized when concentrations of the isotope were found in his body. Traces were also found on a member of Mr. Litvinenko's family.

The mystery seemed as deep as ever: the police had traced Mr. Litvinenko's movements and his contacts on Nov. 1. Detectives had spent 20 hours interviewing him in the hospital, according to associates. Yet the trail to Moscow seemed elusive and was impossible to confirm. Speculation swirled inconclusively about Kremlin plots and counterplots and efforts by rogue operatives to pursue their own feuds or discredit President Putin. But no one could say where the poison came from or how it entered Mr. Litvinenko's body.

Indeed, Mr. Lugovoi, the former K.G.B. agent, said in a Russian newspaper interview published on Saturday that Mr. Litvinenko might have, in fact, ingested the poison weeks earlier than anyone realized. If true, that would upend some of the most basic assumptions of the investigation — at least as far as it has been made public — and explain why radiation was found on a British Airways plane that flew between Moscow and London on Oct. 25.

"Alexander Litvinenko, my business partner Dmitri Kovtun and I were in London on Oct. 17 at a meeting in the office of Erinys," the private security company, Mr. Lugovoi told the Russian newspaper Kommersant. "Traces of radiation could have been left there after this visit."

Some of Mr. Litvinenko's associates said his position might have been made more precarious when he began to gather information about the death of Ms. Politkovskaya, the Russian investigative reporter shot to death in Moscow in October. "He was a very good investigator himself," said Mr. Suvorov, the former G.R.U. agent. "That made him very dangerous and vulnerable: if anyone called him and said, 'I know who killed Politkovskaya,' he just arranged a meeting. So, definitely, he was very vulnerable."

There's A Reason Russians Are Paranoid (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

BEING prone to conspiracy theories, as Russians certainly are, doesn't mean that someone is not conspiring against them.

That, in essence, has been the response here to the poisoning of Aleksandr V. Litvinenko, the secret agent turned exile in London who died on Nov. 23 — a case that only grew murkier last week with the discovery of radioactive traces aboard three British airplanes and another mysterious illness in Moscow.

Mr. Litvinenko's slow end, the intrigue of his final healthy days, his deathbed statement accusing President Vladimir V. Putin of culpability (in English, some Russians noted suspiciously) — have nurtured a widely held view here that it was all indeed a conspiracy, only not the one embraced by Mr. Putin's critics.

It was, from this point of view, not a plot by the Kremlin to silence a critic, but one by its enemies to discredit the Kremlin, the obvious suspects being Mr. Putin's critics in exile or, of course, President Bush, the Central Intelligence Agency or the West (generally).

Or it could have been a plot by a faction inside the Kremlin to make it look as if a competing faction inside the Kremlin had done it.

"There is too much evidence" to think otherwise, said Stanislav A. Belkovsky, a political scientist here with ties to Mr. Putin's Kremlin.

Actually, there is not much evidence at all, only questions and suspicions — which is, by the way, equally true of the accusations against Mr. Putin, no matter how fervently his critics believe them.

Every country has its conspiracy theories, of course, and the Spy vs. Spy dramas of the cold war and Hollywood have given life to a fair number of them. But they thrive here in the fertile ground of the Russian imagination as they do in few other places.

The Soviet Union's leaders obsessed over conspiracies, real and imagined. They also rewrote history so regularly, fabricated so many economic reports extolling progress, covered up so many embarrassments like the Chernobyl disaster that few here ever believed they knew the whole truth about anything. And the absence of truth is where conspiracy theories take root.

This remains so, and Mr. Putin is at least partly to blame. He has stifled the news media, and the day-to-day operation of the Kremlin is again as opaque as it was in Soviet times. And there is the inconvenient fact that the Kremlin's critics — including a number of journalists — keep dying in circumstances that investigators have yet to solve.

Mr. Putin's entire presidency has been wrapped up in conspiracy theories, starting with his abrupt rise to power as Boris Yeltsin's successor in 1999. That fall, a series of apartment bombings killed 243 people, fanning popular support for the second war in Chechnya, Russia's separatist region. From the start, the bombings were viewed with suspicion, especially after the discovery of federal agents planting what turned out to be explosives in the basement of another building. (A training exercise, officials finally said.) In Russian politics, the violence clearly played to the advantage of hard-liners like Mr. Putin.

A vocal adherent of the theory that Russian secret services conspired to bomb their own citizens to bolster the Chechen war effort was Mr. Litvinenko, a former agent of the secret service he accused in a book he jointly wrote, "Blowing Up Russia: Terror From Within." The book was published with the help of Boris A. Berezovsky, the self-exiled tycoon who lives in London and has become Mr. Putin's fiercest critic (the feeling is, evidently, mutual).

Aleksei A. Venediktov, a radio host and executive editor of Ekho Moskvy, said the failure of the government to investigate the bombings thoroughly has nurtured distrust. In the same way, there are those who believe the authorities know more than they have told about the terrorist school siege in Beslan, in which 332 hostages and rescuers were killed in 2004.

"As long as the public is not informed, conspiracy theories will multiply and grow," Mr. Venediktov said. "This does not mean there is no conspiracy."

His theory? It was neither Mr. Putin nor the secret services. In fact, few here believe Russia's leaders would have been so obvious as to use a radioactive isotope; it was used, instead, so people would think so!

Mr. Venediktov said a death squad working outside of government control killed Mr. Litvinenko to frighten the political elite into insisting that Mr. Putin, stay on for a third term whether he wants to or not. By law he must step down in 2008.

"The people who are behind this murder want to lay the responsibility in the future on Putin," he said, in order to make him afraid to leave office lest he be prosecuted.

In the Russian press, where objectivity is as elusive as ever, even darker theories abound, almost always pointing the blame away from Mr. Putin's Kremlin and back toward his accusers. Izvestia offered four on Thursday. According to one, Mr. Litvinenko was selling radioactive materials on the black market. Another: he and Mr. Berezovsky were making a nuclear bomb to help Chechnya's separatists.

These theories about Mr. Litvinenko are not just ideas on the fringe. The chairman of the upper house of Parliament, Sergei M. Mironov, noted that the deaths of Mr. Litvinenko and Anna Politkovskaya, the journalist who was murdered in October, took place on the eve of trips by Mr. Putin to Europe. "I do not think the coincidence was accidental," he said.

When news emerged last week that Yegor T. Gaidar, a former prime minister and critic of Mr. Putin's, had fallen ill a day after Mr. Litvinenko died, an ally of Mr. Gaidar's, Anatoly B. Chubais, linked it to the deaths of Mr. Litvinenko and Ms.

Politkovskaya, but not to Mr. Putin. Mr. Chubais, the head of Russia's electric company, offered a grand conspiracy theory involving an attempted coup against Mr. Putin.

The logic behind the conspiracies — let alone the facts — can sometimes be hard to fathom, but a Kremlin spokesman, Dmitry S. Peskov, said that many people in London, exiles and their supporters, were all too ready to believe anything that reflected poorly on Russia. "It is a negative heritage of the old times," he said.

Pressed, he suggested that "commercial interests" lay behind Mr. Litvinenko's charges.

Even Mr. Putin himself struck a conspiratorial tone, questioning the origins of Mr. Litvinenko's last statement. "If such a note really appeared before Mr. Litvinenko's death, then a question arises: why this note was not made public when he was still alive?"

British Cabinet Told Of Russian Espionage (WT)

By Sean Rayment

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

LONDON -- The Russian intelligence services, prime suspects in the death of Alexander Litvinenko, have a network of more than 30 spies operating in Britain.

The sophisticated ring represents the greatest espionage threat facing Britain, government and law-enforcement sources told the London Sunday Telegraph.

The startling intelligence was presented last week to Cabinet ministers at a meeting of Cobra, the anti-terrorist task force.

The spies, equivalent in number to one in five of Moscow government officials based in Britain, are known to be monitoring the movements and activities of Russian emigres and opponents of Russian President Vladimir Putin.

But they also are involved in a widespread operation targeting businessmen, members of Parliament and scientists in an attempt to steal commercial and state secrets.

Only the United States has more Russian agents operating on its soil.

Government sources claim that the agents are as active today as they were at the height of the Cold War, despite the fact that the Kremlin is now one of Britain's major allies in the war on terrorism.

They were also told that Mr. Litvinenko, a former KGB agent who died Nov. 23, was "most probably" slain by "state-sponsored" assassins with the radioactive poison polonium 210 and that suspicion centered firmly on Moscow.

"The Russian intelligence services are highly bureaucratic and legalistic. There isn't a great deal of room for personal initiative. Everything has to be officially authorized and signed off. And this murder would have been a highly complex operation involving many people, not one or two acting in isolation," one source told the Telegraph.

The revelations came as the Italian investigator Mario Scaramella, a friend of Mr. Litvinenko, was still being treated in a hospital after also being contaminated with polonium 210 after their meeting at a sushi restaurant.

Last night he was showing "no evidence of radiation toxicity," but doctors said they were continuing to monitor his condition and further tests were expected.

"The results may seem to suggest that Scaramella was an accidental victim, but it is still possible that the perpetrators simply failed to do their job properly, or that Scaramella himself might have had another role," a police source said.

Mr. Scaramella flew to Britain on an Easyjet flight from Naples, Italy, to Stansted Airport on Oct. 31 and flew back on Nov. 3.

Mr. Scaramella's name was one of five on a supposed "hit list" of people targeted for assassination by the Russian intelligence services and a shadowy group of KGB veterans called Dignity and Honor, which is run by a Col. Velentin Velichko.

During the Cobra meeting, government officials and the police were told that Russia is being ruled by a "brutal regime" that regards dissidents such as Mr. Litvinenko and Boris Berezovsky -- a Russian businessman living in exile in Britain -- as terrorists. The Russian state is suspected of ordering the killings of five persons in the past two decades.

Government sources said that Russia continues to spy on Britain because of its "insatiable" appetite for other countries' state secrets. The main areas of interest include finance, the energy industry, defense and electronics.

The threat is so severe that senior businessmen in companies such as BP and Centrica have been warned by MI5, a British intelligence service, that they may be targeted.

DOJ_NMG_0101232

Government officials said that the Russian spies target unsuspecting businessmen at trade fairs and functions at the Russian Embassy.

Meetings usually follow the exchange of business cards, during which a favor is asked and may be rewarded with cash or other "inducements."

Officials said that in a "throwback" to the Cold War, agents communicate by "live letter boxes," in which secret material is carried by one spy to another, or by "dead letter boxes," where the material is left in a covert location.

Raul Castro Asserts Leadership At Big Brother Fidel's Birthday Party (MCT)

By Frances Robles

McClatchy Newspapers, December 3, 2006

In a clear signal that Cuba's post-Castro era has begun, an ailing Fidel Castro failed to appear at a massive military parade in his honor Saturday while his brother and designated successor delivered an inaugural speech of sorts.

Without explaining his brothers' absence, Raul renewed his willingness to negotiate an end to the almost 50 years of animosity between Washington and Havana. But on his own terms.

"We want to reaffirm our disposition to resolve at the negotiating table the prolonged dispute between the United States and Cuba, if and when they accept our country's condition that it will not tolerate any shadows over its independence," Raul said.

Many Cuba-watchers had expected Fidel to make his first public appearance at the parade since undergoing surgery in July and "temporarily" surrendering the presidency to Raul. At that time, Fidel asked that celebrations for his 80th birthday on Aug. 13 be postponed until Saturday.

But Fidel's absence was certain to fuel U.S. reports that he suffers from terminal cancer and likely will not live past 2007. The Cuban government has refused to detail his ailment, only repeating incessantly that he is "recuperating."

Cuba's media said 300,000 soldiers, students and workers marched along the Plaza of the Revolution as Russian-built MiG jets soared overhead, tanks rolled, and the nation's elite watched from the perch of bleachers.

Many of the marchers chanted, "We love you Fidel" and "Viva Raul," and some carried signs praising the revolution, launched Dec. 2, 1956 when the yacht Granma landed in eastern Cuba carrying the Castro brothers and 80 other fighters.

But in other parts of Havana, the capital seemed largely quiet and almost lifeless on a Saturday morning, with only a dampened sense of the celebrations of the birthdays of Fidel or the revolution.

Some Havana residents interviewed by The Miami Herald Saturday seemed to accept that Fidel is on his last legs yet - at least in public and before strangers - insisted that his ideology would survive his death.

"His death will not change anything. It will not mean they can come in and take over," said 83-year-old Sergio, referring to Cuban exiles abroad.

Leading the military display was Raul, still referred to by the Cuban media as defense minister rather than acting president. After a brief introduction by a teenager, Raul gave the only address of the parade.

It was the second time in Raul's rare recent public statements that he mentioned a willingness to work with Washington. But his calls are likely to fall flat for the time being since Bush administration policy is to push for democracy in Cuba - and oppose the kind of succession from one Castro to another that Raul's speech signaled.

"The absence of Fidel at this parade means that Dec. 2 marks the start of the post-Fidel era," said National War College professor Frank Mora. "The eulogies have begun, history and legacy will inform everything, but the message is clear . . . a new era and model of governance has begun."

Raul led the parade aboard a Soviet-era military vehicle, accompanied by three original commanders of the revolution: Ramiro Valdes, Juan Almeida and Guillermo Garcia.

"We are convinced that the way out of the distressing conflicts that humanity faces is not through war but through political solutions," Raul said.

The Bush administration reacted to Raul's speech by reiterating its previous position: The communist government must first initiate a democratic opening - an option long rejected by the Cubans as interference in their internal affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0101233

"The dialogue that needs to take place is one between the Cuban regime and the Cuban people about the democratic future of their island," said State Department spokeswoman Janelle Hironimus, reading from a prepared statement. "As we have repeatedly stated, any deepening of our engagement with Cuba depends on that dialogue and the Cuban regime's willingness to take concrete steps toward a political opening and a transition toward democracy."

Assistant Secretary of State for the Western Hemisphere Thomas Shannon in August specified some of the U.S. conditions: freeing political prisoners, respecting human rights, permitting the creation of independent organizations such as political parties and trade unions, and "creating a pathway" towards elections.

The olive branch that Raul extended toward Washington was not without barbs, however.

"After almost half a century, we are willing to wait patiently for the moment when common sense prevails in the behavior of the circles of power in Washington," he said.

"Three years and seven months after the euphoric and hasty declaration of `mission accomplished' in Iraq by President Bush aboard an aircraft carrier, the cadavers of young American soldiers continue to arrive in the United States," he added. "The government of the United States finds itself at a crossroads with no way out."

Underlining the importance of Raul's speech, the Cuban government swiftly posted translations into English, French, Italian, Portuguese, German, Arabic and Russian in its web site.

Many observers say Raul would be a more pragmatic leader, committed to communist rule but open to reforms away from Cuba's centrally controlled economy. The Revolutionary Armed Forces that Raul Castro leads now runs most of the island's commercial enterprises, such as its tourist industry.

Since Fidel announced plans for Saturday's event four months ago, he has appeared only in sporadic videos and photographs that showed him shrunken and weak, sometimes in pajamas or a loose-fitting tracksuit.

But those weren't the images shown Saturday on Cuban television, which broadcast hours of historic clips of a younger, stronger, triumphant Castro.

Miami Herald Washington correspondent Pablo Bachelet and translator Renato Perez contributed to this report. The name of the correspondent in Havana who also contributed was withheld because the Miami Herald lacks Cuban government authorization to report from there.

Castro A No-show At 80th Birthday Bash (AP)

By Anita Snow, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 3, 2006

Fidel Castro was a no-show Saturday at a major military parade that doubled as his 80th birthday celebration, raising questions about whether the ailing leader will ever return to power as his public absence begins taking on a tone of permanence.

Many Cubans had hoped for at least a glimpse of Castro before dozens of olive-camouflaged tanks rumbled through the Plaza of the Revolution and jet fighters soared above the capital to mark the 50th anniversary of the formation of Cuba's Revolutionary Armed Forces.

Castro hasn't been seen in public since July 26, before he underwent secretive intestinal surgery and temporarily ceded power to his younger brother, Raul. He delayed his 80th birthday celebration from Aug. 13 to this week in order to give himself time to recover, and speculation had been rife whether he would appear.

The military event, which lasted about two hours, culminated five days of events to celebrate Castro's birthday — none of which he attended.

Instead, it was Raul Castro, the island's defense minister, who stood at the mahogany lectern reviewing the troops during Saturday's parade.

The parade's most obvious purpose was to warn the U.S. against taking advantage of Fidel Castro's illness to attack the island. In the last 15 years the Cuban military has taken on a purely defensive role, and is trained to repel invaders.

In a speech that lacked his brother's rhetorical flourishes, Raul Castro reached out to the U.S. government, which has a decades-old trade and travel embargo against the communist-run island. He did not explain the absence of his brother.

"We take this opportunity to once again state that we are willing to resolve at the negotiating table the long-standing dispute between the United States and Cuba," as long as the U.S. respects Cuba's sovereignty, said Raul Castro, who turned 75 in June.

"After almost half a century, we are willing to wait patiently until the moment when common sense prevails in Washington power circles," he added.

U.S. State Department spokeswoman Janelle Hironimus said Saturday that "the dialogue that needs to take place is one between the Cuban regime and the Cuban people about the democratic future of the island.

"Any deepening of our engagement with Cuba depends on that dialogue and the Cuban regime's willingness to take concrete steps toward a political opening and a transition to democracy," she added.

Raul Castro used the event to underscore cohesion among the Cuban people, the armed forces and the Communist Party — a recurring theme among officials in recent days.

"This unity is our main strategic weapon, which has made it possible for this small island to resist and overcome so many aggressions from imperialism and its allies," he said.

Cuban officials insist Fidel Castro is recovering, but U.S. officials say they believe he suffers from some kind of inoperable cancer and will not live through the end of 2007. He has appeared thin and pale in photographs and videos released by the government in recent months.

Some U.S. doctors have speculated he could have diverticulosis, a condition relatively common among older people that is caused when weak spots form along the colon and intersect with an artery.

Fidel Castro purportedly sent a message to those celebrating his birthday earlier this week, telling a crowd of 5,000 supporters at the opening event Tuesday at a Havana theater that he was too sick to meet with them.

"I direct myself to you, intellectuals and prestigious personalities of the world, with a dilemma," said a note read at the event. "I could not meet with you in a small locale, only in the Karl Marx Theater where all the visitors would fit, and I was not yet in condition, according to the doctors, to face such a colossal encounter."

Magda Avila, a 70-year-old army veteran, said she was not disappointed the elder Castro did not appear at the parade. "It is fine that he didn't come, so that he can recuperate," she said.

In Miami, Alfredo Mesa, executive director of the anti-Castro Cuban-American National Foundation, said the leader's failure to appear was unimportant.

"For us, Fidel Castro is part of the past," Mesa said. "The pressure is on those who did appear, for them to let Cubans in Cuba decide for themselves what kind of future they want."

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said in Caracas that Castro, his good friend and ally, was still "alive and kicking" and that Cuba's communist revolution will live on. Chavez could not attend the parade because he faces re-election Sunday.

Among those at the parade were Bolivian President Evo Morales, Haitian President Rene Preval, Nicaraguan President-elect Daniel Ortega and Colombian Nobel laureate Gabriel Garcia Marquez, as well as hundreds of elderly former combatants from Cuba's revolutionary struggle.

In the first major military parade held in Havana in a decade, tens of thousands of Cubans marched behind anti-aircraft missiles, tanks and other armored vehicles while MiG fighter jets and helicopter gunships flew overhead. The crowd of loyalists was more subdued than in other mass events presided over by Fidel Castro.

Thousands of soldiers led the parade, including special forces in red berets, militiamen in blue uniforms and horseback riders wearing the white dress uniform of 19th century Cuban independence fighters.

Cuba's Revolutionary Armed Forces, which replaced the military that existed before the Cuban Revolution, traces its roots to Dec. 2, 1956, when 82 rebels landed on the island on a yacht — the Granma — that sailed from Mexico.

Only 12 survived the landing and initial skirmishes with President Fulgencio Batista's forces in December 1956. Among the survivors were the two Castro brothers and Ernesto "Che" Guevara, who headed for the hills to build a command post for the revolution that drove Batista out of Cuba on Jan. 1, 1959.

A Rare Silence Reverberates In Castro's Long Goodbye (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

DOJ_NMG_0101235

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

HAVANA, Dec. 2 — In his day, Fidel Castro could not stop talking. He was Cuba's talk show host as well as its president, with his frequent long speeches broadcast into homes on radio and television serving as something akin to background music in Cubans' lives.

Anything that popped into his head was material, whether it was his reflections on Cuban history, his outrage at Washington or a meandering story that left audiences scratching their heads.

Now, though, Mr. Castro, Cuba's ailing leader, is silent, leaving a gap on state-run broadcasts and confused audiences.

On Saturday, the final day of a weeklong belated birthday celebration for the 80-year-old Mr. Castro, Cubans expected one last discourse. But he was a no-show at a flashy military parade that capped the week of festivities. That left many Cubans convinced that their leader of nearly half a century had delivered his final speech.

"The old man is as weak as me," said a man in his 70s who sells copies of the Communist Party newspaper from the wheelchair he has used since losing a leg to gangrene. "I will outlast him."

Mr. Castro last addressed Cubans on July 26, then slipped out of view for several days. On July 31, he announced in a statement that he had had abdominal surgery several days before and that his 75-year-old brother, Raúl, would take over as president while he recuperated.

Mr. Castro's illness, details of which are still regarded as a state secret, has awakened Cubans to the notion of life without the only leader most of them have ever known. Life, defenders and critics of his rule agree, is likely to continue largely as it has, only with a new Castro, a more taciturn one, at the top of the Communist Party organizational chart.

"Nothing has changed for us," said José, 38, a mechanic who opened the refrigerator in his tiny, rundown apartment this week to show three shriveled tomatoes, three pieces of garlic and little else. "Every day will continue to be a struggle."

Mr. Castro's Cuba is very much a work in progress. Its education and health care systems are universal, but socialism has not wiped out classism or racism, freedom to speak out is clearly restricted and life for most people is humble, at best.

Mr. Castro's popularity stems in large part from his long standoff with the United States; he has been an irritant for presidents dating back to Eisenhower.

A variety of concerts, conferences and other tributes in the past week have had the feeling of a long goodbye. Mr. Castro's death, which opponents in the United States had predicted for years was imminent, is now widely assumed among Cubans to be looming.

At Saturday's parade, Raúl was the only Castro to speak. In a 20-minute address, he railed at the American government, condemning the war in Iraq and suggesting that Cuba would negotiate with Washington only on equal terms.

"After almost half a century, we are willing to wait patiently until the moment when common sense prevails in the Washington power circles," he said.

The parade, which featured Soviet-made tanks rumbling by and jets streaking overhead, drew onlookers from around the world, including such notables as Gabriel García Márquez, the Nobel prize-winning author from Colombia; Daniel Ortega, the president-elect of Nicaragua; Evo Morales, the president of Bolivia; René Préval, the president of of Haiti; and the French actor Gérard Depardieu.

Expectations were high that Mr. Castro would attend, but when he did not, his supporters made the most of the celebration. "He's not physically here, but he's still here with us," said Deysi Francis, 42, a journalist with the state-run newspaper Granma.

Antonio Jiménez, 70, a retired teacher, held up a photograph of a young, cigar-smoking Mr. Castro and expressed optimism that he would recover. "His doctors are trying to preserve him," Mr. Jimenez said.

When he does die, Fidel Castro's illness has already shown that he will not disappear altogether.

Billboards of his likeness and his words have been erected around Cuba, posted after the country learned he was sick. Television has been showing biographical sketches of him and snippets of speeches from the past.

Mr. Castro even continues to speak in the pages of Granma, which is churning out a serialized version of several long interviews he gave a French academic in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0101236

“The enemies of the Cuban revolution are counting the minutes waiting and hoping that he dies, without understanding that Fidel no longer is Fidel,” Foreign Minister Felipe Pérez Roque said Thursday at an academic conference devoted to Mr. Castro, the bearded former guerrilla fighter.

“Now, he is the people, and he is every man and woman prepared to fight for the idea that a better world is possible,” said Mr. Pérez Roque, who was for years Mr. Castro’s personal secretary.

While insisting that Mr. Castro would recover, Mr. Pérez Roque described a post-Castro Cuba in which the ideals he spoke of in his many long addresses over the years would endure. “When he and the men of his generation are no longer with us, we have the conviction that our people will have made those ideas and principles theirs forever,” he said.

But Mr. Castro’s long-winded days are almost surely in the past. Brian Latell, a former C.I.A. analyst who specialized in Cuba, describes in his book “After Fidel” one speech from 1968, during a political purge on the island, that went on for 12 hours.

“Probably no other human in any line of work has ever been recorded uttering such avalanches of words,” wrote Mr. Latell, who sifted through many of Mr. Castro’s thousands of speeches over the years in search of clues on his thinking.

On the streets, people speak of him fondly one minute, then whisper criticism of his rule. Saying his name is not necessary — they sometimes stroke an imaginary beard. Opinions are often a jumble of contradictions.

“I don’t have a bad opinion of him, but he has us like we’re in jail,” said Mario Gutiérrez, 19, a rap singer.

José, the mechanic, who provided only his first name out of fear his comments could run afoul of the authorities, said Mr. Castro had become a father figure to Cubans — even those who are dissatisfied with their everyday lives and blame him. “Our father is dying, and that’s sad,” he said, “even though we want him to go.”

No Castro, But Lots Of Speculation (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

HAVANA, Dec. 2 -- Cubans woke before dawn Saturday and walked miles for a chance to be near Fidel Castro.

There were no guarantees that the Cuban president, who had been absent from public view for more than four months since undergoing stomach surgery, would surface. Just rumors and whispers, whispers and rumors.

The sounds of Havana wrestling with its greatest modern mystery trickled out of faded doorways and clattered off the chipped facades of this gracefully decaying capital.

"He's getting better."

"He's dead."

"Nobody knows."

It went like that all morning, as hundreds of thousands of Cubans ringed the concrete Plaza de la Revolucion for this country's largest military parade in decades. And it went like that long after the last missile launchers and tanks cut smoky paths down the 20th of May Avenue.

The man they had all come to see never showed up. Castro remained hidden away, his illness shrouded in mystery, his whereabouts a jealously guarded state secret.

"We're all wondering what's happening; it's all we talk about," said Angel Gutierrez, a graphic artist who watched the event on television in his home along the parade route, as a half-dozen police officers crowded his doorway to catch a glimpse of the coverage. "Whatever it is, it's bad."

Those in the crowd, waving thousands of Cuban flags attached to splintery poles, got no clues from Castro's handpicked interim successor, his younger brother Raul. Appearing in a green military uniform and a cap, Raul Castro, 75, said Cuba was willing to use "the negotiating table" to improve relations with the United States. But he said little about his brother, other than "Viva Fidel!" -- Long live Fidel!

Many Cubans expected the uncertainty about Fidel Castro to be cleared up Saturday. But the day ended with more confusion.

DOJ_NMG_0101237

The president temporarily relinquished power for the first time in 47 years after his surgery on July 31. The Cuban government canceled a blowout party planned for Aug. 13, his 80th birthday, but set Dec. 2 as the date for his triumphant return. It was to have been both a commemoration of the Cuban revolution's 50th anniversary and a belated birthday celebration.

Stars of Latin America's populist movements -- heirs to Castro's legacy -- poured into Havana. There was Daniel Ortega, the onetime rebel who recently recaptured Nicaragua's presidency, and there was Evo Morales, the plain-spoken indigenous leader who holds Bolivia's presidency.

In absentia, Castro was praised in a series of events over the past three days, and honored by political leaders and intellectuals, such as Gabriel Garcia Marquez, a Nobel Prize-winning author and Castro's friend.

Each event was accompanied by a tingle of anticipation, a buzz in the corridors about whether Castro would appear. On Tuesday night, a spokesman read a rambling statement to a concert audience in which Castro said his doctors advised him against showing up at such a large event.

Diplomats and analysts parsed the statement, searching for meaning. Many foreign officials have concluded that Castro does not have long to live, that he is dying of cancer or some other terminal disease.

The possible demise of the dominant figure in modern Cuban history has sparked an endless conversation here about what comes next. Cubans seem to be accepting Raul Castro's legitimacy as Fidel Castro's heir to power, but they wonder and sometimes fear what the younger brother will do.

Cubans often praise the country's 100 percent literacy rate and its system of free schools and medical treatment. But many, speaking cautiously and almost always anonymously, say they hope a new government might allow more personal freedom, sanction private enterprise and lift travel restrictions that keep most Cubans on the island their entire lives.

"I like a lot of what I have," said Pablo, a state worker. "But so much has to change; it just has to."

Change here is associated with the end of Fidel Castro's reign, or more specifically, the end of his life. But the Cuban government says its "supreme leader" will lead again.

On Friday, at the gala closing of Castro's birthday celebration, Vice President Carlos Lage emphatically declared that Castro would recover and return to power.

"He is not a man," Lage shouted into the microphone. "He is a force of nature!"

Yet Lage also seemed to ponder Castro's demise.

"When Fidel is not here, his works and his thoughts will remain," he said.

But at the military parade Saturday, there was no such talk. An announcer shouted "Viva Fidel! Viva Raul!" as a replica of the Granma, the yacht the Castro brothers sailed from Mexico to start their revolution, eased past the reviewing stand.

The elite crowd of invited guests in the plaza yelled back, "Viva Fidel! Viva Raul !"

But the crowd in Gutierrez's living room, and the even bigger one peering through his window and lining the street, watched in silence.

Fidel's Final Victory (FA)

From Foreign Affairs, January/February 2007

Summary: The smooth transfer of power from Fidel Castro to his successors is exposing the willful ignorance and wishful thinking of U.S. policy toward Cuba. The post-Fidel transition is already well under way, and change in Cuba will come only gradually from here on out. With or without Fidel, renewed U.S. efforts to topple the revolutionary regime in Havana can do no good -- and have the potential to do considerable harm.

CUBA AFTER CASTRO?

Ever since Fidel Castro gained power in 1959, Washington and the Cuban exile community have been eagerly awaiting the moment when he would lose it -- at which point, the thinking went, they would have carte blanche to remake Cuba in their own image. Without Fidel's iron fist to keep Cubans in their place, the island would erupt into a collective demand for rapid change. The long-oppressed population would overthrow Fidel's revolutionary cronies and clamor for capital, expertise, and leadership from the north to transform Cuba into a market democracy with strong ties to the United States.

But that moment has come and gone -- and none of what Washington and the exiles anticipated has come to pass. Even as Cuba-watchers speculate about how much longer the ailing Fidel will survive, the post-Fidel transition is already well under way. Power has been successfully transferred to a new set of leaders, whose priority is to preserve the system while permitting only very gradual reform. Cubans have not revolted, and their national identity remains tied to the defense of the homeland against U.S. attacks on its sovereignty. As the post-Fidel regime responds to pent-up demands for more democratic participation and economic opportunity, Cuba will undoubtedly change -- but the pace and nature of that change will be mostly imperceptible to the naked American eye.

Fidel's almost five decades in power came to a close last summer not with the expected bang, or even really a whimper, but in slow motion, with Fidel himself orchestrating the transition. The transfer of authority from Fidel to his younger brother, Raúl, and half a dozen loyalists -- who have been running the country under Fidel's watch for decades -- has been notably smooth and stable. Not one violent episode in Cuban streets. No massive exodus of refugees. And despite an initial wave of euphoria in Miami, not one boat leaving a florida port for the 90-mile trip. Within Cuba, whether Fidel himself survives for weeks, months, or years is now in many ways beside the point.

In Washington, however, Cuba policy -- aimed essentially at regime change -- has long been dominated by wishful thinking ever more disconnected from the reality on the island. Thanks to the votes and campaign contributions of the 1.5 million Cuban Americans who live in florida and New Jersey, domestic politics has driven policymaking. That tendency has been indulged by a U.S. intelligence community hamstrung by a breathtaking and largely self-imposed isolation from Cuba and reinforced by a political environment that rewards feeding the White House whatever it wants to hear. Why alter the status quo when it is so familiar, so well funded, and so rhetorically pleasing to politicians in both parties?

But if consigning Cuba to domestic politics has been the path of least resistance so far, it will begin to have real costs as the post-Fidel transition continues -- for Cuba and the United States alike. Fidel's death, especially if it comes in the run-up to a presidential election, could bring instability precisely because of the perception in the United States that Cuba will be vulnerable to meddling from abroad. Some exiles may try to draw the United States into direct conflict with Havana, whether by egging on potential Cuban refugees to take to the florida Straits or by appealing to Congress, the White House, and the Pentagon to attempt to strangle the post-Fidel government.

Washington must finally wake up to the reality of how and why the Castro regime has proved so durable -- and recognize that, as a result of its willful ignorance, it has few tools with which to effectively influence Cuba after Fidel is gone. With U.S. credibility in Latin America and the rest of the world at an all-time low, it is time to put to rest a policy that Fidel's handover of power has already so clearly exposed as a complete failure.

CHANGE IN THE WEATHER

On July 31, 2006, Fidel Castro's staff secretary made an announcement: Fidel, just days away from his 80th birthday, had undergone major surgery and turned over "provisional power" to his 75-year-old brother, Raúl, and six senior officials. The gravity of Fidel's illness (rumored to be either terminal intestinal cancer or severe diverticulitis with complications) was immediately clear, both from photographs of the clearly weakened figure and from Fidel's own dire-sounding statements beseeching Cubans to prepare for his demise. Across the island, an air of resignation and anticipation took hold.

The dead of August, with its intense heat and humidity, is a nerve-racking time in Cuba, but as rumors sped from home to home, there was a stunning display of orderliness and seriousness in the streets. Life continued: people went to work and took vacations, watched telenovelas and bootlegged dvds and programs from the Discovery and History channels, waited in lines for buses and weekly rations, made their daily black-market purchases -- repeating the rituals that have etched a deep mark in the Cuban psyche. Only in Miami were some Cubans partying, hoping that Fidel's illness would soon turn to death, not only of a man but also of a half century of divided families and mutual hatred.

Raúl quickly assumed Fidel's duties as first secretary of the Communist Party, head of the Politburo, and president of the Council of State (and retained control of the armed forces and intelligence services). The other deputies -- two of whom had worked closely with the Castro brothers since the revolution and four of whom had emerged as major players in the 1990s -- took over the other key departments. Ranging in age from their mid-40s through their 70s, they had been preparing for this transition to collective leadership for years. José Ramón Balaguer, a doctor who fought as a guerrilla in the Sierra Maestra during the revolution, assumed authority over public health. José Ramón Machado Ventura, another doctor who fought in the Sierra, and Esteban Lazo Hernández now share power over education. Carlos Lage Dávila -- a key architect of the economic reforms of the 1990s, including efforts to bring in foreign investment -- took charge of the energy sector. Francisco Soberón Valdés, president of the Central Bank of Cuba, and Felipe Pérez Roque, minister of foreign affairs, took over finances in those areas.

At first, U.S. officials simply admitted that they had almost no information about Fidel's illness or plans for succession. President George W. Bush said little beyond soberly (and surprisingly) pointing out that the next leader of Cuba would come from Cuba -- a much-needed warning to the small yet influential group of hard-line exiles (Republican florida Congressman Lincoln Diaz-Balart, a nephew of Fidel's, prominent among them) with aspirations to post-Fidel presidential politics.

A few weeks into the Fidel deathwatch, Raúl gave an interview clearly meant for U.S. consumption. Cuba, he said, "has always been ready to normalize relations on the basis of equality. But we will not accept the arrogant and interventionist policies of this administration," nor will the United States win concessions on Cuba's domestic political model. A few days later, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State for Western Hemisphere Affairs Thomas Shannon responded in kind. Washington, he said, would consider lifting its embargo -- but only if Cuba established a route to multiparty democracy, released all political prisoners, and allowed independent civil-society organizations. With or without Fidel, the two governments were stuck where they have been for years: Havana ready to talk about everything except the one condition on which Washington will not budge, Washington offering something Havana does not unconditionally want in exchange for something it is not willing to give.

From Washington's perspective, this paralysis may seem only temporary. Shannon compared post-Fidel Cuba to a helicopter with a broken rotor -- the implication being that a crash is imminent. But that view, pervasive among U.S. policymakers, ignores the uncomfortable truth about Cuba under the Castro regime. Despite Fidel's overwhelming personal authority and Raúl's critical institution-building abilities, the government rests on far more than just the charisma, authority, and legend of these two figures.

POLITICALLY INCORRECT

Cuba is far from a multiparty democracy, but it is a functioning country with highly opinionated citizens where locally elected officials (albeit all from one party) worry about issues such as garbage collection, public transportation, employment, education, health care, and safety. Although plagued by worsening corruption, Cuban institutions are staffed by an educated civil service, battle-tested military officers, a capable diplomatic corps, and a skilled work force. Cuban citizens are highly literate, cosmopolitan, endlessly entrepreneurial, and by global standards quite healthy.

Critics of the Castro regime cringe at such depictions and have worked hard to focus Washington and the world's attention on human rights abuses, political prisoners, and economic and political deprivations. Although those concerns are legitimate, they do not make up for an unwillingness to understand the sources of Fidel's legitimacy -- or the features of the status quo that will sustain Raúl and the collective leadership now in place. On a trip to Cuba in November, I spoke with a host of senior officials, foreign diplomats, intellectuals, and regime critics to get a sense of how those on the ground see the island's future. (I have traveled to Cuba nearly 30 times since 1984 and met with everyone from Fidel himself to human rights activists and political prisoners.) People at all levels of the Cuban government and the Communist Party were enormously confident of the regime's ability to survive Fidel's passing. In and out of government circles, critics and supporters alike -- including in the state-run press -- readily acknowledge major problems with productivity and the delivery of goods and services. But the regime's still-viable entitlement programs and a widespread sense that Raúl is the right man to confront corruption and bring accountable governance give the current leadership more legitimacy than it could possibly derive from repression alone (the usual explanation foreigners give for the regime's staying power).

The regime's continued defiance of the United States also helps. In Cuba's national narrative, outside powers -- whether Spain in the nineteenth century or the United States in the twentieth -- have preyed on Cuba's internal division to dominate Cuban politics. Revolutionary ideology emphasizes this history of thwarted independence and imperialist meddling, from the Spanish-American War to the Bay of Pigs, to sustain a national consensus. Unity at home, the message goes, is the best defense against the only external power Cuba still regards as a threat -- the United States.

To give Cubans a stake in this tradeoff between an open society and sovereign nationhood, the revolution built social, educational, and health programs that remain the envy of the developing world. Public education became accessible to the entire population, allowing older generations of illiterate peasants to watch their children and grandchildren become doctors and scientists; by 1979, Cuba's literacy rates had risen above 90 percent. Life expectancy went from under 60 years at the time of the revolution to almost 80 today (virtually identical to life expectancy in the United States). Although infectious disease levels have been historically lower in Cuba than in many parts of Latin America, the revolutionary government's public vaccination programs completely eliminated polio, diphtheria, tetanus, meningitis, and measles. In these ways, the Cuban state truly has served the poor underclass rather than catering to the domestic elite and its American allies.

Foreign policy, meanwhile, put the island on the map geopolitically. The Cubans used the Soviets (who regarded the brash young revolutionaries as reckless) for money, weapons, and insulation from their implacable enemy to the north. Although the government's repression of dissent and tight control over the economy drove many out of the country and turned many others against the Castro regime, most Cubans came to expect the state to guarantee their welfare, deliver the international standing they regard as their cultural and historical destiny, and keep the United States at a healthy distance.

The end of the Cold War seriously threatened this status quo. The Soviet Union withdrew its $4 billion annual subsidy, and the economy contracted by 35 percent overnight. Cuba's political elite recognized that without Soviet support, the survival of the revolutionary regime was in peril -- and, with Fidel's reluctant acquiescence, fashioned a pragmatic response to save it. Cuban officials traveling abroad started using once-anathema terms, such as "civil society." Proposals were circulated to include multiple candidates (although all from the Communist Party) in National Assembly elections and to permit small private businesses. The government legalized self-employment in some 200 service trades, converted state farms to collectively owned cooperatives, and allowed the opening of small farmers' markets. At Raúl's instigation, state enterprises adopted capitalist accounting and business practices; some managers were sent to European business schools. As the notion of a "socialist enterprise" became increasingly unsustainable, words like "market," "efficiency," "ownership," "property," and "competition" began to crop up with ever more frequency in the state-controlled press and in public-policy debates. Foreign investment from Europe, Latin America, Canada, China, and Israel gave a boost to agriculture and the tourism, mining, telecommunications, pharmaceutical, biotechnology, and oil industries.

These changes rendered Cuba almost unrecognizable compared with the Cuba of the Soviet era, but they also allowed Fidel's government to regain its footing. The economy began to recover, and health and educational programs started to deliver again. By the end of the 1990s, Cuba's infant mortality rate (approximately six deaths per 100,000 births) had dropped below that of the United States, and close to 100 percent of children were enrolled in school full time through ninth grade. Housing, although deteriorating and in desperate need of modernization, remained virtually free. And a cosmopolitan society -- albeit one controlled in many ways by the state -- grew increasingly connected to the world through cultural exchanges, sporting events, scientific cooperation, health programs, technology, trade, and diplomacy. Moreover, by 2002, total remittance inflows reached $1 billion, and nearly half of the Cuban population had access to dollars from family abroad.

In 2004, a process of "recentralization" began: the state replaced the dollar with a convertible currency, stepped up tax collection from the self-employed sector, and imposed stricter controls on revenue expenditures by state enterprises. But even with these controls over economic activity, the black market is everywhere. Official salaries are never enough to make ends meet, and the economy has become a hybrid of control, chaos, and free-for-all. The rules of the game are established and broken at every turn, and most Cubans have to violate some law to get by. The administrators of state enterprises steal and then sell the inputs they get from the government, forcing workers to purchase themselves the supplies they need to do their jobs -- rubber for the shoemaker, drinking glasses for the bartender, cooking oil for the chef -- in order to fill production quotas.

At the same time, the revolution's investment in human capital has made Cuba uniquely well positioned to take advantage of the global economy. In fact, the island faces an overcapacity of professional and scientific talent, since it lacks the industrial base and foreign investment necessary to create a large number of productive skilled jobs. With 10,000 students in its science and technology university and already successful joint pharmaceutical ventures with China and Malaysia, Cuba is poised to compete with the upper ranks of developing nations.

STRAITS JACKET

The last potential turning point in U.S.-Cuban relations came with the end of the Cold War. Cubans greeted the fall of the Berlin Wall with a collective sigh of relief; it was, they thought, an opportunity to explore the kind of society Cuba might become once it could no longer depend on the Soviet Union. But over the next decade and a half, U.S. policymakers -- hobbled by domestic politics and a fundamental misunderstanding of the reality on the island -- missed opportunity after opportunity to bring decades of enmity to a close.

Instead of allowing debates about reform to take their natural course in Cuba, Washington jumped on the chance to, as Bill Clinton put it in the 1992 presidential campaign, "bring the hammer down" on Fidel. Congress passed and Clinton signed the Cuban Democracy Act, which, among other things, barred foreign subsidiaries of U.S. companies from trading with Cuba and ships traveling from Cuban ports from docking in the United States. Havana reacted with predictable outrage, condemning U.S. imperial designs in dramatic public protests. More important, some reform proposals were put on hold -- lest the slightest crack in Cuba's armor open the way to U.S.-backed counterrevolution. National security trumped everything else.

The next decade saw a series of half steps forward followed by large steps back. Hoping to learn more about the island while driving a wedge between its people and its government, the Clinton administration began to allow licensed travel to Cuba for academic purposes and for the sake of lending "support to the Cuban people." It also embraced a policy of "calibrated response": as Cuba changed, U.S. policy would as well. Without ever relating them to U.S. gestures, Cuba did undertake some important (and largely unreciprocated) reforms, loosening restrictions on family and some professional travel, relaxing residency requirements for writers and artists, and continuing the economic openings. And when 40,000 rafters left for U.S. shores in 1994, after a summer of brutal heat and electricity and food shortages in Havana, U.S. and Cuban officials began secret negotiations in Canada. The result was unprecedented cooperation on migration issues -- Washington would provide 20,000 visas to Cubans a year, and the U.S. Coast Guard would send Cubans picked up at sea to the U.S. naval base at Guantánamo Bay -- and a degree of official and people-to-people contact unknown since a brief opening under Jimmy Carter.

But these tentative steps, bitterly resisted by exiles who feared a slippery slope toward full-blown U.S.-Cuban relations, were soon thwarted. In February 1996, the Cuban air force shot down two planes being flown in the area by an exile group called Brothers to the Rescue. Led by a Bay of Pigs veteran, the group would make surveillance flights over the florida Straits (to inform the U.S. Coast Guard of rafters) and occasionally drop anti-Castro pamphlets over Havana from Cessnas bought at Pentagon tag sales. Sometimes, U.S. officials would join the flights. Havana had repeatedly warned Washington that the flights would not be tolerated, but the shootdown nonetheless resulted in swift congressional retaliation -- in the form of the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidary Act, better known as Helms-Burton.

Helms-Burton took the U.S. embargo to new extremes. It attempted to halt all foreign investment in Cuba by allowing investors to be sued in U.S. courts. It mandated that future presidents could lift the embargo only if Cuba complied with a number of conditions, including holding multiparty elections, recognizing private property, and releasing all political prisoners. And it stipulated that any future change in U.S. policy would depend on Fidel and Raúl Castro -- along, implicitly, with other senior officials in the military and the Communist Party -- leaving politics altogether.

The Cuban regime responded with its own hard line. Raúl, although a leading advocate of economic reform domestically, was an absolutist when it came to confronting the United States. Even as some liberalization continued, and a new Cuban constitution opened the way for a religious revival by allowing Communist Party members to practice openly, there was a government-wide purge of academics and intellectuals -- many of them party loyalists -- thought to be associated with the United States or U.S.-backed reforms. The message was chillingly clear: given a choice between national security and a more open society, the revolution would pick security every time.

In the wake of Helms-Burton, the Clinton administration worked to revive a series of goodwill initiatives. When Pope John Paul II visited Havana's jam-packed Revolution Square in 1999, he asked "the world to open to Cuba and Cuba to open to the world." His entreaty gave both Washington and Havana political cover to revive some momentum on improving relations. The countries' coast guards worked together on antidrug operations, and retired U.S. military commanders met with Fidel and Raúl.

The Baltimore Orioles and the Cuban national baseball team played each other -- once in Baltimore, once in Havana -- and after the musicologist Ry Cooder released an album of traditional Cuban ballads, there was a "Buena Vista Social Club effect," with American artists, musicians, clergy, academics, students, businesspeople, and politicians flocking to Cuba in record numbers. Cuban Americans who had not returned to the island since leaving as small children visited for the first time, and then returned over and over, reconnecting with long-lost family members. A number of prominent Republicans, including former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and George Shultz, called for a bipartisan commission to undertake a full-scale review of U.S. policy toward Cuba.

But the day after Thanksgiving in 2000, progress was undermined once again -- this time by the arrival in southern florida of a six-year-old boy named Elián González. Elián had left Cuba with his mother, but she had died on the trip to the United States. At first, the Clinton administration was slow to take Elián from the custody of his relatives in florida and return him to his father in Cuba -- inflaming Cuban nationalism and inciting mass anti-U.S. protests in Havana. Then, when Attorney General Janet Reno ordered federal agents to seize Elián in a predawn raid and return him to his father, the exile community erupted. The incident not only ended the prospect of a further thawing in U.S.-Cuban relations; it also (at least absent a recount) helped tip the presidential election to George W. Bush, who defeated Al Gore in florida by a few hundred votes.

Like most aspiring presidents casting around for votes, candidate Bush had promised to end the Castro regime. But it was not until the September 11 attacks, and the administration's newfound attention to democracy promotion and rogue regimes, that U.S. Cuba policy took a decidedly more aggressive turn. Bush's first-term Latin America team (many of whose members had either helped write or lobbied for Helms-Burton) rejected any business or security cooperation with Havana and encouraged speculation that Cuba was developing bioweapons for export to rogue regimes or use against the United States. (Those allegations, not surprisingly, withered under closer scrutiny.) By the end of its first term, the Bush administration had upended virtually all initiatives, official and unofficial, for improving relations. It ended the bilateral talks on migration. It stopped approving most medical sales, made legal travel to Cuba difficult for all but faith-based groups and some academics, and cut off visas for Cuban academics and artists. And it almost entirely barred Cuban Americans, who lean strongly Republican, from visiting or sending money to Cuba. Only sales of U.S. agricultural products, because they were explicitly allowed by Congress, escaped the crackdown.

INFIDELITY

Although the George H. W. Bush administration ended covert efforts to topple Fidel, the United States today spends about $35 million a year on initiatives described by some as "democracy promotion" and by others as "destabilization." Radio Martí and tv Martí broadcast from florida to Cuba; other U.S. government programs are intended to support dissidents, the families of political prisoners, human rights activists, and independent journalists. Although some Cubans do listen to Radio Martí, the Cuban government blocks the tv Martí signal, and without open ties between the countries, only a fraction of the support actually reaches Cubans living on the island; the lion's share is distributed through no-bid contracts to the anti-Castro cottage industry that has sprung up in Miami, Madrid, and a few Latin American and eastern European capitals. The recipients of such federal largess -- along with the Cuban intelligence agents that routinely penetrate the groups they form -- have become the primary stakeholders in Washington's well-funded, if obviously ineffective, policy toward Cuba.

On the ground in Cuba, moreover, these efforts are generally counterproductive. U.S. economic sanctions have given Cuba's leaders justification for controlling the pace of the island's insertion into the world economy. The perception, pervasive in Cuba, that the United States and the Cuban diaspora are plotting regime change further strengthens domestic hard-liners who argue that only a closed political model with minimal market openings can insulate the island from domination by a foreign power allied with old-money elites. Dissidents who openly associate with U.S. policy and its advocates in Miami or the U.S. Congress mark themselves as stooges of the United States, even if they are not. Moreover, the Cuban government has successfully undermined both the domestic and the international legitimacy of dissidents by "outing" some as sources, assets, or agents of the United States (or of Cuba's own intelligence services). The 2003 arrest and incarceration of 75 dissidents was intended to demonstrate that Cuba could and would preempt outside efforts at regime change regardless of the consequent international outcry and U.S. congressional rebuke.

There are some genuine dissidents in Cuba untainted by either government and not weakened by infighting. One, Oswaldo Payá, is a devout Catholic who heads the Varela Project, which collected more than 11,000 signatures in 2002 for a petition calling on the Cuban government to hold a referendum on open elections, free speech, free enterprise, and the release of political prisoners. Yet it is only by resisting the embrace of the international community, and of the United States in particular, that Payá has maintained his credibility and autonomy. Meanwhile, below the radar screen (and throughout officially sanctioned Cuban institutions), there are scores of thoughtful nationalists, communists, socialists, social democrats, and progressives who may not yet have the political space to air their views publicly but who express dissent in terms that U.S. policymakers either do not recognize or do not support.

The upshot of a half century of hostility -- especially now with ties severed almost entirely -- is that Washington has virtually no leverage over events in Cuba. With no other way to make good on its campaign commitments to Cuban Americans short of a full-scale invasion, the Bush administration established the Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba in 2003 and appointed a "Cuba transition coordinator" in 2004. To date, the commission, the membership and deliberations of which have been kept secret, has issued two reports, totaling over 600 pages, on what kind of assistance the U.S. government could, "if requested," provide to a transitional government in Cuba.

The basic assumption behind the commission's planning is that with outside assistance, Cuba's transition will be a hybrid of those in eastern Europe, South Africa, and Chile. Those analogies and the policy prescriptions derived from them do not hold up. Unlike Eastern Europeans in the 1980s, Cubans, though enthusiasts of American culture and dynamism, regard Washington not as a beacon of freedom against tyranny but as an imperialist oppressor that has helped justify domestic repression. (Moreover, the United States had actively promoted travel, commerce, and cultural ties with the Soviet bloc before the transitions there began.) In the case of South Africa, the sanctions that helped topple the apartheid regime were successful because they were, in contrast to the unilateral U.S. embargo on Cuba, international in scope. And in Chile, the U.S. government was able to ease Augusto Pinochet out of power only because it had staunchly supported him for so long.

The second feature of Washington's vision for post-Fidel Cuba is more dangerous than a bad analogy. The Bush administration has made clear that its top priority is to interrupt the Castro regime's succession plans. The Commission for Assistance to a Free Cuba report released just before Fidel underwent intestinal surgery in July states, "The only acceptable result of Fidel Castro's incapacitation, death, or ouster is a genuine democratic transition. ... In order to undermine the regime's succession strategy, it is critical that the U.S. government maintain economic pressure on the regime."

Since the 2003 war in Iraq, Cubans have closely observed the effects of de-Baathification there. Like membership in Iraq's Baath Party under Saddam Hussein, membership in the Cuban Communist Party is a ticket to professional advancement for devout believers and agnostic opportunists alike. Party members include sophisticated intellectuals, reform-minded economists, clergy, brash up-and-coming youth leaders, scientists, professors, military officers, bureaucrats, police officers, and businesspeople in the "revenue-earning sectors" of the economy. In short, it is impossible to know who among the roughly million party members (and 500,000 members of the Union of Communist Youth) is a real fidelista or raulista. Purging party members would leave the country without the skilled individuals it will need after Fidel, whatever the pace of change. And should the United States, or a government that Washington deems adequately transitional, ever be in a position to orchestrate such a purge, it would then face an insurgency of highly trained militias galvanized by anti-American nationalism.

One encouraging development is that the Cuban American community is no longer of one mind with respect to Cuba's future and its role in it. For decades, a vocal minority of hard-line exiles -- some of whom have directly or indirectly advocated violence or terrorism to overthrow Fidel -- have had a lock on Washington's Cuba policy. But Cuban Americans who came to the United States as young children are less passionate and single-minded as voters than their parents and grandparents, and the almost 300,000 migrants who have arrived since 1994 are generally most concerned with paying bills and supporting their families on the island. Now, the majority of Cuban Americans, although still anti-Castro, recognize that the embargo has failed and want to sustain family and humanitarian ties without completely eliminating sanctions. Overall, many want reconciliation rather than revenge.

The State Department is starting to recognize these changes, and many members of Congress must now answer to constituents from other Latin American countries who resent the outsized influence of Cuban Americans. But the hard-liners and their allies in Washington will continue to fight any proposed policy overhaul. They worry that if Washington adopts a more realistic approach to the island, the policy train will bypass Miami and head straight for Havana -- and they will have lost their influence at the moment when it matters most.

WASHINGTON'S MOVE

Even with the economy growing and new public-sector investment in transportation, energy, education, health care, and housing, Cubans today are deeply frustrated by the rigors of just making ends meet. They are eager for more democratic participation and economic opportunity. But they also recognize that Cuba's social, economic, and political models will change only gradually, and that such reform will be orchestrated by those whom Fidel has long been grooming to replace him. Washington, too, must accept that there is no alternative to those already running post-Fidel Cuba.

From the perspective of Fidel's chosen successors, the transition comes in a particularly favorable international context. Despite Washington's assiduous efforts, Cuba is far from isolated: it has diplomatic relations with more than 160 countries, students from nearly 100 studying in its schools, and its doctors stationed in 69. The resurgence of Latin America's left, along with the recent rise in anti-American sentiment around the globe, makes Cuba's defiance of the United States even more compelling and less anomalous than it was just after the Cold War. The Cuban-Venezuelan relationship, based on a shared critique of U.S. power, imperialism, and "savage capitalism," has particular symbolic power. Although this alliance is hardly permanent, and American observers often make too much of Venezuela's influence as a power broker, it does deliver Cuba some $2 billion in subsidized oil a year and provide an export market for Cuba's surfeit of doctors and technical advisers. (By providing the backbone for Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's social programs and assistance in building functional organizations, Havana exercises more influence in Venezuela than Caracas does in Cuba.) Havana, without ceding any authority to Chávez, will optimize this relationship as long as it remains beneficial.

Nor is Venezuela the only country that will resist U.S. efforts to dominate post-Fidel Cuba and purge the country of Fidel's revolutionary legacy. Latin Americans, still deeply nationalistic, have long viewed Fidel as a force for social justice and a necessary check on U.S. influence. As attendance at his funeral will demonstrate, he remains an icon. Latin Americans of diverse ideological stripes, most of them deeply committed to democracy in their own countries, want to see a soft landing in Cuba -- not the violence and chaos that they believe U.S. policy will bring. Given their own failures in the 1990s to translate engagement with Cuba into democratization, and the United States' current credibility problems on this score, it is unlikely that U.S. allies in Latin America or Europe will help Washington use some sort of international initiative to advance its desires for radical change in Cuba.

When Fidel dies, various actors in the United States and the international community will rush to issue and, if they get their way, enforce a series of demands: hold a referendum and multiparty elections, immediately release all political prisoners, return nationalized property and compensate former owners, rewrite the constitution, allow a free press, privatize state companies -- in short, become a country Cuba has never been, even before the revolution. Many of those goals would be desirable if you were inventing a country from scratch. Few of them are now realistic.

After Fidel's funeral, a "transition" government of the sort Washington is hoping for will not occupy the presidential palace in Havana. This means that the White House cannot responsibly wait for the happy day when the outlines of its commission reports can be put to the test. Instead, the current administration should immediately start talking to the senior Cuban leadership. Recognizing that Cuba and the United States share an interest in stability on both sides of the florida Straits, the first priority is to coordinate efforts to prevent a refugee crisis or unforeseen provocations by U.S.-based exile groups eager to exploit a moment of change on the island. Beyond crisis management, Washington and Havana can cooperate on a host of other concerns in the Caribbean Basin, including drug trafficking, migration, customs and port security, terrorism, and the environmental consequences of offshore drilling in the Gulf of Mexico. The two countries have successfully worked on some of these issues in the past: each has bureaucracies staffed by professionals who know the issues, and even know one another. An end to Washington's travel ban, a move already backed by bipartisan majorities in the House of Representatives, would further open the way to a new dynamic between the United States and Cuba. Just as the first Bush White House formally ended covert operations on the island, this Bush administration or its successor should also affirmatively take regime change, long the centerpiece of Washington's policy toward Cuba, off the table.

By continuing the current course and making threats about what kind of change is and is not acceptable after Fidel, Washington will only slow the pace of liberalization and political reform in Cuba and guarantee many more years of hostility between the two countries. By proposing bilateral crisis management and confidence-building measures, ending economic sanctions, stepping out of the way of Cuban Americans and other Americans who wish to travel freely to Cuba, and giving Cuba the space to chart its own course after Fidel, Washington would help end the siege mentality that has long pervaded the Cuban body politic and, with the applause of U.S. allies, perhaps help accelerate reform. Cubans on and off the island have always battled over its fate -- and attempted to draw American might into their conflicts, directly or indirectly. Lest the next 50 years bring more of the same, the wisest course for Washington is to get out of the way, removing itself from Cuba's domestic politics altogether.

Fidel's successors are already at work. Behind Raúl are a number of other figures with the capacity and the authority to take the reins and continue the transition, even after Raúl is gone. Fortunately for them, Fidel has taught them well: they are working to consolidate the new government, deliver on bread-and-butter issues, devise a model of reform with Cuban characteristics, sustain Cuba's position in Latin America and internationally, and manage the predictable policies of the United States. That these achievements will endure past Fidel's death is one final victory for the ultimate Latin American survivor.

Gen. Pinochet Suffers Heart Attack (AP)

By Eduardo Gallardo, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 3, 2006

Former dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet was hospitalized early Sunday after suffering a heart attack and is in serious but stable condition, the Santiago Military Hospital said.

The 91-year-old retired general, who has been under house arrest, was rushed to the hospital after suffering "an acute" heart attack, the hospital said in a statement. "His condition is serious but stable."

The brief statement said Pinochet was at the hospital's emergency room undergoing treatment.

Pinochet, who ruled from 1973 until 1990, was taken to the hospital from his suburban Santiago residence.

Pinochet's spokesman, retired Gen. Guilleremo Garin, said the former strongman was undergoing "thorough medical tests. It's a heart condition. That's all we know now."

Pinochet's health has deteriorated gradually in recent years. He has used a pacemaker for several years and was diagnosed with mild dementia caused by several strokes. He also suffers from diabetes and arthritis.

The former dictator's failing health has helped him escape punishment for human rights abuses committed during his regime, with courts ruling his condition prevented from standing trail in at least two cases in recent years.

But last week, Pinochet was indicted and ordered to remain under house arrest for the execution of two bodyguards of Salvador Allende, the freely elected Marxist president who was toppled in the 1973 coup.

The indictment came after Pinochet's 91st birthday on Nov. 25, which he marked by issuing a statement for the first time taking full political — though not explicitly legal — responsibility for abuses committed by his regime.

"Today, near the end of my days, I want to say that I harbor no rancor against anybody, that I love my fatherland above all and that I take political responsibility for everything that was done which had no other goal than making Chile greater and avoiding its disintegration," he said at the time.

The recent house arrest is the fifth such action taken against Pinochet on charges stemming from human rights violations during his dictatorship.

The indictment alleges kidnapping and homicide in connection with the deaths of two Allende bodyguards who were arrested the day of the coup, Sept. 11, 1973. Both were executed by firing squad four weeks later, the military regime announced at the time.

Pinochet faces two other indictments — another in connection to human rights abuses and one on tax charges.

According to an official report prepared by an independent commission appointed by the first civilian government after Pinochet's rule, 3,197 people were killed for political reasons during his regime and more than 1,000 of them were "disappeared."

Venezuela's Economic Boom Buoys Chávez's Campaign (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Dec. 2 — To understand why Hugo Chávez seems set for victory in Sunday's presidential election and a strengthened mandate for what he calls a socialist revolution, consider the vigor here of that most capitalist of institutions: the stock exchange.

Housed in El Rosal, an upscale district with new skyscrapers and hotels, the 59-year-old Caracas stock exchange was the site of frenzied trading this week. Its main index climbed to a record high of 46,741, topping off a 129.2 percent rise this year that has made it one of the best performing markets in the world. On Friday, the index climbed 8 percent for its biggest daily gain in four years.

"For all of Chávez's faults, his government has been extremely pragmatic in economic terms," said José Guerra, a former chief of economic research at Venezuela's central bank. "State-supported capitalism isn't just surviving under Chávez," he said. "It is thriving."

Often lost in the campaigning between Mr. Chávez and his electoral challenger, Manuel Rosales, is that Venezuela, with the largest conventional petroleum reserves outside the Middle East, is having one of the most significant oil booms in its history. Economic growth this year is set to pass 10 percent, making Venezuela the fastest-growing economy in the Americas.

The Chávez government, while wrapping itself in socialist imagery — like red clothing — and deepening its alliance with Fidel Castro's Cuba, has made this expansion possible by quietly working with Venezuela's banking system. The rush of petrodollars into the economy has led bank deposits to climb 84 percent in the past 12 months, according to Softline Consultores, a financial consulting business here.

The boom is evident in an economy that has put financial speculation and conspicuous consumption ahead of domestic manufacturing. For instance, foreign automobile companies Ford and General Motors will sell 300,000 cars in the country this year. Economists describe Venezuela as a "harbor economy" because of its lust for imported goods.

"Many people say we're in a profound political and social crisis," said Michael Penfold-Becerra, an economist at the Institute of Higher Administrative Studies, a Caracas business school. "On the contrary, we've returned to a temporary period of harmony. Oil is buying us a certain social peace and stability."

Neither candidate in Sunday's election seems to acknowledge the growing consumerism in rich and poor households as one of the main reasons Mr. Chávez has resilient popularity ratings after eight years as president. Most opinion polls give him a double-digit lead over Mr. Rosales, governor of the oil-producing Zulia State in the west.

Mr. Chávez makes frequent exhortations in favor of socialism, sometimes describing Jesus Christ as the first socialist and Judas as the first capitalist. Mr. Rosales said in an interview that Mr. Chávez, who has deepened ties with Cuba by bringing thousands of Cuban doctors to Venezuela in exchange for subsidized oil, was "implementing a Castro-style system of autocratic rule in Venezuela."

While Mr. Chávez promises socialism, historians say that in effect he is delivering old-fashioned populism. He is often compared to Carlos Andrés Pérez, the populist president who oversaw economic expansion in the 1970s when Venezuela also benefited from higher oil prices.

"Chávez has a problem in that what he calls his socialist revolution never involved the overthrow of a dictator like Batista or Somoza," said Alberto Barrera Tyszka, who co-wrote an acclaimed biography of Mr. Chávez. "He's redefining socialism as a concept that could exist only in Venezuela, where it is characterized by hatred of George Bush and an excess of BMWs and Audis."

Some Chávez economic policies draw inspiration from formulas used with mixed results by countries in the developing and industrialized worlds the 1960s and 1970s. These include price controls for food and gasoline, strict limits on buying and selling foreign currency and caps on everything from lending rates at banks to hourly fees at parking lots.

At the same time, the government has channeled billions of dollars in oil revenues into social welfare programs and small cooperatives intended to produce goods to replace imports on the domestic market. The government says these efforts are moving Venezuela toward a vaguely defined "21st-century socialism."

Oil is at the heart of this development model. Venezuela, in contrast to oil-exporting countries like Mexico or Saudi Arabia that tightly circumscribe the operations of foreign oil companies, still produces oil in ventures with some of the largest private energy companies, including Chevron and Royal Dutch Shell. And the government works closely with Venezuelan and foreign banks to maintain economic stability.

Unlike Rafael Correa, the newly elected president of Ecuador, who plans to renegotiate the foreign debt, Mr. Chávez has made every effort to meet Venezuela's obligations with foreign lenders. As a result, markets still consider Venezuelan bonds about as safe an investment as bonds issued by Brazil, a neighboring industrial powerhouse.

The Finance Ministry, meanwhile, has tolerated loopholes for the moneyed classes to circumvent foreign exchange controls by allowing them to buy stocks and bonds that can be exchanged for securities denominated in dollars. Critics of this system say it has allowed a new elite to emerge through opaque dealings with the government.

Fernando Coronil, a Venezuelan historian at the University of Michigan, said Mr. Chávez's policies were reminiscent of the heady years after World War II when Democratic Action, a social democratic party, swept into power on a platform that emphasized distributing oil wealth to the poor. Leaders even called their movement the October Revolution, though populist rule in Venezuela eventually became characterized by a lack of transparency in the distribution of favors through the state.

While earlier booms revolved around huge investments in industrial projects like aluminum smelters, analysts say the latest expansion is especially risky because it focuses mainly on consumption.

Despite boasting of some of South America's most fertile land in an area the size of Texas and Oklahoma combined, Venezuela still imports more than half its food, largely from the United States and Colombia. An overvalued currency, meanwhile, has been disastrous for Venezuelan industry with the number of manufacturing companies falling to about 8,000 today from 17,000 in 1998, according to Mr. Guerra, the former economist at the central bank.

With Chavez, Some Venezuelan Entrepreneurs See Opportunity (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Dec. 2 -- Venezuela's business establishment often warns that if President Hugo Chavez wins reelection Sunday, it won't take long before the populist firebrand transforms Venezuela into a communist state, dooming its oil-rich economy. Alejandro Uscategui, an industrialist here, couldn't disagree more.

Overseeing a variety of companies, Uscategui is among a growing number of business leaders who reject the doom-and-gloom scenario and see something else entirely in Venezuela's free-spending government: opportunity.

"We think President Hugo Chavez has done a very good job," said Uscategui, president of an association, Entrepreneurs for Venezuela, that is closely allied with the government. "Here there has been incredible growth in companies. There are businesses that close, sure, but they don't close because of Ch?vez."

Eight years into what Chavez calls "21st century socialism," Venezuela's economy has evolved into one marked by contradictions: the highest growth rate in the Americas and grinding underemployment, out-of-control consumerism and a lack of investment, troubling uncertainty and golden prospects.

The economy is expected to expand by more than 8 percent this year, the highest rate in South America. Gross domestic product has shot up from about $92 billion in 2002 to a projected $170 billion this year. The torrent of oil revenue filters down to companies and consumers, who are on a buying binge for luxury cars, penthouse apartments and 48-inch plasma television sets.

It is also a country where foreign investment has collapsed, falling from $5.6 billion in 1997 to a projected negative outflow of $2.7 billion this year, according to calculations by Tamara Herrera, an economist with LatinSource, a New York-based group of Latin American economists. The economy is unable to create enough jobs for those entering the workforce, and inflation, at 15 percent, is among the highest in Latin America.

In a foreshadowing of possible trouble, the price of oil has experienced a four-month slide that recently dropped the Venezuelan barrel below $50, about as low as the government wants to go.

"The data continues to shine, but behind it in our opinion are serious problems of sustainability, and of the possibility of stagnation," said Herrera, also chief economist of Sintesis Financiera, a consulting firm in Caracas. "Behind these numbers are a huge dependence on oil, more than we've ever seen."

The question now is where Chavez will take this country of 26 million should he win another six-year term, as the majority of public opinion polls predict. His promise to further consolidate his revolution would surely mean more state control over the private sector, the creation of hundreds, if not thousands, of state cooperatives and the founding of more state-owned companies. If the price of oil holds, billions more would be funneled into social programs.

"Socialism is the only path that will permit us to save the human being, the human species," Chavez said in a recent speech. "Capitalism is the path to the destruction of the world, the destruction of the human being. Capitalism is the path to the destruction of life."

Capitalism, though, along with Venezuela's state spending, seems to have been very good to a new class of entrepreneurs in Venezuela who have either allied themselves with the government or found a way to have a cordial relationship. Many of them have secured lucrative government contracts, and the opposition has dubbed them the Boliburguesia, short for the Bolivarian bourgeoisie.

"Ninety percent of those businessmen are there because they give them the money to be businessmen," said Flavio Fridegotto, owner of a national chain of hardware stores and a leader in Fedecamaras, the nation's largest business association. "They are there because they are opportunists."

Fridegotto is referring to such people as Majed Khalil, a son of Lebanese immigrants who runs a variety of companies. Eveba cans tuna. Hardwell sells and services computers and software and has a contract to provide schools with technology. His companies provide equipment such as taxiway lights to airports, and he now has a contract to work on the construction of an electrical plant.

"With the government opening up, you see offers and opportunities where you can do business," Khalil said in an interview in his office. "Past governments have never invested like this government."

Uscategui, the head of Entrepreneurs for Venezuela, or Empreven, said he and other business leaders close to the government want to replace Fedecamaras as the main business chamber. Those allied with Chavez will never forget that it was the president of Fedecamaras, Pedro Carmona, who in 2002 became interim president in what turned out to be an ill-fated effort to oust Ch?vez.

Sitting in his office, next to a table of pharmaceutical products he hopes to sell to government clinics, Uscategui talks of being committed to the "idea of social capitalism" and warns of business people who "want to exploit Venezuela's riches and go live elsewhere."

"We defend the private property, we defend businessmen, we defend credits," Uscategui said. "Our difference is we don't aspire to political power, we don't question Ch?vez."

Uscategui says altruism motivates him, but he exudes astute self-interest, crucial to survive in Venezuela's topsy-turvy economy. Unlike those who supported the failed coup, and a disastrous national oil strike that lasted two months, Uscategui stuck with the government.

He soon found himself invited to business gatherings, where he would be seated next to Ch?vez. "The business sector has advanced," he said with assurance. "It has not gone to elites."

Alberto Vollmer, 38, who runs Santa Teresa Rum, a distiller that is one of Venezuela's most storied companies, is among those who is admittedly from the traditional upper class. He lost a third of the 7,400 acres that made up his farm to land invaders, but he did not lash back.

DOJ_NMG_0101249

He instead started working closely with the government to implement social programs in the poor barrios nearby. "There are mistakes this government has made and is making, but if you don't have a constructive attitude, you won't get anything done," he said. Vollmer has, to be sure, drawn the ire of some entrepreneurs for working with the government.

"For some of my friends, it's very hard to understand that I get along with Ch?vez," he said. "It doesn't mean I agree with 100 percent of their ideas."

Vollmer is far from being a confidant of the president. He rattles off deep concerns, such as that Venezuela is repeating a disastrous error from the 1970s -- spending oil revenue wildly without creating a climate for solid non-oil investment.

Many economists agree. Domingo Maza Zavala, a director of the Venezuelan Central Bank, said the economy needs to create 1.5 million jobs but cannot do so without huge private investments. "Private investment needs a stable climate, a climate of tranquility, a climate of institutional security," he said.

The government, though, appears intent on spending -- and confident that the price of oil will remain high.

The government's 2007 budget will be 32 percent higher than this year's, according to the National Assembly, which used a cautious projected average oil price of $29 a barrel. "Rather than cut spending, we're encouraged that capital investment is increasing, and that will boost the country's production," the planning minister, Jorge Giordani, said this week.

Alberto Cudemus, 62, who owns a hog butchering and packing company, said he agrees with much of what the government is doing.

On the surface, he is like many of his colleagues at Fedecamaras, where he heads a chamber representing pork producers. He wears a suit, is trim from daily exercise and speaks English and Dutch fluently.

But though he has some misgivings, he said government policies, such as making loans cheap and accessible, have helped reawaken the private sector.

"There are many positive things happening," he said. "I don't think everything is positive. But enough positive things are happening to give me confidence."

Adios Is Not In Chavez's Plans (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

CARACAS, VENEZUELA — The United States had better get used to its Latin American nemesis, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. If, as expected, he wins reelection to a new six-year term today, he says he will seek a change in the constitution that would enable him to serve indefinitely.

As many as 14 million Venezuelans will go to the polls to choose between Chavez and Manuel Rosales, the scrappy governor of Zulia state. Rosales started his campaign late, but has fared better than many expected in re-energizing a badly fragmented, dispirited opposition. Still, surveys show Chavez ahead by margins ranging from 4 to 22 percentage points.

Rosales' only hope of victory lies in capturing large numbers of undecided voters.

Many U.S. citizens know Chavez for his diatribes against President Bush. But the key to his support lies in the redistribution of Venezuela's immense oil windfall. He now is spending a third of Venezuela's annual $130 billion in economic output on social outreach, public works and food and housing subsidies, and he is expected to reap the electoral dividends.

Chavez says he has added 4 million people to the payrolls since he took office, the vast majority through social outreach programs called "missions," worker-owned cooperatives and public works programs.

Those government-supported jobs could vanish with a decline in the price of oil, critics say, adding that private investment, industrial output and the creation of skilled jobs all have declined under Chavez's socialist policies.

"What we are seeing is state-led growth, very vulnerable in the medium and long term to a downturn in oil prices," said Michael Penfold, a political scientist at a graduate studies college here known by its Spanish initials IESA. "We are far more dependent on oil than 12 to 15 years ago, and that's what worries me."

But for now, the good times are rolling.

Whiskey and new car sales are at record highs, and polls show most Venezuelans generally feeling optimistic and happy with Chavez's stewardship, according to Datanalysis, a polling firm in Caracas, the capital. Fueled by public spending, the

Venezuelan economy has grown at an annual rate of 10% for the last three years, said economist Francisco Vivancos of the University of Central Venezuela.

The country has emerged from an economic crisis after a strike by oil workers starting in late 2002 nearly brought crude exports to a halt. The strike followed the unsuccessful effort to oust Chavez in April 2002.

Despite the political problems between the two countries, Venezuela is the fourth-largest exporter of oil to the U.S.

If Chavez has a weakness among his supporters, it's widespread dissatisfaction with his foreign policy, which has included giveaways of oil to Cuba and other Caribbean nations; discounted heating oil to poor people in the United States; medical subsidies in Mexico and Central America; bond purchases in Argentina; and foreign aid to Bolivia.

Rosales, 53, has argued in his campaign that charity should begin and end at home.

A career politician, Rosales has said he would give poor Venezuelans a cash withdrawal card to directly access the nation's oil wealth. He would also expand the "missions," making them available to everyone.

Chavez's anti-U.S. rhetoric also rubs some of his supporters the wrong way, given familial and cultural ties to the United States.

At a Thursday news conference, Chavez unapologetically repeated his description of Bush made before the U.N. General Assembly in September. "Someone has to call the devil the devil," Chavez said with a shrug.

He said Thursday that if he wins today, he will call an assembly to make revisions to the constitution that would allow him to serve an unlimited number of terms. Without that change, Chavez would have to leave office at the end of a new term.

Although more than four-fifths of Venezuelans polled by Datanalysis last month said they were better off under Chavez's leadership, almost as many said the president should do more to fight crime, now among the worst in the hemisphere.

Retired policeman Hector Ortega of Caracas' poor Vargas section is among those who seem ready to look past any misgivings about Chavez because of his commitment to alleviating Venezuela's inequalities. "He speaks our language," Ortega said.

Chavez came to power with high expectations as a reformer in 1999, preceded by a two-decade period in which Venezuela's economy was second-to-last in Latin America, said Francisco Monaldi, also an IESA professor.

The president's popularity started to increase after the missions were launched in 2003 with the Mission Barrio Adentro, which offers free medical help in poor neighborhoods.

Critics accuse Chavez of packing the Supreme Court and the National Electoral Commission with supporters. But the opposition has sometimes made it easy. Opposition candidates boycotted congressional elections last year in a dispute over the vote-counting machines.

Chavez is getting credit for making today's election more transparent than those in the past, agreeing to the auditing of half the ballot boxes and allowing more than 1,000 foreign and national electoral observers.

The biggest fear, expressed by both Chavez and opposition leaders, is that the vote will be so close that neither side will accept defeat, which could lead to turmoil similar to what occurred in Mexico after this summer's disputed election.

Red Cross: Asia Storm Toll May Hit 700 (AP)

AP, December 2, 2006

PADANG, Philippines (AP) — Hopes virtually vanished Sunday for finding survivors of typhoon-triggered mudslides that engulfed entire villages in the eastern Philippines, with the Red Cross fearing the death toll could reach 700.

The government's National Disaster Coordinating Center reported 309 bodies have been retrieved and 298 people remained missing three days after Typhoon Durian struck, triggering mudslides in worst-hit Albay province.

Sen. Richard Gordon, who heads the local Red Cross, said the death toll could easily reach 700 "on the low side," based on official casualty figures and reports his group obtained from mayors of devastated villages.

"There are many unidentified bodies, there could be a lot more hidden below. Whole families may have been wiped out," Gordon told The Associated Press by phone.

No survivors are known to have been pulled from the swampy land since the first hours after Durian blasted ashore Thursday with winds gusting up to 165 mph.

DOJ_NMG_0101251

The storm affected 800,000 people, officials said.

The first funerals took place Saturday evening as bodies rapidly decomposed in the tropical heat.

All but two dozen of the deaths occurred in worst-hit Albay province, including 165 in the town of Guinobatan, swamped by floodwaters in the Mayon volcano's foothills, southeast of the capital Manila. Four other provinces reported fatalities, but accurate casualty figures were hard to come by, with the disaster's devastation so widespread and power and phone lines down.

In some places, rescue workers found only body parts.

"We need food, tents, water, body bags," Philippine National Red Cross official Andrew Nocon told DZMM radio Saturday. "We sent initially 300 bags, but we need more."

Houses along the Yawa River in Padang, about 7 miles from Legazpi, the capital of Albay province, were buried under 5 feet of mud, with only roofs protruding.

In Padang village, 28 bodies were recovered, said Luis Bello, the mayor's aide. Some of the bodies had been washed out to sea, then swept by currents to the shores of an adjacent town.

For nearly three hours late Thursday afternoon, mudslides ripped through Mayon's gullies, uprooting trees, flattening houses and swallowing people.

"Every corner of this province has been hit. It is a total devastation," Albay Gov. Fernando Gonzalez said. "Never before in the history have we seen water like this. Almost every residential area was flooded."

Australia conveyed its condolences through Ambassador Tony Hely to President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo and made an initial pledge of $780,000 in immediate humanitarian relief. Canada earlier donated $876,000, while Japan said it would send $173,000.

From Competitors To Trading Partners (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

KANO, Nigeria -- The pasta factory that Umar Sani Marshall's family owns on the outskirts of this ancient city had not churned out so much as a single piece of macaroni in more than a year. The other former titans among Kano's once-mighty manufacturers were doing no better, producing mostly cobwebs as the city's markets overflowed with cheap imports from China.

So last month Marshall, 30, tall and wiry with rectangular, silver-framed glasses and a goatee, decided to forsake his legacy as scion of one of Nigeria's leading industrial families. He strapped $5,000 to his waist and flew off to Asia in search of a new kind of fortune, built not on making goods but trading them.

By the time he returned 12 days later, Marshall had started a new business dealing cars and auto parts, as a middleman between Chinese suppliers and Nigerian consumers. Along the way, he said, he found the kinds of profits that long have eluded Kano's manufacturers, and he learned a few lessons about how to work with Chinese businesses instead of competing against them.

"When you go there with the intention of buying socks, you will come back with a jacket and hat" as well, Marshall said, smiling as he pretended to place a top hat on his head.

His shift, from manufacturing to trading, mirrors a broader one across Nigeria and much of Africa. A 30-year experiment in building local factory capacity has faltered with declining trade barriers and rising global competition, most powerfully from China. African business leaders increasingly are staking their fortunes on old-fashioned extractive industries, such as oil production needed to fuel Asian industry, while also attempting to profit from the flood of finished goods coming in return.

Although the model stirs memories of the kind of economic relationships once common between European powers and their vassal states here, Africans say the Chinese at least treat them as equals and invest in infrastructure projects key to the continent's future.

At a recent trade summit in Beijing, officials from 48 African nations met with Chinese leaders, who promised to double aid to Africa while offering $5 billion in new loans. Already Chinese firms have built dams, roads, railways, port upgrades, mining facilities and telecommunication systems in Africa.

A Chinese company at the summit announced an $8.3 billion project to build a railway connecting Kano to the port city of Lagos. It will be paid for out of Nigeria's oil revenue, which is burgeoning in part because of rising Chinese demand. Overall, Africa's trade with China rose from $10.6 billon in 2000 to almost $40 billion last year. Projections are that it could reach $100 billion by 2010.

Signs of China's growing prominence on the continent are easy to spot in Kano, a bustling, thousand-year-old city of 3.5 million people that long was a regular stopover for trade flowing through the Sahara, whose sandy southern edge is nearby. Now the city's gaze has shifted to the Far East, with Chinese restaurants spreading across the city, Chinese goods filling shops and a Chinese-owned shoe factory employing more than 2,000 workers, more than any other private employer in northern Nigeria.

A decade ago, the Marshall family's shortcake factory had a similar number of workers and a powerful market position throughout northern Nigeria and into neighboring Cameroon, Niger and beyond. It is now closed, along with the family's pasta factory, victims not so much of competition as of government policies that made it difficult to import durum semolina, a key ingredient, Marshall said.

Business leaders here say the decline of Kano's manufacturers resulted from an influx of Chinese products as trade restrictions fell. Chinese companies had more modern machinery, more reliable sources of electricity and easier access to capital, said Saidu Dattijo Adhama, owner of a textile factory whose payroll has dropped from 335 workers to 24. The raw cotton produced by Chinese farmers, meanwhile, was stronger and yielded more fabric per pound.

"Without a little protection, if the Chinese bring their finished cotton to Nigeria, you cannot compete with them," Adhama said. "The gap is so wide that if you just allow them to come in, you are killing Nigerian companies."

Fifteen years ago, 500 factories hummed with work in Kano, but fewer than 100 remain operational today, most at far less than full capacity, according to the city's Chamber of Commerce. Tens of thousands of jobs have been lost. Meanwhile, Kano's Kwari textile market, the biggest in West Africa, has swelled with stall after stall of Chinese fabrics and clothing.

Liti Kulkul, former chairman of the textile traders association here, estimated that a decade ago, 80 percent of the fabric sold at Kwari was made in Nigeria, compared with 5 percent now. Asian products, mostly from China, make up the rest.

"We have taken this path of neocolonialism," Kulkul said. "They have virtually crippled all aspects of our economy."

Yet others see China not as the ruin of Kano business but as a transformative force pushing the city back to its roots in trading. Beyond Kulkul's stall, which specialized in the colorful Nigerian prints long produced by local textile mills, the market buzzed with dealmaking.

Rows of shops overflowed with Asian-made air conditioners, televisions and DVD players. Beyond them, Kano's noisy, smoggy streets were jammed from curb to curb with Chinese-made motorcycle taxis that largely have replaced the aging stock of Italian-made Vespas, which cost three times more.

Chinese business "revived the economy," said Ahmed Rabiu, deputy president of the Chamber of Commerce. "Trading improved. Manufacturing went down. That's it."

Not everyone in Kano applauds the change. The motorcycle taxi drivers earn less than factory workers once did. And the growth in trade has not absorbed most of the workers laid off in the past decade. There are more beggars and other visible signs of poverty than ever before, residents say.

"We are very bitter that the factory closed down," said Ibrahim Garba, 50, who worked for the Marshall family's pasta factory for 25 years, earning enough to support his two wives, six children and six grandchildren.

Now, instead of going to the factory, where he operated a generator, he farms five dusty acres of corn, beans and millet, most of which he uses to feed his family, not to earn money. His income has plunged from about $50 to about $15 a month, Garba said.

But Marshall, with the education, capital and savvy to adjust to Kano's shifting business climate, is not complaining.

He met with Chinese businessmen in Singapore and quickly spent the $5,000 he brought and $15,000 more he had kept in reserve in Nigeria. In return, he got four used Honda cars and 1 1/2 shipping containers full of car parts. Used automotive products here are known as "Belgium" for the traditional source of many of them, but now most Belgium comes from Asia.

Marshall calculates that he can sell the cars and auto parts for $34,000, a profit of 70 percent on his investment.

DOJ_NMG_0101253

"I'm going back next month, inshallah!" Marshall said, using a common phrase in the Muslim world that means "God willing." "More opportunity is coming."

A Blame Game China Needs To Stop (WP)

Last month the International Energy Agency announced that China would probably surpass the United States as the world's largest contributor of the greenhouse gas carbon dioxide by 2009, more than a full decade earlier than anticipated. This forecast could spur China to adopt tough new energy and environmental standards, but it probably won't. China has already embarked on a very different strategy to manage its environmental reputation: launching a political campaign that lays much of the blame for the country's mounting environmental problems squarely on the shoulders of foreigners and, in particular, multinational companies.

While still in its initial stages, the campaign has gained steam over the past month. Senior Chinese officials, the media and even some environmental activists have charged multinational firms and other countries with exporting pollution, lowering their environmental manufacturing standards and willfully ignoring China's environmental regulations. Faced with growing international and popular discontent over the country's environmental crisis, China's leaders are tapping into anti-foreign and nationalist sentiments to deflect attention from their own failures.

In late October a top environmental official, Pan Yue, accused the developed countries of "environmental colonialism": of transferring resource-intensive, polluting industries to China and bearing as little environmental responsibility as possible. At the same time, a leading member of China's National People's Congress claimed that foreign companies were not only exporting their waste but also underpaying Chinese workers. When a Chinese nongovernmental organization released a list of 2,700 companies cited for violations of China's water regulations in late October, the ensuing media frenzy focused exclusively on the 33 multinationals, including 3M, Panasonic, PepsiCo and DuPont, and ignored the more than 2,600 Chinese companies similarly cited. Not surprisingly, Chinese bloggers have taken up the call, discussing the "eco-colonialist" policies of multinationals and calling for "eco-compensation." Even environmental activists who have worked closely with multinationals have accused these corporations of not practicing what they preach.

The logic behind the campaign is simple, if misguided. The rapidly approaching Olympic Games have brought an unwelcome spotlight on China's environmental situation. Beijing won its Olympics bid with the promise of the world's first "green" games. Five years later, there is no talk of a green Olympics, only of how extensive a shutdown of industry and transportation will be needed in Beijing and surrounding provinces just to ensure that the athletes can breathe. Moreover, the climate issue has focused the world's attention not only on China's contribution to global warming but also on its role as the largest contributor to a range of other global environmental problems such as ozone depletion, the illegal timber trade and marine pollution.

Perhaps nothing is more troubling to China's leaders, however, than the environment's contribution to domestic social unrest. In May, China Daily reported that there were 50,000 environmental protests in China in 2005. Some of these demonstrations engaged upward of 30,000 people and resulted in serious injuries and even deaths. In such a climate, scapegoating foreigners can be an attractive policy option.

Certainly, as with most Chinese political campaigns, there is a kernel of truth in some of the accusations. The multinational companies listed should take greater care to ensure that their own factories and those of their suppliers operate under only the highest standards.

Yet, overwhelmingly, China's environmental crisis and its contribution to global pollution are of its own making. Most Chinese businesses are clearly unprepared to be environmental leaders. China's coal-based and largely state-owned power sector, for example, is the No. 1 source of China's air pollution. In a recent poll, only 18 percent of Chinese companies supported the idea that they could both thrive economically and do the right thing environmentally.

China's leaders need to educate and reform Chinese industry, but beyond this they must establish an incentive structure to make it easy for local officials and business leaders to do the right thing. They need to open the door to greater transparency, official accountability and the rule of law to ensure effective environmental governance -- a step they have avoided taking for fear of diminishing their political power.

The environment has been one of the most fruitful areas of cooperation between China and the rest of the world for almost two decades. Billions of dollars in environmental assistance have flowed to China from foreign governments and international organizations. In most cases, multinational firms have been at the forefront of raising China's environmental standards, transferring best practices and cutting-edge technologies, and supporting a range of broader environmental initiatives. China should not risk all this -- and its own environmental future -- for the short-term and largely illusory benefits of playing an environmental blame game.

Canada Liberals Pick New Leader In Upset (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

MONTREAL, Dec. 2 _ In a surprising outcome, Stéphane Dion, a former professor at the University of Montreal, edged out Michael Ignatieff, a former official at Harvard, for the leadership of Canada's Liberal Party on Saturday.

Mr. Ignatieff, who is also a well-known author and broadcaster, returned to Canada just last year after spending three decades in Britain and the United States. His lack of connections both within the Liberal Party and Canada in general seemed to play a role in his defeat. He led for the first two of the four convention ballots. But unlike Mr. Dion, he was unable to attract endorsements from other significant candidates as they dropped from the race.

On the final ballot, Mr. Dion gathered 54.7 percent of the 4,605 delegates' votes compared with 45.3 percent for Mr. Ignatieff.

As Mr. Dion noted at the start of his victory speech, he will move back into campaign mode almost immediately and try to lead the party back to power through a general election that may come as early as spring. Success in that would make Mr. Dion prime minister.

The Liberals controlled the federal government for most of the last century, leading both supporters and critics to call it Canada's natural governing party. Although Canadians elected a minority Conservative government in January, partly because of a Liberal financing scandal in Quebec, and the Conservatives' hold on power is tenuous.

Canada's Liberal Leader A Surprise Pick (AP)

By Beth Duff-Brown, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 3, 2006

A former environment minister who criticized the conservative prime minister for modeling himself after President Bush won leadership of Canada's Liberal Party on Saturday.

Stephane Dion pledged to unseat Prime Minister Stephen Harper after he scored a surprise defeat of the party front-runner, Michael Ignatieff.

"I am convinced that to beat Harper in the next election, it will not be enough to capitalize on his mistakes," Dion, 51, told the party convention after winning more than half the votes of the 5,000 delegates.

"It will not be enough to be a government-in-waiting. To win, we must offer our own project to Canadians, a generous and ambitious vision that is in stark contrast to Mr. Harper's selfish and narrow idea of Canada."

Dion was part of the team of Liberals under former Prime Minister Jean Chretien who opposed the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003 and turned down Washington's request to join.

He also has attacked Harper for "blindly" committing Canadian Forces to Afghanistan until 2009. Some 2,300 Canadian troops are helping other NATO forces fight the Taliban in the south.

"Canada has a prime minister who thinks that the United States is not only our ally, but also our model," Dion said in his speech Friday night ahead of the party vote.

Opponents of Ignatieff, a scholar and human rights expert, had cited his early support the Iraq invasion, a highly unpopular war among Canadians. He initially argued the war was in the best interests of international security, but has since said President Bush made mistakes.

Ignatieff supported Canada's role in Afghanistan.

Dion came into the race in fourth place out of eight candidates. He won 54.7 percent in the fourth round of balloting Saturday after several of the losing candidates in previous rounds threw their support behind him.

In elections in January, Harper's Conservatives unseated the Liberals after nearly 13 years in power. The stunning defeat left the party flailing and delegates are now looking to the person who can rebuild the party and take back the House of Commons in the next elections, expected in 2007.

Ignatieff, 59, had only returned to Canada last year, leaving his position as director of Harvard's Carr Center of Human Rights Policy to win his first seat in Parliament and stake his claim to the leadership position.

After his defeat, called on Liberals to unanimously support Dion.

"This is a day in which every Liberal in this room can feel deeply proud of the party we love," he said. "We have chosen a great leader. We have chosen a principled man, a man with vision, a man with courage."

Dion was environment minister under former Prime Minister Paul Martin and he is a strong supporter of the Kyoto Protocol to cut greenhouse gas emissions — he even has a husky dog named Kyoto. Harper's government has effectively opted out of the global accord, a position that Dion railed against during his campaign. The U.S. has not signed the protocol.

Dion had emphasized his decade of political experience under former Liberal prime ministers Martin and Chretien, as opposed to Ignatieff's lack of time in Ottawa.

Dion is from the French-speaking province of Quebec and has taken some criticism for his heavily accented English.

Canada Liberals Spurn Ignatieff (BBC)

BBC.com, December 3, 2006

A former Canadian minister has beaten prominent writer Michael Ignatieff in a leadership election for the country's opposition Liberal party.

Mr Ignatieff had been favourite to win the race, but was defeated by ex-Environment Minister Stephane Dion.

Mr Dion's campaign focused on green issues, pledging to act on Canada's Kyoto protocol commitments.

The Liberals lost power last January to the Conservatives led by Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

The BBC's Mike Finnerty at the party convention in Montreal says the election was a nail-biter, as 5,000 delegates struggled to decide who was most likely to beat the Conservatives.

Mr Dion needed four rounds of voting to finally beat Mr Ignatieff, the front-runner.

Outsider

Mr Ignatieff is a prominent writer, broadcaster and former Harvard academic.

Despite Michael Ignatieff's fame as an author, his support waned. However his 30-year absence from Canada and his initial support for the US-led invasion of Iraq played against him, our correspondent says.

Mr Dion will lead a party that many have called the natural governing party of Canada because of its dominance in the country's politics.

But a corruption scandal after almost two decades in office meant the party has spent most of 2006 trying to rebuild.

Environmental issues dominated the Montreal convention.

In his victory speech, Mr Dion made clear he would make the Kyoto Protocol on curbing greenhouse gases a key part of the strategy to win the next elections - which analysts say are likely next year.

Prime Minister Harper has called the Kyoto protocol unrealistic and recently cancelled a meeting with European Union leaders where he was expected to be criticised for his stance.

Advocate For Environment To Head Canada's Liberals (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0101256

MONTREAL, Dec. 2 -- In a convention that underscored the rising political weight of climate change issues, Canada's Liberal Party on Saturday chose St?phane Dion, a former environment minister, to lead the party and try to wrest power from the ruling Conservatives in the next national election.

Dion, 51, was elected head of the party over seven other candidates, including Michael Ignatieff, a renowned Harvard professor who returned to Canada last year and had quickly become a front-runner in the race to head the opposition against Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Ignatieff's drive for the post stumbled in the fourth and last ballot over his opinions on Iraq, Afghanistan and Israel. The fragmented delegations at the convention turned to Dion, whose environmental credentials overcame his thickly accented English and lackluster convention speech.

In his acceptance speech, Dion repeatedly emphasized his main goal: dealing with what he called "the greatest challenge we have today, sustainable development."

He was elected, he said, because "Canadians have a deep concern about the main issue of our time -- building a sustainable environment for our children."

It was a message the delegates embraced.

"We've recognized that global warming and Kyoto are agenda items we have to deal with. Canada has gotten the message," said a delegate on the convention floor, Paul Mulligan, 60, a retired cartographer.

Dion must regroup the Liberals, long the dominant party in Canada, to try to reverse the loss in January to Harper's Conservatives. The party hopes that disillusionment with Harper for cutting social programs, rising despair over Canadian military losses in Afghanistan and opposition to Harper's retreat from the Kyoto environmental accord will topple the Conservative minority government.

As visual evidence of the importance of environmental issues, the sea of green T-shirts worn by Dion's supporters grew as the balloting continued in Montreal's cavernous Palace of Congress. Each of the candidates had pledged to make aggressive strides on the environment, but Dion's long work to strengthen the Kyoto accord carried those who put the issue at the top of the agenda.

An academic and native of Quebec City, Dion entered Parliament a decade ago and has held a variety of cabinet posts under Liberal governments. But in his last post, as environment minister, he won credit for devoting enormous effort to extending the provisions of the Kyoto accord. He owns a husky named Kyoto.

But he is less well-liked in his home province of Quebec because of his opposition to the popular movement to make the French-speaking province an independent country. In the late 1990s, Dion carried on a long-running debate with supporters of separatism and eventually assisted in drafting a law that many Quebecers feel helps block their movement.

"Quebec people don't like St?phane Dion," said Jean Pierre Laine, 54, an alternate delegate from Montreal. "He is a federalist." Quebec newspaper cartoons at the time portrayed him as a rat; he was pilloried as a traitor to his province.

"It will be an uphill struggle for Dion in Quebec," agreed Charles Hubbard, a member of Parliament from New Brunswick, in the convention hall. "The people who question federalism see Dion as the arch devil."

That is a burden for the Liberal Party, which had hoped to strengthen its position in the province. Dion's speaking style, often wooden and stilted, also is seen as a detriment in any matchup with Harper, who is smooth and fluent in both English and French.

Dion "is a bit rigid," said David Carter, 58, a delegate from Medicine Hat, Alberta. But he is "highly principled. He's strong, intelligent and very committed to the country."

In Canada's Parliament and other public appearances, top officials are expected to switch between both official languages with ease. Dion's syntax is sometimes difficult to sort out in English.

"It's important to be bilingual. I think it's horrible to say, but his language skills are not good enough," said Lana Stermac, a party observer from Toronto.

Others disagreed.

"It didn't hurt Chr?tien," said delegate Garry Johnson, noting that former prime minister Jean Chr?tien, also a Quebec native, served for 10 years and spoke heavily accented English.

DOJ_NMG_0101257

"If they keep sending our boys back in body bags from Afghanistan, that is what will do Harper in," he added.

The Afghanistan issue is a tricky one for Liberals, however. A Liberal Paul Martin government committed Canadian troops to Afghanistan. Harper expanded the mission and engineered a Parliament vote in May to keep the troops there until at least 2009. Many Liberal Parliament members voted for the extension.

Harper, described at the convention as a Canadian version of President Bush, has focused on a narrow agenda of conservative social and fiscal goals, and has cut programs that fall outside of that list. As head of a minority government, he has said he will call an election to try to win a majority. Political experts predict that an election called by Harper or forced by the opposition will come next year, possibly early in the year.

The Pope Without His Sting (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

HAS the pope gone wobbly?

The question might matter less if he weren't the man he is — and if the images of his facing Mecca in prayer on his trip to Turkey weren't fresh. Supporters have long depended on Benedict XVI for brave talk, even and maybe especially if it was unpleasant to hear. But his was never mere blunt confrontation. With his big brain and the heft of Roman Catholic tradition behind him, Benedict has stood for a remarkably clear idea: there is truth, and we won't retreat from it.

That penchant for truth-telling found its date with history two months ago in the pope's now-famous speech in Regensburg, Germany. Rare for a mainstream leader, he planted a steely marker in the struggle against terror and militant Islam, quoting a Byzantine emperor as saying Islam had brought only things "evil and inhuman." Islam, he seemed to say, was distant from reason and thus prone to violence.

But in his visit to Turkey last week, the face of confrontation, and perhaps the hold on certainty, seemed to soften. Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan emerged happily from his meeting with Benedict, saying that the pope had endorsed Turkey's bid to join the European Union and so reversed his long-held personal opposition.

In the place of tough talk, Benedict suggested "dialogue" — a concept, with regard to Islam especially, that he had not seemed completely open to before.

And so a new and ever more interesting chapter in this young papacy, as well as in the larger issue of how to engage the Muslim world, including those elements of it that resort to violence, seemed to open on Benedict's four days in Turkey.

The questions are many, starting with whether or not Benedict, the doctrinal purist, has somehow gone soft. To some of his most hard-core supporters, that, indeed, may be the lesson of his visit to Turkey.

"He has signaled to Islam that there are concessions he can make, and reactions other than outrage in the face of intimidation and violence," one conservative blogger wrote in an emblematic posting that found echoes in the concerned Catholic blogosphere. "It is a shame. We needed Benedict, and his withdrawal from the debate is a considerable loss."

But other commentators, with varying views of the pope, put the question another way: can one's idea of truth be expressed differently, especially when reality gets in the way?

By many accounts, the Vatican was deeply shaken at the reaction to the pope's speech, which was at its heart a criticism of the West for being so beholden to reason that it had blocked out other values, like religion. The section on Islam was short, and Benedict made clear he was quoting others in his criticism of Islam.

But the reaction — and here the Vatican officially blames the news media — focused on the sharp, if brief, critique of Islam. And the Muslim world reacted with rage. Demonstrations broke out in many Muslim countries; firebombers attacked churches in the West Bank and Gaza; gunmen killed an Italian nun in Somalia. The pope himself was threatened, accounting for the heavy security on his trip to Turkey.

"This is a pope who hasn't really understood that what he says has consequences for Christians elsewhere," said Sergio Romano, a columnist for Corriere della Sera and the former Italian ambassador to NATO. "He can put them in danger. He has had to adopt a more diplomatic line."

This new phase in Benedict's papacy, then, is seen by many as a transformation from his understanding of his role primarily as a theologian, concerned with a specific truth, to a greater appreciation of his role as something of a diplomat, who seeks to balance various truths in the service of a greater interest; in this case, that of the church and its believers.

David Gibson, author of "The Rule of Benedict," published in September by HarperSanFranciso, described the pope's performance in Turkey as a crucial moment. With his silent prayer in the mosque and general warmth, he showed himself to be every bit as adept at politics as theology.

"We have seen to some degree the transformation of Joseph Ratzinger the cardinal and theologian to Benedict XVI, pope and statesman," Mr. Gibson said. "He said and did some things that obviously go against his personal grain."

But, he added: "It was really smart. And it cost him nothing."

Like any good politician, Benedict gave a bit to everyone and kept his words vague enough (he himself never came out and explicitly endorsed Turkey's entry into the E.U.) that people could read into them what they wanted. Indeed, the Catholic chattering class was working full time on whether he actually did endorse an E.U. entry or whether he said an actual prayer at the Blue Mosque in Istanbul.

The question for the many longtime supporters of the pope is whether this new Benedict is really the same man, whether the straight talk that distinguished him will be recognizable in a more political outfit.

Philip F. Lawler, editor of Catholic World News, an influential conservative Web site, says he believes that it will be. While he acknowledged that some of Benedict's supporters were not happy about the comments on the European Union or the mosque visit, Benedict continued to raise in Turkey the same issues he always has: concern for religious freedom; respect for religious minorities; denunciation of violence in the name of God.

"I haven't seen any backtracking since Regensburg," he said. "I've seen questions posed in a different manner. And I've seen a concern that he doesn't want to offend people by the way in which he poses the questions. But he's still determined to have those questions posed."

The Rev. Thomas V. Berg, executive director of the Westchester Institute for Ethics, a conservative Catholic research group, said, "Pope Benedict will hold to principle, but he will do so with a gentle smile."

"That approach has allowed him to be so amazingly clear about the problems he has with militant Islam, and at the same time walk right into the heart of one of the epicenters of the Islamic world and emerge as a hero, a mender of fences, a great humanitarian, a man of dialogue," Father Berg said.

But however well Benedict's new approach seemed to go over in Turkey, Mr. Gibson, who described Benedict as a polarizing figure in his book, issued a warning: The clash of East and West, Islam and Christianity, is not over. Benedict's role as conciliator is young, untested and does not come as naturally as his older role as a man of certainty.

"I don't think he wants to play Mr. Touchy-Feely with world Islam," Mr. Gibson said. "I think there are going to be some difficult moments."

German Turks Ask Where They Fit Now (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

FOR the 2.7 million Turkish immigrants who live in Germany, Pope Benedict XVI's visit to their homeland last week was not quite the occasion for relief, satisfaction, even joy that one might have expected.

The German-born pope did speak of understanding and dialogue between Christians and Muslims, trying to salve wounds caused by a speech in Bavaria in which he had seemed to equate Islam with violence. And he endorsed Turkey's entrance into the European Union, reversing the opposition he had expressed while still a cardinal.

But the pope's message fell short of a full embrace; he never, for example, dropped his definition of Europe as a place with a Christian history. Such ambiguity about welcoming Turkey and Islam into Europe is felt deeply across the continent, and it turns out that the Turks who have migrated here mirror it. They feel part of Germany and Europe, and yet never fully welcomed.

That was plainly the case during a series of conversations here in Kreuzberg, a graffiti-stained district that is one of Berlin's largest Turkish quarters. Benedict's pilgrimage elicited a complex range of feelings that spoke of conflicted loyalties and disillusionment, of a people caught between the land of their ancestors and their adopted land. "The pope's power is mainly within the church," said Ramiz Koyuncu, a sporting-goods salesman, as he emerged from morning prayers at Berlin's largest mosque. "What people like Merkel say is more important."

His reference was to Angela Merkel, Germany's chancellor, who opposes granting Turkey full membership in the union. The European Union, in fact, is now weighing whether to suspend part of the negotiations because of Turkey's failure to open trade with Cyprus, and Turks who live in Europe are resigning themselves to a hard reality: their home country may not break into the European club during their lifetimes.

It's more complicated than a simple question of spurning a club that won't have them. Turks who came to Germany as guest workers in the early 1960's are building retirement communities here. Of the estimated 2.7 million people of Turkish origin living in Germany, 900,000 are now German citizens — a percentage that has grown as the influx of new arrivals has slowed because of tougher immigration laws.

While 60 percent of Turks in Germany still favor entry, according to a survey by the Center for Turkish Studies in Essen, that number represents a steep drop from 91 percent in 2004.

Ahmed Hunker, who owns a kebab restaurant in a hard-bitten Berlin neighborhood, said that admitting Turkey would cost Germany billions of euros in aid and erode his standard of living. After scraping together a life in Germany over a decade, Mr. Hunker said he did not want to see his new country saddled with the problems of his old one.

"Why should Turkey be a member of the E.U.?" he asked. "Why should Bulgaria be a member? Why should Romania be a member? The rich countries will just end up paying for them."

Mr. Hunker and his neighbors know about the costs that come with expanding borders. When the reunification of Germany took place more than a decade ago, Turks like him in western Berlin found themselves suddenly competing for jobs with newcomers from the east.

Few Turks speak as bluntly as Mr. Hunker. It is far more typical to hear them say they hope to see Turkey in the union. But some seem to have given up on the idea that the West will ever accept a Muslim society. Pope Benedict's remarks about the Prophet Mohammed confirmed the suspicions of some Turks that Europeans view their club as a Christian one.

"The pope poisoned the atmosphere," Mr. Koyuncu said. "That's why he had to make this gesture to Turkey."

Closer To And Farther From Europe (NYT)

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

The strained relationship between Europe and Turkey took two steps forward last week and, we fear, at least that many backward.

On the plus side, the visit to Turkey by Pope Benedict XVI helped soothe relations, especially after Benedict backed off his opposition to Turkey's application to join the European Union. The pope — who infuriated Muslims a few months ago with a tone-deaf speech criticizing Islam — may have done even more good with his visit to the Blue Mosque in Istanbul, where he prayed facing Mecca.

But those efforts at conciliation may be undercut if the European Union follows through on a recommendation by its enlargement commissioner, Olli Rehn, to freeze part of the negotiating program for Turkey's membership unless Turkey opens its ports to shipping from Cyprus. To many in Turkey — and to us as well — that looked like another ploy to keep Turkey out of the union. Some members are pressing for the European Union to suspend the talks altogether.

There is no question that Turkey has to open its ports, the sooner the better. But the European Union also needs to do a lot more to help end the division of Cyprus — rather than just hitting Turkey over the head with it.

In 2004, Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, courageously changed his country's longstanding policy and persuaded Turkish Cypriots to vote in favor of a United Nations settlement plan.

But the Greek Cypriots — assured by the European Union of membership no matter what they did — rejected the plan. If the union is serious about bringing in Turkey — and it should be — it needs to press the Greek Cypriots to settle.

It is obvious why Turkey would want to join Europe's wealthy club. But Europe and all of the West have a lot to gain as well. The prospect of membership is already encouraging Ankara to make needed political and economic reforms, although a lot more needs to be done. Turkey's admission would be a strong sign that the West truly believes its claims of tolerance and respect for all religions.

As he left Istanbul, the pope said he hoped his visit would bring "civilizations progressively closer." The European Union should listen.

Germany To Restrict Smoking, Joining Other Nations In Europe (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

FRANKFURT, Dec. 2 — Yielding grudgingly to the growing European campaign against smoking in public places, Germany announced Friday that it would seek to ban smoking in restaurants, discos, schools and other public buildings, but not in pubs, bars or beer tents.

The compromise, worked out by the coalition government, would bring this country, Europe's biggest tobacco market, closer to its neighbors in curtailing public smoking. But it would fall short of the recent laws passed by Britain, France, Ireland and Italy, which stamp out cigarettes in pubs and bars as well as other public places.

Antismoking groups said the proposal was a milestone, given Germany's long resistance to any restrictions. They called on the Parliament to broaden the ban when it votes on it, probably next year.

"Germany has been lagging on this issue for 20 years," said Friedrich J. Wiebel, president of the German Medical Action Group on Smoking and Health, an antismoking organization. "There is no reason why one group of customers should be protected and others should not."

German officials defended the loopholes, saying the ban had a better chance of passing that way.

For a people fixated on the virtues of fresh air, Germans are curiously tolerant of smoking in public places. Restaurants here are typically hazy with smoke. Customers who ask for a nonsmoking table are sometimes treated brusquely.

Roughly a third of Germans smoke regularly, a proportion comparable to other major Western European countries. But Germany has more young smokers than many of its neighbors. And while the percentage of men who smoke has declined modestly since 1984, smoking has become more popular among women.

One woman who quit years ago is Chancellor Angela Merkel. That makes her one of the few nonsmoking German leaders. Gerhard Schröder puffs on cigars, Willy Brandt smoked a pipe and Helmut Schmidt has frequently appeared on television talk shows wreathed in cigarette smoke.

Mrs. Merkel's support for a smoking ban, though carefully modulated, helped turn the tide, according to antismoking groups.

Surveys show that, despite their tolerance of secondhand smoke, a majority of Germans now favor banning it in restaurants. The hurdle, Dr. Wiebel said, is the German tobacco industry, which has historically had close ties to the government and has stymied previous efforts to curtail smoking.

Losing The Race Against AIDS (NYT)

Despite all the lofty goals set by world leaders, and billions of dollars thrown into the fight to quench the global AIDS pandemic in recent years, it is discouraging to learn the world is still falling behind.

A recent update issued by the United Nations AIDS program and the World Health Organization found some encouraging signs of progress, including a drop in H.I.V. infections in young people in eight African countries, thanks to aggressive prevention programs. But the number of people living with the AIDS virus continued to grow, reaching a record 39.5 million in 2006; 4.3 million people became infected this year; and the number of deaths due to AIDS reached an all-time high.

Most disturbingly, some countries that had been trumpeted as successes in controlling AIDS, like Uganda and Thailand, seemed to be having a resurgence. As one top United Nations official noted, "countries are not moving at the same speed as their epidemics."

Even more troubling was a report from the International Treatment Preparedness Coalition, an advocacy group, which pointed to shortfalls in an area where substantial progress seemed to have been made: the provision of antiretroviral drugs to save or extend the lives of AIDS victims. Both the United Nations and the Group of 8 industrialized nations have set a goal of providing "universal access" to AIDS treatment by 2010, by which time they hope to have 9.8 million people receiving antiretroviral drugs. At the current rate, the coalition estimates, they will fall five million short.

Progress has been slowed by many factors, including insufficient testing to identify people who are infected and weak public health services for delivering the drugs. But the overriding problem may be a loss of the sense of urgency and a reluctance by most governments to commit the huge resources needed to provide universal access to treatment, prevention, care and support.

Blame Iceland (WP)

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

IN A FORM of fishing known as bottom trawling, huge, weighted nets are dragged across the ocean floor, destroying corals and just about everything else in their path. In U.S. waters, the practice is tightly regulated -- and forbidden in certain environmentally sensitive areas. On much of the high seas, however, it's open season. Delicate ecosystems get ravaged with nobody paying attention. The Bush administration, along with several other governments, has been pushing for a moratorium on unregulated trawling on the high seas. Last month, thanks in large part to Iceland, it failed to get that measure.

Iceland did not act alone in preventing a ban: Russia, Japan, China and South Korea joined in. Iceland's embassy, in a statement, said it "strongly objects to claims, made by some environmental organizations, that it was in the forefront of blocking consensus" to ban deep-sea bottom trawling. The denial is disingenuous. In closed-door negotiations, Iceland, along with Russia, took a particularly vocal and aggressive stand against strong action.

Because the arcane rules of high-seas fishing are largely defined by consensus, even small countries that are genuine moral outliers in world attitudes toward oceans can prevent agreement. The result in this case was a mushy resolution that fell far short of what the administration and environmental groups wanted, which in turn is ominous for efforts to protect marine life in international waters. The world's oceans are heading toward environmental collapse, which only bold action will avert. It's hard to imagine that happening if a country that hunts whales and has a population smaller than Washington's can help block a common-sense proposal to safeguard the ecological health of the ocean floor.

Kofi Annan's Legacy (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

UNITED NATIONS -- The melancholy of a decade of might-have-beens mixes with a deep fear of what might yet be as Kofi Annan prepares to leave his 38th-floor global pulpit at the United Nations. But the secretary general's silky voice also betrays a determination to spend his final month in office warning the world of grave threats to its moral and physical existence.

Iran, Iraq, the Middle East and Sudan's Darfur region dominate the final day-to-day business that the career diplomat from Ghana conducts. But he is also delivering a series of thoughtful speeches examining nuclear proliferation, human rights and global governance so that "these issues don't drop off the radar" after he puts down his U.N. megaphone.

As we begin a conversation about his legacy -- easily the most active and therefore most controversial record of a secretary general since Dag Hammarskjold gave the job meaning during the Cold War -- Annan surprises me by going quickly to his concern that the West may underestimate Iran's resolve in pursuing its nuclear program.

"I have told the United States and Britain to be careful, to be sure that the Iranians don't come out of a Security Council debate laughing" because sanctions are not adopted by a divided body, he says. Later Annan adds: "Iran feels itself to be a powerful nation. Its president looked me in the eyes" and said exactly that.

Annan says the simultaneous confrontations with Iran and North Korea demonstrate that "you can't do nonproliferation on a case-by-case basis. You have to find a real mechanism" to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons to new states or even terrorist groups. That is likely to happen only if recognized nuclear states begin to fulfill existing treaty obligations to eventually give up nuclear weapons, rather than continually modernizing them.

Iran's new self-confidence also suggests that Tehran will not easily agree to U.S. overtures to engage in talks about Iraq, as conventional wisdom in the foreign policy community now recommends. Tehran will instead relentlessly bargain for U.S. concessions as a price for joining a dialogue, in the view of Annan and others.

That possibility was forecast in the contacts that former secretary of state Jim Baker had with Javad Zarif, Iranian ambassador to the United Nations. Iran has no interest in a dialogue limited to Iraq, as Baker suggested to him, Zarif has told diplomats here. Instead, talks must include security guarantees for Iran as a topic.

The might-have-beens of Annan's two terms center on his rocky relations with the Bush administration, which have left scars on both sides. Some U.S. officials treated him "as an enemy" at times because of his opposition to the invasion of Iraq, Annan tells me.

"The United States has a natural leadership role to play in this organization," says Annan, who is American-educated, came to office with strong U.S. support and has worked hard to develop a broad constituency for the United Nations among American private-sector and nongovernmental organizations. "It can get a lot done." He pauses. "But no one nation can always have its way. It has to be possible to disagree" and still work together.

"Iraq has set us back on many issues," including one of Annan's proudest accomplishments. That was to get the United Nations to endorse an international "duty to protect" citizens from their own abusive governments.

In today's polarized atmosphere, it is much more difficult to get governments to take on the burden of humanitarian intervention in places such as Darfur, Annan believes. So he has had to engage a devious Sudanese government in an exasperating political negotiation for getting an effective peacekeeping force into that country.

Despite -- or perhaps because of -- his troubles with Washington, Annan is actively pushing for a regional conference to help resolve Iraq's instability and permit an orderly U.S. withdrawal: "Everybody has an interest in getting Iraq right."

A standing conference intended to last for months, not a few days, and one that would include the major Security Council powers as well as Iraq's neighbors, is his preferred option. The United Nations would sponsor such a meeting, if asked, he predicted to the Iraq Study Group headed by Baker and Lee Hamilton.

The day is late, and the light coming in from the sky over Manhattan's East River is fading as I ask Annan a final question: How should his successor, South Korea's Ban Ki Moon, go about restoring U.S.-U.N. relations?

"My only advice to him about this job is to do it his way. I did it my way, which was to try to work with the United States while being the secretary-general of all United Nations members."

The New Demagogues (WP)

By Niall Ferguson

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

"We are confronting the devil -- and we will hit a home run off the devil!"

Venezuelan President Hugo Ch?vez was at it again last week, demonizing his archenemy in front of throngs of loyal supporters in downtown Caracas. Forget his opponent in today's presidential elections -- that's not the "devil" he has in mind. Instead, following the example of another great Latin American demagogue, Fidel Castro, Ch?vez directs his rhetorical fire against the United States and President Bush.

The world over, demagogues are back, yelling their slogans and thumping their tubs.

In Latin America, Bolivia's Evo Morales and Mexico's Andr?s Manuel L?pez Obrador have joined Ch?vez in heaping opprobrium on the diabolical gringo imperialists. In the Middle East, Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Hezbollah's Hasan Nasrallah denounce the demonic Yankee crusaders and their Zionist confederates with equal fervor. Others have different targets, but their language is no less inflammatory. In Germany, Udo Pastoers of the xenophobic National Democratic Party won a regional election after calling Europe "a cultural space for white people." In South Africa, former deputy president Jacob Zuma belts out "Mshini Wami," an anti-apartheid anthem that includes the line, "Bring me my machine gun."

Their rhetoric may seem overblown, but no one should underestimate the threat these new demagogues pose -- especially to the United States. Irrelevant in Latin America, impotent in the Middle East, ignored in Africa and isolated in Europe, Washington may be facing its biggest foreign policy crisis since the late 1970s, when the Iranian Revolution and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan rocked Jimmy Carter's presidency. And this new generation of rabble-rousers is seizing the moment. The more unpopular the United States becomes, the easier it is for them to win votes by bad-mouthing Uncle Sam.

We have been here before, and it wasn't pretty. When an elected president expresses skepticism about the Holocaust and threatens to wipe the state of Israel from the map, it is not hyperbole to draw comparisons with that most disastrous of demagogues, Adolf Hitler. Like Hitler, Ahmadinejad knows that anti-Semitism is one of the aces in the demagogue's deck, a tried-and-true means of inspiring hatred and suspicion of others -- and of staying in power himself. Hitler also frequently expressed his contempt for the United States, which he dismissed as "a decayed country," racially and culturally inferior to Germany -- and, of course, ruled by Jews. Read Ahmadinejad's latest letter to "the American people," released last week, for a reprise of that theme.

And today, the conditions for truly dangerous demagogues to emerge are almost ideal.

The classic breeding grounds for demagogy are war and revolution. It is no coincidence that Ahmadinejad is a veteran of the 1979 Islamic Revolution in Iran and the war between Iran and Iraq. In a new mood of "realism," the United States would now like Iran to help prevent its neighbor Iraq from collapsing into civil war. Fat chance. Ahmadinejad is bidding for Iranian hegemony in the Middle East. The last thing he needs is to be seen bailing out the Great Satan.

Severe economic volatility can also create a popular appetite for rousing rhetoric. It is significant that economic growth has been so much more variable in Latin America and the Middle East over the past 20 years than it has been in the United States. When people are buffeted by wild fluctuations in income, prices and job security, they are more likely to lose confidence in the political status quo and to heed the words of messianic leaders such as Ch?vez and Morales.

Also relevant is the level of average income. Today, per capita incomes in poorer Latin American countries and most of the Middle East are similar to those of Central Europe between the wars. (That's important, because studies suggest that a democracy's chances of survival are much higher when per capita income is above $6,000.) Illiteracy rates are probably higher than they were in Central Europe. Urbanization rates certainly are. It's an ideal environment for demagogy: masses of people, stuck between the grinding poverty of agrarian societies and the affluence of today's richest countries, living in crowded cities with lousy schools. In such settings, the center seldom holds for long. Soon the maverick speechmaker is strutting in presidential regalia.

That helps explain why so many demagogues swept to power in Central and Eastern Europe in the 1920s and '30s. Hitler was only one of a host of dictators who combined fiery rhetoric with colored shirts, shiny boots -- and an utter disregard for civil liberties, especially those of ethnic minorities. And that's the critical point.

History's lesson is that personal freedom is all too often the demagogue's first victim, especially when popular sentiment is whipped up against some internal or foreign enemy.

The ancient Greek word "demagogos" means simply a spokesman for the people or, more pejoratively, a leader of the mob. Modern usage implies rhetorical gifts and the ability to arouse an audience, usually with the promise of radical measures. It is to the baser impulses of the public that a demagogue usually appeals -- hence the tendency to identify and denounce enemies of the people.

Demagogy is as old as democracy, but not all democracies produce demagogues. The best known of the ancient Greek demagogues was Alcibiades, who sold his fellow Athenians the (bad) idea of conquering Sicily. The Roman Republic produced Marcus Tullius Cicero, whose devastating Philippics sought to thwart the ambitions of Julius Caesar's friend and Cleopatra's lover Mark Antony. (Cicero called Antony a "madman" who wanted a "bloodbath" in Rome.)

The term took on a new significance in the 17th century. If the English Civil War had its demagogue, it was the Puritan parliamentarian John Pym, Charles I's most vehement critic in the House of Commons -- though it was the plainspoken man of action Oliver Cromwell who emerged as dictator.

Not all revolutions produce demagogues. The American Revolution owed more to lawyerly draftsmen and amateur soldiers than to masters of rhetoric. In France, though, intemperate speechifying was the essence of the revolution. Demagogues such as Georges Danton -- nicknamed "Jove the thunderer" and one of the leaders of the Reign of Terror -- gave firebrand oratory a bad name for the better part of a century.

From the 1880s on, the widening of franchises to include poorer, less educated voters combined with a major economic slowdown to produce a new kind of demagogue: not so much a warmonger or a revolutionary as a vote-winner. The defining moment was William Ewart Gladstone's 1878 Midlothian campaign, when the British Liberal leader made a series of inspirational stump speeches aimed not just at local voters but at the nation.

But as the boom years of the industrial age gave way to deflation and depression, demagogues turned against liberalism. On the left and right alike, from socialists to anti-Semites, radical politicians discovered that the best way to mobilize new voters was to blame economic volatility on enemies of the people. In Austria, the anti-Semite Karl Lueger blamed the troubles of the Viennese petty bourgeoisie after the stock market crash of 1873 on the city's supposedly all-powerful Jews. In Russia, radical socialists such as Leon Trotsky fulminated with equal vehemence against czarism and capitalism. In every case, the demagogue pointed an accusatory finger, blaming this or that group for the sufferings of the masses. Success meant power for the demagogue, and persecution for his targets.

Small wonder, then, that the years between World Wars I and II proved to be the zenith of demagogic politics. After 1914, the world was swept first by war, then by revolutions and finally by the worst depression in economic history. Hitler was of course the arch-demagogue, a hate-filled monster and false Messiah who promised the German people redemption after years of humiliation. But in Italy, Benito Mussolini also strutted and stormed; Oswald Mosley, the renegade socialist who founded the British Union of Fascists, tried the same tricks in England. Central Europe resounded to the diatribes of a horde of similar rabble-rousers. In Poland, National Democrat leader Roman Dmowski prophesied an "international pogrom of the Jews." In Romania, the founder of the Legion of the Archangel Michael, Corneliu Codreanu, pledged to "destroy the Jews before they can destroy us." Hitler was very far from the only demagogue in the 1930s to scapegoat the Jews. When he took Europe to war, he found willing collaborators all over the continent.

The good news about demagogues is that they often find it harder to deliver on election pledges than to deliver election speeches. In September, Morales's deputy, Vice President ?lvaro Garc?a Linera, called on Bolivia's indigenous people to defend Morales's government "with your chest, with your hand, with your Mauser" in response to opposition in the eastern city of Santa Cruz. Such language belies the reality that the Morales government has been forced to modify its plan to nationalize the country's energy sector (though last week it did succeed in pushing through a radical land reform bill). Economic instability and backwardness may bring demagogues to power. But they also constrain them once they get there.

Still, the fact that Chavez and Ahmadinejad sit on top of 6 percent and 11 percent of proven global oil reserves must give us pause. Perhaps the greatest strategic weakness of the interwar demagogues was their lack of fuel. That, indeed, was one of their motives for conquering what Hitler called "living space" from neighboring countries.

Today's demagogues, by contrast, rule oil-rich countries. This may reduce their need to acquire territory. But with oil prices stuck above $60 a barrel, it also guarantees them large payments from oil-importing countries such as the United States and gives them the means to back up their words with action. And you don't need to know a lot of history to know that hot air plus petroleum is a potentially explosive combination.

Felipe Calderon's Daunting To-do List For Mexico (LAT)

By Jorge G. Castañeda

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

MEXICO'S SEEMINGLY endless electoral ordeal has finally concluded: Felipe Calderon took office as president on Friday, albeit under hardly auspicious circumstances. Constitutional order has prevailed — though just barely — despite the onslaught of a strident and deeply wounded left-wing opposition bent on impeding Calderon's inauguration and a bitter, resentful Institutional Revolution Party (PRI) silently hoping and conspiring for the new president's failure.

The bad news for Calderon is that the telenovela that debuted on election day, July 2, is only the beginning. The toughest challenges lie ahead for him now that he has moved into Los Pinos (as the presidential spread on the edge of Chapultepec Park is called).

DOJ_NMG_0101265

The conventional wisdom in Mexico doesn't fully appreciate Calderon's predicament. If Vicente Fox's term was largely a self-inflicted failure — as is broadly believed — then it would be relatively easy for the new administration to improve on this dismal past. So Calderon would set about imposing respect for the rule of law and the country's institutions, using political skills acquired as a party leader and legislator to broker deals with the PRI for the structural economic reforms Mexico needs to grow at roughly twice the rate of the Fox years (a meager 2% a year), downsizing expectations for dealing with Washington on immigration and cracking down on corruption that has remained rampant over the last six years.

That wouldn't prove so daunting. Alas, this simplistic narrative is not only inaccurate, it is devastatingly misleading.

Fox's six years in office, coupled with the four last years of former President Ernesto Zedillo's mandate, were a milestone. Not since the 1960s had Mexico enjoyed 10 consecutive years of economic stability, low inflation, low interest rates, a stable currency and constant, if mediocre, growth. For the first time, mortgages, automobile loans and consumer credit became available to the lower middle class: This year more homes were built and sold, and more cars were bought, than ever before. Fox can be criticized for indulging disruptive political protesters and an extremist opposition, but what's more important is that he did not resort to the bloody repression for which most of his predecessors came to be known. And as his foreign minister for a time, I am proud that Fox dragged Mexico out of its archaic foreign policy cocoon and put immigration and human rights front and center on Mexico's international agenda.

As far as Fox's inability to build coalitions with other parties (his National Action Party, or PAN, did not control a majority in the Congress, and still doesn't), perhaps it was their fault, not his. Even before taking office, Calderon was unable to accomplish his very first goal: building the coalition government — at least with the PRI — that he repeatedly proclaimed as the solution to the political gridlock that has cursed Mexico since 1997. There are advantages to having a uniform and disciplined, though probably disposable, PAN Cabinet, even one made up largely of lackluster, mostly unknown and untested archconservatives from the heartland, but this is not what Calderon said he wanted. Similarly, no deal was reached with the leftist opposition regarding the inauguration ceremony — thus the chaotic, depressing scenes of Mexican congressmen fighting it out at the podium of their chamber over the course of the last week.

Moreover, local conflicts like those in the southern state of Oaxaca have not been quickly resolved under Fox, either politically or through the use of force. It seems that Mexico's problems are more intractable than just not having Fox to "kick around anymore."

Actually, they may be more simple and complex at the same time. Mexico experienced an abrupt economic opening under former President Carlos Salinas de Gortari (1988-1994), a belated but successful political opening under Zedillo (1994-2000) and, at long last, a true rotation in power thanks to Fox (2000-2006). But all of these historical transformations took place while leaving the essence of the old PRI-inspired machinery intact: The foundations of the system (which political scientists would call "corporativist" because that system managed to subordinate all sectors of society — the party, business, labor, the church and so on under its control), created in the 1930s, remain untouched. They still represent the most formidable obstacles to Mexico's growth and success.

The first pillar of this structure is the public and private economic monopolies that dominate the country. The oil (Pemex) and electric power (Federal Electricity Commission) firms owned by the state are untainted by competition; the private virtual monopolies in telecommunications (Telmex), television networks (Televisa), cement (Cemex), bread and tortilla manufacturing (Bimbo and Maseca, respectively) and banking (Banamex/Citigroup and Bancomer/Banco de Bilbao) face only tepid competition at home, thanks to their cozy relationship with the state. Prices, supply, service and quality suffer as a consequence, and today these monopolies are stronger than ever.

The second pillar is formed by the unions that have controlled the Mexican labor movement since the 1930s. They were granted immense leverage in workplaces, tremendous resources and political power. The power of such organizations as the teachers union (the largest in Latin America), the oil workers union (the richest in Latin America) and the Social Security employees union (that has thwarted any attempt at pension or health reform for years) remains largely unchecked to this day. These unions obtained all their perks in exchange for 70 years of support for the PRI. They retain those perks, though they no longer owe any support to the government.

The third pillar is the political monopoly. For 70 years, one party had a complete lock on Mexican politics; now three parties do, and no one else can enter the political arena or have access to the taxpayer subsidies handed out to these parties (to the tune of more than half a billion dollars last year) without their consent. In Mexico, Joe Lieberman would not have been reelected to the Senate because, among other reasons, independent candidates are not allowed to run. The parties write their own antitrust legislation, vote their own subsidies and choose their own elected officials, who are just ratified at the polls.

Calderon's daunting assignment is to take on the pillars of the PRI's ancient regime, which have outlasted that party's seven-decade control of the presidency. His administration needs to liberate the union movement, upgrade and enforce antitrust laws to break up private monopolies and allow new competitors — even to the old public monopolies — to enter the marketplace. The barriers of entry into the marketplace of political ideas must also come down.

Can Calderon achieve all this? On one hand, the question might appear nonsensical. Given his weakness at the start, and the virulence and insidiousness of his opposition, taking on more enemies, including some of the powers that be that backed him, seems absurd and impossible. On the other hand, doing so may be the only way to strengthen his presidency. Moreover, his supporters can hardly break with him and join the Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador insurrection or the PRI silent conspiracy. They have nowhere else to go. Nor, indeed, does Calderon. He has to move forward and take up some formidable interests that are standing in the way of Mexico's future. It will not be easy.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Three-month Roundup Nets 136 Terror Suspects (WT/AFP)

By Suleiman Nimr

The Washington Times, December 3, 2006

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia -- The government yesterday announced the arrest of 136 suspected al Qaeda terrorists over the past three months in one of the largest crackdowns since it began battling Islamist extremists.

The Interior Ministry said the suspects, most of them Saudis, were rounded up during a series of raids across the vast oil-rich kingdom, where al Qaeda militants waged a series of shootings and bombings in May 2003, many targeting Westerners.

Those detained were 115 Saudis and 21 foreigners, and included a cell that had been plotting a suicide bombing, abductions and killings, the ministry said in a statement carried by the official SPA news agency.

That cell consisted of 31 suspects, including four foreign residents, who were detained during a "pre-emptive" security operation in Riyadh on Sept. 12, the ministry said.

The cell had been "on the verge of acting, after issuing fatwas legitimizing the abduction of innocent people, bargaining over them, killing them and raiding [shops] and banks," the ministry said.

"They included one [suspect] who wrote his will, to be publicized after he has carried out a suicide operation targeting innocent people and the nation's resources," the ministry said.

Another 44 Saudis were detained Oct. 26 in a series of simultaneous security operations in Riyadh, the oil-rich Eastern Province and the northern regions of Al-Qassim and Hail, the ministry said.

Six more Saudis had been detained earlier in October in the northern Al-Jawf region, near the borders with Iraq and Jordan, for forming a cell that "used their families to hide wanted [militants] and smuggle them outside" the country, the ministry said.

Other swoops netted a group of 16 suspects, including two foreigners, who were linked to outside "go-betweens" with the purpose of training militants abroad and sending them back to operate inside the kingdom, the ministry said.

Saudi Arabia announced in February it had thwarted a bid to blow up an oil processing plant, the world's largest, at Abqaiq in the Eastern Province.

Western coalition forces said in October they feared possible attacks on oil installations in Saudi Arabia and other Gulf countries.

The Saudi Interior Ministry said security forces seized "weapons, money in various currencies, documents," and communications and electronic equipment during the raids.

It did not specify the nationalities of the foreigners detained.

Saudis Arrest 139 "Sleeper Cell" Suspects (CNN)

CNN.com, December 2, 2006

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia (CNN) -- Saudi security officials said Saturday they foiled a planned terrorist suicide attack and arrested 139 suspected Islamist militants who were in "sleeper cells" believed to be affiliated with al Qaeda.

A senior official in the Saudi Interior Ministry told CNN that the suspects, who are from several Arab nations, were monitored by Saudi security agents for several months. They rounded the men up just before the expected attack was launched.

The suspects, arrested in different areas of Saudi Arabia, were being interrogated Saturday, the official said.

In October 2005, King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia called the threat of al Qaeda in his country "madness and evil" and vowed to "eliminate this scourge" of terrorism. Fifteen of the 19 al Qaeda terrorists participating in the September 11, 2001, attacks were Saudis.

There has been a series of deadly bombings in Saudi Arabia since then, including Western targets, further aligning the Saudi government with the United States in the war against terror.

In 2003, suicide bombings at residential compounds housing Westerners in Riyadh killed 23 people, and a car bombing in a mostly Arab neighborhood near Riyadh's diplomatic quarter killed at least 17. Both attacks were blamed on al Qaeda.

In December 2004 a Saudi-based al Qaeda group claimed responsibility for an armed raid on the U.S. consulate in Jeddah that left nine people dead.

Last year Saudi security forces, carrying out raids targeting suspected al Qaeda members, killed a man in Medina they said was the leader of al Qaeda on the Arab Peninsula.

"Militants" Held In Saudi Arabia (BBC)

BBC.com, December 2, 2006

The Saudi authorities say they have detained 136 suspected militants, including a potential suicide bomber.

The arrests were made over the past few months in several cities, and those held include members of al-Qaeda-type cells, the interior ministry said.

A ministry spokesman told the BBC that 115 of the suspects were Saudi nationals - the rest were foreigners.

They are accused of planning to bring down the Saudi royal family and attack Western targets.

Militants began a campaign in Saudi Arabia in 2003 with attacks on Western housing compounds.

However violence has declined in recent years in the face of tough security measures.

The only known attempted operation by Islamic militants this year was a foiled attack against the country's largest and most important oil facility.

Religious decrees

The interior ministry spokesman, General Mansoor al-Turki, said some of the militant groups had been about to carry out attacks in Saudi Arabia while others were still in the preparatory stages.

He said the authorities had withheld the announcement of the arrests until all the suspects had been rounded up.

"We're talking about eight different cells that were caught all over the kingdom, in almost all areas," Mr Turki told the BBC.

Some of those arrested were recruiting others to fight in "unstable countries", he added.

Others were allegedly recruiting militants to be trained abroad and then sent back to Saudi Arabia to carry out attacks.

The War On Terror, Under New Scrutiny (NYT)

By James Risen

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

IN the frantic first few months after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the Bush administration created what amounted to a new secret side of the government, based on an expansive view of the president's authority to wage the war on terror. From secret C.I.A. prisons and harsh interrogation tactics overseas to warrantless eavesdropping at home, the new counterterror structure was established with little Congressional oversight or legal scrutiny.

For several years after 9/11, President Bush was given broad latitude by the legislative and judicial branches to fight terrorism as he saw fit. But 2006 has seen the American government's system of checks and balances slowly clicking back into place, forcing the Bush White House to confront new limits and more scrutiny.

A series of developments last week reflected that changed reality. The Justice Department inspector general's office announced that it had begun an internal investigation into the department's role in the National Security Agency's domestic spying program, after the administration agreed to give the office's staff the necessary security clearances.

Separately, the federal government agreed to pay $2 million to a settle a lawsuit brought by an Oregon lawyer wrongly arrested after the F.B.I. mistakenly linked him to the 2004 Madrid train bombings based on a faulty fingerprint match.

In a third case, a German man abducted in 2003 and held in a C.I.A. secret prison in Afghanistan urged a federal appeals court to allow him to pursue a lawsuit against the United States that had been dismissed for national security reasons. He then went to Washington to meet with Congressional aides about his case.

Those actions followed much more consequential changes in the legal and political landscape this year. The Supreme Court set the tone in June, with its landmark ruling in the case of Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which struck at the heart of President Bush's assertion of executive power to wage the war on terror.

The court repudiated the president's plan to put detainees at Guantánamo Bay on trial before military commissions, ruling that the panels were unauthorized by federal statute and violated international law.

The ruling forced Congress to set up a system of military commissions, with lawmakers agreeing with the president that evidence could be withheld from terror suspects in some instances, and detainees could be barred from going to court to challenge their confinement.

But the Hamdan ruling also raised questions about the legality of other counterterrorism programs. Two months after the decision, a federal judge in Detroit ruled that the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping was unconstitutional, rejecting among other arguments that the president's constitutional authority allowed the program. The ruling set the stage for what seems likely to be a prolonged legal battle.

The impact of the Hamdan ruling was followed by the political impact of last month's Democratic electoral victory. With both the House and Senate now under Democratic control, greater Congressional oversight of the war on terror seems certain, a climate that the administration says will hamper its efforts to protect national security.

"The administration probably feels like it is under attack on all fronts, but I think it is just the fact that the checks and balances in our democracy are beginning to reassert themselves," said Jeffrey Smith, former general counsel of the Central Intelligence Agency and now a Washington lawyer.

"The president was probably correct in the days after 9/11 when he saw that the laws on the books were inadequate to deal with the threat we faced," Mr. Smith added. "But he was very wrong to thus conclude that he could act as he saw fit. The failure to get legal authority meant that he didn't have the legal basis and public support to make these programs sustainable legally and politically."

Suzanne Spaulding, a former Congressional intelligence staffer and now a Washington lawyer, said she believed that the midterm elections and the Hamdan decision have substantially changed the climate in Washington for the war on terror.

"I think the ability of the Justice Department inspector general to get clearances to investigate the N.S.A. program may very well reflect the administration's responses to the changes on the Hill," Ms. Spaulding said.

"And the judiciary is not always impervious to the mood of the country. At the same time, it does have a trickle-down effect when the Supreme Court expresses its opinion."

Representative Jane Harman, the moderate California Democrat who just lost her bid to become chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, told a Washington conference of experts on national security law on Friday that President Bush missed opportunities to establish a stronger basis for the war on terror by refusing to work with Congress and the courts early on.

"When faced with difficult questions of executive authority, the response of the president has been to claim that the Constitution allows exactly what his office of legal counsel says it does," Ms. Harman said. "This just isn't a good way to run a country."

The Bush administration, meanwhile, continues to assert that it has operated legally, has broad authority to wage the war on terror, and will continue to use that authority to protect Americans.

Desperate Guantanamo Detainees Turn To Each Other For Legal Help (AP)

By John Heilprin

AP, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Like more than a hundred enemy combatants held without charges at the Navy's Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, Hamid Al Razak of Afghanistan turned to a fellow prisoner for legal help.

His bid for help unleashed a federal judge's condemnation of the U.S. government's detention policies.

Dozens more held at Guantanamo, cut off from the outside world and lacking English language skills or any knowledge of the justice system, are still seeking representation from other detainees -- who are either free now or have access to an attorney.

"It is often said that 'justice delayed is justice denied.' Nothing could be closer to the truth with reference to the Guantanamo Bay cases," U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler of Washington D.C. wrote in a ruling Friday, spurning the Pentagon's attempt to deny Bisher Al Rawi, another Afghan man held at Guantanamo, from representing his friend Al Razak.

Al Rawi would represent his friend with the help of the Center for Constitutional Rights, which has aided several hundred Guantanamo detainees, and New York lawyer Alan Sussman.

Al Razak's legal filings say he is not a member of the Taliban, al-Qaida or any terrorist group, but has been kept in isolation, repeatedly interrogated and severely beaten, put in cages without privacy, shackled with heavy chains and irons, exposed to extreme temperatures, sexually humiliated and subjected to violent behavior and psychological abuse.

Kessler wrote that Al Razak has been cut off from family, friends and indeed all of the outside world for more than three years, can't speak English, doesn't know the criminal justice system, lacks access to a law library, and has no criminal charges filed against him.

"He has every reason to distrust his captors and keepers. He has every reason to rely on the friendship of other detainees, who speak his language and suffer the same disabilities. He has every reason to challenge his detainment," Kessler wrote. "He cannot communicate with his attorney, nor does he even know at present that he has an attorney. He has no expectation of release, ever."

The Bush administration has argued that it has made numerous efforts to make lawyers available and that more than 200 of the detainees have filed a petition that allows a civilian judge to consider their cases.

DOJ_NMG_0101272

A Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey D. Gordon, on Saturday defended the detention policies at Guantanamo and said multiple reviews have been conducted for each of the people held there. More than 400 detainees remain at Guantanamo; several hundred were allowed to leave the prison for other countries, according to the Pentagon.

Gordon said that "humane treatment is the standard" at Guantanamo, which represents the culmination of a major undertaking to pick up hundreds of military combatants found in Afghanistan or trying to flee into Pakistan, among other places. A U.S. Army colonel is investigating allegations of prisoner abuse at Guantanamo Bay.

"Now they're going to face justice," said Gordon, who lacked an explanation for why the Pentagon had sought to block the dozens of prisoners from being represented from fellow detainees whom they considered friends.

Not so, according to Kessler, who wrote that just because "some of the unfortunate petitioners who have been detained for many years in the terrible conditions at Guantanamo Bay" were able to file a writ of habeus corpus doesn't show that Al Razak should have been able to do it for himself.

William Goodman, legal director for the center, said the judge's insights are universal for all the detainees, particularly those like Al Razak who need a friend to represent them.

"Many of these people are isolated, they do not know English, they do not know the Western legal system and they are intentionally kept in the dark by the Department of Defense," Goodman said. "There are probably well over 100 who have been in his situation, who have to clear this hurdle."

Warrantless Surveillance Issue Demands Scrutiny (CCCT)

Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times, December 3, 2006

The Bush administration's warrantless domestic surveillance program came to light a year ago this December. The president had authorized what was then a secret program that allowed the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on calls and e-mails between the United States and foreign countries.

Since then, President Bush has strongly defended the program, saying that the nation's security depends on allowing government agents to tap phone calls or troll for information relating to terrorism.

But many legal experts believe the president's program violates the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, enacted in 1978 to regulate domestic wiretapping. Under this act, the NSA must obtain warrants from a judicial panel before it can engage in wiretap operations.

The 11-member FISA court has approved thousands of wiretap operations, often retroactively. But this court's actions are geared toward specific cases. The spying authorized by the president apparently involves "trolling" for data by listening in on thousands or hundreds of thousands of phone calls and e-mail communications. This involves super computers programmed to search the data base for patterns of information, which makes it difficult to seek FISA court approval.

Critics of President Bush's action said that even if the broader surveillance program could be justified in this post-9/11 world, the president erred by not asking Congress to change the FISA law to make the operation legal and constitutional.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor ruled in August that the NSA program is in violation of both statutory and constitutional law. After Taylor's decision, the House passed a measure to overhaul the rules to allow wiretaps without warrants. In the Senate, Arlen Specter drafted legislation to allow the program to continue with legal review. Such efforts to codify the program are considered dead following the November elections.

This week, the Justice Department's inspector general said he will conduct an investigation to determine how the information obtained by the wiretap program has been used. He will also look at compliance with the FISA law.

The 110th Congress, soon after it takes office in January, must deal with this issue. If the Bush White House is right that new tools are needed to permit "data mining" to fight the war on terrorism, then those tools should be incorporated into law, with judicial oversight to protect the rights of American citizens.

If the NSA wiretap program violates the law, as Judge Taylor ruled, then Congress has the authority to direct the president to curtail it until legal oversight is provided. The FISA framework would simply need to be reworked. Oversight of U.S. intelligence operations is a responsibility of Congress. It must act to 1) protect our national security and, 2) protect Americans' constitutional liberties. Neither of these should trump the other.

Better Signs On Wiretaps (TENN)

Nashville Tennessean, December 3, 2006

A decision by the inspector general of the Justice Department to look into the controversial wiretapping program used in the war on terror could restore some public trust, although the scope of the probe is limited.

Inspector General Glenn Fine says investigators will look into how Justice used information gathered from the wiretapping at the National Security Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0101273

Fine had previously said no to a review, claiming the role should fall to the department's Office of Professional Responsibility. President Bush did not allow security clearance for investigators from that office.

Concerns were raised when word got out that the NSA was monitoring phone calls between people in the U.S. and other countries without court oversight. The news drew criticism from civil liberties groups. It did not build trust when the Bush administration reacted so strongly that even the existence of the program had become known to the public.

It is important to note that the Justice probe will not deal specifically with whether the NSA program breaks the law or violates the Constitution, but it was also notable recently that members of a special board appointed to examine privacy concerns expressed satisfaction with the way eavesdropping had been conducted.

The developments do suggest that a greater measure of accountability is in store.

The administration may find that with a reasonable amount of disclosure, more Americans will feel comfortable with the techniques being used. But anytime programs are cloaked in secrecy, they invite the very sort of skepticism and scrutiny the program has received. ·

WAR NEWS:

Rumsfeld's Memo Of Options For Iraq War (NYT)

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

Following is the text of a classified Nov. 6 memorandum that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld sent to the White House suggesting new options in Iraq. The memorandum was sent one day before the midterm Congressional elections and two days before Mr. Rumsfeld resigned.

Nov. 6, 2006

SUBJECT: Iraq — Illustrative New Courses of Action

The situation in Iraq has been evolving, and U.S. forces have adjusted, over time, from major combat operations to counterterrorism, to counterinsurgency, to dealing with death squads and sectarian violence. In my view it is time for a major adjustment. Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough. Following is a range of options:

ILLUSTRATIVE OPTIONS

Above the Line: (Many of these options could and, in a number of cases, should be done in combination with others)

¶Publicly announce a set of benchmarks agreed to by the Iraqi Government and the U.S. — political, economic and security goals — to chart a path ahead for the Iraqi government and Iraqi people (to get them moving) and for the U.S. public (to reassure them that progress can and is being made).

¶Significantly increase U.S. trainers and embeds, and transfer more U.S. equipment to Iraqi Security forces (ISF), to further accelerate their capabilities by refocusing the assignment of some significant portion of the U.S. troops currently in Iraq.

¶Initiate a reverse embeds program, like the Korean Katusas, by putting one or more Iraqi soldiers with every U.S. and possibly Coalition squad, to improve our units' language capabilities and cultural awareness and to give the Iraqis experience and training with professional U.S. troops.

¶Aggressively beef up the Iraqi MOD and MOI, and other Iraqi ministries critical to the success of the ISF — the Iraqi Ministries of Finance, Planning, Health, Criminal Justice, Prisons, etc. — by reaching out to U.S. military retirees and Reserve/National Guard volunteers (i.e., give up on trying to get other USG Departments to do it.)

¶Conduct an accelerated draw-down of U.S. bases. We have already reduced from 110 to 55 bases. Plan to get down to 10 to 15 bases by April 2007, and to 5 bases by July 2007.

¶Retain high-end SOF capability and necessary support structure to target Al Qaeda, death squads, and Iranians in Iraq, while drawing down all other Coalition forces, except those necessary to provide certain key enablers for the ISF.

¶Initiate an approach where U.S. forces provide security only for those provinces or cities that openly request U.S. help and that actively cooperate, with the stipulation being that unless they cooperate fully, U.S. forces would leave their province.

¶Stop rewarding bad behavior, as was done in Fallujah when they pushed in reconstruction funds, and start rewarding good behavior. Put our reconstruction efforts in those parts of Iraq that are behaving, and invest and create havens of opportunity to reward them for their good behavior. As the old saying goes, "If you want more of something, reward it; if you want less of something, penalize it." No more reconstruction assistance in areas where there is violence.

¶Position substantial U.S. forces near the Iranian and Syrian borders to reduce infiltration and, importantly, reduce Iranian influence on the Iraqi Government.

DOJ_NMG_0101274

¶Withdraw U.S. forces from vulnerable positions — cities, patrolling, etc. — and move U.S. forces to a Quick Reaction Force (QRF) status, operating from within Iraq and Kuwait, to be available when Iraqi security forces need assistance.

¶Begin modest withdrawals of U.S. and Coalition forces (start "taking our hand off the bicycle seat"), so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country.

¶Provide money to key political and religious leaders (as Saddam Hussein did), to get them to help us get through this difficult period.

¶Initiate a massive program for unemployed youth. It would have to be run by U.S. forces, since no other organization could do it.

¶Announce that whatever new approach the U.S. decides on, the U.S. is doing so on a trial basis. This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not "lose."

¶Recast the U.S. military mission and the U.S. goals (how we talk about them) — go minimalist.

Below the Line (less attractive options):

¶Continue on the current path.

¶Move a large fraction of all U.S. Forces into Baghdad to attempt to control it.

¶Increase Brigade Combat Teams and U.S. forces in Iraq substantially.

¶Set a firm withdrawal date to leave. Declare that with Saddam gone and Iraq a sovereign nation, the Iraqi people can govern themselves. Tell Iran and Syria to stay out.

¶Assist in accelerating an aggressive federalism plan, moving towards three separate states — Sunni, Shia, and Kurd.

¶Try a Dayton-like process.

Rumsfeld Memo On Iraq Proposed "Major" Change (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon, David S. Cloud

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 2 — Two days before he resigned as defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld submitted a classified memo to the White House that acknowledged that the Bush administration's strategy in Iraq was not working and called for a major course correction.

"In my view it is time for a major adjustment," wrote Mr. Rumsfeld, who has been a symbol of a dogged stay-the-course policy. "Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough."

Nor did Mr. Rumsfeld seem confident that the administration would readily develop an effective alternative. To limit the political fallout from shifting course, he suggested the administration consider a campaign to lower public expectations.

"Announce that whatever new approach the U.S. decides on, the U.S. is doing so on a trial basis," he wrote. "This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not 'lose.' "

"Recast the U.S. military mission and the U.S. goals (how we talk about them) — go minimalist," he added. The memo suggests frustration with the pace of turning over responsibility to the Iraqi authorities; in fact, the memo calls for examination of ideas that roughly parallel troop withdrawal proposals presented by some of the White House's sharpest Democratic critics. [Text, Page 28.]

The memo's discussion of possible troop reduction options offers a counterpoint to Mr. Rumsfeld's frequent public suggestions that discussions about force levels are driven by requests from American military commanders.

It also puts on the table several ideas for troop redeployments or withdrawals, even as there have been recent pronouncements from American commanders emphasizing the need to maintain troop levels for the time being.

The memorandum sometimes has a finger-wagging tone, as Mr. Rumsfeld says that the Iraqis must "pull up their socks," and suggests that reconstruction aid should be withheld in violent areas to avoid rewarding "bad behavior."

Other options called for shrinking the number of bases, establishing benchmarks that would mark the Iraqis' progress toward political, economic and security goals and conducting a "reverse embeds" program to attach Iraqi soldiers to American squads.

The memo was finished one day after President Bush interviewed Robert M. Gates, the president of Texas A&M University, as a potential successor to Mr. Rumsfeld and one day before the midterm elections. By then it was clear that the Republicans appeared likely to suffer a setback at the polls and that the administration was poised to begin reconsidering its Iraq strategy.

The memo provides no indication that Mr. Rumsfeld intended to leave his Pentagon post. It is unclear whether he knew at that point that he was about to be replaced, though the White House has said that Mr. Bush and Mr. Rumsfeld had a number of conversations on the matter.

Told that The New York Times had obtained a copy of it, a Pentagon spokesman, Eric Ruff, confirmed its authenticity. "As it became clear that people were considering options for the way forward, the secretary had some views on the subject, and this memo reflects those views," he said.

At the Pentagon, Mr. Rumsfeld has been famous for his "snowflakes" — memos that drift down to the bureaucracy from on high and that are used to ask questions, stimulate debate and shape policy. Mr. Rumsfeld's Nov. 6 memorandum, circulated as part of the administration's review of Iraq policy, is written in that spirit and with the same blunt aphorisms that Mr. Rumsfeld frequently uses in public.

Unlike the lawyerly memo on Iraq policy submitted Nov. 8 by Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, Mr. Rumsfeld's listed more than a dozen "illustrative options" that the defense secretary did not endorse, but suggested merited serious consideration. "Many of these options could, and in a number of cases, should be done in combination with others," Mr. Rumsfeld advised.

With Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation, the options no longer have the same weight. In recent weeks, some have been discarded as the Bush administration tries to adjust its military and political strategy in Iraq. But others, like increasing the number of advisers attached to Iraqi forces, live on and have also been recommended by others.

Mr. Rumsfeld, who has presided over two wars and is one of the longest-serving Pentagon chiefs, is scheduled to leave when his designated successor, Mr. Gates, is confirmed by the Senate, expected later this month.

Titled "Iraq — Illustrative New Courses of Action," the memo reflects mounting concern over a war that, as Mr. Rumsfeld put it, has evolved from "major combat operations to counterterrorism, to counterinsurgency, to dealing with death squads and sectarian violence."

The first section of the memo contains two pages of options that Mr. Rumsfeld describes as "above the line" ideas worthy of consideration. Some that Mr. Rumsfeld found intriguing appear to reflect his long-held view that the United States should use relatively modest force in intervening in foreign countries to avoid creating a dependency on American power. That approach, critics have charged, left the United States unprepared to deal with the chaos that followed the ouster of Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Rumsfeld has frequently emphasized the difficulty of stabilizing Iraq and the need to turn over responsibility to Iraqi authorities as quickly as possible. But he has also been a forceful, even cantankerous, defender of American policy, often insisting his critics were unduly pessimistic. On Oct. 31, just a week before finishing the memo, Mr. Rumsfeld told a radio interviewer, "I feel that we are making good progress with the piece of it the Defense Department has."

One option Mr. Rumsfeld offered calls for modest troop withdrawals "so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country."

Another option calls for redeploying American troops from "vulnerable positions" in Baghdad and other cities to safer areas in Iraq or Kuwait, where they would act as a "quick reaction force." That idea is similar to a plan suggested by Representative John P. Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat, a plan that the White House has soundly rebuffed.

Still another option calls for consolidating the number of American bases in Iraq to 5 from 55 by July 2007, a considerable shrinking of the American footprint. At the same time, Mr. Rumsfeld all but dismisses the idea of setting a firm date for removing forces from Iraq, listing it as one of the less palatable ideas.

One of the more provocative options would punish provinces that failed to cooperate with the Americans by withdrawing economic assistance and security. "Stop rewarding bad behavior, as was done in Falluja when they pushed in reconstruction funds, and start rewarding good behavior," the option reads. "No more reconstruction assistance in areas where there is violence."

Some military officers have said that the idea of denying assistance in some areas ignores the fact that many Iraqis are afraid to cooperate with the Americans for fear of retaliation by insurgents.

Falluja has been the focus of reconstruction efforts following an offensive by Americans that crippled city services and damaged scores of buildings, leaving the United States few options beyond rebuilding or evacuating the city. Now, it is considered by the Marines to be one of the few relatively stable areas in the dangerous Anbar Province. Many of the other towns in the region have become even more hostile because the economic assistance has been minimal, leaving the residents feeling neglected by the authorities in Baghdad, military officers say.

Then, too, work on infrastructure that sprawls across the country, like the electrical grid and the oil pipelines, network, cannot be limited to nonviolent areas.

"There is an element of throwing in the towel and effectively giving up on at least some areas of the country," said James Dobbins, a former State Department official and director of the International Security and Defense Policy Center at RAND.

In any case, administration officials indicated this week that withholding assistance was not under serious consideration.

DOJ_NMG_0101276

Reflecting exasperation with much of the American government, another option in the memo raises the possibility of using military reservists to “beef up” the Iraqi government’s ministries. “Give up on trying to get other USG Departments to do it,” he writes, referring to other United States government agencies.

Taking a leaf out of Mr. Hussein’s book, Mr. Rumsfeld seemed to see some merit in the former dictator’s practice of paying Iraqi leaders. “Provide money to key political and religious leaders (as Saddam Hussein did), to get them to help us get through this difficult period,” one option reads.

The list of favored options notably does not mention the “clear, hold and build” approach that the White House has touted as its strategy for waging counterinsurgency. That is a troop-intensive approach that calls for clearing contested areas with American and Iraqi troops, holding them with American and Iraqi forces and then carrying out reconstruction programs to win support. Nor does the list make the withdrawal of American forces explicitly contingent on improving conditions in Iraq.

The final page of the memo is a brief list of six “less attractive” options, which Mr. Rumsfeld describes as “below the line.” They include an “aggressive federalism plan,” an international conference modeled on the Dayton accords that produced an agreement on Bosnia and an idea that is currently being seriously discussed by senior administration officials: temporarily sending 20,000 additional American forces or more to Baghdad to try to improve security there and regain momentum.

Rumsfeld Called For Change In War Plan (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Two days before he resigned from the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld sent to the White House a classified memo recommending "a major adjustment" in Iraq strategy and acknowledging slow progress there.

"Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough," Rumsfeld wrote in the Nov. 6 memo.

Rumsfeld has made similar comments in public about insufficient progress in Iraq, both before and immediately after his resignation on Nov. 8.

But the defense secretary's unusually expansive memo also laid out a series of 21 possible courses of action regarding Iraq strategy, including many that would transform the U.S. occupation.

Michael O'Hanlon, a defense analyst at the Brookings Institution, said the revelation of the memo would undercut any attempt by President Bush to defend anything resembling a "stay the course" policy in Iraq.

"When you have the outgoing secretary of defense, the main architect of Bush's policy, saying it's failing, that puts a lot more pressure on Bush," he said.

The memo makes clear that Rumsfeld understood acutely the political implications of changing strategy.

"Announce that whatever new approach the U.S. decides on, the U.S. is doing so on a trial basis," he wrote in one of the bulleted options. "This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not 'lose.' "

He next advised: "Recast the U.S. military mission and the U.S. goals (how we talk about them) -- go minimalist."

Similarly, Rumsfeld advocated announcing "a set of benchmarks" for the Iraqi government -- "to get them moving," he added parenthetically, as well as to "reassure" the U.S. public that progress can be made.

The existence of the memo was first reported last night by the New York Times, which posted it on its Web site. The Pentagon confirmed the memo's authenticity.

Asked about the memo, White House spokeswoman Eryn Witcher said: "The president has said he's been dissatisfied with the progress in Iraq, so the right thing to do is reevaluate our tactics. There are a number of reviews underway, and the president is open to listening to a wide array of options."

Rumsfeld's ideas did not depart radically from the alternative strategies emerging so far from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group or from other military and governmental Iraq policy reviews initiated in recent weeks.

For example, Rumsfeld called for significantly increasing the number of U.S. military trainers embedded with Iraqi forces, and, in a twist, for "a reverse embeds program" that would place Iraqi soldiers with American squads, partly to boost the Arabic-language skills of U.S. troops.

Several options Rumsfeld raised involve withdrawing or pulling back the 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq as a way to pressure the Iraqi government to take greater responsibility for its own security. This idea, favored by many Democrats in Congress, has not been publicly embraced by Rumsfeld to such a degree. Still, Rumsfeld wrote that he opposed setting a firm withdrawal date.

"Begin modest withdrawals of U.S. and Coalition forces (start 'taking our hand off the bicycle seat'), so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up, and take responsibility for their country," Rumsfeld wrote.

Rumsfeld suggested using the security provided by U.S. troops in a carrot-and-stick approach, providing security only for provinces and cities that fully cooperate with U.S. forces. Similarly, reconstruction aid should go only to "those parts of Iraq that are behaving," he wrote, adding: "No more reconstruction assistance in areas where there is violence."

Options the defense secretary characterized as "less attractive" involved U.S. troop increases, such as a surge in U.S. forces into Baghdad or substantially increasing the number of American combat brigades in Iraq. The only place he recommended a U.S. troop increase was along Iraq's borders with Syria and Iran.

Rumsfeld's well-known frustration with other branches of the U.S. government comes through repeatedly in the memo and is far blunter than the secretary has been in public. He called for reaching out to U.S. military retirees and reservists to "aggressively beef up" Iraqi ministries, adding, "i.e. give up on trying to get other USG Departments to do it."

Similarly, he called for a "massive program for unemployed youth" but said it would have to be run by U.S. forces, "since no other organization could do it."

Retired Army Col. Andrew Bacevich, now a professor of international relations at Boston University, said his impression of the memo is that it is a "laundry list" of current ideas entirely lacking in analysis.

"The memo is a tacit admission of desperation and of impending failure," said Bacevich, who has been critical of the conduct of the war.

People in Washington familiar with the workings of the Pentagon and the media were suspicious of the motives behind the leak of the memo.

Retired Army Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton, an Iraq veteran who has been critical of Rumsfeld, said he was bothered by both the timing and the substance of the memo.

"For Mr. Rumsfeld to write this leaked memo, saying things aren't going well, is disingenuous and self-serving," said Eaton.

But he added that he did not think it would affect the morale of troops or officers serving in Iraq, saying he thought they would dismiss it as irrelevant "high-level politics."

Rumsfeld Memo Called For New Iraq Strategy (LAT)

By Josh Meyer, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

Days before resigning, the secretary urged new strategies, including troop reductions.

WASHINGTON — Two days before he resigned as secretary of Defense, Donald H. Rumsfeld sent a rambling memo to the White House in which he acknowledged that the current U.S. strategy in Iraq was not working and offered several diverging scenarios for reversing course.

In the classified, three-page document, Rumsfeld offered several options for reducing troop presence in Iraq, including some that were similar to proposals by Democratic critics of the war in Iraq and that have been sharply opposed by the Bush administration.

And he suggested one potentially controversial plan of action that had been used in a different form by deposed dictator Saddam Hussein — paying off "key political and religious leaders" so they would be more compliant with U.S. occupying forces in the war-torn country and its capital, Baghdad.

"In my view it is time for a major adjustment," Rumsfeld wrote in the Nov. 6 memo. "Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough."

Until his resignation, Rumsfeld frequently had said that the overall course of action in Iraq was working, even if it needed adjustments. And while he has said he bases his decisions on input from commanders, his memo is peppered with proposals that run counter to the advice of officers, most of whom have opposed redeployments or withdrawals.

Critics immediately seized on the memo as an admission of failure by one of the administration's primary architects of the Iraq war and its aftermath.

"This is an unbelievable memo. It is an admission of failure. It is more frank than anything that any [administration] official has said publicly in the three years of the war," said Joseph Cirincione, senior vice president for national security at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank.

In the memo, first reported Saturday by the New York Times on its website and titled "Illustrative New Courses of Action," Rumsfeld describes a "range of options" for the White House to consider. Many of them involve sharply drawing down U.S. troop presence in Iraq by mid-2007.

"Recast the U.S. military mission and the U.S. goals (how we talk about them) — go minimalist," Rumsfeld suggested. For instance, he proposed an accelerated shuttering or consolidation of most U.S. military bases in Iraq.

"We have already reduced from 110 to 55 bases," he wrote. "Plan to get down to 10 to 15 bases by April 2007, and to 5 bases by July 2007."

DOJ_NMG_0101278

Another option: withdrawing U.S. forces from vulnerable positions, such as cities and patrols, and moving them to a "Quick Reaction Force" status, in which they would operate from within Iraq and neighboring Kuwait.

Rumsfeld also proposed keeping high-end special operations forces in Iraq to target Al Qaeda, death squads and Iranians, but "drawing down all other Coalition forces," except for key U.S. advisors.

He suggested a new approach in which U.S. forces would only provide security for those provinces or cities that openly request it — "and that actively cooperate, with the stipulation being that unless they cooperate fully, U.S. forces would leave their province."

In areas where there is continued violence, Rumsfeld proposed that U.S. forces stop helping Iraqis, particularly with reconstruction efforts.

"As the old saying goes, 'If you want more of something, reward it; if you want less of something, penalize it,' " he wrote.

All told, such drawdown efforts would send a strong signal to Iraqis, Rumsfeld said. He described it as " 'taking our hand off the bicycle seat,' so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country."

Eric Ruff, the senior Pentagon spokesman, said the formulation of the memo evolved over a period of several weeks.

"There had been a lot of discussion over a period of several weeks; people were discussing different options and various approaches, and the secretary had some views on the matter, and the memo reflects those views," Ruff said.

The White House said President Bush was reviewing Rumsfeld's proposals, along with many others. "The president has said he's been dissatisfied with the progress in Iraq. So the right thing to do is reevaluate our tactics," said spokeswoman Eryn Witcher.

The memo was sent one day after Bush had interviewed Rumsfeld's appointed successor, Robert M. Gates, the former CIA director and president of Texas A&M University. But Pentagon and White House officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said they believed that the timing was coincidental, and that the memo had nothing to do with Rumsfeld's impending departure or any efforts on his behalf to keep his job.

In the memo, Rumsfeld offered alternatives to troop reductions. He proposed stepping up the public relations campaign in Iraq by announcing a set of benchmarks that would reassure the U.S. public and give the appearance "that progress can and is being made."

Even so, Rumsfeld cautioned that the administration should take steps to lower expectations and keep its options open.

"Announce that whatever new approach the U.S. decides on, the U.S. is doing so on a trial basis," he wrote. "This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not 'lose.' "

Lawrence Di Rita, Rumsfeld's press secretary from 2001 until May, said the memo shows how his former boss operates.

"He is always throwing things out there for people to consider. That is what good leaders do," Di Rita said. "This is his way of recognizing that our policy is in need of adapting to the realities" in Iraq.

A senior administration official said the memo should not be seen as Rumsfeld abdicating his long-held beliefs about the administration's strategy in Iraq. Instead, it shows how the defense secretary was trying to present the White House with all available options to consider when deciding how to go forward with the war in Iraq, he said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the memo had not been formally made public.

"This is vintage Rumsfeld," the senior administration official said.

EXCERPTS FROM RUMSFELD MEMO

`It is time for a major adjustment'

The situation in Iraq has been evolving, and U.S. forces have adjusted, over time, from major combat operations to counterterrorism, to counterinsurgency, to dealing with death squads and sectarian violence. In my view it is time for a major adjustment. Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough. Following is a range of options:

Illustrative options

Above the Line (many of these options could and, in a number of cases, should be done in combination with others):

· Publicly announce a set of benchmarks agreed to by the Iraqi government and the U.S. — political, economic and security goals — to chart a path ahead for the Iraqi government and Iraqi people (to get them moving) and for the U.S. public (to reassure them that progress can and is being made).

· Significantly increase U.S. trainers and embeds, and transfer more U.S. equipment to Iraqi security forces (ISF), to further accelerate their capabilities by refocusing the assignment of some significant portion of the U.S. troops currently in Iraq.

· Conduct an accelerated draw-down of U.S. bases.

· Initiate an approach where U.S. forces provide security only for those provinces or cities that openly request U.S. help and that actively cooperate, with the stipulation being that unless they cooperate fully, U.S. forces would leave their province.

· Stop rewarding bad behavior, as was done in Fallouja when they pushed in reconstruction funds, and start rewarding good behavior. Put our reconstruction efforts in those parts of Iraq that are behaving, and invest and create havens of opportunity to reward them for their good behavior. As the old saying goes, "If you want more of something, reward it; if you want less of something, penalize it." No more reconstruction assistance in areas where there is violence.

· Withdraw U.S. forces from vulnerable positions — cities, patrolling, etc. — and move U.S. forces to a Quick Reaction Force (QRF) status, operating from within Iraq and Kuwait, to be available when Iraqi security forces need assistance.

· Begin modest withdrawals of U.S. and coalition forces (start "taking our hand off the bicycle seat"), so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country.

· Provide money to key political and religious leaders (as Saddam Hussein did), to get them to help us get through this difficult period.

Below the Line (less attractive options):

· Continue on the current path.

· Move a large fraction of all U.S. forces into Baghdad to attempt to control it.

· Increase Brigade Combat Teams and U.S. forces in Iraq substantially.

· Set a firm withdrawal date to leave. Declare that with Saddam gone and Iraq a sovereign nation, the Iraqi people can govern themselves. Tell Iran and Syria to stay out.

· Assist in accelerating an aggressive federalism plan, moving toward three separate states — Sunni, Shia, and Kurd.

Rumsfeld Memo: Iraq Tactics Not Working (AP)

By Robert Burns,

AP, December 3, 2006

President Bush said Saturday he wants to hear all advice before making decisions about changes in Iraq strategy, even as it was disclosed that Donald H. Rumsfeld called for major changes in tactics two days before he resigned as defense secretary.

"In my view it is time for a major adjustment," Rumsfeld wrote in a Nov. 6 memo to the White House. "Clearly, what U.S. forces are currently doing in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough."

Existence of the classified memo was first reported by The New York Times on its Internet site Saturday evening in a story for the paper's Sunday editions.

Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff said he was not the source of the leak to the Times, but confirmed the memo's authenticity to The Associated Press late Saturday.

"The formulation of these ideas evolved over a period of several weeks," Ruff said in a telephone interview.

He said the options presented in the paper were Rumsfeld's personal ideas developed in conversations with a variety of people, not part of a formal Pentagon review that also is under way. Rumsfeld had previously said publicly that he believed U.S. efforts in Iraq were not working well enough or fast enough, but he has not called for a "major adjustment" in the U.S. approach to stabilizing Iraq.

Ruff also emphasized that Rumsfeld does not endorse any one particular recommendation, and that he notes in the memo that "many of these options could and, in a number of cases, should be done in combination with others."

Lawrence Di Rita, who was Rumsfeld's chief spokesman before he left the Pentagon last spring, said in a telephone interview Saturday evening that the broad range of options presented by Rumsfeld belies the notion, often cited by his critics, that he is inflexible and reluctant to consider alternative approaches.

"I see this thing as classic Rumsfeld," Di Rita said. "This is the way he operates."

The president acknowledged the difficulties in Iraq in his Saturday radio address and said: "I recognize that the recent violence in Iraq has been unsettling. Many people in our country are wondering about the way forward. The work ahead will not be easy, yet by helping Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki strengthen Iraq's democratic institutions and promote national reconciliation, our military leaders and diplomats can help put Iraq on a solid path to liberty and democracy."

Bush added: "The decisions we make in Iraq will be felt across the broader Middle East."

The president is under pressure to decide a new blueprint for U.S. involvement in Iraq. A bipartisan commission headed by James A. Baker III, a former Republican secretary of state and Bush family friend from Texas, and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana is to present its recommendations to Bush in the coming week.

There is no hint in the memo Rumsfeld sent to the White House a day before the Nov. 7 elections that he intended to resign. However, a person familiar with the sequence of those events told the AP that Rumsfeld did know when he wrote it that he would be leaving. The person discussed the matter on condition of anonymity.

Bush announced Rumsfeld's impending departure the day after Democrats won control of the House and Senate. The president has designated Robert Gates to replace Rumsfeld.

Before listing options for change — many of which are similar to various proposals by people in and out of government, including Democratic critics in Congress — Rumsfeld noted that the situation in Iraq "has been evolving" and said U.S. forces have adjusted from "major combat operations, to counterterrorism, to counterinsurgency, to dealing with death squads and sectarian violence."

Rumsfeld said the administration should "announce that whatever new approach the U.S. decides on, the U.S. is doing so on a trial basis. This will give us the ability to readjust and move to another course, if necessary, and therefore not `lose.'"

Specifics on his options checklist:

_"Publicly announce a set of benchmarks agreed to by the Iraqi government and the U.S. ... to chart a path ahead for the Iraqi government and Iraqi people (to get them moving) and for the U.S. public (to reassure them that progress can and is being made)."

_"Significantly increase U.S. trainers and embeds, and transfer more U.S. equipment to Iraqi security forces."

_"Initiate a reverse embeds program ... by putting one or more Iraqi soldiers with every U.S. and possibly coalition squad."

_Aggressively beef up Iraqi ministries by reaching out to U.S. military retirees and Reserve and National Guard volunteers.

_Conduct an accelerated drawdown of U.S. bases, noting they have already been reduced from 110 to 55. "Plan to get down to 10 to 15 bases by April 2007, and to 5 bases by July 2007."

_"Retain high-end ... capability ... to target al-Qaida, death squads, and Iranians in Iraq, while drawing down all other coalition forces, except those necessary to provide certain key enablers" for Iraqi forces.

_Provide U.S. security forces "only for those provinces or cities that openly request U.S. help and that actively cooperate."

_Stop rewarding "bad behavior" with reconstruction funds and start rewarding "good behavior."

_"Position substantial U.S. forces near the Iranian and Syrian borders to reduce infiltration and, importantly, reduce Iranian influence on the Iraqi government."

_Withdraw U.S. forces from vulnerable positions and move to a quick reaction force status, operating from within Iraq and Kuwait, to be available when Iraqi security forces need assistance.

_"Begin modest withdrawals of U.S. and coalition forces (start `taking our hand off the cycle seat') so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country."

Rumsfeld also listed a handful of "below the line" (less attractive) options that included continuing on the current path, moving a large fraction of all U.S. forces in Iraq into Baghdad, increasing U.S. forces substantially, setting a firm withdrawal date and pushing "an aggressive federalism plan" that would lead to three separate states — Sunni, Shia and Kurd.

Baghdad Market Is Hit By 3 Bombs (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec 2 -- A triple car bombing struck a busy shopping district Saturday, killing at least 51 people and wounding more than 90 in an attack timed to inflict as many casualties as possible, according to Iraqi officials.

Three parked cars exploded just before dinnertime as shoppers were buying meat, fruit and vegetables in the bustling majority Shiite neighborhood of Sadriyah. Columns of black smoke hovered above buildings.

The bombing occurred a day after U.S. and Iraqi forces raided the nearby Sunni neighborhood of Fadhil, capturing dozens of suspected Sunni Arab insurgents. It was the deadliest attack since a barrage of car bombs, mortars and missiles hit the Shiite slums of Sadr City on Nov. 23, killing more than 200 people.

And in a pattern indicative of sectarian violence, the Interior Ministry said 44 bodies had been found in Baghdad in a 24-hour period, most of them shot.

Meanwhile, U.S. and Iraqi forces on Saturday launched an offensive in Baqubah, the provincial capital of Diyala province, about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. The operation resulted in the arrest of 44 insurgents and the release of a 16-year-old kidnapping victim who was held for ransom for 25 days.

The offensive also led to the seizure of several car bombs that were ready to detonate as well as weapons and posters that encouraged sectarian violence, Iraqi army officials said. Saturday's operation came two days after the U.S. military said in a statement that Baqubah was fully operational.

As the fierce clashes occurred, gunmen opened fire on a man and his son in Aswad district, west of Khalis, 10 miles northwest of Baqubah, killing them both, Lt. Ali Khayyam said.

DOJ_NMG_0101281

Elsewhere, a roadside bomb killed a driver in Musayyib and armed men attacked a criminal intelligence commissioner's house in the pre-dawn hours of Saturday in the town of Iskandariyah. The assailants injured the commissioner and shot a missile at the house, but he started shooting back, killing two of the assailants. The gun battle continued until Iraqi forces arrived.

In al-Wahada, 22 miles south of Baghdad, a truck rammed into a bus stop, killing about 20 people, wounding 15 and crushing several cars, police said.

Clashes also broke out Saturday between insurgents and U.S. troops in the predominantly Sunni city of Duluiyah, 45 miles north of Baghdad, police Capt. Qassim Mohammed told the Associated Press.

In Anbar province, a U.S. soldier assigned to 1st Battalion, 1st Armored Division, died Friday from "wounds sustained due to enemy action," the military said Saturday.

In the west Baghdad neighborhood of Jihad, special Iraqi army forces, along with U.S. advisers, captured a member of an insurgent cell believed to have directed car bombing attacks, the military said. The Iraqi forces detained five additional suspects during the raid and confiscated several assault rifles.

At Least 51 Killed In Baghdad (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

BAGHDAD — Car bombs and mortar attacks killed at least 51 people in Baghdad on Saturday as Prime Minister Nouri Maliki met with tribal leaders from a Shiite stronghold in an attempt to mend his fractured government.

"The enemies are trying to disperse us, but they will not be able to," Maliki said, appearing on state-run Al Iraqiya television with 65 representatives of the Sadr City slum who reportedly asked Maliki for more police to patrol the neighborhood.

Sadr City is the stronghold of anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada Sadr. Thirty legislators and six Cabinet ministers loyal to Sadr suspended participation in parliament and Maliki's government Wednesday to protest the prime minister's meeting with President Bush last week in Amman, Jordan.

As Saturday's meeting took place, violence continued in the capital and beyond. The Interior Ministry said 44 bodies were discovered in Baghdad during the previous 24 hours. Most of the victims were middle-aged and had been shot and stripped of identification.

At least half a dozen other Iraqis died in clashes across the country. The U.S. military reported the death of a soldier who had been injured in combat in western Al Anbar province.

In Baghdad, two car bombs exploded Saturday afternoon in the market area of Sadriya and one in the market at Hafidh Qadhi, about 100 yards away, said police Lt. Haitham Kamil. Three mortar attacks followed soon afterward in the same areas, police said.

By nightfall, no one had claimed responsibility for the attacks. Firefighters were still battling flames near the charred remains of numerous victims, a witness said.

The injured filled the hallways at three hospitals.

"We are so overwhelmed that we have left many of the injured in the hallways due to lack of space," a medical assistant at Kindi Hospital said.

Deputy Prime Minister Salam Zikam Ali Zubaie, a member of the major Sunni legislative bloc, was targeted by gunmen while his convoy was traveling in Ghazaliya, a majority Sunni area of Baghdad, police said. He was unharmed, but one of his bodyguards was injured.

Rockets struck near the office of Adnan Dulaimi, leader of a major Sunni party within Zubaie's bloc.

Dulaimi said he was meeting with Sunni and Shiite leaders at a northwest Baghdad mosque to discuss local security at the time of the attack. They watched five rockets strike the area, hitting a school and a mosque, then a nearby house, killing two men and injuring a third.

Dulaimi said he believed that he was targeted by Shiites and that Maliki's government has not protected him.

"I think today is part of the latest escalation, every day hurting and disastrous events that destroy the country and especially Baghdad," he said, urging Shiite politicians who are boycotting Maliki's government to return.

Maliki met Bush a week after bombings and mortar attacks in Sadr City killed at least 215 people and left more than 200 wounded.

The Sadr City tribal leaders who met with Maliki for a half hour Saturday asked him to hire more local people to patrol their Baghdad neighborhood, increasing the police force from 1,460 to 7,000 officers, said Samir Awad, an Iraqi journalist who helped arrange the meeting.

Awad said the Sadr City representatives also proposed a nationwide meeting of tribal leaders from various groups.

DOJ_NMG_0101282

In Jordan, Abdelaziz Hakim, a prominent Iraqi Shiite figure who leads a parliamentary bloc comparable in size to Sadr's, spoke out against suggestions that an international summit could address sectarian divisions. Hakim insisted that Iraq's conflicts are political, not sectarian, and could be resolved internally. U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan had suggested the meeting.

"It is illogical, unacceptable and incorrect for the Iraqi people that issues related to their self-determination and destiny be decided and molded through international conferences," said Hakim, who leads the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. He is scheduled to meet with Bush on Monday.

Meanwhile, Iraqi and U.S. troops launched a joint operation in Baqubah, a city about 35 miles northwest of Baghdad that has been under curfew since Friday morning because of insurgent attacks.

Gunmen were walking the streets Saturday, attacking homes and killing residents, witnesses said.

"This military operation is designed to separate the terrorists from the honorable people of Baqubah and better enable the Iraqi security forces to maintain a secure and stable environment," said Col. David Sutherland, commander of 3rd Brigade Combat Team of the U.S. Army's 1st Cavalry Division.

Military officials said three suspected insurgents were killed in Baqubah and 44 were detained. Soldiers also freed a 16-year-old captive who had been held for 25 days.

U.S. forces in helicopters, jets, scout planes and 20 vehicles launched another assault late Saturday in Duluiya, about 55 miles north of Baghdad, clashing with gunmen, police said.

Baghdad's Yarmouk Hospital came under fire from attackers with machine guns.

They traded fire with police and soldiers at the front gate for half an hour, killing a police officer and injuring three people before the attackers escaped, police said. Staff members said the hospital manager had earlier received anonymous threats that the building would be hit with mortar rounds or bombs if it continued to treat police and soldiers.

Among the other Iraqis killed Saturday were two people on their way to a funeral in the holy city of Najaf, a contractor in the northern city of Mosul who supplied food to U.S. troops, and two people in the southern city of Iskandariya — a driver killed by a roadside bomb and a 25-year-old man shot by U.S. troops while he was attempting to plant a bomb.

51 Dead In Bombings In Iraq Shiite Area (AP)

By Kim Gamel, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 3, 2006

A triple car bombing struck a food market in a predominantly Shiite area in central Baghdad on Saturday, killing at least 51 people a day after a U.S.-Iraqi raid against Sunni insurgents in a nearby neighborhood.

Three parked cars blew up nearly simultaneously as shoppers were buying fruit, vegetables, meat and other items in the busy al-Sadriyah district.

The blasts sent clouds of black smoke over concrete high-rises in the area, which has narrow alleys that made it difficult for ambulances and fire trucks to navigate. At least 51 people were killed and 90 wounded, said police Lt. Mohammed Khayoun and hospital officials.

A cheese vendor who was wounded said the market was full of people shopping on their way home from work.

"We heard a big explosion from the western side of the area and the second from the eastern side. After one minute the third explosion took place near us," Ahmed Salman said from a hospital bed.

It was one of the worst incidents since a bombing and mortar attack killed 215 people and wounded more than 200 in the Shiite district of Sadr City in Baghdad on Nov. 23 amid escalating sectarian conflict.

Nobody claimed responsibility for the attack, but it followed a Friday raid by Iraqi forces backed by U.S. helicopters targeting Sunni insurgents in al-Fadhil, less than a half mile away.

The Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars in Iraq condemned the al-Fadhil raid in a statement Saturday, alleging six people were killed and 13 detained.

Iraqi police said Friday that one Iraqi soldier and two civilians were killed in the fighting, and the U.S. military said 28 people were detained.

Separately, U.S. and Iraqi forces began an offensive Saturday in Baqouba, capital of Diyala province about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, where fighting has raged for a week between Sunni insurgents and police, the U.S. command said.

At least 36 suspected militants were detained during one pre-dawn raid in Baqouba, police said. Later in the day, state-run Iraqiya television said one al-Qaida in Iraq insurgent was killed and 43 detained, including two foreigners.

Ahmed Fuad, a senior morgue official in Baqouba, said the morgue had received 102 bodies since Nov. 22, only 20 of which had been retrieved by their families.

"We do believe that there are many bodies in some areas of Diyala province, but neither police nor ambulance could fetch them," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0101283

Clashes broke out Saturday between insurgents and U.S. troops in the predominantly Sunni city of Duluiyah 45 miles north of Baghdad, police Capt. Qassim Mohammed said.

Elsewhere, a truck driving at high speed slammed into a bus stop in al-Wahada, 22 miles south of Baghdad, killing about 20 people, wounding 15 and crushing several cars, police said.

Police Lt. Muhammed Al-Shemari said the crash did not appear to be accidental because the truck, an empty fuel tanker, had no obvious mechanical problems.

The driver fled the overturned truck but was caught by witnesses and turned over to police, al-Shemari said, adding that other witnesses found a body in the vehicle's cabin.

Another police officer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the probe, said the driver blamed brake failure.

A U.S. Army soldier was reported killed in fighting in the volatile Anbar province on Friday, the military said, raising to at least 2,887 the number of American military personnel who have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003.

Eight other people were killed in attacks nationwide, including a driver and his assistant who were shot to death as they were delivering soft drinks to stores in Baghdad's volatile Sunni neighborhood of Dora.

Iraqi police also found at least 46 bodies of apparent victims of sectarian death squads in Baghdad and three other towns. Forty-two were handcuffed, blindfolded and marked with signs of torture.

Meanwhile, the last of Italy's troops in Iraq returned to Rome on Saturday, a few weeks earlier than the date promised by Italian Premier Romano Prodi. Italy at one point was Washington's second largest coalition partner in Iraq, after Britain, during reconstruction efforts after Saddam Hussein was ousted nearly four years ago.

Whose War Is It? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

AMERICAN TROOPS must not be allowed to become helpless bystanders in Iraq's civil war. Nor can they become co-conspirators with a government intent on taking sides in this civil war. These two axioms should guide the Bush administration's Iraq policy in the weeks and months ahead.

The endgame to the administration's Mesopotamian adventure may be in sight, but the timeline cannot be dictated by U.S. electoral politics — whether the triumph of the Democrats last month or the needs of Republican presidential hopefuls in 2008. It should depend on the military and political situation on the ground in Iraq.

U.S. troops should remain in that country, but only as long as the Iraqi government is willing and able to stay above the sectarian fray. Indeed, despite talk in Washington of troop reductions, a short-term increase in the number of U.S. troops may be necessary to help turn the tide on the streets of Baghdad and elsewhere in the country. U.S. troops may have to become even more involved in fighting the Sunni/Al Qaeda insurgency directly and in disarming Shiite militias. But they should only do so if the fledgling Iraqi government proves itself an ally committed to building a state that represents all Iraqi factions.

Iraq's commitment, and America's

That question — what exactly is Iraq's government willing and able to do? — provided the dramatic backdrop to last week's meeting in Jordan between President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki. Bush's insistence that Maliki is the "right guy" to lead Iraq was belied by his own national security advisor, Stephen Hadley, who, in a memo leaked to the New York Times, wondered whether Maliki is simply too weak to crack down on the Shiite death squads run by his supporters, or whether he is unwilling to so do.

It's time to find out the answer. We don't know exactly what Bush told Maliki in private, but we hope he told him to clean up his Interior Ministry and to start arresting Shiite death squad leaders. U.S. forces might also execute — or at least threaten to execute — the outstanding arrest warrant on murder charges for Muqtada Sadr, who controls one of the largest Shiite militias and is now boycotting the government. Maliki needs to break with Sadr if he is to be a credible leader in the eyes of moderate Sunnis, and the U.S. needs to take on Sadr if it is to continue imploring neighboring Sunni nations to help bring stability to Iraq.

At the same time, U.S. forces must redouble their efforts to arrest the Sunni terrorists whose atrocities have so provoked the Shiites. Their leaders should be tried and punished; an end to impunity on both sides could help quell vigilantism and help erase the perception that U.S. forces are becoming bystanders to sectarian slaughter.

Security remains the necessary condition to the political development of a representative government, and an all-out civil war may soon make Iraqis yearn for the terrible old days of Saddam Hussein. Time is running out for the U.S. and Maliki to restore order.

Maliki has promised that Iraqi troops will be ready to take over from the U.S. within six months. Whether that's realistic or not, it's hard to imagine that the U.S. has any more time than that to improve matters. Bush needs to use the leverage gained by those 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq to pressure Sunnis and Shiites into peace.

Meanwhile, Bush could make the best use of the growing calls for withdrawal from Iraq to hint to Iran and Syria, very privately, that he might do just that. At the moment, Damascus and Tehran can afford to be spoilers, watching the U.S. bleed in Iraq while (so far) being spared the potentially chaotic consequences of a U.S. withdrawal. Suggestions that Saudi Arabia and Jordan might intervene to protect their Sunni brethren if an Iranian-backed Shiite Iraqi government were to rise in Baghdad, possibly triggering a regional conflagration, should give all sides pause.

These steps could bring pressure to bear on Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds to hammer out a new internal political compact that would keep Iraq intact but provide more local autonomy to deal with sectarian tensions. It would necessarily include a long-overdue deal to divide up the nation's oil wealth. Civil wars rarely end at the negotiating table until one side is defeated, or realizes it soon will be, or until stalemate or exhaustion sets in. That may also prove true in Iraq. But there is still time for the living to change history.

We recognize that none of this adds up to a tidy, satisfying road map; there are no easy exits from a quagmire. The quandary for Bush, in some senses ironic, is that the mission of removing Hussein and of turning the nation of Iraq over to its people has been accomplished — but the outcome is still disastrous.

What is the U.S. to do if a sovereign government that represents the nation's long-oppressed majority is intent on settling scores by engaging in sectarian violence? Having dealt with the international dimensions of the threats posed by Hussein's regime (while continuing to worry about the international threat posed by anarchy within Iraq), Washington cannot indefinitely be held responsible for Iraq's domestic travails.

Which is not to say that it cannot be held responsible now. The Bush administration, let's be clear, did botch the postwar occupation of Iraq. Its poorly planned, arrogant and ahistoric approach to the aftermath of the invasion has been a blow to U.S. prestige and will earn Bush a prominent place among the roll call of failed presidents.

The (mis)uses of history

Decades from now, historians will still be debating whether a more competent occupation would have succeeded in building the peaceful, model democracy the administration once talked about, or whether sectarian violence and civil war were inevitable regardless. For now, we can ask how the most powerful nation in the world squandered billions of dollars and tens of thousands of (mostly Iraqi) lives in such a fiasco.

It is often noted that George Marshall had more than three years to develop his occupation plans for Japan and Germany, while retired Lt. Gen. Jay Garner had 60 days to develop his for Iraq. Yet the fault lies not merely in the short time span but in the erratic nature of the planning, which was yanked from the State Department to the National Security Council to the Pentagon and from Garner to J. Paul Bremer III.

Each team spurned the work of its bureaucratic predecessors, and each refused to listen to their country's leading Middle East experts, whose warnings were interpreted as proof of ideological incorrectness. Each also turned a deaf ear to their British allies, whose experiences occupying Iraq after World War I were to prove shockingly relevant.

Historians may identify April 12, 2003, as the day the United States began to lose the peace in Iraq. That's when Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, responding to reports of widespread looting, declined to order up more U.S. troops to keep order and protect Iraqi lives and property. Instead, an irritated Rumsfeld asserted that the looting wasn't as bad as media reports made it seem, that it was an understandable result of the pent-up frustration of decades of repression and that "stuff happens."

"Stuff was tolerated" is more like it — and, as anyone familiar with the "broken windows" theory of crime prevention knows, failure to enforce law and order in small ways tends to encourage more brazen provocations. Veterans of conflicts past warned that day that if more troops did not arrive, terrified Iraqis would turn to their own ethnic kin for self-protection. No one was listening.

The administration's overreaching de-Baathification policy was another terrible blunder. Garner wanted to fire the top three layers of Hussein loyalists and leave Iraqis to deal with the rest, keeping some semblance of a civilian government in place; the Pentagon's Iraqi siren, Ahmad Chalabi, wanted to gut the ancien regime. Chalabi won, and thousands of low-level Sunnis were sacked and replaced by Shiites who saw no need to provide services to Sunni areas.

The senseless disbanding of the Iraqi army also helped bolster the insurgency. Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz erroneously claimed that the Iraqi army had melted away; without consulting the Joint Chiefs of Staff, he and Bremer scrapped the military's plans to order the Iraqi rank and file back for vetting, in exchange for a $20 bonus (six months' pay).

By the time the U.S. military got that order countermanded, it was July. The armed, unemployed and alienated Sunni soldiers didn't wait for Washington to make a decision. Some joined the insurgency. By the time Al Qaeda began to foment attacks on Shiites in August 2003, Sunnis distrusted and disdained the U.S. and had ample motive to make common cause.

The disbanding of the Iraqi civil service and military was especially damaging in light of the administration's haste to transfer sovereignty to a new government. To this day, Washington is paying the price for relying on governmental institutions that it essentially dismantled at the outset of the occupation.

Tempering hope with realism

The history is instructive and, as usual, the road to the present from the past is more apparent than the road ahead, which can at times feel like the quest for the least-disastrous outcome. Iraq can't be a threat to its neighbors. It can't be a trigger for a regional war. It can't become a hollow, failed state that plays host to international terrorists. That much is clear.

U.S. troops should minimize the bloodshed while there is a pluralistic government in place; widespread ethnic cleansing must be averted. These are murkier goals, harder to pursue.

As for the model shining democracy setting an example for the entire Middle East — well, Iraq's realities may have gotten in the way of this particular Washington fantasy.

And Now, Plan B (WP)

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

THE IRAQ Study Group appears likely to recommend a new course for U.S policy this week that, in important respects, corresponds with what the Bush administration, leading members of Congress and the Iraqi government already are proposing. The elements of that emerging consensus begin with a commitment to greatly increase the U.S. training and advisory mission for the Iraqi army. During the coming months, command of the army would be steadily transferred to the government, which would then lead the fight against insurgents and renegade militias. As that process went forward, a substantial reduction of U.S. combat troops would take place.

Both the study group and the Pentagon are reportedly considering a halving of the force of 140,000 American troops during 2007, though without adopting a rigid timetable; that's close to what Democratic Sens. Carl M. Levin (Mich.) and Jack Reed (R.I.) have called for. While it's not clear where President Bush stands, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said Thursday that he believed that Iraqi forces would be ready for the beginning of a U.S. withdrawal by June.

Mr. Bush is more likely to resist the study group's proposal for a new U.S. diplomatic offensive in the region. That's because it would include contacts with Iran and Syria, along with Iraq's other neighbors, possibly through an international conference. We believe that such a diplomatic initiative, aimed above all at encouraging an accord among Iraq's warring parties, is long overdue. But whether it occurs ultimately is less important than what happens inside Iraq: Outside actors, including the United States, cannot impose order or broker a political solution unless and until the warring Sunni, Shiite and Kurd factions choose to do so.

That's where the potential trouble for a new U.S. policy may begin. The study group proposals, like those being developed by the Bush administration, assume that the army and government of Mr. Maliki are worth a continued, if slowly diminishing, commitment of U.S. military support -- with an inevitable cost in American lives. But are they? Mr. Bush has made his bet: After meeting with Mr. Maliki on Thursday, he called him a "strong leader" and "the right guy for Iraq." Yet a leaked memo by Mr. Bush's national security adviser spells out doubts shared by many Iraqis and Americans. Though Mr. Maliki has frequently committed himself to a pluralistic and democratic Iraq, he has been either unable or unwilling to rein in Shiite militias or prevent his own government from pursuing a sectarian agenda. In fact, it may be that Mr. Maliki's government, the army or the political system as a whole are headed toward dissolution; the Bush administration needs a plan for that possibility.

But writing off the government now is not in the U.S. interest. The best remaining option for the United States lies in a long-term effort to bolster Iraq's political administration and army so that it defends the current constitution and slowly gains the ability to take on the enemies of the United States. First among those are the Sunni extremists linked to the Baath Party and al-Qaeda, which continue to inflict more than 70 percent of American casualties.

Giving up on the government, as advocates of a rapid withdrawal suggest, would simply concede the country to those enemies, as well as to Shiite extremists, and betray those Iraqis who believed in the U.S. vision of a democracy at peace with its neighbors. It would mean the destruction of American allies in Iraq and throughout the region. Mr. Bush, who commonly is accused of being out of touch with reality, made one statement last week that struck us as pretty rational: "This business about a graceful exit," the president said, "simply has no realism to it at all."

6 Militants, 3 Others Die In Iraq Raids (AP)

Associated Press, December 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- U.S. soldiers destroyed two buildings being used by insurgents in a town in Anbar province, killing six militants, two women and a child, the military said Sunday.

It was the latest of several recent raids during which women or children have been killed or wounded by U.S. forces as they attacked insurgents in residential areas. In some of the attacks, the U.S. command accused the militants of using civilians as "human shields" or buildings as "safe houses."

DOJ_NMG_0101286

On Saturday night in the town of Karmah, coalition ground and air forces killed six insurgents while destroying two buildings that militants were using, the military said. Searching through one of the destroyed buildings, coalition forces also found a weapons cache and the bodies of two women and a child, the military said, without providing the age of the women or the age and sex of the child. Three suspected insurgents also were detained.

Karmah, 50 miles west of Baghdad, is in Anbar province, the large area of western Iraq where many of the country's Sunni Arab insurgent groups operate.

"Coalition forces take precautions to mitigate risks to civilians while in pursuit of terrorists. However, terrorists continue to put innocent civilians in danger by operating among them," the U.S. military statement said.

On Friday, near Taji, just north of Baghdad, American soldiers killed one insurgent and wounded a woman in her 50s "who was being used as human shield by the terrorist," the U.S. command said. "Terrorists continue to deliberately place innocent Iraqi women and children in danger by their actions and presence," it said.

On Wednesday, two Iraqi women died when U.S. forces backed by aircraft killed eight al-Qaida in Iraq insurgents during a raid near Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, the military said.

The day before, American soldiers fought with suspected insurgents in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province, killing six Iraqis: one man and five girls, ages 7 months, 12, 14, 15 and 17, the U.S. command said. Another Iraqi woman was wounded. The military quoted residents as saying the building attacked "was a known anti-Iraqi force safe house."

Historic Task For A Top Negotiator (HC)

By Anne Belli

Houston Chronicle, December 3, 2006

James A. Baker III is sitting in his law office above downtown Houston, taking a rare break from his role as co-chair of the Iraq Study Group.

The former U.S. secretary of state is bristling at depictions of him as a sort of magician who will somehow make the nation's Iraq problems disappear.

"It's unfortunate," he says, a bit annoyed. "Expectations are totally out of control. There is no magic formula for our difficulties in Iraq."

That may be true.

But if anticipation has been great, it's because the 76-year-old Baker — a Republican who was also secretary of state and chief of staff for two presidents — has spent much of the past 35 years pulling rabbits out of hats.

Brokering Middle East peace talks. Winning bipartisan support for tax reform. And galvanizing international support for the first Gulf War, which booted Iraqi troops out of Kuwait.

"He has an extraordinary ability to look at a problem and get to the essence of it," said former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger. "He couples that with an ability to find an operational means to deal with it. ... Everybody knows how effective Baker was when he was operating in Washington."

'Critical moment'Indeed, the man now at the center of what Kissinger and others call a "critical moment in our history" is known as a master negotiator who often solves problems by forging bipartisan support and by turning enemies into friends.

Said former President George H.W. Bush, whose life and career have been entwined with Baker's for decades: "The expectations are indeed high on this latest assignment, the Iraq Study Group. I do not know how all that will come out. I do know that the country is very lucky to have this tough, able, seasoned man as so-called head of the group."

No matter what the panel's recommendations when formally released Wednesday, those who have known Baker well say his legacy as a statesman already has been sealed.

Looking out the window of his office, Baker gives an easy smile while recalling a time in his life when — as a Democratic lawyer and occasional voter in Houston — politics was the last thing on his mind.

"I never dreamed I would do all this," he said. "I was programmed to be a lawyer. I came from a long line of lawyers."

To prove his point, he walks to the wall beside his desk and points out old newspaper clippings and photographs of his grandfather, Capt. James A. Baker. The headline, "Work Hard, Study and Keep out of Politics," was his grandfather's advice and the title of Baker's recent memoir.

As he has recently joked during a speech before the Houston World Affairs Council, "For the first 40 years of my life, that's what I did."

Baker's great-grandfather, a friend of Sam Houston's, founded the law firm Baker Botts. And both his grandfather and father were well-known lawyers.

Baker calls his father a "wonderful man," a stern disciplinarian who instilled in him a strong work ethic, a deep discipline, a healthy sense of competition and a love for the outdoors.

DOJ_NMG_0101287

But perhaps the most important advice, Baker says, was what his workaholic father called the "Five P's" — Prior Preparation Prevents Poor Performance.

"People are often surprised to hear a man my age recite it, and without embarrassment," Baker writes in his memoir. "But this was a gift from my father that has helped me in one way or another almost every day of my adult life."

Baker attended Princeton University, where he began honing his political views.

He wrote his senior thesis about the clash in the 1930s between two powerful members of Great Britain's Parliament — Aneurin Bevan, an idealist, and Ernest Bevin, a realist. He argued in favor of the pragmatist Bevin.

The nepotism policy at Baker Botts, where his father still practiced, prevented Baker from joining the family firm after he graduated from the University of Texas Law School. So he took a job with Andrews, Kurth, Campbell & Bradley, where he built a career as a general business lawyer.

The father of four sons, he was living the good life in 1968 when tragedy struck — his wife, Mary Stuart, was diagnosed with breast cancer. She passed away just two years later when Baker was 40. The event was even more difficult because neither Baker nor his wife had told their sons she was dying — "a mistake I now profoundly regret," he writes in his book.

Finding a friendThe path out of deep depression was laid by his friend and tennis partner, George H.W. Bush, who asked Baker to help run his 1970 campaign for Senate.

Though Baker was a Democrat and had no political experience, he agreed to switch parties and aid his good friend. They lost the race, but their partnership would endure.

In 1973, Baker married Susan Winston, a family friend and divorcee with three children of her own. Their blended family now included seven children — six boys and a girl.

Baker was tapped in 1975 to be undersecretary of the U.S. Commerce Department. It was there, he says, that he made his first big mistake in Washington.

Believing a comment to reporters was off the record, Baker remarked that it was unlikely that the controversial Secretary of State Kissinger would remain in the Cabinet if President Ford was elected the next November.

When the statement was printed in an Oklahoma paper, Kissinger was steamed.

"There have been better beginnings to a relationship," Kissinger said in a recent interview.

Nonetheless, President Ford asked Baker to first become his chief delegate hunter in the primary against Ronald Reagan, then-manager of his general election against Jimmy Carter.

Baker was pinching himself.

"Here I was only seven years away from being a Democratic lawyer in Houston and running a campaign for an incumbent president in a very, very close election," he said.

The next year, after President Ford lost, the Bakers added an eighth child to their brood. Baker, hooked on politics, ran for Texas attorney general in 1978 and lost.

Soon after, his old tennis partner turned to Baker for help again, this time to help him run his first campaign for president. Bush lost the primary to California's then-Gov. Ronald Reagan. But Reagan asked Baker to become his chief of staff, joining Counselor to the President Edwin Meese and Deputy Chief of Staff Michael Deaver in a famous troika of power.

Shortly after Reagan's second term began, Baker and Treasury Secretary Don Regan decided to switch jobs and took the idea to Reagan, who approved it.

Baker flourished at Treasury, while Regan resigned two years later amid the Iran-Contra affair.

Top of his gameThe pinnacle of his Washington career, said Baker, came in 1988. After successfully running Bush's presidential campaign, he was named secretary of state.

During that time, he witnessed the end of the Cold War and the reunification of Germany, and made strides in the Arab-Israeli peace process and the coalition-building diplomatic initiative that preceded entering Kuwait to drive out Iraqi forces.

He also burnished his reputation for being one of the world's most influential negotiators, forging diplomatic ties through his realist policies.

"He was a master at being able to size up the domestic political situation in whatever foreign land he happened to be in order to accomplish something," said Margaret Tutwiler, who served as assistant secretary of state for public affairs and is one of Baker's closest advisers.

"After all," she added, "this is the man who got the parties in the Middle East to come to Madrid and sit at the same table, something that had never happened over 40 years."

Real nerve, and the willingness to exercise power the moment he's given it, also are Baker trademarks.

As deputy secretary of commerce under President Ford in 1976, he one-upped Kissinger just as the president was about to make a key speech.

DOJ_NMG_0101288

Kissinger, who pushed for unlimited import of Chinese textiles at the time, wanted wording taken out of Ford's speech and called Air Force One hours before the address and successfully lobbied to remove it. But Baker, suspecting the play, had asked to be called if that happened. He was, and he made an even more successful appeal. The wording was restored.

Years later, hours after President Reagan's inaugural parade — and Baker's first day as chief of staff — he fended off then-Secretary of State Al Haig.

As work crews swept up confetti, Baker, Meese and Deaver were meeting in the White House when Haig suddenly confronted them with a 20-page document naming him the person in charge of crisis management in the administration. The three balked, and Haig accused them of blocking an agreement he already had made with the president. Such a document was approved by the president a year later — but it put Vice President Bush in charge.

One more challengeAs President Bush's term was coming to an end, he asked Baker to run his troubled re-election campaign. Baker said that although his retirement speech from the State Department was one of the hardest things he's ever done, he owed it to Bush to try and help him win another term.

"When the president asks you to do something, you do it," he said. "But it was more than that. He was more than that. He was my friend."

Still, managing a friend's campaign is thorny business.

"Being a campaign manager for a friend is tough. It's tough," he said. "You always have families who have their own ideas about what ought to be happening."

Said his wife, Susan Baker, "It says an awful lot about George Bush and my man that they survived intact."

For his part, Bush says the two men are lifelong friends whose special relationship weathered highs and lows but endured.

"Over the years, there have been stories of a Bush-Baker rivalry," he said. "Those were nonsense stories. ... We remain good friends because I respect his service to our country, and I just enjoy being with him and Susan. He is almost a brother to me. We are close. Very close family friends. He cares about my family. I care about his."

Baker says unequivocally that without his old friend, he would not have been as successful.

"I tell you one thing with certainty, that I would never have done what I did in public service and politics without him," said Baker, who calls his former tennis partner "jefe," which means "chief" in Spanish.

After Bush's re-election defeat, Baker returned to Houston, accepting a job with Baker Botts, where the nepotism policy was no longer a problem. Then-managing partner Bill Barnett recalls how Baker warned that his name would be worth much less in two or three years.

"He wanted to make sure we understood that," Barnett said.

But that never really happened. Baker helped form the James A. Baker III Institute for Public Policy at Rice University and re-entered the national arena when he flew to Florida and helped George W. Bush secure victory there after the contentious 2000 election.

Last year, he agreed to head a panel reviewing the safety culture at troubled oil giant British Petroleum, and most notably, to co-chair the Iraq Study Group and take a fresh look at the nation's war plan.

Baker insists he agreed to help because the current president asked — not as a favor to his father. "It was 43 who asked me to do this, not 41," he said.

Slowing downLongtime friends and aides say the Baker of today is mellower than he was while at the height of his political career.

"All of us who worked closely with him have noticed how at peace, relaxed and happy he is," Tutwiler said.

Baker agrees.

"Life is so good now," he said. "My schedule is my own."

And he fills that schedule with hunting, fishing and golfing — often with his wife and other family members by his side.

"I was not as good a father as my father," he said. "I was so busy trying to make it in a competitive atmosphere."

His family got bigger a couple of years ago, when Baker discovered a whole new branch of the Baker family tree — an African-American branch, living in Huntsville.

Baker was in that town just north of Houston for the dedication of his great-grandfather's grave when a man walked up to him and identified himself as James Baker, his cousin.

"Boy, was I surprised," he said.

Although he later had the lineage researched, Baker took the man's word for it, and even introduced him and others in his family as long-lost relatives at several public appearances he made that day.

"He was such a gracious person," said Wendell Baker, 84, the former secretary's third cousin. They later met again at a family reunion, and are planning to do so again this summer.

DOJ_NMG_0101289

Baker's wife says she has watched her husband's faith grow deeper and broader over the past several years, as has his acceptance of life's curveballs.

"He has learned to take life as it comes," she said. "

But while her husband has what she calls "a great capacity for relaxing," Baker said he would go "stir-crazy" if he retired.

For now, though, all eyes are on him and the report he and others will deliver to the president next week.

Baker insists the main goal is simply to reach a consensus.

"The one thing we can do is present a report that will represent a unified approach on the part of both Democrats and Republicans — a bipartisan approach to the problems in Iraq," he said.

Is Baker A "Wise Man" Or A Wannabe? (LAT)

By Walter Isaacson

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

JAMES A. BAKER III has one great goal left as he hones his legacy: trying to make sure that the words "American statesman" appear in his newspaper obituary before the words "Florida recount." That's one reason he's so eager to make the findings of the Iraq Study Group, which he co-chairs, sagacious and bipartisan enough to ensconce him firmly in the pantheon of American "Wise Men."

I applaud the instinct. The Wise Men were a clubby, Cold War coterie; polished gents from a more statesmanlike era for whom sagacity was synonymous with bipartisanship. John J. McCloy was a Wall Street lawyer who helped run the War Department and then became U.S. high commissioner for Germany; Dean Acheson had been President Truman's secretary of State; W. Averell Harriman was a railroad heir who became President Franklin Roosevelt's special envoy; and Robert Lovett was a banker who became secretary of Defense.

The members of the group maintained their influence through much of the postwar 20th century. After they had grayed into elder statesmen, they were summoned back to the White House to advise Lyndon B. Johnson on what to do about the Vietnam War. At first, they suggested that he should stay the course, but by early 1968, they had generally come to the pragmatic and realistic conclusion that the U.S. had to disengage. Throughout their careers and into their old age, they were above all practical and realistic, beholden to no ideology or partisan agenda.

The question facing Baker today is whether he will end up being remembered as a latter-day Lovett, the most emblematic of the Wise Men, or whether he will fall on the other side of a subtle divide and be seen as more like Clark Clifford, who was a skilled statesman but remained a Wise Man wannabe because he could never quite shake his reputation as a partisan wheeler-dealer and manipulator.

By heritage and breeding, Baker most resembles Lovett. They had similar, indeed intertwined, backgrounds as scions of patrician Texas families. In the 1890s, Lovett's father and Baker's grandfather helped build the Houston-based railway law firm then called Baker, Botts, Baker and Lovett (the present James Baker is now a senior partner at the firm).

Like Lovett, Baker approaches issues with a cool yet vinegary pragmatism. Problems are meant to be solved, usually with a blend of firmness and negotiability devoid of emotion, ideology or sentimentality. There's one salient difference, however: Lovett was devoid of any partisanship. When Truman once made a political remark to him, he responded, "Remember, Mr. President, I'm a Republican." Truman replied, "Damn it, I keep forgetting." That's not a line likely to be uttered about Baker (who, among other things, oversaw the Florida recount in the 2000 election for George W. Bush).

Nor would it have been said about Clifford, who began his public career as Truman's counsel and campaign strategist. He was as smooth a Democratic operator as Baker has been a Republican one. Like Baker, Clifford had a velvet manner and the ability to touch his fingertips together in a way that could seem either sagacious or scheming, depending on who was watching.

When Johnson fired his controversial Defense secretary, Robert S. McNamara, in the midst of the Vietnam War, Clifford was called from semi-retirement to replace him. But as hard as he tried to appear like a wise old statesman, he continued to be dogged by his reputation as a political fix-it man and corporate operative whose hands, as time went on, seemed faintly soiled by partisan maneuvers and Arab money.

It is, unfortunately, easy to understand why Baker — and Lee H. Hamilton, Vernon E. Jordan Jr., Sandra Day O'Connor and the other estimables in his study group — have a difficult time achieving Lovett-like status in this day and age. The foremost reason is that foreign policy, like just about everything else in the age of blogs and cable TV and Florida recounts, is far more partisan.

In addition, politicians and the press play a substantially more aggressive gotcha game now than they used to. If he were around today, even a saintly gent like Lovett might have found himself on the defensive about the dealings of his partners and clients at Brown Brothers Harriman & Co., Union Pacific Railroad and Pan American Airways.

Yet there is a fundamental way in which Baker and his study group members resemble the wise elders of earlier eras. It is not in their nature to be transformationalists or radical visionaries, the way that the neoconservatives and democracy crusaders have been. When they congregate to stroke their chins and reach consensus, not a whole lot of crockery is in danger of being broken. Instead, they will generally tend to be cautious, pragmatic and (yes) wise.

This is partly institutional: Blue-ribbon consensus-seekers tend not to embrace radical or bold visions. It is also personal, especially in the case of the pragmatic realist Baker. He was the secretary of State who urged President George H.W. Bush not to try to occupy Baghdad during the Persian Gulf War in 1991, and he cautioned against the invasion of Iraq in 2003 before it even began.

Having been slammed for these positions by the neocons, he had a difficult time in his recent memoir suppressing his smug awareness that their transformationalist dreams are now seen to have produced what may be the worst foreign policy disaster in U.S. history.

If Baker and his posse can come up with a plan that salvages some threads of our national interest from the debacle of Iraq, and if he stays around to help implement it, that would be such an awesome magic trick that those of us who dabble with the first drafts of history should reward him by carving a niche in the pantheon for him somewhere between Lovett and Acheson.

It's easy to disparage stability and containment as foreign policy goals (as the neocons like to do) and to make fun of blue-ribbon chin-strokers. But the aspiration to be statesmanlike, even if it is partly motivated by the desire to polish a legacy, is a welcome trait these days. So too is the courage to be cautious and the confidence to be humble when it comes to foreign policy.

In our search for contemporary Wise Men, there is one irony that the builders of the original Pantheon would have noted. The closest person we have to a true Wise Man is someone who should be the easiest for the president to tap but, for reasons that only Sophocles or Shakespeare (or perhaps Freud) could explain, is actually the hardest: President Bush the elder.

He was a great realist who choreographed the end of the Cold War and the prudent execution of the first Gulf War. In lieu of him, his consigliere, James Baker, will have to serve as proxy. Fortunately, he is eager to don the mantle.

Walter Isaacson, chief executive of the Aspen Institute, is the coauthor with Evan Thomas of "The Wise Men" and the author of biographies of Henry Kissinger and Benjamin Franklin.

Even The Wise Men Can't Save Us In Iraq (WP)

By Daniel L. Byman

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Washington is abuzz as reports about the findings of the Iraq Study Group grow from a trickle to a flow. Doves hope that the group's endorsement of troop withdrawals will be the first step in a speedy exit from Iraq. Hawks hope that the study group will leave enough wiggle room to support President Bush's commitment to remain in Iraq as long as necessary "to get the job done." All sides, in short, are looking to James A. Baker III, Lee H. Hamilton and the other commissioners to evaluate current policies and chart a path forward -- a job that normally should be carried out by, well, Congress and the White House.

Unfortunately, the bipartisan study group is almost certain to disappoint these high and contradictory expectations. This is not a statement on the abilities or intentions of the panel's members; rather, it is the simple realization of the potential pitfalls -- tepid recommendations, partisan divisions, little follow-up and eventual irrelevance -- that have beset countless commissions, study groups and blue ribbon panels since the nation's founding.

Indeed, commissions are nearly as old as the United States. In 1794, George Washington created one to help mediate the Whiskey Rebellion; it flopped, setting a sorry precedent for many of its successors.

Commissions do not come about by accident. Most are created after a disaster or tragedy, such as the Warren Commission investigating the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, or the 9/11 commission, on whose staff I served. Others come about in anticipation of a long-term crisis, such as the 1983 National Commission on Social Security Reform. Often special panels exist because Congress or outsiders do not trust the executive branch to investigate itself, as in the case of the Tower Commission, which examined the Iran-contra scandal. Still other commissions enable leaders to feign decisiveness while they kick the can down the road, such as the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence, which helped policymakers appear responsive to the assassinations of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and Sen. Robert F. Kennedy. Finally, administrations create commissions because they want cover for an already planned change of course. "When it is hopeless," one veteran of several investigations put it to me, "people turn to a commission."

The Iraq Study Group has a touch of all these elements. It is investigating an ongoing policy disaster and proposing long-term solutions; Congress doesn't trust the administration to shift course alone; and all parties hope the commission will show that it is seeking new solutions and will provide cover for their preferred options. A tall order, and one unlikely to be met.

Just as politics leads to the creation of commissions, so, too, does it shape their membership. Political leaders of both parties often try to stack the ranks with their own people, and commissions are thus packed with inside-the-Beltway denizens.

For example, Brent Scowcroft, the independent-minded national security adviser under President George H.W. Bush, is the quintessential commission member. Scowcroft has led or served on commissions on strategic forces, arms control and defense management; he was on the Tower Commission; and he has headed groups such as the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board. Such people bring gravitas and knowledge of Beltway realities to commissions, but overall, the overrepresentation of Washington insiders seldom promotes fresh thinking.

Once formed, commissions must find and propose something -- almost anything. Imagine if the Iraq Study Group concludes that there are few good options for Iraq. Such a conclusion would be patently true, but would disappoint everyone and also lead to questions about why the panel existed at all.

In reaching their findings, commission leaders strive to unify their members; otherwise they risk seeing their recommendations swallowed up by Washington's partisan politics. But consensus has its price. As Philip D. Zelikow and Ernest May, the executive director and a senior adviser, respectively, of the 9/11 commission, have written, "Keeping peace within a large and diverse staff and avoiding the appearance of partisan tilt sometimes requires muting interpretation." Unsurprisingly, Bush and Bill Clinton emerged largely unscathed from the 9/11 commission report, while bureaucracies that are not tied to either party -- such as the CIA -- took the lion's share of the blame.

Commissions don't want their findings leaked piecemeal and criticized preemptively, so secrecy is at a premium. As a result, some of their suggestions are not fully vetted, making it more likely that a panel will issue a proposal that is less sound or is unnecessarily contentious. As Hamilton and Thomas H. Kean wrote in their book on the 9/11 commission, "Secrecy is a precursor to cynicism and conspiracy theories."

By their very nature, commissions are temporary creations, often lacking the ability to follow up on their own recommendations. In congressional investigations, hearings can continue as long as a problem lingers unresolved, but commissions are like bees: They sting once and then die. They can make a splash with their recommendations, but savvy bureaucrats know that even widely publicized findings are often forgotten within weeks. How many in Washington, for instance, can remember the good ideas buried in the 2000 report of the National Commission on Terrorism, led by Ambassador L. Paul Bremer?

One of the innovations of the 9/11 commission was a follow-up effort -- known as the 9/11 Public Discourse Project -- that watchdogged the implementation of the panel's recommendations and gave various bureaucracies lousy grades in a widely publicized report card. Yet even that effort has fallen short at times. Democrats in Congress, who have long campaigned on implementing the 9/11 commission report, quickly abandoned that pledge upon recapturing the majority. The leadership has deciding against reorganizing congressional oversight of the intelligence community -- one of the panel's key recommendations. Reform, it seems, is for the other guy.

Indeed, commissions' greatest influence often comes years later, when another disaster leads congressional staffers or mid-level bureaucrats to blow the dust off the old tomes. For example, recommendations from the Hart-Rudman Commission on U.S. national security in the 21st century and the Gilmore Commission on U.S. preparedness for terrorist attacks involving weapons of mass destruction eventually helped create the Department of Homeland Security. But it took the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, when the government began casting about for ways to protect the nation from further terrorism, for these commission reports to seem relevant again.

Of all the hurdles ahead for the Baker-Hamilton group, the most daunting may prove strictly political. Many commissions have addressed technical policy issues -- say, how to better protect vulnerable U.S. embassies or other facilities worldwide. But the Iraq Study Group exists not just to solve a policy problem, but also to fill a political vacuum. To date, neither the administration nor Democrats have admitted the horrific costs of either staying in Iraq or withdrawing troops. For more than a year now, some of the top minds in the military have thought hard about how to change course in Iraq and still win, and some improvements in doctrine and training have emerged. But broadly speaking, there is no technical fix to Iraq that is lying in a musty drawer in the Pentagon. And technical answers don't address the most difficult political questions: What are U.S. interests in Iraq? How would a pullout affect U.S. interests beyond Iraq? And how many more American lives and taxpayer dollars will we risk to protect those interests?

Commissions at times fall back on politically easy answers, or simply bypass the most important questions. Despite the centrality of Iraq to the fight against terrorism, the 9/11 commission basically dodged the war altogether, but it did have time to make a host of recommendations on intelligence restructuring and first-responder radio spectrums. Similarly, the otherwise hard-hitting Robb-Silberman investigation of the intelligence community's performance with regard to Iraq's WMD programs took a dive on the key political question in the public mind: whether the White House manipulated the prewar intelligence.

For the Iraq Study Group, a similarly easy answer would be an uncritical endorsement of "handing off" security to Iraqi forces -- a policy that the Bush administration and Democrats support, and one too often discussed as a nearly magical way to prevent a collapse in Iraq while drawing down U.S. forces. Yet the Iraqi army and police are corrupt, poorly trained, and penetrated by insurgents and militias. Reforming Iraqi security forces is vital, but it is a decade-long effort. They will not be ready to assume responsibility for security in troubled areas or otherwise ease the U.S. burden in the near-term.

The two leaders of the Iraq Study Group are experienced Washington hands who do not need to worry about their findings hurting their popularity or future job prospects. They are respected across the political aisle, and each is willing to criticize his own party's positions. But because they are unlikely to find a technical fix to the Iraq war's political problems, their greatest contribution will be initiating, rather than concluding, a broader debate on how to proceed. In such a debate, the best choices will not (and should not) earn unanimity. A serious escalation is probably necessary to "win" in Iraq, and this will require hundreds of billions more dollars and hundreds of thousands more U.S. troops. If winning is too demanding and politically unfeasible, then the United States must think creatively about ways to draw down significantly while still maintaining some influence in the Iraqi snake pit.

Washington has dithered long enough rather than face these hard, unpalatable choices. At best, the Iraq Study Group will catalyze our leadership and help foster the political will to accept this painful reality. But salvation? Forget about it.

Iraqi Shiite Leader To Prod Bush On Iran (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi And Qassim Abdul-Zahra, Associated Press Writers

AP, December 3, 2006

A Shiite powerbroker reviled by Sunni Arabs for his ties to Iran and a militia linked to sectarian violence will ask President Bush to seek Iran's help in their upcoming White House meeting and try to allay U.S. concerns over Iranian influence in Iraq.

Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who is due to meet with Bush on Monday, on Saturday dismissed speculation that his trip to the United States threatened the authority of beleaguered Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who came under criticism for meeting with Bush last week in Jordan.

"This trip to Washington was planned a long time ago and has nothing to do with the meetings that took place in Amman," al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, Iraq's largest Shiite party, told reporters in Amman, Jordan, before his departure.

Al-Hakim is arguably the most powerful Shiite politician in Iraq, but he prefers to work behind the scenes. He wanted a close SCIRI associate, Adil Abdul-Mahdi, to be prime minister after elections in December, but grudgingly accepted al-Maliki as a compromise. The two men have since maintained a public image of cooperation to safeguard the ruling coalition.

Speculation in Iraq that al-Hakim was emerging as a rival for Washington's attention was fueled in part by an internal White House memo that questioned al-Maliki's authority and his ability to handle Iraq's worsening security.

Written by National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley after he met al-Maliki in Baghdad, the memo also spoke of the need for the Iraqi leader to end his alliance with the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose militia, the Mahdi Army, is blamed for much of Iraq's sectarian violence.

The timing of al-Hakim's meeting with Bush raised the possibility that Washington may also be looking for additional sources of help as it tries to stabilize Iraq, allowing a drawdown on U.S. forces to begin.

Bush's pledges of support for al-Maliki and his Monday meeting with al-Hakim also coincide with an ongoing debate within his administration on whether to abandon efforts to persuade Sunni Arabs to halt their insurgency and instead leave that task to the Shiites and Kurds, according to U.S. officials familiar with the re-evaluation process.

Two al-Maliki aides and third close to al-Hakim said the prime minister and the SCIRI leader had discussed the White House visit. The aides, who spoke on condition of anonymity in exchange for disclosing confidential information, said al-Hakim was expected to try to persuade Bush to enlist Iran's help in quelling violence in Iraq. In return, they said, al-Hakim would pledge not to allow Iran to use him to promote its own interests, said by analysts to be "controlled chaos" that keeps the United States preoccupied with Iraq.

Al-Hakim has close links with Shiite Iran, where he lived in exile for years before he returned to Iraq after the 2003 ouster of Saddam Hussein's Sunni-led regime. His Badr Brigade militia, trained and armed by the Iranians, is blamed for some of Iraq's sectarian violence.

Badr, however, has mostly stayed out of the limelight, leaving the focus on another Shiite militia, the less disciplined and less secretive Mahdi Army.

Al-Hakim's militia links and close ties to Iran, however, have gone unmentioned by Washington, perhaps in recognition of his political leverage.

DOJ_NMG_0101293

The two al-Maliki aides, meanwhile, said the Iraqi prime minister won a pledge from Bush to avoid directly involving Washington's Sunni Arab allies — like Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia — who have become alarmed at the rise of Iraq's majority Shiites.

The two aides, who were both briefed by al-Maliki on his meeting, also said Bush again demanded assurances from the Iraqi leader that he would deal swiftly with the Mahdi Army.

Al-Maliki, they said, countered that the militia would cease to be a problem when Iraq's security forces take over from the U.S. military, which al-Maliki said will happen by June.

Al-Maliki has yet to take any concrete action against the Mahdi Army. Al-Sadr's support ensured al-Maliki's election to his job and many in Iraq believe that beholds him to the radical cleric.

The aides, however, said al-Maliki remained committed to diplomacy in dealing with al-Sadr and his militia for the time being and sought to play down the boycott of the government and parliament by 30 lawmakers and five Cabinet members loyal to al-Sadr.

The boycott was announced Wednesday to protest against al-Maliki's meeting with Bush, an encounter the Sadrists said amounted to an insult to Iraqis. They said a timetable for the withdrawal of foreign troops in Iraq and an improvement in public services like electricity were their condition to end the boycott.

"We have not abandoned al-Maliki, but we ask that he too does not abandon us," said Sadrist lawmaker Nasser al-Saadi. "We are an important part of the government and if al-Maliki took our boycott to be an embarrassment to him, so be it. We don't care."

Hendawi was reporting in Baghdad; Abdul-Zahra was in Amman, Jordan.

Exodus From Iraq Unsettles Mideast (BOS)

By Thanassis Cambanis

The Boston Globe, December 3, 2006

AMMAN, Jordan -- As Iraq's bloodshed worsens, the tide of refugees fleeing the country is straining the region's resources and inflaming fears that Iraq's sectarian conflict might spread to neighboring countries.

A new United Nations report says Iraq is "hemorrhaging" refugees in staggering numbers. Anywhere from 2,000 to 3,000 people are fleeing the country every day.

After 3 1/2 years of nearly constant warfare, at least 1.5 million Iraqi refugees have moved to neighboring countries, reshaping the already complex demographic mosaics of Jordan, Syria, and Lebanon. The influx has prompted government crackdowns and anger from local populations who feel refugees are grabbing scarce jobs and resources.

Another 1.5 million people are displaced inside Iraq, many of them clamoring to leave but lacking the resources. Humanitarian agencies fear this group will drive a continued exodus that could quickly double the already massive refugee population in the region.

The mass migration out of the country is transforming the region's culture, a diaspora rivaled in size only by the 3 million Palestinian refugees, including descendants of those who fled conflicts with Israel since 1948. With no end in sight to the fighting in Iraq, governments in Syria and Jordan worry that Iraqis are becoming the new Palestinians -- a permanent refugee population that will import its sectarian and religious squabbles into the host countries.

But what makes this spiraling refugee crisis different, and uniquely unsettling to Iraq's neighbors, is that a great proportion of those with the resources to flee are rich and well-educated -- and thus able to command more influence than migrants with no resources.

Iraq's refugee crisis has had the most pronounced effect on Jordan, a US-allied kingdom with a population of only 4 million, as many as half of whom are Palestinian refugees.

An estimated 700,000 Iraqis are living in Jordan in a semi-legal limbo. The richest and most powerful Iraqis have long had offices and second homes in Amman, from where they can conduct business and politics with far more safety than in Baghdad.

Until recently, when Jordan began turning away Iraqis at the border, the poorest also poured into Amman -- the most convenient major city, with relatively convenient access to Iraq.

In the first two years of the war, Jordan admitted the refugees with few restrictions. But when Iraqi suicide bombers struck three Amman hotels a year ago, the kingdom reversed course, limiting the number of residency permits, turning away men between the ages of 18 and 35, and rounding up and deporting Iraqis.

Mustafa Ahmed, 29, an unemployed blacksmith, roams Amman's poor downtown, a warren of cheap clothing stores, flophouses, and street corners where day laborers seek jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0101294

Ahmed said he's terrified that he'll be deported like his cousin, who was put on a bus from Amman to Baghdad two months ago when police caught him in a roundup. Halfway home, Sunni insurgents in Anbar Province pulled the cousin from the bus; when they saw his Shi'ite name on his identity card, Ahmed said, they executed him.

"If I go back, I will be killed on the road," Ahmed said, drawing a finger across his throat. Dressed in ratty workman's clothes, soiled jeans, and a dirty jacket, he spends his time drinking tea at a restaurant in downtown Amman frequented by other poor Iraqi refugees.

Syria is schooling the children of the 600,000 Iraqi refugees who live there. But Jordan has barred its already inadequate school system to Iraqis; only those Iraqis rich enough to afford private school can educate their children in Jordan.

Kristele Younes, a researcher who tracks displaced Iraqis in Lebanon, Syria, and Jordan for the nonprofit advocacy group Refugees International, said Syria has been the most welcoming country for Iraqis, but like other Arab countries was running out of resources.

"Very slowly but surely, Iraqis are starting to be treated like Palestinians," Younes said in a telephone interview from Washington, where her group is based. "There is a complete lack of political will in the region to admit that these people are not going home any time soon."

Another group, Human Rights Watch, issued a scathing report last week, calling on Jordan to treat displaced Iraqis as refugees, allowing them to stay until the conflict in Iraq subsided and granting them basic rights, including public education for children.

Jordan and Syria are wary of Iraqis spreading that country's sectarian strife. Most countries face their own version of Shi'ite-Sunni rivalry and work hard to keep it from becoming violent.

UN agencies and human rights groups said they have gathered anecdotal evidence, based on interviews with refugees, that Jordan is seeking to buttress its own Sunni Arab population by allowing Iraqi Sunnis across its borders but denying haven to Shi'ites.

The organizations have no hard data on the demographics of the refugees, and none of the host governments will release any information about the refugee populations inside their borders.

Syria, meanwhile, is ruled by a small minority of Alawites, a small breakaway Shi'ite sect. The same observers believe that Syria has allowed Shi'ites and Christians who will support the regime to settle, but made it hard for Sunni Arabs. An outer ring of predominantly Shi'ite suburbs around the Syrian capital, Damascus, has exploded in population over the last three years, absorbing most of the Iraqi refugees.

Bill Frelick, refugee policy director at Human Rights Watch, who researched and wrote the report on Jordan's treatment of Iraqi refugees, said Jordanians had recently started to block entry by young men and poor Iraqis.

"The people they're admitting are better off," he said.

Most refugees haven't officially registered with the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, which normally handles refugee crises, because the agency has no resources to handle the influx and has stopped processing claims for refugee status. Aid groups have called on international donors -- in particular the United States and Britain, which led the invasion of Iraq -- to help host countries cover the costs of refugees.

But according to the UN estimates, Iraq is the second-greatest producer of refugees in the world, after Afghanistan. The actual number of refugees could easily top 2 million, UN officials said. About 10 percent of Iraq's prewar population of 26 million has fled the country over the last three years.

"Iraq is hemorrhaging. The humanitarian crisis which the international community had feared in 2003 is now unfolding," the UN High Commissioner for Refugees said in its November update. And because of insufficient resources in countries like Jordan and Syria, "tolerance is growing thin," the report added.

In Jordan, a population already suffering from high unemployment has begun to turn against the wealthy Iraqis who have snapped up apartments, created jobs -- usually for other Iraqis -- and created an investment boom that only benefits the very rich.

"They have driven up the prices of everything. They have brought nothing good here," said Nawruz Abida, who delivers tea and water pipes to downtown Amman shops. His family's rent has doubled since the influx of Iraqi refugees, Abida said.

Host countries are all too aware of Iraq's history of conflict.

Amman has become a home away from home for many Sunni Arabs sympathetic to the nationalist insurgency. Even before the fall of Saddam Hussein, Ba'athists and wealthy supporters of the regime had long had business and political ties to the elite in Jordan and Syria, and many now have taken refuge there.

"Only bringing back Saddam can restore stability," said Saleh Jabouri, a merchant who fled Baghdad six months ago and now moves between Damascus and Amman whenever his tourist visa expires.

Abbas F. Shamara, an Iraqi Shi'ite whose company builds power plants in Iraq, runs millions of dollars worth of construction projects in Jordan and the rest of the Middle East. He has homes in Amman and Baghdad and is nominally a refugee -- but he has residency in Jordan and has enrolled his three children in school there.

Shamara, 53, advises a senior Shi'ite cleric in Baghdad and commands the ear of many influential Americans and Iraqis because of the money at his disposal. His holding company has created several hundred jobs for Jordanians, and is building a new office tower in Amman, in part to blunt criticism that Iraqi migrants do nothing for their host countries.

"We've put millions of dollars into Jordan's economy," Shamara said in his Amman office. In contrast with Jordan, Shi'ites fit more comfortably in Syria, whose government is battling its own growing fundamentalist Sunni population. Syria has close ties to Iran, and last month restored diplomatic ties with the Baghdad government after a 24-year rupture.

With wealth and swagger unusual for a refugee population, the Iraqi exodus is already changing the fashion and the culture of the Middle East. That's no more apparent than in the nightlife of the cities the refugees now call home.

At 1 a.m. on a Tuesday at Amman's Al Zawyeh music club, a traditional Iraqi tribal singer belts out heart-rending folk songs about the nation, family, and war. It's a slow night; an older Iraqi couple sings along, and the woman rises from her table to dance slowly on the stage in front of the singer, Fadil Zeidan.

The club started out five years ago as a gallery for Iraqi artists, with Saddam Hussein as an investor. After the US invasion, however, and the flood of Iraqis to Amman, the gallery owners shuttered their restaurant chain in Iraq and turned Zawyeh into a music club.

Saif Ghariba, 24, the owner's son, said Baghdad's elite quickly reassembled in Amman and sought its old entertainments. The club has a distinctly Sunni and Ba'athist style, decorated with the heavy wood panels and well-lit whiskey bar characteristic of the haunts in Baghdad neighborhoods like Mansour and Jadriya that were fancied by the ruling Ba'athist class before the US invasion.

"Iraqis fled here and wanted to hear their music," Ghariba said. "Our music is full of poetry and emotion."

In Iraq, An Obligation Coming Due (WP)

By Michael Goldfarb

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Every time I read about the United States pulling out while Iraq takes the final step into the abyss of civil war, I find myself thinking of a conversation I had with my translator and my driver in April 2003 as the first phase of the war was reaching its climax.

We were coming back from inspecting the damage caused by American airstrikes in a small town at the edge of Saddam Hussein's control in northern Iraq. My translator, Ahmad Shawkat, and driver, Sami Abdul Qader, were chatting in Kurdish.

"What are you guys talking about?" I asked.

"Sami wants to know if you will help him and his family get out of Iraq if Saddam comes back."

"Is he joking?" I said with a casual laugh. "Tell him, yeah, sure, no problem."

"No, he is very serious," Ahmad said. "He cannot believe Saddam will go without a fight. Sami's afraid that because he works with Americans he will be killed."

"Really?"

"Really."

It took me a second to absorb this. Sami was absolutely fearless. Several days earlier we'd come under artillery fire while watching Green Berets and Kurdish pesh merga trying to secure a bridge on the road from Irbil to Mosul. Ahmad and I were roaming through pastureland with the Green Berets and Sami was with the car when the artillery piece opened up. All the other drivers working with reporters on the scene pulled well back. Sami stayed right down by the bridge as the shells came in, refusing to leave us behind.

That he was now genuinely afraid seemed odd, because what he feared was quite improbable. Baghdad was on the verge of falling. As we were having this conversation, American troops were preparing to pull down the statue of Hussein in Firdaus Square.

But my driver's fear was not without basis. I've seen what happens when the "international community" precipitously pulls out of conflict zones. To have had an American job -- working for journalists or for nongovernmental organizations -- is not a good thing at those times.

This is the way things work in war zones: We go, they stay. If the whole escapade falls apart, American journalists and relief workers are evacuated and can be swimming in a hotel pool, all expenses paid, by evening. Our translators, drivers and office managers return to their houses and wait in fear of reprisal against those who collaborate with the Great Satan.

And this is the thought that nags me now. I call a friend in northern Iraq (I'll omit his identification; bad people read this newspaper online at Internet cafes in Iraq). He works for an American nongovernmental organization as a trainer, trying to help people in Iraq relearn the "democratic mentality" gouged out of Iraqi civil society by a quarter-century of totalitarian rule.

We chat about the U.S. midterm elections, and he asks if it's really possible that America will leave Iraq. I assure him it is. Not overnight, I tell him, although I can see a dramatic reduction in troops by the end of 2007.

But they are building the biggest embassy in the world in Baghdad, he says, and what about the businesses Americans have started, and the oil?

I reply: My friend, you have no idea what will be left behind once the decision is made.

I think of this brave young man traveling all over his country offering seminars on democracy and wonder what will happen to him and those who have attended his training sessions when the United States draws down its force and says to whatever government is in place in Baghdad, "Fellas, it's on you." Provision needs to be made for their safety.

On the drive back to Irbil that hopeful afternoon 3 1/2 years ago, as the metaphorical noose was tied around the neck of Hussein's statue in Baghdad, I reached across into the front seat and put my hand on my driver's shoulder. I looked at my translator. "Tell Sami he has nothing to fear." I paused so he could translate that sentence. "Saddam is finished, but if anything happens, I will make sure he is safe. And his family."

When Ahmad finished translating, I turned to Sami, who spoke some English and said, "Okay?" It was an easy promise to make, since I believed I would never have to honor it. Now I fear I may have to.

"About Five Minutes Into It, We Had To Take Over" (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 2 -- The bullets flew from every direction -- from rooftops, windows, alleys and doorways.

Soldiers from the Iraqi army's 9th Division were pinned against a wall. They were under a covered sidewalk. According to accounts from U.S. forces who were with them on Friday, a suspected insurgent with an AK-47 assault rifle aimed at them from a doorway. Pieces of concrete fell as the insurgent's fire ripped into the wall above the Iraqi soldiers.

That's when they froze.

U.S. Army Sgt. 1st Class Kent McQueen, 37, arrived to help. As he tried to get them out, he was hit. The night-vision goggles perched on his helmet fell down his face. They were dented. He had been shot in the head. "God was definitely on my side," McQueen said Saturday.

The scene played out during Operation Lion Strike, the U.S. soldiers recalled. The goal was to capture insurgents in the Fadhil district of central Baghdad. It was the first time the Iraqi army's 9th Division was to be in complete control of an operation in the two years it has been training under the Americans. Teams of U.S. advisers remained close, but planned to leave the fighting to the Iraqis.

"It started out that way. But about five minutes into it, we had to take over," Staff Sgt. Michael Baxter, 35, said.

While the battle was in progress, U.S. military leaders had called it an "outstanding" example of Iraqi forces taking charge. They said the Iraqis captured 43 insurgents while suffering few casualties.

But interviews the following day with U.S. and Iraqi soldiers at Camp al-Rashid in Rustimayah, where they are based, painted a more complex picture.

Strengthening Iraq's police and army is the key to the eventual withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq, American commanders say. The bipartisan Iraq Study Group, in its report due to be released next week, is expected to recommend pulling out nearly all U.S. combat units from Iraq by early 2008 and leaving behind troops such as those involved in Friday's fight in Fadhil to train, advise and support Iraqi forces.

Although the Iraqis in the 9th Division have become more effective in the two years since they formed, American soldiers and some Iraqi leaders at Camp al-Rashid said they are not yet ready to operate on their own.

"They're basically a baby army," Baxter said. "They're just now starting up. It's going to take them a while to get the experience."

The unit, the only mechanized division in the Iraqi army, has about 4,000 soldiers.

They are typically older soldiers, recruited from across the country, said Col. Douglass S. Heckman, the senior adviser for the 9th Division Military Transition Team, whose members are part of the 1st Cavalry Division. When U.S. troops first began rebuilding the Iraqi army after the 2003 invasion, recruits would drop out if they were deployed away from their homes, Heckman said. "These guys are not afraid to go anywhere," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0101297

The U.S. military is increasingly ceding more authority to Iraqi leaders, Heckman said. For example, personnel decisions are now up to Iraqi leaders. "It inspires a lot of confidence to have Iraqi units with Iraqi flags," he said.

That confidence appeared to have been shaken on Friday. In one three-block section of Fadhil in a neighborhood known as Jumhuriya, 35 Iraqi soldiers came under fire as soon as they arrived at 6 a.m., their American advisers recalled.

For any army, however well trained, the Jumhuriya battle would have been a difficult one. There were empty shops and tall buildings where snipers could easily hide. The streets were narrow, preventing easy movement of tanks.

The Iraqis knew little about their enemy. They could not quantify them. They couldn't distinguish between a civilian and an insurgent because everyone dressed alike, the Americans and Iraqis said.

Their enemy, however, appeared to know a lot about them. Somehow, they knew where the Americans and Iraqis had set up one of two field headquarters and fired mortar shells at it, said Maj. Thomas J. Boczar.

The Jumhuriya battle was just one small part of Friday's operation, which involved about 500 Iraqis conducting searches and 60 Americans advising them. Other parts of the operation ran smoothly, high-ranking American officers said.

But it was a window on the challenges U.S. forces face in training the Iraqis.

Sitting in a conference room at Camp al-Rashid, American soldiers described Iraqi troops with inadequate training, resources or motivation. When they shoot, they "pray and spray" and do not aim for targets, the soldiers said. They either lack equipment or are not well trained in new equipment. On the battlefield on Friday, the Iraqis communicated by cellphone because their walkie-talkies did not work, the U.S. soldiers said.

The way the Americans see it, the Iraqis are fierce fighters. But they have been depleted of their energy after so many years of war, first against Iran in the 1980s, then against the United States during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, the American soldiers said.

By about 11 a.m. on Friday, the Americans decided it was time to pull out of that part of Jumhuriya.

The sniper bullets kept flying, not just from the rooftops, but from the second and third floors of apartment buildings, they recalled. Grenades flew out the windows. Machine guns fired. It was an all-out ambush, unusual in that it was such a coordinated effort by the insurgents, the Americans said.

While some Iraqis froze in indecision, others fired wildly as they ran across streets. Hollywood heroics, one soldier called it.

"I'm just thinking to myself, oh God, get me out of this because these guys are going to get me killed if we stay here," Baxter said.

The Americans called in helicopters to shoot at the snipers, but it was too chaotic of a scene for the aircraft to make clear shots, they said.

Still pinned against the wall underneath the covered sidewalk, McQueen decided it was time to make a run for his Humvee, he recalled. In Arabic, he told the Iraqis to go.

They gave him a puzzled look. Follow me, he told them. This time they complied.

McQueen got into the Humvee first, then opened the back door. Bullets whizzed by. He pulled the soldiers inside as the Humvee drove away. They squeezed in under the gunner. They jumped on top of one another. "It looked like Twister," McQueen said.

Top Iraqi leaders at the base said the mission proved that they can someday secure their own country without interference from American forces. What they lack is not training, not motivation, not confidence, but equipment, they said. They need better tanks and spare parts, Iraqi officials said. And they really need aircraft.

"Give us the aviation and leave us alone," Brig. Gen. Kasim Maliki, a 25-year veteran of the army, said through an interpreter.

Friday's operation was planned over the course of 48 hours, in consultation with the Defense Ministry, Maliki said.

He scoffed at the idea that the Iraqi army needs better training to carry out such missions. "We have been through wars," he said over a cup of sweet tea.

Lt. Col. Bassim Mohammed, who joined the Iraqi army in 1987, said he did not believe his men were prepared for Friday's operation because they had so little notice. He said he found out about the mission at midnight, and they left at 3:30 a.m. That was not enough time to secure the perimeter, he said.

They encountered more than 100 insurgents, he said, and killed or wounded about 20 of them. He said he believes his soldiers could have better handled so many insurgents with more notice.

"We've never suffered the way we did yesterday," he said.

Behind the official reports proclaiming steady progress, U.S. officers involved in training Iraqi security forces have found it a difficult and even puzzling process. Below are two excerpts from official debriefing interviews conducted by historians at the Army's Combat Studies Institute at Fort Leavenworth, Kan. Both illustrate the cultural chasm between U.S. and Iraqi soldiers.

Army Lt. Col. Paul Ciesinski, who worked as a trainer for the Iraqi army in 2005-06, describes how he compelled an Iraqi unit to establish a professional command post:

"I think they looked at us as a necessary annoyance. . . . When we arrived, the main CP [Command Post] was a TV watching room for Lebanese music videos and soccer games. . . . There were no communications. After about a month or two, they actually pulled the [military] radio out of the CP because it was hard to listen to the TV with the radio on. So we launched a full-court press to change that and actually build a main CP. They fought us and resisted because it was hard work and they didn't see the need for it. This was common with the Arab and Kurdish soldiers and leadership. But after we trained them on it and we got it running, it became a point of pride."

Army Maj. Jeffrey Allen, who advised the Iraqi army in 2004, recalls how an Iraqi battalion commander demanded that he possess one of two available computers -- even though he didn't know how to use it:

"They were authorized ten and two laptops or something like that. Ten computers overall. They had two. We're trying to build this battalion, so I wanted one to go to the S-3 [operations officer] for doing training calendars and all those types of things, and one for the S-1 [personnel officer] for all his accountability, but it would have to be shared amongst the staff. One of those two computers sat on the battalion commander's desk for weeks, not turned on, collecting dust. It was a status symbol for him: he had a computer on his desk. He had no idea how to even turn it on, but it didn't matter -- it was sitting on his desk."

Review Finds Army Mishandled Friendly-Fire Case (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Army officials destroyed critical evidence that could have determined who shot and killed Pfc. Jesse R. Buryj at an Iraq checkpoint in May 2004, one of several problems with the friendly-fire inquiry that may permanently shroud Buryj's death in mystery, according to an Army inspector general's review.

The lengthy inquiry found that criminal investigators destroyed bullet fragments, agents failed to collect ballistic evidence from weapons at the checkpoint, medical personnel made incorrect notations on Buryj's records and military officials knew his death was a friendly-fire case months before they officially notified his family.

As a result, Buryj's family buried him believing he was killed when his vehicle was rammed by a dump truck. They did not learn that he was shot by friendly forces until nine months after his death, and a lack of physical evidence means it is nearly impossible to know what happened that night.

Buryj's death -- which came just days after the high-profile friendly-fire killing of former football player Pat Tillman in Afghanistan -- also exposed a rift between U.S. and Polish forces. A group of Polish allied troops was also manning the checkpoint, and U.S. officials sought to blame them for the soldier's death.

The inspector general found no specific effort to cover up the incident. The review shows, however, that initial investigators believed there was a need for international sensitivity. One unnamed investigator told the inspector general that there was a sense that U.S. investigators could not "say anything bad about the Poles," even though they were convinced Polish shots killed Buryj (pronounced BOO-dee). Investigators ultimately ruled that the Poles probably fired the fatal shot.

Peggy Buryj of Canton, Ohio, has long believed that details of her son's death were obscured or delayed to protect members of his unit or Polish troops in 2004, an election year during which President Bush often praised Poland's contribution to the fight against terrorism. Buryj said she is still furious about the way the Army has handled her son's case, and she feels it has now slammed the door.

"They said that anything that could go wrong did go wrong, that it was a series of unfortunate mistakes," she said after an Army briefing. "They apologized, and I think they were sincere in their apology. But the whole thing just shows incompetence, from the notification to the very end."

Jesse Buryj, 21, of Canton was killed on May 5, 2004, when an Iraqi dump truck sped through a coalition military checkpoint in Karbala and ultimately crashed into his vehicle, sending him tumbling to the ground. Soldiers initially believed that the fall injured Buryj, but he actually took fire from either the U.S. troops around him or the Polish troops nearby. A bullet pierced his back and caused massive internal injuries.

Later, when Buryj's family learned that a gunshot killed him, they believed it was hostile fire, though the people found in the dump truck were not carrying weapons.

The 47-page report, presented to Buryj's family by the Army's inspector general, Lt. Gen. Stanley E. Green, found that criminal investigators failed to conduct ballistic tests on four U.S. weapons fired that night and did not collect Polish weapons for testing.

Because the case was incorrectly labeled a hostile death, criminal investigators inadvertently destroyed the only evidence that could be used to identify a weapon -- a 5.56mm bullet fragment -- in the fall of 2005. At that time, criminal investigators destroyed evidence in a number of hostile-death cases in which evidence could not be matched to individual weapons, and Buryj's case was mistakenly among them, the report said.

"Before September 2005, CID kept the bullet extracted from PFC Buryj as evidence," the report said, referring to the Criminal Investigations Division. "Had the four U.S. weapons been tested, this might have eliminated doubts over whether U.S. weapons fired the fatal round."

The report also exposed a casualty reporting system marred by gaps and inconsistencies. The Buryj case, along with others, prompted major changes in the way the Army notifies families of war casualties. Those new policies were put into effect in April, three months after Buryj's story was reported publicly and after the secretary of the Army asked for a review.

Col. Patrick Gawkins, director of the Army Casualty and Mortuary Affairs Operation Center, said mistakes in the case "prevented a more timely, accurate notification" of the family. He noted that the complexity of the situation added to the confusion and that a vast majority of cases are reported correctly.

"Providing accurate casualty circumstances when you are attempting to rapidly notify a family of a loss is an extremely challenging task," Gawkins said. "We have continued to improve all aspects of casualty support because this is precisely what we owe our fallen soldiers and our families. We have definitely analyzed the Buryj case and other publicized cases to identify problems and fix the system."

Typically, casualty officials in the United States track such deaths via medical records, investigative reports and official notifications from the field. Though Army officials claimed to have notified the family about the nature of Buryj's death not long after it occurred, there are no records of such a conversation, according to the report. Incorrect medical records led to incorrect entries in Buryj's casualty report, which in turn led to incorrect information getting to the family.

"The casualty reporting in the PFC Buryj case was often inaccurate and untimely," leading to errors and delays, according to the inspector general's report.

One of the delays that particularly bothers Peggy Buryj concerns the final investigative report, which places responsibility on the Polish troops. It was completed by Multi-National Corps-Iraq on Sept. 6, 2004, 124 days after the incident. It was then forwarded to the U.S. Central Command weeks before the U.S. elections but stayed there until Feb. 18, 2005 -- a total of 165 additional days.

Polish officials have repeatedly disputed the U.S. findings, saying their troops were not responsible for Buryj's death. The inspector general found that U.S. criminal investigative agents were aware of the international sensitivities and the fact that the loose military coalition was losing members at the time.

Peggy Buryj said she is resigned to the idea that she may never know what happened to her son.

"I feel like I gave them my son and they've done nothing but dishonor him," she said.

From Skies To Streets, Woman Warriors Face The Enemy And Change Military Landscape (AP)

By Sharon Cohen

AP, December 2, 2006

A goodwill mission to deliver kerosene heaters to Iraqi schools erupts into the fiery chaos of a roadside bombing — and Maj. Mary Prophit shields a comrade so he can rescue a critically burned Iraqi soldier.

A convoy outside Baghdad is ambushed by machine-gun wielding Iraqi insurgents — and Spc. Ashley Pullen races down a road to save an injured sergeant.

A Black Hawk helicopter is struck by a rocket-propelled grenade in Iraq — and co-pilot Tammy Duckworth, bloody and severely wounded, struggles to stay conscious until the damaged aircraft is down and her crew is safe.

In Iraq and Afghanistan, women warriors are writing a new chapter in military history, serving by the tens of thousands, fending off enemy fire and taking on — and succeeding in — high-profile roles in the battlefield and the skies as never before.

"The American public is beginning to realize that women are playing an equal part in this war and that they are facing the same risks," says Duckworth, who lost both legs in the 2004 insurgent attack. "This is the first time in our nation's history ... when it's normal to see female names as part of the war wounded or those killed in action."

More than 155,000 women have been deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan since 2002, according to the Pentagon, nearly four times the number during the Persian Gulf War. Females now account for 15% of the active duty force.

The number of women casualties — 68 dead and more than 430 injured — represents a tiny fraction of the total. Still, by one estimate, the deaths exceed the number of military women who lost their lives in Korea, Vietnam and the Gulf War combined.

The public, long accustomed to seeing disabled male veterans and grieving widows clutching folded U.S. flags, has adjusted to a new set of somber images: women soldiers coming home with life-changing injuries and tearful farewells to mothers, wives and daughters.

In just two weeks in September, bombs killed four military women in Iraq and Afghanistan. Among them: Sgt. 1st Class Merideth Howard, a 52-year-old former firefighter with a master's degree in marine biology, and 2nd Lt. Emily J.T. Perez, a 23-year-old West Point graduate of the "Class of 9-11" who played the clarinet, spoke fluent German, read the Bible daily and helped start an AIDS ministry at her church.

There is no shared experience that binds together the women of war. Each has a different story, a reason why they're in uniform, an explanation of how their lives have changed.

Some feel pressured to prove themselves as women. Others don't. Some never fire their weapons. Others engage in life-and-death battles. Some are professional soldiers. Others enlist for college money. A few are grandmothers; many more are in their 20s.

Almost all serve anonymously, though a few have captured headlines back home. Former Brig. Gen. Janis Karpinski made news as the highest-ranking officer punished in the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse scandal. Jessica Lynch, the former prisoner of war, rocketed onto the nation's TV screens when she was portrayed as a guns-blazing, all-American heroine — a depiction she herself disavowed.

But Lynch's job — Army supply clerk in a maintenance company — illustrates one of the realities of the war: No place is safe. As the insurgency took hold, that grew even more apparent. Front lines don't exist. Combat troops still face the heaviest losses and while women are mostly in support roles, a mortar or bomb can strike anywhere from a mess hall to a supply convoy.

"My dad has friends who constantly tell him, 'Oh, your daughter's fine in Iraq. She's not in harm's way or she's not involved in combat,'" says Capt. Mary Caruso, who served two tours in Iraq, one as a platoon leader in the 194th Military Police Company.

"I don't think the general public really sees what females are doing over there," she says. "We don't have a linear battlefield anymore. The enemy's everywhere."

Women are barred from units assigned to direct ground combat — the infantry, armor and artillery, for example. While many remain in traditional jobs, such as health care, they've also served as translators and mechanics, commanded police companies and support battalions, flown jet fighters and attack helicopters.

They've been heroes, too.

In the Kentucky National Guard's 617th Military Police Company, Army Sgt. Leigh Ann Hester became the first woman since World War II to win the Silver Star for heroism. After a supply convoy was ambushed, she and others counterattacked, killing more than two dozen insurgents.

Spc. Ashley Pullen, another member of the unit, received a Bronze Star for valor, risking her life to help save a wounded soldier in the same attack. In recommending her for a medal, her company commander praised her "incredible courage."

"We now know women can hold their own, they're brave, they do have the physical and mental stamina to face combat-like situations," says retired Navy Capt. Lory Manning, director of the Women in the Military Project at the Women's Research and Education Institute in Washington, D.C. "We now know that men don't go to pieces and the American public doesn't go to pieces if women are killed. And we know that women, in fact, can defend men."

Manning says that represents a change in perceptions.

"I used to get a lot of guff that women can't do this, that women are weakening the military, women are feminizing the military — that's gone with the wind," she says. "The debate about whether they belong there seems to be over."

Not quite. Though women are widely viewed as essential with the nation's fighting forces stretched thin and they perform jobs off-limits to men for cultural reasons — searching Iraqi females, for instance — the critics have not been silenced.

"Engaging the enemy in this uncivilized thing we call war is a job for men, not women," Kate O'Beirne, a conservative pundit and Washington editor of the National Review, said in a radio interview this spring. She likened it to a man sending his wife or daughter to check out a possible home break-in.

Martin van Creveld, a prominent military historian and Iraq war critic, argues the contribution of females in the conflict has been dramatically exaggerated. "They're not occupying any particularly important positions or fighting in the front ... If there were not a single woman (deployed), the war would be the same," he says.

The Center for Military Readiness, a conservative think tank, contends that the Army has ignored its rules that prevent female soldiers from being in units that "physically collocate and remain with" ground combat troops.

Elaine Donnelly, the center's president, says that creates the potential for romantic involvement, morale problems and physical hazards. A woman, she says, might not be strong enough to rescue a wounded male soldier.

"All these social issues do matter," she says. "Cohesion is what lives depend on. It's all about survival. If you start causing doubts, you make the job more difficult or dangerous for everybody."

Last year, some members of Congress tried to curb the role of women in combat zones, but retreated after running into opposition from the Pentagon and lawmakers from both parties.

Capt. Christine Roney was tangled in the debate in 2004 when she was about to take command of a forward support company that would accompany a combat battalion.

She says she was told several male captains fired off e-mails to members of Congress and the Center for Military Readiness opposing the move. One captain, she says, messaged one of her peers asking: "What are you guys doing sending a female over here?"

When plans changed and a man was chosen to take command, Roney says she was disappointed at first, then reconsidered. "I probably did think having a female would have been disruptive in some sense," she says. "They might think they have to act differently with a woman."

Roney, who ended up commanding a logistics company that conducted more than 500 missions in the streets of Baghdad, thinks gender walls will crumble as more women and men work together.

"Sometimes," she says, "they need to get females in the unit to see they have some of the same abilities, the same competencies as the male soldiers."

Some of that already has happened.

Capt. Tara Stiles was a platoon leader in the 194th Military Police Company supporting the First Marine Expeditionary Force. "At first, they were kind of leery," she says. But after a few weeks "they'd rather have my platoon vs. one of the others led by males. .. They needed their backs covered and we were there. And vice versa."

Stiles' company was commanded by Capt. Terri Dorn, who says she noticed some Marines were uncomfortable dealing with females, but she didn't detect resentment.

"I never felt like someone was trying to tell me we're in the wrong place," she says. "It was, 'Oh my God, what do we do?' ... Really what you're doing is teaching that person how to deal with a female."

Dorn says when men would tell her they'd never had a woman in their unit, she'd reply: "Don't think of them as females. Talk to them as soldiers."

It was advice she, too, found useful. "I wasn't a female," she says. "I was a company commander."

Dorn says some Iraqi military leaders proved a far bigger obstacle. There were those, she says, who refused to shake her hand. "It didn't hinder our conversation," she says. "It didn't hurt my feelings ... I proved myself by not allowing them NOT to speak with me."

For decades there have been questions about men and women bunking in the same quarters and whether they could serve together without distractions. While problems such as sexual harassment and assault remain, some say that gender lines blur when lives are on the line.

"Traditionally, the front is the most sexless place in the world. Behind the lines is where trouble happens," says Joshua Goldstein, a professor emeritus of international relations at American University and author of "War and Gender."

Lt. Col. Cheri Provancha, who commanded a Stryker Brigade Support Battalion in Iraq with 700 soldiers, says she didn't detect a gender gap among her troops.

"It didn't matter if you were male or female," she says. "You're going through the same thing as your buddy. That creates a bond."

Provancha also says she has noticed firsthand how attitudes toward women have changed in her 23 years in the Army.

"In the 1980s when a male soldier walks in the door, the expectation is they are competent. The woman on the other hand, it was 'I've got to see what you have before I give you that level of confidence,'" she says. "Now when I walk in the door, I feel like the guys do."

But other officers say the military is far from having an even playing field.

Janis Karpinski, who was demoted to colonel after the scandal at the Abu Ghraib prison, says she was a scapegoat — and she blames many of her problems on being a woman.

DOJ_NMG_0101302

When the prison conditions started unraveling, she says, "there was not a good ole boy network to support me. They wouldn't let me in. ... There was not a male commander to say, 'Hey, Janis, you better watch out.' Had I been a man, I would have been aware of it all along."

Karpinski says the military is still regarded by many men in uniform — especially the older ones — as the "last bastion of male dominance and they're very reluctant to give up this turf to women."

And yet, some see progress, partly because younger men are moving up in the ranks along with women.

"Gender integration is not perfect by any stretch, but it's a heck of lot better than it was 30 years ago when women entered the military academy," says Mady Wechsler Segal, professor of sociology at the University of Maryland and an expert on the military.

Women have a long history of military service going back to the Revolutionary War, when they sometimes disguised themselves as men to defend their country. Through the many wars, they've been spies and soldiers, nurses and pilots — and prisoners.

Relatively few, however, have fallen from enemy fire. In World War I, for example, nearly 360 servicewomen died, mostly nurses stricken by influenza, according to the Women's Memorial Foundation.

And in World War II, more than 330,000 women served both domestically and abroad, and more than 540 died, mostly from vehicle accidents, air crashes and illness, according to the foundation. Sixteen Army nurses died by enemy fire, the group says.

In the Persian Gulf War, about two-thirds of the 15 women who died lost their lives in non-hostile incidents. (In Iraq and Afghanistan, more than a third of the deaths have been non-combat fatalities.)

After the Gulf War, the Army opened thousands more jobs to women, including piloting attack and scout helicopters.

Maj. Tammy Duckworth — who recently lost a bid for Congress — says when she joined the Illinois Army National Guard, she picked aviation because it was a combat position open to women. "I wanted to be treated equally to the males in my unit ... and I felt part of that was accepting the same kind of risks," she says.

Early on, she says she adapted to being a woman in a man's world. "I tried to be one of the boys, to be tough or tougher," she says. But her attitude changed as she was promoted. "I knew I was a good enough officer on my own and I stopped trying to be extra-macho," she says.

Besides, she adds, some of the guys were already teasing her that she had "ovaries of brass."

But other women say they're mindful of being a minority and feel pressure — some of it self-imposed — to demonstrate their physical strength and their mental toughness so no one thinks they'll crumble when bullets start flying or bombs start exploding.

Alicia Flores says she earned the respect of male comrades in the Army's 92nd Chemical Company by hauling bodies, cleaning up feces, doing everything men did. "I had a lot of guys look up to me and say, 'How could you be out here doing this?' "

Flores says she was determined not to show weakness.

"I saw a lot of guys break down," she says. "Most of the times I did a lot better than they did. ... I wasn't going to break down and cry. Crying wasn't going to get me anywhere. It was just going to get me dirtier."

Aneta Urban stood out as the only women in her Marine police company during training in Camp Pendleton, Calif. She could feel all eyes on her.

"When it's 100 guys and you're the only girl, it's like proving yourself every day," she says. "When you're doing rifle training, close combat training, they're looking at you a lot more closely. They're wondering: Can she do it? Can she handle it? You don't want to be laughed at."

Two years later, when she was deployed, she felt she had measured up.

"They knew they could depend on me," she says. "They knew I could pull my own weight. They knew they could trust me if something happened."

Even so, Urban, a native of Poland who served as translator on a second tour, says she would never complain about "stupid girly issues" such as the lack of bathrooms.

"We were under enough stress as it is ... without worrying about finding a place to go pee," she says.

Some women say hygiene issues, whether it's going to the bathroom in a hole in the ground or not being able to wash your hair for a month, tend to be harder on females than men. Some find creative solutions.

Maj. Mary Prophit, for instance, secured her own shower, trading a Benchmade knife in exchange.

Prophit was part of a four-member Civil Affairs team and one of three women among a task force of 700. If that didn't set her apart, her age did. "I was old enough to be their mother," says the 42-year-old mother of three who is a library assistant in Glenoma, Wash. "I thought it was kind of cool."

DOJ_NMG_0101303

Despite two decades in the Army Reserve, Prophit says she felt internal pressures to be a good model. "I knew if I screwed up, someone would say, 'That's why we shouldn't have women in the military,'" she says. "I want to make sure that no one thinks the mission dragged on because I'm there."

In January 2005, Prophit demonstrated her skills when the convoy she was in was attacked by a roadside bomb, ripping into the truck behind her that was carrying Iraqi soldiers.

With ammunition exploding from the blazing truck, Prophit used her body as a shield so a medic could tend to one of the badly burned Iraqis. Later, she laid down fire at a mosque where insurgents were hiding.

Prophit then propped up the critically wounded Iraqi with her body in the tight quarters of the Stryker armored vehicle, placed his head in her lap and tried to keep him conscious as they raced to the hospital.

"My performance was a testament that women can be in combat," she says. But she draws a line. "I definitely don't think women should be in the infantry. It's not because they're not mentally strong enough or physically strong enough. If you mix genders, that alters the dynamic of the group."

After the war ends, the military and Congress will evaluate these kinds of experiences and there will be renewed discussion about what combat is, but any changes will probably be incremental, not dramatic, says Manning, the military expert.

For now, though, she says, "the public accepts that women are in the military, that there are going to be shootings, that they're going to be dying, and that's fine — with most people."

Homemade Memorial Is Stirring Passions On Iraq (NYT)

By Jesse McKinley

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

LAFAYETTE, Calif., Nov. 30 — The tranquil suburb of Lafayette hardly seems the most likely place in the Bay Area for a battle over the First Amendment and the war in Iraq. Liberal Berkeley is just over the hill, after all, and nearby San Francisco is always spoiling for a fight.

But over the last few weeks, it is Lafayette — an affluent bedroom community 20 miles east of downtown San Francisco — that has become the scene of a passionate debate over the place of political speech in suburbia.

At issue is a hillside memorial, made up of some 450 small white crosses and a 5-by-16-foot sign that reads: “In Memory of 2,867 U.S. Troops Killed in Iraq.” The memorial was created by Jeff Heaton, a building contractor and antiwar activist, who said it was meant “to get people involved on a local level” and talking about Iraq.

Sure enough, people here have become involved, including more than 200 people and a half-dozen television news crews and reporters who crammed into the usually sparsely attended City Council meeting last week to voice their opinions about the memorial. And while many there said they found the crosses deeply moving, others called the memorial unpatriotic, disrespectful or just plain ugly.

That camp included Jean Bonadio, a former Marine sergeant who said she was so offended that she stopped her car and climbed the hill to dismantle the sign, which sits with the crosses on private property of a fellow advocate just north of Highway 24, a major Bay Area thoroughfare, and the Lafayette light-rail station.

“My first reaction was, ‘What a disgrace to those who have sacrificed,’ ” said Ms. Bonadio, 53, a dog trainer. “I had no tools with me, so I removed it with my bare hands and feet.”

The sign was repaired, but Ms. Bonadio is not the only one trying to take down the sign. Shortly after the memorial was erected, the city government called on Mr. Heaton to remove the accompanying sign, citing a municipal code forbidding anything larger than four square feet to be posted on private property.

That, however, prompted some supporters of the memorial to suggest that the city was engaging in censorship, accusations Mayor Ivor Samson denied. “The content of the sign is not an issue,” Mr. Samson said. “If the sign was that size and said ‘I love my mom,’ it would still be in violation.”

Mr. Samson also said that the memorial had drawn attention here precisely because Lafayette, where the median cost of a home is over $1 million, was traditionally apolitical. “I think had this been in Berkeley or Santa Cruz, a community with a greater history of political activism, this wouldn’t be news,” he said.

No action was taken at Monday’s meeting, after the city’s attorney said he needed more time to study the issue. But Louise Clark, who owns the property the memorial sits on, said that if the sign had to go, the meaning would be lost.

But some Lafayette residents question whether the memorial actually meant to remember the dead troops. “There’s no American flag flying, it’s just very stark and shock value,” said Lyn Zusman, 53, whose son is a marine just back from Iraq. “If you want to make it a memorial, you personalize it. But if it’s a protest, call it that. That’s why we live in America, so we can spout our views off.”

DOJ_NMG_0101304

This is not the first time Mr. Heaton, a longtime Lafayette resident, has tried to erect a memorial in his hometown. Three years ago, he tried to mount a smaller display of crosses on the same hillside. The night after he planted them, however, someone stole them. The next day, he planted the crosses again, and the next night, they disappeared again.

But this time, Mr. Heaton says he feels that the mood about the war has shifted, both nationwide and in Lafayette.

"There's been a real change in the tide of feeling about the war," said Mr. Heaton, 53, who said the inspiration for the crosses came from a visit to the Vietnam Memorial in Washington. "It is much more acceptable now to question the reasons for the war."

He added that Lafayette would be a good place to make a statement because "it is pretty sleepy and conservative and not that much happens there."

City officials in Lafayette also say their city has been slowly changing, with an influx of former Berkeley and San Francisco residents looking for a place with good public schools for their children. Lafayette, Mr. Samson said, now has "people who are very interested in the larger world."

The Lafayette crosses are not the only grass-roots remembrance around, or the only one to stir controversy. Veterans for Peace, a nonprofit antiwar group based in St. Louis, has regularly planted similar arrays of crosses on beaches in Santa Monica and Santa Barbara. Since 2004, the American Friends Service Committee, a Quaker group based in Philadelphia, has sponsored a traveling exhibit called Eyes Wide Open, which features a pair of empty boots for every American solider killed in Iraq.

Michael T. McPhearson, executive director of Veterans for Peace, which also has fields of crosses planted in four other cities, admitted that the displays sometimes provoked angry reactions. "They say we're not supporting the troops, and they say we shouldn't be doing these vigils," said Mr. McPhearson, 42, who served in the first gulf war. "But we feel that especially because we're veterans and we've served, we have the right."

Mr. Samson said he did not know when the city attorney would rule on whether the sign in Lafayette had to go. In the meantime, however, Mr. Heaton and Ms. Clark say they will continue to add crosses — and update the numbers on the sign.

"It's overwhelming just looking at that small number, and that's nowhere near the number of the ones we lost," said Ms. Clark, speaking of the dead in Iraq. "When we get all those crosses up there, everybody will gasp."

As The War Drags On, She Keeps On Wrapping (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, December 3, 2006

It did not begin as Luz Mercado's Christmas tradition.

Instead, it began two years ago as something at once desperate and mundane — a mother's obsessive campaign to make Christmas seem like Christmas for her son in Iraq and the Marines serving under him.

With the holidays coming and her son, Marine Sgt. Luis Mercado Jr., requesting a Santa suit for himself and assorted goodies for the Marines in his unit, Mrs. Mercado turned her garage into a warehouse and herself into a nonprofit foundation called Support Our Heroes. Before long the donations poured in, the gift baskets were stuffed and mailed off, and it was Christmas in Iraq in a war she hoped, prayed and believed would soon be over.

When the next Christmas came, he was home, serving as a Marine drill inspector on Parris Island, S.C. But his buddies were still in Iraq, and she figured she owed it to other moms to do for their children what she had done for her own. So there was a second Christmas blitz, more gift baskets, more bags from Sam's Club and Wal-Mart, more stacks of Big Red gum, Red Bull energy drink and black socks to send to Iraq.

Now the war limps on, and the pictures at www.supportourheroes.net are of Army Pfc. Matt Harvey from Cornwall, N.Y., and Marine Lance Cpl. Chris Smolinski from Newburgh, N.Y., whose platoons will be the recipients of this year's 125 gift bags of snacks, sweets, toiletries and clothes. She also sends packages of supplies throughout the year.

It feels different from when she began. Most of the flags and yellow ribbons are gone from nearby homes. The war feels like the ailing elephant in the room of American life, too big to ignore, too grim to discuss much. The garage is pretty empty and the fund-raising is a struggle. We need new product in America, and this war feels like something long since marked down and ready to be moved. In September, she sent out 125 letters to previous donors asking for contributions. She got responses from about 10.

But it would feel wrong to move on while the soldiers are still there, so Mrs. Mercado pushed on like someone walking uphill into a stiff wind.

"It's just hard," she said. "People are busy. They only have so much money. I understand that. But I made a promise to keep doing this until all the soldiers are home, and that's what I plan to do."

DOJ_NMG_0101305

It's not what she bargained for. When the war began, she thought it would last a few months, a year and a half at the most. Who expected this? It didn't help when she had to have surgery over the summer or when the war news kept getting worse.

But Mrs. Mercado, who sells jewelry and has a 15-year-old son at home, has the laser focus of the woman who manages to get the kids to every event, bake the perfect peach pie and make the trains run on time at home. So she has managed to cook up events, raise money, buy things herself when she finds good sales.

She has help from Pat Smolinski, an occupational therapist, and Linda Harvey, who runs a Montessori school, both of whom come across as modern war moms — terrified and slightly ironic at the same time.

When Mrs. Harvey stopped over on her way to yoga class the other night, Mrs. Mercado was excited to hear that Matt was due home for two weeks in January.

"Don't let him go back," Mrs. Mercado said urgently.

"What am I supposed to do, shoot him?"

"Break his leg or something. There must be a way."

It's not that people don't care. There was a bake sale at the Newburgh auto auction and, a tango dance fund-raiser. People are generous in dropping off things at the yoga studio Mrs. Harvey attends.

Still, it's a struggle.

"People are tired of the war," Mrs. Smolinski said. "And look at our economy. People tend to forget unless you're in their face constantly, and if you're in their face all the time, you're going to alienate them."

She sends her own CARE packages to her son two or three times a week, car magazines, Chef Boyardee ravioli, Skittles, Twizzlers, and tries to keep an even keel. "He seems to be doing wonderfully," she said. "His mother, on the other hand, is a basket case."

Mrs. Mercado has been there. She cried every day her son was away, followed war news intently, shivered over every casualty report. That should be over. It's not.

She still gets that cold chill from the casualty reports, even if her son is safe in South Carolina. She still fusses over those gift bags. She prays this is a tradition that won't last past this year, but figures if it's still needed, she'll be ready to do it again.

In Afghanistan, Lessons In The Face Of Violence (LAT)

By Paul Watson

The Los Angeles Times, December 3, 2006

THE teacher had been warned.

Mohammed Aref was on duty near the front gate of his school. The children were at recess, playing volleyball without a net.

The throaty rumble of a motorcycle broke through their playful shrieks and laughter. The lone rider, a man wearing a traditional shalwar kameez with his face obscured by the long tail of his turban, called Aref over to talk. Then he pulled an AK-47 from under his baggy shirt and fired six bullets into the teacher.

Aref had no way to defend himself. His only weapons were his faith in knowledge, some tattered books and a piece of chalk. He died in the dirt in front of horrified pupils.

Fifteen days earlier, Taliban guerrillas had come in the darkness and posted a "night letter" on the door of his farmhouse, telling the 50-year-old teacher to stay away from the school if he wanted to stay alive.

Aref, who earned just $50 a month, stood his ground. One of the first victims in the resurgent Taliban's dirty war on education, he gave his life trying to teach Afghan children that there is more to theirs than endless war.

After the U.S. joined with anti-Taliban militias five years ago to bring down the Islamist government, one of the biggest changes was in education. The Taliban, whose name means "students," regard Western-style education as a direct threat to the vision of a pure Islamic state. Its followers regard modern education as a morally toxic force of Western colonialism.

The Taliban's founders learned their disdain for most things modern in radical religious schools in Pakistan, where the only legitimate subject is study of the Koran. Extremist mullahs teach a harsh version of Islam that professes to be a return to traditions established by the prophet Muhammad.

A decade ago, when the Taliban swept across southern Afghanistan to seize the capital, Kabul, the mullahs issued edicts closing the women's university and most girls' schools. A collapsing infrastructure made it difficult for many boys to attend school as well.

When schools reopened in 2002 after the ouster of the Taliban regime, only about a third of Afghanistan's school-age children were in class. Today, the World Bank says, the figure is 87%, about 6.5 million pupils, a reflection of the hope of Afghan parents that the U.S.-backed government will be able to bring their country into the modern world. Some aid workers estimate the figure is much lower.

The United States has distributed textbooks and supplies, trained 50,000 teachers and rebuilt 672 schools.

But once again, education is under pressure from the Taliban. The militants are active once more across at least half of the country, including the southern province of Helmand, where Aref died in December 2005. Afghanistan's corrupt police and weak army are unable to provide much security.

Over the last year, insurgents have burned at least 146 schools, and insecurity has forced 215 others to close, the Afghan Education Ministry says. Zuhoor Afghan, an advisor to Education Minister Mohammed Hanif Atmar, says about 220,000 students have quit school because they fear for their lives.

To his wife and their seven children, and the many villagers who respected him, Aref was a mujahid, a courageous man engaged in a holy struggle to defeat ignorance and hatred so Afghanistan might know peace.

"He loved teaching," said his brother, Mohammed Rafiq Mohammedi. "It was important to him because he wanted students to learn what he knew and build the nation, to work for the people."

Continuing threats

The day after Aref died, none of his school's 1,300 students or their teachers showed up for class.

Their principal, Noor Mohammed, spent weeks trying to undo the damage, sitting with parents for hours, trying to convince them they had to keep the school open.

"They said, 'Unless you guarantee the security of our children, we will not allow them to go to school,' " he recalled outside the deserted school recently. "I said, 'I cannot guarantee the lives of your children, but they must study as much as they can.' "

As he desperately tried to reassure parents and children, Mohammed received his own night letter, which was posted on the gate of the local mosque for all to see.

"Drop this business of teaching and the school or you will be responsible for your own death," it warned. "If you continue, you will have to wash your hands of your life."

Like Aref, the principal kept going, but he couldn't vanquish the terror sown by the Taliban or protect his school.

Even where Taliban violence isn't threatening schools, Afghanistan's other problems are. Across the country, schools are in crisis because of corrupt contractors, shoddy building practices and a chronic shortage of textbooks and trained teachers, said Afghan, the Education Ministry official.

"If they have teachers, they don't have books," he said. "If they have books, they have no chairs. If they have fancy buildings, they have no toilets."

The government doesn't even know how many teachers there are because it is still awaiting the results of a head count started early this year. Despite the progress in many areas, every district in the country is reporting a shortage of qualified teachers, Afghan said.

"We need thousands of professional teachers, and we also need to train most of our professional teachers who are teaching now," he said. "There are students who have not even finished their schooling yet, but they are teaching. For example, students in grade 10 and 11 are teaching grade 3 or 4, and in some places it's even worse than that."

The situation is likely to improve under Atmar, the education minister, who has a strategic plan to improve the system, said Wagma Battoor Hassan Zumati, education program coordinator for CARE, a U.S.-based aid agency. Atmar won praise from foreign aid donors for his management of the rural reconstruction and development ministry.

But many Afghans are losing patience. Encouraged by the promises of Western leaders, they believed the Taliban's defeat meant the dawn of a new age of rapid progress, in which all children could get a good education. The plodding advances, even relapses to the more familiar rot of war and corruption in large parts of the country, feed a growing cynicism toward foreign governments and aid agencies.

"The optimism has died because these people are not honest with each other or with us," Afghan said. "They are working for their own benefit."

Woman of defiance

When the Taliban's mullahs ruled, she ran a secret school for women. Now, as head of education for Ghazni province in central Afghanistan, she is defying the extremists' efforts to turn back the clock. And, as a woman in a deeply conservative region, she also fights entrenched sexism and sclerotic bureaucracy.

Mushtaq does not hide her elegant face in public. She dares to adorn it with makeup. She covers her hair with a sheer white scarf, embroidered with delicate flowers, draped over her shoulders. Her voice is soft, but uncompromising.

And she packs a pistol.

"I can use it," she said with a steely smile.

She may have to. Last fall, Mushtaq received a night letter warning that she would be killed if she didn't quit her job and stay home.

"I said, 'Go ahead. Everything that you can do, I'm ready for it.' "

Friends and colleagues have tried to persuade her to give in to the threats. But Mushtaq feels the burden of a nation on her shoulders. She's afraid that if she surrenders, other women will give up too, and then everything they've gained will be lost.

And she has so much left to fight for.

"When we go to people and tell them, 'You should send your daughters to school,' they tell us, 'First you build a school, then we will send you our daughters,' " she said.

Over the last year, insurgents have killed a principal and one of his office staffers and burned more than a dozen of Ghazni's schools. Taliban threats have shut down at least 13 more, forcing their students to study in homes and mosques.

About half the province's schools have no buildings or tents, and 100,000 Ghazni students attend class in the open, many of them sitting in the broiling desert, Mushtaq said. Textbooks are in short supply everywhere.

But she insists on seeing the bright side.

"It's a bad situation with a good future," she said.

It takes a lot of optimism to see good things ahead for Ghazni villages such as Chaghatu, in a patch of windblown desert almost 100 miles southwest of Kabul. It is surrounded by barren, black mountains, a forbidding sanctuary for Taliban insurgents and their allies.

The villagers are ethnic Hazaras, who by one theory are descendants of Genghis Khan's Mongol army that invaded central Afghanistan in the 12th century. They have suffered persecution for generations, but after the Taliban's fall, they enjoyed a brief period of peace.

That changed a year ago when the insurgents suddenly grew stronger here. About 4 a.m. on May 29, marauders came down from the mountains and attacked Chaghatu's small school, just down the road from an Afghan army checkpoint.

A bomb placed in a storage room failed to explode, but ignited a fire that destroyed most of the books and part of the school. Villagers doused the flames with shovels of dirt and buckets of water, Principal Gul Mohammed said.

"There are a lot of motorcycles and cars passing us, and they are mostly Taliban or their informers," he said, with a worried eye to the dirt track that passes in front of his office window.

Twelve days before the attempted bombing, two men on a motorcycle passed by close to the gate about 5 p.m. One got off to warn the watchman that "girls should not go to school."

Some were moved the next day to a mosque. Several older girls remained in their regular classroom, where on a recent morning they still were studying. Sitting on floor mats, they were learning English.

"They are afraid of suicide attackers," the principal said. "They are afraid that someone might come into their class and explode or throw a grenade."
