"If it blows up, what is he going to say to the people who wind up in the morgue?" he said. "Who needs to stay awake for up to three days?"

The ease with which the drug can be made has prompted action in Washington.

A federal law that took effect in September bans over-the-counter sales of certain cold medicines with ingredients used to make meth, including pseudoephedrine and ephedrine.

The law requires buyers to show photo identification and allows them to purchase only a 30-day supply.

Robertson, who started out as a clandestine-lab investigator in the Southwest in the mid-1990s, said changes in the meth culture shifted into high-gear when recipes were posted on the Internet.

"Then all of a sudden it was there," he said. "People were cooking in the backs of cars, in hotel rooms and apartments. It was everywhere."

Authorities Braces For Meth Invasion (JI)

Journal Inquirer, December 1, 2006

Methamphetamine is known in drug circles as ice, crank, or speed, it smells like cat urine when it's being cooked, and makes chronic users' teeth fall out and blood pressure soar.

Despite that, the cheap street drug most commonly referred to as "meth" is popular and is continuing its creep towards Connecticut and the Northeast.

"Meth is a major, major problem" in other parts of the country, U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor says.

But, "If we put our heads in the sand, and think it will never come here, we are terribly wrong," O'Connor said. "If we ignore it, it soon will become a major problem."

O'Connor was joined by Gov. M. Jodi Rell, State's Attorney Kevin Kane, and officials from state and federal law enforcement and public health agencies on Thursday, the first annual National Methamphetamine Awareness Day.

DEA officials say meth, which affects the central nervous system, has "a phenomenal rate of addiction, with some experts saying users often get hooked after just one use."

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency says 80 percent of meth is smuggled into this country from Mexico.

Meth isn't grown, like marijuana, poppy, or other organic substances, but manufactured. Federal authorities say the most common ingredient in meth is pseudoephedrine or ephedrine - ingredients found in common over-the-counter cold medicines.

To make meth - it can be smoked, snorted, injected, or taken orally - the legal drugs are cooked and processed using other common chemicals, such as lye, brake cleaner, alcohol, ether, battery acid, and battery lithium.

But the very existence of meth labs is worrisome, officials said Thursday, because chemicals used to make the drug are volatile.

Vapors produced during manufacturing permeate the walls and carpets of houses and buildings, making them uninhabitable, the DEA says, and one pound of meth can yield five pounds of toxic waste.

Because of the distinctive odor - "like a lot of cats," Department of Public Health Commissioner J. Robert Galvin said - meth labs are hard to hide. They are most often found in secluded, rural areas.

DOJ_NMG_0101726

That may be one reason Connecticut has been largely spared from what many say is an epidemic in western and midwestern rural areas.

According to the DEA, in 2001, there were 1,480 meth lab "incidents" in Washington state, 1,883 in California, 806 in Oklahoma, 2,180 in Missouri, and 852 in Kansas, compared with one incident in Connecticut.

The western numbers have declined in recent years, as the public has become more aware of what to look for, authorities said Thursday.

However, the drug's march east has continued: While there were eight meth lab "incidents" in New York in 2001, there were 80 in that state last year.

And on Thursday, DEA officials announced the arrest of 10 people who they say operated meth labs in New York City and on Long Island.

The DEA's Assistant Special Agent in Charge in Connecticut, Brian R. Crowell, said authorities are currently investigating cases involving two meth labs.

There were arrests in three labs last year, including two in East Hampton.

In 2002, Enfield police had to close off the police station and surrounding streets for several hours when a local couple drove a packed-up meth lab - later found to belong to their daughter's boyfriend, who would serve a federal sentence - from their basement to police headquarters.

And Windsor Locks police in 2003 were alerted by local residents to a meth lab that was set up in a wooded area on land owned by a water company. A subsequent search of the man suspected of the setting up the lab yielded lye, sulfuric acid, and other chemicals used to make the drug.

Residents who notice suspicious activities, like those in Windsor Locks who notified police, are important to catching and stopping the manufacturing of meth, authorities said.

In one of the East Hampton cases, police were notified by a suspicious store clerk who reported young people were legally buying large amounts of a chemical.

Eastern states may be luckier than those out west because, after recognizing that over-the-counter drugs were being used, federal authorities this year enacted a law governing the sale of certain cold medicines used to make meth.

The law requires people to show identification before buying pseudoephedrine and ephedrine, and limits the amount that can be purchased to a 30-day supply. The buyer's name and information is also kept in a log for two years.

Stiff punishment for meth manufacturers and sellers is again on the legislative agenda, Rell said, and she intends to revive legislation calling for 15-year prison sentences for first-time offenders, and up to 30 years for second-offenders.

"We need to send that message that the sale and possession of this drug will land you in jail," she said.

Federal Agents Round Up Ten Suspects In Meth Ring (NY1)

By Lindley Pless

NY1, December 4, 2006

A drug factory in the next apartment. That's what federal agents say some New Yorkers were running unbeknownst to their neighbors. NY1's Lindley Pless visited one building where a tenant was allegedly cooking up a potentially explosive mixture.

Neighbors say they didn't have a clue. The DEA says here at a posh Murray Hill high-rise, Michael Knibb, a vice president with Citibank, had created an illicit methamphetamine drug lab in his penthouse apartment.

“I would never have suspected in New York City, particularly in a big building like this, with so many people coming in and out. I guess it happens. I am glad we didn't get blown up or a bad fire started or anything of that nature,” said a building resident.

The DEA says Knibb was among ten people arrested for cooking up potentially explosive drugs in Manhattan and on Long Island. They allegedly used things like household cleaning products, kerosene, and even a lava lamp.

Agents say another arrest was made at the Potamkin Dealership on 11th Avenue, where two mechanics are also accused of setting up a lab.

“It's frightening that these labs are operating in a city with a population as dense as New York City,” said DEA Special Agent in Charge John Gilbride. “These labs are highly volatile. They are highly explosive labs. They contain caustic chemicals that produce fumes that can explode at any time. These labs are ticking time bombs.”

The DEA says seven of those time bombs were ticking here in the city: three in Manhattan, two in Queens, one in the Bronx, and one in Brooklyn.

Special Agent Gilbride says that methamphetamine has become the crack of the 21st century. He says it is a drug that is now affecting the lower, middle, and upper classes.

“Methamphetamine cuts across all sections of society,” said Gilbride. “There is not one type of individual, one type of group that manufactures methamphetamine.”

The DEA says the ten people arrested Thursday face charges of operating illegal drug labs. Agents say the toxic chemicals they used to make these drugs pose a threat to anyone living nearby.

"Individuals who operate clandestine labs are not only putting themselves in harm's way," said Gilbride. "They are putting their neighbors, their coworkers, their friends, anyone in their apartment who gets in contact with these chemicals. They are putting everyone in harm's way."

And the DEA says that could put them behind bars for up to 20 years.

Speakout: Colorado's Indian Reservations In Need Of More Policing, Judges (RMN)

By Troy A. Eid

Rocky Mountain News, December 2, 2006

TOWAOC - At first glance, this picturesque village, nestled beneath Sleeping Ute Mountain near the Four Corners monument and a short drive from Mesa Verde National Park, might seem an unlikely candidate to be the murder capital of Colorado.

Just over 2,000 tribal members live on the entire Ute Mountain Ute Indian Reservation south of Cortez, many in or near Towaoc (pronounced toy- ACK), seat of the tribal government. Yet this year alone, there have been a staggering five murders and one unexplained death on that reservation.

Immediately to the east, the Southern Ute Indian Reservation south of Durango is home to about 1,400 tribal members. Two victims have been murdered there so far this year, including an infant thrown against a wall. The recent death of a third person is still being investigated.

Taken together, the murder rate for Colorado's two Indian nations is 20 times higher than the state average. It rivals the number of murders in Colorado Springs, the state's second-largest city with a population of 360,890.

What accounts for this appalling rate of violent crime in southwestern Colorado?

Both tribes would benefit from more boots-on-the-ground law enforcement. This is especially true on the Ute Mountain Ute Reservation, which lacks its own tribal police force. Just five police officers from the Bureau of Indian Affairs, part of the U.S. Department of the Interior, patrol the entire 600,000-acre reservation.

Some tribes, such as Southern Ute, have created their own professional police departments and court systems. For more than two decades, however, the Ute Mountain Ute Tribe has chosen not to have its own tribal law enforcement officers and judges and instead relies entirely on the BIA.

Unfortunately for the Ute Mountain Ute Tribe, BIA's tribal court system has operated only sporadically for the past few years.

Federal law ordinarily governs felonies committed on Indian reservations. The Federal Bureau of Investigation has the lead role for handling most felony investigations on Colorado's two Indian reservations. The lone FBI agent assigned to southwestern Colorado does a superb job under extraordinarily trying circumstances. So do the two assistant U.S. attorneys in Durango who prosecute major crimes on the reservations - functioning like deputy district attorneys do elsewhere in Colorado.

These and other federal officials attempting to serve justice on Colorado's two Indian reservations face many challenges.

Yet no obstacle to the equitable and effective administration of justice is more difficult than this: There is not a single permanent federal trial court judge anywhere in western Colorado, or anywhere outside of Denver.

Restricting federal trial judges to the state capital is remarkable even for a large Western state. Even far less populous states such as Wyoming, Idaho and Montana have long provided courthouses with permanent trial judges in more than one geographic region.

In contrast, the nearest permanent federal court to our fellow citizens who happen to live in southwestern Colorado is up to nine hours away by car, in downtown Denver. Perhaps nowhere else in the entire United States south of Alaska must people travel so far to serve on, or be served by, a federal trial jury or grand jury.

A lone part-time federal magistrate in Durango provides invaluable support to the criminal justice system. But in nearly every case, witnesses to violent crimes and their alleged perpetrators must still travel repeatedly to Denver. So do federal agents and prosecutors who, in the ultimate irony, are often tethered to the federal courthouse in Denver when violent crimes are occurring in southwestern Colorado.

Yet another challenge involves the rising use and trafficking of methamphetamine on Ute Mountain Ute and Southern Ute reservations. Gangs based off-reservation sometimes offer free samples of crystal meth - or "ice," as it is known - specifically targeting Native American people. As users get hooked, they turn to dealing and other crimes on-reservation to sustain their addiction.

Difficult though these challenges are, there are promising signs of change after so many years of neglect. U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar met recently with Alberto Gonzales, attorney general of the United States, to discuss strengthening federal law enforcement and judicial resources for southwestern Colorado. Leaders from the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration, U.S. Attorney's Office, and other federal agencies are working more closely than ever before with the elected leaders of the Southern Ute and Ute Mountain Ute tribes and their representatives.

For those of us serving in federal law enforcement, this is a case where the proof of our good intentions must be measured by real results. Too many lives have already been lost in the Southern Ute and Ute Mountain Ute nations. This is a state and national disgrace, and it must end. To cynics who say it will take too long to turn this tragedy around, our answer must be: Let's get started.

Drug Importers Sentenced (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, December 2, 2006

Couple recruited African to swallow heroin pills

The man from Ghana refused to reveal the contents of his stomach until he reached the hospital. There, faced with the prospect of an X-ray, he started to tell Maryland immigration authorities his death-defying tale.

An emigre in the United States recruited Hopkins Appau back in Africa to swallow dozens of pellets filled with heroin. He boarded a plane, arrived in Baltimore and greeted his American bosses from his motherland -- a longtime Washington municipal employee and his immigrant wife living in a suburban townhouse.

A U.S. District Court judge in Baltimore sentenced the couple, Godfrey Bonsu, 44, and his wife, Victoria Boateng, 42, both of Bowie, to lengthy prison terms yesterday for running a drug courier business out of a Takoma Park Quality Inn.

They were found guilty in February by a federal jury of conspiracy to import and distribute heroin. Yesterday, Bonsu received a 14-year prison term while Boateng was ordered to prison for slightly more than 11 years.

"I'm really sorry. ... I let my children down," Bonsu told the judge. "I had a good job."

U.S. District Judge Catherine C. Blake increased both of their prison terms after finding that they were supervisors or managers of the drug conspiracy.

"The couriers testified to being given various instructions by the defendants, such as drinking milk, waiting at the hotel and calling the defendants when the pellets were ready," Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Hanlon wrote in court papers.

In the Maryland case investigated by U. S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, prosecutors argued that in 2003 and 2004, Bonsu and Boateng recruited couriers from Ghana to smuggle heroin from Ghana, Germany and the United Kingdom.

Appau, who was arrested in December 2004, carried almost 600 grams of heroin, or about 60 internal pellets.

His fellow courier, James Manu, arrested in September of that year, filled his stomach with 69 pellets and lined his clothing with an additional 3 kilograms of heroin. Yesterday, the judge also determined that Bonsu had obstructed justice by testifying falsely at a pretrial suppression hearing, leading to another enhancement of his sentence.

Bonsu "was employed, he contributed to society," Blake said at the hearing. But despite some undisclosed information the couple provided to authorities about the drug trade, she could not excuse their role as leaders.

Law enforcement agents use a variety of techniques to catch such drug couriers.

"Sometimes we have intelligence provided by an informant or you see that something is wrong with a person," Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent Steve Robertson said in an interview shortly after the Bonsu-Boateng convictions in February.

Agents usually try to wait the courier out, taking suspects into a bathroom with a screen to catch excrement. The pellets don't throw up very well, according to Robertson.

"But it's incredibly dangerous. Stomach acids can burn a hole in them. But sometimes people will swallow them and tie them to a back molar and then they pull it back up through their throat," said the agent, who spent 17 years in drug interdiction work on the Southwest border.

Pittston Twp. Cop Arrested On Drug Trafficking Charges (CV)

Citizens Voice, December 2, 2006

PITTSTON TWP. — A part-time township police officer who also worked in other communities was arrested Friday on federal drug trafficking and illegal handgun possession charges.

Patrolman Charles M. Byra Jr., 28, a township resident, was charged with possession of crack cocaine and marijuana with intent to sell and with carrying a stolen gun, which he allegedly used while drug trafficking, according to the criminal complaint.

If convicted, Byra could face from five years to life in prison and close to $2 million in fines.

The arrest follows an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the state police that spanned most of this year. Even after Byra was in custody, investigators searched the township police office for more evidence.

"They took everything pertaining to him — log sheets, time sheets, evidence pertaining to his cases," said Chief Stephen Rinaldi.

The chief said Byra had worked for his department since February 2005.

"He was a good cop. It's very disappointing to me. Any time you asked him to do something, he'd do it," Rinaldi said.

Byra also has worked as a part-time officer in Avoca, Dupont and worked for about a month in Duryea in 2005. Part-time officers are hired on a month-to-month basis in the communities.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Houser said Friday it was against policy to comment on charges against a defendant.

Byra was taken to federal court in Scranton to hear the charges against him on Friday afternoon. U.S. Magistrate Judge Malachy E. Mannion order him detained until a detention hearing in federal court in Wilkes-Barre on Wednesday at 10:30 a.m.

The hearing will determine whether he should remain incarcerated or be released on bail.

His preliminary examination hearing is set for Dec. 13 at 3:30 p.m. in federal court in Scranton to determine if there is sufficient evidence to send the charges to trial.

Officer Faces Charges (PAPN)

Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA), December 3, 2006

LUZERNE COUNTY

PITTSTON TWP.

A Pittston Twp. police officer has been charged in federal court with felony drug and weapons offenses after an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. Federal officials said Michael Byra Jr., 28, could face a sentence of up to life in prison and fines up to $2 million if convicted of all offenses lodged against him.

Byra was charged in U.S. District Court in Scranton on Friday with possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine, possession with intent to distribute marijuana, possession of a firearm during a felony drug trafficking transaction and possession of a stolen firearm.

Byra was being held by federal authorities at an undisclosed location.

Source: Cop Took Evidence In Drug Cases (TLPA)

Times Leader, December 2, 2006

SCRANTON – Pittston Township police officer Charles Michael Byra Jr. recently testified that he's made at least 60 drug busts, arresting out-of-town drug dealers who make a habit of staying at a specific township motel on weekends.

On Friday, Byra, 28, found himself as a defendant facing the same charges.

A source close to the investigation said Byra was arrested on suspicion he stole evidence connected to mainly drug cases when he worked as a part-time officer in Dupont earlier this year.

Dupont Mayor Daniel Lello said Byra was employed as a part-time officer in Dupont but hasn't worked since the evidence – heroin, cocaine, marijuana, guns, about $10,000 in cash from drug busts, numerous files, and a log book – was reported missing earlier this year.

"After the incident happened, I didn't put him on anymore," Lello said.

Byra was arrested by state police at Wyoming and turned over to federal agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Friday morning.

He appeared nervous often conversing with his lawyer, Ingrid Cronin, when he appeared before U.S. Magistrate Judge Malachy Mannion in federal court in Scranton Friday afternoon.

Byra was charged with two counts of possession with intent to distribute marijuana, and one count each of possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine, carrying a firearm during a drug transaction and possession of a stolen firearm, a Highpoint .380-caliber pistol, according to the federal criminal complaint.

U.S. Assistant Attorney William Houser declined to comment about the allegations against Byra. Mannion approved a request by Houser to seal the affidavit of probable cause, which is a narrative description of what police say happened.

During Friday's brief hearing in federal court, Houser said there are numerous recordings that implicate Byra.

Cronin refused to comment.

Byra was ordered to be held by federal authorities until Wednesday when a detention hearing is tentatively scheduled for 10:30 a.m. Wednesday at the federal courthouse in Scranton. A preliminary examination, commonly known as a preliminary hearing, is tentatively set for Dec. 13 at the federal courthouse in Scranton.

Throughout the morning and into the early afternoon, state and federal authorities removed boxes of evidence and several filing cabinets from the Pittston Township Police Department.

Township police Chief Stephen Rinaldi said he couldn't comment. Rinaldi did say Byra was employed as a township officer for nearly two years.

Township Supervisor Anthony Attardo said a decision will be made whether to suspend or terminate Byra from the police department. Attardo said whatever action is taken, Byra is entitled to a hearing before the supervisors.

According to Times Leader archives, Byra previously worked as a police officer in Ashley, Avoca, Sugar Notch and Warrior Run.

Lack Of Cooperation Hinders Baseball's Steroid Inquiry (NYT)

By Jack Curry

The New York Times, December 2, 2006

George J. Mitchell, the former Senate majority leader who is leading an investigation into steroid use in baseball, said in a statement yesterday that some parties he would not name had not cooperated with investigators. Because of that lack of cooperation, Mitchell said, it will take longer to complete the investigation.

"My investigative staff has conducted hundreds of interviews and received thousands of documents; however, much more work will be necessary," he said. "Cooperation has been good from many of those with whom we have sought testimony and documents, but has been less good from some others."

Since Mitchell does not have the power to force anyone connected with possible steroid use to testify, he has been stalled in pursuing some information. Several team officials have given testimony, but no players have acknowledged speaking with Mitchell. Mitchell has repeatedly declined to offer a timetable for when the investigation might be finished.

"This will not affect the result of the investigation, but it has increased the length of time it will take to complete the investigation," said Mitchell, who gave the statement after inquiries from reporters.

"It is for that reason I will continue the policy of not attempting to predict when the investigation will conclude, other than to say that we are pressing forward and will conclude our work as soon as possible," he said. "It's important to finish this job as soon as possible, but it's even more important to do it right."

When Commissioner Bud Selig appointed Mitchell as the investigator more than eight months ago, it was believed that he was targeting Barry Bonds, something Selig has denied. Bonds has 734 career home runs, 21 short of Hank Aaron's career record. Mitchell has not revealed whether he has interviewed Bonds, but it seemed unlikely. Bonds said last season that he had not spoken to any investigators.

"When I accepted this assignment, I said that I intended to conduct an investigation that is objective, thorough and fair," Mitchell said. "That remains my intention."

MLB's Steroids Probe Delayed By Lack Of Power No Timetable For Probe's Conclusion, Mitchell Says (AP)

AP, December 1, 2006

NEW YORK - Former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell said his probe into steroid use in baseball has been delayed because he lacks power to order testimony.

Mitchell was hired by commissioner Bud Selig last March following more than a year of allegations against Barry Bonds, Mark McGwire and other stars. No timetable was set for Mitchell's report.

"When I began, I was, of course, aware that I do not have the power to compel testimony or the production of documents," Mitchell said in a statement Friday. "From the outset I believed that the absence of such power would significantly increase the amount of time necessary to complete the investigation, and it has."

A Third Way On Drug Laws (WP)

By Kevin A. Sabet

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Some say that the state of Michoacan, deep in south Mexico, is where the "war on drugs" really started, back in 1985. It was there that Mexican drug lords upped the stakes by burying in a shallow grave the body of a young Drug Enforcement Administration agent, Enrique Camarena, whom they had kidnapped and killed. The U.S. Congress responded months later with strict anti-drug laws, including a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years in prison for anyone trafficking in five grams of crack cocaine or 500 grams of powder cocaine.

At that time, crack was certainly producing more violence on the streets than powder cocaine, and beat cops were expressing frustration at this ever-increasing drug market. Undoubtedly it was a time to enact "tough" legislation. But today, more than 20 years later, drug-related killings remain commonplace in that region of Mexico. Six police officers were found dead there one day last month. And though crack cocaine use has decreased dramatically since the mid-1980s, the debate over what to do about our drug problem rages on.

On the same day as the recent police killings in Mexico, the U.S. Sentencing Commission -- an independent judicial body that advises Congress on sentencing laws -- held hearings on the effectiveness of the federal cocaine law. Should five grams of crack cocaine continue to trigger the same sentence as 500 grams of powder cocaine? The answer is clearly no.

The Sentencing Commission has written that there is a "widely held perception that the current penalty structure . . . promotes unwarranted disparity based on race." The evidence that trafficking laws disproportionately affect blacks is hard to quantify, since there is little national demographic data on traffickers. Still, this law undoubtedly helps funnel young black men (a mind-boggling 85 percent of federal defendants in crack cocaine cases are black) into prison at rates that should cause us concern.

Most of these people are street-level dealers rather than high-level traffickers. Theoretically, a mid-to-high-level dealer caught with 499 grams of cocaine could get a lighter sentence than any one of the scores of much lower-level crack dealers he supplied the drug to (crack is a simple combination of powder cocaine and baking soda). Perhaps most troubling, the law has caused many Americans to lose faith in the criminal justice system even as it has increased racial division.

If current laws are unjustified, what are the alternatives? Many drug policy activists will tell you that "our laws don't work" and then quickly conclude that legalization is the most sensible solution. But there's no evidence that works either. If addiction, sickness and community decay are concerns, then it must be said that drug legalization has failed as a social experiment -- witness the massive problems of legalized drugs in other places (remember Switzerland's Needle Park?) or legalized tobacco today (where commercialization fuels addiction and high profits).

But of course no serious drug policy analyst can look you in the eye and tell you that our only alternatives are strict prohibition or lax legalization. There is, in fact, a comfortable position closer to the middle: We can reform the worst parts of our laws without fearing massive increases in drug use. Erasing or dramatically closing the gap between the sentences for crack cocaine and powder cocaine is a good example of this.

The commission last argued for a 20-to-1 sentencing ratio (as opposed to the present 100-to-1) as a politically sensitive solution, and some members of Congress have argued for wiping out the distinction altogether. Just about anything would be better than current policy.

It sounds easier than it is, of course, but the current political climate may be just right. President Bush, two days before his first inauguration, expressed a desire for a change, telling CNN that the law "ought to be addressed by making sure the powder cocaine and the crack cocaine penalties are the same," because he didn't "believe we ought to be discriminatory." With the president now saying he is ready to work with the newly elected Democratic leadership, reform could be within reach.

Such a move would be more about making our drug policies "smart," and less about looking "tough." And it certainly would be about time.

Editorial | Internet Drug Trafficking (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 2, 2006

Almost anyone with an e-mail address has received those annoying spam messages offering prescription drugs without a prescription. Most folks simply hit "delete" and think no more of it.

But as Inquirer reporter John Shiffman recently chronicled in a page-turner of an investigative series, illegal Internet drug trafficking is a lucrative, dangerous business. Stopping these illicit cyber drug rings requires dedicated, technologically savvy law enforcement agents and a high level of cooperation among federal, state and local authorities.

Fortunately, that's exactly what happened in Operation Cyber Chase, an investigation led by the Drug Enforcement Administration. The Inquirer's "Drugnet" series (http://go.philly.com/drugnet) provided a behind-the-scenes look at how authorities captured Akhil Bansal.

The grad student living in Roxborough had an online operation that illegally sold about 2.5 million doses per month of controlled substances to more than 100,000 customers. Bansal supplied eight drug organizations operating more than 200 Web sites with painkillers, steroids and other controlled substances smuggled from India, where his father was a physician. In all, 25 co-conspirators were arrested.

These drug networks involve much more than people trying to make a fast buck. They harm their customers, including many teens, who become addicted to pills. They are responsible for overdose deaths. Some drugs are counterfeit; some haven't been stored properly. They come without instructions; they come without any consultation with a licensed physician.

A 2003 study by Monitoring the Future (funded in part by the National Institutes of Health) found that abuse among 12th graders of Vicodin, a narcotic pain-reliever, was second only to marijuana. Parents previously worried about their children encountering drug pushers on street corners; the Internet allows far more sophisticated pushers direct access to their homes.

Tougher, updated laws could help slow the flow of illegal controlled substances. Federal law enforcement authorities work under the auspices of the 1970s-era Controlled Substances Act, enacted long before the Internet came into use.

Some states are catching on to the public health threat. Kentucky enacted an Internet pharmacy law in 2005 that requires anyone shipping controlled substances into the state to register with the Attorney General's Office. Pennsylvania does not have such a law; New Jersey introduced a bill this year, but it stalled in the General Assembly.

Many of the Web sites selling these drugs operate overseas. To shut them down requires international cooperation, which can be slow and complicated.

U.S. drug wholesalers need to step up their efforts, too. These companies are privy to unusual sales patterns; for example, when a small pharmacy starts ordering much larger amounts of narcotics than it had in the past. Not all wholesalers are living up to their legal obligation to report suspicious activity.

State medical boards should speak out against online doctor-patient "relationships." The Federation of State Medical Boards has said that a patient filling out an online questionnaire to be reviewed by a cyber doctor "does not constitute an acceptable standard of care."

Also, the public's attitude about pills needs to change. Street drugs such as heroin are understood to be harmful and illegal because the user injects a needle into his or her arm. Narcotics in pill form are just as dangerous, just as addictive, and these days are much easier to obtain.

Afghanistan Opium Crop Sets Record (WP)

By Karen Deyoung, Washington Post Staff Writer

U.S.-Backed Efforts At Eradication Fail

Opium production in Afghanistan, which provides more than 90 percent of the world's heroin, broke all records in 2006, reaching a historic high despite ongoing U.S.-sponsored eradication efforts, the Bush administration reported yesterday.

In addition to a 26 percent production increase over past year -- for a total of 5,644 metric tons -- the amount of land under cultivation in opium poppies grew by 61 percent. Cultivation in the two main production provinces, Helmand in the southwest and Oruzgan in central Afghanistan, was up by 132 percent.

White House drug policy chief John Walters called the news "disappointing."

The administration has cited resurgent Taliban forces as the main impediment to stabilization and reconstruction efforts in Afghanistan, and the U.S. military investment has far exceeded anti-narcotic and development programs. But U.S. military and intelligence officials have increasingly described the drug trade as a problem that rivals and in some ways exceeds the Taliban, threatening to derail other aspects of U.S. policy.

"It is truly the Achilles' heel of Afghanistan," Gen. James L. Jones, the supreme allied commander for NATO, said in a recent speech at the Council on Foreign Relations. Afghanistan is NATO's biggest operation, with more than 30,000 troops. Drug cartels with their own armies engage in regular combat with NATO forces deployed in Afghanistan, he said. "It would be wrong to say that this is just the Taliban. I think I need to set that record straight," he added.

"They have their own capability to inflict damage, to make sure that the roads and the passages stay open and they get to where they want to go, whether it's through Pakistan, Iran, up through Russia and all the known trade routes. So this is a very violent cartel," Jones said. "They are buying their protection by funding other organizations, from criminal gangs to tribes, to inciting any kind of resistance to keep the government off of their back."

Any disruption of the drug trade has enormous implications for Afghanistan's economic and political stability. Although its relative strength in the overall economy has diminished as other sectors have expanded in recent years, narcotics is a $2.6 billion-a-year industry that this year provided more than a third of the country's gross domestic product. Farmers who cultivate opium poppies receive only a small percentage of the profits, but U.S. officials estimate the crop provides up to 12 times as much income per acre as conventional farming, and there is violent local resistance to eradication.

"It's almost the devil's own problem," CIA Director Michael V. Hayden told Congress last month. "Right now the issue is stability. . . . Going in there in itself and attacking the drug trade actually feeds the instability that you want to overcome."

"Attacking the problem directly in terms of the drug trade . . . would undermine the attempt to gain popular support in the region," agreed Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency. "There's a real conflict, I think."

The Afghan government has prohibited the aerial herbicide spraying used by U.S. anti-narcotic programs in Latin America. Instead, opium poppy plants in Afghanistan are destroyed by tractors dragging heavy bars. But only 38,500 of nearly 430,000 acres under cultivation were eradicated this year.

Because of security concerns and local sensibilities, all eradication is done by Afghan police, and corruption is a major problem at every level from cultivation to international trafficking. Although the drug trade is believed to provide some financing to the Taliban, most experts believe it is largely an organized criminal enterprise. According to a major report on the Afghan drug industry jointly released last week by the World Bank and the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, key narcotics traffickers "work closely with sponsors in top government and political positions."

The report drew specific attention to the Afghan Interior Ministry, saying its officials were increasingly involved in providing protection for and facilitating consolidation of the drug industry in the hands of leading traffickers. "At the lower levels," the report said, "payments to police to avoid eradication or arrest reportedly are very widespread. At higher levels, provincial and district police chief appointments appear to be a tool for key traffickers and sponsors to exercise control and favor their proteges at middle levels in the drug industry."

Opium cultivation was outlawed during Taliban rule in the late 1990s and was nearly eliminated by 2001. After the overthrow of the Taliban government by U.S. forces in the fall of that year, the Bush administration said that keeping a lid on production was among its highest priorities. But corruption and alliances formed by Washington and the Afghan government with anti-Taliban tribal chieftains, some of whom are believed to be deeply involved in the trade, undercut the effort.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai recently noted that "once we thought terrorism was Afghanistan's biggest enemy" but said that now "poppy, its cultivation and drugs are Afghanistan's major enemy."

Eradication and alternative development programs have made little discernible headway. Cultivation -- measured annually with high-resolution satellite imagery that is then parsed by analysts using specialized computer software -- is nearly double its highest pre-Karzai level.

"There is supposed to be a tremendous energy associated with this," Jones said of the counter-narcotics programs, "but it needs a fresh look because . . . we're losing ground.

Afghan Opium Breaks All Records, U.S. Says (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, December 2, 2006

Afghanistan's opium crop, which provides almost all the world's heroin, has broken all records despite U.S.-sponsored purge efforts, the White House says.

In addition to a 26 percent production increase over past year -- for a total of 5,644 metric tons -- the acreage used for opium poppies grew by 61 percent, the White House said.

Cultivation in the two main production provinces, Helmand and Oruzgan, was up by 132 percent.

White House drug policy chief John Walters called the news "disappointing."

U.S. military and intelligence officials increasingly describe Afghanistan's drug trade as a problem that in some ways exceeds that of the Taliban, The Washington Post reports.

Drug cartels with their own armies engage in regular combat with NATO forces in Afghanistan, NATO Spreme Allied Commander Gen. James L. Jones said.

"It would be wrong to say that this is just the Taliban. I think I need to set that record straight," he said.

IMMIGRATION:

Congress Open To Passing Bill On Immigration (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

Congress will approve an immigration bill that will grant citizenship rights to most of the 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens in the U.S. after Democrats take control next month, predict both sides on Capitol Hill.

While Republicans have been largely splintered on the issue of immigration reform, Democrats have been fairly unified behind the principle that the illegals currently in the country should get citizenship rights without having to first leave the country.

"Years of dawdling have worsened our border security and made it harder to fix this broken system," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who will lead the Judiciary Committee next year. "We should not let partisan politics and intolerance continue to delay and derail effective reform."

Democrats in both chambers say they will start with some form of legislation first drafted by Sens. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, which was the basis for the bill that was approved earlier this year by the Senate.

"This past May, the Senate Judiciary Committee reported and then the Senate passed bipartisan versions of comprehensive immigration reform to bring people out of the shadows while strengthening our borders," Mr. Leahy said. "I look forward to building on that work next year and making progress on a bipartisan effort that improves security, supports our economy and respects the dignity of all people."

House Republicans and many outside Congress derided that bill as "amnesty" for allowing illegals to remain in the U.S. and eventually become citizens. Democrats say it's not amnesty because aliens must pay a fine and wait years before becoming citizens.

"The Senate bill is pure amnesty," said Rep. Jack Kingston, Georgia Republican. "Dress it up any way you want, it's still amnesty. It lets people pay their way out of sneaking into the country illegally."

With President Bush as an ally in the White House, he worries, Democrats will proceed next year with legislation to ultimately make citizens out of most of the illegals now in the country. And Republicans, still reeling from deep losses in the November elections, will give up the fight.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, California Republican, said he expects an immigration-reform bill that doesn't deport illegal aliens to be the only significant legislation to come out of the new Democratic Congress and win Mr. Bush's approval.

"The only real legislation that can be expected from Congress is amnesty," he said. "If they come up with a plan and the president is behind it, it will pick up a lot of our own members."

Republicans also expressed little confidence that their leadership team is committed to blocking amnesty.

The group Americans for Better Immigration, which supports tougher immigration policies, has given Republican leaders mixed grades on the issue. But on the issue of amnesty, the grades have been much worse.

Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House Republican leader, has a "D"; Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, the House Republican whip, scores a "C+." Incoming House Republican Conference Chairman Adam H. Putnam of Florida, who has co-sponsored legislation that many view as amnesty, scores an "F-" from the group on the issue.

Still, Mr. Boehner and Mr. Blunt can claim credit for thwarting the Senate immigration bill earlier this year. But now the only hope, Republicans say, is that some of the conservative Democrats who beat Republican incumbents this year will side with conservatives in the House to block anything that smells like amnesty.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, the Colorado Republican and a leading critic of amnesty, was initially dejected by November's elections, fearing that Democrats would ram through immigration reform. But a recent congressional trip with conservative-leaning "Blue Dog" Democrats changed his mind.

They don't want to touch the issue, he said, after seeing fissures already develop among Democrats' base voters on the issue. Illegal-alien advocacy groups think the Senate bill is too harsh on illegal aliens because it imposes fines on all and excludes others with criminal records. Those groups also insist future workers have a direct path to citizenship -- a requirement that labor unions fiercely oppose.

"I think it's going to be much more difficult for them to do than I had thought the day after the election," Mr. Tancredo said.

Most likely, he said, Democrats will succeed at undoing plans to build 700 miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border.

"The thing that's in the greatest jeopardy right now is the fence, because they do have the appropriations process and that's probably the one they can stop," Mr. Tancredo said.

TAX:

Senator-Elect From The Farm Makes Small Firms A Priority (USNEWS)

By Renuka Rayasam

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

Jon Tester got into Montana politics about eight years ago because he thought that the state's 1997 energy deregulation policies were unfair to small companies. Last year, as Montana Senate president, he won enactment of legislation offering tax credits to make health insurance more affordable to companies with two to nine employees. Even after taking time off from campaigning to harvest grain for his organic farm, the fiscally conservative Democrat still narrowly beat out Republican incumbent Conrad Burns in last month's U.S. Senate race. Tester will be a member of the Senate Committee on Small Business and Entrepreneurship.

Tell me about the farm you run with your wife, Sharla, 12 miles west of Big Sandy, Mont.

The farm we run [growing lentils, barley, peas, and gluten-free grain] as a business adds value through organics. We also shut down a custom butcher shop that processed animals for the neighbors. Both things came handed to me generationally. My grandparents started the farm we operate in 1916. My dad and mom set up the custom butcher shop in the 1960s.

How has being a farmer and business owner shaped your view of small-business issues?

If you look at what has built this country, it has been small business and working families. They are critical to the economic success of the country. We're a mom and pop operation. Some of the things we experience are regulations set up more from a big-business standpoint. Small business is taxed with potential accounting measures set up for Enron and things like that.

What are some of the issues important to small business?

You have to make sure you're not putting undue burden on small business from a tax and regulation standpoint.

Does that burden include the Internal Revenue Service crackdown on small companies in order to close the tax gap?

If there's some tax fraud, it needs to be cracked down on. But tax problems don't come from the small-business community. They come from businesses locating offshore and things like that.

You are a former school board chairman. How do you think education relates to small business?

A well-trained workforce is critical to small-business success. What I hear from business is that it's hard to find help that meets their needs. Right now we're breaking ground on a technical college in Great Falls to facilitate a better workforce. You've got to have a good public education system so small-business owners, when they locate to an area, are confident their kids are getting the best education possible. I feel strongly about local control in school districts. Things like [the] No Child Left Behind [Act] take away local control, but a local school board knows best what a district needs.

How will the healthcare debate affect small-business owners?

Healthcare is very much a high priority for me. Healthcare is also a huge issue for business, both big and small. But that's an issue that hasn't been addressed at all yet from a small-business standpoint.

It looks as if the federal minimum wage will climb next year. What effect will that have on small companies?

I don't think that's going to impact small business in the least. It's so minimal you can't get good people at that wage level. If you are going to have someone stay with you any length of time, you are going to have to pay them more.

What advice do you have for other small-business owners?

You've got to be smart and deliver the kind of service and commodity that the customer wants. You have to be smart financially, and you can't overextend yourself. Make sure you have a sharp pencil.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

More Disorder In The Court? (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

Just days before last month's elections, a conservative weekly's website suggested that a member of the U.S. Supreme Court was gravely ill and that friends had been asked to pray for 86-year-old Justice John Paul Stevens.

Such rumors are normally "too ghoulish to repeat publicly," wrote Sean Rushton on HumanEvents.com. But with control of the Senate at stake, it is "news that should be considered," he said, even if it's unfounded.

That get-out-the-vote effort stuck out even in a campaign full of cynical appeals. Today, nearly a month after Democrats won both houses of Congress, the Stevens scuttlebutt remains uncorroborated–the senior justice has participated fully in recent arguments, as has Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, 73, who's also been the subject of rumors of poor health. But the effort by Rushton, former director of a conservative group devoted to winning approval of White House judicial nominations, underscored the right wing's investment in the issue of high court nominees. With newly powerful Democrats like New York Sen. Charles Schumer of the Judiciary Committee vowing an end to "the days of hard-right judges," the nominee game has become far more complicated.

Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the Democrat who will chair the Judiciary Committee, said he is willing to work with Bush but noted that "the power to avoid destructive political warfare over a vacancy on the Supreme Court lies with the president." So what does that mean for future nominations? The new dynamic has unleashed speculation over whom President Bush may consider if he gets another opportunity to nominate a Supreme Court justice–it would be his third–during his remaining two years. And it has reinvigorated strategy sessions on all sides to assess the many "what if's."

Would the lame-duck president instigate a potentially unwinnable war with Senate Democrats by putting up a conservative in the mold of Samuel Alito, described recently by a GOP activist as "one of the most conservative federal appeals court judges ever confirmed"? Or would he work with Democrats to build consensus around a moderate conservative with a shot at winning a Senate confirmation vote? And would the president try to make history with a Hispanic nominee–or make up for his failed effort to get White House Counsel Harriet Miers on the bench and pick a woman?

"Obviously, everything changed when the majority changed," says Mark Agrast of the liberal Center for American Progress. "The issue of filibuster, which colored the whole discussion previously, is off the table, and nominees now will go through the regular order: from Judiciary Committee, to the Senate floor, and to a vote." And both sides are eager to test the waters.

The View From the Right

Leonard Leo of the conservative Federalist Society is already urging Bush to stick with his strategy of picking nominees that please the right, even without a GOP Senate majority. "No matter who he nominates, it's going to be a firefight," said Leo, a behind-the-scenes player in the administration's judicial nomination strategy. "What's the worst that happens? The cost of not doing the right thing is greater than a nominee going down in flames." He and others on the right believe that if the president has the opportunity, he'll nominate a woman. And the top name on their list is Edith Hollan Jones of Texas. Appointed in 1985 to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in Houston by President Reagan, Jones, 57, is now a chief judge and has been on the Supreme Court shortlist since the president's father was in office.

Lawmakers Wrapping Up Session But Leaving Loose Ends (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

New York Times, December 3, 2006

Republicans intend to conclude the 109th Congress this week and leave Democrats stuck with the tab in the form of unfinished spending bills as the days of Republican rule draw to a close on Capitol Hill.

Congressional leaders said election losses had sapped Republican enthusiasm for trying to finish nine spending measures that were due Oct. 1. Congress will instead pass a stopgap measure to keep the government running until mid-February, leaving the fiscal tangle for the new Democratic majority to sort out next year.

Republicans will, however, try to record some final accomplishments as they intend to adjourn by Friday. They would like to extend a number of popular tax breaks rather than see Democrats get credit for restoring them next year. House Republicans also plan to try to push through an expansion of offshore oil and gas drilling opportunities and will take a symbolic anti-abortion vote before Democrats, many of whom support abortion rights, take control in January.

On Tuesday, the Senate Armed Services Committee will convene a hearing on the nomination of Robert M. Gates to be defense secretary. Members of both parties expect him to be approved by the end of the week to succeed Donald H. Rumsfeld unless a serious obstacle emerges in the hearing.

In any event, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader who is stepping down at the end of this Congress, does not intend to keep lawmakers around long.

“Senator Frist plans to adjourn the 109th Congress by week’s end,” his office said last week as it laid out a potential agenda.

The resistance to finishing the appropriations bills is not going over well with Democrats, who have accused Republicans of acting irresponsibly. The unfinished business could also prove a distraction for members of the incoming majority who would like to spend the first weeks of 2007 moving ahead with their own agenda rather than cleaning up from 2006.

“They cut and run from the troops by not doing their oversight, and now they are cutting and running from the country by not passing the spending bills,” said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who will be the chairman of the Democratic caucus next year.

But Republicans noted that Democrats had failed to finish their spending bills after the 2002 elections gave Republicans control of the Senate. And they said inaction on the appropriations measures would save the government money by holding spending at current levels rather than providing increases to federal agencies or establishing new programs.

“Every week we don’t pass the bills, we save money,” said Mr. Frist’s chief of staff, Eric M. Ueland.

Republicans struggled throughout the 109th Congress with budget and appropriations measures, caught between conservatives who wanted to hold down spending and more moderate lawmakers who sought to increase investment in health, education and other programs.

Congress this year sent only 2 of 11 spending bills — those covering the Pentagon and the Department of Homeland Security — to President Bush, leaving much of the government operating under what is known as a continuing resolution. Senate conservatives have led the opposition to trying to finish the bills, arguing that they do not want to see a flurry of wasteful pet projects inserted into a huge appropriations package that few would be able to decipher. But others said failing to pass the bills would leave agencies unable to deal with new demands like a need for increased veterans care.

Republicans would also like to renew tax breaks like the tuition tax credit, federal income tax deduction for state sales tax, and a business research and development tax credit. Those provisions have been tied up in disputes over other legislation all year. The tax breaks could run into trouble again if lawmakers try to use the package to gain approval of more controversial items, like a trade agreement with Vietnam. The bill might also be used to suspend a cut in doctor fees under Medicare.

With an eye on a new Democratic majority that will be less inclined to expand offshore drilling, House Republican leaders have decided to allow a vote on a Senate measure that would open about 8 million acres in the eastern Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas exploration rather than hold out for a more expansive House bill.

The House approach, which would end longstanding drilling bans along much of the nation's coast, has no chance of approval in the Senate before Congress adjourns. The oil industry and its allies persuaded the House leadership to agree to a vote on the Senate bill as the best chance to win new drilling rights.

"With the results of this past election, this Congressional session may be the only chance we have for years to come to produce more oil offshore," said Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, who hailed the measure that would steer millions of dollars in royalties to his state and others along the Gulf Coast.

The House leadership intends to try to win passage of the legislation on Tuesday under an expedited process that limits amendments but requires the approval of two-thirds of those voting; should that fail, they may try to bring the bill back to the floor later in the week with a limit on amendments.

In a concession to abortion opponents, the Republican leadership plans on Wednesday to allow a vote on a measure that would require women seeking an abortion to be informed that the procedure could cause pain to the fetus and be given the option of anesthesia for the fetus. Even if approved by the House, the bill is not on the Senate schedule. And it may be the last anti-abortion measure brought to the House floor for some time, since the new Democratic majority strongly backs abortion rights.

Lame-duck Session Likely To Punt To Next Congress (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON

The "lame-duck" Congress opening this week may fit its billing.

There's a vast unfinished agenda in the 109th Congress, including most of the fiscal 2007 spending bills, immigration reform, ethics rules for lawmakers, an offshore drilling bill, a fix for President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program, and an omnibus trade and tax package.

But after an election that shifted control of the House and Senate to Democrats, there's little political will to complete it this session.

"There are a lot of factors in play, and the difficulties haven't gone anywhere since the election," says Don Stewart, a spokesman for incoming Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell. "Both sides are talking a lot, but there hasn't been agreement yet. People are just going to keep talking until someone throws up their hands."

Congress is likely to punt on approving at least nine of the 12 spending bills for the fiscal year that began on Oct. 1.

All that means heavy lifting for Democrats in the 110th Congress, who will have to deal with old spending bills even as they are rolling out a signature agenda for the first 100 legislative days.

While expectations are fading for spending bills, the Senate is on track to confirm former CIA director Robert Gates as Defense secretary. The Senate Armed Services Committee opens hearings on the nomination Tuesday, which are expected to be vigorous but not deeply divisive.

"We have to have someone who will speak truth to power and not just tell a president what he wants to hear," said Sen. Carl Levin (D) of Michigan, the committee's incoming chairman, on NBC's "Meet the Press" Sunday. "It's likely that he's confirmed, but it's very important that there be a fair process."

Of the dozen postelection sessions Congress has held since World War II, several have had historical significance. In 1954, the Senate convened to censure Sen. Joseph McCarthy (R) of Wisconsin for his "lynch party"-style hearings on the dangers of communism. In 1974, Congress met to complete legislation delayed by the Watergate investigation. In 1998, the House met for two days to impeach President Clinton.

Since then, Congress has been driven into overtime after each election because of unfinished spending bills. Those lame-duck sessions became a free-for-all for adding earmarks to massive omnibus spending bills or, when that failed, postponing decisions until the next Congress.

Of the two strategies, say budget watchdog groups, punting to the next Congress may be preferable. "It will save a lot of money," says Tom Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste. "For now, taxpayers have a little bit of a Christmas present, because a continuing resolution spends the lower amount of last year's spending bill."

At press time both the House and Senate aimed to pass a continuing resolution for spending bills through Feb. 15, 2007.

The deadlock is similar to what happened in the waning hours of the 107th Congress, after Democrats lost control of the Senate. After failing to agree on spending, Congress opted to complete work on 11 unfinished appropriations bills in the new Congress. In 2002 and 2004, Congress used lame-duck sessions to negotiate vast omnibus spending bills, along with member "pork" projects to sweeten the deal.

Today, in the Senate, the main obstacle is a determined minority of conservatives who want assurances that no pork projects will be added to appropriations bills.

"We're trying to shut down the favor factory, at least until Christmas," says John Hart, a spokesman for Sen. Tom Coburn (R) of Oklahoma, who for the first time challenged individual earmarks, such as the proposed "bridge to nowhere" in Alaska, on the floor of the Senate in the 109th Congress. "We'll take a short-term [resolution] if it means not passing 10,000 earmarks in the last stages of the session."

Senate conservatives are also blocking a conference with the House over the $136 billion Military Quality of Life and Veterans Affairs spending bill, which cleared the Senate unanimously last month, in a bid to curb earmarks.

Other bills could break through the gridlock. On Friday, House Republicans agreed to allow a vote on a Senate compromise bill that would open new areas for oil and natural-gas development in the Gulf Coast, but maintain a ban on coastal drilling elsewhere. The bill also increases federal royalty shares for Gulf states from less than 2 percent to 37.5 percent. The more expansive House version of the bill would open drilling in any coastal area, unless states object.

Another compromise deal that could move this week is a package of popular tax extenders, including expiring state sales-tax deductions, college-tuition deductions, and the research-and-development tax credits that are a top priority of US business groups. This bill could be paired with expiring trade preferences for developing countries, including a measure that would allow Haiti to import textiles from countries such as China and sell them duty-free in the United States - a move strongly opposed by US textile manufacturers.

Meanwhile, lawmakers are engaged in the ups and downs of the coming power shift. Halls of congressional office buildings look like an army on the move. Defeated lawmakers, including several key committee chairmen, were due to be out of their offices by last Friday.

Lazy Ducks (WP)

ONE OF the basic functions of Congress is passing spending bills to fund the operations of government. Congress regularly fails to complete this work in a timely way, but the 109th Congress is set to leave on an especially negligent note. Unless something dramatic changes, it will limp to a close having completed work on just two spending bills for fiscal 2007, which began Oct. 1. The upshot is that, at best, the fiscal year will be nearly one-third over by the time the 110th Congress finishes the work left incomplete by the 109th.

This is inexcusable. The House passed all but one spending bill. The Senate Appropriations Committee reported all the spending measures by July, the earliest that's been accomplished in 18 years. Then the full Senate punted. Only two bills -- covering defense spending and homeland security -- became law; one other, for military construction, won initial Senate passage, but the conference agreement worked out with the House is now stalled.

Part of the reason -- or, to be more accurate, part of the excuse -- for the latest gridlock is a revolt by some conservative senators against earmarks in that bill. But none of the complaining senators offered any motion to strip the supposedly offending earmarks. And the reality is that their do-nothing strategy sat just fine with Senate Republican leaders, who dallied before the election and could have forced action in the lame-duck session.

Instead, they were happy to dump $460 billion in unfinished business on the new Democratic majority. One political plus for them is that the leftover mess threatens to snarl the Democrats' already full agenda at the start of the 110th Congress. Another is that it could force the new leaders to an early and unpleasant choice about whether to live within the Republicans' spending ceiling or look like hypocritical big spenders and risk a presidential veto.

We understand the political temptation to do mischief by doing nothing, but this is a gross abdication of lawmakers' fundamental responsibilities. It creates enormous problems across a broad spectrum of federal agencies, which have no assurance about what their final spending allowances will be. The new Congress confronts a full plate of important issues. The fiscal 2008 budget will arrive on lawmakers' desks in early February, most likely along with an oversized emergency spending request for operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. Getting all that business done will be hard enough for the 110th Congress without having to pull cleanup duty for the 109th.

Gates Criticized on Handling of Intelligence at CIA

When President George H.W. Bush nominated him to lead the CIA in 1991, Robert M. Gates was at 47 the youngest intelligence professional to achieve that distinction.

But during his Senate confirmation hearings, Gates -- a brilliant, smooth-operating Soviet specialist -- lost some of his luster. CIA colleagues came forward to testify that he had kowtowed to the wishes of his superiors and had manipulated intelligence to suit White House policy. Questions also arose about his involvement in the Reagan-era Iran-contra scandal.

Gates eventually won confirmation and held the CIA director's job for 14 months; even his critics describe it as a reasonably successful, modernizing tenure. Now another President Bush has picked Gates to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as secretary of defense, citing Gates's deep Washington experience, his knowledge of the Middle East and his recent work as a reformist university president in Texas as ideal preparation for the task of leading U.S. troops out of trouble in Iraq.

With bipartisan support on Capitol Hill for quickly putting the war under new command, Gates's controversial history is by all accounts highly unlikely to derail his confirmation after a single hearing, which is scheduled for Tuesday. Moreover, Gates and others say he learned from the searing, 10-day hearings that scrutinized his record 15 years ago and has since adopted a less officious style.

At the same time, the concerns expressed about Gates then have echoes in the contemporary debate over the alleged tailoring of intelligence analysis to serve political ends, an issue at the heart of criticism of the war in Iraq. The Senate intelligence committee concluded in 2004, for example, that the CIA -- under a different director -- overstated the threat posed by Iraqi weapons of mass destruction programs and that the Bush administration shaped its depiction of intelligence to bolster the case for the U.S. intervention there.

Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), incoming chairman of the Armed Services Committee and a foe of Gates's confirmation 15 years ago, cited the old charges of skewing intelligence in telling reporters he will seek assurances at the upcoming hearing that Gates will be independent-minded in his new job, which includes supervising a large military intelligence bureaucracy. Alluding to the Bush administration's record on Iraq, Levin said, "We've had enough [of] manipulating intelligence . . . in order to give the policymakers what they wanted to hear."The Trip to the Top Gates's rise through the CIA bureaucracy was so swift, it sparked controversy. "He was recognized in the agency as being an exceptionally gifted analyst and an exceptionally gifted operator," said Alan Fiers, who chaired the agency's Central America task force in the mid-1980s. He was widely seen as a guy "on the make," Fiers testified in 1991.

A Wichita native who had spent a summer working as a grain inspector, Gates evidently itched to leave that life. He signed up with a CIA recruiter in 1965 because, he wrote in his memoirs, "I thought I could get a free trip to the capital." With CIA backing, he then jumped feet first into the Cold War as an Air Force intelligence officer at a Minuteman missile wing, where he recalls being "the only person in our unit who could pronounce the names of our targets."

As a CIA analyst back in Washington, he participated in one demonstration against the Vietnam War, in 1970. But the agency's obsession with the Soviet Union quickly became his own, and in 1974, at age 31, he joined the National Security Council staff for the first time as a Soviet specialist.

Gates did not lack self-confidence in the role. On a 1975 trip to Romania, where his passport was confiscated without explanation, he stood at the door of a White House plane and extended his middle finger to security police shortly before takeoff. It was a "regrettable but immensely satisfying display of pique and immaturity," he wrote later. Zbigniew Brzezinski, national security adviser to President Jimmy Carter, nonetheless called the young Gates "the epitome of discretion and good judgment."

In 1980, Gates became the national intelligence officer for the Soviet Union, although he did not visit the country until nine years later. When William J. Casey took the CIA's reins in 1981 after being Ronald Reagan's campaign manager, Gates took an instant liking to him. Both favored a large U.S. military buildup. Although he considered Casey a "zealot" on Central America, Gates concluded that the two had similar views about the Soviet Union, including a conviction that Moscow was orchestrating rebel movements and terrorism in the Third World.

That belief was disputed by others at the agency, but the intelligence estimates prepared under Casey and Gates about the Soviet threat -- now declassified -- were mostly unequivocal, though later they were shown to be largely wrong. Four years before the Soviet Union dissolved, for example, Gates warned in a memo that Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev was after power and not reform, leaving a "long competition and struggle ahead."

Disaffection over Gates's role in pressing such conclusions was centered in the CIA's Office of Soviet Analysis, headed by Melvin Goodman, who at the 1991 hearings accused Gates of corrupting "the process and the ethics of intelligence" by ordering changes in its reports that were unsupported by evidence.

CIA Soviet affairs analyst Jennifer Glaudemans testified, "Not only could we feel his contempt, we could feel his party line."

Disgruntlement also reached into senior ranks. Harold P. Ford, Gates's acting successor as head of the National Intelligence Council, accused his colleague at the time of leaning heavily on subordinates to skew intelligence, adding that the nation deserved someone with a better "analytic batting average."

Other senior CIA officials disputed the criticism, attributing it to sour grapes and false hearsay. Gates produced a detailed rebuttal to Goodman and in his 1996 memoir said, "We were honest, even if we were not always right."

In the end, 31 lawmakers voted against Gates's confirmation -- the most opposition any CIA director nominee had faced.

Reagan's secretary of state, George P. Shultz, was silent during the 1991 confirmation hearings but took issue with Gates in a memoir he published two years later. He said the CIA's analyses had been predictable, manipulative and improperly shaped by "strong views about policy."

"If this were a business, I'd find myself another supplier," Shultz said he told Gates at the time. Now at Stanford University's Hoover Institution, Shultz did not return a phone call seeking his current appraisal of Gates.Iran-Contra Affair

At the 1991 hearings, Gates was forced to confront another controversy, involving when he learned about the Iran-contra affair and how he reacted to it. The scandal arose in part from the secret sale of missiles and spare parts to Iran at inflated prices beginning in the mid-1980s, in a bid to gain the release of U.S. hostages held by Iranian-backed forces in Lebanon. The other part involved the secret transfer of the profits from those dealings to rebel groups in Nicaragua known as contras.

Congress had barred aid to the contras, and disclosure of the twin transactions in 1986 plunged the last two years of Reagan's presidency into controversy. Eleven active or retired U.S. officials were charged with making false statements, destroying evidence or committing fraud.

Gates was a strong backer at the time of armed intervention against Nicaragua's leftist government. In a classified memo to Casey in 1984, recently published by the nonprofit National Security Archive, Gates said Washington should do "everything in its power short of invasion to put that regime out," and he recommended airstrikes, among other measures.

Gates also became deeply involved in a controversial May 1985 intelligence estimate that he later said was "one of the animating factors" in the White House's decision to pursue the arms sales. It raised the prospect of a Cold War race with Moscow for leverage in a destabilized Iran, a notion Gates supported over the strong opposition of the CIA's Soviet analysts.

The State Department disagreed with that conclusion as well and said so in a footnote to the intelligence estimate. Morton I. Abramowitz, then the department's intelligence chief, recalls being telephoned by Gates, who requested that the department drop its footnote of dissent. Abramowitz agreed but came to regret it after the report was linked to Iran- contra. "Subsequently, given what was happening, it takes on a more nefarious meaning," Abramowitz said.

Vincent Cannistraro, an NSC staff member who oversaw covert action at the time, said in an interview that Gates "was aware of what Bill Casey was doing with [NSC staff member] Ollie North and those back-pocket operations. . . . He clearly knew there were things going on not in accord with the regulations."

But Gates told investigators that he did not know about North's control over the contra activities and said he played no role in the affair. After hearing in October 1986 of the funds diversion, Gates expressed concerns to Casey and Reagan's national security adviser. Years later, he wrote that criticism of his failure to get to the bottom of the diversion or report it to Congress "hit home."

An independent counsel, Lawrence E. Walsh, in 1993 labeled the recollections of Casey's "ambitious" deputy disquieting and untruthful but not criminal. Walsh wrote that he was particularly troubled by Gates's assertion that he forgot receiving earlier memos and briefings about the diversion, and he said Gates's reactions were tailored more to protecting the CIA than to learning the truth and stopping illegal conduct.

But when reached in Oklahoma City, Walsh, now retired, said that he remembers feeling that Gates was in a difficult position as Casey's deputy and said he supports his confirmation as defense secretary.

Gates admitted knowing by the end of 1985 about the arms sales to Iran, which Walsh said "contravened" U.S. policy and may have been illegal. But in his memoir, Gates said he thought the sales were legal and opined that "the dirty little secret of the Iran affair" was that officials widely saw it "as a wacko, likely-to-fail NSC operation that the president wanted to pursue -- and no one was willing to put his job on the line to stop it."A New Perspective

Gates used his memoir to distance himself from the controversies. He criticized Casey for being contemptuous of Congress and "something of a bully." He said that in Iran-contra, the CIA was guilty of "political games [and] petty deceptions."

Gates also became more moderate in his views about using military force. He told a PBS interviewer for a documentary on the Persian Gulf War that the cautions of military officers about using force instead of diplomacy to solve foreign policy problems are understandable, "because I have seen a lot of civilians make a lot of proposals for a lot of silly military actions." Gates also said he supported the U.S. decision then to end hostilities without occupying Baghdad, because doing otherwise would have led to a "quagmire."

In 1999, Gates wrote that "pigeonholing most countries in one or another category -- as either friend or foe -- is wrongheaded and undermines our national interest." In 2004, he co-chaired a panel that supported direct dialogue with Iran on regional stability issues and depicted the use of military force on Iran's nuclear facilities as "extremely problematic."

Fiers, who pleaded guilty in 1991 to withholding information from Congress while working for the CIA, said that "we all grow" in judgment with 15 years of perspective, and that he considers Gates a "very good choice" to head the Defense Department because he is "smart and can see all the nuances at play in the Middle East."

Fiers said Gates has "got what very few people get in life: He's got a mulligan. He can come back and play it the right way at the right time."

Hints Of A Rumsfeld-ian Style (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

Gates was known as a bully, but the Defense nominee's supporters say that's in the past.

WASHINGTON — Shortly after Ronald Reagan was reelected president, the CIA forwarded a controversial intelligence report on the 1981 assassination attempt against Pope John Paul II to the White House. It suggested the Soviets were involved in the plot.

Inside the agency, many analysts considered the intelligence estimate flawed. In the words of one CIA branch chief, the assertion lacked "common sense" and was, at best, conjecture.

The contention later was proved false. But there was one person who did see a Soviet hand at play in the plot, and that was the man who mattered at the time: CIA Deputy Director Robert M. Gates, who personally handed the report up to the White House.

On Tuesday, the Senate begins its hearings on replacing Donald H. Rumsfeld, a Defense secretary criticized for failing to hear dissenting views, allowing his department to peddle flawed intelligence, and leading the military into a war in which victory has proved elusive. And it is Gates whom President Bush has selected to lead the Pentagon, offering the onetime CIA director up as "an agent of change."

But Gates appears to some an odd choice, given the Pentagon's rocky and occasionally divisive atmosphere under Rumsfeld. For much of Gates' career, critics and even some admirers have likened him to the imperious Rumsfeld and his close administration ally, Vice President Dick Cheney.

"Gates was making it clear to analysts what intelligence they were to produce," said Thomas Blanton, director of the National Security Archive, a nonprofit institute that gathers and analyzes declassified documents. "It's a chilling record, because you have two main themes of the Iraq war present in Robert Gates' career at CIA: the arrogance and bullying of a Rumsfeld and the intelligence cherry-picking of a Cheney."

Hearings were key

But critics and friends also suggest that Gates, 63, has evolved. The charges that he was a bully who was wrong on the important foreign policy issues of the day were sifted during his 1991 confirmation hearings to become CIA director. Those hearings, along with his failed nomination in 1987, were a public flogging that, those close to him say, forced him to reexamine his style.

"Bob Gates has learned over the years," said former Sen. David Boren (D-Okla.), who was chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee during the 1991 hearings. "He realized in retrospect he had been misunderstood by some people who became his critics. After that, he became more patient."

The '91 hearings stretched on for months, and friends say the searing national spotlight softened the sharp-elbowed Gates and taught important lessons that he took to his jobs as CIA director and, later, president of Texas A&M University.

"I think he really was stunned to find that people actually disliked him," said retired Adm. Bobby Ray Inman, a career intelligence officer who worked closely with Gates in the Carter and Reagan administrations. "I'm not sure I'd say [he was] chastened, but maturity and experience causes you to simply be calmer in dealing with people."

To some, it is an open question about which Bob Gates would take the helm of the Pentagon: the former CIA analyst with a bullying intellect and occasionally dictatorial style like Rumsfeld's, or the patient listener who eventually won over critics at the CIA and tradition-bound Texas A&M.

Whatever qualities Gates brings, he will face the challenge of leading the world's dominant military at a time of historic strains over frustrated war efforts abroad and shifting political currents at home.

The portrayal of Gates as a blunt and uncompromising taskmaster during the 1980s is not shared by all who worked with him as he climbed the government's national security hierarchy. Many insist he always has approached problems with an open mind.

"He was good at building a consensus and understanding what other people's points of view are, even if he didn't agree with them," said retired Adm. Stansfield Turner, President Carter's CIA director for whom Gates served as executive assistant.

Gates' rise through the ranks — he remains the only entry-level analyst ever to become director — was colored by the Cold War.

From the start of his government career, which began after he served two years as an Air Force officer in the late 1960s, he sided with anti-Soviet hard-liners. It was a view of Moscow that would bring him close to Zbigniew Brzezinski, Carter's national security advisor, and William J. Casey, Reagan's CIA director.

But it earned him the enmity of advocates of detente, including George P. Shultz, Reagan's secretary of State, who would later accuse Gates of shaping intelligence to fit his worldview and push to get Gates fired.

"In Sovietology, it's to some extent a speculative science. You can either err by being much too soft on the Soviets, or you can err by being somewhat too hard," said Brzezinski, who counts himself and Gates among the latter group. "I don't think [Gates] was politicizing intelligence. He was rendering views different than George Shultz's."

Signs of the taskmaster

Casey found the young analyst to be a kindred spirit, a fellow cold warrior with the intellectual firepower to demand more rigor in what Casey viewed as a flabby and overly cautious CIA analysis of the Soviets. Gates rose even faster than before, first as the agency's lead Soviet analyst, then as head of all intelligence analysis, and finally as Casey's deputy director.

His rapid advance — Gates was just 38 when he became Casey's director of intelligence in January 1982 — revealed some of the first signs of the overweening taskmaster. It certainly was a role Casey wanted him to play.

"We never sent Bob to charm school when it came to criticizing analysis," said John N. McMahon, Casey's deputy and Gates' boss for four years. "You can dump on someone in several different ways and get the point across, and one is to be forthright and just bang it out — and Bob did that."

But even if he was doing Casey's bidding, it also appeared to be a role Gates relished. In a September 1981 memo to Casey, shortly before taking over the intelligence directorship, he was merciless toward the agency's analysts.

"There are far too many people playing it safe," Gates wrote. "CIA is slowly turning into the Department of Agriculture."

For the remainder of the Reagan administration, Gates appeared to show little restraint.

"Analysts would come to him with what they thought was great analysis, and he'd tear it apart," recalled Richard L. Haver, the top official in the Pentagon's intelligence operation at the time.

"He would correct their English, their syntax, and he would hammer the way in which they crafted their conclusions."

Gates' hammering may have been what the CIA needed, but it also created enemies. That became apparent on the national stage in 1987, when he was nominated to succeed Casey as CIA director.

Any stylistic controversies, however, were overshadowed that year by the burgeoning Iran-Contra scandal, in which proceeds from secret U.S. arms sales to Iran were funneled to White House-backed insurgents in Nicaragua. Gates was not charged, but questions over his role were enough to force him to withdraw his nomination.

In 1991, when Gates once more was nominated to lead the CIA, his reputation for bullying analysts came into full light. Gates had expected a rehash of Iran-Contra. But those close to the nominee said he was stunned by the browbeating accusations, some of which came from old friends.

"It was totally a shock to me, and it shocked Bob, I know, as well," said McMahon, who said the analysts made no such charges within the CIA against Gates.

The committee's investigation and hearings lasted from June until October. Ultimately, he was confirmed by a split Senate.

Switching his style

Gates has never spoken at length about the effect of those hearings. But many said that the Gates who took charge of the CIA's Langley, Va., headquarters at the end of 1991 was quite different from the man who had been Casey's tough-minded deputy.

Gates returned to the CIA with an aggressive reform agenda. But rather than force changes through top-down edicts, he sought input from senior subordinates. On his first day on the job, Gates launched 12 reform task forces to take on a range of issues.

"He told us when we started off where he wanted us to go," Haver said. "But we were given lots of latitude to argue with him."

One of Gates' first acts was to give important responsibilities to Harold P. Ford, a longtime CIA official as well as a lecturer and historian who had been one of his most persuasive critics in the confirmation process. The move sent a signal that dissent was welcome, said Blanton, director of the National Security Archive.

Gates employed similar approaches when, nine years after leaving the CIA, he became president of Texas A&M.

Much as he had assuaged the skeptical ranks at CIA, Gates moved quickly to counter faculty doubts by increasing their clout.

"I always felt we had a voice with this president, a voice we never had before," said Martha L. Loudder, a former president of the Faculty Senate. "He motivates people because they understand he wants to make changes that they want to make."

The issue of affirmative action on student admissions was a particularly sensitive conflict. In 2003, Gates, who opposed racial preferences, squared off against professor Bob Strawser, another former head of the Faculty Senate, who wanted to reinstate them.

Gates held firm, but many said he changed the debate. Remarkably, at a university with one of the most vocal group of graduates in the nation, he ended preferences for the children of alumni — a largely white group. That change, along with more aggressive recruiting, drove up minority enrollment on campus.

Strawser believes this is the management style Gates will bring to the Pentagon. And the uniformed military, many of whom privately have said they are frustrated after feeling ignored by Rumsfeld, may be heard once more.

"I think the military leaderships will have a surprise. They will get a full hearing," Strawser said. "He isn't going to take votes, but he will listen and take advice."

Those who worked with both men agree that Gates' style will be profoundly different from Rumsfeld's.

"Don has always been a change agent. He comes into a new situation with his own, independent ideas," said Frank C. Carlucci, a former defense secretary who has worked closely with Rumsfeld and Gates. "Gates will listen more to the establishment, but he'll reach his own conclusions. He's more of a consensus-builder."

Inman, a friend of Gates' who also has worked with Rumsfeld, predicted that Gates would be seen roaming the halls of the Pentagon, seeking out mid-level officials for their opinions.

"Part of it is out of curiosity, but it's also partly image — that he's not sitting on the throne or in the cloistered environment," Inman said.

"He is, by his nature, polite. That's not an allegation I'd make in Don's case."

Quizzing Robert Gates (NYT)

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

Robert M. Gates, President Bush's nominee to succeed Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, will appear before the Senate Armed Services Committee tomorrow for his confirmation hearing. We asked six defense and foreign-policy experts to tell us what questions the senators should ask. The Next Attack

1. According to the Congressional Budget Office, the Pentagon is underfinancing its procurement program by $53 billion to $121 billion each year for the next several years. What will be your priorities to address this shortfall?

2. Do you agree that our NATO allies other than Britain should be contributing more forces, equipment and training to help secure success in Iraq and Afghanistan? How would you persuade them to do so?

3. Department of Defense intelligence functions and capacities have significantly expanded in recent years. Do you intend to continue, increase or disband them?

4. In view of the predictions that we are likely to experience further terrorist attacks on American soil and that these attacks are likely to be multiple in number and executed nearly simultaneously, do you believe the doctrine of posse comitatus, which prohibits the military from engaging in domestic law enforcement, should be revised?

— WILLIAM S. COHEN, the secretary of defense from 1997 to 2001. Rights vs. Realism

1. You have long been associated with the "realist" view that American policy-makers should not concern themselves with a country's internal human rights practices. Yet it is now clear that threats to the United States are often fueled by abusive regimes and incubated in failing states. On the other hand, rapid democratization can bring bloodshed, and American support for moderates can undermine their credibility. Given this complexity, what principles should guide American interactions with human rights abusers in the 21st century?

2. American forces are overextended in Iraq; NATO countries are reluctant to send additional troops to Afghanistan to confront the resurgent Taliban; and so many peacekeepers now operate under the United Nations flag that the major troop contributors are becoming exhausted. What will you do to try to convince American allies to assist in stabilizing places that the United States believes are important, but where it cannot or should not itself be present?

3. The Sudanese government is conducting a devastating offensive against civilians in Darfur. Owing to the support of China and the Arab League, Khartoum has felt free to thumb its nose at demands from the United Nations that it allow a large protection force to enter the embattled province. What levers can the Pentagon pull — with Khartoum, with Sudan's allies or with the rebels in Darfur — to ensure that a robust force gets to the region before tens of thousands more civilians die?

— SAMANTHA POWER, a professor at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government and the Pulitzer Prize-winning author of " 'A Problem From Hell': America and the Age of Genocide." Life With the Chiefs

1. How will you restore the readiness of an overstressed military, while continuing to transform it in preparation for irregular warfare or for war with countries that may possess weapons of mass destruction?

2. Please discuss your view of the role of the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other senior uniformed military leaders with regard to the secretary of defense and the president. What steps will you take to strengthen civilian-military relations in the Pentagon?

3. What changes in strategy will you make that will enable the military to complete its missions in Iraq and Afghanistan?

4. Looking back, what could we have done at the beginning of the war in Iraq that might have produced a better outcome, and how will you ensure that we never again ask our military to conduct operations that are not well thought out or properly resourced?

— DONALD KERRICK, a former United States Army lieutenant general, deputy national security adviser and assistant to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Handling the Hill

1. Donald Rumsfeld made a mistake in not paying enough attention to members of Congress; listening to them and spending time with them is a crucial part of the secretary's job. But you will have to appear before 16 Congressional committees. How do you intend to manage your time?

2. Right now the Army is riven with conflict. Top generals retire and immediately start speaking out because they feel they weren't listened to. The members of National Guard and reserves feel they've not been treated well, particularly in terms of replacement equipment; and the regular forces feel they lack sufficient personnel. How do you plan to handle all the dissension within the Army?

3. The National Security Agency, which reports to the secretary of defense, has become embroiled in lawsuits concerning electronic surveillance. These are important public affairs problems that must be handled very carefully. How will you deal with such issues before they get to court? Will you delegate this responsibility or get personally involved?

4. Are you willing to increase the military's personnel budget so that those who serve in the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps are paid salaries at least comparable to what they might make in similar civilian jobs?

— MELVIN LAIRD, the secretary of defense from 1969 to 1973. You and Tehran

1. Will you exchange the current "train and leave" approach to the war in Iraq for a clear-and-hold victory strategy, which may include increasing troop levels, abandoning standard rotations (now limited to one year), replacing commanding generals and bypassing spending restrictions to obtain crucial equipment?

2. You have in the past suggested that the United States should have a direct dialogue with Iran. Is it your view that Iran's sponsorship of terrorist groups in Iraq, Lebanon and the West Bank and Gaza could end as a result of direct dialogue? If by dialogue you mean negotiation, what do you suggest the United States offer Iran in exchange for an end to its pro-terrorist foreign policy?

3. Are you prepared to undertake a sweeping review of the state of the American military and its ability to respond to identified national security threats? Are you prepared to increase the size of the ground forces?

— DANIELLE PLETKA, the vice president for foreign and defense policy studies at the American Enterprise Institute. An Anti-Rumsfeld

1. It is clear that your immediate task must be to resolve the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. What else will you be able to accomplish as secretary of defense in the next two years?

2. Is the Department of Defense the right agency to lead the war on terrorism?

3. What do you intend to do to improve the department's cooperation with other government agencies in combating terrorism?

4. Will you rebalance the air, naval and ground forces to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps?

5. How will you avoid making the mistakes of your predecessor?

Iraq And The Danger Of Psychological Entrapment (WP)

By Shankar Vedantam

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

As Robert M. Gates appears this week at his Senate confirmation hearings for defense secretary, Wesleyan University psychologist Scott Plous sees a hidden trap. To understand it, take a little test.

Let's say your elderly dad has a beloved car. Its reliability was legendary, but it has started to have problems. He gets one thing fixed, and something else goes wrong. Each fix doesn't cost much, but they add up, and then the problems start to get bigger. Your dad is convinced the next repair will get the car as good as new. Would you advise him to pull the plug and get rid of the car?

Or consider this. A friend invests some money after getting a tip about a stock. The price soars, and your friend gains 10 percent overnight. He immediately doubles his investment. A week later, the thing tanks, and he is in the red. A month later, it dives again, and he has lost a quarter of his investment. Should he cut his losses and sell?

One more, and yes, these are all trick questions. A woman you care about falls in love. After many years of a happy relationship, the person she is with develops a vicious streak, starts smashing things and occasionally gives her a black eye. Would you tell her to walk out of the relationship?

The trick in all these questions is that when presented with such scenarios, it is easy for us to answer yes. Your dad should sell that car, your friend should save what money he can, and the person you care about should dump that abuser.

Every day, of course, when it comes to such decisions in our own lives, millions of people answer no.

The difference is because of a widespread phenomenon in human behavior known as entrapment. When you invest yourself in something, it is exceedingly difficult to discard your investment. What is devilish about entrapment is not just that it can result in ever greater losses, but that those losses get you ever more entrapped, because now you have even more invested.

Plous, a social psychologist and author of "The Psychology of Judgment and Decision Making," said experiments show that psychological entrapment comes in at least four guises: the investment trap, in which we try to recover sunk costs by throwing good money after bad; the time delay trap, in which a short-term benefit carries the seed of long-term problems; the deterioration trap, in which things that started out well slowly get worse; and the ignorance trap, in which hidden risks surface suddenly.

What does this have to do with the Gates confirmation? Plous sees the U.S. dilemma about what military course to take in Iraq as a perfect example of psychological entrapment -- on a national scale.

"What is remarkable is that the war in Iraq is a kind of super trap that has all these elements," Plous said. "Some weeks things look better, and then they look worse and then there is a setback. What we need is to take a step back and ask, 'If we were faced with the choice today without sunk costs, what decision would we make?' "

Plous is talking about the quick military victory followed by the zigzag decline into nightmare: the lack of intelligence on the ground about Saddam Hussein's supposed weapons of mass destruction; the hundreds of billions of dollars invested to fight the war; and above all, the lives of thousands of Americans that have been lost.

Plous said his alarm bells went off when he realized that President Bush was explicitly using the language of entrapment in speeches to rally support for the war. "Retreating from Iraq would dishonor the service of our brave men and women who have sacrificed in that country and have given their lives in that country, which would mean their sacrifice would be in vain," the president said recently.

Plous's point is not that Bush's appeal is ineffective; the point of entrapment is that it is exceedingly effective. It is utterly human not to want a great sacrifice to go in vain.

I asked Plous whether he was drawing his conclusion only because the war in Iraq is going badly. Would he have told the British the same thing, for example, during the bleakest days of 1940, when a German victory seemed imminent -- and when holding on led to victory over Adolf Hitler?

In other words, how do you tell the difference between getting entrapped in a disaster and being persistent through the difficult phase that can precede victory?

Psychology cannot predict the future or tell you what to do, but Plous said it can warn you to be vigilant if a course of action is primarily justified in terms of recovering what has already been lost. It is not wrong to factor in sunk costs, but they should not drive the decision.

In the World War II example, defeating fascism, not honoring dead British soldiers, was the reason it made sense to fight on.

"Rational decision-making should not be driven primarily by recovery of past costs," Plous said. "If you can no longer justify it in terms of what it will bring in the future and what its realistic prospects are, that is a warning sign you may have become entrapped."

Other techniques to avoid entrapment in everyday life include making sure that a decision to continue on a path is not made solely by people who decided on that path in the first place, by setting limits on investments upfront and by triggering automatic reviews if a plan of action hits certain predetermined failure points.

But none of those measures can take the sting out of the dilemma on whether to change course after a substantial investment: "Regardless of whether you supported the war or not," Plous said, "this is going to be heart-wrenching."

Next Defense Secretary Must Hit Ground Running (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook, Matt Kelley

USA Today, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Robert Gates, President Bush's choice as the next Defense secretary, will have to act fast — within months, analysts and retired officers say — to effect change at the Pentagon and in Iraq.

Hearings on Gates' nomination are scheduled to begin Tuesday before the Senate Armed Services Committee. Nobody has announced opposition to Gates, the 63-year-old president of Texas A&M University. He led the CIA from 1991 until early 1993.

“He has to be able to go in immediately and make changes” at the Pentagon, said committee member Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I. “He has to thoroughly re-examine the policy and strategy in Iraq. That's the most pressing and immediate priority.”

The challenges will be tough. Gates faces violent insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan that have forced troops into faster-than-normal deployments; a strained relationship between the Defense secretary and top generals; and a short time in which to make a difference.

Gates has to work closely and quickly with Congress to be successful, said William Cohen, a 24-year veteran of Congress and Defense secretary from 1997 to 2001. “As we get further into next year, obviously the political ambitions of those running for president will intensify, and the risk of more partisanship at that point is going to materialize,” Cohen said.

Gates' experience with the Iraq Study Group puts him “ahead of the curve in terms of understanding what needs to be done” in Iraq, Cohen said. Gates was a member of the bipartisan commission until his nomination Nov. 8. The group is scheduled to release its recommendations Wednesday, including an endorsement of a gradual pullout of U.S. troops.

If Bush does decide on a new Iraq policy, Cohen said, “Gates is in the best position to try” to make it happen.

Gates' appointment is a symbol that the Bush administration is open to changing course in Iraq, said Stephen Biddle, a defense expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, a think tank.

However, “if it turns out the administration is not willing to contemplate any real change, Gates has just bought himself a ticket on the Titanic,” said Biddle, a former assistant professor at the Army War College. “He can mop the deck a bit, but we all know what happened to the Titanic.”

Pushing policy changes in Iraq is the real extent of Gates' potential influence, said retired general Jack Keane, a former Army vice chief of staff.

That's because Gates will only have time to influence the Pentagon's budget for one year, Keane said, “and that can be changed by a subsequent administration.”

Gates must also mend fences within the Pentagon, some analysts and retired generals say.

“There are going to be a lot of people happy to see Rumsfeld gone because he was a miserable boss to work for,” said Frederick Kagan, a military analyst at the American Enterprise Institute. “There are a handful who are very loyal. But a much larger number happy to see a change.”

Gates should “create an atmosphere where you'll get your ass chewed for not speaking up,” said retired general William Nash, now a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations.

Retired major general Paul Eaton, one of several generals who said last spring that Rumsfeld should resign, said Gates must listen to generals who advocate for a larger Army and Marine Corps. Rumsfeld failed to listen to advice on the need for more troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, Eaton said. “We have failed to build a military to meet the foreign policy of America.”

It's nonsense to claim that Rumsfeld discouraged dissent, said Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said. Rumsfeld solicited advice from military and civilian officials at the Pentagon, Whitman said, and did not reject calls for more troops.

“The number of U.S. troops in Iraq has always been based on the recommendations of experienced commanders on the ground, the combatant command and the best military advice of the Joint Chiefs of Staff,” Whitman said.

Rumsfeld should not be the scapegoat for the problems in Iraq and the Pentagon, said Richard Perle, a former Defense official and a research fellow at the American Enterprise Institute. Instead, the entire Bush administration should be held accountable, said Perle, who led Rumsfeld's civilian advisory board during the buildup for the Iraq invasion.

Gates will be one of many people determining military policy, Perle said. “He'll have a seat at the table. But he's making very few of the decisions on his own.”

Democrats Who Opposed War Move Into Key Positions (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Although given little public credit at the time, or since, many of the 126 House Democrats who spoke out and voted against the October 2002 resolution that gave President Bush authority to wage war against Iraq have turned out to be correct in their warnings about the problems a war would create.

With the Democrats taking over control of the House next January, the views that some voiced during two days of debate four years ago are worth recalling, since many of those lawmakers will move into positions of power. They include not only members of the new House leadership but also the incoming chairmen of the Appropriations, Armed Services, Budget and Judiciary committees and the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. (S.C.), a senior member of the Armed Services Committee, was one of several Democrats who predicted during the House floor debate that "the outcome after the conflict is actually going to be the hardest part, and it is far less certain." He credited his views in part to what he heard over breakfasts with retired generals Anthony C. Zinni and Joseph P. Hoar, both of whom had led the U.S. Army's Central Command -- a part of which is in Spratt's district.

"They made the point: We do not want to win this war, only to lose the peace and swell the ranks of terrorists who hate us," Spratt said.

Spratt recently looked back at his resolution, which would have required Bush to come back to Congress before launching an attack. It was defeated 270 to 158. He recalled that extended hearings were held before the Persian Gulf War but that nothing similar preceded the vote on the 2002 resolution. "I remember we talked this time about how we got to get answers before this train leaves the station," Spratt said.

The incoming Armed Services chairman, Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), spoke in support of Spratt's amendment, stressing the need for "a plan for rebuilding of the Iraqi government and society, if the worst comes to pass and armed conflict is necessary."

Skelton had written Bush a month earlier, after a White House meeting, to say that "I have no doubt that our military would decisively defeat Iraq's forces and remove Saddam. But like the proverbial dog chasing the car down the road, we must consider what we would do after we caught it."

Skelton went on to note the "extreme difficulty of occupying Iraq with its history of autocratic rule, its balkanized ethnic tensions and its isolated economic system." He also warned that Bush's postwar strategy must "take seriously" the possibility that a replacement regime "might be rejected by the Iraqi people, leading to civil unrest and even anarchy."

Rep. David R. Obey (Wis.), who will chair the Appropriations Committee, was among the group that organized the Democrats. He spoke then about poor preparation for postwar Iraq, a concern he developed after listening to State Department officials.

He recalled recently that an amendment by Rep. Barbara T. Lee (D-Calif.) that would have delayed taking action until inspectors from the United Nations completed their work "made sense, but there was no prayer it would pass." It got 72 votes.

Obey said Spratt's amendment was the only approach "that could gather critical mass, and that's what most of us in the caucus settled on."

The number of House Democrats who supported Spratt "was a remarkable achievement," Obey said, "given it meant opposing the president in the wake of 9/11." Obey's district was 70 percent in favor of going into Iraq, he said.

On the House floor more than four years ago, Lee told colleagues: "Our own intelligence agencies report that there is currently little chance of chemical and biological attack from Saddam Hussein on U.S. forces or territories. But they emphasize that an attack could become much more likely if Iraq believes that it is about to be attacked." That information, she said, came from material that then-CIA Director George J. Tenet had provided to the Senate.

Lee also raised questions in the floor debate that remain unanswered. "What is our objective here," she asked four years ago, "regime change or elimination of weapons of mass destruction?"

Looking forward now to next year and a Democratic majority in the House, Lee said, "Those of us who early on understood have many ideas of what to do now and how to get out of Iraq."

Rep. Tammy Baldwin (Wis.), who did not belong to a committee with national security jurisdiction, was among the lawmakers who talked on the House floor about what turned out to be the real issues in Iraq. She spoke of the "postwar challenges," saying that "there is no history of democratic government in Iraq," that its "economy and infrastructure is in ruins after years of war and sanctions" and that rebuilding would take "a great deal of money."

Baldwin four years ago asked questions that are being widely considered today: "Are we prepared to keep 100,000 or more troops in Iraq to maintain stability there? If we don't, will a new regime emerge? If we don't, will Iran become the dominant power in the Middle East? . . . If we don't, will Islamic fundamentalists take over Iraq?"

Baldwin said recently that she put together her statement after reading public commentary and talking with like-minded colleagues and her staff about what would come next. "A vote like this, I didn't undertake lightly -- I almost fully expected they would find weapons there," she said. "But we hadn't heard about an exit strategy; it was such a blank."

The day after the House vote, The Washington Post recorded that 126 House Democrats voted against the final resolution. None was quoted giving a reason for his or her vote except for Rep. Joe Baca (Calif.), who said a military briefing had disclosed that U.S. soldiers did not have adequate protection against biological weapons.

"As a veteran, that's what hit me the hardest," he said.

Lee was described as giving a "fiery denunciation" of the administration's "rush to war," with only 14 colleagues in the House chamber to hear her. None of the reasons she gave to justify her concerns, nor those voiced by other Democratic opponents, was reported in the two Post stories about passage of the resolution that day.

Opie's All Grown Up Now (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

Every political race Adam Putnam has run, it seems, has focused on his age. When he was 22 and running for the Florida Statehouse, with his mother laying out district maps on the kitchen table and his father creating campaign literature in front of the television, his 69-year-old opponent attacked him for trying to run from "the frat house to the statehouse" and used his sophomore-class high school yearbook photo in an advertisement. The cherubic redhead heard pretty much the same refrain when he ran for Congress in 2000. Even the national Republican Party was hesitant about backing such a young prospect. "I looked about 12," he jokes now. And he had the nickname to match: "Opie" was the favorite at the time. He then, well, graduated to President Bush's favorite moniker, "Red," and now, at 32, Putnam occasionally gets "Howdy Doody."

And yet, in this terrible political year for the GOP, Putnam is one Republican for whom "stay the course" has proved a winning strategy. Yes, he's still a youngster. He's not a household name, and he doesn't grab all the headlines, even back home in Florida. But having just won a fourth term by garnering 69 percent of the vote, Putnam is racing up the Capitol Hill pecking order. Republicans bumped him up again last month to chair of the House Republican Conference, the No. 3 GOP position in the House, in effect the communications maestro behind Minority-Leader-to-be John Boehner and Minority Whip Roy Blunt. Putnam was tapped to boost a beleaguered party. How well he does with that assignment may help determine the GOP's future. And it may have a major bearing on Adam Putnam's political future as well.

A state the size of Florida has no shortage of big-time politicians. And Florida has its share of metropolitan power circles around Miami, Orlando, Tampa, Jacksonville, and Tallahassee. Putnam's roots aren't in any of those areas. No, he hails from Bartow in Polk County–that's east of Tampa and southwest of Orlando. As a fifth-generation Floridian, Putnam grew up in a family that runs a cattle ranch and a citrus farm. (He still gets hefty campaign donations from agriculture, and most of his personal worth of more than $2 million is tied to the family business.) And at the University of Florida, he was a food and resource economics major and spent a little time in college politics, but unlike many young Republicans-Ralph Reed and Grover Norquist–who have quickly risen through the ranks, he wasn't head of College Republicans or some other national political club. He was in "Florida for Jeb" and "Gators for Bush [41]," he says, and was involved in the statewide 4-H club. But "there is no political blood in my family," he notes.

His first experience with Washington politics was interning for hometown Republican Rep. Charles Canady, whose seat he now holds, during the summer before he graduated from college in 1995. Republicans were basking in the warm glow of the Gingrich revolution, and even though his car was broken into four times, Putnam loved the job, because he felt a need for young people to have their political voices heard. He'd been interested in the Florida legislature as a high schooler, so he decided to make his first run there, just a year out of the University of Florida. His father "was just silent for what seemed like an eternity" when he heard the news, but ultimately, Dad campaigned hard for him. Putnam was elected in a season when Republicans took control of the state House of Representatives for the first time in 122 years; before long, the young state rep was chairing the Agriculture Committee.

U.S. News and World Report, December 4, 2006

In today's world of commuter nightmares, consider this one for the record book. When Sen. Patty Murray goes home every Friday to Whidbey Island, Wash., it takes 10 hours to cover 2,500 miles in a Planes, Trains and Automobiles string of transports. On a good day. And for what? Well, the three-term Democrat just named to the No. 4 leadership post in the new majority isn't one of those who trade their home turf for Georgetown cocktail parties. She likes to hang with her peeps. "I can take the temperature of the country at any time just by going to the grocery store," she says. "If everybody's doing OK, they just say, 'Hi.' If things are going on, it takes me an hour and a half or two just to get through." In fact, it was during her visits to the Freeland Payless that she sensed the strong pro-Democratic mood that would junk the GOP Congress.

So, about her travels: Fridays start at 5:30 a.m. with a trip to Dulles Airport, where she grabs a United nonstop to Seattle with lots of other lawmakers. For 5½ hours, "depending on wind," she works. From the airport, she and her hubby drive two hours to the Mukilteo Ferry and wait in line for the 25-minute sail to Whidbey. She gets no special treatment. "If somebody cuts in front of that ferry line, you're dead." Then it's another 40 minutes home. A hassle? "I do this so much I don't think about it," she says. "It's just a day."

It's Not Maple Syrup Dean's Out Selling

His loudmouthed inside-the-beltway boors are still booing Democratic boss Howard Dean, despite the party's strong election showing, but they're eating him up like sweet Vermont maple syrup in Canada and overseas. Party bigs say the former Vermont guv is headed to Europe to cheer on liberal parties in England, Spain, and Portugal. His keynote address this month to Canada's beleaguered Liberal Party, fans say, was just a warm-up. Dean's message: Show folks like England's Laborites how to remake their top-down outfits into grassroots organizations just as he did at the Democratic National Committee. "A lot of these parties are where the Democrats were a few years ago," says an insider, "when there were people in the party who said, 'We have to be more like Republicans,'and others who said, 'We have to stand up for what we believe in.'"

Dems in? Lobbyists Win-No Problem!

The switch in Congress and promises by Democrats to swamp the administration with investigations and subpoenas are boosting K Street's bottom line. Lobbying and PR firms report up to a 25 percent surge in spending by worried firms, especially those in the defense, drug, and energy worlds expecting to catch the majority of flack from Capitol Hill.

It's 'Rewrite' for the Bible of Politics

Our colleague and columnist Michael Barone is back to rewriting the Bible–er, the bible of politics that is. As the chief author of The Almanac of American Politics, Barone updates after every federal election. But with the Democrats taking control of the House and Senate and with about 30 new faces in Congress, this looks to be a pretty big job. So what are Barone's git'r done secrets? First, he figures what to expand or cut. "Obviously," he says, "I'm not going to use a lot of the material on House Speaker Denny Hastert that was in the previous Almanac." Next, he gets detailed voting info. "I find that close examination of the election returns tells me a lot that most observers miss." To make sure he's balanced, Barone shuns labels. "I have tried to avoid using the word reform in describing any proposal, since it can be taken as showing approval for it." Now he has to redo the introduction, which famously declared America a 49 percent-to-49 percent nation. His new view: The country is still divided. "The political future," quoth the sage, "is very much up for grabs. Both parties have the possibility of getting enough support to go above the 51 percent ceilings." And that could happen, he adds, if a presidential candidate liked by both sides emerges in 2008.

Heritage Seeking Out Democrats On Agenda (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

The Heritage Foundation, seeing new opportunities to advance its conservative agenda in next year's Democratic Congress, wants to talk with Democratic leaders about where they might find common ground.

The prospect of the conservative think tank, whose ideas fueled President Reagan's policies in the 1980s, sitting down with some of the Democrats' most liberal leaders to discuss taxes, spending and health care might sound far-fetched in the immediate aftermath of a bitter midterm election. But a senior Heritage official says, "We are actively soliciting a chance to sit down and discuss our ideas with them," and Democrats say they are more than willing to get together.

Letters seeking a meeting for a frank exchange of ideas quietly began going out this week to a number of House and Senate Democratic leaders, including incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer and prospective Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel.

Mr. Rangel "thinks it's a great idea," said a spokesman for the New York Democrat. "He wants to hear different opinions because Congress functions best when you have more views expressed. Working for that middle ground is one of his priorities."

Heritage is not alone in thinking that some longtime adversaries of Democrats can have an effect on legislation in Congress next year. Advocacy groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Federation of Independent

Business (NFIB), say that potential alliances between some of the Democrats' newly enlarged centrist blocs, including the "Blue Dogs" and the so-called "New Democrats," could open up opportunities for them to move some legislation in their direction.

"Because both parties now will want to take accomplishments to the voters two years from now, it's going to force a new way of doing business in Washington," said Jay Timmons, senior vice president for policy and government relations at the National Association of Manufacturers.

"We're the eternal optimists here. We believe there is a chance to move a free-market, smaller-government agenda forward in this environment. Many of the incoming [Democratic] members won their seats on the appeal that I would characterize as one of limited government," said Michael Franc, Heritage's vice president of government relations.

"They talked of no tax increases on the middle class, they wanted a balanced budget, and they embraced the pay-as-you-go idea that, if you focus on the spending side, can be a wonderful discipline," Mr. Franc said. "Conservatives should not approach this new arrangement with an immediate confrontational posture."

The NFIB, the small-business lobby, similarly expresses cautious optimism that it might be able to win some support in Congress for its agenda on health, tax and regulatory issues, but not on the Democrats' plans to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, which business groups say they have no chance of blocking.

"There are definitely challenges posed by the new Congress, but opportunities as well. You have a lot of new Democratic members who ran as moderates or conservatives who are on record saying we need to do something for small businesses," said NFIB chief spokesman Michael Donohue.

Bruce Josten, chief lobbyist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, says that on some issues such as spending, the more centrist House Blue Dog Democrat caucus, which claims 44 members next year, and the New Democrat Coalition, which will have 62 members, could be a formidable force on key votes.

"How many Blue Dog Democrats do you know who subscribe to [incoming House Speaker] Nancy Pelosi's views? None would be the answer," Mr. Josten said.

But veteran tax-cut lobbyist Grover Norquist, who heads Americans for Tax Reform, doesn't see much chance that Democrats will help pass any of the conservative agenda.

"Tort reform? Nothing the trial lawyers do not want will pass. Labor-law reform?" Mr. Norquist said. "The unions own the Blue Dogs. They will vote against free-trade agreements because the unions tell them to. If you can't cross the trial lawyers or labor unions, on what issues are these Democrats supposed to be moderate?"

10 Questions For Charles Rangel (TIME)

By Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, December 4, 2006

Outspoken and influential, New York Congressman Charles Rangel is set to become chairman of the powerful Ways and Means Committee when Democrats take control of the House in January. A co-founder of the Congressional Black Caucus, Rangel, 76, spoke to TIME's Perry Bacon Jr. about his ongoing push for a military draft, whether he would back Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama for President and the controversy over the N word.

Is your push for a draft purely symbolic, or do you really think there should be a draft?

If we had had a draft, those who decided to have an elective--rather than defensive--strike against Iraq would not have received public or congressional support. When you're talking about war and you have no concept of anyone being lost in your family or your community, then it's human nature to be more prone to say, "Let's fight, I'll hold your coat." I'm serious about it. As of now, I would be satisfied to have a discussion.

The Ways and Means Committee oversees Social Security legislation. Most people say you'll either have to raise taxes or cut benefits to keep the system solvent. Do you agree?

I guess you would call extending the [retirement] age reducing benefits, but it's a very complex problem. One of the difficulties about Social Security is that if you start talking about the pain, then you lose the political will.

Whom would you support for President: Hillary Clinton, whom you backed for Senator when she was still First Lady, or Barack Obama?

He ought to get out there, test his wings and see whether there's any solid foundation for his popularity. No question--this is the time to do it. [But] right now, it would be Hillary Clinton, only because I know so much more about her.

Do you think an African American can be elected President?

I have reason to believe Colin Powell could have been President, yes.

Recently in New York City, an unarmed black man was shot to death by police officers who thought he might have a weapon. Why do you think incidents like this keep happening?

The police are addicted to a contagious need to expel rounds of deadly bullets. They cannot control themselves because they see their fellow companions do it. They don't carry the same standard they would in more affluent communities. Race only plays a role because there are more blacks and Hispanics in poor communities.

Did you hear about Michael Richards' comments, in which he repeatedly used the N word? Is that the comedian?

Yes. So many of these comedians are obscene that I would have no idea whether they were serious or it was part of their act. It was a terrible insult to African Americans, but so many things on TV are so insulting.

Lots of black rappers use the N word. Should they not?

I should think it would be a word that nobody would use.

What did you think of the ad about Tennessee Senate candidate Harold Ford Jr., which had a white woman saying, "Harold, call me"?

While it did not seem to me to be as devastating and as racist as I would think in first reviewing it, after having Southerners--white and black--share with me the deep-seated fear whites [have] of black men and white women, I then came to the conclusion that the ad meant to do harm from racial implication.

Last year you compared George W. Bush with Bull Connor, the civil rights--era police chief whose name is synonymous with racism. Do you regret that?

I have not chosen my words as carefully as I would want. It was my hope that, as Connor's act awakened Americans to racist policies that existed in the South, [after] the apparent lack of concern with Katrina, Americans would look at the question of poverty. I have been terribly disappointed.

Four blacks will chair committees in the new Congress, Massachusetts has its first African-American Governor, and Obama is a possible '08 candidate. Is this a new era for African Americans in politics?

There have been gradual increases in opportunity. Condoleezza Rice and Colin Powell are examples as to the progress that has been made politically. But in terms of economic advancements, it has been far slower than the political advancements. It's hard to say it's a new era.

FDA Project At White Oak Right On Track (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Four buildings are up and occupied. Three more buildings are under construction. Another is on the drawing board. Three other projects are on a waiting list.

The headquarters consolidation of the Food and Drug Administration, on 130 acres in suburban Maryland, appears on track to become one of the government's most successful construction and development projects.

"The project is going beautifully," Betsy L. Bretz, chairman of Labquest, a community group that has kept close watch over the site. "They have been good neighbors, and they are doing this responsibly."

When the project is completed, probably in 2011, about 7,700 FDA employees and contract workers will be located at White Oak, off New Hampshire Avenue in Silver Spring. Congress estimates the General Services Administration, which owns the property and is managing the construction, will spend about $900 million on buildings and site improvement.

Dave Dwyer, FDA's director for the headquarters consolidation, calls the project "the future of the FDA" because it will bring together scientists, researchers and safety experts who have been scattered in more than 40 buildings across Maryland and the District, often in offices in poor condition.

The project was authorized by Congress in 1990 and picked up some steam five years later, when the Defense Department began a round of base closings and decided to close a Navy laboratory for naval surface warfare research at White Oak.

"Everyone had a million ideas of what to do with the property," Bretz said.

But community and redevelopment representatives soon focused on the FDA, she said, largely because residents thought the nation needed a world-class complex where FDA employees could more easily collaborate and share ideas on how to protect Americans' health.

The decision to recruit the FDA to White Oak set off a decade-long struggle to obtain funding for planning, design and construction. Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski and Rep. Steny H. Ho yer, both Maryland Democrats with seats on appropriations committees, began making the case for Congress to fund the project, joined by Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.), other members of Congress and state officials. Local officials, in particular, were eager to retain a well-paid and highly educated workforce and hoped the FDA would attract high-tech companies to the Route 29 corridor near White Oak.

Funding for the project came in fits and starts, as is often the case when Congress has competing budget priorities. For example, the fiscal 2007 appropriation for White Oak -- $178.5 million -- is on hold until Congress determines how to revive spending bills that have stalled in the lame-duck session.

Still, the project has gained momentum through the years.

In October 2003, the FDA opened the first White Oak building -- a four-story life sciences lab for 100 employees that includes drug evaluation and research facilities. That was followed by the opening of two office buildings in August 2005 for 1,600 employees.

The latest opening came in September -- a "shared-use" building available to all employees. It features a conference center for large meetings, a dozen conference rooms, a consolidated library, a cafeteria, fitness center and credit union.

At the end of March, Dwyer said, the FDA plans to open an engineering and physics lab. Two other office buildings have been scheduled for openings in March 2008 and May 2009.

Also in the works are offices for the FDA commissioner and the agency's office of regulatory affairs, with a construction contract scheduled to be granted at the end of September. Starting in fiscal 2008, the FDA hopes to win congressional support for funding of two more life sciences labs and another office building.

"GSA is building on time and on budget," Dwyer said. "It's as good a GSA team as I have ever worked with."

Shapour Ebadi, a 20-year GSA employee, has been the GSA's project executive since 1994. Dwyer, who has nearly 30 years of experience in construction and facilities management, joined the project as the FDA representative in February.

The two agencies are looking at how to address traffic issues that seem likely to arise as more employees relocate to White Oak in coming months. To help employees who prefer mass transit and to hold down traffic, FDA has started a shuttle service to Metro subway stops and to FDA offices in Rockville, about 10 miles away. The GSA is looking for alternative entrances to the White Oak site in hopes of easing traffic at the primary entrance on New Hampshire Avenue.

After all, White Oak will probably be the FDA's home for several decades. "As best we can," Dwyer said, "we are trying to think for now, and for a minute from now."

"Helloooo, Dolly!" sang the chorus of photographers, their moods as jubilant as Dolly Parton's brisk bounce down the red carpet at the State Department dinner on the eve of last night's Kennedy Center Honors gala.

Except -- the country music star wasn't slowing down. She was supposed to slow down. And stop.

"Not too far," one of the photographers cautioned.

"No!" the country star retorted, finally halting and leaning forward flirtatiously. "He said to the 'X' " -- she pointed to the black tape under her heels -- "and that's the 'X.' " The lower half of her face cracked into a wide Joker's grin, the upper half remaining frozen as a photo. Flashes popped. Sparks flared from the sequins of her black velvet dress.

When Parton heard she would be one of the 29th annual Kennedy Center Honors recipients, joining musical theater composer Andrew Lloyd Webber, conductor Zubin Mehta, Motown legend Smokey Robinson and filmmaker Steven Spielberg, she "immediately went to work on the clothes," she said, telling her designer, Robert Bahar, "I have to look good, and I have to look like me. I want to look like Frederick's of Dollywood."

She calls her very low-cut dress and its accompanying bolero "my version of a tuxedo, with boobs out."

This was upstairs, just past the State Department receiving line where Condoleezza Rice -- emerald gown, big smile -- was welcoming everyone, with the honorees basking in this clubby, intimate and exclusive venue where the arts world's biggest stars and Washington's brightest bulbs celebrate together on the night before the grand and much more public gala.

Behind Parton was Aretha Franklin, who had just plucked three egg rolls from a passing tray and was drinking a Coke. Her fur wrap was flung across her high-backed chair. "Oh, Ms. Franklin!" squeaked Steven Spielberg's wife, Kate Capshaw, as she walked past. "How are you?"

Even the stars get starry-eyed at this black-tie, silk-gowned, stiletto-heeled, double-take-whiplash-inducing affair: There's George Lucas and Itzhak Perlman and Ted Kennedy and Barbara Walters and Michele Lee (from "Knots Landing") and Shania Twain.

Shania Twain! Zubin Mehta's young granddaughter Shenaya was excited to meet her, telling the crossover country star that they share the same name. Which prompted Twain to ask the granddaughter of the former director of the New York Philharmonic if she was named after her, a songstress whose hit list includes "Man! I Feel Like a Woman." Shenaya Chinoy said she answered, after a brief pause: No.

The star-studdery was everywhere. Natasha Richardson confessed that although the formal dinner -- crab cakes with avocado salsa, rack of lamb, chestnut potato puree, corn bread plus three wines (all fabulous) and, for dessert, chocolate coffee baked Alaska (not fabulous) and demitasse -- is a quintessentially grown-up evening, "it's making me feel like a 15-year-old, and I want to go around with my autograph book."

Franklin had come to celebrate, she said, "my oldest, dearest friend" -- Smokey Robinson, who grew up a block away from her in Detroit, where they were "childhood friends, sandbox friends." Back then, said the Queen of Soul and 1994 Honors recipient, "we sang a lot. People in Detroit like to sing. There was a group on every corner: Everyone aspired to be a singer." She took another bite of egg roll and said, "The way they play basketball now is the way we came up singing."

Robinson's hair curls around his face like a corona, and his turquoise eyes are as mesmerizing as his voice. "In one word," he said, "this is awesome." Later in the evening he was lauded by Richardson: "When Smokey sang, people got together. Babies were made." Or, as Motown Records founder Berry Gordy puts it, "He has touched people in places they had never been touched before."

Spielberg, describing himself as "ebullient," said, "When I got the official letter, it came to my office. I had them read it to me three times to make sure there wasn't a typo. So few filmmakers have been honored."

The drinks were served in big goblets, like fishbowls on skinny stems, and Webber was having trouble with his, getting jostled by the throngs. "It's great to have an American award like this," he said, then disappeared into the jostlers.

Right behind him, Mehta -- this year's other non-American honoree (he was born in Mumbai and is, he said, "still Indian") -- was reaching out as his dear friend Elaine Wolfensohn walked past and touched her sumptuous stole.

"This is from my country!" he exulted, rubbing the fabric lightly between his fingers. "Wow! Wow! Wow! It's super pashmina." He invited us to touch it, too -- but "without the pen," he admonished sternly. The shawl was softer than a puppy's ear, and as for the embroidery: "Just look at this work!" he said. "People go blind doing this."

"You have a good eye," Wolfensohn said and stroked Mehta's cheek. Her husband, Jim Wolfensohn, former president of the World Bank, would be doing Mehta's toast later in the evening.

At the far end of the room, Liam Neeson asked a waiter to bring him a glass of pinot noir. A tall and peevish presence, dressed like a funeral director, he was telling us he couldn't talk about Spielberg. Just listen to the four-minute speech I'll be giving tomorrow, he said. (It is a speech, by the way, that in rehearsal focused a lot on Neeson. Just saying.)

We asked about "Schindler's List." Is there really anything about Spielberg that he hasn't already written into a short speech?

"Schindler's List," Neeson said, almost with a sneer, "is not an anecdotal movie. It's really not. But we were a band of brothers." And we were dismissed.

Across the room, Tom Hanks was talking opera with Verdi baritone Sherrill Milnes -- comparing Shakespeare's "Othello" with Verdi's "Otello" -- and exchanging greetings with Ted Kennedy -- "We're going to be sitting at the same table," Hanks told the senator -- then took a moment to describe Spielberg as ("and I mean this in the best of all possible ways") "a machine. . . . He's never doing anything but movies. That's the way his DNA was created."

By 11 p.m., after the honorees received their medals, it was time to take the "class picture" (professional photographer unhappy that everyone in the room was snapping, too, messing up his flash) and get into the limos.

Perhaps the meaning of the whole night -- the whole weekend, and of the arts themselves -- was best summed up by Alison Krauss, who toasted Parton and made her cry when she said: "Dolly, you make me want to be somebody."

Artists Lauded At Kennedy Center Gala (NYT)

By Holli Chmela

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 — Though small-town Locust Ridge, Tenn., and big-city Detroit had little in common in 1940s America, each produced a singer who became much more than a hometown favorite. By the late 1950s and early 1960s, Tennessee's Dolly Parton had burst on the scene as a bubbly teenage country singer while Detroit's William Robinson Jr., as Smokey Robinson, had crooned his way onto the radio with a smooth style and soulful lyrics — and nearly a half century later both are still building musical legacies.

On Sunday, Ms. Parton, Mr. Robinson, the conductor Zubin Mehta, the musical theater composer Andrew Lloyd Webber and the filmmaker Steven Spielberg were recognized for their lifetime contributions to the arts at the Kennedy Center Honors here.

"This year we honor five extraordinary international artists whose abundant contributions to their fields are remarkable," said Stephen A. Schwarzman, chairman of the board of trustees of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. "They have transformed the culture of our country and of the world."

The Kennedy Center Honors, in its 29th year, is the paramount event on the Washington cultural calendar, with events at the State Department and the White House and a concluding program at the Kennedy Center. The program will be broadcast on CBS on Dec. 26. “To be included among these people — Smokey, Dolly, Zubin Mehta, Andrew Lloyd Webber — it’s really an honor,” Mr. Spielberg said. “It’s the closest thing to an American knighthood. We’re all feeling a gentle sword touching our shoulders tonight.”

On Saturday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was the host at a State Department dinner, where medals were presented to this year’s honorees. Among the 250 guests were the soul singer Aretha Franklin, a 1994 honoree; the violinist Itzhak Perlman, a 2003 honoree; the actor Tom Hanks; the country singer Shania Twain; Representative Nancy Pelosi, the incoming House speaker; and Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts.

An accomplished pianist and self-proclaimed “lover of the arts,” Ms. Rice said she went to a Smokey Robinson concert on her first date — chaperoned by her father because, “I suppose he thought there was too much power in the soul of Smokey Robinson.”

“Arts flourish most when they happen in a democracy,” Ms. Rice said. “The arts give expression to human spirit and give expression to human freedom.”

Mr. Kennedy said the first secretary of state, “Thomas Jefferson, and Secretary Rice both knew the power of the arts to bring people together.” He added, “Arts connect us with our history and inspire our future.”

Ms. Parton is one of the most honored country music stars of all time, with seven Grammy Awards, nine Country Music Association Awards and a National Medal of Arts. Mr. Robinson is lauded as a primary influence in rhythm and blues, at the Motown record label where he recorded dozens of Top 40 hits with the Miracles and as a solo artist. Mr. Mehta’s career as a conductor of Western classical music includes his tenure with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, with which he has conducted more than 1,600 performances on five continents. In his 13 years at the New York Philharmonic, Mr. Mehta conducted more than 1,000 concerts, including a 10-day tour of the Soviet Union in 1988.

Mr. Lloyd Webber is often referred to as the Shakespeare of his time with musicals like “Jesus Christ Superstar,” “Evita” “Cats” and “The Phantom of the Opera.” Mr. Lloyd Webber was knighted by Queen Elizabeth in 1992. He won an Oscar for "You Must Love Me,” a song written for the 1996 film version of “Evita.” Mr. Spielberg is among Hollywood’s most successful and influential directors, and a three-time Academy Award winner who won Oscars for best director and picture for “Schindler’s List” and best director for “Saving Private Ryan.” He directed three of the highest-grossing films of their time: “Jaws,” in 1975, “E.T. the Extra-Terrestrial,” in 1982, and “Jurassic Park,” in 1993.

Artists Get A Star-studded Salute (USAT)

By Karen Thomas

USA Today, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — The sounds of country, Motown, Broadway and classical music combined with Hollywood star power in the nation's capital Sunday for the Kennedy Center Honors.

Stars from across the entertainment industry turned out. Among them: Tom Hanks, Liam Neeson, Reese Witherspoon, Aretha Franklin, India Arie, Jessica Simpson, Shania Twain, Reba McEntire and Josh Groban.

They gathered to pay tribute to director Steven Spielberg, country's Dolly Parton, Motown's Smokey Robinson, Broadway composer Andrew Lloyd Webber and conductor Zubin Mehta. The stars joined President Bush and first lady Laura Bush for the 29th awards ceremony, in which the Kennedy Center recognizes artists for their lifetime contribution to the arts and to American culture. The two-hour gala in the center's opera house was taped to air Dec. 26 on CBS (9 p.m. ET/PT).

Witherspoon and Simpson were there to honor fellow blonde Parton. Simpson relied heavily on cue cards to perform 9 to 5 and missed a few lines.

“Dolly, you make me so nervous I can't even sing the words right,” Simpson said before leaving the stage.

Witherspoon fared a little better with the same Parton tune just moments earlier. The Walk the Line Oscar winner warbled several lines of 9 to 5 a cappella before giggling, “Someone else will sing this better later.”

The show featured plenty of musical numbers. Parton also was celebrated by a duet from American Idol's Carrie Underwood and Kenny Rogers, who sang Islands in the Stream.

Another duo, Hanks and Neeson, paid tribute to Spielberg. Hanks introduced five World War II veterans and a Holocaust survivor during the show. Renee Firestone, the Holocaust survivor, emphasized the importance of the work of the director of Schindler's List and Saving Private Ryan. “Thank you, Steven, for what you have done for history. You are our hero.”

Webber said the Kennedy Center award was better than a Grammy or an Oscar because "it's not connected to any of the industry." His former wife, Sarah Brightman, introduced the segment honoring him. When Broadway star Betty Buckley paid tribute by singing Memory from Webber's Cats, the audience responded with a standing ovation.

During the segment honoring Robinson, which was introduced by Franklin, Cee-Lo Green of Gnarls Barkley and Arie sang Going to a Go-Go, and Sam Moore and Jonny Lang performed Tracks of My Tears.

Robinson spoke earlier about receiving the honor: "It means everything to me," because the award is "for your impact on society."

Two More Years (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

At a reception following the midterm election, President Bush approached Senator-elect James Webb.

"How's your boy?" asked Mr. Bush.

"I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President," replied Mr. Webb, whose son, a Marine lance corporal, is risking his life in Mr. Bush's war of choice.

"That's not what I asked you," the president snapped. "How's your boy?"

"That's between me and my boy, Mr. President," said Mr. Webb.

Good for him. We need people in Washington who are willing to stand up to the bully in chief. Unfortunately, and somewhat mysteriously, they're still in short supply.

You can understand, if not condone, the way the political and media establishment let itself be browbeaten by Mr. Bush in his post-9/11 political prime. What's amazing is the extent to which insiders still cringe before a lame duck with a 60 percent disapproval rating.

Look at what seems to have happened to the Iraq Study Group, whose mission statement says that it would provide an "independent assessment." If press reports are correct, the group did nothing of the sort. Instead, it watered down its conclusions and recommendations, trying to come up with something Mr. Bush wouldn't reject out of hand.

In particular, says Newsweek, the report "will set no timetables or call for any troop reductions." All it will do is "suggest that the president could, not should, begin to withdraw forces in the vaguely defined future."

And all this self-abasement is for naught. Senior Bush aides, Newsweek tells us, are "dismissive, even condescending" toward James Baker, the Bush family consigliere who is the dominant force in the study group, and the report. Of course they are. That's how bullies always treat their hangers-on.

Even now, it seems, the wise men of Washington can't bring themselves to face up to two glaringly obvious truths.

The first is that Americans are fighting and dying in Iraq for no reason.

It's true that terrible things will happen when U.S. forces withdraw. Mr. Bush was attacking a straw man when he mocked those who think we can make a "graceful exit" from Iraq. Everyone I know realizes that the civil war will get even worse after we're gone, and that there will probably be a bloody bout of ethnic cleansing that effectively partitions the country into hostile segments.

But nobody — not even Donald Rumsfeld, it turns out — thinks we're making progress in Iraq. So the same terrible things that would happen if we withdrew soon will still happen if we delay that withdrawal for two, three or more years. The only difference is that we'll sacrifice many more American lives along the way.

The second truth is that the war will go on all the same, unless something or someone forces Mr. Bush to change course.

During his recent trip to Vietnam, Mr. Bush was asked whether there were any lessons from that conflict for Iraq. His response: "We'll succeed unless we quit."

It was a bizarre answer given both the history of the Vietnam War and the facts on the ground in Iraq, but it makes perfect sense given what we know about Mr. Bush's character. He has never been willing to own up to mistakes, however trivial. If he were to accept the failure of his adventure in Iraq, he would be admitting, at least implicitly, to having made the mother of all mistakes.

So Mr. Bush will keep sending other men's children off to fight his war. And he'll always insist that Iraq would have been a great victory if only his successors had shared his steely determination.

Does this mean that we're doomed to at least two more years of bloody futility? Not necessarily. Last month the public delivered a huge vote of no confidence in Mr. Bush and his war. He's still the commander in chief, but the new majority in Congress can put a lot of pressure on him to at least begin a withdrawal.

I'm worried, however, that Democrats may have counted on the Iraq Study Group to provide them with political cover. Now that the study group has apparently wimped out, will the Democrats do the same?

Well, here's a question for those who might be tempted, yet again, to shy away from a confrontation with Mr. Bush over Iraq: How do you ask a man to be the last to die for a bully's ego?

Why Darker Clouds Might Eclipse Sunny Unemployment Forecasts (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

From a bird's eye view, the job market seems to be humming as the unemployment rate hovers at a five-year low. Indeed, Federal Reserve officials have cited it as a sign of vigor that could stoke inflation.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke said last week that, outside of the auto and housing sectors, U.S. economic growth remains "solid," and that the tight labor market remains a top concern because it could prod some companies to raise prices. The unemployment rate fell to 4.4% in October.

However, other signals indicate the employment picture could darken. Initial claims for jobless benefits recently jumped to their highest level in more than a year. Payroll growth has eased this year to a monthly average of 147,000 net new jobs, from last year's 165,000. Just 92,000 jobs were created in October.

Data released Friday by the Institute for Supply Management show that the decline in manufacturing employment extends beyond the two suffering housing and auto sectors. Its employment index slipped to 49.2 in November from 50.8 in October. Readings below 50 indicate a contraction.

Question of the Day:2 Is the job market stronger or weaker than it was a year ago?

The ISM said employment fell last month in five of the 18 industries it tracks. Seven others reported flat employment. A separate report released last week showed durable-goods orders plunged in October, a sign business investment could be weakening.

The Conference Board, a nonprofit business research group that tracks consumer confidence, said 22.4% of those polled last month considered jobs "hard to get," up slightly from October. Along with other indicators, that suggests "a loss of momentum in the overall job market," said Gail Fosler, the board's chief economist.

Those are the kind of signs bond-market investors and some economists have seized upon to dispute the Fed's upbeat assessment. Yields on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note on Friday fell to close to their lowest levels of the year, a sign bond investors expect weaker growth next year.

Futures-market traders raised to roughly 74% Friday from 51% earlier in the day the odds that the Fed would cut short-term interest rates by April, even though the Fed has suggested its choice is whether to raise, not whether to cut.

Economists say the health of the economy and job market through next year hinges mainly on how quickly the auto and housing sectors can pare the excess inventories that are forcing them to cut production, and the effect of the housing market's slump on other sectors. They will scrutinize the November jobs report, due out Friday, for insight.

Tens of thousands of workers have already felt the effects of the auto and housing slowdowns. Roughly 72,000 hourly employees accepted buyouts from General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. and auto-parts maker Delphi Corp. GM and Ford said Friday they will cut North American auto production in the first quarter. Some of the nation's largest homebuilders have announced major job cuts this year.

Ed McKelvey, a senior economist at Goldman Sachs, projects monthly job growth will slow to an average of 75,000 next year. He expects the unemployment rate will climb to roughly 5% by the end of 2007, an increase sharp enough to elevate the risk of recession.

The October employment report, which showed the construction sector cut 26,000 jobs, "is just a drop in the bucket," said Mr. McKelvey, who anticipates that from 250,000 to 500,000 construction jobs could be slashed in the next six to 12 months. "The housing weakness has some distance to go," he said. "We're entering a phase where the spillover effect onto the job market and consumer spending are the biggest risks to the economy."

Nouriel Roubini, chairman of Roubini Global Economics, says the economy will be in recession next year.

To be sure, other economists say the job market is healthy and that indicators hinting at trouble can change direction quickly. The rise in initial claims for unemployment benefits in the week ended Nov. 25 might have been due to seasonal variations common during the holiday season, the Labor Department said. Still, it was the highest level since October 2005, in the wake of the Gulf Coast hurricanes. Excluding the post-hurricane period, initial claims hit their highest level in 2½ years.

Lou Crandall, chief economist at Wrightson ICAP, says the U.S. labor market should be fine. The housing and auto sectors are working down excess inventories this quarter, and that shouldn't have a major impact on other sectors beyond winter, he says. Moreover, large revisions boosted the estimate of August and September payroll growth, which suggests the job market is "generally in very good shape," Mr. Crandall says.

Still, Mr. Crandall says he will keep a keen eye on the November unemployment report. "Any downside surprises in Friday's report would have a greater-than-usual impact on our expectation" for economic growth, he says.

Cracks Widen In U.S. Economy (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, December 2, 2006

Economic weakness spread beyond the stricken housing and auto sectors last month, with reports showing U.S. manufacturing shrank for the first time in 31/2 years and construction dropped the most since the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

U.S. industries broadly cut back production, adding to factory shutdowns caused by deepening recessions in auto- and housing-related industries such as wood, furniture and appliances, according to a report yesterday from the Institute for Supply Management.

An unexpected decline in construction of offices and other business facilities in October added to a record string of drops in housing construction of more than 1 percent in the last seven months to cause the biggest drop in construction spending in six years, the Commerce Department said yesterday.

"Industry is clearly going through a rough patch" that few anticipated, said Daniel Jester, analyst at Moody's Economy.com. Outside housing and autos, the Federal Reserve had expected business to pick up rather than decline this fall, supporting a so-called "soft landing" in the economy.

The weakness in manufacturing started with autos, was compounded by housing, and recently has spread to big-ticket capital goods such as technology and telecommunications equipment, Mr. Jester said. In addition, a broad array of manufacturers are cutting back because of an unexpected buildup of inventories this fall that has to be worked off, he said.

"It is clear that several segments of the industrial base have weakened measurably over the past few months. This may now be spilling over to heretofore healthy segments related to business investment," he said.

"The signal of declining production should not come as a surprise," said Daniel J. Meckstroth, chief economist at the Manufacturers Alliance. "Two major manufacturing markets are declining -- motor vehicles and housing -- and many other industries are trying to adjust inventories to adjust for a period of much slower growth ahead in 2007."

The "awful" collapse of the construction market in October means that sector is likely to be a major drag on economic growth for the fourth straight quarter in the final quarter of 2006, according to Economy.com estimates.

David Wyss, economist at Standard & Poor's Corp., noted that the downbeat tone of recent economic news contrasts sharply with upbeat assessments this week coming from Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke and other Fed officials. Mr. Wyss said there is cause for worry.

"Weak retail sales and a drop in consumer confidence in November create worries about the consumer," he said, adding that "home sales and prices are dropping and the manufacturing sector appears to be retreating for the first time in over three years."

While Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials maintain that the economy can avoid recession even with the critical housing and car industries in decline, many economists disagree.

"Housing slowdowns tend to lead recessions rather than result from them," said John Makin, economist with the American Enterprise Institute. "An annual drop in the growth rate of residential investment of more than 10 percent has coincided with a recession five of the seven times it has occurred since 1965."

Housing, the biggest contributor to a halving of economic growth this year, plummeted at an 11 percent rate in the spring, 18 percent in the summer, and an estimated 9 percent in the fall.

"The intensity of the fall in U.S. residential investment during the middle two quarters of 2006 is approaching potential recession territory," Mr. Makin said, but whether a downturn occurs depends on whether the Fed changes its stance and starts to cut interest rates.

Interest rates declined in the bond market yesterday in expectation that the Fed will reverse course and start cutting rates by March.

Roger M. Kubarych, economist with Unicredit Markets, said the Fed will reconsider its position at a meeting later this month. Mr. Bernanke signaled that the central bank is starting to become concerned about the housing market in a speech this week that for the first time designated a housing collapse as the biggest risk to economic growth.

"It seems the Fed is beginning to get nervous about the economic outlook," he said.

Who's Afraid Of A Higher Minimum Wage? (WP)

By Michael S. Rosenwald

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Nomey Druskin, manager of the Rainbow Hair Designers at the White Flint Mall, employs six shampooers. Mostly Hispanic immigrants, they are paid at the low end of the wage scale. Druskin should be particularly interested in the Democrats' intention to raise the minimum wage when they take over Congress, right?

She's not. Druskin pays her shampooers at the North Bethesda salon a base rate of more than $8 an hour. That's higher than the federal minimum wage ($5.15), higher than Maryland's minimum wage ($6.15) and higher than what the Democrats are proposing federally ($7.25). In fact, the median hourly rate for all shampooers in the Bethesda-Gaithersburg area, according to federal statistics, is $7.48 -- above all mandated minimums.

Druskin said the shampooers at her 30-year-old salon earn what they earn -- plus tips -- for a few reasons. First and foremost, it would be inhumane to pay them less, she said, given the cost of living in the Washington region. And if she didn't pay them a decent salary, she couldn't attract good, stable help. The shampooers wouldn't smile as easily at their customers. The hair wouldn't be washed just right, and the business, which serves a high-end clientele, would suffer.

"We have to pay them enough to make them happy and for them to live happily," Druskin said. "It's a domino effect from the bottom up. We want the clients to be happy."

Druskin's experience suggests that increasing the federal minimum wage might be irrelevant for many of this region's workers and employers, given the extent to which market forces -- high demand for labor, low unemployment and the lofty cost of living -- have already raised the floor for hourly salaries. According to federal data, the median hourly pay for all workers in the Washington-Arlington-Alexandria area is $19.14 -- about 72 percent higher than Lubbock, Tex., where it is $11.13.

Dressing-room attendants make about $8.41 an hour here. Photographic processing machine operators: $10.29. Dishwashers: $8.05. Lifeguards: $7.98.

"Raising the minimum wage won't really matter for us," Druskin said. "We are already above that."

So are most other big job centers around the country, with only about 520,000 people nationwide making the federal minimum of $5.15 an hour, a rate that hasn't gone up in a decade and has led some 28 states and the District to pass their own increases.

"When you let the minimum wage fall as low as it's fallen, it becomes almost irrelevant," said Harry J. Holzer, professor of public policy at Georgetown University and a former chief economist for the Labor Department. "This is an attempt to make it somewhat more meaningful, but not so meaningful that it destroys a lot of jobs."

While the number who make the federal minimum wage is minuscule compared with the total workforce of 132 million, economists think that several million workers would be affected by a change in the law. The Economic Policy Institute, a Washington think tank, estimates that the number of workers making at least $5.15 an hour but less than the Democrat-proposed $7.25 will be 5.6 million by 2009 -- when the proposed increase would be fully phased in.

Then there are the workers who already make $7.25 an hour, or a little more. Liana Fox, an economic analyst for the institute, thinks these workers would also see a small bump in wages to keep the pecking order. The institute puts about 7.4 million workers in that category. That means 13 million people, or about 10 percent of the workforce, could be affected by an increase.

Of those workers, about 79 percent are 20 or older, the institute estimates. Forty-six percent work in sales or service. About 61 percent are white; 59 percent are women.

Locally, about 450,000 workers in Virginia -- 13 percent of the state's workforce -- could be affected, according to an EPI analysis. The total in Maryland is 116,000 workers, 4.4 percent of the workforce. An analysis for the District was not possible; the sample size was too small.

Economists and analysts for years have argued about the possible negative effects on the workforce of raising the minimum wage. Some, like Fox and Holzer, think those would be negligible, given that the dollar amount of the increase is not great. Also, Fox said, "this is such a small fraction of the total labor force."

But other economists say that raising the minimum wage would lead employers to reduce their staffs, eliminating jobs for the least-skilled employees. The National Restaurant Association recently released a poll in which 41 percent of family dining and casual restaurant operators said they would cut jobs because of increases in the minimum wage.

Jim Wordsworth, who owns the steakhouse J.R.'s Stockyards Inn in Tysons Corner, starts his dishwashers at $7.20 an hour, and some make more than that. He said he wouldn't cut jobs if the minimum wage went up, but he wouldn't add any.

Would he increase salaries for those already making more than the new minimum?

DOJ_NMG_0101759

"If I'm forced to by the market," he said. "I respond to market conditions."

Carlos Castro is another area employer who said he won't cut workers if the minimum wage goes up. As the owner of Todos Supermarkets in Alexandria and Woodbridge, he pays a starting wage of $7 an hour for cashiers, stockers, meat cutters and cooks -- well above the $5.15 minimum in Virginia.

"You just can't get by on minimum wage these days, and I don't want to force my employees to have to get a second job to support themselves," Castro said.

Castro said that if Congress increases the federal minimum wage, he will probably raise his pay to keep it above that -- precisely what the EPI anticipates happening around the country.

"My philosophy is to pay a little more than at other places to make sure we get better workers," he said.

New U.S. Rules Raise Retention Requirements For E-documents (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. companies will need to know more about where they store e-mails, instant messages and other electronic documents generated by their employees in the event they are sued because of changes in federal rules that took effect Friday, legal experts say.

The changes, approved by the Supreme Court's administrative arm in April after a five-year review, require companies and other parties involved in federal litigation to produce "electronically stored information" as part of discovery, the process by which both sides share evidence before a trial.

Federal and state courts have increasingly been requiring the production of such evidence in individual cases. The new rules clarify that the data will be required in federal cases.

Under the new rules, an information technology employee who routinely copies over a backup computer tape could be committing "virtual shredding" once a lawsuit has been filed, said Alvin F. Lindsay, a partner in the Miami office of Hogan & Hartson whose legal expertise is in technology and litigation.

Companies still could routinely purge their archives if the data aren't relevant to cases the companies have pending or expect to face, though specific sectors such as financial services remain governed by other data-retention rules.

The new rules make it more important for firms to know what electronic information they have and where, especially because of a provision that requires lawyers to provide information much earlier than before on where clients' data are stored and how accessible they are.

Besides e-mail, companies will need to know about things more difficult to track, such as digital photos of work sites on employee cellphones and information on removable memory cards, said James Wright, director of electronic discovery at Halliburton Co.

There are hundreds of "e-discovery vendors," and these businesses are raking in about $1.6 billion in 2006, Wright said. That could double in 2007, he added.

Although electronic searches can help narrow the amount of data, Lindsay said, some high-paid lawyers still will have to sift through casual e-mails to find relevant information.

But Martha Dawson, a partner at Seattle-based law firm Preston Gates & Ellis who specializes in electronic discovery, said companies would not have to alter how they retain their electronic documents. Rather, she said, they will have to do an "inventory of their IT system" to know better where the documents are.

As Jeb Bush Leaves Office, Big Role Awaits Him As Party Power Broker (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. -- Republicans pondering a political shift to the middle after their losses in midterm elections might consider the example of Florida Gov. Jeb Bush before setting their course.

Mr. Bush, who is stepping down this month because of term limits after eight years in office, has a track record as one of the nation's most socially and economically conservative politicians, yet he enjoys a nearly 65% approval rating in a state where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans. His brand of conservatism -- a mix of conservative political stands and activist governance -- has paid off for him in a way it hasn't for his brother in the White House.

His public support in a key swing state, his recent launch of a political advocacy group and the departure of two of his high-level aides to join the possible presidential campaign of another conservative governor suggest Mr. Bush will exert substantial influence over his party in the 2008 election and beyond.

At the least, he looks likely to be a significant power broker, despite the heavy toll the Iraq war has taken on his older brother's public-approval rating. The younger Bush has said he has no plans to seek the presidency in 2008. But he hasn't been as assertive in batting down persistent speculation among his closest backers that he might consider the No. 2 spot on a presidential ticket.

In a recent interview, he declined to rule out that possibility, adding that he wanted to dispel the myth that a hard political conservative has no future in politics. "There's a way to advocate conservatism that draws people toward the cause," Mr. Bush said. "I think I'm living proof of it."

Though he has declined to speculate on his political future beyond 2008, it is widely assumed that the 53-year-old governor would at least consider a White House run somewhere down the line. Among those fueling that assumption is President Bush, who told reporters last spring that his younger brother would make "a great president."

"Like a lot of other people, I've pushed him fairly hard about what he intends to do," President Bush said. "I don't think he knows, and if he did know he wasn't going to tell me because he's afraid I'd tell you."

While the governor has been vague about his own plans, there are few secrets about where his sympathies lie for 2008. Two of his chief political operatives have allied themselves with Republican Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who is considering a presidential bid.

Mr. Romney is viewed as a social conservative, to the right of presumed Republican front-runner Sen. John McCain of Arizona. That dovetails with Mr. Bush's view of himself: "I'm conservative admittedly and unashamedly. I don't apologize for it."

Governors control the political levers that help deliver a state's vote to presidential candidates. But as Mr. Romney and other Republican hopefuls begin fanning out across the country in the next few months, they will find their network of statehouse allies has shrunk since President Bush won re-election in 2004.

The November elections left Democrats holding a majority of governorships for the first time in a dozen years. Democrats held on to big states in the East and Midwest and picked up Ohio, which has had a Republican governor for 16 years. In 2004, President Bush's narrow victory in Ohio was viewed as pivotal to his re-election.

Now, with electoral-vote heavyweights like Ohio, Pennsylvania, Michigan and New York in Democratic hands, a Republican victory in 2008 is likely to depend on Texas and Florida, states where the Bush name continues to play well.

Florida is considered a must-win for Republicans; shortly after Election Day, the party tapped Florida Sen. Mel Martinez to be its general chairman. Florida's importance for 2008 is clear to early presidential hopefuls: Messrs. McCain and Romney along with former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani all visited the state during the 2006 election season. Mr. Romney, as head of the Republican Governors Association, gave the state's party $1 million.

"This is the highest priority state for us," Mr. Romney said during his September visit. "There are a couple of others in that category, but nobody's higher than Florida."

During his tenure as governor, Mr. Bush, helped by a sympathetic Florida legislature, expanded the reach of his office. While most judges in Florida previously had been elected, the governor now controls many of the state's judicial appointments. In a recent interview, Mr. Bush referred to that system as "the proper way" to select judges.

Education has been a priority for Mr. Bush, and by nearly every account he has improved Florida schools without raising taxes. He also worked with the legislature to abolish the Board of Regents, which had overseen the state's public universities, and to unwind affirmative action on those campuses.

Along with improving Florida's bond rating, Mr. Bush also has managed to seize control of the state's budget from the legislature. "The governor now dominates the budget process," he said. "The drunken sailors can't take charge in Florida."

Moreover, the state's performance in providing disaster relief in the wake of hurricanes, particularly after four of them hit in the 2004 season, has drawn national accolades.

As governor, Mr. Bush has rarely shied from a political fight, though he hasn't always avoided embarrassing missteps. In 2002, after Florida voters passed a ballot proposal to limit class sizes, Mr. Bush, unaware that a reporter was present, told lawmakers he had "a couple of devious plans" for derailing the cap. Similarly, in a speech to the Florida Medical Association, he promised to "whack the trial lawyers," prompting critics to accuse him of basing his drive to reform the state's medical-malpractice regime more on political vengeance than sound policy.

In 2003, Mr. Bush dispatched Florida troopers to raid the hospice where brain-damaged Terri Schiavo lay in a "persistent vegetative state" and, over the objections of her husband, whisk her away to another hospital, where she could be fed through a tube. After Ms. Schiavo died in 2005 following a protracted court battle, Mr. Bush asked a state prosecutor to investigate her husband's role in the 1990 incident that caused Ms. Schiavo's condition. Mr. Bush later dropped the investigation, bringing to an end a series of moves that even people close to the governor considered risky political overreach.

For better or worse, such actions have shaped Mr. Bush's political reputation, says J.M. "Mac" Stipanovich, a Tallahassee lobbyist and onetime aide to former Republican Gov. Bob Martinez. "Jeb will always matter," Mr. Stipanovich said. "But he'll matter the most if the party decides to stay right-wing....Then Jeb would be a paragon, an exemplar for the party."

Mr. Bush also draws respect from the other side of the aisle. Jim Krog, a former chief of staff for Democratic Gov. Lawton Chiles, said Mr. Bush deserves accolades for changing one of the weakest governor seats in the country into one of the strongest. "I've never seen a governor as tireless as him, and I doubt I ever will again," Mr. Krog said. "He breathes it. He lives it. And you know what? Jeb Bush in the White House wouldn't be the worst thing that could happen."

Mr. Krog said that from a political handicapper's standpoint, Mr. Bush "could announce for president tomorrow, and make a helluva run at it." In a recent interview, Mr. Bush, formerly a commercial real-estate developer, said he intends to return to private life after leaving office. Mr. Bush said he probably will remain involved in issues that interest him, such as school vouchers.

Though Mr. Bush reiterated in a recent interview that he has no intention of running for president in 2008, he declined to rule out joining a presidential ticket -- which some political supporters have suggested he will consider. "I'm leaving," he said. "I don't know what I'm going to do."

Mr. Bush blames what he calls "political heroin addicts" for stirring up speculation about his future. In recent months and years, his name has been floated for National Football League commissioner, senator from Florida and president. Many of his closest supporters say he is almost certain to seek higher office down the line.

Adding to his appeal as a potential vice-presidential candidate, Mr. Bush has proved he can raise significant amounts of campaign money. In August he created a political advocacy group called Foundation for Florida's Future Action Fund, which state newspapers have reported already has amassed $2 million in cash. Mr. Bush has teased the media about the purpose of the organization, recently telling reporters: "The great thing about America is you can ask and I don't have to say."

GOP Governors Ponder Damage (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

MIAMI -- Some Republican governors meeting here wonder whether their party can realistically hope to regain majorities in Congress, the governors mansions and state legislatures, given that the unpopular Bush administration's lease on the management of government has two more years to run.

Republican governors, whose numbers went from a high of 32 in 1998 to 28 last year, generally agree that the reasons they are down to 22 after last month's elections are the Iraq war and the general tarnishing of their party's brand image.

"The war in Iraq hurt even at the gubernatorial level, even at the state level," Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour said, agreeing with a point Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman made in a speech to the Republican Governors Association annual meeting that concluded over the weekend.

"National issues, especially the war in Iraq, had a profound impact on state races including campaigns for governor," Texas Gov. Rick Perry said. "Immigration was another powerful issue."

Mr. Barbour said he and other members of the Republican Governors Association were told in a closed meeting that polling showed that 20 percent of people who voted in the governors' races said Iraq was a major issue in their vote.

"Now, that's just hard to believe, that people would think about foreign policy and national-security issues and say that's what affects whom I vote for governor," Mr. Barbour said. "Because the governor has nothing to do with it. Yet people felt so strongly about the war, it colored their decisions about whom to vote for governor."

Governors said that in closed conference sessions, they heard reports from Republican pollsters and managers of state legislative campaigns who said their legislative candidates would go door to door, knock and say, "I'm running for the statehouse." The voter who answered the door would say, "Well, great, what are you going to do about Iraq?" The candidate would reply, "Well, I'm running for the statehouse and we don't have anything to do with that."

But the voter would simply repeat, "Well, what are you going to do about Iraq?"

The devastation of the midterm elections was beyond what many Republican governors had expected. Mr. Barbour said he didn't realize till he heard Mr. Mehlman say it in his speech that there is now only one Republican, Rep. Christopher Shays of Connecticut, among the 22 newly elected House members who hail from New England.

Some Republican strategists attending the conference said privately that they suspect it is, as one of them put it, "silly" to think about taking back the House and Senate and winning a majority of governorships with the Bush administration still in power.

"It goes back to that larger theme of trust," says South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford, a limited-government conservative who won re-election on Nov. 7. "And once that trust is broken -- for whatever reasons, and a lot of it was very innocent -- I mean, the people didn't expect anything better from Clinton. He was viewed as a scoundrel from the start."

Mr. Sanford said, "It's more difficult for [President] Bush and [Vice President Dick] Cheney, given the high standing they held, and now there's this angst about Iraq -- and I think the economy is going to weaken."

Mr. Barbour sees the Democrats playing at least as big a role as the Bush administration in determining whether a Republican comeback is possible.

"It depends on what happens the next two years," he said. "The Democrats have offered nothing, and if they do what they offered -- nothing -- then the Republicans might come back in two years."

Yet Republican governors say that the war was not the only cause of the midterm meltdown.

"Republicans need to stop spending like Democrats because ultimately the people will elect the real thing if there is no difference," Mr. Perry said.

Recalling the year when Republicans gained the congressional majority that was wiped out Nov. 7, Mr. Barbour said that in 1994, "Republicans got elected by a majority who wanted a different domestic policy. In this election, the Democrats got elected because they weren't the Republicans. It was the war, but also scandal and corruption."

A Split In The GOP Tent (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Republicans are good at reinvention. They have appealed to voters' dark side (Nixon's Southern strategy) as well as to their sunny side (Reagan's "Morning in America"). They have skipped from anti-government populism (Newt Gingrich and the leave-us-alone coalition) to big-government machine politics (the alliance with corporate lobbyists known as the K Street Project). Through all these transformations, the GOP has sustained its big-tent coalition. The question in the wake of its election thumpin' is whether the tent will split.

You can see this possibility in " Liberaltarians," an essay in the New Republic by Brink Lindsey, the director of research at the libertarian Cato Institute. Lindsey is not merely joining the large crowd of disenchanted conservatives who believe that the Republican Party has betrayed its principles -- spraying money at farmers, building bridges to nowhere and presiding over the fastest ramp-up in federal spending since Lyndon Johnson. Rather, Lindsey is taking a step further, arguing that libertarians should ditch the Republican Party in favor of the Democrats.

Why react to the temporary corruption of a party by abandoning it outright? Lindsey's answer is that Republicans are not merely failing to live up to their principles; the principles have altered. The party has been virtually cleaned out of the Northeast; it has suffered setbacks in the Mountain West; it increasingly reflects the values of its stronghold in the South. As a result, it has lost its libertarian tinge and grown more religious and traditionalist.

There has always been a tension between Republican libertarians, who believe that individual choices should be unconstrained by received wisdom, and Republican traditionalists, who believe pretty much the opposite. In their history of the conservative movement, John Micklethwait and Adrian Wooldridge recall that Barry Goldwater believed Jerry Falwell deserved "a swift kick in the ass;" and Goldwater's wife, Peggy, helped to found Planned Parenthood in Arizona. But for a long time the two wings of the party could paper over these differences. Christian conservatives and libertarians agreed that misconceived government programs were harming traditional values. Schools forced sex education on children. The tax system and the welfare system penalized marriage.

Conservatives have grown less able to bridge these divisions because of their success. Welfare has been reformed, and the tax system now supports families with the expanded child tax credit. Having ticked off the first things on their to-do list, Christian conservatives now press for affirmative state action on behalf of traditional values: amendments to the constitution to bar gay marriage, government efforts to teach abstinence, federal payments to faith-based groups. All these policies appall libertarians.

It's not just the values of the South that pose a problem. It is the region's appetite for government. The most solidly red states in the nation tend also to be the most reliant on federal handouts -- farm subsidies, water projects and sundry other earmarks. It's hard to be the party of small government when you represent the communities that benefit most from big government. George W. Bush tried to straddle this divide by pleasing libertarians with tax cuts and traditionalists with spending. The result is a huge deficit.

Would libertarians be more comfortable in the company of Democrats? On moral questions -- abortion, gay marriage, stem cell research -- clearly they would. But on economic issues, the answer is less obvious. For just as Republicans want government to restore traditional values, so Democrats want government to bring back the economic order that existed before globalization. As Lindsey puts it in his New Republic essay, Republicans want to go home to the United States of the 1950s while Democrats want to work there.

If Democrats can get over this nostalgia, there's a chance that liberaltarianism could work. For the time has passed when libertarians could seriously hope to cut government: Much of what could be deregulated has been, and the combination of demographics, defense costs and medical inflation leaves no scope for tax cuts. As Lindsey himself says, the ambition of realistic libertarians is not to shrink government but to contain it: to cut senseless spending such as the farm program and oil subsidies to make room for the inevitable expansion in areas such as health.

As it happens, this also describes a plausible agenda for the Democratic Party -- at least if it can shed the back-to-the-1950s yearnings of its reactionary left. Precisely because Democrats want government to provide social insurance against the volatility of globalization, the party has an interest in cutting unneeded federal spending. Precisely because entitlements are expanding so expensively, the party needs cost-saving ideas from anyone who has them -- including libertarians.

The era of big government is far from over, and liberals and libertarians gain nothing from fighting over its inevitable growth. But precisely because government is on a trajectory of unsustainable expansion, liberals and libertarians have a common interest in reinventing it.

Senate Will Be Tough On 2008 Hopefuls (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, December 4, 2006

For senators with presidential aspirations, 2007 looms like a potential minefield.

The schedule alone is a career enhancement hazard.

When Congress returns under Democratic control in the first week in January, the House and Senate will be tied up with spending bills and other legislation left over from this year as well as an ambitious agenda set by new Democratic congressional leaders.

The schedule for this week's lame-duck session calls for a limited amount of work.

Lawmaking will be a balancing act between voters' expectations and legislative pragmatism, between the impulse to spend and fiscal discipline, between campaigning and staying in Washington to govern.

The likely candidates next year face votes on appropriations, budgets and trade — all of which present potential pitfalls in a presidential campaign.

Congress also could consider immigration and Social Security legislation, two issues that attract widespread public interest as well as alarm.

Hanging over all that will be Iraq.

So far six Democratic and three Republican senators are weighing whether to run for president in 2008. Two House Republicans also are in the mix. The race is off to an early start, with potential candidates setting up their campaign and fundraising operations and seeking early media exposure.

For the Democrats in particular, that amounts to serious multitasking.

At least three — Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and John Kerry of Massachusetts — will be committee chairmen in the Senate. Two other senators — Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Evan Bayh of Indiana — are in line to head two subcommittees, where much legislation originates.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada has pledged to increase the work tempo in the Senate, promising votes throughout the week instead of the current Tuesday to Thursday schedule.

"It's going to be interesting to see if those folks who are in the Senate and who now have the responsibility to chair committees, to sort of run the show, whether their attention will be captured by the Senate or whether they will make time to come campaign," said Dick Harpootlian, a former chairman of the Democratic Party in South Carolina. His state is a requisite stop early in the presidential sweepstakes.

As senators, Republican and Democratic presidential contenders will face difficult choices on the Senate floor. Democrats have pledged to budget frugally, spending or cutting taxes only if the money can be made up elsewhere.

That is a tall order given their desire to increase spending on education and fix the alternative minimum tax, intended to ensure the wealthy do not avoid taxes through loopholes.

But this tax is not indexed to inflation and has encroached on middle-income taxpayers. Correcting the tax or eliminating it would cost hundreds of billions in lost revenue over the next decade.

Congress also will have to address nettlesome trade issues.

President Bush's right to negotiate trade deals without the ability of Congress to amend them expires in June. Labor unions oppose simple reauthorization and votes that expand trade do not play well in states such as South Carolina, which has lost much of its textile industry to foreign countries.

DOJ_NMG_0101764

Outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a likely contender for the Republican presidential nomination, alluded to the challenge facing senators while he attended the annual meeting last week of the Republican Governors' Association, which he has headed.

"There's nothing that's going to yield a bigger swat — or a thumping if you will — than saying one thing and doing another," Romney said.

Part of the problem for Democrats is that congressional Republicans return to Washington this week with the reins of power still in their hands, but with little ambition to do much more than ride out of town by week's end.

During the weeklong session, the last under GOP control, Congress is expected to vote on a new defense secretary, approve a package of expiring but popular tax and health provisions, put the government on a budget autopilot and leave major spending decisions to next year.

Unable to complete action on nine major spending bills to operate the government, the House and Senate plan to approve a resolution that will keep the government running at current spending levels until Feb. 15. House and Senate negotiators were trying to finish work on a nuclear power technology-sharing agreement between the United States and India.

Congressional leaders were looking for ways to get a vote on legislation giving Vietnam preferred trading status. Labor unions oppose the bill, though several Democrats, including Dodd and Kerry, support it. But without any urgency to pass it, the measure could also end up in a 2007 to-do list.

Absent any legislative clashes, the Iraq war will offer lawmakers plenty of opportunities to spell out their differences with Bush administration policy — and with each other.

Bush's nominate to lead the Pentagon, Robert Gates, will have his confirmation hearing Tuesday before the Senate Armed Services Committee. Clinton, Bayh and Sen. John McCain of Arizona, now considered the front-runner for the Republican presidential nomination, are committee members.

Gates is not expected to face serious opposition, but he will be pressed to assess the administration's policies in Iraq.

"They need to elicit from Gates a clear and unequivocal recognition of the full range of the mistakes that have been made," said Susan Rice, a foreign policy expert at the Brookings Institution who advised Kerry in his 2004 presidential campaign. "If he can't acknowledge that, it really does call into question his willingness and ability to change course."

On Wednesday, a bipartisan commission studying Iraq is scheduled to release its recommendations. They are expected to call for increased diplomacy with Syria and Iran and a gradual withdrawal of combat troops from Iraq.

Many Democrats, including Kerry, want a specific timetable for withdrawal. McCain, on the other hand, wants to boost troop strength in Iraq. Either way, the commission report will provide fodder for presidential candidates to stake out positions that will follow them well into the campaign.

Early 'Maybe' From Obama Jolts '08 Field (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 3 — Senator Barack Obama's announcement that he might run for president is altering the early dynamics of the 2008 Democratic nominating contest. The move has created complications for Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton as she steps up her own preparations and is posing a threat to lesser-known Democrats trying to position themselves as alternatives to Mrs. Clinton, Democrats said Sunday.

The declaration six weeks ago by Mr. Obama, an Illinois Democrat, has set off a surge of interest in Democratic circles, which party officials expect will only be fueled in the coming week as Mr. Obama prepares for a day of campaignlike events in New Hampshire next Sunday.

At the least, Mr. Obama's very high-profile explorations have contributed to a quickening of the pace across the 2008 Democratic field. On Sunday, Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana said that he would create a presidential exploratory committee this week. And Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa went so far as to announce his candidacy two years before Election Day, in what his aides said was a calculated strategy to grab a moment of attention before Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton blot out the sun.

Mrs. Clinton has been meeting in recent days with New York Democrats — including a two-hour brunch on Sunday at the Manhattan apartment of Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer — to telegraph her own likely entry into the race, though her aides said the get-together had been planned before Mr. Obama discussed his possible run publicly.

But more than simply picking up the pace, Democrats increasingly believe that Mr. Obama has the potential of upending the dynamics of the 2008 contest more than any other Democrat who might run — short, perhaps, of Al Gore, the former vice president, whom some Democrats are pressing to run.

In Mr. Obama, Democrats have a prospective candidate who both underlines and compensates for the potential weaknesses that worry many Democrats about Mrs. Clinton.

He is a fervent opponent of the war in Iraq, and Democrats see him as an exceedingly warm campaigner with a compelling personality and a striking ability to command a crowd. He has no known major political baggage (though he has yet to encounter anything approaching the level of scrutiny Mrs. Clinton has undergone during her years in public life). And Mr. Obama can even match Mrs. Clinton's arresting political storyline if he tries to became the nation's first black president as she seeks to become its first female president.

But whatever complications he might pose for Mrs. Clinton are dwarfed by the shadow he is throwing over lesser-known Democrats. Almost without exception, they have approached this race with the same strategy: to try to emerge as the alternative to Mrs. Clinton and take advantage of substantial reservations in Democratic circles about her potential to win the White House.

There is only so much money, seasoned political expertise and media attention to go around, so the prospect of Mr. Obama eyeing the presidential nomination is understandably unsettling to his potential rivals. Whereas their original success was contingent on Mrs. Clinton folding, now they face the prospect of having to hope that two high-profile national Democrats collapse in the year leading into the Iowa caucuses.

"For every candidate in the race who isn't Hillary Clinton, the entry of any other candidate in the races makes your job that much harder," said Ron Klain, who worked as a senior adviser for Mr. Gore when he ran for president. "For all those guys, Obama is a very serious candidate who will compete with them for the limited supply of activists and media attention."

Mark McKinnon, who was a top adviser to President Bush in his two White House runs and who is a senior adviser to Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona and a likely presidential candidate in 2008, said, "I think Barack Obama is the most interesting persona to appear on the political radar screen in decades." He added, "He's a walking, talking hope machine, and he may reshape American politics."

David Axelrod, a senior adviser to Mr. Obama, said, "If you believe at some level that this is a zero-sum game in terms of money and supporters and talent, then any time someone gets in with a big excitement quotient, that affects everybody else." Mr. Axelrod has worked for Mr. Vilsack and for John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator who ran for president in 2004 and is likely to do so again this time.

Mr. Bayh got a reminder of that on Sunday when he appeared on "This Week" on ABC.

"What kind of a strategy do you need to combat huge political celebrities like John McCain, Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton?" asked George Stephanopoulos, the program's host.

Mr. Bayh earnestly dodged the question for a moment, before finally responding: "Is this a little bit like David and Goliath? A little bit, but as I recall, David did O.K."

Asked repeatedly about the woman who is perceived as his most formidable challenge in the primary, Mr. Obama has been careful not to criticize Mrs. Clinton directly. But one of his central messages is that he is something Mrs. Clinton is not: a late baby boomer (he was born in 1961, at the tail end of the post-World War II generation; Mrs. Clinton was born in 1947), and a fresh face that rises above old partisan grudges.

Mr. Obama has already provided some hints of how he would position himself against Mrs. Clinton, suggesting he would link her to her husband's presidency and their role in the intense partisanship that marked much of the 1990s and that carried over into the Bush presidency.

During a lengthy interview just before the midterm elections, Mr. Obama portrayed himself as part of a new generation of political leaders. Asked whether he detected a void in the Democratic presidential field, Mr. Obama replied that he sensed a mood of "Do we want to get beyond the slash-and-burn, highly ideological politics that bogged us down over the last several decades?"

Mr. Obama went on to say that he admired former President Bill Clinton for trying to bridge a centrist course between Democrats and Republicans. But he did not shy away from pointing out Mr. Clinton's weaknesses — as someone who came of age in the 1960s, and all the debates about Vietnam service, drug use and sexual conduct that went with it, issues that continued to play out, sometimes with Mrs. Clinton in a supporting role.

"Although his instincts were right on target, and I think, intellectually and pragmatically, he understood that America wanted to move beyond those categories, in some ways he was trapped by his biography," Mr. Obama said. "Some of what I say, I think, is facilitated by the fact that I'm less rooted in some of those arguments."

For all the excitement Mr. Obama's potential candidacy has stirred, he remains a 45-year-old first-term senator who is largely untested in national politics. Yes, Mr. Obama is unusually talented, Democrats and Republicans alike say, but the history of presidential campaigns is filled with examples of celebrity candidates like Gen. Wesley Clark in 2004 who burst onto the political stage but eventually sputtered as they struggled to master the difficulties of running for president.

Mrs. Clinton's advisers said they never figured this would be an easy race for her, should she run. They said they appreciated Mr. Obama's political talents and the threats he posed to her candidacy — in particular, his appeal to liberal voters, given the opposition to the war, and his appeal to black voters, who have been a large part of Mrs. Clinton's base.

It is conceivable that Mr. Obama would help Mrs. Clinton by initially commanding contributions and blocking out more experienced and tested potential rivals — like Mr. Edwards or Mr. Bayh — only to stumble later on, when it is too late for anyone else to catch up.

James Carville, a Democratic consultant who advises Mrs. Clinton, said it was impossible to predict how Mr. Obama might shape such a crowded field.

"He has an early effect on the race, but there's no way to predict what happens in a presidential race with this many funded candidates and this kind of name recognition," Mr. Carville said.

Mrs. Clinton's advisers have said throughout the year that she would wait until after the midterm election before moving into the more aggressive exploration phase that she is now in. "Her decision-making process is not going to depend on what candidates do or don't do, which isn't to say we don't have tremendous respect for the other candidates," said Howard Wolfson, a Clinton adviser.

One Democrat with knowledge of Mrs. Clinton's conversation with Mr. Spitzer on Sunday, and who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the conversation was meant to be private, said Mrs. Clinton did not tell Mr. Spitzer that she was running or ask him to commit to her possible candidacy; rather, they talked over the pros and cons of a presidential run.

Mr. Obama, who first said in October that he was considering a race for the White House, said he intended to make his decision known after the first of the year.

Other Democrats who might run include Senators Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, Joseph R. Biden of Delaware and John Kerry of Massachusetts, and Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico.

Mr. Vilsack has been the most aggressive in trying to compensate for an expected move by Mr. Obama: the governor did a five-state announcement tour last week. "We accomplished our mission which was to make our introduction before anyone else sort of crowded in on the field," said Jeff Link, a senior adviser to Mr. Vilsack.

Clinton In 'extensive' Talks About 2008 Run (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, December 4, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is ramping up preparations for a 2008 presidential run, talking to political colleagues in New York and interviewing potential staff. A final decision is expected early next year.

Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said Sunday that the New York Democrat is consulting with her state's congressional members, state party chairman Denny Farrell and Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer. "She is weighing what a campaign would entail, thinking about what themes she would run on, what issues she would discuss."

He said Clinton and Sen. Charles Schumer, New York's other senator, are scheduled to have "extensive" discussions this week in the capital.

The flurry of activity comes as the fields take shape in both parties. Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., said Sunday he will form an official exploratory committee this week to raise money for a potential race. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is finishing a five-day, five-state announcement tour today.

On the Republican side, Senate majority leader Bill Frist said last week he will not run. Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani have formed exploratory committees. Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback is expected to follow suit this week.

Bayh, a former two-term governor, said on ABC's This Week that he'll announce a final decision early next year. The country needs "someone who can unite Americans in a politics of common purpose," he said. "If I can be that individual, so be it."

Clinton was a lightning rod for controversy as first lady, but as a senator has tended to New York concerns and sponsored bills with Republican partners. She won a second term last month with two-thirds of the vote.

Even as she declined to discuss possible presidential plans during her re-election campaign, Clinton consistently led the list of Democrats in national polls of prospective nominees.

In a USA TODAY/Gallup poll last month, Clinton was the choice of 31% of Democrats. In second place was freshman Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who generated excitement this year campaigning for fellow Democrats. In recent days he has been conferring with friends, family and political associates about whether to run for president.

The only other prospect in double digits was former North Carolina senator John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee, at 10%. Former vice president and 2000 nominee Al Gore was at 9%, followed by 2004 nominee John Kerry at 7%. Bayh and Vilsack trailed with 2% and 1%, respectively.

According to Wolfson, Clinton has from $10 million to $14 million left from her Senate race that could be used for a presidential campaign if she runs. Bayh, who has been busily raising money, may have close to the same amount.

Hillary Networks To Get Likely '08 Bid Up And Running (WT/AP)

By Beth Fouhy

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

NEW YORK -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton met yesterday with New York's Democratic governor-elect to solicit his support for her likely White House bid, the latest indication she is stepping up plans to join a growing field of potential contenders for 2008.

One rival, Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana, announced yesterday he was establishing an exploratory committee to raise money for a possible presidential run. He expects to decide over the Christmas holidays whether to seek his party's nomination.

A top aide to Mrs. Clinton said he did not know when the former first lady would decide about pursuing the presidency or set up an exploratory committee. Clinton aides, however, have begun interviewing potential campaign staffers, Howard Wolfson said.

Mrs. Clinton, who long has topped national polls of Democratic hopefuls, spent two hours with Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer at his Manhattan home.

"We just had a great, wide-ranging meeting on so many issues that affect the city, the state and the country," Mrs. Clinton said as she left the meeting.

Last week she contacted leading state Democrats, including Reps. Charles B. Rangel and Nita M. Lowey, and the state party chairman, Denny Farrell, to assess her prospects and seek their support.

Mrs. Clinton's Democratic colleague, Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, told reporters yesterday that Mrs. Clinton had called him to arrange a meeting next week. But he was coy about the purpose of the get-together.

"She wants to sit down and talk next week, which we're going to do. It could be about legislation. I have no idea what it's about, and until we sit down and talk that's all I'm going to say about it," Mr. Schumer said. He added, "I think she'd make a very good president, but let's wait and see. Everyone's sort of jumping the gun."

Mr. Wolfson said Mrs. Clinton "is reaching out to her colleagues in the New York delegation and asking for their advice and counsel and their support if she decides to make a run."

Mrs. Clinton easily won re-election last month to a second term in the Senate. Mr. Wolfson noted that Mrs. Clinton long has said she would begin actively considering a presidential bid after that election. "That process has begun," Mr. Wolfson said.

Thirteen months before the first votes are cast in the nomination process, the presidential jockeying has intensified in both parties.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack announced his bid for the Democratic nod last week; Mr. Bayh is taking the initial steps; and others, such as the party's 2004 ticket of Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, are weighing runs.

The effort comes as Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, a rising star in Democratic politics, enjoys a wave of publicity and momentum around a possible White House bid.

Mr. Obama, a clear challenger to Mrs. Clinton's front-runner status, has appeared before huge crowds around the country, promoting his best-selling book, "The Audacity of Hope."

He met with aides in Chicago last week and they expect him to disclose his intentions about a 2008 run in a matter of weeks.

On the Republican side, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani have established exploratory committees; so, too, has long-shot candidate Rep. Duncan Hunter of California. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is moving toward a bid and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas is expected to announce his intentions soon.

Mr. Bayh, appearing on ABC's "This Week," acknowledged he was not well-known outside Washington and Indiana, but said he had the credentials necessary to be an effective president.

"As the people get to know me, I think we'll do very well. I've been a successful two-term governor with a record of delivering results. I now have national security experience from my presence in the Senate," he said. "Is this a little bit like David and Goliath? A little bit, but as I recall, David did OK."

Mr. Bayh, 50, has charted a relatively centrist course in the Senate. He has appearances scheduled this week in Iowa and New Hampshire, two states with early contests on the presidential campaign calendar. As of Sept. 30, he had about $10.5 million in his Senate campaign account, all of which can be transferred to a presidential committee.

Mrs. Clinton, for her part, has as much as $13 million left from her Senate race, plus a vast network of donors and advisers led by her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

Bayh Considers Presidential Bid (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0101768

By Chris Cillizza
The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh (D) announced yesterday that he is forming a presidential exploratory committee, a move that allows him to raise money and travel the country in support of a potential national candidacy in 2008.

Appearing on ABC's "This Week," Bayh said the American people "need someone who can deal with the dysfunction here in this city so that our government begins to empower our people to fulfill their potential," adding: "If I can be that individual, so be it." He said he expects to make a final decision on whether to run by early 2007.

Bayh's announcement caps a busy week in Democratic presidential politics as Gov. Tom Vilsack (Iowa) formally announced his bid, former senator Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.) dropped out of the race, and Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) began to test the 2008 waters. Clinton is reaching out to members of the New York congressional delegation, seeking advice and support in case she decides to run. Obama said that on Dec. 10 he will visit New Hampshire, a key early primary state.

The Republican race has already begun in earnest as well. Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and former New York City mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani have formed exploratory committees, and outgoing Gov. Mitt Romney (Mass.) is expected to join the field shortly after the new year.

Bayh's announcement has long been expected. Since winning reelection in 2004, the Indiana senator has focused heavily on bolstering his presidential rÃ©sumÃ© -- traveling to Iowa and New Hampshire, raising millions of dollars for himself and other Democratic candidates, and assembling a staff of operatives with national experience. As of Sept. 30, Bayh had $10.6 million in his Senate account -- all of which can be transferred to a presidential bid.

Bayh was slated to spend today campaigning in Iowa, and then head to New Hampshire later in the week to do the same. He has already begun looking for office space in both states as well as interviewing potential staff members in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada.

Later this month Bayh will host a meeting of his top financial backers in Washington. He is also interviewing media consultants; Anita Dunn, Bayh's longtime media adviser, will not play that role should he run for president but will remain a senior strategist for the campaign.

"The exploratory committee will allow us to put an infrastructure in place so that as soon as a decision is made, we can turn the switch and be an up-and-running, high-caliber presidential campaign on day one," said Bayh spokesman Dan Pfeiffer.

While his active planning for a presidential bid has spanned much of the past two years, Bayh's potential on the national stage has been a matter of speculation for more than two decades. The son of former senator Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) -- himself a failed presidential candidate in 1976 -- Evan Bayh was elected Indiana secretary of state in 1986, and in 1988, at age 32, won the governorship. Easily reelected in 1992, Bayh began running in late 1996 for the seat being vacated by retiring Sen. Dan Coats (R). In November 1998 he was elected to the Senate with 64 percent of the vote, and six years later coasted to a second term.

Bayh's electoral success in a state regularly won by Republicans in presidential contests -- Lyndon Johnson was the last Democratic nominee to carry Indiana -- is at the core of his campaign-in-waiting. Bayh's allies argue that he is the lone candidate with a proven record of winning the votes of Republicans and independents, a necessity for the party's chances of retaking the White House in 2008.

"Evan Bayh has developed a formula for winning under the most difficult of circumstances," Pfeiffer wrote after the midterm elections. "He is fiscally responsible, tough on national security, shares the values of middle-class families, and values progress over partisanship."

Although his rÃ©sumÃ© is impressive, Bayh is little known outside Indiana. National polling and surveys in early-voting states show Bayh as barely a blip on the radar screen when compared with such figures as Clinton, Obama and former North Carolina senator John Edwards.

Bayh acknowledged his underdog status in the "This Week" interview. "Is this a little bit like David and Goliath?" he said. "A little bit, but as I recall, David did okay."

Clinton, Bayh Step Up Efforts For 2008 (AP)

AP, December 4, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton met on Sunday with New York's Democratic governor-elect to solicit his support for her likely White House bid, the latest indication she is stepping up plans to join a growing field of potential contenders for 2008.

One rival, Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, announced Sunday he was establishing an exploratory committee to raise money for a possible presidential run. He expects to decide over the Christmas holidays whether to seek his party's nomination.

A top aide to Clinton said he did not know when the former first lady would decide about pursuing the presidency or set up an exploratory committee. Clinton aides, however, have begun interviewing possible campaign staffers in recent weeks, Howard Wolfson said.

Clinton, who long has topped national polls of Democratic hopefuls, spent two hours with Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer at his Manhattan home.

"We just had a great, wide-ranging meeting on so many issues that affect the city, the state and the country," Clinton said as she left the meeting.

Last week she contacted leading state lawmakers, including Democratic Reps. Charles Rangel and Nita Lowey, and the state party chairman, Denny Farrell, to assess her prospects and seek their support.

Clinton's Senate colleague, Chuck Schumer, told reporters Sunday that Clinton had called him to arrange a meeting next week. But he was coy about the purpose of the get-together.

"She wants to sit down and talk next week, which we're going to do. It could be about legislation. I have no idea what it's about, and until we sit down and talk that's all I'm going to say about it," said Schumer. He added, "I think she'd make a very good president but let's wait and see. Everyone's sort of jumping the gun."

Wolfson told The Associated Press that Clinton "is reaching out to her colleagues in the New York delegation and asking for their advice and counsel and their support if she decides to make a run."

Clinton easily won re-election last month to a second term in the Senate. Wolfson noted that Clinton long has said she would begin actively considering a presidential bid after that election. "That process has begun," Wolfson said.

Thirteen months before the first votes are cast in the nomination process, the presidential jockeying has intensified in both parties.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack announced his bid for the Democratic nod last week; Bayh is taking the initial steps; and others, such as the party's 2004 ticket of Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry and former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, are weighing possible runs.

The effort comes as Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, a rising star in Democratic politics, enjoys a wave of publicity and momentum around a possible White House bid.

Obama, a clear challenger to Clinton's front-runner status, has appeared before huge crowds around the country, promoting his best-selling book, "The Audacity of Hope."

He met with aides in Chicago last week and they expect him to disclose his intentions about a 2008 run in a matter of weeks.

On the Republican side, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani have established exploratory committees; so, too, has long-shot candidate Rep. Duncan Hunter of California. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is moving toward a possible bid and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback is expected to announce soon about his intentions.

Bayh, appearing on ABC's "This Week," acknowledged he was not well-known outside Washington and Indiana, but said he had the credentials necessary to be an effective president.

"As the people get to know me, I think we'll do very well. I've been a successful two-term governor with a record of delivering results. I now have national security experience from my presence in the Senate," he said. "Is this a little bit like David and Goliath? A little bit, but as I recall, David did OK."

Bayh, 50, has charted a relatively centrist course in the Senate. He has appearances scheduled this week in Iowa and New Hampshire, two states with early contests on the presidential campaign calendar. As of Sept. 30, he had about $10.5 million in his Senate campaign account, all of which can be transferred to a presidential committee.

Clinton, for her part, has as much as $13 million left from her Senate race, plus a vast network of donors and advisers led by her husband, former President Clinton.

Vilsack told ABC his candidacy would appeal to a broad range of voters in states not traditionally friendly to Democrats.

"I think it's important for Democrats to be able to expand. I think our party has got to expand the map," Vilsack said. "I think we can do this. I think I can do it. I think I have done it in my state."

Politics: McCain's Ground War (NSWK)

By Holly Bailey

Newsweek, December 4, 2006

Dec. 11, 2006 issue - Peter Spaulding was John McCain's man in New Hampshire, and with good reason. The longest-serving member of the state's Executive Council (which, with the governor, holds all administrative power for the state), Spaulding chaired McCain's victorious 2000 New Hampshire primary campaign. So influential is the Republican counselor, his bid for re-election this past November earned the endorsement of the state's Democratic governor. It didn't help. Like so many Republicans, Spaulding was crushed at the polls this year. He didn't hesitate when asked to explain his defeat. "Voters were angry," he said. "They wanted to see some big changes, starting with Iraq."

Spaulding's fate could have implications for his old friend McCain. Since the election, the Arizona senator has pushed for more, not fewer, troops in the Iraq conflict, claiming "without additional ground forces we will not win this war." It's a striking stance for a man considered to be the front runner for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008, considering the American public's growing impatience for the end of the war. Even in conservative New Hampshire, 38 percent of voters now support bringing troops "home ASAP," according to the most recent Granite State poll. South Carolina, where a tough defeat ended McCain's 2000 campaign, will play an even more influential role in 2008 thanks to early placement in the primary calendar. There, too, Republican voters are growing unhappy with the war. "People are wondering how long this is going to go on," says Buddy Witherspoon, a Republican National Committeeman from Columbia. "I don't think a proposal like that is going to get McCain any votes down here."

Privately, some McCain supporters have begun to worry that the senator's hard line on the war may turn off the moderate, independent-minded voters who've long formed the bedrock of his primary support. "We lost independents," says one campaign adviser, who asked for anonymity discussing the politics of national security. "McCain will have to get them back to win, or at least convince them to trust him."

Still, some members of McCain's inner circle are convinced the position could actually work to his advantage—reminding independents of the maverick they fell in love with in 2000. In a 2008 campaign, aides say, the senator would accentuate his differences with the Bush administration over management of the Iraq occupation, stressing his early criticism of ousted Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and the persistent call for more troops. The hope, the campaign adviser says, is that even antiwar voters will gradually come to accept the position as "a long-term stand based on principle."

It's a risky strategy, particularly in a primary field where candidates like Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney offer Iraq-free résumés and a fresh set of eyes for the conflict. Last week, Tom Vilsack, the Iowa governor, kicked off his bid for the Democratic presidential nomination by claiming McCain's option would "make a big mistake even bigger." Still, aides say the senator will continue to call for more troops. "It's not in his nature to let potential political considerations influence a decision like that," says his chief of staff, Mark Salter. "This is what he believes, period."

Bucking Tide Of School Reform, A Superintendent Gets Results (NYT)

By David M. Herszenhorn

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

Kathleen M. Cashin is responsible for some of the roughest territory in the New York City school system — vast stretches of poverty and desolation from Ocean Hill-Brownsville and East New York in Brooklyn to Far Rockaway in Queens, all part of Region 5, where she is superintendent.

Already this school year, two of her students have been shot dead, including a 16-year-old killed last week. The area has more homeless shelters than any other part of the city. For generations, the local school districts she now runs were marred by racial strife and corruption.

Yet in the last three years, Dr. Cashin has produced one of the school system's most unlikely success stories. Since 2003, her elementary and middle schools have consistently posted the best total gains on annual reading and math tests, outpacing other regions with similar legacies of low achievement.

"It's not a job, it's a lifework," she often tells her staff. "You are saving children's lives."

Dr. Cashin's results should be an easy reason for Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and Schools Chancellor Joel I. Klein to gloat, a triumph in their takeover of the nation's largest school system. But in many ways, her success raises questions about the thrust of their recent efforts to reshape the school bureaucracy.

While Mr. Klein has derided the "status quo crowd" and sought to bring outsiders into the administration, Dr. Cashin is a lifelong city educator. While Mr. Klein wants to free principals from the control of superintendents like her, Dr. Cashin believes even the best principals need an experienced supervisor.

Where Mr. Klein insists that school administration must be reinvented to reverse generations of failure by generations of educators, Dr. Cashin, a product of the old system, insists she can get results with a clear instructional mission, careful organization and a simple strategy of every educator's being supported by an educator with more experience.

In short, Dr. Cashin stands, in a way, as the antithesis of Mr. Klein's mission to slash midlevel bureaucracy and let principals sail on their own, a challenge to the notion that changing governance structure is the key to turning around schools.

She runs her schools in Region 5, with more than 85,000 students, the same way she ran her schools under the old Board of Education and under previous mayors.

The tug and push over how to manage the system is not academic. Across the country, big school districts have looked outside the ranks of educators, turning to experts in business, law or the military for help. Mr. Klein is a lawyer; Los Angeles hired a retired Navy admiral; the Seattle superintendent is a former banker and public utilities official.

But with studies showing little progress in narrowing the achievement gap between minority and white students, the question of how best to improve schools in places like Region 5 is the most critical issue in American education. And Dr. Cashin has the numbers to stake a claim as the best turnaround artist in town.

In 2003, 33.2 percent of her students in grades three to eight could read on grade level and 34.6 percent were proficient in math. Today, 50.6 percent read on grade and 56.9 percent are proficient in math. No other region starting below 40 percent has crossed the halfway mark in either subject.

"We are relentless," Dr. Cashin said in a recent interview. "The secret is clear expectations. Everything is spelled out. Nothing is assumed." She provides her principals, for instance, with a detailed road map of what should be taught in every subject, in every grade, including specific skills of the week in reading and focus on a genre of literature every month.

Dr. Cashin was chosen by Mr. Klein to be one of 10 regional superintendents, as part of the initial restructuring of the city's 32 local school districts under Mr. Bloomberg's control of the system. But since the start of the mayor's second term, Mr. Klein has pushed to reduce the role of superintendents, giving wider authority to principals in an effort that could lead to consolidation or elimination of the 10 regions. That could potentially leave the regional superintendents without jobs or perhaps filling a new role in which principals choose them to advise groups of schools. They would no longer be supervisors but rather support staff.

In a statement, Mr. Klein praised her for doing a "terrific job." But, through a spokesman, he suggested that Dr. Cashin was one of few exceptions to come up through the ranks and that Region 5's results, while impressive, were still incremental, while he wants much larger citywide improvement. He also reiterated his intention to "devolve decision making and resources" to give principals more power.

In an interview, Andres Alonso, the deputy chancellor for teaching and learning, also suggested that Dr. Cashin and Mr. Klein were not so different. "She has a huge entrepreneurial side," he said. But he tempered his praise, noting that aggregate improvements in scores, across many grade levels, can mask slower progress in particular areas.

He also said the mayor's initial restructuring had set the stage for her region's gains. "They were given the span of control, they were given the political authority, they were given the resources," he said of the superintendents. "They were supported comprehensively."

Dr. Cashin, a Brooklyn native who once studied to be a nun and now zips through some of the city's bleakest quarters in a dark Lexus, does not criticize her bosses publicly. But just 15 of 115 principals in Region 5 joined the chancellor's "empowerment" program, which frees principals from answering to superintendents in exchange for their agreeing to meet performance targets. Other similarly sized regions had two or three times as many sign up.

Dr. Cashin prefers principals who come up through the system over graduates of the chancellor's Leadership Academy, which has focused on recruiting candidates from other professions. And while Mr. Klein has dealt with the teachers' union on a war footing, Dr. Cashin has made the union a partner, hiring it to train teachers instead of using outside vendors.

Though she uses the citywide math and reading programs in many schools, Dr. Cashin does not believe they are sufficient and customizes them extensively, with an emphasis on writing. She also uses an array of other initiatives of her own choosing or design.

"You need to expand the knowledge base, expand the vocabulary, expand the experience base, and that only comes with good instruction and a rich curriculum," she said.

In Region 5, about 100 principals are overseen by 13 local instructional superintendents, who are constantly in schools to make sure they are on track and who meet weekly with Dr. Cashin and her longtime deputy, Stephen M. Mittman.

Close associates of Dr. Cashin, who turns 59 this month, said frustrations with headquarters at times had prompted her to consider retiring. But she is divorced, with three stepsons but no children of her own, a regret she describes as "an emptiness in my heart." So far, her friends said, she cannot bring herself to give up her life's work.

Dr. Cashin grew up in Flatbush, the youngest of five children. Her parents died when she was a teenager. She studied to become a nun but settled on teaching, first in Roman Catholic school and then at Public School 299 in Bushwick until teacher layoffs in 1976.

She worked in educational publishing, then in curriculum development for the Board of Education. In 1982, she became principal of P.S. 193 in Midwood, where she stayed until becoming superintendent of District 23 in Ocean Hill-Brownsville, the epicenter of battles between black parents and white educators in the 1960s.

Former Chancellor Rudy Crew, who hired her for District 23, said Dr. Cashin excelled in the technical aspects of teaching: "She is a principal's dream."

DOJ_NMG_0101772

To appoint her, Dr. Crew overruled neighborhood opponents who were demanding a black superintendent and branded her "the white lady from Bensonhurst." (She is from Bay Ridge.)

Denise Gordon, a longtime parent organizer, said Dr. Cashin bridged racial divisions. "I tell everyone she's tan because she's black underneath," said Ms. Gordon, who is black.

These days, Dr. Cashin, who is 6 feet tall with short blond hair, strides into schools, juggling her cellphone and BlackBerry, doling out hugs to parents, kisses to principals and a never-ending stream of thank-yous to her teachers. She calls everyone Baby or Hon.

"You have to be kind to people," she said. "If people feel they don't have a voice, they are going to strike back at some point."

Although Dr. Cashin is beloved by parent and community groups, often impressing them with her passion for children, some who have worked with her say that she can be imperious, that she listens intently but can be difficult to persuade to change her mind.

She is often generous with praise, but her criticism can be merciless. "It's got to be much more rigorous," she told a principal after touring a Brownsville elementary school. Her quiet tone did not mask her fury. "I don't think there's a sense of urgency."

She was particularly distressed to see some children sharing books and noted with disdain that some were doing busywork. "I saw, in one or two rooms, copying from the board," she said, derisively. "I don't know what that was all about."

Dr. Cashin is obsessed with writing, and in most of her schools, student work lines the walls — not just the final product but layers of drafts. Even first graders have writing posted on the walls.

A feature used in every school is the four-square graphic organizer, a worksheet with four boxes like a window pane and a rectangle at its center that helps children develop a five-paragraph essay. Some progressive educators scorn it as a crutch; Dr. Cashin insists that it works.

While the city's reading program focuses on story books, Dr. Cashin layers on lots of nonfiction. And, responding to research showing that impoverished children often lack vocabulary and basic facts, she has adopted a curriculum called Core Knowledge, which teaches basics like the principles of constitutional government, events in world history and well-known literature.

"The question to raise is, why aren't more schools doing this?" said Pedro Noguera, an education professor at New York University. "Why aren't more of these approaches that are proven to be effective being adopted more widely in the city?"

Others say they are impressed by her organization. "They stick with a plan, make sure the resources get to the plan and follow up to see if the plan worked," said Seppy Basili, the vice president of Kaplan K12 Learning Services, the test preparation company, who has worked in districts nationwide.

While the scores in Region 5 reflect extensive test preparation, on that front, too, Dr. Cashin does things her way, having pushed Kaplan to develop a program to her specifications.

At a recent conference on homeless children, Dr. Cashin recalled the anxiety among some of her principals over an influx of students from a shelter. "The children from the Junius Shelter are going to be coming," she said, recalling the unease. "What are we going to do? Our reading scores have just started to go up."

"These are the children that are traumatized, that are hungry, that are fatigued, that are stressed," she told the audience.

"We decided the goal was not to try to take the fewest numbers, but to have T-shirts for them, and book bags and intervention services, to welcome them, be nurturing to them, because these are the children who have been most hurt."

With A Hefty Education Grant Come Equally Great Expectations (WP)

By Jacqueline L. Salmon

The Washington Post, December 3, 2006

Irasema Salcido's heart raced when she pulled the letter from a stack of mail in her Capitol Hill office. She tore open the envelope.

The Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation is pleased to award the Cesar Chavez Public Charter Schools a grant in the amount of $1,570,000. . . .

Salcido rocketed into her staff's offices to share the news. She had landed what thousands of other nonprofit organizations are chasing: a Gates grant. One of the world's largest charitable foundations, the most important sponsor of efforts to improve U.S. schools after the government, believed in her seven-year-old educational experiment.

That moment in September 2005 marked the launch of a partnership between a Harvard-educated daughter of migrant farm workers and a charity built on the fortune of a billionaire Harvard dropout.

If all went as planned, two Cesar Chavez schools would become four. Then four might become more. With that jackpot letter, the Chavez school motto -- "SÃ-, se puede! Yes, it can be done!" -- seemed to have become "Yes, it will be done!"

"I thought, 'Well, Gates, they're probably going to give us the money, and we're very thankful, and that's that,' " Salcido recalled.

But Gates money doesn't just come with dreams. It also comes with demands.

With nearly $32 billion in assets and more coming from investment guru Warren Buffett, the Gates Foundation is a leading sponsor of global health and economic development initiatives. In the United States, the foundation focuses on upgrading libraries and public education. In the school arena, it seeks to raise high school graduation rates and prepare more students, particularly minorities, to go to college.

"America's high schools are obsolete," Bill Gates argued in a speech last year in Washington. "Until we design them to meet the needs of the 21st century, we will keep limiting -- even ruining -- the lives of millions of Americans each year."

The Microsoft founder has the means to do more than complain.

Overhauling schools is all the rage among the entrepreneurial nouveau mega-rich, such as personal computer pioneer Michael Dell, Netscape founder James Barksdale and home builder Eli Broad. But the Gates Foundation is lavishing unprecedented sums of money on the effort. So far, it has awarded $1.5 billion in grants to improve secondary education, including $285 million last year. Richard Colvin, director of Columbia University's Hechinger Institute on Education and the Media, called the foundation an "unparalleled force" in U.S. schools. "They are going to change the high school experience for tens of thousands of kids," he said.

Gates grants have flowed to schools and school systems in 42 states and the District, including $126 million to New York, $65 million to Chicago and $38 million to Oakland, Calif. The grants have helped open 1,100 schools and revamp an additional 700. The foundation also has sunk millions into education think tanks and policy and academic groups (including Hechinger). Its agenda is to create high schools with rigorous college-prep curricula, to replicate successful experiments and to convert giant, mostly urban schools into effective, manageable units.

Reviews of the Gates school initiatives have been mixed.

This fall, Denver shut down a high school that had received $1 million in Gates grants; officials cited plunging enrollment after the school was divided into three smaller ones and students fled to other schools.

In Lebanon, Ore., parents and school board members rebelled after a foundation-backed effort broke up the lumber-mill town's high school and cut back on traditional vocational classes. Gates pulled out abruptly in May, and the school system lost half of its $950,000 grant.

"Sometimes I'm not sure Gates wants all the headlines they get," Lebanon Superintendent Jim Robinson said. "When things get a little rocky, safer ground is easily found elsewhere."

The foundation, through research it has commissioned, has found that Gates-funded schools have strong attendance and more rigorous English and reading assignments. But the research also showed that test scores have improved only slightly, and math performance has been stagnant or lower compared with other schools.

So far, the foundation and intermediaries have spent about $4 million in the District. Most has gone to charter schools such as Chavez, which receive public funding but are independently operated. Gates officials have shied away from larger investments in the turbulent and troubled D.C. school system.

But now the foundation is considering a larger effort. Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty (D) has asked for its guidance in a possible bid to take over the public schools.

Irasema Salcido could offer the incoming mayor insight on working with Gates.

Salcido, an administrator for 12 years at Bell Multicultural Senior High School in Northwest Washington, opened the first Cesar Chavez Public Charter School for Public Policy in 1998 in a Southwest Washington supermarket basement. The school, named for the late Mexican American labor and civil rights leader, seeks to offer a college-prep curriculum to kids whose families earn less in a year than the annual tuition of pricey private schools.

The school days are long and expectations lofty. After-school tutoring and summer school are required for all students regardless of academic standing. So are internships and service projects with community groups or think tanks. Four-fifths of the students are African American, and most of the rest are Latino.

Although some kids show up academically prepared, most arrive at the high school two to six grades behind. Some struggle with basic arithmetic or with writing a paragraph. Chavez seeks to help them catch up.

Three years at Chavez changed the life of Moises Flores, 22, a Nicaraguan immigrant. "I finally realized that I could do something," he said. "I could learn, and I could excel." He graduated in May from American University and is headed for law school.

Salcido, 44, an elegant and dark-eyed woman, knows the obstacles Flores overcame only too well. She moved to the United States from Mexico at age 15 knowing almost no English. To get through high school, she memorized passages from textbooks. It took her more than a decade to get through college and graduate school.

With her life experience and vision, Salcido has proven adept at attracting students. Her flagship campus moved three times in eight years to accommodate growth, settling on Capitol Hill; a second campus with a combined middle school and high school opened east of the Anacostia River last fall. Enrollment is now more than 1,100.

However, test scores have been just slightly better than the mediocre citywide average; the latest test data show one-quarter of Chavez students were proficient in math and one-third in reading. Just as worrisome, many students leave the school after their freshman year.

Salcido reached out to the Gates Foundation in 2004 through an official she knew there, education program director Jim Shelton, who arranged for Melinda Gates to tour the school that year. (Like Buffett, Melinda Gates serves on the board of The Washington Post Co.)

Salcido said she begged the foundation for help. "This is the time to make the investment," Salcido told Shelton last year, "not later when we make mistakes."

The pitch worked. The foundation dispatched program officer Andrew Smiles to help Salcido put together a proposal.

After prowling around the Capitol Hill campus, Smiles liked much of what he saw. Girls in bracelet-size hoop earrings and boys in baggy jeans walked past hand-lettered posters listing the grade-point averages of top students. Like the tail of a kite, sheets of paper lined a hall with the names of graduating seniors and the colleges to which they had been accepted. Bates, Penn State, Howard, the University of Maryland -- every Chavez graduate has been accepted to college, according to the school.

Many teachers were former policy wonks with Ivy League degrees. Smiles also saw promise in the public policy-oriented focus that linked coursework to the world at large. The school fit with the Gates "three R's" approach: rigor, relevance and relationships.

But some classes weren't as rigorous as they could be, Smiles concluded, and inexperienced teachers didn't know how to push kids to do more than recite answers by rote.

In a few weeks, he and Chavez administrators hammered out a 30-page plan with 11 target actions, known as "deliverables," in exchange for foundation support to fix problems and add two campuses. Most of the Gates money would come toward the end of a five-year grant. The deliverables included strengthening the curriculum, training teachers, drawing up more detailed budgets and taking steps to reduce student attrition. Nearly a quarter of the freshman class, Smiles discovered, had disappeared by the time their sophomore year began.

The Gates model is more common in business than philanthropy. Experts say Gates officials seek to hold grant recipients accountable and find formulas for success. The foundation "doesn't give all that much money to a school just because it's good and they want to make it better," said Paul T. Hill of the Center on Reinventing Public Education at the University of Washington, which also has received Gates funding. "They give money to the school because it's an exemplar and they want to have it reproduced."

So far, the Chavez schools have received $370,000 in two installments and have met the foundation's conditions. Salcido and her administrators hired a dropout prevention specialist, recruited a curriculum expert for their board of directors and hired a principal to open a third campus next fall. But tough questions remain. Will the dropout rate decline? Will teacher training help raise test scores? Will the new school have a strong academic plan?

One key element of the Chavez expansion has been delayed. Two new campuses, not one, were supposed to open next fall. Salcido still aims for that fourth campus. Her enrollment target is 3,000 students.

"They've learned a lot of tough lessons over time," Shelton said of Salcido's team.

Smiles stays in constant contact by phone and in person, taking on an oversight role typical for a central office in a large school system. In July, he met with Chavez administrators to review progress on such matters as the new school calendar and dropout prevention. With pressed khaki pants and a thatch of unruly brown hair, Smiles looked like a cross between a Microsoft engineer and a prep-school English teacher as he took notes on a legal pad.

"It'd be great to get some perspective on the deliverables," he told them. "I'm also hoping that this meeting can serve as reflecting time to say, 'Here we are, getting prepared for two more schools.' "

Salcido gave a mock groan. "Do you have to remind us?" she said, as laughter rippled across the room.

Smiles grinned. "I know," he said. "Exactly."

Shirtless Bush Seen In 'Brokeback' Spoof (AP)

By Beth Duff-brown

AP, December 4, 2006

A "Brokeback Mountain" parody airing on Canadian television depicts an unusual type of summit between President Bush and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

In the sketch based on the acclaimed film about a love affair between two cowboys, Harper and Bush are portrayed naked from the waist up in a tent. Images of their faces are pasted over actors' bodies.

At one point, Bush throws cherries at Harper's nipples, which are covered with whipped cream. After the cherries land, separatist politician Andre Boisclair, who cooperated with filming of the spot, is seen opening the tent flap and stiffly saying that Quebec won't get involved "in something like that."

The sketch was filmed for the MusiMax music and entertainment channel but has leaked out to French-language TV stations, upsetting members of the provincial Liberal government of Premier Jean Charest.

"I leave it to Mr. Boisclair to defend his judgment," said Quebec's education minister, Jean-Marc Fournier.

Boisclair, who is gay and the leader of Parti Quebecois, later said he regretted the entire episode: "It's quite obvious I wouldn't do it again."

Tweaking The News (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

Katie Couric showed up without an appointment.

It was Thursday morning in Amman, Jordan, and the CBS anchor, who hadn't gotten to bed until 4 a.m., was woken up with word that she might have a shot at talking to the Iraqi prime minister if she headed to the military airbase."I thought, 'What the heck, what else do I have to do but sleep?' " she says.

Nouri al-Maliki, who had just finished a scheduled sitdown with ABC's Charlie Gibson, did not recognize Couric and did not seem receptive. But the Iraqi foreign minister interceded on her behalf, much to the dismay of the ABC producers who thought they had an exclusive.

Couric, who also wound up interviewing Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, had hesitated to fly to Jordan for President Bush's meeting with Maliki. "We just weren't sure if it'd be worth our while in terms of securing interviews," she says from Amman. "Then we decided the only way we'd know is if we came and tried."

The critics -- and Couric has more than her share -- may not have noticed, but the nightly newscast that she launched three months ago is in transition. Some of the changes she made have been dropped or curtailed to squeeze in more old-fashioned, what-happened-today stories. And Couric is finally starting to make news for covering the news.

"In the first couple of weeks, we might have focused more on features than hard news, and we're adjusting that," says CBS News President Sean McManus. "We've also learned that to break the mold too much might be an interesting creative process, but it wouldn't serve the viewer tuning in at 6:30 to find out what's happening."

Rome Hartman, executive producer of the "CBS Evening News," says a myth has taken root in the press. "The story line that got peddled -- and believe me, it got peddled -- that we were off the news, or softer than the other guys, is basically bogus," he says.

Still, the pace and feel of Couric's program can differ markedly from those of Gibson and NBC's Brian Williams, who, like Couric, anchored from Amman on Wednesday and Thursday. As the former "Today" star has tried to transfer her morning magic to the more traditional confines of the nightly news, some of her moves have been controversial, even within CBS.

"It's a very tricky thing to toy with the format, because we want to try new things and not look as if we're throwing things against the wall to see what sticks," Couric says during a lengthy conversation in New York. "That's why I took this job, to take some chances and do new things . . . We're still sort of finding our way, and that's okay."

With the "Evening News" ensconced in third place, some pundits have been quick to pronounce the $15-million-a-year anchor a flop. But the mood at CBS improved when Couric garnered good reviews for her fast-paced election night coverage. "She was under incredible pressure, but she really came through," says Bob Schieffer, her predecessor as anchor.

Couric's visit to Jordan was her first foreign foray as anchor after a mostly stay-at-home tenure that has included quick trips to Los Angeles and Washington. But she had been to Jordan before to interview King Abdullah and Queen Rania for "Today," became friendly with the queen, and was able to work her contacts to help secure several interviews.

While Iraq dominated the news last week, Couric made time for a very different subject. Last Monday, after returning from Thanksgiving break, she was tinkering with promotions for a five-part series called "Overweight in America."

"We want to make it a little catchier," she told her staff. " Are you feeling as stuffed as your turkey?" She pondered for a moment. " ' Tis the season to be indulging?" Couric conjured up the series and reported the opening segment, on the genetic causes of being fat.

"The news of the day is still our staple, but that doesn't mean we can't do a really smart series on obesity," says Couric, who is perpetually on a diet herself. "Or a piece on foster kids being given addictive drugs . . . 'Hard' and 'soft' are completely antiquated terms. Some of the stories on the front page of The Washington Post and New York Times aren't traditional hard-news stories, and I've never heard anyone ask them to justify that."

In Couric's early weeks as anchor, her team loaded the broadcast with new segments -- from a nightly "Free Speech" forum for outside commentators to the highlighting of interesting photos and Web items -- while bypassing or truncating a handful of important stories. In recent weeks, though, "Free Speech" has been cut to barely once a week and other small features deep-sixed.

CBS's White House correspondent Jim Axelrod says Couric and the staff are still "tinkering with the right flow of hard news and soft news and commentary. I don't think it's any surprise that at the outset, people said, 'Wait a minute, I want more news here.' "

"I think 'Free Speech' was a great idea and well worth trying, but in the end it just took too much time away from news," Schieffer says. "All news programs are a work in progress. We're still in something of a shakedown cruise, but I think we're moving in the right direction."

National correspondent Byron Pitts says that "people are angry, in a good way, to make this the best show it can be . . . A tremendous amount of work went into the planning for Katie's arrival, and once she got here we realized we still had work to do. The problems aren't going to be fixed overnight."

CBS executives said all along that they planned to experiment with the format. "Maybe it takes some getting used to at 6:30 on a weeknight, but I think it's what people expect of her," Hartman says.

The experimentation generally comes after the first commercial break. Couric has led her broadcast with Iraq 18 times, terror-related subjects a dozen times, American politics a dozen times and other foreign-policy issues five times. But there are still differences among the newscasts. On Nov. 20, when her rivals were leading with developments in Iraq, CBS's first two stories dealt with an Alabama school bus accident that killed three teenagers and broader questions of student safety -- a local tragedy that warranted a few sentences on NBC and ABC.

"I think sometimes people have Iraq fatigue," Couric says. "If there's not something really significant going on, it starts to feel like 'Groundhog Day.' We felt millions of kids get on a school bus every day and this would just be interesting. It made us wonder why seat belts weren't required by buses."

Couric, who interviewed O.J. Simpson in 2000 and 2004, also broke with the pack in declining to cover Simpson's book deal and Fox television special for a hypothetical discussion about the two murders he maintains he did not commit.

"I felt it was so sleazy," says Couric, who aired a "Free Speech" commentary on domestic violence instead. "We felt it would turn into more of an infomercial for Fox and Judith Regan," the book's publisher. "It seemed so distasteful." Couric covered the story days later when Regan's boss, Rupert Murdoch, bowed to public outrage and killed the deal.

That stance -- Couric introduced the commentary by telling viewers the Simpson saga wasn't worth their time -- was reminiscent of CBS's Dan Rather refusing, in the summer of 2001, to join the media frenzy over missing congressional intern Chandra Levy.

One emerging hallmark of the newscast is that Couric, who honed her interviewing skills during 15 years at "Today," has been spending more time chatting up newsmakers and analysts, along with her own correspondents. On Iraq, for instance, Couric has spoken with the likes of Rep. Jack Murtha, Sen. Carl Levin, retired Maj. Gen. John Batiste and New York Times columnist Tom Friedman. During the campaign, she periodically hosted former Clinton White House spokesman Mike McCurry and former Bush White House spokeswoman Nicolle Wallace, segments that seemed little different from what is routinely on cable news.

Couric's longest interview, which drew the most flak within CBS, was a discussion with Michael J. Fox. She spoke to the actor after Rush Limbaugh accused him of exaggerating his Parkinson's symptoms during commercials for Democratic candidates who support stem cell research. Some CBS staffers were upset that she devoted nine minutes, or nearly half the newscast, to the subject. Couric made sure to disclose that she has contributed to Fox's foundation, and that her father suffers from Parkinson's.

"People can grouse about it," Couric says of the interview, "but it was distinguishing television."

She is aggravated by some of the pundit potshots about the broadcast's news quotient. "I just think we got an unfair rap, and unfortunately it was perpetrated by people who didn't take the time to watch the show," Couric says.

DOJ_NMG_0101777

All the newscasts play up health care, but the subject has been particularly prominent on CBS, often featuring a physician, Jon LaPook, whom Couric helped recruit as medical correspondent. She reports some of these segments as well, including pieces about back pain and hormone replacement therapy. These and other stories and interviews have reduced the airtime of some frustrated correspondents, making Couric the unquestioned star of the show.

"Time is our enemy in this particular format," she says. "It's really a constant struggle to figure out what goes and what stays."

There is also, undeniably, the X factor: Couric's role as the first female anchor to fly solo on a network newscast, and her informal, "Hi, everyone" tone. That has its fans and its detractors.

Erik Sorenson, a former "Evening News" producer, says Couric is "a bit of a lightning rod" but that CBS executives "should be applauded for trying a lot of things." The question, he says, is "are they going to succumb [to criticism], and in three months we're going to look up and they're doing the same newscast as Dan Rather was three years ago?"

In the closely watched ratings race, Couric quickly faded after winning her first two weeks. For the week of Nov. 20, "NBC Nightly News" drew 9.46 million viewers, ABC's "World News" 8.48 million and Couric's broadcast 7.96 million. That represented a modest rebound from Couric's low mark of 7.74 million two weeks earlier.

But while the staff is conflicted over the uneven start, McManus's message remains upbeat. He says the program, excluding those atypical first two weeks, is up 11 percent over last year in the 25-to-54 group prized by advertisers.

"It's bringing in enough to pay for Katie's salary," he says. "I couldn't be happier with the job she is doing, knowing she is under more scrutiny than probably any other person in television history."

Report: N.Korea Offers Uranium To Russia (AP)

AP, December 3, 2006

North Korea has offered Russia exclusive rights to its natural uranium deposits in exchange for support at the stalled talks on Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions, a newspaper reported Sunday.

The two countries have been in talks since 2002 on a deal for Russia to import uranium, which it wants to enrich and sell as nuclear fuel to China and Vietnam, according to a report in the regional daily, Tokyo Shimbun, citing unnamed Russian officials.

North Korea recently offered Russia exclusive rights to the uranium in exchange for open support at the six-party talks on the North's nuclear program, which have stalled since last year, the report stated.

Russia, which already exports natural gas and oil, hopes to become a major exporter of nuclear fuel, according to the report. Negotiations between Russia and North Korea were set to continue, the report added.

North Korea defied international demands by testing a nuclear weapon for the first time on Oct. 8. The U.N. quickly sanctioned the communist regime, banning member states from trading in weapons-related technology with the North.

Efforts to restart talks to halt the North's nuclear program have so far failed. Russia, North and South Korea, Japan, China and the U.S. are involved in the talks.

U.S. nuclear envoy Christopher Hill and his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye Gwan, failed to agree to a start date for negotiations after meeting in Beijing last week.

At those talks, Hill reportedly urged North Korea to shut down its nuclear testing facilities by the end of 2008, halt uranium production, let U.N. weapons inspectors back into the country and hand over a full list of its nuclear facilities.

In return, the other five countries would offer the North security guarantees, economic aid, and the possibility of normalizing U.S.-North Korea ties, the Kyodo News agency reported Saturday, citing unnamed officials.

Pyongyang would face additional sanctions if it didn't comply with the proposal, which was drawn up by the U.S., Japan and South Korea, and shared with China and Russia, the report said, without elaborating.

The mass-circulation Yomiuri Shimbun newspaper carried a similar report.

Officials at Japan's Foreign Ministry were unavailable for comment. Russia's Foreign Ministry and the Russian Embassy in Tokyo also declined immediate comment.

North Korea withdrew from the six-party talks last November, angered at U.S. financial sanctions against a Macau-based bank where Pyongyang held several accounts that Washington alleged were used to launder money.

Kim, the North Korean envoy, has said Pyongyang will not unilaterally give up its nuclear weapons program.

Russian officials have repeatedly said they support a non-nuclear North Korea.

"The main task of the six-party talks is guaranteeing the non-nuclear status of the Korean Peninsula," Russian Security Council chief Igor Ivanov, was quoted by ITAR-Tass as saying on Saturday during a visit to Mexico.

Direct US, North Korea Talks Give New Glimmer Of Hope (AFP)

AFP, December 4, 2006

One month after North Korea agreed to return to multilateral nuclear talks following its defiant atomic weapons test, the six-nation dialogue remains stalled. But few are complaining.

This is because the United States and North Korea, the key parties of the four-year nuclear standoff, are engaged in face-to-face talks on crunch issues that some believe are more productive that the six-party process including China, South Korea, Russia and Japan.

Top US negotiator Christopher Hill met his North Korean counterpart Kim Kye-Gwan in Beijing last week, their second meeting in a month, to explore how North Korea should consider disbanding its atomic weapons network in return for security, diplomatic and energy guarantees.

Experts noted that their 15 hours of marathon talks brokered by China over two days were wide-ranging and tackled critical issues.

"One of the things to note is that there had been extensive talks this time between the North Koreans and the United States," said Daniel Pinkston of the California-based Center for Nonproliferation Studies.

"Proposals were exchanged and discussions were held and that means diplomacy is underway, and so whether or not the six-party meeting is held may be irrelevant," he said.

The six-party talks have been stalled since November 2005 and few expect them to resume before the end of the year.

The administration of President George W. Bush has been under pressure to hold direct talks with North Korea since the hardline communist state defied the international community and tested a nuclear bomb two months ago.

Washington has always emphasized that the rare direct talks between US and North Korean negotiators in Beijing are part of the six-party process hosted by China and not considered official bilateral discussions.

At the Beijing talks last week, North Korea reportedly told the United States to lift the financial restrictions on a Macau-based bank which Washington alleges was used by Pyongyang to commit financial crimes.

The United States, for its part, demanded the communist state report all of its nuclear facilities and programs, and accept inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, according to the Yomiuri Shimbun daily in Japan.

Citing Japanese and US government sources, it said Hill also demanded that the North close its plutonium-producing nuclear reactor in Yongbyon and seal off underground nuclear facilities from where it conducted the atomic test.

Kim has taken the conditions, reportedly agreed upon by the other five parties, back to Pyongyang for consultations with the North Korean leadership.

Hill would only say that he shared some "ideas" with the North Koreans.

"They heard them for the first time from us, and so they are going to take them back to Pyongyang and study them. And we hope to hear from them soon," he said.

Experts say it is hard to tell at this stage whether North Korea, with its de facto nuclear power status following its October 9 test explosion, would just abandon its atomic weapons arsenal.

"It's important to make the North Koreans choose between the survival of their regime and having nuclear weapons," said Robert Einhorn, who directed nonproliferation matters at the State Department from 1999 to 2001.

"If they believe that keeping nuclear weapons will over the long term jeapordise the survival of their regime then perhaps they would have incentives for giving up those weapons," said Einhorn, who now works at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

North Korea agreed in principle during the six-party talks in September 2005 to give up its nuclear weapons program in return for concessions but boycotted the talks two months later after US sanctions led to a freeze in North Korean accounts in Macao-based Banco Delta Asia.

Pyongyang only agreed about a month ago to return to the six-party talks after testing its nuclear bomb and drawing UN Security Council sanctions.

But Washington said it would not resume the six-party talks until a concrete outcome is ready to be put on the table, fearing North Korea would use the meeting as a stalling tactic to expand its nuclear arsenal.

"The North Koreans have said they'll come back to the talks. That's a done deal. But we don't want to just have people come back to the talks," said US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"It really is what are the expectations of this next round and that may take some time. And it may take further discussions," she said.

Gaza Truce Won't Be Widened To West Bank (WP)

By Scott Wilson

DOJ_NMG_0101779

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 3 -- Extending a tenuous cease-fire between Israel and Palestinian armed groups in the Gaza Strip to the far larger West Bank proved elusive Sunday as Israel's security cabinet decided against doing so and the governing Hamas movement withdrew from negotiations on the matter.

But the Israeli government reaffirmed its commitment to the temporary truce in Gaza despite the continuing rocket fire from there into southern Israel, which violates the eight-day-old agreement.

Israeli military officials say 15 rockets have been launched from Gaza since the truce was reached between Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who has suggested that the modest achievement could be a first step toward reviving dormant negotiations over the creation of a Palestinian state.

"The situation is sensitive," Olmert told the cabinet. "We must act wisely and with serious consideration."

The cease-fire, hailed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice during a visit here last week, has brought a pause to months of fighting in and around Gaza.

Israeli forces have killed more than 250 Palestinians there, most of them gunmen, since the military wing of Hamas captured an Israeli soldier in a cross-border raid on June 25. Palestinian rocket fire, a terrifying daily menace to many towns along the strip's edge, has killed two Israelis since then.

Rice urged Olmert and Abbas to build upon the rare accord by extending its terms to the West Bank, an area of far greater strategic importance to Israel and the Palestinians than the remote, enclosed strip.

But Israeli military officials have warned against doing so, fearing that the armed groups would use the respite to replenish arsenals and plan attacks against Israel. That argument appeared to win over the cabinet, already under some pressure to renew operations in Gaza in light of the continuing rocket fire, which has not caused any injuries since the cease-fire took effect.

One rocket fell inside Israel on Sunday, military officials said. Later in the day, Israeli forces killed a 15-year-old Palestinian boy near the West Bank city of Nablus who was throwing rocks at troops during what military officials characterized as a riot.

A few hours later, Hamas officials in Gaza announced that the radical Islamic group was quitting talks with other Palestinian factions over whether to include the West Bank in the truce.

A Hamas spokesman, Ismail Radwan, said Israel was violating the terms of the cease-fire in Gaza, although he did not specify how. He also signaled that the talks to extend the truce were distracting from Palestinian efforts to form a national-unity government, a process that has broken down in recent days.

"The comprehensive cease-fire must come as a part of a comprehensive national plan, and at this time, the talks on a cease-fire are being held at the expense of talks on internal Palestinian issues," the group said in a statement issued in Gaza.

Those talks between Hamas and Abbas's rival Fatah movement are designed to produce a government acceptable to international donors, who cut off aid to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas's victory in January parliamentary elections. Hamas, classified as a terrorist organization by Israel, the European Union and the United States, has so far refused to meet international demands that it recognize Israel's right to exist.

In another indication of the cease-fire's fragility, the radical Islamic Jihad issued a statement Sunday warning that "calm is on the edge of collapse" because of Israeli violations. The group, which did not formally agree to the cease-fire, said it would begin attacks on Israel "in the coming hours."

Gaza Cease-Fire In Danger (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

GAZA, Dec. 3 (AP) — Israelis and Palestinians threatened Sunday to scrap a truce that has largely ended five months of violence in Gaza, with Palestinian militants insisting that it must also apply to the West Bank and Israeli leaders saying that rocket squads were still active.

Speaking to the Israeli cabinet, Defense Minister Amir Peretz said militants in Gaza had continued to fire rockets, including one on Sunday.

Abu Hamza, a spokesman for the militant group Islamic Jihad, charged that Israel was violating the cease-fire by continuing operations in the West Bank.

Israel Revamps Its Training After Hezbollah Conflict (USAT)

By Yaakov Katz

USA Today, December 4, 2006

JERUSALEM — Israel's military is overhauling its training and expanding a guerrilla warfare school in response to problems the army had in fighting Hezbollah militants in Lebanon this summer.

DOJ_NMG_0101780

"If there is one lesson from the war (in Lebanon), it is that we need to train more and be better prepared," said Maj. Gen. Benny Gantz, head of the Israel Defense Force's Ground Forces Command.

Israel's military encountered a tougher-than-expected fight in Lebanon, where Hezbollah militants fought from a series of underground bunkers dug into the rocky and brushy hills of southern Lebanon.

Militants, armed with anti-tank missiles and other sophisticated weaponry supplied by Iran and Syria, killed 119 Israeli soldiers during the 34-day war.

The fighting erupted after a cross-border attack July 12 during which two Israeli reservists were kidnapped. Israel claims to have killed 500-700 Hezbollah militants during the conflict.

The fighting ended Aug. 14 with a United Nations-brokered cease-fire and a decision to beef up the U.N. force in Lebanon to more than 10,000 troops.

"There is still danger there," said Shimon Boyarski, a retired colonel and former intelligence officer. "And we need to be ready."

Israel's military overhaul includes:

·Expanding the Elyakim base, where soldiers train on terrain resembling the hilly and rocky surfaces of southern Lebanon. Training includes using paint ball guns to simulate close combat.

·Increasing overall training of Israeli forces by 40%, Gantz said.

·Creating a "Red Unit," which will study Hezbollah and Palestinian militia tactics and act as "enemy forces" during training exercises. Gantz said the Israeli military got the idea from the U.S. military.

·Opening an urban warfare center in southern Israel, meant to replicate downtown Nablus in the West Bank and Gaza City in Gaza. The center will be used to train units that conduct raids in the Palestinian territories and operate mostly in towns and cities.

Israeli officers say the military forgot many of the lessons learned during its 18-year presence in Lebanon in the 1980s and '90s.

For example, Israel's elite Egoz Unit was redeployed after Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon in 2000. The unit was formed with the mission of tracking Hezbollah militants in the terrain of southern Lebanon. After 2000, the unit was moved to the West Bank, where there is mostly urban fighting. The Egoz Unit ceased its training in more open terrain, said Lt. Col. Yair Lipshitz, commander of the Elyakim training base. This summer, the Egoz Unit lost five soldiers during one day of fighting with Hezbollah guerrillas in the Lebanese village of Maroun al-Ras, less than a half-mile from the Israeli border.

Lipshitz said Israel's military began sending all of its infantry brigades in October to Elyakim for training. Israeli brigades are typically about 2,000 soldiers. Before that, there was limited training of individuals at the base.

Elyakim provides training in camouflage and navigation with Global Positioning System devices. In Lebanon, Israeli troops trekked dozens of miles in enemy territory and laid ambushes in the thick southern Lebanese brush.

The open terrain of Lebanon also meant large formations of soldiers clashing on the battlefield, a sharp contrast from the small-unit tactics of the Palestinian territories. For some commanders, the war was the first time they had commanded their entire units in a battle, said retired major general Yoram Yair, formerly head of Israel's Southern Command. In Gaza and the West Bank, most units were deployed in small contingents of 30 troops.

"Moving on a battlefield with an entire brigade or battalion requires different skills that the commanders did not have," said Yair, who oversaw the internal military investigations into the Lebanon fight this past summer.

Cuts to the defense budget in recent years and a shift in focus over the past six years to the Palestinian insurgency in the West Bank and Gaza led to a decline in the number of days allocated to units for training, Yair said. "During the war, these gaps in the training were obvious," he said.

Infantry brigades, Lipshitz said, were not accustomed to using long-range weapons such as rocket launchers and mortars.

Israel's military will also focus training on coordinating tanks and infantry units to work better together. In Lebanon this summer, Israel deployed 400 tanks, some of which were involved in friendly fire incidents, Lipshitz said.

"Training is our insurance policy," Gantz said. "And we plan to be prepared."

Shi'ite-Sunni Battle Worsens Divide (WT/AP)

By Zeina Karam

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

BEIRUT -- Violent clashes broke out yesterday between Shi'ite and Sunni Muslims in the capital, leaving one man dead and exacerbating tensions that threaten the country's fragile political balance.

Hezbollah supporters on Friday began an open-ended sit-in in the capital in an effort to bring down the government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora. But Mr. Siniora, emboldened by Arab and U.S. support, vowed yesterday to stay in office.

DOJ_NMG_0101781

As revolutionary and nationalist songs blared from protesters' tent camp in the heart of Beirut, a Mass was held at Mr. Siniora's office in memory of Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel, who was assassinated by gunmen in a Beirut suburb last month.

The service was seen as a show of solidarity with the government, which draws its support largely from Sunni Muslims and Christians who oppose involvement in the country's affairs by neighboring Syria.

A few yards away, a rival Mass organized by supporters of Michel Aoun, a Christian leader allied with the Shi'ite Muslim Hezbollah, was held at the St. George Cathedral.

The clash in Tarik Jdideh occurred as Hezbollah supporters were returning from Beirut's downtown and passed through the Sunni neighborhood.

Police officials said the two sides threw stones at each other and the clash escalated into gunfire, which killed Ahmed Ali Mahmoud, a 20-year-old Shi'ite. At least 10 persons were slightly injured in similar clashes elsewhere in West Beirut.

Hezbollah, an ally of Syria that is backed by many Shi'ite Muslims and some Christians, contends that the fight is against American -- not Syrian -- influence, saying the United States dominates Lebanon in the interests of Israel.

Mr. Siniora warned that any attempts by Hezbollah supporters to storm his office, ringed by hundreds of police officers and soldiers, tanks and armored vehicles, would lead to "a major and serious problem." The prime minister, a Sunni, appeared to be cautioning against open fighting between Sunnis and Shi'ites.

Addressing the flag-waving protesters in central Beirut, pro-Hezbollah speakers vowed to continue the campaign to remove Mr. Siniora from power.

"We will not leave until the government is changed," former Interior Minister Suleiman Franjieh, an ally of Syria, told the crowd.

The anti-Syrian coalition pledged to confront what it called "a coup" by pro-Syrian groups to undermine Lebanon's independence after last year's withdrawal of Syrian troops after three decades of domination in Lebanon.

In Jerusalem, Israeli officials warned that the fall of Mr. Siniora's moderate government could lead to the establishment of an Iranian proxy state on Israel's northern border and increase the probability of war between the two nations.

Mass Protests Continue In Lebanon (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, December 4, 2006

Both sides in Lebanon's power struggle on Sunday vowed not to budge with thousands of anti-government demonstrators camping out in the heart of Beirut for a third night while prime minister Fouad Siniora insisted that he would not resign.

The protests have been largely peaceful, but last night four people were injured in a clash when Shia demonstrators entered a largely Sunni neighbourhood of Beirut. Smaller incidents have also been reported from other areas.

The western-backed Mr Siniora, on Sunday repeated that he would not resign and said that "protest is no solution". The opposition, led by the pro-Syrian, Shia Hizbollah movement, is demanding a government of national unity.

Margaret Beckett, the British foreign secretary, and Frank-Walter Steinmeier, the German foreign minister, were in Beirut over the weekend. They met Mr Siniora separately and expressed their support for him.

In the Arab world, King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia and Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak voiced strong support for the Lebanese government.

But, while visiting Beirut over the weekend Amr Moussa, the head of the Arab League, called for a compromise, "an agreement between all".

In Beirut, opposition activists said that they would continue demonstrating until they had brought down the government. They also said that they would be prepared to take "additional steps" if their demands were not met.

After a mass rally on Friday, the demonstrators set up tents in front of the prime minister's office, the main government building in the heart of Beirut.

Mr Siniora and several of his ministers have been spending the night there recently out of security concerns and the building is surrounded by security forces, armoured personnel carriers and barbed wire.

At the weekend Syria came out publicly in support of the demonstrators.

Faisal Mekdad, Syria's deputy foreign minister, emphasised what he called: "the importance of respecting the choice of the Lebanese people to establish a government of national unity as demanded by the mass demonstrations".

The Israeli cabinet meanwhile voted on Sunday to go ahead with transferring control over the border village of Ghajar to the Unifil peacekeeping force in southern Lebanon.

The step, which would complete the Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon after this summer's war with Hizbollah, is seen by some as potentially strengthening Mr Siniora. Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert warned on Sunday night that Israel "would not be able to hold back for much longer" if Palestinian violations of a week-old ceasefire in the Gaza Strip continued.

DOJ_NMG_0101782

His comments came as Palestinian groups accused Israel of not adhering to the increasingly shaky truce.

Under the deal struck on November 26, Israel agreed to withdraw its troops from Gaza, where they have been operating for the past five months, if militants stopped firing rockets.

Since the agreement, more than a dozen rockets have been fired into southern Israel, causing minor damage but no injuries.

Israel, meanwhile, has stayed out of Gaza.

Shiite Protester Shot Dead In Beirut As Tensions Rise (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

BEIRUT, Dec. 3 -- Sunni residents and Shiite protesters clashed in the capital Sunday, leaving one man dead and raising tension across Lebanon on a third day of demonstrations aimed at toppling the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

The shooting death of the Shiite protester was the first reported since Hezbollah, the Shiite Muslim movement, and its allies launched their anti-government campaign Friday, sending hundreds of thousands of followers to downtown Beirut, where armor, barricades and troops guarded the government headquarters where the prime minister has taken up residence. Thousands have camped there since, housed in canvas tents spread across downtown; tens of thousands more joined them Sunday.

Lebanese television stations and Hezbollah officials reported several clashes in Beirut and in the Bekaa Valley, and rumors swirled about the extent of the violence in a city and country riven by divisions of politics, personal loyalties and sect. The worst clash was at the edge of the Sunni neighborhood of Tariq Jdideh, for weeks one of the city's tensest fault lines. Television stations said Sunni residents threw stones at a van carrying Shiite protesters from downtown after nightfall. Passengers got out and, in the ensuing melee, a few cars were damaged before the army stepped in and broke up the crowd.

Accounts differed on the death of the protester, whom Hezbollah officials identified as a 26-year-old. Some said he was shot during the melee, others after it was broken up. Lebanese security officials said they were still trying to confirm the details of the death. News agencies reported that as many as 12 people were hurt in all in the clashes.

There is a deep worry here that the mobilization of supporters by Hezbollah and its allies -- as well as another demonstration by Hezbollah's foes during a funeral last month -- will worsen clashes along the city's many fault lines: pro- and anti-government, Christian allies and opponents of Hezbollah, and the sectarian divisions among Christians, Shiites and Sunnis. Several fights have already broken out in Tariq Jdideh. On Thursday, dozens of Sunni and Shiite residents fought in the streets there.

In downtown, the biggest crowds gathered since the protests began Friday, giving rise to scenes that took on a surreal air. The crisis could decide the fate of the government and Lebanese politics for years to come.

Organizers said 20,000 runners took part in the Fourth International Beirut Marathon, scheduled long before the demonstration. One of its advertisements read, "Run for life." The routes were redrawn to skirt parts of the protest, but at one intersection near downtown, the marathon's posters and flags mixed with green and orange banners carried by demonstrators.

"This is democracy," said Helena Shaar, a little winded from the race. "Some demonstrate. Some go to a marathon.

"This is the puzzle of Lebanon," she added.

Near the protest itself, within eyeshot of the government headquarters known as the Serail, there were dueling Masses. One was organized by supporters of Michel Aoun, a Christian leader allied with Hezbollah, at the St. George Cathedral. Up the street, another was held inside the Serail itself, in memory of Pierre Gemayel, a Christian government minister assassinated last month. It drew Siniora, some of his government supporters and Gemayel's relatives, in what amounted to a show of solidarity.

"A solution to any problem does not come through the streets," Siniora told reporters afterward.

But there appears to be almost no attempt to reach a compromise in a crisis that erupted with Hezbollah's demand in October for a greater share of power in the cabinet and that, since Friday, has become part waiting game, part test of wills. Hezbollah has promised to keep the protests open-ended; government officials speak privately about a fear that demonstrators might try to storm the Serail, which Hezbollah and its allies denied.

After the Mass, Siniora appealed for parliament speaker Nabih Berri, an ally of Hezbollah whose movement backs the protest, to restart dialogue between the two camps. They are divided by ideology, priorities for the country and alliances -- backing for the government comes from the United States and France, while support for Hezbollah comes from Iran and Syria. Both bring different views, as well, of the summer's 33-day war with Israel. Hezbollah considers it a victory; the government blames Hezbollah for starting it. Siniora seemed to suggest counter-protests were possible, but a key ally said government supporters would simply wait. The protesters said they would, too.

"The war went for 33 days, but the protests can go on for a year," said Mohammed Zeinati, a 26-year-old protester.

Around him, tents had multiplied, some going up along the barbed wire and barricades guarding the Serail.

DOJ_NMG_0101783

He smiled. "I don't think it will take that long," he said, pointing at the Serail. "I'm hoping tomorrow they all leave."

Losing Lebanon (TIME)

By Tim Mcgirk

Time, December 4, 2006

It's never a good sign for a country when the Prime Minister and most of his Cabinet members spend their days barricaded in an Ottoman-era compound. That's what Fouad Siniora and Lebanon's other top officials have done since Nov. 21, when gunmen assassinated Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel in broad daylight. Siniora's worries go beyond his personal safety. With Lebanon still trying to recover from last summer's 34-day war between Israel and the Shi'ite militant group Hizballah, the government has seen its authority undermined, renewed meddling from the country's neighbors and the growing assertiveness of Hizballah. Organized by Hizballah and its allies, about 800,000 protesters--a rather grand figure in a country of just 3.8 million--gathered in the center of Beirut last Friday to demand the resignation of Siniora. At the time, Lebanon's leader was in his barracks, surrounded by machine guns and barbed wire.

Lebanon wasn't supposed to turn out this way. In March of last year, President George W. Bush was hailing Lebanon as a shining beacon of his Administration's "democracy agenda" for the Middle East. Close to 1 million Lebanese had flooded into Beirut to demand that Syria pull its troops out of Lebanon and end its 29-year domination of the country. The U.S. State Department coined the protests the Cedar Revolution, a more folksy title than the Lebanese term, Independence Intifadeh, which smacked of radicalism. But with six ministers having resigned since Nov. 11, sectarian tensions rising and government officials fearing for their lives, the vision of a new Lebanon is dimming fast--and with it, the Administration's bid to build a positive legacy in the Middle East beyond the wreckage of Iraq.

There are worrying signs, in fact, that Lebanon may be closer to a total meltdown than at any time since the 1975-90 civil war. An Arab diplomat told TIME that General Michael Suleiman, the commander in chief of the Lebanese Army, recently admitted that his troops would be able to contain a series of demonstrations "for only a few weeks." If Hizballah organizes protests around the country similar to those in Beirut last week, "We will not be able to cope," Suleiman reportedly said. His concern was that because many of his troops are Shi'ite, they would refuse to act against their brethren within Hizballah.

The nightmare scenario is that Hizballah's show of strength could provoke a backlash against its mostly Shi'ite supporters by Lebanon's Sunni Muslim, Christian and Druze communities. If that happens, most Lebanese believe the situation could quickly escalate into all-out civil war. As a river of pro-Hizballah demonstrators flowed toward Siniora's besieged compound last week, poultry seller Ahmad Sahd, 65, wept. "These youngsters didn't live through the civil war. I did. And it looks like it's starting again."

So why is the Cedar Revolution crashing down? Part of the answer rests outside Lebanon's borders. During the summer's war with Israel, Hizballah relied heavily on the Syrians for logistic, military and financial support. According to Israeli officials, Western diplomats in Beirut and Arab sources, Damascus acted as a conduit for Iranian weapons to reach Hizballah, allowing the group to fight the Israelis to a standstill.

Now it is payback time. Lebanese officials, along with Israeli military sources and Western diplomats, say that while Syrian President Bashar Assad may be willing to help pull the Bush Administration out of the Iraqi quicksand, he hopes to exact concessions that would allow him to treat Lebanon, where the Syrian regime has vast financial interests, as his private turf. And according to these same sources, he is unnerved by a U.N.-sponsored inquiry that implicates top Syrian officials in the February 2005 car bombing that killed former Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri and 22 others. Assad is hoping that the international probe will peter out. Indictments issued by a U.N.-sponsored court against members of the Syrian leadership could critically weaken the Damascus regime and lead to U.N. sanctions against Assad's clique. Hizballah pulled its six ministers out of the 24-seat Cabinet rather than vote to support an international court to prosecute the Hariri case, and the assassination of Gemayel, the scion of a powerful Christian family and a fervent anti-Syrian, was seen as further warning to Siniora. His Cabinet voted anyway to recommend an international tribunal into the Hariri killing, pushing Hizballah into the streets last week.

Hizballah also accuses Siniora's ministers of secretly siding with Israel and the U.S. by failing to provide backup during the July-August war with Israel. With its massive street demonstrations, Hizballah hopes to intimidate the country's other parties into giving it more than the six Cabinet seats it had held, enabling it to block any legislation seen as contrary to the interests of Hizballah and its backers in Damascus and Tehran.

Whether Hizballah succeeds depends on how long it can capitalize on the p.r. boost it gained from waging war with Israel. Among Lebanon's downtrodden Shi'ites, Hizballah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah now enjoys mythical status. The many faces of Nasrallah appear everywhere. At times he is portrayed as a jolly preacher, a wise scholar or a glowering warrior with his turban like a black storm cloud overhead. When a starstruck woman requested the abaya, or robe, that he wore during the war,

Nasrallah obliged, and since then TV crews have been following the woman across Lebanon as she displays this now holy garment for other faithful fans.

And yet even in Lebanon, Nasrallah isn't universally adored. Many Lebanese consider it a heroic but colossal blunder on Nasrallah's part to have provoked the Israelis by having his fighters stage a cross-border raid in July and kidnap two Israeli soldiers. War damage in Lebanon is assessed at $3.6 billion. More than 1,200 Lebanese died, and 3,700 were wounded. Another 974,184 were left homeless. Says parliamentarian Saad Hariri, son of the slain former Prime Minister: "When it starts raining and getting cold, people will realize what a huge mistake it was for Hizballah to start this war." What's more, the olive groves and hills of southern Lebanon are sown with more than 1 million bomblets from Israeli cluster bombs, say U.N. experts, making it hazardous if not lethal to wander into these areas.

Hizballah was badly swatted by the Israelis too. The Israeli military says it has the names of over 550 Hizballah fighters who were killed, including 400 belonging to the Iranian-trained Ã©lite special forces unit, the Nasr Brigade. In Lebanon, the thinking is that those numbers are probably inflated, that many of the dead were militants unaffiliated with Hizballah who grabbed a gun and joined the fighting. Whatever the body count, Hizballah has lost assets. As part of a cease-fire agreement, 10,000 U.N. peacekeepers and 15,000 Lebanese troops moved into southern Lebanon, long an exclusive preserve of Hizballah. As a result, Nasrallah's men lost possession of a number of strategic underground bunkers, complete with showers and dining halls, honeycombing the limestone hills for miles near the Israeli border. Many of its field commanders were killed in the fighting, and according to Lebanese and Israeli sources, Hizballah inquisitors are now weeding out and shooting suspected collaborators who helped the Israelis by pinpointing militia targets. And every Hizballah office in Beirut was sledge-hammered by Israeli warplanes. The rubble of concrete slabs, steel and scraps of clothing was scooped up by bulldozers into heaps; it has added a dozen large hills to the coastal landscape south of Beirut.

Hizballah's opponents say that as time passes, resentments toward Nasrallah are likely to build. That may be the main reason that Hizballah is again girding for war. The next round could be even uglier. While most of the other communities still have stockpiles of arms stashed away from the days of the civil war, Hizballah's force is stronger and better organized than its rivals, say Beirut-based diplomats. But the various players in Lebanon may find outside backers. The Christians could again find support from the Israelis; and the Saudis, who are alarmed at the growing Shi'ite influence in Lebanon through Hizballah, may find Sunni militias to bankroll. Sunni jihadists may also join the fray, turning Lebanon into a mini-Iraq. Lebanese intelligence recently broke up a ring of 200 Syrian-backed Islamists holed up in a Palestinian refugee camp who had a hit list of 36 Lebanese politicians.

Posters of Nasrallah, usually grinning, may crop up everywhere, but the cleric himself is still deep in hiding. During the summer's fighting, the Israelis made no secret that they were trying to assassinate him. Western diplomats in Beirut say they are trying to persuade the Israelis that killing the Hizballah boss is no longer a good idea. His murder could spark reprisals across the Middle East. Hizballah has ways of taking revenge. After Israelis targeted a previous Hizballah leader in 1992, the militia blew up the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires. Should Nasrallah be killed, Israeli missions today would be similarly at risk--as would U.S. interests around the world. But these sources say that the Israelis may be willing to court that danger if they have a chance to take out Nasrallah, whom they view as a particularly clever and dangerous enemy. The damage that Lebanon and the Middle East will face if another war breaks out could make the destruction caused by Hizballah and Israel last summer look like a brisk whirlwind by comparison. Somali Troops Seek To Recapture Town (AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

AP, December 4, 2006

Somalia's government has sent hundreds of troops backed by Ethiopian soldiers to recapture a strategic southern town seized by the country's powerful Islamic movement, military officials and witnesses said Sunday, as dozens of families began fleeing the area.

The Islamic militia, which has seized the capital and most of the country's south since June, declared itself in control of the southern town of Dinsor on Saturday, saying it moved into the area without encountering resistance or firing a shot.

With the seizure of the town, the Islamic Courts Union has now effectively surrounded the weak, transitional government in its fortified base in Baidoa, the only town it controls.

Fears were mounting that a battle for Dinsor, about 75 miles southwest of Baidoa, could be the spark that ignites a war in Somalia. The town controls a vital bridge linking Baidoa with southern Somalia and the key port of Kismayo.

"The Courts' provocative and unjustified act of aggression in the region must be faced with force," warned the government's justice minister, Sheik Aden Nour Mohamed.

Some 600 government troops were deployed late Saturday in pickup trucks mounted with machine guns to drive the Islamic group out of the town, said a senior military official on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

Another official speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation said two Ethiopian battalions were in support.

The Islamic movement's spokesman, Sheik Abdirahim Ali Mudey, promised that any government assault would be met with resistance. Witnesses said there were about 200 Islamic fighters with dozens of armed trucks preparing defensive positions in the town.

"Since the town is now under the control of the Islamic courts with the willingness of the local people, any attack waged against it would meet a fierce battle," Mudey said.

One shopkeeper, Mo'alim Isgow Ahmed, said at least half the town's residents have fled.

"We left Dinsor to save our lives," said Mad Ali Gab, who arrived in Baidoa by car. "They are preparing for war, so we cannot wait for the fighting to begin."

Ethiopia, a largely Christian nation, fears the emergence of a neighboring Islamic state and has acknowledged sending military advisers to help the Somali government.

A confidential U.N. report recently obtained by The Associated Press said there were up to 8,000 Ethiopian troops in the country supporting the government. Last week, Ethiopia's parliament authorized military action if attacked by the Islamic movement, which has declared holy war on Ethiopia over its troop incursions.

The U.N. report said Ethiopia's regional rival, Eritrea, had 2,000 troops in the country.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and then turned on one another. The transitional government was formed with the help of the U.N. two years ago, but has struggled to assert its authority.

The U.S. circulated a draft U.N. resolution late Friday that would authorize the deployment of a regional military force to protect the fragile government. The troops would likely come from a seven-nation East African group, but would not include Somalia's neighbors, like Ethiopia.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said Friday he expects Security Council experts to discuss the draft on Monday.

Tehran Court Judgment Could Turn Over US Embassy To Plaintiff (CSM)

By Mike Theodoulou

The Christian Science Monitor, December 4, 2006

NICOSIA, CYPRUS

The United States is in danger of losing its sprawling embassy in Tehran to an Iranian businessman who was abducted in a bungled sting operation by US customs agents 14 years ago.

A Tehran court awarded Hossein Alikhani more than half a billion dollars in damages in the first lawsuit by an Iranian against the US for supporting terrorism.

Now, three years after that ruling, a writ of enforcement is due to be served this week, from when the US will have 10 days to respond by paying or presenting a list of assets in Iran to be seized as compensation.

The most valuable of those assets is the defunct US embassy. Mr. Alikhani, a Cyprus-based businessman, estimates it to be worth at most $120 million.

He spent 105 days in a US jail in 1992 after being abducted in the Bahamas for allegedly violating US sanctions against Libya. He argued the sanctions did not apply to non-Americans outside the US.

The Bahamian government was furious, saying it had not been consulted. Alikhani's case also caused consternation in Congress.

In his ruling three years ago, Chief Justice Mansour Pour Nouri of the Third Branch of the Tehran Public Court accused US investigators of "kidnapping, false imprisonment, using force, battering, abusing, and ultimately inflicting physical and psychological injuries."

Alikhani says he has made no plans yet what to do with the embassy if he receives the deeds. "Maybe I would make it into a school, a university or a public park," he told the Monitor from Tehran.

While few observers expect the embassy's title to land in Alikhani's hands any time soon, the embassy is a potent emblem of the enmity between the US and Iran since 1980, after militant students seized the embassy and held 52 US diplomats hostage for 444 days. The compound, its walls scrawled with anti-American graffiti, has long housed Revolutionary Guards.

The US says that under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, diplomatic premises are immune from court judgments. But Alikhani counters that the US flouted that convention in 1996 when it adopted the Antiterrorism and Effective

Death Penalty Act. The act stripped countries on the State Department's list of sponsors of terrorism of their immunity from lawsuits in US courts for terror acts perpetrated against US citizens.

Since then, US courts have awarded hundreds of millions of dollars in damages to victims of terror overseas.

"So how can they come back and say that according to the Vienna Convention their assets are immune?" Alikhani asks.

Alikhani says his action was motivated by principle and followed US court rulings to hold Iran responsible for damages awarded to Americans held hostage by pro-Iranian groups in Lebanon during the 1980s.

"Everyone is suing Iran. For instance, the hostages in Lebanon. They were taken in Lebanon by Lebanese but they sued Iran and not the hostage-takers themselves or the Lebanese government," Alikhani says.

His legal action in Iran followed his bid in a Florida court to sue the US for $360 million. The case collapsed in 2001 with a ruling that he had agreed not to sue as a condition of his release. His lawyers argue that was invalid because Alikhani agreed under threat of an indefinite prison term.

Alikhani's saga began in July 1990, when he sought to buy $1.6 million of spare parts for gas generators from a Florida company. He planned to ship the equipment through Germany to Libya for use in a government oil field.

The company said that the parts could not be supplied because Libya was under US sanctions for supporting terrorism. Alikhani did not pursue the deal. However, the Florida company tipped off US Customs and agreed to set up a sting operation that resulted in Alikhani's arrest.

For 30 days, Alikhani was questioned in several Florida hotels, where he says he was shackled to his bed at night, before being moved to a Miami prison where inmates included Manuel Noriega, former dictator of Panama. With anger in the Bahamas and in Congress over the abduction, Alikhani accepted a token charge and was freed after being sentenced to time served.

Paulson Reaches Out On China (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, December 4, 2006

Hank Paulson, US treasury secretary, will on Monday begin a series of policy talks with industry leaders to discuss the Bush administration's policy towards China ahead of a high-level delegation to Beijing next week.

The former head of Goldman Sachs, an investment bank, will on Monday meet executives from manufacturing companies, including Procter & Gamble, before on Wednesday sitting down with financial services companies - including Citigroup – as well as those from other sectors.

A Treasury official said Mr Paulson was "reaching out on his China agenda" before heading to Beijing for a "strategic economic dialogue" that will include top-ranking cabinet officials and Ben Bernanke, Federal Reserve chairman.

The delegation will press for greater currency flexibility, but Mr Paulson also wants to cultivate an intimate discourse about long-term economic goals with the Beijing leadership, many of whom he knows personally from his time at Goldman.

Mr Paulson's negotiating tactics will on Monday be questioned by impatient manufacturers, who blame Beijing for fuelling a record US trade deficit with China of more than $200bn by maintaining a cheap currency.

Frank Vargo, from the National Association of Manufacturers, said executives would "make sure he understands how frustrated manufacturers are over China's currency", suggesting there would be a "pretty vocal back-and-forth discussion".

Mr Vargo praised the Treasury secretary as "a guy who exudes confidence he can get the job done", but said there was demand for "action early next year" from key figures such as Doug Oberhelman, head of Caterpillar, and John Surma, president of US Steel.

Some manufacturers are understood to be ready to throw their political and financial weight behind Democratic lawmakers who are threatening to initiate punitive sanctions against China in the wake of the mid-term elections.

But among financial services groups there is support for Mr Paulson's patient pursuit of reforms that would give them access to sectors such as pensions, insurance, and broking.

Jeremie Waterman, a director at the US Chamber of Commerce, said the goal of the dialogue for business was to "institute practices to allow mergers and acquisitions, allow trade and allow capital to flow freely." He said there was widespread corporate backing for Mr Paulson.

Susan Schwab, the US trade representative, will also meet business leaders this week as she prepares for the China visit and holds separate talks with South Korea in Montana in a frantic bid to reach a free-trade deal.

The five-day negotiations with South Korea are seen as the last chance to agree the outline of a bilateral trade pact before President George W. Bush's special fast-track trade promotion authority expires this summer.

A US trade official said: "We need to move the ball down the field this week to have a realistic chance of completing a deal in time."

DOJ_NMG_0101787

Negotiators were downbeat about the prospect of a breakthrough despite signs of US concessions on the most politically-sensitive issues for Seoul, where there have been mass protests against the deal.

China Export Controls Contested (WT)

By Steve Hirsch

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

Business groups are upset about a Bush administration move to strengthen restrictions on exports to China. They said the controls will not keep the communist country from acquiring sensitive technologies and will cost too much to implement.

In July, the Commerce Department proposed tighter restrictions on exports of certain high-technology products.

"The administration has not demonstrated that this proposed change would provide any additional security benefit and has not articulated a clear purpose for it," a group of 24 trade associations -- ranging from the General Aviation Manufacturers Association to the American Chamber of Commerce in Hong Kong -- said Thursday in a letter to the Commerce Department.

The proposal would cover specified software, machine tools, computers, marine equipment and other exports.

If the purpose is to deny access to China's military, "it is destined to be ineffective due to widespread foreign availability ... including production in China, and the fact that all indications thus far are that it will be unilateral," said the letter, released Friday.

Executives say they also are concerned about the cost of compliance.

Business Software Alliance President Robert Holleyman said the rule would impose "stifling financial costs on American companies seeking to comply."

High-technology business groups often comment on this type of regulation, but Dirk Van Dongen, president of the National Association of Wholesaler-Distributors, said his organization has not been involved in other export-control issues.

The proposed changes "will shut down markets for American firms without denying Chinese buyers the products they desire," he said.

The administration is committed to the proposal, said Assistant Commerce Secretary Christopher A. Padilla, who was in Berlin on a trip to discuss the controls with European allies.

He said the proposal is "motivated by fundamental national security concerns and it's consistent with basic U.S. foreign policy toward China, which is to encourage legitimate civilian trade while discouraging China's double-digit, rapid military modernization."

The administration encouraged companies to submit evidence that the technologies were available in China, he said, and would examine ways to ease the compliance burden without endangering national security.

Mr. Padilla said businesses have dealt with more stringent nonproliferation controls, but business representatives insisted that the China proposal would be more difficult to handle.

One European telecommunications company has determined that its compliance cost alone would be $165 million, several sources said.

Larry M. Wortzel, chairman of the bipartisan, congressionally mandated U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission, said business had legitimate concerns about restricting only U.S. companies and about the compliance burden.

The proposed controls could hold U.S. businesses accountable if the Chinese government conceals a company affiliation, he said.

"When this all sorts out, I hope that the government will not require business to do the sorts of intelligence work to figure out what subsidiaries in China might be really defense-related or hidden parts of the government, when for itself the government really can't do that effectively with its own intelligence apparatus," he said.

Beijing Steps Up Movement To Integrate Tibet (USAT)

By Calum Macleod

USA Today, December 4, 2006

LHASA, China — Chinese supermarket baron Zhang Xiaohong reveres Tibet's austere Buddhist culture so deeply that he spent $12.5 million to build a luxury hotel that doubles as a Tibetan folklore museum.

The Brahmaputra Grand Hotel, in Tibet's high-altitude capital of Lhasa, is the region's only five-star hotel. It houses Zhang's extensive collection of Tibetan antiquities, including a 1,000-year-old warrior's costume. “I must do something to protect and promote Tibetan culture,” says Zhang, founder of the Bright Red Supermarket chain.

In reality, the culture Zhang wants to preserve risks disappearing beneath a surge of Chinese investment, migration and tourism. Beijing is accelerating its 5½-decade campaign to bring Tibet to heel. It is spurring high-growth economic policies and crushing political dissent in a drive to integrate the separatist-minded region into the rest of China.

Tibetan exiles say political repression is on the rise. In recent months, Chinese authorities have jailed several Tibetans, including monks, for possessing or distributing pro-independence leaflets, posters or photographs of the Dalai Lama, Tibet's exiled spiritual leader.

In September, Chinese border guards fired on an unarmed group of about 80 Tibetans fleeing to Nepal through a Himalayan pass. One of those fleeing, a Buddhist nun, was killed. A Romanian mountaineer filmed the attack.

"The killing of Tibetans by Chinese authorities is a matter of common practice," the Dalai Lama told Asahi Shimbun, a Japanese newspaper, last month.

Since May, Chinese officials have directed "an unprecedented wave of criticism" at the Dalai Lama, says his brother Gyalo Dhondup. "This is a major shift in their attitude, unprecedented in the past 27 years of contact with Chinese officials," Dhondup told Radio Free Asia last month.

Beijing's political crackdown has coincided with major economic initiatives that have brought:

·Tourism. In July, China completed construction of the 2,500-mile Beijing-Lhasa rail line, which carries the world's highest-elevation passenger train. Since then, tourist arrivals — mainly of ethnic Chinese — have soared. In July and August, 913,000 travelers surged into the sparsely populated region, a 54% increase over the same two-month period a year ago, says Lhaba Phuntsok, a Tibetan who heads the official China Tibetology Research Center in Beijing.

Government banners hanging across the streets of Lhasa proclaim the railway to be "the happiness line for all the peoples of Tibet."

Phuntsok says the railway creates a healthy incentive. For Tibetans to benefit economically from tourist traffic, he says, they must preserve the things that lured tourists in the first place: Tibet's distinct culture and the pristine beauty of its high plateaus and mountains.

The Dalai Lama, though, has warned that a tide of outsiders brought in by rail could lead to "cultural genocide" in Tibet, which is home to just 2.8 million of China's 1.3 billion people.

Zhang, the Chinese tycoon, says Chinese influences could overwhelm Tibet. "It's a challenge, and we will have to work hard" to protect the local way of life, he says.

·Migration. Figures on the number of ethnic Chinese living in Tibet remain highly sensitive. At a news conference for foreign journalists in July, Tibet's Beijing-appointed governor, Champa Phuntsok, declined to break down the current population of Lhasa.

He said the railway will bring "an inevitable increase" in Chinese workers, but maintained the official line that Tibet is more than 95% non-Han. Han is the ethnicity of the Chinese majority.

Many Tibetan Lhasa residents say their capital of 500,000 people is now at least half Chinese. At the time of the Chinese takeover in 1950, the city's population barely topped 30,000, and only a few dozen were Chinese.

"The authorities are trying to stamp out any breath of dissent and are deliberately encouraging people to move there," says Robbie Barnett, a Tibet specialist at Columbia University in New York.

·Jobs and investment. Beijing has poured money into giant infrastructure projects, and private investment has followed. But opportunities created by a boom in construction, retail and services have gone disproportionately to Chinese newcomers. Only 10% of the workers on the new rail line were Tibetans, says Zhu Zhensheng, senior engineer at the Ministry of Railways. Most of the current railroad staff is Han, he says.

At Zhang's Brahmaputra Grand Hotel, where rooms range from $170 to $1,100 a night, the management team was imported from neighboring Sichuan province. Only a third of the employees are Tibetan, sales manager Hong He says.

In October, hundreds of young Tibetans staged a rare public protest in Lhasa to complain about government job discrimination. The protest followed the regional government's decision to fill 98 of 100 job openings with ethnic Chinese applicants.

Beijing says it has taken steps aimed at protecting Tibetan culture, such as ensuring that 70% of the books published in the region are in the Tibetan language. Government officials also have loosened restrictions on Tibetan religious worship and reopened many of the monasteries and holy sites that were closed in the 1980s.

Even so, the government keeps a firm grip. "Every month, a work team from the religious affairs bureau and the police come to the temple to make us oppose the Dalai Lama," says a young monk at the Jokhang temple, Lhasa's holiest site. He declined to be identified for fear of persecution.

The vice director of administration at the temple, monk Ngawang Quzha, acknowledges that all monks must undergo "patriotic study lessons."

Interviewed in the presence of officials from the regional government, he says: "Most of the monks in Tibet would not hope the Dalai Lama returns to Tibet."

The mistrust between Chinese and Tibetans is deep.

DOJ_NMG_0101789

"The Tibetan people are very suspicious," Barnett says, "and the Chinese are suspicious that Tibet is not grateful for this largesse."

Mao Pengfei, a farmer who moved to Lhasa from China's Henan province in 2003, says he has no Tibetan friends. "We live in different areas, and I don't speak any Tibetan," says Mao, who now works as a taxi driver.

Fan Liming, a Chinese engineer who helped build a rail station 70 miles outside Lhasa, scratches his head at the slow pace and religious underpinnings that are central to Tibetan life. "I saw Tibetan pilgrims prostrate themselves on the ground, get up, walk three paces, then prostrate again," Fan says. "They could take months to get to Lhasa. It's difficult for us Han to understand their faith. These people are not in a hurry."

Tashi Tsering, a Tibetan author who has funded construction of 69 rural schools to preserve the written language, lives near Jokhang in a house squeezed between two Chinese-owned fast-food restaurants, Dicos and California Beef Noodles. He marvels at the new rail system but says it shouldn't be used to bring in migrants. "I hope the Chinese government will never make that decision," he says.

Development has brought shopping malls and giant apartment blocks to Lhasa. The city's old quarter is now dotted with shiny, tiled buildings familiar throughout China. Yuthok Lam, the main shopping street, has been modernized in keeping with Tibetan architectural style, albeit with one incongruous import — plastic palm trees.

Tourists like to see the original buildings, "but that doesn't suit development needs," says Que Longkai, director of architecture at Lhasa's Tibet University. Chinese outsiders "are not wolves," says the academic, a Lhasa resident for the past five years. "Development is the only way."

Kelsang Phuntsok, president of the exile group Tibetan Youth Congress, based in Dharamsala, India, says China's view of development does little for the people he left behind. "Tibetans don't need skyscrapers. They need education, food, security and freedom," he says. "A hungry man doesn't need a Mercedes."

Chinese Doublespeak (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

Who said China's Communists don't have a sense of humor? On the same day that the country's politicized courts rejected two closely watched appeals, the mandarins in Beijing proclaimed that they will ease restrictions on the foreign press ahead of the 2008 Olympics.

On Friday, the Beijing High Court upheld a trumped-up fraud conviction against New York Times researcher Zhao Yan. The decision wasn't a surprise. Mr. Zhao had long been a thorn in Beijing's side for his reporting on the plight of poor farmers. His current legal troubles began in September 2004, when a Times report hinted at a conflict between President Hu Jintao and former President Jiang Zemin over military personnel. A subsequent article predicted that Mr. Jiang would resign his post as head of the military. Shortly thereafter, Mr. Zhao was arrested on charges of leaking state secrets. The Times maintains that Mr. Zhao was not the source for the latter story.

Prosecutors dropped the state secrets charge in August for lack of evidence. But Beijing couldn't lose face, so the court pursued an unrelated, and very fishy, fraud charge against the journalist. After a closed trial (justified by the state secrets charge, even though that count had already been dropped), Mr. Zhao was convicted and sentenced to three years behind bars. In a five-minute "hearing" last week, a court denied Mr. Zhao's appeal. He will spend the next 10 months in jail serving out the rest of his sentence.

Also on Friday, Chen Guangcheng's appeal was rejected by a county court in Shandong province. Mr. Chen, a blind lawyer who worked to reveal abuses of China's one-child policy, was convicted of property damage and inciting mob violence in a trial that, like Mr. Zhao's, stunk of political interference. In the 30-minute retrial, the defense wasn't allowed to present witnesses or evidence, according to the Associated Press. He lost his appeal.

Human rights advocates suggest it's no accident Mr. Zhao's appeal landed on the same day Beijing eased restrictions on foreign journalists. That's because the new "freedoms" do not apply to Chinese research assistants working with foreign correspondents. Mr. Zhao's fate appears designed not just to punish a squeaky wheel but to intimidate other research assistants, too.

Thus, even while Beijing is trying to make itself look more open to foreign reporting as a concession to the International Olympic Committee, the government is menacing the Chinese journalists who make much of that reporting possible. Some correspondents will be able to cover preparations for the 2008 games. But in the wake of the Zhao ruling, no one will be fooled about what Beijing really thinks of a free press.

U.S., Seoul Discuss Free-Trade Deal (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

SEOUL -- Talks on a proposed U.S.-South Korea free-trade agreement -- which is President Bush's biggest bilateral trading initiative and would be Seoul's largest such deal -- resume today with the toughest issues on the table.

The progress the two countries make this week at a Montana ski resort will determine whether they can reach a deal in time for Mr. Bush to seek a simple yes-no vote on it from Congress. His trade-negotiating authority will expire in June and Congress will then take back the ability to change trade deals, a power that inhibits countries from negotiating with the U.S.

For South Korea, the pact would provide a boost to its already-healthy sale of products to the U.S. and drive a broad restructuring of numerous protected industries as well as its consumer market. For the U.S., the deal would have a smaller relative effect, though it should help American farmers and manufacturers sell more goods in South Korea, now the world's 10th-largest economy.

Earlier negotiating rounds progressed more slowly than expected and the two countries are just now tackling the thorniest issues, such as how to reduce tariffs on food and autos. The session this week in Big Sky, Mont. -- the fifth formal negotiating round -- was previously expected to be the last one.

As the round opens, the two countries are also squabbling over South Korea's ban on U.S. beef, which was imposed in late 2003 after a case of mad-cow disease was reported in Washington state. In October, Seoul lifted the ban partially by agreeing to buy boneless beef, which is considered the safest because the disease, when present, is in bones.

But South Korea has rejected the first two multi-ton shipments of U.S. beef, the latest on Friday, after X-rays found a coin-size bone fragment in the first shipment and three sliver-size pieces in the second. The bone fragments posed no health hazard, but South Korea wants assurance it is receiving boneless beef.

A proposed free-trade agreement is particularly contentious in South Korea because it represents a major break with the country's economic history. South Korea set up sizable trade barriers in the 1960s and 1970s to assist its transformation from a poor, agrarian backwater into a wealthy industrial power. An FTA with the U.S. would remove many of those barriers and open the door for other countries to seek better trade terms with it.

In autos, South Korea imposes an 8% duty on imports and assesses taxes, based on engine size, that fall hardest on imports. And in food, duties affect almost every import, from 8% on candy to 42% on beef to 600% on popcorn. U.S. duties on Korean goods are lower in almost every case.

The two countries traded $72 billion in goods and services last year, with South Korea selling about $16 billion more to the U.S. than the U.S. sold to it.

A deal with South Korea would be the largest free-trade agreement in value for the U.S. since the North American Free Trade Agrement was reached 12 years ago. Mr. Bush's administration is also hoping to complete FTAs with Malaysia, Panama and Thailand before its negotiating authority ends.

Though nearly invisible in the U.S., the FTA negotiations are in the news almost every day in South Korea as protesters, supporters and economists argue about the potential effect of a pact. Farmers and trade-union members recently stepped up the frequency and size of their protests.

Free-trade supporters in both countries worry their message is being drowned out. "In Korea, business groups and other supporters are not prepared to beat up the passionate opposition, while, in the U.S., we do that," said Myron Brilliant, president of the U.S.-Korea Business Council.

South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun has repeatedly expressed commitment to forging an FTA with the U.S. The country has completed FTAs with Chile and Singapore and is negotiating one with Canada, which has drawn token protests. On a trip to Australia this week, Mr. Roh is expected to announce that South Korea will begin free-trade talks with that country.

Chavez Wins Re-election By Wide Margin (AP)

By Ian James

AP, December 4, 2006

President Hugo Chavez won re-election by a wide margin Sunday, giving the firebrand leftist six more years to redistribute Venezuela's vast oil wealth to the poor and press his campaign to counter U.S. influence in Latin America and beyond.

Challenger Manuel Rosales conceded defeat but vowed to remain in opposition. During the campaign, Rosales accused Chavez of edging Venezuela toward authoritarian rule and warned the president could undertake even more radical policies if re-elected.

Minutes after the results were announced, Chavez appeared on the balcony of the presidential palace singing the national anthem. He pledged to deepen his effort to transform Venezuela into a socialist society.

"Long live the socialist revolution! Destiny has been written," Chavez shouted to thousands of flag-waving supporters wearing red shirts and braving a pouring rain.

DOJ_NMG_0101791

"That new era has begun," he said, raising a hand in the air. "We have shown that Venezuela is red!... No one should fear socialism... Socialism is human. Socialism is love," Chavez said. "Down with imperialism! We need a new world!"

Since he first won office in 1998, Chavez has increasingly dominated all branches of government and his allies now control congress, state offices and the judiciary. He has called President Bush the devil, allied himself with Iran and influenced elections across the region.

Chavez also has used Venezuela's oil wealth to his political advantage. He has channeled oil profits toward multibillion-dollar programs for the poor including subsidized food, free university education and cash benefits for single mothers. He has also helped allies from Cuba to Bolivia with oil and petrodollars.

He now promises to solidify his social program.

With 78 percent of voting stations reporting, Chavez had 61 percent to 38 percent for challenger Rosales, said Tibisay Lucena, head of the country's elections council. Chavez had nearly 6 million votes versus 3.7 million for Rosales, according to the partial tally.

Turnout among the 15.9 million eligible voters was 62 percent, according to an official bulletin of results, making Chavez's lead insurmountable.

"We will continue in this struggle," Rosales told cheering supporters as he conceded defeat.

Some supporters at his campaign headquarters wept, while others were clearly angry.

"We have to do something," said Dona Bavaro, a 36-year-old Rosales supporter. "My country is being stolen. This is the last chance we have. Communism is coming here."

Rosales, a cattle rancher and governor of western Zulia state who stepped down temporarily to run against Chavez, focused his campaign on issues such as rampant crime and corruption, widely seen as Chavez's main vulnerabilities.

A top Rosales adviser, Teodoro Petkoff, said the voting was carried out in a "satisfactory manner." He said some irregularities had occurred but most were resolved. Another member of the Rosales camp had accused pro-Chavez soldiers of reopening closed polling stations and busing voters to them.

Even before polls closed, Chavez supporters celebrated in the streets, setting off fireworks and cruising Caracas honking horns and shouting "Chavez isn't going anywhere!"

Earlier, Chavez loyalists jarred voters awake hours before dawn in Caracas with recordings of reveille blaring from truck-mounted loudspeakers.

"We're here to support our president, who has helped us so much," said Jose Domingo Izaguirre, a factory worker who waited hours to vote. His family recently moved into new government housing.

Rosales supporters accused Chavez of deepening class divisions with searing rhetoric demonizing his opponents.

Alicia Primera, a 54-year-old housewife, was among voters so passionate about the choice that they camped out overnight in voting queues.

"I voted for Chavez previously. I cried for him," Primera said. "Now I'm crying for him to leave. He's sown a lot of hate with his verbiage."

The campaign has been hostile, with Chavez calling Rosales a pawn of Washington and Rosales saying he was on the alert for fraud. Rosales' campaign had endorsed the electronic voting system as trustworthy — as long as no attempts were made to thwart it.

More than 125,000 soldiers and reservists were deployed to safeguard the balloting.

In Washington, State Department spokeswoman Janelle Hironimus stressed "the importance of a free, fair and transparent process."

Conflict and ambition have marked the rise of Chavez, 52, from a boy selling homemade sweets in a dusty backwater to a failed coup commander in 1992 and now a leader who could set the tone of Latin American politics for years to come.

Constitutional reforms he oversaw in 1999 triggered new elections the following year that he easily won. Loyalists helped him survive a 2002 coup, a subsequent general strike and a 2004 recall referendum.

Chavez says he would convene a commission upon re-election to propose constitutional reforms, likely including an end to presidential term limits. Current law prevents him from running again in 2012.

The president insists he is a democrat and will continue to respect private property — though he has boosted state control over the oil industry and has said he might nationalize utilities. Venezuela is the world's fifth largest oil exporter and soaring oil prices have made it the continent's fastest growing economy.

Chavez has pledged at least $1.1 billion in loans and financial aid to Latin American countries in the past two years, and billions more in bond bailouts for friendly governments as well as generously financed oil deals. But the largesse has proved a weakness at home, with polls suggesting many Venezuelans believe the aid impedes efforts to address the country's own problems.

Chávez Wins Easily In Venezuela, But Opposition Protests (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Dec. 3 — President Hugo Chávez was re-elected in a landslide on Sunday night, as voting tallies poured in from throughout the country. But representatives of the opposition candidate contended that the results were tainted by irregularities.

With 78 percent of the votes counted, Mr. Chávez was ahead with 61 percent, compared with 38 percent for Manuel Rosales, the governor of Zulia State, Venezuela's electoral council said late Sunday night as it declared Mr. Chávez the winner. Thousands of supporters filed into the streets around Miraflores, the president palace downtown, to hear Mr. Chávez deliver a victory speech in the rain.

"Long live the socialist revolution!" Mr. Chávez yelled to the crowd, pumping his fist in the air. His supporters, many of them dancing, reacted by chanting, "Ooh-ah, Chávez isn't leaving!"

The win for Mr. Chávez gives him a stronger mandate to press forward with his socialist-inspired policies in Venezuela and abroad. He signaled as much in his victory speech, invoking figures from Jesus Christ to Pancho Villa as influences for his ambitious plans.

The tension between the campaigns of Mr. Chávez and Mr. Rosales reflected a polarized electorate in Venezuela, but by contrast the voting itself was largely tranquil, with few reports of clashes or other violence. Both candidates spent heavily in the race, with supporters for Mr. Chávez and Mr. Rosales each using American polling companies until well into Sunday evening.

Evans/McDonough, a polling company based in Oakland, Calif., and hired by Venezuela's national oil company, released an exit poll indicating that Mr. Chávez was ahead, with 58 percent of the vote, to 40 percent for Mr. Rosales.

The results showed Mr. Rosales doing better than had been forecast in some polls, and his advisers said that quick counts indicated that he had won in several states and Caracas. But Mr. Rosales conceded defeat in a brief speech Sunday night, while saying the margin of Mr. Chávez's victory was narrower than official results indicated.

"It's been a hard fight against the mechanisms, all the dimensions of the government," Mr. Rosales said.

Antonio Márquez, an official with Mr. Rosales's campaign, said: "There's been a great deal of pressure exerted by the government to demonstrate that they won. This climate of tension is not positive for the country."

Other campaign officials for Mr. Rosales said soldiers had forced some polling places to remain open past the 4 p.m. closing time on Sunday to allow supporters of Mr. Chávez to vote. International observers in various parts of the country, however, said the election took place without signs of wrongdoing.

"One had to be moved by the earnestness and attention to detail," said Martin Garbus, a trial lawyer from New York invited by Venezuela's government to observe the election in Sarare, a town in the state of Lara. "it was a lesson in participatory democracy."

Once the official results are in, how Mr. Chávez and Mr. Rosales react will determine whether Venezuela will return to the instability and street violence that had marred earlier elections. Mr. Rosales said Sunday night that he would continue leading the political opposition in the country, but it was clear that many critics of Mr. Chávez were hoping for a stronger response.

Still, the margin in Mr. Chávez's favor reflected widespread support for the president as Venezuela reaps the economic benefits of high oil prices. Mr. Chavez has redirected government spending by creating an array of social welfare programs that benefit the poor.

In Caracas, voting at the Simón Bolívar elementary school in San Blas, a slum in the Petare district, proceeded calmly on Sunday morning. Once outside after voting, some voters put on red shirts and hats, indicating their support for Mr. Chávez. "I'm red, very red," said Carlos Gelvis, an unemployed man from Petare, in a reference to a refrain of Mr. Chávez's campaign.

Chavez Re-elected Venezuela's President (FT)

By Andy Webb-Vidal

Financial Times, December 4, 2006

Hugo Chávez was re-elected Venezuela's president for a six-year term on Sunday with 61 per cent of the vote, 23 percentage points ahead of his main challenger, according to preliminary official results from electoral authorities.

Manuel Rosales, the predominant opposition candidate, won just over 38 per cent of the vote, the National Electoral Council said on Sunday evening.

Tibisay Lucena, head of the CNE, said that the preliminary result was based on the tally from 78 per cent of polling stations around the country.

Mr Chávez's margin of victory of between 20 and 25 percentage points - if confirmed after an audit comparing electronic voting results with paper records - would be roughly in line with opinion polls published in the run-up to Sunday's ballot.

An exit poll released on Sunday evening by US pollster Evans/McDonough suggested Mr Chávez was leading with 58 per cent compared with 40 per cent for Mr Rosales.

Mr Chávez, a former army officer who often rails against the Bush administration and who has governed the world's fifth largest oil exporter for almost eight years, pledged to radicalise his left-leaning "Bolivarian Revolution".

"Today begins a new era," screamed Mr Chávez during his victory speech from a balcony at the presidential palace. "The central idea of that new era will be the deepening and the expansion of the Bolivarian Revolution towards Socialism."

But earlier in the evening, opposition leaders had alleged that voting centres had been re-opened in some areas to allow hastily mobilised presumed pro-Chávez supporters to vote.

Mr Rosales, who stepped down as governor of the western oil-rich state of Zulia to challenge the incumbent, was expected to address his supporters on Sunday night.

On Sunday, Mr Rosales had claimed that "problems" were delaying and adversely affecting voting in as many as a third of polling stations.

He alleged that were signs that voters who claimed they had voted for him received "null vote" paper receipts from the electronic voting machines.

Before the first partial official result was announced, Teodoro Petkoff, a leading political commentator and Mr Rosales's chief campaign strategist, urged opponents to be patient for the result of the auditing process, which was expected to take several hours.

Electoral witnesses and some international observers from the Organisation of American States and other institutions were due to oversee the audit of electronic ballot results at about 17,500, or 54 per cent, of polling stations.

Shortly after the partial results were announced, Mr Chávez celebrated by singing the national anthem from a balcony at the presidential palace.

Government supporters set off a volley of fireworks in the centre of the city and in the poor slums that encircle the city, home of Mr Chávez's political constituency.

During the day, Mr Chávez, who often portrays himself as the voice of the people, turned up to vote in a poor neighbourhood of Caracas driving a red Volkswagen Beetle.

Venezuela's ChÃ¡vez Wins Decisive Victory (WP)

By Juan Forero

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Dec. 3 -- By an overwhelming margin, Venezuelans reelected President Hugo ChÃ¡vez on Sunday, further extending a presidency that began when the former paratrooper was swept into power eight years ago, intent on overturning Venezuela's old social order. ChÃ¡vez will receive another six years in office to broaden his leftist revolution and contest American initiatives across Latin America.

"Today is a new era," the fiery populist leader told screaming supporters. "Venezuela is red, very red."

With 78 percent of the votes counted by 10 p.m., electoral authorities announced that ChÃ¡vez, 52, had secured 61.3 percent of the vote to 38.4 percent for Manuel Rosales, whose candidacy united a fractured opposition but had only four months to gather momentum. Minutes after the National Electoral Council announced that ChÃ¡vez had garnered 5.9 million votes to 3.7 million for Rosales, the president appeared at the balcony of the presidential palace.

Euphoric supporters, ignoring a downpour, burst into the streets, waving flags, shooting off fireworks and chanting pro-ChÃ¡vez slogans.

"Everything has been completed, the great victory of the Bolivarian revolution," ChÃ¡vez said as rain soaked him and close aides on the balcony. "It's another great victory: a victory of love, a victory of peace, a victory of hope. It's a victory for all Venezuela. May Venezuela be victorious always."

With the win, ChÃ¡vez's Bolivarian revolution will last until at least 2013, although ChÃ¡vez told reporters on Thursday that a change to the constitution could permit him to rule even longer.

"I'm not planning to say in the constitution, 'Hugo ChÃ¡vez will remain in the presidency until he dies,' because that would be perverse," said ChÃ¡vez, who under the law can serve only one more term. "It's very different to study the possibility of indefinite reelection. It will always be the will of the people."

Rosales, 53, later conceded defeat without declaring fraud, as opponents had done in the last major election they lost to ChÃ¡vez, a recall referendum two years ago. Rosales did, however, say that his campaign believed the electoral council's figures were off and that the final results were tighter.

"The truth is that though the margin is closer, we recognize that today we were defeated. But we continue to fight. We will remain in the street," he said. "It's not time to give up."

Earlier in the evening, an aide close to Rosales, Julio Montoya, called early voting estimates "false and manipulated," without offering proof. Other officials in the Rosales campaign said voting equipment malfunctioned at several polling sites and that there were delays in pro-Rosales districts.

Authorities with the five-member National Electoral Council said they had not found serious discrepancies.

"Everything is perfectly normal in the country," Vicente DÃ-az, who is considered partial to the opposition, told reporters Sunday night. Observers from the European Union, the Atlanta-based Carter Center and the Organization of American States monitored the vote and reported only isolated incidents by early Sunday night.

The ChÃ¡vez victory further consolidates the tide of leftist politicians who have won office in Latin America in recent years, including a former labor leader in Brazil, Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva; Michelle Bachelet, a market-friendly socialist in Chile; and Evo Morales, the indigenous leader of Bolivia. Although Colombia, Peru and Mexico this year elected pro-trade, pro-U.S. presidents, leftist leaders who criticize market reforms and sharply question the Bush administration's policies in the region were elected last month in Nicaragua and Ecuador.

But Venezuela's government is the most defiantly anti-Bush, with ChÃ¡vez making theatrical accusations about U.S. designs on Venezuela's oil deposits, even though many of the biggest producers here are American multinationals.

ChÃ¡vez's government will ensure that Venezuela, which says it has the largest oil reserves outside the Middle East, remains a price hawk in the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries. The president has also said he would solidify Venezuela's relations with Cuba and Iran, countries the Bush administration is working to isolate. ChÃ¡vez, who survived a 2002 coup that the White House tacitly endorsed, often accuses Washington of backing undemocratic opposition groups.

"This is another defeat for the devil," ChÃ¡vez said, referring to Bush with a term he used to describe his U.S. counterpart at the United Nations in September. "Venezuela has independence. Venezuela is free. Venezuela will never be a North American colony."

With bugles and fireworks awakening voters across Caracas and beyond early Sunday morning, Venezuelans flocked to 32,000 voting booths guarded by 125,000 soldiers and reservists. ChÃ¡vez drove himself in a red Volkswagen Beetle to cast his ballot at the 23rd of January housing development, not far from the presidential palace.

"I feel very happy, very happy," he said. He added that with this election, he has faced off and defeated his opponents four times, including his first win in 1998, an election in 2000 after the constitution was changed to permit him to be elected to a six-year term, and the 2004 recall that left his foes demoralized.

With oil prices having reached historic highs, and ChÃ¡vez's Fifth Republic Movement in control of the National Assembly and other institutions, the government has funneled billions of dollars into education, health and nutrition programs. Venezuela's economy has been roaring, growing at 18 percent in 2004 and 9.3 percent last year.

Although private investment has dwindled and half of Venezuelans work in the black market, the government's spending has put money in banks and in people's pockets. Business sectors dependent upon government contracts are booming, and the stock index on Friday had its biggest increase in nearly four years on the strength of the belief that ChÃ¡vez would win.

In a recent opinion poll conducted by Ipsos for the Associated Press, 66 percent of respondents said they approved of ChÃ¡vez's administration. The poll showed that although most Venezuelans see ChÃ¡vez as authoritarian, they also overwhelmingly approve of his social policies, which have given a voice to a vast underclass that had felt forgotten under previous governments.

In CaÃ±o Amarillo, a working-class neighborhood near downtown Caracas, several people said they voted for the president, overlooking concerns they had about crime and his combative style.

"I think the president has done what he said he would do," said Jose Medina, 54, a schoolteacher. "He's put the social policies above everything else."

Another voter, Pedro Fiaggio, 76, summed up his support for ChÃ¡vez by rattling off the programs that benefit him and his wife, Lesbia, 62 -- a healthy pension, subsidized food and educational programs for seniors. He said the opposition would never have offered the same.

"They are people who are always out for their own self-interest," he said. "We didn't have a real vote with them."

The opposition, which has suffered a series of setbacks since the coup, had hoped to appeal to voters by focusing on issues such as spiraling crime, alleged corruption and unchecked spending. Rosales, 53, governor of Zulia state, the historic heart of Venezuela's oil industry, had proposed a populist handout program to cut into ChÃ¡vez 's support base.

"The future of Venezuela is at stake," Rosales told supporters as he cast his ballot.

There were, to be sure, millions of Venezuelans who agreed that a change was needed. "We've had eight ears without work, nothing stable," said Victor Castellanos, 53, a construction worker.

Another voter, Marco Ravelo, 39, a cabdriver, said he was tired of ChÃ¡vez's obsession with the Bush administration, as well as the government's generous outlay of aid to poor countries. "We need better relations with other countries," he said. "ChÃ¡vez divides countries. He gives away all this oil, and we still have poverty and misery here."

Chávez Landslide May Speed Venezuela Changes (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- President Hugo Chávez won a landslide election to a new six-year term, sparking fears among foes that he will accelerate his quest to install what he calls "21st-century socialism" in the world's fifth-largest oil exporter.

With 78% of the vote counted, Mr. Chávez, who has built a massive base of support by spending billions on subsidized health, education and other social programs benefiting poor Venezuelans, won 61% of the vote to opposition candidate's 38%. His victory stoked concern among his opponents that Mr. Chávez, an admirer of Cuban leader Fidel Castro, would press the accelerator on what his opponents fear is his attempt to remake Venezuela along the lines of communist Cuba.

"Long live the socialist revolution," cried Mr. Chávez after singing the Venezuelan national anthem from a window in the presidential palace as a crowd below shouted "Uh, Ah, Hugo no se va," or "Uh, Ah, Hugo's not leaving."

Teodoro Petkoff, a top official in the campaign of opposition candidate Manuel Rosales, said while there had been scattered "incidents," the election had "developed in a satisfactory way." Mr. Rosales conceded late last night.

Encouraged by his victory, Mr. Chávez will no doubt redouble efforts to create an anti-American and anti-free-trade bloc in the hemisphere, while lending diplomatic support to other anti-U.S. countries such as Iran. Last week, Rafael Correa, a Chavez ally, won Ecuador's presidential election. But most analysts believe that Mr. Chávez's populist "Bolivarian" revolution, which relies on his free spending of billions in oil income, isn't easily exportable.

Mr. Rosales, a tough and experienced politician, managed to unite a fractured and inept opposition and mount a feisty campaign against Mr. Chávez, who had enormous state resources. It was unclear whether Mr. Rosales, who took a leave of absence as governor of Zulia, Venezuela's second-most-important state, to run for the presidency, would try to mount a national opposition movement to Mr. Chávez or return to Zulia, where he retains a regional power base.

Opponents fear Mr. Chávez's landslide could consolidate his power for years. Already Mr. Chávez, who has repeatedly said he will stay in power until 2021, controls all 167 seats in Venezuela's National Assembly, as well as Venezuela's judicial branch. With the political wind at their backs, Mr. Chávez, 52, and his congressional allies are expected to push through a constitutional overhaul abolishing term limits, permitting the fiery populist to run repeatedly for re-election.

Mr. Chávez may also move to increase state control over private education, and further extend control over Venezuela's highly centralized economy by promoting noncapitalist forms of production and exchange such as cooperatives. Quirkily, Mr. Chávez last month called for the introduction of barter in the country's rural economy. The Venezuelan government already has in place extensive foreign-exchange controls, while Mr. Chávez exerts control over the state oil company, Petróleos de Venezuela SA, or PDVSA, which is the motor of this oil-dependent economy.

Mr. Chávez has also said he favors forging a single government party from the handful of parties that now support him. Analysts believe Mr. Chávez would also increase the already prominent role of Venezuela's armed forces in the government.

The landslide was a not-unexpected triumph for Mr. Chávez, who has dominated and convulsed Venezuelan politics for more than a decade. He first erupted on the scene as one of the ringleaders of a failed coup in 1992. He served two years in prison but was released as part of an amnesty in 1994.

Four years later, capitalizing on a general sense of disgust with Venezuela's political parties, widely seen as corrupt, Mr. Chávez won the presidency with 56% of the vote. He then redrew Venezuela's constitution, giving him much wider powers. In 2000 he again was elected president. But his fiery rhetoric directed against Venezuela's middle and upper classes, which he labeled "oligarchs," his confrontational stance with the U.S., and his closeness with Mr. Castro violently split the country.

Mr. Chávez is expected to continue Venezuela's bankrolling of Cuba's hard-pressed economy. Analysts say Venezuela's aid to the island, which includes about 103,000 barrels per day of petroleum products, could be as much as $3 billion a year. In turn, Cuba provides the services of more than 20,000 doctors as well as an untold number of security agents. While Mr. Chávez already exerts almost total control over Venezuela's government institutions, he could well face resistance if he tries to mold Venezuela's chaotic, consumerist and largely nonideological society along austere Cuban lines.

"In Cuba if you have two televisions, you have to give one to the government. You can't do that because we are free," says Yelitza Ojeda, 33, a maid at a luxury Caracas hotel whose 15-member family all voted for Mr. Chávez. "The same way we put him in power, we can knock him out of power, but I don't think he wants to do a Cuban-style government here."

Another likely restraint on Mr. Chávez' radical ambitions is the widespread corruption that has flourished under his government. A newly rich class of government officials, military officers and businessmen with close links to the government, known as Boliburgeses, or Bolivarian bourgeoisie, has sprung up in the last few years. These wealthy and powerful barons now have foreign bank accounts, apartments in Miami and private jets they are loath to lose. "The powers in the Chavista movement-the military, mayors, government ministers, and top managers of state companies -- are all capitalists," says Juan Carlos Zapata, a political analyst here. "They are nervous about where the system is going and where Chávez is going."

Lebanon Again At The Brink (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, December 4, 2006

BEIRUT, LEBANON

Fresh from fighting Israeli troops in south Lebanon this summer, militant Hizbullah is engaged in a new battle - this one political. Its supporters and its opposition allies are camping on the streets of Beirut determined to bring down the Western-backed Lebanese government.

Hizbullah's new campaign, which entered its third day Sunday, brings into sharp relief the conflicting motivations underpinning the group, in which its ambitions as a national party are balanced against obligations as an Iranian and Syrian ally in the struggle to curb US regional influence.

But to win politically at home, especially in its bid to bring down the anti-Syrian March 14 ruling coalition, Hizbullah has to convince Lebanon that it isn't simply pushing an agenda dictated by Tehran and Damascus.

"The Syrian-Iranian camp, led by Hizbullah, has begun to implement a plot for a coup," proclaimed a headline in Saturday's Al-Mustaqbal newspaper, which is owned by the family of Saad Hariri, who heads the March 14 bloc.

To be sure, Hizbullah denies that its actions are dictated by outsiders. "Definitely Michel Aoun is not allied to Syria and Iran, and he's a big component of this opposition movement," says Ali Mokdad, a Hizbullah member of parliament, referring to a retired general who heads a mainly Christian opposition party and fought the Syrian Army in Lebanon in 1989-90. "This accusation is not logical. We are a completely Lebanese movement."

Rows of coiled razor wire and armored vehicles mark the new front line in Lebanon's latest political crisis. The barricades are strung across roads leading to the Grand Serail, the Ottoman-era military barracks that today houses the offices of the prime minister, Fouad Siniora. Mr. Siniora and several cabinet colleagues have been working and sleeping in the safety of the Grand Serail since the assassination two weeks ago of Pierre Gemayel, industry minister and a Christian leader.

A stone's throw from the hilltop building are dozens of white canvas tents erected by the protesters Friday evening. One city square facing theGrand Serailand the glass and stone United Nations building is occupied by supporters of Hizbullah and its allies in the Amal Movement, another by Christian and Druze opposition groups.

A towering bank of loudspeakers broadcasts a steady diet of Hizbullah military songs and recorded speeches by Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbullah's charismatic leader.

"We will be here not less than five days," says Ali Allawi, a Hizbullah supporter from Tyre in south Lebanon. "It might take longer because those people up there are crocodiles," he adds with a dismissive gesture at the nearby Grand Serail.

The long-simmering political crisis escalated two weeks ago when a depleted government endorsed a UN resolution to form an international tribunal to try those suspected of killing Rafik Hariri, a former prime minister who died in a truck bomb explosion in February last year. The vote went ahead without the participation of six ministers - including all five Shiites - who quit the government prior to the emergency cabinet session.

Emile Lahoud, Lebanon's staunchly pro-Syrian president, as well as Nabih Berri, the parliamentary speaker and ally of Hizbullah, has ruled the government's approval of the tribunal as unconstitutional due to the absence of the Shiite ministers and the lack of prior coordination between the president and prime minister.

The March 14 coalition suspects that the Hizbullah-led opposition is acting on behalf of Syria to hinder or delay the formation of the tribunal. A UN commission investigating Hariri's murder has indicated the involvement of senior Syrian and Lebanese security officials.

But Hizbullah dismisses the notion that the tribunal lies at the root of the present troubles, insisting that the street protest is solely about domestic grievances. "The talk about the tribunal is just an excuse by the government," says Mr. Mokdad. "This is a Lebanese affair. We want a government of national unity that represents all the Lebanese, including the groups that make up March 14."

The opposition says its campaign was spurred by the March 14 coalition refusing to grant it a number of cabinet seats proportionate to its share of parliament. The opposition component of the 24-seat government included four ministers considered allies of Mr. Lahoud. But recently they had begun to distance themselves from the president, shifting the balance of power in the cabinet firmly in favor of the March 14 bloc.

"All we wanted was to replace Lahoud's share with our allies to restore the balance in the government," says Ali Hamdan, an official with Amal. "They [the government] should stop saying that Hizbullah is hijacking a large part of Lebanese society," he adds. "These are not the Taliban, they are Lebanese."

Still, Hizbullah's opposition also reflects a deep mistrust of a government that it regards as a tool of US foreign policy. The Shiite party was angered by what it considered to be a lack of support from the government during the war with Israel and has accused it of plotting to disarm Hizbullah's military wing on US orders to benefit Israel.

The Bush administration, which fully endorsed the mass street protests of 22 months ago that brought down the pro-Syrian government of then Prime Minister Omar Karami, has likened the Hizbullah-led equivalent to a "coup" attempt.

With US authority in Iraq steadily waning, Lebanon finds itself playing a key role in the confrontation pitting Washington and its regional allies against an anti-Western alliance grouping Iran, Syria, Hizbullah, and Hamas.

If Hizbullah and its allies succeed in toppling the government, US influence in Lebanon will inevitably weaken in favor of Syria and Iran. And that, say some analysts, is an underlying motive for Hizbullah's political gambit.

"I think Hizbullah's primary perspective has to be regional," says Paul Salem, director of the Carnegie Middle East Center in Beirut. "They are stuck in a regional agenda because they are financed by Iran."

Chávez Easily Wins Fourth Term (MH)

By Phil Gunson And Steven Dudley

The Miami Herald, December 4, 2006

CARACAS - President Hugo Chávez won his fourth presidential bid in eight years on Sunday, defeating career politician Manuel Rosales and boosting his "21st Century Socialism," which includes widespread social projects, increasing relations with countries such as Cuba and Iran, and diminishing relations with the United States.

The National Electoral Council, or CNE, announced at 9 p.m. EST that Chávez had received 61 percent of the vote and Rosales 38 percent, with 78 percent of the votes counted.

The victory was greeted with fireworks, small parades, dancing and chants of "Uh, Ah, Chávez no se va!" -- Chávez will not go -- throughout a rain-soaked Caracas.

"Long live this day of victory! -- your destiny was already written!" Chávez told the thousands of red-clad supporters who had gathered in front of the presidential palace to celebrate with their leader.

Rosales, who had succeeded in reuniting a fractious opposition movement in his short campaign, conceded victory to Chávez.

"They beat us, but we will continue to fight," Rosales told a crowd of supporters.

But the lifelong politician from the western oil producing state of Zulia may have a difficult time keeping a united front, as previous Chávez victories have been greeted with incredulity and cries of fraud.

Chávez's incredible rise to president in 1998 -- after participating when he was an army lieutenant colonel in a failed military coup in 1992 -- is almost as amazing as his seven-year run as the leader of this oil-rich nation of 27 million people.

Chávez survived a coup attempt in 2002, a national strike later that same year and a recall referendum in 2004. Along the way he changed the country's constitution, and stacked almost all of its courts, councils and prosecutors' offices with his allies. A Chávez-controlled legislature has also passed laws squelching opposition press and given rise to fears that he is more a dictator than democrat.

Internationally, Chávez played a key role in rebuilding a fragmented OPEC and driving oil prices to record highs. He built a name as an outspoken critic of the Bush administration and world leader of the poor: From northern New York State to the Patagonia, Chávez's name resonates with the underclass.

"He's not given me anything," said José Brito, a 45-year-old handyman who voted for Chávez in the poor Catia district in western Caracas near where Chávez himself voted. ``But he's helped members of my family, my friends, my neighbors."

Chávez's freewheeling use of his oil revenue helped his friend and mentor, Fidel Castro, create an economic coalition outside the U.S. sphere of influence. Courting countries like Iran perturbed Washington, seemingly powerless to slow Chávez' march toward ``21st Century Socialism."

About the only one who seems to be able to slow Chávez down is the Venezuelan president himself, who may have overstepped his bounds recently by declaring the podium at the United Nations smelled of "sulfur" because President Bush had spoken there, and that Israel was in the wrong for attacking Lebanon-based Hezbollah guerrillas. The outbursts may have cost his country a rotating seat on the U.N. Security Council last month.

Still, oil affords Chávez tremendous latitude in foreign and domestic affairs. Chávez's oil wealth has bought friends abroad and helped him start widespread health, education and subsidy programs at home that sustain his popularity despite rising crime and corruption that rank this country among the most dangerous and graft-prone in the hemisphere.

"I voted for my commander," said Jorge Mendoza, a 48-year-old carpenter, referring to Chávez, after voting in the poor neighborhood of Catia in western Caracas. ``He does things that no other government has done."

Mendoza said two of his sons got new houses from the Chávez administration after mudslides destroyed their homes in 1999.

And if this election proved anything, it was that Chávez is as much image as substance. The president arrived to vote in a poor neighborhood in western Caracas in a red Volkswagon Beetle, a longtime symbol of working class and intellectual revolutionaries in Latin America. After voting, he spoke about his leftist partners in the hemisphere.

But Chávez's socialist messages aside, Venezuela continues to be a largely capitalist country. Restaurants and malls remain packed with patrons of all classes taking advantage of an oil boom that has created a new wealthy class that has some of the same tastes in whiskeys and private airplanes as the old.

Still, Chávez remains the symbol of a seismic shift in Latin American politics. From Nicaragua to Brazil, the region is electing leftists who spend more money on their own social welfare than paying off their foreign debt. Chávez plays the dual role of financier and cheerleader of these changes and promises to continue pushing for more regional integration of its loosely knitted components.

The future also promises more controversy and changes at home.

The president has said he would create a commission to study changing the country's constitution again, possibly giving him endless opportunities to run for president in the future.

At the same time, he's reiterated that he is not a threat to private property, even while he's hinted that his "socialist" revolution here will be more profound in years to come.

Chávez has some problems. His own movement is splintered by corruption and envy, and crime rates are rising.

But if this election is any indication, Chávez still seems to have the confidence of the poor majority.

"He's the president of the humble people," said Lady Fernandez, a 52-year old nurse who voted in Catia.

Clashes Break Out On 3rd Day Of Protests In Beirut (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, December 4, 2006

BEIRUT — Tens of thousands of protesters led by the militant Shiite group Hezbollah poured into Beirut for the third day Sunday in a show of force aimed at toppling the elected government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora.

“Saniora out, Saniora out!” Abbass Kaiss, 19, of Beirut chanted with fellow Hezbollah supporters.

The protests, which Saniora described as an attempted coup, had been peaceful until Sunday, when clashes broke out between Shiite and Sunni Muslims.

Police officials told the Associated Press that a 20-year-old Shiite Muslim was shot and killed in a neighborhood of West Beirut. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not allowed to speak to the press.

The death happened as a group of Hezbollah supporters were returning home from the downtown protest and passed through the predominantly Sunni neighborhood. Police officials said the two sides threw stones at each other before shots were fired.

Saniora says the protests are an attempt by Syria and Iran to bring down a democratically elected government. Syria and Iran support Hezbollah, sending arms and money to what the U.S. State Department says is a terrorist group.

Saniora said he has received words of support from other Arab nations as well as the United States and France.

“This government will continue as long as it enjoys the support and backing of the constitutional institutions in the country, most importantly Parliament,” he said.

The Saniora government is largely backed by Sunni Muslims and Christians who oppose involvement in Lebanon's affairs by neighboring Syria.

“We will remain strong,” said Walid Jumblatt, a senior member of the Saniora coalition in Parliament. “There is a legitimate government and an illegitimate government that wants to topple it.”

The majority of the seats in Lebanon's elected parliament are held by a coalition opposed to Syrian influence. Syria withdrew its military forces from Lebanon last year after a 29-year occupation but is accused of assassinating politicians in the country since its departure.

Hezbollah controls 35 of the 128 seats in Parliament but is demanding a third of the seats, which would allow it to veto some policies. Among those is an attempt to prosecute individuals for the assassinations.

Hezbollah's five members in the government resigned after its demands were refused.

Friday, hundreds of thousands of people descended on the capital to demand the government resign. They set up tents and appeared to be prepared to remain for days.

The Lebanese army has dispatched armed security services and thousands of soldiers backed by armored vehicles to central Beirut. They are under orders to stay neutral but protect government offices from any attempt to storm them.

The government has urged its supporters to stay at home and not confront protesters.

"We will stay 50 days and nights, or until Saniora goes away," said protester Nadir Ghabress, 15, who was camping in a tent city in Martyrs and Riad al-Solh squares.

"We want to change the government; we want Nasrallah," he said, referring to Hassan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader who orchestrated the kidnapping of Israeli soldiers in the summer the sparked a 34-day war with Israel.

Also turning out in force were thousands of supporters of Michel Aoun's Christian Free Patriotic Movement, who sported their orange colors while Hezbollah waved its yellow flags.

Aoun has aligned himself with Hezbollah, perhaps in a bid for greater power since he has long fought Syrian influence.

"This goes beyond religion," said Patrick Nakhle, 33, a Beirut lawyer and Aoun supporter.

"We are Christians, they are Shiites," he said, pointing to Hezbollah demonstrators. "But we are all Lebanese under one flag."

Chavez Defeats Foe In Landslide (WT)

By Kelly Hearn

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela -- A barrage of fireworks rattled windows last night in this expectant city as election officials announced that President Hugo Chavez, the oil-funded socialist revolutionary who has vilified the Bush administration, won a landslide victory over his conservative opponent.

The first-round preliminary results showed Mr. Chavez with 61.3 percent of the vote and Manuel Rosales with 38.4 percent.

The news erupted through a city grown tense in recent weeks.

Within minutes of the announcement, Mr. Chavez was addressing a rain-soaked crowd of screaming supporters in his trademark red shirt -- a symbol of his socialist revolution.

Standing on the balcony of the presidential palace, he led the crowd in song, declaring the historic election a "victory for the future" and at times chanting "justice, justice, justice."

A loss by Mr. Rosales, a conservative who unified a fragmented opposition, hands Mr. Chavez six more years to guide the world's fifth-largest oil producer down a socialist path seen by many as a line against waning U.S. influence in Latin America.

Since coming to power in 1998, Mr. Chavez has earned a near iconic status among Venezuela's poor.

Mr. Chavez's party controls Venezuela's legislature and judiciary.

Flush with oil money and seemingly impervious to domestic political challenge, he has publicly called President Bush "the devil" and frequently lambasted U.S. foreign and economic policy.

Meanwhile, he has sought oil, trade and military ties with nations such as Iran, Russia and China.

Voting tables that had no voters waiting in line were officially closed at 4 p.m. as a steady rain settled over Caracas, the capital.

But opposition leaders complained that Venezuelan troops loyal to Mr. Chavez had in some cases intervened to keep voting booths opened after the official closing time.

Enriche Marquez, a Rosales campaign official, called on the military to cease interfering and "respect the law."

Officials at Venezuela's National Election Council (CNE), had released no results by press time though recent polls gave Mr. Chavez a comfortable lead over Mr. Rosales.

Other polls showed Mr. Rosales narrowing that lead in recent days.

Voting tables that had no voters waiting in line were officially closed at 4 p.m. as a steady rain settled over Caracas, the capital.

Soon afterward, however, opposition figures appeared on television accusing army officials in Caracas and the state of Sucre of forcing some voting centers to reopen. Enrique Marquez, a Rosales campaign official, called on the military to cease interfering and "respect the law."

Earlier in the day, Mr. Rosales had asked the CNE to examine reported voting-machine malfunctions at some stations located in areas heavily populated by his supporters.

But Mr. Chavez dismissed the claims as "excuses" in a subsequent press conference.

"The information I have is that the process is moving along normally," the former military officer said before driving himself from a Caracas polling station in a red Volkswagen that was mobbed by his supporters.

Election officials later assured the public that no irregularities had been found.

In Caracas, voters had awakened by pre-dawn fireworks lined up for city blocks to pass their judgment on Mr. Chavez's socialist platform, which blends nationalist and militarist rhetoric with oil-fueled social spending.

"I will vote for my commandant Hugo Frias Chavez," said Jordi Romero, a 21-year-old security guard. "He has fixed our streets, built clinics and given the poor houses to live in."

But Manuel, a 30-year-old taxi driver and evangelical Christian who did not want to give his last name, said while he supports Mr. Chavez's social efforts, he fears the president will restrict freedom.

"I am scared that the police will have too much power and that he will restrict the church," he said.

Opposition leaders have criticized Mr. Chavez for his lavish foreign spending and for installing what they say is a Cuban-style dictatorship here. Mr. Chavez has cast his opponent as being a puppet of U.S. interests.

He is the region's staunchest critic of Mr. Bush and U.S. foreign and trade policies. But his rhetoric belies strong trade ties with the United States, especially petroleum sales made through the Venezuelan-owned Citgo Petroleum Corp., based in Texas.

Recent elections in Nicaragua, Bolivia and Ecuador have brought leftist allies of Mr. Chavez to power. And some analysts say a victory would secure his place as the anchor of a regional alternative to the United States and its regional allies, such as Colombia.

David Dent, a Towson State University political scientist, said an alliance between Mr. Chavez and incoming president Rafael Correa in Ecuador could signal "a Bolivarian effort to zero in on Colombia for a trifecta in northern South America."

Venezuela's Chavez Reelected (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

CARACAS, VENEZUELA — Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez was resoundingly reelected Sunday, setting the scene for a promised "deepening" of his socialist revolution and a broader role as leftist lightning rod on the world stage.

With about 80% of the ballots counted, Chavez had captured 61% of the vote, compared with 38% for Manuel Rosales, election officials said.

His reelection is expected to further Latin America's move to the left after victories by five left-leaning presidential candidates in the region in little more than a year.

Chavez, who pledges to revise his nation's constitution to allow him to serve indefinitely, may try to fill the leadership void created in July by the illness of Cuba's Fidel Castro, supporters say.

Relations between the firebrand Chavez and the United States are at an ebb because of suspicion by the Bush administration over Chavez's overtures to Iran, his billion-dollar arms purchase agreements with Russia, and what Washington says is his lack of cooperation in fighting terrorism and drug trafficking.

Venezuela is the fourth-largest supplier of oil to the United States, and revenue generated by high crude oil prices has allowed Chavez to wield considerable influence among his neighbors through energy subsidies and aid programs.

Chavez, addressing a crowd in front of the presidential palace, bellowed, "Long live the preordained popular victory. Long live the reign of socialism, the future of Venezuela…. Another defeat for the North American empire. Another defeat for the devil. Down with imperialism."

Rosales conceded Sunday night, saying he was up against "an entire state, all the power of a government in all its structure and dimensions."

"Tonight we have to recognize that they beat us," said Rosales, addressing supporters at his campaign headquarters.

The governor of oil-rich Zulia state, Rosales mounted a challenge to Chavez in September after opposition parties belatedly rallied around him.

Despite his decisive loss, observers credited Rosales with laying the groundwork for a new opposition movement.

His campaign complained of several irregularities, including refusals by National Election Commission officials at some polls to open ballot boxes for audits, as is legally required, and the keeping of voting booths open past the deadline.

Chavez and other government officials said the election was a success with no "relevant" irregularities.

"This is my fourth election where my government has been tested, and you can see the dynamism and depth of Venezuelan democracy," Chavez said after arriving before noon at a polling place in the poor January 23rd neighborhood in Caracas, driving an old Volkswagen Beetle. "It's a happy day for Venezuela."

Chavez, who was imprisoned after a failed coup attempt in 1992, was first elected in 1998 and reelected in 2000. He withstood a recall vote in 2004.

Observers say he will waste little time in reshaping the Venezuelan Constitution to advance his "socialism for the 21st century," which includes opposition to U.S. economic policies, among them a regional free-trade agreement.

Constitutional revisions probably will include unlimited reelections, Chavez told reporters. Without the change, his upcoming term would be his last.

Carlos Escarra, a Chavez confidant and congressman, said in an interview Sunday that he and other legislators would meet this week with Chavez to plan for a sweeping new constitutional "architecture" that would strengthen the legal standing of presidential decrees, such as the transfer of ownership stakes in businesses and factories to worker cooperatives.

Legislative approval of such a revision is considered a foregone conclusion because Chavez loyalists occupy all of the 165 seats in Congress.

Opposition candidates boycotted congressional elections in December 2005.

Opponents fear that the constitutional revisions might produce a more authoritarian state. Although acknowledging his popularity among Venezuela's poor, Chavez's critics say he has weakened democratic institutions by taking control of the judiciary, Congress and the military, leaving little room for dissent.

"What is coming is not the deepening of the revolution, because there is none, but of the authoritarianism of Chavez," said historian Agustin Blanco Muñoz of the University of Central Venezuela.

Human rights lawyer Asdrubal Aguilar fears that Chavez will use a constitutional assembly to "liquidate political plurality…. He wants to eliminate diversity and replace it with a personal relation with society."

Voters waited hours to cast ballots. Lines stretched for blocks, and there were reports of polling machine failures. Opposition voters such as university student Sheila Bermudez, interviewed near the American School, claimed the breakdowns were "tortoise maneuvers" to discourage supporters of Chavez's opponent.

But long waits to vote were the norm even in pro-Chavez, lower-class neighborhoods such as Las Minas. Store manager Noreliza Iza said her three-hour wait was typical for Venezuelan elections and was "acceptable."

The Chavez victory had been predicted by virtually all pollsters, who cited his lavish spending on social programs and public works. Escarra said the victory would extend "the leadership of Chavez and Venezuela in the world."

Since last year, left-leaning candidates have won presidential elections in Chile, Brazil, Ecuador, Nicaragua and Bolivia, although not all adhere to Chavez's agenda.

Escarra predicted that Chavez would "fill the leadership space" created by Castro's illness.

Chavez has rhetorically pummeled the United States in recent years while seeking to counter U.S. influence with oil-financed aid programs to Argentina, Bolivia and the Caribbean. Of most concern to the United States are his commercial relations with Iran and his arms deals with Russia.

Chavez this year signed agreements to buy scores of Russian military airplanes and helicopters. He also sealed a deal with Moscow to build an assault rifle factory here.

"Soon we will be selling them to countries in Latin America," Chavez told reporters last week.

Chavez also criticized Bush in the Thursday interview, saying the U.S. president would "not accept the new world is multipolar, that it won't kneel before the United States."

Chavez plans to launch additional massive public works projects, including lumber, steel and aluminum factory cities in eastern Venezuela, and to build another bridge over the Orinoco River, in addition to the $1.2-billion span opened last month.

The links to Brazil, as well as a proposed natural gas pipeline to Argentina, are part of Chavez's southward development push.

He said his plans also included extending trade relations with China, which announced $5 billion in planned investments here. China and Venezuela also established a $6-billion fund to finance social projects in Venezuela.

Chavez also said he planned to increase the construction of subsidized housing, which totaled 120,000 units this year.

When he took office in 1999, Venezuela was "lost, a ship sinking at sea," Chavez told reporters. "Now Venezuela has direction…. Yes, we have committed mistakes, and there are many things left to do. That's why we are getting six more years."

Chirac And Merkel Unite Over Turkey (FT)

By Hugh Williamson, Peggy Hollinger And Wolfgang Proissl

Financial Times, December 4, 2006

Germany and France will on Tuesday demand tougher conditions for Turkey's troubled European Union membership bid, in a move likely to cause new divisions over Ankara at next week's EU summit.

DOJ_NMG_0101802

Jacques Chirac, French president, will use a meeting with Angela Merkel, German chancellor, to back her proposal that would effectively set Turkey a new 18-month deadline to open its ports to Cyprus, an EU member, the Financial Times has learned.

Such a deadline was not included in the European Commission's proposal last week on the partial freezing of the EU's membership talks with Ankara. But both Berlin and Paris believe such a deadline is necessary to maintain pressure on Turkey, officials said.

Ms Merkel said at last week's Nato summit in Riga that the Commission position needed to be "strengthened". A "review clause" on whether Ankara had opened its ports "would be desirable so that the council [EU summit] can review Turkey's progress, perhaps in 18 months' time", she said.

An official in Mr Chirac's office told the FT on Sunday: "France and Germany are on the same page with regard to Turkey."

Officials close to the French government said Mr Chirac would endorse Ms Merkel's stance at the bilateral summit on Monday near Saarbrücken, in Germany.

A Franco-German axis could unify EU countries, including Portugal, Greece and Cyprus, that are sceptical of Turkey's bid, but is also likely to alienate the Turkish government further.

Britain and some Scandinavian countries oppose setting Ankara new deadlines.

Finland, which holds the EU presidency, hopes an agreement on partial freezing of talks can be reached at an EU foreign ministers' meeting on December 11. But a spokeswoman for Ms Merkel's office said last night that the chancellor "expects the review clause to be discussed" at the EU summit on December 14-15.

Officials in Brussels criticised the Franco-German move. A Finnish senior diplomat said: "We don't think there should be an additional clause. The Turks already feel strongly punished by the Commission proposal as it is."

The Commission is proposing that the bloc agree on the freezing of eight of the 35 separate policy areas under the membership talks. Ankara has refused to open its ports – a condition of EU membership – because of its long-running political dispute with Cyprus, but would have unlimited time to do so under the Commission draft.

EU Pacts With Kazakhstan Aim To Ease Reliance On Russia For Gas (WSJ)

By Marc Champion

Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

ASTANA, Kazakhstan -- In the European Union's growing struggle to break Russia's grip on the bloc's gas imports, all roads are leading to Kazakhstan.

Today, the EU signs a memorandum of understanding with Kazakhstan on energy aimed at binding Europe closer to this vast country -- which stretches from the Caspian Sea to China.

Yesterday, EU Energy Commissioner Andris Piebalgs signed an accord on nuclear cooperation, with a view toward increasing Kazakhstan's share of uranium sales in the EU to 20% from 3%. Kazakhstan has one of the world's largest uranium reserves. Last week, Mr. Piebalgs, a Latvian who speaks fluent Russian, attended an EU-inspired meeting in Kazakhstan of regional energy ministers that produced a road map toward integrating their countries' energy grids and regulatory systems with the EU's.

Yet in all this flurry of documents and initiatives, the thing Mr. Piebalgs and many EU countries want most -- the construction of a gas pipeline across the Caspian Sea that would connect the gas-rich countries of Central Asia directly to Europe -- isn't mentioned.

Kazakhstan is critical to building the home stretch of a new southern energy corridor that would carry gas from the Caspian and beyond to the EU, via the Caucasus and Turkey. Such a corridor for the first time would allow the countries of Central Asia to sell gas directly to the EU, rather than to Russian gas monopoly OAO Gazprom, which can then re-export the gas at a high profit, as it does currently. Russia accounts for 44% of EU gas imports, a proportion that is expected to rise significantly, especially after Russia builds a northern gas corridor directly to Germany, under the Baltic Sea.

"The trans-Caspian gas pipeline for us is really important to take more seriously," Mr. Piebalgs said in an interview here. He said that by 2015, Kazakhstan could be producing 106 billion cubic meters of gas annually, about 20% more than Germany consumes each year. Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan, which also could supply the pipe, already are big producers.

A raft of pipelines to make this new East-West energy corridor are either in planning stages or under construction. A gas connector from Turkey to Greece and from there to Italy is being built. Another pipeline, known as Nabucco, is planned to take gas from Turkey north to Central Europe, Austria and beyond. Another, newer pipeline project, promoted since Gazprom cut off gas supplies to Ukraine in a price dispute last winter, would take gas across Georgia and directly to Ukraine and Romania via the Black Sea.

To make these pipe dreams a reality, there has to be gas to fill them. Russia is offering to expand its pipeline, called Blue Stream, across the Black Sea to Turkey, but that would increase the EU's dependency on Gazprom. Iran, with the world's second-biggest gas reserves, after Russia, could hook up to Turkey's grid and send gas to Europe, but relations between Tehran and the EU are poor. Connections to bring gas from Iraq and Egypt to Turkey also are possible but equally uncertain.

Gazprom is skeptical about the EU's pipeline ambitions. At a recent conference on the EU's external energy policy in Brussels, Gazprom Deputy Chairman Alexander Medvedev joked about the Nabucco project: "with names like that, pipelines don't get built."

Mr. Piebalgs is eager to secure a new southern gas route as soon as possible. Kazakhstan could choose to pipe its gas to China instead of Europe, even if the cost and distance involved would be far higher than crossing the Caspian. But Kazakhstan President Nursultan Nazarbayev, who visits Brussels this week, is proving cautious. Closely allied to Moscow, the Kazakh government is wary of inviting the kind of retribution that has met Georgia's snubbing of Russian power.

Nine oil- and gas-pipeline projects mentioned in an early draft of the Astana meeting's road map were all taken out, largely for fear of angering Russia over the trans-Caspian issue, according to an official familiar with the matter.

"It's too early to start talking about a trans-Caspian pipeline," Kazakh Energy Minister Baktykozha Izmukhambetov said in an interview yesterday, adding that the first thing to do is to agree with Russia on expanding capacity in the existing Russian pipeline routes.

Mr. Izmukhambetov agreed that Kazakhstan has a strong interest in selling its gas directly to Europe, but he noted that the EU and U.S. are launching feasibility studies for a potential trans-Caspian gas route. Only once those are complete will it be possible for Kazakhstan to judge if the project is commercially viable, and only then could negotiations with Russia start, he said.

UK Team To Visit Russia In Spy Probe (FT)

By Jimmy Burns And Neil Buckley

Financial Times, December 4, 2006

The investigation into the death of the former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko is broadening into an international police probe into organised crime, alleged state-sponsored murder and the activities of individuals who have worked for the Russian secret service.

A team from SO15, the UK counter-terrorism investigation squad, is expected to fly to Moscow on Monday or Tuesday to interview witnesses and gather information on potential suspects.

The Russian state-run television channel Rossiya said on Sunday night that the arrival of the nine British detectives was important as it would demonstrate Moscow's willingness to co-operate. It was also a guarantee of an "objective investigation", against the highly "politicised background" to the case in London.

John Reid, UK home secretary, plans to brief European counterparts on Monday on the UK investigation at a meeting in Brussels of EU justice and interior ministers.

"We want our European colleagues to be brought up to date and we are seeking co-operation from them," a UK government aide said Sunday night. The investigation could extend to other European countries, including France, Italy and Spain.

International co-operation on the case has so far been largely limited to a sharing of information with the US Federal Bureau of Investigation, with which the British have developed a strong working relationship since September 11, 2001.

In recent days UK police have been in Washington, interviewing a witness in the presence of FBI agents. The interviewee is thought be a former KGB agent, Yuri Shvets, a contact of Mario Scaramella, the Italian who allegedly met Mr Litvinenko on November 1.

Mr Scaramella, a self-proclaimed expert on the activities of the former KGB, is under observation in a London hospital after he was found to have been contaminated with the radioactive isotope polonium-210, which killed Mr Litvinenko on November 23.

The UK government has in recent days tried to play down any suggestions that the Kremlin itself is implicated in Mr Litvinenko's murder, amid some nervousness about the damage controversy over the case is having on Anglo-Russian relations, according to diplomatic sources in London.

It emerged on Sunday that Vladimir Putin, Russian president, expressed his anger in a message to the UK Foreign Office last week.

Trails being followed by UK investigators include contacts Mr Litvinenko had with three Russians who visited him in London, and who have returned to Moscow.

Investigation Widens In Poisoning Of Ex-KGB Spy (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

DOJ_NMG_0101804

The Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

LONDON — British authorities said today they are widening their investigation into the poisoning of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko on the heels of a fresh series of leads into the Russian's murky political and business connections that spanned from Moscow to the U.S.

"Over the next few days, I think all of these things will widen out a little from the circle just being here in Britain," Home Secretary John Reid told Britain's Sky News Sunday Live program.

Quoting unidentified law enforcement sources, British press reports said police investigators are in the U.S. interviewing former KGB agent Yuri Shvets, who purportedly has information on a dossier Litvinenko had in his possession relating to the Kremlin's pursuit of figures connected to Yukos Oil Co.

The company was forcibly broken up and effectively renationalized in 2004 after Russian authorities imprisoned its chief executive, Mikhail Khodorkovsky. One of President Vladimir V. Putin's closest lieutenants, KGB veteran Igor Sechin, became board chairman of the state-owned company that took over Yukos.

In Moscow, British investigators were said to be planning to interview another former KGB agent, Andrei Lugovoy, who had recently traveled to London from Moscow and met with Litvinenko on the day of his suspected poisoning. Lugovoy was one of those Litvinenko himself is said to have suspected, "We can't go into detail on operational matters, but obviously the investigators will go wherever needed," a police spokeswoman said today.

While Litvinenko in the days before his death accused the Kremlin of responsibility for the large dose of radioactive polonium-210 that is believed to have killed him, police are exploring a growing number of leads, some relating to Litvinenko's own investigative work into the shadowy world of Russian and Chechen organized crime, wealthy Russian oligarchs and international politics.

In a first-person account and interview provided to Britain's Observer newspaper, a Russian academic researching a book on Chechnya said she had met Litvinenko several times over the past year and learned he had accumulated secret and damaging dossiers from the Federal Security Service, the successor to the KGB known as the FSB, on a number of influential figures that he planned to use for blackmailing purposes.

"He told me he was going to blackmail or sell sensitive information about all kinds of powerful people, including oligarchs, corrupt officials and sources in the Kremlin," she said. "He mentioned a figure of 10,000 pounds they would pay each time to stop him broadcasting these FSB documents.

"Litvinenko was short of money and adamant that he could obtain any files he wanted," she said.

The file he was most excited about, she told the Observer, related to the takeover of Yukos Oil by the Russian state-a mysterious tax sale, never fully understood, under which the bulk of the private firm's assets came under the ownership of the state-owned Rosneft Oil Co.

Former Yukos executive Leonid Nevzlin, who fled Russia to Israel when it became clear he was also facing imprisonment, has said Litvinenko recently flew to Israel to give him potentially incendiary documents relating to Yukos and the Russian authorities.

"Alex had information on crimes committed with the Russian government's direct participation. He only recently gave me and my attorneys documents that shed light on the most significant aspects of the Yukos affair," Nevzlin said in a statement.

Nevzlin said he had passed the documents on to British authorities, and had been requested not to discuss their specific contents.

A Moscow court in 2004 issued an arrest warrant charging Nevzlin with organizing a double contract killing and a string of attempted murders, but the former executive says it is part of the same alleged campaign to target Yukos executives and critics of the Putin government.

Meanwhile, an Italian security consultant who also met Litvinenko on the probable day of the poisoning, Mario Scaramella, released a statement over the weekend saying he believes he and Litvinenko were jointly targeted as a result of information the two had been sharing over the past several months.Scaramella has also tested positive for polonium exposure, though doctors said he did not yet show any symptoms of radiation toxicity.

"I have reason to believe that my poisoning and that of Litvinenko is connected to the information that for months the same Litvinenko was passing me," Scaramella said in a statement released through his lawyer.

Scaramella said his samples showed significantly lower traces than those that killed Litvinenko, "but they were still considered to be potentially lethal, and therefore capable of killing me."

Scaramella was working with an Italian-based commission that was looking into possible past connections between Russian intelligence services and Italian politicians. Commission members said they found evidence that the former Soviet Union had ordered the attempted assassination of former Pope John Paul II and the 1978 murder of former prime minister Aldo Moro by the Italian militant Red Brigades.

But Italian press reports, some quoting wiretapped conversations between Scaramella and Sen. Paolo Guzzanti, a member of Silvio Berlusconi's right-wing Forza Italia party, have suggested there may also have been political motivations to the probe aimed at finding connections, prior to the elections eight months ago, between Prime Minister Romano Prodi and the KGB.

British authorities have refused to comment on any of the theories except to say that they are following all possible leads.

"The worst thing we can do is speculate. We will end up with egg on our face. This isn't a game of Cluedo," Reid said.

Probe Of Ex-spy's Death Widening Beyond Britain (USAT)

By Ellen Tumposky Special For

USA Today, December 4, 2006

LONDON — The investigation into the poisoning of former KGB spy Alexander Litvinenko is widening beyond Britain's borders, a top British official said Sunday.

"The police will follow wherever this investigation leads; inside or outside Britain," Home Secretary John Reid told Sky News. "Over the next few days … all of these things, I think, will widen out a little from the circle just being here in Britain."

Reid didn't specify where investigators would go to delve further into the death of Litvinenko. The former spy was poisoned with polonium-210, a highly radioactive isotope, and died in a London hospital on Nov. 23.

The Associated Press, quoting unnamed police officials, reported that a Scotland Yard team was expected to travel to Russia early this week. Scotland Yard refused to confirm the report, saying police aren't commenting on the investigation.

Scotland Yard officers, assisted by the FBI, have already traveled to Virginia to interview former KGB officer Yuri Shvets, according to the Associated Press.

Shvets told the AP he gave investigators the name of the person he believed was behind Litvinenko's death. He declined to confirm the name of the person he told police about or to offer details of a document he said he had given to the British officers.

"This is firsthand information, this is not gossip. I gave them the firsthand information that I have," Shvets told the AP.

"I want this inquiry to get to the bottom of it, otherwise they will be killing people all over the world — in London, in Washington and in other places," Shvets said.

The news of an expanding police probe came as Mario Scaramella, who met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1 at the Itsu sushi bar, remained at University College Hospital for further tests.

Traces of radiation have been found at the sushi bar, though police have not confirmed that Litvinenko was poisoned there.

Scaramella was lunching with Litvinenko to discuss the murder of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya, according to an interview Litvinenko gave the BBC before he became seriously ill.

Scaramella, who worked with an Italian parliamentary commission that was probing possible links between Italian politicians and the KGB, was rushed to the hospital on Friday when it was determined that he tested positive for polonium-210.

In a statement he released Saturday through his lawyer, Scaramella said he had no symptoms. Scaramella said Scotland Yard spoke to him as a witness in its investigation.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov has vowed to cooperate with the British authorities, according to the British government.

Litvinenko's friend and family spokesman, Alex Goldfarb, said that he has doubts about how serious Russia is about cooperating.

"The Russian authorities at the highest level have formally said that they will provide full cooperation," Goldfarb said. "I am skeptical. Let's see."

Before his death, Litvinenko accused Russian President Vladimir Putin of involvement in his poisoning. The Kremlin has denied it.

Goldfarb said that he had seen Walter Litvinenko, Alexander's father, on Saturday. The elder Litvinenko lives in Russia but had traveled to London when his son became ill.

"If Putin gives up people who killed my son, then I would publicly apologize to him," Goldfarb quoted Walter Litvinenko as saying. "If he does not, I consider him an accomplice."

Goldfarb, who has no official knowledge of the investigation, said he thinks Scotland Yard will want to interview the group of Russians who met with Litvinenko at the Millennium Hotel after the sushi lunch.

Britain Says Inquiry Into Poisoning Of Russian Will Broaden (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 3 — The investigation into the poisoning of Alexander V. Litvinenko, a former Russian K.G.B. operative, will likely broaden in coming days, Britain's highest ranking law enforcement officer said Sunday, and media reports said British counterterrorism officers were planning to fly to Moscow to interview witnesses.

Mr. Litvinenko died Nov. 23 of radiation poisoning, and a radioactive isotope, polonium 210, was found in his urine. Since then, the investigation into his death has led the police along a trail of places where traces of radiation were found — including British Airways airplanes flying to and from Moscow and several locations in central and north London.

The reported plan to send officers to Moscow has deepened speculation that the British police are looking increasingly to Moscow for information about the origins of the poison and the identity of people who may have been in contact with Mr. Litvinenko before his death. Mr. Litvinenko had, since the late 1990's, become a staunch critic of the Russian president, Vladimir V. Putin.

The possible Russian connection has spilled into the realms of diplomacy. Senior Russian officials have complained to their British counterparts about the publication of a death-bed statement by Mr. Litvinenko accusing Mr. Putin of responsibility for the poisoning, according to a British official who spoke on condition of anonymity under civil service rules. Moscow has said it will cooperate in the British investigation.

Shortly before his death, Mr. Litvinenko secured British citizenship, according to his associates, and that has raised the diplomatic stakes, particularly if foreign agents were responsible for his death, which would make it an assassination on British soil. In a television interview on Sunday, Britain's head law enforcement official, Home Secretary John Reid, said: "The police will follow wherever this investigation leads, inside or outside of Britain." He added, "Over the next few days, I think all of these things, I think, will widen out a little from the circle just being here in Britain."

News media reports in Moscow and London said nine British counterterrorism officers planned to fly to Moscow to interview people, possibly including Andrei Lugovoi, a former K.G.B. agent. Mr. Lugovoi met with Mr. Litvinenko on several occasions, including on Nov. 1, when Mr. Litvinenko began feeling unwell.

Radioactive traces have been found in the Pine Bar of the Mayfair Millennium Hotel, where the two men met. Mr. Lugovoi was quoted in The Sunday Times of London as saying he had been framed by people laying a false trail for the police.

Mr. Litvinenko also met Nov. 1 with an Italian contact, Mario Scaramella, who has since then tested positive for radioactive traces. In a statement on Sunday, London's University College Hospital said that Mr. Scaramella remained "well" and that the results of pathology tests showed no abnormalities.

Mr. Scaramella has said the contamination is evidence that he, too, was a target. "I have reason to believe that the poisoning of myself and Litvinenko may be connected to information that Litvinenko himself, for months, had transmitted to me," Mr. Scaramella said in a statement published by Italian news media, according to [a news agency].

British newspapers on Sunday suggested the narrative was becoming not only murkier, but broader. One report said the British officers had interviewed a former K.G.B. officer in Washington, identified as Yuri Shvets, about a dossier on the Yukos oil company affair — in which the company's former chairman, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, has been imprisoned for tax evasion. Leonid Nevzlin, an exiled Russian oil tycoon living in Israel, has said in interviews with two news organizations that Mr. Litvinenko had passed him a dossier on the company.

Another report in The Observer quoted a Russian academic living in London, Julia Svetlichnaya, as saying Mr. Litvinenko told her he planned to make a living blackmailing Russian billionaires and spies. Ms. Svetlichnaya did not respond immediately to an e-mailed request for comment on the article.

U.K. Probe Into Death Of Ex-Spy Gets Closer To Moving To Russia (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp And Aaron O. Patrick In London And Stacy Meichtry In Rome

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

U.K. authorities investigating the poisoning death of Russian former spy Alexander Litvinenko in London are closer to moving the inquiry to Russian soil amid talks with the Russian government, according to a person familiar with the situation.

The diplomatic talks will include London's Metropolitan Police Service, which is leading the investigation, and the U.K.'s Foreign and Commonwealth Office, led by Margaret Beckett. The talks will include a list of people Scotland Yard will want to interview in Moscow. Russian authorities have said they will cooperate but they would like to know the game plan of British investigators.

Over the weekend, the U.K. inquiry into Mr. Litvinenko's death Nov. 23 broadened as his wife and the man he had lunch with a month ago were found to be contaminated with radiation and police searched yet more locales for traces of a radioactive substance.

Police Extend Searches

The investigation appears far from determining who administered the poison, or how or why. Police expanded their searches of premises that may hold traces of the radioactive substance polonium 210, including a country club about 19 miles southeast of London. British health officials are seeking to stem public concern about radioactive particles that have been found in three London locations and on two British Airways planes.

The Health Protection Agency said yesterday it had identified 179 people who warrant further investigation and had referred 27 for assessment for possible exposure as of Saturday night. The agency reiterated that the risk to the public remains low.

Polonium, which is made in nuclear laboratories, is used in some devices that measure radiation. The amount and potency of the poison used to kill Mr. Litvinenko has prompted speculation it was procured from a nuclear facility, but no ties to any such facility have been formally established, a person familiar with the investigation said.

Even a tiny amount is intensely radioactive if it enters the body, where it quickly is distributed to soft tissue including bone marrow. It can enter the body through inhalation, ingestion or a wound. Doctors test for polonium 210 by measuring the amount of alpha radiation in urine.

One person who could provide information in the U.K. probe is former KGB spy Andrei Lugovoy, who met with Mr. Litvinenko on Nov. 1. That night, Mr. Litvinenko fell ill from the poison. U.K. authorities currently consider Mr. Lugovoy a cooperating witness who has been willing to detail his whereabouts in London.

Testing Positive

On Nov. 1, Mr. Litvinenko had lunch at a restaurant in London with Italian political adviser Mario Scaramella. Mr. Scaramella, who initially claimed he wasn't contaminated, was at a London hospital Friday night after testing positive for radiation. So far, he hasn't shown signs of overt poisoning such as vomiting or diarrhea, according to a person familiar with the investigation.

Investigators are looking at whether Messrs. Litvinenko and Scaramella came in contact with the poison together or if it happened at different times. After lunch, the two went separate ways, the person familiar with the inquiry said. The two men have told authorities there wasn't a third party at the meeting.

U.K. health officials said a close relative of Mr. Litvinenko also had been exposed to polonium. A person familiar with the matter identified the relative as Mr. Litvinenko's wife. The U.K. Health Protection Agency said the level of contamination was unlikely to lead to serious illness. It is possible she was exposed from dealing with Mr. Litvinenko during his illness.

Mr. Scaramella served as an adviser to Paolo Guzzanti, a right-wing Italian senator who formerly headed a parliamentary commission. The commission was formed in 2002 with the aim of uncovering links between KGB spies and Italian politicians during the Cold War. Although the senator tapped Mr. Scaramella on the basis of his expertise in Italian security, many elements in Mr. Scaramella's résumé have recently come under public scrutiny.

Faculty at the Universita Federico II in Naples have disputed Mr. Scaramella's claim that he once served as an adviser to the university's aerospace-and-engineering department. Neither Mr. Scaramella nor his lawyer could be reached to comment.

Poisoning Probe Not Limited By Borders (WT/AP)

By David Stringer

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

LONDON -- Britain's senior law-enforcement official said yesterday that an inquiry into the death of a former KGB agent had expanded overseas, and a U.S.-based friend of the former agent said he had told police the name of the person he thinks orchestrated the poisoning.

Yuri Shvets said he had known the poisoned ex-spy, Alexander Litvinenko, since 2002 and spoke with him on Nov. 23, the day Mr. Litvinenko died from exposure to a rare radioactive element, polonium-210.

"The truth is, we have an act of international terrorism on our hands. I happen to believe I know who is behind the death of my friend Sasha and the reason for his murder," Mr. Shvets said by telephone from the United States, referring to Mr. Litvinenko by his Russian nickname.

Mr. Shvets, also a former KGB officer, declined to say who he thought was behind Mr. Litvinenko's death because of concern it could disrupt the investigation. He also declined to offer details on a document that he said he had given to the British officers.

"This is firsthand information, this is not gossip. I gave them the firsthand information that I have," Mr. Shvets said.

In London, meanwhile, Home Secretary John Reid said the inquiry would go wherever "the police take it."

"Over the next few days, I think all of these things will widen out a little from the circle just being here in Britain," Mr. Reid told Britain's Sky News television.

DOJ_NMG_0101808

The British police official said police were expected to travel to Russia in coming days for interviews, including with Andrei Lugovoi. Mr. Lugovoi is another former Russian spy who met with Mr. Litvinenko on Nov. 1, the day Mr. Litvinenko fell ill.

The Sunday Times newspaper quoted Mr. Lugovoi as saying he had also been contaminated with polonium-210, but he did not say whether he had fallen ill. He denied that he and two business associates who accompanied him to the Nov. 1 meeting were involved in Mr. Litvinenko's death.

"We suspect that someone has been trying to frame us," the Times quoted Mr. Lugovoi as saying. "Someone passed this stuff onto us ... to point the finger at us and distract the police."

Repeated attempts by the Associated Press to reach Mr. Lugovoi in Moscow through a business associate have been unsuccessful.

Mr. Litvinenko said from his deathbed that he thought Russian President Vladimir Putin was behind his poisoning. Mr. Putin has dismissed the accusation as "nonsense."

Revisiting Putin's Soul (NYT)

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

The fatal poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko in London, along with all the other suspicious murders and attempted murders of Kremlin critics in recent months, poses fundamental questions about Russia, and how the West should treat it.

Since most of these crimes remain unsolved, we can only speculate about who is behind them. We would certainly prefer not to suspect that anyone connected to President Vladimir Putin is involved, even if the attacks have the hallmarks of professional assassinations. The West needs a good relationship with Russia and its cooperation in containing nuclear proliferation and fighting terrorism. No one wants to return to the time when Russia was seen as an enemy.

Yet the recent events — a Russian defector is killed by a radioactive element, a Russian economic reformer suddenly is sickened in Ireland, a crusading Russian reporter is shot down in her doorway — cannot simply be dismissed as unrelated occurrences, as Mr. Putin would prefer.

What is indisputable is that a culture of lawlessness is spreading throughout Russia, and Mr. Putin has done little to stop it. On the contrary, he has weakened Russia's democracy by stuffing his administration with shadowy fellow veterans of the old K.G.B. and by fanning Russians' deep-seated feelings of insecurity and mistrust of the outside world.

Under the guise of restoring Russian honor, Mr. Putin's government is quashing the freedoms won by the post-Soviet press, judiciary and legislature. Government critics have been branded "enemies of Russia" on lists that circulate openly in government circles. The Kremlin claims to see American wiles behind every real or perceived setback.

The West has no choice but to continue dealing with Russia, and with Mr. Putin. But when Kremlin critics are attacked or murdered, the West must demand a full, transparent investigation and punishment for the criminals — no matter who they are. It is time to let Mr. Putin know that we are looking hard into his soul, and we don't like what we see.

Pinochet In Stable Condition After Heart Attack (NYT)

By Pascale Bonnefoy

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile, Dec. 3 — Gen. Augusto Pinochet, the former dictator of Chile, suffered a serious heart attack on Sunday morning and underwent angioplasty and, later in the day, another surgical procedure, hospital officials and his family said.

General Pinochet, who turned 91 on Nov. 25, underwent the angioplasty in the morning, said his son Marco Antonio Pinochet, who added that the procedure had "virtually rescued him from death." Hospital officials said he was to have bypass surgery that afternoon.

Later, a news release from the Military Hospital of Santiago, where he is being treated, said that the second procedure was instead an evaluation of the angioplasty, and that his condition was "stable."

Dr. Juan Ignacio Vergara, leader of the medical team treating General Pinochet, said that the general was conscious and communicating with his family and doctors. He said that treatment so far had progressed "satisfactorily," that the lung edema that General Pinochet had when he was admitted "has been resolved" and that a bypass "will probably not be necessary" for now.

He said, though, that General Pinochet's condition "continues to be serious," and that the next 24 to 48 hours are "critical."

Marco Antonio Pinochet said his father had received last rites in the morning.

The commander in chief of the army, Gen. Óscar Izurieta, met with General Pinochet's wife, Lucía Hiriart, and children at the hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0101809

Government officials had no comment on General Pinochet's health or on what might happen when he dies, but Ricardo Lagos Weber, a spokesman and the son of a former president, said the government "was prepared" for whatever the outcome of his illness might be.

In an interview on Chilean television in August, President Michelle Bachelet said that General Pinochet would not be entitled to a state funeral, given that he had been indicted for crimes. "The conscience of Chileans would feel violated" were he given official honors, she said.

General Pinochet had been suffering from several ailments, including diabetes, and has had several strokes in recent years. His faltering health and what doctors have diagnosed as "mild dementia" have allowed him to evade trials for human rights violations and other crimes committed during his 17-year rule, which began after a military coup toppled the democratically elected president, Salvador Allende, in 1973.

Last week, General Pinochet was indicted on charges of kidnapping and murdering two Allende bodyguards after the 1973 coup, and was placed under house arrest. In recent years, he has also been indicted in cases involving the disappearance of opponents in 1975, the kidnapping and torture of political prisoners in the mid-1970s, and on charges of tax fraud, falsifying public documents and fabricating and using false passports in connection with an investigation into his illicit fortune, hidden abroad.

In 2004, a United States Senate report disclosed that General Pinochet had stashed up to $8 million in secret accounts at the Riggs Bank in Washington. A human rights report issued in 1991 by a government-appointed commission established that during the military dictatorship, almost 3,200 people were killed or disappeared. In 2004, a commission on political prisons and torture found that at least 28,000 people had been victims of torture.

Pinochet In Intensive Care After Heart Attack (WP)

By Jonathan Franklin

The Washington Post, December 4, 2006

SANTIAGO, Chile, Dec. 3 -- Gen. Augusto Pinochet, a former military dictator accused of killing and torturing thousands of people, underwent emergency angioplasty and was placed in intensive care after suffering a heart attack Sunday morning, his family and doctors said.

Pinochet, 91, was expected to be monitored for the next 24 to 48 hours to see whether a bypass was necessary. Doctors have called that procedure extremely risky and were seeking to avoid it.

"He is stable but of course serious," said Juan Ignacio Vergara, a doctor at the military hospital where Pinochet was taken.

Pinochet, who ruled Chile from 1973 to 1990, has multiple health problems, including diabetes, and has suffered several strokes over the past six years.

Pinochet was under house arrest at his home in an upscale Santiago neighborhood when a family member called for an ambulance. Special judicial permission was granted to transfer Pinochet to the hospital.

Pinochet's son Marco Antonio Pinochet said the doctors performed surgery "to virtually save him from death. He's bad, very bad."

Pinochet's supporters gathered outside the hospital with placards reading "Immortal" and with dated pictures of him in uniform.

Pinochet faces multiple investigations for his role in the deaths and disappearances of 3,000 Chilean civilians during his rule. The most recent charges against him emanate from a secret military mission known as "The Caravan of Death," in which a helicopter hit squad traveled throughout Chile executing political prisoners.

"We've never seen him in such conditions," said Luis Cortes Villa, one of Pinochet's closest allies. He recounted that in the last week, Pinochet told his inner circle that he thought he was dying. "He said, 'I am in the final phase of my life.' "

Chilean President Michelle Bachelet, a socialist who was arrested and tortured by security forces during Pinochet's rule, made no immediate comment.

Ban Cluster Bombs In Civilian Areas (WT)

By Dianne Feinstein

The Washington Times, December 4, 2006

In 2005, three young Cambodian boys were playing near their village when they found four small steel objects that they picked up and used to play an impromptu game of marbles. Their new-found toys, however, were actually "bomblets" left from a cluster bomb that had been dropped years before. In the middle of their game, one of the balls was struck by another, triggering an explosion. One boy died from massive abdominal wounds. The other two boys survived with serious injuries.

Similarly, in Kosovo in 1999, a teenage boy went for a swimming in a lake near his home, where he found a small yellow canister. When he showed off his discovery to his family, the bomblet fell to the ground and exploded. It left him permanently wounded and killed his older brother and father. Several months later, his sister stepped on another cluster bomb in the region and was killed.

These terrible stories, unfortunately, are all too common in war-torn areas around the world. Tens of thousands of innocent men, women, and children have been killed or maimed by these indiscriminate and deadly weapons. They were used in Laos in the 1970s and 1980s, Eritrea and Ethiopia in 1998, Serbia and Montenegro 1999, Afghanistan in 2001, Iraq in 2003, and most recently by both sides during the conflict between Israel and Lebanon.

The time has come to ban the use of these weapons in or near civilian areas.

Cluster bombs are intended for attacking large-scale enemy troop formations. They come apart in the air before making contact, dispersing between 200 and 400 small bomblets that can saturate a radius of 250 yards.

The changing nature of warfare, though, has meant cluster bombs have been used against enemies in or near highly populated areas. So, all too often, cluster bombs critically injure or kill innocent victims instead of their intended military targets.

The danger is this: These weapons are unreliable and cannot be used with precision. Up to 40 percent of the bomblets from cluster bombs fail to detonate immediately. This leaves a trail of unexploded munitions in war-torn areas.

These tiny bomblets end up in streets and cities. They land in trees and fields where children play. They have been found in rice fields.

Bomblets are usually no bigger than a size D battery. In some cases, they resemble small metal tennis balls. They are attractive to curious young children who find them and pick them up. And 40 or 50 years after used, these munitions remain extremely volatile.

The simple truth is that the remnants of cluster bombs become de facto land mines. They kill, maim, and wound civilians every day, even long after conflict has ended. In fact, 98 percent of cluster bomb victims are civilians. I believe use of these weapons in or near civilian areas runs counter to our values and counter to the international laws of war.

Today, the arsenal of the U.S. military contains 5.5 million cluster bombs. That's 728 million bomblets. We need to take steps to ensure civilians are protected when these weapons are deployed.

So, when the Senate convenes for the new Congress in January, I will seek to ban the use of federal funds spent on cluster bombs until the Defense Department has articulated a new policy that will minimize civilian death and suffering from these weapons.

This means cluster bombs used or purchased by the U.S. military or sold to another country can only be used against clearly defined military targets and will not be used where civilians are known to be present or in areas normally inhabited by civilians.

The International Committee for the Red Cross and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan recently called for prohibiting use of cluster bombs in populated areas. Their calls echoed a growing international consensus that the unintended humanitarian cost of these weapons is simply too high.

During the 1990s, a comprehensive pact was forged to protect civilians from land mines worldwide. The United States and the international community have since spent millions to remove mines in post-conflict regions. These efforts have helped to save countless lives. There is no question there should be a similar program for cluster bombs.

In November, a wide-ranging treaty went into effect to protect civilians, peacekeepers and other humanitarian agencies in post-conflict regions from cluster bombs. It will require parties to an armed conflict to clear all unexploded cluster bombs and other munitions once hostilities have ended. It is a good first step.

The United States and the international community should work together to stop use of cluster bombs when the lives of civilians are at risk. We need to ensure we don't needlessly endanger innocent men, women, and children by dropping cluster bombs where they live, work, and play. This is the right and just thing to do.

Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat, is a member of the United States Senate.

The U.N. Menu (WSJ)

By Henry I. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, December 4, 2006

CHIBA, Japan -- The U.N. task force that wrapped up here on Friday deliberated on the regulation of foods obtained with recombinant DNA (or gene-splicing) technology. They ignored the rule of holes: When you're in a hole, stop digging. The more this ongoing project progresses, the worse for science and technology -- and consumers everywhere.

The scope of this exercise, held under the auspices of the Codex Alimentarius Commission, which sets food standards on behalf of the U.N.'s Food and Agriculture Organization and World Health Organization, makes no sense. Now in its seventh year, the mission is to create more stringent regulatory requirements only for those foods made with the newest, most precise and predictable techniques of biotechnology -- gene-splicing, or genetic modification -- while exempting others made with far less precise and predictable conventional technologies. Having already stifled innovative research on food plants and microorganisms, the commission is now penetrating other areas, such as animals and even animals immunized with high-tech vaccines.

It is one thing to regulate novel foods with traits that are of potential concern, but quite another to regulate merely because a certain technique has been used, especially when that technique is state-of-the-art. It is rather like circumscribing for extra regulation only cars outfitted with disk brakes, radial tires and air bags -- and then limiting only those vehicles to a lower speed.

The members of this task force, including representatives of the U.S. government, disregard the scientific consensus that gene-splicing is an extension, or refinement, of older, traditional techniques of genetic modification, and that it does not warrant discriminatory, excessive regulation. They overlook the fact that during two decades of widespread use, the performance of gene-spliced crops has been spectacular, with farmers enjoying increased yields, decreased use of agricultural chemicals, and lower occupational exposures to pesticides.

The approach of Codex is also incompatible with FDA policies, which are the most scientifically defensible, risk-based approach to biotech regulation in the world. Dr. Eric Flamm, a senior FDA bureaucrat and the head of the U.S. delegation, is unfazed by the inconsistency; he says that the members of the delegation to Codex represent not their own agencies, but the U.S. One wonders whether the commissioner of the FDA -- who proclaims during every speech that the agency is committed to science as the basis for policy -- shares this view.

Why does the U.S. go along with this travesty? The representatives of U.S. regulatory agencies on the task force offer several rationales: Because virtually every other country has in place irrational, unscientific regulation, we must follow suit; the task force is really addressing issues of trade, not science; and most important, American industry demands that we play along.

Unpersuasive on all counts. The Codex standards only provide cover for unfair trade practices, because with them in place, a country wanting to block trade in gene-spliced foods for any reason can defend against charges of unfair trade practices simply by remonstrating that it's deferring to Codex.

It is true that big agribusiness companies (dozens of whose lobbyists flock to the task force meetings) endorse the Codex process. They like regulation because it limits competition and provides a sort of Good Housekeeping seal of approval. But they fail to realize that encouraging excessive, unscientific regulation is like eating your seed corn: a short-term expedient but a long-term catastrophe, especially for smaller farmers, plant breeders and academic researchers (who are not represented at Codex).

American regulators have become surrogates of big agribusiness companies at the expense of academic research and the well-being of other sectors of the U.S. economy. American officials now regularly encourage unscientific, excessive regulation, although the outcomes consistently sacrifice U.S. interests to those of the European Union and anti-technology NGOs (which, inexplicably, are permitted full participation in the task force). What makes this particularly absurd is that the U.S. provides about a quarter of the base budget of the U.N. As a scientist, I feel embarrassed; as a former regulator, appalled; and as an American taxpayer, violated.

Dr. Miller, a fellow at Stanford's Hoover Institution, was the founding director of the Office of Biotechnology at the FDA from 1989 to 1993.

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Agent Describes Alleged Texas Terrorist Cell.

The Houston Chronicle (12/2, Korosec) reports, "An FBI agent testified in federal court Friday that at least four aspiring jihadists conducted firearms training and discussed going to war against the United States on two weekend camping trips near Willis earlier this year. 'The group had discussions about traveling to Pakistan to engage (the) United States and coalition forces,' Special Agent John McKinley, who is assigned to an international counterterrorism squad in Houston, told a federal judge. … The group included two Houston-area men who were arrested and charged earlier this week with conspiracy to aid the Taliban."

The Dallas Morning News (12/2, Chapa, Trahan) reports, "Federal authorities allege that Syed Maaz Shah joined the other men over several days in January to train with assault rifles in a rural area near Willis, Texas, north of Houston. The goal of the two Houston men was to 'hone their skills with weapons to assist fighters engaging United States forces in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iraq,' according to conspiracy indictments for Kobie Williams, 33, and Adnan Babar Mirza, 29."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

California Man Indicted For Hoax Anthrax Letters To Celebrities. The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Krikorian) reported Chad Conrad Castagana of Woodland Hills, Calif., was indicted "Friday on charges of sending threatening letters with white powder to half a dozen politicians and celebrities, including incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and television personalities Jon Stewart and Keith Olbermann. … The powder turned out to be harmless." The Times noted, "According to an affidavit by Los Angeles FBI Agent Mary Hogan, the investigation began Sept. 6 when agents in New York were called to the apartment of comedian Jon Stewart and found a threatening letter, postmarked from Santa Clarita with an unknown white powder. … 'It appears the individuals were targeted based on what he described as their liberal politics,' Assistant U.S. Atty. Donald Gaffney said Friday after the indictment was returned."

The AP (12/2, Marquez) noted, "Castagana was charged with 14 federal counts of threats and hoaxes, one for each letter he is accused of sending. Each count carries a 5-year sentence." The AP added, "The FBI has said federal agents watched Castagana walk from his home to a public mailbox and deposit several letters. One was addressed to someone previously targeted and contained the white powder."

Leahy Plans To Investigate Traveler Assessment Program. The AP (12/2, Sniffin) reports, "A leader of the new Democratic Congress, business travelers and privacy advocates expressed outrage Friday over the unannounced assignment of terrorism risk assessments to American international travelers by a computerized system managed from an unmarked, two-story brick building in Northern Virginia." Incoming Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy "pledged greater scrutiny of such government database-mining projects after reading that during the past four years millions of Americans have been evaluated without their knowledge to assess the risks that they are terrorists or criminals."

Database Raises Privacy Concerns. NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 7, 2:00) ran an "In Depth" report on privacy in the US, with anchor Brian Williams saying, "Many people may not realize it, but since 9/11, the government has been monitoring and gathering data on just about every person entering the US. Now there are concerns about what the government is doing about all the information it gathers." NBC (P. Williams): "Each of the more than 400 million times a year that US citizens and foreign travelers enter the US, a Customs and Border Protection agent has about one minute to decide if they're a threat, and if so, to conduct a more intrusive inspection. A big factor in that decision is a computer database containing such personal information as credit card and phone numbers used to buy tickets, travel history, traveling companions, even airline seat numbers. Recently disclosed government documents say the system also generates a risk assessment score for every traveler, including American citizens. A record, the government says, that can be kept as long as 40 years. That has privacy advocates raising new objections that homeland security wants to prevent passengers from reviewing their records for mistakes. … Homeland Security says there is a way for passengers to claim that the information on them is incorrect. But privacy groups say, unless passengers can see it for themselves, it's impossible to fix."

NYTimes Seeks Dismissal Of Hatfill Defamation Suit. The New York Times (12/2, A13, Lewis, Johnston) reports, "The New York Times filed a motion with a federal judge on Friday asking him to dismiss a suit by a germ-warfare scientist who said a series of columns by Nicholas D. Kristof about the deadly anthrax mailings of 2001 defamed him. The scientist, Stephen J. Hatfill, who formerly worked in the Army laboratories at Fort Detrick, Md., has said Mr. Kristof's columns about the slow pace of the anthrax investigation defamed him because they suggested that he was responsible for the attacks. In the motion filed Friday, lawyers for The Times asked Judge Claude M. Hilton of Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va., to dismiss the suit."

NYTimes Says Katrina Evacuees Ought To Have Been Given Section 8 Vouchers. The New York Times (12/2, A14) editorializes, "One of the many victims of Hurricane Katrina may turn out to be the hospitality that American cities, particularly Houston, showed to people fleeing the storm. Thanks largely to the Bush administration's catastrophic handling of the relocation crisis, Houston endured much more civic strain than it should have in caring for the tens of thousands of Louisianans who landed on its doorstep. The administration's mishandling of the crisis has often looked like a calculated attempt to discourage displaced people from seeking housing aid, even if it means leaving them vulnerable to homelessness. A federal district court judge implied as much this week, when he found that the Federal Emergency Management Agency's aid application process was so convoluted and confusing as to be unconstitutional." According to the Times, "The administration made its most disastrous misstep when it failed to enlist the Department of Housing and Urban Development, which was created to deal with just these kinds of situations. If the administration had provided Section 8 housing vouchers through HUD, families could have been directed to affordable housing all over the country."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Study Group Said To Seek "Middle Road" Between Bush, Democrats. All three broadcast networks led their Friday evening newscasts with reports on harsh winter weather in the Midwest. Beyond that story, the focus was mainly on Iraq and the widely anticipated report from the Iraq Study Group. In addition to television coverage, the ISG report receives front-page coverage from both Washington newspapers and was a big topic on cable talk shows.

The Washington Post (12/2, Baker, Ricks, 690K) says the ISG "plans to recommend that the U.S. military mission shift to advising, training and supporting Iraqi forces, who would take the lead in securing their country. As part of that, U.S. soldiers would increasingly embed with Iraqi troops to guide them." The ISG "tries to find a middle road between President Bush's adamant refusal to leave Iraq until the job is done and Democratic demands to pull out U.S. troops. But in achieving unanimity among its Republican and Democratic members, the commission has outlined a strategy with its own political and military risks."

Under the headline "Study Group To Echo Bush," the Washington Times (12/2, Scarborough, 88K) says Bush and the ISG "are not far apart when it comes to a final plan for getting U.S. troops out of Iraq." Gen. Benjamin Mixon, a senior commander in Iraq, said the group's "idea to shift more duties to Iraqis and gradually pull out forces is current Pentagon policy." The Times finds Bush and the ISG "essentially" opposing an "immediate" pullout and a "date-certain timeline"; however, the group seeks "a goal of 18 months to pull out most combat troops."

NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 3, 2:50, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "White House officials say the President will decide about course corrections in Iraq before Christmas. But despite expectations of major change, tonight officials insist the President's core war strategy is sound. ... Leading Democrats, however, remain critical saying the President was wrong this week to give an open-ended commitment on US troop presence." Sen. Carl Levin: "It's wrong. It takes the pressure off the Iraqis to do what only they can do."

The Wall Street Journal (12/2, A2, Seib, 2.04M) reports that the study "will be only the beginning of a Washington rethink." The Journal notes the existence of other efforts, "some perhaps equally important. Inside the Pentagon, a team of three colonels has been outlining a series of options for Gen. Peter Pace." The Pace group "has looked far more favorably on temporarily increasing the size of the U.S. force in Baghdad in an effort to get the city under control. It also is pushing a far more robust program of American military advisers," while NSA Stephen Hadley "is emerging as a kind of presidential fix-it man on Iraq" and is "quietly canvassing" for advice on Iraq. Finally, "the new Democratic majority in Congress is about to try to put its own stamp on Iraq policy. ... The risk for the White House is that the situation could shift rapidly from too few ideas on Iraq to too many disjointed ones."

The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 2, 2:00, Plante, 7.66M) reported, "Long-time Middle East diplomat Martin Indyk says forget victory, the US is staring defeat in the face." Indyk: "What we immediately need to be focused on is preventing the situation in Iraq affecting our other interests in the region." Plante: "It's precisely to keep the region from exploding that the Baker commission is expected to recommend a major diplomatic initiative, including US talks with Iran and Syria, something the President has consistently rejected. As one senior White House official put it: If that's the recommendation, everyone here will be underwhelmed."

Officials Expect No Big Changes In Iraq Policy. The Washington Post (12/2, Wright, 690K) reports, "With the Iraq Study Group report due on Wednesday, the Bush administration has notified allies that it will not budge on certain aspects of Iraq policy, whatever recommendations are put forth by the independent panel of 10 prominent Republicans and Democrats." State and NSC officials spoke "at a private briefing for diplomats" last Wednesday, according to unnamed diplomats at the briefing. The officials "said any recommendations for policy shifts would have to fit in with long-term U.S. strategic objectives for Iraq, including ensuring that the nation can govern and defend itself and that it is stable, not a threat to neighbors, and an ally in the fight against terrorism." They gave "a further indication that the White House may be digging in its heels" by stressing that Bush "will have the last word on what happens next and will not succumb to outside pressure."

Baker, Hamilton Have "Herculean" Task. The AP (12/1, Yen) reports James Baker and Lee Hamilton "face a Herculean task of extricating the U.S. from an increasingly unpopular war. … Preliminary details of their unanimous report, which calls for a gradual troop pullback without setting firm timetables and more regional diplomacy, are already generating fire from some Democrats in Congress, while President Bush is deriding the notion of a graceful exit as having 'no realism to it whatsoever.'" The co-chairmen's "diplomatic powers and cache of bipartisan goodwill" may patch the rift.

Legislators Comment On ISG Report. Sen. John Cornyn said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/1, Blitzer), "I think the Pentagon is going to make clear that it thinks we have three options: go big, go long or go home. And I think the only one that has a reasonable chance of success is growing the size of our troop level in Baghdad so we can not only clear dangerous areas, we can actually hold them."

Sen. Christopher Dodd said on MSNBC (12/1, Jansing), "Maybe the more important suggestion, at least in terms of timing, is the suggestion by the Baker-Hamilton report that the Administration begin to deal regionally with this issue, to begin talking to people that are not our friends and in fact, in some cases, are our enemies, but recognizing we're going to have to deal with the regional aspects of this problem. ... That suggestion by this study group may be the far more important suggestion than actually the timing of when our troops come or leave."

Rep. Jack Murtha said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/1, Blitzer), "The commission is saying let's redeploy, let's change the policy of stay the course to redeployment. The problem, as I understand it, and I haven't seen the report, but the problem is they say it depends on the circumstances on the ground. Well, if it depends on circumstances on the ground it's not a lot different from what President Bush is saying. And then President Bush says he's going to ignore it anyway.."

Rep. Dennis Kucinich said on Fox News' Your World (12/1, Cavuto), "The American people voted in November for a dramatic change in Iraq. They want out. And I think that Congress has a responsibility to take this country in that direction."

Bush Will Meet Head Of Iraqi Shiite Party, Sunni VP. ABC World News (12/1, story 3, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush, back from the summit, says he'll meet with another powerful Iraqi at the White House on Monday. He heads the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament, and is one of the most influential leaders of Iraq's Shiite majority." The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 2, 2:00, Plante, 7.66M), reported bdul Aziz al-Hakim "heads Iraq's largest Shiite sect. His Badr militia rivals the Mahdi Army of Moqtada al-Sadr." The NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 3, 2:50, Gregory, 9.87M) called it "an effort aides say to keep up pressure on Iraq's political leaders to end the bloodletting."

The New York Times (12/2, Sanger, Wong, 1.16M) reports that the meeting is "the latest step in a burst of new administration attempts to try different approaches to bolstering the fragile Iraqi government." The Times says the "effort is part of a White House strategy that calls for reaching out to a wider circle of Iraqi politicians to give greater support to the weak government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, and lessen his dependence on Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric." However, the endeavor "immerses Washington even deeper into Baghdad's byzantine coalition politics, and it risks being interpreted in Baghdad as a sign that Mr. Bush is hedging his bets." This move "comes at a time when the administration is overhauling its approach to dealing with Iraq's leadership, though there are arguments over how deeply Washington can involve itself in the politics of a country in such political turmoil."

The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Gerstenzang, 850K) also reports the pending meetings, adding, "In the last seven months, Hashimi has lost a sister and a brother to Iraq's civil war."

US Rethinking Goal Of Iraq Unification. The AP (12/2, Gearan) reports President Bush "is becoming more personally involved in Iraq's fragmented politics as his administration reevaluates efforts to unite different Iraqi groups in an attempt to preserve U.S. options. ... Bush is reaching out on Monday to another Shiite politician, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, to seek ways to end the violence and keep Iraq's unity government intact. To show he's not choosing sides, Bush is planning to meet next month with Iraq's Sunni Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, according to a senior administration official." However, "the administration is also debating whether to abandon U.S. efforts to bring Sunni insurgents into the political process to stabilize Iraq and instead leave that outreach to the majority Shiites and Iraq's third major group, the Kurds, a senior U.S official said. No decision has been made."

Maliki Is Criticized Amidst Violence. The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has attempted to reassert his authority in recent weeks, confronting U.S. leaders, demanding more control over national security and weighing plans to reconfigure his Cabinet. ... But Iraqi leaders and citizens were skeptical Friday that the prime minister could fight the rising tide of civil war." On Friday, "those gathering at mosques across Iraq, Sunni and Shiite, said they saw Maliki's meeting with Bush as largely unproductive, and yet another sign their country was falling apart."

Reporter Interprets Bush, Maliki Body Language. An analysis of Bush's meeting this week with Maliki in the New York Times (12/2, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports, "Nobody expected a love fest… As they wrapped up their breakfast at the Four Seasons hotel in Amman on Thursday morning, aides warned that reporters…would be on the lookout for any sign of bad blood. That's when the president hugged the prime minister." The Times adds, "When the president heaped praise upon the prime minister, lauding him for his courage, Mr. Maliki barely looked Mr. Bush's way. Though much was made afterward of the body language, White House officials blamed the language barrier, saying each man was listening intently into his earpiece for a translation of the other's words." The Times calls their relationship "a complicated entanglement. Mr. Bush, who has staked his presidency on success in Iraq, needs the Maliki government as an ally. But Mr. Maliki's survival depends, in part, on his ability to demonstrate that he is his own man, not an American puppet."

Salhani Says All-Out Shiite-Sunni War Could Tie Down Fundamentalists. In a commentary for the Washington Times (12/2, 88K), UPI editor Claude Salhani writes, "And when it comes to pulling U.S. forces out of Iraq there are two opposing schools of thought. The first is that the United States will not withdraw from Iraq until the security void can be filled (by Iraqis) to prevent further deterioration in what is already being called a civil war. ... The second school of thought -- albeit a rather Machiavellian one -- sees a unique 'opportunity' to entangle the Muslim world in a fratricidal war that would keep Islamic forces occupied for years, if not decades, to come. ... for some policymakers it could provide the answer to what they perceive as a rising threat that three years of continued all-out war by the world's best-armed, best-trained, best-equipped and most motivated army could not resolve. Under this scenario, Saudi troops, along with billions of Saudi petro-dollars, would be tied up for years fighting Iranian-backed insurgents in Iraq. ... The thinking supporting that theory is that this would tie down fundamentalist forces on both sides for years to come."

US, Iraqi Forces Launch Baghdad Raids. The Washington Post/AP (12/2, Wagner) reports, "U.S. and Iraqi forces launched six raids against insurgents Friday, including one that killed at least three Iraqis and another in which American forces wounded an Iraqi female who the U.S. command said was being used as a 'human shield.' The U.S. military also reported that an American soldier was killed in combat in the capital Thursday. ... Iraqi soldiers backed by U.S. helicopters swept through Fadhil, one of the oldest areas of Baghdad, and engaged in house-to-house combat, police Lt. Ali Muhsin said. The neighborhood is about a mile from the heavily fortified Green Zone." The Post adds of other fighting in "the Taji area," "It was the fourth time this week that a female Iraqi civilian has been killed or wounded in crossfire between U.S. forces and insurgents."

Iraq Takes Over Army Division From US. The Financial Times (12/2, Dinmore) reports, "Iraq's government on Friday took command over another army division in the north, a US general announced, in an apparent demonstration of the US's commitment to accelerate the handover of military control to Nouri al-Maliki, prime minister.

... Mr Bush said he had listened to Mr Maliki's 'frustration' at not having the tools to do his job." Gen. Benjamin Mixon said that "the remaining two northern divisions would follow by February 2007." The Times adds, "US officials have expressed concern over too rapid a transfer of authority, because of a lack of training and fears that some Iraqi troops uphold their sectarian allegiances above their loyalty to the state. Rogue units of Iraq's police forces – which are not under US control – have been accused of carrying out extrajudicial killings and torture."

The AP (12/1, Baldor) reports that Gen. Mixon "said Friday the transfer of responsibility for security from U.S. to Iraqi forces, reportedly among the recommendations of a special study group, already is under way." Mixon "said he is on track to place all four Iraqi army divisions in his area under Iraqi control by March."

The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 2, 2:00, Plante, 7.66M) reported, "In his meeting with the President yesterday, Iraq's prime minister insisted he could gain control of the sectarian violence if he had complete control of security forces. Mr. Bush agreed to speed that up and today the US commander of coalition forces in northern Iraq said that control of four Iraqi divisions will be transferred to Baghdad by March."

Iraqi Forces Train In Jordan. On ABC World News 12/1, story 3, 2:35, McCarthy) reported on a training site for Iraqi forces in the Jordanian desert, where 133,000 troops and 160,000 police "have been trained since the war began." Maliki "said this week, his forces will be ready to take over for the US within six months, a claim US military experts dispute." Ex-Army Vice Chief of Staff Gen. Jack Keane: "It's very difficult to imagine that in the next six months, these forces could be ready to assume responsibility in Iraq." McCarthy: "No amount of US advisers can teach Iraqis to be impartial in a country where religious identity has become a matter of life or death. Sectarian conflict can only be overcome if Maliki starts genuine reconciliation talks between Sunnis and Shiites. And that's something so far he's failed to deliver."

US Troops In Iraq Take On New Role. The AP (12/1, Burns) reports, "These are not normal times — not in a chaotic Iraq where President Bush is banking on improving Iraqi security forces so the American military can begin to pull out, or at least pull back. U.S. soldiers and Marines are being plucked out of combat positions to be "embedded" with Iraqi army and police units as trainers and advisers. ... U.S. commanders see this effort as the key to winding down American combat action in a country wracked by internal strife." However, "U.S. advisers are giving the program mixed reviews. Some of them complain they spend much of their time making sure Iraqi soldiers are paid and have the equipment they need." The AP adds, "In Vietnam the advising gave way to the introduction of hundreds of thousands of U.S. combat forces, whereas in Iraq the advisers are seen as a way to get combat forces out."

Negroponte Says Iraq's Cities Insecure, Enemy Hard To Spot. The AP (12/1) reports National Intelligence Director John Negroponte "says Iraq's cities are less secure and the enemy harder to identify in comparison to the situation in much of Vietnam when he served as a U.S. diplomat there in the 1960s. ... Negroponte said he sees more differences than similarities between the two conflicts. In Vietnam, for example, there was a clear enemy, given Soviet support of the North Vietnamese." He stated, "In Vietnam, the cities were secure. The province capitals were secure." Negroponte "said Iraqis must take more responsibility for their security and defense. The key, he said, is Baghdad, where the violence is greatest.."

Last Italian Troops Leave Iraq. AFP (12/1, Deshmukh) reports, "The last Italian troops in Iraq have headed home as Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki said his forces could take over the battered nation's security by June 2007. ... The Italians were deployed in Iraq's south along with British, Australians and Romanian forces. At least 31 Italian soldiers have been killed in Iraq since 2003. The troops were stationed in Nasiriyah, the provincial seat of Dhi Qar, a relatively peaceful region compared with Iraq's central and western regions where US forces are battling a raging insurgency and a brutal sectarian conflict."

Iraqi Professor Urges Dialogue With Iran, Syria. The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Perry, 850K) reports on refugee professor Naba Saleem Hadid: "Her message is simple: While life under Saddam Hussein was horrible, because of the violence and power struggles, life since the U.S. invasion is worse." While not calling for an American pullout, "she feels it is imperative for President Bush to work with leaders in Iran and Syria to cobble together a regional solution to suppressing the violence and repairing the massive damage."

Iraqi Civilian Death Toll Rises 43% In November. The AP (12/1, Gamel) reports, "An Interior Ministry official said Friday that 1,846 civilians were killed in Iraq in November, a 43 percent increase from the estimated toll in October." The October estimate was 1,289 dead. The AP adds, "Rising sectarian tensions have pushed the country toward the verge of civil war," saying that its own November count was 1,923.

Kasparov Claims US Is Overfocused On Iraq, Needs To Examine "Big Picture." In a commentary for the Wall Street Journal (12/2, 2.04M), former chess champion and political activist Gerry Kasparov writes, "Thirty years as a chess player ingrained in me the importance of never losing sight of the big picture. ... America and its allies are so focused on Iraq they are ceding territory all over the map. ... This dire situation is a result of the only thing worse than a failed strategy: the inability to recognize, or to admit, that a strategy has failed. Since the invasion of Iraq in March 2003, North Korea has tested a nuclear weapon. Iran is openly boasting of its uranium enrichment program while pouring money into Hezbollah and Hamas. A resurgent Taliban is on the rise in Afghanistan. Nearly off the radar, Somalia is becoming an al Qaeda haven. ... From Caracas to Moscow to Pyongyang, everyone follows their own agenda while ignoring President Bush and the U.N. ... So what then, to do? ... if allied troops leave Iraq, I won't say things can't get worse -- if we've learned anything, it's that things in the Middle East can always get worse; but at least the current deadly dynamic would be changed."

Afghan District Strikes Own Deal With Taliban. The New York Times (12/2, Gall, 1.16M) reports in a 1,583 word front page article, "After a series of bruising battles between British troops and Taliban fighters, the Afghan government struck a peace deal with tribal elders in Helmand Province, arranging for a cease-fire and the withdrawal of both sides from one southern district." The deal brought "welcome peace" but also "sharply divided former government officials, legislators and ordinary Afghans. ... Some say the agreement points the way forward in bringing peace to war-torn parts of the country. Others warn that it sets a dangerous precedent and represents a capitulation to the Taliban and a potential reversal of five years of American policy to build a strong central government."

Afghan Opium Crop Sets Record, Marking Failure Of Eradication Efforts. The Washington Post (12/2, DeYoung, 690K) reports in a front page article, "Opium production in Afghanistan, which provides more than 90 percent of the world's heroin, broke all records in 2006, reaching a historic high despite ongoing U.S.-sponsored eradication efforts, the Bush administration reported yesterday. In addition to a 26 percent production increase over past year -- for a total of 5,644 metric tons -- the amount of land under cultivation in opium poppies grew by 61 percent." The news, called "disappointing" by White House drug czar John Walters, adds to the alarm of US officials who "have increasingly described the drug trade as a problem that rivals and in some ways exceeds the Taliban, threatening to derail other aspects of U.S. policy." The Post adds, "After the overthrow of the Taliban government by U.S. forces in the fall of that year, the Bush administration said that keeping a lid on production was among its highest priorities. But corruption and alliances formed by Washington and the Afghan government with anti-Taliban tribal chieftains, some of whom are believed to be deeply involved in the trade, undercut the effort."

DOJ:

Buchanan Named Head Of DOJ's Office On Violence Against Women. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (12/2, Buckley) reports, "Mary Beth Buchanan has been named acting director of the Justice Department's Office on Violence Against Women." The PTR continues, "This Washington, D.C.-based office administers financial and technical assistance to communities around the country that are creating programs, policies and practices aimed at ending domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault and stalking. … OVW's mission is to provide leadership in developing the nation's capacity to reduce violence against women through implementation of the Violence Against Women Act. The Office's ultimate goal is to change perceptions about violence against women so that those crimes are considered unacceptable and no longer tolerated in our society." The PTR adds, "As director, Buchanan will oversee the administration of approximately $400 million in grant funding. One of the program areas the grants will go to is the Campus Program. … The Grants to Reduce Violent Crimes Against Women on Campus program is designed to encourage institutions of higher education to adopt comprehensive, coordinated responses to violent crimes against women on campuses, including sexual assault, stalking, domestic violence, and dating violence. … Buchanan will continue to serve as United States Attorney for Western Pennsylvania in addition to her new challenges leading the OVW. … Appointed by President George W. Bush Sept. 5, 2001, and confirmed by the United States Senate Sept. 14, 2001, Buchanan is the first woman and youngest person in Pennsylvania's history to be presidentially appointed to this position."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Seeks Testimony Of Former Fidelity Trader's Mother. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, B3, Levitz) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission is trying to force the mother of a former Fidelity Investments trader to testify about purchase of shares made in her account at about the time the mutual-fund titan was buying the same security." The Journal continues, "Under securities laws, money managers and traders are forbidden from making a personal profit from their inside market knowledge of what their company is buying or selling, or from passing that information to others. Using that advance knowledge -- a practice often called 'front-running' -- can be valuable because stocks often rise after big firms like Fidelity make a purchase. … In a filing in U.S. District Court in Boston, the SEC says it wants to compel testimony from Concetta Donovan, mother of former Fidelity trader David Donovan Jr. Along with testimony, the SEC also wants both of Mr. Donovan's parents to produce documents in connection with the purchase of Covad Communications Group Inc. stock in Ms. Donovan's brokerage account in 2003. The SEC's filing says it is also investigating trading based on "material nonpublic information" in the shares of Comverse Technology Inc., and CellStar Corp. and certain other unidentified securities, though it provided few details." The Journal adds, "Richard E. Nicolazzo, a spokesman for Mr. Donovan, said 'he never took any actions that violated company policies and procedures' while at Fidelity and 'remains confident that when the inquiries are completed he will be vindicated.' … A lawyer for Concetta Donovan has said her client has been unable to testify because she is on pain medications 'that affect her ability to think clearly and process information,' the SEC filing said. … Fidelity spokeswoman Anne Crowley said the Boston firm alerted regulators to matters concerning Mr. Donovan in early 2005. He left the company in December 2004, according to National Association of Securities Dealers records."

The New York Times/Bloomberg (12/2) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission asked a federal court to force the parents of a former Fidelity Investments trader to cooperate in an investigation of whether they bought stock based on nonpublic information from their son." Bloomberg continues, "The parents, Concetta and David Donovan Sr., failed to comply with subpoenas issued in April 2005 in connection with their purchase of Covad Communications shares in 2003, according to a filing made by the S.E.C. Thursday in Federal District Court in Boston. Their son, David Donovan Jr., was a trader at Fidelity until March 2005, when he left the company. … The S.E.C. asserts in an affidavit that 55,000 Covad shares were purchased by a brokerage account owned by Concetta Donovan in August 2003 and were sold a month later for a profit of $89,775." Bloomberg notes, "The S.E.C. asked the court to order Concetta and David Donovan Sr. to provide documents and testify, and to show why they cannot comply with the subpoenas."

Judge Dismisses Lerach's Enron Suit Against Alliance Capital. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, B3, Lattman) reports, "The federal judge overseeing the Enron Corp. shareholders' class-action lawsuit has dismissed a $1 billion claim brought by plaintiffs' lawyer William Lerach against investment firm Alliance Capital Management LP, now known as AllianceBernstein LP." The Journal continues, "In a step unusual in securities class-action cases, U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon in Houston ordered the plaintiffs to pay Alliance's attorney's fees. She also stated that the payment of attorney's fees would be "more appropriate" to "be borne" by plaintiffs' counsel. … 'We're disappointed in her ruling but Judge Harmon calls 'em as she sees 'em,' said Mr. Lerach of Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins LLP. He added that he hopes the judge may change her view or that the plaintiffs may prevail on the issue on appeal, but he says that if attorney's fees 'are going to be paid, we're the ones who are going to pay them.'" The Journal adds, "LThe class-action lawsuit was brought against investment firms for alleged fraud related to their underwriting of Enron securities. … This particular claim concerned the service of an Alliance executive, Frank Savage, on Enron's board of directors and his signing of a false registration statement for the issuance of

$1 billion of Enron bonds. … The shareholders alleged that Alliance had placed Mr. Savage on Enron's board to serve its own interest or, at the very least, approved Mr. Savage's Enron board service and thus controlled his actions on the board."

The New York Times (12/2, Norris) reports, "In a decision that she conceded flies in the face of previous rulings by other courts, a federal judge in Houston has ordered the law firm of William S. Lerach, a leading class-action lawyer, to pay the legal fees and costs of a company he sued." The Times continues, "The company, Alliance Capital, a money management firm, was sued by Mr. Lerach's firm as part of a large Enron class-action case. The lawsuit argued that Alliance should be held responsible for the Enron fraud because an Alliance official was also a director of Enron. … In a decision issued late Thursday, Judge Melinda Harmon of Federal District Court issued a summary judgment dismissing the case against Alliance, and also invoked a rule requiring the payment of Alliance's legal fees by the plaintiff's lawyer, on the ground that the case was pursued after it became clear it was without merit. The decision appears to be the first in which a law firm, and not the plaintiff, has been ordered to pay under that section of the securities law. … It is not clear how much the ruling will cost the Lerach firm, Lerach, Coughlin, Stoia, Geller, Rudman & Robbins of San Diego. Alliance, now known as AllianceBernstein, was directed to submit its bills for the months since Mr. Lerach's firm should have known the case was unreasonable."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Maryland Rabbi Sentenced In Internet Sex Sting. The Washington Post (12/2, B3, Markon) reports, "A Maryland rabbi caught in a television sting operation was sentenced to 6 1/2 years in prison yesterday for trying to solicit sex from a 13-year-old boy over the Internet." The Post continues, "David A. Kaye, 56, told the judge that he traveled to Herndon for what he thought would be sex with a boy 'as a cry out for help to fight my personal demons.' Sobbing as he acknowledged his father, who sat in the courtroom in a wheelchair, Kaye said his conviction had made him face 'the reality of who I am. . . . I know I need help. I pray that God allows me to get that help.'" The Post adds, "Kaye's attorney, Peter D. Greenspun, said the rabbi, who was featured last year on the 'To Catch a Predator' series on 'Dateline NBC,' kept his sexuality secret and spent thousands of hours chatting online in search of liaisons. … Kaye thought that he was chatting online with a young adult, Greenspun said. He said Kaye, who is divorced, is in therapy, and he urged a sentence on the low end of federal guidelines, which recommended a term of 63 to 78 months in prison. … But U.S. District Judge James C. Cacheris in Alexandria settled on 78 months and said Kaye would then face 10 years of supervised release. The judge said that during that time, Kaye will be forbidden to accept any job involving children, and he ordered him to never be around children younger than 18 without an adult present. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Ed Power had called for a tough sentence and said Kaye's conduct was 'a crime of violence in which he essentially tried to rape a 13-year-old boy.' … U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg said the lesson of the case 'is pretty simple: Stay away from our children.'"

The AP (12/2, Barakat) reports, "During yesterday's hearing, prosecutors said Kaye's crime was not an isolated incident and submitted affidavits from others who claimed Kaye engaged in improper conduct, including one incident at a youth camp as far back as 1974." The AP continues, "Details of that incident were not discussed, and the affidavits are under seal. Kaye denied any improper conduct. … The 78-month sentence from U.S. District Judge James Cacheris was at the high end of federal sentencing guidelines, and will be followed by an unusually long period of supervised release -- 10 years." The AP notes, "Kaye also will be required to register as a sex offender and is barred from having unsupervised contact with minors."

Consultant Pleads Guilty In Pennsylvania Bridge Commission Scam. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/2, Callas) reports, "Robert Stears, a consultant and lobbyist, pleaded guilty today to defrauding the Burlington County Bridge Commission of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and failing to pay federal taxes for six years." The Inquirer continues, "During his plea hearing before U.S. District Judge Jerome B. Simandle, Stears, 51, answered 'yes' to 31 allegations, holding his head in his hands as the list continued. … He admitted that he submitted inflated and fraudulent bills to the bridge commission from 1997 to 2003. He also did not file income tax forms from 1999 to 2004." The Inquirer adds, "In pleading guilty, Stears gave up his right to an appeal. His sentencing date is scheduled for March 30, and he faces up to 25 years in prison. … Stears told the court he created the Strategy Group, a Trenton consulting firm that performed lobbying and public relations work for the commission from 1997 to 2002. Stears admitted that he was the sole liaison between the commission and the consulting group and was aware of "virtually all transactions," the U.S. Justice Department said. Stears also said he prepared the invoices submitted to the commission monthly. … The company paid the group $300,000 a year from 1997-1999 and more than $500,000 a year from 2000 to 2002." The Inquirer notes, "In 2002, Stears received more than $300,000 in taxable income on which he did not pay income taxes; he owes $112,863 in taxes on that alone. He admitted that he tried to hide that money from the government in a checking account under the name of his new venture: Governmental Strategies. He did not file federal income taxes from 1999 to 2004, the justice department said."

Smartmatic Denies Tax, Bribery Allegations. The Miami Herald (12/2, Chardy, Weaver) reports, "Smartmatic, an international company with offices in Boca Raton, has contacted the Justice Department to deny allegations that its Venezuelan owners paid a bribe to secure a $91 million contract to supply electronic voting machines in Venezuela, an attorney for the firm said Friday. … 'We have informally told the Justice Department that there is no basis for these allegations,' said Jeffrey Bialos, a Washington, D.C. attorney retained by Smartmatic. … He said Justice officials told the company this fall that it was not the target of a criminal investigation, nor has it received any subpoenas. … The company, incorporated in Delaware, also denied allegations that it failed to pay U.S. income taxes." The Herald continues, "Smartmatic's denials mark yet another chapter in the convoluted saga of the Boca Raton firm that last year bought Sequoia Voting Systems of Oakland, Calif., one of the nation's leading suppliers of electronic voting machines. Sequoia machines operate in Washington, D.C. and 16 states, including four counties in Florida: Palm Beach, Indian River, Hillsborough and Pinellas. Smartmatic machines will be used in Sunday's presidential election in Venezuela. … Smartmatic also is being investigated by a Treasury-led panel over whether the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, increasingly at odds with President Bush, is a secret business partner. Smartmatic has denied any link to the Chávez government." The Herald notes, "In another development, Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y., who helped spark the Smartmatic probe by the Treasury-led Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, sent a letter Thursday to Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson Jr. to urge his agency to publicize its findings as soon as the review is completed. … The Wall Street Journal reported Friday that the Justice Department has been probing Smartmatic for possible violations of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and possible tax evasion. A Justice Department spokesman on Friday refused to comment."

Former Connecticut Governor's Aide Awaits Sentencing On Corruption Charges. The New York Times (12/2, Cowan) reports, "To many people, Lawrence E. Alibozek epitomized much that was wrong with the ill fated administration of Gov. John G. Rowland of Connecticut. … From the moment Mr. Alibozek joined the governor's office as his deputy chief of staff in the fall of 1997, the improper favors flowed. It started with $9,500 from a state contractor so that he could buy a new car. Later, Mr. Alibozek's boss, Peter N. Ellef, handed him an envelope stuffed with cash in the Capitol parking lot with a promise of more to come." The Times continues, "After five years, enough money and gifts had changed hands at the highest levels of state government that federal prosecutors needed 22 pages to list everything that was taken and to tell a bit of the stories behind them. … In the case of Mr. Alibozek, there were limousine rides to hotels in Boston and New York, vacations in Maine and Florida, the use of a 65-foot yacht, and dinners and getaways for him and his mistress, a state official. There were the 40 gold coins he buried in his backyard — a symbol of corruption at its most blatant — that he had accepted in exchange for steering a contract. … But what the public did not know was how much the government's successful prosecution of Mr. Rowland on bid-rigging charges, which drove him from office in his third term, depended on Mr. Alibozek's cooperation, and the price he has paid." The Times notes, "Federal prosecutors advised Mr. Alibozek not to comment because they needed his testimony at a trial of his former associates. His own sentencing was put off until their cases were resolved so that the value of his assertions could be assessed. His lawyer, William T. Gerace, said yesterday: 'He's in limbo right now. He can't move on, and he'd like to.' … But now that those cases have been successfully prosecuted, Mr. Alibozek's own sentencing is scheduled for January, suggesting that the impasse may be ending. It will be a cathartic end to a long-running investigation in which he was derided as an unstable informer and a symbol for much of the misconduct, and later was the subject of harassment."

Chicago Water Department Employee Indicted In Political Hiring Probe. The Chicago Tribune (12/2, Bush, Mihalopoulos) reported, "Pressing forward with their investigation of Mayor Richard Daley's political machine, federal prosecutors unsealed an indictment Friday against a campaign coordinator in the powerful Hispanic Democratic Organization." John Resa, "an employee with the city's Water Management Department, was charged with lying when he told a grand jury that he had not sought city jobs to reward campaign workers for HDO. Prosecutors alleged that Resa regularly lobbied his superiors in HDO--including a former high-ranking city official--to get jobs, promotions and other benefits for his political workers. He pleaded not guilty Friday morning. Resa's indictment offered a new glimpse into how authorities are homing in on HDO, which for years was the most potent street army in Daley's political organization." The Chicago Sun-Times (12/2, Korecki, Novak) added, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins said Resa headed a political army made up of 70 to 80 volunteers. 'This is part of a bigger investigation that does allege a scheme,' Collins said. … Prosecutors call the charges against Resa an outgrowth of the Hired Truck federal probe," and he "is the 45th person charged in the investigation.

FBI Used New "Roving Bug" Technique In Genovese Probe. CNET News.com (12/1, McCullagh, Broache, 2:20 p.m. PST) reported, "The FBI appears to have begun using a novel form of electronic surveillance in criminal investigations: remotely activating a mobile phone's microphone and using it to eavesdrop on nearby conversations. The technique is called a 'roving bug,' and was approved by top U.S. Department of Justice officials for use against members of a New York organized crime family who were wary of conventional surveillance techniques such as tailing a suspect or wiretapping him. Nextel cell phones owned by two alleged mobsters, John Ardito and his attorney Peter Peluso, were used by the FBI to listen in on nearby conversations. The FBI views Ardito as one of the most powerful men in the Genovese family." CNET noted, "While the Genovese crime family prosecution appears to be the first time a remote-eavesdropping mechanism has been used in a criminal case, the technique has been discussed in security circles for years." In a ruling released last week, US District Judge Lewis Kaplan "concluded that the 'roving bugs' were legally permitted to capture hundreds of hours of conversations because the FBI had obtained a court order and alternatives probably wouldn't work."

New Hampshire Democrats Settle 2002 Phone-Jamming Suit. The New York Times (12/2) reports the New Hampshire Democratic Party, "which had sought compensation in an Election Day 2002 phone-jamming scheme, settled its lawsuit against the Republican Party for an undisclosed sum, state Republicans said. The case had been expected to go to trial Monday. Republicans had hired a telemarketing firm to place hundreds of hang-up calls to phone banks for the Democrats and the Manchester firefighters' union, a nonpartisan group offering rides to the polls."

Las Vegas Police Recommend No Charges Against Gibbons. The Los Angeles Times (12/2) reports Las Vegas police "said they would recommend that no criminal charges be filed" against Nevada Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons, "who was accused by a cocktail waitress of assaulting her in a parking garage three weeks before election day. The investigation into Chrissy Mazzeo's accusation has been completed and sent to Clark County Dist. Atty. David Roger," who now "has the final say as to whether" Gibbons will face charges.

Los Angeles Archdiocese Settles 45 Sex Abuse Cases For $60 Million. The Washington Post (12/2, A2, Pomfret) reports, "Almost five years after a sex scandal erupted within the Roman Catholic Church, the nation's largest archdiocese announced Friday that it will pay $60 million to settle 45 lawsuits alleging sex abuse by priests." The Post continues, "The deal, which involves incidents alleged to have occurred before 1955 and after 1986, constitutes the largest settlement made by the archdiocese and follows years of legal battles waged under the leadership of Cardinal Roger Mahony. The archdiocese still faces more than 500 lawsuits by other individuals alleging sexual abuse." The Post adds, "Ray Boucher, the lead plaintiff's attorney, said the settlement involved 22 priests who were accused of a broad spectrum of sexual behavior, including impregnating a woman and multiple acts of sodomy against young boys. "You have serial pedophiles and priests accused of one or two acts," he said. The archdiocese will pay $52 million and religious orders $8 million, he said. … Jeff Anderson, another attorney in the case, said a main sticking point between the victims and the archdiocese was not so much the money but the victims' demands that documents held by the church related to sexual abuse be released to the public."

The New York Times (12/2, Chang) reports, "The average payment of about $1.3 million to each plaintiff is among the highest in a sexual abuse settlement involving clergy members. In October, the archdiocese settled seven other claims for a total of $10 million. … The archdiocese will pay $40 million of the settlement from its central operations fund with the rest coming from insurance money and the religious orders of the 25 accused clergymen. The money will not be taken from individual parishes, Cardinal Roger M. Mahony, the head of the archdiocese, said in a telephone interview." The Times adds, "Over 500 sexual abuse lawsuits are still pending against the archdiocese, the country's largest. Payouts in those cases would come mostly from insurance, but the archdiocese may have to sell property or reduce ministry services to make up the difference, Cardinal Mahony said. … 'Is it going to hurt? Oh sure, we could have used the money for other pastoral works,' he said. 'But it's also an acknowledgment and a recognition of our responsibility, that the church failed these people. The church accepts responsibility, and I accept responsibility.'"

The AP (12/2) reports, "Negotiations on the deal had been in progress for at least a year but were held up because attorneys for the plaintiffs wanted the church to release the accused priests' private files. … The agreement calls for an independent judge to review those files and decide which documents can be released to the victims. That process is expected to take several months."

CIVIL LAW:

SCOTUS To Hear Case Involving Office Of Faith-Based Initiatives. The New York Times (12/2, A11, Greenhouse) reports the Supreme Court "agreed Friday to decide whether private citizens are entitled to go to court to challenge activities of the White House office in charge of the Bush administration's religion-based initiative. A lower court had blocked a lawsuit challenging conferences the White House office holds for the purpose of teaching religious organizations how to apply and compete for federal grants. That constitutional challenge, by a group advocating the strict separation of church and state, was reinstated by an appeals court; the administration in turn appealed to the Supreme Court. … In its lawsuit challenging the White House conferences, filed in Federal District Court in Madison, Wis., in 2004, an organization called the Freedom From Religion Foundation named as defendants more than a dozen administration officials who oversaw or participated in the conferences." Judge John C. Shabaz of Federal District Court "dismissed the lawsuit for lack of standing, finding that the officials' activities were not sufficiently tied to specific Congressional appropriations. Taxpayers' objections to the use of general appropriations could not be a basis for standing, he said. The president's Faith-Based and Community Initiative was created through a series of executive orders and not by Congress, he noted."

Blind Community Welcomes Ruling On US Currency. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (12/2, Johnson) reports, "In a world where trust is in short supply, the kindness of strangers has always worked for Korene Kegg. … 'The five's on top,' said Lori Waleslagle, 26, of Debbie's Diner in Greenfield, as she handed back $9 in change to Kegg." The PTR continues, "Kegg, who has been blind since she was 5, can't possibly know if Waleslagle is telling the truth; still, the Greenfield woman instinctively folds what she believes to be that five neatly in half and then in half again, and keeps it separate from what presumably are four ones, after purchasing a hot tea from Waleslagle. … After living 22 years on Greenfield Avenue, Kegg, 49, said she knows the neighborhood well enough to trust most people. … Kegg's need for others to distinguish paper money might end if a recent court ruling holds." The PTR adds, "The American Council of the Blind filed a lawsuit four years ago in U.S. District Court in Washington, charging that the U.S. Treasury Department discriminates against the blind by not distinguishing denominations of paper money by size or feel. … The currency violates Section 504 of the federal Rehabilitation Act, which says the federal government shall not discriminate, said Day Al-Mohamed, director of advocacy and governmental affairs for the council. .. .U.S. District Judge James Roberston this week ordered the government to fix the problem. … The Justice Department has until Friday to decide whether to appeal to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, said Charles Miller, spokesman for the Justice Department's civil division, which is defending the Treasury Department in the case. … If it chooses not to appeal, Miller said, the government has 30 days from Tuesday's decision to discuss how to fix the problem."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Opens Civil Rights Investigation Of Florida Police Shooting. The AP (12/2) reported that in Fort Lauderdale, "The FBI has begun a civil rights investigation into the case of unarmed black man shot dead by police while driving a carjacked sport utility vehicle, authorities said. Troy Eddines, 21, was killed and Travis Jackson was wounded when the officers fired on the stolen vehicle they were riding in Tuesday. Two officers had pulled over the SUV, which reversed as they approached and hit one of them in the leg, authorities said." The AP noted, "The FBI opened its investigation Thursday after receiving phone calls from City Commissioner Carlton Moore and the NAACP, FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said. The death is the fourth fatal shooting by Fort Lauderdale police this year, authorities said."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (12/2, Johnson, Lewis) reported, "Two state legislators on Friday joined the chorus of black leaders calling for greater scrutiny of the Fort Lauderdale Police Department following this week's fatal police shooting." Rep. Perry Thurston "wrote a letter asking the Florida Department of Law Enforcement to investigate the three shootings that involved black men, saying his constituents 'question the tactics of our police department.'" Meanwhile, Sen. Mandy Dawson "said she would ask Senate leaders to take a statewide look at police-involved shootings to determine such factors as how often they occur and the age of officers involved." The Sun-Sentinel noted, "The FBI has already begun a civil rights investigation into Tuesday's fatal shooting."

SCOTUS To Consider "Bong Hits 4 Jesus" Case. The AP (12/2) reports, "The Supreme Court stepped into a dispute over free speech Friday involving a suspended high school student and his banner that proclaimed 'Bong Hits 4 Jesus.' … The justices agreed to hear the appeal by the Juneau, Alaska, school board and principal Deborah Morse of a lower court ruling that allowed the student's civil rights lawsuit to proceed. The school board hired former Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth Starr to argue its case to the high court." The AP continues, "Morse suspended Joseph Frederick after he displayed the banner, with its reference to marijuana use, when the Olympic torch passed through Juneau in 2002 on its way to the Winter Games in Salt Lake City. … Frederick, then a senior, was off school property when he hoisted the banner but was suspended for violating the school's policy of promoting illegal substances at a school-sanctioned event. … The Alaska case was one of three appeals the court accepted Friday. … It will also consider a request from the Bush administration to kill a lawsuit challenging the White House's promotion of federal financing for faith-based charities." The AP adds, "In the banner case, the school board upheld the suspension, and a federal judge initially dismissed Frederick's lawsuit. The 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals said the banner was vague and nonsensical and Frederick's civil rights had been violated. … At that point, the school board retained Starr, who investigated President Clinton's relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky. He took the case free of charge. … The appeals court said that even if the banner could be construed as a positive message about marijuana use, the school could not punish or censor a student's speech because it promotes a social message contrary to one the school favors."

Judge Ends DOJ Oversight Of Hawaii's Mental Health System. The AP (12/2) reports, "U.S. District Judge David Ezra has signed an order ending more than 15 years of federal oversight of (Hawaii's) mental health system." The AP continues, "The oversight, which began in 1991 with a U.S. Justice Department lawsuit alleging violations of the constitutional rights of patients at Hawai'i State Hospital, ended Thursday, state officials announced yesterday. … 'This is a historic moment in the reform of state services for persons in our community with severe and persistent mental illness who need hospital care and community-based follow-up,' state Department of Health Director Chiyome Fukino said. … 'The state has made tremendous improvements in our mental health system, and ... we will continue to move forward to build on and improve the way these services are provided,' she said." The AP adds, "The hospital emerged from oversight in late 2004, but the federal government kept watch over how the state provided services to the mentally ill in the community. On Oct. 24, Ezra cleared the way for the federal oversight to end when he essentially approved the latest federal magistrate's status report."

NYPD Identifies Fourth Man In Police Shooting. The New York Daily News (12/2, Gendar, Rouen, Siemaszko) reports, "A confidental NYPD document providing the most detailed account of the police shooting that plunged the city into crisis was obtained yesterday by the Daily News - as sources unmasked the mystery man who cops say fled the scene. High-ranking law enforcement sources identified Jean Nelson, a 27-year-old Queens man known on the streets as M.O., as the so-called fourth man." The News continues, "Investigators believe Nelson ran off just before the 50-shot police barrage that killed Sean Bell on his wedding day - a claim Nelson's lawyer and the two survivors reject as absurd." The News adds, "In the confidential police report obtained by The News, Lt. Gary Napoli, the highest-ranking officer at the shooting, references the mystery man - and says he believes Bell knew the plainclothes lieutenant was a cop before shots were fired. … Napoli says that he 'may have observed a male attempting to get into the passenger side' of Bell's car early Saturday outside a strip club in Jamaica, Queens, although he was unsure if the man was trying to get into the front- or backseat - or even if he got into the car. … Napoli also says that when his unmarked car passed Bell's Nissan Altima a 'male with whom he had made eye contact . . . knew that he was a police officer.' … Napoli, who ducked for cover when the shooting erupted, was not one of the five cops who fired, killing Bell, 23, and wounding Trent Benefield, 23, and Joseph Guzman, 31. .. The three men were not armed. Napoli's account is significant because Benefield and Guzman say Bell hit the gas thinking they were about to be carjacked - and insist they didn't know the plainclothes officers were cops."

Southern University Official Cooperating With DOJ In Sexual Harassment Probe Of Aide. The Baton Rouge Advocate (12/2, Blum) reports, "Southern University System President Ralph Slaughter is cooperating with a federal grand jury investigating sexual harassment allegations against governor's aide Johnny Anderson, who also is head of Southern's governing body, the lawyer representing Slaughter said Friday." The Advocate continues, "Slaughter responded to a subpoena and turned over all documentation of the claims Southern employees made against Anderson, said attorney Liz Craft of Baton Rouge. … The request came through the U.S. Department of Justice this week, said Craft, who personally represents Slaughter. … The information could not be confirmed through the Justice Department late Friday." The Advocate adds, "The Governor's Office received the allegations Oct. 31, Craft said. … Anderson is Gov. Kathleen Blanco's assistant chief of staff. He also is chairman of the Southern University System Board, which makes him Slaughter's boss. … Blanco recently ordered an independent investigation into the allegations led by Mark Falcon, a local lawyer." The Advocate notes, "Anderson has maintained his innocence and argued that the allegations are politically motivated, while criticizing Slaughter for not handling the matter internally. … Knowledge of the accusations against Anderson were first publicized a month after Slaughter sent a letter to state Sen. Charles D. Jones, D-Monroe, who is chairman of the Senate and Governmental Affairs Committee, asking for a confidential investigation. … Meanwhile, at news conference Friday, more than 100 people heard several pastors offer support to Anderson, including Southern Chancellor Ed Jackson, Athletics Director Greg LaFleur, former Attorney General Richard leyoub and Metro Councilman Byron Sharper."

Prince George's Police Criticized For Racial Profiling. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (12/2, A15), Miami Herald columnist Leonard Pitts Jr. writes, "I have a question for Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson and Police Chief Melvin C. High. … It concerns my youngest son, who is 21. He was walking to his car at Bowie Town Center after working a shift at one of the stores there Sunday night when a police officer met him at his car and asked if he had seen anything 'suspicious.' Bryan said no. The officer asked where he was coming from. Bryan told him. The officer asked for his license and registration. Bryan gave them to him. … After 20 minutes my son was allowed to drive away. Less than two minutes later he was pulled over, still at the mall. He asked why. "I'll ask the questions," said this officer. The questions were: Where are you going, where are you coming from? Again, Bryan answered. Again, he was asked for his license and registration. A few minutes later, he was ordered out of his car with his hands up, and police began to search the vehicle. … Six police cars converged on this scene. Having received a call from a friend who happened to be at the mall, I went, too." Pitts continues, "I went because there are periods when Prince George's police pull one or another of my sons over about once a week. I went because a police officer once Maced my middle son in the face -- five people saw this -- for no reason. I went because that son was once punched in the face by a Prince George's officer while handcuffed. I went because of the time that police, looking for a 5-foot-7 suspect, arrested Bryan, who is 6-foot-3. I went because a police officer cursed my 16-year-old daughter one night after she refused to leave the safe and lighted area where she was waiting for her mom to pick her up from the movies. I went because I am sick and tired of being sick and tired. … And I went because of the obstructed windshield. .. .That's what it said on the citation when Bryan was pulled over last year. He went to court and took the 'obstruction' with him: one of those air fresheners in the shape of a Christmas tree. The judge barely bothered to hide her contempt while dismissing the charges." Pitts adds, "If somebody commits a crime -- my son or anybody else's son -- he or she should pay the price. I mean that. And I respect police who do that difficult and often thankless job with honor. I mean that, too. But the price my sons pay in being stopped with such regularity has nothing to do with crime, and I cannot respect arrogance, rudeness, wrongness and racial profiling that hide behind a badge. … For years we have been promised that all this will change. Yet there sits my son on the ground while police write up a citation. Windows too darkly tinted and an open-container violation -- which my son strongly denies -- are the latest excuses. .. .How can I respect a police force that operates like this? Until the county executive and the police chief give a better answer than their officer did Sunday, I'll assume they don't know either."

Los Angeles Fire Chief Resigns Over Racial Controversy. The Washington Post (12/2, A2, Geis) reports, "The Los Angeles fire chief was forced to resign yesterday amid a political firestorm sparked when the City Council offered a huge legal settlement to a black firefighter whose colleagues served him dog food. … After the Los Angeles City Council offered the firefighter a $2.7 million settlement last month, local radio talk show hosts ridiculed the size of the award and urged listeners to send cans of dog food to council members. Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa (D) vetoed the proposed settlement but also began distancing himself from Chief William Bamattre, who is white." The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Helfand, Hymon), the New York Times (12/2, A10, Steinhauer) and the AP (12/1) also report on the controversy.

NAACP Outlines Legislative Priorities. The Washington Times (12/2, A1, Debose) reports, "Democratic leaders will face pressure from minority voters to pass legislation during the next two years on many issues that have stalled in Congress, particularly those designed to close racial disparities." Hilary Shelton, the top NAACP lobbyist, "said two of the priorities are raising the minimum wage and extending a new version of the Ryan White Act, which provides funding for research and treatment for HIV/AIDS patients." Shelton "said laws setting a federal standard for appropriate use of force by police and punishments for racial profiling are also priorities. … Universal health care, particularly for children 'born and unborn' is also a top issue for the NAACP, as well as a measure to reduce mandatory minimum sentences for drug offenses."

WPost Claims FL13 Controversy Shows Need For "Paper Trail." The Washington Post (12/2, A14) editorializes, "it is strangely appropriate that six years after a controversy over hanging chads ended with George W. Bush in the White House, a fight over election results to fill [Rep. Katherine] Harris's 13th Congressional District seat is raising new questions about voting. A state audit is underway to determine why some 18,000 ballots in Sarasota County did not show votes in a race ultimately decided, by a mere 369 votes, in favor of the Republican candidate. … Unfortunately, the chances of finding a definitive reason for the 'missing' votes are diminished because of Florida's failure to require a way to verify and audit votes recorded by touch-screen voting machines. … Our support for a paper trail is not rooted in any belief that machines are to be mistrusted. Nor are we inclined to credit the theories about how election machines can be rigged. There is no evidence that any such fraud has occurred, and while there were scattered problems in the recent midterm election, overall the system functioned well."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Subpoenas AMD, Nvidia In Antitrust Probe Of PC Graphics Card Industry. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/2, C - 1, Pimentel) reports, "The Justice Department is investigating Advanced Micro Devices Inc. and Nvidia Corp. in a federal probe of possible antitrust violations in the computer graphics card industry." The Chronicle continues, "Both Silicon Valley companies, the two leading makers of PC graphics cards, said they have received subpoenas from the Justice Department, although the agency has not made any specific allegations. … In separate statements, AMD and Nvidia said they were cooperating with the investigation." The Chronicle adds, "Michael Hara, vice president of corporate communications at Nvidia, said the Justice Department requested documents going back eight or nine years. … 'It's a broad range of documents relating to customers, competitors, product stack, prices, market studies -- everything, pretty much,' he said. 'Our position now is to comply with their request and get them what they need.' … Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the agency does not comment on specific companies under investigation. … 'I will confirm that the antitrust division is investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices involving the graphics processing units and cards industry,' she said in an e-mail."

The San Jose Mercury News (12/2, Poletti) reports, "This is the second Justice Department investigation in the semiconductor industry in the past two months. In October, Justice officials said they were looking into the static random access memory (SRAM) chip business. Cypress Semiconductor of San Jose, a maker of SRAMs used in cell phones and digital music players, said it was cooperating with the investigation." The News continues, "AMD entered the graphics business in October when it completed a $5.4 billion acquisition of ATI, a Markham, Ontario, developer of graphics chips. Analysts said they did not think AMD's acquisition of ATI was the cause or the target of the review by the Justice Department. … ATI and Nvidia are fierce competitors in the PC graphics chip business, where they develop the chips and add-on cards that boost graphics performance in PCs, especially the high-end systems favored by video gamers. Their chips render two- and three-dimensional graphics, making video games more lifelike with each new generation."

The AP (12/2, Elias) reports, "The AMD and Nvidia subpoenas come on the heels of a 4-year-old price-fixing probe among memory chip makers. To date, four companies and 17 people have been charged, and the Justice Department has secured fines totaling more that $731 million in the probe of the dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, industry. .. .Government investigators also have demanded Sony Corp., Cypress Semiconductor Inc., Samsung Electronics and Toshiba Corp. turn over information related to another flavor of memory chip - static random access memory, or SRAM."

Bloomberg (12/2, Stebbins) reports, "Federal investigators may be looking at the fact that Nvidia and larger rival ATI Technologies Inc. have similar pricing among some competing product lines, Doug Freedman, an American Technology Research analyst, said today in an interview. Advanced Micro Devices Inc., which bought ATI in October for $5.4 billion, was subpoenaed Nov. 29. … ATI is the second-largest maker of computer-graphics chips behind Intel Corp. The combination of Advanced Micro and ATI puts the merged company in direct competition with Intel and Nvidia for sales of graphics chips. Intel hasn't received a subpoena, said Chuck Mulloy, spokesman for the Santa Clara, California-based company." Bloomberg adds, "U.S. antitrust investigators have examined the market for memory chips used in computers and opened a probe in October into possible price-fixing for another type of memory chip used in cell phones, Freedman said. The Albany Times-Union (12/2, Rulison) also reports on the subpoena.

DOJ Seeks More Information On CBOT-Chicago Merc Buyout. The AP (12/2) reports, "The parent companies of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the Chicago Board of Trade said Friday that the Justice Department has requested additional information about their pending $8 billion deal to combine operations into a single unit." The AP continues, "Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc., which has agreed to be bought by its longtime crosstown rival, both said they plan to respond promptly and expect the transaction to close by mid-2007. They did not discuss specifics of the request, which they said was not unexpected." The AP adds, "The two exchanges announced an agreement in October to combine both the electronic and floor trading platforms of their more than century-old operations. The $8 billion deal will create the world's largest futures market. … The Justice Department, which must sign off on the deal, is assessing any potential anti-competitive impact formed by the powerhouse combination. Officials of the exchanges have said they don't expect it to encounter antitrust problems."

FCC Chairman Seeks To End Telecom Deal Impasse. The AP (12/2, Meyerson) reports, "FCC Chairman Kevin Martin on Friday initiated a process that may break the deadlock in the agency's vote on AT&T's proposed acquisition of BellSouth by allowing a fifth commissioner who had recused himself to participate." The AP continues, "Martin asked the general counsel for the Federal Communications Commission to consider whether Robert McDowell ought to be authorized to participate in the deliberations on the $81.6 billion deal, FCC officials said Friday. … The chairman sent letters to the relevant committees in Congress advising them of the request, according to McDowell's office and an FCC official who spoke on condition of anonymity because Martin's office had not issued a public statement." The AP adds, "McDowell, one of three Republicans on the five-person commission, had recused himself because he is a former lobbyist for a trade group that opposes the merger. … Without McDowell, the vote has been deadlocked at 2-2, with Martin and another Republican appointee favoring approval of the deal, and the two Democrats demanding the companies offer additional concessions to ensure it doesn't harm consumers." The AP notes, "The Antitrust Division of the Justice Department cleared the deal Oct. 11, declaring that there were no competitive concerns and opting not to require the combined company to divest any assets or make any other concessions. The takeover, the biggest ever in U.S. telecommunications history, also has been approved by regulators in 18 states, leaving the FCC as the final hurdle."

The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Puzzanghera) reports, "With McDowell on the sideline, the commission has been split evenly between Republicans and Democrats. Martin said he wanted the FCC to approve the deal unconditionally, and Republican Deborah Taylor Tate was expected to back him. … But upset that the Justice Department gave unconditional approval to the deal in October, the two Democratic commissioners, Michael J. Copps and Jonathan S. Adelstein, have pressed for the FCC to impose strong conditions. They are concerned about the clout that would be created by the merger. A more muscular AT&T would dominate the market in California and 21 other states." The Times adds, "Among the sticking points are requirements that the Democrats would like to impose to prevent AT&T from charging some websites for higher-speed delivery of their content, an issue known as network neutrality. .. .Negotiations have been going on for seven weeks and Martin has postponed scheduled votes three times. With another commission meeting set for Dec. 20 and AT&T and BellSouth pushing for approval before the end of the year, Martin is trying to bring McDowell into the process."

Microsoft On Trial For Allegedly Overcharging Iowans. Bloomberg (12/2, Van Voris) reports, "Microsoft Corp. used its monopoly position to overcharge Iowans for software products including Windows, Word and Excel, a lawyer told jurors Friday at the opening of an antitrust trial in Des Moines." Bloomberg continues, "Roxanne Conlin, representing statewide buyers of Microsoft products since 1994, said the company violated Iowa antitrust law by taking advantage of monopolies in personal computer operating systems and software applications to charge inflated prices. … 'The law requires of Microsoft what it requires of all companies: that they compete fair and square,' Conlin told a jury of seven men and five women. 'Microsoft did not.'" Bloomberg adds, "The lawsuit is one of only two such cases Microsoft hasn't settled or persuaded judges to dismiss. The customers claim $329 million in damages, and a jury award can be tripled under Iowa antitrust law. … The Iowa case and one in Mississippi are the last of dozens filed by groups of consumers after an antitrust suit against Microsoft brought by the U.S. government and several states, including Iowa, in 1998. … The company settled the case, agreeing to give computer makers the freedom to promote competing software programs, such as Web browsers and media players, for prominent display on Windows-powered personal computers."

House GOP Plans Vote On Offshore Drilling Bill. The Washington Times (12/2) reports House Republicans "agreed yesterday to move a compromise offshore-drilling bill passed by the Senate this summer that would open new territory in the Gulf Coast area to oil rigs and create a cash cow for nearby states. But it wasn't clear whether party leaders could summon enough votes to pass it quickly before lawmakers adjourn in the coming weeks. … Republican leaders will send the measure to the floor Tuesday as a 'suspension' bill requiring a two-thirds majority to pass, said Kevin Madden, a spokesman for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio." The Times notes, "House leaders previously had blocked the bill, hoping for more ambitious legislation that would allow drilling in coastal waters across the country unless a state objects. But industry groups have lobbied heavily for Republicans to take what they can get and pass the Senate bill."

WPost Criticizes Administration, Congressional Inaction On Energy. The Washington Post (12/2, A14), in an editorial, writes, "Ever since President Bush lamented the nation's addiction to oil in his State of the Union address, energy policy has been on the rhetorical agenda. But neither the administration nor Congress has shown much appetite for action beyond subsidies for research on alternative fuels."

Voters In The West Seen As Embracing Conservation Measures. The Washington Post (12/2, A1, Harden) reports that in the 90s, "Working-class indignation exploded in the Interior West against environmentalists, Democrats and outside agitators, stalling efforts by the Clinton administration to rewrite grazing, mining and forestry laws. … Last month's elections, though, may signal the end of Republican dominance and fierce resistance to many conservation measures." Voters in the west "rejected ballot measures that could have shredded state and local land-use rules limiting growth, controlling sprawl and ensuring open space. Voters in Idaho, Washington and California soundly defeated 'takings' measures, intended to compensate individual owners whose land is devalued by land-use or zoning laws." The Post adds, "At the same time, Democrats consolidated gains from 2004, picking up the governorship in Colorado, a Senate seat in Montana and two House seats in Arizona. … Perhaps more significant, Democratic and Republican politicians from New Mexico to Montana have found common ground with hunters and anglers in opposing widespread energy development on wild public lands, halting drilling in several areas where the public felt that wildlife and scenic values trumped economic consideration."

SF Chronicle Appeals Order To Imprison BALCO Reporters. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/2, Page B - 1, Egelko) reports, "The Chronicle, challenging a judge's order to imprison two of its reporters for refusing to reveal who leaked grand jury testimony about athletes and steroids, told a federal appeals court Friday that the public interest and evolving legal doctrines require recognition of a journalist's right to protect confidential sources. … 'Confidentiality is essential for the reporters to sustain the relationships they need with sources and to obtain sensitive information from them,' Jonathan Donnellan, a lawyer for the newspaper and the reporters, said in papers filed with the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco. 'Without it, the press cannot effectively serve the public by keeping it informed.'" The Chronicle continues, "The contempt-of-court order against the two reporters, if upheld, would be 'an unprecedented extension of subpoena power against the press,' the brief argued, saying the only comparable cases in the past have involved national security." The Chronicle adds, "The brief said the reporting in this case did no harm to the prosecution, which had long since concluded, and had served the public interest by exposing steroid use by prominent athletes and triggering a national debate. … The court should adopt a new standard for evaluating reporters' claims of confidentiality in cases of grand jury leaks, the newspaper argued -- weighing the value of information revealed by the reporting against the damage, if any, caused by the leak. Such a balancing test has not yet been accepted by federal courts, which have upheld grand juries' power to compel testimony from journalists. … The brief also argued that the judge who ordered the reporters confined for up to 18 months in September gave too little weight to a 1996 U.S. Supreme Court ruling that allowed psychotherapists to refuse to disclose information from their patients. That decision compels federal courts to extend the same rights to journalists, the brief said."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pelosi Chooses Reyes To Head Intelligence Committee. Fox News' Special Report (12/1, story 5, Wilson) reported that incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi selected Rep. Sylvester Reyes to head the House Intelligence Committee." Fox noted, "In doing so, Pelosi passed over two more senior members of the committee, California Congresswoman Jane Harman and Florida Congressman Alcee Hastings. Harman's term as the panel's top Democrat expires this year, and critics said it would have been a mistake to choose Hastings, who was impeached by Congress back when he was a federal judge. Reyes, who voted against authorization of the war in Iraq, said today he considers Iraq the number one issue for his committee, but he does not want the US to leave Iraq a terrorist haven, as Afghanistan was under the Taliban."

The AP (12/1, Shrader) reports National Intelligence Director John Negroponte and CIA Director Michael Hayden "issued statements welcoming Reyes' selection. 'His comprehensive understanding of the intelligence community and the challenges it faces, ideally qualifies him for this important chairmanship,' Negroponte said."

The Houston Chronicle (12/2, Mittelstadt) reports Texas Republicans and Democrats "alike praised Reyes, saying his experience and bipartisan nature would be important assets. 'He is the perfect choice,' said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison. 'He will not be partisan. He will be independent.'"

The Washington Times (12/2, Fagan) reports, "The outgoing intelligence panel chairman offered his good wishes as well, even as he urged a bipartisan atmosphere next year. 'The threats and challenges facing our great nation know no political bounds,' said Rep. Peter Hoekstra." The Times adds that "Reyes has made some bipartisan moves in the past, including praising the nomination of former CIA Director Robert M. Gates to be the next defense secretary." The web sites of The Hill (12/1, Hearn) and Roll Call (12/1, Yachnin) provide brief reports on Reyes' selection.

Reyes Pledges To Challenge Administration On Surveillance, Detainees. The Washington Post (12/2, A4, Weisman) reports Reyes "signaled that he will use his post to confront the Bush administration on national security and intelligence issues that he said Republicans have shied away from. 'On warrantless tapping, on their policy on detention and interrogation, their policy on secret prisons, all of those have undermined our position in the world,' Reyes said in an interview yesterday. 'And we have been complicit in Congress by rubber-stamping everything the administration has proposed.'"

The AP (12/1, Shrader) reports Reyes "has said he will demand more information on the Bush administration's most classified programs, including the detention of enemy combatants and the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance of domestic communications. He also plans to focus on the war in Iraq, threats from terrorists, the spread of weapons, diversity at U.S. intelligence agencies and civil liberties. … In a recent interview, Reyes said Republicans have made a habit of rubber-stamping the Bush administration's programs. Democrats, he said, must act quickly to show they will dig deeply into the government's actions."

Harman Preempts Pelosi's Announcement. The New York Times (12/2, A1, Mazzetti, Zeleny) reports Pelosi "sent a strong new signal on Friday that Democrats intend to confront the White House by naming" Reyes, "who opposed the war in Iraq" over Rep. Jane Harman of California, "a more hawkish figure who voted to authorize the war in Iraq and a political rival with whom Mrs. Pelosi has long had a stormy relationship." Pelosi "called Ms. Harman on Friday morning to deliver the news, and the two…spoke for about 10 minutes, according to people familiar with both sides of the conversation." Harman, "though, beat Mrs. Pelosi to the punch in announcing the news. In a break of political protocol, she sent out a statement congratulating Mr. Reyes before Mrs. Pelosi's office had even made the appointment official."

The Houston Chronicle (12/2, Mittelstadt) reports Reyes "may have helped himself by not lobbying Pelosi directly for the chairmanship because, he said, she knew him well from their prior service together on the Intelligence Committee. Pelosi, who has strained relations with Harman, was reportedly angered when her fellow Californian launched an aggressive campaign for the job. Pelosi this week bypassed Hastings, who was impeached as a federal judge, after critics questioned his suitability for the sensitive job."

Reyes' Travels With Weldon Draw Intelligence Community's Scrutiny. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, A4, Rogers, Solomon) reports Reyes "faces some skepticism in the intelligence community -- ironically, because of Mr. Reyes's travels with" Rep. Curt Weldon, who was defeated last month." The Journal notes that as a member of Armed Services, Reyes "has frequently traveled overseas as part of delegations led by" Weldon and "has made high-profile stops in North Korea, Libya and Russia in recent years. … An August 2003 trip included a stopover in Paris that drew the ire of the Central Intelligence Agency, according to two recently retired members of the agency's Directorate of Operations. Included was a meeting at a Paris hotel with group of Iranian exiles to discuss Iran's alleged role in terrorism and developing weapons of mass destruction. Among the leaders of the Iranian delegation was Manucher Ghorbanifar, a central figure in the Reagan administration's Iran-Contra scandal and a man the CIA had accused of providing bogus intelligence to the Americans. In an interview Friday, William Murray, who was the CIA's station chief in Paris at the time, said he tried to prevent the lawmakers from going to the meeting after he learned that Mr. Ghorbanifar would be attending. But he said that his advice went unheeded. 'Reyes was one of the guys who met with Ghorbanifar,' Mr. Murray said. Mr. Reyes's office said Friday that he has never met with Mr. Ghorbanifar, and didn't attend the hotel meeting during the Paris stopover.

Reyes' Family's Ties To Contractor Were Subject Of Investigation. The Washington Post (12/2, A4, Weisman)

reports Reyes "has been linked to past controversies. The inspector general of the government's General Services Administration looked into the serious failures of a $239 million network of cameras and sensors along the Mexican and Canadian borders, an investigation that focused in part on the contractor's employment of Reyes's daughter Rebecca. Reyes has been a key backer of the system and its contractor, International Microwave Corp. Shortly after its 1999 contract award, the firm hired Rebecca Reyes to serve as a liaison to what was then the Immigration and Naturalization Service. She ultimately became IMC's vice president for contracts. IMC also hired her brother, Silvestre Reyes Jr., as a technician on the program, known as the Integrated Surveillance Intelligence System, or ISIS. Rep. Reyes said that he never interceded on his daughter's behalf or with U.S. officials to help her company win a contract, and that he backed the firm's search for funding only because he supports the system of border sensors and cameras. And, he said, the investigation was concluded with no charges of improprieties by the company, his daughter or himself."

Senate GOP Reportedly Planning To Oust Roberts From Intelligence. The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Miller) reports, "Senate aides said GOP leaders planned to remove Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) as the top Republican on the panel. Possible replacements include Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) and Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the outgoing chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. A spokeswoman for Roberts declined to comment."

Gates Business Ties Raise Concerns. The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Roche, 850K) reports that as Robert Gates "awaits Senate confirmation as President Bush's secretary of Defense, ethics watchdogs worry about the revolving door between government and private business that allowed Gates to align himself with defense contractors, investment houses and a global drilling company" involved with Halliburton. The Bush Administration "has been dogged by allegations that past corporate affiliations of administration officials led to favored treatment in federal contract awards." Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was allowed "to keep holdings worth as much as $25 million in Gilead Sciences Inc., a California company that developed a drug used to treat bird flu. Gilead, for which Rumsfeld served as board chairman, has seen its stock prices soar with sales to the Pentagon and other government customers." Gates "had no more than $165,000 in savings and retirement accounts [when he left government in 1993]. Now, he has $1.1 million in holdings with Fidelity Investments, as well as stock holdings in some of the companies where he has served as director." He has advised "10 different companies, assessing issues as varied as Saudi oil drilling, mutual fund performance and restaurant sales at Romano's Macaroni Grill."

DOD's Cambone To Resign At End Of Year. Undersecretary of Defense for Intelligence Stephen Cambone's resignation was covered by wire services but not by newspaper staff reporters. AFP (12/1) reports that Cambone "is the most senior Pentagon official to announce he is leaving since US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld tendered his resignation last month." He was a "key player in [Rumsfeld's] efforts to transform the US military into a lighter, high tech force and in carving out a larger role for US military intelligence." Despite "criticism from some in Congress that [DOD] was intruding on turf traditionally dominated by the CIA," DCI Hayden called allegations of Pentagon-CIA feuding "an urban legend." The AFP calls Cambone "one of the last members of the original team that came to the Pentagon with Rumsfeld."

The AP (12/1, Baldor) reports that he becomes "the first key department member to leave in the wake of Rumsfeld's resignation. ... The Pentagon's intelligence-gathering has come under fire during Cambone's tenure, with critics accusing the Defense Department of trying to take expanded control over the nation's intelligence activities. Cambone was in charge of intelligence when it was disclosed a year ago that a Pentagon database of suspicious activities contained the names of anti-war groups that had been found not be security risks." More than 30 sites carried the AP story.

Bushes Host First Of 24 White House Holiday Parties. The Washington Post (12/2, Argetsinger, Roberts) "Reliable Source" column writes that the President and the First Lady "hosted the first of 24 White House holiday-season parties last night…just hours after the first lady unveiled this year's decorations, inspired by the mansion's Red Room." Two 12-foot trees "covered in poinsettias greeted guests in the Grand Foyer, along with vases of red carnations, lots of candy canes, cranberry topiaries and 4,638 shiny red balls on the trees and garlands.

The 18-foot Douglas fir in the Blue Room is decorated in glass, crystal and that cottony kind of fake snow, as well as tiny red bows." Mrs. Bush said "the tree upstairs in the private residence is covered with family ornaments."

President, First Lady Marks World AIDS Day. The AP (12/1) reports President Bush "marked Worlds AIDS Day on Friday by declaring: "The pandemic of HIV/AIDS can be defeated." Bush and first lady Laura Bush met in the Roosevelt Room with Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt, U.S. Global AIDS Coordinator Mark Dybul and community leaders from the U.S. and Africa. 'It's a day for the world to recognize the fact that there are 39 million people living with HIV/AIDS,' Bush said. 'And a day to remember the fact that 25 million people have died of AIDS.' Bush's AIDS initiative, announced in 2003, is the largest international health initiative dedicated to a single disease." Bush "also urged Congress to reauthorize the $2.1 billion Ryan White Care Act, the largest federal program specifically for people with HIV/AIDS."

The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 6, 2:25, Couric) reported, "Today is World AIDS Day. It's been 25 years since we first heard medical and media reports of a baffling and deadly new disease. Now, of course, it's no longer new and it's taken a terrible toll. More than 64 million infected worldwide, more than 23 million dead. And just last year, despite all the medical advances, more than four million new cases." The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 7, 2:30, Couric) also aired an interview with Melinda Gates on the Gates Foundation's anti-AIDS efforts.

GSA Administrator Accused Of Comparing IG Staff To Terrorists. The Washington Post (12/2, A1, Higham, O'Harrow) reports GSA Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan "is trying to limit the ability of the agency's inspector general to audit contracts for fraud or waste and has said oversight efforts are intimidating the workforce, according to government documents and interviews." Doan, described as "a Bush political appointee and former government contractor," has "proposed cutting $5 million in spending on audits and shifting some responsibility for contract reviews to small, private audit contractors. Doan also has chided Inspector General Brian D. Miller for not going along with her attempts to streamline the agency's contracting efforts. In a private staff meeting Aug. 18, Doan said Miller's effort to examine contracts had 'gone too far and is eroding the health of the organization,' according to notes of the meeting written by an unidentified participant from the Office of Inspector General (OIG)." Doan "compared Miller and his staff to terrorists, according to a copy of the notes obtained by The Washington Post. 'There are two kinds of terrorism in the US: the external kind; and, internally, the IGs have terrorized the Regional Administrators,' Doan said, according to the notes."

"Icy Exchange" Makes Webb "A Folk Hero" On The Left. The Washington Post (12/2, B1, Shear) reports, "An icy exchange between President Bush and Virginia Sen.-elect James Webb that was made public this week has turned Webb into something of a folk hero among critics of the president, who have longed for someone to challenge his bravado. At the same time, Webb's refusal to play the gentlemanly political games so common in Washington has angered conservatives and renewed questions about how well he fits with other politicians in a sharply divided Congress, where compromise will be key. … But Webb chief of staff Paul J. Reagan said the senator-elect is going to be effective once he takes office next month." Reagan added, "He does not consider the incident two weeks ago to be consequential." The Post notes, "Among hundreds of comments posted on The Washington Post Web site, many Virginia residents and others praised Webb's courage in standing up to Bush."

Noonan Criticizes Bush Over Webb Exchange. In her column for the Wall Street Journal (12/2, P12) Peggy Noonan writes, "The latest example of a lack of grace in Washington is the exchange between Jim Webb and President Bush at a White House Christmas party. Mr. Webb did not want to pose with the president and so didn't join the picture line. Fair enough, everyone feels silly on a picture line. Mr. Bush approached him later and asked after his son, a Marine. Mr. Webb said he'd like his son back from Iraq. Mr. Bush then, according to the Washington Post, said: 'That's not what I asked you. How's your son?' Mr. Webb replied that's between him and his son. For this Mr. Webb has been roundly criticized. And on reading the exchange I thought it had the sound of the rattling little aggressions of our day, but not on Mr. Webb's side. Imagine Lincoln saying, in such circumstances, 'That's not what I asked you.' Or JFK. Or Gerald Ford! 'That's not what I asked you' is a sentence straight from cable TV, from which many Americans are acquiring an attitude toward public and even private presentation."

Coast Guard Finds Defect In Patrol Boats. The Washington Post (12/2, D1, Merle, 690K) reports, "Months after a whistle-blower took to the popular Web site YouTube to warn of communications problems with converted patrol boats, the Coast Guard says it has stopped using the ships after finding structural problems that made them potentially dangerous. ... In August, Michael De Kort, a former engineer at Bethesda-based Lockheed Martin, posted a 10-minute video saying there were blind spots in the ships' security cameras, equipment that malfunctioned in cold weather and other problems. But the Coast Guard said yesterday that the problems that prompted the sidelining of the ships were structural. 'They had nothing to do with secure communications,' said Cmdr. Jeff Carter, the Coast Guard's chief spokesman." The Post adds, "The ships were part of a massive modernization program run by Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman to replace the service's aging ships and helicopters. But the four-year-old program has seen cost increases -- from $17 billion to $24 billion -- and run into technical and management problems."

Teach For America Profiled. NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 9, 3:00, Williams) ran a feature on "one woman's mission to help some of the nation's most vulnerable children get a good education. What started out as a small idea -- young people teaching other young people -- a program called Teach for America is so big now it's as selective in picking young people to be teachers as Ivy League schools are in deciding who can be students." The group founded by Wendy Kopp "is making a difference for children and teachers alike."

LATimes Endorses Democrats' College Affordability Agenda. The Los Angeles Times (12/2) editorializes, "college affordability was one of the Democrats' main campaign promises this year. It was a pledge calculated as much to frustrate Republicans as to please working- and middle-class families. Who wants to oppose giving more students a chance at college? The outgoing Congress had made itself curiously vulnerable on the issue, cutting funding for Pell Grants, which go to the most impoverished students, and moving too slowly to end unnecessary subsidies to private lenders, though the worst were eventually eliminated. … Some Republicans have made the argument that giving students more financial assistance will only encourage colleges to raise their fees. This has it backward. Students need more financial assistance to cope with rising college fees. At any rate, Republicans would be better off working with Democrats to help make college more affordable for working families — of any political stripe.

Congressional Democrats Encouraged To Pursue Ethics Reform. In an op-ed for the New York Times (12/2, A15) Josh Chafetz, a student at the Yale Law School, writes, "With three-quarters of voters in the recent election saying that corruption and scandals helped determine how they cast their ballots, one of the first items of business for the Democrats in January should be putting their Congressional houses in order. … The new Democratic leadership can get off on the right foot by making a serious and sustained effort at self-regulation, even if that means some uncomfortable moments around the caucus table."

OTHER NEWS:

Weak Manufacturing Report Has Investors Warily Waiting For Fed's Move. In a pessimistic report, the Washington Times (12/2, Hill) says "economic weakness spread beyond the stricken housing and auto sectors last month, with reports showing U.S. manufacturing shrank for the first time in 3 1/2 years and construction dropped the most" since 9/11. US industries "broadly cut back production, adding to factory shutdowns caused by deepening recessions in auto- and housing-related industries such as wood, furniture and appliances." At the same time, an "unexpected decline in construction of offices and other business facilities in October added to a record string of drops in housing construction of more than 1 percent in the last seven months to cause the biggest drop in construction spending in six years." The New York Times (12/2, C6) also says the manufacturing report raised "concerns that the economy will not be able to achieve a soft landing."

The Washington Post (12/2, D1, Henderson) says many investors "aren't buying the Federal Reserve's forecast for a mild economic slowdown, worrying that a series of recently released figures might signal the onset of a sharper, more prolonged slump. Stock prices fell yesterday and the dollar extended its recent decline" after the construction spending news, which followed reports last week "showing the holiday shopping season got off to a tepid start and that new orders for big-ticket durable goods like airplanes and automobiles fell sharply in October."

The Wall Street Journal (12/2, A3, Conkey) also says the data provide "new ammunition to those who view the Federal Reserve's upbeat economic outlook as overly optimistic." There is "a big divide between bond-market investors and Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke over the next move on interest rates. The bond market is pessimistic about the prospects for near-term economic growth and views inflation as contained," and hopes for lower interest rates. But Bernanke "has struck a more sanguine note, saying the weakness is primarily confined to the housing market."

Stock Markets Decline. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, B1, Lahart) reports, "With less than a month left to the year, the question for investors is whether they should be singing 'Deck the Halls' or worrying that the economy is about to get decked. Stocks fell for the second week in a row and Treasury yields dropped to their lowest level in more than 10 months." The Dow Jones Industrial Average closed at 12194.13 Friday, down 27.80 points. The S&P 500 was down 3.92 points to 1396.71, and the Nasdaq down 18.56 points to 2413.21. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, Browning) also has a front-page story on the strategies of investors as the year draws to a close.

Dollar Continues To Fall. The Financial Times (12/2, Garnham, Brown-Humes, Guha) reports the dollar "fell further on Friday as weak US economic data heightened investor fears that the country's economy could be heading for a hard landing." The New York Times (12/2, C1, Weisman) says the "fluctuations of the dollar have unsettled many in the world of finance this last week, when it sagged about 2 percent against the euro, bringing its decline this year to more than 12 percent. On Friday, the dollar fell to 1.33 euros; it dropped against the British pound as well, with it now taking $1.98 to buy a pound."

Automobile Sales Slow As GM, Ford Plan Production Cuts. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, A3, Kosdrosky, Stoll) reports US automobile sales "downshifted in November to the slowest seasonally adjusted pace since October 2005" as both GM and Ford said they will cut North American production "in the first quarter of 2007 amid signs of flattening demand." The Washington Post (12/2, D2, Altman) adds that Toyota sold more vehicles than Ford in the US last month, "the second time that the No. 2 domestic automaker was outsold by its Japanese rival." The New York Times (12/2, C4, Bunkley) says Ford "fell into fourth place in November for the first time in its history," behind GM, Toyota, and DaimlerChrysler. The Financial Times (12/2, Simon) says "troubled" Ford's sales fell by 9.6% in November from a year earlier. NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 8, 2:50, Williams) reported on the "bad news today for Ford" as a lead-in to a report on auto workers migrating from Michigan to Wyoming for energy industry jobs. Meanwhile, the New York Times (12/2, C1, Maynard) has a report on the drama inside GM, "wrestling with one of the biggest financial crises in its history," where Kirk Kerkorian sold off the last of his $1.2 billion in shares this week.

WSJournal Lauds Report On US Decline In Competitiveness. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, A8) editorializes, "It won't be news to readers of these columns that increased regulatory burdens and litigation costs are undermining the competitive position of America's capital markets. But this week's interim report from the blue-ribbon Committee on Capital Markets Regulation performs a public service by marshaling evidence of the decline that is hard to refute. … The report's best contribution is the seriousness with which it examines the evidence of U.S. competitive decline -- evidence that defenders of the status quo should now be obliged to answer."

Obama Joins Brownback At Evangelical AIDS Event. The AP (12/1) reports, "Potential presidential candidate," Sen. Barack Obama "stood before one of the country's largest evangelical churches Friday and declared that condoms should be made more widely available to fight AIDS. The Democratic senator's appearance at" Rev. Rick Warren's Saddleback "megachurch was a source of dispute among evangelical leaders, with some of the most conservative saying that a politician who supports abortion rights should not have been allowed to speak at such a prominent church. … In a show of political unity, Obama took an AIDS test with a potential White House rival on the Republican side" -- Sen. Sam Brownback. The AP adds that "in another show of bipartisanship, the Illinois senator said President Bush doesn't get enough credit for committing $15 million against HIV and AIDS over five years."

The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Finnegan) reports Obama "drew a standing ovation from the 2,072 pastors and others who came from 39 states and 18 nations. … 'We can't ignore the fact that abstinence and fidelity, although the ideal, may not always be the reality — that we're dealing with flesh and blood men and women and not abstractions, and that if condoms and, potentially, things like microbicides, can prevent millions of deaths, then they should be made more widely available,' he said."

Some Conservatives Upset By Obama's Appearance. ABC World News (12/1, story 7, 2:30, Gibson) reported, "In this country, one AIDS Day event produced sharp political controversy. The event was at the California church of pastor and awe tore, Rick Warren. He came under fire from some fellow evangelicals who objected to one of his invited guests. … Rick Warren hosted his annual AIDS Summit today. Among others, he invited Democratic Senator Barak Obama, who took a public HIV test. The idea -- to come together to raise awareness about the importance of testing for AIDS." According to ABC, "many conservative Christian leaders, who were furious with Warren for inviting Obama. Why? Because the Senator supports abortion rights. 18 leading Christian conservatives wrote to Warren, 'If Senator Obama cannot defend the most helpless citizens in our country, he has nothing to say about the AIDS crisis. You cannot fight one evil while justifying another.'"

Warren said on MSNBC's Tucker (12/1, Carlson), "Everybody knows that I'm staunchly pro-life. … So that I would be criticized by pro-lifers is pretty ludicrous to me, but the real issue is if you can only work with people that you agree with 100%, you will never get anything done. … In the last session, I had two senators speak, one the face of compassionate conservatism and I think the other is the face of compassionate liberalism, and what they have in common is the compassion. And that's why we brought them here, because they care about AIDS, not because all of their different viewpoints."

Dowd Notes Controversy Over Obama's Middle Name: Hussein. The New York Times (12/2, A15, Dowd) reports, "If you call Barack Obama's office to check the spelling of his middle name, the reply comes back: 'Like the dictator.' In the first rush of our blind date with the young senator from Illinois, we are still discovering things that are going to take some getting used to. Like his middle name: Hussein. … There hadn't been much focus on" Obama "having the same name as the Butcher of Baghdad until a Republican operative dropped the H-bomb on 'Hardball' this week. Ed Rogers, a Bush 41 official, said he was underwhelmed with 'Barack Hussein Obama,' dismissing him as 'a blank canvas where people project their desires.' This set off indignation among liberal bloggers and in the Obama camp, where the middle name has not been hidden, but has not been mentioned much, either, even on the senator's August odyssey to his paternal home in Africa. The hush-hush on Hussein is a bit odd given that Mr. Inclusive is presenting himself as the American dream in human form, a multiethnic quilt whose journey is his qualification for higher office."

Bayh To Create Presidential Exploratory Committee. The AP (12/1, Espo) reports Sen. Evan Bayh, "a Democrat with a record of political success in a Republican-leaning state," will create a presidential exploratory committee and travel to Iowa and New Hampshire next week. Bayh "has been pointing toward a run for the White House for months, and had $10.5 million in his Senate campaign bank account as of Sept. 30. The money can be transferred to his exploratory committee."

Romney Faces Scrutiny Over Alleged Hiring Of Illegal Immigrant Landscapers. The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Mehren) reports Gov. Mitt Romney, "a 2008 GOP presidential aspirant and an outspoken critic of illegal immigration, apparently employed undocumented landscape workers at his home near Boston." Following on a Friday Boston Globe report, Romney Communications Director Eric Fehrnstrom said Romney "was unaware that several of the landscapers who kept up his suburban Belmont property were in this country illegally." Fehrnstrom said, "Gov. Romney has no information or knowledge to corroborate the Globe's allegations. He hired a legitimate lawn service company and he knows the owner as a decent, hardworking person who is a legal resident."

On MSNBC's Tucker (12/1, Carlson), Republican strategist Terry Holt and Democratic strategist Steve McMahon discussed the matter. Holt said, "We have moved decades beyond that kind of anger, where something like that" would derail Romney's campaign. McMahon said, "I don't think it's probably that big a deal, but I do think it's somewhat stupid, 15 years after Bill Clinton had this problem" with nominee Zoe Baird, "for people who are interested in running for president to make this kind of a dumb mistake."

Reid, Romney Draw Attention To Mormons In Politics. Gannett (12/2, Marrero) reports, "When Sen. Harry Reid becomes Senate majority leader next year, he will be the most powerful Mormon in Washington. But that reign could be short-lived if Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney makes a bid for the presidency in 2008 and wins." According to Gannett, "the 15 Mormons in Congress is a slightly greater representation than the religious group's percentage of the general population." However, "Some evangelical Christians consider the faith a cult, and 35% of Americans say they would not vote for a Mormon for president, according to a recent poll. That presents a particular challenge for Romney, who so far has steered clear of any public discussion about his religion."

Iowa Democratic Chair Says Clinton Not Organizing State. On MSNBC's Tucker (12/1, Carlson), Iowa Democratic Party Chairman Rob Tully said Sen. Hillary Clinton "doesn't have anybody at this point in time organizing the state. But I anticipate probably after the last couple days, she'll probably get on that pretty quick. … I just think that the rumor's been going around that a lot of the other candidates are starting to form and getting to move forward with their campaigns. I think, right after the first of the year, we're going to see a lot of candidates that are going to announce. And from that point on, it's going to be a mad dash to January of 2008."

Kerry Assessing Joke's Impact On Presidential Prospects. The AP (12/1) reports that in the wake of "The Joke" about those who "get stuck in Iraq," even "fellow Democrats and former supporters question" whether Sen. John Kerry "is still politically viable." While Kerry is publicly going ahead with plans for a second presidential run, "behind the scenes, Kerry apparently has been having doubts, calling current and former Democratic confidantes to inquire just how much his gaffe hurt his presidential chances, according to several Democrats who spoke on condition of anonymity."

Pataki Hires Ex-Cheney Aide As PAC Finance Director. The New York Times (12/2, B2, Healy) reports Gov. George Pataki hired Kara Ahern, a former aide to Vice President Dick Cheney yesterday, as the national finance director for his 21st Century Freedom PAC, which "is laying groundwork for Mr. Pataki's possible bid for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008." Ahern "worked with Mr. Pataki when she was the Northeast finance director for President Bush's campaign in 2004. Afterward, she was political director to Mr. Cheney."

Vilsack Comfortable With Underdog Role. Gov. Tom Vilsack said on MSNBC (12/1, Cosby), "Obviously, I'm a long shot. There's no question about that. And I have to have folks know me in the country. So I'm getting out, visiting with people in New Hampshire and Iowa, going to Nevada and South Carolina and spending some time with folks. … I've always started to campaign as an underdog. When I ran for governor in 1998, I was almost 23 points behind with just three weeks to go in my race. So the notion of being an underdog is something that I'm familiar with and certainly comfortable with." MSNBC's Rita Cosby concluded by saying, "Gov. Tom Vilsack: raised as an orphan and now running for president. A great success story."

Steele Seen Positioning Himself For 2010 Maryland Gubernatorial Run. The Washington Times (12/2, Miller) reports Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele "has rebounded from his election loss by returning to an active role in state Republican politics, positioning himself for a potential run for governor in four years." Steele said, "I'm just trying to make sure our party gets back on its feet and stands tall. If we don't do the groundwork now and pull ourselves up, 2010 won't matter and 2008 won't matter, either." Steele said it "was 'too soon' to commit to a run for governor, but he did not rule out the possibility."

Calderon Becomes Mexican President Despite Continued Protests. ABC World News (12/1, story 6, 0:20, Gibson) reported, "In Mexico today, the country's new president took office in what was a chaotic ceremony. There were scuffles and shouting during the inauguration of Felipe Calderon. After the ceremony, thousands of protesters marched through the streets of Mexico City." NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 5, 0:30, Williams) called it "a bizarre scene in Mexico early this morning. The country's new President, Felipe Calderon, a conservative, had to slip onto a stage in a hurry to take the oath of office because of lawmakers who had been brawling in the chamber, literally, for days."

Major newspapers, wire services and websites report the inauguration of Calderon. The Washington Post (12/2, A8, Orlandi) calls Calderon "a free-trade booster and career politician," and says his swearing-in was "undercut by lawmakers' jeers and fisticuffs, a chaotic scene that reflected the country's deep political and economic divisions." The scene on the floor of Congress "was an unprecedented departure from the typical somber pageantry of Mexico's transfer of power and a long way from the mass euphoria that greeted Vicente Fox's 2000 election victory, which ended 71 years of single-party rule. It was also an indication of the challenges that await Calderon."

Under the headline, "Amid Catcalls, Mexico's President Is Sworn In," the New York Times (12/2, A6, McKinley) notes, "It was not pretty, but [Calderon] managed to take the oath of office in Congress Friday, as opposition lawmakers whistled and catcalled and the losing leftist candidate staged a massive march down the central avenue of the capital. Never before in modern Mexican history has a president been sworn in under such chaotic and divisive conditions."

The Wall Street Journal (12/2, A4, Luhnow, Lyons) says Calderon took office while "facing down leftist lawmakers who had vowed to block his inauguration and putting the country on notice that he won't retreat as easily in the face of opposition as his predecessor did." The Journal calls his taking of the oath of office in the Congress a "symbolic gesture" that "sent a loud message in Mexico, a country that only saw its first fully democratic transition in 2000, but that has been slowly becoming more violent and ungovernable since that year's election of President Vicente Fox, who repeatedly backed down in the face of protests and opposition demands. The resulting drift has let Mexico fall ever further behind its Asian rivals in attracting investment to create jobs and ease poverty."

The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Tobar) titles its piece, "Chaos Reigns For Mexican Inauguration." Calling Calderon "a diminutive but determined 44-year-old conservative," the Times says he will govern "a deeply divided Mexico." His "defiant appearance on the dais was in sharp contrast with the attitude of [Fox] during his final months in office." Calderon promised to "reach out to his rivals and try to heal the wounds of a long and bitter fight over the election."

The Washington Times (12/2, A1, Grillo) runs the front-page headline, "Roughhouse Swearing-in," while the Houston Chronicle (12/2, Althaus, Lloyd) titles its coverage, "Pomp And Punches." The Dallas Morning News (12/2, Corchado, Iliff) says Calderon "outmaneuvered opposition lawmakers vowing to disrupt his inauguration," and "quickly vowed to crack down on drug cartels while creating jobs to slow illegal immigration to the United States."

NYTimes Lauds Calderon's Leadership, Political Skills. A New York Times (12/2, A14) editorial compares Calderon to outgoing President Vicente Fox, "a decent man with many good ideas who lacked the skill and appetite to muscle his programs through." Calderon shares many of Fox's ideas but "may have the political savvy to succeed." He "has chosen a mostly good cabinet and a steady economic team," and said "he would push for universal health insurance for children and an expansion of the country's antipoverty programs. He is taking a page from Mr. López Obrador's agenda — which is good for Mexico and might win the new president some of the political capital he will need to push through reforms."

Pro-Hezbollah Lebanese Rally To Demand Siniora's Resignation. ABC World News (12/1, story 4, 0:20, Gibson) reported, "In Lebanon, hundreds of thousands of protesters poured into the streets of Beirut, calling for the Prime Minister and his government to resign. The protest was organized by Hezbollah, which is backed by Syria and Iran. It has called the Lebanese government a puppet of the United States." The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 3, 0:40, Phillips) reported, ""They came, police estimated, in their hundreds of thousands, supporters of the militant Hezbollah movement which battled Israel in southern Lebanon in last summer's war and which wants to bring down the US-backed Lebanese government now. And they pitched their tents saying they'll stay until the government falls."

NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 4, 1:00, Engel) reported, "As you can see behind me, those demonstrations are continuing. Now the protesters have set up tents so they can spend the night in the streets and maintain pressure on the government. Earlier today at one stage, there were as many as one million Hezbollah supporters in downtown Beirut. They are demanding that the current pro-American government be toppled. They say it is nothing more than an American puppet."

On its front page, the Washington Post (12/2, A1, Shadid, 690K) reports Hezbollah "and its allies escalated Lebanon's month-long political crisis into a popular confrontation Friday, sending hundreds of thousands of supporters into the streets, parking lots and sidewalks of downtown Beirut, vowing to topple the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and reorient the country." The city "was awash in red-white-and-green Lebanese flags, interspersed with banners in the colors of various sectarian and political leaders," and the "crowd was more festive than angry, more celebratory than militant, as the theater of the moment intersected, perhaps a little dissonantly, with the Post adds, "In symbolism, numbers and aims, the protest drama of a struggle as decisive as any in Lebanon's history." marked a collision between two countries that have coexisted uneasily inside Lebanon following the assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri." The current conflict "is more than just a political struggle unleashed by Hezbollah's demand in October for a share of the cabinet that would give it an effective veto over government decisions. Competing narratives of the country's past and future are on display."

The New York Times (12/2, Slackman, 1.16M) adds, "The official goal was to overthrow the government, but the atmosphere was bizarrely festive… The mood was lighthearted, but the turnout underscored the challenge this politically divided and fragile country faces as it confronts its most dangerous political crisis since the end of a 15-year civil war in 1990." The Times says the current "crisis threatens to undermine a donors conference scheduled for January in Paris," and "has already hurt a ploddingly slow effort to rebuild the mainly Shiite areas that were severely damaged in the war. But that did not seem to matter as anger spilled out, carnival style."

A piece in the Los Angeles Times (12/2, Stack) adds, "Hundreds of thousands of Hezbollah supporters and their allies poured into the capital Friday in a mass protest that paralyzed the city center, laid siege to the prime minister's office and threatened an escalating campaign of civil disobedience until the U.S.-backed government collapses." The Times calls the protest "uncannily reminiscent of anti-Syria demonstrations that erupted" after Hariri's murder.

The AP (12/2, Ghattas) notes, "Launching a long-threatened campaign to force Lebanon's U.S.-backed government from office, Hezbollah and its pro-Syrian allies said the demonstration would be followed by a wave of open-ended protests." Hezbollah "has tried to depict the protest as rallying all Lebanese, not just its supporters. It urged demonstrators to wave only the red and white Lebanese flag with its green cedar tree, in contrast to past protests that featured the group's yellow flag with a fist and Kalashnikov rifle." State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey "said U.S. diplomats in Beirut had telephoned Lebanese government officials to offer their support."

BBC.com (12/2) adds, "Demonstrators slept in tents outside the office of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, who they say is hostile to Syria and must resign." Siniora opponents claim they "will keep up the pressure until the government steps down." The BBC local reporter "says there is no sign that either side is giving up."

Annan Says Lebanon Ceasefire Holding But Israeli Overflights Continue. The New York Times (12/2, A8) notes UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan "said Friday that the cease-fire that ended fighting between Israel and Hezbollah fighters on Aug. 14 was holding, but that Israeli overflights in the border area were occurring almost daily." Annan told the Security Council "that Israel saw the incursions as a 'necessary security measure.' He said the United Nations continued to receive reports of illegal arms smuggling across the Syrian border but had been unable to verify them. An assessment team, he added, found 'significant deficiencies' in border control."

Abbas, PLO Executive Committee Discuss Political Way-Forward. The New York Times (12/2, A8, Myre) reports Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "convened the Palestine Liberation Organization's top decision-making group on Friday amid growing signs of a possible political showdown with Hamas, the faction that currently leads the Palestinian government." The PLO Executive Committee "is expected to meet for several days before deciding what action to take, if any." Of the ongoing unity government talks with Hamas, the PLO said in a statement, "The dialogue has stopped and there is no chance of resuming it in the same manner." The Times adds, "With the Palestinian government broke and isolated, Fatah and Hamas had agreed in principle on a unity government made up of professionals and technocrats. But they have not been able to agree on how to divide up important ministerial positions. There is no clear way out of the political standoff if they cannot reach an agreement."

Dead Sea Conference Said To Offer Few Specifics. In a piece comparing yesterday's Dead Sea conference to previous efforts, the New York Times (12/2, Cooper, 1.16M) notes, "With the recent setbacks to democracy throughout the region, the goals at this year's conference … were often smaller and, presumably, a bit more attainable." The Forum for the Future was conceived "to prod the Arab and Muslim world's autocratic governments toward democracy and stronger civil society, as sort of a bulwark against the hopelessness and disenchantment that could lead to extremism. It was an ambitious goal, and things seemed promising at first." However, the Times says, "that was the new Middle East, before the old one quickly reasserted itself." Detailing the meeting's atmospherics, the Times adds Secretary of State Rice "had been diplomatic the night before when a reporter asked her whether it was incongruous that Russia, which passed a law restricting nongovernmental organizations, was a host of a democracy conference in Jordan."

The Washington Post (12/2, A12, Kessler, 690K) headlines its report, "At Dead Sea Forum, Incongruities Abound." Noting the "uncomfortable irony" of a rule of law and press freedom forum co-hosted by Russia, the Post says, "With the Bush administration's push to promote democracy in the Middle East facing setbacks in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, irony was not in short supply." Describing leaders' activities on the margins of the official program, the Post reports Rice "held a series of bilateral meetings -- for instance, with a Sudanese official for a tough talk on the crisis in Darfur -- and skipped the final news conference to fly back to Washington when the sessions ran late."

Lavrov Says Iran UNSCR Talks Could Open Next Week. The AP (12/2) reports Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov "said Friday that talks on proposed sanctions against Iran's nuclear program could take place early next week." Lavrov told Russian media that "the meeting, suggested by France, would focus on the draft U.N. resolution on Iran and would take place at a top diplomatic level." The AP notes he claims that Secretary Rice, British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett and German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier "all agreed Friday to the meeting," and "China also might attend, although it is not clear if it will." Lavrov "said Russia was ready to vote for a U.N. ban on exports of nuclear materials and sensitive technologies to Iran. But he said Moscow was opposed 'to such sanctions and steps that could affect the International Atomic Energy Agency's activities in Iran.'" The AP adds that Undersecretary Burns "will attend a European conference in Brussels next week, probably on Tuesday, and will confer there with European diplomats about the resolution."

Experts Emphasis Temporal Nature Of Incentives Packages. In an op-ed in today's New York Times (12/2), the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace's George Perkovich and Pierre Goldschmidt write, "Beneath the legalese, Iran is moving as fast as it can to master uranium enrichment, while threatening its neighbors and refusing to provide transparency that the [IAEA] requires." They add, "International interlocutors must disabuse Iran that it can have its uranium cake and eat it, too. The vital security objective all along has been to prevent Iran from acquiring the capacity to make nuclear weapons fuel." If Iran becomes proficient at enriching uranium, "it would make no further sense to offer Iran exceptional nuclear energy cooperation, political benefits or access to international markets, capital and technology." The international community must "clarify now that the positive incentives the world wishes to negotiate with Iran will be withdrawn if it does not immediately accede to the binding Security Council demand for suspension." The authors note, "Failure to clarify the limited duration of positive incentives only encourages those in Iran who argue that there are no real costs to defying the Security Council and continuing the enrichment program." They conclude, "The Iranian people, their neighbors and the world deserve a more considered debate of Iran's options and of their consequences. Iran will never be in a better position than it is now to obtain a favorable deal that would improve its economy, employment and quality of life."

Strong Challenge To Chavez Could Tighten Tomorrow's Vote. Previewing tomorrow's Venezuelan presidential vote, the Wall Street Journal (12/2, A2, De Córdoba) reports President Hugo Chávez's "exasperated opponents got a gleeful surprise at a rally ahead of Sunday's election, when a giant inflatable figure of the nation's fiery and famously voluble leader inexplicably began to deflate." While a Chavez loss "looks unlikely -- most polls show Mr. Chávez with a comfortable edge -- Venezuela's often fractured and famously inept opposition is at least putting up a respectable fight this time. They are marching into electoral battle united behind Manuel Rosales, 54, a hard-nosed and experienced professional politician who has, by all accounts, mounted a feisty challenge to Mr. Chávez. That challenge, to be sure, is fueled by desperation." Rosales "faces long odds in his quest to oust the incumbent," and Chavez "retains a strong following among the majority of poor Venezuelans, on whom he has showered uncounted billions to subsidize health, education and employment programs." Chavez "also has fear on his side: His minions haven't shrunk from firing employees from government jobs or state companies for showing opposition leanings."

The Washington Times (12/2, Hearn) says Chavez "heads into tomorrow's election with some polls showing a victory margin of more than 30 percent while others show a dead heat for the fiery leftist who calls President Bush the devil." Rosales "has managed to unite a fragmented opposition and made inroads into Mr. Chavez's base by attacking the president's lavish spending on leftist causes throughout Latin America and his support for Cuba's Fidel Castro." Analysts "say a surprise showing by Mr. Rosales could cause political disturbances."

Rep. Connie Mack said on Fox News (12/1, Skinner), "The reality of this election is it's not going to be fair. Chavez has done everything he can so he can manipulate the election. So I think we all need to be prepared, at the end of the day, that he will win. Whether or not it was winning legitimately, that's still to be determined. And my thinking is that it's, no, he didn't win it; he won't win it legitimately."

A piece on the front page of the New York Times (12/2, Romero) notes the growing violent crime problem in Venezuela. "Yet the man in charge … rarely addresses the problem publicly and is sailing toward an easy election for a third time. Analysts say [President Hugo] Chávez is able to ignore the issue by governing through a system of extensive handouts that eases the purchase of basic goods but does little to ensure public order." Chavez has "politicized police forces throughout the country, marginalizing officers viewed as disagreeing with Mr. Chávez's 'Bolivarian Revolution,'" and the Times says "police forces have also largely been urged to tread lightly in poor neighborhoods, turning a blind eye to small demonstrations and petty crime like burning tires." Zulia Governor Manuel Rosales, Chavez's main opponent, "has been pounding the crime issue, questioning why murders have surged since Mr. Chávez entered office in 1999." Rosales "laid the blame squarely at the feet of the president, saying his confrontational style and tendency to turn the courts, military and the police into tools of his own power, are feeding the crime epidemic."

Financial Viability Of Chavez's Transcontinental Pipeline Project May Not Matter. The New York Times (12/2, C3, Gould) details Chavez's plan "to build a 5,000-mile natural gas pipeline that stretches from [the] remote northern tip of South America to the bottom end of the continent." The project "is the centerpiece of a broader effort by Mr. Chávez to strengthen ties among Latin America's economies and shrink their dependence on the United States." However, the concept "has generated political and environmental controversy at home and abroad." Chavez's "geopolitical aim is, in fact, the project's biggest hurdle, energy analysts maintain. They say that the decision by Mr. Chávez to give his ideological goals priority over profit jeopardizes the success of the project." The Times says it remains unclear "that Mr. Chávez can muster long-term support in South America for a huge pipeline that would take at least a decade to complete. There is already skepticism and bickering over other energy deals, analysts say."

Castro Reportedly Does Not Have Cancer. The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 5, 0:30, Logan) reported, "Fidel Castro remains seriously ill, but CBS News has learned that he does not have cancer, despite the rumors. However, we're told it's unlikely he'll recover enough to ever return to power, even if he survives for years. Millions here are hoping Castro will be able to attend a military parade tomorrow."

Ahead Of Olympics, China Will Lift Foreign Journalist Restrictions. The Washington Post (12/2, A8, Cody) reports a Chinese government statement that Beijing "has decided to substantially liberalize restrictions on coverage by foreign journalists ahead of the 2008 Olympic Games in Beijing." The "decree" claimed that "foreign reporters, whether assigned here permanently or visiting for the Olympics, will be allowed to roam most of the country freely and report without interference by local police or propaganda officials from Jan. 1, 2007, until Oct. 17, 2008. The Games are in August 2008." The Foreign Ministry noted that "the new rules departed clearly -- if temporarily -- from long-standing orders. They also marked a significant watershed for China, where information has long been treated as government property to be manipulated and controlled by propaganda officials." The Post says the new policy "would for more than 21 months eliminate some major barriers to accurate reporting about China: regulations that legally oblige foreign correspondents to work through local propaganda officials when gathering news. Those restrictions, when followed, have limited frank conversation with Chinese people and emphasized the official version of news."

The New York Times (12/2, A3, Yardley) calls the move "a step intended to fulfill the country's promise to allow visiting reporters to work freely in advance of the 2008 Beijing Olympics." The "relaxed reporting rules for foreigners are an important public relations gesture as Beijing prepares for the Olympic Games in August 2008." The Foreign Correspondents' Club of China "applauded the new rules and singled out the Foreign Ministry for praise. But the group also called on the government to make the regulations permanent." Reporters Without Borders "also praised the new rules but noted that the announcement came on the same day that a Beijing appeals court upheld a fraud conviction against Zhao Yan, a Chinese researcher for The New York Times."

Bodman Asks OPEC Not To Cut Production. The Financial Times (12/2, Hoyos) notes the Administration "on Friday urged the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries not to make further cuts to its oil production." Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman is quoted saying, "I encourage them to keep markets well-supplied." However, Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi "indicated that the cartel needed to give serious consideration to further reducing its production when it met in Abuja, Nigeria's capital, on December 14. He told reporters that demand was 'okay,' US inventories were high, and 100m barrels of oil would have to be removed from the market to achieve a balance." The Times adds that some "hawkish" OPEC members "have called on the group to reduce its production by at least another 500,000 barrels a day." Also, the Times reports, Angola will join OPEC and Sudan has begun working towards membership.

Litvinenko's Wife, Acquaintance Have Elevated Levels Of Polonium-210. ABC World News (12/1, story 5, 2:15, Gibson) reported, "Now to the overseas story that gets more intriguing with every passing day: the poisoning of Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko. They have detected the same radioactive sub tense in an Italian man, with shadowy intelligence ties." ABC (Sciutto): "Almost every hour today, another extraordinary twist. First, confirmation that Mario Scaramella, seen arriving for emergency treatment, tested positive for polonium. An Italian security analyst, he met Litvinenko the day he fell ill. Then came word, that Litvinenko's wife also tested positive. Then, as doctors performed a delicate and dangerous autopsy on Litvinenko hauling in special protective clothing, the discovery of not one, but two poisons in Litvinenko's body. Polonium and radioactive thallium in huge quantities. Both are believed to be favorite murder weapons of the Russian security services."

The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 4, 0:30, Roth) reported, "Authorities now say the radioactive substance that killed a former Russian spy also poisoned one of his contacts. … With extra equipment to protect the pathologists today, an autopsy was carried out on Litvinenko's body, which gets sealed in a special coffin before it's buried to keep radiation from spreading." NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 6, 1:30, Friesen) reported, "Exactly one month ago, these two men met at a London sushi bar. Now Alexander Litvinenko is dead and now Mario Scaramella is in the hospital. … The question tonight -- is he a victim or a suspect? In interviews last week, he said he met Litvinenko to warn him they were both on a hit list."

The Washington Post (12/2, A8, Jordan, Delaney) reports claims that polonium-210, "the radioactive substance that killed former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko, has contaminated his wife and an Italian security consultant he met the day he fell ill." British authorities "said that neither was showing symptoms of poisoning," and confirmed that they "are the only two who have tested positive for the radiation since Litvinenko's mysterious death on Nov. 23." The Post says the Putin critic and former spy's "unexplained death has created Cold War-like tensions between London and Moscow."

The New York Times (12/2, A3, Lyall) adds the security consultant, Mario Scaramella, "was himself admitted to a London hospital on Friday, the authorities said, after tests showed that he had a significant amount of radioactive material in his body." Scaramella's hospitalization "adds a further layer of confusion to the puzzle surrounding the death of" Litvinenko." The Times adds, "With each new development, there are more mysteries to be solved in the case, which has still not been characterized as a murder by the London police."

The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Murphy) notes, "After days of investigation, police have begun to trace a radiation trail across flight manifests and London hotels and offices that security experts said could eventually pinpoint how the radioactive substance was brought to London and possibly by whom." Scaramella's test result "increases the likelihood that the poison was administered at the sushi restaurant in central London where the two men met briefly Nov. 1 — hours before Litvinenko became sick — especially since the radiation trail appears to follow Litvinenko's movements across London after that rendezvous."

Italy's Prodi Will Sue Accusers, Possibly Including Scaramella. The Financial Times (12/2, Barber) reports Litvinenko's "suspicious" death "was enmeshed in alleged dirty tricks in Italian politics on Friday after [Prime Minister Romano Prodi] "announced legal action against people linking him to the KGB, the former Soviet intelligence service." The Times calls Scaramella "the main person who has made [that] accusation" against Prodi. "The Litvinenko affair has spilled into Italian politics because Mr Scaramella was appointed in 2003 as a consultant to a parliamentary inquiry, known as the Mitrokhin commission, which was investigating KGB activities in Italy." Scaramella "reported to the commission's chairman in January that he had been looking into alleged links between Mr Prodi and the KGB."

Columnist Accuses Putin Of Undermining Elective Democracy. In her monthly column in the Washington Post (12/2, A15), the Carnegie Moscow Center's Marsha Lipman says Russia "is undergoing yet another round of election-rule tightening -- as usual, a product of the country's rubber-stamp legislature." Vladimir Putin's Kremlin "has managed to obstruct the financing of unwelcome political projects," and "political loyalists can draw on what's called the 'administrative resource' -- a network of administrators at various levels who are eager to do the regime's bidding." In short, "election results are preordained. There is a flatness about campaigns -- a lack of enthusiasm and emotion. Which is the way the Kremlin likes it." Arguing that "there's no more law or order about [Putin's] regime than there was in Boris Yeltsin's 'chaotic' Russia," Lipman says the "political scene has been fully cleared of genuine competition, and the executive and legislative branches filled with loyalists who need not worry about public accountability." The "disputes" among Kremlin allies "grow ever more intense and vicious, creating an atmosphere of rampant corruption and crime." She concludes, "Real competitive politics, if they were ever allowed, might be a threat to the ruling elite. Fierce infighting within the regime is a threat to the entire nation and its future."

In Turkey, Pope Said To "Soothe" Muslim "Outrage." The Washington Times (12/2, Phillips) notes Pope Benedict XVI "concluded a historic trip to the Muslim world yesterday after soothing an outraged Islamic population with his Christian message of peace and reconciliation." Benedict "wound up his triumphant four-day visit to Turkey with a parting message of good will to Muslims as Turkish clerics and commentators lauded the German-born pope for facing Mecca as he prayed alongside a top Islamic clergyman in Istanbul's Blue Mosque on Thursday." One Turkish paper is quoted reporting, "The pope's dreaded visit was concluded with a wonderful surprise," while another said, "He turned toward Mecca and prayed like Muslims." The Times adds, "Throughout his trip, however, the pope also gently stressed Rome's concept of reciprocity in which respect for Muslims in the West warrants respect for religious minorities such as Christians and Jews in majority Muslim lands, including the beleaguered community of 90,000 Christians in Turkey."

The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Wilkinson) adds, "Just as the Bible speaks of converting swords into plowshares, Pope Benedict XVI has used his extraordinary pilgrimage to Turkey this week to transform outrage over provocative remarks he made about Islam into an emerging image of conciliation and outreach." His mission to Turkey "could have crucial influence on the future of the troubled relations between Islam and Christianity. … By most accounts, Benedict was successful in winning over begrudging hearts and minds in the Islamic world." The Times cites an Italian observer saying the visit saw "the theological Benedict replaced by the diplomatic Benedict, an infrequently seen facet of this complex and deeply intellectual pope." Turkish press "gave generally positive coverage to the pontiff's visit to the majestic 17th century Blue Mosque. A photograph of him praying silently Thursday alongside the grand mufti of Istanbul dominated almost every front page."

Turkey Maintains Ban On Cypriot Traffic Despite EU Warning. The Washington Times (12/2, Borowiec) reports, "The Turkish government this week tried to minimize the impact of the European Union's threat to partially freeze accession talks, saying its foreign policy remained unchanged." A "senior" Turkish official "rejected EU insistence that Turkey must open its airports and harbors to traffic from Cyprus." For its part, the Cypriot government in Nicosia said the EU "was giving Turkey too much leeway, thus damaging efforts to find a solution to the Mediterranean island's partition." The Times calls the EU Commission's recommendation of a halt in talks, "a significant warning and a blow to Turkey's ambition to join what some in the Turkish press call 'the Christian Europe.'"

US Draft Resolution Would Create Regional Somalia Peacekeeping Force. The New York Times (12/2, Hoge, 1.16M) reports the US circulated a draft UN Security Council resolution on Somalia "urging a regional peacekeeping force to monitor a struggle for control between the country's embattled government and its powerful Islamist foes, and calling for a partial lifting of an arms embargo to enable the equipping of local security units." The "8,000-member force would come from seven East African nations but not from neighboring states of Kenya, Djibouti and Ethiopia. This restriction was added out of concern that the proposed United Nations move, aimed at calming tensions, might end up provoking wider hostilities." Noting some NGO opposition to a ground force, the Times says Ambassador Bolton "expressed annoyance with this view. 'You know, people criticize us when we take action on the ground, that our taking action makes the situation worse,' he said." Bolton "said that the text would be circulated to various capitals over the weekend, and that he hoped that reactions could start to be incorporated into the document at drafters' meetings beginning Monday."

The AP (12/2, Lederer) adds the US draft UNSCR "would authorize a regional force to protect Somalia's weak government and threaten Security Council action against those who block peace efforts and attempt to overthrow it." The UNSCR "would lift a 1992 arms embargo against Somalia so that troops in the "protection and training mission" could be militarily equipped. It would ban Somalia's neighbors from sending soldiers — a demand by a seven-nation East African group expected to contribute soldiers to the force, as well as European members of the Security Council who want to ensure the force's aim is to promote peace."

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington 30

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Agent Describes Alleged Texas Terrorist Cell. The Houston Chronicle (12/2, Korosec) reports, "An FBI agent testified in federal court Friday that at least four aspiring jihadists conducted firearms training and discussed going to war against the United States on two weekend camping trips near Willis earlier this year. 'The group had discussions about traveling to Pakistan to engage (the) United States and coalition forces,' Special Agent John McKinley, who is assigned to an international counterterrorism squad in Houston, told a federal judge. … The group included two Houston-area men who were arrested and charged earlier this week with conspiracy to aid the Taliban."

The Dallas Morning News (12/2, Chapa, Trahan) reports, "Federal authorities allege that Syed Maaz Shah joined the other men over several days in January to train with assault rifles in a rural area near Willis, Texas, north of Houston. The goal of the two Houston men was to 'hone their skills with weapons to assist fighters engaging United States forces in Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iraq,' according to conspiracy indictments for Kobie Williams, 33, and Adnan Babar Mirza, 29."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

California Man Indicted For Hoax Anthrax Letters To Celebrities. The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Krikorian) reported Chad Conrad Castagana of Woodland Hills, Calif., was indicted "Friday on charges of sending threatening letters with white powder to half a dozen politicians and celebrities, including incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and television personalities Jon Stewart and Keith Olbermann. … The powder turned out to be harmless." The Times noted, "According to an affidavit by Los Angeles FBI Agent Mary Hogan, the investigation began Sept. 6 when agents in New York were called to the apartment of comedian Jon Stewart and found a threatening letter, postmarked from Santa Clarita with an unknown white powder. … 'It appears the individuals were targeted based on what he described as their liberal politics,' Assistant U.S. Atty. Donald Gaffney said Friday after the indictment was returned."

The AP (12/2, Marquez) noted, "Castagana was charged with 14 federal counts of threats and hoaxes, one for each letter he is accused of sending. Each count carries a 5-year sentence." The AP added, "The FBI has said federal agents watched Castagana walk from his home to a public mailbox and deposit several letters. One was addressed to someone previously targeted and contained the white powder."

Leahy Plans To Investigate Traveler Assessment Program. The AP (12/2, Sniffin) reports, "A leader of the new Democratic Congress, business travelers and privacy advocates expressed outrage Friday over the unannounced assignment of terrorism risk assessments to American international travelers by a computerized system managed from an unmarked, two-story brick building in Northern Virginia." Incoming Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy "pledged greater scrutiny of such government database-mining projects after reading that during the past four years millions of Americans have been evaluated without their knowledge to assess the risks that they are terrorists or criminals."

Database Raises Privacy Concerns. NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 7, 2:00) ran an "In Depth" report on privacy in the US, with anchor Brian Williams saying, "Many people may not realize it, but since 9/11, the government has been monitoring and gathering data on just about every person entering the US. Now there are concerns about what the government is doing about all the information it gathers." NBC (P. Williams): "Each of the more than 400 million times a year that US citizens and foreign travelers enter the US, a Customs and Border Protection agent has about one minute to decide if they're a threat, and if so, to conduct a more intrusive inspection. A big factor in that decision is a computer database containing such personal information as credit card and phone numbers used to buy tickets, travel history, traveling companions, even airline seat numbers. Recently disclosed government documents say the system also generates a risk assessment score for every traveler, including American citizens. A record, the government says, that can be kept as long as 40 years. That has privacy advocates raising new objections that homeland security wants to prevent passengers from reviewing their records for mistakes. … Homeland Security says there is a way for passengers to claim that the information on them is incorrect. But privacy groups say, unless passengers can see it for themselves, it's impossible to fix."

NYTimes Seeks Dismissal Of Hatfill Defamation Suit. The New York Times (12/2, A13, Lewis, Johnston) reports, "The New York Times filed a motion with a federal judge on Friday asking him to dismiss a suit by a germ-warfare scientist who said a series of columns by Nicholas D. Kristof about the deadly anthrax mailings of 2001 defamed him. The scientist, Stephen J. Hatfill, who formerly worked in the Army laboratories at Fort Detrick, Md., has said Mr. Kristof's columns about the slow pace of the anthrax investigation defamed him because they suggested that he was responsible for the attacks. In the motion filed Friday, lawyers for The Times asked Judge Claude M. Hilton of Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va., to dismiss the suit."

NYTimes Says Katrina Evacuees Ought To Have Been Given Section 8 Vouchers. The New York Times (12/2, A14) editorializes, "One of the many victims of Hurricane Katrina may turn out to be the hospitality that American cities, particularly Houston, showed to people fleeing the storm. Thanks largely to the Bush administration's catastrophic handling of the relocation crisis, Houston endured much more civic strain than it should have in caring for the tens of thousands of Louisianans who landed on its doorstep. The administration's mishandling of the crisis has often looked like a calculated attempt to discourage displaced people from seeking housing aid, even if it means leaving them vulnerable to homelessness. A federal district court judge implied as much this week, when he found that the Federal Emergency Management Agency's aid application process was so convoluted and confusing as to be unconstitutional." According to the Times, "The administration made its most disastrous misstep when it failed to enlist the Department of Housing and Urban Development, which was created to deal with just these kinds of situations. If the administration had provided Section 8 housing vouchers through HUD, families could have been directed to affordable housing all over the country."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Study Group Said To Seek "Middle Road" Between Bush, Democrats. All three broadcast networks led their Friday evening newscasts with reports on harsh winter weather in the Midwest. Beyond that story, the focus was mainly on Iraq and the widely anticipated report from the Iraq Study Group. In addition to television coverage, the ISG report receives front-page coverage from both Washington newspapers and was a big topic on cable talk shows.

The Washington Post (12/2, Baker, Ricks, 690K) says the ISG "plans to recommend that the U.S. military mission shift to advising, training and supporting Iraqi forces, who would take the lead in securing their country. As part of that, U.S. soldiers would increasingly embed with Iraqi troops to guide them." The ISG "tries to find a middle road between President Bush's adamant refusal to leave Iraq until the job is done and Democratic demands to pull out U.S. troops. But in achieving unanimity among its Republican and Democratic members, the commission has outlined a strategy with its own political and military risks."

Under the headline "Study Group To Echo Bush," the Washington Times (12/2, Scarborough, 88K) says Bush and the ISG "are not far apart when it comes to a final plan for getting U.S. troops out of Iraq." Gen. Benjamin Mixon, a senior commander in Iraq, said the group's "idea to shift more duties to Iraqis and gradually pull out forces is current Pentagon policy." The Times finds Bush and the ISG "essentially" opposing an "immediate" pullout and a "date-certain timeline"; however, the group seeks "a goal of 18 months to pull out most combat troops."

NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 3, 2:50, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "White House officials say the President will decide about course corrections in Iraq before Christmas. But despite expectations of major change, tonight officials insist the President's core war strategy is sound. ... Leading Democrats, however, remain critical saying the President was wrong this week to give an open-ended commitment on US troop presence." Sen. Carl Levin: "It's wrong. It takes the pressure off the Iraqis to do what only they can do."

The Wall Street Journal (12/2, A2, Seib, 2.04M) reports that the study "will be only the beginning of a Washington rethink." The Journal notes the existence of other efforts, "some perhaps equally important. Inside the Pentagon, a team of three colonels has been outlining a series of options for Gen. Peter Pace." The Pace group "has looked far more favorably on temporarily increasing the size of the U.S. force in Baghdad in an effort to get the city under control. It also is pushing a far more robust program of American military advisers," while NSA Stephen Hadley "is emerging as a kind of presidential fix-it man on Iraq" and is "quietly canvassing" for advice on Iraq. Finally, "the new Democratic majority in Congress is about to try to put its own stamp on Iraq policy. ... The risk for the White House is that the situation could shift rapidly from too few ideas on Iraq to too many disjointed ones."

The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 2, 2:00, Plante, 7.66M) reported, "Long-time Middle East diplomat Martin Indyk says forget victory, the US is staring defeat in the face." Indyk: "What we immediately need to be focused on is preventing the situation in Iraq affecting our other interests in the region." Plante: "It's precisely to keep the region from exploding that the Baker commission is expected to recommend a major diplomatic initiative, including US talks with Iran and Syria, something the President has consistently rejected. As one senior White House official put it: If that's the recommendation, everyone here will be underwhelmed."

Officials Expect No Big Changes In Iraq Policy. The Washington Post (12/2, Wright, 690K) reports, "With the Iraq Study Group report due on Wednesday, the Bush administration has notified allies that it will not budge on certain aspects of Iraq policy, whatever recommendations are put forth by the independent panel of 10 prominent Republicans and Democrats." State and NSC officials spoke "at a private briefing for diplomats" last Wednesday, according to unnamed diplomats at the briefing. The officials "said any recommendations for policy shifts would have to fit in with long-term U.S. strategic objectives for Iraq, including ensuring that the nation can govern and defend itself and that it is stable, not a threat to neighbors, and an ally in the fight against terrorism." They gave "a further indication that the White House may be digging in its heels" by stressing that Bush "will have the last word on what happens next and will not succumb to outside pressure."

Baker, Hamilton Have "Herculean" Task. The AP (12/1, Yen) reports James Baker and Lee Hamilton "face a Herculean task of extricating the U.S. from an increasingly unpopular war. … Preliminary details of their unanimous report, which calls for a gradual troop pullback without setting firm timetables and more regional diplomacy, are already generating fire from some Democrats in Congress, while President Bush is deriding the notion of a graceful exit as having 'no realism to it whatsoever.'" The co-chairmen's "diplomatic powers and cache of bipartisan goodwill" may patch the rift.

Legislators Comment On ISG Report. Sen. John Cornyn said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/1, Blitzer), "I think the Pentagon is going to make clear that it thinks we have three options: go big, go long or go home. And I think the only one that has a reasonable chance of success is growing the size of our troop level in Baghdad so we can not only clear dangerous areas, we can actually hold them."

Sen. Christopher Dodd said on MSNBC (12/1, Jansing), "Maybe the more important suggestion, at least in terms of timing, is the suggestion by the Baker-Hamilton report that the Administration begin to deal regionally with this issue, to begin talking to people that are not our friends and in fact, in some cases, are our enemies, but recognizing we're going to have to deal with the regional aspects of this problem. ... That suggestion by this study group may be the far more important suggestion than actually the timing of when our troops come or leave."

Rep. Jack Murtha said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/1, Blitzer), "The commission is saying let's redeploy, let's change the policy of stay the course to redeployment. The problem, as I understand it, and I haven't seen the report, but the problem is they say it depends on the circumstances on the ground. Well, if it depends on circumstances on the ground it's not a lot different from what President Bush is saying. And then President Bush says he's going to ignore it anyway.."

Rep. Dennis Kucinich said on Fox News' Your World (12/1, Cavuto), "The American people voted in November for a dramatic change in Iraq. They want out. And I think that Congress has a responsibility to take this country in that direction."

Bush Will Meet Head Of Iraqi Shiite Party, Sunni VP. ABC World News (12/1, story 3, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush, back from the summit, says he'll meet with another powerful Iraqi at the White House on Monday. He heads the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament, and is one of the most influential leaders of Iraq's Shiite majority." The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 2, 2:00, Plante, 7.66M), reported bdul Aziz al-Hakim "heads Iraq's largest Shiite sect. His Badr militia rivals the Mahdi Army of Moqtada al-Sadr." The NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 3, 2:50, Gregory, 9.87M) called it "an effort aides say to keep up pressure on Iraq's political leaders to end the bloodletting."

The New York Times (12/2, Sanger, Wong, 1.16M) reports that the meeting is "the latest step in a burst of new administration attempts to try different approaches to bolstering the fragile Iraqi government." The Times says the "effort is part of a White House strategy that calls for reaching out to a wider circle of Iraqi politicians to give greater support to the weak government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, and lessen his dependence on Moktada al-Sadr, the anti-American Shiite cleric." However, the endeavor "immerses Washington even deeper into Baghdad's byzantine coalition politics, and it risks being interpreted in Baghdad as a sign that Mr. Bush is hedging his bets." This move "comes at a time when the administration is overhauling its approach to dealing with Iraq's leadership, though there are arguments over how deeply Washington can involve itself in the politics of a country in such political turmoil."

The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Gerstenzang, 850K) also reports the pending meetings, adding, "In the last seven months, Hashimi has lost a sister and a brother to Iraq's civil war."

US Rethinking Goal Of Iraq Unification. The AP (12/2, Gearan) reports President Bush "is becoming more personally involved in Iraq's fragmented politics as his administration reevaluates efforts to unite different Iraqi groups in an attempt to preserve U.S. options. ... Bush is reaching out on Monday to another Shiite politician, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, to seek ways to end the violence and keep Iraq's unity government intact. To show he's not choosing sides, Bush is planning to meet next month with Iraq's Sunni Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, according to a senior administration official." However, "the administration is also debating whether to abandon U.S. efforts to bring Sunni insurgents into the political process to stabilize Iraq and instead leave that outreach to the majority Shiites and Iraq's third major group, the Kurds, a senior U.S official said. No decision has been made."

Maliki Is Criticized Amidst Violence. The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has attempted to reassert his authority in recent weeks, confronting U.S. leaders, demanding more control over national security and weighing plans to reconfigure his Cabinet. ... But Iraqi leaders and citizens were skeptical Friday that the prime minister could fight the rising tide of civil war." On Friday, "those gathering at mosques across Iraq, Sunni and Shiite, said they saw Maliki's meeting with Bush as largely unproductive, and yet another sign their country was falling apart."

Reporter Interprets Bush, Maliki Body Language. An analysis of Bush's meeting this week with Maliki in the New York Times (12/2, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports, "Nobody expected a love fest… As they wrapped up their breakfast at the Four Seasons hotel in Amman on Thursday morning, aides warned that reporters…would be on the lookout for any sign of bad blood. That's when the president hugged the prime minister." The Times adds, "When the president heaped praise upon the prime minister, lauding him for his courage, Mr. Maliki barely looked Mr. Bush's way. Though much was made afterward of the body language, White House officials blamed the language barrier, saying each man was listening intently into his earpiece for a translation of the other's words." The Times calls their relationship "a complicated entanglement. Mr. Bush, who has staked his presidency on success in Iraq, needs the Maliki government as an ally. But Mr. Maliki's survival depends, in part, on his ability to demonstrate that he is his own man, not an American puppet."

Salhani Says All-Out Shiite-Sunni War Could Tie Down Fundamentalists. In a commentary for the Washington Times (12/2, 88K), UPI editor Claude Salhani writes, "And when it comes to pulling U.S. forces out of Iraq there are two opposing schools of thought. The first is that the United States will not withdraw from Iraq until the security void can be filled (by Iraqis) to prevent further deterioration in what is already being called a civil war. ... The second school of thought -- albeit a rather Machiavellian one -- sees a unique 'opportunity' to entangle the Muslim world in a fratricidal war that would keep Islamic forces occupied for years, if not decades, to come. ... for some policymakers it could provide the answer to what they perceive as a rising threat that three years of continued all-out war by the world's best-armed, best-trained, best-equipped and most motivated army could not resolve. Under this scenario, Saudi troops, along with billions of Saudi petro-dollars, would be tied up for years fighting Iranian-backed insurgents in Iraq. ... The thinking supporting that theory is that this would tie down fundamentalist forces on both sides for years to come."

US, Iraqi Forces Launch Baghdad Raids. The Washington Post/AP (12/2, Wagner) reports, "U.S. and Iraqi forces launched six raids against insurgents Friday, including one that killed at least three Iraqis and another in which American forces wounded an Iraqi female who the U.S.

command said was being used as a 'human shield.' The U.S. military also reported that an American soldier was killed in combat in the capital Thursday. ... Iraqi soldiers backed by U.S. helicopters swept through Fadhil, one of the oldest areas of Baghdad, and engaged in house-to-house combat, police Lt. Ali Muhsin said. The neighborhood is about a mile from the heavily fortified Green Zone." The Post adds of other fighting in "the Taji area," "It was the fourth time this week that a female Iraqi civilian has been killed or wounded in crossfire between U.S. forces and insurgents."

Iraq Takes Over Army Division From US. The Financial Times (12/2, Dinmore) reports, "Iraq's government on Friday took command over another army division in the north, a US general announced, in an apparent demonstration of the US's commitment to accelerate the handover of military control to Nouri al-Maliki, prime minister. ... Mr Bush said he had listened to Mr Maliki's 'frustration' at not having the tools to do his job." Gen. Benjamin Mixon said that "the remaining two northern divisions would follow by February 2007." The Times adds, "US officials have expressed concern over too rapid a transfer of authority, because of a lack of training and fears that some Iraqi troops uphold their sectarian allegiances above their loyalty to the state. Rogue units of Iraq's police forces – which are not under US control – have been accused of carrying out extrajudicial killings and torture."

The AP (12/1, Baldor) reports that Gen. Mixon "said Friday the transfer of responsibility for security from U.S. to Iraqi forces, reportedly among the recommendations of a special study group, already is under way." Mixon "said he is on track to place all four Iraqi army divisions in his area under Iraqi control by March."

The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 2, 2:00, Plante, 7.66M) reported, "In his meeting with the President yesterday, Iraq's prime minister insisted he could gain control of the sectarian violence if he had complete control of security forces. Mr. Bush agreed to speed that up and today the US commander of coalition forces in northern Iraq said that control of four Iraqi divisions will be transferred to Baghdad by March."

Iraqi Forces Train In Jordan. On ABC World News 12/1, story 3, 2:35, McCarthy) reported on a training site for Iraqi forces in the Jordanian desert, where 133,000 troops and 160,000 police "have been trained since the war began." Maliki "said this week, his forces will be ready to take over for the US within six months, a claim US military experts dispute." Ex-Army Vice Chief of Staff Gen. Jack Keane: "It's very difficult to imagine that in the next six months, these forces could be ready to assume responsibility in Iraq." McCarthy: "No amount of US advisers can teach Iraqis to be impartial in a country where religious identity has become a matter of life or death. Sectarian conflict can only be overcome if Maliki starts genuine reconciliation talks between Sunnis and Shiites. And that's something so far he's failed to deliver."

US Troops In Iraq Take On New Role. The AP (12/1, Burns) reports, "These are not normal times — not in a chaotic Iraq where President Bush is banking on improving Iraqi security forces so the American military can begin to pull out, or at least pull back. U.S. soldiers and Marines are being plucked out of combat positions to be "embedded" with Iraqi army and police units as trainers and advisers. ... U.S. commanders see this effort as the key to winding down American combat action in a country wracked by internal strife." However, "U.S. advisers are giving the program mixed reviews. Some of them complain they spend much of their time making sure Iraqi soldiers are paid and have the equipment they need." The AP adds, "In Vietnam the advising gave way to the introduction of hundreds of thousands of U.S. combat forces, whereas in Iraq the advisers are seen as a way to get combat forces out."

Negroponte Says Iraq's Cities Insecure, Enemy Hard To Spot. The AP (12/1) reports National Intelligence Director John Negroponte "says Iraq's cities are less secure and the enemy harder to identify in comparison to the situation in much of Vietnam when he served as a U.S. diplomat there in the 1960s. ... Negroponte said he sees more differences than similarities between the two conflicts. In Vietnam, for example, there was a clear enemy, given Soviet support of the North Vietnamese." He stated, "In Vietnam, the cities were secure. The province capitals were secure." Negroponte "said Iraqis must take more responsibility for their security and defense. The key, he said, is Baghdad, where the violence is greatest.."

Last Italian Troops Leave Iraq. AFP (12/1, Deshmukh) reports, "The last Italian troops in Iraq have headed home as Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki said his forces could take over the battered nation's security by June 2007. ... The Italians were deployed in Iraq's south along with British, Australians and Romanian forces. At least 31 Italian soldiers have been killed in Iraq since 2003. The troops were stationed in Nasiriyah, the provincial seat of Dhi Qar, a relatively peaceful region compared with Iraq's central and western regions where US forces are battling a raging insurgency and a brutal sectarian conflict."

Iraqi Professor Urges Dialogue With Iran, Syria. The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Perry, 850K) reports on refugee professor Naba Saleem Hadid: "Her message is simple: While life under Saddam Hussein was horrible, because of the violence and power struggles, life since the U.S. invasion is worse." While not calling for an American pullout, "she feels it is imperative for President Bush to work with leaders in Iran and Syria to cobble together a regional solution to suppressing the violence and repairing the massive damage."

Iraqi Civilian Death Toll Rises 43% In November. The AP (12/1, Gamel) reports, "An Interior Ministry official said Friday that 1,846 civilians were killed in Iraq in November, a 43 percent increase from the estimated toll in October." The October estimate was 1,289 dead. The AP adds, "Rising sectarian tensions have pushed the country toward the verge of civil war," saying that its own November count was 1,923.

Kasparov Claims US Is Overfocused On Iraq, Needs To Examine "Big Picture." In a commentary for the Wall Street Journal (12/2, 2.04M), former chess champion and political activist Gerry Kasparov writes, "Thirty years as a chess player ingrained in me the importance of never losing sight of the big picture. ... America and its allies are so focused on Iraq they are ceding territory all over the map. ... This dire situation is a result of the only thing worse than a failed strategy: the inability to recognize, or to admit, that a strategy has failed. Since the invasion of Iraq in March 2003, North Korea has tested a nuclear weapon. Iran is openly boasting of its uranium enrichment program while pouring money into Hezbollah and Hamas. A resurgent Taliban is on the rise in Afghanistan. Nearly off the radar, Somalia is becoming an al Qaeda haven. ... From Caracas to Moscow to Pyongyang, everyone follows their own agenda while ignoring President Bush and the U.N. ... So what then, to do? ... if allied troops leave Iraq, I won't say things can't get worse -- if we've learned anything, it's that things in the Middle East can always get worse; but at least the current deadly dynamic would be changed."

Afghan District Strikes Own Deal With Taliban. The New York Times (12/2, Gall, 1.16M) reports in a 1,583 word front page article, "After a series of bruising battles between British troops and Taliban fighters, the Afghan government struck a peace deal with tribal elders in Helmand Province, arranging for a cease-fire and the withdrawal of both sides from one southern district." The deal brought "welcome peace" but also "sharply divided former government officials, legislators and ordinary Afghans. ... Some say the agreement points the way forward in bringing peace to war-torn parts of the country. Others warn that it sets a dangerous precedent and represents a capitulation to the Taliban and a potential reversal of five years of American policy to build a strong central government."

Afghan Opium Crop Sets Record, Marking Failure Of Eradication Efforts. The Washington Post (12/2, DeYoung, 690K) reports in a front page article, "Opium production in Afghanistan, which provides more than 90 percent of the world's heroin, broke all records in 2006, reaching a historic high despite ongoing U.S.-sponsored eradication efforts, the Bush administration reported yesterday. In addition to a 26 percent production increase over past year -- for a total of 5,644 metric tons -- the amount of land under cultivation in opium poppies grew by 61 percent." The news, called "disappointing" by White House drug czar John Walters, adds to the alarm of US officials who "have increasingly described the drug trade as a problem that rivals and in some ways exceeds the Taliban, threatening to derail other aspects of U.S. policy." The Post adds, "After the overthrow of the Taliban government by U.S. forces in the fall of that year, the Bush administration said that keeping a lid on production was among its highest priorities. But corruption and alliances formed by Washington and the Afghan government with anti-Taliban tribal chieftains, some of whom are believed to be deeply involved in the trade, undercut the effort."

DOJ:

Buchanan Named Head Of DOJ's Office On Violence Against Women. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (12/2, Buckley) reports, "Mary Beth Buchanan has been named acting director of the Justice Department's Office on Violence Against Women." The PTR continues, "This Washington, D.C.-based office administers financial and technical assistance to communities around the country that are creating programs, policies and practices aimed at ending domestic violence, dating violence, sexual assault and stalking. … OVW's mission is to provide leadership in developing the nation's capacity to reduce violence against women through implementation of the Violence Against Women Act. The Office's ultimate goal is to change perceptions about violence against women so that those crimes are considered unacceptable and no longer tolerated in our society." The PTR adds, "As director, Buchanan will oversee the administration of approximately $400 million in grant funding. One of the program areas the grants will go to is the Campus Program. … The Grants to Reduce Violent Crimes Against Women on Campus program is designed to encourage institutions of higher education to adopt comprehensive, coordinated responses to violent crimes against women on campuses, including sexual assault, stalking, domestic violence, and dating violence. … Buchanan will continue to serve as United States Attorney for Western Pennsylvania in addition to her new challenges leading the OVW. … Appointed by President George W. Bush Sept. 5, 2001, and confirmed by the United States Senate Sept. 14, 2001, Buchanan is the first woman and youngest person in Pennsylvania's history to be presidentially appointed to this position."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Seeks Testimony Of Former Fidelity Trader's Mother. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, B3, Levitz) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission is trying to force the mother of a former Fidelity Investments trader to testify about purchase of shares made in her account at about the time the mutual-fund titan was buying the same security." The Journal continues, "Under securities laws, money managers and traders are forbidden from making a personal profit from their inside market knowledge of what their company is buying or selling, or from passing that information to others. Using that advance knowledge -- a practice often called 'front-running' -- can be valuable because stocks often rise after big firms like Fidelity make a purchase. … In a filing in U.S. District Court in Boston, the SEC says it wants to compel testimony from Concetta Donovan, mother of former Fidelity trader David Donovan Jr. Along with testimony, the SEC also wants both of Mr. Donovan's parents to produce documents in connection with the purchase of Covad Communications Group Inc. stock in Ms. Donovan's brokerage account in 2003. The SEC's filing says it is also investigating trading based on "material nonpublic information" in the shares of Comverse Technology Inc., and CellStar Corp. and certain other unidentified securities, though it provided few details." The Journal adds, "Richard E. Nicolazzo, a spokesman for Mr. Donovan, said 'he never took any actions that violated company policies and procedures' while at Fidelity and 'remains confident that when the inquiries are completed he will be vindicated.' … A lawyer for Concetta Donovan has said her client has been unable to testify because she is on pain medications 'that affect her ability to think clearly and process information,' the SEC filing said. … Fidelity spokeswoman Anne Crowley said the Boston firm alerted regulators to matters concerning Mr. Donovan in early 2005. He left the company in December 2004, according to National Association of Securities Dealers records."

The New York Times/Bloomberg (12/2) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission asked a federal court to force the parents of a former Fidelity Investments trader to cooperate in an investigation of whether they bought stock based on nonpublic information from their son." Bloomberg continues, "The parents, Concetta and David Donovan Sr., failed to comply with subpoenas issued in April 2005 in connection with their purchase of Covad Communications shares in 2003, according to a filing made by the S.E.C. Thursday in Federal District Court in Boston. Their son, David Donovan Jr., was a trader at Fidelity until March 2005, when he left the company. … The S.E.C. asserts in an affidavit that 55,000 Covad shares were purchased by a brokerage account owned by Concetta Donovan in August 2003 and were sold a month later for a profit of $89,775." Bloomberg notes, "The S.E.C. asked the court to order Concetta and David Donovan Sr. to provide documents and testify, and to show why they cannot comply with the subpoenas."

Judge Dismisses Lerach's Enron Suit Against Alliance Capital. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, B3, Lattman) reports, "The federal judge overseeing the Enron Corp. shareholders' class-action lawsuit has dismissed a $1 billion claim brought by plaintiffs' lawyer William Lerach against investment firm Alliance Capital Management LP, now known as AllianceBernstein LP." The Journal continues, "In a step unusual in securities class-action cases, U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon in Houston ordered the plaintiffs to pay Alliance's attorney's fees. She also stated that the payment of attorney's fees would be "more appropriate" to "be borne" by plaintiffs' counsel. … 'We're disappointed in her ruling but Judge Harmon calls 'em as she sees 'em,' said Mr. Lerach of Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins LLP. He added that he hopes the judge may change her view or that the plaintiffs may prevail on the issue on appeal, but he says that if attorney's fees 'are going to be paid, we're the ones who are going to pay them.'" The Journal adds, "LThe class-action lawsuit was brought against investment firms for alleged fraud related to their underwriting of Enron securities. … This particular claim concerned the service of an Alliance executive, Frank Savage, on Enron's board of directors and his signing of a false registration statement for the issuance of $1 billion of Enron bonds. … The shareholders alleged that Alliance had placed Mr. Savage on Enron's board to serve its own interest or, at the very least, approved Mr. Savage's Enron board service and thus controlled his actions on the board."

The New York Times (12/2, Norris) reports, "In a decision that she conceded flies in the face of previous rulings by other courts, a federal judge in Houston has ordered the law firm of William S. Lerach, a leading class-action lawyer, to pay the legal fees and costs of a company he sued." The Times continues, "The company, Alliance Capital, a money management firm, was sued by Mr. Lerach's firm as part of a large Enron class-action case. The lawsuit argued that Alliance should be held responsible for the Enron fraud because an Alliance official was also a director of Enron. … In a decision issued late Thursday, Judge Melinda Harmon of Federal District Court issued a summary judgment dismissing the case against Alliance, and also invoked a rule requiring the payment of Alliance's legal fees by the plaintiff's lawyer, on the ground that the case was pursued after it became clear it was without merit. The decision appears to be the first in which a law firm, and not the plaintiff, has been ordered to pay under that section of the securities law. … It is not clear how much the ruling will cost the Lerach firm, Lerach, Coughlin, Stoia, Geller, Rudman & Robbins of San Diego. Alliance, now known as AllianceBernstein, was directed to submit its bills for the months since Mr. Lerach's firm should have known the case was unreasonable."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Maryland Rabbi Sentenced In Internet Sex Sting. The Washington Post (12/2, B3, Markon) reports, "A Maryland rabbi caught in a television sting operation was sentenced to 6 1/2 years in prison yesterday for trying to solicit sex from a 13-year-old boy over the Internet." The Post continues, "David A. Kaye, 56, told the judge that he traveled to Herndon for what he thought would be sex with a boy 'as a cry out for help to fight my personal demons.' Sobbing as he acknowledged his father, who sat in the courtroom in a wheelchair, Kaye said his conviction had made him face 'the reality of who I am. . . . I know I need help. I pray that God allows me to get that help.'" The Post adds, "Kaye's attorney, Peter D. Greenspun, said the rabbi, who was featured last year on the 'To Catch a Predator' series on 'Dateline NBC,' kept his sexuality secret and spent thousands of hours chatting online in search of liaisons. … Kaye thought that he was chatting online with a young adult, Greenspun said. He said Kaye, who is divorced, is in therapy, and he urged a sentence on the low end of federal guidelines, which recommended a term of 63 to 78 months in prison. … But U.S. District Judge James C. Cacheris in Alexandria settled on 78 months and said Kaye would then face 10 years of supervised release. The judge said that during that time, Kaye will be forbidden to accept any job involving children, and he ordered him to never be around children younger than 18 without an adult present. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Ed Power had called for a tough sentence and said Kaye's conduct was 'a crime of violence in which he essentially tried to rape a 13-year-old boy.' … U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg said the lesson of the case 'is pretty simple: Stay away from our children.'"

The AP (12/2, Barakat) reports, "During yesterday's hearing, prosecutors said Kaye's crime was not an isolated incident and submitted affidavits from others who claimed Kaye engaged in improper conduct, including one incident at a youth camp as far back as 1974." The AP continues, "Details of that incident were not discussed, and the affidavits are under seal. Kaye denied any improper conduct. … The 78-month sentence from U.S. District Judge James Cacheris was at the high end of federal sentencing guidelines, and will be followed by an unusually long period of supervised release -- 10 years." The AP notes, "Kaye also will be required to register as a sex offender and is barred from having unsupervised contact with minors."

Consultant Pleads Guilty In Pennsylvania Bridge Commission Scam. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/2, Callas) reports, "Robert Stears, a consultant and lobbyist, pleaded guilty today to defrauding the Burlington County Bridge Commission of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and failing to pay federal taxes for six years." The Inquirer continues, "During his plea hearing before U.S. District Judge Jerome B. Simandle, Stears, 51, answered 'yes' to 31 allegations, holding his head in his hands as the list continued. … He admitted that he submitted inflated and fraudulent bills to the bridge commission from 1997 to 2003. He also did not file income tax forms from 1999 to 2004." The Inquirer adds, "In pleading guilty, Stears gave up his right to an appeal. His sentencing date is scheduled for March 30, and he faces up to 25 years in prison. … Stears told the court he created the Strategy Group, a Trenton consulting firm that performed lobbying and public relations work for the commission from 1997 to 2002. Stears admitted that he was the sole liaison between the commission and the consulting group and was aware of "virtually all transactions," the U.S. Justice Department said. Stears also said he prepared the invoices submitted to the commission monthly. … The company paid the group $300,000 a year from 1997-1999 and more than $500,000 a year from 2000 to 2002." The Inquirer notes, "In 2002, Stears received more than $300,000 in taxable income on which he did not pay income taxes; he owes $112,863 in taxes on that alone. He admitted that he tried to hide that money from the government in a checking account under the name of his new venture: Governmental Strategies. He did not file federal income taxes from 1999 to 2004, the justice department said."

Smartmatic Denies Tax, Bribery Allegations. The Miami Herald (12/2, Chardy, Weaver) reports, "Smartmatic, an international company with offices in Boca Raton, has contacted the Justice Department to deny allegations that its Venezuelan owners paid a bribe to secure a $91 million contract to supply electronic voting machines in Venezuela, an attorney for the firm said Friday. … 'We have informally told the Justice Department that there is no basis for these allegations,' said Jeffrey Bialos, a Washington, D.C. attorney retained by Smartmatic. … He said Justice officials told the company this fall that it was not the target of a criminal investigation, nor has it received any subpoenas. … The company, incorporated in Delaware, also denied allegations that it failed to pay U.S. income taxes." The Herald continues, "Smartmatic's denials mark yet another chapter in the convoluted saga of the Boca Raton firm that last year bought Sequoia Voting Systems of Oakland, Calif., one of the nation's leading suppliers of electronic voting machines. Sequoia machines operate in Washington, D.C. and 16 states, including four counties in Florida: Palm Beach, Indian River, Hillsborough and Pinellas. Smartmatic machines will be used in Sunday's presidential election in Venezuela. … Smartmatic also is being investigated by a Treasury-led panel over whether the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, increasingly at odds with President Bush, is a secret business partner. Smartmatic has denied any link to the Chávez government." The Herald notes, "In another development, Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y., who helped spark the Smartmatic probe by the Treasury-led Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, sent a letter Thursday to Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson Jr. to urge his agency to publicize its findings as soon as the review is completed. … The Wall Street Journal reported Friday that the Justice Department has been probing Smartmatic for possible violations of the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and possible tax evasion. A Justice Department spokesman on Friday refused to comment."

Former Connecticut Governor's Aide Awaits Sentencing On Corruption Charges. The New York Times (12/2, Cowan) reports, "To many people, Lawrence E. Alibozek epitomized much that was wrong with the ill fated administration of Gov. John G. Rowland of Connecticut. … From the moment Mr. Alibozek joined the governor's office as his deputy chief of staff in the fall of 1997, the improper favors flowed. It started with $9,500 from a state contractor so that he could buy a new car. Later, Mr. Alibozek's boss, Peter N. Ellef, handed him an envelope stuffed with cash in the Capitol parking lot with a promise of more to come." The Times continues, "After five years, enough money and gifts had changed hands at the highest levels of state government that federal prosecutors needed 22 pages to list everything that was taken and to tell a bit of the stories behind them. … In the case of Mr. Alibozek, there were limousine rides to hotels in Boston and New York, vacations in Maine and Florida, the use of a 65-foot yacht, and dinners and getaways for him and his mistress, a state official. There were the 40 gold coins he buried in his backyard — a symbol of corruption at its most blatant — that he had accepted in exchange for steering a contract. … But what the public did not know was how much the government's successful prosecution of Mr. Rowland on bid-rigging charges, which drove him from office in his third term, depended on Mr. Alibozek's cooperation, and the price he has paid." The Times notes, "Federal prosecutors advised Mr. Alibozek not to comment because they needed his testimony at a trial of his former associates. His own sentencing was put off until their cases were resolved so that the value of his assertions could be assessed. His lawyer, William T. Gerace, said yesterday: 'He's in limbo right now. He can't move on, and he'd like to.' … But now that those cases have been successfully prosecuted, Mr. Alibozek's own sentencing is scheduled for January, suggesting that the impasse may be ending. It will be a cathartic end to a long-running investigation in which he was derided as an unstable informer and a symbol for much of the misconduct, and later was the subject of harassment."

Chicago Water Department Employee Indicted In Political Hiring Probe. The Chicago Tribune (12/2, Bush, Mihalopoulos) reported, "Pressing forward with their investigation of Mayor Richard Daley's political machine, federal prosecutors unsealed an indictment Friday against a campaign coordinator in the powerful Hispanic Democratic Organization." John Resa, "an employee with the city's Water Management Department, was charged with lying when he told a grand jury that he had not sought city jobs to reward campaign workers for HDO. Prosecutors alleged that Resa regularly lobbied his superiors in HDO--including a former high-ranking city official--to get jobs, promotions and other benefits for his political workers. He pleaded not guilty Friday morning. Resa's indictment offered a new glimpse into how authorities are homing in on HDO, which for years was the most potent street army in Daley's political organization." The Chicago Sun-Times (12/2, Korecki, Novak) added, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins said Resa headed a political army made up of 70 to 80 volunteers. 'This is part of a bigger investigation that does allege a scheme,' Collins said. … Prosecutors call the charges against Resa an outgrowth of the Hired Truck federal probe," and he "is the 45th person charged in the investigation.

FBI Used New "Roving Bug" Technique In Genovese Probe. CNET News.com (12/1, McCullagh, Broache, 2:20 p.m. PST) reported, "The FBI appears to have begun using a novel form of electronic surveillance in criminal investigations: remotely activating a mobile phone's microphone and using it to eavesdrop on nearby conversations. The technique is called a 'roving bug,' and was approved by top U.S. Department of Justice officials for use against members of a New York organized crime family who were wary of conventional surveillance techniques such as tailing a suspect or wiretapping him. Nextel cell phones owned by two alleged mobsters, John Ardito and his attorney Peter Peluso, were used by the FBI to listen in on nearby conversations. The FBI views Ardito as one of the most powerful men in the Genovese family." CNET noted, "While the Genovese crime family prosecution appears to be the first time a remote-eavesdropping mechanism has been used in a criminal case, the technique has been discussed in security circles for years." In a ruling released last week, US District

Judge Lewis Kaplan "concluded that the 'roving bugs' were legally permitted to capture hundreds of hours of conversations because the FBI had obtained a court order and alternatives probably wouldn't work."

New Hampshire Democrats Settle 2002 Phone-Jamming Suit. The New York Times (12/2) reports the New Hampshire Democratic Party, "which had sought compensation in an Election Day 2002 phone-jamming scheme, settled its lawsuit against the Republican Party for an undisclosed sum, state Republicans said. The case had been expected to go to trial Monday. Republicans had hired a telemarketing firm to place hundreds of hang-up calls to phone banks for the Democrats and the Manchester firefighters' union, a nonpartisan group offering rides to the polls."

Las Vegas Police Recommend No Charges Against Gibbons. The Los Angeles Times (12/2) reports Las Vegas police "said they would recommend that no criminal charges be filed" against Nevada Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons, "who was accused by a cocktail waitress of assaulting her in a parking garage three weeks before election day. The investigation into Chrissy Mazzeo's accusation has been completed and sent to Clark County Dist. Atty. David Roger," who now "has the final say as to whether" Gibbons will face charges.

Los Angeles Archdiocese Settles 45 Sex Abuse Cases For $60 Million. The Washington Post (12/2, A2, Pomfret) reports, "Almost five years after a sex scandal erupted within the Roman Catholic Church, the nation's largest archdiocese announced Friday that it will pay $60 million to settle 45 lawsuits alleging sex abuse by priests." The Post continues, "The deal, which involves incidents alleged to have occurred before 1955 and after 1986, constitutes the largest settlement made by the archdiocese and follows years of legal battles waged under the leadership of Cardinal Roger Mahony. The archdiocese still faces more than 500 lawsuits by other individuals alleging sexual abuse." The Post adds, "Ray Boucher, the lead plaintiff's attorney, said the settlement involved 22 priests who were accused of a broad spectrum of sexual behavior, including impregnating a woman and multiple acts of sodomy against young boys. "You have serial pedophiles and priests accused of one or two acts," he said. The archdiocese will pay $52 million and religious orders $8 million, he said. … Jeff Anderson, another attorney in the case, said a main sticking point between the victims and the archdiocese was not so much the money but the victims' demands that documents held by the church related to sexual abuse be released to the public."

The New York Times (12/2, Chang) reports, "The average payment of about $1.3 million to each plaintiff is among the highest in a sexual abuse settlement involving clergy members. In October, the archdiocese settled seven other claims for a total of $10 million. … The archdiocese will pay $40 million of the settlement from its central operations fund with the rest coming from insurance money and the religious orders of the 25 accused clergymen. The money will not be taken from individual parishes, Cardinal Roger M. Mahony, the head of the archdiocese, said in a telephone interview." The Times adds, "Over 500 sexual abuse lawsuits are still pending against the archdiocese, the country's largest. Payouts in those cases would come mostly from insurance, but the archdiocese may have to sell property or reduce ministry services to make up the difference, Cardinal Mahony said. … 'Is it going to hurt? Oh sure, we could have used the money for other pastoral works,' he said. 'But it's also an acknowledgment and a recognition of our responsibility, that the church failed these people. The church accepts responsibility, and I accept responsibility.'"

The AP (12/2) reports, "Negotiations on the deal had been in progress for at least a year but were held up because attorneys for the plaintiffs wanted the church to release the accused priests' private files. … The agreement calls for an independent judge to review those files and decide which documents can be released to the victims. That process is expected to take several months."

CIVIL LAW:

SCOTUS To Hear Case Involving Office Of Faith-Based Initiatives. The New York Times (12/2, A11, Greenhouse) reports the Supreme Court "agreed Friday to decide whether private citizens are entitled to go to court to challenge activities of the White House office in charge of the Bush administration's religion-based initiative. A lower court had blocked a lawsuit challenging conferences the White House office holds for the purpose of teaching religious organizations how to apply and compete for federal grants. That constitutional challenge, by a group advocating the strict separation of church and state, was reinstated by an appeals court; the administration in turn appealed to the Supreme Court. … In its lawsuit challenging the White House conferences, filed in Federal District Court in Madison, Wis., in 2004, an organization called the Freedom From Religion Foundation named as defendants more than a dozen administration officials who oversaw or participated in the conferences." Judge John C. Shabaz of Federal District Court "dismissed the lawsuit for lack of standing, finding that the officials' activities were not sufficiently tied to specific Congressional appropriations. Taxpayers' objections to the use of general appropriations could not be a basis for standing, he said. The president's Faith-Based and Community Initiative was created through a series of executive orders and not by Congress, he noted."

Blind Community Welcomes Ruling On US Currency. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (12/2, Johnson) reports, "In a world where trust is in short supply, the kindness of strangers has always worked for Korene Kegg. … 'The five's on top,' said Lori Waleslagle, 26, of Debbie's Diner in Greenfield, as she handed back $9 in change to Kegg." The PTR continues, "Kegg, who has been blind since she was 5, can't possibly know if Waleslagle is telling the truth; still, the Greenfield woman instinctively folds what she believes to be that five neatly in half and then in half again, and keeps it separate from what presumably are four ones, after purchasing a hot tea from Waleslagle. … After living 22 years on Greenfield Avenue, Kegg, 49, said she knows the neighborhood well enough to trust most people. … Kegg's need for others to distinguish paper money might end if a recent court ruling holds." The PTR adds, "The American Council of the Blind filed a lawsuit four years ago in U.S. District Court in Washington, charging that the U.S. Treasury Department discriminates against the blind by not distinguishing denominations of paper money by size or feel. … The currency violates Section 504 of the federal Rehabilitation Act, which says the federal government shall not discriminate, said Day Al-Mohamed, director of advocacy and governmental affairs for the council. .. .U.S. District Judge James Roberston this week ordered the government to fix the problem. … The Justice Department has until Friday to decide whether to appeal to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, said Charles Miller, spokesman for the Justice Department's civil division, which is defending the Treasury Department in the case. … If it chooses not to appeal, Miller said, the government has 30 days from Tuesday's decision to discuss how to fix the problem."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Opens Civil Rights Investigation Of Florida Police Shooting. The AP (12/2) reported that in Fort Lauderdale, "The FBI has begun a civil rights investigation into the case of unarmed black man shot dead by police while driving a carjacked sport utility vehicle, authorities said. Troy Eddines, 21, was killed and Travis Jackson was wounded when the officers fired on the stolen vehicle they were riding in Tuesday. Two officers had pulled over the SUV, which reversed as they approached and hit one of them in the leg, authorities said." The AP noted, "The FBI opened its investigation Thursday after receiving phone calls from City Commissioner Carlton Moore and the NAACP, FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said. The death is the fourth fatal shooting by Fort Lauderdale police this year, authorities said."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (12/2, Johnson, Lewis) reported, "Two state legislators on Friday joined the chorus of black leaders calling for greater scrutiny of the Fort Lauderdale Police Department following this week's fatal police shooting." Rep. Perry Thurston "wrote a letter asking the Florida Department of Law Enforcement to investigate the three shootings that involved black men, saying his constituents 'question the tactics of our police department.'" Meanwhile, Sen. Mandy Dawson "said she would ask Senate leaders to take a statewide look at police-involved shootings to determine such factors as how often they occur and the age of officers involved." The Sun-Sentinel noted, "The FBI has already begun a civil rights investigation into Tuesday's fatal shooting."

SCOTUS To Consider "Bong Hits 4 Jesus" Case. The AP (12/2) reports, "The Supreme Court stepped into a dispute over free speech Friday involving a suspended high school student and his banner that proclaimed 'Bong Hits 4 Jesus.' … The justices agreed to hear the appeal by the Juneau, Alaska, school board and principal Deborah Morse of a lower court ruling that allowed the student's civil rights lawsuit to proceed. The school board hired former Whitewater prosecutor Kenneth Starr to argue its case to the high court." The AP continues, "Morse suspended Joseph Frederick after he displayed the banner, with its reference to marijuana use, when the Olympic torch passed through Juneau in 2002 on its way to the Winter Games in Salt Lake City. … Frederick, then a senior, was off school property when he hoisted the banner but was suspended for violating the school's policy of promoting illegal substances at a school-sanctioned event. … The Alaska case was one of three appeals the court accepted Friday. … It will also consider a request from the Bush administration to kill a lawsuit challenging the White House's promotion of federal financing for faith-based charities." The AP adds, "In the banner case, the school board upheld the suspension, and a federal judge initially dismissed Frederick's lawsuit. The 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals said the banner was vague and nonsensical and Frederick's civil rights had been violated. … At that point, the school board retained Starr, who investigated President Clinton's relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky. He took the case free of charge. … The appeals court said that even if the banner could be construed as a positive message about marijuana use, the school could not punish or censor a student's speech because it promotes a social message contrary to one the school favors."

Judge Ends DOJ Oversight Of Hawaii's Mental Health System. The AP (12/2) reports, "U.S. District Judge David Ezra has signed an order ending more than 15 years of federal oversight of (Hawaii's) mental health system." The AP continues, "The oversight, which began in 1991 with a U.S. Justice Department lawsuit alleging violations of the constitutional rights of patients at Hawai'i State Hospital, ended Thursday, state officials announced yesterday. … 'This is a historic moment in the reform of state services for persons in our community with severe and persistent mental illness who need hospital care and community-based follow-up,' state Department of Health Director Chiyome Fukino said. … 'The state has made tremendous improvements in our mental health system, and ... we will continue to move forward to build on and improve the way these services are provided,' she said." The AP adds, "The hospital emerged from oversight in late 2004, but the federal government kept watch over how the state provided services to the mentally ill in the community. On Oct. 24, Ezra cleared the way for the federal oversight to end when he essentially approved the latest federal magistrate's status report."

NYPD Identifies Fourth Man In Police Shooting. The New York Daily News (12/2, Gendar, Rouen, Siemaszko) reports, "A confidental NYPD document providing the most detailed account of the police shooting that plunged the city into crisis was obtained yesterday by the Daily News - as sources unmasked the mystery man who cops say fled the scene. High-ranking law enforcement sources identified Jean Nelson, a 27-year-old Queens man known on the streets as M.O., as the so-called fourth man." The News continues, "Investigators believe Nelson ran off just before the 50-shot police barrage that killed Sean Bell on his wedding day - a claim Nelson's lawyer and the two survivors reject as absurd." The News adds, "In the confidential police report obtained by The News, Lt. Gary Napoli, the highest-ranking officer at the shooting, references the mystery man - and says he believes Bell knew the plainclothes lieutenant was a cop before shots were fired. … Napoli says that he 'may have observed a male attempting to get into the passenger side' of Bell's car early Saturday outside a strip club in Jamaica, Queens, although he was unsure if the man was trying to get into the front- or backseat - or even if he got into the car. … Napoli also says that when his unmarked car passed Bell's Nissan Altima a 'male with whom he had made eye contact . . . knew that he was a police officer.' … Napoli, who ducked for cover when the shooting erupted, was not one of the five cops who fired, killing Bell, 23, and wounding Trent Benefield, 23, and Joseph Guzman, 31. .. The three men were not armed. Napoli's account is significant because Benefield and Guzman say Bell hit the gas thinking they were about to be carjacked - and insist they didn't know the plainclothes officers were cops."

Southern University Official Cooperating With DOJ In Sexual Harassment Probe Of Aide. The Baton Rouge Advocate (12/2, Blum) reports, "Southern University System President Ralph Slaughter is cooperating with a federal grand jury investigating sexual harassment allegations against governor's aide Johnny Anderson, who also is head of Southern's governing body, the lawyer representing Slaughter said Friday." The Advocate continues, "Slaughter responded to a subpoena and turned over all documentation of the claims Southern employees made against Anderson, said attorney Liz Craft of Baton Rouge. … The request came through the U.S. Department of Justice this week, said Craft, who personally represents Slaughter. … The information could not be confirmed through the Justice Department late Friday." The Advocate adds, "The Governor's Office received the allegations Oct. 31, Craft said. … Anderson is Gov. Kathleen Blanco's assistant chief of staff. He also is chairman of the Southern University System Board, which makes him Slaughter's boss. … Blanco recently ordered an independent investigation into the allegations led by Mark Falcon, a local lawyer." The Advocate notes, "Anderson has maintained his innocence and argued that the allegations are politically motivated, while criticizing Slaughter for not handling the matter internally. … Knowledge of the accusations against Anderson were first publicized a month after Slaughter sent a letter to state Sen. Charles D. Jones, D-Monroe, who is chairman of the Senate and Governmental Affairs Committee, asking for a confidential investigation. … Meanwhile, at news conference Friday, more than 100 people heard several pastors offer support to Anderson, including Southern Chancellor Ed Jackson, Athletics Director Greg LaFleur, former Attorney General Richard Ieyoub and Metro Councilman Byron Sharper."

Prince George's Police Criticized For Racial Profiling. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (12/2, A15), Miami Herald columnist Leonard Pitts Jr. writes, "I have a question for Prince George's County Executive Jack B. Johnson and Police Chief Melvin C. High. … It concerns my youngest son, who is 21. He was walking to his car at Bowie Town Center after working a shift at one of the stores there Sunday night when a police officer met him at his car and asked if he had seen anything 'suspicious.' Bryan said no. The officer asked where he was coming from. Bryan told him. The officer asked for his license and registration. Bryan gave them to him. … After 20 minutes my son was allowed to drive away. Less than two minutes later he was pulled over, still at the mall. He asked why. "I'll ask the questions," said this officer. The questions were: Where are you going, where are you coming from? Again, Bryan answered. Again, he was asked for his license and registration. A few minutes later, he was ordered out of his car with his hands up, and police began to search the vehicle. … Six police cars converged on this scene. Having received a call from a friend who happened to be at the mall, I went, too." Pitts continues, "I went because there are periods when Prince George's police pull one or another of my sons over about once a week. I went because a police officer once Maced my middle son in the face -- five people saw this -- for no reason. I went because that son was once punched in the face by a Prince George's officer while handcuffed. I went because of the time that police, looking for a 5-foot-7 suspect, arrested Bryan, who is 6-foot-3. I went because a police officer cursed my 16-year-old daughter one night after she refused to leave the safe and lighted area where she was waiting for her mom to pick her up from the movies. I went because I am sick and tired of being sick and tired. … And I went because of the obstructed windshield. .. .That's what it said on the citation when Bryan was pulled over last year. He went to court and took the 'obstruction' with him: one of those air fresheners in the shape of a Christmas tree. The judge barely bothered to hide her contempt while dismissing the charges." Pitts adds, "If somebody commits a crime -- my son or anybody else's son -- he or she should pay the price. I mean that. And I respect police who do that difficult and often thankless job with honor. I mean that, too. But the price my sons pay in being stopped with such regularity has nothing to do with crime, and I cannot respect arrogance, rudeness, wrongness and racial profiling that hide behind a badge. … For years we have been promised that all this will change. Yet there sits my son on the ground while police write up a citation. Windows too darkly tinted and an open-container violation -- which my son strongly denies -- are the latest excuses. .. .How can I respect a police force that operates like this? Until the county executive and the police chief give a better answer than their officer did Sunday, I'll assume they don't know either."

Los Angeles Fire Chief Resigns Over Racial Controversy. The Washington Post (12/2, A2, Geis) reports, "The Los Angeles fire chief was forced to resign yesterday amid a political firestorm sparked when the City Council offered a huge legal settlement to a black firefighter whose colleagues served him dog food. … After the Los Angeles City Council offered the firefighter a $2.7 million settlement last month, local radio talk show hosts ridiculed the size of the award and urged listeners to send cans of dog food to council members. Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa (D) vetoed the proposed settlement but also began distancing himself from Chief William Bamattre, who is white." The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Helfand, Hymon), the New York Times (12/2, A10, Steinhauer) and the AP (12/1) also report on the controversy.

NAACP Outlines Legislative Priorities. The Washington Times (12/2, A1, Debose) reports, "Democratic leaders will face pressure from minority voters to pass legislation during the next two years on many issues that have stalled in Congress, particularly those designed to close racial disparities." Hilary Shelton, the top NAACP lobbyist, "said two of the priorities are raising the minimum wage and extending a new version of the Ryan White Act, which provides funding for research and treatment for HIV/AIDS patients." Shelton "said laws setting a federal standard for appropriate use of force by police and punishments for racial profiling are also priorities. … Universal health care, particularly for children 'born and unborn' is also a top issue for the NAACP, as well as a measure to reduce mandatory minimum sentences for drug offenses."

WPost Claims FL13 Controversy Shows Need For "Paper Trail." The Washington Post (12/2, A14) editorializes, "it is strangely appropriate that six years after a controversy over hanging chads ended with George W. Bush in the White House, a fight over election results to fill [Rep. Katherine] Harris's 13th Congressional District seat is raising new questions about voting. A state audit is underway to determine why some 18,000 ballots in Sarasota County did not show votes in a race ultimately decided, by a mere 369 votes, in favor of the Republican candidate. … Unfortunately, the chances of finding a definitive reason for the 'missing' votes are diminished because of Florida's failure to require a way to verify and audit votes recorded by touch-screen voting machines. … Our support for a paper trail is not rooted in any belief that machines are to be mistrusted. Nor are we inclined to credit the theories about how election machines can be rigged. There is no evidence that any such fraud has occurred, and while there were scattered problems in the recent midterm election, overall the system functioned well."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Subpoenas AMD, Nvidia In Antitrust Probe Of PC Graphics Card Industry. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/2, C - 1, Pimentel) reports, "The Justice Department is investigating Advanced Micro Devices Inc. and Nvidia Corp. in a federal probe of possible antitrust violations in the computer graphics card industry." The Chronicle continues, "Both Silicon Valley companies, the two leading makers of PC graphics cards, said they have received subpoenas from the Justice Department, although the agency has not made any specific allegations. … In separate statements, AMD and Nvidia said they were cooperating with the investigation." The Chronicle adds, "Michael Hara, vice president of corporate communications at Nvidia, said the Justice Department requested documents going back eight or nine years. … 'It's a broad range of documents relating to customers, competitors, product stack, prices, market studies -- everything, pretty much,' he said. 'Our position now is to comply with their request and get them what they need.' … Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the agency does not comment on specific companies under investigation. … 'I will confirm that the antitrust division is investigating the possibility of anticompetitive practices involving the graphics processing units and cards industry,' she said in an e-mail."

The San Jose Mercury News (12/2, Poletti) reports, "This is the second Justice Department investigation in the semiconductor industry in the past two months. In October, Justice officials said they were looking into the static random access memory (SRAM) chip business. Cypress Semiconductor of San Jose, a maker of SRAMs used in cell phones and digital music players, said it was cooperating with the investigation." The News continues, "AMD entered the graphics business in October when it completed a $5.4 billion acquisition of ATI, a Markham, Ontario, developer of graphics chips. Analysts said they did not think AMD's acquisition of ATI was the cause or the target of the review by the Justice Department. … ATI and Nvidia are fierce competitors in the PC graphics chip business, where they develop the chips and add-on cards that boost graphics performance in PCs, especially the high-end systems favored by video gamers. Their chips render two- and three-dimensional graphics, making video games more lifelike with each new generation."

The AP (12/2, Elias) reports, "The AMD and Nvidia subpoenas come on the heels of a 4-year-old price-fixing probe among memory chip makers. To date, four companies and 17 people have been charged, and the Justice Department has secured fines totaling more that $731 million in the probe of the dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, industry. .. .Government investigators also have demanded Sony Corp., Cypress Semiconductor Inc., Samsung Electronics and Toshiba Corp. turn over information related to another flavor of memory chip - static random access memory, or SRAM."

Bloomberg (12/2, Stebbins) reports, "Federal investigators may be looking at the fact that Nvidia and larger rival ATI Technologies Inc. have similar pricing among some competing product lines, Doug Freedman, an American Technology Research analyst, said today in an interview. Advanced Micro Devices Inc., which bought ATI in October for $5.4 billion, was subpoenaed Nov. 29. … ATI is the second-largest maker of computer-graphics chips behind Intel Corp. The combination of Advanced Micro and ATI puts the merged company in direct competition with Intel and Nvidia for sales of graphics chips. Intel hasn't received a subpoena, said Chuck Mulloy, spokesman for the Santa Clara, California-based company." Bloomberg adds, "U.S. antitrust investigators have examined the market for memory chips used in computers and opened a probe in October into possible price-fixing for another type of memory chip used in cell phones, Freedman said. The Albany Times-Union (12/2, Rulison) also reports on the subpoena.

DOJ Seeks More Information On CBOT-Chicago Merc Buyout. The AP (12/2) reports, "The parent companies of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange and the Chicago Board of Trade said Friday that the Justice Department has requested additional information about their pending $8 billion deal to combine operations into a single unit." The AP continues, "Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc., which has agreed to be bought by its longtime crosstown rival, both said they plan to respond promptly and expect the transaction to close by mid-2007. They did not discuss specifics of the request, which they said was not unexpected." The AP adds, "The two exchanges announced an agreement in October to combine both the electronic and floor trading platforms of their more than century-old operations. The $8 billion deal will create the world's largest futures market. … The Justice Department, which must sign off on the deal, is assessing any potential anti-competitive impact formed by the powerhouse combination. Officials of the exchanges have said they don't expect it to encounter antitrust problems."

FCC Chairman Seeks To End Telecom Deal Impasse. The AP (12/2, Meyerson) reports, "FCC Chairman Kevin Martin on Friday initiated a process that may break the deadlock in the agency's vote on AT&T's proposed acquisition of BellSouth by allowing a fifth commissioner who had recused himself to participate." The AP continues, "Martin asked the general counsel for the Federal Communications Commission to consider whether Robert McDowell ought to be authorized to participate in the deliberations on the $81.6 billion deal, FCC officials said Friday. … The chairman sent letters to the relevant committees in Congress advising them of the request, according to McDowell's office and an FCC official who spoke on condition of anonymity because Martin's office had not issued a public statement." The AP adds, "McDowell, one of three Republicans on the five-person commission, had recused himself because he is a former lobbyist for a trade group that opposes the merger. … Without McDowell, the vote has been deadlocked at 2-2, with Martin and another Republican appointee favoring approval of the deal, and the two Democrats demanding the companies offer additional concessions to ensure it doesn't harm consumers." The AP notes, "The Antitrust Division of the Justice Department cleared the deal Oct. 11, declaring that there were no competitive concerns and opting not to require the combined company to divest any assets or make any other concessions. The takeover, the biggest ever in U.S. telecommunications history, also has been approved by regulators in 18 states, leaving the FCC as the final hurdle."

The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Puzzanghera) reports, "With McDowell on the sideline, the commission has been split evenly between Republicans and Democrats. Martin said he wanted the FCC to approve the deal unconditionally, and Republican Deborah Taylor Tate was expected to back him. … But upset that the Justice Department gave unconditional approval to the deal in October, the two Democratic commissioners, Michael J. Copps and Jonathan S. Adelstein, have pressed for the FCC to impose strong conditions. They are concerned about the clout that would be created by the merger. A more muscular AT&T would dominate the market in California and 21 other states." The Times adds, "Among the sticking points are requirements that the Democrats would like to impose to prevent AT&T from charging some websites for higher-speed delivery of their content, an issue known as network neutrality. .. .Negotiations have been going on for seven weeks and Martin has postponed scheduled votes three times. With another commission meeting set for Dec. 20 and AT&T and BellSouth pushing for approval before the end of the year, Martin is trying to bring McDowell into the process."

Microsoft On Trial For Allegedly Overcharging Iowans. Bloomberg (12/2, Van Voris) reports, "Microsoft Corp. used its monopoly position to overcharge Iowans for software products including Windows, Word and Excel, a lawyer told jurors Friday at the opening of an antitrust trial in Des Moines." Bloomberg continues, "Roxanne Conlin, representing statewide buyers of Microsoft products since 1994, said the company violated Iowa antitrust law by taking advantage of monopolies in personal computer operating systems and software applications to charge inflated prices. … 'The law requires of Microsoft what it requires of all companies: that they compete fair and square,' Conlin told a jury of seven men and five women. 'Microsoft did not.'" Bloomberg adds, "The lawsuit is one of only two such cases Microsoft hasn't settled or persuaded judges to dismiss. The customers claim $329 million in damages, and a jury award can be tripled under Iowa antitrust law. … The Iowa case and one in Mississippi are the last of dozens filed by groups of consumers after an antitrust suit against Microsoft brought by the U.S. government and several states, including Iowa, in 1998. … The company settled the case, agreeing to give computer makers the freedom to promote competing software programs, such as Web browsers and media players, for prominent display on Windows-powered personal computers."

House GOP Plans Vote On Offshore Drilling Bill. The Washington Times (12/2) reports House Republicans "agreed yesterday to move a compromise offshore-drilling bill passed by the Senate this summer that would open new territory in the Gulf Coast area to oil rigs and create a cash cow for nearby states. But it wasn't clear whether party leaders could summon enough votes to pass it quickly before lawmakers adjourn in the coming weeks. … Republican leaders will send the measure to the floor Tuesday as a 'suspension' bill requiring a two-thirds majority to pass, said Kevin Madden, a spokesman for House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio." The Times notes, "House leaders previously had blocked the bill, hoping for more ambitious legislation that would allow drilling in coastal waters across the country unless a state objects. But industry groups have lobbied heavily for Republicans to take what they can get and pass the Senate bill."

WPost Criticizes Administration, Congressional Inaction On Energy. The Washington Post (12/2, A14), in an editorial, writes, "Ever since President Bush lamented the nation's addiction to oil in his State of the Union address, energy policy has been on the rhetorical agenda. But neither the administration nor Congress has shown much appetite for action beyond subsidies for research on alternative fuels."

Voters In The West Seen As Embracing Conservation Measures. The Washington Post (12/2, A1, Harden) reports that in the 90s, "Working-class indignation exploded in the Interior West against environmentalists, Democrats and outside agitators, stalling efforts by the Clinton administration to rewrite grazing, mining and forestry laws. … Last month's elections, though, may signal the end of Republican dominance and fierce resistance to many conservation measures." Voters in the west "rejected ballot measures that could have shredded state and local land-use rules limiting growth, controlling sprawl and ensuring open space. Voters in Idaho, Washington and California soundly defeated 'takings' measures, intended to compensate individual owners whose land is devalued by land-use or zoning laws." The Post adds, "At the same time, Democrats consolidated gains from 2004, picking up the governorship in Colorado, a Senate seat in Montana and two House seats in Arizona. … Perhaps more significant, Democratic and Republican politicians from New Mexico to Montana have found common ground with hunters and anglers in opposing widespread energy development on wild public lands, halting drilling in several areas where the public felt that wildlife and scenic values trumped economic consideration."

SF Chronicle Appeals Order To Imprison BALCO Reporters. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/2, Page B - 1, Egelko) reports, "The Chronicle, challenging a judge's order to imprison two of its reporters for refusing to reveal who leaked grand jury testimony about athletes and steroids, told a federal appeals court Friday that the public interest and evolving legal doctrines require recognition of a journalist's right to protect confidential sources. … 'Confidentiality is essential for the reporters to sustain the relationships they need with sources and to obtain sensitive information from them,' Jonathan Donnellan, a lawyer for the newspaper and the reporters, said in papers filed with the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco. 'Without it, the press cannot effectively serve the public by keeping it informed.'" The Chronicle continues, "The contempt-of-court order against the two reporters, if upheld, would be 'an unprecedented extension of subpoena power against the press,' the brief argued, saying the only comparable cases in the past have involved national security." The Chronicle adds, "The brief said the reporting in this case did no harm to the prosecution, which had long since concluded, and had served the public interest by exposing steroid use by prominent athletes and triggering a national debate. … The court should adopt a new standard for evaluating reporters' claims of confidentiality in cases of grand jury leaks, the newspaper argued -- weighing the value of information revealed by the reporting against the damage, if any, caused by the leak. Such a balancing test has not yet been accepted by federal courts, which have upheld grand juries' power to compel testimony from journalists. … The brief also argued that the judge who ordered the reporters confined for up to 18 months in September gave too little weight to a 1996 U.S. Supreme Court ruling that allowed psychotherapists to refuse to disclose information from their patients. That decision compels federal courts to extend the same rights to journalists, the brief said."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pelosi Chooses Reyes To Head Intelligence Committee. Fox News' Special Report (12/1, story 5, Wilson) reported that incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi selected Rep. Sylvester Reyes to head the House Intelligence Committee." Fox noted, "In doing so, Pelosi passed over two more senior members of the committee, California Congresswoman Jane Harman and Florida Congressman Alcee Hastings. Harman's term as the panel's top Democrat expires this year, and critics said it would have been a mistake to choose Hastings, who was impeached by Congress back when he was a federal judge. Reyes, who voted against authorization of the war in Iraq, said today he considers Iraq the number one issue for his committee, but he does not want the US to leave Iraq a terrorist haven, as Afghanistan was under the Taliban."

The AP (12/1, Shrader) reports National Intelligence Director John Negroponte and CIA Director Michael Hayden "issued statements welcoming Reyes' selection. 'His comprehensive understanding of the intelligence community and the challenges it faces, ideally qualifies him for this important chairmanship,' Negroponte said."

The Houston Chronicle (12/2, Mittelstadt) reports Texas Republicans and Democrats "alike praised Reyes, saying his experience and bipartisan nature would be important assets. 'He is the perfect choice,' said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison. 'He will not be partisan. He will be independent.'"

The Washington Times (12/2, Fagan) reports, "The outgoing intelligence panel chairman offered his good wishes as well, even as he urged a bipartisan atmosphere next year. 'The threats and challenges facing our great nation know no political bounds,' said Rep. Peter Hoekstra." The Times adds that "Reyes has made some bipartisan moves in the past, including praising the nomination of former CIA Director Robert M. Gates to be the next defense secretary." The web sites of The Hill (12/1, Hearn) and Roll Call (12/1, Yachnin) provide brief reports on Reyes' selection.

Reyes Pledges To Challenge Administration On Surveillance, Detainees. The Washington Post (12/2, A4, Weisman) reports Reyes "signaled that he will use his post to confront the Bush administration on national security and intelligence issues that he said Republicans have shied away from. 'On warrantless tapping, on their policy on detention and interrogation, their policy on secret prisons, all of those have undermined our position in the world,' Reyes said in an interview yesterday. 'And we have been complicit in Congress by rubber-stamping everything the administration has proposed.'"

The AP (12/1, Shrader) reports Reyes "has said he will demand more information on the Bush administration's most classified programs, including the detention of enemy combatants and the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance of domestic communications. He also plans to focus on the war in Iraq, threats from terrorists, the spread of weapons, diversity at U.S. intelligence agencies and civil liberties. … In a recent interview, Reyes said Republicans have made a habit of rubber-stamping the Bush administration's programs. Democrats, he said, must act quickly to show they will dig deeply into the government's actions."

Harman Preempts Pelosi's Announcement. The New York Times (12/2, A1, Mazzetti, Zeleny) reports Pelosi "sent a strong new signal on Friday that Democrats intend to confront the White House by naming" Reyes, "who opposed the war in Iraq" over Rep. Jane Harman of California, "a more hawkish figure who voted to authorize the war in Iraq and a political rival with whom Mrs. Pelosi has long had a stormy relationship." Pelosi "called Ms. Harman on Friday morning to deliver the news, and the two…spoke for about 10 minutes, according to people familiar with both sides of the conversation." Harman, "though, beat Mrs. Pelosi to the punch in announcing the news. In a break of political protocol, she sent out a statement congratulating Mr. Reyes before Mrs. Pelosi's office had even made the appointment official."

The Houston Chronicle (12/2, Mittelstadt) reports Reyes "may have helped himself by not lobbying Pelosi directly for the chairmanship because, he said, she knew him well from their prior service together on the Intelligence Committee. Pelosi, who has strained relations with Harman, was reportedly angered when her fellow Californian launched an aggressive campaign for the job. Pelosi this week bypassed Hastings, who was impeached as a federal judge, after critics questioned his suitability for the sensitive job."

Reyes' Travels With Weldon Draw Intelligence Community's Scrutiny. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, A4, Rogers, Solomon) reports Reyes "faces some skepticism in the intelligence community -- ironically, because of Mr. Reyes's travels with" Rep. Curt Weldon, who was defeated last month." The Journal notes that as a member of Armed Services, Reyes "has frequently traveled overseas as part of delegations led by" Weldon and "has made high-profile stops in North Korea, Libya and Russia in recent years. … An August 2003 trip included a stopover in Paris that drew the ire of the Central Intelligence Agency, according to two recently retired members of the agency's Directorate of Operations. Included was a meeting at a Paris hotel with group of Iranian exiles to discuss Iran's alleged role in terrorism and developing weapons of mass destruction. Among the leaders of the Iranian delegation was Manucher Ghorbanifar, a central figure in the Reagan administration's Iran-Contra scandal and a man the CIA had accused of providing bogus intelligence to the Americans. In an interview Friday, William Murray, who was the CIA's station chief in Paris at the time, said he tried to prevent the lawmakers from going to the meeting after he learned that Mr. Ghorbanifar would be attending. But he said that his advice went unheeded. 'Reyes was one of the guys who met with Ghorbanifar,' Mr. Murray said. Mr. Reyes's office said Friday that he has never met with Mr. Ghorbanifar, and didn't attend the hotel meeting during the Paris stopover.

Reyes' Family's Ties To Contractor Were Subject Of Investigation. The Washington Post (12/2, A4, Weisman) reports Reyes "has been linked to past controversies. The inspector general of the government's General Services Administration looked into the serious failures of a $239 million network of cameras and sensors along the Mexican and Canadian borders, an investigation that focused in part on the contractor's employment of Reyes's daughter Rebecca. Reyes has been a key backer of the system and its contractor, International Microwave Corp. Shortly after its 1999 contract award, the firm hired Rebecca Reyes to serve as a liaison to what was then the Immigration and Naturalization Service. She ultimately became IMC's vice president for contracts. IMC also hired her brother, Silvestre Reyes Jr., as a technician on the program, known as the Integrated Surveillance Intelligence System, or ISIS. Rep. Reyes said that he never interceded on his daughter's behalf or with U.S. officials to help her company win a contract, and that he backed the firm's search for funding only because he supports the system of border sensors and cameras. And, he said, the investigation was concluded with no charges of improprieties by the company, his daughter or himself."

Senate GOP Reportedly Planning To Oust Roberts From Intelligence. The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Miller) reports, "Senate aides said GOP leaders planned to remove Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) as the top Republican on the panel. Possible replacements include Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) and Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), the outgoing chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. A spokeswoman for Roberts declined to comment."

Gates Business Ties Raise Concerns. The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Roche, 850K) reports that as Robert Gates "awaits Senate confirmation as President Bush's secretary of Defense, ethics watchdogs worry about the revolving door between government and private business that allowed Gates to align himself with defense contractors, investment houses and a global drilling company" involved with Halliburton. The Bush Administration "has been dogged by allegations that past corporate affiliations of administration officials led to favored treatment in federal contract awards." Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld was allowed "to keep holdings worth as much as $25 million in Gilead Sciences Inc., a California company that developed a drug used to treat bird flu. Gilead, for which Rumsfeld served as board chairman, has seen its stock prices soar with sales to the Pentagon and other government customers." Gates "had no more than $165,000 in savings and retirement accounts [when he left government in 1993]. Now, he has $1.1 million in holdings with Fidelity Investments, as well as stock holdings in some of the companies where he has served as director." He has advised "10 different companies, assessing issues as varied as Saudi oil drilling, mutual fund performance and restaurant sales at Romano's Macaroni Grill."

DOD's Cambone To Resign At End Of Year. Undersecretary of Defense for Intelligence Stephen Cambone's resignation was covered by wire services but not by newspaper staff reporters. AFP (12/1) reports that Cambone "is the most senior Pentagon official to announce he is leaving since US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld tendered his resignation last month." He was a "key player in [Rumsfeld's] efforts to transform the US military into a lighter, high tech force and in carving out a larger role for US military intelligence." Despite "criticism from some in Congress that [DOD] was intruding on turf traditionally dominated by the CIA," DCI Hayden called allegations of Pentagon-CIA feuding "an urban legend." The AFP calls Cambone "one of the last members of the original team that came to the Pentagon with Rumsfeld."

The AP (12/1, Baldor) reports that he becomes "the first key department member to leave in the wake of Rumsfeld's resignation. ... The Pentagon's intelligence-gathering has come under fire during Cambone's tenure, with critics accusing the Defense Department of trying to take expanded control over the nation's intelligence activities. Cambone was in charge of intelligence when it was disclosed a year ago that a Pentagon database of suspicious activities contained the names of anti-war groups that had been found not be security risks." More than 30 sites carried the AP story.

Bushes Host First Of 24 White House Holiday Parties. The Washington Post (12/2, Argetsinger, Roberts) "Reliable Source" column writes that the President and the First Lady "hosted the first of 24 White House holiday-season parties last night…just hours after the first lady unveiled this year's decorations, inspired by the mansion's Red Room." Two 12-foot trees "covered in poinsettias greeted guests in the Grand Foyer, along with vases of red carnations, lots of candy canes, cranberry topiaries and 4,638 shiny red balls on the trees and garlands. The 18-foot Douglas fir in the Blue Room is decorated in glass, crystal and that cottony kind of fake snow, as well as tiny red bows." Mrs. Bush said "the tree upstairs in the private residence is covered with family ornaments."

President, First Lady Marks World AIDS Day. The AP (12/1) reports President Bush "marked Worlds AIDS Day on Friday by declaring: "The pandemic of HIV/AIDS can be defeated." Bush and first lady Laura Bush met in the Roosevelt Room with Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt, U.S. Global AIDS Coordinator Mark Dybul and community leaders from the U.S. and Africa. 'It's a day for the world to recognize the fact that there are 39 million people living with HIV/AIDS,' Bush said. 'And a day to remember the fact that 25 million people have died of AIDS.' Bush's AIDS initiative, announced in 2003, is the largest international health initiative dedicated to a single disease." Bush "also urged Congress to reauthorize the $2.1 billion Ryan White Care Act, the largest federal program specifically for people with HIV/AIDS."

The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 6, 2:25, Couric) reported, "Today is World AIDS Day. It's been 25 years since we first heard medical and media reports of a baffling and deadly new disease. Now, of course, it's no longer new and it's taken a terrible toll. More than 64 million infected worldwide, more than 23 million dead. And just last year, despite all the medical advances, more than four million new cases." The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 7, 2:30, Couric) also aired an interview with Melinda Gates on the Gates Foundation's anti-AIDS efforts.

GSA Administrator Accused Of Comparing IG Staff To Terrorists. The Washington Post (12/2, A1, Higham, O'Harrow) reports GSA Administrator Lurita Alexis Doan "is trying to limit the ability of the agency's inspector general to audit contracts for fraud or waste and has said oversight efforts are intimidating the workforce, according to government documents and interviews." Doan, described as "a Bush political appointee and former government contractor," has "proposed cutting $5 million in spending on audits and shifting some responsibility for contract reviews to small, private audit contractors. Doan also has chided Inspector General Brian D. Miller for not going along with her attempts to streamline the agency's contracting efforts. In a private staff meeting Aug. 18, Doan said Miller's effort to examine contracts had 'gone too far and is eroding the health of the organization,' according to notes of the meeting written by an unidentified participant from the Office of Inspector General (OIG)." Doan "compared Miller and his staff to terrorists, according to a copy of the notes obtained by The Washington Post. 'There are two kinds of terrorism in the US: the external kind; and, internally, the IGs have terrorized the Regional Administrators,' Doan said, according to the notes."

"Icy Exchange" Makes Webb "A Folk Hero" On The Left. The Washington Post (12/2, B1, Shear) reports, "An icy exchange between President Bush and Virginia Sen.-elect James Webb that was made public this week has turned Webb into something of a folk hero among critics of the president, who have longed for someone to challenge his bravado. At the same time, Webb's refusal to play the gentlemanly political games so common in Washington has angered conservatives and renewed questions about how well he fits with other politicians in a sharply divided Congress, where compromise will be key. … But Webb chief of staff Paul J. Reagan said the senator-elect is going to be effective once he takes office next month." Reagan added, "He does not consider the incident two weeks ago to be consequential." The Post notes, "Among hundreds of comments posted on The Washington Post Web site, many Virginia residents and others praised Webb's courage in standing up to Bush."

Noonan Criticizes Bush Over Webb Exchange. In her column for the Wall Street Journal (12/2, P12) Peggy Noonan writes, "The latest example of a lack of grace in Washington is the exchange between Jim Webb and President Bush at a White House Christmas party. Mr. Webb did not want to pose with the president and so didn't join the picture line. Fair enough, everyone feels silly on a picture line. Mr. Bush approached him later and asked after his son, a Marine. Mr. Webb said he'd like his son back from Iraq. Mr. Bush then, according to the Washington Post, said: 'That's not what I asked you. How's your son?' Mr. Webb replied that's between him and his son. For this Mr. Webb has been roundly criticized. And on reading the exchange I thought it had the sound of the rattling little aggressions of our day, but not on Mr. Webb's side. Imagine Lincoln saying, in such circumstances, 'That's not what I asked you.' Or JFK. Or Gerald Ford! 'That's not what I asked you' is a sentence straight from cable TV, from which many Americans are acquiring an attitude toward public and even private presentation."

Coast Guard Finds Defect In Patrol Boats. The Washington Post (12/2, D1, Merle, 690K) reports, "Months after a whistle-blower took to the popular Web site YouTube to warn of communications problems with converted patrol boats, the Coast Guard says it has stopped using the ships after finding structural problems that made them potentially dangerous. ... In August, Michael De Kort, a former engineer at Bethesda-based Lockheed Martin, posted a 10-minute video saying there were blind spots in the ships' security cameras, equipment that malfunctioned in cold weather and other problems. But the Coast Guard said yesterday that the problems that prompted the sidelining of the ships were structural. 'They had nothing to do with secure communications,' said Cmdr. Jeff Carter, the Coast Guard's chief spokesman." The Post adds, "The ships were part of a massive modernization program run by Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman to replace the service's aging ships and helicopters. But the four-year-old program has seen cost increases -- from $17 billion to $24 billion -- and run into technical and management problems."

Teach For America Profiled. NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 9, 3:00, Williams) ran a feature on "one woman's mission to help some of the nation's most vulnerable children get a good education. What started out as a small idea -- young people teaching other young people -- a program called Teach for America is so big now it's as selective in picking young people to be teachers as Ivy League schools are in deciding who can be students." The group founded by Wendy Kopp "is making a difference for children and teachers alike."

LATimes Endorses Democrats' College Affordability Agenda. The Los Angeles Times (12/2) editorializes, "college affordability was one of the Democrats' main campaign promises this year. It was a pledge calculated as much to frustrate Republicans as to please working- and middle-class families. Who wants to oppose giving more students a chance at college? The outgoing Congress had made itself curiously vulnerable on the issue, cutting funding for Pell Grants, which go to the most impoverished students, and moving too slowly to end unnecessary subsidies to private lenders, though the worst were eventually eliminated. … Some Republicans have made the argument that giving students more financial assistance will only encourage colleges to raise their fees. This has it backward. Students need more financial assistance to cope with rising college fees. At any rate, Republicans would be better off working with Democrats to help make college more affordable for working families — of any political stripe.

Congressional Democrats Encouraged To Pursue Ethics Reform. In an op-ed for the New York Times (12/2, A15) Josh Chafetz, a student at the Yale Law School, writes, "With three-quarters of voters in the recent election saying that corruption and scandals helped determine how they cast their ballots, one of the first items of business for the Democrats in January should be putting their Congressional houses in order. … The new Democratic leadership can get off on the right foot by making a serious and sustained effort at self-regulation, even if that means some uncomfortable moments around the caucus table."

Weak Manufacturing Report Has Investors Warily Waiting For Fed's Move. In a pessimistic report, the Washington Times (12/2, Hill) says "economic weakness spread beyond the stricken housing and auto sectors last month, with reports showing U.S. manufacturing shrank for the first time in 3 1/2 years and construction dropped the most" since 9/11. US industries "broadly cut back production, adding to factory shutdowns caused by deepening recessions in auto- and housing-related industries such as wood, furniture and appliances." At the same time, an "unexpected decline in construction of offices and other business facilities in October added to a record string of drops in housing construction of more than 1 percent in the last seven months to cause the biggest drop in construction spending in six years." The New York Times (12/2, C6) also says the manufacturing report raised "concerns that the economy will not be able to achieve a soft landing."

The Washington Post (12/2, D1, Henderson) says many investors "aren't buying the Federal Reserve's forecast for a mild economic slowdown, worrying that a series of recently released figures might signal the onset of a sharper, more prolonged slump. Stock prices fell yesterday and the dollar extended its recent decline" after the construction spending news, which followed reports last week "showing the holiday shopping season got off to a tepid start and that new orders for big-ticket durable goods like airplanes and automobiles fell sharply in October."

The Wall Street Journal (12/2, A3, Conkey) also says the data provide "new ammunition to those who view the Federal Reserve's upbeat economic outlook as overly optimistic." There is "a big divide between bond-market investors and Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke over the next move on interest rates. The bond market is pessimistic about the prospects for near-term economic growth and views inflation as contained," and hopes for lower interest rates. But Bernanke "has struck a more sanguine note, saying the weakness is primarily confined to the housing market."

Stock Markets Decline. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, B1, Lahart) reports, "With less than a month left to the year, the question for investors is whether they should be singing 'Deck the Halls' or worrying that the economy is about to get decked. Stocks fell for the second week in a row and Treasury yields dropped to their lowest level in more than 10 months." The Dow Jones Industrial Average closed at 12194.13 Friday, down 27.80 points. The S&P 500 was down 3.92 points to 1396.71, and the Nasdaq down 18.56 points to 2413.21. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, Browning) also has a front-page story on the strategies of investors as the year draws to a close.

Dollar Continues To Fall. The Financial Times (12/2, Garnham, Brown-Humes, Guha) reports the dollar "fell further on Friday as weak US economic data heightened investor fears that the country's economy could be heading for a hard landing." The New York Times (12/2, C1, Weisman) says the "fluctuations of the dollar have unsettled many in the world of finance this last week, when it sagged about 2 percent against the euro, bringing its decline this year to more than 12 percent. On Friday, the dollar fell to 1.33 euros; it dropped against the British pound as well, with it now taking $1.98 to buy a pound."

Automobile Sales Slow As GM, Ford Plan Production Cuts. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, A3, Kosdrosky, Stoll) reports US automobile sales "downshifted in November to the slowest seasonally adjusted pace since October 2005" as both GM and Ford said they will cut North American production "in the first quarter of 2007 amid signs of flattening demand." The Washington Post (12/2, D2, Altman) adds that Toyota sold more vehicles than Ford in the US last month, "the second time that the No. 2 domestic automaker was outsold by its Japanese rival." The New York Times (12/2, C4, Bunkley) says Ford "fell into fourth place in November for the first time in its history," behind GM, Toyota, and DaimlerChrysler. The Financial Times (12/2, Simon) says "troubled" Ford's sales fell by 9.6% in November from a year earlier. NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 8, 2:50, Williams) reported on the "bad news today for Ford" as a lead-in to a report on auto workers migrating from Michigan to Wyoming for energy industry jobs. Meanwhile, the New York Times (12/2, C1, Maynard) has a report on the drama inside GM, "wrestling with one of the biggest financial crises in its history," where Kirk Kerkorian sold off the last of his $1.2 billion in shares this week.

WSJournal Lauds Report On US Decline In Competitiveness. The Wall Street Journal (12/2, A8) editorializes, "It won't be news to readers of these columns that increased regulatory burdens and litigation costs are undermining the competitive position of America's capital markets. But this week's interim report from the blue-ribbon Committee on Capital Markets Regulation performs a public service by marshaling evidence of the decline that is hard to refute. … The report's best contribution is the seriousness with which it examines the evidence of U.S. competitive decline -- evidence that defenders of the status quo should now be obliged to answer."

Obama Joins Brownback At Evangelical AIDS Event. The AP (12/1) reports, "Potential presidential candidate," Sen. Barack Obama "stood before one of the country's largest evangelical churches Friday and declared that condoms should be made more widely available to fight AIDS. The Democratic senator's appearance at" Rev. Rick Warren's Saddleback "megachurch was a source of dispute among evangelical leaders, with some of the most conservative saying that a politician who supports abortion rights should not have been allowed to speak at such a prominent church. … In a show of political unity, Obama took an AIDS test with a potential White House rival on the Republican side" -- Sen. Sam Brownback. The AP adds that "in another show of bipartisanship, the Illinois senator said President Bush doesn't get enough credit for committing $15 million against HIV and AIDS over five years."

The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Finnegan) reports Obama "drew a standing ovation from the 2,072 pastors and others who came from 39 states and 18 nations. … 'We can't ignore the fact that abstinence and fidelity, although the ideal, may not always be the reality — that we're dealing with flesh and blood men and women and not abstractions, and that if condoms and, potentially, things like microbicides, can prevent millions of deaths, then they should be made more widely available,' he said."

Some Conservatives Upset By Obama's Appearance. ABC World News (12/1, story 7, 2:30, Gibson) reported, "In this country, one AIDS Day event produced sharp political controversy. The event was at the California church of pastor and awe tore, Rick Warren. He came under fire from some fellow evangelicals who objected to one of his invited guests. … Rick Warren hosted his annual AIDS Summit today. Among others, he invited Democratic Senator Barak Obama, who took a public HIV test. The idea -- to come together to raise awareness about the importance of testing for AIDS." According to ABC, "many conservative Christian leaders, who were furious with Warren for inviting Obama. Why? Because the Senator supports abortion rights. 18 leading Christian conservatives wrote to Warren, 'If Senator Obama cannot defend the most helpless citizens in our country, he has nothing to say about the AIDS crisis. You cannot fight one evil while justifying another.'"

Warren said on MSNBC's Tucker (12/1, Carlson), "Everybody knows that I'm staunchly pro-life. … So that I would be criticized by pro-lifers is pretty ludicrous to me, but the real issue is if you can only work with people that you agree with 100%, you will never get anything done. … In the last session, I had two senators speak, one the face of compassionate conservatism and I think the other is the face of compassionate liberalism, and what they have in common is the compassion. And that's why we brought them here, because they care about AIDS, not because all of their different viewpoints."

Dowd Notes Controversy Over Obama's Middle Name: Hussein. The New York Times (12/2, A15, Dowd) reports, "If you call Barack Obama's office to check the spelling of his middle name, the reply comes back: 'Like the dictator.' In the first rush of our blind date with the young senator from Illinois, we are still discovering things that are going to take some getting used to. Like his middle name: Hussein. … There hadn't been much focus on" Obama "having the same name as the Butcher of Baghdad until a Republican operative dropped the H-bomb on 'Hardball' this week. Ed Rogers, a Bush 41 official, said he was underwhelmed with 'Barack Hussein Obama,' dismissing him as 'a blank canvas where people project their desires.' This set off indignation among liberal bloggers and in the Obama camp, where the middle name has not been hidden, but has not been mentioned much, either, even on the senator's August odyssey to his paternal home in Africa. The hush-hush on Hussein is a bit odd given that Mr. Inclusive is presenting himself as the American dream in human form, a multiethnic quilt whose journey is his qualification for higher office."

Bayh To Create Presidential Exploratory Committee. The AP (12/1, Espo) reports Sen. Evan Bayh, "a Democrat with a record of political success in a Republican-leaning state," will create a presidential exploratory committee and travel to Iowa and New Hampshire next week. Bayh "has been pointing toward a run for the White House for months, and had $10.5 million in his Senate campaign bank account as of Sept. 30. The money can be transferred to his exploratory committee."

Romney Faces Scrutiny Over Alleged Hiring Of Illegal Immigrant Landscapers. The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Mehren) reports Gov. Mitt Romney, "a 2008 GOP presidential aspirant and an outspoken critic of illegal immigration, apparently employed undocumented landscape workers at his home near Boston." Following on a Friday Boston Globe report, Romney Communications Director Eric Fehrnstrom said Romney "was unaware that several of the landscapers who kept up his suburban Belmont property were in this country illegally." Fehrnstrom said, "Gov. Romney has no information or knowledge to corroborate the Globe's allegations. He hired a legitimate lawn service company and he knows the owner as a decent, hardworking person who is a legal resident."

On MSNBC's Tucker (12/1, Carlson), Republican strategist Terry Holt and Democratic strategist Steve McMahon discussed the matter. Holt said, "We have moved decades beyond that kind of anger, where something like that" would derail Romney's campaign. McMahon said, "I don't think it's probably that big a deal, but I do think it's somewhat stupid, 15 years after Bill Clinton had this problem" with nominee Zoe Baird, "for people who are interested in running for president to make this kind of a dumb mistake."

Reid, Romney Draw Attention To Mormons In Politics. Gannett (12/2, Marrero) reports, "When Sen. Harry Reid becomes Senate majority leader next year, he will be the most powerful Mormon in Washington. But that reign could be short-lived if Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney makes a bid for the presidency in 2008 and wins." According to Gannett, "the 15 Mormons in Congress is a slightly greater representation than the religious group's percentage of the general population." However, "Some evangelical Christians consider the faith a cult, and 35% of Americans say they would not vote for a Mormon for president, according to a recent poll. That presents a particular challenge for Romney, who so far has steered clear of any public discussion about his religion."

Iowa Democratic Chair Says Clinton Not Organizing State. On MSNBC's Tucker (12/1, Carlson), Iowa Democratic Party Chairman Rob Tully said Sen. Hillary

Clinton "doesn't have anybody at this point in time organizing the state. But I anticipate probably after the last couple days, she'll probably get on that pretty quick. … I just think that the rumor's been going around that a lot of the other candidates are starting to form and getting to move forward with their campaigns. I think, right after the first of the year, we're going to see a lot of candidates that are going to announce. And from that point on, it's going to be a mad dash to January of 2008."

Kerry Assessing Joke's Impact On Presidential Prospects. The AP (12/1) reports that in the wake of "The Joke" about those who "get stuck in Iraq," even "fellow Democrats and former supporters question" whether Sen. John Kerry "is still politically viable." While Kerry is publicly going ahead with plans for a second presidential run, "behind the scenes, Kerry apparently has been having doubts, calling current and former Democratic confidantes to inquire just how much his gaffe hurt his presidential chances, according to several Democrats who spoke on condition of anonymity."

Pataki Hires Ex-Cheney Aide As PAC Finance Director. The New York Times (12/2, B2, Healy) reports Gov. George Pataki hired Kara Ahern, a former aide to Vice President Dick Cheney yesterday, as the national finance director for his 21st Century Freedom PAC, which "is laying groundwork for Mr. Pataki's possible bid for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008." Ahern "worked with Mr. Pataki when she was the Northeast finance director for President Bush's campaign in 2004. Afterward, she was political director to Mr. Cheney."

Vilsack Comfortable With Underdog Role. Gov. Tom Vilsack said on MSNBC (12/1, Cosby), "Obviously, I'm a long shot. There's no question about that. And I have to have folks know me in the country. So I'm getting out, visiting with people in New Hampshire and Iowa, going to Nevada and South Carolina and spending some time with folks. … I've always started to campaign as an underdog. When I ran for governor in 1998, I was almost 23 points behind with just three weeks to go in my race. So the notion of being an underdog is something that I'm familiar with and certainly comfortable with." MSNBC's Rita Cosby concluded by saying, "Gov. Tom Vilsack: raised as an orphan and now running for president. A great success story."

Steele Seen Positioning Himself For 2010 Maryland Gubernatorial Run. The Washington Times (12/2, Miller) reports Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael Steele "has rebounded from his election loss by returning to an active role in state Republican politics, positioning himself for a potential run for governor in four years." Steele said, "I'm just trying to make sure our party gets back on its feet and stands tall. If we don't do the groundwork now and pull ourselves up, 2010 won't matter and 2008 won't matter, either." Steele said it "was 'too soon' to commit to a run for governor, but he did not rule out the possibility."

Calderon Becomes Mexican President Despite Continued Protests. ABC World News (12/1, story 6, 0:20, Gibson) reported, "In Mexico today, the country's new president took office in what was a chaotic ceremony. There were scuffles and shouting during the inauguration of Felipe Calderon. After the ceremony, thousands of protesters marched through the streets of Mexico City." NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 5, 0:30, Williams) called it "a bizarre scene in Mexico early this morning. The country's new President, Felipe Calderon, a conservative, had to slip onto a stage in a hurry to take the oath of office because of lawmakers who had been brawling in the chamber, literally, for days."

Major newspapers, wire services and websites report the inauguration of Calderon. The Washington Post (12/2, A8, Orlandi) calls Calderon "a free-trade booster and career politician," and says his swearing-in was "undercut by lawmakers' jeers and fisticuffs, a chaotic scene that reflected the country's deep political and economic divisions." The scene on the floor of Congress "was an unprecedented departure from the typical somber pageantry of Mexico's transfer of power and a long way from the mass euphoria that greeted Vicente Fox's 2000 election victory, which ended 71 years of single-party rule. It was also an indication of the challenges that await Calderon."

Under the headline, "Amid Catcalls, Mexico's President Is Sworn In," the New York Times (12/2, A6, McKinley) notes, "It was not pretty, but [Calderon] managed to take the oath of office in Congress Friday, as opposition lawmakers whistled and catcalled and the losing leftist candidate staged a massive march down the central avenue of the capital. Never before in modern Mexican history has a president been sworn in under such chaotic and divisive conditions."

The Wall Street Journal (12/2, A4, Luhnow, Lyons) says Calderon took office while "facing down leftist lawmakers who had vowed to block his inauguration and putting the country on notice that he won't retreat as easily in the face of opposition as his predecessor did." The Journal calls his taking of the oath of office in the Congress a "symbolic gesture" that "sent a loud message in Mexico, a country that only saw its first fully democratic transition in 2000, but that has been slowly becoming more violent and ungovernable since that year's election of President Vicente Fox, who repeatedly backed down in the face of protests and opposition demands. The resulting drift has let Mexico fall ever further behind its Asian rivals in attracting investment to create jobs and ease poverty."

The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Tobar) titles its piece, "Chaos Reigns For Mexican Inauguration." Calling Calderon "a diminutive but determined 44-year-old conservative," the Times says he will govern "a deeply divided Mexico." His "defiant appearance on the dais was in sharp contrast with the attitude of [Fox] during his final months in office." Calderon promised to "reach out to his rivals and try to heal the wounds of a long and bitter fight over the election."

The Washington Times (12/2, A1, Grillo) runs the front-page headline, "Roughhouse Swearing-in," while the Houston Chronicle (12/2, Althaus, Lloyd) titles its coverage, "Pomp And Punches." The Dallas Morning News (12/2, Corchado, Iliff) says Calderon "outmaneuvered opposition lawmakers vowing to disrupt his inauguration," and "quickly vowed to crack down on drug cartels while creating jobs to slow illegal immigration to the United States."

NYTimes Lauds Calderon's Leadership, Political Skills. A New York Times (12/2, A14) editorial compares Calderon to outgoing President Vicente Fox, "a decent man with many good ideas who lacked the skill and appetite to muscle his programs through." Calderon shares many of Fox's ideas but "may have the political savvy to succeed." He "has chosen a mostly good cabinet and a steady economic team," and said "he would push for universal health insurance for children and an expansion of the country's antipoverty programs. He is taking a page from Mr. López Obrador's agenda — which is good for Mexico and might win the new president some of the political capital he will need to push through reforms."

Pro-Hezbollah Lebanese Rally To Demand Siniora's Resignation. ABC World News (12/1, story 4, 0:20, Gibson) reported, "In Lebanon, hundreds of thousands of protesters poured into the streets of Beirut, calling for the Prime Minister and his government to resign. The protest was organized by Hezbollah, which is backed by Syria and Iran. It has called the Lebanese government a puppet of the United States." The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 3, 0:40, Phillips) reported, ""They came, police estimated, in their hundreds of thousands, supporters of the militant Hezbollah movement which battled Israel in southern Lebanon in last summer's war and which wants to bring down the US-backed Lebanese government now. And they pitched their tents saying they'll stay until the government falls."

NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 4, 1:00, Engel) reported, "As you can see behind me, those demonstrations are continuing. Now the protesters have set up tents so they can spend the night in the streets and maintain pressure on the government. Earlier today at one stage, there were as many as one million Hezbollah supporters in downtown Beirut. They are demanding that the current pro-American government be toppled. They say it is nothing more than an American puppet."

On its front page, the Washington Post (12/2, A1, Shadid, 690K) reports Hezbollah "and its allies escalated Lebanon's month-long political crisis into a popular confrontation Friday, sending hundreds of thousands of supporters into the streets, parking lots and sidewalks of downtown Beirut, vowing to topple the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and reorient the country." The city "was awash in red-white-and-green Lebanese flags, interspersed with banners in the colors of various sectarian and political leaders," and the "crowd was more festive than angry, more celebratory than militant, as the theater of the moment intersected, perhaps a little dissonantly, with the Post adds, "In symbolism, numbers and aims, the protest drama of a struggle as decisive as any in Lebanon's history." marked a collision between two countries that have coexisted uneasily inside Lebanon following the assassination of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri." The current conflict "is more than just a political struggle unleashed by Hezbollah's demand in October for a share of the cabinet that would give it an effective veto over government decisions. Competing narratives of the country's past and future are on display."

The New York Times (12/2, Slackman, 1.16M) adds, "The official goal was to overthrow the government, but the atmosphere was bizarrely festive… The mood was lighthearted, but the turnout underscored the challenge this politically divided and fragile country faces as it confronts its most dangerous political crisis since the end of a 15-year civil war in 1990." The Times says the current "crisis threatens to undermine a donors conference scheduled for January in Paris," and "has already hurt a ploddingly slow effort to rebuild the mainly Shiite areas that were severely damaged in the war. But that did not seem to matter as anger spilled out, carnival style."

A piece in the Los Angeles Times (12/2, Stack) adds, "Hundreds of thousands of Hezbollah supporters and their allies poured into the capital Friday in a mass protest that paralyzed the city center, laid siege to the prime minister's office and threatened an escalating campaign of civil disobedience until the U.S.-backed government collapses." The Times calls the protest "uncannily reminiscent of anti-Syria demonstrations that erupted" after Hariri's murder.

The AP (12/2, Ghattas) notes, "Launching a long-threatened campaign to force Lebanon's U.S.-backed government from office, Hezbollah and its pro-Syrian allies said the demonstration would be followed by a wave of open-ended protests." Hezbollah "has tried to depict the protest as rallying all Lebanese, not just its supporters. It urged demonstrators to wave only the red and white Lebanese flag with its green cedar tree, in contrast to past protests that featured the group's yellow flag with a fist and Kalashnikov rifle." State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey "said U.S. diplomats in Beirut had telephoned Lebanese government officials to offer their support."

BBC.com (12/2) adds, "Demonstrators slept in tents outside the office of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, who they say is hostile to Syria and must resign." Siniora opponents claim they "will keep up the pressure until the government steps down." The BBC local reporter "says there is no sign that either side is giving up."

Annan Says Lebanon Ceasefire Holding But Israeli Overflights Continue. The New York Times (12/2, A8) notes UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan "said Friday that the cease-fire that ended fighting between Israel and Hezbollah fighters on Aug. 14 was holding, but that Israeli overflights in the border area were occurring almost daily." Annan told the Security Council "that Israel saw the incursions as a 'necessary security measure.' He said the United Nations continued to receive reports of illegal arms smuggling across the Syrian border but had been unable to verify them. An assessment team, he added, found 'significant deficiencies' in border control."

Abbas, PLO Executive Committee Discuss Political Way-Forward. The New York Times (12/2, A8, Myre) reports Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas "convened the Palestine Liberation Organization's top decision-making group on Friday amid growing signs of a possible political showdown with Hamas, the faction that currently leads the Palestinian government." The PLO Executive Committee "is expected to meet for several days before deciding what action to take, if any." Of the ongoing unity government talks with Hamas, the PLO said in a statement, "The dialogue has stopped and there is no chance of resuming it in the same manner." The Times adds, "With the Palestinian government broke and isolated, Fatah and Hamas had agreed in principle on a unity government made up of professionals and technocrats. But they have not been able to agree on how to divide up important ministerial positions. There is no clear way out of the political standoff if they cannot reach an agreement."

Dead Sea Conference Said To Offer Few Specifics. In a piece comparing yesterday's Dead Sea conference to previous efforts, the New York Times (12/2, Cooper, 1.16M) notes, "With the recent setbacks to democracy throughout the region, the goals at this year's conference … were often smaller and, presumably, a bit more attainable." The Forum for the Future was conceived "to prod the Arab and Muslim world's autocratic governments toward democracy and stronger civil society, as sort of a bulwark against the hopelessness and disenchantment that could lead to extremism. It was an ambitious goal, and things seemed promising at first." However, the Times says, "that was the new Middle East, before the old one quickly reasserted itself." Detailing the meeting's atmospherics, the Times adds Secretary of State Rice "had been diplomatic the night before when a reporter asked her whether it was incongruous that Russia, which passed a law restricting nongovernmental organizations, was a host of a democracy conference in Jordan."

The Washington Post (12/2, A12, Kessler, 690K) headlines its report, "At Dead Sea Forum, Incongruities Abound." Noting the "uncomfortable irony" of a rule of law and press freedom forum co-hosted by Russia, the Post says, "With the Bush administration's push to promote democracy in the Middle East facing setbacks in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, irony was not in short supply." Describing leaders' activities on the margins of the official program, the Post reports Rice "held a series of bilateral meetings -- for instance, with a Sudanese official for a tough talk on the crisis in Darfur -- and skipped the final news conference to fly back to Washington when the sessions ran late."

Lavrov Says Iran UNSCR Talks Could Open Next Week. The AP (12/2) reports Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov "said Friday that talks on proposed sanctions against Iran's nuclear program could take place early next week." Lavrov told Russian media that "the meeting, suggested by France, would focus on the draft U.N. resolution on Iran and would take place at a top diplomatic level." The AP notes he claims that Secretary Rice, British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett and German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier "all agreed Friday to the meeting," and "China also might attend, although it is not clear if it will." Lavrov "said Russia was ready to vote for a U.N. ban on exports of nuclear materials and sensitive technologies to Iran. But he said Moscow was opposed 'to such sanctions and steps that could affect the International Atomic Energy Agency's activities in Iran.'" The AP adds that Undersecretary Burns "will attend a European conference in Brussels next week, probably on Tuesday, and will confer there with European diplomats about the resolution."

Experts Emphasis Temporal Nature Of Incentives Packages. In an op-ed in today's New York Times (12/2), the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace's George Perkovich and Pierre Goldschmidt write, "Beneath the legalese, Iran is moving as fast as it can to master uranium enrichment, while threatening its neighbors and refusing to provide transparency that the [IAEA] requires." They add, "International interlocutors must disabuse Iran that it can have its uranium cake and eat it, too. The vital security objective all along has been to prevent Iran from acquiring the capacity to make nuclear weapons fuel." If Iran becomes proficient at enriching uranium, "it would make no further sense to offer

Iran exceptional nuclear energy cooperation, political benefits or access to international markets, capital and technology." The international community must "clarify now that the positive incentives the world wishes to negotiate with Iran will be withdrawn if it does not immediately accede to the binding Security Council demand for suspension." The authors note, "Failure to clarify the limited duration of positive incentives only encourages those in Iran who argue that there are no real costs to defying the Security Council and continuing the enrichment program." They conclude, "The Iranian people, their neighbors and the world deserve a more considered debate of Iran's options and of their consequences. Iran will never be in a better position than it is now to obtain a favorable deal that would improve its economy, employment and quality of life."

Strong Challenge To Chavez Could Tighten Tomorrow's Vote. Previewing tomorrow's Venezuelan presidential vote, the Wall Street Journal (12/2, A2, De Córdoba) reports President Hugo Chávez's "exasperated opponents got a gleeful surprise at a rally ahead of Sunday's election, when a giant inflatable figure of the nation's fiery and famously voluble leader inexplicably began to deflate." While a Chavez loss "looks unlikely -- most polls show Mr. Chávez with a comfortable edge -- Venezuela's often fractured and famously inept opposition is at least putting up a respectable fight this time. They are marching into electoral battle united behind Manuel Rosales, 54, a hard-nosed and experienced professional politician who has, by all accounts, mounted a feisty challenge to Mr. Chávez. That challenge, to be sure, is fueled by desperation." Rosales "faces long odds in his quest to oust the incumbent," and Chavez "retains a strong following among the majority of poor Venezuelans, on whom he has showered uncounted billions to subsidize health, education and employment programs." Chavez "also has fear on his side: His minions haven't shrunk from firing employees from government jobs or state companies for showing opposition leanings."

The Washington Times (12/2, Hearn) says Chavez "heads into tomorrow's election with some polls showing a victory margin of more than 30 percent while others show a dead heat for the fiery leftist who calls President Bush the devil." Rosales "has managed to unite a fragmented opposition and made inroads into Mr. Chavez's base by attacking the president's lavish spending on leftist causes throughout Latin America and his support for Cuba's Fidel Castro." Analysts "say a surprise showing by Mr. Rosales could cause political disturbances."

Rep. Connie Mack said on Fox News (12/1, Skinner), "The reality of this election is it's not going to be fair. Chavez has done everything he can so he can manipulate the election. So I think we all need to be prepared, at the end of the day, that he will win. Whether or not it was winning legitimately, that's still to be determined. And my thinking is that it's, no, he didn't win it; he won't win it legitimately."

A piece on the front page of the New York Times (12/2, Romero) notes the growing violent crime problem in Venezuela. "Yet the man in charge … rarely addresses the problem publicly and is sailing toward an easy election for a third time. Analysts say [President Hugo] Chávez is able to ignore the issue by governing through a system of extensive handouts that eases the purchase of basic goods but does little to ensure public order." Chavez has "politicized police forces throughout the country, marginalizing officers viewed as disagreeing with Mr. Chávez's 'Bolivarian Revolution,'" and the Times says "police forces have also largely been urged to tread lightly in poor neighborhoods, turning a blind eye to small demonstrations and petty crime like burning tires." Zulia Governor Manuel Rosales, Chavez's main opponent, "has been pounding the crime issue, questioning why murders have surged since Mr. Chávez entered office in 1999." Rosales "laid the blame squarely at the feet of the president, saying his confrontational style and tendency to turn the courts, military and the police into tools of his own power, are feeding the crime epidemic."

Financial Viability Of Chavez's Transcontinental Pipeline Project May Not Matter. The New York Times (12/2, C3, Gould) details Chavez's plan "to build a 5,000-mile natural gas pipeline that stretches from [the] remote northern tip of South America to the bottom end of the continent." The project "is the centerpiece of a broader effort by Mr. Chávez to strengthen ties among Latin America's economies and shrink their dependence on the United States." However, the concept "has generated political and environmental controversy at home and abroad." Chavez's "geopolitical aim is, in fact, the project's biggest hurdle, energy analysts maintain. They say that the decision by Mr. Chávez to give his ideological goals priority over profit jeopardizes the success of the project." The Times says it remains unclear "that Mr. Chávez can muster long-term support in South America for a huge pipeline that would take at least a decade to complete. There is already skepticism and bickering over other energy deals, analysts say."

Castro Reportedly Does Not Have Cancer. The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 5, 0:30, Logan) reported, "Fidel Castro remains seriously ill, but CBS News has learned that he does not have cancer, despite the rumors. However, we're told it's unlikely he'll recover enough to ever return to power, even if he survives for years. Millions here are hoping Castro will be able to attend a military parade tomorrow."

Ahead Of Olympics, China Will Lift Foreign Journalist Restrictions. The Washington Post (12/2, A8, Cody) reports a Chinese government statement that

Beijing "has decided to substantially liberalize restrictions on coverage by foreign journalists ahead of the 2008 Olympic Games in Beijing." The "decree" claimed that "foreign reporters, whether assigned here permanently or visiting for the Olympics, will be allowed to roam most of the country freely and report without interference by local police or propaganda officials from Jan. 1, 2007, until Oct. 17, 2008. The Games are in August 2008." The Foreign Ministry noted that "the new rules departed clearly -- if temporarily -- from long-standing orders. They also marked a significant watershed for China, where information has long been treated as government property to be manipulated and controlled by propaganda officials." The Post says the new policy "would for more than 21 months eliminate some major barriers to accurate reporting about China: regulations that legally oblige foreign correspondents to work through local propaganda officials when gathering news. Those restrictions, when followed, have limited frank conversation with Chinese people and emphasized the official version of news."

The New York Times (12/2, A3, Yardley) calls the move "a step intended to fulfill the country's promise to allow visiting reporters to work freely in advance of the 2008 Beijing Olympics." The "relaxed reporting rules for foreigners are an important public relations gesture as Beijing prepares for the Olympic Games in August 2008." The Foreign Correspondents' Club of China "applauded the new rules and singled out the Foreign Ministry for praise. But the group also called on the government to make the regulations permanent." Reporters Without Borders "also praised the new rules but noted that the announcement came on the same day that a Beijing appeals court upheld a fraud conviction against Zhao Yan, a Chinese researcher for The New York Times."

Bodman Asks OPEC Not To Cut Production. The Financial Times (12/2, Hoyos) notes the Administration "on Friday urged the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries not to make further cuts to its oil production." Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman is quoted saying, "I encourage them to keep markets well-supplied." However, Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi "indicated that the cartel needed to give serious consideration to further reducing its production when it met in Abuja, Nigeria's capital, on December 14. He told reporters that demand was 'okay,' US inventories were high, and 100m barrels of oil would have to be removed from the market to achieve a balance." The Times adds that some "hawkish" OPEC members "have called on the group to reduce its production by at least another 500,000 barrels a day." Also, the Times reports, Angola will join OPEC and Sudan has begun working towards membership.

Litvinenko's Wife, Acquaintance Have Elevated Levels Of Polonium-210. ABC World News (12/1, story 5, 2:15, Gibson) reported, "Now to the overseas story that gets more intriguing with every passing day: the poisoning of Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko. They have detected the same radioactive sub tense in an Italian man, with shadowy intelligence ties." ABC (Sciutto): "Almost every hour today, another extraordinary twist. First, confirmation that Mario Scaramella, seen arriving for emergency treatment, tested positive for polonium. An Italian security analyst, he met Litvinenko the day he fell ill. Then came word, that Litvinenko's wife also tested positive. Then, as doctors performed a delicate and dangerous autopsy on Litvinenko hauling in special protective clothing, the discovery of not one, but two poisons in Litvinenko's body. Polonium and radioactive thallium in huge quantities. Both are believed to be favorite murder weapons of the Russian security services."

The CBS Evening News (12/1, story 4, 0:30, Roth) reported, "Authorities now say the radioactive substance that killed a former Russian spy also poisoned one of his contacts. … With extra equipment to protect the pathologists today, an autopsy was carried out on Litvinenko's body, which gets sealed in a special coffin before it's buried to keep radiation from spreading." NBC Nightly News (12/1, story 6, 1:30, Friesen) reported, "Exactly one month ago, these two men met at a London sushi bar. Now Alexander Litvinenko is dead and now Mario Scaramella is in the hospital. … The question tonight -- is he a victim or a suspect? In interviews last week, he said he met Litvinenko to warn him they were both on a hit list."

The Washington Post (12/2, A8, Jordan, Delaney) reports claims that polonium-210, "the radioactive substance that killed former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko, has contaminated his wife and an Italian security consultant he met the day he fell ill." British authorities "said that neither was showing symptoms of poisoning," and confirmed that they "are the only two who have tested positive for the radiation since Litvinenko's mysterious death on Nov. 23." The Post says the Putin critic and former spy's "unexplained death has created Cold War-like tensions between London and Moscow."

The New York Times (12/2, A3, Lyall) adds the security consultant, Mario Scaramella, "was himself admitted to a London hospital on Friday, the authorities said, after tests showed that he had a significant amount of radioactive material in his body." Scaramella's hospitalization "adds a further layer of confusion to the puzzle surrounding the death of" Litvinenko." The Times adds, "With each new development, there are more mysteries to be solved in the case, which has still not been characterized as a murder by the London police."

The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Murphy) notes, "After days of investigation, police have begun to trace a radiation trail across flight manifests and London hotels and offices that security experts said could eventually pinpoint how the radioactive substance was brought to London and possibly by whom." Scaramella's test result "increases the likelihood that the poison was administered at the sushi restaurant in central London where the two men met briefly Nov. 1 — hours before Litvinenko became sick — especially since the radiation trail appears to follow Litvinenko's movements across London after that rendezvous."

Italy's Prodi Will Sue Accusers, Possibly Including Scaramella. The Financial Times (12/2, Barber) reports Litvinenko's "suspicious" death "was enmeshed in alleged dirty tricks in Italian politics on Friday after [Prime Minister Romano Prodi] "announced legal action against people linking him to the KGB, the former Soviet intelligence service." The Times calls Scaramella "the main person who has made [that] accusation" against Prodi. "The Litvinenko affair has spilled into Italian politics because Mr Scaramella was appointed in 2003 as a consultant to a parliamentary inquiry, known as the Mitrokhin commission, which was investigating KGB activities in Italy." Scaramella "reported to the commission's chairman in January that he had been looking into alleged links between Mr Prodi and the KGB."

Columnist Accuses Putin Of Undermining Elective Democracy. In her monthly column in the Washington Post (12/2, A15), the Carnegie Moscow Center's Marsha Lipman says Russia "is undergoing yet another round of election-rule tightening -- as usual, a product of the country's rubber-stamp legislature." Vladimir Putin's Kremlin "has managed to obstruct the financing of unwelcome political projects," and "political loyalists can draw on what's called the 'administrative resource' -- a network of administrators at various levels who are eager to do the regime's bidding." In short, "election results are preordained. There is a flatness about campaigns -- a lack of enthusiasm and emotion. Which is the way the Kremlin likes it." Arguing that "there's no more law or order about [Putin's] regime than there was in Boris Yeltsin's 'chaotic' Russia," Lipman says the "political scene has been fully cleared of genuine competition, and the executive and legislative branches filled with loyalists who need not worry about public accountability." The "disputes" among Kremlin allies "grow ever more intense and vicious, creating an atmosphere of rampant corruption and crime." She concludes, "Real competitive politics, if they were ever allowed, might be a threat to the ruling elite. Fierce infighting within the regime is a threat to the entire nation and its future."

In Turkey, Pope Said To "Soothe" Muslim "Outrage." The Washington Times (12/2, Phillips) notes Pope Benedict XVI "concluded a historic trip to the Muslim world yesterday after soothing an outraged Islamic population with his Christian message of peace and reconciliation." Benedict "wound up his triumphant four-day visit to Turkey with a parting message of good will to Muslims as Turkish clerics and commentators lauded the German-born pope for facing Mecca as he prayed alongside a top Islamic clergyman in Istanbul's Blue Mosque on Thursday." One Turkish paper is quoted reporting, "The pope's dreaded visit was concluded with a wonderful surprise," while another said, "He turned toward Mecca and prayed like Muslims." The Times adds, "Throughout his trip, however, the pope also gently stressed Rome's concept of reciprocity in which respect for Muslims in the West warrants respect for religious minorities such as Christians and Jews in majority Muslim lands, including the beleaguered community of 90,000 Christians in Turkey."

The Los Angeles Times (12/2, Wilkinson) adds, "Just as the Bible speaks of converting swords into plowshares, Pope Benedict XVI has used his extraordinary pilgrimage to Turkey this week to transform outrage over provocative remarks he made about Islam into an emerging image of conciliation and outreach." His mission to Turkey "could have crucial influence on the future of the troubled relations between Islam and Christianity. … By most accounts, Benedict was successful in winning over begrudging hearts and minds in the Islamic world." The Times cites an Italian observer saying the visit saw "the theological Benedict replaced by the diplomatic Benedict, an infrequently seen facet of this complex and deeply intellectual pope." Turkish press "gave generally positive coverage to the pontiff's visit to the majestic 17th century Blue Mosque. A photograph of him praying silently Thursday alongside the grand mufti of Istanbul dominated almost every front page."

Turkey Maintains Ban On Cypriot Traffic Despite EU Warning. The Washington Times (12/2, Borowiec) reports, "The Turkish government this week tried to minimize the impact of the European Union's threat to partially freeze accession talks, saying its foreign policy remained unchanged." A "senior" Turkish official "rejected EU insistence that Turkey must open its airports and harbors to traffic from Cyprus." For its part, the Cypriot government in Nicosia said the EU "was giving Turkey too much leeway, thus damaging efforts to find a solution to the Mediterranean island's partition." The Times calls the EU Commission's recommendation of a halt in talks, "a significant warning and a blow to Turkey's ambition to join what some in the Turkish press call 'the Christian Europe.'"

US Draft Resolution Would Create Regional Somalia Peacekeeping Force. The New York Times (12/2, Hoge, 1.16M) reports the US circulated a draft UN Security Council resolution on Somalia "urging a regional peacekeeping force to monitor a struggle for control between the country's embattled government and its powerful Islamist foes, and calling for a partial lifting of an arms embargo to enable the equipping of local security units." The "8,000-member force would come from seven East African nations but not from neighboring states of Kenya, Djibouti and Ethiopia. This restriction was added out of concern that the proposed United Nations move, aimed at calming tensions, might end up provoking wider hostilities." Noting some NGO opposition to a ground force, the Times says Ambassador Bolton "expressed annoyance with this view. 'You know, people criticize us when we take action on the ground, that our taking action makes the situation worse,' he said." Bolton "said that the text would be circulated to various capitals over the weekend, and that he hoped that reactions could start to be incorporated into the document at drafters' meetings beginning Monday."

The AP (12/2, Lederer) adds the US draft UNSCR "would authorize a regional force to protect Somalia's weak government and threaten Security Council action against those who block peace efforts and attempt to overthrow it." The UNSCR "would lift a 1992 arms embargo against Somalia so that troops in the "protection and training mission" could be militarily equipped. It would ban Somalia's neighbors from sending soldiers — a demand by a seven-nation East African group expected to contribute soldiers to the force, as well as European members of the Security Council who want to ensure the force's aim is to promote peace."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Padilla Lawyers Say Mistreatment Makes Client Unfit To Stand Trial. The New York Times (12/4, Sontag, 1.16M) reports on the videotape of a trip to the dentist by terror detainee José Padilla, which was recently released to his lawyers "and viewed by The New York Times." To Padilla's lawyers, the video and other pictures they have released "capture the dehumanization of their client during his military detention from mid-2002 until earlier this year, when the government changed his status from enemy combatant to criminal defendant and transferred him to the federal detention center in Miami. He now awaits trial scheduled for late January." The images "represent the latest and most aggressive sally by defense lawyers who declared this fall that charges against Mr. Padilla should be dismissed for 'outrageous government conduct,' saying that he was mistreated and tortured during his years as an enemy combatant." Lawyers for Padilla "suggest that he is unfit to stand trial. They argue that he has been so damaged by his interrogations and prolonged isolation that he suffers post-traumatic stress disorder and is unable to assist in his own defense. His interrogations, they say, included hooding, stress positions, assaults, threats of imminent execution and the administration of 'truth serums.'" A Pentagon spokesman, Lt. Col. Todd Vician, "said Sunday that the military disputes Mr. Padilla's accusations of mistreatment."

Newsweek (12/11, Isikoff, 3.12M) reports, "Lawyers for 'enemy combatant' Jose Padilla claim he is so disoriented from three years of isolation and aggressive interrogations that he is now mentally ill. In new court filings, Padilla's lawyers also assert for the first time that Padilla's interrogations were taped, thereby providing a potentially extensive video record of how the government treated a man once considered a dangerous Qaeda operative. … Padilla's lawyers recently moved to have the entire case dropped because of government conduct that allegedly included subjecting him to sleep deprivation, extreme cold, injecting noxious fumes into his cell and giving him mind-altering drugs."

Judge's Ruling Against Guantanamo Treatment Called "Sharp," "Blunt." The Washington Post (12/4, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler issued a blunt indictment Friday of the Bush administration's legal handling of prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in Cuba. Frustrated with the plight of prisoners held without charges for years at the base, Kessler expressed disgust with the federal government's repeated efforts to block courts from hearing detainees' complaints." Her opinion "was particularly unusual" because it concerned "a technicality." The Post quotes her ruling, in which she refers to Guantanamo's "terrible conditions" and states, "It is often said that 'justice delayed is justice denied.' Nothing could be closer to the truth with reference to the Guantanamo Bay cases."

DOD Seeks "Emergency Authority" For Guantanamo Court. McClatchy (12/4) reports, "The Pentagon is invoking emergency authority to fast-track funding of a comprehensive war-crimes court compound at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, according to a letter to Congress obtained by The Miami Herald. ... Congressional staff members say the price tag and the funding mechanism have stirred protests among key members of Congress with fiscal and operational oversight of the Department of Defense." The Pentagon "wants to build, in three months, a mini-city on an abandoned airfield to stage the trials - two new courtrooms with space for two more, dining, housing and work space for up to 1,200 military and civilians working at the trials, and media, conference and classified information centers." The cost could be "as much as $125 million." More than 10 sites carried the story.

CIA Failed To Capture Muslim Cleric Living In Norway. The Washington Post (12/4, A1, Whitlock, 690K) reports, "Two months after he helped kidnap a Muslim cleric in Italy, records show, an undercover CIA officer boarded a flight to Norway on another secret mission. Two other US spies followed a few weeks later and checked into the same hotel. Shortly after the agents arrived in the spring of 2003, an Islamic militant living in Oslo known as Mullah Krekar received a warning from an anonymous Norwegian official, according to Krekar's lawyer. The message: Krekar, then head of a Kurdish insurgent group, was a CIA target and should watch his back." The spies "left Norway by the end of the summer, according to records of their travels compiled by European investigators. If the CIA was planning to abduct Krekar, like other Islamic radicals it had secretly apprehended in Europe after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, those plans were quietly abandoned. … Four days after the CIA officer arrived in Oslo, Krekar's attorney, Meling, said he received a warning about his client from a Norwegian government source, via an intermediary. Although the message was vague, it made clear that US spies had Krekar in their sights. In response, the lawyer wrote a letter to Norwegian police, requesting extra protection for Krekar." The case "shows how the United States has struggled to deal with Islamic militants who are allowed to live freely in Europe despite being labeled serious security risks. Others have included radical clerics in London and supporters of the Hamburg cell responsible for the Sept. 11 hijackings."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Administration Releases Details Of Visa Waiver Proposal. The Washington Times (12/4, Waterman, 88K) reports US officials are providing more details of the President's proposal to broaden the Visa Waiver Program, "sketching an ambitious plan for an electronic 'visa lite' system that would enable travelers to be cleared against terrorism and immigration watch lists" before reaching the US. Last Wednesday, DHS "laid down broad outlines" of the reform package the White House will be sending to Congress, including the new "visa lite" system called an "electronic travel authorization," which would be issued to passport holders before they traveled to the US, "as well as better information-sharing by new member nations."

Army Corps Said To Have Slowed Pace Of Levee Work In New Orleans. The New York Times (12/4, Schwartz, 1.16M) reports that as the Army Corps of Engineers has moved from patching broken levees and building floodgates in New Orleans to the "the task of strengthening flood protection…beyond its pre-Hurricane Katrina level," their "pace has slowed, those in the region say, with little trace of the round-the-clock frenzy of the first phase. … Contractors are waiting impatiently for the chance to bid on jobs." However, corps officials say that while "the early work was done in the spirit of addressing a crisis," the next phase "has to be planned with great care." The Times adds, "It is also becoming increasingly clear that the billions of dollars in appropriations will not cover the New Orleans area projects Congress has ordered the corps to take on."

Katrina Said To Have Lasting Impact On Victims' Mental Health. NBC Nightly News (12/3, story 12, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported on "the lasting impact of Hurricane Katrina" in New Orleans, where the storm's psychological effects "are gaining recognition as a serious medical problem. Here's Martin Savidge." NBC (Savidge) "Locals call it Katrina brain. Symptoms include difficulty concentrating, mood swings and depression. Experts say it's brought on by the endless battles of disrupted life. Federal estimates suggest a half million people along the Gulf Coast may still be struggling with mental health issues. Adding to the stress and anxiety, many who need psychiatric care or medication are having a hard time finding it. And when they do, an even harder time affording it." Rosalynn Carter, the founder of the Carter Center, which recently held a meeting of health experts, was shown saying, "Hopefully, the mental health community and government can all come together and make sure that in another disaster, things like this won't happen."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Expected To Seek "New Way Forward" On Iraq. Iraq once again dominated the broadcast news last night, leading on both ABC and NBC. (CBS was pre-empted by sports coverage.) ABC World News (12/3, lead story, 2:50, Harris, 8.78M) opened by saying this "could be a pivotal week for the US mission in Iraq." President Bush will today hold "an Oval Office meeting with a powerful Shiite leader with ties to a violent militia. Tuesday, Senate confirmation hearings begin for the President's nominee for Defense Secretary, Robert Gates. And on Wednesday, the Iraq Study Group releases its highly-anticipated report, looking for ways to salvage the US mission." Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (12/3, lead story, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) said that as the President "prepares to listen to a report this week from the Iraq Study Group, word from his National Security Advisor today that the President won't necessarily followed study group's recommendations. It comes as three more Americans were killed in Iraq this weekend."

The NBC report drew heavily on comments by NSA Stephen Hadley made on the Sunday morning political talk shows. On NBC's Meet the Press (12/3, Russert), Hadley said the President was concerned "the Baker-Hamilton commission was just going to be cover for an American withdrawal almost regardless of what was happening on the ground. And the President felt he needed to stop that right there. That isn't graceful withdrawal, that's cut and run. And of course, as the President's said, cut and run is not his cup of tea." On ABC's This Week (12/3, Stephanopoulos), Hadley said, "At some point, obviously we would like to begin bringing troops back home. The President has said that." On CBS' Face the Nation (12/03, Schieffer), Hadley said, "He's going to listen to the Baker-Hamilton report. He's going to listen to the reviews that are being done by his agencies. He's going to want to hear what Republicans and Democrats and the Congress think about. Then he's going to pull it together in terms of a way forward in Iraq that hopefully will command support from Republicans, Democrats, the executive branch and the Congress."

The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Meyer, 850K) reports the President "has been actively soliciting ideas and proposals about a course correction in Iraq from an array of senior aides, congressional and military leaders, Iraqi officials and others, and he plans to announce a 'new way forward' soon," according to Hadley and others. The New York Times (12/4, A15, Weisman, 1.16M) notes that Hadley said on NBC that "it's going to be weeks, not months," before Bush makes his own conclusions public. The AP (12/3, Loven) says Bush "has walked a fine line between embracing the mission of a bipartisan, high-profile advisory panel on Iraq and maintaining enough distance not to be bound by all -- or even most -- of its upcoming recommendations." But as the AP (12/3, Ben Feller) reports in another piece, Hadley "said as he made the talk show rounds" that the US "will fail in Iraq if we pull out our troops before we're in a position to help the Iraqis succeed.'"

Under the headline "Amid Hints Bush Will Change Policy, Clues He Won't," the New York Times (12/4, A15, Sanger, 1.16M) asks, "The debate that will engulf Washington and much of the country this week centers on a question that lurks at the intersection of war strategy and the personality of the commander in chief: after three and a half years, is President Bush ready to abandon his declaration that American forces cannot begin to leave Iraq until the Iraqis demonstrate that they are capable of defending themselves?"

Sen. John Warner, on NBC's Meet the Press (12/3, Russert), said, "The Baker-Hamilton group…are doing their job. And our President is listening, learning, and he's open to take a change in course." But on the same program, Sen. Carl Levin said President Bush has been "absolutely stubborn in his view that we are there -- and this is his words just a few days ago – 'We are going to stay in Iraq as long as Iraqis ask us to be there.' Now, that seems to me to be more of the same, stay the course."

Bush Will Consider Ideas From Rumsfeld Memo. Much of the coverage of possible new directions for Iraq considers what Hadley called "a 'laundry list of ideas' from a Nov. 6 memo" from Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, "who announced his resignation two days later -- just after Republicans lost control of the House and Senate in the midterm elections," the Washington Post (12/4, A5, Babington, 690K) writes. The options "include the redeployment of substantial U.S. forces to areas near the Iranian and Syrian borders, withdrawing U.S. troops from especially vulnerable positions and starting modest drawdowns of American forces to encourage Iraqis, as Rumsfeld wrote, 'to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country.'" The Washington Times (12/4, Pfeiffer, 88K) highlights Hadley's CBS comment that "it was a useful and constructive memo, but it was not a proposal for a new course of action." Hadley added, "It was much more a list of things that needed to be considered." USA Today (12/4, 7A, Wolf, El Nasser, 2.27M) headlines its story "Bush Weighing Rumsfeld Ideas Among Options." The Financial Times (12/4, Guha, Luce, Sevastopulo) says Bush's "isolation over Iraq deepened" after the publication of the memo.

On NBC's Meet the Press (12/3, Russert), Hadley was asked if the Rumsfeld memo is evidence that the President was "saying one thing publicly to the voters, while you and Donald Rumsfeld were saying another thing privately inside the White House." Hadley answered, "The President has been talking about making changes, and has been making changes throughout."

Senators React To Rumsfeld Memo. Sen. Lindsey Graham was asked on Fox News Sunday (12/3, Wallace) if he is "concerned about…the disconnect, the difference between what the Administration has been saying in public and what it's apparently been thinking in private." Graham said, "Yes, very much so. … My suggestion is that the political leadership, led by the president, needs to tell the American public a failed state in Iraq is a dramatic loss in the war on terror."

Sen. Joseph Biden, on Fox News Sunday (12/3, Wallace), contended "there was a clear disconnect between what the administration's been saying the last year and what's been going on the ground. And the Rumsfeld memo makes it quite clear that one of the greatest concerns is the political fallout from changing course here in the United States politically and how to deal with that."

Sen. Jon Kyl, during his appearance on CNN's Late Edition (12/3, Blitzer), emphasized that the "key difference here between those who are trying to find a graceful exit and those who want to find a way to win is the president's view, and I think it's shared by Secretary Rumsfeld, that we need to figure out ways in which we can maximize our ability to support the Iraqis, get to a position where that country is safe and secure, that we can leave but do so under conditions in which we have defeated the terrorists and not enabled, or not left Iraq a failed state."

Sen. John Kerry, on CNN's Late Edition (12/3, Blitzer), said, "Everything in the Rumsfeld memo is a summary of things that I and others laid out three years ago."

US Withdrawal, Security Turnover To Iraqis Considered. ABC World News (12/3, story 8, 2:50, Harris, 8.78M) said the Iraq Study Group "is going to put out its recommendations for getting the US out of Iraq. We already know a lot about what's expected to be in this report. So, tonight, we're going to ask some hard questions about whether any of these ideas are likely to work. We start with the proposal to pull many US troops out of Iraq." While there is "little agreement over just how a phased withdrawal of US forces would work, there is a virtual consensus on one issue: fewer US troops will lead to more bloodshed." In another report, ABC World News (12/3, story 9, 2:25, Harris, 8.78M) said, "The theory behind pulling out US troops is that Iraqi forces can be trained to take over. But is that really possible in a country where many people are more loyal to their religious group than they are to their government?" ABC (Katursky) added, "Many of the people the Iraqis are supposed to protect do not trust them." And while trainer Maj. Peter Zike "says he believes in his mission," getting Iraqi troops" fully trained, he says, could take as long as 25 years."

US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, on CNN's Late Edition (12/3, Blitzer), said, "I think in order for Iraq to work…the Iraqi government's security institutions have to have the monopoly over use of force. And militias, death squads, other unauthorized groups with access to weapons have to be brought under control."

ISG Said To Want US To Ask "Enemies" For Help. ABC World News (12/3, story 10, 2:55, Harris, 8.78M) examined "one of the more controversial proposals for fixing the US problems" in Iraq -- that the Bush Administration should "engage in talks with two of its enemies, Iran and Syria. But the US considers both of those countries to be sponsors of terrorism." Syria is "ruled by a dictator who is accused of letting insurgents cross over the border to wage Jihad." Iran is "ruled by a president who's accused of developing nuclear weapons and supporting militias that wreak havoc in Iraq. Now the Iraq Study Group is poised to propose that the US ask these countries for help."

Novak Says ISG Report "Spells Trouble For Bush." In his Washington Post (12/4, A19, 690K) column, Robert Novak writes, "The Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton, is out of the White House sphere of influence. The White House certainly did not ask Congress for help by creating this commission. Baker has made sure that the report, though leaked in part to the press, has not gone to the White House. As a creature of Congress (an institution that Bush dislikes), Baker's group spells trouble for Bush when it releases its report Wednesday." Bush's position "is difficult. He does not want to be seen as ignoring a congressional study group. But he has not yet reached the point of accepting unconditional troop withdrawal. If he seems to differ from Baker-Hamilton recommendations, he can expect heavy scolding by the group's members on television."

More Commentary. In a nearly 1,600-word Wall Street Journal (12/4, A16, 2.04M) op-ed, Duke University's Donald Horowitz writes, "Just when you thought the midterm election results had weakened President Bush's hand in Iraq, it turns out the opposite is true. The president has been liberated from a stay-the-course policy that the Iraqi government could pocket as an open-ended commitment. The voters have given Mr. Bush a chance, perhaps a last chance, to turn Iraq in a new direction."

Bush Seen As Likely To Accept ISG's "Repudiation" Of His Iraq Policy. Time's Michael Duffy (12/11), on a cover story on how President Bush is likely to respond to the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, writes that Bush's "biggest reversals usually come after months -- even years -- of stubborn resistance. … But Bush has never had to pull off a U-turn like the one he is contemplating now: to give up on his dream of turning Babylon into an oasis of freedom and democracy and instead begin a staged withdrawal from Iraq, rewrite the mission of the 150,000 U.S. troops there as they begin to draw down, and launch a diplomatic Olympics across the Middle East and between Israel and the Palestinians." Duffy adds that

"sometime in the next month or so, Bush will begin the biggest foreign policy course correction of his presidency. No matter what else may get stapled onto it, the maneuver will be based on the agreement reached by the" Iraq Study Group. According to Duffy, the commission "is proposing nothing short of a repudiation of pretty much all US foreign policy for the past three years. The Iraq Study Group will call for a massive diplomatic push in two areas in which the White House has never put its shoulder to the grindstone: rekindling peace talks between Palestinians and Israelis and holding an international conference that would lead to direct talks between Washington and both Tehran and Damascus."

But Newsweek's Evan Thomas (12/11) writes, "Persuading Bush to listen -- and to change course, even at the margins -- will be very difficult. … People who know Bush well say, as one presidential friend put it to NEWSWEEK, that he 'realizes that the disappointments on the ground in Iraq -- not just the election -- require new thinking.' (The source spoke anonymously for fear of alienating Bush.) 'He is looking for a militarily effective and politically sustainable approach that gives Iraq the chance to succeed in the long term,' says the friend, 'and I think he is very open to change, very open to the Baker Commission and the internal review.'"

U.S. News and World Report's Michael Barone (12/11), meanwhile, writes, "While George W. Bush's many critics and detractors portray him as facing the same dilemma as Lyndon Johnson in Vietnam, Bush himself seems determined to proceed the way Harry Truman did in Korea – or, as some might put it, as Winston Churchill did after Dunkirk. … In this, Bush has the support of others. Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates opposes a quick pullout. So do all the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Central Command's Gen. John Abizaid. Retired generals who have criticized Bush testified that we should send more troops into Iraq. Democrats seem disinclined to use their congressional majorities to cut short our mission in Iraq lest they be blamed for the unpleasant consequences many predict." Barone adds, "Many in the mainstream media today, as in 1968, see nothing but the prospect of American defeat. George W. Bush seems to have other ideas."

US Withdrawal Seen As Likely To Escalate "Civil War." Time's Aparisim Ghosh (12/11) writes that if the Iraqi government "can't stop sectarian killing today when it is able to call on the world's most powerful military, it can hardly be expected to do so once the Americans have left. The more likely outcome is an escalation of the civil war, with elements of the security forces taking sides." Ghosh adds, "Having foolishly dismantled the existing Iraqi army, the U.S. has the duty to create a genuinely proficient new one, instead of rushing recruits through Boy Scout lessons just to satisfy predetermined quotas. It may take five more years. But if the U.S. leaves sooner, Iraq will devolve into an even bigger mess. If the Americans insist on pulling out, they ought to park their hardware nearby, because like it or not, they'll be back."

U.S. News and World Report (12/11, Whitelaw, 2.03M) reports that "an average of 2,000 Iraqis a day are fleeing to Syria – and the numbers appear to be growing. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that at least 700,000 Iraqis have taken refuge in Syria, while an additional 700,000 or so are in Jordan. (Iraq's estimated population is 27 million.) … The numbers jumped sharply after the bombing of the Shiite shrine in Samarra last February that intensified Iraq's sectarian strife. With Iraq slipping toward an all-out civil war amid record numbers of civilians being killed each month, a UNHCR official warns that hundreds of thousands more Iraqis appear to be 'teetering' on the brink of departure. Even U.S. officials, many of whom have previously downplayed refugee flows, now acknowledge they are increasingly concerned." U.S. News and World Report (12/11, Mulrine, 2.03M) reports, "As the capital last week eased out of the round-the-clock curfew imposed after the bombing of the Shiite enclave of Sadr City that killed over 200 people, traffic was light – except on the airport road, where families packed into cars and braved roadside bombs for the chance to fly to another place."

NBC's Use Of Term "Civil War" Seen As A Defeat For White House. Time's James Poniewozik (12/11) writes, "When Matt Lauer announced that NBC would start referring to the conflict in Iraq as a 'civil war,' media observers hailed it as a 'Cronkite moment,' referring to the CBS anchor's 1968 declaration that the Vietnam War was unwinnable, upon which L.B.J. realized he had lost Middle America. … So, O.K., NBC's declaration may have no effect on the war in Iraq. But it was a signal moment in the war between the Bush White House and the media. If the issue seems like pointless semantics, it is hardly so to the Administration, which has been fixated on framing issues and politicizing language."

Bush's Trip Abroad Portrayed As An Escape From Democrats. Time's Mike Allen (12/11) writes that "if there was ever a good time for George W. Bush to leave home for a spell, it was right after the mid-term elections, when Capitol Hill was aswarm with triumphant Democrats. … European leaders expecting a humbled Bush at the NATO summit in Latvia instead got a stout speech in which he rearticulated his foreign policy."

Military Leaders Call For Increased Troop Commitment In Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A4, Jaffe, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports that a "growing number of senior military officials are arguing that the only way to salvage the situation" in Iraq "is to add more U.S. forces and more U.S. money." With about 140,000 US troops currently in Iraq, "some military officials said that as many as 30,000 more troops could be needed."

Will Says McCain Correct About Need For More Troops. In his Washington Post (12/4, A19, 690K) column, George Will writes that "for three years," Sen. John McCain "has been saying, correctly, that there are far too few U.S. troops in Iraq. For months he has said we cannot win without many more troops. That, too, is correct -- if it does not imply that some surge of troops can now guarantee winning. … Absent adoption of the McCain policy -- a substantial increase in forces -- America's waning influence on events may derive from the increasing likelihood that the scant protection that American forces now provide will be withdrawn."

Bush-Hakim Meeting Seen As Intended To Bolster Maliki. McClatchy (12/4, Gordon, Walcott) says President Bush's meeting today with Iraqi Shiite leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim "is considered an effort to boost support for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki." Hakim "is a leading opponent of anti-U.S. Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr," and the White House "hopes that by urging Hakim and other al-Sadr rivals to support Maliki more forcefully, they can reign in the growing radical influence of al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia."

War Of Words Rages Over Iraq "Civil War" Terminology. The New York Times (12/4, C1, Carr, 1.16M) examines the debate over the term "civil war" as applied to the internal conflict in Iraq, writing, "The war over words and definitions is not a new one. The current administration has fought to maintain custody of the Iraqi conflict by defining insurgents as 'terrorists' and prisoners of war as 'unlawful combatants.' During Vietnam, the administration defined civilian casualties as 'collateral damage.' … There are those who suggest that there is something vaguely seditious in describing the situation in Iraq as a civil war." But "on closer inspection, what seems like a bold, transgressive step by the media," led by NBC and the Los Angeles Times, to adopt the term "is considerably less. It is not a coincidence that some members of the mainstream media were only willing to attempt to redefine the terms of the current debate after a massive electoral setback to the current administration."

Annan Now Says Iraq In "Civil War." The New York Times (12/4, A14, Wong, 1.16M) headlines a story "Annan Adds His Voice To A Growing Chorus That Is Calling The Situation In Iraq A 'Civil War,'" saying that the UN Secretary-General also now says Iraq has "descended into a civil war that was even deadlier and more anarchic than the 15-year sectarian bloodshed that tore Lebanon apart."

Washington Seeks Lessons From Iraq Experience. The Christian Science Monitor (12/4, Grier, 59K) writes that "even as Washington looks forward to the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, expected this week, many experts and policy organizations are looking back to try and glean crucial lessons from the three-plus years of the US experience in Iraq. It's an unorganized process that involves everything from Army field manuals to the Council on Foreign Relations, and it may never reach consensus, given the range of opinions involved. But even exchanging ideas could be important, since -- as hard as it is to believe now -- the interests and power of the US mean that at some point it could find itself weighing new sorts of military interventions."

Pessimism Has Set In Among Some Iraqis Over Past Four Years. ABC World News (12/3, story 10, 3:00, Harris, 8.78M) ran a feature on changes in Iraq over the last four years, "many of them wrenching. … Even here, at our ABC News compound in Baghdad, we're seeing religious tension among our Iraqi staffers. Over the past day or so, I've been out reconnecting with some of the Iraqis I've been covering for years. When Saddam Hussein fell, perhaps no Iraqi was more jubilant than this man." Unidentified male: "I feel very happy, really. I can't explain my feelings. Really, I am very happy." Harris: "We can no longer show you his face. Because these days, associating with Americans could get him killed. … Through subsequent years of car bombs and kidnappings he stayed stubbornly upbeat. But now, as he watches his neighbors kill each other in a rapid, rabid spiral of religious violence, now he says he wishes Saddam had never been toppled."

More Attacks Against US Troops, But No Casualties. NBC Nightly News (12/3, story 2, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Iraq today, there were more attacks against American troops. Roadside bombs exploded near a US convoy in Baghdad, causing damage but no casualties. US forces were on the move against insurgents with air strikes in Anbar province and a sweep through Bakubah. Meanwhile the death toll from that triple bombing yesterday at a Baghdad market rose to 53."

Friday Battle Showed Difficulties In Letting Iraqi Forces Take Control. The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Moore, 850K) examines a Friday battle in Iraq. Joint US and Iraqi forces, "undertaking what officials described as a major counterinsurgency operation, were in pursuit of 70 'high-value targets' in Baghdad's crowded Fadhil quarter, a Sunni Arab neighborhood of multistory tenements along the east bank of the Tigris River." But they "had walked into a deadly ambush." From "upper-story apartments, insurgents stopped the soldiers' advance with grenades and shoulder-fired rockets. Others launched coordinated mortar strikes, hitting one of two nearby Iraqi field posts. By the time the 11-hour battle was over, one Iraqi soldier had been killed and six others wounded, including one who shot himself in the foot." US officials "say an imminent expansion of the Military Transition Teams -- squads of American military advisors traveling with Iraqi army units -- will meet demands" Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki made of President Bush at their meeting last week "for more authority over his own security forces. But interviews at their joint Rustamiya base with U.S. advisors and Iraqi soldiers involved in Friday's battle revealed a different story. The operation was hastily prepared and badly executed, they said, and plans to let the Iraqis take the lead in the battle were quickly scrapped."

Airstrike Said To Have Killed "Toddler." USA Today (12/4, 2.27M) carries an AP story about civilian casualties of a US airstrike. The story was carried Sunday in the Norfolk Virginian Pilot (12/13), for example, but USA Today's version changes the word "child" in the first sentence to "toddler." The age of the child was not given in yesterday's version -- the USA Today version, though, says that the child was a boy "believed to be under the age of 2."

AFP Pegs Cost Of Iraq War At $350 Billion. AFP (12/4) reports, "The war in Iraq has cost the United States more than 350 billion dollars since the March 2003 invasion, according to an AFP review of Congress figures." A September 22 Congressional Research Service study "estimated the cost at 319 billion dollars, representing 73 percent of US spending for the 'war on terror' launched after [9/11]. Congress has approved 70 billion dollars for the 'war on terror' in the 2007 defense budget that includes about 50 billion dollars for the Iraq conflict, bringing the three-and-a-half-year spending over 350 billion dollars."

Missing F-16 Pilot Listed As Killed In Action. The AP (12/3) reports, "An American pilot whose F-16 fighter jet went down in Iraq was listed as killed in action following DNA analysis of remains recovered at the crash site, the U.S. Air Force said Sunday." The dead pilot is Maj. Troy L. Gilbert, 34, who "was supporting troops fighting in Anbar province, where many of the country's Sunni-Arab insurgent groups operate." US officials doubt "Gilbert was shot down." More than 40 sites carried this story. The Washington Post (12/4, Trejos, 690K) reports his death at the bottom of an article about Saddam's death penalty appeal.

Saddam's Lawyers Formally Appeal Death Sentence. The Washington Post (12/4, A16, Trejos, 690K) reports Saddam Hussein's lawyers have "formally appealed his death sentence for the killing of 148 Shiite men and boys from the town of Dujail in the 1980s, a spokesman for the Iraqi High Tribunal said. The case will now go to a higher court, which can rule on it at any time. If the court upholds Hussein's conviction, his execution, by hanging, must occur within 30 days, according to Iraqi law."

Joint State-DOD Report Says Afghan Police Force Ineffective. A front-page New York Times (12/4, Glanz, Rohde, 1.16M) story running nearly 2,000 words says that "five years after the fall of the Taliban, a joint report by the Pentagon and the State Department has found that the American-trained police force in Afghanistan is largely incapable of carrying out routine law enforcement work, and that managers of the $1.1 billion training program cannot say how many officers are actually on duty or where thousands of trucks and other equipment issued to police units have gone." The report said "no effective field training program had been established in Afghanistan."

Bombing, Aftermath Kill At Least Three In Kandahar. The New York Times (12/4, A14, Gall, 1.16M) reports a suicide bomber "rammed a minibus" into a British military convoy in Kandahar Sunday, "wounding three soldiers and setting a vehicle on fire" and leading British troops to open fire on civilians. At least three people were killed and 15 wounded "in the bombing and the shooting afterward."

Musharraf Blamed For Afghanistan's Instability. Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria (12/11) writes, "Afghanistan is in danger of becoming a version of Iraq, where the central government has collapsed, disorder is rife and a Qaeda-backed insurgency controls large swathes of the country." Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf "have openly quarreled about the cause of the Taliban's re-emergence. Musharraf blames Karzai's incompetence and weakness. Karzai argues that Pakistan has been tacitly — and often actively — supporting the Taliban along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, and in Pakistan itself." Musharraf "is a genuine modernizer who has saved his country from becoming a failed state. Despite the compromises he has had to make, he has been more forward-looking on economics, law, religion and even women's rights issues than any government in Pakistan since the early 1970s. But having confronted Islamic extremists on such matters, Musharraf seems to believe that one area where he need not actively thwart them is in their goal of jihad against Karzai's government and its Western backers."

Taliban Uses Manual To Train Fighters. Newsweek (12/11, 3.12M) reports, "In case a Taliban fighter wonders what is expected of him, he can now refer to a nine-page, blue and white, pocket-size pamphlet called the Layeha, which Mullah Mohammed Omar began distributing last month. The book (NEWSWEEK obtained a copy, and has seen Taliban fighters carrying it in several parts of Afghanistan) lays down 29 strictures for conduct on the battlefield and in villages, as well as sanctions faced by those who break the rules: strict Islamic justice."

Pakistani Officials Urge NATO To Negotiate With Taliban. The Washington Times (12/4, Rashid, 88K) reports Pakistani officials "are urging NATO countries to accept the Taliban and negotiate a series of regional peace agreements similar to those that Pakistan has reached in tribal areas along its border with Afghanistan." Pakistani Foreign Minister Khurshid Kasuri told NATO foreign ministers last week "that the Taliban was winning the war in Afghanistan and that NATO was bound to fail."

Wiccan Symbol Placed On Soldier's Memorial Plaque. The Washington Post/AP (12/4, A17) reports the widow of Sgt. Patrick Stewart, who died in Pakistan, "saw a Wiccan symbol placed on a memorial plaque for her husband Saturday, after fighting the federal government for more than a year over the emblem." Roberta Stewart said it was the "first government-issued memorial plaque with a Wiccan pentacle."

Fewer Combat Medals Being Awarded In Iraq Than In Previous Wars. Time (12/11, Donnelly, 4.03M) reports, "U.S. troops are fighting and dying with valor. So why have so few received the military's top awards? Are there fewer heroes in the Iraq war than in previous wars? That's the message the Pentagon is sending, say critics, by not awarding today's soldiers nearly as many of the nation's highest military honors. Three and a half years of combat in Iraq, for example, have produced only two winners of the Medal of Honor, the country's highest military award for bravery in combat. There were, by contrast, 464 Medals of Honor handed out during America's involvement in World War II, which lasted the same amount of time. … The same applies to the second highest honor, the service crosses: there were 8,716 of those given out during World War II and just 26 so far in Iraq."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Study Finds School Killings Up Slightly. The AP (12/4, Jordan) reports, "At least 21 people were killed at school during the 2004-05 academic year, a slight increase from the year before, the government reported Sunday." The AP continues, "The study by the Bureau of Justice Statistics does not include data from fatal shootings in Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania this fall. In Pennsylvania, five Amish girls were killed in a one-room schoolhouse by a milk truck driver who then turned the gun on himself." The AP adds, "Overall, fewer students reported being the victims of violent crime at school or school-sponsored events in 2004-2005, the study by the Justice Department agency show. Additionally, school-age children remain far more likely to be assaulted, raped and robbed off school grounds. … The study looked at violent crime against students over several periods of time. … The 21 killings at school-related events, between July 2004 and June 2005, targeted victims between age 5 and 18, said Katrina Baum, co-author of the 2006 Indicators of School Crime and Safety. Over the previous year, 19 people were killed. … It was not immediately clear whether all the victims were students. Still, the preliminary data indicates that students were about 50 times more likely in the 2003-04 school year to be killed away from school than at school, the report shows."

Middle America Said To Be In The Midst Of Violent Crime Wave. Time (12/11, Kingsbury, 4.03M) reports, "Violent offenses are rising in midsize U.S. cities for the first time in 10 years. A closer look at one Midwestern town shows what's behind the uptick--and why we shouldn't expect it to slow anytime soon. It's as if Milwaukee, Wis., had reverted to a state of lethal chaos. … Not only did crime suddenly begin to rise in 2005, but the most violent crimes led the trend. Homicides shot up 3.4%. Robberies, 3.9%. Aggravated assaults, 1.8%. Hardest hit were not metropolises like New York City and Los Angeles but cities with populations between 400,000 and 1 million -- such as Baltimore, Md.; Charlotte, N.C.; St. Louis, Mo.; and Oakland, Calif. -- and this year looks to see similar rates of increase, if not worse. Few places have suffered more than Milwaukee. The homicide count for the city of 590,000 fell from 130 in 1996 to just 88 in 2004. But last year, according to FBI figures, Milwaukee saw the country's largest jump in homicides -- up 40%, to 121."

US Charges Two With DC Automobile Fine Payment Scheme. The Washington Times (12/4, Mcelhatton) reports, "The D.C. Office of Inspector General is investigating a reported scheme in which stolen credit cards were used to pay fines for parking and moving violations in the District, court records show." The Times continues, "Federal authorities last week filed arrest warrants that state two persons engaged in the scheme to pay off tickets for people at half the face value of the tickets, according to court records. … An affidavit from a D.C. Inspector General investigator states the scheme involved a man identified as Lonnell Damon Duckett offering to pay off people's unpaid parking and moving-violation tickets. In return, he sought cash for up to half the value of the unpaid D.C. Department of Motor Vehicle tickets, court records show. .. .In other words, Mr. Duckett, a Transportation Department employee, would offer to wipe out $1,000 in tickets if he received $500 in cash, authorities said." The Times adds, "The second person in the reported scheme has been identified as Ladonna Gray and described as Mr. Duckett's 'DMV connection,' according to court records. .. .Investigators say once Mr. Duckett received the cash, he used stolen credit-card information -- reportedly obtained from Miss Gray -- to pay the tickets. … The payments were made over the Internet, a common practice by most municipalities. … The pair was charged under a criminal statute titled fraud and related activity in connection with access devices last week in federal court. … The U.S. attorney's office filed complaints Nov. 27 against Miss Gray and Mr. Duckett."

California Man Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison For Movie Piracy. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/2, Gentile) reported, "A man convicted of sneaking camcorders into movie screenings and selling the pirated tapes in video stores was sentenced to seven years in federal prison Friday." Johnny Ray Gasca of Los Angeles "was convicted in June 2005 of three counts of copyright infringement as well as using a fake Social Security number and of an escape charge for fleeing his attorney's custody while awaiting trial." The AP noted, "He represented himself during a weeklong trial, saying he didn't intend to profit from his actions," but "Federal prosecutors showed the jury Gasca's diary in which he wrote that he earned up to $4,000 a week by attending the screenings. Prosecutors alleged he sold the films through small video stores or on the street. … At one point, Gasca pointed to an FBI agent in the courtroom and said, 'I'm going to prove to you he's a liar, your honor.'"

Copley News Service (12/2, Krasnowski) reported, "At the sentencing hearing, Gasca was unapologetic and maintained his innocence. He thanked lawyers who have aided him and court staff, but also took time to note 'lies' he alleged prosecutors made during his trial." Copley noted, "In an FBI search of Gasca's Hollywood apartment, agents found video duplication equipment and diaries in which he reported making as much as $4,500 a week selling pirated, prereleased movies." After his 2003 arrest, "Gasca escaped and was a fugitive for 16 months before being captured in Florida – reportedly in a hotel room containing stacks of DVDs and recording equipment."

Rural Thieves Targeting Agricultural Sector. USA Today (12/4, 1A, Kasindorf, 2.27M) reports that in a "rising wave of rural larceny, thieves are tracking commodity prices to steal everything that grows, plows or sprinkles on the USA's farms." California, "the No. 1 state in agricultural production, reports the biggest problems. Theft rings that kept police busy last year chasing stolen artichokes, pomegranates and diesel fuel switched this year to nuts, avocados, citrus, tractors, irrigation pipe and copper wiring, says Bill Yoshimoto, the supervising prosecutor for a 13-county Central California task force on farm crime." No "national statistics are kept on rural thefts, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the American Farm Bureau Federation. Yoshimoto estimates that crops and equipment worth $1 billion will be stolen nationwide this year."

Group Warns Virginia Community About Accused Pedophile. The Washington Post (12/4, B1, Salmon) reports, "An afternoon of football watching and holiday decorating took a strange detour yesterday for some Herndon residents when they opened their doors to find strangers confronting them with troubling information: One of their neighbors is an accused pedophile." The Post continues, "Members of two groups representing victims of abusive Catholic priests went door-to-door in the neighborhood, distributing packets of information accusing a former Catholic priest who has lived there for 10 years. … 'Community notification: Protect your children from a credibly accused serial sex offender,' the packet's cover reads." The Post adds, "The 38-page sheaf of material contained information about Edward F. Dudzinski, 56, who last month was among 20 former priests accused by the Catholic Diocese of Wilmington, Del., of sexually abusing children. He served in the priesthood in the 1970s and 1980s. .. .The diocese disclosed the names in its weekly newspaper, saying that it had found 'credible or substantiated complaints of sexual abuse of minors' against the priests. It said eight, including Dudzinski, are living. Dudzinski has not been convicted of -- or charged in -- any sex-abuse crime. … In a letter accompanying the list, Bishop Michael Saltarelli of the Diocese of Wilmington said he released the names at the recommendation of a diocesan review board. … Yesterday, Dudzinski did not return calls to numbers listed for his address. Two of his roommates, who said the former priest was not at home, defended him and denounced the groups' tactics."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Supreme Court To Consider School Desegregation Cases. The Christian Science Monitor (12/4, Richey, 59K) reports that with US classrooms "growing increasingly segregated," the Supreme Court "takes up two cases that confront the heated debate over race. On one side are those who believe affirmative action and other race-conscious programs are necessary to fight the effects of discrimination and inequality. On the other side are those who believe the Constitution mandates a colorblind approach to race relations - that government programs granting benefits based on a person's race are just as illegal as withholding benefits because of a person's skin color." The two cases concern "race-based student enrollment plans at public school districts in Seattle and in Louisville, Ky. Both plans were designed by the local school boards to voluntarily achieve racial integration to provide a diverse learning environment for the benefit of all students. Both plans are under attack by local parents who say the use of race to maintain a racial balance amounts to an unconstitutional form of government discrimination."

The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Savage, 850K) reports the outcome of the Seattle and Louisville cases "could affect hundreds of school systems across the nation, including the Los Angeles Unified School District. With the arrival of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., civil rights lawyers believe there may be a five-member majority determined to strike down race-based integration programs." In Seattle, the school board "adopted a policy — now suspended — that gave 'nonwhite' students an edge if they sought to enroll in a popular, mostly white high school. In Jefferson County, Ky., which includes Louisville, the school district said the black student body at each elementary school should range from 15% to 50%." In both cities, "several white parents sued to have the plans declared unconstitutional after their children were barred from enrolling in the school of their choice because of their race. Though they lost in the lower courts, the Supreme Court voted in June to hear their appeals, leading many to predict the justices are poised to outlaw 'racial balancing' in the public schools."

Seattle System Shows School Assignment Practices Can Benefit Whites. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A1, Golden, 2.04M) reports in an approximately 2300 word story that the case from Seattle before the Supreme Court was "filed by a predominantly white parents' group from an affluent Seattle neighborhood. Their children were denied admission to a majority-white school, and instead assigned to mostly minority schools." The case, "dating to 2000, has become a lightning rod for critics who say school boards go too far to try to achieve an elusive goal of racial integration. The court's rulings on Seattle and a similar case involving Louisville, Ky., schools are likely to affect hundreds of districts nationwide that use race as a factor in school assignments." But a "close look at Seattle shows that officials have frequently yielded to school-assignment pressure from white parents in pursuing another elusive goal -- middle-class participation in public schools." Even as parents "challenge a government action making room for minorities in highly-regarded schools, the later events in Seattle show another side of the picture: the ways that school-assignment practices can work to the benefit of whites. In Seattle as in other parts of the country, schools sometimes accommodate middle-class parents who push to get their children into coveted schools. When these middle-class parents are predominantly white, as in Seattle, the lobbying can tend to sort more white children into the most desirable schools."

Breyer Says Court Should Promote Rights Of Political Minorities. The AP (12/4, Yen) reports Justice Stephen G. Breyer "says the Supreme Court must promote the political rights of minorities and look beyond the Constitution's text when necessary to ensure that 'no one gets too powerful.'" Breyer, "a Clinton appointee who has brokered many of the high court's 5-4 rulings, spoke in a televised interview that aired one day before justices hear a key case on race in schools. He said judges must consider the practical impact of a decision to ensure democratic participation." Breyer said, "It's a Constitution that protects a democratic system, basic liberties, a rule of law, a degree of equality, a division of powers, state, federal, so that no one gets too powerful." The AP adds that on Monday, "the court will hear arguments in a pair of cases involving integration plans in K-12 schools. The legal challenge, which is backed by the Bush administration, could be among the most significant school cases since the landmark Brown v. Board of Education ruling in 1954 banned racial segregation."

NYTimes Criticizes Government For Backing Challenges To Seattle, Louisville Plans. The New York Times (12/4, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Conservative activists are seeking to halt the completely voluntary, and laudable, efforts by Seattle and Louisville, Ky., to promote racially integrated education. Both cities have school assignment plans known as managed or open choice. Children are assigned to schools based on a variety of factors, one of which is the applicant's race." The Louisville and Seattle plans "are precisely the kind of benign race-based policies that the court has long held to be constitutional. Promoting diversity in education is a compelling state interest under the equal protection clause, and these districts are using carefully considered, narrowly tailored plans to make their schools more diverse." It is "startling to see the Justice Department, which was such a strong advocate for integration in the civil rights era, urging the court to strike down the plans."

WPost Says School Desegregation Cases Not Affirmative Action. The Washington Post (12/4, A18, 690K) says in an editorial that the justices "may be tempted to see the" Seattle and Louisville cases "as the latest showdown over affirmative action. One side casts the matter as a simple issue of governmental race-consciousness; the other talks of diversity. Yet the programs at issue are not classic racial preferences. They deserve to be considered -- and upheld -- for what they are." These programs "use race in a fashion quite different from those that have inspired the court's skepticism in the past. While the Louisville and Seattle programs differ, neither gives members of any particular race a boost at the expense of any other. Rather, the programs respond to residential segregation patterns by giving minority students preference in preponderantly white schools and white students preference in preponderantly minority schools."

Nearly Two-Thirds Of Those Shocked With Tasers In Houston Are Black. The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Bustillo) reports from Houston, "Fred Weary, a pro football player for the Houston Texans, was driving his maroon Chevy Impala SS last month when he was pulled over by police after failing to signal that he was changing lanes. … What happened next is in dispute. Police say Weary was 'verbally combative' and did not put his hands on his car when ordered. The 305-pound offensive lineman says he did what the officers told him. But one thing is clear: Like many black men in this city, Weary was zapped with a stun gun and cuffed as he lay motionless on the ground." The Times continues, "The highly publicized case has brought attention to some stark statistics about police use of Tasers in the nation's fourth-largest city: Nearly two-thirds of those shocked with the high-voltage weapons over the last two years were black. … And the resulting outcry from black community activists and a City Council member has led Mayor Bill White to call for an independent review of Taser use by the Houston Police Department. … 'The mayor took a positive first step, but what will he do when the information comes back and clearly shows that race is a direct factor in who gets Tasered?' said Quanell X, a community activist and leader of the New Black Panther Nation. 'We already know that African Americans are Tasered more often than whites.'" The Times notes, "At a town hall meeting set for today, Quanell X said, he plans to highlight cases of people shocked by stun guns — including one in which a black man who was having an epileptic seizure was Tasered for failing to comply with an officer's orders."

Sharpton Calls On Congress To Investigate Rash Of Police Shootings. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/4, Haines) reports from Atlanta, "Al Sharpton called for a congressional probe of police shooting policies as he joined local activists Sunday outside the home of an elderly woman killed by narcotics police officers who burst into her home. The civil rights leader said the death of Kathryn Johnston — along with the death of 23-year-old groom-to-be Sean Bell, who was shot by police on his wedding day outside a Queens strip club — is an example of 'a new sense of police recklessness' sweeping the country. … Sharpton called for the incoming Congress to address the issue. 'There seems to be a new spirit in law enforcement that they can become the judge, jury and executioner of the law on the scene,' Sharpton said." The AP notes that the FBI is leading the investigation of the Atlanta incident.

Police Shootings Seen As Hard To Probe, Harder To Prosecute. The New York Times (12/4, Hartocollis) reports, "With Sean Bell now eulogized and buried, the emotions surrounding his death are swirling around the investigation into whether police officers committed a crime when they fired 50 bullets into Mr. Bell's car." The Times continues, "Although every investigation is different, cases like that of Mr. Bell, an unarmed black man who was killed on his wedding day, have come to follow a similar rhythm and pattern. And experts and those involved in the investigation say that through the history of those cases, they have learned that it is very difficult to convince a grand jury or a trial jury that police officers, who are empowered to defend the public with deadly force if necessary, went too far. In many cases of police shootings, with tensions high, the facts and legal fine points are difficult to isolate from a much larger context. … 'What makes these cases so hard are issues that go well beyond the incident itself,' a high-ranking official in the office of Richard A. Brown, the Queens district attorney, said last week, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing. … 'It's the racial tension that still exists in the city,' the official continued. 'It's the mistrust in the minority community. It's cops that are faced with danger every day and have to react in seconds. It's safe to say, if they're wrong, somebody dies' — whether a civilian or an officer. … Everyone involved knows the stakes. While the district attorney's office investigates, civil rights activists and lawyers for the victims and the police officers are struggling to shape public opinion and find witnesses who buttress their points of view."

More Commentary. In a column for the New York Times (12/4), Bob Herbert writes, "The death of Sean Bell at the hands of undercover police officers, who also wounded his two companions in their 50-shot barrage in Queens nine days ago, brought to mind a case from a few years back in which undercover cops, acting on bogus information, attacked an innocent group of young people in a car in Manhattan." The Times continues, "The cops in the Manhattan case assumed that the people in the car were lowlifes. They were all Ivy League graduates, and one is currently clerking for U.S. Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens. … The incident occurred about 11:30 p.m. on Jan. 10, 2000. Two men and two women who were running their own startup Internet company, MagicBeanStalk.com, were parked outside a subway station on East 14th Street, near Union Square. Without any warning, a plainclothes officer leaped out of a yellow cab with his gun drawn and rushed the car with the four young people in it. … Thinking he was being carjacked, the driver put the vehicle in reverse and tried to get away. He was blocked by an unmarked police car that had pulled up behind him. He ended up hitting both the unmarked car and the cab (which was also a police vehicle) in his unsuccessful effort to flee. … The driver, Jason Rowley, who was 25 at the time, had no idea that the man with the gun was a cop. … It turned out that the cops were acting on a mistaken computer report that Mr. Rowley's car was stolen. As frightening as the incident was, the four people in the car were lucky that none of the cops opened fire." Herbert adds, "The four people who were in the car in the Manhattan incident have since done extremely well. Ms. Sudeall, for example, graduated from law school and is now a clerk for Justice Stevens. Mr. Gilbert has established a new Internet venture based on a program he invented that predicts people's buying patterns online. It's very creepy to think how easily one or more of the four could have been killed in their encounter with the police."

Maryland Hears Challenge To Marriage Definition Law. The Washington Post (12/4, B1, Otto, 690K) reports civil rights veteran Charles Blackburn "has resumed his march for civil rights, this time beside his partner of 28 years, Glen Dehn, and 17 other gay and lesbian plaintiffs in a lawsuit asking Maryland to legalize same-sex marriage." Today, the case "goes before Maryland's highest court, where lawyers will debate whether a 33-year-old law defining marriage as between a man and a woman violates constitutional protections against discrimination. The court is not expected to rule immediately." In January, "a Baltimore Circuit Court judge ruled in favor of the plaintiffs, finding that the state's definition of marriage was discriminatory and could not withstand a constitutional challenge." The state "appealed Murdock's decision and will argue at today's hearing that the law meets constitutional muster and that questions concerning the definition of marriage would be better handled by the state legislature."

Religious Freedom Group Files Argument Against Gay Marriage. The Washington Times (12/4, Ward, 88K) reports a "national religious-freedom group has chosen the same-sex 'marriage' case to be argued today in Maryland's highest court to file its first legal argument." The Beckett Fund, "a nonprofit legal group supporting religious freedoms, argues that legalized same-sex 'marriage' could result in civil suits against churches that refuse to marry same-sex couples or refuse to hire homosexual employees." The group "also says the government might strip such churches of their tax-exempt status and of their power to license marriages."

Voting Machines Available On Market Said To Be Lacking. In a New York Times editorial observer (12/4), Adam Cohen says, "To the long list of recent Election Day horrors from butterfly ballots to six-hour lines, add 'vote flipping.' In Ohio, Illinois, New Jersey and other states last month, there were reports — some confirmed by election officials — that when voters touched the screen for one candidate, the machine registered it for another. One Florida Congressional race, in which the Republican won by fewer than 400 votes, is in the courts because paperless electronic voting machines may have failed to register as many as 18,000 votes." Voters who "complain about their own machines don't often get a chance to compare them with other options. But New York's boards of elections are replacing the old lever machines, and I recently went to demonstrations the city held to allow the public to try out the five finalists." But if "it comes down to waiting longer or sticking voters with illegal or unreliable machines that will undermine democracy for years to come, officials should wait, and insist on better machines. New Yorkers, and all Americans, deserve better choices than the voting machine industry is offering."

Public Relations Battle Launched Over Airline Merger. USA Today (12/4, 1B, Adams) reports, "Delta Air Lines' creditors and a bankruptcy judge will decide whether US Airways buys Delta, but that isn't stopping both airlines from battling for public opinion." USA continues, "Both airlines have hired big names in the financial public relations business to help shape the views of Wall Street analysts, airline employees and airline customers as well as the creditors and judges. US Airways hired New York communications firm Joele Frank, Wilkinson Brimmer Katcher. Delta is using Kekst and Co., a large New York financial PR firm with longstanding ties to the airline." USA adds, "In a surprise announcement Nov. 15, US Airways publicly offered Delta's bankruptcy creditors $8 billion in stock and cash for Delta, which is in Chapter 11. Delta's management has rebuffed the offer. … The unveiling was well-orchestrated. That morning, US Airways' PR team, along with a team from Joele Frank, placed predawn phone calls to dozens of reporters and Wall Street analysts to alert them to an 8:15 a.m. conference call with CEO Doug Parker. … Meanwhile, Delta bought a full-page advertisement opposing the merger in its hometown newspaper, The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. And at the urging of its own employees, Delta ordered and distributed 50,000 red 'Keep Delta My Delta' lapel buttons. US Airways has scheduled meetings with influential newspaper editorial boards."

Oberstar To Play Key Role In Antitrust Scrutiny Of Airline Mergers. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (12/4, Fedor) reports, "U.S. Rep. James Oberstar intends to take a hard look at potential airline mergers in the coming months because he knows that fusing two carriers together often causes pain for employees and hurts some consumers. … The Minnesota Democrat already is scrutinizing the proposed US Airways-Delta merger." The Tribune continues, "Next month, Oberstar will assume the chairmanship of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, where he will be well-positioned to raise concerns in the event that a wave of consolidation sweeps the airline industry next year, as some observers predict. … While airlines don't need congressional approval to merge, Oberstar's post gives him the ability to spotlight antitrust issues that the Justice Department is legally obliged to examine. … 'People are saying there is overcapacity' and that some seats should be removed from the market, Oberstar said. But he sees carriers flying with many full planes and argues 'there is a lack of substantial competition' on many routes." The Tribune adds, "Oberstar, who was reelected to a 17th House term last month, gave his assessment of the state of the airline industry and talked about his oversight role during an interview last week with the Star Tribune. … The only member of the Minnesota delegation who was serving in Congress when the airline industry was deregulated in 1978, he sees that move as a success. … 'There's no question about the success of deregulation,' Oberstar said. 'It has created seamless travel, more nonstops, more destinations, more opportunities." By taking the government out of the pricing business, consumers are saving about $6.5 billion a year on fares, he argued. … So when mergers and acquisitions and leveraged buyouts are considered,' Oberstar said, 'my first thought is: Is the result going to be undoing the consumer benefits of deregulation?'"

South African Edgars In Talks With Blackstone, Bain, KKR. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A14, Singer) reports, "Edgars Consolidated Stores Ltd. of South Africa is in talks with Blackstone Group, Bain Capital and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. on a potential $3 billion deal that would be the largest private-equity buyout in that country, according to people familiar with the situation." The Journal continues, "The emergence of the largest U.S. private-equity firms as possible buyers of one of South Africa's biggest retail groups illustrates how the booming sector is scouring further afield to deploy the billions in cash raised in recent years." The Journal adds, "Edgars Consolidated Stores, known as Edcon, said in October that it was approached by private-equity firms interested in acquiring the fashion chain, which has more than 900 stores in South Africa, Botswana, Namibia, Swaziland and Lesotho. Founded in 1929, the Johannesburg company has more than 20,000 employees and a market value of about 19 billion rand ($2.6 billion). … Some of the U.S. firms working on a potential acquisition may make a combined bid, but final decisions haven't been made, the people close to the matter said. The company has asked for firm proposals to be made in January, they said. … Edcon would be the latest in a string of potential private-equity takeovers in South Africa. Financial-service provider Alexander Forbes Ltd. received a bid by a group of investors led by Actis Capital LLP, and grocery chain Shoprite Holdings Ltd. has drawn potential private-equity bids."

Bush Mulls Lifting Moratorium On Drilling Off Southwestern Alaska Coast. The New York Times (12/4, Barringer, 1.16M) reports, "President Bush is considering whether to lift the 17-year-old moratorium on energy drilling in the waters off southwestern Alaska, a White House spokeswoman said Sunday, which would allow oil and gas companies to try to tap into more than five trillion cubic feet of natural gas that lies beneath rich fishing grounds." The Times adds, "Last summer the Interior Department recommended reopening several areas of the outer continental shelf, including the southern part of Bristol Bay, which lies just north of where the Aleutian Islands meet the Alaskan mainland, to energy exploration." There "has been widespread speculation among environmental groups and fishing industry representatives that President Bush would end the moratorium during the lame-duck session of Congress, allowing the Interior Department to proceed with its plans to market oil and gas leases in the southern section of the bay, along the north coast of the Aleutian Islands."

Gingrich Urges House To Pass Senate Offshore Drilling Bill. In a Washington Times (12/4, 88K) op-ed former House Speaker Newt Gingrich writes that "the House should adopt Sen. Pete Domenici and Sen. Mary Landrieu's narrowly drawn bill to expand Gulf Coast oil and gas production," which "would give the Gulf states a greater share of oil revenues to rebuild and restore the vanishing coastline." Gingrich calls the bill "a good first step toward a process in which other states could apply for permission to develop new offshore oil and gas reserves in exchange for a share of the revenues." He concludes, "Instead of holding out for an impossible bill, the House Republicans would be wise to see the Senate bill as an important first step toward energy self-sufficiency through expanded offshore oil and gas production, disaster prevention and ecological restoration. Completing this in the next few weeks is an important step in the right direction."

Administration Shows "New Interest" In Alternative Energy. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A6, McKinnon, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Facing increased political pressure on environmental policy at home and abroad, the Bush administration is signaling new interest in promoting alternative energies and curbing greenhouse gases." Administration "officials may push U.S. auto makers to make more vehicles that can run on ethanol and other alternative fuels. To boost availability, they are also considering a call to cut tariffs on imported ethanol." The Journal adds, "White House aides are also suggesting new openness to global-warming solutions, including the broad emissions limits they have resisted so far. The ultimate aim is to begin piecing together a framework to replace the Kyoto accord after it expires in 2012."

Study Finds Renewables Could Supply Quarter Of US Energy. The Christian Science Monitor (12/4, Clayton, 59K) reports, "Renewables could supply one-quarter of US energy by 2025, with no harm to economy, a study says. The last time renewable-energy entrepreneurs were this gung-ho, in the early 1980s, subsidies - not sales - buoyed their business plans. This time may be different." Although "most renewable fuels can't yet compete with their traditional counterparts, their costs of production are falling steadily. If the trend continues, America's energy mix by 2025 could be far greener and cleaner - without damaging the economy - than most analysts could have anticipated a few years ago." A November report by the RAND Corp. "estimated that if the cost to produce renewable energy continued to fall at its current rate, renewables could provide 25 percent of the nation's power by 2025 at no additional cost to the economy and perhaps even save money."

Link Between Pollutant, Hormone Systems Studied. The Washington Post (12/4, B1, Fahrenthold) reports, "Growing evidence that chemicals in the environment can interfere with animals' hormone systems -- including the discovery that male Potomac River fish are growing eggs -- has focused the attention of environmentalists and scientists on a new question: Are humans also at risk?" The Post continues, "A decade ago, the very idea that pollutants could interfere with a body's chemical messages was near the fringes of science. But now, it is an urgent topic for lawmakers and researchers around the world, and especially in the Washington area. … In recent years, researchers have linked some common chemicals to troubling changes in laboratory rodents and wild animals, including reproductive defects, immune-system alterations and obesity." The Post adds, "For now, no connections to human ailments have been proved. But some studies have provided hints that people might be affected by crossed hormones, and activists wonder if this kind of pollution could contribute to diabetes, birth defects and infertility. … The Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments is planning to host a public forum about hormone-disrupting pollution this spring. U.S. Reps. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.) and Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) have said they plan to press the Environmental Protection Agency about its failure to develop a program to test chemicals for hormonelike effects, as ordered by Congress in 1996." The Post notes, "The idea that natural hormone messages can be tampered with is not new; for decades, women using birth-control pills have been counting on a man-made chemical to do just that. .. .But the current concern is much wider: Some fear that modern chemistry might have unwittingly created other compounds with hormonelike effects and that they might have spread widely around the globe."

WSJournal Sees Senators' Letter As Part Of Campaign Against Global Warming Dissent. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (12/4, 2.04M) writes, "Washington has no shortage of bullies, but even we can't quite believe an October 27 letter that Senators Jay Rockefeller and Olympia Snowe sent to Exxon Mobil CEO Rex Tillerson. Its message: Start toeing the Senators' line on climate change, or else." The Journal adds, "On the one hand, the Senators say that everyone agrees on the facts and consequences of climate change. But at the same time they are so afraid of debate that they want Exxon to stop financing a doughty band of dissenters who can barely get their name in the paper." The "letter is of a piece with what has become a campaign of intimidation against any global warming dissent." The Journal writes, "A windfall profits tax is in the air, and we've seen what happens to other companies that dare to resist Congressional intimidation. It's to Exxon's credit that, in its response to the Senators, the company said that it will continue to fund free market research groups because 'there is value in the debate' that helps promote 'optimal public policy decisions.' Too bad that's not what the Senators care about."

The Wall Street Journal (12/4, 2.04M) prints excerpts from the senators' letter, which says, "Exxon Mobil's longstanding support of a small cadre of global climate change skeptics, and those skeptics' access to and influence on government policymakers, have made it increasingly difficult for the United States to demonstrate the moral clarity it needs across all facets of its diplomacy." The Senators "recommend that Exxon Mobil publicly acknowledge both the reality of climate change and the role of humans in causing or exacerbating it," "repudiate its climate change denial campaign and make public its funding history," and devote "at least some of the money it has invested in climate change denial pseudo-science to global remediation efforts."

NYTimes Says USDA Should Not Categorize Wild Salmon As Organic. The New York Times (12/4, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The Department of Agriculture routinely distinguishes between organic carrots and the regular kind when it decides whether to grant an 'organic' label. But it has gotten into trouble recently over how to decide whether a fish — especially a fish like salmon — is organic or not. The fishing industry is eager to call wild salmon 'organic,' as a way of denoting quality to consumers. But there's a problem. Carrots are either grown organically — without conventional pesticides — or they're not. A wild carrot, to most people, is barely a carrot, but the flower called Queen Anne's lace." Fish "can be as organic as the finest pasture-raised organic pig farm or as inorganic as a hog confinement operation. Let's use the word 'organic' as a way to distinguish between them, all the while hoping that there remain wild salmon out in the oceans, beyond any of our categorizing."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Reporting On Meth Awareness Day Continues. The Boston Herald (12/1) reported, "The Hub is winning the war on crystal methamphetamine thanks to lessons learned from battles waged in the meth-gripped West and Midwest, a top federal drug official said yesterday, but she warned that the addictive drug is on a destructive march toward the East Coast. 'We've been fortunate in New England,' June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in New England, said on the first National Methamphetamine Awareness Day. … The Combat Methamphetamine Act of 2005 has tremendously curbed the production of home-grown meth now that common cold medications containing the ingredients ephedrine, pseudoephedrine and phenylpropanolamine must be kept behind pharmacy counters, Stansbury said."

The Southern Illinoisan (12/2) reported DEA agent Roger Ehler "answered much more specific questions Thursday when he came to address a criminal justice class at John A. Logan College on Thursday. It was National Meth Awareness Day, and many of the students were already quite aware." Ehler "followed up by discussing current trends in meth use in Southern Illinois. The good news is small-batch meth labs are declining in the wake of legislation limiting the availability of pseudoephedrine, a key ingredient in meth production. The bad news is imported meth, a more pure form known as ice or Mexican dope, is slowly on the rise."

Meth Labs Found In New York. The New York Daily News (12/3, Fenner, Moore) reported Meth "is moving up in society. Experts say methods for 'cooking' the drug have become less noxious over the past decade, making meth labs a friendlier fit for apartment buildings like the one on Manhattan's East Side, where federal agents announced a bust last week. 'Back in the day, cooking meth was a very smelly process,' said Steve Robertson, special agent and spokesman for the DEA. 'That's why meth labs would go into rural areas. You would have them out in little shacks out on farms or ranches.' Agents from his agency announced Thursday - National Meth Awareness Day - that they had busted a clandestine meth lab at a high-rise on E. 39th St. They also announced nine other meth lab busts in the city and on Long Island." The New York Daily News story also was used by the Contra Costa Times, Kansas City Star, and San Luis Obispo Tribune.

Manchester, Connecticut's Journal Inquirer (12/1) reported DEA officials "say meth, which affects the central nervous system, has 'a phenomenal rate of addiction, with some experts saying users often get hooked after just one use.' The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency says 80 percent of meth is smuggled into this country from Mexico. … And on Thursday, DEA officials announced the arrest of 10 people who they say operated meth labs in New York City and on Long Island."

On its Web site, NY1, New York (12/4) reports, "Special Agent [John] Gilbride says that methamphetamine has become the crack of the 21st century. He says it is a drug that is now affecting the lower, middle, and upper classes. 'Methamphetamine cuts across all sections of society,' said Gilbride. 'There is not one type of individual, one type of group that manufactures methamphetamine.'"

US Attorney Notes Rising Use, Trafficking Of Meth On Coloado's Reservations. In the Rocky Mountain News (12/2), Troy A. Eid, U.S. Attorney for the District of Colorado, wrote, "Taken together, the murder rate for Colorado's two Indian nations is 20 times higher than the state average. … Yet another challenge involves the rising use and trafficking of methamphetamine on Ute Mountain Ute and Southern Ute reservations. Gangs based off-reservation sometimes offer free samples of crystal meth…specifically targeting Native American people." Leaders from the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration, U.S. Attorney's Office, and other federal agencies "are working more closely than ever before with the elected leaders of the Southern Ute and Ute Mountain Ute tribes and their representatives."

Maryland Couple Sentenced For Running Drug Courier Business. The Baltimore Sun (12/2, Dolan) reported, "An emigre in the United States recruited Hopkins Appau back in Africa to swallow dozens of pellets filled with heroin. He boarded a plane, arrived in Baltimore and greeted his American bosses from his motherland -- a longtime Washington municipal employee and his immigrant wife living in a suburban townhouse. A U.S. District Court judge in Baltimore sentenced the couple, Godfrey Bonsu, 44, and his wife, Victoria Boateng, 42, both of Bowie, to lengthy prison terms…for running a drug courier business out of a Takoma Park Quality Inn." Bonsu "received a 14-year prison term while Boateng was ordered to prison for slightly more than 11 years." Law enforcement agents "use a variety of techniques to catch such drug couriers. 'Sometimes we have intelligence provided by an informant or you see that something is wrong with a person,' Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent Steve Robertson said in an interview shortly after the Bonsu-Boateng convictions in February."

Police Officer In Pennsylvania Faces Drug-Trafficking Charges. Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania's Citizens Voice (12/2) reported a part-time township police officer who "also worked in other communities was arrested Friday on federal drug trafficking and illegal handgun possession charges. Patrolman Charles M. Byra Jr., 28, a township resident, was charged with possession of crack cocaine and marijuana with intent to sell and with carrying a stolen gun, which he allegedly used while drug trafficking. … The arrest follows an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the state police that spanned most of this year."

The Harrisburg (PA) Patriot-News (12/3) reported Byra "was charged in U.S. District Court in Scranton on Friday with possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine, possession with intent to distribute marijuana, possession of a firearm during a felony drug trafficking transaction and possession of a stolen firearm."

Wilkes-Barre's Times Leader (12/2) reported, "A source close to the investigation said Byra was arrested on suspicion he stole evidence connected to mainly drug cases when he worked as a part-time officer in Dupont earlier this year."

Mitchell Says Baseball's Steroids Investigation Stymied By Lack Of Cooperation. In its Baseball section, the New York Times (12/2, Curry) reported George Mitchell, the former Senate majority leader who "is leading an investigation into steroid use in baseball, said in a statement…that some parties he would not name had not cooperated with investigators. Because of that lack of cooperation, Mitchell said, it will take longer to complete the investigation. … Several team officials have given testimony, but no players have acknowledged speaking with Mitchell."

The AP (12/1) reported Mitchell "said his probe into steroid use in baseball has been delayed because he lacks power to order testimony."

US Drug Laws Said To Be In Need Of Reform. In the Washington Post (12/4, A19, 690K), Kevin A. Sabet, a fellow at National Development and Research Institutes Inc. in New York, writes about US drug laws and says, "No serious drug policy analyst can look you in the eye and tell you that our only alternatives are strict prohibition or lax legalization. There is, in fact, a comfortable position closer to the middle: We can reform the worst parts of our laws without fearing massive increases in drug use. Erasing or dramatically closing the gap between the sentences for crack cocaine and powder cocaine is a good example of this."

Philadelphia Inquirer: Updated Laws Could Prevent Internet Drug Trafficking. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/2) editorialized, "Almost anyone with an e-mail address has received those annoying spam messages offering prescription drugs without a prescription. Stopping these illicit cyber drug rings requires dedicated, technologically savvy law enforcement agents and a high level of cooperation among federal, state and local authorities. Fortunately, that's exactly what happened in Operation Cyber Chase, an investigation led by the Drug Enforcement Administration. … Tougher, updated laws could help slow the flow of illegal controlled substances. Federal law enforcement authorities work under the auspices of the 1970s-era Controlled Substances Act, enacted long before the Internet came into use."

Afghanistan Opium Production Sets Record. The Washington Post (12/2, A1, Deyoung) reported Opium production in Afghanistan "broke all records in 2006, reaching a historic high despite ongoing U.S.-sponsored eradication efforts, the Bush administration reported yesterday. In addition to a 26 percent production increase over past year -- for a total of 5,644 metric tons -- the amount of land under cultivation in opium poppies grew by 61 percent. Cultivation in the two main production provinces, Helmand in the southwest and Oruzgan in central Afghanistan, was up by 132 percent. … White House drug policy chief John Walters called the news 'disappointing.'"

The Washington Times/UPI (12/2) reported, "In addition to a 26-percent production increase over past year -- for a total of 5,644 metric tons -- the acreage used for opium poppies grew by 61 percent, the White House said."

IMMIGRATION:

Next Congress Expected To Pass "Amnesty" Immigration Bill. The Washington Times (12/4, Hurt, 88K) reports Congress will "approve an immigration bill that will grant citizenship rights to most of the 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens in the U.S. after Democrats take control next month, predict both sides on Capitol Hill." While Republicans have "been largely splintered on the issue of immigration reform, Democrats have been fairly unified behind the principle that the illegals currently in the country should get citizenship rights without having to first leave the country." Democrats in "both chambers say they will start with some form of legislation first drafted by Sens. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, which was the basis for the bill that was approved earlier this year by the Senate." But House Republicans "and many outside Congress derided that bill as 'amnesty' for allowing illegals to remain in the U.S. and eventually become citizens. Democrats say it's not amnesty because aliens must pay a fine and wait years before becoming citizens."

TAX:

Tester Claims Tax Policies Discriminate Against Small Businesses. In an interview with U.S. News and World Report (12/11, 2.03M) Sen.-Elect Jon Tester says, "If you look at what has built this country, it has been small business and working families. They are critical to the economic success of the country. We're a mom and pop operation. Some of the things we experience are regulations set up more from a big-business standpoint. Small business is taxed with potential accounting measures set up for Enron and things like that. … You have to make sure you're not putting undue burden on small business from a tax and regulation standpoint." Asked, "It looks as if the federal minimum wage will climb next year. What effect will that have on small companies," Tester replied, "I don't think that's going to impact small business in the least. It's so minimal you can't get good people at that wage level. If you are going to have someone stay with you any length of time, you are going to have to pay them more."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Conservatives Urge Bush To Continue Nominating Conservatives For Judgeships. U.S. News and World Report (12/11, Halloran, 2.03M) reports, "With newly powerful Democrats like New York Sen. Charles Schumer of the Judiciary Committee vowing an end to 'the days of hard-right judges,' the nominee game has become far more complicated. … The new dynamic has unleashed speculation over whom President Bush may consider if he gets another opportunity to nominate a Supreme Court justice…during his remaining two years. And it has reinvigorated strategy sessions on all sides to assess the many 'what if's.'" Leonard Leo of the Federalist Society "is already urging Bush to stick with his strategy of picking nominees that please the right, even without a GOP Senate majority. 'No matter who he nominates, it's going to be a firefight,' said Leo, a behind-the-scenes player in the administration's judicial nomination strategy. … He and others on the right believe that if the president has the opportunity, he'll nominate a woman. And the top name on their list is Edith Hollan Jones of Texas."

Lame Duck Congress To Use Continuing Resolution To Fund Government. The New York Times (12/4, Hulse, 1.16M) reports Republicans "intend to conclude the 109th Congress this week and leave Democrats stuck with the tab in the form of unfinished spending bills as the days of Republican rule draw to a close on Capitol Hill." Congressional leaders "said election losses had sapped Republican enthusiasm for trying to finish nine spending measures that were due Oct. 1. Congress will instead pass a stopgap measure to keep the government running until mid-February, leaving the fiscal tangle for the new Democratic majority to sort out next year." However, the GOP will "try to record some final accomplishments as they intend to adjourn by Friday." They would "like to extend a number of popular tax breaks rather than see Democrats get credit for restoring them next year. House Republicans also plan to try to push through an expansion of offshore oil and gas drilling opportunities and will take a symbolic anti-abortion vote before Democrats, many of whom support abortion rights, take control in January."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/4, Chaddock, 59K) reports that while there is "a vast unfinished agenda in the 109th Congress, including most of the fiscal 2007 spending bills, immigration reform, ethics rules for lawmakers, an offshore drilling bill, a fix for President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program, and an omnibus trade and tax package," after an "election that shifted control of the House and Senate to Democrats, there's little political will to complete it this session." Congress is "likely to punt on approving at least nine of the 12 spending bills for the fiscal year that began on Oct. 1. All that means heavy lifting for Democrats in the 110th Congress, who will have to deal with old spending bills even as they are rolling out a signature agenda for the first 100 legislative days." But while "expectations are fading for spending bills, the Senate is on track to confirm former CIA director Robert Gates as Defense secretary."

WPost Criticizes GOP For Failure To Pass Appropriations Bills. The Washington Post (12/4, A18, 690K) says in an editorial that the congressional Republicans were "happy to dump $460 billion in unfinished business on the new Democratic majority. One political plus for them is that the leftover mess threatens to snarl the Democrats' already full agenda at the start of the 110th Congress. Another is that it could force the new leaders to an early and unpleasant choice about whether to live within the Republicans' spending ceiling or look like hypocritical big spenders and risk a presidential veto. We understand the political temptation to do mischief by doing nothing, but this is a gross abdication of lawmakers' fundamental responsibilities."

Gates' CIA Record On Intelligence Raises Concerns. On its front page, the Washington Post (12/4, Smith, 690K) looks back at Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates' tenure as CIA director. During his 1991 confirmation hearings, "Gates -- a brilliant, smooth-operating Soviet specialist -- lost some of his luster. CIA colleagues came forward to testify that he had kowtowed to the wishes of his superiors and had manipulated intelligence to suit White House policy. Questions also arose about his involvement in the Reagan-era Iran-contra scandal." He "eventually won confirmation and held the CIA director's job for 14 months; even his critics describe it as a reasonably successful, modernizing tenure." But "the concerns expressed about Gates then have echoes in the contemporary debate over the alleged tailoring of intelligence analysis to serve political ends, an issue at the heart of criticism of the war in Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Spiegel, Barnes, 850K) says Gates "appears to some an odd choice" to replace Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, "given the Pentagon's rocky and occasionally divisive atmosphere under Rumsfeld. For much of Gates' career, critics and even some admirers have likened him to the imperious Rumsfeld and his close administration ally, Vice President Dick Cheney. 'Gates was making it clear to analysts what intelligence they were to produce,' said Thomas Blanton, director of the National Security Archive, a nonprofit institute that gathers and analyzes declassified documents. 'It's a chilling record, because you have two main themes of the Iraq war present in Robert Gates' career at CIA: the arrogance and bullying of a Rumsfeld and the intelligence cherry-picking of a Cheney.'"

Questions For Gates Proposed. The New York Times (12/4, A25, 1.16M) offers questions for Gates from ex-Defense Secretary William Cohen, Harvard's Samantha Power, ex-Army Lt. Gen. Donald Kerrick, ex-Defense Secretary Melvin Laird, the American Enterprise Institute's Danielle Pletka, and the Naval Postgraduate School's Kalev Sepp. Among the topics: procurement financing, NATO commitment to Iraq and Afghanistan, DOD intelligence spending, human rights, Darfur, relations with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, relations with Congress, the military personnel budget, and DOD's role in the war on terror.

Gates Urged To Avoid "Psychological Entrapment" On Iraq. The Washington Post (12/4, A2, Vedantam, 690K) writes about the notion of "psychological entrapment," the idea that "when you invest yourself in something, it is exceedingly difficult to discard your investment. What is devilish about entrapment is not just that it can result in ever greater losses, but that those losses get you ever more entrapped, because now you have even more invested. … What does this have to do with the Gates confirmation?" The US experience in Iraq is seen by one expert "as a perfect example of psychological entrapment -- on a national scale."

Gates Said To Face Serious Time Constraints In Effort To Bring Change To DOD, Iraq. Under the headline "Next Defense Secretary Must Hit Ground Running," USA Today (12/4, 7A, Brook, Kelley, 2.27M) says Gates "will have to act fast -- within months, analysts and retired officers say -- to effect change at the Pentagon and in Iraq." Hearings on the Gates nomination begin tomorrow, and he is expected to be confirmed. Sen. Jack Reed said, "He has to be able to go in immediately and make changes. … He has to thoroughly re-examine the policy and strategy in Iraq. That's the most pressing and immediate priority." Cohen also said Gates "has to work closely and quickly with Congress to be successful."

Democrats Who Opposed Iraq War Resolution Moving Into Powerful Posts. The Washington Post (12/4, A4, Pincus, 690K) writes, "Although given little public credit at the time, or since, many of the 126 House Democrats who spoke out and voted against the October 2002 resolution that gave President Bush authority to wage war against Iraq have turned out to be correct in their warnings about the problems a war would create." And now, "many of those lawmakers will move into positions of power. They include not only members of the new House leadership but also the incoming chairmen of the Appropriations, Armed Services, Budget and Judiciary committees and the Select Committee on Intelligence."

Putnam Expected To Play Outsize Role Within GOP House Leadership. U.S. News and World Report (12/11, Brush, 2.03M) reports Rep. Adam Putnam "is one Republican for whom 'stay the course' has proved a winning strategy. Yes, he's still a youngster. He's not a household name, and he doesn't grab all the headlines, even back home in Florida. But having just won a fourth term by garnering 69 percent of the vote, Putnam is racing up the Capitol Hill pecking order. Republicans bumped him up again last month to chair of the House Republican Conference, the No. 3 GOP position in the House, in effect the communications maestro behind Minority-Leader-to-be John Boehner and Minority Whip Roy Blunt. Putnam was tapped to boost a beleaguered party. How well he does with that assignment may help determine the GOP's future. And it may have a major bearing on Adam Putnam's political future as well."

Thompson Expected To Prove Troublesome For DHS. U.S. News and World Report's Washington Whispers column (12/11, Bedard) reports, "Here's one thing the Department of Homeland Security can expect when Democrats take control of the Congress this January: Questions, and lots of 'em, from Rep. Bennie Thompson, the Mississippi Democrat taking the reins of the House Homeland Security Committee. At one point this year, Thompson had 100 requests for info pending at DHS. … Why so many letters? 'If the department was proactive in communicating with us,' he sniffs, 'we probably wouldn't need to write so many.'"

Heritage Foundation Seeks Meeting With Congressional Democrats. The Washington Times (12/4, Lambro, 88K) reports the Heritage Foundation, "seeing new opportunities to advance its conservative agenda in next year's Democratic Congress, wants to talk with Democratic leaders about where they might find common ground." The prospect of "the conservative think tank, whose ideas fueled President Reagan's policies in the 1980s, sitting down with some of the Democrats' most liberal leaders to discuss taxes, spending and health care might sound far-fetched in the immediate aftermath of a bitter midterm election. But a senior Heritage official says, 'We are actively soliciting a chance to sit down and discuss our ideas with them,' and Democrats say they are more than willing to get together." Letters "seeking a meeting for a frank exchange of ideas quietly began going out this week to a number of House and Senate Democratic leaders, including incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer and prospective Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel." The Times adds Heritage is "not alone in thinking that some longtime adversaries of Democrats can have an effect on legislation in Congress next year. Advocacy groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Federation of Independent Business (NFIB), say that potential alliances between some of the Democrats' newly enlarged centrist blocs, including the 'Blue Dogs' and the so-called 'New Democrats,' could open up opportunities for them to move some legislation in their direction."

Rangel Defends His Draft Proposal. In an interview with Time (12/11, Bacon, 4.03M) Rep. Charles Rangel is quoted as saying, "If we had had a draft, those who decided to have an elective -- rather than defensive -- strike against Iraq would not have received public or congressional support. When you're talking about war and you have no concept of anyone being lost in your family or your community, then it's human nature to be more prone to say, 'Let's fight, I'll hold your coat.' I'm serious about it. As of now, I would be satisfied to have a discussion."

FDA White Oak Project Touted As Government Success Story. The Washington Post's "Federal Diary" column (12/4, D1, Barr) reports, "The headquarters consolidation of the Food and Drug Administration, on 130 acres in suburban Maryland, appears on track to become one of the government's most successful construction and development projects." When the "project is completed, probably in 2011, about 7,700 FDA employees and contract workers will be located at White Oak, off New Hampshire Avenue in Silver Spring. Congress estimates the General Services Administration, which owns the property and is managing the construction, will spend about $900 million on buildings and site improvement." The Post adds, "The decision to recruit the FDA to White Oak set off a decade-long struggle to obtain funding for planning, design and construction." Funding "came in fits and starts, as is often the case when Congress has competing budget priorities. For example, the fiscal 2007 appropriation for White Oak -- $178.5 million -- is on hold until Congress determines how to revive spending bills that have stalled in the lame-duck session. Still, the project has gained momentum through the years."

White House, State Department Host Kennedy Center Honor Recipients. On the front page of its Style section, the Washington Post (12/4, C1, Johnson, 690K) reports on the State Department dinner held "on the eve of last night's Kennedy Center Honors gala." The Post notes that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, wearing an "emerald gown" and a "big smile," welcomed the honorees at the gala "where the arts world's biggest stars and Washington's brightest bulbs celebrate together." The New York Times (12/4, A22, Chmela, 1.16M) calls the Kennedy Center Honors the "paramount event on the Washington cultural calendar, with events at the State Department and the White House" and notes that President and Mrs. Bush attended the Kennedy Center program on Sunday evening after a reception at the White House. USA Today (12/14, 2.27M) also reports the story.

Krugman Praises Webb For Snubbing Bush. In his New York Times column (12/4), Paul Krugman notes Sen.-elect James Webb's recent snub of President Bush, who had asked about his son, a Marine lance corporal, adding, "Good for him. We need people in Washington who are willing to stand up to the bully in chief. Unfortunately, and somewhat mysteriously, they're still in short supply. You can understand, if not condone, the way the political and media establishment let itself be browbeaten by Mr. Bush in his post-9/11 political prime. What's amazing is the extent to which insiders still cringe before a lame duck with a 60 percent disapproval rating." Krugman cites the example of the Iraq Study Group, which "watered down its conclusions and recommendations, trying to come up with something Mr. Bush wouldn't reject out of hand."

Bush Said To Be Mostly Uninterested In His Legacy. U.S. News and World Report's Washington Whispers column (12/11, Bedard) reports, "Now here's a real shocker. The Bushies aren't eager to start talking legacy about their prez yet . 'Really,' says one, 'he's not obsessed with his legacy.' Aides describe President Bush as the polar opposite of former President Bill Clinton, who was reportedly focused on his legacy the minute he was re-elected in 1996. We know how that went. Bush's doesn't look pretty either, but insiders say he's taking the long view and for proof note how his recent reading list included three George Washington bios."

Employment, Manufacturing Sectors Both Show Weakness. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, Gerena-Morales, 2.04M) reports the "job market seems to be humming as the unemployment rate hovers at a five-year low. Indeed, Federal Reserve officials have cited it as a sign of vigor that could stoke inflation." The "unemployment rate fell to 4.4% in October. However, other signals indicate the employment picture could darken. Initial claims for jobless benefits recently jumped to their highest level in more than a year. Payroll growth has eased this year to a monthly average of 147,000 net new jobs, from last year's 165,000. Just 92,000 jobs were created in October." Data "released Friday by the Institute for Supply Management show that the decline in manufacturing employment extends beyond the two suffering housing and auto sectors. Its employment index slipped to 49.2 in November from 50.8 in October. Readings below 50 indicate a contraction." Economists "say the health of the economy and job market through next year hinges mainly on how quickly the auto and housing sectors can pare the excess inventories that are forcing them to cut production, and the effect of the housing market's slump on other sectors. They will scrutinize the November jobs report, due out Friday, for insight."

The Washington Times (12/2, Hill, 88K) reports, "Economic weakness spread beyond the stricken housing and auto sectors last month, with reports showing U.S. manufacturing shrank for the first time in 31/2 years and construction dropped the most since the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." US industries "broadly cut back production, adding to factory shutdowns caused by deepening recessions in auto- and housing-related industries such as wood, furniture and appliances, according to a report yesterday from the Institute for Supply Management." The "unexpected decline in construction of offices and other business facilities in October added to a record string of drops in housing construction of more than 1 percent in the last seven months to cause the biggest drop in construction spending in six years, the Commerce Department said yesterday." David Wyss, "economist at Standard & Poor's Corp., noted that the downbeat tone of recent economic news contrasts sharply with upbeat assessments this week coming from Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke and other Fed officials. Mr. Wyss said there is cause for worry."

Minimum Wage Hike Unlikely To Boost Wages For Many In Metro Washington. The Washington Post (12/4, D1, Rosenwald, 690K) reports "increasing the federal minimum wage might be irrelevant for many" of the Washington, DC area's "workers and employers, given the extent to which market forces -- high demand for labor, low unemployment and the lofty cost of living -- have already raised the floor for hourly salaries. According to federal data, the median hourly pay for all workers in the Washington-Arlington-Alexandria area is $19.14 -- about 72 percent higher than Lubbock, Tex., where it is $11.13." So are "'most other big job centers around the country, with only about 520,000 people nationwide making the federal minimum of $5.15 an hour, a rate that hasn't gone up in a decade and has led some 28 states and the District to pass their own increases."

New Discovery Rules Call For Stricter Retention Requirements For E-Documents. The AP (12/4) reports, "U.S. companies will need to know more about where they store e-mails, instant messages and other electronic documents generated by their employees in the event they are sued because of changes in federal rules that took effect Friday, legal experts say." The AP continues, "The changes, approved by the Supreme Court's administrative arm in April after a five-year review, require companies and other parties involved in federal litigation to produce 'electronically stored information' as part of discovery, the process by which both sides share evidence before a trial. … Federal and state courts have increasingly been requiring the production of such evidence in individual cases. The new rules clarify that the data will be required in federal cases." The AP adds, "Under the new rules, an information technology employee who routinely copies over a backup computer tape could be committing 'virtual shredding' once a lawsuit has been filed, said Alvin F. Lindsay, a partner in the Miami office of Hogan & Hartson whose legal expertise is in technology and litigation. … Companies still could routinely purge their archives if the data aren't relevant to cases the companies have pending or expect to face, though specific sectors such as financial services remain governed by other data-retention rules. …

The new rules make it more important for firms to know what electronic information they have and where, especially because of a provision that requires lawyers to provide information much earlier than before on where clients' data are stored and how accessible they are. … Besides e-mail, companies will need to know about things more difficult to track, such as digital photos of work sites on employee cellphones and information on removable memory cards, said James Wright, director of electronic discovery at Halliburton Co."

Jeb Bush Expected To Play Major Role In GOP Politics. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A1, Cooper, 2.04M) reports in a front page story that the Republicans "pondering a political shift to the middle after their losses in midterm elections might consider the example of Florida Gov. Jeb Bush before setting their course." Gov. Bush, "who is stepping down this month because of term limits after eight years in office, has a track record as one of the nation's most socially and economically conservative politicians, yet he enjoys a nearly 65% approval rating in a state where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans. His brand of conservatism -- a mix of conservative political stands and activist governance -- has paid off for him in a way it hasn't for his brother in the White House." And Jeb Bush's "public support in a key swing state, his recent launch of a political advocacy group and the departure of two of his high-level aides to join the possible presidential campaign of another conservative governor suggest Mr. Bush will exert substantial influence over his party in the 2008 election and beyond." At "the least, he looks likely to be a significant power broker, despite the heavy toll the Iraq war has taken on his older brother's public-approval rating. The younger Bush has said he has no plans to seek the presidency in 2008. But he hasn't been as assertive in batting down persistent speculation among his closest backers that he might consider the No. 2 spot on a presidential ticket." While the Governor has "been vague about his own plans, there are few secrets about where his sympathies lie for 2008. Two of his chief political operatives have allied themselves with Republican Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who is considering a presidential bid."

GOP Governors Ponder Party's Future After Midterm Losses. The Washington Times (12/4, Hallow, 88K) reports some Republican governors, meeting in Miami, "wonder whether their party can realistically hope to regain majorities in Congress, the governors mansions and state legislatures, given that the unpopular Bush administration's lease on the management of government has two more years to run." Republican governors, "whose numbers went from a high of 32 in 1998 to 28 last year, generally agree that the reasons they are down to 22 after last month's elections are the Iraq war and the general tarnishing of their party's brand image." Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi said, "The war in Iraq hurt even at the gubernatorial level, even at the state level." Barbour said "he and other members of the Republican Governors Association were told in a closed meeting that polling showed that 20 percent of people who voted in the governors' races said Iraq was a major issue in their vote." Some Republican strategists "attending the conference said privately that they suspect it is, as one of them put it, 'silly' to think about taking back the House and Senate and winning a majority of governorships with the Bush administration still in power."

Possible Social Conservative-Libertarian Split Seen Within GOP. In his Washington Post column (12/4, A19), Sebastian Mallaby says that through a variety of transformations, the Republican Party "has sustained its big-tent coalition. The question in the wake of its election thumpin' is whether the tent will split. You can see this possibility in "Liberaltarians," an essay in the New Republic by Brink Lindsey, the director of research at the libertarian Cato Institute. Lindsey is not merely joining the large crowd of disenchanted conservatives who believe that the Republican Party has betrayed its principles -- spraying money at farmers, building bridges to nowhere and presiding over the fastest ramp-up in federal spending since Lyndon Johnson. Rather, Lindsey is taking a step further, arguing that libertarians should ditch the Republican Party in favor of the Democrats." Having "ticked off the first things on their to-do list, Christian conservatives now press for affirmative state action on behalf of traditional values: amendments to the constitution to bar gay marriage, government efforts to teach abstinence, federal payments to faith-based groups. All these policies appall libertarians."

Presidential Candidates Face Tough Congressional Season. The AP (12/4, Kuhnhenn) reports a number of likely presidential candidates in Congress "next year face votes on appropriations, budgets and trade — all of which present potential pitfalls in a presidential campaign." Congress also "could consider immigration and Social Security legislation, two issues that attract widespread public interest as well as alarm. Hanging over all that will be Iraq." So far, "six Democratic and three Republican senators are weighing whether to run for president in 2008. Two House Republicans also are in the mix. The race is off to an early start, with potential candidates setting up their campaign and fundraising operations and seeking early media exposure." For the Democrats "in particular, that amounts to serious multitasking." At least three — "Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and John Kerry of Massachusetts — will be committee chairmen in the Senate. Two other senators — Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Evan Bayh of Indiana — are in line to head two subcommittees, where much legislation originates." Former South Carolina Democratic Party Chairman Dick Harpootlian said, "It's going to be interesting to see if those folks who are in the Senate and who now have the responsibility to chair committees, to sort of run the show, whether their attention will be captured by the Senate or whether they will make time to come campaign." The AP adds the GOP and Democratic senators "will face difficult choices on the Senate floor. Democrats have pledged to budget frugally, spending or cutting taxes only if the money can be made up elsewhere." That is "a tall order given their desire to increase spending on education and fix the alternative minimum tax, intended to ensure the wealthy do not avoid taxes through loopholes."

Obama Roils Democratic Field As Clinton, Bayh Step Up '08 Efforts. The New York Times (12/4, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Democratic Sen. Barack Obama's "announcement that he might run for president is altering the early dynamics of the 2008 Democratic nominating contest. The move has created complications for Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton as she steps up her own preparations and is posing a threat to lesser-known Democrats trying to position themselves as alternatives to Mrs. Clinton, Democrats said Sunday." Obama is preparing "for a day of campaignlike events in New Hampshire next Sunday," and at the "least, Mr. Obama's very high-profile explorations have contributed to a quickening of the pace across the 2008 Democratic field." Sen. Evan Bayh "said that he would create a presidential exploratory committee this week," and Gov. Tom Vilsack "went so far as to announce his candidacy two years before Election Day, in what his aides said was a calculated strategy to grab a moment of attention before Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton blot out the sun." Sen. Clinton has "been meeting in recent days with New York Democrats — including a two-hour brunch on Sunday at the Manhattan apartment of Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer — to telegraph her own likely entry into the race, though her aides said the get-together had been planned before Mr. Obama discussed his possible run publicly." But "more than simply picking up the pace, Democrats increasingly believe that Mr. Obama has the potential of upending the dynamics of the 2008 contest more than any other Democrat who might run — short, perhaps, of Al Gore, the former vice president, whom some Democrats are pressing to run."

ABC World News (12/3, story 6, 0:25, Kerley, 8.78M) reported, "There are strong, new signals that Senator Hillary Clinton is getting set to make a White House run. One of her top advisers says Clinton has personally asked other New York Democrats for their support and is interviewing possible campaign staffers."

NBC Nightly News (12/3, story 9, , Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "There's word tonight that Hilary Clinton maybe preparing to make a bid for the White House. The 'New York Times' reports that Senator Clinton is signaling to key New York politicians that she's likely to win for the presidency in 2008. Senator Clinton has personally asked some top state Democrats for their support."

USA Today (12/4, 2A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Sen. Clinton is "ramping up preparations for a 2008 presidential run, talking to political colleagues in New York and interviewing potential staff. A final decision is expected early next year." Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said "said Clinton and Sen. Charles Schumer, New York's other senator, are scheduled to have 'extensive' discussions this week in the capital."

The Washington Times/AP (12/4, Fouhy) reports Sen. Clinton "met on Sunday with New York's Democratic governor-elect," Eliot Spitzer, "to solicit his support for her likely White House bid, the latest indication she is stepping up plans to join a growing field of potential contenders for 2008." Top Clinton aide Howard Wolfson "said he did not know when the former first lady would decide about pursuing the presidency or set up an exploratory committee," but her aides "have begun interviewing possible campaign staffers in recent weeks." Last week, Clinton "contacted leading state lawmakers, including Democratic Reps. Charles Rangel and Nita Lowey, and the state party chairman, Denny Farrell, to assess her prospects and seek their support." Meanwhile, the AP adds, Sen. Obama, "a rising star in Democratic politics, enjoys a wave of publicity and momentum around a possible White House bid."

The Washington Post (12/4, A3, Cillizza, 690K) reports Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh "announced yesterday that he is forming a presidential exploratory committee, a move that allows him to raise money and travel the country in support of a potential national candidacy in 2008." In an appearance on ABC's "This Week," Bayh said "the American people 'need someone who can deal with the dysfunction here in this city so that our government begins to empower our people to fulfill their potential,' adding: 'If I can be that individual, so be it.' He said he expects to make a final decision on whether to run by early 2007." The Post adds Bayh's "announcement caps a busy week in Democratic presidential politics as Gov. Tom Vilsack (Iowa) formally announced his bid, former senator Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.) dropped out of the race, and Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) began to test the 2008 waters." Bayh was "slated to spend today campaigning in Iowa, and then head to New Hampshire later in the week to do the same. He has already begun looking for office space in both states as well as interviewing potential staff members in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada." Bayh's "electoral success in a state regularly won by Republicans in presidential contests -- Lyndon Johnson was the last Democratic nominee to carry Indiana -- is at the core of his campaign-in-waiting."

ABC World News (12/3, story 6, 0:25, Kerley, 8.78M) reported, "The Democratic jockeying is heating up as Indiana Senator Evan Bayh told ABC's 'This Week,' he is setting up a committee to explore a presidential run."

The AP (12/4, Fouhy) reports Sen. Bayh "announced Sunday he was establishing an exploratory committee to raise money for a possible presidential run. He expects to decide over the Christmas holidays whether to seek his party's nomination."

McCain's Support For More Troops In Iraq Said To Complicate His 2008 Bid. Newsweek (12/11, Bailey, 3.12M) reports Sen. John McCain "has pushed for more, not fewer, troops in the Iraq conflict, claiming 'without additional ground forces we will not win this war.' It's a striking stance for a man considered to be the front runner for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008, considering the American public's growing impatience for the end of the war. Even in conservative New Hampshire, 38 percent of voters now support bringing troops 'home ASAP,' according to the most recent Granite State poll. South Carolina, where a tough defeat ended McCain's 2000 campaign, will play an even more influential role in 2008 thanks to early placement in the primary calendar. There, too, Republican voters are growing unhappy with the war." However, "some members of McCain's inner circle are convinced the position could actually work to his advantage — reminding independents of the maverick they fell in love with in 2000."

Dean Reportedly Popular Among Liberals Internationally. U.S. News and World Report's Washington Whispers column (12/11, Bedard) reports, "His loudmouthed inside-the-beltway boors are still booing Democratic boss Howard Dean, despite the party's strong election showing, but they're eating him up like sweet Vermont maple syrup in Canada and overseas. Party bigs say the former Vermont guv is headed to Europe to cheer on liberal parties in England, Spain, and Portugal. His keynote address this month to Canada's beleaguered Liberal Party, fans say, was just a warm-up. Dean's message: Show folks like England's Laborites how to remake their top-down outfits into grassroots organizations just as he did at the Democratic National Committee."

TV Networks Pressuring Democrats Not To Choose Denver For 2008. U.S. News and World Report's Washington Whispers column (12/11, Bedard) reports, "Here's another reason the Big Apple is looking as if it will beat Denver to host the 2008 Democratic National Convention. TV networks – yes, they still run the show – are whining about how hard it will be to drag crews and gear to the Mile High City after wrapping up coverage of the Summer Olympics in Beijing and then pivot to the GOP convention in Minneapolis. Their preference is NYC, their backyard."

New York City Superintendent Finds Success While Rejecting Much Of Reform Agenda. The New York Times (12/4, A1, Herszenhorn, 1.16M) reports Region Five Superintendent, Kathleen M. Cashin has "produced one of the school system's most unlikely success stories" with "the best total gains on annual reading and math tests." But, that success "raises questions about" the reform efforts of New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Schools Chief Joel Klein, because Cashin "is a lifelong city educator" who "runs her schools in Region 5, with more than 85,000 students, the same way she ran her schools under the old Board of Education and under previous mayors." Cashin also "prefers principals who come up through the system over graduates of the chancellor's Leadership Academy" and "has made the union a partner, hiring it to train teachers instead of using outside vendors."

Gates Foundation May Play Role In DC Schools. The Washington Post (12/4, A1, Salmon, 690K) reports on the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation's efforts to improve high schools, noting that it "has awarded $1.5 billion in grants to improve secondary education, including $285 million last year." The foundation "is considering a larger effort" in the Washington, D.C. schools because Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty (D) "has asked for its guidance in a possible bid to take over the public schools." The article describes the experience of Irasema Salcido whose Cesar Chavez Public Charter Schools received a grant from the Gates Foundation. The Foundation helped the school develop a plan for "strengthening the curriculum, training teachers, drawing up more detailed budgets and taking steps to reduce student attrition" and the foundation's representative "stays in constant contact by phone and in person, taking on an oversight role typical for a central office in a large school system."

Canadian TV Runs "Brokeback" Parody Of Bush, Harper. The AP (12/4, Duff-Brown) reports a "'Brokeback Mountain' parody airing on Canadian television depicts an unusual type of summit between President Bush and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper." In the sketch "based on the acclaimed film about a love affair between two cowboys, Harper and Bush are portrayed naked from the waist up in a tent. Images of their faces are pasted over actors' bodies." At one point, "Bush throws cherries at Harper's nipples, which are covered with whipped cream. After the cherries land, separatist politician Andre Boisclair, who cooperated with filming of the spot, is seen opening the tent flap and stiffly saying that Quebec won't get involved 'in something like that.'"

Couric's CBS News In Transition. The Washington Post (12/4, C1, Kurtz, 690K) reports CBS anchor Katie Couric managed to get an unscheduled interview with Iraqi Prime Minister Nour al Malaki in Amman, Jordan, "much to the dismay of the ABC producers who thought they had an exclusive. Couric, who also wound up interviewing Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, had hesitated to fly to Jordan for President Bush's meeting with Maliki." Couric said, "We just weren't sure if it'd be worth our while in terms of securing interviews. Then we decided the only way we'd know is if we came and tried." The Post adds the "critics -- and Couric has more than her share -- may not have noticed, but the nightly newscast that she launched three months ago is in transition. Some of the changes she made have been dropped or curtailed to squeeze in more old-fashioned, what-happened-today stories. And Couric is finally starting to make news for covering the news." Still, the "pace and feel of Couric's program can differ markedly from those of Gibson and NBC's Brian Williams, who, like Couric, anchored from Amman on Wednesday and Thursday. As the former 'Today' star has tried to transfer her morning magic to the more traditional confines of the nightly news, some of her moves have been controversial, even within CBS." With the show "ensconced in third place, some pundits have been quick to pronounce the $15-million-a-year anchor a flop. But the mood at CBS improved when Couric garnered good reviews for her fast-paced election night coverage."

Pyongyang Reportedly Offers Uranium To Russia In Exchange For Support. The AP (12/3) reports North Korea "offered Russia exclusive rights to its natural uranium deposits in exchange for support at the stalled talks on Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions," a Japanese newspaper reported Sunday. The two countries have "been in talks since 2002 on a deal for Russia to import uranium, which it wants to enrich and sell as nuclear fuel to China and Vietnam," according to a report in the regional daily, Tokyo Shimbun, citing unnamed Russian officials. However, recently Pyongyang "offered Russia exclusive rights to the uranium in exchange for open support at the six-party talks." Negotiations between Russia and North Korea on the matter were "set to continue," the report added.

Direct US, North Korea Talks Seen As Source Of Hope. Under the headline "Direct US, North Korea Talks Give New Glimmer Of Hope," AFP (12/4, Parameswaran) reports, "One month after North Korea agreed to return to multilateral nuclear talks following its defiant atomic weapons test, the six-nation dialogue remains stalled. But few are complaining. This is because the United States and North Korea…are engaged in face-to-face talks on crunch issues that some believe are more productive that the six-party process including China, South Korea, Russia and Japan."

Parties Accuse Each Other Of Violating Terms Of Gaza Ceasefire. The Washington Post (12/4, A15, Wilson, 690K) reports that "extending a tenuous cease-fire between Israel and Palestinian armed groups in the Gaza Strip to the far larger West Bank proved elusive Sunday as Israel's security cabinet decided against doing so and the governing Hamas movement withdrew from negotiations on the matter." However, the Israeli government "reaffirmed its commitment to the temporary truce in Gaza despite the continuing rocket fire."

The New York Times/AP (12/4) says "Israelis and Palestinians threatened Sunday to scrap" the truce. Speaking to the Israeli cabinet, Defense Minister Amir Peretz "said militants in Gaza had continued to fire rockets, including one on Sunday." Abu Hamza, "a spokesman for the militant group Islamic Jihad, charged that Israel was violating the cease-fire by continuing operations in the West Bank."

Israeli Military Overhauls Training Following Lebanon War. USA Today (12/4, 15A, For, 2.27M) reports, "Israel's military is overhauling its training and expanding a guerrilla warfare school in response to problems the army had in fighting Hezbollah militants in Lebanon this summer. 'If there is one lesson from the war (in Lebanon), it is that we need to train more and be better prepared,' said Maj. Gen. Benny Gantz, head of the Israel Defense Force's Ground Forces Command." Israel's military "encountered a tougher-than-expected fight in Lebanon, where Hezbollah militants fought from a series of underground bunkers dug into the rocky and brushy hills of southern Lebanon." Israel's military overhaul includes, "Expanding the Elyakim base, where soldiers train on terrain resembling the hilly and rocky surfaces of southern Lebanon. Training includes using paint ball guns to simulate close combat. Increasing overall training of Israeli forces by 40%, Gantz said. Creating a 'Red Unit,' which will study Hezbollah and Palestinian militia tactics and act as "enemy forces" during training exercises. Gantz said the Israeli military got the idea from the U.S. military. Opening an urban warfare center in southern Israel, meant to replicate downtown Nablus in the West Bank and Gaza City in Gaza. The center will be used to train units that conduct raids in the Palestinian territories and operate mostly in towns and cities."

Beirut Protests Turn Violent. The Washington Times/AP(12/4, Karam) reports that "violent clashes broke out Sunday between Shiite and Sunni Muslims in the capital, leaving one man dead from gunshot wounds and 21 others injured at a time when tensions throughout Lebanon threaten the country's fragile sectarian and political balance." Meanwhile, the Financial Times (12/4, Biedermann) reports that both sides Sunday "vowed not to budge" while prime minister Fouad Siniora "insisted that he would not resign." Separately, British foreign secretary Margaret Beckett and German foreign minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier met with Siniora "separately and expressed their support for him." Saudi King Abdullah Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak also "voiced strong support for the Lebanese government" over the weekend.

The Washington Post (12/4, A13, Shadid, 690K) reports that the death of one protestor raised "tension across Lebanon," while "Lebanese television stations and Hezbollah officials reported several clashes in Beirut and in the Bekaa Valley, and rumors swirled about the extent of the violence." At the same time, the Post says there "appears to be almost no attempt to reach a compromise" since protests began Friday.

NBC Nightly News (12/3, story 3, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "The US is watching this situation very closely. Not only is Lebanon an American ally, but it is also the only real American success story. A success for the Bush Administration's policy to spread pro-Western democracies in the Middle East. If this government were toppled, the US would lose a friend and Hezbollah and its main backer, Iran and Syria, would gain power."

Lebanon On Verge Of "Total Meltdown." Time's Tim McGirk (12/11) writes, "With Lebanon still trying to recover from last summer's 34-day war between Israel and the Shi'ite militant group Hizballah, the government has seen its authority undermined, renewed meddling from the country's neighbors and the growing assertiveness of Hizballah. … Lebanon wasn't supposed to turn out this way. In March of last year, President George W. Bush was hailing Lebanon as a shining beacon of his Administration's 'democracy agenda' for the Middle East. Close to 1 million Lebanese had flooded into Beirut to demand that Syria pull its troops out of Lebanon and end its 29-year domination of the country." According to McGirk, "There are worrying signs, in fact, that Lebanon may be closer to a total meltdown than at any time since the 1975-90 civil war."

US Seeks UN-Backed Regional Force In Somalia. The AP (12/4, Hassan) reports Somalia's government "has sent hundreds of troops backed by Ethiopian soldiers to recapture a strategic southern town seized by the country's powerful Islamic movement, military officials and witnesses said Sunday, as dozens of families began fleeing the area." Meanwhile, the US "circulated a draft UN resolution late Friday that would authorize the deployment of a regional military force to protect the fragile government." The troops would "likely come from a seven-nation East African group, but would not include Somalia's neighbors, like Ethiopia." Ambassador Bolton "said Friday he expects Security Council experts to discuss the draft on Monday."

Iranian Court Could Turn Over US Embassy To Plaintiff. The Christian Science Monitor (12/4, Theodoulou, 59K) reports the US is "in danger of losing its sprawling embassy in Tehran to an Iranian businessman who was abducted in a bungled sting operation by US customs agents 14 years ago." A Tehran court awarded Hossein Alikhani "more than half a billion dollars in damages in the first lawsuit by an Iranian against the US for supporting terrorism." Now, three years after that ruling, "a writ of enforcement is due to be served this week, from when the US will have 10 days to respond by paying or presenting a list of assets in Iran to be seized as compensation."

Paulson Reaches Out To US Business Before Trip To China. The Financial Times (12/4, Callan) reports, "Hank Paulson, US treasury secretary, will on Monday begin a series of policy talks with industry leaders to discuss the Bush administration's policy towards China ahead of a high-level delegation to Beijing next week." Paulson "will on Monday meet executives from manufacturing companies, including Procter & Gamble, before on Wednesday sitting down with financial services companies -- including Citigroup -- as well as those from other sectors." The Times adds, "A Treasury official said Mr Paulson was 'reaching out on his China agenda' before heading to Beijing for a 'strategic economic dialogue' that will include top-ranking cabinet officials and Ben Bernanke, Federal Reserve chairman."

The Washington Times (12/4, Hirsch, 88K) reports, "Business groups are upset about a Bush administration move to strengthen restrictions on exports to China. They said the controls will not keep the communist country from acquiring sensitive technologies and will cost too much to implement. … 'The administration has not demonstrated that this proposed change would provide any additional security benefit and has not articulated a clear purpose for it,' a group of 24 trade associations -- ranging from the General Aviation Manufacturers Association to the American Chamber of Commerce in Hong Kong -- said Thursday in a letter to the Commerce Department." The proposal "would cover specified software, machine tools, computers, marine equipment and other exports."

Beijing Cracks Down On Tibetan Dissidents. USA Today (12/4, 20A, MacLeod, 2.27M) reports, "Beijing is accelerating its 5½-decade campaign to bring Tibet to heel. It is spurring high-growth economic policies and crushing political dissent in a drive to integrate the separatist-minded region into the rest of China. Tibetan exiles say political repression is on the rise. In recent months, Chinese authorities have jailed several Tibetans, including monks, for possessing or distributing pro-independence leaflets, posters or photographs of the Dalai Lama, Tibet's exiled spiritual leader." Beijing's "political crackdown has coincided with major economic initiatives."

WSJournal Criticizes Rejection Of Zhao's Appeal. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (12/4, A16, 2.04M) reports, "Who said China's Communists don't have a sense of humor? On the same day that the country's politicized courts rejected two closely watched appeals, the mandarins in Beijing proclaimed that they will ease restrictions on the foreign press ahead of the 2008 Olympics. … Human rights advocates suggest it's no accident [New York Times researcher Zhao Yan]'s appeal landed on the same day Beijing eased restrictions on foreign journalists. That's because the new 'freedoms' do not apply to Chinese research assistants working with foreign correspondents. Mr. Zhao's fate appears designed not just to punish a squeaky wheel but to intimidate other research assistants, too." The Journal adds, "In the wake of the Zhao ruling, no one will be fooled about what Beijing really thinks of a free press."

US, South Korea To Resume Talks On Trade Agreement. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A10, Ramstad, 2.04M) reports, "Talks on a proposed US-South Korea free-trade agreement -- which is President Bush's biggest bilateral trading initiative and would be Seoul's largest such deal -- resume today with the toughest issues on the table. The progress the two countries make this week at a Montana ski resort will determine whether they can reach a deal in time for Mr. Bush to seek a simple yes-no vote on it from Congress." Bush's "trade-negotiating authority will expire in June and Congress will then take back the ability to change trade deals, a power that inhibits countries from negotiating with the US. … Earlier negotiating rounds progressed more slowly than expected and the two countries are just now tackling the thorniest issues, such as how to reduce tariffs on food and autos. The session this week in Big Sky, Mont. -- the fifth formal negotiating round -- was previously expected to be the last one."

Chávez Declares Victory. ABC World News (12/3, story 3, 0:45, Kerley, 8.78M) reported that "in Washington, the White House is watching as one of the outspoken enemies cruises to a reelected victory. Venezuela's leftist President, Hugo Chávez , who called the President the devil at the United Nations back in September, is in line for another six-year term, leading the country with the world's largest oil reserves outside of the Middle East." NBC Nightly News (12/3, story 10, , Siegenthaler, 9.87M) also noted Chavez "has called President Bush the devil." The AP (12/4, James) says Chávez won by "a wide margin Sunday." However, challenger Manuel Rosales "conceded defeat but vowed to remain in opposition."

Similarly, the New York Times (12/4, Romero, 1.16M) reports Chávez won "in a landslide" but "representatives of the opposition candidate contended that the results were tainted by irregularities." With 78 percent of the votes counted, Chávez was "ahead with 61 percent, compared with 38 percent for Manuel Rosales." The Times says the "tension between the campaigns of Mr. Chávez and Mr. Rosales reflected a polarized electorate in Venezuela, but by contrast the voting itself was largely tranquil, with few reports of clashes or other violence." However, the Financial Times (12/4, Webb-Vidal) notes that an exit poll released on Sunday evening by US pollster Evans/McDonough "suggested Mr. Chávez was leading with 58 percent compared with 40 percent for Mr. Rosales."

The Washington Post (12/4, A14, Forero, 690K) says the Chávez victory "further consolidates the tide of leftist politicians who have won office in Latin America in recent years," many of whom "criticize market reforms and sharply question the Bush administration's policies in the region." The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A3, De Córdoba, 2.04M) also notes that Chávez's reelection is "sparking fears among foes that he will accelerate his quest to install what he calls '21st-century socialism' in the world's fifth-largest oil exporter." Encouraged by his victory, Chávez, it writes, "will no doubt redouble efforts to create an anti-American and anti-free-trade bloc in the hemisphere, while lending diplomatic support to other anti-US countries such as Iran." The Christian Science Monitor (12/4, Blanford, 59K), Miami Herald (12/4, Gunson, Dudley, 286K), USA Today (12/4, 18A, Stinson, 2.27M), Washington Times (12/4, Hearn, 88K) and Los Angeles Times (12/14, Kraul, 850K), among other sources, also report the story.

France, Germany To Demand Tougher Conditions For Turkey's EU Bid. The Financial Times (12/4, Williamson, Hollinger, Proissl) reports, "Germany and France will on Tuesday demand tougher conditions for Turkey's troubled European Union membership bid, in a move likely to cause new divisions over Ankara at next week's EU summit." Jacques Chirac, French president, "will use a meeting with Angela Merkel, German chancellor, to back her proposal that would effectively set Turkey a new 18-month deadline to open its ports to Cyprus, an EU member, the Financial Times has learned." Merkel "said at last week's Nato summit in Riga that the Commission position needed to be 'strengthened'. A 'review clause' on whether Ankara had opened its ports 'would be desirable so that the council [EU summit] can review Turkey's progress, perhaps in 18 months' time', she said." The Times adds, "An official in Mr Chirac's office told the FT on Sunday: 'France and Germany are on the same page with regard to Turkey.'"

EU Hopes Agreements With Kazakhstan Will Reduce Energy Dependence On Russia. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A6, Champion, 2.04M) reports, "In the European Union's growing struggle to break Russia's grip on the bloc's gas imports, all roads are leading to Kazakhstan. Today, the EU signs a memorandum of understanding with Kazakhstan on energy aimed at binding Europe closer" to the country. And "[y]esterday, EU Energy Commissioner Andris Piebalgs signed an accord on nuclear cooperation, with a view toward increasing Kazakhstan's share of uranium sales in the EU to 20% from 3%." Last week, Pielbalgs "attended an EU-inspired meeting in Kazakhstan of regional energy ministers that produced a road map toward integrating their countries' energy grids and regulatory systems with the EU's." But "in all this flurry of documents and initiatives, the thing Mr. Piebalgs and many EU countries want most -- the construction of a gas pipeline across the Caspian Sea that would connect the gas-rich countries of Central Asia directly to Europe -- isn't mentioned."

Litvinenko Probe Widens To Moscow, US. The Financial Times (12/4, Burns, Buckley) reports, "The investigation into the death of the former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko is broadening into an international police probe into organised crime, alleged state-sponsored murder and the activities of individuals who have worked for the Russian secret service. A team from SO15, the UK counter-terrorism investigation squad, is expected to fly to Moscow on Monday or Tuesday to interview witnesses and gather information on potential suspects." The Russian state-run television channel Rossiya "said on Sunday night that the arrival of the nine British detectives was important as it would demonstrate Moscow's willingness to co-operate. It was also a guarantee of an 'objective investigation', against the highly 'politicised background' to the case in London."

The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Murphy, 850K) reports British authorities said "they are widening their investigation into the poisoning of…Litvinenko on the heels of a fresh series of leads into the Russian's murky political and business connections that spanned from Moscow to the US. 'Over the next few days, I think all of these things will widen out a little from the circle just being here in Britain,' Home Secretary John Reid told Britain's Sky News Sunday Live program." The Times adds, "Quoting unidentified law enforcement sources, British press reports said police investigators are in the US interviewing former KGB agent Yuri Shvets, who purportedly has information on a dossier Litvinenko had in his possession relating to the Kremlin's pursuit of figures connected to Yukos Oil Co." USA Today (12/4, 17A, For, 2.27M), the New York Times (12/4, Cowell, 1.16M) and Wall Street Journal (12/4, A4, Mollenkamp, Patrick, Meichtry, 2.04M) run similar reports.

The Washington Times/AP (12/4, Stringer) reports "a US-based friend of the former agent said he had told police the name of the person he thinks orchestrated the poisoning." Yuri Shvets "said he had known the poisoned ex-spy…since 2002 and spoke with him on Nov. 23, the day Mr. Litvinenko died from exposure to a rare radioactive element, polonium-210. 'The truth is, we have an act of international terrorism on our hands. I happen to believe I know who is behind the death of my friend Sasha and the reason for his murder,' Mr. Shvets said by telephone from the United States, referring to Mr. Litvinenko by his Russian nickname." ABC World News (12/3, story 5, 0:30, Kerley, 8.78M) noted the AP story last night.

NYTimes Urges West To Put Pressure On Putin. Under the headline "Revisiting Putin's Soul," the New York Times (12/4, 1.16M) editorializes, "The fatal poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko in London, along with all the other suspicious murders and attempted murders of Kremlin critics in recent months, poses fundamental questions about Russia, and how the West should treat it. … We would certainly prefer not to suspect that anyone connected to President Vladimir Putin is involved, even if the attacks have the hallmarks of professional assassinations. The West needs a good relationship with Russia and its cooperation in containing nuclear proliferation and fighting terrorism. No one wants to return to the time when Russia was seen as an enemy. Yet the recent events…cannot simply be dismissed as unrelated occurrences, as Mr. Putin would prefer." The Times concludes, "The West has no choice but to continue dealing with Russia, and with Mr. Putin. But when Kremlin critics are attacked or murdered, the West must demand a full, transparent investigation and punishment for the criminals -- no matter who they are. It is time to let Mr. Putin know that we are looking hard into his soul, and we don't like what we see."

Castro Absent From His Birthday Celebration. ABC World News (12/3, story 4, 0:15, Kerley, 8.78M) reported, "In Cuba, this weekend's celebration of Fidel Castro's 80th birthday has come and gone with no sign of the guest of honor. The ailing leader's conspicuous absence is being taken by many Cubans as a clear sign that Castro will never return to power. He hasn't been seen in public in more than four months."

Pinochet Suffers Heart Attack. NBC Nightly News (12/3, story 11, , Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Chile, former dictator Augusto Pinochet is fighting for his life after suffering a heart attack. Doctors are clearing an obstructed artery. Augusto Pinochet has been under house arrest charged with human rights abuses during his 17 year rule that ended in 1990." The New York Times (12/4, Bonnefoy, 1.16M) and Washington Post (12/4, A13, Franklin, 690K) also report the story.

Feinstein Calls For Ban On Use Of Cluster Bombs Near Civilian Areas. Sen. Dianne Feinstein writes in the Washington Times (12/4, 88K) that "the time has come to ban the use" of cluster bombs "in or near civilian areas. Cluster bombs are intended for attacking large-scale enemy troop formations. They come apart in the air before making contact, dispersing between 200 and 400 small bomblets that can saturate a radius of 250 yards. The changing nature of warfare, though, has meant cluster bombs have been used against enemies in or near highly populated areas. So, all too often, cluster bombs critically injure or kill innocent victims instead of their intended military targets. … The United States and the international community should work together to stop use of cluster bombs when the lives of civilians are at risk. We need to ensure we don't needlessly endanger innocent men, women, and children by dropping cluster bombs where they live, work, and play. This is the right and just thing to do."

UN Task Force Questioning Gene Splicing Criticized. Henry I. Miller, a fellow at Stanford's Hoover Institution, writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/4, A16, 2.04M), "The UN task force that wrapped up here on Friday deliberated on the regulation of foods obtained with recombinant DNA (or gene-splicing) technology. They ignored the rule of holes: When you're in a hole, stop digging. The more this ongoing project progresses, the worse for science and technology -- and consumers everywhere." Miller adds, "The scope of this exercise, held under the auspices of the Codex Alimentarius Commission, which sets food standards on behalf of the UN's Food and Agriculture Organization and World Health Organization, makes no sense. … It is one thing to regulate novel foods with traits that are of potential concern, but quite another to regulate merely because a certain technique has been used, especially when that technique is state-of-the-art. It is rather like circumscribing for extra regulation only cars outfitted with disk brakes, radial tires and air bags -- and then limiting only those vehicles to a lower speed. The members of this task force, including representatives of the US government, disregard the scientific consensus that gene-splicing is an extension, or refinement, of older, traditional techniques of genetic modification, and that it does not warrant discriminatory, excessive regulation." American regulators, writes Miller, "have become surrogates of big agribusiness companies at the expense of academic research and the well-being of other sectors of the US economy."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Padilla Lawyers Say Mistreatment Makes Client Unfit To Stand Trial. The New York Times (12/4, Sontag, 1.16M) reports on the videotape of a trip to the dentist by terror detainee José Padilla, which was recently released to his lawyers "and viewed by The New York Times." To Padilla's lawyers, the video and other pictures they have released "capture the dehumanization of their client during his military detention from mid-2002 until earlier this year, when the government changed his status from enemy combatant to criminal defendant and transferred him to the federal detention center in Miami. He now awaits trial scheduled for late January." The images "represent the latest and most aggressive sally by defense lawyers who declared this fall that charges against Mr. Padilla should be dismissed for 'outrageous government conduct,' saying that he was mistreated and tortured during his years as an enemy combatant." Lawyers for Padilla "suggest that he is unfit to stand trial. They argue that he has been so damaged by his interrogations and prolonged isolation that he suffers post-traumatic stress disorder and is unable to assist in his own defense. His interrogations, they say, included hooding, stress positions, assaults, threats of imminent execution and the administration of 'truth serums.'" A Pentagon spokesman, Lt. Col. Todd Vician, "said Sunday that the military disputes Mr. Padilla's accusations of mistreatment."

Newsweek (12/11, Isikoff, 3.12M) reports, "Lawyers for 'enemy combatant' Jose Padilla claim he is so disoriented from three years of isolation and aggressive interrogations that he is now mentally ill. In new court filings, Padilla's lawyers also assert for the first time that Padilla's interrogations were taped, thereby providing a potentially extensive video record of how the government treated a man once considered a dangerous Qaeda operative. … Padilla's lawyers recently moved to have the entire case dropped because of government conduct that allegedly included subjecting him to sleep deprivation, extreme cold, injecting noxious fumes into his cell and giving him mind-altering drugs."

Judge's Ruling Against Guantanamo Treatment Called "Sharp," "Blunt." The Washington Post (12/4, Leonnig, 690K) reports, "U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler issued a blunt indictment Friday of the Bush administration's legal handling of prisoners at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in Cuba. Frustrated with the plight of prisoners held without charges for years at the base, Kessler expressed disgust with the federal government's repeated efforts to block courts from hearing detainees' complaints." Her opinion "was particularly unusual" because it concerned "a technicality." The Post quotes her ruling, in which she refers to Guantanamo's "terrible conditions" and states, "It is often said that 'justice delayed is justice denied.' Nothing could be closer to the truth with reference to the Guantanamo Bay cases."

DOD Seeks "Emergency Authority" For Guantanamo Court. McClatchy (12/4) reports, "The Pentagon is invoking emergency authority to fast-track funding of a comprehensive war-crimes court compound at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, according to a letter to Congress obtained by The Miami Herald. ... Congressional staff members say the price tag and the funding mechanism have stirred protests among key members of Congress with fiscal and operational oversight of the Department of Defense." The Pentagon "wants to build, in three months, a mini-city on an abandoned airfield to stage the trials - two new courtrooms with space for two more, dining, housing and work space for up to 1,200 military and civilians working at the trials, and media, conference and classified information centers." The cost could be "as much as $125 million." More than 10 sites carried the story.

CIA Failed To Capture Muslim Cleric Living In Norway. The Washington Post (12/4, A1, Whitlock, 690K) reports, "Two months after he helped kidnap a Muslim cleric in Italy, records show, an undercover CIA officer boarded a flight to Norway on another secret mission. Two other US spies followed a few weeks later and checked into the same hotel. Shortly after the agents arrived in the spring of 2003, an Islamic militant living in Oslo known as Mullah Krekar received a warning from an anonymous Norwegian official, according to Krekar's lawyer. The message: Krekar, then head of a Kurdish insurgent group, was a CIA target and should watch his back." The spies "left Norway by the end of the summer, according to records of their travels compiled by European investigators. If the CIA was planning to abduct Krekar, like other Islamic radicals it had secretly apprehended in Europe after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, those plans were quietly abandoned. … Four days after the CIA officer arrived in Oslo, Krekar's attorney, Meling, said he received a warning about his client from a Norwegian government source, via an intermediary. Although the message was vague, it made clear that US spies had Krekar in their sights. In response, the lawyer wrote a letter to Norwegian police, requesting extra protection for Krekar." The case "shows how the United States has struggled to deal with Islamic militants who are allowed to live freely in Europe despite being labeled serious security risks. Others have included radical clerics in London and supporters of the Hamburg cell responsible for the Sept. 11 hijackings."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Administration Releases Details Of Visa Waiver Proposal. The Washington Times (12/4, Waterman, 88K) reports US officials are providing more details of the President's proposal to broaden the Visa Waiver Program, "sketching an ambitious plan for an electronic 'visa lite' system that would enable travelers to be cleared against terrorism and immigration watch lists" before reaching the US. Last Wednesday, DHS "laid down broad outlines" of the reform package the White House will be sending to Congress, including the new "visa lite" system called an "electronic travel authorization," which would be issued to passport holders before they traveled to the US, "as well as better information-sharing by new member nations."

Army Corps Said To Have Slowed Pace Of Levee Work In New Orleans. The New York Times (12/4, Schwartz, 1.16M) reports that as the Army Corps of Engineers has moved from patching broken levees and building floodgates in New Orleans to the "the task of strengthening flood protection…beyond its pre-Hurricane Katrina level," their "pace has slowed, those in the region say, with little trace of the round-the-clock frenzy of the first phase. … Contractors are waiting impatiently for the chance to bid on jobs." However, corps officials say that while "the early work was done in the spirit of addressing a crisis," the next phase "has to be planned with great care." The Times adds, "It is also becoming increasingly clear that the billions of dollars in appropriations will not cover the New Orleans area projects Congress has ordered the corps to take on."

Katrina Said To Have Lasting Impact On Victims' Mental Health. NBC Nightly News (12/3, story 12, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported on "the lasting impact of Hurricane Katrina" in New Orleans, where the storm's psychological effects "are gaining recognition as a serious medical problem. Here's Martin Savidge." NBC (Savidge) "Locals call it Katrina brain. Symptoms include difficulty concentrating, mood swings and depression. Experts say it's brought on by the endless battles of disrupted life. Federal estimates suggest a half million people along the Gulf Coast may still be struggling with mental health issues. Adding to the stress and anxiety, many who need psychiatric care or medication are having a hard time finding it. And when they do, an even harder time affording it." Rosalynn Carter, the founder of the Carter Center, which recently held a meeting of health experts, was shown saying, "Hopefully, the mental health community and government can all come together and make sure that in another disaster, things like this won't happen."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Expected To Seek "New Way Forward" On Iraq. Iraq once again dominated the broadcast news last night, leading on both ABC and NBC. (CBS was pre-empted by sports coverage.) ABC World News (12/3, lead story, 2:50, Harris, 8.78M) opened by saying this "could be a pivotal week for the US mission in Iraq." President Bush will today hold "an Oval Office meeting with a powerful Shiite leader with ties to a violent militia. Tuesday, Senate confirmation hearings begin for the President's nominee for Defense Secretary, Robert Gates. And on Wednesday, the Iraq Study Group releases its highly-anticipated report, looking for ways to salvage the US mission." Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (12/3, lead story, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) said that as the President "prepares to listen to a report this week from the Iraq Study Group, word from his National Security Advisor today that the President won't necessarily followed study group's recommendations. It comes as three more Americans were killed in Iraq this weekend."

The NBC report drew heavily on comments by NSA Stephen Hadley made on the Sunday morning political talk shows. On NBC's Meet the Press (12/3, Russert), Hadley said the President was concerned "the Baker-Hamilton commission was just going to be cover for an American withdrawal almost regardless of what was happening on the ground. And the President felt he needed to stop that right there. That isn't graceful withdrawal, that's cut and run. And of course, as the President's said, cut and run is not his cup of tea." On ABC's This Week (12/3, Stephanopoulos), Hadley said, "At some point, obviously we would like to begin bringing troops back home. The President has said that." On CBS' Face the Nation (12/03, Schieffer), Hadley said, "He's going to listen to the Baker-Hamilton report. He's going to listen to the reviews that are being done by his agencies. He's going to want to hear what Republicans and Democrats and the Congress think about. Then he's going to pull it together in terms of a way forward in Iraq that hopefully will command support from Republicans, Democrats, the executive branch and the Congress."

The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Meyer, 850K) reports the President "has been actively soliciting ideas and proposals about a course correction in Iraq from an array of senior aides, congressional and military leaders, Iraqi officials and others, and he plans to announce a 'new way forward' soon," according to Hadley and others. The New York Times (12/4, A15, Weisman, 1.16M) notes that Hadley said on NBC that "it's going to be weeks, not months," before Bush makes his own conclusions public. The AP (12/3, Loven) says Bush

"has walked a fine line between embracing the mission of a bipartisan, high-profile advisory panel on Iraq and maintaining enough distance not to be bound by all -- or even most -- of its upcoming recommendations." But as the AP (12/3, Ben Feller) reports in another piece, Hadley "said as he made the talk show rounds" that the US "will fail in Iraq if we pull out our troops before we're in a position to help the Iraqis succeed.'"

Under the headline "Amid Hints Bush Will Change Policy, Clues He Won't," the New York Times (12/4, A15, Sanger, 1.16M) asks, "The debate that will engulf Washington and much of the country this week centers on a question that lurks at the intersection of war strategy and the personality of the commander in chief: after three and a half years, is President Bush ready to abandon his declaration that American forces cannot begin to leave Iraq until the Iraqis demonstrate that they are capable of defending themselves?"

Sen. John Warner, on NBC's Meet the Press (12/3, Russert), said, "The Baker-Hamilton group…are doing their job. And our President is listening, learning, and he's open to take a change in course." But on the same program, Sen. Carl Levin said President Bush has been "absolutely stubborn in his view that we are there -- and this is his words just a few days ago – 'We are going to stay in Iraq as long as Iraqis ask us to be there.' Now, that seems to me to be more of the same, stay the course."

Bush Will Consider Ideas From Rumsfeld Memo. Much of the coverage of possible new directions for Iraq considers what Hadley called "a 'laundry list of ideas' from a Nov. 6 memo" from Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, "who announced his resignation two days later -- just after Republicans lost control of the House and Senate in the midterm elections," the Washington Post (12/4, A5, Babington, 690K) writes. The options "include the redeployment of substantial U.S. forces to areas near the Iranian and Syrian borders, withdrawing U.S. troops from especially vulnerable positions and starting modest drawdowns of American forces to encourage Iraqis, as Rumsfeld wrote, 'to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country.'" The Washington Times (12/4, Pfeiffer, 88K) highlights Hadley's CBS comment that "it was a useful and constructive memo, but it was not a proposal for a new course of action." Hadley added, "It was much more a list of things that needed to be considered." USA Today (12/4, 7A, Wolf, El Nasser, 2.27M) headlines its story "Bush Weighing Rumsfeld Ideas Among Options." The Financial Times (12/4, Guha, Luce, Sevastopulo) says Bush's "isolation over Iraq deepened" after the publication of the memo.

On NBC's Meet the Press (12/3, Russert), Hadley was asked if the Rumsfeld memo is evidence that the President was "saying one thing publicly to the voters, while you and Donald Rumsfeld were saying another thing privately inside the White House." Hadley answered, "The President has been talking about making changes, and has been making changes throughout."

Senators React To Rumsfeld Memo. Sen. Lindsey Graham was asked on Fox News Sunday (12/3, Wallace) if he is "concerned about…the disconnect, the difference between what the Administration has been saying in public and what it's apparently been thinking in private." Graham said, "Yes, very much so. … My suggestion is that the political leadership, led by the president, needs to tell the American public a failed state in Iraq is a dramatic loss in the war on terror."

Sen. Joseph Biden, on Fox News Sunday (12/3, Wallace), contended "there was a clear disconnect between what the administration's been saying the last year and what's been going on the ground. And the Rumsfeld memo makes it quite clear that one of the greatest concerns is the political fallout from changing course here in the United States politically and how to deal with that."

Sen. Jon Kyl, during his appearance on CNN's Late Edition (12/3, Blitzer), emphasized that the "key difference here between those who are trying to find a graceful exit and those who want to find a way to win is the president's view, and I think it's shared by Secretary Rumsfeld, that we need to figure out ways in which we can maximize our ability to support the Iraqis, get to a position where that country is safe and secure, that we can leave but do so under conditions in which we have defeated the terrorists and not enabled, or not left Iraq a failed state."

Sen. John Kerry, on CNN's Late Edition (12/3, Blitzer), said, "Everything in the Rumsfeld memo is a summary of things that I and others laid out three years ago."

US Withdrawal, Security Turnover To Iraqis Considered. ABC World News (12/3, story 8, 2:50, Harris, 8.78M) said the Iraq Study Group "is going to put out its recommendations for getting the US out of Iraq. We already know a lot about what's expected to be in this report. So, tonight, we're going to ask some hard questions about whether any of these ideas are likely to work. We start with the proposal to pull many US troops out of Iraq." While there is "little agreement over just how a phased withdrawal of US forces would work, there is a virtual consensus on one issue: fewer US troops will lead to more bloodshed." In another report, ABC World News (12/3, story 9, 2:25, Harris, 8.78M) said, "The theory behind pulling out US troops is that Iraqi forces can be trained to take over. But is that really possible in a country where many people are more loyal to their religious group than they are to their government?" ABC (Katursky) added, "Many of the people the Iraqis are supposed to protect do not trust them." And while trainer Maj. Peter Zike "says he believes in his mission," getting Iraqi troops" fully trained, he says, could take as long as 25 years."

US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, on CNN's Late Edition (12/3, Blitzer), said, "I think in order for Iraq to work…the Iraqi government's security institutions have to have the monopoly over use of force. And militias, death squads, other unauthorized groups with access to weapons have to be brought under control."

ISG Said To Want US To Ask "Enemies" For Help. ABC World News (12/3, story 10, 2:55, Harris, 8.78M) examined "one of the more controversial proposals for fixing the US problems" in Iraq -- that the Bush Administration should "engage in talks with two of its enemies, Iran and Syria. But the US considers both of those countries to be sponsors of terrorism." Syria is "ruled by a dictator who is accused of letting insurgents cross over the border to wage Jihad." Iran is "ruled by a president who's accused of developing nuclear weapons and supporting militias that wreak havoc in Iraq. Now the Iraq Study Group is poised to propose that the US ask these countries for help."

Novak Says ISG Report "Spells Trouble For Bush." In his Washington Post (12/4, A19, 690K) column, Robert Novak writes, "The Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former secretary of state Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton, is out of the White House sphere of influence. The White House certainly did not ask Congress for help by creating this commission. Baker has made sure that the report, though leaked in part to the press, has not gone to the White House. As a creature of Congress (an institution that Bush dislikes), Baker's group spells trouble for Bush when it releases its report Wednesday." Bush's position "is difficult. He does not want to be seen as ignoring a congressional study group. But he has not yet reached the point of accepting unconditional troop withdrawal. If he seems to differ from Baker-Hamilton recommendations, he can expect heavy scolding by the group's members on television."

More Commentary. In a nearly 1,600-word Wall Street Journal (12/4, A16, 2.04M) op-ed, Duke University's Donald Horowitz writes, "Just when you thought the midterm election results had weakened President Bush's hand in Iraq, it turns out the opposite is true. The president has been liberated from a stay-the-course policy that the Iraqi government could pocket as an open-ended commitment. The voters have given Mr. Bush a chance, perhaps a last chance, to turn Iraq in a new direction."

Bush Seen As Likely To Accept ISG's "Repudiation" Of His Iraq Policy. Time's Michael Duffy (12/11), on a cover story on how President Bush is likely to respond to the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, writes that Bush's "biggest reversals usually come after months -- even years -- of stubborn resistance. … But Bush has never had to pull off a U-turn like the one he is contemplating now: to give up on his dream of turning Babylon into an oasis of freedom and democracy and instead begin a staged withdrawal from Iraq, rewrite the mission of the 150,000 U.S. troops there as they begin to draw down, and launch a diplomatic Olympics across the Middle East and between Israel and the Palestinians." Duffy adds that "sometime in the next month or so, Bush will begin the biggest foreign policy course correction of his presidency. No matter what else may get stapled onto it, the maneuver will be based on the agreement reached by the" Iraq Study Group. According to Duffy, the commission "is proposing nothing short of a repudiation of pretty much all US foreign policy for the past three years. The Iraq Study Group will call for a massive diplomatic push in two areas in which the White House has never put its shoulder to the grindstone: rekindling peace talks between Palestinians and Israelis and holding an international conference that would lead to direct talks between Washington and both Tehran and Damascus."

But Newsweek's Evan Thomas (12/11) writes, "Persuading Bush to listen -- and to change course, even at the margins -- will be very difficult. … People who know Bush well say, as one presidential friend put it to NEWSWEEK, that he 'realizes that the disappointments on the ground in Iraq -- not just the election -- require new thinking.' (The source spoke anonymously for fear of alienating Bush.) 'He is looking for a militarily effective and politically sustainable approach that gives Iraq the chance to succeed in the long term,' says the friend, 'and I think he is very open to change, very open to the Baker Commission and the internal review.'"

U.S. News and World Report's Michael Barone (12/11), meanwhile, writes, "While George W. Bush's many critics and detractors portray him as facing the same dilemma as Lyndon Johnson in Vietnam, Bush himself seems determined to proceed the way Harry Truman did in Korea – or, as some might put it, as Winston Churchill did after Dunkirk. … In this, Bush has the support of others. Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates opposes a quick pullout. So do all the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Central Command's Gen. John Abizaid. Retired generals who have criticized Bush testified that we should send more troops into Iraq. Democrats seem disinclined to use their congressional majorities to cut short our mission in Iraq lest they be blamed for the unpleasant consequences many predict." Barone adds, "Many in the mainstream media today, as in 1968, see nothing but the prospect of American defeat. George W. Bush seems to have other ideas."

US Withdrawal Seen As Likely To Escalate "Civil War." Time's Aparisim Ghosh (12/11) writes that if the Iraqi government "can't stop sectarian killing today when it is able to call on the world's most powerful military, it can hardly be expected to do so once the Americans have left. The more likely outcome is an escalation of the civil war, with elements of the security forces taking sides." Ghosh adds, "Having foolishly dismantled the existing Iraqi army, the U.S. has the duty to create a genuinely proficient new one, instead of rushing recruits through Boy Scout lessons just to satisfy predetermined quotas. It may take five more years. But if the U.S. leaves sooner, Iraq will devolve into an even bigger mess. If the Americans insist on pulling out, they ought to park their hardware nearby, because like it or not, they'll be back."

U.S. News and World Report (12/11, Whitelaw, 2.03M) reports that "an average of 2,000 Iraqis a day are fleeing to Syria – and the numbers appear to be growing. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that at least 700,000 Iraqis have taken refuge in Syria, while an additional 700,000 or so are in Jordan. (Iraq's estimated population is 27 million.) … The numbers jumped sharply after the bombing of the Shiite shrine in Samarra last February that intensified Iraq's sectarian strife. With Iraq slipping toward an all-out civil war amid record numbers of civilians being killed each month, a UNHCR official warns that hundreds of thousands more Iraqis appear to be 'teetering' on the brink of departure. Even U.S. officials, many of whom have previously downplayed refugee flows, now acknowledge they are increasingly concerned." U.S. News and World Report (12/11, Mulrine, 2.03M) reports, "As the capital last week eased out of the round-the-clock curfew imposed after the bombing of the Shiite enclave of Sadr City that killed over 200 people, traffic was light – except on the airport road, where families packed into cars and braved roadside bombs for the chance to fly to another place."

NBC's Use Of Term "Civil War" Seen As A Defeat For White House. Time's James Poniewozik (12/11) writes, "When Matt Lauer announced that NBC would start referring to the conflict in Iraq as a 'civil war,' media observers hailed it as a 'Cronkite moment,' referring to the CBS anchor's 1968 declaration that the Vietnam War was unwinnable, upon which L.B.J. realized he had lost Middle America. … So, O.K., NBC's declaration may have no effect on the war in Iraq. But it was a signal moment in the war between the Bush White House and the media. If the issue seems like pointless semantics, it is hardly so to the Administration, which has been fixated on framing issues and politicizing language."

Bush's Trip Abroad Portrayed As An Escape From Democrats. Time's Mike Allen (12/11) writes that "if there was ever a good time for George W. Bush to leave home for a spell, it was right after the mid-term elections, when Capitol Hill was aswarm with triumphant Democrats. … European leaders expecting a humbled Bush at the NATO summit in Latvia instead got a stout speech in which he rearticulated his foreign policy."

Military Leaders Call For Increased Troop Commitment In Iraq. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A4, Jaffe, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports that a "growing number of senior military officials are arguing that the only way to salvage the situation" in Iraq "is to add more U.S. forces and more U.S. money." With about 140,000 US troops currently in Iraq, "some military officials said that as many as 30,000 more troops could be needed."

Will Says McCain Correct About Need For More Troops. In his Washington Post (12/4, A19, 690K) column, George Will writes that "for three years," Sen. John McCain "has been saying, correctly, that there are far too few U.S. troops in Iraq. For months he has said we cannot win without many more troops. That, too, is correct -- if it does not imply that some surge of troops can now guarantee winning. … Absent adoption of the McCain policy -- a substantial increase in forces -- America's waning influence on events may derive from the increasing likelihood that the scant protection that American forces now provide will be withdrawn."

Bush-Hakim Meeting Seen As Intended To Bolster Maliki. McClatchy (12/4, Gordon, Walcott) says President Bush's meeting today with Iraqi Shiite leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim "is considered an effort to boost support for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki." Hakim "is a leading opponent of anti-U.S. Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr," and the White House "hopes that by urging Hakim and other al-Sadr rivals to support Maliki more forcefully, they can reign in the growing radical influence of al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia."

War Of Words Rages Over Iraq "Civil War" Terminology. The New York Times (12/4, C1, Carr, 1.16M) examines the debate over the term "civil war" as applied to the internal conflict in Iraq, writing, "The war over words and definitions is not a new one. The current administration has fought to maintain custody of the Iraqi conflict by defining insurgents as 'terrorists' and prisoners of war as 'unlawful combatants.' During Vietnam, the administration defined civilian casualties as 'collateral damage.' … There are those who suggest that there is something vaguely seditious in describing the situation in Iraq as a civil war." But "on closer inspection, what seems like a bold, transgressive step by the media," led by NBC and the Los Angeles Times, to adopt the term "is considerably less. It is not a coincidence that some members of the mainstream media were only willing to attempt to redefine the terms of the current debate after a massive electoral setback to the current administration."

Annan Now Says Iraq In "Civil War." The New York Times (12/4, A14, Wong, 1.16M) headlines a story "Annan Adds His Voice To A Growing Chorus That Is Calling The Situation In Iraq A 'Civil War,'" saying that the UN Secretary-General also now says Iraq has "descended into a civil war that was even deadlier and more anarchic than the 15-year sectarian bloodshed that tore Lebanon apart."

Washington Seeks Lessons From Iraq Experience. The Christian Science Monitor (12/4, Grier, 59K) writes that "even as Washington looks forward to the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, expected this week, many experts and policy organizations are looking back to try and glean crucial lessons from the three-plus years of the US experience in Iraq. It's an unorganized process that involves everything from Army field manuals to the Council on Foreign Relations, and it may never reach consensus, given the range of opinions involved. But even exchanging ideas could be important, since -- as hard as it is to believe now -- the interests and power of the US mean that at some point it could find itself weighing new sorts of military interventions."

Pessimism Has Set In Among Some Iraqis Over Past Four Years. ABC World News (12/3, story 10, 3:00, Harris, 8.78M) ran a feature on changes in Iraq over the last four years, "many of them wrenching. … Even here, at our ABC News compound in Baghdad, we're seeing religious tension among our Iraqi staffers. Over the past day or so, I've been out reconnecting with some of the Iraqis I've been covering for years. When Saddam Hussein fell, perhaps no Iraqi was more jubilant than this man." Unidentified male: "I feel very happy, really. I can't explain my feelings. Really, I am very happy." Harris: "We can no longer show you his face. Because these days, associating with Americans could get him killed. … Through subsequent years of car bombs and kidnappings he stayed stubbornly upbeat. But now, as he watches his neighbors kill each other in a rapid, rabid spiral of religious violence, now he says he wishes Saddam had never been toppled."

More Attacks Against US Troops, But No Casualties. NBC Nightly News (12/3, story 2, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Iraq today, there were more attacks against American troops. Roadside bombs exploded near a US convoy in Baghdad, causing damage but no casualties. US forces were on the move against insurgents with air strikes in Anbar province and a sweep through Bakubah. Meanwhile the death toll from that triple bombing yesterday at a Baghdad market rose to 53."

Friday Battle Showed Difficulties In Letting Iraqi Forces Take Control. The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Moore, 850K) examines a Friday battle in Iraq. Joint US and Iraqi forces, "undertaking what officials described as a major counterinsurgency operation, were in pursuit of 70 'high-value targets' in Baghdad's crowded Fadhil quarter, a Sunni Arab neighborhood of multistory tenements along the east bank of the Tigris River." But they "had walked into a deadly ambush." From "upper-story apartments, insurgents stopped the soldiers' advance with grenades and shoulder-fired rockets. Others launched coordinated mortar strikes, hitting one of two nearby Iraqi field posts. By the time the 11-hour battle was over, one Iraqi soldier had been killed and six others wounded, including one who shot himself in the foot." US officials "say an imminent expansion of the Military Transition Teams -- squads of American military advisors traveling with Iraqi army units -- will meet demands" Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki made of President Bush at their meeting last week "for more authority over his own security forces. But interviews at their joint Rustamiya base with U.S. advisors and Iraqi soldiers involved in Friday's battle revealed a different story. The operation was hastily prepared and badly executed, they said, and plans to let the Iraqis take the lead in the battle were quickly scrapped."

Airstrike Said To Have Killed "Toddler." USA Today (12/4, 2.27M) carries an AP story about civilian casualties of a US airstrike. The story was carried Sunday in the Norfolk Virginian Pilot (12/13), for example, but USA Today's version changes the word "child" in the first sentence to "toddler." The age of the child was not given in yesterday's version -- the USA Today version, though, says that the child was a boy "believed to be under the age of 2."

AFP Pegs Cost Of Iraq War At $350 Billion. AFP (12/4) reports, "The war in Iraq has cost the United States more than 350 billion dollars since the March 2003 invasion, according to an AFP review of Congress figures." A September 22 Congressional Research Service study "estimated the cost at 319 billion dollars, representing 73 percent of US spending for the 'war on terror' launched after [9/11]. Congress has approved 70 billion dollars for the 'war on terror' in the 2007 defense budget that includes about 50 billion dollars for the Iraq conflict, bringing the three-and-a-half-year spending over 350 billion dollars."

Missing F-16 Pilot Listed As Killed In Action. The AP (12/3) reports, "An American pilot whose F-16 fighter jet went down in Iraq was listed as killed in action following DNA analysis of remains recovered at the crash site, the U.S. Air Force said Sunday." The dead pilot is Maj. Troy L. Gilbert, 34, who "was supporting troops fighting in Anbar province, where many of the country's Sunni-Arab insurgent groups operate." US officials doubt "Gilbert was shot down." More than 40 sites carried this story. The Washington Post (12/4, Trejos, 690K) reports his death at the bottom of an article about Saddam's death penalty appeal.

Saddam's Lawyers Formally Appeal Death Sentence. The Washington Post (12/4, A16, Trejos, 690K) reports Saddam Hussein's lawyers have "formally appealed his death sentence for the killing of 148 Shiite men and boys from the town of Dujail in the 1980s, a spokesman for the Iraqi High Tribunal said. The case will now go to a higher court, which can rule on it at any time. If the court upholds Hussein's conviction, his execution, by hanging, must occur within 30 days, according to Iraqi law."

Joint State-DOD Report Says Afghan Police Force Ineffective. A front-page New York Times (12/4, Glanz, Rohde, 1.16M) story running nearly 2,000 words says that "five years after the fall of the Taliban, a joint report by the Pentagon and the State Department has found that the American-trained police force in Afghanistan is largely incapable of carrying out routine law enforcement work, and that managers of the $1.1 billion training program cannot say how many officers are actually on duty or where thousands of trucks and other equipment issued to police units have gone." The report said "no effective field training program had been established in Afghanistan."

Bombing, Aftermath Kill At Least Three In Kandahar. The New York Times (12/4, A14, Gall, 1.16M) reports a suicide bomber "rammed a minibus" into a British military convoy in Kandahar Sunday, "wounding three soldiers and setting a vehicle on fire" and leading British troops to open fire on civilians. At least three people were killed and 15 wounded "in the bombing and the shooting afterward."

Musharraf Blamed For Afghanistan's Instability. Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria (12/11) writes, "Afghanistan is in danger of becoming a version of Iraq, where the central government has collapsed, disorder is rife and a Qaeda-backed insurgency controls large swathes of the country." Afghan President Hamid Karzai and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf "have openly quarreled about the cause of the Taliban's re-emergence. Musharraf blames Karzai's incompetence and weakness. Karzai argues that Pakistan has been tacitly — and often actively — supporting the Taliban along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, and in Pakistan itself." Musharraf "is a genuine modernizer who has saved his country from becoming a failed state. Despite the compromises he has had to make, he has been more forward-looking on economics, law, religion and even women's rights issues than any government in Pakistan since the early 1970s. But having confronted Islamic extremists on such matters, Musharraf seems to believe that one area where he need not actively thwart them is in their goal of jihad against Karzai's government and its Western backers."

Taliban Uses Manual To Train Fighters. Newsweek (12/11, 3.12M) reports, "In case a Taliban fighter wonders what is expected of him, he can now refer to a nine-page, blue and white, pocket-size pamphlet called the Layeha, which Mullah Mohammed Omar began distributing last month. The book (NEWSWEEK obtained a copy, and has seen Taliban fighters carrying it in several parts of Afghanistan) lays down 29 strictures for conduct on the battlefield and in villages, as well as sanctions faced by those who break the rules: strict Islamic justice."

Pakistani Officials Urge NATO To Negotiate With Taliban. The Washington Times (12/4, Rashid, 88K) reports Pakistani officials "are urging NATO countries to accept the Taliban and negotiate a series of regional peace agreements similar to those that Pakistan has reached in tribal areas along its border with Afghanistan." Pakistani Foreign Minister Khurshid Kasuri told NATO foreign ministers last week "that the Taliban was winning the war in Afghanistan and that NATO was bound to fail."

Wiccan Symbol Placed On Soldier's Memorial Plaque. The Washington Post/AP (12/4, A17) reports the widow of Sgt. Patrick Stewart, who died in Pakistan, "saw a Wiccan symbol placed on a memorial plaque for her husband Saturday, after fighting the federal government for more than a year over the emblem." Roberta Stewart said it was the "first government-issued memorial plaque with a Wiccan pentacle."

Fewer Combat Medals Being Awarded In Iraq Than In Previous Wars. Time (12/11, Donnelly, 4.03M) reports, "U.S. troops are fighting and dying with valor. So why have so few received the military's top awards? Are there fewer heroes in the Iraq war than in previous wars? That's the message the Pentagon is sending, say critics, by not awarding today's soldiers nearly as many of the nation's highest military honors. Three and a half years of combat in Iraq, for example, have produced only two winners of the Medal of Honor, the country's highest military award for bravery in combat. There were, by contrast, 464 Medals of Honor handed out during America's involvement in World War II, which lasted the same amount of time. … The same applies to the second highest honor, the service crosses: there were 8,716 of those given out during World War II and just 26 so far in Iraq."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Study Finds School Killings Up Slightly. The AP (12/4, Jordan) reports, "At least 21 people were killed at school during the 2004-05 academic year, a slight increase from the year before, the government reported Sunday." The AP continues, "The study by the Bureau of Justice Statistics does not include data from fatal shootings in Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania this fall. In Pennsylvania, five Amish girls were killed in a one-room schoolhouse by a milk truck driver who then turned the gun on himself." The AP adds, "Overall, fewer students reported being the victims of violent crime at school or school-sponsored events in 2004-2005, the study by the Justice Department agency show. Additionally, school-age children remain far more likely to be assaulted, raped and robbed off school grounds. … The study looked at violent crime against students over several periods of time. … The 21 killings at school-related events, between July 2004 and June 2005, targeted victims between age 5 and 18, said Katrina Baum, co-author of the 2006 Indicators of School Crime and Safety. Over the previous year, 19 people were killed. … It was not immediately clear whether all the victims were students. Still, the preliminary data indicates that students were about 50 times more likely in the 2003-04 school year to be killed away from school than at school, the report shows."

DOJ_NMG_0101922

Middle America Said To Be In The Midst Of Violent Crime Wave. Time (12/11, Kingsbury, 4.03M) reports, "Violent offenses are rising in midsize U.S. cities for the first time in 10 years. A closer look at one Midwestern town shows what's behind the uptick--and why we shouldn't expect it to slow anytime soon. It's as if Milwaukee, Wis., had reverted to a state of lethal chaos. … Not only did crime suddenly begin to rise in 2005, but the most violent crimes led the trend. Homicides shot up 3.4%. Robberies, 3.9%. Aggravated assaults, 1.8%. Hardest hit were not metropolises like New York City and Los Angeles but cities with populations between 400,000 and 1 million -- such as Baltimore, Md.; Charlotte, N.C.; St. Louis, Mo.; and Oakland, Calif. -- and this year looks to see similar rates of increase, if not worse. Few places have suffered more than Milwaukee. The homicide count for the city of 590,000 fell from 130 in 1996 to just 88 in 2004. But last year, according to FBI figures, Milwaukee saw the country's largest jump in homicides -- up 40%, to 121."

US Charges Two With DC Automobile Fine Payment Scheme. The Washington Times (12/4, Mcelhatton) reports, "The D.C. Office of Inspector General is investigating a reported scheme in which stolen credit cards were used to pay fines for parking and moving violations in the District, court records show." The Times continues, "Federal authorities last week filed arrest warrants that state two persons engaged in the scheme to pay off tickets for people at half the face value of the tickets, according to court records. … An affidavit from a D.C. Inspector General investigator states the scheme involved a man identified as Lonnell Damon Duckett offering to pay off people's unpaid parking and moving-violation tickets. In return, he sought cash for up to half the value of the unpaid D.C. Department of Motor Vehicle tickets, court records show. .. .In other words, Mr. Duckett, a Transportation Department employee, would offer to wipe out $1,000 in tickets if he received $500 in cash, authorities said." The Times adds, "The second person in the reported scheme has been identified as Ladonna Gray and described as Mr. Duckett's 'DMV connection,' according to court records. .. .Investigators say once Mr. Duckett received the cash, he used stolen credit-card information -- reportedly obtained from Miss Gray -- to pay the tickets. … The payments were made over the Internet, a common practice by most municipalities. … The pair was charged under a criminal statute titled fraud and related activity in connection with access devices last week in federal court. … The U.S. attorney's office filed complaints Nov. 27 against Miss Gray and Mr. Duckett."

California Man Sentenced To Seven Years In Prison For Movie Piracy. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/2, Gentile) reported, "A man convicted of sneaking camcorders into movie screenings and selling the pirated tapes in video stores was sentenced to seven years in federal prison Friday." Johnny Ray Gasca of Los Angeles "was convicted in June 2005 of three counts of copyright infringement as well as using a fake Social Security number and of an escape charge for fleeing his attorney's custody while awaiting trial." The AP noted, "He represented himself during a weeklong trial, saying he didn't intend to profit from his actions," but "Federal prosecutors showed the jury Gasca's diary in which he wrote that he earned up to $4,000 a week by attending the screenings. Prosecutors alleged he sold the films through small video stores or on the street. … At one point, Gasca pointed to an FBI agent in the courtroom and said, 'I'm going to prove to you he's a liar, your honor.'"

Copley News Service (12/2, Krasnowski) reported, "At the sentencing hearing, Gasca was unapologetic and maintained his innocence. He thanked lawyers who have aided him and court staff, but also took time to note 'lies' he alleged prosecutors made during his trial." Copley noted, "In an FBI search of Gasca's Hollywood apartment, agents found video duplication equipment and diaries in which he reported making as much as $4,500 a week selling pirated, prereleased movies." After his 2003 arrest, "Gasca escaped and was a fugitive for 16 months before being captured in Florida – reportedly in a hotel room containing stacks of DVDs and recording equipment."

Rural Thieves Targeting Agricultural Sector. USA Today (12/4, 1A, Kasindorf, 2.27M) reports that in a "rising wave of rural larceny, thieves are tracking commodity prices to steal everything that grows, plows or sprinkles on the USA's farms." California, "the No. 1 state in agricultural production, reports the biggest problems. Theft rings that kept police busy last year chasing stolen artichokes, pomegranates and diesel fuel switched this year to nuts, avocados, citrus, tractors, irrigation pipe and copper wiring, says Bill Yoshimoto, the supervising prosecutor for a 13-county Central California task force on farm crime." No "national statistics are kept on rural thefts, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the American Farm Bureau Federation. Yoshimoto estimates that crops and equipment worth $1 billion will be stolen nationwide this year."

Group Warns Virginia Community About Accused Pedophile. The Washington Post (12/4, B1, Salmon) reports, "An afternoon of football watching and holiday decorating took a strange detour yesterday for some Herndon residents when they opened their doors to find strangers confronting them with troubling information: One of their neighbors is an accused pedophile." The Post continues, "Members of two groups representing victims of abusive Catholic priests went door-to-door in the neighborhood, distributing packets of information accusing a former Catholic priest who has lived there for 10 years. … 'Community notification: Protect your children from a credibly accused serial sex offender,' the packet's cover reads." The Post adds, "The 38-page sheaf of material contained information about Edward F. Dudzinski, 56, who last month was among 20 former priests accused by the Catholic Diocese of Wilmington, Del., of sexually abusing children. He served in the priesthood in the 1970s and 1980s. .. .The diocese disclosed the names in its weekly newspaper, saying that it had found 'credible or substantiated complaints of sexual abuse of minors' against the priests. It said eight, including Dudzinski, are living. Dudzinski has not been convicted of -- or charged in -- any sex-abuse crime. … In a letter accompanying the list, Bishop Michael Saltarelli of the Diocese of Wilmington said he released the names at the recommendation of a diocesan review board. … Yesterday, Dudzinski did not return calls to numbers listed for his address. Two of his roommates, who said the former priest was not at home, defended him and denounced the groups' tactics."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Supreme Court To Consider School Desegregation Cases. The Christian Science Monitor (12/4, Richey, 59K) reports that with US classrooms "growing increasingly segregated," the Supreme Court "takes up two cases that confront the heated debate over race. On one side are those who believe affirmative action and other race-conscious programs are necessary to fight the effects of discrimination and inequality. On the other side are those who believe the Constitution mandates a colorblind approach to race relations - that government programs granting benefits based on a person's race are just as illegal as withholding benefits because of a person's skin color." The two cases concern "race-based student enrollment plans at public school districts in Seattle and in Louisville, Ky. Both plans were designed by the local school boards to voluntarily achieve racial integration to provide a diverse learning environment for the benefit of all students. Both plans are under attack by local parents who say the use of race to maintain a racial balance amounts to an unconstitutional form of government discrimination."

The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Savage, 850K) reports the outcome of the Seattle and Louisville cases "could affect hundreds of school systems across the nation, including the Los Angeles Unified School District. With the arrival of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., civil rights lawyers believe there may be a five-member majority determined to strike down race-based integration programs." In Seattle, the school board "adopted a policy — now suspended — that gave 'nonwhite' students an edge if they sought to enroll in a popular, mostly white high school. In Jefferson County, Ky., which includes Louisville, the school district said the black student body at each elementary school should range from 15% to 50%." In both cities, "several white parents sued to have the plans declared unconstitutional after their children were barred from enrolling in the school of their choice because of their race. Though they lost in the lower courts, the Supreme Court voted in June to hear their appeals, leading many to predict the justices are poised to outlaw 'racial balancing' in the public schools."

Seattle System Shows School Assignment Practices Can Benefit Whites. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A1, Golden, 2.04M) reports in an approximately 2300 word story that the case from Seattle before the Supreme Court was "filed by a predominantly white parents' group from an affluent Seattle neighborhood. Their children were denied admission to a majority-white school, and instead assigned to mostly minority schools." The case, "dating to 2000, has become a lightning rod for critics who say school boards go too far to try to achieve an elusive goal of racial integration. The court's rulings on Seattle and a similar case involving Louisville, Ky., schools are likely to affect hundreds of districts nationwide that use race as a factor in school assignments." But a "close look at Seattle shows that officials have frequently yielded to school-assignment pressure from white parents in pursuing another elusive goal -- middle-class participation in public schools." Even as parents "challenge a government action making room for minorities in highly-regarded schools, the later events in Seattle show another side of the picture: the ways that school-assignment practices can work to the benefit of whites. In Seattle as in other parts of the country, schools sometimes accommodate middle-class parents who push to get their children into coveted schools. When these middle-class parents are predominantly white, as in Seattle, the lobbying can tend to sort more white children into the most desirable schools."

Breyer Says Court Should Promote Rights Of Political Minorities. The AP (12/4, Yen) reports Justice Stephen G. Breyer "says the Supreme Court must promote the political rights of minorities and look beyond the Constitution's text when necessary to ensure that 'no one gets too powerful.'" Breyer, "a Clinton appointee who has brokered many of the high court's 5-4 rulings, spoke in a televised interview that aired one day before justices hear a key case on race in schools. He said judges must consider the practical impact of a decision to ensure democratic participation." Breyer said, "It's a Constitution that protects a democratic system, basic liberties, a rule of law, a degree of equality, a division of powers, state, federal, so that no one gets too powerful." The AP adds that on Monday, "the court will hear arguments in a pair of cases involving integration plans in K-12 schools. The legal challenge, which is backed by the Bush administration, could be among the most significant school cases since the landmark Brown v. Board of Education ruling in 1954 banned racial segregation."

NYTimes Criticizes Government For Backing Challenges To Seattle, Louisville Plans. The New York Times (12/4, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Conservative activists are seeking to halt the completely voluntary, and laudable, efforts by Seattle and Louisville, Ky., to promote racially integrated education. Both cities have school assignment plans known as managed or open choice. Children are assigned to schools based on a variety of factors, one of which is the applicant's race." The Louisville and Seattle plans "are precisely the kind of benign race-based policies that the court has long held to be constitutional. Promoting diversity in education is a compelling state interest under the equal protection clause, and these districts are using carefully considered, narrowly tailored plans to make their schools more diverse." It is "startling to see the Justice Department, which was such a strong advocate for integration in the civil rights era, urging the court to strike down the plans."

WPost Says School Desegregation Cases Not Affirmative Action. The Washington Post (12/4, A18, 690K) says in an editorial that the justices "may be tempted to see the" Seattle and Louisville cases "as the latest showdown over affirmative action. One side casts the matter as a simple issue of governmental race-consciousness; the other talks of diversity. Yet the programs at issue are not classic racial preferences. They deserve to be considered -- and upheld -- for what they are." These programs "use race in a fashion quite different from those that have inspired the court's skepticism in the past. While the Louisville and Seattle programs differ, neither gives members of any particular race a boost at the expense of any other. Rather, the programs respond to residential segregation patterns by giving minority students preference in preponderantly white schools and white students preference in preponderantly minority schools."

Nearly Two-Thirds Of Those Shocked With Tasers In Houston Are Black. The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Bustillo) reports from Houston, "Fred Weary, a pro football player for the Houston Texans, was driving his maroon Chevy Impala SS last month when he was pulled over by police after failing to signal that he was changing lanes. … What happened next is in dispute. Police say Weary was 'verbally combative' and did not put his hands on his car when ordered. The 305-pound offensive lineman says he did what the officers told him. But one thing is clear: Like many black men in this city, Weary was zapped with a stun gun and cuffed as he lay motionless on the ground." The Times continues, "The highly publicized case has brought attention to some stark statistics about police use of Tasers in the nation's fourth-largest city: Nearly two-thirds of those shocked with the high-voltage weapons over the last two years were black. … And the resulting outcry from black community activists and a City Council member has led Mayor Bill White to call for an independent review of Taser use by the Houston Police Department. … 'The mayor took a positive first step, but what will he do when the information comes back and clearly shows that race is a direct factor in who gets Tasered?' said Quanell X, a community activist and leader of the New Black Panther Nation. 'We already know that African Americans are Tasered more often than whites.'" The Times notes, "At a town hall meeting set for today, Quanell X said, he plans to highlight cases of people shocked by stun guns — including one in which a black man who was having an epileptic seizure was Tasered for failing to comply with an officer's orders."

Sharpton Calls On Congress To Investigate Rash Of Police Shootings. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/4, Haines) reports from Atlanta, "Al Sharpton called for a congressional probe of police shooting policies as he joined local activists Sunday outside the home of an elderly woman killed by narcotics police officers who burst into her home. The civil rights leader said the death of Kathryn Johnston — along with the death of 23-year-old groom-to-be Sean Bell, who was shot by police on his wedding day outside a Queens strip club — is an example of 'a new sense of police recklessness' sweeping the country. … Sharpton called for the incoming Congress to address the issue. 'There seems to be a new spirit in law enforcement that they can become the judge, jury and executioner of the law on the scene,' Sharpton said." The AP notes that the FBI is leading the investigation of the Atlanta incident.

Police Shootings Seen As Hard To Probe, Harder To Prosecute. The New York Times (12/4, Hartocollis) reports, "With Sean Bell now eulogized and buried, the emotions surrounding his death are swirling around the investigation into whether police officers committed a crime when they fired 50 bullets into Mr. Bell's car." The Times continues, "Although every investigation is different, cases like that of Mr. Bell, an unarmed black man who was killed on his wedding day, have come to follow a similar rhythm and pattern. And experts and those involved in the investigation say that through the history of those cases, they have learned that it is very difficult to convince a grand jury or a trial jury that police officers, who are empowered to defend the public with deadly force if necessary, went too far. In many cases of police shootings, with tensions high, the facts and legal fine points are difficult to isolate from a much larger context. … 'What makes these cases so hard are issues that go well beyond the incident itself,' a high-ranking official in the office of Richard A. Brown, the Queens district attorney, said last week, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is continuing. … 'It's the racial tension that still exists in the city,' the official continued. 'It's the mistrust in the minority community. It's cops that are faced with danger every day and have to react in seconds. It's safe to say, if they're wrong, somebody dies' — whether a civilian or an officer. … Everyone involved knows the stakes. While the district attorney's office investigates, civil rights activists and lawyers for the victims and the police officers are struggling to shape public opinion and find witnesses who buttress their points of view."

More Commentary. In a column for the New York Times (12/4), Bob Herbert writes, "The death of Sean Bell at the hands of undercover police officers, who also wounded his two companions in their 50-shot barrage in Queens nine days ago, brought to mind a case from a few years back in which undercover cops, acting on bogus information, attacked an innocent group of young people in a car in Manhattan." The Times continues, "The cops in the Manhattan case assumed that the people in the car were lowlifes. They were all Ivy League graduates, and one is currently clerking for U.S. Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens. … The incident occurred about 11:30 p.m. on Jan. 10, 2000. Two men and two women who were running their own startup Internet company, MagicBeanStalk.com, were parked outside a subway station on East 14th Street, near Union Square. Without any warning, a plainclothes officer leaped out of a yellow cab with his gun drawn and rushed the car with the four young people in it. … Thinking he was being carjacked, the driver put the vehicle in reverse and tried to get away. He was blocked by an unmarked police car that had pulled up behind him. He ended up hitting both the unmarked car and the cab (which was also a police vehicle) in his unsuccessful effort to flee. … The driver, Jason Rowley, who was 25 at the time, had no idea that the man with the gun was a cop. … It turned out that the cops were acting on a mistaken computer report that Mr. Rowley's car was stolen. As frightening as the incident was, the four people in the car were lucky that none of the cops opened fire." Herbert adds, "The four people who were in the car in the Manhattan incident have since done extremely well. Ms. Sudeall, for example, graduated from law school and is now a clerk for Justice Stevens. Mr. Gilbert has established a new Internet venture based on a program he invented that predicts people's buying patterns online. It's very creepy to think how easily one or more of the four could have been killed in their encounter with the police."

Maryland Hears Challenge To Marriage Definition Law. The Washington Post (12/4, B1, Otto, 690K) reports civil rights veteran Charles Blackburn "has resumed his march for civil rights, this time beside his partner of 28 years, Glen Dehn, and 17 other gay and lesbian plaintiffs in a lawsuit asking Maryland to legalize same-sex marriage." Today, the case "goes before Maryland's highest court, where lawyers will debate whether a 33-year-old law defining marriage as between a man and a woman violates constitutional protections against discrimination. The court is not expected to rule immediately." In January, "a Baltimore Circuit Court judge ruled in favor of the plaintiffs, finding that the state's definition of marriage was discriminatory and could not withstand a constitutional challenge." The state "appealed Murdock's decision and will argue at today's hearing that the law meets constitutional muster and that questions concerning the definition of marriage would be better handled by the state legislature."

Religious Freedom Group Files Argument Against Gay Marriage. The Washington Times (12/4, Ward, 88K) reports a "national religious-freedom group has chosen the same-sex 'marriage' case to be argued today in Maryland's highest court to file its first legal argument." The Beckett Fund, "a nonprofit legal group supporting religious freedoms, argues that legalized same-sex 'marriage' could result in civil suits against churches that refuse to marry same-sex couples or refuse to hire homosexual employees." The group "also says the government might strip such churches of their tax-exempt status and of their power to license marriages."

Voting Machines Available On Market Said To Be Lacking. In a New York Times editorial observer (12/4), Adam Cohen says, "To the long list of recent Election Day horrors from butterfly ballots to six-hour lines, add 'vote flipping.' In Ohio, Illinois, New Jersey and other states last month, there were reports — some confirmed by election officials — that when voters touched the screen for one candidate, the machine registered it for another. One Florida

Congressional race, in which the Republican won by fewer than 400 votes, is in the courts because paperless electronic voting machines may have failed to register as many as 18,000 votes." Voters who "complain about their own machines don't often get a chance to compare them with other options. But New York's boards of elections are replacing the old lever machines, and I recently went to demonstrations the city held to allow the public to try out the five finalists." But if "it comes down to waiting longer or sticking voters with illegal or unreliable machines that will undermine democracy for years to come, officials should wait, and insist on better machines. New Yorkers, and all Americans, deserve better choices than the voting machine industry is offering."

Public Relations Battle Launched Over Airline Merger. USA Today (12/4, 1B, Adams) reports, "Delta Air Lines' creditors and a bankruptcy judge will decide whether US Airways buys Delta, but that isn't stopping both airlines from battling for public opinion." USA continues, "Both airlines have hired big names in the financial public relations business to help shape the views of Wall Street analysts, airline employees and airline customers as well as the creditors and judges. US Airways hired New York communications firm Joele Frank, Wilkinson Brimmer Katcher. Delta is using Kekst and Co., a large New York financial PR firm with longstanding ties to the airline." USA adds, "In a surprise announcement Nov. 15, US Airways publicly offered Delta's bankruptcy creditors $8 billion in stock and cash for Delta, which is in Chapter 11. Delta's management has rebuffed the offer. … The unveiling was well-orchestrated. That morning, US Airways' PR team, along with a team from Joele Frank, placed predawn phone calls to dozens of reporters and Wall Street analysts to alert them to an 8:15 a.m. conference call with CEO Doug Parker. … Meanwhile, Delta bought a full-page advertisement opposing the merger in its hometown newspaper, The Atlanta Journal-Constitution. And at the urging of its own employees, Delta ordered and distributed 50,000 red 'Keep Delta My Delta' lapel buttons. US Airways has scheduled meetings with influential newspaper editorial boards."

Oberstar To Play Key Role In Antitrust Scrutiny Of Airline Mergers. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (12/4, Fedor) reports, "U.S. Rep. James Oberstar intends to take a hard look at potential airline mergers in the coming months because he knows that fusing two carriers together often causes pain for employees and hurts some consumers. … The Minnesota Democrat already is scrutinizing the proposed US Airways-Delta merger." The Tribune continues, "Next month, Oberstar will assume the chairmanship of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, where he will be well-positioned to raise concerns in the event that a wave of consolidation sweeps the airline industry next year, as some observers predict. … While airlines don't need congressional approval to merge, Oberstar's post gives him the ability to spotlight antitrust issues that the Justice Department is legally obliged to examine. … 'People are saying there is overcapacity' and that some seats should be removed from the market, Oberstar said. But he sees carriers flying with many full planes and argues 'there is a lack of substantial competition' on many routes." The Tribune adds, "Oberstar, who was reelected to a 17th House term last month, gave his assessment of the state of the airline industry and talked about his oversight role during an interview last week with the Star Tribune. … The only member of the Minnesota delegation who was serving in Congress when the airline industry was deregulated in 1978, he sees that move as a success. … 'There's no question about the success of deregulation,' Oberstar said. 'It has created seamless travel, more nonstops, more destinations, more opportunities." By taking the government out of the pricing business, consumers are saving about $6.5 billion a year on fares, he argued. … So when mergers and acquisitions and leveraged buyouts are considered,' Oberstar said, 'my first thought is: Is the result going to be undoing the consumer benefits of deregulation?'"

South African Edgars In Talks With Blackstone, Bain, KKR. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A14, Singer) reports, "Edgars Consolidated Stores Ltd. of South Africa is in talks with Blackstone Group, Bain Capital and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. on a potential $3 billion deal that would be the largest private-equity buyout in that country, according to people familiar with the situation." The Journal continues, "The emergence of the largest U.S. private-equity firms as possible buyers of one of South Africa's biggest retail groups illustrates how the booming sector is scouring further afield to deploy the billions in cash raised in recent years." The Journal adds, "Edgars Consolidated Stores, known as Edcon, said in October that it was approached by private-equity firms interested in acquiring the fashion chain, which has more than 900 stores in South Africa, Botswana, Namibia, Swaziland and Lesotho. Founded in 1929, the Johannesburg company has more than 20,000 employees and a market value of about 19 billion rand ($2.6 billion). … Some of the U.S. firms working on a potential acquisition may make a combined bid, but final decisions haven't been made, the people close to the matter said. The company has asked for firm proposals to be made in January, they said. … Edcon would be the latest in a string of potential private-equity takeovers in South Africa. Financial-service provider Alexander Forbes Ltd. received a bid by a group of investors led by Actis Capital LLP, and grocery chain Shoprite Holdings Ltd. has drawn potential private-equity bids."

Bush Mulls Lifting Moratorium On Drilling Off Southwestern Alaska Coast. The New York Times (12/4, Barringer, 1.16M) reports, "President Bush is considering whether to lift the 17-year-old moratorium on energy drilling in the waters off southwestern Alaska, a White House spokeswoman said Sunday, which would allow oil and gas companies to try to tap into more than five trillion cubic feet of natural gas that lies beneath rich fishing grounds." The Times adds, "Last summer the Interior Department recommended reopening several areas of the outer continental shelf, including the southern part of Bristol Bay, which lies just north of where the Aleutian Islands meet the Alaskan mainland, to energy exploration." There "has been widespread speculation among environmental groups and fishing industry representatives that President Bush would end the moratorium during the lame-duck session of Congress, allowing the Interior Department to proceed with its plans to market oil and gas leases in the southern section of the bay, along the north coast of the Aleutian Islands."

Gingrich Urges House To Pass Senate Offshore Drilling Bill. In a Washington Times (12/4, 88K) op-ed former House Speaker Newt Gingrich writes that "the House should adopt Sen. Pete Domenici and Sen. Mary Landrieu's narrowly drawn bill to expand Gulf Coast oil and gas production," which "would give the Gulf states a greater share of oil revenues to rebuild and restore the vanishing coastline." Gingrich calls the bill "a good first step toward a process in which other states could apply for permission to develop new offshore oil and gas reserves in exchange for a share of the revenues." He concludes, "Instead of holding out for an impossible bill, the House Republicans would be wise to see the Senate bill as an important first step toward energy self-sufficiency through expanded offshore oil and gas production, disaster prevention and ecological restoration. Completing this in the next few weeks is an important step in the right direction."

Administration Shows "New Interest" In Alternative Energy. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A6, McKinnon, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Facing increased political pressure on environmental policy at home and abroad, the Bush administration is signaling new interest in promoting alternative energies and curbing greenhouse gases." Administration "officials may push U.S. auto makers to make more vehicles that can run on ethanol and other alternative fuels. To boost availability, they are also considering a call to cut tariffs on imported ethanol." The Journal adds, "White House aides are also suggesting new openness to global-warming solutions, including the broad emissions limits they have resisted so far. The ultimate aim is to begin piecing together a framework to replace the Kyoto accord after it expires in 2012."

Study Finds Renewables Could Supply Quarter Of US Energy. The Christian Science Monitor (12/4, Clayton, 59K) reports, "Renewables could supply one-quarter of US energy by 2025, with no harm to economy, a study says. The last time renewable-energy entrepreneurs were this gung-ho, in the early 1980s, subsidies - not sales - buoyed their business plans. This time may be different." Although "most renewable fuels can't yet compete with their traditional counterparts, their costs of production are falling steadily. If the trend continues, America's energy mix by 2025 could be far greener and cleaner - without damaging the economy - than most analysts could have anticipated a few years ago." A November report by the RAND Corp. "estimated that if the cost to produce renewable energy continued to fall at its current rate, renewables could provide 25 percent of the nation's power by 2025 at no additional cost to the economy and perhaps even save money."

Link Between Pollutant, Hormone Systems Studied. The Washington Post (12/4, B1, Fahrenthold) reports, "Growing evidence that chemicals in the environment can interfere with animals' hormone systems -- including the discovery that male Potomac River fish are growing eggs -- has focused the attention of environmentalists and scientists on a new question: Are humans also at risk?" The Post continues, "A decade ago, the very idea that pollutants could interfere with a body's chemical messages was near the fringes of science. But now, it is an urgent topic for lawmakers and researchers around the world, and especially in the Washington area. … In recent years, researchers have linked some common chemicals to troubling changes in laboratory rodents and wild animals, including reproductive defects, immune-system alterations and obesity." The Post adds, "For now, no connections to human ailments have been proved. But some studies have provided hints that people might be affected by crossed hormones, and activists wonder if this kind of pollution could contribute to diabetes, birth defects and infertility. … The Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments is planning to host a public forum about hormone-disrupting pollution this spring. U.S. Reps. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.) and Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) have said they plan to press the Environmental Protection Agency about its failure to develop a program to test chemicals for hormonelike effects, as ordered by Congress in 1996." The Post notes, "The idea that natural hormone messages can be tampered with is not new; for decades, women using birth-control pills have been counting on a man-made chemical to do just that. .. .But the current concern is much wider: Some fear that modern chemistry might have unwittingly created other compounds with hormonelike effects and that they might have spread widely around the globe."

WSJournal Sees Senators' Letter As Part Of Campaign Against Global Warming Dissent. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (12/4, 2.04M) writes, "Washington has no shortage of bullies, but even we can't quite believe an October 27 letter that Senators Jay Rockefeller and Olympia Snowe sent to Exxon Mobil CEO Rex Tillerson. Its message: Start toeing the Senators' line on climate change, or else." The Journal adds, "On the one hand, the Senators say that everyone agrees on the facts and consequences of climate change. But at the same time they are so afraid of debate that they want Exxon to stop financing a doughty band of dissenters who can barely get their name in the paper." The "letter is of a piece with what has become a campaign of intimidation against any global warming dissent." The Journal writes, "A windfall profits tax is in the air, and we've seen what happens to other companies that dare to resist Congressional intimidation. It's to Exxon's credit that, in its response to the Senators, the company said that it will continue to fund free market research groups because 'there is value in the debate' that helps promote 'optimal public policy decisions.' Too bad that's not what the Senators care about."

The Wall Street Journal (12/4, 2.04M) prints excerpts from the senators' letter, which says, "Exxon Mobil's longstanding support of a small cadre of global climate change skeptics, and those skeptics' access to and influence on government policymakers, have made it increasingly difficult for the United States to demonstrate the moral clarity it needs across all facets of its diplomacy." The Senators "recommend that Exxon Mobil publicly acknowledge both the reality of climate change and the role of humans in causing or exacerbating it," "repudiate its climate change denial campaign and make public its funding history," and devote "at least some of the money it has invested in climate change denial pseudo-science to global remediation efforts."

NYTimes Says USDA Should Not Categorize Wild Salmon As Organic. The New York Times (12/4, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The Department of Agriculture routinely distinguishes between organic carrots and the regular kind when it decides whether to grant an 'organic' label. But it has gotten into trouble recently over how to decide whether a fish — especially a fish like salmon — is organic or not. The fishing industry is eager to call wild salmon 'organic,' as a way of denoting quality to consumers. But there's a problem. Carrots are either grown organically — without conventional pesticides — or they're not. A wild carrot, to most people, is barely a carrot, but the flower called Queen Anne's lace." Fish "can be as organic as the finest pasture-raised organic pig farm or as inorganic as a hog confinement operation. Let's use the word 'organic' as a way to distinguish between them, all the while hoping that there remain wild salmon out in the oceans, beyond any of our categorizing."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Reporting On Meth Awareness Day Continues. The Boston Herald (12/1) reported, "The Hub is winning the war on crystal methamphetamine thanks to lessons learned from battles waged in the meth-gripped West and Midwest, a top federal drug official said yesterday, but she warned that the addictive drug is on a destructive march toward the East Coast. 'We've been fortunate in New England,' June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration in New England, said on the first National Methamphetamine Awareness Day. … The Combat Methamphetamine Act of 2005 has tremendously curbed the production of home-grown meth now that common cold medications containing the ingredients ephedrine, pseudoephedrine and phenylpropanolamine must be kept behind pharmacy counters, Stansbury said."

The Southern Illinoisan (12/2) reported DEA agent Roger Ehler "answered much more specific questions Thursday when he came to address a criminal justice class at John A. Logan College on Thursday. It was National Meth Awareness Day, and many of the students were already quite aware." Ehler "followed up by discussing current trends in meth use in Southern Illinois. The good news is small-batch meth labs are declining in the wake of legislation limiting the availability of pseudoephedrine, a key ingredient in meth production. The bad news is imported meth, a more pure form known as ice or Mexican dope, is slowly on the rise."

Meth Labs Found In New York. The New York Daily News (12/3, Fenner, Moore) reported Meth "is moving up in society. Experts say methods for 'cooking' the drug have become less noxious over the past decade, making meth labs a friendlier fit for apartment buildings like the one on Manhattan's East Side, where federal agents announced a bust last week. 'Back in the day, cooking meth was a very smelly process,' said Steve Robertson, special agent and spokesman for the DEA. 'That's why meth labs would go into rural areas. You would have them out in little shacks out on farms or ranches.' Agents from his agency announced Thursday - National Meth Awareness Day - that they had busted a clandestine meth lab at a high-rise on E. 39th St. They also announced nine other meth lab busts in the city and on Long Island." The New York Daily News story also was used by the Contra Costa Times, Kansas City Star, and San Luis Obispo Tribune.

Manchester, Connecticut's Journal Inquirer (12/1) reported DEA officials "say meth, which affects the central nervous system, has 'a phenomenal rate of addiction, with some experts saying users often get hooked after just one use.' The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency says 80 percent of meth is smuggled into this country from Mexico. … And on Thursday, DEA officials announced the arrest of 10 people who they say operated meth labs in New York City and on Long Island."

On its Web site, NY1, New York (12/4) reports, "Special Agent [John] Gilbride says that methamphetamine has become the crack of the 21st century. He says it is a drug that is now affecting the lower, middle, and upper classes. 'Methamphetamine cuts across all sections of society,' said Gilbride. 'There is not one type of individual, one type of group that manufactures methamphetamine.'"

US Attorney Notes Rising Use, Trafficking Of Meth On Coloado's Reservations. In the Rocky Mountain News (12/2), Troy A. Eid, U.S. Attorney for the District of Colorado, wrote, "Taken together, the murder rate for Colorado's two Indian nations is 20 times higher than the state average. … Yet another challenge involves the rising use and trafficking of methamphetamine on Ute Mountain Ute and Southern Ute reservations. Gangs based off-reservation sometimes offer free samples of crystal meth…specifically targeting Native American people." Leaders from the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration, U.S. Attorney's Office, and other federal agencies "are working more closely than ever before with the elected leaders of the Southern Ute and Ute Mountain Ute tribes and their representatives."

Maryland Couple Sentenced For Running Drug Courier Business. The Baltimore Sun (12/2, Dolan) reported, "An emigre in the United States recruited Hopkins Appau back in Africa to swallow dozens of pellets filled with heroin. He boarded a plane, arrived in Baltimore and greeted his American bosses from his motherland -- a longtime Washington municipal employee and his immigrant wife living in a suburban townhouse. A U.S. District Court judge in Baltimore sentenced the couple, Godfrey Bonsu, 44, and his wife, Victoria Boateng, 42, both of Bowie, to lengthy prison terms…for running a drug courier business out of a Takoma Park Quality Inn." Bonsu "received a 14-year prison term while Boateng was ordered to prison for slightly more than 11 years." Law enforcement agents "use a variety of techniques to catch such drug couriers. 'Sometimes we have intelligence provided by an informant or you see that something is wrong with a person,' Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent Steve Robertson said in an interview shortly after the Bonsu-Boateng convictions in February."

Police Officer In Pennsylvania Faces Drug-Trafficking Charges. Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania's Citizens Voice (12/2) reported a part-time township police officer who "also worked in other communities was arrested Friday on federal drug trafficking and illegal handgun possession charges. Patrolman Charles M. Byra Jr., 28, a township resident, was charged with possession of crack cocaine and marijuana with intent to sell and with carrying a stolen gun, which he allegedly used while drug trafficking. … The arrest follows an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the state police that spanned most of this year."

The Harrisburg (PA) Patriot-News (12/3) reported Byra "was charged in U.S. District Court in Scranton on Friday with possession with intent to distribute crack cocaine, possession with intent to distribute marijuana, possession of a firearm during a felony drug trafficking transaction and possession of a stolen firearm."

Wilkes-Barre's Times Leader (12/2) reported, "A source close to the investigation said Byra was arrested on suspicion he stole evidence connected to mainly drug cases when he worked as a part-time officer in Dupont earlier this year."

Mitchell Says Baseball's Steroids Investigation Stymied By Lack Of Cooperation. In its Baseball section, the New York Times (12/2, Curry) reported George Mitchell, the former Senate majority leader who "is leading an investigation into steroid use in baseball, said in a statement…that some parties he would not name had not cooperated with investigators. Because of that lack of cooperation, Mitchell said, it will take longer to complete the investigation. … Several team officials have given testimony, but no players have acknowledged speaking with Mitchell."

The AP (12/1) reported Mitchell "said his probe into steroid use in baseball has been delayed because he lacks power to order testimony."

US Drug Laws Said To Be In Need Of Reform. In the Washington Post (12/4, A19, 690K), Kevin A. Sabet, a fellow at National Development and Research Institutes Inc. in New York, writes about US drug laws and says, "No serious drug policy analyst can look you in the eye and tell you that our only alternatives are strict prohibition or lax legalization. There is, in fact, a comfortable position closer to the middle: We can reform the worst parts of our laws without fearing massive increases in drug use. Erasing or dramatically closing the gap between the sentences for crack cocaine and powder cocaine is a good example of this."

Philadelphia Inquirer: Updated Laws Could Prevent Internet Drug Trafficking. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/2) editorialized, "Almost anyone with an e-mail address has received those annoying spam messages offering prescription drugs without a prescription. Stopping these illicit cyber drug rings requires dedicated, technologically savvy law enforcement agents and a high level of cooperation among federal, state and local authorities. Fortunately, that's exactly what happened in Operation Cyber Chase, an investigation led by the Drug Enforcement Administration. … Tougher, updated laws could help slow the flow of illegal controlled substances. Federal law enforcement authorities work under the auspices of the 1970s-era Controlled Substances Act, enacted long before the Internet came into use."

Afghanistan Opium Production Sets Record. The Washington Post (12/2, A1, Deyoung) reported Opium production in Afghanistan "broke all records in 2006, reaching a historic high despite ongoing U.S.-sponsored eradication efforts, the Bush administration reported yesterday. In addition to a 26 percent production increase over past year -- for a total of 5,644 metric tons -- the amount of land under cultivation in opium poppies grew by 61 percent. Cultivation in the two main production provinces, Helmand in the southwest and Oruzgan in central Afghanistan, was up by 132 percent. … White House drug policy chief John Walters called the news 'disappointing.'"

The Washington Times/UPI (12/2) reported, "In addition to a 26-percent production increase over past year -- for a total of 5,644 metric tons -- the acreage used for opium poppies grew by 61 percent, the White House said."

IMMIGRATION:

Next Congress Expected To Pass "Amnesty" Immigration Bill. The Washington Times (12/4, Hurt, 88K) reports Congress will "approve an immigration bill that will grant citizenship rights to most of the 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens in the U.S. after Democrats take control next month, predict both sides on Capitol Hill." While Republicans have "been largely splintered on the issue of immigration reform, Democrats have been fairly unified behind the principle that the illegals currently in the country should get citizenship rights without having to first leave the country." Democrats in "both chambers say they will start with some form of legislation first drafted by Sens. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, which was the basis for the bill that was approved earlier this year by the Senate." But House Republicans "and many outside Congress derided that bill as 'amnesty' for allowing illegals to remain in the U.S. and eventually become citizens. Democrats say it's not amnesty because aliens must pay a fine and wait years before becoming citizens."

TAX:

Tester Claims Tax Policies Discriminate Against Small Businesses. In an interview with U.S. News and World Report (12/11, 2.03M) Sen.-Elect Jon Tester says, "If you look at what has built this country, it has been small business and working families. They are critical to the economic success of the country. We're a mom and pop operation. Some of the things we experience are regulations set up more from a big-business standpoint. Small business is taxed with potential accounting measures set up for Enron and things like that. … You have to make sure you're not putting undue burden on small business from a tax and regulation standpoint." Asked, "It looks as if the federal minimum wage will climb next year. What effect will that have on small companies," Tester replied, "I don't think that's going to impact small business in the least. It's so minimal you can't get good people at that wage level. If you are going to have someone stay with you any length of time, you are going to have to pay them more."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Conservatives Urge Bush To Continue Nominating Conservatives For Judgeships. U.S. News and World Report (12/11, Halloran, 2.03M) reports, "With newly powerful Democrats like New York Sen. Charles Schumer of the Judiciary Committee vowing an end to 'the days of hard-right judges,' the nominee game has become far more complicated. … The new dynamic has unleashed speculation over whom President Bush may consider if he gets another opportunity to nominate a Supreme Court justice…during his remaining two years. And it has reinvigorated strategy sessions on all sides to assess the many 'what if's.'" Leonard Leo of the Federalist Society "is already urging Bush to stick with his strategy of picking nominees that please the right, even without a GOP Senate majority. 'No matter who he nominates, it's going to be a firefight,' said Leo, a behind-the-scenes player in the administration's judicial nomination strategy. … He and others on the right believe that if the president has the opportunity, he'll nominate a woman. And the top name on their list is Edith Hollan Jones of Texas."

Lame Duck Congress To Use Continuing Resolution To Fund Government. The New York Times (12/4, Hulse, 1.16M) reports Republicans "intend to conclude the 109th Congress this week and leave Democrats stuck with the tab in the form of unfinished spending bills as the days of Republican rule draw to a close on Capitol Hill."

Congressional leaders "said election losses had sapped Republican enthusiasm for trying to finish nine spending measures that were due Oct. 1. Congress will instead pass a stopgap measure to keep the government running until mid-February, leaving the fiscal tangle for the new Democratic majority to sort out next year." However, the GOP will "try to record some final accomplishments as they intend to adjourn by Friday." They would "like to extend a number of popular tax breaks rather than see Democrats get credit for restoring them next year. House Republicans also plan to try to push through an expansion of offshore oil and gas drilling opportunities and will take a symbolic anti-abortion vote before Democrats, many of whom support abortion rights, take control in January."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/4, Chaddock, 59K) reports that while there is "a vast unfinished agenda in the 109th Congress, including most of the fiscal 2007 spending bills, immigration reform, ethics rules for lawmakers, an offshore drilling bill, a fix for President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program, and an omnibus trade and tax package," after an "election that shifted control of the House and Senate to Democrats, there's little political will to complete it this session." Congress is "likely to punt on approving at least nine of the 12 spending bills for the fiscal year that began on Oct. 1. All that means heavy lifting for Democrats in the 110th Congress, who will have to deal with old spending bills even as they are rolling out a signature agenda for the first 100 legislative days." But while "expectations are fading for spending bills, the Senate is on track to confirm former CIA director Robert Gates as Defense secretary."

WPost Criticizes GOP For Failure To Pass Appropriations Bills. The Washington Post (12/4, A18, 690K) says in an editorial that the congressional Republicans were "happy to dump $460 billion in unfinished business on the new Democratic majority. One political plus for them is that the leftover mess threatens to snarl the Democrats' already full agenda at the start of the 110th Congress. Another is that it could force the new leaders to an early and unpleasant choice about whether to live within the Republicans' spending ceiling or look like hypocritical big spenders and risk a presidential veto. We understand the political temptation to do mischief by doing nothing, but this is a gross abdication of lawmakers' fundamental responsibilities."

Gates' CIA Record On Intelligence Raises Concerns. On its front page, the Washington Post (12/4, Smith, 690K) looks back at Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates' tenure as CIA director. During his 1991 confirmation hearings, "Gates -- a brilliant, smooth-operating Soviet specialist -- lost some of his luster. CIA colleagues came forward to testify that he had kowtowed to the wishes of his superiors and had manipulated intelligence to suit White House policy. Questions also arose about his involvement in the Reagan-era Iran-contra scandal." He "eventually won confirmation and held the CIA director's job for 14 months; even his critics describe it as a reasonably successful, modernizing tenure." But "the concerns expressed about Gates then have echoes in the contemporary debate over the alleged tailoring of intelligence analysis to serve political ends, an issue at the heart of criticism of the war in Iraq."

The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Spiegel, Barnes, 850K) says Gates "appears to some an odd choice" to replace Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, "given the Pentagon's rocky and occasionally divisive atmosphere under Rumsfeld. For much of Gates' career, critics and even some admirers have likened him to the imperious Rumsfeld and his close administration ally, Vice President Dick Cheney. 'Gates was making it clear to analysts what intelligence they were to produce,' said Thomas Blanton, director of the National Security Archive, a nonprofit institute that gathers and analyzes declassified documents. 'It's a chilling record, because you have two main themes of the Iraq war present in Robert Gates' career at CIA: the arrogance and bullying of a Rumsfeld and the intelligence cherry-picking of a Cheney.'"

Questions For Gates Proposed. The New York Times (12/4, A25, 1.16M) offers questions for Gates from ex-Defense Secretary William Cohen, Harvard's Samantha Power, ex-Army Lt. Gen. Donald Kerrick, ex-Defense Secretary Melvin Laird, the American Enterprise Institute's Danielle Pletka, and the Naval Postgraduate School's Kalev Sepp. Among the topics: procurement financing, NATO commitment to Iraq and Afghanistan, DOD intelligence spending, human rights, Darfur, relations with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, relations with Congress, the military personnel budget, and DOD's role in the war on terror.

Gates Urged To Avoid "Psychological Entrapment" On Iraq. The Washington Post (12/4, A2, Vedantam, 690K) writes about the notion of "psychological entrapment," the idea that "when you invest yourself in something, it is exceedingly difficult to discard your investment. What is devilish about entrapment is not just that it can result in ever greater losses, but that those losses get you ever more entrapped, because now you have even more invested. … What does this have to do with the Gates confirmation?" The US experience in Iraq is seen by one expert "as a perfect example of psychological entrapment -- on a national scale."

Gates Said To Face Serious Time Constraints In Effort To Bring Change To DOD, Iraq. Under the headline "Next Defense Secretary Must Hit Ground Running," USA Today (12/4, 7A, Brook, Kelley, 2.27M) says Gates "will have to act fast -- within months, analysts and retired officers say -- to effect change at the Pentagon and in Iraq." Hearings on the Gates nomination begin tomorrow, and he is expected to be confirmed. Sen. Jack Reed said, "He has to be able to go in immediately and make changes. … He has to thoroughly re-examine the policy and strategy in Iraq. That's the most pressing and immediate priority." Cohen also said Gates "has to work closely and quickly with Congress to be successful."

Democrats Who Opposed Iraq War Resolution Moving Into Powerful Posts. The Washington Post (12/4, A4, Pincus, 690K) writes, "Although given little public credit at the time, or since, many of the 126 House Democrats who spoke out and voted against the October 2002 resolution that gave President Bush authority to wage war against Iraq have turned out to be correct in their warnings about the problems a war would create." And now, "many of those lawmakers will move into positions of power. They include not only members of the new House leadership but also the incoming chairmen of the Appropriations, Armed Services, Budget and Judiciary committees and the Select Committee on Intelligence."

Putnam Expected To Play Outsize Role Within GOP House Leadership. U.S. News and World Report (12/11, Brush, 2.03M) reports Rep. Adam Putnam "is one Republican for whom 'stay the course' has proved a winning strategy. Yes, he's still a youngster. He's not a household name, and he doesn't grab all the headlines, even back home in Florida. But having just won a fourth term by garnering 69 percent of the vote, Putnam is racing up the Capitol Hill pecking order. Republicans bumped him up again last month to chair of the House Republican Conference, the No. 3 GOP position in the House, in effect the communications maestro behind Minority-Leader-to-be John Boehner and Minority Whip Roy Blunt. Putnam was tapped to boost a beleaguered party. How well he does with that assignment may help determine the GOP's future. And it may have a major bearing on Adam Putnam's political future as well."

Thompson Expected To Prove Troublesome For DHS. U.S. News and World Report's Washington Whispers column (12/11, Bedard) reports, "Here's one thing the Department of Homeland Security can expect when Democrats take control of the Congress this January: Questions, and lots of 'em, from Rep. Bennie Thompson, the Mississippi Democrat taking the reins of the House Homeland Security Committee. At one point this year, Thompson had 100 requests for info pending at DHS. … Why so many letters? 'If the department was proactive in communicating with us,' he sniffs, 'we probably wouldn't need to write so many.'"

Heritage Foundation Seeks Meeting With Congressional Democrats. The Washington Times (12/4, Lambro, 88K) reports the Heritage Foundation, "seeing new opportunities to advance its conservative agenda in next year's Democratic Congress, wants to talk with Democratic leaders about where they might find common ground." The prospect of "the conservative think tank, whose ideas fueled President Reagan's policies in the 1980s, sitting down with some of the Democrats' most liberal leaders to discuss taxes, spending and health care might sound far-fetched in the immediate aftermath of a bitter midterm election. But a senior Heritage official says, 'We are actively soliciting a chance to sit down and discuss our ideas with them,' and Democrats say they are more than willing to get together." Letters "seeking a meeting for a frank exchange of ideas quietly began going out this week to a number of House and Senate Democratic leaders, including incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer and prospective Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel." The Times adds Heritage is "not alone in thinking that some longtime adversaries of Democrats can have an effect on legislation in Congress next year. Advocacy groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Federation of Independent Business (NFIB), say that potential alliances between some of the Democrats' newly enlarged centrist blocs, including the 'Blue Dogs' and the so-called 'New Democrats,' could open up opportunities for them to move some legislation in their direction."

Rangel Defends His Draft Proposal. In an interview with Time (12/11, Bacon, 4.03M) Rep. Charles Rangel is quoted as saying, "If we had had a draft, those who decided to have an elective -- rather than defensive -- strike against Iraq would not have received public or congressional support. When you're talking about war and you have no concept of anyone being lost in your family or your community, then it's human nature to be more prone to say, 'Let's fight, I'll hold your coat.' I'm serious about it. As of now, I would be satisfied to have a discussion."

FDA White Oak Project Touted As Government Success Story. The Washington Post's "Federal Diary" column (12/4, D1, Barr) reports, "The headquarters consolidation of the Food and Drug Administration, on 130 acres in suburban Maryland, appears on track to become one of the government's most successful construction and development projects." When the "project is completed, probably in 2011, about 7,700 FDA employees and contract workers will be located at White Oak, off New Hampshire Avenue in Silver Spring. Congress estimates the General Services Administration, which owns the property and is managing the construction, will spend about $900 million on buildings and site improvement." The Post adds, "The decision to recruit the FDA to White Oak set off a decade-long struggle to obtain funding for planning, design and construction." Funding "came in fits and starts, as is often the case when Congress has competing budget priorities. For example, the fiscal 2007 appropriation for White Oak -- $178.5 million -- is on hold until Congress determines how to revive spending bills that have stalled in the lame-duck session. Still, the project has gained momentum through the years."

White House, State Department Host Kennedy Center Honor Recipients. On the front page of its Style section, the Washington Post (12/4, C1, Johnson, 690K) reports on the State Department dinner held "on the eve of last night's Kennedy Center Honors gala." The Post notes that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, wearing an "emerald gown" and a "big smile," welcomed the honorees at the gala "where the arts world's biggest stars and Washington's brightest bulbs celebrate together." The New York Times (12/4, A22, Chmela, 1.16M) calls the Kennedy Center Honors the "paramount event on the Washington cultural calendar, with events at the State Department and the White House" and notes that President and Mrs. Bush attended the Kennedy Center program on Sunday evening after a reception at the White House. USA Today (12/14, 2.27M) also reports the story.

Krugman Praises Webb For Snubbing Bush. In his New York Times column (12/4), Paul Krugman notes Sen.-elect James Webb's recent snub of President Bush, who had asked about his son, a Marine lance corporal, adding, "Good for him. We need people in Washington who are willing to stand up to the bully in chief. Unfortunately, and somewhat mysteriously, they're still in short supply. You can understand, if not condone, the way the political and media establishment let itself be browbeaten by Mr. Bush in his post-9/11 political prime. What's amazing is the extent to which insiders still cringe before a lame duck with a 60 percent disapproval rating." Krugman cites the example of the Iraq Study Group, which "watered down its conclusions and recommendations, trying to come up with something Mr. Bush wouldn't reject out of hand."

Bush Said To Be Mostly Uninterested In His Legacy. U.S. News and World Report's Washington Whispers column (12/11, Bedard) reports, "Now here's a real shocker. The Bushies aren't eager to start talking legacy about their prez yet . 'Really,' says one, 'he's not obsessed with his legacy.' Aides describe President Bush as the polar opposite of former President Bill Clinton, who was reportedly focused on his legacy the minute he was re-elected in 1996. We know how that went. Bush's doesn't look pretty either, but insiders say he's taking the long view and for proof note how his recent reading list included three George Washington bios."

OTHER NEWS:

Employment, Manufacturing Sectors Both Show Weakness. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, Gerena-Morales, 2.04M) reports the "job market seems to be humming as the unemployment rate hovers at a five-year low. Indeed, Federal Reserve officials have cited it as a sign of vigor that could stoke inflation." The "unemployment rate fell to 4.4% in October. However, other signals indicate the employment picture could darken. Initial claims for jobless benefits recently jumped to their highest level in more than a year. Payroll growth has eased this year to a monthly average of 147,000 net new jobs, from last year's 165,000. Just 92,000 jobs were created in October." Data "released Friday by the Institute for Supply Management show that the decline in manufacturing employment extends beyond the two suffering housing and auto sectors. Its employment index slipped to 49.2 in November from 50.8 in October. Readings below 50 indicate a contraction." Economists "say the health of the economy and job market through next year hinges mainly on how quickly the auto and housing sectors can pare the excess inventories that are forcing them to cut production, and the effect of the housing market's slump on other sectors. They will scrutinize the November jobs report, due out Friday, for insight."

The Washington Times (12/2, Hill, 88K) reports, "Economic weakness spread beyond the stricken housing and auto sectors last month, with reports showing U.S. manufacturing shrank for the first time in 31/2 years and construction dropped the most since the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." US industries "broadly cut back production, adding to factory shutdowns caused by deepening recessions in auto- and housing-related industries such as wood, furniture and appliances, according to a report yesterday from the Institute for Supply Management." The "unexpected decline in construction of offices and other business facilities in October added to a record string of drops in housing construction of more than 1 percent in the last seven months to cause the biggest drop in construction spending in six years, the Commerce Department said yesterday." David Wyss, "economist at Standard & Poor's Corp., noted that the downbeat tone of recent economic news contrasts sharply with upbeat assessments this week coming from Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke and other Fed officials. Mr. Wyss said there is cause for worry."

Minimum Wage Hike Unlikely To Boost Wages For Many In Metro Washington. The Washington Post (12/4, D1, Rosenwald, 690K) reports "increasing the federal minimum wage might be irrelevant for many" of the Washington, DC area's "workers and employers, given the extent to which market forces -- high demand for labor, low unemployment and the lofty cost of living -- have already raised the floor for hourly salaries. According to federal data, the median hourly pay for all workers in the Washington-Arlington-Alexandria area is $19.14 -- about 72 percent higher than Lubbock, Tex., where it is $11.13." So are "'most other big job centers around the country, with only about 520,000 people nationwide making the federal minimum of $5.15 an hour, a rate that hasn't gone up in a decade and has led some 28 states and the District to pass their own increases."

New Discovery Rules Call For Stricter Retention Requirements For E-Documents. The AP (12/4) reports, "U.S. companies will need to know more about where they store e-mails, instant messages and other electronic documents generated by their employees in the event they are sued because of changes in federal rules that took effect Friday, legal experts say." The AP continues, "The changes, approved by the Supreme Court's administrative arm in April after a five-year review, require companies and other parties involved in federal litigation to produce 'electronically stored information' as part of discovery, the process by which both sides share evidence before a trial. … Federal and state courts have increasingly been requiring the production of such evidence in individual cases. The new rules clarify that the data will be required in federal cases." The AP adds, "Under the new rules, an information technology employee who routinely copies over a backup computer tape could be committing 'virtual shredding' once a lawsuit has been filed, said Alvin F. Lindsay, a partner in the Miami office of Hogan & Hartson whose legal expertise is in technology and litigation. … Companies still could routinely purge their archives if the data aren't relevant to cases the companies have pending or expect to face, though specific sectors such as financial services remain governed by other data-retention rules. … The new rules make it more important for firms to know what electronic information they have and where, especially because of a provision that requires lawyers to provide information much earlier than before on where clients' data are stored and how accessible they are. … Besides e-mail, companies will need to know about things more difficult to track, such as digital photos of work sites on employee cellphones and information on removable memory cards, said James Wright, director of electronic discovery at Halliburton Co."

Jeb Bush Expected To Play Major Role In GOP Politics. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A1, Cooper, 2.04M) reports in a front page story that the Republicans "pondering a political shift to the middle after their losses in midterm elections might consider the example of Florida Gov. Jeb Bush before setting their course." Gov. Bush, "who is stepping down this month because of term limits after eight years in office, has a track record as one of the nation's most socially and economically conservative politicians, yet he enjoys a nearly 65% approval rating in a state where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans. His brand of conservatism -- a mix of conservative political stands and activist governance -- has paid off for him in a way it hasn't for his brother in the White House." And Jeb Bush's "public support in a key swing state, his recent launch of a political advocacy group and the departure of two of his high-level aides to join the possible presidential campaign of another conservative governor suggest Mr. Bush will exert substantial influence over his party in the 2008 election and beyond." At "the least, he looks likely to be a significant power broker, despite the heavy toll the Iraq war has taken on his older brother's public-approval rating. The younger Bush has said he has no plans to seek the presidency in 2008. But he hasn't been as assertive in batting down persistent speculation among his closest backers that he might consider the No. 2 spot on a presidential ticket." While the Governor has "been vague about his own plans, there are few secrets about where his sympathies lie for 2008. Two of his chief political operatives have allied themselves with Republican Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who is considering a presidential bid."

GOP Governors Ponder Party's Future After Midterm Losses. The Washington Times (12/4, Hallow, 88K) reports some Republican governors, meeting in Miami, "wonder whether their party can realistically hope to regain majorities in Congress, the governors mansions and state legislatures, given that the unpopular Bush administration's lease on the management of government has two more years to run." Republican governors, "whose numbers went from a high of 32 in 1998 to 28 last year, generally agree that the reasons they are down to 22 after last month's elections are the Iraq war and the general tarnishing of their party's brand image." Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi said, "The war in Iraq hurt even at the gubernatorial level, even at the state level." Barbour said "he and other members of the Republican Governors Association were told in a closed meeting that polling showed that 20 percent of people who voted in the governors' races said Iraq was a major issue in their vote." Some Republican strategists "attending the conference said privately that they suspect it is, as one of them put it, 'silly' to think about taking back the House and Senate and winning a majority of governorships with the Bush administration still in power."

transformations, the Republican Party "has sustained its big-tent coalition. The question in the wake of its election thumpin' is whether the tent will split. You can see this possibility in "Liberaltarians," an essay in the New Republic by Brink Lindsey, the director of research at the libertarian Cato Institute. Lindsey is not merely joining the large crowd of disenchanted conservatives who believe that the Republican Party has betrayed its principles -- spraying money at farmers, building bridges to nowhere and presiding over the fastest ramp-up in federal spending since Lyndon Johnson. Rather, Lindsey is taking a step further, arguing that libertarians should ditch the Republican Party in favor of the Democrats." Having "ticked off the first things on their to-do list, Christian conservatives now press for affirmative state action on behalf of traditional values: amendments to the constitution to bar gay marriage, government efforts to teach abstinence, federal payments to faith-based groups. All these policies appall libertarians."

Presidential Candidates Face Tough Congressional Season. The AP (12/4, Kuhnhenn) reports a number of likely presidential candidates in Congress "next year face votes on appropriations, budgets and trade — all of which present potential pitfalls in a presidential campaign." Congress also "could consider immigration and Social Security legislation, two issues that attract widespread public interest as well as alarm. Hanging over all that will be Iraq." So far, "six Democratic and three Republican senators are weighing whether to run for president in 2008. Two House Republicans also are in the mix. The race is off to an early start, with potential candidates setting up their campaign and fundraising operations and seeking early media exposure." For the Democrats "in particular, that amounts to serious multitasking." At least three — "Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and John Kerry of Massachusetts — will be committee chairmen in the Senate. Two other senators — Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Evan Bayh of Indiana — are in line to head two subcommittees, where much legislation originates." Former South Carolina Democratic Party Chairman Dick Harpootlian said, "It's going to be interesting to see if those folks who are in the Senate and who now have the responsibility to chair committees, to sort of run the show, whether their attention will be captured by the Senate or whether they will make time to come campaign." The AP adds the GOP and Democratic senators "will face difficult choices on the Senate floor. Democrats have pledged to budget frugally, spending or cutting taxes only if the money can be made up elsewhere." That is "a tall order given their desire to increase spending on education and fix the alternative minimum tax, intended to ensure the wealthy do not avoid taxes through loopholes."

Obama Roils Democratic Field As Clinton, Bayh Step Up '08 Efforts. The New York Times (12/4, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports Democratic Sen. Barack Obama's "announcement that he might run for president is altering the early dynamics of the 2008 Democratic nominating contest. The move has created complications for Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton as she steps up her own preparations and is posing a threat to lesser-known Democrats trying to position themselves as alternatives to Mrs. Clinton, Democrats said Sunday." Obama is preparing "for a day of campaignlike events in New Hampshire next Sunday," and at the "least, Mr. Obama's very high-profile explorations have contributed to a quickening of the pace across the 2008 Democratic field." Sen. Evan Bayh "said that he would create a presidential exploratory committee this week," and Gov. Tom Vilsack "went so far as to announce his candidacy two years before Election Day, in what his aides said was a calculated strategy to grab a moment of attention before Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton blot out the sun." Sen. Clinton has "been meeting in recent days with New York Democrats — including a two-hour brunch on Sunday at the Manhattan apartment of Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer — to telegraph her own likely entry into the race, though her aides said the get-together had been planned before Mr. Obama discussed his possible run publicly." But "more than simply picking up the pace, Democrats increasingly believe that Mr. Obama has the potential of upending the dynamics of the 2008 contest more than any other Democrat who might run — short, perhaps, of Al Gore, the former vice president, whom some Democrats are pressing to run."

ABC World News (12/3, story 6, 0:25, Kerley, 8.78M) reported, "There are strong, new signals that Senator Hillary Clinton is getting set to make a White House run. One of her top advisers says Clinton has personally asked other New York Democrats for their support and is interviewing possible campaign staffers."

NBC Nightly News (12/3, story 9, , Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "There's word tonight that Hilary Clinton maybe preparing to make a bid for the White House. The 'New York Times' reports that Senator Clinton is signaling to key New York politicians that she's likely to win for the presidency in 2008. Senator Clinton has personally asked some top state Democrats for their support."

USA Today (12/4, 2A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Sen. Clinton is "ramping up preparations for a 2008 presidential run, talking to political colleagues in New York and interviewing potential staff. A final decision is expected early next year." Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said "said Clinton and Sen. Charles Schumer, New York's other senator, are scheduled to have 'extensive' discussions this week in the capital."

The Washington Times/AP (12/4, Fouhy) reports Sen. Clinton "met on Sunday with New York's Democratic governor-elect," Eliot Spitzer, "to solicit his support for her likely White House bid, the latest indication she is stepping up plans to join a growing field of potential contenders for 2008." Top Clinton aide Howard Wolfson "said he did not know when the former first lady would decide about pursuing the presidency or set up an exploratory committee," but her aides "have begun interviewing possible campaign staffers in recent weeks." Last week, Clinton "contacted leading state lawmakers, including Democratic Reps. Charles Rangel and Nita Lowey, and the state party chairman, Denny Farrell, to assess her prospects and seek their support." Meanwhile, the AP adds, Sen. Obama, "a rising star in Democratic politics, enjoys a wave of publicity and momentum around a possible White House bid."

The Washington Post (12/4, A3, Cillizza, 690K) reports Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh "announced yesterday that he is forming a presidential exploratory committee, a move that allows him to raise money and travel the country in support of a potential national candidacy in 2008." In an appearance on ABC's "This Week," Bayh said "the American people 'need someone who can deal with the dysfunction here in this city so that our government begins to empower our people to fulfill their potential,' adding: 'If I can be that individual, so be it.' He said he expects to make a final decision on whether to run by early 2007." The Post adds Bayh's "announcement caps a busy week in Democratic presidential politics as Gov. Tom Vilsack (Iowa) formally announced his bid, former senator Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.) dropped out of the race, and Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) began to test the 2008 waters." Bayh was "slated to spend today campaigning in Iowa, and then head to New Hampshire later in the week to do the same. He has already begun looking for office space in both states as well as interviewing potential staff members in Iowa, New Hampshire and Nevada." Bayh's "electoral success in a state regularly won by Republicans in presidential contests -- Lyndon Johnson was the last Democratic nominee to carry Indiana -- is at the core of his campaign-in-waiting."

ABC World News (12/3, story 6, 0:25, Kerley, 8.78M) reported, "The Democratic jockeying is heating up as Indiana Senator Evan Bayh told ABC's 'This Week,' he is setting up a committee to explore a presidential run."

The AP (12/4, Fouhy) reports Sen. Bayh "announced Sunday he was establishing an exploratory committee to raise money for a possible presidential run. He expects to decide over the Christmas holidays whether to seek his party's nomination."

McCain's Support For More Troops In Iraq Said To Complicate His 2008 Bid. Newsweek (12/11, Bailey, 3.12M) reports Sen. John McCain "has pushed for more, not fewer, troops in the Iraq conflict, claiming 'without additional ground forces we will not win this war.' It's a striking stance for a man considered to be the front runner for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008, considering the American public's growing impatience for the end of the war. Even in conservative New Hampshire, 38 percent of voters now support bringing troops 'home ASAP,' according to the most recent Granite State poll. South Carolina, where a tough defeat ended McCain's 2000 campaign, will play an even more influential role in 2008 thanks to early placement in the primary calendar. There, too, Republican voters are growing unhappy with the war." However, "some members of McCain's inner circle are convinced the position could actually work to his advantage — reminding independents of the maverick they fell in love with in 2000."

Dean Reportedly Popular Among Liberals Internationally. U.S. News and World Report's Washington Whispers column (12/11, Bedard) reports, "His loudmouthed inside-the-beltway boors are still booing Democratic boss Howard Dean, despite the party's strong election showing, but they're eating him up like sweet Vermont maple syrup in Canada and overseas. Party bigs say the former Vermont guv is headed to Europe to cheer on liberal parties in England, Spain, and Portugal. His keynote address this month to Canada's beleaguered Liberal Party, fans say, was just a warm-up. Dean's message: Show folks like England's Laborites how to remake their top-down outfits into grassroots organizations just as he did at the Democratic National Committee."

TV Networks Pressuring Democrats Not To Choose Denver For 2008. U.S. News and World Report's Washington Whispers column (12/11, Bedard) reports, "Here's another reason the Big Apple is looking as if it will beat Denver to host the 2008 Democratic National Convention. TV networks – yes, they still run the show – are whining about how hard it will be to drag crews and gear to the Mile High City after wrapping up coverage of the Summer Olympics in Beijing and then pivot to the GOP convention in Minneapolis. Their preference is NYC, their backyard."

New York City Superintendent Finds Success While Rejecting Much Of Reform Agenda. The New York Times (12/4, A1, Herszenhorn, 1.16M) reports Region Five Superintendent, Kathleen M. Cashin has "produced one of the school system's most unlikely success stories" with "the best total gains on annual reading and math tests." But, that success "raises questions about" the reform efforts of New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Schools Chief Joel Klein, because Cashin "is a lifelong city educator" who "runs her schools in Region 5, with more than 85,000 students, the same way she ran her schools under the old Board of Education and under previous mayors." Cashin also "prefers principals who come up through the system over graduates of the chancellor's Leadership Academy" and "has made the union a partner, hiring it to train teachers instead of using outside vendors."

Gates Foundation May Play Role In DC Schools. The Washington Post (12/4, A1, Salmon, 690K) reports on the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation's efforts to improve high schools, noting that it "has awarded $1.5 billion in grants to improve secondary education, including $285 million last year." The foundation "is considering a larger effort" in the Washington, D.C. schools because Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty (D) "has asked for its guidance in a possible bid to take over the public schools." The article describes the experience of Irasema Salcido whose Cesar Chavez Public Charter Schools received a grant from the Gates Foundation. The Foundation helped the school develop a plan for "strengthening the curriculum, training teachers, drawing up more detailed budgets and taking steps to reduce student attrition" and the foundation's representative "stays in constant contact by phone and in person, taking on an oversight role typical for a central office in a large school system."

Canadian TV Runs "Brokeback" Parody Of Bush, Harper. The AP (12/4, Duff-Brown) reports a "'Brokeback Mountain' parody airing on Canadian television depicts an unusual type of summit between President Bush and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper." In the sketch "based on the acclaimed film about a love affair between two cowboys, Harper and Bush are portrayed naked from the waist up in a tent. Images of their faces are pasted over actors' bodies." At one point, "Bush throws cherries at Harper's nipples, which are covered with whipped cream. After the cherries land, separatist politician Andre Boisclair, who cooperated with filming of the spot, is seen opening the tent flap and stiffly saying that Quebec won't get involved 'in something like that.'"

Couric's CBS News In Transition. The Washington Post (12/4, C1, Kurtz, 690K) reports CBS anchor Katie Couric managed to get an unscheduled interview with Iraqi Prime Minister Nour al Malaki in Amman, Jordan, "much to the dismay of the ABC producers who thought they had an exclusive. Couric, who also wound up interviewing Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, had hesitated to fly to Jordan for President Bush's meeting with Maliki." Couric said, "We just weren't sure if it'd be worth our while in terms of securing interviews. Then we decided the only way we'd know is if we came and tried." The Post adds the "critics -- and Couric has more than her share -- may not have noticed, but the nightly newscast that she launched three months ago is in transition. Some of the changes she made have been dropped or curtailed to squeeze in more old-fashioned, what-happened-today stories. And Couric is finally starting to make news for covering the news." Still, the "pace and feel of Couric's program can differ markedly from those of Gibson and NBC's Brian Williams, who, like Couric, anchored from Amman on Wednesday and Thursday. As the former 'Today' star has tried to transfer her morning magic to the more traditional confines of the nightly news, some of her moves have been controversial, even within CBS." With the show "ensconced in third place, some pundits have been quick to pronounce the $15-million-a-year anchor a flop. But the mood at CBS improved when Couric garnered good reviews for her fast-paced election night coverage."

Pyongyang Reportedly Offers Uranium To Russia In Exchange For Support. The AP (12/3) reports North Korea "offered Russia exclusive rights to its natural uranium deposits in exchange for support at the stalled talks on Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions," a Japanese newspaper reported Sunday. The two countries have "been in talks since 2002 on a deal for Russia to import uranium, which it wants to enrich and sell as nuclear fuel to China and Vietnam," according to a report in the regional daily, Tokyo Shimbun, citing unnamed Russian officials. However, recently Pyongyang "offered Russia exclusive rights to the uranium in exchange for open support at the six-party talks." Negotiations between Russia and North Korea on the matter were "set to continue," the report added.

Direct US, North Korea Talks Seen As Source Of Hope. Under the headline "Direct US, North Korea Talks Give New Glimmer Of Hope," AFP (12/4, Parameswaran) reports, "One month after North Korea agreed to return to multilateral nuclear talks following its defiant atomic weapons test, the six-nation dialogue remains stalled. But few are complaining. This is because the United States and North Korea…are engaged in face-to-face talks on crunch issues that some believe are more productive that the six-party process including China, South Korea, Russia and Japan."

Parties Accuse Each Other Of Violating Terms Of Gaza Ceasefire. The Washington Post (12/4, A15, Wilson, 690K) reports that "extending a tenuous cease-fire between Israel and Palestinian armed groups in the Gaza Strip to the far larger West Bank proved elusive Sunday as Israel's security cabinet decided against doing so and the governing Hamas movement withdrew from negotiations on the matter." However, the Israeli government "reaffirmed its commitment to the temporary truce in Gaza despite the continuing rocket fire."

The New York Times/AP (12/4) says "Israelis and Palestinians threatened Sunday to scrap" the truce. Speaking to the Israeli cabinet, Defense Minister Amir Peretz "said militants in Gaza had continued to fire rockets, including one on Sunday." Abu Hamza, "a spokesman for the militant group Islamic Jihad, charged that Israel was violating the cease-fire by continuing operations in the West Bank."

Israeli Military Overhauls Training Following Lebanon War. USA Today (12/4, 15A, For, 2.27M) reports, "Israel's military is overhauling its training and expanding a guerrilla warfare school in response to problems the army had in fighting Hezbollah militants in Lebanon this summer. 'If there is one lesson from the war (in Lebanon), it is that we need to train more and be better prepared,' said Maj. Gen. Benny Gantz, head of the Israel Defense Force's Ground Forces Command." Israel's military "encountered a tougher-than-expected fight in Lebanon, where Hezbollah militants fought from a series of underground bunkers dug into the rocky and brushy hills of southern Lebanon." Israel's military overhaul includes, "Expanding the Elyakim base, where soldiers train on terrain resembling the hilly and rocky surfaces of southern Lebanon. Training includes using paint ball guns to simulate close combat. Increasing overall training of Israeli forces by 40%, Gantz said. Creating a 'Red Unit,' which will study Hezbollah and Palestinian militia tactics and act as "enemy forces" during training exercises. Gantz said the Israeli military got the idea from the U.S. military. Opening an urban warfare center in southern Israel, meant to replicate downtown Nablus in the West Bank and Gaza City in Gaza. The center will be used to train units that conduct raids in the Palestinian territories and operate mostly in towns and cities."

Beirut Protests Turn Violent. The Washington Times/AP(12/4, Karam) reports that "violent clashes broke out Sunday between Shiite and Sunni Muslims in the capital, leaving one man dead from gunshot wounds and 21 others injured at a time when tensions throughout Lebanon threaten the country's fragile sectarian and political balance." Meanwhile, the Financial Times (12/4, Biedermann) reports that both sides Sunday "vowed not to budge" while prime minister Fouad Siniora "insisted that he would not resign." Separately, British foreign secretary Margaret Beckett and German foreign minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier met with Siniora "separately and expressed their support for him." Saudi King Abdullah Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak also "voiced strong support for the Lebanese government" over the weekend.

The Washington Post (12/4, A13, Shadid, 690K) reports that the death of one protestor raised "tension across Lebanon," while "Lebanese television stations and Hezbollah officials reported several clashes in Beirut and in the Bekaa Valley, and rumors swirled about the extent of the violence." At the same time, the Post says there "appears to be almost no attempt to reach a compromise" since protests began Friday.

NBC Nightly News (12/3, story 3, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "The US is watching this situation very closely. Not only is Lebanon an American ally, but it is also the only real American success story. A success for the Bush Administration's policy to spread pro-Western democracies in the Middle East. If this government were toppled, the US would lose a friend and Hezbollah and its main backer, Iran and Syria, would gain power."

Lebanon On Verge Of "Total Meltdown." Time's Tim McGirk (12/11) writes, "With Lebanon still trying to recover from last summer's 34-day war between Israel and the Shi'ite militant group Hizballah, the government has seen its authority undermined, renewed meddling from the country's neighbors and the growing assertiveness of Hizballah. … Lebanon wasn't supposed to turn out this way. In March of last year, President George W. Bush was hailing Lebanon as a shining beacon of his Administration's 'democracy agenda' for the Middle East. Close to 1 million Lebanese had flooded into Beirut to demand that Syria pull its troops out of Lebanon and end its 29-year domination of the country." According to McGirk, "There are worrying signs, in fact, that Lebanon may be closer to a total meltdown than at any time since the 1975-90 civil war."

US Seeks UN-Backed Regional Force In Somalia. The AP (12/4, Hassan) reports Somalia's government "has sent hundreds of troops backed by Ethiopian soldiers to recapture a strategic southern town seized by the country's powerful Islamic movement, military officials and witnesses said Sunday, as dozens of families began fleeing the area." Meanwhile, the US "circulated a draft UN resolution late Friday that would authorize the deployment of a regional military force to protect the fragile government." The troops would "likely come from a seven-nation East African group, but would not include Somalia's neighbors, like Ethiopia." Ambassador Bolton "said Friday he expects Security Council experts to discuss the draft on Monday."

Iranian Court Could Turn Over US Embassy To Plaintiff. The Christian Science Monitor (12/4, Theodoulou, 59K) reports the US is "in danger of losing its sprawling embassy in Tehran to an Iranian businessman who was abducted in a bungled sting operation by US customs agents 14 years ago." A Tehran court awarded Hossein Alikhani "more than half a billion dollars in damages in the first lawsuit by an Iranian against the US for supporting terrorism." Now, three years after that ruling, "a writ of enforcement is due to be served this week, from when the US will have 10 days to respond by paying or presenting a list of assets in Iran to be seized as compensation."

Paulson Reaches Out To US Business Before Trip To China. The Financial Times (12/4, Callan) reports, "Hank Paulson, US treasury secretary, will on Monday begin a series of policy talks with industry leaders to discuss the Bush administration's policy towards China ahead of a high-level delegation to Beijing next week." Paulson "will on Monday meet executives from manufacturing companies, including Procter & Gamble, before on Wednesday sitting down with financial services companies -- including Citigroup -- as well as those from other sectors." The Times adds, "A Treasury official said Mr Paulson was 'reaching out on his China agenda' before heading to Beijing for a 'strategic economic dialogue' that will include top-ranking cabinet officials and Ben Bernanke, Federal Reserve chairman."

The Washington Times (12/4, Hirsch, 88K) reports, "Business groups are upset about a Bush administration move to strengthen restrictions on exports to China. They said the controls will not keep the communist country from acquiring sensitive technologies and will cost too much to implement. … 'The administration has not demonstrated that this proposed change would provide any additional security benefit and has not articulated a clear purpose for it,' a group of 24 trade associations -- ranging from the General Aviation Manufacturers Association to the American Chamber of Commerce in Hong Kong -- said Thursday in a letter to the Commerce Department." The proposal "would cover specified software, machine tools, computers, marine equipment and other exports."

Beijing Cracks Down On Tibetan Dissidents. USA Today (12/4, 20A, MacLeod, 2.27M) reports, "Beijing is accelerating its 5½-decade campaign to bring Tibet to heel. It is spurring high-growth economic policies and crushing political dissent in a drive to integrate the separatist-minded region into the rest of China. Tibetan exiles say political repression is on the rise. In recent months, Chinese authorities have jailed several Tibetans, including monks, for possessing or distributing pro-independence leaflets, posters or photographs of the Dalai Lama, Tibet's exiled spiritual leader." Beijing's "political crackdown has coincided with major economic initiatives."

WSJournal Criticizes Rejection Of Zhao's Appeal. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (12/4, A16, 2.04M) reports, "Who said China's Communists don't have a sense of humor? On the same day that the country's politicized courts rejected two closely watched appeals, the mandarins in Beijing proclaimed that they will ease restrictions on the foreign press ahead of the 2008 Olympics. … Human rights advocates suggest it's no accident [New York Times researcher Zhao Yan]'s appeal landed on the same day Beijing eased restrictions on foreign journalists. That's because the new 'freedoms' do not apply to Chinese research assistants working with foreign correspondents. Mr. Zhao's fate appears designed not just to punish a squeaky wheel but to intimidate other research assistants, too." The Journal adds, "In the wake of the Zhao ruling, no one will be fooled about what Beijing really thinks of a free press."

US, South Korea To Resume Talks On Trade Agreement. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A10, Ramstad, 2.04M) reports, "Talks on a proposed US-South Korea free-trade agreement -- which is President Bush's biggest bilateral trading initiative and would be Seoul's largest such deal -- resume today with the toughest issues on the table. The progress the two countries make this week at a Montana ski resort will determine whether they can reach a deal in time for Mr. Bush to seek a simple yes-no vote on it from Congress." Bush's "trade-negotiating authority will expire in June and Congress will then take back the ability to change trade deals, a power that inhibits countries from negotiating with the US. … Earlier negotiating rounds progressed more slowly than expected and the two countries are just now tackling the thorniest issues, such as how to reduce tariffs on food and autos. The session this week in Big Sky, Mont. -- the fifth formal negotiating round -- was previously expected to be the last one."

Chávez Declares Victory. ABC World News (12/3, story 3, 0:45, Kerley, 8.78M) reported that "in Washington, the White House is watching as one of the outspoken enemies cruises to a reelected victory. Venezuela's leftist President, Hugo Chávez , who called the President the devil at the United Nations back in September, is in line for another six-year term, leading the country with the world's largest oil reserves outside of the Middle East." NBC Nightly News (12/3, story 10, , Siegenthaler, 9.87M) also noted Chavez "has called President Bush the devil." The AP (12/4, James) says Chávez won by "a wide margin Sunday." However, challenger Manuel Rosales "conceded defeat but vowed to remain in opposition."

Similarly, the New York Times (12/4, Romero, 1.16M) reports Chávez won "in a landslide" but "representatives of the opposition candidate contended that the results were tainted by irregularities." With 78 percent of the votes counted, Chávez was "ahead with 61 percent, compared with 38 percent for Manuel Rosales." The Times says the "tension between the campaigns of Mr. Chávez and Mr. Rosales reflected a polarized electorate in Venezuela, but by contrast the voting itself was largely tranquil, with few reports of clashes or other violence." However, the Financial Times

(12/4, Webb-Vidal) notes that an exit poll released on Sunday evening by US pollster Evans/McDonough "suggested Mr. Chávez was leading with 58 percent compared with 40 percent for Mr. Rosales."

The Washington Post (12/4, A14, Forero, 690K) says the Chávez victory "further consolidates the tide of leftist politicians who have won office in Latin America in recent years," many of whom "criticize market reforms and sharply question the Bush administration's policies in the region." The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A3, De Córdoba, 2.04M) also notes that Chávez's reelection is "sparking fears among foes that he will accelerate his quest to install what he calls '21st-century socialism' in the world's fifth-largest oil exporter." Encouraged by his victory, Chávez, it writes, "will no doubt redouble efforts to create an anti-American and anti-free-trade bloc in the hemisphere, while lending diplomatic support to other anti-US countries such as Iran." The Christian Science Monitor (12/4, Blanford, 59K), Miami Herald (12/4, Gunson, Dudley, 286K), USA Today (12/4, 18A, Stinson, 2.27M), Washington Times (12/4, Hearn, 88K) and Los Angeles Times (12/14, Kraul, 850K), among other sources, also report the story.

France, Germany To Demand Tougher Conditions For Turkey's EU Bid. The Financial Times (12/4, Williamson, Hollinger, Proissl) reports, "Germany and France will on Tuesday demand tougher conditions for Turkey's troubled European Union membership bid, in a move likely to cause new divisions over Ankara at next week's EU summit." Jacques Chirac, French president, "will use a meeting with Angela Merkel, German chancellor, to back her proposal that would effectively set Turkey a new 18-month deadline to open its ports to Cyprus, an EU member, the Financial Times has learned." Merkel "said at last week's Nato summit in Riga that the Commission position needed to be 'strengthened'. A 'review clause' on whether Ankara had opened its ports 'would be desirable so that the council [EU summit] can review Turkey's progress, perhaps in 18 months' time', she said." The Times adds, "An official in Mr Chirac's office told the FT on Sunday: 'France and Germany are on the same page with regard to Turkey.'"

EU Hopes Agreements With Kazakhstan Will Reduce Energy Dependence On Russia. The Wall Street Journal (12/4, A6, Champion, 2.04M) reports, "In the European Union's growing struggle to break Russia's grip on the bloc's gas imports, all roads are leading to Kazakhstan. Today, the EU signs a memorandum of understanding with Kazakhstan on energy aimed at binding Europe closer" to the country. And "[y]esterday, EU Energy Commissioner Andris Piebalgs signed an accord on nuclear cooperation, with a view toward increasing Kazakhstan's share of uranium sales in the EU to 20% from 3%." Last week, Pielbalgs "attended an EU-inspired meeting in Kazakhstan of regional energy ministers that produced a road map toward integrating their countries' energy grids and regulatory systems with the EU's." But "in all this flurry of documents and initiatives, the thing Mr. Piebalgs and many EU countries want most -- the construction of a gas pipeline across the Caspian Sea that would connect the gas-rich countries of Central Asia directly to Europe -- isn't mentioned."

Litvinenko Probe Widens To Moscow, US. The Financial Times (12/4, Burns, Buckley) reports, "The investigation into the death of the former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko is broadening into an international police probe into organised crime, alleged state-sponsored murder and the activities of individuals who have worked for the Russian secret service. A team from SO15, the UK counter-terrorism investigation squad, is expected to fly to Moscow on Monday or Tuesday to interview witnesses and gather information on potential suspects." The Russian state-run television channel Rossiya "said on Sunday night that the arrival of the nine British detectives was important as it would demonstrate Moscow's willingness to co-operate. It was also a guarantee of an 'objective investigation', against the highly 'politicised background' to the case in London."

The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Murphy, 850K) reports British authorities said "they are widening their investigation into the poisoning of…Litvinenko on the heels of a fresh series of leads into the Russian's murky political and business connections that spanned from Moscow to the US. 'Over the next few days, I think all of these things will widen out a little from the circle just being here in Britain,' Home Secretary John Reid told Britain's Sky News Sunday Live program." The Times adds, "Quoting unidentified law enforcement sources, British press reports said police investigators are in the US interviewing former KGB agent Yuri Shvets, who purportedly has information on a dossier Litvinenko had in his possession relating to the Kremlin's pursuit of figures connected to Yukos Oil Co." USA Today (12/4, 17A, For, 2.27M), the New York Times (12/4, Cowell, 1.16M) and Wall Street Journal (12/4, A4, Mollenkamp, Patrick, Meichtry, 2.04M) run similar reports.

The Washington Times/AP (12/4, Stringer) reports "a US-based friend of the former agent said he had told police the name of the person he thinks orchestrated the poisoning." Yuri Shvets "said he had known the poisoned ex-spy…since 2002 and spoke with him on Nov. 23, the day Mr. Litvinenko died from exposure to a rare radioactive element, polonium-210. 'The truth is, we have an act of international terrorism on our hands. I happen to believe I know who is behind the death of my friend Sasha and the reason for his murder,' Mr. Shvets said by telephone from the United States, referring to Mr. Litvinenko by his Russian nickname." ABC World News (12/3, story 5, 0:30, Kerley, 8.78M) noted the AP story last night.

NYTimes Urges West To Put Pressure On Putin. Under the headline "Revisiting Putin's Soul," the New York Times (12/4, 1.16M) editorializes, "The fatal poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko in London, along with all the other suspicious murders and attempted murders of Kremlin critics in recent months, poses fundamental questions about Russia, and how the West should treat it. … We would certainly prefer not to suspect that anyone connected to President Vladimir Putin is involved, even if the attacks have the hallmarks of professional assassinations. The West needs a good relationship with Russia and its cooperation in containing nuclear proliferation and fighting terrorism. No one wants to return to the time when Russia was seen as an enemy. Yet the recent events…cannot simply be dismissed as unrelated occurrences, as Mr. Putin would prefer." The Times concludes, "The West has no choice but to continue dealing with Russia, and with Mr. Putin. But when Kremlin critics are attacked or murdered, the West must demand a full, transparent investigation and punishment for the criminals -- no matter who they are. It is time to let Mr. Putin know that we are looking hard into his soul, and we don't like what we see."

Castro Absent From His Birthday Celebration. ABC World News (12/3, story 4, 0:15, Kerley, 8.78M) reported, "In Cuba, this weekend's celebration of Fidel Castro's 80th birthday has come and gone with no sign of the guest of honor. The ailing leader's conspicuous absence is being taken by many Cubans as a clear sign that Castro will never return to power. He hasn't been seen in public in more than four months."

Pinochet Suffers Heart Attack. NBC Nightly News (12/3, story 11, , Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Chile, former dictator Augusto Pinochet is fighting for his life after suffering a heart attack. Doctors are clearing an obstructed artery. Augusto Pinochet has been under house arrest charged with human rights abuses during his 17 year rule that ended in 1990." The New York Times (12/4, Bonnefoy, 1.16M) and Washington Post (12/4, A13, Franklin, 690K) also report the story.

Feinstein Calls For Ban On Use Of Cluster Bombs Near Civilian Areas. Sen. Dianne Feinstein writes in the Washington Times (12/4, 88K) that "the time has come to ban the use" of cluster bombs "in or near civilian areas. Cluster bombs are intended for attacking large-scale enemy troop formations. They come apart in the air before making contact, dispersing between 200 and 400 small bomblets that can saturate a radius of 250 yards. The changing nature of warfare, though, has meant cluster bombs have been used against enemies in or near highly populated areas. So, all too often, cluster bombs critically injure or kill innocent victims instead of their intended military targets. … The United States and the international community should work together to stop use of cluster bombs when the lives of civilians are at risk. We need to ensure we don't needlessly endanger innocent men, women, and children by dropping cluster bombs where they live, work, and play. This is the right and just thing to do."

UN Task Force Questioning Gene Splicing Criticized. Henry I. Miller, a fellow at Stanford's Hoover Institution, writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/4, A16, 2.04M), "The UN task force that wrapped up here on Friday deliberated on the regulation of foods obtained with recombinant DNA (or gene-splicing) technology. They ignored the rule of holes: When you're in a hole, stop digging. The more this ongoing project progresses, the worse for science and technology -- and consumers everywhere." Miller adds, "The scope of this exercise, held under the auspices of the Codex Alimentarius Commission, which sets food standards on behalf of the UN's Food and Agriculture Organization and World Health Organization, makes no sense. … It is one thing to regulate novel foods with traits that are of potential concern, but quite another to regulate merely because a certain technique has been used, especially when that technique is state-of-the-art. It is rather like circumscribing for extra regulation only cars outfitted with disk brakes, radial tires and air bags -- and then limiting only those vehicles to a lower speed. The members of this task force, including representatives of the US government, disregard the scientific consensus that gene-splicing is an extension, or refinement, of older, traditional techniques of genetic modification, and that it does not warrant discriminatory, excessive regulation." American regulators, writes Miller, "have become surrogates of big agribusiness companies at the expense of academic research and the well-being of other sectors of the US economy."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Saudi Arabia Announces Arrests Of 136 Terror Suspects. The Washington Times (12/3, Nimr, 88K) reports The government of Saudi Arabia "yesterday announced the arrest of 136 suspected al Qaeda terrorists over the past three months in one of the largest crackdowns since it began battling Islamist extremists. … Those detained were 115 Saudis and 21 foreigners, and included a cell that had been plotting a suicide bombing, abductions and killings, the ministry said in a statement carried by the official SPA news agency. That cell consisted of 31 suspects, including four foreign residents, who were detained during a 'pre-emptive' security operation in Riyadh on Sept. 12, the ministry said."

CNN.com (12/2) reports, "A senior official in the Saudi Interior Ministry told CNN that the suspects, who are from several Arab nations, were monitored by Saudi security agents for several months. They rounded the men up just before the expected attack was launched. The suspects, arrested in different areas of Saudi Arabia, were being interrogated Saturday, the official said."

BBC.com (12/2) reports interior ministry spokesman General Mansoor al-Turki, "said some of the militant groups had been about to carry out attacks in Saudi Arabia while others were still in the preparatory stages. … Some of those arrested were recruiting others to fight in 'unstable countries', he added."

Administration's Latitude In Fighting War On Terror Said To Be Diminishing. In a New York Times "Week in Review" piece (12/3, WK14), James Risen writes, "For several years after 9/11, President Bush was given broad latitude by the legislative and judicial branches to fight terrorism as he saw fit. But 2006 has seen the American government's system of checks and balances slowly clicking back into place, forcing the Bush White House to confront new limits and more scrutiny. A series of developments last week reflected that changed reality. The Justice Department inspector general's office announced that it had begun an internal investigation into the department's role in the National Security Agency's domestic spying program, after the administration agreed to give the office's staff the necessary security clearances. Separately, the federal government agreed to pay $2 million to a settle a lawsuit brought by an Oregon lawyer wrongly arrested after the F.B.I. mistakenly linked him to the 2004 Madrid train bombings based on a faulty fingerprint match. In a third case, a German man abducted in 2003 and held in a C.I.A. secret prison in Afghanistan urged a federal appeals court to allow him to pursue a lawsuit against the United States that had been dismissed for national security reasons."

Guantanamo Detainees Turn To Each Other For Legal Help. The AP (12/3, Heilprin) reports that Guantanamo detainees "cut off from the outside world and lacking English language skills or any knowledge of the justice system, are still seeking representation from other detainees -- who are either free now or have access to an attorney." The case of Hamid Al Razak, an Afghan at Guantanamo, who will be represented by fellow detainee Bisher Al Rawi and the Center for Constitutional Rights, is described.

Editorials Laud DOJ IG's Review Of Warrantless Surveillance Program. The Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times (12/3) editorializes, "The Bush administration's warrantless domestic surveillance program came to light a year ago this December. The president had authorized what was then a secret program that allowed the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on calls and e-mails between the United States and foreign countries. .. Since then, President Bush has strongly defended the program, saying that the nation's security depends on allowing government agents to tap phone calls or troll for information relating to terrorism. .. .But many legal experts believe the president's program violates the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, enacted in 1978 to regulate domestic wiretapping. Under this act, the NSA must obtain warrants from a judicial panel before it can engage in wiretap operations." The Caller-Times continues, "Critics of President Bush's action said that even if the broader surveillance program could be justified in this post-9/11 world, the president erred by not asking Congress to change the FISA law to make the operation legal and constitutional. … This week, the Justice Department's inspector general said he will conduct an investigation to determine how the information obtained by the wiretap program has been used. He will also look at compliance with the FISA law." The Caller-Times notes, "The 110th Congress, soon after it takes office in January, must deal with this issue. If the Bush White House is right that new tools are needed to permit 'data mining' to fight the war on terrorism, then those tools should be incorporated into law, with judicial oversight to protect the rights of American citizens. … If the NSA wiretap program violates the law, as Judge Taylor ruled, then Congress has the authority to direct the president to curtail it until legal oversight is provided. The FISA framework would simply need to be reworked. Oversight of U.S. intelligence operations is a responsibility of Congress. It must act to 1) protect our national security and, 2) protect Americans' constitutional liberties. Neither of these should trump the other."

The Nashville Tennessean (12/3) editorializes, "A decision by the inspector general of the Justice Department to look into the controversial wiretapping program used in the war on terror could restore some public trust, although the scope of the probe is limited." The Tennessean continues, "It is important to note that the Justice probe will not deal specifically with whether the NSA program breaks the law or violates the Constitution, but it was also notable recently that members of a special board appointed to examine privacy concerns expressed satisfaction with the way eavesdropping had been conducted. … The developments do suggest that a greater measure of accountability is in store." The Tennessean adds, "The administration may find that with a reasonable amount of disclosure, more Americans will feel comfortable with the techniques being used. But anytime programs are cloaked in secrecy, they invite the very sort of skepticism and scrutiny the program has received."

WAR NEWS:

Pre-Resignation Rumsfeld Memo To White House On Iraq Causes Stir. The revelation of a memorandum on Iraq written by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on November 6 -- the day before Election Day and two days before Rumsfeld resigned -- received major play on NBC, the only network to air a newscast Saturday night. The story also appears on the front page of several major newspapers, and the memo is printed in its entirety in the New York Times (12/3, A28, 1.16M). Coverage suggests that the memo, in which Rumsfeld called for a change of course in Iraq, contradicted or undercut positive pronouncements by the Administration. The AP reports that Rumsfeld knew he was leaving the Pentagon when he wrote the memo, while other sources express uncertainty over whether he knew at the time.

NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 2, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported "about what the Defense Secretary thought about Iraq just days before he resigned." NBC (Corke): "As the President prepares this week to receive a major report on the way forward in Iraq, new details tonight about the war and one of his closest advisors. Just days before he resigned last month," Rumsfeld "wrote the Administration's plan for Iraq was not working and that the United States needed to change course there. … Rumsfeld wrote, 'In my view, it is time for a major adjustment,' adding, 'Clearly what US forces are currently doing in Iraq aren't working fast enough.' … The publication of the memo comes as President Bush prepares it to conduct the latest in a series of diplomatic efforts to stabilize the Iraqi government. … NBC News has learned the White House did in fact receive that Rumsfeld memo and a White House spokeswoman has said that the President has been dissatisfied about Iraq. We also learned tonight that that memo was developed over a period of several weeks, and it's not clear if Rumsfeld felt his job was in jeopardy at the time he sent it."

The New York Times, Washington Post, and Los Angeles Times all put the story on their front pages, and wire reports appear in or on the web sites of well over 100 newspapers. The New York Times (12/3, Gordon, Cloud, 1.16M) says in the memo, Rumsfeld did not "seem confident that the administration would readily develop an effective alternative. To limit the political fallout from shifting course, he suggested the administration consider a campaign to lower public expectations." Rumsfeld's memo "suggests frustration with the pace of turning over responsibility" to the Iraqis, "offers a counterpoint" to his own "frequent public suggestions that discussions about force levels are driven by requests from American military commanders," and "puts on the table several ideas for troop redeployments or withdrawals, even as there have been recent pronouncements from American commanders emphasizing the need to maintain troop levels for the time being."

The Washington Post (12/3, Tyson, 690K) notes that Rumsfeld "has made similar comments in public about insufficient progress in Iraq, both before and immediately after his resignation on Nov. 8. But the defense secretary's unusually expansive memo also laid out a series of 21 possible courses of action regarding Iraq strategy, including many that would transform the U.S. occupation."

In its report on what it calls a "rambling" memo, the Los Angeles Times (12/3, Meyer, 850K) highlights "one potentially controversial plan of action that had been used in a different form by deposed dictator Saddam Hussein -- paying off 'key political and religious leaders' so they would be more compliant with U.S. occupying forces in the war-torn country and its capital, Baghdad." The Times comments that the "memo is peppered with proposals that run counter to the advice of officers," even though "he has said he bases his decisions on input from commanders." Detractors "immediately seized on the memo as an admission of failure by one of the administration's primary architects of the Iraq war and its aftermath." But ex-Pentagon spokesman Lawrence DiRita is quoted defending Rumsfeld, saying of the diversity of suggestions posed in the memo, "This is what good leaders do."

The AP (12/3, Burns) also cites DiRita's defense of Rumsfeld, saying DiRita argues that the "broad range of options presented by Rumsfeld belies the notion, often cited by his critics, that he is inflexible and reluctant to consider alternative approaches." The AP adds, "A person familiar with the sequence of those events told the AP that Rumsfeld did know when he wrote it that he would be leaving."

Baghdad Bombings Kill At Least 51. NBC Nightly News (12/2, lead story, 2:25, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "We begin tonight with the war in Iraq and new explosions that hit the heart of Baghdad. It happened today in crowded markets. Bombs in three parked cars blew up at almost the same time. At least 51 people were killed. Ninety others were injured."

CNN (12/2, Robertson) reported, "The bombings took place about an hour before dusk in a busy downtown market -- three different bombs, two in one square, one in another square, in rapid succession. ... There were so many casualties…that they were taken to five different hospitals. And the blast was so big that it destroyed 10 stores in the area and 12 vehicles as well."

The Washington Post (12/3, A20, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "It was the deadliest attack since a barrage of car bombs, mortars and missiles hit the Shiite slums of Sadr City on Nov. 23, killing more than 200 people. And in a pattern indicative of sectarian violence, the Interior Ministry said 44 bodies had been found in Baghdad in a 24-hour period, most of them shot." The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "By nightfall, no one had claimed responsibility for the attacks." Sunni politician "Adnan Dulaimi said he believed that he was targeted by Shiites and that Maliki's government has not protected him." The AP (12/3, Gamel) adds, "Nobody claimed responsibility for the attack, but it followed a Friday raid by Iraqi forces backed by U.S. helicopters targeting Sunni insurgents in al-Fadhil, less than a half mile away."

LATimes Considers Role Of US Troops In "Civil War." In an editorial running nearly 1,700 words, the Los Angeles Times (12/3, 850K) writes, "The Bush administration, let's be clear, did botch the postwar occupation of Iraq. ... Historians may identify April 12, 2003, as the day the United States began to lose the peace in Iraq. That's when Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, responding to reports of widespread looting, declined to order up more U.S. troops to keep order and protect Iraqi lives and property." That said, the Times urges the US to follow "two axioms" in its Iraq policy: "American troops must not be allowed to become helpless bystanders in Iraq's civil war. Nor can they become co-conspirators with a government intent on taking sides in this civil war."

WPost Says US Cannot Give Up On Current Iraqi Government. The Washington Post (12/3, 690K) editorializes that "writing off" the current Iraqi government "now is not in the U.S. interest. The best remaining option for the United States lies in a long-term effort to bolster Iraq's political administration and army so that it defends the current constitution and slowly gains the ability to take on the enemies of the United States. ... Giving up on the government, as advocates of a rapid withdrawal suggest, would simply concede the country to those enemies, as well as to Shiite extremists, and betray those Iraqis who believed in the U.S. vision of a democracy at peace with its neighbors. It would mean the destruction of American allies in Iraq and throughout the region."

Anbar Raids Kill Six Insurgents, Three Others. The AP (12/2) reports, "U.S. soldiers destroyed two buildings being used by insurgents in a town in Anbar province, killing six militants, two women and a child, the military said Sunday. It was the latest of several recent raids during which women or children have been killed or wounded by U.S. forces as they attacked insurgents in residential areas." US officials have accused insurgents of using women and children as "human shields."

Baker Says "There Is No Magic Formula" For Iraq. The Houston Chronicle (12/3, Belli, 530K) runs a highly complimentary piece on James Baker, who "is bristling at depictions of him as a sort of magician who will somehow make the nation's Iraq problems disappear." Baker said, "Expectations are totally out of control. There is no magic formula for our difficulties in Iraq." Nonetheless, according to the Chronicle, Baker "is known as a master negotiator who often solves problems by forging bipartisan support and by turning enemies into friends." His career and achievements are described, with plaudits from Henry Kissinger, George Herbert Walker Bush, and others cited.

Isaacson Hopes Baker Can Attain Mantle Of "Wise Man." In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (12/3, 850K), Aspen Institute head Walter Isaacson writes that Baker "has one great goal left as he hones his legacy: trying to make sure that the words 'American statesman' appear in his newspaper obituary before the words 'Florida recount.'" Baker "was the secretary of State who urged President George H.W. Bush not to try to occupy Baghdad during the Persian Gulf War in 1991, and he cautioned against the invasion of Iraq in 2003 before it even began. ... If Baker and his posse can come up with a plan that salvages some threads of our national interest from the debacle of Iraq, and if he stays around to help implement it, that would be such an awesome magic trick that those of us who dabble with the first drafts of history should reward him by carving a niche in the pantheon for him somewhere between" ex-Defense Secretary Robert Lovett and ex-Secretary of State Dean Acheson.

Professor Skeptical About ISG's Chances For Success. In a commentary for the Washington Post (12/3, B3, 690K), Georgetown professor Daniel Byman writes that the Iraq Study Group runs the risks that all commissions do: "tepid recommendations, partisan divisions, little follow-up and eventual irrelevance. … At best, the Iraq Study Group will catalyze our leadership and help foster the political will to accept this painful reality. But salvation? Forget about it."

Hakim May Ask Bush To Reach Out To Tehran. An AP (12/2, Hendawi, Abdul-Zahra) piece previews President Bush's Monday meeting with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, "a Shiite powerbroker reviled by Sunni Arabs for his ties to Iran and a militia linked to sectarian violence." Hakim "will ask President Bush to seek Iran's help," and will "try to allay U.S. concerns over Iranian influence in Iraq." He "dismissed speculation that his trip to the United States threatened the authority of beleaguered Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who came under criticism for meeting with Bush last week in Jordan."

Iraqi Mass Exodus Unsettles Middle East. The Boston Globe (12/3, A1, Cambanis, 413K) reports, "As Iraq's bloodshed worsens, the tide of refugees fleeing the country is straining the region's resources and inflaming fears that Iraq's sectarian conflict might spread to neighboring countries. A new United Nations report says Iraq is 'hemorrhaging' refugees in staggering numbers. Anywhere from 2,000 to 3,000 people are fleeing the country every day. ... at least 1.5 million Iraqi refugees have moved to neighboring countries, reshaping the already complex demographic mosaics of Jordan, Syria, and Lebanon. The influx has prompted government crackdowns and anger from local populations who feel refugees are grabbing scarce jobs and resources."

More Commentary. In a commentary for the Washington Post (12/3, 690K), journalist Michael Goldfarb writes, "I've seen what happens when the 'international community' precipitously pulls out of conflict zones. ... American journalists and relief workers are evacuated and can be swimming in a hotel pool, all expenses paid, by evening. Our translators, drivers and office managers return to their houses and wait in fear of reprisal against those who collaborate with the Great Satan."

US Advisers Forced To Intervene When Iraqis Prove Inadequate. The Washington Post (12/3, A20, Trejos, 690K) reports that, during "Operation Lion Strike" in Baghdad, "teams of U.S. advisers remained close, but planned to leave the fighting to the Iraqis." Staff Sgt. Michael Baxter said, "It started out that way. But about five minutes into it, we had to take over." The performance by the Iraqis contrasted with official statements. US military leaders "had called it an 'outstanding' example of Iraqi forces taking charge. They said the Iraqis captured 43 insurgents while suffering few casualties." However, American soldiers "described Iraqi troops with inadequate training, resources or motivation. When they shoot, they 'pray and spray' and do not aim for targets, the soldiers said. They either lack equipment or are not well trained in new equipment. On the battlefield on Friday, the Iraqis communicated by cellphone because their walkie-talkies did not work, the U.S. soldiers said." In his Washington Post (12/3, B2, 690K) "Inbox" column, Tom Ricks quotes debriefings of two US Army trainers of Iraqis.

Review Says Army Mishandled Friendly Fire Case. The Washington Post (12/3, A17, White, 690K) reports, "Army officials destroyed critical evidence that could have determined who shot and killed Pfc. Jesse R. Buryj at an Iraq checkpoint in May 2004, one of several problems with the friendly-fire inquiry that may permanently shroud Buryj's death in mystery, according to an Army inspector general's review. ... As a result, Buryj's family buried him believing he was killed when his vehicle was rammed by a dump truck. They did not learn that he was shot by friendly forces until nine months after his death, and a lack of physical evidence means it is nearly impossible to know what happened that night."

Women Warriors "Change Military Landscape." The AP (12/2, Cohen) reports in a nearly 3,000-word article, "In Iraq and Afghanistan, women warriors are writing a new chapter in military history, serving by the tens of thousands, fending off enemy fire and taking on -- and succeeding in -- high-profile roles in the battlefield and the skies as never before. ... More than 155,000 women have been deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan since 2002, according to the Pentagon, nearly four times the number during the Persian Gulf War."

California Iraq Memorial Stirs Controversy. The New York Times (12/3, A38, McKinley, 1.16M) reports that previously "tranquil" Lafayette, California, "has become the scene of a passionate debate over the place of political speech in suburbia. At issue is a hillside memorial, made up of some 450 small white crosses and a 5-by-16-foot sign that reads: 'In Memory of 2,867 U.S. Troops Killed in Iraq.'" Detractors of the memorial "called the memorial unpatriotic, disrespectful or just plain ugly." Some locals "question whether the memorial actually meant to remember the dead troops," believing that it is primarily a war protest.

Iraq Veteran's Mother Continues Sending Gift Packages To Troops. The New York Times (12/3, A45, Applebome, 1.16M) profiles Luz Mercado of New Windsor, New York, who continues to send gift packages to troops in Iraq even though her son Luis has already come home. Mercado ""figured she owed it to other moms to do for their children what she had done for her own."

Taliban Kills Teachers, Intimidates Pupils. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Watson, 850K) reports on the Taliban's efforts to shut down public education: "One of the first victims in the resurgent Taliban's dirty war on education, [Mohammed Aref] gave his life trying to teach Afghan children that there is more to theirs than endless war. ... once again, education is under pressure from the Taliban. ... Over the last year, insurgents have burned at least 146 schools, and insecurity has forced 215 others to close, the Afghan Education Ministry says. Zuhoor Afghan, an advisor to Education Minister Mohammed Hanif Atmar, says about 220,000 students have quit school because they fear for their lives." Many Afghans "are losing patience. Encouraged by the promises of Western leaders, they believed the Taliban's defeat meant the dawn of a new age of rapid progress, in which all children could get a good education."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Nigerian Fraud E-Mails Claim To Be From FBI's Mueller. NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 9, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) ran an "In Depth" report on "a new twist on Internet fraud." NBC (Myers): "It's not every day that you get an email from the director of the FBI, Robert Mueller. … In these e-mails bearing official FBI logos, he's been notifying Americans that they've inherited $10.5 million each. To receive the cash, you must immediately contact the FBI in Nigeria to obtain a certificate of ownership. So when we got an e-mail, we immediately dialed away. Is in the FBI In Nigeria?" Unidentified male: "Yes, this is the FBI Federal Republic of Nigeria." Myers: "My FBI pal told me a long-lost relative had died in Nigeria and left me a huge inheritance." Unidentified male: "All you have to send is only $2,000." Myers: "Only $2,000? And I get $10.5 million? … The Mueller e-mails are, of course, fakes. A new twist on an age-old con, all part of Internet scams that cost Americans $183 million last year alone."

Alleged New England Mob Underboss Arrested. The Boston Globe (12/3, Murphy, Mishra) reports, "Reputed Mafia underboss Carmen 'The Big Cheese' DiNunzio was arrested on extortion and illegal gambling charges as he emerged from a North End social club yesterday, potentially ending the reign of an underworld leader credited with uniting the fractured Boston mob into a low-key, profit-focused machine." The Globe continues, "After State Police removed $6,000 in cash from his pockets and led the portly mobster away in cuffs, officials predicted his arrest would further weaken an organized-crime syndicate already diminished from decades of investigations and infighting." The Globe adds, "DiNunzio, 49, ascended to second in command of all New England mobsters around 2002, according to law enforcement officials, after winning the favor of New England godfather Luigi 'Baby Shanks' Manocchio of Providence. Law-enforcement officials allege he set about refocusing the mob on money-making crimes, such as extortion and gambling. … 'He's a low-key underboss who has been trying to keep the mob's activities under the radar of law enforcement and the media,' said one law enforcement official." The Globe notes, "According to a source briefed on the investigation, DiNunzio's extortion and gambling operation had been collecting 'hundreds of thousands' of dollars per week and involved a 'ton" of operatives. … Many of the crimes date to 2001, when the investigation began, and the statute of limitations was going to expire this month, triggering yesterday's arrest at the Gemini social club at the corner of Lynn and Cooper streets."

FBI Establishes Montana Public Corruption Tip Line. The AP (12/3) reported, "The FBI has established a tip line for people to report individuals working in public offices whom they believe are corrupt. People can call in to report suspected shady public officials working for school districts, law-enforcement agencies, government offices or in any other public position funded by taxpayers. The Public Corruption Tip Line, 1-866-50-BRIBE, was established for Montana, Idaho and Utah residents through the FBI's Salt Lake City field office. In addition, tips regarding public corruption can be made at the FBI's Web site, www.fbi.gov by going to the Web site and clicking on the link to the Salt Lake City field office." The AP noted, The FBI announced the establishment of the tip line after charges were filed against three employees of a Utah school district."

Jefferson Pursuing Nagin Strategy For Runoff. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/3, Donze) reported, "Accomplishing a feat widely considered impossible, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin managed to get re-elected in May by stitching together an unlikely coalition of working-class black voters and white conservatives. Now…it appears that U.S. Rep. William Jefferson is trying to replicate Nagin's feat, or at least compose a variation on the same theme. … On one hand, Jefferson, for the first time in his long career in public office, is touting his conservative votes in Congress against same-sex marriage and late-term abortions." Meanwhile, he "also has been trotting out his liberal credentials as an outspoken advocate of displaced public housing residents and out-of-work public school teachers and hammering away at the campaign contributions Carter has collected from Republicans." The Times-Picayune noted, "If there was a cloud over Nagin, it was not the thunderhead that hangs over the Jefferson camp. … 'It's hard to outdo an FBI investigation and money in your freezer,' University of New Orleans political science professor Susan Howell said."

The AP (12/4, Burdeau) reports that "Jefferson hunted for votes among churchgoers Sunday as he headed into the final week of a campaign to hold onto his seat and salvage his political fortunes. FBI raids on his homes and his congressional office, including allegations in an FBI affidavit that he hid $90,000 in bribe money in a freezer, have left Jefferson vulnerable for the first time since he won the seat in 1990. … 'It's going to be very competitive,' said Gary Clark, a political science professor at Dillard University. 'There are those who may wish he may lose, but it will take more than wishing. He's a veteran politician and there are those who benefit by his being in office.'"

In New TV Ad, Jefferson Denies Taking Bribe. ABC News' The Blotter (12/1, 11:50 a.m.) reported that Jefferson "has taken to the airwaves to unequivocally deny the allegations that have plagued him for months. 'I have never taken a bribe from anyone,' he asserts in a new campaign ad." Jefferson's opponent, Rep. Karen Carter, "has seized on the probe in her campaign against Jefferson, and recently ran an ad quoting a Washington Post article that said the FBI had caught Jefferson accepting a bribe on videotape. In this latest ad, Jefferson responds by saying that Carter's 'newspaper source got the facts wrong.'"

Memphis Corruption Charges Renew Questions About Race, FBI Probes. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (12/3, Erskine) reported, "When Johnnie R. Turner first heard about the arrests of Memphis City Councilmen Edmund Ford and Rickey Peete last week, it stopped her cold in her tracks. … Turner, executive director of the Memphis branch of the NAACP, said recent public corruption investigations have given citizens the impression that African-American politicians are 'inherently more crooked, and that is not true.'" Memphis FBI spokesman George Bolds "said he understands the race of those charged in recent public corruption cases is an element some people examine. … But Bolds said race by no means is a factor in how the FBI investigates cases. 'We, the FBI, go where the investigation leads us. Race is not a consideration for us.'" The Commercial Appeal adds that white, Republican state Sen. Paul Stanley "said he thinks complaints about racial targeting are nothing more than an excuse. 'The head of the FBI here is an African-American woman,' Stanley said, referring to FBI Special Agent in Charge My Harrison. 'She's just saying, "We're going to go and get you if you've done something wrong."'"

Critics Call For State, Federal Probes Of Prosecutor In Duke Lacrosse Case. The Raleigh News & Observer (12/3, Neff, Blythe, Niolet) reported, "In the war that is the Duke lacrosse case, Mike Nifong's fierce fight will not end with the trial. … Dozens of people, some connected to the accused, have asked the governor and the state attorney general to intervene. Many have complained to the N.C. State Bar," seeking his disbarment. "And a lawyer for one of the indicted players has urged members of Congress to have the U.S. Department of Justice open a civil rights investigation." The News & Observer notes that defendant Collin Finnerty's lawyer, Michael Cornacchia, "wrote to the U.S. attorney general, the FBI director, the congressional delegations of North Carolina and Long Island and others, saying Nifong had violated the civil rights of the three players. … The chances of a federal investigation are unknown; a State Bar investigation is more likely."

NYTimes Applauds Ruling On US Currency And The Blind. The New York Times (12/3, WK11, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "Unlike the currency in 180 other countries, the American greenback comes in one size, and one dominant color — green. That can be so confusing for the 3.3 million Americans who are either blind or have very poor sight that a United States District Court judge in the District of Columbia ruled last week that the government had unlawfully denied them access to the nation's paper money. … Judge James Robertson's opinion makes it clear that the American government simply has not tried very hard to help those Americans who cannot see their money."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

SCOTUS To Hear Two School Desegregation Cases. The Washington Post (12/3, A3, Barnes, 690K) reports, "More than 50 years after the Supreme Court decided in Brown v. Board of Education that separate schools are inherently unequal, the court will consider tomorrow whether race can still be a factor when school systems design programs to promote racial integration. A broadly written decision on Louisville's plan, and on a related one from Seattle, could have a profound impact on school systems across the country. It is the first time in more than a decade that the Supreme Court will consider what is proper for school systems to do to promote desegregation, and it is the first test on the issue for two new justices who in the past have been skeptical about the use of racial classifications."

Newsday (12/3, Brune) reports parents "argue that when a child is denied assignment to a nearby school because of race to achieve a racial balance -- not to remedy past discrimination -- it violates the equal treatment guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. The districts respond that the goal of school integration, and the educational and social benefits that come with it, justifies a careful, limited use of race in deciding where a student should go to school."

The Washington Times (12/3, 88K) reports, "A year ago, Justice O'Connor and her colleagues refused to hear a similar school-diversity challenge from Massachusetts. After Justice Alito's arrival, however, the court surprised many observers by agreeing to hear the appeals."

The San Francisco Chronicle (12/3, Page A1, Egelko) reports, "More than 50 years after the U.S. Supreme Court outlawed racial segregation in public schools, the justices are about to consider whether a school district can voluntarily integrate by considering race in campus assignments." The Chronicle continues, "In cases from Seattle and Louisville, Ky., to be argued Monday, the justices will address the question left unanswered by the Brown vs. Board of Education ruling in 1954: What can the government do when the last vestiges of state-sponsored segregation are erased and schools nevertheless remain racially isolated because of housing patterns, parental choice and perhaps societal discrimination?" The Chronicle adds, "Facing that situation, officials in Seattle installed a system that allowed race to be considered as one of several factors in determining enrollment in popular high schools. In Jefferson County, Ky., which includes Louisville, the school district was once under a court desegregation order, and officials tried to avoid resegregating by setting minimum minority and white populations at each school. … 'Jefferson County housing is substantially segregated along racial lines,' attorney Frances Mellen said in a brief to the court. 'The assignment of all (district) students to 'neighborhood schools' would result in a substantial number of racially segregated schools.' … After the court desegregation order was lifted in 2000, Mellen said, the 97,000-student district concluded the only way it could prevent resegregation was to seek African American enrollment of 15 to 50 percent at each school. The proportion of blacks in the district was 36 percent. … But Teddy Gordon, the attorney for a white woman whose 5-year-old son was assigned to a more distant Louisville school rather than his neighborhood school, said the district's program was 'nothing more than a hard-core, mechanized quota.' … The Bush administration agrees. In papers filed with the court, Solicitor General Paul Clement outlined the administration's position: A district can assign students by race when necessary to make up for its own intentional discrimination, but not to integrate schools that were never deliberately segregated."

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (12/3, Sichko) reports, "The appeals, involving the school districts of Seattle and Louisville, Ky., are the most significant race-related cases the court has heard in several years. The court's ruling, expected in late spring or early summer, could restrict the ways schools pursue integration, said Gary Orfield, director of the Civil Rights Project at Harvard University. … 'The stakes are rising,' Orfield said. 'We're now talking about if the Supreme Court will find plans that were rejected as not enough in 1968 to be too much in 2006.' He said a ban on race-based school assignment aimed at integration would likely lead to 'a significant increase in racial segregation across the country.'" The Post-Dispatch notes, "Critics of Louisville's plan disagree. … 'Our communities have come (a) long way since the segregated days of the '40s and the '50s and on into the '70s,' wrote attorneys for a Louisville parent whose white child was denied a transfer due to desegregation standards. 'There is no going back. We will not turn back the clock,'"

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (12/3), attorney Edward Lazarus writes, "At the start of his first full term on the Supreme Court, Justice Anthony Kennedy weighed a legal challenge to a policy in Richmond, Va., that reserved 10% of the city's contracts for minority-owned businesses (Richmond vs. Croson). At the time, Kennedy was thought to be a potential swing vote on a court deeply riven by its views on affirmative action." Lazarus continues, "The court's liberal wing believed that in light of the nation's racist past, the Constitution's promise of 'equal protection of the laws' permitted — indeed, almost mandated — some degree of minority racial preferences. … . The most conservative justices rallied around the opposite view. To get beyond racism, they contended, it was essential not to perpetuate a 200-plus-year mistake of letting government classify individuals according to race. Under their reading of the equal protection clause, the Constitution morally demanded colorblindness. … Kennedy struggled to find a middle ground. Although uncomfortable with affirmative action (and disdainful of Richmond's program, which the court struck down), Kennedy, siding with the majority, rejected the argument that the Constitution categorically bars government from using race-conscious means to achieve such compelling policy objectives as remedying past discrimination. With respect to affirmative action, Kennedy suggested, the Constitution's answer was not 'never' but 'almost never.'" Lazarus adds, "Eighteen years later, on the eve of the court hearing its first set of affirmative action cases under Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., the battle over racial preferences continues. On the federal level, former President Clinton's "mend it, don't end it" approach remains essentially in place, though in several states, California and Michigan most notably, anti-affirmative action forces have imposed their version of colorblindness. … Inside the court, although some of the players have changed, the justices remain deeply divided about the means for achieving racial equality. And Kennedy has become even more pivotal to the fate of affirmative action."

In his column for the Washington Post (12/3, B7, 690K) George Will writes that Seattle's school district "decided in 2000 that because the son of Jill Kurfirst and the daughter of Winnie Bachwitz are white, they should be assigned to an inferior and distant high school. If they had not left the Seattle school system, this would have required them to rise at 5 a.m. in order to leave home by 5:30 a.m., alone and in the dark, to take the first of three buses, returning home between 8 p.m. and 9 p.m., with almost no time left for homework, family activities and adequate sleep. … Soon -- oral arguments are tomorrow -- the Supreme Court can remind the 9th Circuit of the Constitution's limits on what schools can do in the name of 'diversity.'"

Gay Activists Optimistic Democrats In Congress Will Champion Their Agenda. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, A1, Neuman, 850K) reports, "For the last 12 years of Republican control of Congress, gay-rights organizations set aside their push for legal protections in order to defend against conservative measures such as same-sex marriage bans. With the realignment of the House and Senate next month, gay and lesbian groups say they are tantalizingly close to having enough votes to ensure passage of at least the hate crimes bill, and perhaps the discrimination measure, which once failed in the Senate by one vote." Rep. Barney Frank "said the hate crimes bill had a 'very good chance of going to George Bush's desk … in the first half of the year.' He said the discrimination measure might be further off, noting that Democrats may not want to push for too much too soon."

More Help Sought For Mentally Ill Ex-Convicts. The AP (12/3, Santi) reports, "Larry Lamb has lived a half-century of failures: three stints in New Jersey state prison, four psych ward confinements, drug and alcohol abuse dating back to adolescence, and more time in county lockups than he can count. … A year ago, he began racking up successes." The AP continues, "Lamb, 50, hasn't had a drug-tainted urine sample since he enrolled in an intensive program for mentally ill inmates as he was being released from jail. He's taking antidepressants, keeping appointments with his therapist, working when he can find a job and paying off court-imposed fines from his prior life of crime and homelessness. … Advocates for the mentally ill say Lamb's situation is common among the nation's inmates, 55 percent of whom suffer from a mental health problem, according to a study released in September by the Justice Department's Office of Justice Programs." The AP adds, "Yet, the availability and intensity of mental health services for people in the nation's criminal justice system varies greatly, said Karen Bower, a lawyer with the Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law, a Washington-based group advocating for the rights of the mentally ill. .. A similar disparity in post-incarceration services exists nationally, with some people receiving comprehensive discharge planning before they leave prison or jail, others being offered limited mental health or social services, and some getting none. … Services are severely lacking for those with dual diagnoses, like mental illness and drug dependence, said Bower. In one class-action lawsuit filed by Bazelon in New York, mentally ill parolees are suing for access to chemical addiction programs. A prior suit brought by a mentally ill inmate in New Jersey forced the state to revamp its prison psychiatric programs to replace the practice of segregating inmates whose psychiatric disorders made them disruptive. … Without adequate support, or access to medication and counseling, those discharged or paroled with serious mental illness — defined as schizophrenia, bipolar or major depression — often wind up cycling back through the criminal justice system, Bower said."

Maine Sued For Banning Saucy Beer Labels. The New York Times (12/3, Zezima) reports, "Santa Claus will not be coming to Maine this year, at least not on a beer label, if state officials have their way." The Times continues, "The state's Bureau of Liquor Enforcement in September rejected three beer labels proposed by Shelton Brothers, a Massachusetts beer importer, including one for 'Santa's Butt Winter Porter' that depicts St. Nick from behind, checking a list and drinking a beer, his ample posterior on a wooden barrel." The Times adds, "The bureau said the labels violated a regulation stating that alcohol advertisements cannot contain 'undignified or improper illustrations.' … The Maine Civil Liberties Union sued the bureau on Thursday in Federal District Court in Portland on behalf of Shelton Brothers, claiming that its right to free speech was being violated. .. .One of the other rejected labels, for Rose de Gambrinus, a raspberry lambic beer, depicts a watercolor commissioned by its maker, Cantillon of Belgium, of a nude woman sitting on a person's lap. The third, for Les Sans Culottes French blonde ale, uses Delacroix's 'Liberty Leading the People,' which hangs in the Louvre. …. 'The illustrations on these labels are artistic, and art is entitled to the protection of the First Amendment,' said Zachary Heiden, a staff lawyer with the Maine Civil Liberties Union."

The AP (12/3) reports, "The dispute recalls a similar squabble last year when Connecticut told Shelton Brothers it had problems with its Seriously Bad Elf ale. … 'Last year it was elves. This year it's Santa. Maybe next year it'll be reindeer,' said Daniel Shelton, owner of the company in Belchertown, Mass." The AP adds, "The lawsuit, filed Thursday, contends the state's action violates the First Amendment by censoring artistic expression. … But the state says it's within its rights. The label with Santa might appeal to children, said Maine State Police Lt. Patrick Fleming. The other two labels are considered inappropriate because they show bare-breasted women. … 'We stand by our decision and at some point it'll go through the court system and somebody will make the decision on whether we are right or wrong,' he said."

EU Antitrust Chief Urges Breaking Up Of Large Energy Companies. The AP (12/3, White) reports, "Europe needs to split control of the energy supply chain to stimulate investment and lower prices, European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said last week in a signal that regulators are determined to break up large companies that generate and distribute power. … 'I see only one way forward if we are to restore credibility and faith in the market. Europe needs a structural solution that once and for all separates infrastructure from supply and generation,' she said. .. 'A clear separation of interests between the network operators, energy producers and energy companies is imperative,' she said at Les Mandarins, France's interconnector facility that feeds energy supplies across the English Channel. 'Then we will finally see an end to discrimination, and we will also have laid the ground for a system of proper investment incentives.'" The AP adds, "EU regulators say they have identified fundamental problems with the way Europe's gas and electricity sectors work that could best be tackled by "ownership unbundling" that would force large integrated energy companies such as Germany's E.On to focus on either power generation or supply, selling off other units. … Regulators are scheduled to publish their recommendations on Jan. 10. … Kroes said there are major problems connecting energy from one European country to another, mainly caused by the 'slow pace of investment in infrastructure under the current vertically integrated regime.'"

Former Interior Auditor Takes On Oil Industry Over Royalties. The New York Times (12/3, BU1, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "During a 22-year career, Bobby L. Maxwell routinely won accolades and awards as one of the Interior Department's best auditors in the nation's oil patch, snaring promotions that eventually had him supervising a staff of 120 people. He and his team scrutinized the books of major oil producers that collectively pumped billions of dollars worth of oil and gas every year from land and coastal waters owned by the public. Along the way, the auditors recovered hundreds of millions of dollars from companies that shortchanged the government on royalties." However the Interior Department "eliminated his job in what it called a 'reorganization.' That came exactly one week after a federal judge in Denver unsealed a lawsuit in which Mr. Maxwell contended that a major oil company had spent years cheating on royalty payments." Maxwell "is at the center of an escalating battle with both the oil industry and the Bush administration over how the federal government oversees about $60 billion worth of oil and gas produced every year on federal property. In the process, he has become one of the most nettlesome whistle-blowers Big Oil has ever encountered."

States Seek To Skirt Reinstated Forest Rules. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Boxall, 850K) reports, "The future of some of the West's most unspoiled national forestlands remains in flux more than two months after a federal judge reinstated protections on nearly 50 million acres of backcountry. Nowhere is that uncertainty more in evidence than in Idaho. … In October, shortly after a district court in California restored President Clinton's ban on most road-building and logging in the backcountry, Idaho petitioned the federal government to loosen the restrictions on its 9.3 million roadless acres. Then, at a hearing in Washington last week, Idaho Gov. James E. Risch put a much greener spin on his state's intentions, saying he wanted to honor the Clinton prohibitions. The testimony by Risch, a Republican, not only raised questions, but underscored the degree to which the roadless forest issue remains in play."

Produce Farmers Seek Share Of Federal Agriculture Subsidies. The New York Times (12/3, A1, Barrionuevo, 1.16M), in a front-page story, reports "For decades, the fiercely independent fruit and vegetable growers of California, Florida and other states have been the only farmers in America who shunned federal subsidies, delivering produce to the tables of millions of Americans on their own. But now, in the face of tough new competition primarily from China, even these proud groups are buckling. Produce farmers, their hands newly outstretched, have joined forces for the first time, forming a lobby group intended to pressure politicians over the farm bill to be debated in Congress in January." The Times goes on to report, "The farmers are not asking for the kind of direct subsidies that have been accused of distorting trade and hurting developing countries' agricultural industries. Hoping to avoid a nasty battle with powerful farm-state politicians in the Midwest and Southeast, they are asking instead for money to help market their products at home and overseas, as well as for research and conservation."

Bush Said To Have Worked Frequently Against Free Trade. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (12/3, B2, 690K) Slate's Daniel Gross writes, "Since 2000, Bush Republicans have done as much as Democrats, if not more, to erect trade barriers and tariffs. … In March 2002, for example, Bush proudly signed 'temporary safeguards' that imposed tariffs of 8 percent to 30 percent on most steel imports for three years. … In May 2002, Bush signed the Farm Security and Rural Investment Act, which Republicans passed without much help from Democrats. Just six years after President Bill Clinton signed the 1996 Farm Bill, which slashed agricultural subsidies, Bush jacked up federal payments by as much as 80 percent for cash crops."

Winter Storm Kills At Least 11 In Midwest. NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 4, 2:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "A major storm swept across the country dumping ice and snow in the Midwest, disrupting air travel and leaving thousands without power." NBC (Shamlian): "The storm has moved on but people all over the Midwest are still dealing with it tonight. From clearing downed power lines and trees to rebooking canceled flights, a Midwestern mess in the wake of the season's first major winter storm."

The New York Times/AP (12/3) reports, "The death toll from the Midwest's first big snowstorm of the season rose to 11 as the system blew through the Northeast late Friday and early Saturday." The AP (12/2) reports, "Utility crews worked overtime Saturday to restore electrical service to thousands of customers still blacked out by the Midwest's first big snowstorm of the season."

Climate Change Presents Unprecedented Difficulties For Insurance Industry. The Washington Post's Joel Garreau (12/3, C1) writes, "A place near the water has been an American dream for a very long time. … This is the year, however, in which the big boys in global finance got religion about climate change. As a result, this American dream…is under attack." Garreau adds, "The big buzz in the insurance industry today is climate change. Lloyd's of London's June report is titled: 'Climate Change: Adapt or Bust.' The 2005 hurricane season gave the United States supposedly once-in-a-century storms, one right after the other. Katrina, Rita and Wilma were among the seven most expensive hurricanes ever to hit the country. Companies that had to eat too much of the $51.5 billion in insured losses went under. The big problem with climate change for the insurance companies is not the risk. Their whole business is getting paid to accept risks. The trouble is that their traditional means of calculating what is an acceptable risk -- and how much to charge for it -- is based on history."

FBI Breaking Of New Jersey Gang Was Dangerous, Four-Year Task. Under the headline "How The FBI Took Down A Deadly Jersey Gang," the Newark Star-Ledger (12/3, Martin) reported in a five-thousand word story, "The depth of New Jersey's gang problem dawned on John Havens on a steamy Sunday four years ago as he parked along Ninth Street in Newark. Havens, a 32-year-old FBI agent, had his eyes on a two-story corner house where nearly 50 young men had gathered for a barbecue. One wore a hidden microphone that piped the proceedings to the agent's vehicle. … The Double ii Bloods, as they were called, brought gangs to a new level. They met weekly to discuss business and Blood codes, and to break in members." The Star-Ledger added, "The meeting recorded that afternoon on Ninth Street marked a turning point in the FBI investigation. Dismantling the set would take four more years, testing agents' ability to follow the trail of violence, entangling informants who risked death, and allowing prosecutors for the first time to pursue gangs as organized enterprises with a single purpose: crime." However, the Star-Ledger noted, FBI Newark SAC Leslie Wiser "cautioned: 'Law enforcement is not the answer to the gang problem. No one should make the mistake in thinking that it is.'"

IMMIGRATION:

DOJ Pushes For Deportation Of Former Nazi Guards. The Detroit Free Press (12/3, Ashenfelter) reports, "John Kalymon, Johann Leprich and Iwan Mandycz are old men now, hobbled by the same aches and pains that plague many senior citizens in their 80s. … Only these men are not ordinary senior citizens." The Free Press continues, "In the 1940s, the U.S. Department of Justice says, they helped the Nazi killing machine as it steamrolled across Europe, exterminating millions of people deemed enemies of Adolf Hitler's Third Reich. … As it has in scores of similar cases, the government has gone to court to strip all three metro Detroit men of their U.S. citizenship so they can be deported. .. .But getting rid of them has created a moral, legal and diplomatic dilemma." The Free Press adds, "Their families and neighbors regard them as harmless old men who were victims, forced to choose between the Nazi juggernaut or death. Detroit-area survivors of the Holocaust regard them as tormentors who helped mercilessly kill their loved ones and friends. And the federal government, which is racing to expel them from the country before they die, is having a tough time finding European countries to take them. … Eli Rosenbaum, head of the Justice Department's Nazi-hunting Office of Special Investigations, is mainly concerned about making travel arrangements for the men. … 'Right now, we have six people who we could put on a plane tomorrow,' Rosenbaum said, adding that Leprich is one of the six. … 'In recent years, we've had great difficulty persuading European nations to take these people back,' Rosenbaum said. 'And in some cases, we've hit a brick wall.' … Rosenbaum said many European countries are too embarrassed to take back people they can't prosecute because they lack the laws or the desire to do so."

Academic Claims Immigration Does Not Contribute To Higher Crime Rates. In a piece for the New York Times Magazine (12/3P the Nation's Eyal Press writes, "In an age of Latino gangs and Chinese criminal networks, the notion that communities with growing immigrant populations tend to be unsafe is fairly well established, at least in the popular imagination. … In fact, according to evidence cropping up in various places, the opposite may be the case. Ramiro Martinez Jr., a professor of criminal justice at Florida International University, has sifted through homicide records in border cities like San Diego and El Paso, both heavily populated by Mexican immigrants, both places where violent crime has fallen significantly in recent years. 'Almost without exception,' he told me, 'I've discovered that the homicide rate for Hispanics was lower than for other groups, even though their poverty rate was very high, if not the highest, in these metropolitan areas.' He found the same thing in the Haitian neighborhoods of Miami."

Georgia Legislator's Wife Faces Deportation. The New York Times (12/3, A38, Goodman, 1.16M) reports, "The wife of a Georgia legislator known for his strong support of immigrants' rights is in hiding after federal agents came to their home on Tuesday with an order to deport her to her native Colombia, her lawyer said. In a written statement issued on Wednesday, State Senator Curt Thompson, 37, a Democrat, said his wife, Sascha Herrera, 28, missed an immigration-related court hearing in February 2005. … Because Ms. Herrera did not appear in court, a federal judge issued a deportation order in February 2005."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Leahy Seen As Having Historic Opportunity For DOJ Oversight. The Barre-Montpelier (VT) Times Argus (12/3) editorializes, "Friends and staff of Sen. Patrick Leahy are already talking about the opportunity now before him to establish a legacy that will place him among the most important senators in Vermont history. … It will not be about the pork he is able to secure from his position on the Appropriations Committee or his long-term work for the interests of the state's dairy farmers. It will be his legacy as a defender of the U.S. Constitution." The Times Argus continues, "Leahy has been almost giddy since the elections last month, with the prospect that he will become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. But the challenges before him are serious indeed. … As chairman he will have the power to focus on the numerous ways that the Bush administration has worked to skirt and undermine the constitutional limits on executive power, straying into activities that might be judged illegal or even criminal. A successful effort to rein in the abuses of the Bush administration will place Leahy in the history books alongside Sen. Ralph Flanders of Vermont, who was instrumental in challenging the abuses of Sen. Joseph McCarthy — except Leahy's challenge is even greater and the abuses more serious than those of the senator from Wisconsin whose name has become synonymous with an era of thuggery and paranoia." The Times Argus adds, "Leahy appears to understand what he is up against. Already he has sent letters to the Justice Department renewing numerous requests for information on a variety of programs and activities that are constitutionally dubious. President Bush has promised to foster a spirit of bipartisanship in his dealings with the new Democratic Congress, but so far the Justice Department and the White House show every sign that they will resist Leahy's efforts to let the sun shine on the doings of the federal government. … Leahy will have to focus both on the specifics of administration activities and on the broader legal and political philosophy the administration has offered in its own defense. … It will be important for Leahy to maintain a focus on the legal and constitutional issues at stake: that the United States stands for human rights, the rule of law and a system of checks and balances that applies to the president even in a time of war. The American people will be grateful to him if he can establish that a democracy need not resort to the ruthless, lawless methods of a panicked bully. And Vermonters will remember him among the handful of Vermont's greatest statesmen."

Fetal-Pain Bill Among Few Items On House's Agenda For This Week. The Washington Post (12/3, A4, Weisman, 690K) reports Congress "will convene on Tuesday for what some fear will be the lamest of lame-duck sessions, and GOP leaders have decided to take a minimalist approach before turning over the reins of power to the Democrats. Rather than a final surge of legislative activity, Congress will probably wrap up things after a single, short week of work. They have even decided to punt decisions on annual government spending measures to the Democrats next year. … Republican lawmakers will have met for one week in November, devoted almost exclusively to leadership elections for next year, and one week in December, largely to pick committee assignments, move offices and pass a measure to keep the government operating through February. That will mean this Congress will have spent the least time in session of any in at least half a century." The Post notes that the House has scheduled a vote on Rep. Chris Smith's fetal-pain bill.

GOP Will Attempt To Extend Popular Tax Breaks. The Washington Times/AP (12/3) reports, "Millions of entrepreneurs, teachers and parents with children in college have a financial stake in whether Congress, in the waning hours of Republican rule, revives tax breaks that expired 11 months ago. … The breaks, which expired Jan. 1, enjoy wide support in both parties. Precisely because of this support, lawmakers have sought to add them as a 'sweetener' to contentious legislation in hopes of getting that legislation through." Lawmakers "will take one more shot at the tax bill when they return this week to wrap up their work for the year, but they might not have the time or the will to agree on a compromise."

McConnell Emphasizes His Independence From White House. In the Washington Post (12/3, 690K), David Broder writes, "Ask Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky to name his role models for his responsibilities as Senate minority leader in the next Congress, and the answer is surprising. 'Mike Mansfield and George Mitchell,' he replied the other day. 'I know they're both Democrats, but I admire the way they ran things here.' … When McConnell was asked, during a visit to The Post last week, what obligation he felt toward the current President Bush, he replied, 'I was elected by Senate Republicans, and they are the ones to whom I am responsible.' While emphasizing that he was in 'philosophical agreement' with the president, he clearly sees his role differently than did his predecessor, retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee. Frist was installed in the leadership job with major help from the Bush White House and often appeared to be more the president's liaison to the Senate than the Senate's leader."

Historians Examine Bush's Place In History In WPost Essays. In today's Washington Post (12/3, B1 and B5, 690K) "Outlook" section, five historians consider how history will compare President Bush to his predecessors, devoting more than 5,000 cumulative words to the subject. Their assessments are quite negative.

The harshest, headlined "He's The Worst Ever," comes from Eric Foner of Columbia University, who says the "cronyism, corruption and pro-business bias of the Bush administration" has surpassed that of Presidents Harding and Coolidge, and that while President Nixon "considered himself above the law," Bush "has taken this disdain for law even further." Foner concludes, "It is impossible to say with certainty how Bush will be ranked in, say, 2050. But somehow, in his first six years in office he has managed to combine the lapses of leadership, misguided policies and abuse of power of his failed predecessors. I think there is no alternative but to rank him as the worst president in U.S. history."

Michael Lind of the New America Foundation is only slightly kinder, with his piece headlined "He's Only Fifth Worst." Lind says Presidents Buchanan, Andrew Johnson, Nixon, and Madison adopted policies that "were even more disastrous. … To qualify a president for the Worst of All Time list, a war must be catastrophic as well as unnecessary. … The two big, unjustified wars on my list are the War of 1812 and the current conflict in Iraq."

Tulane University's Douglas Brinkley says it is "dangerous for historians to wield the 'worst president' label like a scalp-hungry tomahawk simply because they object to Bush's record. But we live in speedy times and, the truth is, after six years in power and barring a couple of miracles, it's safe to bet that Bush will be forever handcuffed to the bottom rungs of the presidential ladder. The reason: Iraq. … The problem for Bush is that certitude is only a virtue if the policy enacted is proven correct." However, Bush "is an honest man" and his Administration "has been largely void of widespread corruption. This will help him from being portrayed as a true villain. This last point is crucial. Though Bush may be viewed as a laughingstock, he won't have the zero-integrity factors that have kept Nixon and Harding at the bottom in the presidential sweepstakes."

David Greenberg of Rutgers University also says "At Least He's Not Nixon," writing under that headline that "as the now-flourishing reputations of Truman, Eisenhower and Reagan attest, the antipathy a president elicits from his contemporaries usually fades over time. And as Nixon's still-dismal reputation also attests, in the contest for the dubious title of 'worst president,' Bush faces stiff competition. … However toxic the fallout from Iraq, it's hard to imagine that it could greatly exceed the damage wrought by Vietnam." And "if Bush has given Nixon good chase when it comes to undemocratic hardball politics, he hasn't surpassed the master."

The piece most favorable to Bush comes from Vincent Cannato of the University of Massachusetts, who says "today's pronouncements that Bush is the 'worst president ever' are too often ideology masquerading as history. … There certainly are echoes of Truman in the current carping about Bush." He adds, "No one expects historians to be perfectly objective. But history should at least teach us humility. Time will cool today's political passions. As years pass, more documents will be released, more insights gleaned and the broader picture of this era will be painted. Only then will we begin to see how George W. Bush fares in the pantheon of U.S. presidents."

More Historical Comparisons For Bush. In the Washington Post (12/3, W23, 690K), Joel Achenbach notes that George Will "recently wrote that the Republicans were routed in the November elections because of 'war leadership even worse than during the War of 1812.' … Until recently there were three levels of wartime incompetence: Bad, Very Bad and War of 1812 Bad." After examining the mishaps of that conflict, Achenbach concludes, "maybe in a few years, historians will be able to tell us if there's a new standard."

In his New York Times (12/3, WK12, 1.16M) column, Frank Rich writes of President Bush, "Whatever the reason, he is slipping into the same zone as Woodrow Wilson did when refusing to face the rejection of the League of Nations, as a sleepless L.B.J. did when micromanaging bombing missions in Vietnam, as Ronald Reagan did when checking out during Iran-Contra."

Crisis Management Experts Have Advice For Bush. The Washington Post (12/3, B4, 690K) runs advice on "Presidential Crisis Management" from professionals in that field. Burson Marsteller founder Harold Burson says to President Bush, "I think the American public is very forgiving. The admission that you were on the wrong track and you're changing works well in this country." Crisis management consultant James Lukaszewski says Bush "should prepare America to compassionately welcome all of our troops now in harm's way as they return home, and advocate a plan to help them reenter private life." Crisis communications consultant Helio Fred Garcia advises that "the first two rules of crisis management are: 1) Think clearly; and 2) Take the pain. … Bush's presidency risks being defined by his failure to think clearly or to take the pain." And public relations executive Larry Kamer says, "There's an adage in crisis communications: They don't care that you know until they know that you care. I'm not sure the president's compassion is showing through, and it's hurting his stature and credibility."

Rice In Running For Time "Person Of The Year." CNN (12/2, Whitfield) reported Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "crisscrossing the globe as the diplomatic sands shifts in Iraq and in Washington…lands a nomination as Time magazine's Person of the Tear." Time World Editor Romesh Ratnesar said Rice "has emerged the pivotal figure in the Bush Administration's national security team. As secretary of state, she's come into her own and she's developed a level of influence within administration that I think only the Vice President possibly can match. Her main accomplishment is sort of shifting the rhetoric of the Administration's foreign policy away from this kind of unilateralist, 'with us or against us' approach that we saw first term. And we could see next year or the year after Condoleezza Rice really being thrust to the forefront as the US tries to deal both with managing some kind of withdrawal from Iraq and also dealing with the threats from Iran and North Korea."

Negroponte Plans To Stay On. The Washington Post (12/3, Pincus, 690K) reports Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte, "who had been rumored to be going over to the State Department as deputy secretary, said last week that he plans to remain in his current position through the end of the Bush administration." There had been concern "that Negroponte would leave the newly created position after having assembled a staff from other agencies that now totals 1,200." He said of Secretary-designate Robert Gates, with whom he worked in the Reagan administration, "I look forward very much to working with him again."

Bush Administration Said To Have Loosened Trucking Safety Standards. The New York Times (12/3, A1, Labaton, 1.16M) reports that lawsuits against trucking companies involved in fatal crashes may determine "whether the Bush administration's decision to reject tighter industry regulation and instead reduce what officials viewed as cumbersome rules permitted a poorly trained trucker to stay behind the wheel, alone, instead of resting after a long day of driving. After intense lobbying by the politically powerful trucking industry, regulators a year earlier had rejected proposals to tighten drivers' hours and instead did the opposite, relaxing the rules on how long truckers could be on the road. … Government officials had also turned down repeated requests from insurers and safety groups for more rigorous training for new drivers." According to the Times, "Federal officials…have dismissed the assertion that deregulation has reduced safety and have maintained that in fact it has helped. … In loosening the standards, the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration was fulfilling President Bush's broader pledge to free industry of what it considered cumbersome rules. In the last six years, the White House has embarked on the boldest strategy of deregulation in more than a generation."

Bush-Webb Meeting Caused "Tense Moment" At White House. CNN's Lou Dobbs This Week (12/2, Pilgrim) reported, "A tense moment at the White House between President Bush and the newly elected senator from Virginia, Jim Webb, this week. Webb is a highly decorated Vietnam veteran and his son is serving in Iraq with the Marine Corps. The President and Webb met at a White House reception." CNN (Schneider) continued, "Jim Webb became a Democrat and ran for the Senate for one big reason: Iraq. … Webb has special credibility on Iraq. He was a military officer who served in Vietnam, a former secretary of the Navy under President Reagan, and he has a son serving in Iraq. He wore his son's old combat boots during the campaign." The White House "incident is causing a lot of tut-tutting in Washington. A Democratic Senate staffer told the Post, 'I think Webb is going to be a total pain. He's going to do things his own way.' … Webb's confrontation is a striking contrast to pictures of Democrats meeting with President Bush and pledging cooperation and bipartisanship."

Firm Tied To CDC's Gerberding Obtained Noncompetitive Contracts. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/3, Young, 379K) reports, "It began when a prominent Atlanta business leader introduced Dr. Julie Gerberding to a man who wanted to be her free management adviser, to help her transform operations at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Now the agency is scrambling to explain the gyrations it used to give $10 million in business without competition to a consulting firm associated with and recommended by CDC director Gerberding's free adviser. A CDC public relations risk-management analysis obtained by The Atlanta Journal-Constitution identified several 'threats' to the agency, including 'significant procurement mistakes' and an 'inappropriately backdated' contract document. … And an explanation offered late Friday by CDC officials appears to illustrate questionable practices that experts say are designed to award contracts to favored companies, denying others the opportunity to compete and taxpayers the assurance that the government is paying a fair price."

Researcher May Get More Funding For Controversial Gulf War Syndrome Work. On its front page, the Washington Post (12/3, Brown, 690K) reports that "even though most other scientists long ago discounted his theories," a Texas epidemiologist "is in line to get as much as $75 million in federal funding to press his studies of 'Gulf War syndrome.'" Robert Haley has already received $16 million thanks to "his backers in Congress and the Pentagon. … Haley and his supporters, who also include a powerful cluster of veterans and government advisers, are undeterred by the scientific consensus against him. As recently as September, a panel of the National Academy of Science's Institute of Medicine reached the same conclusion that half a dozen other expert groups had: Gulf War syndrome does not exist."

Transportation Department Touts Findings On Seat-Belt Usage. The Washington Times (12/3, Price, 88K) reports, "Fewer Americans are wearing seat belts compared with last year, but usage continues to be higher in states where motorists can be pulled over solely because they are not wearing a safety belt, a new federal study shows. Seat-belt use climbed from 58 percent in 1994 to 81 percent this year. It reached an all-time high in 2005 at 82 percent, according to a report released last week by the Department of Transportation."

"Paternalistic" Legislation Said To remain Unpopular In The US. The New York Times Magazine's Jim Holt (12/3) writes, "When the government tells you that you can't smoke marijuana or that you must wear a helmet when you ride your motorcycle even if you happen to like the feeling of the wind in your hair, it is being paternalistic. It is largely treating you the way a parent treats a child, restricting your liberty for what it deems to be your own good. Paternalistic laws aren't very popular in this country."

NYTimes Recommends Ethics Reforms Measures For New Congress. The New York Times (12/3, WK11, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "Even before the new Congress arrives, there is disquieting talk of advance compromises on what will be done — or not done. … Once the new year begins, any feeling of urgency will fade, replaced by a determination to acquire, and protect, whatever power and turf are available. At a minimum, the reforms must include: Creation of a public integrity office to do more than merely audit lobbyists' filings. … An enforceable ban, with penalties, on all meals, gifts and travel — not just from lobbyists, but also from the organizations that hire them. … Restraints on the revolving-door horde of Congressional alumni turned backslapping lobbyists. … Detailed disclosure of costly and undebated 'earmarks.'"

OTHER NEWS:

Housing Prices Continue To Decline. NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 10, 2:50, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported that "for those thinking of buying a house or those trying to sell one, if you're waiting for a change in the current trend, you may have to wait a while." NBC (Seigenthaler): "For the first time in eight months, existing home sales increased slightly this week, but in part because of plummeting prices which dropped 3.5% -- the biggest decline since 1990. Meanwhile interest rates on a 30-year fixed loan fell to 6.14%, the lowest in nearly a year."

Inflation Concerns Fail To Raise Bond Rates. The New York Times (12/3, BU6, De Aenlle, 1.16M) reports, "If you look at bond yields and economic reports like one on Friday that showed weakness in manufacturing, you may not think" inflation is resurgent, but "other evidence may be more worrisome. Economic growth and inflation often go hand in hand. Some recent reports have shown a bit of resilience in the housing market and an upward revision to the calculation of third-quarter economic output. Plainly spelling out the risks, Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, said in a speech last week that inflation remained 'uncomfortably high.' None of this has lifted rates on 10-year Treasury notes, which yield less than 4.5 percent, versus short-term rates above 5 percent."

Narrowing Gender Pay Gap Attributed To Erosion Of Men's Wages. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "Women are closing in on men when it comes to wages, but not for the reasons anticipated — or hoped for — when gender pay equity became a rallying cry in the 1970s. Data show that the pay gap has been narrowing not because women have made great strides, labor experts say, but because men's wages are eroding. The disparity in median hourly pay between men and women narrowed to 18.3% in August from 21.5% five years earlier, according to recently released census figures. In addition, the U.S. Labor Department noted recently that the wage differential in 2005 was the smallest since the department began tracking it 33 years ago, when it was 36.9%. … The difference between men's and women's median annual earnings shrank between 2000 and 2005 from 26.3% to 23%, or 77 cents on each dollar earned by men. Women earned an average $31,858 and men $41,386."

Employers Said To Prize Former Autoworkers. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Huffstutter, 850K) reports, "After decades of being kicked around by foreign competitors and laid off by the hundreds of thousands by their U.S. employers, the autoworker has unexpectedly become one of the hottest commodities in industrial America. .. For employers outside the Rust Belt, the bounty of former autoworkers is pure gold. For generations, these workers have epitomized the industrial work ethic, putting in long hours on often mind-numbing tasks involving complex machinery."

Privacy Concerns Stymie Health Information Technology Drive. The New York Times (12/3, BU1, Freudenheim, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "Powerful forces are lobbying hard for government and private programs that could push the nation's costly and inefficient health care system into the computer age. President Bush strongly favors more use of health information technology. Health insurance and medical device companies are eager supporters, not to mention technology companies like I.B.M. and Google. Furthermore, Intel and Wal-Mart Stores have both said they intend to announce plans this week to embrace electronic health records for their employees. ... Bills to speed the adoption of information technology by hospitals and doctors have passed both chambers of Congress. But the legislation has bogged down, largely because of differences over how to balance the health care industry's interest in efficiently collecting, studying and using data with privacy concerns for tens of millions of ordinary Americans."

Progress On Stem Cell Research Slower Than Some Expected. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Engel, 850K) reports, "Two years after California voters authorized $3 billion in bonds to fund stem cell research, the institute created to oversee the enterprise has just begun what experts see as a long and slow scientific journey. Even with the $150-million state loan approved recently to kick-start work stalled by legal challenges, there are no breakthroughs in sight. Gone are the allusions to healing such afflictions as spinal cord injuries and Parkinson's and Alzheimer's diseases that dominated the 2004 campaign for Proposition 71. In fact, scientists say, there is no guarantee of cures — certainly not any time soon — from the measure that was optimistically titled the California Stem Cell Research and Cures Act."

US Said To Be Moving Inexorably Towards National Health Care. In a piece for the New York Times (12/3, BU4, 1.16M) Slate's Daniel Gross writes, "When Democrats assume control of Congress next month, they may be dusting off some long-dormant proposals on how to deal with the growing disconnect between health insurance and employment. … Any efforts to expand government's role in providing insurance will likely be opposed by the Bush administration, which says it opposes excessive direct government involvement in an industry that constitutes about 14 percent of the gross domestic product. Michael O. Leavitt , the secretary of health and human services, recently dismissed a proposal to have the government negotiate drug prices for the Medicare benefit, arguing that 'it's a surrogate for a much larger issue, which is really government-run health care.' While the administration may oppose government-run health care in principle, the government's role in the vast health industry has been expanding. By various measures, the United States is about halfway toward a system in which the government and taxpayers fully fund health care. And trends are pushing the government to become more involved each year."

Clinton Signals Presidential Run Likely In Meetings With New York Democrats. Deep inside the A section, the New York Times (12/3, A45, Healy, 1.16M) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton "has begun a calculated series of meetings with top New York Democratic officials to signal that she is likely to run for the presidency in 2008 and to ask for their support if she does, according to one state Democratic official who spoke with her and two others who have been briefed on her plans." Clinton met with Rep. Charles Rangel, "dean of the New York Congressional delegation," this week, and also spoke with New York Democratic Party Chairman Herman D. Farrell Jr., who "confirmed that Senator Clinton briefed him on her 2008 intentions; Mr. Rangel declined to describe their conversation." Clinton's "maneuvering comes at a time of growing speculation about a hard-fought contest for the Democratic presidential nomination between her and another possible hopeful," Sen. Barack Obama.

Clark, Edwards Carry 2004 Campaign Debts As They Eye 2008. The AP (12/2) reports possible presidential candidates Wesley Clark and John Edwards "have debts of several hundred thousand dollars from their unsuccessful White House bids in 2004, a burden as they consider presidential runs in 2008." At the end of September,

Edwards had "about $2,200" in his campaign account and more than $300,000 in debt. Clark "had about $390,000 left from the last campaign and debts totaling more than $260,000."

No Texans Among Large Crop Of 2008 Presidential Hopefuls. Cox News Service (12/2, Herman) looks at the "Texas-sized hole in the crowded field of candidates" for the White House in 2008, writing that among 24 potential candidates, Texas, "the Land of the Big Ego, has none, zilch, nada. … Nothing personal against the state, observers say, noting instead that Texas, for once, is short on candidates of presidential caliber." Gov. Rick Perry and Sens. John Cornyn and Kay Bailey Hutchison are not "presidential contenders. Hutchison, however, gets mentions as a potential vice presidential candidate, especially if the Democrats nominate New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and the GOP feels pressured to put a woman on the ticket." But Hutchison "could be a tough sell to the GOP's social conservative base because of her support for abortion rights before a fetus is viable outside the womb."

Dean Says Democrats Must Avoid Post-Victory Complacency. The New York Times (12/3, A38, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports DNC Chairman Howard Dean, addressing the party's executive committee, warned Democrats "not to revel too long in the victories from last month's midterm elections or treat their Congressional majorities as a permanent directive from voters." Dean said, "The other party made mistakes in the past claiming that elections are mandates. Elections are not mandates. The voters of this country loaned the Democrats the power of the country for two years. Now it's our job to earn it back again." The AP (12/2, Lester) reports Dean added, "George Bush made a huge mistake by representing half of America, while treating the rest of us with contempt. We need to reach out to everybody whether they agree with us or not."

Denver Makes Bid For 2008 Democratic Convention. The New York Times (12/3, A36, Johnson, 1.16M) examines Denver's bid to host the 2008 Democratic National Convention. If Denver bests the other contender, New York, it will be the first convention in the city since Democrats nominated William Jennings Bryan there in 1908. If Denver "prevails this time -- a decision is expected by the end of the year -- party members from around the country say it will probably be by virtue of a polished and highly organized effort to turn the city's lemons into lemonade. A new location, Denver's convention-bid organizers have argued to the party hierarchy, is precisely what the Democrats need."

Romney Deal Will Let Massachusetts Police Arrest Illegal Immigrants. The Boston Globe (12/3, A1, Levenson, Saltzman, 413K) reports Gov. Mitt Romney "has reached an agreement with federal authorities that allows the Massachusetts State Police to arrest immigrants who are in the state illegally." Critics said the agreement "would lead to racial profiling and foster mistrust of the police in communities with large numbers of immigrants. The deal, reached in the final days of Romney's administration, also sets up a potential conflict with Governor-elect Deval L. Patrick, who has expressed strong opposition to granting the State Police such powers."

Schwarzenegger Raising Big Money For Inaugural. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Nicholas, 850K) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "is keeping his fundraising operation at full throttle, asking donors to pay for a stylish inauguration and seeing to it that he continues to fly private jets and stage public appearances worthy of a Hollywood celebrity." Schwarzenegger's political team "has approached Chevron Corp., PG&E, Blue Cross of California, AT&T and other businesses, asking for tens of thousands of dollars to pay for a two-day celebration surrounding his Jan. 5 inauguration."

Ehrlich Urges Maryland Republicans To Unite. The Washington Times (12/3, Miller, 88K) reports outgoing Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich "called for Republican unity yesterday at the state convention, where the selection of party chairman revealed divisions within the party after last month's widespread election defeats." Ehrlich said, "The hard left is in firm control of the state, and we don't have the votes to stop them. That's not the fate of Maryland in the long term. It's just where we are today." Ehrlich said the GOP "should not 'whine' or play 'Monday-morning quarterback' about election losses that restored Democrats almost complete control of state government."

Ehrlich Cameos As State Trooper On HBO's "The Wire." The Washington Post (12/3, D3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) "Reliable Source" column reports that HBO will tonight "air an episode of the gritty Baltimore-based crime-and-politics drama 'The Wire'" in which Ehrlich "cameos as -- stay with us, here -- a trooper on security detail for the show's fictional governor of Maryland." When producers "called offering a speaking role, Ehrlich jumped at the chance. 'He's a huge fan of the show,' said spokeswoman Shareese DeLeaver."

Virginia Episcopal Bishop Threatens Breakaway Churches. The Washington Times (12/3, A1, Duin, 88K) reports Virginia Episcopal Bishop Peter J. Lee "is threatening to sue conservative Episcopal churches that soon will vote on whether to leave his diocese, saying individual members of each congregation's governing board will be liable. … Thousands of Episcopalians already have left the 2.2 million-member denomination over arguments about biblical authority and the 2003 consecration of New Hampshire Bishop V. Gene Robinson, an active homosexual."

California Diocese Moves Toward Break From Episcopal Church. The AP (12/2) reports, "In a rebuke of the Episcopal Church, a conservative diocese voted Saturday to affirm its membership in the worldwide Anglican Communion after distancing itself from the national church over the ordination of gays and women. San Joaquin, California, Bishop John-David Schofield called it a first step toward a formal break with the U.S. Anglican denomination." The New York Times (12/3, A30, Goodstein, Marshall, 1.16M) also reports on the decision by the California diocese.

Middle East Allies Said To Showcase "Soaring Concern" Over Administration Policies. Under the headline, "Mideast Allies Near A State Of Panic," the Los Angeles Times (12/3, Richter, 850K) reports President Bush "and his top advisors fanned out across the troubled Middle East over the last week to showcase their diplomatic initiatives to restore strained relationships with traditional allies and forge new ones with leaders in Iraq. But instead of flaunting stronger ties and steadfast American influence, the president's journey found friends both old and new near a state of panic." The Administration's interlocutors "expressed soaring concern over upheavals across the region that the United States helped ignite through its invasion of Iraq and push for democracy — and fear that the Bush administration may make things worse." Trips by Bush, Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice were "designed to show the American team in charge," but "ended instead in diplomatic embarrassment and disappointment, with U.S. leaders rebuked and lectured by Arab counterparts."

Hezbollah Supporters Continue Peaceful Siege Of Beirut. Reporting continues this morning on the protests by Hezbollah supporters in Beirut seeking the resignation of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora's government. The McClatchy Newspapers (12/3, Lasseter) reports, "A siege on Lebanon's American-backed government continued Saturday with tens of thousands of demonstrators … packing downtown Beirut." They "filled the roads surrounding the center of Beirut, … effectively shutting down the capital. Hezbollah gave every indication that it is prepared for the long haul: setting up long rows of tents, portable bathrooms and handing out cups of water and sandwiches."

CNN (12/2, Sadler) reported, "Thousands of government opponents pour into downtown Beirut, the commercial heart of the city paralyzed by noisy but peaceful protests. Scores of large canvas tents suggest they could be here for a long time. The opposition is led by Hezbollah, the armed militant group that fought Israel during the recent war in Lebanon, now waging this political war with words. For now, the opposition is promoting a festive mood of relentless song and dance to try to topple the western-backed government, ridiculing their political adversaries. But a ring of steel protects the Prime Minister's office complex, guarded by troops and armored vehicles in case words turn to war."

The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Stack, 850K) adds, "The massive sit-in staged by Hezbollah supporters so far has done little to dislodge the U.S.-backed government, but it has managed to turn the Lebanese capital inside out — literally." Shiite Muslims, who tend to be "some of the poorest and most marginalized people in the country," are leaving "their homes in suburban slums to camp out on the nation's priciest bit of real estate. Though they often have trudged through Lebanese history as war refugees, now they have managed to displace Lebanon's wealthiest shop owners."

The New York Times (12/3, Slackman, 1.16M) says Beirut "remained paralyzed and shuttered… The atmosphere remained festive, almost joyous, though, as protesters emerged from tents pitched in empty lots and chanted slogans, banged drums and appeared to dig in for a long stay." During the protests, "rumors abounded about what Hezbollah and its alliance, which includes the Christian Free Patriotic Movement, might be planning to escalate the conflict further. There has been talk about blocking roads and members of Parliament resigning en masse."

NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 6, 0:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Beirut, another day of protests. Thousands of supporters of the Hezbollah-led opposition took to the streets, though far fewer than yesterday. They're trying to bring the US-backed government there."

A 2,500-word story on the front page of the Washington Post (12/3, Shadid, 690K) reports, "In a city of frontiers, Beirut built another border Saturday. … Long divided by the Christian east and largely Muslim west of its 15-year civil war, Beirut is a city snarled today by far more numerous boundaries of sect, perspective and ideology, intersecting and tangling across a capital and country wrestling with a question still unanswered since independence more than 60 years ago: What is Lebanon's identity?" That series of "fault lines tell the story of the struggle underway between the country's two camps, divided by past and present, with vastly different visions of Lebanon's future: on one side Hezbollah, supported by Iran and Syria, and on the other the government, backed by the United States and France. The fault lines tell, too, of an impasse that perhaps can't be broken."

The Washington Times (12/3, Razzouk, 88K) adds Siniora's Cabinet "vowed not to cave in to calls to resign after a massive demonstration led by the pro-Syrian group Hezbollah, as protesters camped outside government offices." The protesters "tightened the political deadlock in the country, which has been nearly paralyzed because of a fierce struggle for supremacy between pro- and anti-Syrian camps within the power-sharing regime." Parliamentary Majority Leader Saad Hariri "vowed that 'the Siniora government will not fall because of pressure from the street. However long they continue their protest, it will not fall.'"

Palestinian PM Rejects PLO Call For His Resignation. The AP (12/3, Laub) reports Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh "rejected demands that his Hamas-led government resign and called for the resumption of talks to form a national unity government with the Fatah Party." Haniyeh was responding to a PLO statement on Friday asking him "to step down to make way for a new premier who could resume talks with" President Mahmoud Abbas. A Hamas spokesman "said the call for Haniyeh's resignation amounted to 'a coup.'"

Supporters Of Sunni Government Win Bahraini Election. The AP (12/3) says yesterday's parliamentary election in Bahrain "reinforced sectarian divisions between Shiites and Sunnis and witnessed a deepening Islamic conservatism in the U.S. ally, considered among the most liberal of Gulf Arab states." Government supporters including "Islamic hardliners" defeated parties representing the opposition Shiite majority, who "have long complained they are squeezed out of power by the Sunni monarchy." The returns "gave a sweeping victory to hard-liners from both of Islam's chief branches who bulldozed challenges by progressive candidates and women. Twelve of the 22 pro-government winners were hardliners."

In Washington Visit, Yanukovych Seeks To "Renovate His Image." Under the headline, "Ukraine PM Aims To Mend Fences With U.S.," the AP (12/3, Bellaby) previews today's arrival in Washington of Ukrainian Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych. "He was cast by critics as the Russian-backed bad guy during Ukraine's Orange Revolution two years ago, the burly politician who almost stole the presidential election from the pro-Western leader Viktor Yushchenko." Now, Yanukovych "says he hopes to renovate his image in the West during his meetings with U.S. officials," likely to include Vice President Cheney and Secretaries Rice and Bodman." He "has tried not to overtly antagonize the West. For instance, while delaying Ukraine's membership bid into NATO, he does support continuing cooperation with the alliance. On Tuesday, he called the U.S. 'a strategic partner of Ukraine.'" Yanukovych "is trying to improve his soft powers along with his hard-nosed political moves."

Jockeying For Putin's Endorsement In 2008 Underway. In a 1,400-word piece, the Los Angeles Times (12/3, Holley, 850K) describes Russian President Vladimir Putin's role in selecting his successor. The "buzz" in Moscow "is that" First Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev and Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov "are the leading contestants in a competition to be [Putin's] anointed successor when his second term expires in 2008." The Times adds, "With Putin enjoying popularity ratings above 70% and holding ever greater centralized power, a presidential endorsement is widely seen here as key to succeeding him. That means the current contest among Medvedev, Ivanov and other potential candidates for the big man's nod may well prove more crucial than the 2008 election in determining Russia's course."

Litvinenko's "World Of Deceptions" Detailed. A front-page story in the New York Times (12/3, A1, Cowell, 1.16M) details the final decade of the life of Alexander Litvinenko, the former KGB agent and critic of Vladimir Putin who died of polonium-210 poisoning last week in London. His career "began in the roller-coaster politics and self-enrichment of post-Soviet Russia, spanned his desperate flight from Russia through Turkey and then on to Britain to seek asylum. It ended spectacularly and mysteriously… After Mr. Litvinenko's death, sketchy facts and abundant speculation unfolded like some lost chapter of the cold war. But unlike those days of East-West division and the half-light of shadowy, underground conflicts, this saga played out in the bright glare of newspaper headlines and 24-hour news channels." A separate New York Times (12/3, WK4, Myers, 1.16M) piece entitled, "There's A Reason Russians Are Paranoid," details some of the popular Russian reaction to – and theories about – Litvinenko's death.

NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 8, 2:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Authorities are still trying to figure out who is responsible for the radiation poisoning death of a former Russian spy." NBC (Colt): "Winter is coming to Moscow. Difficult times lie ahead and it's not just the change of the seasons. Russia is finding itself in the hot glare of an international inquiry into the radiation killing of Alexander Litvinenko in London last week."

On its front page, the Washington Times (12/3, Rayment, 88K) carries reporting by the London Sunday Telegraph that "the Russian intelligence services, prime suspects in [Litvinenko's death], have a network of more than 30 spies operating in Britain. The sophisticated ring represents the greatest espionage threat facing Britain." That "startling intelligence was presented last week to Cabinet ministers at a meeting of Cobra, the anti-terrorist task force." Russian operatives in the UK "are known to be monitoring the movements and activities of Russian emigres and opponents of Russian President Vladimir Putin," and "are involved in a widespread operation targeting businessmen, members of Parliament and scientists in an attempt to steal commercial and state secrets." Recent estimates place the UK second only to the US for unknowingly hosting Russian agents.

Castro Absent From Massive Parade In His Honor. The McClatchy Newspapers (12/3, Robles) reports, "In a clear signal that Cuba's post-Castro era has begun, an ailing Fidel Castro failed to appear at a massive military parade in his honor Saturday while his brother and designated successor delivered an inaugural speech of sorts." McClatchy adds, "Many Cuba-watchers had expected Fidel to make his first public appearance at the parade since" July, and his "absence was certain to fuel U.S. reports that he suffers from terminal cancer and likely will not live past 2007." Raul Castro "renewed his willingness to negotiate an end to the almost 50 years of animosity between Washington and Havana. But on his own terms."

NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 5, 2:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Cuba, thousands turned out today for a major military parade paying tribute to Fidel Castro who was expected to appear but at the last minute, he didn't show up. His absence once again raises questions about his health and his ability to lead." NBC (Potter): "The public salute to his brother from Raul Castro today did little to cheer the crowd. Thousands had gathered, hoping to finally see the ailing Fidel Castro -- ailing Fidel Castro. But at a parade in have a Havana, he once again failed to appear with no explanation."

The AP (12/3, Snow) says yesterday's event is "raising questions about whether the ailing leader will ever return to power as his public absence begins taking on a tone of permanence." Raul's address "reached out to the U.S. government," and he "did not explain the absence of his brother."

Under the headline, "A Rare Silence Reverberates In Castro's Long Goodbye," the New York Times (12/3, Lacey, 1.16M) notes, "In his day, Fidel Castro could not stop talking. He was Cuba's talk show host as well as its president," but now he "is silent, leaving a gap on state-run broadcasts and confused audiences." His absence yesterday "left many Cubans convinced that their leader of nearly half a century had delivered his final speech." The Times adds that Fidel's "Cuba is very much a work in progress."

The Washington Post (12/3, A20, Roig-Franzia, 690K) reports, "There were no guarantees that [Fidel] would surface. Just rumors and whispers, whispers and rumors. The sounds of Havana wrestling with its greatest modern mystery trickled out of faded doorways and clattered off the chipped facades of this gracefully decaying capital." In the end, "the man they had all come to see never showed up. Castro remained hidden away, his illness shrouded in mystery, his whereabouts a jealously guarded state secret. … Many Cubans expected the uncertainty about Fidel Castro to be cleared up Saturday. But the day ended with more confusion."

The January/February 2007 edition of Foreign Affairs has a 6,200-word essay by Julia Sweig of the Council on Foreign Relations that argues that "with or without Fidel, renewed U.S. efforts to topple the revolutionary regime in Havana can do no good -- and have the potential to do considerable harm."

Pinochet Stricken By Heart Attack. The AP (12/3, Gallardo) reports former Chilean leader Augusto Pinochet, 91, "was hospitalized early Sunday after suffering a heart attack and is in serious but stable condition, the Santiago Military Hospital said." Pinochet spokesman Guilleremo Garin "said the former strongman was undergoing 'thorough medical tests. It's a heart condition. That's all we know now.'"

Robust Venezuelan Economy Absent From Campaign Rhetoric. In continuing coverage of the run-up to today's Venezuelan presidential vote, the New York Times (12/3, A8, Romero, 1.16M) notes, "To understand why Hugo Chávez seems set for victory … and a strengthened mandate for what he calls a socialist revolution, consider the vigor" of the Caracas stock exchange. "Often lost in the campaigning between Mr. Chávez and his electoral challenger, Manuel Rosales, is that Venezuela, with the largest conventional petroleum reserves outside the Middle East, is having one of the most significant oil booms in its history." While Chavez is known for "wrapping" his presidency "in socialist imagery," the Times says he "has made this expansion possible by quietly working with Venezuela's banking system." In the election campaign, neither Chavez nor Rosales "seems to acknowledge the growing consumerism in rich and poor households as one of the main reasons Mr. Chávez has resilient popularity ratings after eight years as president."

The Washington Post (12/3, A21, Forero, 690K)'s pre-election report focuses on the growing ties between Chavez and some business owners. There are "a growing number of business leaders who reject the doom-and-gloom scenario and see something else entirely in Venezuela's free-spending government: opportunity." The "economy has evolved into one marked by contradictions: the highest growth rate in the Americas and grinding underemployment, out-of-control consumerism and a lack of investment, troubling uncertainty and golden prospects." However, the status quo "seems to have been very good to a new class of entrepreneurs in Venezuela who have either allied themselves with the government or found a way to have a cordial relationship. Many of them have secured lucrative government contracts, and the opposition has dubbed them the Boliburguesia, short for the Bolivarian bourgeoisie."

The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Kraul, 850K) adds, "The United States had better get used to its Latin American nemesis, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. If, as expected, he wins reelection to a new six-year term today, he says he will seek a change in the constitution that would enable him to serve indefinitely." The Times says Rosales' "only hope of victory lies in capturing large numbers of undecided voters."

Philippine Mudslides, Sparked By Typhoon, Could Claim 700. NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 7, 0:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In the Philippines tonight, mudslides have covered whole villages. The rivers of mud were triggered by a typhoon which blasted ashore with winds at more than 150 miles per hour. At least 300 people are dead with another 300 still missing." The AP (12/2) adds, "Hopes virtually vanished Sunday for finding survivors."

African Entrepreneurs Forsake Local Manufacturing For Trade With China. A lengthy background piece in today's Washington Post (12/3, A23, Timberg, 690K) notes the growing economic links between China and Africa. One family's "shift, from manufacturing to trading, mirrors a broader one across Nigeria and much of Africa. A 30-year experiment in building local factory capacity has faltered with declining trade barriers and rising global competition, most powerfully from China. African business leaders increasingly are staking their fortunes on old-fashioned extractive industries, such as oil production needed to fuel Asian industry, while also attempting to profit from the flood of finished goods coming in return."

China Cautioned Against Continuing "Blame Game" On Environmental Degradation. The Council on Foreign Relations' Elizabeth Economy titles her Washington Post (12/3, B7, 690K) op-ed, "A Blame Game China Needs To Stop." China is unlikely "to adopt tough new energy and environmental standards," and puts most "of the blame for the country's mounting environmental problems squarely on the shoulders of foreigners and, in particular, multinational companies." The "climate issue has focused the world's attention not only on China's contribution to global warming but also on its role as the largest contributor to a range of other global environmental problems such as ozone depletion, the illegal timber trade and marine pollution." China should not risk trade and "its own environmental future" for the "short-term and largely illusory benefits of playing an environmental blame game."

Canada's Liberals Elect Dion Leader. Major media report on the Canadian Liberals' election of professor Stephane Dion as their leader. The New York Times (12/3, Austen, 1.16M) calls it "a surprising outcome," saying Michael Ignatieff's "lack of connections both within the Liberal Party and Canada in general seemed to play a role in his defeat." Dion promised to "move back into campaign mode almost immediately and try to lead the party back to power through a general election that may come as early as spring."

The AP (12/3, Duff-Brown) describes Dion as "a former environment minister who criticized the conservative prime minister for modeling himself after President Bush." He "was part of the team of Liberals under former Prime Minister Jean Chretien who opposed the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003 and turned down Washington's request to join."

BBC.com (12/3) notes its local reporter "says the election was a nail-biter, as 5,000 delegates struggled to decide who was most likely to beat the Conservatives." Dion's victory speech "made clear he would make the Kyoto Protocol on curbing greenhouse gases a key part of the strategy to win the next elections." The Washington Post (12/3, A21, Struck, 690K) says the vote "underscored the rising political weight of climate change issues."

In Turkey Trip, Benedict May Have Broached New Ground In Papacy. The New York Times (12/3, WK1, Fisher, 1.16M) reviews Pope Benedict XVI's trip to Turkey, asking if he's "gone wobbly?" Noting that Benedict "has stood for a remarkably clear idea: there is truth, and we won't retreat from it," the Times says in Turkey "the face of confrontation, and perhaps the hold on certainty, seemed to soften." Accordingly, "a new and ever more interesting chapter in this young papacy, as well as in the larger issue of how to engage the Muslim world, including those elements of it that resort to violence, seemed to open on Benedict's four days in Turkey." While some analysts are asking if Benedict "has somehow gone soft," other experts "put the question another way: can one's idea of truth be expressed differently, especially when reality gets in the way?"

Under the headline, "German Turks Ask Where They Fit Now," a separate New York Times (12/3, WK14, Landler, 1.16M) piece says Benedict's "message fell short of a full embrace; he never, for example, dropped his definition of Europe as a place with a Christian history. Such ambiguity about welcoming Turkey and Islam into Europe is felt deeply across the continent, and it turns out that the Turks who have migrated [to Berlin] mirror it. They feel part of Germany and Europe, and yet never fully welcomed."

NYTimes Pans EU Stalling On Turkish Accession. The New York Times (12/3, 1.16M) editorializes, "The strained relationship between Europe and Turkey took two steps forward last week and, we fear, at least that many backward." Benedict's "efforts at conciliation may be undercut if the European Union [decides] to freeze part of the negotiating program for Turkey's membership unless Turkey opens its ports to shipping from Cyprus." The Times says such a move "looked like another ploy to keep Turkey out of the union." Saying the EU must "press the Greek Cypriots to settle" the conflict there, the Times notes "Europe and all of the West have a lot to gain" from Turkish membership. The Times concludes that it "would be a strong sign that the West truly believes its claims of tolerance and respect for all religions."

German Government Will Ask Parliament To Ban Some Smoking In Public. The New York Times (12/3, A8, Landler, 1.16M) reports, "Yielding grudgingly to the growing European campaign against smoking in public places, Germany announced Friday that it would seek to ban smoking in restaurants, discos, schools and other public buildings, but not in pubs, bars or beer tents." The deal "would bring this country, Europe's biggest tobacco market, closer to its neighbors in curtailing public smoking. But it would fall short of the recent laws passed by Britain, France, Ireland and Italy, which stamp out cigarettes in pubs and bars as well as other public places."

NYTimes Chides World Community's Lack Of "Urgency" On AIDS. The New York Times (12/3, WK11, 1.16M) editorializes, "Despite all the lofty goals set by world leaders, and billions of dollars thrown into the fight to quench the global AIDS pandemic in recent years, it is discouraging to learn the world is still falling behind." The Times notes a "resurgence" of the virus in some countries, and a decline in the availability of retroviral drugs. They conclude, "Progress has been slowed by many factors,… but the overriding problem may be a loss of the sense of urgency and a reluctance by most governments to commit the huge resources needed to provide universal access to treatment, prevention, care and support."

WPost Pans Icelandic Support For Bottom Trawling. In an editorial about bottom-trawling, the Washington Post (12/3, B6, 690K) notes, "Delicate ecosystems get ravaged with nobody paying attention. The Bush administration, along with several other governments, has been pushing for a moratorium on unregulated trawling on the high seas. Last month, thanks in large part to Iceland, it failed to get that measure." The Post explains, "Because the arcane rules of high-seas fishing are largely defined by consensus, even small countries that are genuine moral outliers in world attitudes toward oceans can prevent agreement." The "world's oceans are heading toward environmental collapse, which only bold action will avert." The Post concludes, "It's hard to imagine that happening if a country that hunts whales and has a population smaller than Washington's can help block a common-sense proposal to safeguard the ecological health of the ocean floor."

Hoagland Says Annan Leaving Office With Robust Legacy. In his Washington Post (12/3, B7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland reviews Kofi Annan's decade of UN leadership. His "legacy" is "easily the most active and therefore most controversial record of a secretary general since Dag Hammarskjold gave the job meaning during the Cold War." Hoagland says the "might-have-beens of Annan's two terms center on his rocky relations with the Bush administration, which have left scars on both sides." Annan believes that, "in today's polarized atmosphere, it is much more difficult to get governments to take on the burden of humanitarian intervention in places such as Darfur." Annan also offers advice to incoming Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon – 'My only advice to him about this job is to do it his way. I did it my way, which was to try to work with the United States while being the secretary-general of all United Nations members.'"

Academic Says Oil-Rich "Demagogues" Pose Serious Threat. In today's Washington Post (12/3, B1, 690K), history professor Niall Ferguson says, "The world over, demagogues are back, yelling their slogans and thumping their tubs." Although "their rhetoric may seem overblown," he says "no one should underestimate the threat these new demagogues pose -- especially to the United States." Now, "the conditions for truly dangerous demagogues to emerge are almost ideal." Ferguson's "critical point" is that "personal freedom is all too often the demagogue's first victim, especially when popular sentiment is whipped up against some internal or foreign enemy." He continues, "The good news about demagogues is that they often find it harder to deliver on election pledges than to deliver election speeches." In contrast to recent history, "today's demagogues rule oil-rich countries," and "you don't need to know a lot of history to know that hot air plus petroleum is a potentially explosive combination."

Former Mexican Minister Implores Calderon To Dismantle Political Machine. In an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (12/3, 850K), former Mexican Foreign Minister Jorge Castañeda describes President Felipe Calderon's "daunting to-do list." The "bad news for Calderon is that the telenovela that debuted on election day, July 2, is only the beginning. The toughest challenges lie ahead for him." Noting that Mexico is coming off "10 consecutive years of economic stability, low inflation, low interest rates, a stable currency and constant, if mediocre, growth," Castaneda says "it seems that Mexico's problems are more intractable than just not having [Vicente] Fox to 'kick around anymore.'" He says the "pillars" of the PRI system are intact and "represent the most formidable obstacles to Mexico's growth and success." Calderon "needs to liberate the union movement, upgrade and enforce antitrust laws to break up private monopolies and allow new competitors — even to the old public monopolies — to enter the marketplace. The barriers of entry into the marketplace of political ideas must also come down." Castenada concludes that Calderon must "move forward and take up some formidable interests that are standing in the way of Mexico's future. It will not be easy."

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington ... 24

TERRORISM NEWS:

Saudi Arabia Announces Arrests Of 136 Terror Suspects. The Washington Times (12/3, Nimr, 88K) reports The government of Saudi Arabia "yesterday announced the arrest of 136 suspected al Qaeda terrorists over the past three months in one of the largest crackdowns since it began battling Islamist extremists. … Those detained were 115 Saudis and 21 foreigners, and included a cell that had been plotting a suicide bombing, abductions and killings, the ministry said in a statement carried by the official SPA news agency. That cell consisted of 31 suspects, including four foreign residents, who were detained during a 'pre-emptive' security operation in Riyadh on Sept. 12, the ministry said."

CNN.com (12/2) reports, "A senior official in the Saudi Interior Ministry told CNN that the suspects, who are from several Arab nations, were monitored by Saudi security agents for several months. They rounded the men up just before the expected attack was launched. The suspects, arrested in different areas of Saudi Arabia, were being interrogated Saturday, the official said."

BBC.com (12/2) reports interior ministry spokesman General Mansoor al-Turki, "said some of the militant groups had been about to carry out attacks in Saudi Arabia while others were still in the preparatory stages. … Some of those arrested were recruiting others to fight in 'unstable countries', he added."

Administration's Latitude In Fighting War On Terror Said To Be Diminishing. In a New York Times "Week in Review" piece (12/3, WK14), James Risen writes, "For several years after 9/11, President Bush was given broad latitude by the legislative and judicial branches to fight terrorism as he saw fit. But 2006 has seen the American government's system of checks and balances slowly clicking back into place, forcing the Bush White House to confront new limits and more scrutiny. A series of developments last week reflected that changed reality. The Justice Department inspector general's office announced that it had begun an internal investigation into the department's role in the National Security Agency's domestic spying program, after the administration agreed to give the office's staff the necessary security clearances. Separately, the federal government agreed to pay $2 million to a settle a lawsuit brought by an Oregon lawyer wrongly arrested after the F.B.I. mistakenly linked him to the 2004 Madrid train bombings based on a faulty fingerprint match. In a third case, a German man abducted in 2003 and held in a C.I.A. secret prison in Afghanistan urged a federal appeals court to allow him to pursue a lawsuit against the United States that had been dismissed for national security reasons."

Guantanamo Detainees Turn To Each Other For Legal Help. The AP (12/3, Heilprin) reports that Guantanamo detainees "cut off from the outside world and lacking English language skills or any knowledge of the justice system, are still seeking representation from other detainees -- who are either free now or have access to an attorney." The case of Hamid Al Razak, an Afghan at Guantanamo, who will be represented by fellow detainee Bisher Al Rawi and the Center for Constitutional Rights, is described.

Editorials Laud DOJ IG's Review Of Warrantless Surveillance Program. The Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times (12/3) editorializes, "The Bush administration's warrantless domestic surveillance program came to light a year ago this December. The president had authorized what was then a secret program that allowed the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on calls and e-mails between the United States and foreign countries. .. Since then, President Bush has strongly defended the program, saying that the nation's security depends on allowing government agents to tap phone calls or troll for information relating to terrorism. .. .But many legal experts believe the president's program violates the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, enacted in 1978 to regulate domestic wiretapping. Under this act, the NSA must obtain warrants from a judicial panel before it can engage in wiretap operations." The Caller-Times continues, "Critics of President Bush's action said that even if the broader surveillance program could be justified in this post-9/11 world, the president erred by not asking Congress to change the FISA law to make the operation legal and constitutional. … This week, the Justice Department's inspector general said he will conduct an investigation to determine how the information obtained by the wiretap program has been used. He will also look at compliance with the FISA law." The Caller-Times notes, "The 110th Congress, soon after it takes office in January, must deal with this issue. If the Bush White House is right that new tools are needed to permit 'data mining' to fight the war on terrorism, then those tools should be incorporated into law, with judicial oversight to protect the rights of American citizens. … If the NSA wiretap program violates the law, as Judge Taylor ruled, then Congress has the authority to direct the president to curtail it until legal oversight is provided. The FISA framework would simply need to be reworked. Oversight of U.S. intelligence operations is a responsibility of Congress. It must act to 1) protect our national security and, 2) protect Americans' constitutional liberties. Neither of these should trump the other."

The Nashville Tennessean (12/3) editorializes, "A decision by the inspector general of the Justice Department to look into the controversial wiretapping program used in the war on terror could restore some public trust, although the scope of the probe is limited." The Tennessean continues, "It is important to note that the Justice probe will not deal specifically with whether the NSA program breaks the law or violates the Constitution, but it was also notable recently that members of a special board appointed to examine privacy concerns expressed satisfaction with the way eavesdropping had been conducted. … The developments do suggest that a greater measure of accountability is in store." The Tennessean adds, "The administration may find that with a reasonable amount of disclosure, more Americans will feel comfortable with the techniques being used. But anytime programs are cloaked in secrecy, they invite the very sort of skepticism and scrutiny the program has received."

WAR NEWS:

Pre-Resignation Rumsfeld Memo To White House On Iraq Causes Stir. The revelation of a memorandum on Iraq written by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on November 6 -- the day before Election Day and two days before Rumsfeld resigned -- received major play on NBC, the only network to air a newscast Saturday night. The story also appears on the front page of several major newspapers, and the memo is printed in its entirety in the New York Times (12/3, A28, 1.16M). Coverage suggests that the memo, in which Rumsfeld called for a change of course in Iraq, contradicted or undercut positive pronouncements by the Administration. The AP reports that Rumsfeld knew he was leaving the Pentagon when he wrote the memo, while other sources express uncertainty over whether he knew at the time.

NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 2, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported "about what the Defense Secretary thought about Iraq just days before he resigned." NBC (Corke): "As the President prepares this week to receive a major report on the way forward in Iraq, new details tonight about the war and one of his closest advisors. Just days before he resigned last month," Rumsfeld "wrote the Administration's plan for Iraq was not working and that the United States needed to change course there. … Rumsfeld wrote, 'In my view, it is time for a major adjustment,' adding, 'Clearly what US forces are currently doing in Iraq aren't working fast enough.' … The publication of the memo comes as President Bush prepares it to conduct the latest in a series of diplomatic efforts to stabilize the Iraqi government. … NBC News has learned the White House did in fact receive that Rumsfeld memo and a White House spokeswoman has said that the President has been dissatisfied about Iraq. We also learned tonight that that memo was developed over a period of several weeks, and it's not clear if Rumsfeld felt his job was in jeopardy at the time he sent it."

The New York Times, Washington Post, and Los Angeles Times all put the story on their front pages, and wire reports appear in or on the web sites of well over 100 newspapers. The New York Times (12/3, Gordon, Cloud, 1.16M) says in the memo, Rumsfeld did not "seem confident that the administration would readily develop an effective alternative. To limit the political fallout from shifting course, he suggested the administration consider a campaign to lower public expectations." Rumsfeld's memo "suggests frustration with the pace of turning over responsibility" to the Iraqis, "offers a counterpoint" to his own "frequent public suggestions that discussions about force levels are driven by requests from American military commanders," and "puts on the table several ideas for troop redeployments or withdrawals, even as there have been recent pronouncements from American commanders emphasizing the need to maintain troop levels for the time being."

The Washington Post (12/3, Tyson, 690K) notes that Rumsfeld "has made similar comments in public about insufficient progress in Iraq, both before and immediately after his resignation on Nov. 8. But the defense secretary's unusually expansive memo also laid out a series of 21 possible courses of action regarding Iraq strategy, including many that would transform the U.S. occupation."

In its report on what it calls a "rambling" memo, the Los Angeles Times (12/3, Meyer, 850K) highlights "one potentially controversial plan of action that had been used in a different form by deposed dictator Saddam Hussein -- paying off 'key political and religious leaders' so they would be more compliant with U.S. occupying forces in the war-torn country and its capital, Baghdad." The Times comments that the "memo is peppered with proposals that run counter to the advice of officers," even though "he has said he bases his decisions on input from commanders." Detractors "immediately seized on the memo as an admission of failure by one of the administration's primary architects of the Iraq war and its aftermath." But ex-Pentagon spokesman Lawrence DiRita is quoted defending Rumsfeld, saying of the diversity of suggestions posed in the memo, "This is what good leaders do."

The AP (12/3, Burns) also cites DiRita's defense of Rumsfeld, saying DiRita argues that the "broad range of options presented by Rumsfeld belies the notion, often cited by his critics, that he is inflexible and reluctant to consider alternative approaches." The AP adds, "A person familiar with the sequence of those events told the AP that Rumsfeld did know when he wrote it that he would be leaving."

Baghdad Bombings Kill At Least 51. NBC Nightly News (12/2, lead story, 2:25, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "We begin tonight with the war in Iraq and new explosions that hit the heart of Baghdad. It happened today in crowded markets. Bombs in three parked cars blew up at almost the same time. At least 51 people were killed. Ninety others were injured."

CNN (12/2, Robertson) reported, "The bombings took place about an hour before dusk in a busy downtown market -- three different bombs, two in one square, one in another square, in rapid succession. ... There were so many casualties…that they were taken to five different hospitals. And the blast was so big that it destroyed 10 stores in the area and 12 vehicles as well."

The Washington Post (12/3, A20, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "It was the deadliest attack since a barrage of car bombs, mortars and missiles hit the Shiite slums of Sadr City on Nov. 23, killing more than 200 people. And in a pattern indicative of sectarian violence, the Interior Ministry said 44 bodies had been found in Baghdad in a 24-hour period, most of them shot." The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "By nightfall, no one had claimed responsibility for the attacks." Sunni politician "Adnan Dulaimi said he believed that he was targeted by Shiites and that Maliki's government has not protected him." The AP (12/3, Gamel) adds, "Nobody claimed responsibility for the attack, but it followed a Friday raid by Iraqi forces backed by U.S. helicopters targeting Sunni insurgents in al-Fadhil, less than a half mile away."

LATimes Considers Role Of US Troops In "Civil War." In an editorial running nearly 1,700 words, the Los Angeles Times (12/3, 850K) writes, "The Bush administration, let's be clear, did botch the postwar occupation of Iraq. ... Historians may identify April 12, 2003, as the day the United States began to lose the peace in Iraq. That's when Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, responding to reports of widespread looting, declined to order up more U.S. troops to keep order and protect Iraqi lives and property." That said, the Times urges the US to follow "two axioms" in its Iraq policy: "American troops must not be allowed to become helpless bystanders in Iraq's civil war. Nor can they become co-conspirators with a government intent on taking sides in this civil war."

WPost Says US Cannot Give Up On Current Iraqi Government. The Washington Post (12/3, 690K) editorializes that "writing off" the current Iraqi government "now is not in the U.S. interest. The best remaining option for the United States lies in a long-term effort to bolster Iraq's political administration and army so that it defends the current constitution and slowly gains the ability to take on the enemies of the United States. ... Giving up on the government, as advocates of a rapid withdrawal suggest, would simply concede the country to those enemies, as well as to Shiite extremists, and betray those Iraqis who believed in the U.S. vision of a democracy at peace with its neighbors. It would mean the destruction of American allies in Iraq and throughout the region."

Anbar Raids Kill Six Insurgents, Three Others. The AP (12/2) reports, "U.S. soldiers destroyed two buildings being used by insurgents in a town in Anbar province, killing six militants, two women and a child, the military said Sunday. It was the latest of several recent raids during which women or children have been killed or wounded by U.S. forces as they attacked insurgents in residential areas." US officials have accused insurgents of using women and children as "human shields."

Baker Says "There Is No Magic Formula" For Iraq. The Houston Chronicle (12/3, Belli, 530K) runs a highly complimentary piece on James Baker, who "is bristling at depictions of him as a sort of magician who will somehow make the nation's Iraq problems disappear." Baker said, "Expectations are totally out of control. There is no magic formula for our difficulties in Iraq." Nonetheless, according to the Chronicle, Baker "is known as a master negotiator who often solves problems by forging bipartisan support and by turning enemies into friends." His career and achievements are described, with plaudits from Henry Kissinger, George Herbert Walker Bush, and others cited.

Isaacson Hopes Baker Can Attain Mantle Of "Wise Man." In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (12/3, 850K), Aspen Institute head Walter Isaacson writes that Baker "has one great goal left as he hones his legacy: trying to make sure that the words 'American statesman' appear in his newspaper obituary before the words 'Florida recount.'" Baker "was the secretary of State who urged President George H.W. Bush not to try to occupy Baghdad during the Persian Gulf War in 1991, and he cautioned against the invasion of Iraq in 2003 before it even began. ... If Baker and his posse can come up with a plan that salvages some threads of our national interest from the debacle of Iraq, and if he stays around to help implement it, that would be such an awesome magic trick that those of us who dabble with the first drafts of history should reward him by carving a niche in the pantheon for him somewhere between" ex-Defense Secretary Robert Lovett and ex-Secretary of State Dean Acheson.

Professor Skeptical About ISG's Chances For Success. In a commentary for the Washington Post (12/3, B3, 690K), Georgetown professor Daniel Byman writes that the Iraq Study Group runs the risks that all commissions do: "tepid recommendations, partisan divisions, little follow-up and eventual irrelevance. … At best, the Iraq Study Group will catalyze our leadership and help foster the political will to accept this painful reality. But salvation? Forget about it."

Hakim May Ask Bush To Reach Out To Tehran. An AP (12/2, Hendawi, Abdul-Zahra) piece previews President Bush's Monday meeting with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, "a Shiite powerbroker reviled by Sunni Arabs for his ties to Iran and a militia linked to sectarian violence." Hakim "will ask President Bush to seek Iran's help," and will "try to allay U.S. concerns over Iranian influence in Iraq." He "dismissed speculation that his trip to the United States threatened the authority of beleaguered Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who came under criticism for meeting with Bush last week in Jordan."

Iraqi Mass Exodus Unsettles Middle East. The Boston Globe (12/3, A1, Cambanis, 413K) reports, "As Iraq's bloodshed worsens, the tide of refugees fleeing the country is straining the region's resources and inflaming fears that Iraq's sectarian conflict might spread to neighboring countries. A new United Nations report says Iraq is 'hemorrhaging' refugees in staggering numbers. Anywhere from 2,000 to 3,000 people are fleeing the country every day. ... at least 1.5 million Iraqi refugees have moved to neighboring countries, reshaping the already complex demographic mosaics of Jordan, Syria, and Lebanon. The influx has prompted government crackdowns and anger from local populations who feel refugees are grabbing scarce jobs and resources."

More Commentary. In a commentary for the Washington Post (12/3, 690K), journalist Michael Goldfarb writes, "I've seen what happens when the 'international community' precipitously pulls out of conflict zones. ... American journalists and relief workers are evacuated and can be swimming in a hotel pool, all expenses paid, by evening. Our translators, drivers and office managers return to their houses and wait in fear of reprisal against those who collaborate with the Great Satan."

US Advisers Forced To Intervene When Iraqis Prove Inadequate. The Washington Post (12/3, A20, Trejos, 690K) reports that, during "Operation Lion Strike" in Baghdad, "teams of U.S. advisers remained close, but planned to leave the fighting to the Iraqis." Staff Sgt. Michael Baxter said, "It started out that way. But about five minutes into it, we had to take over." The performance by the Iraqis contrasted with official statements. US military leaders "had called it an 'outstanding' example of Iraqi forces taking charge. They said the Iraqis captured 43 insurgents while suffering few casualties." However, American soldiers "described Iraqi troops with inadequate training, resources or motivation. When they shoot, they 'pray and spray' and do not aim for targets, the soldiers said. They either lack equipment or are not well trained in new equipment. On the battlefield on Friday, the Iraqis communicated by cellphone because their walkie-talkies did not work, the U.S. soldiers said." In his Washington Post (12/3, B2, 690K) "Inbox" column, Tom Ricks quotes debriefings of two US Army trainers of Iraqis.

Review Says Army Mishandled Friendly Fire Case. The Washington Post (12/3, A17, White, 690K) reports, "Army officials destroyed critical evidence that could have determined who shot and killed Pfc. Jesse R. Buryj at an Iraq checkpoint in May 2004, one of several problems with the friendly-fire inquiry that may permanently shroud Buryj's death in mystery, according to an Army inspector general's review. ... As a result, Buryj's family buried him believing he was killed when his vehicle was rammed by a dump truck. They did not learn that he was shot by friendly forces until nine months after his death, and a lack of physical evidence means it is nearly impossible to know what happened that night."

Women Warriors "Change Military Landscape." The AP (12/2, Cohen) reports in a nearly 3,000-word article, "In Iraq and Afghanistan, women warriors are writing a new chapter in military history, serving by the tens of thousands, fending off enemy fire and taking on -- and succeeding in -- high-profile roles in the battlefield and the skies as never before. ... More than 155,000 women have been deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan since 2002, according to the Pentagon, nearly four times the number during the Persian Gulf War."

California Iraq Memorial Stirs Controversy. The New York Times (12/3, A38, McKinley, 1.16M) reports that previously "tranquil" Lafayette, California, "has become the scene of a passionate debate over the place of political speech in suburbia. At issue is a hillside memorial, made up of some 450 small white crosses and a 5-by-16-foot sign that reads: 'In Memory of 2,867 U.S. Troops Killed in Iraq.'" Detractors of the memorial "called the memorial unpatriotic, disrespectful or just plain ugly." Some locals "question whether the memorial actually meant to remember the dead troops," believing that it is primarily a war protest.

Iraq Veteran's Mother Continues Sending Gift Packages To Troops. The New York Times (12/3, A45, Applebome, 1.16M) profiles Luz Mercado of New Windsor, New York, who continues to send gift packages to troops in Iraq even though her son Luis has already come home. Mercado ""figured she owed it to other moms to do for their children what she had done for her own."

Taliban Kills Teachers, Intimidates Pupils. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Watson, 850K) reports on the Taliban's efforts to shut down public education: "One of the first victims in the resurgent Taliban's dirty war on education, [Mohammed Aref] gave his life trying to teach Afghan children that there is more to theirs than endless war. ... once again, education is under pressure from the Taliban. ... Over the last year, insurgents have burned at least 146 schools, and insecurity has forced 215 others to close, the Afghan Education Ministry says. Zuhoor Afghan, an advisor to Education Minister Mohammed Hanif Atmar, says about 220,000 students have quit school because they fear for their lives." Many Afghans "are losing patience. Encouraged by the promises of Western leaders, they believed the Taliban's defeat meant the dawn of a new age of rapid progress, in which all children could get a good education."

Nigerian Fraud E-Mails Claim To Be From FBI's Mueller. NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 9, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) ran an "In Depth" report on "a new twist on Internet fraud." NBC (Myers): "It's not every day that you get an email from the director of the FBI, Robert Mueller. … In these e-mails bearing official FBI logos, he's been notifying Americans that they've inherited $10.5 million each. To receive the cash, you must immediately contact the FBI in Nigeria to obtain a certificate of ownership. So when we got an e-mail, we immediately dialed away. Is in the FBI In Nigeria?" Unidentified male: "Yes, this is the FBI Federal Republic of Nigeria." Myers: "My FBI pal told me a long-lost relative had died in Nigeria and left me a huge inheritance." Unidentified male: "All you have to send is only $2,000." Myers: "Only $2,000? And I get $10.5 million? … The Mueller e-mails are, of course, fakes. A new twist on an age-old con, all part of Internet scams that cost Americans $183 million last year alone."

Alleged New England Mob Underboss Arrested. The Boston Globe (12/3, Murphy, Mishra) reports, "Reputed Mafia underboss Carmen 'The Big Cheese' DiNunzio was arrested on extortion and illegal gambling charges as he emerged from a North End social club yesterday, potentially ending the reign of an underworld leader credited with uniting the fractured Boston mob into a low-key, profit-focused machine." The Globe continues, "After State Police removed $6,000 in cash from his pockets and led the portly mobster away in cuffs, officials predicted his arrest would further weaken an organized-crime syndicate already diminished from decades of investigations and infighting." The Globe adds, "DiNunzio, 49, ascended to second in command of all New England mobsters around 2002, according to law enforcement officials, after winning the favor of New England godfather Luigi 'Baby Shanks' Manocchio of Providence. Law-enforcement officials allege he set about refocusing the mob on money-making crimes, such as extortion and gambling. … 'He's a low-key underboss who has been trying to keep the mob's activities under the radar of law enforcement and the media,' said one law enforcement official." The Globe notes, "According to a source briefed on the investigation, DiNunzio's extortion and gambling operation had been collecting 'hundreds of thousands' of dollars per week and involved a 'ton" of operatives. … Many of the crimes date to 2001, when the investigation began, and the statute of limitations was going to expire this month, triggering yesterday's arrest at the Gemini social club at the corner of Lynn and Cooper streets."

FBI Establishes Montana Public Corruption Tip Line. The AP (12/3) reported, "The FBI has established a tip line for people to report individuals working in public offices whom they believe are corrupt. People can call in to report suspected shady public officials working for school districts, law-enforcement agencies, government offices or in any other public position funded by taxpayers. The Public Corruption Tip Line, 1-866-50-BRIBE, was established for Montana, Idaho and Utah residents through the FBI's Salt Lake City field office. In addition, tips regarding public corruption can be made at the FBI's Web site, www.fbi.gov by going to the Web site and clicking on the link to the Salt Lake City field office." The AP noted, The FBI announced the establishment of the tip line after charges were filed against three employees of a Utah school district."

Jefferson Pursuing Nagin Strategy For Runoff. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/3, Donze) reported, "Accomplishing a feat widely considered impossible, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin managed to get re-elected in May by stitching together an unlikely coalition of working-class black voters and white conservatives. Now…it appears that U.S. Rep. William Jefferson is trying to replicate Nagin's feat, or at least compose a variation on the same theme. … On one hand, Jefferson, for the first time in his long career in public office, is touting his conservative votes in Congress against same-sex marriage and late-term abortions." Meanwhile, he "also has been trotting out his liberal credentials as an outspoken advocate of displaced public housing residents and out-of-work public school teachers and hammering away at the campaign contributions Carter has collected from Republicans." The Times-Picayune noted, "If there was a cloud over Nagin, it was not the thunderhead that hangs over the Jefferson camp. … 'It's hard to outdo an FBI investigation and money in your freezer,' University of New Orleans political science professor Susan Howell said."

The AP (12/4, Burdeau) reports that "Jefferson hunted for votes among churchgoers Sunday as he headed into the final week of a campaign to hold onto his seat and salvage his political fortunes. FBI raids on his homes and his congressional office, including allegations in an FBI affidavit that he hid $90,000 in bribe money in a freezer, have left Jefferson vulnerable for the first time since he won the seat in 1990. … 'It's going to be very competitive,' said Gary Clark, a political science professor at Dillard University. 'There are those who may wish he may lose, but it will take more than wishing. He's a veteran politician and there are those who benefit by his being in office.'"

In New TV Ad, Jefferson Denies Taking Bribe. ABC News' The Blotter (12/1, 11:50 a.m.) reported that Jefferson "has taken to the airwaves to unequivocally deny the allegations that have plagued him for months. 'I have never taken a bribe from anyone,' he asserts in a new campaign ad." Jefferson's opponent, Rep. Karen Carter, "has seized on the probe in her campaign against Jefferson, and recently ran an ad quoting a Washington Post article that said the FBI had caught Jefferson accepting a bribe on videotape. In this latest ad, Jefferson responds by saying that Carter's 'newspaper source got the facts wrong.'"

Memphis Corruption Charges Renew Questions About Race, FBI Probes. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (12/3, Erskine) reported, "When Johnnie R. Turner first heard about the arrests of Memphis City Councilmen Edmund Ford and Rickey Peete last week, it stopped her cold in her tracks. … Turner, executive director of the Memphis branch of the NAACP, said recent public corruption investigations have given citizens the impression that African-American politicians are 'inherently more crooked, and that is not true.'" Memphis FBI spokesman George Bolds "said he understands the race of those charged in recent public corruption cases is an element some people examine. … But Bolds said race by no means is a factor in how the FBI investigates cases. 'We, the FBI, go where the investigation leads us. Race is not a consideration for us.'" The Commercial Appeal adds that white, Republican state Sen. Paul Stanley "said he thinks complaints about racial targeting are nothing more than an excuse. 'The head of the FBI here is an African-American woman,' Stanley said, referring to FBI Special Agent in Charge My Harrison. 'She's just saying, "We're going to go and get you if you've done something wrong."'"

Critics Call For State, Federal Probes Of Prosecutor In Duke Lacrosse Case. The Raleigh News & Observer (12/3, Neff, Blythe, Niolet) reported, "In the war that is the Duke lacrosse case, Mike Nifong's fierce fight will not end with the trial. … Dozens of people, some connected to the accused, have asked the governor and the state attorney general to intervene. Many have complained to the N.C. State Bar," seeking his disbarment. "And a lawyer for one of the indicted players has urged members of Congress to have the U.S. Department of Justice open a civil rights investigation." The News & Observer notes that defendant Collin Finnerty's lawyer, Michael Cornacchia, "wrote to the U.S. attorney general, the FBI director, the congressional delegations of North Carolina and Long Island and others, saying Nifong had violated the civil rights of the three players. … The chances of a federal investigation are unknown; a State Bar investigation is more likely."

NYTimes Applauds Ruling On US Currency And The Blind. The New York Times (12/3, WK11, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "Unlike the currency in 180 other countries, the American greenback comes in one size, and one dominant color — green. That can be so confusing for the 3.3 million Americans who are either blind or have very poor sight that a United States District Court judge in the District of Columbia ruled last week that the government had unlawfully denied them access to the nation's paper money. … Judge James Robertson's opinion makes it clear that the American government simply has not tried very hard to help those Americans who cannot see their money."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

SCOTUS To Hear Two School Desegregation Cases. The Washington Post (12/3, A3, Barnes, 690K) reports, "More than 50 years after the Supreme Court decided in Brown v. Board of Education that separate schools are inherently unequal, the court will consider tomorrow whether race can still be a factor when school systems design programs to promote racial integration. A broadly written decision on Louisville's plan, and on a related one from Seattle, could have a profound impact on school systems across the country. It is the first time in more than a decade that the Supreme Court will consider what is proper for school systems to do to promote desegregation, and it is the first test on the issue for two new justices who in the past have been skeptical about the use of racial classifications."

Newsday (12/3, Brune) reports parents "argue that when a child is denied assignment to a nearby school because of race to achieve a racial balance -- not to remedy past discrimination -- it violates the equal treatment guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. The districts respond that the goal of school integration, and the educational and social benefits that come with it, justifies a careful, limited use of race in deciding where a student should go to school."

The Washington Times (12/3, 88K) reports, "A year ago, Justice O'Connor and her colleagues refused to hear a similar school-diversity challenge from Massachusetts. After Justice Alito's arrival, however, the court surprised many observers by agreeing to hear the appeals."

The San Francisco Chronicle (12/3, Page A1, Egelko) reports, "More than 50 years after the U.S. Supreme Court outlawed racial segregation in public schools, the justices are about to consider whether a school district can voluntarily integrate by considering race in campus assignments." The Chronicle continues, "In cases from Seattle and Louisville, Ky., to be argued Monday, the justices will address the question left unanswered by the Brown vs. Board of Education ruling in 1954: What can the government do when the last vestiges of state-sponsored segregation are erased and schools nevertheless remain racially isolated because of housing patterns, parental choice and perhaps societal discrimination?" The Chronicle adds, "Facing that situation, officials in Seattle installed a system that allowed race to be considered as one of several factors in determining enrollment in popular high schools. In Jefferson County, Ky., which includes Louisville, the school district was once under a court desegregation order, and officials tried to avoid resegregating by setting minimum minority and white populations at each school. … 'Jefferson County housing is substantially segregated along racial lines,' attorney Frances Mellen said in a brief to the court. 'The assignment of all (district) students to 'neighborhood schools' would result in a substantial number of racially segregated schools.' … After the court desegregation order was lifted in 2000, Mellen said, the 97,000-student district concluded the only way it could prevent resegregation was to seek African American enrollment of 15 to 50 percent at each school. The proportion of blacks in the district was 36 percent. … But Teddy Gordon, the attorney for a white woman whose 5-year-old son was assigned to a more distant Louisville school rather than his neighborhood school, said the district's program was 'nothing more than a hard-core, mechanized quota.' … The Bush administration agrees. In papers filed with the court, Solicitor General Paul Clement outlined the administration's position: A district can assign students by race when necessary to make up for its own intentional discrimination, but not to integrate schools that were never deliberately segregated."

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (12/3, Sichko) reports, "The appeals, involving the school districts of Seattle and Louisville, Ky., are the most significant race-related cases the court has heard in several years. The court's ruling, expected in late spring or early summer, could restrict the ways schools pursue integration, said Gary Orfield, director of the Civil Rights Project at Harvard University. … 'The stakes are rising,' Orfield said. 'We're now talking about if the Supreme Court will find plans that were rejected as not enough in 1968 to be too much in 2006.' He said a ban on race-based school assignment aimed at integration would likely lead to 'a significant increase in racial segregation across the country.'"

The Post-Dispatch notes, "Critics of Louisville's plan disagree. … 'Our communities have come (a) long way since the segregated days of the '40s and the '50s and on into the '70s,' wrote attorneys for a Louisville parent whose white child was denied a transfer due to desegregation standards. 'There is no going back. We will not turn back the clock,'"

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (12/3), attorney Edward Lazarus writes, "At the start of his first full term on the Supreme Court, Justice Anthony Kennedy weighed a legal challenge to a policy in Richmond, Va., that reserved 10% of the city's contracts for minority-owned businesses (Richmond vs. Croson). At the time, Kennedy was thought to be a potential swing vote on a court deeply riven by its views on affirmative action." Lazarus continues, "The court's liberal wing believed that in light of the nation's racist past, the Constitution's promise of 'equal protection of the laws' permitted — indeed, almost mandated — some degree of minority racial preferences. … . The most conservative justices rallied around the opposite view. To get beyond racism, they contended, it was essential not to perpetuate a 200-plus-year mistake of letting government classify individuals according to race. Under their reading of the equal protection clause, the Constitution morally demanded colorblindness. … Kennedy struggled to find a middle ground. Although uncomfortable with affirmative action (and disdainful of Richmond's program, which the court struck down), Kennedy, siding with the majority, rejected the argument that the Constitution categorically bars government from using race-conscious means to achieve such compelling policy objectives as remedying past discrimination. With respect to affirmative action, Kennedy suggested, the Constitution's answer was not 'never' but 'almost never.'" Lazarus adds, "Eighteen years later, on the eve of the court hearing its first set of affirmative action cases under Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., the battle over racial preferences continues. On the federal level, former President Clinton's "mend it, don't end it" approach remains essentially in place, though in several states, California and Michigan most notably, anti-affirmative action forces have imposed their version of colorblindness. … Inside the court, although some of the players have changed, the justices remain deeply divided about the means for achieving racial equality. And Kennedy has become even more pivotal to the fate of affirmative action."

In his column for the Washington Post (12/3, B7, 690K) George Will writes that Seattle's school district "decided in 2000 that because the son of Jill Kurfirst and the daughter of Winnie Bachwitz are white, they should be assigned to an inferior and distant high school. If they had not left the Seattle school system, this would have required them to rise at 5 a.m. in order to leave home by 5:30 a.m., alone and in the dark, to take the first of three buses, returning home between 8 p.m. and 9 p.m., with almost no time left for homework, family activities and adequate sleep. … Soon -- oral arguments are tomorrow -- the Supreme Court can remind the 9th Circuit of the Constitution's limits on what schools can do in the name of 'diversity.'"

Gay Activists Optimistic Democrats In Congress Will Champion Their Agenda. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, A1, Neuman, 850K) reports, "For the last 12 years of Republican control of Congress, gay-rights organizations set aside their push for legal protections in order to defend against conservative measures such as same-sex marriage bans. With the realignment of the House and Senate next month, gay and lesbian groups say they are tantalizingly close to having enough votes to ensure passage of at least the hate crimes bill, and perhaps the discrimination measure, which once failed in the Senate by one vote." Rep. Barney Frank "said the hate crimes bill had a 'very good chance of going to George Bush's desk … in the first half of the year.' He said the discrimination measure might be further off, noting that Democrats may not want to push for too much too soon."

More Help Sought For Mentally Ill Ex-Convicts. The AP (12/3, Santi) reports, "Larry Lamb has lived a half-century of failures: three stints in New Jersey state prison, four psych ward confinements, drug and alcohol abuse dating back to adolescence, and more time in county lockups than he can count. … A year ago, he began racking up successes." The AP continues, "Lamb, 50, hasn't had a drug-tainted urine sample since he enrolled in an intensive program for mentally ill inmates as he was being released from jail. He's taking antidepressants, keeping appointments with his therapist, working when he can find a job and paying off court-imposed fines from his prior life of crime and homelessness. … Advocates for the mentally ill say Lamb's situation is common among the nation's inmates, 55 percent of whom suffer from a mental health problem, according to a study released in September by the Justice Department's Office of Justice Programs." The AP adds, "Yet, the availability and intensity of mental health services for people in the nation's criminal justice system varies greatly, said Karen Bower, a lawyer with the Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law, a Washington-based group advocating for the rights of the mentally ill. .. A similar disparity in post-incarceration services exists nationally, with some people receiving comprehensive discharge planning before they leave prison or jail, others being offered limited mental health or social services, and some getting none. … Services are severely lacking for those with dual diagnoses, like mental illness and drug dependence, said Bower. In one class-action lawsuit filed by Bazelon in New York, mentally ill parolees are suing for access to chemical addiction programs. A prior suit brought by a mentally ill inmate in New Jersey forced the state to revamp its prison psychiatric programs to replace the practice of segregating inmates whose psychiatric disorders made them disruptive. … Without adequate support, or access to medication and counseling, those discharged or paroled with serious mental illness — defined as schizophrenia, bipolar or major depression — often wind up cycling back through the criminal justice system, Bower said."

Maine Sued For Banning Saucy Beer Labels. The New York Times (12/3, Zezima) reports, "Santa Claus will not be coming to Maine this year, at least not on a beer label, if state officials have their way." The Times continues, "The state's Bureau of Liquor Enforcement in September rejected three beer labels proposed by Shelton Brothers, a Massachusetts beer importer, including one for 'Santa's Butt Winter Porter' that depicts St. Nick from behind, checking a list and drinking a beer, his ample posterior on a wooden barrel." The Times adds, "The bureau said the labels violated a regulation stating that alcohol advertisements cannot contain 'undignified or improper illustrations.' … The Maine Civil Liberties Union sued the bureau on Thursday in Federal District Court in Portland on behalf of Shelton Brothers, claiming that its right to free speech was being violated. .. .One of the other rejected labels, for Rose de Gambrinus, a raspberry lambic beer, depicts a watercolor commissioned by its maker, Cantillon of Belgium, of a nude woman sitting on a person's lap. The third, for Les Sans Culottes French blonde ale, uses Delacroix's 'Liberty Leading the People,' which hangs in the Louvre. …. 'The illustrations on these labels are artistic, and art is entitled to the protection of the First Amendment,' said Zachary Heiden, a staff lawyer with the Maine Civil Liberties Union."

The AP (12/3) reports, "The dispute recalls a similar squabble last year when Connecticut told Shelton Brothers it had problems with its Seriously Bad Elf ale. … 'Last year it was elves. This year it's Santa. Maybe next year it'll be reindeer,' said Daniel Shelton, owner of the company in Belchertown, Mass." The AP adds, "The lawsuit, filed Thursday, contends the state's action violates the First Amendment by censoring artistic expression. … But the state says it's within its rights. The label with Santa might appeal to children, said Maine State Police Lt. Patrick Fleming. The other two labels are considered inappropriate because they show bare-breasted women. … 'We stand by our decision and at some point it'll go through the court system and somebody will make the decision on whether we are right or wrong,' he said."

EU Antitrust Chief Urges Breaking Up Of Large Energy Companies. The AP (12/3, White) reports, "Europe needs to split control of the energy supply chain to stimulate investment and lower prices, European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said last week in a signal that regulators are determined to break up large companies that generate and distribute power. … 'I see only one way forward if we are to restore credibility and faith in the market. Europe needs a structural solution that once and for all separates infrastructure from supply and generation,' she said. .. 'A clear separation of interests between the network operators, energy producers and energy companies is imperative,' she said at Les Mandarins, France's interconnector facility that feeds energy supplies across the English Channel. 'Then we will finally see an end to discrimination, and we will also have laid the ground for a system of proper investment incentives.'" The AP adds, "EU regulators say they have identified fundamental problems with the way Europe's gas and electricity sectors work that could best be tackled by "ownership unbundling" that would force large integrated energy companies such as Germany's E.On to focus on either power generation or supply, selling off other units. … Regulators are scheduled to publish their recommendations on Jan. 10. … Kroes said there are major problems connecting energy from one European country to another, mainly caused by the 'slow pace of investment in infrastructure under the current vertically integrated regime.'"

Former Interior Auditor Takes On Oil Industry Over Royalties. The New York Times (12/3, BU1, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "During a 22-year career, Bobby L. Maxwell routinely won accolades and awards as one of the Interior Department's best auditors in the nation's oil patch, snaring promotions that eventually had him supervising a staff of 120 people. He and his team scrutinized the books of major oil producers that collectively pumped billions of dollars worth of oil and gas every year from land and coastal waters owned by the public. Along the way, the auditors recovered hundreds of millions of dollars from companies that shortchanged the government on royalties." However the Interior Department "eliminated his job in what it called a 'reorganization.' That came exactly one week after a federal judge in Denver unsealed a lawsuit in which Mr. Maxwell contended that a major oil company had spent years cheating on royalty payments." Maxwell "is at the center of an escalating battle with both the oil industry and the Bush administration over how the federal government oversees about $60 billion worth of oil and gas produced every year on federal property. In the process, he has become one of the most nettlesome whistle-blowers Big Oil has ever encountered."

States Seek To Skirt Reinstated Forest Rules. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Boxall, 850K) reports, "The future of some of the West's most unspoiled national forestlands remains in flux more than two months after a federal judge reinstated protections on nearly 50 million acres of backcountry. Nowhere is that uncertainty more in evidence than in Idaho. … In October, shortly after a district court in California restored President Clinton's ban on most road-building and logging in the backcountry, Idaho petitioned the federal government to loosen the restrictions on its 9.3 million roadless acres. Then, at a hearing in Washington last week, Idaho Gov. James E. Risch put a much greener spin on his state's intentions, saying he wanted to honor the Clinton prohibitions. The testimony by Risch, a Republican, not only raised questions, but underscored the degree to which the roadless forest issue remains in play."

Produce Farmers Seek Share Of Federal Agriculture Subsidies. The New York Times (12/3, A1, Barrionuevo, 1.16M), in a front-page story, reports "For decades, the fiercely independent fruit and vegetable growers of California, Florida and other states have been the only farmers in America who shunned federal subsidies, delivering produce to the tables of millions of Americans on their own. But now, in the face of tough new competition primarily from China, even these proud groups are buckling. Produce farmers, their hands newly outstretched, have joined forces for the first time, forming a lobby group intended to pressure politicians over the farm bill to be debated in Congress in January." The Times goes on to report, "The farmers are not asking for the kind of direct subsidies that have been accused of distorting trade and hurting developing countries' agricultural industries. Hoping to avoid a nasty battle with powerful farm-state politicians in the Midwest and Southeast, they are asking instead for money to help market their products at home and overseas, as well as for research and conservation."

Bush Said To Have Worked Frequently Against Free Trade. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (12/3, B2, 690K) Slate's Daniel Gross writes, "Since 2000, Bush Republicans have done as much as Democrats, if not more, to erect trade barriers and tariffs. … In March 2002, for example, Bush proudly signed 'temporary safeguards' that imposed tariffs of 8 percent to 30 percent on most steel imports for three years. … In May 2002, Bush signed the Farm Security and Rural Investment Act, which Republicans passed without much help from Democrats. Just six years after President Bill Clinton signed the 1996 Farm Bill, which slashed agricultural subsidies, Bush jacked up federal payments by as much as 80 percent for cash crops."

Winter Storm Kills At Least 11 In Midwest. NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 4, 2:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "A major storm swept across the country dumping ice and snow in the Midwest, disrupting air travel and leaving thousands without power." NBC (Shamlian): "The storm has moved on but people all over the Midwest are still dealing with it tonight. From clearing downed power lines and trees to rebooking canceled flights, a Midwestern mess in the wake of the season's first major winter storm."

The New York Times/AP (12/3) reports, "The death toll from the Midwest's first big snowstorm of the season rose to 11 as the system blew through the Northeast late Friday and early Saturday." The AP (12/2) reports, "Utility crews worked overtime Saturday to restore electrical service to thousands of customers still blacked out by the Midwest's first big snowstorm of the season."

Climate Change Presents Unprecedented Difficulties For Insurance Industry. The Washington Post's Joel Garreau (12/3, C1) writes, "A place near the water has been an American dream for a very long time. … This is the year, however, in which the big boys in global finance got religion about climate change. As a result, this American dream…is under attack." Garreau adds, "The big buzz in the insurance industry today is climate change. Lloyd's of London's June report is titled: 'Climate Change: Adapt or Bust.' The 2005 hurricane season gave the United States supposedly once-in-a-century storms, one right after the other. Katrina, Rita and Wilma were among the seven most expensive hurricanes ever to hit the country. Companies that had to eat too much of the $51.5 billion in insured losses went under. The big problem with climate change for the insurance companies is not the risk. Their whole business is getting paid to accept risks. The trouble is that their traditional means of calculating what is an acceptable risk -- and how much to charge for it -- is based on history."

FBI Breaking Of New Jersey Gang Was Dangerous, Four-Year Task. Under the headline "How The FBI Took Down A Deadly Jersey Gang," the Newark Star-Ledger (12/3, Martin) reported in a five-thousand word story, "The depth of New Jersey's gang problem dawned on John Havens on a steamy Sunday four years ago as he parked along Ninth Street in Newark. Havens, a 32-year-old FBI agent, had his eyes on a two-story corner house where nearly 50 young men had gathered for a barbecue. One wore a hidden microphone that piped the proceedings to the agent's vehicle. … The Double ii Bloods, as they were called, brought gangs to a new level. They met weekly to discuss business and Blood codes, and to break in members." The Star-Ledger added, "The meeting recorded that afternoon on Ninth Street marked a turning point in the FBI investigation. Dismantling the set would take four more years, testing agents' ability to follow the trail of violence, entangling informants who risked death, and allowing prosecutors for the first time to pursue gangs as organized enterprises with a single purpose: crime." However, the Star-Ledger noted, FBI Newark SAC Leslie Wiser "cautioned: 'Law enforcement is not the answer to the gang problem. No one should make the mistake in thinking that it is.'"

IMMIGRATION:

DOJ Pushes For Deportation Of Former Nazi Guards. The Detroit Free Press (12/3, Ashenfelter) reports, "John Kalymon, Johann Leprich and Iwan Mandycz are old men now, hobbled by the same aches and pains that plague many senior citizens in their 80s. … Only these men are not ordinary senior citizens." The Free Press continues, "In the 1940s, the U.S. Department of Justice says, they helped the Nazi killing machine as it steamrolled across Europe, exterminating millions of people deemed enemies of Adolf Hitler's Third Reich. … As it has in scores of similar cases, the government has gone to court to strip all three metro Detroit men of their U.S. citizenship so they can be deported. .. .But getting rid of them has created a moral, legal and diplomatic dilemma." The Free Press adds, "Their families and neighbors regard them as harmless old men who were victims, forced to choose between the Nazi juggernaut or death. Detroit-area survivors of the Holocaust regard them as tormentors who helped mercilessly kill their loved ones and friends. And the federal government, which is racing to expel them from the country before they die, is having a tough time finding European countries to take them. … Eli Rosenbaum, head of the Justice Department's Nazi-hunting Office of Special Investigations, is mainly concerned about making travel arrangements for the men. … 'Right now, we have six people who we could put on a plane tomorrow,' Rosenbaum said, adding that Leprich is one of the six. … 'In recent years, we've had great difficulty persuading European nations to take these people back,' Rosenbaum said. 'And in some cases, we've hit a brick wall.' … Rosenbaum said many European countries are too embarrassed to take back people they can't prosecute because they lack the laws or the desire to do so."

Academic Claims Immigration Does Not Contribute To Higher Crime Rates. In a piece for the New York Times Magazine (12/3P the Nation's Eyal Press writes, "In an age of Latino gangs and Chinese criminal networks, the notion that communities with growing immigrant populations tend to be unsafe is fairly well established, at least in the popular imagination. … In fact, according to evidence cropping up in various places, the opposite may be the case. Ramiro Martinez Jr., a professor of criminal justice at Florida International University, has sifted through homicide records in border cities like San Diego and El Paso, both heavily populated by Mexican immigrants, both places where violent crime has fallen significantly in recent years. 'Almost without exception,' he told me, 'I've discovered that the homicide rate for Hispanics was lower than for other groups, even though their poverty rate was very high, if not the highest, in these metropolitan areas.' He found the same thing in the Haitian neighborhoods of Miami."

Georgia Legislator's Wife Faces Deportation. The New York Times (12/3, A38, Goodman, 1.16M) reports, "The wife of a Georgia legislator known for his strong support of immigrants' rights is in hiding after federal agents came to their home on Tuesday with an order to deport her to her native Colombia, her lawyer said. In a written statement issued on Wednesday, State Senator Curt Thompson, 37, a Democrat, said his wife, Sascha Herrera, 28, missed an immigration-related court hearing in February 2005. … Because Ms. Herrera did not appear in court, a federal judge issued a deportation order in February 2005."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Leahy Seen As Having Historic Opportunity For DOJ Oversight. The Barre-Montpelier (VT) Times Argus (12/3) editorializes, "Friends and staff of Sen. Patrick Leahy are already talking about the opportunity now before him to establish a legacy that will place him among the most important senators in Vermont history. … It will not be about the pork he is able to secure from his position on the Appropriations Committee or his long-term work for the interests of the state's dairy farmers. It will be his legacy as a defender of the U.S. Constitution." The Times Argus continues, "Leahy has been almost giddy since the elections last month, with the prospect that he will become chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. But the challenges before him are serious indeed. … As chairman he will have the power to focus on the numerous ways that the Bush administration has worked to skirt and undermine the constitutional limits on executive power, straying into activities that might be judged illegal or even criminal. A successful effort to rein in the abuses of the Bush administration will place Leahy in the history books alongside Sen. Ralph Flanders of Vermont, who was instrumental in challenging the abuses of Sen. Joseph McCarthy — except Leahy's challenge is even greater and the abuses more serious than those of the senator from Wisconsin whose name has become synonymous with an era of thuggery and paranoia." The Times Argus adds, "Leahy appears to understand what he is up against. Already he has sent letters to the Justice Department renewing numerous requests for information on a variety of programs and activities that are constitutionally dubious. President Bush has promised to foster a spirit of bipartisanship in his dealings with the new Democratic Congress, but so far the Justice Department and the White House show every sign that they will resist Leahy's efforts to let the sun shine on the doings of the federal government. … Leahy will have to focus both on the specifics of administration activities and on the broader legal and political philosophy the administration has offered in its own defense. … It will be important for Leahy to maintain a focus on the legal and constitutional issues at stake: that the United States stands for human rights, the rule of law and a system of checks and balances that applies to the president even in a time of war. The American people will be grateful to him if he can establish that a democracy need not resort to the ruthless, lawless methods of a panicked bully. And Vermonters will remember him among the handful of Vermont's greatest statesmen."

Fetal-Pain Bill Among Few Items On House's Agenda For This Week. The Washington Post (12/3, A4, Weisman, 690K) reports Congress "will convene on Tuesday for what some fear will be the lamest of lame-duck sessions, and GOP leaders have decided to take a minimalist approach before turning over the reins of power to the Democrats. Rather than a final surge of legislative activity, Congress will probably wrap up things after a single, short week of work. They have even decided to punt decisions on annual government spending measures to the Democrats next year. … Republican lawmakers will have met for one week in November, devoted almost exclusively to leadership elections for next year, and one week in December, largely to pick committee assignments, move offices and pass a measure to keep the government operating through February. That will mean this Congress will have spent the least time in session of any in at least half a century." The Post notes that the House has scheduled a vote on Rep. Chris Smith's fetal-pain bill.

GOP Will Attempt To Extend Popular Tax Breaks. The Washington Times/AP (12/3) reports, "Millions of entrepreneurs, teachers and parents with children in college have a financial stake in whether Congress, in the waning hours of Republican rule, revives tax breaks that expired 11 months ago. … The breaks, which expired Jan. 1, enjoy wide support in both parties. Precisely because of this support, lawmakers have sought to add them as a 'sweetener' to contentious legislation in hopes of getting that legislation through." Lawmakers "will take one more shot at the tax bill when they return this week to wrap up their work for the year, but they might not have the time or the will to agree on a compromise."

McConnell Emphasizes His Independence From White House. In the Washington Post (12/3, 690K), David Broder writes, "Ask Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky to name his role models for his responsibilities as Senate minority leader in the next Congress, and the answer is surprising. 'Mike Mansfield and George Mitchell,' he replied the other day. 'I know they're both Democrats, but I admire the way they ran things here.' … When McConnell was asked, during a visit to The Post last week, what obligation he felt toward the current President Bush, he replied, 'I was elected by Senate Republicans, and they are the ones to whom I am responsible.' While emphasizing that he was in 'philosophical agreement' with the president, he clearly sees his role differently than did his predecessor, retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee. Frist was installed in the leadership job with major help from the Bush White House and often appeared to be more the president's liaison to the Senate than the Senate's leader."

Historians Examine Bush's Place In History In WPost Essays. In today's Washington Post (12/3, B1 and B5, 690K) "Outlook" section, five historians consider how history will compare President Bush to his predecessors, devoting more than 5,000 cumulative words to the subject. Their assessments are quite negative.

The harshest, headlined "He's The Worst Ever," comes from Eric Foner of Columbia University, who says the "cronyism, corruption and pro-business bias of the Bush administration" has surpassed that of Presidents Harding and Coolidge, and that while President Nixon "considered himself above the law," Bush "has taken this disdain for law even further." Foner concludes, "It is impossible to say with certainty how Bush will be ranked in, say, 2050. But somehow, in his first six years in office he has managed to combine the lapses of leadership, misguided policies and abuse of power of his failed predecessors. I think there is no alternative but to rank him as the worst president in U.S. history."

Michael Lind of the New America Foundation is only slightly kinder, with his piece headlined "He's Only Fifth Worst." Lind says Presidents Buchanan, Andrew Johnson, Nixon, and Madison adopted policies that "were even more disastrous. … To qualify a president for the Worst of All Time list, a war must be catastrophic as well as unnecessary. … The two big, unjustified wars on my list are the War of 1812 and the current conflict in Iraq."

Tulane University's Douglas Brinkley says it is "dangerous for historians to wield the 'worst president' label like a scalp-hungry tomahawk simply because they object to Bush's record. But we live in speedy times and, the truth is, after six years in power and barring a couple of miracles, it's safe to bet that Bush will be forever handcuffed to the bottom rungs of the presidential ladder. The reason: Iraq. … The problem for Bush is that certitude is only a virtue if the policy enacted is proven correct." However, Bush "is an honest man" and his Administration "has been largely void of widespread corruption. This will help him from being portrayed as a true villain. This last point is crucial. Though Bush may be viewed as a laughingstock, he won't have the zero-integrity factors that have kept Nixon and Harding at the bottom in the presidential sweepstakes."

David Greenberg of Rutgers University also says "At Least He's Not Nixon," writing under that headline that "as the now-flourishing reputations of Truman, Eisenhower and Reagan attest, the antipathy a president elicits from his contemporaries usually fades over time. And as Nixon's still-dismal reputation also attests, in the contest for the dubious title of 'worst president,' Bush faces stiff competition. … However toxic the fallout from Iraq, it's hard to imagine that it could greatly exceed the damage wrought by Vietnam." And "if Bush has given Nixon good chase when it comes to undemocratic hardball politics, he hasn't surpassed the master."

The piece most favorable to Bush comes from Vincent Cannato of the University of Massachusetts, who says "today's pronouncements that Bush is the 'worst president ever' are too often ideology masquerading as history. … There certainly are echoes of Truman in the current carping about Bush." He adds, "No one expects historians to be perfectly objective. But history should at least teach us humility. Time will cool today's political passions. As years pass, more documents will be released, more insights gleaned and the broader picture of this era will be painted. Only then will we begin to see how George W. Bush fares in the pantheon of U.S. presidents."

More Historical Comparisons For Bush. In the Washington Post (12/3, W23, 690K), Joel Achenbach notes that George Will "recently wrote that the Republicans were routed in the November elections because of 'war leadership even worse than during the War of 1812.' … Until recently there were three levels of wartime incompetence: Bad, Very Bad and War of 1812 Bad." After examining the mishaps of that conflict, Achenbach concludes, "maybe in a few years, historians will be able to tell us if there's a new standard."

In his New York Times (12/3, WK12, 1.16M) column, Frank Rich writes of President Bush, "Whatever the reason, he is slipping into the same zone as Woodrow Wilson did when refusing to face the rejection of the League of Nations, as a sleepless L.B.J. did when micromanaging bombing missions in Vietnam, as Ronald Reagan did when checking out during Iran-Contra."

Crisis Management Experts Have Advice For Bush. The Washington Post (12/3, B4, 690K) runs advice on "Presidential Crisis Management" from professionals in that field. Burson Marsteller founder Harold Burson says to President Bush, "I think the American public is very forgiving. The admission that you were on the wrong track and you're changing works well in this country." Crisis management consultant James Lukaszewski says Bush "should prepare America to compassionately welcome all of our troops now in harm's way as they return home, and advocate a plan to help them reenter private life." Crisis communications consultant Helio Fred Garcia advises that "the first two rules of crisis management are: 1) Think clearly; and 2) Take the pain. … Bush's presidency risks being defined by his failure to think clearly or to take the pain." And public relations executive Larry Kamer says, "There's an adage in crisis communications: They don't care that you know until they know that you care. I'm not sure the president's compassion is showing through, and it's hurting his stature and credibility."

Rice In Running For Time "Person Of The Year." CNN (12/2, Whitfield) reported Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, "crisscrossing the globe as the diplomatic sands shifts in Iraq and in Washington…lands a nomination as Time magazine's Person of the Tear." Time World Editor Romesh Ratnesar said Rice "has emerged the pivotal figure in the Bush Administration's national security team. As secretary of state, she's come into her own and she's developed a level of influence within administration that I think only the Vice President possibly can match. Her main accomplishment is sort of shifting the rhetoric of the Administration's foreign policy away from this kind of unilateralist, 'with us or against us' approach that we saw first term. And we could see next year or the year after Condoleezza Rice really being thrust to the forefront as the US tries to deal both with managing some kind of withdrawal from Iraq and also dealing with the threats from Iran and North Korea."

Negroponte Plans To Stay On. The Washington Post (12/3, Pincus, 690K) reports Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte, "who had been rumored to be going over to the State Department as deputy secretary, said last week that he plans to remain in his current position through the end of the Bush administration." There had been concern "that Negroponte would leave the newly created position after having assembled a staff from other agencies that now totals 1,200." He said of Secretary-designate Robert Gates, with whom he worked in the Reagan administration, "I look forward very much to working with him again."

Bush Administration Said To Have Loosened Trucking Safety Standards. The New York Times (12/3, A1, Labaton, 1.16M) reports that lawsuits against trucking companies involved in fatal crashes may determine "whether the Bush administration's decision to reject tighter industry regulation and instead reduce what officials viewed as cumbersome rules permitted a poorly trained trucker to stay behind the wheel, alone, instead of resting after a long day of driving. After intense lobbying by the politically powerful trucking industry, regulators a year earlier had rejected proposals to tighten drivers' hours and instead did the opposite, relaxing the rules on how long truckers could be on the road. … Government officials had also turned down repeated requests from insurers and safety groups for more rigorous training for new drivers." According to the Times, "Federal officials…have dismissed the assertion that deregulation has reduced safety and have maintained that in fact it has helped. … In loosening the standards, the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration was fulfilling President Bush's broader pledge to free industry of what it considered cumbersome rules. In the last six years, the White House has embarked on the boldest strategy of deregulation in more than a generation."

Bush-Webb Meeting Caused "Tense Moment" At White House. CNN's Lou Dobbs This Week (12/2, Pilgrim) reported, "A tense moment at the White House between President Bush and the newly elected senator from Virginia, Jim Webb, this week. Webb is a highly decorated Vietnam veteran and his son is serving in Iraq with the Marine Corps. The President and Webb met at a White House reception." CNN (Schneider) continued, "Jim Webb became a Democrat and ran for the Senate for one big reason: Iraq. … Webb has special credibility on Iraq. He was a military officer who served in Vietnam, a former secretary of the Navy under President Reagan, and he has a son serving in Iraq. He wore his son's old combat boots during the campaign." The White House "incident is causing a lot of tut-tutting in Washington. A Democratic Senate staffer told the Post, 'I think Webb is going to be a total pain. He's going to do things his own way.' … Webb's confrontation is a striking contrast to pictures of Democrats meeting with President Bush and pledging cooperation and bipartisanship."

Firm Tied To CDC's Gerberding Obtained Noncompetitive Contracts. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/3, Young, 379K) reports, "It began when a prominent Atlanta business leader introduced Dr. Julie Gerberding to a man who wanted to be her free management adviser, to help her transform operations at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Now the agency is scrambling to explain the gyrations it used to give $10 million in business without competition to a consulting firm associated with and recommended by CDC director Gerberding's free adviser. A CDC public relations risk-management analysis obtained by The Atlanta Journal-Constitution identified several 'threats' to the agency, including 'significant procurement mistakes' and an 'inappropriately backdated' contract document. … And an explanation offered late Friday by CDC officials appears to illustrate questionable practices that experts say are designed to award contracts to favored companies, denying others the opportunity to compete and taxpayers the assurance that the government is paying a fair price."

Researcher May Get More Funding For Controversial Gulf War Syndrome Work. On its front page, the Washington Post (12/3, Brown, 690K) reports that "even though most other scientists long ago discounted his theories," a Texas epidemiologist "is in line to get as much as $75 million in federal funding to press his studies of 'Gulf War syndrome.'" Robert Haley has already received $16 million thanks to "his backers in Congress and the Pentagon. … Haley and his supporters, who also include a powerful cluster of veterans and government advisers, are undeterred by the scientific consensus against him. As recently as September, a panel of the National Academy of Science's Institute of Medicine reached the same conclusion that half a dozen other expert groups had: Gulf War syndrome does not exist."

Transportation Department Touts Findings On Seat-Belt Usage. The Washington Times (12/3, Price, 88K) reports, "Fewer Americans are wearing seat belts compared with last year, but usage continues to be higher in states where motorists can be pulled over solely because they are not wearing a safety belt, a new federal study shows. Seat-belt use climbed from 58 percent in 1994 to 81 percent this year. It reached an all-time high in 2005 at 82 percent, according to a report released last week by the Department of Transportation."

"Paternalistic" Legislation Said To remain Unpopular In The US. The New York Times Magazine's Jim Holt (12/3) writes, "When the government tells you that you can't smoke marijuana or that you must wear a helmet when you ride your motorcycle even if you happen to like the feeling of the wind in your hair, it is being paternalistic. It is largely treating you the way a parent treats a child, restricting your liberty for what it deems to be your own good. Paternalistic laws aren't very popular in this country."

NYTimes Recommends Ethics Reforms Measures For New Congress. The New York Times (12/3, WK11, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "Even before the new Congress arrives, there is disquieting talk of advance compromises on what will be done — or not done. … Once the new year begins, any feeling of urgency will fade, replaced by a determination to acquire, and protect, whatever power and turf are available. At a minimum, the reforms must include: Creation of a public integrity office to do more than merely audit lobbyists' filings. … An enforceable ban, with penalties, on all meals, gifts and travel — not just from lobbyists, but also from the organizations that hire them. … Restraints on the revolving-door horde of Congressional alumni turned backslapping lobbyists. … Detailed disclosure of costly and undebated 'earmarks.'"

OTHER NEWS:

Housing Prices Continue To Decline. NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 10, 2:50, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported that "for those thinking of buying a house or those trying to sell one, if you're waiting for a change in the current trend, you may have to wait a while." NBC (Seigenthaler): "For the first time in eight months, existing home sales increased slightly this week, but in part because of plummeting prices which dropped 3.5% -- the biggest decline since 1990. Meanwhile interest rates on a 30-year fixed loan fell to 6.14%, the lowest in nearly a year."

Inflation Concerns Fail To Raise Bond Rates. The New York Times (12/3, BU6, De Aenlle, 1.16M) reports, "If you look at bond yields and economic reports like one on Friday that showed weakness in manufacturing, you may not think" inflation is resurgent, but "other evidence may be more worrisome. Economic growth and inflation often go hand in hand. Some recent reports have shown a bit of resilience in the housing market and an upward revision to the calculation of third-quarter economic output. Plainly spelling out the risks, Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, said in a speech last week that inflation remained 'uncomfortably high.' None of this has lifted rates on 10-year Treasury notes, which yield less than 4.5 percent, versus short-term rates above 5 percent."

Narrowing Gender Pay Gap Attributed To Erosion Of Men's Wages. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "Women are closing in on men when it comes to wages, but not for the reasons anticipated — or hoped for — when gender pay equity became a rallying cry in the 1970s. Data show that the pay gap has been narrowing not because women have made great strides, labor experts say, but because men's wages are eroding. The disparity in median hourly pay between men and women narrowed to 18.3% in August from 21.5% five years earlier, according to recently released census figures. In addition, the U.S. Labor Department noted recently that the wage differential in 2005 was the smallest since the department began tracking it 33 years ago, when it was 36.9%. … The difference between men's and women's median annual earnings shrank between 2000 and 2005 from 26.3% to 23%, or 77 cents on each dollar earned by men. Women earned an average $31,858 and men $41,386."

Employers Said To Prize Former Autoworkers. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Huffstutter, 850K) reports, "After decades of being kicked around by foreign competitors and laid off by the hundreds of thousands by their U.S. employers, the autoworker has unexpectedly become one of the hottest commodities in industrial America. .. For employers outside the Rust Belt, the bounty of former autoworkers is pure gold. For generations, these workers have epitomized the industrial work ethic, putting in long hours on often mind-numbing tasks involving complex machinery."

Privacy Concerns Stymie Health Information Technology Drive. The New York Times (12/3, BU1, Freudenheim, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "Powerful forces are lobbying hard for government and private programs that could push the nation's costly and inefficient health care system into the computer age. President Bush strongly favors more use of health information technology. Health insurance and medical device companies are eager supporters, not to mention technology companies like I.B.M. and Google. Furthermore, Intel and Wal-Mart Stores have both said they intend to announce plans this week to embrace electronic health records for their employees. ... Bills to speed the adoption of information technology by hospitals and doctors have passed both chambers of Congress. But the legislation has bogged down, largely because of differences over how to balance the health care industry's interest in efficiently collecting, studying and using data with privacy concerns for tens of millions of ordinary Americans."

Progress On Stem Cell Research Slower Than Some Expected. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Engel, 850K) reports, "Two years after California voters authorized $3 billion in bonds to fund stem cell research, the institute created to oversee the enterprise has just begun what experts see as a long and slow scientific journey. Even with the $150-million state loan approved recently to kick-start work stalled by legal challenges, there are no breakthroughs in sight. Gone are the allusions to healing such afflictions as spinal cord injuries and Parkinson's and Alzheimer's diseases that dominated the 2004 campaign for Proposition 71. In fact, scientists say, there is no guarantee of cures — certainly not any time soon — from the measure that was optimistically titled the California Stem Cell Research and Cures Act."

US Said To Be Moving Inexorably Towards National Health Care. In a piece for the New York Times (12/3, BU4, 1.16M) Slate's Daniel Gross writes, "When Democrats assume control of Congress next month, they may be dusting off some long-dormant proposals on how to deal with the growing disconnect between health insurance and employment. … Any efforts to expand government's role in providing insurance will likely be opposed by the Bush administration, which says it opposes excessive direct government involvement in an industry that constitutes about 14 percent of the gross domestic product. Michael O. Leavitt , the secretary of health and human services, recently dismissed a proposal to have the government negotiate drug prices for the Medicare benefit, arguing that 'it's a surrogate for a much larger issue, which is really government-run health care.' While the administration may oppose government-run health care in principle, the government's role in the vast health industry has been expanding. By various measures, the United States is about halfway toward a system in which the government and taxpayers fully fund health care. And trends are pushing the government to become more involved each year."

Clinton Signals Presidential Run Likely In Meetings With New York Democrats. Deep inside the A section, the New York Times (12/3, A45, Healy, 1.16M) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton "has begun a calculated series of meetings with top New York Democratic officials to signal that she is likely to run for the presidency in 2008 and to ask for their support if she does, according to one state Democratic official who spoke with her and two others who have been briefed on her plans." Clinton met with Rep. Charles Rangel, "dean of the New York Congressional delegation," this week, and also spoke with New York Democratic Party Chairman Herman D. Farrell Jr., who "confirmed that Senator Clinton briefed him on her 2008 intentions; Mr. Rangel declined to describe their conversation." Clinton's "maneuvering comes at a time of growing speculation about a hard-fought contest for the Democratic presidential nomination between her and another possible hopeful," Sen. Barack Obama.

Clark, Edwards Carry 2004 Campaign Debts As They Eye 2008. The AP (12/2) reports possible presidential candidates Wesley Clark and John Edwards "have debts of several hundred thousand dollars from their unsuccessful White House bids in 2004, a burden as they consider presidential runs in 2008." At the end of September, Edwards had "about $2,200" in his campaign account and more than $300,000 in debt. Clark "had about $390,000 left from the last campaign and debts totaling more than $260,000."

No Texans Among Large Crop Of 2008 Presidential Hopefuls. Cox News Service (12/2, Herman) looks at the "Texas-sized hole in the crowded field of candidates" for the White House in 2008, writing that among 24 potential candidates, Texas, "the Land of the Big Ego, has none, zilch, nada. … Nothing personal against the state, observers say, noting instead that Texas, for once, is short on candidates of presidential caliber." Gov. Rick Perry and Sens. John Cornyn and Kay Bailey Hutchison are not "presidential contenders. Hutchison, however, gets mentions as a potential vice presidential candidate, especially if the Democrats nominate New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and the GOP feels pressured to put a woman on the ticket." But Hutchison "could be a tough sell to the GOP's social conservative base because of her support for abortion rights before a fetus is viable outside the womb."

Dean Says Democrats Must Avoid Post-Victory Complacency. The New York Times (12/3, A38, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports DNC Chairman Howard Dean, addressing the party's executive committee, warned Democrats "not to revel too long in the victories from last month's midterm elections or treat their Congressional majorities as a permanent directive from voters." Dean said, "The other party made mistakes in the past claiming that elections are mandates. Elections are not mandates. The voters of this country loaned the Democrats the power of the country for two years. Now it's our job to earn it back again." The AP (12/2, Lester) reports Dean added, "George Bush made a huge mistake by representing half of America, while treating the rest of us with contempt. We need to reach out to everybody whether they agree with us or not."

Denver Makes Bid For 2008 Democratic Convention. The New York Times (12/3, A36, Johnson, 1.16M) examines Denver's bid to host the 2008 Democratic National Convention. If Denver bests the other contender, New York, it will be the first convention in the city since Democrats nominated William Jennings Bryan there in 1908. If Denver "prevails this time -- a decision is expected by the end of the year -- party members from around the country say it will probably be by virtue of a polished and highly organized effort to turn the city's lemons into lemonade. A new location, Denver's convention-bid organizers have argued to the party hierarchy, is precisely what the Democrats need."

Romney Deal Will Let Massachusetts Police Arrest Illegal Immigrants. The Boston Globe (12/3, A1, Levenson, Saltzman, 413K) reports Gov. Mitt Romney "has reached an agreement with federal authorities that allows the Massachusetts State Police to arrest immigrants who are in the state illegally." Critics said the agreement

"would lead to racial profiling and foster mistrust of the police in communities with large numbers of immigrants. The deal, reached in the final days of Romney's administration, also sets up a potential conflict with Governor-elect Deval L. Patrick, who has expressed strong opposition to granting the State Police such powers."

Schwarzenegger Raising Big Money For Inaugural. The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Nicholas, 850K) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "is keeping his fundraising operation at full throttle, asking donors to pay for a stylish inauguration and seeing to it that he continues to fly private jets and stage public appearances worthy of a Hollywood celebrity." Schwarzenegger's political team "has approached Chevron Corp., PG&E, Blue Cross of California, AT&T and other businesses, asking for tens of thousands of dollars to pay for a two-day celebration surrounding his Jan. 5 inauguration."

Ehrlich Urges Maryland Republicans To Unite. The Washington Times (12/3, Miller, 88K) reports outgoing Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich "called for Republican unity yesterday at the state convention, where the selection of party chairman revealed divisions within the party after last month's widespread election defeats." Ehrlich said, "The hard left is in firm control of the state, and we don't have the votes to stop them. That's not the fate of Maryland in the long term. It's just where we are today." Ehrlich said the GOP "should not 'whine' or play 'Monday-morning quarterback' about election losses that restored Democrats almost complete control of state government."

Ehrlich Cameos As State Trooper On HBO's "The Wire." The Washington Post (12/3, D3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) "Reliable Source" column reports that HBO will tonight "air an episode of the gritty Baltimore-based crime-and-politics drama 'The Wire'" in which Ehrlich "cameos as -- stay with us, here -- a trooper on security detail for the show's fictional governor of Maryland." When producers "called offering a speaking role, Ehrlich jumped at the chance. 'He's a huge fan of the show,' said spokeswoman Shareese DeLeaver."

Virginia Episcopal Bishop Threatens Breakaway Churches. The Washington Times (12/3, A1, Duin, 88K) reports Virginia Episcopal Bishop Peter J. Lee "is threatening to sue conservative Episcopal churches that soon will vote on whether to leave his diocese, saying individual members of each congregation's governing board will be liable. … Thousands of Episcopalians already have left the 2.2 million-member denomination over arguments about biblical authority and the 2003 consecration of New Hampshire Bishop V. Gene Robinson, an active homosexual."

California Diocese Moves Toward Break From Episcopal Church. The AP (12/2) reports, "In a rebuke of the Episcopal Church, a conservative diocese voted Saturday to affirm its membership in the worldwide Anglican Communion after distancing itself from the national church over the ordination of gays and women. San Joaquin, California, Bishop John-David Schofield called it a first step toward a formal break with the U.S. Anglican denomination." The New York Times (12/3, A30, Goodstein, Marshall, 1.16M) also reports on the decision by the California diocese.

Middle East Allies Said To Showcase "Soaring Concern" Over Administration Policies. Under the headline, "Mideast Allies Near A State Of Panic," the Los Angeles Times (12/3, Richter, 850K) reports President Bush "and his top advisors fanned out across the troubled Middle East over the last week to showcase their diplomatic initiatives to restore strained relationships with traditional allies and forge new ones with leaders in Iraq. But instead of flaunting stronger ties and steadfast American influence, the president's journey found friends both old and new near a state of panic." The Administration's interlocutors "expressed soaring concern over upheavals across the region that the United States helped ignite through its invasion of Iraq and push for democracy — and fear that the Bush administration may make things worse." Trips by Bush, Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice were "designed to show the American team in charge," but "ended instead in diplomatic embarrassment and disappointment, with U.S. leaders rebuked and lectured by Arab counterparts."

Hezbollah Supporters Continue Peaceful Siege Of Beirut. Reporting continues this morning on the protests by Hezbollah supporters in Beirut seeking the resignation of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora's government. The McClatchy Newspapers (12/3, Lasseter) reports, "A siege on Lebanon's American-backed government continued Saturday with tens of thousands of demonstrators … packing downtown Beirut." They "filled the roads surrounding the center of Beirut, … effectively shutting down the capital. Hezbollah gave every indication that it is prepared for the long haul: setting up long rows of tents, portable bathrooms and handing out cups of water and sandwiches."

CNN (12/2, Sadler) reported, "Thousands of government opponents pour into downtown Beirut, the commercial heart of the city paralyzed by noisy but peaceful protests. Scores of large canvas tents suggest they could be here for a long time. The opposition is led by Hezbollah, the armed militant group that fought Israel during the recent war in Lebanon, now waging this political war with words. For now, the opposition is promoting a festive mood of relentless song and dance to try to topple the western-backed government, ridiculing their political adversaries. But a ring of steel protects the Prime Minister's office complex, guarded by troops and armored vehicles in case words turn to war."

The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Stack, 850K) adds, "The massive sit-in staged by Hezbollah supporters so far has done little to dislodge the U.S.-backed government, but it has managed to turn the Lebanese capital inside out — literally." Shiite Muslims, who tend to be "some of the poorest and most marginalized people in the country," are leaving "their homes in suburban slums to camp out on the nation's priciest bit of real estate. Though they often have trudged through Lebanese history as war refugees, now they have managed to displace Lebanon's wealthiest shop owners."

The New York Times (12/3, Slackman, 1.16M) says Beirut "remained paralyzed and shuttered… The atmosphere remained festive, almost joyous, though, as protesters emerged from tents pitched in empty lots and chanted slogans, banged drums and appeared to dig in for a long stay." During the protests, "rumors abounded about what Hezbollah and its alliance, which includes the Christian Free Patriotic Movement, might be planning to escalate the conflict further. There has been talk about blocking roads and members of Parliament resigning en masse."

NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 6, 0:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Beirut, another day of protests. Thousands of supporters of the Hezbollah-led opposition took to the streets, though far fewer than yesterday. They're trying to bring the US-backed government there."

A 2,500-word story on the front page of the Washington Post (12/3, Shadid, 690K) reports, "In a city of frontiers, Beirut built another border Saturday. … Long divided by the Christian east and largely Muslim west of its 15-year civil war, Beirut is a city snarled today by far more numerous boundaries of sect, perspective and ideology, intersecting and tangling across a capital and country wrestling with a question still unanswered since independence more than 60 years ago: What is Lebanon's identity?" That series of "fault lines tell the story of the struggle underway between the country's two camps, divided by past and present, with vastly different visions of Lebanon's future: on one side Hezbollah, supported by Iran and Syria, and on the other the government, backed by the United States and France. The fault lines tell, too, of an impasse that perhaps can't be broken."

The Washington Times (12/3, Razzouk, 88K) adds Siniora's Cabinet "vowed not to cave in to calls to resign after a massive demonstration led by the pro-Syrian group Hezbollah, as protesters camped outside government offices." The protesters "tightened the political deadlock in the country, which has been nearly paralyzed because of a fierce struggle for supremacy between pro- and anti-Syrian camps within the power-sharing regime." Parliamentary Majority Leader Saad Hariri "vowed that 'the Siniora government will not fall because of pressure from the street. However long they continue their protest, it will not fall.'"

Palestinian PM Rejects PLO Call For His Resignation. The AP (12/3, Laub) reports Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh "rejected demands that his Hamas-led government resign and called for the resumption of talks to form a national unity government with the Fatah Party." Haniyeh was responding to a PLO statement on Friday asking him "to step down to make way for a new premier who could resume talks with" President Mahmoud Abbas. A Hamas spokesman "said the call for Haniyeh's resignation amounted to 'a coup.'"

Supporters Of Sunni Government Win Bahraini Election. The AP (12/3) says yesterday's parliamentary election in Bahrain "reinforced sectarian divisions between Shiites and Sunnis and witnessed a deepening Islamic conservatism in the U.S. ally, considered among the most liberal of Gulf Arab states." Government supporters including "Islamic hardliners" defeated parties representing the opposition Shiite majority, who "have long complained they are squeezed out of power by the Sunni monarchy." The returns "gave a sweeping victory to hard-liners from both of Islam's chief branches who bulldozed challenges by progressive candidates and women. Twelve of the 22 pro-government winners were hardliners."

In Washington Visit, Yanukovych Seeks To "Renovate His Image." Under the headline, "Ukraine PM Aims To Mend Fences With U.S.," the AP (12/3, Bellaby) previews today's arrival in Washington of Ukrainian Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych. "He was cast by critics as the Russian-backed bad guy during Ukraine's Orange Revolution two years ago, the burly politician who almost stole the presidential election from the pro-Western leader Viktor Yushchenko." Now, Yanukovych "says he hopes to renovate his image in the West during his meetings with U.S. officials," likely to include Vice President Cheney and Secretaries Rice and Bodman." He "has tried not to overtly antagonize the West. For instance, while delaying Ukraine's membership bid into NATO, he does support continuing cooperation with the alliance. On Tuesday, he called the U.S. 'a strategic partner of Ukraine.'" Yanukovych "is trying to improve his soft powers along with his hard-nosed political moves."

Jockeying For Putin's Endorsement In 2008 Underway. In a 1,400-word piece, the Los Angeles Times (12/3, Holley, 850K) describes Russian President Vladimir Putin's role in selecting his successor. The "buzz" in Moscow "is that" First Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev and Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov "are the leading contestants in a competition to be [Putin's] anointed successor when his second term expires in 2008." The Times adds, "With Putin enjoying popularity ratings above 70% and holding ever greater centralized power, a presidential endorsement is widely seen here as key to succeeding him. That means the current contest among Medvedev, Ivanov and other potential candidates for the big man's nod may well prove more crucial than the 2008 election in determining Russia's course."

Litvinenko's "World Of Deceptions" Detailed. A front-page story in the New York Times (12/3, A1, Cowell, 1.16M) details the final decade of the life of Alexander Litvinenko, the former KGB agent and critic of Vladimir Putin who died of polonium-210 poisoning last week in London. His career "began in the roller-coaster politics and self-enrichment of post-Soviet Russia, spanned his desperate flight from Russia through Turkey and then on to Britain to seek asylum. It ended spectacularly and mysteriously… After Mr. Litvinenko's death, sketchy facts and abundant speculation unfolded like some lost chapter of the cold war. But unlike those days of East-West division and the half-light of shadowy, underground conflicts, this saga played out in the bright glare of newspaper headlines and 24-hour news channels." A separate New York Times (12/3, WK4, Myers, 1.16M) piece entitled, "There's A Reason Russians Are Paranoid," details some of the popular Russian reaction to – and theories about – Litvinenko's death.

NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 8, 2:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Authorities are still trying to figure out who is responsible for the radiation poisoning death of a former Russian spy." NBC (Colt): "Winter is coming to Moscow. Difficult times lie ahead and it's not just the change of the seasons. Russia is finding itself in the hot glare of an international inquiry into the radiation killing of Alexander Litvinenko in London last week."

On its front page, the Washington Times (12/3, Rayment, 88K) carries reporting by the London Sunday Telegraph that "the Russian intelligence services, prime suspects in [Litvinenko's death], have a network of more than 30 spies operating in Britain. The sophisticated ring represents the greatest espionage threat facing Britain." That "startling intelligence was presented last week to Cabinet ministers at a meeting of Cobra, the anti-terrorist task force." Russian operatives in the UK "are known to be monitoring the movements and activities of Russian emigres and opponents of Russian President Vladimir Putin," and "are involved in a widespread operation targeting businessmen, members of Parliament and scientists in an attempt to steal commercial and state secrets." Recent estimates place the UK second only to the US for unknowingly hosting Russian agents.

Castro Absent From Massive Parade In His Honor. The McClatchy Newspapers (12/3, Robles) reports, "In a clear signal that Cuba's post-Castro era has begun, an ailing Fidel Castro failed to appear at a massive military parade in his honor Saturday while his brother and designated successor delivered an inaugural speech of sorts." McClatchy adds, "Many Cuba-watchers had expected Fidel to make his first public appearance at the parade since" July, and his "absence was certain to fuel U.S. reports that he suffers from terminal cancer and likely will not live past 2007." Raul Castro "renewed his willingness to negotiate an end to the almost 50 years of animosity between Washington and Havana. But on his own terms."

NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 5, 2:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In Cuba, thousands turned out today for a major military parade paying tribute to Fidel Castro who was expected to appear but at the last minute, he didn't show up. His absence once again raises questions about his health and his ability to lead." NBC (Potter): "The public salute to his brother from Raul Castro today did little to cheer the crowd. Thousands had gathered, hoping to finally see the ailing Fidel Castro -- ailing Fidel Castro. But at a parade in have a Havana, he once again failed to appear with no explanation."

The AP (12/3, Snow) says yesterday's event is "raising questions about whether the ailing leader will ever return to power as his public absence begins taking on a tone of permanence." Raul's address "reached out to the U.S. government," and he "did not explain the absence of his brother."

Under the headline, "A Rare Silence Reverberates In Castro's Long Goodbye," the New York Times (12/3, Lacey, 1.16M) notes, "In his day, Fidel Castro could not stop talking. He was Cuba's talk show host as well as its president," but now he "is silent, leaving a gap on state-run broadcasts and confused audiences." His absence yesterday "left many Cubans convinced that their leader of nearly half a century had delivered his final speech." The Times adds that Fidel's "Cuba is very much a work in progress."

The Washington Post (12/3, A20, Roig-Franzia, 690K) reports, "There were no guarantees that [Fidel] would surface. Just rumors and whispers, whispers and rumors. The sounds of Havana wrestling with its greatest modern mystery trickled out of faded doorways and clattered off the chipped facades of this gracefully decaying capital." In the end, "the man they had all come to see never showed up. Castro remained hidden away, his illness shrouded in mystery, his whereabouts a jealously guarded state secret. … Many Cubans expected the uncertainty about Fidel Castro to be cleared up Saturday. But the day ended with more confusion."

The January/February 2007 edition of Foreign Affairs has a 6,200-word essay by Julia Sweig of the Council on Foreign Relations that argues that "with or without Fidel, renewed U.S. efforts to topple the revolutionary regime in

Havana can do no good -- and have the potential to do considerable harm."

Pinochet Stricken By Heart Attack. The AP (12/3, Gallardo) reports former Chilean leader Augusto Pinochet, 91, "was hospitalized early Sunday after suffering a heart attack and is in serious but stable condition, the Santiago Military Hospital said." Pinochet spokesman Guilleremo Garin "said the former strongman was undergoing 'thorough medical tests. It's a heart condition. That's all we know now.'"

Robust Venezuelan Economy Absent From Campaign Rhetoric. In continuing coverage of the run-up to today's Venezuelan presidential vote, the New York Times (12/3, A8, Romero, 1.16M) notes, "To understand why Hugo Chávez seems set for victory … and a strengthened mandate for what he calls a socialist revolution, consider the vigor" of the Caracas stock exchange. "Often lost in the campaigning between Mr. Chávez and his electoral challenger, Manuel Rosales, is that Venezuela, with the largest conventional petroleum reserves outside the Middle East, is having one of the most significant oil booms in its history." While Chavez is known for "wrapping" his presidency "in socialist imagery," the Times says he "has made this expansion possible by quietly working with Venezuela's banking system." In the election campaign, neither Chavez nor Rosales "seems to acknowledge the growing consumerism in rich and poor households as one of the main reasons Mr. Chávez has resilient popularity ratings after eight years as president."

The Washington Post (12/3, A21, Forero, 690K)'s pre-election report focuses on the growing ties between Chavez and some business owners. There are "a growing number of business leaders who reject the doom-and-gloom scenario and see something else entirely in Venezuela's free-spending government: opportunity." The "economy has evolved into one marked by contradictions: the highest growth rate in the Americas and grinding underemployment, out-of-control consumerism and a lack of investment, troubling uncertainty and golden prospects." However, the status quo "seems to have been very good to a new class of entrepreneurs in Venezuela who have either allied themselves with the government or found a way to have a cordial relationship. Many of them have secured lucrative government contracts, and the opposition has dubbed them the Boliburguesia, short for the Bolivarian bourgeoisie."

The Los Angeles Times (12/3, Kraul, 850K) adds, "The United States had better get used to its Latin American nemesis, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. If, as expected, he wins reelection to a new six-year term today, he says he will seek a change in the constitution that would enable him to serve indefinitely." The Times says Rosales' "only hope of victory lies in capturing large numbers of undecided voters."

Philippine Mudslides, Sparked By Typhoon, Could Claim 700. NBC Nightly News (12/2, story 7, 0:10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "In the Philippines tonight, mudslides have covered whole villages. The rivers of mud were triggered by a typhoon which blasted ashore with winds at more than 150 miles per hour. At least 300 people are dead with another 300 still missing." The AP (12/2) adds, "Hopes virtually vanished Sunday for finding survivors."

African Entrepreneurs Forsake Local Manufacturing For Trade With China. A lengthy background piece in today's Washington Post (12/3, A23, Timberg, 690K) notes the growing economic links between China and Africa. One family's "shift, from manufacturing to trading, mirrors a broader one across Nigeria and much of Africa. A 30-year experiment in building local factory capacity has faltered with declining trade barriers and rising global competition, most powerfully from China. African business leaders increasingly are staking their fortunes on old-fashioned extractive industries, such as oil production needed to fuel Asian industry, while also attempting to profit from the flood of finished goods coming in return."

China Cautioned Against Continuing "Blame Game" On Environmental Degradation. The Council on Foreign Relations' Elizabeth Economy titles her Washington Post (12/3, B7, 690K) op-ed, "A Blame Game China Needs To Stop." China is unlikely "to adopt tough new energy and environmental standards," and puts most "of the blame for the country's mounting environmental problems squarely on the shoulders of foreigners and, in particular, multinational companies." The "climate issue has focused the world's attention not only on China's contribution to global warming but also on its role as the largest contributor to a range of other global environmental problems such as ozone depletion, the illegal timber trade and marine pollution." China should not risk trade and "its own environmental future" for the "short-term and largely illusory benefits of playing an environmental blame game."

Canada's Liberals Elect Dion Leader. Major media report on the Canadian Liberals' election of professor Stephane Dion as their leader. The New York Times (12/3, Austen, 1.16M) calls it "a surprising outcome," saying Michael Ignatieff's "lack of connections both within the Liberal Party and Canada in general seemed to play a role in his defeat." Dion promised to "move back into campaign mode almost immediately and try to lead the party back to power through a general election that may come as early as spring."

The AP (12/3, Duff-Brown) describes Dion as "a former environment minister who criticized the conservative prime minister for modeling himself after President Bush." He "was part of the team of Liberals under former Prime Minister Jean Chretien who opposed the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003 and turned down Washington's request to join."

BBC.com (12/3) notes its local reporter "says the election was a nail-biter, as 5,000 delegates struggled to decide who was most likely to beat the Conservatives." Dion's victory speech "made clear he would make the Kyoto Protocol on curbing greenhouse gases a key part of the strategy to win the next elections." The Washington Post (12/3, A21, Struck, 690K) says the vote "underscored the rising political weight of climate change issues."

In Turkey Trip, Benedict May Have Broached New Ground In Papacy. The New York Times (12/3, WK1, Fisher, 1.16M) reviews Pope Benedict XVI's trip to Turkey, asking if he's "gone wobbly?" Noting that Benedict "has stood for a remarkably clear idea: there is truth, and we won't retreat from it," the Times says in Turkey "the face of confrontation, and perhaps the hold on certainty, seemed to soften." Accordingly, "a new and ever more interesting chapter in this young papacy, as well as in the larger issue of how to engage the Muslim world, including those elements of it that resort to violence, seemed to open on Benedict's four days in Turkey." While some analysts are asking if Benedict "has somehow gone soft," other experts "put the question another way: can one's idea of truth be expressed differently, especially when reality gets in the way?"

Under the headline, "German Turks Ask Where They Fit Now," a separate New York Times (12/3, WK14, Landler, 1.16M) piece says Benedict's "message fell short of a full embrace; he never, for example, dropped his definition of Europe as a place with a Christian history. Such ambiguity about welcoming Turkey and Islam into Europe is felt deeply across the continent, and it turns out that the Turks who have migrated [to Berlin] mirror it. They feel part of Germany and Europe, and yet never fully welcomed."

NYTimes Pans EU Stalling On Turkish Accession. The New York Times (12/3, 1.16M) editorializes, "The strained relationship between Europe and Turkey took two steps forward last week and, we fear, at least that many backward." Benedict's "efforts at conciliation may be undercut if the European Union [decides] to freeze part of the negotiating program for Turkey's membership unless Turkey opens its ports to shipping from Cyprus." The Times says such a move "looked like another ploy to keep Turkey out of the union." Saying the EU must "press the Greek Cypriots to settle" the conflict there, the Times notes "Europe and all of the West have a lot to gain" from Turkish membership. The Times concludes that it "would be a strong sign that the West truly believes its claims of tolerance and respect for all religions."

German Government Will Ask Parliament To Ban Some Smoking In Public. The New York Times (12/3, A8, Landler, 1.16M) reports, "Yielding grudgingly to the growing European campaign against smoking in public places, Germany announced Friday that it would seek to ban smoking in restaurants, discos, schools and other public buildings, but not in pubs, bars or beer tents." The deal "would bring this country, Europe's biggest tobacco market, closer to its neighbors in curtailing public smoking. But it would fall short of the recent laws passed by Britain, France, Ireland and Italy, which stamp out cigarettes in pubs and bars as well as other public places."

NYTimes Chides World Community's Lack Of "Urgency" On AIDS. The New York Times (12/3, WK11, 1.16M) editorializes, "Despite all the lofty goals set by world leaders, and billions of dollars thrown into the fight to quench the global AIDS pandemic in recent years, it is discouraging to learn the world is still falling behind." The Times notes a "resurgence" of the virus in some countries, and a decline in the availability of retroviral drugs. They conclude, "Progress has been slowed by many factors,… but the overriding problem may be a loss of the sense of urgency and a reluctance by most governments to commit the huge resources needed to provide universal access to treatment, prevention, care and support."

WPost Pans Icelandic Support For Bottom Trawling. In an editorial about bottom-trawling, the Washington Post (12/3, B6, 690K) notes, "Delicate ecosystems get ravaged with nobody paying attention. The Bush administration, along with several other governments, has been pushing for a moratorium on unregulated trawling on the high seas. Last month, thanks in large part to Iceland, it failed to get that measure." The Post explains, "Because the arcane rules of high-seas fishing are largely defined by consensus, even small countries that are genuine moral outliers in world attitudes toward oceans can prevent agreement." The "world's oceans are heading toward environmental collapse, which only bold action will avert." The Post concludes, "It's hard to imagine that happening if a country that hunts whales and has a population smaller than Washington's can help block a common-sense proposal to safeguard the ecological health of the ocean floor."

Hoagland Says Annan Leaving Office With Robust Legacy. In his Washington Post (12/3, B7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland reviews Kofi Annan's decade of UN leadership. His "legacy" is "easily the most active and therefore most controversial record of a secretary general since Dag Hammarskjold gave the job meaning during the Cold War." Hoagland says the "might-have-beens of Annan's two terms center on his rocky relations with the Bush administration, which have left scars on both sides." Annan believes that, "in today's polarized atmosphere, it is much more difficult to get governments to take on the burden of humanitarian intervention in places such as Darfur." Annan also offers advice to incoming Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon – 'My only advice to him about this job is to do it his way. I did it my way, which was to try to work with the United States while being the secretary-general of all United Nations members.'"

Academic Says Oil-Rich "Demagogues" Pose Serious Threat. In today's Washington Post (12/3, B1, 690K), history professor Niall Ferguson says, "The world over, demagogues are back, yelling their slogans and thumping their tubs." Although "their rhetoric may seem overblown," he says "no one should underestimate the threat these new demagogues pose -- especially to the United States." Now, "the conditions for truly dangerous demagogues to emerge are almost ideal." Ferguson's "critical point" is that "personal freedom is all too often the demagogue's first victim, especially when popular sentiment is whipped up against some internal or foreign enemy." He continues, "The good news about demagogues is that they often find it harder to deliver on election pledges than to deliver election speeches." In contrast to recent history, "today's demagogues rule oil-rich countries," and "you don't need to know a lot of history to know that hot air plus petroleum is a potentially explosive combination."

Former Mexican Minister Implores Calderon To Dismantle Political Machine. In an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (12/3, 850K), former Mexican Foreign Minister Jorge Castañeda describes President Felipe Calderon's "daunting to-do list." The "bad news for Calderon is that the telenovela that debuted on election day, July 2, is only the beginning. The toughest challenges lie ahead for him." Noting that Mexico is coming off "10 consecutive years of economic stability, low inflation, low interest rates, a stable currency and constant, if mediocre, growth," Castaneda says "it seems that Mexico's problems are more intractable than just not having [Vicente] Fox to 'kick around anymore.'" He says the "pillars" of the PRI system are intact and "represent the most formidable obstacles to Mexico's growth and success." Calderon "needs to liberate the union movement, upgrade and enforce antitrust laws to break up private monopolies and allow new competitors — even to the old public monopolies — to enter the marketplace. The barriers of entry into the marketplace of political ideas must also come down." Castenada concludes that Calderon must "move forward and take up some formidable interests that are standing in the way of Mexico's future. It will not be easy."

Last Stop for Detainee Cases May Be High Court

Jason McLure

When the U.S. military began shipping prisoners from the war on terror to Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, one goal was clear: to keep them outside the reach of the U.S. court system.

But nearly five years later, those cases remain stuck exactly where the Bush administration didn't want them to be.

The most recent battle is over the Military Commissions Act, signed by the president just six weeks ago. A key piece of that law prevents those designated "enemy combatants" from challenging their detention in federal court.

But the constitutionality of that provision is under consideration by two appellate courts, and lawyers for both the detainees and the Bush administration say it is likely the Supreme Court will again step in to decide the matter.

"I'll be surprised if the Court doesn't accept review in those cases or some others that pose similar questions," says Neal Katyal, a professor at Georgetown University Law Center who successfully argued against the administration's earlier military tribunal system in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld.

The first hurdle for the White House comes in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. There, a three-judge panel could deliver a verdict as soon as this winter in a tangled, 2-year-old case in which more than two dozen detainees at Guantánamo — some of whom have been held without trial for nearly five years — are seeking the right to file habeas corpus petitions in the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., challenging their indefinite imprisonment.

Ninety miles south of the District, in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit based in Richmond, Va., lawyers for Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a Qatari national held in a naval brig in South Carolina, are challenging his designation as an enemy combatant and also arguing for the right to challenge his detention in federal court.

Though the high court almost certainly wouldn't hear arguments in an appeal of either case until next fall, that hasn't stopped the Defense Department from moving forward with plans to try roughly 70 of the approximately 430 Guantánamo detainees on war-crimes charges. Last month the Pentagon said it would seek funds to build a $125 million courthouse complex at Guantánamo, with the goal of holding the first military commissions in July. But if the courts declare portions of the MCA unconstitutional, the Pentagon's plans could be thrown into disarray — and any convictions it secures could be declared invalid.

In addition, there's the potential that Congress could act before the Supreme Court has a chance. With Democrats claiming Congressional majorities in last month's midterm elections, Congress could attempt to revise the MCA's habeas provisions. Sen. Christopher Dodd (D-Conn.) introduced a bill just last month that would undo those provisions. And Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has signaled his intention to re-examine the MCA.

A GOOD SUBSTITUTE?

Among the detainees contesting the law is Lakhdar Boumediene, one of six Algerian-born men taken into U.S. custody in Bosnia in 2002. The men, who worked for charities in Bosnia, were accused of plotting to blow up the U.S. Embassy in Sarajevo and affiliating with al Qaeda. Lawyers for Boumediene and the others have said the allegations are baseless, pointing to an official inquiry by Bosnian prosecutors into their detention in 2004 that formally cleared the men. The most substantive review of Boumediene's status has been through his Combatant Status Review Tribunal in 2004 at Guantánamo. But those tribunals have been much criticized by human rights groups and U.S. allies for being rigged against the detainees.

Boumediene v. Bush is one of two lead cases (the other is al Odah v. United States) that have been before the D.C. Circuit since early 2005 seeking the right of Guantánamo detainees to contest their detention in the District's federal trial court. Though the petitions in the twin cases include the names of fewer than three dozen detainees, the court's ruling in the case will almost certainly be applied to all those currently held at Guantánamo.

The case itself has been buffeted by the shifts in the administration's detention policy brought about by legislation from Congress and the high court's decision in Hamdan. Two sets of oral arguments have already been held, and lawyers for the government and the detainees have filed five series of briefs.

The most recent interruption has been the passage of the MCA, which included statutory language that says, "No court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by . . . an alien . . . who had been determined by the United States to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant."

In an exchange of briefs last month, lawyers for the Justice Department and detainees disputed whether the language effectively strips any statutory claim to habeas corpus and whether the Geneva Conventions trump the law and allow detainees to have their cases heard in federal court. But both sides agree that the key issue is whether the habeas language in the MCA is constitutional.

The Constitution's suspension clause says, "[T]he Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it." In the Boumediene case, the Justice Department is arguing that the MCA provides an "adequate substitute" to habeas protections, namely the Combatant Status Review Tribunals and the ability to appeal the determination of enemy-combatant status to the D.C. Circuit.

But lawyers for Boumediene and others held at Guantánamo call the procedures a sham. They point out that the CSRTs have not been overseen by judges but by uniformed military officers, detainees have not been represented by lawyers but by military officers acting as "personal representatives," and defendants have been tightly limited in which outside evidence and witnesses they could introduce.

On appeal, they argue, the D.C. Circuit is limited to determining only whether the tribunals properly followed their own procedures, not whether the procedures themselves are adequate. Additionally, they argue that because the D.C. Circuit has no power to order a prisoner's release — only to order another tribunal — the appellate review falls short of full habeas protections.

"The big issue now is, if they've taken away the right to habeas corpus, have they given a reasonable substitute for us?" says Thomas Wilner, a lawyer at Shearman & Sterling who represents a number of detainees in the case.

Wilner and the other lawyers in the case have also garnered support from an unlikely ally: former solicitor general and Whitewater independent counsel Kenneth Starr, who wrote to Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) this fall to express his concerns about the MCA's attempt to strip habeas corpus from the detainees.

"Although no one wants the War on Terror to be litigated in the courts," Starr wrote in the letter, dated Sept. 24 (just before the MCA's passage), "Congress should act cautiously to strike a balance between the need to detain enemy combatants during the present conflict and the need to honor the historic privilege of the writ of habeas corpus."

THE ENEMY WITHIN

Like Boumediene and the other Guantánamo detainees, Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri has been declared an enemy combatant. But unlike Boumediene, who was taken into custody overseas, al-Marri was arrested by the FBI in Peoria, Ill., in 2001. The Justice Department brought a series of indictments against al-Marri, a Qatari who was beginning graduate studies at Bradley University, accusing him of credit-card fraud and lying to federal agents.

But just weeks before al-Marri was scheduled to face criminal trial in 2003, President George W. Bush declared him an enemy combatant and an al Qaeda "sleeper agent," and al-Marri was transferred to military custody in South Carolina, where he was interrogated and held without access to a lawyer or International Red Cross monitors until the fall of 2004.

Al-Marri's lawyer Jonathan Hafetz, of the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University Law School, says the government chose to change al-Marri's status after it became clear they had a poor criminal case. "If they have the evidence they say they have, why haven't they tried him?" says Hafetz.

The government contends that as the investigation of al-Marri continued, it became clear that he was intent on waging jihad — citing a call made from al-Marri's cell phone to a suspected al Qaeda financier overseas and numerous files on al-Marri's computer that included speeches by Osama bin Laden and Web sites where al-Marri allegedly researched hydrogen cyanide, a poisonous gas. "It became clear to us that [al-Marri] was, in fact, not just a run-of-the-mill felon but a very bad person linked up with al Qaeda," says a Justice Department lawyer with knowledge of the detention cases.

As in the Boumediene case before the D.C. Circuit, the Justice Department has told the 4th Circuit to remand al-Marri's habeas application for dismissal on the grounds that the MCA bars courts from hearing all habeas petitions from aliens designated as enemy combatants — not just those who were detained overseas.

In many ways, al-Marri's case resembles that of Jose Padilla, an American citizen whom the government detained in Chicago in 2002 and declared an enemy combatant. Later, after Padilla had been detained for nearly two years with no access to counsel, the government shifted course and asked that Padilla be transferred out of military custody and into the federal court system, drawing an angry rebuke from the usually supportive 4th Circuit in the process.

Like Boumediene, al-Marri's case will test the constitutionality of the MCA's habeas-stripping provisions under the suspension clause. But al-Marri's lawyers are also arguing that denying him access to the courts violates the equal protection clause under the 14th Amendment. That's because in the Hamdi v. Rumsfeld decision, the Supreme Court found that U.S. citizens cannot be detained as enemy combatants and, according to al-Marri's argument, that protection should extend to legal aliens detained far from any battlefield.

The government argues that a number of laws treat U.S. residents differently based on their immigration status. But the DOJ lawyer familiar with the cases says that although he's confident in the government's position in both Boumediene and al-Marri, the latter could prove more difficult for the government. "There is an additional legal argument in the al-Marri case," he says.

Al-Marri's lawyers also have the advantage of a prominent ally: Former Attorney General Janet Reno, who has rarely criticized her successors, has signed off on an amicus brief with other former DOJ officials condemning the government's handling of al-Marri.

Oral arguments in al-Marri's case likely won't take place until early February, by which time the D.C. Circuit may have already ruled in Boumediene's case. But by then the 110th Congress, with its newly elected Democratic majority, could well be applying new pressure to the administration's habeas policies. Leahy, who will take the helm of the Senate Judiciary Committee in January, has referred to the election as an "intervention" and made no secret of his distaste for the MCA. "Congress had no justification for suspending the writ of habeas corpus — a core value in American law — in order to avoid judicial review that prevents government abuse," said Leahy in a statement forwarded to Legal Times by his office.

Meanwhile, Dodd's bill, which would restore habeas protections, will likely be reintroduced during the next session of Congress. This summer, during the debate over the MCA, an amendment sponsored by Specter granting detainees access to the courts fell just short in the Senate, failing with a vote of 51-48, though it garnered the votes of a handful of moderate GOP senators. Since then, the Senate's composition has shifted further to the left, and Democrats will enjoy a 13-vote majority in the House.

That still leaves the administration's opponents well short of the two-thirds supermajority needed to override a veto, but lawyers for detainees are hoping that even without a change in the law, congressional hearings could put pressure on the administration to change course. "Guantánamo has only been allowed to exist because it's been hidden from the public eye," says Wilner, who represents some of the detainees with petitions before the D.C. Circuit.

Of course, perceptions of Guantánamo are shaped by how one views the effort to stop terrorism, which the White House has cast as a war requiring the United States to adopt entirely new legal structures.

"This basically comes down to: Their view of the world is, any process to hold these guys has to resemble a criminal trial in a [federal] court," says a second DOJ official with knowledge of the habeas litigation. "Our view is, you have to look at what happens in armed conflict and what happens in international tribunals. . . . At the broadest level, this depends on what you think this is about."

State NAACP gets permission to join No Child suit

NEW HAVEN, Conn ._A federal judge grants the Connecticut N-Double-A-C-P's request to become a party in the state's No Child Left Behind lawsuit.

The state sued the federal government in 2002, saying the education law costs more to administer than the state receives in federal reimbursement.

But the N-Double-A-C-P isn't backing the state's argument. Rather, it's intervening as a party on the federal government's side.

Group leaders say that's because they're concerned about money being spent on the lawsuit.

They're also concerned that voiding the No Child law could set a precedent to allow the state to circumvent other civil rights statutes.

They want Connecticut's case tossed out.

JUDGE DISMISSES FARMERS' WHISTLE-BLOWER LAWSUIT

Sandy Hodson, Staff Writer

A judge has dismissed a whistle-blowers' lawsuit filed by local dairy farmers against the city of Augusta.

In an order signed Thursday, U.S. District Court Judge Orinda D. Evans of the Northern District of Georgia ruled that the lawsuit had to be dismissed, not because the allegations were false, but because of how the farmers gathered the information.

In order to prevail on the challenge raised by city attorneys, the plaintiffs had to prove they had "direct and independent knowledge of the information on which the allegations are based," the opinion stated. The judge ruled the farmers based their allegations on public records instead.

George W. Boyce and R.A. McElmurray III, local dairy farmers, and David Lewis, a retired Environmental Protection Agency microbiologist, filed the false claims act lawsuit on behalf of the United States.

"The purpose of the False Claims Act is to recover money fraudulently taken from the United States government," Judge Evans noted in the opinion.

The lawsuit alleged the Augusta-Richmond County government fraudulently obtained more than $22 million in loans in the early 1990s to fund wastewater treatment improvements. They maintained it was fraudulent because the city didn't report environmental violations and diverted funds from the wastewater treatment department to the city's general fund.

"(The plaintiffs) claim that 'without their research, defendant's misconduct never would have been exposed to the public.'" the opinion reads.

The city countered that the plaintiffs "gained whatever knowledge they have about defendant's alleged false claims second-hand from the efforts of the Georgia EPD or through documents filed in other civil litigation," the opinion reads.

The judge sided with the city attorneys on the issue. Because the farmers and microbiologist were not the original source of the information they used to form their lawsuit, they could not prevail.

The plaintiffs can appeal, if notice is filed within 30 days.

The case is the latest development in a long-standing conflict between the city and the Boyce and McElmurray families.

They have sued the city in local courts, alleging that sewage sludge that was supposed to be safe fertilizer contained hazardous elements that poisoned their land and lead to the death of cows.

The Boyce family lawsuit was tried in 2003, and a jury awarded them $550,000 in damages. The family had asked for $12.5 million.

Judge J. Carlisle Overstreet, who presided over the Boyce trial, threw out the McElmuray family lawsuit.

Higher courts, however, reinstated the lawsuit, and it is pending in Richmond County Superior Court.

Blowing the Whistle on Big Oil

EDMUND L. ANDREWS

HONOLULU DURING a 22-year career, Bobby L. Maxwell routinely won accolades and awards as one of the Interior Department's best auditors in the nation's oil patch, snaring promotions that eventually had him supervising a staff of 120 people.

He and his team scrutinized the books of major oil producers that collectively pumped billions of dollars worth of oil and gas every year from land and coastal waters owned by the public. Along the way, the auditors recovered hundreds of millions of dollars from companies that shortchanged the government on royalties.

"Mr. Maxwell's career has been characterized by exceptional performance and significant contributions," wrote Gale A. Norton, then the secretary of the interior, in a 2003 citation. Ms. Norton praised Mr. Maxwell's "perseverance and leadership" while cataloguing his "many outstanding achievements."

Less than two years later, the Interior Department eliminated his job in what it called a "reorganization." That came exactly one week after a federal judge in Denver unsealed a lawsuit in which Mr. Maxwell contended that a major oil company had spent years cheating on royalty payments.

"When I got this citation, they told me this would be very good for my career," said Mr. Maxwell, smiling during an interview here. "Next thing I knew, they fired me." Today, at 53, Mr. Maxwell lives on a $44,000 annual pension in a two-bedroom bungalow in the hills outside the Hawaiian capital.

But Mr. Maxwell has hardly disappeared. Instead, he is at the center of an escalating battle with both the oil industry and the Bush administration over how the federal government oversees about $60 billion worth of oil and gas produced every year on federal property. In the process, he has become one of the most nettlesome whistle-blowers Big Oil has ever encountered, a face-off that offers an inside look at how the industry and the government do business together.

Invoking a law that rewards private citizens who expose fraud against the government, Mr. Maxwell has filed a suit in federal court in Denver against the Kerr-McGee Corporation. The suit accuses the company, which was recently acquired by Anadarko Petroleum, of bilking the government out of royalty payments. It also contends that the Interior Department ignored audits indicating that Kerr-McGee was cheating. Three other federal auditors, who once worked for Mr. Maxwell and still work at the Interior Department, have since filed similar suits of their own against other energy companies.

Several of the nation's biggest oil producers, including Exxon Mobil, Chevron, Shell and ConocoPhillips, failed in an effort to block Mr. Maxwell's suit, arguing before an appellate judge that his case would "open the floodgates" to suits by other federal auditors. But the court rejected their pleas, and a trial is set to start on Jan. 16.

Mr. Maxwell's self-interest is as much in play in the suit as is the public interest. If he wins, Kerr-McGee could be forced to pay more than $50 million in unpaid royalties and penalties, Mr. Maxwell said. Mr. Maxwell and his lawyers could be entitled to keep as much as 30 percent of any funds the government recovers -- enough to make him a wealthy man.

Anadarko says that the government's rules were followed and that it owes no money because the Interior Department never asked it to pay more. But it is now trying to negotiate a settlement before the trial begins.

"We believe the case is without merit," said John Christiansen, an Anadarko spokesman. "However, as is a fairly common practice, both sides have agreed to meet with a mediator prior to trial."

THE actions of Mr. Maxwell and the other auditors have coincided with broader investigations by Congress and the Interior Department's own inspector general into whether the agency properly collects the money for oil and gas pumped from public land. Investigators say they have found evidence of myriad problems at the department: cronyism and cover-ups of management blunders; capitulation to oil companies in disputes about payments; plunging morale among auditors; and unreliable data-gathering that often makes it impossible to determine how much money companies actually owe.

In February, the Interior Department admitted that energy companies might escape more than $7 billion in royalty payments over the next five years because of errors in leases signed in the 1990s that officials are now scrambling to renegotiate. The errors were discovered in 2000, but were ignored for the next six years and have yet to be fixed.

Congressional investigators are worried about other problems, as well. The Interior Department's inspector general told a House subcommittee in September that senior officials at the agency had repeatedly glossed over ethical lapses and bungling. "Short of crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior," declared Earl E. Devaney, the inspector general.

The Interior Department, which has described Mr. Maxwell as a renegade former employee motivated by the riches his lawsuit might bring, said its auditing efforts received a clean bill of health from an outside accounting firm in 2005. "The results are clear and irrefutable," the agency said in a statement, adding that it was "accomplishing its job on behalf of the American public."

But Republican leaders on the House Government Reform Committee, which has been reviewing the flawed leases, recently accused Interior officials of perpetuating a "culture of irresponsibility and lack of accountability" at the agency.

The committee ordered the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, to begin a broad examination of issues ranging from the agency's rules and enforcement practices to the accuracy of its most rudimentary data.

The Interior Department "clearly doesn't view their responsibility as maximizing revenue to the American people for resources that belong to the American people," said Representative Darrell E. Issa, a California Republican who oversaw hearings on the flawed leases. "We don't have a system that accurately tells us how much oil is being taken out of the ground."

No one, says Mr. Maxwell, knows that better than he does.

BORN "Bobby," not "Robert," Mr. Maxwell is bald, burly and speaks with a back-country drawl that is occasionally punctuated by a cackling laugh. He said he thrived in the world of wells, pipelines and offshore rigs and meshed comfortably with the oil cultures of Texas and Oklahoma. Genial and unflappable, he describes his politics as "very conservative" and cringes at being labeled a rebel.

"I like the oil and gas industry," he said, as he reminisced about his years as a federal auditor. "We are neither for nor against the profits they make. Our job is to make sure the American public gets a fair return on its assets."

Mr. Maxwell grew up in a poor family in rural Tennessee. After serving in the Army in Hawaii, he earned a bachelor's degree in business at Chaminade University here. He later became a certified public accountant and earned a master's degree in business from Texas A&M. In 1983, after stints as an auditor with the Air Force and the Department of Energy, he joined the Minerals Management Service of the Interior Department.

The M.M.S. is responsible for collecting and overseeing the royalties for all the oil, gas, timber and coal that is produced on federal property. Last year, companies paid nearly $10 billion in royalties on oil and gas alone.

"I loved going to the oil companies," Mr. Maxwell recalled, saying he spent about half of his time on the road -- some of it at offshore drilling rigs. "Sometimes, there would be nothing more than a room and a helicopter pad to land on. But it was an education, and it was highly practical."

Despite Mr. Maxwell's placid demeanor, friends and former colleagues say he was a dogged auditor who sometimes rankled his own bosses. In 1988, he visited a coal mine on federal land in Montana even though, he says, his supervisors scoffed at the trip because they thought that the mine was too small to scrutinize. When Mr. Maxwell arrived, he found that the mine only looked small because it had been underpaying royalties for years. Within months, the company agreed to pay $43 million in back royalties, and it eventually paid more than $100 million.

In 1993, during the Clinton administration, officials in Washington told him to drop a complex dispute with ARCO because they thought his reasoning was dubious. But just as he was about to back down, ARCO executives volunteered to pay $20 million.

The Interior Department gave Mr. Maxwell an award that year, noting that he had "vehemently pressed his position" even though "support seemed lacking." It attributed his success to both his "measured combatant style" and his personal rapport with ARCO executives.

"If he thought there was a case, he had a reason," said Barbara Rothway, a retired Interior Department auditor. But, she added, "I could see how he might sometimes bother the people he worked for."

Patient and stubborn, Mr. Maxwell spent years poring over the accounts of the Jicarilla Apache Tribe in New Mexico, which had long complained that companies were underpaying them for natural gas extracted on their tribal lands. Tribal officials said Interior Department officials had paid little heed until Mr. Maxwell came along. He collected and organized data going back 30 years and found pervasive errors by both oil companies and the government. The tribe eventually recovered more than $20 million in back royalties.

"Anyone knowledgeable about the way Interior processes payments knows there are all sorts of ways for companies to underpay," said Alan R. Taradash, a lawyer in Albuquerque who has represented the tribe for years. "Bobby was one of the few who stood up with us and demanded that the auditing be done properly."

MR. MAXWELL says his first serious doubts about the Interior Department originated in 1998, when the agency reluctantly began to investigate accusations of systematic cheating on royalties for oil.

Several of the nation's biggest oil companies eventually settled that investigation by paying nearly $440 million. The investigation occurred only after outside whistle-blowers argued for years that the government was losing billions.

The cases had been sparked in part by a former oil trader at ARCO named J. Benjamin Johnson Jr., known as Benji, who contended that oil companies had used elaborate swapping schemes to cheat on royalties owed to private and state landowners, as well as the federal government.

Mr. Johnson and another former ARCO trader quit their jobs and became expert witnesses for landowners and state governments who wanted to sue oil companies for back payments. The two traders soon realized that the biggest case by far belonged to the federal government. But no federal officials were interested.

"It was unbelievably difficult," Mr. Johnson recalled in a recent interview. "They brought me to Denver, to the M.M.S. office, in a room with about 30 auditors and managers from the solicitor's office. Their reaction was that I was crazy, that it was impossible, that there was no way they could have actually missed this."

But Mr. Johnson found a way to recover the federal royalties on his own. In 1995, he filed suit under the False\l "l" Claims\l "l" Act\l "l", a longstanding law intended to encourage whistle\l "l"-blowers\l "l". Under the act, best known for its use against overbilling by military contractors, a private citizen can sue a company, contending that it defrauded the federal government. Companies found guilty have to pay as much as three times the amount of their fraudulent gains, and any person who files a suit is entitled to keep up to 30 percent of the money recovered.

The Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" initially refused to join Mr. Johnson's suit, but it eventually did so, in 1998 after concluding that he and other whistle\l "l"-blowers\l "l" -- including a nonprofit group called the Project on Government Oversight -- were on to something. That was when Mr. Maxwell became involved. Working for the Interior Department, he collected data on a number of oil companies, pooling his material with that of Mr. Johnson.

"Bobby was with us," Mr. Johnson recalled. "He was a straight-shooter, and he saw it." Mobil was the first to settle and paid more than $40 million in 1998. Chevron paid $95 million. Shell paid $110 million. By 2002, 15 oil companies had paid a total of almost $440 million.

The Johnson lawsuit taught Mr. Maxwell three lessons. One was that Mr. Johnson became a wealthy man. (The oil trader and his lawyers received more than $30 million, while two other groups of whistle\l "l"-blowers\l "l" received more than $40 million.) The second was that top Interior officials had been obstinately blind to the oil industry's practices. The third was about the power of the False\l "l" Claims\l "l" Act\l "l". Until Mr. Johnson came along, no one had used it to go after royalty underpayments.

Created in 1849 to manage the nation's publicly owned natural resources, from national forests to parks and waterways, the Interior Department oversees timber, grazing, mining and oil drilling operations over many tens of millions of acres. And while the agency has often tried to increase drilling and mining under Democrats and Republicans alike, current and former officials say the Bush administration elevated that goal above almost all of the department's other mandates.

Mr. Maxwell says his frustrations with the Interior Department escalated after the Bush administration took office in 2001. The Interior Department's top priorities became increasing domestic oil and gas production, offering more incentives to drillers in the Gulf of Mexico and pushing to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and other wilderness areas to drilling. The department trimmed spending on enforcement and cut back on auditors, and sped up approvals for drilling applications.

The agency's senior ranks also became more heavily populated with officials friendly to the energy industry. For example, its new deputy secretary, J. Steven Griles, worked as an oil industry lobbyist before joining the department, and Chevron and Shell had paid him as an expert witness on their behalf in the Benji Johnson case. Mr. Griles declined to comment.Auditors, according to Mr. Maxwell and many others, were told to devote less energy to time-consuming audits and rely more on a computerized monitoring system called "compliance review." Auditors complained that the new system was superficial and riddled with technical problems. Even when the new system flagged potential underpayments, Mr. Maxwell said, it often failed to supply conclusive information.

"We were getting shut down on all kinds of cases," he said. "We started to wish that someone would come along and file a False Claims suit, so we could jump onboard."

Auditing and compliance review had generated an average of about $176 million annually in the 1990s, with an extraordinary peak of $331 million in 2000, according to data from the Congressional Budget Office and the Interior Department. But from 2001 through 2005, a period when energy prices soared to new highs, enforcement revenue averaged about $46 million a year.

In 2004, the Interior Department's inspector general issued a blistering report about the auditing system, saying that many auditors were unqualified, that essential documents were being lost and that the internal review process was "ineffective."

BY 2002, Mr. Maxwell was fed up. He and a team of auditors had worked for months to dissect a complicated marketing deal by Kerr-McGee that they believed was cheating the government. He concluded that Kerr-McGee was selling all its oil at below-market prices to another company that compensated Kerr-McGee by assuming many of its marketing and administrative costs.

Simply put, Kerr-McGee seemed to be getting paid in both cash and services, but it was calculating its royalties only on the cash it received. Mr. Maxwell calculated that the company had underpaid the government by as much as $12 million between 1997 and 2002. State auditors in Louisiana had been investigating exactly the same issue in 2001, and ordered Kerr-McGee to pay an extra $2 million in royalties on oil from state lands.

According to Mr. Maxwell and Interior Department officials, when Mr. Maxwell presented his findings to his superiors, agency lawyers told him to drop the case. When he continued to argue, he recounts in his lawsuit, the agency's chief of enforcement warned him that the director of the M.M.S., Johnnie M. Burton, would be "very upset" if he persisted.

"The word came down from the top, not to issue this order," Mr. Maxwell said in an interview, speaking about the Interior Department. "There have always been people who don't want to pursue things. But now it's grown into a major illness. It's dysfunctional."

In a written response to questions from The New York Times, the Minerals Management Service said it was "rare" to overrule an auditor but that Mr. Maxwell's contentions involved a "questionable application of M.M.S. regulations."

The matter might have ended there, except that Mr. Maxwell decided to retire in June 2003. As soon as he left the agency, he began researching the possibility of emulating Benji Johnson and filing his own suit under the False\l "I" Claims\l "I" Act\l "I". As it happened, Mr. Maxwell's "retirement" was brief. In October, the Interior Department rehired him to fill a management gap in its Denver office, and it put him in charge of a 120-person auditing team monitoring the Gulf of Mexico.

Despite rejoining the government, Mr. Maxwell filed his suit against Kerr-McGee in June 2004. The case was unsealed on Jan. 20, 2005; a week later, Mr. Maxwell lost his job.

Arriving at his office shortly before 8 a.m. on Jan. 27, Mr. Maxwell said he was summoned to a meeting with a senior M.M.S. official, who had flown in from Washington. The official handed him a memo, explaining that his job responsibilities were being moved to Houston and that his position would be eliminated.

To this day, Interior officials say they never fired Mr. Maxwell. They say, according to court papers, that he was merely a "re-employed annuitant" who was no longer needed. "The position disappeared," said Ms. Burton, the M.M.S. director, in a meeting with energy reporters in September.

Mr. Maxwell protested. He said he would have relocated or taken a different job. He added that he was a certified public accountant and had a master's degree in business administration; his successor lacked those degrees. But the fight did not last long. When Interior officials offered Mr. Maxwell a confidential financial settlement to leave without a fight, he took the deal and moved to Hawaii.

And he continued to press his case against Kerr-McGee. The company tried and failed to have the suit dismissed, arguing that a federal auditor should not be allowed to take information from work and file a lawsuit under the False\l "I" Claims\l "I" Act\l "I". In October, eight major oil companies including Chevron and Exxon Mobil weighed in on Kerr-McGee's side.

"Government employees who uncover suspected fraud in the course of carrying out their jobs will receive a tacit invitation" to sue as private citizens, the companies argued in their brief. After the appellate court rejected the industry's plea, Mr. Maxwell's trial was rescheduled for January. Settlement talks are scheduled to begin in Denver this week.

Interior officials contend that Mr. Maxwell and other auditors have a conflict of interest when they stand to gain personally from their enforcement work. "These people could be entitled to collect 30 percent of the money that is owed to the government, for work they were already being paid to do," Ms. Burton told reporters in September.

If Mr. Maxwell had not acted, of course, the government would have had no chance of recovering any money at all. James W. Moorman, president of Taxpayers Against Fraud, a nonprofit organization that specializes in the False\l "I" Claims\l "I" Act\l "I", acknowledged that it was less than ideal for federal investigators to have a financial stake in rebelling against their bosses. But he said the alternatives might be worse.

"You're talking about a situation where there seems to be complete breakdown in the system," Mr. Moorman said. "If they've got evidence of fraud, why shouldn't a court hear it?"

STANDING in his garage recently, Mr. Maxwell pointed to six big cartons stacked along the wall. They contained 60,000 pages of documents that Kerr-McGee and the Interior Department had provided as part of the discovery process in his lawsuit. Mr. Maxwell, true to form, has gone through every page, and distilled his case into seven modestly sized binders he keeps in his living room. He says he is ready for trial, and even for the possibility of losing.

If he does lose, his lawyers will not charge for their work but he will have to pay about $125,000 to expert witnesses he has hired. "I can manage it," he said. He has saved money all his life, he said, and can live on his savings and his pension.

"He's thought about all the options, and none of them seem life-threatening to him," said his daughter, Angela Maxwell Horn. "What can they do him? They've already fired him."

RCMP Boss Back Under Gun

RCMP Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli, already under fire for the force's handling of the Maher Arar affair, will have more explaining to do when he faces yet another grilling by MPs this week.

In his last appearance at the Commons public safety committee two months ago, the country's top cop fended off demands for his resignation, suggesting that would be too easy a way out.

"Three are two kinds of people in this world," Zaccardelli told the all-party panel. "There are those who are faced with difficulties and they throw up their hands and walk away from the challenge. Then there are those who roll up their sleeves and decide they're going to fix what went wrong. I'm a person who fits in the latter category."

Zaccardelli stumbled, however, when MPs pressed him on some key details of what went wrong in the Arar case.

The Syrian-Canadian telecommunications engineer was arrested by U.S. authorities in the fall of 2002 and deported to Damascus, where he was tortured into false confessions of terrorist activity.

Justice Dennis O'Connor, who conducted a public inquiry into the affair, concluded the Americans "very likely" acted on the basis of erroneous information provided by the Mounties — a document that described Arar as an "Islamic extremist" with suspected ties to al-Qaida.

In fact, he was a peripheral figure in an RCMP anti-terrorist investigation who came to the Mounties' attention only because he had been spotted talking to another man targeted by the probe.

Zaccardelli said he wasn't informed of the mistake until Arar was already in Syria. He repeatedly insisted the force had "tried" to correct the error in private with U.S. officials, but never explained why he didn't go public at the time.

The commissioner was also vague on whether he shared the fact the Mounties had bungled with his political masters in Ottawa.

He maintained that briefing material was prepared for unnamed federal "officials" but was unclear on whether that included members of the Liberal cabinet then in power.

Former ministers Wayne Easter and Anne McLellan have since testified that Zaccardelli never told them about the mistake. Ward Elcock, then head of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, has also said he was kept in the dark.

"In fact (Zaccardelli) withheld information about that investigation," says Liberal MP Mark Holland, one of the RCMP chief's fiercest critics. "I have no idea how he will try to explain this . . . This is about as troubling as you can get."

But it won't be the only point on which committee members will confront Zaccardelli when he appears before them again Tuesday.

The commissioner told them in September he found it "deplorable" that someone had leaked misleading information to the media about Arar after his return to Canada, using the confession extracted under torture as proof of his purported terrorist ties.

Zaccardell noted his deputy commissioner and "right-hand person," Gary Loeppky, had personally organized an investigation to get to the bottom of the leaks.

"Everything possible will be done," he promised. "Everybody is being looked at, nobody is excluded."

Less than month later, an Ontario judge quashed RCMP search warrants used to raid the home and office of Juliet O'Neill, an Ottawa Citizen reporter, in an effort to discover her sources for a leaked story.

Justice Lynn Ratushny struck down portions of the federal security law used to obtain the warrants and excoriated the Mounties for targeting a journalist.

Investigators considered O'Neill an "easy target," said the judge, and the raid was a thinly veiled attempt at "intimidating her into compromising her constitutional right of freedom of the press."

When the Conservative government refused to appeal the judgment it appeared the investigation of the leaks had hit a dead end — although the Mounties refused to admit it.

A spokesman for the force contended the probe would continue but couldn't explain what new avenues would be pursued.

Lead Plaintiff in Indian Trust Reform Lawsuit Challenges Harvard University

TANYA LEE Targeted News Service

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Dec. 3 -- "Harvard was established in part to educate Indians," Elouise Cobell reminds her audience of Harvard Law School students and faculty, referring to the 1653 colonial government authorization that was made just 18 years after the school was founded. The goal, at the time, was "to construct a building for the instruction of 'six hopfull Indian youthes.'"

Cobell, who is a member of the Blackfeet Tribe, was discussing a classaction lawsuit she had filed against the U.S. government for the gross mismanagement of thousands of individual Indian trust fund accounts. In 1996, Cobell, who as a child had heard repeated stories about money owed to Indians, was a banker who could see for herself that the federal\l "I" government's Individual Indian Management accounting system was woefully inadequate is your goal was accountability. Her assessment was that half a million people had in fact not been paid what they were owed, and that the Department of the Interior had no intention of even recognizing the problem, let alone remedying it.

Much Native American history, and certainly the history of the trust fund, hinges on the Dawes Act of 1887, the law that assigned 160 acres of reservation land to each Indian family, took that land into trust and let settlers on the westward migration from the urban East toward California claim the rest. Millions of acres -- in fact 90 million acres -- of Indian land were lost. Ninety million acres represented nearly two-thirds of the land the tribes had left after the wars were fought and the treaties signed.

The federal government, as trustee of Indian-owned lands, could lease the land for any purpose; it could collect the royalties and rent due on that land; and it could put those moneys into the U.S. Treasury. What it apparently could not, and certainly did not, do was to keep track of the money and pay it out to the Indians of whose behalf the government was amassing it.

Dividing Indian Assets

Cris Stainbrook, a Lakota who is now president of the Indian Land Tenure Foundation (http://www.indianlandtenure.org/), presented historical and legal background for Cobell's\l "l" talk. Stainbrook explained the background of the labyrinth of legislation and court precedents that pass for federal Indian policy. A major problem is fractionation -- the ownership of a parcel of land by hundreds or thousands of people.

When the Indian owner of an allotment passed away, the ownership of the land was divided among his or her heirs, but the land itself could not be divided. The allotment, after a few years, could have dozens of owners. After more than a hundred years, many allotments now have thousands of owners, each one of whom is due some portion of the money that land earns. Not only has the federal government lost track of who is entitled to royalties, they have lost track of how much they have collected in royalties.

A Demand for Restitution

Cobell said that originally the lawsuit asked for three things: to compel the government to fix the accounting systems or put adequate systems in place; to give individual Indians an accounting of what they owned; and to make restitution, if indeed restitution had to be made.

"I thought it would be over in three years," she said.

The plaintiffs won in court again and again. The judge assumed oversight of the accounts then appointed a special master to make sure the government was doing what it said it would do. In the meantime, the Department of Justice had a cadre of attorneys working on appeals. The government did appeal and lost. The court ruled that the Interior Department had to fix the accounting systems, that the federal government was in breach of trust, and that an accounting must be provided.

Contempt

"The government was destroying documents," Cobell said, noting that 167 boxes of Treasury documents were destroyed along with others at the Interior Department. U.S. Secretary of Interior Bruce Babbitt was held in contempt of court, followed by Interior Secretary Gale Norton.

The plaintiffs hired their own investigators and found out where every oil well in Indian Country was, something the government had never been unable to do.

The figure $13 billion was agreed upon as an appropriate amount for restitution. But the court said that because "the trust obligation began in 1887 when the federal government said we were all incompetent," the amount would have to include compound interest, and the figure was suddenly $176 billion.

"This administration went to Congress and attached a midnight rider to get a stay on the accounting. Congress passed it along with the bill, which was for firefighters. The government continued to say, 'We can give you an accounting. Just give us $10 billion and 10 more years'."

"This is extraordinary," Cobell continued. "Congress cannot interfere in an ongoing court case." But it did.

Then the special master discovered that anyone could hack into the computer system, create an account, move money into that account, and create a check. Treasury Department officials testified that billions of dollars were accumulating in the account and it was up to the Bureau of Indian Affairs to tell Treasury what checks to issue.

"Since no one knew who the money belonged to, they used it to reduce the national debt," said Cobell, who alleges that the mismanagement of these funds is not just incompetence. "The problem is not caused just by fractionation. There is so much fraud and corruption with the Indian trust moneys," she said, though she declined to name names. "We are not interested in the possible criminal aspects of this matter," she explained. "We want justice for Indian people."

Legislation Fails

In 2005, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., then chairman of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, introduced a bill to settle the matter. "He said he would try to get justice, and we believed him."

In an effort to expedite the matter, Cobell and her associates went to the tribes and hammered out 50 principles for trust reform on which everyone could agree. But when the legislation was finally written, not one of those principles was included. And there was a blank space where the amount of money for the settlement should have been.

So the plaintiffs came up with a number, taking into account what some of the unintended consequences of the settlement could be, such as people losing their Social Security.

"We came up with $27.5 billion. Congress offered $8 billion," said Cobell. "We said no, but then we decided that in the interests of getting this done, we would live with it.

"Right before the bill was marked up, President Bush sent a message to McCain and Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne saying the administration needed more time to study the bill. McCain caved.

After the August 2006 recess, the administration offered its opinion. For $8 billion, the administration wanted every Indian issue, including the tribal trust claims, settled. And the administration said that any money spent figuring out to whom to send the money would have to come out of the $8 billion. Finally, they said that when the money, or what was left of it, was paid, the federal government would not be liable for how it handles trust matters.

"It was almost insane. They wanted us to give them a blank check to commit fraud," said Cobell.

A Cry for Justice

Sen. Bryon L. Dorgan, D-N.D., the incoming chairman of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, has asked for a meeting and said he would consider new legislation in the next Congress, according to Cobell. But the plaintiffs will go on fighting in court.

"This case screams to the heavens for justice," said Cobell.

And who better to help see that justice is done but graduates of one of the most influential schools in the country, a school that has produced seven U.S. presidents, has an operating budget of $2.4 billion a year, and holds an endowment greater than the GNP of some countries?

So far the plaintiffs in the case have raised $11 million, but that is not nearly enough, and most of it went to pay the accountants. The federal government is spending $100 million a year on this case, so finding financial as well as legal support are high on the list of reasons for Cobell's\l "l" round of speaking engagements.

The event was moderated by Gerald Torres, Oneida Indian Nation Visiting Professor of Law, and sponsored by The Native American Law Student Association and the Harvard University Native American Program.

OPINION; Abused and abandoned; If the CIA snatched the wrong man, U.S. owes him at least an apology

Khaled el-Masri says Washington owes him an apology and maybe a little cash. That seems little enough for the German citizen to ask. According to his lawsuit against the CIA, he was grabbed in Macedonia, stripped, drugged and spirited away to a prison in Afghanistan, where he was abused for months and then unceremoniously dumped, broke and disoriented, on a dark road in Albania.

Washington has neither confirmed nor denied CIA involvement. But officials did invoke the state secrets privilege to convince a federal judge in Virginia to dismiss el-Masri's lawsuit, insisting that allowing it to go forward would pose a grave risk to national security. That sounds like an admission, of sorts, of CIA involvement in his ordeal.

If it is complicit, Washington should find some way to compensate him. That's the decent thing to do, for a man whose life was upended in what seems a nightmarish case of mistaken identity.

In another instance of mistaken identity, Washington did compensate Brandon Mayfield, a lawyer arrested in Oregon in connection with the 2004 terrorist bombing of a train in Madrid. He was released after two weeks when officials discovered that they'd been wrong in believing that fingerprints found on a bag of detonators were his. Officials gave Mayfield a formal apology and $2 million in a settlement announced last week. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said, "If mistakes occur despite our best efforts, we'll work to address them."

So, why not for el-Masri? His lawyers say Washington has offered neither apology nor compensation. An appeal of the decision dismissing his suit was argued Tuesday in Virginia.

You have to wonder about the government's insistence on secrecy. El-Masri's story is under investigation in Germany. It has been widely publicized. President George W. Bush has acknowledged secret CIA prisons and a policy of rendition, or sending detainees to captivity in other countries. If el-Masri's story of lost liberty and reputation is true, Washington should make amends. It's the right thing to do.

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Cites Need For Secrecy In Seeking Dismissal Of ACLU Surveillance Suit. The AP (12/5, Goodman) reports from Detroit, "The Bush administration asked a federal appeals court Monday to toss out a lawsuit challenging a warrantless surveillance program, saying the government can't defend itself without revealing national secrets." The AP continues, "The American Civil Liberties Union sued the National Security Agency in January on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers who say the surveillance has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets. … 'This suit must be dismissed because its very subject matter is a state secret, and litigation would inevitably result in disclosing state secrets,' Justice Department lawyers wrote in a brief filed Monday." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled in August that the program violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers. … The Justice Department appealed to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati, which ruled that the administration could keep the program in place during the appeal."

Defense Releases Photos Of Masked, Chained Padilla. In a story widely-distributed by McClatchy, the Miami Herald (12/5, Weaver, 286K) reports, "Providing a rare glimpse of a locked-up 'enemy combatant,' attorneys for terror suspect Jose Padilla released declassified images of him in chains and a mask to bolster their bid to have his Miami case thrown out because of alleged mistreatment during military detention for more than three years. The still video images show Padilla wearing blacked-out goggles, noise-blocking headphones, and shackles on his hands and feet." The Herald notes, "Carl Tobias, a constitutional scholar at the University of Richmond School of Law in Virginia who has followed Padilla's legal odyssey, said his attorneys' bid is a long shot. But he said the photo of Padilla in chains and a mask, published on the front page of The New York Times on Monday, 'makes an impression on people.' Whether it has the same impression on the judge is another matter. It's hard to know.'"

The AP (12/5, Anderson) reports from Miami, "The images, taken from an unclassified Defense Department video, show Padilla being chained hand and foot and led out of his cell by three guards dressed in camouflage and wearing riot helmets and visors. The video images are the first publicly released of Padilla's 3 1/2-year detention at a Navy brig in Charleston, South Carolina. … They were filed late Friday in federal court in Miami as part of an attempt by Padilla's lawyers to get criminal terrorism support charges against him dismissed, based on what they claim was treatment that amounted to torture while in military custody. … 'The extended torture visited upon Mr. Padilla has left him damaged, both mentally and physically,' Padilla lawyer Orlando do Campo said in one court filing. [The government's treatment of Mr. Padilla has robbed him of his personhood.'" The AP adds, "Existence of the filing containing the video images was first reported Monday by The New York Times. The court papers do not give details about the actual video, but The Times reported that it was made as Padilla was being taken out of his cell for dental work. … A spokeswoman for Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta declined comment Monday."

Egyptians Arrest American, 11 Europeans On Terrorism Allegations. The AP (12/5, el-Magd) reports Egyptian police "have arrested an American, 11 Europeans and several others from Arab countries for allegedly plotting terrorist attacks in Middle Eastern countries including Iraq, the Interior Ministry said Monday. The group was part of an Islamic militant terror cell that had adopted extremist ideas and were living in Egypt under the guise of studying Arabic and Islamic studies, the ministry said in a statement." The AP adds that "the State Department confirmed an American had been arrested in Egypt about a week ago but could not provide any details. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said American officials were 'seeking consular access to this individual' but declined to give more information, citing U.S. privacy laws."

The Washington Post (12/5, A18, Whitlock, 690K) notes, "The Egyptian Interior Ministry said the cell was 'related to some terrorist organizations abroad' but did not name the network or those arrested. … A U.S. law enforcement official said the U.S. citizen 'was not on our radar at all' before his arrest in Egypt and is not named on the government's voluminous terrorism watch list. 'He was not a known figure to the U.S.,' the official said." The Washington Times (12/5, 88K) runs a version of the AP story.

Lawyers Demand Release Of Chinese Muslims In Gitmo. The Washington Post (12/5, White, 690K) reports, "Attorneys for a group of Chinese Muslims held for nearly five years in the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, filed suit yesterday, asking that the men be released immediately and alleging that they have been held as part of a political deal between the United States and China. ... They contend that the men have been labeled wrongfully as terrorist suspects because they oppose the Communist Chinese government." The ethnic Uighurs "have been a diplomatic headache" for the US; "Earlier this year, [five other] Uighurs were released to a U.N. compound in Albania, where they remain virtual prisoners. ... More than a dozen Uighurs are still in Guantanamo. U.S. officials have determined them to be enemy combatants because of their participation in an alleged terrorist training camp in Afghanistan. ... The lawyers challenge the way the Uighurs were determined to be enemy combatants, arguing that their encampment in Afghanistan did not make them a party to hostilities."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

IG Report Shows "Disturbing" Examples Of Crime Coming From Within DHS. The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Gaouette, 850K) reports a semiannual report filed to Congress by the Department of Homeland Security inspector general showed that in addition to "patrolling the nation's borders and guarding against terrorism," the agency "is battling fraud, theft, bribery, smuggling and other crimes by American citizens — with some of the most disturbing examples coming from" its own employees. The report "showed a sharp jump in arrests in the six months ended Sept. 30, with many stemming from schemes by members of the public to bilk the agency of emergency relief funds in the wake of Hurricane Katrina." Meanwhile, an "array of staff transgressions tucked into the report reflects the continued growing pains of an agency that was formed only three years ago, and the pressures created as parts of the department have rapidly expanded, critics say."

US Labs Developing Nuke Safeguards Under "Secret" Presidential Directive. The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Vartabedian, 850K) reports, "In response to a secret order from President Bush, U.S. nuclear weapons laboratories are developing technology to make the weapons virtually impossible to use if they fall into the wrong hands. The security system will be part of a new generation of nuclear weapons approved formally last week by a panel of the Defense and Energy departments. The "3-year-old effort, known as National Security Presidential Directive 28, has evoked strong criticism from many nuclear weapons experts, who doubt that absolute safeguards are necessary or even possible. Instead, they say, the federal government should plug known security weaknesses at bomb labs and nuclear weapons factories."

Registered Traveler Expanding To More Airports. In its "On the Road" column, the New York Times (12/5, Sharkey, 1.16M) reports, "Ready or not -- and some critics say not -- the long-delayed Registered Traveler program is moving forward, with the single existing operator planning a succession of openings soon at four airports, while a competitor says it is about to join in." Steven Brill, the chief executive of Verified Identity Pass Inc., "which began the first Registered Traveler program at Orlando International Airport in July 2005," says the company "is processing applications with the Transportation Security Administration for Kennedy and for San Jose, Calif.; Cincinnati; and Indianapolis." Critics, meanwhile, "have questioned its customer service value and slow pace and have also asked whether it could open a security loophole for potential terrorists who are able to pass a background check."

DHS Report Sets Five-Year Goal For "Effective Control" Of US-Mexico Border. Under the headline "DHS Plan for 'Virtual' Border Fence Still Has Gaps," the Washington Post (12/5, A27, Hsu, 690K) reports that in a report to Congress, the Department of Homeland Security has said that a "virtual" fence along the US-Mexico border "will cost $7.6 billion and be completed by 2011, but the government lacks clear benchmarks for success." The report also confirmed "well-known problems along the Mexican border," indicating "that the United States had 'effective control' over only 284 miles of its 1,993-mile southern frontier as of March, up from 241 miles in October 2005. The department set a goal of controlling 345 miles next year and the full border in five years." The goal "is the latest offered by US officials. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has predicted two years, three to five years, and most recently he has said control could be contingent on enactment of a guest-worker program, which could take up to six years to implement."

Professor Chosen To Be New Orleans "Recovery Czar." The New York Times (12/5, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin appointed Edward J. Blakely as the city's "new 'executive director for recovery management'" Monday. Blakely, "a former chairman of the department of city and regional planning at the University of California, Berkeley," who is now professor of urban planning at the University of Sydney in Australia, said recovery plans "have to be brought together under one umbrella." The Times adds that "the appointment of a 'recovery czar' for the city has been pending for months," and that "at Monday's announcement, Dr. Blakely's precise responsibilities were not spelled out by Mr. Nagin, only that he would 'coordinate and direct recovery efforts.'"

WAR NEWS:

Bush Meets With Iraqi Shiite Leader. President Bush hosted Iraqi Shiite leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim Monday at the White House in a meeting ABC World News (12/4, story 3, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) said "opened a new diplomatic front in the battle for Iraq." The New York Times (12/5, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports Hakim is "a political rival of Prime Minister Nouri Kamal al-Maliki." Yesterday, Bush "urged" him to "reject the extremists that are trying to stop the advance of this young democracy." The meeting with Hakim was "part of an effort by the Bush administration to shore up the fragile Maliki government by reaching out to a wider circle of Iraqi politicians." Speaking to reporters, the president said he told Hakim that he was "not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq," although he said he was "proud of the courage of the Iraqi people." Hakim, for his part, "flatly rejected one of the recommendations that the bipartisan Iraq Study Group is expected to make this week: a call for an international conference or regional peace initiative."

The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports Hakim's opposition to "enlisting the help of Iran and Syria, as a blue-ribbon commission is expected to recommend," gave the President "an important Baghdad ally in his opposition to such an overture, two days before the bipartisan Iraq Study Group is scheduled to deliver its report." Hakim "rejected any international conference to solve Iraq's problems, a White House official said, speaking on condition of anonymity in accordance with White House ground rules. And Bush underscored his concerns in the private meeting, speaking directly 'about Iran and Syria and the critical need for them to respect Iraqi sovereignty and stop destructive activity that undermines Iraq,' the official said."

In an interview with Brit Hume on Fox News' Special Report (12/4) President Bush described his meeting with Hakim, saying they "had a very good discussion about the way forward in Iraq. … I was listening to whether or not this powerful figure was dedicated to a unity government. And he is. There is a lot of talk about Shia dominance to the exclusion of other folks in Iraq. I didn't hear that at all. Quite the contrary. I listened to a man who understands that the way forward is for there to be a government of and by and for the people. His words were, 'we want the people to dictate our government.' In other words, let the people determine the course. And I was most impressed by his attitudes. … First and foremost he supports the Maliki government. As a matter of fact, I asked him during the meeting, I said, 'I just want you to understand, I met with the prime minister, the head of the government, and I don't want the prime minister to construe that this meeting in anyway doesn't support him.' He called Prime Minister Maliki right prior to our meeting to assure him that our meeting…would be viewed as positive. He supports the Maliki government. He believes Prime Minister Maliki has got what it takes to move the government forward."

The CBS Evening News (12/4, story 2, 2:55, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "This was an odd scene. Hakim, who the US Government's own intelligence sources have linked to death squads, being praised by the US President." Bush was shown saying, "I appreciate it very much, his eminence's strong position against the murder of innocent life." Axelrod: "And Hakim told Mr. Bush it's not as bad as it seems in Iraq. 'The presented picture among many media sources,' said Hakim, is 'profoundly different from reality.'" On NBC Nightly News (12/4, lead story, Williams, 9.87M), Kenneth Pollack, Saban Center For Middle East Policy, was shown saying, "At the end of the day, stability in Iraq, political progress in Iraq, comes down to a small group of people, including Abdul Aziz al-Hakim."

The Washington Post (12/5, A23, Wright, Baker, 690K) says "Bush and Hakim are unlikely allies in forging Iraq policy. Hakim's movement was founded during his two decades of exile in Iran, and its Badr Organization militia, formerly known as the Badr Brigade, is still widely believed to have close ties to Tehran." White House spokesman Tony Snow "called Hakim a 'significant force' in Iraqi politics. 'He's somebody who can play a very constructive role and we hope he will,' Snow said."

The AP (12/5, Riechmann) reports "some consider al-Hakim, who lived in exile in Iran for years, a more powerful political figure than…al-Maliki. Al-Hakim leads the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament. His party also is backed by the Badr Brigade militia blamed for sectarian killings." The meeting "was evidence that Bush, under pressure to find a new blueprint for his war strategy, was getting more personally involved in the political infighting among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds."

Another AP story (12/5, Hendawi) reports Hakim "is closer to Iran than any other Iraqi politician and runs a Shiite militia blamed for sectarian violence in Iraq. So why did…Bush meet him in the White House? Some Iraqi officials believe Bush wanted to find out what role Iran can play in bringing peace to this country. If anyone in Iraq knows, it is the 55-year-old al-Hakim."

The AP (12/5, Hunt) reports that after what he called a "very clear" meeting earlier with Secretary Rice, Hakim told reporters in Arabic that "we have asked for the American forces to stay in Iraq" to enable Iraqi security to deal with terrorists. The Washington Times (12/5, Curl, 88K) reports that after his conversation with Rice, Hakim disclosed that "'we have asked for the American forces to stay in Iraq' in an effort to help Iraqi security forces contend with terrorists." Added Hakim, "We will work very hard and seek all forms of cooperation at the international level and the regional level in order to defeat terrorism that it is trying to use Iraq as a base in order to sabotage the future of that nation." The White House "yesterday did not rule out a possible meeting with Sheik al-Sadr." Said Snow, "I don't know if al-Sadr would also be willing to entertain the option. It's a very interesting question; we'll go back and muse on it in a few minutes."

The Financial Times (12/5, Dinmore) reports that "speaking later at the US Institute of Peace (USIP), Mr Hakim criticised US forces for not cracking down hard enough on Sunni insurgents. Decisive strikes were needed, Mr Hakim said. Otherwise, he warned, Shia spiritual leaders might lose their capacity to contain Shia anger and Iraq would be plunged into civil war and 'catastrophic storms that no power in the world could calm or control.'" USIP "is assisting the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which is due to release its recommendations for new strategies in Iraq on Wednesday." The Washington Post (12/5, A23, Wright, Baker, 690K) also reports on the USIP speech under the headline "Iraqi Shiite Leader Speaks Bluntly In Washington."

Bush Claims 90% Of Iraq Is "Relatively Peaceful." Asked on Fox News' Special Report (12/4, Hume) to respond to former Secretary of State Colin Powell's suggestion that Iraq is in the midst of a civil war, Bush said, "I've heard a lot of voices say that. I talked to people in Iraq who don't believe that's the case. For example, some would argue that the fact that 90% of the country…most of the country, outside of the Baghdad area, is relatively peaceful, doesn't indicate a civil war as far as they're concerned. … I get briefings all the time about where the level of violence is and…most of it occurs around the Baghdad area. And therefore, they don't get to see the normalcy of life outside of the Baghdad area."

Kinsley Contrasts Bush Twins' Lifestyle With That Of US Troops In Iraq. In his column for the Washington Post (12/5, A29, 690K) Michael Kinsley writes, "It is not the fault of Jenna or Barbara Bush that their father, the president, has gotten us into a war that he doesn't know how to get us out of. … From what little has leaked out, it seems that Jenna and Barbara are party girls who like to drink and dance until the wee hours with aristocrats and frat boys." Kinsley continues, "Nevertheless, there is a war on. It's a war that has killed 3,000 Americans, most of them around Jenna and Barbara's age or younger. It has killed hundreds of thousands of Iraqis of all ages. And even more Americans and Iraqis have been injured, lost limbs, suffered terrible pain. … No one thinks that the president should have to give up a child to prove that his family is as serious about freedom as these other families he praises. But it would be reassuring to see a little struggle here -- some sign that the Bush family truly believes that American soldiers are dying for our freedom, and that it's worth it."

Bush Says Baker-Hamilton Report One Of Several "Advice Documents." During an interview with Fox News' Special Report's Brit Hume yesterday (12/4), President Bush was asked how he viewed the "advice document" from Defense Secretary Rumsfeld describing possible policy adjustments in Iraq. President Bush echoed Hume's phrasing in his answer, saying, "I'm getting a lot of 'advice documents.' And these documents were never intended to be read in the public. These are frank assessments by different members of my Administration. We will be getting another 'advice document' from the Baker-Hamilton commission soon. My attitude is: I ought to absorb and listen to everything that's being said, because I'm not satisfied with the progress being made in Iraq. … When it comes to military matters, II want to listen to the military, to come up with a way of achieving our objective quicker."

The Washington Times (12/5, Scarborough, 88K), in an article that reinforces the President's assertion that the ISG report is not the only advice he will consult when deciding on potential policy changes, notes, "By the time the White House begins studying" the ISG's report, President Bush "will also have scores of ideas from his own advisers." The office of the secretary of defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the State Department and the National Security Council are all weighing options. The ideas range from A to Z: pull out all troops now or add more troops to quell restive Baghdad and Anbar province." An anonymous "Pentagon official" is quoted as saying, "Let's see if the [Iraq Study Group] comes up with anything better than this."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/4, Henry) reported, "The President realizes the Iraq Study Group's report may be blistering in its assessment of the war." White House spokesman Tony Snow "is noncommittal about whether the president will embrace some or any of the report, noting the president is also waiting for Pentagon and White House reviews of Iraq policy. But Snow bristled at a suggestion the President ordered these separate reviews in order to have the political cover to cherry-pick which recommendations to follow."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/5, LaFranchi, 59K) leads its coverage with the claim that "the big question is not so much what the bipartisan Iraq Study Group will say…but how President Bush will respond." NBC Nightly News (12/4, story 2, Mitchell, 9.87M), the only network newscast to report on the ISG report, addressed that same issue, reporting, "When the Baker-Hamilton group presents its report this week, many are wondering whether the President will be listening. … Only last week the President said he would not change policy in Iraq" and "in the past, the President has been described as unwilling to shift gears." Presidential Historian Michael Beschloss was shown saying, "Psychologically, it's hard to imagine George W. Bush saying, 'Gee, I didn't plan to do any of these things that you recommend in this report, but I now see the light.'" Mitchell concluded her report by predicting that "the most likely scenario" is that the President "will embrace some of the Baker group's recommendations, but save face by calling them his own." Along similar lines, NBC Nightly News' David Gregory (12/4, story 3) stated that he gets "a sense from this White House that they don't like outside help to a problem that they think to a large measure they have under control. They are getting some notions of what is in the Baker-Hamilton report, and privately they say, 'look, the nuts and bolts of the war strategy is sound. … They also question, frankly, whether there's much new the Baker-Hamilton report that they haven't already thought of."

"Skeptical" White House Reportedly Willing To Pursue Limited Talks With Iran. The AP (12/5, Schweid) reports that White House officials are "dropping hints" that President Bush will accept the expected Iraq study commission recommendation that the US hold talks with the government of Iran, but, according to the AP, the White House has let it be known the talks will be "restricted to curbing violence in Iraq." The AP portrays the president and his aides as "skeptical" about the prospects for diplomacy, though the commission is said to be "convinced that reaching out to Iran and Syria could help stabilize…Iraq, and improve chances for easing overall Middle East tensions by boosting the prospects for an Arab-Israeli settlement." The AP goes on to report that administration officials "continue to accuse Iran and Syria of arming and otherwise supporting insurgents in Iraq, Lebanon and elsewhere; and they "insist there is nothing to be gained by rewarding Iran and Syria with high-profile discourse with American diplomats." Richard Perle is quoted as saying that such talks "will be seen throughout the region as an indication of American weakness." The AP contrasts Perle's assertion with that of Defense Secretary nominee Robert Gates, who "told the Council on Foreign Relations in 2004, 'Direct dialogue with Tehran on specific areas of mutual concern should be pursued.'" In his column for the New York Times (12/5, 1.16M) Nicholas Kristof writes that the Iraqi Study Group "is right about needing to consult with neighbors like Syria and Iran, but that doesn't resolve another central problem in Iraq: Our open-ended military presence, perceived by Iraqis as a grab for Iraqi oil and bases, ends up legitimizing extremists like Abu Deraa and aggravating civil war."

Baker And Hamilton May Testify Before The Senate Thursday. The AP (12/5, Flaherty) notes that Sens. John Warner and Carl Levin have asked former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton to testify Thursday before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

ISG Members Made Political Contributions Since Joining Panel. The Hill (12/5, Cusack) reports that "a few" members of the Iraq Study Group have made political contributions since joining the panel. Democratic member Leon Panetta contributed $500 to Rep. John Murtha, who, The Hill notes, has "embraced a quick withdrawal of U.S. troops." Additionally, Vernon Jordan, also a Democratic member, contributed $500 to Rep. Frank Wolf's opponent even though Wolf "played a leading role" in the formation of the group. Former Secretary of State Baker contributed $15,000 to the NRSC last spring. The Hill goes on to report that former Sen. Alan Simpson contributed to several GOP candidates, but told The Hill, "I give to people. What's new?" Simpson characterized "any article on the political giving of the ISG" as "bt" and "extraneous crap."

ISG's Origin As An Earmark Noted. The New York Times' David Kirkpatrick (12/5) writes, "One never knows what some lawmaker will insert into a spending bill without public scrutiny: a remote bridge, or maybe a bike path. Then there is the Iraq Study Group, better known as the Baker-Hamilton commission. In the last year, lawmakers of both parties have criticized earmarks as fostering waste and corruption. But few are complaining about the Iraq Study Group, which will release its much-anticipated report on Wednesday."

US Urged To Broker Shia-Kurd Coalition And Withdraw. In an op-ed for the Financial Times (12/5) former national security advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski writes, "America needs a strategic change of course, and it has to be undertaken on a broad front. It must accept the fact that real leadership in Iraq should be based on a coalition of the Shia clergy commanding the loyalty of Shia militias and of the autonomous Kurds and that the sooner a date is set for US departure, the sooner the authentic Iraqi leaders will be able to enlist Iraq's neighbours in a wider regional effort to promote a more stable Iraq."

Military Families Said To Favor Withdrawal From Iraq, But Not "Quitting." NBC Nightly News (12/4, story 10, Williams, 9.87M) spoke with military families regarding their feelings about the progress of the war in Iraq. In a typical comment, Sergeant Vincent Watkins, who "has already done three tours and is readying for a fourth," was said to favor "anything that means fewer troops having to go back." Sergeant Vincent Watkins: "Right now we're losing a lot of troops. They're dying for a reason but I'm confused, but I'm going to do my mission regardless." NBC's Martin Savidge concluded, "All the soldiers we talked with did agree on one point -- of all the options under consideration, quitting shouldn't be one of them." NBC Nightly News (12/4, story 11, , Williams, 9.87M) also reported from Vermont on families of National Guard members who have been deployed to Iraq.

Zinni Warns About Leaving Iraq Too Early. The New York Times (12/5, Gordon, 1.16M) reports about war critic and retired Marine general Anthony Zinni, "These days General Zinni is delivering another provocative message: that leaving Iraq quickly would strengthen Iranian influence throughout the Middle East, create a sanctuary for terrorist groups, encourage even more sectarian strife in Iraq and risk turmoil in an oil-rich region." Before the war, he had "contended that the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's Iraq was vastly overstated and that invading Iraq would be a burdensome distraction from the struggle against Al Qaeda." The Times notes "odd bedfellows" concerning Iraq; Zinni's position now is "similar to that of Senator John McCain," who supported invading Iraq, while Secretary Rumsfeld's "troop reduction and pullback options" show "some convergence between him and Democratic lawmakers who have criticized the war." In a new paper for the World Security Institute, Zinni further "calls for a new bipartisan steering group to ensure that American policies toward Iraq are efficiently carried out, job-creation programs for Iraqis, integration of Iraq's militias into government-supervised national guard units and encouragement for the Iraqi Army to promote civil affairs."

Conventional Wisdom Regarding Iraq Invasion Challenged. In an op-ed for the New York Times (12/5, 1.16M) author Tim Pritchard writes that though the invasion of Iraq "is generally portrayed as well planned and executed, while the post-invasion strategy is characterized as poorly thought out and undermanned. … In fact, the short fight to get to Baghdad and the long one in which coalition forces have been engaged ever since have much in common. All the information about the nature of the trouble to come was apparent from the very first days of the war. If lessons learned then had been incorporated into military and political thinking, it would have injected a much needed dose of realism at an early stage."

Warner Will Urge Bush To Consult With Democrats On Iraq Strategy. The AP (12/5, Flaherty) reports Sen. John Warner "will call on President Bush to solicit privately the opinions of Democrats before forging a new strategy on Iraq." In his opening statement for the confirmation hearing of defense secretary nominee Robert Gates, Warner will claim Bush has a "moral obligation" to consult Democrats. The AP characterizes Warner's statement as "the strongest indication yet that he and perhaps other key Republicans will challenge Bush when it comes to the war."

Rumsfeld Declassifies Memo In Response To Questions Regarding Timing Of Leak. The AP (12/5, Burns) reports that according to a "cover letter" declassified by Defense Secretary Rumsfeld yesterday, Rumsfeld's "secret memo" to President Bush on options for Iraq policy "was developed over a period of weeks." The letter also reveals that Rumsfeld "instructed" Gen. John Abizaid "to assemble his own group 'some time ago' to consider new approaches in Iraq, though there "has been no public disclosure of recommendations from the Abizaid group" as of yet. The AP contends that Rumsfeld declassified the cover letter in order to rebut critics who saw the memo as "a way of defending Rumsfeld's reputation as he was about to leave office." Sen. Susan Collins "said Monday she viewed the memo as inconsistent with Rumsfeld's recent congressional testimony, and she said he should have shared these suggestions with Congress many months ago." Collins is quoted as saying, "the leaking" of the memo "very much reminded me of a strategy of trying to leave office saying that you actually had a lot of good plans that were different than your public utterances." The declassification of the cover letter received no coverage beyond the AP's report.

Adelman Describes Rumsfeld As "In Denial." The CBS Evening News's David Martin (12/4, story 3, 2:45) spoke with former Assistant Secretary of Defense Kenneth Adelman, described as "a former Rumsfeld ally who's now a very harsh critic, a critic who says that memo was long overdue." Adelman was shown saying, "My impression was that he was in denial. … He says, 'This war will never be lost in Baghdad.

It will only be lost in America.' And I tried to butt-in and say, 'it is being lost in Iraq. What are you talking about? We are losing there.' And he said, 'Excuse me.' And then he just went on."

US Troops Shifting To Advisory Positions. The New York Times (12/5, Shanker, Wong, 1.16M) reports, "American commanders in Iraq are already shifting thousands of combat troops into advisory positions with Iraqi Army and police units, especially in the capital, in their latest attempt to bring sectarian violence under control. ... American generals in Iraq have made the reassignments in recent weeks even though President Bush and his senior national security advisers have not yet made a formal decision about whether to expand the American contingent sent to Iraq specifically to serve on military training teams." Officers concede new risks with the new emphasis on advisory work, such as the danger of "working ... away from the security of larger American units," which cost three officers their lives "in a single attack in Baghdad." Furthermore, "operations carried out with Iraqi security forces in the lead may be less effective and result in more casualties among Iraqi security forces and civilians than with the better-trained American troops. ... There is also some concern that pushing Iraqi units to the front may result in atrocities by corrupt or sectarian Iraqi units."

US Death Toll Passes 2,900 After Four Service Members Die In Iraq Copter Crash. The CBS Evening News (12/4, lead story, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "It's heartbreaking every time we have to report it, but four more US servicemen have been killed in Iraq, four Marines. Their Sea Knight helicopter went down in a lake in Anbar province. The military blames mechanical problems. And with that, the US death toll in Iraq has now passed 2,900."

The New York Times (12/5, Semple, 1.16M) reports, "Four American troops were killed when a military helicopter broke down while flying over a lake in Anbar Province in western Iraq and made an emergency landing on the shore, American military officials said Monday. The military said the craft, Marine Corps CH-46 Sea Knight troop transport helicopter with 16 people and equipment on board, was flying over Lake Qadisiya, near Haditha, on Sunday when it began to experience mechanical difficulties." The pilots "brought the twin-rotor helicopter down in a controlled maneuver and guided it to the water's edge, according to Lt. Col. Josslyn L. Aberle, a military spokeswoman in Baghdad. The mechanical failures were not caused by an enemy attack, officials said; they did not give further details." The Washington Post (12/5, A24, Trejos, 690K) runs a similar report.

Military Census Finds There Are About 100,000 Contractors In Iraq. The Washington Post (12/5, D1, Merle, 690K) reports, "There are about 100,000 government contractors operating in Iraq, not counting subcontractors, a total that is approaching the size of the US military force there, according to the military's first census of the growing population of civilians operating in the battlefield. The survey finding, which includes Americans, Iraqis and third-party nationals hired by companies operating under U.S. government contracts, is significantly higher and wider in scope than the Pentagon's only previous estimate, which said there were 25,000 security contractors in the country." It is also "10 times the estimated number of contractors that deployed during the Persian Gulf War in 1991, reflecting the Pentagon's growing post-Cold War reliance on contractors for such jobs as providing security, interrogating prisoners, cooking meals, fixing equipment and constructing bases that were once reserved for soldiers." The Post also reports, "Three years into the war, the headcount represents one of the Pentagon's most concrete efforts so far toward addressing the complexities and questions raised by the large numbers of civilians who have flooded into Iraq to work. With few industry standards, the military and contractors have sometimes lacked coordination, resulting in friendly fire incidents, according to a Government Accountability Office report last year."

AP Alleged To Have Fabricated Atrocity In Iraq. Fox News Special Report (12/4, Hume) reported the Associated Press "is under attack for allegedly fabricating news from Iraq. They quoted an Iraqi Police captain named Jamail Hussein in several stories, including one describing soldiers standing by as people were burned alive at a mosque. But Iraq's Interior Ministry says it has no evidence that it happened and that the captain does not even exist. The AP says it revisited the neighborhood and found witnesses that confirmed its story. But the Boston Herald's Jules Crittenden says, 'the AP is making up war crimes' and described the AP as 'an anti-American agency that seeks to undermine the President.'"

US Commanders Dissatisfied With Iraqi Army's Performance. ABC World News (12/4, story 5, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the Bush Administration, "of course," had "hoped to begin withdrawing American forces from Iraq by now. That has not happened, largely because Iraqi forces are still not up to the job of securing their own country. ABC's Aaron Katersky and has embedded with US forces since the beginning of last month and has seen why they are not ready to take over." Katersky went on to report, "US commanders are often frustrated when Iraqi troops hit the street, as we've traveled with them over the past two weeks, the trainers say the Iraqis need a lot of work." Major William Breazille, 3rd Infantry Division: "They are minimally ready to defend their battle space. They need more equipment, more personnel, they need soldiers that are more committed." Katersky added, "We heard that kind of complaint everywhere went."

Danish Reporters Acquitted In Iraq WMD Case. The AP (12/5, Olsen) reports, "Three Danish journalists who published classified intelligence reports on Iraq's former weapons program were acquitted Monday on charges of endangering national security. The Copenhagen City Court ruled that Niels Lunde, chief editor of the Berlingske Tidende newspaper, and reporters Michael Bjerre and Jesper Larsen acted in the public interest when they published a series of articles in 2004 citing leaked Danish intelligence reports."

Commander Says Troop Shortage, "Caveats" Undermining War Effort In Afghanistan. USA Today (12/5, 1A, Wiseman, 2.27M) reports, "The outgoing US commander in Afghanistan warned that the fight against the Taliban is in danger of being undermined by a shortage of NATO troops and by restrictions that keep some alliance forces out of combat." US Army Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry "said in an interview that NATO countries need to contribute more troops and that some of them must drop 'caveats' that prevent their forces from fighting freely." Eikenberry "is worried about the caveats and about NATO's troop strength, which is at 90% of the level NATO says is required. 'The objective has got to be to get to the 100% level,' he said." USA Today adds, "Close to wrapping up an 18-month tour as U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Eikenberry also said Afghanistan's broken-down infrastructure -- particularly its roads -- needed more repair than the United States and its allies realized after ousting the Taliban regime in late 2001."

DOD Resists DEA's "Pleas" For Help In Afghan Opium Campaign. The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Meyer, 850K) reports, "The Pentagon, engaged in a difficult fight to defeat a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, has resisted entreaties from U.S. anti-narcotics officials to play an aggressive role in the faltering campaign to curb the country's opium trade. Military units in Afghanistan largely overlook drug bazaars, rebuff some requests to take U.S. drug agents on raids and do little to counter the organized crime syndicates shipping the drug to Europe, Asia and, increasingly, the United States, according to officials and documents." In Afghanistan, "poppy cultivation has exploded, increasing by more than half this year." The "DEA's advocates in Congress" and Afghan officials "have asked for more help from the Pentagon." Rep. Henry Hyde's aides "say the congressman hasn't heard back" since October 20 from Secretary Rumsfeld or Undersecretary Edelman about an October 12 request "to allow DEA agents to ride along on more military missions in Afghanistan and to call them in when soldiers found a large drug stash or operation."

Poor DOD Oversight Is Faulted For 2004 Afghan Crash. USA Today (12/5, Levin, Kelley, 2.27M) reports, "Poor Defense Department oversight of private companies that fly military missions in war zones was partially responsible for a 2004 crash that killed six people in Afghanistan, federal accident investigators said Monday." The NTSB "recommended that the Defense Department coordinate with the Federal Aviation Administration to better monitor the charter flights increasingly being used to carry small numbers of troops and cargo in Iraq and Afghanistan." Among other violations, "the military requires planes it charters to be equipped with a device that allows people on the ground to follow the flight's route. But the NTSB said it found no evidence that the military had tried to enforce the rule."

Afghan Women's Shelters Are Under Constant Threat. The Washington Post (12/5, Constable, 690K) reports in a front page article on Afghan shelters for women fleeing abuse: "In the years since the overthrow of the Taliban in 2001, a network of civic groups has begun promoting women's legal rights and opening shelters. Still, despite increasing cooperation from police and referrals from the women's ministry, the shelters remain controversial and in permanent danger of attack by angry husbands and fathers." Several advocates are quoted.

NYTimes Says Iraq, Bush's "Inattention" At Root Of Problems In Afghanistan. The New York Times (12/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "Afghanistan was supposed to be the good war -- and the war America was winning. But because of the Bush administration's inattention and mismanagement, even the good war is going wrong." President Bush's "decision to rush off to invade Iraq meant that Afghanistan would be shortchanged when it came to resources and to policy makers' priority lists. The cost of that inattention can be seen in the failing Afghan police force. It can also be seen in the Taliban's growing strength, the mounting death toll of Afghan civilians and NATO troops, and the unraveling of the Karzai government."

US Army Unable To Keep Up With Equipment Repair. The Washington Post (12/5, Tyson, 690K) reports in a front page article, "[The] Army ... is wearing out faster than it is being rebuilt. The Army and Marine Corps have sunk more than 40 percent of their ground combat equipment into the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to government data. An estimated $17 billion-plus worth of military equipment is destroyed or worn out each year, blasted by bombs, ground down by desert sand and used up to nine times the rate in times of peace. ... Partly as a result of the shortages, many U.S. units are rated 'unready' to deploy, officials say, raising alarm in Congress and concern among military leaders." The repair work "will cost an estimated $17 billion to $19 billion annually for several more years, regardless of any shift in Iraq strategy. The Army alone has 280,000 major pieces of equipment in combat zones that will eventually have to be fixed or replaced. Before the war, the Army spent $2.5 billion to $3 billion a year on wear and tear. ... Responding to urgent requests from the Army and Marine Corps, Congress approved an extra $23.8 billion in October to replace worn-out equipment in fiscal 2007."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC To Dispute Whistleblower's Allegations About Morgan Stanley Probe. USA Today (12/5, 7B, Farrell) reports, "In an unusual departure from the polite 'no comment' that the Securities and Exchange Commission generally offers in response to criticism, four SEC officials are expected to blast a self-proclaimed 'whistle-blower' before a Senate subcommittee hearing today." USA continues, "The four officials, including Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's director of enforcement, are scheduled to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee to answer allegations that a high-profile investigation of John Mack, the CEO of Morgan Stanley, was abandoned last year because of political pressure." USA adds, "Gary Aguirre, a former SEC investigator, made those allegations at a congressional hearing in June. Aguirre said he was fired because he didn't want to abandon an investigation into whether Mack broke inside-trading rules by sharing market-sensitive information with a hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management. … He testified that he wanted to subpoena Mack in order to ask him about various suspicious trades, but his superiors wouldn't let him issue the subpoena." USA notes, "In June, the SEC said political pressure didn't play a role in the decision not to bring Mack in for questioning. Last week the SEC closed the investigation. Today, Thomsen and others are expected to offer blunt testimony about Aguirre and his work habits at the SEC. … Aguirre was fired in September 2005, just days before the expiration of his one-year probationary period at the commission."

Second Official Had Concerns About SEC Inquiry. The New York Times (12/5, Bogdanich) reports, "Congressional investigators have found that a second official at the Securities and Exchange Commission expressed serious concerns about how the agency was conducting its inquiry into a prominent hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management." The Times continues, "The official, Eric Ribelin, an investigator at the commission, asked to be removed from the Pequot inquiry because of his serious misgivings about decisions being made on the case by senior S.E.C. officials, according to a government official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss the matter." The Times adds, "Mr. Ribelin believed that the inquiry 'was not handled right,' Senator Arlen Specter, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said in an interview. The investigator's criticism echoes some of the complaints lodged this year by the former S.E.C. lawyer who ran the investigation, Gary J. Aguirre. … 'Something smells rotten here,' Mr. Ribelin wrote in an e-mail message to an S.E.C. supervisor last year." The Times notes, "He is among those expected to testify today before Senator Specter's committee, which, together with the Senate Finance Committee, has been examining allegations by Mr. Aguirre that the agency prematurely halted its Pequot investigation because of outside political pressure. … Mr. Aguirre, who led the hedge fund investigation until he was fired last year, has told members of Congress that senior S.E.C. officials blocked him from taking testimony from John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive and friend of Pequot's founder, Arthur J. Samberg. … S.E.C. officials said they turned down Mr. Aguirre's request at that time because he had not made a strong enough case for taking Mr. Mack's testimony, records show. The S.E.C. took Mr. Mack's testimony about a year later, and formally closed the Pequot investigation last week without taking any enforcement action. Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack have repeatedly denied any improper conduct."

Jefferies To Pay $9.7 Million To Settle Fidelity Gift Probe. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, C1, Craig, Levitz) reports, "Brokerage firm Jefferies Group Inc. has agreed to pay more than $10 million to settle allegations that a former star trader doled out gifts and entertainment, including expensive wine and private-jet flights, to Fidelity Investments to win mutual-fund trading business." The Journal continues, "The National Association of Securities Dealers, which spearheaded the investigation, imposed a $5.5 million penalty on Jefferies, and the Securities and Exchange Commission ordered Jefferies to return nearly $4.8 million of trading gains. The firm, which settled charges without admitting or denying guilt, has been ordered to hire a monitor to review travel, entertainment and gift policies." The Journal adds, "Former Jefferies trader Kevin Quinn, whom Jefferies armed with a big expense account to lure Fidelity business, was fined $468,000, and Scott Jones, a Jefferies board member who was Mr. Quinn's immediate supervisor, was fined $50,000. Both agreed to other penalties to settle the charges. … Mr. Quinn, who through his attorney declined to comment, has been permanently barred from working at a registered securities firm. … Notable in yesterday's announcement was that the SEC, which has jurisdiction over Fidelity, took no action against the mutual-fund company. Mutual funds are supposed to send their stock trades to whichever firm offers them -- and their customers -- the best price and service, and such decisions aren't supposed to be based on gifts a fund manager may have received from a broker. .. However, according to people familiar with the inquiry, the SEC has had difficulty trying to prove that investors were financially harmed because Fidelity traders accepted the gifts and entertainment."

USA Today (12/5, 9B, Farrell) reports, "In a case that could taint the pristine image of mutual fund giant Fidelity Investments, federal regulators settled civil charges with a stock brokerage firm for lavishing more than $1.6 million in fine wines, golf junkets, sports tickets and other goodies on a handful of Fidelity traders. The gifts, regulators contend, were designed to get Fidelity to shift more of its stock-trading business to the firm." USA continues, "Regulators say Jefferies obliterated the NASD's $100 limit on the amount of gifts and expense-related entertainment that can be provided to a customer each year. … According to the settlement, Jefferies made only $4.3 million in commissions off the Boston-based family of mutual funds in 2001. In order to grow its Fidelity business, the company hired Kevin Quinn in September 2002, paying him $4 million a year and an annual expense account of $1.5 million."

The Washington Post/AP (12/5, D2, Gordon) reports, "It was the first case brought in a two-year investigation by the SEC and the NASD into whether about two dozen brokerage firms illegally provided golf outings, Super Bowl tickets and other gifts to traders at mutual fund advisers to get them to bring their business to the firms. The practice is said to be widespread in the brokerage industry. … Fidelity Investments, the Boston-based fund giant, has said it could face action from the SEC in an investigation into whether its traders sent company business to brokerage firms that offered gifts and gratuities, rather than to firms offering the best deals on trades. More than a dozen Fidelity employees have been disciplined in connection with the investigation and at least five traders have left the firm."

The Financial Times (12/5, Masters, Knight) reports, "US regulators moved on Monday to crack down on brokers who lavish gifts on mutual fund traders as they slapped $9.7m in penalties on Jefferies & Co, the New York securities firm, for currying favour with Fidelity traders." The Times continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission and the industry regulator NASD said Jefferies, a middle-sized investment bank, hired Kevin Quinn as an executive vice-president in 2002 and gave him a $1.5m annual travel and entertainment budget to boost their institutional business. … He used the money to court five Fidelity traders, paying for private flights to Turks and Caicos, Bermuda and Puerto Rico, as well as vintage wines, golf outings, and trips to Wimbledon and the US Open tennis tournament. … He also paid $75,000 towards a lavish Miami bachelor party for a Fidelity trader. "Investors deserve and the integrity of the market requires that traders select brokers based on the quality of their trade execution and not the lavishness of their gifts," said Walter Ricciardi, the SEC's deputy enforcement director." The Times notes, "The regulators said the case was part of a broader effort to tighten policies that have let brokers funnel thousands of dollars in gifts and entertainment to institutional traders. … The NASD, which unearthed the problem, also issued a report urging firms to track entertainment and gifts more closely."

Regulators Find Accounting Rule Change Agreement Elusive. The Washington Post (12/5, D1, Johnson) reports, "Regulators continue to revise an accounting rule criticized by business groups as overly expensive, Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said yesterday, but an agreement remains days away." The Post continues, "Officials at the SEC and the board that oversees the audit industry have been meeting and exchanging documents about the measure, which requires accountants to review corporate financial controls, for the better part of two weeks. The rule is the single most expensive part of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, corporate accountability legislation passed in 2002 that is designed to prevent fraud after collapses at Enron and WorldCom." The Post adds, "Trade groups and lawmakers have attacked the provision and called for regulators to scrap the burdensome approach. At the same time, consumer advocates warn that establishing different standards for thousands of small and mid-size businesses would effectively gut the measure and make financial reports less reliable for investors. … The trick is to make complying with the rule less expensive, particularly for smaller companies with fewer resources. Coming to agreement on the mechanics, including forcing accountants to rely on the judgment of corporate managers, and to focus on the most important issues in the financial statements, has been a difficult task. The debate broke into public view two weeks ago after a memo from Cox was leaked to the press."

CRIMINAL LAW:

US Charges NIH Alzheimer's Researcher With Conflict Of Interest. The AP (12/5, Beamish) reports, "In a rare federal prosecution, a leading government Alzheimer's researcher was charged Monday with a criminal conflict of interest for performing lucrative private drug company work that overlapped his official duties." The AP continues, "Prosecutors alleged Dr. Trey Sunderland of the National Institutes of Health received $285,000 in improper consulting fees and travel expenses from Pfizer, Inc., for work on early indicators of Alzheimer's at the same time he also oversaw similar NIH business with the drugmaker. … The private consulting 'directly related' to his government job, and Sunderland failed to obtain the proper approvals from his supervisors or disclose the work to NIH, according to papers filed in U.S. District Court in Baltimore. … The felony charge carries a maximum sentence of one year in prison and a $100,000 fine. Prosecutors filed the charge as a criminal information, instead of indictment, signaling the possibility of a plea deal." The AP adds, "The prosecution is believed to be the first such case against a federal scientist since the early 1990s. … It stemmed from a two-year ethics controversy at NIH that prompted the nation's premier medical agency to issue new rules on consulting and end such relationships that enrich its scientists. … Scientists recently told NIH that the new rules are so strict that many are considering leaving the agency. … NIH had identified at least 44 government researchers who improperly made money moonlighting for biotechnology and drug companies. Most were given written or verbal reprimands or were permitted to retire. … But Sunderland drew the attention of federal prosecutors and the ire of Congress when House investigators revealed his private financial deal and the fact that he transferred hundreds of tubes of valuable NIH tissue samples to Pfizer around the time of his consulting work."

US Charges New York CEO With Stealing Employees' Identities. Fortune (12/5, Mehta) reports, "Anyone who works in an office - or watches 'The Office' - knows how torturous cubicle life can be: unflattering fluorescent lights, insecure supervisors and clueless co-workers can all take their toll. Now, it seems, there's a new indignity: bosses who steal their employees' identities." Fortune continues, "Terrence D. Chalk, a well-known White Plains, N.Y., entrepreneur, may have done just that. The Justice Department says Chalk, CEO of a computer services company called CompuLinx, applied for loans and credit cards using the names of employees or clients, falsely claiming they were officers of his firm. … Charges include conspiracy and credit card fraud, and if he's convicted, he faces up to 165 years in prison. Chalk, who was quoted frequently in computer industry trade publications and served on local charity boards, has made other enemies too."

Fortune adds, "Once his case became public, assorted associates came out of the woodwork, claiming the entrepreneur owed them money. And a former business partner told the local paper that Chalk used his deceased father's personal information to get a loan. Chalk's lawyer didn't return calls. … ID-stealing bosses are the exception, but they are out there, says Linda Foley, executive director of the Identity Theft Resource Center, a leading nonprofit that provides information and support for fraud victims. .. In fact, Foley started the center in 1999 after her boss used information on Foley's tax forms to apply for credit cards and a cell phone. And earlier this year a judge in upstate New York sentenced a computer entrepreneur to seven years in jail for tax fraud and stealing the IDs of employees and friends."

US Wins Discovery Battle In Milberg Weiss Probe. The California Recorder (12/5, Scheck) reports, "L.A. federal prosecutors have won a behind-the-scenes discovery fight in the undying probe of plaintiffs firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman." The Recorder continues, "In a sealed ruling issued the day before Thanksgiving, U.S. District Judge A. Howard Matz ordered the production of reams of discovery that prosecutors had sought from various plaintiffs firms, according to lawyers familiar with the case." The Recorder adds, "Attorneys for Milberg -- which was indicted in May, as were two of its name partners, on charges of paying kickbacks to clients -- had argued that the material was covered by work-product privilege. … The documents relate largely to payment agreements with other firms for John Torkelsen, a former expert witness for the plaintiff goliath, said the attorneys." The Recorder notes, "'Torkelsen has been the subject of intense interest as the prosecutors continue efforts to indict Milberg's former star partner William Lerach, who now heads the top plaintiff shop Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins. … The May indictment of Milberg accused that firm of giving fees to outside lawyers who in turn paid lead plaintiffs in class actions, constituting illegal kickbacks. … But the ongoing investigation looks beyond those charges at other transactions. Aside from the Torkelsen payments, prosecutors have spent years looking at referral fees Milberg allegedly paid to other lawyers -- and possibly stockbrokers -- in exchange for bringing them lead plaintiffs."

Navy Submariner Pleads Guilty To Peddling Classified Data. The AP (12/5, Barisic) reports, "A sailor accused of stealing a U.S.Navy laptop and peddling its classified contents to an undisclosed foreign government pleaded guilty to espionage, desertion and other charges." The AP continues, "If convicted, Petty Officer 3rd Class Ariel J. Weinmann, 22, of Salem, Oregon, could face a sentence of life in prison without parole, a dishonorable discharge from the Navy and forfeiture of all pay." The AP adds, "Under the plea agreement Monday, Weinmann pleaded guilty to one count each of espionage, desertion, failing to properly safeguard and store classified information, electronically copying classified information, communicating classified information to a person not entitled to receive it, and stealing and destroying a government computer. … Weinmann pleaded guilty to trying to transmit classified information related to national defense to a representative of a foreign government on Oct. 19, 2005, while he was in or near Vienna, Austria. … He pleaded not guilty to two additional espionage counts, one accusing him of giving classified information to an agent of a foreign government in March 2005 in Bahrain and another accusing him of trying to deliver confidential information on March 19, 2006, in Mexico City."

Former US Attorney Discusses Memphis Councilman's Prior Bribery Conviction. WPTY-TV Memphis (12/4, Amorose) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "On Thursday, November 30, 2006, city council members Rickey Peete and Edmund Ford were charged for taking a bribes in exchange for their votes on a zoning issue. It is the same crime Rickey Peete was convicted of in 1989. Hickman Ewing was the U.S. Attorney who prosecuted the case" in 1989. "One day he received a call from his friend, a real estate developer. … He said, 'They would go down and talk to each councilman and try to lobby them to vote for them, and Rickey basically says I'm the one that can get this through, I can get this through for you, and I need money now and money later.'" WPTY added, "Ewing said he is glad the U.S. Attorney's office is continuing it's crusade against public corruption. He said, 'I think prosecuting one public official is worth a lot more than prosecuting ten bank robbers. Who's more dangerous to society, one crack dealer who's 19 years-old who's got a habit, or the public official? I'd say the public official.'"

Former SBC Employee Pleads Not Guilty In Pellicano-Related Perjury Case. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/5) reports former SBC

Communications employee Joann Wiggan "pleaded not guilty Monday to charges of lying to FBI agents and a federal grand injury investigating wiretapping allegations against Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano." Wiggan "is charged with lying to investigators, grand jurors and during a previous trial about her contact with former co-worker Ray Turner. … Prosecutors say Wiggan was one of three SBC employees who supplied Turner with information from confidential phone company databases he used to help Pellicano illegally tap the phones of several Hollywood figures." The AP notes, "Wiggan was acquitted in September of four perjury charges but jurors deadlocked on a fifth. … In the new indictment, prosecutors allege Wiggan and Turner called each other at least 35 times during a time when Wiggan claimed they hadn't spoken."

Reputed New England Mob Underboss Released On Bail. The Boston Globe (12/5, Murphy, 413K) reports, "Reputed New England Mafia underboss Carmen 'The Big Cheese' DiNunzio looked uncomfortable yesterday as he shuffled into court in leg irons. He didn't speak, as his lawyer entered not guilty pleas on his behalf to charges of illegal gambling and extortion." He "was freed on bail after posting $20,000 cash." Defense lawyer Anthony M. Cardinale "said the indictment returned by an Essex County grand jury on Friday alleges crimes that occurred in 2001 and was brought just as the statute of limitations was about to expire. 'I think it's to our benefit that they waited this long' to bring the case, Cardinale said. DiNunzio is charged with extortion, maintaining or organizing an illegal gaming operation, and conspiracy in maintaining or organizing a gaming operation."

FBI Leading Nation-Wide Search For Abducted Florida Newborn. Fox News' The Big Story With John Gibson (12/4, 5:40 p.m.) reported, "Our big crime story is the intense search for a missing baby boy, a search that is now nation-wide. The FBI is now working on the case as they hunt for a woman who held the mother at knife point before snatching her newborn baby in Florida. … With me now live on the phone with new developments in the case, FBI Special Agent John Kuchta." Kuchta: "Well, we've expanded our search nationwide. And we are…appealing to the public. We believe that someone close to the offender, a husband, boyfriend, mother, sister, friend, would have information and they would come forward." Gibson: "What do you think the outlook for this is?" Kuchta: "Well, it's strong. … Our federal and state local partners are working on this case. We will leave no stone unturned and we will work it to conclusion until we reunite the baby with the family."

Connecticut Man Found Competent To Be Tried On Murder-For-Hire Charges. The New Haven Register (12/5, Helsel, 82K) reports from Ansonia, Conn., "The local man who police say conspired with his mother in a low-rent 'murder for hire' scheme was ruled competent to stand trial and entered not guilty pleas Monday. Nicholas Scott Taylor, 20, is charged, along with his mother, Kathryn Smith, 48, of conspiring in a plot to kill Smith's boyfriend for what they believed would result in a $100,000 insurance policy payout earlier this year." The Register notes that Taylor "and his mother allegedly offered an undercover FBI informant a used stereo and up to $150 cash to kill Smith's longtime boyfriend, according to an arrest warrant affidavit."

Washington Woman Charged In 1978 Murder-For-Hire. The Seattle Times (12/5, Miletich, Brunner, 118K) reports, "Prosecutors charged a Pierce County woman Monday with first-degree murder in the 1978 killing of an auto mechanic who allegedly was lured to his death as part of a contract killing." Karen L. Martin "was arrested Friday by a FBI/local law-enforcement task force investigating old unsolved homicides. Her name surfaced as investigators combed past cases related to organized crime and Seattle strip clubs." The Times notes, "A year after the killing, Martin and her attorney went to federal prosecutors, saying she had information on contract killings linked to a Seattle-based crime organization. She was offered immunity from federal prosecution before she acknowledged she killed [Leroy] Grant, according to the charging papers. … Federal prosecutors didn't inform King County prosecutors about Martin's admissions, and Grant's slaying went unsolved."

Bogus DHS Show Producer Sentenced To Year In Prison For Fraud. The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Hanley, Krikorian, 850K) reports, "In a ruling that surprised attorneys and outraged investors, a federal judge Monday sentenced onetime Hollywood producer Joseph Medawar to a year and a day in prison for swindling scores of people out of millions of dollars to develop a bogus television show about the U.S. Department of Homeland Security." US

District Judge Manuel L. Real sentenced Medawar "to a term far shorter than the 33 months his attorney had requested, or the 57 months sought by the government." Assistant US Attorney Christine Ewell "told reporters outside court that authorities would review Real's sentence to see if there are any grounds for appeal." The Times notes that "according to the FBI, the IRS and the U.S. attorney's office, Medawar and others had defrauded at least 70 investors — many from local churches — out of millions of dollars."

The AP (12/5) reports, "As part of the scheme, federal prosecutors said, he falsely claimed 26 episodes of 'DHS' were in post-production and that the company had distribution deals with 137 overseas markets. Investigators found only one episode had been shot, and only after Medawar became aware of the federal probe. One would-be investor, Manuel Lozano, told the judge Monday that Medawar left many 'individuals financially crushed by the side of the road.' … Lozano also expressed disappointment outside the court, saying 'justice and the legal system don't necessarily coexist.'"

Jury Selection Begins For Alabama FEMA Fraud Trial. The Mobile Register (12/4, Kirby) reported, "Governor Reiss Sr. committed murder as a teenager, spent part of his adulthood on the run after an escape from prison and then became a preacher. Now in his 50s, the Mobile native finds himself once again in trouble with the law." Reiss "will go on trial later this month on charges that he defrauded the federal government following Hurricane Katrina, the first such case to go to trial in Mobile's federal court. Jury selection is slated for today." The Press-Register noted that "defense attorney Willie Huntley said his client is innocent of the current allegations. He attributed the fraud charges to confusion on the part of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which he contends filed his application under the wrong category."

Maryland Teen Arrested For DC Assaults. The Washington Post (12/5, B4, Pierre) reports, "A teenager from Temple Hills has been arrested in connection with eight recent sexual assaults near Howard University, D.C. police said yesterday." The Post continues, "Women were groped in the incidents, and in two cases, the assailant brandished a knife, police said. No one was injured in the assaults, which took place late last month. During the past week, police blanketed the area where the assaults occurred with plainclothes and uniformed officers." The Post adds, "Yesterday, police announced the arrest of Avon Marquell Pittman, 17, of the 4700 block of Temple Hill Road. On Saturday afternoon, plainclothes officers noticed Pittman following a woman in the 200 block of T Street NW and pounced, discovering a kitchen knife and taking him into custody, police said. He was later let go, and police said the woman he had been following was so startled that she left before they could question her. … Police arrested Pittman early yesterday, after authorities developed additional leads. He was charged as an adult with assault with intent to commit first-degree sexual assault while armed. The charge applies to just one of the cases. … But 'the community can feel confident' that the crimes are solved, police Cmdr. Larry McCoy declared at a news conference."

Virginia Governor Again Delays Execution Of Convicted Murderer. The Washington Post (12/5, B05, Rondeaux) reports, "Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine yesterday delayed for the second time the execution of triple killer Percy L. Walton, a move that keeps the capital murder case at the center of a growing national debate over the execution of the mentally ill." The Post continues, "In June, Kaine delayed Walton's scheduled execution until Friday to allow for an independent evaluation of his mental condition and competence. Based on that evaluation, Kaine (D) said yesterday that Walton's execution would be delayed 18 more months, until June 10, 2008. … 'I am compelled to conclude that Walton is severely mentally impaired and meets the Supreme Court's definition of mental incompetence,' Kaine said in a statement. 'At the same time, it is within the realm of possibility -- though unlikely -- that Walton's mental impairment is not permanent. Accordingly, a commutation of his sentence is not appropriate at this time.'" The Post adds, "The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1986 that the execution of the mentally ill violates the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court said death-row inmates must be able to comprehend that they are about to be executed and why. But the high court left it up to states to define who is sane or insane. … Walton's case is one of several pending around the country that have frequently been cited as important tests of the limits of the Supreme Court's ruling in Ford v. Wainwright. … Attorneys for Walton, 28, contend that Walton is mentally ill and mentally retarded and that his condition has further deteriorated since he has been on death row. His attorneys at trial never requested a competency hearing. A competency hearing was held three years ago as part of his appeals, and experts disagreed about his mental state." The Post notes, "In a rare move, less than two hours before his scheduled execution in June, Kaine asked three mental health experts to evaluate Walton to determine if he is competent to be executed. A spokesman for the governor said two of the three experts had completed reports on Walton's mental health, and one declined to review his case. The experts' conclusions will not be made public, the spokesman said."

Reform Of Tort Trust System Urged. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (12/5, A18), Kimberley A. Strassel, a member of the Journal's editorial board, writes, "Harry Kananian died in the year 2000 of mesothelioma -- a cancer almost always caused by asbestos. But the legacy that may survive him is the role he is posthumously playing in exposing evidence of asbestos litigation fraud." Strassel continues, "In early 2000, the Ohio resident met with the law firm of Early, Ludwick, Sweeney & Strauss to see about collecting compensation from special trusts set up by companies to deal with asbestos liabilities. So the law firm filed a claim to one trust, saying Kananian had worked in a World War II shipyard and was exposed to insulation containing asbestos. It also filed a claim to another trust saying he had been a shipyard welder. A third claim, to another trust, said he'd unloaded asbestos off ships in Japan. And a fourth claim said that he'd worked with 'tools of asbestos' before the war. Meanwhile, a second law firm, Brayton Purcell, submitted two more claims to two further trusts, with still different stories. The two firms swept up as much as $700,000 for Kananian and his estate from trusts and settlements. … In the legal trade, this is known as 'double dipping' -- the process by which lawyers file claims at many different bankruptcy trusts on behalf of a single plaintiff. Each trust is told a different story about how the client got sick, and the plaintiff collects from all of them. Of course, the lawyers collect too. This practice may well have remained unexposed had not Brayton Purcell decided to cash in on Kananian one more time. It sued Lorillard Tobacco, this time claiming its client had become sick from smoking Kent cigarettes, whose filters contained asbestos for several years in the 1950s. That suit has now exploded on Brayton, exposing one of the asbestos bar's more lucrative cash cows." Strassel adds, "Whatever happens, the exposure of this trust scam is bolstering a new wave of oversight. Judges are already taking a closer look at silicosis claims and 'prepackaged' bankruptcies -- both cash cows for the trial bar. … Meanwhile, reform proposals are beginning to emerge. One idea is for the trusts to release data about claimants, so that other trusts and defense attorneys can review existing claims. Some lawyers are requesting that active litigation be put on hold until companies can see who claimed from trusts. That this hasn't already happened is the fault of bankruptcy judges, who have been unresponsive to requests for more oversight of the trusts they help create."

Supreme Court Expected To Strike Down Use Of Race As Factor In School Assignments. USA Today (12/5, 3A, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "The Supreme Court appeared ready Monday to strike down public school diversity programs that use race as a factor in deciding where students go to school." In "the first test of school integration efforts to come before the court since Chief Justice John Roberts and fellow conservative Samuel Alito joined the bench last term," the justices "heard two cases -- one from Seattle, the other from Louisville -- that examine whether using race in school assignments violates the Constitution's equality guarantee." Yesterday's "two hours of arguments indicated that the court is moving toward a harder line on race-based policies." USA Today adds, "The key player appeared to be Justice Anthony Kennedy, who is at the ideological center of the court. As the liberals asked questions that suggested they supported the school districts' policies, Kennedy joined conservative justices in expressing skepticism about programs that transfer some students out of their neighborhoods to counteract racially segregated housing patterns in those cities."

ABC World News (12/4, story 7, 2:35, Crawford-Greenburg, 8.78M) reported "the justices "grappled with a key question: Can officials turn children away from their neighborhood schools because they're the wrong color? Swing justice Anthony Kennedy, whose vote could determine the outcome of the case, called the school plans 'troubling.' He suggested schools could find better ways to integrate." NBC Nightly News (12/4, story 6, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported "the court's majority seems prepared to rule that assigning students by race is unconstitutional, no matter what the motive."

The CBS Evening News (12/4, story 7, 0:45, Andrews, 7.66M) reported "the schools say this use of race is justified to maintain diversity and that if the court rules against them, the inevitable result will be segregated schools. Expect a ruling next spring."

McClatchy (12/5, Henderson) reports Kennedy "was joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts, Justice Antonin Scalia and Justice Samuel Alito in his criticism of the school plans. Justice Clarence Thomas, a longtime critic of race-conscious policies, typically doesn't speak during oral arguments but is widely expected to object to the plans." The New York Times (12/5, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports "lawyers for the school systems found themselves struggling, under the justices' questioning, to meet the even more basic challenge of explaining why the plans should be seen as something different from the intentional segregation that the court struck down in Brown v. Board of Education."

The Legal Times (12/5, Mauro) reports, "During two hours of oral argument, Justice Anthony Kennedy, whose vote may determine the outcome of the case, seemed deeply skeptical of the constitutionality of using race as a factor, especially in a school district that has already been declared 'unitary' and ended efforts to desegregate. … 'If we, for the first time, say that a system that has achieved unitary status ... can turn around and use individual skin color. ... We've never said that,' Kennedy exclaimed at one point. 'That takes us on a very perilous course.'" The Times adds, "A ruling against the use of race could have a broad impact in school districts nationwide that use a variety of race-conscious methods to cure racial imbalances caused by housing patterns. Civil rights leaders who were among the spectators packing the courtroom Monday were pessimistic afterward. … 'If they are inclined to view these voluntary measures in the same light as segregation and any use of race is constitutionally suspect, then God help us,' said Ted Shaw, director and counsel of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund. 'I'm not going to predict defeat, but it's an uphill fight after what we heard today.'"

The Washington Post (12/5, A3, Barnes, 690K) says the discussion "seemed to reflect a court majority highly skeptical of the proposition that the benefits of racially diverse public schools can justify any restriction on an individual's constitutional right to equal protection." The decision "is likely to be one of the most defining of the court headed by the new chief justice, John G. Roberts Jr., and a powerful statement about where the nation stands more than 50 years after Brown v. Board of Education demanded an end to segregated schools." The court, "encouraged by the Bush administration, has grown increasingly distrustful of racial classifications, and it reached out to take up the cases challenging schools in Seattle and Louisville even though appeals courts had upheld them as constitutional." The Washington Times (12/5, Fagan, 88K) runs a similar story this morning, while the Los Angeles Times (12/5, Savage, 850K) titles its report "Court Appears Likely To Bar School 'Racial Balancing.'"

The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A2, Bravin, 2.04M) reports, "The court's four more liberal members suggested that US society still bears the legacy of the nation's history of racial discrimination and that school officials should be free to craft enrollment policies to promote diversity. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg observed that in 1975, Louisville officials had been forced to accept a desegregation plan, but after the court order was lifted, decided 'it's worked rather well, so we'll keep it.' How can 'what's constitutionally required one day' be 'constitutionally prohibited the next day?' she said. 'That's very odd.'"

The Washington Post (12/5, A3, Alexander, 690K) reports "demonstrators from as far as California, along with students from Washington area high schools and universities, braved the breezy, 40-degree weather and gathered on the court steps as early as Sunday night to protest a case that the demonstrators said could reinstitute school segregation. Then, holding signs saying 'Fight for Equality' and chanting 'by any means necessary,' they marched down Independence Avenue for a rally at the Lincoln Memorial. … On the steps of the memorial, student leaders defended affirmative action policies in public schools and demanded school improvements. Three busloads of students from the District's Ballou Senior High School called for better facilities."

The AP (12/5, Sherman) reports, "Demonstrators in favor of racial preferences and bearing 'Fight For Equality' placards descended on the Supreme Court Monday as justices prepared to hear fresh arguments in cases testing when race may be used as a basis for assigning students to public schools." The AP continues, "The cases could produce the most important decisions on school integration in the U.S. in decades. … Parents in two cities are challenging school assignment plans that factor in a student's race in an effort to have individual school populations approximate the racial makeup of the entire system. Federal appeals courts have upheld both programs." The AP adds, "On the sidewalk in front of the Supreme Court, hundreds of demonstrators marched to dramatize their issue. A parent-teachers group from Chicago and several civil rights groups were among those sponsoring the demonstration. … Demonstrators chanted 'Equal education, not segregation' and 'We won't go to the back of the bus, integration is a must.' Some held signs that read 'Stop racism now.'"

More Commentary. Douglas W. Kmiec, professor of constitutional law, Pepperdine University and "constitutional legal counsel to Presidents Reagan and George H. W. Bush," writes in USA Today (12/5, 14A, 2.27M) that in Seattle, "when a student declines to disclose racial ancestry, the schools use 'visual inspection.' Admission by skin pigment is not academic diversity." Kmiec adds, "It is speculated that the usually collegial, and often unanimous, court led by Chief Justice John Roberts might divide sharply on this one. It shouldn't. The moral authority asserted by Earl Warren to banish race stands foursquare behind his young, articulate successor. The way to end racial discrimination is to stop discriminating by race -- not to invite and embed the practice in the decision-making of thousands of schools."

In an editorial, USA Today (12/5, 14A, 2.27M) disagrees, saying, "In 2000, white enrollment at predominantly non-white Franklin High School was 25%; by 2005 it was down to 10%. Without the plan, Seattle's schools have gone backwards. The high court shouldn't lead a charge to ensure similar results around the nation."

Federal Jury Convicts Truck Driver In Immigrant Smuggling Deaths. The AP (12/5, Lozano) reports, "Now that a jury has convicted a truck driver for his role in the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt, his defense attorneys said they are focused on one thing: sparing him a death sentence." The AP continues, "The federal jury convicted Tyrone Williams on Monday of all 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting he faced for ferrying illegal immigrants during a May 2003 smuggling attempt from South Texas to Houston. … His airtight tractor-trailer was packed with more than 70 immigrants who punched out taillights and screamed for help when the heat inside the tomblike trailer became deadly. Nineteen of the immigrants died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation." The AP adds, "On the 20 death penalty eligible counts Williams faced in his retrial, the new jury found that his actions resulted in the death of a person, sending the trial to a punishment phase. That phase is set to begin Wednesday and last about a week. … Jurors will decide whether Williams should be sentenced to death or up to life in prison." The AP notes, "Prosecutors say Williams merits a death sentence because he was responsible for the deaths by not freeing the immigrants or turning on the trailer's air conditioning, which could have saved their lives. Some survivors testified they thought the air conditioning had been turned on. … Prosecutors declined comment on the verdict, but during a court hearing after the jury's decision was read, said they would be presenting 25 to 26 witnesses during the punishment phase and concentrating on how the crime was committed."

The CBS Evening News (12/4, story 8, 0:35, Couric) reported, "I'm Lee Cowan in Texas where the verdict is in one of the deadliest known smuggling cases in US history. More than 70 illegal immigrants from Honduras and Mexico were crammed into this unventilated semi truck three years ago and left to bake in the hot Texas sun. Nineteen of them suffocated in temperatures that soared above 170 degrees. The driver, Tyrone Williams, had unhitch it had trailer and left it there. Today, a Federal jury in Houston convicted Williams of 58 counts of smuggling, some of which carry the death penalty. If Williams is sentenced to death, he becomes the first foreign face execution in connection with the smuggling of illegal immigrants."

The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Hart) reports, "Williams stared ahead and showed no emotion when the verdict was read, but later hugged his lawyer, Craig Washington, before being led away by U.S. marshals. … 'I'm deeply disappointed,' Washington said outside the courtroom." The Times adds, "Prosecutors declined to comment on the verdict, but told U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal that they expect to call about 25 witnesses during the sentencing trial."

The New York Times (12/5, Blumenthal) reports, "In a retrial of the nation's deadliest human trafficking case, the federal jury that convicted the driver, Tyrone M. Williams, 35, of Schenectady, N.Y., begins hearing testimony Wednesday on whether to give Mr. Williams the first death sentence under a 12-year-old 'alien smuggling' statute or a lesser term of up to life in prison." The Times adds, "Mr. Williams, a legal immigrant from Jamaica, sat impassively through 58 recitations of 'guilty' as the verdict form was read, then embraced his lawyer, Craig A. Washington. Asked afterward how his client had taken the news, Mr. Washington, a former Texas congressman, said, 'Better than me.' … Mr. Washington, whose trial defense conceded Mr. Williams's role as a smuggler but challenged his awareness of the victims' suffering, said he planned to put on about 20 witnesses to testify about mitigating factors in Mr. Williams's history." The Times notes, "The lead prosecutor, Daniel C. Rodriguez, an assistant United States attorney who had painted Mr. Williams as 'vile and heartless,' declined to comment until the punishment phase was concluded."

Juror In First Trial Says Williams Was Not Alone In Guilt. The Houston Chronicle (12/5, Rice) reports, "One of the jurors in Tyrone Williams' first trial, which ended with a hung jury in March 2005, said he held out to spare the truck driver from a death sentence because he believed others shared responsibility for the deaths of 19 illegal immigrants. … 'I couldn't see them giving the death sentence to one person,' said Horace Rains, 79, a merchant seaman who lives in east Harris County." The Chronicle continues, "Rains says he and a woman , whose name he could not recall, kept the 2005 jury from reaching a unanimous verdict. His revelation was made possible by U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal's decision to lift a gag order issued by the judge who presided over Williams' first trial. … U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore gave an oral order to jurors at the end of the first trial not to speak with the news media or attorneys after they were discharged. … Gilmore lifted a written gag order in May this year after the case was transferred to Rosenthal, but not the oral order to jurors. The Houston Chronicle asked Rosenthal to lift the oral order and provide a list of jurors because reporters were prevented from interviewing them after the trial."

Prosecutors Question Two Shot By New York Police. The New York Times (12/5, Baker, Rashbaum) reports, "Prosecutors from the Queens district attorney's office conducted bedside hospital interviews yesterday with the two men wounded in a hail of 50 police bullets that claimed the life of Sean Bell, the first time investigators have heard from any direct participants in the Nov. 25 shooting, a lawyer for the two men said." The Times continues, "In separate interviews, the two men, Trent Benefield, 23, and Joseph Guzman, 31, told prosecutors what their lawyers have been saying publicly for days about the shooting, according to the lawyer, Sanford A. Rubenstein. … The two said that only they and Mr. Bell, who was 23, were in or near the car when the shooting erupted — contradicting accounts from some officers involved that a fourth man was with the group and may have been armed." The Times adds, "Mr. Benefield and Mr. Guzman also said that the five police officers who opened fire on them did not identify themselves and that they had no idea that they were facing the police, Mr. Rubenstein said. He was one of three lawyers present as a team of assistant district attorneys and members of the district attorney's staff questioned the men in their rooms at Mary Immaculate Hospital. … Richard A. Brown, the Queens district attorney, is gathering facts about the case, which he has said will go before a grand jury." The Times notes, "For days, the Police Department has been seeking a fourth man who officers and a civilian witness quoted by the police say was wearing a beige jacket and who law enforcement officials believe may have been with Mr. Bell, Mr. Benefield and Mr. Guzman. … One of the detectives who fired, according to a person briefed on his version of events, said the fourth man was in Mr. Bell's car. The civilian witness, who looked down from an apartment window after she heard gunshots, described seeing a man in a beige jacket fleeing the scene, the police said."

Florida Mayor, Police Say Some Rushing To Judgment In Shooting. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (12/5, Johnson, 237K) reports, "Standing on the steps of City Hall on Monday," Fort Lauderdale Mayor Jim Naugle "and police union called the actions of some elected officials and the NAACP 'irresponsible' and 'reckless' after the fourth fatal shooting by Fort Lauderdale police this year. The community has rushed to condemn officers Robert Norvis and Todd Hill before the investigation into the Nov. 28 shooting is finished, said Jack Lokeinsky, president of the Fort Lauderdale Fraternal Order of Police. … 'Judge incidents after all the facts are ascertained and not before,' Lokeinsky said Monday with a diverse crowd of more than 75 officers standing behind him. … 'The posturing of some in the community trying to stir things up, to me, is really wrong,' Naugle said of Commissioner Carlton Moore and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People." The Sun-Sentinel notes, "The FBI has begun a civil rights investigation."

Atlanta Officials, Residents Discuss Police Shootings. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/5, Haines) reports, "Civil rights leaders, clergy and city officials met Monday with residents of a northwest Atlanta neighborhood to discuss how to ease tensions between them and police after officers serving a warrant killed an elderly woman at her home. Many in the audience had questions for Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington, who said he was committed to a thorough investigation into the Nov. 21 fatal shooting of Kathryn Johnston. … Pennington said he was not able to comment on specifics of the case, which has been turned over to the FBI and Georgia Bureau of Investigation." The AP notes that the NAACP, "which hosted the meeting, has called for the establishment of a civilian review board with the power to subpoena witnesses and a return to community policing."

Activists Reportedly Urging Black Chairmen To Pursue Slavery Reparations. The New York Times (12/5, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports, "The impending Democratic takeover of Congress will elevate more blacks to positions of power in the Capitol than ever: 4 major House committee chairmen, as many as 16 subcommittee chairmen, the third-ranking House Democratic leader and a senator considered a credible candidate for his party's presidential nomination." The Times adds, "It is so much power" that Rep. Charles Rangel, set to become chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, "said he hesitated to speak about it publicly. 'I don't want to scare the hell out of people,' Mr. Rangel said, 'that blacks are now in charge of the committees and so, therefore, watch out.'" According to the Times, the NAACP and the Congressional Black Caucus "say they expect their newly powerful champions…to push a long-stalled agenda that includes hearings or a commission on reparations for slavery, guaranteeing voting rights for convicted felons, prohibiting racial profiling by police or customs officers, restricting gun sales, and sharply increasing the compensation paid to people displaced by Hurricane Katrina."

Lesbian Fire Chief Under Fire In Minneapolis. The New York Times (12/5, Saulny) reports, "Two years ago, when Bonnie Bleskachek was named fire chief in Minneapolis, it made news far beyond Minnesota because she was the first openly lesbian firefighter to achieve that rank in the professional fire service of a major city. .. .Hailed as a pioneer, Chief Bleskachek was showered with praise for her years of hard work. Perhaps no one was more pleased with the appointment than Mayor R. T. Rybak, a supporter of gay rights who made the promotion a media event." The Times continues, "But last Wednesday, it became clear that everything had changed. Citing a lack of confidence in Chief Bleskachek's management style, Mr. Rybak asked the City Council to fire her. … The move was made after suits were filed against the city and Chief Bleskachek that accused her of playing sexual politics, retaliating against a former partner, acting as a lustful predator and showing bias against at least one heterosexual male firefighter. … 'All of that information has been presented to us in great detail,' Mr. Rybak said. 'I have to be honest. I very much wanted Bonnie Bleskachek to succeed.'" The Times adds, "Chief Bleskachek says that she did succeed and that is precisely why she is entangled in such a case. … 'Being an out lesbian, which the mayor really wanted to push, the first openly lesbian fire chief, made me an easy target,' she said. 'The sharks smelled blood in the water.' … John A. Klassen, an employment lawyer representing the plaintiffs in three of the four suits against Chief Bleskachek, rejected that argument. … 'None of these cases are antilesbian,' Mr. Klassen said. 'These cases are about discrimination.' … The suits, including one by a former partner of Chief Bleskachek, depict a firehouse culture where lesbians and their allies enjoyed favors and people who crossed them risked punishment."

The Washington Post (12/5, A3, Lydersen) reports, "Last week, city officials were briefed on an investigation being conducted by a local law firm into Bleskachek's performance as chief. After the briefing, Mayor R.T. Rybak announced that a proposed deal that would have given Bleskachek severance pay and demoted her within the department is off the table. Instead, the city may move to fire her from the force, pending the completion of the investigation. … Bleskachek, 43, is furious that the city has settled the lawsuits rather than taking them to trial, where she could have told her side of the story. … 'They have no evidence at all; this is all based on conjecture and hurt feelings,' she said, in her home in a pleasant, modest south Minneapolis neighborhood." The Post notes, "There is no doubt the Fire Department is rife with personal dramas and romantic entanglements. One of the lawsuits against Bleskachek was filed by Jennifer Cornell, 35, the chief's ex-partner of six years, who shares custody of their two children. Another suit was brought by Kathleen Mullen, 43, a longtime friend who had dated Bleskachek's current girlfriend. … A third complaint is from a woman who says Bleskachek flirted with her and then punished her professionally after she declined the advances. Bleskachek counters that the firefighter, Kristina Lemon, was the one who professed attraction to her a decade ago and that she became angry when Bleskachek disciplined her last year for a physical altercation with another firefighter in a burning building."

Maryland Court Hears Arguments On Gay Marriage. The Washington Post (12/5, B1, Rich, 690K) reports, "An attorney for 19 gay and lesbian Maryland residents urged the state's highest court yesterday to strike down a law banning same-sex marriage, saying there is 'no constitutionally sufficient justification' for denying his clients and their children protections that only marriage affords. During an hour-long argument in a crowded chamber of the Court of Appeals in Annapolis, attorney Kenneth Y. Choe of the American Civil Liberties Union invoked the civil rights struggle and said the ability to marry is a fundamental right that belongs to all Marylanders, not only to those for whom that right has always been recognized." On behalf of the state, Assistant Attorney General Robert A. Zarnoch "urged the court to let stand the statute that defines marriage as the union of a man and a woman. Arguing that the judiciary should defer to the legislature, Zarnoch noted that no federal or state appellate court in the country has held that, as the plaintiffs argue, there is a fundamental right to same-sex marriage." The New York Times/AP (12/5) and Washington Times (12/5, Ward, 88K) also report the story.

Federal Panel Deadlocked On Proposal To Require Paper Ballots. The New York Times/AP (12/5) reports, "A federal advisory panel rejected a recommendation on Monday that states use just voting machines whose results could be independently verified. The panel, drafting guidelines for the United States Election Assistance Commission, deadlocked, 6 to 6, on a proposal that would have required electronic machines to produce paper records or other independent means of checking results. Eight votes were needed to pass the recommendation."

The Washington Post (12/5, B6, Barr, 690K) reports committee member Brit Williams, "a computer scientist who has conducted certification evaluations of Georgia's paperless electronic voting system, opposed the measure. 'You are talking about basically a reinstallation of the entire voting system hardware,' he said."

Utah Approves Redistricting Plan To Add Fourth House Seat. The New York Times (12/5, Johnson, 1.16M) reports, "The State of Utah and the District of Columbia are perhaps the oddest imaginable political allies in a nation of polarized partisan loyalties, alike in few things other than bankable predictability: Washington Democratic, Utah Republican." But they "share outrage that each does not have more influence in Congress, and Utah took a big step toward a marriage of convenience Monday when legislators here approved a plan that would give the state a fourth Congressional seat before the next census and Washington its first voting representation ever." The state was "denied a fourth seat after the 2000 census because the government did not count thousands of residents who were away serving as missionaries for the Mormon Church." The plan "faces big hurdles," but the "gulf of political difference between the state and the District is the very glue that offers both of them some hope Congress will give its required approval: one of the newly created seats would almost certainly be Democratic, the other Republican, with no net change in the balance of power."

The Washington Times (12/5, Emerling, 88K) reports Washington, DC officials "cheered the Utah Legislature's approval of a redistricting map that is key to the District's voting rights bill, saying the development brings city residents one step closer to having a vote in the House." Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty, "who met with House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi last week and discussed the bill's prospects, said that Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, told him she would move aggressively for the bill." Fenty said, "I remain optimistic that the bill will move this week. And if it doesn't, I'm hopeful it will be at the top of the legislative agenda in 2007." The Times adds the "chances of the measure making it out of the House Judiciary Committee and through both chambers of the Republican-controlled Congress before lawmakers adjourn this month are shrinking. The bill was not on the House floor schedule issued last week, although bills can be added to the docket."

WPost Says Congress Shouldn't Delay Vote On DC, Utah House Seat Bill. The Washington Post (12/5, A28, 690K) says in an editorial, "The people of the District of Columbia shouldn't have to wait another minute, let alone another month, to get the full voting representation in government that is their due as Americans. A bill to give the District a vote in the House of Representatives is pending, but for reasons that are as unclear as they are unacceptable, it may not be brought to a vote. Instead of idly watching the hours tick down in the final days of a generally useless legislative year, the 109th Congress should muster the political will to right a 200-year-old wrong."

Fetal Pain Bill Seen As Test of Democrats' "Evolving" Stance On Abortion. The Washington Post (12/5, A5, Weisman, 690K) reports Republicans House leaders "plan to bring up a bill tomorrow that would declare that fetuses feel pain and require abortion providers to offer pregnant patients anesthesia for their unborn child." According to the Post, the vote "may be the last on abortion-related legislation for years. That's because Democratic leaders hope to avoid confrontations over hot-button social issues that divide their caucus." Democrats "are shying from the fight. Party leaders in the House have declared tomorrow's decision 'a vote of conscience' and will not try to sway the outcome." House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi "does not plan to speak on the bill, a rarity for her." The Post adds that conservatives "see an opportunity to test Democrats' evolving position on abortion, a position that has become more amenable to incremental curbs on ending pregnancies and more vocal about reducing the number of abortions."

Poll Shows 65% Of Hispanics Favor English As Official US Language. The Washington Times (12/5, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside The Beltway" column that Rob Toonkel, "director of communications for U.S. English Inc., called our attention yesterday to a new Zogby International poll finding that 65 percent of Hispanics favor making English the official language of the United States. He says the results of the poll of 903 Hispanic adults 'challenges the long-standing claim that Hispanics generally oppose official-English measures.'"

FCC Head Tries To Break Telecom Deadlock. USA Today (12/5, Davidson) reports, "Moving to break a deadlock over approval of AT&T's purchase of BellSouth, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission said he will ask a recused commissioner to cast the tie-breaking vote." USA continues, For nearly two months, the FCC has been split 2-2 along party lines, with Democrats Jonathan Adelstein and Michel Copps pressing for tough conditions on the $80 billion deal, which would create the nation's largest phone company. … The impasse has forced three postponements of votes on the merger and talks broke down again Friday over Democrats' demands for non-discrimination assurances for AT&T's broadband traffic and reduced wholesale prices." USA adds, "In a letter to congressional leaders Friday, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, who favors no conditions on the deal, said he will ask fellow Republican Robert McDowell to break the stalemate. … McDowell disqualified himself because he previously worked as a lobbyist for a trade group that opposed the deal. Martin told lawmakers a recused commissioner may be authorized to vote if the government's interests outweigh any ethical concerns. He said he has asked the FCC general counsel to determine if McDowell may vote. … Enlisting McDowell could 'spark various ethical/legal complaints' and a political ruckus with leaders in the new Democratic-controlled Congress, Stifel Nicolaus analyst Blair Levin said in a report." USA notes, "The FCC hopes to clear the deal at its Dec. 20 meeting, before the new Congress takes over in January. Levin predicted McDowell would 'seek some sort of compromise' but would lean toward Martin's view."

Telecom Merger Judge Riled By "Rubber Stamp" Inference. The Deal (12/5, Lindell) reports, "Fireworks in a Washington, D.C., courtroom don't necessarily signal bad news for two telecommunications mergers under review by a federal judge, but they may portend a battle over merger law." The Deal continues, "On Nov. 30, District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan heard the latest round of arguments in his review of the mergers between Verizon Communications Inc. and MCI Inc., and SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp., which the Department of Justice approved in 2005. … Sullivan, months into a congressionally mandated review of the merger, was taken aback when Verizon's lawyer bluntly suggested the judge had little power to unwind the deals. … 'This merger is not going to be unscrambled by anything this court does,' senior Verizon lawyer John Thorne told Sullivan." The Deal adds, "The startled judge -- who has repeatedly said he intends to conduct an independent review and 'won't be a rubber stamp' for the government -- nearly came off the bench. Leaning forward, he glared at Thorne and asked the Verizon attorney to explain his opinion of the judge's authority and the importance of the Tunney Act proceeding. … Thorne, who is well-versed in antitrust law, replied, 'If a transaction is largely good, it should close.'" The Deal notes, "Sullivan's irritation aside, Thorne's view of restricted judicial authority is shared by many antitrust experts. … Thorne concluded that anti-competitive issues posed by a merger, which in this case resulted in the telecoms being ordered to let competitors lease lines into some 700 buildings in about a dozen markets, can be dealt with after a deal closes through the Tunney Act process. … Continuing to glare at Thorne, Sullivan said, 'Maybe Congress should make it clear that mergers couldn't close until there has been judicial review,' he said. … As Thorne finally sat down, Sullivan said, 'I'm going to do an independent review and we'll see where the merger stands at that point.' … Despite Sullivan's tough words, other antitrust experts say the judge, in fact, has little power to rewrite the Justice Department's two merger approvals. … In merger cases where DOJ predicts anti-competitive harm and negotiates divestitures or other remedies with the merging parties to resolve the problems, the agency must submit any remedies for approval by a federal judge. The Tunney Act, a law enacted in the 1970s and amended in 2004, mandates that process."

Kentucky Lawmaker Seeks DOJ Review Of Delta-US Airways Merger. The Louisville (KY) Business First (12/5) reports, "Kentucky congressman Geoff Davis is encouraging the U.S. Attorney General and Transportation Secretary to conduct a 'full and careful review' of US Airways' efforts to merge with Delta Air Lines." Business First continues, "In letters dated Dec. 1, Davis told both Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Transportation Secretary Mary Peters that he is 'very concerned about the significant loss of competition and the likely impact on air fares this merger could create. … The tremendous overlap of the route networks of these carriers would cause significant consolidation, reducing flight choices and increasing already expensive fares for our consumers,' he wrote. 'This potential merger affects thousands of jobs, and Delta/Comair has an economic impact for our region in the billions.'" Business First adds, "Atlanta-based Delta operates its second-largest hub at the Cincinnati/Northern Kentucky International Airport in Hebron, Ky. That hub, which also contains the headquarters of Comair, Delta's regional carrier subsidiary, employs an estimated 10,000 people and has an economic impact of nearly $4 billion, according to a news release issued Monday by Davis, a Boone County Republican representing Kentucky's Fourth District. … 'We feel that Delta and its employees, through extraordinary sacrifice and hard work, are making tremendous progress on their restructuring plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a strong and independent carrier,' Davis wrote to Peters and Gonzales. 'The interests of all may be best served by ensuring they remain on this course.'"

Mercury News Cuts Layoffs After Bargaining Session. The AP (12/5, Konrad) reports, "After a 20-hour bargaining session ended Monday morning, the San Jose Mercury News and its union reached a tentative agreement on a two-year contract that reduced the number of workers to be laid off." The AP continues, "The 263,000-circulation daily newspaper will eliminate 27.5 full-time positions, down from the 69 positions originally slated to be cut. … The paper, which employs 490 members of the San Jose Newspaper Guild, guaranteed it would not lay off more union workers through June. Managers will notify employees of the layoffs by Tuesday morning." The AP adds, "Laid off workers may receive two weeks pay for every year of service, up to 10 weeks of salary, and two months of paid health care. … The reduction in layoffs was welcome news among reporters, photographers and other editorial workers, who wore black Monday to show solidarity with soon-departed colleagues." The AP notes, "MediaNews Group Inc., the nation's fourth-largest newspaper publisher, acquired the Mercury News, the Monterey County Herald and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Co. earlier this year in a complex deal valued at $1 billion. MediaNews also owns the Oakland Tribune and seven other Bay Area newspapers. … The Mercury News was previously owned by Knight Ridder, the nation's second largest newspaper publisher, which put itself up for sale late last year under pressure from shareholders unhappy with a sagging stock price. The slump reflected investors' souring sentiments about traditional media as the Internet siphons away advertising revenue. … Late last month, a federal judge issued a temporary restraining order on the San Francisco Chronicle, whose parent company, Hearst Corp., appeared interested in collaborating with MediaNews on local distribution and national advertising sales. U.S. District Judge Susan Illston said such a deal would possibly violate antitrust laws."

Plaintiffs In Iowa Microsoft Trial Will Not Call Gates, Ballmer. The AP (12/5, Pitt) reports, "The attorney representing plaintiffs in one of the few state-level class-action antitrust lawsuits left against Microsoft announced today that she would not call Chairman Bill Gates and CEO Steve Ballmer as witnesses." The AP continues, "Roxanne Conlin won a judge's ruling prior to the trial that would have forced Gates and Ballmer to travel to Des Moines for direct questioning even though the two executives were expected to testify later in the case when Microsoft presents its defense." The AP adds, "Judge Scott Rosenberg's ruling indicated that Gates and Ballmer would be required to travel to Des Moines from Washington only once. That would have allowed Microsoft attorneys to question the two men directly — in effect presenting part of their defense in the middle of the plaintiffs' case. … Conlin released a statement today that said the decision was reached to avoid any potential confusion by jurors. … 'I am concerned such a disruption of our case may create unnecessary confusion for the jurors,' Conlin said. 'There is absolutely no reason to have such a disruption in light of the defense's promise to call Bill Gates as a witness.'" The AP notes, "The Iowa lawsuit claims Microsoft violated Iowa's competition laws and seeks about $330 million for Iowans who have purchased the software maker's products since 1994."

Bank Of New York To Acquire Mellon Financial For $16.5 Billion. USA Today (12/5, 9B, Krantz) reports, "Bank of New York said Monday it will buy Mellon Financial for $16.5 billion in stock, creating an investor service behemoth and one of the world's largest asset managers." USA continues, "The combined company, to be called Bank of New York Mellon, will rank first worldwide with $16.6 trillion of assets under custody, says globalcustody.net (custody services distribute cash and dividends held in trust on behalf of the trust owners). It will be in the top 10 of the world's largest asset managers, overseeing more than $1.1 trillion of assets, says David George, analyst at A.G. Edwards. … 'This deal does make sense,' says Eric Fitzwater at bank industry research firm SNL Financial." USA adds, "Investors seemed to agree. Shares of Bank of New York gained $4.27 to $39.75, and Mellon gained $2.73 to $42.78. Investors were so pleased because the expectations for the merger are 'reasonable and realistic,' says Gerard Cassidy, analyst at RBC Capital Markets. … The new combined company will put major pressure on smaller firms to combine so they can compete, Cassidy says. … As large as the Bank of New York's buy of Mellon is, it's just the latest in a frenzied year for financial M&A. The deal is the industry's second-largest this year and 12th-largest ever, Thomson Financial says."

The Wall Street Journal (12/5, C1, Riley) reports, "If the $16.5 billion stock deal is approved by regulators and shareholders, that business now would have a new leader: The combined Bank of New York Mellon Corp. would have $16.6 trillion in assets under custody -- overseeing trade processing, internal accounting, fund administration and other such services for hedge funds, retirement plans, mutual funds and government entities. That figure would catapult the company ahead of J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., which oversees about $12.9 trillion under custody." The Journal adds, "Hedge funds and institutional investors, including governments in emerging markets, are making a larger number of often-complicated investments across multiple asset classes in many countries, sometimes simultaneously through several trading strategies. … The complexity of dealing with varied regulations, currency conversions and accounting differences world-wide is forcing many asset managers, which once serviced their own trades, to outsource the work to larger and better-equipped financial institutions with global reach."

The New York Times (12/5, Edmonston) reports, "For Bank of New York, the deal will bolster its position as a leader in the securities servicing and processing business, which provides the backbone of the world's stock and bond markets. Earlier this year, Bank of New York nearly doubled the size of its corporate trust business, which handles record-keeping for debt issues, by agreeing to swap many of its retail branches for J.P. Morgan Chase's corporate trust unit." The Times adds, "While the deal ends a longstanding rivalry for both companies, it will bring together institutions whose heritage is tied to two titans of American business history. Mellon was founded more than a century ago by Judge Thomas Mellon, who handed over the business to his son Andrew; the Bank of New York was founded by Alexander Hamilton in 1784. … When the deal is completed, Bank of New York's shareholders will own 63 percent of the stock in the combined company, with Mellon's shareholders owning the remainder. Under the terms of the deal, Bank of New York's shareholders will receive 0.9434 shares of the combined company for each their current shares. Mellon's shareholders will exchange their stock on a one-for-one basis."

The Washington Post/AP (12/5, D3, Powell) reports, "The companies, in announcing the deal, said it would result in the elimination of about 3,900 jobs, or nearly 10 percent of their combined work force of about 40,000. The reductions would be made through normal attrition 'wherever possible,' the companies said in a statement. … The deal was approved by each company's board of directors but requires approval by regulators and shareholders."

LSI Logic To Purchase Agere. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A3, Clark) reports, "LSI Logic Corp. agreed to buy Agere Systems Inc. for stock valued at about $3.45 billion, placing a big bet on the market for chips used in data storage and networking." The Journal continues, "The purchase agreement announced yesterday is the largest in the 25-year history of LSI. The Silicon Valley company pioneered the market for chips that companies customize for specific chores." The Journal adds, "Abhi Talwalkar, a former Intel Corp. executive who became LSI's chief executive in May 2005, has narrowed the company's broad range of products to focus on chips for managing disk drives and communications between computers and data-storage systems. LSI chips also are used in consumer-electronic products. … Agere, of Allentown, Pa., traces its lineage to Bell Laboratories, the one-time research arm of AT&T Corp. that invented the transistor. Lucent Technologies Inc., which inherited those operations, spun Agere off in 2000. Agere also sells data-storage chips, as well as chips used in networking devices and cellphones."

Founding Family Seeks $4.7 Billion Buyout Of Station Casinos. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A2, Sanders) reports, "A management-led $4.7 billion buyout offer for Station Casinos Inc. represents a way for the company's founding family to tighten its hold on Station at a time when competition is intensifying for Las Vegas residents, its core customers." The Journal continues, "Station received an $82-per-share offer from a group led by Chairman and Chief Executive Frank Fertitta III; his brother, President Lorenzo Fertitta; and Colony Capital LLC. The Fertittas already own about 20% of Station, a Las Vegas-based company that owns and operates 16 so-called locals casinos aimed largely at suburban Las Vegas residents. The offer also calls for the assumption of more than $3.4 billion in Station debt." The Journal adds, "Speculation about a buyout of Station has circulated for weeks, and yesterday the offer sent the shares up more than 22%, ending the day at $84.90 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. That is $2.90 higher than the offer price, suggesting that investors expect a higher offer before a deal is reached. … Any deal for Station will likely be closely scrutinized because of management's involvement. Station says it appointed a special committee of independent directors to review the proposal. … The move comes as Station is facing tough competitive issues. Last month, the company lowered its fourth-quarter and 2007 earnings estimates. Station reported net income of $161.9 million in 2005 on revenue of $1.1 billion. It faces competition from Boyd Gaming Corp. and others angling for gamblers who live in Las Vegas, as opposed to tourists. … It also comes amid a wave of interest in casino-industry buyouts. Gambling giant Harrah's Entertainment Inc. Oct. 2 received an $81-per-share offer from private equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group. That offer was quickly raised to $83.50 per share, according to people close to the situation, valuing the company at $15.5 billion."

Reckson Rejects Icahn Bid As Shareholders Mull Merger With Green Realty. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A9, Forsyth) reports, "Reckson Associates Realty Corp. has rejected a late bid from financier Carl Icahn and will hold a shareholder vote tomorrow seeking approval for its planned merger with SL Green Realty Corp." The Journal continues, "Reckson's board issued a statement late last night saying that Mr. Icahn's cash-and-stock offer 'does not meet the standard set forth in the SL Green merger agreement to permit discussions or negotiations' with American Real Estate Partners LP, which is 90%-owned by Mr. Icahn." The Journal adds, "On Monday, Mr. Icahn faxed a letter to the independent board of Reckson, offering $1 billion in cash and $3.3 billion in a new class of stock in American Real Estate Partners, traded on the New York Stock Exchange. The proposal was considerably altered from his planned all-cash bid of $49 a share because he lost his two partners over the weekend. … The board's rejection of Mr. Icahn's proposal, by a vote of its independent directors last night, came even before Mr. Icahn issued his official bid, which he had said he would provide today to Reckson, a Uniondale, N.Y., real-estate investment trust. … The development is a victory for SL Green, of New York, another REIT, whose efforts to acquire Reckson hit a kink on Nov. 16 when Mr. Icahn and his then-partner, New York real-estate developer Harry Macklowe, jumped in with a surprise proposal."

Gold Kist Accepts Takeover Bid By Pilgrim's Pride. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, C4, Gibson) reports, "Gold Kist Inc.'s agreement to be acquired by Pilgrim's Pride

Corp. for a sweetened $21-a-share bid ended a four-month standoff in a deal that would create the world's largest chicken processor." The Journal continues, "Assuming the proposed transaction is completed, the combined company would leapfrog industry leader Tyson Foods Inc. as the largest processor of chicken. Tyson, which also processes beef and pork, would remain the world's largest meat company, with more than three times the annual sales." The Journal adds, "The $1.1 billion offer was approved by Gold Kist's board Sunday after a weekend of negotiations over price. The accord came three days after the announcement that 67% of Gold Kist shareholders had tendered their stock despite repeated urgings from management that it was preferable to remain independent. … In what Pilgrim's Pride executives called a 'cordial' meeting in Dallas on Saturday and Sunday, Pilgrim's Pride sweetened its initial $20-a-share bid by $1, Gold Kist agreed to a takeover and Pilgrim's Pride was allowed to look at Gold Kist's nonpublic documents for the first time since it launched its unsolicited offer in August."

EU To Probe Car Battery Firm Merger. The AP (12/5) reports, "The European Union launched an antitrust investigation Monday into plans by German car battery maker VB Autobatterie to buy the car battery business of Italy's FIAMM group." The AP continues, "An initial review revealed 'serious competition concerns,' EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said in a statement. … Under EU rules, she has until April 23 to reach a final finding. … 'When the largest producer of automotive starter batteries (in Europe) wants to acquire the third-largest manufacturer in an already highly concentrated market, the Commission must ensure that this would not adversely affect consumers,' Kroes said." The AP adds, "VB and FIAMM make and market batteries for makers of cars, trucks and commercial vehicles as well as car parts and repair services. VB is a joint venture of Johnson Controls Inc. of Milwaukee and the German Robert Bosch GmbH, Europe's leading supplier of car starter batteries. .. .If VB buys FIAMM's battery business, the number of European suppliers would drop from three to two. Kroes said she also would examine any impact of the acquisition on the 'independent aftermarket,' which covers sales of replacement batteries."

US Urges 9th Circuit Panel To Stop Water Seepage To Mexico. The AP (12/5, Kravets) reports, "The Bush administration urged a federal appeals court Monday to allow a section of a major canal separating California and Mexico to be lined with cement to stop millions of gallons of water from seeping south of the border each year." The AP continues, "The 82-mile-long All-American Canal, which gets life from the Colorado River, in part nourishes crops on both sides of the border about 100 miles east of San Diego along the Calexico-Mexicali border - where the lining is proposed. The U.S. government says Mexico already gets 489 billion gallons of Colorado River water legitimately each year under a 1944 treaty and isn't entitled to the seepage, which provides a farming lifeline in Mexico." The AP adds, "A Justice Department attorney, John Smeltzer, told a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that Mexicans have no right to the water, which is also the lifeblood for 500,000 acres of U.S. farmland. … The lining project will provide enough annual water for 135,000 new homes in the San Diego area." The APnotes, "All three judges suggested while hearing oral arguments in the case Monday that people in Mexico might not have legal standing to assert a claim for the water in U.S. courts. … The San Francisco-based appeals court temporarily blocked the $210 million, 23-mile-long lining construction project in August after Mexican business interests and U.S. environmental groups sued."

House To Vote On Senate Version Of Offshore Drilling Bill. The Washington Post (12/5, A4, Mufson, Eilperin, 690K) reports the House "is scheduled to vote today on a Senate plan for offshore oil and gas drilling…that falls far short of an offshore drilling bill the House adopted earlier this year. House Democratic leaders have decided not to take a position on the bill in order to avoid having to choose between different constituencies within the party's own ranks. Environmental groups oppose the drilling measure; the Sierra Club issued a statement saying that 'it's time for Congress to stop appeasing Big Oil' and that 'drilling is a bad deal for Americans.'" However, "many" Democrats "support wider drilling to increase domestic natural gas supplies. And Louisiana Democrats avidly support the Senate bill because it would divert 37.5 percent of federal royalties to Gulf states for coastal restoration projects."

Religious Land Use Law Strains Some Municipalities. The Christian Science Monitor (12/5, Green, 59K) reports in Orlando, Florida, "about a dozen churches are within a few miles of one another, and more are under construction. Neighbors venturing out for bagels and other errands find themselves stuck in traffic, heads bowed not in faith but frustration. Some complain that the traffic persists all week, as religious, youth, sports, and other activities draw crowds after work and school." While communities "traditionally zone against houses of ill-repute, not houses of worship, frustrations have grown since 2000, when then-President Clinton signed the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act." The law "doesn't exempt churches from zoning regulations, per se. But when religious groups say the rules would create 'a substantial burden,' officials must show a compelling reason for the limits. Sometimes, the results leave neighborhoods feeling helpless in the face of ecclesiastical development." For their part, religious leaders "say they are responding to growth in their communities by providing needed services. Growth among houses of worship - particularly megachurches - poses a delicate quandary for local leaders. In smaller communities, too many churches - because of their tax-exempt status - can even strain the economy."

Panel Says Administration Sought To Stymie Nuclear Worker Payouts. Under the headline, "Administration Tried To Cut Payouts To Nuke Workers," USA Today (12/5, Eisler, 2.27M) reports, "The Bush administration repeatedly sought ways to limit payouts to nuclear weapons workers sickened by radiation and toxic material, according to a memo written by congressional investigators and obtained by USA Today. The investigation focuses on a federal program created in 2000 to compensate people with" illnesses "tied to their work at government and contractor-owned" nuclear weapons production facilities. USA Today adds that since 2002, "'there is a continuous stream of (administration) communications … strategizing on minimizing payouts,' according to the Nov. 30 memo by staff for the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Border Security and Claims," for outgoing Chairman John Hostettler, R-Ind."

Tight Uranium Fuel Supplies Could Hamper Plans For New US Nuclear Reactors. Under the headline, "Nuclear Power Revival Could Encounter Hurdles; Tight Uranium Supplies, Scarce Processing Facilities May Hurt Bush Energy Plan," the Wall Street Journal (12/5, A4, Fialka, 2.04M) reports on the Bush administration's planned nuclear "renaissance" that faces "tightening world-wide supplies of uranium and a lack of enrichment facilities to turn the uranium into fuel for power plants." The Journal adds that "the 'Ad Hoc Utility Group,' an industry collective that represents 85% of the utilities involved in producing nuclear power is nervous about securing adequate fuel supplies for nuclear power plants over the next 10 years," and is "lobbying the administration to allow Russia to sell enriched fuel directly to US utilities." But that plan "is opposed by USEC Inc., the Bethesda, Md., company that acts as the US agent for Russian enriched fuel under a 1993 agreement," fearing that "it could interfere with its plans to finance and build a new enrichment plant in the US."

Inhofe To Hold Hearing On Media Coverage Of Global Warming. The Washington Times (12/5, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Sen. James M. Inhofe, chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, "will hold a full committee hearing tomorrow on 'Climate Change and the Media.'" The hearing will "look at how the media has presented scientific evidence regarding predictions of human-caused catastrophic global warming, the senator's office said." Committee Communications Director Marc Morano said, "Senator Inhofe believes that poorly conceived policy decisions will result from the media's nonstop hyping of 'extreme scenarios' and dire climate predictions. This hearing will serve to advance the interests of sound science and encourage rational policy decisions."

Renewable Energy Boom Takes Toll On Forests. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A1, Barta, Spencer, 2.04M) reports, "Investors are pouring billions of dollars into 'renewable' energy sources such as ethanol, biodiesel and solar power that promise to reduce the world's reliance on petroleum. But exploiting these alternatives may produce unintended environmental and economic consequences that offset the expected benefits." In Borneo, "forest fires that have blazed across the island. Many of them were set to clear land to produce palm oil -- a key ingredient in biodiesel, a clean-burning diesel fuel alternative." The "miasma of smoke from Borneo and the island of Sumatra -- an annual phenomenon that blankets large parts of Southeast Asia in smog -- underscores a troubling dark side of the world's alternative-energy boom. Among other problems, the fires in Indonesia spew millions of tons of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases into the atmosphere, experts say." And these "side effects are not an isolated problem. In Indonesia, Malaysia, Canada and elsewhere, forests are being slashed for new energy-yielding crops or other unconventional fuels."

NYTimes Praises Bodman For Agreement On Efficiency Standards. The New York Times (12/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "It seemed to take forever, but the Bush administration has finally agreed to a strict timetable for establishing new energy efficiency standards for nearly two dozen commercial and residential appliances over the next five years. The agreement is good news for the environment." It is "a tribute to the persistence of 15 states, the Natural Resources Defense Council and various consumer groups that sued the Energy Department for failing to comply with longstanding Congressional mandates." The Times writes, "The benefits are obvious, and Samuel Bodman, in his second year as secretary of energy, is to be commended for recognizing them."

Audit Finds $56 Million Shortfall In FBI Computer Database Funding. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/5, Jordan) reports, "The FBI faces a $56.7 million funding gap as it builds a new computer system to replace a problem-riddled database of investigation files, Justice Department auditors said Monday. With careful oversight, the Sentinel program still could be successful, auditors from the department's inspector general's office concluded." The AP notes, "The FBI asked for an estimated $150 million in the fiscal year that began Oct. 1; the White House approved spending $100 million. … Although the FBI expects to have about $50 million left over from earlier work on Sentinel and other bureau projects, auditors warned that pulling money from other programs 'may have an adverse affect on the FBI's mission capabilities,' the auditors said. Responding, the FBI in a statement said the money needed 'has long been identified from existing FBI balances, and will not impact operational programs.'"

The Washington Post (12/5, A27, Eggen, 690K) also notes the audit "said that a current White House budget request includes only $100 million for Sentinel in fiscal 2007, although the FBI says it needs $57 million more to keep it going." The Post adds that the audit "also says the FBI has made 'significant progress' in several key areas, including improving management controls and finding ways to ensure that the software will work as intended. Fine made five specific recommendations to overcome various problems. FBI officials said they agreed with the ideas and had begun implementing them."

The New York Times (12/5, Lichtblau, 1.16M) reports, "Democrats said they planned to press Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the F.B.I., about the computer project when he appears before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Wednesday." Incoming Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy said yesterday, "After watching the F.B.I. waste five years and more than 170 million of taxpayer dollars on the Trilogy program, I remain seriously concerned about the handling of this project. The American people cannot afford another fiasco."

Government Executive (12/4, Pulliam) reported, "The FBI has made 'significant progress' in addressing many initial concerns about the development of the case management system dubbed Sentinel, the Justice Department inspector general's office stated in the audit. For instance, the FBI has made strides in staffing the project's program management office," however, "uncertainty about funding and cost estimates, and deficient contingency planning, must be addressed if the law enforcement agency is to avoid delays and other problems…auditors said." GE also notes that Mueller is scheduled to testify tomorrow and adds, "The IG recommended that the FBI update the project's estimated total cost as actual cost data becomes available, develop contingency plans for identified risks to the project and fill all vacancies in the program management office. In a response to the report, the FBI agreed with all of the IG's recommendations."

FBI Seen As Falling Short In Counter-Terrorism Efforts. NBC Nightly News (12/4, story 4, Williams, 9.87M) asked, "How much progress has the FBI really made since the attacks on 9/11? In an exclusive interview and in never-before released tapes, FBI officials reveal what critics say is a stunning lack of knowledge about terrorism and terrorist threats." NBC (Myers) added, "Bassem Youssef is the FBI's highest-ranking Arab American agent, a terrorism expert and one of only six agents with advanced Arabic skills." Youssef: "I don't believe that the FBI's doing everything it can to combat terrorism." Myers: "Youssef believes the FBI has sidelined him, denying him a significant role in the war on terror. He claims discrimination and is now suing the bureau." NBC aired unflattering excerpts of FBI officials' testimony in 2004 deposition videotapes for the Youssef lawsuit, then showed NBC analyst Michael Sheehan saying, "Not knowing these basic tenets is symptomatic of a lack of deep knowledge about your principle adversary and that is unacceptable." Myers: "An FBI spokesman now concedes that expertise does matter and says today's leaders have it." John Miller: "To have that depth of subject matter expertise and the executive and leadership skills is certainly a plus, and I think over time we've developed that at the top." Myers: "Some agents privately grumble that Youssef has an inflated sense of his own talents. … For now Youssef has a desk job. A far cry from terrorism's front lines."

Under FBI Probe, Mollohan Set To Take Reins Of Spending Subcommittee. Bloomberg (12/5, Faler, Forsythe) reports, "Representative Alan Mollohan, a West Virginia Democrat whose finances are being investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, is in line to take over the House panel that sets the bureau's budget." Bloomberg continues, "Mollohan, 63, is the ranking Democrat on the appropriations subcommittee overseeing the Department of Justice, which includes the FBI. His party has a long-standing practice of awarding appropriations subcommittee chairmanships to senior members, and no other Democrat has announced plans to seek the post when the party assumes control of Congress next month." Bloomberg adds, "The pending appointment poses an ethical dilemma for incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, 66, who helped her party take control of Congress for the first time in 12 years by vowing to clean up a 'culture of corruption' on Capitol Hill. … 'If the Democrats want to be taken seriously as the party of ethics reform, then every time one of their members gets into trouble, they're going to have to take it seriously,' said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. Her organization is urging Mollohan to recuse himself from any decisions affecting the FBI's budget." Bloomberg notes, "Earlier this year, the National Legal and Policy Center, a Falls Church, Virginia-based group that backs smaller government, filed a complaint with the department questioning an increase in Mollohan's net worth. For 2005, Mollohan and his wife reported assets worth $6.8 million to $25.7 million, up from $116,000 to $315,000 in 1999, when he restated financial disclosure forms after the group's complaint. … In May, Mollohan told the Washington Post that the FBI had subpoenaed a Washington-based real-estate company in which he had invested. In April, a nonprofit group set up under Mollohan's leadership, the Vandalia Heritage Foundation, said in a statement that it had been told by the FBI to expect a request for information."

Former Connecticut Town Official Pleads Guilty To Cocaine Charges. The AP (12/5) reports, "A former member of the Bridgeport Democratic Town Committee pleaded guilty Monday to federal cocaine charges, avoiding a trial that could have put pressure on Mayor John Fabrizi to testify. Shawn Fardy, 36, convicted of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute, and distribution of cocaine, admitted buying cocaine from drug dealer Juan Marrero and then distributing some of that to others and keeping some for his own use." The AP notes, "Fardy's attorney, Francis O'Reilly, has said prosecutors were relying on allegations that Fabrizi made against Fardy. Fabrizi met with the FBI at least twice and gave lengthy interviews that are contained in FBI reports, O'Reilly said. Prosecutors have declined to comment on whether Fabrizi would be a government witness, but his name was among 41 people whose names may be mentioned during the trial or who may testify."

Florida Attorney Admits Helping Drug Dealer Conceal Transactions. The Palm Beach Post (12/5) reports criminal defense attorney John Garcia "pleaded guilty Monday to federal charges of helping a drug dealer and former client conceal financial transactions and lying about it to drug enforcement agents. Garcia was arrested in September and charged with three counts of illegal money structuring and one count of making false statements to federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents." Garcia "deposited $9,000 in…drug profits into his personal account, which was used for [a] home. The scenario was repeated in September 2003, the government said."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (12/4, Diaz) reported Garcia "admitted to depositing $18,000 into his personal checking account -- once in 2002 and again in 2003 -- and $28,000 into his law firm's trust account to help [his client] Joel McDermott buy a five-bedroom, $630,000 home in the Olympia community in Wellington. Garcia purchased Bank of America cashier's checks for McDermott, who's serving a 21-year federal prison sentence."

Supreme Court Upholds 55-Year Sentence For Gun Possession During Marijuana Deals. The AP (12/4) reports the Supreme Court on Monday "let stand a mandatory 55-year prison sentence, condemned as excessive by the federal judge who imposed it, for a man convicted of carrying a handgun during three marijuana deals. Record producer Weldon Angelos received the minimum sentence under the law -- a harsher sentence than a child rapist or a terrorist who detonates a bomb aboard an aircraft would receive, according to his attorneys. … Angelos was convicted of 16 counts of violating federal firearms, drug and money laundering laws in 2003. The charges stemmed from his sale of three 8-ounce bags of marijuana to an undercover informant."

Pentagon Said To Resist Appeals To Help Combat Afghanistan's Opium Trade. The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Meyer) reports the Pentagon, "engaged in a difficult fight to defeat a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, has resisted entreaties from U.S. anti-narcotics officials to play an aggressive role in the faltering campaign to curb the country's opium trade. Military units in Afghanistan largely overlook drug bazaars, rebuff some requests to take U.S. drug agents on raids and do little to counter the organized crime syndicates shipping the drug to Europe, Asia and, increasingly, the United States, according to officials and documents." While the Pentagon and DEA "have been at odds, poppy cultivation has exploded, increasing by more than half this year. … The DEA's advocates in Congress argue that the Pentagon could undermine the insurgency by combating the drugs that help finance it. Military officials say they can spare no resources from the task of fighting the Taliban and its allies."

Walters Links Rising Opium Production To Taliban, Limited Funds. Asia News (12/4) reported opium production in Afghanistan "reached record highs this year despite international efforts to strangle it. This was recently revealed by the US government, in confirmation of a report by the UN Office on Drugs and Crime and the World Bank. In 2006, production is estimated to have grown by 61% after a 26% increase in 2005, for a total product of around 5,600 tons. … John Walters, White House drug policy chief, said the main causes for the failure to eradicate production were the resurgence of Taliban forces, which oppose US operations, and limited funds available for anti-narcotic and development programs."

Poorly Trained Police Force Linked To "Explosion" In Opium. The New York Times (12/4, Glanz, Rohde) say a joint report by the Pentagon and the State Department "has found that the American-trained police force in Afghanistan is largely incapable of carrying out routine law enforcement work. … The training experts say the United States made some of the same mistakes in training police forces in Afghanistan that it made in Iraq, including offering far too little field training, tracking equipment poorly and relying on private contractors for the actual training. … In Afghanistan, the failure has contributed to the explosion in opium production, government corruption and the resurgence of the Taliban."

NYTimes Ties Ineffective Police Force To Rise In Opium Production. In an editorial, the New York Times (12/5) writes, "The failure to provide local security — or even a semblance of impartial justice — helps explain why so many Afghans have lost confidence in the pro-Western government of President Hamid Karzai, and why a growing number are again turning to the Taliban for protection. The failure to stand up an effective police force also helps explain why opium cultivation rose by nearly 60 percent this year."

Think Tank Proposes Painkiller Licensing To Thwart Drug Trafficking. For UPI (12/5), Pyotr Goncharov in Moscow writes, "Perhaps, it is worth considering a proposal made by the Senlis Council, an international drug policy think tank based in Europe. It believes that Western countries should officially buy opium poppy from Afghanistan and then license it to produce painkillers. The Afghan state would benefit and establish at least partial control over the poppy fields. More importantly, this would be a severe blow to illegal drug trafficking."

Brother Of Colombia's Drug Czar Arrested On Cocaine Charge. The AP (12/4) reported Colombia's drug czar "said police arrested his brother over the weekend with six grams (0.2 ounces) of cocaine. Carlos Albornoz, head of the National Drug Directorate responsible for Colombia's drug-control policies, said in a news conference Sunday his brother Ivan Albornoz was arrested shortly after buying the drugs Saturday night in southern Bogota. … Albornoz said he was unaware of his brother's drug use and expected him to be treated with the same severity as any other Colombian citizen."

IMMIGRATION:

Wife Of Georgia State Senator Faces Deportation. The AP (12/5, Dell'Orto) reports Georgia state Sen. Curt Thompson "has been a strong advocate of immigration rights, once speaking in Spanish from the steps of the Georgia Capitol against the adoption of some of the nation's strictest immigration controls. Now Thompson's Colombia-born wife is in hiding as federal immigration officials try to deport her." Sascha Herrera, 28, "has been in hiding since Immigration and Customs Enforcement officers arrived at her home Nov. 28 with an order to remove her from the U.S. She was not home at the time." Herrera's attorney, Charles Kuck, "claims she was duped by a man handling her immigration requests and that she never received the immigration notices that triggered her deportation order. While Kuck says neither he nor her husband know where Herrera is, he said that she will turn herself in Tuesday."

Charity Linked To Minuteman Leader Fined For Financial Reporting Problems. The Washington Times (12/5, Seper, 88K) reports, "One of the charitable organizations cited by Minuteman Civil Defense Corps boss Chris Simcox on why financial accountability concerns raised by some corps members were unfounded has been fined for failing to keep its own financial records in order, The Washington Times has learned." The Declaration Foundation, "a tax-exempt charity created by conservative activist Alan Keyes, who has vigorously supported the Minuteman movement, was fined $6,500 in August and prohibited by the Pennsylvania Bureau of Charitable Organizations from soliciting donations until it becomes 'properly registered.'" The August 18 "'agreement and order,' signed by Declaration Foundation Executive Director Mary Parker Lewis, a top Minuteman adviser, acknowledged that the charity made false statements in seeking to solicit donations, failed to properly administer money it had collected, and withheld documents sought as part of an 'investigative subpoena.'" The Declaration Foundation is "at the center of an intricate weave of conservative organizations founded by Mr. Keyes or tied to longtime Keyes associates now working with MCDC. They have served as mentors for Mr. Simcox and provided consulting and financial services for the group's fundraising and media activities."

Congressional Democrats Expected To Struggle With Immigration Issues. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/4, Dobbs) reported, "The Democrats will likely try to push through a Bill granting a pathway to citizenship for millions of illegal aliens regardless of what the American public wants or says." CNN added, "Last year, amnesty provisions passed the Senate and failed in the House. Next year could look a lot like a rerun of this year. The vast majority of Americans are adamantly opposed to anything that resembles amnesty. Several political observers say if Democrats hope to retain the majority in 2008, they may have to reconsider their position on this issue." Also on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/4, Dobbs), New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson said, "What I would like to do is have a comprehensive [immigration] act that addresses…border security, that….makes sense out of a policy that is broken and needs fixing. And this is the way we need do deal with it, by a comprehensive effort."

TAX:

Judge Bars Maryland Man From Running Tax Scheme. The Baltimore Sun/AP (12/5) reports, "A Westminster (MD) man has been barred by a federal judge from running a scheme in which he promised to help members avoid paying federal taxes, the U.S. Department of Justice announced today." The AP continues, "The 'Save-A-Patriot Fellowship' run by John Baptist Kotmair Jr. falsely advised that clients didn't have to pay taxes and could legally withdraw from the Social Security system, U.S. District Judge William Nickerson said in his ruling. Despite legal action by the U.S. Justice Department, Kotmair's organization continued to file frivolous protest letters with the Internal Revenue Service on behalf of more than 800 clients and showed 'no inclination ... to cease their activities,' Nickerson noted." The AP adds, "Nickerson's order, issued last week, permanently bars Kotmair and his organization from representing or assisting anyone in corresponding with the IRS, or preparing court filings relating to income taxes. Kotmair and his organization must also notify all individuals involved in the scheme of the injunction and provide the Justice Department with the names of the customers, their e-mail addresses and telephone and Social Security numbers. … The injunction also must be posted prominently on the organization's Web sites for a year, and fraudulent promotional materials must be removed from the sites."

IRS Lacks Plan To Recover $200 Million In Fraudulent Tax Refunds. USA Today (12/5, McKoy, 2.27M) reports, "At least two months before the IRS mistakenly began paying an estimated $200 million in fraudulent or erroneous 2006 tax season refunds, the agency was warned about potentially "catastrophic" problems in a new computer being developed to avert such a blunder. A USA TODAY examination of the IRS Electronic Fraud Detection System project found the previously unpublicized November 2005 warning, along with other warnings and new details of missteps that culminated in one of the most costly and embarrassing episodes in the tax agency's recent history." USA Today adds, "As the peak of the 2006 tax season approached last spring, the IRS discovered that a planned upgrade of the agency computer that red-flags potentially fraudulent tax refunds had failed. The discovery came after the IRS had shut down the older computer. The failure forced the agency to continue processing 2006 tax season returns -- and issuing refunds -- without its first line of electronic defense against fraud." USA TODAY's review "found that the IRS lacks a comprehensive plan to recover the $200 million, which the agency said represents far less than 1% of all 2006 tax season refunds. That means most fraudulent filers who got federal checks in 2006 will likely never be caught."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bolton Resigns; Khalilzad Seen As Most Likely Replacement. UN Ambassador John Bolton announced his resignation Monday, in a move that is being largely portrayed as a White House defeat in the face of the Democratic opposition. The New York Times (12/5, A1, Cooper, 1.16M) reports that it is "not immediately clear" who would replace Bolton, but reportedly under consideration are Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, Undersecretary of State Burns, former UNCHR ambassador Richard S. Williamson, and Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine. But "how Mr. Bush chooses to fill those jobs could indicate which direction the administration will tilt during its last two years, administration officials and United Nations diplomats said." The Washington Post (12/5, A1, Baker, Kessler, 690K) says the White House's is "focusing on…Khalilzad" and "also has a crop of Republican lawmakers who lost reelection to consider. A number of senior ambassadors from around the world have expressed interest, but administration officials said Bolton's successor will be a political nominee." The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A3, McKinnon, Dreazen, 2.04M) also says that speculation has focused on Ambassador Khalilzad, but also includes Sudan special envoy Andrew Natsios, Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky, and retiring Iowa Rep. Jim Leach.

ABC World News (12/4, story 6, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Democrats, now in control of the Congress, promised to defeat the" Bolton nomination. NBC Nightly News (12/4, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) and the CBS Evening News (12/4, story 4, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) briefly noted Bolton's resignation in similar reports. CBS referred to Bolton as "the UN Ambassador who loved to bash the UN" and "a lightning rod for critics who compared his style to a bull in a China shop."

The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Farley, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports the "pugnacious" Bolton "is known for not giving up." But "after meeting with his mentor Vice President Dick Cheney on Thursday to discuss ways to stay at the UN without a Senate confirmation, he decided it was time to quit." The resignation "signals that the Bush administration is less willing, or less able, to go around Congress to push through an unpopular agenda."

On its front page, the Washington Post (12/5, A1, Baker, Kessler, 690K) says Bush "surrendered to congressional foes yesterday." According to the Post, "administration lawyers in recent weeks had developed options to keep him there after that appointment expires this month. But officials said Bolton and the White House decided against provoking an early confrontation with Democrats as they take over Congress next month." Bolton's resignation is seen as leaving "another hole in Bush's foreign policy team at a time when the U.N. ambassador is heavily involved in diplomacy involving the nuclear activities of Iran and North Korea and the ongoing crisis in Lebanon."

Similarly, the Financial Times (12/5, Daniel, Turner) says the White House "bowed to the political realities imposed by the new Democratic Congress" and notes that White House spokesman Tony Snow "admitted defeat" saying, it was "pretty obvious" Bolton wasn't going to get the votes from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. However, the Times says the White House was "reluctant to present it as a conciliatory move for Democrats," so instead

Bush "blamed 'stubborn obstructionism,' while Snow said the 'appointments process is broken,' and charged that 'for reasons of partisanship a handful of senators prevented him remaining UN ambassador.'" Under the headline "Bolton's Exit May Signal A Shift to the Center," the Wall Street Journal (12/5, A3, McKinnon, Dreazen, 2.04M) says Bolton's departure "marked another concession by…Bush to the new political realities facing him, and likely pushes his administration more to the center as he heads into his final two years in office." Bolton's resignation suggests the Bush White House is "being forced into the center," said Danielle Pletka of the American Enterprise Institute. "This confirms an inevitable fact of political life, which is that administrations do drift" as they move into the home stretch, she added.

On its website, Time (12/5, Zagorin, 4.03M) says Bolton's departure "marks another acknowledgement by the White House of the political consequences of the Nov. 7 Congressional elections." Bush "could have put Bolton's name up for a new recess appointment when his current one expires in early January, but Bolton would have been prohibited by law from drawing a salary. More important, such an attempt by the White House to again override the Senate by sending Bolton back to the U.N. risked infuriating Democrats and undermining Bush's professed intention to seek consensus and political compromise."

The Washington Times (12/5, Dinan, 88K) says Bush is "giving in to the objections of Senate Democrats and one Republican a month after the White House pledged to push to confirm him." Bolton's departure "will leave Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice with three major vacancies to fill. Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, the department's second-in-command, left for Wall Street in July, and Philip Zelikow, the department counselor and a top confidant of the secretary, announced last month he plans to return to his teaching job at the University of Virginia in January."

The New York Times (12/5, Cooper, 1.16M) notes Bush issued a "strongly worded statement excoriating" Bolton's opponents on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, saying "they chose to obstruct his confirmation, even though he enjoys majority support in the Senate, and even though their tactics will disrupt our diplomatic work at a sensitive and important time." However, the Times says that "despite the president's strong words, administration officials had largely given up" on Bolton's confirmation last month. His resignation "brings to an end the stormy and controversial tenure of an ambassador whose confrontational style often conflicted with the understated ways of the United Nations," the Times writes. In a second report, the New York Times (12/5, Hoge, 1.16M) says the announcement was "greeted by United Nations officials with relief, while diplomats from other nations offered mixed assessments of his effectiveness during his 17 months as the American envoy."

In an interview with Fox News' Special Report (12/4, Hume), Bush said Bolton "chose to leave gracefully…because it became apparent that once again, the Senate would block his nomination. I am very disappointed. Look, John Bolton came into office…with a lot of unfair criticism and he proved the critics wrong. He did a fine job. … On issue after issue, Bolton delivered. You are looking at a man who is deeply disappointed in what I would call shallow politics of the Senate. I truly believe the Senate denied a really accomplished person the opportunity to serve."

The AP (12/5, Ben Feller) says the "setback for the White House seemed to put a hold on the post-election talk of bipartisanship" as Bush delivered "stinging" words to congressional members who "helped scuttle his nomination." Democrats, however, said Bolton's resignation signaled a fresh start. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said, "Hopefully this change marks a shift from the failed go-it-alone strategies that have left America less safe." Similarly, Sen. John Kerry said, "With the Middle East on the verge of chaos and the nuclear threats from Iran and North Korea increasing, we need a United Nations ambassador who has the full support of Congress and can help rally the international community to tackle the serious threats we face."

The Pawtucket Times (12/5, Baron) reports, "Chafee's opposition to Bolton as a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee 'was what made it not happen,' said Chafee spokesman Steven Hourahan. 'Without his vote in committee, it wasn't going to go.'" Hourahan "said Chafee was 'very comfortable' with his decision to effectively remove Bolton as ambassador. He said it was 'clear that the American people sent a message,' in the November election that they were unhappy with Bolton's confrontational style and the Bush administration's foreign policy." In a written statement issued Monday, Chafee said, "I have long believed that the go-it-alone philosophy that has driven this administration's approach to international relations has damaged our leadership position in the world. Mr. Bolton did not demonstrate the kind of collaborative approach that I believe will be called for if we are to restore the United States' position as the strongest country in a peaceful world."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/5, Grier, 59K) reports, "Critics claimed that Bolton's brusqueness made him counterproductive. At the UN, he alienated US allies, both real and potential, according to his critics. Many Senate Democrats -- and a few Republicans -- charged that his hard-line ideology and penchant for confrontation was at odds with the UN's multilateral nature." But Bolton's "defenders insist that he has done well at the UN headquarters in New York, pushing through tough Security Council resolutions on North Korea's nuclear activities, building consensus among allies on the need for Iran to suspend its enrichment of uranium, and pressing for peace in Darfur."

More Commentary. The New York Times (12/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "Bolton's decision to resign as America's envoy to the United Nations was a wise move. He averted a distracting and divisive fight at a time when both Congress and the Bush administration have better things to do. He has also provided President Bush with an opportunity to show the kind of bipartisan leadership he talks about so frequently and exercises so seldom. ... Mr. Bolton's withdrawal gives the president a chance to improve his relationship with both the U.N. and Congress."

The Wall Street Journal (12/5, 2.04M) editorializes, "Yesterday's announcement that Mr. Bolton will resign as US Ambassador to the United Nations when his recess appointment ends with this Congress was no doubt cheered in Tehran, Damascus, Caracas, Pyongyang, and Christopher Dodd's Senate office. ... More important, he has stood forcefully for American interests despite the leaks and sniping from the office of Secretary General Kofi Annan. ... And it does not speak well for the American political system that it can't find a place in government at this dangerous moment in history for one of the world's leading anti-proliferation experts. The decision by newly ascendant Democrats -- Mr. Dodd in particular -- to deny Mr. Bolton a confirmation vote on the Senate floor shows that they value partisan animosity above having a seasoned negotiator at the UN."

Gates Expected To Win Confirmation Easily. Time (12/5, Waller, 4.03M) reports on its website DOD nominee Robert Gates "is expected to have little trouble winning Senate approval. Even Democrats who have had issues with Gates in the past are anxious to begin course corrections in the Pentagon's troubled Iraq war strategy. And means the hearings will most likely be a far cry from the last ones Gates faced — when George Herbert Walker Bush picked Gates to be CIA director in 1991." Time notes Senate Democrats "appear willing to let bygones be bygones. One of the senators who voted against Gates in 1991 was Carl Levin, who takes over as Armed Services Committee chairman next year. 'Fifteen years have passed since that vote,' Levin says. 'I'm going to want to consider what his record has been since then — his thinking and writing since then. And I'm going to give it a fair and fresh look.'"

LATimes Urges Senators To Press Gates On Intelligence Matters. The Los Angeles Times (12/5, 850K), in an editorial, writes Gates "is a shoo-in. But senators should nevertheless use his confirmation hearings, slated to begin today, to put Gates on notice that he will have to reestablish the trust of Congress and the American people about whether to believe what the military — and other agencies — say about intelligence matters. Allegations that Gates has in the past edited intelligence to suit his political superiors are certainly disturbing. … But the point of these hearings is not to rehash Gates' past. It is to establish what he has learned from his mistakes and how he intends to prevent the Pentagon from repeating them."

Pelosi Plans To Fast-Track Miller's Minimum Wage Bill. USA Today/AP (12/5, 6A) reports Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "wants to fast-track efforts to boost the federal minimum wage and could seek to bring a bill directly to the House floor in January. … Pelosi's preference is for a 'stand alone' minimum-wage bill that is not tied to other legislative endeavors. The bill probably will go straight to the floor for consideration, bypassing the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, said Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly, lobbyists and others involved in the process." According to USA Today the bill "is likely to call for a phased-in increase in the current federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour along the lines of a proposal written by Rep. George Miller."

Kennedy Legislation Would Require Companies To Provide Paid Sick Days. The New York Times (12/5, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports that "women's organizations" and "liberal groups" are "gearing up for a fight" over paid sick days. The Times notes Sen. Edward Kennedy "introduced a bill last year to require companies with at least 15 employees to provide seven paid sick days a year, but that bill languished in the Republican-led Congress. Now that Democrats have won control of Congress, Mr. Kennedy, the incoming chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, is more optimistic. 'It has a wildfire of support across the country,' he said. 'When you talk to workers, this is, besides an increase in the minimum wage, the most important issue for these families. This is a families issue. This is a values issue.'"

Liberal Groups To Target 86 Districts In Push For Democratic Agenda. The Hill (12/5, Hearn) reports Change America Now, "a coalition of 40 liberal groups set to push the House Democrats' economic agenda, is targeting 86 districts around the country for press events and possibly television advertising, according to a list obtained by The Hill." The groups "will focus their efforts on 54 Republican and 32 Democratic districts, most represented by moderates, hoping to build support for four parts of the Democrats' '100 Hours' agenda: raising the minimum wage, allowing Medicare to negotiate drug prices with pharmaceutical companies, cutting student-loan interest rates and repealing tax breaks for oil companies."

Democrats Counseled To Pursue Moderate Agenda. New York Times' guest columnist Thomas Edsall (12/5, Edsall) writes, "In this election campaign, the Democratic leadership offered pallid, nonspecific policy initiatives — in the House, a 'bipartisan solution to strengthen Social Security,' and in the Senate, a call to 'work together to strengthen Social Security and Medicare.' Nonetheless, buried in a morass of campaign-season evasion were the outlines of a potentially salable political program. … As the party struggles to forge a working majority, it must strike a delicate balance, argue Jason Bordoff and colleagues at the Brookings Institution's Hamilton Project. Allocating excessive economic risk to individuals can harm economic growth as well as family well-being, they note. Conversely, 'poorly designed programs to protect against risks can distort economic incentives and impair overall economic performance.' For the Democrats to thread this needle will take a steady hand."

Democrats Picking Most Committee Chairs This Week. The Hill (12/5, Hearn) reports House Democratic leaders "hope to have nearly all their committee chairmen named by week's end, a House Democratic leadership aide said yesterday." According to The Hill, "only the Veterans Affairs Committee is disputed."

Democrats Will Restructure Appropriations Committees. The Washington Times (12/5, Waterman, 88K) reports Democrats "will restructure the appropriations panels of both chambers, seeking to restore the alignment between the Senate and House subcommittees and ease a budgeting process that has failed for 12 years in a row to deliver spending bills on time." The Times notes Democrats "maintain that by eliminating two subcommittees on the House side, responsible for funding the legislative branch and the District of Columbia, and moving other elements of jurisdiction around among the remaining 10, Republicans made the complex job of reconciling the House and Senate versions of spending bills that much more complicated, because the two-chamber conferences doing the work had to involve lawmakers from as many as four different subcommittees."

GOP Portrayed As Unwilling To Pursue Its Agenda After Midterm Defeats. The AP (12/5, Abrams), in a highly contentious article, reports, "A Republican-led Congress criticized for producing little but political rancor is likely to end its term this week with at best a grade of 'Incomplete.' The House and Senate return Tuesday having already decided to dump an unfinished budget on next year's Democratic-controlled Congress. Passing grades are problematic for a host of other issues on lawmakers' plates." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "had originally talked of keeping the Senate working right up to Christmas, but motivation to stay in Washington was deflated by the Republican losses of both the House and Senate in the election." The Washington Post (12/5, A27, Murray, 690K), in an another article dismissive of the congressional GOP's accomplishments, reports, "A pile of unfinished business awaits the Republican-led Congress when it returns today, and a pile of unfinished business is likely to remain when lawmakers adjourn for the year, presumably on Friday. Lawmakers have all but given up on completing any of the nine remaining spending bills and will instead leave it to the new Democratic leaders to work out the new government spending levels when they take charge in January." The Post notes that Democrats "have lambasted the GOP Congress for months about its skimpy list of accomplishments this year."

Blunt And Cantor Meet To Diffuse Tensions Over Whip Race. The Hill (12/5, O'Connor) reports House Majority Whip Roy Blunt and Rep. Eric Cantor "met yesterday…to quell simmering tension between the two of them that boiled over during the recent leadership contest." The Hill continues, "The friction came to a head during the recent leadership races even though Cantor was assisting Blunt in turning back a challenge from Rep. John Shadegg. … During that campaign, some Republican members and staff frequently suggested that Cantor was the more popular candidate to perform the whip duties even though Blunt eventually beat Shadegg by a wide margin. A steady stream of stories and member comments fed that perception during the week and a half between the midterm election and the leadership race, creating tension between the two offices that was further fueled by inconsistent communication between the two staffs, the sources said. That tension erupted during a phone call between the Blunt and Cantor before the race itself when Blunt expressed concern that Cantor's staff had not gone far enough to discredit a story that members wanted to 'draft' the affable Virginian despite his commitment to build support for Blunt, aides said."

New Ethics Committee Must Decide Whether To Reauthorize Existing Probes. The Washington Times (12/5, Bellantoni, 88K) reports the House ethics panel "is unlikely to complete several of its investigations during the final month of the 109th Congress, so questions about the conduct of a handful of members will remain unresolved. … A new committee at the convening of the 110th Congress could vote to reauthorize or carry over the investigations, but panel members are not required to do so." The Times goes on to report that the committee has "at least" four active investigations, including those of Rep. William Jefferson and former Rep. Bob Ney.

Pelosi Criticized For Passing Over Hastings. USA Today's DeWayne Wickham (12/5, 15A) writes, "What Democrats did to Alcee Hastings is a case of political ethics being taken to an illogical extreme. The decision by Rep. Nancy Pelosi…not to make the Florida congressman chairman of the Intelligence Committee was a concession to political expediency, not good judgment."

Rangel, Tancredo Draw Criticism Over Regional Insults. USA Today (12/5, Copeland, 2.27M) reports, "The regional insult, a staple of trash-talking sports fans but rarely used these days by national politicians, is making a comeback." Rep. Charles Rangel "angered Mississippians when he asked last month, 'Who the hell wants to live in Mississippi?'" Last week, Rep. Tom Tancredo "said of Miami: 'You would never know you're in the United States of America. You would certainly say you're in a Third World country.'"

Medicare Drug Plan Changes Seen As Potentially Ensnaring Low-Income Seniors. The New York Times (12/5, Pear, 1.16M) reports that "advocates for older Americans" are "worried that tens of thousands of low-income Medicare beneficiaries will again have trouble getting medications next month, as they did in January of this year." The Times notes, "Many prescription drug plans are changing benefits. Beneficiaries are changing from one plan to another. New plans are entering the market. Some beneficiaries will find they can no longer use the drugstores they have been using. … About 600,000 poor people are losing the guarantee of extra assistance that covered nearly all their drug costs this year." Pharmacists "say they also foresee problems for another group: 300,000 low-income people who will be reassigned to plans chosen at random by the federal government. Even people who stay in the same plan may face surprises because some of their drugs may no longer be covered." Medicare officials "said they were trying hard to avoid a repetition of the problems that overwhelmed pharmacists 11 months ago. … 'Lessons have been learned,' said Kathleen M. Harrington, a spokeswoman for the Medicare agency."

Federal Officials Offer Estimating Tool To Counter "Doughnut Hole" Concerns. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, D3, Zhang, 2.04M) reports the federal government "is offering seniors a hand figuring out the infamous 'doughnut hole' -- the coverage gap in Medicare's prescription-drug benefit that many beneficiaries will encounter during the year. A new tool on Medicare's Web site, called a cost estimator, offers monthly and annual spending estimates based on the drugs seniors take and the pharmacy they use. Because it includes both the costs to seniors and to their plans -- the two factors that determine when the doughnut hole kicks in -- seniors can get at least a rough idea of when during the year they will reach the gap under each plan in their area."

Legislation Filed To Restructure Red Cross. The New York Times (12/5, Strom, 1.16M) reports, "Senator

Charles E. Grassley filed legislation yesterday to overhaul the American Red Cross," marking "the first time in almost 60 years that Congress has moved to amend the organization's charter. The legislation, which has the organization's strong support, would cut the size of the Red Cross's national board by more than half, change the way board members are nominated and mandate the appointment of an independent ombudsman charged with reporting annually to Congress, among other steps." An expert panel commissioned by the Red Cross following "widespread criticism of its performance after Hurricane Katrina" filed a report suggesting "many changes that require legislative action because the Red Cross is governed by a Congressional charter."

NASA Announces Plans For Moon Base. The announcement of NASA's plans for moon exploration was covered in all major newspapers, and given front-page status in the New York Times and the Washington Post. All major stories emphasize that officials "declined" to discuss the price of the project. The New York Times (12/5, A1 Leary, 1.16M) reports in a front-page article, "NASA announced plans on Monday for a permanent base on the Moon, to be started soon after astronauts return there around 2020. The agency's deputy administrator, Shana Dale, said the United States would develop rockets and spacecraft to get people to the Moon and establish a rudimentary base. There, other countries and commercial enterprises could expand the outpost to develop scientific and other interests, Ms. Dale said." Dale and other officials said the base would be located in one of the moon's poles. "NASA gave no cost estimate for the program and no design details for the base. Ms. Dale said all plans assumed that the agency would continue operating from a fixed budget of about $17 billion a year."

The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Johnson, 850K) reports inside its "A" section, "Earth's first off-world colonists will cruise the surface in a lunar lander that will function like a low-gravity pickup, possibly journeying to the dark side to build the most ambitious collection of observatories ever constructed, NASA said." The report adds that NASA has "embarked on a $100-billion-plus program to design a new launch system and crew vehicle capable of carrying four astronauts to the lunar surface. To free up money, NASA will mothball the space shuttles by 2010. Until now, it was unclear what NASA had in mind for the moon."

The Washington Post (12/5, A01, Kaufman, 690K) reports in its front-page article, "NASA officials declined to put a price tag on what will clearly be an extremely expensive venture. But they said that with help from international partners and perhaps space businesses, the agency would have sufficient funds to undertake the plan without any dramatic infusion of new money. If the project goes ahead as planned, it would return humans to the moon for the first time since 1972. NASA Deputy Administrator Shana Dale said the agency met with hundreds of scientists, potential international partners and space businesses over the past year to discuss lunar options."

USA Today (12/5, 4A, Watson, 2.27M) reports, "Deputy NASA Administrator Shana Dale said the costs of building a moon colony would not require an increase in the NASA budget, currently $17 billion per year. Part of the money would come from the retirement of the space shuttle, planned for mid-2010, Dale said." NASA has said that the development of spacecraft for the first moon trip will cost $100 billion, but "skeptics, such as the Congressional Budget Office and the Government Accountability Office, have warned that NASA is unlikely to be able to mount such an ambitious effort with so little money. Already Griffin has cut NASA's funding of space science and aeronautics research to help pay for the moon program and the high costs of the space shuttle and the International Space Station."

Thomas Returns To Work After Leukemia Treatments. The Washington Times (12/5, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Sen. Craig Thomas "returned to work yesterday, about a month earlier than originally planned, after undergoing treatment for leukemia." Thomas, 73, "was released Saturday from Bethesda National Naval Medical Center. He began treatment for leukemia on Nov. 9. He had said previously he didn't expect to return to the Senate until January."

Laura Bush's Changes Of Outfits Before Kennedy Center Event Noted. The Washington Post (12/5, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports, "Can we just start the evening over? Come back out, do it all over again but this time, you know, differently? So it went at the Kennedy Center Honors on Sunday, not just for Jessica Simpson -- who broke down onstage over some imperceptible flaw in her tribute to Dolly Parton -- but also for Laura Bush, who mysteriously changed dresses right before the gala." It "turns out that earlier in the evening, the first lady walked into the super-exclusive White House reception for the honorees, wearing the exact same red Oscar de la Renta embroidered tulle jacket and floor-length trumpet skirt as three other party guests, including local philanthropist Vicki Sant." Press secretary Susan Whitson said, "Evidently Oscar is very popular this season." The Post adds the "first couple laughed about it. 'But she didn't want her guests to feel uncomfortable,' Whitson said, so FLOTUS dashed upstairs and slipped into a black lace gown before heading to the KenCen."

Bush, First Lady Entertain Children From Military Families. The AP (12/5) reports, "In a yearly tradition, President Bush and first lady Laura Bush welcomed their young guests to the East Room for a holiday performance. The kids all came from military families, and the president had a message for them. 'We wanted to welcome you here to the White House to, first of all, thank you for your strength — and so that you would do me a favor,' the president told the children. He asked them to send an e-mail to their parents stationed overseas to say 'how much the commander in chief respects them, admires them and supports them.'" The AP notes that when the president "went on stage to thank the performers after the show, the children headed the other way — following Santa Claus out of the room."

Webb's White House Incident Sparks Commentary. On Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (12/4) host Bill O'Reilly remarked on the recent incident involving Sen.-elect James Webb and President Bush at the White House. According to O'Reilly, "At a post-election White House reception, President Bush spotted senator-elect James Webb of Virginia and according to the Washington Post, the President asked about Webb's son, a marine corporal serving in Iraq. 'How's your boy,' said Mr. Bush. 'I'd like to get them out of Iraq,' answered Mr. Webb. 'That's not what I asked you,' the President replied. … Webb shot back: 'that's between me and my boy.'" O'Reilly noted that he has "invited Webb to talk it over, but he has not accepted," adding, "You made a mistake, Mr. Webb in not being gracious. Webb is not…an angry partisan, he's representing the commonwealth of Virginia and should know better. … Clear-thinking Americans realize that disrespecting people with who you disagree is now out of control. … My respect for Senator-elect Webb has declined. He was wrong and should admit it."

Former NBC anchor Tom Brokaw, was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (12/4) to comment on the Bush-Webb exchange. Brokaw noted Webb's son "was in a patrol recently and some of his friends were killed. I think it's very likely Mr. Webb was emotional at that point. I know he is anxious about his son's welfare and whether he will get home ok. Jim Webb is not a guy who disrespects the president as his commander-in-chief. He called him 'Mr. President' at the time. But in our system, we should have these kinds of exchanges and not just dance around protocol."

The Washington Post's Richard Cohen (12/5, A29) writes, "I am of two minds about what…Webb did. … It might have jarred Bush into appreciating the fact that many of his critics actually feel keenly about the war in Iraq -- that they are not mere political opponents but people who are morally appalled by a war that continues for no apparent reason. Maybe also the incident made him wonder about Webb, who, after all, hardly fits the demagogic antiwar stereotype constructed by Bush, Karl Rove and Fox News."

Government Study Faults VA's Mental Health Funding. USA Today (12/5, Zoroya, 2.27M) reports, "The Department of Veterans Affairs is too slow to spend the money it budgeted to treat the mental health needs of veterans, including those returning from Iraq and Afghanistan, according to a Congressional study released Monday." The Government Accountability Office report shows the VA "spent only $200 million" for mental health initiatives -- one hundred million less than it had budgeted in fiscal 2005-2006. USA Today adds, "The study also found that the VA had little or no way of tracking spending for new mental health initiatives during those two years, and that some of the money it spent might not have gone toward mental health programs." The VA "took issue with the findings," with VA spokesman Matt Burns saying, "Unfortunately, the GAO chose to look at the plan as an accounting exercise, focusing primarily on how many dollars are spent."

The AP (12/4, Gamboa) also reports the story, taking a markedly more critical tone in covering the GAO study. The story says Rep. Mike Michaud, ranking Democrat for a Veterans Health subcommittee Michaud, "thinks VA is overwhelmed," and concludes by noting, "Democrats have said they want to increase the department's oversight and get detailed budget accounting from the VA."

Islamic Group Wants Columnist Off Holocaust Council. The Washington Post/AP (12/4, C8, Frommer) reported the Council on American-Islamic Relations has called for the removal of columnist Dennis Prager from the US Holocaust Memorial Council for comments he made criticizing MN5 Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's (D) "decision to use the Quran during his ceremonial swearing-in next month." The council said Monday that Prager "displayed an intolerance toward Islam that makes him inappropriate to serve on the council, which oversees the US Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington." Prager said Monday that he and "the vast majority of Americans" would be satisfied if Ellison were to bring "a Bible with him along with his Quran."

USPS, Letter Carriers' Union To Take Differences To Arbitration. The Washington Post's (12/5, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The US Postal Service and one of its largest unions, the National Association of Letter Carriers, have broken off contract talks and will take their differences to arbitration." The Union's president William H. Young, "said outsourcing was the main issue preventing an agreement," and in an "e-mail to union members," said the USPS "'has signaled its intention' to use contractors for 'existing city carrier work,' such as delivering mail to homes and businesses in the nation's metropolitan areas." The Post notes that "contract talks continue" with three other postal worker unions including "the American Postal Workers Union, the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association and the National Postal Mail Handlers Union." The Post notes that the "arbitration process typically takes six months or longer, and the rulings usually give unions some or much of what they sought at the negotiating table, according to Bush administration officials."

Labor Department Set To Offer Another Round Of Early Retirements. The Washington Post's (12/5, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "It's time for another round of early outs at the Labor Department. Labor, which has offered early retirement to employees eight times in the past 10 years, will offer the option next year, from Jan. 1 to Sept. 30." The Post notes that "employees are eligible for early outs if they have 25 years of service or have 20 years of service and are at least 50. Early outs can lead to reduced pensions for some employees, usually people under 55 covered by the Civil Service Retirement System."

WPost Urges Congress To Pass Trade Measures. The Washington Post (12/5, A28, 690K) editorializes, "It shouldn't matter whether you're conservative or liberal, for globalization or against: Some trade bills are so obviously beneficial and unobjectionable that there's no excuse for letting them languish. This is the case with a raft of measures that would extend trade preferences for poor countries -- preferences due to expire at the end of the year. Failing to renew them would not save American jobs or advance any other national interest; rather, it would disrupt the economies of US trading partners and create another excuse for foreigners to resent the United States. The lame-duck session of Congress provides a chance to avoid that outcome, but there's no guarantee members will act." The Post adds, "Four trade-preference measures are in jeopardy. The measures would prolong tariff concessions to Andean nations, allow African garments made with third-country fabrics into the US market, extend a similar concession to Haiti and renew the Generalized System of Preferences, which helps more than 100 countries. Passing these measures would not involve granting new market access; it would avoid closing the US market and triggering factory closures in partner countries." Meanwhile, Congress also "needs to ratify Vietnam's membership in the World Trade Organization."

Chicago Fed President Expects Continued Growth. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, Wisnefski, 2.04M) reports, "The president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago said Monday that the latest economic data, including numbers last week showing a contraction in the manufacturing sector, haven't changed his view of the economy." In an interview webcast on CNBC.com, Michael Moskow said, "Overall, I think the economy is solid. Moskow "pointed to productivity growth, low unemployment and strong demand from countries outside the US as factors that buoy the domestic economy." Moskow also "said that the Chicago Fed is expecting gross domestic product growth to be 'somewhat below trend,' citing a forecast for 2007 of a 2.8% expansion."

Stocks Surge Higher. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, C1, Browning, 2.04M) reports, "All it took was a couple of takeover announcements and a dip in oil futures, and stocks wiped out all of last week's losses. Although they already have pushed indexes to double-digit gains since July 14, investors still appear prepared to buy. After falling 86.04 points last week on disappointing economic news, the Dow Jones Industrial Average yesterday rebounded 89.72 points, or 0.74%, to finish at 12283.85. It is up 14.6% in 2006, less than 60 points from the record 12342.56 hit last month."

USA Today (12/5, 11B, 2.27M) says "the broad US stock market closed at a fresh 2006 high Monday as investors put aside Pfizer's decision to halt development of a key drug and focused instead on another series of takeover deals." The Standard & Poor's 500 index "rose 12.41 points, or 0.9%, at 1409.12, hitting a fresh six-year high. The Russell 2000, an index of small-company stocks, notched a record high, gaining 14.68 points, or 1.9%, to 795.85." The Nasdaq composite "added 35.18 points, or 1.5%, to 2448.39." The Washington Post/AP (12/5, D5) also reports the stock numbers.

Shortage Of Skilled Workers Threatens US Manufacturing Sector. USA Today (12/5, 1B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports "manufacturers, regardless of size, specialty or location, across the USA are reporting a dire shortage of skilled workers: people such as welders, electricians or machinists with a craft that goes beyond pushing buttons or stacking boxes but does not require a degree. That shortage is threatening their ability to meet current demand, let alone expand their businesses. The gap could threaten the viability of the U.S. manufacturing sector at a time when it is facing heavy competition from abroad." USA Today adds, "In a survey of 800 manufacturers conducted by the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM) last year, more than 80% said they were experiencing a shortage of skilled workers. In October, manufacturers surveyed by the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia said "finding qualified workers" was their biggest business problem." The shortage of skilled workers "is the result of a number of factors. One of the biggest is that manufacturing in the USA is becoming more high-tech and skill-based as the more repetitive, less-skilled work is moving abroad. … Plus, baby boomers with years of experience are retiring. And younger people are bypassing factory jobs, viewing them as repetitive, dirty and without much opportunity, a view that hasn't been helped by all the factory closings and headlines about manufacturing jobs moving to China."

USA Today (12/5, 3B, Carty, 2.27M) also runs a story on Wyoming, which "is seeing a boom in the energy, coal mining, high-tech data storage, communications and health care industries. The need for all kinds of workers, especially skilled ones, is so great that the state is actively recruiting from Michigan, were the situation is almost the exact opposite. For the past two years, as General Motors, then Ford Motor and now Chrysler Group have sounded the siren on their worsening financial situations, workers have lived under the daily stress of knowing their jobs could be eliminated at any moment. More than 70,000 hourly autoworkers have agreed to take buyout packages this year. … So, Wyoming officials thought, why not bring some of Michigan's displaced workers 1,000 miles west? … About 100 people have made the move so far, and 6,000 more Michiganians have posted résumés on Wyoming's jobs website."

More Americans Falling Behind On Mortgage Payments. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A1, Simon, Hagerty, 2.04M) reports, "Americans who have stretched themselves financially to buy a home or refinance a mortgage have been falling behind on their loan payments at an unexpectedly rapid pace. The surge in mortgage delinquencies in the past few months is squeezing lenders and unsettling investors world-wide in the $10 trillion U.S. mortgage market." The Journal adds, "The pain is most apparent in subprime mortgages, though there are signs it is spreading to other parts of the mortgage market. … Until the past year or so, delinquency rates were low by historical standards, thanks to low interest rates and rising home prices, which made it easy for borrowers to refinance or sell their homes if they ran into trouble. But as the housing market peaked and loan volume leveled off, some lenders responded by relaxing their lending standards. Now, the downside of that strategy is becoming more apparent. Based on current performance, 2006 is on track to be one of the worst ever for subprime loans, according to UBS AG."

After Democratic Gains In State, Sununu Could Face Tough Race. The Hill (12/5, Blake) reports that after Democrats won New Hampshire's two US House seats and flipped both chambers of its legislature in 2006, in 2008, Sen. John Sununu "could well be headed for a race worthy of what has become the biggest little state in American politics." Nearly a "quarter of the 400 seats in the state House flipped, and exactly one quarter of the 24 seats in the state Senate flipped. Democrats now control each chamber with a nearly 60 percent majority. Coupled with the reelection of Democratic Gov. John Lynch, these shifts give

New Hampshire Democrats control of the state capitol for the first time in more than 130 years and a bright eye toward 2008 and, specifically, Sununu's seat." The "trick for Democrats is finding a candidate worthy of the race, and three potential challengers with valuable statewide experience appear unlikely to run." Perhaps the "strongest candidate, Lynch, was returned to office with a record 74 percent of the vote last month and doesn't plan to leave." Former state Sen. Burt Cohen (D), "who dropped a bid against Sen. Judd Gregg (R) in 2004 amid flawed financial filings, was recently charged with disobeying a police officer and resisting arrest during an incident stemming from a traffic stop." And former Gov. Jeanne Shaheen (D), who "lost to Sununu by four points in 2002, is unlikely to run again, according to a New Hampshire Democratic Party source who 'would be surprised' if Shaheen left her post as head of Harvard University's Institute of Politics."

Brownback Forms Presidential Exploratory Committee. The AP (12/5, Hananel) reports that after "taking the first step in a presidential bid on Monday, Sen. Sam Brownback said he would start a 10-state tour with a traditional stop in Iowa. Then he's going to jail." Brownback "plans to spend Friday night at Louisiana's notorious state penitentiary in Angola to highlight the problem of recidivism and programs that can help prisoners become law-abiding members of the community." Though an "unusual route, possibly a first for a potential presidential candidate," the "prison stay captures the complexity of Brownback's views and his desire to broaden his appeal beyond religious conservatives who form his natural base." Brownback, who established an exploratory committee, "says his deep faith in God guides his well-known opposition to abortion, gay marriage and embryonic stem-cell research. He pledged to make 'issues of life,' fiscal restraint and tax reform key components of his effort to woo supporters." But his "faith also leads him to tackle social injustice around the world."

CQ Politics (12/5, Kady) reports Brownback is "joining an increasingly crowded field of 2008 presidential candidates, hoping his social conservative credentials will appeal to Republican primary voters." Though he "would be considered a dark horse right out of the gate, standing in the shadows of Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani," Brownback says "there is room in the Republican race for a committed social conservative who has been more outspoken on gay marriage, judicial activism and abortion. In courting the right wing, Brownback will be competing immediately with outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, another favorite of conservatives."

The Kansas City Star (12/5, Stearns, 271K) reports Brownback's "first campaign stop will be Tuesday in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to be followed by visits to ten states over the next month. Brownback has spent the past two years road-testing a theme he describes as 'renewing the culture.' It's a unique amalgam of old-fashioned Republican social and fiscal conservatism combined with a progressive, internationalist message of reconciliation between rich and poor, deeply informed by religious faith." Brownback called for "a flat tax, for term limits for judges and members of Congress, and for 'compassionate yet practical programs to help the poor here and around the world,' in his prepared statement Monday." A "20-member exploratory advisory group includes Tom Monaghan, founder of Domino's Pizza; Bowie Kuhn, former Major League Baseball commissioner; retired Gen. Charles Krulak, former U.S. Marine Corps commandant; and Steve McEveety, a Hollywood producer closely affiliated with Mel Gibson (his credits include The Passion of the Christ). Also officially on board: Chuck Hurley, a friend of Brownback from law school who is a leader among social conservatives in Iowa, site of the crucial first-in-the-nation presidential caucuses in 13 months." Brownback's Senate chief of staff, Rob Wasinger, "will leave to run the exploratory committee."

The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Neuman, 850K) reports political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said, "Obviously there's a vacancy on the right, and (Brownback) may well fit the niche. He's a long shot -- but you don't have any shot if you don't throw your hat in the ring." The Times adds, "A supporter of free trade and a flat tax, he has voted to authorize trade relations with China and phase out estate and gift taxes. He voted for -- and, aides say, still supports -- the Iraq war."

The Hill (12/5, Bolton) reports Brownback "immediately sought to position himself as the leading social conservative of the 2008 field." Brownback, "along with outgoing Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), has in recent years been the Senate's most vocal advocate of social conservatives' agenda on abortion and related issues. Brownback's appeal to social conservatives could help him become the leading alternative to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the perceived frontrunner." McCain, Giuliani and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, "who is expected to set up an exploratory committee soon, are considered by Republican insiders and political analysts as the top tier. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, an ordained Baptist minister popular with social conservatives, is also among the upper echelon of GOP candidates." Social conservatives are "wary of McCain for his stance on campaign finance, of Romney for his views on abortion, and of Giuliani because of his beliefs on both abortion and homosexual rights. Many are gravitating toward Huckabee because of his experience as a minister, but Huckabee has alienated small-government fiscal conservatives because he raised taxes as governor."

The Washington Post (12/5, A6, Cillizza, 690K) reports that in "declaring his intentions so early, Brownback is hoping to stake out a position as the most viable conservative in the field. Neither McCain nor Romney is the first choice of social conservatives, and analysts said there is room for a candidate who fills that niche." David Kensinger, "a former Brownback chief of staff and a member of the senator's political inner circle," said "that Brownback's political positioning makes him the ideal candidate for the Iowa caucuses, which tend to be dominated by social conservatives."

USA Today (12/5, 4A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Brownback "released a list of supporters that includes several active in the fight against abortion. But McCain outmaneuvered him in Iowa last week by snagging Marlys Popma, a prominent GOP activist who used to head Iowa Right to Life. Dearin called her decision 'a signal to a lot of Christian evangelicals that John McCain is OK.'"

Obama Meets With Soros, Democratic Fundraisers In NY. The New York Times (12/5, Healy, 1.16M) reports Democratic Sen. Barack Obama "treaded onto Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's home turf last night to meet with prominent Democratic donors and feel out those who might prefer the sound of President Obama to President Clinton (as in Hillary, not Bill)." Obama "met with George Soros, the liberal billionaire philanthropist, then some other donors last night at Mr. Soros's offices. Afterward he spoke at a charity event that was to be followed by a news conference." One donor who met with Mr. Obama "said that he and several others had supported Mrs. Clinton's Senate campaigns but were not committed to her as a presidential candidate." The "prominent businessman" said, "I like Hillary a lot, but I'm also impressed with Obama — his message, the way he connects to people. It's a little too early for Democrats to be certain that Hillary is the strongest bet for 2008. There are a lot of good people interested in running."

Dionne Praises Obama, Warren For Reaching Across Party Lines. In his Washington Post column (12/5, A29), E.J. Dionne says, "When Rick Warren, one of the nation's most popular evangelical pastors, faced down right-wing pressure and invited Sen. Barack Obama to speak at a gathering at his Saddleback Valley Community Church about the AIDS crisis, he sent a signal: A significant group of theologically conservative Christians no longer wants to be treated as a cog in the Republican political machine. For his part, Obama, the former community organizer from Chicago, showed why he is this moment's hottest commodity in 2008 presidential politics, even though he has not entered the race yet." Warren "speaks for a new generation of evangelicals who think that harnessing religious faith too closely to electoral politics is bad for religion, and who are broadening the evangelical public agenda to include a concern for global poverty and the scourge of AIDS." That Obama "received a standing ovation suggests that Warren is right to sense that growing numbers of Christians are tired of narrowly partisan politics and share his interest in 'the whole bird.' In their different spheres, Warren and Obama are both in the business of retailing hope."

Clinton Begins Outreach To Iowa, New Hampshire Democrats. The Des Moines Register (12/4, Beaumont, 160K) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton "began making calls today to Iowa Democrats about the state's political landscape with an eye toward its 2008 presidential nominating caucuses, aides to Clinton said." Clinton communication director Lorraine Voles said, "She's begun the process of making some calls into Iowa." Clinton has "had conversations with supporters in New York and the state's congressional delegation to discuss the possibility of running. 'As a continuation of this process, she is starting to reach out across the country and specifically to some friends in Iowa,' Voles said." The Register adds Clinton "spoke today with Des Moines Democrat Bonnie Campbell, who worked in the Department of Justice during the administration of President Bill Clinton, the senator's husband." Campbell, "a former Iowa attorney general, declined to discuss the details of her brief talk with Sen. Clinton, except that it touched on her running for president and competing for the caucuses, scheduled to launch the 2008 nominating process." Campbell said she "would support Clinton if she ran, as did Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's former chief of staff JoDee Winterhoff, a former Iowan now living in the Washington, D.C.-area."

The Manchester Union-Leader (12/5, Distaso) reports Sen. Clinton has "begun weighing in with New Hampshire Democratic activists about a possible run for President in 2008." During the "past few days," Clinton "has placed initial calls to key Democrats in the first-in-the-nation primary state seeking advice, according to veteran state and national party activist Karen Hicks." Hicks, who "headed Howard Dean's New Hampshire presidential campaign in 2004, said those calls will continue. Hicks also confirmed that if Clinton runs for President, 'I'll be with her,' reportedly as national field director, a position similar to the one she held for the Democratic National Committee during the 2004 general election." The Union Leader adds it has "learned that Clinton had a telephone conversation last week with Gov. John Lynch." Word of Clinton's New Hampshire "overtures comes as state Democrats prepare to welcome their party's newest 'rock star,' Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, to a celebration of their 2006 election day sweep on Sunday afternoon in Manchester. Yesterday, Obama added a Sunday morning visit to Portsmouth to his schedule."

Clinton Hires National Fundraising Director, Campaign Spokesman. The AP (12/5, Fouhy) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "has hired a national fundraising director and a senior campaign spokesman, the latest sign the Democrat is moving quickly toward a likely 2008 presidential bid." Phil Singer, "a veteran of Sen. John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign who most recently was spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, will join the Clinton communications team, her senior adviser Howard Wolfson said." The campaign "has also signed a national finance director, veteran Democratic fundraiser Jonathan Mantz, and is likely to bring aboard a respected national field organizer, Karen Hicks. In 2004, Hicks served as New Hampshire director for Howard Dean's upstart presidential bid." The staff additions "came as Clinton continued her outreach Monday to New York Democrats about a possible presidential run, a process she began early last week. She spoke to several members of the state's congressional delegation and to Andrew Cuomo, the attorney general-elect and son of former New York Gov. Mario Cuomo."

McCain Said To Be Gaining Reputation For Frequent Parties. The New York Times (12/5, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports Sen. John McCain "hardly needs a holiday to give a party. Just last week, Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, presented a lavish feast for Republican governors gathering in Florida." From the "2004 Republican convention in New York City, Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, is still fondly remembered, at least among the A-list crowd, for holding an event for his 68th birthday at La Goulue on Madison Avenue and another soiree at Cipriani on 42nd Street. And in this bustling season of holiday parties, Mr. McCain was among the first to have an event, on Monday evening. The senator and his wife, Cindy, invited several hundred people to the Corcoran Gallery of Art in Washington for a party to be paid for by his primary campaign account. Cameras were not only allowed, but also encouraged."

2008 Presidential Field Quickly Swells. The Christian Science Monitor (12/5, Feldmann, 59K) reports the 2008 presidential race is "morphing so fast that four possible candidates have already dropped out. Then there's the X factor - the unprecedented front-loading of primaries and caucuses that will make it more difficult than ever for a dark horse to come out of nowhere and take the nomination." Democratic strategist James Carville said the election "is going to be 'the mother of them all,'" and he "marvels at the array of 'larger than life people' definitely or possibly mounting campaigns - John McCain, Rudolph Giuliani, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama, Al Gore, and 'to make it interesting,' Newt Gingrich. These are people who 'change the temperature of the room' when they walk in, Mr. Carville says." It may be "a sign of the vulnerabilities of both putative front-runners - Senators McCain (R) and Clinton (D) - that so many other people are talking about running, but in the end, many political oddsmakers are still betting that today's front-runners end up facing off in November 2008. And the size of the field is likely to shrink fast." This is "good news, at least, for most news organizations, which don't have the staff to follow dozens of Oval Office wannabes all over Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Nevada, not to mention Michigan, Florida, and California, which are taking steps to hold early primaries, too." Jack Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont-McKenna College, said, "A big field will become a little field very quickly. I suspect a lot of the people talking of running now or even announcing exploratory committees will flunk the invisible primary." The Monitor adds, "Just how much money a candidate needs to raise in the first quarter of 2007 is open to debate, but a common benchmark is $30 million." Sen. Barack Obama "would probably be able to hit that mark," while Sen. Hillary Clinton "would have little trouble raising several times that; former Vice President Gore also still has his network. Beyond those three, access to big money is dubious; there's a lot out there, but it's not infinite."

USA Today (12/5, 4A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Sen. Sam Brownback "became the fourth major presidential hopeful to set up a fundraising committee for 2008, testimony to the demands of a White House race shaping up as the most expensive in U.S. history." The "pace of campaigns has been accelerating since 2000, when then-Texas governor George W. Bush formed an exploratory committee in March 1999 and started campaigning in June. Democrat Howard Dean officially started his 2004 bid in May 2002. The big change for 2008 is the sheer scale of fundraising necessary to compete with celebrity candidates such as Clinton and McCain, and to prepare for spending unfettered by federal rules and caps." Michael Toner, chairman of the Federal Election Commission, "says he expects that 'for the first time ever,' nominees of both parties in 2008 will opt out of the public financing system for both the primaries and the general. 'The stage is set for the first billion-dollar presidential election,' Toner says, predicting the eventual nominees will raise $500 million apiece." Toner said the "top-tier prospects such as McCain, Giuliani, Romney and Clinton should plan on raising $100 million by the end of 2007."

Democratic Presidential Candidates Said To Face Significant Hurdles. The Washington Times (12/5, Lambro, 88K) reports the 2008 Democratic presidential race "was off and running as soon as last month's midterm elections concluded, with front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton facing more opposition than she may have expected at this point in the two-year campaign cycle." Sen. Clinton "is the leading choice of her party in all the polls. But more than half a dozen other candidates are likely to challenge her expected bid for the nomination, including Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the party's 2004 nominee; Mr. Kerry's running mate, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina; and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, the Democrats' hottest political figure, who has rocketed into contention like a rock star." But the Democrats' "growing pack of presidential hopefuls is fraught with problems." Clinton "remains one of the most polarizing political leaders in the country," while Kerry "hurt himself in the final weeks of the midterm elections when he told a joke that suggested only uneducated soldiers ended up fighting the war in Iraq." Both Edwards and Obama "have thin experience on their resumes. Mr. Edwards of North Carolina served only one term in the Senate, while Mr. Obama, who was elected in 2004 has been in the Senate for just two years, and has little or no legislative accomplishments of which to speak."

Homelessness "Pervasive" In Hawaii. The New York Times (12/5, Magin, 1.16M) reports, "Homelessness in Hawaii has become so pervasive that the governor has assigned a state employee to work full-time at getting people off the beaches and into transitional housing. Once there, they have access to rent assistance programs and low-income housing. While hundreds of homeless people live on Honolulu's beaches, including the tourist center Waikiki, it is the Waianae Coast on the semiarid west shore where the problem is most visible." The population of Waianae, home to about 40,000 of Oahu's 900,000 people, "is predominantly native Hawaiian and is historically low income."

French Envoy Says Agreement Near On Iran Resolution. The AP (12/5, Charlton) reports that the six powers seeking a UN resolution on Iran's nuclear program are "nearing agreement on a text," French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said Monday. Diplomats will continue consolations Tuesday in Paris. "We want to reach as broad an agreement as possible," Douste-Blazy said in Brussels, "therefore we are gathering tomorrow in Paris, to discuss the text." After speaking with Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov, Douste-Blazy said, "We are in agreement with Russia to adopt sanctions against Iran's proliferation program."

AFP (12/5) reports Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said Monday that was "time" for Russia and China to agree with Britain, France, Germany and the United States on the sanctions. "It's been too long we have been debating...we have to pass the sanction resolution," Burns told reporters on the margins of the OSCE conference.

Iran's Internet Crackdown Shows Ease Of Government Censorship. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A6, Rhoads, 2.04M) reports that Iran's "campaign to shutter popular Web sites and curtail text-message traffic reflects the growing ability of governments to control online content inside their national borders." However, the crackdown, which is "part of a broader offensive against what authorities consider immoral Western culture," isn't "airtight, as more-savvy Internet users in the country have access to software and other measures that allow them to get around government restrictions, Internet experts say." However, the Journal notes that "as Internet usage has increased in more countries, so has the ability of governments to restrict the online experience within their countries."

WSJournal Urges US Not To Engage Iran. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A18, 2.04M) editorializes, "The same people who now call for engagement [with Iran] also believed in it long before the invasion of Iraq or the recent revelations about Iran's nuclear advances. They argue that Iran's pressing political and economic problems...mean the Islamic Republic has reasons of its own to come to the table. The same logic also suggests that the real purpose of its nuclear program is to serve as a bargaining chip to obtain bigger concessions from the West rather than as an end in itself." The Journal also notes that President Bush has "spoken repeatedly, in his major speeches and in interviews, about American support for Iranians who aspire to more freedom, which is one reason the US is popular among the Iranian people. What message would it now send those Iranians if the US turned around and embraced the rule of Tehran's mullahs?"

Bush To Meet With Blair On Thursday. ABC World News (12/4, story 4, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The White House said the President's consultations on Iraq will now also include British Prime Minister Tony Blair that meeting held at the White House on Thursday."

Blair Unveils Plan For Nuclear Missiles. USA Today (12/5, 12A, 2.27M) reports Blair unveiled plans Monday for "a new submarine-based nuclear-missile defense system to thwart threats from rogue regimes and state-sponsored terrorists." Blair told the House of Commons that with threats posed by North Korea, Iran and others, "It would be unwise and dangerous for Britain alone of any of the nuclear powers to give up its independent nuclear deterrent." Parliament is expected to vote on the proposal by March.

The AP (12/5, Stringer) adds that Blair "also said a decision on whether Britain will build a new arsenal of warheads to replace current stocks -- expected to last only until the 2020s -- would not be made before 2009." The New York Times (12/5, A8, Cowell, 1.16M) notes that the proposed changes could cost "as much as $40 billion." The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Murphy, 850K) also reports on the announcement.

To Answer Critics, Israel Releases Video From War In Lebanon. In a front page article, the New York Times (12/5, A1, Myre, 1.16M) reports Israel's military, "which has been accused of abuses in its war against Hezbollah this summer, has declassified photographs, video images and prisoner interrogations to buttress its accusation that Hezbollah systematically fired from civilian neighborhoods in southern Lebanon and took cover in those areas to shield itself from attack." In a new report, an Israeli research group says Hezbollah "stored weapons in mosques, battled Israelis from inside empty schools, flew white flags while transporting missiles and launched rockets near United Nations monitoring posts." The Times received an advance copy of the "detailed" report, which was produced by the Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center at the Center for Special Studies, a private research group headed by Reuven Erlich, a retired Israeli colonel in military intelligence. In Lebanon, a Hezbollah official "denied the study's allegations, saying its military units were based outside towns and villages and had come into populated areas only when circumstances required it."

Israel Mulls International PR Campaign. Also on its front page, the Washington Times (12/5, A1, Bawa, 88K) reports, "Israel's international image is hurting, and the country's top officials have turned to the wisdom of Madison Avenue in a bid to 're-brand' their product." Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni met with "public relations executives, branding specialists and diplomats in September in Tel Aviv to brainstorm about improving the country's image." Israeli officials "complain that the international press gives the country a warlike image by focusing on its military might and the string of conflicts with its Arab neighbors," but Livni told the Tel Aviv gathering that she would like to project "a more inviting image of the Jewish state."

More Troops Deployed In Beirut After Death Of Protestor. The Financial Times (12/5, Biedermann) reports Lebanon has deployed more soldiers in Beirut Monday after the killing of a demonstrator "raised fears peaceful anti-government protests could turn to violence." The AP (12/5, Faramarzi) says "troops in armored cars deployed to Sunni Muslim neighborhoods...but that failed to prevent renewed friction." Police said two people were injured late Monday during demonstrations. Separately, "About 300 people also gathered on the highway to Beirut international airport, in an apparent attempt to block the road, but security forces prevented them."

The Washington Post (12/5, A18, Shadid, 690K) reports that "within a day of his death in a street brawl along Beirut's increasingly tense fault lines of sect and politics, Ahmed Mahmoud became the first symbol of the mass demonstrations by Hezbollah and its allies." The Post notes that the "arrival of Mahmoud's body was a dramatic moment in the otherwise carnival-like atmosphere of the demonstrations," which entered their fourth day Monday.

Expansion Of Poisoning Probe Strains UK-Russian Relations. The Washington Post (12/5, A22, Jordan, Finn, 690K) reports that a team of British police investigators arrived in Moscow Monday "to begin questioning people about the poisoning death of Alexander Litvinenko, a former Russian spy who had recently become a British citizen, in a case that is straining relations between the two governments." Home Secretary John Reid, speaking at a European Union meeting in Brussels, said the Scotland Yard officers in Moscow would "follow the evidence wherever it goes." Although Russian officials have "pledged to cooperate in the inquiry, their irritation over the case showed through in official comments." Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov warned Monday against "politicizing this issue" and "speculations on this subject." The Russian Interfax news agency also quoted him as saying, "This is, of course, harming our relations." The Financial Times (12/5, Buckley, Burns, Dombey) also reports Lavrov's comments.

Probe Casts Light On Russian Émigrés In London. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A6, Mollenkamp, Patrick, 2.04M) says he investigation has "cast a spotlight on some of London's wealthiest jet-setters: the thousands of Russian émigrés who have moved here in the past decade." Russians come "to protect their wealth and take advantage of the tax laws, or send their children to British schools," while other "are exiles seeking escape from the regime of President Vladimir Putin." However, the Journal says many "maintain ties back to Russia and its murky business and government connections."

Columnist Says Poisoning A Reminder Of Nuclear Threat. Washington Post (12/5, A29, 690K) columnist Anne Applebaum says Litvinenko's death reminds us "that the old KGB lives on in new guises." Despite their "widely varying fates," she says it has "long been perfectly clear that many of these old comrades continue to work together in mutually profitable ways." However, Applebaum says "that we were surprised, are surprised, is both tragic and ironic: After all, for the better part of a decade now, we've been desperately looking for weapons of mass destruction and for the strange new enemies, the Islamic radicals who might be planning to use them. And now we've discovered that there really is nuclear material for sale and that it really is being used, in the West, to kill people. And that the killers aren't strange, or new, or even Islamic."

Ukraine's Yanukovuch Vows Commitment To Democracy. The AP (12/5, Butler) reports Ukrainian Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych "told an American audience Monday that his country is committed to democracy and on a path toward political and economic reform." On his first trip to the US, Yanukovych "sought to convince US officials and business leaders that he has strong democratic credentials, even though he was previously identified with efforts to rig the 2004 presidential election." Yanukovych's meetings Monday and Tuesday with Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and members of Congress "were designed in part to discuss Ukraine's economy and its possible entry into the World Trade Organization and NATO," but former US ambassador to Ukraine, Steven Pifer, says the "main goal that Yanukovych is coming with is to establish some credibility with the administration."

Chávez Likely To "Tighten Grip" During Third Term. In a news analysis, the New York Times (12/5, A3, Romero, 1.16M) writes, "If President Hugo Chávez rules like an autocrat, as his critics in Washington and here charge, then he does so with the full permission of a substantial majority of the Venezuelan people, Sunday's election" showed. During his third term in office, Chávez "seems intent on assuming the mantle from the fading Fidel Castro of chief Latin American scourge of the United States," and "has spoken of a desire to unite his supporters in one political party and to alter legislation to allow him to remain in power past 2020." Winning support for such measures, the Times says, "may not be difficult in a country where his allies already control the legislature and the Supreme Court as well as governorships in all but two states, and where the military, the national oil company and other government bureaucracies and institutions have been systematically packed with Chávez boosters and stripped of opponents."

US Sees Opportunity For "More Cooperative" Relationship. The AP (12/5) reports the Bush administration "greeted [Chávez's] re-election victory by holding out the possibility of a more cooperative relationship." State Department spokesman Eric Watnik Monday said the US looks "forward to having the opportunity to work with the Venezuelan government on issues of mutual interest." His "brief comment" did not "offer congratulations" to Chávez and said reports of electoral irregularities "should be investigated."

Newspapers Urge Washington To Improve Relations With Chávez. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/5, 850K) says that although "there are plenty of reasons for Venezuelans not to like Hugo Chávez," Washington "should try to improve bilateral ties not just because there is a long-term strategic value to cordial relations with this big oil producer. A goodwill effort to be reasonable toward Caracas will also undermine Chávez 's own credibility when he tries to sell his Yankees-are-devils pitch to the rest of Latin America." Similarly, the Financial Times (12/5) urges policymakers in Washington not to overreact to Hugo Chávez's victory in Sunday's election in Venezuela. The Times points out moderate candidates "keen to work with Washington won elections in five of the six important" Latin American countries. The Times argues it is better "for the US and its hemispheric friends to cease the rhetorical barrages against Mr. Chávez that are such grist to his populist mill." Instead, Washington "should continue a recent more pragmatic approach, engaging Venezuela in areas such as oil, energy policy and border security."

Sudan Issues Final Rejection Of UN Force In Darfur. The AP (12/5, De Montesquiou) reports Sudan's "final rejection of a joint U.N.-African peacekeeping force in Darfur came as little surprise to many involved in failed international efforts to end the region's deadly violence. But many say civilians will be the ones to bear the costs of that opposition -- thousands more will die, they fear, and many more will be forced to flee their homes unless the West can somehow muster strong sanctions against Sudan's government." However, the AP says Sudan's opposition is "deeply rooted," noting that "several Sudanese government hard-liners are believed to be on a list of suspects that the International Criminal Court has said it would prosecute for crimes against humanity."

Subject Of "Hotel Rwanda" Criticized For Portrayal In Film. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A1, Rhoads, 2.04M) reports on its front page that since the movie "Hotel Rwanda" was released two years ago, Paul Rusesabagina "has become a hero in the US," but in his native Rwanda, he is "seen in a different light." Depicted in the film as "saving hundreds of refugees from his country's genocide in 1994," the Rwandan media, former refugees in the hotel and "even the country's president in recent months have denounced Mr. Rusesabagina as an impostor profiting from the genocide. They say the Hollywood movie greatly exaggerated his role and distorted these sensitive events. The head of the country's genocide survivor association has called for criminal charges against him." However, Rusesabagina "believes the attacks on him come from people worried that he will turn his celebrity into a credible opposition and run for president somewhere down the road."

Columnist Says Cuba Will Have Smooth Transition To Raul Castro. Washington Post (12/5, A29, 690K) columnist Eugene Robinson writes that as "fiercely implacable exiles in Miami, perennially outfoxed bureaucrats in Washington and salivating real estate developers around the world" are "trying to predict what will happen in Cuba the day after Fidel Castro dies," Castro "appears to have engineered a seamless transition" to his brother Raul. Robinson says, "If any lingering doubts about the de facto succession needed to be dispelled, Havana's biggest military parade in years on Saturday reminded everyone that Rail has been running the Cuban armed forces since Day One."

Muslims Accused Of Double Standard. In a commentary for the Los Angeles Times (12/5, 850K), Raymond Ibrahim, author of the forthcoming "Al Qaeda Reader" and research librarian, contrasts the "permanent desecration of" Hagia Sophia in Istanbul and the Israeli failure to "deface or convert" the Al Aqsa mosque: "When Muslims conquer non-Muslim territories — such as Constantinople, not to mention all of North Africa, Spain and southwest Asia — those whom they have conquered as well as their descendants are not to expect any apologies, let alone political or territorial concessions. ... But if we live in a world where the strong rule and the weak submit, why is it that whenever Muslim regions are conquered, such as in the case of Palestine, the same Islamists who would never concede one inch of Islam's conquests resort to the United Nations and the court of public opinion, demanding justice, restitutions, rights and so forth?"

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Cites Need For Secrecy In Seeking Dismissal Of ACLU Surveillance Suit. The AP (12/5, Goodman) reports from Detroit, "The Bush administration asked a federal appeals court Monday to toss out a lawsuit challenging a warrantless surveillance program, saying the government can't defend itself without revealing national secrets." The AP continues, "The American Civil Liberties Union sued the National Security Agency in January on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers who say the surveillance has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets. … 'This suit must be dismissed because its very subject matter is a state secret, and litigation would inevitably result in disclosing state secrets,' Justice Department lawyers wrote in a brief filed Monday." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled in August that the program violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers. … The Justice Department appealed to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati, which ruled that the administration could keep the program in place during the appeal."

Defense Releases Photos Of Masked, Chained Padilla. In a story widely-distributed by McClatchy, the Miami Herald (12/5, Weaver, 286K) reports, "Providing a rare glimpse of a locked-up 'enemy combatant,' attorneys for terror suspect Jose Padilla released declassified images of him in chains and a mask to bolster their bid to have his Miami case thrown out because of alleged mistreatment during military detention for more than three years. The still video images show Padilla wearing blacked-out goggles, noise-blocking headphones, and shackles on his hands and feet." The Herald notes, "Carl Tobias, a constitutional scholar at the University of Richmond School of Law in Virginia who has followed Padilla's legal odyssey, said his attorneys' bid is a long shot. But he said the photo of Padilla in chains and a mask, published on the front page of The New York Times on Monday, 'makes an impression on people.' Whether it has the same impression on the judge is another matter. It's hard to know.'"

The AP (12/5, Anderson) reports from Miami, "The images, taken from an unclassified Defense Department video, show Padilla being chained hand and foot and led out of his cell by three guards dressed in camouflage and wearing riot helmets and visors. The video images are the first publicly released of Padilla's 3 1/2-year detention at a Navy brig in Charleston, South Carolina. … They were filed late Friday in federal court in Miami as part of an attempt by Padilla's lawyers to get criminal terrorism support charges against him dismissed, based on what they claim was treatment that amounted to torture while in military custody. … 'The extended torture visited upon Mr. Padilla has left him damaged, both mentally and physically,' Padilla lawyer Orlando do Campo said in one court filing. [The government's treatment of Mr. Padilla has robbed him of his personhood.'" The AP adds, "Existence of the filing containing the video images was first reported Monday by The New York Times. The court papers do not give details about the actual video, but The Times reported that it was made as Padilla was being taken out of his cell for dental work. … A spokeswoman for Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta declined comment Monday."

Egyptians Arrest American, 11 Europeans On Terrorism Allegations. The AP (12/5, el-Magd) reports Egyptian police "have arrested an American, 11 Europeans and several others from Arab countries for allegedly plotting terrorist attacks in Middle Eastern countries including Iraq, the Interior Ministry said Monday. The group was part of an Islamic militant terror cell that had adopted extremist ideas and were living in Egypt under the guise of studying Arabic and Islamic studies, the ministry said in a statement." The AP adds that "the State Department confirmed an American had been arrested in Egypt about a week ago but could not provide any details. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said American officials were 'seeking consular access to this individual' but declined to give more information, citing U.S. privacy laws."

The Washington Post (12/5, A18, Whitlock, 690K) notes, "The Egyptian Interior Ministry said the cell was 'related to some terrorist organizations abroad' but did not name the network or those arrested. … A U.S. law enforcement official said the U.S. citizen 'was not on our radar at all' before his arrest in Egypt and is not named on the government's voluminous terrorism watch list. 'He was not a known figure to the U.S.,' the official said." The Washington Times (12/5, 88K) runs a version of the AP story.

Lawyers Demand Release Of Chinese Muslims In Gitmo. The Washington Post (12/5, White, 690K) reports, "Attorneys for a group of Chinese Muslims held for nearly five years in the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, filed suit yesterday, asking that the men be released immediately and alleging that they have been held as part of a political deal between the United States and China. ... They contend that the men have been labeled wrongfully as terrorist suspects because they oppose the Communist Chinese government." The ethnic Uighurs "have been a diplomatic headache" for the US; "Earlier this year, [five other] Uighurs were released to a U.N. compound in Albania, where they remain virtual prisoners. ... More than a dozen Uighurs are still in Guantanamo. U.S. officials have determined them to be enemy combatants because of their participation in an alleged terrorist training camp in Afghanistan. ... The lawyers challenge the way the Uighurs were determined to be enemy combatants, arguing that their encampment in Afghanistan did not make them a party to hostilities."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

IG Report Shows "Disturbing" Examples Of Crime Coming From Within DHS. The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Gaouette, 850K) reports a semiannual report filed to Congress by the Department of Homeland Security inspector general showed that in addition to "patrolling the nation's borders and guarding against terrorism," the agency "is battling fraud, theft, bribery, smuggling and other crimes by American citizens — with some of the most disturbing examples coming from" its own employees. The report "showed a sharp jump in arrests in the six months ended Sept. 30, with many stemming from schemes by members of the public to bilk the agency of emergency relief funds in the wake of Hurricane Katrina." Meanwhile, an "array of staff transgressions tucked into the report reflects the continued growing pains of an agency that was formed only three years ago, and the pressures created as parts of the department have rapidly expanded, critics say."

US Labs Developing Nuke Safeguards Under "Secret" Presidential Directive. The Los Angeles Times (12/4, Vartabedian, 850K) reports, "In response to a secret order from President Bush, U.S. nuclear weapons laboratories are developing technology to make the weapons virtually impossible to use if they fall into the wrong hands. The security system will be part of a new generation of nuclear weapons approved formally last week by a panel of the Defense and Energy departments. The "3-year-old effort, known as National Security Presidential Directive 28, has evoked strong criticism from many nuclear weapons experts, who doubt that absolute safeguards are necessary or even possible. Instead, they say, the federal government should plug known security weaknesses at bomb labs and nuclear weapons factories."

Registered Traveler Expanding To More Airports. In its "On the Road" column, the New York Times (12/5, Sharkey, 1.16M) reports, "Ready or not -- and some critics say not -- the long-delayed Registered Traveler program is moving forward, with the single existing operator planning a succession of openings soon at four airports, while a competitor says it is about to join in." Steven Brill, the chief executive of Verified Identity Pass Inc., "which began the first Registered Traveler program at Orlando International Airport in July 2005," says the company "is processing applications with the Transportation Security Administration for Kennedy and for San Jose, Calif.; Cincinnati; and Indianapolis." Critics, meanwhile, "have questioned its customer service value and slow pace and have also asked whether it could open a security loophole for potential terrorists who are able to pass a background check."

DHS Report Sets Five-Year Goal For "Effective Control" Of US-Mexico Border. Under the headline "DHS Plan for 'Virtual' Border Fence Still Has Gaps," the Washington Post (12/5, A27, Hsu, 690K) reports that in a report to Congress, the Department of Homeland Security has said that a "virtual" fence along the US-Mexico border "will cost $7.6 billion and be completed by 2011, but the government lacks clear benchmarks for success." The report also confirmed "well-known problems along the Mexican border," indicating "that the United States had 'effective control' over only 284 miles of its 1,993-mile southern frontier as of March, up from 241 miles in October 2005. The department set a goal of controlling 345 miles next year and the full border in five years." The goal "is the latest offered by US officials. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has predicted two years, three to five years, and most recently he has said control could be contingent on enactment of a guest-worker program, which could take up to six years to implement."

Professor Chosen To Be New Orleans "Recovery Czar." The New York Times (12/5, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin appointed Edward J. Blakely as the city's "new 'executive director for recovery management'" Monday. Blakely, "a former chairman of the department of city and regional planning at the University of California, Berkeley," who is now professor of urban planning at the University of Sydney in Australia, said recovery plans "have to be brought together under one umbrella." The Times adds that "the appointment of a 'recovery czar' for the city has been pending for months," and that "at Monday's announcement, Dr. Blakely's precise responsibilities were not spelled out by Mr. Nagin, only that he would 'coordinate and direct recovery efforts.'"

WAR NEWS:

Bush Meets With Iraqi Shiite Leader. President Bush hosted Iraqi Shiite leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim Monday at the White House in a meeting ABC World News (12/4, story 3, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) said "opened a new diplomatic front in the battle for Iraq." The New York Times (12/5, Stolberg, 1.16M) reports Hakim is "a political rival of Prime Minister Nouri Kamal al-Maliki." Yesterday, Bush "urged" him to "reject the extremists that are trying to stop the advance of this young democracy." The meeting with Hakim was "part of an effort by the Bush administration to shore up the fragile Maliki government by reaching out to a wider circle of Iraqi politicians." Speaking to reporters, the president said he told Hakim that he was "not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq," although he said he was "proud of the courage of the Iraqi people." Hakim, for his part, "flatly rejected one of the recommendations that the bipartisan Iraq Study Group is expected to make this week: a call for an international conference or regional peace initiative."

The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports Hakim's opposition to "enlisting the help of Iran and Syria, as a blue-ribbon commission is expected to recommend," gave the President "an important Baghdad ally in his opposition to such an overture, two days before the bipartisan Iraq Study Group is scheduled to deliver its report." Hakim "rejected any international conference to solve Iraq's problems, a White House official said, speaking on condition of anonymity in accordance with White House ground rules. And Bush underscored his concerns in the private meeting, speaking directly 'about Iran and Syria and the critical need for them to respect Iraqi sovereignty and stop destructive activity that undermines Iraq,' the official said."

In an interview with Brit Hume on Fox News' Special Report (12/4) President Bush described his meeting with Hakim, saying they "had a very good discussion about the way forward in Iraq. … I was listening to whether or not this powerful figure was dedicated to a unity government. And he is. There is a lot of talk about Shia dominance to the exclusion of other folks in Iraq. I didn't hear that at all. Quite the contrary. I listened to a man who understands that the way forward is for there to be a government of and by and for the people. His words were, 'we want the people to dictate our government.' In other words, let the people determine the course. And I was most impressed by his attitudes. … First and foremost he supports the Maliki government. As a matter of fact, I asked him during the meeting, I said, 'I just want you to understand, I met with the prime minister, the head of the government, and I don't want the prime minister to construe that this meeting in anyway doesn't support him.' He called Prime Minister Maliki right prior to our meeting to assure him that our meeting…would be viewed as positive. He supports the Maliki government. He believes Prime Minister Maliki has got what it takes to move the government forward."

The CBS Evening News (12/4, story 2, 2:55, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "This was an odd scene. Hakim, who the US Government's own intelligence sources have linked to death squads, being praised by the US President." Bush was shown saying, "I appreciate it very much, his eminence's strong position against the murder of innocent life." Axelrod: "And Hakim told Mr. Bush it's not as bad as it seems in Iraq. 'The presented picture among many media sources,' said Hakim, is 'profoundly different from reality.'" On NBC Nightly News (12/4, lead story, Williams, 9.87M), Kenneth Pollack, Saban Center For Middle East Policy, was shown saying, "At the end of the day, stability in Iraq, political progress in Iraq, comes down to a small group of people, including Abdul Aziz al-Hakim."

The Washington Post (12/5, A23, Wright, Baker, 690K) says "Bush and Hakim are unlikely allies in forging Iraq policy. Hakim's movement was founded during his two decades of exile in Iran, and its Badr Organization militia, formerly known as the Badr Brigade, is still widely believed to have close ties to Tehran." White House spokesman Tony Snow "called Hakim a 'significant force' in Iraqi politics. 'He's somebody who can play a very constructive role and we hope he will,' Snow said."

The AP (12/5, Riechmann) reports "some consider al-Hakim, who lived in exile in Iran for years, a more powerful political figure than…al-Maliki. Al-Hakim leads the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament. His party also is backed by the Badr Brigade militia blamed for sectarian killings." The meeting "was evidence that Bush, under pressure to find a new blueprint for his war strategy, was getting more personally involved in the political infighting among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds."

Another AP story (12/5, Hendawi) reports Hakim "is closer to Iran than any other Iraqi politician and runs a Shiite militia blamed for sectarian violence in Iraq. So why did…Bush meet him in the White House? Some Iraqi officials believe Bush wanted to find out what role Iran can play in bringing peace to this country. If anyone in Iraq knows, it is the 55-year-old al-Hakim."

The AP (12/5, Hunt) reports that after what he called a "very clear" meeting earlier with Secretary Rice, Hakim told reporters in Arabic that "we have asked for the American forces to stay in Iraq" to enable Iraqi security to deal with terrorists. The Washington Times (12/5, Curl, 88K) reports that after his conversation with Rice, Hakim disclosed that "'we have asked for the American forces to stay in Iraq' in an effort to help Iraqi security forces contend with terrorists." Added Hakim, "We will work very hard and seek all forms of cooperation at the international level and the regional level in order to defeat terrorism that it is trying to use Iraq as a base in order to sabotage the future of that nation." The White House "yesterday did not rule out a possible meeting with Sheik al-Sadr." Said Snow, "I don't know if al-Sadr would also be willing to entertain the option. It's a very interesting question; we'll go back and muse on it in a few minutes."

The Financial Times (12/5, Dinmore) reports that "speaking later at the US Institute of Peace (USIP), Mr Hakim criticised US forces for not cracking down hard enough on Sunni insurgents. Decisive strikes were needed, Mr Hakim said. Otherwise, he warned, Shia spiritual leaders might lose their capacity to contain Shia anger and Iraq would be plunged into civil war and 'catastrophic storms that no power in the world could calm or control.'" USIP "is assisting the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which is due to release its recommendations for new strategies in Iraq on Wednesday." The Washington Post (12/5, A23, Wright, Baker, 690K) also reports on the USIP speech under the headline "Iraqi Shiite Leader Speaks Bluntly In Washington."

Bush Claims 90% Of Iraq Is "Relatively Peaceful." Asked on Fox News' Special Report (12/4, Hume) to respond to former Secretary of State Colin Powell's suggestion that Iraq is in the midst of a civil war, Bush said, "I've heard a lot of voices say that. I talked to people in Iraq who don't believe that's the case. For example, some would argue that the fact that 90% of the country…most of the country, outside of the Baghdad area, is relatively peaceful, doesn't indicate a civil war as far as they're concerned. … I get briefings all the time about where the level of violence is and…most of it occurs around the Baghdad area. And therefore, they don't get to see the normalcy of life outside of the Baghdad area."

Kinsley Contrasts Bush Twins' Lifestyle With That Of US Troops In Iraq. In his column for the Washington Post (12/5, A29, 690K) Michael Kinsley writes, "It is not the fault of Jenna or Barbara Bush that their father, the president, has gotten us into a war that he doesn't know how to get us out of. … From what little has leaked out, it seems that Jenna and Barbara are party girls who like to drink and dance until the wee hours with aristocrats and frat boys." Kinsley continues, "Nevertheless, there is a war on. It's a war that has killed 3,000 Americans, most of them around Jenna and Barbara's age or younger. It has killed hundreds of thousands of Iraqis of all ages. And even more Americans and Iraqis have been injured, lost limbs, suffered terrible pain. … No one thinks that the president should have to give up a child to prove that his family is as serious about freedom as these other families he praises. But it would be reassuring to see a little struggle here -- some sign that the Bush family truly believes that American soldiers are dying for our freedom, and that it's worth it."

Bush Says Baker-Hamilton Report One Of Several "Advice Documents." During an interview with Fox News' Special Report's Brit Hume yesterday (12/4), President Bush was asked how he viewed the "advice document" from Defense Secretary Rumsfeld describing possible policy adjustments in Iraq. President Bush echoed Hume's phrasing in his answer, saying, "I'm getting a lot of 'advice documents.' And these documents were never intended to be read in the public. These are frank assessments by different members of my Administration. We will be getting another 'advice document' from the Baker-Hamilton commission soon. My attitude is: I ought to absorb and listen to everything that's being said, because I'm not satisfied with the progress being made in Iraq. … When it comes to military matters, II want to listen to the military, to come up with a way of achieving our objective quicker."

The Washington Times (12/5, Scarborough, 88K), in an article that reinforces the President's assertion that the ISG report is not the only advice he will consult when deciding on potential policy changes, notes, "By the time the White House begins studying" the ISG's report, President Bush "will also have scores of ideas from his own advisers." The office of the secretary of defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the State Department and the National Security Council are all weighing options. The ideas range from A to Z: pull out all troops now or add more troops to quell restive Baghdad and Anbar province." An anonymous "Pentagon official" is quoted as saying, "Let's see if the [Iraq Study Group] comes up with anything better than this."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/4, Henry) reported, "The President realizes the Iraq Study Group's report may be blistering in its assessment of the war." White House spokesman Tony Snow "is noncommittal about whether the president will embrace some or any of the report, noting the president is also waiting for Pentagon and White House reviews of Iraq policy. But Snow bristled at a suggestion the President ordered these separate reviews in order to have the political cover to cherry-pick which recommendations to follow."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/5, LaFranchi, 59K) leads its coverage with the claim that "the big question is not so much what the bipartisan Iraq Study Group will say…but how President Bush will respond." NBC Nightly News (12/4, story 2, Mitchell, 9.87M), the only network newscast to report on the ISG report, addressed that same issue, reporting, "When the Baker-Hamilton group presents its report this week, many are wondering whether the President will be listening. … Only last week the President said he would not change policy in Iraq" and "in the past, the President has been described as unwilling to shift gears." Presidential Historian Michael Beschloss was shown saying, "Psychologically, it's hard to imagine George W. Bush saying, 'Gee, I didn't plan to do any of these things that you recommend in this report, but I now see the light.'" Mitchell concluded her report by predicting that "the most likely scenario" is that the President "will embrace some of the Baker group's recommendations, but save face by calling them his own." Along similar lines, NBC Nightly News' David Gregory (12/4, story 3) stated that he gets "a sense from this White House that they don't like outside help to a problem that they think to a large measure they have under control. They are getting some notions of what is in the Baker-Hamilton report, and privately they say, 'look, the nuts and bolts of the war strategy is sound. … They also question, frankly, whether there's much new the Baker-Hamilton report that they haven't already thought of."

"Skeptical" White House Reportedly Willing To Pursue Limited Talks With Iran. The AP (12/5, Schweid) reports that White House officials are "dropping hints" that President Bush will accept the expected Iraq study commission recommendation that the US hold talks with the government of Iran, but, according to the AP, the White House has let it be known the talks will be "restricted to curbing violence in Iraq." The AP portrays the president and his aides as "skeptical" about the prospects for diplomacy, though the commission is said to be "convinced that reaching out to Iran and Syria could help stabilize…Iraq, and improve chances for easing overall Middle East tensions by boosting the prospects for an Arab-Israeli settlement." The AP goes on to report that administration officials "continue to accuse Iran and Syria of arming and otherwise supporting insurgents in Iraq, Lebanon and elsewhere; and they "insist there is nothing to be gained by rewarding Iran and Syria with high-profile discourse with American diplomats." Richard Perle is quoted as saying that such talks "will be seen throughout the region as an indication of American weakness." The AP contrasts Perle's assertion with that of Defense Secretary nominee Robert Gates, who "told the Council on Foreign Relations in 2004, 'Direct dialogue with Tehran on specific areas of mutual concern should be pursued.'" In his column for the New York Times (12/5, 1.16M) Nicholas Kristof writes that the Iraqi Study Group "is right about needing to consult with neighbors like Syria and Iran, but that doesn't resolve another central problem in Iraq: Our open-ended military presence, perceived by Iraqis as a grab for Iraqi oil and bases, ends up legitimizing extremists like Abu Deraa and aggravating civil war."

Baker And Hamilton May Testify Before The Senate Thursday. The AP (12/5, Flaherty) notes that Sens. John Warner and Carl Levin have asked former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton to testify Thursday before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

ISG Members Made Political Contributions Since Joining Panel. The Hill (12/5, Cusack) reports that "a few" members of the Iraq Study Group have made political contributions since joining the panel. Democratic member Leon Panetta contributed $500 to Rep. John Murtha, who, The Hill notes, has "embraced a quick withdrawal of U.S. troops." Additionally, Vernon Jordan, also a Democratic member, contributed $500 to Rep. Frank Wolf's opponent even though Wolf "played a leading role" in the formation of the group. Former Secretary of State Baker contributed $15,000 to the NRSC last spring. The Hill goes on to report that former Sen. Alan Simpson contributed to several GOP candidates, but told The Hill, "I give to people. What's new?" Simpson characterized "any article on the political giving of the ISG" as "bt" and "extraneous crap."

ISG's Origin As An Earmark Noted. The New York Times' David Kirkpatrick (12/5) writes, "One never knows what some lawmaker will insert into a spending bill without public scrutiny: a remote bridge, or maybe a bike path. Then there is the Iraq Study Group, better known as the Baker-Hamilton commission. In the last year, lawmakers of both parties have criticized earmarks as fostering waste and corruption. But few are complaining about the Iraq Study Group, which will release its much-anticipated report on Wednesday."

US Urged To Broker Shia-Kurd Coalition And Withdraw. In an op-ed for the Financial Times (12/5) former national security advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski writes, "America needs a strategic change of course, and it has to be undertaken on a broad front. It must accept the fact that real leadership in Iraq should be based on a coalition of the Shia clergy commanding the loyalty of Shia militias and of the autonomous Kurds and that the sooner a date is set for US departure, the sooner the authentic Iraqi leaders will be able to enlist Iraq's neighbours in a wider regional effort to promote a more stable Iraq."

Military Families Said To Favor Withdrawal From Iraq, But Not "Quitting." NBC Nightly News (12/4, story 10, Williams, 9.87M) spoke with military families regarding their feelings about the progress of the war in Iraq. In a typical comment, Sergeant Vincent Watkins, who "has already done three tours and is readying for a fourth," was said to favor "anything that means fewer troops having to go back." Sergeant Vincent Watkins: "Right now we're losing a lot of troops. They're dying for a reason but I'm confused, but I'm going to do my mission regardless." NBC's Martin Savidge concluded, "All the soldiers we talked with did agree on one point -- of all the options under consideration, quitting shouldn't be one of them." NBC Nightly News (12/4, story 11, , Williams, 9.87M) also reported from Vermont on families of National Guard members who have been deployed to Iraq.

Zinni Warns About Leaving Iraq Too Early. The New York Times (12/5, Gordon, 1.16M) reports about war critic and retired Marine general Anthony Zinni, "These days General Zinni is delivering another provocative message: that leaving Iraq quickly would strengthen Iranian influence throughout the Middle East, create a sanctuary for terrorist groups, encourage even more sectarian strife in Iraq and risk turmoil in an oil-rich region." Before the war, he had "contended that the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's Iraq was vastly overstated and that invading Iraq would be a burdensome distraction from the struggle against Al Qaeda." The Times notes "odd bedfellows" concerning Iraq; Zinni's position now is "similar to that of Senator John McCain," who supported invading Iraq, while Secretary Rumsfeld's "troop reduction and pullback options" show "some convergence between him and Democratic lawmakers who have criticized the war." In a new paper for the World Security Institute, Zinni further "calls for a new bipartisan steering group to ensure that American policies toward Iraq are efficiently carried out, job-creation programs for Iraqis, integration of Iraq's militias into government-supervised national guard units and encouragement for the Iraqi Army to promote civil affairs."

Conventional Wisdom Regarding Iraq Invasion Challenged. In an op-ed for the New York Times (12/5, 1.16M) author Tim Pritchard writes that though the invasion of Iraq "is generally portrayed as well planned and executed, while the post-invasion strategy is characterized as poorly thought out and undermanned. … In fact, the short fight to get to Baghdad and the long one in which coalition forces have been engaged ever since have much in common. All the information about the nature of the trouble to come was apparent from the very first days of the war. If lessons learned then had been incorporated into military and political thinking, it would have injected a much needed dose of realism at an early stage."

Warner Will Urge Bush To Consult With Democrats On Iraq Strategy. The AP (12/5, Flaherty) reports Sen. John Warner "will call on President Bush to solicit privately the opinions of Democrats before forging a new strategy on Iraq." In his opening statement for the confirmation hearing of defense secretary nominee Robert Gates, Warner will claim Bush has a "moral obligation" to consult Democrats. The AP characterizes Warner's statement as "the strongest indication yet that he and perhaps other key Republicans will challenge Bush when it comes to the war."

Rumsfeld Declassifies Memo In Response To Questions Regarding Timing Of Leak. The AP (12/5, Burns) reports that according to a "cover letter" declassified by Defense Secretary Rumsfeld yesterday, Rumsfeld's "secret memo" to President Bush on options for Iraq policy "was developed over a period of weeks." The letter also reveals that Rumsfeld "instructed" Gen. John Abizaid "to assemble his own group 'some time ago' to consider new approaches in Iraq, though there "has been no public disclosure of recommendations from the Abizaid group" as of yet. The AP contends that Rumsfeld declassified the cover letter in order to rebut critics who saw the memo as "a way of defending Rumsfeld's reputation as he was about to leave office." Sen. Susan Collins "said Monday she viewed the memo as inconsistent with Rumsfeld's recent congressional testimony, and she said he should have shared these suggestions with Congress many months ago." Collins is quoted as saying, "the leaking" of the memo "very much reminded me of a strategy of trying to leave office saying that you actually had a lot of good plans that were different than your public utterances." The declassification of the cover letter received no coverage beyond the AP's report.

Adelman Describes Rumsfeld As "In Denial." The CBS Evening News's David Martin (12/4, story 3, 2:45) spoke with former Assistant Secretary of Defense Kenneth Adelman, described as "a former Rumsfeld ally who's now a very harsh critic, a critic who says that memo was long overdue." Adelman was shown saying, "My impression was that he was in denial. … He says, 'This war will never be lost in Baghdad. It will only be lost in America.' And I tried to butt-in and say, 'it is being lost in Iraq. What are you talking about? We are losing there.' And he said, 'Excuse me.' And then he just went on."

US Troops Shifting To Advisory Positions. The New York Times (12/5, Shanker, Wong, 1.16M) reports, "American commanders in Iraq are already shifting thousands of combat troops into advisory positions with Iraqi Army and police units, especially in the capital, in their latest attempt to bring sectarian violence under control. ... American generals in Iraq have made the reassignments in recent weeks even though President Bush and his senior national security advisers have not yet made a formal decision about whether to expand the American contingent sent to Iraq specifically to serve on military training teams." Officers concede new risks with the new emphasis on advisory work, such as the danger of "working ... away from the security of larger American units," which cost three officers their lives "in a single attack in Baghdad." Furthermore, "operations carried out with Iraqi security forces in the lead may be less effective and result in more casualties among Iraqi security forces and civilians than with the better-trained American troops. ... There is also some concern that pushing Iraqi units to the front may result in atrocities by corrupt or sectarian Iraqi units."

US Death Toll Passes 2,900 After Four Service Members Die In Iraq Copter Crash. The CBS Evening News (12/4, lead story, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "It's heartbreaking every time we have to report it, but four more US servicemen have been killed in Iraq, four Marines. Their Sea Knight helicopter went down in a lake in Anbar province. The military blames mechanical problems. And with that, the US death toll in Iraq has now passed 2,900."

The New York Times (12/5, Semple, 1.16M) reports, "Four American troops were killed when a military helicopter broke down while flying over a lake in Anbar Province in western Iraq and made an emergency landing on the shore, American military officials said Monday. The military said the craft, Marine Corps CH-46 Sea Knight troop transport helicopter with 16 people and equipment on board, was flying over Lake Qadisiya, near Haditha, on Sunday when it began to experience mechanical difficulties." The pilots "brought the twin-rotor helicopter down in a controlled maneuver and guided it to the water's edge, according to Lt. Col. Josslyn L. Aberle, a military spokeswoman in Baghdad. The mechanical failures were not caused by an enemy attack, officials said; they did not give further details." The Washington Post (12/5, A24, Trejos, 690K) runs a similar report.

Military Census Finds There Are About 100,000 Contractors In Iraq. The Washington Post (12/5, D1, Merle, 690K) reports, "There are about 100,000 government contractors operating in Iraq, not counting subcontractors, a total that is approaching the size of the US military force there, according to the military's first census of the growing population of civilians operating in the battlefield. The survey finding, which includes Americans, Iraqis and third-party nationals hired by companies operating under U.S. government contracts, is significantly higher and wider in scope than the Pentagon's only previous estimate, which said there were 25,000 security contractors in the country." It is also "10 times the estimated number of contractors that deployed during the Persian Gulf War in 1991, reflecting the Pentagon's growing post-Cold War reliance on contractors for such jobs as providing security, interrogating prisoners, cooking meals, fixing equipment and constructing bases that were once reserved for soldiers." The Post also reports, "Three years into the war, the headcount represents one of the Pentagon's most concrete efforts so far toward addressing the complexities and questions raised by the large numbers of civilians who have flooded into Iraq to work. With few industry standards, the military and contractors have sometimes lacked coordination, resulting in friendly fire incidents, according to a Government Accountability Office report last year."

AP Alleged To Have Fabricated Atrocity In Iraq. Fox News Special Report (12/4, Hume) reported the Associated Press "is under attack for allegedly fabricating news from Iraq. They quoted an Iraqi Police captain named Jamail Hussein in several stories, including one describing soldiers standing by as people were burned alive at a mosque. But Iraq's Interior Ministry says it has no evidence that it happened and that the captain does not even exist. The AP says it revisited the neighborhood and found witnesses that confirmed its story. But the Boston Herald's Jules Crittenden says, 'the AP is making up war crimes' and described the AP as 'an anti-American agency that seeks to undermine the President.'"

US Commanders Dissatisfied With Iraqi Army's Performance. ABC World News (12/4, story 5, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the Bush Administration, "of course," had "hoped to begin withdrawing American forces from Iraq by now. That has not happened, largely because Iraqi forces are still not up to the job of securing their own country. ABC's Aaron Katersky and has embedded with US forces since the beginning of last month and has seen why they are not ready to take over." Katersky went on to report, "US commanders are often frustrated when Iraqi troops hit the street, as we've traveled with them over the past two weeks, the trainers say the Iraqis need a lot of work." Major William Breazille, 3rd Infantry Division: "They are minimally ready to defend their battle space. They need more equipment, more personnel, they need soldiers that are more committed." Katersky added, "We heard that kind of complaint everywhere went."

Danish Reporters Acquitted In Iraq WMD Case. The AP (12/5, Olsen) reports, "Three Danish journalists who published classified intelligence reports on Iraq's former weapons program were acquitted Monday on charges of endangering national security. The Copenhagen City Court ruled that Niels Lunde, chief editor of the Berlingske Tidende newspaper, and reporters Michael Bjerre and Jesper Larsen acted in the public interest when they published a series of articles in 2004 citing leaked Danish intelligence reports."

Commander Says Troop Shortage, "Caveats" Undermining War Effort In Afghanistan. USA Today (12/5, 1A, Wiseman, 2.27M) reports, "The outgoing US commander in Afghanistan warned that the fight against the Taliban is in danger of being undermined by a shortage of NATO troops and by restrictions that keep some alliance forces out of combat." US Army Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry

"said in an interview that NATO countries need to contribute more troops and that some of them must drop 'caveats' that prevent their forces from fighting freely." Eikenberry "is worried about the caveats and about NATO's troop strength, which is at 90% of the level NATO says is required. 'The objective has got to be to get to the 100% level,' he said." USA Today adds, "Close to wrapping up an 18-month tour as U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Eikenberry also said Afghanistan's broken-down infrastructure -- particularly its roads -- needed more repair than the United States and its allies realized after ousting the Taliban regime in late 2001."

DOD Resists DEA's "Pleas" For Help In Afghan Opium Campaign. The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Meyer, 850K) reports, "The Pentagon, engaged in a difficult fight to defeat a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, has resisted entreaties from U.S. anti-narcotics officials to play an aggressive role in the faltering campaign to curb the country's opium trade. Military units in Afghanistan largely overlook drug bazaars, rebuff some requests to take U.S. drug agents on raids and do little to counter the organized crime syndicates shipping the drug to Europe, Asia and, increasingly, the United States, according to officials and documents." In Afghanistan, "poppy cultivation has exploded, increasing by more than half this year." The "DEA's advocates in Congress" and Afghan officials "have asked for more help from the Pentagon." Rep. Henry Hyde's aides "say the congressman hasn't heard back" since October 20 from Secretary Rumsfeld or Undersecretary Edelman about an October 12 request "to allow DEA agents to ride along on more military missions in Afghanistan and to call them in when soldiers found a large drug stash or operation."

Poor DOD Oversight Is Faulted For 2004 Afghan Crash. USA Today (12/5, Levin, Kelley, 2.27M) reports, "Poor Defense Department oversight of private companies that fly military missions in war zones was partially responsible for a 2004 crash that killed six people in Afghanistan, federal accident investigators said Monday." The NTSB "recommended that the Defense Department coordinate with the Federal Aviation Administration to better monitor the charter flights increasingly being used to carry small numbers of troops and cargo in Iraq and Afghanistan." Among other violations, "the military requires planes it charters to be equipped with a device that allows people on the ground to follow the flight's route. But the NTSB said it found no evidence that the military had tried to enforce the rule."

Afghan Women's Shelters Are Under Constant Threat. The Washington Post (12/5, Constable, 690K) reports in a front page article on Afghan shelters for women fleeing abuse: "In the years since the overthrow of the Taliban in 2001, a network of civic groups has begun promoting women's legal rights and opening shelters. Still, despite increasing cooperation from police and referrals from the women's ministry, the shelters remain controversial and in permanent danger of attack by angry husbands and fathers." Several advocates are quoted.

NYTimes Says Iraq, Bush's "Inattention" At Root Of Problems In Afghanistan. The New York Times (12/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "Afghanistan was supposed to be the good war -- and the war America was winning. But because of the Bush administration's inattention and mismanagement, even the good war is going wrong." President Bush's "decision to rush off to invade Iraq meant that Afghanistan would be shortchanged when it came to resources and to policy makers' priority lists. The cost of that inattention can be seen in the failing Afghan police force. It can also be seen in the Taliban's growing strength, the mounting death toll of Afghan civilians and NATO troops, and the unraveling of the Karzai government."

US Army Unable To Keep Up With Equipment Repair. The Washington Post (12/5, Tyson, 690K) reports in a front page article, "[The] Army ... is wearing out faster than it is being rebuilt. The Army and Marine Corps have sunk more than 40 percent of their ground combat equipment into the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to government data. An estimated $17 billion-plus worth of military equipment is destroyed or worn out each year, blasted by bombs, ground down by desert sand and used up to nine times the rate in times of peace. ... Partly as a result of the shortages, many U.S. units are rated 'unready' to deploy, officials say, raising alarm in Congress and concern among military leaders." The repair work "will cost an estimated $17 billion to $19 billion annually for several more years, regardless of any shift in Iraq strategy. The Army alone has 280,000 major pieces of equipment in combat zones that will eventually have to be fixed or replaced. Before the war, the Army spent $2.5 billion to $3 billion a year on wear and tear. ... Responding to urgent requests from the Army and Marine Corps, Congress approved an extra $23.8 billion in October to replace worn-out equipment in fiscal 2007."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC To Dispute Whistleblower's Allegations About Morgan Stanley Probe. USA Today (12/5, 7B, Farrell) reports, "In an unusual departure from the polite 'no comment' that the Securities and Exchange Commission generally offers in response to criticism, four SEC officials are expected to blast a self-proclaimed 'whistle-blower' before a Senate subcommittee hearing today." USA continues, "The four officials, including Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's director of enforcement, are scheduled to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee to answer allegations that a high-profile investigation of John Mack, the CEO of Morgan

DOJ_NMG_0102079

Stanley, was abandoned last year because of political pressure." USA adds, "Gary Aguirre, a former SEC investigator, made those allegations at a congressional hearing in June. Aguirre said he was fired because he didn't want to abandon an investigation into whether Mack broke inside-trading rules by sharing market-sensitive information with a hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management. … He testified that he wanted to subpoena Mack in order to ask him about various suspicious trades, but his superiors wouldn't let him issue the subpoena." USA notes, "In June, the SEC said political pressure didn't play a role in the decision not to bring Mack in for questioning. Last week the SEC closed the investigation. Today, Thomsen and others are expected to offer blunt testimony about Aguirre and his work habits at the SEC. … Aguirre was fired in September 2005, just days before the expiration of his one-year probationary period at the commission."

Second Official Had Concerns About SEC Inquiry. The New York Times (12/5, Bogdanich) reports, "Congressional investigators have found that a second official at the Securities and Exchange Commission expressed serious concerns about how the agency was conducting its inquiry into a prominent hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management." The Times continues, "The official, Eric Ribelin, an investigator at the commission, asked to be removed from the Pequot inquiry because of his serious misgivings about decisions being made on the case by senior S.E.C. officials, according to a government official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss the matter." The Times adds, "Mr. Ribelin believed that the inquiry 'was not handled right,' Senator Arlen Specter, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said in an interview. The investigator's criticism echoes some of the complaints lodged this year by the former S.E.C. lawyer who ran the investigation, Gary J. Aguirre. … 'Something smells rotten here,' Mr. Ribelin wrote in an e-mail message to an S.E.C. supervisor last year." The Times notes, "He is among those expected to testify today before Senator Specter's committee, which, together with the Senate Finance Committee, has been examining allegations by Mr. Aguirre that the agency prematurely halted its Pequot investigation because of outside political pressure. … Mr. Aguirre, who led the hedge fund investigation until he was fired last year, has told members of Congress that senior S.E.C. officials blocked him from taking testimony from John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive and friend of Pequot's founder, Arthur J. Samberg. … S.E.C. officials said they turned down Mr. Aguirre's request at that time because he had not made a strong enough case for taking Mr. Mack's testimony, records show. The S.E.C. took Mr. Mack's testimony about a year later, and formally closed the Pequot investigation last week without taking any enforcement action. Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack have repeatedly denied any improper conduct."

Jefferies To Pay $9.7 Million To Settle Fidelity Gift Probe. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, C1, Craig, Levitz) reports, "Brokerage firm Jefferies Group Inc. has agreed to pay more than $10 million to settle allegations that a former star trader doled out gifts and entertainment, including expensive wine and private-jet flights, to Fidelity Investments to win mutual-fund trading business." The Journal continues, "The National Association of Securities Dealers, which spearheaded the investigation, imposed a $5.5 million penalty on Jefferies, and the Securities and Exchange Commission ordered Jefferies to return nearly $4.8 million of trading gains. The firm, which settled charges without admitting or denying guilt, has been ordered to hire a monitor to review travel, entertainment and gift policies." The Journal adds, "Former Jefferies trader Kevin Quinn, whom Jefferies armed with a big expense account to lure Fidelity business, was fined $468,000, and Scott Jones, a Jefferies board member who was Mr. Quinn's immediate supervisor, was fined $50,000. Both agreed to other penalties to settle the charges. … Mr. Quinn, who through his attorney declined to comment, has been permanently barred from working at a registered securities firm. … Notable in yesterday's announcement was that the SEC, which has jurisdiction over Fidelity, took no action against the mutual-fund company. Mutual funds are supposed to send their stock trades to whichever firm offers them -- and their customers -- the best price and service, and such decisions aren't supposed to be based on gifts a fund manager may have received from a broker. .. However, according to people familiar with the inquiry, the SEC has had difficulty trying to prove that investors were financially harmed because Fidelity traders accepted the gifts and entertainment."

USA Today (12/5, 9B, Farrell) reports, "In a case that could taint the pristine image of mutual fund giant Fidelity Investments, federal regulators settled civil charges with a stock brokerage firm for lavishing more than $1.6 million in fine wines, golf junkets, sports tickets and other goodies on a handful of Fidelity traders. The gifts, regulators contend, were designed to get Fidelity to shift more of its stock-trading business to the firm." USA continues, "Regulators say Jefferies obliterated the NASD's $100 limit on the amount of gifts and expense-related entertainment that can be provided to a customer each year. … According to the settlement, Jefferies made only $4.3 million in commissions off the Boston-based family of mutual funds in 2001. In order to grow its Fidelity business, the company hired Kevin Quinn in September 2002, paying him $4 million a year and an annual expense account of $1.5 million."

The Washington Post/AP (12/5, D2, Gordon) reports, "It was the first case brought in a two-year investigation by the SEC and the NASD into whether about two dozen brokerage firms illegally provided golf outings, Super Bowl tickets and other gifts to traders at mutual fund advisers to get them to bring their business to the firms. The practice is said to be widespread in the brokerage industry. … Fidelity Investments, the Boston-based fund giant, has said it could face action from the SEC in an investigation into whether its traders sent company business to brokerage firms that offered gifts and gratuities, rather than to firms offering the best deals on trades. More than a dozen Fidelity employees have been disciplined in connection with the investigation and at least five traders have left the firm."

The Financial Times (12/5, Masters, Knight) reports, "US regulators moved on Monday to crack down on brokers who lavish gifts on mutual fund traders as they slapped $9.7m in penalties on Jefferies & Co, the New York securities firm, for currying favour with Fidelity traders." The Times continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission and the industry regulator NASD said Jefferies, a middle-sized investment bank, hired Kevin Quinn as an executive vice-president in 2002 and gave him a $1.5m annual travel and entertainment budget to boost their institutional business. … He used the money to court five Fidelity traders, paying for private flights to Turks and Caicos, Bermuda and Puerto Rico, as well as vintage wines, golf outings, and trips to Wimbledon and the US Open tennis tournament. … He also paid $75,000 towards a lavish Miami bachelor party for a Fidelity trader. "Investors deserve and the integrity of the market requires that traders select brokers based on the quality of their trade execution and not the lavishness of their gifts," said Walter Ricciardi, the SEC's deputy enforcement director." The Times notes, "The regulators said the case was part of a broader effort to tighten policies that have let brokers funnel thousands of dollars in gifts and entertainment to institutional traders. … The NASD, which unearthed the problem, also issued a report urging firms to track entertainment and gifts more closely."

Regulators Find Accounting Rule Change Agreement Elusive. The Washington Post (12/5, D1, Johnson) reports, "Regulators continue to revise an accounting rule criticized by business groups as overly expensive, Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said yesterday, but an agreement remains days away." The Post continues, "Officials at the SEC and the board that oversees the audit industry have been meeting and exchanging documents about the measure, which requires accountants to review corporate financial controls, for the better part of two weeks. The rule is the single most expensive part of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, corporate accountability legislation passed in 2002 that is designed to prevent fraud after collapses at Enron and WorldCom." The Post adds, "Trade groups and lawmakers have attacked the provision and called for regulators to scrap the burdensome approach. At the same time, consumer advocates warn that establishing different standards for thousands of small and mid-size businesses would effectively gut the measure and make financial reports less reliable for investors. … The trick is to make complying with the rule less expensive, particularly for smaller companies with fewer resources. Coming to agreement on the mechanics, including forcing accountants to rely on the judgment of corporate managers, and to focus on the most important issues in the financial statements, has been a difficult task. The debate broke into public view two weeks ago after a memo from Cox was leaked to the press."

CRIMINAL LAW:

US Charges NIH Alzheimer's Researcher With Conflict Of Interest. The AP (12/5, Beamish) reports, "In a rare federal prosecution, a leading government Alzheimer's researcher was charged Monday with a criminal conflict of interest for performing lucrative private drug company work that overlapped his official duties." The AP continues, "Prosecutors alleged Dr. Trey Sunderland of the National Institutes of Health received $285,000 in improper consulting fees and travel expenses from Pfizer, Inc., for work on early indicators of Alzheimer's at the same time he also oversaw similar NIH business with the drugmaker. … The private consulting 'directly related' to his government job, and Sunderland failed to obtain the proper approvals from his supervisors or disclose the work to NIH, according to papers filed in U.S. District Court in Baltimore. … The felony charge carries a maximum sentence of one year in prison and a $100,000 fine. Prosecutors filed the charge as a criminal information, instead of indictment, signaling the possibility of a plea deal." The AP adds, "The prosecution is believed to be the first such case against a federal scientist since the early 1990s. … It stemmed from a two-year ethics controversy at NIH that prompted the nation's premier medical agency to issue new rules on consulting and end such relationships that enrich its scientists. … Scientists recently told NIH that the new rules are so strict that many are considering leaving the agency. … NIH had identified at least 44 government researchers who improperly made money moonlighting for biotechnology and drug companies. Most were given written or verbal reprimands or were permitted to retire. … But Sunderland drew the attention of federal prosecutors and the ire of Congress when House investigators revealed his private financial deal and the fact that he transferred hundreds of tubes of valuable NIH tissue samples to Pfizer around the time of his consulting work."

US Charges New York CEO With Stealing Employees' Identities. Fortune (12/5, Mehta) reports, "Anyone who works in an office - or watches 'The Office' - knows how torturous cubicle life can be: unflattering fluorescent lights, insecure supervisors and clueless co-workers can all take their toll. Now, it seems, there's a new indignity: bosses who steal their employees' identities." Fortune continues, "Terrence D. Chalk, a well-known White Plains, N.Y., entrepreneur, may have done just that. The Justice Department says Chalk, CEO of a computer services company called CompuLinx, applied for loans and credit cards using the names of employees or clients, falsely claiming they were officers of his firm. … Charges include conspiracy and credit card fraud, and if he's convicted, he faces up to 165 years in prison. Chalk, who was quoted frequently in computer industry trade publications and served on local charity boards, has made other enemies too." Fortune adds, "Once his case became public, assorted associates came out of the woodwork, claiming the entrepreneur owed them money. And a former business partner told the local paper that Chalk used his deceased father's personal information to get a loan. Chalk's lawyer didn't return calls. … ID-stealing bosses are the exception, but they are out there, says Linda Foley, executive director of the Identity Theft Resource Center, a leading nonprofit that provides information and support for fraud victims. .. In fact, Foley started the center in 1999 after her boss used information on Foley's tax forms to apply for credit cards and a cell phone. And earlier this year a judge in upstate New York sentenced a computer entrepreneur to seven years in jail for tax fraud and stealing the IDs of employees and friends."

US Wins Discovery Battle In Milberg Weiss Probe. The California Recorder (12/5, Scheck) reports, "L.A. federal prosecutors have won a behind-the-scenes discovery fight in the undying probe of plaintiffs firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman." The Recorder continues, "In a sealed ruling issued the day before Thanksgiving, U.S. District Judge A. Howard Matz ordered the production of reams of discovery that prosecutors had sought from various plaintiffs firms, according to lawyers familiar with the case." The Recorder adds, "Attorneys for Milberg -- which was indicted in May, as were two of its name partners, on charges of paying kickbacks to clients -- had argued that the material was covered by work-product privilege. … The documents relate largely to payment agreements with other firms for John Torkelsen, a former expert witness for the plaintiff goliath, said the attorneys." The Recorder notes, "'Torkelsen has been the subject of intense interest as the prosecutors continue efforts to indict Milberg's former star partner William Lerach, who now heads the top plaintiff shop Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins. … The May indictment of Milberg accused that firm of giving fees to outside lawyers who in turn paid lead plaintiffs in class actions, constituting illegal kickbacks. … But the ongoing investigation looks beyond those charges at other transactions. Aside from the Torkelsen payments, prosecutors have spent years looking at referral fees Milberg allegedly paid to other lawyers -- and possibly stockbrokers -- in exchange for bringing them lead plaintiffs."

Navy Submariner Pleads Guilty To Peddling Classified Data. The AP (12/5, Barisic) reports, "A sailor accused of stealing a U.S.Navy laptop and peddling its classified contents to an undisclosed foreign government pleaded guilty to espionage, desertion and other charges." The AP continues, "If convicted, Petty Officer 3rd Class Ariel J. Weinmann, 22, of Salem, Oregon, could face a sentence of life in prison without parole, a dishonorable discharge from the Navy and forfeiture of all pay." The AP adds, "Under the plea agreement Monday, Weinmann pleaded guilty to one count each of espionage, desertion, failing to properly safeguard and store classified information, electronically copying classified information, communicating classified information to a person not entitled to receive it, and stealing and destroying a government computer. … Weinmann pleaded guilty to trying to transmit classified information related to national defense to a representative of a foreign government on Oct. 19, 2005, while he was in or near Vienna, Austria. … He pleaded not guilty to two additional espionage counts, one accusing him of giving classified information to an agent of a foreign government in March 2005 in Bahrain and another accusing him of trying to deliver confidential information on March 19, 2006, in Mexico City."

Former US Attorney Discusses Memphis Councilman's Prior Bribery Conviction. WPTY-TV Memphis (12/4, Amorose) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "On Thursday, November 30, 2006, city council members Rickey Peete and Edmund Ford were charged for taking a bribes in exchange for their votes on a zoning issue. It is the same crime Rickey Peete was convicted of in 1989. Hickman Ewing was the U.S. Attorney who prosecuted the case" in 1989. "One day he received a call from his friend, a real estate developer. … He said, 'They would go down and talk to each councilman and try to lobby them to vote for them, and Rickey basically says I'm the one that can get this through, I can get this through for you, and I need money now and money later.'" WPTY added, "Ewing said he is glad the U.S. Attorney's office is continuing it's crusade against public corruption. He said, 'I think prosecuting one public official is worth a lot more than prosecuting ten bank robbers. Who's more dangerous to society, one crack dealer who's 19 years-old who's got a habit, or the public official? I'd say the public official.'"

Former SBC Employee Pleads Not Guilty In Pellicano-Related Perjury Case. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/5) reports former SBC Communications employee Joann Wiggan "pleaded not guilty Monday to charges of lying to FBI agents and a federal grand injury investigating wiretapping allegations against Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano." Wiggan "is charged with lying to investigators, grand jurors and during a previous trial about her contact with former co-worker Ray Turner. … Prosecutors say Wiggan was one of three SBC employees who supplied Turner with information from confidential phone company databases he used to help Pellicano illegally tap the phones of several Hollywood figures." The AP notes, "Wiggan was acquitted in September of four perjury charges but jurors deadlocked on a fifth. … In the new indictment, prosecutors allege Wiggan and Turner called each other at least 35 times during a time when Wiggan claimed they hadn't spoken."

Reputed New England Mob Underboss Released On Bail. The Boston Globe (12/5, Murphy, 413K) reports, "Reputed New England Mafia underboss Carmen 'The Big Cheese' DiNunzio looked uncomfortable yesterday as he shuffled into court in leg irons. He didn't speak, as his lawyer entered not guilty pleas on his behalf to charges of illegal gambling and extortion." He "was freed on bail after posting $20,000 cash." Defense lawyer Anthony M. Cardinale "said the indictment returned by an Essex County grand jury on Friday alleges crimes that occurred in 2001 and was brought just as the statute of limitations was about to expire. 'I think it's to our benefit that they waited this long' to bring the case, Cardinale said. DiNunzio is charged with extortion, maintaining or organizing an illegal gaming operation, and conspiracy in maintaining or organizing a gaming operation."

FBI Leading Nation-Wide Search For Abducted Florida Newborn. Fox News' The Big Story With John Gibson (12/4, 5:40 p.m.) reported, "Our big crime story is the intense search for a missing baby boy, a search that is now nation-wide. The FBI is now working on the case as they hunt for a woman who held the mother at knife point before snatching her newborn baby in Florida. … With me now live on the phone with new developments in the case, FBI Special Agent John Kuchta." Kuchta: "Well, we've expanded our search nationwide. And we are…appealing to the public. We believe that someone close to the offender, a husband, boyfriend, mother, sister, friend, would have information and they would come forward." Gibson: "What do you think the outlook for this is?" Kuchta: "Well, it's strong. … Our federal and state local partners are working on this case. We will leave no stone unturned and we will work it to conclusion until we reunite the baby with the family."

Connecticut Man Found Competent To Be Tried On Murder-For-Hire Charges. The New Haven Register (12/5, Helsel, 82K) reports from Ansonia, Conn., "The local man who police say conspired with his mother in a low-rent 'murder for hire' scheme was ruled competent to stand trial and entered not guilty pleas Monday. Nicholas Scott Taylor, 20, is charged, along with his mother, Kathryn Smith, 48, of conspiring in a plot to kill Smith's boyfriend for what they believed would result in a $100,000 insurance policy payout earlier this year." The Register notes that Taylor "and his mother allegedly offered an undercover FBI informant a used stereo and up to $150 cash to kill Smith's longtime boyfriend, according to an arrest warrant affidavit."

Washington Woman Charged In 1978 Murder-For-Hire. The Seattle Times (12/5, Miletich, Brunner, 118K) reports, "Prosecutors charged a Pierce County woman Monday with first-degree murder in the 1978 killing of an auto mechanic who allegedly was lured to his death as part of a contract killing." Karen L. Martin "was arrested Friday by a FBI/local law-enforcement task force investigating old unsolved homicides. Her name surfaced as investigators combed past cases related to organized crime and Seattle strip clubs." The Times notes, "A year after the killing, Martin and her attorney went to federal prosecutors, saying she had information on contract killings linked to a Seattle-based crime organization. She was offered immunity from federal prosecution before she acknowledged she killed [Leroy] Grant, according to the charging papers. … Federal prosecutors didn't inform King County prosecutors about Martin's admissions, and Grant's slaying went unsolved."

Bogus DHS Show Producer Sentenced To Year In Prison For Fraud. The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Hanley, Krikorian, 850K) reports, "In a ruling that surprised attorneys and outraged investors, a federal judge Monday sentenced onetime Hollywood producer Joseph Medawar to a year and a day in prison for swindling scores of people out of millions of dollars to develop a bogus television show about the U.S. Department of Homeland Security." US District Judge Manuel L. Real sentenced Medawar "to a term far shorter than the 33 months his attorney had requested, or the 57 months sought by the government." Assistant US Attorney Christine Ewell "told reporters outside court that authorities would review Real's sentence to see if there are any grounds for appeal." The Times notes that "according to the FBI, the IRS and the U.S. attorney's office, Medawar and others had defrauded at least 70 investors — many from local churches — out of millions of dollars."

The AP (12/5) reports, "As part of the scheme, federal prosecutors said, he falsely claimed 26 episodes of 'DHS' were in post-production and that the company had distribution deals with 137 overseas markets. Investigators found only one episode had been shot, and only after Medawar became aware of the federal probe. One would-be investor, Manuel Lozano, told the judge Monday that Medawar left many 'individuals financially crushed by the side of the road.' … Lozano also expressed disappointment outside the court, saying 'justice and the legal system don't necessarily coexist.'"

Jury Selection Begins For Alabama FEMA Fraud Trial. The Mobile Register (12/4, Kirby) reported, "Governor Reiss Sr. committed murder as a teenager, spent part of his adulthood on the run after an escape from prison and then became a preacher. Now in his 50s, the Mobile native finds himself once again in trouble with the law." Reiss "will go on trial later this month on charges that he defrauded the federal government following Hurricane Katrina, the first such case to go to trial in Mobile's federal court. Jury selection is slated for today." The Press-Register noted that "defense attorney Willie Huntley said his client is innocent of the current allegations. He attributed the fraud charges to confusion on the part of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which he contends filed his application under the wrong category."

Maryland Teen Arrested For DC Assaults. The Washington Post (12/5, B4, Pierre) reports, "A teenager from Temple Hills has been arrested in connection with eight recent sexual assaults near Howard University, D.C. police said yesterday." The Post continues, "Women were groped in the incidents, and in two cases, the assailant brandished a knife, police said. No one was injured in the assaults, which took place late last month. During the past week, police blanketed the area where the assaults occurred with plainclothes and uniformed officers." The Post adds, "Yesterday, police announced the arrest of Avon Marquell Pittman, 17, of the 4700 block of Temple Hill Road. On Saturday afternoon, plainclothes officers noticed Pittman following a woman in the 200 block of T Street NW and pounced, discovering a kitchen knife and taking him into custody, police said. He was later let go, and police said the woman he had been following was so startled that she left before they could question her. … Police arrested Pittman early yesterday, after authorities developed additional leads. He was charged as an adult with assault with intent to commit first-degree sexual assault while armed. The charge applies to just one of the cases. … But 'the community can feel confident' that the crimes are solved, police Cmdr. Larry McCoy declared at a news conference."

Virginia Governor Again Delays Execution Of Convicted Murderer. The Washington Post (12/5, B05, Rondeaux) reports, "Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine yesterday delayed for the second time the execution of triple killer Percy L. Walton, a move that keeps the capital murder case at the center of a growing national debate over the execution of the mentally ill." The Post continues, "In June, Kaine delayed Walton's scheduled execution until Friday to allow for an independent evaluation of his mental condition and competence. Based on that evaluation, Kaine (D) said yesterday that Walton's execution would be delayed 18 more months, until June 10, 2008. … 'I am compelled to conclude that Walton is severely mentally impaired and meets the Supreme Court's definition of mental incompetence,' Kaine said in a statement. 'At the same time, it is within the realm of possibility -- though unlikely -- that Walton's mental impairment is not permanent. Accordingly, a commutation of his sentence is not appropriate at this time.'" The Post adds, "The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1986 that the execution of the mentally ill violates the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court said death-row inmates must be able to comprehend that they are about to be executed and why. But the high court left it up to states to define who is sane or insane. … Walton's case is one of several pending around the country that have frequently been cited as important tests of the limits of the Supreme Court's ruling in Ford v. Wainwright. … Attorneys for Walton, 28, contend that Walton is mentally ill and mentally retarded and that his condition has further deteriorated since he has been on death row. His attorneys at trial never requested a competency hearing. A competency hearing was held three years ago as part of his appeals, and experts disagreed about his mental state." The Post notes, "In a rare move, less than two hours before his scheduled execution in June, Kaine asked three mental health experts to evaluate Walton to determine if he is competent to be executed. A spokesman for the governor said two of the three experts had completed reports on Walton's mental health, and one declined to review his case. The experts' conclusions will not be made public, the spokesman said."

Reform Of Tort Trust System Urged. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (12/5, A18), Kimberley A. Strassel, a member of the Journal's editorial board, writes, "Harry Kananian died in the year 2000 of mesothelioma -- a cancer almost always caused by asbestos. But the legacy that may survive him is the role he is posthumously playing in exposing evidence of asbestos litigation fraud." Strassel continues, "In early 2000, the Ohio resident met with the law firm of Early, Ludwick, Sweeney & Strauss to see about collecting compensation from special trusts set up by companies to deal with asbestos liabilities. So the law firm filed a claim to one trust, saying Kananian had worked in a World War II shipyard and was exposed to insulation containing asbestos. It also filed a claim to another trust saying he had been a shipyard welder. A third claim, to another trust, said he'd unloaded asbestos off ships in Japan. And a fourth claim said that he'd worked with 'tools of asbestos' before the war. Meanwhile, a second law firm, Brayton Purcell, submitted two more claims to two further trusts, with still different stories. The two firms swept up as much as $700,000 for Kananian and his estate from trusts and settlements. … In the legal trade, this is known as 'double dipping' -- the process by which lawyers file claims at many different bankruptcy trusts on behalf of a single plaintiff. Each trust is told a different story about how the client got sick, and the plaintiff collects from all of them. Of course, the lawyers collect too. This practice may well have remained unexposed had not Brayton Purcell decided to cash in on Kananian one more time. It sued Lorillard Tobacco, this time claiming its client had become sick from smoking Kent cigarettes, whose filters contained asbestos for several years in the 1950s. That suit has now exploded on Brayton, exposing one of the asbestos bar's more lucrative cash cows." Strassel adds, "Whatever happens, the exposure of this trust scam is bolstering a new wave of oversight. Judges are already taking a closer look at silicosis claims and 'prepackaged' bankruptcies -- both cash cows for the trial bar. … Meanwhile, reform proposals are beginning to emerge. One idea is for the trusts to release data about claimants, so that other trusts and defense attorneys can review existing claims. Some lawyers are requesting that active litigation be put on hold until companies can see who claimed from trusts. That this hasn't already happened is the fault of bankruptcy judges, who have been unresponsive to requests for more oversight of the trusts they help create."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Supreme Court Expected To Strike Down Use Of Race As Factor In School Assignments. USA Today (12/5, 3A, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "The Supreme Court appeared ready Monday to strike down public school diversity programs that use race as a factor in deciding where students go to school." In "the first test of school integration efforts to come before the court since Chief Justice John Roberts and fellow conservative Samuel Alito joined the bench last term," the justices "heard two cases -- one from Seattle, the other from Louisville -- that examine whether using race in school assignments violates the Constitution's equality guarantee." Yesterday's "two hours of arguments indicated that the court is moving toward a harder line on race-based policies." USA Today adds, "The key player appeared to be Justice Anthony Kennedy, who is at the ideological center of the court. As the liberals asked questions that suggested they supported the school districts' policies, Kennedy joined conservative justices in expressing skepticism about programs that transfer some students out of their neighborhoods to counteract racially segregated housing patterns in those cities."

ABC World News (12/4, story 7, 2:35, Crawford-Greenburg, 8.78M) reported "the justices "grappled with a key question: Can officials turn children away from their neighborhood schools because they're the wrong color? Swing justice Anthony Kennedy, whose vote could determine the outcome of the case, called the school plans 'troubling.' He suggested schools could find better ways to integrate." NBC Nightly News (12/4, story 6, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported "the court's majority seems prepared to rule that assigning students by race is unconstitutional, no matter what the motive."

The CBS Evening News (12/4, story 7, 0:45, Andrews, 7.66M) reported "the schools say this use of race is justified to maintain diversity and that if the court rules against them, the inevitable result will be segregated schools. Expect a ruling next spring."

McClatchy (12/5, Henderson) reports Kennedy "was joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts, Justice Antonin Scalia and Justice Samuel Alito in his criticism of the school plans. Justice Clarence Thomas, a longtime critic of race-conscious policies, typically doesn't speak during oral arguments but is widely expected to object to the plans." The New York Times (12/5, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports "lawyers for the school systems found themselves struggling, under the justices' questioning, to meet the even more basic challenge of explaining why the plans should be seen as something different from the intentional segregation that the court struck down in Brown v. Board of Education."

The Legal Times (12/5, Mauro) reports, "During two hours of oral argument, Justice Anthony Kennedy, whose vote may determine the outcome of the case, seemed deeply skeptical of the constitutionality of using race as a factor, especially in a school district that has already been declared 'unitary' and ended efforts to desegregate. … 'If we, for the first time, say that a system that has achieved unitary status ... can turn around and use individual skin color. ... We've never said that,' Kennedy exclaimed at one point. 'That takes us on a very perilous course.'" The Times adds, "A ruling against the use of race could have a broad impact in school districts nationwide that use a variety of race-conscious methods to cure racial imbalances caused by housing patterns. Civil rights leaders who were among the spectators packing the courtroom Monday were pessimistic afterward. … 'If they are inclined to view these voluntary measures in the same light as segregation and any use of race is constitutionally suspect, then God help us,' said Ted Shaw, director and counsel of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund. 'I'm not going to predict defeat, but it's an uphill fight after what we heard today.'"

The Washington Post (12/5, A3, Barnes, 690K) says the discussion "seemed to reflect a court majority highly skeptical of the proposition that the benefits of racially diverse public schools can justify any restriction on an individual's constitutional right to equal protection." The decision "is likely to be one of the most defining of the court headed by the new chief justice, John G. Roberts Jr., and a powerful statement about where the nation stands more than 50 years after Brown v. Board of Education demanded an end to segregated schools." The court, "encouraged by the Bush administration, has grown increasingly distrustful of racial classifications, and it reached out to take up the cases challenging schools in Seattle and Louisville even though appeals courts had upheld them as constitutional." The Washington Times (12/5, Fagan, 88K) runs a similar story this morning, while the Los Angeles Times (12/5, Savage, 850K) titles its report "Court Appears Likely To Bar School 'Racial Balancing.'"

The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A2, Bravin, 2.04M) reports, "The court's four more liberal members suggested that US society still bears the legacy of the nation's history of racial discrimination and that school officials should be free to craft enrollment policies to promote diversity. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg observed that in 1975, Louisville officials had been forced to accept a desegregation plan, but after the court order was lifted, decided 'it's worked rather well, so we'll keep it.' How can 'what's constitutionally required one day' be 'constitutionally prohibited the next day?' she said. 'That's very odd.'"

The Washington Post (12/5, A3, Alexander, 690K) reports "demonstrators from as far as California, along with students from Washington area high schools and universities, braved the breezy, 40-degree weather and gathered on the court steps as early as Sunday night to protest a case that the demonstrators said could reinstitute school segregation. Then, holding signs saying 'Fight for Equality' and chanting 'by any means necessary,' they marched down Independence Avenue for a rally at the Lincoln Memorial. … On the steps of the memorial, student leaders defended affirmative action policies in public schools and demanded school improvements. Three busloads of students from the District's Ballou Senior High School called for better facilities."

The AP (12/5, Sherman) reports, "Demonstrators in favor of racial preferences and bearing 'Fight For Equality' placards descended on the Supreme Court Monday as justices prepared to hear fresh arguments in cases testing when race may be used as a basis for assigning students to public schools." The AP continues, "The cases could produce the most important decisions on school integration in the U.S. in decades. … Parents in two cities are challenging school assignment plans that factor in a student's race in an effort to have individual school populations approximate the racial makeup of the entire system. Federal appeals courts have upheld both programs." The AP adds, "On the sidewalk in front of the Supreme Court, hundreds of demonstrators marched to dramatize their issue. A parent-teachers group from Chicago and several civil rights groups were among those sponsoring the demonstration. … Demonstrators chanted 'Equal education, not segregation' and 'We won't go to the back of the bus, integration is a must.' Some held signs that read 'Stop racism now.'"

More Commentary. Douglas W. Kmiec, professor of constitutional law, Pepperdine University and "constitutional legal counsel to Presidents Reagan and George H. W. Bush," writes in USA Today (12/5, 14A, 2.27M) that in Seattle, "when a student declines to disclose racial ancestry, the schools use 'visual inspection.' Admission by skin pigment is not academic diversity." Kmiec adds, "It is speculated that the usually collegial, and often unanimous, court led by Chief Justice John Roberts might divide sharply on this one. It shouldn't. The moral authority asserted by Earl Warren to banish race stands foursquare behind his young, articulate successor. The way to end racial discrimination is to stop discriminating by race -- not to invite and embed the practice in the decision-making of thousands of schools."

In an editorial, USA Today (12/5, 14A, 2.27M) disagrees, saying, "In 2000, white enrollment at predominantly non-white Franklin High School was 25%; by 2005 it was down to 10%. Without the plan, Seattle's schools have gone backwards. The high court shouldn't lead a charge to ensure similar results around the nation."

Federal Jury Convicts Truck Driver In Immigrant Smuggling Deaths. The AP (12/5, Lozano) reports, "Now that a jury has convicted a truck driver for his role in the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt, his defense attorneys said they are focused on one thing: sparing him a death sentence." The AP continues, "The federal jury convicted Tyrone Williams on Monday of all 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting he faced for ferrying illegal immigrants during a May 2003 smuggling attempt from South Texas to Houston. … His airtight tractor-trailer was packed with more than 70 immigrants who punched out taillights and screamed for help when the heat inside the tomblike trailer became deadly. Nineteen of the immigrants died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation." The AP adds, "On the 20 death penalty eligible counts Williams faced in his retrial, the new jury found that his actions resulted in the death of a person, sending the trial to a punishment phase. That phase is set to begin Wednesday and last about a week. … Jurors will decide whether Williams should be sentenced to death or up to life in prison." The AP notes, "Prosecutors say Williams merits a death sentence because he was responsible for the deaths by not freeing the immigrants or turning on the trailer's air conditioning, which could have saved their lives. Some survivors testified they thought the air conditioning had been turned on. … Prosecutors declined comment on the verdict, but during a court hearing after the jury's decision was read, said they would be presenting 25 to 26 witnesses during the punishment phase and concentrating on how the crime was committed."

The CBS Evening News (12/4, story 8, 0:35, Couric) reported, "I'm Lee Cowan in Texas where the verdict is in one of the deadliest known smuggling cases in US history. More than 70 illegal immigrants from Honduras and Mexico were crammed into this unventilated semi truck three years ago and left to bake in the hot Texas sun. Nineteen of them suffocated in temperatures that soared above 170 degrees. The driver, Tyrone Williams, had unhitch it had trailer and left it there. Today, a Federal jury in Houston convicted Williams of 58 counts of smuggling, some of which carry the death penalty. If Williams is sentenced to death, he becomes the first foreign face execution in connection with the smuggling of illegal immigrants."

The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Hart) reports, "Williams stared ahead and showed no emotion when the verdict was read, but later hugged his lawyer, Craig Washington, before being led away by U.S. marshals. … 'I'm deeply disappointed,' Washington said outside the courtroom." The Times adds, "Prosecutors declined to comment on the verdict, but told U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal that they expect to call about 25 witnesses during the sentencing trial."

The New York Times (12/5, Blumenthal) reports, "In a retrial of the nation's deadliest human trafficking case, the federal jury that convicted the driver, Tyrone M. Williams, 35, of Schenectady, N.Y., begins hearing testimony Wednesday on whether to give Mr. Williams the first death sentence under a 12-year-old 'alien smuggling' statute or a lesser term of up to life in prison." The Times adds, "Mr. Williams, a legal immigrant from Jamaica, sat impassively through 58 recitations of 'guilty' as the verdict form was read, then embraced his lawyer, Craig A. Washington. Asked afterward how his client had taken the news, Mr. Washington, a former Texas congressman, said, 'Better than me.' … Mr. Washington, whose trial defense conceded Mr. Williams's role as a smuggler but challenged his awareness of the victims' suffering, said he planned to put on about 20 witnesses to testify about mitigating factors in Mr. Williams's history." The Times notes, "The lead prosecutor, Daniel C. Rodriguez, an assistant United States attorney who had painted Mr. Williams as 'vile and heartless,' declined to comment until the punishment phase was concluded."

Juror In First Trial Says Williams Was Not Alone In Guilt. The Houston Chronicle (12/5, Rice) reports, "One of the jurors in Tyrone Williams' first trial, which ended with a hung jury in March 2005, said he held out to spare the truck driver from a death sentence because he believed others shared responsibility for the deaths of 19 illegal immigrants. … 'I couldn't see them giving the death sentence to one person,' said Horace Rains, 79, a merchant seaman who lives in east Harris County." The Chronicle continues, "Rains says he and a woman , whose name he could not recall, kept the 2005 jury from reaching a unanimous verdict. His revelation was made possible by U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal's decision to lift a gag order issued by the judge who presided over Williams' first trial. … U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore gave an oral order to jurors at the end of the first trial not to speak with the news media or attorneys after they were discharged. … Gilmore lifted a written gag order in May this year after the case was transferred to Rosenthal, but not the oral order to jurors. The Houston Chronicle asked Rosenthal to lift the oral order and provide a list of jurors because reporters were prevented from interviewing them after the trial."

Prosecutors Question Two Shot By New York Police. The New York Times (12/5, Baker, Rashbaum) reports, "Prosecutors from the Queens district attorney's office conducted bedside hospital interviews yesterday with the two men wounded in a hail of 50 police bullets that claimed the life of Sean Bell, the first time investigators have heard from any direct participants in the Nov. 25 shooting, a lawyer for the two men said." The Times continues, "In separate interviews, the two men, Trent Benefield, 23, and Joseph Guzman, 31, told prosecutors what their lawyers have been saying publicly for days about the shooting, according to the lawyer, Sanford A. Rubenstein. … The two said that only they and Mr. Bell, who was 23, were in or near the car when the shooting erupted — contradicting accounts from some officers involved that a fourth man was with the group and may have been armed." The Times adds, "Mr. Benefield and Mr. Guzman also said that the five police officers who opened fire on them did not identify themselves and that they had no idea that they were facing the police, Mr. Rubenstein said. He was one of three lawyers present as a team of assistant district attorneys and members of the district attorney's staff questioned the men in their rooms at Mary Immaculate Hospital. … Richard A. Brown, the Queens district attorney, is gathering facts about the case, which he has said will go before a grand jury." The Times notes, "For days, the Police Department has been seeking a fourth man who officers and a civilian witness quoted by the police say was wearing a beige jacket and who law enforcement officials believe may have been with Mr. Bell, Mr. Benefield and Mr. Guzman. … One of the detectives who fired, according to a person briefed on his version of events, said the fourth man was in Mr. Bell's car. The civilian witness, who looked down from an apartment window after she heard gunshots, described seeing a man in a beige jacket fleeing the scene, the police said."

Florida Mayor, Police Say Some Rushing To Judgment In Shooting. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (12/5, Johnson, 237K) reports, "Standing on the steps of City Hall on Monday," Fort Lauderdale Mayor Jim Naugle "and police union called the actions of some elected officials and the NAACP 'irresponsible' and 'reckless' after the fourth fatal shooting by Fort Lauderdale police this year. The community has rushed to condemn officers Robert Norvis and Todd Hill before the investigation into the Nov. 28 shooting is finished, said Jack Lokeinsky, president of the Fort Lauderdale Fraternal Order of Police. … 'Judge incidents after all the facts are ascertained and not before,' Lokeinsky said Monday with a diverse crowd of more than 75 officers standing behind him. … 'The posturing of some in the community trying to stir things up, to me, is really wrong,' Naugle said of Commissioner Carlton Moore and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People." The Sun-Sentinel notes, "The FBI has begun a civil rights investigation."

Atlanta Officials, Residents Discuss Police Shootings. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/5, Haines) reports, "Civil rights leaders, clergy and city officials met Monday with residents of a northwest Atlanta neighborhood to discuss how to ease tensions between them and police after officers serving a warrant killed an elderly woman at her home. Many in the audience had questions for Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington, who said he was committed to a thorough investigation into the Nov. 21 fatal shooting of Kathryn Johnston. … Pennington said he was not able to comment on specifics of the case, which has been turned over to the FBI and Georgia Bureau of Investigation." The AP notes that the NAACP, "which hosted the meeting, has called for the establishment of a civilian review board with the power to subpoena witnesses and a return to community policing."

Activists Reportedly Urging Black Chairmen To Pursue Slavery Reparations. The New York Times (12/5, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports, "The impending Democratic takeover of Congress will elevate more blacks to positions of power in the Capitol than ever: 4 major House committee chairmen, as many as 16 subcommittee chairmen, the third-ranking House Democratic leader and a senator considered a credible candidate for his party's presidential nomination." The Times adds, "It is so much power" that Rep. Charles Rangel, set to become chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, "said he hesitated to speak about it publicly. 'I don't want to scare the hell out of people,' Mr. Rangel said, 'that blacks are now in charge of the committees and so, therefore, watch out.'" According to the Times, the NAACP and the Congressional Black Caucus "say they expect their newly powerful champions…to push a long-stalled agenda that includes hearings or a commission on reparations for slavery, guaranteeing voting rights for convicted felons, prohibiting racial profiling by police or customs officers, restricting gun sales, and sharply increasing the compensation paid to people displaced by Hurricane Katrina."

Lesbian Fire Chief Under Fire In Minneapolis. The New York Times (12/5, Saulny) reports, "Two years ago, when Bonnie Bleskachek was named fire chief in Minneapolis, it made news far beyond Minnesota because she was the first openly lesbian firefighter to achieve that rank in the professional fire service of a major city. .. .Hailed as a pioneer, Chief Bleskachek was showered with praise for her years of hard work. Perhaps no one was more pleased with the appointment than Mayor R. T. Rybak, a supporter of gay rights who made the promotion a media event." The Times continues, "But last Wednesday, it became clear that everything had changed. Citing a lack of confidence in Chief Bleskachek's management style, Mr. Rybak asked the City Council to fire her. … The move was made after suits were filed against the city and Chief Bleskachek that accused her of playing sexual politics, retaliating against a former partner, acting as a lustful predator and showing bias against at least one heterosexual male firefighter. … 'All of that information has been presented to us in great detail,' Mr. Rybak said. 'I have to be honest. I very much wanted Bonnie Bleskachek to succeed.'" The Times adds, "Chief Bleskachek says that she did succeed and that is precisely why she is entangled in such a case. … 'Being an out lesbian, which the mayor really wanted to push, the first openly lesbian fire chief, made me an easy target,' she said. 'The sharks smelled blood in the water.' … John A. Klassen, an employment lawyer representing the plaintiffs in three of the four suits against Chief Bleskachek, rejected that argument. … 'None of these cases are antilesbian,' Mr. Klassen said. 'These cases are about discrimination.' … The suits, including one by a former partner of Chief Bleskachek, depict a firehouse culture where lesbians and their allies enjoyed favors and people who crossed them risked punishment."

The Washington Post (12/5, A3, Lydersen) reports, "Last week, city officials were briefed on an investigation being conducted by a local law firm into Bleskachek's performance as chief. After the briefing, Mayor R.T. Rybak announced that a proposed deal that would have given Bleskachek severance pay and demoted her within the department is off the table. Instead, the city may move to fire her from the force, pending the completion of the investigation. … Bleskachek, 43, is furious that the city has settled the lawsuits rather than taking them to trial, where she could have told her side of the story. … 'They have no evidence at all; this is all based on conjecture and hurt feelings,' she said, in her home in a pleasant, modest south Minneapolis neighborhood." The Post notes, "There is no doubt the Fire Department is rife with personal dramas and romantic entanglements. One of the lawsuits against Bleskachek was filed by Jennifer Cornell, 35, the chief's ex-partner of six years, who shares custody of their two children. Another suit was brought by Kathleen Mullen, 43, a longtime friend who had dated Bleskachek's current girlfriend. … A third complaint is from a woman who says Bleskachek flirted with her and then punished her professionally after she declined the advances. Bleskachek counters that the firefighter, Kristina Lemon, was the one who professed attraction to her a decade ago and that she became angry when Bleskachek disciplined her last year for a physical altercation with another firefighter in a burning building."

Maryland Court Hears Arguments On Gay Marriage. The Washington Post (12/5, B1, Rich, 690K) reports, "An attorney for 19 gay and lesbian Maryland residents urged the state's highest court yesterday to strike down a law banning same-sex marriage, saying there is 'no constitutionally sufficient justification' for denying his clients and their children protections that only marriage affords. During an hour-long argument in a crowded chamber of the Court of Appeals in Annapolis, attorney Kenneth Y. Choe of the American Civil Liberties Union invoked the civil rights struggle and said the ability to marry is a fundamental right that belongs to all Marylanders, not only to those for whom that right has always been recognized." On behalf of the state, Assistant Attorney General Robert A. Zarnoch "urged the court to let stand the statute that defines marriage as the union of a man and a woman. Arguing that the judiciary should defer to the legislature, Zarnoch noted that no federal or state appellate court in the country has held that, as the plaintiffs argue, there is a fundamental right to same-sex marriage." The New York Times/AP (12/5) and Washington Times (12/5, Ward, 88K) also report the story.

Federal Panel Deadlocked On Proposal To Require Paper Ballots. The New York Times/AP (12/5) reports, "A federal advisory panel rejected a recommendation on Monday that states use just voting machines whose results could be independently verified. The panel, drafting guidelines for the United States Election Assistance Commission, deadlocked, 6 to 6, on a proposal that would have required electronic machines to produce paper records or other independent means of checking results. Eight votes were needed to pass the recommendation."

The Washington Post (12/5, B6, Barr, 690K) reports committee member Brit Williams, "a computer scientist who has conducted certification evaluations of Georgia's paperless electronic voting system, opposed the measure. 'You are talking about basically a reinstallation of the entire voting system hardware,' he said."

Utah Approves Redistricting Plan To Add Fourth House Seat. The New York Times (12/5, Johnson, 1.16M) reports, "The State of Utah and the District of Columbia are perhaps the oddest imaginable political allies in a nation of polarized partisan loyalties, alike in few things other than bankable predictability: Washington Democratic, Utah Republican." But they "share outrage that each does not have more influence in Congress, and Utah took a big step toward a marriage of convenience Monday when legislators here approved a plan that would give the state a fourth Congressional seat before the next census and Washington its first voting representation ever." The state was "denied a fourth seat after the 2000 census because the government did not count thousands of residents who were away serving as missionaries for the Mormon Church." The plan "faces big hurdles," but the "gulf of political difference between the state and the District is the very glue that offers both of them some hope Congress will give its required approval: one of the newly created seats would almost certainly be Democratic, the other Republican, with no net change in the balance of power."

The Washington Times (12/5, Emerling, 88K) reports Washington, DC officials "cheered the Utah Legislature's approval of a redistricting map that is key to the District's voting rights bill, saying the development brings city residents one step closer to having a vote in the House." Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty, "who met with House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi last week and discussed the bill's prospects, said that Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, told him she would move aggressively for the bill." Fenty said, "I remain optimistic that the bill will move this week. And if it doesn't, I'm hopeful it will be at the top of the legislative agenda in 2007." The Times adds the "chances of the measure making it out of the House Judiciary Committee and through both chambers of the Republican-controlled Congress before lawmakers adjourn this month are shrinking. The bill was not on the House floor schedule issued last week, although bills can be added to the docket."

WPost Says Congress Shouldn't Delay Vote On DC, Utah House Seat Bill. The Washington Post (12/5, A28, 690K) says in an editorial, "The people of the District of Columbia shouldn't have to wait another minute, let alone another month, to get the full voting representation in government that is their due as Americans. A bill to give the District a vote in the House of Representatives is pending, but for reasons that are as unclear as they are unacceptable, it may not be brought to a vote. Instead of idly watching the hours tick down in the final days of a generally useless legislative year, the 109th Congress should muster the political will to right a 200-year-old wrong."

Fetal Pain Bill Seen As Test of Democrats' "Evolving" Stance On Abortion. The Washington Post (12/5, A5, Weisman, 690K) reports Republicans House leaders "plan to bring up a bill tomorrow that would declare that fetuses feel pain and require abortion providers to offer pregnant patients anesthesia for their unborn child." According to the Post, the vote "may be the last on abortion-related legislation for years. That's because Democratic leaders hope to avoid confrontations over hot-button social issues that divide their caucus." Democrats "are shying from the fight. Party leaders in the House have declared tomorrow's decision 'a vote of conscience' and will not try to sway the outcome." House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi "does not plan to speak on the bill, a rarity for her." The Post adds that conservatives "see an opportunity to test Democrats' evolving position on abortion, a position that has become more amenable to incremental curbs on ending pregnancies and more vocal about reducing the number of abortions."

Poll Shows 65% Of Hispanics Favor English As Official US Language. The Washington Times (12/5, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside The Beltway" column that Rob Toonkel, "director of communications for U.S. English Inc., called our attention yesterday to a new Zogby International poll finding that 65 percent of Hispanics favor making English the official language of the United States. He says the results of the poll of 903 Hispanic adults 'challenges the long-standing claim that Hispanics generally oppose official-English measures.'"

FCC Head Tries To Break Telecom Deadlock. USA Today (12/5, Davidson) reports, "Moving to break a deadlock over approval of AT&T's purchase of BellSouth, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission said he will ask a recused commissioner to cast the tie-breaking vote." USA continues, For nearly two months, the FCC has been split 2-2 along party lines, with Democrats Jonathan Adelstein and Michel Copps pressing for tough conditions on the $80 billion deal, which would create the nation's largest phone company. … The impasse has forced three postponements of votes on the merger and talks broke down again Friday over Democrats' demands for non-discrimination assurances for AT&T's broadband traffic and reduced wholesale prices." USA adds, "In a letter to congressional leaders Friday, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, who favors no conditions on the deal, said he will ask fellow Republican Robert McDowell to break the stalemate. … McDowell disqualified himself because he previously worked as a lobbyist for a trade group that opposed the deal. Martin told lawmakers a recused commissioner may be authorized to vote if the government's interests outweigh any ethical concerns. He said he has asked the FCC general counsel to determine if McDowell may vote. … Enlisting McDowell could 'spark various ethical/legal complaints' and a political ruckus with leaders in the new Democratic-controlled Congress, Stifel Nicolaus analyst Blair Levin said in a report." USA notes, "The FCC hopes to clear the deal at its Dec. 20 meeting, before the new Congress takes over in January. Levin predicted McDowell would 'seek some sort of compromise' but would lean toward Martin's view."

Telecom Merger Judge Riled By "Rubber Stamp" Inference. The Deal (12/5, Lindell) reports, "Fireworks in a Washington, D.C., courtroom don't necessarily signal bad news for two telecommunications mergers under review by a federal judge, but they may portend a battle over merger law." The Deal continues, "On Nov. 30, District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan heard the latest round of arguments in his review of the mergers between Verizon Communications Inc. and MCI Inc., and SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp., which the Department of Justice approved in 2005. … Sullivan, months into a congressionally mandated review of the merger, was taken aback when Verizon's lawyer bluntly suggested the judge had little power to unwind the deals. … 'This merger is not going to be unscrambled by anything this court does,' senior Verizon lawyer John Thorne told Sullivan." The Deal adds, "The startled judge -- who has repeatedly said he intends to conduct an independent review and 'won't be a rubber stamp' for the government -- nearly came off the bench. Leaning forward, he glared at Thorne and asked the Verizon attorney to explain his opinion of the judge's authority and the importance of the Tunney Act proceeding. … Thorne, who is well-versed in antitrust law, replied, 'If a transaction is largely good, it should close.'" The Deal notes, "Sullivan's irritation aside, Thorne's view of restricted judicial authority is shared by many antitrust experts. … Thorne concluded that anti-competitive issues posed by a merger, which in this case resulted in the telecoms being ordered to let competitors lease lines into some 700 buildings in about a dozen markets, can be dealt with after a deal closes through the Tunney Act process. … Continuing to glare at Thorne, Sullivan said, 'Maybe Congress should make it clear that mergers couldn't close until there has been judicial review,' he said. … As Thorne finally sat down, Sullivan said, 'I'm going to do an independent review and we'll see where the merger stands at that point.' … Despite Sullivan's tough words, other antitrust experts say the judge, in fact, has little power to rewrite the Justice Department's two merger approvals. … In merger cases where DOJ predicts anti-competitive harm and negotiates divestitures or other remedies with the merging parties to resolve the problems, the agency must submit any remedies for approval by a federal judge. The Tunney Act, a law enacted in the 1970s and amended in 2004, mandates that process."

Kentucky Lawmaker Seeks DOJ Review Of Delta-US Airways Merger. The Louisville (KY) Business First (12/5) reports, "Kentucky congressman Geoff Davis is encouraging the U.S. Attorney General and Transportation Secretary to conduct a 'full and careful review' of US Airways' efforts to merge with Delta Air Lines." Business First continues, "In letters dated Dec. 1, Davis told both Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Transportation Secretary Mary Peters that he is 'very concerned about the significant loss of competition and the likely impact on air fares this merger could create. … The tremendous overlap of the route networks of these carriers would cause significant consolidation, reducing flight choices and increasing already expensive fares for our consumers,' he wrote. 'This potential merger affects thousands of jobs, and Delta/Comair has an economic impact for our region in the billions.'" Business First adds, "Atlanta-based Delta operates its second-largest hub at the Cincinnati/Northern Kentucky International Airport in Hebron, Ky. That hub, which also contains the headquarters of Comair, Delta's regional carrier subsidiary, employs an estimated 10,000 people and has an economic impact of nearly $4 billion, according to a news release issued Monday by Davis, a Boone County Republican representing Kentucky's Fourth District. … 'We feel that Delta and its employees, through extraordinary sacrifice and hard work, are making tremendous progress on their restructuring plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a strong and independent carrier,' Davis wrote to Peters and Gonzales. 'The interests of all may be best served by ensuring they remain on this course.'"

Mercury News Cuts Layoffs After Bargaining Session. The AP (12/5, Konrad) reports, "After a 20-hour bargaining session ended Monday morning, the San Jose Mercury News and its union reached a tentative agreement on a two-year contract that reduced the number of workers to be laid off." The AP continues, "The 263,000-circulation daily newspaper will eliminate 27.5 full-time positions, down from the 69 positions originally slated to be cut. … The paper, which employs 490 members of the San Jose Newspaper Guild, guaranteed it would not lay off more union workers through June. Managers will notify employees of the layoffs by Tuesday morning." The AP adds, "Laid off workers may receive two weeks pay for every year of service, up to 10 weeks of salary, and two months of paid health care. … The reduction in layoffs was welcome news among reporters, photographers and other editorial workers, who wore black Monday to show solidarity with soon-departed colleagues." The AP notes, "MediaNews Group Inc., the nation's fourth-largest newspaper publisher, acquired the Mercury News, the Monterey County Herald and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Co. earlier this year in a complex deal valued at $1 billion. MediaNews also owns the Oakland Tribune and seven other Bay Area newspapers. … The Mercury News was previously owned by Knight Ridder, the nation's second largest newspaper publisher, which put itself up for sale late last year under pressure from shareholders unhappy with a sagging stock price. The slump reflected investors' souring sentiments about traditional media as the Internet siphons away advertising revenue. … Late last month, a federal judge issued a temporary restraining order on the San Francisco Chronicle, whose parent company, Hearst Corp., appeared interested in collaborating with MediaNews on local distribution and national advertising sales. U.S. District Judge Susan Illston said such a deal would possibly violate antitrust laws."

Plaintiffs In Iowa Microsoft Trial Will Not Call Gates, Ballmer. The AP (12/5, Pitt) reports, "The attorney representing plaintiffs in one of the few state-level class-action antitrust lawsuits left against Microsoft announced today that she would not call Chairman Bill Gates and CEO Steve Ballmer as witnesses." The AP continues, "Roxanne Conlin won a judge's ruling prior to the trial that would have forced Gates and Ballmer to travel to Des Moines for direct questioning even though the two executives were expected to testify later in the case when Microsoft presents its defense." The AP adds, "Judge Scott Rosenberg's ruling indicated that Gates and Ballmer would be required to travel to Des Moines from Washington only once. That would have allowed Microsoft attorneys to question the two men directly — in effect presenting part of their defense in the middle of the plaintiffs' case. … Conlin released a statement today that said the decision was reached to avoid any potential confusion by jurors. … 'I am concerned such a disruption of our case may create unnecessary confusion for the jurors,' Conlin said. 'There is absolutely no reason to have such a disruption in light of the defense's promise to call Bill Gates as a witness.'" The AP notes, "The Iowa lawsuit claims Microsoft violated Iowa's competition laws and seeks about $330 million for Iowans who have purchased the software maker's products since 1994."

Bank Of New York To Acquire Mellon Financial For $16.5 Billion. USA Today (12/5, 9B, Krantz) reports, "Bank of New York said Monday it will buy Mellon Financial for $16.5 billion in stock, creating an investor service behemoth and one of the world's largest asset managers." USA continues, "The combined company, to be called Bank of New York Mellon, will rank first worldwide with $16.6 trillion of assets under custody, says globalcustody.net (custody services distribute cash and dividends held in trust on behalf of the trust owners). It will be in the top 10 of the world's largest asset managers, overseeing more than $1.1 trillion of assets, says David George, analyst at A.G. Edwards. … 'This deal does make sense,' says Eric Fitzwater at bank industry research firm SNL Financial." USA adds, "Investors seemed to agree. Shares of Bank of New York gained $4.27 to $39.75, and Mellon gained $2.73 to $42.78. Investors were so pleased because the expectations for the merger are 'reasonable and realistic,' says Gerard Cassidy, analyst at RBC Capital Markets. … The new combined company will put major pressure on smaller firms to combine so they can compete, Cassidy says. … As large as the Bank of New York's buy of Mellon is, it's just the latest in a frenzied year for financial M&A. The deal is the industry's second-largest this year and 12th-largest ever, Thomson Financial says."

The Wall Street Journal (12/5, C1, Riley) reports, "If the $16.5 billion stock deal is approved by regulators and shareholders, that business now would have a new leader: The combined Bank of New York Mellon Corp. would have $16.6 trillion in assets under custody -- overseeing trade processing, internal accounting, fund administration and other such services for hedge funds, retirement plans, mutual funds and government entities. That figure would catapult the company ahead of J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., which oversees about $12.9 trillion under custody." The Journal adds, "Hedge funds and institutional investors, including governments in emerging markets, are making a larger number of often-complicated investments across multiple asset classes in many countries, sometimes simultaneously through several trading strategies. … The complexity of dealing with varied regulations, currency conversions and accounting differences world-wide is forcing many asset managers, which once serviced their own trades, to outsource the work to larger and better-equipped financial institutions with global reach."

The New York Times (12/5, Edmonston) reports, "For Bank of New York, the deal will bolster its position as a leader in the securities servicing and processing business, which provides the backbone of the world's stock and bond markets. Earlier this year, Bank of New York nearly doubled the size of its corporate trust business, which handles record-keeping for debt issues, by agreeing to swap many of its retail branches for J.P. Morgan Chase's corporate trust unit." The Times adds, "While the deal ends a longstanding rivalry for both companies, it will bring together institutions whose heritage is tied to two titans of American business history. Mellon was founded more than a century ago by Judge Thomas Mellon, who handed over the business to his son Andrew; the Bank of New York was founded by Alexander Hamilton in 1784. … When the deal is completed, Bank of New York's shareholders will own 63 percent of the stock in the combined company, with Mellon's shareholders owning the remainder. Under the terms of the deal, Bank of New York's shareholders will receive 0.9434 shares of the combined company for each their current shares. Mellon's shareholders will exchange their stock on a one-for-one basis."

The Washington Post/AP (12/5, D3, Powell) reports, "The companies, in announcing the deal, said it would result in the elimination of about 3,900 jobs, or nearly 10 percent of their combined work force of about 40,000. The reductions would be made through normal attrition 'wherever possible,' the companies said in a statement. … The deal was approved by each company's board of directors but requires approval by regulators and shareholders."

LSI Logic To Purchase Agere. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A3, Clark) reports, "LSI Logic Corp. agreed to buy Agere Systems Inc. for stock valued at about $3.45 billion, placing a big bet on the market for chips used in data storage and networking." The Journal continues, "The purchase agreement announced yesterday is the largest in the 25-year history of LSI. The Silicon Valley company pioneered the market for chips that companies customize for specific chores." The Journal adds, "Abhi Talwalkar, a former Intel Corp. executive who became LSI's chief executive in May 2005, has narrowed the company's broad range of products to focus on chips for managing disk drives and communications between computers and data-storage systems. LSI chips also are used in consumer-electronic products. … Agere, of Allentown, Pa., traces its lineage to Bell Laboratories, the one-time research arm of AT&T Corp. that invented the transistor. Lucent Technologies Inc., which inherited those operations, spun Agere off in 2000. Agere also sells data-storage chips, as well as chips used in networking devices and cellphones."

Founding Family Seeks $4.7 Billion Buyout Of Station Casinos. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A2, Sanders) reports, "A management-led $4.7 billion buyout offer for Station Casinos Inc. represents a way for the company's founding family to tighten its hold on Station at a time when competition is intensifying for Las Vegas residents, its core customers." The Journal continues, "Station received an $82-per-share offer from a group led by Chairman and Chief Executive Frank Fertitta III; his brother, President Lorenzo Fertitta; and Colony Capital LLC. The Fertittas already own about 20% of Station, a Las Vegas-based company that owns and operates 16 so-called locals casinos aimed largely at suburban Las Vegas residents. The offer also calls for the assumption of more than $3.4 billion in Station debt." The Journal adds, "Speculation about a buyout of Station has circulated for weeks, and yesterday the offer sent the shares up more than 22%, ending the day at $84.90 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. That is $2.90 higher than the offer price, suggesting that investors expect a higher offer before a deal is reached. … Any deal for Station will likely be closely scrutinized because of management's involvement. Station says it appointed a special committee of independent directors to review the proposal. … The move comes as Station is facing tough competitive issues. Last month, the company lowered its fourth-quarter and 2007 earnings estimates. Station reported net income of $161.9 million in 2005 on revenue of $1.1 billion. It faces competition from Boyd Gaming Corp. and others angling for gamblers who live in Las Vegas, as opposed to tourists. … It also comes amid a wave of interest in casino-industry buyouts. Gambling giant Harrah's Entertainment Inc. Oct. 2 received an $81-per-share offer from private equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group. That offer was quickly raised to $83.50 per share, according to people close to the situation, valuing the company at $15.5 billion."

Reckson Rejects Icahn Bid As Shareholders Mull Merger With Green Realty. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A9, Forsyth) reports, "Reckson Associates Realty Corp. has rejected a late bid from financier Carl Icahn and will hold a shareholder vote tomorrow seeking approval for its planned merger with SL Green Realty Corp." The Journal continues, "Reckson's board issued a statement late last night saying that Mr. Icahn's cash-and-stock offer 'does not meet the standard set forth in the SL Green merger agreement to permit discussions or negotiations' with American Real Estate Partners LP, which is 90%-owned by Mr. Icahn." The Journal adds, "On Monday, Mr. Icahn faxed a letter to the independent board of Reckson, offering $1 billion in cash and $3.3 billion in a new class of stock in American Real Estate Partners, traded on the New York Stock Exchange. The proposal was considerably altered from his planned all-cash bid of $49 a share because he lost his two partners over the weekend. … The board's rejection of Mr. Icahn's proposal, by a vote of its independent directors last night, came even before Mr. Icahn issued his official bid, which he had said he would provide today to Reckson, a Uniondale, N.Y., real-estate investment trust. … The development is a victory for SL Green, of New York, another REIT, whose efforts to acquire Reckson hit a kink on Nov. 16 when Mr. Icahn and his then-partner, New York real-estate developer Harry Macklowe, jumped in with a surprise proposal."

Gold Kist Accepts Takeover Bid By Pilgrim's Pride. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, C4, Gibson) reports, "Gold Kist Inc.'s agreement to be acquired by Pilgrim's Pride Corp. for a sweetened $21-a-share bid ended a four-month standoff in a deal that would create the world's largest chicken processor." The Journal continues, "Assuming the proposed transaction is completed, the combined company would leapfrog industry leader Tyson Foods Inc. as the largest processor of chicken. Tyson, which also processes beef and pork, would remain the world's largest meat company, with more than three times the annual sales." The Journal adds, "The $1.1 billion offer was approved by Gold Kist's board Sunday after a weekend of negotiations over price. The accord came three days after the announcement that 67% of Gold Kist shareholders had tendered their stock despite repeated urgings from management that it was preferable to remain independent. … In what Pilgrim's Pride executives called a 'cordial' meeting in Dallas on Saturday and Sunday, Pilgrim's Pride sweetened its initial $20-a-share bid by $1, Gold Kist agreed to a takeover and Pilgrim's Pride was allowed to look at Gold Kist's nonpublic documents for the first time since it launched its unsolicited offer in August."

EU To Probe Car Battery Firm Merger. The AP (12/5) reports, "The European Union launched an antitrust investigation Monday into plans by German car battery maker VB Autobatterie to buy the car battery business of Italy's FIAMM group." The AP continues, "An initial review revealed 'serious competition concerns,' EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said in a statement. … Under EU rules, she has until April 23 to reach a final finding. … 'When the largest producer of automotive starter batteries (in Europe) wants to acquire the third-largest manufacturer in an already highly concentrated market, the Commission must ensure that this would not adversely affect consumers,' Kroes said." The AP adds, "VB and FIAMM make and market batteries for makers of cars, trucks and commercial vehicles as well as car parts and repair services. VB is a joint venture of Johnson Controls Inc. of Milwaukee and the German Robert Bosch GmbH, Europe's leading supplier of car starter batteries. .. .If VB buys FIAMM's battery business, the number of European suppliers would drop from three to two. Kroes said she also would examine any impact of the acquisition on the 'independent aftermarket,' which covers sales of replacement batteries."

US Urges 9th Circuit Panel To Stop Water Seepage To Mexico. The AP (12/5, Kravets) reports, "The Bush administration urged a federal appeals court Monday to allow a section of a major canal separating California and Mexico to be lined with cement to stop millions of gallons of water from seeping south of the border each year." The AP continues, "The 82-mile-long All-American Canal, which gets life from the Colorado River, in part nourishes crops on both sides of the border about 100 miles east of San Diego along the Calexico-Mexicali border - where the lining is proposed. The U.S. government says Mexico already gets 489 billion gallons of Colorado River water legitimately each year under a 1944 treaty and isn't entitled to the seepage, which provides a farming lifeline in Mexico." The AP adds, "A Justice Department attorney, John Smeltzer, told a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that Mexicans have no right to the water, which is also the lifeblood for 500,000 acres of U.S. farmland. … The lining project will provide enough annual water for 135,000 new homes in the San Diego area." The APnotes, "All three judges suggested while hearing oral arguments in the case Monday that people in Mexico might not have legal standing to assert a claim for the water in U.S. courts. … The San Francisco-based appeals court temporarily blocked the $210 million, 23-mile-long lining construction project in August after Mexican business interests and U.S. environmental groups sued."

House To Vote On Senate Version Of Offshore Drilling Bill. The Washington Post (12/5, A4, Mufson, Eilperin, 690K) reports the House "is scheduled to vote today on a Senate plan for offshore oil and gas drilling…that falls far short of an offshore drilling bill the House adopted earlier this year. House Democratic leaders have decided not to take a position on the bill in order to avoid having to choose between different constituencies within the party's own ranks. Environmental groups oppose the drilling measure; the Sierra Club issued a statement saying that 'it's time for Congress to stop appeasing Big Oil' and that 'drilling is a bad deal for Americans.'" However, "many" Democrats "support wider drilling to increase domestic natural gas supplies. And Louisiana Democrats avidly support the Senate bill because it would divert 37.5 percent of federal royalties to Gulf states for coastal restoration projects."

Religious Land Use Law Strains Some Municipalities. The Christian Science Monitor (12/5, Green, 59K) reports in Orlando, Florida, "about a dozen churches are within a few miles of one another, and more are under construction. Neighbors venturing out for bagels and other errands find themselves stuck in traffic, heads bowed not in faith but frustration. Some complain that the traffic persists all week, as religious, youth, sports, and other activities draw crowds after work and school." While communities "traditionally zone against houses of ill-repute, not houses of worship, frustrations have grown since 2000, when then-President Clinton signed the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act." The law "doesn't exempt churches from zoning regulations, per se. But when religious groups say the rules would create 'a substantial burden,' officials must show a compelling reason for the limits. Sometimes, the results leave neighborhoods feeling helpless in the face of ecclesiastical development." For their part, religious leaders "say they are responding to growth in their communities by providing needed services. Growth among houses of worship - particularly megachurches - poses a delicate quandary for local leaders. In smaller communities, too many churches - because of their tax-exempt status - can even strain the economy."

Panel Says Administration Sought To Stymie Nuclear Worker Payouts. Under the headline, "Administration Tried To Cut Payouts To Nuke Workers," USA Today (12/5, Eisler, 2.27M) reports, "The Bush administration repeatedly sought ways to limit payouts to nuclear weapons workers sickened by radiation and toxic material, according to a memo written by congressional investigators and obtained by USA Today. The investigation focuses on a federal program created in 2000 to compensate people with" illnesses "tied to their work at government and contractor-owned" nuclear weapons production facilities. USA Today adds that since 2002, "'there is a continuous stream of (administration) communications … strategizing on minimizing payouts,' according to the Nov. 30 memo by staff for the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Border Security and Claims," for outgoing Chairman John Hostettler, R-Ind."

Tight Uranium Fuel Supplies Could Hamper Plans For New US Nuclear Reactors. Under the headline, "Nuclear Power Revival Could Encounter Hurdles; Tight Uranium Supplies, Scarce Processing Facilities May Hurt Bush Energy Plan," the Wall Street Journal (12/5, A4, Fialka, 2.04M) reports on the Bush administration's planned nuclear "renaissance" that faces "tightening world-wide supplies of uranium and a lack of enrichment facilities to turn the uranium into fuel for power plants." The Journal adds that "the 'Ad Hoc Utility Group,' an industry collective that represents 85% of the utilities involved in producing nuclear power is nervous about securing adequate fuel supplies for nuclear power plants over the next 10 years," and is "lobbying

the administration to allow Russia to sell enriched fuel directly to US utilities." But that plan "is opposed by USEC Inc., the Bethesda, Md., company that acts as the US agent for Russian enriched fuel under a 1993 agreement," fearing that "it could interfere with its plans to finance and build a new enrichment plant in the US."

Inhofe To Hold Hearing On Media Coverage Of Global Warming. The Washington Times (12/5, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Sen. James M. Inhofe, chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, "will hold a full committee hearing tomorrow on 'Climate Change and the Media.'" The hearing will "look at how the media has presented scientific evidence regarding predictions of human-caused catastrophic global warming, the senator's office said." Committee Communications Director Marc Morano said, "Senator Inhofe believes that poorly conceived policy decisions will result from the media's nonstop hyping of 'extreme scenarios' and dire climate predictions. This hearing will serve to advance the interests of sound science and encourage rational policy decisions."

Renewable Energy Boom Takes Toll On Forests. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A1, Barta, Spencer, 2.04M) reports, "Investors are pouring billions of dollars into 'renewable' energy sources such as ethanol, biodiesel and solar power that promise to reduce the world's reliance on petroleum. But exploiting these alternatives may produce unintended environmental and economic consequences that offset the expected benefits." In Borneo, "forest fires that have blazed across the island. Many of them were set to clear land to produce palm oil -- a key ingredient in biodiesel, a clean-burning diesel fuel alternative." The "miasma of smoke from Borneo and the island of Sumatra -- an annual phenomenon that blankets large parts of Southeast Asia in smog -- underscores a troubling dark side of the world's alternative-energy boom. Among other problems, the fires in Indonesia spew millions of tons of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases into the atmosphere, experts say." And these "side effects are not an isolated problem. In Indonesia, Malaysia, Canada and elsewhere, forests are being slashed for new energy-yielding crops or other unconventional fuels."

NYTimes Praises Bodman For Agreement On Efficiency Standards. The New York Times (12/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "It seemed to take forever, but the Bush administration has finally agreed to a strict timetable for establishing new energy efficiency standards for nearly two dozen commercial and residential appliances over the next five years. The agreement is good news for the environment." It is "a tribute to the persistence of 15 states, the Natural Resources Defense Council and various consumer groups that sued the Energy Department for failing to comply with longstanding Congressional mandates." The Times writes, "The benefits are obvious, and Samuel Bodman, in his second year as secretary of energy, is to be commended for recognizing them."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Audit Finds $56 Million Shortfall In FBI Computer Database Funding. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/5, Jordan) reports, "The FBI faces a $56.7 million funding gap as it builds a new computer system to replace a problem-riddled database of investigation files, Justice Department auditors said Monday. With careful oversight, the Sentinel program still could be successful, auditors from the department's inspector general's office concluded." The AP notes, "The FBI asked for an estimated $150 million in the fiscal year that began Oct. 1; the White House approved spending $100 million. … Although the FBI expects to have about $50 million left over from earlier work on Sentinel and other bureau projects, auditors warned that pulling money from other programs 'may have an adverse affect on the FBI's mission capabilities,' the auditors said. Responding, the FBI in a statement said the money needed 'has long been identified from existing FBI balances, and will not impact operational programs.'"

The Washington Post (12/5, A27, Eggen, 690K) also notes the audit "said that a current White House budget request includes only $100 million for Sentinel in fiscal 2007, although the FBI says it needs $57 million more to keep it going." The Post adds that the audit "also says the FBI has made 'significant progress' in several key areas, including improving management controls and finding ways to ensure that the software will work as intended. Fine made five specific recommendations to overcome various problems. FBI officials said they agreed with the ideas and had begun implementing them."

The New York Times (12/5, Lichtblau, 1.16M) reports, "Democrats said they planned to press Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the F.B.I., about the computer project when he appears before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Wednesday." Incoming Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy said yesterday, "After watching the F.B.I. waste five years and more than 170 million of taxpayer dollars on the Trilogy program, I remain seriously concerned about the handling of this project. The American people cannot afford another fiasco."

Government Executive (12/4, Pulliam) reported, "The FBI has made 'significant progress' in addressing many initial concerns about the development of the case management system dubbed Sentinel, the Justice Department inspector general's office stated in the audit. For instance, the FBI has made strides in staffing the project's program management office," however, "uncertainty about funding and cost estimates, and deficient contingency planning, must be addressed if the law enforcement agency is to avoid delays and other problems…auditors said." GE also notes that Mueller is scheduled to testify tomorrow and adds, "The IG recommended that the FBI update the project's estimated total cost as actual cost data becomes available, develop contingency plans for identified risks to the project and fill all vacancies in the program management office. In a response to the report, the FBI agreed with all of the IG's recommendations."

FBI Seen As Falling Short In Counter-Terrorism Efforts. NBC Nightly News (12/4, story 4, Williams, 9.87M) asked, "How much progress has the FBI really made since the attacks on 9/11? In an exclusive interview and in never-before released tapes, FBI officials reveal what critics say is a stunning lack of knowledge about terrorism and terrorist threats." NBC (Myers) added, "Bassem Youssef is the FBI's highest-ranking Arab American agent, a terrorism expert and one of only six agents with advanced Arabic skills." Youssef: "I don't believe that the FBI's doing everything it can to combat terrorism." Myers: "Youssef believes the FBI has sidelined him, denying him a significant role in the war on terror. He claims discrimination and is now suing the bureau." NBC aired unflattering excerpts of FBI officials' testimony in 2004 deposition videotapes for the Youssef lawsuit, then showed NBC analyst Michael Sheehan saying, "Not knowing these basic tenets is symptomatic of a lack of deep knowledge about your principle adversary and that is unacceptable." Myers: "An FBI spokesman now concedes that expertise does matter and says today's leaders have it." John Miller: "To have that depth of subject matter expertise and the executive and leadership skills is certainly a plus, and I think over time we've developed that at the top." Myers: "Some agents privately grumble that Youssef has an inflated sense of his own talents. … For now Youssef has a desk job. A far cry from terrorism's front lines."

Under FBI Probe, Mollohan Set To Take Reins Of Spending Subcommittee. Bloomberg (12/5, Faler, Forsythe) reports, "Representative Alan Mollohan, a West Virginia Democrat whose finances are being investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, is in line to take over the House panel that sets the bureau's budget." Bloomberg continues, "Mollohan, 63, is the ranking Democrat on the appropriations subcommittee overseeing the Department of Justice, which includes the FBI. His party has a long-standing practice of awarding appropriations subcommittee chairmanships to senior members, and no other Democrat has announced plans to seek the post when the party assumes control of Congress next month." Bloomberg adds, "The pending appointment poses an ethical dilemma for incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, 66, who helped her party take control of Congress for the first time in 12 years by vowing to clean up a 'culture of corruption' on Capitol Hill. … 'If the Democrats want to be taken seriously as the party of ethics reform, then every time one of their members gets into trouble, they're going to have to take it seriously,' said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. Her organization is urging Mollohan to recuse himself from any decisions affecting the FBI's budget." Bloomberg notes, "Earlier this year, the National Legal and Policy Center, a Falls Church, Virginia-based group that backs smaller government, filed a complaint with the department questioning an increase in Mollohan's net worth. For 2005, Mollohan and his wife reported assets worth $6.8 million to $25.7 million, up from $116,000 to $315,000 in 1999, when he restated financial disclosure forms after the group's complaint. … In May, Mollohan told the Washington Post that the FBI had subpoenaed a Washington-based real-estate company in which he had invested. In April, a nonprofit group set up under Mollohan's leadership, the Vandalia Heritage Foundation, said in a statement that it had been told by the FBI to expect a request for information."

Former Connecticut Town Official Pleads Guilty To Cocaine Charges. The AP (12/5) reports, "A former member of the Bridgeport Democratic Town Committee pleaded guilty Monday to federal cocaine charges, avoiding a trial that could have put pressure on Mayor John Fabrizi to testify. Shawn Fardy, 36, convicted of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute, and distribution of cocaine, admitted buying cocaine from drug dealer Juan Marrero and then distributing some of that to others and keeping some for his own use." The AP notes, "Fardy's attorney, Francis O'Reilly, has said prosecutors were relying on allegations that Fabrizi made against Fardy. Fabrizi met with the FBI at least twice and gave lengthy interviews that are contained in FBI reports, O'Reilly said. Prosecutors have declined to comment on whether Fabrizi would be a government witness, but his name was among 41 people whose names may be mentioned during the trial or who may testify."

Florida Attorney Admits Helping Drug Dealer Conceal Transactions. The Palm Beach Post (12/5) reports criminal defense attorney John Garcia "pleaded guilty Monday to federal charges of helping a drug dealer and former client conceal financial transactions and lying about it to drug enforcement agents. Garcia was arrested in September and charged with three counts of illegal money structuring and one count of making false statements to federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents." Garcia "deposited $9,000 in…drug profits into his personal account, which was used for [a] home. The scenario was repeated in September 2003, the government said."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (12/4, Diaz) reported Garcia "admitted to depositing $18,000 into his personal checking account -- once in 2002 and again in 2003 -- and $28,000 into his law firm's trust account to help [his client] Joel McDermott buy a five-bedroom, $630,000 home in the Olympia community in Wellington. Garcia purchased Bank of America cashier's checks for McDermott, who's serving a 21-year federal prison sentence."

Supreme Court Upholds 55-Year Sentence For Gun Possession During Marijuana Deals. The AP (12/4) reports the Supreme Court on Monday "let stand a mandatory 55-year prison sentence, condemned as excessive by the federal judge who imposed it, for a man convicted of carrying a handgun during three marijuana deals. Record producer Weldon Angelos received the minimum sentence under the law -- a harsher sentence than a child rapist or a terrorist who detonates a bomb aboard an aircraft would receive, according to his attorneys. … Angelos was convicted of 16 counts of violating federal firearms, drug and money laundering laws in 2003. The charges stemmed from his sale of three 8-ounce bags of marijuana to an undercover informant."

Pentagon Said To Resist Appeals To Help Combat Afghanistan's Opium Trade. The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Meyer) reports the Pentagon, "engaged in a difficult fight to defeat a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, has resisted entreaties from U.S. anti-narcotics officials to play an aggressive role in the faltering campaign to curb the country's opium trade. Military units in Afghanistan largely overlook drug bazaars, rebuff some requests to take U.S. drug agents on raids and do little to counter the organized crime syndicates shipping the drug to Europe, Asia and, increasingly, the United States, according to officials and documents." While the Pentagon and DEA "have been at odds, poppy cultivation has exploded, increasing by more than half this year. … The DEA's advocates in Congress argue that the Pentagon could undermine the insurgency by combating the drugs that help finance it. Military officials say they can spare no resources from the task of fighting the Taliban and its allies."

Walters Links Rising Opium Production To Taliban, Limited Funds. Asia News (12/4) reported opium production in Afghanistan "reached record highs this year despite international efforts to strangle it. This was recently revealed by the US government, in confirmation of a report by the UN Office on Drugs and Crime and the World Bank. In 2006, production is estimated to have grown by 61% after a 26% increase in 2005, for a total product of around 5,600 tons. … John Walters, White House drug policy chief, said the main causes for the failure to eradicate production were the resurgence of Taliban forces, which oppose US operations, and limited funds available for anti-narcotic and development programs."

Poorly Trained Police Force Linked To "Explosion" In Opium. The New York Times (12/4, Glanz, Rohde) say a joint report by the Pentagon and the State Department "has found that the American-trained police force in Afghanistan is largely incapable of carrying out routine law enforcement work. … The training experts say the United States made some of the same mistakes in training police forces in Afghanistan that it made in Iraq, including offering far too little field training, tracking equipment poorly and relying on private contractors for the actual training. … In Afghanistan, the failure has contributed to the explosion in opium production, government corruption and the resurgence of the Taliban."

NYTimes Ties Ineffective Police Force To Rise In Opium Production. In an editorial, the New York Times (12/5) writes, "The failure to provide local security — or even a semblance of impartial justice — helps explain why so many Afghans have lost confidence in the pro-Western government of President Hamid Karzai, and why a growing number are again turning to the Taliban for protection. The failure to stand up an effective police force also helps explain why opium cultivation rose by nearly 60 percent this year."

Think Tank Proposes Painkiller Licensing To Thwart Drug Trafficking. For UPI (12/5), Pyotr Goncharov in Moscow writes, "Perhaps, it is worth considering a proposal made by the Senlis Council, an international drug policy think tank based in Europe. It believes that Western countries should officially buy opium poppy from Afghanistan and then license it to produce painkillers. The Afghan state would benefit and establish at least partial control over the poppy fields. More importantly, this would be a severe blow to illegal drug trafficking."

Brother Of Colombia's Drug Czar Arrested On Cocaine Charge. The AP (12/4) reported Colombia's drug czar "said police arrested his brother over the weekend with six grams (0.2 ounces) of cocaine. Carlos Albornoz, head of the National Drug Directorate responsible for Colombia's drug-control policies, said in a news conference Sunday his brother Ivan Albornoz was arrested shortly after buying the drugs Saturday night in southern Bogota. … Albornoz said he was unaware of his brother's drug use and expected him to be treated with the same severity as any other Colombian citizen."

IMMIGRATION:

Wife Of Georgia State Senator Faces Deportation. The AP (12/5, Dell'Orto) reports Georgia state Sen. Curt Thompson "has been a strong advocate of immigration rights, once speaking in Spanish from the steps of the Georgia Capitol against the adoption of some of the nation's strictest immigration controls. Now Thompson's Colombia-born wife is in hiding as federal immigration officials try to deport her." Sascha Herrera, 28, "has been in hiding since Immigration and Customs Enforcement officers arrived at her home Nov. 28 with an order to remove her from the U.S. She was not home at the time." Herrera's attorney, Charles Kuck, "claims she was duped by a man handling her immigration requests and that she never received the immigration notices that triggered her deportation order. While Kuck says neither he nor her husband know where Herrera is, he said that she will turn herself in Tuesday."

Charity Linked To Minuteman Leader Fined For Financial Reporting Problems. The Washington Times (12/5, Seper, 88K) reports, "One of the charitable organizations cited by Minuteman Civil Defense Corps boss Chris Simcox on why financial accountability concerns raised by some corps members were unfounded has been fined for failing to keep its own financial records in order, The Washington Times has learned." The Declaration Foundation, "a tax-exempt charity created by conservative activist Alan Keyes, who has vigorously supported the Minuteman movement, was fined $6,500 in August and prohibited by the Pennsylvania Bureau of Charitable Organizations from soliciting donations until it becomes 'properly registered.'" The August 18 "'agreement and order,' signed by Declaration Foundation Executive Director Mary Parker Lewis, a top Minuteman adviser, acknowledged that the charity made false statements in seeking to solicit donations, failed to properly administer money it had collected, and withheld documents sought as part of an 'investigative subpoena.'" The Declaration Foundation is "at the center of an intricate weave of conservative organizations founded by Mr. Keyes or tied to longtime Keyes associates now working with MCDC. They have served as mentors for Mr. Simcox and provided consulting and financial services for the group's fundraising and media activities."

Congressional Democrats Expected To Struggle With Immigration Issues. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/4, Dobbs) reported, "The Democrats will likely try to push through a Bill granting a pathway to citizenship for millions of illegal aliens regardless of what the American public wants or says." CNN added, "Last year, amnesty provisions passed the Senate and failed in the House. Next year could look a lot like a rerun of this year. The vast majority of Americans are adamantly opposed to anything that resembles amnesty. Several political observers say if Democrats hope to retain the majority in 2008, they may have to reconsider their position on this issue." Also on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/4, Dobbs), New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson said, "What I would like to do is have a comprehensive [immigration] act that addresses…border security, that….makes sense out of a policy that is broken and needs fixing. And this is the way we need do deal with it, by a comprehensive effort."

TAX:

Judge Bars Maryland Man From Running Tax Scheme. The Baltimore Sun/AP (12/5) reports, "A Westminster (MD) man has been barred by a federal judge from running a scheme in which he promised to help members avoid paying federal taxes, the U.S. Department of Justice announced today." The AP continues, "The 'Save-A-Patriot Fellowship' run by John Baptist Kotmair Jr. falsely advised that clients didn't have to pay taxes and could legally withdraw from the Social Security system, U.S. District Judge William Nickerson said in his ruling. Despite legal action by the U.S. Justice Department, Kotmair's organization continued to file frivolous protest letters with the Internal Revenue Service on behalf of more than 800 clients and showed 'no inclination ... to cease their activities,' Nickerson noted." The AP adds, "Nickerson's order, issued last week, permanently bars Kotmair and his organization from representing or assisting anyone in corresponding with the IRS, or preparing court filings relating to income taxes. Kotmair and his organization must also notify all individuals involved in the scheme of the injunction and provide the Justice Department with the names of the customers, their e-mail addresses and telephone and Social Security numbers. … The injunction also must be posted prominently on the organization's Web sites for a year, and fraudulent promotional materials must be removed from the sites."

IRS Lacks Plan To Recover $200 Million In Fraudulent Tax Refunds. USA Today (12/5, McKoy, 2.27M) reports, "At least two months before the IRS mistakenly began paying an estimated $200 million in fraudulent or erroneous 2006 tax season refunds, the agency was warned about potentially "catastrophic" problems in a new computer being developed to avert such a blunder. A USA TODAY examination of the IRS Electronic Fraud Detection System project found the previously unpublicized November 2005 warning, along with other warnings and new details of missteps that culminated in one of the most costly and embarrassing episodes in the tax agency's recent history." USA Today adds, "As the peak of the 2006 tax season approached last spring, the IRS discovered that a planned upgrade of the agency computer that red-flags potentially fraudulent tax refunds had failed. The discovery came after the IRS had shut down the older computer. The failure forced the agency to continue processing 2006 tax season returns -- and issuing refunds -- without its first line of electronic defense against fraud." USA TODAY's review "found that the IRS lacks a comprehensive plan to recover the $200 million, which the agency said represents far less than 1% of all 2006 tax season refunds. That means most fraudulent filers who got federal checks in 2006 will likely never be caught."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bolton Resigns; Khalilzad Seen As Most Likely Replacement. UN Ambassador John Bolton announced his resignation Monday, in a move that is being largely portrayed as a White House defeat in the face of the Democratic opposition. The New York Times (12/5, A1, Cooper, 1.16M) reports that it is "not immediately clear" who would replace Bolton, but reportedly under consideration are Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, Undersecretary of State Burns, former UNCHR ambassador Richard S. Williamson, and Ohio Sen. Mike DeWine. But "how Mr. Bush chooses to fill those jobs could indicate which direction the administration will tilt during its last two years, administration officials and United Nations diplomats said." The Washington Post (12/5, A1, Baker, Kessler, 690K) says the White House's is "focusing on…Khalilzad" and "also has a crop of Republican lawmakers who lost reelection to consider. A number of senior ambassadors from around the world have expressed interest, but administration officials said Bolton's successor will be a political nominee." The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A3, McKinnon, Dreazen, 2.04M) also says that speculation has focused on Ambassador Khalilzad, but also includes Sudan special envoy Andrew Natsios, Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky, and retiring Iowa Rep. Jim Leach.

ABC World News (12/4, story 6, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Democrats, now in control of the Congress, promised to defeat the" Bolton nomination. NBC Nightly News (12/4, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) and the CBS Evening News (12/4, story 4, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) briefly noted Bolton's resignation in similar reports. CBS referred to Bolton as "the UN Ambassador who loved to bash the UN" and "a lightning rod for critics who compared his style to a bull in a China shop."

The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Farley, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports the "pugnacious" Bolton "is known for not giving up." But "after meeting with his mentor Vice President Dick Cheney on Thursday to discuss ways to stay at the UN without a Senate confirmation, he decided it was time to quit." The resignation "signals that the Bush administration is less willing, or less able, to go around Congress to push through an unpopular agenda."

On its front page, the Washington Post (12/5, A1, Baker, Kessler, 690K) says Bush "surrendered to congressional foes yesterday." According to the Post, "administration lawyers in recent weeks had developed options to keep him there after that appointment expires this month. But officials said Bolton and the White House decided against provoking an early confrontation with Democrats as they take over Congress next month." Bolton's resignation is seen as leaving "another hole in Bush's foreign policy team at a time when the U.N. ambassador is heavily involved in diplomacy involving the nuclear activities of Iran and North Korea and the ongoing crisis in Lebanon."

Similarly, the Financial Times (12/5, Daniel, Turner) says the White House "bowed to the political realities imposed by the new Democratic Congress" and notes that White House spokesman Tony Snow "admitted defeat" saying, it was "pretty obvious" Bolton wasn't going to get the votes from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. However, the Times says the White House was "reluctant to present it as a conciliatory move for Democrats," so instead Bush "blamed 'stubborn obstructionism,' while Snow said the 'appointments process is broken,' and charged that 'for reasons of partisanship a handful of senators prevented him remaining UN ambassador.'" Under the headline "Bolton's Exit May Signal A Shift to the Center," the Wall Street Journal (12/5, A3, McKinnon, Dreazen, 2.04M) says Bolton's departure "marked another concession by…Bush to the new political realities facing him, and likely pushes his administration more to the center as he heads into his final two years in office." Bolton's resignation suggests the Bush White House is "being forced into the center," said Danielle Pletka of the American Enterprise Institute. "This confirms an inevitable fact of political life, which is that administrations do drift" as they move into the home stretch, she added.

On its website, Time (12/5, Zagorin, 4.03M) says Bolton's departure "marks another acknowledgement by the White House of the political consequences of the Nov. 7 Congressional elections." Bush "could have put Bolton's name up for a new recess appointment when his current one expires in early January, but Bolton would have been prohibited by law from drawing a salary. More important, such an attempt by the White House to again override the Senate by sending Bolton back to the U.N. risked infuriating Democrats and undermining Bush's professed intention to seek consensus and political compromise."

The Washington Times (12/5, Dinan, 88K) says Bush is "giving in to the objections of Senate Democrats and one Republican a month after the White House pledged to push to confirm him." Bolton's departure "will leave Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice with three major vacancies to fill. Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, the department's second-in-command, left for Wall Street in July, and Philip Zelikow, the department counselor and a top confidant of the secretary, announced last month he plans to return to his teaching job at the University of Virginia in January."

DOJ_NMG_0102099

The New York Times (12/5, Cooper, 1.16M) notes Bush issued a "strongly worded statement excoriating" Bolton's opponents on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, saying "they chose to obstruct his confirmation, even though he enjoys majority support in the Senate, and even though their tactics will disrupt our diplomatic work at a sensitive and important time." However, the Times says that "despite the president's strong words, administration officials had largely given up" on Bolton's confirmation last month. His resignation "brings to an end the stormy and controversial tenure of an ambassador whose confrontational style often conflicted with the understated ways of the United Nations," the Times writes. In a second report, the New York Times (12/5, Hoge, 1.16M) says the announcement was "greeted by United Nations officials with relief, while diplomats from other nations offered mixed assessments of his effectiveness during his 17 months as the American envoy."

In an interview with Fox News' Special Report (12/4, Hume), Bush said Bolton "chose to leave gracefully…because it became apparent that once again, the Senate would block his nomination. I am very disappointed. Look, John Bolton came into office…with a lot of unfair criticism and he proved the critics wrong. He did a fine job. … On issue after issue, Bolton delivered. You are looking at a man who is deeply disappointed in what I would call shallow politics of the Senate. I truly believe the Senate denied a really accomplished person the opportunity to serve."

The AP (12/5, Ben Feller) says the "setback for the White House seemed to put a hold on the post-election talk of bipartisanship" as Bush delivered "stinging" words to congressional members who "helped scuttle his nomination." Democrats, however, said Bolton's resignation signaled a fresh start. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said, "Hopefully this change marks a shift from the failed go-it-alone strategies that have left America less safe." Similarly, Sen. John Kerry said, "With the Middle East on the verge of chaos and the nuclear threats from Iran and North Korea increasing, we need a United Nations ambassador who has the full support of Congress and can help rally the international community to tackle the serious threats we face."

The Pawtucket Times (12/5, Baron) reports, "Chafee's opposition to Bolton as a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee 'was what made it not happen,' said Chafee spokesman Steven Hourahan. 'Without his vote in committee, it wasn't going to go.'" Hourahan "said Chafee was 'very comfortable' with his decision to effectively remove Bolton as ambassador. He said it was 'clear that the American people sent a message,' in the November election that they were unhappy with Bolton's confrontational style and the Bush administration's foreign policy." In a written statement issued Monday, Chafee said, "I have long believed that the go-it-alone philosophy that has driven this administration's approach to international relations has damaged our leadership position in the world. Mr. Bolton did not demonstrate the kind of collaborative approach that I believe will be called for if we are to restore the United States' position as the strongest country in a peaceful world."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/5, Grier, 59K) reports, "Critics claimed that Bolton's brusqueness made him counterproductive. At the UN, he alienated US allies, both real and potential, according to his critics. Many Senate Democrats -- and a few Republicans -- charged that his hard-line ideology and penchant for confrontation was at odds with the UN's multilateral nature." But Bolton's "defenders insist that he has done well at the UN headquarters in New York, pushing through tough Security Council resolutions on North Korea's nuclear activities, building consensus among allies on the need for Iran to suspend its enrichment of uranium, and pressing for peace in Darfur."

More Commentary. The New York Times (12/5, 1.16M) editorializes, "Bolton's decision to resign as America's envoy to the United Nations was a wise move. He averted a distracting and divisive fight at a time when both Congress and the Bush administration have better things to do. He has also provided President Bush with an opportunity to show the kind of bipartisan leadership he talks about so frequently and exercises so seldom. ... Mr. Bolton's withdrawal gives the president a chance to improve his relationship with both the U.N. and Congress."

The Wall Street Journal (12/5, 2.04M) editorializes, "Yesterday's announcement that Mr. Bolton will resign as US Ambassador to the United Nations when his recess appointment ends with this Congress was no doubt cheered in Tehran, Damascus, Caracas, Pyongyang, and Christopher Dodd's Senate office. ... More important, he has stood forcefully for American interests despite the leaks and sniping from the office of Secretary General Kofi Annan. ... And it does not speak well for the American political system that it can't find a place in government at this dangerous moment in history for one of the world's leading anti-proliferation experts. The decision by newly ascendant Democrats -- Mr. Dodd in particular -- to deny Mr. Bolton a confirmation vote on the Senate floor shows that they value partisan animosity above having a seasoned negotiator at the UN."

Gates Expected To Win Confirmation Easily. Time (12/5, Waller, 4.03M) reports on its website DOD nominee Robert Gates "is expected to have little trouble winning Senate approval. Even Democrats who have had issues with Gates in the past are anxious to begin course corrections in the Pentagon's troubled Iraq war strategy. And means the hearings will most likely be a far cry from the last ones Gates faced — when George Herbert Walker Bush picked Gates to be CIA director in 1991." Time notes Senate Democrats "appear willing to let bygones be bygones. One of the senators who voted against Gates in 1991 was Carl Levin, who takes over as Armed Services Committee chairman next year. 'Fifteen years have passed since that vote,' Levin says. 'I'm going to want to consider what his record has been since then — his thinking and writing since then. And I'm going to give it a fair and fresh look.'"

LATimes Urges Senators To Press Gates On Intelligence Matters. The Los Angeles Times (12/5, 850K), in an editorial, writes Gates "is a shoo-in. But senators should nevertheless use his confirmation hearings, slated to begin today, to put Gates on notice that he will have to reestablish the trust of Congress and the American people about whether to believe what the military — and other agencies — say about intelligence matters. Allegations that Gates has in the past edited intelligence to suit his political superiors are certainly disturbing. … But the point of these hearings is not to rehash Gates' past. It is to establish what he has learned from his mistakes and how he intends to prevent the Pentagon from repeating them."

Pelosi Plans To Fast-Track Miller's Minimum Wage Bill. USA Today/AP (12/5, 6A) reports Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "wants to fast-track efforts to boost the federal minimum wage and could seek to bring a bill directly to the House floor in January. … Pelosi's preference is for a 'stand alone' minimum-wage bill that is not tied to other legislative endeavors. The bill probably will go straight to the floor for consideration, bypassing the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, said Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly, lobbyists and others involved in the process." According to USA Today the bill "is likely to call for a phased-in increase in the current federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour along the lines of a proposal written by Rep. George Miller."

Kennedy Legislation Would Require Companies To Provide Paid Sick Days. The New York Times (12/5, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports that "women's organizations" and "liberal groups" are "gearing up for a fight" over paid sick days. The Times notes Sen. Edward Kennedy "introduced a bill last year to require companies with at least 15 employees to provide seven paid sick days a year, but that bill languished in the Republican-led Congress. Now that Democrats have won control of Congress, Mr. Kennedy, the incoming chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, is more optimistic. 'It has a wildfire of support across the country,' he said. 'When you talk to workers, this is, besides an increase in the minimum wage, the most important issue for these families. This is a families issue. This is a values issue.'"

Liberal Groups To Target 86 Districts In Push For Democratic Agenda. The Hill (12/5, Hearn) reports Change America Now, "a coalition of 40 liberal groups set to push the House Democrats' economic agenda, is targeting 86 districts around the country for press events and possibly television advertising, according to a list obtained by The Hill." The groups "will focus their efforts on 54 Republican and 32 Democratic districts, most represented by moderates, hoping to build support for four parts of the Democrats' '100 Hours' agenda: raising the minimum wage, allowing Medicare to negotiate drug prices with pharmaceutical companies, cutting student-loan interest rates and repealing tax breaks for oil companies."

Democrats Counseled To Pursue Moderate Agenda. New York Times' guest columnist Thomas Edsall (12/5, Edsall) writes, "In this election campaign, the Democratic leadership offered pallid, nonspecific policy initiatives — in the House, a 'bipartisan solution to strengthen Social Security,' and in the Senate, a call to 'work together to strengthen Social Security and Medicare.' Nonetheless, buried in a morass of campaign-season evasion were the outlines of a potentially salable political program. … As the party struggles to forge a working majority, it must strike a delicate balance, argue Jason Bordoff and colleagues at the Brookings Institution's Hamilton Project. Allocating excessive economic risk to individuals can harm economic growth as well as family well-being, they note. Conversely, 'poorly designed programs to protect against risks can distort economic incentives and impair overall economic performance.' For the Democrats to thread this needle will take a steady hand."

Democrats Picking Most Committee Chairs This Week. The Hill (12/5, Hearn) reports House Democratic leaders "hope to have nearly all their committee chairmen named by week's end, a House Democratic leadership aide said yesterday." According to The Hill, "only the Veterans Affairs Committee is disputed."

Democrats Will Restructure Appropriations Committees. The Washington Times (12/5, Waterman, 88K) reports Democrats "will restructure the appropriations panels of both chambers, seeking to restore the alignment between the Senate and House subcommittees and ease a budgeting process that has failed for 12 years in a row to deliver spending bills on time." The Times notes Democrats "maintain that by eliminating two subcommittees on the House side, responsible for funding the legislative branch and the District of Columbia, and moving other elements of jurisdiction around among the remaining 10, Republicans made the complex job of reconciling the House and Senate versions of spending bills that much more complicated, because the two-chamber conferences doing the work had to involve lawmakers from as many as four different subcommittees."

GOP Portrayed As Unwilling To Pursue Its Agenda After Midterm Defeats. The AP (12/5, Abrams), in a highly contentious article, reports, "A Republican-led Congress criticized for producing little but political rancor is likely to end its term this week with at best a grade of 'Incomplete.' The House and Senate return Tuesday having already decided to dump an unfinished budget on next year's Democratic-controlled Congress. Passing grades are problematic for a host of other issues on lawmakers' plates." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "had originally talked of keeping the Senate working right up to Christmas, but motivation to stay in Washington was deflated by the Republican losses of both the House and Senate in the election." The Washington Post (12/5, A27, Murray, 690K), in an another article dismissive of the congressional GOP's accomplishments, reports, "A pile of unfinished business awaits the Republican-led Congress when it returns today, and a pile of unfinished business is likely to remain when lawmakers adjourn for the year, presumably on Friday. Lawmakers have all but given up on completing any of the nine remaining spending bills and will instead leave it to the new Democratic leaders to work out the new government spending levels when they take charge in January." The Post notes that Democrats "have lambasted the GOP Congress for months about its skimpy list of accomplishments this year."

Blunt And Cantor Meet To Diffuse Tensions Over Whip Race. The Hill (12/5, O'Connor) reports House Majority Whip Roy Blunt and Rep. Eric Cantor "met yesterday…to quell simmering tension between the two of them that boiled over during the recent leadership contest." The Hill continues, "The friction came to a head during the recent leadership races even though Cantor was assisting Blunt in turning back a challenge from Rep. John Shadegg. … During that campaign, some Republican members and staff frequently suggested that Cantor was the more popular candidate to perform the whip duties even though Blunt eventually beat Shadegg by a wide margin. A steady stream of stories and member comments fed that perception during the week and a half between the midterm election and the leadership race, creating tension between the two offices that was further fueled by inconsistent communication between the two staffs, the sources said. That tension erupted during a phone call between the Blunt and Cantor before the race itself when Blunt expressed concern that Cantor's staff had not gone far enough to discredit a story that members wanted to 'draft' the affable Virginian despite his commitment to build support for Blunt, aides said."

New Ethics Committee Must Decide Whether To Reauthorize Existing Probes. The Washington Times (12/5, Bellantoni, 88K) reports the House ethics panel "is unlikely to complete several of its investigations during the final month of the 109th Congress, so questions about the conduct of a handful of members will remain unresolved. … A new committee at the convening of the 110th Congress could vote to reauthorize or carry over the investigations, but panel members are not required to do so." The Times goes on to report that the committee has "at least" four active investigations, including those of Rep. William Jefferson and former Rep. Bob Ney.

Pelosi Criticized For Passing Over Hastings. USA Today's DeWayne Wickham (12/5, 15A) writes, "What Democrats did to Alcee Hastings is a case of political ethics being taken to an illogical extreme. The decision by Rep. Nancy Pelosi…not to make the Florida congressman chairman of the Intelligence Committee was a concession to political expediency, not good judgment."

Rangel, Tancredo Draw Criticism Over Regional Insults. USA Today (12/5, Copeland, 2.27M) reports, "The regional insult, a staple of trash-talking sports fans but rarely used these days by national politicians, is making a comeback." Rep. Charles Rangel "angered Mississippians when he asked last month, 'Who the hell wants to live in Mississippi?'" Last week, Rep. Tom Tancredo "said of Miami: 'You would never know you're in the United States of America. You would certainly say you're in a Third World country.'"

Medicare Drug Plan Changes Seen As Potentially Ensnaring Low-Income Seniors. The New York Times (12/5, Pear, 1.16M) reports that "advocates for older Americans" are "worried that tens of thousands of low-income Medicare beneficiaries will again have trouble getting medications next month, as they did in January of this year." The Times notes, "Many prescription drug plans are changing benefits. Beneficiaries are changing from one plan to another. New plans are entering the market. Some beneficiaries will find they can no longer use the drugstores they have been using. … About 600,000 poor people are losing the guarantee of extra assistance that covered nearly all their drug costs this year." Pharmacists "say they also foresee problems for another group: 300,000 low-income people who will be reassigned to plans chosen at random by the federal government. Even people who stay in the same plan may face surprises because some of their drugs may no longer be covered." Medicare officials "said they were trying hard to avoid a repetition of the problems that overwhelmed pharmacists 11 months ago. … 'Lessons have been learned,' said Kathleen M. Harrington, a spokeswoman for the Medicare agency."

Federal Officials Offer Estimating Tool To Counter "Doughnut Hole" Concerns. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, D3, Zhang, 2.04M) reports the federal government "is offering seniors a hand figuring out the infamous 'doughnut hole' -- the coverage gap in Medicare's prescription-drug benefit that many beneficiaries will encounter during the year. A new tool on Medicare's Web site, called a cost estimator, offers monthly and annual spending estimates based on the drugs seniors take and the pharmacy they use. Because it includes both the costs to seniors and to their plans -- the two factors that determine when the doughnut hole kicks in -- seniors can get at least a rough idea of when during the year they will reach the gap under each plan in their area."

Legislation Filed To Restructure Red Cross. The New York Times (12/5, Strom, 1.16M) reports, "Senator Charles E. Grassley filed legislation yesterday to overhaul the American Red Cross," marking "the first time in almost 60 years that Congress has moved to amend the organization's charter. The legislation, which has the organization's strong support, would cut the size of the Red Cross's national board by more than half, change the way board members are nominated and mandate the appointment of an independent ombudsman charged with reporting annually to Congress, among other steps." An expert panel commissioned by the Red Cross following "widespread criticism of its performance after Hurricane Katrina" filed a report suggesting "many changes that require legislative action because the Red Cross is governed by a Congressional charter."

NASA Announces Plans For Moon Base. The announcement of NASA's plans for moon exploration was covered in all major newspapers, and given front-page status in the New York Times and the Washington Post. All major stories emphasize that officials "declined" to discuss the price of the project. The New York Times (12/5, A1 Leary, 1.16M) reports in a front-page article, "NASA announced plans on Monday for a permanent base on the Moon, to be started soon after astronauts return there around 2020. The agency's deputy administrator, Shana Dale, said the United States would develop rockets and spacecraft to get people to the Moon and establish a rudimentary base. There, other countries and commercial enterprises could expand the outpost to develop scientific and other interests, Ms. Dale said." Dale and other officials said the base would be located in one of the moon's poles. "NASA gave no cost estimate for the program and no design details for the base. Ms. Dale said all plans assumed that the agency would continue operating from a fixed budget of about $17 billion a year."

The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Johnson, 850K) reports inside its "A" section, "Earth's first off-world colonists will cruise the surface in a lunar lander that will function like a low-gravity pickup, possibly journeying to the dark side to build the most ambitious collection of observatories ever constructed, NASA said." The report adds that NASA has "embarked on a $100-billion-plus program to design a new launch system and crew vehicle capable of carrying four astronauts to the lunar surface. To free up money, NASA will mothball the space shuttles by 2010. Until now, it was unclear what NASA had in mind for the moon."

The Washington Post (12/5, A01, Kaufman, 690K) reports in its front-page article, "NASA officials declined to put a price tag on what will clearly be an extremely expensive venture. But they said that with help from international partners and perhaps space businesses, the agency would have sufficient funds to undertake the plan without any dramatic infusion of new money. If the project goes ahead as planned, it would return humans to the moon for the first time since 1972. NASA Deputy Administrator Shana Dale said the agency met with hundreds of scientists, potential international partners and space businesses over the past year to discuss lunar options."

USA Today (12/5, 4A, Watson, 2.27M) reports, "Deputy NASA Administrator Shana Dale said the costs of building a moon colony would not require an increase in the NASA budget, currently $17 billion per year. Part of the money would come from the retirement of the space shuttle, planned for mid-2010, Dale said." NASA has said that the development of spacecraft for the first moon trip will cost $100 billion, but "skeptics, such as the Congressional Budget Office and the Government Accountability Office, have warned that NASA is unlikely to be able to mount such an ambitious effort with so little money. Already Griffin has cut NASA's funding of space science and aeronautics research to help pay for the moon program and the high costs of the space shuttle and the International Space Station."

Thomas Returns To Work After Leukemia Treatments. The Washington Times (12/5, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Sen. Craig Thomas "returned to work yesterday, about a month earlier than originally planned, after undergoing treatment for leukemia." Thomas, 73, "was released Saturday from Bethesda National Naval Medical Center. He began treatment for leukemia on Nov. 9. He had said previously he didn't expect to return to the Senate until January."

Laura Bush's Changes Of Outfits Before Kennedy Center Event Noted. The Washington Post (12/5, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports, "Can we just start the evening over? Come back out, do it all over again but this time, you know, differently? So it went at the Kennedy Center Honors on Sunday, not just for Jessica Simpson -- who broke down onstage over some imperceptible flaw in her tribute to Dolly Parton -- but also for Laura Bush, who mysteriously changed dresses right before the gala." It "turns out that earlier in the evening, the first lady walked into the super-exclusive White House reception for the honorees, wearing the exact same red Oscar de la Renta embroidered tulle jacket and floor-length trumpet skirt as three other party guests, including local philanthropist Vicki Sant." Press secretary Susan Whitson said, "Evidently Oscar is very popular this season." The Post adds the "first couple laughed about it. 'But she didn't want her guests to feel uncomfortable,' Whitson said, so FLOTUS dashed upstairs and slipped into a black lace gown before heading to the KenCen."

Bush, First Lady Entertain Children From Military Families. The AP (12/5) reports, "In a yearly tradition, President Bush and first lady Laura Bush welcomed their young guests to the East Room for a holiday performance. The kids all came from military families, and the president had a message for them. 'We wanted to welcome you here to the White House to, first of all, thank you for your strength — and so that you would do me a favor,' the president told the children. He asked them to send an e-mail to their parents stationed overseas to say 'how much the commander in chief respects them, admires them and supports them.'" The AP notes that when the president "went on stage to thank the performers after the show, the children headed the other way — following Santa Claus out of the room."

Webb's White House Incident Sparks Commentary. On Fox News' O'Reilly Factor (12/4) host Bill O'Reilly remarked on the recent incident involving Sen.-elect James Webb and President Bush at the White House. According to O'Reilly, "At a post-election White House reception, President Bush spotted senator-elect James Webb of Virginia and according to the Washington Post, the President asked about Webb's son, a marine corporal serving in Iraq. 'How's your boy,' said Mr. Bush. 'I'd like to get them out of Iraq,' answered Mr. Webb. 'That's not what I asked you,' the President replied. … Webb shot back: 'that's between me and my boy.'" O'Reilly noted that he has "invited Webb to talk it over, but he has not accepted," adding, "You made a mistake, Mr. Webb in not being gracious. Webb is not…an angry partisan, he's representing the commonwealth of Virginia and should know better. … Clear-thinking Americans realize that disrespecting people with who you disagree is now out of control. … My respect for Senator-elect Webb has declined. He was wrong and should admit it."

Former NBC anchor Tom Brokaw, was asked on MSNBC's Hardball (12/4) to comment on the Bush-Webb exchange. Brokaw noted Webb's son "was in a patrol recently and some of his friends were killed. I think it's very likely Mr. Webb was emotional at that point. I know he is anxious about his son's welfare and whether he will get home ok. Jim Webb is not a guy who disrespects the president as his commander-in-chief. He called him 'Mr. President' at the time. But in our system, we should have these kinds of exchanges and not just dance around protocol."

The Washington Post's Richard Cohen (12/5, A29) writes, "I am of two minds about what…Webb did. … It might have jarred Bush into appreciating the fact that many of his critics actually feel keenly about the war in Iraq -- that they are not mere political opponents but people who are morally appalled by a war that continues for no apparent reason. Maybe also the incident made him wonder about Webb, who, after all, hardly fits the demagogic antiwar stereotype constructed by Bush, Karl Rove and Fox News."

Government Study Faults VA's Mental Health Funding. USA Today (12/5, Zoroya, 2.27M) reports, "The Department of Veterans Affairs is too slow to spend the money it budgeted to treat the mental health needs of veterans, including those returning from Iraq and Afghanistan, according to a Congressional study released Monday." The Government Accountability Office report shows the VA "spent only $200 million" for mental health initiatives -- one hundred million less than it had budgeted in fiscal 2005-2006. USA Today adds, "The study also found that the VA had little or no way of tracking spending for new mental health initiatives during those two years, and that some of the money it spent might not have gone toward mental health programs." The VA "took issue with the findings," with VA spokesman Matt Burns saying, "Unfortunately, the GAO chose to look at the plan as an accounting exercise, focusing primarily on how many dollars are spent."

The AP (12/4, Gamboa) also reports the story, taking a markedly more critical tone in covering the GAO study. The story says Rep. Mike Michaud, ranking Democrat for a Veterans Health subcommittee Michaud, "thinks VA is overwhelmed," and concludes by noting, "Democrats have said they want to increase the department's oversight and get detailed budget accounting from the VA."

Islamic Group Wants Columnist Off Holocaust Council. The Washington Post/AP (12/4, C8, Frommer) reported the Council on American-Islamic Relations has called for the removal of columnist Dennis Prager from the US Holocaust Memorial Council for comments he made criticizing MN5 Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's (D) "decision to use the Quran during his ceremonial swearing-in next month." The council said Monday that Prager "displayed an intolerance toward Islam that makes him inappropriate to serve on the council, which oversees the US Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington." Prager said Monday that he and "the vast majority of Americans" would be satisfied if Ellison were to bring "a Bible with him along with his Quran."

USPS, Letter Carriers' Union To Take Differences To Arbitration. The Washington Post's (12/5, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "The US Postal Service and one of its largest unions, the National Association of Letter Carriers, have broken off contract talks and will take their differences to arbitration." The Union's president William H. Young, "said outsourcing was the main issue preventing an agreement," and in an "e-mail to union members," said the USPS "'has signaled its intention' to use contractors for 'existing city carrier work,' such as delivering mail to homes and businesses in the nation's metropolitan areas." The Post notes that "contract talks continue" with three other postal worker unions including "the American Postal Workers Union, the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association and the National Postal Mail Handlers Union." The Post notes that the "arbitration process typically takes six months or longer, and the rulings usually give unions some or much of what they sought at the negotiating table, according to Bush administration officials."

Labor Department Set To Offer Another Round Of Early Retirements. The Washington Post's (12/5, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "It's time for another round of early outs at the Labor Department. Labor, which has offered early retirement to employees eight times in the past 10 years, will offer the option next year, from Jan. 1 to Sept. 30." The Post notes that "employees are eligible for early outs if they have 25 years of service or have 20 years of service and are at least 50. Early outs can lead to reduced pensions for some employees, usually people under 55 covered by the Civil Service Retirement System."

WPost Urges Congress To Pass Trade Measures. The Washington Post (12/5, A28, 690K) editorializes, "It shouldn't matter whether you're conservative or liberal, for globalization or against: Some trade bills are so obviously beneficial and unobjectionable that there's no excuse for letting them languish. This is the case with a raft of measures that would extend trade preferences for poor countries -- preferences due to expire at the end of the year. Failing to renew them would not save American jobs or advance any other national interest; rather, it would disrupt the economies of US trading partners and create another excuse for foreigners to resent the United States. The lame-duck session of Congress provides a chance to avoid that outcome, but there's no guarantee members will act." The Post adds, "Four trade-preference measures are in jeopardy. The measures would prolong tariff concessions to Andean nations, allow African garments made with third-country fabrics into the US market, extend a similar concession to Haiti and renew the Generalized System of Preferences, which helps more than 100 countries. Passing these measures would not involve granting new market access; it would avoid closing the US market and triggering factory closures in partner countries." Meanwhile, Congress also "needs to ratify Vietnam's membership in the World Trade Organization."

Chicago Fed President Expects Continued Growth. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, Wisnefski, 2.04M) reports, "The president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago said Monday that the latest economic data, including numbers last week showing a contraction in the manufacturing sector, haven't changed his view of the economy." In an interview webcast on CNBC.com, Michael Moskow said, "Overall, I think the economy is solid. Moskow "pointed to productivity growth, low unemployment and strong demand from countries outside the US as factors that buoy the domestic economy." Moskow also "said that the Chicago Fed is expecting gross domestic product growth to be 'somewhat below trend,' citing a forecast for 2007 of a 2.8% expansion."

Stocks Surge Higher. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, C1, Browning, 2.04M) reports, "All it took was a couple of takeover announcements and a dip in oil futures, and stocks wiped out all of last week's losses. Although they already have pushed indexes to double-digit gains since July 14, investors still appear prepared to buy. After falling 86.04 points last week on disappointing economic news, the Dow Jones Industrial Average yesterday rebounded 89.72 points, or 0.74%, to finish at 12283.85. It is up 14.6% in 2006, less than 60 points from the record 12342.56 hit last month."

USA Today (12/5, 11B, 2.27M) says "the broad US stock market closed at a fresh 2006 high Monday as investors put aside Pfizer's decision to halt development of a key drug and focused instead on another series of takeover deals." The Standard & Poor's 500 index "rose 12.41 points, or 0.9%, at 1409.12, hitting a fresh six-year high. The Russell

Shortage Of Skilled Workers Threatens US Manufacturing Sector. USA Today (12/5, 1B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) reports "manufacturers, regardless of size, specialty or location, across the USA are reporting a dire shortage of skilled workers: people such as welders, electricians or machinists with a craft that goes beyond pushing buttons or stacking boxes but does not require a degree. That shortage is threatening their ability to meet current demand, let alone expand their businesses. The gap could threaten the viability of the U.S. manufacturing sector at a time when it is facing heavy competition from abroad." USA Today adds, "In a survey of 800 manufacturers conducted by the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM) last year, more than 80% said they were experiencing a shortage of skilled workers. In October, manufacturers surveyed by the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia said "finding qualified workers" was their biggest business problem." The shortage of skilled workers "is the result of a number of factors. One of the biggest is that manufacturing in the USA is becoming more high-tech and skill-based as the more repetitive, less-skilled work is moving abroad. … Plus, baby boomers with years of experience are retiring. And younger people are bypassing factory jobs, viewing them as repetitive, dirty and without much opportunity, a view that hasn't been helped by all the factory closings and headlines about manufacturing jobs moving to China."

USA Today (12/5, 3B, Carty, 2.27M) also runs a story on Wyoming, which "is seeing a boom in the energy, coal mining, high-tech data storage, communications and health care industries. The need for all kinds of workers, especially skilled ones, is so great that the state is actively recruiting from Michigan, were the situation is almost the exact opposite. For the past two years, as General Motors, then Ford Motor and now Chrysler Group have sounded the siren on their worsening financial situations, workers have lived under the daily stress of knowing their jobs could be eliminated at any moment. More than 70,000 hourly autoworkers have agreed to take buyout packages this year. … So, Wyoming officials thought, why not bring some of Michigan's displaced workers 1,000 miles west? … About 100 people have made the move so far, and 6,000 more Michiganians have posted résumés on Wyoming's jobs website."

More Americans Falling Behind On Mortgage Payments. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A1, Simon, Hagerty, 2.04M) reports, "Americans who have stretched themselves financially to buy a home or refinance a mortgage have been falling behind on their loan payments at an unexpectedly rapid pace. The surge in mortgage delinquencies in the past few months is squeezing lenders and unsettling investors world-wide in the $10 trillion U.S. mortgage market." The Journal adds, "The pain is most apparent in subprime mortgages, though there are signs it is spreading to other parts of the mortgage market. … Until the past year or so, delinquency rates were low by historical standards, thanks to low interest rates and rising home prices, which made it easy for borrowers to refinance or sell their homes if they ran into trouble. But as the housing market peaked and loan volume leveled off, some lenders responded by relaxing their lending standards. Now, the downside of that strategy is becoming more apparent. Based on current performance, 2006 is on track to be one of the worst ever for subprime loans, according to UBS AG."

After Democratic Gains In State, Sununu Could Face Tough Race. The Hill (12/5, Blake) reports that after Democrats won New Hampshire's two US House seats and flipped both chambers of its legislature in 2006, in 2008, Sen. John Sununu "could well be headed for a race worthy of what has become the biggest little state in American politics." Nearly a "quarter of the 400 seats in the state House flipped, and exactly one quarter of the 24 seats in the state Senate flipped. Democrats now control each chamber with a nearly 60 percent majority. Coupled with the reelection of Democratic Gov. John Lynch, these shifts give New Hampshire Democrats control of the state capitol for the first time in more than 130 years and a bright eye toward 2008 and, specifically, Sununu's seat." The "trick for Democrats is finding a candidate worthy of the race, and three potential challengers with valuable statewide experience appear unlikely to run." Perhaps the "strongest candidate, Lynch, was returned to office with a record 74 percent of the vote last month and doesn't plan to leave." Former state Sen. Burt Cohen (D), "who dropped a bid against Sen. Judd Gregg (R) in 2004 amid flawed financial filings, was recently charged with disobeying a police officer and resisting arrest during an incident stemming from a traffic stop." And former Gov. Jeanne Shaheen (D), who "lost to Sununu by four points in 2002, is unlikely to run again, according to a New Hampshire Democratic Party source who 'would be surprised' if Shaheen left her post as head of Harvard University's Institute of Politics."

Brownback Forms Presidential Exploratory Committee. The AP (12/5, Hananel) reports that after "taking the first step in a presidential bid on Monday, Sen. Sam Brownback said he would start a 10-state tour with a traditional stop in Iowa. Then he's going to jail." Brownback "plans to spend Friday night at Louisiana's notorious state penitentiary in Angola to highlight the problem of recidivism and programs that can help prisoners become law-abiding members of the community." Though an "unusual route, possibly a first for a potential presidential candidate," the "prison stay captures the complexity of Brownback's views and his desire to broaden his appeal beyond religious conservatives who form his natural base." Brownback, who established an exploratory committee, "says his deep faith in God guides his well-known opposition to abortion, gay marriage and embryonic stem-cell research. He pledged to make 'issues of life,' fiscal restraint and tax reform key components of his effort to woo supporters." But his "faith also leads him to tackle social injustice around the world."

CQ Politics (12/5, Kady) reports Brownback is "joining an increasingly crowded field of 2008 presidential candidates, hoping his social conservative credentials will appeal to Republican primary voters." Though he "would be considered a dark horse right out of the gate, standing in the shadows of Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani," Brownback says "there is room in the Republican race for a committed social conservative who has been more outspoken on gay marriage, judicial activism and abortion. In courting the right wing, Brownback will be competing immediately with outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, another favorite of conservatives."

The Kansas City Star (12/5, Stearns, 271K) reports Brownback's "first campaign stop will be Tuesday in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to be followed by visits to ten states over the next month. Brownback has spent the past two years road-testing a theme he describes as 'renewing the culture.' It's a unique amalgam of old-fashioned Republican social and fiscal conservatism combined with a progressive, internationalist message of reconciliation between rich and poor, deeply informed by religious faith." Brownback called for "a flat tax, for term limits for judges and members of Congress, and for 'compassionate yet practical programs to help the poor here and around the world,' in his prepared statement Monday." A "20-member exploratory advisory group includes Tom Monaghan, founder of Domino's Pizza; Bowie Kuhn, former Major League Baseball commissioner; retired Gen. Charles Krulak, former U.S. Marine Corps commandant; and Steve McEveety, a Hollywood producer closely affiliated with Mel Gibson (his credits include The Passion of the Christ). Also officially on board: Chuck Hurley, a friend of Brownback from law school who is a leader among social conservatives in Iowa, site of the crucial first-in-the-nation presidential caucuses in 13 months." Brownback's Senate chief of staff, Rob Wasinger, "will leave to run the exploratory committee."

The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Neuman, 850K) reports political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said, "Obviously there's a vacancy on the right, and (Brownback) may well fit the niche. He's a long shot -- but you don't have any shot if you don't throw your hat in the ring." The Times adds, "A supporter of free trade and a flat tax, he has voted to authorize trade relations with China and phase out estate and gift taxes. He voted for -- and, aides say, still supports -- the Iraq war."

The Hill (12/5, Bolton) reports Brownback "immediately sought to position himself as the leading social conservative of the 2008 field." Brownback, "along with outgoing Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), has in recent years been the Senate's most vocal advocate of social conservatives' agenda on abortion and related issues. Brownback's appeal to social conservatives could help him become the leading alternative to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the perceived frontrunner." McCain, Giuliani and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, "who is expected to set up an exploratory committee soon, are considered by Republican insiders and political analysts as the top tier. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, an ordained Baptist minister popular with social conservatives, is also among the upper echelon of GOP candidates." Social conservatives are "wary of McCain for his stance on campaign finance, of Romney for his views on abortion, and of Giuliani because of his beliefs on both abortion and homosexual rights. Many are gravitating toward Huckabee because of his experience as a minister, but Huckabee has alienated small-government fiscal conservatives because he raised taxes as governor."

The Washington Post (12/5, A6, Cillizza, 690K) reports that in "declaring his intentions so early, Brownback is hoping to stake out a position as the most viable conservative in the field. Neither McCain nor Romney is the first choice of social conservatives, and analysts said there is room for a candidate who fills that niche." David Kensinger, "a former Brownback chief of staff and a member of the senator's political inner circle," said "that Brownback's political positioning makes him the ideal candidate for the Iowa caucuses, which tend to be dominated by social conservatives."

USA Today (12/5, 4A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Brownback "released a list of supporters that includes several active in the fight against abortion. But McCain outmaneuvered him in Iowa last week by snagging Marlys Popma, a prominent GOP activist who used to head Iowa Right to Life. Dearin called her decision 'a signal to a lot of Christian evangelicals that John McCain is OK.'"

Obama Meets With Soros, Democratic Fundraisers In NY. The New York Times (12/5, Healy, 1.16M) reports Democratic Sen. Barack Obama "treaded onto Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's home turf last night to meet with prominent Democratic donors and feel out those who might prefer the sound of President Obama to President Clinton (as in Hillary, not Bill)." Obama "met with George Soros, the liberal billionaire philanthropist, then some other donors last night at Mr. Soros's offices. Afterward he spoke at a charity event that was to be followed by a news conference." One donor who met with Mr. Obama "said that he and several others had supported Mrs. Clinton's Senate campaigns but were not committed to her as a presidential candidate." The "prominent businessman" said, "I like Hillary a lot, but I'm also impressed with Obama — his message, the way he connects to people. It's a little too early for Democrats to be certain that Hillary is the strongest bet for 2008. There are a lot of good people interested in running."

Dionne Praises Obama, Warren For Reaching Across Party Lines. In his Washington Post column (12/5, A29), E.J. Dionne says, "When Rick Warren, one of the nation's most popular evangelical pastors, faced down right-wing pressure and invited Sen. Barack Obama to speak at a gathering at his Saddleback Valley Community Church about the AIDS crisis, he sent a signal: A significant group of theologically conservative Christians no longer wants to be treated as a cog in the Republican political machine. For his part, Obama, the former community organizer from Chicago, showed why he is this moment's hottest commodity in 2008 presidential politics, even though he has not entered the race yet." Warren "speaks for a new generation of evangelicals who think that harnessing religious faith too closely to electoral politics is bad for religion, and who are broadening the evangelical public agenda to include a concern for global poverty and the scourge of AIDS." That Obama "received a standing ovation suggests that Warren is right to sense that growing numbers of Christians are tired of narrowly partisan politics and share his interest in 'the whole bird.' In their different spheres, Warren and Obama are both in the business of retailing hope."

Clinton Begins Outreach To Iowa, New Hampshire Democrats. The Des Moines Register (12/4, Beaumont, 160K) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton "began making calls today to Iowa Democrats about the state's political landscape with an eye toward its 2008 presidential nominating caucuses, aides to Clinton said." Clinton communication director Lorraine Voles said, "She's begun the process of making some calls into Iowa." Clinton has "had conversations with supporters in New York and the state's congressional delegation to discuss the possibility of running. 'As a continuation of this process, she is starting to reach out across the country and specifically to some friends in Iowa,' Voles said." The Register adds Clinton "spoke today with Des Moines Democrat Bonnie Campbell, who worked in the Department of Justice during the administration of President Bill Clinton, the senator's husband." Campbell, "a former Iowa attorney general, declined to discuss the details of her brief talk with Sen. Clinton, except that it touched on her running for president and competing for the caucuses, scheduled to launch the 2008 nominating process." Campbell said she "would support Clinton if she ran, as did Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's former chief of staff JoDee Winterhoff, a former Iowan now living in the Washington, D.C.-area."

The Manchester Union-Leader (12/5, Distaso) reports Sen. Clinton has "begun weighing in with New Hampshire Democratic activists about a possible run for President in 2008." During the "past few days," Clinton "has placed initial calls to key Democrats in the first-in-the-nation primary state seeking advice, according to veteran state and national party activist Karen Hicks." Hicks, who "headed Howard Dean's New Hampshire presidential campaign in 2004, said those calls will continue. Hicks also confirmed that if Clinton runs for President, 'I'll be with her,' reportedly as national field director, a position similar to the one she held for the Democratic National Committee during the 2004 general election." The Union Leader adds it has "learned that Clinton had a telephone conversation last week with Gov. John Lynch." Word of Clinton's New Hampshire "overtures comes as state Democrats prepare to welcome their party's newest 'rock star,' Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, to a celebration of their 2006 election day sweep on Sunday afternoon in Manchester. Yesterday, Obama added a Sunday morning visit to Portsmouth to his schedule."

Clinton Hires National Fundraising Director, Campaign Spokesman. The AP (12/5, Fouhy) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "has hired a national fundraising director and a senior campaign spokesman, the latest sign the Democrat is moving quickly toward a likely 2008 presidential bid." Phil Singer, "a veteran of Sen. John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign who most recently was spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, will join the Clinton communications team, her senior adviser Howard Wolfson said." The campaign "has also signed a national finance director, veteran Democratic fundraiser Jonathan Mantz, and is likely to bring aboard a respected national field organizer, Karen Hicks. In 2004, Hicks served as New Hampshire director for Howard Dean's upstart presidential bid." The staff additions "came as Clinton continued her outreach Monday to New York Democrats about a possible presidential run, a process she began early last week. She spoke to several members of the state's congressional delegation and to Andrew Cuomo, the attorney general-elect and son of former New York Gov. Mario Cuomo."

McCain Said To Be Gaining Reputation For Frequent Parties. The New York Times (12/5, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports Sen. John McCain "hardly needs a holiday to give a party. Just last week, Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, presented a lavish feast for Republican governors gathering in Florida." From the "2004 Republican convention in New York City, Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, is still fondly remembered, at least among the A-list crowd, for holding an event for his 68th birthday at La Goulue on Madison Avenue and another soiree at Cipriani on 42nd Street. And in this bustling season of holiday parties, Mr. McCain was among the first to have an event, on Monday evening. The senator and his wife, Cindy, invited several hundred people to the Corcoran Gallery of Art in Washington for a party to be paid for by his primary campaign account. Cameras were not only allowed, but also encouraged."

2008 Presidential Field Quickly Swells. The Christian Science Monitor (12/5, Feldmann, 59K) reports the 2008 presidential race is "morphing so fast that four possible candidates have already dropped out. Then there's the X factor - the unprecedented front-loading of primaries and caucuses that will make it more difficult than ever for a dark horse to come out of nowhere and take the nomination." Democratic strategist James Carville said the election "is going to be 'the mother of them all,'" and he "marvels at the array of 'larger than life people' definitely or possibly mounting campaigns - John McCain, Rudolph Giuliani, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama, Al Gore, and 'to make it interesting,' Newt Gingrich. These are people who 'change the temperature of the room' when they walk in, Mr. Carville says." It may be "a sign of the vulnerabilities of both putative front-runners - Senators McCain (R) and Clinton (D) - that so many other people are talking about running, but in the end, many political oddsmakers are still betting that today's front-runners end up facing off in November 2008. And the size of the field is likely to shrink fast." This is "good news, at least, for most news organizations, which don't have the staff to follow dozens of Oval Office wannabes all over Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Nevada, not to mention Michigan, Florida, and California, which are taking steps to hold early primaries, too." Jack Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont-McKenna College, said, "A big field will become a little field very quickly. I suspect a lot of the people talking of running now or even announcing exploratory committees will flunk the invisible primary." The Monitor adds, "Just how much money a candidate needs to raise in the first quarter of 2007 is open to debate, but a common benchmark is $30 million." Sen. Barack Obama "would probably be able to hit that mark," while Sen. Hillary Clinton "would have little trouble raising several times that; former Vice President Gore also still has his network. Beyond those three, access to big money is dubious; there's a lot out there, but it's not infinite."

USA Today (12/5, 4A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports Sen. Sam Brownback "became the fourth major presidential hopeful to set up a fundraising committee for 2008, testimony to the demands of a White House race shaping up as the most expensive in U.S. history." The "pace of campaigns has been accelerating since 2000, when then-Texas governor George W. Bush formed an exploratory committee in March 1999 and started campaigning in June. Democrat Howard Dean officially started his 2004 bid in May 2002. The big change for 2008 is the sheer scale of fundraising necessary to compete with celebrity candidates such as Clinton and McCain, and to prepare for spending unfettered by federal rules and caps." Michael Toner, chairman of the Federal Election Commission, "says he expects that 'for the first time ever,' nominees of both parties in 2008 will opt out of the public financing system for both the primaries and the general. 'The stage is set for the first billion-dollar presidential election,' Toner says, predicting the eventual nominees will raise $500 million apiece." Toner said the "top-tier prospects such as McCain, Giuliani, Romney and Clinton should plan on raising $100 million by the end of 2007."

Democratic Presidential Candidates Said To Face Significant Hurdles. The Washington Times (12/5, Lambro, 88K) reports the 2008 Democratic presidential race "was off and running as soon as last month's midterm elections concluded, with front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton facing more opposition than she may have expected at this point in the two-year campaign cycle." Sen. Clinton "is the leading choice of her party in all the polls. But more than half a dozen other candidates are likely to challenge her expected bid for the nomination, including Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the party's 2004 nominee; Mr. Kerry's running mate, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina; and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, the Democrats' hottest political figure, who has rocketed into contention like a rock star." But the Democrats' "growing pack of presidential hopefuls is fraught with problems." Clinton "remains one of the most polarizing political leaders in the country," while Kerry "hurt himself in the final weeks of the midterm elections when he told a joke that suggested only uneducated soldiers ended up fighting the war in Iraq." Both Edwards and Obama "have thin experience on their resumes. Mr. Edwards of North Carolina served only one term in the Senate, while Mr. Obama, who was elected in 2004 has been in the Senate for just two years, and has little or no legislative accomplishments of which to speak."

Homelessness "Pervasive" In Hawaii. The New York Times (12/5, Magin, 1.16M) reports, "Homelessness in Hawaii has become so pervasive that the governor has assigned a state employee to work full-time at getting people off the beaches and into transitional housing. Once there, they have access to rent assistance programs and low-income housing. While hundreds of homeless people live on Honolulu's beaches, including the tourist center Waikiki, it is the Waianae Coast on the semiarid west shore where the problem is most visible." The population of Waianae, home to about 40,000 of Oahu's 900,000 people, "is predominantly native Hawaiian and is historically low income."

French Envoy Says Agreement Near On Iran Resolution. The AP (12/5, Charlton) reports that the six powers seeking a UN resolution on Iran's nuclear program are "nearing agreement on a text," French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said Monday. Diplomats will continue consolations Tuesday in Paris. "We want to reach as broad an agreement as possible," Douste-Blazy said in Brussels, "therefore we are gathering tomorrow in Paris, to discuss the text." After speaking with Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov, Douste-Blazy said, "We are in agreement with Russia to adopt sanctions against Iran's proliferation program."

AFP (12/5) reports Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said Monday that was "time" for Russia and China to agree with Britain, France, Germany and the United States on the sanctions. "It's been too long we have been debating...we have to pass the sanction resolution," Burns told reporters on the margins of the OSCE conference.

Iran's Internet Crackdown Shows Ease Of Government Censorship. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A6, Rhoads, 2.04M) reports that Iran's "campaign to shutter popular Web sites and curtail text-message traffic reflects the growing ability of governments to control online content inside their national borders." However, the crackdown, which is "part of a broader offensive against what authorities consider immoral Western culture," isn't "airtight, as more-savvy Internet users in the country have access to software and other measures that allow them to get around government restrictions, Internet experts say." However, the Journal notes that "as Internet usage has increased in more countries, so has the ability of governments to restrict the online experience within their countries."

WSJournal Urges US Not To Engage Iran. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A18, 2.04M) editorializes, "The same people who now call for engagement [with Iran] also believed in it long before the invasion of Iraq or the recent revelations about Iran's nuclear advances. They argue that Iran's pressing political and economic problems…mean the Islamic Republic has reasons of its own to come to the table. The same logic also suggests that the real purpose of its nuclear program is to serve as a bargaining chip to obtain bigger concessions from the West rather than as an end in itself." The Journal also notes that President Bush has "spoken repeatedly, in his major speeches and in interviews, about American support for Iranians who aspire to more freedom, which is one reason the US is popular among the Iranian people. What message would it now send those Iranians if the US turned around and embraced the rule of Tehran's mullahs?"

Bush To Meet With Blair On Thursday. ABC World News (12/4, story 4, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The White House said the President's consultations on Iraq will now also include British Prime Minister Tony Blair that meeting held at the White House on Thursday."

Blair Unveils Plan For Nuclear Missiles. USA Today (12/5, 12A, 2.27M) reports Blair unveiled plans Monday for "a new submarine-based nuclear-missile defense system to thwart threats from rogue regimes and state-sponsored terrorists." Blair told the House of Commons that with threats posed by North Korea, Iran and others, "It would be unwise and dangerous for Britain alone of any of the nuclear powers to give up its independent nuclear deterrent." Parliament is expected to vote on the proposal by March.

The AP (12/5, Stringer) adds that Blair "also said a decision on whether Britain will build a new arsenal of warheads to replace current stocks -- expected to last only until the 2020s -- would not be made before 2009." The New York Times (12/5, A8, Cowell, 1.16M) notes that the proposed changes could cost "as much as $40 billion." The Los Angeles Times (12/5, Murphy, 850K) also reports on the announcement.

To Answer Critics, Israel Releases Video From War In Lebanon. In a front page article, the New York Times (12/5, A1, Myre, 1.16M) reports Israel's military, "which has been accused of abuses in its war against Hezbollah this summer, has declassified photographs, video images and prisoner interrogations to buttress its accusation that Hezbollah systematically fired from civilian neighborhoods in southern Lebanon and took cover in those areas to shield itself from attack." In a new report, an Israeli research group says Hezbollah "stored weapons in mosques, battled Israelis from inside empty schools, flew white flags while transporting missiles and launched rockets near United Nations monitoring posts." The Times received an advance copy of the "detailed" report, which was produced by the Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center at the Center for Special Studies, a private research group headed by Reuven Erlich, a retired Israeli colonel in military intelligence. In Lebanon, a Hezbollah official "denied the study's allegations, saying its military units were based outside towns and villages and had come into populated areas only when circumstances required it."

Israel Mulls International PR Campaign. Also on its front page, the Washington Times (12/5, A1, Bawa, 88K) reports, "Israel's international image is hurting, and the country's top officials have turned to the wisdom of Madison Avenue in a bid to 're-brand' their product." Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni met with "public relations executives, branding specialists and diplomats in September in Tel Aviv to brainstorm about improving the country's image." Israeli officials "complain that the international press gives the country a warlike image by focusing on its military might and the string of conflicts with its Arab neighbors," but Livni told the Tel Aviv gathering that she would like to project "a more inviting image of the Jewish state."

More Troops Deployed In Beirut After Death Of Protestor. The Financial Times (12/5, Biedermann) reports Lebanon has deployed more soldiers in Beirut Monday after the killing of a demonstrator "raised fears peaceful anti-government protests could turn to violence." The AP (12/5, Faramarzi) says "troops in armored cars deployed to Sunni Muslim neighborhoods…but that failed to prevent renewed friction." Police said two people were injured late Monday during demonstrations. Separately, "About 300 people also gathered on the highway to Beirut international airport, in an apparent attempt to block the road, but security forces prevented them."

The Washington Post (12/5, A18, Shadid, 690K) reports that "within a day of his death in a street brawl along Beirut's increasingly tense fault lines of sect and politics, Ahmed Mahmoud became the first symbol of the mass demonstrations by Hezbollah and its allies." The Post notes that the "arrival of Mahmoud's body was a dramatic moment in the otherwise carnival-like atmosphere of the demonstrations," which entered their fourth day Monday.

Expansion Of Poisoning Probe Strains UK-Russian Relations. The Washington Post (12/5, A22, Jordan, Finn, 690K) reports that a team of British police investigators arrived in Moscow Monday "to begin questioning people about the poisoning death of Alexander Litvinenko, a former Russian spy who had recently become a British citizen, in a case that is straining relations between the two governments." Home Secretary John Reid, speaking at a European Union meeting in Brussels, said the Scotland Yard officers in Moscow would "follow the evidence wherever it goes." Although Russian officials have "pledged to cooperate in the inquiry, their irritation over the case showed through in official comments." Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov warned Monday against "politicizing this issue" and "speculations on this subject." The Russian Interfax news agency also quoted him as saying, "This is, of course, harming our relations." The Financial Times (12/5, Buckley, Burns, Dombey) also reports Lavrov's comments.

Probe Casts Light On Russian Émigrés In London. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A6, Mollenkamp, Patrick, 2.04M) says he investigation has "cast a spotlight on some of London's wealthiest jet-setters: the thousands of Russian émigrés who have moved here in the past decade." Russians come "to protect their wealth and take advantage of the tax laws, or send their children to British schools," while other "are exiles seeking escape from the regime of President Vladimir Putin." However, the Journal says many "maintain ties back to Russia and its murky business and government connections."

Columnist Says Poisoning A Reminder Of Nuclear Threat. Washington Post (12/5, A29, 690K) columnist Anne Applebaum says Litvinenko's death reminds us "that the old KGB lives on in new guises." Despite their "widely varying fates," she says it has "long been perfectly clear that many of these old comrades continue to work together in mutually profitable ways." However, Applebaum says "that we were surprised, are surprised, is both tragic and ironic: After all, for the better part of a decade now, we've been desperately looking for weapons of mass destruction and for the strange new enemies, the Islamic radicals who might be planning to use them. And now we've discovered that there really is nuclear material for sale and that it really is being used, in the West, to kill people. And that the killers aren't strange, or new, or even Islamic."

Ukraine's Yanukovuch Vows Commitment To Democracy. The AP (12/5, Butler) reports Ukrainian Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych "told an American audience Monday that his country is committed to democracy and on a path toward political and economic reform." On his first trip to the US, Yanukovych "sought to convince US officials and business leaders that he has strong democratic credentials, even though he was previously identified with efforts to rig the 2004 presidential election." Yanukovych's meetings Monday and Tuesday with Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and members of Congress "were designed in part to discuss Ukraine's economy and its possible entry into the World Trade Organization and NATO," but former US ambassador to Ukraine, Steven Pifer, says the "main goal that Yanukovych is coming with is to establish some credibility with the administration."

Chávez Likely To "Tighten Grip" During Third Term. In a news analysis, the New York Times (12/5, A3, Romero, 1.16M) writes, "If President Hugo Chávez rules like an autocrat, as his critics in Washington and here charge, then he does so with the full permission of a substantial majority of the Venezuelan people, Sunday's election" showed. During his third term in office, Chávez "seems intent on assuming the mantle from the fading Fidel Castro of chief Latin American scourge of the United States," and "has spoken of a desire to unite his supporters in one political party and to alter legislation to allow him to remain in power past 2020." Winning support for such measures, the Times says, "may not be difficult in a country where his allies already control the legislature and the Supreme Court as well as governorships in all but two states, and where the military, the national oil company and other government bureaucracies and institutions have been systematically packed with Chávez boosters and stripped of opponents."

US Sees Opportunity For "More Cooperative" Relationship. The AP (12/5) reports the Bush administration "greeted [Chávez's] re-election victory by holding out the possibility of a more cooperative relationship." State Department spokesman Eric Watnik Monday said the US looks "forward to having the opportunity to work with the Venezuelan government on issues of mutual interest." His "brief comment" did not "offer congratulations" to Chávez and said reports of electoral irregularities "should be investigated."

Newspapers Urge Washington To Improve Relations With Chávez. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/5, 850K) says that although "there are plenty of reasons for Venezuelans not to like Hugo Chávez," Washington "should try to improve bilateral ties not just because there is a long-term strategic value to cordial relations with this big oil producer. A goodwill effort to be reasonable toward Caracas will also undermine Chávez 's own credibility when he tries to sell his Yankees-are-devils pitch to the rest of Latin America." Similarly, the Financial Times (12/5) urges policymakers in Washington not to overreact to Hugo Chávez's victory in Sunday's election in Venezuela. The Times points out moderate candidates "keen to work with Washington won elections in five of the six important" Latin American countries. The Times argues it is better "for the US and its hemispheric friends to cease the rhetorical barrages against Mr. Chávez that are such grist to his populist mill." Instead, Washington "should continue a recent more pragmatic approach, engaging Venezuela in areas such as oil, energy policy and border security."

Sudan Issues Final Rejection Of UN Force In Darfur. The AP (12/5, De Montesquiou) reports Sudan's "final rejection of a joint U.N.-African peacekeeping force in Darfur came as little surprise to many involved in failed international efforts to end the region's deadly violence. But many say civilians will be the ones to bear the costs of that opposition -- thousands more will die, they fear, and many more will be forced to flee their homes unless the West can somehow muster strong sanctions against Sudan's government." However, the AP says Sudan's opposition is "deeply rooted," noting that "several Sudanese government hard-liners are believed to be on a list of suspects that the International Criminal Court has said it would prosecute for crimes against humanity."

Subject Of "Hotel Rwanda" Criticized For Portrayal In Film. The Wall Street Journal (12/5, A1, Rhoads, 2.04M) reports on its front page that since the movie "Hotel Rwanda" was released two years ago, Paul Rusesabagina "has become a hero in the US," but in his native Rwanda, he is "seen in a different light." Depicted in the film as "saving hundreds of refugees from his country's genocide in 1994," the Rwandan media, former refugees in the hotel and "even the country's president in recent months have denounced Mr. Rusesabagina as an impostor profiting from the genocide. They say the Hollywood movie greatly exaggerated his role and distorted these sensitive events. The head of the country's genocide survivor association has called for criminal charges against him." However, Rusesabagina "believes the attacks on him come from people worried that he will turn his celebrity into a credible opposition and run for president somewhere down the road."

Columnist Says Cuba Will Have Smooth Transition To Raul Castro. Washington Post (12/5, A29, 690K) columnist Eugene Robinson writes that as "fiercely implacable exiles in Miami, perennially outfoxed bureaucrats in Washington and salivating real estate developers around the world" are "trying to predict what will happen in Cuba the day after Fidel Castro dies," Castro "appears to have engineered a seamless transition" to his brother Raul. Robinson says, "If any lingering doubts about the de facto succession needed to be dispelled, Havana's biggest military parade in years on Saturday reminded everyone that Rail has been running the Cuban armed forces since Day One."

Muslims Accused Of Double Standard. In a commentary for the Los Angeles Times (12/5, 850K), Raymond Ibrahim, author of the forthcoming "Al Qaeda Reader" and research librarian, contrasts the "permanent desecration of" Hagia Sophia in Istanbul and the Israeli failure to "deface or convert" the Al Aqsa mosque: "When Muslims conquer non-Muslim territories — such as Constantinople, not to mention all of North Africa, Spain and southwest Asia — those whom they have conquered as well as their descendants are not to expect any apologies, let alone political or territorial concessions. ... But if we live in a world where the strong rule and the weak submit, why is it that whenever Muslim regions are conquered, such as in the case of Palestine, the same Islamists who would never concede one inch of Islam's conquests resort to the United Nations and the court of public opinion, demanding justice, restitutions, rights and so forth?"

TERRORISM NEWS:

Justice Department Says Secrecy Needs Bar ACLU Surveillance Suit (AP)

By DAVID N. GOODMAN
AP, December 5, 2006

DETROIT - The Bush administration asked a federal appeals court Monday to toss out a lawsuit challenging a warrantless surveillance program, saying the government can't defend itself without revealing national secrets.

The American Civil Liberties Union sued the National Security Agency in January on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers who say the surveillance has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets.

"This suit must be dismissed because its very subject matter is a state secret, and litigation would inevitably result in disclosing state secrets," Justice Department lawyers wrote in a brief filed Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0102121

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled in August that the program violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers.

The Justice Department appealed to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati, which ruled that the administration could keep the program in place during the appeal.

The Bush administration secretly launched the surveillance program in 2001. It monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links.

A secret court was established in the late 1970s to grant warrants for such surveillance, but the Justice Department said it can't always wait for the court to act.

The president and his advisers "have determined that the current threat to the United States demands that signals intelligence be carried out with a speed and methodology that cannot be achieved by seeking judicial approval" through traditional channels, Monday's brief said.

The journalists and other plaintiffs lack standing to sue because secrecy considerations mean that "they cannot show, and the government cannot dispute, that the government has intercepted or likely will intercept their communications," the government brief said.

In a brief filed Nov. 14, the ACLU said that the Bush administration's "sweeping theory of executive power would allow the president to violate any law passed by Congress."

"This theory presents a profound threat to our democratic system," it said.

The 6th Circuit Court of Appeals has set a Dec. 18 deadline for other interested groups to file their own briefs in the case.

Padilla Lawyers Claim Images Cause For Throwing Case Out (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, December 5, 2006

Providing a rare glimpse of a locked-up "enemy combatant," attorneys for South Florida terror suspect Jose Padilla released declassified images of him in chains and a mask to bolster their bid to have his Miami case thrown out because of alleged mistreatment during military detention for more than three years.

The still video images show Padilla wearing blacked-out goggles, noise-blocking headphones, and shackles on his hands and feet. Dressed in an orange prison-like jumpsuit, he is being led out of his cell by three guards dressed in camouflage, riot helmets and visors at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C.

The first disclosed images of his military detention were filed on Friday along with a psychiatrist's sworn statement in Miami federal court to counter the U.S. government's contention that Padilla was treated humanely before his transfer here last January to face terror charges.

"Mr. Padilla asserts that he was not treated humanely, but instead was tortured and that the government's conduct was outrageous," one of Padilla's attorneys, Orlando do Campo, wrote in a court filing. He added that the treatment "has left him damaged, both mentally and physically" -- leaving him unable to assist his legal team.

Padilla, 36, and two other Muslim men, Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi, are charged with conspiring to support terrorist activities overseas.

The trio face trial on Jan. 22, though the proceeding is likely to be delayed because the U.S. government has appealed a judge's dismissal of one count in the Miami indictment. The high-profile case is built largely on classified wiretaps of defendants' communications between 1993 and 2001, when Padilla lived in Broward County and traveled to the Middle East as a recruit for a suspected North American terror cell.

THE JUDGE'S DECISION

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke must decide whether to toss out the indictment based on the defense team's allegation that Padilla's constitutional rights were violated by the military during his detention as an enemy combatant.

Carl Tobias, a constitutional scholar at the University of Richmond School of Law in Virginia who has followed Padilla's legal odyssey, said his attorneys' bid is a long shot.

DOJ_NMG_0102122

But he said the photo of Padilla in chains and a mask, published on the front page of The New York Times on Monday, ``makes an impression on people. Whether it has the same impression on the judge is another matter. It's hard to know."

Padilla had been in the Middle East allegedly training with the al Qaeda terrorist group before his arrest by the FBI in the United States on May 8, 2002.

He was designated an enemy combatant without being formally charged, though the Bush administration accused him of plotting to detonate a radiological "dirty bomb" on U.S. soil and to blow up apartment buildings in various cities.

After President Bush dropped that designation a year ago to avoid a Supreme Court confrontation, Padilla was transferred to the Federal Detention Center in downtown Miami to face the terror-support charges. They are unrelated to the earlier accusations.

Padilla initially made his allegations in October.

CLAIMS OF TORTURE

In court papers, Padilla asserted he was isolated in a tiny cell around the clock, deprived of sleep on a steel bunk with no mattress, shackled and manacled for hours on end, and threatened with being cut with a knife and having alcohol poured on the wounds. He also alleged he was given drugs against his will -- believed to be LSD or PCP -- to act as a sort of truth serum during his interrogations.

But he had provided no evidence until his latest court filing on Friday.

It includes not only the images, taken from a declassified Defense Department video, but also an affidavit by psychiatrist Angela Hegarty. She evaluated Padilla several times last summer and concluded he cannot help his defense because of psychiatric harm he allegedly suffered during detention and interrogation at the Navy brig.

THE GOVERNMENT'S SIDE

Federal prosecutors insist that Padilla was treated humanely in the Navy brig.

"Padilla's conditions of confinement were humane and designed to ensure his safety and security," assistant U.S. Attorney Russell Killinger and other prosecutors said. ``His basic needs were met in a conscientious manner."

That included halal food, some outdoor exercise and medical attention when necessary.

Prosecutors also said Padilla never made any abuse claims while in custody: ``Padilla's allegations of torture have no merit whatsoever."

Attorneys: Images Show Harsh U.S. Treatment Of Padilla, Shows Him In Chains, Headphones (FINDLAW/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 5, 2006

(AP) - MIAMI-Still video images of alleged terror operative Jose Padilla in chains and wearing headphones and blacked-out goggles demonstrate the harsh tactics used by U.S. interrogators while he was in military custody as an "enemy combatant," his lawyers said in court papers.

The images, taken from an unclassified Defense Department video, show Padilla being chained hand and foot and led out of his cell by three guards dressed in camouflage and wearing riot helmets and visors. The video images are the first publicly released of Padilla's 3 1/2-year detention at a Navy brig in Charleston, South Carolina.

They were filed late Friday in federal court in Miami as part of an attempt by Padilla's lawyers to get criminal terrorism support charges against him dismissed, based on what they claim was treatment that amounted to torture while in military custody.

"The extended torture visited upon Mr. Padilla has left him damaged, both mentally and physically," Padilla lawyer Orlando do Campo said in one court filing. "The government's treatment of Mr. Padilla has robbed him of his personhood."

Existence of the filing containing the video images was first reported Monday by The New York Times. The court papers do not give details about the actual video, but The Times reported that it was made as Padilla was being taken out of his cell for dental work.

Several of his lawyers did not return e-mail and phone messages left Monday by The Associated Press. A spokeswoman for Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta declined comment Monday.

Padilla claims, among other things, that he was forced to stand in painful stress positions, given LSD or some other drug as a "truth serum," subjected to loud noises and noxious odors and forced to endure sleep deprivation, extreme heat and cold, and harsh lights.

The new court papers include a affidavit from Dr. Angela Hegarty, a New York psychiatrist who has met with Padilla for 22 hours over several days this year. Hegarty said Padilla appears to suffer from post-traumatic stress syndrome and is unable to adequately help prepare his legal defense.

"When approached by his attorneys, he begs them, 'please, please, please' not to have to discuss his case," Hegarty wrote. "He refuses to watch the videos of his interrogation and he refuses to answer questions pertaining to aspects of the evidence in his case."

One of Padilla's attorneys, Andrew Patel, said in court papers his client fears being returned to the Navy brig if he discusses what happened there and that "he often exhibits facial tics, unusual eye movements and contortions of his body" when the subject of his detention comes up.

"Mr. Padilla remains unsure if I and the other attorneys working on his case are actually his attorney or another component of the government's interrogation scheme," said Patel, who has represented Padilla for four years.

Federal prosecutors and Pentagon officials have repeatedly denied that Padilla was tortured, contending in their own court filings that he was humanely treated and that the tactics used were for "safety and security" reasons.

A Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon, said Monday that Padilla's claims of abuse are false and that shackles are used when necessary.

"Detainees are moved based on their threat. If they pose a threat to the individuals charged with transporting them, clearly appropriate measures must be taken to protect the guards and any other personnel involved," Gordon said.

Padilla, a 36-year-old former Chicago gang member, was declared an enemy combatant by President George W. Bush in June 2002, shortly after he was arrested upon arrival at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. U.S. authorities initially claimed he was on an al-Qaida mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a U.S. city.

Amid an intense legal battle over Bush's wartime detention powers, Padilla was transferred to civilian custody in January to face federal terrorism support charges along with two others in Miami. Trial on those charges, which do not mention the "dirty bomb" allegations, is currently scheduled to begin Jan. 22.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke has not yet scheduled a hearing on the torture claims.

Egypt Arrests American On Plot Charge (AP)

By Nadia Abou El-magd

AP, December 5, 2006

Police have arrested an American, 11 Europeans and several others from Arab countries for allegedly plotting terrorist attacks in Middle Eastern countries including Iraq, the Interior Ministry said Monday.

The group was part of an Islamic militant terror cell that had adopted extremist ideas and were living in Egypt under the guise of studying Arabic and Islamic studies, the ministry said in a statement.

Along with the American, police arrested two Belgians, nine French and several others from Egypt and other Arab countries including Tunisia and Syria, the statement said.

The ministry did not provide names or say how many Egyptians and Arabs were arrested.

"Investigations have confirmed that those elements are related to some terrorist organizations abroad," the ministry said. "They were seeking to recruit others, teach them destructive beliefs, urging them for jihad, traveling to Iraq to carry out operations via other countries in the region."

In Washington, the State Department confirmed an American had been arrested in Egypt about a week ago but could not provide any details.

DOJ_NMG_0102124

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said American officials were "seeking consular access to this individual" but declined to give more information, citing U.S. privacy laws.

A government official in Brussels also confirmed that the two Belgians were arrested and said they were Belgian citizens of Moroccan origin. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press.

"It seems they had sympathies with fundamentalist, Islamist circles," the official said. "There is no evidence that they perpetrated any violent act, and we expect them to be expelled from Egypt soon."

A spokesman for France's Foreign Ministry said several French citizens had been arrested in Egypt but said he could not immediately provide further details.

Egyptian authorities made the arrests about a week ago, and some had been studying at Al-Azhar University, Sunni Islam's most important seat of learning, police officials said. They spoke on condition on anonymity because they were not authorized to talk to the media. It was not immediately clear if all the arrests took place in Cairo or elsewhere in Egypt.

All of the arrested were in jail pending further investigation, the ministry said.

Egypt has witnessed a string of suicide terror attacks in recent years at Sinai Peninsula tourist resorts.

Last week, an Egyptian state security court condemned to death three Islamic militants convicted of taking part in suicide attacks that killed 34 people in 2004 in the Sinai resort of town of Taba.

The three belonged to the militant group Tawhid and Jihad, which Egyptian security officials and prosecutors accuse of carrying out two other bombings against Sinai resorts that killed another 87 people — Sharm el-Sheik in July 2005 and Dahab in April.

In February, three British Muslims were released from an Egyptian prison after spending nearly three years in custody for allegedly belonging to a banned Islamic group. The three accused Egyptian authorities of torturing them during their captivity, but the government denied the allegations.

Egypt operates under emergency laws, which gives the government wide powers to detain suspects without charging them. The laws have been in place since the assassination of President Anwar Sadat in 1981 despite a growing chorus of opposition from both inside and outside the country.

Egypt Detains American In Terrorist Cell Case (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

BERLIN, Dec. 4 -- Egyptian authorities said Monday that they had arrested an American and nearly a dozen Europeans after breaking up an international terrorist cell that was recruiting operatives to go to Iraq.

The Egyptian Interior Ministry said the cell was "related to some terrorist organizations abroad" but did not name the network or those arrested. The official Egyptian news agency MENA reported that the suspects included nine French citizens and two Belgians, as well as two Syrians, a Tunisian woman and an undisclosed number of Egyptians.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said U.S. officials knew the identity of the American and were "seeking consular access to this individual." He said the U.S. suspect was arrested Nov. 26 but declined to name the person, citing federal privacy laws.

A U.S. law enforcement official said the U.S. citizen "was not on our radar at all" before his arrest in Egypt and is not named on the government's voluminous terrorism watch list.

"He was not a known figure to the U.S.," the official said. "There's no record of him in the sense that he would have been a person of concern."

A handful of U.S. citizens have faced charges of engaging in terrorism overseas since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Adam Gadahn, a California native who is believed to be in Pakistan, was indicted in October on a charge of treason based on his alleged appearance in numerous al-Qaeda videotapes calling for the death of Americans and for attacks on U.S. targets.

Jose Padilla, a former Chicago gang member, stands accused of traveling to the Middle East for military training and joining a North American terrorist cell, although a federal judge in Miami dismissed a charge of murder conspiracy, the most serious count he faced.

DOJ_NMG_0102125

John Walker Lindh, a Californian, was sentenced to 20 years after pleading guilty to providing services to the Taliban in Afghanistan and to carrying explosives during a felony. All three men are Muslim converts.

Egyptian officials said the cell members arrested there recently were operating in Cairo and Alexandria while masquerading as religious students, but released few other details.

"They were seeking to recruit others, teach them destructive beliefs, urging them for jihad and traveling to Iraq to carry out operations via other countries in the region," the Interior Ministry said in a statement announcing the arrests.

Police began to break up the cell in mid-November but continued making arrests for several days, according to Arab and European media reports. The French newspaper Liberation reported that four other French nationals were arrested on similar charges in Egypt in 2005 and were later deported.

Egyptian investigators did not say whether there was a connection between the European suspects and another local cell blamed for killing more than 100 people in three separate suicide attacks on the Sinai Peninsula since 2004.

On Thursday, three Muslim radicals were sentenced to death by an Egyptian court for their involvement in one of those attacks, the October 2004 bombing that killed 34 people in the Red Sea resort of Taba popular with Israeli tourists.

On Sunday, three days after the verdict, Israeli counterterrorism officials issued a warning that other attacks were being planned at Egyptian resorts along the Red Sea.

In India, a judge on Monday convicted six men of involvement in the 1993 bombings that killed 257 people in Mumbai, delivering the last verdicts for 123 defendants charged in India's worst terrorist attack.

The convictions brought to 100 the number of people convicted; 23 were acquitted. Sentences will be imposed early next year.

"This is a historic case. Never before in Indian history have 100 people been convicted in a single case," public prosecutor Ujjwal Nikam told reporters.

American Arrested In Terrorism Probe (WT/AP)

Lawyers Demand Release Of Chinese Muslims (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Attorneys for a group of Chinese Muslims held for nearly five years in the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, filed suit yesterday, asking that the men be released immediately and alleging that they have been held as part of a political deal between the United States and China.

Citing new laws that allow detainees to challenge their status as "enemy combatants," the lawyers argue that their seven clients -- ethnic Uighurs (pronounced wee-gurs) -- have never taken up arms against the United States or its allies. They contend that the men have been labeled wrongfully as terrorist suspects because they oppose the Communist Chinese government.

In a 58-page filing at the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, the lawyers argue that the Uighurs have been held since early 2002 as a way to win Chinese acquiescence for the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

The lawyers -- Sabin Willett and Susan Baker Manning -- allege in the court documents that their clients' detention was one of several demands the Chinese government solicited in mid-2002 as the United States was seeking global support for toppling Saddam Hussein.

U.S. officials labeled the East Turkistan Islamic Movement (ETIM) -- a group that includes Uighur separatists who want their own nation in western China -- a terrorist organization in August 2002 after diplomatic discussions with China about Iraq, the lawyers allege.

"In the crisis atmosphere of the time, the interests of a few dozen refugees paled beside the urgency of the Administration's war plans," the lawsuit said. "The Iraq deal sealed the fate of the seven petitioners here. More than four years have passed. Long-discarded pawns in a diplomatic match between superpowers, petitioners today remain illegally imprisoned at Guantanamo."

Former State Department officials acknowledged in interviews that they negotiated with China about placing ETIM and another group on a list of known terrorist organizations, and that ETIM was added after intelligence reports indicated the group had killed innocent people. The officials said, however, that labeling the group as terrorists had no effect on Uighurs already in U.S. custody, who were believed to be cooperating with the Taliban and al-Qaeda near Tora Bora, Afghanistan.

Then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage met with Chinese officials in Beijing in late August 2002 and discussed the Iraq situation with them. He said at the time that ETIM was placed on the foreign terrorist list after months of discussions with China. He also said he made clear that China needed to respect the minority Uighur population.

"They had been after us to put ETIM on the list," Armitage said in a recent interview. He said the decision did not have anything to do with winning China's tacit approval on the Iraq invasion. "But at the time, we didn't know when we were going to invade Iraq. It was done in response to information gathered by the intelligence group."

The Uighurs have been a diplomatic headache for the United States. U.S. officials working to negotiate the release of five other Uighurs held at Guantanamo who were determined not to be a threat to U.S. interests refused to return them to China out of concern they could be tortured or killed. More than two dozen countries declined requests to take them in, and the United States has been unwilling to allow them to come here.

DOJ_NMG_0102127

Earlier this year, those five Uighurs were released to a U.N. compound in Albania, where they remain virtual prisoners.

Pierre-Richard Prosper, who formerly led U.S. negotiations with other countries over Guantanamo detainees, said that China wanted custody of the Uighurs but that the United States staved off Beijing because of human rights concerns. "We tried for many months to reach an understanding with China regarding the fate of the Uighurs and were unable to do so," he said.

More than a dozen Uighurs are still in Guantanamo. U.S. officials have determined them to be enemy combatants because of their participation in an alleged terrorist training camp in Afghanistan, which all fled when the United States started bombing the area after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The Uighurs have told military court officials they were not allied with the Taliban and are sympathetic to the United States, which they view as a liberator. They said they were living in a small community in Afghanistan after fleeing oppression in China.

According to military tribunal records and court filings, the men were lured to a mosque in Pakistan, where they were arrested and later turned over to Pakistani authorities. Willett said he believes the men were sold to the United States for sizable bounties and were sent to Guantanamo along with many other detainees captured there.

The lawyers challenge the way the Uighurs were determined to be enemy combatants, arguing that their encampment in Afghanistan did not make them a party to hostilities. The Uighurs have said the United States allowed a Chinese delegation to visit and interrogate them after their capture, and that the Chinese threatened them. A U.S. official confirmed that the Chinese were allowed to question the Uighurs.

"It is amazing to me that the U.S. has agreed to, in effect, hold political prisoners for China in exchange for anything," Manning said. "That goes against everything that we, I thought, stood for in this country."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Smuggling, Theft, Bribery At Agency (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Aside from patrolling the nation's borders and guarding against terrorism, the Department of Homeland Security also is battling fraud, theft, bribery, smuggling and other crimes by American citizens — with some of the most disturbing examples coming from the sprawling agency's own employees.

A semiannual report filed to Congress by the department's inspector general showed a sharp jump in arrests in the six months ended Sept. 30, with many stemming from schemes by members of the public to bilk the agency of emergency relief funds in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

But the report, released this week, also highlights a litany of staff misconduct: immigration officials demanding sex in exchange for visas, airport screeners stealing money from tourists' luggage, federal air marshals smuggling drugs, and employees from various DHS agencies committing sex crimes — including indecent exposure and distributing child pornography.

The array of staff transgressions tucked into the report reflects the continued growing pains of an agency that was formed only three years ago, and the pressures created as parts of the department have rapidly expanded, critics say.

Clark Kent Ervin, a former DHS inspector general, said the Transportation Security Administration rushed to hire screeners and air marshals in 2003 without running background checks on the applicants.

"Knowing DHS dysfunction and disingenuousness, it wouldn't surprise me if DHS doesn't fully vet employees for criminal backgrounds before hiring them or periodically recheck them," Ervin said.

Russ Knocke, press secretary for DHS, would not comment on the agency's policy on background checks but dismissed Ervin's criticism as "pure speculation" and "without merit."

Knocke said the problems were due mainly to a few individuals.

"No law enforcement agency of any government in the world is going to be immune to inappropriate behavior on the part of its employees, particularly one that is as large as we are," Knocke said. "… There's no tolerance for unethical behavior at this department and we use every authority to confront it."

DOJ_NMG_0102128

Investigations by the inspector general's office triggered 321 arrests and 243 convictions in the six-month period. The report filed for the previous six months documented 200 arrests; six months earlier, there were 54.

The report did not provide a breakdown of how many cases involved DHS staff, but they came from all parts of the department.

Two TSA screeners were caught pilfering jewelry from luggage, while another was found smuggling more than $80,000 in an attempt to avoid reporting income brought into the country. Another team of four screeners targeted Japanese tourists until one was caught stealing up to $1,800 from checked luggage.

Many of the offenses involved getting contraband past barriers. Two federal air marshals were snared by a DHS and FBI investigation that found the marshals had sought and accepted a bribe to shepherd 15 kilograms of cocaine through airports. Two guards at an Immigration and Customs Enforcement prison sold alcohol and cigarettes to the illegal immigrants in their custody.

The agency's defenders said that in a department of more than 180,000 people, the number getting into trouble is relatively insignificant and that the arrests show the department's oversight is improving.

The inspector general's reports can be found online at http://www.dhs.gov/xoig/rpts/semiannl/editorial_0330.shtm .

U.S. Nuclear Labs Working On Weapons Safeguards (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian, Times Staff Writer

Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

LIVERMORE, Calif. -- In response to a secret order from President Bush, U.S. nuclear weapons laboratories are developing technology to make the weapons virtually impossible to use if they fall into the wrong hands.

The security system will be part of a new generation of nuclear weapons approved formally last week by a panel of the Defense and Energy departments.

A nuclear bomb equipped with the safeguards theoretically could be left on the street and terrorists would be unable, even given months of tinkering, to set off a detonation. Scientists say they are working on technology that would destroy every component inside -- including the plutonium and uranium -- if anyone even tampered with it.

But the 3-year-old effort, known as National Security Presidential Directive 28, has evoked strong criticism from many nuclear weapons experts, who doubt that absolute safeguards are necessary or even possible. Instead, they say, the federal government should plug known security weaknesses at bomb labs and nuclear weapons factories.

The nation's stockpile of 6,000 nuclear warheads is located on missiles and in military depots in places as disparate as Texas, North Dakota and Europe. They all have electronic locks or other safeguards, known as use controls.

But the new plan aims for a dramatic improvement.

The big leap would involve the self-destruction of the weapon without dispersing radioactivity or causing an explosion. The system would be able to destroy the electronic and mechanical components, rendering the plutonium and uranium materials unusable for construction of a crude improvised device.

How? That's secret. But one possible approach is that the bomb would contain a powerful acid or other chemical that would poison the uranium and plutonium. The resulting sludge theoretically could be reprocessed, but that would require transportation to a highly specialized chemical-processing factory.

And, the thinking goes, if terrorists had access to such a factory, they probably wouldn't need to steal a bomb.

The nation's two nuclear weapons laboratories -- Lawrence Livermore in California and Los Alamos in New Mexico -- are competing to design the new generation of bombs, known as the reliable replacement warhead. A winner of the competition could be selected by the Nuclear Weapons Council, a panel of top Defense and Energy officials, as soon as this week.

"It is essential that we make sure our weapons are impossible for terrorists to use," said Bruce Goodwin, chief of nuclear weapons design at Livermore. The weapons produced during the Cold War, he said, were not designed for an Age of Terrorism.

"There was no motivation for the Red Army to send in a suicide squad to steal an American weapon," Goodwin said. "They had plenty of their own. There is tremendous incentive to certain people who don't have nuclear weapons to terrorize this nation by stealing one."

DOJ_NMG_0102129

Before Sept. 11, security experts had not considered the prospect of a nuclear weapons scientist leading a suicide squad that would seize and detonate a U.S. nuclear weapon.

But critics say the risk of a terrorist seizing a U.S. bomb is the least likely form of nuclear terrorism. A more probable scenario, they say, is the theft of highly enriched uranium or plutonium that could be fashioned into a crude nuclear device or the smuggling of a complete nuclear bomb into the U.S.

"The real threat is the uranium and plutonium materials that are spread across the country in totally inappropriate places and inadequate facilities," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a Washington, D.C., group that has long criticized the Energy Department for lax security.

"So, rather than fixing the problem they have, they are trying to fix a problem they don't have."

Although a U.S. nuclear weapon never has been stolen, the U.S. accidentally has lost custody of some. Bombs were dropped or destroyed in a 1961 accident in Goldsboro, N.C.; a 1966 accident in Palomares, Spain; a 1968 accident in Thule, Greenland; and a 1980 accident in Damascus, Ark. Those were recovered, but others have been lost at sea.

Philip Coyle, a former deputy director of the Livermore lab, worries that even the best U.S. technology might not be truly tamper-proof.

"They make it sound like you could leave a nuclear weapon on the streets of Baghdad and nobody would know what to do with it," Coyle said. "I don't think that is quite the case. People can reverse-engineer many things."

Another key concern comes from the military, which has worried about putting locks on weapons. The fear is that malfunctioning use controls could prevent the authorized use of a nuclear weapon.

"The argument against doing more and more of the use controls is that you lose confidence in the weapon," said David Mosher, a nuclear weapons expert at Rand Corp. Such technical concerns could lead the military to ask for a resumption of underground nuclear testing, he said.

But weapons scientists inside the labs say their goal of "absolute surety" is not only the right policy but is clearly achievable.

"We know how to do it," Goodwin said.

Registered Traveller Program Set To Go Beyond One Airport (NYT)

By Joe Sharkey

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

READY or not — and some critics say not — the long-delayed Registered Traveler program is moving forward, with the single existing operator planning a succession of openings soon at four airports, while a competitor says it is about to join in.

Verified Identity Pass Inc., which began the first Registered Traveler program at Orlando International Airport in July 2005, is planning to open its second site, in Terminal 7 at Kennedy International Airport, with a target date of Dec. 19, said Steven Brill, the chief executive of the company, which markets its version of the expedited security program under the name Clear.

He said the company, which has more than 30,000 members at Orlando, is processing applications with the Transportation Security Administration for Kennedy and for San Jose, Calif.; Cincinnati; and Indianapolis.

“We have about 3,000 non-Orlando people signed up so far,” he said. “We’ve been sort of keeping it quiet because we find it much easier to talk about it once the lanes are open.”

Late last month, Mr. Brill’s program received certification from the security administration to begin rolling out at other airports. Mr. Brill said then that he expected Clear to be operating in 12 to 20 airports within 12 months.

In all, over the last six months, more than two dozen airports have expressed interest in the program. Many are now talking with Mr. Brill and several competitors about if, when and how to proceed.

The Unisys Corporation said yesterday that it was planning soon to introduce its own version of Registered Traveler, first at Reno/Tahoe International Airport in Nevada, where the company has a contract to start operating once the security administration approves.

“We are very much in the game,” said Lawrence J. Zmuda, a Unisys partner working with the Homeland Security Department and the security administration to develop the program. “We are going to be rolling this out at several locations in the spring of 2007.”

DOJ_NMG_0102130

The Registered Traveler program provides identity cards, which include not only data on place of birth and home address but also fingerprints and iris scans. Travelers who pay an annual fee after passing a federal background check can then go through expedited security in special lanes. Clear charges $99.95 a year, which includes a federal fee for the security clearances. Once the program expands, Registered Traveler identity cards will be interchangeable at various suppliers' lanes.

But what do you really get for the money besides a special lane? Critics of the program have questioned its customer service value and slow pace and have also asked whether it could open a security loophole for potential terrorists who are able to pass a background check.

The program's progress has been slower than anticipated, as the security administration carefully evaluates both the program itself and the various technologies it may employ to provide better benefits to members. In November 2005, Mr. Brill testified to Congress that once the government announced "a clear blueprint for benefits" to members, "we and our competitors would likely be rolled out at 30 to 40 of the 50 largest airports within six months."

Among other potential benefits that have been discussed are not having to remove shoes and coats, and not having to take laptops from their cases. The security administration continues to evaluate various technologies to address those issues, but so far hasn't approved any.

One system being evaluated was developed by GE Security in partnership with Mr. Brill's company. It uses explosives-detection technology to examine travelers' shoes as they step into the Clear kiosk where their biometric ID cards are verified.

Mr. Brill said that while the security administration has not yet given final approval for that system, it is in place for testing at Orlando and is being installed at Kennedy. And, he added, "We expect to be able to deploy at least the shoe scanner part as we open at each airport," including Kennedy when Clear starts operating there in two weeks.

Unisys already has contracts with most of the nation's airports to provide biometric-based security systems for workers in secure areas. .

"Shoes are everybody's No. 1 concern; laptops are No. 2 and outer garments are No. 3," said Mr. Brill, who predicted that technology dealing with laptops and coats would become available next year.

Mr. Zmuda said: "I think this is definitely going to be a decent business, one that's going to continually evolve, given that it is a security program as well as a customer service program." <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

DHS Plan For 'Virtual' Border Fence Still Has Gaps (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

A Bush administration plan to build a "virtual" fence along the Mexico border will cost $7.6 billion and be completed by 2011, but the government lacks clear benchmarks for success, according to a report to Congress by the Department of Homeland Security.

Confirming well-known problems along the Mexican border, DHS also reported that the United States had "effective control" over only 284 miles of its 1,993-mile southern frontier as of March, up from 241 miles in October 2005. The department set a goal of controlling 345 miles next year and the full border in five years. But it acknowledged not having "a wholly satisfactory methodology" of defining "control."

Lawmakers ordered DHS to submit a multi-year strategic plan for the Secure Border Initiative (SBI) and its virtual-fence system (SBInet), citing two failed border technology programs that have cost taxpayers $429 million since 1998. The department's inspector general warned last month that SBInet could cost as much as $30 billion, far more than the $2 billion initially projected by industry analysts, and suffers from vague objectives.

Despite a law authorizing a 700-mile physical fence on the Mexican border, the Congress and White House are pushing forward with SBInet, which would deploy a mix of fencing, vehicle barriers, sensors, cameras and other surveillance technology to create a virtual barrier along 6,000 miles of U.S. northern and southern borders.

SBInet will cost $1.2 billion this year and $7.6 billion through 2011 on the southern border alone, DHS reported. By comparison, DHS agencies expect to spend $40.7 billion for border security between 2008 and 2011.

DOJ_NMG_0102131

The five-year target for operational control of the border is the latest offered by U.S. officials. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has predicted two years, three to five years, and most recently he has said control could be contingent on enactment of a guest-worker program, which could take up to six years to implement.

DHS also issued a new mission statement for SBI that emphasizes counterterrorism over immigration control. The program will promote strategies "that protect against and prevent terrorist attacks and other transnational crimes," DHS reported, while coordinating efforts to enforce immigration laws.

New Orleans Picks Professor To Lead Efforts On Rebuilding (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 4 — Amid continuing criticism that the city's recovery has lagged 15 months after Hurricane Katrina, Mayor C. Ray Nagin appointed an official on Monday to manage the rebuilding efforts.

Mr. Nagin's new "executive director for recovery management" is Edward J. Blakely, a former chairman of the department of city and regional planning at the University of California, Berkeley, who helped Oakland, Calif., recover from the earthquake of 1989 and the brush fire of 1991. He is now professor of urban planning at the University of Sydney in Australia.

"There are a lot of plans, and these plans have to be brought together under one umbrella," Dr. Blakely said Monday at a news conference.

Like other facets of New Orleans's tortuous comeback, the appointment of a "recovery czar" for the city has been pending for months. But at Monday's announcement, Dr. Blakely's precise responsibilities were not spelled out by Mr. Nagin, only that he would "coordinate and direct recovery efforts."

Mr. Nagin rejected a formal plan for the city's recovery months ago, because he considered it too politically divisive, as under the plan some neighborhoods were to receive greater attention than others.

Since then some parts of New Orleans have returned to life but many have not, particularly those most devastated by the poststorm flooding of September 2005. At least half the population remains displaced, block after block of houses are still vacant and gutted, downtown New Orleans is moribund, and some neighborhoods are reverting to green space.

Mr. Nagin, meanwhile, has made only intermittent pronouncements about the city's recovery, saying mostly that it should be guided by the citizens.

The mayor's hands-off approach — Mr. Nagin has said he believes New Orleans's recovery should be "market driven" — intensified calls for a competent manager to take charge. Monday's announcement drew a qualified welcome from some who have looked critically on the efforts to date.

"What will be significant will be when they actually itemize his responsibilities," said Rob Couhig, a lawyer here who ran unsuccessfully against Mr. Nagin in last spring's mayoral election, and who has been serving as an unpaid adviser to the mayor. "It's like a lot of things. You wish it happened earlier, but better today than tomorrow."

Under the loose, citizen-driven process sanctioned by the city, no single plan exists as yet for the recovery. Citizens continue to meet — they did so again this past Saturday, some linked by satellite feeds from Houston, Atlanta, Dallas and elsewhere — and exchange ideas for infrastructure renewal, for example, under municipal auspices.

Further meetings are planned, though it is unclear how much federal money will be available for whatever is eventually decided on, and there is evidence that citizens here are increasingly weary of the process, after more than a year of similar meetings.

Asked Monday why it had taken so long to name a recovery czar, Mr. Nagin responded: "I wanted to make sure we had some momentum and clarity. We now have that. We now have clarity in the planning process."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Meets With Rival Of Iraqi Leader (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

DOJ_NMG_0102132

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — President Bush met today with one of the most powerful Shiite leaders in Iraq — a political rival of Prime Minister Nouri Kamal al-Maliki — and urged him to "reject the extremists that are trying to stop the advance of this young democracy."

The meeting with Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, was part of an effort by the Bush administration to shore up the fragile Maliki government by reaching out to a wider circle of Iraqi politicians. The hourlong session in the Oval Office plunged Mr. Bush deep into the intricate web of ethnic Iraqi politics.

Speaking to reporters afterward, the president said he told Mr. Hakim that he was "not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq," although he said he was "proud of the courage of the Iraqi people." He also said he appreciated Mr. Hakim's commitment to the unity government, and his "strong position against the murder of innocent life."

Mr. Hakim, for his part, flatly rejected one of the recommendations that the bipartisan Iraq Study Group is expected to make this week: a call for an international conference or regional peace initiative.

"We believe that the Iraqi issue should be solved by the Iraqis with the help of friends everywhere," Mr. Hakim said, speaking through an interpreter. "But we reject any attempts to have a regional or international role in solving the Iraqi issue. We cannot bypass the political process."

Mr. Hakim, who wears the black turban of a descendant of the Prophet Muhammed, has close ties to Iran and is one of the most divisive Shiite politicians in Iraq. He remarked last week that if Iraq deteriorated into civil war, Sunni Arabs would be the "biggest losers" — a comment that was widely interpreted as a veiled threat to Sunnis. He is also the main Shiite leader pushing to partition the country into autonomous regions, a proposal that both Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki strongly oppose.

Today's meeting came as the White House is in the thick of re-evaluating its stance in Iraq. Mr. Bush met Mr. Maliki last week in Amman, Jordan. On Wednesday, the president will receive the recommendations of the independent Iraq Study Group, headed by James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman.

The Senate Armed Services Committee has asked Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton to testify about the report on Capitol Hill on Thursday morning. That same day, Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, perhaps Mr. Bush's closest ally on Iraq, will visit the White House. And next month, Mr. Bush will receive another Iraqi politician, Tariq al-Hashemi, the leader of the most powerful Sunni Arab party.

The Bush-Hakim visit is significant because Mr. Hakim is a fierce rival of Moktada al-Sadr, the radical anti-American Shiite cleric who has thrown his weight behind Mr. Maliki. The White House wants Mr. Maliki to lessen his dependence on Mr. Sadr; one way to advance that cause would be to bolster Mr. Hakim's ties with Mr. Maliki.

Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, outlined the strategy in a classified memo published by The New York Times last week. "Press Sunni and other Iraqi leaders (especially Hakim) to support Maliki," Mr. Hadley wrote, in a section outlining how the White House might drive a wedge between Mr. Maliki and Mr. Sadr.

By meeting with leaders other than Mr. Maliki, Mr. Bush runs the risk of undermining the Iraqi prime minister — whom he declared ''the right guy for Iraq" during their meeting in Amman — by seeming to hedge his bets with others who might claim power should the Maliki government fail.

In an interview with Brit Hume of Fox News, Mr. Bush said he raised that issue with Mr. Hakim today.

"I said, 'I just want you to understand, as you know, I met with the prime minister, the head of the government,' " Mr. Bush said. "And that I don't want the prime minister to construe that this meeting in any way doesn't support him, and he said, look, I understand that as well."

Mr. Hakim's close ties to Iran also pose potential problems for the Bush administration. His party, usually referred to by its acronym, Sciri, was founded in Iran and its armed wing, the Badr Brigade, was widely accused by Sunni Arabs of operating death squads in the aftermath of the American invasion of Iraq.

Mr. Hakim fended off those charges today in an appearance at the United States Institute for Peace, following his White House visit. "We reject all those accusations," Mr. Hakim said, asked by a reporter if his organization is responsible for murder, torture and abduction. He added, "We say there is no evidence. Nothing of that happened."

At the White House, the press secretary, Tony Snow was peppered with questions about why Mr. Bush was meeting with Mr. Hakim.

“This is a man who spent 20 years in Iran when Saddam Hussein was in power,” Mr. Snow said, “but he’s also made it clear that he sees himself as an Iraqi leader, not someone who is beholden to Iran.” <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Shiite Leader Sees No Role For Iraq's Neighbors (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — The leader of a key Shiite Muslim faction in the Iraqi government told President Bush on Monday that his country's problems could not be solved by enlisting the help of Iran and Syria, as a blue-ribbon commission is expected to recommend.

The remarks by Abdelaziz Hakim, whose Shiite political party holds the highest number of seats in the parliament, gave the president an important Baghdad ally in his opposition to such an overture, two days before the bipartisan Iraq Study Group is scheduled to deliver its report.

"We reject any attempts to have a regional or international role in solving the Iraqi issue," Hakim said after the meeting. "Iraq should be in a position to solve Iraqi problems."

Hakim rejected any international conference to solve Iraq's problems, a White House official said, speaking on condition of anonymity in accordance with White House ground rules. And Bush underscored his concerns in the private meeting, speaking directly "about Iran and Syria and the critical need for them to respect Iraqi sovereignty and stop destructive activity that undermines Iraq," the official said.

The Bush administration has promoted Hakim as a moderate Iraqi voice despite ties he formed during 20 years of exile spent largely in Iran.

Hakim's invitation to the Oval Office gave Bush an opportunity to hear an informed voice on Iran, as well as a potential courier for any messages from Washington to the leadership in Tehran. The meeting followed a week of Bush administration diplomacy on the Middle East that ended in disappointment for the White House after Arab leaders expressed concern over growing instability in Iraq and elsewhere.

On Monday, Bush renewed his declaration, in Hakim's presence, that he was "not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq," but that he wanted to continue "to work with the sovereign government" there.

Even as Hakim said that the political solution must come from within Iraq, he reached out for assistance from "the international level and the regional level in order to defeat terrorism." He also said that he and Bush had discussed the arms and training that Iraq would need to meet its security needs.

The two met privately for about 20 minutes and with aides for nearly an hour. A total of 50 minutes had been allotted for the two meetings.

In a speech later to the U.S. Institute of Peace, Hakim called for a stiffer U.S. military response to violence by militias, saying that "the deterring factors are not up to the level of their criminal activities."

"The strikes they are getting from the multinational forces are not hard enough to put an end to their acts," he said.

Hakim leads the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. It was established in Iran in 1982, providing a political home for Iraqi Shiite exiles during Saddam Hussein's rule. Members of an armed wing of the group, the Badr Brigade, have been accused of engaging in criminal activity under the cover of Iraqi security forces.

The White House official, reporting on the Oval Office discussions, said Hakim sought support for strengthening Iraqi security forces to "bring to justice those operating outside the rule of law."

Pressed on Hakim's ties to Iran and the militia, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said as the session was getting underway that Hakim was an Iraqi leader, and "not somebody who is beholden to Iran." He said Bush planned to discuss the militia activities with Hakim.

DOJ_NMG_0102134

"What Mr. Al-Hakim has also done is he has talked about the importance of reconciliation within Iraq," Snow said. "He is a significant force in Iraqi politics."

In extensive comments about Hakim during an interview with Fox News Channel, Bush said he came away from the meeting convinced that Hakim was committed to a unity government. Bush also said he had heard no reference to Shiite dominance to the exclusion of others.

In a reference to the various militias, Bush said that Hakim saw no place for murderers in a constitutional government.

The president used the Fox interview to counter some of the criticism in the run-up to Wednesday's release of the report by the Iraq Study Group, which is headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.). The panel is expected to recommend that Bush shift course in Iraq and begin withdrawing U.S. troops.

Iraqi Shiite Leader Speaks Bluntly In Washington (WP)

By Robin Wright And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

President Bush yesterday told the leader of Iraq's largest Shiite Muslim party that the United States is not satisfied with the progress in Iraq and appealed for more help in fighting extremism and reconciling the country's increasingly fractured society.

But in a speech after their hour-long meeting, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim countered that U.S. troops need to do more to fight the insurgency and denied that the Shiite militias are fueling the sectarian strife in Iraq. It was one of the starkest criticisms of U.S. military strategy by an Iraqi leader.

"The strikes [the insurgents] are getting from the multinational forces are not hard enough to put an end to their acts, but leave them to stand up again to resume their criminal acts," Hakim said in a speech at the United States Institute of Peace. "This means that there is something wrong in the policies taken to deal with that danger threatening the lives of Iraqis."

The only way to eliminate the danger of a civil war, he added, was through "decisive strikes" against insurgents once loyal to former leader Saddam Hussein. "Otherwise we'll continue to witness massacres . . . against innocent Iraqis."

Hakim, who heads the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, arrived in Washington as the administration is reviewing its strategy in Iraq. The Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), is due to publish its recommendations tomorrow. The meeting also comes as U.S. officials try to repair relations with Shiite leaders who had feared a recent U.S. outreach to Sunni insurgents.

The Bush administration is under pressure from both escalating sectarian strife and plummeting U.S. support for the Iraq war. "We talked about the need to give the government of Iraq more capability as quickly as possible," Bush said in a joint photo opportunity in the Oval Office. "Part of unifying Iraq is for the elected leaders and society leaders to reject the extremists that are trying to stop the advance of this young democracy."

Hakim, who leads the Shiite coalition with the largest number of seats in parliament, told Bush that Iraqi issues should be solved by Iraqis. His words reflected the growing sentiment in both Washington and Baghdad that a shift in responsibility in managing Iraqi affairs is essential if the now multisided conflict is to be halted.

But expressing the frustration that is also rising in Washington, Bush acknowledged in an interview on Fox News yesterday that "what Americans are trying to figure out is why Iraqis are killing Iraqis when you have a better future ahead."

The growing talk of civil war in Iraq "scares us, too," Hakim said in his speech. He expressed concern that Shiite religious authorities, who have calmed tensions after the deadliest suicide bombings, would someday lose their ability to counter the violence. He called the religious authorities the "last fortress" against civil war and "catastrophic storms that no power in the world could calm or control to return Iraq to its senses."

At the White House and in his speech, Hakim signaled rejection of recent suggestions for a regional or international conference to bring Iraq's neighbors together to help defuse escalating tensions and end meddling, particularly by Iran and Syria. "We do not want to distribute shares of powers to neighboring countries," he said in his speech.

Bush and Hakim are unlikely allies in forging Iraq policy. Hakim's movement was founded during his two decades of exile in Iran, and its Badr Organization militia, formerly known as the Badr Brigade, is still widely believed to have close ties to Tehran. Hakim said yesterday that he supports the disbanding of militias, and said his own armed wing has been transformed for use in political activity. But some Sunnis allege that the Badr Organization was behind political assassinations that have contributed to sectarian violence.

White House spokesman Tony Snow called Hakim a "significant force" in Iraqi politics. "He's somebody who can play a very constructive role and we hope he will," Snow said.

Bush Says Iraq Progress Too Slow (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, December 5, 2006

President Bush told a Shiite political leader on Monday the United States is not happy with progress in Iraq and sought the cleric's help to curb extremists and terrorists trying to undermine the struggling new democracy.

Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim said U.S. troops need to stay in Iraq to help deal with escalating violence. He also told Bush that Iraq welcomes help from other nations, including those in the Middle East, so long as they do not bypass Iraq's political process.

"Iraq should be in a position to solve Iraqi problems," al-Hakim told Bush after they met in the Oval Office for more than an hour.

Some consider al-Hakim, who lived in exile in Iran for years, a more powerful political figure than Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Al-Hakim leads the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament. His party also is backed by the Badr Brigade militia blamed for sectarian killings.

The meeting was evidence that Bush, under pressure to find a new blueprint for his war strategy, was getting more personally involved in the political infighting among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds.

"I told him that we're not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq, and that we want to continue to work with the sovereign government of Iraq," Bush said. He said the young Iraqi government needs to be given more capability as quickly as possible to secure the country from extremists and murderers.

Bush is meeting on Thursday with British Prime Minister Tony Blair — a day after the bipartisan Iraq Study Group issues its long-awaited recommendations. Bush also plans to meet next month with Iraq's Sunni Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi. Last week, he met in Jordan with al-Maliki.

Before al-Hakim's visit to the United States, two al-Maliki aides and a third person close to al-Hakim said the cleric was expected to try to persuade Bush to enlist Iran's help in quelling violence in Iraq.

Bush spoke with al-Hakim directly about Iran and Syria and the critical need for them to respect Iraqi sovereignty and stop destructive activity that undermines Iraq's unity government, a senior administration official said. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to divulge details of the meeting.

The official said it wasn't known whether al-Hakim specifically asked Bush to enlist Iran's assistance. Al-Hakim told reporters that he vehemently opposes any regional or international effort to solve Iraq's problems that goes around the unity government in Baghdad.

"We reject any attempts to have a regional or international role in solving the Iraqi issue," the cleric, who speaks Arabic, said through a translator. "We cannot bypass the political process. Iraq should be in a position to solve Iraqi problems."

Later, in a speech at the U.S. Institute of Peace in Washington, al-Hakim said Iraq is interested in creating good relations with all neighboring nations, including Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, Iran, Syria and Jordan.

But he said: "We do not want to distribute shares of power to neighboring countries, but rather we want balanced relations."

Al-Hakim said he talked with Bush about equipment, including armaments, that the Iraqi security forces need. He pledged that the government would deal with all forms of terrorism, no matter where they originate.

He also said that eliminating the danger of civil war in Iraq can be achieved only by decisive strikes against terrorist Baathists and extremist followers of Islam. "Otherwise we will continue to witness massacres being committed every now and then against the innocent Iraqis," he said.

Monday's developments came amid rising expectations about a new U.S. policy that Bush is crafting for Iraq — one that his advisers say will be announced within weeks. He is seeking information from reviews being done by the State Department,

DOJ_NMG_0102136

National Security Council and the Joint Chiefs of Staff as well as the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana.

It became increasingly clear that the administration was looking for Iraq alternatives well before the November elections, when Bush was adamantly defending his policies.

A day before the elections, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld wrote a letter saying he had developed a list of alternative approaches for Iraq over a period of weeks. In his letter, obtained by The Associated Press on Monday, Rumsfeld said he and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, had told the president "a number of weeks ago" that they were considering alternatives for Iraq policy because changes were needed.

Rumsfeld also wrote that at his request, Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander for U.S. forces in the Middle East, had assembled a group to work on the issue.

Iraq's Al-Hakim Gets White House Meeting (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi

AP, December 5, 2006

Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim is closer to Iran than any other Iraqi politician and runs a Shiite militia blamed for sectarian violence in Iraq.

So why did President Bush meet him in the White House?

Some Iraqi officials believe Bush wanted to find out what role Iran can play in bringing peace to this country. If anyone in Iraq knows, it is the 55-year-old al-Hakim.

Al-Hakim is the leader of Iraq's largest political party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI. He lived in exile in Iran for more than two decades before returning home in 2003 after the ouster of Saddam Hussein's Sunni-dominated regime.

SCIRI was founded in Iran and its affiliated militia, the Badr Brigade, was trained and armed by Iran's Revolutionary Guard. The militia fought alongside the Iranians in their eight-year war against Iraq in the 1980s.

Al-Hakim's Sunni Arab critics, in fact, charge that he is more Iranian than Iraqi.

"Al-Hakim wants Iran to rule Iraq," Saleh al-Mutlaq, a senior Sunni Arab politician, told Al-Jazeera television interview that aired Sunday.

Al-Hakim, who spoke to Bush for more than an hour at the White House Monday, became leader of the SCIRI when his brother and party founder Ayatollah Mohammed Baqir al-Hakim was killed in a bombing in August 2003. Since then, he has risen from political obscurity into the leader of parliament's largest bloc.

"Bush today met a powerful leader," said Adnan al-Dulaimi, leader of parliament's largest Sunni Arab bloc and a critic of the government. "Al-Hakim was expected to assure Bush that he is not a tool in Iran's hands, but that he can take a message back to the Iranians from him."

While al-Hakim's ties to Iran inspire suspicion among Sunni Iraqis, they apparently enhanced his prestige with the U.S. — especially as the Bush administration searches for an exit strategy from its 44-month-old military involvement in Iraq.

A report by a bipartisan commission due out Wednesday is expected to offer a set of military and political options for Iraq including an effort to enlist Iran's help in curbing the violence.

Bush refuses to speak directly to Iran, a U.S. adversary for almost 30 years. That prompted al-Hakim to consider volunteering as an intermediary between Washington and Tehran, according to key advisers to the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who talked with al-Hakim before his Washington visit.
