"He could be a champion, a great one. There are going to be thousands of disabled people here, maybe more. There's nothing keeping him from doing anything. We just want him to reach his full potential."

In Iraqi Provinces, NATO Could Help (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

The Black Hawk helicopters skim out over the rooftops of Baghdad, leaving the palm-lined boulevards of the Green Zone, the walled city within a city that Western officials seldom leave, and heading into the Red Zone, the land of uncertainty that is the rest of Iraq.

It might better be described as the Dust Zone. The dun-colored, garbage-ridden sprawl of the city yields to an expanse of dirt, somewhere between desert and wasteland, as the two low-flying choppers swing south. Only beside the Euphrates is the land fertile. Children in farmyards wave and jump, little bundles of enthusiasm in a country of fear.

Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts is being ferried by the U.S. military to Hilla, a provincial town about 110 kilometers, or 70 miles, south of Baghdad. Hilla is adjacent to Babylon, the ancient city that Saddam Hussein, his megalomania in overdrive, chose to rebuild, describing himself as the son of King Nebuchadnezzar.

But his legacy is not splendor; it is ruin. The wreckage is apparent in the shattered infrastructure of Iraq, but is less immediately evident in the places where it is most damaging: the conspiracy-filled, terror-haunted, initiative-stripped minds of Iraqis.

In Hilla, the United States recently established a Provincial Reconstruction Team, or PRT, a group of military and civilian officials working to jump-start the economy by instilling in Iraqis the conviction that they now have control of their own lives and can make decisions at local level without awaiting a despot's word from Baghdad.

It is to assess this experiment, tried with some success by NATO in Afghanistan, that Kerry has headed into the provinces. The blue shirt and Hermès tie, familiar on the U.S. campaign trail, are offset here, with a certain chic, by a camouflage flak jacket, removed as he strides into the regional embassy. Officials headed by Fred Fonteneau, a diplomat with wide experience in the Middle East, gather around a table. The atmosphere is businesslike: no coffee, no drinks. Kerry wastes little time: "What kinds of problems do you face?"

The list is long, but begins with security, or rather its absence. Although the immediate area is largely Shiite, and the insurgency has been led by Sunnis, attacks are not infrequent. A favored method is roadside bombs. Two people from the regional office were killed by one last year.

"As soon as we've got used to one kind of method, they shift to another," says Major Lloyd Navarro, a U.S. officer attached to the PRT. Of late, explosive devices, believed to be manufactured in Iran, that direct armor-penetrating projectiles have proved particularly devastating.

Kerry is puzzled. Why is a largely Shiite area so treacherous? "This suggests a greater depth to the insurgency than has been described," he says. Babil Province, where Hilla is situated, has a population of 1.6 million, of whom 75 percent are Shia and 25 percent Sunnis living mainly in the northern part.

Fonteneau and other officials try to explain. There are opportunists who don't want stable government. There are followers of the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr. There are tribal rivalries and fights between militias. In short, there's a fog out there beyond the compound's walls in which no one faction has a monopoly on violence.

The bottom line is this: every time anyone heads out, a four-vehicle convoy is required, protected by more than a dozen guards from the Blackwater USA security firm of North Carolina. This protection gets hugely expensive, absorbing resources needed for reconstruction.

The senator ponders this. Even in a stable environment, the challenges would be daunting. Kerry has before him a 14-page paper setting out the "institutional challenges" in Hilla.

"Legislature branch is weak with limited power and no procedural rules or regulations," it says. "Executive branch answers to the federal, not provincial government. It is inefficient and riddled with corruption."

The judicial branch is weak. The police have strong leadership, "but are under siege to become a political arm of SCIRI," the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a major Shiite political party.

In short, the Hilla PRT, currently 44 personnel and growing, is confronted by the challenge of reinventing an entire political culture as it pursues its mission statement: "Developing a transparent, functional, responsive and representative government."

This will take time, but funds are running out and skepticism in Washington is growing. Kerry is told to deliver the message to Congress that Iraq needs and merits more money. In an impassioned outburst, Martin Hanratty of the U.S. Agency for International Development says:

"The demand is unbelievable from Iraqis. They are excited about what we are doing. If we can't get it together to support that, there is something wrong with us. Not with them, but with us."

There is something else wrong in Hilla, and elsewhere in Iraq. In Afghanistan, the work of the PRTs has not been that of America alone, but of America and its allies in NATO. What is the alliance for if not to fight the most critical battle of this generation: the forging, against the odds, of a decent and democratic Iraq that could change the closed, repressive culture of the Middle East?

The disagreements over the start of the war, and the Bush administration's misrepresentation of its justification, no longer matter. The United States is deep in Iraq, and real NATO assistance could make a decisive difference, as it has in Afghanistan.

A 90-day action plan in Hilla includes development of telecommunications services, aerial spraying of palm groves to stop a disease that has devastated date production, and installation of 14 drinking-water supply networks. Is there any reason France and Germany couldn't get behind that?

There is a reason, of course: overwhelming opposition in those countries to the war. That opposition is short-sighted but will not go away. As for Kerry, the darling of the French and Germans, his verdict is sober: "There are a lot of difficulties, but this is not impossible. We are doing many things better than we were."

America's Message To Iraq (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

America's agile envoy in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, is working these days to cajole Iraqi political leaders to put aside narrow interests in favor of a government of national unity. But behind the political dickering lies a stark message: If the Iraqis can't agree on a broad-based government of reconciliation, the United States may have to reduce its military and economic support. America won't bankroll one side in a civil war.

I spoke with Khalilzad by telephone this week about his efforts to coax a compromise from the Iraqis. By most accounts, the Afghan-born diplomat has been a brilliant ringmaster of the Baghdad political circus. But even he can't soften the dilemma facing the Iraqis: They must find a way to work together or the fragile Iraqi state will unravel.

The American envoy is deploying a weapon the United States hasn't used much in Iraq -- the word "no." He said he is arguing that the new government must give the two security ministries -- Interior and Defense -- to people who have broad national support and aren't linked to sectarian militias. Otherwise, America may have to adjust its massive effort to train and equip the Iraqi security forces.

"The security ministries have to be run by people who are not associated with militias and who are not regarded as sectarian," Khalilzad told me. "The issue is how forces that we're investing a huge amount of money in are perceived by the Iraqis. If they are perceived as sectarian, their effectiveness will not be there. We have insisted on this, stated it clearly. These two ministries need people who are acceptable to all parties of a national unity government. . . . We are saying: If you choose the wrong candidates, that will affect U.S. aid."

Khalilzad's message is aimed largely at Abdul Aziz Hakim, the leader of the Shiite religious coalition that won the largest number of votes in December's election. The current interior minister is a close ally of Hakim's and a former leader of the Shiite militia known as the Badr Brigade. U.S. officials believe that under his control, the Interior Ministry has condoned torture of Sunni prisoners and increasingly used the police to settle sectarian scores. That must stop, the Americans argue.

U.S. officials see Iraq at a decisive turning point following December's election to choose a permanent government. They had hoped the balloting would open the way for a secular coalition that might bridge the bitter divisions among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds. Instead, the balloting reinforced those sectarian tendencies. Iraqis voted their fears and the us-or-them logic of sectarian conflict. Religious and ethnic parties that maintain strong militias did well; secular parties that support national institutions did poorly.

"We've reached a point of no return now," argues Raad Alkadiri, an Anglo-Iraqi who advised the British government in Baghdad during the first year of occupation and who is now a consultant with PFC Energy in Washington. "Are Iraqis willing to put aside their narrow interests? Is there a real Iraqi state? You can't fudge this. This is the edge of the precipice."

Khalilzad is telling Shiite and Kurdish leaders that they have a golden opportunity to stabilize the country because of a sharp split that is emerging within the Sunni insurgency. Sunni tribal and political leaders who had been backing the insurgency are increasingly angry at the terrorist tactics of al Qaeda's leader in Iraq, Abu Musab Zarqawi. That opens the way for a deal -- if the Shiites and Kurds want one. "The tectonics are shifting in the Sunni heartland," Khalilzad told me. "A fault line is developing that is going to expand, between Zarqawi and his allies and elements of the insurgency."

If the Iraqis can reach across the sectarian chasm, it could mark the beginning of a virtuous cycle in Iraq that could finally bring a measure of stability and prosperity. Khalilzad has been talking with Iraqi leaders about a "First 100 Days" program that would get the new government off to a fast start. He has discussed creating a National Security Council that would hammer out consensus within a small leadership group. He is talking with Iraqi leaders about a national Bill of Assurances that would address the anxieties of each sect. But all these good steps require the basic willingness to compromise, bury the hatchets and bring in the Sunnis.

Khalilzad's message is that America's money and patience aren't unlimited. If the Iraqis can come together to build a framework for cooperation, America stands with them. If they can't pull together, they will eventually have to face the nightmare of a shattered Iraq on their own. Ironically, that's America's hidden leverage in Iraq -- the power to walk away.

History Lessons (WT)

The Washington Times, January 25, 2006

Dec. 20, 1998 (USA Today) -- One day after President Clinton halted a four-night U.S. and British air assault on Iraq, his national security team blanketed the Sunday talk shows to get out the message: "Mission accomplished."

But some critics say it's unclear what the mission was and what it accomplished.

"This was a largely punitive operation," said Anthony Cordesman, a defense analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "It did not cripple any of Saddam's capabilities."...

In Operation Desert Fox, the stated mission was to "degrade" Saddam's ability to develop, manufacture and deliver [WMD]. After four days, the Pentagon said his weapon-making capacity was diminished but that it was too early to say how much. And critics said the vague word "degrade" had been used deliberately to allow leaders to claim success no matter what...

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Slapping Down A Dynamic Duo (WSJ)

By Peter Lattman And Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

The Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission long have worked in concert in fighting corporate wrongdoing, securing convictions and settlements in recent years against former executives at WorldCom Inc., Enron and elsewhere.

The SEC can bring civil charges and seek to impose financial penalties and to ban transgressors from top jobs at publicly traded corporations or from the securities industry. The Justice Department can bring criminal charges and seek prison sentences for the most serious white-collar violators.

In two recent cases, however, federal judges have taken the agencies to task for using what the judges deemed an unfair one-two-punch approach in criminal cases.

In Oregon this month, a judge dismissed criminal charges against three corporate executives, saying the Justice Department unconstitutionally pursued a stealth criminal investigation under the cloak of a less-threatening civil proceeding by the SEC. And in Alabama last year, a judge dismissed charges that former HealthSouth Corp. Chief Executive Richard Scrushy lied to the SEC, ruling that he should have been warned that the Justice Department already had opened a criminal investigation when the SEC questioned him.

In both cases, the judges found the line between the agencies' roles had become improperly blurred.

"It is entirely appropriate and necessary for courts to make sure that line is clear," says defense lawyer Jacob Frenkel, a former SEC lawyer and federal prosecutor.

The SEC and the Justice Department long have run parallel investigations. Business scandals prompted President Bush in July 2002 to create the Corporate Fraud Task Force, which stepped up coordination between federal agencies.

"It's important that those of us with expertise in the securities field can lend that expertise to criminal prosecutors and work together," says Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's director of enforcement. "All of us do have to worry about making sure we do it right while protecting fairness and due process."

The SEC refers matters to the Justice Department if the agency decides violations merit criminal investigation. But defense lawyers say the system becomes unfair if prosecutors use a civil SEC probe to secretly advance a criminal case.

Without an explicit threat of jail time, executives have a greater incentive to cooperate in SEC investigations. Subjects of SEC probes can assert their Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination and stay silent, but judges and juries are allowed to draw "adverse inferences" from such assertions in civil trials. In criminal trials, such inferences aren't allowed. It puts corporate defendants in a Catch-22: If they talk to the SEC, they might help criminal prosecutors. If they don't, they will be disadvantaged in the civil case.

Though no statute articulates how parallel civil and criminal proceedings work, courts for years have allowed the U.S. agencies leeway: They can communicate regularly, exchange information and discuss strategy, though prosecutors can't share anything they learn via grand-jury proceedings, which are by law secret.

In a 1970 case involving the Food and Drug Administration and criminal prosecutors, the Supreme Court confirmed that parallel proceedings are constitutional. But it said that case didn't involve the government's using a civil action "solely to obtain evidence for its criminal prosecution" or failing to advise a defendant that he faced criminal charges -- suggesting that such tactics might be unconstitutional.

"Up until now, the courts have mostly taken a hands-off approach to parallel proceedings," says Peter Henning, law professor at Wayne State University Law School in Detroit and a former federal prosecutor and SEC lawyer.

He adds: "Judges are trying to find a line to accommodate the cooperation between civil and criminal investigations without allowing the civil investigation to be a facade for the Justice Department."

In the Oregon case, U.S. v. Stringer, U.S. District Judge Ancer Hagerty dismissed criminal indictments against three former executives at Flir Systems Inc., a technology company.

The judge pointed to a Federal Bureau of Investigation memo about a 2000 meeting with the SEC and federal prosecutors. The memo said that because one of the defendants had agreed to an SEC interview, the FBI -- an arm of the Justice Department -- wouldn't conduct any interviews that would flag a criminal investigation "so as not to jeopardize the opportunity to obtain statements from these individuals."

Another memo cited by the judge indicated that prosecutors opted against opening a grand-jury investigation so they could "passively observe the results of the SEC's work" -- a strategy that "provided good investigative results, at little cost." The judge also cited an SEC lawyer's handwritten note to herself to "make sure court reporters won't tell" a defense lawyer about Justice Department involvement.

Judge Hagerty's Jan. 9 ruling was blistering in its criticism, accusing prosecutors of spending "years hiding behind the civil investigation to obtain evidence, avoid criminal-discovery rules and avoid constitutional protections." The judge accused prosecutors of using "deceit and trickery" to conduct a criminal probe "behind the guise of a civil prosecution."

The U.S. attorney for Oregon, Karin Immergut, says the Justice Department is reviewing appeal options and "we disagree with the court's decision based on the facts and the law." The SEC declined to comment on the case, which was the subject of an Oregonian newspaper article Jan. 15.

The judge's opinion "clearly shows judicial aversion" to the close working relationship between the two agencies, says Mary Jo White, a former U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York. While the conduct "sounded scuzzy," she adds, "I don't think it's going to have broad repercussions."

In dismissing the perjury counts against HealthSouth's Mr. Scrushy, U.S. District Judge Karon Bowdre criticized the government for "failing to advise Mr. Scrushy or his attorneys about the criminal investigation."

The judge based her decision in part on a 2003 ruling by U.S. District Judge Inge Johnson in the SEC's civil case against Mr. Scrushy. Reversing a court-approved freeze of Mr. Scrushy's assets by the SEC, Judge Johnson also criticized the two agencies.

"The government had undoubtedly manipulated simultaneous criminal and civil proceedings," she wrote.

Thomas Sjoblom, a former SEC lawyer and Mr. Scrushy's lawyer in the asset-freeze hearing, says parallel probes were more carefully conducted in his days at the agency. Defense lawyer Ralph Ferrara, a former SEC general counsel, agrees. "These folks are moving in shadows with one another," he says.

Judges don't always act on defendants' complaints. Lawyers for Jeffrey Skilling, the former Enron chief executive, sought to bar Mr. Skilling's SEC deposition testimony from being introduced at his coming criminal trial, citing the Oregon case. Monday, the judge denied the request.

Enron Judge Nixes Bid To Move Trial From Houston (AP)

By Kristen Hays, The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0011490

Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling will go to trial in the scandal-ridden company's hometown of Houston, a judge has ruled.

U.S. District Judge Sim Lake issued an order late Monday denying the former executives' last-minute request to move the trial from Houston based on potential jurors' vitriolic statements about Lay and Skilling on questionnaires.

The judge said he wasn't persuaded by defense arguments that a fair jury can't be found in Houston because the questionnaire answers reveal inherent prejudice against Lay and Skilling.

Lake said questionnaires with unbiased answers and his intention to question the pool during jury selection next Monday "provide adequate safeguards to defendants and will result in the selection of a fair and impartial jury in this case."

He also denied defense requests that attorneys be allowed to question potential jurors individually and postpone the trial to send out a new round of questionnaires in light of a guilty plea by former chief accounting officer Richard Causey. Causey was supposed to have been tried alongside his former bosses.

Lake has rejected all those requests before. He has yet to rule on a separate, more recent defense request to postpone the trial.

A year ago he nixed the defense's first request to move the trial to Denver, Atlanta or Phoenix, noting that extensive pretrial publicity wasn't so inflammatory or pervasive that it would prevent a fair trial.

The renewed venue change request emerged from what the defense teams called a "rage of publicity" stemming from Causey's decision to cut a deal with prosecutors. The government opposed any move.

Skilling attorney Daniel Petrocelli and Lay attorney Michael Ramsey also were concerned about potential jurors' comments about their clients on questionnaires sent out last November in the first step of jury selection.

Some prospective jurors called Skilling "a high-class crook" and "cheater" who "would lie to his mother if it would further his cause." Comments about Lay included "the biggest lying crook of all" who "did a lot of injustice to a lot of good people."

The jury pool has been whittled to 164 from the original 400 who filled out questionnaires. Defense attorneys wanted to question potential jurors individually to ferret out hidden bias, but Lake has repeatedly said he will conduct overall questioning. If answers indicate a need to speak to individuals in the pool, attorneys can question them privately at the judge's bench, he has said.

Lake also has repeatedly said he expects a jury to be chosen in a day. If so, defense attorneys and prosecutors would present the panel with opening statements on Tuesday and Wednesday next week. Prosecutors have been alloted two hours for opening statements, while the combined defense teams have four hours.

Skilling faces 35 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors for allegedly conspiring to fool investors into believing a fragile Enron was healthy before the company went bankrupt in December 2001. Prosecutors intend to tell Lake at a hearing Thursday that the government will drop four wire fraud counts against Skilling that are related to Causey counts, so the former CEO will face 31 criminal counts.

Lay faces seven counts of fraud and conspiracy for allegedly perpetuating the public lies about Enron's health after Skilling resigned in August 2001.

Both have pleaded not guilty.

Hard Times Haunt Enron's Ex-Workers (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

HOUSTON, Jan. 24 - For Angelique Chappell, a former administrative assistant at Enron, it all now seems like a mirage.

There were the trips organized just for assistants, including one to California to visit a new chain of hotels where they would be booking reservations for their bosses. There was the time she won a company drawing for seats behind the dugout at a Houston Astros baseball game in a stadium then known as Enron Field. And, she recalls, there were the American Express gift cards that were handed out frequently to those who answered a trivia question.

"We may have been a little overcompensated, but we worked our tails off every single day," said Ms. Chappell, 33, an Army veteran who goes by Angie. "There was so much fun, so much camaraderie among us. At that time in my life I felt like I could do almost anything." But life took a jarring turn for Ms. Chappell, as it did for thousands of others among Enron's rank and file after the company's chaotic collapse into bankruptcy at the end of 2001. Four years of bouncing from job to job followed. Today, Ms. Chappell has finally found a secretarial job that might, sometime soon, even provide health and retirement benefits.

Her experience resembles that of most former Enron employees who had nothing to do with the fraud at the company, in contrast to the success enjoyed by those at the top who cashed out early and a comparative handful of high-ranking professionals who were able to parlay their status and skills into lucrative jobs at other energy companies. Few like Ms. Chappell have been able to restore the glitter of their jobs at Enron, a factor that still overlays the mood in Houston as the trial of Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, the company's former chief executives, is set to get under way next week.

Some of the Enron diaspora have had to start their careers all over again. Karl Klicker, who lost a comfortable employee-training position at Enron with a six-figure salary, recently rejoined the Marine Corps at age 50, and is studying Arabic in hopes of going to Iraq.

Like Ms. Chappell, Mr. Klicker had been in the military, a not uncommon background for many of the people Enron hired. A self-described "base brat," he followed his father and grandfather into the Marines shortly after high school, eventually earning a doctorate in adult education while also serving as a Marine intelligence officer.

"I went from the top to the bottom to the top again," Mr. Klicker said.

In the months after Enron's collapse, Mr. Klicker said, he sent out about 400 job applications and had offers for only two interviews. A marathon runner, he said he had plenty of time - perhaps too much time - to think about Enron during the 100 to 200 miles he ran each month.

Of course, other companies have laid off large numbers of workers - Ford just announced on Monday that it would be eliminating 30,000 jobs over the next six years. But Enron's collapse not only unfolded swiftly, it also destroyed the livelihood and retirement savings of many employees who had believed the company symbolized the future course of the global economy.

"Enron was such an aggressive, complex entity at the avant-garde of many developments," said Richard I. Evans, director of the social psychology program at the University of Houston. "It was not just losing a job. It was losing an identity associated with power and innovation, producing trauma and sometimes grief."

For Ms. Chappell, the former Enron secretary, there have been plenty of tears. It took five months for her to find a job after Enron collapsed. By that time, she had adjusted her salary expectations downward after earning nearly $50,000 a year. About the time her unemployment benefits were about to run out in 2002, she found a part-time position in the Houston office of CMS Energy.

A contact at CMS suggested to Ms. Chappell that she should avoid discussing her time at Enron, given the general unease associated with the company's demise, particularly in Houston's energy circles. But Ms. Chappell, a talkative native of Southern California, did exactly the opposite.

"What was I going to do, ignore that time in my life?" Ms. Chappell said. She joked in her job interview, she said, about how fast she had gone from working for a respected company to one that had turned into a pauper - kind of a Cinderella tale in reverse.

But soon after she landed the job at CMS, company executives were implicated in a scandal involving trades, similar to some of the manipulations at Enron and other energy and telecommunications companies that exaggerated their revenue. Ms. Chappell helped downsize CMS's office in Houston, moving with a skeleton crew of two other employees to a less expensive location in suburban Sugarland, Tex., before eventually losing the job at the end of 2003.

Meanwhile, Ms. Chappell's husband, a native of Houston she had met while they were both in the Army in their 20's, found a new job as a firefighter earning less than $30,000 a year. That helped keep food on the table.

They have managed to keep the modest tract home they bought in Katy, Tex., a fast-growing distant suburb of Houston, where they live with their two sons, ages 12 and 9. Finances, though, remain extremely tight.

"I still have creditors calling me to pay certain bills," said Ms. Chappell. "I was mad at God for a while, but I got over it."

Ms. Chappell found temporary administrative work again in the spring of 2004 with a company that charters vessels for the oil and gas industry, but left that job for another temporary position at a mortgage company last October, cutting her commute to an hour from an hour and a half. It is a solid job, she says, with a salary approaching what she made at Enron - she declined to give the exact amount - and the possibility of benefits sometime soon.

As for Mr. Klicker, with no job in sight, he began painting murals, babysitting and writing about his thoughts on leadership strategies. He said he ate Ramen noodles regularly to cut down on expenses. He founded his own company to advise clients on management training and organizational psychology, but had trouble getting it off the ground.

Finally, last August, he decided to rejoin the Marines in a recall aimed at retired officers. The motivation, Mr. Klicker said, had less to do with his financial situation and more to do with a yearning to combat terror threats. He said he lost a friend in the 9/11 attack on the Pentagon, and still keeps his business card as a bookmark.

"A lot of Enron went through my mind when I was unemployed," said Mr. Klicker, now a captain in the Marine Corps. "But I find now, back in uniform, there are many things I learned at Enron about leadership - like how not to lead."

"Take away the corporate setting and the $2,000 wool blend suit and you see the real Ken Lay," Mr. Klicker said in a telephone interview from Virginia Beach, where he is now stationed.

These days, Mr. Klicker said he was happy training soldiers in leadership procedures and living in an oceanfront rental home during the winter months - "unaffordable in the summer," he said - where his 9-year-old daughter can visit him during school breaks. And despite being almost twice the age of some other Marine captains, Mr. Klicker hopes he has the chance for a tour of duty in Iraq.

"I keep my ear to the tracks for an opportunity," Mr. Klicker said. "Of course, I want to go. You never have to explain why as a marine."

Meanwhile, Ms. Chappell has little set aside for the future. She lost her $12,000 in retirement savings at Enron and has no 401(k). She had to scrimp recently to buy winter jackets for her sons and to take them to a movie.

But rather than relishing the opportunity to see Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling put on trial, Ms. Chappell said, she was hoping to avoid thinking about the past.

"I don't want to turn on the TV and see their faces," she said, her voice quivering with anger, as it sometimes does when she is reliving Enron's demise. "I mean, when is it going to be over? We live paycheck to paycheck and they're spending millions of dollars on their lawyers.

"Ken Lay should have known every nook and cranny of that company. I just cringe when I see his image."

In the weeks leading up to the company's bankruptcy filing, she was training for a different assignment, feeling somewhat in limbo in redeployment, as that status was called within Enron. So she did not hesitate to accept the suggestion of an Enron human resources employee that she accept a "temporary" layoff with a severance package.

Within days of leaving Enron in late November 2001, however, the company was essentially out of business, ending her hope of getting any severance pay. The whole experience, she says, will shape her outlook on life forever.

"I learned not to be loyal to anyone but my family," Ms. Chappell said. She said she still dreamed of advancing as she did at Enron, but that her aspirations were now more modest. She would like to finish her undergraduate degree, though she was not sure what her major would be; entering a new career path in her 30's, she said, would not be easy.

Ms. Chappell said she had thought of leaving Houston, moving to the Pacific Northwest, where she was stationed in the Army, or going to Iraq, where she hears contractors pay overtime-laden salaries into six figures. But the risks are great and doing so would take her away from her children. She has shelved that option.

Now she looks forward to a better life for her sons, hoping they will be able to attend a nearby university like Texas A&M, where she believes they will have the opportunity for an education that may allow them to view something like the Enron story from a higher perch than hers.

"I just don't want my sons to have to experience what I went through."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Members Aided Abramoff Bid (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, January 25, 2006

Reps. Steven LaTourette (R-Ohio) and Don Young (R-Alaska) sought to intervene with a federal agency in September 2002 on behalf of American Indian clients of lobbyist Jack Abramoff as part of Abramoff's effort to gain control of the Old Post Office Pavilion in downtown Washington, D.C.

LaTourette and Young both wrote to the General Services Administration in September 2002 urging Stephen Perry, then head of the GSA, to give preferential treatment to organizations such as Indian tribes when the GSA evaluated proposals to develop the Old Post Office site.

Young, chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, received $7,000 from two of Abramoff's tribal clients just weeks after the letters went to the GSA.

LaTourette, for his part, said he agreed to send the letters after being lobbied on the issue by a former top aide to Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio). Ney is under investigation by the Justice Department over his ties to Abramoff. Ten days ago, Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) pressured Ney into giving up his gavel at the House Administration Committee because of his alleged involvement in the Abramoff scandal.

Abramoff's interest in leasing and developing the Old Post Office building is one of the key pieces of the federal government's case against David Safavian, the former GSA chief of staff who was indicted Sept. 19 on charges of making false statements to Senate and federal investigators and obstruction of justice.

Abramoff himself pleaded guilty on Jan. 3 to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officers. The one-time lobbying superstar is cooperating with the Justice Department in its ongoing corruption probe.

In its complaint against Safavian, federal prosecutors allege that Abramoff repeatedly sought guidance from Safavian on how best to proceed in winning control of the Old Post Office.

DOJ_NMG_0011493

An affidavit filed by an FBI agent in support of the Safavian complaint states that Abramoff sought "changes in the regulations governing the development of the [Old Post Office], including the granting of HUBZone contracting preferences that could have given some of Lobbyist A's tribal clients a competitive advantage in efforts to lease and develop the building." Lobbyist A, while not named, is Abramoff.

The affidavit also adds further details on Abramoff and Safavian's interactions with regard to the Old Post Office, Washington's second tallest building and a downtown tourist magnet for more than 100 years.

"Lobbyist A solicited SAFAVIAN's assistance and guidance regarding leasing the [Old Post Office] from GSA," the affidavit states. "For example, on July 22, 2002, Lobbyist A sent an e-mail to SAFAVIAN's home e-mail address containing a draft letter purportedly to be sent by at least two Members of Congress to the Administrator of GSA and requesting special consideration for HUBZone businesses. Lobbyist A asked SAFAVIAN, 'Does this work, or do you want it to be longer?'"

The affidavit adds: "SAFAVIAN responded to Lobbyist A's requests for assistance and guidance regarding leasing the OPO from GSA. For example, on July 25, 2002, SAFAVIAN forwarded an e-mail describing resistance by an Office of Management and Budget ("OMB") employee to leasing the OPO from GSA. SAFAVIAN advised Lobbyist A, "I suspect we'll end up having to bring some Hill pressure to bear on OMB.'" It is unclear who at OMB objected or why.

HUBZone is the acronym for "historically underutilized business zone," and small businesses located in those areas are given preferences on government contracts. HUBZone businesses include American Indian tribes.

In an interview Tuesday, LaTourette said Neil Volz, a former top aide to Ney, approached his office in late July 2003 and asked him to write to the GSA regarding the Old Post Office facility. At the time, LaTourette was the chairman of the Transportation and Infrastructure subcommittee on economic development, public buildings and emergency management, which has jurisdiction over federal facilities like the Old Post Office building.

LaTourette said he agreed to the request because Volz was "an old friend," and that after checking with staffers at the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, he saw no problems with contacting Perry on the issue.

LaTourette added that he never personally met with Volz regarding the two letters he sent to the GSA in September 2002.

Volz left Ney's staff and went to work for Abramoff at the firm Greenberg Traurig in February 2002. Ney's subsequent involvement that year with Abramoff, including taking part in a Scotland golf junket in August 2002, was part of the plea deal that Abramoff struck with the Justice Department. Both Ney and Volz are referenced in the plea document, although neither is singled out by name.

Volz contacted LaTourette's office on July 23, 2002, seeking a meeting with the Ohio Republican or his staffers regarding the Old Post Office building. Volz's request is spelled out in an e-mail to one of the Ohio Republican's aides. The e-mail was given to Roll Call by LaTourette for this story.

In the e-mail, Volz said he had tried to contact LaTourette's personal office chief of staff but found that she was not available. Volz then e-mailed another aide "seeking advice" when his first message went unreturned.

"With her being out though, I wasn't sure who to contact since we have a time sensitive issue I was hoping Congressman LaTourette could take a look at," Volz wrote. "Do you have a few minutes sometime soon so that I could you a call to chat about a building/gsa issue? Or could you give me some advice on who I should contact to talk through."

Volz was directed by LaTourette's aide to speak to staffers on the subcommittee on economic development, public buildings and emergency management.

In August 2002, Safavian was part of a golf junket to Scotland that included Abramoff, Volz, Ney and others. The trip cost more than $150,000, according to The Washington Post.

In the Sept. 5, 2002, letter, LaTourette asked Perry to give preferential treatment for HUBZone business as the GSA evaluated proposals to develop the Old Post Office.

"As GSA proceeds with this important historic reuse project, I urge you to give consideration to providing additional opportunities for Hubzone businesses in the redevelopment process," LaTourette wrote. "Specifically, I ask that you consider giving Hubzone businesses an advance opportunity to provide redevelopment proposals that could be given priority if they otherwise meet" federal requirements.

LaTourette and Young then sent the exact same letter to Perry again one week later.

The letters were provided to Roll Call as part of a Freedom of Information Act request to the GSA.

Perry responded to the two lawmakers' letters on Nov. 19, 2002. Perry said the GSA expected that redevelopment of the Old Post Office "will require significant diversity in skills and experience" for those taking on the project, including expertise in such fields as "historic preservation, architecture/design, real estate finance, construction management, estimation, commercial development, residential development and property management." The GSA's view was that only "development teams," not individual organizations, would be able to meet federal standards for the project.

Perry, however, added that there would be "many opportunities for small business concerns which will include HUBZone small business, minority and women-owned business. We anticipate opportunities for small businesses to participate either as development team members or subcontractors to team members."

A former Abramoff associate said Abramoff wanted to build a hotel on the Old Post Office site, although it is unclear if it would have been entirely paid for by tribal funds. The project, however, never got beyond the planning stage.

LaTourette said on Tuesday that "there were two things that concerned us" when his staff drafted the letters to the GSA — "preference and an advanced look."

According to LaTourette, the GSA was already giving special preferences and briefings to HUBZone businesses on similar federal projects, so there was no conflict there.

LaTourette said he "assumed" that Volz was acting on behalf of one of his tribal clients at Greenberg Traurig in making the request for a letter to the GSA. "I mean, why else would he come in?" LaTourette asked.

LaTourette later co-sponsored legislation to create a national women's museum at the Old Post Office site.

Mike Anderson, chief of staff in Young's personal office, called the Alaska Republican's letter to the GSA "a coincidence." Anderson said Young has "no recollection" of how that letter to the GSA came about, although he was adamant that Young cannot recall ever meeting with Abramoff personally.

Anderson said he could not provide records of any meetings between Transportation Committee staff and any Greenberg Traurig lobbyists or tribal representatives.

Anderson denied that Young ever sought to help Abramoff. "There is no relationship between Young and Abramoff," Anderson said.

Young, however, has an extensive history of acting on behalf of Abramoff's lobbying clients.

His leadership political action committee, the Midnight Sun PAC, received $7,000 from two of Abramoff's tribal clients, the Aqua Caliente of California and Mississippi Choctaws, on Oct. 17, 2002, just five weeks after he wrote to Perry.

All together, the Midnight Sun PAC received $12,000 from Abramoff's tribal clients during the 2001-02 election cycle.

In addition, one of the Alaska Republican's former aides, Duane Gibson, went to work for Abramoff at Greenberg Traurig several months before Young intervened with the GSA on the Old Post Office site.

Going back to 1997, Young, then chairman of the House Resources Committee, authored legislation to hold a plebiscite in Puerto Rico over the island's political future. At the time, Abramoff was also lobbying in favor of a Puerto Rican plebiscite.

Young also repeatedly acted to aid the government of the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, a group of Pacific Ocean islands controlled by the United States. The CNMI government paid Abramoff $8 million to lobby on its behalf.

Young refused to hold hearings on the conditions for CNMI garment-industry workers despite complaints over their treatment, and he also blocked a proposal by House Democrats to boost the minimum wage on the islands. Young visited the CNMI in 1999 along with a number of Resource Committee members.

While Young received considerable financial backing from Abramoff clients, the former lobbyist never donated directly to Young's re-election campaigns or his leadership PAC. All together, Abramoff's tribal clients gave $20,000 to Young.

In 2000, the firm Preston Gates Ellis Rouvelas & Meeds, then Abramoff's employer, held a tribute to Young during the Republican convention in Philadelphia.

Young also used Abramoff's skybox at the MCI Center in D.C. for two fundraisers, events he did not report to the Federal Election Commission until after the Abramoff scandal broke.

Anderson dismissed the overlap between Young and Abramoff as "mere circumstance."

"If Abramoff is lobbying for Resources-related issues, which he did, what is the likelihood that Mr. Young and [Abramoff's] clients are going to be in a nexus sometime?" Anderson asked.

LaTourette, a former member of the House ethics committee, received no campaign contributions from Abramoff or his clients during the 2001-02 cycle, and neither the lawmaker nor his staff ever took any trips paid for by an organization tied to Abramoff.

Abramoff, The Triplets And The Nanny Fund (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, January 25, 2006

Before the lobbying scandal hit Washington and GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff was still one of the town's most influential powerbrokers, it may have seemed like a normal, even run-of-the mill personal Washington event.

Abramoff, who recently pleaded guilty to fraud, bribery and tax evasion, helped host a baby shower for Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) and his wife in December 2003. The Rohrabachers were expecting triplets and feeling the pinch of the prevailing congressional salary of $154,700 at the time while maintaining homes in D.C. and the lawmaker's pricey Southern California coastal district.

Abramoff's and his wife's names appeared on the invitation, with Reps. George Radanovich (R-Calif.) and Ed Whitfield (R-Ky.) and their wives. The names of former Rep. David McIntosh (R-Ind.), who left Congress in 2001 and became a lobbyist at Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw, also were listed as hosts.

The lobbyist, who had been friends with Rohrabacher since the early 1980s when the future lawmaker was a White House speechwriter and Abramoff was chairman of the College Republicans, allowed the couple to use his restaurant, Signatures, between lunch and dinner for the shower. Only hors d'oeuvres were served, Rohrabacher disclosed in a Los Angeles Times article two weeks ago.

In the same article, Rohrabacher called Abramoff a close friend of 20 years and a "good person who's done bad things and has to be punished for doing bad things."

The article did not mention that guests at the shower contributed to a fund for nanny service provided by After the Stork, a 24-hour child-care service based in the district.

Since Abramoff's plea agreement went public, House Republicans have been scrambling to reform rules governing congressional ethics, lobbying and gifts to lawmakers.

Rohrabacher did nothing wrong under current rules, but ethics experts say that in the new atmosphere of reform Congress may want to rethink whether the rules governing gifts at personal events such as weddings and showers are strict enough.

Rohrabacher spokeswoman Rebecca Rudman estimates that fewer than 25 people attended the shower and that gifts to the fund amounted to roughly $3,000. She noted that After the Stork charges $250 a day for 24-hour nanny care for triplets.

The guests, Rudman said, were members of Congress, staffers and former staffers who were close friends of the Rohrabachers. She said she did not know whether any guests, other than Abramoff and McIntosh, were registered lobbyists or who contributed to the nanny fund.

At the time, Abramoff was representing several Indian tribes, whom he allegedly bilked out of more than $65 million. He, his wife and several tribal clients have donated $12,500 in political contributions to Rohrabacher since 1999, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

In 2003, McIntosh's lobbying clients included the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Pfizer, Verizon and the Coalition for Tax Fairness, among others.

When Rudman asked Rohrabacher whether Abramoff had contributed to the event, she said he couldn't remember.

"He didn't give any more than anyone else did," she said.

She also said Abramoff did not play a role in collecting checks for the fund or organizing the event. When asked what they would like as shower gifts, Rohrabacher and his wife came up with the idea of setting up a nanny-service fund. The invitation makes no mention of the fund, saying only: "For RSVP and for gift suggestions, contact [Rohrabacher staffer] Phaedra Dugan."

"Dana and Rhonda knew they were going to need help when the triplets came," Rudman said. "He invited friends [to the shower], but he didn't record their professions when they walked in the door. It was a small event with close friends."

Radanovich spokesman Mike Lukens said his boss remembers giving $200 to the nanny fund. When asked if the shower organizers could put his name on the invitation, Radanovich readily agreed but Lukens said Radanovich didn't know that Abramoff would also be listed as a host.

The $3,000 gift does not appear on Rohrabacher's annual personal financial disclosure documents because the congressman asked the House ethics committee to waive that disclosure requirement after it had granted him a waiver to accept shower gifts.

The committee, known officially as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, does not make public initial requests for waivers from the gift rule and does not discuss any waivers it grants, according to a panel staffer, so there is no way to tell if Rohrabacher told the committee he was setting up a nanny-service fund in lieu of self-selected shower gifts.

The committee, however, does make public its response to requests to waive the disclosure of gifts received in connection with a shower or gift. Rohrabacher's office filed the request, and the committee granted it in a letter dated Dec. 3, 2003.

The letters are supposed to be kept on file at the House Legislative Resource Center, where the public can look them up. In this case, the letter is missing, but Rohrabacher's office provided a copy to The Hill.

The gift rule bars lawmakers from receiving gifts of more than $50 in value and more than $100 from any one person during a single year. But waivers are routinely granted for wedding and baby gifts, according to GOP ethics lawyer Jan Baran.

The rules on wedding and baby gifts warn recipients "to exercise caution in accepting any gift that likely would not have been offered but for the individual's official position.

"As to any such gift, the individual should consider its source, nature and value, and any possible conflict with official duties."

In this case, Baran said, Rohrabacher satisfied the ethics rules requirements.

"Waivers are granted on a fairly regular basis because there are baby showers and weddings," he said. "There's nothing to prevent the value of the gift from being several hundred dollars. There's nothing to prevent it from being several thousand dollars."

Whether the rules makes sense is another question, he said.

"Maybe there ought to be fewer exceptions granted," he said. "Perhaps it should be reexamined in the course of Congress reexamining all the ethics rules."

Larry Noble, who heads the watchdog group the Center for Responsive Politics, argued that whether a waiver should be granted in this case should depend on who attended the event and gave the gifts and whether they had any business before Congress. But accepting gifts, especially cash, should be avoided.

"I think you have to accept that, when you're a public official, certain relationships that in other contexts may be just close personal friends may require more caution," he said. "When you have lobbyists giving you cash, regardless of the reason, it doesn't look good."

Lobbyists Bring Unwanted Attention To Law Firm (DMN)

By Joshua Benton, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, January 25, 2006

Lobbyists are hired for their connections. But as Washington sorts through a growing lobbying scandal, the past connections of two lobbyists hired last fall by Locke Liddell & Sapp are bringing unwanted attention to the powerful Dallas law firm.

The two men, Roy Coffee and David DiStefano, have been connected to a foreign company's attempt to work around U.S. sanctions against Iran and sell airplane parts to that nation – an attempt that centered on U.S. Rep. Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican accused in lobbyist Jack Abramoff's recent plea agreement of accepting bribes.

The two lobbyists were hired in 2003 by a pair of businessmen with résumés out of a James Bond movie. One, a Syrian gambler nicknamed "The Fat Man," made his fortune in Middle East arms deals. The other, a felon, was banned from East Coast racetracks in the 1980s for his connections to organized crime and has a Tennessee rap sheet for trying to defraud Elvis Presley.

Mr. Coffee and Mr. DiStefano have not been charged with any crimes, and there is no public evidence to indicate either is a direct target of the ongoing investigation. Their activities generating scrutiny predate their joining the Dallas firm.

Locke Liddell spokeswoman Julie Gilbert said the firm still has confidence in the two lobbyists. "Our firm feels very comfortable about their reputation, credibility and ethical standing," she said.

Mr. Coffee and Mr. DiStefano started work in Locke Liddell's new Washington office in October, at a time when the firm – one of the biggest in Texas – wanted to expand its national footprint. One of its former partners, Harriet Miers, had just been nominated to the U.S. Supreme Court by President Bush.

On its Web site, the firm promotes its lobbyists' connections in the federal government, promising "a unique team with a vast number of political contacts at every level of government and the inside knowledge on how public processes operate. This adds up to success for our clients."

According to news reports, documents about the attempted Iran sale have been subpoenaed as part of a spin-off from the Justice Department's Abramoff investigation. Mr. DiStefano was Mr. Ney's chief of staff from 1994 to 1998.

Mr. Coffee – son and grandson of the former University Park mayors of the same name and a longtime associate of President Bush – said he and Mr. DiStefano have done nothing wrong, despite questions from reporters.

"They love the salaciousness of a Syrian-born person and a guy with a criminal record," he said. "It's almost a guilt-by-association story."

That story begins in early 2003, when Mr. Coffee and Mr. DiStefano were hired as lobbyists by a little-known company named FN Aviation.

FN Aviation was registered to an address in Larnaca, a city on the island nation of Cyprus. It was led by Nigel Winfield, a 68-year-old British man who has had a series of problems with the law.

Prison time

He served a federal prison term in the 1980s for conspiring to evade $7.4 million in taxes while living the high life selling jets and owning racehorses. In 1982, he was sentenced to six months for his role in trying to defraud Elvis Presley out of $330,000 through a complicated leasing scheme on a private jet.

In the late 1960s, he pleaded guilty on eight occasions to larceny, fraud and forgery charges in Massachusetts. And in 1981, he was banned from running his horses at a series of racetracks in part because of his connections to organized-crime figures in New Jersey and Rhode Island.

Mr. Coffee said he and Mr. DiStefano had no idea about Mr. Winfield's past when FN hired them. "It's not my normal mode of operation to ask whether someone is a felon," he said. "I never thought that someone who was very presentable, who had an ongoing company you could look up on the Internet, that I should be worried about somebody's background."

'The Fat Man'

Mr. Winfield's business partner in the venture was Fouad al-Zayat, a Syrian-born man who made millions in the 1980s working on Middle Eastern defense deals.

In 2002, a London court froze Mr. al-Zayat's assets – including a Boeing 727 and a Rolls Royce – after the Ritz Casino charged that he had tried to buy about $3 million worth of gambling chips with seven checks that bounced.

That came after he lost about $17 million over more than 150 visits to the casino between 1999 and 2001.

Mr. al-Zayat is nicknamed "The Fat Man" in British gambling circles, according to news reports at the time of the court action, which called him "Britain's biggest gambler." The court also seized his bank accounts in Switzerland, the Isle of Man and Cyprus.

FN Aviation hired Mr. Coffee and Mr. DiStefano as lobbyists to "monitor trade legislation," according to mandatory lobbying disclosure filings. Mr. Coffee was paid about $220,000 by FN in 2003, according to those filings. Mr. DiStefano was paid about $20,000.

Mr. Coffee said the two men arranged for FN officials to meet with Mr. Ney. In February 2003, Mr. Ney flew to London on a three-day trip paid for by the company. He reported on House disclosure forms that the trip was valued at $2,707 and concerned "trade and international business matters."

There, he met with Mr. Winfield and Mr. al-Zayat, who said they wanted to sell airplane parts to Iran but were prevented by U.S. sanctions against the country. They were seeking a special government permit that could allow them to get around the sanctions.

Special permits

Mr. Coffee said he would not discuss the details of his work for FN Aviation. But the Jan. 23 issue of Newsweek reports that, after Mr. Ney's trip, the congressman personally lobbied then-Secretary of State Colin Powell to allow the exception to sanctions.

The special permits were in the end not approved, Newsweek reports, because FN Aviation's proposed deal with Iran fell through. Mr. Coffee said the company dissolved a few months later. Mr. Ney's spokesman, Brian Walsh, did not return a call from The News, but he told the Los Angeles Times that Mr. Ney "did not lobby" for FN Aviation.

According to his personal finance disclosure filing, Mr. Ney returned to London sometime later in 2003 and gambled at the Ambassador's Club, a private casino at which Mr. Al-Zayat was a member. He reported winning $34,000. Mr. Walsh, his spokesman, has said that Mr. Ney won that sum by playing two hands of a three-card game of chance, with an initial bet of $100.

Mr. Ney is one of the key figures in the widening Abramoff scandal. Under pressure from GOP leadership, he agreed last week to temporarily resign his chairmanship of the House administration committee while he is investigated on corruption charges. He has denied any wrongdoing.

In Mr. Abramoff's plea agreement, Mr. Ney is referred to as "Representative No. 1." As part of his guilty plea, Mr. Abramoff admitted bribing Mr. Ney and members of his staff with a series of gifts, including expense-paid trips to Scotland and the Northern Marianas, in exchange for various favors.

Ties to Texas

Mr. Coffee was deputy campaign manager for George W. Bush's first run for governor in 1994. After the election, he was Texas' director of state-federal relations until 1998. He then joined the Washington lobbying firm O'Connor & Hannan.

He was known for close connections to the Bush family. In 2000, the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call said some lobbyists called him "Bush's 'eyes and ears' on K Street."

It's not unusual for powerful law firms to offer lobbying services. Locke Liddell's lobbying business represents a wide range of clients, including a number of firms in the telecommunications, energy and health care industries.

Ms. Gilbert, the firm's director of strategic communications, said Locke Liddell's October announcement of a new Washington office was not timed to coincide with Ms. Miers' nomination to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Coffee and Mr. DiStefano joined the firm in October after a lengthy search process, Ms. Gilbert said.

"We had been doing a search and they came highly recommended," she said. "We felt they each had strong backgrounds and exceptional credentials and matched what we wanted. They have capabilities in all branches of the government."

But Alex Knott, a lobbying analyst for the government watchdog group Center for Public Integrity, said that lobbying firms hire former Capitol Hill staffers like Mr. DiStefano to gain access to their connections.

"Why else would you hire somebody with a revolving-door connection to Bob Ney unless you planned on using that pre-existing relationship?" he said. "The people with revolving-door connections deliver. That's why they're hired in the first place."

Mr. Coffee said he is confident Mr. Ney's difficulties will not taint him or Mr. DiStefano.

"Everything was filed ethically and legally, and there was no problem," he said. "I know we have done nothing wrong."

Feds Claim Ryan Failed To Report $80,000 In Income (AP)

By Mike Robinson

CHICAGO - There was $45 for a snack on the Mexican Riviera. And $540 for an overnight stay at Caesar's Palace on a trip to Palm Springs and Las Vegas.

On trips to St. Louis, Toronto and New York to watch the Blackhawks, the White Sox and the Bulls, George Ryan used Citizens for Ryan plastic to pay for dinners and failed to declare the campaign money as income, an Internal Revenue Service tax expert testified Tuesday.

The total Ryan should have declared but didn't came to just over $80,000 in four years, IRS forensic accountant Shari Schindler testified during the former governor's racketeering and fraud trial.

Schindler testified that the biggest single item was a series of payments totaling $55,000 to help troubled son-in-law Michael Fairman dig out from his gambling debts.

But other items ranged from $6,000 for his elderly mother-in-law's caregiver to $455 in golf lessons for former state senator and lobbyist Arthur "Ron" Swanson, one of Ryan's closest friends.

Ryan, 71, and longtime friend Larry Warner, 67, are charged in a 22-count federal indictment with racketeering and fraud. Prosecutors say Ryan dipped into his campaign fund for years to pay for personal expenses and hand out gifts to his friends and relatives.

No one says Ryan did anything illegal in using campaign funds for personal expenses. But the government maintains he should have paid taxes on the money and that not declaring it was fraud.

Ryan defense attorney Dan K. Webb immediately began building a defense based on the notion that Ryan had no way of understanding the complexities of the tax code and meant no harm.

He chose a dramatic way of making his point, challenging Schindler to show him anywhere in eight heavy volumes of tax laws and IRS regulations that it said Ryan owed the money.

"It's very complicated, isn't it?" Webb asked as books piled up on the witness stand and the hours ticked away.

"Yes, it is," Schindler said.

The cross-examination consumed considerably more time than expected by prosecutors, who had been planning to rest their case Wednesday. Lead prosecutor Patrick M. Collins said searching through "all these big books" was a waste of time.

He urged Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer to speed things up.

At one point, Webb and Schindler went searching through several volumes for the IRS definition of the word "gift" without finding it. But Pallmeyer gave no sign that she plans to hurry the process along, and prospects for the prosecution resting Wednesday faded.

Webb showed jurors a letter from Ryan to the IRS explaining that "it was my understanding that the persons who actually received the money were the persons who should pay the taxes."

"While I have served in public office for 30 years, my professional training is as a pharmacist, not a lawyer or an accountant," Ryan said in his letter.

Webb noted that Fairman and other relatives who received money through Ryan did pay taxes on it - even though he was the one who owed the government and they did not.

Ryan amended his tax returns twice, once in 1998 and again in 2002.

He is not charged with fraud in connection with back taxes that he paid along with the 1998 amended return. But Schindler said he is charged with tax fraud related to the back taxes he acknowledged owing on the 2002 amended return because "by then the investigation had started."

Parents Of Crash Victims Speak After Ryan Trial (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 25, 2006

While jurors at former Gov. George Ryan's trial got a dry lesson Tuesday in the complexities of tax law, the parents of six children killed in a horrific crash that came to symbolize the tragic consequences of Illinois' licenses-for-bribes scandal spoke outside the courtroom in more personal terms.

Public corruption "has to stop," Rev. Duane "Scott" Willis told reporters as he and his wife, Janet, made their first appearance at the marathon trial since October. "You know if it was just money, we may not be as vigilant, but ... deaths are involved."

The couple, who now live in Tennessee, said they were in Chicago to celebrate that 8½-year-old grandson Danny had been "declared cured" after a three-year battle with leukemia. Janet Willis recently completed a children's book based on her husband's discussion of forgiveness with son Hank, one of the children killed in the wreck, after he had broken a window at the family home while playing baseball.

With the prosecution case nearing its end, Willis said he and his wife don't intend to make a special trip back here to attend possible testimony by Ryan himself. "I don't want to make a circus out of it," he said.

However, he made it clear the couple care deeply about the outcome of the trial. "It is related to the loss of our children," he said. "There's a connection there ... so there's a very personal aspect to it."

Jurors have heard limited details about the crash because U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer considered the issue too prejudicial for Ryan and co-defendant Lawrence Warner.

Among the wide-ranging charges against Ryan, prosecutors have alleged he gutted the investigative arm of his office in 1995 to stop its agents from looking into the sale of driver's licenses for bribes by employees under pressure to sell Ryan fundraising tickets.

One investigator testified that Dean Bauer, Ryan's inspector general, refused to let him investigate the fatal 1994 Willis crash outside Milwaukee.

The fiery accident occurred when a heavy piece of metal fell from a truck and punctured the gas tank of the Willis van. The truck driver, Ricardo Guzman, had paid a bribe for his commercial driver's license in Illinois and could not understand warnings from other truckers, in English, that the piece was dangling dangerously from his rig.

Willis said he wasn't bothered that details of the crash have been kept from jurors. "From a personal standpoint, I really don't seek the limelight," he said. "The way it worked out was OK."

In the courtroom Tuesday, Ryan's lead lawyer, Dan Webb, showed a bit of a theatrical flair, lugging eight volumes of tax laws and regulations to the witness stand to wonder aloud how Ryan was supposed to figure out the seemingly arcane world of the Internal Revenue Service.

The witness, IRS agent Shari Schindler, pointed out several times that Ryan had accountants to help him navigate the maze.

Under questioning by the prosecution, Schindler testified that Ryan had intentionally omitted from tax returns for 1995 through 1998 a combined $80,000 in campaign funds that had been spent on personal expenses and should have been declared as income.

The tax charges against Ryan allege he failed to report expenditures by his campaign that went for personal travel, gifts and other expenses. Among the largest expenditures were payments of $55,000 to a son-in-law in financial trouble because of gambling addiction and $6,225 to a Ryan family caretaker.

The government has also charged that Ryan concealed $9,675 in payments from former U.S. Sen. Phil Gramm's failed 1996 presidential campaign. Ryan passed the money on to four of his daughters, who did little or no work for the Gramm campaign, according to testimony.

In late 2002, Ryan amended his 1995, 1996 and 1997 tax returns to pay the taxes owed on the payments from Gramm and to his son-in-law, but Schindler was quick to note that came after Ryan was aware of the federal investigation into his dealings.

In a statement to the IRS at the time, Ryan contended he didn't realize he had to pay taxes on the Gramm payments since he had passed the money on to his daughters and they had paid taxes on the income.

On cross-examination, Webb asked where Ryan was expected to find out about that concept and then handed up to Schindler two thick volumes of the IRS Code, the nation's tax laws, and six more volumes of tax regulations.

Asked to find a definition for gifts in the volumes, Schindler said she believed the answer rather would be found in court cases.

"George Ryan should have to know case law?" Webb asked.

Webb tried to show that the omissions on Ryan's tax returns weren't intentional but simply mistakes or oversights on the part of secretary of state staffers assigned to track what campaign expenditures should be reported as personal expenses.

Schindler conceded that Ryan paid taxes in his 1996 return for a $350 trip that the campaign had paid for on behalf of Nancy Smith, then a caretaker for Ryan's mother-in-law.

But Ryan is charged with intentionally omitting a $226 trip taken by Smith in 1997.

Asked if that could be a mistake, Schindler said no.

Witness Doesn't Connect Illegal Contributions To Bill Campbell (AJC)

By Beth Warren , Jeffry Scott, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 25, 2006

Seven years of investigating. Sixteen months of preparing their corruption case against former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell.

Yet when federal prosecutors had their first witness on the stand Tuesday, they appeared to stumble.

Witness Kevin Ross, an attorney who chaired Campbell's political campaigns, seemed to actually help the defense more than prosecutors as the federal corruption trial entered its second day with testimony that at times was more confusing than convincing.

Part of the federal indictment against Campbell claims he knowingly accepted illegal campaign contributions while he was mayor.

Ross spent six hours on the witness stand Monday and Tuesday detailing Campbell's inner circle and the key players involved in raising more than $3 million to help the former mayor win re-election in 1997 despite serious opposition.

Ross, questioned by Assistant U.S. Attorney Russell Vineyard, said there were several questionable donations totaling more than $100,000. The donations, in the form of cashier's checks and money orders, used various donors' names but all appeared to be in the handwriting of Campbell's golfing buddy, Steve Labovitz, an attorney who served as the mayor's campaign treasurer.

There were also five cashier's checks totaling $5,000 with the names of five of Campbell's family members, Ross said. Defense attorneys agreed that the mayor's family members' names were used but they weren't the true contributors.

Under cross examination by defense attorney Fred Orr, Ross said he didn't believe Campbell would have been the one to misuse his relatives' names to make illegal contributions.

"I can't conceive he would put his family at risk in that way," Ross said. "He's always been somewhat protective of his family."

So while the prosecution will set out to show the seven-man, five-woman jury that there were illegal contributions to the mayor's campaign, Ross did not connect the contributions to Campbell.

Campbell is charged with racketeering, including taking more than $160,000 in payoffs and $137,000 in illegal campaign contributions. His defense attorneys, led by Billy Martin, told jurors during opening statements Monday that there were excessive contributions that exceeded the legal limits but that Campbell didn't know about them.

Ross also said he stood by his October 2000 comments to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution that "Bill Campbell has been the most accomplished mayor in recent Atlanta history."

Earlier in the day, Ross described how Campbell was desperately trying to hold on to his reign as mayor after failing to garner half the votes needed to win re-election on Nov. 4, 1997. Ross said the campaign relied on questionable contributions.

Ross said thousands of dollars poured in, with much of it coming from the cashier's checks and money orders in Labovitz's handwriting. Labovitz, who hasn't been charged with a crime, is expected to testify during the trial.

Campbell won the runoff, beating out Marvin Arrington, who is now a Fulton County judge, on Nov. 25, 1997. Yet Campbell still needed more money, Ross testified.

The mayor's campaign had raised $3 million but was left with an $80,000 debt. Ross said he wanted to take a closer look at expenditures, but Campbell told him not to.

Prosecutors showed jurors a memo Labovitz sent to staffers suggesting it would be a good time to ask for donations from people who had failed to support the mayor or who didn't give "to the best of their abilities."

Campbell's defense team acknowledges that there were illegal campaign contributions and bribes from city contractors to officials under Campbell, but they insist the mayor didn't know anything about the crimes.

Orr asked Ross: "Would you agree there's no way the mayor, the candidate, the governor, the candidate, or the president of the United States, the candidate ... can always know what people are doing in their names?"

Ross responded: "I agree that is true."

Also Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Richard Story suspended the proceedings while attorneys on both sides determined how evidence is to be introduced. On Monday and Tuesday, the defense lodged several objections about the relevance of certain questions prosecutors asked Ross and Byron Marshall, a former chief operating officer under Campbell who was also called to testify.

"We have tried to prevent certain evidence, not because it is harmful, but because it is not admissible," said Martin, Campbell's lead attorney.

"I am concerned that we don't have clear lines of what is admissible and what is not," said Story, who ordered both sides to be prepared to resolve the issue today.

Knoxville Fire Chief Under Fire For Too Much Overtime (AP)

AP, January 25, 2006

GREENEVILLE, Tenn. (AP) -- A former Unicoi County court clerk will serve three years probation for stealing more than $10,000 from his office.

Fifty-seven-year-old Gregg Masters will serve six months of his probation in home confinement. He will also have to pay restitution for the money he stole.

He faced a maximum sentence of ten years in prison.

In 2003, Masters resigned the office he had held for 27 years five days after the FBI raided the clerk's office.

At the time he said health problems were the reason he was leaving.

In September, he pleaded guilty in federal court. He admitted stealing payments of traffic violation fines and using the stamp for the Unicoi County general sessions judge to dismiss those cases.

'Embarrassed' Mobster Sentenced To 6½ Years In Prison (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press

AP, January 25, 2006

NEW HAVEN — Prosecutors said he should have spent his old age planting gardens or visiting his grandchildren, but instead 72-year-old Victor Riccitelli was running gambling operations for the mob.

Friday, a federal judge sentenced him to 6½ years in prison for racketeering, flatly rejecting his argument that prosecutors sought to embarrass him by releasing transcripts of his conversations with an FBI informant.

U.S. District Judge Janet Bond Arterton also found "somewhat preposterous" the argument that, when the convicted mobster was recorded discussing his Mafia induction ceremony and the hierarchy of the Gambino crime family, he claimed to have been repeating things he read in a book or saw on the HBO drama "The Sopranos."

Riccitelli, who has 29 convictions dating to the 1950s, became one of the most colorful characters in the landmark Mafia case federal prosecutors brought in 2004.

He allegedly moved bulk cocaine — a fact prosecutors said he hid from his mob superiors — and was caught on tape negotiating deals while receiving treatment for colon cancer.

"He started chemo in January of '04 and sold a kilo (of cocaine) in February of '04," Arterton said, later adding, "Mr. Riccitelli is a man of great stamina, it would seem."

He was also caught on tape trying to arrange a kidnapping, surprising prosecutors who said most criminals slow down in their old age.

"Spend time with the grandkids, plant a garden — something other than plan a kidnapping," prosecutor Mike Gustafson said.

Riccitelli, who is already serving 13 years in prison on federal drug charges, told Arterton he was in the "wrong place at the wrong time."

"All I know how to do is gamble. I had no education," Riccitelli said. "I leave my faith up to you."

While all of Riccitelli's co-defendants, including reputed Mafia underboss Anthony Megale, struck plea deals with prosecutors, Riccitelli became a thorn in the side of the Justice Department.

He rejected plea deals, accused the FBI of selectively recording him and claimed no knowledge of the Gambino family.

Only on the eve of trial, as prosecutors prepared to make public hours of taped conversations between Riccitelli and the informant, did Riccitelli admit his Mafia membership and plead guilty.

Soon after, prosecutors shocked Riccitelli when they released transcripts of his conversations anyway, revealing that he talked freely about the secretive world of the Gambino family. Riccitelli accused the Justice Department of overstepping its bounds and intentionally embarrassing him.

"It's turning into something personal against Mr. Riccitelli or using him as a scapegoat to put on a dog-and-pony show against, as your honor calls it, the Mafia," attorney John Einhorn said.

Arterton agreed that he could serve the new prison sentence at the same time as his drug sentence but said she did not accept his argument of prosecutorial misconduct or his renewed efforts to distance himself from the crime family.

Gambino Figure Will Be 82 Before Release Date (CTPOST)

By MICHAEL P. MAYKO

Connecticut Post, January 25, 2006

NEW HAVEN — In the end, none of the infamous mob hierarchy tapes were played.

Nor was Victor Riccitelli's 13-year, four-month federal prison term for cocaine trafficking increased Friday, as a result of his guilty pleas to racketeering and gambling.

Instead the 72-year-old reputed Gambino crime family soldier left the courtroom $8,000 poorer.

U.S. District Judge Janet Bond Arterton imposed a 78-month sentence concurrent to the time the Bridgeport mob figure is already serving.

The judge explained that to do anything else would be "piling on." She did note that should Riccitelli, formerly of Capitol Avenue, overturn his cocaine conviction on appeal, her sentence would keep him behind bars.

The judge fined him $7,500 and ordered him to pay another $500 in special assessments — all coming from his prison earnings.

"It was a very fair sentence," said Jonathan Einhorn, Riccitelli's court-appointed lawyer.

Einhorn said if the drug conviction is not overturned, Riccitelli will be 82 at the least before he gets out.

"For him to embark in criminal activity again at that age would be amazing," Einhorn said. "There's no future for Mr. Riccitelli in crime. I hope there's a future for him at all."

Riccitelli, who operated a Bridgeport nightclub for years, has racked up 29 state and federal convictions since his 18th birthday. Most of the convictions involve bookmaking, Einhorn explained.

When he was 71 years old in 2004, just months after surgery for colon cancer and heart disease, Riccitelli was recorded by the FBI plotting a kidnapping, Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Gustafson said.

It involved snatching Alfred Lenoci's youngest son and holding him for $2 million ransom. The elder Lenoci is the multi-millionaire founder of United Properties, a Fairfield-based real estate development company.

The plot never went forward.

Still, Gustafson said, at that stage of life, Riccitelli should have been "visiting his grandchildren, planting a garden — anything but plotting a kidnapping."

Gustafson said that if Riccitelli gets out of jail, "he'll go back to criminal activity he has the support of a criminal organization around him."

The prosecutor said Riccitelli's induction into the mob was "handed out as a lifetime achievement award. He was recognized by other criminals for his accomplishments."

AGRICULTURE

Tomato shortage ends; prices should go down

A tomato shortage, created by eight hurricanes the past two storm seasons, appears to be ending.

With Florida's winter harvest now in full swing, Agriculture Commissioner Charles Bronson said Monday that grocery shelves should soon be full of the state's top quality tomatoes and prices should decrease.

Hurricane Wilma that struck Florida in October delayed the current harvest, sending tomato prices to the $4 a pound range, up about $1.50. Some restaurants, including fast-food giant Wendy's, removed tomatoes unless specifically requested.

Hurricanes made 2005 one of the worst years in recent memory for Florida agriculture. Four storms that struck the state not only caused an estimated $2.2 billion in damage to the state's crops and farming infrastructure, but the storms are believed to have spread citrus canker as well.

CELLPHONES

BILL TO CRIMINALIZE SALE OF RECORDS

Legislators introduced a new bill in Congress that would criminalize the sale of cellphone records over the Internet, following reports that data brokers posing as customers obtained confidential information from phone carriers.

Some 40 companies around the country, including a Tamarac-based firm, have websites that advertise the sale of phone records made from any cell number for a $100 fee. Consumer groups have decried the practice as a violation of privacy rights.

The bipartisan bill, co-sponsored by U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), would close loopholes in the current law, which makes it a felony to pose as someone else to obtain and then sell customers' call records.

Google Launches Services In China (MERCN)

By Michael Bazeley

The San Jose Mercury News, January 25, 2006

Google on Tuesday launched operations in China, a decision executives have agonized over because it will require the Internet firm to subject itself to self-censorship to comply with Chinese law.

The Mountain View search giant is one of the last large U.S. Internet companies to set up shop inside China. The delay reflects months of internal wrangling at Google over how to balance business interests against the company's distaste at having to comply with China's restrictive speech policies.

For now, the Google is making what one executive described as a ``targeted entry," offering Internet search but not e-mail, blogging, video or messaging services. As if Tuesday some Chinese Internet users were able to access the www.google.cn Web site.

They were not, however, able to search for information on the ``three T's": Taiwan independence, Tibet independence and Tiananmen Square, which are all forbidden topics in China. And Google is not yet offering its e-mail service, called GMail.

Ironically, Google's agreement to censor itself and comply with Chinese government rules comes at the same time it's being lauded in the United States for refusing a Justice Department subpoena to turn over data about seaches conducted on its site.

Google needs to compete in the quickly emerging and potentially vast Internet search market in China. That market is becoming increasingly competitive between U.S. and Chinese companies.

But until now, the only way that the Chinese could access the company's services was through its U.S.-based Web sites. But those sites often were sluggish when viewed from China, Google executives said, and what Chinese users see on those sites was subject to filtering and censorship by government officials.

Locating Web servers in China should improve the availability of Google's services, according to company executives.

``Google is mindful that governments around the world impose restrictions on access to information," said Andrew McLaughlin, Google's Senior Policy Counsel, in a statement. ``In order to operate from China, we have removed some content from the search results available on Google.cn, in response to local law, regulation or policy.

``While removing search results is inconsistent with Google's mission," added McLaughlin, ``providing no information (or a heavily degraded user experience that amounts to no information) is more inconsistent with our mission."

To offer its services from within China, Google had to register with the Chinese Ministry of Information Industry and agree to comply with information security rules.

Owing to the delicate nature of the move, Google only briefed reporters about its decision on background, and then released a carefully worded statement. Google executives Larry Page and Sergey Brin were at the World Economic Forum's annual meeting in Davos, Switzerland, and were not expected to comment on the announcement.

Other U.S. Internet companies -- including Microsoft, eBay and Yahoo -- are already established in China. But Google's entrance has been highly anticipated because of the company's global influence and its stated ``Don't Be Evil" motto.

``Google's dilemma with China is a near-textbook case study on the deep question of how much assistance, if any, companies chartered in free societies should render to regimes that censor political and cultural expression," said Jon Zittrain, an assistant professor of entrepreneurial legal studies at Harvard Law School who has studied Chinese censorship.

The human rights group Reporters Without Borders immediately condemned the move. The group's longstanding position has been that U.S. companies should not do business in China as long as it's ruled by a repressive regime.

``Google is following along the lines of other Internet giants and bending to the rules of Communist regimes and going against the original, democratic guidelines under which they were founded,' said Tala Dowlatshahi, the New York representative for the group. ``At some point, they should draw the line and say no."

Google's announcement surprised no one. The company has been telegraphing this move since last year, when it announced the planned opening of a research and development center, hired a top China expert from Microsoft and opened a sales office.

Unknown until now, though, was how Google would make its move.

For now, Google is limiting its China services to Web and image searching, local searching and news.

Google will voluntarily censor its own search results. The company has compiled information on the types of Web sites and phrases China finds offensive, based on information from third parties and by observing the behavior of China's Internet filtering mechanisms.

``We intend to disclose to users when information has been removed from our search results in response to local laws and regulations," McLaughlin said in the statement.

Google makes similar concessions in other countries. In Germany, for example, a Google search for a specific Web site that allegedly contains Nazi content returns a page that says that, for legal reasons, the Web site is not available.

Google's decision not to place any e-mail servers in China is a calculated move intended to shield it from the type of trouble that befell Yahoo last year. Human rights activists blamed Yahoo for the jailing of a Chinese journalist after the company identified him as the owner of a Yahoo Mail account allegedly used to relay the contents of a secret government order.

Yahoo said at the time that it was required to operate under local laws and had no choice but to cooperate with police.

Google also intends to store some records of its Web server activity outside of China so that authorities cannot access them.

``They're trying to straddle, and it always seems like a good compromise," said Michael Lord, an international business professor at Wake Forest Universitys. ``But it can sometimes not work very well in practice. By limiting what services they offer and what they have on the ground in China, it's difficult to see how they won't be limited by that."

Google's late entrance into the Chinese market has allowed competitors such as Baidu and Yahoo China -- now owned by e-commerce company Alibaba -- to secure strong footholds while Google's market share has dropped.

Baidu, in which Google owns a small stake, is the Internet search leader in China with as much as 30 percent of the market, said Dick Wei, an analyst for JPMorgan Technology Research in Hong Kong.

Google and Yahoo each have about 20 percent, he said.

Wei said Baidu benefits by being perceived as a local company, while Google is seen as foreign company. Baidu is more popular with teenagers, while Google is favored by university students and higher-income users, he said.

Freehold School District Using Eye-scanning Technology (AP)

FREEHOLD, N.J. -- The school district in this Monmouth County borough has become the second in the Garden State to start using iris recognition technology to screen visitors, according to computer maker Hewlett-Packard Co.

Freehold launched the system Monday in its three schools, one of which includes the district's offices. The system is being employed as part of a study funded by a $369,000 grant from the U.S. Justice Department's National Institute of Justice.

Plumsted Township in Ocean County started using the eye-scanning technology in 2003 under a similar federal grant.

Iris recognition systems use a video camera to record the colored ring around the eye's pupil. Markings in the iris are unique to each person.

Deployment of the technology in Freehold was the result of a collaboration between Palo-Alto, Calif.-based HP; Renton, Wash.-based Newton Security Inc.; and two New Jersey companies _ Eyemetric Identity Systems and LG Electronics USA.

HP said the Freehold system has enhancements from lessons learned at Plumsted:

_A visitor management computer system that keeps a digital record of everybody that enters the school.

_A system that sounds an alarm when a person holds a door open for someone else.

_A timesaving application scanning driver's license information and retrieving information for records.

Panel Suspends Roane County Judge (KNOXNS)

By JAMIE SATTERFIELD

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), January 24, 2006

A Roane County judge arrested Monday on federal extortion charges was suspended today from his post.

The Tennessee Court of the Judiciary, which handles disciplinary actions involving judges, announced today that Roane County General Sessions Court Judge Thomas A. Austin has been suspended from his judgeship.

Austin, 57, was arraigned Monday in U.S. District Court on an eight-count indictment accusing him of extortion and money laundering.

"This court has determined an interim suspension is appropriate," the Court of the Judiciary order stated.

Presiding Judge Steven Stafford, who heads up of the disciplinary panel and also serves as a chancellor for the 29th Judicial District, said the court felt quick action was needed.

"Under the circumstances, the members of the Court of the Judiciary agreed that it was necessary to act as quickly as possible to suspend Judge Austin," Stafford said.

State law dictates that Austin will continue to draw his salary, estimated to be more than $100,000, while suspended.

Roane County will not be without a Sessions Court judge. There are two who handle the docket. But it will burden a court system already overloaded with a backlog of cases, according to Roane County Public Defender Joe Walker.

In addition to Sessions Court, Austin also served as Juvenile Court judge.

Austin is accused of forcing kickbacks from the operators of two driving schools where the judge sent traffic offenders for remedial instruction and from the chief of a private firm that handles offenders placed on county probation.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Charles Atchley also alleged during Monday's court hearing that Austin regularly used "illegal drugs."

A complaint filed against Austin in 2004 by Roane County attorney Tom McFarland contained allegations of sexual harassment by the judge. That complaint has not yet been made public.

Austin's arrest came after McFarland's complaint sparked a Tennessee Bureau of Investigation probe that eventually led to an investigation by the FBI, officials have said.

Federal Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton freed Austin Monday on a conditional bond after ordering him to undergo drug testing, turn over his guns to his brother and stay away from alleged victims and witnesses in the case.

Judge Orders 30-year Sentence For Kansas Group Home Operator (FINDLAW/AP)

By Roxana Hegeman, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 25, 2006

(AP) - WICHITA, Kansas-A former social worker was sentenced to 30 years in prison after being convicted of abusing mentally ill residents of a group home he operated with his wife.

Arlan Kaufman was found guilty in November of 31 federal charges and his wife, Linda, was convicted of 30 counts. The charges include health care fraud, Medicare fraud, forced labor and holding clients in involuntary servitude at the Kaufman House Residential Treatment Center.

Linda Kaufman was sentenced to seven years in prison.

Federal prosecutors had argued that the couple controlled the lives of mentally ill residents, including deciding who could wear clothes. They were found guilty of forcing residents to masturbate, fondle each other and shave each other's genitals - activities that Arlan Kaufman videotaped.

"You are an arrogant individual, you don't recognize what you have done is wrong," District Judge Monti Belot told Arlan Kaufman during the sentencing hearing on Monday. "You see yourself as a victim of some massive conspiracy."

But Belot showed some leniency for Linda Kaufman, agreeing with Wichita psychiatrist Ted Moeller that she had a dependent personality and was manipulated by her husband.

Arlan Kaufman, in a three-hour speech before his sentencing, said he didn't believe he and his wife should have to spend the rest of their lives in prison for trying to help mentally ill patients.

"It was never my intent to exploit any of my patients," he said.

Linda Kaufman, speaking in court for the first time, told the judge she never intentionally hurt anybody and asked for forgiveness.

"I stand before you today humble and broken," she said softly.

Arlan Kaufman, whose social work license was suspended in 2001, had disputed the reports of forcing residents to commit sex acts, saying their behavior was voluntary. He testified that he videotaped the residents so they could see themselves more objectively when their judgment was not so clouded or emotionally charged.

The Kaufmans incorporated their unlicensed treatment center in 1980 and ran it until their arrests in October 2004. Their crimes dated to 1984.

Body Part Scandal In New York Is Expected To Spawn Lots Of Lawsuits (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 25, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Patricia Battisti had thought her back surgery in early 2005 was routine. A letter from her hospital nearly a year later made it clear she was wrong.

Battisti was informed that the cadaver bone that was implanted in her back may have been infected with various viruses - the result of what investigators say was a large-scale scheme in which corpses were cut up and body parts illegally sold.

The Brooklyn district attorney's office has opened a criminal case focusing on scores of funeral homes in the New York City area and hundreds of looted bodies, including that of "Masterpiece Theatre" host Alistair Cooke. No arrests have been made.

Battisti's case may be an early warning that the gruesome body parts scandal is going to lead to a lot of lawsuits.

The Long Island woman now claims she contracted syphilis from the bone implant and plans to sue. The hospital adamantly denies the allegation.

"I just want answers," said Battisti, 41, a single mother of four, in a recent interview. "I had the operation to feel better, not get sick."

Battisti joins a burgeoning list of potential victims.

Authorities believe two men paid off funeral homes so they could take bone and skin from the dead without their families' knowledge. Worse, some body parts came from elderly people and perhaps victims of infectious diseases, and the paperwork was doctored to say they had been younger and healthier, investigators say.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration is trying to trace the tissue, which was sold to medical facilities across the country and in Canada.

Both the FDA and hospital officials, while suggesting certain patients should get tested for viruses as a precaution, insisted the risk of becoming ill from tainted tissue is minuscule.

But some of those patients are not comforted, said Battisti's attorney, Jeffrey S. Lisabeth.

"It really freaks them out," he said.

Also disturbed are families who recently learned of evidence that their dead relatives were secretly carved up before being buried or cremated.

A lawsuit filed in Brooklyn accuses a now-defunct New Jersey tissue bank, Biomedical Tissue Services, of stealing parts from a 43-year-old woman who died of ovarian cancer in 2003. The business allegedly forged a signature on a consent form, and listed the cause of death as head trauma.

Authorities also found paperwork indicating Cooke's bones had been removed by the tissue bank before he was cremated. Cooke died of cancer last year at 95, but authorities say documents listed the cause of death as heart attack and lowered his age to 85.

The operators of the tissue bank have denied any wrongdoing.

Battisti's ordeal began in December, when North Shore-Long Island Jewish Health System warned her and 41 other patients that they were at risk for HIV, hepatitis B and C and syphilis. The letters explained that tissue products used for surgical repairs came from body parts that were removed without permission or medical safeguards.

Doctors implanted bone in Battisti's back to relieve pain from a car accident injury. Her lawyer said a recent blood test indicated she had been exposed to syphilis; she is awaiting the results of further tests.

The hospital's attorney, Anthony Sola, argued the tissue banks were responsible for screening and sterilizing their products, which arrive at hospitals ready for use in sealed containers. He also claimed anyone getting syphilis from a bone graft would be "a medical first."

Unfounded allegations, he warned, could "create undue fear in patients who need treatment."

Both Lisabeth and the attorney who filed the lawsuit in Brooklyn said they have been contacted by other lawyers and possible victims nationwide.

"The number of potential plaintiffs is virtually limitless," Lisabeth said.

High Court Delays Fla. Inmate Execution (AP)

By RON WORD

AP, January 25, 2006

STARKE, Fla. - A death row inmate won a stay from the Supreme Court Tuesday night about an hour after he was scheduled to be executed for killing a police officer.

Clarence Hill claimed he is mentally retarded and also challenged the state's use of execution drugs as cruel.

It was not clear if the court's intervention would only briefly delay Hill's execution, which had been scheduled for 6 p.m., to give justices additional time to review stay requests.

Witnesses had gathered at the Florida State Prison for the execution, which was put off for more than an hour before word came from the court.

The witnesses were sent home after Justice Anthony M. Kennedy filed paperwork that said Hill's death sentence would "be stayed pending further order" of the justices.

"The court will not rule until tomorrow," said Robby Cunningham, spokesman for the Florida Department of Corrections.

D. Todd Doss, Hill's attorney, expressed relief. "The important thing is he's still alive tonight," he said.

Earlier, Hill lost appeals at the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta. He was scheduled to die for the October 1982 slaying of a Pensacola police officer and the wounding of his partner.

Hill was to be the 61st inmate executed in Florida since 1976, when executions resumed after a 12-year moratorium.

In one of his appeals, Hill, 48, asked for a delay to give him time to contest the chemicals that will be used. Kennedy cited that case in granting the stay.

Hill's lawyers argue that the three chemicals used in Florida's lethal injection method cause pain, making his execution cruel and unusual punishment.

DNA Exonerates Fla. Man After 24 Years (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mitch Stacy, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 25, 2006

(AP) - TAMPA, Fla.-Alan Crotzer stepped into the warm sunlight outside the courthouse Monday and raised his arms to the sky, celebrating his freedom after more than 24 years behind bars for crimes he didn't commit.

A judge freed the 45-year-old Crotzer after DNA testing and other evidence convinced prosecutors he was not involved in the 1981 armed robbery and rapes that led to his 130-year prison sentence.

"It's been a long time coming," said Crotzer, his black hair graying at the temples. "Thank God for this day."

Crotzer walked free more than three years after he wrote to the Innocence Project in New York, a legal clinic that seeks to exonerate inmates through DNA testing.

"Are you ready for what you waited so long to hear?" Circuit Judge J. Rogers Padgett said to Crotzer during the brief hearing. "Motion granted - you're a free man."

Members of Crotzer's family and other courtroom spectators clapped and cheered as a bailiff removed the shackles from his wrists and ankles.

Prosecutor Mike Sinacore congratulated him. "Trying to fix an error in the system is just as important as trying to convict someone who is guilty," he said.

DNA has been used to clear at least 172 people wrongly convicted of crimes in 31 states since 1989, according to the Innocence Project.

Crotzer and brothers Douglas James and Corlenzo James were convicted of robbing a Tampa family in 1981. Douglas James and Crotzer were also found guilty of kidnapping and raping a 38-year-old woman and her 12-year-old girl at gunpoint.

A victim picked Crotzer out of a photo lineup. But Douglas James says Crotzer is innocent. He said he and his brother were the rapists and a childhood friend was their accomplice.

Crotzer, who has never held a paying job, said he will go live with a sister in St. Petersburg and try to find work. His attorneys said they will seek compensation from the state for him.

In December, Gov. Jeb Bush signed a bill allowing Wilton Dedge to receive $2 million for the 22 years he spent in prison for a rape he did not commit. Dedge, 44, also was exonerated by DNA evidence.

"There ain't no compensation for what they done to me," said Crotzer, whose mother died while he was in prison. "But I'm not bitter."

Crotzer said he was looking forward to a barbecue with his family, who promised him his favorites - pork chops and banana pudding. Then, he said, he wanted to take a bath in a real bathtub.

"I want to soak," he said. "I want to get some of this off me."

Girl, 7, Shot By Boy, 8, At Day Care In Montgomery (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

An 8-year-old boy who shot a 7-year-old girl in the arm yesterday with a handgun he sneaked into a Germantown day-care center in his backpack told classmates last Friday after a fight that he had easy access to guns, two law enforcement officials said.

The boy, a third-grader at Cedar Grove Elementary, had been suspended in the past for bringing a toy weapon to school, said the sources, who declined to be identified because the case is open.

He was armed yesterday with a .38-caliber Taurus revolver that belonged to his father, a felon with a lengthy record, police said.

The law enforcement sources said they do not believe that the shooting victim, a second-grader at S. Christa McAuliffe Elementary, was involved in Friday's fight. It was unclear what the boy had planned to do with his father's gun, they said. But whatever his plans, they were cut short around sunrise as six children supervised by a female teacher were huddled around a television set watching Peter Pan at the day-care center.

The sources said the boy threatened to rob the girl and then fired the gun once, striking her in the upper right arm.

The boy's father, John Linwood Hall, 56, was arrested and charged with leaving a firearm within reach of an unsupervised minor, contributing to the delinquency of a minor and possession of a firearm by a felon. His son was charged as a juvenile with numerous counts that police declined to outline yesterday. The boy was placed in the custody of the Maryland Department of Juvenile Services, which provides counseling and treatment to delinquent juveniles.

In charging the boy, authorities weighed the nature of the offense and the child's disciplinary history against his age, officials said.

"An innocent 7-year-old girl was shot in the arm inches away from her heart," Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler said. "In the final analysis, given this particular child's personal history, both at home and school, the decision was made that it would be in the best interest of this juvenile to be charged."

Minutes before 7 a.m., police received the call about the shooting at For Kids We Care Inc., which rents a unit at the Northlake apartments in the 12600 block of Grey Eagle Court. For Kids We Care cares for children before the regular school day begins.

Paramedics rushed the girl to the sports field of her school, near the apartments, and about 7:35 a.m. a state police helicopter took her from the field to Children's Hospital in the District. She was reported in stable condition last night. Her family could not be reached for comment yesterday.

The sound of the helicopter was the first indication McAuliffe Principal Loretta Favret had that something was amiss.

"I turned on the TV and saw it was happening here," Favret said. Within minutes, she learned from school system supervisors who the shooting victim was.

"Our first concern was for her and her family," Favret said. "She's kind of a favorite around here -- very gregarious, always has a crowd around her."

Miles away, in a McLean office, parent Jackie Tazwell, 29, an administrative assistant, got a frantic call from her sister, who had recognized the name of the day-care center's street from news reports. Tazwell's heart pounded as she called the center, where she had left her 4-year-old son at 6:30 a.m. He was not hurt, she was told during a brief conversation with a day-care worker. Still, she yearned to hold her son.

"I dropped everything and ran straight from work to find out what was going on," Tazwell said.

At McAuliffe, administrators went to Code Blue -- a state of heightened awareness used in emergency situations. School officials told parents concerned about the shooting that their children would be safe in school.

"Not a lot of kids knew about this incident," said Favret, the principal. "It was scary for parents to hear that a kid had a gun inside a backpack. The reality is, it's scary that we're in a large community where people have guns and kids have access to them."

When asked by police where he got the gun, the 8-year-old boy said "he brought the handgun from home and that it was his father's," according to a police document. The boy also "stated that there were numerous additional firearms in that residence which he had access to," the document said.

Hall's criminal history dates to at least 1968 in Baltimore, according to a list of 17 offenses outlined in the police document prepared yesterday. The list says he has been charged with assault with the intent to commit murder, battery, intimidating a witness, assault with the intent to maim and a handgun violation, among other offenses. It did not say how many charges had led to convictions.

Hall was being held on $750,000 bond.

Parents of McAuliffe students expressed shock and anger yesterday.

"It's very scary," said Rana Kuri, 41, whose 10-year-old son is a fifth-grader. "This is an elementary school. Are they going to put in a metal detector?" She paused, seemingly outraged by the thought. "They might as well consider it."

Jason Musser, 25, whose 7-year-old daughter attends McAuliffe, said he was concerned by what he perceived to be a recent surge in crime in Germantown.

"This is a shocker, especially happening just across the street" from the school, he said. "I was a kid here. I would never feel unsafe walking alone at night. I don't do that anymore."

The center is one of two operated by For Kids We Care. The second is at the Canterbury apartments in the 19900 block of Sweetgum Circle in Germantown. Property managers at both locations asked reporters to leave the premises yesterday. A woman who answered the phone at the Canterbury center declined to comment.

Tazwell said she thought the day-care staff handled the situation well. She said she plans to continue taking her son to the center. Her son seems unfazed by what he witnessed, she said.

"He hasn't talked about it unless he's been asked," she said.

The shooting came days after 4-year old Fahad Islam was hit in the head Friday night by what appeared to be a stray bullet while playing in his Columbia home. He was taken to the hospital in serious condition but is expected to be released in two to three weeks, according to Renu Shrestha, a family friend.

Howard County police said they are trying to determine who was responsible for the shooting.

Boy, 8, 'Accidentally' Shoots Girl (WT)

By Arlo Wagner And Matthew Cella

Montgomery County police yesterday charged a Germantown man and his 8-year-old son after the boy took his father's handgun and shot a 7-year-old girl in the arm while playing with it at a child care center before school.

John Linwood Hall, 56, was charged with leaving a firearm in a location accessible to a minor, contributing to the delinquency of a minor and possession of a firearm by a felon. He was held last night in the Seven Locks Detention Center.

Police also said they "initiated charges" against Mr. Hall's son, whose name was not released because he is a juvenile. They referred calls for comment to the county's Department of Juvenile Services.

Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler confirmed that the boy was charged in the case, but he would not identify the charges. Mr. Gansler said that authorities considered the seriousness of the incident and the age of the boy in deciding to file charges.

"In the final analysis, given the history of this boy, both at school and at home, the decision was made to charge him and get him into the system and get him the help he needs," Mr. Gansler said.

Officer Derek Baliles, a county police spokesman, said the shooting occurred just before 7 a.m. at the For Kids We Care child care center at 12648 Grey Eagle Court in Germantown.

Police said the boy took a .38-caliber Taurus revolver from an unlocked container in his father's closet and put it into his school backpack.

Officer Baliles said the gun fired "accidentally" at the day care center when the boy played with it inside the backpack. The girl was struck in the arm, authorities said.

The girl, whose name was not released, was flown to Children's Hospital and was in stable condition last night. She is a second-grader at S. Christa McAuliffe Elementary School in Germantown.

The girl's father, who was not identified, said in a statement issued through the hospital and obtained by the Associated Press: "Everyone has a responsibility to ensure that guns are kept unloaded, locked and out of children's reach to prevent incidents like this."

The AP reported that Mr. Hall has an arrest record that goes back nearly 40 years. The record includes six arrests in Baltimore between 1968 and 1970. There are also eight arrests in Montgomery and Frederick counties from 1971 to 1989. The charges include contributing to the delinquency of a minor, assault with intent to murder and intimidating a witness. The outcome of those cases isn't clear, according to the AP.

Police said Mr. Hall had the .38 caliber Taurus for several years and that he and his son live in the Northlake apartment complex where For Kids We Care center is located.

The center, which caters to infants and toddlers and offers before- and after-school programs, is located in a specially outfitted ground-floor apartment that's connected to a fenced-in outdoor playground.

When police arrived, Mr. Hall's son, the wounded girl and four other children were calm, police said. "The child care providers did a marvelous job," said Lucille Baur, a county police spokeswoman.

Providers voluntarily closed the center where the incident occurred and another one they operate about two miles away.

"It scared me," said Rashida Means, 25, who lives in the apartment complex.

William Reinhard, a spokesman for the Maryland State Department of Education, said the child care facility has been licensed since August 2003.

The license is in the name of Touye Simmons. More recent documents identify the owner and president of For Kids We Care as Touye Harris.

Mr. Reinhard said the department would conduct its own investigation. He could not say whether the center would reopen today.

Messages left yesterday at the center's two locations were not returned.

Boy Shoots Girl (WP)

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

AT A DAY-CARE center in Germantown, an 8-year-old boy shot a 7-year-old girl with a handgun yesterday, hitting her in the arm but not killing her. The boy, whose father is a convicted felon with a long rap sheet, had bragged that he had access to guns. But why is it that after years of similar incidents and anguish and debate, the country has yet to enact laws to prevent such tragedies?

In the late 1990s, then-Gov. Parris N. Glendening's task force on gun violence in Maryland pushed for tougher rules mandating safety devices on handguns. In the following years, the state adopted a number of laws -- stronger than most in the nation -- including a requirement that handguns sold in Maryland be equipped with a childproof locking device, and another forbidding people from leaving loaded firearms within reach of unsupervised children. But other regulations -- potentially more effective ones in preventing accidents such as yesterday's -- went nowhere. Most notable was a proposal that guns be "personalized" by incorporating technology restricting a gun's use to its owner, for instance by using fingerprint recognition. In a study published in 2003, researchers led by Jon S. Vernick of the Johns Hopkins School of Public Health examined 117 unintentional homicide deaths in Maryland from 1991 to 1998, four-fifths of them involving handguns. The conclusion: 37 percent of the deaths could have been prevented by a "personalized" gun.

A third or more U.S. households keep a gun at home, often a loaded one, in the belief that it will protect them from intruders who would do them harm. These guns may furnish some people with a sense of personal security, and at times they do safeguard the lives of innocent homeowners. But the pervasive presence of guns in homes comes with a cost; a substantial body of research suggests that households with guns are more likely to be the scenes of suicides and homicides than those without.

More gun safety laws will prevent many incidents, but they won't protect everyone from lawbreakers such as the father of the Germantown boy. Without stricter federal laws on access to handguns, more of these tragedies will occur.

CIVIL LAW:

Lawyers For Defense, Unions Detail Their Differences For Federal Judge (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

Judge Emmet G. Sullivan presides over his federal courtroom with an easy manner, a sleek laptop computer on his desk and the ancient scales of justice behind his chair. He does not always require the audience to stand when he enters and leaves the courtroom, and yesterday he gave ample time to Justice Department and union lawyers to argue over new workplace rules at the Defense Department.

The rules will change the way in which 650,000 Defense civil service employees are assigned work, paid and disciplined. A coalition of unions filed suit to stop certain changes, and Sullivan's decision in the case could affect other Bush administration efforts to revamp civil service rules across government.

The rules, as Sullivan put it yesterday, are "extremely important, extremely complicated." To limit confusion, union and Justice Department lawyers used slide shows to make their points to Sullivan.

Sullivan asked the lawyers to shed light on what Congress intended in creating the National Security Personnel System, whether Pentagon officials had honored a mandate to collaborate with unions on the development of the rules, and whether the Pentagon could waive civil service law on union rights and take numerous issues off the bargaining table.

Daniel M. Schember , representing the union coalition, and Joseph W. LoBue , a Justice lawyer representing the Pentagon and the Office of Personnel Management, jousted over whether rules on labor-management negotiations must be read as a whole. One part calls for ensuring that Defense employees retain their bargaining rights, but a second part gives the department broad powers to limit labor rights and to override union contracts.

Schember pointed to statements by senators, such as Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), that a compromise reached between the House and Senate did not allow the Pentagon to waive the basic requirements of civil service labor law.

LoBue said Congress knew it would be allowing Defense to set up a different system and that the judge should treat part two of the rules as an exception to the first part.

When the judge asked about the process used to shape the new rules, Joseph Goldberg , representing the American Federation of Government Employees, said the Pentagon had not followed the law, which calls for "meaningful discussions" and the participation of unions in revising workplace rules. Goldberg said the Pentagon "went dark" on the unions and drafted a regulation without their involvement.

Sullivan asked why the Pentagon had waited 60 days to start talks with unions on the new rules and whether they had a seat on the design team. LoBue said the Pentagon had provided the unions with ideas and draft proposals and had given them time to comment when a proposed rule was published. The "meet and confer" period was not a sham, LoBue said, contending that unions had the opportunity to be heard.

Hovering over the case is a ruling by one of Sullivan's colleagues on the U.S. District Court concerning workplace changes planned at the Department of Homeland Security. Judge Rosemary M. Collyer blocked the department's new labor rules because they fell short of guaranteeing bargaining rights.

Like Defense, Homeland Security would permit department officials to override any provision in a union contract by issuing a policy directive. Homeland Security has appealed Collyer's decision.

LoBue told Sullivan it is inappropriate to compare the cases, because Congress wrote a different law for Defense that included a provision saying that the new rules "shall supersede" collective bargaining agreements. Homeland Security was not given such congressional instruction, LoBue said.

In addition, he said, the Pentagon regulation allows only a relatively few senior officials to issue NSPS directives, eliminating the possibility that a lower-level manager could curb bargaining.

The case could turn on how the judge views the new rules in relation to national security. LoBue argued that Defense needs maximum flexibility to respond to terrorist threats and reassign civil service employees quickly to support the military. Schember pointed out that the government has not identified any national security problems that would require the jettisoning of union rights.

Sullivan listened, but noted, "This is a different world since 9/11."

He promised to reach a decision by March 1.

New DOD Personnel System Delayed (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

The Defense Department agreed yesterday to delay implementation of its new personnel system until at least March 1 to give a federal judge time to decide whether the new rules pass legal muster.

Judge Emmet G. Sullivan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia told lawyers for the department and for a coalition of federal employee labor unions that it would take him at least that long to sort through the issues at the heart of the unions' lawsuit against the new system.

"It's an extremely important case and it is extremely complex," Sullivan said yesterday during a three-hour hearing.

The National Security Personnel System, which would cover 650,000 civilian employees, would replace the familiar 15-grade General Schedule pay system with one in which raises are linked to annual performance evaluations. The new work rules also would curtail the power of labor unions and make it easier to hire, promote and discipline employees -- all in the name of making the Defense Department more nimble in the struggle against terrorism.

The unions contend that the new rules would gut collective bargaining in violation of federal law. And they maintain that department officials did not live up to their obligation, spelled out in the 2003 law that paved the way for the changes, to consult with employees' representatives in developing a new labor management system.

"They simply ignored the explicit requirement of the law and did what they wanted to do," said Joe Goldberg, a lawyer for the American Federation of Government Employees, the lead union.

A similar lawsuit against the Homeland Security Department has delayed the implementation of a new pay system there by as much as a year. In August, U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer faulted the new DHS system for undermining employees' rights to collective bargaining, and blocked implementation of new rules governing labor relations and employee appeals. DHS has appealed.

Joseph Lobue, a lawyer for the Justice Department, told Sullivan that the DOD personnel system was "very different from Judge Collyer's case." He added: "She was faced with a very different statue. . . . These agencies have explicit authority to do just what they did."

Agreeing to the delay was a small concession. The DOD already had pushed back the start date of the new system to April 30. It will continue to develop a new internal labor relations board, however.

Pentagon Again Delays New Labor Rules Upon Judge's Request (GOVEXEC)

By Karen Rutzick

Government Executive, January 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0011513

The Defense Department has delayed the rollout of its new labor relations system until March 1 in response to a judge's request that he be given more time to consider a lawsuit challenging the system.

Judge Emmet Sullivan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia heard arguments Tuesday in a lawsuit filed by a coalition of federal employee unions against the National Security Personnel System.

NSPS would supplant the decades-old General Schedule pay system with broad paybands that would allow supervisors to use greater discretion in hiring and employee compensation. It also would tie annual raises to a system of rigorous performance reviews. At issue in the lawsuit, however, are other portions of the NSPS regulations that curtail collective bargaining rights for Defense employees.

Sullivan said he needed until March to decide the case on its merits. The department had already agreed to stall the system until Feb. 1 because of the lawsuit. Lawyers for the Pentagon agreed to the second delay, with a few exceptions.

Most notably, the government said it would move forward with setting up the National Security Labor Relations Board as planned. The NSLRB would replace the governmentwide Federal Labor Relations Authority in hearing labor disputes. Its members would be appointed by the Defense secretary with some consultation from unions.

Justice Department lawyer Joseph Lobue, who argued on behalf of the Defense Department and also represented the Homeland Security Department last summer in a similar case, said the government would appoint a chairman, hire staff and complete regulations on the structure of the NSLRB.

The NSLRB would not hear any labor disputes until March 1, Lobue added. Union lawyers agreed to the deal, although they said they will continue to contest the legality of the new board in their lawsuit.

The department said it will retain the right to continue training employees on the workings of NSPS and developing further details of the system. Recently, Defense announced a significant delay and scaling back of the first installment of the human resources portion of the system to allow more time to work on it.

Sullivan heard more than three hours of arguments on NSPS collective bargaining procedures, and called the Pentagon's ability to waive previously negotiated collective bargaining agreements "the principle question concerning the validity of the labor relations system."

In August, D.C. Circuit Judge Rosemary Collyer ruled that DHS' similar labor relations system was illegal, in large part because of this very ability.

Sullivan said he had read Collyer's decision closely. But both sides pointed out that Congress passed different laws to authorize the Defense and Homeland Security systems, and the departments have developed different regulations to implement them.

"It's a very separate case," Lobue said. "It's also a different regulation. The [DHS] regulation authorized the agencies to impose limitations on bargaining by any manager in the agency. Here the issuances that we're talking about can only be promulgated by a discrete group of people. You don't have a situation where the danger is a lower level agency official can impose a limitation on bargaining."

Also at issue in the case is the process by which the department developed the NSPS regulations. Government lawyers said the agency met its legal obligation to meet and confer with unions by holding a number of meetings and by receiving input to the regulations when they were published in the Federal Register.

But the unions argued that the meetings served no purpose because the agency ignored their comments.

Sullivan could rule that because the process was illegal, the regulations are voided in their entirety.

Big U.S. Telecom Contracts Delayed (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

The General Services Administration yesterday told bidders on its estimated $20 billion, 10-year "Networx" telecommunications contract that it had postponed the award dates until 2007 but gave no specific reason for the delay.

The telecom contract, the largest ever to be awarded by the GSA, is the grand prize in federal communications work and attracted bids from groups led by AT&T Inc., Qwest Communications International Inc., Sprint Nextel Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.

The contract is split into two parts. Networx Universal, the larger and more lucrative piece, requires bidders to serve more than 15,000 locations in the United States and overseas, providing noncombat communications for the military and U.S. missions in roughly 190 countries.

Winners of Networx Universal, whose award date has been delayed until March 2007 from July of this year, will share $525 million in guaranteed revenue. Beyond that they will bid for individual agency projects.

Networx Enterprise, whose contract award has been postponed to May 2007 from September of this year, is a more tailored piece of the project designed to give smaller companies without global reach a chance to bid for part of the work.

Spokesmen for AT&T, Qwest, Sprint Nextel and Verizon, which all bid on Networx Universal, said their companies were informed of the delay yesterday but were given no detailed reason.

The delay offers something of a silver lining for Sprint Nextel and Verizon because both provide the federal government with telecommunications services under the FTS 2001 contract, which will have to be extended because of the Networx delay.

Verizon has a piece of FTS 2001 because of its $8.5 billion purchase of MCI Inc., which was one of the winning bidders on that contract.

Sprint Nextel spokeswoman Stephanie C. Taliaferro said her company is negotiating a two-year extension of its FTS 2001 contract, which is due to expire in December, to take into account the Networx delay.

A GSA spokesman did not immediately return telephone calls seeking comment.

GSA spokesman Blake Williams earlier told Washington Technology he could not comment on the reason for the Networx delay.

A Threat To The Campaign Law (NYT)

Just when the American public - outraged by the growing lobbying scandals - is calling for more regulation of money in politics, the Supreme Court has opened the door for a move in the other direction. Its brief 9-to-0 ruling this week is technical in nature, but carries the potential to undermine campaign finance reform.

The decision involves the McCain-Feingold reform law, which the court upheld in a landmark 2003 ruling. During the 2004 elections, Wisconsin Right to Life, an anti-abortion group, wanted to run television ads that put Senator Russell Feingold, a Democrat who was in a tough re-election fight, in a bad light.

The ads expressed concern about the use of filibusters to block judicial nominees, and urged viewers to tell Senator Feingold, and Wisconsin's other senator, to oppose filibusters. McCain-Feingold bans the use of corporate and special-interest group money for "electioneering communications," which it defines in part as ads that run within 60 days of a general election and mention a candidate by name. But Wisconsin Right to Life argued that its ads were grass-roots lobbying - an attempt to change the process of judicial confirmation - not an electioneering effort to defeat Senator Feingold. Therefore, the group said, the ads did not come under the law's limitations.

The lower court interpreted the Supreme Court's 2003 ruling to mean that all ads of this kind were restricted within the 60-day window, and that lower courts should not get involved in trying to separate acceptable ads from unacceptable ones. But the Supreme Court disagreed this week, saying that courts could hear "as applied" challenges like Wisconsin Right to Life's, and consider which ads were really no more than grass-roots lobbying.

There is nothing wrong with that in principle. But it is important that the courts develop a narrow and honest test for when advertisements are grass-roots lobbying. In this case, Wisconsin Right to Life was actively opposing Senator Feingold's re-election. It had supported candidates against him, and the ads it wanted to run right before his election were clearly intended to encourage people to vote against him. The claim that those ads were unrelated to opposing Senator Feingold's re-election is simply not credible.

If the courts create a big "grass-roots lobbying" loophole, it will free corporations and special interests to run phony "issue ads" that are actually a form of unregulated campaign contribution. That is not what Congress wanted when it passed McCain-Feingold, and it is not what the public wants today.

If this case comes back to the Supreme Court, as seems likely, it will be an important test of the new Roberts court. At his confirmation hearings, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. expressed his commitment to "judicial modesty" and his respect for precedent. It would not be judicially modest to tear a gaping hole in Congress's landmark campaign-finance statute, and it would not show respect for precedent to undo a key part of the landmark 2003 case that upheld the law's reasonable restrictions on money in politics.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Senate Approves Voter ID Requirement (AP)

By Doug Gross

ATLANTA - Georgia voters would need photo identification to vote, under a bill that got approval from the state Senate on Tuesday.

The bill, which spurred several hours of emotional and sometimes racially charged debate on the Senate floor, now must return to the House for a vote on minor Senate changes. Gov. Sonny Perdue, who must sign it into law, has said he supports the bill.

The bill passed 32-22, largely along party lines. Sen. Jack Hill, R-Reidsville, a former Democrat who switched parties in 2003, was the only Republican voting against it.

The legislation would require a driver's license, military ID or a state-issued identification card, with a photo, to vote. It removes several forms of identification currently accepted, including Social Security cards, birth certificates and utility bills.

The plan was voted into law by the Legislature last year. But a federal judge blocked it, saying it amounted to an unconstitutional poll tax. Most voters who didn't already have approved identification would have paid $35 for a state ID.

This year's changes waive that fee and give equipment to each of Georgia's 159 counties to issue the cards.

Critics argued Tuesday, as they have since last year, that the plan unfairly impacts the poor, the elderly and minorities, who are less likely to have driver's licenses.

Supporters say the bill is an effort to crack down on voter fraud.

Sen. Cecil Staton, R-Macon, called critics' comparisons to the poll taxes of the segregation-era South unfair, saying his effort was about protecting the Constitutional right to vote.

"There is also another side to the civil rights argument," Staton said. "Our civil rights also dictate that we have a right to have our vote count, not disqualified by someone else who votes illegally."

Critics argued the plan is little more than an effort by majority Republicans to make voting more difficult for voting blocs that don't tend to support them.

"This is not about voter identification, but rather a voter constriction bill," said Sen. Ed Harbison, D-Columbus. "This ultimately will have a chilling effect."

Tuesday's debate, which took up virtually all of a seven-hour Senate session, failed to reach the highly emotional level of last year's - when one senator brandished shackles, saying the effort reminded him of slavery, and black Democrats led a walkout after the vote.

Still, Sen. Sam Zamarripa, D-Atlanta, derided the effort as "mean to old people" and Sen. Steen Miles, D-Decatur, referred to the "white sheet of power politics" after a speech that mentioned the Ku Klux Klan.

Sen. Preston Smith, R-Rome, argued that race had nothing to do with plan.

"Why should we intellectually accept that a system designed to verify identity through the use of a photo ID has a disparate impact on the minority community?" he said.

Hill, who did not speak against the bill, said that as a Democrat he helped author the state's previous voting laws and that he felt the 17 forms of identification formerly accepted to vote were sufficient.

Because the Senate made minor changes to the bill, it must now go back to the House for final approval.

If signed by Perdue, the bill then would have to be approved by the U.S. Justice Department before it goes into effect. Georgia, like other states with a segregationist past, must get federal approval to any change in its voting laws.

SIU Receives Justice Department Proposal On Minority Fellowships (AP)

By JIM SUHR, Associated Press

AP, January 24, 2006

Southern Illinois University administrators are weighing a Justice Department proposal that would head off the government's threatened lawsuit over three allegedly discriminatory graduate fellowships, the university system's general counsel said Tuesday.

Jerry Blakemore refused to publicly discuss the Justice Department's recommendations but cast them as a breakthrough, marking the first time in months of negotiations that he's had a proposal of adequate clarity to take to SIU President Glenn Poshard and other administrators.

"We certainly believe we have sufficient understanding of the legal issues for me to be making a legal recommendation to the president, the board and the university," Blakemore said.

Though the Justice Department has not categorized the proposal as its final offering, Blakemore said the university was treating it as such "because we've had lots of discussions for some time" with the government.

Poshard and Walter Wendler, chancellor of the Carbondale campus, on Tuesday and Wednesday were to meet with SIU administrators and key "constituency groups" for feedback about the government's suggested solution to the dispute. After those private talks, SIU would respond, said Blakemore, not offering a time frame.

Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said the agency was "currently in settlement negotiations with the university" and "hoped to resolve our differences without resorting to contested litigation."

The Justice Department demanded in writing in November that SIU halt the fellowships or be sued, arguing that the programs violate the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964 and result in "intentional discrimination against whites, non-preferred minorities and males."

SIU officials have denied that the fellowships discriminate, saying the financial aid incentives promote the university's tradition of diversity.

Two of the fellowship programs are aimed at increasing minority enrollment in graduate programs in which minorities are underrepresented. The third fellowship is offered to women — including whites — and minorities who have overcome social, cultural or economic obstacles.

Nearly 130 students have been aided through the fellowships, the university has said. Just under 8 percent of SIU's 5,500 graduate students are black or Hispanic, according to SIU.

The university has been in negotiations with the Justice Department for weeks but has refused to discuss the dialogue, which Blakemore on Tuesday called "good and fruitful."

Rob Benford, a sociology professor serving as president of the school's Faculty Senate, said Tuesday he looked forward to Poshard detailing the Justice Department's proposal during their meeting Wednesday — but that he would likely question any retreat by the university from the fellowships.

Last month, the Faculty Senate unanimously passed a symbolic resolution urging the school's administration to maintain the programs.

"These programs bring enormous benefit to the university," Benford said. "My concern is, where are the people who supposedly have been harmed by the current policy? All I can point to is people who have been helped."

Montgomery Repeals Lawn Sign Limit (WP)

By Tim Craig

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

The Montgomery County Council voted yesterday to repeal a provision that requires property owners to remove lawn signs after 30 days or pay $30 to apply for a permit to keep them up longer.

The American Civil Liberties Union had argued that the time limit -- a provision in a larger sign ordinance that had been in place since 1998 -- violates the First Amendment right to free speech, and the organization was threatening to sue the county.

Although county attorneys said yesterday that they were willing to defend the law, the council appeared reluctant to pick a fight with the ACLU.

"There is a disconnect between the U.S. Constitution and our sign ordinance, and that is why we must pass this bill," said council member Howard A. Denis (R-Potomac-Bethesda), a sponsor of an amendment to repeal the time-limit provision.

The repeal, which goes into effect Feb. 3, will apply only to private properties. Signs posted in public rights of way will still have to be removed after 30 days.

The two council members who voted against changing the law, Nancy Floreen (D-At Large) and Marilyn Praisner (D-Eastern County), warned that unsightly signs may soon proliferate in neighborhoods.

"The real issue is what it means for neighborhoods," Floreen said.

The ACLU represents a group of residents who erected signs to protest the planned construction of what they considered an oversize house in their Chevy Chase area neighborhood of Brookdale. A limited liability corporation headed by Thomas R. Eldridge, a developer and Somerset Town Council member, bought a 2 1/2 -story house in Brookdale in March and tore it down. The corporation has since broken ground on a house that residents contend will be four stories.

In August, several dozen residents posted signs in their yards that read, "Council Member Eldridge, We Don't Want Your McMansion for Profit in Our Neighborhood!"

In September, the county Department of Permitting Services, which in July approved Eldridge's plans for building the house, said the signs had to go.

When six residents refused, they were issued violation notices, the first step toward fines that could have approached $500.

After the ACLU got involved, County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) announced that he supported scrapping the 30-day limit. But the county Planning Board, concerned that lawn signs could stay up forever, urged the council not to act on the proposal.

Several community groups also opposed repealing the time limit.

"It opens the door to visual clutter," said Dennis Holden, co-chairman of the Fairland Coalition, a community group in the Burtonsville area.

But council member Phil Andrews (D-Gaithersburg-Rockville) argued yesterday that "eliminating clutter is not an argument for limiting free speech."

Defending The Faith New Battleground In Textbook Wars: Religion In History (WSJ)

By Daniel Golden, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

The victors write the history books, the saying goes. But increasingly, religious advocates try to edit them.

Religious pressure on textbooks is growing well beyond Christian fundamentalists' attack on evolution. History books are the biggest battleground, as groups vie for changes in texts for elementary and secondary schools that cast their faiths in a better light.

Two Hindu groups and a Jewish group have been set up in the past three years as textbook watchdogs, adding to Islamic advocates who have monitored history textbooks since 1990. In addition, some Sikhs have started to complain about being short-changed in history textbooks.

QUESTION OF THE DAY

1 · Cast Your Vote: Do you think the history books used in your local schools are accurate?2

All are seeking to extract concessions as California holds its periodic approval process for history textbooks. The process drives school-district purchases in the most populous state, and books adopted for California typically are the ones that schools in the rest of the country end up using for several years.

Hindu groups, in particular, have swamped California authorities with proposed revisions, which would delete or soften references to polytheism, the caste system and the inferior status of women in ancient India. For example, the Hindu Education Foundation, a group linked to a Hindu nationalist organization in India, proposed replacing a textbook's statement that "men had many more rights than women" in ancient India with: "Men had different duties ... as well as rights than women. Many women were among the sages to whom the Vedas [sacred texts] were revealed."

California's Curriculum Commission endorsed this and most other changes pushed by Hindu groups, moving the matter along to the state board of education, which usually follows its advice. But then a strong objection to such changes arrived from a group of U.S. scholars, led by a Harvard professor, Michael Witzel. The scholars' protest, in turn, led to a lawsuit threat, a call for Harvard to disband the professor's department, and finally an unusual state-sponsored head-to-head debate between two scholars of ancient India.

Underlying such free-for-alls is the question of whether lobbying by religious groups yields a more sensitive and accurate version of history or a sugar-coated one -- and also whether students are served better or less well. "It tends to be scholar pitted against believer," says Kenneth Noonan, a member of the state education board.

For textbook publishers, meanwhile, to ignore religious groups is to risk exclusion from markets. One of the nation's largest school districts, Fairfax County, Va., dropped a McGraw-Hill Cos. 10th-grade text from its recommended list last year after complaints from Hindu parents, keeping it out of classrooms there.

Religious protests nearly crippled Oxford University Press's effort to enter the U.S. world-history textbook market. The prestigious university press sought to impress California authorities with cutting-edge scholarship and narrative verve, but the Curriculum Commission initially recommended against adopting Oxford's sixth-grade book last fall after Jewish and Hindu groups objected to it.

The Institute for Curriculum Services, a Jewish group set up in 2004 to scrutinize textbooks, was upset by the book's statement that archaeology and ancient Egyptian records don't support the Biblical account of the Exodus of the Israelite slaves from Egypt. While conceding this was true, the group said the book didn't apply the same skepticism to Islamic or Christian events, such as when it said that "ancient writings" and the Gospel according to Matthew relate that "wise men (probably philosophers or astrologers) followed a brightly shining star" when Jesus was born. Similarly, the book said that "according to Muslim tradition," the prophet Muhammad flew into heaven from the site of the Dome of the Rock mosque.

The Hindu groups, meanwhile, called the book's tone insensitive, such as its heading over a column about vegetarianism in India: "Where's the Beef?" The state board finally put the book on its approved list after Oxford cut the passages found objectionable and added a paragraph saying that for Jews, the Exodus is a "central event in their history" and "powerful symbol of the importance of freedom."

Casper Grathwohl, an official of Oxford University Press, says it preserved its integrity, and the give-and-take improved the text. But he complains that "the process is skewed toward giving the loudest voices what they want."

Every six years, California adopts a list of history books for kindergarten through eighth grade, and districts can spend designated state money only for books on this list. Publishers typically roll out new textbooks for the state, whose districts are expected to buy nearly $200 million of history books over the next two years. California alone represents 10% to 12% of the national textbook market.

In the 1970s and 1980s, history texts shied away from religion. "They didn't use the 'capital G' word," says Roger Rogalin, a publishing consultant. "They said the pilgrims gave thanks on Thanksgiving, but they didn't say to whom."

Difficult Goals

Prodded by religious groups, states began requiring more coverage of the topic. But they imposed goals that can be hard to reconcile: both maintaining historical accuracy and enhancing the pride and self-esteem of believers. California's guidelines, for instance, say students "should understand the intense religious passions that have produced fanaticism and war." But also, texts should avoid "reflecting adversely" on anyone's creed or instilling "prejudice against...those who believe in other religions."

Such cautions provide an opportunity for religious activists such as the Council on Islamic Education in Fountain Valley, Calif. In California's most recent review, the council called for extensive changes, most of which the state appears likely to accept.

One target: A Prentice Hall text said the medieval spread of Islam was partly due to military conquest. "Actual conversion to Islam did NOT occur...at the point of a sword," the council told the state. A specialist appointed by the state board to review Islamic coverage recommended dropping the reference, and Prentice Hall says it will do so.

Publishers often hire the Council on Islamic Education to prescreen manuscripts. In California, the council is a "content consultant" for Houghton Mifflin Co. and Ballard & Tighe Co., an educational publisher in Brea, Calif. The council has sometimes advised Prentice Hall and other publishers as well.

Publishers have allowed the Islamic group to "dictate" content, charges Gilbert Sewall, director of the American Textbook Council, a New York nonprofit group that reviews history texts and has said they often lack depth and factual fidelity. "Islamic pressure groups have been working energetically for 15 years to scrub the past in instructional materials," he wrote to California officials. He added that "textbooks submitted either gloss over jihad, sharia [Islamic law], Muslim slavery, the status of women and Islamic terrorism -- or omit the subject altogether."

Houghton Mifflin says it hasn't ceded any control to the Council on Islamic Education, and seeks Hindu, Jewish, Protestant, Catholic and Buddhist perspectives too. "We listen to their input and weigh it against what our scholarly authors believe is true," a spokesman says. Ballard & Tighe says its text was examined by Jewish and Hindu experts as well as the Islamic council. "We're mostly looking not to insult people," says an executive of the publisher. A spokeswoman for Prentice Hall says it has found the Council on Islamic Education to be a "solid resource for reviewing content."

The council's founder, Shabbir Mansuri, says that texts are treating Islam better not because of his efforts but because of state guidelines that stress sensitivity toward religious beliefs.

Disputes over textbook portrayal of Hinduism are a staple of politics in India, and the concerns have arrived in America along with many Indian immigrants. The conventional view of ancient India in U.S. history texts is that men enjoyed more rights than women and that, then as now, Hindus worshipped many gods and were divided into castes.

But the Hindu Education Foundation and the Vedic Foundation, the educational arm of a Hindu temple in Austin, Texas, say Hinduism is monotheistic because all of its deities are aspects of one god, Brahman. So when one textbook referred to Hindus visiting temples to "express their love of the gods," this should be changed to "express their love for God," said the Vedic group.

The groups repeatedly proposed deleting references to the caste system and making other changes that burnished the image of Indian history and culture. For instance, McGraw-Hill's book said of an early monarch called Asoka that his "tolerance was unusual for the time." The Hindu Education Foundation suggested changing "unusual" to "usual."

'Source of Misunderstanding'

At the Vedic Foundation, "Our motto is to re-establish the greatness of Hinduism, and part of that is to correct the textbooks," says Janeshwari Devi, director of programs. "Those are a source of misunderstanding, prejudice and derogatory information."

Some Hindu students say they're humiliated in school because texts dwell on customs such as ostracism of untouchables and an old tradition, rarely observed today, of "sati" -- widows immolating themselves on their husbands' funeral pyres. Trisha Pasricha, a high-school junior in a Houston suburb, says she used to deny being Hindu to classmates because she was tired of refuting stereotypes perpetuated by textbooks and teachers. "The textbooks bring up all these obscure practices, like bride burning, and act like they happen every day," she says. "The biggest mistake is that Hinduism is portrayed as polytheistic. And the caste system has nothing to do with Hinduism. But no one believes you, because it's in the textbook."

But some prominent scholars, both non-Hindu and Hindu, say the books were right. According to Madhav Deshpande, a Sanskrit professor at the University of Michigan who is Hindu, Hinduism is polytheistic and linked to the caste system, and women did have inferior status in ancient India.

He says the Hindu groups hold a mistaken position that dates to when India was ruled by Britain in the 19th century and under pressure from Christian missionaries. The missionaries told prospective converts Christianity was superior because it had one god, treated women fairly, and didn't have castes, Mr. Deshpande says, adding that to counter, Hindu intellectuals made up an argument that their religion had once been the same way. The foundations' contention that the caste system developed separately from Hinduism is incorrect, he maintains, because "in ancient texts, there is no distinction between the religious and nonreligious domains of life."

Jackson Spielvogel, a retired Penn State professor and author of McGraw-Hill's "Ancient Civilizations" textbook, says, "You can't allow Hindu nationalists to rewrite the history of India.... It becomes an issue of censorship."

To review changes proposed by the Hindu groups, California hired an expert recommended by one of the groups: Shiva Bajpai, a retired California State University history professor. He endorsed most of their changes. "I want to recognize the negatives but project the positives," says Mr. Bajpai, who is Hindu.

With his blessing, the changes were rolling toward ratification by the state board when Harvard's Prof. Witzel unexpectedly intervened. Alerted by an Indian-American graduate student whom the Vedic Foundation had approached to support its changes, Mr. Witzel wrote to the board the day before a Nov. 9 meeting at which approval of the Hindu-backed changes was expected. "They are unscholarly [and] politically and religiously motivated," wrote Mr. Witzel, a Sanskrit professor. His letter was co-signed by nearly 50 scholars, including Mr. Deshpande of Michigan.

Mr. Witzel calls the Hindu Education Foundation a front for a prominent nationalist group in India, the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh, whose leader caused a stir in November by urging Hindu women to have more children to keep up with the Muslim growth rate. A spokesman for the Hindu Education Foundation acknowledges a connection -- it was established by the U.S. counterpart of the Indian group -- but says it acts independently.

State officials did an about-face after they got Mr. Witzel's letter, inviting him and two like-minded scholars to scrutinize Mr. Bajpai's recommendations. When the three advised restoring much of the textbooks' original wording, angry letters began pouring in from Hindu groups. One, the Hindu American Foundation, threatened to sue the state. A petition from Hindu advocates called on Harvard to end its association with "Aryan Supremacist Creationist hate mongering." Harvard responded by defending Mr. Witzel's academic freedom.

The groups persuaded two members of California's congressional delegation to weigh in. Rep. Pete Stark, a Unitarian, and Rep. Linda Sanchez, a Catholic, asked the state superintendent of public instruction to investigate Mr. Witzel. The superintendent replied that the state had already held three public hearings on the history texts, received more than 1,000 pages of testimony, and considered more than 800 textual changes.

The pendulum swung back on Dec. 2, when the Curriculum Commission voted to support most of the changes sought by the Hindu foundations. "We have to err on the side of sensitivity toward religion," a commission member, Stan Metzenberg, said at the time.

The game wasn't over. Other Hindu groups -- including members of the "untouchables" caste -- entered the fray on Mr. Witzel's behalf. The Dalit Freedom Network, an advocacy group for untouchables, wrote to the education board that the proposed Vedic and Hindu Education Foundation changes reflect "a view of Indian history that softens...the violent truth of caste-based discrimination in India.... Do not allow politically-minded revisionists to change Indian history."

Caught in the cross-fire, the board of education summoned Mr. Witzel and Mr. Bajpai to an unusual private session Jan. 6. Before board and commission members, staffers and the board's lawyer, the scholars debated each edit.

"It was a gladiator combat," Mr. Bajpai recalls, "the most acrimonious thing I have ever done in my entire life. It deteriorated into me telling him he didn't understand anything." Mr. Witzel says Mr. Bajpai "mixed his religion with scholarship."

The duo did reach consensus on some changes. They agreed to narrow the McGraw-Hill text's statement that men in ancient India had "more rights" than women to "more property rights" -- but not to the Hindu groups' preferred wording of "different" rights.

Still, it isn't certain the compromises reached by the two scholars will stand. At a meeting Jan. 12, the state board of education created a subcommittee to reconsider the matter -- and to prepare for still more religious pressure when books are expected to be added to the list in two years.

Public Schools Looking At Bible Literacy Class Backers Say Course Is Academic; Others See Religious Motive (USAT)

By Mike Linn

High schools across the nation are considering an elective course in Bible literacy. That's pitting advocates of church-state separation against proponents of the class who say their mission is purely scholarly.

Lawmakers in Alabama and Georgia in the past few weeks have introduced legislation clearing the way for their high schools to offer the course, which is based on the textbook The Bible and Its Influence.

The book's publisher, the Fairfax, Va.-based Bible Literacy Project, says about 300 school districts are considering the course, which covers the Old Testament, followed by both Jews and Christians, and the New Testament, the story of Jesus and his disciples.

In the past week, the school board in New Braunfels, Texas, voted to offer the course next year. Some high schools in California, Oregon and Washington, where the text was tested in a pilot program last year, already are offering it.

Charles Haynes, senior scholar at the Freedom Forum First Amendment Center, says the textbook, which is promoted as an examination of the Bible's influence on literature, art, history and culture, successfully keeps religion out of public schools. The center is a non-profit institute that promotes constitutional freedoms covered by the First Amendment.

"If you're considering a Bible elective, look at this textbook," says Haynes, who helped review a draft of the book with 41 other scholars, including Christians, Jews and agnostics. "They've done a Herculean effort to make it as constitutional as they could."

The textbook does have critics, including Americans United for the Separation of Church and State.

"There has been an effort underway for many years to try to do an end run around the Supreme Court's rulings on religion in the schools, and we see this as the latest move," says Joseph Conn, a spokesman for the group.

The textbook has generated no lawsuits, says Sheila Weber, a spokeswoman for the Bible Literacy Project. Jeremy Gunn, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Program on Freedom of Religion and Beliefs, also says he hasn't heard of any litigation.

"If people were to actually implement this in a fair and neutral way, there wouldn't be any lawsuits," Gunn says. "If people are going to use this as a backdoor way to proselytizing in public schools, I would imagine there would be lawsuits."

Conn says the textbook paints the Bible's influence mostly in a positive light. However, Chuck Stetson, founder of the Bible Literacy Project, says the textbook does examine the Bible's negative impact. As an example, he cites a boxed feature in the book that he says shows the Bible was used "to justify and even encourage anti-Semitism."

Stetson describes the course as being academic and says it helps connect the dots for students who would not be able, for example, to understand the works of Shakespeare without understanding their biblical references.

The 'Whites Only' Retirement Fund (NYT)

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

Americans tend to think that the worst forms of institutional racism simply went away after Congress passed the landmark civil rights laws of the 1960's. But black police officers in Georgia who were denied membership in a supplementary retirement fund decades ago for reasons of race know better. Because of Jim Crow policies that barred them from the fund as shamefully late as the mid-1970's, many of these officers are facing troubled and underfunded retirements, with benefits substantially lower than those of their white colleagues.

The Georgia Legislature inexplicably failed to help these officers when a bill came before it two years ago, but it has received a new bill and a fresh opportunity to show its commitment to simple justice. Under the current bill, being shepherded by State Representative Tyrone Brooks, the state would assume half of what it would cost hundreds of working black officers to buy retirement coverage for the years they were barred from the fund.

If the measure is passed, which seems likely, it will take care of only those police officers who are still on the job. Retired officers are left out in the cold by a provision of the State Constitution that prevents the Legislature from helping them. To help this group, the voters would have to ratify an amendment to the State Constitution, which would first have to clear a State Legislature that has not been exemplary when it comes to issues of racial fairness.

But Georgia should do whatever it takes to give justice to all of the people affected by this shameful episode. Beyond that, other Southern states with Jim Crow legacies should begin to prepare themselves to encounter similar issues. If this happened in Georgia, it almost certainly happened elsewhere.

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Foot-dragging Irks EU And US (REU)

By David Lawsky

Reuters, January 24, 2006

BRUSSELS (Reuters) - For the first time in 12 years, Microsoft is in trouble on both sides of the Atlantic for the same reason at the same time -- failing to share information needed to remedy its antitrust violations.

The European Commission has reacted to Microsoft's foot-dragging with a threatened fine of up to 2 million euros ($2.46 million) daily. Now that the Justice Department this week for the first time expressed similar frustration, it will be up to a judge to decide if new action is necessary.

Microsoft's general counsel, Brad Smith, plans to hold a news conference in Brussels on Wednesday to discuss the case.

The United States and the European Commission take very different approaches to the software giant, but their recent statements have begun to resemble one another. One lawyer said that is because of the company's behavior pattern.

"There's a striking similarity between Microsoft's efforts to evade compliance with the European decision and its failure to properly comply with the U.S. settlement," said Thomas Vinje, a Brussels lawyer who represents Microsoft critics.

Microsoft has said it does not want to provide so much information that it would unfairly surrender its intellectual property to other companies.

"The current issue with the U.S. program is not comparable to the concerns raised in Europe. We have a program here that is successfully operating with 26 licensees and a dozen products shipping," Microsoft spokesman Jack Evans said by telephone from the company's headquarters in Redmond, Washington.

The governments say the remedies are aimed at restoring competition that Microsoft destroyed through illegal actions.

That competition, Brussels and Washington contend, will give consumers a broader choice and promote innovation.

Six years after a U.S. judge found Microsoft violated the Sherman Act against monopoly abuse, the Justice Department complained to a judge this week that the software giant had provided inaccurate information and failed to meet deadlines.

Two years after the European Commission found Microsoft had violated the 25-member bloc's antitrust laws, the EU regulator told Microsoft late last year that documentation it had provided was "fundamentally flawed."

"The Justice Department and the Commission's competition department have regular contact on this case," said Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd.

SIMILAR REMEDIES

In the United States, Microsoft is supposed to license its software to help rivals' servers work smoothly with its Windows operating system, because it competed unfairly in the 1990s.

In Europe, the Commission has ordered Microsoft to license its protocols -- rules of the road -- to help rivals' server software work with other servers and with its Windows operating system, because it competed unfairly in the late 1990s.

In each case, competitors need instruction to use the software.

But in a filing to the U.S. District Court in Washington, the Justice Department and 10 states said Microsoft was dragging its feet and its last filing had "not detailed the seriousness of the current situation."

The company had fallen significantly behind and needed to "dramatically increase the resources devoted to responding to technical documentation issues."

The U.S. filing said Microsoft had acknowledged it provided inaccurate information and on some occasions had been unable to provide accurate information.

The European Commission quoted a trustee nominated by Microsoft as calling the company's approach to documentation "fundamentally flawed in its conception and ... explanation and detail."

Throughout the fight, critics and governments have said that delaying the remedies perpetuates Microsoft's advantage while changes in technology and competition erode their relevance.

Wednesday was meant to be the deadline for the company to respond to the Commission's threatened fine, but once again Microsoft has gained time with a delay to February 15.

The last time the United States and Europe worked together on the case was in 1994, when they reached a joint agreement with Microsoft over licensing policies.

At one time, Microsoft also faced lawsuits from companies that complained its unfair practices had damaged their business, some following on cases brought by governments.

Microsoft settled those cases with AOL-Time Warner, Sun Microsystems, InterTrust Technologies, Novell, the Computer & Communications Industry Association and RealNetworks between 2003 and 2005 for about $4.5 billion.

The main legal actions left involve 30 governments -- the 25-nation EU and three other states linked to it in the European Economic Area, the United States and South Korea.

Microsoft Lags In Antitrust Compliance, U.S. Says (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, January 24, 2006

Microsoft is falling behind in meeting certain obligations under its antitrust agreement with the U.S. government, the Bush administration said.

The criticism, leveled by federal and state prosecutors in a document filed Monday with U.S. District Judge Colleen Kollar-Kotelly, largely surrounded the company's progress in developing technical documentation for developers who license the Microsoft Communications Protocol Program.

Microsoft started the program as part of its efforts to comply with a 2002 consent decree reached with the government.

Since its last court appearance in mid-November, Microsoft has "fallen significantly behind" in responding to concerns raised by a technical committee charged with overseeing the program's documentation project, according to the Washington, D.C., court document.

The project, known as Troika, is intended to be an automated system that can validate the accuracy of the technical documentation by comparing it to actual network traffic, Microsoft has said. The software giant originally expected to complete the project by February 2006.

Microsoft must "dramatically increase the resources devoted to responding to technical documentation issues," the number of which continues to grow, the prosecutors said.

Microsoft said in a statement that it is "working hard to resolve the concerns" raised by regulators.

"In our filing Jan. 17, we detailed the efforts we've made to increase the speed of our responses to technical documentation issues found by the Technical Committee," Microsoft said. "We also underscored our commitment to expend whatever resources are necessary to address these issues, including hiring as many qualified people as we can find to accomplish these highly specialized tasks."

The software maker also noted that 26 companies have taken licenses for its communications protocols and a dozen products have been shipped that use Microsoft technology.

The Justice Department and Microsoft are expected to file their quarterly status report on Feb. 8, and both parties are due in court on Valentine's Day for a status conference before Judge Kollar-Kotelly.

Disney Announces Deal To Buy Pixar For $7.4 Billion (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2006

Walt Disney Co. today agreed to buy Pixar Animation Studios — which has produced the hits "Toy Story" and "The Incredibles" — in a $7.4-billion deal that will make Pixar CEO Steve Jobs the entertainment company's single-largest shareholder.

The long-awaited buyout was announced after months of talks between the two companies to extend and expand a long-term distribution pact that was due to expire in June with the release of Pixar's most recent feature, "Cars."

The deal to acquire Emeryville, Calif.-based Pixar became a major goal for Disney Chief Executive Robert Iger, who began to work on repairing the company's frayed relationship with the animation studio as soon as he took control of Disney in October.

"The addition of Pixar significantly enhances Disney animation, which is a critical creative engine for driving growth across our businesses," Iger said in a statement.

Under the terms of the deal, each share of Pixar will be exchanged for 2.3 shares of Disney common stock. Jobs, who owns 50.6% of the Pixar stock, will vote his shares in favor of the deal and will join the board of directors of Burbank-based Disney.

The acquisition has been approved by the directors of both companies but must still be approved by the remainder of Pixar's shareholders.

"Disney and Pixar can now collaborate without the barriers that come from two different companies with two different sets of shareholders," Jobs said in a statement. "Now, everyone can focus on what is most important, creating innovative stories, characters and films that delight millions of people around the world."

The companies had broken off negotiations in 2004 when Jobs, who is also chief executive officer of Apple Computer Inc., clashed with Iger's predecessor, Michael Eisner.

Pixar President Ed Catmull will serve in the same position as head of Pixar and Disney animation studios. Meanwhile, John Lasseter, Pixar's highly regarded creative leader, will be chief creative officer of both animation studios and will advise Walt Disney Imagineering on the design of new attractions for Disney theme parks.

By acquiring industry leader Pixar, Disney would once again regain its role as a leader in the animation industry, which it pioneered with "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs" in 1937 and dominated in the 1990s with such hits as "The Lion King" and "Beauty and the Beast."

But Disney's animation division produced several costly failures recently, including "Treasure Planet" and "Atlantis: The Lost Empire." In contrast, Pixar has generated such box office hits as "Monsters, Inc." and "Finding Nemo."

Disney In $7.4bn Pixar Deal (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin and James Politi

Financial Times, January 25, 2006

Walt Disney on Tuesday agreed to acquire Pixar, the animated film studio, in a $7.4bn deal it hopes will revive its animation department and better position the company to compete in a media industry being remade by digital technology.

As part of the agreement, which is expected to be finalised this summer, Steve Jobs, Pixar's founder, will take a seat on Disney's board and become the company's biggest shareholder.

Another key Pixar executive, Ed Catmull, will become president of the combined studios, while its creative guru, John Lasseter, will assume the title of principal creative advisor. In that role, Mr Lasseter will also help to develop new Disney theme park attractions.

After months of negotiation, Disney agreed to offer 2.3 of its shares for each Pixar share. Disney is betting that the acquisition will at a stroke restore it as the pre-eminent Hollywood animation studio, satisfying a goal set out by Robert Iger when he took over as chief executive nearly four months ago.

Animation is vital to Disney because the cartoon characters created by its artists and storytellers lie at the centre of its global businesses, from films to theme parks and consumer products.

"The addition of Pixar significantly enhances Disney animation, which is a critical creative engine for driving growth across our business," Mr Iger said.

Some analysts believe that the agreement could be even more valuable by bringing Mr Jobs, who is also chief executive of Apple Computer, and Mr Lasseter, into the Disney fold. Their technical wizardry would bolster Disney at a time when it and other media companies are attempting to sell their content on a variety of emerging digital platforms, including iPods, mobile phones and other devices.

Mr Jobs said: "Disney and Pixar can now collaborate without the barriers that come from two different companies with two different sets of shareholders."

Animators to suffer as success draws imitators

The deal confirms a remarkable reversal of fortunes for Disney and Pixar. Disney's Magic Kingdom was built on animation, and was once synonymous with the art form. But it has faltered in recent years as its artists struggled to make the transition from hand-drawn cartoons to the computer-generated techniques Pixar made famous with the 1995 release of Toy Story. Since then, the studio, based near San Francisco, has produced string of hits, including Finding Nemo and The Incredibles.

The deal was greeted with enthusiasm by Wall Street although some complained about the price. "The price tag is a little more than people were expecting," said analyst Dennis McAlpine, of McAlpine Associates. Some analysts, such as JP Morgan's Spencer Wang, have questioned an outright acquisition, arguing that it would dilute Disney's earnings. There are also concerns that Mr Jobs could face conflicts of interest between his job at Apple and a new role at Disney.

Nonetheless, Disney's shares continued a recent rally, closing Tuesday's trading day in New York up 47 cents, or 1.8 per cent at $25.99. Pixar was down 70 cents at $57.57, giving it a market capitalisation just shy of $6.9bn.

The two sides have held long-running talks about renegotiating an agreement under which Disney distributes Pixar's works. That deal was set to expire in June with the release of Cars. It appears to have escalated to include the possibility of a strategic partnership or sale after Mr Iger took over from Michael Eisner, the long-time Disney chief executive who had clashed with Mr Jobs.

A final deal would raise the question of whether Pixar could maintain its creative force as part of a much larger Disney empire. It has also focused attention on John Lasseter, the Pixar creative director, who some analysts believe may be more important to Disney's ultimate success than Mr Jobs. Mr Lasseter was a Disney animator before he bolted for Pixar years ago.

Disney Reaches Deal To Buy Pixar For $7.4 Billion In Stock (NYT)

By Laura M. Holson And Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 24 - The Walt Disney Company said this afternoon that it would buy Pixar Animation Studios in a stock transaction valued at about $7.4 billion, in a deal that comes almost 15 years after the companies began their lucrative partnership.

Disney said it would exchange 2.3 of its shares for each Pixar share, valuing Pixar at $59.77 a share, an almost 4 percent premium based on closing share prices today. The deal would also place senior executives from Pixar in key roles overseeing both the Pixar and Disney animation studios.

John Lasseter, Pixar's chief creative officer and a former animator at Disney, will have the same title covering both animation units and will also become the principal creative adviser to the Disney unit that designs new attractions for the company's theme parks, and in that capacity will report directly to Robert A. Iger, Disney's chief executive. Pixar's president, Ed Catmull, will be the president of the combined studios and will report to Mr. Iger and Dick Cook, chairman of the Walt Disney Studios.

Stephen P. Jobs, Pixar's chairman and chief executive, will get a seat on Disney's board. Mr. Jobs owns 50.6 percent of the outstanding shares of Pixar and has agreed to vote at least 40 percent of the company's oustanding shares in favor of the transaction.

Shareholders of Pixar will have to approve the acquisition, which will also be subject to antitrust review by federal regulators.

The deal comes two years ago Disney and Pixar began renegotiating a distribution agreement that would have given Disney the right to distribute Pixar's films after the release of the forthcoming "Cars." (The two jointly produce Pixar movies although Disney owns the rights. The agreement ends after "Cars.")

At that time, as with these talks, price was an issue. In 2004, Mr. Jobs was demanding that Disney share rights to the movies that Pixar had yet to make, including "The Incredibles," which was released in 2005, as well as "Cars." But Disney, which owned all of the rights to these movies, did not want to give them up.

Mr. Jobs appeared to cast the deal as a way to resolve those discussions and move on to the important business of movie making.

"Disney and Pixar can now collaborate without the barriers that come from two different companies with two different sets of shareholders," Mr. Jobs said in a statement. "Now, everyone can focus on what is most important, creating innovative stories, characters and films that delight millions of people around the world."

In the same statement, Mr. Iger said: "The addition of Pixar significantly enhances Disney animation, which is a critical creative engine for driving growth across our businesses."

Pixar, based in Emeryville, Calif., has grown to hundreds of employees from about 44 in 1986, two years after Mr. Jobs acquired the company from the director George Lucas for $10 million. Pixar and DreamWorks Animation have led the way in computer animation for films.

Last year, talks about renewing the distribution deal with Pixar arose again after Mr. Iger was named chief executive of Disney. Mr. Iger began thinking about the acquisition last fall when it became clear to him that distribution alone would not add much value to Disney over all, said a person who discussed the matter with the Disney chief.

Disney's own animation unit lagged behind its peers, and Mr. Iger made it a priority to improve its operation. Animation is essential to Disney's success because it provides the characters that drive the company's theme parks, consumer products and cable television programs. In recent years, Pixar has become a steady supplier of such characters.

In after-hours trading today, shares of Pixar were up $1.95, or 3.4 percent, to $59.52; shares of Disney were up 10 cents, to $26.09.

Disney, Pixar Merge In $7.5B Deal Once-hostile Relationship Evolves Into Marriage (USAT)

By David Lieberman And Laura Petrecca

NEW YORK — Disney and Pixar made it official Tuesday: The entertainment giant agreed to buy the computer-animation studio for stock valued at nearly $7.5 billion based on Disney's closing price Tuesday of $25.99.

They chose to merge instead of renewing their production and distribution deal that expires in June because “no matter what kind of partnership we had, we're still two separate, publicly traded companies,” Pixar CEO Steve Jobs says. “Sometimes that stuff just gets in the way of making the best films we could,” as well as using Pixar's characters in Disney's theme parks.

They expect the deal to close this summer. It will make Jobs, who owns about half of Pixar, Disney's No. 1 shareholder, with 6.6%. He will join the Disney board.

Disney is offering 2.3 shares of its stock for each Pixar share. That's a 3.8% premium on Pixar's closing price of $57.57, which already is up 8% since Jan. 3 on investor anticipation of a deal.

There's no collar on the agreement, which means the value will rise or fall with Disney's stock price. Disney is issuing new stock but says it will buy back shares to return to the current float in 2007.

The agreement represents a startling change of direction for Disney's animation unit — arguably its most important business.

The operation that produced classics such as Snow White and The Lion King failed to keep up with computer animation and released a series of disappointments, including Treasure Planet and The Emperor's New Groove.

Disney CEO Robert Iger will put Pixar President Ed Catmull in charge of Disney and Pixar's animation operations, which will remain in their respective quarters in Burbank and Emeryville, Calif. Catmull will report to Iger and Disney studio chief Dick Cook.

In addition, Pixar's John Lasseter — who wrote and directed Toy Story, A Bug's Life, Toy Story 2, and the upcoming Cars — will report to Iger as chief creative officer for the animation studios and principal creative adviser for Walt Disney Imagineering, which develops theme park attractions.

Iger's willingness to give Pixar so much control is a sharp break from the management style of his predecessor, Michael Eisner. Clashes between Eisner and Jobs caused earlier deal talks to break down.

The company says the Pixar executives will decide whether to streamline operations or lay off people in their units. And Iger leaves open the possibility that Catmull and Lasseter might tinker with Disney films in production.

Lassiter will remain under contract until 2011. Catmull does not have a contract.

Disney Sets $7.4 Billion Pixar Deal (WSJ)

By Merissa Marr And Nick Wingfield

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

With Walt Disney Co.'s $7.4 billion deal to acquire Pixar Animation Studios, the combined animation powerhouses face a tricky task: how to revive Disney's animation efforts without disrupting the formula that has made Pixar one of the most successful moviemakers in Hollywood history.

The stock deal announced yesterday represents a quick fix for Disney's lagging animation business, which relies on movie characters that can be spun across its theme park, merchandise and television empires. Pixar has in the last decade become the gold standard in animated filmmaking with computer-generated hits like "Finding Nemo," while Disney's own efforts have tailed off in popularity, and its pipeline is uncertain. Disney has benefited from Pixar's success by co-financing and distributing Pixar films, but that arrangement was set to expire this year.

The proposed deal comes with risks. Disney is acquiring Pixar in the midst of a profitable winning streak -- all six of its movies have been blockbusters -- in a business where failure is considered an inevitability. It also comes when revenue from DVD sales, a key movie-industry driver, may have passed its peak. And the companies face a cultural challenge in trying to maintain Pixar's esprit de corps.

As part of the deal, Pixar Chairman and Chief Executive Steve Jobs will become Disney's largest individual shareholder and a key adviser at a time when the entertainment industry is scrambling for ways to reinvent itself in a digital era. Mr. Jobs, who also heads Apple Computer Inc. will join Disney's board and take a stake of around 6.5%. He ruled out becoming Disney's chairman in future, however, saying: "that's not on my radar. Being chairman of a public company is an awful lot of work."

Regardless, even Mr. Jobs' Pixar colleagues expect him to become a potent force on the Disney board. "They're going to have to install seat belts in that board room because when Steve gets in there, he'll be a ball of fire," said John Lasseter, the Pixar creative guru who will play a pivotal role in the combined company. (See related article1.)

In an interview, Mr. Jobs said an important consideration in the decision to unite with Disney was Pixar's desire to make new movies based on existing Pixar characters. Under their distribution deal, Disney retained rights to create sequels to Pixar movies. "The opportunity to reunite the family was certainly a factor in our decision," Mr. Jobs said. He added that Disney was the only company with animation in its DNA and an "incredible collection of unique assets like theme parks."

Mr. Jobs, who owns 50.6% of Pixar's stock, is making his move as Pixar's stock hovers around an all-time high. Pixar's stock has rallied 33% since the start of 2005. In 4 p.m. composite trading on the Nasdaq, Pixar shares were down 1.2% at $57.57. Disney shares were up 1.8% at $25.99. As part of the agreement, Disney will issue 2.3 of its own shares for each Pixar share. The total price includes $1 billion of Pixar cash.

For Disney, CEO Robert Iger said the consideration was about "getting a business that is vital to the future of Disney right." In evaluating the price, Disney said it was confident Pixar's box-office success would continue but recognized that not all its future films would be sure-fire hits. The company also took into account the current trends at the box office and in DVD sales.

Messrs. Iger and Jobs acknowledged that the key was to maintain Pixar's unique culture. "Most of the time that Bob and I have spent talking about this hasn't been about economics, it's been about preserving the Pixar culture because we all know that's the thing that's going to determine the success here in the long run," said Mr. Jobs. At the same time, Pixar President Ed Catmull and Mr. Lasseter will "help provide a slightly different culture at Disney feature animation that will maximize some of the talent there to make even better films," said Mr. Jobs.

Mr. Catmull, who co-founded the studio, will become president of the combined Pixar/Disney animation business. Mr. Lasseter will take a role as chief creative officer of the combined company as well as a creative role advising Disney's Imagineering division, helping design attractions for the theme parks. Pixar will remain based in Emeryville, Calif., far from Disney's Burbank, California, home.

Another vital piece of the puzzle is securing Pixar's core creative team beyond Mr. Lasseter, including the likes of Pete Docter, Andrew Stanton and Brad Bird. Mr. Iger said Disney would continue with Pixar's practice of not making its creative team sign contracts. However, he said they would be enticed with Disney stock options.

Mr. Iger said he first considered an acquisition while watching a parade of characters at the opening of Hong Kong Disneyland last September. In buying Pixar, Disney leapfrogs back to the top of an increasingly crowded competitive landscape in animated films. That field includes not only DreamWorks Animation SKG, home of the "Shrek" movies, but also other players that have emerged in the last couple of years.

A big question is how good Pixar's pipeline is going forward. From its first movie, "Toy Story," through 2004's "The Incredibles," every Pixar film has been a substantial hit. Pixar's next movie is "Cars." But Pixar hasn't announced its slate beyond that.

Disney said the plan was for Pixar and Disney to each make one animated movie a year, although there may be years when they make more movies.

The deal won praise from Roy Disney, the company's former vice chairman and a major shareholder who led a shareholder revolt against the company in 2004. "This clearly solidifies the Walt Disney Company's position as the dominant leader in motion picture animation and we applaud and support Bob Iger's vision."

Disney was advised by Goldman Sachs Group Inc. and Bear Stearns Cos. and law firms Dewey Ballantine and Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom. Pixar was advised by Credit Suisse and law firm Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati.

Pixar's Magic Touch (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

When Apple Computer Inc. founder Steve Jobs bought what became Pixar Animation Studios for $10 million in 1986, it was a small animation-systems firm with a few alumni from Walt Disney Co., not the least of whom included creative director John A. Lasseter.

Yesterday, Disney secured the return of Lasseter and his talented team as part of a $7.4 billion deal for Pixar aimed at jump-starting the media giant's animation empire.

Over the past two decades, the 730-person Pixar has garnered a reputation as a place where creative genius thrives, and in recent years the studio has far outpaced the bigger and more institutionalized Disney with hits such as "The Incredibles" and "Finding Nemo." Beyond its money-making ability, Pixar won critical acclaim for bringing adult emotional appeal to a traditional kids' medium.

Pixar started as a computer graphics company, and it is still known for its technical prowess and its ability to digitally replicate the look and texture of rusting cars, peeling paint and fur blowing in the wind. But Pixar's hands-off management style and its artisan cultivation of the creative process have helped it become the benchmark against which the rest of the industry measures itself.

"For us now, the high-water mark is Pixar," said Dug Ward, manager of the Animation Workshop at the University of California in Los Angeles film school. "I remember just a few years ago when students wanted to go to work for Disney. Now they want to go to Pixar."

Under the deal, Pixar President Edwin E. Catmull, 60, would head Disney and Pixar's animation studios, and Lasseter, 49, would head the creative operations of both companies' animation divisions.

News of the merger prompted some animators to worry whether Pixar would be able to maintain its free-wheeling culture. Disney executives pledged to protect Pixar's independence but did not say whether the two companies' animation units might merge.

"A fear a lot of us have is . . . if Disney takes over Pixar and micromanages every detail, they will strangle the golden goose," Ward said.

Even if Disney leaves Pixar alone, there is no guarantee that the relationship will lift the parent's fortunes on Wall Street. Ford Motor Co., for example, never really capitalized on its purchase of Jaguar, nor did America Online Inc. make much of its acquisition of Netscape Inc.

Lasseter, though, is among a handful of Pixar's longtime executives credited with shepherding the company from its early days as a spinoff of "Star Wars" director George Lucas's Lucasfilm operation to a powerhouse in animation. Lasseter graduated from a school founded by Walt Disney and his brother, the California Institute of the Arts, and started his career as an old-fashioned pen-and-paper animator at Disney, where making early film classic films like "Snow White and the Seven Dwarves" required millions of drawings. After moving to Pixar in 1984, Lasseter gravitated to computer animation, producing early short films like "Nick Nack" and "Luxo Jr."

Lasseter's hallmark is his ability to foster originality and create strong story lines, taking advantage of innovative technology to deliver the results, Ward said.

At an animated film screening in the late 1980s, Lasseter talked about his goals for computer animation, Ward recalled. "He was saying that his goal was to do an animated feature film, all in 3-D computer animation," and that high ambition set the crowd abuzz, he said.

When the company's movies first hit the screens, critics marveled at the attention to detail.

"One thing Pixar is good at doing is the eyes. You can tell so much about what someone's thinking with the eyes," Ward offered as an example.

By comparison, Disney's recent film, "Chicken Little," showed little in the way of originality, using old songs instead of an original score and employing gags already used in other animated films, he said. While both "Chicken Little" and "Nemo" both featured father-son dramas, "Nemo" made the audience care more, he said. Watching the Disney film "just felt like watching the 1970s cartoon," Ward said. "I can see why Disney would want to buy them back."

Starting with its 1995 Academy Award-winning hit "Toy Story," Pixar has six major feature films to its name, all of which were hits at the box office.

"Pixar is known for a cost-effective way of creating life-like animation," said Ivan Feinseth, an analyst with Matrix USA LLC, an institutional research and brokerage firm.

By comparison, Disney still garners $7.6 billion in studio-entertainment revenue -- far more than Pixar -- but it has become "the serial re-releaser" of old films, he said.

Still, the culture Lasseter has built at Pixar "is in some ways very close to the historical Disney culture," with its focus on story and the back and forth between the artist and the producer, said Steven D. Lavine, president of the California Institute of the Arts. "There is a real sense of cultivating the individual talents of employees."

In its release, Pixar credited Disney with helping to develop talent through a seven-year co-production partnership that ended in 2004, after Jobs's falling out with former Disney chief Michael D. Eisner.

"I'm very sensitive to what can happen when a company gets bought," Disney's president and chief executive Robert A. Iger said of the deal in a news conference yesterday. "I'm really deeply committed to seeing to it that Pixar is allowed to exist in the form it existed."

Disney To Buy Pixar Studios In Its Move To A Digital Era (WP)

By Steven Levingston And Mike Musgrove

Walt Disney Co. announced yesterday that it will acquire Steve Jobs's Pixar Animation Studios in a deal aimed at restoring the Disney magic in the age of computer-generated animation.

As audiences have cooled to hand-drawn films, Disney has been slow to embrace the newer technologies behind such Pixar-produced hits as "Toy Story" and "Finding Nemo." The media giant hopes buying one of Hollywood's hottest studios for $7.4 billion in stock will help it in the intensifying competition for the hearts of young moviegoers.

"The goal here, above all else, is to make great animated films -- the rest kind of takes care of itself," Disney's new chief executive, Robert A. Iger, said in a conference call with investors yesterday.

The deal opens the possibility of a wider partnership between Disney and Jobs, Pixar's chief executive and the head of Apple Computer Inc. Jobs, who would become a Disney director after the merger, has helped foster the cultural phenomenon of portable digital music and video with Apple's iPod. Iger and Jobs spoke enthusiastically yesterday about finding other avenues of cooperation as the new media era evolves.

Under Iger, Disney has been pushing hard to shake off an apparent weakness lingering from its days under former chief executive Michael D. Eisner, when the company had to fight off an unsolicited takeover bid by cable giant Comcast Corp. ABC, which is owned by Disney, has climbed in the ratings with hit shows such as "Desperate Housewives" and "Lost." Disney's ESPN network is a hot property on cable. But Disney's stock price has languished in recent years as the company has struggled to reassert its preeminence in animation.

The need to bolster Disney's animation division grew urgent as other studios moved aggressively into computer-generated production. The number of these types of films is growing yearly. Sony Pictures plans to release its first computer-animated movie this year, with another to follow in 2007. With Pixar's releases, Disney will likely catapult into the forefront of the field. It has its own computer-generated movies in the pipeline, including "Meet the Robinsons," scheduled for release this year, and "An American Dog" next year. But Disney's earlier computer-animated feature, "Chicken Little," did not garner the mega-sales typical of a Pixar release.

"Disney built the company on animation, and its hand went cold just as Pixar's went hot. This is big, big stuff for Disney," said Tom Adams, president of Adams Media Research, an entertainment-industry research and consulting firm.

As a result of the deal, Jobs would become one of Disney's largest shareholders. Pixar President Edwin E. Catmull would serve as president of the new Pixar and Disney animation studios. Pixar's executive vice president and powerful creative force John A. Lasseter, who once worked in animation at Disney, would become chief creative officer of the animation studios.

The deal came together only after Eisner left Disney, allowing Iger to smooth over the company's soured relations with Jobs. Eisner and Jobs had a contentious relationship, and analysts expected Pixar would look for a new distributor for its films after its arrangement with Disney expires this year.

"After a lot of soul searching and thinking and, of course, getting to know Bob, this looked to be the most exciting path for Pixar's future," Jobs said during the investor conference call with Iger.

By gobbling up a creative, intensely independent boutique studio, Disney has the challenge of encouraging new, high-quality work without stifling talent under its bureaucratic wing. It also hopes Jobs and his team will infuse other animation efforts at the company with their cutting-edge vision.

Anant Sundaram, professor at the Tuck School of Business at Dartmouth College, is skeptical that Pixar will have much influence over its huge parent. "One is hard-pressed to find where a much smaller entity comes in and changes a larger entity," he said. "What happens is the smaller entity and its modes of operating often get squelched."

Jobs discounted those concerns, saying he has grown to trust Iger. Much of the discussion leading up to the deal, Jobs said, "hasn't been about economics, it's been about preserving the Pixar culture because, as you know, that's what's going to determine the success in the long run."

Disney is buying Pixar after the small studio's remarkable run of blockbusters has translated into a lofty stock price. Under the deal, 2.3 Disney shares will be issued for each Pixar share, and Disney will pay about $59.78 a share for Pixar. That's about a 4 percent premium over Pixar's closing price yesterday of $57.57. The deal is slated to be completed by the summer.

The purchase price assumes that Pixar's successes will continue -- and will bring in a steady stream of revenue.

"Obviously, in the movie business, there's always a lot of risk," said Joseph Bonner, a media analyst at Argus Research Corp. "Pixar has an unbroken string of hits. The perceived wisdom is you do produce a flop sometime."

Iger said he recognized the risks implicit in investing in a film company. "Anytime you're putting money behind the creative process, there are risks associated with it," he said. But, he added, "Pixar has a track record that is unrivaled."

Although the deal would not officially affect Apple, speculating on possible byproducts of the agreement has become a popular pastime among Mac watchers. Some figure that becoming part of Disney will help Jobs score more content, including possibly feature-length films, for Apple's online music-and-video store, iTunes.

Others argue that Jobs's alliance with Disney would sacrifice Apple's image as a neutral dealer among TV producers looking to put their shows online. And some Mac fans worry that the company is paying less attention to its computer products as it ventures further into music and entertainment.

For Disney and fans of animation, the deal could wind up bringing more people into the theaters. Pixar's influence could help improve the story lines and characters in Disney's future films, said John Canemaker, a professor at New York University's Tisch School of the Arts, where he is director of the animation program.

"The main problem with Disney recently was not technology but that its stories and characters just haven't caught on with the public as they did in the past," he said. "Pixar has had a winner every time and has become what Disney used to be in terms of well-crafted stories, vibrant personalities, warmth and heart."

Pixar Executive Played Key Role In Disney Deal (WSJ)

By Nick Wingfield And Merissa Marr

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

During their decade-plus partnership, relations between Pixar Animation Studios Chief Executive Officer Steven P. Jobs and Walt Disney Co.'s former chief, Michael Eisner, were as topsy-turvy as a roller-coaster ride at Disneyland. But even as animosity between the two men came close to destroying one of the most lucrative relationships in the film industry, a key Pixar executive -- John Lasseter -- held an emotional connection to Disney.

In the $7.4 billion agreement by Disney to acquire Pixar announced yesterday, Mr. Lasseter -- Pixar's top creative executive -- played an important role and now stands to assume an even more influential position: chief creative officer of Disney's animation studios and principal creative adviser of Walt Disney Imagineering, where he will work on designing new theme-park attractions.

While Mr. Jobs, with just over 50% of Pixar's stock, ultimately made the decision to sell the company, Mr. Lasseter's blessing of the deal was crucial to making it happen, according to people familiar with the matter.

How this will play with the Disney people is anybody's guess at this early stage. This much is certain: A former Disney employee himself -- both as a young artist and as a theme-park employee -- Mr. Lasseter never lost his love for all things Disney, or his desire to reunite with the company that played such a large role in his life.

"This deal would not happen if John didn't want it to happen," says former Disney studio chief Peter Schneider, part of the team that negotiated Disney's original deal with Pixar to distribute and co-finance its films.

Mr. Jobs said the support of Mr. Lasseter and Pixar's president and co-founder, Edwin Catmull, was key to making the deal work. "This wasn't my decision alone -- this was really Ed and John and me," Mr. Jobs said in an interview. "If any of the three of us hadn't wanted to do this, we wouldn't have done it."

Mr. Lasseter, 49 years old, is widely recognized as one of Pixar's most valuable assets, credited with helping to turn the company into a powerhouse in computer-animated films through his emphasis on compelling storytelling rather than bland technical wizardry. A traditional animator by training, Mr. Lasseter directed and helped write the script for 1995's "Toy Story," the first Pixar feature film, and its next movie, "Cars."

Mr. Lasseter is also deeply involved in overseeing the production of films by Pixar's stable of in-house directors. Going forward, he faces a tougher assignment: keeping Pixar on its long box-office winning streak while helping Disney return to its past glory in the medium it helped to pioneer. He will likely face insecurities all around, both from Disney animators who may feel usurped by the transaction, and from Pixar employees who fear their small-company style will disappear.

Mr. Lasseter's advantage lies in the fact that he has remained a familiar face at Disney even while Pixar was on the rise. His affinity for the company began during his childhood in Whittier, Calif., a half-hour from the Disneyland theme park in Anaheim, where he worked as a youngster operating the Jungle Cruise.

"It's really Disney blood throughout my veins," Mr. Lasseter said in an interview yesterday.

Inspired by the cartoons he loved as a child, Mr. Lasseter, just out of high school, enrolled in a new character-animation program at the California Institute for the Arts in Valencia, along with classmates that included the director Tim Burton. He went to work for Disney in the early 1980s, helping to animate movies like "Mickey's Christmas Carol."

A turning point for Mr. Lasseter came during early screenings of the dailies from the Disney science-fiction movie "Tron," released in 1982. He was dazzled by the groundbreaking computer-animated special effects in the movie, and he helped to persuade Disney to do a short test film that combined hand-drawn animation with computer generated backgrounds.

While he was thrilled by the artistic possibilities that computer animation seemed to open up, Mr. Lasseter was put off by Disney's belief that computers could primarily be used to save money during the creation of animated films.

"There just wasn't an interest in pushing the technology of animation," Mr. Lasseter says.

That attitude and what he saw as the declining quality of Disney's animated films prompted him to leave the company in 1983 for a job at Lucasfilm Ltd., the Northern California movie-production company run by George Lucas. There Mr. Lasseter did groundbreaking work with other members of the computer-animation team at Lucasfilm, including Mr. Catmull.

Mr. Catmull will become president of the new Pixar and Disney animation studios as a result of the deal.

After Mr. Jobs acquired the Lucasfilm computer-animation group in 1986 for $10 million, renaming the new company Pixar, Mr. Lasseter helped to establish a relationship with Disney in 1991, from which came some of the most memorable and successful films of the past decade, including "Finding Nemo" and "The Incredibles."

Mr. Lasseter pitched "Toy Story" to Disney, and the two companies ended up making the movie together, according to people familiar with the situation.

Along the way, Mr. Lasseter has reaped the rewards of Pixar's success. He is, by far, Pixar's highest salaried employee, earning $2.9 million in salary during 2004, more than five times as much as Mr. Catmull earned, according to Pixar regulatory filings. Mr. Lasseter held Pixar shares, as of last July, valued at $26 million. He lives with his wife and children far from the bustle of Hollywood in the Sonoma County wine country north of San Francisco, where he owns a winery.

While at Pixar, Mr. Lasseter has stayed close to Disney, helping to design rides for theme parks based on Pixar characters such as Buzz Lightyear. At the 50th anniversary of Disneyland last year, Mr. Lasseter turned up at a small dinner for Disney executives, mingling alongside Mr. Eisner and Disney's current CEO Robert Iger, even as the relationship between Messrs. Eisner and Jobs remained deeply acrimonious. Mr. Lasseter often said to staff at Disney that he wished such tensions between the two men could be resolved.

Some people who know Mr. Lasseter, though, speculate that any support he has given for the Disney acquisition is likely driven more by a desire to help shape future films and other uses of Pixar's characters than by a love for Disney.

Under the two companies' distribution deal, which expires with the release of "Cars" this June, sequel rights to Pixar movies are owned by Disney, which had already begun development on its own script for "Toy Story 3" before Disney agreed to acquire Pixar, a prospect that horrified Pixar executives.

"That is the kind of thing that would break John's heart," says Pam Kerwin, a former Pixar vice president who left the company in 1999. "They're his children."

"There's no question that a big part of keeping the negotiations going, even when it was difficult, was because Disney had control of our characters that we had created," Mr. Lasseter said.

In his new role at Disney, Mr. Lasseter says he doesn't intend to force Disney's animation to copy everything Pixar does. "We're not going to come into Disney feature animation and insist everything becomes like Pixar." He adds: "The goal is simply to be there to help those artists make the best movies possible."

Imagining A Day Without BlackBerrys (WSJ)

By Jane Spencer And Jessica E. Vascellaro

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

The latest development in the legal battle involving BlackBerry hand-helds is forcing millions of people to confront an unsettling question: What would life be like without a BlackBerry?

While the possibility of a disruption in BlackBerry service is still extremely remote, the Supreme Court's decision not to hear an appeal by BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. on Monday has triggered new concerns that BlackBerrys -- the wireless email gadgets often dubbed crackberries because their users are so devoted -- could go dark.

The BlackBerry started out seven years ago as a device for high-ranking corporate types, but it has quickly become a verb, a source of marital discord, a safety hazard for those who cross busy streets while responding to email, a status symbol (Will your company give you one?) and even a pick-up tool. (Michael L. Romero, a 27-year-old systems administrator in Phoenix, says his friends email him on his BlackBerry to point out "cute girls" at nightclubs.) The BlackBerry has been responsible for many an interrupted vacation and dinner hour, but it's also integral for keeping the wheels of commerce, government and even law enforcement moving. So even the inkling of a possibility that it could shut down has sent people scrambling to arrange backups.

Information-technology professionals at dozens of big companies -- including Citigroup Inc. and Boeing Co. -- are drafting contingency plans. Law firms such as White & Case LLP, a New York-based firm, are stockpiling alternative wireless email devices like the Palm Treo 700w. And dozens of government agencies -- including the Los Angeles Police Department -- are contemplating how they would operate without BlackBerrys, which are currently used to alert police captains in the field about homicides.

Roughly four million Americans have a BlackBerry device, and RIM controls about 50% of the market for wireless email devices, according to Gartner. "A stoppage of BlackBerry would cause major havoc," says Bob Egan, director of emerging technology at the research firm Tower Group. "CEOs use them, doctors use them, Wall Street guys use them."

But for the many BlackBerry victims, the prospect of a blackout is liberating. Patrick Blanchfield, who works for a New York-based nongovernmental organization, says it would prevent his boss from sending him emails at all hours of the night.

And Debra Lucas, an office manager in Ashburn, Va., says her husband is constantly checking the device, and she has banned it from the bedroom and restaurants. Still, she says she sometimes finds him hiding in the foyer, huddled up with the device. "It's like there's another woman -- but it's really just the BlackBerry," she says.

Some companies have put off purchasing BlackBerry upgrades. Law firm Hogan & Hartson has delayed an upgrade for the company's 1,000 lawyers until RIM's legal issues are resolved. In addition, the company is considering teaching lawyers how to use text messaging on their cellphones and looking at text-to-speech companies, including iHello and jConnect, that would allow lawyers to call in and have their email read to them over the phone by a computer.

Individual users are also trying to wean themselves off the devices in anticipation of a possible shutdown. Elana Centor, a 54-year-old free-lance writer, rarely lets her BlackBerry 7250 out of her sight -- that is, until earlier this week, when she decided to try to kick her habit in light of the lawsuit. "I'm preparing myself," says Ms. Centor of Minneapolis, describing how she suspended her routine of checking her email every 15 minutes and even went to the gym without the BlackBerry.

Meanwhile, interest in BlackBerry alternatives is taking off. Good Technology Inc., which makes wireless email software applications for devices such as Treo, Motorola Q and Nokia E-series devices, launched a "Try Good" campaign in December that allows corporate clients to test the services for 45 days free of charge. The company says it has fielded close to 600 calls in the past month from companies and government agencies.

Intellisync Corp. of San Jose, Calif., another RIM competitor, has launched pilot programs for more than 40 financial-services firms and government customers looking to test BlackBerry alternatives.

The high court's decision bounced the long-running patent-infringement battle between RIM and NTP Inc. back to a district court in Virginia, where it will likely be heard in February. Some worry the judge could rule in favor of NTP and issue an injunction that would shut down BlackBerry service to U.S. users, at least temporarily, though analysts say a settlement between RIM and NTP is more likely.

Even if an injunction is issued, RIM officials say it won't disrupt service. They say that have backup technology that will keep BlackBerry emails running without infringing NTP's patents. But some analysts have questioned the feasibility of implementing a so-called workaround, and some customers are worried it could compromise BlackBerry's functioning. And NTP has said it would challenge the workaround in court.

Analysts also say any court-ordered injunction would likely carve out an exception for government users. BlackBerrys are currently used by many federal agencies including members of the House of Representatives and Department of Justice lawyers. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist is known for sending late-night messages to Senate colleagues via his BlackBerry.

Since BlackBerry handsets run only the BlackBerry operating system, users wouldn't have access to other corporate email programs in the event of a service shutdown. But the device wouldn't be totally useless. The phone part, along with text messaging, may still work, analysts say.

Still, some remain worried. Larry Engel, a partner at White & Case in San Francisco, says his BlackBerry actually alleviates marital tension by allowing him to secretly check his email and get work done during vacations with his wife. "BlackBerrys are very easy to conceal in your palm," he says. A shutdown would blow his cover, since he'd have to break out a laptop at the beach.

In Patent Disputes, A Scramble To Prove Ideas Are Old Hat (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

Research in Motion Ltd., facing the threat that its popular BlackBerry service would be shut down in the U.S. over a patent dispute, got a tip early last year from a high-tech industry official: Check out a library in Norway.

At a university in Trondheim, a city about 310 miles from the Arctic Circle, the company found eight Norwegian Telecommunications Administration reports going back to 1986 and 1989. The reports described a wireless-email messaging system similar to that used by BlackBerry.

The reports, it turned out, helped RIM fire back at a company waging a patent war against it. The company, NTP Inc., says RIM infringed on patents it holds. RIM argued the Norway reports show NTP's patents weren't entirely original. Although RIM is making progress at the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, the fight is still mired in court. (See related article1).

Patent battles across the country are sending lawyers scrambling for finds like the Norway memos: published evidence that a patent is invalid because the idea was already in the air. The legal term for such documents is "prior art." When it's used successfully to fend off a patent-infringement claim, lawyers sometimes call it "killer art."

A cartoon strip by Rube Goldberg and a 1978 issue of Mad magazine have both successfully been cited as prior art in patent cases. The Patent Office late last year cited the Norwegian reports in preliminary decisions rejecting NTP's patents. "All you need is one reference that was publicly available, and that's sufficient to invalidate a patent," says Dennis Crouch, a Chicago patent attorney.

It used to be a lot harder than it is now to find such offbeat references. Up until the mid-1990s, the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office still did much of its patent-examination work manually. Patent examiners would sift through boxes called "shoes" (because they looked like shoe boxes) for old patents and articles from the likes of Popular Science and trade magazines that might undermine the supposed novelty of a patent claim. (Patent claims are the statements that bolster a patent application spelling out how the invention is unique.)

Don Kelly, a Virginia consultant who worked for the patent office for 37 years, remembers spending days looking through those shoes, investigating a single patent claim. On one application, he decided that a drawing by Mr. Goldberg, famous for his cartoons depicting complicated ways to perform simple tasks, represented prior art. The patent being sought was for a dog-food dispenser that attached to a dog's collar and dumped food when the dog jerked the chain. In searching for prior art, Mr. Kelly found a cartoon by Mr. Goldberg dubbed "Teeing Up a Golf Ball" that worked on the same premise; it even featured an animal with a collar attached to a chain that helped move the ball toward the tee. The company, whose name Mr. Kelly can't remember, narrowed its patent claims to avoid a rejection, he says.

These days, computerized databases and the Internet have made the task a lot easier. There are Web sites devoted solely to finding prior art. Archived materials at university libraries, out-of-print textbooks and international patent filings all are now easily accessible, opening up a world of possibility to those trying to fend off patent-infringement suits.

The Norway find isn't the first time David Long, RIM's patent attorney at Washington-based Howrey LLP, has hit upon potential killer art. In 2000, Mr. Long was representing the National Retail Federation and International Mass Retail Association in a case involving infringement claims by the estate of an inventor named Jerome Lemelson. The estate alleged that companies selling and using bar-code technology were infringing on patents Mr. Lemelson had obtained and updated between the mid-1950s and 1990s. Mr. Long's client countered by seeking to prove "that the bar code has been part of Americana for years," he says. In other words, the technology has been widely available for so long it's too late now to cite a problem with it.

Mr. Long recalled from his childhood an issue of Mad magazine with a big black bar code on the cover denouncing the technology. "But I didn't preserve it, because I didn't know I'd need it for litigation someday," jokes Mr. Long.

Thanks to eBay, the online-auction site, Mr. Long found a copy of the April 1978 issue and included the reference in an appeals-court filing for his client. A federal judge last year threw out the estate's claims and an appeals court upheld that decision, citing the bar code's widespread acceptance and years of delay by Mr. Lemelson in seeking redress for any patent infringement.

Those seeking patents are required to search for prior art and bring it to the attention of government examiners when filing applications. Likewise, the patent office also looks for prior art in deciding whether to grant a patent. But because of a heavy backlog, examiners usually don't spend more than 20 hours per filing, so it isn't likely that they will turn up truly obscure examples.

Thorough searches like the one in Research in Motion's case tend to be done only in high-stakes court cases where major money is on the line. The hunt for art in those situations helped spawn a Web-based service in 2000 called BountyQuest. Subscribers to the service would post a patent on the site and offer a $10,000 reward for anyone who found published materials debunking it. The site, now defunct, was partially funded by Amazon.com founder Jeff Bezos, who at the time was trying to keep Barnes & Noble's Web site from using one-click technology that Mr. Bezos argued violated Amazon's patent.

Though that case was settled out of court for undisclosed terms, Charles Cella, a Boston patent attorney and the former chief executive of BountyQuest, says they did turn up some prior art that could have proved useful in that case. For example, one submission was a 1980s software program mailed to customers by the Bank of Montreal that allowed people to re-order personal checks with a single click. "As far as we know, that's the first evidence of one-click shopping," says Mr. Cella.

In the end, though, the company couldn't make enough money and shut down its service in late 2002.

Companies fighting patent suits often get help from others in the industry, sometimes anonymously. In RIM's case, they know who their tipster is, but have declined to name the person beyond saying it's an industry official. But the suggestion that RIM search through the Norwegian library has turned out to be a potential lifesaver for the company. The Norwegian reports were issued at least two years before NTP's earliest patent was filed, and the patent office already has cited the documents in preliminary decisions invalidating at least four of the five NTP patents involved in the case. It could take another year for the patent office to finalize its decision.

Still, the lawsuit is moving ahead much more quickly, with a federal judge in Virginia already ruling against RIM and threatening to shut down BlackBerry service in the U.S. as early as next month. While it might be too late for the judge to consider the Norwegian reports in his decision, they almost certainly will play a role in any appeals by RIM.

Arcelor Clinches Deal For Dofasco As Thyssen Quits (WSJ)

By Juliane Von Reppert-bismarck

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Arcelor SA yesterday said it agreed to an all-cash deal to buy Canadian steelmaker Dofasco Inc. for about €3.95 billion ($4.86 billion), after rival bidder ThyssenKrupp AG of Germany pulled out of the running late Monday.

Arcelor, the world's second-largest steel producer behind London-based Mittal Steel Co., rose 4.5% to €21.63 ($26.62) in late trading yesterday on the Belgian stock exchange. While the deal ends Arcelor's recent streak of losing expensive bidding wars, some analysts said the bid looks expensive. ThyssenKrupp and Arcelor had been fighting for control of Dofasco since November, and both had raised their bids several times.

"Arcelor may have been too eager to close an important acquisition," said Delta Lloyd Securities analyst Gert Biesmans.

The deal needs to generate some €100 million in synergies to create value and be justified "not only from a strategic rationale," said Dexia analyst Mickael Van den Hauwe.

Arcelor said it will pay C$71, or about US$62, a share for Dofasco. The Luxembourg-based company didn't say what synergies it expected to achieve through the acquisition. While Dofasco's board has recommended Arcelor's bid, shareholders must still approve the deal.

ThyssenKrupp said it decided to pull out of the battle for Dofasco because a higher offer "would go beyond the point of creating economic value." The company had until midnight Monday New York time to respond to Arcelor's latest bid, made Jan. 17. ThyssenKrupp's last bid was C$68 a share.

Credit Suisse praised ThyssenKrupp's move, upgrading the stock to "outperform" from "neutral" and raising its target price to €23 from €17.50. In afternoon Frankfurt trading, the stock rose 2.6% to €19.20.

ThyssenKrupp said it still plans to expand its North American steel operations, and while it didn't rule out U.S. acquisitions, it said it preferred to build new plants.

WB, UPN To Merge Into Single New Network (WT/AP)

By Seth Sutel

The Washington Times, January 25, 2006

NEW YORK -- Two small, long-struggling television networks -- UPN and the WB, which air on Channels 20 and 50, respectively, in the Washington area -- will shut down this fall, and programming from both will be used to start a new network aimed mainly at young and minority viewers.

The new network will be called the CW -- "C" for CBS Corp. and "W" for Warner Bros. -- each of which will own half of the new entity and contribute programs, assets and executives to the venture.

The WB was owned by Time Warner Inc., parent of Warner Bros., and the Tribune Co., a Chicago-based media company, which will relinquish its 22.5 percent stake in exchange for a 10-year affiliation deal to carry the new network on 16 of its stations, including Washington's WBDC-TV (Channel 50).

"We're going to have the WB programs [through August], and then we'll become the CW network," said Eric Meyrowitz, vice president and general manager of WBDC. "We're ecstatic about the change. To get the best of the WB and UPN is just incredible."

The CW will air 30 hours of programming each week, like the WB. Shows will air Monday through Friday 3-5 p.m. and 8-10 p.m., and Sundays 5-10 p.m. There also will be five hours of children's programs on Saturday mornings, Mr. Meyrowitz said.

The CW also will be carried on the 12 stations owned by UPN, a unit of CBS Corp., guaranteeing the network carriage in 48 percent of the country and 20 of the top 25 TV markets. Network executives said they hoped to have agreements in place to cover most of the rest of the country by the time the network starts in the fall.

Fox Entertainment Group owns WDCA-TV (Channel 20), Washington's UPN station. Local Fox executives did not return repeated calls for comment yesterday about the future of the station, which has been on the air since April 1966.

Chris Ender, a CBS spokesman, said UPN programming will air through the end of August on WDCA, but CW programs will be available exclusively on WBDC.

UPN and the WB had struggled to compete against larger rivals in the broadcast-TV business, including Walt Disney Co.'s ABC, General Electric Co.'s NBC, CBS Corp.'s CBS and News Corp.'s Fox. Both consistently place behind their larger rivals in the Nielsen ratings race and have financially burdened their parent companies.

"Looking down the road, this was much better than keeping UPN alive," said Leslie Moonves, chief executive of CBS, which became a separate company from Viacom Inc., the owner of MTV and VH1, at the beginning of the year.

But it's not clear that the combination of two struggling networks will result in a strong one or in a moneymaker.

"Chances are, in five years they may not exist at all, or it may be something else, but right now it's better than going alone," said Hal Vogel, a longtime media analyst and author of a book on the economics of the entertainment industry.

"This makes sense -- it's not a slam-dunk proposition, but it makes sense. Six networks was too many," he said.

The new network will draw on programming from both UPN -- whose shows include "Everybody Hates Chris" and "Veronica Mars" -- and from the WB -- whose shows include "Supernatural," "Smallville" and "Everwood."

The new network will based in a new, undetermined location, network executives said. The WB and UPN both are based in Southern California.

Dawn Ostroff, currently UPN's president, will become the president of entertainment at the CW, overseeing programming. John Maatta, the WB's current chief operating officer, will oversee business operations at the CW as COO.

CBS shares rose $1.08, or 4 percent, to $26.90 in trading on the New York Stock Exchange, while Tribune's fell 25 cents to $29.65.

Time Warner's shares rose 18 cents, or 1.1 percent, to $17.27.

Hearing Set For Early February In Ivory-billed Woodpecker Case (AP)

AP, January 24, 2006

LITTLE ROCK (AP) - Attorneys for environmental groups came to court with an audiovisual presentation showing an image of the black, white and red ivory-billed woodpecker.

But they didn't have a chance to explain Monday why they believe the Grand Prairie Irrigation project in eastern Arkansas should be stopped in order to avoid harming the rare bird.

Instead, U.S. District Judge G. Thomas Eisele recused himself before the hearing began. The case was bumped to another court before landing in the court of U.S. District Judge William R. Wilson, who set a hearing on it for Feb. 6 in Jonesboro.

Work on the $320 million project to siphon water from the White River for use on farms that have been depleting the underground water supply will continue for now.

The National Wildlife Federation and the Arkansas Wildlife Federation filed the lawsuit in September, claiming that the project would violate the Endangered Species Act. The suit claims that diverting water from the White River could damage the ivory-billed's habitat.

The bird was once thought to be extinct and was only recently rediscovered in Arkansas.

Other lawsuits, both federal and state, have ended unfavorably for the environmentalists.

In a note to lawyers, Eisele wrote that while reviewing the case at his home Sunday, he found an affidavit by Kenneth Lee Smith, whom he identified as director of the Arkansas Audubon Society, a conservation group. Eisele wrote that while the group was not a party to the case, he had recused in a recent case involving the society because in February 2003 he made a $200 contribution in honor of a friend, Bob Shults, one of the group's founders.

District Court Clerk James McCormack said that one of the parties to the case declined to go forward after Eisele mentioned the conflict. McCormack said federal rules wouldn't allow him to say which of the parties had caused the judge to recuse himself.

The case was reassigned to Judge George Howard Jr., but his docket was full so the case was then assigned to Wilson.

Work on the project began in June with construction on a $34.5 million pumping station on the White River. In all, project is to include pipelines and canals and on-farm water-holding structures. The construction site, on 241 acres of mostly treeless fields, is more than 20 miles south of where the woodpecker was spotted.

The Grand Prairie covers a half-million acres. And if all goes as planned, water will be flowing to farms across the White River Irrigation District by 2012.

But environmental groups say the corps has refused to perform an in-depth investigation into whether the project will harm the woodpecker's habitat.

"It would cause major changes to the area," said Lisa Madry, regional representative with the National Wildlife Federation. Madry said drawing large amounts of water from the river could affect vegetation in the area. She said that so little is known about the ivory-billed woodpecker that it's unclear how the bird could be harmed.

Justice Department attorneys Devon McCune and Bridget McNeil declined to comment Monday. But farmers who traveled to Little Rock for the hearing said the project could be completed without hurting the woodpecker.

"Our position is what we're doing presently is not disruptive of any habitat of the woodpecker in the past years, knowingly or unknowingly," said Tommy Hillman, a farmer from near Carlisle.

Tom Fortner, director of the White River Irrigation District, which would oversee the irrigation system, said only about half of the water for the project would come from the river. The rest would come from measures to capture rainwater and irrigation runoff on farms, he said.

Bush Administration Outlines More Funding For Hydrogen Fuel Cells (BOS)

By Ken Thomas

The Boston Globe, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON --The Bush administration said Tuesday it would provide $119 million in funding for research into hydrogen fuel cells, touting the automotive technology as a way to reduce the nation's dependence on foreign oil.

Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, touring the Washington Auto Show, said the money would fund projects to help overcome some of the barriers "in getting technology out of the laboratory and out onto the test track."

"We are well past the point where we see that it can be done, and now we're at the point of figuring out how it can be done -- affordably and safely," Bodman said.

The funding is part of President Bush's $1.7 billion hydrogen research program, first detailed in 2003. The government and automakers have been working to develop vehicles powered by pollution-free hydrogen fuel cells, which could reduce demand for imported oil while cutting greenhouse gas emissions.

Many obstacles remain -- fuel cell vehicles are extremely expensive to produce and lack an infrastructure of fueling stations to make them viable. The government has said it hopes hydrogen fuel cell vehicles will be available in car showrooms by 2020.

The Energy Department would provide up to $100 million during the next four years for research projects to improve various components of fuel cell systems, with the goal of improving performance and lowering cost by 2010.

Another $19 million will be devoted toward a dozen research projects looking at the components involved in using hydrogen to create electricity. The projects will be conducted in Arizona, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee and Virginia.

Bodman also released guidelines for identifying and overcoming some of the technical challenges facing the industry. Some of the challenges include the reducing the cost of hydrogen production and fuel cell systems, improving the durability of the systems and increasing the capacity of onboard hydrogen storage.

Coalition Turns On To 'Plug-In Hybrids' (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

DAVIS, Calif. -- In the 1950s, an aspiring Pasadena hot-rodder named Andrew Frank shocked the competition by powering his 1936 Ford with a Cadillac V-12 engine. "It had gobs of torque," he recalls.

In the 1990s, as a mechanical-engineering professor at the University of California here, Dr. Frank produced another shocker. He yanked big engines out of American cars and replaced them with electric motors that worked in tandem with much smaller gasoline engines. He called his new configuration the "plug-in hybrid" because it allowed homeowners to recharge the car's batteries by plugging into an electrical outlet.

Hybrid automobiles work with two engines. Auto makers have tinkered with them since the early 1900s, but the cars didn't gain much attention in the U.S. until Japanese companies began selling them in 1999. The current top seller is Toyota Motor Corp.'s Prius; Americans bought 205,790 of them last year. What Dr. Frank was proposing more than 10 years ago, however, was a variation on the hybrid theme.

But Detroit auto makers ignored him. Japanese car makers, about to market their own hybrids that didn't plug in, paid scant attention. This year, however, as hybrids have gained in popularity amid high gasoline prices, Dr. Frank, now 72 years old, is getting some traction:

A U.S. coalition led by electric utilities, sensing a way to gain market share through vehicles that derive 90% of their power from electricity and can recharge at night when power is plentiful and cheap, kicked off a national campaign in Washington yesterday to push auto makers to make plug-in hybrids.

Some cities, environmental groups and state pollution regulators have joined this "Plug-in Partners" effort. They see plug-ins as a means to meet tightening air-pollution standards and to use controls over utilities as a way to clean up urban air.

DaimlerChrysler AG has turned a European delivery van, called the Sprinter, into a prototype diesel-electric plug-in. Forty of the vehicles will be tested over the next two years by a variety of U.S. agencies and companies.

The plug-in campaign is intensifying just as car buyers and policy makers are grasping for ways to ease the nation's energy problems. When President Bush delivers his State of the Union address next week, he is expected to tout alternative auto fuels, like ethanol, as well as nuclear energy.

A key difference between plug-in hybrids and conventional hybrids is that plug-ins have a bigger battery pack and can be designed to run a passenger car on electricity for the first 60 miles -- about the length of an average daily commute.

Dr. Frank estimates that if drivers regularly recharge their batteries at home, plug-ins may get well over 100 miles per gallon. By comparison, conventional hybrids must rely on gasoline-powered engines to recharge their batteries and get between 40 and 60 mpg.

While running on electricity, the plug-in's fuel cost drops to 70 cents a gallon, or lower, Dr. Frank estimates.

Only a handful of experimental plug-ins are on the road. Some auto makers say the vehicles are more vulnerable to wear and tear than other hybrids. The biggest government spenders on auto research, the federal government and the state of California, remain focused not on hybrids but on fuel-cell-powered cars that use hydrogen.

"You should take a look and see at least what the federal government is thinking," Dr. Frank told students in one of his graduate classes recently, adding with a smile and a wink, "I don't agree with most of what they have to say." In the basement of his school's engineering building, Dr. Frank and his students tinker with sport-utility vehicles.

Their first move with a Ford Motor Co. Explorer was to rip up its floor panels. "Most cars have plenty of underutilized space," Dr. Frank explains, showing how he and the students filled that space with batteries.

Then the students replaced the Explorer's big gasoline engine with a fuel-sipper taken from a General Motors Corp. Saturn and a 200-horsepower electric motor. Power from the two engines, which operate on the same drive shaft, is controlled by a continuously variable transmission, a gearless, computer-controlled device. Dr. Frank estimates that the car's weight remains about the same. The batteries he puts in make it heavier, but his engines and transmissions are lighter than the ones he removes.

Dr. Frank's hybrids have enough electric power to run for the first 60 miles; then, computers turn on the gasoline engine to help run the car and keep the batteries charged. Dr. Frank's students have discovered that even with six of them riding in the Explorer, it could still "burn rubber."

That was the Explorer's downfall last year in an annual contest held by the Department of Energy to see which American university could build the most efficient-running car. Dr. Frank's students were showing off the car's acceleration in the parking lot before the contest, when it died. "We broke the motor," he explains.

In June, U.C. Davis will try again with a Chevrolet Equinox, powered by a relatively tiny Toyota Prius gasoline engine and electric equipment similar to that in the Explorer. To demonstrate that cars can be weaned almost entirely from fossil fuel, Dr. Frank's students plan to run the gasoline engine mainly on ethanol made from corn. They are designing a tent with solar panels that can be used to recharge the batteries.

Utilities are drawn to the idea of a car that plugs in at home. The Electric Power Research Institute, which is financed by utilities, is sponsoring DaimlerChrysler's experiment with plug-in delivery vans. The project is being shepherded one of Dr. Frank's former students, Mark Duvall, who remembers working long nights modifying cars in the professor's lab. "He was a complete master of giving you enough rope to hang yourself," Mr. Duvall says.

Critics say the plug-in's weak point may be its batteries, which could burn out if power is drawn up and down frequently. Dr. Frank says recent experiments with electric cars by Toyota and GM have developed batteries that can stand the strain.

Dan Benjamin, a transportation analyst for ABI Research, an Oyster Bay, N.Y., market-research firm, says the battery problem means plug-ins will appear first as commercial vehicles: "Stop-and-go city driving really takes advantage of this technology."

Bill Kwong, a spokesman for Toyota, says the company doesn't encourage buyers of its hybrids to use kits, made by some companies, that convert them into plug-ins, since "it cycles the batteries down way too deeply and shortens the life of the batteries." For that reason, he says Toyota isn't working on a plug-in hybrid.

Others think the car will be too expensive. It costs Dr. Frank about $100,000 to customize a car. But he estimates that made in volume, his adjustments would raise the cost of a car by a more affordable 25%. He says most plug-in parts could be made by a well-equipped machine shop.

The plug-in feature will add from $4,000 to $6,000 to the cost of a car, he calculates, noting "that's what some people pay for a sunroof, leather seats and a fancy navigation system."

Drug Makers Plan Big Increase In Flu Vaccine For Next Fall (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

ATLANTA, Jan. 24 (AP) - Pharmaceutical companies say they are preparing to produce as many as 120 million doses of flu vaccine for the next flu season, by far the most ever.

The increased production could mean an end to the shortages of the past several years, especially in the 2004-5 flu season, when bacterial contamination led to the shutdown of a British factory that was to produce nearly half the United States' supply.

Speaking Tuesday at a flu vaccine conference here sponsored by the American Medical Association and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, vaccine makers said the increase was warranted for several reasons: better government reimbursement for shots, indications that federal health officials may one day recommend flu shots for nearly everyone, and public fears of avian flu (although the vaccine would protect only against conventional flu).

GlaxoSmithKline, which produced 7.5 million doses of flu vaccine for the current flu season, said it expected to distribute 20 million to 30 million for next season. The company recently acquired plants in Canada and Pennsylvania and is expanding its plants in Dresden, Germany.

Sanofi Pasteur, the main vaccine producer for the current season, broke ground last July on a vaccine plant in Swiftwater, Pa., to double the capacity of that company, a joint venture of Sanofi-Aventis and Merck.

Five percent to 20 percent of the population gets the flu each year, with the disease leading to 36,000 deaths and 200,000 hospitalizations.

Flu vaccinations are currently recommended by the disease control centers for groups most at risk of complications, including the elderly and people with weakened immune systems. But officials at the centers say they may expand the recommendation to include most children.

About 86 million doses of vaccine were produced for the current season in the United States, up from about 61 million for last season. The record is 95 million, for 2002-3.

A New Tack In West's Land Battles (CSM)

By Jeff Oliver

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2006

CHALLIS, IDAHO - The federal government owns so much of Custer County, Idaho, that one could call it common ground. More than 95 percent lies in public hands. But for years, Idaho has failed to find much, if any, common ground on what to do with the region's pristine backwoods.

Environmentalists wanted to protect the roadless forestland as federal wilderness, ranchers hoped to maintain the land for their cattle, and weekend warriors pushed for access for their dirt bikes and off-road vehicles. Local government officials, starved for revenue, looked to privatize some government land to generate more property taxes.

Exhausted after three decades of lawsuits, failed legislation, and ill will, these groups are backing a compromise bill that would designate some 300,000 acres as wilderness, privatize another 6,000, and keep the rest open for multiple uses. Some observers call the legislation, submitted last year by US Rep. Mike Simpson (R) of Idaho, an example of "collaborative process," an evolving concept that could define the future of conservation.

"The environmental movement has gotten very good at fighting and we've lost touch with a lot of people," says Rick Johnson, executive director of The Idaho Conservation League and a key figure in the Custer County compromise.

"Collaboration, in the big sense, means getting things done instead of simply fighting. People are hungry for that."

While definitions of the process vary, the basic idea has existed for decades. Most often it's used to describe a coming together of stakeholders intimately connected to a particular problem. The use of such cooperative approaches has surged in recent years. Now, the movement seems to be presenting itself as a viable alternative to mainstream environmentalism.

The trend is particularly evident here in the West, where public landholdings are vast and debate has sharpened over what to do with them. For example:

· In southern Oregon, a group of environmentalists, government agents, logging representatives, and concerned citizens came to an amicable agreement this past fall regarding a long-disputed timber sale. According to the agreement, loggers will bypass the forest's largest and oldest trees while a local committee will help to mediate any future conflicts.

· After witnessing what happened to timber towns when the spotted owl made the endangered species list, farmers in Washington state joined environmentalists in a similar effort to protect sage grouse.

· In southwestern Idaho, ranchers, environmentalists, government officials, native Americans, and local residents are working together to protect the long- disputed Owyhee Canyonlands. The group is crafting a compromise similar to Custer County's, which will then be introduced as legislation by US Sen. Michael Crapo (R) of Idaho.

Some experts attribute the movement's increased momentum to the rise of the Republican Party. Indeed, collaboration has quietly become a priority for the Bush White House. In August, the administration sponsored the first White House Conference on Cooperative Conservation, dedicated to promoting the "appropriate inclusion of local participation in Federal decision making."

Collaboration has found another champion in Senator Crapo. In December, he proposed amending the Endangered Species Act to encourage broad-based local groups to find collaborative solutions to wildlife decline.

Other experts attribute the impetus to a rising dissatisfaction with the strict gospel of conservation and the resulting stalemates. In its place, a more temperate approach, the so-called "wise-use" ideology, is gaining ground, says Kirk Emerson, director of the US Institute for Environmental Conflict Resolution in Tucson, Ariz. That ideology, in turn, has given birth to a number of well-funded organizations dedicated to advancing collaborative process. These include The Quivira Coalition in New Mexico, the Sonoran Institute in Arizona, and the Montana-based Red Lodge Clearinghouse.

Not everyone is thrilled by this expansion. The collaborative movement has mostly produced "a lot of talk and little follow-through," says environmentalist Michael McCloskey, who in 1995 wrote a now-famous memo. It warned environmentalists: "A new dogma is emerging as a challenge to us. It embodies the proposition that the best way for the public to determine how to manage its interest in the environment is through collaboration among stakeholders."

Ten years later, he remains unimpressed. He argues that the main reason conservationists increasingly turn to compromise is that the federal government is failing to do its job protecting the environment. Also, many collaborative groups set the bar so low that they declare success if they can get all the stakeholders to the table, he says.

Indeed, there remains little hard evidence that collaboration works in the long term, experts agree. This is partly because few researchers follow the trend, partly because the collaborations frequently span so many years that they're hard for researchers to track.

For proponents, however, anecdotes have long filled in for proof. "In almost every case you find people who have fought those old wars over and over again," says Daniel Kemmis, senior fellow at the Center for the Rocky Mountain West in Missoula, Mont. "These old warriors have agreed to lay down their arms and see if there is an alternative answer."

Clogged Rockies Highway Divides Coloradans (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

SILVERTHORNE, Colo., Jan. 22 - When Interstate 70 was built through here in the 1960's and 70's, the Colorado Rockies were largely rural and remote, and the old roads that the highway replaced were a widely recognized danger.

Over the years, as the population grew, delays and frustrations on the highway began to mount. Traffic jams at nosebleed altitude became common. In 8,800-foot-high Silverthorne, which was little more than a gas station pit stop a generation ago, with a grocery that got fresh produce only on Thursdays, alpine meadows gave way to factory outlet stores.

Now state officials are considering a major and contentious widening project for Interstate 70 that is dividing people over the question of who the highway is for and how it transformed these mountains.

The project is a variation of a drama that is playing out across much of the West as once-rural outposts are transformed into brimming settlements with newfound political and economic clout in transportation decisions.

As the Federal Highway Act of 1956 established the Interstate System and helped open vast expanses of the West, highways like Interstate 70 changed just about everything by putting on the map distant places that had been mostly untouched.

Now, the very places that were changed, like Silverthorne - 65 miles west of Denver - are wading in as aggressive and muscular participants in discussions about what comes next.

In Nevada, the expansion U.S. 95 connecting Las Vegas and its sprawling western suburbs has resumed after environmentalists settled a lawsuit last year over the effect of increased vehicle emissions on nearby residents.

The proposed Legacy Highway in Utah, extending south of Salt Lake City, was blocked for years before receiving final approval this month.

Elsewhere in Colorado, a plan for a toll road across the once-empty plains east of Denver was put on hold last year after opposition from residents.

Transportation experts, politicians and residents agree that the stakes and implications of these fights are enormous, touching on tenets of the West that are scriptural: unbridled growth, local identity, civic autonomy and an uneasy dependence on government.

Here in Colorado, where Interstate 70 is crucial to the tourism economy and the state's image as the mountain playground of the West, businesses, residents and interest groups do not remotely agree on what to do.

"The question is, How much do we really want to improve I-70 - and do we want to improve it so much that it changes the character of our communities?" said Gary Severson, the executive director of the Northwest Colorado Council of Governments. "That's the tightrope."

The idea that transportation systems can reshape the regions through which they pass is well established. As far back as the Erie Canal and the transcontinental railroad, geographers and historians say that getting from Point A to Point B has always been at least partly about property values, boosterism and the restless American impulse to move on and create anew.

But that pattern is being given a decidedly new twist here on a road that was hailed and agonized over as one of the most daunting stretches of the Interstate System.

Places like Silverthorne - incorporated in 1967, when it was populated mainly by highway construction workers - have become destinations for shopping or homebuilding and tend to favor an expansion of the highway that would deliver more of the bounty that Interstate 70 has already bestowed. Towns closer to Denver, like Idaho Springs, which have not seen the influx of vacation homes or tourists and which also have many more commuters to Denver, say mass transit must be on the table.

Some politicians and residents say that doing nothing may be the wisest course. Colorado's population in and out of the mountains is expected to increase by 50 percent in the next 20 years, pushing people toward mass transit as traffic congestion worsens.

Not everything that has happened here is a result of transportation, of course. The explosion of population and the economy since the completion of Interstate 70's last leg in 1979 - the second tube of the Eisenhower/Johnson Tunnel at 11,000 feet across the Continental Divide - also coincided with a demographic transformation as members of the post-World War II generation reached their peak earning years, stock and real estate markets boomed and changes in tax law made buying vacation real estate more attractive.

Resorts that opened or grew during the highway's early years - like Vail, in 1962, Keystone in 1970 and Beaver Creek in 1980 - have moved toward year-round operations and real-estate development that bring more visitors and residents.

The results have all fed back into the equation of traffic, which is increasingly bumper-to-bumper on weekends in winter and summer. Another record was set last year for the number of cars trying to squeeze through the four lanes of the Eisenhower/Johnson Tunnel in one month - just over 37,000 a day, last July.

Issues of class and clout have further clouded the picture.

Summit County, where Silverthorne is located, was one of the fastest-growing counties in the nation in the 1990's, with the population up 83 percent. Equally important, many residents and politicians say, is that the nine counties along the Interstate 70 corridor - led by Summit and Eagle, where the big resorts and the biggest waves of homebuilding are concentrated - are becoming more and more important to the state's economy.

In 2000, a private study commissioned by the state found that the corridor produced about $2 billion in recreation revenue, out of $9.3 billion statewide, and generated $136 million in state and local tax revenues.

"Do we accommodate growth, or do we stifle it? That is the question," said Lou DelPiccolo, Silverthorne's mayor, who favors a highway widening plan.

Thirty miles east, in Clear Creek County, where the growth has been slower and the big payoff from the highway never quite materialized, political leaders like the Idaho Springs mayor, Dennis Lunbery, are asking the opposite question: Could they survive the widening of the highway?

Idaho Springs, confined in a narrow canyon - the back door of City Hall is less than 100 feet from the Interstate's westbound guardrail - would be destroyed, Mr. Lunbery said, by the miasma of asphalt, noise and dust that a bigger highway, and the years of construction, would bring.

Mr. Lunbery said he thought that the state, in its environmental assessment of the corridor, had "stacked the deck" toward a highway-widening option by excluding any plan that costs more than $4 billion. Most mass transit proposals would add at least another $2 billion to $4 billion.

Coincidentally or not, widening is what the destination communities farther west mostly want. Many people farther west also worry that a mass transit rail line, however good it may be for closer-in communities like Idaho Springs, could turn resort communities into bedroom communities, full of commuters catching the train to their offices in Denver.

The executive director of the State Department of Transportation, Thomas E. Norton, who is expected to make a decision on the corridor later this year, said he was open to all options.

"I don't think there is a bias in my perspective," Mr. Norton said. "There is a bias toward best use of the public dollar, and until you can get really high transit kinds of usage, the economics are not there. Rail that can move 10,000 people an hour looks great, but if only 12 days of the year it would be used by that many people, it's not an efficient use of dollars."

Many people, including Mr. Lunbery, who expects the state's study to be challenged in court almost no matter what happens, think that nothing will happen for years on the corridor - partly because of the difficulty in finding the money - and that worsening traffic is, for now, the only certainty.

Gary Lindstrom thinks that is a good thing. He is a legislator in the Colorado House whose district includes much of the corridor. He is also a Democratic candidate for governor this year and favors the mass transit idea, but he agrees with Mr. Norton that for now it does not appear feasible. Time will change that equation, Mr. Lindstrom said.

"The worst thing we can do is widen the highway," he said. "We need to keep the congestion so people will be interested in the transit."

No matter what unfolds, Linda Wellington and her husband, Bill, who have lived all their lives here, will probably not see it. Ms. Wellington has watched it all - the good and the bad - and often talked it over with her father, a career highway worker, before he died, who regularly plowed the highest passes of the old road before Interstate 70 was built.

"At one time I was bitter. I'd say, 'Dad, don't you hate all the people and the traffic?' and he'd say, 'We need to move forward,' " said Ms. Wellington, who is in her 50's. "So that's where I am now. You can't stop it. It's here, we've built it, and you can't close the door."

The Wellingtons are planning to move. Mr. Wellington, who is 56, said he had been looking at a place in northeastern Colorado, out on the plains toward Kansas, where it is not as crowded as the mountains have become and where their son now lives. He will hate to leave, he said, but things have changed too much to stay.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Grassley Backs Ex-FBI Agent (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

When Cecilia Woods, an FBI special agent based in Panama, suspected her boss of having extramarital affairs including one with a paid informant in 2000, she reported her concerns to bureau officials -- and started investigating on her own.

For her trouble, the bureau suspended her for 10 days, then later transferred her to a less prestigious post in Washington, Woods said. The 23-year veteran retired in 2005 after enduring a second, unrelated suspension of 14 days and concluding that she would never get back in the agency's good graces.

"All I wanted is for the FBI to look into his actions," Woods said in an interview. "And because I raised the issue with the bureau, the bureau came after me instead. The bureau made me the target."

Woods, who in 2001 filed an equal employment opportunity complaint alleging a hostile work environment, is hardly the first federal employee to allege that she was the victim of unfair treatment by the brass. But she has attracted a powerful ally -- Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and a longtime critic of the FBI.

Woods's supervisor eventually admitted to the affairs, and to giving the informant lingerie and other gifts, said Grassley, whose staff investigated the case. For that and for misusing government vehicles, he received a 14-day suspension, a demotion and a transfer to the office of his choice, Grassley said.

In a six-page letter sent Monday to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III, Grassley cited Woods's case as an example of what he believes is a chronic "double standard" of discipline at the agency, in which misconduct by supervisors is punished more lightly than that by underlings. The FBI also has a habit of dealing more harshly with misconduct by agents who are seen as disloyal than by those seen as loyal, wrote Grassley, who asked Mueller for more information about discipline at the agency.

"The lesson is this: If you are loyal to the FBI and you are a supervisor, it is possible to engage in conduct that dishonors the Bureau and undermines its mission while keeping your job," Grassley wrote. "However, if you show any sign of disloyalty to the FBI or your supervisors, they will try to fire you -- even if your 'disloyalty' consists of reporting misconduct or concerns about national security."

An FBI spokesman said the agency planned to review Grassley's letter before responding "in an expeditious manner" to the senator. "The director is currently traveling overseas, and therefore the FBI has no additional response at this time," Special Agent Richard Kolko said.

The thrust of Grassley's criticism is not new. A 2002 report by the Justice Department's inspector general said there was a perception among FBI employees that a double standard of discipline exists within the agency. That view arose, in part, because there was a separate disciplinary system for managers until 2000. Inspector General Glenn A. Fine cited several "troubling cases" in which discipline for managers appeared "unduly lenient."

In 2003, Fine reported on inappropriate sexual behavior and racial comments by senior FBI managers, saying the incidents reinforced earlier findings that the agency had repeatedly let senior managers get away with egregious conduct while handing out stronger punishment to lower-level employees who behaved similarly.

Woods drew her first suspension after she asked a hotel bar worker to let her know when her supervisor left the hotel. Woods and the supervisor had met with the informant in a hotel room before he told Woods to depart, leaving the two of them alone -- and Woods suspicious. She was suspended in February 2001 for acting unprofessionally and providing information to an non-bureau individual (the hotel worker).

Woods received her second suspension in November 2003 for providing her attorney in her EEO case with unredacted documents that may have contained sensitive or classified materials. Woods acknowledged the lapse but said that "there was nothing classified. If anything, there were some names that were sensitive."

In his letter, Grassley wrote: "I am aware of no evidence that her alleged disclosures, either to the acquaintance in the hotel bar or to her attorney, had any actual negative impact on the security of FBI operations."

Woods said the experience in Panama taught her that FBI discipline runs on the "good old boy" system. "I wanted the bureau to be responsible," she said. "They shoved everything under the carpet. They just didn't want to look at it."

Medical Marijuana Advocates File Challenge To San Diego County (AP)

By Elliot Spagat

The Associated Press, January 24, 2006

SAN DIEGO – Medicinal marijuana advocates on Tuesday challenged a San Diego County lawsuit that seeks to overturn a state law permitting the use of pot for medical purposes.

The county sued the state of California and its director of health services on Friday in federal court, saying federal law that prohibits marijuana use trumps state law that allows it. California approved the use of marijuana for medicinal purposes with the passage of Proposition 215, which won 55 percent votes cast in 1996.

San Diego is the only California county that has refused to provide identification cards to registered medical marijuana users.

The American Civil Liberties Union, Americans for Safe Access and the Drug Policy Alliance filed a motion to intervene in the lawsuit on behalf of patients including Pamela Sakuda, 58, who uses marijuana to treat side effects of chemotherapy for rectal cancer. The San Diego woman said the drug has quelled nausea and stimulated her appetite.

"The supervisors have turned a deaf ear to the pleas of sick and dying people, and now they have shown that they are equally willing to ignore the law," said Joe Elford, chief counsel for Americans for Safe Access.

According to the ACLU, 11 states have approved marijuana for medical purposes. California was first, followed by Montana, Arizona, Alaska, Colorado, Hawaii, Maine, Nevada, Oregon, Washington and, most recently, Rhode Island.

The county's five Republican supervisors were mostly silent as several marijuana users urged them Tuesday to drop the lawsuit filed last week in San Diego. One supervisor, Ron Roberts, garnered applause when he said he opposed the lawsuit.

"Your actions are unjust, unlawful and un-American," said Wendy Christakes of La Mesa, who has used marijuana since 2003 to treat a back injury. She used a cane to step up to the microphone.

Rudy Reyes, 28, said marijuana has allowed him to sleep after massive wildfires in 2003 burned 75 percent of his body and put him in the hospital for eight months. He said doctors at UC San Diego Medical Center recommended the drug after his body rejected morphine.

"I don't have flashbacks, I don't have those middle-of-the-night terrors," he said in an interview after urging the supervisors to drop their fight.

Last year, a 3-2 board majority voted to ignore a state requirement that counties issue identification cards for medical marijuana users and maintain a registry of people who apply for the cards. The move came despite a warning from the county counsel that the move would likely result in costly litigation.

Challenge To Pot ID Law To Continue (LAT)

By Tony Perry And Ashley Powers, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2006

SAN DIEGO — Despite pleas from the ACLU and several individuals suffering chronic pain, the San Diego County Board of Supervisors on Tuesday declined to withdraw a lawsuit seeking to overturn a state law requiring the county to issue medical marijuana cards.

Meanwhile, San Bernardino County officials announced they supported the San Diego board's decision to challenge the state law on grounds that federal prohibition of marijuana use takes precedence. By day's end, the county counsel of San Bernardino had contacted his counterpart in San Diego to discuss legal strategy.

Kevin Keenan, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union's office for San Diego and Imperial counties, said he was disappointed but not surprised by the San Diego supervisors' decision to "forge ahead with this misguided lawsuit." The ACLU and two groups that support medical marijuana on Tuesday petitioned the federal court to allow them to oppose the lawsuit.

San Bernardino County Supervisors Dennis Hansberger and Josie Gonzales said their county's action was intended to force the state to clarify its policies on how local agencies should enforce drug laws. They said they believe San Bernardino County Sheriff Gary Penrod will join as a plaintiff, although Penrod could not be reached for comment.

"I don't want law enforcement trapped between a rock and a hard place," Gonzales said.

In 1996, 56% of California voters approved Proposition 215, which allowed doctors to prescribe cannabis for therapeutic use. Three years ago, state legislation mandated ID cards for patients and their caregivers.

But the U.S. Supreme Court in June ruled that federal officials could seize and destroy pot plants and arrest growers and consumers, even in the 11 states where the drug has been legalized for medical use.

Last month, federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents raided 13 San Diego-area marijuana dispensaries.

The San Diego lawsuit, filed last week in federal court, asserts that the requirement to issue medicinal marijuana ID cards is preempted by the federal Controlled Substances Act, which criminalizes pot, and an international treaty called the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs. The ACLU asserts the county lacks legal standing to bring such a lawsuit.

San Bernardino County had tentative plans to begin issuing ID cards in February, but had not begun printing cards or designating staff for the project, which is now on hold, said county spokesman David Wert.

The state had calculated that up to 7,000 San Bernardino County residents might be eligible for cards, Wert said.

In December, Riverside County became the first Southern California county to begin issuing the ID cards, which include the marijuana user's photo and a computer-generated identification number.

Cardholders must submit a state form, proof of residency and their doctor's recommendation, and provide government-issued identification. The annual cost to get and renew the card is $100.

The San Diego supervisors last year voted 3 to 2 not to issue the identification card. On Tuesday, the supervisors listened to lawsuit opponents but declined to schedule a new vote on the issue.

Perry reported from San Diego and Powers from Riverside.

Official Details Texas - Mexico Standoff (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 24, 2006

SIERRA BLANCA, Texas (AP) -- Texas law enforcement officers faced off with men dressed as Mexican Army soldiers and apparent drug suspects near the U.S.-Mexican border Tuesday, after three SUVs attempted to flee state authorities, officials said.

Andrea Simmons, an agency spokeswoman in El Paso, told The Associated Press that Texas Department of Public Safety troopers chased three SUVs, believing they were carrying drugs, to the banks of the Rio Grande during Monday's incident.

Men dressed in Mexican military uniforms or camouflage were on the U.S. side of the border in Texas, she said.

Simmons said the FBI was not involved and referred requests for further details to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

The Inland Valley Daily Bulletin of Ontario, Calif., reported Tuesday that the incident included an armed standoff involving the Mexican military and suspected drug smugglers. The incident follows a story in the Bulletin on Jan. 15 that said the Mexican military had crossed into the United States more than 200 times since 1996.

In a news conference, Rick Glancey of the Texas Border Sheriff's Coalition, said three Hudspeth County deputies and at least two Texas Department of Public Safety troopers squared off against at least 10 heavily armed men from the Mexican side of the Rio Grande.

U.S. officials who pursued three fleeing SUVs to the Mexican border saw what appeared to be a Mexican military Humvee help one of the SUVs when it got stuck in the river, he said.

When that didn't work, a group of men dressed in civilian clothes started unloading what appeared to be bundles of marijuana from the SUV, and the stuck vehicle was then torched, he said. A second SUV had a flat tire and was left behind in the United States and its occupant ran across the border, he said.

Glancey said he could not confirm whether the armed men seen at the site were Mexican Army, police officers, or drug dealers, and would not detail what markings deputies may have seen on the men's uniforms or the Humvee.

Chief Deputy Mike Doyal of the Hudspeth County Sheriff's Department said that Mexican army personnel had several mounted machine guns on the ground more than 200 yards inside the U.S. border, the Daily Bulletin newspaper reported earlier.

"It's been so bred into everyone not to start an international incident with Mexico that it's been going on for years," Doyal said. "When you're up against mounted machine guns, what can you do? Who wants to pull the trigger first? Certainly not us."

Hudspeth County Sheriff Arvin West, whose officers were involved in a similar incident last year, said he is certain that Mexican authorities know who was involved.

After the newspaper reported on Mexican military crossings earlier this month, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the report was overblown and most of the incursions were just mistakes.

In eastern California, Arizona and New Mexico, the U.S.-Mexico border is largely unmarked. But in Texas, the Rio Grande separates the two countries and even when dry, is a riverbed about 200 feet wide.

In November, Doyal said Border Patrol agents in the border town of Fort Hancock called for help after confronting more than six men dressed in Mexican military uniforms. The men allegedly were trying to bring more than three tons of marijuana across the Rio Grande, Doyal told the newspaper.

Border Incident Sparks Outrage (DMN)

By David Mclemore

The Dallas Morning News, January 25, 2006

A West Texas standoff along the Rio Grande between U.S. law enforcement officers and heavily armed Mexican drug smugglers in military-style clothing prompted congressional demands Tuesday for an international investigation and a call for deployment of U.S. troops to the border.

The incident, which occurred Monday on U.S. soil at an isolated river crossing about 50 miles east of El Paso, is the latest involving armed incursions along the U.S. border with Mexico.

And it comes less than a week after Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff called a California newspaper's account of such border incursions "overblown."

The incident Monday involved an encounter between two Hudspeth County Sheriff's Department deputies and three Department of Public Safety troopers and 10 heavily armed drug smugglers at an area about 50 miles down the river from El Paso.

A spokesman for Mexico's Foreign Ministry said Mexican military personnel had nothing to do with the incident and suggested the trespassers may have been drug traffickers wearing military-style gear.

The incident began on Interstate 10 near the Sierra Blanca checkpoint when DPS troopers began chasing three westbound SUVs believed to be carrying marijuana.

When the SUV drivers saw that they were being followed, they made a U-turn and headed south toward the river to an area known as Neely's Crossing, said Rick Glancey, executive director of the Texas Border Sheriffs Coalition.

At the crossing, one of the SUVs drove across the shallow river into Mexico. A second one got stuck in the muddy banks. And as the Texas deputies watched, a military-style Humvee attempted to pull it from the mud, while several armed men in green uniforms fanned out around it, Mr. Glancey said.

When the Humvee failed to extricate the truck, a group of men in civilian clothes walked into the ankle-deep river, removed what appeared to be bales of marijuana and hauled them to the Mexican side. They then set the truck, a Ford Expedition, ablaze.

The third vehicle, a Cadillac Escalade, was abandoned on the U.S. side with a flat tire as the driver escaped on foot. Deputies found 1,447 pounds of marijuana inside.

"What this latest incidence underscores is the necessity of increased support for local law enforcement to aid improving our border security," said Mr. Glancey. "If this doesn't open D.C.'s eyes, I don't know what will."

Inquiry launched

Monday's incident was not the first face-to-face confrontation for Hudspeth County deputies. In November, deputies responded to assist Border Patrol agents at the border town of Fort Hancock where they encountered six men in military uniforms attempting to carry a load of marijuana over the river.

U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials said Tuesday they have launched an inquiry into the Monday incident and asked Mexican authorities for a thorough investigation and full answer on what happened.

Customs "is coordinating closely with the appropriate federal, state and local authorities," said Kristi Clemens, Customs' assistant commissioner for public affairs. "The U.S. government is also discussing the matter with the government of Mexico and is asking for a thorough investigation and response. We take very seriously and investigate fully any alleged incident of criminal activity, threats against our agents or possible incursions."

Gov. Rick Perry also has ordered an investigation, spokeswoman Kathy Walt said.

U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., a frequent critic of the administration's border security efforts, called Tuesday for the federal government and the governments of southern border states to immediately deploy troops to the U.S.-Mexico border in light of what he termed "recent armed assistance Mexico's military has given to drug smugglers."

"Our border has literally turned into a war zone with foreign military personnel challenging our laws and our sovereignty," Mr. Tancredo said.

"The only way to deal with this dangerous situation is to tap the resources of our own military," Mr. Tancredo said. "I call on President Bush and the governors of border states to immediately deploy military personnel to defend our borders against the Mexican military."

U.S. Sen. Jon Kyl, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Terrorism and Homeland Security, called on Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice to initiate a formal investigation on the reported border crossings and to begin a dialogue with Mexican officials to prevent further occurrences.

"These illegal incursions are a violation of our sovereignty and pose a significant danger to U.S. law enforcement officials and citizens near the border – especially if all parties involved are armed. The potential for violence is significant.

Mr. Kyl noted that the Department of Homeland Security released figures that indicate that there have been 231 documented incursions along the 2,000-mile border with Mexico since 1996.

Of those, 63 in that nine-year period occurred in Arizona and 28 occurred along the Texas border, according to Homeland Security.

In each instance, U.S. agents at the local level asked Mexican federal police and army officials to clarify what happened.

Border forays

Many included accidental forays by legitimate Mexican authorities across a poorly defined border in rough and isolated country while in pursuit of drug dealers. The Texas-Mexico border, however, is delineated by the Rio Grande River.

Investigators have long documented that Mexican drug gangs often wear camouflage clothing and carry military-style automatic weapons.

But Tuesday's request for a Mexican government response significantly ups the ante, federal officials said.

In Mexico, officials said the National Defense Ministry has begun an investigation of the incident and launched a search for the vehicles identified by photographs taken by Hudspeth County deputies.

Hudspeth County Chief Deputy Mike Doyal said that men dressed as Mexican soldiers manned what looked like .50-caliber machine guns mounted on vehicles about 200 yards inside the U.S. border during the incident.

In Mexico, a ministry spokesman said that the Army's Ciudad Juarez garrison does not maintain Humvees with mounted .50-caliber machine guns.

"It cannot be ruled out that said actions are designed as much to harm the image of our armed forces as the bilateral cooperation between Mexico and the United States in the fight against organized crime and, in particular, narcotrafficking," a foreign ministry spokesman said.

Mexican Drug Run Thwarted At Border (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 25, 2006

U.S. law-enforcement authorities confronted several men in Mexican military uniforms and a camouflaged Humvee with .50-caliber machine guns who had crossed into Texas with suspected drug smugglers 50 miles southeast of El Paso, forcing an armed standoff along the Rio Grande, says a Texas sheriff.

Hudspeth County, Texas, Sheriff Arvin West said the incident began at 2:19 p.m. Monday when his deputies -- working as part of an anti-drug smuggling enforcement initiative known as "Operation Linebacker" -- pursued three SUVs spotted driving north from a border area along the Rio Grande near Interstate 10.

Sheriff West said the pursuit, which began near Sierra Blanca, Texas, ended for one of the vehicles when it blew out a tire and the driver fled. He said deputies seized 1,400 pounds of marijuana from that vehicle.

As the southbound chase continued for the other two SUVs, he said the deputies and at least two Texas Department of Public Safety troopers who had joined in the pursuit encountered several men on the U.S. side of the border dressed in what he described as battle dress uniforms (BDUs). He said they "appeared to be soldiers, in a Humvee vehicle with what appeared to the officers as being .50-caliber machine guns."

Sheriff West said one of the vehicles made it into Mexico, but the other got stuck in the river, where a group of men in civilian clothes offloaded what appeared to be bundles of marijuana. He said the truck was then set ablaze by the "soldiers."

No shots were fired and no injuries were reported during what amounted to an armed standoff at the border.

T.J. Bonner, a veteran Border Patrol agent and president of the National Border Patrol Council, yesterday called the incident "just another example of what we have been saying all along: This is a serious problem and it's not going to go away.

"The U.S. government has got to put its foot down and take decisive action," said Mr. Bonner, whose union represents all 10,000 of the agency's non-supervisory personnel. "It would be nice if the Mexican government would address the problem, but it won't even admit there is one."

In November, the U.S. Border Patrol chased a dump truck full of marijuana in the same area when it also got stuck in the river seeking to return to Mexico. While Border Patrol agents sought to unload 3 tons of marijuana, the driver -- who had fled -- returned with a heavily armed group of men wearing Mexican military uniforms and carrying military-style weapons. The soldiers backed the agents away and bulldozed the truck back into Mexico.

Last week, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff dismissed reports of possible Mexican military incursions into the United States as "overblown" and "scare tactics." He said those involved in the crossings may have been dressed in military uniforms, "but they are just criminals, they are not military but they are wearing camouflage so someone may assume they are military."

Mr. Chertoff also said a significant number of 216 confirmed incursions since 1996 were "innocent," noting that police and military units in Mexico pursuing criminals "may step across the border because they do not know exactly where the line is."

Law-enforcement officials yesterday noted that the Texas-Mexico border is clearly marked by the Rio Grande.

Yesterday, U.S. Customs and Border Protection (CBP) spokeswoman Kristi M. Clemens said the Border Patrol was notified of possible narcotics smuggling by the sheriff's office involving suspects dressed in military-style uniforms and using military-style equipment. She said the incident is under investigation.

Ms. Clemens also said the Bush administration is discussing the matter with the government of Mexico and is asking for a thorough investigation and response.

Rafael Laveaga, spokesman for the Mexican Embassy in Washington, yesterday said that country's Ministry of Defense has ordered an investigation of the incident, but "already has informed us they do not have the type of vehicles and heavy weapons described by the sheriff" in the area.

"We strongly deny that members of the Mexican military were involved," Mr. Laveaga said, adding that criminal organizations involved in drug trafficking "wear look-alike military uniforms and use look-alike military equipment to affect an image of the Mexican military."

Republican Reps. David Dreier, chairman of the House Rules Committee, and Duncan Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, have asked the House Judiciary Committee, the Department of Homeland Security, the House Homeland Security Committee and the House International Relations Committee to investigate suspected incursions by the Mexican military.

The two California congressmen, citing what they called the "critical importance of border and national security," also asked Mr. Chertoff to explain how these incidents occurred, to outline the department's current policies to address illegal crossings, and to explain its strategy for preventing similar acts in the future.

Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Terrorism, Technology and Homeland Security, also has asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to "initiate an official investigation" and "open a dialogue with Mexico to prevent any future incursions.

"These incidents pose a significant threat to our national security, as I'm sure you agree," Mr. Kyl said.

A Mexican government commission yesterday said it will distribute at least 70,000 maps showing highways, rescue beacons and water tanks in the Arizona desert to curb the death toll among illegal border crossers.

Feel The Rush Of A Smuggler (LAT)

By Richard Marosi

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2006

TIJUANA — The Mexican gang of human smugglers, hiding behind the wobbly fence of a drab town house, prepare the car for the latest run across the border.

Two young men wipe down the dusty windshield and check the brake lights while three migrants wait silently inside the house.

Finally, the driver arrives, an American who puffs nervously on a cheap cigarette and calls himself Trent. Accompanying Trent is Felix, the heavyset smuggling boss.

"Venganse!" — "Let's get going!" — a gang member yells. One by one, the migrants get in the trunk, twisting to fit inside. The one woman hesitates. She crosses herself. She steps in.

Curled beside one another, the migrants look up at the gang member.

"It won't be long, 20 minutes," he promises. "Don't move," he adds, slamming the lid shut. Within minutes, Trent drives the car into a sea of traffic inching toward the row of U.S. inspection booths at the border.

Smuggling operations like this one — Mexican rings teaming up with American drivers — occur daily at the two main vehicle gateways into California, a phenomenon that frustrates U.S. authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0011546

In the last fiscal year, Americans drivers were caught 4,078 times on suspicion of smuggling migrants through the San Ysidro and Otay Mesa ports of entry into San Diego. The figure has hovered around 4,000 since the number of car smuggling cases spiked about six years go. U.S. agents can only inspect a fraction of the estimated 64,000 vehicles that cross daily. Even if drivers are caught, they are usually released. Only 279 drivers in 2005 faced alien smuggling charges.

Federal authorities say they are overwhelmed.

Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff, in a recent visit to San Ysidro, said he sympathized with federal prosecutors.

"There's a lot of crime out there," he said. "There just aren't enough prosecutors and judges to prosecute everything." Chertoff promised more alien-smuggling prosecutions in the future. Port authorities announced last week that drivers caught smuggling will be fined $5,000 for the first offense and $10,000 for the second.

The smugglers come from all walks of life — homeless veterans, single mothers, senior citizens and college students. Some drivers are drug addicts or gamblers who are down on their luck.

Felix says he employs so many American drivers like Trent that he rents them to other smuggling organizations. Dispensing orders on three constantly ringing cellphones, Felix has a code word for U.S. drivers: monos — monkeys.

"Siempre llegan los monos," — the monkeys always come to me, Felix says with a glint in his eye.

Felix, like many smugglers, provides drivers with free stays at motels in Tijuana, meals and drugs included. A driver doing three weekly runs can earn more than $100,000 per year, Trent said.

There's nothing like the euphoric feeling that rushes over him, Trent says, when he clears customs, a sense of relief mixed with satisfaction. After he helps migrants from the car, some shake his hand and thank him.

In between runs, Trent dreams of an early retirement and spends his earnings on a "weakness for Latina babes," typically prostitutes. "What it boils down to: It's such an easy life, that it lures you in," he says.

I met Felix while reporting another story involving a low-budget Mexican movie producer. The producer said he knew a human smuggler — Felix, his financier and a part-time actor — and asked Felix to join us for dinner at a downtown Tijuana restaurant.

During the interview, Felix invited me to accompany him on a smuggling operation, but on several occasions over a five-month period he failed to show up for scheduled meetings.

One day last fall, Felix invited me to his home. A taxi driver, guided by Felix on the phone, drove me up the winding, potholed streets to his hillside house.

Felix shook my hand at the steel gate entrance to his walled property and introduced me to Trent. Both men agreed to be interviewed on the condition that their identities not be disclosed.

Felix didn't say why he agreed to bring me along. He said that he trusted me and that he didn't believe an article would harm his interests.

During the eight-hour visit, I realized that I would probably witness criminal activity and that the agreement would limit my ability to disclose details.

But the trade-off was gaining access into the world of human smuggling that remains a serious problem for the United States.

The frontier here — a 14-mile stretch blocked by double-fencing, stadium lighting, and hundreds of Border Patrol agents — is among the country's most heavily fortified.

With crossings between the ports of entry becoming so difficult, Tijuana has become the major staging ground for car-smuggling trips on the Southwest border.

The number of illegal migrants caught inside vehicles at the San Ysidro gateway has quadrupled since 2000, from 10,600 to 40,033 in 2005.

The bosses, like Felix, are typically Mexican and charge migrants as much as $2,500. They prefer teaming up with Americans to get their clients across the border.

Migrants are hidden in hollowed-out dashboards, radiators, and "coffin compartments" welded to the undercarriages of vehicles. Inspectors have found migrants in piñatas, rolled-up carpets and gasoline tanks. Some don't even hide, hoping to slip by as passengers.

Federal authorities focus on prosecuting cases in which drivers endanger the migrants' lives. According to court records, for example, Norma Martinez-Warnett was convicted in 2004 after trying to smuggle three children in a Honda Acura in 120-degree heat. A boy was hidden inside a special compartment in the back seat and agents discovered the boy after hearing his screams.

On the day of my visit to Felix's hillside home, Trent arrives grizzled and sleepy-eyed after a late night in the red light district. Felix works the phones while watching a Mexican soccer match on TV.

Hovering around the grounds are Felix's underlings: three heavily tattooed convicted felons. The men were deported from the U.S. and now work for Felix recruiting and shuttling drivers.

During a lunch of carnitas cooked by Felix's mother, Trent and Felix discuss the tricks of the trade, the morality of human smuggling and their partnership.

Felix and Trent say they met a few years ago, shortly after Trent showed up in Tijuana with 12 cents in his pocket. Trent says he lived in a nice home in a Southern California suburb when his marriage hit the rocks. His wife divorced him, took his four children and Trent said he was financially ruined.

In Tijuana's red light district, one of Felix's recruiters made an irresistible offer: $500 per migrant.

Trent quickly proved to be a reliable driver, Felix says, unlike many of the hundreds he has employed over the years. Would-be drivers are often drug addicts who must be "cured," Felix says, before being given jobs.

Felix's remedy? He gives them a present of one last fix before putting them through terapia intensiva — "intensive therapy": A cold-turkey detoxification regimen consisting of a shave, haircut and lots of cold showers, Felix said.

Trent, Felix says, is not a drug addict and thanks to his dignified bearing and gutsy attitude has become one of his best drivers.

Trent, who speaks little Spanish, considers migrant smuggling "illegal, but not immoral." He says he doesn't smuggle drugs, and called the migrants he brings into the country hard-working people who contribute to American society and support families back home in Mexico.

Trent says the smuggling work provides ample support for himself too, thanks to Felix, who Trent said is more generous than other human smugglers he's worked for.

"What impressed me about him is, when you do get done with a piece of work, he asks you, 'Do you need anything … food, drugs, girls? He'll take care of you," says Trent.

Trent says he makes a good living, despite all his spending on women. "Unfortunately they consume a significant portion of my income," he says. "I've been robbed, cheated, drugged and fallen for a few."

One reason for Felix's largesse with drivers: The long wait between runs as the smugglers organize loads. Trent goes days between jobs, he says. When he is finally summoned, the wait to launch the run can take hours, just like this day.

After the meal, Felix waters his plants, plays with his young daughters and confers with his cronies.

They watch a low-budget Mexican movie about warring drug cartels. Felix partly financed the film and played a bit part as a gunman. When Felix's character is peppered with bullets, he staggers to his death with a dramatic flourish, cracking up everyone in the room, including Felix.

"You should have been an actor," Felix's sister tells him.

The film and human smuggling worlds share some similarities, Felix says. He plans to "recast" one newly arrived American, who looked like a tough guy in baggy jeans, into a mellow surfer dude with knee-length shorts and colored T-shirt. A beach vibe is better than an urban thug look for driving migrants across the border. "It's just like the movies," Felix said. "You have to cast them properly."

A short while later, Felix gets another phone call, hangs up and tells Trent: "Hey, do me a favor. Go shower and shave. Dress perfectly. We're working in one hour."

The mens' relaxed demeanors turn serious. Trent hurries upstairs, and Felix tries to keep up with the constant phone calls.

Trent emerges wearing slacks and a beige, pullover shirt, his chin bloodied from shaving. They get into a car, and Felix begins driving us on the half-hour trip across the traffic-choked city to the town house where the migrants are waiting. Blue rosary beads dangle from the rear-view mirror. No one speaks.

When they stop and Trent runs into a mini-mart for cigarettes, Felix says Trent is unusually nervous. A jumpy driver facing off with U.S. inspectors — What were you doing in Tijuana? What did you buy? — is definitely not a good thing, he says.

A sweaty brow, darting eyes, fidgety shoulders can give away a smuggler.

Earlier, Trent had boasted about being able to fool any inspector. "It's all about presentability," he said. "I'm a professional."

But just before getting into the car Trent had confessed fear. Trent has been caught before — he won't say how many times — and if authorities pursue charges, he could face three years in prison.

"The stress is killing me. You can mask it, hide it, appear to be relaxed. But the reality is, there's always that little nagging sensation that grows louder the closer you get to the gate," he said.

When they arrive at the town house, the mood is tense. The gang works quickly knowing that if police arrive, it would be easy to prove smuggling charges. In Mexico, that would mean a possible six-year prison term or, according to Felix, a $15,000 bribe to get the case dismissed.

Trent gets his instructions: After clearing customs, he is to drive to a parking lot in a San Diego suburb where the migrants will be turned over to another driver.

After the migrants squeeze into the trunk, the gang members peer beneath the car to make sure the modified suspension has kept the rear end from dipping low enough to catch inspectors' attention.

Behind the wheel, Trent studies the dashboard and turns on the defroster so the migrants' breaths won't fog the rear window.

He is angry at Felix because he has offered less money than the usual, $500 per migrant. "I'm not a happy camper," he says, "but we'll deal with that later."

As Trent pulls out, Felix leans into the window. "Everything is going to be OK…. Don't forget your seat belt." Trent buckles up.

The drive to the border takes a few minutes.

Felix, taking me in his vehicle, follows to make sure police are not tailing Trent. When Trent drives into the lanes leading to the border checkpoint, Felix pulls over in front of a small house and honks the horn.

It's a waiting game now. Felix gets calls every few minutes from a lookout near the border. The line of cars is longer than expected, at least a 40-minute wait. Felix knows that some migrants, overwhelmed by the darkness and heat in the trunk, start crying. The operation could be foiled if a roving U.S. inspector walks by with a dog trained to sniff out drugs and humans.

As Felix told me in an earlier meeting, "Those dogs smell fear."

A middle-aged woman emerges from the house and gets in Felix's car. She houses migrants for him and Felix owes her money. They chat about some of Felix's successful drivers. One father-son team from Texas, they say, used smuggling profits to pay for the boy's cancer treatments.

Then the lookout calls Felix with news: Trent got busted.

Felix hangs up the phone. "Somehow he got tripped up answering the questions," he says.

The authorities will free him shortly, Felix predicts. "They don't do anything to drivers."

As federal arrest records later show, Trent will indeed be released — along with 36 other American drivers caught trying to smuggle 61 migrants during a four-day stretch.

"Tomorrow, he'll come back," Felix says, "and we'll try again."

Maps Show Illegal Migrants Best Routes (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2006

MEXICO CITY — Mexico's National Human Rights Commission will print and distribute at least 70,000 maps showing immigrants the safest routes to cross the border into Arizona, officials said Tuesday.

The project, which immediately drew fire from groups organized against illegal immigration, is aimed at reducing the number of people who die trying to cross 50 miles of Sonoran Desert to reach highways in southern Arizona, according to Humane Borders, the Tucson-based humanitarian group that created the maps.

Steel barriers and stepped-up border patrols in California over the last decade have pushed immigrant smuggling routes east to more sparsely populated stretches of the Arizona border. Summer temperatures there routinely surpass 100 degrees.

"We can close the border with enough money and political will, which I don't think we have, but we don't have to kill people by forcing them out into the desert," said the Rev. Robin Hoover, president of Humane Borders.

The Mexican government said 441 of its citizens died last year on the border, most in Arizona.

The new maps will show spots where people have died — presumably discouraging some prospective migrants — as well as main roads, rescue beacons and the locations of water stations maintained by Humane Borders.

The Pima County Board of Supervisors this fall approved spending $25,000 to support the group's water stations after administrators argued that it was cheaper than the $300,000 the county spends recovering and storing the bodies of immigrants who died in failed desert crossings.

Hoover said work on the desert maps began in May using government data and donated mapping software. The maps also show how far an average adult can walk in one, two or three days.

"The idea is to put the fear of God into some of these migrants so they'll stay in the main corridors and don't go where there's no water," said Hoover, pastor of the First Christian Church in Tucson.

Jose Luis Soberanes, president of Mexico's human rights commission, thanked Hoover and his group Tuesday, saying they have been saving the lives of migrants.

The group last year compiled safety tips for desert crossings that covered proper clothing and how much water to bring for each day's journey. Mexico was criticized for printing a million of the 32-page booklets for migrants headed to the United States.

Jack Martin, special projects director for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, said the maps and other efforts only encourage illegal immigration.

"The fact that there's an American group doing this," he said, "sends the message that there are Americans who think that it's perfectly acceptable to enter the U.S. illegally, and probably will be down on the border aiding and abetting the illegals when they get in the U.S."

The U.S. House of Representatives approved a bill in December that would add 700 miles of border fencing and make illegal immigration a felony. The bill is expected to reach the Senate next month.

Mexico opposes increased border enforcement without creating a broad temporary worker program and provisions for the millions of Mexicans living illegally in the United States.

Times staff writer Richard Marosi in San Diego and Cecilia Sanchez in The Times' Mexico City Bureau contributed to this report.

Case Sent To Grand Jury, Conner Sent Back To Jail (BRITSHC)

By Matthew Lakin, Bristol Herald Courier

Bristol (VA) Herald Courier, January 25, 2006

GREENEVILLE - Evidence against a Navy recruiter accused of a murder-for-hire plot will stay secret a little longer.

Chief Petty Officer Keith Patrick Conner, 38, appeared briefly in federal court Tuesday - just long enough to waive his rights to bond and to a preliminary hearing on charges of trying to buy a bomb to kill someone.

"This will save us a lot of time," said his lawyer, Nikki Pierce, an assistant federal public defender.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Dennis Inman sent the case to the grand jury and sent Conner back to jail.

Conner, a Gulf War veteran and the senior recruiter for the Navy's office in Bristol Virginia, met an undercover agent for the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives in the parking lot of the Bristol Mall last week and paid $1,000 as a down payment for what he thought was a homemade bomb, authorities said.

He showed up two days later at the Days Inn on West State Street to pick it up, according to court records. Conner put the "bomb" - a fake - in his truck, authorities said, and federal agents put him in handcuffs.

"Our bombs don't work," said Jim Cavanaugh, special agent in charge of the bureau's Nashville office and chief of ATF operations in Tennessee. "But without these agents' hard work, we could very easily have ended up working a bombing fatality."

Skipping the preliminary hearing saved prosecutors from making the evidence against Conner public, including the details of a confession federal agents said he signed and the name of the bomb's intended target.

Federal agents have refused to say who they think Conner wanted to blow up.

"It really doesn't matter who he intended to kill, as long as there's evidence that he tried to buy a bomb," Cavanaugh said.

At the recruiting office in Bristol, Conner's fellow sailors still couldn't believe the news.

"It was a shock to everybody," said Cmdr. Dan Cunningham, his commanding officer. "We've never experienced anything like this. It's like a bad TV show."

Cunningham said he spent the past few days telling Conner's recruits what happened.

"You're dealing mainly with teenagers and 20-year-olds," he said. "They get to know these people. They look up to them."

Conner, a native of the Jacksonville, Fla., area, joined the Navy in 1985. He spent most of his time on ships as a hull technician, doing welding and various repair jobs, before going to work as a recruiter.

He arrived at the Bristol office in April 2003 and recruited 29 sailors during his time there. He last reported for work on Thursday, just a few hours before his arrest.

"He's still in the Navy," Cunningham said. "Right now all I can do is wait and see what route they take with his case."

Kingsport Man Accused Of Trying To Buy Bomb For Use In Murder (KINGSTN)

Kingsport (TN) Times-News, January 25, 2006

KINGSPORT - A U.S. Navy recruiter is accused of trying to buy a homemade bomb with plans to use it to murder another person. But authorities say the person he attempted to buy the bomb from was an undercover ATF agent.

Chief Petty Officer Keith Patrick Conner, 38, of Kingsport, was arrested last week on the charge of using an interstate commerce facility (telephone) in the commission of murder for hire.

Officials with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives said Conner attempted to buy an explosive device from an undercover ATF agent last week and was subsequently arrested.

Conner, the senior recruiter for the U.S. Navy's Bristol office, appeared in U.S. District Court in Greeneville on Monday, where he waived a detention and preliminary hearing.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Dennis Inman ruled Conner be held without bond until trial. U.S. Attorney Rob Reeves said no trial date has been set. The case will now go before a grand jury for possible indictment.

Conner faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Jim Cavanaugh, special agent in charge of the Nashville Field Division of the ATF, said the ATF was called into the case after the Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) received a tip about Conner's plot.

According to court records, on Jan. 15 Conner spoke to an undercover ATF agent over the phone about hiring him to build a bomb.

"Conner was buying the bomb from the agent, and either he or others were going to plant the bomb," Cavanaugh said.

Cavanaugh said Conner has told authorities who he intended to target with the bomb, but federal agents are not releasing that person's identity.

Federal agents say they are not certain when Conner was going to commit the murder.

Court records state Conner agreed to pay $1,000 up front for the bomb and pay an additional $1,000 plus an unspecified bonus once the murder was completed.

Officials say Conner met the ATF agent at the Bristol Mall on Jan. 17 and paid him the first $1,000. Two days later, Conner allegedly met the agent in the parking lot of the Days Inn in Bristol, Tenn., in order to pick up the explosive device.

Court records state when the device was placed in Conner's truck, federal agents arrested him.

Cavanaugh said incidents such as this do happen from time to time.

"They're rare for any city, but they're not rare across the country," Cavanaugh said. "When a person comes up and acquires an explosive device and plans to murder somebody, it becomes very dicey.

"If we didn't get involved and intercept this, the potential is Conner could go to someone else to make the bomb, it could blow up, the victim could be killed. There's a whole lot of associated dangers. We're just glad we're not working a fatal bombing."

Dozens Of Sticks Of Dynamite Are Stolen (FWST)

By Alex Branch And Gale Bradford

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, January 25, 2006

PARKER COUNTY - A thief who used a torch to cut a lock on a shed where explosives are kept stole about 100 sticks of dynamite from a stone business in southern Parker County, law-enforcement officials said.

The theft from Fort Worth Crushed Stone, in the 4300 block of Bethel Road, was reported about 6:30 a.m. Monday, Parker County Sheriff Larry Fowler said.

County Judge Mark Riley immediately notified state and federal authorities, Fowler said.

Investigators and company officials took inventory Monday to determine whether anything else was missing, said Tom Crowley, spokesman for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives in Dallas.

"We're already doing interviews and chasing down leads," Crowley said. "Obviously, it's a big concern anytime you're talking about explosives potentially falling into the wrong hands."

The Texas Department of Public Safety is also assisting in the investigation, he said.

To provide information about the theft, call the Parker County Sheriff's Department at (817) 594-8845 or the ATF at (469) 227-4300.

IMMIGRATION:

Accused Nazi Guard Appeals U.S. Deportation Order (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 25, 2006

(AP) - CLEVELAND-An 85-year-old retired autoworker who lost his U.S. citizenship based on evidence he was a Nazi death camp guard asked an immigration board to reverse a judge's order that he be deported.

Chief Immigration Judge Michael Creppy ruled Dec. 28 that there was no evidence to document John Demjanjuk's claim that he would be tortured if deported to his home country of Ukraine. The judge ruled that Demjanjuk should be deported to Germany or Poland if Ukraine does not accept him.

Demjanjuk's appeal filed Monday sticks to the argument that he faces torture in Ukraine and that the case should have been handed to a judge responsible for Cleveland. Creppy is based in Falls Church, Virginia, as is the Board of Immigration Appeals.

Demjanjuk, who came to the United States in 1952, was cleared in 1993 in Israel of being Ivan the Terrible, a sadistic guard at the Treblinka concentration camp. He had faced a death sentence in Israel until new evidence emerged that someone else was the notorious Ivan.

He lost his U.S. citizenship for a second time after a judge ruled in 2002 that documents from World War II prove he was a Nazi guard at various death or forced labor camps.

House Republican Cites Guest-worker 'Amnesty' (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 25, 2006

Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., the House point man on immigration, yesterday said that a guest-worker program like the one proposed by President Bush is amnesty and that he cannot accept it in a final immigration bill.

"A guest-worker program that applies to illegal aliens already here is an amnesty," the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee said in an interview with The Washington Times.

As the chief House negotiator in any House-Senate conference committee on immigration, he said voters will not accept a plan that amounts to amnesty, and said Mr. Bush's proposal would simply push the problem down the road.

"It seems to me that if you give these people the temporary cards, and the president talked a little bit about that yesterday out in Kansas, whether they are three-year cards or six-year cards or any other term, how do you get them to go back home when they expire?" he said. "We end up simply postponing the decision on what to do about illegal aliens until the end of the validity of these cards."

He also said when Congress and the White House agreed in December 2004 to increase the U.S. Border Patrol by 2,000 agents a year, then two months later the president only funded 210 positions, it "was embarrassing both to the administration and those of us who fought for increased assets for border protection in the intelligence bill and then were let down."

The Wisconsin Republican was a driving force behind last year's House immigration-enforcement bill, which calls for nearly 700 miles of border fence, requires employers to verify employees' Social Security numbers and allows border county sheriffs to enforce immigration laws.

He said he would prefer that Congress make sure border and interior enforcement is in place before a guest-worker program begins to operate.

"The guest-worker provision won't work without interior enforcement and verification of Social Security numbers. It's as simple as that," he said.

He also said the U.S. Chamber of Commerce "should be ashamed of themselves" for sponsoring meetings with Luis Ernesto Derbez, Mexico's secretary of foreign affairs, in Chicago in December, after which the minister criticized the House bill.

"What they are doing is saying that it's OK to use fake Social Security numbers. I don't think that anybody who is in business ought to be condoning the use of false documentation," Mr. Sensenbrenner said. "If they continue promoting speeches by Mexican government officials then maybe they ought to register as an agent of a foreign government under the law."

Randy Johnson, the chamber's vice president for labor and immigration issues, said the chamber "does not condone, and never has condoned, the use of fake Social Security numbers, and we recognize that improved worksite verification is necessary as part of any reform package."

But he said verification has to be phased in and "shown to work." He said the bill sponsored by Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, also has verification.

He also said the chamber did not invite Mr. Derbez to attack Mr. Sensenbrenner, and said the chamber works with Mr. Sensenbrenner on many issues.

Mr. Sensenbrenner also:

·Said he supports expanding the local law-enforcement provisions in last month's bill so that authorities nationwide could enforce immigration laws.

·Called on the president to include funds to pay for the pending House enforcement bill in his upcoming budget.

·Said employers should pay for the applications process for a guest-worker program and employers should also determine the period for their temporary workers, because then they will have an incentive to make sure the worker remains employed.

TAX:

IRS To Revise Tax-Fraud Screening (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- IRS Commissioner Mark Everson ordered a review of a tax-fraud detection program criticized for freezing thousands of refunds without notifying taxpayers.

Mr. Everson said the tax agency will soon announce new procedures to advise taxpayers when a refund has been frozen. The agency will also revise its fraud screening procedures so that it withholds fewer refunds owed to innocent taxpayers. "Honest taxpayers expecting a refund deserve to be treated fairly," Mr. Everson said.

National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson criticized the program in her annual list of the worst problems facing taxpayers. Her office, which helps taxpayers resolve disputes with the IRS, handles more frozen refunds than any other issue. A study of those cases found no evidence of fraud in two out of three instances.

Lawmakers said the IRS needed to take more care to prevent innocent taxpayers from enduring long delays in receiving a refund, and Mr. Everson said critics raised legitimate complaints.

IRS criminal investigators use the Questionable Refund Program to screen tax returns for indications of fraud. It temporarily freezes refunds when it detects evidence of potential fraud.

The IRS tries to validate the taxpayers' right to a refund and lifts the freeze if no fraud is discovered. If the refund can't be validated, the tax collectors permanently freeze the refund for further investigation. In most cases, the tax agency doesn't inform taxpayers that they are suspected of fraud. A taxpayer wouldn't be told anything until six months after trying to find out what happened to an expected refund.

Refunds claimed on tax returns determined to be fraudulent remain frozen for a number of years until the IRS sees the taxpayer file a number of legitimate returns.

The tax agency said it is fighting a rising tide of refund fraud, which it now estimates to be more than $500 million a year. A significant portion involves false earned-income-tax-credit claims, which can amount to $4,400 on a tax return, the IRS said. Nearly 75% of the pool of frozen refunds studied by the taxpayer advocate were low-income families claiming the earned-income-tax credit, designed to reduce poverty among the working poor.

The IRS issues more than 100 million refunds each year, and the Questionable Refund Program withholds less than 1% for further scrutiny. The IRS said about 200,000 refunds are held longer than a week, but many of those can be held for months or years.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa), who asked the IRS to revise the program before this year's tax-filing deadline, called the announcement "a good step."

"Taxpayers deserve notification of their refund status and a chance to tell their side of the story," Sen. Grassley said in a statement.

IRS To Tell Taxpayers Of Frozen Refunds (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

The Internal Revenue Service, under pressure from Congress and its taxpayer advocate, said yesterday that it will notify taxpayers when their refunds are withheld because of suspicion of fraud.

Last year, according to a study by the office of the IRS's national taxpayer advocate, the IRS "froze" more than 120,000 refunds that were identified as likely to be fraudulent. Over the past five years, more than 1.6 million such refunds were withheld.

Taxpayers were not notified that their refunds had been frozen, nor were they given a chance to respond. Eventually some of the refunds were released, but many were delayed months or years. Others remained frozen indefinitely.

Nina E. Olson, the taxpayer advocate, highlighted the issue in her annual report to Congress this month. She noted that many of the blocked refunds involved the earned income tax credit, which is available to low-income working families.

The report elicited concern from many on Capitol Hill, including Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) and senior Democrat Max Baucus (Mont.) of the Senate Finance Committee.

Internal Revenue Commissioner Mark W. Everson said yesterday that he had ordered a review of the program.

"We will announce plans in the very near future to institute notification procedures as well as significant processing improvements to minimize the number of taxpayers whose refunds are frozen unnecessarily," Everson said in a written statement. Everson provided no details, but an IRS spokesman said the agency expects more information to be available next week.

"Claiming fraudulent refunds ultimately undermines the integrity of the tax system, but I believe that appropriate notification should be given when refunds have been frozen. Honest taxpayers expecting a refund deserve to be treated fairly," he said.

The IRS estimates refund fraud at $500 million a year and noted that Congress has pressed the agency to narrow the gap between what taxpayers owe and what they pay. That gap is estimated at $300 billion to $350 billion.

Agency officials noted after the release of Olson's report that the 120,000 frozen refunds were claimed on a tiny fraction of the 130 million returns filed annually and that refund fraud had increased 322 percent in the past six years.

Olson expressed doubts in her report about the unannounced seizure of refunds by the IRS's criminal investigation division.

"At a minimum, this procedure constitutes an extraordinary violation of fundamental taxpayer rights and fairness. In our view, it may also constitute a violation of due process of law," she said in the report.

Yesterday, Olson commended Everson for initiating the review, acknowledging that the program "serves an important tax administration purpose." She urged that in addition to notification, the agency allow affected taxpayers to present their side of the cases "before making any 'determination' that someone has committed tax fraud." She also recommended that it "refine fraud-screening methods to reduce the number of honest taxpayers whose refunds are frozen in error" and speed up processing of frozen-refund cases.

IRS Chief Wants Policy Freezing Tax Refunds Reviewed (USAT)

By Sandra Block

USA Today, January 25, 2006

IRS Commissioner Mark Everson said Tuesday that he's ordered the IRS to review a controversial anti-fraud program that freezes refunds for hundreds of thousands of mostly low-income taxpayers without their knowledge.

In a statement, Everson said the IRS will soon announce procedures to notify taxpayers when their refunds are frozen. The IRS also plans to change its screening process to minimize the number of taxpayers whose refunds are frozen unnecessarily, he said.

Earlier this month, the IRS' taxpayer advocate, Nina Olson, said the Questionable Refund Program might violate taxpayers' rights to due process of law.

The program freezes refunds that are potentially fraudulent. But the IRS doesn't notify taxpayers that their returns are being investigated. If taxpayers call to inquire, IRS employees are usually barred from providing any information for six months after a taxpayer's inquiry.

Olson said complaints to her office about unpaid tax refunds have risen more than 400% since 2002. More than two-thirds of those who complained were entitled to a full refund, an investigation by her office found.

Olson said low-income families who claimed the earned income tax credit were disproportionately affected by the program. Delayed refunds cause a significant hardship for these families, she said.

While fraudulent refunds undermine the integrity of the tax system, “Appropriate notification should be given when refunds have been frozen,” Everson said. “Honest taxpayers expecting a refund deserve to be treated fairly.”

Asked about Everson's announcement Tuesday, Olson said the IRS should focus immediately on four priorities: providing prompt notification to taxpayers whose refunds have been frozen; allowing taxpayers whose refunds have been frozen to present evidence supporting their refund claims; reducing the number of refunds frozen in error; and processing frozen-refund cases more quickly.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, sent a letter to Treasury Secretary John Snow last week, urging the IRS to fix the problem before the spring tax-filing season.

In a statement Tuesday, Grassley called the IRS announcement a “good step.”

“Taxpayers deserve notification of their refund status and a chance to tell their side of the story,” Grassley said. “They deserve not to get caught in a criminal dragnet unnecessarily.”

Tax Shelter Inquiry Expands (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

Federal prosecutors are investigating three lawyers at a prominent Dallas law firm, Jenkens & Gilchrist, in a widening of an investigation into questionable shelters that shielded billions of dollars from taxes, according to people briefed on the inquiry.

The criminal investigation of the lawyers, now being heard by a grand jury in Manhattan, is a clear sign that the government is extending the investigation of tax shelters that it considers abusive beyond the case involving the accounting firm KPMG.

There is no indication that Jenkens & Gilchrist itself is a target of the investigation. Petri Darby, a spokesman for Jenkens & Gilchrist, said yesterday, "We are cooperating fully with the investigation."

Instead, the investigation is focused on three current and former tax lawyers based in the firm's Chicago office, the heart of its tax practice. They are Paul M. Daugerdas (pronounced DOG-er-dus), Erwin Mayer and Donna M. Guerin, according to the people who have been briefed on the investigation.

The three lawyers wrote hundreds of legal opinion letters in recent years blessing aggressive tax shelters sold by accounting firms and, in some cases, by the law firm itself, that did not pass muster with the Internal Revenue Service, according to separate civil litigation against the firm. Investors used those legal opinion letters, often costing $75,000 or more each, as a form of protection that they thought guaranteed their tax shelters were legitimate.

Mr. Daugerdas in particular became among the richest of those who participated in the tax shelter business, according to court papers in the separate civil proceedings.

In the civil litigation, Jenkens & Gilchrist has argued that what it did was proper at the time, and the firm has generally sought to settle cases or have them dismissed.

Lawyers for Mr. Daugerdas, Mr. Mayer and Ms. Guerin declined to comment yesterday.

The criminal investigation of the lawyers indicates that the government's focus on questionable tax shelters has broadened beyond KPMG.

In the KPMG case, the firm agreed to pay a $456 million penalty, accept an independent monitor of its operations and acknowledge wrongdoing to avoid an indictment. Seventeen former KPMG tax professionals, an outside lawyer and an investment adviser have been indicted on charges of defrauding the I.R.S. through the creation and sale of four shelters. All 19 are fighting the charges.

At the time of the original indictment, prosecutors indicated that the investigation was continuing and that they would be looking at the law firms, advisory firms and banks that the government contends helped accounting firms create and sell aggressive tax shelters in recent years. Such shelters, which in the eyes of the I.R.S. are illegitimate tax dodges, have deprived federal coffers of tens of billions of dollars in revenue. A Senate subcommittee that conducted hearings on abusive tax shelters in 2003 identified several banks, including Deutsche Bank, law firms and others that worked together to create and sell questionable tax shelters.

According to civil lawsuits against it, Jenkens & Gilchrist sold legal opinions attesting to the acceptability of tax shelters with names like Cobra, Homer and Bart. The firm also helped design certain questionable tax shelters, according to the lawsuits.

Jenkens & Gilchrist, with about 270 lawyers, has been struggling in recent years as it defends itself in more than a dozen lawsuits over its work on tax shelters.

Partners and clients have left the firm. An $82 million settlement between Jenkens & Gilchrist and about 1,100 wealthy investors who bought invalid tax shelters using its opinion letters is still awaiting court approval.

In December, Jenkens & Gilchrist did not renew the contracts of Mr. Daugerdas and Mr. Mayer; it had previously stripped both men of their stakes in the firm. Ms. Guerin is still employed by the firm, but she is no longer an equity partner sharing in profits.

Lawyers for the three Jenkens & Gilchrist lawyers are expected to argue that the amount of money that Mr. Daugerdas was earning for himself and the firm through his tax shelter work was well known to the firm's top leadership.

The opinion letters written by all three lawyers typically bore the co-signatures of tax partners in the Dallas office of Jenkens & Gilchrist, according to a person who has seen the letters.

Mr. Daugerdas earned $93 million in fees from 1999 through 2003 by selling opinion letters for questionable shelters and by designing and selling certain shelters, according to persons who have seen sealed documents filed in connection with a previous class-action civil settlement between Jenkens & Gilchrist and investors.

That figure would make Mr. Daugerdas one of the wealthiest single participants in the tax shelter business. The Chicago tax practice that Mr. Daugerdas led in the late 1990's generated $267 million in fees from its work on tax shelters, according to the people who have seen the settlement documents.

Of that amount, about a third went to the general coffers of Jenkens & Gilchrist, while the rest went to other partners, including Mr. Mayer and Ms. Guerin, and accounting and financial firms with which the law firm worked on tax shelters. Mr. Mayer's work on questionable shelters earned him about $28 million from 1999 through 2003, while Ms. Guerin made around $4 million, according to the people who have seen the sealed settlement papers.

Jenkens & Gilchrist has been in the sights of the I.R.S. and Justice Department since at least 2003. That year, in the first case of its kind involving a law firm, the Justice Department petitioned a federal court in Illinois to enforce several I.R.S. summonses and petitions that sought to force the law firm to turn over the names of 600 investors who bought aggressive shelters. Jenkens & Gilchrist eventually complied.

The grand jury investigating the three Jenkens lawyers was impaneled by the United States attorney's office in Manhattan sometime last summer, according to the people briefed on the investigation. It is the second to examine the illicit tax shelter industry.

The first grand jury on tax shelters was impaneled in early 2004 to investigate KPMG. Its findings led federal prosecutors to recommend to the Justice Department that KPMG be indicted. KPMG and Justice reached a deferred-prosecution agreement in late August.

IRS Steps Up Scrutiny Of Family Partnerships (WSJ)

By Rachel Emma Silverman And Tom Herman

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

The IRS is intensifying its scrutiny of family limited partnerships, a popular technique for reducing estate and gift taxes.

The heightened scrutiny comes as the Internal Revenue Service has stepped up enforcement more broadly, increasing the number of audits it performs. The agency has said it plans to focus more resources investigating taxpayers with incomes of $100,000 and above. Officials also are focusing especially on what they call abusive shelters, or transactions with no real economic purpose other than evading taxes.

As part of its deepening probe into family limited partnerships, the IRS is questioning more of these transactions and taking a harder line during audits, seeking evidence of whether they really were set up for legitimate business purposes -- or merely as an elaborate tax dodge, officials say. In an increasing number of cases, auditors are interviewing taxpayers' adult children and others involved in a partnership for details on how it was set up and run. Officials are sometimes even scrutinizing partners' medical records, or interviewing doctors, to determine if a partnership was improperly created mainly to save taxes by someone on the verge of dying.

"We think it's a significant area of abuse," says Aileen Condon, chief of the estate and gift-tax program in the IRS's small business/self-employed division. She says a string of court victories by the IRS involving family limited partnerships in recent years has helped make the agency "more effective in identifying and challenging noncompliance and abuse."

Tax lawyers say the IRS's more aggressive stance has cast a chill over the partnerships and led them to be more careful about which clients they recommend the transactions to. David Handler, a partner at Kirkland & Ellis LLP in Chicago, says he has begun routinely telling clients considering setting up these partnerships "to plan on their gift-tax or estate-tax returns being audited." He says he has seen the IRS step up its scrutiny in recent months and has reduced the number of partnerships he has set up.

In a typical family limited partnership, a parent transfers assets, such as stock, real estate or a business, into a partnership formed with the children. Most of the shares in the partnership are eventually given to the children. Parents retain a small ownership stake and sometimes are the general partner, which means they can make management decisions about the assets. Because the children often receive limited partnership interests with less control, the value of their limited shares often can be discounted at least 20%, thereby lowering the gift-tax bite. Partnership interests given to the children also may be considered out of the parents' estate.

Martin E. Basson, an IRS lawyer based in southern Florida, and James L. Gulley, an IRS lawyer in Houston, said at a recent tax conference that the agency has gotten more aggressive in its scrutiny of family limited partnerships. One area of interest: Is the discount applied in valuing partnership interests a reasonable amount?

What's more, auditors increasingly might interview adult children of a deceased person who had set up a family limited partnership. "The IRS may be checking that those children who are limited and general partners have the business knowledge, expertise and involvement that establish a valid business purpose" for the partnership, according to Bruce Friedland, an IRS spokesman.

While nobody knows exactly how many family limited partnerships exist, lawyers and IRS officials say billions of dollars have flowed into these vehicles. The cost of setting up a partnership varies depending on its complexity. The partnerships can cost $15,000 or more in lawyer and appraisal fees. There are also annual accounting and administration fees that can cost several thousand dollars a year.

A major IRS courtroom victory occurred over the summer, when the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit ruled in favor of the government in a case involving the partnership of a deceased Texas businessman named Albert Strangi. The court found that the assets transferred into the partnership should be included in Mr. Strangi's estate, and thus subject to estate taxes. In essence, the court found that Mr. Strangi didn't really give up possession of his assets even after transferring them into the partnership. What's more, the partnership didn't have a "substantial" purpose besides saving taxes, according to the ruling.

While the IRS has won numerous court cases involving family limited partnerships, it has also lost a few. Tax lawyers say the cases have provided them with helpful hints on how to structure transactions. For example, in light of heightened IRS scrutiny, advisers emphasize that partnerships should have a valid nontax reason to exist -- such as managing a family business or to pool together investment assets, such as real estate. Also, the parent shouldn't regularly dip into partnership assets, such as cash or a house, for personal use. If a parent donates to a partnership but still continues to hang onto the assets, the property may revert back to the parent's estate.

Some advisers also recommend that parents name an independent third party as a general partner, so parents don't retain too much control over the partnership. And parents should set up a partnership while in good health, rather than on their deathbed to avoid the appearance the partnership is intended mainly to avoid estate tax. * * *

Speculation grows over whether Congress will extend lower rates on capital gains and dividends.

The top 15% rate on long-term capital gains and most types of corporate dividends is scheduled to expire after 2008. There is "probably about a one-in-three chance" that Congress won't act this year to extend these rates through 2010, says Andy Laperriere of ISI Group, an investment research and brokerage firm.

If legislation doesn't pass early this year to extend the dividend tax break, "investors will rightly question whether this will expire, considering Republicans are likely to have smaller majorities in Congress next year," the ISI report says.

Also, if this doesn't pass, "it is a negative for the overall market, but particularly high dividend-paying stocks, such as utilities." * * *

New laws affecting hurricane victims are summarized in an IRS publication.

The IRS said yesterday that Publication 4492 is available on its Web site (www.irs.gov1). It explains changes to the tax law and relief provisions available for those affected by Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma.

The publication applies to both individuals and businesses. * * *

BRIEFS: Kimberly S. Blanchard of Weil, Gotshal & Manges LLP takes over as head of the New York State Bar Association tax section, succeeding David P. Hariton of Sullivan & Cromwell LLP… The IRS deadline expired Monday for thousands of taxpayers to file papers to accept the government's offer to settle high-stakes battles over 21 shelters. The IRS hasn't yet said how many taxpayers filed.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Alito Confirmation Supporters Look Strong (AP)

By Jesse J. Holland, Associated Press Writer

(01-24) 18:54 PST WASHINGTON, (AP) --

Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito won commitments from a majority of senators Tuesday, assuring his eventual confirmation and a likely tilt of the court to the right.

On the same day Alito won a 10-8 party-line approval from the Senate Judiciary Committee, five Republicans announced that they would vote for his confirmation in the full Senate, pushing him over 50 votes in the 100-member chamber.

Fifty Senate Republicans, plus one Democrat, Ben Nelson of Nebraska, have publicly committed to vote for Alito through their representatives, interviews with The Associated Press or news releases.

No Republicans have opposed him and five have yet to declare how they will vote: Sens. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe of Maine and Ted Stevens of Alaska.

One of Alito's supporters, Sen. Craig Thomas of Wyoming, announced after meeting with Alito in his Senate office. "He represents the kind of justice who will interpret the law with respect to the Constitution and not legislate from the bench. His judicial experience is second to none and I'm confident he will do an excellent job handling his constitutional responsibility," Thomas said.

Twenty Democrats are publicly opposing President Bush's pick to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, while the other 23 and independent Sen. Jim Jeffords of Vermont are still publicly undecided or refuse to say how they will vote on Alito's nomination.

The only way Democrats can stop the conservative judge now is through a filibuster, a maneuver they show little interest in.

The final debate on the 55-year-old New Jersey jurist begins Wednesday.

"We urge the Senate to move forward with a swift up-or-down vote so he can begin serving on our nation's highest court," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

Democrats are working to get a large opposition vote to make their points against President Bush.

"I think it sends a message to the American people that this guy is not King George, he's President George," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

Bush should have picked a woman, said Reid, who urged the president last year to pick White House counsel Harriet Miers. "They couldn't go for her because she was an independent woman," Reid said of Miers, whose nomination was withdrawn under conservative criticism.

Bush then picked Alito, a 15-year federal appeals judge, former federal prosecutor and lawyer for the Reagan administration.

Republicans say he is a perfect choice for the high court. They praise his parrying of Democratic attacks on his judicial record and personal credibility during his confirmation hearings this month.

"If anybody has demonstrated judicial temperament and poise and patience, it is Judge Alito, And he ought to be confirmed on that basis alone," said committee chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

Democrats worry that Alito, along with new Chief Justice John Roberts, will push the court to the right and could even help overturn major decisions such as Roe v. Wade, the abortion rights case.

"Roberts, who promised us humility, who promised us that he would be looking to chart a middle course, we see time and again that he's falling in league with Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas," said Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, referring to Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the court's most conservative members. "My fear is that we are adding a fourth vote to that coalition with Sam Alito's nomination. And that's why I'm going to vote no."

Roberts won the votes of 22 Democrats last year — including three on the Judiciary Committee — ranking Democrat Patrick Leahy of Vermont as well as Wisconsin Sens. Russ Feingold and Herb Kohl. Those three senators voted against Alito Tuesday.

Several other Democrats who voted for Roberts have announced they will vote against Alito, sending the judge toward the sharpest partisan split for a Supreme Court nominee in years. The closest margin for victory for a justice in modern history is Thomas' 52-48 in 1991. In that vote, 11 Democrats broke with their party and supported President George H.W. Bush's nominee.

Both Republicans and Democrats are preparing to use Alito as a campaign issue. Republicans say the Democratic filibuster of lower-court judges helped them knock off former Democratic Senate leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota two years ago.

If Democrats want to make judges a campaign issue, "we welcome that debate on our side. We'll clean your clock," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C.

More than half, 54 percent in a CNN-USA Today-Gallup poll out this week, said they thought the Senate should vote to confirm Alito. That is up slightly from early January before his confirmation hearings.

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., also warned that Republicans would remember a party-line Alito vote in future Supreme Court nominations, noting that many Republicans voted for Justices Stephen Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, who were nominated by President Clinton.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said things are different from when the Senate considered Breyer and Ginsburg, who were confirmed 87-9 and 96-3 respectively. "There was not the polarization within America that is there today, and not the defined move to take this court in a singular direction," she said.

Alito Clears Senate Judiciary Panel (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A divided Senate begins debate today on confirming U.S. Circuit Judge Samuel Alito for a pivotal seat on the Supreme Court, following a 10-8 party-line vote by the Judiciary Committee for the nomination.

Democrats won't try to filibuster, despite pressure from some party activists. Still, Judge Alito's confirmation vote is expected to be a narrow one that could draw opposition from one or two Republicans and scant support from Democrats, half of whom backed Chief Justice John Roberts's nomination to the high court last year. And the debate will likely continue to play out into the fall elections.

Sens. Lincoln Chafee (R., R.I.) and Olympia Snowe (R., Maine) both have expressed concern about Judge Alito's history of opposing abortion rights, and spokesmen said neither has decided yet which way to vote. Thus far, Nebraska Sen. Ben Nelson is the only Democrat committed to support the nomination when it comes to a vote sometime in the next week.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) said he was "personally sorry" to see his panel so divided, and predicted that Judge Alito, who serves on the Third U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia, may face "close to a party-line vote" in the full Senate too.

The partisan split over President Bush's high-court nominee sets the stage for a contentious session of Congress leading up to the midterm elections. Republicans, eager to bolster their majorities in the House and Senate, vowed to focus attention on the votes of Democrats representing states President Bush carried in 2004. Two Bush supporters have pledged a combined $5 million for the campaign, a Republican activist said.

A $100,000 television ad buy ran in the Dakotas over the weekend to pressure Democratic Sens. Tim Johnson and Kent Conrad to support Judge Alito. Sen. Conrad, from North Dakota, is up for re-election. The senators, who both voted for the Roberts appointment, will also be under heavy pressure from Democratic activists to oppose this nomination.

Judge Alito's public statements deferring to presidential power and against abortion rights are the driving forces behind the opposition this time around. The issue of executive power gained new importance with the news of government surveillance of some domestic communication without court warrants, in an effort to identify potential terrorists. The Judiciary Committee will hold hearings soon on whether the counterterrorism campaign is legal or not.

"The Supreme Court needs to act as a check" on the presidency "to provide balance," said Sen. Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.). The Judiciary Committee's senior Democrat supported the president's selection of Judge Roberts to serve as chief justice, but yesterday opposed Judge Alito, saying he had no confidence the judge "will provide that check and balance."

Republicans defended the nominee, citing his 15 years on the appellate court and a top rating from the American Bar Association. "Some on the left cannot abide a judge who thinks that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land," said Sen. Orrin Hatch (R., Utah).

Recalling that most Republicans put politics aside to support President Clinton's appointments of Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer, Sen. Jon Kyl (R., Ariz.) warned that the Democrats were setting a "very bad precedent. Think carefully about what is being done today."

But Sen. Richard Durbin (D., Ill.) argued that Republicans already had applied a partisan litmus test to the nomination when they forced the withdrawal of White House Counsel Harriet Miers, the president's first choice for the seat, as insufficiently conservative.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D., Calif.) said Judge Alito's nomination was distinct because it is part of a Republican strategy to move the federal courts to the right, and because he would succeed Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who is retiring. During her 24 years on the court she has often been the swing vote on issues such as abortion, affirmative action and the death penalty.

Panel Sends Alito Nomination To Full Senate (REU)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The Senate Judiciary Committee voted along party lines on Tuesday to approve President George W. Bush's nomination of Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court, moving the 55-year-old conservative a step closer toward confirmation by the full Republican-led Senate.

With 10 Republicans voting yes and eight Democrats voting no, the committee sent the nomination to the 100-member Senate. The full chamber is to begin debate on Wednesday, with a confirmation vote as early as the end of this week.

If confirmed, Alito, a federal appeals judge since 1990, would replace moderate conservative Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and could help move the high court to the right on abortion, civil rights and other hot-button issues.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "We urge the Senate to move forward with a swift up-or-down vote so that he can begin serving on our nation's highest court."

Sen. Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican, denounced the partisan rancor over Alito, saying, "Today was the first time in the history of the United States Senate that the Judiciary Committee passed out a Supreme Court nominee on a purely partisan vote."

The Senate historian's office could not immediately confirm Kyl's assertion but noted that traditionally the Senate has approved successful nominees to the high court with bipartisan support.

So far, just one of the Senate's 44 Democrats -- moderate Ben Nelson of Nebraska -- has announced he will vote for Alito. All but a handful of others are expected to oppose him.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he would oppose the nomination. "It is unfortunate the president made such a divisive nomination."

"At a time when the president is abusing his power at every turn, I cannot vote to confirm a judge who won't be an independent check on the executive branch," Reid said.

BAR ASSOCIATION'S TOP RATING

Before the committee vote, Republicans hailed Alito as a fair-minded, mainstream conservative who had received the American Bar Association's top rating.

But Democrats charged Alito had staked out some extreme positions on such matters as abortion rights, civil rights and presidential powers.

Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, a moderate Pennsylvania Republican, said he believed Alito was qualified.

"His personal background is exemplary. His professional qualifications are outstanding. His educational achievements are of the highest order," Specter said.

Specter also said he believes Alito's colleagues on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals answered many critics when they testified at his confirmation hearing that "he is not an ideologue and that he does have an open mind."

The Senate vote on Alito is expected to be far closer than the 78-22 one that John Roberts, Bush's first nomination to the high court, received in September in being confirmed as U.S. chief justice.

But no Democrat has threatened a filibuster, since they do not appear to have the votes to sustain such a procedural roadblock.

DOJ_NMG_0011559

Sen. John Cornyn, a Texas Republican, said, "If qualifications, integrity, fairness and judicial philosophy were all that mattered in this process, Judge Alito would have been voted out of this committee unanimously."

"But the new rule is that any nominee who refuses to promise to impose a liberal agenda from the bench is subjected to ... tactics of distortion and smear," Cornyn said.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, said the committee was sharply divided because "this president has clearly indicated that he wants to take the court even further to the right than it has been in the last 10 years."

On Party Lines, Panel Approves Alito For Court (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 - The Senate Judiciary Committee voted along party lines Tuesday to approve the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. as senators turned the occasion into a broader and sometimes heated debate over the rancorous and partisan nature of the confirmation process.

Republicans threatened retaliation against future Democratic nominees, saying Democrats had rallied party members to vote against Judge Alito's confirmation for political reasons unrelated to his qualifications. Democrats said a close vote would warn President Bush not to name such conservative judges.

Judge Alito's confirmation to the court is now all but assured, by a vote of the full Senate roughly along party lines.

In contrast, the president's previous nominee, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., was confirmed just a few months ago with the support of three of the eight Democrats on the committee and half of the 44 Democrats in the Senate.

Recalling the overwhelming and bipartisan majorities that approved President Bill Clinton's Supreme Court nominees, Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer, several Republican senators said their party had evaluated the qualifications of nominees on less ideological terms. They said the Democratic opposition to Judge Alito could alter the judicial confirmation process for years to come.

Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona, warned that Republicans might apply the same political tactics to future Democratic nominees in return: "So I say to my Democratic friends, think carefully about what is being done today. Its impact will be felt well beyond this particular nominee."

Democrats countered that the Bush administration had politicized the confirmation process by nominating a roster of staunch conservatives to the federal courts.

"It's a very different day and time" than during the Clinton administration's nominations, Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, said. "There was not the polarization within America that is there today and not the defined move to take this court in a singular direction."

The committee vote, with all 10 Republicans voting to confirm and all 8 Democrats voting to reject the nomination, sets the stage for equally contentious if predictable debate beginning Wednesday on the Senate floor. Many Democrats have indicated Judge Alito appeared too well qualified and unthreatening in his confirmation hearings to justify a filibuster, and without one his confirmation by a majority vote is virtually guaranteed.

Democratic leaders are nonetheless pushing for a lengthy debate over the nomination to make their case against Judge Alito. And Democratic aides say privately that they also hope to hold off the final vote until Tuesday, when the president's State of the Union speech will overshadow the news.

Republicans had talked about holding the vote this weekend, but some senators plan to be in Davos, Switzerland, mingling with international business and political leaders at the World Economic Forum.

Behind the public arguments about the importance of the courts and the confirmation process, strategists for both parties say they are planning to use the Senate vote as a political weapon in the midterm elections. Such elections are typically decided by the turnout of party loyalists, and such voters would most likely have passionate views on the Alito nomination.

Republicans are laying the groundwork to attack Democrats who vote against Judge Alito as beholden to liberal interest groups. Democrats plan to make an issue of his votes on subjects like abortion rights or environmental regulations.

Speaking to reporters after the committee vote, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said that even if Judge Alito was confirmed, the strong Democratic opposition should send a message.

"I would hope it sends a message to the president that he should be more careful," Mr. Reid said. "I think it sends a message to the American people that this guy is not King George, he's President George."

Still, if Judge Alito joins Chief Justice Roberts on the bench, Mr. Bush will have put a substantial mark on the court. On many social issues, the court has been the biggest obstacle to the goals of conservatives now in control of the other branches of government, and Judge Alito would replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who often had been a pivotal vote.

After his statement to reporters, Mr. Reid met privately with representatives of a coalition of liberal groups opposing Judge Alito, a group that included People for the American Way, the Alliance for Justice, and labor, abortion rights and environmental groups.

Democratic aides briefed on the meeting said officials of the groups made a last-ditch plea for a filibuster. People present said Mr. Reid agreed only that the Democrats would discuss their plans at a party meeting on Wednesday.

Democrats also began making an issue of Chief Justice Roberts's decisions on the court in explaining their opposition to Judge Alito.

Mrs. Feinstein said that in the recent Gonzales v. Oregon decision, involving an Oregon law allowing doctor-assisted suicide, Chief Justice Roberts sided with conservative justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas in finding that the Bush administration could block the practice.

Chief Justice Roberts's vote ran counter to some of the statements he made during his confirmation hearing, suggesting that the court should stay out of "end-of-life" decisions, Mrs. Feinstein said. She quoted from his testimony: "The basic understanding is that it's a free country, and the right to be left alone is one of our basic rights."

She said that Judge Alito's record suggested he was also likely to join the same conservative faction of the court, especially on abortion rights.

"If one is pro-choice in this day and age, in this structure," Mrs. Feinstein said, "one can't vote for Judge Alito. It is simply that simple."

Republicans said that making an issue of Judge Alito's rulings would redound to their benefit, asserting that his legal views were more in line with the American electorate than those of his liberal critics.

"I'll just tell you right now we welcome that debate on our side," Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, told the Democrats. "We'll clean your clock."

Senate Panel Backs Alito On Party-Line Vote (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate Judiciary Committee on Tuesday endorsed the Supreme Court nomination of Samuel A. Alito Jr. in a vote that split along party lines and highlighted disputes over his conservative judicial record.

The full Senate will begin its debate on Alito today and a vote on his selection by President Bush to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor could come by the end of the week. Alito is expected to narrowly win confirmation and, as a justice, tilt the court to the right.

O'Connor, 75, frequently sided with the court's more liberal members on an array of social issues, providing the swing vote on some decisions. Alito, 55, probably would take more conservative positions in many cases, including those involving abortion rights and the death penalty.

In Tuesday's committee vote, all of the panel's 10 Republicans supported Alito, praising him as an accomplished federal appellate judge who, on the high court, would follow the law, not try to rewrite it.

"If anybody has demonstrated judicial temperament and poise and patience, it is Judge Alito," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the committee's chairman. "He ought to be confirmed on that basis alone."

All the committee's eight Democrats voted against Alito, with several saying they were especially concerned that his record and his testimony to the panel this month suggested he would not move to curb Bush's efforts to expand his wartime powers.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who does not serve on the committee, echoed the complaints about Alito in announcing that he would oppose his nomination.

"Judge Alito has failed to demonstrate a commitment to the system of checks and balances enshrined in our Constitution," Reid said. "At a time when the president is abusing his power at every turn, I cannot vote to confirm a judge who won't be an independent check on the executive branch."

But Democrats stopped short of calling for a filibuster — the only apparent way the minority party could derail Alito's nomination in the GOP-controlled Senate.

Asked whether he would mount such a parliamentary tactic against Alito, Reid answered, "No," although he refused to rule out the possibility.

Specter said he was glad that Alito received the formal nod from the panel, but expressed regret at the partisan outcome of the vote.

"I am personally sorry to see a party-line vote out of this committee, and perhaps very close to a party-line vote out of the full Senate," Specter said. "But we all have our points of view."

DOJ_NMG_0011561

According to congressional researchers, the last Supreme Court nominee to be approved by the committee on a party-line vote was Louis D. Brandeis in 1916. Brandeis was picked for the court by Democratic President Wilson.

Reid and other leading Senate Democrats sent a clear signal that party members would vote nearly as a bloc against Alito's confirmation. But Reid also said the matter was a "vote of conscience," meaning the leaders would not insist upon opposition to him.

Only one Democrat, Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska, has said he plans to vote for Alito.

Nelson is among a handful of Democrats facing reelection this fall in states that lean Republican, and party leaders don't want to pressure them to take a position that could jeopardize their seats.

Almost all of the Senate's 55 Republicans have expressed support for Alito, with just a few from Democratic-leaning states remaining officially undecided. One believed likely to oppose Alito is Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, a supporter of abortion rights who is up for reelection in November.

A close vote on Alito would contrast with the 78-22 tally by which John G. Roberts Jr. was confirmed in September as Bush's choice for chief justice. In that vote, half the Senate's 22 Democrats supported him. He also had won the backing of three of the Judiciary Committee's Democrats.

Alito, who before becoming a federal appellate judge in 1990 worked in the Reagan administration's Justice Department, has sparked more opposition partly because of Democrats' concerns that he would change the court's political balance. Roberts was replacing the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who consistently issued conservative rulings.

Before the Judiciary Committee vote, senators from both parties made the case for and against Alito. For Democrats, the question of the limits on executive power took front and center.

"The president is in the midst of a radical realignment of the powers of the government and its intrusiveness into the private lives of Americans," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the committee's top Democrat. "And I believe this nomination is part of that plan. I am concerned that if we confirm this nominee, we will further erode the checks and balances that have protected our constitutional rights for more than 200 years."

The controversy over the president's decision to bypass special courts and order warrantless wiretaps on American citizens and others inside the country was a consistent strain in Democrats' critique of Alito.

"We have a president who claims that he has the authority to spy on persons on American soil without a court order required by law," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). "The record demonstrates that we cannot count on Judge Alito to blow the whistle when the president is out of bounds. He is a long-standing advocate for expanding executive power, even at the expense of core individual liberties."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), the only woman on the committee, said she was troubled by Alito's statement during his committee testimony that legal "precedent is not an inexorable command" in decisions by the Supreme Court.

She said that suggested to her that Alito would not be committed to uphold the 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision that legalized abortion nationwide. "That's exactly the language Justice Rehnquist used arguing to overturn Roe," Feinstein said. "That spoke volumes to me."

Republicans accused Democrats of politicizing what they said should be a nonpartisan confirmation process.

"Why is this committee divided over Judge Alito?" asked Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.). "It cannot be because of his qualifications or temperament, but only because our Democratic colleagues don't think he will vote the right way, the way that they think he should, on some cases."

He added: "I fear a very bad precedent is being set today, a precedent that a unanimous minority will oppose a nominee on political grounds, not because the nominee is in any way unqualified."

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) accused Democrats of trying to turn Alito's nomination into a campaign issue in fall congressional elections.

"We're no longer advising and consenting. We're jockeying for the next election," Graham said. "And over time we'll erode the quality of the judiciary."

But Graham acknowledged that politics, at least the presidential kind, are part of the equation when it comes to the Supreme Court.

"What did you expect President Bush to do" in making court nominations? he asked Democrats rhetorically.

Throughout his two winning presidential campaigns, Bush stressed he would nominate conservatives to the court.

Judiciary Panel OKs Alito (WT)

By Charles Hurt

DOJ_NMG_0011562

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. yesterday in a party-line vote, but Democrats refused to rule out a filibuster to block the jurist's confirmation.

After the committee's 10-8 vote, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid declined to reveal whether he will lead a filibuster against Judge Alito as liberal lobbyists are demanding, only saying that he opposes President Bush's nominee to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

With commitments of support from 51 senators, Judge Alito has the majority needed for confirmation but remains below the 60-vote threshold needed to guarantee a full-floor vote and prevent a filibuster. Recent Democratic filibusters of nominees to the federal bench all began with a party-line vote by the Senate committee.

"There is a storm cloud on the horizon," said Sen. Jon Kyl, Arizona Republican.

Observers on both sides of the aisle, however, say they doubt Democrats really have the stomach for a high-profile filibuster. For instance, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, California Democrat and member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said last week that she would not support a filibuster.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, said it would be bad for the country to turn the judicial-nominations process into a litmus test on raw political issues such as abortion. And, he said, if Democrats insist, they'll regret it.

"I'll just tell you right now we welcome that debate on our side," Mr. Graham said. "We'll clean your clock. I mean, Judge Alito is closer to the mainstream of America than [liberal lobbyists People] for the American Way. We'll win that debate, but the judiciary will lose if we continue to do this."

Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, warned Democrats that Americans overwhelmingly side with Republicans on many of the hot-button political issues before the court, such as so-called "partial-birth abortion," homosexual "marriage" and keeping the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Yesterday's committee meeting, however, provided no real drama. The only member whose vote remained in question beforehand was that of Sen. Herb Kohl, the Wisconsin Democrat who voted in favor of confirming Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

"I fear that a Justice Alito will narrow our rights, limit our freedoms and overturn decades of progress," Mr. Kohl said. "To confirm Judge Alito to the Supreme Court would be to gamble with our liberties, a bet I fear the Constitution and the American people would lose."

Mr. Kohl was among other committee Democrats who echoed warnings by Massachusetts Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, who said Judge Alito "refuses to enforce core constitutional standards protecting individuals against low-level government officials in routine situations."

One issue that dominated the hearings earlier this month -- accusations of ethical lapses by Judge Alito -- have all but evaporated as the full Senate plans to begin debating the Alito nomination first thing this morning. Debate is expected to last until Friday.

During the hearings, Judge Alito was asked 113 questions about ethics and his membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton, which had formed in opposition to the admission of women to the university. That number was surpassed only by the 120 questions asked about presidential authority, according to a Republican tally.

Yesterday, Judge Alito's membership in Concerned Alumni of Princeton never was mentioned, and his belated recusal from the case involving Vanguard Group Inc. was referenced only once.

Senators spent more time talking about abortion rights.

"If one is pro-choice in this day and age, in this structure, one can't vote for Judge Alito," Mrs. Feinstein said. "It is simply that simple."

She said Judge Alito refused to say that federal abortion rights are settled. He did not, Mrs. Feinstein said, go as far as Justice Roberts, whom she also voted against, citing fears that he would undo the federal abortion-rights guarantee.

Democrats also said Judge Alito too often sides with big corporate or government interests against the "little guy."

But Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, said their concern is hollow as long as they support abortion rights.

"I think about the most vulnerable little guy in this world, which is the unborn child, which we attain no liberty for in this country any longer," he said. "And how can we claim to be for the little guy and ignore that little guy?"

Mr. Graham said he did not recognize the caricature of Judge Alito that Democrats described during yesterday's meeting.

"It's amazing he would even be considered for nomination," he joked. "He should be under house arrest."

Mr. Cornyn, at one point, held aloft a magazine with Judge Alito's wife, in tears, on the cover and said they had overplayed their hand in attacking the nominee.

Fifty of 55 Republicans and Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska have committed publicly to vote for Judge Alito, giving him the 51 votes needed for confirmation, according to interviews with The Washington Times or the Associated Press or from press releases.

Twenty Democrats publicly are opposing Judge Alito, and 23 others still are undecided publicly.

Republican Sens. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee; Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island; Susan Collins and Olympia J. Snowe of Maine; and Ted Stevens of Alaska have not publicly committed to vote for Judge Alito.

Alito Debate Begins Today In Full Senate Discussions Likely To Spotlight Partisan Rift Over Court Nominee (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's third pick for the Supreme Court, Samuel Alito, is headed for almost-certain confirmation by next week. The Senate vote, however, could emphasize deep partisan divisions over the swing seat he will occupy on the nation's highest court.

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved Alito on Tuesday, 10-8, without a single Democratic vote. Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska is the only Democrat who has said he will back him. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada called Alito "divisive."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., praised Alito, 55, as an even-handed jurist. "He does have an open mind," Specter said.

The Senate begins debate on Alito's nomination today. A final vote is likely before Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday.

Specter said he is "disappointed" by the near-unanimous opposition of Democrats, who hold 44 of the Senate's 100 seats. It contrasts with the reception for Chief Justice John Roberts, Bush's first court pick, who was confirmed in September with 22 Democratic votes.

"Democrats' relentless politicization of a process that has traditionally been above partisan politics is disappointing," White House spokesman Steve Schmidt said.

The Alito nomination is different, Democrats contend, because he will succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a deciding vote on abortion and other controversial issues.

"This is not just another nomination to the Supreme Court," said Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill. "It is truly going to tip the scales of justice."

Republicans noted that Alito, a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, received bipartisan support from colleagues on the bench and the American Bar Association's highest rating. Democrats' opposition to Alito is "about politics," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C. "We're jockeying for the next election."

Democrats portrayed Alito as a jurist who allows legal technicalities to override compassion and favors corporate and government power over ordinary citizens.

"He has shown a hostility to … average Americans," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

Republican Sens. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine have yet to say whether they will support Alito. All are abortion rights supporters. Alito opposed abortion as a lawyer in the Reagan administration but said during his confirmation hearings that he won't allow his personal views to affect his rulings.

A handful of Democratic centrists, including Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas, Daniel Inouye of Hawaii and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, also have not said how they will vote. Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., said Tuesday that he will oppose Alito. "He is not the centrist voice I believe this nation needs," he said.

Given the Republican majority in the Senate, the only way for Alito's opponents to halt his nomination would be through a filibuster, which allows 40 senators to block a vote by refusing to end debate. Reid has not publicly ruled out the parliamentary technique. Key centrists such as Snowe and Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., whose support would be needed, have said a filibuster isn't justified.

Alito Clears On Party-line Vote (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, January 25, 2006

The Judiciary Committee approved Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito on a straight party-line vote yesterday, likely foreshadowing a relatively close confirmation on the Senate floor.

Alito won the support of the 10 committee Republicans and was opposed by all eight panel Democrats.

"I guess there's 18 ways of saying the same thing, broken into two categories," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), providing a moment of levity during an otherwise laborious three-hour hearing in which most senators ignored an oversized digital speech timer.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) refused to rule out a Democratic filibuster against the nomination, though such a move would surprise many congressional observers.

The party-line vote contrasted sharply with the 14-4 approval the committee gave to President Bush's first pick for the high court, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., late last year. Accordingly, congressional observers expect Alito will win confirmation with a far smaller margin than the 78-22 vote for Roberts.

Already, some Democrats who voted for Roberts have announced their opposition to Alito.

"There is a fear that this one will turn the balance, will tip the balance of the court, and that probably raises the stakes of this nomination," Nebraska Sen. Ben Nelson said on C-SPAN yesterday. Nelson is the only Democrat in the upper chamber to announce support for Alito.

At the final committee hearing, Republicans focused on Alito's qualifications, including his 15 years on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, and characteristics such as integrity and honor that they said he demonstrated both on the bench and in committee hearings. Democrats again voiced concerns about the possibility that Alito would vote to overturn abortion rights and that he would support the expansion of presidential powers.

"If one is pro-choice in this day and age … one cannot vote for Judge Alito," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.).

Even as they celebrated Alito's advancement yesterday, Republicans and conservative interest groups denounced Democratic opposition.

"While it's heartening to see Judge Alito favorably recommended by the Senate Judiciary Committee, it's disappointing to hear the continued partisan attacks that accompanied a party-line vote," said Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman.

"Their goal is to impose radical policy ideas on America through control of the court," Family Research Council President Tony Perkins said in a statement released before the hearing concluded. "It demonstrates the allegiance Democrats have sworn to the extreme factions of their party."

But as Alito's nomination moved from the Judiciary Committee to the floor, President Bush and his Republican allies in the Senate inched closer to fulfilling campaign promises to fill the high court with unambiguously conservative jurists.

The Senate is expected to begin debate on the nomination today, but it was not clear as of press time when a confirmation vote would occur. "A justice delayed will not be a justice denied," said Eric Ueland, chief of staff to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

Senate Republicans and Democrats are engaged in a two-step over the timing of the confirmation vote, which could be held just before or just after the president's annual State of the Union address Tuesday. The speech appears to be a factor in the tussle over timing.

"Not sure if we can get it done this week," Reid spokesman Jim Manley said.

Interest groups on the left are still encouraging their allies in the Senate to put up a fight.

Meanwhile, Senate Republican leaders could file a cloture motion and force a vote on whether to cut off debate.

"Nothing is ruled in, or ruled out," a GOP aide said.

"The calculus on when Alito is finito comes from how long Senate Democrats want to continue to fight to suppress the final vote total against an outstanding nominee," the aide said.

The Unsmoked Signal Of Victory On Alito (WP)

By Marcia Davis

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

Sometimes it's not the words that tell the story. Sometimes it's a cigar.

During yesterday's Senate Judiciary Committee vote on Supreme Court nominee Samuel A. Alito Jr., there were words aplenty, thousands of them, spoken for nearly three hours. There were words of praise and condemnation, expressions of great confidence and deep doubts, incriminations and recriminations, all delivered with rock-hard partisan sincerity. There were moments of passion and humor, and, at times, even moments of eloquence.

And then there was the cigar.

It was fat and brown, and when it wasn't clutched between the fingers of Bill Reynolds, Republican Sen. Arlen Specter's chief of staff, it was tucked -- unlit -- squarely in the left side of his mouth, or being delicately finger-twirled between his lips. Despite all the speeches in that ornate, wood-paneled room, it was his cigar that was sending the true message of the day.

This legislative "minuet," as Reynolds's boss, the Judiciary Committee chairman, described the confirmation process at the start of the Alito hearings -- was just about over. The dance was done but for a few formal steps. It was time to pass the cigars and pop the corks -- and -- oh, yeah -- somebody should count the votes.

Yesterday, those votes fell strictly along partisan lines, and that meant 10 to 8 in Alito's favor. Now the nomination will go before the full Senate, where the balance of power is tilted in the GOP's favor, 55 to 44 (with one independent). Yesterday's committee outcome was no surprise, and the vote before the full Senate won't be, either.

Specter started yesterday's meeting acknowledging such.

"I don't believe . . . that there is a great deal of suspense as to what's going to happen," he said as he pleaded with his colleagues for brevity, saying he was limiting himself to five minutes and that he hoped others would follow his lead.

Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democrat on the committee, heard Specter's call for brevity but said he didn't know if he could heed it. He had much to say at "this critical time in the nation's history."

Calling Bush a divider and not a uniter, he criticized the president for not sending a nominee to the Senate who might have been "someone who would have the support of all Americans." Leahy was one of three Democrats on the committee who voted for Chief Justice John Roberts in September, and one of 22 Democrats who voted to confirm the chief justice on the Senate floor.

But yesterday was different. "This is a time in our history when the protections of Americans' liberties are at risk," Leahy said, focusing his remarks on the issue of executive power and his belief that the Bush administration is illegally grabbing power under the cover of the war on terrorism.

"This is a critical nomination, one that can tip the balance on the Supreme Court radically away from constitutional checks and balances and the protection of Americans' fundamental rights."

Utah's Orrin Hatch set the tone for his Republican colleagues. The GOP strategy had not changed from the hearings themselves: praise Alito's "outstanding record" as a jurist and shake a finger of shame in the face of his critics. Democrats, Hatch and his colleagues said repeatedly, were destroying the bipartisan tradition on confirmations with their partisan politics.

"Observers of what the judicial confirmation process has become in the last several years might have a hard time remembering that fair process," Hatch said. "Where were the filibusters? Where were the litmus paper and the scorecards? Did people tally up Justice [Ruth Bader] Ginsburg's past appeals court rulings and, on that basis, warn that she would not give certain groups a fair shake in the future?"

And so it went. One by one, the Democrats repeated concerns about a Bush power grab and a judge they say is too deferential to big government and big business in his rulings.

Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) was uncharacteristically restrained in the length of his remarks. He voiced his concern that Alito was insensitive to the subtleties of today's problems of discrimination. Alito "is not someone who looks into the shadows" when it comes to ferreting out such forms of bias, he said.

Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona, like his Republican colleagues, pointed to the outstanding recommendations that Alito has gotten from the American Bar Association and the number of people who had come to testify on his behalf. He wanted to know how someone so respected could come under such attacks.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) had an answer.

It's not just qualifications that matter, she said, because "legal philosophy and personal views do play a role on the Supreme Court." And, she said, these are polarized times.

Last, Feinstein addressed the issue on which so many thought this nomination would rise or fall: abortion rights.

"If one is pro-choice in this day and age, one cannot vote for Judge Alito."

But it was Lindsey Graham, the Republican senator from South Carolina who always seems ready with a quip, who let it all hang out.

"I guess there are 18 ways of saying the same thing," he said, eliciting one of the few moments of bipartisan chuckling, "broken into two different categories."

Look, he said: "What did you expect President Bush to do when he won?" These are the spoils of victory. Clinton, after all, got his picks.

And if the Democrats think they're going to use the issue in the election, he taunted, "go ahead, we'll clean your clock."

But Richard Durbin of Illinois, the last Democrat to speak, had a few jabs of his own.

"We were supposed to be meeting on the nomination of Harriet Miers," he said.

Supporters and opponents of Alito stood in the back of the room watching. They had their red stickers pasted to their lapels, for Alito and against, standing side by side. They stood for three hours straight, watching as if the outcome were an unanswered question. Later, Alito supporters condemned Democrats for their dissent. And the judge's opponents praised the Democrats for their strong speeches and their unity.

It isn't over until it's over, they said. The battle moves to the offices of the moderates on both sides who might be swayed, whether they are Democrats in red states or Republicans who support abortion rights.

But the numbers are the numbers. And after the vote, our cigar man was down the hall listening to his boss give a news conference.

So what was up with that cigar, he was asked. After all, sometimes a cigar is just a cigar.

"It's clearly a bad habit," he said. "Something I need to quit."

Florida Senator To Vote Against Alito Supreme Court Confirmation (HTRIB)

By brent kallestad

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), January 25, 2006

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. -- U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson said Tuesday he plans to vote against Judge Samuel Alito's confirmation to the Supreme Court.

Nelson announced his decision in a statement from his Washington office shortly after the Senate Judiciary Committee favorably recommended Alito's Supreme Court nomination to the full Senate on a 10-8 party-line vote.

"His many legal writings, judicial opinions and evasive answers both at his hearing and in our private meeting, convinced me he would tilt the scales of justice in favor of big government," Nelson said.

"Judge Alito is an extremist judge with proven views far outside those of mainstream Floridians," said Stephanie Grutman, executive director of the Florida Association of Planned Parenthood Affiliates, who applauded Nelson's decision.

Alito, who was chosen by Bush to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, spent nearly an hour with Nelson last week in the senator's office.

The full Senate is expected to vote later this week or early next week and confirmation is considered likely.

Alito picked up the support last week of Florida's other U.S. senator, Republican Mel Martinez. Many of the state's largest newspapers also endorsed Alito's nomination.

A Democrat seeking re-election in November, Nelson is likely to find himself forced to defend his decision in this year's campaign.

Nelson's office noted in the same statement opposing Alito that the senator had voted for 215 of President George W. Bush's 225 judicial picks, including Chief Justice John Roberts.

"Sen. Nelson has proved himself to have a moderate record in support of the president's judicial nominees the vast majority of the time," Nelson spokesman Bryan Gulley said Tuesday. "I think it goes to show he calls them as he sees them."

The Republican Party of Florida disagreed.

"Sen. Nelson's opposition confirms that he has lost sight of the profound credentials of Judge Alito, the sentiments of Florida voters and the integrity of the Supreme Court," state GOP chairman Carole Jean Jordan said.

U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris of Sarasota is seeking the Republican nomination to oppose Nelson in November. Her office issued a statement that Nelson chose to play politics with the decision and ignore Alito's credentials.

Sen. Bill Nelson Says He'll Vote Against Alito's Nomination (MH)

By Lesley Clark

The Miami Herald, January 25, 2006

U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson said Tuesday he'll vote against Judge Samuel Alito Jr.'s nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court, saying he believes the jurist would ``tilt the scales of justice in favor of big government over the average person."

The Democrat's decision came as Alito, President Bush's nominee to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, was favorably recommended by the Senate Judiciary Committee along a party-line vote, 10 to 8.

The full Senate is expected to vote later this week. That vote, too, is expected to fall along party lines, with Nebraska's Ben Nelson the only Democrat so far to pledge support for the jurist.

Nelson, who likely will come under Republican attack for his "no" vote, underscored in a statement that he has voted "for almost all" of Bush's judicial nominees.

But, Nelson, who met privately with Alito last week, said Alito's ``many legal writings, judicial opinions and evasive answers both at his hearing and in our private meeting, convinced me he would tilt the scales of justice in favor of big government over the average person.

"Because he is not the centrist voice I believe this nation needs to replace the retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who fiercely defended the rights and liberties of all Americans, I'm going to vote no on his confirmation," Nelson said in the statement.

Nelson, who faces a re-election challenge in November, likely from Republican U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris, noted in his statement that since arriving to the Senate in 2001, he has voted for 215 -- or 96 percent -- of the president's 225 judicial picks, including Miguel Estrada and Chief Justice John Roberts.

Nelson, who has sought to fashion himself as a moderate in a state nearly evenly divided between Democrats and Republicans, had been pressured on both sides.

Republican groups as late as Tuesday morning sent out a package of material -- including newspaper editorials that backed Alito -- to ``respectfully encourage Sen. Nelson to review the facts and join fellow Florida Sen. Mel Martinez in supporting the Alito confirmation."

Civil rights groups and others rallied Tuesday morning in Miami against Alito, saying they had petitions from nearly 50,000 Floridians opposing Alito. The petitions were delivered to the two senators' offices, the groups said.

Now It's The Full Senate's Turn To Look At Alito (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 25, 2006

Supreme Court nominee Judge Samuel Alito Jr. was voted out of the Senate Judiciary Committee early Tuesday afternoon on straight party lines, with all 10 Republicans endorsing the 55-year-old federal appeals court judge and all eight Democrats opposing him. The strictly partisan committee vote had been widely anticipated after Alito's weeklong hearings earlier this month.

"I do not believe, notwithstanding all the cameras here today, that there's a great deal of suspense," said committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa. "I am personally very sorry to see a party-line vote out of this committee and almost a party-line vote out of the full Senate," Specter added, shortly after he gaveled the committee to order at 9:30 a.m., some three hours before the panel's actual roll-call vote.

The full Senate will take up the Alito nomination this morning; it could vote on his confirmation as early as Friday or as late as next Tuesday, the day President George W. Bush is slated to give his annual State of the Union address.

Specter permitted each member of the committee five minutes to talk about the nomination, although several went far beyond that limit.

Democrats were unapologetic in their opposition to Alito, who has served on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the past 15 years. Republicans, by contrast, were effusive in their praise. And they insisted that Democratic problems with Alito boiled down to one issue: abortion.

"Seeing one of the finest judges in the country have a straight party-line vote, that's amazing to me," said Utah Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch, during an impromptu news conference with seven other Republican committee members a half-hour after the vote.

In a 1985 application for a senior position at the Department of Justice, Alito wrote that he did not believe that the Constitution protected a woman's right to an abortion. During his three days of questioning, Alito confirmed the accuracy of the 1985 memo, but he never explicitly said whether he continued to hold that view.

California Democrat Sen. Dianne Feinstein, the committee's only female member and a strong proponent of abortion rights, was unsettled by Alito's response to her question about the precedential strength of the Supreme Court's 1973 opinion Roe v. Wade.

"Precedent is not an inexorable command," she noted Alito had said during his confirmation hearings. "That spoke volumes to me," she said, adding that was the same language the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist used when he tried to overturn well-established precedents. "That said, Judge Alito probably would not uphold Roe if given the chance."

Democrats also complained that, more generally speaking, Alito's answers on a range of subjects, from executive power to civil rights, may have appeared to be substantive responses, but, in fact, were not.

"On too many issues we were treated to artful evasions and pleasant banalities," New York Democrat Sen. Charles Schumer told his fellow committee members as well as the national television audience watching the committee meeting. Alito, said Schumer, "intoned no fewer than six times that 'No one is above the law.' But has any nominee ever said anyone is above the law?" Reading from a prewritten speech, Schumer said, the American people, like most members of the committee, deserve "honest answers, not practiced platitudes." Alito, he added, "has stood alone, at the edge of the judicial mainstream, in too many important cases and on too many important issues."

Other Democrats complained that Alito's hundreds of decisions over the years demonstrated undue deference to executive power. "We cannot count on Judge Alito to blow the whistle when the president is out of bounds," noted Massachusetts Democrat Sen. Edward Kennedy.

Democrats also faulted Alito for taking a narrow and technical view of large and complex legal issues. "He repeatedly, and in some cases gratuitously, raised questions of justiciability," said Wisconsin Democrat Sen. Russ Feingold, who went on to criticize Alito's views on privacy and deference to the executive branch.

That led South Carolina Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham to respond: "After listening to Senator Feingold, it's amazing that [Alito] should even be considered for the nomination -- he should be under house arrest."

Republicans, including Graham, had strong praise for the nominee, sometimes even soaring praise.

"This is a towering legal figure," said Alabama Sen. Jeff Sessions. "He was a magnificent witness, he was unflappable. It was exciting to see him perform that way. He represents the very best in judges."

Other Republicans felt it was the content of Alito's answers, rather than his style, that bothered Senate Democrats.

Said Texas Republican Sen. John Cornyn: "I think some of my colleagues are voting against Judge Alito not because he didn't answer the questions adequately, but they didn't like the answers he gave."

Why Dems Can't Sink Alito (HILL)

The reason Democrats and liberals did not get more popular traction in their opposition to the appointment of Judge Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court is that their worldview of what constitutes a good nominee is sharply at variance with that of the American public at large.

To the likes of Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) et al., the Supreme Court is a kind of super-Congress — nine special Senate seats — and the criterion for confirmation is agreement with the nominee on the key issues likely to come before the court. But to the American voters, the Supreme Court is above politics and ideology and confirmation should be awarded based on personal attributes such as integrity, intelligence, judgment, compassion, wisdom, maturity, fairness and temperament.

Realizing this difference in perspective between the Democratic base and the public at large, President Bush has done very well with both the John Roberts and the Alito appointments. When his people forgot about the dichotomy — and nominated Harriet Miers who was seen as a poorly qualified if conservative candidate — they got their heads handed to them.

Of course, ideology is as important (if not more so) to conservatives as it is to liberals. But with the White House comes the ability to get men or women who share your ideology approved as long as they are objectively well-qualified. Bill Clinton learned that lesson when the Senate easily approved his nominations of moderate liberal Stephen Breyer and ultraliberal Ruth Bader Ginsburg. Republicans then, as with Democrats now, could not rally public opposition to a judge simply based on his or her ideology.

The Robert Bork nomination failed, ultimately, not so much because he was a conservative but because his opponents managed to cast doubts on his temperament by engaging him in harsh rhetorical exchanges during his hearings. Clarence Thomas was not seriously opposed because of his conservatism but as a result of the allegations of Anita Hill that he sexually harassed her.

The failure of voters to understand the role of ideology in court decisions seems to fly in the face of the knee-jerk conservatism of Antonin Scalia, Thomas and, during his tenure, Rehnquist and the automatic liberalism of John Paul Stevens and Ginsburg. But voters are not deluded; they simply do not see Roe v. Wade in quite the apocalyptic terms that both the left and the right do. To the vast middle of the American political spectrum, it is more important that a Supreme Court nominee be a good person with sterling credentials than be predictably for or against Roe v. Wade.

But, in an even broader sense, voters are increasingly appalled at the growth of partisanship on Capitol Hill. Clinton's impeachment and the GOP government closures of the 1990s have left their legacy in the growing public impatience with shrill, blind partisan advocacy in their elected Congress. Their insistence on credentials and personal qualifications in Supreme Court nominees reflects their desire not to see this unappealing trait spread to the Supreme Court.

Public OKs wiretapping

The Fox News poll of Jan. 11 confirms that the public stands solidly behind Bush's policy of authorizing warrantless wiretaps by the National Security Agency of conversations between American citizens and people outside the United States.

By 58-32, voters supported the policy, and 60 percent of the public said that they would be willing, personally, to sacrifice some of their privacy to help national security.

The poll also found that Americans disagree with Osama bin Laden that we have avoided terrorist attacks simply because al Qaeda has not planned any raids. Forty-six percent say that it was because of our efforts at homeland security that we have not been hit in four and a half years. Only 22 percent said it was because no attacks were attempted. Twenty percent said both were responsible. And 60 percent want the Patriot Act to be renewed.

These survey findings underscore that Democrats attack Bush on his efforts to prevent domestic terror attacks at their own peril. The public dislikes Republicans because of their corruption scandals but appreciates their positions on homeland security. It differs with the Democrats over domestic anti-terror efforts but exempts them from its condemnation of congressional dishonesty. Each party should stay on its own turf and clean up the rest of its act.

Alito Nomination Sent To Full Senate (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel Alito moved to the full Senate Tuesday on a strictly party-line vote in the Judiciary Committee, foreshadowing a rocky election year in which Democrats and Republicans are likely to angrily part ways on judicial nominations and a range of other issues.

Democrats objected to elevating Alito to the Supreme Court, saying they had little faith that he would serve as a check on a power-hungry executive branch. They said they worried that he would not protect Americans' civil liberties and would fail to uphold a woman's right to an abortion.

"I'm concerned that if we confirm this nominee, we'll further erode the checks and balances that have protected our constitutional rights for more than 200 years," said Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), the committee's top Democrat.

Republicans, on the other hand, called Alito a superb judge whose 15 years as a federal appeals court judge made him more experienced than most Supreme Court nominees.

"He's a good, decent, honest man," said Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio). "He has an extraordinary legal talent and he approaches each case with an open mind and understanding heart. Throughout this process, Judge Alito has conducted himself with dignity, patience and poise."

Alito had the misfortune of being nominated to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a swing vote on some of the most controversial matters to come before the court, from abortion to affirmative action. That raised the stakes for the Democrats, since Alito's confirmation as the 110th justice in U.S. history, which seems all but assured, would likely determine the future direction of the high court.

Alito's nomination comes at a time of deep unhappiness among Democrats toward the White House over domestic eavesdropping and the treatment of suspected terrorists in American military custody. That and Bush's relatively low poll numbers helped contribute to the party-line vote.

The full Senate is expected to vote on Alito's confirmation Monday, with only a handful of Democrats supporting him. He would likely be sworn in almost immediately, taking the place of O'Connor, who would step down. Cases that the justices have heard in recent months that have not yet been decided might have to be reargued, since Alito could not vote on a case if he was not sitting at the time of the argument.

Alito Would Likely Change Supreme Court In Unexpected Ways (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson And James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Senate Judiciary Committee moved Samuel Alito one step closer to a lifetime seat on the Supreme Court on Tuesday, where he could immediately shift the court's stance on high-profile issues such as abortion, the death penalty, religion and executive power.

Yet it is Alito's vision of judicial restraint and a limited role for courts - a vision he shares with new Chief Justice John G. Roberts - that could produce an even more fundamental change in the high court.

Together, the two are likely to bring a narrow and lawyerly approach to deciding cases that, if persuasive, could help remove the justices from some of the high-profile political squabbles that now define them.

"Overall, I think the court could appear a lot less political with these two new justices, and that's a good thing," said Jonathan Adler, a law professor at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland and a constitutional scholar. "Both Roberts and Alito seem to feel that courts are most effective and respected when they operate within a limited role, rather than seeking to intrude into a lot of other contexts."

Cambridge University professor and court expert David Garrow agreed.

"Neither has much of an appetite for grand declarations," he said of Roberts and Alito. "Once you get away from the left-right spectrum that everyone views the court in, I think you see them having a very different kind of effect on things."

Alito's confirmation hearings were hard fought in the Senate Judiciary Committee earlier this month and inspired bitterly partisan campaigns on both sides, but his confirmation seems all but assured after the committee voted Tuesday to move debate to the Senate floor.

The 10-8 party vote portends an equally partisan outcome in the full Senate and one of the slimmest confirmation margins since Clarence Thomas got 52 votes in 1991.

DOJ_NMG_0011570

Judiciary Committee Republicans applauded Alito's experience and intellect and complained that Democrats were judging Alito only on ideological grounds. Democrats said Alito didn't deserve their votes because as a conservative jurist he would alter the balance of the court.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said the political split on Alito's nomination illustrated a dramatic shift since liberal-leaning jurists such as Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer won confirmation to the court with overwhelming bipartisan votes.

"What's going on in the Judge Alito nomination, I think, is not advising and consenting. It's more about politics," Graham said. "We're jockeying for the next election. And over time we'll erode the quality of the judiciary."

Without question, Alito's presence could have an immediate impact on many attention-grabbing issues as the high court. And because his outlook is markedly different from retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's, his vote could be crucial.

Alito won't likely see the partial-birth abortion ban the same way O'Connor did in 2000, when she cast the deciding vote to strike it down because it lacked a health exception.

Alito's strong First Amendment leanings could also lead him to see campaign regulations differently from O'Connor. This spring, the court will decide whether Vermont can limit not only campaign contributions, but also expenditures by candidates in statewide races.

Alito has also been particularly loath to overturn death sentences as an appellate judge, while O'Connor has been key to the court's ongoing review of capital punishment standards. This term alone, the court is considering several death penalty cases, and experts expect that Alito's arrival might slow the pace of reform dictated by the court.

As the court begins to consider challenges to the Bush administration's bold assertions of executive authority, Alito's record suggests strongly that he'll be more deferential than O'Connor was.

"I don't think there's any question that Alito, like Roberts, will be voting an awful lot with Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas," said Garrow, referring to the court's most conservative jurists.

But more than these controversial single issues, Alito's allegiance to a minimalist court could magnify his influence.

In his appellate court decisions, Alito tended toward scholarly, reserved opinions that were long on technical analysis and short on sweeping pronouncements. While his decisions almost uniformly tacked to the right, his approach was humble and often persuasive to other judges on his court.

Already, there are signs that Roberts, in the chief justice's job since October, may be pushing that approach at the high court with some success. The justices have decided several seemingly high-profile cases already this term - on assisted suicide, abortion regulations, the scope of disability law and campaign finance regulations.

But in each case, the court avoided addressing the central, polarizing issues in the cases and decided them on narrow legal terms. None turned out to be a headline-grabbing decision.

`They're not ducking the issues in those cases," said Adler. "They're just saying they have no need to answer things they don't have to answer."

Doug Kendall, an environmental lawyer and executive director of a public-interest law firm in Washington, said that while the idea of judicial restraint is hard to oppose, it may be difficult to define in practical terms.

Judges frequently must decide between competing interpretations of law, and the most restrained decision from a judicial perspective yields the most activist result in terms of the law's intent and impact.

"Is it restrained to accept a dramatically restrictive interpretation of, say, clean water regulations to avoid addressing broader constitutional issues about the law?" Kendall asked. "I suppose it is in one way, but that's also pretty activist in another way because it limits the reach that Congress intended for that law."

Still, Kendall said he can be optimistic in theory about how Roberts and Alito will approach their jobs on the high court.

"I think what we're seeing so far with Roberts may be encouraging," he said. "But Alito's conservative record suggests he may not be quite the same. We'll see."

Alito Seems Assured Of A Seat On High Court (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

Democrats all but conceded the Supreme Court confirmation of Samuel A. Alito Jr. yesterday but signaled they will use the Senate debate that begins today to focus on President Bush's domestic spying program and their predictions that Alito will be too pliant in supporting it.

The Senate Judiciary Committee voted 10 to 8 along party lines to recommend Alito's confirmation, depriving him of the bipartisan support enjoyed by most current justices and setting the stage for a sharply partisan Senate debate this week. The vote, which was anticipated, occurred after stinging criticisms by Democrats, including the three who supported Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. last fall.

Democratic leaders indicated they will attack Alito's record as an appellate judge in the floor debate expected to extend to Friday or later. But they strongly hinted there will be no filibuster, a parliamentary tactic that conceivably could enable Democrats to block the confirmation in a 100-member chamber in which Republicans hold 55 seats.

Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) told reporters that each senator's decision on Alito is "a vote of conscience," a term used when the leadership does not press for party solidarity. Reid would not rule a filibuster in or out, but top Democratic staff aides said they saw little chance of one.

It is unclear whether Democrats would have tried a filibuster under any circumstances. An accord reached last year between seven Democratic and seven Republican senators, which averted a showdown over judicial filibusters in general, rendered an Alito filibuster virtually impossible. Several of the "Gang of 14" members, as they are called, said they would oppose a filibuster, and their pact gave them the clout to prevail.

Republicans predicted the Senate will confirm Alito by a much narrower margin than the 78 to 22 vote Roberts received on Sept. 29, and they berated Democrats for making a Supreme Court nomination a largely partisan matter. As of yesterday, the only Democratic senator to publicly announce support of Alito was Ben Nelson (Neb.).

Senators agreed that one reason Alito's nomination is more divisive than Roberts's is that Alito, 55, is slated to replace the swing-voting Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a move that could move the court notably to the right. Roberts succeeded a fellow conservative, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist.

At yesterday's committee meeting, Democrats repeatedly criticized Bush's use of the National Security Agency to conduct warrantless eavesdropping on U.S. citizens, the subject of committee hearings scheduled for next month. As an appellate judge for 15 years, Democrats said, Alito backed broad executive powers, making him a poor Supreme Court choice when the White House needs to be reined in.

"This is a nomination that I fear threatens the fundamental rights and liberties of all Americans," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), who voted for Roberts. Saying Bush "is in the midst of a radical realignment of the powers of the government and its intrusiveness into the private lives of Americans," Leahy concluded: "I will not lend my support to an effort by this president to move the Supreme Court and the law radically to the right and to remove the final check within our democracy."

The other two committee Democrats who had backed Roberts -- Sens. Russell Feingold and Herb Kohl of Wisconsin -- also said Alito appears far more likely than Roberts to vote to expand presidential powers, limit civil rights and possibly allow states to outlaw abortion.

"I fear that a Justice Alito will narrow our rights, limit our freedoms and overturn decades of progress," Kohl said. Feingold said Bush "thinks his executive power permits him to violate explicit criminal statutes by spying on Americans without a court order."

The Supreme Court may ultimately decide such matters, Feingold said, adding that he and others "repeatedly asked Judge Alito whether the president can violate a clear statutory prohibition such as the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and the ban on torture" and that "he never answered the question."

Reid, who opposed Roberts and is not on the Judiciary Committee, told reporters: "I have no confidence he will serve as real check on the abuse of presidential power that we see so prevalent today. . . . President Bush continues to believe that he is above the law and above the Constitution."

Judiciary Committee Republicans defended Alito, even as some reserved judgment on Bush's surveillance practices. Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) told colleagues, "I am very concerned that the war resolution is being interpreted overly broad," a reference to a congressional vote that Bush cites as justification for his NSA policies.

Graham called Alito an outstanding nominee and chastised Democrats for failing to give him bipartisan backing similar to that enjoyed by Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer, who were nominated by President Bill Clinton.

"What's changed?" Graham said. "It's not the quality of the nominees, it's the quality of the process." He said Democrats want to make "a campaign issue of the decisions on the court." In that contest, he warned Democrats, "we'll clean your clock."

Why Democrats Are United Against Alito (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - With Senate math against them, Democrats see scant prospect of blocking Judge Samuel Alito's rise to the Supreme Court - a final call to be made in a caucus meeting Wednesday.

But their push for a party-line vote on Alito signals another prize in this week's confirmation debate: a possible takeover of the Senate in next fall's elections.

While liberal groups critical to the the Democratic base are disappointed with the probable confirmation of Judge Alito, Democrats are eager to mount an aggressive rhetorical case heading into this week's final vote - and coming midterm elections.

"This is a nomination that threatens the rights and liberties of Americans now and for generations to come," said Sen. Patrick Leahy (D) of Vermont, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee in his opening salvo against the nominee Tuesday. On a 10-8 party-line vote, the panel voted to send the Alito nomination to the full Senate.

Senator Leahy was one of 22 Democrats who voted to confirm John Roberts as chief justice in September. In a far more contentious confirmation, 11 Democrats voted with Republicans to confirm Clarence Thomas to the Supreme Court in 1991. The vote to confirm Mr. Alito is expected to draw even fewer Democratic votes.

So far, the only Democrat to publicly back Alito is Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska. Six Democrats who voted for Justice Roberts have already announced their opposition to Alito.

In a week billed as a "prebuttal" of the president's State of the Union Address Jan. 31, Democrats are rallying around a few key themes: privacy rights, civil rights, and the dangers of unchecked presidential power.

"We'll use the debate to set the bar for the president's [speech] and set some themes for the 2006 elections," says Senate Democratic spokesman Jim Manley.

As President Bush takes his case for domestic eavesdropping without a warrant to the American people in a series of events this week, Democrats are using the Alito debate to raise objections. Before voting Tuesday, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary panel zeroed in on Alito's statements in support of executive powers, especially in a time of war.

"In times of constitutional crisis, the Supreme Court can tell the executive it has gone too far, and require it to obey the law," said Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, another Democrat who voted for Roberts but who opposes Alito. "Yet Judge Alito's record and testimony strongly suggest that he would do what he has done for much of his 15 years on the bench: defer to the executive branch in case after case at the expense of individual rights."

For the small army of interest groups opposing the nomination, the Democrats' war of words falls short of the all-out battle they had expected. Some say they still hope Democrats will mount a filibuster against the nomination, which requires 60 votes to break. Republicans have 55 votes in the 100-member Senate.

"Many of these Democrats ran on the promise to fight with any means possible to bar someone like Samuel Alito," says Jonathan Turley, a law professor at George Washington University. "Yet, the Democrats could not even field their members to a filibuster. That will leave a view with many Democratic voters that the current Democratic leadership is ineffectual."

In a preemptive move to break a possible filibuster, Senate Republicans have threatened a change in Senate rules that would ban that option in the case of judicial nominations. Last May, a bipartisan group of 14 senators agreed to vote against either a filibuster or a rule change in a bid to defuse the crisis.

Republicans say Alito is one of the most highly qualified judges ever to come before the Senate and should be confirmed. "Many of Judge Alito's detractors oppose his nomination simply because he will not promise to impose a liberal agenda from the bench," said Sen. John Cornyn (R) of Texas, before Tuesday's vote.

Fixes Considered For 'Broken' Supreme Court Confirmation Process (FOX)

By Jane Roh

Fox News, January 25, 2006

Samuel Alito's elevation to the U.S. Supreme Court is nearly a foregone conclusion despite serious misgivings about him by Democrats and, reportedly, a few moderate Republicans. But that hasn't stopped a partisan fight from casting an unflattering light on the judiciary confirmation process as a whole.

The Senate Judiciary Committee confirmed Alito Tuesday on a 10-8 party-line vote. Most notably lacking in the panel tally was any suspense surrounding where its members would come down. Even a one-week delay in the committee vote failed to whip up any further mystery surrounding the outcome.

Few additional surprises are expected during the full Senate debate, which was beginning Wednesday. A final vote on the nominee could come as early as Friday and again is expected to split down party lines.

After the confirmation hearing for Alito wrapped up on Jan. 13, Delaware Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden, who voted by proxy against Alito because he is abroad monitoring Wednesday's Palestinian election, called the system "broken." At least one Republican who backs Alito's confirmation agreed with Biden's assessment.

"I find myself tending to agree a little bit with Senator Biden, who questioned whether such a process really has a meaningful purpose," Texas Republican Sen. John Cornyn said just before announcing his vote for Alito on Tuesday. "I don't think the hearings should be a place to dump one's political or ideological outbox."

That description largely fit the Alito hearing, and to a lesser degree, the one for Chief Justice John Roberts in September, observers say. During the Alito hearing, many Democratic senators spent more time discussing how they would have voted in legal disputes and their thoughts about Princeton University, Alito's alma mater, than actually asking Alito questions — ostensibly the reason for the hearing.

Republican senators weren't particularly inquisitive either, opting instead to extol Alito as a serious-minded, intellectually gifted jurist who is "not a racist."

As a result, critics say, the public did not learn anything more about the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals judge than they would have by reading the numerous opinions he authored in 15 years on the bench. Not learning more, they say, may be all but built into the process.

"What this has done is set a new standard of evasiveness," said Richard Davis, author of "Electing Justice: Fixing the Supreme Court Nomination Process." "That will obviously give heart to White Houses in the future: It is possible to get by the Senate."

Davis, who teaches political science at Brigham Young University, said the most fundamental arguments against holding hearings is that it is almost universally agreed upon that judges' personal views should not affect their jurisprudence and judges should not forecast how they would vote on specific issues.

In fact, the late William H. Rehnquist initially refused to sit through the hearing process when he was nominated to be elevated from associate justice to chief justice of the United States.

"He said, 'Look, I have this record, I've been on the court for 14 years,'" Davis said. "One could make the same argument for federal judges like Samuel Alito."

Observers add that once questions regarding a nominee's personal views or hypothetical cases that may one day reach the court are taken off the table, not much is left to discuss.

"The nominees have learned not to say very much. They've simply learned in the wake of Bork — and now they go through murder boards that have them rehearse every possible question — they've learned to say relatively bland or banal things that don't give away very much," said Perry Dane, professor at Rutgers School of Law and one-time clerk for the late Justice William Brennan.

The highly political nature of the confirmation process has caused administrations to be extra cautious about their nominees because fumbles and surprises do occur, as evidenced by Justice Clarence Thomas, withdrawn Bush nominee Harriet Miers and rejected candidate Robert Bork, whose failed nomination is viewed as a playbook of "don'ts" for subsequent nominees.

"No nominee to the Supreme Court can answer the questions the senators most want answered," said Dennis J. Hutchinson of the University of Chicago School of Law.

That prudence translates into snoozes for both the hearings and the nominees. Lacking the congenital twinkle of Roberts, who many say charmed the senators as much as demonstrated his intellect, Alito was left to rely on his encyclopedic memory and scholarly dexterity.

"What goes on at the hearings is not particularly well-correlated with a judge's actual job description. Judges spend most of their time writing and thinking, and to the extent they play a public role, they are asking questions rather than answering them," Dane said.

"This is the same dilemma we get into with political candidates: the best leaders are not necessarily the best debaters and the best judges are not necessarily the ones who will perform the best in a hearing," he added.

Dane said based on the current debate over nominees and executive branch efforts to find irreproachable candidates, voters should not expect to see many more personalities like the humorously grouchy Antonin Scalia or the feisty John Paul Stevens in the court's future.

"There is this tendency to pick people who are going to do themselves the least damage at the hearings and to avoid people who might be more interesting," Dane said.

A Constitutional Solution?

"Any nominee coming up here is so coached the process can't work very well," Biden told Newsweek after Alito's confirmation hearing. He suggested doing away with hearings entirely and just holding a full Senate floor debate.

But defenders of committee hearings say they can be useful, even if only in a just-in-case kind of way.

"We have to wait and see what sort of justices the recent appointees turn out to be and where they take the Supreme Court and the country before we can say the process is broken," said Michael Comiskey, author of "Seeking Justices: The Judging of Supreme Court Nominees."

"It is useful to confirm what you thought you already knew. We sometimes do learn new things about their constitutional philosophies, although we didn't in this case," he said.

While Democratic committee members Edward Kennedy and Charles Schumer were assailed by the right for questioning Alito's integrity, strict scrutiny is called for when the stakes are so high, Comiskey told FOXNews.com. Such pointed questions would likely get lost in the cacophony of a floor debate.

"We are seeing a turning point in the court. You had to believe certain things in order to rise up in the political ranks in the Reagan Justice Department," he said, referring to both Roberts' and Alito's allegiance during their time in that administration. "With [Justice Sandra Day] O'Connor's seat now going to Alito, we're going to see a big change."

O'Connor, who was nominated by the late President Reagan, has been a crucial swing vote on culture war issues like access to abortion, affirmative action and separation of church and state. The retiring justice has also shown skepticism toward the Bush administration's use of the War on Terror to defend its executive power claims.

While whittling down the process to just floor debates may seem a more attractive option, senators need to get over their curiosity about nominees' personal views, Hutchinson said. Instead, scrutinize the nominee's record and debate it.

"When the Senate tries to use job applications and club memberships as proxies for the nominee's views, they almost by definition trivialize the stakes of the inquiry," he said, referring to Alito's membership in a controversial Princeton alumni group and a job application he submitted to the Reagan Justice Department.

And as much as this may fall on deaf ears on Capitol Hill, committee members need to ignore interest groups, many observers agree.

"What [the abortion issue has] done is galvanize interest groups on the both the left and the right, who view Roe v. Wade and abortion as an accessible and profound symbol of the role of government and of the definition of their party," Hutchinson said. "Senators who rely on interest groups as part of their base are beholden in various ways to those groups, and that just automatically creates a polarized process, about which the nominee can say nothing substantial and shouldn't."

"I think abortion fatigue has set in," Comiskey added.

It seems unlikely that the founders, who could not have imagined the advent of television, would have foreseen the judicial confirmation process they envisioned become so partisan or political. But supporters of the current nominee, who reject the use of the filibuster now permitted by Senate rules, may think differently if Democrats take back the White House and Congress.

"For the long-term health of our constitutional system, wouldn't it help to have something that is somewhat more attuned to really trying to get judges who are simply excellent with less care about their ideology?" Dane asked.

Dane proposed that lawmakers look at states that rely on special nominating committees comprising prominent lawyers and legal scholars. In 23 states and the District of Columbia, nominating committees work with the governor in appointing judges to courts of last resort, according to the American Judicature Society. Only eight states rely on partisan elections for their highest courts.

Dane also suggested depriving presidents of their winner-takes-all approach to reshaping the court. Acknowledging the nation's reluctance to tinker with the Constitution, he said he would rather see a system of justice-designates that automatically fill seats as they open up. The emphasis on qualifications would trump ideological bent because presidents and senators would have no idea in advance who was going to be replaced.

Any changes to the system have little chance of occurring as long as the American public remains uninterested in the process, as they seem to have been with Alito, critics add.

"You could say they tuned it out because of what was being offered them," said Ruben Navarrette, syndicated columnist with The Washington Post Writers Group. "So much of this is about feeding the egos of these men and one woman on the panel, who are bright and want to show us all how bright they are."

But, he added, "it is our responsibility and it begins on Election Day."

Casey Announces Endorsement Of Alito (AP)

By KIMBERLY HEFLING, The Associated Press

AP, January 24, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Sen. Rick Santorum's leading Democratic challenger, Pennsylvania Treasurer Bob Casey, announced Tuesday that he endorses Judge Samuel Alito's confirmation to the Supreme Court.

For weeks, Republicans have called Casey "Silent Bob" and pressed him to say whether he supports Alito's confirmation. Casey and Alito have a family connection because Alito, who serves on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals based in Philadelphia, sided with Casey's father, the late Gov. Bob Casey, in Planned Parenthood v. Casey. The case challenged a state law requiring women seeking abortions to notify their spouses.

"I do not agree with everything that Judge Samuel Alito has done or said — particularly many of his rulings which too often result in corporate power prevailing over the interests of consumers and workers," Casey said in a statement. "However, I agree with The Philadelphia Inquirer and Washington Post editorial boards that the arguments against Judge Alito do not rise to the level that would require a vote denying him a seat on the U.S. Supreme Court."

Santorum's campaign manager responded with a statement accusing Casey of ducking the issue and then following the lead of Santorum, the No. 3 Senate Republican. Both candidates are generally against abortion. Santorum came out strong in support of Alito at a conservative rally Jan. 8.

Alito on Tuesday won narrow approval along strict party lines from the Senate Judiciary Committee, with all Republicans supporting him and the Democrats opposed. He still must be confirmed by the full Senate.

Larry Smar, a Casey spokesman, said the treasurer wanted time to examine Alito's background. The focus on Alito was an attempt by the Santorum campaign to distract from other issues, Smar said.

Casey's endorsement came shortly after Gov. Ed Rendell said Tuesday during a news conference in Washington that he reluctantly supports Alito's confirmation. Smar said the timing was a coincidence.

The Planned Parenthood v. Casey decision was overturned in 1992 by the Supreme Court, but justices did give states new powers to make it more difficult for women to end their pregnancies. Alito defended the ruling at his Senate confirmation hearing.

Dem Senate Challengers Would Reject Samuel Alito (HILL)

By David Mikhail And Andrew Barr

None of the Democrats challenging incumbent Republican senators in competitive midterm races has said they would vote to confirm Judge Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court.

While Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. received support from a majority of such challengers, the Democrats offer a striking contrast on Alito. Even though these Senate hopefuls will not have a say in the upcoming floor vote, political observers are closely tracking their public comments on the controversial nominee.

The question of whether to confirm Alito is politically difficult for Democrats running in red states. If they reject Alito, the candidates open themselves to obstruction criticisms. If they support Alito, they could alienate political donors.

All Democratic candidates surveyed by The Hill who answered definitively said they would vote against Alito, who would replace centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. The remaining candidates either provided no comment or did not respond.

Sen. Ben Nelson (Neb.) is the only Senate Democrat to speak out in favor of Alito.

Todd Gaziano, director for the Center for Legal and Judiciary Studies at the Heritage Foundation, said the lack of Democratic support for Alito is a function of candidates' securing campaign contributions from liberal donors as "Howard Dean candidates."

Sean Rushton, executive director with the Committee for Justice, said that Democratic challengers are following the lead of many Senate Democrats who decided to support Roberts and reject Alito in an effort to appear fair-minded. Rushton added that the judicial philosophies of Roberts and Alito were "almost indistinguishable."

Jonathan Turley, professor of law at George Washington University Law School and an outspoken opponent of Alito, said Alito's hard-right stance — specifically on abortion and presidential power — would remind voters in November of his confirmation, making him "the political gift that keeps on giving" for Democrats.

A spokesperson for Claire McCaskill, who is challenging Sen. James Talent (R-Mo.), said McCaskill is opposed to the Alito confirmation.

In a press release, McCaskill said, "Missourians want their senator to be an independent voice for their concerns, not a rubber stamp for the administration."

McCaskill said, however, that she would oppose a Senate filibuster. Last year she said she would have voted for Roberts had she been in the upper chamber.

A spokesperson for Pennsylvania Treasurer Bob Casey Jr., who is looking to unseat Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), said that Casey has not yet announced his position. Casey, an opponent of abortion rights, spoke out in favor of the Roberts nomination.

The Democrats seeking to challenge Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) are rejecting Alito.

Carl Frisch, a spokesman for Democratic candidate Paul Hackett, said that Alito is out of the mainstream and that his views on equality and corporate governance are unfit for the court.

A spokesperson for Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio), who is vying with Hackett to face DeWine, said Brown would vote against Alito if given the opportunity.

Two candidates looking to unseat Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), Rhode Island Secretary of State Matt Brown and former state Attorney General Sheldon Whitehouse, have released statements on their opposition to Alito's confirmation.

Brown described Alito as a “right-wing ideologue” and spoke of the importance of standing up against the confirmation. Whitehouse called on Chafee “to stand by a promise he made in 2000 to oppose any Supreme Court nominee who would put a women’s right to choose at risk and to filibuster.”

Chafee, whose reelection this year has been endorsed by NARAL Pro-Choice America, has not announced how he will vote on Alito.

Jon Tester and John Morrison, both challenging Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), have said they oppose the confirmation of Alito. Specifically addressing Alito’s failure to recuse himself in cases involving Vanguard Properties, through which Alito owned mutual funds, Tester said, “Alito is not a man of his word.”

Rep. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who is vying for the seat of retiring Sen. Jim Jeffords (I-Vt.), said that Alito would move the court “in a direction that this country should not be going.”

Turley predicted that the confirmation vote will be extremely close, much closer than the 78-22 vote confirming Roberts. But others said that the vote will not be a nail-biter and that Alito is heading to passage by a comfortable margin.

Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.), who is running for the Senate seat held by Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and supported Roberts’s confirmation, did not respond to a request for comment.

Others not responding included Rep. Ed Case (D-Hawaii), who is challenging Sen. Daniel Akaka (D-Hawaii) in a primary, and Jim Pederson, who is running against Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.).

Pulling Rank (NYT)

By John R. Lott Jr.

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

Washington

REPUBLICAN senators have found a new friend during judicial confirmations: the American Bar Association. During the confirmation hearings of John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr., the senators invoked A.B.A. evaluations to ward off Democratic attacks - including in yesterday's vote by the Senate Judiciary Committee sending Judge Alito's nomination to the full Senate. But this tactic is shortsighted: what works now may make it difficult for Republicans to credibly reject A.B.A. ratings when they really matter.

The bar association has liberal views on issues from abortion rights to gun control, but it has always claimed that a high wall separates its evaluations from its policy positions.

Yet the bar association's liberal bias on its evaluations is there for all to see. Academics rank the influence of judges by how frequently other federal judges cite their opinions. Among serving United States Court of Appeals jurists, the three outstanding judges are Richard A. Posner, Frank H. Easterbrook and J. Harvie Wilkinson III. By the citations yardstick, these three judges, especially Judge Posner and Judge Easterbrook, wield unrivaled influence. But all three were Reagan appointees, and when they were nominated, the A.B.A. gave them the lowest possible ratings, "qualified/not qualified." From Jimmy Carter through George W. Bush's first term, it rated 89 percent of Court of Appeals nominees more highly.

These cases, while extreme, were not unique. I recently completed a study of A.B.A. ratings, analyzing the 342 circuit court and 1,215 district court nominees from 1977 through 2004 to see whether A.B.A. ratings were politically biased after taking into account factors like nominees' schools; whether they served on law review; clerked for different courts; had already been judges; their race, gender and age; publications; and how many years and in what types of positions they served as lawyers. Surveys of lawyers who argued before the judges by The Almanac of the Federal Judiciary also allowed me to examine the relationship between A.B.A. ratings and professional competence, judicial temperament and political bias.

While Democratic Court of Appeals nominees who were clerks on the Supreme Court had an average rating of slightly below "well qualified," similar Republican nominees were rated on average as only "qualified/well qualified." Likewise, of nominees who attended Top 10 law schools and served on their law reviews, Democrats had an average rating as "well qualified/qualified," but Republican nominees were only "qualified/well qualified." Overall, Republican nominees had lower ratings than the nominees of either President Carter or President Clinton.

Moreover, the A.B.A. rating system was a poor guide to how judges will do once they are on the bench. According to The Almanac of the Federal Judiciary's lawyer survey, judges who had "good" judicial temperament got lower A.B.A. ratings than judges whom lawyers rated as only "fair."

The A.B.A. didn't give all Republicans low ratings. They saved the lowest ratings for when there was a Republican president and a Democratic Senate, when the nominations were most likely to be contested.

For the Supreme Court, a similar pattern exits. So in the cases of Judge Alito and Justice Roberts, the A.B.A. is staying true to form. There's no reason to give a low rating to a nominee when a Republican majority will pretty much assure his confirmation.

But what will Senate Republicans say when Democrats use A.B.A. ratings against them?

Bush Considering Tax Breaks For Health Care Workers Who Must Buy Coverage May Be Aided, Economic Adviser Says (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush is weighing proposals for new tax breaks for health care costs, which will be a major topic of next week's State of the Union address, a top economic adviser to the president said Tuesday.

"People are very, very frustrated about the cost of health care," said Allan Hubbard, director of the National Economic Council.

Hubbard told reporters at USA TODAY and Gannett News Service that the tax code offers advantages when a company buys health coverage for its employees but doesn't do the same for employees who have to buy coverage on their own.

"The president's very concerned about the unfairness of the tax code," Hubbard said.

Bush himself has discussed some other health care ideas, including expansion of health savings accounts, which are tax-free savings accounts that can be used for medical expenses.

Bush has also talked about providing consumers with more information about medical costs, to enable them to be better shoppers. "Do you realize the medical field is one where you don't do any comparative shopping?" the president asked the crowd last week during an event in Virginia.

Hubbard said Bush will discuss that topic, but he declined to say whether Bush would propose that the government require doctors to post their fees, or simply encourage patients to ask.

"I'm going to let the president talk about exactly how this should happen," he said.

Hubbard said Bush will also devote part of Tuesday's speech to higher energy prices and the rising costs of entitlement programs such as Medicare and Social Security.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said the administration's health care approach does not address the increasing numbers of uninsured Americans, or problems with Medicare's new prescription-drug plan.

"Its health proposals will fatten the bank accounts of HMOs and the drug industry, and lavish more tax giveaways on the wealthy," Kennedy said.

In recent appearances, Bush has indicated he will revive past health care proposals. They include allowing businesses to pool their health insurance costs across state boundaries and restricting what Bush calls "junk lawsuits" that drive up medical costs.

The president and aides will also promote health insurance "portability" in an increasingly mobile society. "People should be able to leave their jobs and keep their insurance," Hubbard said.

Bush has cited portability as a reason for expanding health savings accounts. One idea, according to Hubbard, is to increase the amount of money that can be deposited in a tax-free health account.

A presidential commission on tax law changes suggested last year that the administration consider taxing employer-provided health benefits.

That idea has been rejected, Hubbard said, and Bush is not expected to spend much time on ways to overhaul the tax code.

"Tax reform is not off the table," Hubbard said. "At the same time, it doesn't have the priority that health care does right now."

New Tax Breaks For Medical Expenses (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

President Bush will propose that Americans be allowed to take tax deductions on more of their out-of pocket medical expenses, as part of an initiative the White House believes will rein in soaring health costs by shifting responsibility toward individuals, according to congressional and other sources familiar with the administration's thinking.

The new tax breaks for personal health spending, to be included in the 2007 budget Bush will release in less than two weeks, are designed to help the uninsured and to allow people with insurance to write off a greater portion of the money they spend on co-payments, deductibles and care that is not covered. Under current tax rules, people can deduct medical expenses only if they exceed 7.5 percent of their adjusted gross income.

The president also plans to call for an expansion of health savings accounts, an idea long favored by conservatives and approved by Congress slightly more than two years ago, in which people who buy bare-bones insurance policies are allowed to put money into tax-free accounts for their medical expenses.

In addition, Bush intends to propose changes to allow people to keep their insurance, without extra cost, if they change jobs or decide to start a business, building on a decade-old law that was designed to make health coverage more "portable."

The three proposals -- and possibly others -- are part of a renewed effort by the White House to tackle medical costs, a theme that administration officials said yesterday Bush intends to emphasize in his State of the Union address next week. The health initiative also represents one of the few areas in which the president will try to create new domestic policies through what he and aides have said will be an austere budget.

Part of the initiative recycles proposals that the White House could not push through Congress, including tighter limits on medical malpractice lawsuits and changes that would allow small businesses to band together to buy insurance in ways that bypass state insurance rules.

But the new components would propel the nation's health care system in a direction that many Republicans and business groups embrace: lightening the burden of insurance cost on employers to some degree, while creating financial incentives for individual patients to restrict how much care and medicine they use.

Even before most people on Capitol Hill learn of the proposals, several senior congressional aides and health policy experts predicted yesterday that Bush may have a difficult time winning support. They said that fiscal conservatives may balk at the expense, and that many Democrats will argue the changes are inadequate for poor people, who are most likely to be uninsured.

White House officials would not confirm the decision to allow tax breaks on consumer health spending, and it remains unclear how large a deduction the president envisions.

In an interview yesterday, however, Allan B. Hubbard, director of the White House's National Economic Council, said the current system is flawed because it gives employers tax deductions for the health insurance they buy for workers, but no similar tax preferences for people who buy coverage because their company does not provide it.

"That's not fair. It's really almost backwards," Hubbard said. He said that inconsistency concerns Bush, adding: "Normally, when he's got concerns, he tries to find solutions."

Hubbard said Americans are not as careful consumers of health care as they are in shopping for other services, because insurance masks from them much of the cost. He said the price and quality of health care would improve if consumers were given greater financial incentives and had to decide for themselves how much care they really need.

The idea of tax breaks for out-of-pocket medical expenses is borrowed from a recent book by three academics, including two with whom Hubbard has close ties: R. Glenn Hubbard, a former chairman under Bush of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, and John F. Cogan, a White House economic adviser when Ronald Reagan was president. Their book, "Healthy, Wealthy & Wise," calls for all such spending to become tax-deductible. The authors estimate that the revision in tax law would cost $28 billion a year when phased in completely, although they predict much of that lost revenue would be regained through ripple effects the change would create in the health care system.

Several outside health policy experts, both Democrat and Republican, speculated yesterday that the president is unlikely to make such a large financial commitment at a time when the administration has pledged to halve a $400 billion budget deficit during the next several years. Joseph R. Antos, a scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, predicted that Bush will "open this particular door. But how far does it open? We'll see."

An administration official, speaking anonymously because he was not authorized to discuss the budget in advance, said Bush is focused on both the deficit and medical costs. "He feels . . . there may need to be some additional investment to deal with the cost" of health care, the official said. "The overall gain, not only to the federal budget but the family budget, is worth that."

Allan Hubbard said Bush also thinks the government has not done enough to help people keep insurance when they change jobs. Under a law passed in 1996, an insurer may not penalize people who change jobs -- by charging them more because of preexisting medical problems -- as long as they began a new job within about two months. Hubbard said the protection should be extended to include people who take longer before they begin a new job or who go to work for themselves.

Hubbard also said "it would not surprise me" if Bush proposes to expand health savings accounts, although Hubbard would not describe the changes the White House would like.

Business Likes Bush's Healthcare Hints (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

DOJ_NMG_0011579

Big business interests are prepared to back up President Bush's expected call to make healthcare legislation a priority in the coming legislative year.

Facing escalating costs and aging populations of workers and retirees, large employers are seeking policies that would enable them to limit their future healthcare spending while allowing them to avoid dropping expensive health benefits altogether. The small-business community also favors legislation that would make it less pricey to provide employees health coverage.

Bush has made healthcare a central topic in recent public remarks and highlighted the issue in his weekly radio address Saturday. Observers in lobbying and elsewhere have interpreted the president's emphasis on healthcare as a preview of his State of the Union address scheduled for Tuesday.

The healthcare priorities of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, for example, "align almost completely with the recent speeches the president has given," said Bruce Josten, the Chamber's executive vice president for government affairs.

The Business Roundtable's legislative agenda for the year also resonates with the signals coming out of the White House. CEOs representing the Roundtable are planning one of their quarterly visits to Washington Feb. 8, spokeswoman Tita Freeman said, adding that the cost of health benefits will be a major topic of discussion this year.

"We've been extremely vocal," said Maria Ghazal, the Roundtable's director of public policy. "We've had numerous visits with the House and Senate and the White House" already, she added. Other business-sector interest groups, such as the National Federation of Independent Business, have similar aims, she said.

Particularly appealing to business interests are proposals to increase the allure of health savings accounts (HSAs), tax-free vehicles created to encourage people to set aside money for their medical expenses. In a recent radio address, Bush said, "This year, I will ask Congress to take steps to make these accounts more available, more affordable and more portable."

The proposals that might emerge this year likely will focus on providing additional tax incentives, such as exemptions for the cost of the high-deductible health-insurance plans people must buy in conjunction with the accounts. Some lobbyists also are eyeing increases in the limit on how much an employer or employee can put in the account each year.

HSAs, described by advocates as "consumer directed" healthcare, would work to address the concerns of the business community about their open-ended commitments to health benefits in the future, according to Neil Trautwein, assistant vice president of the National Association of Manufacturers.

A central component of consumer-directed healthcare is to make employees more aware of, and more responsible for, rising costs, thereby "making individuals better healthcare consumers," Ghazal said.

Critics, including most congressional Democrats, decry this approach as a simple attempt to pass along high healthcare costs to workers. HSAs and other health benefits make employees more vulnerable to high medical expenses without expanding coverage to many of the approximately 39 million people without health insurance, opponents contend.

Josten said that employers are moving in this direction regardless. "It's ultimately inevitable," he said, because companies will not continue devoting more of their resources to health benefits.

The desire for more access to HSAs represents a sea change much like that which continues to replace traditional pensions with 401(k) plans, Josten said. The interest in consumer-directed healthcare is part of the same "movement by companies away from defined-benefit offerings" and toward those for which employers can reliably predict their future spending.

These market-based healthcare reforms also could appeal to the segment of the Republican Party most dissatisfied with the Bush administration's last major foray into healthcare legislation, the Medicare prescription-drug benefit.

"It's pretty hard to deny that there's a bad taste left in a lot of lawmakers' mouths" about the Medicare bill, remarked Pete Sepp, vice president of communications for the National Taxpayers Union. "The HSAs were about the only valuable thing in the rotten Medicare drug bill."

Language in the Medicare bill created HSAs in their present form. At the time, a number of congressional Republicans indicated that the HSA provisions provided them with consolation while voting for a large expansion of a federal entitlement program.

Fiscal conservatives may still be dissatisfied with the Medicare expansion, but "HSAs certainly fit with their philosophy," said Mary Grealy, president of a coalition of healthcare CEOs called the Healthcare Leadership Council. "I think the environment for doing something on HSAs … is probably a little more favorable than a lot of people think," she said.

Proposals foreshadowed by Bush closely resemble legislation sponsored last year by prominent conservative Republicans such as Reps. Eric Cantor (Va.) and John Shadegg (Ariz.).

In the Senate, Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee Chairman Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) is preparing to move ahead on some of the White House's agenda, a spokesman said. "I wouldn't expect him to echo everything the president says, ... [but] we do expect to be supportive in a number of areas," the spokesman added.

For example, Enzi has been seeking Democratic support for legislation that would enable small employers to form large groups to buy health insurance. Legislation to create the so-called association, or small-business, health plans has stalled in the

Senate because it would circumvent state laws that guarantee the availability of certain health benefits and limit how much insurers can raise premiums.

A Blueprint For Health-care Freedom (WT)

By Michael F. Cannon

The Washington Times, January 25, 2006

The White House has been dropping hints that the president will make health-care reform the centerpiece of his State of the Union address. The Bush administration's health care record is, to put it delicately, inconsistent. It has supported efforts to remove government influence over the health care sector, such as health savings accounts (HSAs). On the other hand, the president signed into law the largest expansion of federal power over health care in generations the ill-fated Medicare drug program.

So in an attempt to help the administration straighten up and fly right, here's my health policy wish list for the State of the Union.

1. Propose "large HSAs." Federal tax laws encourage workers to surrender control over their health care to their employer. Among other things, that means that most people lose their health insurance when they leave a job.

HSAs give some of that control back to workers. Workers and their employer make tax-free contributions into an HSA, which covers out-of-pocket medical expenses. But workers are required to purchase catastrophic coverage, with deductibles in the neighborhood of $1,000 to $5,000. For many, that makes HSAs downright unappealing.

The president should propose using HSAs to give workers control over all their health-care dollars. First, nearly all workers and employers should be allowed to deposit the entire amount they are now spending on health benefits into a "large HSA." Then, workers should be allowed (but not required) to use their HSA funds to purchase a health plan of their choosing, from their employer or any other source. Large HSAs would allow a worker to purchase the coverage she wants rather than what politicians or employers think she should have and that stays with her when she leaves her job. Large HSAs would also increase competition among insurers, and make health care more affordable for workers who cannot obtain coverage, either because they are too sick or too poor.

2. Push hard for interstate commerce in health insurance. A big reason that health insurance is so expensive is over-regulation by the states and the fact that each state forbids you to buy insurance from carriers in another state. The Congressional Budget Office estimates some state regulations increase insurance premiums by as much as 15 percent.

The Constitution allows Congress to remove such interstate trade barriers. The president already supports legislation (sponsored by Rep. John Shadegg and Sen. Jim DeMint) that would allow individuals and employers to purchase insurance from states where regulatory costs are lower. He should push Congress hard to give purchasers that freedom now.

3. Avoid further expansions of federal power. There is no shortage of people who argue that health-care markets would work better if only we gave the federal government more power. They want taxpayer dollars to create electronic medical records. Or they want to require health-care providers to furnish price and quality information. Or they want Washington to make decisions that belong to the states, including health insurance regulation (read: "association health plans") and medical malpractice reform.

The president should explain that markets will deliver conveniences like electronic medical records and price and quality information just as soon as government stops monkeying with market incentives. And he should explain that expanding federal power at the expense of states is improper, because it limits individual freedom and the states' ability to experiment.

4. Clean up the Medicare mess. Finally, it would be nice for the president to acknowledge that the Medicare drug program that took effect this month was a huge mistake. Though the intent was to expand coverage, so far the program has caused many to lose the coverage they had, including some of the poorest and sickest seniors.

But the worst is yet to come. The Medicare drug plans will soon begin dropping drugs and pharmacies from their plans to keep the sickest seniors away. And the cost of the program, which already looks to be twice the sticker price, will continue to outstrip projections. At a minimum, the president should commit to reforming Medicare. The program's fiscal outlook is six times worse than Social Security's, and the president himself is responsible for a large part of Medicare's troubles. Absent reform, Medicare will require a tax increase equal to one-quarter of wages. It's time for the president to start thinking about his legacy, and whether he wants that type of tax increase to be a part of it.

Democrat Blasts Bush Before State Of The Union (REU)

By Donna Smith

Reuters, January 25, 2006

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid on Tuesday urged President George W. Bush to "swagger" less and show more honesty and humility in his annual State of the Union speech to the nation next week.

In a speech at a liberal think tank, Reid gave a scathing assessment of the state of the nation under Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress.

"Republicans run good campaigns, but when it comes to actually governing and protecting Americans, they have a record of incompetence," Reid told an audience at the Center for American Progress.

Reid's speech was part of an effort to lay the groundwork for the November congressional election in which Democrats hope to win control of Congress or at least shrink the Republican majority.

Reid took aim at the president's national security record, saying Bush "must unite the nation behind our most important goal -- keeping our people and way of life safe. We need to hear honesty and humility from the commander in chief, not swagger from the campaigner-in-chief."

Bush is to deliver his State of the Union address before Congress on January 31 and lay out his priorities for the year. He is expected to talk about national security and suggest expansion of tax-free "Health Savings Accounts" to help people pay medical expenses.

Reid accused Bush of making promises in past State of the Union speeches and doing the opposite. In 2003, Reid said, Bush promised not to pass the nation's current bills on to the next generation.

Noting that the government will breach the $8.184 trillion debt limit next month, Reid accused Bush of "bankrupting our country and placing an enormous tax on our children and grandchildren, simply so he can hand out tax breaks to special interests and the wealthy."

The White House has asked Congress to raise the credit limit by mid-February, saying the Treasury would have to take extraordinary measures to keep paying bills for everything from Social Security and national defense. Since 2002, Congress has raised the debt ceiling by $2.2 trillion.

Reid also urged Bush to offer a plan to fix the new Medicare prescription drug program for the elderly. Since the plan was launched on January 1, many poor and elderly people have been snagged by problems that have made it difficult for them to get their prescription costs covered.

About half of the states have stepped in to pay the costs of people who have run into problems. The drug plan relies on private insurers, pharmacies and healthcare companies to provide coverage to Medicare's 42 million beneficiaries.

Sen. Reid: Bush Should 'Come Clean' (AP)

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid urged President Bush Tuesday to "come clean" in next week's State of the Union speech and acknowledge "the costs of Republican corruption."

"In his 2000 campaign, George Bush promised to bring 'dignity' to the White House, but we've since found that he brought Jack Abramoff instead," said Reid, D-Nev. He spoke at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, in remarks previewing Democratic criticism of the presidential speech on Jan. 31.

"President Bush needs to quit stonewalling about his White House's connection to corruption, and finally tell us how he's going to reform Washington," Reid said.

Asked about the criticism, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said, "This is more of the kind of partisan attacks that we see in this city that only lower the discourse in this town."

McClellan repeated refusals to disclose details of administration contacts with Abramoff, the disgraced ex-lobbyist who has pleaded guilty to corruption charges.

"There's a difference between responding to questions like that and engaging in a fishing expedition that has nothing to do with the investigation," he said.

Reid ticked off a list of what he termed Bush failures, contending Bush policies have made the country less safe, driven up debt and increased dependence on foreign oil.

He noted problems with the newly implemented Medicare prescription drug plan. "The state of our union today is that we have seniors begging in the streets for the medicine they need," Reid said.

Reid also said Bush was "deeply dishonest" when he promised in his 2003 State of the Union not to pass along problems to future generations. Instead, younger generations will pay "so he can hand out tax breaks to special interests and the wealthy," Reid said.

The 15-minute speech was prefaced by a video showing Bush clips from past speeches followed by quotes meant to show a failure to deliver. Reid said the video showed the president "has been giving us doublespeak for years."

Reid Says Bush, GOP Corruption Hurts U.S. (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 25, 2006

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid said yesterday that President Bush and other Republicans are so corrupt they have weakened the United States.

"The Republican abuse of power comes at great cost to our country, and we can see it in the present state of our union," the Nevada Democrat said in a speech yesterday to the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. "Special interests and the well-connected have grown stronger, while our national security, our economy, our health care and our government have grown weaker."

Mr. Reid set a series of hurdles for Mr. Bush to clear in next week's State of the Union address, particularly on political-process reforms.

"In his 2000 campaign, George Bush promised to bring 'dignity' to the White House -- but we've since found that he brought Jack Abramoff instead," Mr. Reid said. "President Bush needs to quit stonewalling about his White House's connection to corruption and finally tell us how he's going to reform Washington."

While most of the charges about Abramoff seem to center on Congress, Mr. Reid said the president has his own problems -- including charges against Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff and the arrest of David Safavian, who ran the Office of Federal Procurement Policy.

At the White House, press secretary Scott McClellan said the remarks were "more of the kind of partisan attacks that we see in this city."

He said that Abramoff, the lobbyist who has pleaded guilty to corruption charges, "has contributed to both Democrats and Republicans alike, whether it was directly or indirectly."

And Tracey Schmitt, the Republican National Committee's press secretary, said Mr. Reid mischaracterized the president's record "in an effort to score cheap political points."

Mr. Reid directly challenged Republicans' national-security credentials -- the one issue where Republicans believe they run the strongest.

"Republicans run good campaigns, but when it comes to actually governing and protecting Americans, they have a record of incompetence," he said.

Mr. Reid said he was trying to lay out a framework for what Mr. Bush must do next week in his State of the Union address, including explaining a path to success in Iraq, acknowledging the nation's poor fiscal state and finding a plan "to fix his bait-and-switch Medicare [prescription] drug program."

"We need to hear honesty and humility from the commander in chief, not swagger from the campaigner in chief," Mr. Reid said.

Frist Nixes Reid On Agenda Plan (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, January 25, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) rejected an expected demand by Senate Democrats late Tuesday that the GOP leader postpone consideration of asbestos legislation in favor of their lobbying reform bill, arguing in a letter to Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) that “to postpone debate on this issue is to blatantly ignore a very real problem” and accusing Reid of wanting to “kill this bipartisan legislation that ensures victims are better compensated.”

Subsequently, Democratic aides said that Reid no longer expects to make a formal request.

The pre-emptive attack, a senior GOP aide said Tuesday, is the first offensive maneuver orchestrated by Frist’s message operation, which is winkingly called the “peace room” as a contrast to Reid’s “war room.”

The aide said Frist hopes that such message tactics will allow Republicans “to be more flexible and adaptive as we move on ahead, both on offense and refuting spurious and scurrilous Democratic claims.”

According to the letter, Frist said he decided to move forward with the pre-emptive rejection following a Tuesday story in Roll Call that outlines Reid’s plan to release a Democratic Caucus letter today demanding that the asbestos bill be set aside in favor of ethics reform.

“I have read with interest press reports that tomorrow you will ask me to put aside early Senate action on bipartisan asbestos reform in order to immediately begin action on lobbying reform,” Frist wrote in the letter.

In the letter, Frist also chides Reid for seeking a quick resolution to the ethics issue, arguing that while "I acted before anyone else in Congress to commit us to pass bipartisan lobbying reform ... I expect the Senate to pass a thorough and comprehensive lobby reform bill early this year that is done right and well, not fast and foolish."

A Reid spokeswoman denounced Frist's decision to stick with his previous schedule as bad policy and said Reid continues to oppose the bill. "Having asbestos as the first bill up shows Bill Frist's misplaced priorities. Sen. Reid is strongly opposed to the bill," the spokeswoman said.

The decision to formally begin operations of the peace room also stems from Frist's desire to demonstrate that the GOP leadership is responding the desire of many Republican Senators "for a crisper and firmer caucus, prepared to act to stand up on behalf of what it believes in," a Senate Republican said.

The GOP aide acknowledged that Frist's letter represents a departure from Frist's normally calculated and carefully thought-out responses to Democrats' message salvos. Although Republicans will continue to push their agenda in a positive light, the aide said, "the novelty is that we are pre-acting to Reid's misbehavior."

Republicans said that Frist will continue to take a notably more aggressive approach to the perennial message war with Democrats — a stance that is clear in the language used in the asbestos letter.

For instance, Frist closes the letter with a direct attack on Reid's motives in seeking a delay of the asbestos bill, saying "Don't put the future at risk with partisan, obstructionist tactics."

While Frist is expected to pick his shots as the message operation develops, Republicans hope that the new muscular approach to fighting Reid will put Democrats back on the defensive and open the minority Party to more traditional GOP charges of obstructionism and a lack of a positive Democratic agenda.

"Not everything deserves a response," the aide said. "The uniform negativity of the Democrats will end up punching them in the jaw, with no solutions, no ideas, nothing but whining and complaining to offer as their agenda."

US To Help Reimburse States For Medicare Drugs (REU-Y2)

By Susan Heavey

Reuters, January 25, 2006

The federal government will help reimburse states that have been paying for prescription drugs after glitches with Medicare's new benefit left many patients stranded, U.S. health officials said on Tuesday.

Since the program began three weeks ago, enrollment problems have left hundreds of thousands of Medicare's elderly and disabled caught without coverage for their medications. More than half of the states stepped in to pay for them, but not without calling for reimbursement.

Mark McClellan, head of the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services (CMS), said states should first seek reimbursement from health insurers and other companies offering the plans. But if states paid out more than they can get back, Medicare will pay the difference, he said.

"We'll reimburse states for the drug costs and the administrative costs they have incurred in their systems during this transition period for certain people," McClellan told reporters in a conference call. He added the agency would make sure companies repay states.

McClellan called on states to stop paying for the drugs by February 15 and allow Medicare to take over, although some states could get an extension.

"States that work with us ... will be reimbursed," he said.

Patients most affected are the 6 million who are also enrolled in Medicaid, which covers the poor. Many were either not enrolled properly or were automatically signed up with a plan that did not cover their particular medication.

It's not clear how many millions of dollars the roughly 25 states and Washington, D.C. have spent so far.

Several governors and state organizations welcomed the announcement.

"I'm pleased that the federal government has agreed to reimburse us for the total cost of providing a safety net while the new program's issues are worked out," said Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich, a Democrat.

Martha Roherty, director National Association of State Medicaid Directors, said Medicare's plan seemed positive, but added, "It's going to come down to how it's all implemented."

Previously, McClellan had said Medicare could not pay the states under law. He did not say what had changed, but on Tuesday ruled out any need for congressional action. "We don't need legislation," he said.

Medicare's offer did not satisfy some members of Congress, mostly Democrats and a few moderate Republicans, who have been pushing legislation to force the agency to pay the states.

Medicare officials, consumer groups and other have all said they expect another spike in reported problems in May, the last month for beneficiaries to sign up without extra fees.

DOJ_NMG_0011584

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt told reporters the agency was trying to anticipate future problems.

Some critics have called on Congress to extend the enrollment period until the glitches are worked out.

Sen. Charles Grassley (news, bio, voting record), head of the Senate Committee on Finance that oversees Medicare, said postponing the deadline would not help and could lead to higher costs.

"CMS can fix these problems using its authority under the law and can do it faster than if Congress comes in and changes the law," the Iowa Republican said, adding that the committee would meet with McClellan and Leavitt on Wednesday.

Bush Troubled By Medicare Delays (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Washington

Financial Times, January 25, 2006

The Bush administration was forced to step in to mend problems with the new Medicare prescription drug programme on Tuesday, promising to reimburse states for money they have spent to provide medicine to people whose benefits were delayed.

The decision to intervene is an embarrassing setback for President George W. Bush, who has listed the programme among the primary accomplishments of his first term. But it reflects growing pressure from Republican and Democratic governors, as well as members of Congress, following reports that trouble enrolling in the programme has left hundreds of thousands of people without coverage since it took effect on January 1.

Chuck Grassley, chairman of the Senate finance committee, has called a private meeting of the panel for this morning, at which senators will be able to question Mike Leavitt, secretary of health and human services, and Mark McClellan, administrator of the federal agency that runs Medicare, the health programme for the elderly.

The prescription drug programme was enacted in 2003 and its supporters said it would help patients deal with rising healthcare costs by limiting what they pay for medicine. About 24m people have signed up for the benefit so far. Most of those who have experienced trouble with it are among the 6m people who had been covered by Medicaid, the health programme for the poor.

About two dozen states have stepped in to pay for emergency drugs this month, prompting many governors to call for reimbursement from Washington. Mr McClellan said states should go first for payment to the insurance companies administering the plans but that Medicare would cover the rest of their costs.

Conservatives in Mr Bush's party have long criticised the plan as too expensive, while Democrats see it as too friendly to insurance companies.

Harry Reid, Democratic leader in the Senate, said on Tuesday: "We need to fix Medicare – and do it now." But Mr Grassley said the implementation problems were "mainly logistical and administrative" and could be fixed without changing the law.

States' Costs To Be Repaid In Drug Plan (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 - The Bush administration said Tuesday that states would be fully reimbursed for any costs they incurred in paying claims for prescription drugs that should have been covered by the new federal Medicare program.

Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, announced the plan in response to a political furor swirling around the new Medicare drug benefit.

At least two dozen states have taken emergency action to help low-income people who could not get their medications under the program, which began Jan. 1. States are spending millions of dollars a day in such assistance.

Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said the Bush administration would use its influence to ensure that prescription drug plans - private insurers under contract to Medicare - reimbursed states for the cost of claims that the insurers should have paid.

Many states have paid more for particular drugs than private plans would have paid. Dr. McClellan said the federal government would reimburse states for the difference and would also cover any administrative costs that states had incurred in operating stopgap programs.

Mr. Leavitt said, "In cases where states have continued to pay for drugs at rates higher than what the plans would reimburse, as a function of our transition, we're going to help them cover that."

The federal government said it would reimburse states for prescription drugs dispensed to low-income Medicare beneficiaries through Feb. 15. Federal officials assume that problems in the new program will be worked out by then.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, a Republican, welcomed the promise of full reimbursement. "This is great news," he said. "The federal government is living up to its responsibility."

But the steps were not enough to satisfy some Democrats, who said the federal government should reimburse all state costs, without requiring states to dun insurers.

Gov. John Lynch of New Hampshire, a Democrat, expressed concern about the Feb. 15 deadline. "New Hampshire citizens are still having problems getting their medications through Medicare," Mr. Lynch said. "The federal government should not set a deadline until it can prove that everyone who is eligible can actually get their prescriptions."

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, said the announcement showed that Bush administration officials "are feeling the heat, are finally recognizing the crisis they created in the design and implementation of the new drug benefit."

In an interview, Ms. Clinton said the action was intended to head off legislation that would require the federal government to reimburse the states directly. "I am very skeptical that all the kinks in the new program will be worked out by Feb. 15," she added.

The chief sponsor of the legislation, Senator Frank R. Lautenberg, Democrat of New Jersey, said: "Today's announcement only makes the problem worse. First, states had to step in and spend millions to prevent the Medicare system from collapsing at the beginning of this year. Now the federal government wants the states to act as its bill collectors."

A co-author of the bill, Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, said she was pleased that the administration would compensate states for the costs of their emergency assistance programs, which she said had "averted great harm to those with limited resources."

For weeks, federal officials said they did not have authority to reimburse states. On Tuesday, they said they had discovered that they could reimburse the states by conducting a demonstration project under Section 402 of the Social Security Amendments of 1967.

Bush administration officials said they did not know how much their commitment to the states would cost. Dr. McClellan said "the bulk of costs" would be paid by insurers, not the government. But, he said, federal officials would help the states collect through a "reconciliation process," the details of which were still being worked out.

While acknowledging some problems, Dr. McClellan said Tuesday, "The prescription drug program is working for the vast majority of seniors and people with disabilities."

But William P. Scheer, president of the Pharmacists Society of the State of New York, who owns a drugstore in the Bronx, said: "Federal officials must be taking happy juice if they believe that everything is running so well. Some of the prescription drug plans are running roughshod over us and our patients."

States To Be Reimbursed For Drugs (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

Federal officials said yesterday that they will reimburse states that bought medicine for senior citizens and disabled people who could not get help through the new Medicare drug benefit.

Under the program, which began Jan. 1, beneficiaries enroll in private plans selected by the government to provide prescription drug coverage.

But the program got off to such a difficult start that more than 20 states opted to provide emergency coverage for low-income residents who ran into difficulty. Some people did not show up in pharmacists' computers as being enrolled in a plan, and others were charged far more than they were supposed to pay.

Previously, officials said reimbursement to the states would come from the private plans themselves. But in cases in which states incurred expense above and beyond what the plans are required to pay, the federal government will step in, officials said.

States To Be Reimbursed For Emergency Drugs (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — California and more than 20 other states will be "fully reimbursed" for hundreds of thousands of emergency prescriptions for seniors who ran into trouble with the new Medicare drug benefit, top federal officials said Tuesday.

The promise was part of a seven-point plan by Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt to try to resolve the continuing frustration faced by many patients and pharmacists since the benefit took effect three weeks ago.

Leavitt's announcement marked the first time that a senior official publicly acknowledged the need to fix the broad range of problems. It came a week before President Bush's scheduled State of the Union message, in which the president, despite the glitches, is expected to praise the benefit as a significant accomplishment and a foundation for market-oriented healthcare reforms.

Started Jan. 1, the program offers 43 million Medicare beneficiaries the opportunity to enroll in private insurance plans providing government-subsidized coverage for their outpatient prescriptions. But its complicated design appears to have dampened enthusiasm among seniors, and many low-income beneficiaries who were automatically enrolled in the program have encountered a host of unintended coverage problems, leading some to leave the pharmacy without medicines they needed.

Quoting an e-mail sent to him by an Alabama pharmacist, Leavitt said, " 'There are still plenty of bumps, but it's much better.'

"To every single [patient] who went to the drug counter and wasn't able to get a prescription filled, it was a big problem — and we are taking it seriously," he said.

Federal and state officials estimate that 80% to 90% of seniors have not encountered such problems. But error rates of 10% to 20% in a program that is supposed to provide crucial medications for millions of people are considered unacceptable.

Leavitt also threatened to unleash federal investigators on private drug plans that failed to deliver services required by their contracts with the government, such as providing transitional supplies of medications they did not normally cover.

Critics said Leavitt's response was overdue.

"The secretary is confronting reality finally, and that is a good thing," said Robert M. Hayes, president of the Medicare Rights Center, a New York-based advocacy group. "We all know consumers were confused, but we had no sense the leadership in the federal government was so confused."

California has spent more than $9 million for about 110,000 emergency prescriptions since Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger intervened about two weeks ago.

The state was concerned that many low-income and disabled beneficiaries who had gotten drugs under Medi-Cal were having problems renewing prescriptions under Medicare. In some cases, beneficiaries were dropped from computerized eligibility lists. In others, the drug plans wanted hefty co-payments that low-income patients were not supposed to be charged. Some plans did not cover the same drugs that Medi-Cal did.

As part of the reimbursement plan, the federal government will help states collect from drug plans that were supposed to be taking care of low-income beneficiaries. Washington will also cover the states' administrative costs plus any difference between what pharmacies charged the states and rates the drug plans pay to pharmacies.

"Almost all of it is paid for by the plans," Leavitt said.

Medicare Administrator Mark B. McClellan said no congressional action was needed to authorize the program. He said he expected most states to shut down their emergency assistance efforts by Feb. 15.

"We will ensure the plans reimburse the states … and pay for any difference," he said. Federal officials did not yet have a cost estimate.

Such an arrangement would be acceptable to California, Stan Rosenstein, the state's deputy director of medical services, said in a recent interview.

"We are willing to work with the federal government on that," he said. "It can work as long as the federal government insists that the plans reimburse us."

Leavitt's repair plan for the Medicare drug benefit closely tracks the flaws that critics have pointed to in recent weeks. It calls on Medicare to purge computerized errors that have caused delays and on drug companies to beef up call centers.

It also urges seniors who want to enroll in or switch plans to do so early in the month so their paperwork is in order on the first day of the following month, when coverage takes effect. But that might be difficult, said advocates for the elderly, because some changes are prompted by unforeseen medical needs.

Rx Plan Failing To Help Neediest Low-income Seniors Are Slow To Sign Up (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Low-income seniors without Medicaid or prescription coverage are signing up for a new Medicare drug benefit at a far slower rate than others, a sign the program isn't reaching many of those who need it most.

Fewer than 300,000 of the 3.6 million people who have voluntarily enrolled in the drug program were approved for a low-income subsidy. That's just 4% of the 8.2 million people the Bush administration has estimated could qualify for the subsidy.

By contrast, more than 3.3 million people have signed up for coverage without qualifying for the subsidy. That's nearly 25% of an estimated 14 million people without full prescription drug coverage who are not low-income.

The six-month signup period ends May 15; the program's benefits began Jan. 1.

The inability to sign up more low-income seniors and disabled Americans is caused by two factors. Historically, only one-third to two-thirds of people eligible for low-income programs take advantage of them. And in this case, the two-step process of qualifying for the subsidy and enrolling in a plan is complex, experts say.

Gary Karr, spokesman for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, says the program likely is reaching more low-income people. “There are going to be people who are in the program who haven't applied for the low-income subsidy,” he says.

Another 6.2 million low-income Americans were automatically enrolled because they had received prescription drugs through Medicaid. Thousands were denied drugs or were overcharged at pharmacies this month because of glitches in the process, leading more than 20 states to offer emergency coverage. Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said Tuesday that the states will be reimbursed.

After those problems and months of widespread confusion among seniors over the program's scores of insurance options, most Americans say the program is struggling. By a 2-to-1 ratio, they say the program isn't working, according to a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll released Tuesday.

The low-income subsidy is available to individuals with annual incomes below about $15,000 and assets below about $11,500, not including their homes. Many will pay no premiums or deductibles, and no more than $2 monthly for each generic drug and $5 for each brand-name drug.

Last year, the Social Security Administration sent letters to about 19 million people advising them of the subsidy, then followed up with 65,000 public events. To date, 1.2 million people have qualified for the subsidy: Those who don't sign up with an insurance plan will be automatically enrolled in May.

Golden Oldies New Medicare Drug Benefit Sparks An Industry Land Grab (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck And Vanessa Fuhrmans

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

The government's new Medicare benefit that gives private drug coverage to millions of Americans has sparked a competitive scramble in the health-insurance industry. One of the battlegrounds is UnitedHealth Group Inc.'s cavernous call center in Roanoke, Va., which houses more than 500 customer-service representatives.

Fliers pinned on the wall list the "5 things every caller should know about our prescription-drug plan." The top one: "We are the only...plan endorsed by AARP, the most respected organization serving older Americans."

AARP, the powerful seniors' organization, is in the awkward position of providing impartial advice to seniors while at the same time selling them products. For UnitedHealth, the nation's No. 2 health-insurance provider, the AARP relationship is a powerful tool in what is becoming an all-out land grab.

Defying early predictions that private insurers wouldn't offer prescription-drug policies, dozens of companies are offering regional plans and 10 are selling them nationwide. The government is heavily subsidizing the policies, for which 42 million people are eligible. It's a big and unexpected growth opportunity at a time when the industry's traditional business -- administering employer health benefits -- is stagnant or shrinking.

UnitedHealth, based in Minnetonka, Minn., is one of the most aggressive players and one of the most successful so far. It has signed up about 2.8 million Medicare beneficiaries, either to stand-alone drug plans or within its more comprehensive Medicare plans. It picked up 1.5 million more sign-ups from its acquisition in December of PacifiCare Health Systems.

One of UnitedHealth's biggest rivals is Humana Inc., a midsize player in the market of offering insurance to corporate employees. Seeking quick growth, the Louisville, Ky., company is relying heavily on low prices, selling policies with monthly premiums as low as $2, alongside other more expensive plans. UnitedHealth's AARP premiums range between $23 and $31. Humana, in part through a marketing alliance with Wal-Mart Stores Inc., has signed up 1.7 million people for the drug benefit, either alone or through one of its comprehensive Medicare plans. It hopes to eventually switch many of these new customers to more lucrative policies.

"Basically 42 million people have been put in the marketplace, and that won't happen again," says Steve Brueckner, Humana's vice president of senior products. "If you don't get your fair share, you're going to be in trouble later on."

Every major insurer has carved out a slightly different strategy. WellPoint Inc., the nation's biggest health insurer, is counting on its long track record selling individual insurance products through the Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans in 14 states. WellPoint is marketing many of them at Walgreen Co. stores. Like a handful of other plans, it has eliminated deductibles in some offerings.

Aetna Inc. and Cigna Inc. are touting options with higher premiums but covering more drugs. Aetna, the third biggest insurer, is taking a relatively conservative approach to pricing and how many people it expects to sign up. It might stand to benefit if the new program proves a commercial bust.

Before the new Medicare legislation passed in 2003, insurers didn't sell stand-alone drug coverage, which they thought would be unprofitable. The likely consumers were people with high drug bills. Insurers covered medications only as part of broader packages that included doctor and hospital insurance.

But the Bush administration's prescription-drug program suddenly changed the calculus. Not only did the Medicare benefit provide a new way to drum up business from seniors, the government agreed to protect insurance companies from much of the risk.

Each year under the new drug program, insurers submit bids based on their estimated costs to the federal government, which then calculates a national average. The government pays insurers about 74.5% of that average. It requires companies to charge customers the balance between the government subsidy and insurers' initial estimates.

Thus, the lower the insurer's bid, the lower the premium for the customer. The government hopes this formula will keep its costs low.

Insurers also get additional federal payments for enrolling high-risk beneficiaries and those with low incomes. If an insurance company spends more than the estimate, the government will help pay the excess. If an insurer spends less, the government gets part of the savings.

Insurers say there's about 3% to 4% profit margin in drug-only insurance. The extra government payments mean there's little downside risk.

Bumpy Start

Medicare drug coverage, which began Jan. 1, has gotten off to a bumpy start. Many pharmacists have had problems confirming customers' new insurance. Some beneficiaries haven't received cards or letters proving they have coverage. Many states are stepping in to buy drugs temporarily for low-income seniors who ran into problems after being switched by the government to the new Medicare program from Medicaid.

Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt says that problems are being worked out and that "the vast majority" of people signed up for the benefit are using it successfully. "When you move large amounts of people and data...there's always an imperfect match," he says.

For some companies, the new benefit is a welcome boost. Humana, for example, with seven million members, is only half the size of Cigna, its next largest competitor, in the employee-based health-insurance market. Humana is betting that its experience in the Medicare market and its super-low premiums will let it take advantage of this "one-shot opportunity," says Mr. Brueckner, the vice president.

After grabbing market share, Humana hopes to entice many seniors to switch to more comprehensive Medicare plans, which are known as Medicare Advantage. The company calls this strategy "enroll and migrate." These more-lucrative plans cover doctors' visits, hospital stays and other services.

The premiums on Humana's least-expensive plan make the insurer such an outlier in the market that, "either they've figured out something the others haven't or they're pursuing a reckless strategy," says Matthew Borsch, a health-insurance analyst at Goldman Sachs.

Under the cheapest Humana plan, consumers pay a $250 deductible, then 25% of the next $2,000, all of the next $2,850, and 5% of everything else for the rest of the year. Other Humana plans don't have an initial deductible, charging only co-pays, and the most-expensive option provides coverage without a gap.

On a recent morning, Humana sales representatives manned tables in front of Wal-Mart's largest outlet in Tucson, Ariz. One Humana representative offered free, canvas tote bags to coax people into talking to a sales agent.

Jim Winger, 70 years old, a retired truck driver, said he wanted to avoid the higher premiums that kick in after a May 15 deadline. "I just want to avoid that penalty and get a plan that doesn't cost that much," said Mr. Winger, who at the moment doesn't take any medications. He bought a midpriced policy for $11.58 a month and no deductible, among the cheapest available in Arizona.

This marketing push is designed to shore up Humana's battle against traditional heavyweights such as UnitedHealth. "We had to do eight different things to compete with that one," says Humana's Mr. Brueckner.

The UnitedHealth/AARP combination is emerging as one of the major players in this new market with the AARP Medicare Rx plan. The plan doesn't have any deductibles.

AARP, which counts more than 36 million members, has a long-running relationship with UnitedHealth. The insurer beat rivals to win a 10-year contract with the seniors group that started in 1998. The two co-market, under AARP's name, supplemental Medicare insurance policies, sometimes called Medigap, which cover some services and items not paid by Medicare.

It was a lucrative relationship even before the start of the new drug benefit. In 2004, UnitedHealth collected $4.5 billion in premiums from AARP-related products. Currently, nearly three million people buy the AARP/UnitedHealth Medigap plans, making the duo the biggest Medigap vendor. The AARP-based drug plan has generated at least 95% of UnitedHealth's overall Medicare drug enrollment so far.

Lois Quam, head of Ovations, the UnitedHealth unit that oversees products for older people, calls the company's tie with AARP "a partnership that we treasure."

The partnership has been lucrative for AARP, too. In 2004, AARP earned $197 million in insurance-related royalties and an additional $23 million from investing insurance premiums, in both cases mostly from Medigap. In total, 40% of the organizations $878 million in 2004 revenue came from various royalties and service provider fees. That compares to $224 million, or 26%, from membership dues.

AARP and UnitedHealth are testing an AARP-branded Medicare Advantage plan in Rhode Island, which they could expand if successful.

AARP's Dual Role

The seniors' group often draws fire for its dual role as a seniors' advocate and a sales organization. Wearing a policy hat, AARP played a pivotal role in the 2003 passage of the drug-benefit legislation. That angered some of the bill's Democratic opponents who disliked the level of private-sector involvement in the new program. Some 60,000 people revoked or declined to renew their AARP memberships.

The two sides of AARP operate separately but communicate frequently. Information gleaned from the policy side's field offices is often shared with the business side, says Mark Carter of AARP Services Inc., the organization's business arm. When the AARP is considering a new product, the policy side gives it advice about local markets, for example.

Mr. Carter says "goal No. 1" on the business side is to make sure anyone who contacts AARP is educated about the Medicare drug benefit. But a "close second," he says, is selling the AARP product. "We try to be objective and at the same time not turn away business."

AARP publications in the past two months, such as AARP The Magazine and AARP Bulletin, have explained the overall federal program without mentioning AARP's plan. They've also mentioned some of Humana's plans -- without using the company's name.

But AARP's Web site showcases the organization's own insurance products, including those from UnitedHealth. Ads for AARP's products, which the business side has to buy at standard rates, also dominate the magazines.

AARP officials realize there are "perception issues," says Cheryl Matheis, director of health strategy in AARP's Office of Social Impact, part of the group's policy operation. Ms. Matheis says AARP staff won't help people fill out applications for a specific drug plan or advise people about which one to choose.

Ms. Matheis notes that AARP ploughs most of its revenue back into the association. "Clearly there will be more revenue to the association if more people sign up," she says. "It's a good thing because I can do more social impact work."

On a recent day, Bernard Bernstein, an 82-year-old retiree in Boca Raton, Fla., spoke with a sales agent at the Roanoke call center. Mr. Bernstein already had AARP/UnitedHealth Medicare supplemental insurance. After getting an expensive prescription from his doctor, he decided to enroll in a drug plan and called the number on the back of his AARP insurance card.

"I'd like to get a prescription-drug plan," he told UnitedHealth sales agent Heather Reynolds. "I'm an AARP member.... What information do I have to have?" She signed him up after he found his Medicare card.

Mr. Bernstein, a former sales manager for a Japanese electronics company, said in a later interview he didn't consider other companies' plans because he was happy with his AARP Medigap coverage. "I've never had any problems," he said. "Why not go back to them?"

At the call center, UnitedHealth invites local residents for lunchtime information sessions. On a recent day, Ronnie Reed, 69, and his wife Emma, 68, of Salem, Va., sat in a conference room to hear a pitch on the AARP drug plan. A white board on the wall carried the message: "Information is Power."

"We've pretty well made up our minds," said Mrs. Reed afterward. "We're going to go with the AARP program."

"I hope we can pretty well trust them," Mr. Reed said.

"We can," his wife said.

Democrats Move To Revive Medicare Law (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) will introduce legislation to restore Senate-passed language that would cut payments to private insurers in Medicare by $26 billion over the next decade, the lawmakers said yesterday.

As part of a broad budget-cutting bill, the Senate approved legislation that targeted private HMOs participating in Medicare by changing the formula that governs their reimbursement, lowering payments $26 billion over the next decade. But after lobbying by the health insurance industry, House and Senate Republican negotiators last month made a critical change that had the effect of eliminating all but $4 billion of the projected savings, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

Language inserted into the budget compromise stipulated that a key part of the formula change could be applied only in 2008, 2009 and 2010. The result, CBO analysts say, was a $22 billion swing in the insurance industry's favor.

Clinton described the behind-the-scenes action, detailed yesterday in a Washington Post report, as "the latest example of Republicans taking care of their special interests at the expense of the American people."

The Senate approved the compromise budget plan last month, but one vote remains in the House early next month. If the plan is signed into law, Clinton and Dingell said they will introduce legislation to restore the original Senate language.

They would also try to revive a Senate-approved cut to a fund established to lure managed-care companies into Medicare. If both Clinton-Dingell proposals are approved, it would save the government more than $32 billion over a decade, according to CBO estimates.

Republicans have been adamant that the changes made in conference will not have the impact that CBO analysts project. In a statement this week, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) said CBO is assuming that Medicare administrators would let private health plans "game the system so badly that they not only would reverse the payment cut, but they'd also gain even more money from Medicare. This is a ridiculous assumption."

Grassley said yesterday he would be "happy to work with my colleagues on legislation to cut other overpayments made by Medicare and Medicaid."

Md. Urged To Cover Funding Gaps In Medicare Drug Plan (WP)

By Susan Levine And Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

The new Medicare drug program, repeatedly slammed as a disaster during hearings yesterday in Maryland and the District, is putting elderly and disabled people at ever greater peril because of continuing difficulties getting their prescriptions, lawmakers were told.

In Maryland, advocates called on the state to immediately pick up the cost of medications and co-payments that the federal government otherwise would be handling under the Medicare Part D plan.

"A lot of very vulnerable people aren't getting their meds," said Herbert S. Cromwell, executive director of Community Behavioral Health of Maryland, which serves children and adults with mental health problems. "This is nothing short of a fiasco."

Legislators in the Democratic-controlled General Assembly echoed his concern, although they urged Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) to instead make state money available so additional caseworkers could be hired to help beneficiaries navigate the complex drug program. Its escalating troubles have emerged as a local campaign issue, with both Democratic candidates for governor criticizing Ehrlich's response.

In the District, Health Committee Chairman David A. Catania (I-At Large) warned that the $3 million that Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) recently ordered to be set aside to pay for medicines for the city's most needy may not be nearly enough.

"The burn rate of that $3 million is going to be fast," he said.

Every day brings another avalanche of queries from worried, even desperate, D.C. residents. The Health Insurance Counseling Project, part of George Washington University's National Law Center, has helped resolve about 400 cases and has 250 more in process, yet its small paid and volunteer staff remains overwhelmed 24 days into the new federal coverage.

"We have 350 people . . . we've not been able to call back yet," director Suzanne Jackson testified yesterday, a thick stack of client reports on the table in front of her.

Those people, like others at risk in every state, are very low-income Americans who are elderly or disabled or both. They are simultaneously eligible for Medicare and Medicaid. An estimated 16,000 District residents fall into that category. In Maryland, they number 55,000.

In the past, they received their pills virtually free of charge through Medicaid, but the new Part D program requires that their prescription coverage be switched to Medicare. That enrollment was to happen automatically Jan. 1. In many cases it did not, or people were not notified about the plan they were assigned or were put in plans that do not cover their drugs.

With people walking away empty-handed from pharmacies or erroneously being charged steep deductibles for critical medications, the District and more than two dozen states have stepped forward in recent weeks, expending hundreds of millions of dollars from their own budgets. In late 2005, some allowed beneficiaries to refill their prescriptions early.

"We're all extremely concerned, which is why we moved as we did," said Kate Jesberg of the D.C. Income Maintenance Administration. "Because we're afraid people will die."

Catania suggested that he might use the committee's subpoena powers to compel federal officials to discuss the situation -- and the costs to the city and states that Medicare administrators had repeatedly maintained they could not reimburse. Yesterday, after much pressure, they reversed course and agreed to help compensate the emergency medicine purchases.

"For once," Catania said, "it's not the District government making a mess of things."

In Annapolis, Dennis Carroll of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services told lawmakers that the federal government would work with states to assist them in recouping money from the private drug plans participating. "We're very sympathetic to the people trying to deal with the problems on the front lines," said Carroll, an associate regional administrator.

The Ehrlich administration defended itself in the half-day hearing before the House Health and Government Operations Committee. Paul A. Gurny, a deputy secretary of Maryland's Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, noted that state officials allocated $2.2 million in December so "dual eligibles" could get advance refills.

"We preempted that problem," said Gurny, who disputed advocates' characterization of a public health crisis. "It may be in other states, but it certainly isn't in Maryland. I think people in Maryland are getting their medication, for the most part."

Gurny said he would forward legislators' request that Ehrlich provide emergency funding to provide more caseworkers. But he asked local health officials and community advocates for empirical evidence on the number of people in need.

To which Del. Adrienne A. Mandel (D-Montgomery) responded, "You've asked for evidence, but how long can we wait?"

Limits Are Sought For Doctors' Ties To Drug Makers (WSJ)

By Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

A group of academics called for stringent limits on the ties between drug companies and doctors, saying in an article published in the Journal of the American Medical Association that the current relationships lead to conflicts of interest.

The medical profession's standing is "jeopardized by allowing obvious conflicts to continue," and academic medical centers should take the lead in reforming them, the JAMA article said. The writers, from Harvard University, Columbia University, the University of California at Berkeley and other institutions, echoed concerns expressed with increasing frequency by medical-journal editors, professors and some doctors.

The authors want to end all free drug samples and gifts to doctors from pharmaceutical and medical-device makers, including payments for travel to meetings, meals and attending medical-education sessions. The article calls for companies to stop directly funding medical-education sessions because they could lead to a mingling of promotional and educational goals. The authors also called on medical-school faculty to stop serving as speakers for companies and using industry-paid ghostwriters.

The writers want new limits on industry consulting and research contracts, including a prohibition on "so-called 'no strings attached' grants or gifts to individual researchers." Such agreements should be disclosed on a public Web site, they said, because company-funded research is likely to lead to more positive results and "on occasion companies have restricted the dissemination of research results unfavorable to their products."

The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, an industry trade group, said in a prepared statement that it already has adopted voluntary guidelines limiting gifts to doctors, and other government and standards-setting groups have rules on medical education. "The current rules...really ought to address the concerns that they've got," said Scott Lassman, an assistant general counsel for the group. The group believes its guidelines "have been extremely effective," he said, even though they are voluntary.

The American Medical Association said that it has ethics guidance for doctors that suggests limits on gifts. It also said it has been "examining and updating" the policy.

But members of the group that wrote the JAMA article dismissed the current guidelines from medical and other groups as inadequate, particularly concerning disclosure of relationships. "They are weak, they lack enforcement, they lack monitoring," said David Rothman, a professor at Columbia University and president of the nonprofit Institute on Medicine as a Profession. "Transparency goes way beyond disclosure."

Jordan Cohen, an author of the article and president of the Association of American Medical Colleges, said he planned to bring up the article with the organization's executive council; his work on it wasn't on behalf of the association. "The public has become quite appropriately concerned," said Dr. Cohen. But, he said, he expects "resistance" from universities and doctors wary of losing a substantial income stream.

Distance Sought Between Doctors And Drug Industry (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

Declaring that the pervasive influence of drug industry money is distorting doctors' treatment decisions and scientific findings, a prestigious panel of medical experts called on their colleagues yesterday to adopt far-reaching new conflict-of-interest policies.

In an article in the Journal of the American Medical Association, the group said that voluntary efforts to limit corporate inducements have failed, resulting in the overprescribing of some medications and the withholding of negative discoveries about others. Highly publicized cases involving the anti-inflammatory drug Vioxx, antidepressants for children and spinal implants made by Medtronic -- all occurring while voluntary guidelines were in place -- highlight the need for stricter measures, they said.

"My mother told me never to accept gifts from strangers. If a stranger wants to give you a gift, it's very likely they want something in return," said Jordan J. Cohen, president of the Association of American Medical Colleges and a co-author of the new proposal. "We've become overly dependent on these kinds of blandishments to support our core activities, and that is jeopardizing public trust and scientific integrity."

The panel -- which includes Cohen, officials from several medical schools and members of the Institute on Medicine as a Profession -- urged the nation's 400 teaching hospitals to impose stringent measures, including a ban on accepting gifts, meals and drug samples and tight restrictions on outside income. A series of articles published today in the journal Academic Medicine reach similar conclusions, noting that strict, standardized policies are needed to ensure patients receive unbiased, evidence-based treatments.

Spokesmen for the pharmaceutical industry said the extra steps are unnecessary and could deprive physicians of valuable information.

From their first rounds as residents, doctors travel in a world increasingly dominated by drug company salespeople proffering meals, office supplies, entertainment and even cash to speak at conferences or sit on advisory boards.

Some physicians have been paid lucrative consulting retainers for no specific work; others are paid to put their names on articles ghostwritten by industry employees. One congressional inquiry cited in the report found that pharmaceutical executives steer research grants to doctors and schools that promote their firms' drugs.

"The problem has gotten worse and worse and worse," Cohen said. The relationships can prompt doctors to order unnecessary tests, prescribe more expensive medicines or advocate adding certain medications to a hospital's list of preferred drugs, he said.

Although most doctors say their relationships with drugmakers do not affect medical decisions, numerous studies suggest otherwise.

"There is solid evidence it isn't the size of the gift, it's the gifting itself that creates a sense of loyalty and indebtedness," said Sharon Levine, associate executive director of Kaiser Permanente's Northern California group practice. The 6,000-doctor practice and the Yale University School of Medicine are among the only institutions in the nation to implement policies similar to those outlined in JAMA.

"The industry is spending $13 billion per year on direct-to-physician promotion," she continued. "That wouldn't be happening if it weren't resulting in changing patterns of utilization. It doesn't necessarily mean patients are getting bad care, but it does mean their influence is out there."

Judging from the "grumbling" he has heard from physicians, Scott Lassman, assistant general counsel at the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the industry's lobbying group, said voluntary guidelines issued by industry, government and the profession in recent years seem to be working. Modest gifts such as lunch or pens may persuade a doctor "to listen to the presentation of information, not necessarily to prescribe that product." And having those discussions over a "working meal" is merely a timesaver for busy doctors, he said.

But the JAMA authors said it is a costly mistake to confuse marketing with scientific data.

"Drug companies spend $13,000 per physician annually," said co-author David J. Rothman, a professor of social medicine at Columbia University Medical Center. "Those marketing tactics are very, very effective at getting physicians to do what each drug company wants -- to prescribe their product."

The team conducted focus groups with doctors who "came right out and said if one drug rep is nicer than another, I'm going to prescribe that person's drug, all else being equal," said co-author David Blumenthal, director of the Institute for Health Policy at Massachusetts General Hospital. In a second article, Blumenthal found that conflicts of interest have contributed to growing secrecy in research, with some scientists intentionally omitting negative findings about a drug or device.

Rather than severing all ties to the pharmaceutical industry, the panel suggested creating financial firewalls. Instead of paying a physician directly for continuing medical education, it would be more appropriate for drug companies to contribute to a central account that supported educational programs, they wrote. In addition, payments for outside work such as speeches or consulting should be explicitly defined and posted on the Internet.

Finally, the group urged the nation's 125 medical schools and affiliated hospitals to refuse drug samples and instead create a voucher system or central distribution bank for poor patients.

"The availability of free samples is a powerful inducement for physicians and patients to rely on medications that are expensive but not more effective," the JAMA article said. In most cases, once patients begin the expensive drug regimen, they are inclined to stick with it.

Some industry experts said the recommendations underestimated the ability of physicians and patients to think on their own.

"I subscribe to the crazy view that more information is better," said Daniel Troy, former chief counsel of the Food and Drug Administration. "This very sweeping proposed ban would really choke off an important flow of information to physicians."

A drug sample handed out in a doctor's office is a good way to begin treatment immediately, he said, rather than waiting to have a prescription filled.

Cohen predicted the industry and many medical institutions would blanch at the recommendations. But both could stand to improve their reputations, he said. He added: "We need a strong, ethical, effective partnership with industry."

In Article, Doctors Back Ban On Gifts From Drug Makers (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

The gifts, drugs and classes that makers of pharmaceuticals and medical devices routinely give doctors undermine medical care, hurt patients and should be banned, a group of influential doctors say in today's issue of The Journal of the American Medical Association.

Medical schools and teaching hospitals should be the first to establish a comprehensive ban, the group writes. But the authors argue that all doctors should eventually follow suit.

Broadly adopted, the recommendations would transform doctors' day-to-day lives and shut off the focus of drug makers' biggest expenditures. But Dr. David Blumenthal, an author of the article, said it was "not very likely" that many in medicine would listen to the group.

"I'm not very optimistic," said Dr. Blumenthal, a professor at Harvard Medical School who, like many of the article's 10 other authors, has studied conflicts of interest in medicine for years.

Federal law forbids companies from paying doctors to prescribe drugs or devices, but gifts and consulting arrangements are almost entirely unregulated. Voluntary professional guidelines suggest that doctors refuse gifts of greater than "modest" value. Sanctions against doctors who accept gifts of great value are extremely rare.

The drug industry spends tens of billions of dollars a year to woo doctors, far more than it spends on research or consumer advertising. Some doctors receive a significant part of their income from consulting arrangements with drug and device makers. Others take regular vacations and golfing trips that are paid for by companies.

A recent lawsuit involving the device maker Medtronic revealed that one prominent Wisconsin surgeon received $400,000 for a consulting contract that required him to work just eight days. While such rich arrangements are often restricted to specialists, most physicians routinely accept small gifts from drug salespeople, including pens, mugs, pads and food.

Surveys show that most doctors do not believe that these gifts influence their medical decisions, although most believe that they do affect their colleagues' medical judgment.

But even small gifts can lead to profound changes in doctors' prescribing behavior, with "negative results on clinical care," the article states. As a result, all gifts should be banned, the authors conclude.

Ken Johnson, a spokesman for the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, said the drug industry had a voluntary code of marketing conduct.

"Only practices that do not compromise independent judgments of health providers - such as modest working meals, gifts of minimal value that support the medical practice, and distribution of free samples - are permitted," Mr. Johnson said in a statement.

Dr. Duane M. Cady, board chairman of the American Medical Association, said in a statement that "drug and medical device makers can play a role in educating physicians about new products." He said the organization was "in the process of examining and updating its policy on gifts to physicians from industry."

The article is part of a spate of reports in medical journals that have taken a skeptical view of drug makers' influence on medical practice and research. The New England Journal of Medicine recently published an article accusing Merck of withholding crucial safety information about the withdrawn painkiller Vioxx, a charge that Merck denies. Other articles have criticized drug makers' tendency to keep the results of human research secret.

Dr. Catherine DeAngelis, editor in chief of The Journal of the American Medical Association, said drug makers were a vital part of the nation's health care system because of their research efforts.

"But there has been a substantial change in the way pharmaceutical companies function over the last decade," Dr. DeAngelis said. Drug makers are far more aggressive in their marketing efforts, she said, and these efforts are having a deleterious effect on the practice of medicine.

Dr. Steven Shea, vice dean of the faculty of medicine at Columbia University Medical Center, predicted that the journal article would "prompt changes in policy and guidelines at many academic health centers, including ours."

Kaiser Permanente, the California-based managed-care group, is one of the few medical organizations in the United States that have enacted nearly all of the recommendations suggested by the journal article. Kaiser physicians prescribe heavily marketed medicines far less frequently than doctors nationally.

"We thought it was critical for us that our patients never had a doubt that the decision made about a drug or a device was based on the best interests of the patient and not the financial interest of the physician," said Dr. Sharon Levine, associate executive director of Kaiser Permanente Northern California.

The article also argues that "no strings attached" consulting arrangements should be banned, and that all other consulting agreements should be posted on Web sites. Doctors should refuse free drug samples, the article states, because they are "a powerful inducement for physicians and patients to rely on medications that are expensive but not more effective."

Such a refusal would also eliminate one of the principal reasons for which drug salespeople are routinely allowed to enter doctors' offices, the article states. While the article does not suggest that salespeople be refused entry into offices, it states that such visits have few useful functions.

"Would we be delighted if drug reps never saw the inside of doctors' offices? Absolutely," said Dr. David J. Rothman, president of the Institute of Medicine and one of the article's two principal authors. "But you can't mandate that. It's a free country."

Two years ago, Dr. Rothman received a $7.5 million grant from the financier George Soros to set up an organization that would study medical professionalism. Today's article is in part an outgrowth of that grant, he said.

Dr. Troy A. Brennan, former chairman of the American Board of Internal Medicine and the other principal author of the article, said he was looking forward to reading responses to it.

"I don't think there are a lot of good answers as to why it's O.K. to accept these gifts and contracts," Dr. Brennan said.

Med Schools Urged To Keep Drugmakers At Arm's Length (USAT)

By Rita Rubin

USA Today, January 25, 2006

Medical school faculty must set an example for their profession by distancing themselves from drug companies' marketing efforts, a group of academic medicine leaders urges in a paper today.

The relationship between academic medical centers and drugmakers represents a “serious threat” to trust in doctors, according to the paper, published in the Journal of the American Medical Association. “This paper represents a call to action,” says co-author David Rothman, a Columbia University medical historian and president of the Institute on Medicine as a Profession.

Despite a dramatic increase in direct-to-consumer advertising, about 90% of the pharmaceutical industry's $21 billion marketing budget is directed at doctors, according to the authors. The authors include Jordan J. Cohen, president of the American Association of Medical Colleges.

“Marketing … should not be allowed to undermine physicians' commitment to their patient's best interest or to scientific integrity,” they write. The authors say voluntary guidelines don't go far enough, and they recommend that medical schools:

·Ban all gifts, including free meals. Research shows that even inexpensive gifts, such as pens, can distort doctors' behavior.

·Prohibit doctors from accepting free samples, a “powerful inducement … to rely on medications that are expensive but not more effective.”

·Exclude doctors with financial ties to drug firms from serving on panels that decide what drugs should be prescribed.

·Prohibit drugmakers from directly financing continuing medical education.

·Ban faculty from belonging to manufacturers' speakers bureaus or publishing articles ghostwritten by industry staff.

·Require faculty members with drug company consulting agreements or unconditional grants to post them on a publicly available Internet site.

DOJ_NMG_0011595

Some medical schools may find these guidelines difficult to implement because of how much they depend on drug company money, says co-author Jerome Kassirer, a former editor of The New England Journal of Medicine. “A lot of our funds for education and for lunches now come from pharmaceutical companies,” he notes.

Coincidentally, Yale's medical school today published its new conflict-of-interest guidelines, similar to those in JAMA, in the journal Academic Medicine.

“We believe it's the most restrictive set of guidelines … established by a medical school,” says lead author David Coleman, Yale's interim chair of internal medicine.

The Case Western Reserve medical school hopes to implement its new policy by July 1. Says Dean Ralph Horwitz: “Medical schools need to be the conscience of American medicine.”

Bush Courts Charities In Bid To Change Foreign Food-Aid Program (BLOOM)

By Mark Drajem

Bloomberg, January 25, 2006

Jan. 25 (Bloomberg) -- The Bush administration is reviving a plan to buy some of the food it uses for overseas aid from foreign rather than domestic farmers, and is courting the support of charities that helped sink the idea last year.

The proposal, a version of last year's plan to funnel one- quarter of the $1.2 billion spent by the government on foreign aid to local suppliers, still faces opposition from U.S. agricultural producers, who currently supply all the food aid.

U.S. Agency for International Development officials met recently with groups such as Care, which runs poverty programs in more than 70 countries, and Save the Children, to try to win their support for reviving the idea of buying emergency food supplies in or near countries hit by famine, according to Alina Labrada of Care and Ina Schonberg of Save the Children.

``What the U.S. seeks is a flexible box of tools to deal with crises,'' Jonathan Dworken, the acting director of USAID's Food for Peace office, said in an interview. ``Purchasing locally is often cheaper and might allow us to react more quickly.'' He declined to provide details of what Bush will propose in the budget he sends Congress on Feb. 6.

The five-decade-old food aid and famine-relief program has maintained its political support in Washington because Congress mandates that all food and grain be bought from U.S. farmers, packaged by U.S. exporters such as Cargill Inc. of Wayzata, Minnesota, the largest U.S. agricultural company, and shipped on U.S.-flagged vessels. Bush is renewing his plan as the European Union pushes the U.S. to accept limits on its use of food aid as part of World Trade Organization talks.

Farmers `Strongly Opposed'

``We're strongly opposed'' to changing the system, said Dawn Forsythe, director of public affairs at U.S. Wheat Associates in Washington, the crop producers' export-marketing arm. ``We don't see the value of purchasing our competitors' wheat with U.S. funds.''

Charities also have something to lose under the Bush plan. Groups such as Monrovia, California-based World Vision, Baltimore-based Catholic Relief Services and Care, with a U.S. headquarters in Atlanta, currently can sell some of the U.S. food donations they handle to finance other development projects, such as education or health care. The Bush plan would reduce the amount of food aid available for that purpose.

Government food aid programs accounted for about 30 percent of the revenue of the eight largest private groups that distribute U.S. government food aid, according to Cornell University economist Chris Barrett.

``They are desperately scared of losing'' that money, said Barrett, author of the 2005 book ``Food Aid After Fifty Years.'' ``With a few influential people who have something at stake and these images that come out of food aid, politically this is a tough ball to move.''

Political Risk

The U.S. bought from U.S. farms and distributed to foreign nations $1.6 billion of food in 2004, mostly through programs run by USAID and private charities, according to the Agriculture Department. That includes purchases of 200,000 metric tons of rice, 300,500 tons of corn and 1.63 million tons of wheat.

While some foreign purchases may be acceptable, if they remove too much of the financial benefits for U.S. producers and organizations, support in Washington will be lost, said Michael Wiest, the chief operating officer of Catholic Relief Services.

``There is the great risk that there is no longer the political support to protect these programs from cuts,'' said Wiest, whose group distributed $154 million in food aid in 2004.

Critics say the current program spends too much money shipping U.S. food overseas while undercutting the ability of local farmers to make a profit. Cornell's Barrett says maintaining the current practices can also mean delays in times of emergency.

`Structural Problem'

DOJ_NMG_0011596

``There is a structural problem in bringing food from a long way off in every situation," Andrew Natsios, who stepped down as head of the USAID this month, said in an interview. ``If I had more funds, I would not invest it in more food aid, but in agriculture development" overseas.

Bush's proposal last year would have let USAID spend $300 million of the $1.2 billion food aid budget buying products in or near the countries in need.

Natsios said he had expected opposition from farm groups and shippers, and was surprised by the resistance from the charities. They said Natsios was creating a slush fund without any details on how the program would work.

Objections

House Agriculture Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte, a Republican from Virginia, criticized Bush's proposal last year because it would have transferred U.S. taxpayer funds to foreign competitors.

``Under the current system we're able to help those in need, and also help U.S. farmers and ranchers," Alise Kowalski, a spokeswoman for Goodlatte, said this week.

Congress not only declined to pursue Bush's plan last year, it admonished Bush not to propose it again. The 20 members of Congress who negotiated a final farm spending bill said in their October report that Bush should ``refrain from proposals which place at risk a carefully balanced coalition of interests which have served the interests of international food assistance programs well for more than 50 years."

``The reaction last year surprised a lot of people," said Patrick Webb, the former chief of nutrition at the United Nations' World Food Programme who is now a dean at Tufts University near Boston. If Bush had courted the charities last year, ``maybe the reaction would have been different," he said.

Ready to Listen

Some of the charity groups who have met recently with Dworken or his aides say they are ready to listen now, partly because outside pressures, such as the WTO talks and funding cuts, are already pushing changes to the system. They say they never opposed the overall idea, just the lack of detail.

The charities already face cuts in U.S. aid for long-term donation programs, especially those that allow them to sell food in poor countries and use the proceeds to fund their other programs. About $600 million of food aid in 2004 was used in this way, according to the U.S. Agriculture Department.

``We all want to find a way to test this out and make it work," said Schonberg, the director of food security programs at Save the Children in Westport, Connecticut, which provides food, AIDS treatment and education in 110 countries. ``But there are a lot of questions. One is: Are the agriculture producers going to block this?"

Bush, Congress Focus On Science (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 25, 2006

A bipartisan group of senators will introduce an ambitious trifecta of bills today aiming billions of dollars in new spending at the nation's sliding science and technology sector.

The bills, collectively called Protecting America's Competitive Edge (PACE), sprang from a request made by Sens. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) and Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.) to the independently funded National Academies: What specific actions could Congress take to ensure continued U.S. competitiveness?

When the National Academies came back with 20 recommendations and a report on how to implement them, the senators took notice, as did President Bush, who is reportedly considering making science and technology innovation a major theme of his State of the Union address.

Alongside Energy and Natural Resources Committee Chairman Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) and Sen. Barbara Mikulski (D-Md.), Alexander and Bingaman are sponsoring three versions of PACE: one for energy, one for education and one for tax policy. The bills would set up a new transformational-energy agency within the Energy Department, create science and math scholarships for 25,000 students and boost research spending at seven federal agencies.

The bills are estimated to cost upwards of $9 billion, a price tag that could prove anathema to a congressional leadership already wary of the bloated federal deficit. But the PACE bills have the solid support of the GOP-leaning business community.

Fifteen manufacturing and high-tech lobbying groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the Business Roundtable and the National Association of Manufacturers, issued a report last July imploring the Bush administration to refocus its efforts on improving the quality of science and math education and research.

"We are running out of scientists and engineers," Roundtable President John Castellani said late last week. "It will hurt our ability to be competitive in the future."

DOJ_NMG_0011597

The Roundtable plans to recommend a major increase in the federal research budget in letters to Capitol Hill and the White House that will be sent before the State of the Union.

Bush's Foes Eager To Get Photos Of President With Abramoff (KRT)

By William Douglas And Maria Recio

Knight Ridder, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - A picture is worth a thousand words, the old adage goes, which is why President Bush's foes are anxious to get their hands on photos of him posing with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Until now, the only tangible link between Bush and Abramoff was the $6,000 that Abramoff donated to the president's re-election campaign. The White House ended up giving that money to the American Heart Association. But Time magazine reported this week that it's seen five photos of Bush with Abramoff, the lobbyist's sons and Raul Garza Sr., then-chairman of the Texas Kickapoo Indian tribe, which owns a casino in southwestern Texas.

The photos aren't proof of any wrongdoing on Bush's part. But they do put him in the uncomfortable position of standing next to an admitted felon who's become the symbol for all that's wrong with Washington. Bush's opponents would like the ammo as mid-term elections approach.

"I would love to have those pictures. I would use the pictures (in advertisements) and write `Why is this man smiling?' in the cutlines under the pictures," said Paul Begala, a veteran of Democratic political campaigns and a former counselor to President Clinton during the Monica Lewinsky scandal. "This is a visual age. The story becomes bigger when there are pictures. It puts the scandal in the White House."

White House press secretary Scott McClellan, while not commenting on the specific pictures reported by Time, said there probably are photos of Bush with Abramoff because the president has been photographed with thousands of people at political and social events since he took office in 2001.

Garza, who knew Bush when he was governor of Texas, said he remembers spending about 45 seconds talking with the president while his picture was being snapped in a White House meeting room in 2001. Garza recalls Bush fondly greeting him as "jefe," the Spanish word for "chief."

"I told him the tribe is with you," Garza told Knight Ridder Monday. Garza said Abramoff arranged his brief meeting with Bush. Garza was ousted in 2002 after 29 years as a tribal chairman. He's now under indictment for allegedly looting more than $500,000 from the tribe's casino, the Lucky Eagle.

White House officials have refused requests to release any photos of Bush and Abramoff together.

"I know that there's some Democrats that want to try to engage in partisan attacks," McClellan said Monday. "Trying to say there's more to it than the president taking a picture in a photo line is just absurd."

Indeed, the Democratic National Committee sent a release to reporters on Sunday, alerting them to the Time magazine piece. McClellan acknowledged that Abramoff visited the White House at least twice for Hanukkah receptions in 2001 and 2002. Published reports indicate that Abramoff and his associates had nearly 200 contacts with the White House during Bush's first 10 months in office.

While Begala believes the pictures would politically cripple Bush and the Republican Party, Scott Reed, who managed former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole's presidential campaign, thinks they'd cause minimal damage.

"It's short-term heartache because the pictures would be blasted around the world," Reed said. "It will be an embarrassment because of what Abramoff has come to symbolize, but it will be short term because the Democrats still don't have an agenda or the leaders."

Mike McCurry, Clinton's former press secretary, also questioned the picture's long-term impact.

"They will cause a mild titter and will show up in some campaign commercials," he said. "Other than that, I don't know what their value is."

Embarrassing pictures and videos have haunted presidents in the past, including Bush. While the White House was trying to distance itself from the Enron scandal, a video from 1997 showed Bush, then Texas governor, wishing a departing Enron executive well.

On the video, Bush's father, former President George H.W. Bush, hinted at close family ties with the Enron official: "I don't think anybody did more than you did to support George," the elder Bush said.

Clinton endured repeated showings of pictures of him with Lewinsky, including one shown regularly on television of him encountering a starry-eyed Lewinsky in a greeting line.

Mr. Abramoff's Meetings (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0011598

HERE ARE SOME things we know about Jack Abramoff and the White House: The disgraced lobbyist raised at least $100,000 for President Bush's reelection campaign. He had long-standing ties to Karl Rove, a key presidential adviser. He had extensive dealings with executive branch officials and departments -- one of whom, former procurement chief David H. Safavian, has been charged by federal prosecutors with lying to investigators about his involvement with Mr. Abramoff.

We also know that Mr. Abramoff is an admitted crook who was willing to bribe members of Congress and their staffs to get what he (or his clients) wanted. In addition to attending a few White House Hanukkah parties and other events at which he had his picture snapped with the president, Mr. Abramoff had, according to the White House, "a few staff-level meetings" with White House aides.

Here is what we don't know about Jack Abramoff and the White House: whom he met with and what was discussed. Nor, if the White House sticks to its current position, will we learn that anytime soon. Press secretary Scott McClellan told the White House press corps: "If you've got some specific issue that you need to bring to my attention, fine. But what we're not going to do is engage in a fishing expedition that has nothing to do with the investigation."

This is not a tenable position. It's undisputed that Mr. Abramoff tried to use his influence, and his restaurant and his skyboxes and his chartered jets, to sway lawmakers and their staffs. Information uncovered by Mr. Bush's own Justice Department shows that Mr. Abramoff tried to do the same inside the executive branch.

Under these circumstances, asking about Mr. Abramoff's White House meetings is no mere exercise in reportorial curiosity but a legitimate inquiry about what an admitted felon might have been seeking at the highest levels of government. Whatever White House officials did or didn't do, there is every reason to believe that Mr. Abramoff was up to no good and therefore every reason the public ought to know with whom he was meeting.

Mr. McClellan dismisses requests for the information as an effort to play "partisan politics," and no doubt there is more than an element of partisanship in Democrats' efforts to extract this information. But Republicans wouldn't stand for this kind of stonewalling if the situation were reversed. We can say that with confidence because history proves it. During the 1996 scandal over foreign fundraising in the Clinton White House, Republicans demanded -- and obtained, though not without a fight -- extensive information about White House coffees and other meetings, including photos and videotapes.

"Any suggestion by critics or anybody else to suggest that the president was doing something nefarious with Jack Abramoff is absolutely wrong, and it's absurd," presidential adviser Dan Bartlett said on NBC's "Today" show. The best way to refute such "absurd" suggestions is to get all of Mr. Abramoff's dealings with the Bush White House and the Bush administration out in the open -- now.

Big trade associations — lobbyists — are getting ready to fight the sharp tightening of lobbying regulations.

The board of directors of the American League of Lobbyists (ALL), a trade association representing lobbyists, met Monday to discuss the various reform proposals and to lay plans for a coalition of lobbying heavyweights to work with lawmakers to review them.

“Our big issue right now is that we’re not sure you can say the system is broken,” Paul Miller, ALL’s president, said in an interview. “We’ve got to start with enforcement, and that’s our message to Congress. We want to make sure they find a way to enforce the current rules before they make up any new rules.”

Momentum for reform is building. The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee is scheduled today to consider how to respond to concerns raised by the scandal surrounding lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to federal charges of fraud, conspiracy to bribe and tax evasion.

Miller said a coordination effort is under way among several of the biggest business lobbying groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM), the National Federation of Independent Business (NFIB), the American Society of Association Executives (ASAE) and others. A similar coalition was formed in 1995 when Congress last seriously scrutinized lobbying regulations, Miller said.

Some of the groups Miller cites seem leery about joining the effort to influence reform proposals when criticism of lobbyists is so intense both on and off Capitol Hill.

“The hope is we can all do this together,” said Miller. “I’d like to see a coalition formed so we can hold a meeting in the next few weeks.”

Former Michigan Gov. John Engler, president of NAM, plans to testify today against some of the most far-reaching reform proposals before the Senate Homeland Security panel. Miller will also testify, as will Bill Samuel, director of the AFL-CIO’s legislative department.

Darren McKinney, a spokesman for NAM, said Engler will stress the same message as Miller, that existing laws and rules impose serious penalties on those who violate the public trust and that additional rules are not necessary.

Engler will argue four other points, McKinney said:

· Congress should not treat all lobbyists the same, for trade associations with thousands of members are different from so-called hired guns who represent smaller interests.

· Gifts and meals given to lawmakers should not be weighed down with onerous reporting requirements.

· Lawmakers should be allowed to accept invitations to tour plants and factories in their districts.

· Each lawmaker's personal integrity determines whether unethical lobbyists are able to corrupt government.

A source familiar with NAM's leadership said the group would likely be willing to participate in a larger coalition or working group to help members of Congress fashion what lobbyists could accept as sensible reforms.

Jim Clarke, senior vice president of public policy at ASAE, said his group opposes the ban on congressional travel paid for by outside groups proposed last week by Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.) and House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.).

"Our efforts has been focused on [the effort aimed at] banning paid travel," he said. "We want to have everyone take a look at what travel really means and the difference between an exotic trip and taking the train to Philadelphia and talking to folks around the country."

Clarke said trips to vacation destinations may be curbed but not legitimate trips around the country to discuss the potential impact of policy proposals. ASAE plans to circulate a letter to lawmakers expressing its concerns today and to hold a press conference tomorrow.

Clarke declined to say whether ASAE would join a coordinated effort by trade associations and lobbyists to moderate reform proposals in Congress.

Other major trade groups are lying low on the contentious issue of lobbying reform

Mike Hardiman, a spokesman for the NFIB, said his organization would not join a coalition organized by the league of lobbyists on the issue of reform. The NFIB was not active on the issue, he added.

"Our membership hasn't been polled on this," Hardiman said. "We're driven by the membership. … The issues we work on come from the membership."

Other issues are a much higher priority for the NFIB, he said.

Trade associations and lobbyists seeking to stanch a flood of new rules may have an ally in at least one candidate for House majority leader.

"The solution to the problems we face is to stop abuses of power by Congress or individual members, not more bureaucratic rules," said Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.). "I applaud the Speaker and Chairman Dreier's efforts. However, many trips are truly educational, and I believe a complete ban on all private travel would be an overreaction that doesn't get to the root of the problem."

Jessica Boulanger, a spokesman for interim House Majority Leader Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), who is vying against Shadegg and Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) to remain majority leader, said reform proposals should be fully debated in the House.

"I would reiterate Congressman Blunt's support for the Speaker's and Chairman Dreier's efforts," she said. "Mr. Blunt said it is important to look at all the proposals, go through regular order and have ample debate."

Congressman Seeks To End K Street-Wall Street Linkage (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 25, 2006

Rep. Brian Baird, a Washington state Democrat, wants to end an inside-the-Beltway version of insider trading as part of his party's larger lobbying-reform effort.

But to do so, he may have to craft a legislative remedy to this town's tendency to talk, an effort Baird admits will be difficult and lobbyists say is an overreach.

The conversations in question are secret tips lobbyists get from their contacts on Capitol Hill and pass along to hedge-fund clients, who in turn may use the information to buy or sell a stock. The tips could include, for example, nonpublic information about when a bill is going to be introduced or a key member's opinion on a particular policy.

Several K Street firms supplement their lobbying incomes through this type of "political intelligence" work, serving as pipelines to hedge funds in particular because they often trade stocks more frequently than other businesses, such as mutual funds.

The problem, Baird says, is the trading on information that is not yet public and therefore not readily available to other investors who can't afford to hire lobbyists.

"Clearly, the selling or buying of stock based on this type of 'political intelligence' has the potential to profit some private parties at the expense of others who may not have access to the same information," Baird wrote to the House ethics committee in November after learning of the activity in a report published in The Hill.

Staffers and lawmakers are prevented from releasing classified information. Congressional rules prohibit members or staff from using confidential information available to them as a consequence of their positions to make money. Beyond those, though, there are few formal institutional limitations on what Capitol Hill employees can discuss with outsiders.

It's tricky to deal with political intelligence, Baird acknowledged, because lawmakers and their staffs need to talk with lobbyists about prospective bills to ensure any measure doesn't have unintended consequences.

Defining what is and isn't public information is another complication, Baird said.

"It turns out that it's not easy," Baird says of his efforts to draft a bill.

But Baird says he's determined to shine some light on the practice, which has increased along with the growth of hedge funds in the past decade, because the potential to make big money from the release of the information could have a corrupting influence on the process.

One possible solution Baird suggested was that lobbyists would promise not to pass along information gleaned from Capitol Hill contacts to their hedge funds for investment purposes.

"I think there are ways you can do this," he said.

At a minimum, Baird said, he would press for "clear-cut, full disclosure" of lobbyists' relationships with hedge funds. Lobbyists currently can keep their relationships with hedge funds private. Disclosure rules don't apply because the firms aren't attempting to influence Congress.

Baird said he expected his bill to be part of the broader reform package Democrats offer this year.

But even supporters of broad lobbying reforms said it might be difficult to try to stem the flow of information from Capitol Hill.

"The Hill is so gossip-driven. Information flows all over the place," said Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen, a watchdog group. "It would be hard to define what is unique information."

That said, Claybrook supports an effort to require lobbyists and other political-intelligence practitioners to disclose their clients.

Lobbyists who do political-intelligence work but asked not to be identified because they didn't want to challenge a reform effort publicly in light of the scandals, said their business is not dependent on the hot tips Baird seems to be after.

Some firms do only political-intelligence work; others use it to supplement their lobbying practices.

Because companies don't have to disclose these revenues, it's unclear how big the business is.

One source said that while his firm provides the occasional heads-up about a bill to be introduced or an amendment offered during floor debate, the bulk of its work is more macroeconomic, such as providing advice on which companies may benefit from an energy bill or a particular version of asbestos-litigation reform.

The source equated his practice with a "high-cost media subscription service" because the tips the firm does pass on could be the same type of not-yet-public information that press outlets provide readers. It would be unfair to prevent his firm from profiting from its contacts on Capitol Hill while also allowing reporters to mine their contacts, the source said.

Another lobbyist who advises Wall Street also said his investor clients are rarely looking for a hot tip. More often, clients look for an analysis of a bill or just basic information about how Washington works.

"You can't believe the dumb questions that I get paid to answer," the source said.

When Does A Gift Become A Bribe? (CSM)

By G. Jeffrey Macdonald

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2006

As members of Congress scramble to take cover amid a storm of corruption scandals, professionals of all stripes have fresh reasons to question whether the business-related gifts they give and receive are truly innocent.

Norms vary as to what constitutes a bribe, say ethicists and other experts on the subtle, sometimes manipulative, power of gifts. As a result, individuals in positions of responsibility and trust are likely to get entangled - perhaps tragically - in the absence of explicit policies for what is acceptable.

"If you don't know where the lines are, you may not be able to make the best decision," says Judy Nadler, senior fellow in government ethics at the Markkula Center for Applied Ethics at Santa Clara University in California. Having clear rules in place, she says, "makes it easier when you are tempted."

On Capitol Hill, a plea bargain from Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff has attracted the glare of an unwelcome spotlight. Wary that Mr. Abramoff's legendary largesse might constitute bribery in a Department of Justice probe, dozens in Congress have rushed to donate or return hundreds of thousands of dollars linked to him. Such steps, however, won't undo the times when members allegedly unwound in Abramoff's skybox seats at sporting events or flew to such destinations as the Northern Mariana Islands on his dime.

Congressional rules cap noncampaign-related gifts at $50 per item and $100 per year from any individual, including lunches or other meals.

Abramoff's case threatens to build upon the confessed shame of US Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R) of California, who pled guilty in November to charges of accepting a luxury yacht and other gifts from private firms seeking government contracts. And outside Congress, charges of bribery in the past year have taken down a city councilor in San Jose, Calif., a mayor in Chicopee, Mass., and Chicago's city clerk.

Amid this climate, some professionals are taking steps to ensure that even traditional gifts don't create conflicts of interest.

In medicine, the prescription-drug industry now bans its representatives from doling out gifts worth more than $100 each to physicians, and doctors' spouses are no longer welcome at industry-sponsored "educational" dinners in restaurants.

About 400 physicians and the 60,000-member American Medical Students Association are urging colleagues to go further and take no gifts whatsoever from drugmakers, lest their independence of judgment come into question.

In 2004, New York City joined other school districts that have begun restricting gifts to teachers. The policy of capping gift values at $5 in New York resulted after parents complained that students were getting special treatment in exchange for high-priced gifts.

Hard and fast rules, however, tend to get blurry in international business settings. Even Fortune 500 companies with laudably firm policies have trouble in this area, says Peter Madsen, executive director of the Center for the Advancement of Applied Ethics and Political Philosophy at Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh.

In Asian countries, for instance, refusing a gift is often considered unthinkably rude. And in some less-developed nations, foreigners are sometimes expected to "pay to play."

"Relativism is rampant ... and when you're talking business, cultural relativism becomes a really big problem," Mr. Madsen says.

Multinational corporations, he says, "engage in what we would call a bribe, although perhaps elsewhere it's not [called that], but they do it nonetheless to get the business. So there's all of this, what we would call, 'corruption in government'.... But if you impose your values elsewhere, you're told you're practicing cultural imperialism. So you can't win."

Even in the US, where bribery is said to be less brazen than in some other countries, not all agree at what point a gift becomes a bribe.

For Nadler, any gift given with "an expectation of compensation" has crossed the line into bribery.

Another view holds that a gift becomes a bribe only when the expected compensation is "specific," says Mark Osteen, editor of an essay collection titled, "The Question of the Gift." Decisionmakers need to start declining gifts long before they reach that level, he says.

"When you're in power and someone is giving you a gift, it's pretty difficult for it not to be tainted with some kind of expectation," says Mr. Osteen, professor of literature at Loyola College in Baltimore.

"I would think that a truly ethical person in power - whether it's a politician, a person above you in a job, a religious figure, or a police officer - would want to steer away from that kind of thing because ... the person who gave it is going to expect something back, whether it's specified or not."

Having a no-gifts policy works best, Nadler says. But in situations where a gift cannot be refused, such as one from a foreign host, she suggests accepting it and then publicly donating it to a charity.

Concerning the power of gifts, no ground is so holy as to be immune. At Sinai Temple in Los Angeles, Senior Rabbi David Wolpe notes that the oral and written Judaic traditions emphasize the moral duties of the not-yet-corrupted person who might be tempted to take a bribe.

He points to Exodus 23:8, which warns that "a bribe blinds those who see and twists the words of the righteous."

Consequently, he says he accepts neither monetary gifts nor anything more "extravagant" than, say, a briefcase or a necktie.

"I'm in a much better position than the politician is, because what I dispense is not monetarily valuable," Rabbi Wolpe says.

Yet when making judgment calls, such as evaluating whether bar mitzvah applicants have met minimal study requirements, he appreciates feeling indebted to no one.

"I don't want anyone to be able to say to me, 'How could you say no? I gave you this,' " Wolpe says.

"I don't want it to be about what was given to me. I want it to be about the issue.... Even if they give a large gift to the synagogue, I get that, you know, 'We gave such a big gift to the synagogue, how could you do this?' But at least that gives me one level of removal because I can say ... 'The synagogue promotes exactly the values that I'm trying to enforce here.' "

DOJ_NMG_0011602

To reduce corruption in Congress, the activist group Common Cause is proposing a ban on privately sponsored travel for Congress members and their staffs, as well as a ban on taking personal gifts.

Currently, "no one follows [gift rules] because no one has been checking" to see if rules are being followed, says Michael Surrusco, ethics campaign director at Common Cause.

Yet at this point, he says, Congress still has a long way to go. Among the 535 members of Congress, Mr. Surrusco says he's not aware of one who insists that staffers pay their own way when dining with lobbyists.

House Democrats Hold Off On Ethics Complaints, For Now (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, January 25, 2006

House Democrats have no immediate plans to file complaints against Republicans when the ethics committee is up and running again, according to a top Democratic lawmaker.

As Republicans have hinted they may file formal ethics complaints, Democrats are content to sit on the sidelines for now.

"The Justice Department is moving, and there's no reason to interfere and give the Republicans a tool to say the investigation is being politicized," the Democratic lawmaker said. "That's not in their rhetoric, and right now they have to answer the Justice Department's charges. Once it looks like it's political, they don't have to answer that."

Democrats also said that they would not move forward because the panel remains shuttered after a months-long partisan disagreement over how to staff the committee and that the committee would not pursue an investigation in tandem with the Justice Department.

Still, a handful of House Republicans could be ensnared in the department's wide-ranging influence-peddling probe involving Jack Abramoff, including Rep. Bob Ney (Ohio), identified as the "Representative #1" of a Justice Department inquiry in Abramoff's Jan. 3 plea agreement.

Ney was recently persuaded to step down temporarily as chairman of the House Administration Committee.

With the focus on the Abramoff controversy so far highlighting Republican lawmakers and their possible indictments, GOP lawmakers could have more to gain than Democrats by filing ethics complaints.

Meanwhile, GOP sources say that the new staff director of the ethics committee, William Reilly, is nearly finished hiring an investigative staff.

A Republican aide attributed the Democratic reticence to concern by House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) about possible pressure on the ethics panel's ranking Democrat, Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), to pursue the cases.

"Pelosi won't permit complaints to be filed because she knows that doing so would put pressure on Mollohan to move forward," the aide said. "Pelosi has the best of both worlds because she can criticize the failure to investigate when the only reason they can't investigate is because she won't let them."

The ethics panel has investigations pending into Reps. Jim McDermott (D-Wash.) and Tom DeLay (R-Texas) on hold from the 108th Congress.

Despite the uncertainty, Democrats have their eyes on a House rule that requires complaints to be filed no fewer than 60 days before an election. The deadline for filing a complaint against Ney, given Ohio's May 2 primary, is March 2.

Ney has offered to meet with the ethics panel several times but has not received a response, said his spokesman, Brian Walsh.

"Ney would welcome the opportunity to clear his name. … He is confident that has done nothing wrong and that he will ultimately cleared," Walsh added.

Reps. DeLay, John Doolittle (R-Calif.) and Richard Pombo (R-Calif.) also have ties to the Abramoff probe. In Texas, the primary is set for March 7, so Democrats have missed the 60-day window. But the California primary will take place Aug. 1, so Democrats have until June 1 to file a complaint against Pombo or Doolittle.

Republicans and Democrats have lobbed threats of an ethics war against one other. Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) told reporters last week that it was unfortunate the ethics committee is shut down because "there are people on the other side that should be before the ethics committee and were cued up to go before the ethics committee."

"Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi has never been a party to an ethics truce and has always said that individual members have the right to file a complaint," said Jennifer Crider, Pelosi's spokeswoman.

Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.), who favors taking an aggressive approach in an ethics war against Republicans, is preparing a report titled, "America for Sale: The Cost of Corruption," which she expects to release within the next few weeks, said Eric Burns, Slaughter's spokesman. The report will tie ethics charges against the GOP to what the Democrats consider "horrific" legislative outcomes.

Historically, Indictments Tough To Overcome (HILL)

By Peter Savodnik

The Hill, January 25, 2006

History shows that members of Congress with an indictment hanging over their heads are almost certain to lose their seats — a cautionary tale not only for House Republicans tied to lobbyist Jack Abramoff but the entire GOP conference as a whole.

Republicans with Abramoff ties who could be indicted in the coming weeks include Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio, a target of a Justice Department probe. But a handful of other members have or are suspected of having ties to Abramoff and are watching intently as the events unfold.

Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) has been indicted in a state court on money-laundering charges related to a political committee suspected of channeling corporate money into Texas elections illegally, but so far DeLay has not been indicted for his ties to Abramoff.

While the Congressional Research Service does not keep a tally of all members of Congress ever indicted, anecdotal evidence suggests that the vast majority of indicted members either step down or lose at the polls, a CRS official said.

"It's usually a killer for your political career to be indicted," said the official, who declined to speak openly because of the ongoing, Abramoff-related investigations. "If a member's under indictment and stands for reelection … it really casts such a pall over them.

"The party — they're worried about losing the seat. They really want someone else to run for that seat. And [members] often feel tremendous pressure to resign."

Don Ritchie, a historian with the Senate's Historical Office, estimated that only 10 senators in the nation's history have been indicted, beginning with Ohio's John Smith in 1808.

More recently, Ritchie noted, Sen. David Durenberger (R-Minn.) was indicted in 1993 and 1994 for filing fraudulent reimbursement claims. The senator did not seek reelection in 1994.

Most of the indictments, Ritchie said, dealt with "financial mismanagement."

Smith was accused of conspiracy for what modern-day lawyers might consider treason: he was trying to form a new nation in the western part of the country.

Several House members' careers have been short-circuited by lengthy investigations, guilty pleas or convictions, including Reps. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who resigned last year after he admitted to taking millions of dollars in bribes, and Jay Kim, who lost a primary in 1998, some six years after taking $250,000 in illegal campaign contributions. Both are California Republicans.

Rep. James Traficant, an Ohio Democrat, was expelled from Congress in 2002 after a conviction for bribery, tax evasion and racketeering. Later that year, he launched a failed effort from prison to win back his seat as a write-in candidate.

But an indictment alone has also proved damaging — most famously, perhaps, when veteran Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) was thrown out of his strongly Democratic Chicago seat amid the 1994 investigations of the House post office.

Moreover, the 1994 election shows, the indictment of just a few members can precipitate an avalanche of incumbent losses, which is what Democrats who continue to lambaste Republicans for creating a "culture of corruption" hope will happen in 2006.

The post office and concurrent check-kiting scandals, for instance, led to the indictments of just seven lawmakers, none of whom is still in Congress. But Democrats lost 54 House seats in the subsequent Republican takeover.

This year, Democrats say that if their strategy works they may pick up seats that extend far beyond Ney's or DeLay's districts. One Democratic official in Washington said Colo.-7, Ohio-15, Fla.-22 and N.M.-1 top the party's list of possible pickups.

Ney spokesman Brian Walsh declined to speculate on his boss's plans if he is indicted.

"I'm not going to go down that path," Walsh said.

Walsh said that at a recent rally in Zanesville, Ohio, GOP officials had pledged their support to Ney. Later this week, he added, the congressman will announce his reelection bid for a seventh term.

Criminal misconduct has not always meant premature retirement.

In 1789, Rep. Matthew Lyon of Vermont won reelection after being imprisoned for a conviction on sedition. In 1956, Rep. Thomas Lane won reelection despite having spent four months in prison for tax evasion; he served until 1963.

Rep. Joseph McDade (R-Pa.) was indicted in 1992 on charges that he accepted gifts from defense companies in exchange for contracts. But he managed to stay in office for the better part of the decade; McDade was exonerated in 1996.

Still, Democrats are confident that the growing pool of indictments or possible indictments bodes well for them.

Price Tag For Enforcing Lobby Reform Unclear (HILL)

DOJ_NMG_0011604

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 25, 2006

The offices are nondescript and rarely crowded. No cameras are permitted inside. Visitors strolling the halls of Hart or Cannon would have little reason to know the rooms exist.

But the Senate's Office of Public Records and the House's Legislative Resource Center are poised to become hotbeds of activity this year, with Congress weighing big changes to lobbying disclosure rules that could flood the offices with paper and newfound responsibility.

Public Records Superintendent Pam Gavin said the office would be hard-pressed to determine what it might need to administer a new disclosure regime that the Senate has not yet passed or even debated.

"Whatever we do, I suspect we're going to have to look at our work processes and see if there is any space to make more efficiencies," Gavin said. "Do I think I'm suddenly going to get a lot more money? No."

The Office of Public Records (OPR) collects thousands of lobbying disclosure forms, which are double-checked and provided for public viewing. In private, Gavin's three full-time lobbying staffers send correction letters to the unknown number of lobbyists and firms who have erred in their filings.

Lobbyists who fail to file at all, or who cover their tracks with a technically accurate but misleading disclosure, can easily escape any notice.

"We're not asking anyone in the correction letters if they are telling the truth," Gavin said. "There are people who see competitors in the halls who they believe should be registered. They tell the office, the office sends inquiries."

Yet Gavin acknowledged that this kind of K Street whistle-blowing, which she jokingly called "the lobby wars," is rare. And the OPR does not keep track of how many initial correction letters it sends to lobbyists, making follow-up difficult.

"We don't think it's a statistic that has any relevance," Gavin said. "It's sort of like, the ethics committee sends correction letters on public financial disclosures, and they don't keep statistics on that either."

The OPR has an Internet presence, unlike its counterparts in the Clerk of the House's Office. A new lobbying law passed this session is likely to require the House to post its lobby filings online, although the House Administration Committee, now under Chairman Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.), has yet to assess the practical costs of changes.

"It's a little premature to know that," committee spokesman Jon Brandt said. As for posting lobbyist filings on the Web, "the law doesn't require it to be disclosed. If the law is changed to require it to be disclosed [online], then it will be."

In addition to filings from more than 20,000 lobbyists, the Legislative Resource Center (LRC) also allows visitors to view House members' annual financial disclosures, but not before asking for the name, address and affiliation of those making a search. Curious parties can then check up on who is spying on whom, from eager reporters to staffers peeping at forms filed by their bosses' rivals.

Neither the OPR nor the LRC would disclose how many noncompliant lobbying cases they refer to the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia, who plays the role of lobby police. But of the 200 referrals made by Congress since 2003, prosecutors have pursued only 13, according to U.S. attorney spokesman Channing Phillips.

One senior attorney pores over the list of lobbyists who failed to respond within four months to several letters from the House and Senate asking for corrected disclosures, Phillips said, and "we go on which have merit." Seven of the 13 cases deemed worthy remain unsettled with the lawbreaking lobbyists in question, and three of the remaining six cases exited the system unpunished.

Most proposed lobbying and ethics reforms would double the frequency of lobby filings. Lawmakers have rarely discussed the cost of cracking down, and congressional ethics watchers are beginning to raise questions.

"You can beef up the rules, but if you don't enforce them, and people know that what they're going to do will be ignored, it will get to a point where it's out of control again," Norm Ornstein, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, told reporters Monday.

Dennis Thompson, a professor of political ethics at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government, pointed out that even well-enforced disclosure rules might not repair public disapproval of Congress.

"Disclosure by itself is not only not adequate but can make the problem worse," Thompson said. When annual financial disclosures are released, "instead of looking at patterns of influence, we look at a top 10 list of wealth. We need some serious effort to do something with what's disclosed."

Senate Democratic plans to chill relations between Congress and K Street involve creating an Office of Public Integrity, which would conduct audits and investigations to ensure lobbyists are following the stronger disclosure rules. Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.), a candidate for House majority whip, has released details of a bill that would create an independent lobbying enforcement commission.

Still, conservatives in both chambers will probably rebel against any reform bill that contains the bureaucratic burden of a new lobbying agency or office.

"We don't want to create a whole new entity if it's not necessary," Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) told reporters last week at a joint appearance on lobbying reform with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.). Santorum stressed that Senate Republicans are "open to ideas."

Republicans have started discussing those ideas through a small lobbying-reform working group convened by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), according to Rules Committee spokeswoman Susan Irby. The group is composed of Rules Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.), Santorum, McCain and Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairwoman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

Despite Collins's committee's taking the majority of jurisdiction over the lobbying and ethics overhaul, Irby said the OPR, overseen by the secretary of the Senate, will likely ask Rules for a bigger budget this year.

Absent from the Frist working-group roster is Senate Ethics Committee Chairman George Voinovich (R-Ohio). Both the House and Senate ethics panels have a long-standing policy of declining to investigate members who already face an inquiry from the Justice Department.

Secrecy As A Spoil Of Victory (NYT)

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

Never mind the golf junkets and poolside seminars. One of the rawest displays of lobbyists' power in the Capitol occurred beyond the sight of the public last month, when Republican Congressional negotiators tweaked a budget-cutting bill in order to provide the health insurance industry with a $22 billion windfall. The circumstance of this victory by insurance lobbyists is particularly relevant now that the same Congressional leaders are feverishly vowing to enact lobbying reform. The bill change, dearly sought by the H.M.O. industry, was written by House and Senate lawmakers and staff members in closed-door, Republican-only bargaining sessions - one of the "conference committees" for settling differences in final legislation that are themselves becoming part of the Capitol's influence-peddling scandal.

The current version of this deal-setting routine entirely excludes Democratic lawmakers, who are in the minority but still represent significant numbers of Americans. Rather, the lobbyists who successfully worked for a whopping fix in the Medicare reimbursement formula were far more clued in by cooperative Republicans. This is business as usual in Congress; no one is promising hearings about secretive behavior, skulking about in a black hat or hiring defense lawyers.

The bill change might have gone unnoticed but for the fact that the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office was doing its job in parsing out the last-minute gutting of a formula that was originally intended to produce a $26 billion savings for taxpayers across 10 years. Instead, the final bargainers reduced the projected savings to $4 billion and handed the H.M.O.'s a $22 billion gift by protecting the inflated reimbursements they currently reap through Medicare.

Republican lawmakers insist that nothing nefarious was transacted, and that a minor formula change was grossly miscalculated in the budget office report. It's nice to see the lawmakers coming out of the shadows, if only to make excuses. But their credibility problem lies in the deep secrecy and partisanship that shroud the conference committees.

If the tables were reversed, Democrats might indulge the same hegemony. But right now, some are proposing that the forthcoming attempt at lobbying reform include a rules change to at least open the conference committees to the public and allow minority party lawmakers votes in committee on the final wording of legislation. It remains to be seen whether such an advance in participatory democracy can survive the inevitable assault by dissatisfied lobbyists and their allied incumbents.

Candidates Try To Force Second Ballot (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, January 25, 2006

With Rep. Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) the front-runner in the race to become the next majority leader, Reps. John Boehner (R-Ohio) and John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) are locked in a precarious duel to force a second ballot.

The prospect of a second ballot generates significant uncertainty for each team heading into the Feb. 2 election, but it creates a particularly difficult dynamic between Boehner and Shadegg because the two lawmakers must work together in forcing the second vote while trying to beat each other on the first.

With most members already committed to one of the three candidates, the race is stuck in a momentary lull. This question about a second ballot is just one of the many uncertainties lawmakers must confront when they return next week for the president's State of the Union speech and an as-yet-undetermined number of leadership races.

Members, aides and lobbyists have started to debate this second-ballot question in anticipation of next week's race.

DOJ_NMG_0011606

At press time, Blunt had 91 public supporters, Boehner had 41 and Shadegg had 10. Unlike Blunt and Boehner, Shadegg is not whipping his vote count or releasing the names of public backers.

Some in the House had noted that Blunt's public supporters had not moved much recently — until he added five new endorsements Monday.

The unspoken alliance between Blunt's two challengers appears to benefit Boehner because the Ohio lawmaker claims more public support than Shadegg — but not enough to win the first ballot on his own. That would allow him to face Blunt in a runoff if the acting majority leader is unable to win outright on the first ballot and Shadegg does not eclipse him by Feb. 2 — both of which are distinct possibilities.

Shadegg has begun to distance himself from Boehner in the past week, casting himself as the one true conservative with "the real and consistent record of reform," but he is also working with the Ohio lawmaker to criticize Blunt.

Shadegg called Boehner last week after hearing that Blunt had declined separate requests to debate his two opponents on NBC's "Meet the Press" and "Fox News Sunday," Shadegg spokesman Michael Steel said yesterday. After that conversation, the two issued a joint statement criticizing Blunt for declining the invitations for a public debate.

In addition, the two camps have repeatedly questioned Blunt's decision not to resign his position as majority whip after declaring his candidacy for the leader's role.

While Shadegg is attempting to accentuate his difference with Boehner, members and staff have questioned the effect their apparent cooperation would have on Shadegg's campaign.

"Shadegg is running a general-election strategy in the primary," one GOP aide said. "He doesn't seem to be focused on beating Boehner."

Boehner continues to praise Shadegg's candidacy, even as the Arizona conservative wins the support of conservative media outlets and conservative, reform-minded Republicans such as Reps. Jeff Flake (Ariz.) and Mike Pence (Ind.). Boehner officials even issued releases touting their boss's reform credentials after the endorsements by Flake and Pence.

In response to a question about whether Boehner was deliberately running with Shadegg to force a second ballot, Boehner spokesman Kevin Smith wrote, "Mr. Boehner and Mr. Shadegg are the two candidates in this race talking about the need to change the status quo, and to the extent that Mr. Shadegg's candidacy has helped to make reform and change the dominant topic of conversation in the race, John has embraced his candidacy."

Blunt is running a quiet campaign as the established member of the leadership, while Boehner and Shadegg are fighting for the role of reform candidate.

Even though the race to replace DeLay has not attracted headlines in most congressional districts, a handful of regional newspapers have seized on the race — and Shadegg's candidacy, in particular — to encourage their representatives to make wholesale changes in the current leadership.

Shadegg has been the toast of conservative editorial boards since entering the contest almost two weeks ago. The Dallas Morning News, the Mobile Register in Alabama and the Rocky Mountain News in Denver all endorsed the former Republican Study Committee chairman in the past week, and The Palm Beach Post and The Arizona Republic took their push for change a step further by separately challenging two potentially vulnerable Republicans, Reps. Clay Shaw (Fla.) and Rick Renzi (Ariz.), for supporting Blunt.

Shaw is facing a tough reelection while simultaneously waging a campaign to become chairman of the powerful Ways and Means Committee. The Post wrote that, by supporting Blunt, "Shaw is also supporting corruption as usual in Congress." That day, his Democratic opponent, state Sen. Ron Klein, issued a statement condemning Shaw for backing Blunt.

However, grassroots pressure has not yet become significant enough for a bloc of members publicly to shift their support from one candidate to another.

Because the vote will be determined by 232 members of the Republican Conference, media endorsements hold much less sway, but grassroots criticism could be detrimental for the party as members prepare for the midterm election in November.

Blunt has already claimed enough support to win the election on the first ballot. Yet this race is unlike tough votes he has whipped over the years because the secret ballot will not allow him to see who, if anyone, has betrayed him. Blunt's claim has solidified his position as front-runner, but it could damage him politically if the votes don't back him up Feb. 2.

"Congressman Blunt remains confident he has the support of his colleagues needed to win this race," spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger said. "He looks forward to wrapping up this campaign and getting to the important work on behalf of the American people that House Republicans do so well."

Blunt has attracted the most support of the three contenders from the revolutionary class of 1994, of which Shadegg is a member. Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.), who came in with Shadegg, formally backed his classmate yesterday.

Boehner, meanwhile, has the most House committee chairmen publicly behind him, attracting the support of six of them (excluding Boehner himself). Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) has not publicly announced his support, but he worked closely with Boehner on pension reform last year and supported him in his 1998 race for Policy Committee chairman against then-Rep. J.C. Watts (R-Okla.) in 1998. Likewise, International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), who has not endorsed any candidate for majority leader, publicly backed Boehner in 1998.

Members of the conference have already been notified that a second ballot would occur immediately after the first, conference spokesman Sean Spicer said yesterday. In addition to the race for majority leader, the conference will also vote for a new chairman of the Republican Policy Committee and any openings that result from the races. That could include a race for majority whip if Blunt wins the race for majority leader.

The other details are still being worked out, Spicer said, and it is still unclear whether there will be any other elections. Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) could challenge Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), and Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) could also join that race.

Unlikely GOP Allies Back Shadegg (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 25, 2006

A vocal House conservative and the leader of a liberal wing of House Republicans united yesterday to back Rep. John Shadegg to be majority leader, saying he is the best choice to bring true reform.

"We're most likely to see bold initiatives if John Shadegg is elected majority leader," said Rep. Charles Bass of New Hampshire, chairman of the Tuesday Group, a gathering of more liberal House Republicans.

Mr. Bass announced the endorsement yesterday with Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican, weeks after the two first spurred the leadership race by circulating a petition calling for such elections.

The Republican Party has been shaken by the indictment of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and many are now discussing lobbying reform, budget reform and other changes.

Mr. Shadegg, Arizona Republican, made a late entrance into the majority leader's race, joining Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio and front-runner Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, who has been acting majority leader since Rep. Tom DeLay, Texas Republican, stepped down from the post in September.

Mr. Bass and Mr. Flake worked closely together last year to try to reform the budget process, enforce fiscal discipline, reduce the number of earmarks and create a more open, honest budget structure. Their efforts were largely unsuccessful, but both said yesterday Mr. Shadegg is the one to work with them to make those changes.

"John has been a reformer from the beginning," Mr. Flake said.

"I want moderate Republicans to understand that if you care about reform and you want a fresh face, this is the man to support," Mr. Bass added.

"This shows again that this race is not about moderate versus conservative -- it is a choice between real reform and the status quo," Mr. Shadegg said in a statement.

Mr. Boehner, meanwhile, praised Mr. Bass and Mr. Flake "for helping bring greater attention to the need for reducing pork and wasteful earmarks."

He noted that he has never asked for a single pork-barrel project for his congressional district.

"I look forward to working with them as majority leader on earmark and budget reforms so we can change the way Congress does business," Mr. Boehner said.

A senior House Republican aide said Mr. Boehner is likely wooing the Shadegg camp so they'll vote for him in the likelihood that none of the three candidates win a majority of Republicans and members must vote a second time in a runoff between the top two candidates, likely Mr. Boehner and Mr. Blunt.

Mr. Flake agreed that Mr. Boehner is solid on the earmark issue, but said Mr. Shadegg is still his first choice. Mr. Bass said all three candidates are philosophically in the same conservative camp, but Mr. Shadegg "will restore America's faith" in Congress.

Mr. Blunt's office made no public statement on the pair's endorsement, but continued to say Mr. Blunt has enough public and private commitments to win the race.

A secret-ballot vote is set for Feb. 2.

Arizonan Running For House Majority Leader Wins Backing Of 2 Who Helped Ease Out DeLay (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24 - Two House Republicans who pushed to keep Representative Tom DeLay from regaining his post as majority leader threw their support for the job behind Representative John Shadegg of Arizona on Tuesday, portraying him as the candidate who represents a true change in party direction.

"If you care about reform and you want a fresh face, this is the man to support," said Representative Charles Bass, who was joined by Representative Jeff Flake in endorsing Mr. Shadegg over the two other candidates: Roy Blunt of Missouri, the acting majority leader, and John A. Boehner of Ohio.

There was no surprise in the pledge by Mr. Flake, like Mr. Shadegg an Arizona conservative. But Mr. Bass, of New Hampshire, is a moderate leader in the House, and he acknowledged that it would be hard for some to accept his support of Mr. Shadegg, arguably the most conservative of the contenders.

Mr. Bass said that he did not see significant ideological differences among the three and that Mr. Shadegg had made a stronger commitment to "bring transparency, accountability and necessary disclosure back to the legislative scene here in Washington."

Still, with little more than a week to go before the vote for a permanent successor to Mr. DeLay, Mr. Blunt remains in the lead with a public list of 90 backers. Mr. Boehner counts 46 public backers, and Mr. Shadegg, who entered the race late, about a dozen. Mr. Blunt has said he has public or private commitments from more than the 117 lawmakers needed to win, while Mr. Boehner claims about 90.

Mr. Blunt, who in 2002 was elected party whip, the No. 3 House leadership position, and Mr. Boehner, a former member of the leadership who is chairman of the Committee on Education and the Workforce, have come under criticism from some lawmakers of both parties, as well as Republican operatives outside Congress, who say both men symbolize the status quo in a year when Congress has been rocked by scandal.

That was a point driven home Tuesday by Mr. Flake and Mr. Bass, who earlier this month were the architects of a petition drive that helped persuade Mr. DeLay, under indictment on campaign finance charges in Texas, to abandon the idea of reclaiming his leadership post.

"What we're saying is that you want someone who doesn't have to have an epiphany on reform," Mr. Flake said, "somebody who's been there from the beginning, pushing reform, and doesn't have to have an election-year conversion on the topic."

In a statement responding to the endorsements for a rival, Mr. Boehner simply commended the two lawmakers for their push to make it harder for members of Congress to get money for pet projects. A spokeswoman for Mr. Blunt said that he remained confident he would win and that his backers represented diverse ideological viewpoints among House Republicans.

Welcoming the new backing, Mr. Shadegg said: "These men - a moderate leader and a conservative leader - recognize that our party faces a crisis. They were out in front when it was a difficult thing to do."

Both Mr. Boehner and Mr. Blunt have their own prominent centrist backers. Representatives Christopher Shays of Connecticut and Mark Steven Kirk of Illinois are among moderates supporting Mr. Blunt, while Representatives Michael N. Castle of Delaware and Ray LaHood of Illinois are behind Mr. Boehner.

Republican moderates have wielded greater influence in the House in recent months, with the leadership relying heavily on their support to win close budget and spending votes in the face of unified Democratic opposition. And, amid the corruption scandal revolving around the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, they have joined with conservatives in pushing for significant changes in lobbying rules and more open consideration of legislation.

All three candidates for majority leader have embraced some changes in the rules governing the relationships between lawmakers and lobbyists, though they disagree on the details.

Those three, as well as candidates for other leadership posts, will spend the next week trying to solidify support ahead of the Feb. 2 vote. Representatives Bass and Flake said they still considered the outcome of the election uncertain despite Mr. Blunt's claim to have sufficient votes to win.

"A lot can happen in nine days," Mr. Bass said. "It is ultimately a secret ballot."

Kinky Money (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, January 25, 2006

Seeing as he's an outspoken social conservative, some folks were surprised to find out that one of the largest contributors to Rep. Roy Blunt's (R-Mo.) political action committee last year was a businessman who made his fortune in the 1990s off the phone-sex business.

DOJ_NMG_0011609

Jeffrey Prosser, dubbed by the Columbia Journalism Review in a 1998 story "a world-class phone-sex operator," gave $5,000 to Blunt's Rely On Your Beliefs fund in 2005 and his wife, Dawn Prosser, gave another $5,000, making them the largest donor couple to Blunt's PAC.

Prosser, who owns the Virgin Islands Telephone Co., its cable television company and the territory's largest newspaper, was scheduled to "shed" the phone-sex side of his business in a complicated split with his partner, CJR reported. But it's hard to ignore his recent past raking in the bucks off porn chat lines.

The donations have given giddy Democrats an opening to attack Blunt, in tacky and personal ways. "If I received special interest money from phone-sex magnates, my eyebrows would be in surprise mode all the time, too," one Democratic aide told HOH. "Though, in truth, the phone sex donors probably gave to Blunt's PAC because up until Tom DeLay stepped aside — post-indictment — Roy Blunt was known as 'whip.'"

Blunt's ROYB Fund executive director, Keri Ann Hayes, said the Congressman had no clue that Prosser was a 1-900 kind of a guy. "Mr. Blunt was not aware of the colorful history of this individual contributor when his PAC accepted the donation," she said.

Hayes said Blunt will not return the money because "the funds were given in a 100 percent legal and ethical fashion."

Calling Miss Manners. Rep. Brian Baird (D-Wash.) must have been channeling Emily Post when he wrote a letter lecturing a college student — who had just been awarded a scholarship in Baird's name — on how to write a proper thank-you note. And the student must have been channeling Karl Rove when he retaliated with a full-on political attack on Baird.

The letter exchanges have become "the" topic of Washington state political gossip. Compiled in a tidy little file (by state GOP operatives, perhaps?) the letters were sent en masse to Washington delegation members, Senators and their staff ... and to HOH.

The student, Kevin Nelson, who attends Centralia College in Centralia, Wash., won the Congressman Brian Baird and Rachel Nugent Scholarship award this past fall to help send him to business or law school. His thank-you note to the Congressman and his wife wasn't so swift: a bland, typed, one-paragraph note, addressed impersonally to the "Brian Baird Scholarship."

Baird, again channeling Ms. Post, wrote to the student with what he said he hoped would be received as "a friendly and helpful suggestion."

"Your note, a copy of which is attached, was, quite frankly, not very impressive to say the least," Baird wrote. "Perhaps you have not been given instruction in how to write formal letters, but let us suggest that you learn. If you truly wish to advance in business and law, you will need to know how to write a proper letter."

Baird went on to tell the young man that he should learn how to write "a truly thoughtful and expressive letter of gratitude," one that should be handwritten, preferably. "If your handwriting is as poor as mine, I certainly understand a typed alternative, but at the very least what you write should be in a format that shows you spent more than two minutes preparing it."

It was the distinct tone of condescension that struck a raw nerve in Nelson, as well as the fact that Baird had CCed his letter on proper etiquette to the Centralia College Scholarship Office. Nelson, who is no stranger to politics — he's a precinct committee officer in Lewis County, Wash. — whipped off letters to the state Republican Party and to both Senators in the Washington delegation, telling them how offended he was by Baird's letter.

"In his letter he accused me of ignorance and a lack of courtesy — telling me that a proper thank you note should have been longer and on a more appropriate letterhead," Nelson wrote in a letter to his state GOP. "Because of his attack on my character, I felt compelled to respond."

Baird said he wasn't attacking the young man's character, just giving the lad a little guidance from a former professor. Spokeswoman Meghan O'Shaughnessy said Baird "did not intend this to be blown out of proportion like this." He was only providing a "friendly and helpful suggestion."

Bummed at Begala. Former presidential campaign aides are fit to be tied over the way they and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) are portrayed in the new book "Take It Back" by Democratic strategists Paul Begala and James Carville. They were seething when they watched "Meet the Press" on Sunday morning, when host Tim Russert, quoting a passage written by Begala, read aloud:

"Our friends who ran the Kerry campaign continue to insist they did have a message. Here's what they called a message: J-HOS. That's right, J-HOS. It stands for jobs, healthcare, oil, security. They talked and they talk[ed] but voters weren't listening or more accurately, couldn't hear any message in the laundry list of issues. Without a message, Democrats were, if you'll pardon the expression, J-HOSED."

"Ouch," Russert said. Ouch is certainly what the former Kerry presidential campaign aides are saying, too.

One former Kerry speechwriter said he and others were "taken aback" because Begala was advising the campaign and, according to him, helped write the stump speech that was based on J-HOS issues. "We won't be J-Spun because we were J-there," quipped the speechwriter. "Mr. Begala was there at the scene of the crime writing that speech, and we haven't J-forgotten. The pander of candor doesn't work if you cover up the truth."

But Begala said the Kerry aides are suffering from revisionist history syndrome. He categorically denies having helped write the J-HOS issues platform that he trashed in his book. "Nice try," he told HOH. "They're gonna have to wash the stench of their own failure off themselves."

Ouch again.

Begala said he tried his hardest to get Kerry to "have a message." He suggested: "You can't trust George W. Bush." But the Kerry camp, he said, "didn't have a message, and they didn't want one."

The Money Maw (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

Washington so far has managed to take the much-hyped "Abramoff Effect" in stride. There was a little hiccup, to be sure, when the birthday bash-fundraiser tonight for Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) moved from powerhouse lobbyist Cassidy & Associates offices to the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

Tonight also turns out to be all-Montana night, as Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), who's not even running this year, has invited lobbyists to a dinner at a tony restaurant at 9th and K Streets NW. That's also $2,000 for political action committees and $1,000 for individuals. (So first hors d'oeuvres for Burns, a little song and then down the hill to Baucus's for dinner.)

Can't make it to dinner? No problem. Baucus will be in the Cassidy skybox at the MCI Center raising money at a Bon Jovi concert next week.

Out of town tonight? No problem. You are cordially invited to attend a reception in support of Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who's also not running this year. It's a cheap-o, just $500 a person and $1,000 a PAC, at his apartment in Georgetown on Feb. 6.

That is scheduled to be the first day of debate in the Senate on the very complicated asbestos trust fund legislation. Specter is leading the debate on his bill that aims to take care of people exposed to asbestos fibers.

The invite, we were told, was sent to many of the lobbyists involved on the many, many sides of the issue. Specter, chatting with our colleague Jeffrey H. Birnbaum , said this is an annual event that he does during his birthday week and no particular lobbying interests were singled out.

If you can't go, send a card. It's his 76th on Feb. 12.Farewell, Graham Farewell

Did you mark your calendars next week for a "farewell reception" Tuesday "honoring John Graham ," the administrator of the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs at the Office of Management and Budget?

That's the super-powerful office that oversees many business regulations. The lobbying firm Valis Associates, which lists manufacturing, telecommunications and energy groups among its 2005 clients, had booked the Committee on Small Business room in the Rayburn House Office Building for the event.

Graham has often been blasted for being pro-business, and some hypersensitive eyebrows arched yesterday about this gathering. But he is leaving his job March 1, and people throw farewell receptions all the time to thank oversight officials for jobs well done.

Even so, OMB spokesman Alex Conant , asked yesterday about the reception, said: "After it was first cleared by the ethics office, our understanding of the basic event changed and no longer fits within our ethical guidelines, so it was canceled." We're told the cancellation came around 5:30 p.m.Tiebreaker Looms on FCC Horizon

The Federal Communications Commission may be a step closer to filling its long-vacant third Republican seat. The name of Robert M. McDowell , senior vice president and assistant general counsel at the Comptel telecom trade association, is being floated for the seat, Reuters reported, which would give FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin a working majority. There hasn't been a GOP majority on the commission since Michael K. Powell left as chairman in March 2005.

Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), whose support is key -- and there has been to-ing and fro-ing between him and the White House for months over the slot -- said yesterday he would support McDowell.For Lawmakers, a One-Night Sand

Neither rain nor storm nor gloom of night nor even a "debilitating sandstorm" will deter congressional delegations from their appointed rounds. In fact, a codel headed by Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) used a weekend sandstorm in Iraq to tout that it had "established a landmark as being the first such group to stay overnight with American troops in Fallujah."

Of course the group, which included Reps. Jim Gerlach (R-Pa.), Todd R. Platts (R-Pa.) and Stephen Lynch (D-Mass.), didn't have much choice, because they arrived by air at the base in Fallujah and were marooned by the storm.

Why, there wasn't even a chance to stroll the back streets of Fallujah and ask folks how things are going. Even so, the hardy band, which had earlier stopped in Kuwait to meet with Kuwaiti officials, media and women activists, took off the next day for Afghanistan.What's Left of the Score

Speaking of the MCI Center, a Loop Fan checking out the scoreboard at a Wizards game the other night noticed the fine banner ad for MZM Inc. That was the defense contracting firm founded by Mitchell J. Wade , who's under investigation for certain dealings with former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.). Cunningham pleaded guilty to conspiring to take millions in bribes from contractors.

MZM was sold over the summer and is now known as Athena Innovative Solutions Inc., but its MCI account still must be paid. The ad says "MZM Inc. Providing Solutions Through Innovation."

Innovation? Sounds like pretty traditional stuff.

Bush The Incompetent (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

Incompetence is not one of the seven deadly sins, and it's hardly the worst attribute that can be ascribed to George W. Bush. But it is this president's defining attribute. Historians, looking back at the hash that his administration has made of his war in Iraq, his response to Hurricane Katrina and his Medicare drug plan, will have to grapple with how one president could so cosmically botch so many big things -- particularly when most of them were the president's own initiatives.

In numbing profusion, the newspapers are filled with litanies of screw-ups. Yesterday's New York Times brought news of the first official assessment of our reconstruction efforts in Iraq, in which the government's special inspector general depicted a policy beset, as Times reporter James Glanz put it, "by gross understaffing, a lack of technical expertise, bureaucratic infighting [and] secrecy." At one point, rebuilding efforts were divided, bewilderingly and counterproductively, between the Army Corps of Engineers and, for projects involving water, the Navy. That's when you'd think a president would make clear in no uncertain terms that bureaucratic turf battles would not be allowed to impede Iraq's reconstruction. But then, the president had no guiding vision for how to rebuild Iraq -- indeed, he went to war believing that such an undertaking really wouldn't require much in the way of American treasure and American lives.

It's the president's prescription drug plan (Medicare Part D), though, that is his most mind-boggling failure. As was not the case in Iraq or with Katrina, it hasn't had to overcome the opposition of man or nature. Pharmacists are not resisting the program; seniors are not planting car bombs to impede it (not yet, anyway). But in what must be an unforeseen development, people are trying to get their medications covered under the program. Apparently, this is a contingency for which the administration was not prepared, as it has been singularly unable to get its own program up and running.

Initially, Part D's biggest glitch seemed to be the difficulty that seniors encountered in selecting a plan. But since Part D took effect on Jan. 1, the most acute problem has been the plan's failure to cover the 6.2 million low-income seniors whose medications had been covered by Medicaid. On New Year's Day, the new law shifted these people's coverage to private insurers. And all hell broke loose.

Pharmacists found that the insurers didn't have the seniors' names in their systems, or charged them far in excess of what the new law stipulated -- and what the seniors could afford. In California fully 20 percent of the state's 1.1 million elderly Medicaid recipients had their coverage denied. The state had to step in to pick up the tab for their medications. California has appropriated $150 million for the medications, and estimates that it will be out of pocket more than $900 million by 2008-09. Before Jan. 1 the Bush administration had told California that it would save roughly $120 million a year once Part D was in effect.

California's experience is hardly unique. To date at least 25 states and the District have had to defray the costs to seniors that Part D was supposed to cover. What's truly stunning about this tale is that, while officials may not have known how many non-indigent seniors would sign up of their own accord, they always knew that these 6.2 million seniors would be shifted into the plan on the first day of the year. There were absolutely no surprises, and yet administration officials weren't even remotely prepared.

No such problems attended the creation of Medicare itself in the mid-1960s. Then, a governmental agency simply assumed responsibility for seniors' doctor and hospital visits. But, financially beholden to both the drug and insurance industries, the Bush administration and the Repsublican Congress mandated that millions of Americans have their coverage shifted to these most byzantine of bureaucracies.

This is, remember, the president's signature domestic initiative, just as the Iraq war is his signature foreign initiative.

How could a president get these things so wrong? Incompetence may describe this presidency, but it doesn't explain it. For that, historians may need to turn to the seven deadly sins: to greed, in understanding why Bush entrusted his new drug entitlement to a financial mainstay of modern Republicanism. To sloth, in understanding why Incurious George has repeatedly ignored the work of experts whose advice runs counter to his desires.

More and more, the key question for this administration is that of the great American sage, Casey Stengel: Can't anybody here play this game?

Terrorists, By Any Name (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

Osama bin Laden's latest tape was such big news last week that its coverage swamped some other major terror news: that the Bush Administration has rounded up some of America's most dangerous domestic terrorists.

The Justice Department on Friday released a 65-count indictment against 11 members of an animal-rights and ecoterrorism outfit that for more than four years had spread violence and destruction across five Western states. Using fire and explosives, the individuals stand accused of targeting ranger stations, animal-holding facilities, lumber companies, timber farms, a ski resort and even a police department. Eight have been detained; another three are believed to be hiding outside the country.

Credit here goes to the FBI, which in recent years has listed green extremists as a top domestic terror threat -- responsible for more than 1,200 criminal acts and millions of dollars in damage. In recent years these outfits have been expanding their scope, targeting bodies that are only marginally linked to practices they resent. The New York Stock Exchange's recent decision to postpone the listing of Huntingdon Life Sciences -- a U.K. animal-research company that has been a top terrorist target for years -- was put down to the Exchange's worry that it would be next on the hit list.

Law enforcement agencies have made some important arrests in recent years, yet they still face difficulties tracking down these thugs -- who operate in underground cells linked to organizations such as the Earth Liberation Front or Animal Liberation Front. Oklahoma Senator Jim Inhofe last year introduced legislation to give authorities more tools to prosecute ecoterrorists; current statutes don't cover many ecoterrorist activities, such as threats or coercion against third-party targets. The sooner Congress takes this up the better, and more news coverage of their widespread threats and violence wouldn't hurt either.

Oil Drops On Saudi Pledge To Keep Market Supplied (FT)

By Neil Dennis

Financial Times, January 25, 2006

Zinc hit a record on Tuesday as inventory declines and the threat of strikes in Peru added to concerns that supply was already likely to be outstripped by demand.

The metal, used as an anti-corrosive coating for steel, hit $2,230 a tonne, in spite of news that workers at three of Volcan's mines in Peru were to return to work tomorrow. The company fears however, that more walkouts will take place next month. Peru is the world's third biggest producer of zinc.

Daily zinc output from Volcan was down by 40 per cent after six days of the strike. Meanwhile, inventories in warehouses monitored by the London Metal Exchange yesterday fell to their lowest levels since September 2001.

"We see the back end of the forward price curve staying well supported, due to severe medium-term supply constraints, with far forward prices currently catching up with strong performance in other base metals," said Ingrid Sternby at Barclays Capital. Three-month zinc on the LME closed up $44 to $2,229 a tonne.

Lead also hit a record price, in spite of inventories rising in LME warehouses, as it too began catching up with the other base metals.

The threat of strikes in Mexico has helped underpin lead prices this year, while speculators expect a repeat of last year's deficit, which was in excess of 100,000 tonnes. Three-month lead gained $33 to $1,339 a tonne, just $1 off its record earlier in the day.

Crude prices fell after Saudi Arabia pledged to pump more oil to cover supply problems in Nigeria.

While the problems with militant activity in Nigeria and the nuclear debate with Iran persisted on Tuesday, Saudi Arabia's pledge to ensure supply levels from the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries did not drop took the heat out of prices.

Analysts at Société Générale believed the market was now starting to price in the Iran effect. "Although the dispute with Iran could have a devastating impact on the supply-demand balance, the market seems still cautious in pricing this possible outcome," said analyst Frédéric Lasserre. He added: "One could argue that this simply reflects its expectations that everything will be done to avoid an oil embargo."

But Merrill Lynch said these geopolitical factors had led it to upgrade its average forecasts for 2006 and 2007 on both Nymex West Texas Intermediate and Brent by $5 a barrel. This would take its average price on WTI to $57 a barrel and Brent to $56 in 2006, and to $47 and $46 respectively in 2007. By midday in New York, Nymex WTI for March delivery was down 25 cents to $67.85 a barrel, while March Brent eased 25 cents to $65.92.

Market Makes Another Push (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

Investors, still woozy after Friday's mauling, managed to stay on their feet for a second day in a row Tuesday. While the gains were moderate, they at least helped investors regain a semblance of confidence in the market.

"It's like when you've had a little too much to drink, it takes you a few days to get your legs back," said Barry Ritholtz, chief market strategist of Ritholtz Capital Partners.

The Dow industrials gained 23.45 points to 10712.22. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 3.04 to 1266.86 and the Nasdaq Composite Index, heavy with tech stocks, gained 16.78 points to 2265.25.

Small stocks rallied. The Russell 2000, a barometer of small companies, surged 10.20 points, or 1.44%, to 718.02. The Dow Transports gained 99.27 points, or 2.38%, to 4275.02, amid a decline in oil prices.

Light, sweet crude-oil prices fell $1.04 to $67.06 on the New York Mercantile Exchange ahead of a weekly inventory report Wednesday expected to show a solid build in oil stock piles as warm weather persists in the Northeast.

Now, as earnings season cranks into high gear and with five Dow components reporting Tuesday, investors are getting a better look at how companies performed at the end of 2005. Despite a wave of high-profile misses last week from bellwethers such as Citigroup and Intel, results so far are coming in slightly better than forecast, according to data from earnings tracker Thomson Financial.

About 25% of the companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index have reported results as of Tuesday afternoon. Somewhat surprisingly, given all the slipups, those companies have topped expectations by 4%, compared with an average of 3% historically, according to David Dropsy, an earnings analyst at Thomson.

The best performing sector so far: consumer-discretionary stocks, which have topped estimates by 16%, though just 23% of companies in the sector have reported earnings.

The mood on Wall Street, though, is more downbeat after the high-profile misses last week. A number of professional investors, though, say they expect companies to continue to post solid earnings for their latest quarter.

Tuesday, strong results from United Technologies, which gained nearly 4%, provided investors a welcome respite from misses by other headline grabbers such as General Electric and Citigroup, which helped trigger Friday's selloff. But the day wasn't without a downside, as DuPont, Johnson & Johnson, 3M and Texas Instruments each served up results that disappointed Wall Street forecasts.

Analyst upgrades of Coca-Cola and Wal-Mart Stores, and a solid earnings report from McDonald's also helped the market, though stocks finished well off their highs for the day.

DuPont's fourth-quarter net income fell 45%7 due to hurricane disruptions and other production outages. The chemical behemoth also warned that the weakness in earnings would continue into the first few months of 2006. Its shares fell 0.7%.

Johnson & Johnson slid 3% after it hit earnings targets for a gain of 73 cents a share, but sales of $12.75 billion fell below targets for $13.18 billion. And 3M, which topped fourth-quarter forecasts by a penny, slid 1.4% after the company said it expects to post first-quarter earnings in the range of $1.10 to $1.14 a share, below expectations for a gain of $1.15.

On the plus side, United Technologies reported fourth-quarter earnings8 excluding extraordinary items of 71 cents a share on revenue of $11.26 billion, topping earnings expectations by a penny. Analysts had expected the maker of Pratt & Whitney engines and Sikorsky aircraft to post sales of $11.1 billion.

Shares of McDonald's gained 0.4% after the company posted net income of 31 cents a share for the fourth quarter, in line with estimates. Sales of $5.23 billion were above targets for $5.18 billion.

In major market action:

Stocks rose9. On the Big Board, where 1.9 billion shares traded, 2,266 stocks rose and 1,077 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.1 billion shares traded, 2,002 rose and 1,017 declined.

Bonds fell10. The benchmark 10-year Treasury note lost 9/32, or $2.81 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.394%. The 30-year bond fell 18/32 to yield 4.572%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar rose.11 It traded at 114.59 yen, up from 114.46 yen late Monday, while the euro fell to $1.2282 from $1.2306.

Cost-Cutting At Daimler To Eliminate 6,000 Jobs (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0011614

By Carter Dougherty International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

FRANKFURT, Jan. 24 - DaimlerChrysler said Tuesday that it would eliminate 6,000 white-collar jobs, 20 percent of its administrative work force around the world, taking its cost-cutting drive beyond the factory floor.

The company said it would save $1.8 billion a year after this and other streamlining efforts were completed by the end of 2008. Of the white-collar cuts, 30 percent would come from the management level.

"Over the last several years, we focused on our automotive business and started to streamline the core processes in our divisions," Dieter Zetsche, the chief executive, said in a statement on Tuesday. "But to safeguard our future in this competitive global industry, we need to apply that same equation across all general and administrative functions."

While declining to speculate where the cuts would occur, Mr. Zetsche said that the pool of employees affected was overwhelmingly in Germany, where the company is based. About 57 percent of the company's white-collar employees are in Germany, with 25 percent in the United States and Canada, and the rest spread throughout the world, he said.

The move follows Ford Motor's announcement Monday that it would eliminate as many as 30,000 jobs over the next six years, and it further hardened Mr. Zetsche's reputation as a cost-cutter.

In his previous post as chief of the Chrysler division, he eliminated 26,000 jobs, turning it around in a manner that its American competitors, Ford and General Motors, are trying to emulate. In September, Mr. Zetsche pushed through 8,500 job cuts at the Mercedes car group, which he directs personally alongside his job as chief executive.

Mr. Zetsche succeeded Jürgen E. Schrempp as chief on Jan. 1, and hinted at the time that management jobs would need to go. Tuesday's announcement was his first major move as chief.

Shares of Daimler rallied in response to the news, increasing $2.60, to $54.84.

Mr. Zetsche also announced that he and other members of the management board based at headquarters in Stuttgart would move from an office tower in the Möhringen district to offices near a Mercedes-Benz production line in Untertürkheim, another section of the city.

In a nod to the engineering traditions that made Mercedes a global synonym for high performance, Mr. Zetsche called Untertürkheim "the cradle of the Daimler organization." The move underscored Mr. Zetsche's determination to get executives and engineers working more closely and solve the chronic quality problems at the luxury brand, analysts said.

Michael Raab, an analyst with Sal Oppenheim in Frankfurt, said, "Everything began where they are now going." He added, "This is clearly intended as a signal that Zetsche wants to get back to the roots."

Mr. Zetsche said that the job-cutting plan - affecting areas like finance, human resources and strategic planning - would take three years and cost Daimler 2 billion euros ($2.5 billion), although he emphasized that reductions among senior executives would be in place by March 1.

"You have low-hanging fruit that you will be able to benefit from in the first 12 months," Mr. Zetsche said. "Then you have things that require significant changes in the way you do your business."

With Mr. Zetsche already serving as both chief executive and head of Mercedes, further consolidation of responsibilities will reduce the number of management board members to 9, from 12.

White-Collar Blues In The Auto Industry (WP)

By Amy Joyce

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

DaimlerChrysler AG said yesterday that it is cutting 6,000 administrative and management jobs, including about 1,500 in the United States, becoming the latest automaker to shed thousands of white-collar workers.

The announcement came a day after that of a Ford Motor Co. restructuring, which includes a reduction of about 4,000 salaried positions, some of them contract workers, by the end of March.

General Motors Corp. eliminated 6 to 7 percent of its 36,000 salaried employees each of the past three years "through normal attrition and special programs," according to spokesman Stefan Weinmann. GM expects a similar reduction this year.

While U.S. automakers are eliminating unionized workers by the tens of thousands, they are also paring their ranks of engineers, executives and other white-collar workers.

Oftentimes, white-collar, nonunion workers in the manufacturing industries are on the front line of staff reductions. Companies do not have to go through negotiations to eliminate nonunion jobs.

The workers often cost less to fire because they do not have the same protections that organized workers have. For example, the Big Three automakers pay into a job bank, which pays hourly workers even if they have been laid off.

"White-collar workers in an economic crunch usually get it in the neck first," said Robert Bruno, professor of labor and industrial relations at the University of Illinois. "They are not the largest number, but they were the easiest to let go."

Both blue-collar and white-collar jobs have fallen victim to increased productivity from new technology.

"We see it in engineering, where they moved from a physical to a virtual world," said David E. Cole, chairman of the Center for Automotive Research. The work is now "heavily computer-based, which has enabled a huge increase in productivity, and fewer people are required."

Ford's white-collar cuts, first announced in November, will reduce North American salary costs by 10 percent, the company said. Ford cut an additional 2,750 white-collar jobs earlier last year.

The company would not release details of severance packages available to white-collar workers. The amount a worker receives in a separation or severance agreement depends on years of service, said Marcey Evans, a spokeswoman.

The company employs 35,000 salaried workers in North American automotive operations.

Ford also started reducing its corporate officer ranks -- executives appointed by the board and at the level of vice president or above -- yesterday, hoping to cut the number by six by the end of the quarter.

Stephen G. Lyons will retire from his position as group vice president for North American marketing, sales and service. He will be replaced by Cisco Codina, vice president in charge of the customer service division. Darryl B. Hazel, vice president of marketing, will replace Codina.

Ford cut one corporate officer position in product development and one in marketing, sales and service. Barbara L. Gasper, the company's vice president of investor relations, will leave, and the position will no longer be at the officer level. Tim O'Brien, Ford's vice president of corporate relations, will become the deputy chief of staff, and his position will also not be officer-level.

Ford's salaried workers, however, may have an easier time finding work than the 30,000 union workers. White-collar auto-industry workers, Cole said, typically have marketable skills that can help land them jobs at other automotive companies or at firms outside the industry.

Hyundai Motor Co. will be adding engineers and other workers to its laboratory in Ann Arbor, Mich., and Toyota Motor Corp. is tripling the size of its Ann Arbor facility, according to Cole. With a large number of white-collar workers retiring from skilled auto-industry jobs, he said, openings for salaried workers will increase. "Even though it will be a . . . hardship on individuals now, we're going to run into a stone wall very quickly on [finding] people with skills."

Auto Workers Of The World Unite . . . (WSJ)

By John B. Schnapp

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

General Motors and Ford, bleeding cash and market share, have vowed to cut 60,000 jobs over the next half-dozen years. So far, though, they have been unable to request, much less obtain, more than token economic first-aid from the United Automobile Workers. A recent modest health-care "give-up" proposal at Ford provoked angry union militants to accuse their president, Ron Gettlefinger, of rank appeasement and was endorsed by a vote of only 51% to 49%. Ford's announcement of its "Way Forward" downsizing has led UAW leaders to grouse that both auto makers should be mobilizing to increase sales rather than engaging in brutal cutbacks.

The collective bargaining negotiations upcoming in 2007 loom as a likely auto industry Armageddon, in stark contrast to a rising trend among similarly threatened industries in Germany, where unions are quietly customizing deals to protect jobs and preserve employers. The evident unwillingness of the UAW rank-and-file to participate in that sort of salvation effort is a legacy of the union's justly admired founder, Walter Reuther, an inheritance likely to prove now progressively more obsolete and self-defeating. * * *

Reuther (1907-1970) was an old-fashioned American lefty, a breed now long extinct. Growing up in the household of an ardently Socialist immigrant father, he and his dad in 1917 visited party leader Eugene Debs during his controversial incarceration for opposition to American involvement in World War I. It made a lasting impression.

Reuther became a tool-and-die maker at Ford, the pinnacle of auto worker technical achievements. In the midst of the Great Depression, Walter and his brother Victor worked for two years at the Gorky automobile factory in the USSR, designed by Ford for the Stalin regime. The experience left Reuther with a firm antipathy toward communism and communist labor factions in the U.S. He believed that they cynically subordinated worker interest to political ambition.

On his return, he became active in the infant UAW and on May 26, 1937, became engraved into the national conscience. He and other UAW leaders, engaged in a leafleting effort at the Miller Road gate of Ford's River Rouge complex, were confronted by club-wielding thugs led by Henry Ford's confidante, ex-boxer Harry Bennett. The resulting "Battle of the Overpass" and its one-sided bloodletting, photographed by Scotty Kilpatrick of the Detroit News and widely circulated in Life, Time and other outlets, shocked the country.

Inevitably, the persistent worker "sitdown" occupations of their plants, combined with pressure from the Roosevelt administration's National Labor Relations Board, led to the unionization of all American auto makers. In 1946, Reuther was elected president of the UAW after a longstanding struggle against a faction led by Homer Martin, George Addes and Richard Frankensteen, which was considered -- probably accurately -- as Communist. It was almost surely an outgrowth of this intramural conflict that prompted a 1948 shotgun blast through Reuther's kitchen window, which left his right arm permanently damaged.

As leader of his union, Reuther was a stubborn and tactically brilliant negotiator. He repeatedly challenged the auto makers to prove that they were economically unable to meet his demands, and invented the concept of a "target company." For each collective bargaining cycle, the UAW selected one auto maker for negotiation: It might be the weakest and most vulnerable to a strike threat, or the strongest and most able to provide a generous settlement. The contract hammered out with the target company became the "pattern" applied to everyone else. In 1948, Reuther also invented the linking of worker compensation to inflation through an automatic cost-of-living (COLA) escalator.

Walter Reuther created the foundation of the entire panoply of worker benefits that now contribute to the overall cost sclerosis at GM and Ford. But the aspect of his legacy that currently weighs most heavily on the future of these auto makers was philosophic.

First was the cultivation among UAW members of a primary attachment to the union rather than to their employers. The employer was an adversary to be confronted rather than an ally to which workers owed loyalty and support.

Second was Reuther's belief that the UAW should never allow itself to influence competition among auto makers by differentiating contract terms. Wages, hours, benefits and work rules were to be identical. Even as the weakest companies -- Studebaker, Hudson, Packard -- foundered in the '40s and '50s, Reuther's UAW made little effort to throw them a life preserver. Indeed, there was little reason to do so since overall industry growth in that period readily absorbed displaced UAW members.

Reuther died in 1970, and it was only a decade later, with Chrysler teetering on the edge of insolvency, did then-UAW President Douglas Fraser allow that company some relief from the established-pattern terms. This gesture and his accession to Chrysler's board of directors, together with a modest federal loan guarantee and Lee Iacocca's inspired managerial improvisation, saved the company. But Mr. Fraser's actions came late in the Chrysler crisis and it was all a close-run thing.

Walter Reuther could not have foreseen the competitive world that Doug Fraser faced, much less today's. In the year of his death, American companies still held 87% of the U.S. market. Only Volkswagen, among offshore auto makers, sold as many as half a million vehicles here. Toyota and Datsun jointly accounted for about a quarter million and the coming of Honda was still five years in the future. Indeed the big story in 1970 was a three-month UAW strike at GM, which cost that company more than a million units of production.

The habit of confrontation established by Reuther, though, deeply impedes the willingness of his union to seek creative quid pro quos that might help GM and Ford avoid bankruptcies -- bankruptcies that would undermine their credibility among potential customers and lead to likely voiding of collective bargaining agreements. Throughout Germany, in contrast, unions affiliated with the IG Metall confederation -- many of them in the auto-parts sector -- have quietly been making the company-specific deals with employers that Reuther abhorred, in order to prevent the shifting of production to lower-wage venues and to guarantee job security. The German unions' most frequent concessions have given employers greater control over work hours, extended the work day without additional compensation, applied lower wages to new employees and reduced year-end bonuses.

The UAW, instead, seems to be falling into a policy of angry negativism. GM and Ford, despite the intensity of their problems, are viewed as still-rich enterprises afflicted with managerial ineptness who will just have to figure things out for themselves. It remains an "us versus them" kind of world at Solidarity House, the UAW's Detroit headquarters. By refusing to become involved in solutions to the auto makers' problems, as Doug Fraser found it desirable to do 25 years ago, the UAW makes itself into an increasingly prominent part of those problems. * * *

In the late '70s, I figured in a singular reflection of the consequences to the UAW, both then and now, of the Reuther philosophy. My consulting firm was engaged by Nissan to advise it on key issues related to the establishment of what became the second Japanese-owned auto assembly plant in the U.S. One of them was labor relations.

Nissan was predisposed toward replicating its situation in Japan, where it has a company union which, in turn, maintains ties to a relatively weak national federation. Despite traditional theatrics around annual wage negotiations, Nissan's Japanese workers are deeply loyal to the company and proud of their affiliation with it.

We told Nissan that autonomous company-specific unions were a rarity in the U.S. and tended to be absorbed by strong national federations. Its real choice, then, was between the UAW and no union at all. We wrote a briefing book on the history of the UAW, striving to make it unbiased. We stressed the union's social progressiveness and its lack of corruption. But we also stressed its commitment, stemming from Reuther, to identical treatment of all auto makers.

The Nissan management struggled with this, weighing its traditional attachment to dealing with a workers' organization against the likelihood that the UAW would force it into work practices identical to those of GM or Ford or Chrysler. This was not at all what it had in mind. It prompted a painful decision, one that went deeply against the grain, but Nissan chose to reject UAW overtures to unionize its new Smyrna, Tenn., plant. It sent nearly 400 of its initial work force for training in Japan, most of them at a twin plant in Kyushu to learn its ways alongside Japanese counterparts on Kyushu's production line. Many of these Tennesseans had never been farther from home than Nashville.

Nissan adopted also a number of important symbolic gestures. All employees, including top executives, wore identical work uniforms. Production workers were empowered to stop the assembly line if they perceived any problem affecting quality. There were no reserved parking spaces nor was there an executive dining room. Smyrna quickly became the most productive auto plant in the U.S., with the highest level of objectively measured product quality, an eminence it continues to enjoy.

Three separate UAW organizing efforts have all foundered at Smyrna. No later Asian auto maker plant unaffiliated with the Big Three has ever been organized either.

Walter Reuther was an undoubted great man. However, the persistence in the contemporary UAW of his intractability, understandable though it may have been in his own time, ensures a continuation of the worst of all outcomes -- a shrinkage of employers and the disappearance of jobs.

Churches To Weigh In On Stem Cell Research (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, January 25, 2006

Despite the pleas of many doctors and researchers to keep arguments rooted in science, the debate over embryonic stem cell research won't be confined to laboratories.

When three legislative committees convene Wednesday to hear testimony about bills that would commit $125 million over five years for embryonic stem cell research, members of various religious communities will weigh in. And while the official position of the Roman Catholic Church against embryonic stem cell research might be widely known, there are members of other denominations who stand firmly in favor of the bills.

"What troubles me is that the current Catholic understanding regarding the beginning of life seems to somehow have become the gold standard by which everything is judged," said the Rev. Peter K. Nord, executive presbyter of the Presbytery of Baltimore, who plans to testify in Annapolis Wednesday. "That is one perspective, but there are others. Most of us support the use of embryos that would otherwise be discarded."

The Episcopal Diocese of Maryland also will submit written testimony in support of the legislation, as will Bishop John R. Schol of the Baltimore-Washington Conference of the United Methodist Church.

"The United Methodist Church is supportive of stem cell research because of the healing opportunities that it potentially gives us, and we as a denomination are very much interested in health in life," Schol said.

Public discourse over when life begins has predominated conservative arguments against federal and state funding for embryonic stem cell research, a science that experts believe could help develop treatments for debilitating illnesses such as Parkinson's and Alzheimer's. Catholic leaders have argued that an embryo is a living being entitled to protection.

"There's a real misunderstanding of the value of the human person and human dignity and how every person is created in God's eyes," said Nancy Fortier, associate director for the Respect for Life Department of the Maryland Catholic Conference. Fortier plans to speak against the bills but acknowledged that she could not name another religious group that shares her opposition to embryonic research.

With an election looming in November, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. has entered the debate, proposing $13.5 million for a new research center in Baltimore and $20 million in state funding for stem cell research. The has proposed that the Maryland Technology Development Corp. decide which kind of projects to fund.

That opening has given hope to people like Fortier, who said she could support research using adult stem cells. But it concerns others, including the sponsors of the House and Senate funding bills, who like many scientists believe embryonic research holds the greatest promise.

"There's tenfold the amount of evidence that embryonic stem cells hold special things that adult-derived stem cells don't," said John McDonald, director of the International Center for Spinal Cord Injury at the Kennedy Krieger Institute in Baltimore.

Lawmakers sponsoring the legislation say the measures the bills contain for making sure money goes to the most potentially fruitful projects are essential. But they don't stand alone in their view.

Don Schroeder, bishop's deputy for public policy for the Episcopal Diocese of Maryland, said the diocese's support for the bills, which comes with a caveat against human cloning, is unwavering.

"It's a shame that a year was wasted," Schroeder said, noting that the diocese supported similar bills last year that stalled in the Senate.

Schol said the United Methodist Church is supportive as well, with a few qualifiers, notably that embryos created for fertility treatments have been donated with prior informed consent and that they were not deliberately created for research purposes or obtained by sale or purchase.

DOJ_NMG_0011618

John Deckenback, conference minister for the Central Atlantic Conference of the United Church of Christ, said his national church adopted a statement in 2001 in support of embryonic stem cell research.

"Clearly we have theological differences with our Roman Catholic friends and colleagues," Decken back said. "We have to agree to disagree on this one."

N.Va. Trial Over Air Bags Begins (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

Attorneys for an Arlington woman who contends that she was blinded in one eye when an air bag deployed told a Fairfax County jury yesterday that Ford Motor Co. knew its 1995 Escort was dangerous but did nothing to fix it or warn motorists.

Berta Benitez, 44, was on her way to work more than six years ago as the front-seat passenger in an Escort station wagon when the car and a Plymouth Voyager minivan collided on Lee Highway in Arlington. She filed suit in 2001 against Ford and the Koons Ford dealership where the car was bought.

Ford's attorneys, who dispute that the air bag caused Benitez's injuries, said in their opening statement yesterday that the 1995 Escort was safe and that its passenger air bag was no different than the air bags in other cars made in the mid-1990s. Benitez's attorneys said the air bags were too big and deployed much faster than called for in safety guidelines.

Benitez's attorney David Bernhard enlisted the help of Taras S. Rudnitsky, a former air bag engineer for General Motors Corp. who became disenchanted with what he says was the lack of safety concern in the auto industry. Rudnitsky quit to go to law school. After graduating, Rudnitsky served as an expert witness in lawsuits against carmakers, but he had eased away from auto litigation -- until Benitez's case came along.

Her case and e-mails from Bernhard lured him back, Rudnitsky said before trial. And so yesterday, in Fairfax Circuit Court, Rudnitsky began his first trial as a lawyer.

"Ford knew since the late 1960s and early 1970s that air bags can kill people or seriously injure them," Rudnitsky told the jury. He cited a renowned 1975 research study from Japan that concluded that air bags should not be traveling faster than about 92 mph when they make contact with a passenger.

Rudnitsky said that Ford's main expert will acknowledge the accuracy of the Japanese study and that the expert used it in his own published papers on air bags with Ford's approval. But when Ford made a last-minute decision to install front passenger air bags in the Escort and its sister car, the Mercury Tracer, Rudnitsky said, Ford designed a "unique air bag" for the 1995 and 1996 model years.

Bernhard said that nearly 700,000 of the cars were manufactured. He said he did not know how many are still on the road.

Ford's engineers said in pretrial depositions that they were unaware of the velocity of the Escort's air bags, Rudnitsky said, and were unaware of the Japanese study's standards.

Rudnitsky said his experts conducted three tests on the Escort's air bag and found that it deployed at more than 200 mph and was still moving far in excess of 92 mph when it reached the passenger's face and body milliseconds later. Rudnitsky said that "Ford lied to the government" when it claimed that the air bag inflated to 18 inches. Rudnitsky said it actually was 29 to 30 inches.

Sandra G. Ezell, an attorney for Ford, responded that in 1995, "nobody else had a less-powerful inflator" or a tether to limit the air bag's deployment. "Ford believes in selling safe products," Ezell said. "They believe in the 1995 Escort."

She said that the decision to install a passenger air bag was not "last-minute" and that the air bag was "well-designed, thoroughly tested."

Ezell noted that the Sept. 14, 1999, collision was a violent one, injuring Benitez, a housekeeper, and three others in the Escort. She said no one would testify at the trial that the air bag -- as opposed to Benitez's arms or other items flying in the car -- caused the blindness in Benitez's left eye and cataracts in her right eye. "No act or omission on the part of Ford Motor Company is responsible for these injuries," Ezell said.

Rudnitsky said before the trial that he had helped persuade Nissan to recall some of its Altima models after a similar lawsuit, and that he hoped this case would have the same effect on Ford. The trial is expected to last two weeks.

Palestinians Head For Coalition Government (FT)

By Harvey Morris In Gaza City

Financial Times, January 25, 2006

A multi-party coalition government led by Fatah, with the possible inclusion of ministers from Hamas, appeared the most likely outcome of Wednesday's Palestinian parliamentary elections as last-minute polls showed the ruling party maintaining its lead.

DOJ_NMG_0011619

A poll by the Palestinian Centre for Public opinion indicated Fatah would win just under 40 percent support among 1.35m registered voters in the West Bank and Gaza, 10 per cent ahead of Hamas, the Islamic movement that is contesting its first national election.

Some analysts believe Hamas's inclusion in the democratic process, a prospect that initially alarmed Israel and the US, might improve the chances of a renewal of negotiations with the next Israeli government.

With the election likely to deny Fatah the overall majority it won in the first Palestinian Authority parliamentary elections in 1996, its most likely coalition partners are small, formerly Marxist left-wing parties, the centre-left National Initiative List and the Third Way, headed by Salam Fayyad, former finance minister.

Mr Fayyad, a widely respected former IMF official who helped restore the PA's chaotic finances but quit after the leadership expanded the public payroll to pacify the restless security forces, is spoken of as a possible prime minister in a coalition government.

Hamas's inclusion will depend largely on the post-election stance of the party itself.

The Islamists might press for portfolios linked to welfare and social issues or alternatively choose to remain in opposition, at least in the short term.

Hamas has softened its traditionally militant tone, indicating that even if it gained power it would leave any dealings with Israel to Mahmoud Abbas, the PA's Fatah president.

Mahmoud Zahar, a Hamas leader in Gaza did not rule out negotiations with Israel as long as these related to ending its occupation and releasing prisoners.

"Negotiation is not a taboo," he said. "But the political crime is when we sit with the Israelis and then come out with a wide smile to tell the Palestinian people that there is progress, when in fact, there is not."

"Hamas is completely devoted to the electoral process," said Qaid Abdul-Karim, who heads the left-wing Badil list. "Not one bullet is coming from their rifles."

He said Hamas might not yet be ready for a negotiated settlement. "Hamas has some time to prepare its internal climate. But I'm sure it will do it in the end."

Fatah has restored some of its credibility in recent weeks, after a near-disastrous split at the end of last year, in part due to a vigorous anti-Hamas campaign spearheaded in Gaza by Mohamed Dahlan, a former security chief and the local strongman.

In a highly personalised televised debate at the weekend between Mr Dahlan and Mr Zahar, the Fatah candidate accused the Islamic party of being incapable of looking after the future of the Palestinians.

Mr Zahar, who alleges he was tortured in a PA prison, reminded Mr Dahlan he had been responsible in the past for the repression of Hamas militants. "As far as you're concerned, a good Hamas member is a dead Hamas member," he said.

Despite the political invective, all groups - including the frequently troublesome Fatah-linked Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades - have pledged to ensure an orderly election.

Politicians had expressed fears that armed groups might stage attacks on polling stations or kidnap foreigners if they believed the vote was not going their way.

If election day passes peacefully, officials anticipate publishing results within 24 hours.

Voters will choose from 11 party lists to fill 66 seats in the new parliament by proportional representation. With a threshold of 2 percent, only six parties are likely to win seats. The remaining winners will be chosen from candidates standing in 19 multi-seat electoral districts, including east Jerusalem.

Palestinian Vote Could Redraw Political Scene First Parliamentary Elections Since 1996 Likely To Dilute Fatah's Power (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, January 25, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza are voting today in parliamentary elections that could change the course of politics in the Palestinian territories and the region.

About 1.3 million Palestinian voters were eligible to choose candidates from 11 parties in the first elections for the 132-member Palestinian Legislative Council since 1996. Concerns about violence, however, had cast a shadow over the election. On Tuesday, Yousef Hassouna, 35, a local politician from a branch of the ruling Fatah Party, was killed in Nablus, a West Bank city. Hassouna was shot when he ordered opposing Fatah gunmen not to tear down a campaign poster, said Abdel Rahim Omar, a Nablus-based journalist.

Such election-related violence could deter people from voting, said Les Campbell, executive director of the Washington-based National Democratic Institute, a non-governmental organization that facilitates elections worldwide.

In response to the Nablus attack, seven militant organizations, including Hamas, signed a declaration disavowing violence on election day, said Ghazi Hamid, editor of the Hamas-affiliated weekly Al-Risala.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas called on Palestinians to vote despite the threat of unrest. “The election is a right and duty,” Abbas told reporters in Ramallah, the West Bank city where his Palestinian Authority is based.

Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Tuesday said his government “will know how to operate and act under any eventuality” after the elections. In his first major televised address since taking over from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who suffered a massive stroke three weeks ago, Olmert reaffirmed his commitment to the U.S.-backed “road map” to peace and said he supported the idea of a Palestinian state.

He also said Israel will have to give up small portions of territory in the West Bank to keep its Jewish majority but would keep larger settlements there and never renounce its claim to Jerusalem.

Referring to Hamas, which appeared set to capture nearly a third of the parliamentary seats, Olmert said he hoped Palestinians would not “choose again the extremists who have led them from tragedy to tragedy and to sorrowful lives.”

A poll released Jan. 20 by the Jerusalem Media & Communication Center, a Palestinian research group, indicated Hamas would win 30.2% of the vote, and Abbas' Fatah would win a slim plurality with 32.3%.

Israel has said it would not deal with Hamas politicians. The United States and Europe have warned they would withhold aid to the Palestinian Authority if Hamas, which opposes Israel's existence and is on the U.S. State Department's list of terrorist groups, becomes part of the government.

Fatah and Hamas say they might consider forming a national unity government. Such a coalition would dim prospects for future Palestinian-Israeli negotiations. Hamid, the editor, said Hamas wants to join a broad coalition and would press the Palestinian Authority to adopt a harder line toward Israel. Once in government, “Hamas would not make the same mistake as Fatah and engage in 12 years of fruitless negotiation,” he said.

Sunday, Fatah's leading candidate, Marwan Barghouti, also called for a national unity government that would include Hamas. Serving five life terms in an Israeli prison for killing Israelis, Barghouti told the Al-Jazeera satellite channel, “There is no peace process.”

In Ramallah, jeweler Khamis Ali, 38, said, “We need quiet and peace for the economy.” Ali said Palestinians “need to vote for a party that can talk to Israel and America. We need a party with diplomatic experience.”

Firas Jasser Arar, 35, an electrician who was on his way to a Hamas meeting in Ramallah, referred to recent fighting among Fatah factions as a reason to doubt the ruling party's effectiveness:

“If Fatah can't even control itself, how is it supposed to achieve a state?” he asked.

Hamas Narrows Gap With Fatah (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 25, 2006

NABLUS, West Bank -- The final campaign rally of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah party was a noisy, overheated affair, with supporters up on their feet, chanting and waving banners over their heads.

But buildings, bridges and lampposts along the road to this central West Bank city were plastered with bright green posters representing Hamas -- the militant Islamist movement that is looking for an upset in parliamentary elections today.

Hamas always had been expected to perform well in the Gaza Strip, its traditional power base. But its highly visible presence in the Fatah-dominated West Bank has worried even dedicated supporters of the party created by Yasser Arafat.

"I don't think Fatah will win," said Nadia abu Ziaher, a soft-spoken student at Birzeit University who volunteers in the office of Fatah candidate Dalal Salameh.

Miss Ziaher said she likes her candidate more than his party, saying life has become harder since Fatah began ruling the West Bank a decade ago. There are more roadblocks, fewer services and persistent corruption.

Hamas did well in recent municipal elections, she said, and "they deserve it. They'll work harder."

Both parties have coordinated extensive get-out-the-vote efforts in Gaza and the West Bank, employing canvassers, rallies, media coverage and smear campaigns.

Recent polls show Hamas gaining rapidly on Fatah, though the presence of several minor parties means neither will achieve an outright majority.

Each voter will cast two ballots -- one for a party and one for a candidate running in his local district, with half the seats in the legislative council to be filled by each system. A number of seats have been set aside for women and Christian candidates.

Hamas is expected to win just under half of the votes cast for the political parties, while Fatah candidates are expected to do better than their Hamas rivals in the district-by-district voting.

But if Hamas does well enough to secure seats in the next Palestinian Cabinet, it will create a crisis in relations with Israel, which has refused to negotiate with what it considers a terrorist organization.

The top two names on Fatah's party slate are those of Mr. Abbas and jailed resistance fighter Marwan Barghouti. But pictures of the late Fatah leader, Yasser Arafat, are everywhere.

"If Fatah wins it will be because of a dead man and a jailed man," sighed one Ramallah taxi driver.

Many voters, such as a Palestinian border agent at the Erez Crossing into the Gaza Strip, say they will vote for Fatah despite its shortcomings, because they fear that Hamas would exacerbate already inflamed relations with Israel.

Hamas -- which is so deeply religious that its female followers sometimes attend separate rallies rather than mix with men -- has won many followers with an extensive network of social services and a reputation for honesty.

Hamas also has played on resentment of Israeli occupation, criticizing Mr. Arafat and his successors for negotiating with Israel and catering to its demands.

The United States and the European Union have indicated they could greatly reduce assistance to the Palestinians if Hamas plays a substantial role in the next government.

Hamas has tried to turn the threat to its advantage. "Israel and the U.S. say no to Hamas," says one flapping banner in Nablus. "What do you say?"

Waheeb Attabeh says yes.

"I am not a religious man, but I am in favor of Hamas," said Mr. Attabeh, who has sold olive oil in the historic Nablus market for 30 years. "I look to Lebanon and I see [Sheik Hassan] Nasrallah spreading the strength of Hezbollah. I want to see that here."

Mr. Attabeh, 50, sees parallels between Hezbollah and Hamas, both of which have been declared terrorist organizations by the U.S. government.

Both have stood against corruption, provided significant health care, education and welfare to the poor, and have sponsored separate political and military wings.

By comparison, Mr. Attabeh and many others dismiss Fatah as a clubby organization that looks after its members first and the people later.

Amin Makboul, Fatah's campaign manager in Nablus, doesn't deny corruption, but claims Fatah is best positioned to end it.

"Fatah was the first to open the file on corruption," he declared. "We're telling people we've arrested and judged [the perpetrators]."

Palestinians Set For Vote And Big Shift (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank, Jan. 24 - For better or worse, Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president, has gotten what he wanted: Palestinian legislative elections, the first such vote in a decade.

But Mr. Abbas's accomplishment with the election on Wednesday is also an extraordinary risk. He has decided to end the monopoly of his Fatah faction over all the instruments of power in the Palestinian territories, bringing the radical Islamic group Hamas into national politics.

Many in Fatah, let alone in Israel and the United States, say they believe that Mr. Abbas is inviting the snake into the garden. They think that by trying to co-opt Hamas, rather than confronting it, he risks handing the nascent state of Palestine over to an armed group, sworn to the destruction of Israel. And they say he is digging his own political grave.

But Mr. Abbas, a pale, scholarly man of 70, has overridden the objections with his trademark distance from the fray, and his refusal to try to exercise power in the personal, tribal style of his late predecessor, Yasir Arafat.

Long Mr. Arafat's No. 2, Mr. Abbas was an obvious successor, but not a natural one. He is a man of logic, not passion; a negotiator, not a politician; a man who wears a business suit, not a military uniform; a man who condemns violence, not incites it; a man who despises personality cults and refuses to put his face up in every office; a touchy man of dark moods, who often threatens to quit, as he quit as prime minister after four months in 2003 when Mr. Arafat did not allow him enough power.

If the elections fail or if Hamas wins, making it difficult or impossible for him to carry out his intended policies of internal reform and peace negotiations with Israel, Mr. Abbas says he will quit this job as well.

Abdul Fatah Ayyseh, a Palestinian vendor, voted for Mr. Abbas and likes him. "Abu Mazen is a smart man who doesn't deserve to be the president of the Palestinian people," he said, using the name by which Mr. Abbas is known here. "He deserves to be the president of a Scandinavian country. He's smart, calm and unmilitary. He rejected the armed intifada, but he wasn't helped by the Palestinian factions, or by Fatah, or by Israel."

But Nariman Sharif regrets the moment she voted for Mr. Abbas. "You can't compare him to Abu Ammar," she said, referring to Mr. Arafat. "Abu Mazen has a weak character. I was expecting the situation on the ground would improve the minute he took over. But he's failed. He has nothing to say except, 'O.K.' Abu Ammar was respected, and the president should enjoy respect and fear. He lacks these things."

A pragmatist, Mr. Abbas is a refugee, born in what is now the Israeli town of Safed, which he fled with his family at the age of 13, in 1948. But he is considered by Israelis to be a man of principle who believes that the armed intifada is counterproductive, negotiates fairly and wants two states to live side by side.

On Tuesday, on the eve of the vote, Mr. Abbas stepped out here to urge all Palestinians to vote. "The election is a right and duty at the same time," he said. "And I hope that the results of this election will reflect honestly the choice of every Palestinian."

Palestinians seem eager to vote, with turnout expected to be above 80 percent and opinion polls suggesting a narrow win for Fatah and its secular allies. But whether Fatah then tries to govern in coalition with Hamas or tries to leave them outside as a large opposition is unclear, and Mr. Abbas, who will appoint the next prime minister, has remained silent about his intentions.

"It is Abu Mazen's achievement that these elections will take place on time," said Salah Abdel Shafi, a Gazan economist. "He was under great pressure to postpone or cancel them. It proves his genuine commitment to the process of democracy and the results of these elections."

The stakes are immense, Mr. Shafi said: "The future of Palestine in the near and medium future will be decided in the next week."

Mr. Abbas's great gamble is a successful outcome in which Hamas is an engaged player but not dominant. "Either we emerge with a strong parliament and government, or we have the collapse of the Palestinian Authority," Mr. Shafi said. "I don't think there's any third option."

Mahdi Abdul Hadi, the director of Passia, a Palestinian research institute in Jerusalem, says the entire region is trying to come to terms with Islamic parties like Hamas, citing Egypt, Lebanon, Jordan and Syria. "You can't ignore them any more or deny them or contain them, so you have to bring them in," he said.

Hamas, with an army of 5,000 men, is too powerful to fight, and could take over Gaza within hours if it wanted, many experts say. Mr. Abbas has always said he would not start a civil war, but he has also promised Washington that he would disarm Hamas after the elections. Yet few expect anything more than a cosmetic effort to incorporate the Hamas militia into the Palestinian security forces, the way Fatah's Aksa Martyrs Brigades have been at least partly incorporated.

Mr. Abbas was elected little more than a year ago to fill the vacancy left by the death of Mr. Arafat, the complicated, charismatic leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization, of the Fatah faction and of the Palestinian Authority. "The Arafat era was three things: to pay, to appoint and to kill," said Mr. Hadi, the economist. "But Abu Mazen doesn't have this character. We don't need this kind of leader, and he is trying to deliver rule of law in stages."

Mr. Abbas has long argued that democracy will tame the radicals, and he has stuck to his plan to make that work. But in the process, he has made many mistakes. While his personal standing among Palestinians remains high, with an approval rating of more than 60 percent, he is largely without effective allies, either in Fatah or the Palestinian Authority itself, and Israel has not helped him to convince Palestinians that its withdrawal from Gaza was Mr. Abbas's accomplishment and not due to Hamas's rockets and suicide bombings.

"The general view is that he's weak," said Mr. Shafi. "People expected more leadership from him."

Mr. Abbas never set up an efficient presidential office, despite American efforts to help him do so. He never appointed a permanent press secretary to help him appeal to the population. He remained reactive and indecisive. "I don't think he really understood what it is to be president, the challenge before him and the gross mismanagement and corruption of Fatah," said a former Palestinian official who watched the process at close hand.

"There is no decision-making process, no clear chain of command," the official said. "It's like throwing cooked spaghetti against the wall. People like democracy, but they wanted institutional change. He inherited a mess, but he promised to end corruption and restore law and order and create 'one law, one authority and one gun,' but he failed miserably to do any of that."

The former official, who admires Mr. Abbas, said he had also failed to move against the Arafat holdovers in his office, who retain power to block decisions. In particular, he kept on Ahmed Qurei as his prime minister despite Mr. Qurei's opposition to nearly all of Mr. Abbas's policies.

Hanan Ashrawi, a Fatah legislator now running on the independent Third Way slate with former Finance Minister Salam Fayyad, was explicit in her criticism. "Our people have despaired of the corruption in the government institutions, the internal squabbles between the president and prime minister, over the fact that Abu Mazen goes around and does nothing," she told the Israeli daily Yediot Aharonot.

Legislators brought Mr. Qurei a plan of action for reform, but he did nothing, she said. So they brought it to Mr. Abbas, who was enthusiastic. "But instead of taking action," she said, "he cooked up a deal: freeze everything, don't throw out the corrupt officials, sit and do nothing, grasp onto the excuse of the elections."

But the elections, originally scheduled for last July, are instrumental to Mr. Abbas's effort to clean out the older members of Fatah, like Mr. Qurei, who decided not even to run.

Mr. Abbas's theory is that his mandate comes from voters - unlike Mr. Arafat's, which came from his past. With Fatah split into three parts or more, the Palestinian Authority was scarcely representative, so it needed a new, democratic legitimacy. And Hamas had become too powerful to fight on any battlefield except the democratic one, where he believed it might be contained.

So in Mr. Hadi's view, "he left things loose - he didn't embrace anyone or commit himself to any one path; he let things develop on their own." Whether that's good or bad, he said, remains to be seen.

Mr. Shafi said, "He understood his role to have new elections and put a legitimately elected government in place, but he didn't understand that he also had to restructure and reform the Palestinian Authority."

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel "wanted no Palestinian partner," Mr. Hadi said. "He had no interest in recognizing the Palestinians or dealing with them."

Israeli promises to Mr. Abbas to release a large number of Palestinian prisoners, hand back large cities to Palestinian control, loosen travel restrictions in the West Bank and ease access of people and goods to Gaza all fell afoul of Palestinian terrorist attacks and Israeli internal politics, making his arguments against terrorism seem hollow.

"The fact that Israel and the international community did not deliver hurts Abu Mazen," Mr. Ahmed said. "It's a miscalculation that will be reflected in the results of the elections."

Still, Mr. Abbas is the author of many of his own problems, Mr. Hadi said. "Abbas is no hypocrite," he said. "Everyone wants him to be different. But he cannot be."

Hamas Poised To Become Insiders (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

GAZA CITY -- Mahmoud Zahar is a relatively well-off thyroid surgeon who wears his thinning gray hair in a comb-over that shakes loose when he is angry, which is often. On his forehead is the dime-size bruise of a devout Muslim, the result of many hours spent praying in the mosque across the dirt street from his house here.

He is also among the most obdurate leaders of the Islamic Resistance Movement, or Hamas, and will almost certainly be among those who emerge victorious as Palestinians vote Wednesday for parliament for the first time in a decade. Often described by those who know him as severe and short-tempered, Zahar is ebullient as the movement makes its first bid for power in the Palestinian Legislative Council.

"We are feeling victory," Zahar, 60, said during an interview earlier this week in the sunny courtyard of his home. "The people are going to vote for the project of the resistance. Israel should know that a new political and moral atmosphere is going to appear."

Hamas is projected to win roughly a third of the new parliament's 132 seats and bring the Islamic movement inside the Palestinian government. Hamas, a party at war with Israel, refused to participate in earlier elections and rejected the 1993 Oslo peace accords that led to the creation of the Palestinian Authority. Now, Hamas may be taking new risks by joining a weak and nearly bankrupt Palestinian government it has scolded from the outside for years.

Already Hamas leaders are facing questions about how they will manage future peace negotiations with Israel, win the freedom of thousands of Palestinian prisoners from Israeli jails, and ease the occupation in the West Bank given their vow not to recognize Israel or talk to its leaders.

At the same time, many Hamas followers who favored the group's past attacks on Israeli soldiers and civilians over the Palestinian Authority's cooperation with Israel are wondering why the movement is going mainstream while the occupation endures in the West Bank.

Each week in the courtyard of the Red Cross here, a group of women gather to demand the release of the estimated 7,000 Palestinians in Israeli jails. Most of the women are poor, desperate residents of the Jabalya refugee camp. They are veiled, clutching framed photos of their sons. They are the natural constituency of Hamas. Yet none said they intend to support Hamas now. "If they wanted to help, they would be here protesting with us," said Ghaliah Barood, 70, who leads the weekly demonstration. "But you can see that none of them are."

Although Hamas officials vow not to meet with Israeli officials, Zahar said he favors mediation through Egypt, Jordan or the European Union to win the prisoners' release, perhaps the most emotional issue in Palestinian politics. Barood, whose son Ibrahim has been in an Israeli jail for two decades, said only kidnapping Israeli soldiers would win the prisoners' release. "We've never seen anyone pay attention to us, and now they only come for our vote," said Aziza Abu Dabah, 55, whose son has been in jail for 11 years.

Though designated a terrorist organization by the United States, Europe and Israel, Hamas has positioned itself among Palestinians as the clean counterweight to the corrupt, ineffective rule of Fatah, the movement that governs the Palestinian Authority. Hamas has a military wing that has carried out deadly attacks on Israelis, but its popularity stems largely from the grass-roots charity work and political organizing that is the hallmark of Islamic movements throughout the Arab world.

Here in the Gaza Strip banners festoon the streets bearing the "Change and Reform" label alongside a green crescent moon, the Hamas trademark. In some places, the signs bear the faces of Sheik Ahmed Yassin and Abdel Aziz Rantisi, Hamas leaders in Gaza whom Israel assassinated in 2004.

In the final week of the campaign, Hamas has been broadcasting television ads featuring the party's top national candidate, Ismail Haniyeh, explaining why it is joining the government. Haniyeh, who favored participating in the first parliamentary elections a decade ago, says Hamas will be better able to confront corruption, free Palestinian prisoners and fight the Israeli occupation from inside the system.

Zahar, who lost a son in a 2003 Israeli airstrike that also broke his back and badly injured his wife, said Hamas will not abandon its goal of establishing a Palestinian state across a territory that includes what is now Israel. He argued that Hamas is not joining the existing Palestinian Authority so much as creating a new government through its presence.

"This is to assure people they have not shifted," said Nashat Aqtash, a professor of media studies at Bir Zeit University in the West Bank who is designing the Hamas advertising strategy, though he is not a party member. "They are moving in one direction -- fighting corruption and the occupation -- and that has not changed."

He added with a laugh, "I'm just afraid they'll win more than 50 percent of the vote, and then they'll be in real trouble."

Hamas showed well in a number of municipal races last year, especially in urban areas where its message of war with Israel and its charity networks have broad appeal in the refugee camps. But Hamas may find criticizing the Palestinian government far easier than governing an increasingly frustrated electorate. Leaders of Fatah, a secular movement, say a coalition government with Hamas will likely be impossible given their vastly different views on relations with Israel, the role of Islam in political life, and the future of party-affiliated militias now roaming the Palestinian territories.

"The issue is not who will win in the elections, but the power-sharing and political partnership that must follow," said Ziad Abu Amr, a longtime broker between the Palestinian factions, who is running as an independent candidate from the Gaza City district with the public support of Hamas.

Abu Amr said a "national accord" will have to be reached in parliament outlining a political consensus on the most pressing issues -- peace talks with Israel, continuation of the temporary cease-fire, disarmament of the militias, and reforms in a bureaucracy staffed almost entirely by Fatah members. He said Israel's elections in March and the aftermath will give the new Palestinian parliament time to focus first on internal matters.

"We'll have a breathing space of about six months, and we'll need that time to organize ourselves," he said. "The fact is there is no alternative to real partnership, and the two parties will be Fatah and Hamas."

Polls show that roughly 30 percent of the Palestinian electorate remains undecided, and in the final week, Fatah and Hamas leaders have been casting their rivals as the more dangerous option.

Abdullah Frangi, head of Fatah's campaign here, said of Hamas: "They are pragmatic and they say they will not try to destroy Israel. But it is not working. It would be very hard on the Palestinians if Hamas became the government, and this is the message we are telling people now."

Zahar, dressed in a khaki suit and stylish silk tie, is among the sternest personalities in a movement whose members celebrate the grim culture of suicide attacks and hope to establish Islamic law in the Palestinian territories.

Zahar said Hamas would not give up its military wing after joining the government, which Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has said would be required. Zahar also warned that the cease-fire with Israel that Abbas brokered with armed Palestinian factions last year was no longer operative, saying, "We are outside the calm, but it is in our hands."

"The Palestinian Authority has failed to achieve even the most basic demand: a Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital," Zahar said. "The people know it is time for the party with clean hands to take over."

But Hamas has already dealt with Israeli officials in its capacity running municipal councils. In the West Bank town of Qalqilyah, Hashem Masri, the Hamas mayor, acknowledged recently that he has sought permission from the Israeli military to build an industrial park he hopes will create hundreds of jobs. Whether that contact will continue at the national level is uncertain, but some former Israeli security officials see the elections as an opportunity.

"Israel must take a chance with Hamas inside the system," said Shalom Harari, a retired senior Israeli military intelligence officer now with the International Policy Institute for Counter-Terrorism in Herzliya. "We're already faced with a failing peace process that had them on the outside. Israel has nothing to lose. They are already here. Let's try to tame them."

Why Hamas Is Gaining In Palestinian Polls (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0011625

By Ilene R. Prusher, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2006

NABLUS, WEST BANK - Speaking easy English and shaking the hand of male and female visitors alike, Adli Yaish is hardly the typical face of Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement.

Rather, the new mayor of Nablus embodies a cadre of Hamas "spinoffs." Gone are the full beards and fiery religious rhetoric. Absent are assertions that all Israel is a "Zionist entity" that Muslims must destroy.

Saying they are inspired by - though not in lock step with - Hamas's militant core, politicians like Mr. Yaish have come to the fore in the group's first campaign for national representation. And when Palestinians vote in Wednesday's legislative elections, analysts say, it's Hamas's more moderate tone, as well as disillusionment with the ruling Fatah Party, that will yield the group significant gains.

At the same time, its mix of moderate and hard-line messages may complicate Israeli and US stands against dealing with Hamas, which both countries consider a terrorist organization.

Campaigning was barred Tuesday, while thousands of Palestinian security officers took up positions in the West Bank and Gaza to protect polling stations. Armed groups pledged to maintain calm during the election, but gunmen linked to Fatah killed a party leader, spurring about 1,000 supporters and activists to march in Nablus in protest of the lawlessness.

According to the latest figures from the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research, based in Ramallah, 42 percent of Palestinians will vote for Fatah, while 35 percent will vote for the Hamas-backed Change and Reform Party.

But it is unclear how Hamas's popularity will translate into policy. The group, which is responsible for the greatest number of suicide bombings targeting Israeli civilians, only recently became involved in municipal, let alone national, governance.

Some Palestinians say that Hamas is hoping it doesn't get a majority, preparing instead to be an opposition or second-largest power. In recent interviews, leaders have said that they will not change their charter calling for Israel's destruction. But Tuesday, Hamas leader and candidate Mahmoud Zahar said in Gaza that "negotiation is not a taboo," adding at the same time that "we do not consider the Israeli enemy as a partner or a neighbor." Hamas takes a pragmatic turn

To some observers, appearance of figures like Yaish suggest that Hamas may be placing itself in a more pragmatic spot on the Palestinian spectrum. Others say that Hamas has widened its umbrella by appealing to people who abide by Muslim values but are not extreme. And amid disarray within the Palestinian Authority (PA), run since 1994 by the secular Fatah faction, Hamas is gleaning much of what might be called a protest vote.

At the Arafat Sweets Shop - no relation to the late Palestinian leader - there is a popular sentiment: Throw the Bums Out, Middle Eastern-style.

"We want change. We want our leaders to be people who fear God," says Abdullah Kassem. "We were Fatah supporters," he says of his friends, "but we are demanding new faces. The PA is full of criminals and there is unbelievable lawlessness."

As the men chat, Amal Khreishe, a candidate for one of the most liberal of the 11 lists running for office, approaches to ask for support.

"If we only have Fatah and Hamas, and if there is conflict because of that, the people will pay the price," she says. She is a member of the list headed by Mustafa Barghouti, a physician with a small following among academics and moderates.

The men are friendly but appear unswayed in their intent to vote for Hamas. A nearby wall is carpeted with posters, almost all of them for Hamas. On the street, there is malaise and a desire for quick solutions. Anger at Israel mixes with feelings that the Palestinian leadership is corrupt and weak. Violence within Fatah, particularly in Gaza, seems to bolster the image of a Hamas that is tightly run.

"Fatah has had 10 years to negotiate, and just look at this," says Suleiman Kawarik, a driver, as he points to long lines at the checkpoint south of the city. "It's like trying to leave the country, just trying to leave your city. The PA can't help anybody - they just give out small services...." Hamas provides social services

Hamas was founded in the Gaza Strip in late 1987, at the start of the first intifada, as the Palestinian branch of the Muslim Brotherhood. Its secretive military wing, as Hamas describes it, carried out attacks on Israelis. But while its political wing rejected the Oslo Accords, it opened a dialogue with the Palestinian authors of the peace process in Fatah.

Meanwhile, Hamas runs preschools, youth clubs, and health clinics. It provides needy people with assistance, and even holds free weddings. It is that face of Hamas that many Palestinians see first.

"People think of Hamas as only killing people, but no, this is only one side of the picture. We are also doing a lot of social work," says Yaish, who studied at Liverpool University in England and is a father of six. He believes that Hamas will come to be accepted internationally as an interlocutor. "I think the Americans and the Israelis have to deal with anyone the people choose," he says.

The city's deputy mayor, also from the Reform and Change Party, says the world should see their party as one might view Christian Democrats in Europe.

"Religious people here are the elite," says Nihad Masri, an obstetrician. "You can't find an unemployed man among us. I condemn suicide bombings, but are they justified or not? We don't have anything else to defend ourselves with," he says, pointing to Israel's controversial barrier and military incursions.

But some Palestinians say the only way out of conflict is to return to talks with Israel, and support Fatah as the best route. "[O]nly Fatah can negotiate with Israel," says Hussam Bakeer, who runs an appliance store here. "Fatah is internationally accepted at the negotiating table."

Indeed, while Hamas says a temporary truce - even a long-term one - could be on the table, it continues to strike a combative tone. In one campaign ad, rebroadcast by CNN, the group shows footage of militants as it states: "We will not rest as long as one inch of our holy land is in the hands of the Jews. Our flags will fly over the minarets of Jerusalem."

Hamas Plays Different Tune (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, January 25, 2006

BIDDU, West Bank -- Hamas is working to soften its image both abroad and domestically on the eve of today's Palestinian elections, recognizing that its reputation for violence is hurting its cause, at least in the West.

At a campaign rally in this village of 8,000 in the final days before the elections, one banner featured a slogan in English that said, "We don't sing the song of death, but recite the hymns of life."

A professional media consultant hired by the campaign acknowledged that after years of suicide bombings and other attacks on Israelis, the Palestinians in general and Hamas in particular are thought of abroad as bloodthirsty.

"We are just screaming and shouting, and nobody knows the story. People think we are occupying Israel," said Nashat Aqtash, a communications professor at Birzeit University. "We need to address Westerners differently. We need to talk their language."

Mr. Aqtash, who said he is not a member of Hamas, said the group is spending about $40,000 to improve its image in the foreign press.

Hamas could end up with one-third to half the seats in the Palestinian parliament, giving the militant group a powerful role both domestically and in relations with Israel. That has made it more imperative for the group to repackage itself.

The new tone also offers a test for the Bush administration's theory that as militant organizations buy into a growing Middle East democracy movement, they will become more responsible.

"As people start getting elected and have to start worrying about constituencies, social issues and living standards -- and not about whether their fire-breathing rhetoric against Israel is being heard -- then things start to change," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in an interview at The Washington Times in March.

But Israelis will not be easily convinced. Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said yesterday that he hoped Palestinians would not "choose again the extremists who have led them from tragedy to tragedy and to sorrowful lives."

Nevertheless, the Hamas campaign rally in Biddu was missing the incendiary rhetoric of the recent intifada, with its threats to target Israeli buses and restaurants.

The Hamas charter calling for the destruction of Israel also has been submerged by a campaign platform that is much more vague about the issue.

A rising star in the party is the relatively moderate Sheik Mohammed Abu Tir, a candidate from East Jerusalem who has spent 25 years in Israeli jails and is instantly recognizable by his fiery red beard.

In the past week, Sheik Abu Tir has been quoted on Israeli television and in newspapers boasting that Hamas would do a better job of negotiating peace than the Palestinian Authority has done.

At the Biddu rally, he sent out mixed messages. He wagged his finger as he declared the 1993 Oslo peace accords a dead letter, done in by the "blessed intifada." Then he hinted at the possibility of talks.

"We are the owners of a mature political process," he said of Hamas' diplomatic strategy for ending violence with Israel. "We want to engage politically and socially."

Eyad Saraj, an independent candidate for parliament and a Palestinian human rights activist, said Hamas is undergoing a real change, even if it has not gone far enough to satisfy Israel. He pointed to the group's honoring of a yearlong moratorium on attacks on Israel.

The Islamists have not dropped support for an armed uprising against Israel, but now advocate negotiating a settlement indirectly with Israel based on the ill-fated U.N. partition plan of 1947.

"They have become more sophisticated, and more mature, and more professional in their work," Mr. Saraj said. "They are playing it cool."

Yossi Alpher, editor of the online Israeli-Palestinian opinion forum Bitterlemons.org, said it's too early to say what direction the organization is headed.

He noted that Hezbollah in Lebanon refused to disarm even after winning a bloc of seats in that country's parliament. "Frankly," he said, "I'll be very surprised if after the election [Hamas] will become more moderate, but there is a possibility."

With Hamas On Palestinian Ballot, The Stakes Are Immense (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, January 25, 2006

A strong showing in today's Palestinian elections by Hamas, which the United States has designated a terrorist group, could jeopardize U.S. aid to the Palestinians and Arab-Israeli peace efforts.

In December, the House of Representatives approved, 397-17, a resolution saying U.S. relations and $350 million in aid pledged to the Palestinians this year would be at risk if Hamas becomes part of the government. The European Union also has warned that it might cut off its $312 million contribution.

In a letter to President Bush on Dec. 21, 70 U.S. senators said the president must “make clear to Palestinian leaders that terrorist groups must either disarm or be banned from the political process.” If Hamas gains a foothold in the Palestinian legislature, the United States “will have little choice but to re-evaluate all aspects of our relations with the Palestinian Authority,” the letter said.

The Bush administration says it expects those who come to political office to renounce violence.

“There should be no place in the political process for groups and individuals who refuse to renounce terror and violence or refuse to recognize Israel's right to exist or refuse to disarm,” Assistant Secretary of State David Welch said this month.

That may be too optimistic, says a new report on Hamas by the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based organization that tries to avert and end conflicts.

“It is a safe assumption that for most Islamists, integration (into electoral politics) is meant to complement armed struggle rather than replace it,” the report says.

Israel originally tolerated Hamas in the 1980s to blunt the power of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which was leading the fight against Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza.

Israel reached a peace deal with the PLO and its leader, Yasser Arafat, in 1993. Arafat then became leader of the Palestinian Authority, while Hamas continued to reject Israel's right to exist.

Now Hamas could win 30% or more of the seats in the legislature, according to recent surveys.

Khalil Shikaki, a Palestinian pollster, said the weakness of the government led by Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas, Arafat's successor, and his Fatah Party could clear the way for a Hamas takeover.

“We are at a point where this could be the end of the era of the nationalists and the beginning of the era of the Islamicists,” he says.

Hamas is one of several Islamic political parties gaining strength throughout the Middle East, most prominently in Egypt, Iraq and Lebanon. They all share opposition to U.S. policies, particularly American support for Israel.

Religious parties are gaining because they are “the most organized, best-funded, most dedicated and most attractive” alternatives to corrupt authoritarian regimes, says Daniel Pipes, director of the Middle East Forum, a Philadelphia-based think tank. Their views contradict the U.S. goal of creating “liberal, stable, open societies,” he says.

Don't Deal With Terrorists (USAT)

By Daniel Pipes

USA Today, January 25, 2006

As Hamas, the Islamist terror group, surges in the polls with a prospect of joining the Palestinian Authority or even running it, governments worldwide must decide on their responses.

Masked Hamas gunmen join a press conference in Gaza. Hamas is intent on destroying Israel, one founder recently reiterated.

An increasing number of voices are calling for Hamas to be recognized, arguing that the imperatives of governance would tame it, ending its arch-murderous vocation (it has killed about 600 Israelis) and turning it into a responsible citizen.

Even President Bush made this argument in early 2005: "There's a positive effect when you run for office. Maybe some will run for office and say, 'Vote for me, I look forward to blowing up America.' ... I don't think so. I think people who generally run for office say, 'Vote for me, I'm looking forward to fixing your potholes, or making sure you got bread on the table.' "

The historical record, however, refutes this "pothole theory of democracy." Mussolini made the trains run, Hitler built autobahns, Stalin cleared the snow and Castro reduced infant mortality — without any of these totalitarians giving up their ideological zeal nor their grandiose ambitions. Likewise, Islamists in Afghanistan, Iran and Sudan have governed without becoming tamed. If proof is needed, note the Iranian efforts to build nuclear weapons amid an apocalyptic fervor.

Hamas might have hired a spin doctor to improve its image in the West, but its leadership candidly maintains it has no intention of changing. Responding to a question on whether Bush is correct that U.S. engagement with Hamas would moderate the terror group, Mahmoud Zahar, a Hamas founder, laughed and declared that this tactic "will not succeed." In recent days, Zahar has publicly reiterated that Hamas still intends to destroy Israel.

Fortunately, U.S. policy remains steadfast: "We haven't dealt with Hamas, and we won't deal with Hamas members who are elected," says U.S. embassy spokesman Stewart Tuttle in Israel. That is a good start; ideally, there should be no dealings at all with a Palestinian Authority that includes Hamas in its leadership.

It was a mistake to permit Hamas to compete in elections. Like al-Qaeda, Hamas should be destroyed, not legitimated, much less courted.

Ballot Box Gains For Hamas Pose Dilemma For U.S., Allies (USAT)

USA Today, January 25, 2006

The Middle East, one saying goes, is a place where anything can happen — and often does. How else to describe the transformation of now-ailing Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon?

After dedicating his life to settling disputed land, Sharon recently gave some settlements up — forcing Israeli families out at army gunpoint — in the name of long-term Israeli security.

An equally stunning transformation, at least on the surface, has been taking place in the run-up to today's first legislative Palestinian elections in a decade. Hamas, an Islamic terror organization dedicated to the destruction of Israel, has given itself a campaign makeover.

Curtailed are the black masks, glorification of suicide bombers, Kalashnikovs and much of the wipe-Israel-off-the-map rhetoric. Hamas has been campaigning as the "Change and Reformation Party," specializing in getting out the vote, ending corruption and bringing prosperity.

A strong showing by Hamas would underscore one of the biggest risks in promoting democracy in the Middle East: Radical Muslims can win elections. Though many Palestinians are wary of its Islamic fundamentalism, polls indicate Hamas could get as much or more of the vote in its first big foray into politics as the ruling Fatah Party could.

Hamas' makeover is being orchestrated by a savvy PR expert, raising the obvious question: How much of it is for real, and how much of it is a cynical ploy to grab power, then revert to big-time terrorism? Given Hamas' history, extreme skepticism is in order.

Even so, the smartest strategy for U.S., Israeli and international policymakers is to find ways to prod Hamas to make its new image more than cosmetic. Hamas needs to be pushed onto the path taken by the Irish Republican Army (IRA), which over time split into a military and political wing, the former slowly overwhelmed by the latter.

That's far easier said than done. First, the United States and others correctly insist, Hamas has to affirm Israel's right to exist and commit itself to disarm. That has to be the non-negotiable baseline. But beyond that there needs to be a concerted campaign to coerce Hamas into taking political responsibility and building constructively on its long-standing social services to Palestinians. Unlike al-Qaeda, which condemns democracy and elections, Hamas shows some willingness to change.

Fatah, the party whose dominance is set to be weakened — or even end — in the elections, has similar origins to Hamas: It originated in the former Palestine Liberation Organization, a terror group led by the iconic Yasser Arafat. Israel, with U.S. and international backing, ultimately negotiated with Arafat. But Mahmoud Abbas, who became president after Arafat's death in 2004, has been weak and unable to control infighting.

One reason the IRA evolved was because followers in Northern Ireland, much as the Palestinians now, grew tired of violence. Many Palestinians who vote for Hamas today want their own version of the "Sharon precedent," according to Israeli newspaper columnist Sever Plocker.

That might take years, if at all. But Sharon's late-in-life conversion shows nothing is impossible, even Israeli talks some day with a Hamas offshoot. As Yitzhak Rabin, the late Israeli prime minister, once said, "You don't make peace with friends. You make it with very unsavory enemies."

Acting Israeli Leader Backs A Palestinian State (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0011629

JERUSALEM, Jan. 24 - In his first major policy address since becoming Israel's acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert said Tuesday that he backed the creation of a Palestinian state, and that Israel would have to relinquish parts of the West Bank to maintain its Jewish majority.

"We support the establishment of a modern, democratic Palestinian state," Mr. Olmert said at the annual Herzliya Conference near Tel Aviv, which has become a forum for important speeches by Israeli leaders. "The existence of two nations, one Jewish and one Palestinian, is the full solution to the national aspirations and problems of each of the peoples."

He said he was following the path set down by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who suffered a severe stroke on Jan. 4 and remains in a coma.

In his remarks, Mr. Olmert said the biggest challenge facing Israel was defining the country's permanent borders in ways that assured a continued Jewish majority. While maintaining that the West Bank is part of "our historic homeland," he said demographic realities required handing back parts of the territories, which Israel captured during the 1967 Arab-Israeli war.

"The choice between allowing Jews to live in all parts of the land of Israel and living in a state with a Jewish majority mandates giving up parts of the land of Israel," he said. "We will not be able to continue ruling over the territories in which the majority of the Palestinian population lives."

Mr. Olmert did not offer new proposals, but said this was an opportune moment to revive peacemaking efforts, with the Palestinians holding parliamentary elections on Wednesday and with Israel holding its legislative elections on March 28.

"The elections tomorrow in the Palestinian Authority are a historic opportunity for the Palestinians to take a giant step toward realizing their goal to achieve national independence," he said. But he added, "The key to moving the political process forward is for the Palestinians to abandon the path of terror."

The elections could complicate peace efforts, however. The radical Islamic faction Hamas, which has waged a suicide bombing campaign against Israel, is poised to make a strong showing, and Israel and Hamas have always refused to deal with each other.

Like Mr. Sharon, Mr. Olmert said he would be guided by the road map, the international peace plan that was introduced in the summer of 2003 but immediately stalled.

Neither side has met its requirements in the first stage of the plan, which has three stages and ultimately calls for a comprehensive peace agreement and a Palestinian state. Still, Mr. Olmert cited the rarely mentioned second stage, which would allow for a Palestinian state with temporary borders.

The Palestinians could have a state "even before all the complicated issues connected to a final agreement are resolved," he noted.

The Palestinians have generally opposed interim measures, and prefer to focus on final-status issues. The Palestinian leadership seeks a state in all of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, with a capital in East Jerusalem. Mr. Olmert stressed that, in any final settlement, Jerusalem would remain a unified city under Israeli control.

Responding to the speech, Saeb Erekat, the chief Palestinian negotiator, said: "I want Mr. Olmert to know he has a partner on the Palestinian side. I hope he will abandon unilateral Israeli actions and come back to the negotiating table so both sides can begin to implement their obligations under the road map."

Mr. Sharon has not shown any significant signs of recovery in recent days, and there is now an almost universal assumption that he will not return to political life. In his absence, Mr. Olmert has become the acting head of the centrist Kadima party, which is heavily favored in the Israeli elections, according to opinion surveys.

As the acting prime minister, Mr. Olmert initially avoided major decisions, but lately has begun to assert himself. He said Israel should limit construction in Jewish settlements, work to improve the daily lives of Palestinians and take down West Bank settlement outposts that were erected without government permission.

But the Palestinians want all Jewish settlements in the West Bank removed, something Mr. Olmert said he was not prepared to do.

He said Israel would "maintain control over the security zones, the Jewish settlement blocs and those places which have supreme national importance to the Jewish people, first and foremost a united Jerusalem under Israeli sovereignty."

About 250,000 Jewish settlers now live in the West Bank, a figure that is increasing by more than 10,000 annually. The figures do not include Israelis living in East Jerusalem, which was captured by Israel in the 1967 war and then annexed.

Mr. Olmert was a strong advocate of Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip last summer, though he has not said whether he would be prepared to take a similar action in the West Bank.

"We would prefer an agreement," he said. "To realize this opportunity, the Palestinians will have to give up part of their national dreams, just as we have given up some of our national dreams."

The Samurai Of Zionism (NY)

DOJ_NMG_0011630

New Yorker, January 25, 2006

This week in the magazine, Ari Shavit writes about the life and career of Israel's Prime Minister, Ariel Sharon, who has been incapacitated since suffering a stroke, earlier this month. Here, with Amy Davidson, Shavit, a columnist for the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz, discusses Sharon's legacy.

AMY DAVIDSON: In your piece this week, you write that there have been many Sharons: Arik of Sinai, Arik the Settler, Arik the Leper. Was one of them the real Sharon?

ARI SHAVIT: If you look at Sharon's life, the bottom line is that he is the "samurai of Zionism," as I refer to him in the article. Basically, he is a warrior. He is the product of the Israeli-Palestinian tragedy, and he became a major player—actor—in it. His life was about the aggressive and combative elements of the Zionist directive. This man has affected the lives of all Israelis and Palestinians, in many episodes over several decades, but I think that, at the end of the day, what was most important was the settlements. In this sense, Arik the Settler is the one who, unfortunately, had more influence than all the others. He changed the reality on the ground in a fundamental way. Ironically, toward the end of his life, he began undoing some of what he did during most of the previous quarter of a century, while still trying to save other parts. The drama of creating the settlements—which I think was a pitiful project and absurd in many ways—and the drama of the undoing are what will remain with us in the years following the Sharon era. This is not history; it is still history in the making, and it will shape our future here in the next decade.

AD: What do you think drove him to undo some of what he did? For a lot of Israelis, the dilemma is remaining both a Jewish state and a democratic state, given the demographic reality. Was that his concern?

AS: Later on, it did become his concern. But I'm not sure that his initial conversion was because of democracy. I think that it came about for strategic reasons. He failed to suppress terror; he failed to create a suitable Palestinian partner for the political process he had in mind; and he failed to get enough international support for his war against Yasir Arafat. So he was faced with a real political threat in 2003. One has to understand that, to begin with, the Sharon strategy for this decade was, basically, to suppress terror in the first phase, not to negotiate until there was calm, and then to try to negotiate an interim long-term agreement with the Palestinians. He had some success with both, but, ultimately, he failed. He did not beat terror, and he could not bring Arafat—and not even Abu Mazen—to go along with his sort of political process. So he found himself facing a political dead end, in which he saw that the outcome would be increasing international pressure on Israel and, possibly, the loss of the support of the American Administration, which was so essential to him. And the Israeli left, which was beginning to have war fatigue after giving Sharon a chance for two years, was emerging again as a potential opposition. All of that together brought him to understand that he must take the initiative in order to stop the stagnation and create some sort of new momentum, which he hoped he would be able to master. The demographic factor has dominated the discourse of the Israeli left and center for a long time. Sharon was a late bloomer, or discoverer, of the demographic reality.

AD: Sharon went from being the champion of the most radical settlers to being someone they viewed as having betrayed them by withdrawing from Gaza. How do you think the settlers view him now, as he nears the end of his life?

AS: This is a fascinating story, which not only is political, with historical repercussions, but has a very strong emotional and human element. There was, I would say, an unholy alliance between Sharon and the settlers. He needed their messianic energy to fulfill his strategic settlement plan, which was to take part of the West Bank and Gaza and to basically annex them to Israel, but he did this without having any religious and messianic thinking. He was using them because he did not have the support of the Israeli left, the Israeli Labor movement, or even the Likud people, who are not settler types. The settlers, for their part, saw him as a sort of contractor, who carried out their divine plan although he didn't believe in it. They thought, He doesn't know what he's doing. These were two different schools of thought, two different persuasions, and they made a kind of alliance that was strategic but had a contradiction at its core. They chose each other without anyone knowing who would laugh last. The crisis between Sharon and the settlers was waiting to happen. It was not a total surprise. Throughout the years, the settlers respected him very much, they admired him; he was not only helping them with their project but was an embodiment of the warrior, the man of the land. They worshipped these elements in his character, but they were suspicious of him, and many of them feared that one day Sharon would dismantle the settlements. Sharon swore to them, literally swore, that he never would. And then, as in a Greek tragedy—and to the delight of the liberals in Israel and throughout the world—he betrayed them, in a very aggressive, brutal way. They also knew that he was the only person, the only politician, who had the political ability to carry out this project; if anyone would do this to them, it would be Sharon. And their nightmare was fulfilled. On the one hand, they felt betrayed, and, on the other hand, they were somehow paralyzed, bewitched by his nationalistic charisma, by the Zionist mythology he carried with him, and they couldn't quite get their act together in fighting him. And this is why he really left them completely shattered. He not only dismantled twenty-five settlements; he left their leadership in deep crisis, their entire political force in complete disarray. We who saw the settlers as a great enemy of benign Zionism, of Israel as a democratic state, we have to thank Sharon for this. Yet, if you look at it from a storyteller's point of view, this was a very cruel drama that had all the elements of trust and betrayal.

AD: That ambivalence you talk about, on the part of liberals in Israel—do you think that's shared by Palestinians? Do you think that Arabs will eventually view Sharon as a strangely positive figure, or always as a negative figure?

AS: I think you saw growing respect for Sharon among Palestinians and throughout the Arab world in the past two years. When he first made his disengagement plan public, there was total mistrust. People did not believe that he would fulfill it. And there were very good reasons for this mistrust, because Sharon's record was very troublesome, both because of his past brutality and because of his cunning ways. But once Sharon proved that he was serious, and that he was willing to put all his political capital on the line and risk everything in order to implement the pullout from Gaza, I think that brought him a lot of respect among Palestinians. I don't think they can, or should, forget his history. They'll always remember the brutal Sharon, the Sharon who fought viciously and aggressively against them in the fifties and sixties, in 1971 in Gaza, and, most of all, in Lebanon in the early eighties. But look at the turnaround of this person, who was so hated, and yet left them with two amazing achievements. He left 1.4 million Palestinians free, for the first time in Palestinian history. Gaza is a mess, it's surrounded, the situation there is very troubling, and Sharon bears a lot of responsibility for that. But one cannot ignore the fact that he created this precedent. The other contribution is bringing the entire Israeli public to accept the idea of a Palestinian state and a two-state solution. Ehud Barak, the Israeli Prime Minister in 2000, broke the taboo, but he didn't have political backing. In many ways, Sharon became, whether he liked it or not, the father of the Palestinian state-to-be. This is an enormous historical contribution, and I think that sober Palestinians realize that.

AD: In your interviews with him and elsewhere, Sharon has been very blunt about his disdain for Arabs—his disdain for them not just as political adversaries or enemies but as a people. One likes to think that peace and reconciliation go together, that increased understanding between Jews and Arabs is a part of the peace process, and yet it seems not to have been for him.

AS: Sharon was a deeply incorrect—politically incorrect—person, and not only regarding Arabs. He had prejudices regarding Jews as well, and regarding Europeans; he was not p.c. in any way, from the day he first knew his own mind to the day he collapsed. It was not part of his world. He was not a humanist in any way, he was not a universalist; he cared about the Jews and only about the Jews, and whatever he did he did because he thought it would serve him and his people. Now, when it comes to his attitude toward Arabs—first of all, I must say these are some of the most fascinating and troubling lines I've heard from him, and I was surprised how direct and frank he was in saying it, not realizing how immoral it was, when he talked about not trusting Arabs in general. I think that this was something that was very true of him, this deep mistrust of our Arab and Palestinian neighbors. And I think that, to the end, he really was not a man of peace. Because you're absolutely right: if you want peace, you need real respect of the other, real understanding of the other's rights, and real understanding that not all justice is on your side and that compromise is needed, not only for political reasons but for moral reasons. Sharon had none of this; I do not think he had a moral element of this sort. But, perhaps, this makes his process even more interesting. Because, although he did not believe in peace, he wanted to have some sort of quiet. He did—and here I do believe him—want to have less bloodshed and more stability. And, in fact, he thought that the people who speak highly of peace, of the perfect peace, of an ideal peace, were actually going to bring much more bloodshed. He thought—and he was not the only one—that the record of recent years proved that when you try to impose an ideal notion of peace on a very troublesome, rough neighborhood, such as the Middle East, the outcome is actually more violence, more bloodshed, and even war. What he was trying to do was reduce occupation, reduce friction, reduce the level of violence, although he didn't have any of what he would call "illusions" about a European kind of peace and coöperation. He did believe in a kind of coöperation on the ground—economics, commerce, water, agriculture. But he didn't believe it was time for a real, historical reconciliation, because he thought the Palestinians were not ripe for that. One might say he was not ripe for that, either.

Having said all that, it is worth mentioning that he did have respect for our Arab neighbors in terms of what he believed was their concept of nationalism, their attachment to the land, the role that honor played in their political life. He even expressed envy of that. He felt that, in these aspects, the Arabs were more impressive than the Jews, and in this sense, ironically, he wanted the Jews to be more like Arabs. Here I'll close the circle of the argument: perhaps it's not that surprising that he found a common language with people like President Hosni Mubarak, of Egypt, and some of the other Arab leaders, who felt that they could have, with Sharon, the kind of dialogue they understood, which they could not have with European-type statesmen like Shimon Peres, for instance. Peres is much more generous, elegant, humanist, universalist, but less understood. Sharon, with all his prejudices, somehow found a way of living in a kind of dialogue with the region. And, at the end of the day, some in the region were actually willing to accept him.

AD: Sharon talked about his own attachment to the land in your interviews with him. You said earlier that the settlers saw him as too secular. It's a strange thing—he speaks about the land in Biblical terms, evoking Biblical figures, without ever being religious.

AS: Sharon was a godless person, in a very profound way. He had no religion, no faith. When you look at the brutal chapters of his biography, you can say that there was something of the brutal secularist about him; this was the modus operandi of a person who's really not God-fearing in any way. This is fact No. 1. Fact No. 2 is that he had a very strong sense of history, with a special attachment to the land, and a very strong Biblical memory—the Bible and the land came together in a potent fusion process within him. He was truly a nationalist romantic, in an almost scary way. The two sides seem to be contradictory, but, if you look at the history of Zionism, you see that there is not that much of a contradiction. For the early Zionists, the Labor-movement Zionists, history replaced God, and the Bible replaced both the Talmud and the Orthodox way of living as a Jew. History was the God of the Zionists. The idea was to bring the Jews—who, in the old Zionist terminology, had lived outside of history—back to the family of nations, the theatre of nations, where there is peace and war. This was the great thrill of the founding fathers of Zionism. And, in the same way, the Bible, being taken and read as the book about Jews living in this land, with a real, physical life as a nation, cultivating the land, defending the land—this was very powerful for the young Zionists and the young Sabras of Sharon's generation. He took it perhaps to a bit of an extreme, because he was a person of extremes, but this intimate relationship with the land and with Biblical legacy and tradition actually goes well together with the godless dimension of his personality, and, in many ways, makes him the last of this early line of Zionists; we are not going to see any more of this type in the future.

AD: Let's talk about the immediate future. Is there a vacuum with Sharon still in a coma? Can Ehud Olmert, the acting Prime Minister, operate freely, or is the question still "What would Sharon want?"

AS: Right now, we are in limbo. Sharon is in the hospital and there is less and less hope among his supporters of him coming back as a political figure of any sort; yet, because he is still there, hovering between life and death, things have not been settled yet—what his legacy is, who follows it, how Israel will deal with what he has left behind. What you do have right now are the political facts on the ground, and the most dominant fact is Kadima, Sharon's new party, which, in an astonishing way, is doing remarkably well, even without him. Which proves that the need for a centrist party in Israel was so great that once Sharon created it—and there was a need for Sharon to be the creator—it had a life of its own, even without him leading it. Things might change, but right now it seems that there is enough political energy to have, so to speak, the "Sharon way," even when Sharon is politically gone. Having said that, it's going to be much more difficult, because Olmert does not have Sharon's gravitas or authority, especially when it comes to dealing with the settlers. Although Olmert is more dovish than Sharon was, and he will try to go beyond what Sharon had in mind—he will probably try to dismantle more settlements than Sharon would have—he will run into more difficulty, because he lacks Sharon's historical range and his unique place within the collective Israeli psyche. When it comes to implementation on the ground, I feel that it will be much harder; anyone hoping for something as elegant, efficient, and quick as the disengagement in Gaza to repeat itself in the West Bank will be proved wrong. We are going to try, as a people, to deal with the difficulty of the settlements in the West Bank, but without Sharon it's going to be more difficult and more violent and, I'm afraid, it might even become bloody.

AD: You've interviewed Sharon several times over the years, and you write that he always confounded you in some ways. Do you think that, in the end, you understood him? Did you like him? Did you appreciate him?

AS: First of all, I learned before interviewing Sharon that it's very easy for politicians to be nice to journalists. They may be polite, even generous, sometimes charming with you, as a journalist interviewing them, but it's not relevant at all to the way they conduct politics, and it's not how you should judge them. Yes, I had a good time with Sharon; he gave people a good time—in a deep sense—but that is totally irrelevant to the way I see him as a political and historical figure. I did know him, and perhaps I did figure him out, in a way; I think I knew what to expect and I was able to predict, generally, what his next step would be. But there was, and still is, an enigma. I think that the Sharon enigma, which I tried to decipher in this piece, is still there. Therefore there will be something to linger over in the coming years, when all of this really becomes history.

Mideast Democracy Boosts Islamists U.S. Pushes Elections; Fundamentalists Gain (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, January 25, 2006

Islamic fundamentalists who oppose U.S. interests in the Middle East have benefited from the U.S. policy of promoting democracy, making significant gains in recent elections.

Hamas is the latest to rise. Its likely strong showing in Palestinian parliamentary elections today poses a dilemma for the United States and Israel, which refuse to deal with a group responsible for numerous suicide bombings.

Kenneth Katzman, a Middle East expert at the non-partisan Congressional Research Service, says the United States has pressured Egypt, Iraq and the Palestinian territories to hold free elections. "The pro-democracy effort has had the actual effect of strengthening fundamentalist movements," Katzman says.

In Egypt, he says, the Muslim Brotherhood was the most organized opposition to longtime President Hosni Mubarak, so it was ideally positioned to do well in the elections.

DOJ_NMG_0011633

Hamas, the Muslim Brotherhood, Hezbollah in Lebanon and several Iraqi religious groups oppose U.S. support for Israel and back policies that could restrict social freedoms.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack declined to comment on the trend and said the administration would wait for Palestinian election results.

Promoting democracy should “obviously” be part of U.S. policy, says Richard Haass, a senior State Department official in President Bush's first term. But there's debate about whether it is outweighing other foreign policy goals, he says.

The Realities Of Exporting Democracy (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

Sitting in a prison cell halfway around the planet, an Egyptian opposition leader forced President Bush this month to confront the question of how serious he was when he vowed to devote his second term to "ending tyranny in our world."

Ayman Nour, who dared challenge Egypt's authoritarian leader in manipulated elections, was sentenced on Christmas Eve to five years on what U.S. officials consider bogus charges. Inside the administration, a debate ensued over whether to shelve a new trade agreement with Egypt in protest. In the end, the trade talks were suspended and an Egyptian negotiating team invited to Washington last week was told it was no longer welcome.

In the year since Bush redefined U.S. foreign policy in his second inaugural address to make the spread of democracy the nation's primary mission, the clarion-call language has resonated in the dungeons and desolate corners of the world. But soaring rhetoric has often clashed with geopolitical reality and competing U.S. priorities.

While the administration has enjoyed notable success in promoting liberty in some places, it has applied the speech's principles inconsistently in others, according to analysts, activists, diplomats and officials. Beyond its focus on Iraq, Washington has stepped up pressure on repressive regimes in countries such as Belarus, Burma and Zimbabwe -- where the costs of a confrontation are minimal -- while still gingerly dealing with China, Pakistan, Russia and other countries with strategic and trade significance.

In the Middle East, where the administration has centered its attention, it has promoted elections in the Palestinian territories such as today's balloting for parliament, even as it directed money aimed at clandestinely preventing the radical Islamic group Hamas from winning. And although it has now suspended trade negotiations with Egypt, it did not publicly announce the move, nor has it cut the traditionally generous U.S. aid to Cairo.

"The glass is a quarter full, but we need more of it," said Jennifer Windsor, executive director of Freedom House, a group that promotes democracy. "The administration deserves credit, but it's just a start."

In its annual survey ranking nations as free, partly free or not free, the group upgraded nine nations or territories in 2005 and downgraded four. Among those deemed freer were Ukraine and Kyrgyzstan, where peaceful revolutions overthrew entrenched governments; Lebanon, where Syrian occupation troops were pressured to withdraw; and Afghanistan and the Palestinian territories, where trailblazing elections were held. Overall, Freedom House concluded, "the past year was one of the most successful for freedom" since the survey began in 1972.

At the same time, Human Rights Watch released its annual report, upbraiding the Bush administration for undermining its credibility in promoting freedom abroad through its embrace of abusive interrogation tactics in the battle with terrorists. "There's no question that the issue of torture in particular has compromised the U.S. voice, and not only torture but a manifold list of other human rights issues," said the group's associate director, Carroll Bogert.

The broader question is the degree to which Bush's speech marked genuine change in policy rather than so much talk. In many parts of the government, democracy promotion seems still to take a back seat to other goals.

After the government in Uzbekistan massacred hundreds of protesters in Andijan, for instance, the Pentagon resisted any tough response to protect its military base there. Ultimately, even the restrained statements by the U.S. government alienated the autocratic Uzbek president, Islam Karimov, who threw out the U.S. military.

"They come into conflict every day," a senior official said of rival priorities inside the administration. "The question becomes the weight given to the intangible interest in freedom versus the tangible interest in having a base in Uzbekistan, for instance."

The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity citing administration rules, called Bush's speech "a weapon in the hands of everyone in the administration who is pushing for a stronger and stronger democracy agenda."

"Anytime there's a question, should we say this or say that . . . someone can pull out a copy of the president's speech and say, 'Wait a second, may I quote from what the president said?' " the official added.

Outside the United States, the speech inspired many fighting for freedom but also raised expectations that are hard to fulfill. "All they do is talk right now," said Gulam Umarov. His father, Sanjar Umarov, head of the opposition Sunshine Coalition in Uzbekistan, has been in prison since October. "I don't know what actual moves they take. But they are talking, which is really good."

In other places, the United States has done more than talk. In Kyrgyzstan, the U.S. government funded pro-democracy groups and provided generators to print an opposition newspaper before its revolution. Edil Baisalov, director of the Coalition for Democracy and Civil Society, can quote extensively from the Bush inaugural speech. "The Kyrgyz people are much, much better off today than they were a year ago, and I think the U.S. government should take pride in taking credit for that," he said. "And [it] should never apologize that it wants the people to be free."

In Belarus, another former Soviet republic ruled by an iron-fisted leader, Bush's words also stir hope. "We draw strength from these statements," said Vladimir Kolas, chairman of the Council of the Belarusian Intelligentsia opposing President Alexander Lukashenko. "We understand there are limits to what the U.S. can do. But we do need strong and decisive statements . . . that they will not recognize falsified election results."

The Bush administration has been willing to stay tough on Belarus and others it labeled "outposts of tyranny," such as Burma and Zimbabwe. Bush lobbied Asian leaders at a November summit in South Korea to bring Burma before the U.N. Security Council, and as a result the council had an unprecedented discussion last month. The United States also renewed economic sanctions adopted in 2003.

Opposition activists in Burma said they were grateful for U.S. efforts to highlight repression in their country. But despite these measures, little has changed, and some diplomats believe the situation has deteriorated. More than 1,100 political prisoners are behind bars, according to Amnesty International, and all regional offices of Aung San Suu Kyi's National League for Democracy remain shuttered.

In Zimbabwe, U.S. Ambassador Christopher W. Dell has been so outspoken about President Robert Mugabe's government that he has been threatened with expulsion. David Coltart, an opposition member of parliament, said Zimbabwe has been on the Bush administration's radar screen, even if not the president's. "George Bush is too preoccupied by Iraq to be personally engaged in the Zimbabwe crisis," he said. "But Colin Powell certainly was a friend of those struggling to bring democracy. It's too early to say whether Condoleezza Rice is focused on Zimbabwe."

Elsewhere, the U.S. hand is not seen as readily. In East Africa, newspapers are filled with columns asking why the Bush administration ignores their undemocratic leaders. After violence spilled into the streets of Uganda's capital when President Yoweri Museveni changed the constitution to run for a third term, Washington was silent. Museveni also jailed his opponent on what critics call trumped-up charges of treason and rape.

In Ethiopia, where 40 people were killed by government forces firing into crowds protesting fraudulent elections, Ethiopians complained that it took months for U.S. officials to speak out. "Does the Bush administration care about fighting terrorism for its citizens or does it care about the political situation in a Third World country like Ethiopia?" asked Tamrat G. Giorgis, managing editor of Fortune, one of Ethiopia's few independent newspapers. "I think Africans are asking that question, and we know the war on terror is more important."

When it comes to places such as China and Russia, the Bush administration prefers private friendly advice to ringing public denunciations. Sometimes it passes on both. Although U.S. officials have said they would like Gen. Pervez Musharraf, who took over Pakistan in a military coup, to give up his army post and govern as a civilian, Musharraf said last year that Bush has never raised the issue with him.

"I know presidents and diplomats are not dissidents and when they say they can achieve more in private talks, they may be sincere," said Lyudmila Alexeyeva of the Moscow Helsinki Group, a human rights organization under pressure from the Kremlin. "But I would still like to hear more. And maybe it will have an effect on our president."

Then there are Iran and North Korea, the two top enemies on Bush's list. The president appointed a special envoy on human rights in North Korea, but Abdollah Momeni of the Office for Fostering Unity, an Iranian student group, wants more constructive help. "If they only make noises about this, or if they think that through military action democracy can be achieved, they are moving on the wrong path," said Momeni, who is appealing a five-year prison sentence. "Military action against a country would dry up the democratic blossoms." But, he added, "more action and less talking is needed."

And there is Egypt, one of the most problematic places for the Bush democracy push. When President Hosni Mubarak agreed to let challengers run against him for the first time, a visiting Laura Bush praised the "wise and bold" move. But shortly after she left, Mubarak supporters orchestrated attacks on democracy demonstrators. The presidential election was manipulated, and a subsequent parliamentary election degenerated into violence and mass arrests.

The arrest of Nour, who won an unprecedented 7 percent against Mubarak, presented a singular challenge to Bush, who promised in his inaugural address to stand with "democratic reformers facing repression, prison or exile." The White House pronounced itself "deeply troubled" and demanded Mubarak "release Mr. Nour from detention."

Nour remains behind bars.

6 Powers To Meet In London To Seek A Common Policy On Iran (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

VIENNA, Jan. 24 - The foreign ministers of Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will meet in London on Monday in an effort to resolve their differences on how best to punish Iran for its nuclear activities, three diplomats said Tuesday.

The United States and the Europeans say they believe that the United Nations Security Council must begin to pass judgment now on Iran for its nuclear behavior. The meeting was prompted by Iran's decision earlier this month to reopen its uranium enrichment plant despite a voluntary agreement freezing such activity, although the behavior being criticized also includes violations of Iran's treaty obligations over the years.

But Russia and China are resisting entreaties to move immediately, arguing that Iran should be pressed to close the plant but should be given more time to comply with the demands being made before the Security Council acts.

The meeting in London will give the five permanent members of the Security Council, as well as Germany, a last opportunity to forge a common position before a crucial meeting in Vienna on Feb. 2 of the 35country board of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the diplomats said, speaking on condition of anonymity under customary diplomatic rules.

At a minimum, the ministers could be expected to issue a statement of concern calling on Iran to immediately close down its uranium enrichment plant at Natanz, which Iran says it wants to operate for research purposes.

The site is still under strict monitoring by the atomic energy agency, based in Vienna. While Iran has begun to move equipment around and clear the site, international inspectors have seen no evidence that it has begun to operate any of the machinery there, diplomats said.

The United States and the Europeans are still hoping that the agency's board will vote at its meeting next week to refer the situation to the Security Council.

The Iran dispute has set in motion intense global diplomatic efforts by the Americans and Europeans as well as the Iranians, who have threatened to put into effect a law of theirs that would require them to move ahead with a full-scale uranium enrichment program and limit cooperation with the international atomic agency if the Iran dossier went before the Security Council.

Enriched uranium can be used for peaceful energy purposes or for making atomic bombs, and the process of enrichment for peaceful purposes is allowed under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

In Moscow on Tuesday, Ali Larijani, the chief Iranian nuclear negotiator, met with Russian officials to discuss their proposal to enrich Iran's uranium on Russian soil under Russian supervision.

After the talks, the office of Igor S. Ivanov, the secretary of Russia's Security Council, issued a statement saying only that "both sides expressed their desire to solve the issue in a diplomatic way within the framework of the International Atomic Energy Agency."

In Nicosia, Cyprus, on Tuesday, Foreign Secretary Jack Straw of Britain urged Iran to "look much more seriously" at the Russian proposal, The Associated Press reported. When the Russians made their proposal late last year, Iran at first denied that the proposal existed, then rejected it, and now says it is under consideration.

In another diplomatic development, officials from the atomic agency flew on Tuesday to Tehran, where they will give Iran a last chance to cooperate fully with the agency's demands concerning Iran's past nuclear activities, agency officials said.

Olli Heinonen, the deputy director general for safeguards, and a team of inspectors will press longstanding demands, including access to a former military site in Tehran, information about Iran's dealings with an international nuclear black market that supplied it with atomic technology, and information about possible work related to nuclear weapons.

Critical White House Seeks Russia's Aid (AP)

By Barry Schweid, AP Diplomatic Writer

AP, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration is looking to Russia for diplomatic help in harnessing Iran's nuclear program despite growing U.S. criticism of Russian domestic policies.

A recent law requiring all non-governmental organizations to register with a state commission was criticized again Tuesday by State Department spokesman Sean McCormack.

DOJ_NMG_0011636

The law is viewed by its defenders as a measure to crack down on extremism. Critics find in it evidence that President Vladimir Putin, in an authoritarian move, is tightening controls on democratic and humanitarian activities.

"We have previously expressed our concern about the recent law," McCormack said in tersely registering U.S. opposition again.

However, this displeasure was overshadowed by the urgency of trying to line up Russia to challenge Iran's nuclear programs — first in the International Atomic Energy Agency at a special meeting Feb. 2-3 and then at the United Nations if the agency sends the dispute there.

Russia has signaled it favors a go-slow approach. At the same time, it is offering to defuse some of the concern about Iran's activities by offering to shift enrichment activities to Russia so they could be monitored as designed for civilian and not weapons purposes.

The European Union's senior diplomat, Javier Solana, said while holding talks last week in Washington that it remains a live idea.

McCormack said the Russian proposal, if accepted by Iran, "would provide the international community some comfort that Iran couldn't use that mechanism (enrichment) to try to obtain nuclear weapons."

However, McCormack described the Russians as frustrated in their efforts to intercede with Iran.

In Moscow, after a meeting with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, the office of Russia's security council secretary, Igor Ivanov, issued a brief statement saying the Iranian nuclear dispute must be solved by diplomatic efforts within the U.N. nuclear agency.

Meanwhile, at a conference at the Nixon Center, Dimitri Simes, president of the private group, said "the state of Russian democracy today is bleak and getting bleaker."

Simes said the judicial system is corrupt and totally controlled by the government and that the Duma, the Russian legislature, is a rubber-stamp body.

"You are allowed to express any opinion you like," he said, "as long as you are ineffective."

And President Bush's "special relationship" with Putin in which the two leaders spoke frequently to each other, stopped two years ago, he said.

Simes, who visited Russia last week, said Putin and his associates "have destroyed the checks and balances" common to democracies.

Simes said the law requiring registration of non-governmental groups was not so bad as the original draft. But Simes said in an interview that "the trouble is the law will be implemented by a Russian bureaucracy with no role for the courts."

The other principal speaker, Lorne Cramer, president of the International Republican Institute, which is partly U.S.-financed, said the Bush administration was silent about repression in Russia during its first term.

But now, he said, "we are seeing the first manifestation of breaking our silence."

Iran Defends Planned Holocaust Conference (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 25, 2006

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran on Tuesday defended its plan to organize a conference to examine what it terms the scientific evidence for the Holocaust.

At the United Nations, the Israeli ambassador said the conference plans were proof that Iran was run by an "extreme, fundamentalist, lunatic regime."

The planned conference, which has drawn condemnation from Western leaders, is yet another step in hard-line President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's public campaign against Israel.

"For over half a century, those who seek to prove the Holocaust have used every podium to defend their position. Now they should listen to others," Iran's Foreign Ministry spokesman, Hamid Reza Asefi, was quoted as saying Tuesday by the official Islamic Republic News Agency.

Ahmadinejad already had called the Nazis' World War II slaughter of 6 million European Jews a "myth" and said the Jewish state should be "wiped off the map."

Dan Gillerman, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, said the planned conference was "proof of what a global threat Iran really is."

"I fear that the only reason Iran is showing so much interest in the Holocaust is because they may be preparing another Holocaust and it is up to the world and the United Nations to prevent that from happening," Gillerman told The Associated Press on the sidelines of the opening of the "No Child's Play" exhibit at the U.N. commemorating Holocaust remembrance week.

IRNA quoted Asefi as saying: that "blind prejudice together with political interests and aims have closed the eyes of the Holocaust defenders to the realities of the world, and they reject without any logic a scientific conference."

DOJ_NMG_0011637

Iran's Foreign Ministry, which was expected to sponsor the conference, has yet to fix a date or place. It was not clear who might attend.

"Iran is proving yet again what an extreme, fundamentalist, lunatic regime it is," Gillerman said.

Ahmadinejad has been issuing the highly inflammatory comments about Israel and the Holocaust in conjunction with the country's deepening confrontation with the West over its nuclear activities. The United States and its allies accuse Iran of seeking nuclear weapons. Tehran says the program is its right under the Nonproliferation Treaty and is designed for electricity generation.

Russia's national security chief and Iran's top nuclear negotiator said Tuesday that the nuclear standoff must be resolved by diplomatic efforts in the U.N. atomic watchdog agency.

The Kremlin statement reflected Russia's efforts to delay Iran's referral to the U.N. Security Council and Moscow's opposition to international sanctions against Tehran.

8 Are Killed By Bombings In Restive City In South Iran (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

TEHRAN, Jan. 24 - Two separate bombs exploded Tuesday morning in the southern city of Ahwaz at a bank and a government building, leaving 8 people dead and 46 wounded, state-run news agencies reported.

The first bomb went off at 9:30 a.m. at Saman Bank and the second 30 minutes later at the government office for natural resources.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had been expected to meet his cabinet in the city, but the trip was canceled Monday evening. His office said the four-day trip was canceled because of bad weather, the IRNA news agency reported Monday. The explosions occurred at the time he had been expected to make a speech in Ahwaz.

A series of deadly bombs went off in Ahwaz last year, and the government accused Britain of provoking the attacks. Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said in October that Iran had proof of British involvement.

Britain has repeatedly denied the accusations.

Mostafa Pourmohammadi, the interior minister, said the bombings on Tuesday were motivated by foreigners. Mr. Ahmadinejad ordered the Intelligence and Foreign Ministries to investigate "the role of foreign hands" in the bombings, the ISNA student news agency reported.

"The president has ordered a prompt and firm probe into today's blast and the terrorists who executed it," a government spokesman, Gholam Hossein Elham, was quoted as saying.

"Iran has always been victimized by terrorism, and these blind blasts show the continuity of brutal acts against Iran by international terrorists," he added.

Samad Tavakoli, the manager of Saman Bank, said there were nearly 60 people at the bank when the bomb exploded Tuesday.

"I was speaking to one of the customers when the power suddenly went off," ISNA quoted him as saying. "Then I saw something explode in the middle of the bank in front of me and I saw all my colleagues and many customers getting injured."

Ahwaz is the capital of Khuzestan Province and home to a Sunni Arab minority. The province borders Iraq and was battered during the Iran-Iraq war. It has remained one of the least developed regions in the country since then.

Unrest broke out in the city in April, and several people were killed after rumors spread that the government planned to relocate Arabs.

U.S. Troops On Front Line Of Expanding India Ties (WP)

By John Lancaster

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

CHAUBATIA, India -- More than half a century after independence, foreign soldiers have returned to this onetime colonial garrison of tin-roofed bungalows, stone churches and panoramic Himalayan views. But this time, the soldiers' accents are American, not British, and their purpose is not to subdue India but to cultivate it as an ally.

In the latest of a series of such exercises, 120 U.S. combat troops have come here to train with their Indian counterparts in areas such as counterinsurgency and peacekeeping. Besides taking classroom instruction, they are firing Indian weapons, bonding with Indian soldiers over games of soccer and volleyball, and even developing a taste for vegetarian cuisine, albeit with spices toned down for sensitive American palates.

"When you get the armies together, it's like saying, 'Hey, we can work together, we can accomplish this together,' " said U.S. Army Capt. Robert Atienza, 31, of San Diego, who commands the Hawaii-based infantry company that is participating in the 2 1/2 -week exercise that began last week. "It's very broad."

The exercise is an example of the striking improvement in relations between the United States and India following decades of Cold War estrangement and more recent tensions stemming from India's nuclear tests in 1998.

Spurred by the United States, the two governments have signed commercial, scientific and military agreements in the last two years and are negotiating a controversial deal that could permit the sale of civilian nuclear technology to India. The Bush administration is eager to cultivate India as a partner in counterterrorism and, some analysts say, as a strategic counterweight to China.

The warming trend is also reflected in the surge of interest in India among U.S. business leaders such as Bill Gates, the chairman of Microsoft Corp., who recently announced a $1.7 billion investment in the country, the latest in a string of such commitments by U.S. technology firms eager to cash in on India's booming economy and surplus of inexpensive brainpower.

Other indicators include the parade of U.S. lawmakers through New Delhi in recent months and steadily expanding commercial air links. In addition, a record number of Indian students -- more than 80,000 -- are studying at U.S. universities, according to the U.S. Embassy in New Delhi.

President Bush is scheduled to visit India for the first time in early March at the invitation of Prime Minister Manmohan Singh, a self-effacing economist who met with Bush at the White House last July. In New Delhi on Friday, Indian Foreign Secretary Shyam Saran said the planned visit is "really reflective of the very significant transformation that has taken place, and is taking place, in India-U.S. relations."

Saran was speaking at a news conference after meetings with Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, who was making his third visit to the Indian capital in the last six months. "India is one of the few countries in the world that has the capability to act globally and has the same basic interests as the United States," Burns said in a telephone interview from New Delhi.

The two countries still have important differences. In particular, India has a long history of warm relations with Iran and is pursuing plans to build a natural gas pipeline from Iran across Pakistan, a move that the Bush administration has warned could trigger sanctions against Indian companies under a U.S. law aimed at isolating Iran's Islamic regime. Indian officials say the project is essential to their country's energy security.

Partly for that reason, India has walked a tightrope in its handling of the standoff between Iran and the United States over allegations that Iran is secretly developing nuclear weapons.

India's reluctance to dance entirely to Washington's tune stems in part from the influence of political parties opposed to the Bush administration's policies on Iraq and free trade.

One of the most important tests of the new relationship centers on the agreement signed by Bush and Singh in Washington last July that would give India access to nuclear fuel and reactors to produce electricity. Under the deal, the United States would lift a ban on the sale of such technology to India, provided that India opens up its civilian nuclear facilities to international inspections and other safeguards.

That cannot happen, however, until the administration and India agree on a plan to separate the country's civilian and military nuclear facilities. The U.S. Congress would then have to vote on the deal, which critics say would weaken efforts to curb the spread of nuclear weapons and create perceptions of a double standard in U.S. dealings with such countries as Iran and North Korea.

"The nonproliferation system is built on rules," said Michael Krepon, a specialist on the issue at the Henry L. Stimson Center in Washington. "They're not always honored, but having them makes it easier to gang up on people who break the rules. The approach the administration is taking is very poisonous to all that."

U.S. officials say the deal would strengthen nonproliferation efforts by opening up India's civilian nuclear facilities to outside inspection for the first time. India, they say, is entitled to special treatment in light of its democratic values and exemplary record of preventing nuclear secrets from falling into the wrong hands.

Burns said in the interview that his discussions last week with Indian officials had not yielded a breakthrough on the separation plan, and he made no prediction about whether a deal would be secured in time for Bush's visit. "It's a possibility but not a certainty," he said.

If the deal does fall apart, "a lot of people would be quite happy to say, 'We told you the United States cannot be trusted,' " said C. Raja Mohan, an analyst and commentator in New Delhi.

Other analysts say the relationship would survive such a setback, citing many common interests. Already, they note, India and the United States are working closely to coordinate policy on regional concerns such as instability in Nepal and Bangladesh. "The relationship is going to stand on its own," Burns said.

DOJ_NMG_0011639

The goodwill marks a sharp change from the Cold War, when India was a champion of the Non-Aligned Movement and had close ties to the Soviet Union. Relations began to improve in the early 1990s following the Soviet collapse and India's initial moves to liberalize its economy. But they nosedived when the United States imposed sanctions in response to India's 1998 nuclear tests.

The Bush administration lifted the sanctions after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and has promoted India as a new global partner, citing its vast economic potential and status as the world's largest democracy.

Analysts say the White House drive to court India was also influenced by frustration with traditional allies such as France and Germany and concerns over the rising power of China.

The administration has paid special attention to strengthening India's military capabilities.

Since 2002, India and the United States have held a number of naval, air and ground exercises. The latest is being conducted in Chaubatia, an army base that was established by the British Indian Army in the late 19th century in the forested Himalayan foothills about 90 miles northeast of New Delhi. It is now occupied by the Indian army's Kumaon Regiment and, at least through the end of January, by the men of Charlie Company, 2nd Battalion, 27th Infantry Regiment, which is part of the 25th Infantry Division out of Scofield Barracks, Hawaii.

Chaubatia is an exotic setting for the exercise, with its striking views of snow-capped peaks, immaculate grounds and road sign alerting drivers that "leopards have right of way."

One morning last week, Atienza, the company commander, lectured Indian soldiers on lessons learned during the battalion's year-long tour of Afghanistan, which ended in March 2004, as an interpreter translated his words into Hindi. In other classes, Indian officers shared their experiences fighting Islamic guerrillas in Kashmir. Later in the day, Indian and American troops converged on a firing range, where they took turns shooting each other's assault rifles at pop-up targets.

In part, the exercise is aimed at bridging cultural gaps between the two militaries. Several American officers, for example, said they had been struck by the relative lack of autonomy vested in Indian soldiers at the platoon level. And an Indian officer, who under Indian army ground rules could not be identified by name, said the U.S. soldiers were "quite relaxed," adding philosophically, "That is their way."

Report: U.S. Arms Helped Indonesia Attack East Timor (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 24 -- U.S. political and military support for Indonesia was vital to its ability to invade East Timor in December 1975 and to sustain a brutal 24-year occupation that cost the lives of at least 100,000 people, parts of a Timorese inquiry made public Tuesday show.

East Timor's Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation contended that the Ford administration "turned a blind eye" to the Indonesian invasion even though it knew that U.S.-supplied arms would be used to carry it out. The report called on the United States, France, Britain and other military backers of Indonesia to pay reparations to victims of Indonesian oppression.

The commission relied on more than 4,500 pages of recently declassified documents collected by the Washington-based National Security Archive, a nonprofit research group, which posted a 119-page portion of the commission's 2,500-page report on its Web site Tuesday. The rest is expected to be made public in the coming weeks.

The commission was created in 2001 by the United Nations and East Timor to provide a comprehensive account of abuses during Indonesia's occupation, which ended in 1999. East Timor's President Xanana Gusmao delivered it last week to Secretary General Kofi Annan.

"The Commission finds that the United States of America failed to support the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination, and that its political and military support were fundamental to the Indonesian invasion and occupation," the report said. "The support of the United States was given out of a strategically-motivated desire to maintain a good relationship with Indonesia, whose anti-communist regime was seen as an essential bastion against the spread of communism."

The national archive gave the commission National Security Council documents showing that U.S. officials were aware of Indonesian plans to invade East Timor a year before the invasion and did not discourage it. Other documents showed that U.S. officials had evidence that Indonesia had used U.S. naval vessels in support of air bombardment during its invasion of East Timor, but decided to remain silent about it.

The commission's report cites a Dec. 6, 1975, meeting in Jakarta -- the day before the invasion -- in which Indonesia's former ruler, President Suharto, asked then-President Gerald R. Ford and then-Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger for their "understanding" if his government took "rapid or drastic action" against East Timor, according to a declassified account of the conversation first made public in 2001.

Ford assured Suharto that "we will understand and will not press you on the issue," the documents say. Kissinger pressed Suharto to delay an invasion until the president had returned to the United States. "It is important that whatever you do succeeds quickly," Kissinger is reported to have said.

Kissinger did not respond to a request for comment Tuesday evening. A spokeswoman, Jesse LePorin, said he is recuperating from shoulder surgery.

In 1998, Kissinger was asked at Arizona State University about the invasion and, according to the Arizona Republic, replied: "You may not believe this, but Indonesia is a country of 180 million people, and they didn't ask our permission. Also, we were negotiating an end to the Vietnam War at that time, and we were not looking to make another enemy in Southeast Asia."

Simulated Attack Showcases Defense (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 25, 2006

The Pentagon showed off its new command-and-control system for U.S. missile defenses yesterday during a war-game missile attack on the United States, Japan and South Korea.

The simulation did not identify the missiles as coming from North Korea, but it was clear to observers and participants that the fictional island nation of Midland in the Sea of Japan/East Sea represented the communist state referred to by President Bush as part of an "axis of evil."

Several minutes into the hourlong simulation, one of the seven long-range missile warheads landed on the Aleutian Islands, in western Alaska, while six others aimed at Honolulu, Los Angeles, Colorado Springs and Fort Greely, Alaska, were intercepted and destroyed in midflight.

Brig. Gen. Robert Dehnert, program director for command and control at the Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency (MDA), said hitting a flying missile with another missile is not easy.

"As you've seen in the war game, this is easy to say, but difficult to accomplish," he told congressional lawmakers, congressional staff members and 12 journalists, who played the roles of key decision-makers, from the president to Patriot anti-missile battery operators.

"The purpose today is ... to provide some level of insight into the command-and-control battle-management system," Gen. Dehnert said.

The command-and-control system connects sensors that detect and track enemy missiles with military units charged with firing interceptors at the incoming missiles, including long-range missiles traveling at speeds of up to 15,000 miles per hour.

The control system distributes data from satellites and surface radar on missile launches. It also allows commanders in Washington, Nebraska, Colorado, Alaska and Hawaii and on ships in Asia to communicate and order launches using different missile interceptors.

The war game used missile-defense systems such as Patriot PAC-3 batteries in South Korea, Navy SM-3 interceptors on a ship near Japan, and 10 ground-based strategic-missile interceptors -- eight in Alaska and two in Southern California.

Sen. Wayne Allard, Colorado Republican, who sponsored the three days of war games, said the exercise "reminds us all of the vulnerability of our country" to missile attack.

Mr. Allard said the main missile threats today are from Iran, which is building nuclear arms and has medium-range missiles, and North Korea, which has short-range, medium-range and long-range missiles.

On the overall threat from missile attack, Mr. Allard said, "This is a threat that is emerging more and more every year because our adversaries are getting more and more competent every year."

Compass Name In UN Fraud Report (FT)

By Salamander Davoudi and Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, January 25, 2006

A United Nations report into procurement operations at its peacekeeping missions has uncovered evidence of suspected mismanagement, favouritism and financial irregularities in relation to its dealings with several companies including a subsidiary of Compass, the troubled contract caterer.

The investigation by the Office of Internal Oversight Services, the UN's internal investigative arm, examined 27 contracts worth $1bn, or 31 per cent of the cumulative value of all commercial contracts over $5m. As reported, it found that the world body could have lost as much as $298m in contract irregularities.

"A lack of enforcement of accountability and a reluctance to investigate mismanagement of resources, fraud and abuse of delegated authority has led to a pattern of corrupt practices," the report, distributed to UN members this week, said.

However, an earlier draft report, not for public distribution but seen by the FT, provides detail on that part of the investigation in which the OIOS looked into the UN's relationship with ESS, a subsidiary of Compass. The UN suspended ESS last October as a registered vendor pending the completion of an investigation into allegations about the way ESS won a Liberia contract in 2004.

The report describes seemingly irregular payments made to ESS, suspicions over why contracts were awarded to ESS and the absence of proper financing on one contract.

A spokesman for Compass said the company was aware of the report. "We are in constant contact with the head of the UN investigation, Paul L. Roberts. We have not seen the report but have been assured that there is nothing significant in it relating to ESS that we are not already aware of. We continue to co-operate very closely with all relevant authorities."

The draft report cites four separate areas in which UN dealings with ESS were called into question.

Firstly, the UN mission in Liberia complained that ESS's performance in providing food rations was "dismal" and hired a private investigations company, SGS, to ascertain why it had been awarded the contract. UN head office also sent its own investigator.

Secondly, ESS allegedly billed the $7.3m for transportation costs in excess of the value of a contract in East Timor. Some $7.6m was allegedly paid in violation of the UN's regulations.

The third instance in which UN dealings with ESS were called into question was a meeting in December 2004 to decide on several contract awards, including a $201m proposal to award ESS with a contract to provide the food rations for the UN mission in Sudan, took place without the usual chairman and other members. The contract was awarded to ESS without the requirement that it provide a guarantee, even though this represented, according to the report, "a crucial business risk" for the UN.

Finally, the report says ESS was among the companies that allegedly benefited from a failure to enforce UN rules relating to the provision of performance bonds, which are issued by banks to guarantee satisfactory performance by a contractor. UN rules state that the bonds should represent 10-30 per cent of the contract value. But investigators found on one $61.4m contract that ESS did not provide bonds up to the required value, and that its performance bond was returned eight months before the contract ended.

The UN is still investigating.

Annan's Son Will Repay Ghana For Fees On Car (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 24 - Kojo Annan, the son of Secretary General Kofi Annan, will repay the government of Ghana import duties he avoided by falsely claiming that a Mercedes he bought was for his father, his lawyer disclosed Tuesday.

"The automobile was not for the secretary general's own personal use and therefore the exemption was not justified," William W. Taylor III, the lawyer, said in a Jan. 19 letter from his Washington office to the customs services in Accra, the Ghanaian capital.

"I write to inform you that Mr. Kojo Annan wishes to make full payment of the amount due to the government of Ghana as a result of this transaction," the letter read.

The transaction first became public in a September report by the committee led by Paul A. Volcker investigating corruption and mismanagement in the oil-for-food program.

The report said that Kojo Annan had admired the luxury station wagon at a Geneva car show in March 1998 and arranged to purchase it and have it shipped to Ghana in November.

By using his father's name, he obtained a $6,541 discount from Mercedes and avoided paying $14,103 in import duties.

The Volcker committee was interested in the case because it was trying to establish whether there was any connection between Kofi Annan and the award of an oil-for-food contract to Cotecna Inspection Services, the Swiss company that had employed his son.

In the report, investigators said they first suspected that the car might be a payoff. They concluded, however, that the senior Mr. Annan had not known about the purchase and his son's use of his name.

Kojo Annan told investigators that he had misrepresented the ownership of the car to Abdoulie Janneh, a family friend who was a representative of the United Nations Development Program in Ghana, to get him to sign the necessary waiver request.

Adam L. Rosman, a partner of Mr. Taylor, the lawyer, said in an e-mail message on Tuesday that the automobile had been damaged beyond repair as a result of an accident in November 2005.

He also said that although Kojo Annan was willing to compensate Ghana, he did not intend to pay back the discount that Mercedes gave him for the faked ownership claim.

Blair Is More Popular In USA Than In UK (USAT)

By César G. Soriano

USA Today, January 25, 2006

LONDON — At home, British Prime Minister Tony Blair is frequently caricatured as a poodle following President Bush's lead. His ratings are in the loo (toilet). Not so in the USA, where a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll shows 67% of Americans view Blair favorably.

Sixty-six percent say Blair would be a good secretary-general of the United Nations when he no longer is leading Great Britain. Last week, former president Bill Clinton recommended Blair for that job, now held by Kofi Annan.

Blair's spokesman Ian Gleeson would not comment on why Americans think highly of the prime minister. Nor would he speculate about what Blair will do after his term ends, tentatively in 2009.

The latest poll numbers coincide with a ringing endorsement of Blair from Bush on Monday at Kansas State University. Bush branded as unfair suggestions that Blair is a yes man for Bush's policies, particularly the Iraq war.

In Britain, Blair's approval rating has averaged 34% since January 2003, according to Market & Opinion Research International (MORI), Britain's largest independent polling organization.

A number of factors, including the unpopular war in Iraq, have led to Blair's eroding popularity here. In November, his anti-terrorism bill, which included a plan to jail terror suspects for 90 days without charges, was rejected by Parliament, including by members of his own Labor Party. Scandals haven't helped, including this month's revelation that the Education Department allowed sex offenders to work in schools.

"I don't think it's unusual for the British to have lower opinions of their leaders than the rest of the world," says Andrew Russell, a political analyst at the University of Manchester. He says former prime minister Margaret Thatcher was "hated" by many Britons while she was revered in the USA.

Blair's "foreign policy has been pro-American, so naturally Americans would approve of that," says Roger Mortimore, political analyst at the MORI polling group. He says Blair also has charisma. "Blair has come across as a reliable ally and a decisive and successful leader. He does successfully come across as an honest and likable guy, and that improves his ratings" in the USA.

Most Britons feel the prime minister "is more presentation than politics," Russell says. Blair's gifts as an orator in the international arena have helped him in this area. "Blair is at his best when he's … involved in international summits and representing Britain on the big stage," which would prove useful at the United Nations, Russell says.

Steve Bettison, general manager of the Adam Smith Institute, a libertarian think tank that often is critical of Blair's domestic policies, attributes Blair's popularity in the USA to his unwavering support since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. "If the American media reported what he did over here, then maybe they'd view him differently," Bettison says.

As for the U.N. job, Bettison says, "He's very good on the world stage." However, Bettison says the job probably would go to an emissary from the Third World.

Please, Sir, May We Have An Ambassador? (CSM)

By Janaki Kremmer, Correspondent Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, January 25, 2006

SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA - More than a year after the former US ambassador said his goodbyes to Australia, the top diplomatic post remains vacant in Canberra, reflecting a casualness that has the typically laid-back Aussies getting a little anxious.

Sure, even good mates don't always keep in touch - to a point.

And with trouble in the Middle East, spy scandals at home, and plans to move hundreds of diplomats to hot spots around the world, filling an ambassadorial post in the South Pacific may not be high on the White House's priority list.

A relaxed attitude by both governments - which are in agreement on almost all matters of foreign policy - has allowed months to pass before doubts finally began to be raised here that perhaps the Americans were being a tad callous toward their close ally.

"The US definitely takes us for granted - and they know that it's not a difficult relationship to manage and that we don't need any sort of mollycoddling or day-to-day attention," says Elizabeth Thurbon, professor of politics and international relations at the University of New South Wales in Sydney.

No reason has been given for the delay in dispatching an ambassador to Canberra's vast US Embassy grounds. Foreign Minister Alexander Downer has stated that he would like the position to be filled as quickly as possible.

After Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice canceled two trips to this country in as many months for more pressing matters overseas, an editorial in The Australian asked, "Is it something we've done?"

Among America's closest allies in the war on terror, only the United Kingdom has suffered for so long recently without the attentions of an American ambassador. But even in London's case, the post was filled within 12 months.

US watchers here say that the person appointed must be someone loyal to President Bush, and preferably a major donor to the Republican Party. In addition, he or she has to be able to operate easily at high levels between the countries' two leaders. They also point out that sun-drenched Australia could hardly be considered a hardship posting.

The job of any ambassador, besides dealing with political and economic differences, is to enhance the image of his or her country overseas.

"But when we've signed the Free Trade Agreement, agreed to send troops to Iraq and Afghanistan, there are no real grievances between the US and Australia," says James Jupp, professor of political science at the Australian National University. "And as far as spreading the American image abroad, nothing does it better than TV."

The US could not have a bigger supporter in Australia than Prime Minister John Howard - a sort of de facto US ambassador, some say, who in case of a crisis can just pick up the phone and call the White House. The leader of the opposition here is also strongly pro-American.

"If you look at the recent Free Trade Agreement, you see that we were compliant on most issues, and when Australian negotiators were ready to walk away from the agreement at one point because they said it was unfair to the sugar farmers, the Australian prime minister basically told them to go back and sign on the dotted line," says Ms. Thurbon, adding that it made a mockery of the negotiating process.

When an ambassador is finally picked, it could take Congress several months to clear the nominee, meaning that it may be nearly two years before the post is filled.

China's Hu Will Visit U.S. In April To Talk Trade (WSJ)

By Jason Dean

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

BEIJING -- Chinese President Hu Jintao will visit the U.S. in April as the two nations try to hash out persistent disagreements over trade and other issues.

U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick disclosed the timing of the planned trip while in Beijing yesterday. Mr. Hu had been scheduled to visit Washington while in the U.S. last September, but the White House visit was postponed because of Hurricane Katrina.

Mr. Zoellick didn't provide further details of the coming trip. Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Kong Quan said it "will be a big event for the two countries and will be very significant for furthering a constructive, cooperative Sino-U.S. relationship in the new century."

Talking to reporters, Mr. Zoellick struck a broadly positive tone in his comments about China, underscoring a relative improvement in relations in recent months despite a host of nagging disputes over trade and other issues.

Mr. Zoellick said he raised those sticking points during meetings yesterday with senior Chinese officials, including Premier Wen Jiabao. The U.S. official said he reiterated comments by President Bush on Monday urging China to show further flexibility in the exchange rate of the yuan. That issue is certain to come up during Mr. Hu's April visit.

China allowed the yuan to appreciate 2.1% against the dollar in the summer, but critics in the U.S. argue that the currency still is undervalued. They say that makes Chinese exports unfairly cheap, further aggravating the U.S.'s huge trade deficit with China, which Washington estimates topped $200 billion in 2005. China, which calculates its trade figures differently, has said that its trade surplus with the U.S. is likely to have exceeded $110 billion last year.

"I tried to explain the domestic context in the U.S., where you have a very large bilateral deficit with China," and "the importance for those of us who want to stress open markets ... in the U.S., to make sure that there are fair and open opportunities in China as well," Mr. Zoellick said.

In meeting with Mr. Zoellick, Mr. Wen said China hopes to improve bilateral strategic discussions and "further improve mutual understanding and mutual trust, so that we can put the China-U.S. relationship on a track of steady and sound growth."

Mr. Zoellick emphasized areas of potential cooperation with China, even on subjects that have sometimes been sources of disagreement, such as Beijing's expanding pursuit of overseas energy deals.

He said he was "pleased to see" a visit this week to China by Saudi Arabia's leader, King Abdullah, during which the two countries signed a bilateral deal calling for greater cooperation and investment in oil, natural gas and minerals. "It's natural that China is going to encourage energy investment around the world," Mr. Zoellick said.

He also stressed what he said are a "common set of interests and concerns" between Beijing and Washington over the issue of Iran's nuclear program. The U.S. is trying to bring Iran before the United Nations Security Council, but faces possible resistance to any serious action there by Russia and China, both of which wield veto power in the body. Mr. Zoellick said he didn't discuss the possibility of a veto with Chinese officials yesterday.

Even on China's ties with Sudan -- a relationship that has been criticized because of the Sudanese government's alleged human-rights abuses -- Mr. Zoellick stressed that Beijing could play a positive role. "I believe that as China develops its relationship with Sudan, it also gives it an opportunity to help us deal with some of the problems" there, he said.

Mr. Zoellick, who also stopped in Tokyo during his current tour, is scheduled to spend today in the city of Chengdu in China's relatively impoverished hinterland. He said he hopes his visit to the city will give him a deeper sense of the domestic economic challenges facing China. He then travels to Davos, Switzerland, for the World Economic Forum.

China's Economy Grows 9.9% In 2005 (FT)

By Sun Yu In Beijing

Financial Times, January 25, 2006

China's economy grew a powerful 9.9 per cent in the fourth quarter of last year, fueled by strong domestic investment and export growth.

The National Bureau of Statistics said on Wednesday China's gross domestic product was Rmb18,232bn (US$2,251bn) for all of 2005, also up 9.9 per cent - a growth rate slightly slower than the 10.1 per cent recorded for 2004. Per capita GDP reached US$1,700.

Li Deshui, head of the statistics bureau, warned of overheating in sectors such as aluminum and automobile manufacturing, despite a series of a government efforts over the last two years aimed at cooling investor enthusiasm.

Fixed asset investment remained high in 2005, climbing 25.7 per cent in the whole of 2005, only 0.9 percentage points slower than the year before. Industrial production rose 11.4 per cent last year.

"A conspicuous problem in China currently is that capacity in some sectors is expanding too fast and over-supply problems are relatively serious," Mr Li said. "This issue deserves close attention."

Over-capacity was one of a number of deflationary influences acting on the economy, he said.

However, Mr Li warned that inflationary pressures were also present, citing possible price deregulation for public services and energy as a potential catalysts for broader price increases.

Consumer price inflation was a moderate 1.8 per cent in 2005, down from 3.9 per cent in 2004.

Growth in foreign direct investment in China slowed to 0.5 per cent, reaching US$60.3bn last year, the first such decline in the last few years.

But Mr. Li said FDI remained "stable" and the decline was not a matter for concern, adding that in 2004 some foreign investors had rushed into China's property market - a target of state efforts to cool the economy.

"Foreign businesses came into the real estate market and some engaged in malicious speculation. Less of this is not a problem - it's good for us," he said.

Retail sales rose 12 per cent last year, including a 17.7 per cent registered by restaurants. Consumption's role in the economy grew, accounting for 33.3 per cent in the GDP of 2005.

However, the income gap between urban and rural areas continued to widen, as growth of disposable income last year of rural residents declined 0.6 percentage points compared with 2004, while growth in urban residents' incomes rose 1.9 percentage points.

China's net oil imports declined 5.3 per cent in 2005, amid government efforts to reduce the economy's dependence on energy inputs.

China's GDP Jumps 9.9% (WSJ)

By Andrew Browne

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

HONG KONG -- China's economy surged 9.9% last year from a year earlier as exports boomed, although some economists believe even that figure underestimates the powerful momentum behind what may now be the world's fourth largest economy.

The figure came in slightly below revised 10.1% growth for 2004 and 10% for 2003. It matches growth of 9.9% in the fourth quarter of 2005, according to numbers released Wednesday by the National Bureau of Statistics.

The numbers indicate that not only has China escaped a "hard landing" that some feared as Beijing cooled overheated investment in sectors like real estate and steel starting in 2004, but it has maintained rapid growth for the third straight year with low inflation, currently running at around 1%.

Economists are also encouraged by what appears to more balanced growth, somewhat less reliant on high levels of fixed asset investment that threaten industrial overcapacity and falling corporate profits. Domestic consumption is strong, although one of the biggest challenges for Chinese authorities this year will be to unleash more of the country's vast savings pool. The success of Beijing's efforts to encourage Chinese to spend more, thus putting the economy on a more self-sustaining track, could have an extra importance for the global economy if U.S. consumption falters this year.

Although the Chinese economy relied heavily on exports for growth last year (its trade surplus more than tripled to $102 billion), many economists believe the surplus will moderate this year as domestic demand picks up and China offloads less of its production of steel, chemicals and heavy machinery on the rest of the world. Already, there are signs that the real estate market is recovering, particularly in poorer inland cities where Beijing is targeting higher growth and investment.

Yet doubts persist about the accuracy of China's GDP data, even though authorities announced this month they had found an additional $278 billion in the 2004 economy -- almost the size of the entire Indonesian economy -- after revising higher nominal GDP for that year by 16.8%. That revision was based on a census that showed China's statistics had underestimated the size of the services sector -- everything from restaurants to moving companies and beauty parlors. After the revision, China's 2004 growth was revised to 10.1% from 9.5%.

More importantly, because the overall economy was bigger, it meant that fixed investment as a proportion of GDP came down from an alarming 45% or so to a still strong, but more reasonable, 38%. The better ratio gives comfort to foreign investors worried that out-of-control investment could lead to a crash.

At the same time, the revision vaulted China over Italy and France in economic global league tables, and most likely over Britain, too, which has yet to announce its 2005 GDP data, according to Rob Subbaraman, chief Asia economist for Lehman Brothers.

The strong data mean there is unlikely to be any easing of pressure on China to let the yuan appreciate.

The yuan didn't move after the data were issued. The dollar was last quoted at 8.0621 yuan from yesterday's close of 8.0614 yuan. Beijing announced a 2.1% appreciation of the yuan against the dollar last year, but since then it has added only another 0.5% or so. Growth last quarter was up slightly from a revised 9.8% rise in GDP in the third quarter from a year earlier and beat economists' forecasts, which had centered on a rise of 9.5%.

The statistics agency said that fixed-asset investment growth slowed slightly to 24.2% in December from a year earlier. It grew 29% in November.

The country's top statistician, Li Deshui, said conditions exist for both inflation and deflation, but his remarks at a briefing were focused more on the possibility of deflation.

"It is not correct to say China is now facing deflation," he said. But, in general, "overcapacity is dangerous. Enterprises will suffer and go bankrupt."

Still, ING's chief economist in Asia, Tim Condon, said the small drop in fixed-asset investment growth "is a welcome development," and deflation is unlikely given that strong global growth will prop up demand in China.

China said that the consumer price index rose 1.6% in December from a year earlier, slightly faster than market expectations, which had centered on a 1.5% gain. The producer price index increased by 3.2% in December and retail sales rose 12.5% last month from a year earlier. Industrial output grew 16.5% from a year earlier in December, slightly below expectations for a 16.6% gain.

China Shuts Down Influential Weekly Newspaper In Crackdown On Media (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

BEIJING, Jan. 24 - China's Propaganda Department on Tuesday ordered the closing of Bing Dian, an influential weekly newspaper that often tackled touchy political and social subjects, as the authorities stepped up efforts to curb the spread of information and views the Communist Party considers unfavorable.

The shutdown came the same day that Google announced that it would begin steering its Chinese users to www.google.cn, which will restrict access to content that China's media monitors consider problematic.

President Hu Jintao has been tightening controls on expression as his leadership grapples with mounting internal challenges, including social unrest over corruption, pollution, unpaid wages and land seizures.

DOJ_NMG_0011646

Though the Chinese news media have never been permitted to criticize top leaders, television, newspapers and Web-based news sites, now mostly commercially driven, have often competed to break explosive news stories and discuss sensitive topics.

But authorities under Mr. Hu have slowly but systematically purged editors who defy propaganda controls and have closed or reorganized publications that they believe have become too bold, making the news media more timid today than they were regarded as being in recent years.

Bing Dian, or Freezing Point, published as a supplement to the influential newspaper China Youth Daily, was one of the few major news outlets that routinely printed in-depth investigative stories and broached delicate topics.

The order to cease publication is effective immediately, the paper's longtime editor, Li Datong, said in a telephone interview.

"This is an intolerable step that has absolutely no basis in law and is in fact completely illegal," he said. It cannot be appealed, he said.

The authorities cited the publication of a lengthy study of Chinese middle-school textbooks as a reason for the order, Mr. Li said. The Jan. 11 article discussed what the author, Yuan Weishi, a Zhongshan University professor, referred to as official distortions of history to emphasize the humiliations China suffered at the hands of imperial powers.

He criticized the textbooks' treatment of events like the Boxer Rebellion and the burning of the Summer Palace by British and French troops in 1860, which he said were partly the result of mistakes by then-flailing Qing Dynasty leaders.

"We are at a critical moment in our modernization and the key to the success of our development is understanding our system and mental model," he wrote. "I was shocked to see that few things had changed since the Cultural Revolution."

Mr. Li said the article, though provocative, was just an excuse for closing the paper. In August, a letter by Mr. Li led to a revolt at the China Youth Daily group after the paper's new party-appointed editor, Li Erliang, sought to impose a review system that graded the staff on factors including the reaction their work elicited from party leaders.

The letter, which was posted on the Web, and the backlash resulted in the modification of the review system.

Leading Publication Shut Down In China (WP)

By Philip P. Pan

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

BEIJING, Jan. 24 -- China's ruling Communist Party on Tuesday suspended one of the premier publications in Chinese journalism, escalating a campaign to rein in the state media, part of the government's toughest crackdown on freedom of expression here in more than a decade.

The decision to shut down Freezing Point, a four-page weekly feature section of the state-run China Youth Daily that often tested the censors and challenged the party line, came less than a month after the authorities replaced the top editors of another daring newspaper, the Beijing News.

The China Youth Daily is the official newspaper of the Communist Youth League, a power base for President Hu Jintao. Because any move to punish it would almost certainly require his approval, the decision to close Freezing Point was seen as further evidence of Hu's personal support for a tightening of controls on the media that began two years ago, about a year after Hu took office.

Party officials summoned the senior editors of the China Youth Daily and ordered Freezing Point closed a day after distributing a five-page document that accused the section of "viciously attacking the socialist system" and condemned a recent article in it that criticized the history textbooks used in Chinese middle schools.

Propaganda authorities issued an order barring all media from reporting the suspension, all reporters from participating in any news conference about it and all Web sites from carrying any discussion about it, journalists said.

The chief editor of Freezing Point, Li Datong, confirmed the suspension in a message on his blog before censors deleted the page. "My colleagues and I just finished the full-page proof of tomorrow's Freezing Point, but it looks like it can't come out," he wrote. "Freezing Point tenaciously survived for 11 years, and it has finally died."

Reached by telephone, Li said that it was inconvenient to discuss what happened in detail but that he planned to write an essay to fight the decision. He said propaganda officials issued a notice criticizing him and the newspaper's editor in chief by name and ordering the section closed until it is "rectified and fully recognizes and corrects its mistakes."

Li, a party member and veteran journalist, stunned the propaganda authorities last summer with a lengthy letter attacking a plan to award bonuses to reporters at the newspaper who had won praise from government officials while deducting pay from reporters whose articles were criticized by officials. After the letter was leaked, the newspaper scrapped the bonus plan.

Though some publications ordered to undergo "rectification" by the party resume operations within weeks, others never publish again. Li said he planned to meet with his colleagues before deciding how to proceed, but he indicated that he did not believe Freezing Point had erred in publishing the article about the history textbooks.

The piece, written by Yuan Weishi, a reform-minded scholar at Zhongshan University in the southern Chinese city of Guangzhou, criticized Chinese textbooks for teaching an incomplete history of China's last imperial dynasty, the Qing, that fosters blind nationalism and closed-minded anti-foreign sentiment.

For example, he challenged the textbooks for portraying the 1900 Boxer Rebellion as a "magnificent feat of patriotism" without describing the violence committed by the rebels or their extreme anti-foreign views. He also criticized the books for blaming the Opium Wars of the mid-1800s entirely on foreign nations, without mentioning the Qing government's record of violating treaties by refusing foreign merchants access to Chinese cities.

The piece was the latest in a long series of articles in Freezing Point that carefully pushed the limits of permissible journalism in China. In November, the section published an essay describing the "White Terror" of authoritarian rule in Taiwan during the 1950s and democratic Taiwan's efforts to cope with that history of political repression. The contrast with events in mainland China was obvious but unstated.

Researcher Jin Ling contributed to this report.

Japan's Economy Extends Growth On Back Of Factory-output Gains (WSJ)

By Stanley White

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

TOKYO -- Japanese economic activity continued to pick up in November, fueled by strong industrial production, the government said.

The data suggest Japan's economic recovery remains on solid footing. Growth in services was moderate, but economists say they remain optimistic given signs of improvement in other areas.

"Production has accelerated even after the index surpassed its post-economic bubble peak in October," said Goldman Sachs economist Daisuke Yamazaki. "With exports now expanding, we can say Japan's post-bubble era is truly over and we'll probably see very positive gross domestic product in the October-December quarter."

The Ministry of Economy, Trade and Industry's all-industries index stood at 105.2 in November, up 0.3% from the previous month. The increase marked the highest level for the index since the ministry began compiling data with a base year of 2000. Economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires had forecast the all-industries index would rise 0.4% from the previous month. In October the index rose 0.9%.

Strength in industrial output contributed to the rise in the all-industries index, according to the ministry. In November, industrial output rose an upwardly revised 1.5% from a month earlier.

US Anti-war Protester Cindy Sheehan Hails Venezuela's Chavez (AFP-Y2)

AFP, January 25, 2006

Anti-war protester Cindy Sheehan, mother of a US soldier killed in Iraq, joined more than 10,000 anti-globalization activists in Caracas, where she hailed Venezuela's leftist President Hugo Chavez.

"I admire him for his resolve against my government and its meddling," said Sheehan, who gained notoriety when she camped outside US President George W. Bush's ranch last year to protest the Iraq war. She said she hoped to meet Chavez later in the week.

Sheehan was among more than 10,000 people from across the Americas who took to the streets of the Venezuelan capital Tuesday in an anti-war protest that launched the six-day Caracas World Social Forum (WSF).

My government should not meddle anywhere, the "peace mom" told AFP during the march, which was marked by anti-Bush slogans.

We must stop the Iraq war, we must not let it happen again, said Sheehan, who has been arrested at least twice while demonstrating outside the White House.

Tuesday's march ended outside the armed forces headquarters, on an avenue usually reserved for military parades. "It's a peace route now," Sheehan said.

Sheehan, whose son Casey was killed in Iraq on April 4, 2004, said she would remain in Caracas until the WSF concludes on Sunday, and would address participants on several occasions.

She said Venezuela's foreign ministry sponsored her visit.

Canadians Give Conservatives Tenuous Victory (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0011648

By Christopher J. Chipello

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

MONTREAL -- Canadians ended 12 years of Liberal Party rule but put the new Conservative government on a short leash by leaving the victors well short of a parliamentary majority.

Preliminary results of Monday's balloting showed the Conservatives, led by Stephen Harper, winning 124 seats and 36% of the popular vote, compared with 103 seats and 30% of the popular vote for the Liberals.

Mr. Harper, a 46-year-old economist from the Western province of Alberta, said he will work with the three opposition parties to make the fragmented Parliament function. Meanwhile, Prime Minister Paul Martin said he will step down as leader of the Liberals, who were hurt by a series of scandals.

Analysts said Mr. Harper will have to steer a careful centrist course, as the Conservatives will need help from other parties to pass legislation and remain in office. Minority governments in Canada typically cooperate with opposition parties on an issue-by-issue basis, rather than through formal coalitions. Such governments have lasted around 18 months on average.

The Conservatives expanded on their Western Canadian electoral base, but they fell short of the 155 seats required to command a majority in the 308-seat House of Commons, the elected part of Ottawa's Parliament.

Preliminary results showed the separatist Bloc Québécois winning 51 of Quebec's 75 seats, down from 54 in the previous election in 2005. The Conservatives picked up 10 seats in the mainly French-speaking province. The left-of-center New Democratic Party won 29 seats nationally, leaving it just short of the number needed to sway the balance in parliamentary votes.

The Conservatives' tenuous grip on power will give them little leeway to pursue foreign-policy initiatives. Still, the change in Ottawa is likely to result in warmer relations with the Bush administration.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said yesterday that "we have had a strong and broad relationship with Canada, and we look forward to working with the new government to strengthen our relations even more."

Mr. Harper has vowed to cut taxes and keep Ottawa's budget in the black. But he also pledged to boost spending on Canada's armed forces -- something Washington has long advocated.

Financial-market reaction to the results was muted, possibly reflecting disappointment with the weak mandate handed to the Conservatives. The Toronto Stock Exchange's S&P/TSX Composite Index slipped 41.02 points to 11,692.35. The Canadian dollar, which had strengthened to 87 U.S. cents before the vote, eased to 86.8 cents yesterday following an apparent hint by the Bank of Canada that its interest-rate increases may be nearing an end.

Conservative Winner's Agenda Faces Tough Haul (WT)

By Levon Sevunts

The Washington Times, January 25, 2006

MONTREAL -- Canada's Conservative Party leader, still elated from his election victory Monday, flew yesterday to the capital, Ottawa, where he must begin figuring out how to push his political agenda through a reluctant Parliament.

With just 124 seats in the 308-seat House of Commons, the presumptive prime minister, Stephen Harper, will have to find allies on an issue-by-issue basis from among three left-of-center parties.

Mr. Harper, a 48-year-old economist from Calgary, gave little indication of his plans yesterday, postponing a scheduled press conference until tomorrow and offering only a short greeting to supporters at the Ottawa airport.

"We had a good sleep, we're all excited and we're all feeling pretty upbeat, as you can imagine ... to start rebuilding this great country of ours," he said with his wife and two children at his side.

Mr. Harper, whose election ended 12 years of Liberal Party rule, campaigned o promises to clean up the government after a searing corruption scandal, cut taxes and increase defense spending.

He also promised to improve relations with the United States after a period of tension over Canada's refusal to join the war in Iraq and a continental missile defense program, as well as trade disputes over softwood lumber and mad cow disease.

But he will have a much tougher time passing his agenda than his predecessor, outgoing Prime Minister Paul Martin, whose Liberal Party had a minority in Parliament since 2004.

Mr. Martin was able to turn for support to the Conservatives, the far-left New Democratic Party or the separatist Bloc Quebecois depending on the issue; Mr. Harper will be alone on the right wing of Canadian politics.

Analysts said he may find support for his plans to clean up government, cut the federal sales tax or allow the French-speaking province of Quebec to have its own seat at the United Nations' cultural agency. But his conservative social policies will be much tougher to push through.

Still, with Liberals facing a leadership race after Mr. Martin said he will step down, and the Bloc Quebecois smarting from a surprise loss of seats, Mr. Harper can count on a few months of relative stability.

During his acceptance speech Monday night, Mr. Harper sounded a conciliatory tone.

DOJ_NMG_0011649

"Tonight, although Canadians have voted for change, they have not given any one party in the House of Commons a majority," he said. "They have asked us to cooperate, to work together and to get on with tackling the real concerns of ordinary working people and their families."

Mr. Harper also pledged to follow the economic course set by Mr. Martin, who eliminated chronic budget deficits as finance minister in mid-1990s before taking over as prime minister in 2003.

"To those around the world who have watched this campaign our message is the same: The result tonight signals a change of government, not a change of country," he said.

Canada's Shift: To The Right, Gently (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

TORONTO, Jan. 24 - Has Canada turned upside down in electing Stephen Harper as the next prime minister? Are conservative winds suddenly blowing through cities where gays and lesbians legally marry and the government pays everyone's health bills?

The next leader of Canada expresses skepticism about the Kyoto climate change protocol, opposes same-sex marriage and wants to make the Canadian military muscular again. He openly supported the American-led invasion of Iraq. All are positions that put Mr. Harper, 46, well to the right on the Canadian political spectrum.

By electing this free-market economist from Alberta, a conservative oil-producing province frequently likened to Texas, it may seem that the Canadian people were trying to debunk the prevailing political wisdom of recent years that their progressive-minded nation was drawing further and further away from the United States.

But many analysts and political observers here caution that it is too soon to draw too stark a conclusion from the election on Monday, in which Mr. Harper's party won a mere 36.3 percent of the popular vote. The shift in Canadian politics is likely to be far from seismic.

Mr. Harper ran a tightly orchestrated campaign focused pragmatically on the pocketbook, shirking ideology and hot-button social issues. He promised allowances to families with young children to help them pay for child care. He pledged modest cuts to the unpopular national sales tax and promised tax breaks for people using public transit. He did not make bold proposals for reforming the national health insurance system, and he made it clear that despite his support for the war in Iraq, he would not send troops there.

The election outcome, in fact, can be read as more of a rejection of Prime Minister Paul Martin's scandal-racked Liberal Party than an embrace of Mr. Harper's own modest agenda.

"It's a very slim mandate, and the party that is holding power is holding it by a thread," said Pierre Martin, a political scientist at the University of Montreal. "If you have a party system divided into four, one party can take power with a proportion of the vote in the 30's percent range. That doesn't mean the country is moving right."

Indeed, when the victorious Mr. Harper stepped to the platform early Tuesday morning before his adoring campaign supporters, he was careful not to suggest that he planned anything more than careful change.

Implicitly acknowledging that his backing was less than overwhelming, he noted that voters had "asked us to cooperate, to work together and to get on with tackling the real issues that matter to ordinary working people and their families."

Arriving in Ottawa in the afternoon, he made the briefest, and vaguest, of statements at the airport. "I know a lot of you are going to be with us now in the next few months and years ahead," he said, "as we start rebuilding this great country of ours."

Mr. Harper's modest words in part reflect a man who is shy to the point of being aloof, someone who has always been careful not to show all of his cards. He is known to have a fiery temper, and he barely disguises his distrust for reporters. His sense of humor on the campaign trail was most revealing in its self-deprecating jokes about his lack of charisma.

But the statements on Tuesday were also intended to balance two goals that will probably not always fit comfortably together.

To enact legislation and even for his government to survive, Mr. Harper must build bridges to work with three left-leaning parties that together will hold the balance of power in the lower house of Parliament, where his Conservative Party won 124 seats of 308 on Monday.

At the same time, he must offer hope to his western base that its patience during years in the political wilderness will eventually take it to a more conservative promised land.

"The westerners will have to understand they will have to make compromises and move to the center," said Michel C. Auger, a political columnist at Le Journal de Montréal. "But Harper can use the time to build a stronger power base in the Maritimes, Quebec and Ontario so next time he can build a majority government and put forward their agenda."

DOJ_NMG_0011650

His own background already straddles that geographic and political divide. Born and raised in Toronto, he moved to Alberta to work in the oil and gas industry in his early 20's and began his conservative tilt as he studied economics at the University of Calgary. He met his wife, Laureen, at a Reform Party convention in 1991.

In the 1990's he directed the National Citizens Coalition, a conservative advocacy group that favored free-market economics, privatizations and tax cuts, an agenda that does not necessarily resonate with most Canadians even today.

The one area where Mr. Harper may be able to make a difference is foreign affairs, even though he admits to having little expertise there. He will surely improve the tone of relations with the Bush administration, which has been downright acrimonious since the Iraq invasion, which Ottawa opposed.

Mr. Harper could serve as a bridge between the United States and countries that have signed and ratified the Kyoto protocol to find ways to cooperate on controlling climate change. He could reopen the debate on whether Canada should join the Bush administration's missile defense system, which Mr. Martin rejected with little diplomatic finesse. But even those modest goals may not be easy.

"It's a delicate balancing act," said James Blanchard, a former United States ambassador to Ottawa. "I am sure that Stephen Harper wants good relations with President Bush and the United States, but any Canadian prime minister has to keep a noticeable independence from the United States, or he loses credibility in Canada."

Canada's Harper Seen As Shrewd, Serious, Bland (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

TORONTO, Jan. 24 -- On March 20, 2003, as the United States launched its invasion of Iraq, Stephen Harper rose in the Canadian House of Commons and bitterly condemned his country's refusal to join the fight.

The government "has betrayed Canada's history and values," he thundered. "The government has for the first time in our history left us outside our British and American allies in their time of need."

It was a vintage performance for the Conservative leader: self-assured, serious, claiming the moral high ground, and caustically critical of the liberals then in power. Now Harper, 46, has reached the pinnacle of a political career. Following his party's victory over the ruling Liberal Party in parliamentary elections Monday, he will become the 22nd prime minister when Parliament reconvenes in the coming weeks.

On Tuesday, Canadians awoke uncertain whether Harper's customary role would change, and whether his history of opposition was well-suited for building the alliances he needs to support the new minority government.

Those who know Harper insist he will not change.

"I expect him to be straightforward," said Diane Ablonczy, a Conservative lawmaker who has known Harper for 19 years and is likely to join his cabinet. "We won't get a dizzying round of rhetoric. He will say what he means and mean what he says."

Despite Harper's years in public life and a long record of speeches, however, many Canadians feel they do not know him well. The political strategist has never been a warm, approachable public figure. He had to overcome a reputation for stiffness that left him at a disadvantage compared with his garrulous opponent, Prime Minister Paul Martin.

"He's not an extrovert. Clearly," said a longtime friend, geologist John Weissenberger, in an interview Tuesday. "He approaches his work in a very serious, professional way. I think he viewed some of the showmanship of politics as being beside the point."

In personality, though not politics, Harper is similar to America's 2000 Democratic presidential nominee, Al Gore. Both are smart, studious policy mavens who come across in public as somewhat wooden. Like Gore, Harper incorporated self-deprecating jokes about his blandness into his standard campaign speech.

"One lesson I have learned in politics is that dull works," he would say, usually the only laugh line in an otherwise policy-filled speech.

Policy and conservatism have been Harper's obsession. When he and Weissenberger were graduate students at the University of Calgary, they debated free-market theory and plotted political strategy over Chinese food at the mall outside campus.

"It sounds kind of incredible to have two guys in their twenties sitting down to say how should we change the way the government works," Weissenberger said. "But that's what we did. We were both kind of political junkies and policy junkies."

Harper's father was an accountant in Toronto, where Harper was born and raised in a white, middle-class neighborhood. Completing the Canadian portrait, Stephen and his two younger brothers were absorbed in ice hockey, and Harper still is a master of hockey trivia.

DOJ_NMG_0011651

Childhood friends remember him as polite, studious and quiet. After high school, Harper set out to work in western Canada. He soon enrolled in the University of Calgary, where his political interests blossomed and he began a march through the conservative political ranks, according to the biography "Stephen Harper and the Future of Canada," by William Johnson.

On campus, he became immersed in the Canadian equivalent of the U.S. Young Republicans. Harper and Weissenberger were avid fans of intellectual conservative William F. Buckley's weekly television debate show, "Firing Line."

The students traded political tomes, debated political theory and hungrily followed the growing popularity of Margaret Thatcher in Britain and Ronald Reagan in the United States, according to Johnson. They wondered why the strident conservatism those leaders represented had largely bypassed Canada.

"We called ourselves the 'Tiny Tories,' " said Goldy Hyder, another college mate, who went on to be chief of staff to a Progressive Conservative leader, Joe Clark.

"I would describe Stephen then pretty much as I would describe him now," Hyder said. "He is a very serious person. He obviously enjoys his policy and his public policy musing. He's reserved, fairly quiet. There is no question of his smarts. He was often in a room full of persons and he was the smartest of them all."

Harper ran unsuccessfully for Parliament in 1988 and won in 1993, but left four years later to take a job as head of the National Citizens Coalition, a conservative advocacy group. There, he forcefully argued that Ottawa and the eastern power structure treated western Canada unfairly. In 2001, he signed a letter urging the Alberta premier to "build firewalls around Alberta" against a "hostile federal government."

It became a controversial letter. And it was not the only position that later caused Harper trouble after he returned to Parliament in 2002 as leader of the opposition party. In their first matchup, in the 2004 national election, the shrewd Martin used Harper's support for the Iraq war and other pro-American statements to portray the Conservative as too closely aligned with right-wing U.S. Republicans.

"It's a very difficult balancing act," said James Blanchard, a former U.S. ambassador to Canada who is now a lawyer and consultant in Washington. Canadian prime ministers do not want to be seen as too close to Washington, he said.

Harper learned the lesson. He avoided foreign policy and politically explosive social policy issues in this campaign, focusing instead on government reform, tax cuts, health care, crime and transferring more power to provinces.

Even detractors give Harper credit for rescuing his party. He engineered the merger of feuding conservative wings into a single party in 2003, applied lessons from their defeat in 2004, and then commanded a tightly disciplined campaign with no major mistakes leading to this election.

His supporters point to that accomplishment as evidence that Harper is a keen political strategist, not just an ideologue.

"Those are marks of leadership," said the last Conservative premier, Brian Mulroney, in an election-night television interview from West Palm Beach, Fla. "Reaching out to unify the party, then to move the party to the center, then to devise a campaign strategy and finally to execute it flawlessly."

Harper's campaign staff declined a request for an interview before the election, citing the load of campaign obligations.

His first step after the election seemed as careful as his campaign. In his late-night victory speech in Calgary, he graciously thanked Martin for his service to the country. He also sought to soften his stern image by appearing with his two children, Rachel, 7, and Benjamin, 9.

His wife, Laureen Teskey, a graphic designer, remained a constant figure by his side in the campaign. Both disdain the media, according to reporters who covered the campaign, though they made an effort in this election run-up to be more civil to the press.

But those who know Harper credit Teskey with helping to soften his hard edges.

"He also has changed a lot. He became more well-rounded after he became married and had children," said Monte Solberg, a Parliament member from Alberta. "He has learned how to compromise. A lot of people have called him an ideologue, but I think he has put that to rest."

Canada Tilts, Cautiously, Rightward (NYT)

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

Canadian voters have done the un-Canadian thing by electing a hard-edged Conservative, Stephen Harper, as their new prime minister. In the past, they have typically chosen leaders from the soft center-left or, less often, from the soft center-right. Mr. Harper's victory puts an end to more than 12 years of economically successful but scandal-marred Liberal Party governments.

But with the Conservatives winning only a little more than 36 percent of the vote and obliged to govern in a coalition with more left-leaning partners, Mr. Harper will need to steer clear of radical policy changes, at least on domestic matters. His electoral platform pragmatically recognizes that by emphasizing cleaner government, lower taxes and increased child care subsidies for families with young children.

On foreign policy, where Canadian prime ministers have freer rein, Mr. Harper is likely to move quickly to cozy up to the Bush administration - Canada's relationship with the United States has been distinctly chilly since the start of the Iraq war. But even here Mr. Harper will need to tread carefully because neither the war nor President Bush are very popular in Canada, and the Conservatives will be angling for a chance to win an outright majority by calling a new election sometime in the next few years.

Mr. Harper's victory is nevertheless a historic breakthrough for his party, which was formed in 2003 by a merger of the old Progressive Conservatives, based in eastern Canada, and the American-style free-market social conservatives from the West. In contrast with the new party's initial unsuccessful run, in 2004, this election resulted in the party's doing well in every region of the country. That notably includes Quebec, long a stronghold of Liberals and separatists.

The Conservatives' success was helped by voters' exhaustion with the divided and squabbling Liberals, with the unending series of slush-fund and inside-dealing scandals that have swirled around their rule for the past few years, and with the distinctly lackluster campaign skills of the outgoing prime minister, Paul Martin, who managed to be uncharismatic even by Canada's undemanding standards.

But the victory belongs chiefly to Mr. Harper. We hope he puts it to good use.

Canadian Warm Front (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

It's January, so naturally much of Canada has fled to Florida, but enough voters were at home Monday to cast their ballots in an election that was as heated as Miami Beach on Canada Day (July 1).

The Conservative Party won a plurality in Parliament on a campaign of national renewal, and not only because party leader Stephen Harper has pledged to root out the corruption in Ottawa brought on by 13 consecutive years of Liberal Party rule. With the growth in labor productivity dropping sharply since 1998 and Canada's geopolitical importance trending in the same direction, Mr. Harper is promising to steer the country in a more prosperous direction, both at home and abroad.

His message resonated well beyond his small-government conservative base in the West and into traditionally Liberal strongholds in Ontario and in parts of Quebec, where the separatist Bloc Québécois party has ruled unchallenged. With just 124 seats in the next Parliament, the Conservatives only managed a minority government. But their success in some Eastern liberal bastions is a testament to a popular hunger to reclaim lost Canadian prestige. This is good news for the U.S., which has more than a passing interest in a strong and prosperous Canada.

While the Liberal Party was trying to paint Mr. Harper as a right-wing extremist (and blood brother to that cowboy in the White House), he was out on the stump vowing to shift power away from Ottawa back to the provinces and return part of the federal budget surplus to taxpayers in the form of tax cuts. His campaign estimated that a two-percentage-point cut in the 7% national goods-and-services tax could save Canadian families an average of $400 a year.

That undoubtedly got the attention of voters, who are feeling the pinch of Canada's declining labor productivity growth. As a tax study just out from the Vancouver-based Fraser Institute notes, in 2004 Canada's per-capita disposable income had fallen to 66.9% of that in the U.S. from 80.4% in 1985. The Harper campaign's proposal for a capital-gains tax exemption -- as long as the money is reinvested within six months -- is one small step toward rebuilding Canadian productivity by attracting capital and rewarding risk.

Mr. Harper also wants to end the Liberal retreat on national defense and reassert some Canadian influence in the world. While other NATO countries are running away from their defense responsibilities, leaving the world's superpower holding the bag, Mr. Harper said he wants Canada both to revive what had been an important international role and to ensure that it can defend its own Northern territory. He promises to spend more on the armed forces and revisit the issue of Canada's participation in a missile-defense shield for North America, which was rejected by Liberal Prime Minister Paul Martin.

Which brings us to Canada's most important bilateral relationship -- with the U.S. Mr. Harper took some political risk by campaigning for an end to the Liberal practice of bad-mouthing the neighbors and promising to renew this traditional friendship.

By far the biggest dispute between the two countries -- each of which is the other's largest trading partner -- concerns the anti-dumping duties on Canadian lumber entering the U.S. Four panels have ruled that the U.S. tariffs violate the North American Free Trade Agreement. The Bush Administration could welcome Mr. Harper's victory -- and turn a new page in U.S.-Canada relations -- by lifting the illegal duties.

Candidate Is Booed By Mexican Students (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

DOJ_NMG_0011653

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 24 (Reuters) - Thousands of Mexican students heckled a presidential candidate, Roberto Madrazo, at a rally on Tuesday, forcing him to cut short a speech and handing him a major embarrassment only days after campaigning began.

Mr. Madrazo, in third place in opinion polls, ended his speech after only two minutes and abandoned the rodeo ring where the rally was taking place in the central city of Pachuca, witnesses said.

He walked off after students whistled and shouted slogans in favor of Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the left-wing front-runner, and booed Mr. Madrazo, from the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI.

Mr. Madrazo is linked to the old guard of the PRI, which ruled Mexico for 71 years and earned a reputation for corruption and authoritarianism. "Long live the Peje!" students shouted, using Mr. López Obrador's nickname, after the pejelagarto fish typical of his home state of Tabasco.

Mr. López Obrador heads opinion polls for the July 2 elections by up to 10 points. Felipe Calderón, of the governing conservative National Action Party, is in second place in the polls.

Morales' Policies Could Jeopardize U.S. Foreign Aid (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 25, 2006

A showcase U.S. aid package for Bolivia worth nearly $600 million could be in jeopardy if new leftist President Evo Morales follows through on some of his campaign promises, a senior U.S. aid official announced this week.

"We will consider the situation in Bolivia very, very carefully," said John Danilovich, chairman of the quasi-independent Millennium Challenge Corp. (MCC), President Bush's signature new program to target U.S. foreign aid to countries with strong records of social, economic and political reforms.

"The evolution of policy in Bolivia under President Morales remains to be seen," Mr. Danilovich told a forum sponsored by the American Enterprise Institute on Monday.

Mr. Morales, a former coca grower and close ally of populist Venezuelan leader Hugo Chavez, has said his election would be a "nightmare" for the Bush administration.

He has vowed to boost state control of Bolivia's sizable oil and gas reserves and denounced the hard-line U.S. approach to curbing Bolivia's cocaine trade. Despite U.S. economic and military aid that has averaged $145 million annually since 1998, Mr. Morales has denounced what he called U.S.-style "neoliberalism" and his country's heavy dependence on foreign aid.

While moderating some of his anti-U.S. and anti-market rhetoric in his Sunday inaugural remarks, Mr. Morales named a Cabinet this week heavy with radical leftist figures, including a new energy minister who has been fiercely critical of foreign investors.

Bush administration officials have taken a wait-and-see approach to the new Bolivian leader, but the Millennium Challenge aid package may be a critical first test of bilateral relations.

Conceived by Mr. Bush as a way to use foreign aid to promote lasting pro-market and political reforms in low-income countries, the MCC uses 16 indicators ranging from corruption and civil rights to the percentage of girls completing primary education in evaluating which countries qualify for assistance.

Just six weeks before Mr. Morales' Dec. 18 election, the agency announced that Bolivia had qualified to apply for MCC funds. The $598 million Bolivian proposal -- for a major road-improvement program and new financial instruments to boost local exporters -- would be the largest single grant in the MCC's two-year history.

Mr. Danilovich, who took over the top job at the MCC in November, said the agency was prepared to suspend or kill grant programs if the recipient country fails to meet its goals or backslides on reforms, and had already done so with applications from Yemen and Armenia.

With Mr. Morales trying to balance the demands of his radical supporters, a parliament in which conservative forces are still strong, and foreign-aid and business groups, even some conservative analysts say the Bush administration should not be too quick to write off La Paz.

According to Heritage Foundation researcher Stephen Johnson, Mr. Morales "shows every sign of becoming a Castro puppet and plunging Bolivia into civil conflict. But no one should say the United States pushed him in that direction."

Castro Directs Anti-U.S. March In Havana (FWJD)

By Vanessa Arrington

The Fort Wayne Journal Gazette, January 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0011654

HAVANA - Fidel Castro directed a vast protest march past the U.S. mission here Tuesday, accusing the United States of preparing to free one of the hemisphere's worst terrorists as thousands of Cubans carried signs equating President Bush with Hitler.

The government-sponsored march coincides with a U.S. court deadline for evidence to be filed in the case of Luis Posada Carriles, a former CIA operative and anti-Castro militant held on immigration charges at a detention center in El Paso, Texas. His lawyers are seeking his freedom as U.S. immigration authorities seek his deportation.

The Cuban president called Posada a "repugnant character" as well as a terrorist as he spoke to a sea of cheering Cubans along the coastal Malecon highway.

Cuba and Venezuela accuse the Cuban-born Posada of masterminding the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner and staging bombings in Havana in 1997 and 1998. Together the attacks killed 74 people. Castro also has accused Posada and his colleagues of plotting to assassinate him at a summit in Panama in November 2000.

"We don't want revenge, we just want justice," said Lucia Roja, a retired educator. Although she is 67 and diabetic, Roja said, "It's important to be here - I've never missed a march."

State-run television estimated 1.4 million people at the march. Those who attend government-sponsored marches are given the day off from work.

Organized by school, work and military groups, marchers waved little red, white and blue Cuban flags and chanted "Bush: fascist! Condemn the terrorist!" The 79-year-old Cuban leader watched the nearly seven-hour event, then marched himself at the end.

Another focus of Castro's ire is a new electronic sign installed outside the U.S. Interests Section in Havana, which handles consular affairs in the absence of full diplomatic relations. The sign was activated as Castro began speaking Tuesday, relaying global news and quotes including Abraham Lincoln's: "No man is good enough to govern another man without that other's consent."

"They already turned on the little sign - the cockroaches are brave," Castro said before starting his speech.

The mission launched the sign a week ago with streaming text of sayings from Martin Luther King Jr. and excerpts from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, to which Cuba is a signatory.

"It's nonsense!" said Carla Smith, a 61-year-old lawyer among the marchers. "Within a few days, we'll have forgotten all about them."

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said he did not see why messages containing quotes about freedom "should be such a source of concern for the Cuban government."

Posada was arrested in Miami in May on charges he entered the United States illegally. His Miami lawyer, Eduardo Soto, filed documents with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials on Monday seeking his release from custody.

The ICE said today that while a judge had forbidden Posada's deportation to Venezuela or Cuba, for fear that he would be tortured there, the agency was still seeking to expel him to a third country.

Africans Pick Congo Republic Leader, Not Sudanese, For Union Post (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, January 25, 2006

KHARTOUM, Sudan, Jan. 24 - African leaders bypassed one of the continent's most controversial presidents as the choice to head the African Union on Tuesday and opted instead for a leader who has managed to reinvent himself, Denis Sassou Nguesso of the Congo Republic, a onetime coup leader now regarded as a stabilizing force in the region.

President Omar Hassan al-Bashir of Sudan had wanted the job as Africa's chief peacemaker and emissary, but his colleagues, who are holding a summit meeting in his capital, thought otherwise, troubled by the Sudanese government's involvement in the war in the western Darfur region of the country.

Mr. Bashir did not lose out completely, though, since his colleagues indicated that the job would be his in 2007. The offer came with the clear expectation that Mr. Bashir would work to end the Darfur crisis before then.

Mr. Sassou, who succeeds Olusegun Obasanjo of Nigeria as chairman of the 53-member bloc, is a smartly dressed former paratrooper who has long used his perch in the tiny Congo Republic, on the continent's Atlantic coast, to speak out on behalf of Africa. He is one of the longest-serving leaders in the African Union and previously filled the rotating chairmanship in the group's predecessor, the Organization of African States.

In some respects, Mr. Sassou is not so different from the man who failed to get the job. Both Mr. Sassou and Mr. Bashir took power in military coups, in 1979 and 1989, respectively. The two soldiers also preside over countries that have spent much of their postcolonial history torn by civil war.

But one major difference is that the Congo Republic has managed to quell its civil war, while Sudan has reached a peace deal in one big conflict, its 20-year-long north-south dispute, only to find itself enmeshed in another one, the crisis in Darfur.

Also, while Sudan is in the early stages of allowing political dissent, Mr. Sassou opened up his country to multiparty elections in 1992. They did not go as he planned, and he found himself voted out of office. But he resurfaced five years later, backed by Angolan troops, and grabbed back the presidency in a brief but bloody civil war.

He fared better in his second attempt at electoral politics, winning by a landslide in March 2002.

Human rights organizations praised African leaders for rebuffing Mr. Bashir's bid for the chairmanship and offered lukewarm praise for Mr. Sassou.

"Sassou's human rights record is nothing to celebrate, but there are not atrocities on the level of Sudan," said Reed Brody of Human Rights Watch.

Mr. Sassou's colleagues described him as serious, eloquent and committed to the betterment of Africa.

Jendayi Frazier, the American assistant secretary of state for African affairs, said Mr. Sassou was a leader the Bush administration could work with to help resolve the crisis in Darfur, indicating that the United States would continue to back the African Union's peacekeeping mission there.

Financing for that operation will dry up in March, and some African leaders have suggested that the United Nations should take over the peacekeeping duties. That will be only one of the issues Mr. Sassou will face.

"We shall do everything we can to ensure peace will come," he said. "It's a big challenge for us."

European Leaders Appear Far Apart On Energy Policy (WSJ)

By Juliane Von Reppert-bismarck And William Echikson

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Unsettled by high oil prices and Russia's recent rupture of gas contracts, European leaders pushed for the creation of a common continentwide energy policy, only to end up demonstrating their differences on such key areas as nuclear power.

At a finance ministers' meeting here, France presented a paper calling for increasing research and development into its favored source of "clean" energy -- nuclear power. French officials warned of an energy shortage if Europe continues to dismantle its present reactors and fails to build new ones. Italian Economy Minister Giulio Tremonti joined ranks, saying Europe has "no alternative" to nuclear power.

Energy will be a key topic at the next summit of leaders in March. At that time, the European Commission will unveil policy proposals.

But so far, divergences seem great. While a European Commission poll published yesterday showed 47% of European citizens favor a European energy policy, it illustrated little enthusiasm for an increase in nuclear power, with only 12% seeing it as the best solution to reduce Europe's dependency on current energy sources.

The idea of a common European Union energy chest has been bandied about since the beginning of the postwar pan-European project. The EU's precursor was designed to create a common coal and steel policy. But countries still have their own national oil stocks. They negotiate different rates with Russia on gas supplies. In 2003, studies reported that only about 8% of electricity flowed across national borders.

As the EU has expanded and its own domestic-energy sources such as German coal and Dutch gas have dwindled, however, the argument for a common policy is re-emerging.

Environmental groups are calling instead for Europe to focus on sustainable energy. They want renewable sources such as wind and biomass energy to make up a quarter of Europe's primary energy supply by 2020.

Darfur Descending (WP)

By Kofi A. Annan

The Washington Post, January 25, 2006

When I visited Darfur last May, I felt hopeful. Today I am pessimistic, unless a major new international effort is mustered in the coming weeks.

I visited a village whose people had returned after fleeing from violence and were living in relative safety, thanks to the presence of troops from the African Union (A.U.). True, this was only a beginning. Much of the vast region was prey to sporadic violence, with more than a million people living in camps. But thanks to a massive relief operation led by the United Nations, the number dying from hunger or disease was falling dramatically. A cease-fire, admittedly flawed, was in place. Peace talks between the Sudanese government and the rebel movements, ably mediated by A.U. representatives, were proceeding in Abuja, Nigeria. It was hoped that agreement could be reached by the end of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0011656

There were other positive signs. The U.N. Security Council had referred the situation to the International Criminal Court and had decided in principle to apply targeted sanctions to individuals who could be identified as responsible for the atrocities of the past two years.

I wish I could report that all these efforts had borne fruit -- that Darfur was at peace and on the road to recovery. Alas, the opposite is true. People in many parts of Darfur continue to be killed, raped and driven from their homes by the thousands. The number displaced has reached 2 million, while 3 million (half the total population of Darfur) are dependent on international relief for food and other basics. Many parts of Darfur are becoming too dangerous for relief workers to reach. The peace talks are far from reaching a conclusion. And fighting now threatens to spread into neighboring Chad, which has accused Sudan of arming rebels on its territory.

Despite a chronic funding crisis, A.U. troops in Darfur are doing a valiant job. People feel safer when the troops are present. But there are too few of them -- a protection force of only 5,000, with an additional 2,000 police and military observers, to cover a territory the size of Texas. They have neither the equipment nor the broad mandate they would need to protect the people under threat or to enforce a cease-fire routinely broken by the rebels, as well as by the Janjaweed militia and Sudanese government forces.

On Jan. 12, the African Union decided to renew the mission's mandate until March 31, while expressing support, in principle, for a transition to a U.N. operation this year. The timing of this transition is still being discussed, including at this week's A.U. summit in Khartoum. This puts the Security Council on the spot. The U.N. Charter gives the council primary responsibility for international peace and security. And in September, in a historic first, U.N. members unanimously accepted the responsibility to protect populations from genocide, ethnic cleansing, war crimes and crimes against humanity, pledging to take action through the Security Council when national authorities fail.

The transition from the A.U. force to a U.N. peace operation in Darfur is now inevitable. A firm decision by the Security Council is needed, and soon, for an effective transition to take place.

But let no one imagine that this crisis can be solved simply by giving the present A.U. mission a "U.N. hat." Any new mission will need a strong and clear mandate, allowing it to protect those under threat, by force if necessary, as well as the means to do so. That means it will need to be larger, more mobile and much better equipped than the current African Union mission. Those countries that have the required military assets must be ready to deploy them.

Such a force would take the United Nations months to deploy. In the meantime, the A.U. mission must be maintained and strengthened. We cannot afford any gaps or any weakening of the force in place. Last May the African Union and the United Nations organized a donor conference in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, to raise money and logistical support for the A.U. force. A follow-up conference is planned for Feb. 20. At the same time, the massive relief operation must continue, and be fully funded, so that Darfur's people continue to receive clean water, food and other vital supplies.

Finally, and above all, much stronger pressure must be brought on all parties -- the rebels as well as the government -- to observe the cease-fire and commit themselves to the Abuja peace talks with a sense of urgency. The current delays are inexcusable; they cost lives every day. Those negotiating must be reminded of their personal responsibility.

One thing is clear: Whatever external force is sent to Darfur can provide at best only temporary security to the people there. Only a political agreement among their leaders can secure their future and the return of 2 million of them to their homes.

A Deal To End All Barter (WSJ)

By Viktor Yushchenko

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

When Ukrainian voters elected me President last year, I promised that our future relations with Russia would be based on national interests alone. The time when our policy to Moscow would be dictated by the special interests of financial-industrial groups and oligarchs was over.

The dispute that recently erupted between Moscow and Kiev over Russian natural gas prices was a trying test of our political maturity. Corporate players threatened our sovereignty, economic independence and freedom.

We could have contributed to the rising tensions by pursuing court action to assert our contractual rights. Under the terms of an existing agreement signed in 2004 between our national gas companies, prices had been fixed until 2009.

However, we were troubled by the fact that Gazprom's unilateral decision to reduce gas deliveries to Ukraine also led to a loss of gas pressure in our pipelines to the rest of Europe. Instead of escalating the conflict we therefore sought to settle the differences with Moscow and allay the fears of both Ukrainian and European citizens.

Fortunately, pragmatic heads on both sides prevailed. The importance of this settlement became all too evident for Ukrainians who for the past week had to endure double-digit sub-zero temperatures.

DOJ_NMG_0011657

Together with Russia's President Vladimir Putin, we were able to find a workable formula for the transport of Russian natural gas to European consumers. As was our strategic goal from the outset, the deal was based on mutual respect for national interests and market pricing.

For Ukraine, the compromise has several advantages. First, unlike in our neighboring countries -- where Gazprom has taken control of the national gas pipelines -- our strategic gas pipelines remain Ukrainian property.

Second, and maybe most importantly, the compromise finally introduces cash payments to our international gas trade, ending the murky Russian-Ukrainian barter operations for energy supplies.

Previously, Ukraine contractually withdrew up to 25 billion cubic meters of Russian gas pumped towards Europe through its pipelines in exchange of industrial assets and the right to use our pipeline to deliver gas to the Continent. Now, Ukraine pays cash for the Russian gas it consumes just as Russia pays cash for the transport of its gas through Ukraine's pipeline. Everything is transparent and fixed in contracts.

For fourteen years, though, international barter settlements had cost Ukraine hundreds of strategic assets such as factories, shipping vessels and other enterprises, which had been used as payment for Russian (and Turkmen) gas supplies. The practice of forfeiting strategic assets had fueled cronyism and corruption, enriching a few oligarchs at the expense of the rest of the nation. This intolerable practice has finally ended.

It is true that Ukraine now pays a higher price for Russian natural gas. However, we still pay less per cubic meter than what Moscow charges our closest neighbors, with the exception of Belarus. That's because we now receive more cheap Turkmen and Kazakh gas.

Moving closer to market pricing mechanisms will force our domestic industry to improve energy efficiency and conservation. At the same time, developing domestic gas drilling has become a policy priority and will help Ukraine become more energy independent.

During the discussions with President Putin we also agreed to soon create a joint venture for a more transparent international gas transporter to fulfill the terms reached between our national gas companies. The opaque shareholder structure of the gas transporter currently in charge has caused concern domestically and abroad.

European businesses and consumers will also benefit. Russian gas deliveries to Ukraine have now been contractually separated from gas designated to the rest of Europe. Honoring these now separate agreements and their five-year terms offer consumers in both Europe and Ukraine predictability and stability. Meanwhile, we intend to work with all gas producing countries to our east on developing and diversifying natural gas supplies to Europe in order to provide consumers with options for the future. The idea is to transport natural gas from Turkmenistan, Kazakhstan and other central Asian countries through new pipelines which could eventually be connected to the existing network supplying Europe.

The gas compromise, though, caught many in Ukraine off-guard. Oligarchs oppose it because it ends one of the largest and most corrupt international barter schemes in Europe. Proceeds from it benefited numerous fifth column groups at the expense of Ukraine's national security. The influence of these oligarchs reaches as far as to Ukraine's parliament. Last month lawmakers broke constitutional procedures and sacked the cabinet of Prime Minister Yuriy Yekhanurov -- only weeks before Ukrainians are set to elect a new legislature.

Ukraine experienced a similar episode only five years ago. In 2000, as Prime Minister, I set the goal of ending domestic barter payments for energy supplies. Achieving that objective cost me my political job when once more the oligarchs used their political influence to rally lawmakers against the government.

Nonetheless, it ended corrupt barter schemes between national enterprises and introduced competitive pricing within the economy, unleashing six years of consecutive economic growth in Ukraine. By removing murky business intermediaries who facilitated the flow of natural gas to Ukraine, our gas debts to Russia became more transparent and manageable. This benefited both Ukrainian and European consumers as it allowed a stable gas transportation system to operate for more than half a decade. Only Ukraine's oligarchs were unhappy then because a grey market loophole of hyper-profits and barter schemes was closed.

The compromise reached earlier this month over Russian gas supplies to Ukraine and their transit to Europe attests to the pragmatic relations developing between our two countries. Through actions rather than mere slogans Ukraine demonstrated its commitment to regional stability and ability to forge mutually beneficial economic relations. My country's course toward European integration and adherence to market principles has once again been affirmed.

In the long-term, domestic market prices for energy will only enhance Ukraine's global economic competitiveness. I am convinced that Ukrainian entrepreneurs will meet this challenge. Together we will develop our energy diversity, strengthen domestic gas reserves and launch a long overdue national energy conservation program. To help facilitate these goals and develop key sectors of our national economy, Ukraine is ready and open for strategic foreign investment.

Mr. Yushchenko is president of Ukraine.

Oil-for-Missiles (WSJ)

By Richard L. Russell

The Wall Street Journal, January 25, 2006

It was no coincidence that Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah this week chose China for his first official trip outside the Middle East since acceding to the throne in August. With five agreements signed during the visit, including a pact for closer cooperation in oil, natural gas and minerals, the two countries are laying the foundations for a strategic relationship that challenges U.S. interests.

Humiliated by their dependence on Washington for survival in the wake of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait, the Saudi royal family has long been seeking to forge closer ties with Beijing in the hope of reducing their dependence on the U.S. The Saudis began moving in this direction even before the first Gulf War, secretly negotiating a deal with China in the mid-'80s to purchase CSS-2 ballistic missiles. That was an affront to the Reagan administration and its policy of preventing the proliferation of ballistic missiles. But the Saudis risked American ire because they saw Iran, Iraq and Israel all armed with ballistic missiles and did not want to be left out. In return, China won hard currency for the missile sale, as well as diplomatic relations with Riyadh in a snub to Taiwan.

Since 9/11, and the American public's backlash over the fact that the majority of the hijackers were Saudi nationals, Riyadh's search for a new strategic partner has assumed fresh impetus. China, for its part, is importing ever increasing amounts of oil from the Gulf to fuel its rapidly expanding economy. That has prompted a degree of paranoia over "energy insecurity." Beijing military strategists worry that, because they lack America's "blue-water" navy, the country is potentially vulnerable to a U.S. blockade of oil shipments from the Gulf to China.

Hence the mutual interest in a closer relationship demonstrated during King Abdullah's three-day visit, which ended yesterday. For all the headlines about the agreements he signed with President Hu Jintao on issues such as energy cooperation and double taxation, it's a safe assumption that strategic issues were also on the agenda away from the bright lights of the media. Saudi Arabia's CSS-2 missiles are now obsolescent and Riyadh would welcome modern Chinese models as replacements. For Beijing, that offers a useful tit-for-tat should Washington agree to further large arms sales to Taiwan. But it would come at the price of violating China's commitment to adhere to the Missile Technology Control Regime, which seeks to control international transfers of ballistic missile technology.

The danger is that these developments will pass largely unnoticed in Washington, as they fall between bureaucratic cracks in the national-security apparatus. In the National Security Council, as well as at the Departments of State and Defense, separate sections still focus on the Middle East and Asia (despite Condoleezza Rice's recent reforms). No one seems to be looking at the bigger picture in terms of the emerging strategic relationship between two regions so important to American national interests.

In the old days of the Cold War, the U.S. viewed the security relationships in the Middle East through the prism of its rivalry with the Soviet Union. Today, Russian power in the Middle East has withdrawn as Moscow grapples with getting its domestic house in order. But China's power in the Middle East, especially in the Persian Gulf, is increasing, a dimension of world politics that American policy makers need to begin focusing attention on.

Mr. Russell teaches at the National Defense University's Near East and South Asia Center for Strategic Studies and is the author of "Weapons Proliferation and War in the Greater Middle East" (Routledge, 2005).

HUCKABEE: "What's happening in Iraq is that it's become truly the Normandy of freedom and democracy in the Middle East. And it's as much a beachhead for changing the future of the world as Normandy was in changing the future of Europe. We can't pull out. We can't simply stop what's being done. It would be not only a disservice to the brave men and women who have already served here, but it would be really the disservice to the future generations of not just Americans, but people around the world who need a stable Middle East in order to stop terrorism and to bring some sense of balance to the world." Subject: Restrictions on Political Activities and Convention

Attached is the DOJ policy regarding Restrictions on Political Activities which applies to all political appointees. While this policy has been circulated to all appointees several times previously, as we approach the November elections it is important to ensure that all DOJ appointees are clear on the rules that govern political activity. Please review this Memorandum carefully. There was a technical problem in the scanning of this document which resulted in one error; the word "not" should appear on page 3 in the first line under "Statutory Restrictions." The sentence should read:

"The statutory restrictions are set forth in the regulations at 5 CFR 734, which are summarized below. Under the regulations, non-career appointees may not:"

Additionally, please note that DOJ appointees are prohibited from attending or otherwise participating in any events or activities of the Republican National Convention in New York. There will be no exceptions granted to this policy.

Thank you for your careful attention to this matter.

MEMORANDUM FOR ALL DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NON-CAREER APPOINTEES

FROM: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

SUBJECT: Restrictions on Political Activities

As employees of the Department of Justice (Department), we have been entrusted with the authority to enforce the la~s of the united States, and with the responsibility to do so in a neutral and impartial manner. For the public to retain its confidence that we are adhering to our responsibility, we must ensure that politics--both in fact and appearance--does not compromise the integrity of our work.

The purpose of this memorandum is to remind all non-career appointees about Department policy regarding the propriety of engaging in certain political activities, and to set forth the policy and statutory/regulatory rules applicable to non-career appointees. As a matter of Department policy, I previously determined that non-career appointees would be held to the restrictions of the pre-1994 Hatch Act, which prohibits employees from active participation in political management or partisan political campaigns. The specific statutory provisions are summarized at the end of this memorandum. Iaalso imposed additional restrictions that are set forth below, which are more strict than required by statute or regulation for I believe that the Department should be held to a higher standard to avoid activity that might be considered partisan in nature.

These policy restrictions, as well as an outline of statutory requirements, are set out below.

Policy Restrictions

Events that may be construed as partisan in nature may be divided into two categories.

1. Political Events

The first category encompasses those functions that are clearly political such as campaign events, political fund-raisers, and conventions, which would never be attended in an official capacity. As a matter of Department policy, all Senate-confirmed presidential appointees, non-career members of the Senior Executive Service (S8S) and Schedule C appointees must obtain approval prior to attending any political event, including a fund-raising or campaign event, or a convention, or to accept a gift of free or discounted attendance at a political event.

As a matter of Department policy, active participation in these events is prohibited for all non-career appointees. Active participation includes making a speech at a party function, appearing on the program, on the dais or in the receiving line of a political event, or allowing your name to be used in connection with the promotion of the event.

Although passive participation is not prohibited, it is subject to a prior approval policy. Passive participation includes merely att~nding a fund-raising or a campaign event. Acceptance- of a gift of free or discounted attendance may be approved if it meets one of the exceptions to the gift rules, including gifts based on a personal relationship or outside business relationship unrelated to official status- If you seek approval to attend an event or accept a gift in connection with an event, you must contact the Principal Associate Deputy Attorney General, the Chief of Staff to the Deputy Attorney General, or the Principal Deputy Associate Attorney General (these three officials are hereafter referred to as the "Leadership Designees").

Of course, any employee may always make an otherwise appropriate donation to the candidate of their choice so long as the fact of the donation is not used in a promotional manner.

2. Official Events

The second category includes official events such as a speech or grant announcement made in a state shortly before a general election, primary or caucus, or an event that may involve an appearance with a candidate for partisan office. We must be especially vigilant to prevent even the appearance that any of our official duties are motivated by improper partisan electoral politics. In determining whether your appearance could be construed as inappropriately partisan, you should consider, among other factors, the identity of the sponsor of the event, the group being addressed, the other participants, the timing of the event, and the subject of any speech to be given. If you have any doubt about whether an appearance may be inappropriate, you should seek approval before agreeing to appear by contacting one of the three Leadership Designees.

Generally, I do not travel to any state within 30 days of a primary or general election within that state. I urge all Senate-confirmed officials to adopt a similar practice to the greatest extent practicable.

If asked by a current or former member of the Administration to participate in an official capacity in an event that you believe could be construed as inappropriately partisan, please contact one of the three Leadership Designees for consultation regarding how to proceed.

Statutory Restrictions

The statutory restrictions are set forth in the regulations at 5 CFR 734, which are summarized below. Under the regulations, non-career appointees may~:

A. use their official authority or influence to interfere with or affect the result of an election;

B. solicit, accept or receive a political contribution;[1] solicit, accept, or receive uncompensated volunteer services from an individual who is a subordinate; or allow their official titles to be used in connection with fund-raising activities;

C. run for nomination or election to public office in a partisan election;

[1] The only statutory exception is for soliciting, accepting or receiving a political contribution to a multi-candidate political committee from a fellow member of a federal labor organization or certain other employee organizations, as long as the solicited employee is not a subordinate and the activity does not violate E below.

[2] In certain designated communities, including the Washington, DC suburbs, an employee may run for office in a local partisan election but only as an independent candidate and may receive, but not solicit, contributions. 5 U.S.C. 7325.

D. solicit or discourage the political activity of any person vho is a participant in any matter before the Department;

Policy Restrictions

In addition, under Department policy, non-career appointees may not:

E. engage in political activity (to include wearing political buttons), while on duty, while in a government occupied office or building, while wearing an official uniform or insignia, or while using a government vehicle; however, an employee may put a bumper sticker on a personal vehicle and park it in a government-owned or subsidized parking lot, but may not use the vehicle in the course of official business; and employees may display signs on their lawns and in their residences, and in similar personal circumstances.

F. distribute fliers printed by a candidate's campaign committee, a political party or partisan political group;

G. serve as an officer of a political party, a member of a national, state, or local committee of a political party, an officer or member of a committee of a partisan political group, or be a candidate for any of these positions;

H. organize or reorganize a political party organization or partisan political group;

I. serve as a delegate, alternate, or proxy to a political party convention;

J. address a convention, caucus, rally, or similar gathering of a political party or partisan political group in support of or in opposition to a candidate for partisan political office or political party office, if such address is done in concert with such a candidate, political party, or partisan political group;

K. organize, sell tickets to, promote, or actively participate in fund-raising activity of a candidate for partisan political office or of a political party or partisan political group; active participation includes making a speech at an event, appearing on the program, on the dais or in the receiving line of an event, or allowing your name to be used in connection with the promotion of the event; passive participation, which is allowed, means merely attending a fund-raising or campaign event;

L. canvass for votes in support of or in opposition to a candidate for partisan political office or a candidate for political party office, if such canvassing is done in concert with such a candidate, political party, or partisan political group;

M. endorse or oppose a candidate for partisan political office or a candidate for political party office in a political advertisement, broadcast, campaign literature, or similar material if such endorsement or opposition is done in concert with such a candidate, political party, or partisan political group;

N. initiate or circulate a partisan nominating petition;

O. act as recorder, watcher, challenger, or similar officer at polling places in consultation or coordination with a political party, partisan political group. Or a candidate for partisan political office;

P. drive voters to polling places in consultation or coordination with a political party, partisan political group, or a candidate for partisan political office.

Today's Events In Washington 49

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter To Question Gonzales On NSA Surveillance. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/26, McGough) reports, "If Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales thought he might be spared tough questioning from Republican senators when he testifies about the warrantless wiretapping of Americans thought to be in contact with foreign terrorists, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., yesterday disabused him of that notion." The Post-Gazette continues, "In a letter sent to the attorney general and shared with the press, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee propounded a series of questions that in a courtroom setting might be called 'leading' and requested that Mr. Gonzales answer them in his opening statement before the committee on Feb. 6. … The combative nature of the letter wasn't altered by the fact that the printed salutation to 'Attorney General Gonzales' was replaced by a hand-written 'Al.'" The Post-Gazette adds, "The letter honed in on the Bush administration's assertion-ridiculed by critics -- that Congress empowered the president to engage in electronic surveillance of Americans without a court order when it passed a resolution after the Sept. 11 2001, attacks authorizing him to 'use all necessary and appropriate force' against terrorists. … Mr. Specter asked: 'In interpreting whether Congress intended to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act by the Sept. 14, 2001, resolution, would it be relevant on the issue of congressional intent that the administration did not specifically ask for an expansion for executive powers under FISA?' … Mr. Specter further asked: 'If Congress had intended to amend FISA by the resolution, wouldn't Congress have specifically acted to [do so] as Congress did in passing the Patriot Act giving the executive expanded powers and greater flexibility in using "roving" wiretaps?' … Mr. Specter also made it clear he would press Mr. Gonzales about the administration's other legal rationale for the surveillance -- that it flowed from Mr. Bush's constitutional authority as commander-in-chief."

The National Journal's Technology Daily (1/25, Stirland) reports, "Pressure mounted on the Bush administration Wednesday to provide lawmakers with answers on domestic spying activities. … Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., released a three-page letter with detailed questions to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on the president's decision in 2002 to secretly authorize domestic wiretaps without warrants. … The letter includes many of the questions that constitutional scholars have been posing about the president's order, and several questions could put Gonzales in an awkward position." Technology Daily adds, "At the same time, Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee demanded that Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., hold a business meeting so the committee can vote to investigate several aspects of the administration's domestic spying. … Under committee rules, Roberts is obligated to hold a meeting if at least five members formally ask for one. All seven Democrats on the panel signed the request to Roberts." Technology Daily notes, "A majority vote is needed to move ahead with the investigation. Two Republicans on the committee, Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine, have asked Roberts for a hearing on the matter. Roberts has said nothing publicly about holding a hearing. … Also on Wednesday, a group of Democrats, including Sens. Richard Durbin of Illinois and Charles Schumer of New York, sent a letter to President Bush asking him for specific changes in the law that he believes are necessary to permit effective surveillance of suspected terrorists."

Gonzales Warned To Expect Tough Questions From Senate Committee. The CBS Evening News (1/25, lead story, 4:00, Roberts) noted, "NSA officials aren't likely to be called in the first round of hearings, but in a letter, the Attorney General was warned by the Judiciary Committee chair, he's in for a full day of grilling on February 6. Among the questions: Why did the President bypass the Federal court that covers wire taps, and how does he justify not more fully informing Congress? The President insists he has informed Congress but complains existing laws aren't nimble enough to cover the explosion of technology through which terrorists communicate."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, lead story, 3:00, Mitchell) also noted, "The White House says when Congress authorized the war on terror after 9/11, it gave the President the power to spy without court orders. But even some powerful Republicans are challenging the program's legality. Today, Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter sent this 'dear Al' letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, listing 15 tough questions he will be asked at a hearing two weeks from now, including whether the spying was an illegal expansion of presidential power." Sen. Specter: "There was no thought when we passed the authorization for the use of force that it had implications for electronic surveillance."

The Baltimore Sun (1/26, Davis, 296K) focuses on Specter's letter, reporting that even as Bush spoke, "questions mounted about the administration's legal justifications for the program. A key Republican senator took issue with Bush's defense of the operation, which was secretly authorized by the president after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and targets some communications inside the United States. Also, new reports surfaced suggesting that the administration had rejected an earlier proposal in Congress that would have made it easier to obtain court approval for domestic wiretapping."

Administration Dismissed 2002 Proposal To Change Surveillance Warrant Standard. The Washington Post (1/26, A4, Eggen) reports, "The Bush administration rejected a 2002 Senate proposal that would have made it easier for FBI agents to obtain surveillance warrants in terrorism cases, concluding that the system was working well and that it would likely be unconstitutional to lower the legal standard." The Post continues, "The proposed legislation by Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) would have allowed the FBI to obtain surveillance warrants for non-U.S. citizens if they had a 'reasonable suspicion' they were connected to terrorism -- a lower standard than the 'probable cause' requirement in the statute that governs the warrants. … The administration has contended that it launched a secret program of warrantless domestic eavesdropping by the National Security Agency in part because of the time it takes to obtain such secret warrants from federal judges under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA)." The Post adds, "The wiretapping program, ordered by President Bush in 2001, is used when intelligence agents have a 'reasonable basis to believe' that a target is tied to al Qaeda or related groups, according to recent statements by administration officials. It can be used on U.S. citizens as well as foreign nationals, without court oversight. … Democrats and national security law experts who oppose the NSA program say the Justice Department's opposition to the DeWine legislation seriously undermines arguments by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and others, who have said the NSA spying is constitutional and that surveillance warrants are often too cumbersome to obtain. … 'It's entirely inconsistent with their current position,' said Philip B. Heymann, a deputy attorney general in the Clinton administration who teaches law at Harvard University. 'The only reason to do what they've been doing is because they wanted a lower standard than 'probable cause.' A member of Congress offered that to them, but they turned it down.'" The Post notes, "But Justice Department officials disagreed, saying the standard the department opposed in 2002 is legally different from the one used by the NSA. … 'The FISA "probable cause" standard is essentially the same as the "reasonable basis" standard used in the terrorist surveillance program,' said spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos, using the term for the NSA program the White House has adopted. 'The "reasonable suspicion" standard, which is lower than both of these, is not used in either program.' … Justice officials also said that even under a different standard, the process of obtaining a surveillance warrant would take longer than is necessary for the NSA to efficiently track suspected terrorists."

Under the headline "Words, Deeds On Spying Differed," The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Savage, 958K) also reports on the 2002 bill, noting that the administration's "public position then was the mirror opposite of its rationale today in defending its warrantless domestic spying program, which has come under attack as a violation of civil liberties. … A Justice Department spokesman confirmed Wednesday the administration had opposed changing the law in 2002 in part because it did not want to publicly debate the issue. 'There was a conscious choice not to have a public discussion about it. It could have exposed the program. This was a military defense intelligence program,' said the spokesman." The Times notes Sen. Patrick Leahy "accused the administration of having tried 'to paper over the legality of a secret spying program. If they really believed the current law is too burdensome, the Bush administration should have asked Congress to change it, but they did not. Instead a top lawyer in the Bush administration did just the opposite.'"

Knight Ridder (1/26, Landay) reports, "James A. Baker, the Justice Department's top lawyer on intelligence policy, made the statement before the Senate Intelligence Committee on July 31, 2002. He was laying out the department's position on an amendment to FISA proposed by Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio. The committee rejected DeWine's proposal, leaving FISA intact. … So while Congress chose not to weaken FISA in 2002, today Bush and his allies contend that Congress implicitly gave Bush the authority to evade FISA's requirements when it authorized him to use force in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks three days after they occurred - a contention that many lawmakers reject." Knight Ridder adds, "Glenn Greenwald, an Internet blogger, first connected the earlier Justice Department statement to the Bush administration's current arguments on his Web log, called Unclaimed Territory. … Baker's 2002 statement drew new attention Wednesday as the White House continued its campaign to justify eavesdropping on Americans who are suspected of being in contact with al-Qaida or other terrorist groups, despite possible violation of FISA." Knight Ridder notes, "Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said Wednesday that Gonzales stands by the administration's current view that FISA warrant requirements impose 'additional layers of review' that sacrifice 'critical speed and agility.'"

Administration Launches Campaign To Frame Surveillance Debate. The Dallas Morning News (1/26, Mittelstadt) reports, "The Bush administration raced this week to defend its warrantless domestic spying program, with several aims in mind, experts say: Win over a conflicted public; force Democrats into an arena that plays to GOP strength; and head off talk of impeachment and special prosecutors." The News continues, "With polls showing the public sharply divided over the controversial surveillance program, the White House and its critics – Democrats, small-government conservatives and civil libertarians – are engaged in a high-stakes contest to frame the debate. … 'If it's defined primarily as "government abuse, the president out of control, the White House running roughshod over basic constitutional rights," it would be a major problem for an extended period of time for the president – both on Capitol Hill but also with the voters,' said political analyst Stuart Rothenberg. … 'If the issue is defined more as "protecting national security, keeping people safe, stopping terrorism," then what the Democrats immediately saw might be a good issue for them could actually be turned around for the president and the Republican Party.' … Though the court of public opinion is key, some suggest that the political system or the courts will be the ultimate arbiter of the program's legality – and the far weightier question of whether Mr. Bush is claiming executive powers outside the bounds of the Constitution or the law." The News notes, "Mr. Specter has summoned Attorney General Al Gonzales for a Feb. 6 hearing and is under pressure from Democrats to invite former Deputy Attorney General James Comey and other administration officials who reportedly raised concerns about the legality of the domestic surveillance."

Debate Over Legality Of NSA Surveillance Narrows. Fox News (1/26) reports, "After three days of a Bush administration offensive and weeks of debate and accusations, some legal experts are coming to terms on what is illegal and what is not in the National Security Agency electronic surveillance program. … 'When the president goes around and speaks ... and says we're monitoring calls from overseas from Al Qaeda to the United States, the NSA can go ahead and do that now under the law,' Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said after the Senate Judiciary confirmation hearing of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito." Fox News continues, "But Kennedy said independent organizations, like the Congressional Research Service, have studied the legality of the NSA program and say the president has gone beyond what the rules allow. Bush, however, says the eavesdropping program is legal and doesn't overstep the boundaries allowed to him by the Constitution and congressional resolution. … According to legal experts, hypothetically, if the NSA had intercepted calls from alleged terrorists such as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed or Ramzi Binalshibb, both now in custody, while they were abroad, then U.S. intelligence agents could listen to the calls without a warrant. That goes for phone calls with people on the other end of the line who happen to be in United States. … Only when the person inside the United States becomes the target of surveillance is a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance court required. … Other experts agree that a warrant is not needed until the U.S.-based individual becomes a suspect. … But others argue that the law says domestic communications monitoring rules apply even when only one end of the call is on U.S. soil. They say that's why Bush signed a highly classified directive approving the program and has to re-approve it every 45 days."

Bush Continues Defense Of NSA Domestic Surveillance Program. President Bush defended the NSA domestic surveillance program yesterday. Media reports describe the President continuing to wage a "campaign" style offensive against its critics, with CBS saying Bush used "his strongest words yet to defend the program" and ABC saying he "made the most dramatic link yet between the September 11th attacks and his controversial domestic spying program." ABC, like most print sources this morning, was referring to the President's reference to the latest Osama Bin Laden tape.

Bush said the tape was a reminder of how serious the terror threat is. Reuters (1/26) reports Bush said "he took…bin Laden's threats of another attack seriously and invoked the al Qaeda leader's recent audiotape to defend a domestic eavesdropping program." The AP (1/26, Pickler) also focuses on Bush's Bin Laden argument, as does the Washington Times (1/26, Sammon, 90K), which notes the

President "the unusual step of imploring Americans to heed the warnings of…bin Laden." Likewise, USA Today (1/26, 2.31M) headlines its brief report "Take Bin Laden Threat Seriously, Bush Warns."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, lead story, 4:00, Schieffer) reported, "The President has clearly decided the best defense is a good offense. Democrats and even some within his own party have raised strong criticism of his decision to eavesdrop without warrants on some Americans, but today the President used his strongest words yet to defend the program." CBS (Roberts) added, "Bush privately told NSA staff today they have his 100% support in the eavesdropping program." His "visit was accompanied by a new White House PR line, casting the program as a vital military operation, one that can't wait for courts to consider warrants." Scott McClellan: "Do you expect our commanders in a time of war to go to a court while they're trying to survey the enemy? I don't think so."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 5, 0:42, Vargas) reported, "Bush made the most dramatic link yet between the September 11th attacks and his controversial domestic spying program." At the NSA he "said had the eavesdropping program been in effect prior to 9/11, the hijackers might have been stopped." Bush: "We know that two of the hijackers who struck the Pentagon were inside the United States, communicating with al Qaeda operatives overseas. But we didn't realize they were here plotting the attack until it was too late. We must be able to connect the dots, before the terrorists strike, so we can stop new attacks."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, lead story, 3:00, Williams) reported, "When it was first disclosed, the critics pounced upon learning that American intelligence personnel were eavesdropping on Americans who were placing suspect phone calls outside of the country. And while many Americans still say it's illegal domestic spying, the president insists on calling it a terrorist surveillance program and insists it's necessary and within his legal powers. And today, he took his argument right to the source." NBC (Mitchell) added, "Inside the NSA, he brushed off critics who say it is illegal." President Bush: "All I would ask them to do is listen to the words of Osama bin Laden and take him seriously. When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it."

Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Cameron) said Bush "reiterated that the program has helped prevent attacks and saved lives and that the US must detect and track all al Qaeda communications to secure the homeland."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Bash) added, "One of the things that even the President's opponents say that they give him credit for is knowing how to run a campaign, and that's exactly what the White House has been doing in trying to defend the controversial spying program this whole week. They are also really pulling out all the stops. One of the things that they did…was have the President himself" go to the NSA "to not only thank the people who are conducting his program, but also to, of course, make the arguments that we've heard time and time again about why it is legal and necessary. But another thing that sort of fell into the President's lap, if you will, was, of course, the tape from Osama bin Laden. And so the White House, for the first time today, had the President use that in making the argument for this program." CNN added that Bush "spent a lot of time on making the argument at the NSA today that it is just perhaps people who are talking to members of al Qaeda who could be listened in on, that it is not just people in the United States who are being surveilled, if you will. That is an argument that we've heard many times but certainly more so today."

The Washington Post (1/26, A4, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "Bush, whose aides said they consider the issue a clear political winner, is resurrecting tactics from the last campaign to make the NSA spying program a referendum on which party will keep the United States safe from terrorists." He "has dispatched top White House officials almost daily to defend the program and has sent a message to party activists that he considers fighting terrorism with tools such as NSA eavesdropping the defining issue of the November elections." The Post adds, "Exhibiting an obsession to detail not seen in the Social Security rollout a year ago, the White House is even waging a war on the semantics being used in the debate, lashing out at reporters who call the program 'domestic' spying, because the monitored calls involve a person overseas." It is also "putting out pages of highly detailed -- and often hotly disputed -- legal analyses of the program and drawing what Democratic critics and many independent analysts regard as questionable historical parallels to show Bush is following a long wartime tradition."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Gerstenzang, 958K) says Bush's visit to NSA headquarters at Ft. Meade, MD, "was part of a stepped-up campaign in recent days to gain public support for the spying program." Earlier, White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan "defended Bush's decision not to ask a special court for warrants to monitor people in the United States. 'This is a time of war. This is about wartime surveillance of the enemy,' McClellan said, adding a refinement of his earlier arguments: 'We don't ask our commanders to go to the court and ask for approval while they're trying to gain intelligence on the enemy.'"

The New York Times (1/26, Bumiller, Lichtblau, 1.19M) reports Bush "first met privately with employees at the agency, then told a small group of reporters who accompanied him that the program, which intercepts international phone calls and e-mail messages of people in the United States suspected of links to Al Qaeda, had been a crucial tool in fighting terrorism."

The President's speech was widely noted by local television news. Local coverage largely mirrored the national newscasts. For example, WGCL-TV Atlanta (1/25, 11:00 p.m.) reported, "Bush continued his aggressive defense of his domestic spying program today." KPRC-TV Houston (1/25, 4:16 p.m.) reported, "The President' s strong defense of a surveillance program is forcing some Democrats to mute criticism." KPNX-TV Phoenix (1/25, 10:12 p.m.) said Democrats "'disagree [with the President] and the Senate will hold hearings," but as KWGN-TV Denver (1/25, 9:24 p.m.) reported, this is a "controversy…the President himself seems almost anxious to keep alive."

White House Confident Public Supports Monitoring Efforts. NBC Nightly News (1/25, lead story, 3:00, Mitchell) reported, "Democrats think their best argument is the move was the power grab the President and will ultimately prove to be unpopular. Despite the furor, the White House is encouraged by recent polls, showing more Americans care about fighting terror than preserving their privacy." Andrew Kohut, independent pollster: "The public is concerned about civil liberties but what they tell us in the polls is they're more concerned about whether the government is doing enough to protect it from another terrorist attack." Mitchell: "Tonight the President plans to reauthorize the spying for as long as terrorists remain a threat."

Claims NSA Program Could Have Prevented 9/11 Attacks Challenged. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 2, 2:00, Martin) reported, "The man who ran the NSA on 9/11 has made the most powerful argument in favor of the controversial eavesdropping program." Gen. Michael Hayden: "Had this program been in effect prior to 9/11, it is my professional judgment that we would have detected some of the 9/11 al Qaeda operatives in the United States." He "offered no specifics, and Democratic members of the 9/11 commission dispute it." Former 9/11 commissioner Tim Roemer: "Indicating that an intercepted communication would somehow identify and then stop or block parts of 9/11, I think is stretching this argument entirely too far." Former 9/11 commissioner Bob Kerrey: "We lost them. There was a breakdown in communication that many has nothing to do with the inability of getting an intercept permission to listen to people's communication." Martin: "Hayden stopped just short of saying warrantless eavesdropping could have broken up the 9/11 plot, but today, the White House claimed it might have. You can't prove any of that with what the 9/11 commission found."

Republicans May Propose Expanding Administration Wiretapping Authority. As a sign of growing Republican confidence in supporting Bush's terrorist monitoring policy one unidentified GOP Senator may propose expanding the Administration's wiretapping authority. The CBS Evening News (1/25, lead story, 4:00, Roberts) reported, "The growing response from Republicans in Congress: Tell us what you need. We'll write new laws. In fact, one Republican Senator told CBS News tonight, she might consider loosening the standards for approving the wiretap and allowing more officials at the Justice Department, not just the Attorney General, to authorize eavesdropping, so that it could begin just as soon as the NSA needed it." Schieffer: "Now, just a second, John. Are you telling me, there's a feeling amongst Republicans up in the Congress that they're going to give more people in the government the authority to eavesdrop without warrants? Is that what you're saying here?" Roberts: "That's what one Republican Senator is suggesting, that instead of making all eavesdropping or wiretapping requests go through the Attorney General, that some upper-level officials might be available and able to be able to authorize those wiretaps. It would spread it out among dozens of people as opposed to a single one at the top." Schieffer: "What do you think the mood is up there? Do you think anything like that could pass?" Roberts: "It's certainty being considered by the Republicans. They have the majority in the Senate and in the House, and if they want it, they'll probably get it."

Democrats On House Intel Panel Demand Open And Closed Hearings On NSA Spying. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "Democrats on the House Intelligence Committee are demanding that the panel hold both open and closed hearings on the NSA surveillance program. In a letter to the Republican chairman, they say they want to know the purpose of the spying, when it began and when it was first authorized. They want to know the targets of the eavesdropping, who decides what information to collect."

Hillary Clinton Calls Bush's Explanations Of Domestic Spying Program "Strange And Farfetched." CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "Senator Hillary Clinton says she doesn't know if Mr. Bush broke the law by authorizing these wiretaps without warrants, but today the New York Democrat called the President's explanations about domestic spying -- and I'm quoting now – 'strange and farfetched.'"

Under the headline "Rift Between Parties Over NSA Wiretapping Grows," the Washington Post (1/26, A4, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "In the latest sign of the escalating debate on the issue, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) called Bush's rationale a 'strange' and dangerous legal stretch." The "conflicting views of the NSA spying program highlighted by the Bush-Clinton exchange reflect a widening divide over warrantless eavesdropping," and "how leaders in both major parties are trying to shape the debate in preparation for upcoming congressional hearings and this year's elections."

LATimes Says Bush Equating Appeasement With Standing Up For Rule Of Law. In an editorial titled "Spying

By Another Name," the Los Angeles Times (1/26, 958K) says, "With polls showing the American public increasingly skeptical about the need to abridge core constitutional freedoms to wage the war on terrorism, the Bush administration launched a major PR offensive this week to justify its decision to conduct warrantless wiretapping within the United States." The White House "deserves credit for at least making its case. Unfortunately for the president, it's a weak case, and repetition doesn't make it any better." The Administration's "legal case remains wobbly, which may explain…Bush's churlish attitude toward his critics." The President "is equating concerns about the legality of bypassing the courts to obtain a warrant to eavesdrop on Americans with a lack of appreciation for the threats posed by Al Qaeda. In Bush's world, only appeasers stand up for the Constitution."

Judge Orders US To Give Moussaoui Defense Documents About Pre-9/11 Intelligence. The AP (1/26) reports US District Judge Leonie Brinkema "has ordered the government to give admitted terrorist conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's defense team documents describing what officials knew before Sept. 11, 2001, about al-Qaeda threats and some of its hijackers. … 'Several of the categories of information are so critical to the issues in this case that the court can address some of the requests without a response,' Brinkema wrote. 'Moreover, given the increasingly shortening time before the start of the trial, discovery issues must be resolved quickly.' Granted Tuesday under seal, her order was released Wednesday after government censors blacked out about five lines of it." The AP notes that the "data clearly was sought by the defense for use in the first part of the upcoming court proceeding, in which prosecutors will try to convince jurors that the FBI would have prevented the Sept. 11 attacks if Moussaoui had told federal agents what he knew about al-Qaeda's desire to fly planes into U.S. buildings. The defense will argue that agents had more information about the plot than Moussaoui could provide but still could not prevent the attacks."

Scripps Howard (1/25, Gordon) reports, "The ruling could create a legal showdown, for example, if it requires intelligence agencies to produce classified information that they consider too sensitive to release, even to defense lawyers with government security clearances. … Jury selection is set to begin on Feb. 6, with opening arguments slated for March 6 in a sentencing trial to determine whether Moussaoui, who pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts last April, should live or die."

Al Arian Lawyers Seek To Withdraw From Case If Retried. The AP (1/26) reports Sami al Arian's defense attorneys, Linda Moreno and Bill Moffitt, "asked a federal judge to let them off the case if prosecutors retry the former college professor on charges of aiding terrorists. … A hearing is scheduled for Friday. 'We gave everything we had, and I'm too exhausted to give anymore,' Moffitt…said Tuesday." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutor Terry Zitek told the court that if the case is retried, his team will need until June to present 'a streamlined case,' which should take about two months to present to a jury."

Texas Men Sentenced For Illegal Exports To Libya, Syria. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/26) reports Texas "brothers convicted of sending exports from their U.S. company to countries considered sponsors of terrorism were sentenced Wednesday to federal prison, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. Hazim Elashi was sentenced to 5 1/2 years in prison and will be deported after serving his sentence. His brother Ihsan 'Sammy' Elashi was given a six-year term, which will run consecutively to the four-year sentence he is currently serving. Hazim and Ihsan Elashi, their three brothers and their company," InforCom, "were convicted in 2004 on charges of making illegal technology shipments to Libya and Syria." The AP notes, "Agents from the FBI investigated InfoCom for years and raided the business the week before the Sept. 11 terror attacks. Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the original indictments against the brothers, calling it part of a campaign against 'the financiers of terror.'"

ACLU Files Lawsuit In Support Of Tariq Ramadan. The New York Times (1/26, Preston, 1.19M) reports that the ACLU filed a lawsuit in Federal District Court in Manhattan on behalf of scholar Tariq Ramadan, and three national organizations of academics or writers who have invited him to speak to their members yesterday, "seeking to strike down a clause of the USA Patriot Act that bars foreigners who endorse terrorism from entering to this country." Ramadan "has been denied a United States visa since July 2004, when he was on the verge of moving with his family to Indiana to take up a tenured professor's position at the Joan B. Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies at the University of Notre Dame. … The ACLU, joined by the New York Civil Liberties Union, brought the suit against Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asserting that the Patriot Act clause is unconstitutional and that the ban on Mr. Ramadan violates the First Amendment rights of American thinkers who want to meet with him." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A4, 2.11M) reports, "The lawsuit…intensifies the debate over the Patriot Act and reflects concerns in academia that the US's security precautions are hampering the flow of ideas between foreign and US scholars."

PATRIOT ACT:

US Scholarly Organizations File Lawsuit Over Patriot Act Visa Provision. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A4, 2.11M) reports, "Three scholarly organizations sued the federal government over its 2004 decision to revoke a visa granted to a European expert on Islam," Tariq Ramadan, "preventing him from taking a faculty position at the University of Notre Dame. The lawsuit…intensifies the debate over the Patriot Act and reflects concerns in academia that the U.S.'s security precautions are hampering the flow of ideas between foreign and U.S. scholars." The Journal adds, "The lawsuit asks the U.S. District Court in New York City to declare unconstitutional a portion of the Patriot Act that denies entry on the grounds of 'ideological exclusion' to those who have endorsed or espoused terrorist activity or who have persuaded others to do so. 'There is simply no evidence' of Mr. Ramadan supporting terrorism, said Barbara DeConcini, executive director of the American Academy of Religion, one of the plaintiff groups." The New York Times (1/26, Preston, 1.19M) notes, "The ACLU, joined by the New York Civil Liberties Union, brought the suit against" DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asserting that the Patriot Act clause is unconstitutional and that the ban on Mr. Ramadan violates the First Amendment rights of American thinkers who want to meet with him." The AP (1/25, Neumeister) and Knight Ridder (1/26, Strobel) also report on the lawsuit.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Georgia ACLU Releases Documents Allegedly Showing Spying On Activist Groups. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/26, Montgomery, 430K) reports, "In the name of fighting terrorism, the U.S. government and police agencies from the federal to the local level have been spying on Georgia anti-war rallies, peace and social action groups, and even a vegan protest, the state legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union charged Wednesday. Documents and surveillance photos obtained by the ACLU through a Freedom of Information Act request reveal a pattern of 'spying on Georgians who are our friends and neighbors, and are leading lawful lives,' attorney Gerald Weber said…outside the Georgia Homeland Security offices in downtown Atlanta. … 'Many of us remember the days of J.Edgar Hoover, and this is another reminder,' said state Rep. Nan Grogan Orrock." The Journal-Constitution adds, "A special agent at the FBI press office in Washington who would not give her name said the FBI 'investigates groups or individuals when we have information or allegations of federal law being broken. We do not investigate groups or persons exercising their constitutional right of protest or dissent.'"

The AP (1/26) reports the ACLU "released two documents from the FBI and DeKalb County Homeland Security," and "Weber says so far the ACLU has received complaints from six organizations and nearly two dozen people who fear they have been spied upon, photographed, videotaped or had their events infiltrated by government agents. He says none of them did anything that would justify surveillance but rather are critics of the Bush administration." The AP notes, "FBI spokesman Bill Carter says all FBI investigations are conducted in response to information that the people being investigated were involved in or might have information about crimes."

White House Declines To Release Documents On Katrina Warning. NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 2, 2:00, Williams) in its story on Federal Katrina relief reported, "Congress also wants answers from the White House about the poor Federal response to Katrina, and tonight members of both parties complain the President is holding back important information about who knew what and when." Sen. Joe Liebermann: "They haven't given us the documents we've asked for. They haven't let us into the people in the White House who were involved in the decision making regarding Hurricane Katrina." Gregory: "The White House cites executive privilege." Scott McClellan, White House Press Secretary: "The President believes that Senator Lieberman ought to have the right to confidential conversations with his advisors, just like all presidents have asserted they ought to have that same right."

The New York Times (1/26, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "In their four months of digging, House and Senate investigators have collected hundreds of thousands of pages of documents and testimony from governors, mayors, Homeland Security and Pentagon officials and dozens of others touched by Hurricane Katrina." While Republican leaders of the two committees are satisfied with "the mountains of still-accumulating evidence," to Democrats, "crucial holes still remain, particularly related to what senior White House aides and the president knew, and how they reacted to this knowledge, right before the storm and after it." Senator Joseph I. Lieberman "said Wednesday that he realized it was unlikely he could get the information he wanted by threatening to subpoena. Even if one were issued, the administration would probably fight it in court."

MSNBC's Hardball (1/25, Shuster) reported, "Ratcheting up a battle with Congress, the Bush White House is now refusing to turn over Hurricane Katrina related documents or make senior officials available for testimony. The Administration contends executive branch discussions about the storm are not open to review by Congress. … It was Senator Lieberman, the President's favorite Democrat, who on Tuesday alleged the Bush Administration's refusal to cooperate has killed the Katrina investigation."

Landrieu Says Administration Should Be More Forthcoming. Sen. Mary Landrieu said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/25), "I believe the committee, the Bipartisan Committee of Senator Collins and Lieberman, has asked for those records. They are truly acting in a bipartisan spirit. And we would like a full investigation of actually what happened. Not so that we can spend time blaming…but that we can prevent this from happening again, and we can get on the business of rebuilding New Orleans, Louisiana, and the Gulf Coast. So you'll have to ask them specifically what they asked for, but I would hope they would provide all the records so we could get to the bottom of whose fault it was that the levees broke and how do we fix it in the future." Asked about White House claims that the requested information is privileged, Landrieu said, "I would think it would be in the country's best interest, as we seek to protect the people of this nation from terrorist attacks, from catastrophic events, that we would have a real independent investigation of that. Our governor has turned over a great deal of information. I'm assuming that our mayor and local officials have. The White House needs to step up and be very forthcoming. But more than turning over that information, the White House needs to turn over some good plans for rebuilding. All we've heard is a lot of empty promises and criticism."

Vitter Criticizes Federal, State and Local Responses To Hurricane. Sen. David Vitter said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/25), "We need to understand what broke down at the federal level and the state level and the local level. Because things clearly broke down at every level. This was not a disaster that was predictable. This was a disaster that was utterly predicted in print, in studies like the hurricane pan exercise. And every level of government fell flat." Vitter added, "I was disappointed at the federal response, very disappointed. I said so matter of factly the Friday after the storm. I gave the whole recovery effort an F. And the state response was just as poor and the local response."

White House Rejects Plan To Buy Out Katrina Home Owners. In a story that characterized the White House as declining to approve aid for Louisiana NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 2, 2:00, Williams) reported on "the long road back for the Gulf Coast, specifically the state of Louisiana. Crippled by Katrina and hoping for a $30 billion Federal relief package that just today was shot down by the Bush White House." NBC (Gregory) added, "Despite lofty promises, the White House has rejected Louisiana's homeowner bailout plan which local officials consider it crucial for recovery." Rep. Richard Baker, New Orleans: "To leave us in that state of disrepair without the hope of recovery is very troubling." Gregory: "The White House considers the" state plan to buy out home owners as "too expensive and bureaucratic suggesting instead the state settle for the more than $6 billion in Federal grants released today to bail out just those homeowners who didn't have insurance because they lived outside the floodplain." Administration officials "say more Federal dollars may come later, but acknowledge that conservatives in Congress are worried about spiraling costs."

The New York Times (1/26, Nossiter, 1.19M) carried a similar tone, reporting, "The White House decision to withhold support from a major Congressional reconstruction plan left Louisiana officials expressing bewilderment on Wednesday over what they characterized as the lack of a workable alternative from the Bush administration. … 'The White House simply needs to tell us what their plan is,' Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said Wednesday at a news conference in Baton Rouge. 'We don't see an adequate plan. You can't fix a $12 billion problem with $6 billion.'"

Reuters (1/25, Roberts) reported, "A group representing mortgage bankers also said President George W. Bush had yet to offer an alternative that was comparable to the plan proposed in Baker's legislation to create the Louisiana Recovery Corp. 'We'll really pay attention to the State of the Union address because we'll be anxious to see what the president is going to propose as a plan for rebuilding those devastated areas,' said Kurt Pfotenhauer, senior vice president of government affairs at the Mortgage Bankers Association. 'It's clear that some plan has to be in place in order to spur the investment of private capital.'"

USA Today (1/26, Dorell, Konigsmark, 2.31M) reports, "Donald Powell, President Bush's coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, suggested that money from the government's funding grant, announced Wednesday, be doled out to roughly 20,000 homeowners who weren't in a flood zone and did not have flood insurance when Hurricane Katrina hit. State officials must draw up plans for disbursing the money and get federal approval." Blanco said the plan "simply will not work," and added that "she won't use the money as the White House recommends. 'We are not in the business of choosing between our citizens.'"

Highlighting the severity of the damage caused by Hurricane Katrina, NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 10, 1:30, Williams) also reported that some viewers were complaining about NBC's continuing coverage of the impact of Hurricane Katrina. NBC defended the extent of its coverage saying that it reported on the impact of all of last year's hurricane's in the region, but "Katrina is different. Katrina displaced two million Americans. It destroyed 350,000 homes. Not all the bodies have been found yet. It exposed cracks in our society, and it has us talking about race and class and money and relief. It affected what we pay for gas and may affect what we pay in taxes. It literally rearranged the map of the Gulf Coast. There are many heroes, but no one villain. Tonight, one of the great American cities is partially in ruins, and many of our fellow citizens are hurting and have nothing left. And in some places, nothing's been done yet." And "we intend to keep covering it."

Nagin's Comments Scrutinized. The Washington Post (1/26, C1, Haygood, 744K) reports, "New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin blew into the original Chocolate City yesterday. Everywhere he goes these days, there seem to be things to explain, his words and comments tossed about as if, well, in yet another hurricane." Attending the winter meeting of the US Conference of Mayors at the Capital Hilton, Nagin said, "I don't get what all the fuss was about when I talked about New Orleans being a chocolate city. I mean, I understand the frustration with my 'God' comments. Maybe I went a little overboard. But Chocolate City? Come on.'"

Flood Insurance Program Administrator Seeks Changes. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) reports, "The administrator of the National Flood Insurance Program asked Congress on Wednesday to allow the elimination of discounts on as many as 1.2 million policies and suggested that the government consider requiring millions more homeowners to buy coverage. The program expects to borrow $23 billion from the Treasury to pay claims from Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma." David I. Maurstad, the administrator, "asked Congress to order the program's parent agency, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, to study expanding coverage requirements to properties in areas known as 500-year flood plains, with a 0.2 percent chance of flooding in any year, and to properties protected by levees and dams. He estimated that would affect four million to six million properties."

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports "the Senate Banking Committee is preparing to overhaul the federal flood insurance program, resulting in much higher premiums for many homeowners and a likely taxpayer bailout. … While broad legislation hasn't yet been proposed, several committee members and experts who appeared before the banking panel yesterday agreed that the insurance program needs to be restructured to operate more like a private insurance company."

WAR NEWS:

US, Iraqi Forces Repel Insurgent Attacks In Ramadi. US Marines and Iraqi troops repelled insurgent attacks in Ramadi Tuesday afternoon, killing seven insurgents. The Washington Post (1/26, A18, Finer, 744K) reports, "Five insurgents -- whose assault included mortar, small-arms and machine-gun fire -- were killed by a strike from a Marine Harrier jet as they gathered in a nearby cemetery, according to a statement from Capt. Jeffrey S. Pool, a Marine spokesman in the city. Two other fighters died in a firefight after insurgents used a rocket-propelled grenade to attack a military convoy entering the city's main government compound. No U.S. or Iraqi forces were wounded in the clashes, the statement said." The Post adds, "During the fighting, Zaal Shehan Mahmoud, 30, a cameraman for the Baghdad TV network, was killed by more than 20 bullets to the head, abdomen and legs, according to Mohammed Dulaimi, a doctor at the Ramadi hospital."

Officials See Rift Between Foreign Fighters, Local Insurgents. Maj. Gen. Richard Zahner, deputy chief of staff for intelligence for multinational forces in Iraq says a deepening rift between radical foreign fighters and native Iraqi insurgents has turned violent, creating an opportunity for US forces to try to persuade local guerillas to lay down their arms and join the political process. USA Today (1/26, Jervis, 2.31M) reports, "Iraq's national security adviser, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, also said there is a rift in the insurgency, calling it a 'a major step forward in our fight against terrorism.'" Zahner "said the insurgency consists of about 12,000 to 15,000 hard-core Iraqi fighters and supporters, as well as 1,000 militants loyal to al-Qaeda in Iraq, of which about 10% are foreign."

Videos Of Insurgent Attacks Provide Training Tool For US Forces. USA Today (1/26, Diamond, 2.31M) reports, "Videotapes of insurgent attacks in Iraq have become a potent propaganda tool for militant Islamists but also a handy training aid for U.S. forces, according to Army briefing documents being given to U.S. officers deploying for duty in Iraq. Insurgents routinely videotape their attacks and sometimes post the footage on the Internet as propaganda to show tactical victories against U.S. military convoys or helicopters. A briefing report prepared by the intelligence division of the Army's Training and Doctrine Command shows how the Army is mining the insurgent tapes for ways to avoid casualties." The briefing "report says 55% of U.S. military deaths in Iraq are attributed to improvised explosive devices, the military's term for roadside bombs, and small-arms attacks. It says 59% of U.S. military deaths occurred in Baghdad and Sunni-dominated Anbar province, which runs from just west of Baghdad to the Syrian border. Designed to help soldiers know what to expect and how to counter insurgent tactics, the briefing also warns that Iranian-backed Shiite militants as well as Iraqi Sunnis and foreign Sunni fighters are regularly mounting attacks."

US Troops Train Iraqi Police To Defeat Insurgents, Combat Corruption. NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 6, 2:00, Miklaszewski) reported that Colonel Bushar Hussein, commander of Iraq's first special police brigade, and his "commandos are slowly taking back parts of the city." And

"he isn't doing it alone. For the past nine months, 10-man teams of US military advisors have trained and fought alongside Iraqi police commandos. Major General Joe Peterson heads the increased US effort to turn Iraqi police into an independent fighting force by the end of this year." Peterson: "Our troops are making a significant difference in increasing that capability." Miklaszewski: "Despite some progress, the Iraqi commandos are far from fighting entirely on their own." Peterson: "There are times when a guy will walk off down the street and buy a pack of cigarettes while we are trying to provide security. And I'll have to fix him." Miklaszewski: "In addition, some police units have been infiltrated by militias while others are reportedly ripe with corruption." And "Colonel Bushar warns that government corruption and incompetence may pose more of a threat to the future of Iraq than the insurgents. And in the long run, may be even more difficult to defeat."

US To Release Five Female Iraqi Prisoners. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 3, 0:25, Woodruff) reported, "Iraq's justice ministry said at least five Iraqi women, in US custody, would be freed soon, possibly tomorrow. This would go a long way toward meeting the demands of militants who kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll of the Christian Science Monitor. A US spokesman confirmed the release of prisoners would occur, but the US has said consistently that any release would be a coincidence and not a response to the kidnapping."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 4, :45, Schieffer) reported, "US officials insist this is not linked to the demand by the kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll that US forces release all women detainees."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Murphy, 61K) reports, "Reuters reported that Iraqi officials have suggested the delay in releasing the women was linked to the demands of the kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll, who threatened to kill her by last Friday unless all women prisoners were freed. The deadline passed with no word on Ms. Carroll's fate."

However, the Washington Times (1/26, Deshmukh, 90K) says that the Iraqi Justice Ministry official "denied that the release of the women had anything to do with kidnappers' demands, and U.S. forces have stressed they do not negotiate with hostage-takers."

Reporter Recounts Attempted Kidnapping In Iraq. The Washington Post (1/26, C1, 744K) excerpts the book "Tell Them I Didn't Cry: A Young Journalist's Story of Joy, Loss, and Survival in Iraq" by reporter Jackie Spinner. In it, Spinner writes, "For 13 months in 2004 and 2005, my half was in Baghdad, dodging mortar rounds, roadside bombs and potential kidnappers, while [twin sister] Jenny worried from home that I would not be able to keep my promise to my nephew, her young son. 'Aunt Jackie always comes back,' I told him each time I returned to Baghdad, to a place that began to feel more like home the longer I stayed." Spinner recounts a day outside Abu Ghraib prison, "when a stranger grabbed my arm and began dragging me toward a car. … Another man came up behind me and grabbed me around the waist. Someone else grabbed the pillowcase that held my belongings and threw it aside. At first I couldn't fathom what was going on. What was happening to me? Were they trying to kidnap me? They were trying to kidnap me! My heart pounded. … Once the men who grabbed me saw the Marines, they let go, and everyone scattered."

In Wake Of Carroll Kidnapping, Journalist Rethinks Dangers In Iraq. Journalist Alissa Rubin writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/26, 958K), "When Jill Carroll was kidnapped, other journalists in Iraq were aghast that something so horrible had happened to someone they knew. But many insisted privately that it never would have happened to them. … The truth is that we are working in a war zone where no rules apply. No one is safe: not Iraqis, not Westerners, not men, not women." Rubin adds, "For most journalists in Iraq, it's hard to be honest about danger, even though we talk about it all the time. … To family and friends not in Iraq, it is incomprehensible why you came here, and certainly why you returned twice, three times — in my case, over and over for nearly three years. … For me, at least, what is true is that once in a while as a journalist you get the chance to witness history, a moment when tectonic plates shift, when more is at stake than you ever imagined you would touch or see. It's the adrenaline surge of being in a place where people's lives are in the balance, where every decision counts and where what you're writing might, might just matter. … I was aware of the statistics: Since the beginning of the war, 60 journalists, five of them women, had been killed in Iraq and at least 37 abducted, according to a tally by the Committee to Protect Journalists. But like all the other foreign journalists in Iraq — fewer than 75 of us, down from more than a thousand after the war — I needed to believe that I was going to slip through. After [journalist Jill] Carroll's abduction, I don't feel that way anymore." Iraq "is hostile ground and nothing I do can make it safe."

Former General Says Iraq WMD Moved To Syria Before US Invasion. Former Iraqi general George Sada, author of "Saddam's Secrets, How an Iraqi General Survived Saddam Hussein," in an interview on Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (1/25) said, "I want to make it very clear to everybody in the world that" there were weapons of mass destruction in Iraq "and the regime used them against our Iraqi people. It was used against Kurds in the north. Against Arabs." Asked whether Iraq had the WMD when the US toppled Hussein's regime, Sada replied, "Up to the year

2002, 2002, in summer, they were in Iraq. And then when Saddam realized that the inspectors are coming on first of November and the Americans are coming, so he took the advantage of natural disaster happened in Syria, a dam was broken. So announced to the world that he is going to make an air bridge" and moved the WMD to Syria.

Kurdish Writer's Prosecution Seen As Test Of Iraq's Move Toward Democracy. The New York Times (1/26, Oppel, 1.19M) reports on Kamal Sayid Qadir a Kurd who, from Austria has written articles accusing Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani's Democratic Party of corruption "while calling members of its intelligence service, the Parastin, criminals and its chief -- Mr. Barzani's son -- a 'pimp.'" Qadir is now imprisoned in Iraq, "sentenced last month to 30 years for defaming the Parastin and Kurdish political leaders after a trial that he said had lasted 15 minutes." The Times adds, "His case, while extraordinary, is by no means unique." These prosecutions "indicate how much remains at play in newly democratic Iraq. The nation has made remarkable steps away from totalitarian rule: the overthrow and prosecution of a genocidal dictator, two national elections and the adoption of a Constitution. But it remains to be seen how far Iraq will ultimately travel toward true Western-style democracy." Iraq "is still testing the limits of responsible free speech, and some of the name-calling and rumor-mongering that goes on clearly oversteps the boundaries. Many of Mr. Qadir's criticisms exceeded what would be tolerated in other Middle East countries, particularly his assertions about the sexual proclivities of the Barzani clan. A number of Kurdish journalists who have called Mr. Qadir's imprisonment outrageous say they are nevertheless uncomfortable with some of his writings, calling them offensive and reckless."

Arrest Of Police Strains Relations Between Iraqis, UK Troops. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Moore, 958K) reports, "Tensions continued to simmer Wednesday between local Iraqi officials and British troops in the Shiite-dominated southern city of Basra, where the British this week arrested 14 law enforcement officials, including two senior police intelligence officers, allegedly linked to political corruption and assassinations. The British released several of the men Wednesday, but a spokesman for the Basra provincial council said that eight remained in custody, including three who had been transferred to a prison facility after British authorities said they had bomb-making materials in their possession. … The province has responded to the arrests by threatening to cut off all cooperation with British forces in Iraq's second-largest city."

Soldiers Make Digital Memorials For Fallen Comrades. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Searcey, 2.11M) reports, "Digital photography, video and Internet access have let soldiers in Iraq stay closer to distant friends and family than troops in any other war. Now, these electronic records are also creating a powerful and raw new wave of war memorials. … Wartime cinematographers say commanders ask to review the videos before they're shown at memorial services to make sure they don't degrade the image of soldiers with, for example, footage showing them drinking."

Hoagland Says Administration Has Been "Bitten" By Reality In Iraq. Jim Hoagland writes in the Washington Post (1/26, A25, 744K), "Iraq's Dec. 15 balloting was orderly and inspiring, but it has created an aftermath that is neither of those things. It has also forced the Bush administration into a silent reassessment of where Iraq is going and how it is going to get there. Increasingly, the country drifts toward the future as two relatively stable autonomous regions and a violently unstable central zone, all linked by a weak central government and a reduced, reactive U.S. military presence." The Bush Administration "gives no sign of trying to hurry things along as it concedes it must deal with the election results it has, not the results it wanted. Those were canceled by the poor showing of Ayad Allawi and Ahmed Chalabi -- secularists who conceivably could have been strong, independent executives -- and successful electioneering by Iranian-backed Shiite parties distrusted by Washington. … Reality has bitten the Bush administration in Iraq and forced the president to settle for less than he wanted. Let's hope that reality can now do the same with Iraq's newly empowered Shiite leaders."

In 1998, Clinton Said No-Fly Zones Over Iraq Would Be Enforced. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (1/26, 90K) excerpts a December 28,, 1998 statement by then-President Bill Clinton. Clinton said, "I think I should say a few words about an incident early this morning over the skies of Iraq, where American and British air crews were enforcing a no-fly zone in Northern Iraq. They were fired on by Iraqi surface-to-air missiles. They took evasive action, returned fire on the missile site, and returned safely to their base in Turkey ... They attacked because they were attacked. And they did the appropriate thing. We will continue to enforce the no-fly zones."

Musharaff Blames US Missile Attack For Increasing Domestic Turmoil. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Champion, Kempe, 2.11M) in an interview with Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf at the World Economic Forum reports Musharraf "said a suspected U.S. missile attack on a Pakistani village that killed civilians this month 'probably' killed five or six al Qaeda operatives, but had

'harmed our interests' by violating his country's sovereignty and feeding domestic unrest." He "said his goal is to transform Pakistani society by ending conflicts like the one in Baluchistan, defusing Islamist extremism and generally calming 'a nation in turmoil.'" Gen. Musharraf said, "We want to guard our own sovereignty." He "also said his close cooperation with the U.S. in the fight against terrorism hadn't been damaged, and that Pakistan needs the technical help the U.S. can offer to gather intelligence. 'Intelligence is far more significant and difficult than operating against [al Qaeda],' he added."

India Provides Aid To Afghanistan. The Washington Times (1/26, Nelson, 90K) reports, "India has poured more than a half-billion dollars of foreign aid into Afghanistan in the past three years in an attempt to create a friendly and stable neighbor in a volatile part of the world." India's "effort, which continues despite a Pakistani blockade of Indian goods bound for Afghanistan, touches all aspects of life." Tensions "between India and Pakistan has complicated proposed energy pipelines from Afghanistan, which would have to run through Pakistan on the way to India." But some observers "think Pakistan is more worried about losing its dominant position in Afghan trade."

Rumsfeld Takes Issue With Reports Saying US Military Is Overstretched. Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Hume) reported, "A couple of new reports suggesting that the US military is overstretched or overstressed or both drew a sharp response from the Secretary of Defense. One report was funded by the Pentagon itself." Fox (Baier) added, "On Capitol Hill today, former officials from the Clinton Administration joined top Democrats to release a new study on the state of the US armed forces. Titled 'The US Military -- Under Strain And At Risk,' it concludes the war in Iraq threatened the battle-readiness of US troops. … At the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld addressed the criticism head on." Rumsfeld "said today's US military, while trying to recover from underfunding…is far from broken." Rumsfeld "pointed out there are more than 2 million troops in the US military if you're counting active duty, National Guard and Reserves and only 136,000 troops in Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 5, :45, Williams) reported, "Two new reports say tonight the US military is so overburdened from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that it's near the breaking point. One report flatly warns ground forces are stretched so thin and under such enormous strain, the Pentagon may not be able to recruit and retain enough troops in the all volunteer army to defeat the insurgency. This afternoon, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld responded." Rumsfeld: "This armed force is enormously capable. In addition, it's battle hardened. And it is not a peace time force that has been in barracks or garrisons." Williams: "Rumsfeld pointed out that there are 138,000 US troops in Iraq, out of two million total including the National Guard and Reserve units."

In a brief story The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 3, :45, Schieffer) noted, "Rumsfeld took strong issue today with former Clinton Administration officials who say the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have stretched the US military to the near breaking point. At a Pentagon news conference, Rumsfeld called that misdirected, and he praised the military as, quote, 'enormously capable and battle hardened.'"

The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/26) says Rumsfeld "spoke a day after the Associated Press reported that an unreleased study conducted for the Pentagon said the Army is being overextended, thanks to the two wars, and may not be able to retain and recruit enough troops to defeat the insurgency in Iraq. Congressional Democrats released a report Wednesday that also concluded the U.S. military is under severe stress."

The Washington Times (1/26, Scarborough, 90K) reports that Rumsfeld responded to the reports with a "combative appearance at a Pentagon press conference. He reminded reporters that during the Clinton years, when the military was sent on about 50 war and peacekeeping missions, that the force suffered from lack of funding and that some units were 'hollow pieces.'" Rumsfeld "said anyone who concludes that the Army is breaking does not know what he or she is talking about. 'I suspect the people writing these things don't know, either, because I suspect that they don't have any more insight than the other people around here do,' he said. 'I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they're close to breaking. That's just not the case.'"

USA Today (1/26, Komarow, 2.31M) says Rumsfeld "dismissed" the reports, "calling their authors ill-informed about America's 'battle-hardened' forces." Speaking at a news conference, Rumsfeld said, "People just don't fully understand," adding that today's military is "battle hardened. It's not a peacetime force that has been in barracks or garrisons."

The Washington Post (1/26, A18, Tyson, 744K) reports that Rumsfeld "said a recent decision to scale back U.S. troop levels in Iraq did not grow out of a need to relieve the strain on American ground forces." Rumsfeld said, "The force is not broken," adding, "I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they're close to breaking. That's just not the case." Rumsfeld called the US military an "'enormously capable force,' as demonstrated to the world by its swift overthrow of governments in Iraq and Afghanistan. Such proven capability

'ought to increase the deterrent rather than weaken it,' he added."

Study Finds Active Duty Reservists Earn More Than In Civilian Jobs. A study released yesterday by the RAND Corporation says that nearly three-fourths of military reservists called to serve in Afghanistan and Iraq are making more money on duty than in their civilian jobs. USA Today (1/26, Komarow, 2.31M) reports, "In many cases, the troops earn a higher gross salary in civilian life. But when the federal tax exemption and other allowances approved by Congress for troops in combat are factored in, about 72% are better off, according to a study by the RAND Corp., a research institute. The RAND study, which was funded by the Pentagon, showed an average benefit of 25% over civilian pay, about $10,000 a year." USA notes, "The study results run counter to complaints by Reserve and Guard troops that they have suffered financially when activated. It is part of an effort to track the war on terrorism's effects on part-time troops."

DOJ:

Federal Judge Extends Temporary Appointment Of Alabama US Attorney. The Mobile (AL) Register (1/26, Kirby) reports, "Chief U.S. District Judge Ginny Granade has extended the term of U.S. Attorney Deborah Rhodes, whose temporary appointment to the Mobile office expires this month." The Register continues, "Rhodes took over for David York, who resigned in September amid reports of an internal Department of Justice investigation into allegations that he had an improper relationship with an assistant prosecutor." The Register adds, "Under the law, the Justice Department could replace York for a maximum of 120 days. The statute gives the chief judge of the district the power to name the U.S. attorney beyond that, and Granade said Tuesday that she complied with a request by the Justice Department to extend Rhodes' tenure until President Bush names a permanent successor. … When appointed to Mobile, Rhodes, 47, was on special assignment to the Justice Department in Washington as a counselor to the assistant attorney general of the criminal division."

DHS Assisting DOJ With Case Management System. Federal Computer Week (1/25, Arnone) reports, "The Homeland Security Department is helping the Justice Department develop new case management systems for the entire federal government, DHS' chief information officer said today." FCW continues, "DHS is working with DOJ to create a Consolidated Enforcement Environment (CEE), which allows access to all available data, analyzes data and links relevant law enforcement partners, DHS' CIO Scott Charbo said. … One goal of the collaboration is to move beyond products and create a layer of information that can be used governmentwide, Charbo said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Trial Seen As Big Test For Federal Prosecutors. The New York Times (1/26, Eichenwald) reports, "In the court of public opinion, they were convicted long ago. But as Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, the onetime leaders of Enron, step into a court of law next week, the outcome of their fraud trial is far from certain, creating one of the most closely watched and hotly contested white-collar criminal cases ever." The Times continues, "On one side of the Houston federal courtroom starting Monday will be two top-flight teams of defense lawyers, who will be taking the risky approach of proclaiming many of the controversial actions of Enron and some much-criticized statements of their clients to be legal and truthful." The Times adds, "On the other, the prosecutors for the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, who have racked up an impressive array of guilty pleas in the case, but whose performance at trial has been decidedly less dazzling. … 'For the government, if they lose the Enron case, it will be seen as a symbolic failure of their rather significant campaign against white-collar crime,' said John C. Coffee Jr., a professor at Columbia Law School. 'It will be seen as some evidence that some cases are too complicated to be brought into the criminal justice process.'" The Times notes, "Of the three major Enron-related criminal cases brought by the government before juries, guilty verdicts stand from only one, which involved Enron's booking what the government said were phantom profits on the sale of Nigerian barges to Merrill Lynch. A second case, against the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, was thrown out by the Supreme Court on appeal. The third, involving the broadband division of Enron, resulted in no convictions, but the five defendants await a retrial."

Success Of Efforts To Curb Corporate Fraud Seen As Problematic. The Washington Post (1/26, D1, Johnson, Ben White) reports, "Four years after the collapse of Enron Corp. spurred the most sweeping revisions in business regulation since the Great Depression, experts warn that the ingredients for a similar financial disaster remain." The Post continues, "Despite new laws and regulations, companies still face enormous pressure to meet short-term financial goals, creating a powerful motive for accounting fraud. Outsized executive compensation grows by the year, offering another rich incentive to cook the books. And there is no certainty that Congress will continue to fund regulatory budgets at current levels. … But some things have changed since December

2001, when Enron's sudden descent into bankruptcy protection rocked investor confidence and left the markets reeling. Accountants face independent oversight for the first time in 70 years. Most corporate board members take their jobs far more seriously. Wall Street is somewhat less willing to accommodate clients' interests." The Post adds, "Nearly a dozen experts contacted by The Washington Post, including regulators, accountants, chief executives, board members and investor advocates, agreed to fill out a corporate governance report card on the eve of the Enron trial. … Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in July 2002, imposing new duties on corporate executives, auditors and directors. The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department spent tens of millions of dollars to root out malfeasance. Along the way, prosecutors won criminal convictions and decades-long prison terms for former leaders of Adelphia Communications Corp., Tyco International Ltd. and WorldCom Inc. … But in a sense, the government efforts may have backfired, inspiring a dangerous overconfidence among investors."

Ex-Enron Employees Still Feel Effects Of Stock Price Plummet. USA Today (1/26, Armour, 2.31M) reports, "Four years after the Texas energy giant began its meltdown -- and on the eve of a criminal trial for its former top executives -- many former Enron employees still feel betrayed." Some of them, "at the end of their careers, have started over again in new jobs -- but working harder to keep up with younger co-workers. They've turned to churches and food pantries to eat, sold homes they could no longer pay for, and endured financial stresses that frayed their marriages."

Former Securities Broker Pleads Guilty To New York Market-Timing Charge. The AP (1/26, Gormley) reports, "A former Las Vegas securities broker pleaded guilty to a felony charge Wednesday in a mutual fund investigation in which investors were defrauded through improper late trading and market timing, according to New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer." The AP continues, "Daniel Calugar, 52, now of Ponte Vedra, Fla., pleaded guilty in state Supreme Court in New York City to violating a state business integrity law called the Martin Act. He was accused of entering into a secret agreement in August, 2001, that defrauded a mutual fund called the Franklin Small-Mid Cap Growth Fund. … He faces up to four years in prison when he is sentenced March 23." The AP adds, "Earlier this month, Calugar agreed to pay $153 million to settle civil charges brought by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. Calugar will relinquish $103 million in ill-gotten gains and pay a civil penalty of $50 million, the largest penalty regulators have imposed on an individual in a late trading and market timing case, SEC officials said. … Spitzer said Calugar secretly agreed to a deal with an employee of Franklin's investment adviser. Calugar would be allowed to rapidly trade in the mutual fund without paying a 2 percent penalty. Calugar then invested $10 million in another hedge fund run by Franklin and defrauded the fund and its shareholders of more than $1 million in fees that he avoided."

Livedoor Investigation Prompts Re-Examination of Japanese Accounting Standards. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Hayashi, Morse) reports, "The investigation into Internet company Livedoor Co. has pointed a spotlight" on Japanese accounting standards, which need to be upgraded, the article says. The Journal notes, "Tokyo district prosecutors arrested Livedoor Chief Executive Takafumi Horie on suspicion of violating securities law." Now, "in Japan, experts … are calling for stepped-up efforts to improve accounting standards, as companies .... increasingly use sophisticated and aggressive financial techniques." In particular, the article notes, "Japan has no standards on accounting for special-purpose companies," and no rules "on how to interpret revenue at Internet and software companies, whose business structures tend to differ significantly from those of traditional companies." However, the article notes, changes are beginning to take place, with the Financial Services Agency issuing "a guideline calling for closer examination of accounting firms and requiring companies to rotate their accountants more frequently" and the Accounting Standards Board of Japan adopting "a handful of standards in the past two months, covering areas from mergers and acquisitions to executive compensation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Leahy Seeks Information From DOJ On Google Subpoena. Reuters (1/26, Vicini) reports, "The Senate Judiciary Committee's top Democrat asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales what steps are being taken to protect Americans' privacy rights as the Justice Department demands information about Internet searches." Reuters continues, "In the letter released on Wednesday, Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont asked Gonzales about the subpoena to Google Inc. and three other companies seeking data about what millions of Americans search for on the Internet's leading search engines." Reuters adds, "Leahy asked about the types of information being sought, how the department intends to use the information while protecting individual privacy rights and civil liberties and whether it will issue any additional subpoenas. … Leahy's letter comes at a time of growing criticism in Congress over the government's monitoring of communications, after the disclosure that the

Bush administration has been conducting domestic eavesdropping after the September 11 attacks."

CNET News (1/25, Broache) reports, "Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said the department planned to respond accordingly, though he was not sure what the response would entail. … As for the privacy concerns raised by Leahy, 'We've addressed that in our subpoenas and to the search engines,' Miller said. 'We weren't seeking information about the individuals, we were only seeking the search terms....We don't even want to know the names of the people.'"

Rep Davis Questions Google's Response To Subpoeana. Government Computer News (1/25, Grimes) reports, "House Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) said today that search giant Google Inc. has 'bent over backward' to comply with the Chinese government's demand that it block certain search results in order to operate in that country. So why, he wondered, won't the company cooperate with the U.S. Justice Department in its efforts to fight online pornography?" GCN continues, "Google has refused a Justice Department subpoena for search results, saying it violated users' privacy. The government has said it needs the data to prepare a case regarding the 1998 Child Online Protection Act. … Other search companies have complied with the subpoena. … The company today also launched a Chinese version of its search site after agreeing to censor topics such as Falun Gong and Tibet. … 'Google gave the Chinese everything they wanted. They're not going to put data on there about human rights,' Davis said." GCN notes, "Davis spoke to public-sector CIOs today at a summit hosted by Micrsosoft Corp. Microsoft's MSN service also censors search results in China, as do Yahoo and others. Microsoft, Yahoo and America Online have also reportedly given the Justice Department information it was seeking. … 'What does it mean to be a corporate citizen, working to bring terrorists or child pornographers to bear? What are the boundaries?' Davis said. 'These are new areas for a lot of us that we've got to work our way through.'"

Dow Jones (1/25, Richmond) reports, "In the last week, Google Inc. stood up to one government and acquiesced to another. … The moves show the kind of treacherous terrain the Internet giant, whose corporate philosophy is 'Don't Be Evil,' must traverse as it weighs its ideals and its business interests. It also spotlights how important Google (GOOG) has become as a key waypoint on the global Internet, where individual and government interests around access to information can and do collide. … 'Google is at the cutting edge in terms of trying to figure out what is acceptable and what is not acceptable in this century,' when the Internet is making information more accessible than ever before, says Lauren Gelman, associate director of Stanford Law School's Center for Internet and Society. 'What happens to information Google collects? I think this is a big question for society as new technologies evolve and we have to rethink privacy and censorship.'"

The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Macdonald) reports that Google is confronting "an age-old business dilemma caught up in the new age of globalization: When governments demand something that compromises the interests of customers, what's a company to do?" The article notes that Google launched service in China and "because of government sensitivities there, will limit what users there can access." However, the article says, Google is also "vigorously fighting US government efforts to obtain data on its users' search habits." The article quotes one expert who lauds Google's decision to fight the subpoena, and another who dislikes Google's decision. The article notes that "So far, Google seems to be winning points for its tough stand against the US Department of Justice. According to one survey released this week, 56 percent of American users of the Internet believe Google should not release information about Web searches to the government." But overseas, the article says, "Google has endured criticism, as has Microsoft's MSN search service, for limiting what Chinese users can find."

Debate In Google Case Not Really About Privacy. The New York Times (1/26, Liptak) reports, "The Justice Department went to court last week to try to force Google, by far the world's largest Internet search engine, to turn over an entire week's worth of searches. The move, which Google is fighting, has alarmed its users, enraged privacy advocates, changed some people's Internet search habits and set off a debate about how much privacy one can expect on the Web. … But the case itself, according to people involved in it and scholars who are following it, has almost nothing to do with privacy. It will turn, instead, on serious but relatively routine questions about trade secrets and civil procedure." The Times continues, "The privacy debate prompted by the case may thus be an instance of the right answer to the wrong question. As recently demonstrated by disclosures of surveillance by the National Security Agency and secret inquiries under the USA Patriot Act, the government is aggressively collecting information to combat terror. And even in ordinary criminal prosecutions and in civil lawsuits, Internet companies including Google routinely turn over authentically private information in response to focused warrants and subpoenas from prosecutors and litigants. … But 'this particular subpoena does not raise serious privacy issues,' said Timothy Wu, a law professor at Columbia. 'These records are completely disconnected. They're just strings of words.'" The Times notes, "In its only extended discussion of its reasons for fighting the subpoena, a Google lawyer told the Justice Department in October that complying would be bad for business. 'Google objects,' the lawyer, Ashok Ramani, wrote,

'because to comply with the request could endanger its crown-jewel trade secrets.' … Mr. Ramani's five-page letter mentioned privacy only once, at the bottom of the fourth page, and then primarily in the context of perception rather than reality. … Even Google's allies are shying away from legal arguments based on privacy. The American Civil Liberties Union, for instance, said it planned to file papers supporting Google. But not on privacy grounds. 'We will probably not be making that argument,' said Aden J. Fine, a lawyer with the civil liberties union." The Times adds, "Other Internet search engine companies, including Yahoo, America Online and MSN, have complied with the same Justice Department subpoena, which also sought a random sample of a million Web addresses. The companies all said there were no privacy issues involved. … A Justice Department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, agreed. 'We specifically stated in our requests,' he said, 'that we did not want the names, or any other information, regarding the users of Google.' … None of this is to say that subpoenas for search records linked to individuals are inconceivable. Google maintains information that could be used that way, and a subpoena could ask for it. But the recent subpoena does not."

Louisiana Businessman Pleads Guilty To New Orleans Contract Fraud. The AP (1/26) reports, "A businessman described by federal prosecutors as a key player pleaded guilty Wednesday to conspiring in a kickback scheme for the biggest contract signed while Marc Morial was New Orleans mayor. Terry Songy "admitted taking kickbacks from subcontractors, participating in a larger kickback conspiracy with the city's director of property management, and failing to file federal income tax returns for 2001, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said." The AP notes, "An affidavit filed with the guilty plea states that, after FBI agents approached him, Songy 'admitted his involvement in a much larger scheme than the government was aware' of. … The indictment described Songy as sharing hundreds of thousands of dollars in kickbacks with the three major defendants: Morial associates Stan 'Pampy' Barre, a restaurant owner and Morial confidant, city property manager Kerry De Cay, and construction company owner Reginald Walker. … All three have denied wrongdoing. Their trial is scheduled Sept. 5 before U.S. District Judge Carl Barbier."

Six Indicted On Bribery Charges In Ongoing Tennessee License Fraud Probe. The Tennessean (1/26, Carey) reports, "A widespread bribery scheme funneled hundreds of illegal aliens into a Winchester, Tenn.-based driving school, netting them fraudulent licenses. And six people, including one current and one former state employee, got more than $146,000, federal prosecutors said yesterday. The U.S. attorney's office yesterday unsealed a six-count indictment of the six people who are accused of helping hundreds of people since May 2004 obtain driver's licenses they didn't earn. … 'Just as in previous investigations, you had those who thought that what they did in secret would never come to light,' said My Harrison, FBI special agent in charge for the Middle and Western Districts of Tennessee. The FBI was one of several agencies involved in the probe. U.S. Attorney Jim Vines said the people who fraudulently received licenses weren't eligible for 'a variety of reasons.'" The Tennessean adds, "The investigation, dubbed Operation Crooked Highway, has been under way by federal and state agencies for 18 months, Vines said yesterday." The Murfreesboro Daily News (1/26) notes, "The FBI charged driver's license examiner Bruce Conklin with taking about $9,200 in cash from July 2005 to January. Agents also charged Bryan Guess, owner of the Winchester Driving School…with paying bribes to Conklin and a former examiner, Teresa Jones.

The AP (1/26) reports, "Authorities said they won't know how many illegal documents were issued until all evidence is studied and declined to speculate on the total. They did say that one state worker accepted $20 per student in bribes for about 1,000 licenses or certificates. 'We come to you with another sad chapter in the book of public corruption in Tennessee,' FBI agent in charge My Harrison said at an afternoon news conference." The AP adds, "Citing a number of recent public corruption investigations in Tennessee, Harrison said agents were getting better with practice. 'If you can hear me and are involved in public corruption, the eyes of law enforcement are upon you,' she said." The Nashville City Paper (1/26, Lewis) also notes Harrison said that "it's the latest 'sad chapter' in a string of Tennessee public corruption cases." She added, "You've heard of Operation Tennessee Waltz, Operation Tarnish Blue and Operation Tarnish Shield. What can I say? Same game, only the names have changed. The title of this new chapter is, Operation Crooked Highway." The City Paper adds that as a result of the investigation, "customs officials took into custody 50 undocumented immigrants and began deportation proceedings against 50 other immigrants who were uncovered in the investigation, said Rick Crocker, assistant special agent in charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement."

IRS Agent Downplays Ryan's Eventual Declaration Of Campaign Funds As Income. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, O'Connor, 643K) reports IRS Agent Shari Schindler "on Wednesday downplayed that former Gov. George Ryan filed corrected tax returns for 1995, 1996 and 1997 several years later because Ryan knew by then of the federal investigation into his finances." Schindler "said that by the time Ryan filed the amended returns in late 2002, each of his six children had testified before the grand jury and there had been press coverage of the nature of the probe." On cross-examination, Ryan lawyer Dan Webb "contended that records showed Ryan had paid taxes on most of the travel expenses, but that certain charges hadn't been itemized in campaign disclosure reports, fell through the cracks and mistakenly weren't reported on Ryan's returns." But Assistant US Attorney Laurie Barsella "pointed out that Roger Bickel, Ryan's former chief lawyer, had spelled out for Ryan 'in plain English' that personal use of campaign funds had to be reported on his tax returns." The AP (1/26, Robinson) notes that the "verbal fencing match between" Webb and Schindler "came to an end with no one sure who emerged the victor. Webb repeatedly tried to get her to agree that Ryan couldn't be blamed if he failed to report thousands of dollars in income because he was grappling with vague, complex tax laws. Schindler coolly disagreed, saying Ryan easily could have asked his tax advisers."

Prosecution Hopes To Rest Thursday After FBI Agent's Testimony. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, O'Connor, 643K) also reports Assistant US Attorney Patrick Collins "said he still hopes to rest the prosecution case on Thursday after four months of testimony. The FBI's case agent is scheduled to be the government's last witness." And US District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer "ruled Wednesday that prosecutors can play a portion of a videotape of Ryan from November when he made a statement to reporters outside the court defending his receipt of $9,675 from the Gramm campaign." The AP (1/26, Robinson) notes, "Prosecutors indicated Wednesday night that just one more prosecution witness remains - Raymond Ruebenson, the veteran FBI man who has long been the case agent for the government's seven-year Operation Safe Road investigation that led to the former governor's indictment. But Ruebenson was absent with a case of the flu Wednesday.

Laski Vows To Fight Bribery Charges, Alleges US Withheld Exculpatory Recordings. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, Washburn, 643K) reports, "Facing federal corruption charges, a defiant James Laski vowed Wednesday to 'keep fighting,' insisted his office is running smoothly and took sharp issue with claims he was away from his job as Chicago city clerk for a prolonged period before charges were filed. 'Somebody is lying, and it isn't me,' Laski declared. The clerk's comments came after a surprise appearance at a City Council committee meeting, his first visit to the council chamber in nearly two months." The Tribune adds, "Laski implied Wednesday that exonerating portions of the recordings were not released when the U.S. attorney's office announced the charges against him on Jan. 13."

Former Campbell Aides Testify About Relationship With Contractor. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/26, Suggs, Scott, 430K) reports former Atlanta contracts compliance director Michael Sullivan testified at former Mayor Bill Campbell's corruption trial on Wednesday "that in 1994 he and the former mayor, along with city contractor Ricky Rowe, traveled together to Florida to attend a golf and tennis tournament sponsored by Black Enterprise magazine. Sullivan said the city paid for his trip. He said he was unsure of who paid for Campbell's but noticed that when he and Rowe were checking out of the hotel, Rowe used his credit card for Campbell's incidentals. … 'He was upset that I allowed Mr. Rowe to pay for his incidentals,' Sullivan told the jury. 'He told me that you can't use a credit card to pay for things like that. It leaves a trail.'" The Journal-Constitution adds, "The theme of loyalty to the mayor was played over and over Wednesday, witness after witness, as prosecutors tried to establish that City Hall under Campbell…was a den of cronyism and deal-making between Campbell, his friends and political allies. None of the prosecution's witnesses testified that Campbell made them do anything illegal, nor did they say they saw Campbell doing anything criminal."

Wisconsin Procurement Official Indicted Over Travel Contract Award. The AP (1/26) reports, "An official in Gov. Jim Doyle's administration was indicted on two felony counts Tuesday for her role in awarding a state travel contract to a company whose executives donated $20,000 to Doyle's campaign. The federal indictment alleges that Georgia Thompson, chief of the Department of Administration's procurement bureau, tried to give her bosses political advantage and help her own job security." The AP notes Thompson, "who was hired before Doyle took office in 2003, served on a committee that awarded a contract to Adelman Travel as part of an effort to cut travel costs. … Questions were raised this summer after media reports that Adelman's CEO donated $10,000 to Doyle before the contract went into effect. An Adelman board member gave another $10,000 afterward, finance reports show."

Former New Jersey Councilman Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering. The Farmingdale (NJ) News Transcript (1/25, Front Page, Israeli) reports former Marlboro Township Councilman Thomas Broderick "pleaded guilty in federal court last week to one count of money laundering. … Broderick was one of the 11 Monmouth County officials who were arrested…in an FBI investigation known as 'Operation Bid Rig.' … Broderick admitted that he accepted $15,000 for assisting in the laundering of large sums of cash from a cooperating government witness whom he believed was a corrupt demolition contractor." The News Transcript notes, "He is scheduled to be sentenced on April 27. Broderick remains free on $50,000 bail."

Contractor Sentenced To Probation, Fine For SoCom Bribery Scheme. The Tampa Tribune (1/26, Lardner) reports, "A contractor formerly employed by U.S. Special Operations Command was sentenced Wednesday to three years probation and a $4,500 fine for his role in a bribery scheme that has tarnished the war fighting organization's reputation for acquiring equipment used by the nation's elite fighting forces. U.S. District Judge Susan Bucklew, who called William E. Burke's crime 'scary' and a 'bad thing,' could have saddled him with a prison term of up to 16 months and a heftier fine. But Bucklew opted for the lighter penalties mainly because Burke has been cooperating with federal law enforcement agents examining contracting practices at Socom, which is headquartered at MacDill Air Force Base in Tampa."

Texas Hired Abramoff-Linked Firm Due To Access To Rove. The AP (1/26) reports the Texas state government "hired a firm with close ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff after rejecting competing bids that met more of its selection criteria and cost less." The Austin American-Statesman reported that Cassidy & Associates, the winning firm, has access "all the way to presidential aide Karl Rove. … The firm was awarded a $15,000-a-month contract in 2004 to lobby Congress for the state." On Friday, seven Democratic Texas state legislators sent a letter to Gov. Rick Perry "demanding that Cassidy's contract be canceled."

California Man Pleads Guilty To Cyber Attack. Federal Computer Week (1/26, Brewin) reports, "A hacker indicted for creating botnet armies that infected Defense Information Systems Agency networks and computers at the Naval Air Warfare Center at China Lake, Calif., pleaded guilty to the charges at a hearing earlier this week in the U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, the Justice Department said." FCW continues, "Justice said James Ancheta 20, of Downey, Calif, entered guilty pleas of conspiring to violate the Computer Fraud Abuse Act and causing damage to computers used in national defense." FCW adds, "Justice said the prosecution of Ancheta was the first of its kind in the United States against a hacker who used botnets, armies of computers infected with Trojan horse programs that allowed Ancheta to remotely control the computers. Justice said Ancheta controlled more than 400,000 computers as part of his botnet armies, which in turn infected other computers with unwanted adware."

Former Dietary Supplement Company Executives Admit $100 Million Mail Fraud. The AP (1/26) reports, "Former executives of a mail-order firm admitted that the company bilked buyers out of more than $100 million by charging credit cards without permission and offering refund guarantees it had no intention of honoring. Four former executives of Berkeley Premium Nutraceuticals Inc. detailed their involvement Wednesday with the Cincinnati-based company that sold vitamins and supplements for a variety of ills from fatigue to sexual disfunction. The four executives filed written statements as part of an agreement to plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati to charges of conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud. Federal agencies -- including the FBI, the Internal Revenue Service and the Food and Drug Administration -- have been investigating Berkeley." The AP adds, "The former executives said Berkeley's vitamins and supplements…weren't supported by strong medical proof, according to court documents."

Jury Convicts Palestinian Man Of Being Iraqi Agent. The AP (1/26, Callahan) reports, "Jurors on Wednesday convicted a Palestinian migrant accused of being an Iraqi agent on six federal charges but could not reach a decision on a charge that he tried to sell to Saddam Hussein's regime the names of U.S. operatives and agents." The AP continues, "Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, 53, showed little reaction as the federal jury returned its verdicts finding him guilty of six of seven counts, including acting as an unregistered foreign agent, violating sanctions against Iraq, conspiracy and witness tampering. … They could not decide his guilt on a charge of violating the International Emergency Economic Powers Act by allegedly trying in late 2002 to sell U.S. intelligence secrets to Iraq for $3 million. No evidence was presented during his trial, however, that he had access to that classified information. … U.S. District Judge John Tinder set sentencing for April 13 on the six convictions." The AP notes, "Shaaban represented himself during an 11-day trial that included testimony by a former Iraqi intelligence officer. He repeatedly contended that the government had confused him with a dead identical twin brother who worked for the CIA."

Three Kidnap Suspects Face Federal Charges In Ohio. Cox News Service (1/26, Giordano, Hardy) reports, "The FBI on Wednesday brought criminal charges against three people accused in the abduction, assault and robbery of a Miami University freshman." Cox continues, "Sidney R. Jones, 23, of Richmond, Ind.; Katrina L. Jones, 18, of Oxford; and Seth R. Jett, 21, of Richmond were turned over to federal custody Monday by local authorities, Special Agent Michael E. Brooks said. … The three had been detained at the Butler County Jail following their arrests Jan. 14 and 15 stemming from a case involving MU freshman Ryan Coli. … The charges were the result of a joint effort by the U.S. Marshals Service and the FBI in three states." Cox adds, "The three appeared Wednesday in U.S. District Court

(in Oxford, OH) where Magistrate Judge Timothy S. Hogan ordered them held pending a detention hearing Jan. 30, when the court will determine bond."

Supreme Court To Hear Lethal Injection Case. The Washington Post (1/26, A3, Lane, 744K) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed yesterday to decide when death row inmates may challenge lethal injection as a method of capital punishment, in a surprise decision issued after the justices dramatically stopped the execution of a Florida prisoner who was already strapped to a gurney preparing to die." The High Court said it will hear convicted murderer Clarence Hill's "claim that he should have an opportunity to argue that his civil rights would be violated because the chemicals used to execute him would cause excessive pain. It is a claim that has been pressed with growing frequency by capital defense lawyers around the country in recent years -- but that has generally not yet succeeded, either in lower courts or at the Supreme Court."

The AP (1/26, Holland) reports, "Lethal injections are used in most states that have capital punishment, and there's been a growing dispute over the way they are carried out. … The Supreme Court has never found a specific form of execution to be cruel and unusual punishment, and the latest case from Florida does not give Court members that opportunity. The justices will, however, spell out what options are available to inmates with last-minute challenges to the way they will be put to death." The AP adds, "Florida inmate Clarence Hill, who filed the appeal, had been strapped to a gurney with intravenous lines running into his arms Tuesday night when he won a temporary Supreme Court stay, Hill's lawyer said. The stay was signed by Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. … The full Court announced Wednesday that the stay would be permanent until justices decide whether an appeals court was wrong to prevent Hill from challenging the lethal injection method. … The argument is expected April 26, with a ruling before July."

Texas Executes Man For 1992 Murders. The Associated Press (1/25) reported that Marion Dudley, an "Alabama man who was part of a ring that shuttled drugs from Texas to his home state was executed [Wednesday] for the slayings of four people in Houston nearly 14 years ago." But the AP noted that Dudley maintained he wasn't at the house where the murders occurred the night of June 20, 1992, when "six people were shot, four of them fatally, in what authorities said was a drug dealer ripoff." Dudley was "the first Texas inmate put to death this year." The wire service added, "Besides Dudley, Arthur 'Squirt' Brown, of Tuscaloosa, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. Now 35, he remains on death row. A third man, Tony Dunson, also from Alabama and 19 at the time of the shootings, received a life sentence."

ID Theft Complaints Rising, But Rate Of Increase Down. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Conkey) reports, "Businesses, law-enforcement agencies and consumers may be beginning to turn the tide in the war against identity theft, data from the Federal Trade Commission suggest. Identity-theft complaints were up again last year to nearly 256,000, the FTC said, but that was only 3.5% higher than the year before. In 2004, complaints rose by 15% and in 2003 by 33%. … Industry officials and analysts say the development and widespread adoption of antifraud technologies are responsible for lower levels of card fraud." The article also said, "the FTC is expected to announce today tough action against" ChoicePoint Inc., which "is expected to agree to pay a multimillion-dollar penalty to settle alleged data-security violations stemming from a yearlong investigation by federal regulators, according to a person briefed on the matter."

Jury Reject Insanity Defense, Convicts Killer of Accused Pedophile Priest. The New York Times (1/26, Zezima) reports, "Rejecting an insanity defense, a state jury on Wednesday convicted an inmate of the prison murder of John J. Geoghan, a defrocked priest who was accused of molesting 150 boys. … Judge Francis R. Fecteau of Worcester District Court sentenced the inmate, Joseph L. Druce, to life in prison without parole, in addition to the life sentence he is serving for another murder. … Prosecutors argued that Mr. Druce was a calculated killer who planned the murder for weeks and saw Mr. Geoghan as a trophy. But Mr. Druce's lawyer, John LaChance, painted his client as someone who 'never had a chance,' unwanted from birth and the victim of physical and sexual abuse for much of his childhood and teenage years."

Girl's Death Highlights "Dual-Track" Handling Of Abuse Reports. The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Ridberg) reports, "Calls to New York's child-abuse hot line have spiked dramatically ever since Nixzmary Brown was buried." The Monitor notes that the girl, allegedly killed by her stepfather, "captured the hearts and minds of New Yorkers who never want to see such a tragedy happen again." However, the article says, "the city is left with the tall task of distinguishing the serious cases of abuse from reports of neglect. This is one of the most controversial challenges facing social welfare systems nationwide." The article says that some states have adopted a dual-track system that divides complaints "into two groups." This approach "aims to ease systems overburdened with poverty-related neglect reports and focus aggressive tactics on the rarer cases of abuse," the article says. It "has been adopted in various states, including Michigan, Missouri, Minnesota, and North Carolina. In Minnesota, one recent study shows the law improved the safety of children by providing better services for families such as food." However, the article notes, New York City fears that under a dual-track approach "an abused child may be handled as a neglect case."

Fairfax County, VA, Police "Accidentally" Shoot, Kill Optometrist Suspected Of Gambling. The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Jackman) reports, "Fairfax County's police chief said yesterday that one of his officers accidentally shot and killed an optometrist outside the unarmed man's townhouse Tuesday night as an undercover detective was about to arrest him on suspicion of gambling on sports. Police had been secretly making bets with Salvatore J. Culosi Jr., 37, since October as part of a gambling investigation, according to court records." In the incident, "Culosi came out of his townhouse on Cavalier Landing Court about 9:35 p.m. and was standing next to the detective's sport-utility vehicle, police said, when the detective gave a signal to tactical officers assembled nearby to move in and arrest Culosi. 'As they approached him . . . one officer's weapon, a handgun, was unintentionally discharged,' said Fairfax Police Chief David M. Rohrer. Culosi was not making any threatening moves when he was shot once in the upper part of his body, police said. He was taken to Inova Fairfax Hospital, where he was pronounced dead."

Crimes Prompt DC Police To Beef Up Presence In Neighborhood. The Washington Post (1/26, B1, Schwartzman) reports, "A spate of crimes outside Adams Morgan clubs and bars, including two assaults in which victims were left in critical condition, has prompted police to plan greater deployment in the area. … A business group plans to supplement the effort with a contingent of security guards and off-duty police to patrol the area on weekends, said Josh Gibson, executive director of Adams Morgan's newly formed business improvement district. Thousands of people pour into Adams Morgan on weekend nights, drawn by its cafes and clubs."

Father Charged With Gun Offenses In Daycare Shooting. The Washington Post (1/26, B1, Londoño) reports that John L. Hall, who is the "father of an 8-year-old boy arrested in the shooting of a 7-year-old girl at their Germantown day-care center provided his son with violent video games and showed him how to cock and release a gun hammer the day before the boy pulled the trigger, a prosecutor said yesterday" at Hall's bond hearing. The Post reports, "Hall's sister, Darlene Hall, 53, disputed the prosecutor's characterization of her brother's influence over the child." The article adds, "Montgomery District Court Judge Mary Beth McCormick reduced Hall's bond to $75,000 yesterday after authorities charged him Tuesday with leaving a firearm within reach of an unsupervised minor and two other gun charges."

NYTimes Columnist Pans Show About Innocence On Death Row. In a New York Times (1/26) column, Joshua Marquis disapproves of a new ABC drama called "In Justice." He writes, "'In Justice' has received dismal reviews. But that hasn't stopped its premise from permeating the conventional wisdom: that our prisons are chock-full of doe-eyed innocents who have been framed by venal prosecutors and corrupt police officers with the help of grossly incompetent public defenders." Calling this "a misconception that has run through our popular culture," Marquis notes that "only 14 Americans who were once on death row have been exonerated by DNA evidence alone. The hordes of Americans wrongfully convicted exist primarily on Planet Hollywood." Marquis says that it is "understandable that journalists focus on the rare case in which an innocent man or woman is sent to prison." However, he says, "The larger issue is whether those who influence the culture, like an enormous television network, have a moral responsibility to keep the facts straight regardless of their thirst for drama. 'In Justice' may soon find itself on the canceled list, but several million people will still have watched it, and they are likely to have the impression that wrongfully convicted death row inmates are the virtual rule."

Times Writer Wistful For Buttafuoco Era. In a New York Times (1/26) column, Lawrence Downes writes, "Before Angie and Brad, before Monica and Bill, there was Amy and Joey. Amy Fisher and Joey Buttafuoco — the Long Island Lolita and her body-shop lover — with Joey's wife, Mary Jo, formed a triangle of passion, obsession and violence that became the industry standard for tabloid crime way, way back in 1992. There is an entire generation, or at least a cohort, or maybe a handful, or at least one or two journalists who remember working on that day in May when the story broke, and who still marvel at how that strange crime — a housewife in a swanky suburb shot in the face — soon became much stranger. It swelled in significance until it made headlines coast to coast and around the globe. … I miss the Buttafuoco era. Joey and Amy were the Sid Caesar and Howdy Doody of reality TV, relics of a simpler time when crime sold newspapers — imagine that — and when the culture tended to look down on adultery and teenage prostitutes, and when attempted murder carried a hint of shame, which presumably was why Amy, in her perp walk, went to the trouble of hiding her face with her long brown hair."

Former Kentucky GE Plant Supervisor Files Whistleblower Suit. The AP (1/26) reports, "A former supervisor at a General Electric Co. plant has filed $50.5 million federal lawsuit that claims that he was fired for testifying that GE shipped defective parts to military and commercial customers." The AP continues, "James Richard Gardner, of Madisonville, filed the suit Friday in U.S. District Court in Louisville. Gardner said he repeatedly alerted managers at the Madisonville plant that engine turbine blades were not meeting company and government specifications and that defective parts were shipped with the knowledge of managers to meet production requirements." The AP adds, "Marta Rhyner, a GE spokeswoman, said she couldn't comment on specific allegations made in the lawsuit. She said the company is 'confident in the parts produced by our employees at Madisonville.' … The Defense Department began a criminal investigation at the plant in November 2000. The Justice Department is conducting a civil investigation."

Judge Rules Trustee Request Could Jeopardize Adelphia Bankruptcy. The New York Law Journal (1/26, Lin) reports, "In a decision released Wednesday in the Chapter 11 bankruptcy of cable company Adelphia Communications, the presiding judge said the motions by which one group of creditors sought the appointment of a trustee to oversee disputes and the disqualification of chief Adelphia bankruptcy counsel Willkie Farr & Gallagher constituted a 'nuclear war button' threatening obliteration of a crucial $17.6 billion deal." The Journal continues, "Southern District of New York Bankruptcy Judge Robert Gerber's strongly worded 113-page decision, In re Adelphia, 02-41729, previously filed under seal, clarified his order issued earlier in the week denying the appointment of a trustee but granting the disqualification of Willkie lawyers from participating in the disputes at issue. Willkie remains bankruptcy counsel to Adelphia. … Those disputes, which the requested trustee would have overseen, are between different groups of debt holders, all seeking to maximize their own claims on the bankruptcy estate, most of the assets of which are slated to be sold to rival cable companies Time Warner and Comcast for $17.6 billion." The Journal adds, "The potential appointment of a bankruptcy trustee is almost always controversial, as such trustees are usually granted broad-ranging powers to settle disputes or dispose of assets. … Gerber said the disqualification and trustee motions, brought in November by noteholders of Arahova, a subsidiary through which Adelphia issued some $540 million in debt, seemed designed to 'purposefully' imperil that sale as part of a 'scorched earth litigation strategy' aimed at extracting a larger distribution by threatening dire consequences for all."

GSA's Networx Contract Award Delayed By Unexpectedly High Number Of Bids. The Washington Post (1/26, D5, Mohammed, 744K) reports, "The General Services Administration said yesterday that it got more bids than expected for a $20 billion telecommunications contract known as Networx," a "10-year telecom contract, the largest ever to be awarded by the GSA," which is "forcing the agency to delay the award so it can evaluate the complex proposals."

Lockheed Loses Spy Plane Contract. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A1, Karp, 2.11M) reports, "In 2004, Lockheed Martin Corp. won an Army spy-plane contract that broke with the past." Instead of building it, they "would serve as the 'lead integrator' -- stuffing somebody else's hardware with high-tech eavesdropping gear." However, "Lockheed engineers proved unable to load the airframe they were buying from Brazil with the equipment the Army wanted. Earlier this month, the Army scrapped Lockheed's contract," in "a setback for Chief Executive Robert Stevens and his young 'integrated solutions' division," and "a signal for the entire defense industry that de-emphasizing old-style hardware in favor of software and systems management isn't a sure path to success."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Virginia Likely To Vote On Gay Marriage Ban; Similar Measure Unveiled In Maryland. The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Jenkins, 744K) reports, "The state Senate all but guaranteed on Wednesday that Virginia will hold a November referendum on whether to amend its 230-year-old Bill of Rights to bar same-sex marriages. The Senate voted 28 to 11 to follow the House of Delegates in approving the amendment. Though each chamber still must pass the measure adopted by the other, their wording is identical and support among the senators and delegates is strong." Meanwhile, Maryland Republicans "introduced a similar measure in the Senate on Wednesday and said they believe they have the votes they need to bring the matter to an up-or-down vote, despite resistance from leaders of the Democrat-controlled legislature. In the wake of a circuit court ruling last week that declared Maryland's 33-year-old ban on same-sex marriage discriminatory, GOP leaders said it was important to at least put the matter to a vote."

The Washington Times (1/26, Bellantoni, Miller, 90K) notes that Maryland Democratic leaders "appear reluctant to put a constitutional amendment on the ballot because it could energize conservative voters in an election year in which Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, is seeking re-election, and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, also a Republican, is running for the U.S. Senate." The Times adds, "In Virginia, state Sen. Stephen D. Newman said the constitutional amendment is necessary to guard against 'aggressive' judges in other states, including Maryland, who are trying to redefine marriage. 'A few judges or a few localities are now presuming to change that fundamental meaning for our civilization and their actions have created confusion on the issue,' the Lynchburg Republican said. 'The federal courts are going to leave us with no other recourse.'"

FBI Mississippi SAC Says Report Could Rewrite Till Story. The AP (1/26) reports, "An FBI report on the decades-old murder of 14-year-old Emmett Till could rewrite the story of the slaying that put a young man's face on racial injustice in the South during that period." The AP adds that "some details of the crime could have been distorted or embellished over the past five decades, the FBI special agent in charge of Mississippi, John G. Raucci, told The Associated Press this week. 'The facts were told one way because that's the information that was available at the time,' Raucci said. 'And often times it's through urban legends and folklore -- and people who lived in the community pass along information from generation to generation -- and the next thing you know, they become fact.' Raucci did not rule out the possibility of indictments in the case or provide a timetable for releasing the report." The AP notes that the FBI report "should soon be turned over to District Attorney Joyce Chiles in Greenville. 'That does not necessarily mean that everybody involved in the Emmett Till case or the overt act is still alive or will one day be prosecuted,' Raucci said. … 'Evidence may no longer be available. Individuals who may have witnessed an event, time has now gotten the better of their minds.'"

FBI Reaching Out To NC Hispanics In New Human Trafficking Initiative. The Charlotte Observer (1/25, Ordoñez, 234K) reports that with funding from the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act, "The FBI is launching a new effort to raise awareness of human trafficking. Calling it an offense against humanity akin to modern-day slavery, the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Charlotte estimates thousands of victims are trafficked into the state each year for forced labor and prostitution. 'This is something that is flying under the radar,' said Special Agent Kevin Kendrick, who is heading the local campaign. … In conjunction with increased investigative efforts to shut down human trafficking rings, the FBI is teaming up with local advocacy groups and social organizations to get a message out that federal agents should be trusted and not feared. The FBI, Kendrick said, is looking to assist all victims of human trafficking, even if they're living in the country illegally. Not only will the FBI protect victims and their rights, Kendrick said, the agency also will help them remain permanently." The Observer adds, "'This is a reprehensible problem,' said Assistant Special Agent Robert Clifford. 'We'd look at every weapon in FBI's arsenal to countering human trafficking.' … 'We need to let people know it's OK to contact us,' Kendrick said. 'This is an affront against humanity. This goes far past someone's immigration status.'"

Georgia Lawmakers Approve Voter ID Bill. The AP (1/25) reports, "A birth certificate might not be enough to vote in Georgia this year - legislation sent to the governor Wednesday would require photo identification before voters could cast their ballots." The AP continues, "Gov. Sonny Perdue said he would sign it quickly to give counties time to prepare for the primary in July and the general election in November. … The U.S. Justice Department also must approve the requirement before it takes effect." The AP adds, "The legislation would require voters to have a driver's license, military ID or state-issued identification card with a photo. Social Security cards, birth certificates and utility bills would no longer be accepted. … Supporters said it would help fight voter fraud. Critics argued it would disenfranchise the poor, minorities or elderly - people who are less likely to have driver's licenses."

5th Circuit Rules Against Shreveport In Race Bias Suit. The Shreveport (LA) Times (1/26, McCabe) reports, "A federal appellate court changed its stance and ruled today in favor of plaintiffs in a discrimination lawsuit against the city of Shreveport and its Fire Department, overturning a lower court's decision to dismiss the five-year-old case." The Times continues, "The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals remanded the heart of the discrimination case back to U.S. District Court in Shreveport. … The petition originally was brought against the city in 2000 by Todd Dean, who was not hired by the Fire Department and felt the city's hiring practices discriminated against him because he is white. Dean earned a higher test score than some blacks hired then, his lawsuit alleges. Other men joined the lawsuit soon after." The Times adds, "The 5th Circuit's ruling should compel the city not only to cease race-based hiring procedures in all departments, but also to re-evaluate the continued validity of all city programs that incorporate race as a criteria for participation," said local attorney Pamela R. Jones, who represented Dean, Shawn Sanders and Jason Matthews in the lawsuit. … The department ended race-based hiring practices 11 months before a federal magistrate dismissed Dean's case in December 2004 hoping to avoid further lawsuits, according to officials. Now the department relies on a pass/fail civil service exam, the educational background and technical training of each candidate and psychological and physical ability exams. … The city has maintained that the Fire Department's hiring practices are based on a complaint brought by the U.S. Justice Department in 1980 that said the department had discriminated against blacks and women. Up to that point, the department had hired only three black men in its history, according to court records."

SIU Changes Web Descriptions Of Challenged Fellowships. The AP (1/26) reports, "While threatened with a federal lawsuit over three graduate fellowships the government considers discriminatory, Southern Illinois University has tweaked the descriptions of at least two of those scholarship programs on its Web site." The AP continues, "The fellowships at issue were said to specifically target minorities or 'underrepresented groups,' before the Justice Department objected last year, but the site now says those programs seek to help 'underserved' populations. … The revisions come as SIU administrators are weighing a Justice Department proposal that would head off a lawsuit threatened by the government, which in demanding that SIU discontinue the fellowship programs has accused the university of engaging in 'intentional discrimination against whites, non-preferred minorities and males.'" The AP adds, "The university has refused to publicly discuss the proposal it got from the Justice Department last week, saying only that administrators and key constituency groups were being tapped this week for feedback before the university responds. … David Gross, a spokesman for the SIU system, said Wednesday the Web site changes were done without the consent of the university's president, the Carbondale school's chancellor or the system's legal counsel and 'do not reflect the proposed offer from Department of Justice.'"

Judge Orders EEOC To Pay $1 Million To Law Firm For Frivolous Action. The AP (1/26) reports, "The U.S. Equal Opportunity Employment Commission must pay more than $1 million to a law firm that it sued unsuccessfully for allegations of sexual harassment and pregnancy discrimination, a federal judge has ruled." The AP continues, "The EEOC action was a 'frivolous' lawsuit against Robert L. Reeves & Associates, which practices immigration law, U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian said in a ruling issued Monday." The AP adds, "Reeves maintained that the EEOC should have known the harassment and discrimination allegations the agency was pursuing were part of a scheme by two of his former law associates to destroy his firm, said a statement from lawyers representing Reeves. … The EEOC has already appealed the judge's findings, said Anna Park, the EEOC regional attorney in charge of the Los Angeles district office's legal division."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Offers To Release Part of Its Source Code In EU Antitrust Case. The Financial Times (1/26, Buck) reports, "Microsoft made a concession in its six-year dispute with European competition regulators on Wednesday by offering to give rivals access to parts of its Windows source code. With only three weeks until a compliance deadline set by Brussels, which had threatened fines of €2m ($2.5m) a day, Brad Smith, the group's general counsel, said: 'We are putting our most valuable intellectual property on the table.' … Microsoft's offer … came in response to a European Commission warning last month that it would impose fines unless the software group complied quickly with Brussels' 2004 antitrust ruling against the US group. The daily fines would come on top of the record €497m payment the Commission ordered in 2004. The regulator said Microsoft had failed to comply with a part of the ruling requiring the software group to share information about its Windows operating system."

The USA Today (1/26, Acohido) reports, "The European Commission issued a terse statement saying it would 'study carefully' Microsoft's announcement 'once it has received the full details.' … This is not the first time Microsoft has let outsiders view such code. It has granted governments, academics and business partners varying levels of access under tight restrictions."

Reuters (1/25, Lawsky, Zawadzki) reports, "Critics of Microsoft contend that protocols are standard software and that Microsoft has used what is essentially a digital combination lock to make them inaccessible. … A Commission spokesman said if that turns out to be true then Microsoft has no right to charge for them. … However, Microsoft says that the protocols include valuable patents and that it should be able to charge for their use, an argument under review at the Commission."

The AP (1/25) reports, "The company's chief counsel, Brad Smith, said sharing the part of the Windows workgroup server operating system and desktop software code that helps rival PCs communicate with Windows servers was 'a bold stroke' that should answer both EU and U.S. regulators' concerns. .. He insisted that Microsoft had already complied in December with an EU order to supply technical information by handing over up to 12,000 pages of documentation and offering 500 hours of free technical support to rivals worth some $100,000. … An independent monitor nominated by Microsoft found last month that the documents were 'totally unfit for its intended purpose.'"

Move Comes After Justice Department Complaints. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Jacoby) reports, "The move came after the Justice Department complained in a court filing this week about Microsoft's compliance with U.S. legal requirements -- and six years after a U.S. judge found Microsoft violated the Sherman Antitrust Act against monopoly abuse. The Justice Department said the Redmond, Wash., software giant had provided inaccurate information to a technical committee, and described one incident as 'particularly troubling' because it delayed an investigative team that had traveled to India. The filing also said the company had 'fallen significantly behind' in complying with monitors' technical requests. … In 2001, the Bush administration dropped the U.S. government's case against Microsoft, but ordered it to change certain anticompetitive practices."

Guidant Accepts Boston Scientific's Takeover Offer. USA Today (1/26, Iwata) reports, "Medical device maker Guidant on Wednesday accepted Boston Scientific's $27 billion bid, rebuffing a lower offer from Johnson & Johnson and ending a long-running takeover war." USA continues, "The companies have been vying for an edge in the growing multibillion-dollar market for medical and heart devices, and Guidant's pacemakers, defibrillators and stents made it an attractive acquisition target. … The merger, to be completed early this year, will make Boston Scientific the world's No. 2 maker of implantable pacemakers and defibrillators. Boston Scientific also will gain share in the market for heart stent devices, which hold open blood vessels." USA adds, "Most Wall Street analysts and some Guidant investors had urged Guidant to take the pricier Boston Scientific offer, calling it a better long-term investment than J&J's deal. The combined company will have $9 billion in revenue in 2006, Boston Scientific says. … To help close the deal and appease antitrust regulators, Boston Scientific teamed with Abbott Laboratories. Abbott will pay Boston Scientific $6.4 billion in cash to buy Guidant's vascular intervention and endovascular businesses." … Approvals are needed from U.S. and European regulators, plus shareholders for both companies."

The New York Times (1/26, Feder) reports, "For Johnson & Johnson, Tuesday started with a morning conference call with analysts to discuss earnings and ended with William C. Weldon, the company's chief executive, and Robert J. Darretta Jr., the chief financial officer, attending a dinner for several dozen institutional investors at the '21' Club in New York. Throughout the day and evening, the company maintained a rigid silence about the one subject on everyone's mind — whether it would respond to a midnight deadline to counter Boston Scientific's bold $27 billion offer for Guidant." The Times notes that Johnson & Johnson released a statement yesterday "saying the company had 'determined not to increase its last offer for Guidant Corporation, because to do so would not have been in the best interest of its shareholders.' About the only comment was its reminder that Guidant was obliged to pay it a $705 million breakup fee by today. … It was a remarkably quiet conclusion to the biggest and most contentious takeover battle yet in the medical device industry. The outcome leaves Boston Scientific as the apparent winner of Guidant, the No. 2 company in the $10 billion market for defibrillators and other implantable devices that regulate human heartbeats."

BlackBerry Injunction Hearing Set For Feb. 24. The Wall Street Journal (1/26) reports, "BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. and NTP Inc. will appear in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia Feb. 24 for the court to consider a shutdown of U.S. sales and service of the popular wireless email device. In recent court filings, RIM, based in Waterloo, Ontario, argued a BlackBerry shutdown isn't warranted for various reasons, including recent preliminary moves by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to reject NTP's wireless email patents. NTP, a Virginia patent holding concern, argues a BlackBerry shutdown is appropriate, since the court has already found RIM infringed on NTP's patents and case law calls for such a shutdown. The court could rule on the injunction as early as Feb. 24 or in the days following, an NTP lawyer said."

NYTimes Says Pixar-Disney Deal Is Chance To Reform Disney's Creative Culture. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) editorializes, "A company like" Pixar "— and a figure like Mr. Jobs, notable for his dynamic role at both Apple and Pixar — doesn't let itself be bought for money alone, though the money is certainly enticing enough. This is really an opportunity to infect, and change, the creative culture of Disney, which, back in its founder's day, used to be one of the most creative places around" but whose "animated films have been nothing to shout about in the past decade or so." For Pixar and Apple the deal has "only an upside," and "the same is true for Disney, especially if it keeps shedding the ways of Mr. Eisner's old company and allows itself to become what may turn out to be, in the end, Mr. Jobs's company after all."

Three ELF Activists Indicted On Ecoterror Charges In California. Reuters (1/26, Fitzgerald) reports, "A federal grand jury indicted three alleged 'eco-terrorists' on Wednesday on charges of plotting to blow up facilities like dams and cell phone towers. 'These three individuals planned to commit a number of dangerous and destructive acts in our region, all in the name of the Environmental Liberation Front,' U.S. Attorney McGregor

Scott told a news conference in the California state capital." Eric McDavid, Zachary Jenson and Lauren Weiner were "arrested January 13 outside a retail store in Auburn, California, following six months of surveillance of McDavid by federal authorities. … The charges were not related to a separate 65-count indictment handed down on Monday in Washington involving 11 environmental and animal rights activists in the Western United States." Scott "said the trio rented a house east of Sacramento in the foothills where they engaged in bomb-making. At some point, the three were joined by an unnamed woman who was a government informant. 'Because of the exceptional work of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and the brave efforts of a confidential source they were prevented from carrying out their planned attacks,' the U.S. Attorney said."

EPA Seeks Ban On Chemicals Used In Cookware. USA Today (1/26, Weise) reports, "In a surprise turn Wednesday, the Environmental Protection Agency moved to eliminate the production of a suspected carcinogen used in the making of Teflon and other non-stick and non-stain coatings. The EPA has asked eight manufacturers that use a family of chemicals known as perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA, to reduce production 95% by 2010 and to stop using it altogether by 2015. … Environmentalists and consumer groups have long dogged the agency to act. 'The science is still coming in, but the concern is there, so acting now to minimize future releases of PFOA is the right thing to do for our environment and our health'" says Susan Hazen of EPA's Office of Prevention, Pesticides and Toxic Substances." According to the article, "EPA officials are calling for voluntary PFOA cutbacks because 'under the Toxic Substances Control Act, they don't have authority to ban it,' says Richard Wiles of the Environmental Working Group, a public interest group that has long fought to bring public attention to PFOA in the environment." Wiles says that if the chemicals are phased out, it "will be 'the single biggest action the agency has ever taken.'"

The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Eilperin) reports favorable coverage of the EPA for this action. It quotes Ken Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group, who says, "'This is one of those days when the Environmental Protection Agency is at its best. With its announcement today, the EPA is challenging an entire industry to err on the side of precaution and public safety, and invent new ways of doing business. … As harshly as we have singled out DuPont for criticism for its past handling of PFOA pollution, today we want to single out and commend the company and acknowledge its leadership going forward."

DuPont Targeted. USA Today and the Post both note that DuPont was a particular target in the PFOA deal. In the first paragraph of its story, The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Eilperin) says, "Eight U.S. companies, including giant DuPont Co., agreed yesterday to virtually eliminate a harmful chemical used to make Teflon from all consumer products coated with the ubiquitous nonstick material." Both the Post and USA Today note that DuPont recently agreed to a $6.5 million settlement with the EPA over charges that it hid information about the dangers of PFOA.

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 7, 2:50, Vargas) reported, "Today, the government asked companies to virtually eliminate" a chemical used to make Teflon "over the next nine years." Ross: "Today, the Federal government said DuPont had virtually agreed to eliminate any new emissions of the key Teflon chemical at its factories." Susan Hazen EPA: "This is the right thing to do. And we are going to move forward with it." The New York Times (1/26, Janofsky, 1.19M) adds, "DuPont immediately pledged to join the" voluntary program," along with "3M/Dyneon, Arkema, Asahi, Ciba, Clariant, Daikin and Solvay Solexis." The EPA says that "full compliance by the companies and their overseas affiliates would lead to a 95 percent reduction by 2010 in use of the substance, perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA, and to their total elimination by 2015."

Video Highlights Problems With Federal Mine Safety Oversight. NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 8, 2:30, Williams) reported, "Those two West Virginia mining disasters have now focused a lot of attention on mine safety in this country." A videotape tape shows "the perils of digging for coal. And the often lax oversight of this nation's mines." NBC (Myers) added, "This is the inside of Coal Creek Mine in southeastern Kentucky. Videotaped by a miner who smuggled a camera into work in June 2004 to document what he said were dangerous conditions." Edwin Pennington "is crushed under this slab of rock 200 feet long." One "safety official who investigated Pennington's death says his tragedy underscores a widespread problem in mines across the country. He says fines are too small to induce companies to fix hazards and the entire system has no teeth." Tony Oppegard, former Mine Safety & Health official: "The company has been going on about its business for the last year and a half without any consequences thus far."

Bush To Push For Reprocessing Of Spent Nuclear Fuel. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Fialka, 2.11M) reports, "The Bush administration plans to announce a $250 million initiative to reprocess spent nuclear fuel, a first step toward reversing a 1970s policy that rejected reprocessing as too dangerous to pursue." The Administration's "decision to put the money into its fiscal 2007 budget to test new technologies is part of an effort to jump-start the nuclear-power industry at a time when energy prices are high and concerns about global warming make nuclear power plants more acceptable." The Journal adds, "According to nuclear industry officials and others briefed on the proposal in recent weeks, the program could be announced as early as next week in President Bush's State of the Union address. If the technology works, it could vastly reduce the amount of spent nuclear waste that would have to be buried in underground storage, such as at Nevada's Yucca Mountain, set to open after 2012."

The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Baker, Linzer, 744K) adds the fuel proposal "is part of a broader push by the president for domestic and global nuclear energy. With worldwide energy demands on the rise and U.S. reliance on foreign oil increasing, Bush has held out nuclear power as a solution that will not affect global warming."

Gore Documentary On Global Warming Has Premiere At Sundance Festival. The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Booth, 744K) reports that ex-Vice President Al Gore's documentary on global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth," "had its world premiere at the Sundance Film Festival on Tuesday night before an enthusiastic audience that gave the former vice president and his movie a big standing O. Among the film's lessons: Earth's glaciers are melting, the polar bears are screwed, each year sets new heat records." The Post notes, "The core of the film is a one-man, ever-evolving multimedia slide show that Gore assembled himself. A little-known fact: Since his defeat by George W. Bush in 2000, Gore has traveled the globe with his bar graphs, staging event after event for small, invited audiences. Free of charge. And he's presented one version or another of this slide show, by his own estimation, a thousand times. … In the film, Gore presents the latest evidence to demonstrate how the accumulation of carbon dioxide and other pollutants of the industrial age are increasing temperatures."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Recuses Himself From Trade School Probe. Under the headline "F.B.I. Director Recused From Investigation Of Weld's Former School," The New York Times (1/26, Healy, 1.19M) reports in "Metro Briefing" that "The F.B.I. director will not play a role in the inquiry into Decker College, the Kentucky school once run by William F. Weld, because the director and Mr. Weld, a Republican candidate for governor, are friends and former colleagues, an F.B.I. spokesman said yesterday. … The New York Democratic Party had asked that Mr. Mueller recuse himself, according to a party spokesman. Mr. Weld has not been accused of any wrongdoing involving Decker, which declared bankruptcy last fall amid allegations of fraud."

Under the headline "Weld's Pal Off Inquiry," The New York Post (1/25, Dicker, 624K) reported yesterday, "FBI spokesman Richard Kolko told The Post that while the Decker probe was being handled by the special agent in charge of the Louisville, Ky., field office, Mueller himself is 'regularly briefed on significant investigations and cases.' And while Kolko insisted Mueller 'has not had a role in directing any part of this investigation,' he said, 'since the issue has been raised publicly, and to avoid even the appearance of any conflict, any decisions that would otherwise be made by the director in this matter will, instead, be handled by Deputy Director John Pistole.' Kolko's announcement came a few hours after state Democratic Chairman Herman 'Denny' Farrell joined D'Amato in urging Mueller to step aside. … Farrell said Weld and Mueller were 'good friends' during the 1980s when both served in the U.S. Attorney's office in Boston. He said Mueller had also contributed to Weld's unsuccessful U.S. Senate campaign against incumbent John Kerry of Massachusetts in 1996."

Minnesota Attorney Charged In Internet Pharmacy Scheme. The AP (1/26) reports, "A lawyer has been indicted (in Minneapolis) on federal charges alleging he helped an Internet pharmacy illegally obtain narcotics and helped its founder hide assets." The AP continues, "Daniel Adkins, who was general counsel for Xpress Pharmacy Direct, helped deceive legitimate pharmacies into supplying the narcotics that Xpress hawked over the Internet and by telephone, according to the indictment issued Tuesday." The AP adds, 'Federal authorities say Xpress filled about 72,000 illegal prescriptions for pain killers and other controlled substances, generating sales of about $20 million. Authorities shut down Xpress last May and company founder Christopher Smith, his accountant and a doctor who issued prescriptions were indicted in August. … The indictment alleges that Adkins helped Smith hide assets after they learned about the investigation. It also alleges that Adkins wrote to legitimate pharmacies from which Xpress ordered drugs, assuring them that Xpress was 'both legal and authorized by federal and state statutes.' … Adkins was charged with conspiracy to distribute and dispense controlled substances, wire fraud; unlawful distribution and dispensing of controlled substances and misbranding drugs. If convicted of wire fraud he could face up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine, the U.S. attorney's office said."

Drug Ring's Alleged Second-In-Command Pleads Guilty. The Knoxville (TN) News-Sentinel (1/26, Satterfield) reports, "Admitting crimes that could lock him away for life made Stephen 'Black' Ardis downright scared Wednesday. Ardis, who was captured on secret recordings expressing worries that an undercover agent he dubbed

'Superman' was on his trail, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to being second-in-command of a Detroit-to-Knoxville drug running operation. But the 26-year-old drug slinger made it clear before entering his plea that a possible life sentence was a scary proposition he wanted to avoid. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck said the massive amount of drugs Ardis conspired to put onto Knoxville's streets guarantees the Detroit man a 20-year prison term. … The drug ring was broken in November after a probe led by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Todd Lee and Knoxville Police Department Investigator Bruce Conkey. It was Conkey whom Ardis dubbed 'Superman' in a conversation secretly recorded by the agents during their investigation."

Prosecutor Delays Charges In Washington Bomb Case. The Tri-City (WA) Herald (1/25, Trumbo) reports, "Benton County prosecutors will need several weeks to decide potential charges against a Richland man who says he kept bomb-making material because he is a miner." The Herald continues, "Kevin D. Johnson, 49, was released from jail Friday, three days after Richland police arrested him at his home where they seized gunpowder, nitro-methane and about 20 pounds of ammonium nitrate. They also found six firearms." The Herald adds, "Prosecutor Andy Miller said Tuesday that no charges were filed during the 72-hour hold on Johnson because more investigation is needed. Items taken from the home also have to be analyzed by agents of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, he said. … 'To prove the elements of the case, we'd have to get the ATF to test the items,' Miller said. … Richland police Capt. Mike Cobb said an ATF agent told him Tuesday analysis of the items found at Johnson's home would be completed in two to four weeks. … Cobb said the investigation also involves 91 blasting caps that allegedly belonged to Johnson that were found Jan. 15 at a home in Franklin County. Cobb said officers discovered the caps in a closet of a man's home after they investigated a domestic violence complaint."

IMMIGRATION:

Daughter Of Former Chilean Dictator Pinochet May Seek Asylum In US. Reuters (1/26) reports, "The eldest daughter of former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet on Wednesday asked the United States to grant her political asylum after she fled tax charges in Chile, Chilean officials said." Reuters continues, "Lucia Pinochet Hiriart, 60, was being moved to an immigration detention center late on Wednesday after spending most of the day at Dulles International Airport near Washington, Chile's Foreign Relations Minister Ignacio Walker told local radio in Santiago. … Earlier, Interior Minister Francisco Vidal said Chile had been told that Pinochet Hiriart had asked for asylum. … 'In the coming two or three days we will have a decision from the United States which, I insist, will be a rejection (of asylum),' Walker said." Reuters adds, "U.S. officials would not confirm that Pinochet Hiriart had requested asylum. … 'Lucia Pinochet is currently in U.S. Customs and Border Protection custody at Dulles International Airport, pending resolution of her immigration status,' said Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security. … Pinochet Hiriart has been charged with tax fraud related to some $1 million in undeclared taxes and falsification of documents as part of a widening tax evasion and fraud investigation involving the Pinochet family."

Jury Finds "Survivor" Winner Hatch Guilty Of Tax Evasion. The AP (1/26, Henry) reports, "Richard Hatch, who won $1 million in the debut season of the reality show 'Survivor,' was found guilty Wednesday of failing to pay taxes on his winnings and taken straight to jail." The AP continues, "Hatch remained calm as the court clerk read the verdict. He waved goodbye to family members, then was handcuffed and taken into custody after U.S. District Judge Ernest Torres said he was a potential flight risk. … The charges carry up to 13 years in prison. Torres said he expected a sentence of between 33 months and 41 months, but said the time could be longer because prosecutors say Hatch committed perjury. Sentencing was scheduled for April 28." The AP adds, "Hatch, 44, was also convicted of evading taxes on $327,000 he earned as co-host of a Boston radio show and $28,000 in rent on property he owned. He was acquitted of seven bank, mail and wire fraud charges related to a charity, Horizon Bound, he planned to open for troubled youth. … Hatch's lawyer, John MacDonald, said he would appeal the verdict. He said Hatch was aware of the possibility of jail time."

Former Washington Man Wanted On Tax Charge Captured In Panama. The Puget Sound (WA) Business Journal (1/26) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice said Wednesday that former Renton resident David Struckman has been captured in Panama. Struckman had been charged by the Internal Revenue Service for running an operation that promoted tax-avoidance plans." The Journal continues, "Struckman was indicted in 2004 and charged with conspiracy to defraud the United States. He then "disappeared," according to a Justice Department spokeswoman. He was arrested in Panama earlier this month and deported, the department said, and will be transported to Western Washington." The Journal adds, "The government alleges that Struckman and four others sold 'Global Prosperity' wealth-building products, including videotapes, CDs and seminars, which 'included fraudulent methods of income tax elimination.' .. The seminars cost as much as $37,000 to attend and, according to the government, the group then concealed income earned from the products by using bogus trusts and offshore bank accounts."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Full Senate Begins Debate On Alito Confirmation. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "The full Senate debate is under way on Samuel Alito's nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court. A day after the judiciary committee cast the divided vote over Alito, Republicans and Democrats are voicing fierce support and opposition to the President's choice for the high court." Alito "met today with Republicans senators whose majority votes are expected to seal his confirmation despite strong Democratic opposition."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 3, 1:00, Williams) reported, "As the full Senate began debating his Supreme Court nomination, Judge Samuel Alito took something of a pre-victory lap on Capitol Hill, thanking Republicans who helped move his nomination to the expected finish line. On the Senate floor, Democrats continued to call him a bad choice, while Republicans praised him." Currently, "Alito has enough support to be confirmed right now."

The AP (1/26, Holland) also says Alito "took a victory lap in the Senate on Wednesday, accepting congratulations from Republican leaders as lawmakers moved toward confirming him in a largely party-line vote." Reuters (1/26) adds Alito "appeared to have the votes for confirmation…as the Senate began a bitter debate."

The Washington Times (1/26, Hurt, 90K) says Republicans "rounded up the 60 votes they need to block any attempt to filibuster his nomination." Meanwhile, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy "called the vote on the nomination 'the vote of a generation.'"

Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Angle) reported, "Though Alito appears to be on track for confirmation and though it appears Democrats aligned against Alito do not have the votes to sustain a filibuster, Virginia's Republican Senator George Allen felt it necessary to issue a warning today." Allen: "My reaction is if they move forward with such a filibuster, my reaction is, 'make my day.' We will enjoy pulling the constitutional trigger to allow Judge Alito a fair up-or-down vote."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 6, 1:15, Vargas) reported, "Senators were divided along party lines." Sen. Hillary Clinton: "Roe v. Wade is at-risk. The privacy of Americans is at-risk. Environmental safeguards, laws that protect workers from abuse or negligence. Laws, even, that keep machine guns off the streets. All these and many other, are imperiled." Sen. Edward Kennedy: "The record demonstrates that we cannot count on Judge Alito to blow the whistle when the President is out of bounds. He is a long-standing advocate of expanding executive power." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist: "Judge Alito deserves to become Justice Alito. And those who oppose him are smearing a decent and honorable man and posing an unfair political standard on all judicial nominees."

Bush Meets With Alito's Former Clerks. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported the President met "with about 40 people, Republicans and Democrats, who've clerked for Judge Alito. It is another attempt to drive home the administration's insistence that Alito is qualified and deserves a quick and fair up or down Senate vote."

Novak Says Red State Democrats Who Oppose Alito Regret Vote. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (1/26) writes that Sens. Kent Conrad and Byron Dorgan of North Dakota, "Bill Nelson of Florida, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, Ken Salazar of Colorado, Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, and Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas are red state Democrats who voted to confirm Chief Justice John Roberts. While Roberts is no less conservative than Alito…these Democrats who voted for the chief justice have been under intense pressure from the left to oppose Alito. All such senators may be willing to risk a politically unpopular 'no' vote, partly thanks to disappointing Senate Republican candidate recruitment this year." Novak notes, "The contention that President Bush's nominee is outside the 'mainstream' is the major talking point against Alito, but polls show support for him and his endorsement of spousal abortion notification. That debate's outcome may determine whether senators who vote against Alito will suffer at the polls this year and in the years ahead."

NYTimes Urges Democrats To Filibuster Alito's Nomination. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) editorialized that Alito's "elevation will come courtesy of a president whose grandiose vision of his own powers threatens to undermine the nation's basic philosophy of government --- and a Senate that seems eager to cooperate by rolling over and playing dead. It is hard to imagine a moment when it would be more appropriate for senators to fight for a principle. Even a losing battle would draw the public's attention to the import of this nomination." The Times adds, "Senate Democrats, who presented a united front against the nomination of Judge Alito in the Judiciary Committee, seem unwilling to risk the public criticism that might come with a filibuster -- particularly since there is very little chance it would work. Judge Alito's supporters would almost certainly be able to muster the 60 senators necessary to put the nomination to a final vote. A filibuster is a radical tool. It's easy to see why Democrats are frightened of it. But from our perspective, there are some things far more frightening. One of them is Samuel Alito on the Supreme Court."

Roberts, Alito Appointments Called Bush's Greatest Domestic Successes Since 2003. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) editorializes, "With at least 52 Senators already on record in support, it's clear that -- short of some smear ex machina -- liberal Democrats can't stop Samuel Alito from being confirmed to a seat on the Supreme Court. So it's a good moment to consider what this says about our politics and what it means for the Court as it enters a new era. One conclusion is that the confirmation of both Chief Justice John Roberts and Judge Alito marks the most important domestic success for President Bush since his 2003 tax cuts." The "Alito-Roberts ascendancy also marks a victory for the generation of legal conservatives who earned their stripes in the Reagan Administration. … The Roberts-Alito Court also represents a notable, and greatly satisfying, rebuke for the legal left and its 'borking' strategy."

Bush Resubmits Nominee Previously Blocked By Democrats. The Washington Post (1/26, A3, Babington, 744K) reports the White House "renominated Brett M. Kavanaugh to the US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. President Bush nominated Kavanaugh, the White House staff secretary, in July 2003, but he fell victim to intense battles between Senate Democrats and Republicans over numerous judicial appointments. A May 2005 bipartisan pact averted a showdown over judicial filibusters and enabled some contested nominees to win confirmation. But it left Kavanaugh in limbo." The Senate Judiciary Committee's eight Democrats "complained last year that Kavanaugh took several months to answer their written questions about his qualifications. Other Democrats have noted that Kavanaugh, 40, has limited courtroom experience and helped independent counsel Kenneth W. Starr pursue the Monica S. Lewinsky case during the Clinton presidency."

Abramoff Prosecutor Among Nominees To Federal Bench. The AP (1/26) reports, "President Bush on Wednesday nominated one of the Justice Department's lead prosecutors in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe to a U.S. District Court seat." The AP continues, "Noel Hillman, chief of the department's public integrity section, was nominated for the federal judgeship in New Jersey, where he served in the U.S. Attorney's office under Michael Chertoff, now secretary of Homeland Security." The AP adds, "The White House was poised to nominate Hillman last summer, after New Jersey's two Democratic senators took the opportunity to weigh in on Hillman and other nominees in exchange for lifting their objections to another candidate Bush had nominated in 2003. … Hillman will step down as chief of the public integrity unit next week, but remain in the Justice Department's criminal division until he is confirmed, a department official said. Andrew Lourie, a career prosecutor in Miami, will lead the public corruption-fighting office on a temporary basis, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss personnel matters. … Lourie performed the same role until Hillman took over early in 2003."

Bush Suggests Government Will Not Bail Out GM And Ford. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Cooper, McKinnon, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush said General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. should develop 'a product that's relevant' rather than look to Washington for help with their heavy pension obligations, and hinted he would take a dim view of a government bailout of the struggling auto makers." In an Oval Office interview, Bush "said that his administration has discussed the development of new fuel technologies with the nation's top two auto makers, which might make them more competitive, but that he has had no talks about the companies' finances." Asked if he had spoken to GM Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner or Ford Chairman and CEO William Clay Ford Jr., Mr. Bush replied, "Not about their balance sheets. … And I haven't been asked by any automobile manufacturer about a bailout." Asked if the government should take "any pre-emptive action," he said, "I think it's very important for the market to function." Bush "suggested he felt optimistic about the companies' prospects."

WPost Says Detroit, Congress Should Embrace "Competition." In an editorial titled "Managing Detroit," the Washington Post (1/26, A24, 744K) says, "It's not clear whether the GM and Ford restructuring plans will be enough to avert bankruptcy. Their difficulties may take on a more political tone, particularly since the Midwest is a key battleground for presidential campaign strategists." But "Congress needs to keep Motown's troubles in perspective. They are the result of competitive pressures that most parts of the US economy take for granted every day. And it is precisely by embracing competition that the United States has become the world's most powerful economy."

Bush Unlikely To Push Large Initiatives In State Of The Union Speech. The New York Times (1/26, Stevenson, 1.19M) reports, "Having stabilized his political standing after a difficult 2005, President Bush is heading into his State of the Union address on Tuesday intent primarily on retaining his party's slim majority in Congress this year and completing unfinished business from his existing agenda." Unlike last year, "when he used the occasion to kick off an ambitious and ultimately failed effort to overhaul Social Security, Mr. Bush seems unlikely to reshape the political landscape with his speech on Tuesday, members of both parties said." The Times adds, "Administration officials and other Republicans in Washington said Mr. Bush would focus on several topics, including health care, spending restraint, illegal immigration and the nation's international economic competitiveness, as well as an unapologetic restatement of his national security policy. Much of the speech, they said, will be tied together under a broad theme acknowledging that the United States is going through transitions that involve wrenching dislocation as well as opportunity." His aides "portray Mr. Bush as undaunted by the plague of setbacks last year that loosened his grip on his party and drove down his poll numbers, which although up from their lows last fall remain at anemic levels."

Bush Urged To Tackle Medicare Reform. David Gratzer, a physician and senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M), "Bush will cite rising health costs as a major problem for Americans and their businesses, and he will outline steps to strengthen health savings accounts as a remedy." But "he is unlikely to mention Medicare reform -- and that would be a mistake. Indeed, if the president is serious about health reform, he will have to tackle Medicare. And he can start by re-engaging a debate from 1999." Seven years ago, Sen. John Breaux and Rep. Bill Thomas "completed the final report of the National Bipartisan Commission on the Future of Medicare. Considering various reforms, they eventually settled on a proposal modeled after the popular Federal Employees Health Benefits Plan (FEHBP), which covers nine million federal employees and their families. Instead of today's one-size-fits-all Medicare structure, they envisioned a program where seniors choose among competing private plans. Since then, Washington has debated the size and scope of Medicare expansion -- such as the prescription benefit -- but the program itself has yet to be fundamentally rethought." It "needs to be, because faced with Medicare's rising costs over the past four decades, the only real response has been a bipartisan exercise in wage and price controls."

Protestors Sue For Spot During State Of The Union. The Washington Post (1/26, A6, Barker, 744K) reports, "Organizers planning a protest during President Bush's State of the Union address next week say they have been denied a permit to hold the demonstration around the U.S. Capitol Reflecting Pool because that area has been reclassified as part of the security perimeter for the day of the speech. The organizers of the Tuesday protest, called 'World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime,' say the National Park Service and the U.S. Capitol Police initially offered them the Capitol Reflecting Pool as a demonstration site but changed their minds. Demonstrators have been told to confine their gathering to the gravel walkways on the Mall between Third and Fourth streets, farther from the Capitol. The grassy areas are fenced off because they are being resodded." Travis Morales, one of the organizers of the demonstration, "said the group was offered use of the area around the Capitol Reflecting Pool on Jan. 10 and that the site was not then part of any security perimeter. But on Jan. 19, he said, the group was told the security area had been expanded to include the Reflecting Pool. He called the change 'politically motivated,' adding that the Bush administration 'is trying to push us so far away that we can't be seen or heard. … A protest not seen and a protest not heard is not a protest.'" The demonstrators "filed a federal lawsuit yesterday seeking a court order that would enable them to gather at the Capitol Reflecting Pool. U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina will convene a hearing, possibly today."

Many Liberals Upset Kaine Was Chosen To Respond To Bush. USA Today (1/26, Lawrence, 2.31M) reports, "Virginia Gov. Timothy Kaine lifted the Democratic Party's spirits last fall when he won in a conservative state and gave his fellow Democrats some ideas about how to replicate his success. The fruits of victory include the honor of being picked to respond to President Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday -- and the wrath of liberal bloggers wondering why Democrats didn't choose somebody else. Anybody else." The selection of Kaine, "a Roman Catholic who opposes gay marriage -- highlighted fault lines within the party. Bloggers on several liberal websites were furious for reasons including Kaine's looks, style and obscurity, his open talk about religion, his moderate positions and his inexperience in foreign affairs. 'What the hell are they thinking?' Arianna Huffington demanded on www.huffingtonpost.com. … Bloggers at dailykos.com, talkleft.com and other liberal sites showered cyberspace with alternatives: new faces — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer -- and famous faces -- Al Gore, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton."

Villaraigosa To Give Spanish-Language Response. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Chen, 958K) reports, "Congressional Democrats announced today that Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa will deliver the party's Spanish-language response to next week's State of the Union address. … This will be the third consecutive year that Democrats have offered a Spanish language response to Bush's speech. Two years ago, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico delivered the first such response. Last year, it was jointly given by then Rep. Robert Menendez, now a senator from New Jersey, and Sen. Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) added "Villaraigosa's remarks clearly will be aimed at helping Democrats reach out to Hispanic voters right here in the United States."

Effectiveness Of Health Savings Accounts Disputed. The New York Times (1/26, Freudenheim, 1.19M) reports, "Bush has made 'consumer-directed' health savings plans a cornerstone of his policy for addressing runaway medical costs, and he plans to push them again in the State of the Union address next week." But "so far there is little evidence that the approach is helping many consumers come to grips with the high price of health care," even though "the early results do offer some hope. More than two million people have signed up for the plans, which were created as part of Medicare overhaul legislation in 2003 but were not an option for many people until the health insurance sign-up season last fall. While that is a tiny fraction of the 180 million Americans with health insurance, some experts say the numbers show a notably fast adoption rate for a complicated new consumer program. By other measures, though, workers and employers have been slow to embrace health savings plans, which are intended to reduce corporate health care costs while giving individuals more control of their medical spending."

In his Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M), David Wessel criticizes Bush's "cure-all for health care," saying Bush argues for making "health care more like the market for tile and pipes." Adds Wessel, "Set aside the case that only a taxpayer-financed, government-organized solution works. A Republican president and Congress aren't going there, and a lot of Democrats are skeptical, too. … A bigger problem is that too many healthy (for now) Americans go without preventive care, and too many chronically ill Americans don't get care that would avoid costly, painful complications later. HSAs don't help there. And then there's the uncomfortable fact that 80% of health spending in the U.S. each year is spent on 8% of the population. Giving them tax breaks to buy health-insurance policies with $2,000 deductibles won't ensure that money is well spent."

Robert J. Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (1/26, 744K), "Americans want more health care for less money, and when they don't get it, they indict drug companies, insurers, trial lawyers and bureaucrats. Although these familiar scapegoats may not be blameless, the real problem is us. We demand the impossible. The changes we truly need are political. We need to reconnect people with the public consequences of their private acts. We should curb the subsidization of private insurance." Medicare recipients, "especially wealthier ones, should pay more of their bills." But "these changes won't happen because people don't want to see the costs. We don't have the health care system we need, but we do have the one we deserve."

Leavitt Says Government Moving To Solve Prescription Drug Program Problems. The Washington Times (1/26, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Administration officials yesterday told senators the new Medicare prescription-drug program has problems, but they're under control, and states will be reimbursed for covering seniors' prescription costs resulting from the glitches." Senators on the Finance Committee "seemed cautiously optimistic at the assurances, but some said Congress will still probably need to act. 'I think there's no question that the issue of prescription drugs will be back on the [Senate] floor in some form this year,' said Sen. Ron Wyden, Oregon Democrat." Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt said yesterday, "We've identified the problems, we're working on them and the plan gets better every day." He and Medicare chief Mark McClellan "had a private meeting yesterday with committee members to brief them on the situation."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 8, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "It is no secret the new Medicare prescription drug program is not off to a great start. Many elderly have been lost in the bureaucratic maze. Many have found themselves with no coverage at all." CBS (Andrews) added, "According to advocates for senior citizens, in thousands of cases so far, drugs might be covered under Medicare, but patients still need prior authorization before insurance actually covers the drug. The Center for Medicare Advocacy calls that sleight of hand. What's the sleight of hand?" Vicki Gottlich: "I think people were promised that they would be able to get all the drugs that they require, but they weren't told that they might have to go through a little extra." Andrews: "Medicare has ordered insurance plans to solve this saying, 'we expect prior authorization to be resolved at the point of service,' meaning the pharmacy counter. … So now in this transition to this massive new benefit, prior authorization is yet another complication in an already-troubled program."

OLC Urges Caution For Federal Employees On Nonprofit Boards. Government Executive (1/26, Pulliam) reports, "Agencies should be careful about allowing employees to serve on the boards of nonprofit organizations that have an interest in their work, according to a recent opinion published by the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel." GE continues, "Federal executives can serve as officers or directors at nonprofit organizations, a 19-page opinion released Jan. 11 stated. But agencies should take into account the appearance of an ethical violation before permitting employees to serve in a group that handles issues related to their government work. … 'Government employees [have a] . . . duty to "avoid any actions creating the appearance that they are violating the law ... or ethical standards,'" the Justice office's opinion said. … 'If an outside organization in which an employee is a director has been advocating its views directly to the federal government on a matter that the organization has identified as especially significant, there is a significantly heightened risk that the employee ... will at least appear less than independent in his judgments,' the legal counsel stated. 'And that risk ... calls for serious consideration by the employee's agency.' … Federal law requires government employees to recuse themselves from work activities when a nonprofit on which they serve has a financial interest in the matter. But just because nonprofits spend money advocating a position does not necessarily mean they have a financial interest in an agency action, according to the opinion." GE notes, "The case leading to the opinion originated in July 2004 when a senior executive at the Education Department was told by the Office of Government Ethics that election to the Senior Executives Association board of directors would result in a criminal conflict of interest due to his service on his department's Executive Resources Board."

Senate Committee Opens Hearings Into Lobbying Reform. USA Today (1/26, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports that after "weeks of calls for restrictions on how lobbyists influence Congress, lawmakers began Wednesday to grapple with the thorny details of just how to do it." The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee opened the first congressional hearing on reforms, and "lobbyists argued against proposals to ban privately financed trips for House and Senate members and their aides, saying travel helps them make good policy decisions in an era of globalization." And some senators "rejected calls for more restrictions, saying problems…are rooted in lawmakers' own behavior, the way Congress operates and a failure to enforce rules already on the books." The Washington Post (1/26, A6, Milbank, 744K) reports lawmakers "had no difficulty conceding they had a problem. But there was yawning disconnect between the problem and the proposed remedies. While most everybody agreed that Congress was being subverted by lawmakers' reliance on lobbyists for campaign cash, the proposals getting the most serious consideration yesterday were relatively minor: whether to ban lobbyist-paid lunches or a few million dollars' worth of privately funded congressional trips." Both newspapers quote Sen. Tom Coburn saying, "I don't believe lobbying reform's the problem; I believe Congress is."

However, CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Koppel) called the hearing "a bipartisan show of support for what Democrat Joe Lieberman called 'doing away' with what they believe is the faulty impression that their votes go to the highest bidder. The high-flying days of Congressional lobbying could be in for a rough landing as Democrats and Republicans alike rushed to put luxury vacations and expensive meals on the Congressional chopping block." The AP (1/25, Abrams) quotes Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairman Susan Collins saying, "The public's trust in Congress is perilously low." The panel's ranking Democrat, Sen. Joseph Lieberman, similarly said, "The status quo stinks and cries out for us to clear the air."

McCain Testifies In Opposition To Earmarks. The Washington Post (1/26, Branigin, 744K) reports Sen. John McCain, appearing as a witness before the panel, "was one of several senators to denounce earmarking, a practice he called 'disgraceful.' He outlined one of several proposals to tighten rules and require greater disclosure of lobbying activities. But he told the committee, 'We're not going to fix this system until we fix the earmarks.'" But "representatives of lobbying organizations urged the committee today not to overreact to what they described as the unscrupulous activities of one corrupt lobbyist," and Minority Whip Richard Durbin said the problem "goes beyond earmarks and that solving it must start with reducing the 'outrageous expense' of political campaigns."

Lewis Offers Steps For Earmarking Reforms. House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis writes in Roll Call (1/26), "The president's budget contains numerous earmarks inserted by nameless, faceless bureaucrats within each government agency. Teach for America, The Points of Light Foundation, and America's Promise are just a few examples of unauthorized, limited-scope initiatives that routinely receive a line-item request in the president's budget. Yet elected representatives know more about local, state or national priorities than the Beltway bureaucracy. It would be a mistake to ignore this expertise when determining how to allocate scarce federal dollars." Lewis calls for "curbing the appetite to spend by sharply reducing the number of earmarks in annual spending bills and making the appropriations process more open and transparent. In order to succeed, the House and Senate must jointly embrace these efforts. Specifically, the leadership of the House Appropriations Committee recommends the following: 1) Sharply limit the number of Member project requests. … 2) Require increased accountability, disclosure and transparency by requiring that Member request letters be made public prior to House consideration of each appropriations bill. … 3) Require that all project requests be submitted in writing to the appropriations subcommittee of jurisdiction via a Member-signed request letter or form. 4) Establish clearly defined criteria for all project requests and require Members to specify how each project meets the criteria. … 5) Increase the proportion of projects that have a dollar-matching requirement. … 6) Require all Congressionally approved projects to go through a formal executive branch contracting and auditing process. 7) Finally, require that all other committees adopt similar earmarking reforms."

Nelson, Coleman Call For Independent Commission. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Curtius, 958K) reports Sens. Ben Nelson and Norm Coleman, "convinced that Congress cannot overhaul its rules on ethics and lobbying in the politically charged atmosphere of an election year," called for the creation of an independent commission for the job. But their "proposal faced quick resistance from two senators leading the reform push," Lieberman and McCain, both of whom said they "feared creating an independent commission and that waiting for it to act would slow the momentum for change." McCain said, "I don't want to wait. We've got to act quickly."

House Democratic Leaders Float "Toughest Lobbying Reform Package Yet." Roll Call (1/26, Newmyer) reports House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, and Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn "circulated principles" of the "toughest lobbying reform package yet" to Democrats, seeking their support. The measure would "force lawmakers to report when they are sponsoring earmarks, require them to pay fair market value for travel on private jets and create an office of public integrity to oversee these and other new lobbying rules. Details of the plan emerged after a day in which lawmakers on both sides of the Capitol traded barbs, with each party claiming to want a bipartisan solution, but finding no partner across the aisle."

GOP Ends Vestige Of "K Street Project." The Washington Post (1/26, A2, Birnbaum, 744K) reports the GOP has ended a "long practice of routinely summoning lobbyists to the Capitol to try to persuade them to hire their aides and colleagues," a "remnant of the K Street Project once championed by Rep. Tom DeLay." The Senate Republican Conference staff director said Wednesday that a "K-Street-job-vacancies memo -- the heart of Congress's remaining involvement in the effort these days -- will no longer be distributed during high-level meetings hosted by the conference on Capitol Hill between lawmakers and lobbyists."

Hill Staff May Rush To Lobbying Jobs Before Rules Change. Roll Call (1/26, Ackley) writes that while the two parties "might not agree on all things lobbying," they "seem united on doubling the current one-year cooling-off period for newly minted advocates. And that has Congressional staffers, who already had an eye toward employment on K Street, stepping up their job-seeking efforts. Lobbyists, headhunters and Capitol Hill aides speculate that a mini-exodus of staffers from both sides of the aisle may be coming as a result."

ASAE Opposes Proposal To Ban Privately Funded Travel For Lawmakers. The Washington Post (1/26, A23, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "The American Society of Association Executives (sometimes referred to as the 'association of associations') is weighing in on plans to overhaul lobbying laws. ASAE, like some other trade groups, is concerned Congress may being acting too fast. ASAE opposes a measure that would ban all privately funded travel for members of Congress because, it believes, the ban would discourage true fact-finding trips and meetings with diverse groups."

DeLay Unrepentant As Ethics Talk Dominates Washington. In his Washington Post (1/26, A25, 744K) column, George Will writes of a visit with Tom DeLay in Richmond, Texas, writing, "Most people, battered as he recently has been, would be curled up on the carpet in a fetal position. But DeLay is as direct and uncomplicated as the tool that supplies his nickname -- 'The Hammer' -- and his faults do not include being a whiner. Furthermore, he is not about to plea-bargain in the court of public opinion. He chafes under prudential reticence: His attorneys tell him not to trumpet the fact that the Justice Department told them he is not a target in the Jack Abramoff investigation. But about other matters, the bantam is belligerent." And in DeLay country, "unlike on the Potomac, the fever for reform is not high. To a visiting columnist who waxes censorious about earmarks for highway projects, DeLay responds with a notable lack of repentance: 'You just drove out on one.'"

Social Security Group Redefines Itself To Push For Lobbying Reform. The Washington Post (1/26, A23, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "Fresh off its success in raising a grass-roots wave of public opposition that helped block President Bush's plan to overhaul Social Security, Americans United to Protect Social Security has redefined itself. The name is shorter -- Americans United -- and the mission is broader: public corruption, education, health and energy costs, economic prosperity and such. Yesterday, Americans United unveiled a $1 million advertising campaign urging support for legislation proposed by Democratic lawyers aimed at tightening the restrictions on lobbying." The group "has received initial support from organized labor, including the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. Brad Woodhouse , director of communication, says Americans United hopes to raise $10 million to $20 million from labor, individuals and others."

Blunt, Boehner Make Case For Their Candidacies. Rep. Roy Blunt, a candidate for House Majority Leader, writes in USA Today (1/26, 2.31M), "House members cannot ignore recent scandals that have many questioning the credibility of our system. Republicans will regain Americans' trust by enacting tough penalties for those who break the law and focusing on our agenda of limited government, personal responsibility and growing the economy by returning money to the Americans who earned it. … Lobbying reforms should include new rules governing travel and disclosure and regulations subjecting shadowy, tax-exempt '527' political groups to the same standards as others who attempt to influence the process. Then the credibility of honest public servants will be not be questioned -- even when some try to paint them with the same brush as those who break the law."

Meanwhile, Rep. John Boehner, a candidate for House Majority Leader writes in USA Today (1/26, 2.31M), "House Republicans need leadership that will help provide a vision and a plan for renewal. We need a leader who will stand up to Democrats when they're wrong, but who has credibility to work with them when it's in the country's best interests.' Boehner adds, "As of now, I am the only candidate who has released a detailed plan that would help House Republicans regain the spirit and energy of 1994, embrace real reform and reclaim the vision responsible for our success."

USA Today Says Blunt, Boehner Not Credible Reformers. An editorial in USA Today (1/26, 2.31M) says, "The former majority leader, Tom DeLay, stepped down after he was indicted in a Texas fundraising case and linked to crooked lobbyist Jack Abramoff. So where is the GOP seeking this fresh face and new start? With two lawmakers -- Roy Blunt of Missouri and John Boehner of Ohio -- who have cozy relations with lobbyists and a penchant for accepting perks from corporate friends." USA adds, "A third candidate for majority leader, John Shadegg of Arizona, is less enmeshed with the lobbying establishment and high-powered fundraising. That's one reason he's given virtually no chance of winning." USA continues, "Both Blunt and Boehner have one point right: Voters are clamoring for change. That requires recognition of what's wrong and the will to do something about it. Lawmakers who've spent their careers accepting perks and raking in special-interest campaign cash don't make for credible reformers."

Cornyn Emerges As Senate GOP's "Self-Appointed Public Relations Man." Roll Call (1/26, Pierce) reports, "With President Bush and Republicans struggling to regain their standing in public opinion as Senate Democrats hammer away daily at every perceived foible or folly committed by the ruling majority," Sen. John Cornyn "has made it his mission to strike back." Over the past year, Cornyn "has become a self-appointed public relations man for Republicans in Congress and the White House, filling a communications void that has developed in the Senate GOP leadership." Cornyn said, "I saw it as addressing this quick-response need that I don't think we had been set up for before, and really didn't need before the Democrats created their war room. It's not enough to come back later on, a week later, two weeks later, and respond. … A charge unrebutted is a charge believed." Cornyn has taken a key role in judicial nominations and also spearheaded "an aggressive effort among his colleagues in directing staff to send out partisan press releases, opposition research papers and talking points." He is now running for the "low-profile but still influential post of vice chairman of the Senate Republican Conference, which just happens to be the No. 2 'message' position."

First Lady's Approval Rating Is 82% In CNN/USA Today/Gallup Poll. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Crowley) reported, "In the latest CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll, 82 percent of Americans gave thumbs up to the way Laura Bush is handling her job. … Her approval rating is almost 40 points higher than her husband's." CNN added, "Despite that 82 percent approval rating, only 40 percent of Americans say they would like to see Mrs. Bush run for Senate. The truth is, when people see her as outside the world of politics, she is one of his biggest political assets."

Cheney Still A GOP Fundraising Draw. Roll Call (1/26, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "Despite a recent spate of bad publicity, Vice President Cheney is still a big draw for GOP fundraising. The vice president is slated to be the headline attraction this evening at a fundraiser for Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio). Anyone can attend for a simple $1,000. But the most generous donors may have a picture snapped with the veep: Going for that 'max out' opportunity before Ohio's primary in May, the DeWine re-election campaign is charging political action committees $5,000 per photo op."

Hillary Clinton Says Bush Disregarding Cities' Needs In Favor Of Tax Cuts. Reuters (1/25, Whitesides) reported, "Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton accused the Bush administration on Wednesday of ignoring the needs of cities in its politically driven zeal for tax cuts and told US mayors 'you are on your own.' Clinton, a potential White House candidate in 2008 who is seeking Senate re-election this year in New York, said that since the September 11 attacks President George W. Bush had reneged on his obligation to states and cities to pay for crucial security and social programs." Clinton said tax "cuts are desirable in the right political and economic climate but 'it is hard to square with the challenges we face at this time of terrorist threat.' At the federal level, 'the sense of urgency that marked the months after the 9/11 attacks has largely given way to politics as usual,' she said."

Clinton Stumbles Over Question On Her Time As Wal-Mart Board Member. The New York Daily News (1/26, McAuliff, 729K) reports that Sen. Clinton "easily pointed at Wal-Mart yesterday as not doing enough about health care but found it a little tougher when asked if she had ever suggested the retailer do more when she was on its board of directors. 'Well, you know, I, that was a long time ago, I have to remember,' she stammered, before pointing to her work on health care while First Lady. She sat on the Wal-Mart board from 1986 to 1992. Her spokesman insisted it's 'a very different company now.'"

Columnist Says Liberals Increasingly Unhappy With Clinton. Columnist Jonah Goldberg writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/26, 958K), "Liberals are sizing up Hillary Clinton for the umpteenth time, and they don't like what they see. … 'I will not support Hillary Clinton for president,' wrote Molly Ivins, the voice of conventional thinking on the left. 'Enough. Enough triangulation, calculation and equivocation. Enough clever straddling, enough not offending anyone.'" Goldberg adds, "The New Republic offers perhaps an even more devastating critique of Clinton for Democratic pragmatists: She can't win. Marisa Katz dismantled the myth that Clinton can appeal to 'red state' voters because she won in upstate New York. Turns out former Vice President Al Gore and Sen. John Kerry each did better in upstate New York than she did. … Meanwhile, a recent Gallup poll showed that 51% of Americans won't even consider voting for Clinton." Goldberg relates that there is "something oddly satisfying in the possibility that Clinton being herself is politically disastrous. And, if she's really just playing one more role according to some classically Clintonian political triangulation, there's something equally satisfying to the prospect that even her fans aren't falling for it anymore."

Obey, Frank To Propose Full Public Financing Of House Contests. Roll Call (1/26, Kornacki) reports that Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.) "is joining with Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) to propose full public financing of all House elections. They announced Wednesday that they will introduce the plan, which would bar all candidates from fundraising and self-financing in their campaigns, when the House reconvenes next week." Obey's "plan would radically curtail the financial advantage most incumbents now enjoy, even making it difficult for some of them to pay for television ads. And even if Democrats were to unite behind it, the prospect on a vote in the GOP-controlled House is less than remote. … Beyond that, the plan also faces an almost certain constitutional hurdle, in the form of the Supreme Court's 1976 Buckley v. Valeo decision that equated campaign spending with free speech."

Kondracke Says House GOP Group To Unveil "Suburban Agenda" Next Month. Roll Call Executive Editor Morton M. Kondracke writes in Roll Call (1/26), "A different kind of agenda -- different from the president's State of the Union address and the anticipated Democratic election year document -- is scheduled to be unveiled early next month to House Republicans: 'The Suburban Agenda.' It's the work of a group of 22 GOP Members from across the party's ideological spectrum and led by moderate Rep. Mark Kirk (Ill.), who's also tried to sell it to President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove." Kirk said "this agenda is designed to answer the problems faced by a suburban family as it moves through its day." Kondracke notes, "There's clearly strategic political intent behind trying to build the 2006 GOP legislative strategy around the suburbs: More than half of U.S. voters live in the 'burbs, and these places, formerly Republican strongholds, have been trending Democratic in recent years. … The agenda is designed to keep Republicans in power, but many of the items -- electronic health records and anti-gang measures, for sure -- ought to be bipartisan. It wouldn't be surprising if there's a bidding war for the support of the suburbs."

Postal Service Opposes Collins Bill On Mail Rates. The Washington Post (1/26, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The U.S. Postal Service headquarters launched a blitz yesterday to block a Senate bill, contending that the legislation, in combination with White House demands, could trigger a 20 percent increase in stamp prices in the near future. The bill's sponsors, Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), said they were 'outraged that the Postal Service would mislead senators.' In a statement, they said, 'Nothing in the bill would lead to rate increases.' Government agencies rarely risk incurring the wrath of committee chairmen who oversee their operations, as is the case with Collins. As head of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, she has made the overhaul of postal operations one of her priorities. Her bill would create a system of setting mail rates that she believes would give the post office greater pricing flexibility and would prevent it from raising rates each year in excess of inflation as measured by the consumer price index."

Federalist Society Protests Nightline Report On Scalia. The Washington Times (1/26, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column "The Federalist Society yesterday called on ABC to investigate a report by its news show 'Nightline' that suggested Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia had done something unethical by participating in a legal seminar sponsored by the group. 'The report grossly misled viewers about a recent trip Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia took to teach a 10-hour course on the Constitution and separation of powers. 'Nightline' suggested that Justice Scalia's trip was a "judicial junket," and even strained to manufacture a link with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff,' Federalist Society President Eugene B. Meyer said in a letter yesterday to ABC News President David Westin. The program, which aired Monday, emphasized that Justice Scalia had missed the September swearing-in of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. because of his commitment to attend the legal seminar at a Colorado resort, suggesting that the jurist spent most of his time playing tennis and engaging in other frivolous pursuits."

High Court Urged To Look To Foreign Opinions In Interpreting Law. Felix G. Rohatyn, the United States ambassador to France from 1997 to 2001, writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (1/26, 1.19M), "Globalization has made it not only 'appropriate or useful' but vital to look at foreign laws" when interpreting our own. "When we require European support on security issues…our job is made more difficult by the intensity of popular opposition in Europe to our policy" on the death penalty. "Contempt for the laws of our allies is a major factor in our increasing isolation in the world," and "that is why is it is deeply troubling that the next member of the Supreme Court will most likely share Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas's" opposition to that view. "Taking the views of 450 million Europeans into account is not a sign of weakness on our part, nor is it a commitment to change our views" but "simply recognition that the laws of our most important allies, our biggest foreign investors, foreign employers, foreign customers and trading partners are worthy of our attention."

Home Sales Drop Sharply. USA Today (1/26, Knox, 2.31M) reports, "Sales of existing homes fell in December for the third-consecutive month, in a surprisingly sharp drop that signaled the housing market is cooling off faster than expected. Home resales declined 5.7% from November to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 6.6 million, the slowest since March 2004, the National Association of Realtors said Wednesday. Western states, notably California, suffered the worst, with home sales in the region skidding 11.4% from November and from December 2004." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Preciphs, 2.11M), however, adds that even if "sales of existing homes fell in December to their lowest level in three months," they "still set a record for the year." The New York Times (1/26, Bajaj, 1.19M) also reports "the housing market registered a fifth consecutive year of increased sales." The data, nonetheless, "appear to suggest that the era of rapidly increasing sales may be coming to a close."

Stocks Down. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) reports, "Stocks ended a two-day rally yesterday as a worsening profit outlook for oil companies and homebuilders, two of the market's best performers during the last 12 months, sent prices lower." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "fell 2.18 points, or 0.2 percent, to close at 1,264.68, its first drop this week. The Nasdaq composite index lost 4.60 points, or 0.2 percent, to 2,260.65. The Dow Jones industrial average dropped 2.48 points, or less than 0.1 percent, to 10,709.74, helped by a gain in General Motors." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Patterson, 2.11M) and USA Today (1/26, 2.31M) also report the stock numbers.

Oil Industry Defends Record-High Profits. ABC World News Tonight (1/25, story 4, 2:30, Vargas) reported, "Some breath-taking numbers from the oil industry today. Conoco/Phillips said it made 13.5 $13.5 billion last year, an increase of 66% from the year before. The record-high profits are the result of record-high oil and gas prices people are paying at the pump and to heat their homes. So, the oil industry is feeling the heat. Today, it launched a counterattack." ABC (Stark): "Today the oil industry tried to argue that it's not just the companies themselves who benefit when profits are high. At the gas pump, where prices are once again increasing, news of the huge oil company profits had consumers up in arms." After "all the numbers are in, analysts expect oil industry profits for the fourth quarter to be up at least 46% over a year ago. The industry today was quick to go on the defensive, pointing out its earnings are just slightly above average for all corporations, just over 7 cents for every dollar spent. It also argued that what's good for big oil is good for average Americans." Stark concluded: "So, for oil companies and those who own shares in them, it has been a boom year. But for many consumers, it's a bust." Vargas: "Indeed it is."

Greenspan To Open Consulting Firm. When he leaves the Fed at the end of the month, Greenspan plans to set up a consulting firm, Greenspan Associates, in Washington, DC, the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) reports. The Journal adds, "One of his first hires will be Michelle Smith, who the Fed said yesterday will leave her job as director of its office of board members to join Mr. Greenspan's new firm. … In addition, the Fed said David W. Skidmore, Ms. Smith's deputy, would become the board's chief spokesman and Rose Pianalto Cameron will oversee other public information activities.

Greenspan Opposes Banking Loophole. Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan opposes a regulatory loophole that allows corporations to own banks. The Wall

Street Journal (1/26, Wysocki, 2.11M) says Greenspan's opposition puts him "into the middle of an effort by Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to establish a bank. Mr. Greenspan's salvo, outlined in a 12-page letter to Congress that was reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, is the latest in a controversy over the separation of commerce and banking. Wal-Mart, the Bentonville, Ark., retailer, is trying to obtain a state banking charter in Utah, using precisely the exemption in the banking laws opposed by Mr. Greenspan." The Journal adds that the remarks "could be Mr. Greenspan's last major statement to Congress as Fed chairman."

Investors Were Skeptical When Greenspan Took Over Fed Chair. USA Today (1/26, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Investors jittery about how incoming Federal Reserve chairman Ben Bernanke will pan out can take some solace -- folks weren't sure some guy named Alan Greenspan was up to snuff either. Investors didn't take the news so well on the day in June 1987 when Paul Volcker announced he was leaving the Fed after eight years and Greenspan was named to his position. Bond markets took their worst one-day beating in more than five years, and the dollar fell." USA adds, "In many ways, Bernanke — although widely respected in economic circles — is more of an unknown to the public than Greenspan was in 1987. … But no matter how well they knew Greenspan, people in 1987 were still nervous about him taking over the Fed."

Dow Chemical Loses Appeal On Life-Insurance Policies. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Matthews) reports, "A federal appeals court ruled Dow Chemical Co. is liable for $22.2 million in back taxes and interest for claiming tax-income losses on thousands of life-insurance policies it took out on its employees. … The ruling is a victory for the Internal Revenue Service, which for the past decade has been cracking down on companies that take out life-insurance policies on their executives and employees, often without their knowledge, in order to reduce their corporate-tax bill." The article says that only Dow Chemical had prevailed against the IRS in these cases, but lost that victory on appeal. The article explains that companies took out these insurance policies "to generate tax deductions with minimal cash outlay. They did this by taking a tax deduction for the interest they paid on loans taken out against the insurance policies, while allowing the policy to build value tax-free."

Ney Announces He Will Seek Reelection. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "A leading target in the influence peddling investigation isn't letting the probe keep him from the campaign trail. Congressman Bob Ney announced today that he is running for re-election. The Ohio Republican recently gave up his committee chairmanship. State party officials have urged him to give up a seat as well if he is indicted. Ney denies any wrongdoing."

The AP (1/26, Hammer) notes that in stepping down as chairman of the House Administration Committee earlier this month, Ney "acknowledged that his ties to Abramoff were a distraction from his duties, particularly as Republicans push an ethics reform agenda -- part of which must be implemented by the Administration Committee. But Ney spokesman Brian Walsh said no such distraction has affected Ney's work for his district, where he's known for hands-on constituent service and independence from GOP trade and labor policies."

The New York Times (1/26, Hauser, 1.19M) relates that Ney, in a statement, said "that the campaign this year promises to be a 'vigorous' one 'and I am ready for the fight.' 'I look forward to joining my friends and supporters, including the many state and local officials backing my re-election bid, as we kick off the 2006 campaign this Thursday and Friday,' he said." Ney "is referred to as 'Representative No. 1' in court documents filed in connection with the corruption scandal surrounding" Abramoff. Ney's statement "said he would announce his re-election bid at a campaign rally in Dover tomorrow evening and then travel to the southern part of the district for a second rally in Chillicothe on Friday at noon."

Roll Call (1/26, Whittington) adds, "Chillicothe Mayor Joe Sulzer and Dover Law Director Zack Space are vying in the May 2 Democratic primary for the chance to face Ney, who has held the expansive 18th district seat since 1994."

Ehrlich Says Stem-Cell Funding Decisions Should Be Based On Science. The Washington Post (1/26, B4, Wagner, 744K) reports that Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich (R) "is pushing a plan to spend $20 million next year on stem cell research," but "is not committing himself on the question that has stirred the most controversy: whether the money should be used primarily for work on stem cells derived from human embryos or from less controversial adult stem cells." Ehrlich, in an interview, said, "I'm not going to make that decision. … The point here is that the decision should be a function of the science. These are fundamentally science questions, not political questions." Ehrlich "would leave it to a state-founded technology corporation to decide whether to provide grants for work on adult stem cells or work on embryonic stems cells, which many scientists say holds greater promise but some in his party consider tantamount to abortion." Ehrlich, "who has supported stem cell research since his days in Congress," said, "The strong pro-life members know the administration does not share their views on this issue, but we wanted to try to lower the temperature on the politics. … I wanted to try to keep everyone's eye on the ball, and I believe this approach accomplishes that goal."

Republicans Say They Have Bipartisan Support For Stem-Cell Bill Filibuster. The Washington Times (1/26, Ward, 90K) reports that Democratic and GOP Maryland state senators on Wednesday vowed "to stop a bill that would promote the creation of embryos for research. 'If [Senate President Thomas V. Mike] Miller wants to do this extraordinary thing, he will get a filibuster that lasts as long as he wants it to last,' said Senate Minority Whip Andrew P. Harris, Baltimore County Republican. Senate Minority Leader J. Lowell Stoltzfus said he had more than the minimum 19 votes to filibuster. 'We think we have 20,' said Mr. Stoltzfus, an Eastern Shore Republican." The Times notes, "There are 14 Republicans in the 47-member Senate, which means six Democrats have agreed to filibuster. Sen. Paula C. Hollinger, Baltimore County Democrat, is sponsoring the Senate bill in support of embryonic stem-cell research for the second year. … 'I'm sure they will filibuster, and I'm sure we will round up the votes,' she said. Mrs. Hollinger also said she would fight for the bill and against the filibuster for 'as long as it takes.'"

Ford Released From Hospital. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 9, 0:10, Vargas) reported, "Gerald Ford was released from the hospital today. He spent the last 12 days being treated for pneumonia at the Eisenhower Medical Center near Rancho Mirage, California. His doctors say he is doing well."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 7, :45, Williams) added, "At 92, he is the oldest living former president. His spokesperson said he's doing well but it's safe to say doctors will be keeping a close eye on him."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Rosenblatt, 958K) reports, "Ford, 92, originally had been scheduled to leave Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage on Jan. 19, but doctors kept him for additional treatment."

Professors Say Maryland Wal-Mart Defeat Stems From Government-Employed Voters. Steve H. Hanke, professor of applied economics at Johns Hopkins University, and Stephen J.K. Walters, professor of economics at Loyola College in Maryland, write in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M), "The consequences of" Maryland's "legislature's override of Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich's veto of their 'Fair Share Health Care Act' on Jan. 12 will be tragic for some of the state's neediest residents." The reason for the override is that legislators "are simply eager for Big Labor's votes and money and therefore subservient to its interests." Estimates show "that as much as a third of the state's economic activity stems from federal employment and purchases," that "sector where revenues appear to arrive automatically and inefficiency never leads to bankruptcy," so "many Marylanders are simply unmindful of the necessities of survival in the private sector." This elects legislators who "often behave as if business is a problem to be solved." However, "legislators should be mindful that companies like Wal-Mart are not the enemy but rather front-line soldiers in a real war on poverty."

Hamas Wins Palestinian Elections; Government Resigns. The AP (1/26) reports this morning, "The Islamic militant group Hamas said Thursday it won control of the Palestinian parliament and officials from the ruling Fatah Party confirmed the estimate -- though Palestinian election officials delayed the release of preliminary official results." The claim by Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh "was based on reporting by Hamas activists who observed the counting in the polling stations, the group said. He said Hamas had won about 70 seats, enough for a majority in the 132-seat parliament. … Officials with Fatah also said that Hamas had won about 70 seats, which would give the Islamists a majority in the 132-seat parliament. They spoke on condition of anonymity because counting in some districts was continuing."

Meanwhile, CNN.com (1/26) reports, "In a stunning development ahead of official election results, Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qorie said he and the rest of the Palestinian Authority government will resign in the wake of militant group Hamas' apparent victory in historic elections. The announcement was an acknowledgment that election results showed Hamas had won a majority of seats in the 132-seat Palestinian Legislative Council, supplanting the ruling Fatah party." This announcement came before official election results had been released, CNN.com reported. According to the article, Qorie's office "said it will be up to Hamas to form a new government."

Previously, most reports had referred to exit polls showing a narrow Fatah win. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Leggett, 2.11M) reports that "according to Beir Zeit University's exit poll, the ruling Fatah party emerged victorious with 46% of the vote and Hamas captured about 40%, making its Reform and Change party the second-most popular among voters. Independent parties accounted for the difference. Final results are expected today." The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 5, 2:00, Schieffer) reported that "exit polls show that a militant group dedicated to Israel's destruction did very well, maybe even well enough to gain a role in the Palestinian government." NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 4, 1:30, Williams) showed Ali Zarbawi, Birzeit University saying, "Hamas will be an active opposition, a very strong opposition, but Fatah is going to lead the government."

USA Today (1/26, Gutman, 2.31M) adds "about 1 million Palestinians voted Wednesday in parliamentary elections that threaten to end the ruling Fatah Party's decade-long monopoly over Palestinian politics." The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Wilson, 744K) headlines its story "Hamas Makes Strong Showing In Vote," while the Washington Times (1/26, Mitnick, 90K) titles its reprot "Fatah Edges Hamas In Polls." The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Prusher, Mitnick, 61K) and Los Angeles Times (1/26, King, 958K) run similar reports.

Bush Touts Palestinian Elections But Says He Will Not Deal With Hamas. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site,, the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush, in an Oval Office interview, declared that he isn't ready yet to deal with the radical Palestinian Islamist group Hamas no matter how well it does in Wednesday's Palestinian elections. Speaking to The Wall Street Journal as Palestinians were electing a new parliament, Bush lauded the Middle Eastern trend toward democracy that produced Palestinian elections, but he said that Hamas isn't a suitable partner for diplomacy until it renounces its position calling for the destruction of Israel. 'A political party, in order to be viable, is one that professes peace, in my judgment, in order that it will keep the peace,' the president said. 'And so you're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility. And the answer is: Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you.'"

The Washington Post (1/26, A19, Kessler, 744K) reports "yesterday's better-than-expected electoral showing by a group labeled a terrorist organization by the United States greatly complicates the administration's diplomacy in the region, U.S. officials said yesterday.' Hamas, "which is dedicated to the destruction of Israel, appears to have ridden a wave of popular disgust at the perceived corruption and incompetence of the ruling Fatah Party. Exit polls indicate Fatah will have only a slim edge over Hamas in the Palestinian Legislative Council, giving Hamas a strong claim to a role in the government." The results "suggested the risks inherent in the Bush administration's campaign to bring democracy to the Middle East." Administration spokesmen "officially celebrated the 'historic moment' for the Palestinians while officials privately reeled at the outcome."

All three network news programs briefly noted Bush's pledge the US would not deal with Hamas unless it renounces violence. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 2, 0:20, Woodruff) reported, "The Bush Administration declared the election 'historic' and called this 'a great day for the Palestinian people.' But President Bush made clear the US will not deal with Hamas, no matter how well it did in the election. He told 'The Wall Street Journal' today 'We view Hamas as a terrorist organization. We don't deal with Hamas. … I don't see that changing.'"

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 6, :30, Schieffer) reported, "Hamas may have won a lot of Palestinian votes, but they got no vote of confidence from President Bush in a 'Wall Street Journal' interview today. The President says he will not deal with Hamas unless the group renounces its call for Israel's destruction."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, lead story, 3:10, Woodruff) reported "Israel's new foreign minister holds out little hope." Israeli Foreign Minister Tsipy Livney: "The essence and the reasons of the existence of the Hamas is not because they want to gain some political gains in the conflict. They are talking about demolishing the state of Israel, to erase the state of Israel from earth."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 4, 1:30, Williams) in its coverage also noted, "President Bush told 'The Wall Street Journal' today he would not deal with Hamas unless it renounces its call for the destruction of Israel."

The New York Times (1/26, Erlanger, Myre, 1.19M) reports "the acting prime minister of Israel, Ehud Olmert, said his country could not accept a situation in which Hamas would be part of the Palestinian Authority if the group remained armed with unchanged goals."

Carter Hopes Hamas Will Moderate Stance And Renounce Violence. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, lead story, 3:10, Woodruff) reported, "What no one knows is if Hamas will change, now that it has gained political power. Former President Jimmy Carter came to monitor today's election elections. There are some that believe Hamas will be pragmatic." Former President Carter: "That's my hope. Everybody hopes Hamas will be pragmatic. Because one thing is, if not for their own benefit but maybe for the benefit of the people they represent. Because no doubt if Hamas is not, as you say, pragmatic, then there will be a reduction in foreign assistance."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 5, 2:00, Hawkins) reported "Former President Jimmy Carter, who is leading international election monitors here, says bringing Hamas into the system may soften its hard-line positions." Carter: "My hope is and my prayer is that this will be a moderating influence on Hamas, that they'll see the responsibility in the government itself that they will moderate their position, forgo violence and terrorist acts."

Sharon's Absence From Stage Said To Make Peace Process Uncertain. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported that former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon's medical condition "leaves Israel with many unresolved matters, including that wall being built in the West Bank." CBS (Pizzey) added, "The most troublesome and obvious symbol of the unfinished business Ariel Sharon has left behind is the security wall separating Israelis and Palestinians on the West Bank. It wasn't Sharon's idea, but he made it a reality, an unplanned but now integral feature of the so-called road map that is supposed to lead to a peace deal. The problem for those who built on Sharon's legacies is that his plans and policies were like this wall: Only gaps that only he seemed to know how to fill."

Iran Open To Russian Enrichment Of Their Uranium. The Washington Post (1/26, Finn, 744K) reports that Ali Larijani, head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council," said "that his country was open to a compromise proposal from Russia that it enrich uranium for Iran on Russian soil," but added that that "the idea needed fine-tuning in advance of further talks scheduled for the middle of next month." The New York Times (1/26, Myers, 1.19M) adds that Larijani "indicated that no agreement had been reached and that significant details remained to be negotiated" and "warned that Iran would begin enriching uranium on an industrial scale if Iran's nuclear program was referred to the United Nations Security Council." His "remarks made it clear that further discussions on it would not take place until later in February, after the meeting at the atomic energy agency's headquarters in Vienna."

Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Rosen) reported that the head of Iran's national security council, "said in Moscow today Iran now takes a positive view of the so-called Russian proposal, which the Iranians previously rejected. The proposal would have Russia enrich uranium and ship the resulting nuclear fuel to Iran for nonmilitary use."

The AP (1/26, Gutterman) adds that President Bush said "Russia's proposal offered the best chance for resolving the impasse, adding 'it's important for us to exhaust all diplomacy' in dealing with Iran."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/26) says "Chief negotiator Ali Larijani also reiterated Iran's threat to renew enrichment activities if it is referred to the United Nations Security Council." The Washington Times (1/26, 90K) runs the same AP story. The Washington Post (1/26, A21, Finn, 744K) runs a similar report under the headline "Iran Says It Is Open To Russian Plan On Nuclear Program," while the New York Times (1/26, Myers, 1.19M) titles its report "Iran Welcomes Russia's Offer To Enrich Uranium Jointly; Details Remain."

Iran's Non-Cooperation Said To Be At Heart Of The Standoff. Knight Ridder (1/26, Landay) reports, "Iran's…obfuscation, conflicting answers and stonewalling on…the enrichment program are at the heart of the crisis over its nuclear program." It is "only by reconstructing the complete history and extent of Iran's nuclear work" that the IAEA can "determine the truth. So far, that's been impossible," and while "Iran has filled some gaps and is promising to fill the rest," IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei said "in a Nov. 18 report to the IAEA board…that 'there still remain issues to be resolved' and Iran's 'full transparency is ... long overdue.'"

Blix Says Bush Administration Overemphasizing Possible Military Action. Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Rosen) reported that "one of the world's best-known weapons inspectors, one who clashed with the Bush Administration before, is criticizing it again now for its approach in the current standoff. Hans Blix, the chief UN weapons inspector in Iraq prior to the war, argued the Administration is overemphasizing the potential for US military interaction in Iran."

Washington Backs Off Linking Iran Vote To India Nuclear Deal. The AFP (1/26) reports, "Washington moved to unlink a landmark US-India civilian nuclear deal with how New Delhi votes on the Iranian nuclear question at a key meeting of the UN atomic watchdog agency." The US Ambassador to India, David Mulford, "had warned Wednesday that a historic deal giving American nuclear technology to India might fall through if New Delhi did not vote against Iran at the February 2-3 meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA)." However, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "we deal with the Indian Government on these two issues as separate issues."

Reuters (1/25) added that "Mulford, told the Press Trust of India news agency that if India decided not to vote against Iran, 'the effect on members of the U.S. Congress with regard to the civil nuclear initiative will be devastating.'" He was also quoted "as saying the deal would 'die,'"

The AP (1/26, Rosenberg) adds, "The State Department in Washington said later that Mulford wasn't speaking for the U.S. government."

Reuters (1/26, Hafezi) also covered this story.

US Envoy Says China's US's Approach To Iran Differ. The New York Times (1/26, Kahn, 1.19M) reports, "China and the United States want to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, but their 'approach may differ' on the best tactics to achieve that result, Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick said after a round of meetings on the subject in Beijing." He also "called the diplomatic discussions fluid and said there were still differences over what steps should be taken to respond to what Western powers say is a covert program by Iran to build nuclear bombs." This suggests "hat China, despite heavy lobbying, had left some doubts as to whether it is prepared to back a proposal…to get the United Nations Security Council involved in deciding how to handle Iran's nuclear program."

Annan Doesn't Expect IAEA To Be Ready In February To Refer Iran To Security Council. Reuters (1/26, Leopold) reports, "U.N. chief Kofi Annan said on Wednesday he doubted that a U.N. nuclear watchdog would be able to come to a decision by early February on referring Iran to the Security Council over its nuclear programme," adding that "Mohamed ElBaradei, the director-general of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, did not expect to have a report on Iran ready until the end of February, for the IAEA's regular board meeting in March."

Iran Accuses British Military Of Aiding Bombers. The Washington Post/Reuters (1/26, A17) reports, "Iran accused the British military on Wednesday of cooperating with bombers who killed eight people in southwest Iran, an allegation Britain described as ludicrous. A little-known group campaigning for independence for Iran's Arab minority asserted responsibility in a Web statement for Tuesday's attacks on a bank and government building in the oil city of Ahvaz." Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki "said that London's involvement was clear and that Tehran would make strong protests." A spokesman in British Prime Minister Tony Blair's office "said Iran's allegation 'deserves to be treated with scorn by the whole international community.'"

UN Peacekeepers To Maintain Monitoring Of Israeli-Lebanese Border. The New York Times/Reuters (1/26) reports, "The members of the United Nations Security Council have agreed that United Nations peacekeepers should keep monitoring the Israeli-Lebanese border for six more months, the current Council president said on Wednesday." Lebanon wanted "a renewal of the mandate of the United Nations' peacekeeping mission for the border area for a year, until Jan. 31, 2007." Yet "the 15 Security Council members instead reached a consensus on an extension until July 31."

Frist Says US, International Community Must "Ramp Up The Pressure" On Syria. In a New York Sun (1/26) op-ed, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist writes, "A year ago this month, a car bomb killed the former Lebanese prime minister, Rafic Hariri. An ongoing U.N. investigation has implicated the Syrian government in the murder. The Syrian president, Bashar al-Assad, may have played a personal role. Several additional high-profile bombings have occurred in the last several months. Enough is enough: Syria's actions in Lebanon have proven that it has no desire to play by the rules of civilized nations. Now, the United States and its partners need to ramp up the pressure on Damascus. We need to push Syria away from its homegrown brand of Arab fascism and toward democracy, peace, and an authentic end to its interference with Lebanon's affairs. We should start by increasing and expanding our funding for prodemocracy groups in Lebanon and Syria. In the coming Congress, I plan to support legislation that will do just that."

Bush Administration Criticizes Mexico's Plan To Distribute Border Maps. Following an announcement Tuesday by Mexico's National Human Rights Commission that it will print and distribute maps showing immigrants the safest routes to cross the border into Arizona, Mexican President Vicente Fox distanced his government from the group, saying that it was an "autonomous commission." However, the Washington Times (1/26, Kralev, Seper, 90K) reports, "The Bush administration yesterday accused the Mexican government of facilitating illegal entry into the United States after Mexican officials said they would distribute maps of dangerous border areas and posters with safety instructions and other tips. … 'We oppose in the strongest terms the publication of maps to aid those who wish to enter the United States illegally,' said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. 'It is a bad idea to encourage migrants to undertake this highly dangerous and ultimately futile effort.'" Meanwhile, "Rafael Laveaga, spokesman for the Mexican Embassy in Washington, said the NHRC is an independent body and receives no government funds."

Hutchison, Border Sheriff Seek Investigation Of Suspected Mexican Military Incursions. The Washington Times (1/26, Seper, 90K) reports Zapata County Sheriff Sigifredo Gonzalez Jr., who heads the Texas Sheriff's Border Coalition, demanded yesterday "that the US and Mexican governments investigate incursions into the United States by heavily armed drug escorts dressed in Mexican military uniforms 'before someone gets killed.'" He "said a growing number of suspected incursions and violence aimed at the area's law-enforcement officers is making the border 'a pretty dangerous place.'" Also yesterday, "Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas Republican, said she was 'deeply concerned' about the possible incursions and asked Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to 'fully investigate this matter and report to Congress the details and confirm whether or not Mexican military officials were involved. … The Mexican government has denied that the men in any of the incidents were soldiers, saying that some drug smugglers dress in military-style uniforms, carry automatic weapons and drive military-style vehicles."

Kyl Says Border Encounters "Undermine Efforts" To Keep Drugs Out Of US. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Marosi, Lopez, Connell, 958K) reports, "Armed Mexican government personnel made unauthorized incursions into the United States five times in the last three months of 2005, including one incident last month in Southern California, according to confidential Department of Homeland Security records. … The records obtained by The Times provide new details on more than a dozen incursions into the US, including the five most recent ones." Meanwhile, "US Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar said "that incursions have declined by more than 50% since 2002. Still, with assault rates against agents at record highs, any incursion is taken 'very seriously.' However, "US Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) said in an interview Wednesday that this week's incident in Texas was 'about as serious as it gets' and noted that dozens of reported incursions have occurred in his state. The encounters seriously undermine efforts to stop the flow of drugs coming across the US border and suggest possible cooperation among Mexican authorities and traffickers, he said."

Mexico Said To Be Helping US Secure Southern Border From Terrorists. Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Bowers, 61K) reports, "A top priority of the United States government is to prevent a determined terrorist from crossing the US- Mexico border. It is also becoming a primary mission for Mexico - and the first place it's focusing on is the 375-mile, desolate stretch of land that abuts Arizona. In addition to sharing intelligence and cooperating on investigations with its US counterparts in Arizona, Mexico last year set up three checkpoints along known human-smuggling routes on its side of the border and plans to add two more. Between August, when the checkpoints became operational, and December, Mexican officials stopped 1,277 non-Mexicans (OTMs, for 'other than Mexicans') from crossing into Arizona, according to a Mexican government report obtained by the Monitor. The report shows that most of the OTMs came from Central and South America, but seven are listed as Iraqis." Meanwhile, "the US government is apprehending record numbers of illegal immigrants on the Arizona side of the border."

State Legislators Considering Immigration Legislation. USA Today (1/26, Cauchon, 2.31M) reports, "Frustrated by slow action in Congress, state legislatures are debating whether to increase border enforcement at their own expense, fine employers who use undocumented workers and get local police involved in deporting them." However, "like Congress, legislatures are divided on what to do about the estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants who provide a low-wage workforce in the USA." It "is one of the hottest issues as 37 legislatures convene this month. Last year, states considered 300 immigration laws and approved 40." Meanwhile, "Congress is considering changes to immigration policies — a border fence, a guest worker program — but it's uncertain whether action will be taken this year."

Provision Of Immigration Bill Compared To Nazi Practice. Andrew S. Grove, a member of the board of overseers of the International Rescue Committee, in an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/26, A10, 2.11M) writes that the recently passed "Sensenbrenner-King" immigration bill "scares me because it has the potential of turning neighbor against neighbor -- and of changing our country into a place of fear and mistrust. … The bill contains a provision punishing anyone who 'assists, [or] encourages . . . a person who . . . lacks lawful authority to remain in the United States' to remain here." Grove states, "This could change the nature of our society in a way that I have seen firsthand. As a Jewish child hiding from the Nazis in Hungary, I saw how the persecution of non-Jewish Hungarians who hid their Jewish friends or neighbors cast a wide blanket of fear over everyone. This fear led to mistrust, and mistrust led to hostility, until neighbors turned upon neighbors in order to protect themselves. Is this what we want?"

Mexican Presidential Candidate Seeks To Boost Profile. The New York Times (1/26, McKinley, 1.19M) reports on Mexican presidential candidate Felipe Calderón's efforts to succeed President Vicente Fox. After "a bitter primary fight last year, Mr. Calderón transformed himself from a little-known former energy commissioner into the best hope for the president's right-of-center party. He is running a strong second in most opinion polls to the leftist former mayor of Mexico City, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, and many political strategists say he has a chance to win the election on July 2." Yet, "outside the capital's opinion-makers and party insiders, surveys show that one in five Mexican voters still do not know who Mr. Calderón is, and as the presidential campaign officially kicked off last week, he made his first tour to try to change that."

Musharraf Vows To Construct Natural-Gas Pipeline To Iran. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Champion, Kempe, 2.11M) reports, "Pakistani president Pervez Musharraf "said his country would build a planned natural-gas pipeline from Iran without India's participation if talks among the three nations continue to produce no result." His "threat came at a delicate time for Gen. Pervez Musharraf, while he is having to balance domestic public opinion and relations with the U.S., India and Iran." At the World Economic Forum he "said Pakistan had opened bilateral talks with Tehran to build a gas pipeline that would run from Iran." But India has "expressed concern about recent attacks on existing gas and power lines in Baluchistan, the region of South Western Pakistan through which a pipeline from Iran would pass. Gen. Musharraf played down the threat posed by Baluchistan militants, dismissing the conflict as limited to one isolated local tribe." His "tough line on the pipeline talks contrasts with that of his prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, while in New York last week."

OPEC Will Refrain From Cutting Oil Output. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Bahree, 2.11M) reports that OPEC "is widely expected to refrain from trimming output levels when its oil ministers meet in Vienna next week, but Iran remains a wild card." The Journal notes, "With the price of oil nearing records recently, an OPEC decision to continue pumping oil at close to capacity should reassure markets of plentiful supply, something Saudi Arabia appears to favor and the U.S. seems to be counting on. In short, there is no economic incentive for OPEC to trim output when market forces have sent billions of extra dollars pouring into the coffers of oil-rich countries anyway." But Iran "could use the OPEC meeting to send a warning to Western Europe and the U.S., both big oil importers." Meanwhile, "U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman says he has been in regular contact with oil producers. 'By and large, they seem to be understanding that we have a situation where there needs to be more oil rather than less oil in the world,' Mr. Bodman said this week."

South Korea Ignores US Call For Action On North Korean Financial Activity. The Washington Times (1/26, Salmon, 90K) reports, "A day after the United States urged South Korea to take an active stance against what it contends are North Korea's illicit financial activities, Seoul refused to say whether it would take action and made clear it opposed any attempt at regime change in Pyongyang." South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun said, "When it comes to the North Korean regime, raising issues about it or pressuring it or sometimes wishing for its collapse, on that position of some Americans, we do not agree." The Times notes, "By 'some Americans,' Mr. Roh appeared to be referring to hard-liners in the Bush administration who favor toppling North Korean strongman Kim Jong-il."

US, South Korea Close To Reaching Free Trade Deal. The Washington Post (1/26, D6, Blustein, 744K) reports, "The United States and South Korea are very close to launching negotiations for a free-trade agreement, which would be the most economically significant free-trade pact for Washington since the North American Free Trade Agreement." Yet "both sides have been reluctant to start formal talks until they are reasonably confident that the negotiations would end in agreement. South Korea's farmers are bitterly opposed to opening their country's agricultural markets, and their political clout could scuttle a deal." While "plans to launch the U.S.-Korea talks could still founder, officials and other sources who have spoken recently with negotiators said an announcement is likely to materialize before long. Asked about the prospects, one administration official replied, 'How do you say 'soon' in Korean?'" And "Rob Portman, the U.S. trade representative, heightened the speculation Friday when he told reporters, 'We'll be announcing some additional [free-trade agreement] partners soon. As I think you will notice, they will not be with small economies because I do think we need to move on to some larger economies.'"

"Gas War" Between Russia And Ukraine Leads To European Shortages. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, White, Crawford, 2.11M) reports, "Bickering over natural-gas shipments intensified between Moscow and Kiev has reduced supplies of Russian gas to Europe, led to shortages in several countries and fueled energy-security anxieties across a continent gripped by an arctic cold snap." Few experts "expect a repeat of Russia's New Year's gas cutoff to Ukraine. … But as details of the Jan. 4 deal have emerged, doubts have grown about whether it sets the stable foundation for supplies and exports to Europe that its backers claim." Despite reassurances from both countries, "the two sides yesterday failed to reach agreement on the details of implementing the Jan. 4 compromise, intended to halt what is known as the 'gas war' in the region."

Putin Claims Alleged British Spies Linked To NGOs. The Washington Post (1/26, A16, Finn, 744K) reports, "Russian President Vladimir Putin on Wednesday linked the scandal to foreign financing of nongovernmental organizations in Russia, a connection that grass-roots activists say is tangential and being used to smear their work." Putin said, "The situation is regrettable, as we have seen, when attempts are made to use secret services to work with nongovernmental organizations and when financing is carried out through secret services' channels." The UK government "has refused to comment on the espionage charges, but has denied it was doing anything illegal with nongovernmental organizations." And "Russian authorities have so far presented no evidence that the alleged spy ring recruited human rights activists." Yet the claims have been "seized on by many Russian politicians. The lower house of parliament, by a vote of 401 to 6, passed a resolution Wednesday condemning the involvement of foreign intelligence services with the private groups."

The New York Times (1/26, Myers, 1.19M) notes, "Putin's "remarks intensified a furor" that "could worsen relations with Britain and other countries as Russia presses its assault on European and American financial support of groups that criticize the Kremlin." Putin "said Russia was still considering whether to expel the four diplomats, all mid-ranking secretaries in the British Embassy, indicating for the first time that they had not yet been expelled or withdrawn, though the espionage that was alleged was reported to have been uncovered last fall."

Google Complies With Chinese Censorship. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 10, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "Google has launched a new search engine today in China, but in order to do it, it had to agree to restrictions from the communist government." CBS (Gonzales) added, "Just last week, Google stood up to another government, the US government, and refused to turn over personal information the Justice Department wants for its defense of an anti-pornography law." Larry Magid, CBS technology analyst: "The fact that they're making a strong, stand firm with the Justice Department over privacy and then being very loose with the Chinese over censorship, I find a little bit disturbing." Gonzales: "Both decisions actually make good business sense for Google. The company can't afford to spook American users, and it has to get a foothold in the world's largest market."

GOP Lawmaker To Question Google's Move. The Financial Times (1/26, Kirchgaessner) reports, "Google will be called to task in Washington next month following a controversial decision by the internet search engine to launch a China-based version of its website that will censor results to avoid angering the country's Communist government." Rep. Chris Smith's decision "to call for a February 16 hearing to examine the operating procedures of US internet companies in China, represents the first signs of what could become a serious backlash against Google and other internet companies in Washington that are perceived as capitulating to the Chinese government."

Zoellick Sends Message About Strengthening US Relations With China. The Washington Post (1/26, A16, Cody, 744K) reports that deputy secretary of state Robert Zoellick's appearance with a Chinese panda "was seen at least in part as a signal to China about where he wants to steer U.S.-Chinese relations. The official New China News Agency received his message 10-4. It immediately transmitted a happy photo of Zoellick and Jing Jing around the country, illustrating the government's view that good U.S.-China relations are essential and, in fact, getting better and better." His "gesture, in another reading, could also be seen as a signal of where he stands in the Washington debate about China. Interpreted that way, becoming a public panda-hugger was an eloquent endorsement of the view that engagement with Beijing is the best path for the United States and that China's emergence as an Asian power does not have to mean conflict in the Pacific." Zoellick's trip "also included specific talks on issues that could be seen as a test of the U.S.-Chinese engagement his panda photo was meant to symbolize. These, he said, included China's stand on the effort to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, China's role in diplomacy to persuade North Korea to eliminate its nuclear weapons program and China's currency policies at a time of soaring U.S. trade deficits."

Concerns Raised Chinese Economic Growth May Be Too Rapid. The Washington Post (1/26, D1, Goodman, 744K) reports, "Led by surging exports, China's economy grew by 9.9 percent last year, the government announced Wednesday, underscoring the swiftness by which this once insular communist country has remade itself into a global trading power." But "the news also increased concern that China could be growing too fast, despite measures aimed at cooling the hottest parts of the economy. Aggressive investment has produced too many factories, heightening trade tensions with the United States as China exports surplus wares such as steel, depressing prices globally. Chinese officials worry that unneeded plants could deliver a crippling era of deflation -- falling prices -- which hurts profits and reduces incentives for companies to invest. Such a syndrome kept Japan mired in recession and unemployment for much of the past 16 years."

Report Suggests China Has Fewer AIDS Cases. The New York Times (1/26, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "China countered the long-held suspicion that it has undercounted the number of people with H.I.V. and AIDS by releasing a new, more extensive estimate on Wednesday that found the opposite: that the country had actually overestimated its number of cases." The new WHO and United Nations AIDS program report "lowered the country's estimated number of H.I.V. and AIDS cases to 650,000 from the official figure of 840,000 released by the government in 2003. Many experts and AIDS workers have long believed that China has at least 1.5 million cases, possibly far more, and some expressed skepticism that the new figure was any more reliable than past estimates."

European Commission Proposes "Nordic-Style" Economic Reforms. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Echikson, 2.11M) reports, "The European Commission presented a new plan to reinvigorate Europe's economies, calling for a Nordic-style, seemingly social-democratic approach rather than an Anglo-Saxon free-market model." The report "gave the most praise to northern European countries that are increasing spending on research and development universities and pursuing interventionist jobs policies." It "also called for the creation of a competitive, continent-wide energy program, and support for small and medium-size businesses." It represents Commission President José Manuel Barroso's attempt to recover the initiative after a tough first year in office. Many of his previous plans for jump-starting Europe's economies have faltered."

Sri Lankan Factions To Resume Peace Talks. The New York Times (1/26, Senanayake, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports, "In a measure of how intractable this country's ethnic conflict is, the warring parties agreed Wednesday to begin talking to each other again, after more than 18 months of deadlock over a site for peace talks and with scores of killings in the meantime." The negotiations "would focus on strengthening an all-but-ineffectual four-year-old cease-fire agreement. They are scheduled to take place in Geneva, starting as early as February." While "modest," the agreement "represents a major breakthrough in the decade-long war."

African Worshipers Mix Islam With Christianity. The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, McLaughlin, 61K) reports that "worshipers at 'The True

Message of God Mission' say it's entirely natural for Christianity and Islam to coexist, even overlap. They begin their worship by praying at the Jesus alcove and then 'running their deliverance' - sprinting laps around the mosque's mosaic-tiled courtyard, praying to the one God for forgiveness and help. They say it's akin to Israelites circling the walls of Jericho - and Muslims swirling around the Ka'ba shrine in Mecca." The group represents "a window on an ongoing religious ferment in Africa. It's still up for debate whether this group, and others like it, could become models for Muslim-Christian unity worldwide or whether they're uniquely African. But either way, they are 'part of a trend,' says Dana Robert, a Boston University religion professor."

Villagers Flee Nigerian Troops. The New York Times/Reuters (1/26) reports, "Villagers fled Nigeria's lawless delta on Wednesday amid fears of military reprisals after a wave of attacks on foreign oil companies by ethnic Ijaw militiamen." Reuters adds, "The army deployed more troops to major installations, and oil companies tightened security around offices a day after heavily armed men stormed the headquarters of the Italian oil firm Agip, robbing a bank on the premises and killing eight policemen and a civilian."

Annan Denies Arranging Deal For Son's Car. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Farley, 958K) reports that after his son, Kojo Annan, agreed to reimburse Ghana for the import duties on a car he misidentified as belonging to his father, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan "welcomed news of his son's move. 'It was the right thing to do. … He knew I wanted him to sort it out, clean it up. It was between him, his lawyer and the government." Asked if "he, as secretary-general, secured the tax break for his son, Annan said, 'Absolutely not. It was done behind my back.'"

Former Surfer Volunteers For International Disaster Relief. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 11, 2:20, Wright) reported, "The remarkable story of one American making so much of a difference. He was a laidback, California surfer, until he saw the damage done by the tsunami" ABC (Wright): "If relief organizations had special forces, Matt George would be a Green Beret. He's a one-man trauma ward, in what may be the coldest clinic on earth. A builder doing what he calls extreme home makeovers. And he delivers supplies where no aid workers have gone before."

Pinochet's Daughter Seeks Asylum In US. The Washington Post (1/26, A20, Reel, Constable, 744K) reports, "The oldest daughter of the former Chilean dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet was detained Wednesday at Dulles International Airport outside Washington, where she requested political asylum, a Chilean official said." Lucia Pinochet "had been served with a subpoena over the weekend in Chile, along with her mother and three siblings. They had been ordered to appear in court on Monday…on tax fraud charges connected to a probe of her father's illegal bank accounts." A DHS spokesman "said she was in U.S. custody at the airport in Virginia 'pending resolution of her immigration status.'" And "Chile's Interior Minister, Francisco Vidal, said U.S. Ambassador Craig Kelly informed his government that Pinochet, sought on an international arrest warrant, had requested asylum. U.S. officials said they could not comment on that issue."

Success Of Bush Allies In War In Iraq Contrasted With Opponents' Downfall. Columnist Mark Steyn in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) writes, "Remember the conventional wisdom of 2004? Back then, you'll recall, it was the many members of George Bush's 'unilateral' coalition who were supposed to be in trouble, not least the three doughty warriors of the Anglosphere -- the president, Tony Blair and John Howard -- who would all be paying a terrible electoral price for lying their way into war in Iraq. The Democrats' position was that Mr. Bush's rinky-dink nickel-&-dime allies didn't count: The president has 'alienated almost everyone,' said Jimmy Carter, 'and now we have just a handful of little tiny countries supposedly helping us in Iraq.' (That would be Britain, Australia, Poland, Japan . . .) Instead of those nobodies, John Kerry pledged that, under his leadership, 'America will rejoin the community of nations' -- by which he meant Jacques Chirac, Gerhard Schröder, the Belgian guy." But now "Bush, Blair, Howard and Koizumi are all re-elected, while Mr. Chirac is the lamest of lame ducks, and his ingrate citizenry have tossed out his big legacy, the European Constitution; Mr. Schröder's government was defeated and he's now shilling for Russia's state-owned Gazprom ('It's all about Gaz!'); and the latest member of the coalition of the unwilling to hit the skids is Canada's Liberal Party, which fell from office on Monday. John Kerry may have wanted to 'rejoin the community of nations.' Instead, 'the community of nations' has joined John Kerry, windsurfing off Nantucket in electric-yellow buttock-hugging Lycra, or whatever he's doing these days."

WSJournal Honors Memory Of Free Market Leader Of Hong Kong. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) editorializes, "Hong Kong's prosperity since World War II is sometimes referred to as a 'miracle.' But miracles require the intervention of a deity, whereas Hong Kong's remarkable economic growth between 1945 and its handover to China in 1997 owes a great deal to the nonintervention of a mortal man, John James Cowperthwaite, who died over the weekend at the age of 90." As Financial Secretary from

1961-1971, Cowperthwaite "was the architect and guardian of the greatest natural experiment in free-market capitalism in the postwar world." The Journal concludes, "Other would-be central planners could learn a lot from what John Cowperthwaite didn't do."

NYTimes Applauds African Union Rejection Of Sudan Leadership. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) editorializes, "The African Union did the right thing in rejecting Sudan's bid for the rotating presidency of the organization. Allowing President Omar Hassan al-Bashir of Sudan to become Africa's face to the world would have sent just about every wrong message imaginable." But while "rebuffed for now, Mr. Bashir was promised the group's presidency in 2007, and for now the chair will go to the Congo Republic, hardly a model of human rights. Giving Sudan the African Union presidency next year will be just as unacceptable as it was this year."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter To Question Gonzales On NSA Surveillance. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/26, McGough) reports, "If Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales thought he might be spared tough questioning from Republican senators when he testifies about the warrantless wiretapping of Americans thought to be in contact with foreign terrorists, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., yesterday disabused him of that notion." The Post-Gazette continues, "In a letter sent to the attorney general and shared with the press, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee propounded a series of questions that in a courtroom setting might be called 'leading' and requested that Mr. Gonzales answer them in his opening statement before the committee on Feb. 6. … The combative nature of the letter wasn't altered by the fact that the printed salutation to 'Attorney General Gonzales' was replaced by a hand-written 'Al.'" The Post-Gazette adds, "The letter honed in on the Bush administration's assertion-ridiculed by critics -- that Congress empowered the president to engage in electronic surveillance of Americans without a court order when it passed a resolution after the Sept. 11 2001, attacks authorizing him to 'use all necessary and appropriate force' against terrorists. … Mr. Specter asked: 'In interpreting whether Congress intended to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act by the Sept. 14, 2001, resolution, would it be relevant on the issue of congressional intent that the administration did not specifically ask for an expansion for executive powers under FISA?' … Mr. Specter further asked: 'If Congress had intended to amend FISA by the resolution, wouldn't Congress have specifically acted to [do so] as Congress did in passing the Patriot Act giving the executive expanded powers and greater flexibility in using "roving" wiretaps?' … Mr. Specter also made it clear he would press Mr. Gonzales about the administration's other legal rationale for the surveillance -- that it flowed from Mr. Bush's constitutional authority as commander-in-chief."

The National Journal's Technology Daily (1/25, Stirland) reports, "Pressure mounted on the Bush administration Wednesday to provide lawmakers with answers on domestic spying activities. … Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., released a three-page letter with detailed questions to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on the president's decision in 2002 to secretly authorize domestic wiretaps without warrants. … The letter includes many of the questions that constitutional scholars have been posing about the president's order, and several questions could put Gonzales in an awkward position." Technology Daily adds, "At the same time, Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee demanded that Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., hold a business meeting so the committee can vote to investigate several aspects of the administration's domestic spying. … Under committee rules, Roberts is obligated to hold a meeting if at least five members formally ask for one. All seven Democrats on the panel signed the request to Roberts." Technology Daily notes, "A majority vote is needed to move ahead with the investigation. Two Republicans on the committee, Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine, have asked Roberts for a hearing on the matter. Roberts has said nothing publicly about holding a hearing. … Also on Wednesday, a group of Democrats, including Sens. Richard Durbin of Illinois and Charles Schumer of New York, sent a letter to President Bush asking him for specific changes in the law that he believes are necessary to permit effective surveillance of suspected terrorists."

Gonzales Warned To Expect Tough Questions From Senate Committee. The CBS Evening News (1/25, lead story, 4:00, Roberts) noted, "NSA officials aren't likely to be called in the first round of hearings, but in a letter, the Attorney General was warned by the Judiciary Committee chair, he's in for a full day of grilling on February 6. Among the questions: Why did the President bypass the Federal court that covers wire taps, and how does he justify not more fully informing Congress? The President insists he has informed Congress but complains existing laws aren't nimble enough to cover the explosion of technology through which terrorists communicate."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, lead story, 3:00, Mitchell) also noted, "The White House says when Congress authorized the war on terror after 9/11, it gave the President the power to spy without court orders. But even some powerful Republicans are challenging the program's legality. Today, Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter sent this 'dear Al' letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, listing 15 tough questions he will be asked at a hearing two weeks from now, including whether the spying was an illegal expansion of presidential power." Sen. Specter: "There was no thought when we passed the authorization for the use of force that it had implications for electronic surveillance."

The Baltimore Sun (1/26, Davis, 296K) focuses on Specter's letter, reporting that even as Bush spoke, "questions mounted about the administration's legal justifications for the program. A key Republican senator took issue with Bush's defense of the operation, which was secretly authorized by the president after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and targets some communications inside the United States. Also, new reports surfaced suggesting that the administration had rejected an earlier proposal in Congress that would have made it easier to obtain court approval for domestic wiretapping."

Administration Dismissed 2002 Proposal To Change Surveillance Warrant Standard. The Washington Post (1/26, A4, Eggen) reports, "The Bush administration rejected a 2002 Senate proposal that would have made it easier for FBI agents to obtain surveillance warrants in terrorism cases, concluding that the system was working well and that it would likely be unconstitutional to lower the legal standard." The Post continues, "The proposed legislation by Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) would have allowed the FBI to obtain surveillance warrants for non-U.S. citizens if they had a 'reasonable suspicion' they were connected to terrorism -- a lower standard than the 'probable cause' requirement in the statute that governs the warrants. … The administration has contended that it launched a secret program of warrantless domestic eavesdropping by the National Security Agency in part because of the time it takes to obtain such secret warrants from federal judges under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA)." The Post adds, "The wiretapping program, ordered by President Bush in 2001, is used when intelligence agents have a 'reasonable basis to believe' that a target is tied to al Qaeda or related groups, according to recent statements by administration officials. It can be used on U.S. citizens as well as foreign nationals, without court oversight. … Democrats and national security law experts who oppose the NSA program say the Justice Department's opposition to the DeWine legislation seriously undermines arguments by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and others, who have said the NSA spying is constitutional and that surveillance warrants are often too cumbersome to obtain. … 'It's entirely inconsistent with their current position,' said Philip B. Heymann, a deputy attorney general in the Clinton administration who teaches law at Harvard University. 'The only reason to do what they've been doing is because they wanted a lower standard than 'probable cause.' A member of Congress offered that to them, but they turned it down.'" The Post notes, "But Justice Department officials disagreed, saying the standard the department opposed in 2002 is legally different from the one used by the NSA. … 'The FISA "probable cause" standard is essentially the same as the "reasonable basis" standard used in the terrorist surveillance program,' said spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos, using the term for the NSA program the White House has adopted. 'The "reasonable suspicion" standard, which is lower than both of these, is not used in either program.' … Justice officials also said that even under a different standard, the process of obtaining a surveillance warrant would take longer than is necessary for the NSA to efficiently track suspected terrorists."

Under the headline "Words, Deeds On Spying Differed," The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Savage, 958K) also reports on the 2002 bill, noting that the administration's "public position then was the mirror opposite of its rationale today in defending its warrantless domestic spying program, which has come under attack as a violation of civil liberties. … A Justice Department spokesman confirmed Wednesday the administration had opposed changing the law in 2002 in part because it did not want to publicly debate the issue. 'There was a conscious choice not to have a public discussion about it. It could have exposed the program. This was a military defense intelligence program,' said the spokesman." The Times notes Sen. Patrick Leahy "accused the administration of having tried 'to paper over the legality of a secret spying program. If they really believed the current law is too burdensome, the Bush administration should have asked Congress to change it, but they did not. Instead a top lawyer in the Bush administration did just the opposite.'"

Knight Ridder (1/26, Landay) reports, "James A. Baker, the Justice Department's top lawyer on intelligence policy, made the statement before the Senate Intelligence Committee on July 31, 2002. He was laying out the department's position on an amendment to FISA proposed by Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio. The committee rejected DeWine's proposal, leaving FISA intact. … So while Congress chose not to weaken FISA in 2002, today Bush and his allies contend that Congress implicitly gave Bush the authority to evade FISA's requirements when it authorized him to use force in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks three days after they occurred - a contention that many lawmakers reject." Knight Ridder adds, "Glenn Greenwald, an Internet blogger, first connected the earlier Justice Department statement to the Bush administration's current arguments on his Web log, called Unclaimed Territory. … Baker's 2002 statement drew new attention Wednesday as the White House continued its campaign to justify eavesdropping on Americans who are suspected of being in contact with al-Qaida or other terrorist groups, despite possible violation of FISA." Knight Ridder notes, "Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said Wednesday that Gonzales stands by the administration's current view that FISA warrant requirements impose 'additional layers of review' that sacrifice 'critical speed and agility.'"

Administration Launches Campaign To Frame Surveillance Debate. The Dallas Morning News (1/26, Mittelstadt) reports, "The Bush administration raced this week to defend its warrantless domestic spying program, with several aims in mind, experts say: Win over a conflicted public; force Democrats into an arena that plays to GOP strength; and head off talk of impeachment and special prosecutors." The News continues, "With polls showing the public sharply divided over the controversial surveillance program, the White House and its critics – Democrats, small-government conservatives and civil libertarians – are engaged in a high-stakes contest to frame the debate. … 'If it's defined primarily as "government abuse, the president out of control, the White House running roughshod over basic constitutional rights," it would be a major problem for an extended period of time for the president – both on Capitol Hill but also with the voters,' said political analyst Stuart Rothenberg. … 'If the issue is defined more as "protecting national security, keeping people safe, stopping terrorism," then what the Democrats immediately saw might be a good issue for them could actually be turned around for the president and the Republican Party.' … Though the court of public opinion is key, some suggest that the political system or the courts will be the ultimate arbiter of the program's legality – and the far weightier question of whether Mr. Bush is claiming executive powers outside the bounds of the Constitution or the law." The News notes, "Mr. Specter has summoned Attorney General Al Gonzales for a Feb. 6 hearing and is under pressure from Democrats to invite former Deputy Attorney General James Comey and other administration officials who reportedly raised concerns about the legality of the domestic surveillance."

Debate Over Legality Of NSA Surveillance Narrows. Fox News (1/26) reports, "After three days of a Bush administration offensive and weeks of debate and accusations, some legal experts are coming to terms on what is illegal and what is not in the National Security Agency electronic surveillance program. … 'When the president goes around and speaks ... and says we're monitoring calls from overseas from Al Qaeda to the United States, the NSA can go ahead and do that now under the law,' Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said after the Senate Judiciary confirmation hearing of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito." Fox News continues, "But Kennedy said independent organizations, like the Congressional Research Service, have studied the legality of the NSA program and say the president has gone beyond what the rules allow. Bush, however, says the eavesdropping program is legal and doesn't overstep the boundaries allowed to him by the Constitution and congressional resolution. … According to legal experts, hypothetically, if the NSA had intercepted calls from alleged terrorists such as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed or Ramzi Binalshibb, both now in custody, while they were abroad, then U.S. intelligence agents could listen to the calls without a warrant. That goes for phone calls with people on the other end of the line who happen to be in United States. … Only when the person inside the United States becomes the target of surveillance is a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance court required. … Other experts agree that a warrant is not needed until the U.S.-based individual becomes a suspect. … But others argue that the law says domestic communications monitoring rules apply even when only one end of the call is on U.S. soil. They say that's why Bush signed a highly classified directive approving the program and has to re-approve it every 45 days."

Bush Continues Defense Of NSA Domestic Surveillance Program. President Bush defended the NSA domestic surveillance program yesterday. Media reports describe the President continuing to wage a "campaign" style offensive against its critics, with CBS saying Bush used "his strongest words yet to defend the program" and ABC saying he "made the most dramatic link yet between the September 11th attacks and his controversial domestic spying program." ABC, like most print sources this morning, was referring to the President's reference to the latest Osama Bin Laden tape.

Bush said the tape was a reminder of how serious the terror threat is. Reuters (1/26) reports Bush said "he took…bin Laden's threats of another attack seriously and invoked the al Qaeda leader's recent audiotape to defend a domestic eavesdropping program." The AP (1/26, Pickler) also focuses on Bush's Bin Laden argument, as does the Washington Times (1/26, Sammon, 90K), which notes the

President "the unusual step of imploring Americans to heed the warnings of…bin Laden." Likewise, USA Today (1/26, 2.31M) headlines its brief report "Take Bin Laden Threat Seriously, Bush Warns."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, lead story, 4:00, Schieffer) reported, "The President has clearly decided the best defense is a good offense. Democrats and even some within his own party have raised strong criticism of his decision to eavesdrop without warrants on some Americans, but today the President used his strongest words yet to defend the program." CBS (Roberts) added, "Bush privately told NSA staff today they have his 100% support in the eavesdropping program." His "visit was accompanied by a new White House PR line, casting the program as a vital military operation, one that can't wait for courts to consider warrants." Scott McClellan: "Do you expect our commanders in a time of war to go to a court while they're trying to survey the enemy? I don't think so."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 5, 0:42, Vargas) reported, "Bush made the most dramatic link yet between the September 11th attacks and his controversial domestic spying program." At the NSA he "said had the eavesdropping program been in effect prior to 9/11, the hijackers might have been stopped." Bush: "We know that two of the hijackers who struck the Pentagon were inside the United States, communicating with al Qaeda operatives overseas. But we didn't realize they were here plotting the attack until it was too late. We must be able to connect the dots, before the terrorists strike, so we can stop new attacks."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, lead story, 3:00, Williams) reported, "When it was first disclosed, the critics pounced upon learning that American intelligence personnel were eavesdropping on Americans who were placing suspect phone calls outside of the country. And while many Americans still say it's illegal domestic spying, the president insists on calling it a terrorist surveillance program and insists it's necessary and within his legal powers. And today, he took his argument right to the source." NBC (Mitchell) added, "Inside the NSA, he brushed off critics who say it is illegal." President Bush: "All I would ask them to do is listen to the words of Osama bin Laden and take him seriously. When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it."

Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Cameron) said Bush "reiterated that the program has helped prevent attacks and saved lives and that the US must detect and track all al Qaeda communications to secure the homeland."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Bash) added, "One of the things that even the President's opponents say that they give him credit for is knowing how to run a campaign, and that's exactly what the White House has been doing in trying to defend the controversial spying program this whole week. They are also really pulling out all the stops. One of the things that they did…was have the President himself" go to the NSA "to not only thank the people who are conducting his program, but also to, of course, make the arguments that we've heard time and time again about why it is legal and necessary. But another thing that sort of fell into the President's lap, if you will, was, of course, the tape from Osama bin Laden. And so the White House, for the first time today, had the President use that in making the argument for this program." CNN added that Bush "spent a lot of time on making the argument at the NSA today that it is just perhaps people who are talking to members of al Qaeda who could be listened in on, that it is not just people in the United States who are being surveilled, if you will. That is an argument that we've heard many times but certainly more so today."

The Washington Post (1/26, A4, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "Bush, whose aides said they consider the issue a clear political winner, is resurrecting tactics from the last campaign to make the NSA spying program a referendum on which party will keep the United States safe from terrorists." He "has dispatched top White House officials almost daily to defend the program and has sent a message to party activists that he considers fighting terrorism with tools such as NSA eavesdropping the defining issue of the November elections." The Post adds, "Exhibiting an obsession to detail not seen in the Social Security rollout a year ago, the White House is even waging a war on the semantics being used in the debate, lashing out at reporters who call the program 'domestic' spying, because the monitored calls involve a person overseas." It is also "putting out pages of highly detailed -- and often hotly disputed -- legal analyses of the program and drawing what Democratic critics and many independent analysts regard as questionable historical parallels to show Bush is following a long wartime tradition."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Gerstenzang, 958K) says Bush's visit to NSA headquarters at Ft. Meade, MD, "was part of a stepped-up campaign in recent days to gain public support for the spying program." Earlier, White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan "defended Bush's decision not to ask a special court for warrants to monitor people in the United States. 'This is a time of war. This is about wartime surveillance of the enemy,' McClellan said, adding a refinement of his earlier arguments: 'We don't ask our commanders to go to the court and ask for approval while they're trying to gain intelligence on the enemy.'"

The New York Times (1/26, Bumiller, Lichtblau, 1.19M) reports Bush "first met privately with employees at the agency, then told a small group of reporters who accompanied him that the program, which intercepts international phone calls and e-mail messages of people in the United States suspected of links to Al Qaeda, had been a crucial tool in fighting terrorism."

The President's speech was widely noted by local television news. Local coverage largely mirrored the national newscasts. For example, WGCL-TV Atlanta (1/25, 11:00 p.m.) reported, "Bush continued his aggressive defense of his domestic spying program today." KPRC-TV Houston (1/25, 4:16 p.m.) reported, "The President' s strong defense of a surveillance program is forcing some Democrats to mute criticism." KPNX-TV Phoenix (1/25, 10:12 p.m.) said Democrats "'disagree [with the President] and the Senate will hold hearings," but as KWGN-TV Denver (1/25, 9:24 p.m.) reported, this is a "controversy…the President himself seems almost anxious to keep alive."

White House Confident Public Supports Monitoring Efforts. NBC Nightly News (1/25, lead story, 3:00, Mitchell) reported, "Democrats think their best argument is the move was the power grab the President and will ultimately prove to be unpopular. Despite the furor, the White House is encouraged by recent polls, showing more Americans care about fighting terror than preserving their privacy." Andrew Kohut, independent pollster: "The public is concerned about civil liberties but what they tell us in the polls is they're more concerned about whether the government is doing enough to protect it from another terrorist attack." Mitchell: "Tonight the President plans to reauthorize the spying for as long as terrorists remain a threat."

Claims NSA Program Could Have Prevented 9/11 Attacks Challenged. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 2, 2:00, Martin) reported, "The man who ran the NSA on 9/11 has made the most powerful argument in favor of the controversial eavesdropping program." Gen. Michael Hayden: "Had this program been in effect prior to 9/11, it is my professional judgment that we would have detected some of the 9/11 al Qaeda operatives in the United States." He "offered no specifics, and Democratic members of the 9/11 commission dispute it." Former 9/11 commissioner Tim Roemer: "Indicating that an intercepted communication would somehow identify and then stop or block parts of 9/11, I think is stretching this argument entirely too far." Former 9/11 commissioner Bob Kerrey: "We lost them. There was a breakdown in communication that many has nothing to do with the inability of getting an intercept permission to listen to people's communication." Martin: "Hayden stopped just short of saying warrantless eavesdropping could have broken up the 9/11 plot, but today, the White House claimed it might have. You can't prove any of that with what the 9/11 commission found."

Republicans May Propose Expanding Administration Wiretapping Authority. As a sign of growing Republican confidence in supporting Bush's terrorist monitoring policy one unidentified GOP Senator may propose expanding the Administration's wiretapping authority. The CBS Evening News (1/25, lead story, 4:00, Roberts) reported, "The growing response from Republicans in Congress: Tell us what you need. We'll write new laws. In fact, one Republican Senator told CBS News tonight, she might consider loosening the standards for approving the wiretap and allowing more officials at the Justice Department, not just the Attorney General, to authorize eavesdropping, so that it could begin just as soon as the NSA needed it." Schieffer: "Now, just a second, John. Are you telling me, there's a feeling amongst Republicans up in the Congress that they're going to give more people in the government the authority to eavesdrop without warrants? Is that what you're saying here?" Roberts: "That's what one Republican Senator is suggesting, that instead of making all eavesdropping or wiretapping requests go through the Attorney General, that some upper-level officials might be available and able to be able to authorize those wiretaps. It would spread it out among dozens of people as opposed to a single one at the top." Schieffer: "What do you think the mood is up there? Do you think anything like that could pass?" Roberts: "It's certainty being considered by the Republicans. They have the majority in the Senate and in the House, and if they want it, they'll probably get it."

Democrats On House Intel Panel Demand Open And Closed Hearings On NSA Spying. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "Democrats on the House Intelligence Committee are demanding that the panel hold both open and closed hearings on the NSA surveillance program. In a letter to the Republican chairman, they say they want to know the purpose of the spying, when it began and when it was first authorized. They want to know the targets of the eavesdropping, who decides what information to collect."

Hillary Clinton Calls Bush's Explanations Of Domestic Spying Program "Strange And Farfetched." CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "Senator Hillary Clinton says she doesn't know if Mr. Bush broke the law by authorizing these wiretaps without warrants, but today the New York Democrat called the President's explanations about domestic spying -- and I'm quoting now – 'strange and farfetched.'"

Under the headline "Rift Between Parties Over NSA Wiretapping Grows," the Washington Post (1/26, A4, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "In the latest sign of the escalating debate on the issue, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) called Bush's rationale a 'strange' and dangerous legal stretch." The "conflicting views of the NSA spying program highlighted by the Bush-Clinton exchange reflect a widening divide over warrantless eavesdropping," and "how leaders in both major parties are trying to shape the debate in preparation for upcoming congressional hearings and this year's elections."

LATimes Says Bush Equating Appeasement With Standing Up For Rule Of Law. In an editorial titled "Spying

By Another Name," the Los Angeles Times (1/26, 958K) says, "With polls showing the American public increasingly skeptical about the need to abridge core constitutional freedoms to wage the war on terrorism, the Bush administration launched a major PR offensive this week to justify its decision to conduct warrantless wiretapping within the United States." The White House "deserves credit for at least making its case. Unfortunately for the president, it's a weak case, and repetition doesn't make it any better." The Administration's "legal case remains wobbly, which may explain…Bush's churlish attitude toward his critics." The President "is equating concerns about the legality of bypassing the courts to obtain a warrant to eavesdrop on Americans with a lack of appreciation for the threats posed by Al Qaeda. In Bush's world, only appeasers stand up for the Constitution."

Judge Orders US To Give Moussaoui Defense Documents About Pre-9/11 Intelligence. The AP (1/26) reports US District Judge Leonie Brinkema "has ordered the government to give admitted terrorist conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's defense team documents describing what officials knew before Sept. 11, 2001, about al-Qaeda threats and some of its hijackers. … 'Several of the categories of information are so critical to the issues in this case that the court can address some of the requests without a response,' Brinkema wrote. 'Moreover, given the increasingly shortening time before the start of the trial, discovery issues must be resolved quickly.' Granted Tuesday under seal, her order was released Wednesday after government censors blacked out about five lines of it." The AP notes that the "data clearly was sought by the defense for use in the first part of the upcoming court proceeding, in which prosecutors will try to convince jurors that the FBI would have prevented the Sept. 11 attacks if Moussaoui had told federal agents what he knew about al-Qaeda's desire to fly planes into U.S. buildings. The defense will argue that agents had more information about the plot than Moussaoui could provide but still could not prevent the attacks."

Scripps Howard (1/25, Gordon) reports, "The ruling could create a legal showdown, for example, if it requires intelligence agencies to produce classified information that they consider too sensitive to release, even to defense lawyers with government security clearances. … Jury selection is set to begin on Feb. 6, with opening arguments slated for March 6 in a sentencing trial to determine whether Moussaoui, who pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts last April, should live or die."

Al Arian Lawyers Seek To Withdraw From Case If Retried. The AP (1/26) reports Sami al Arian's defense attorneys, Linda Moreno and Bill Moffitt, "asked a federal judge to let them off the case if prosecutors retry the former college professor on charges of aiding terrorists. … A hearing is scheduled for Friday. 'We gave everything we had, and I'm too exhausted to give anymore,' Moffitt…said Tuesday." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutor Terry Zitek told the court that if the case is retried, his team will need until June to present 'a streamlined case,' which should take about two months to present to a jury."

Texas Men Sentenced For Illegal Exports To Libya, Syria. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/26) reports Texas "brothers convicted of sending exports from their U.S. company to countries considered sponsors of terrorism were sentenced Wednesday to federal prison, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. Hazim Elashi was sentenced to 5 1/2 years in prison and will be deported after serving his sentence. His brother Ihsan 'Sammy' Elashi was given a six-year term, which will run consecutively to the four-year sentence he is currently serving. Hazim and Ihsan Elashi, their three brothers and their company," InforCom, "were convicted in 2004 on charges of making illegal technology shipments to Libya and Syria." The AP notes, "Agents from the FBI investigated InfoCom for years and raided the business the week before the Sept. 11 terror attacks. Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the original indictments against the brothers, calling it part of a campaign against 'the financiers of terror.'"

ACLU Files Lawsuit In Support Of Tariq Ramadan. The New York Times (1/26, Preston, 1.19M) reports that the ACLU filed a lawsuit in Federal District Court in Manhattan on behalf of scholar Tariq Ramadan, and three national organizations of academics or writers who have invited him to speak to their members yesterday, "seeking to strike down a clause of the USA Patriot Act that bars foreigners who endorse terrorism from entering to this country." Ramadan "has been denied a United States visa since July 2004, when he was on the verge of moving with his family to Indiana to take up a tenured professor's position at the Joan B. Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies at the University of Notre Dame. … The ACLU, joined by the New York Civil Liberties Union, brought the suit against Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asserting that the Patriot Act clause is unconstitutional and that the ban on Mr. Ramadan violates the First Amendment rights of American thinkers who want to meet with him." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A4, 2.11M) reports, "The lawsuit…intensifies the debate over the Patriot Act and reflects concerns in academia that the US's security precautions are hampering the flow of ideas between foreign and US scholars."

PATRIOT ACT:

US Scholarly Organizations File Lawsuit Over Patriot Act Visa Provision. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A4, 2.11M) reports, "Three scholarly organizations sued the federal government over its 2004 decision to revoke a visa granted to a European expert on Islam," Tariq Ramadan, "preventing him from taking a faculty position at the University of Notre Dame. The lawsuit…intensifies the debate over the Patriot Act and reflects concerns in academia that the U.S.'s security precautions are hampering the flow of ideas between foreign and U.S. scholars." The Journal adds, "The lawsuit asks the U.S. District Court in New York City to declare unconstitutional a portion of the Patriot Act that denies entry on the grounds of 'ideological exclusion' to those who have endorsed or espoused terrorist activity or who have persuaded others to do so. 'There is simply no evidence' of Mr. Ramadan supporting terrorism, said Barbara DeConcini, executive director of the American Academy of Religion, one of the plaintiff groups." The New York Times (1/26, Preston, 1.19M) notes, "The ACLU, joined by the New York Civil Liberties Union, brought the suit against" DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asserting that the Patriot Act clause is unconstitutional and that the ban on Mr. Ramadan violates the First Amendment rights of American thinkers who want to meet with him." The AP (1/25, Neumeister) and Knight Ridder (1/26, Strobel) also report on the lawsuit.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Georgia ACLU Releases Documents Allegedly Showing Spying On Activist Groups. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/26, Montgomery, 430K) reports, "In the name of fighting terrorism, the U.S. government and police agencies from the federal to the local level have been spying on Georgia anti-war rallies, peace and social action groups, and even a vegan protest, the state legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union charged Wednesday. Documents and surveillance photos obtained by the ACLU through a Freedom of Information Act request reveal a pattern of 'spying on Georgians who are our friends and neighbors, and are leading lawful lives,' attorney Gerald Weber said…outside the Georgia Homeland Security offices in downtown Atlanta. … 'Many of us remember the days of J.Edgar Hoover, and this is another reminder,' said state Rep. Nan Grogan Orrock." The Journal-Constitution adds, "A special agent at the FBI press office in Washington who would not give her name said the FBI 'investigates groups or individuals when we have information or allegations of federal law being broken. We do not investigate groups or persons exercising their constitutional right of protest or dissent.'"

The AP (1/26) reports the ACLU "released two documents from the FBI and DeKalb County Homeland Security," and "Weber says so far the ACLU has received complaints from six organizations and nearly two dozen people who fear they have been spied upon, photographed, videotaped or had their events infiltrated by government agents. He says none of them did anything that would justify surveillance but rather are critics of the Bush administration." The AP notes, "FBI spokesman Bill Carter says all FBI investigations are conducted in response to information that the people being investigated were involved in or might have information about crimes."

White House Declines To Release Documents On Katrina Warning. NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 2, 2:00, Williams) in its story on Federal Katrina relief reported, "Congress also wants answers from the White House about the poor Federal response to Katrina, and tonight members of both parties complain the President is holding back important information about who knew what and when." Sen. Joe Liebermann: "They haven't given us the documents we've asked for. They haven't let us into the people in the White House who were involved in the decision making regarding Hurricane Katrina." Gregory: "The White House cites executive privilege." Scott McClellan, White House Press Secretary: "The President believes that Senator Lieberman ought to have the right to confidential conversations with his advisors, just like all presidents have asserted they ought to have that same right."

The New York Times (1/26, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "In their four months of digging, House and Senate investigators have collected hundreds of thousands of pages of documents and testimony from governors, mayors, Homeland Security and Pentagon officials and dozens of others touched by Hurricane Katrina." While Republican leaders of the two committees are satisfied with "the mountains of still-accumulating evidence," to Democrats, "crucial holes still remain, particularly related to what senior White House aides and the president knew, and how they reacted to this knowledge, right before the storm and after it." Senator Joseph I. Lieberman "said Wednesday that he realized it was unlikely he could get the information he wanted by threatening to subpoena. Even if one were issued, the administration would probably fight it in court."

MSNBC's Hardball (1/25, Shuster) reported, "Ratcheting up a battle with Congress, the Bush White House is now refusing to turn over Hurricane Katrina related documents or make senior officials available for testimony. The Administration contends executive branch discussions about the storm are not open to review by Congress. … It was Senator Lieberman, the President's favorite Democrat, who on Tuesday alleged the Bush Administration's refusal to cooperate has killed the Katrina investigation."

Landrieu Says Administration Should Be More Forthcoming. Sen. Mary Landrieu said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/25), "I believe the committee, the Bipartisan Committee of Senator Collins and Lieberman, has asked for those records. They are truly acting in a bipartisan spirit. And we would like a full investigation of actually what happened. Not so that we can spend time blaming…but that we can prevent this from happening again, and we can get on the business of rebuilding New Orleans, Louisiana, and the Gulf Coast. So you'll have to ask them specifically what they asked for, but I would hope they would provide all the records so we could get to the bottom of whose fault it was that the levees broke and how do we fix it in the future." Asked about White House claims that the requested information is privileged, Landrieu said, "I would think it would be in the country's best interest, as we seek to protect the people of this nation from terrorist attacks, from catastrophic events, that we would have a real independent investigation of that. Our governor has turned over a great deal of information. I'm assuming that our mayor and local officials have. The White House needs to step up and be very forthcoming. But more than turning over that information, the White House needs to turn over some good plans for rebuilding. All we've heard is a lot of empty promises and criticism."

Vitter Criticizes Federal, State and Local Responses To Hurricane. Sen. David Vitter said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/25), "We need to understand what broke down at the federal level and the state level and the local level. Because things clearly broke down at every level. This was not a disaster that was predictable. This was a disaster that was utterly predicted in print, in studies like the hurricane pan exercise. And every level of government fell flat." Vitter added, "I was disappointed at the federal response, very disappointed. I said so matter of factly the Friday after the storm. I gave the whole recovery effort an F. And the state response was just as poor and the local response."

White House Rejects Plan To Buy Out Katrina Home Owners. In a story that characterized the White House as declining to approve aid for Louisiana NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 2, 2:00, Williams) reported on "the long road back for the Gulf Coast, specifically the state of Louisiana. Crippled by Katrina and hoping for a $30 billion Federal relief package that just today was shot down by the Bush White House." NBC (Gregory) added, "Despite lofty promises, the White House has rejected Louisiana's homeowner bailout plan which local officials consider it crucial for recovery." Rep. Richard Baker, New Orleans: "To leave us in that state of disrepair without the hope of recovery is very troubling." Gregory: "The White House considers the" state plan to buy out home owners as "too expensive and bureaucratic suggesting instead the state settle for the more than $6 billion in Federal grants released today to bail out just those homeowners who didn't have insurance because they lived outside the floodplain." Administration officials "say more Federal dollars may come later, but acknowledge that conservatives in Congress are worried about spiraling costs."

The New York Times (1/26, Nossiter, 1.19M) carried a similar tone, reporting, "The White House decision to withhold support from a major Congressional reconstruction plan left Louisiana officials expressing bewilderment on Wednesday over what they characterized as the lack of a workable alternative from the Bush administration. … 'The White House simply needs to tell us what their plan is,' Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said Wednesday at a news conference in Baton Rouge. 'We don't see an adequate plan. You can't fix a $12 billion problem with $6 billion.'"

Reuters (1/25, Roberts) reported, "A group representing mortgage bankers also said President George W. Bush had yet to offer an alternative that was comparable to the plan proposed in Baker's legislation to create the Louisiana Recovery Corp. 'We'll really pay attention to the State of the Union address because we'll be anxious to see what the president is going to propose as a plan for rebuilding those devastated areas,' said Kurt Pfotenhauer, senior vice president of government affairs at the Mortgage Bankers Association. 'It's clear that some plan has to be in place in order to spur the investment of private capital.'"

USA Today (1/26, Dorell, Konigsmark, 2.31M) reports, "Donald Powell, President Bush's coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, suggested that money from the government's funding grant, announced Wednesday, be doled out to roughly 20,000 homeowners who weren't in a flood zone and did not have flood insurance when Hurricane Katrina hit. State officials must draw up plans for disbursing the money and get federal approval." Blanco said the plan "simply will not work," and added that "she won't use the money as the White House recommends. 'We are not in the business of choosing between our citizens.'"

Highlighting the severity of the damage caused by Hurricane Katrina, NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 10, 1:30, Williams) also reported that some viewers were complaining about NBC's continuing coverage of the impact of Hurricane Katrina. NBC defended the extent of its coverage saying that it reported on the impact of all of last year's hurricane's in the region, but "Katrina is different. Katrina displaced two million Americans. It destroyed 350,000 homes. Not all the bodies have been found yet. It exposed cracks in our society, and it has us talking about race and class and money and relief. It affected what we pay for gas and may affect what we pay in taxes. It literally rearranged the map of the Gulf Coast. There are many heroes, but no one villain. Tonight, one of the great American cities is partially in ruins, and many of our fellow citizens are hurting and have nothing left. And in some places, nothing's been done yet." And "we intend to keep covering it."

Nagin's Comments Scrutinized. The Washington Post (1/26, C1, Haygood, 744K) reports, "New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin blew into the original Chocolate City yesterday. Everywhere he goes these days, there seem to be things to explain, his words and comments tossed about as if, well, in yet another hurricane." Attending the winter meeting of the US Conference of Mayors at the Capital Hilton, Nagin said, "I don't get what all the fuss was about when I talked about New Orleans being a chocolate city. I mean, I understand the frustration with my 'God' comments. Maybe I went a little overboard. But Chocolate City? Come on.'"

Flood Insurance Program Administrator Seeks Changes. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) reports, "The administrator of the National Flood Insurance Program asked Congress on Wednesday to allow the elimination of discounts on as many as 1.2 million policies and suggested that the government consider requiring millions more homeowners to buy coverage. The program expects to borrow $23 billion from the Treasury to pay claims from Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma." David I. Maurstad, the administrator, "asked Congress to order the program's parent agency, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, to study expanding coverage requirements to properties in areas known as 500-year flood plains, with a 0.2 percent chance of flooding in any year, and to properties protected by levees and dams. He estimated that would affect four million to six million properties."

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports "the Senate Banking Committee is preparing to overhaul the federal flood insurance program, resulting in much higher premiums for many homeowners and a likely taxpayer bailout. … While broad legislation hasn't yet been proposed, several committee members and experts who appeared before the banking panel yesterday agreed that the insurance program needs to be restructured to operate more like a private insurance company."

WAR NEWS:

US, Iraqi Forces Repel Insurgent Attacks In Ramadi. US Marines and Iraqi troops repelled insurgent attacks in Ramadi Tuesday afternoon, killing seven insurgents. The Washington Post (1/26, A18, Finer, 744K) reports, "Five insurgents -- whose assault included mortar, small-arms and machine-gun fire -- were killed by a strike from a Marine Harrier jet as they gathered in a nearby cemetery, according to a statement from Capt. Jeffrey S. Pool, a Marine spokesman in the city. Two other fighters died in a firefight after insurgents used a rocket-propelled grenade to attack a military convoy entering the city's main government compound. No U.S. or Iraqi forces were wounded in the clashes, the statement said." The Post adds, "During the fighting, Zaal Shehan Mahmoud, 30, a cameraman for the Baghdad TV network, was killed by more than 20 bullets to the head, abdomen and legs, according to Mohammed Dulaimi, a doctor at the Ramadi hospital."

Officials See Rift Between Foreign Fighters, Local Insurgents. Maj. Gen. Richard Zahner, deputy chief of staff for intelligence for multinational forces in Iraq says a deepening rift between radical foreign fighters and native Iraqi insurgents has turned violent, creating an opportunity for US forces to try to persuade local guerillas to lay down their arms and join the political process. USA Today (1/26, Jervis, 2.31M) reports, "Iraq's national security adviser, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, also said there is a rift in the insurgency, calling it a 'a major step forward in our fight against terrorism.'" Zahner "said the insurgency consists of about 12,000 to 15,000 hard-core Iraqi fighters and supporters, as well as 1,000 militants loyal to al-Qaeda in Iraq, of which about 10% are foreign."

Videos Of Insurgent Attacks Provide Training Tool For US Forces. USA Today (1/26, Diamond, 2.31M) reports, "Videotapes of insurgent attacks in Iraq have become a potent propaganda tool for militant Islamists but also a handy training aid for U.S. forces, according to Army briefing documents being given to U.S. officers deploying for duty in Iraq. Insurgents routinely videotape their attacks and sometimes post the footage on the Internet as propaganda to show tactical victories against U.S. military convoys or helicopters. A briefing report prepared by the intelligence division of the Army's Training and Doctrine Command shows how the Army is mining the insurgent tapes for ways to avoid casualties." The briefing "report says 55% of U.S. military deaths in Iraq are attributed to improvised explosive devices, the military's term for roadside bombs, and small-arms attacks. It says 59% of U.S. military deaths occurred in Baghdad and Sunni-dominated Anbar province, which runs from just west of Baghdad to the Syrian border. Designed to help soldiers know what to expect and how to counter insurgent tactics, the briefing also warns that Iranian-backed Shiite militants as well as Iraqi Sunnis and foreign Sunni fighters are regularly mounting attacks."

US Troops Train Iraqi Police To Defeat Insurgents, Combat Corruption. NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 6, 2:00, Miklaszewski) reported that Colonel Bushar Hussein, commander of Iraq's first special police brigade, and his "commandos are slowly taking back parts of the city." And

"he isn't doing it alone. For the past nine months, 10-man teams of US military advisors have trained and fought alongside Iraqi police commandos. Major General Joe Peterson heads the increased US effort to turn Iraqi police into an independent fighting force by the end of this year." Peterson: "Our troops are making a significant difference in increasing that capability." Miklaszewski: "Despite some progress, the Iraqi commandos are far from fighting entirely on their own." Peterson: "There are times when a guy will walk off down the street and buy a pack of cigarettes while we are trying to provide security. And I'll have to fix him." Miklaszewski: "In addition, some police units have been infiltrated by militias while others are reportedly ripe with corruption." And "Colonel Bushar warns that government corruption and incompetence may pose more of a threat to the future of Iraq than the insurgents. And in the long run, may be even more difficult to defeat."

US To Release Five Female Iraqi Prisoners. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 3, 0:25, Woodruff) reported, "Iraq's justice ministry said at least five Iraqi women, in US custody, would be freed soon, possibly tomorrow. This would go a long way toward meeting the demands of militants who kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll of the Christian Science Monitor. A US spokesman confirmed the release of prisoners would occur, but the US has said consistently that any release would be a coincidence and not a response to the kidnapping."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 4, :45, Schieffer) reported, "US officials insist this is not linked to the demand by the kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll that US forces release all women detainees."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Murphy, 61K) reports, "Reuters reported that Iraqi officials have suggested the delay in releasing the women was linked to the demands of the kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll, who threatened to kill her by last Friday unless all women prisoners were freed. The deadline passed with no word on Ms. Carroll's fate."

However, the Washington Times (1/26, Deshmukh, 90K) says that the Iraqi Justice Ministry official "denied that the release of the women had anything to do with kidnappers' demands, and U.S. forces have stressed they do not negotiate with hostage-takers."

Reporter Recounts Attempted Kidnapping In Iraq. The Washington Post (1/26, C1, 744K) excerpts the book "Tell Them I Didn't Cry: A Young Journalist's Story of Joy, Loss, and Survival in Iraq" by reporter Jackie Spinner. In it, Spinner writes, "For 13 months in 2004 and 2005, my half was in Baghdad, dodging mortar rounds, roadside bombs and potential kidnappers, while [twin sister] Jenny worried from home that I would not be able to keep my promise to my nephew, her young son. 'Aunt Jackie always comes back,' I told him each time I returned to Baghdad, to a place that began to feel more like home the longer I stayed." Spinner recounts a day outside Abu Ghraib prison, "when a stranger grabbed my arm and began dragging me toward a car. … Another man came up behind me and grabbed me around the waist. Someone else grabbed the pillowcase that held my belongings and threw it aside. At first I couldn't fathom what was going on. What was happening to me? Were they trying to kidnap me? They were trying to kidnap me! My heart pounded. … Once the men who grabbed me saw the Marines, they let go, and everyone scattered."

In Wake Of Carroll Kidnapping, Journalist Rethinks Dangers In Iraq. Journalist Alissa Rubin writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/26, 958K), "When Jill Carroll was kidnapped, other journalists in Iraq were aghast that something so horrible had happened to someone they knew. But many insisted privately that it never would have happened to them. … The truth is that we are working in a war zone where no rules apply. No one is safe: not Iraqis, not Westerners, not men, not women." Rubin adds, "For most journalists in Iraq, it's hard to be honest about danger, even though we talk about it all the time. … To family and friends not in Iraq, it is incomprehensible why you came here, and certainly why you returned twice, three times — in my case, over and over for nearly three years. … For me, at least, what is true is that once in a while as a journalist you get the chance to witness history, a moment when tectonic plates shift, when more is at stake than you ever imagined you would touch or see. It's the adrenaline surge of being in a place where people's lives are in the balance, where every decision counts and where what you're writing might, might just matter. … I was aware of the statistics: Since the beginning of the war, 60 journalists, five of them women, had been killed in Iraq and at least 37 abducted, according to a tally by the Committee to Protect Journalists. But like all the other foreign journalists in Iraq — fewer than 75 of us, down from more than a thousand after the war — I needed to believe that I was going to slip through. After [journalist Jill] Carroll's abduction, I don't feel that way anymore." Iraq "is hostile ground and nothing I do can make it safe."

Former General Says Iraq WMD Moved To Syria Before US Invasion. Former Iraqi general George Sada, author of "Saddam's Secrets, How an Iraqi General Survived Saddam Hussein," in an interview on Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (1/25) said, "I want to make it very clear to everybody in the world that" there were weapons of mass destruction in Iraq "and the regime used them against our Iraqi people. It was used against Kurds in the north. Against Arabs." Asked whether Iraq had the WMD when the US toppled Hussein's regime, Sada replied, "Up to the year

2002, 2002, in summer, they were in Iraq. And then when Saddam realized that the inspectors are coming on first of November and the Americans are coming, so he took the advantage of natural disaster happened in Syria, a dam was broken. So announced to the world that he is going to make an air bridge" and moved the WMD to Syria.

Kurdish Writer's Prosecution Seen As Test Of Iraq's Move Toward Democracy. The New York Times (1/26, Oppel, 1.19M) reports on Kamal Sayid Qadir a Kurd who, from Austria has written articles accusing Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani's Democratic Party of corruption "while calling members of its intelligence service, the Parastin, criminals and its chief -- Mr. Barzani's son -- a 'pimp.'" Qadir is now imprisoned in Iraq, "sentenced last month to 30 years for defaming the Parastin and Kurdish political leaders after a trial that he said had lasted 15 minutes." The Times adds, "His case, while extraordinary, is by no means unique." These prosecutions "indicate how much remains at play in newly democratic Iraq. The nation has made remarkable steps away from totalitarian rule: the overthrow and prosecution of a genocidal dictator, two national elections and the adoption of a Constitution. But it remains to be seen how far Iraq will ultimately travel toward true Western-style democracy." Iraq "is still testing the limits of responsible free speech, and some of the name-calling and rumor-mongering that goes on clearly oversteps the boundaries. Many of Mr. Qadir's criticisms exceeded what would be tolerated in other Middle East countries, particularly his assertions about the sexual proclivities of the Barzani clan. A number of Kurdish journalists who have called Mr. Qadir's imprisonment outrageous say they are nevertheless uncomfortable with some of his writings, calling them offensive and reckless."

Arrest Of Police Strains Relations Between Iraqis, UK Troops. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Moore, 958K) reports, "Tensions continued to simmer Wednesday between local Iraqi officials and British troops in the Shiite-dominated southern city of Basra, where the British this week arrested 14 law enforcement officials, including two senior police intelligence officers, allegedly linked to political corruption and assassinations. The British released several of the men Wednesday, but a spokesman for the Basra provincial council said that eight remained in custody, including three who had been transferred to a prison facility after British authorities said they had bomb-making materials in their possession. … The province has responded to the arrests by threatening to cut off all cooperation with British forces in Iraq's second-largest city."

Soldiers Make Digital Memorials For Fallen Comrades. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Searcey, 2.11M) reports, "Digital photography, video and Internet access have let soldiers in Iraq stay closer to distant friends and family than troops in any other war. Now, these electronic records are also creating a powerful and raw new wave of war memorials. … Wartime cinematographers say commanders ask to review the videos before they're shown at memorial services to make sure they don't degrade the image of soldiers with, for example, footage showing them drinking."

Hoagland Says Administration Has Been "Bitten" By Reality In Iraq. Jim Hoagland writes in the Washington Post (1/26, A25, 744K), "Iraq's Dec. 15 balloting was orderly and inspiring, but it has created an aftermath that is neither of those things. It has also forced the Bush administration into a silent reassessment of where Iraq is going and how it is going to get there. Increasingly, the country drifts toward the future as two relatively stable autonomous regions and a violently unstable central zone, all linked by a weak central government and a reduced, reactive U.S. military presence." The Bush Administration "gives no sign of trying to hurry things along as it concedes it must deal with the election results it has, not the results it wanted. Those were canceled by the poor showing of Ayad Allawi and Ahmed Chalabi -- secularists who conceivably could have been strong, independent executives -- and successful electioneering by Iranian-backed Shiite parties distrusted by Washington. … Reality has bitten the Bush administration in Iraq and forced the president to settle for less than he wanted. Let's hope that reality can now do the same with Iraq's newly empowered Shiite leaders."

In 1998, Clinton Said No-Fly Zones Over Iraq Would Be Enforced. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (1/26, 90K) excerpts a December 28,, 1998 statement by then-President Bill Clinton. Clinton said, "I think I should say a few words about an incident early this morning over the skies of Iraq, where American and British air crews were enforcing a no-fly zone in Northern Iraq. They were fired on by Iraqi surface-to-air missiles. They took evasive action, returned fire on the missile site, and returned safely to their base in Turkey ... They attacked because they were attacked. And they did the appropriate thing. We will continue to enforce the no-fly zones."

Musharaff Blames US Missile Attack For Increasing Domestic Turmoil. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Champion, Kempe, 2.11M) in an interview with Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf at the World Economic Forum reports Musharraf "said a suspected U.S. missile attack on a Pakistani village that killed civilians this month 'probably' killed five or six al Qaeda operatives, but had

'harmed our interests' by violating his country's sovereignty and feeding domestic unrest." He "said his goal is to transform Pakistani society by ending conflicts like the one in Baluchistan, defusing Islamist extremism and generally calming 'a nation in turmoil.'" Gen. Musharraf said, "We want to guard our own sovereignty." He "also said his close cooperation with the U.S. in the fight against terrorism hadn't been damaged, and that Pakistan needs the technical help the U.S. can offer to gather intelligence. 'Intelligence is far more significant and difficult than operating against [al Qaeda],' he added."

India Provides Aid To Afghanistan. The Washington Times (1/26, Nelson, 90K) reports, "India has poured more than a half-billion dollars of foreign aid into Afghanistan in the past three years in an attempt to create a friendly and stable neighbor in a volatile part of the world." India's "effort, which continues despite a Pakistani blockade of Indian goods bound for Afghanistan, touches all aspects of life." Tensions "between India and Pakistan has complicated proposed energy pipelines from Afghanistan, which would have to run through Pakistan on the way to India." But some observers "think Pakistan is more worried about losing its dominant position in Afghan trade."

Rumsfeld Takes Issue With Reports Saying US Military Is Overstretched. Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Hume) reported, "A couple of new reports suggesting that the US military is overstretched or overstressed or both drew a sharp response from the Secretary of Defense. One report was funded by the Pentagon itself." Fox (Baier) added, "On Capitol Hill today, former officials from the Clinton Administration joined top Democrats to release a new study on the state of the US armed forces. Titled 'The US Military -- Under Strain And At Risk,' it concludes the war in Iraq threatened the battle-readiness of US troops. … At the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld addressed the criticism head on." Rumsfeld "said today's US military, while trying to recover from underfunding…is far from broken." Rumsfeld "pointed out there are more than 2 million troops in the US military if you're counting active duty, National Guard and Reserves and only 136,000 troops in Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 5, :45, Williams) reported, "Two new reports say tonight the US military is so overburdened from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that it's near the breaking point. One report flatly warns ground forces are stretched so thin and under such enormous strain, the Pentagon may not be able to recruit and retain enough troops in the all volunteer army to defeat the insurgency. This afternoon, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld responded." Rumsfeld: "This armed force is enormously capable. In addition, it's battle hardened. And it is not a peace time force that has been in barracks or garrisons." Williams: "Rumsfeld pointed out that there are 138,000 US troops in Iraq, out of two million total including the National Guard and Reserve units."

In a brief story The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 3, :45, Schieffer) noted, "Rumsfeld took strong issue today with former Clinton Administration officials who say the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have stretched the US military to the near breaking point. At a Pentagon news conference, Rumsfeld called that misdirected, and he praised the military as, quote, 'enormously capable and battle hardened.'"

The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/26) says Rumsfeld "spoke a day after the Associated Press reported that an unreleased study conducted for the Pentagon said the Army is being overextended, thanks to the two wars, and may not be able to retain and recruit enough troops to defeat the insurgency in Iraq. Congressional Democrats released a report Wednesday that also concluded the U.S. military is under severe stress."

The Washington Times (1/26, Scarborough, 90K) reports that Rumsfeld responded to the reports with a "combative appearance at a Pentagon press conference. He reminded reporters that during the Clinton years, when the military was sent on about 50 war and peacekeeping missions, that the force suffered from lack of funding and that some units were 'hollow pieces.'" Rumsfeld "said anyone who concludes that the Army is breaking does not know what he or she is talking about. 'I suspect the people writing these things don't know, either, because I suspect that they don't have any more insight than the other people around here do,' he said. 'I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they're close to breaking. That's just not the case.'"

USA Today (1/26, Komarow, 2.31M) says Rumsfeld "dismissed" the reports, "calling their authors ill-informed about America's 'battle-hardened' forces." Speaking at a news conference, Rumsfeld said, "People just don't fully understand," adding that today's military is "battle hardened. It's not a peacetime force that has been in barracks or garrisons."

The Washington Post (1/26, A18, Tyson, 744K) reports that Rumsfeld "said a recent decision to scale back U.S. troop levels in Iraq did not grow out of a need to relieve the strain on American ground forces." Rumsfeld said, "The force is not broken," adding, "I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they're close to breaking. That's just not the case." Rumsfeld called the US military an "'enormously capable force,' as demonstrated to the world by its swift overthrow of governments in Iraq and Afghanistan. Such proven capability

'ought to increase the deterrent rather than weaken it,' he added."

Study Finds Active Duty Reservists Earn More Than In Civilian Jobs. A study released yesterday by the RAND Corporation says that nearly three-fourths of military reservists called to serve in Afghanistan and Iraq are making more money on duty than in their civilian jobs. USA Today (1/26, Komarow, 2.31M) reports, "In many cases, the troops earn a higher gross salary in civilian life. But when the federal tax exemption and other allowances approved by Congress for troops in combat are factored in, about 72% are better off, according to a study by the RAND Corp., a research institute. The RAND study, which was funded by the Pentagon, showed an average benefit of 25% over civilian pay, about $10,000 a year." USA notes, "The study results run counter to complaints by Reserve and Guard troops that they have suffered financially when activated. It is part of an effort to track the war on terrorism's effects on part-time troops."

DOJ:

Federal Judge Extends Temporary Appointment Of Alabama US Attorney. The Mobile (AL) Register (1/26, Kirby) reports, "Chief U.S. District Judge Ginny Granade has extended the term of U.S. Attorney Deborah Rhodes, whose temporary appointment to the Mobile office expires this month." The Register continues, "Rhodes took over for David York, who resigned in September amid reports of an internal Department of Justice investigation into allegations that he had an improper relationship with an assistant prosecutor." The Register adds, "Under the law, the Justice Department could replace York for a maximum of 120 days. The statute gives the chief judge of the district the power to name the U.S. attorney beyond that, and Granade said Tuesday that she complied with a request by the Justice Department to extend Rhodes' tenure until President Bush names a permanent successor. … When appointed to Mobile, Rhodes, 47, was on special assignment to the Justice Department in Washington as a counselor to the assistant attorney general of the criminal division."

DHS Assisting DOJ With Case Management System. Federal Computer Week (1/25, Arnone) reports, "The Homeland Security Department is helping the Justice Department develop new case management systems for the entire federal government, DHS' chief information officer said today." FCW continues, "DHS is working with DOJ to create a Consolidated Enforcement Environment (CEE), which allows access to all available data, analyzes data and links relevant law enforcement partners, DHS' CIO Scott Charbo said. … One goal of the collaboration is to move beyond products and create a layer of information that can be used governmentwide, Charbo said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Trial Seen As Big Test For Federal Prosecutors. The New York Times (1/26, Eichenwald) reports, "In the court of public opinion, they were convicted long ago. But as Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, the onetime leaders of Enron, step into a court of law next week, the outcome of their fraud trial is far from certain, creating one of the most closely watched and hotly contested white-collar criminal cases ever." The Times continues, "On one side of the Houston federal courtroom starting Monday will be two top-flight teams of defense lawyers, who will be taking the risky approach of proclaiming many of the controversial actions of Enron and some much-criticized statements of their clients to be legal and truthful." The Times adds, "On the other, the prosecutors for the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, who have racked up an impressive array of guilty pleas in the case, but whose performance at trial has been decidedly less dazzling. … 'For the government, if they lose the Enron case, it will be seen as a symbolic failure of their rather significant campaign against white-collar crime,' said John C. Coffee Jr., a professor at Columbia Law School. 'It will be seen as some evidence that some cases are too complicated to be brought into the criminal justice process.'" The Times notes, "Of the three major Enron-related criminal cases brought by the government before juries, guilty verdicts stand from only one, which involved Enron's booking what the government said were phantom profits on the sale of Nigerian barges to Merrill Lynch. A second case, against the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, was thrown out by the Supreme Court on appeal. The third, involving the broadband division of Enron, resulted in no convictions, but the five defendants await a retrial."

Success Of Efforts To Curb Corporate Fraud Seen As Problematic. The Washington Post (1/26, D1, Johnson, Ben White) reports, "Four years after the collapse of Enron Corp. spurred the most sweeping revisions in business regulation since the Great Depression, experts warn that the ingredients for a similar financial disaster remain." The Post continues, "Despite new laws and regulations, companies still face enormous pressure to meet short-term financial goals, creating a powerful motive for accounting fraud. Outsized executive compensation grows by the year, offering another rich incentive to cook the books. And there is no certainty that Congress will continue to fund regulatory budgets at current levels. … But some things have changed since December

2001, when Enron's sudden descent into bankruptcy protection rocked investor confidence and left the markets reeling. Accountants face independent oversight for the first time in 70 years. Most corporate board members take their jobs far more seriously. Wall Street is somewhat less willing to accommodate clients' interests." The Post adds, "Nearly a dozen experts contacted by The Washington Post, including regulators, accountants, chief executives, board members and investor advocates, agreed to fill out a corporate governance report card on the eve of the Enron trial. … Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in July 2002, imposing new duties on corporate executives, auditors and directors. The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department spent tens of millions of dollars to root out malfeasance. Along the way, prosecutors won criminal convictions and decades-long prison terms for former leaders of Adelphia Communications Corp., Tyco International Ltd. and WorldCom Inc. … But in a sense, the government efforts may have backfired, inspiring a dangerous overconfidence among investors."

Ex-Enron Employees Still Feel Effects Of Stock Price Plummet. USA Today (1/26, Armour, 2.31M) reports, "Four years after the Texas energy giant began its meltdown -- and on the eve of a criminal trial for its former top executives -- many former Enron employees still feel betrayed." Some of them, "at the end of their careers, have started over again in new jobs -- but working harder to keep up with younger co-workers. They've turned to churches and food pantries to eat, sold homes they could no longer pay for, and endured financial stresses that frayed their marriages."

Former Securities Broker Pleads Guilty To New York Market-Timing Charge. The AP (1/26, Gormley) reports, "A former Las Vegas securities broker pleaded guilty to a felony charge Wednesday in a mutual fund investigation in which investors were defrauded through improper late trading and market timing, according to New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer." The AP continues, "Daniel Calugar, 52, now of Ponte Vedra, Fla., pleaded guilty in state Supreme Court in New York City to violating a state business integrity law called the Martin Act. He was accused of entering into a secret agreement in August, 2001, that defrauded a mutual fund called the Franklin Small-Mid Cap Growth Fund. … He faces up to four years in prison when he is sentenced March 23." The AP adds, "Earlier this month, Calugar agreed to pay $153 million to settle civil charges brought by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. Calugar will relinquish $103 million in ill-gotten gains and pay a civil penalty of $50 million, the largest penalty regulators have imposed on an individual in a late trading and market timing case, SEC officials said. … Spitzer said Calugar secretly agreed to a deal with an employee of Franklin's investment adviser. Calugar would be allowed to rapidly trade in the mutual fund without paying a 2 percent penalty. Calugar then invested $10 million in another hedge fund run by Franklin and defrauded the fund and its shareholders of more than $1 million in fees that he avoided."

Livedoor Investigation Prompts Re-Examination of Japanese Accounting Standards. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Hayashi, Morse) reports, "The investigation into Internet company Livedoor Co. has pointed a spotlight" on Japanese accounting standards, which need to be upgraded, the article says. The Journal notes, "Tokyo district prosecutors arrested Livedoor Chief Executive Takafumi Horie on suspicion of violating securities law." Now, "in Japan, experts … are calling for stepped-up efforts to improve accounting standards, as companies .... increasingly use sophisticated and aggressive financial techniques." In particular, the article notes, "Japan has no standards on accounting for special-purpose companies," and no rules "on how to interpret revenue at Internet and software companies, whose business structures tend to differ significantly from those of traditional companies." However, the article notes, changes are beginning to take place, with the Financial Services Agency issuing "a guideline calling for closer examination of accounting firms and requiring companies to rotate their accountants more frequently" and the Accounting Standards Board of Japan adopting "a handful of standards in the past two months, covering areas from mergers and acquisitions to executive compensation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Leahy Seeks Information From DOJ On Google Subpoena. Reuters (1/26, Vicini) reports, "The Senate Judiciary Committee's top Democrat asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales what steps are being taken to protect Americans' privacy rights as the Justice Department demands information about Internet searches." Reuters continues, "In the letter released on Wednesday, Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont asked Gonzales about the subpoena to Google Inc. and three other companies seeking data about what millions of Americans search for on the Internet's leading search engines." Reuters adds, "Leahy asked about the types of information being sought, how the department intends to use the information while protecting individual privacy rights and civil liberties and whether it will issue any additional subpoenas. … Leahy's letter comes at a time of growing criticism in Congress over the government's monitoring of communications, after the disclosure that the

Bush administration has been conducting domestic eavesdropping after the September 11 attacks."

CNET News (1/25, Broache) reports, "Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said the department planned to respond accordingly, though he was not sure what the response would entail. … As for the privacy concerns raised by Leahy, 'We've addressed that in our subpoenas and to the search engines,' Miller said. 'We weren't seeking information about the individuals, we were only seeking the search terms....We don't even want to know the names of the people.'"

Rep Davis Questions Google's Response To Subpoeana. Government Computer News (1/25, Grimes) reports, "House Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) said today that search giant Google Inc. has 'bent over backward' to comply with the Chinese government's demand that it block certain search results in order to operate in that country. So why, he wondered, won't the company cooperate with the U.S. Justice Department in its efforts to fight online pornography?" GCN continues, "Google has refused a Justice Department subpoena for search results, saying it violated users' privacy. The government has said it needs the data to prepare a case regarding the 1998 Child Online Protection Act. … Other search companies have complied with the subpoena. … The company today also launched a Chinese version of its search site after agreeing to censor topics such as Falun Gong and Tibet. … 'Google gave the Chinese everything they wanted. They're not going to put data on there about human rights,' Davis said." GCN notes, "Davis spoke to public-sector CIOs today at a summit hosted by Micrsosoft Corp. Microsoft's MSN service also censors search results in China, as do Yahoo and others. Microsoft, Yahoo and America Online have also reportedly given the Justice Department information it was seeking. … 'What does it mean to be a corporate citizen, working to bring terrorists or child pornographers to bear? What are the boundaries?' Davis said. 'These are new areas for a lot of us that we've got to work our way through.'"

Dow Jones (1/25, Richmond) reports, "In the last week, Google Inc. stood up to one government and acquiesced to another. … The moves show the kind of treacherous terrain the Internet giant, whose corporate philosophy is 'Don't Be Evil,' must traverse as it weighs its ideals and its business interests. It also spotlights how important Google (GOOG) has become as a key waypoint on the global Internet, where individual and government interests around access to information can and do collide. … 'Google is at the cutting edge in terms of trying to figure out what is acceptable and what is not acceptable in this century,' when the Internet is making information more accessible than ever before, says Lauren Gelman, associate director of Stanford Law School's Center for Internet and Society. 'What happens to information Google collects? I think this is a big question for society as new technologies evolve and we have to rethink privacy and censorship.'"

The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Macdonald) reports that Google is confronting "an age-old business dilemma caught up in the new age of globalization: When governments demand something that compromises the interests of customers, what's a company to do?" The article notes that Google launched service in China and "because of government sensitivities there, will limit what users there can access." However, the article says, Google is also "vigorously fighting US government efforts to obtain data on its users' search habits." The article quotes one expert who lauds Google's decision to fight the subpoena, and another who dislikes Google's decision. The article notes that "So far, Google seems to be winning points for its tough stand against the US Department of Justice. According to one survey released this week, 56 percent of American users of the Internet believe Google should not release information about Web searches to the government." But overseas, the article says, "Google has endured criticism, as has Microsoft's MSN search service, for limiting what Chinese users can find."

Debate In Google Case Not Really About Privacy. The New York Times (1/26, Liptak) reports, "The Justice Department went to court last week to try to force Google, by far the world's largest Internet search engine, to turn over an entire week's worth of searches. The move, which Google is fighting, has alarmed its users, enraged privacy advocates, changed some people's Internet search habits and set off a debate about how much privacy one can expect on the Web. … But the case itself, according to people involved in it and scholars who are following it, has almost nothing to do with privacy. It will turn, instead, on serious but relatively routine questions about trade secrets and civil procedure." The Times continues, "The privacy debate prompted by the case may thus be an instance of the right answer to the wrong question. As recently demonstrated by disclosures of surveillance by the National Security Agency and secret inquiries under the USA Patriot Act, the government is aggressively collecting information to combat terror. And even in ordinary criminal prosecutions and in civil lawsuits, Internet companies including Google routinely turn over authentically private information in response to focused warrants and subpoenas from prosecutors and litigants. … But 'this particular subpoena does not raise serious privacy issues,' said Timothy Wu, a law professor at Columbia. 'These records are completely disconnected. They're just strings of words.'" The Times notes, "In its only extended discussion of its reasons for fighting the subpoena, a Google lawyer told the Justice Department in October that complying would be bad for business. 'Google objects,' the lawyer, Ashok Ramani, wrote,

'because to comply with the request could endanger its crown-jewel trade secrets.' … Mr. Ramani's five-page letter mentioned privacy only once, at the bottom of the fourth page, and then primarily in the context of perception rather than reality. … Even Google's allies are shying away from legal arguments based on privacy. The American Civil Liberties Union, for instance, said it planned to file papers supporting Google. But not on privacy grounds. 'We will probably not be making that argument,' said Aden J. Fine, a lawyer with the civil liberties union." The Times adds, "Other Internet search engine companies, including Yahoo, America Online and MSN, have complied with the same Justice Department subpoena, which also sought a random sample of a million Web addresses. The companies all said there were no privacy issues involved. … A Justice Department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, agreed. 'We specifically stated in our requests,' he said, 'that we did not want the names, or any other information, regarding the users of Google.' … None of this is to say that subpoenas for search records linked to individuals are inconceivable. Google maintains information that could be used that way, and a subpoena could ask for it. But the recent subpoena does not."

Louisiana Businessman Pleads Guilty To New Orleans Contract Fraud. The AP (1/26) reports, "A businessman described by federal prosecutors as a key player pleaded guilty Wednesday to conspiring in a kickback scheme for the biggest contract signed while Marc Morial was New Orleans mayor. Terry Songy "admitted taking kickbacks from subcontractors, participating in a larger kickback conspiracy with the city's director of property management, and failing to file federal income tax returns for 2001, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said." The AP notes, "An affidavit filed with the guilty plea states that, after FBI agents approached him, Songy 'admitted his involvement in a much larger scheme than the government was aware' of. … The indictment described Songy as sharing hundreds of thousands of dollars in kickbacks with the three major defendants: Morial associates Stan 'Pampy' Barre, a restaurant owner and Morial confidant, city property manager Kerry De Cay, and construction company owner Reginald Walker. … All three have denied wrongdoing. Their trial is scheduled Sept. 5 before U.S. District Judge Carl Barbier."

Six Indicted On Bribery Charges In Ongoing Tennessee License Fraud Probe. The Tennessean (1/26, Carey) reports, "A widespread bribery scheme funneled hundreds of illegal aliens into a Winchester, Tenn.-based driving school, netting them fraudulent licenses. And six people, including one current and one former state employee, got more than $146,000, federal prosecutors said yesterday. The U.S. attorney's office yesterday unsealed a six-count indictment of the six people who are accused of helping hundreds of people since May 2004 obtain driver's licenses they didn't earn. … 'Just as in previous investigations, you had those who thought that what they did in secret would never come to light,' said My Harrison, FBI special agent in charge for the Middle and Western Districts of Tennessee. The FBI was one of several agencies involved in the probe. U.S. Attorney Jim Vines said the people who fraudulently received licenses weren't eligible for 'a variety of reasons.'" The Tennessean adds, "The investigation, dubbed Operation Crooked Highway, has been under way by federal and state agencies for 18 months, Vines said yesterday." The Murfreesboro Daily News (1/26) notes, "The FBI charged driver's license examiner Bruce Conklin with taking about $9,200 in cash from July 2005 to January. Agents also charged Bryan Guess, owner of the Winchester Driving School…with paying bribes to Conklin and a former examiner, Teresa Jones.

The AP (1/26) reports, "Authorities said they won't know how many illegal documents were issued until all evidence is studied and declined to speculate on the total. They did say that one state worker accepted $20 per student in bribes for about 1,000 licenses or certificates. 'We come to you with another sad chapter in the book of public corruption in Tennessee,' FBI agent in charge My Harrison said at an afternoon news conference." The AP adds, "Citing a number of recent public corruption investigations in Tennessee, Harrison said agents were getting better with practice. 'If you can hear me and are involved in public corruption, the eyes of law enforcement are upon you,' she said." The Nashville City Paper (1/26, Lewis) also notes Harrison said that "it's the latest 'sad chapter' in a string of Tennessee public corruption cases." She added, "You've heard of Operation Tennessee Waltz, Operation Tarnish Blue and Operation Tarnish Shield. What can I say? Same game, only the names have changed. The title of this new chapter is, Operation Crooked Highway." The City Paper adds that as a result of the investigation, "customs officials took into custody 50 undocumented immigrants and began deportation proceedings against 50 other immigrants who were uncovered in the investigation, said Rick Crocker, assistant special agent in charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement."

IRS Agent Downplays Ryan's Eventual Declaration Of Campaign Funds As Income. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, O'Connor, 643K) reports IRS Agent Shari Schindler "on Wednesday downplayed that former Gov. George Ryan filed corrected tax returns for 1995, 1996 and 1997 several years later because Ryan knew by then of the federal investigation into his finances." Schindler "said that by the time Ryan filed the amended returns in late 2002, each of his six children had testified before the grand jury and there had been press coverage of the nature of the probe." On cross-examination, Ryan lawyer Dan Webb "contended that records showed Ryan had paid taxes on most of the travel expenses, but that certain charges hadn't been itemized in campaign disclosure reports, fell through the cracks and mistakenly weren't reported on Ryan's returns." But Assistant US Attorney Laurie Barsella "pointed out that Roger Bickel, Ryan's former chief lawyer, had spelled out for Ryan 'in plain English' that personal use of campaign funds had to be reported on his tax returns." The AP (1/26, Robinson) notes that the "verbal fencing match between" Webb and Schindler "came to an end with no one sure who emerged the victor. Webb repeatedly tried to get her to agree that Ryan couldn't be blamed if he failed to report thousands of dollars in income because he was grappling with vague, complex tax laws. Schindler coolly disagreed, saying Ryan easily could have asked his tax advisers."

Prosecution Hopes To Rest Thursday After FBI Agent's Testimony. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, O'Connor, 643K) also reports Assistant US Attorney Patrick Collins "said he still hopes to rest the prosecution case on Thursday after four months of testimony. The FBI's case agent is scheduled to be the government's last witness." And US District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer "ruled Wednesday that prosecutors can play a portion of a videotape of Ryan from November when he made a statement to reporters outside the court defending his receipt of $9,675 from the Gramm campaign." The AP (1/26, Robinson) notes, "Prosecutors indicated Wednesday night that just one more prosecution witness remains - Raymond Ruebenson, the veteran FBI man who has long been the case agent for the government's seven-year Operation Safe Road investigation that led to the former governor's indictment. But Ruebenson was absent with a case of the flu Wednesday.

Laski Vows To Fight Bribery Charges, Alleges US Withheld Exculpatory Recordings. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, Washburn, 643K) reports, "Facing federal corruption charges, a defiant James Laski vowed Wednesday to 'keep fighting,' insisted his office is running smoothly and took sharp issue with claims he was away from his job as Chicago city clerk for a prolonged period before charges were filed. 'Somebody is lying, and it isn't me,' Laski declared. The clerk's comments came after a surprise appearance at a City Council committee meeting, his first visit to the council chamber in nearly two months." The Tribune adds, "Laski implied Wednesday that exonerating portions of the recordings were not released when the U.S. attorney's office announced the charges against him on Jan. 13."

Former Campbell Aides Testify About Relationship With Contractor. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/26, Suggs, Scott, 430K) reports former Atlanta contracts compliance director Michael Sullivan testified at former Mayor Bill Campbell's corruption trial on Wednesday "that in 1994 he and the former mayor, along with city contractor Ricky Rowe, traveled together to Florida to attend a golf and tennis tournament sponsored by Black Enterprise magazine. Sullivan said the city paid for his trip. He said he was unsure of who paid for Campbell's but noticed that when he and Rowe were checking out of the hotel, Rowe used his credit card for Campbell's incidentals. … 'He was upset that I allowed Mr. Rowe to pay for his incidentals,' Sullivan told the jury. 'He told me that you can't use a credit card to pay for things like that. It leaves a trail.'" The Journal-Constitution adds, "The theme of loyalty to the mayor was played over and over Wednesday, witness after witness, as prosecutors tried to establish that City Hall under Campbell…was a den of cronyism and deal-making between Campbell, his friends and political allies. None of the prosecution's witnesses testified that Campbell made them do anything illegal, nor did they say they saw Campbell doing anything criminal."

Wisconsin Procurement Official Indicted Over Travel Contract Award. The AP (1/26) reports, "An official in Gov. Jim Doyle's administration was indicted on two felony counts Tuesday for her role in awarding a state travel contract to a company whose executives donated $20,000 to Doyle's campaign. The federal indictment alleges that Georgia Thompson, chief of the Department of Administration's procurement bureau, tried to give her bosses political advantage and help her own job security." The AP notes Thompson, "who was hired before Doyle took office in 2003, served on a committee that awarded a contract to Adelman Travel as part of an effort to cut travel costs. … Questions were raised this summer after media reports that Adelman's CEO donated $10,000 to Doyle before the contract went into effect. An Adelman board member gave another $10,000 afterward, finance reports show."

Former New Jersey Councilman Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering. The Farmingdale (NJ) News Transcript (1/25, Front Page, Israeli) reports former Marlboro Township Councilman Thomas Broderick "pleaded guilty in federal court last week to one count of money laundering. … Broderick was one of the 11 Monmouth County officials who were arrested…in an FBI investigation known as 'Operation Bid Rig.' … Broderick admitted that he accepted $15,000 for assisting in the laundering of large sums of cash from a cooperating government witness whom he believed was a corrupt demolition contractor." The News Transcript notes, "He is scheduled to be sentenced on April 27. Broderick remains free on $50,000 bail."

Contractor Sentenced To Probation, Fine For SoCom Bribery Scheme. The Tampa Tribune (1/26, Lardner) reports, "A contractor formerly employed by U.S. Special Operations Command was sentenced Wednesday to three years probation and a $4,500 fine for his role in a bribery scheme that has tarnished the war fighting organization's reputation for acquiring equipment used by the nation's elite fighting forces. U.S. District Judge Susan Bucklew, who called William E. Burke's crime 'scary' and a 'bad thing,' could have saddled him with a prison term of up to 16 months and a heftier fine. But Bucklew opted for the lighter penalties mainly because Burke has been cooperating with federal law enforcement agents examining contracting practices at Socom, which is headquartered at MacDill Air Force Base in Tampa."

Texas Hired Abramoff-Linked Firm Due To Access To Rove. The AP (1/26) reports the Texas state government "hired a firm with close ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff after rejecting competing bids that met more of its selection criteria and cost less." The Austin American-Statesman reported that Cassidy & Associates, the winning firm, has access "all the way to presidential aide Karl Rove. … The firm was awarded a $15,000-a-month contract in 2004 to lobby Congress for the state." On Friday, seven Democratic Texas state legislators sent a letter to Gov. Rick Perry "demanding that Cassidy's contract be canceled."

California Man Pleads Guilty To Cyber Attack. Federal Computer Week (1/26, Brewin) reports, "A hacker indicted for creating botnet armies that infected Defense Information Systems Agency networks and computers at the Naval Air Warfare Center at China Lake, Calif., pleaded guilty to the charges at a hearing earlier this week in the U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, the Justice Department said." FCW continues, "Justice said James Ancheta 20, of Downey, Calif, entered guilty pleas of conspiring to violate the Computer Fraud Abuse Act and causing damage to computers used in national defense." FCW adds, "Justice said the prosecution of Ancheta was the first of its kind in the United States against a hacker who used botnets, armies of computers infected with Trojan horse programs that allowed Ancheta to remotely control the computers. Justice said Ancheta controlled more than 400,000 computers as part of his botnet armies, which in turn infected other computers with unwanted adware."

Former Dietary Supplement Company Executives Admit $100 Million Mail Fraud. The AP (1/26) reports, "Former executives of a mail-order firm admitted that the company bilked buyers out of more than $100 million by charging credit cards without permission and offering refund guarantees it had no intention of honoring. Four former executives of Berkeley Premium Nutraceuticals Inc. detailed their involvement Wednesday with the Cincinnati-based company that sold vitamins and supplements for a variety of ills from fatigue to sexual disfunction. The four executives filed written statements as part of an agreement to plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati to charges of conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud. Federal agencies -- including the FBI, the Internal Revenue Service and the Food and Drug Administration -- have been investigating Berkeley." The AP adds, "The former executives said Berkeley's vitamins and supplements…weren't supported by strong medical proof, according to court documents."

Jury Convicts Palestinian Man Of Being Iraqi Agent. The AP (1/26, Callahan) reports, "Jurors on Wednesday convicted a Palestinian migrant accused of being an Iraqi agent on six federal charges but could not reach a decision on a charge that he tried to sell to Saddam Hussein's regime the names of U.S. operatives and agents." The AP continues, "Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, 53, showed little reaction as the federal jury returned its verdicts finding him guilty of six of seven counts, including acting as an unregistered foreign agent, violating sanctions against Iraq, conspiracy and witness tampering. … They could not decide his guilt on a charge of violating the International Emergency Economic Powers Act by allegedly trying in late 2002 to sell U.S. intelligence secrets to Iraq for $3 million. No evidence was presented during his trial, however, that he had access to that classified information. … U.S. District Judge John Tinder set sentencing for April 13 on the six convictions." The AP notes, "Shaaban represented himself during an 11-day trial that included testimony by a former Iraqi intelligence officer. He repeatedly contended that the government had confused him with a dead identical twin brother who worked for the CIA."

Three Kidnap Suspects Face Federal Charges In Ohio. Cox News Service (1/26, Giordano, Hardy) reports, "The FBI on Wednesday brought criminal charges against three people accused in the abduction, assault and robbery of a Miami University freshman." Cox continues, "Sidney R. Jones, 23, of Richmond, Ind.; Katrina L. Jones, 18, of Oxford; and Seth R. Jett, 21, of Richmond were turned over to federal custody Monday by local authorities, Special Agent Michael E. Brooks said. … The three had been detained at the Butler County Jail following their arrests Jan. 14 and 15 stemming from a case involving MU freshman Ryan Coli. … The charges were the result of a joint effort by the U.S. Marshals Service and the FBI in three states." Cox adds, "The three appeared Wednesday in U.S. District Court

(in Oxford, OH) where Magistrate Judge Timothy S. Hogan ordered them held pending a detention hearing Jan. 30, when the court will determine bond."

Supreme Court To Hear Lethal Injection Case. The Washington Post (1/26, A3, Lane, 744K) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed yesterday to decide when death row inmates may challenge lethal injection as a method of capital punishment, in a surprise decision issued after the justices dramatically stopped the execution of a Florida prisoner who was already strapped to a gurney preparing to die." The High Court said it will hear convicted murderer Clarence Hill's "claim that he should have an opportunity to argue that his civil rights would be violated because the chemicals used to execute him would cause excessive pain. It is a claim that has been pressed with growing frequency by capital defense lawyers around the country in recent years -- but that has generally not yet succeeded, either in lower courts or at the Supreme Court."

The AP (1/26, Holland) reports, "Lethal injections are used in most states that have capital punishment, and there's been a growing dispute over the way they are carried out. … The Supreme Court has never found a specific form of execution to be cruel and unusual punishment, and the latest case from Florida does not give Court members that opportunity. The justices will, however, spell out what options are available to inmates with last-minute challenges to the way they will be put to death." The AP adds, "Florida inmate Clarence Hill, who filed the appeal, had been strapped to a gurney with intravenous lines running into his arms Tuesday night when he won a temporary Supreme Court stay, Hill's lawyer said. The stay was signed by Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. … The full Court announced Wednesday that the stay would be permanent until justices decide whether an appeals court was wrong to prevent Hill from challenging the lethal injection method. … The argument is expected April 26, with a ruling before July."

Texas Executes Man For 1992 Murders. The Associated Press (1/25) reported that Marion Dudley, an "Alabama man who was part of a ring that shuttled drugs from Texas to his home state was executed [Wednesday] for the slayings of four people in Houston nearly 14 years ago." But the AP noted that Dudley maintained he wasn't at the house where the murders occurred the night of June 20, 1992, when "six people were shot, four of them fatally, in what authorities said was a drug dealer ripoff." Dudley was "the first Texas inmate put to death this year." The wire service added, "Besides Dudley, Arthur 'Squirt' Brown, of Tuscaloosa, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. Now 35, he remains on death row. A third man, Tony Dunson, also from Alabama and 19 at the time of the shootings, received a life sentence."

ID Theft Complaints Rising, But Rate Of Increase Down. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Conkey) reports, "Businesses, law-enforcement agencies and consumers may be beginning to turn the tide in the war against identity theft, data from the Federal Trade Commission suggest. Identity-theft complaints were up again last year to nearly 256,000, the FTC said, but that was only 3.5% higher than the year before. In 2004, complaints rose by 15% and in 2003 by 33%. … Industry officials and analysts say the development and widespread adoption of antifraud technologies are responsible for lower levels of card fraud." The article also said, "the FTC is expected to announce today tough action against" ChoicePoint Inc., which "is expected to agree to pay a multimillion-dollar penalty to settle alleged data-security violations stemming from a yearlong investigation by federal regulators, according to a person briefed on the matter."

Jury Reject Insanity Defense, Convicts Killer of Accused Pedophile Priest. The New York Times (1/26, Zezima) reports, "Rejecting an insanity defense, a state jury on Wednesday convicted an inmate of the prison murder of John J. Geoghan, a defrocked priest who was accused of molesting 150 boys. … Judge Francis R. Fecteau of Worcester District Court sentenced the inmate, Joseph L. Druce, to life in prison without parole, in addition to the life sentence he is serving for another murder. … Prosecutors argued that Mr. Druce was a calculated killer who planned the murder for weeks and saw Mr. Geoghan as a trophy. But Mr. Druce's lawyer, John LaChance, painted his client as someone who 'never had a chance,' unwanted from birth and the victim of physical and sexual abuse for much of his childhood and teenage years."

Girl's Death Highlights "Dual-Track" Handling Of Abuse Reports. The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Ridberg) reports, "Calls to New York's child-abuse hot line have spiked dramatically ever since Nixzmary Brown was buried." The Monitor notes that the girl, allegedly killed by her stepfather, "captured the hearts and minds of New Yorkers who never want to see such a tragedy happen again." However, the article says, "the city is left with the tall task of distinguishing the serious cases of abuse from reports of neglect. This is one of the most controversial challenges facing social welfare systems nationwide." The article says that some states have adopted a dual-track system that divides complaints "into two groups." This approach "aims to ease systems overburdened with poverty-related neglect reports and focus aggressive tactics on the rarer cases of abuse," the article says. It "has been adopted in various states, including Michigan, Missouri, Minnesota, and North Carolina. In Minnesota, one recent study shows the law improved the safety of children by providing better services for families such as food." However, the article notes, New York City fears that under a dual-track approach "an abused child may be handled as a neglect case."

Fairfax County, VA, Police "Accidentally" Shoot, Kill Optometrist Suspected Of Gambling. The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Jackman) reports, "Fairfax County's police chief said yesterday that one of his officers accidentally shot and killed an optometrist outside the unarmed man's townhouse Tuesday night as an undercover detective was about to arrest him on suspicion of gambling on sports. Police had been secretly making bets with Salvatore J. Culosi Jr., 37, since October as part of a gambling investigation, according to court records." In the incident, "Culosi came out of his townhouse on Cavalier Landing Court about 9:35 p.m. and was standing next to the detective's sport-utility vehicle, police said, when the detective gave a signal to tactical officers assembled nearby to move in and arrest Culosi. 'As they approached him . . . one officer's weapon, a handgun, was unintentionally discharged,' said Fairfax Police Chief David M. Rohrer. Culosi was not making any threatening moves when he was shot once in the upper part of his body, police said. He was taken to Inova Fairfax Hospital, where he was pronounced dead."

Crimes Prompt DC Police To Beef Up Presence In Neighborhood. The Washington Post (1/26, B1, Schwartzman) reports, "A spate of crimes outside Adams Morgan clubs and bars, including two assaults in which victims were left in critical condition, has prompted police to plan greater deployment in the area. … A business group plans to supplement the effort with a contingent of security guards and off-duty police to patrol the area on weekends, said Josh Gibson, executive director of Adams Morgan's newly formed business improvement district. Thousands of people pour into Adams Morgan on weekend nights, drawn by its cafes and clubs."

Father Charged With Gun Offenses In Daycare Shooting. The Washington Post (1/26, B1, Londoño) reports that John L. Hall, who is the "father of an 8-year-old boy arrested in the shooting of a 7-year-old girl at their Germantown day-care center provided his son with violent video games and showed him how to cock and release a gun hammer the day before the boy pulled the trigger, a prosecutor said yesterday" at Hall's bond hearing. The Post reports, "Hall's sister, Darlene Hall, 53, disputed the prosecutor's characterization of her brother's influence over the child." The article adds, "Montgomery District Court Judge Mary Beth McCormick reduced Hall's bond to $75,000 yesterday after authorities charged him Tuesday with leaving a firearm within reach of an unsupervised minor and two other gun charges."

NYTimes Columnist Pans Show About Innocence On Death Row. In a New York Times (1/26) column, Joshua Marquis disapproves of a new ABC drama called "In Justice." He writes, "'In Justice' has received dismal reviews. But that hasn't stopped its premise from permeating the conventional wisdom: that our prisons are chock-full of doe-eyed innocents who have been framed by venal prosecutors and corrupt police officers with the help of grossly incompetent public defenders." Calling this "a misconception that has run through our popular culture," Marquis notes that "only 14 Americans who were once on death row have been exonerated by DNA evidence alone. The hordes of Americans wrongfully convicted exist primarily on Planet Hollywood." Marquis says that it is "understandable that journalists focus on the rare case in which an innocent man or woman is sent to prison." However, he says, "The larger issue is whether those who influence the culture, like an enormous television network, have a moral responsibility to keep the facts straight regardless of their thirst for drama. 'In Justice' may soon find itself on the canceled list, but several million people will still have watched it, and they are likely to have the impression that wrongfully convicted death row inmates are the virtual rule."

Times Writer Wistful For Buttafuoco Era. In a New York Times (1/26) column, Lawrence Downes writes, "Before Angie and Brad, before Monica and Bill, there was Amy and Joey. Amy Fisher and Joey Buttafuoco — the Long Island Lolita and her body-shop lover — with Joey's wife, Mary Jo, formed a triangle of passion, obsession and violence that became the industry standard for tabloid crime way, way back in 1992. There is an entire generation, or at least a cohort, or maybe a handful, or at least one or two journalists who remember working on that day in May when the story broke, and who still marvel at how that strange crime — a housewife in a swanky suburb shot in the face — soon became much stranger. It swelled in significance until it made headlines coast to coast and around the globe. … I miss the Buttafuoco era. Joey and Amy were the Sid Caesar and Howdy Doody of reality TV, relics of a simpler time when crime sold newspapers — imagine that — and when the culture tended to look down on adultery and teenage prostitutes, and when attempted murder carried a hint of shame, which presumably was why Amy, in her perp walk, went to the trouble of hiding her face with her long brown hair."

Former Kentucky GE Plant Supervisor Files Whistleblower Suit. The AP (1/26) reports, "A former supervisor at a General Electric Co. plant has filed $50.5 million federal lawsuit that claims that he was fired for testifying that GE shipped defective parts to military and commercial customers." The AP continues, "James Richard Gardner, of Madisonville, filed the suit Friday in U.S. District Court in Louisville. Gardner said he repeatedly alerted managers at the Madisonville plant that engine turbine blades were not meeting company and government specifications and that defective parts were shipped with the knowledge of managers to meet production requirements." The AP adds, "Marta Rhyner, a GE spokeswoman, said she couldn't comment on specific allegations made in the lawsuit. She said the company is 'confident in the parts produced by our employees at Madisonville.' … The Defense Department began a criminal investigation at the plant in November 2000. The Justice Department is conducting a civil investigation."

Judge Rules Trustee Request Could Jeopardize Adelphia Bankruptcy. The New York Law Journal (1/26, Lin) reports, "In a decision released Wednesday in the Chapter 11 bankruptcy of cable company Adelphia Communications, the presiding judge said the motions by which one group of creditors sought the appointment of a trustee to oversee disputes and the disqualification of chief Adelphia bankruptcy counsel Willkie Farr & Gallagher constituted a 'nuclear war button' threatening obliteration of a crucial $17.6 billion deal." The Journal continues, "Southern District of New York Bankruptcy Judge Robert Gerber's strongly worded 113-page decision, In re Adelphia, 02-41729, previously filed under seal, clarified his order issued earlier in the week denying the appointment of a trustee but granting the disqualification of Willkie lawyers from participating in the disputes at issue. Willkie remains bankruptcy counsel to Adelphia. … Those disputes, which the requested trustee would have overseen, are between different groups of debt holders, all seeking to maximize their own claims on the bankruptcy estate, most of the assets of which are slated to be sold to rival cable companies Time Warner and Comcast for $17.6 billion." The Journal adds, "The potential appointment of a bankruptcy trustee is almost always controversial, as such trustees are usually granted broad-ranging powers to settle disputes or dispose of assets. … Gerber said the disqualification and trustee motions, brought in November by noteholders of Arahova, a subsidiary through which Adelphia issued some $540 million in debt, seemed designed to 'purposefully' imperil that sale as part of a 'scorched earth litigation strategy' aimed at extracting a larger distribution by threatening dire consequences for all."

GSA's Networx Contract Award Delayed By Unexpectedly High Number Of Bids. The Washington Post (1/26, D5, Mohammed, 744K) reports, "The General Services Administration said yesterday that it got more bids than expected for a $20 billion telecommunications contract known as Networx," a "10-year telecom contract, the largest ever to be awarded by the GSA," which is "forcing the agency to delay the award so it can evaluate the complex proposals."

Lockheed Loses Spy Plane Contract. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A1, Karp, 2.11M) reports, "In 2004, Lockheed Martin Corp. won an Army spy-plane contract that broke with the past." Instead of building it, they "would serve as the 'lead integrator' -- stuffing somebody else's hardware with high-tech eavesdropping gear." However, "Lockheed engineers proved unable to load the airframe they were buying from Brazil with the equipment the Army wanted. Earlier this month, the Army scrapped Lockheed's contract," in "a setback for Chief Executive Robert Stevens and his young 'integrated solutions' division," and "a signal for the entire defense industry that de-emphasizing old-style hardware in favor of software and systems management isn't a sure path to success."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Virginia Likely To Vote On Gay Marriage Ban; Similar Measure Unveiled In Maryland. The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Jenkins, 744K) reports, "The state Senate all but guaranteed on Wednesday that Virginia will hold a November referendum on whether to amend its 230-year-old Bill of Rights to bar same-sex marriages. The Senate voted 28 to 11 to follow the House of Delegates in approving the amendment. Though each chamber still must pass the measure adopted by the other, their wording is identical and support among the senators and delegates is strong." Meanwhile, Maryland Republicans "introduced a similar measure in the Senate on Wednesday and said they believe they have the votes they need to bring the matter to an up-or-down vote, despite resistance from leaders of the Democrat-controlled legislature. In the wake of a circuit court ruling last week that declared Maryland's 33-year-old ban on same-sex marriage discriminatory, GOP leaders said it was important to at least put the matter to a vote."

The Washington Times (1/26, Bellantoni, Miller, 90K) notes that Maryland Democratic leaders "appear reluctant to put a constitutional amendment on the ballot because it could energize conservative voters in an election year in which Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, is seeking re-election, and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, also a Republican, is running for the U.S. Senate." The Times adds, "In Virginia, state Sen. Stephen D. Newman said the constitutional amendment is necessary to guard against 'aggressive' judges in other states, including Maryland, who are trying to redefine marriage. 'A few judges or a few localities are now presuming to change that fundamental meaning for our civilization and their actions have created confusion on the issue,' the Lynchburg Republican said. 'The federal courts are going to leave us with no other recourse.'"

FBI Mississippi SAC Says Report Could Rewrite Till Story. The AP (1/26) reports, "An FBI report on the decades-old murder of 14-year-old Emmett Till could rewrite the story of the slaying that put a young man's face on racial injustice in the South during that period." The AP adds that "some details of the crime could have been distorted or embellished over the past five decades, the FBI special agent in charge of Mississippi, John G. Raucci, told The Associated Press this week. 'The facts were told one way because that's the information that was available at the time,' Raucci said. 'And often times it's through urban legends and folklore -- and people who lived in the community pass along information from generation to generation -- and the next thing you know, they become fact.' Raucci did not rule out the possibility of indictments in the case or provide a timetable for releasing the report." The AP notes that the FBI report "should soon be turned over to District Attorney Joyce Chiles in Greenville. 'That does not necessarily mean that everybody involved in the Emmett Till case or the overt act is still alive or will one day be prosecuted,' Raucci said. … 'Evidence may no longer be available. Individuals who may have witnessed an event, time has now gotten the better of their minds.'"

FBI Reaching Out To NC Hispanics In New Human Trafficking Initiative. The Charlotte Observer (1/25, Ordoñez, 234K) reports that with funding from the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act, "The FBI is launching a new effort to raise awareness of human trafficking. Calling it an offense against humanity akin to modern-day slavery, the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Charlotte estimates thousands of victims are trafficked into the state each year for forced labor and prostitution. 'This is something that is flying under the radar,' said Special Agent Kevin Kendrick, who is heading the local campaign. … In conjunction with increased investigative efforts to shut down human trafficking rings, the FBI is teaming up with local advocacy groups and social organizations to get a message out that federal agents should be trusted and not feared. The FBI, Kendrick said, is looking to assist all victims of human trafficking, even if they're living in the country illegally. Not only will the FBI protect victims and their rights, Kendrick said, the agency also will help them remain permanently." The Observer adds, "'This is a reprehensible problem,' said Assistant Special Agent Robert Clifford. 'We'd look at every weapon in FBI's arsenal to countering human trafficking.' … 'We need to let people know it's OK to contact us,' Kendrick said. 'This is an affront against humanity. This goes far past someone's immigration status.'"

Georgia Lawmakers Approve Voter ID Bill. The AP (1/25) reports, "A birth certificate might not be enough to vote in Georgia this year - legislation sent to the governor Wednesday would require photo identification before voters could cast their ballots." The AP continues, "Gov. Sonny Perdue said he would sign it quickly to give counties time to prepare for the primary in July and the general election in November. … The U.S. Justice Department also must approve the requirement before it takes effect." The AP adds, "The legislation would require voters to have a driver's license, military ID or state-issued identification card with a photo. Social Security cards, birth certificates and utility bills would no longer be accepted. … Supporters said it would help fight voter fraud. Critics argued it would disenfranchise the poor, minorities or elderly - people who are less likely to have driver's licenses."

5th Circuit Rules Against Shreveport In Race Bias Suit. The Shreveport (LA) Times (1/26, McCabe) reports, "A federal appellate court changed its stance and ruled today in favor of plaintiffs in a discrimination lawsuit against the city of Shreveport and its Fire Department, overturning a lower court's decision to dismiss the five-year-old case." The Times continues, "The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals remanded the heart of the discrimination case back to U.S. District Court in Shreveport. … The petition originally was brought against the city in 2000 by Todd Dean, who was not hired by the Fire Department and felt the city's hiring practices discriminated against him because he is white. Dean earned a higher test score than some blacks hired then, his lawsuit alleges. Other men joined the lawsuit soon after." The Times adds, "The 5th Circuit's ruling should compel the city not only to cease race-based hiring procedures in all departments, but also to re-evaluate the continued validity of all city programs that incorporate race as a criteria for participation," said local attorney Pamela R. Jones, who represented Dean, Shawn Sanders and Jason Matthews in the lawsuit. … The department ended race-based hiring practices 11 months before a federal magistrate dismissed Dean's case in December 2004 hoping to avoid further lawsuits, according to officials. Now the department relies on a pass/fail civil service exam, the educational background and technical training of each candidate and psychological and physical ability exams. … The city has maintained that the Fire Department's hiring practices are based on a complaint brought by the U.S. Justice Department in 1980 that said the department had discriminated against blacks and women. Up to that point, the department had hired only three black men in its history, according to court records."

SIU Changes Web Descriptions Of Challenged Fellowships. The AP (1/26) reports, "While threatened with a federal lawsuit over three graduate fellowships the government considers discriminatory, Southern Illinois University has tweaked the descriptions of at least two of those scholarship programs on its Web site." The AP continues, "The fellowships at issue were said to specifically target minorities or 'underrepresented groups,' before the Justice Department objected last year, but the site now says those programs seek to help 'underserved' populations. … The revisions come as SIU administrators are weighing a Justice Department proposal that would head off a lawsuit threatened by the government, which in demanding that SIU discontinue the fellowship programs has accused the university of engaging in 'intentional discrimination against whites, non-preferred minorities and males.'" The AP adds, "The university has refused to publicly discuss the proposal it got from the Justice Department last week, saying only that administrators and key constituency groups were being tapped this week for feedback before the university responds. … David Gross, a spokesman for the SIU system, said Wednesday the Web site changes were done without the consent of the university's president, the Carbondale school's chancellor or the system's legal counsel and 'do not reflect the proposed offer from Department of Justice.'"

Judge Orders EEOC To Pay $1 Million To Law Firm For Frivolous Action. The AP (1/26) reports, "The U.S. Equal Opportunity Employment Commission must pay more than $1 million to a law firm that it sued unsuccessfully for allegations of sexual harassment and pregnancy discrimination, a federal judge has ruled." The AP continues, "The EEOC action was a 'frivolous' lawsuit against Robert L. Reeves & Associates, which practices immigration law, U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian said in a ruling issued Monday." The AP adds, "Reeves maintained that the EEOC should have known the harassment and discrimination allegations the agency was pursuing were part of a scheme by two of his former law associates to destroy his firm, said a statement from lawyers representing Reeves. … The EEOC has already appealed the judge's findings, said Anna Park, the EEOC regional attorney in charge of the Los Angeles district office's legal division."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Offers To Release Part of Its Source Code In EU Antitrust Case. The Financial Times (1/26, Buck) reports, "Microsoft made a concession in its six-year dispute with European competition regulators on Wednesday by offering to give rivals access to parts of its Windows source code. With only three weeks until a compliance deadline set by Brussels, which had threatened fines of €2m ($2.5m) a day, Brad Smith, the group's general counsel, said: 'We are putting our most valuable intellectual property on the table.' … Microsoft's offer … came in response to a European Commission warning last month that it would impose fines unless the software group complied quickly with Brussels' 2004 antitrust ruling against the US group. The daily fines would come on top of the record €497m payment the Commission ordered in 2004. The regulator said Microsoft had failed to comply with a part of the ruling requiring the software group to share information about its Windows operating system."

The USA Today (1/26, Acohido) reports, "The European Commission issued a terse statement saying it would 'study carefully' Microsoft's announcement 'once it has received the full details.' … This is not the first time Microsoft has let outsiders view such code. It has granted governments, academics and business partners varying levels of access under tight restrictions."

Reuters (1/25, Lawsky, Zawadzki) reports, "Critics of Microsoft contend that protocols are standard software and that Microsoft has used what is essentially a digital combination lock to make them inaccessible. … A Commission spokesman said if that turns out to be true then Microsoft has no right to charge for them. … However, Microsoft says that the protocols include valuable patents and that it should be able to charge for their use, an argument under review at the Commission."

The AP (1/25) reports, "The company's chief counsel, Brad Smith, said sharing the part of the Windows workgroup server operating system and desktop software code that helps rival PCs communicate with Windows servers was 'a bold stroke' that should answer both EU and U.S. regulators' concerns. .. He insisted that Microsoft had already complied in December with an EU order to supply technical information by handing over up to 12,000 pages of documentation and offering 500 hours of free technical support to rivals worth some $100,000. … An independent monitor nominated by Microsoft found last month that the documents were 'totally unfit for its intended purpose.'"

Move Comes After Justice Department Complaints. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Jacoby) reports, "The move came after the Justice Department complained in a court filing this week about Microsoft's compliance with U.S. legal requirements -- and six years after a U.S. judge found Microsoft violated the Sherman Antitrust Act against monopoly abuse. The Justice Department said the Redmond, Wash., software giant had provided inaccurate information to a technical committee, and described one incident as 'particularly troubling' because it delayed an investigative team that had traveled to India. The filing also said the company had 'fallen significantly behind' in complying with monitors' technical requests. … In 2001, the Bush administration dropped the U.S. government's case against Microsoft, but ordered it to change certain anticompetitive practices."

Guidant Accepts Boston Scientific's Takeover Offer. USA Today (1/26, Iwata) reports, "Medical device maker Guidant on Wednesday accepted Boston Scientific's $27 billion bid, rebuffing a lower offer from Johnson & Johnson and ending a long-running takeover war." USA continues, "The companies have been vying for an edge in the growing multibillion-dollar market for medical and heart devices, and Guidant's pacemakers, defibrillators and stents made it an attractive acquisition target. … The merger, to be completed early this year, will make Boston Scientific the world's No. 2 maker of implantable pacemakers and defibrillators. Boston Scientific also will gain share in the market for heart stent devices, which hold open blood vessels." USA adds, "Most Wall Street analysts and some Guidant investors had urged Guidant to take the pricier Boston Scientific offer, calling it a better long-term investment than J&J's deal. The combined company will have $9 billion in revenue in 2006, Boston Scientific says. … To help close the deal and appease antitrust regulators, Boston Scientific teamed with Abbott Laboratories. Abbott will pay Boston Scientific $6.4 billion in cash to buy Guidant's vascular intervention and endovascular businesses." … Approvals are needed from U.S. and European regulators, plus shareholders for both companies."

The New York Times (1/26, Feder) reports, "For Johnson & Johnson, Tuesday started with a morning conference call with analysts to discuss earnings and ended with William C. Weldon, the company's chief executive, and Robert J. Darretta Jr., the chief financial officer, attending a dinner for several dozen institutional investors at the '21' Club in New York. Throughout the day and evening, the company maintained a rigid silence about the one subject on everyone's mind — whether it would respond to a midnight deadline to counter Boston Scientific's bold $27 billion offer for Guidant." The Times notes that Johnson & Johnson released a statement yesterday "saying the company had 'determined not to increase its last offer for Guidant Corporation, because to do so would not have been in the best interest of its shareholders.' About the only comment was its reminder that Guidant was obliged to pay it a $705 million breakup fee by today. … It was a remarkably quiet conclusion to the biggest and most contentious takeover battle yet in the medical device industry. The outcome leaves Boston Scientific as the apparent winner of Guidant, the No. 2 company in the $10 billion market for defibrillators and other implantable devices that regulate human heartbeats."

BlackBerry Injunction Hearing Set For Feb. 24. The Wall Street Journal (1/26) reports, "BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. and NTP Inc. will appear in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia Feb. 24 for the court to consider a shutdown of U.S. sales and service of the popular wireless email device. In recent court filings, RIM, based in Waterloo, Ontario, argued a BlackBerry shutdown isn't warranted for various reasons, including recent preliminary moves by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to reject NTP's wireless email patents. NTP, a Virginia patent holding concern, argues a BlackBerry shutdown is appropriate, since the court has already found RIM infringed on NTP's patents and case law calls for such a shutdown. The court could rule on the injunction as early as Feb. 24 or in the days following, an NTP lawyer said."

NYTimes Says Pixar-Disney Deal Is Chance To Reform Disney's Creative Culture. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) editorializes, "A company like" Pixar "— and a figure like Mr. Jobs, notable for his dynamic role at both Apple and Pixar — doesn't let itself be bought for money alone, though the money is certainly enticing enough. This is really an opportunity to infect, and change, the creative culture of Disney, which, back in its founder's day, used to be one of the most creative places around" but whose "animated films have been nothing to shout about in the past decade or so." For Pixar and Apple the deal has "only an upside," and "the same is true for Disney, especially if it keeps shedding the ways of Mr. Eisner's old company and allows itself to become what may turn out to be, in the end, Mr. Jobs's company after all."

Three ELF Activists Indicted On Ecoterror Charges In California. Reuters (1/26, Fitzgerald) reports, "A federal grand jury indicted three alleged 'eco-terrorists' on Wednesday on charges of plotting to blow up facilities like dams and cell phone towers. 'These three individuals planned to commit a number of dangerous and destructive acts in our region, all in the name of the Environmental Liberation Front,' U.S. Attorney McGregor

Scott told a news conference in the California state capital." Eric McDavid, Zachary Jenson and Lauren Weiner were "arrested January 13 outside a retail store in Auburn, California, following six months of surveillance of McDavid by federal authorities. … The charges were not related to a separate 65-count indictment handed down on Monday in Washington involving 11 environmental and animal rights activists in the Western United States." Scott "said the trio rented a house east of Sacramento in the foothills where they engaged in bomb-making. At some point, the three were joined by an unnamed woman who was a government informant. 'Because of the exceptional work of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and the brave efforts of a confidential source they were prevented from carrying out their planned attacks,' the U.S. Attorney said."

EPA Seeks Ban On Chemicals Used In Cookware. USA Today (1/26, Weise) reports, "In a surprise turn Wednesday, the Environmental Protection Agency moved to eliminate the production of a suspected carcinogen used in the making of Teflon and other non-stick and non-stain coatings. The EPA has asked eight manufacturers that use a family of chemicals known as perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA, to reduce production 95% by 2010 and to stop using it altogether by 2015. … Environmentalists and consumer groups have long dogged the agency to act. 'The science is still coming in, but the concern is there, so acting now to minimize future releases of PFOA is the right thing to do for our environment and our health'" says Susan Hazen of EPA's Office of Prevention, Pesticides and Toxic Substances." According to the article, "EPA officials are calling for voluntary PFOA cutbacks because 'under the Toxic Substances Control Act, they don't have authority to ban it,' says Richard Wiles of the Environmental Working Group, a public interest group that has long fought to bring public attention to PFOA in the environment." Wiles says that if the chemicals are phased out, it "will be 'the single biggest action the agency has ever taken.'"

The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Eilperin) reports favorable coverage of the EPA for this action. It quotes Ken Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group, who says, "'This is one of those days when the Environmental Protection Agency is at its best. With its announcement today, the EPA is challenging an entire industry to err on the side of precaution and public safety, and invent new ways of doing business. … As harshly as we have singled out DuPont for criticism for its past handling of PFOA pollution, today we want to single out and commend the company and acknowledge its leadership going forward."

DuPont Targeted. USA Today and the Post both note that DuPont was a particular target in the PFOA deal. In the first paragraph of its story, The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Eilperin) says, "Eight U.S. companies, including giant DuPont Co., agreed yesterday to virtually eliminate a harmful chemical used to make Teflon from all consumer products coated with the ubiquitous nonstick material." Both the Post and USA Today note that DuPont recently agreed to a $6.5 million settlement with the EPA over charges that it hid information about the dangers of PFOA.

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 7, 2:50, Vargas) reported, "Today, the government asked companies to virtually eliminate" a chemical used to make Teflon "over the next nine years." Ross: "Today, the Federal government said DuPont had virtually agreed to eliminate any new emissions of the key Teflon chemical at its factories." Susan Hazen EPA: "This is the right thing to do. And we are going to move forward with it." The New York Times (1/26, Janofsky, 1.19M) adds, "DuPont immediately pledged to join the" voluntary program," along with "3M/Dyneon, Arkema, Asahi, Ciba, Clariant, Daikin and Solvay Solexis." The EPA says that "full compliance by the companies and their overseas affiliates would lead to a 95 percent reduction by 2010 in use of the substance, perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA, and to their total elimination by 2015."

Video Highlights Problems With Federal Mine Safety Oversight. NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 8, 2:30, Williams) reported, "Those two West Virginia mining disasters have now focused a lot of attention on mine safety in this country." A videotape tape shows "the perils of digging for coal. And the often lax oversight of this nation's mines." NBC (Myers) added, "This is the inside of Coal Creek Mine in southeastern Kentucky. Videotaped by a miner who smuggled a camera into work in June 2004 to document what he said were dangerous conditions." Edwin Pennington "is crushed under this slab of rock 200 feet long." One "safety official who investigated Pennington's death says his tragedy underscores a widespread problem in mines across the country. He says fines are too small to induce companies to fix hazards and the entire system has no teeth." Tony Oppegard, former Mine Safety & Health official: "The company has been going on about its business for the last year and a half without any consequences thus far."

Bush To Push For Reprocessing Of Spent Nuclear Fuel. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Fialka, 2.11M) reports, "The Bush administration plans to announce a $250 million initiative to reprocess spent nuclear fuel, a first step toward reversing a 1970s policy that rejected reprocessing as too dangerous to pursue." The Administration's "decision to put the money into its fiscal 2007 budget to test new technologies is part of an effort to jump-start the nuclear-power industry at a time when energy prices are high and concerns about global warming make nuclear power plants more acceptable." The Journal adds, "According to nuclear industry officials and others briefed on the proposal in recent weeks, the program could be announced as early as next week in President Bush's State of the Union address. If the technology works, it could vastly reduce the amount of spent nuclear waste that would have to be buried in underground storage, such as at Nevada's Yucca Mountain, set to open after 2012."

The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Baker, Linzer, 744K) adds the fuel proposal "is part of a broader push by the president for domestic and global nuclear energy. With worldwide energy demands on the rise and U.S. reliance on foreign oil increasing, Bush has held out nuclear power as a solution that will not affect global warming."

Gore Documentary On Global Warming Has Premiere At Sundance Festival. The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Booth, 744K) reports that ex-Vice President Al Gore's documentary on global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth," "had its world premiere at the Sundance Film Festival on Tuesday night before an enthusiastic audience that gave the former vice president and his movie a big standing O. Among the film's lessons: Earth's glaciers are melting, the polar bears are screwed, each year sets new heat records." The Post notes, "The core of the film is a one-man, ever-evolving multimedia slide show that Gore assembled himself. A little-known fact: Since his defeat by George W. Bush in 2000, Gore has traveled the globe with his bar graphs, staging event after event for small, invited audiences. Free of charge. And he's presented one version or another of this slide show, by his own estimation, a thousand times. … In the film, Gore presents the latest evidence to demonstrate how the accumulation of carbon dioxide and other pollutants of the industrial age are increasing temperatures."

Mueller Recuses Himself From Trade School Probe. Under the headline "F.B.I. Director Recused From Investigation Of Weld's Former School," The New York Times (1/26, Healy, 1.19M) reports in "Metro Briefing" that "The F.B.I. director will not play a role in the inquiry into Decker College, the Kentucky school once run by William F. Weld, because the director and Mr. Weld, a Republican candidate for governor, are friends and former colleagues, an F.B.I. spokesman said yesterday. … The New York Democratic Party had asked that Mr. Mueller recuse himself, according to a party spokesman. Mr. Weld has not been accused of any wrongdoing involving Decker, which declared bankruptcy last fall amid allegations of fraud."

Under the headline "Weld's Pal Off Inquiry," The New York Post (1/25, Dicker, 624K) reported yesterday, "FBI spokesman Richard Kolko told The Post that while the Decker probe was being handled by the special agent in charge of the Louisville, Ky., field office, Mueller himself is 'regularly briefed on significant investigations and cases.' And while Kolko insisted Mueller 'has not had a role in directing any part of this investigation,' he said, 'since the issue has been raised publicly, and to avoid even the appearance of any conflict, any decisions that would otherwise be made by the director in this matter will, instead, be handled by Deputy Director John Pistole.' Kolko's announcement came a few hours after state Democratic Chairman Herman 'Denny' Farrell joined D'Amato in urging Mueller to step aside. … Farrell said Weld and Mueller were 'good friends' during the 1980s when both served in the U.S. Attorney's office in Boston. He said Mueller had also contributed to Weld's unsuccessful U.S. Senate campaign against incumbent John Kerry of Massachusetts in 1996."

Minnesota Attorney Charged In Internet Pharmacy Scheme. The AP (1/26) reports, "A lawyer has been indicted (in Minneapolis) on federal charges alleging he helped an Internet pharmacy illegally obtain narcotics and helped its founder hide assets." The AP continues, "Daniel Adkins, who was general counsel for Xpress Pharmacy Direct, helped deceive legitimate pharmacies into supplying the narcotics that Xpress hawked over the Internet and by telephone, according to the indictment issued Tuesday." The AP adds, 'Federal authorities say Xpress filled about 72,000 illegal prescriptions for pain killers and other controlled substances, generating sales of about $20 million. Authorities shut down Xpress last May and company founder Christopher Smith, his accountant and a doctor who issued prescriptions were indicted in August. … The indictment alleges that Adkins helped Smith hide assets after they learned about the investigation. It also alleges that Adkins wrote to legitimate pharmacies from which Xpress ordered drugs, assuring them that Xpress was 'both legal and authorized by federal and state statutes.' … Adkins was charged with conspiracy to distribute and dispense controlled substances, wire fraud; unlawful distribution and dispensing of controlled substances and misbranding drugs. If convicted of wire fraud he could face up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine, the U.S. attorney's office said."

Drug Ring's Alleged Second-In-Command Pleads Guilty. The Knoxville (TN) News-Sentinel (1/26, Satterfield) reports, "Admitting crimes that could lock him away for life made Stephen 'Black' Ardis downright scared Wednesday. Ardis, who was captured on secret recordings expressing worries that an undercover agent he dubbed

'Superman' was on his trail, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to being second-in-command of a Detroit-to-Knoxville drug running operation. But the 26-year-old drug slinger made it clear before entering his plea that a possible life sentence was a scary proposition he wanted to avoid. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck said the massive amount of drugs Ardis conspired to put onto Knoxville's streets guarantees the Detroit man a 20-year prison term. … The drug ring was broken in November after a probe led by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Todd Lee and Knoxville Police Department Investigator Bruce Conkey. It was Conkey whom Ardis dubbed 'Superman' in a conversation secretly recorded by the agents during their investigation."

Prosecutor Delays Charges In Washington Bomb Case. The Tri-City (WA) Herald (1/25, Trumbo) reports, "Benton County prosecutors will need several weeks to decide potential charges against a Richland man who says he kept bomb-making material because he is a miner." The Herald continues, "Kevin D. Johnson, 49, was released from jail Friday, three days after Richland police arrested him at his home where they seized gunpowder, nitro-methane and about 20 pounds of ammonium nitrate. They also found six firearms." The Herald adds, "Prosecutor Andy Miller said Tuesday that no charges were filed during the 72-hour hold on Johnson because more investigation is needed. Items taken from the home also have to be analyzed by agents of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, he said. … 'To prove the elements of the case, we'd have to get the ATF to test the items,' Miller said. … Richland police Capt. Mike Cobb said an ATF agent told him Tuesday analysis of the items found at Johnson's home would be completed in two to four weeks. … Cobb said the investigation also involves 91 blasting caps that allegedly belonged to Johnson that were found Jan. 15 at a home in Franklin County. Cobb said officers discovered the caps in a closet of a man's home after they investigated a domestic violence complaint."

IMMIGRATION:

Daughter Of Former Chilean Dictator Pinochet May Seek Asylum In US. Reuters (1/26) reports, "The eldest daughter of former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet on Wednesday asked the United States to grant her political asylum after she fled tax charges in Chile, Chilean officials said." Reuters continues, "Lucia Pinochet Hiriart, 60, was being moved to an immigration detention center late on Wednesday after spending most of the day at Dulles International Airport near Washington, Chile's Foreign Relations Minister Ignacio Walker told local radio in Santiago. … Earlier, Interior Minister Francisco Vidal said Chile had been told that Pinochet Hiriart had asked for asylum. … 'In the coming two or three days we will have a decision from the United States which, I insist, will be a rejection (of asylum),' Walker said." Reuters adds, "U.S. officials would not confirm that Pinochet Hiriart had requested asylum. … 'Lucia Pinochet is currently in U.S. Customs and Border Protection custody at Dulles International Airport, pending resolution of her immigration status,' said Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security. … Pinochet Hiriart has been charged with tax fraud related to some $1 million in undeclared taxes and falsification of documents as part of a widening tax evasion and fraud investigation involving the Pinochet family."

Jury Finds "Survivor" Winner Hatch Guilty Of Tax Evasion. The AP (1/26, Henry) reports, "Richard Hatch, who won $1 million in the debut season of the reality show 'Survivor,' was found guilty Wednesday of failing to pay taxes on his winnings and taken straight to jail." The AP continues, "Hatch remained calm as the court clerk read the verdict. He waved goodbye to family members, then was handcuffed and taken into custody after U.S. District Judge Ernest Torres said he was a potential flight risk. … The charges carry up to 13 years in prison. Torres said he expected a sentence of between 33 months and 41 months, but said the time could be longer because prosecutors say Hatch committed perjury. Sentencing was scheduled for April 28." The AP adds, "Hatch, 44, was also convicted of evading taxes on $327,000 he earned as co-host of a Boston radio show and $28,000 in rent on property he owned. He was acquitted of seven bank, mail and wire fraud charges related to a charity, Horizon Bound, he planned to open for troubled youth. … Hatch's lawyer, John MacDonald, said he would appeal the verdict. He said Hatch was aware of the possibility of jail time."

Former Washington Man Wanted On Tax Charge Captured In Panama. The Puget Sound (WA) Business Journal (1/26) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice said Wednesday that former Renton resident David Struckman has been captured in Panama. Struckman had been charged by the Internal Revenue Service for running an operation that promoted tax-avoidance plans." The Journal continues, "Struckman was indicted in 2004 and charged with conspiracy to defraud the United States. He then "disappeared," according to a Justice Department spokeswoman. He was arrested in Panama earlier this month and deported, the department said, and will be transported to Western Washington." The Journal adds, "The government alleges that Struckman and four others sold 'Global Prosperity' wealth-building products, including videotapes, CDs and seminars, which 'included fraudulent methods of income tax elimination.' .. The seminars cost as much as $37,000 to attend and, according to the government, the group then concealed income earned from the products by using bogus trusts and offshore bank accounts."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Full Senate Begins Debate On Alito Confirmation. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "The full Senate debate is under way on Samuel Alito's nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court. A day after the judiciary committee cast the divided vote over Alito, Republicans and Democrats are voicing fierce support and opposition to the President's choice for the high court." Alito "met today with Republicans senators whose majority votes are expected to seal his confirmation despite strong Democratic opposition."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 3, 1:00, Williams) reported, "As the full Senate began debating his Supreme Court nomination, Judge Samuel Alito took something of a pre-victory lap on Capitol Hill, thanking Republicans who helped move his nomination to the expected finish line. On the Senate floor, Democrats continued to call him a bad choice, while Republicans praised him." Currently, "Alito has enough support to be confirmed right now."

The AP (1/26, Holland) also says Alito "took a victory lap in the Senate on Wednesday, accepting congratulations from Republican leaders as lawmakers moved toward confirming him in a largely party-line vote." Reuters (1/26) adds Alito "appeared to have the votes for confirmation…as the Senate began a bitter debate."

The Washington Times (1/26, Hurt, 90K) says Republicans "rounded up the 60 votes they need to block any attempt to filibuster his nomination." Meanwhile, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy "called the vote on the nomination 'the vote of a generation.'"

Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Angle) reported, "Though Alito appears to be on track for confirmation and though it appears Democrats aligned against Alito do not have the votes to sustain a filibuster, Virginia's Republican Senator George Allen felt it necessary to issue a warning today." Allen: "My reaction is if they move forward with such a filibuster, my reaction is, 'make my day.' We will enjoy pulling the constitutional trigger to allow Judge Alito a fair up-or-down vote."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 6, 1:15, Vargas) reported, "Senators were divided along party lines." Sen. Hillary Clinton: "Roe v. Wade is at-risk. The privacy of Americans is at-risk. Environmental safeguards, laws that protect workers from abuse or negligence. Laws, even, that keep machine guns off the streets. All these and many other, are imperiled." Sen. Edward Kennedy: "The record demonstrates that we cannot count on Judge Alito to blow the whistle when the President is out of bounds. He is a long-standing advocate of expanding executive power." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist: "Judge Alito deserves to become Justice Alito. And those who oppose him are smearing a decent and honorable man and posing an unfair political standard on all judicial nominees."

Bush Meets With Alito's Former Clerks. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported the President met "with about 40 people, Republicans and Democrats, who've clerked for Judge Alito. It is another attempt to drive home the administration's insistence that Alito is qualified and deserves a quick and fair up or down Senate vote."

Novak Says Red State Democrats Who Oppose Alito Regret Vote. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (1/26) writes that Sens. Kent Conrad and Byron Dorgan of North Dakota, "Bill Nelson of Florida, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, Ken Salazar of Colorado, Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, and Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas are red state Democrats who voted to confirm Chief Justice John Roberts. While Roberts is no less conservative than Alito…these Democrats who voted for the chief justice have been under intense pressure from the left to oppose Alito. All such senators may be willing to risk a politically unpopular 'no' vote, partly thanks to disappointing Senate Republican candidate recruitment this year." Novak notes, "The contention that President Bush's nominee is outside the 'mainstream' is the major talking point against Alito, but polls show support for him and his endorsement of spousal abortion notification. That debate's outcome may determine whether senators who vote against Alito will suffer at the polls this year and in the years ahead."

NYTimes Urges Democrats To Filibuster Alito's Nomination. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) editorialized that Alito's "elevation will come courtesy of a president whose grandiose vision of his own powers threatens to undermine the nation's basic philosophy of government --- and a Senate that seems eager to cooperate by rolling over and playing dead. It is hard to imagine a moment when it would be more appropriate for senators to fight for a principle. Even a losing battle would draw the public's attention to the import of this nomination." The Times adds, "Senate Democrats, who presented a united front against the nomination of Judge Alito in the Judiciary Committee, seem unwilling to risk the public criticism that might come with a filibuster -- particularly since there is very little chance it would work. Judge Alito's supporters would almost certainly be able to muster the 60 senators necessary to put the nomination to a final vote. A filibuster is a radical tool. It's easy to see why Democrats are frightened of it. But from our perspective, there are some things far more frightening. One of them is Samuel Alito on the Supreme Court."

Roberts, Alito Appointments Called Bush's Greatest Domestic Successes Since 2003. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) editorializes, "With at least 52 Senators already on record in support, it's clear that -- short of some smear ex machina -- liberal Democrats can't stop Samuel Alito from being confirmed to a seat on the Supreme Court. So it's a good moment to consider what this says about our politics and what it means for the Court as it enters a new era. One conclusion is that the confirmation of both Chief Justice John Roberts and Judge Alito marks the most important domestic success for President Bush since his 2003 tax cuts." The "Alito-Roberts ascendancy also marks a victory for the generation of legal conservatives who earned their stripes in the Reagan Administration. … The Roberts-Alito Court also represents a notable, and greatly satisfying, rebuke for the legal left and its 'borking' strategy."

Bush Resubmits Nominee Previously Blocked By Democrats. The Washington Post (1/26, A3, Babington, 744K) reports the White House "renominated Brett M. Kavanaugh to the US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. President Bush nominated Kavanaugh, the White House staff secretary, in July 2003, but he fell victim to intense battles between Senate Democrats and Republicans over numerous judicial appointments. A May 2005 bipartisan pact averted a showdown over judicial filibusters and enabled some contested nominees to win confirmation. But it left Kavanaugh in limbo." The Senate Judiciary Committee's eight Democrats "complained last year that Kavanaugh took several months to answer their written questions about his qualifications. Other Democrats have noted that Kavanaugh, 40, has limited courtroom experience and helped independent counsel Kenneth W. Starr pursue the Monica S. Lewinsky case during the Clinton presidency."

Abramoff Prosecutor Among Nominees To Federal Bench. The AP (1/26) reports, "President Bush on Wednesday nominated one of the Justice Department's lead prosecutors in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe to a U.S. District Court seat." The AP continues, "Noel Hillman, chief of the department's public integrity section, was nominated for the federal judgeship in New Jersey, where he served in the U.S. Attorney's office under Michael Chertoff, now secretary of Homeland Security." The AP adds, "The White House was poised to nominate Hillman last summer, after New Jersey's two Democratic senators took the opportunity to weigh in on Hillman and other nominees in exchange for lifting their objections to another candidate Bush had nominated in 2003. … Hillman will step down as chief of the public integrity unit next week, but remain in the Justice Department's criminal division until he is confirmed, a department official said. Andrew Lourie, a career prosecutor in Miami, will lead the public corruption-fighting office on a temporary basis, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss personnel matters. … Lourie performed the same role until Hillman took over early in 2003."

Bush Suggests Government Will Not Bail Out GM And Ford. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Cooper, McKinnon, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush said General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. should develop 'a product that's relevant' rather than look to Washington for help with their heavy pension obligations, and hinted he would take a dim view of a government bailout of the struggling auto makers." In an Oval Office interview, Bush "said that his administration has discussed the development of new fuel technologies with the nation's top two auto makers, which might make them more competitive, but that he has had no talks about the companies' finances." Asked if he had spoken to GM Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner or Ford Chairman and CEO William Clay Ford Jr., Mr. Bush replied, "Not about their balance sheets. … And I haven't been asked by any automobile manufacturer about a bailout." Asked if the government should take "any pre-emptive action," he said, "I think it's very important for the market to function." Bush "suggested he felt optimistic about the companies' prospects."

WPost Says Detroit, Congress Should Embrace "Competition." In an editorial titled "Managing Detroit," the Washington Post (1/26, A24, 744K) says, "It's not clear whether the GM and Ford restructuring plans will be enough to avert bankruptcy. Their difficulties may take on a more political tone, particularly since the Midwest is a key battleground for presidential campaign strategists." But "Congress needs to keep Motown's troubles in perspective. They are the result of competitive pressures that most parts of the US economy take for granted every day. And it is precisely by embracing competition that the United States has become the world's most powerful economy."

Bush Unlikely To Push Large Initiatives In State Of The Union Speech. The New York Times (1/26, Stevenson, 1.19M) reports, "Having stabilized his political standing after a difficult 2005, President Bush is heading into his State of the Union address on Tuesday intent primarily on retaining his party's slim majority in Congress this year and completing unfinished business from his existing agenda." Unlike last year, "when he used the occasion to kick off an ambitious and ultimately failed effort to overhaul Social Security, Mr. Bush seems unlikely to reshape the political landscape with his speech on Tuesday, members of both parties said." The Times adds, "Administration officials and other Republicans in Washington said Mr. Bush would focus on several topics, including health care, spending restraint, illegal immigration and the nation's international economic competitiveness, as well as an unapologetic restatement of his national security policy. Much of the speech, they said, will be tied together under a broad theme acknowledging that the United States is going through transitions that involve wrenching dislocation as well as opportunity." His aides "portray Mr. Bush as undaunted by the plague of setbacks last year that loosened his grip on his party and drove down his poll numbers, which although up from their lows last fall remain at anemic levels."

Bush Urged To Tackle Medicare Reform. David Gratzer, a physician and senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M), "Bush will cite rising health costs as a major problem for Americans and their businesses, and he will outline steps to strengthen health savings accounts as a remedy." But "he is unlikely to mention Medicare reform -- and that would be a mistake. Indeed, if the president is serious about health reform, he will have to tackle Medicare. And he can start by re-engaging a debate from 1999." Seven years ago, Sen. John Breaux and Rep. Bill Thomas "completed the final report of the National Bipartisan Commission on the Future of Medicare. Considering various reforms, they eventually settled on a proposal modeled after the popular Federal Employees Health Benefits Plan (FEHBP), which covers nine million federal employees and their families. Instead of today's one-size-fits-all Medicare structure, they envisioned a program where seniors choose among competing private plans. Since then, Washington has debated the size and scope of Medicare expansion -- such as the prescription benefit -- but the program itself has yet to be fundamentally rethought." It "needs to be, because faced with Medicare's rising costs over the past four decades, the only real response has been a bipartisan exercise in wage and price controls."

Protestors Sue For Spot During State Of The Union. The Washington Post (1/26, A6, Barker, 744K) reports, "Organizers planning a protest during President Bush's State of the Union address next week say they have been denied a permit to hold the demonstration around the U.S. Capitol Reflecting Pool because that area has been reclassified as part of the security perimeter for the day of the speech. The organizers of the Tuesday protest, called 'World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime,' say the National Park Service and the U.S. Capitol Police initially offered them the Capitol Reflecting Pool as a demonstration site but changed their minds. Demonstrators have been told to confine their gathering to the gravel walkways on the Mall between Third and Fourth streets, farther from the Capitol. The grassy areas are fenced off because they are being resodded." Travis Morales, one of the organizers of the demonstration, "said the group was offered use of the area around the Capitol Reflecting Pool on Jan. 10 and that the site was not then part of any security perimeter. But on Jan. 19, he said, the group was told the security area had been expanded to include the Reflecting Pool. He called the change 'politically motivated,' adding that the Bush administration 'is trying to push us so far away that we can't be seen or heard. … A protest not seen and a protest not heard is not a protest.'" The demonstrators "filed a federal lawsuit yesterday seeking a court order that would enable them to gather at the Capitol Reflecting Pool. U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina will convene a hearing, possibly today."

Many Liberals Upset Kaine Was Chosen To Respond To Bush. USA Today (1/26, Lawrence, 2.31M) reports, "Virginia Gov. Timothy Kaine lifted the Democratic Party's spirits last fall when he won in a conservative state and gave his fellow Democrats some ideas about how to replicate his success. The fruits of victory include the honor of being picked to respond to President Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday -- and the wrath of liberal bloggers wondering why Democrats didn't choose somebody else. Anybody else." The selection of Kaine, "a Roman Catholic who opposes gay marriage -- highlighted fault lines within the party. Bloggers on several liberal websites were furious for reasons including Kaine's looks, style and obscurity, his open talk about religion, his moderate positions and his inexperience in foreign affairs. 'What the hell are they thinking?' Arianna Huffington demanded on www.huffingtonpost.com. … Bloggers at dailykos.com, talkleft.com and other liberal sites showered cyberspace with alternatives: new faces — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer -- and famous faces -- Al Gore, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton."

Villaraigosa To Give Spanish-Language Response. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Chen, 958K) reports, "Congressional Democrats announced today that Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa will deliver the party's Spanish-language response to next week's State of the Union address. … This will be the third consecutive year that Democrats have offered a Spanish language response to Bush's speech. Two years ago, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico delivered the first such response. Last year, it was jointly given by then Rep. Robert Menendez, now a senator from New Jersey, and Sen. Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) added "Villaraigosa's remarks clearly will be aimed at helping Democrats reach out to Hispanic voters right here in the United States."

Effectiveness Of Health Savings Accounts Disputed. The New York Times (1/26, Freudenheim, 1.19M) reports, "Bush has made 'consumer-directed' health savings plans a cornerstone of his policy for addressing runaway medical costs, and he plans to push them again in the State of the Union address next week." But "so far there is little evidence that the approach is helping many consumers come to grips with the high price of health care," even though "the early results do offer some hope. More than two million people have signed up for the plans, which were created as part of Medicare overhaul legislation in 2003 but were not an option for many people until the health insurance sign-up season last fall. While that is a tiny fraction of the 180 million Americans with health insurance, some experts say the numbers show a notably fast adoption rate for a complicated new consumer program. By other measures, though, workers and employers have been slow to embrace health savings plans, which are intended to reduce corporate health care costs while giving individuals more control of their medical spending."

In his Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M), David Wessel criticizes Bush's "cure-all for health care," saying Bush argues for making "health care more like the market for tile and pipes." Adds Wessel, "Set aside the case that only a taxpayer-financed, government-organized solution works. A Republican president and Congress aren't going there, and a lot of Democrats are skeptical, too. … A bigger problem is that too many healthy (for now) Americans go without preventive care, and too many chronically ill Americans don't get care that would avoid costly, painful complications later. HSAs don't help there. And then there's the uncomfortable fact that 80% of health spending in the U.S. each year is spent on 8% of the population. Giving them tax breaks to buy health-insurance policies with $2,000 deductibles won't ensure that money is well spent."

Robert J. Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (1/26, 744K), "Americans want more health care for less money, and when they don't get it, they indict drug companies, insurers, trial lawyers and bureaucrats. Although these familiar scapegoats may not be blameless, the real problem is us. We demand the impossible. The changes we truly need are political. We need to reconnect people with the public consequences of their private acts. We should curb the subsidization of private insurance." Medicare recipients, "especially wealthier ones, should pay more of their bills." But "these changes won't happen because people don't want to see the costs. We don't have the health care system we need, but we do have the one we deserve."

Leavitt Says Government Moving To Solve Prescription Drug Program Problems. The Washington Times (1/26, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Administration officials yesterday told senators the new Medicare prescription-drug program has problems, but they're under control, and states will be reimbursed for covering seniors' prescription costs resulting from the glitches." Senators on the Finance Committee "seemed cautiously optimistic at the assurances, but some said Congress will still probably need to act. 'I think there's no question that the issue of prescription drugs will be back on the [Senate] floor in some form this year,' said Sen. Ron Wyden, Oregon Democrat." Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt said yesterday, "We've identified the problems, we're working on them and the plan gets better every day." He and Medicare chief Mark McClellan "had a private meeting yesterday with committee members to brief them on the situation."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 8, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "It is no secret the new Medicare prescription drug program is not off to a great start. Many elderly have been lost in the bureaucratic maze. Many have found themselves with no coverage at all." CBS (Andrews) added, "According to advocates for senior citizens, in thousands of cases so far, drugs might be covered under Medicare, but patients still need prior authorization before insurance actually covers the drug. The Center for Medicare Advocacy calls that sleight of hand. What's the sleight of hand?" Vicki Gottlich: "I think people were promised that they would be able to get all the drugs that they require, but they weren't told that they might have to go through a little extra." Andrews: "Medicare has ordered insurance plans to solve this saying, 'we expect prior authorization to be resolved at the point of service,' meaning the pharmacy counter. … So now in this transition to this massive new benefit, prior authorization is yet another complication in an already-troubled program."

OLC Urges Caution For Federal Employees On Nonprofit Boards. Government Executive (1/26, Pulliam) reports, "Agencies should be careful about allowing employees to serve on the boards of nonprofit organizations that have an interest in their work, according to a recent opinion published by the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel." GE continues, "Federal executives can serve as officers or directors at nonprofit organizations, a 19-page opinion released Jan. 11 stated. But agencies should take into account the appearance of an ethical violation before permitting employees to serve in a group that handles issues related to their government work. … 'Government employees [have a] . . . duty to "avoid any actions creating the appearance that they are violating the law ... or ethical standards,"' the Justice office's opinion said. … 'If an outside organization in which an employee is a director has been advocating its views directly to the federal government on a matter that the organization has identified as especially significant, there is a significantly heightened risk that the employee ... will at least appear less than independent in his judgments,' the legal counsel stated. 'And that risk ... calls for serious consideration by the employee's agency.' … Federal law requires government employees to recuse themselves from work activities when a nonprofit on which they serve has a financial interest in the matter. But just because nonprofits spend money advocating a position does not necessarily mean they have a financial interest in an agency action, according to the opinion." GE notes, "The case leading to the opinion originated in July 2004 when a senior executive at the Education Department was told by the Office of Government Ethics that election to the Senior Executives Association board of directors would result in a criminal conflict of interest due to his service on his department's Executive Resources Board."

Senate Committee Opens Hearings Into Lobbying Reform. USA Today (1/26, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports that after "weeks of calls for restrictions on how lobbyists influence Congress, lawmakers began Wednesday to grapple with the thorny details of just how to do it." The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee opened the first congressional hearing on reforms, and "lobbyists argued against proposals to ban privately financed trips for House and Senate members and their aides, saying travel helps them make good policy decisions in an era of globalization." And some senators "rejected calls for more restrictions, saying problems…are rooted in lawmakers' own behavior, the way Congress operates and a failure to enforce rules already on the books." The Washington Post (1/26, A6, Milbank, 744K) reports lawmakers "had no difficulty conceding they had a problem. But there was yawning disconnect between the problem and the proposed remedies. While most everybody agreed that Congress was being subverted by lawmakers' reliance on lobbyists for campaign cash, the proposals getting the most serious consideration yesterday were relatively minor: whether to ban lobbyist-paid lunches or a few million dollars' worth of privately funded congressional trips." Both newspapers quote Sen. Tom Coburn saying, "I don't believe lobbying reform's the problem; I believe Congress is."

However, CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Koppel) called the hearing "a bipartisan show of support for what Democrat Joe Lieberman called 'doing away' with what they believe is the faulty impression that their votes go to the highest bidder. The high-flying days of Congressional lobbying could be in for a rough landing as Democrats and Republicans alike rushed to put luxury vacations and expensive meals on the Congressional chopping block." The AP (1/25, Abrams) quotes Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairman Susan Collins saying, "The public's trust in Congress is perilously low." The panel's ranking Democrat, Sen. Joseph Lieberman, similarly said, "The status quo stinks and cries out for us to clear the air."

McCain Testifies In Opposition To Earmarks. The Washington Post (1/26, Branigin, 744K) reports Sen. John McCain, appearing as a witness before the panel, "was one of several senators to denounce earmarking, a practice he called 'disgraceful.' He outlined one of several proposals to tighten rules and require greater disclosure of lobbying activities. But he told the committee, 'We're not going to fix this system until we fix the earmarks.'" But "representatives of lobbying organizations urged the committee today not to overreact to what they described as the unscrupulous activities of one corrupt lobbyist," and Minority Whip Richard Durbin said the problem "goes beyond earmarks and that solving it must start with reducing the 'outrageous expense' of political campaigns."

Lewis Offers Steps For Earmarking Reforms. House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis writes in Roll Call (1/26), "The president's budget contains numerous earmarks inserted by nameless, faceless bureaucrats within each government agency. Teach for America, The Points of Light Foundation, and America's Promise are just a few examples of unauthorized, limited-scope initiatives that routinely receive a line-item request in the president's budget. Yet elected representatives know more about local, state or national priorities than the Beltway bureaucracy. It would be a mistake to ignore this expertise when determining how to allocate scarce federal dollars." Lewis calls for "curbing the appetite to spend by sharply reducing the number of earmarks in annual spending bills and making the appropriations process more open and transparent. In order to succeed, the House and Senate must jointly embrace these efforts. Specifically, the leadership of the House Appropriations Committee recommends the following: 1) Sharply limit the number of Member project requests. … 2) Require increased accountability, disclosure and transparency by requiring that Member request letters be made public prior to House consideration of each appropriations bill. … 3) Require that all project requests be submitted in writing to the appropriations subcommittee of jurisdiction via a Member-signed request letter or form. 4) Establish clearly defined criteria for all project requests and require Members to specify how each project meets the criteria. … 5) Increase the proportion of projects that have a dollar-matching requirement. … 6) Require all Congressionally approved projects to go through a formal executive branch contracting and auditing process. 7) Finally, require that all other committees adopt similar earmarking reforms."

Nelson, Coleman Call For Independent Commission. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Curtius, 958K) reports Sens. Ben Nelson and Norm Coleman, "convinced that Congress cannot overhaul its rules on ethics and lobbying in the politically charged atmosphere of an election year," called for the creation of an independent commission for the job. But their "proposal faced quick resistance from two senators leading the reform push," Lieberman and McCain, both of whom said they "feared creating an independent commission and that waiting for it to act would slow the momentum for change." McCain said, "I don't want to wait. We've got to act quickly."

House Democratic Leaders Float "Toughest Lobbying Reform Package Yet." Roll Call (1/26, Newmyer) reports House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, and Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn "circulated principles" of the "toughest lobbying reform package yet" to Democrats, seeking their support. The measure would "force lawmakers to report when they are sponsoring earmarks, require them to pay fair market value for travel on private jets and create an office of public integrity to oversee these and other new lobbying rules. Details of the plan emerged after a day in which lawmakers on both sides of the Capitol traded barbs, with each party claiming to want a bipartisan solution, but finding no partner across the aisle."

GOP Ends Vestige Of "K Street Project." The Washington Post (1/26, A2, Birnbaum, 744K) reports the GOP has ended a "long practice of routinely summoning lobbyists to the Capitol to try to persuade them to hire their aides and colleagues," a "remnant of the K Street Project once championed by Rep. Tom DeLay." The Senate Republican Conference staff director said Wednesday that a "K-Street-job-vacancies memo -- the heart of Congress's remaining involvement in the effort these days -- will no longer be distributed during high-level meetings hosted by the conference on Capitol Hill between lawmakers and lobbyists."

Hill Staff May Rush To Lobbying Jobs Before Rules Change. Roll Call (1/26, Ackley) writes that while the two parties "might not agree on all things lobbying," they "seem united on doubling the current one-year cooling-off period for newly minted advocates. And that has Congressional staffers, who already had an eye toward employment on K Street, stepping up their job-seeking efforts. Lobbyists, headhunters and Capitol Hill aides speculate that a mini-exodus of staffers from both sides of the aisle may be coming as a result."

ASAE Opposes Proposal To Ban Privately Funded Travel For Lawmakers. The Washington Post (1/26, A23, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "The American Society of Association Executives (sometimes referred to as the 'association of associations') is weighing in on plans to overhaul lobbying laws. ASAE, like some other trade groups, is concerned Congress may being acting too fast. ASAE opposes a measure that would ban all privately funded travel for members of Congress because, it believes, the ban would discourage true fact-finding trips and meetings with diverse groups."

DeLay Unrepentant As Ethics Talk Dominates Washington. In his Washington Post (1/26, A25, 744K) column, George Will writes of a visit with Tom DeLay in Richmond, Texas, writing, "Most people, battered as he recently has been, would be curled up on the carpet in a fetal position. But DeLay is as direct and uncomplicated as the tool that supplies his nickname -- 'The Hammer' -- and his faults do not include being a whiner. Furthermore, he is not about to plea-bargain in the court of public opinion. He chafes under prudential reticence: His attorneys tell him not to trumpet the fact that the Justice Department told them he is not a target in the Jack Abramoff investigation. But about other matters, the bantam is belligerent." And in DeLay country, "unlike on the Potomac, the fever for reform is not high. To a visiting columnist who waxes censorious about earmarks for highway projects, DeLay responds with a notable lack of repentance: 'You just drove out on one.'"

Social Security Group Redefines Itself To Push For Lobbying Reform. The Washington Post (1/26, A23, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "Fresh off its success in raising a grass-roots wave of public opposition that helped block President Bush's plan to overhaul Social Security, Americans United to Protect Social Security has redefined itself. The name is shorter -- Americans United -- and the mission is broader: public corruption, education, health and energy costs, economic prosperity and such. Yesterday, Americans United unveiled a $1 million advertising campaign urging support for legislation proposed by Democratic lawyers aimed at tightening the restrictions on lobbying." The group "has received initial support from organized labor, including the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. Brad Woodhouse , director of communication, says Americans United hopes to raise $10 million to $20 million from labor, individuals and others."

Blunt, Boehner Make Case For Their Candidacies. Rep. Roy Blunt, a candidate for House Majority Leader, writes in USA Today (1/26, 2.31M), "House members cannot ignore recent scandals that have many questioning the credibility of our system. Republicans will regain Americans' trust by enacting tough penalties for those who break the law and focusing on our agenda of limited government, personal responsibility and growing the economy by returning money to the Americans who earned it. … Lobbying reforms should include new rules governing travel and disclosure and regulations subjecting shadowy, tax-exempt '527' political groups to the same standards as others who attempt to influence the process. Then the credibility of honest public servants will be not be questioned -- even when some try to paint them with the same brush as those who break the law."

Meanwhile, Rep. John Boehner, a candidate for House Majority Leader writes in USA Today (1/26, 2.31M), "House Republicans need leadership that will help provide a vision and a plan for renewal. We need a leader who will stand up to Democrats when they're wrong, but who has credibility to work with them when it's in the country's best interests.' Boehner adds, "As of now, I am the only candidate who has released a detailed plan that would help House Republicans regain the spirit and energy of 1994, embrace real reform and reclaim the vision responsible for our success."

USA Today Says Blunt, Boehner Not Credible Reformers. An editorial in USA Today (1/26, 2.31M) says, "The former majority leader, Tom DeLay, stepped down after he was indicted in a Texas fundraising case and linked to crooked lobbyist Jack Abramoff. So where is the GOP seeking this fresh face and new start? With two lawmakers -- Roy Blunt of Missouri and John Boehner of Ohio -- who have cozy relations with lobbyists and a penchant for accepting perks from corporate friends." USA adds, "A third candidate for majority leader, John Shadegg of Arizona, is less enmeshed with the lobbying establishment and high-powered fundraising. That's one reason he's given virtually no chance of winning." USA continues, "Both Blunt and Boehner have one point right: Voters are clamoring for change. That requires recognition of what's wrong and the will to do something about it. Lawmakers who've spent their careers accepting perks and raking in special-interest campaign cash don't make for credible reformers."

Cornyn Emerges As Senate GOP's "Self-Appointed Public Relations Man." Roll Call (1/26, Pierce) reports, "With President Bush and Republicans struggling to regain their standing in public opinion as Senate Democrats hammer away daily at every perceived foible or folly committed by the ruling majority," Sen. John Cornyn "has made it his mission to strike back." Over the past year, Cornyn "has become a self-appointed public relations man for Republicans in Congress and the White House, filling a communications void that has developed in the Senate GOP leadership." Cornyn said, "I saw it as addressing this quick-response need that I don't think we had been set up for before, and really didn't need before the Democrats created their war room. It's not enough to come back later on, a week later, two weeks later, and respond. … A charge unrebutted is a charge believed." Cornyn has taken a key role in judicial nominations and also spearheaded "an aggressive effort among his colleagues in directing staff to send out partisan press releases, opposition research papers and talking points." He is now running for the "low-profile but still influential post of vice chairman of the Senate Republican Conference, which just happens to be the No. 2 'message' position."

First Lady's Approval Rating Is 82% In CNN/USA Today/Gallup Poll. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Crowley) reported, "In the latest CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll, 82 percent of Americans gave thumbs up to the way Laura Bush is handling her job. … Her approval rating is almost 40 points higher than her husband's." CNN added, "Despite that 82 percent approval rating, only 40 percent of Americans say they would like to see Mrs. Bush run for Senate. The truth is, when people see her as outside the world of politics, she is one of his biggest political assets."

Cheney Still A GOP Fundraising Draw. Roll Call (1/26, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "Despite a recent spate of bad publicity, Vice President Cheney is still a big draw for GOP fundraising. The vice president is slated to be the headline attraction this evening at a fundraiser for Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio). Anyone can attend for a simple $1,000. But the most generous donors may have a picture snapped with the veep: Going for that 'max out' opportunity before Ohio's primary in May, the DeWine re-election campaign is charging political action committees $5,000 per photo op."

Hillary Clinton Says Bush Disregarding Cities' Needs In Favor Of Tax Cuts. Reuters (1/25, Whitesides) reported, "Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton accused the Bush administration on Wednesday of ignoring the needs of cities in its politically driven zeal for tax cuts and told US mayors 'you are on your own.' Clinton, a potential White House candidate in 2008 who is seeking Senate re-election this year in New York, said that since the September 11 attacks President George W. Bush had reneged on his obligation to states and cities to pay for crucial security and social programs." Clinton said tax "cuts are desirable in the right political and economic climate but 'it is hard to square with the challenges we face at this time of terrorist threat.' At the federal level, 'the sense of urgency that marked the months after the 9/11 attacks has largely given way to politics as usual,' she said."

Clinton Stumbles Over Question On Her Time As Wal-Mart Board Member. The New York Daily News (1/26, McAuliff, 729K) reports that Sen. Clinton "easily pointed at Wal-Mart yesterday as not doing enough about health care but found it a little tougher when asked if she had ever suggested the retailer do more when she was on its board of directors. 'Well, you know, I, that was a long time ago, I have to remember,' she stammered, before pointing to her work on health care while First Lady. She sat on the Wal-Mart board from 1986 to 1992. Her spokesman insisted it's 'a very different company now.'"

Columnist Says Liberals Increasingly Unhappy With Clinton. Columnist Jonah Goldberg writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/26, 958K), "Liberals are sizing up Hillary Clinton for the umpteenth time, and they don't like what they see. … 'I will not support Hillary Clinton for president,' wrote Molly Ivins, the voice of conventional thinking on the left. 'Enough. Enough triangulation, calculation and equivocation. Enough clever straddling, enough not offending anyone.'" Goldberg adds, "The New Republic offers perhaps an even more devastating critique of Clinton for Democratic pragmatists: She can't win. Marisa Katz dismantled the myth that Clinton can appeal to 'red state' voters because she won in upstate New York. Turns out former Vice President Al Gore and Sen. John Kerry each did better in upstate New York than she did. … Meanwhile, a recent Gallup poll showed that 51% of Americans won't even consider voting for Clinton." Goldberg relates that there is "something oddly satisfying in the possibility that Clinton being herself is politically disastrous. And, if she's really just playing one more role according to some classically Clintonian political triangulation, there's something equally satisfying to the prospect that even her fans aren't falling for it anymore."

Obey, Frank To Propose Full Public Financing Of House Contests. Roll Call (1/26, Kornacki) reports that Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.) "is joining with Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) to propose full public financing of all House elections. They announced Wednesday that they will introduce the plan, which would bar all candidates from fundraising and self-financing in their campaigns, when the House reconvenes next week." Obey's "plan would radically curtail the financial advantage most incumbents now enjoy, even making it difficult for some of them to pay for television ads. And even if Democrats were to unite behind it, the prospect on a vote in the GOP-controlled House is less than remote. … Beyond that, the plan also faces an almost certain constitutional hurdle, in the form of the Supreme Court's 1976 Buckley v. Valeo decision that equated campaign spending with free speech."

Kondracke Says House GOP Group To Unveil "Suburban Agenda" Next Month. Roll Call Executive Editor Morton M. Kondracke writes in Roll Call (1/26), "A different kind of agenda -- different from the president's State of the Union address and the anticipated Democratic election year document -- is scheduled to be unveiled early next month to House Republicans: 'The Suburban Agenda.' It's the work of a group of 22 GOP Members from across the party's ideological spectrum and led by moderate Rep. Mark Kirk (Ill.), who's also tried to sell it to President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove." Kirk said "this agenda is designed to answer the problems faced by a suburban family as it moves through its day." Kondracke notes, "There's clearly strategic political intent behind trying to build the 2006 GOP legislative strategy around the suburbs: More than half of U.S. voters live in the 'burbs, and these places, formerly Republican strongholds, have been trending Democratic in recent years. … The agenda is designed to keep Republicans in power, but many of the items -- electronic health records and anti-gang measures, for sure -- ought to be bipartisan. It wouldn't be surprising if there's a bidding war for the support of the suburbs."

Postal Service Opposes Collins Bill On Mail Rates. The Washington Post (1/26, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The U.S. Postal Service headquarters launched a blitz yesterday to block a Senate bill, contending that the legislation, in combination with White House demands, could trigger a 20 percent increase in stamp prices in the near future. The bill's sponsors, Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), said they were 'outraged that the Postal Service would mislead senators.' In a statement, they said, 'Nothing in the bill would lead to rate increases.' Government agencies rarely risk incurring the wrath of committee chairmen who oversee their operations, as is the case with Collins. As head of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, she has made the overhaul of postal operations one of her priorities. Her bill would create a system of setting mail rates that she believes would give the post office greater pricing flexibility and would prevent it from raising rates each year in excess of inflation as measured by the consumer price index."

Federalist Society Protests Nightline Report On Scalia. The Washington Times (1/26, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column "The Federalist Society yesterday called on ABC to investigate a report by its news show 'Nightline' that suggested Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia had done something unethical by participating in a legal seminar sponsored by the group. 'The report grossly misled viewers about a recent trip Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia took to teach a 10-hour course on the Constitution and separation of powers. 'Nightline' suggested that Justice Scalia's trip was a "judicial junket," and even strained to manufacture a link with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff,' Federalist Society President Eugene B. Meyer said in a letter yesterday to ABC News President David Westin. The program, which aired Monday, emphasized that Justice Scalia had missed the September swearing-in of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. because of his commitment to attend the legal seminar at a Colorado resort, suggesting that the jurist spent most of his time playing tennis and engaging in other frivolous pursuits."

High Court Urged To Look To Foreign Opinions In Interpreting Law. Felix G. Rohatyn, the United States ambassador to France from 1997 to 2001, writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (1/26, 1.19M), "Globalization has made it not only 'appropriate or useful' but vital to look at foreign laws" when interpreting our own. "When we require European support on security issues…our job is made more difficult by the intensity of popular opposition in Europe to our policy" on the death penalty. "Contempt for the laws of our allies is a major factor in our increasing isolation in the world," and "that is why is it is deeply troubling that the next member of the Supreme Court will most likely share Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas's" opposition to that view. "Taking the views of 450 million Europeans into account is not a sign of weakness on our part, nor is it a commitment to change our views" but "simply recognition that the laws of our most important allies, our biggest foreign investors, foreign employers, foreign customers and trading partners are worthy of our attention."

Home Sales Drop Sharply. USA Today (1/26, Knox, 2.31M) reports, "Sales of existing homes fell in December for the third-consecutive month, in a surprisingly sharp drop that signaled the housing market is cooling off faster than expected. Home resales declined 5.7% from November to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 6.6 million, the slowest since March 2004, the National Association of Realtors said Wednesday. Western states, notably California, suffered the worst, with home sales in the region skidding 11.4% from November and from December 2004." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Preciphs, 2.11M), however, adds that even if "sales of existing homes fell in December to their lowest level in three months," they "still set a record for the year." The New York Times (1/26, Bajaj, 1.19M) also reports "the housing market registered a fifth consecutive year of increased sales." The data, nonetheless, "appear to suggest that the era of rapidly increasing sales may be coming to a close."

Stocks Down. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) reports, "Stocks ended a two-day rally yesterday as a worsening profit outlook for oil companies and homebuilders, two of the market's best performers during the last 12 months, sent prices lower." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "fell 2.18 points, or 0.2 percent, to close at 1,264.68, its first drop this week. The Nasdaq composite index lost 4.60 points, or 0.2 percent, to 2,260.65. The Dow Jones industrial average dropped 2.48 points, or less than 0.1 percent, to 10,709.74, helped by a gain in General Motors." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Patterson, 2.11M) and USA Today (1/26, 2.31M) also report the stock numbers.

Oil Industry Defends Record-High Profits. ABC World News Tonight (1/25, story 4, 2:30, Vargas) reported, "Some breath-taking numbers from the oil industry today. Conoco/Phillips said it made 13.5 $13.5 billion last year, an increase of 66% from the year before. The record-high profits are the result of record-high oil and gas prices people are paying at the pump and to heat their homes. So, the oil industry is feeling the heat. Today, it launched a counterattack." ABC (Stark): "Today the oil industry tried to argue that it's not just the companies themselves who benefit when profits are high. At the gas pump, where prices are once again increasing, news of the huge oil company profits had consumers up in arms." After "all the numbers are in, analysts expect oil industry profits for the fourth quarter to be up at least 46% over a year ago. The industry today was quick to go on the defensive, pointing out its earnings are just slightly above average for all corporations, just over 7 cents for every dollar spent. It also argued that what's good for big oil is good for average Americans." Stark concluded: "So, for oil companies and those who own shares in them, it has been a boom year. But for many consumers, it's a bust." Vargas: "Indeed it is."

Greenspan To Open Consulting Firm. When he leaves the Fed at the end of the month, Greenspan plans to set up a consulting firm, Greenspan Associates, in Washington, DC, the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) reports. The Journal adds, "One of his first hires will be Michelle Smith, who the Fed said yesterday will leave her job as director of its office of board members to join Mr. Greenspan's new firm. … In addition, the Fed said David W. Skidmore, Ms. Smith's deputy, would become the board's chief spokesman and Rose Pianalto Cameron will oversee other public information activities.

Greenspan Opposes Banking Loophole. Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan opposes a regulatory loophole that allows corporations to own banks. The Wall

Street Journal (1/26, Wysocki, 2.11M) says Greenspan's opposition puts him "into the middle of an effort by Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to establish a bank. Mr. Greenspan's salvo, outlined in a 12-page letter to Congress that was reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, is the latest in a controversy over the separation of commerce and banking. Wal-Mart, the Bentonville, Ark., retailer, is trying to obtain a state banking charter in Utah, using precisely the exemption in the banking laws opposed by Mr. Greenspan." The Journal adds that the remarks "could be Mr. Greenspan's last major statement to Congress as Fed chairman."

Investors Were Skeptical When Greenspan Took Over Fed Chair. USA Today (1/26, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Investors jittery about how incoming Federal Reserve chairman Ben Bernanke will pan out can take some solace -- folks weren't sure some guy named Alan Greenspan was up to snuff either. Investors didn't take the news so well on the day in June 1987 when Paul Volcker announced he was leaving the Fed after eight years and Greenspan was named to his position. Bond markets took their worst one-day beating in more than five years, and the dollar fell." USA adds, "In many ways, Bernanke — although widely respected in economic circles — is more of an unknown to the public than Greenspan was in 1987. … But no matter how well they knew Greenspan, people in 1987 were still nervous about him taking over the Fed."

Dow Chemical Loses Appeal On Life-Insurance Policies. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Matthews) reports, "A federal appeals court ruled Dow Chemical Co. is liable for $22.2 million in back taxes and interest for claiming tax-income losses on thousands of life-insurance policies it took out on its employees. … The ruling is a victory for the Internal Revenue Service, which for the past decade has been cracking down on companies that take out life-insurance policies on their executives and employees, often without their knowledge, in order to reduce their corporate-tax bill." The article says that only Dow Chemical had prevailed against the IRS in these cases, but lost that victory on appeal. The article explains that companies took out these insurance policies "to generate tax deductions with minimal cash outlay. They did this by taking a tax deduction for the interest they paid on loans taken out against the insurance policies, while allowing the policy to build value tax-free."

Ney Announces He Will Seek Reelection. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "A leading target in the influence peddling investigation isn't letting the probe keep him from the campaign trail. Congressman Bob Ney announced today that he is running for re-election. The Ohio Republican recently gave up his committee chairmanship. State party officials have urged him to give up a seat as well if he is indicted. Ney denies any wrongdoing."

The AP (1/26, Hammer) notes that in stepping down as chairman of the House Administration Committee earlier this month, Ney "acknowledged that his ties to Abramoff were a distraction from his duties, particularly as Republicans push an ethics reform agenda -- part of which must be implemented by the Administration Committee. But Ney spokesman Brian Walsh said no such distraction has affected Ney's work for his district, where he's known for hands-on constituent service and independence from GOP trade and labor policies."

The New York Times (1/26, Hauser, 1.19M) relates that Ney, in a statement, said "that the campaign this year promises to be a 'vigorous' one 'and I am ready for the fight.' 'I look forward to joining my friends and supporters, including the many state and local officials backing my re-election bid, as we kick off the 2006 campaign this Thursday and Friday,' he said." Ney "is referred to as 'Representative No. 1' in court documents filed in connection with the corruption scandal surrounding" Abramoff. Ney's statement "said he would announce his re-election bid at a campaign rally in Dover tomorrow evening and then travel to the southern part of the district for a second rally in Chillicothe on Friday at noon."

Roll Call (1/26, Whittington) adds, "Chillicothe Mayor Joe Sulzer and Dover Law Director Zack Space are vying in the May 2 Democratic primary for the chance to face Ney, who has held the expansive 18th district seat since 1994."

Ehrlich Says Stem-Cell Funding Decisions Should Be Based On Science. The Washington Post (1/26, B4, Wagner, 744K) reports that Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich (R) "is pushing a plan to spend $20 million next year on stem cell research," but "is not committing himself on the question that has stirred the most controversy: whether the money should be used primarily for work on stem cells derived from human embryos or from less controversial adult stem cells." Ehrlich, in an interview, said, "I'm not going to make that decision. … The point here is that the decision should be a function of the science. These are fundamentally science questions, not political questions." Ehrlich "would leave it to a state-founded technology corporation to decide whether to provide grants for work on adult stem cells or work on embryonic stems cells, which many scientists say holds greater promise but some in his party consider tantamount to abortion." Ehrlich, "who has supported stem cell research since his days in Congress," said, "The strong pro-life members know the administration does not share their views on this issue, but we wanted to try to lower the temperature on the politics. … I wanted to try to keep everyone's eye on the ball, and I believe this approach accomplishes that goal."

Republicans Say They Have Bipartisan Support For Stem-Cell Bill Filibuster. The Washington Times (1/26, Ward, 90K) reports that Democratic and GOP Maryland state senators on Wednesday vowed "to stop a bill that would promote the creation of embryos for research. 'If [Senate President Thomas V. Mike] Miller wants to do this extraordinary thing, he will get a filibuster that lasts as long as he wants it to last,' said Senate Minority Whip Andrew P. Harris, Baltimore County Republican. Senate Minority Leader J. Lowell Stoltzfus said he had more than the minimum 19 votes to filibuster. 'We think we have 20,' said Mr. Stoltzfus, an Eastern Shore Republican." The Times notes, "There are 14 Republicans in the 47-member Senate, which means six Democrats have agreed to filibuster. Sen. Paula C. Hollinger, Baltimore County Democrat, is sponsoring the Senate bill in support of embryonic stem-cell research for the second year. … 'I'm sure they will filibuster, and I'm sure we will round up the votes,' she said. Mrs. Hollinger also said she would fight for the bill and against the filibuster for 'as long as it takes.'"

Ford Released From Hospital. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 9, 0:10, Vargas) reported, "Gerald Ford was released from the hospital today. He spent the last 12 days being treated for pneumonia at the Eisenhower Medical Center near Rancho Mirage, California. His doctors say he is doing well."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 7, :45, Williams) added, "At 92, he is the oldest living former president. His spokesperson said he's doing well but it's safe to say doctors will be keeping a close eye on him."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Rosenblatt, 958K) reports, "Ford, 92, originally had been scheduled to leave Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage on Jan. 19, but doctors kept him for additional treatment."

Professors Say Maryland Wal-Mart Defeat Stems From Government-Employed Voters. Steve H. Hanke, professor of applied economics at Johns Hopkins University, and Stephen J.K. Walters, professor of economics at Loyola College in Maryland, write in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M), "The consequences of" Maryland's "legislature's override of Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich's veto of their 'Fair Share Health Care Act' on Jan. 12 will be tragic for some of the state's neediest residents." The reason for the override is that legislators "are simply eager for Big Labor's votes and money and therefore subservient to its interests." Estimates show "that as much as a third of the state's economic activity stems from federal employment and purchases," that "sector where revenues appear to arrive automatically and inefficiency never leads to bankruptcy," so "many Marylanders are simply unmindful of the necessities of survival in the private sector." This elects legislators who "often behave as if business is a problem to be solved." However, "legislators should be mindful that companies like Wal-Mart are not the enemy but rather front-line soldiers in a real war on poverty."

Hamas Wins Palestinian Elections; Government Resigns. The AP (1/26) reports this morning, "The Islamic militant group Hamas said Thursday it won control of the Palestinian parliament and officials from the ruling Fatah Party confirmed the estimate -- though Palestinian election officials delayed the release of preliminary official results." The claim by Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh "was based on reporting by Hamas activists who observed the counting in the polling stations, the group said. He said Hamas had won about 70 seats, enough for a majority in the 132-seat parliament. … Officials with Fatah also said that Hamas had won about 70 seats, which would give the Islamists a majority in the 132-seat parliament. They spoke on condition of anonymity because counting in some districts was continuing."

Meanwhile, CNN.com (1/26) reports, "In a stunning development ahead of official election results, Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qorie said he and the rest of the Palestinian Authority government will resign in the wake of militant group Hamas' apparent victory in historic elections. The announcement was an acknowledgment that election results showed Hamas had won a majority of seats in the 132-seat Palestinian Legislative Council, supplanting the ruling Fatah party." This announcement came before official election results had been released, CNN.com reported. According to the article, Qorie's office "said it will be up to Hamas to form a new government."

Previously, most reports had referred to exit polls showing a narrow Fatah win. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Leggett, 2.11M) reports that "according to Beir Zeit University's exit poll, the ruling Fatah party emerged victorious with 46% of the vote and Hamas captured about 40%, making its Reform and Change party the second-most popular among voters. Independent parties accounted for the difference. Final results are expected today." The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 5, 2:00, Schieffer) reported that "exit polls show that a militant group dedicated to Israel's destruction did very well, maybe even well enough to gain a role in the Palestinian government." NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 4, 1:30, Williams) showed Ali Zarbawi, Birzeit University saying, "Hamas will be an active opposition, a very strong opposition, but Fatah is going to lead the government."

USA Today (1/26, Gutman, 2.31M) adds "about 1 million Palestinians voted Wednesday in parliamentary elections that threaten to end the ruling Fatah Party's decade-long monopoly over Palestinian politics." The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Wilson, 744K) headlines its story "Hamas Makes Strong Showing In Vote," while the Washington Times (1/26, Mitnick, 90K) titles its reprot "Fatah Edges Hamas In Polls." The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Prusher, Mitnick, 61K) and Los Angeles Times (1/26, King, 958K) run similar reports.

Bush Touts Palestinian Elections But Says He Will Not Deal With Hamas. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site,, the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush, in an Oval Office interview, declared that he isn't ready yet to deal with the radical Palestinian Islamist group Hamas no matter how well it does in Wednesday's Palestinian elections. Speaking to The Wall Street Journal as Palestinians were electing a new parliament, Bush lauded the Middle Eastern trend toward democracy that produced Palestinian elections, but he said that Hamas isn't a suitable partner for diplomacy until it renounces its position calling for the destruction of Israel. 'A political party, in order to be viable, is one that professes peace, in my judgment, in order that it will keep the peace,' the president said. 'And so you're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility. And the answer is: Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you.'"

The Washington Post (1/26, A19, Kessler, 744K) reports "yesterday's better-than-expected electoral showing by a group labeled a terrorist organization by the United States greatly complicates the administration's diplomacy in the region, U.S. officials said yesterday.' Hamas, "which is dedicated to the destruction of Israel, appears to have ridden a wave of popular disgust at the perceived corruption and incompetence of the ruling Fatah Party. Exit polls indicate Fatah will have only a slim edge over Hamas in the Palestinian Legislative Council, giving Hamas a strong claim to a role in the government." The results "suggested the risks inherent in the Bush administration's campaign to bring democracy to the Middle East." Administration spokesmen "officially celebrated the 'historic moment' for the Palestinians while officials privately reeled at the outcome."

All three network news programs briefly noted Bush's pledge the US would not deal with Hamas unless it renounces violence. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 2, 0:20, Woodruff) reported, "The Bush Administration declared the election 'historic' and called this 'a great day for the Palestinian people.' But President Bush made clear the US will not deal with Hamas, no matter how well it did in the election. He told 'The Wall Street Journal' today 'We view Hamas as a terrorist organization. We don't deal with Hamas. … I don't see that changing.'"

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 6, :30, Schieffer) reported, "Hamas may have won a lot of Palestinian votes, but they got no vote of confidence from President Bush in a 'Wall Street Journal' interview today. The President says he will not deal with Hamas unless the group renounces its call for Israel's destruction."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, lead story, 3:10, Woodruff) reported "Israel's new foreign minister holds out little hope." Israeli Foreign Minister Tsipy Livney: "The essence and the reasons of the existence of the Hamas is not because they want to gain some political gains in the conflict. They are talking about demolishing the state of Israel, to erase the state of Israel from earth."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 4, 1:30, Williams) in its coverage also noted, "President Bush told 'The Wall Street Journal' today he would not deal with Hamas unless it renounces its call for the destruction of Israel."

The New York Times (1/26, Erlanger, Myre, 1.19M) reports "the acting prime minister of Israel, Ehud Olmert, said his country could not accept a situation in which Hamas would be part of the Palestinian Authority if the group remained armed with unchanged goals."

Carter Hopes Hamas Will Moderate Stance And Renounce Violence. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, lead story, 3:10, Woodruff) reported, "What no one knows is if Hamas will change, now that it has gained political power. Former President Jimmy Carter came to monitor today's election elections. There are some that believe Hamas will be pragmatic." Former President Carter: "That's my hope. Everybody hopes Hamas will be pragmatic. Because one thing is, if not for their own benefit but maybe for the benefit of the people they represent. Because no doubt if Hamas is not, as you say, pragmatic, then there will be a reduction in foreign assistance."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 5, 2:00, Hawkins) reported "Former President Jimmy Carter, who is leading international election monitors here, says bringing Hamas into the system may soften its hard-line positions." Carter: "My hope is and my prayer is that this will be a moderating influence on Hamas, that they'll see the responsibility in the government itself that they will moderate their position, forgo violence and terrorist acts."

Sharon's Absence From Stage Said To Make Peace Process Uncertain. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported that former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon's medical condition "leaves Israel with many unresolved matters, including that wall being built in the West Bank." CBS (Pizzey) added, "The most troublesome and obvious symbol of the unfinished business Ariel Sharon has left behind is the security wall separating Israelis and Palestinians on the West Bank. It wasn't Sharon's idea, but he made it a reality, an unplanned but now integral feature of the so-called road map that is supposed to lead to a peace deal. The problem for those who built on Sharon's legacies is that his plans and policies were like this wall: Only gaps that only he seemed to know how to fill."

Iran Open To Russian Enrichment Of Their Uranium. The Washington Post (1/26, Finn, 744K) reports that Ali Larijani, head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council," said "that his country was open to a compromise proposal from Russia that it enrich uranium for Iran on Russian soil," but added that that "the idea needed fine-tuning in advance of further talks scheduled for the middle of next month." The New York Times (1/26, Myers, 1.19M) adds that Larijani "indicated that no agreement had been reached and that significant details remained to be negotiated" and "warned that Iran would begin enriching uranium on an industrial scale if Iran's nuclear program was referred to the United Nations Security Council." His "remarks made it clear that further discussions on it would not take place until later in February, after the meeting at the atomic energy agency's headquarters in Vienna."

Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Rosen) reported that the head of Iran's national security council, "said in Moscow today Iran now takes a positive view of the so-called Russian proposal, which the Iranians previously rejected. The proposal would have Russia enrich uranium and ship the resulting nuclear fuel to Iran for nonmilitary use."

The AP (1/26, Gutterman) adds that President Bush said "Russia's proposal offered the best chance for resolving the impasse, adding 'it's important for us to exhaust all diplomacy' in dealing with Iran."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/26) says "Chief negotiator Ali Larijani also reiterated Iran's threat to renew enrichment activities if it is referred to the United Nations Security Council." The Washington Times (1/26, 90K) runs the same AP story. The Washington Post (1/26, A21, Finn, 744K) runs a similar report under the headline "Iran Says It Is Open To Russian Plan On Nuclear Program," while the New York Times (1/26, Myers, 1.19M) titles its report "Iran Welcomes Russia's Offer To Enrich Uranium Jointly; Details Remain."

Iran's Non-Cooperation Said To Be At Heart Of The Standoff. Knight Ridder (1/26, Landay) reports, "Iran's…obfuscation, conflicting answers and stonewalling on…the enrichment program are at the heart of the crisis over its nuclear program." It is "only by reconstructing the complete history and extent of Iran's nuclear work" that the IAEA can "determine the truth. So far, that's been impossible," and while "Iran has filled some gaps and is promising to fill the rest," IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei said "in a Nov. 18 report to the IAEA board…that 'there still remain issues to be resolved' and Iran's 'full transparency is ... long overdue.'"

Blix Says Bush Administration Overemphasizing Possible Military Action. Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Rosen) reported that "one of the world's best-known weapons inspectors, one who clashed with the Bush Administration before, is criticizing it again now for its approach in the current standoff. Hans Blix, the chief UN weapons inspector in Iraq prior to the war, argued the Administration is overemphasizing the potential for US military interaction in Iran."

Washington Backs Off Linking Iran Vote To India Nuclear Deal. The AFP (1/26) reports, "Washington moved to unlink a landmark US-India civilian nuclear deal with how New Delhi votes on the Iranian nuclear question at a key meeting of the UN atomic watchdog agency." The US Ambassador to India, David Mulford, "had warned Wednesday that a historic deal giving American nuclear technology to India might fall through if New Delhi did not vote against Iran at the February 2-3 meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA)." However, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "we deal with the Indian Government on these two issues as separate issues."

Reuters (1/25) added that "Mulford, told the Press Trust of India news agency that if India decided not to vote against Iran, 'the effect on members of the U.S. Congress with regard to the civil nuclear initiative will be devastating.'" He was also quoted "as saying the deal would 'die,'"

The AP (1/26, Rosenberg) adds, "The State Department in Washington said later that Mulford wasn't speaking for the U.S. government."

Reuters (1/26, Hafezi) also covered this story.

US Envoy Says China's US's Approach To Iran Differ. The New York Times (1/26, Kahn, 1.19M) reports, "China and the United States want to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, but their 'approach may differ' on the best tactics to achieve that result, Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick said after a round of meetings on the subject in Beijing." He also "called the diplomatic discussions fluid and said there were still differences over what steps should be taken to respond to what Western powers say is a covert program by Iran to build nuclear bombs." This suggests "hat China, despite heavy lobbying, had left some doubts as to whether it is prepared to back a proposal…to get the United Nations Security Council involved in deciding how to handle Iran's nuclear program."

Annan Doesn't Expect IAEA To Be Ready In February To Refer Iran To Security Council. Reuters (1/26, Leopold) reports, "U.N. chief Kofi Annan said on Wednesday he doubted that a U.N. nuclear watchdog would be able to come to a decision by early February on referring Iran to the Security Council over its nuclear programme," adding that "Mohamed ElBaradei, the director-general of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, did not expect to have a report on Iran ready until the end of February, for the IAEA's regular board meeting in March."

Iran Accuses British Military Of Aiding Bombers. The Washington Post/Reuters (1/26, A17) reports, "Iran accused the British military on Wednesday of cooperating with bombers who killed eight people in southwest Iran, an allegation Britain described as ludicrous. A little-known group campaigning for independence for Iran's Arab minority asserted responsibility in a Web statement for Tuesday's attacks on a bank and government building in the oil city of Ahvaz." Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki "said that London's involvement was clear and that Tehran would make strong protests." A spokesman in British Prime Minister Tony Blair's office "said Iran's allegation 'deserves to be treated with scorn by the whole international community.'"

UN Peacekeepers To Maintain Monitoring Of Israeli-Lebanese Border. The New York Times/Reuters (1/26) reports, "The members of the United Nations Security Council have agreed that United Nations peacekeepers should keep monitoring the Israeli-Lebanese border for six more months, the current Council president said on Wednesday." Lebanon wanted "a renewal of the mandate of the United Nations' peacekeeping mission for the border area for a year, until Jan. 31, 2007." Yet "the 15 Security Council members instead reached a consensus on an extension until July 31."

Frist Says US, International Community Must "Ramp Up The Pressure" On Syria. In a New York Sun (1/26) op-ed, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist writes, "A year ago this month, a car bomb killed the former Lebanese prime minister, Rafic Hariri. An ongoing U.N. investigation has implicated the Syrian government in the murder. The Syrian president, Bashar al-Assad, may have played a personal role. Several additional high-profile bombings have occurred in the last several months. Enough is enough: Syria's actions in Lebanon have proven that it has no desire to play by the rules of civilized nations. Now, the United States and its partners need to ramp up the pressure on Damascus. We need to push Syria away from its homegrown brand of Arab fascism and toward democracy, peace, and an authentic end to its interference with Lebanon's affairs. We should start by increasing and expanding our funding for prodemocracy groups in Lebanon and Syria. In the coming Congress, I plan to support legislation that will do just that."

Bush Administration Criticizes Mexico's Plan To Distribute Border Maps. Following an announcement Tuesday by Mexico's National Human Rights Commission that it will print and distribute maps showing immigrants the safest routes to cross the border into Arizona, Mexican President Vicente Fox distanced his government from the group, saying that it was an "autonomous commission." However, the Washington Times (1/26, Kralev, Seper, 90K) reports, "The Bush administration yesterday accused the Mexican government of facilitating illegal entry into the United States after Mexican officials said they would distribute maps of dangerous border areas and posters with safety instructions and other tips. … 'We oppose in the strongest terms the publication of maps to aid those who wish to enter the United States illegally,' said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. 'It is a bad idea to encourage migrants to undertake this highly dangerous and ultimately futile effort.'" Meanwhile, "Rafael Laveaga, spokesman for the Mexican Embassy in Washington, said the NHRC is an independent body and receives no government funds."

Hutchison, Border Sheriff Seek Investigation Of Suspected Mexican Military Incursions. The Washington Times (1/26, Seper, 90K) reports Zapata County Sheriff Sigifredo Gonzalez Jr., who heads the Texas Sheriff's Border Coalition, demanded yesterday "that the US and Mexican governments investigate incursions into the United States by heavily armed drug escorts dressed in Mexican military uniforms 'before someone gets killed.'" He "said a growing number of suspected incursions and violence aimed at the area's law-enforcement officers is making the border 'a pretty dangerous place.'" Also yesterday, "Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas Republican, said she was 'deeply concerned' about the possible incursions and asked Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to 'fully investigate this matter and report to Congress the details and confirm whether or not Mexican military officials were involved. … The Mexican government has denied that the men in any of the incidents were soldiers, saying that some drug smugglers dress in military-style uniforms, carry automatic weapons and drive military-style vehicles."

Kyl Says Border Encounters "Undermine Efforts" To Keep Drugs Out Of US. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Marosi, Lopez, Connell, 958K) reports, "Armed Mexican government personnel made unauthorized incursions into the United States five times in the last three months of 2005, including one incident last month in Southern California, according to confidential Department of Homeland Security records. … The records obtained by The Times provide new details on more than a dozen incursions into the US, including the five most recent ones." Meanwhile, "US Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar said "that incursions have declined by more than 50% since 2002. Still, with assault rates against agents at record highs, any incursion is taken 'very seriously.' However, "US Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) said in an interview Wednesday that this week's incident in Texas was 'about as serious as it gets' and noted that dozens of reported incursions have occurred in his state. The encounters seriously undermine efforts to stop the flow of drugs coming across the US border and suggest possible cooperation among Mexican authorities and traffickers, he said."

Mexico Said To Be Helping US Secure Southern Border From Terrorists. Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Bowers, 61K) reports, "A top priority of the United States government is to prevent a determined terrorist from crossing the US- Mexico border. It is also becoming a primary mission for Mexico - and the first place it's focusing on is the 375-mile, desolate stretch of land that abuts Arizona. In addition to sharing intelligence and cooperating on investigations with its US counterparts in Arizona, Mexico last year set up three checkpoints along known human-smuggling routes on its side of the border and plans to add two more. Between August, when the checkpoints became operational, and December, Mexican officials stopped 1,277 non-Mexicans (OTMs, for 'other than Mexicans') from crossing into Arizona, according to a Mexican government report obtained by the Monitor. The report shows that most of the OTMs came from Central and South America, but seven are listed as Iraqis." Meanwhile, "the US government is apprehending record numbers of illegal immigrants on the Arizona side of the border."

State Legislators Considering Immigration Legislation. USA Today (1/26, Cauchon, 2.31M) reports, "Frustrated by slow action in Congress, state legislatures are debating whether to increase border enforcement at their own expense, fine employers who use undocumented workers and get local police involved in deporting them." However, "like Congress, legislatures are divided on what to do about the estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants who provide a low-wage workforce in the USA." It "is one of the hottest issues as 37 legislatures convene this month. Last year, states considered 300 immigration laws and approved 40." Meanwhile, "Congress is considering changes to immigration policies — a border fence, a guest worker program — but it's uncertain whether action will be taken this year."

Provision Of Immigration Bill Compared To Nazi Practice. Andrew S. Grove, a member of the board of overseers of the International Rescue Committee, in an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/26, A10, 2.11M) writes that the recently passed "Sensenbrenner-King" immigration bill "scares me because it has the potential of turning neighbor against neighbor -- and of changing our country into a place of fear and mistrust. … The bill contains a provision punishing anyone who 'assists, [or] encourages . . . a person who . . . lacks lawful authority to remain in the United States' to remain here." Grove states, "This could change the nature of our society in a way that I have seen firsthand. As a Jewish child hiding from the Nazis in Hungary, I saw how the persecution of non-Jewish Hungarians who hid their Jewish friends or neighbors cast a wide blanket of fear over everyone. This fear led to mistrust, and mistrust led to hostility, until neighbors turned upon neighbors in order to protect themselves. Is this what we want?"

Mexican Presidential Candidate Seeks To Boost Profile. The New York Times (1/26, McKinley, 1.19M) reports on Mexican presidential candidate Felipe Calderón's efforts to succeed President Vicente Fox. After "a bitter primary fight last year, Mr. Calderón transformed himself from a little-known former energy commissioner into the best hope for the president's right-of-center party. He is running a strong second in most opinion polls to the leftist former mayor of Mexico City, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, and many political strategists say he has a chance to win the election on July 2." Yet, "outside the capital's opinion-makers and party insiders, surveys show that one in five Mexican voters still do not know who Mr. Calderón is, and as the presidential campaign officially kicked off last week, he made his first tour to try to change that."

Musharraf Vows To Construct Natural-Gas Pipeline To Iran. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Champion, Kempe, 2.11M) reports, "Pakistani president Pervez Musharraf "said his country would build a planned natural-gas pipeline from Iran without India's participation if talks among the three nations continue to produce no result." His "threat came at a delicate time for Gen. Pervez Musharraf, while he is having to balance domestic public opinion and relations with the U.S., India and Iran." At the World Economic Forum he "said Pakistan had opened bilateral talks with Tehran to build a gas pipeline that would run from Iran." But India has "expressed concern about recent attacks on existing gas and power lines in Baluchistan, the region of South Western Pakistan through which a pipeline from Iran would pass. Gen. Musharraf played down the threat posed by Baluchistan militants, dismissing the conflict as limited to one isolated local tribe." His "tough line on the pipeline talks contrasts with that of his prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, while in New York last week."

OPEC Will Refrain From Cutting Oil Output. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Bahree, 2.11M) reports that OPEC "is widely expected to refrain from trimming output levels when its oil ministers meet in Vienna next week, but Iran remains a wild card." The Journal notes, "With the price of oil nearing records recently, an OPEC decision to continue pumping oil at close to capacity should reassure markets of plentiful supply, something Saudi Arabia appears to favor and the U.S. seems to be counting on. In short, there is no economic incentive for OPEC to trim output when market forces have sent billions of extra dollars pouring into the coffers of oil-rich countries anyway." But Iran "could use the OPEC meeting to send a warning to Western Europe and the U.S., both big oil importers." Meanwhile, "U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman says he has been in regular contact with oil producers. 'By and large, they seem to be understanding that we have a situation where there needs to be more oil rather than less oil in the world,' Mr. Bodman said this week."

South Korea Ignores US Call For Action On North Korean Financial Activity. The Washington Times (1/26, Salmon, 90K) reports, "A day after the United States urged South Korea to take an active stance against what it contends are North Korea's illicit financial activities, Seoul refused to say whether it would take action and made clear it opposed any attempt at regime change in Pyongyang." South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun said, "When it comes to the North Korean regime, raising issues about it or pressuring it or sometimes wishing for its collapse, on that position of some Americans, we do not agree." The Times notes, "By 'some Americans,' Mr. Roh appeared to be referring to hard-liners in the Bush administration who favor toppling North Korean strongman Kim Jong-il."

US, South Korea Close To Reaching Free Trade Deal. The Washington Post (1/26, D6, Blustein, 744K) reports, "The United States and South Korea are very close to launching negotiations for a free-trade agreement, which would be the most economically significant free-trade pact for Washington since the North American Free Trade Agreement." Yet "both sides have been reluctant to start formal talks until they are reasonably confident that the negotiations would end in agreement. South Korea's farmers are bitterly opposed to opening their country's agricultural markets, and their political clout could scuttle a deal." While "plans to launch the U.S.-Korea talks could still founder, officials and other sources who have spoken recently with negotiators said an announcement is likely to materialize before long. Asked about the prospects, one administration official replied, 'How do you say 'soon' in Korean?'" And "Rob Portman, the U.S. trade representative, heightened the speculation Friday when he told reporters, 'We'll be announcing some additional [free-trade agreement] partners soon. As I think you will notice, they will not be with small economies because I do think we need to move on to some larger economies.'"

"Gas War" Between Russia And Ukraine Leads To European Shortages. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, White, Crawford, 2.11M) reports, "Bickering over natural-gas shipments intensified between Moscow and Kiev has reduced supplies of Russian gas to Europe, led to shortages in several countries and fueled energy-security anxieties across a continent gripped by an arctic cold snap." Few experts "expect a repeat of Russia's New Year's gas cutoff to Ukraine. … But as details of the Jan. 4 deal have emerged, doubts have grown about whether it sets the stable foundation for supplies and exports to Europe that its backers claim." Despite reassurances from both countries, "the two sides yesterday failed to reach agreement on the details of implementing the Jan. 4 compromise, intended to halt what is known as the 'gas war' in the region."

Putin Claims Alleged British Spies Linked To NGOs. The Washington Post (1/26, A16, Finn, 744K) reports, "Russian President Vladimir Putin on Wednesday linked the scandal to foreign financing of nongovernmental organizations in Russia, a connection that grass-roots activists say is tangential and being used to smear their work." Putin said, "The situation is regrettable, as we have seen, when attempts are made to use secret services to work with nongovernmental organizations and when financing is carried out through secret services' channels." The UK government "has refused to comment on the espionage charges, but has denied it was doing anything illegal with nongovernmental organizations." And "Russian authorities have so far presented no evidence that the alleged spy ring recruited human rights activists." Yet the claims have been "seized on by many Russian politicians. The lower house of parliament, by a vote of 401 to 6, passed a resolution Wednesday condemning the involvement of foreign intelligence services with the private groups."

The New York Times (1/26, Myers, 1.19M) notes, "Putin's "remarks intensified a furor" that "could worsen relations with Britain and other countries as Russia presses its assault on European and American financial support of groups that criticize the Kremlin." Putin "said Russia was still considering whether to expel the four diplomats, all mid-ranking secretaries in the British Embassy, indicating for the first time that they had not yet been expelled or withdrawn, though the espionage that was alleged was reported to have been uncovered last fall."

Google Complies With Chinese Censorship. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 10, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "Google has launched a new search engine today in China, but in order to do it, it had to agree to restrictions from the communist government." CBS (Gonzales) added, "Just last week, Google stood up to another government, the US government, and refused to turn over personal information the Justice Department wants for its defense of an anti-pornography law." Larry Magid, CBS technology analyst: "The fact that they're making a strong, stand firm with the Justice Department over privacy and then being very loose with the Chinese over censorship, I find a little bit disturbing." Gonzales: "Both decisions actually make good business sense for Google. The company can't afford to spook American users, and it has to get a foothold in the world's largest market."

GOP Lawmaker To Question Google's Move. The Financial Times (1/26, Kirchgaessner) reports, "Google will be called to task in Washington next month following a controversial decision by the internet search engine to launch a China-based version of its website that will censor results to avoid angering the country's Communist government." Rep. Chris Smith's decision "to call for a February 16 hearing to examine the operating procedures of US internet companies in China, represents the first signs of what could become a serious backlash against Google and other internet companies in Washington that are perceived as capitulating to the Chinese government."

Zoellick Sends Message About Strengthening US Relations With China. The Washington Post (1/26, A16, Cody, 744K) reports that deputy secretary of state Robert Zoellick's appearance with a Chinese panda "was seen at least in part as a signal to China about where he wants to steer U.S.-Chinese relations. The official New China News Agency received his message 10-4. It immediately transmitted a happy photo of Zoellick and Jing Jing around the country, illustrating the government's view that good U.S.-China relations are essential and, in fact, getting better and better." His "gesture, in another reading, could also be seen as a signal of where he stands in the Washington debate about China. Interpreted that way, becoming a public panda-hugger was an eloquent endorsement of the view that engagement with Beijing is the best path for the United States and that China's emergence as an Asian power does not have to mean conflict in the Pacific." Zoellick's trip "also included specific talks on issues that could be seen as a test of the U.S.-Chinese engagement his panda photo was meant to symbolize. These, he said, included China's stand on the effort to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, China's role in diplomacy to persuade North Korea to eliminate its nuclear weapons program and China's currency policies at a time of soaring U.S. trade deficits."

Concerns Raised Chinese Economic Growth May Be Too Rapid. The Washington Post (1/26, D1, Goodman, 744K) reports, "Led by surging exports, China's economy grew by 9.9 percent last year, the government announced Wednesday, underscoring the swiftness by which this once insular communist country has remade itself into a global trading power." But "the news also increased concern that China could be growing too fast, despite measures aimed at cooling the hottest parts of the economy. Aggressive investment has produced too many factories, heightening trade tensions with the United States as China exports surplus wares such as steel, depressing prices globally. Chinese officials worry that unneeded plants could deliver a crippling era of deflation -- falling prices -- which hurts profits and reduces incentives for companies to invest. Such a syndrome kept Japan mired in recession and unemployment for much of the past 16 years."

Report Suggests China Has Fewer AIDS Cases. The New York Times (1/26, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "China countered the long-held suspicion that it has undercounted the number of people with H.I.V. and AIDS by releasing a new, more extensive estimate on Wednesday that found the opposite: that the country had actually overestimated its number of cases." The new WHO and United Nations AIDS program report "lowered the country's estimated number of H.I.V. and AIDS cases to 650,000 from the official figure of 840,000 released by the government in 2003. Many experts and AIDS workers have long believed that China has at least 1.5 million cases, possibly far more, and some expressed skepticism that the new figure was any more reliable than past estimates."

European Commission Proposes "Nordic-Style" Economic Reforms. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Echikson, 2.11M) reports, "The European Commission presented a new plan to reinvigorate Europe's economies, calling for a Nordic-style, seemingly social-democratic approach rather than an Anglo-Saxon free-market model." The report "gave the most praise to northern European countries that are increasing spending on research and development universities and pursuing interventionist jobs policies." It "also called for the creation of a competitive, continent-wide energy program, and support for small and medium-size businesses." It represents Commission President José Manuel Barroso's attempt to recover the initiative after a tough first year in office. Many of his previous plans for jump-starting Europe's economies have faltered."

Sri Lankan Factions To Resume Peace Talks. The New York Times (1/26, Senanayake, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports, "In a measure of how intractable this country's ethnic conflict is, the warring parties agreed Wednesday to begin talking to each other again, after more than 18 months of deadlock over a site for peace talks and with scores of killings in the meantime." The negotiations "would focus on strengthening an all-but-ineffectual four-year-old cease-fire agreement. They are scheduled to take place in Geneva, starting as early as February." While "modest," the agreement "represents a major breakthrough in the decade-long war."

African Worshipers Mix Islam With Christianity. The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, McLaughlin, 61K) reports that "worshipers at 'The True

DOJ_NMG_0011774

Message of God Mission' say it's entirely natural for Christianity and Islam to coexist, even overlap. They begin their worship by praying at the Jesus alcove and then 'running their deliverance' - sprinting laps around the mosque's mosaic-tiled courtyard, praying to the one God for forgiveness and help. They say it's akin to Israelites circling the walls of Jericho - and Muslims swirling around the Ka'ba shrine in Mecca." The group represents "a window on an ongoing religious ferment in Africa. It's still up for debate whether this group, and others like it, could become models for Muslim-Christian unity worldwide or whether they're uniquely African. But either way, they are 'part of a trend,' says Dana Robert, a Boston University religion professor."

Villagers Flee Nigerian Troops. The New York Times/Reuters (1/26) reports, "Villagers fled Nigeria's lawless delta on Wednesday amid fears of military reprisals after a wave of attacks on foreign oil companies by ethnic Ijaw militiamen." Reuters adds, "The army deployed more troops to major installations, and oil companies tightened security around offices a day after heavily armed men stormed the headquarters of the Italian oil firm Agip, robbing a bank on the premises and killing eight policemen and a civilian."

Annan Denies Arranging Deal For Son's Car. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Farley, 958K) reports that after his son, Kojo Annan, agreed to reimburse Ghana for the import duties on a car he misidentified as belonging to his father, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan "welcomed news of his son's move. 'It was the right thing to do. … He knew I wanted him to sort it out, clean it up. It was between him, his lawyer and the government." Asked if "he, as secretary-general, secured the tax break for his son, Annan said, 'Absolutely not. It was done behind my back.'"

Former Surfer Volunteers For International Disaster Relief. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 11, 2:20, Wright) reported, "The remarkable story of one American making so much of a difference. He was a laidback, California surfer, until he saw the damage done by the tsunami" ABC (Wright): "If relief organizations had special forces, Matt George would be a Green Beret. He's a one-man trauma ward, in what may be the coldest clinic on earth. A builder doing what he calls extreme home makeovers. And he delivers supplies where no aid workers have gone before."

Pinochet's Daughter Seeks Asylum In US. The Washington Post (1/26, A20, Reel, Constable, 744K) reports, "The oldest daughter of the former Chilean dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet was detained Wednesday at Dulles International Airport outside Washington, where she requested political asylum, a Chilean official said." Lucia Pinochet "had been served with a subpoena over the weekend in Chile, along with her mother and three siblings. They had been ordered to appear in court on Monday…on tax fraud charges connected to a probe of her father's illegal bank accounts." A DHS spokesman "said she was in U.S. custody at the airport in Virginia 'pending resolution of her immigration status.'" And "Chile's Interior Minister, Francisco Vidal, said U.S. Ambassador Craig Kelly informed his government that Pinochet, sought on an international arrest warrant, had requested asylum. U.S. officials said they could not comment on that issue."

Success Of Bush Allies In War In Iraq Contrasted With Opponents' Downfall. Columnist Mark Steyn in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) writes, "Remember the conventional wisdom of 2004? Back then, you'll recall, it was the many members of George Bush's 'unilateral' coalition who were supposed to be in trouble, not least the three doughty warriors of the Anglosphere -- the president, Tony Blair and John Howard -- who would all be paying a terrible electoral price for lying their way into war in Iraq. The Democrats' position was that Mr. Bush's rinky-dink nickel-&-dime allies didn't count: The president has 'alienated almost everyone,' said Jimmy Carter, 'and now we have just a handful of little tiny countries supposedly helping us in Iraq.' (That would be Britain, Australia, Poland, Japan . . .) Instead of those nobodies, John Kerry pledged that, under his leadership, 'America will rejoin the community of nations' -- by which he meant Jacques Chirac, Gerhard Schröder, the Belgian guy." But now "Bush, Blair, Howard and Koizumi are all re-elected, while Mr. Chirac is the lamest of lame ducks, and his ingrate citizenry have tossed out his big legacy, the European Constitution; Mr. Schröder's government was defeated and he's now shilling for Russia's state-owned Gazprom ('It's all about Gaz!'); and the latest member of the coalition of the unwilling to hit the skids is Canada's Liberal Party, which fell from office on Monday. John Kerry may have wanted to 'rejoin the community of nations.' Instead, 'the community of nations' has joined John Kerry, windsurfing off Nantucket in electric-yellow buttock-hugging Lycra, or whatever he's doing these days."

WSJournal Honors Memory Of Free Market Leader Of Hong Kong. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) editorializes, "Hong Kong's prosperity since World War II is sometimes referred to as a 'miracle.' But miracles require the intervention of a deity, whereas Hong Kong's remarkable economic growth between 1945 and its handover to China in 1997 owes a great deal to the nonintervention of a mortal man, John James Cowperthwaite, who died over the weekend at the age of 90." As Financial Secretary from

1961-1971, Cowperthwaite "was the architect and guardian of the greatest natural experiment in free-market capitalism in the postwar world." The Journal concludes, "Other would-be central planners could learn a lot from what John Cowperthwaite didn't do."

NYTimes Applauds African Union Rejection Of Sudan Leadership. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) editorializes, "The African Union did the right thing in rejecting Sudan's bid for the rotating presidency of the organization. Allowing President Omar Hassan al-Bashir of Sudan to become Africa's face to the world would have sent just about every wrong message imaginable." But while "rebuffed for now, Mr. Bashir was promised the group's presidency in 2007, and for now the chair will go to the Congo Republic, hardly a model of human rights. Giving Sudan the African Union presidency next year will be just as unacceptable as it was this year."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter To Question Gonzales On NSA Surveillance. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/26, McGough) reports, "If Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales thought he might be spared tough questioning from Republican senators when he testifies about the warrantless wiretapping of Americans thought to be in contact with foreign terrorists, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., yesterday disabused him of that notion." The Post-Gazette continues, "In a letter sent to the attorney general and shared with the press, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee propounded a series of questions that in a courtroom setting might be called 'leading' and requested that Mr. Gonzales answer them in his opening statement before the committee on Feb. 6. … The combative nature of the letter wasn't altered by the fact that the printed salutation to 'Attorney General Gonzales' was replaced by a hand-written 'Al.'" The Post-Gazette adds, "The letter honed in on the Bush administration's assertion-ridiculed by critics -- that Congress empowered the president to engage in electronic surveillance of Americans without a court order when it passed a resolution after the Sept. 11 2001, attacks authorizing him to 'use all necessary and appropriate force' against terrorists. … Mr. Specter asked: 'In interpreting whether Congress intended to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act by the Sept. 14, 2001, resolution, would it be relevant on the issue of congressional intent that the administration did not specifically ask for an expansion for executive powers under FISA?' … Mr. Specter further asked: 'If Congress had intended to amend FISA by the resolution, wouldn't Congress have specifically acted to [do so] as Congress did in passing the Patriot Act giving the executive expanded powers and greater flexibility in using "roving" wiretaps?' … Mr. Specter also made it clear he would press Mr. Gonzales about the administration's other legal rationale for the surveillance -- that it flowed from Mr. Bush's constitutional authority as commander-in-chief."

The National Journal's Technology Daily (1/25, Stirland) reports, "Pressure mounted on the Bush administration Wednesday to provide lawmakers with answers on domestic spying activities. … Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., released a three-page letter with detailed questions to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on the president's decision in 2002 to secretly authorize domestic wiretaps without warrants. … The letter includes many of the questions that constitutional scholars have been posing about the president's order, and several questions could put Gonzales in an awkward position." Technology Daily adds, "At the same time, Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee demanded that Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., hold a business meeting so the committee can vote to investigate several aspects of the administration's domestic spying. … Under committee rules, Roberts is obligated to hold a meeting if at least five members formally ask for one. All seven Democrats on the panel signed the request to Roberts." Technology Daily notes, "A majority vote is needed to move ahead with the investigation. Two Republicans on the committee, Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine, have asked Roberts for a hearing on the matter. Roberts has said nothing publicly about holding a hearing. … Also on Wednesday, a group of Democrats, including Sens. Richard Durbin of Illinois and Charles Schumer of New York, sent a letter to President Bush asking him for specific changes in the law that he believes are necessary to permit effective surveillance of suspected terrorists."

Gonzales Warned To Expect Tough Questions From Senate Committee. The CBS Evening News (1/25, lead story, 4:00, Roberts) noted, "NSA officials aren't likely to be called in the first round of hearings, but in a letter, the Attorney General was warned by the Judiciary Committee chair, he's in for a full day of grilling on February 6. Among the questions: Why did the President bypass the Federal court that covers wire taps, and how does he justify not more fully informing Congress? The President insists he has informed Congress but complains existing laws aren't nimble enough to cover the explosion of technology through which terrorists communicate."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, lead story, 3:00, Mitchell) also noted, "The White House says when Congress authorized the war on terror after 9/11, it gave the President the power to spy without court orders. But even some powerful Republicans are challenging the program's legality. Today, Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter sent this 'dear Al' letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, listing 15 tough questions he will be asked at a hearing two weeks from now, including whether the spying was an illegal expansion of presidential power." Sen. Specter: "There was no thought when we passed the authorization for the use of force that it had implications for electronic surveillance."

The Baltimore Sun (1/26, Davis, 296K) focuses on Specter's letter, reporting that even as Bush spoke, "questions mounted about the administration's legal justifications for the program. A key Republican senator took issue with Bush's defense of the operation, which was secretly authorized by the president after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and targets some communications inside the United States. Also, new reports surfaced suggesting that the administration had rejected an earlier proposal in Congress that would have made it easier to obtain court approval for domestic wiretapping."

Administration Dismissed 2002 Proposal To Change Surveillance Warrant Standard. The Washington Post (1/26, A4, Eggen) reports, "The Bush administration rejected a 2002 Senate proposal that would have made it easier for FBI agents to obtain surveillance warrants in terrorism cases, concluding that the system was working well and that it would likely be unconstitutional to lower the legal standard." The Post continues, "The proposed legislation by Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) would have allowed the FBI to obtain surveillance warrants for non-U.S. citizens if they had a 'reasonable suspicion' they were connected to terrorism -- a lower standard than the 'probable cause' requirement in the statute that governs the warrants. … The administration has contended that it launched a secret program of warrantless domestic eavesdropping by the National Security Agency in part because of the time it takes to obtain such secret warrants from federal judges under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA)." The Post adds, "The wiretapping program, ordered by President Bush in 2001, is used when intelligence agents have a 'reasonable basis to believe' that a target is tied to al Qaeda or related groups, according to recent statements by administration officials. It can be used on U.S. citizens as well as foreign nationals, without court oversight. … Democrats and national security law experts who oppose the NSA program say the Justice Department's opposition to the DeWine legislation seriously undermines arguments by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and others, who have said the NSA spying is constitutional and that surveillance warrants are often too cumbersome to obtain. … 'It's entirely inconsistent with their current position,' said Philip B. Heymann, a deputy attorney general in the Clinton administration who teaches law at Harvard University. 'The only reason to do what they've been doing is because they wanted a lower standard than 'probable cause.' A member of Congress offered that to them, but they turned it down.'" The Post notes, "But Justice Department officials disagreed, saying the standard the department opposed in 2002 is legally different from the one used by the NSA. … 'The FISA "probable cause" standard is essentially the same as the "reasonable basis" standard used in the terrorist surveillance program,' said spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos, using the term for the NSA program the White House has adopted. 'The "reasonable suspicion" standard, which is lower than both of these, is not used in either program.' … Justice officials also said that even under a different standard, the process of obtaining a surveillance warrant would take longer than is necessary for the NSA to efficiently track suspected terrorists."

Under the headline "Words, Deeds On Spying Differed," The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Savage, 958K) also reports on the 2002 bill, noting that the administration's "public position then was the mirror opposite of its rationale today in defending its warrantless domestic spying program, which has come under attack as a violation of civil liberties. … A Justice Department spokesman confirmed Wednesday the administration had opposed changing the law in 2002 in part because it did not want to publicly debate the issue. 'There was a conscious choice not to have a public discussion about it. It could have exposed the program. This was a military defense intelligence program,' said the spokesman." The Times notes Sen. Patrick Leahy "accused the administration of having tried 'to paper over the legality of a secret spying program. If they really believed the current law is too burdensome, the Bush administration should have asked Congress to change it, but they did not. Instead a top lawyer in the Bush administration did just the opposite.'"

Knight Ridder (1/26, Landay) reports, "James A. Baker, the Justice Department's top lawyer on intelligence policy, made the statement before the Senate Intelligence Committee on July 31, 2002. He was laying out the department's position on an amendment to FISA proposed by Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio. The committee rejected DeWine's proposal, leaving FISA intact. … So while Congress chose not to weaken FISA in 2002, today Bush and his allies contend that Congress implicitly gave Bush the authority to evade FISA's requirements when it authorized him to use force in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks three days after they occurred - a contention that many lawmakers reject." Knight Ridder adds, "Glenn Greenwald, an Internet blogger, first connected the earlier Justice Department statement to the Bush administration's current arguments on his Web log, called Unclaimed Territory. … Baker's 2002 statement drew new attention Wednesday as the White House continued its campaign to justify eavesdropping on Americans who are suspected of being in contact with al-Qaida or other terrorist groups, despite possible violation of FISA." Knight Ridder notes, "Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said Wednesday that Gonzales stands by the administration's current view that FISA warrant requirements impose 'additional layers of review' that sacrifice 'critical speed and agility.'"

Administration Launches Campaign To Frame Surveillance Debate. The Dallas Morning News (1/26, Mittelstadt) reports, "The Bush administration raced this week to defend its warrantless domestic spying program, with several aims in mind, experts say: Win over a conflicted public; force Democrats into an arena that plays to GOP strength; and head off talk of impeachment and special prosecutors." The News continues, "With polls showing the public sharply divided over the controversial surveillance program, the White House and its critics – Democrats, small-government conservatives and civil libertarians – are engaged in a high-stakes contest to frame the debate. … 'If it's defined primarily as "government abuse, the president out of control, the White House running roughshod over basic constitutional rights," it would be a major problem for an extended period of time for the president – both on Capitol Hill but also with the voters,' said political analyst Stuart Rothenberg. … 'If the issue is defined more as "protecting national security, keeping people safe, stopping terrorism," then what the Democrats immediately saw might be a good issue for them could actually be turned around for the president and the Republican Party.' … Though the court of public opinion is key, some suggest that the political system or the courts will be the ultimate arbiter of the program's legality – and the far weightier question of whether Mr. Bush is claiming executive powers outside the bounds of the Constitution or the law." The News notes, "Mr. Specter has summoned Attorney General Al Gonzales for a Feb. 6 hearing and is under pressure from Democrats to invite former Deputy Attorney General James Comey and other administration officials who reportedly raised concerns about the legality of the domestic surveillance."

Debate Over Legality Of NSA Surveillance Narrows. Fox News (1/26) reports, "After three days of a Bush administration offensive and weeks of debate and accusations, some legal experts are coming to terms on what is illegal and what is not in the National Security Agency electronic surveillance program. … 'When the president goes around and speaks ... and says we're monitoring calls from overseas from Al Qaeda to the United States, the NSA can go ahead and do that now under the law,' Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said after the Senate Judiciary confirmation hearing of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito." Fox News continues, "But Kennedy said independent organizations, like the Congressional Research Service, have studied the legality of the NSA program and say the president has gone beyond what the rules allow. Bush, however, says the eavesdropping program is legal and doesn't overstep the boundaries allowed to him by the Constitution and congressional resolution. … According to legal experts, hypothetically, if the NSA had intercepted calls from alleged terrorists such as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed or Ramzi Binalshibb, both now in custody, while they were abroad, then U.S. intelligence agents could listen to the calls without a warrant. That goes for phone calls with people on the other end of the line who happen to be in United States. … Only when the person inside the United States becomes the target of surveillance is a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance court required. … Other experts agree that a warrant is not needed until the U.S.-based individual becomes a suspect. … But others argue that the law says domestic communications monitoring rules apply even when only one end of the call is on U.S. soil. They say that's why Bush signed a highly classified directive approving the program and has to re-approve it every 45 days."

Bush Continues Defense Of NSA Domestic Surveillance Program. President Bush defended the NSA domestic surveillance program yesterday. Media reports describe the President continuing to wage a "campaign" style offensive against its critics, with CBS saying Bush used "his strongest words yet to defend the program" and ABC saying he "made the most dramatic link yet between the September 11th attacks and his controversial domestic spying program." ABC, like most print sources this morning, was referring to the President's reference to the latest Osama Bin Laden tape.

Bush said the tape was a reminder of how serious the terror threat is. Reuters (1/26) reports Bush said "he took…bin Laden's threats of another attack seriously and invoked the al Qaeda leader's recent audiotape to defend a domestic eavesdropping program." The AP (1/26, Pickler) also focuses on Bush's Bin Laden argument, as does the Washington Times (1/26, Sammon, 90K), which notes the President "the unusual step of imploring Americans to heed the warnings of…bin Laden." Likewise, USA Today (1/26, 2.31M) headlines its brief report "Take Bin Laden Threat Seriously, Bush Warns."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, lead story, 4:00, Schieffer) reported, "The President has clearly decided the best defense is a good offense. Democrats and even some within his own party have raised strong criticism of his decision to eavesdrop without warrants on some Americans, but today the President used his strongest words yet to defend the program." CBS (Roberts) added, "Bush privately told NSA staff today they have his 100% support in the eavesdropping program." His "visit was accompanied by a new White House PR line, casting the program as a vital military operation, one that can't wait for courts to consider warrants." Scott McClellan: "Do you expect our commanders in a time of war to go to a court while they're trying to survey the enemy? I don't think so."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 5, 0:42, Vargas) reported, "Bush made the most dramatic link yet between the September 11th attacks and his controversial domestic spying program." At the NSA he "said had the eavesdropping program been in effect prior to 9/11, the hijackers might have been stopped." Bush: "We know that two of the hijackers who struck the Pentagon were inside the United States, communicating with al Qaeda operatives overseas. But we didn't realize they were here plotting the attack until it was too late. We must be able to connect the dots, before the terrorists strike, so we can stop new attacks."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, lead story, 3:00, Williams) reported, "When it was first disclosed, the critics pounced upon learning that American intelligence personnel were eavesdropping on Americans who were placing suspect phone calls outside of the country. And while many Americans still say it's illegal domestic spying, the president insists on calling it a terrorist surveillance program and insists it's necessary and within his legal powers. And today, he took his argument right to the source." NBC (Mitchell) added, "Inside the NSA, he brushed off critics who say it is illegal." President Bush: "All I would ask them to do is listen to the words of Osama bin Laden and take him seriously. When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it."

Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Cameron) said Bush "reiterated that the program has helped prevent attacks and saved lives and that the US must detect and track all al Qaeda communications to secure the homeland."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Bash) added, "One of the things that even the President's opponents say that they give him credit for is knowing how to run a campaign, and that's exactly what the White House has been doing in trying to defend the controversial spying program this whole week. They are also really pulling out all the stops. One of the things that they did…was have the President himself" go to the NSA "to not only thank the people who are conducting his program, but also to, of course, make the arguments that we've heard time and time again about why it is legal and necessary. But another thing that sort of fell into the President's lap, if you will, was, of course, the tape from Osama bin Laden. And so the White House, for the first time today, had the President use that in making the argument for this program." CNN added that Bush "spent a lot of time on making the argument at the NSA today that it is just perhaps people who are talking to members of al Qaeda who could be listened in on, that it is not just people in the United States who are being surveilled, if you will. That is an argument that we've heard many times but certainly more so today."

The Washington Post (1/26, A4, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "Bush, whose aides said they consider the issue a clear political winner, is resurrecting tactics from the last campaign to make the NSA spying program a referendum on which party will keep the United States safe from terrorists." He "has dispatched top White House officials almost daily to defend the program and has sent a message to party activists that he considers fighting terrorism with tools such as NSA eavesdropping the defining issue of the November elections." The Post adds, "Exhibiting an obsession to detail not seen in the Social Security rollout a year ago, the White House is even waging a war on the semantics being used in the debate, lashing out at reporters who call the program 'domestic' spying, because the monitored calls involve a person overseas." It is also "putting out pages of highly detailed -- and often hotly disputed -- legal analyses of the program and drawing what Democratic critics and many independent analysts regard as questionable historical parallels to show Bush is following a long wartime tradition."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Gerstenzang, 958K) says Bush's visit to NSA headquarters at Ft. Meade, MD, "was part of a stepped-up campaign in recent days to gain public support for the spying program." Earlier, White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan "defended Bush's decision not to ask a special court for warrants to monitor people in the United States. 'This is a time of war. This is about wartime surveillance of the enemy,' McClellan said, adding a refinement of his earlier arguments: 'We don't ask our commanders to go to the court and ask for approval while they're trying to gain intelligence on the enemy.'"

The New York Times (1/26, Bumiller, Lichtblau, 1.19M) reports Bush "first met privately with employees at the agency, then told a small group of reporters who accompanied him that the program, which intercepts international phone calls and e-mail messages of people in the United States suspected of links to Al Qaeda, had been a crucial tool in fighting terrorism."

The President's speech was widely noted by local television news. Local coverage largely mirrored the national newscasts. For example, WGCL-TV Atlanta (1/25, 11:00 p.m.) reported, "Bush continued his aggressive defense of his domestic spying program today." KPRC-TV Houston (1/25, 4:16 p.m.) reported, "The President' s strong defense of a surveillance program is forcing some Democrats to mute criticism." KPNX-TV Phoenix (1/25, 10:12 p.m.) said Democrats '"disagree [with the President] and the Senate will hold hearings," but as KWGN-TV Denver (1/25, 9:24 p.m.) reported, this is a "controversy…the President himself seems almost anxious to keep alive."

White House Confident Public Supports Monitoring Efforts. NBC Nightly News (1/25, lead story, 3:00, Mitchell) reported, "Democrats think their best argument is the move was the power grab the President and will ultimately prove to be unpopular. Despite the furor, the White House is encouraged by recent polls, showing more Americans care about fighting terror than preserving their privacy." Andrew Kohut, independent pollster: "The public is concerned about civil liberties but what they tell us in the polls is they're more concerned about whether the government is doing enough to protect it from another terrorist attack." Mitchell: "Tonight the President plans to reauthorize the spying for as long as terrorists remain a threat."

Claims NSA Program Could Have Prevented 9/11 Attacks Challenged. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 2, 2:00, Martin) reported, "The man who ran the NSA on 9/11 has made the most powerful argument in favor of the controversial eavesdropping program." Gen. Michael Hayden: "Had this program been in effect prior to 9/11, it is my professional judgment that we would have detected some of the 9/11 al Qaeda operatives in the United States." He "offered no specifics, and Democratic members of the 9/11 commission dispute it." Former 9/11 commissioner Tim Roemer: "Indicating that an intercepted communication would somehow identify and then stop or block parts of 9/11, I think is stretching this argument entirely too far." Former 9/11 commissioner Bob Kerrey: "We lost them. There was a breakdown in communication that many has nothing to do with the inability of getting an intercept permission to listen to people's communication." Martin: "Hayden stopped just short of saying warrantless eavesdropping could have broken up the 9/11 plot, but today, the White House claimed it might have. You can't prove any of that with what the 9/11 commission found."

Republicans May Propose Expanding Administration Wiretapping Authority. As a sign of growing Republican confidence in supporting Bush's terrorist monitoring policy one unidentified GOP Senator may propose expanding the Administration's wiretapping authority. The CBS Evening News (1/25, lead story, 4:00, Roberts) reported, "The growing response from Republicans in Congress: Tell us what you need. We'll write new laws. In fact, one Republican Senator told CBS News tonight, she might consider loosening the standards for approving the wiretap and allowing more officials at the Justice Department, not just the Attorney General, to authorize eavesdropping, so that it could begin just as soon as the NSA needed it." Schieffer: "Now, just a second, John. Are you telling me, there's a feeling amongst Republicans up in the Congress that they're going to give more people in the government the authority to eavesdrop without warrants? Is that what you're saying here?" Roberts: "That's what one Republican Senator is suggesting, that instead of making all eavesdropping or wiretapping requests go through the Attorney General, that some upper-level officials might be available and able to be able to authorize those wiretaps. It would spread it out among dozens of people as opposed to a single one at the top." Schieffer: "What do you think the mood is up there? Do you think anything like that could pass?" Roberts: "It's certainty being considered by the Republicans. They have the majority in the Senate and in the House, and if they want it, they'll probably get it."

Democrats On House Intel Panel Demand Open And Closed Hearings On NSA Spying. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "Democrats on the House Intelligence Committee are demanding that the panel hold both open and closed hearings on the NSA surveillance program. In a letter to the Republican chairman, they say they want to know the purpose of the spying, when it began and when it was first authorized. They want to know the targets of the eavesdropping, who decides what information to collect."

Hillary Clinton Calls Bush's Explanations Of Domestic Spying Program "Strange And Farfetched." CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "Senator Hillary Clinton says she doesn't know if Mr. Bush broke the law by authorizing these wiretaps without warrants, but today the New York Democrat called the President's explanations about domestic spying -- and I'm quoting now – 'strange and farfetched.'"

Under the headline "Rift Between Parties Over NSA Wiretapping Grows," the Washington Post (1/26, A4, VandeHei, 744K) reports, "In the latest sign of the escalating debate on the issue, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) called Bush's rationale a 'strange' and dangerous legal stretch." The "conflicting views of the NSA spying program highlighted by the Bush-Clinton exchange reflect a widening divide over warrantless eavesdropping," and "how leaders in both major parties are trying to shape the debate in preparation for upcoming congressional hearings and this year's elections."

LATimes Says Bush Equating Appeasement With Standing Up For Rule Of Law. In an editorial titled "Spying By Another Name," the Los Angeles Times (1/26, 958K) says, "With polls showing the American public increasingly skeptical about the need to abridge core constitutional freedoms to wage the war on terrorism, the Bush administration launched a major PR offensive this week to justify its decision to conduct warrantless wiretapping within the United States." The White House "deserves credit for at least making its case. Unfortunately for the president, it's a weak case, and repetition doesn't make it any better." The Administration's "legal case remains wobbly, which may explain…Bush's churlish attitude toward his critics." The

President "is equating concerns about the legality of bypassing the courts to obtain a warrant to eavesdrop on Americans with a lack of appreciation for the threats posed by Al Qaeda. In Bush's world, only appeasers stand up for the Constitution."

Judge Orders US To Give Moussaoui Defense Documents About Pre-9/11 Intelligence. The AP (1/26) reports US District Judge Leonie Brinkema "has ordered the government to give admitted terrorist conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's defense team documents describing what officials knew before Sept. 11, 2001, about al-Qaeda threats and some of its hijackers. … 'Several of the categories of information are so critical to the issues in this case that the court can address some of the requests without a response,' Brinkema wrote. 'Moreover, given the increasingly shortening time before the start of the trial, discovery issues must be resolved quickly.' Granted Tuesday under seal, her order was released Wednesday after government censors blacked out about five lines of it." The AP notes that the "data clearly was sought by the defense for use in the first part of the upcoming court proceeding, in which prosecutors will try to convince jurors that the FBI would have prevented the Sept. 11 attacks if Moussaoui had told federal agents what he knew about al-Qaeda's desire to fly planes into U.S. buildings. The defense will argue that agents had more information about the plot than Moussaoui could provide but still could not prevent the attacks."

Scripps Howard (1/25, Gordon) reports, "The ruling could create a legal showdown, for example, if it requires intelligence agencies to produce classified information that they consider too sensitive to release, even to defense lawyers with government security clearances. … Jury selection is set to begin on Feb. 6, with opening arguments slated for March 6 in a sentencing trial to determine whether Moussaoui, who pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts last April, should live or die."

Al Arian Lawyers Seek To Withdraw From Case If Retried. The AP (1/26) reports Sami al Arian's defense attorneys, Linda Moreno and Bill Moffitt, "asked a federal judge to let them off the case if prosecutors retry the former college professor on charges of aiding terrorists. … A hearing is scheduled for Friday. 'We gave everything we had, and I'm too exhausted to give anymore,' Moffitt…said Tuesday." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutor Terry Zitek told the court that if the case is retried, his team will need until June to present 'a streamlined case,' which should take about two months to present to a jury."

Texas Men Sentenced For Illegal Exports To Libya, Syria. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/26) reports Texas "brothers convicted of sending exports from their U.S. company to countries considered sponsors of terrorism were sentenced Wednesday to federal prison, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. Hazim Elashi was sentenced to 5 1/2 years in prison and will be deported after serving his sentence. His brother Ihsan 'Sammy' Elashi was given a six-year term, which will run consecutively to the four-year sentence he is currently serving. Hazim and Ihsan Elashi, their three brothers and their company," InforCom, "were convicted in 2004 on charges of making illegal technology shipments to Libya and Syria." The AP notes, "Agents from the FBI investigated InfoCom for years and raided the business the week before the Sept. 11 terror attacks. Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the original indictments against the brothers, calling it part of a campaign against 'the financiers of terror.'"

ACLU Files Lawsuit In Support Of Tariq Ramadan. The New York Times (1/26, Preston, 1.19M) reports that the ACLU filed a lawsuit in Federal District Court in Manhattan on behalf of scholar Tariq Ramadan, and three national organizations of academics or writers who have invited him to speak to their members yesterday, "seeking to strike down a clause of the USA Patriot Act that bars foreigners who endorse terrorism from entering to this country." Ramadan "has been denied a United States visa since July 2004, when he was on the verge of moving with his family to Indiana to take up a tenured professor's position at the Joan B. Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies at the University of Notre Dame. … The ACLU, joined by the New York Civil Liberties Union, brought the suit against Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asserting that the Patriot Act clause is unconstitutional and that the ban on Mr. Ramadan violates the First Amendment rights of American thinkers who want to meet with him." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A4, 2.11M) reports, "The lawsuit…intensifies the debate over the Patriot Act and reflects concerns in academia that the US's security precautions are hampering the flow of ideas between foreign and US scholars."

PATRIOT ACT:

US Scholarly Organizations File Lawsuit Over Patriot Act Visa Provision. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A4, 2.11M) reports, "Three scholarly organizations sued the federal government over its 2004 decision to revoke a visa granted to a European expert on Islam," Tariq Ramadan, "preventing him from taking a faculty position at the University of Notre Dame. The lawsuit…intensifies the debate over the Patriot Act and reflects concerns in academia that the U.S.'s security precautions are hampering the flow of ideas between foreign and U.S. scholars." The Journal adds, "The lawsuit asks the U.S. District Court in New York City to declare unconstitutional a portion of the Patriot Act that denies entry on the grounds of 'ideological exclusion' to those who have endorsed or espoused terrorist activity or who have persuaded others to do so. 'There is simply no evidence' of Mr. Ramadan supporting terrorism, said Barbara DeConcini, executive director of the American Academy of Religion, one of the plaintiff groups." The New York Times (1/26, Preston, 1.19M) notes, "The ACLU, joined by the New York Civil Liberties Union, brought the suit against" DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff "and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asserting that the Patriot Act clause is unconstitutional and that the ban on Mr. Ramadan violates the First Amendment rights of American thinkers who want to meet with him." The AP (1/25, Neumeister) and Knight Ridder (1/26, Strobel) also report on the lawsuit.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Georgia ACLU Releases Documents Allegedly Showing Spying On Activist Groups. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/26, Montgomery, 430K) reports, "In the name of fighting terrorism, the U.S. government and police agencies from the federal to the local level have been spying on Georgia anti-war rallies, peace and social action groups, and even a vegan protest, the state legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union charged Wednesday. Documents and surveillance photos obtained by the ACLU through a Freedom of Information Act request reveal a pattern of 'spying on Georgians who are our friends and neighbors, and are leading lawful lives,' attorney Gerald Weber said…outside the Georgia Homeland Security offices in downtown Atlanta. … 'Many of us remember the days of J.Edgar Hoover, and this is another reminder,' said state Rep. Nan Grogan Orrock." The Journal-Constitution adds, "A special agent at the FBI press office in Washington who would not give her name said the FBI 'investigates groups or individuals when we have information or allegations of federal law being broken. We do not investigate groups or persons exercising their constitutional right of protest or dissent.'"

The AP (1/26) reports the ACLU "released two documents from the FBI and DeKalb County Homeland Security," and "Weber says so far the ACLU has received complaints from six organizations and nearly two dozen people who fear they have been spied upon, photographed, videotaped or had their events infiltrated by government agents. He says none of them did anything that would justify surveillance but rather are critics of the Bush administration." The AP notes, "FBI spokesman Bill Carter says all FBI investigations are conducted in response to information that the people being investigated were involved in or might have information about crimes."

White House Declines To Release Documents On Katrina Warning. NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 2, 2:00, Williams) in its story on Federal Katrina relief reported, "Congress also wants answers from the White House about the poor Federal response to Katrina, and tonight members of both parties complain the President is holding back important information about who knew what and when." Sen. Joe Liebermann: "They haven't given us the documents we've asked for. They haven't let us into the people in the White House who were involved in the decision making regarding Hurricane Katrina." Gregory: "The White House cites executive privilege." Scott McClellan, White House Press Secretary: "The President believes that Senator Lieberman ought to have the right to confidential conversations with his advisors, just like all presidents have asserted they ought to have that same right."

The New York Times (1/26, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "In their four months of digging, House and Senate investigators have collected hundreds of thousands of pages of documents and testimony from governors, mayors, Homeland Security and Pentagon officials and dozens of others touched by Hurricane Katrina." While Republican leaders of the two committees are satisfied with "the mountains of still-accumulating evidence," to Democrats, "crucial holes still remain, particularly related to what senior White House aides and the president knew, and how they reacted to this knowledge, right before the storm and after it." Senator Joseph I. Lieberman "said Wednesday that he realized it was unlikely he could get the information he wanted by threatening to subpoena. Even if one were issued, the administration would probably fight it in court."

MSNBC's Hardball (1/25, Shuster) reported, "Ratcheting up a battle with Congress, the Bush White House is now refusing to turn over Hurricane Katrina related documents or make senior officials available for testimony. The Administration contends executive branch discussions about the storm are not open to review by Congress. … It was Senator Lieberman, the President's favorite Democrat, who on Tuesday alleged the Bush Administration's refusal to cooperate has killed the Katrina investigation."

Landrieu Says Administration Should Be More Forthcoming. Sen. Mary Landrieu said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/25), "I believe the committee, the Bipartisan Committee of Senator Collins and Lieberman, has asked for those records. They are truly acting in a bipartisan spirit. And we would like a full investigation of actually what happened. Not so that we can spend time blaming…but that we can prevent this from happening again, and we can get on the business of rebuilding New Orleans, Louisiana, and the Gulf Coast. So you'll have to ask them specifically what they asked for, but I would hope they would provide all the records so we could get to the bottom of whose fault it was that the levees broke and how do we fix it in the future." Asked about White House claims that the requested information is privileged, Landrieu said, "I would think it would be in the country's best interest, as we seek to protect the people of this nation from terrorist attacks, from catastrophic events, that we would have a real independent investigation of that. Our governor has turned over a great deal of information. I'm assuming that our mayor and local officials have. The White House needs to step up and be very forthcoming. But more than turning over that information, the White House needs to turn over some good plans for rebuilding. All we've heard is a lot of empty promises and criticism."

Vitter Criticizes Federal, State and Local Responses To Hurricane. Sen. David Vitter said on MSNBC's Hardball (1/25), "We need to understand what broke down at the federal level and the state level and the local level. Because things clearly broke down at every level. This was not a disaster that was predictable. This was a disaster that was utterly predicted in print, in studies like the hurricane pan exercise. And every level of government fell flat." Vitter added, "I was disappointed at the federal response, very disappointed. I said so matter of factly the Friday after the storm. I gave the whole recovery effort an F. And the state response was just as poor and the local response."

White House Rejects Plan To Buy Out Katrina Home Owners. In a story that characterized the White House as declining to approve aid for Louisiana NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 2, 2:00, Williams) reported on "the long road back for the Gulf Coast, specifically the state of Louisiana. Crippled by Katrina and hoping for a $30 billion Federal relief package that just today was shot down by the Bush White House." NBC (Gregory) added, "Despite lofty promises, the White House has rejected Louisiana's homeowner bailout plan which local officials consider it crucial for recovery." Rep. Richard Baker, New Orleans: "To leave us in that state of disrepair without the hope of recovery is very troubling." Gregory: "The White House considers the" state plan to buy out home owners as "too expensive and bureaucratic suggesting instead the state settle for the more than $6 billion in Federal grants released today to bail out just those homeowners who didn't have insurance because they lived outside the floodplain." Administration officials "say more Federal dollars may come later, but acknowledge that conservatives in Congress are worried about spiraling costs."

The New York Times (1/26, Nossiter, 1.19M) carried a similar tone, reporting, "The White House decision to withhold support from a major Congressional reconstruction plan left Louisiana officials expressing bewilderment on Wednesday over what they characterized as the lack of a workable alternative from the Bush administration. … 'The White House simply needs to tell us what their plan is,' Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said Wednesday at a news conference in Baton Rouge. 'We don't see an adequate plan. You can't fix a $12 billion problem with $6 billion.'"

Reuters (1/25, Roberts) reported, "A group representing mortgage bankers also said President George W. Bush had yet to offer an alternative that was comparable to the plan proposed in Baker's legislation to create the Louisiana Recovery Corp. 'We'll really pay attention to the State of the Union address because we'll be anxious to see what the president is going to propose as a plan for rebuilding those devastated areas,' said Kurt Pfotenhauer, senior vice president of government affairs at the Mortgage Bankers Association. 'It's clear that some plan has to be in place in order to spur the investment of private capital.'"

USA Today (1/26, Dorell, Konigsmark, 2.31M) reports, "Donald Powell, President Bush's coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, suggested that money from the government's funding grant, announced Wednesday, be doled out to roughly 20,000 homeowners who weren't in a flood zone and did not have flood insurance when Hurricane Katrina hit. State officials must draw up plans for disbursing the money and get federal approval." Blanco said the plan "simply will not work," and added that "she won't use the money as the White House recommends. 'We are not in the business of choosing between our citizens.'"

Highlighting the severity of the damage caused by Hurricane Katrina, NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 10, 1:30, Williams) also reported that some viewers were complaining about NBC's continuing coverage of the impact of Hurricane Katrina. NBC defended the extent of its coverage saying that it reported on the impact of all of last year's hurricane's in the region, but "Katrina is different. Katrina displaced two million Americans. It destroyed 350,000 homes. Not all the bodies have been found yet. It exposed cracks in our society, and it has us talking about race and class and money and relief. It affected what we pay for gas and may affect what we pay in taxes. It literally rearranged the map of the Gulf Coast. There are many heroes, but no one villain. Tonight, one of the great American cities is partially in ruins, and many of our fellow citizens are hurting and have nothing left. And in some places, nothing's been done yet." And "we intend to keep covering it."

Nagin's Comments Scrutinized. The Washington Post (1/26, C1, Haygood, 744K) reports, "New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin blew into the original Chocolate City yesterday. Everywhere he goes these days, there seem to be things to explain, his words and comments tossed about as if, well, in yet another hurricane." Attending the winter meeting of the US Conference of Mayors at the Capital Hilton, Nagin said, "I don't get what all the fuss was about when I talked about New Orleans being a chocolate city. I mean, I understand the frustration with my 'God' comments. Maybe I went a little overboard. But Chocolate City? Come on.'"

Flood Insurance Program Administrator Seeks Changes. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) reports, "The administrator of the National Flood Insurance Program asked Congress on Wednesday to allow the elimination of discounts on as many as 1.2 million policies and suggested that the government consider requiring millions more homeowners to buy coverage. The program expects to borrow $23 billion from the Treasury to pay claims from Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma." David I. Maurstad, the administrator, "asked Congress to order the program's parent agency, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, to study expanding coverage requirements to properties in areas known as 500-year flood plains, with a 0.2 percent chance of flooding in any year, and to properties protected by levees and dams. He estimated that would affect four million to six million properties."

The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports "the Senate Banking Committee is preparing to overhaul the federal flood insurance program, resulting in much higher premiums for many homeowners and a likely taxpayer bailout. … While broad legislation hasn't yet been proposed, several committee members and experts who appeared before the banking panel yesterday agreed that the insurance program needs to be restructured to operate more like a private insurance company."

WAR NEWS:

US, Iraqi Forces Repel Insurgent Attacks In Ramadi. US Marines and Iraqi troops repelled insurgent attacks in Ramadi Tuesday afternoon, killing seven insurgents. The Washington Post (1/26, A18, Finer, 744K) reports, "Five insurgents -- whose assault included mortar, small-arms and machine-gun fire -- were killed by a strike from a Marine Harrier jet as they gathered in a nearby cemetery, according to a statement from Capt. Jeffrey S. Pool, a Marine spokesman in the city. Two other fighters died in a firefight after insurgents used a rocket-propelled grenade to attack a military convoy entering the city's main government compound. No U.S. or Iraqi forces were wounded in the clashes, the statement said." The Post adds, "During the fighting, Zaal Shehan Mahmoud, 30, a cameraman for the Baghdad TV network, was killed by more than 20 bullets to the head, abdomen and legs, according to Mohammed Dulaimi, a doctor at the Ramadi hospital."

Officials See Rift Between Foreign Fighters, Local Insurgents. Maj. Gen. Richard Zahner, deputy chief of staff for intelligence for multinational forces in Iraq says a deepening rift between radical foreign fighters and native Iraqi insurgents has turned violent, creating an opportunity for US forces to try to persuade local guerillas to lay down their arms and join the political process. USA Today (1/26, Jervis, 2.31M) reports, "Iraq's national security adviser, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, also said there is a rift in the insurgency, calling it a 'a major step forward in our fight against terrorism.'" Zahner "said the insurgency consists of about 12,000 to 15,000 hard-core Iraqi fighters and supporters, as well as 1,000 militants loyal to al-Qaeda in Iraq, of which about 10% are foreign."

Videos Of Insurgent Attacks Provide Training Tool For US Forces. USA Today (1/26, Diamond, 2.31M) reports, "Videotapes of insurgent attacks in Iraq have become a potent propaganda tool for militant Islamists but also a handy training aid for U.S. forces, according to Army briefing documents being given to U.S. officers deploying for duty in Iraq. Insurgents routinely videotape their attacks and sometimes post the footage on the Internet as propaganda to show tactical victories against U.S. military convoys or helicopters. A briefing report prepared by the intelligence division of the Army's Training and Doctrine Command shows how the Army is mining the insurgent tapes for ways to avoid casualties." The briefing "report says 55% of U.S. military deaths in Iraq are attributed to improvised explosive devices, the military's term for roadside bombs, and small-arms attacks. It says 59% of U.S. military deaths occurred in Baghdad and Sunni-dominated Anbar province, which runs from just west of Baghdad to the Syrian border. Designed to help soldiers know what to expect and how to counter insurgent tactics, the briefing also warns that Iranian-backed Shiite militants as well as Iraqi Sunnis and foreign Sunni fighters are regularly mounting attacks."

US Troops Train Iraqi Police To Defeat Insurgents, Combat Corruption. NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 6, 2:00, Miklaszewski) reported that Colonel Bushar Hussein, commander of Iraq's first special police brigade, and his "commandos are slowly taking back parts of the city." And "he isn't doing it alone. For the past nine months, 10-man teams of US military advisors have trained and fought alongside Iraqi police commandos. Major General Joe Peterson heads the increased US effort to turn Iraqi police into an independent fighting force by the end of this year." Peterson: "Our troops are making a significant difference in increasing that capability." Miklaszewski: "Despite some progress, the Iraqi commandos are far from fighting entirely on their own." Peterson: "There are times when a guy will walk off down the street and buy a pack of cigarettes while we are trying to provide security. And I'll have to fix him." Miklaszewski: "In addition, some police units have been infiltrated by militias while others are reportedly ripe with corruption." And "Colonel Bushar warns that government corruption and incompetence may pose more of a threat to the future of Iraq than the insurgents. And in the long run, may be even more difficult to defeat."

US To Release Five Female Iraqi Prisoners. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 3, 0:25, Woodruff) reported, "Iraq's justice ministry said at least five Iraqi women, in US custody, would be freed soon, possibly tomorrow. This would go a long way toward meeting the demands of militants who kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll of the Christian Science Monitor. A US spokesman confirmed the release of prisoners would occur, but the US has said consistently that any release would be a coincidence and not a response to the kidnapping."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 4, :45, Schieffer) reported, "US officials insist this is not linked to the demand by the kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll that US forces release all women detainees."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Murphy, 61K) reports, "Reuters reported that Iraqi officials have suggested the delay in releasing the women was linked to the demands of the kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll, who threatened to kill her by last Friday unless all women prisoners were freed. The deadline passed with no word on Ms. Carroll's fate."

However, the Washington Times (1/26, Deshmukh, 90K) says that the Iraqi Justice Ministry official "denied that the release of the women had anything to do with kidnappers' demands, and U.S. forces have stressed they do not negotiate with hostage-takers."

Reporter Recounts Attempted Kidnapping In Iraq. The Washington Post (1/26, C1, 744K) excerpts the book "Tell Them I Didn't Cry: A Young Journalist's Story of Joy, Loss, and Survival in Iraq" by reporter Jackie Spinner. In it, Spinner writes, "For 13 months in 2004 and 2005, my half was in Baghdad, dodging mortar rounds, roadside bombs and potential kidnappers, while [twin sister] Jenny worried from home that I would not be able to keep my promise to my nephew, her young son. 'Aunt Jackie always comes back,' I told him each time I returned to Baghdad, to a place that began to feel more like home the longer I stayed." Spinner recounts a day outside Abu Ghraib prison, "when a stranger grabbed my arm and began dragging me toward a car. … Another man came up behind me and grabbed me around the waist. Someone else grabbed the pillowcase that held my belongings and threw it aside. At first I couldn't fathom what was going on. What was happening to me? Were they trying to kidnap me? They were trying to kidnap me! My heart pounded. … Once the men who grabbed me saw the Marines, they let go, and everyone scattered."

In Wake Of Carroll Kidnapping, Journalist Rethinks Dangers In Iraq. Journalist Alissa Rubin writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/26, 958K), "When Jill Carroll was kidnapped, other journalists in Iraq were aghast that something so horrible had happened to someone they knew. But many insisted privately that it never would have happened to them. … The truth is that we are working in a war zone where no rules apply. No one is safe: not Iraqis, not Westerners, not men, not women." Rubin adds, "For most journalists in Iraq, it's hard to be honest about danger, even though we talk about it all the time. … To family and friends not in Iraq, it is incomprehensible why you came here, and certainly why you returned twice, three times — in my case, over and over for nearly three years. … For me, at least, what is true is that once in a while as a journalist you get the chance to witness history, a moment when tectonic plates shift, when more is at stake than you ever imagined you would touch or see. It's the adrenaline surge of being in a place where people's lives are in the balance, where every decision counts and where what you're writing might, might just matter. … I was aware of the statistics: Since the beginning of the war, 60 journalists, five of them women, had been killed in Iraq and at least 37 abducted, according to a tally by the Committee to Protect Journalists. But like all the other foreign journalists in Iraq — fewer than 75 of us, down from more than a thousand after the war — I needed to believe that I was going to slip through. After [journalist Jill] Carroll's abduction, I don't feel that way anymore." Iraq "is hostile ground and nothing I do can make it safe."

Former General Says Iraq WMD Moved To Syria Before US Invasion. Former Iraqi general George Sada, author of "Saddam's Secrets, How an Iraqi General Survived Saddam Hussein," in an interview on Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (1/25) said, "I want to make it very clear to everybody in the world that" there were weapons of mass destruction in Iraq "and the regime used them against our Iraqi people. It was used against Kurds in the north. Against Arabs." Asked whether Iraq had the WMD when the US toppled Hussein's regime, Sada replied, "Up to the year 2002, 2002, in summer, they were in Iraq. And then when Saddam realized that the inspectors are coming on first of November and the Americans are coming, so he took the advantage of natural disaster happened in Syria, a dam was broken. So announced to the world that he is going to make an air bridge" and moved the WMD to Syria.

Kurdish Writer's Prosecution Seen As Test Of Iraq's Move Toward Democracy. The New York Times (1/26, Oppel, 1.19M) reports on Kamal Sayid Qadir a Kurd who, from Austria has written articles accusing Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani's Democratic Party of corruption "while calling members of its intelligence service, the Parastin, criminals and its chief -- Mr. Barzani's son -- a

'pimp.'" Qadir is now imprisoned in Iraq, "sentenced last month to 30 years for defaming the Parastin and Kurdish political leaders after a trial that he said had lasted 15 minutes." The Times adds, "His case, while extraordinary, is by no means unique." These prosecutions "indicate how much remains at play in newly democratic Iraq. The nation has made remarkable steps away from totalitarian rule: the overthrow and prosecution of a genocidal dictator, two national elections and the adoption of a Constitution. But it remains to be seen how far Iraq will ultimately travel toward true Western-style democracy." Iraq "is still testing the limits of responsible free speech, and some of the name-calling and rumor-mongering that goes on clearly oversteps the boundaries. Many of Mr. Qadir's criticisms exceeded what would be tolerated in other Middle East countries, particularly his assertions about the sexual proclivities of the Barzani clan. A number of Kurdish journalists who have called Mr. Qadir's imprisonment outrageous say they are nevertheless uncomfortable with some of his writings, calling them offensive and reckless."

Arrest Of Police Strains Relations Between Iraqis, UK Troops. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Moore, 958K) reports, "Tensions continued to simmer Wednesday between local Iraqi officials and British troops in the Shiite-dominated southern city of Basra, where the British this week arrested 14 law enforcement officials, including two senior police intelligence officers, allegedly linked to political corruption and assassinations. The British released several of the men Wednesday, but a spokesman for the Basra provincial council said that eight remained in custody, including three who had been transferred to a prison facility after British authorities said they had bomb-making materials in their possession. … The province has responded to the arrests by threatening to cut off all cooperation with British forces in Iraq's second-largest city."

Soldiers Make Digital Memorials For Fallen Comrades. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Searcey, 2.11M) reports, "Digital photography, video and Internet access have let soldiers in Iraq stay closer to distant friends and family than troops in any other war. Now, these electronic records are also creating a powerful and raw new wave of war memorials. … Wartime cinematographers say commanders ask to review the videos before they're shown at memorial services to make sure they don't degrade the image of soldiers with, for example, footage showing them drinking."

Hoagland Says Administration Has Been "Bitten" By Reality In Iraq. Jim Hoagland writes in the Washington Post (1/26, A25, 744K), "Iraq's Dec. 15 balloting was orderly and inspiring, but it has created an aftermath that is neither of those things. It has also forced the Bush administration into a silent reassessment of where Iraq is going and how it is going to get there. Increasingly, the country drifts toward the future as two relatively stable autonomous regions and a violently unstable central zone, all linked by a weak central government and a reduced, reactive U.S. military presence." The Bush Administration "gives no sign of trying to hurry things along as it concedes it must deal with the election results it has, not the results it wanted. Those were canceled by the poor showing of Ayad Allawi and Ahmed Chalabi -- secularists who conceivably could have been strong, independent executives -- and successful electioneering by Iranian-backed Shiite parties distrusted by Washington. … Reality has bitten the Bush administration in Iraq and forced the president to settle for less than he wanted. Let's hope that reality can now do the same with Iraq's newly empowered Shiite leaders."

In 1998, Clinton Said No-Fly Zones Over Iraq Would Be Enforced. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (1/26, 90K) excerpts a December 28,, 1998 statement by then-President Bill Clinton. Clinton said, "I think I should say a few words about an incident early this morning over the skies of Iraq, where American and British air crews were enforcing a no-fly zone in Northern Iraq. They were fired on by Iraqi surface-to-air missiles. They took evasive action, returned fire on the missile site, and returned safely to their base in Turkey ... They attacked because they were attacked. And they did the appropriate thing. We will continue to enforce the no-fly zones."

Musharaff Blames US Missile Attack For Increasing Domestic Turmoil. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Champion, Kempe, 2.11M) in an interview with Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf at the World Economic Forum reports Musharraf "said a suspected U.S. missile attack on a Pakistani village that killed civilians this month 'probably' killed five or six al Qaeda operatives, but had 'harmed our interests' by violating his country's sovereignty and feeding domestic unrest." He "said his goal is to transform Pakistani society by ending conflicts like the one in Baluchistan, defusing Islamist extremism and generally calming 'a nation in turmoil.'" Gen. Musharraf said, "We want to guard our own sovereignty." He "also said his close cooperation with the U.S. in the fight against terrorism hadn't been damaged, and that Pakistan needs the technical help the U.S. can offer to gather intelligence. 'Intelligence is far more significant and difficult than operating against [al Qaeda],' he added."

India Provides Aid To Afghanistan. The Washington Times (1/26, Nelson, 90K) reports, "India has poured more than a half-billion dollars of foreign aid into Afghanistan in the past three years in an attempt to create a friendly and stable neighbor in a volatile part of the world." India's "effort, which continues despite a Pakistani blockade of Indian goods bound for Afghanistan, touches all aspects of life." Tensions "between India and Pakistan has complicated proposed energy pipelines from Afghanistan, which would have to run through Pakistan on the way to India." But some observers "think Pakistan is more worried about losing its dominant position in Afghan trade."

Rumsfeld Takes Issue With Reports Saying US Military Is Overstretched. Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Hume) reported, "A couple of new reports suggesting that the US military is overstretched or overstressed or both drew a sharp response from the Secretary of Defense. One report was funded by the Pentagon itself." Fox (Baier) added, "On Capitol Hill today, former officials from the Clinton Administration joined top Democrats to release a new study on the state of the US armed forces. Titled 'The US Military -- Under Strain And At Risk,' it concludes the war in Iraq threatened the battle-readiness of US troops. … At the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld addressed the criticism head on." Rumsfeld "said today's US military, while trying to recover from underfunding…is far from broken." Rumsfeld "pointed out there are more than 2 million troops in the US military if you're counting active duty, National Guard and Reserves and only 136,000 troops in Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 5, :45, Williams) reported, "Two new reports say tonight the US military is so overburdened from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that it's near the breaking point. One report flatly warns ground forces are stretched so thin and under such enormous strain, the Pentagon may not be able to recruit and retain enough troops in the all volunteer army to defeat the insurgency. This afternoon, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld responded." Rumsfeld: "This armed force is enormously capable. In addition, it's battle hardened. And it is not a peace time force that has been in barracks or garrisons." Williams: "Rumsfeld pointed out that there are 138,000 US troops in Iraq, out of two million total including the National Guard and Reserve units."

In a brief story The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 3, :45, Schieffer) noted, "Rumsfeld took strong issue today with former Clinton Administration officials who say the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have stretched the US military to the near breaking point. At a Pentagon news conference, Rumsfeld called that misdirected, and he praised the military as, quote, 'enormously capable and battle hardened.'"

The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/26) says Rumsfeld "spoke a day after the Associated Press reported that an unreleased study conducted for the Pentagon said the Army is being overextended, thanks to the two wars, and may not be able to retain and recruit enough troops to defeat the insurgency in Iraq. Congressional Democrats released a report Wednesday that also concluded the U.S. military is under severe stress."

The Washington Times (1/26, Scarborough, 90K) reports that Rumsfeld responded to the reports with a "combative appearance at a Pentagon press conference. He reminded reporters that during the Clinton years, when the military was sent on about 50 war and peacekeeping missions, that the force suffered from lack of funding and that some units were 'hollow pieces.'" Rumsfeld "said anyone who concludes that the Army is breaking does not know what he or she is talking about. 'I suspect the people writing these things don't know, either, because I suspect that they don't have any more insight than the other people around here do,' he said. 'I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they're close to breaking. That's just not the case.'"

USA Today (1/26, Komarow, 2.31M) says Rumsfeld "dismissed" the reports, "calling their authors ill-informed about America's 'battle-hardened' forces." Speaking at a news conference, Rumsfeld said, "People just don't fully understand," adding that today's military is "battle hardened. It's not a peacetime force that has been in barracks or garrisons."

The Washington Post (1/26, A18, Tyson, 744K) reports that Rumsfeld "said a recent decision to scale back U.S. troop levels in Iraq did not grow out of a need to relieve the strain on American ground forces." Rumsfeld said, "The force is not broken," adding, "I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they're close to breaking. That's just not the case." Rumsfeld called the US military an "'enormously capable force,' as demonstrated to the world by its swift overthrow of governments in Iraq and Afghanistan. Such proven capability 'ought to increase the deterrent rather than weaken it,' he added."

Study Finds Active Duty Reservists Earn More Than In Civilian Jobs. A study released yesterday by the RAND Corporation says that nearly three-fourths of military reservists called to serve in Afghanistan and Iraq are making more money on duty than in their civilian jobs. USA Today (1/26, Komarow, 2.31M) reports, "In many cases, the troops earn a higher gross salary in civilian life. But when the federal tax exemption and other allowances approved by Congress for troops in combat are factored in, about 72% are better off, according to a study by the RAND Corp., a research institute. The RAND study, which was funded by the Pentagon, showed an average benefit of 25% over civilian pay, about $10,000 a year." USA notes, "The study results run counter to complaints by Reserve and Guard troops that they have suffered financially when activated. It is part of an effort to track the war on terrorism's effects on part-time troops."

DOJ:

Federal Judge Extends Temporary Appointment Of Alabama US Attorney. The Mobile (AL) Register (1/26, Kirby) reports, "Chief U.S. District Judge Ginny Granade has extended the term of U.S. Attorney Deborah Rhodes, whose temporary appointment to the Mobile office expires this month." The Register continues, "Rhodes took over for David York, who resigned in September amid reports of an internal Department of Justice investigation into allegations that he had an improper relationship with an assistant prosecutor." The Register adds, "Under the law, the Justice Department could replace York for a maximum of 120 days. The statute gives the chief judge of the district the power to name the U.S. attorney beyond that, and Granade said Tuesday that she complied with a request by the Justice Department to extend Rhodes' tenure until President Bush names a permanent successor. … When appointed to Mobile, Rhodes, 47, was on special assignment to the Justice Department in Washington as a counselor to the assistant attorney general of the criminal division."

DHS Assisting DOJ With Case Management System. Federal Computer Week (1/25, Arnone) reports, "The Homeland Security Department is helping the Justice Department develop new case management systems for the entire federal government, DHS' chief information officer said today." FCW continues, "DHS is working with DOJ to create a Consolidated Enforcement Environment (CEE), which allows access to all available data, analyzes data and links relevant law enforcement partners, DHS' CIO Scott Charbo said. … One goal of the collaboration is to move beyond products and create a layer of information that can be used governmentwide, Charbo said."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Trial Seen As Big Test For Federal Prosecutors. The New York Times (1/26, Eichenwald) reports, "In the court of public opinion, they were convicted long ago. But as Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, the onetime leaders of Enron, step into a court of law next week, the outcome of their fraud trial is far from certain, creating one of the most closely watched and hotly contested white-collar criminal cases ever." The Times continues, "On one side of the Houston federal courtroom starting Monday will be two top-flight teams of defense lawyers, who will be taking the risky approach of proclaiming many of the controversial actions of Enron and some much-criticized statements of their clients to be legal and truthful." The Times adds, "On the other, the prosecutors for the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, who have racked up an impressive array of guilty pleas in the case, but whose performance at trial has been decidedly less dazzling. … 'For the government, if they lose the Enron case, it will be seen as a symbolic failure of their rather significant campaign against white-collar crime,' said John C. Coffee Jr., a professor at Columbia Law School. 'It will be seen as some evidence that some cases are too complicated to be brought into the criminal justice process.'" The Times notes, "Of the three major Enron-related criminal cases brought by the government before juries, guilty verdicts stand from only one, which involved Enron's booking what the government said were phantom profits on the sale of Nigerian barges to Merrill Lynch. A second case, against the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, was thrown out by the Supreme Court on appeal. The third, involving the broadband division of Enron, resulted in no convictions, but the five defendants await a retrial."

Success Of Efforts To Curb Corporate Fraud Seen As Problematic. The Washington Post (1/26, D1, Johnson, Ben White) reports, "Four years after the collapse of Enron Corp. spurred the most sweeping revisions in business regulation since the Great Depression, experts warn that the ingredients for a similar financial disaster remain." The Post continues, "Despite new laws and regulations, companies still face enormous pressure to meet short-term financial goals, creating a powerful motive for accounting fraud. Outsized executive compensation grows by the year, offering another rich incentive to cook the books. And there is no certainty that Congress will continue to fund regulatory budgets at current levels. … But some things have changed since December 2001, when Enron's sudden descent into bankruptcy protection rocked investor confidence and left the markets reeling. Accountants face independent oversight for the first time in 70 years. Most corporate board members take their jobs far more seriously. Wall Street is somewhat less willing to accommodate clients' interests." The Post adds, "Nearly a dozen experts contacted by The Washington Post, including regulators, accountants, chief executives, board members and investor advocates, agreed to fill out a corporate governance report card on the eve of the Enron trial. … Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in July 2002, imposing new duties on corporate executives, auditors and directors. The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department spent tens of millions of dollars to root out malfeasance. Along the way, prosecutors won criminal convictions and decades-long prison terms for former leaders of Adelphia Communications Corp., Tyco International Ltd.

and WorldCom Inc. … But in a sense, the government efforts may have backfired, inspiring a dangerous overconfidence among investors."

Ex-Enron Employees Still Feel Effects Of Stock Price Plummet. USA Today (1/26, Armour, 2.31M) reports, "Four years after the Texas energy giant began its meltdown -- and on the eve of a criminal trial for its former top executives -- many former Enron employees still feel betrayed." Some of them, "at the end of their careers, have started over again in new jobs -- but working harder to keep up with younger co-workers. They've turned to churches and food pantries to eat, sold homes they could no longer pay for, and endured financial stresses that frayed their marriages."

Former Securities Broker Pleads Guilty To New York Market-Timing Charge. The AP (1/26, Gormley) reports, "A former Las Vegas securities broker pleaded guilty to a felony charge Wednesday in a mutual fund investigation in which investors were defrauded through improper late trading and market timing, according to New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer." The AP continues, "Daniel Calugar, 52, now of Ponte Vedra, Fla., pleaded guilty in state Supreme Court in New York City to violating a state business integrity law called the Martin Act. He was accused of entering into a secret agreement in August, 2001, that defrauded a mutual fund called the Franklin Small-Mid Cap Growth Fund. … He faces up to four years in prison when he is sentenced March 23." The AP adds, "Earlier this month, Calugar agreed to pay $153 million to settle civil charges brought by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. Calugar will relinquish $103 million in ill-gotten gains and pay a civil penalty of $50 million, the largest penalty regulators have imposed on an individual in a late trading and market timing case, SEC officials said. … Spitzer said Calugar secretly agreed to a deal with an employee of Franklin's investment adviser. Calugar would be allowed to rapidly trade in the mutual fund without paying a 2 percent penalty. Calugar then invested $10 million in another hedge fund run by Franklin and defrauded the fund and its shareholders of more than $1 million in fees that he avoided."

Livedoor Investigation Prompts Re-Examination of Japanese Accounting Standards. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Hayashi, Morse) reports, "The investigation into Internet company Livedoor Co. has pointed a spotlight" on Japanese accounting standards, which need to be upgraded, the article says. The Journal notes, "Tokyo district prosecutors arrested Livedoor Chief Executive Takafumi Horie on suspicion of violating securities law." Now, "in Japan, experts … are calling for stepped-up efforts to improve accounting standards, as companies .... increasingly use sophisticated and aggressive financial techniques." In particular, the article notes, "Japan has no standards on accounting for special-purpose companies," and no rules "on how to interpret revenue at Internet and software companies, whose business structures tend to differ significantly from those of traditional companies." However, the article notes, changes are beginning to take place, with the Financial Services Agency issuing "a guideline calling for closer examination of accounting firms and requiring companies to rotate their accountants more frequently" and the Accounting Standards Board of Japan adopting "a handful of standards in the past two months, covering areas from mergers and acquisitions to executive compensation."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Leahy Seeks Information From DOJ On Google Subpoena. Reuters (1/26, Vicini) reports, "The Senate Judiciary Committee's top Democrat asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales what steps are being taken to protect Americans' privacy rights as the Justice Department demands information about Internet searches." Reuters continues, "In the letter released on Wednesday, Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont asked Gonzales about the subpoena to Google Inc. and three other companies seeking data about what millions of Americans search for on the Internet's leading search engines." Reuters adds, "Leahy asked about the types of information being sought, how the department intends to use the information while protecting individual privacy rights and civil liberties and whether it will issue any additional subpoenas. … Leahy's letter comes at a time of growing criticism in Congress over the government's monitoring of communications, after the disclosure that the Bush administration has been conducting domestic eavesdropping after the September 11 attacks."

CNET News (1/25, Broache) reports, "Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said the department planned to respond accordingly, though he was not sure what the response would entail. … As for the privacy concerns raised by Leahy, 'We've addressed that in our subpoenas and to the search engines,' Miller said. 'We weren't seeking information about the individuals, we were only seeking the search terms....We don't even want to know the names of the people.'"

Rep Davis Questions Google's Response To Subpoeana. Government Computer News (1/25, Grimes) reports, "House Government Reform Committee Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) said today that search giant Google Inc. has 'bent over backward' to comply with the Chinese government's demand that it block certain search results in order to operate in that country. So why, he wondered, won't the company cooperate with the U.S. Justice Department in its efforts to fight online pornography?" GCN continues, "Google has refused a Justice Department subpoena for search results, saying it violated users' privacy. The government has said it needs the data to prepare a case regarding the 1998 Child Online Protection Act. … Other search companies have complied with the subpoena. … The company today also launched a Chinese version of its search site after agreeing to censor topics such as Falun Gong and Tibet. … 'Google gave the Chinese everything they wanted. They're not going to put data on there about human rights,' Davis said." GCN notes, "Davis spoke to public-sector CIOs today at a summit hosted by Micrsosoft Corp. Microsoft's MSN service also censors search results in China, as do Yahoo and others. Microsoft, Yahoo and America Online have also reportedly given the Justice Department information it was seeking. … 'What does it mean to be a corporate citizen, working to bring terrorists or child pornographers to bear? What are the boundaries?' Davis said. 'These are new areas for a lot of us that we've got to work our way through.'"

Dow Jones (1/25, Richmond) reports, "In the last week, Google Inc. stood up to one government and acquiesced to another. … The moves show the kind of treacherous terrain the Internet giant, whose corporate philosophy is 'Don't Be Evil,' must traverse as it weighs its ideals and its business interests. It also spotlights how important Google (GOOG) has become as a key waypoint on the global Internet, where individual and government interests around access to information can and do collide. … 'Google is at the cutting edge in terms of trying to figure out what is acceptable and what is not acceptable in this century,' when the Internet is making information more accessible than ever before, says Lauren Gelman, associate director of Stanford Law School's Center for Internet and Society. 'What happens to information Google collects? I think this is a big question for society as new technologies evolve and we have to rethink privacy and censorship.'"

The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Macdonald) reports that Google is confronting "an age-old business dilemma caught up in the new age of globalization: When governments demand something that compromises the interests of customers, what's a company to do?" The article notes that Google launched service in China and "because of government sensitivities there, will limit what users there can access." However, the article says, Google is also "vigorously fighting US government efforts to obtain data on its users' search habits." The article quotes one expert who lauds Google's decision to fight the subpoena, and another who dislikes Google's decision. The article notes that "So far, Google seems to be winning points for its tough stand against the US Department of Justice. According to one survey released this week, 56 percent of American users of the Internet believe Google should not release information about Web searches to the government." But overseas, the article says, "Google has endured criticism, as has Microsoft's MSN search service, for limiting what Chinese users can find."

Debate In Google Case Not Really About Privacy. The New York Times (1/26, Liptak) reports, "The Justice Department went to court last week to try to force Google, by far the world's largest Internet search engine, to turn over an entire week's worth of searches. The move, which Google is fighting, has alarmed its users, enraged privacy advocates, changed some people's Internet search habits and set off a debate about how much privacy one can expect on the Web. … But the case itself, according to people involved in it and scholars who are following it, has almost nothing to do with privacy. It will turn, instead, on serious but relatively routine questions about trade secrets and civil procedure." The Times continues, "The privacy debate prompted by the case may thus be an instance of the right answer to the wrong question. As recently demonstrated by disclosures of surveillance by the National Security Agency and secret inquiries under the USA Patriot Act, the government is aggressively collecting information to combat terror. And even in ordinary criminal prosecutions and in civil lawsuits, Internet companies including Google routinely turn over authentically private information in response to focused warrants and subpoenas from prosecutors and litigants. … But 'this particular subpoena does not raise serious privacy issues,' said Timothy Wu, a law professor at Columbia. 'These records are completely disconnected. They're just strings of words.'" The Times notes, "In its only extended discussion of its reasons for fighting the subpoena, a Google lawyer told the Justice Department in October that complying would be bad for business. 'Google objects,' the lawyer, Ashok Ramani, wrote, 'because to comply with the request could endanger its crown-jewel trade secrets.' … Mr. Ramani's five-page letter mentioned privacy only once, at the bottom of the fourth page, and then primarily in the context of perception rather than reality. … Even Google's allies are shying away from legal arguments based on privacy. The American Civil Liberties Union, for instance, said it planned to file papers supporting Google. But not on privacy grounds. 'We will probably not be making that argument,' said Aden J. Fine, a lawyer with the civil liberties union." The Times adds, "Other Internet search engine companies, including Yahoo, America Online and MSN, have complied with the same Justice Department subpoena, which also sought a random sample of a million Web addresses. The companies all said there were no privacy issues involved. … A Justice Department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse, agreed. 'We specifically stated in our requests,' he said, 'that we did not want the names, or any other information, regarding the users of Google.' … None of this is to say that subpoenas for search records linked to individuals are inconceivable. Google maintains information that could be used that way, and a subpoena could ask for it. But the recent subpoena does not."

Louisiana Businessman Pleads Guilty To New Orleans Contract Fraud. The AP (1/26) reports, "A businessman described by federal prosecutors as a key player pleaded guilty Wednesday to conspiring in a kickback scheme for the biggest contract signed while Marc Morial was New Orleans mayor. Terry Songy "admitted taking kickbacks from subcontractors, participating in a larger kickback conspiracy with the city's director of property management, and failing to file federal income tax returns for 2001, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said." The AP notes, "An affidavit filed with the guilty plea states that, after FBI agents approached him, Songy 'admitted his involvement in a much larger scheme than the government was aware' of. … The indictment described Songy as sharing hundreds of thousands of dollars in kickbacks with the three major defendants: Morial associates Stan 'Pampy' Barre, a restaurant owner and Morial confidant, city property manager Kerry De Cay, and construction company owner Reginald Walker. … All three have denied wrongdoing. Their trial is scheduled Sept. 5 before U.S. District Judge Carl Barbier."

Six Indicted On Bribery Charges In Ongoing Tennessee License Fraud Probe. The Tennessean (1/26, Carey) reports, "A widespread bribery scheme funneled hundreds of illegal aliens into a Winchester, Tenn.-based driving school, netting them fraudulent licenses. And six people, including one current and one former state employee, got more than $146,000, federal prosecutors said yesterday. The U.S. attorney's office yesterday unsealed a six-count indictment of the six people who are accused of helping hundreds of people since May 2004 obtain driver's licenses they didn't earn. … 'Just as in previous investigations, you had those who thought that what they did in secret would never come to light,' said My Harrison, FBI special agent in charge for the Middle and Western Districts of Tennessee. The FBI was one of several agencies involved in the probe. U.S. Attorney Jim Vines said the people who fraudulently received licenses weren't eligible for 'a variety of reasons.'" The Tennessean adds, "The investigation, dubbed Operation Crooked Highway, has been under way by federal and state agencies for 18 months, Vines said yesterday." The Murfreesboro Daily News (1/26) notes, "The FBI charged driver's license examiner Bruce Conklin with taking about $9,200 in cash from July 2005 to January. Agents also charged Bryan Guess, owner of the Winchester Driving School…with paying bribes to Conklin and a former examiner, Teresa Jones.

The AP (1/26) reports, "Authorities said they won't know how many illegal documents were issued until all evidence is studied and declined to speculate on the total. They did say that one state worker accepted $20 per student in bribes for about 1,000 licenses or certificates. 'We come to you with another sad chapter in the book of public corruption in Tennessee,' FBI agent in charge My Harrison said at an afternoon news conference." The AP adds, "Citing a number of recent public corruption investigations in Tennessee, Harrison said agents were getting better with practice. 'If you can hear me and are involved in public corruption, the eyes of law enforcement are upon you,' she said." The Nashville City Paper (1/26, Lewis) also notes Harrison said that "it's the latest 'sad chapter' in a string of Tennessee public corruption cases." She added, "You've heard of Operation Tennessee Waltz, Operation Tarnish Blue and Operation Tarnish Shield. What can I say? Same game, only the names have changed. The title of this new chapter is, Operation Crooked Highway." The City Paper adds that as a result of the investigation, "customs officials took into custody 50 undocumented immigrants and began deportation proceedings against 50 other immigrants who were uncovered in the investigation, said Rick Crocker, assistant special agent in charge of Immigration and Customs Enforcement."

IRS Agent Downplays Ryan's Eventual Declaration Of Campaign Funds As Income. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, O'Connor, 643K) reports IRS Agent Shari Schindler "on Wednesday downplayed that former Gov. George Ryan filed corrected tax returns for 1995, 1996 and 1997 several years later because Ryan knew by then of the federal investigation into his finances." Schindler "said that by the time Ryan filed the amended returns in late 2002, each of his six children had testified before the grand jury and there had been press coverage of the nature of the probe." On cross-examination, Ryan lawyer Dan Webb "contended that records showed Ryan had paid taxes on most of the travel expenses, but that certain charges hadn't been itemized in campaign disclosure reports, fell through the cracks and mistakenly weren't reported on Ryan's returns." But Assistant US Attorney Laurie Barsella "pointed out that Roger Bickel, Ryan's former chief lawyer, had spelled out for Ryan 'in plain English' that personal use of campaign funds had to be reported on his tax returns." The AP (1/26, Robinson) notes that the "verbal fencing match between" Webb and Schindler "came to an end with no one sure who emerged the victor. Webb repeatedly tried to get her to agree that Ryan couldn't be blamed if he failed to report thousands of dollars in income because he was grappling with vague, complex tax laws. Schindler coolly disagreed, saying Ryan easily could have asked his tax advisers."

Prosecution Hopes To Rest Thursday After FBI Agent's Testimony. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, O'Connor, 643K) also reports Assistant US Attorney Patrick Collins "said he still hopes to rest the prosecution case on Thursday after four months of testimony. The FBI's case agent is scheduled to be the government's last witness." And US District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer "ruled Wednesday that prosecutors can play a portion of a videotape of Ryan from November when he made a statement to reporters outside the court defending his receipt of $9,675 from the Gramm campaign." The AP (1/26, Robinson) notes, "Prosecutors indicated Wednesday night that just one more prosecution witness remains - Raymond Ruebenson, the veteran FBI man who has long been the case agent for the government's seven-year Operation Safe Road investigation that led to the former governor's indictment. But Ruebenson was absent with a case of the flu Wednesday.

Laski Vows To Fight Bribery Charges, Alleges US Withheld Exculpatory Recordings. The Chicago Tribune (1/26, Washburn, 643K) reports, "Facing federal corruption charges, a defiant James Laski vowed Wednesday to 'keep fighting,' insisted his office is running smoothly and took sharp issue with claims he was away from his job as Chicago city clerk for a prolonged period before charges were filed. 'Somebody is lying, and it isn't me,' Laski declared. The clerk's comments came after a surprise appearance at a City Council committee meeting, his first visit to the council chamber in nearly two months." The Tribune adds, "Laski implied Wednesday that exonerating portions of the recordings were not released when the U.S. attorney's office announced the charges against him on Jan. 13."

Former Campbell Aides Testify About Relationship With Contractor. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/26, Suggs, Scott, 430K) reports former Atlanta contracts compliance director Michael Sullivan testified at former Mayor Bill Campbell's corruption trial on Wednesday "that in 1994 he and the former mayor, along with city contractor Ricky Rowe, traveled together to Florida to attend a golf and tennis tournament sponsored by Black Enterprise magazine. Sullivan said the city paid for his trip. He said he was unsure of who paid for Campbell's but noticed that when he and Rowe were checking out of the hotel, Rowe used his credit card for Campbell's incidentals. … 'He was upset that I allowed Mr. Rowe to pay for his incidentals,' Sullivan told the jury. 'He told me that you can't use a credit card to pay for things like that. It leaves a trail.'" The Journal-Constitution adds, "The theme of loyalty to the mayor was played over and over Wednesday, witness after witness, as prosecutors tried to establish that City Hall under Campbell…was a den of cronyism and deal-making between Campbell, his friends and political allies. None of the prosecution's witnesses testified that Campbell made them do anything illegal, nor did they say they saw Campbell doing anything criminal."

Wisconsin Procurement Official Indicted Over Travel Contract Award. The AP (1/26) reports, "An official in Gov. Jim Doyle's administration was indicted on two felony counts Tuesday for her role in awarding a state travel contract to a company whose executives donated $20,000 to Doyle's campaign. The federal indictment alleges that Georgia Thompson, chief of the Department of Administration's procurement bureau, tried to give her bosses political advantage and help her own job security." The AP notes Thompson, "who was hired before Doyle took office in 2003, served on a committee that awarded a contract to Adelman Travel as part of an effort to cut travel costs. … Questions were raised this summer after media reports that Adelman's CEO donated $10,000 to Doyle before the contract went into effect. An Adelman board member gave another $10,000 afterward, finance reports show."

Former New Jersey Councilman Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering. The Farmingdale (NJ) News Transcript (1/25, Front Page, Israeli) reports former Marlboro Township Councilman Thomas Broderick "pleaded guilty in federal court last week to one count of money laundering. … Broderick was one of the 11 Monmouth County officials who were arrested…in an FBI investigation known as 'Operation Bid Rig.' … Broderick admitted that he accepted $15,000 for assisting in the laundering of large sums of cash from a cooperating government witness whom he believed was a corrupt demolition contractor." The News Transcript notes, "He is scheduled to be sentenced on April 27. Broderick remains free on $50,000 bail."

Contractor Sentenced To Probation, Fine For SoCom Bribery Scheme. The Tampa Tribune (1/26, Lardner) reports, "A contractor formerly employed by U.S. Special Operations Command was sentenced Wednesday to three years probation and a $4,500 fine for his role in a bribery scheme that has tarnished the war fighting organization's reputation for acquiring equipment used by the nation's elite fighting forces. U.S. District Judge Susan Bucklew, who called William E. Burke's crime 'scary' and a 'bad thing,' could have saddled him with a prison term of up to 16 months and a heftier fine. But Bucklew opted for the lighter penalties mainly because Burke has been cooperating with federal law enforcement agents examining contracting practices at Socom, which is headquartered at MacDill Air Force Base in Tampa."

Texas Hired Abramoff-Linked Firm Due To Access To Rove. The AP (1/26) reports the Texas state government "hired a firm with close ties to lobbyist Jack Abramoff after rejecting competing bids that met more of its selection criteria and cost less." The Austin American-Statesman reported that Cassidy & Associates, the winning firm, has access "all the way to presidential aide Karl Rove. … The firm was awarded a $15,000-a-month contract in 2004 to lobby Congress for the state." On Friday, seven Democratic Texas state legislators sent a letter to Gov. Rick Perry "demanding that Cassidy's contract be canceled."

California Man Pleads Guilty To Cyber Attack. Federal Computer Week (1/26, Brewin) reports, "A hacker indicted for creating botnet armies that infected Defense Information Systems Agency networks and computers at the Naval Air Warfare Center at China Lake, Calif., pleaded guilty to the charges at a hearing earlier this week in the U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, the Justice Department said." FCW continues, "Justice said James Ancheta 20, of Downey, Calif, entered guilty pleas of conspiring to violate the Computer Fraud Abuse Act and causing damage to computers used in national defense." FCW adds, "Justice said the prosecution of Ancheta was the first of its kind in the United States against a hacker who used botnets, armies of computers infected with Trojan horse programs that allowed Ancheta to remotely control the computers. Justice said Ancheta controlled more than 400,000 computers as part of his botnet armies, which in turn infected other computers with unwanted adware."

Former Dietary Supplement Company Executives Admit $100 Million Mail Fraud. The AP (1/26) reports, "Former executives of a mail-order firm admitted that the company bilked buyers out of more than $100 million by charging credit cards without permission and offering refund guarantees it had no intention of honoring. Four former executives of Berkeley Premium Nutraceuticals Inc. detailed their involvement Wednesday with the Cincinnati-based company that sold vitamins and supplements for a variety of ills from fatigue to sexual disfunction. The four executives filed written statements as part of an agreement to plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Cincinnati to charges of conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud. Federal agencies -- including the FBI, the Internal Revenue Service and the Food and Drug Administration -- have been investigating Berkeley." The AP adds, "The former executives said Berkeley's vitamins and supplements…weren't supported by strong medical proof, according to court documents."

Jury Convicts Palestinian Man Of Being Iraqi Agent. The AP (1/26, Callahan) reports, "Jurors on Wednesday convicted a Palestinian migrant accused of being an Iraqi agent on six federal charges but could not reach a decision on a charge that he tried to sell to Saddam Hussein's regime the names of U.S. operatives and agents." The AP continues, "Shaaban Hafiz Ahmad Ali Shaaban, 53, showed little reaction as the federal jury returned its verdicts finding him guilty of six of seven counts, including acting as an unregistered foreign agent, violating sanctions against Iraq, conspiracy and witness tampering. … They could not decide his guilt on a charge of violating the International Emergency Economic Powers Act by allegedly trying in late 2002 to sell U.S. intelligence secrets to Iraq for $3 million. No evidence was presented during his trial, however, that he had access to that classified information. … U.S. District Judge John Tinder set sentencing for April 13 on the six convictions." The AP notes, "Shaaban represented himself during an 11-day trial that included testimony by a former Iraqi intelligence officer. He repeatedly contended that the government had confused him with a dead identical twin brother who worked for the CIA."

Three Kidnap Suspects Face Federal Charges In Ohio. Cox News Service (1/26, Giordano, Hardy) reports, "The FBI on Wednesday brought criminal charges against three people accused in the abduction, assault and robbery of a Miami University freshman." Cox continues, "Sidney R. Jones, 23, of Richmond, Ind.; Katrina L. Jones, 18, of Oxford; and Seth R. Jett, 21, of Richmond were turned over to federal custody Monday by local authorities, Special Agent Michael E. Brooks said. … The three had been detained at the Butler County Jail following their arrests Jan. 14 and 15 stemming from a case involving MU freshman Ryan Coli. … The charges were the result of a joint effort by the U.S. Marshals Service and the FBI in three states." Cox adds, "The three appeared Wednesday in U.S. District Court (in Oxford, OH) where Magistrate Judge Timothy S. Hogan ordered them held pending a detention hearing Jan. 30, when the court will determine bond."

Supreme Court To Hear Lethal Injection Case. The Washington Post (1/26, A3, Lane, 744K) reports, "The Supreme Court agreed yesterday to decide when death row inmates may challenge lethal injection as a method of capital punishment, in a surprise decision issued after the justices dramatically stopped the execution of a Florida prisoner who was already strapped to a gurney preparing to die." The High Court said it will hear convicted murderer Clarence Hill's "claim that he should have an opportunity to argue that his civil rights would be violated because the chemicals used to execute him would cause excessive pain. It is a claim that has been pressed with growing frequency by capital defense lawyers around the country in recent years -- but that has generally not yet succeeded, either in lower courts or at the Supreme Court."

The AP (1/26, Holland) reports, "Lethal injections are used in most states that have capital punishment, and there's been a growing dispute over the way they are carried out. … The Supreme Court has never found a specific form of execution to be cruel and unusual punishment, and the latest case from Florida does not give Court members that opportunity. The justices will, however, spell out what options are available to inmates with last-minute challenges to the way they will be put to death." The AP adds, "Florida inmate Clarence Hill, who filed the appeal, had been strapped to a gurney with intravenous lines running into his arms Tuesday night when he won a temporary Supreme Court stay, Hill's lawyer said. The stay was signed by Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. … The full Court announced Wednesday that the stay would be permanent until justices decide whether an appeals court was wrong to prevent Hill from challenging the lethal injection method. … The argument is expected April 26, with a ruling before July."

Texas Executes Man For 1992 Murders. The Associated Press (1/25) reported that Marion Dudley, an "Alabama man who was part of a ring that shuttled drugs from Texas to his home state was executed [Wednesday] for the slayings of four people in Houston nearly 14 years ago." But the AP noted that Dudley maintained he wasn't at the house where the murders occurred the night of June 20, 1992, when "six people were shot, four of them fatally, in what authorities said was a drug dealer ripoff." Dudley was "the first Texas inmate put to death this year." The wire service added, "Besides Dudley, Arthur 'Squirt' Brown, of Tuscaloosa, was convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death. Now 35, he remains on death row. A third man, Tony Dunson, also from Alabama and 19 at the time of the shootings, received a life sentence."

ID Theft Complaints Rising, But Rate Of Increase Down. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Conkey) reports, "Businesses, law-enforcement agencies and consumers may be beginning to turn the tide in the war against identity theft, data from the Federal Trade Commission suggest. Identity-theft complaints were up again last year to nearly 256,000, the FTC said, but that was only 3.5% higher than the year before. In 2004, complaints rose by 15% and in 2003 by 33%. … Industry officials and analysts say the development and widespread adoption of antifraud technologies are responsible for lower levels of card fraud." The article also said, "the FTC is expected to announce today tough action against" ChoicePoint Inc., which "is expected to agree to pay a multimillion-dollar penalty to settle alleged data-security violations stemming from a yearlong investigation by federal regulators, according to a person briefed on the matter."

Jury Reject Insanity Defense, Convicts Killer of Accused Pedophile Priest. The New York Times (1/26, Zezima) reports, "Rejecting an insanity defense, a state jury on Wednesday convicted an inmate of the prison murder of John J. Geoghan, a defrocked priest who was accused of molesting 150 boys. … Judge Francis R. Fecteau of Worcester District Court sentenced the inmate, Joseph L. Druce, to life in prison without parole, in addition to the life sentence he is serving for another murder. … Prosecutors argued that Mr. Druce was a calculated killer who planned the murder for weeks and saw Mr. Geoghan as a trophy. But Mr. Druce's lawyer, John LaChance, painted his client as someone who 'never had a chance,' unwanted from birth and the victim of physical and sexual abuse for much of his childhood and teenage years."

Girl's Death Highlights "Dual-Track" Handling Of Abuse Reports. The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Ridberg) reports, "Calls to New York's child-abuse hot line have spiked dramatically ever since Nixzmary Brown was buried." The Monitor notes that the girl, allegedly killed by her stepfather, "captured the hearts and minds of New Yorkers who never want to see such a tragedy happen again." However, the article says, "the city is left with the tall task of distinguishing the serious cases of abuse from reports of neglect. This is one of the most controversial challenges facing social welfare systems nationwide." The article says that some states have adopted a dual-track system that divides complaints "into two groups." This approach "aims to ease systems overburdened with poverty-related neglect reports and focus aggressive tactics on the rarer cases of abuse," the article says. It "has been adopted in various states, including Michigan, Missouri, Minnesota, and North Carolina. In Minnesota, one recent study shows the law improved the safety of children by providing better services for families such as food." However, the article notes, New York City fears that under a dual-track approach "an abused child may be handled as a neglect case."

Fairfax County, VA, Police "Accidentally" Shoot, Kill Optometrist Suspected Of Gambling. The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Jackman) reports, "Fairfax County's police chief said yesterday that one of his officers accidentally shot and killed an optometrist outside the unarmed man's townhouse Tuesday night as an undercover detective was about to arrest him on suspicion of gambling on sports. Police had been secretly making bets with Salvatore J. Culosi Jr., 37, since October as part of a gambling investigation, according to court records." In the incident, "Culosi came out of his townhouse on Cavalier Landing Court about 9:35 p.m. and was standing next to the detective's sport-utility vehicle, police said, when the detective gave a signal to tactical officers assembled nearby to move in and arrest Culosi. 'As they approached him . . . one officer's weapon, a handgun, was unintentionally discharged,' said Fairfax Police Chief David M. Rohrer. Culosi was not making any threatening moves when he was shot once in the upper part of his body, police said. He was taken to Inova Fairfax Hospital, where he was pronounced dead."

Crimes Prompt DC Police To Beef Up Presence In Neighborhood. The Washington Post (1/26, B1, Schwartzman) reports, "A spate of crimes outside Adams Morgan clubs and bars, including two assaults in which victims were left in critical condition, has prompted police to plan greater deployment in the area. … A business group plans to supplement the effort with a contingent of security guards and off-duty police to patrol the area on weekends, said Josh Gibson, executive director of Adams Morgan's newly formed business improvement district. Thousands of people pour into Adams Morgan on weekend nights, drawn by its cafes and clubs."

Father Charged With Gun Offenses In Daycare Shooting. The Washington Post (1/26, B1, Londoño) reports that John L. Hall, who is the "father of an 8-year-old boy arrested in the shooting of a 7-year-old girl at their Germantown day-care center provided his son with violent video games and showed him how to cock and release a gun hammer the day before the boy pulled the trigger, a prosecutor said yesterday" at Hall's bond hearing. The Post reports, "Hall's sister, Darlene Hall, 53, disputed the prosecutor's characterization of her brother's influence over the child." The article adds, "Montgomery District Court Judge Mary Beth McCormick reduced Hall's bond to $75,000 yesterday after authorities charged him Tuesday with leaving a firearm within reach of an unsupervised minor and two other gun charges."

NYTimes Columnist Pans Show About Innocence On Death Row. In a New York Times (1/26) column, Joshua Marquis disapproves of a new ABC drama called "In Justice." He writes, "'In Justice' has received dismal reviews. But that hasn't stopped its premise from permeating the conventional wisdom: that our prisons are chock-full of doe-eyed innocents who have been framed by venal prosecutors and corrupt police officers with the help of grossly incompetent public defenders." Calling this "a misconception that has run through our popular culture," Marquis notes that "only 14 Americans who were once on death row have been exonerated by DNA evidence alone. The hordes of Americans wrongfully convicted exist primarily on Planet Hollywood." Marquis says that it is "understandable that journalists focus on the rare case in which an innocent man or woman is sent to prison." However, he says, "The larger issue is whether those who influence the culture, like an enormous television network, have a moral responsibility to keep the facts straight regardless of their thirst for drama. 'In Justice' may soon find itself on the canceled list, but several million people will still have watched it, and they are likely to have the impression that wrongfully convicted death row inmates are the virtual rule."

Times Writer Wistful For Buttafuoco Era. In a New York Times (1/26) column, Lawrence Downes writes, "Before Angie and Brad, before Monica and Bill, there was Amy and Joey. Amy Fisher and Joey Buttafuoco — the Long Island Lolita and her body-shop lover — with Joey's wife, Mary Jo, formed a triangle of passion, obsession and violence that became the industry standard for tabloid crime way, way back in 1992. There is an entire generation, or at least a cohort, or maybe a handful, or at least one or two journalists who remember working on that day in May when the story broke, and who still marvel at how that strange crime — a housewife in a swanky suburb shot in the face — soon became much stranger. It swelled in significance until it made headlines coast to coast and around the globe. … I miss the Buttafuoco era. Joey and Amy were the Sid Caesar and Howdy Doody of reality TV, relics of a simpler time when crime sold newspapers — imagine that — and when the culture tended to look down on adultery and teenage prostitutes, and when attempted murder carried a hint of shame, which presumably was why Amy, in her perp walk, went to the trouble of hiding her face with her long brown hair."

CIVIL LAW:

Former Kentucky GE Plant Supervisor Files Whistleblower Suit. The AP (1/26) reports, "A former supervisor at a General Electric Co. plant has filed $50.5 million federal lawsuit that claims that he was fired for testifying that GE shipped defective parts to military and commercial customers." The AP continues, "James Richard Gardner, of Madisonville, filed the suit Friday in U.S. District Court in Louisville. Gardner said he repeatedly alerted managers at the Madisonville plant that engine turbine blades were not meeting company and government specifications and that defective parts were shipped with the knowledge of managers to meet production requirements." The AP adds, "Marta Rhyner, a GE spokeswoman, said she couldn't comment on specific allegations made in the lawsuit. She said the company is 'confident in the parts produced by our employees at Madisonville.' … The Defense Department began a criminal investigation at the plant in November 2000. The Justice Department is conducting a civil investigation."

Judge Rules Trustee Request Could Jeopardize Adelphia Bankruptcy. The New York Law Journal (1/26, Lin) reports, "In a decision released Wednesday in the Chapter 11 bankruptcy of cable company Adelphia Communications, the presiding judge said the motions by which one group of creditors sought the appointment of a trustee to oversee disputes and the disqualification of chief Adelphia bankruptcy counsel Willkie Farr & Gallagher constituted a 'nuclear war button' threatening obliteration of a crucial $17.6 billion deal." The Journal continues, "Southern District of New York Bankruptcy Judge Robert Gerber's strongly worded 113-page decision, In re Adelphia, 02-41729, previously filed under seal, clarified his order issued earlier in the week denying the appointment of a trustee but granting the disqualification of Willkie lawyers from participating in the disputes at issue. Willkie remains bankruptcy counsel to Adelphia. … Those disputes, which the requested trustee would have overseen, are between different groups of debt holders, all seeking to maximize their own claims on the bankruptcy estate, most of the assets of which are slated to be sold to rival cable companies Time Warner and Comcast for $17.6 billion." The Journal adds, "The potential appointment of a bankruptcy trustee is almost always controversial, as such trustees are usually granted broad-ranging powers to settle disputes or dispose of assets. … Gerber said the disqualification and trustee motions, brought in November by noteholders of Arahova, a subsidiary through which Adelphia issued some $540 million in debt, seemed designed to 'purposefully' imperil that sale as part of a 'scorched earth litigation strategy' aimed at extracting a larger distribution by threatening dire consequences for all."

GSA's Networx Contract Award Delayed By Unexpectedly High Number Of Bids. The Washington Post (1/26, D5, Mohammed, 744K) reports, "The General Services Administration said yesterday that it got more bids than expected for a $20 billion telecommunications contract known as Networx," a "10-year telecom contract, the largest ever to be awarded by the GSA," which is "forcing the agency to delay the award so it can evaluate the complex proposals."

Lockheed Loses Spy Plane Contract. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, A1, Karp, 2.11M) reports, "In 2004, Lockheed Martin Corp. won an Army spy-plane contract that broke with the past." Instead of building it, they "would serve as the 'lead integrator' -- stuffing somebody else's hardware with high-tech eavesdropping gear." However, "Lockheed engineers proved unable to load the airframe they were buying from Brazil with the equipment the Army wanted. Earlier this month, the Army scrapped Lockheed's contract," in "a setback for Chief Executive Robert Stevens and his young 'integrated solutions' division," and "a signal for the entire defense industry that de-emphasizing old-style hardware in favor of software and systems management isn't a sure path to success."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Virginia Likely To Vote On Gay Marriage Ban; Similar Measure Unveiled In Maryland. The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Jenkins, 744K) reports, "The state Senate all but guaranteed on Wednesday that Virginia will hold a November referendum on whether to amend its 230-year-old Bill of Rights to bar same-sex marriages. The Senate voted 28 to 11 to follow the House of Delegates in approving the amendment. Though each chamber still must pass the measure adopted by the other, their wording is identical and support among the senators and delegates is strong." Meanwhile, Maryland Republicans "introduced a similar measure in the Senate on Wednesday and said they believe they have the votes they need to bring the matter to an up-or-down vote, despite resistance from leaders of the Democrat-controlled legislature. In the wake of a circuit court ruling last week that declared Maryland's 33-year-old ban on same-sex marriage discriminatory, GOP leaders said it was important to at least put the matter to a vote."

The Washington Times (1/26, Bellantoni, Miller, 90K) notes that Maryland Democratic leaders "appear reluctant to put a constitutional amendment on the ballot because it could energize conservative voters in an election year in which Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, is seeking re-election, and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, also a Republican, is running for the U.S. Senate." The Times adds, "In Virginia, state Sen. Stephen D. Newman said the constitutional amendment is necessary to guard against 'aggressive' judges in other states, including Maryland, who are trying to redefine marriage. 'A few judges or a few localities are now presuming to change that fundamental meaning for our civilization and their actions have created confusion on the issue,' the Lynchburg Republican said. 'The federal courts are going to leave us with no other recourse.'"

FBI Mississippi SAC Says Report Could Rewrite Till Story. The AP (1/26) reports, "An FBI report on the decades-old murder of 14-year-old Emmett Till could rewrite the story of the slaying that put a young man's face on racial injustice in the South during that period." The AP adds that "some details of the crime could have been distorted or embellished over the past five decades, the FBI special agent in charge of Mississippi, John G. Raucci, told The Associated Press this week. 'The facts were told one way because that's the information that was available at the time,' Raucci said. 'And often times it's through urban legends and folklore -- and people who lived in the community pass along information from generation to generation -- and the next thing you know, they become fact.' Raucci did not rule out the possibility of indictments in the case or provide a timetable for releasing the report." The AP notes that the FBI report "should soon be turned over to District Attorney Joyce Chiles in Greenville. 'That does not necessarily mean that everybody involved in the Emmett Till case or the overt act is still alive or will one day be prosecuted,' Raucci said. … 'Evidence may no longer be available. Individuals who may have witnessed an event, time has now gotten the better of their minds.'"

FBI Reaching Out To NC Hispanics In New Human Trafficking Initiative. The Charlotte Observer (1/25, Ordoñez, 234K) reports that with funding from the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act, "The FBI is launching a new effort to raise awareness of human trafficking. Calling it an offense against humanity akin to modern-day slavery, the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Charlotte estimates thousands of victims are trafficked into the state each year for forced labor and prostitution. 'This is something that is flying under the radar,' said Special Agent Kevin Kendrick, who is heading the local campaign. … In conjunction with increased investigative efforts to shut down human trafficking rings, the FBI is teaming up with local advocacy groups and social organizations to get a message out that federal agents should be trusted and not feared. The FBI, Kendrick said, is looking to assist all victims of human trafficking, even if they're living in the country illegally. Not only will the FBI protect victims and their rights, Kendrick said, the agency also will help them remain permanently." The Observer adds, "'This is a reprehensible problem,' said Assistant Special Agent Robert Clifford. 'We'd look at every weapon in FBI's arsenal to countering human trafficking.' … 'We need to let people know it's OK to contact us,' Kendrick said. 'This is an affront against humanity. This goes far past someone's immigration status.'"

Georgia Lawmakers Approve Voter ID Bill. The AP (1/25) reports, "A birth certificate might not be enough to vote in Georgia this year - legislation sent to the governor Wednesday would require photo identification before voters could cast their ballots." The AP continues, "Gov. Sonny Perdue said he would sign it quickly to give counties time to prepare for the primary in July and the general election in November. … The U.S. Justice Department also must approve the requirement before it takes effect." The AP adds, "The legislation would require voters to have a driver's license, military ID or state-issued identification card with a photo. Social Security cards, birth certificates and utility bills would no longer be accepted. … Supporters said it would help fight voter fraud. Critics argued it would disenfranchise the poor, minorities or elderly - people who are less likely to have driver's licenses."

5th Circuit Rules Against Shreveport In Race Bias Suit. The Shreveport (LA) Times (1/26, McCabe) reports, "A federal appellate court changed its stance and ruled today in favor of plaintiffs in a discrimination lawsuit against the city of Shreveport and its Fire Department, overturning a lower court's decision to dismiss the five-year-old case." The Times continues, "The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals remanded the heart of the discrimination case back to U.S. District Court in Shreveport. … The petition originally was brought against the city in 2000 by Todd Dean, who was not hired by the Fire Department and felt the city's hiring practices discriminated against him because he is white. Dean earned a higher test score than some blacks hired then, his lawsuit alleges. Other men joined the lawsuit soon after." The Times adds, "The 5th Circuit's ruling should compel the city not only to cease race-based hiring procedures in all departments, but also to re-evaluate the continued validity of all city programs that incorporate race as a criteria for participation," said local attorney Pamela R. Jones, who represented Dean, Shawn Sanders and Jason Matthews in the lawsuit. … The department ended race-based hiring practices 11 months before a federal magistrate dismissed Dean's case in December 2004 hoping to avoid further lawsuits, according to officials. Now the department relies on a pass/fail civil service exam, the educational background and technical training of each candidate and psychological and physical ability exams. … The city has maintained that the Fire Department's hiring practices are based on a complaint brought by the U.S. Justice Department in 1980 that said the department had discriminated against blacks and women. Up to that point, the department had hired only three black men in its history, according to court records."

SIU Changes Web Descriptions Of Challenged Fellowships. The AP (1/26) reports, "While threatened with a federal lawsuit over three graduate fellowships the government considers discriminatory, Southern Illinois University has tweaked the descriptions of at least two of those scholarship programs on its Web site." The AP continues, "The fellowships at issue were said to specifically target minorities or 'underrepresented groups,' before the Justice Department objected last year, but the site now says those programs seek to help 'underserved' populations. … The revisions come as SIU administrators are weighing a Justice Department proposal that would head off a lawsuit threatened by the government, which in demanding that SIU discontinue the fellowship programs has accused the university of engaging in 'intentional discrimination against whites, non-preferred minorities and males.'" The AP adds, "The university has refused to publicly discuss the proposal it got from the Justice Department last week, saying only that administrators and key constituency groups were being tapped this week for feedback before the university responds. … David Gross, a spokesman for the SIU system, said Wednesday the Web site changes were done without the consent of the university's president, the Carbondale school's chancellor or the system's legal counsel and 'do not reflect the proposed offer from Department of Justice.'"

Judge Orders EEOC To Pay $1 Million To Law Firm For Frivolous Action. The AP (1/26) reports, "The U.S. Equal Opportunity Employment Commission must pay more than $1 million to a law firm that it sued unsuccessfully for allegations of sexual harassment and pregnancy discrimination, a federal judge has ruled." The AP continues, "The EEOC action was a 'frivolous' lawsuit against Robert L. Reeves & Associates, which practices immigration law, U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian said in a ruling issued Monday." The AP adds, "Reeves maintained that the EEOC should have known the harassment and discrimination allegations the agency was pursuing were part of a scheme by two of his former law associates to destroy his firm, said a statement from lawyers representing Reeves. … The EEOC has already appealed the judge's findings, said Anna Park, the EEOC regional attorney in charge of the Los Angeles district office's legal division."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Offers To Release Part of Its Source Code In EU Antitrust Case. The Financial Times (1/26, Buck) reports, "Microsoft made a concession in its six-year dispute with European competition regulators on Wednesday by offering to give rivals access to parts of its Windows source code. With only three weeks until a compliance deadline set by Brussels, which had threatened fines of €2m ($2.5m) a day, Brad Smith, the group's general counsel, said: 'We are putting our most valuable intellectual property on the table.' … Microsoft's offer … came in response to a European Commission warning last month that it would impose fines unless the software group complied quickly with Brussels' 2004 antitrust ruling against the US group. The daily fines would come on top of the record €497m payment the Commission ordered in 2004. The regulator said Microsoft had failed to comply with a part of the ruling requiring the software group to share information about its Windows operating system."

The USA Today (1/26, Acohido) reports, "The European Commission issued a terse statement saying it would 'study carefully' Microsoft's announcement 'once it has received the full details.' … This is not the first time Microsoft has let outsiders view such code. It has granted governments, academics and business partners varying levels of access under tight restrictions."

Reuters (1/25, Lawsky, Zawadzki) reports, "Critics of Microsoft contend that protocols are standard software and that Microsoft has used what is essentially a digital combination lock to make them inaccessible. … A Commission spokesman said if that turns out to be true then Microsoft has no right to charge for them. … However, Microsoft says that the protocols include valuable patents and that it should be able to charge for their use, an argument under review at the Commission."

The AP (1/25) reports, "The company's chief counsel, Brad Smith, said sharing the part of the Windows workgroup server operating system and desktop software code that helps rival PCs communicate with Windows servers was 'a bold stroke' that should answer both EU and U.S. regulators' concerns. .. He insisted that Microsoft had already complied in December with an EU order to supply technical information by handing over up to 12,000 pages of documentation and offering 500 hours of free technical support to rivals worth some $100,000. … An independent monitor nominated by Microsoft found last month that the documents were 'totally unfit for its intended purpose.'"

Move Comes After Justice Department Complaints. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Jacoby) reports, "The move came after the Justice Department complained in a court filing this week about Microsoft's compliance with U.S. legal requirements -- and six years after a U.S. judge found Microsoft violated the Sherman Antitrust Act against monopoly abuse. The Justice Department said the Redmond, Wash., software giant had provided inaccurate information to a technical committee, and described one incident as 'particularly troubling' because it delayed an investigative team that had traveled to India. The filing also said the company had 'fallen significantly behind' in complying with monitors' technical requests. … In 2001, the Bush administration dropped the U.S. government's case against Microsoft, but ordered it to change certain anticompetitive practices."

Guidant Accepts Boston Scientific's Takeover Offer. USA Today (1/26, Iwata) reports, "Medical device maker Guidant on Wednesday accepted Boston Scientific's $27 billion bid, rebuffing a lower offer from Johnson & Johnson and ending a long-running takeover war." USA continues, "The companies have been vying for an edge in the growing multibillion-dollar market for medical and heart devices, and Guidant's pacemakers, defibrillators and stents made it an attractive acquisition target. … The merger, to be completed early this year, will make Boston Scientific the world's No. 2 maker of implantable pacemakers and defibrillators. Boston Scientific also will gain share in the market for heart stent devices, which hold open blood vessels." USA adds, "Most Wall Street analysts and some Guidant investors had urged Guidant to take the pricier Boston Scientific offer, calling it a better long-term investment than J&J's deal. The combined company will have $9 billion in revenue in 2006, Boston Scientific says. … To help close the deal and appease antitrust regulators, Boston Scientific teamed with Abbott Laboratories. Abbott will pay Boston Scientific $6.4 billion in cash to buy Guidant's vascular intervention and endovascular businesses." … Approvals are needed from U.S. and European regulators, plus shareholders for both companies."

The New York Times (1/26, Feder) reports, "For Johnson & Johnson, Tuesday started with a morning conference call with analysts to discuss earnings and ended with William C. Weldon, the company's chief executive, and Robert J. Darretta Jr., the chief financial officer, attending a dinner for several dozen institutional investors at the '21' Club in New York. Throughout the day and evening, the company maintained a rigid silence about the one subject on everyone's mind — whether it would respond to a midnight deadline to counter Boston Scientific's bold $27 billion offer for Guidant." The Times notes that Johnson & Johnson released a statement yesterday "saying the company had 'determined not to increase its last offer for Guidant Corporation, because to do so would not have been in the best interest of its shareholders.' About the only comment was its reminder that Guidant was obliged to pay it a $705 million breakup fee by today. … It was a remarkably quiet conclusion to the biggest and most contentious takeover battle yet in the medical device industry. The outcome leaves Boston Scientific as the apparent winner of Guidant, the No. 2 company in the $10 billion market for defibrillators and other implantable devices that regulate human heartbeats."

BlackBerry Injunction Hearing Set For Feb. 24. The Wall Street Journal (1/26) reports, "BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. and NTP Inc. will appear in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia Feb. 24 for the court to consider a shutdown of U.S. sales and service of the popular wireless email device. In recent court filings, RIM, based in Waterloo, Ontario, argued a BlackBerry shutdown isn't warranted for various reasons, including recent preliminary moves by the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office to reject NTP's wireless email patents. NTP, a Virginia patent holding concern, argues a BlackBerry shutdown is appropriate, since the court has already found RIM infringed on NTP's patents and case law calls for such a shutdown. The court could rule on the injunction as early as Feb. 24 or in the days following, an NTP lawyer said."

NYTimes Says Pixar-Disney Deal Is Chance To Reform Disney's Creative Culture. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) editorializes, "A company like" Pixar "— and a figure like Mr. Jobs, notable for his dynamic role at both Apple and Pixar — doesn't let itself be bought for money alone, though the money is certainly enticing enough. This is really an opportunity to infect, and change, the creative culture of Disney, which, back in its founder's day, used to be one of the most creative places around" but whose "animated films have been nothing to shout about in the past decade or so." For Pixar and Apple the deal has "only an upside," and "the same is true for Disney, especially if it keeps shedding the ways of Mr. Eisner's old company and allows itself to become what may turn out to be, in the end, Mr. Jobs's company after all."

Three ELF Activists Indicted On Ecoterror Charges In California. Reuters (1/26, Fitzgerald) reports, "A federal grand jury indicted three alleged 'eco-terrorists' on Wednesday on charges of plotting to blow up facilities like dams and cell phone towers. 'These three individuals planned to commit a number of dangerous and destructive acts in our region, all in the name of the Environmental Liberation Front,' U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott told a news conference in the California state capital." Eric McDavid, Zachary Jenson and Lauren Weiner were "arrested January 13 outside a retail store in Auburn, California, following six months of surveillance of McDavid by federal authorities. … The charges were not related to a separate 65-count indictment handed down on Monday in Washington involving 11 environmental and animal rights activists in the Western United States." Scott "said the trio rented a house east of Sacramento in the foothills where they engaged in bomb-making. At some point, the three were joined by an unnamed woman who was a government informant. 'Because of the exceptional work of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force and the brave efforts of a confidential source they were prevented from carrying out their planned attacks,' the U.S. Attorney said."

EPA Seeks Ban On Chemicals Used In Cookware. USA Today (1/26, Weise) reports, "In a surprise turn Wednesday, the Environmental Protection Agency moved to eliminate the production of a suspected carcinogen used in the making of Teflon and other non-stick and non-stain coatings. The EPA has asked eight manufacturers that use a family of chemicals known as perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA, to reduce production 95% by 2010 and to stop using it altogether by 2015. …

Environmentalists and consumer groups have long dogged the agency to act. 'The science is still coming in, but the concern is there, so acting now to minimize future releases of PFOA is the right thing to do for our environment and our health'" says Susan Hazen of EPA's Office of Prevention, Pesticides and Toxic Substances." According to the article, "EPA officials are calling for voluntary PFOA cutbacks because 'under the Toxic Substances Control Act, they don't have authority to ban it,' says Richard Wiles of the Environmental Working Group, a public interest group that has long fought to bring public attention to PFOA in the environment." Wiles says that if the chemicals are phased out, it "will be 'the single biggest action the agency has ever taken.'"

The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Eilperin) reports favorable coverage of the EPA for this action. It quotes Ken Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group, who says, "'This is one of those days when the Environmental Protection Agency is at its best. With its announcement today, the EPA is challenging an entire industry to err on the side of precaution and public safety, and invent new ways of doing business. … As harshly as we have singled out DuPont for criticism for its past handling of PFOA pollution, today we want to single out and commend the company and acknowledge its leadership going forward."

DuPont Targeted. USA Today and the Post both note that DuPont was a particular target in the PFOA deal. In the first paragraph of its story, The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Eilperin) says, "Eight U.S. companies, including giant DuPont Co., agreed yesterday to virtually eliminate a harmful chemical used to make Teflon from all consumer products coated with the ubiquitous nonstick material." Both the Post and USA Today note that DuPont recently agreed to a $6.5 million settlement with the EPA over charges that it hid information about the dangers of PFOA.

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 7, 2:50, Vargas) reported, "Today, the government asked companies to virtually eliminate" a chemical used to make Teflon "over the next nine years." Ross: "Today, the Federal government said DuPont had virtually agreed to eliminate any new emissions of the key Teflon chemical at its factories." Susan Hazen EPA: "This is the right thing to do. And we are going to move forward with it." The New York Times (1/26, Janofsky, 1.19M) adds, "DuPont immediately pledged to join the" voluntary program," along with "3M/Dyneon, Arkema, Asahi, Ciba, Clariant, Daikin and Solvay Solexis." The EPA says that "full compliance by the companies and their overseas affiliates would lead to a 95 percent reduction by 2010 in use of the substance, perfluorooctanoic acid, or PFOA, and to their total elimination by 2015."

Video Highlights Problems With Federal Mine Safety Oversight. NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 8, 2:30, Williams) reported, "Those two West Virginia mining disasters have now focused a lot of attention on mine safety in this country." A videotape tape shows "the perils of digging for coal. And the often lax oversight of this nation's mines." NBC (Myers) added, "This is the inside of Coal Creek Mine in southeastern Kentucky. Videotaped by a miner who smuggled a camera into work in June 2004 to document what he said were dangerous conditions." Edwin Pennington "is crushed under this slab of rock 200 feet long." One "safety official who investigated Pennington's death says his tragedy underscores a widespread problem in mines across the country. He says fines are too small to induce companies to fix hazards and the entire system has no teeth." Tony Oppegard, former Mine Safety & Health official: "The company has been going on about its business for the last year and a half without any consequences thus far."

Bush To Push For Reprocessing Of Spent Nuclear Fuel. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Fialka, 2.11M) reports, "The Bush administration plans to announce a $250 million initiative to reprocess spent nuclear fuel, a first step toward reversing a 1970s policy that rejected reprocessing as too dangerous to pursue." The Administration's "decision to put the money into its fiscal 2007 budget to test new technologies is part of an effort to jump-start the nuclear-power industry at a time when energy prices are high and concerns about global warming make nuclear power plants more acceptable." The Journal adds, "According to nuclear industry officials and others briefed on the proposal in recent weeks, the program could be announced as early as next week in President Bush's State of the Union address. If the technology works, it could vastly reduce the amount of spent nuclear waste that would have to be buried in underground storage, such as at Nevada's Yucca Mountain, set to open after 2012."

The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Baker, Linzer, 744K) adds the fuel proposal "is part of a broader push by the president for domestic and global nuclear energy. With worldwide energy demands on the rise and U.S. reliance on foreign oil increasing, Bush has held out nuclear power as a solution that will not affect global warming."

Gore Documentary On Global Warming Has Premiere At Sundance Festival. The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Booth, 744K) reports that ex-Vice President Al Gore's documentary on global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth," "had its world premiere at the Sundance Film Festival on Tuesday night before an enthusiastic audience that gave the former vice president and his movie a big standing O. Among the film's lessons: Earth's glaciers are melting, the polar bears are screwed, each year sets new heat records." The Post notes, "The core of the film is a one-man, ever-evolving multimedia slide show that Gore assembled himself. A little-known fact: Since his defeat by George W. Bush in 2000, Gore has traveled the globe with his bar graphs, staging event after event for small, invited audiences. Free of charge. And he's presented one version or another of this slide show, by his own estimation, a thousand times. … In the film, Gore presents the latest evidence to demonstrate how the accumulation of carbon dioxide and other pollutants of the industrial age are increasing temperatures."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Recuses Himself From Trade School Probe. Under the headline "F.B.I. Director Recused From Investigation Of Weld's Former School," The New York Times (1/26, Healy, 1.19M) reports in "Metro Briefing" that "The F.B.I. director will not play a role in the inquiry into Decker College, the Kentucky school once run by William F. Weld, because the director and Mr. Weld, a Republican candidate for governor, are friends and former colleagues, an F.B.I. spokesman said yesterday. … The New York Democratic Party had asked that Mr. Mueller recuse himself, according to a party spokesman. Mr. Weld has not been accused of any wrongdoing involving Decker, which declared bankruptcy last fall amid allegations of fraud."

Under the headline "Weld's Pal Off Inquiry," The New York Post (1/25, Dicker, 624K) reported yesterday, "FBI spokesman Richard Kolko told The Post that while the Decker probe was being handled by the special agent in charge of the Louisville, Ky., field office, Mueller himself is 'regularly briefed on significant investigations and cases.' And while Kolko insisted Mueller 'has not had a role in directing any part of this investigation,' he said, 'since the issue has been raised publicly, and to avoid even the appearance of any conflict, any decisions that would otherwise be made by the director in this matter will, instead, be handled by Deputy Director John Pistole.' Kolko's announcement came a few hours after state Democratic Chairman Herman 'Denny' Farrell joined D'Amato in urging Mueller to step aside. … Farrell said Weld and Mueller were 'good friends' during the 1980s when both served in the U.S. Attorney's office in Boston. He said Mueller had also contributed to Weld's unsuccessful U.S. Senate campaign against incumbent John Kerry of Massachusetts in 1996."

Minnesota Attorney Charged In Internet Pharmacy Scheme. The AP (1/26) reports, "A lawyer has been indicted (in Minneapolis) on federal charges alleging he helped an Internet pharmacy illegally obtain narcotics and helped its founder hide assets." The AP continues, "Daniel Adkins, who was general counsel for Xpress Pharmacy Direct, helped deceive legitimate pharmacies into supplying the narcotics that Xpress hawked over the Internet and by telephone, according to the indictment issued Tuesday." The AP adds, 'Federal authorities say Xpress filled about 72,000 illegal prescriptions for pain killers and other controlled substances, generating sales of about $20 million. Authorities shut down Xpress last May and company founder Christopher Smith, his accountant and a doctor who issued prescriptions were indicted in August. … The indictment alleges that Adkins helped Smith hide assets after they learned about the investigation. It also alleges that Adkins wrote to legitimate pharmacies from which Xpress ordered drugs, assuring them that Xpress was 'both legal and authorized by federal and state statutes.' … Adkins was charged with conspiracy to distribute and dispense controlled substances, wire fraud; unlawful distribution and dispensing of controlled substances and misbranding drugs. If convicted of wire fraud he could face up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine, the U.S. attorney's office said."

Drug Ring's Alleged Second-In-Command Pleads Guilty. The Knoxville (TN) News-Sentinel (1/26, Satterfield) reports, "Admitting crimes that could lock him away for life made Stephen 'Black' Ardis downright scared Wednesday. Ardis, who was captured on secret recordings expressing worries that an undercover agent he dubbed 'Superman' was on his trail, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to being second-in-command of a Detroit-to-Knoxville drug running operation. But the 26-year-old drug slinger made it clear before entering his plea that a possible life sentence was a scary proposition he wanted to avoid. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck said the massive amount of drugs Ardis conspired to put onto Knoxville's streets guarantees the Detroit man a 20-year prison term. … The drug ring was broken in November after a probe led by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Todd Lee and Knoxville Police Department Investigator Bruce Conkey. It was Conkey whom Ardis dubbed 'Superman' in a conversation secretly recorded by the agents during their investigation."

Prosecutor Delays Charges In Washington Bomb Case. The Tri-City (WA) Herald (1/25, Trumbo) reports, "Benton County prosecutors will need several weeks to decide potential charges against a Richland man who says he kept bomb-making material because he is a miner." The Herald continues, "Kevin D. Johnson, 49, was released from jail Friday, three days after Richland police arrested him at his home where they seized gunpowder, nitro-methane and about 20 pounds of ammonium nitrate. They also found six firearms." The Herald adds, "Prosecutor Andy Miller said Tuesday that no charges were filed during the 72-hour hold on Johnson because more investigation is needed. Items taken from the home also have to be analyzed by agents of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, he said. … 'To prove the elements of the case, we'd have to get the ATF to test the items,' Miller said. … Richland police Capt. Mike Cobb said an ATF agent told him Tuesday analysis of the items found at Johnson's home would be completed in two to four weeks. … Cobb said the investigation also involves 91 blasting caps that allegedly belonged to Johnson that were found Jan. 15 at a home in Franklin County. Cobb said officers discovered the caps in a closet of a man's home after they investigated a domestic violence complaint."

IMMIGRATION:

Daughter Of Former Chilean Dictator Pinochet May Seek Asylum In US. Reuters (1/26) reports, "The eldest daughter of former Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet on Wednesday asked the United States to grant her political asylum after she fled tax charges in Chile, Chilean officials said." Reuters continues, "Lucia Pinochet Hiriart, 60, was being moved to an immigration detention center late on Wednesday after spending most of the day at Dulles International Airport near Washington, Chile's Foreign Relations Minister Ignacio Walker told local radio in Santiago. … Earlier, Interior Minister Francisco Vidal said Chile had been told that Pinochet Hiriart had asked for asylum. … 'In the coming two or three days we will have a decision from the United States which, I insist, will be a rejection (of asylum),' Walker said." Reuters adds, "U.S. officials would not confirm that Pinochet Hiriart had requested asylum. … 'Lucia Pinochet is currently in U.S. Customs and Border Protection custody at Dulles International Airport, pending resolution of her immigration status,' said Jarrod Agen, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security. … Pinochet Hiriart has been charged with tax fraud related to some $1 million in undeclared taxes and falsification of documents as part of a widening tax evasion and fraud investigation involving the Pinochet family."

Jury Finds "Survivor" Winner Hatch Guilty Of Tax Evasion. The AP (1/26, Henry) reports, "Richard Hatch, who won $1 million in the debut season of the reality show 'Survivor,' was found guilty Wednesday of failing to pay taxes on his winnings and taken straight to jail." The AP continues, "Hatch remained calm as the court clerk read the verdict. He waved goodbye to family members, then was handcuffed and taken into custody after U.S. District Judge Ernest Torres said he was a potential flight risk. … The charges carry up to 13 years in prison. Torres said he expected a sentence of between 33 months and 41 months, but said the time could be longer because prosecutors say Hatch committed perjury. Sentencing was scheduled for April 28." The AP adds, "Hatch, 44, was also convicted of evading taxes on $327,000 he earned as co-host of a Boston radio show and $28,000 in rent on property he owned. He was acquitted of seven bank, mail and wire fraud charges related to a charity, Horizon Bound, he planned to open for troubled youth. … Hatch's lawyer, John MacDonald, said he would appeal the verdict. He said Hatch was aware of the possibility of jail time."

Former Washington Man Wanted On Tax Charge Captured In Panama. The Puget Sound (WA) Business Journal (1/26) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice said Wednesday that former Renton resident David Struckman has been captured in Panama. Struckman had been charged by the Internal Revenue Service for running an operation that promoted tax-avoidance plans." The Journal continues, "Struckman was indicted in 2004 and charged with conspiracy to defraud the United States. He then "disappeared," according to a Justice Department spokeswoman. He was arrested in Panama earlier this month and deported, the department said, and will be transported to Western Washington." The Journal adds, "The government alleges that Struckman and four others sold 'Global Prosperity' wealth-building products, including videotapes, CDs and seminars, which 'included fraudulent methods of income tax elimination.' .. The seminars cost as much as $37,000 to attend and, according to the government, the group then concealed income earned from the products by using bogus trusts and offshore bank accounts."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Full Senate Begins Debate On Alito Confirmation. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "The full Senate debate is under way on Samuel Alito's nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court. A day after the judiciary committee cast the divided vote over Alito, Republicans and Democrats are voicing fierce support and opposition to the President's choice for the high court." Alito "met today with Republicans senators whose majority votes are expected to seal his confirmation despite strong Democratic opposition."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 3, 1:00, Williams) reported, "As the full Senate began debating his Supreme Court nomination, Judge Samuel Alito took something of a pre-victory lap on Capitol Hill, thanking Republicans who helped move his nomination to the expected finish line. On the Senate floor, Democrats continued to call him a bad choice, while Republicans praised him." Currently, "Alito has enough support to be confirmed right now."

The AP (1/26, Holland) also says Alito "took a victory lap in the Senate on Wednesday, accepting congratulations from Republican leaders as lawmakers moved toward confirming him in a largely party-line vote." Reuters (1/26) adds Alito "appeared to have the votes for confirmation…as the Senate began a bitter debate."

The Washington Times (1/26, Hurt, 90K) says Republicans "rounded up the 60 votes they need to block any attempt to filibuster his nomination." Meanwhile, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy "called the vote on the nomination 'the vote of a generation.'"

Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Angle) reported, "Though Alito appears to be on track for confirmation and though it appears Democrats aligned against Alito do not have the votes to sustain a filibuster, Virginia's Republican Senator George Allen felt it necessary to issue a warning today." Allen: "My reaction is if they move forward with such a filibuster, my reaction is, 'make my day.' We will enjoy pulling the constitutional trigger to allow Judge Alito a fair up-or-down vote."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 6, 1:15, Vargas) reported, "Senators were divided along party lines." Sen. Hillary Clinton: "Roe v. Wade is at-risk. The privacy of Americans is at-risk. Environmental safeguards, laws that protect workers from abuse or negligence. Laws, even, that keep machine guns off the streets. All these and many other, are imperiled." Sen. Edward Kennedy: "The record demonstrates that we cannot count on Judge Alito to blow the whistle when the President is out of bounds. He is a long-standing advocate of expanding executive power." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist: "Judge Alito deserves to become Justice Alito. And those who oppose him are smearing a decent and honorable man and posing an unfair political standard on all judicial nominees."

Bush Meets With Alito's Former Clerks. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported the President met "with about 40 people, Republicans and Democrats, who've clerked for Judge Alito. It is another attempt to drive home the administration's insistence that Alito is qualified and deserves a quick and fair up or down Senate vote."

Novak Says Red State Democrats Who Oppose Alito Regret Vote. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (1/26) writes that Sens. Kent Conrad and Byron Dorgan of North Dakota, "Bill Nelson of Florida, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, Ken Salazar of Colorado, Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, and Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas are red state Democrats who voted to confirm Chief Justice John Roberts. While Roberts is no less conservative than Alito…these Democrats who voted for the chief justice have been under intense pressure from the left to oppose Alito. All such senators may be willing to risk a politically unpopular 'no' vote, partly thanks to disappointing Senate Republican candidate recruitment this year." Novak notes, "The contention that President Bush's nominee is outside the 'mainstream' is the major talking point against Alito, but polls show support for him and his endorsement of spousal abortion notification. That debate's outcome may determine whether senators who vote against Alito will suffer at the polls this year and in the years ahead."

NYTimes Urges Democrats To Filibuster Alito's Nomination. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) editorialized that Alito's "elevation will come courtesy of a president whose grandiose vision of his own powers threatens to undermine the nation's basic philosophy of government --- and a Senate that seems eager to cooperate by rolling over and playing dead. It is hard to imagine a moment when it would be more appropriate for senators to fight for a principle. Even a losing battle would draw the public's attention to the import of this nomination." The Times adds, "Senate Democrats, who presented a united front against the nomination of Judge Alito in the Judiciary Committee, seem unwilling to risk the public criticism that might come with a filibuster -- particularly since there is very little chance it would work. Judge Alito's supporters would almost certainly be able to muster the 60 senators necessary to put the nomination to a final vote. A filibuster is a radical tool. It's easy to see why Democrats are frightened of it. But from our perspective, there are some things far more frightening. One of them is Samuel Alito on the Supreme Court."

Roberts, Alito Appointments Called Bush's Greatest Domestic Successes Since 2003. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) editorializes, "With at least 52 Senators already on record in support, it's clear that -- short of some smear ex machina -- liberal Democrats can't stop Samuel Alito from being confirmed to a seat on the Supreme Court. So it's a good moment to consider what this says about our politics and what it means for the Court as it enters a new era. One conclusion is that the confirmation of both Chief Justice John Roberts and Judge Alito marks the most important domestic success for President Bush since his 2003 tax cuts." The "Alito-Roberts ascendancy also marks a victory for the generation of legal conservatives who earned their stripes in the Reagan Administration. … The Roberts-Alito Court also represents a notable, and greatly satisfying, rebuke for the legal left and its 'borking' strategy."

Bush Resubmits Nominee Previously Blocked By Democrats. The Washington Post (1/26, A3, Babington, 744K) reports the White House "renominated Brett M. Kavanaugh to the US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. President Bush nominated

Kavanaugh, the White House staff secretary, in July 2003, but he fell victim to intense battles between Senate Democrats and Republicans over numerous judicial appointments. A May 2005 bipartisan pact averted a showdown over judicial filibusters and enabled some contested nominees to win confirmation. But it left Kavanaugh in limbo." The Senate Judiciary Committee's eight Democrats "complained last year that Kavanaugh took several months to answer their written questions about his qualifications. Other Democrats have noted that Kavanaugh, 40, has limited courtroom experience and helped independent counsel Kenneth W. Starr pursue the Monica S. Lewinsky case during the Clinton presidency."

Abramoff Prosecutor Among Nominees To Federal Bench. The AP (1/26) reports, "President Bush on Wednesday nominated one of the Justice Department's lead prosecutors in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe to a U.S. District Court seat." The AP continues, "Noel Hillman, chief of the department's public integrity section, was nominated for the federal judgeship in New Jersey, where he served in the U.S. Attorney's office under Michael Chertoff, now secretary of Homeland Security." The AP adds, "The White House was poised to nominate Hillman last summer, after New Jersey's two Democratic senators took the opportunity to weigh in on Hillman and other nominees in exchange for lifting their objections to another candidate Bush had nominated in 2003. … Hillman will step down as chief of the public integrity unit next week, but remain in the Justice Department's criminal division until he is confirmed, a department official said. Andrew Lourie, a career prosecutor in Miami, will lead the public corruption-fighting office on a temporary basis, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss personnel matters. … Lourie performed the same role until Hillman took over early in 2003."

Bush Suggests Government Will Not Bail Out GM And Ford. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Cooper, McKinnon, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush said General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. should develop 'a product that's relevant' rather than look to Washington for help with their heavy pension obligations, and hinted he would take a dim view of a government bailout of the struggling auto makers." In an Oval Office interview, Bush "said that his administration has discussed the development of new fuel technologies with the nation's top two auto makers, which might make them more competitive, but that he has had no talks about the companies' finances." Asked if he had spoken to GM Chairman and Chief Executive Rick Wagoner or Ford Chairman and CEO William Clay Ford Jr., Mr. Bush replied, "Not about their balance sheets. … And I haven't been asked by any automobile manufacturer about a bailout." Asked if the government should take "any pre-emptive action," he said, "I think it's very important for the market to function." Bush "suggested he felt optimistic about the companies' prospects."

WPost Says Detroit, Congress Should Embrace "Competition." In an editorial titled "Managing Detroit," the Washington Post (1/26, A24, 744K) says, "It's not clear whether the GM and Ford restructuring plans will be enough to avert bankruptcy. Their difficulties may take on a more political tone, particularly since the Midwest is a key battleground for presidential campaign strategists." But "Congress needs to keep Motown's troubles in perspective. They are the result of competitive pressures that most parts of the US economy take for granted every day. And it is precisely by embracing competition that the United States has become the world's most powerful economy."

Bush Unlikely To Push Large Initiatives In State Of The Union Speech. The New York Times (1/26, Stevenson, 1.19M) reports, "Having stabilized his political standing after a difficult 2005, President Bush is heading into his State of the Union address on Tuesday intent primarily on retaining his party's slim majority in Congress this year and completing unfinished business from his existing agenda." Unlike last year, "when he used the occasion to kick off an ambitious and ultimately failed effort to overhaul Social Security, Mr. Bush seems unlikely to reshape the political landscape with his speech on Tuesday, members of both parties said." The Times adds, "Administration officials and other Republicans in Washington said Mr. Bush would focus on several topics, including health care, spending restraint, illegal immigration and the nation's international economic competitiveness, as well as an unapologetic restatement of his national security policy. Much of the speech, they said, will be tied together under a broad theme acknowledging that the United States is going through transitions that involve wrenching dislocation as well as opportunity." His aides "portray Mr. Bush as undaunted by the plague of setbacks last year that loosened his grip on his party and drove down his poll numbers, which although up from their lows last fall remain at anemic levels."

Bush Urged To Tackle Medicare Reform. David Gratzer, a physician and senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M), "Bush will cite rising health costs as a major problem for Americans and their businesses, and he will outline steps to strengthen health savings accounts as a remedy." But "he is unlikely to mention Medicare reform -- and that would be a mistake. Indeed, if the president is serious about health reform, he will have to tackle Medicare. And he can start by re-engaging a debate from 1999." Seven years ago, Sen.

John Breaux and Rep. Bill Thomas "completed the final report of the National Bipartisan Commission on the Future of Medicare. Considering various reforms, they eventually settled on a proposal modeled after the popular Federal Employees Health Benefits Plan (FEHBP), which covers nine million federal employees and their families. Instead of today's one-size-fits-all Medicare structure, they envisioned a program where seniors choose among competing private plans. Since then, Washington has debated the size and scope of Medicare expansion -- such as the prescription benefit -- but the program itself has yet to be fundamentally rethought." It "needs to be, because faced with Medicare's rising costs over the past four decades, the only real response has been a bipartisan exercise in wage and price controls."

Protestors Sue For Spot During State Of The Union. The Washington Post (1/26, A6, Barker, 744K) reports, "Organizers planning a protest during President Bush's State of the Union address next week say they have been denied a permit to hold the demonstration around the U.S. Capitol Reflecting Pool because that area has been reclassified as part of the security perimeter for the day of the speech. The organizers of the Tuesday protest, called 'World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime,' say the National Park Service and the U.S. Capitol Police initially offered them the Capitol Reflecting Pool as a demonstration site but changed their minds. Demonstrators have been told to confine their gathering to the gravel walkways on the Mall between Third and Fourth streets, farther from the Capitol. The grassy areas are fenced off because they are being resodded." Travis Morales, one of the organizers of the demonstration, "said the group was offered use of the area around the Capitol Reflecting Pool on Jan. 10 and that the site was not then part of any security perimeter. But on Jan. 19, he said, the group was told the security area had been expanded to include the Reflecting Pool. He called the change 'politically motivated,' adding that the Bush administration 'is trying to push us so far away that we can't be seen or heard. … A protest not seen and a protest not heard is not a protest.'" The demonstrators "filed a federal lawsuit yesterday seeking a court order that would enable them to gather at the Capitol Reflecting Pool. U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina will convene a hearing, possibly today."

Many Liberals Upset Kaine Was Chosen To Respond To Bush. USA Today (1/26, Lawrence, 2.31M) reports, "Virginia Gov. Timothy Kaine lifted the Democratic Party's spirits last fall when he won in a conservative state and gave his fellow Democrats some ideas about how to replicate his success. The fruits of victory include the honor of being picked to respond to President Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday -- and the wrath of liberal bloggers wondering why Democrats didn't choose somebody else. Anybody else." The selection of Kaine, "a Roman Catholic who opposes gay marriage -- highlighted fault lines within the party. Bloggers on several liberal websites were furious for reasons including Kaine's looks, style and obscurity, his open talk about religion, his moderate positions and his inexperience in foreign affairs. 'What the hell are they thinking?' Arianna Huffington demanded on www.huffingtonpost.com. … Bloggers at dailykos.com, talkleft.com and other liberal sites showered cyberspace with alternatives: new faces — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer -- and famous faces -- Al Gore, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton."

Villaraigosa To Give Spanish-Language Response. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Chen, 958K) reports, "Congressional Democrats announced today that Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa will deliver the party's Spanish-language response to next week's State of the Union address. … This will be the third consecutive year that Democrats have offered a Spanish language response to Bush's speech. Two years ago, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico delivered the first such response. Last year, it was jointly given by then Rep. Robert Menendez, now a senator from New Jersey, and Sen. Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico."

CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) added "Villaraigosa's remarks clearly will be aimed at helping Democrats reach out to Hispanic voters right here in the United States."

Effectiveness Of Health Savings Accounts Disputed. The New York Times (1/26, Freudenheim, 1.19M) reports, "Bush has made 'consumer-directed' health savings plans a cornerstone of his policy for addressing runaway medical costs, and he plans to push them again in the State of the Union address next week." But "so far there is little evidence that the approach is helping many consumers come to grips with the high price of health care," even though "the early results do offer some hope. More than two million people have signed up for the plans, which were created as part of Medicare overhaul legislation in 2003 but were not an option for many people until the health insurance sign-up season last fall. While that is a tiny fraction of the 180 million Americans with health insurance, some experts say the numbers show a notably fast adoption rate for a complicated new consumer program. By other measures, though, workers and employers have been slow to embrace health savings plans, which are intended to reduce corporate health care costs while giving individuals more control of their medical spending."

In his Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M), David Wessel criticizes Bush's "cure-all for health care," saying Bush argues for making "health care more like the market for tile and pipes." Adds Wessel, "Set aside the case that only a taxpayer-financed, government-organized solution works. A Republican president and Congress aren't going there, and a lot of Democrats are skeptical, too. … A bigger problem is that too many healthy (for now) Americans go without preventive care, and too many chronically ill Americans don't get care that would avoid costly, painful complications later. HSAs don't help there. And then there's the uncomfortable fact that 80% of health spending in the U.S. each year is spent on 8% of the population. Giving them tax breaks to buy health-insurance policies with $2,000 deductibles won't ensure that money is well spent."

Robert J. Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (1/26, 744K), "Americans want more health care for less money, and when they don't get it, they indict drug companies, insurers, trial lawyers and bureaucrats. Although these familiar scapegoats may not be blameless, the real problem is us. We demand the impossible. The changes we truly need are political. We need to reconnect people with the public consequences of their private acts. We should curb the subsidization of private insurance." Medicare recipients, "especially wealthier ones, should pay more of their bills." But "these changes won't happen because people don't want to see the costs. We don't have the health care system we need, but we do have the one we deserve."

Leavitt Says Government Moving To Solve Prescription Drug Program Problems. The Washington Times (1/26, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Administration officials yesterday told senators the new Medicare prescription-drug program has problems, but they're under control, and states will be reimbursed for covering seniors' prescription costs resulting from the glitches." Senators on the Finance Committee "seemed cautiously optimistic at the assurances, but some said Congress will still probably need to act. 'I think there's no question that the issue of prescription drugs will be back on the [Senate] floor in some form this year,' said Sen. Ron Wyden, Oregon Democrat." Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt said yesterday, "We've identified the problems, we're working on them and the plan gets better every day." He and Medicare chief Mark McClellan "had a private meeting yesterday with committee members to brief them on the situation."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 8, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "It is no secret the new Medicare prescription drug program is not off to a great start. Many elderly have been lost in the bureaucratic maze. Many have found themselves with no coverage at all." CBS (Andrews) added, "According to advocates for senior citizens, in thousands of cases so far, drugs might be covered under Medicare, but patients still need prior authorization before insurance actually covers the drug. The Center for Medicare Advocacy calls that sleight of hand. What's the sleight of hand?" Vicki Gottlich: "I think people were promised that they would be able to get all the drugs that they require, but they weren't told that they might have to go through a little extra." Andrews: "Medicare has ordered insurance plans to solve this saying, 'we expect prior authorization to be resolved at the point of service,' meaning the pharmacy counter. … So now in this transition to this massive new benefit, prior authorization is yet another complication in an already-troubled program."

OLC Urges Caution For Federal Employees On Nonprofit Boards. Government Executive (1/26, Pulliam) reports, "Agencies should be careful about allowing employees to serve on the boards of nonprofit organizations that have an interest in their work, according to a recent opinion published by the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel." GE continues, "Federal executives can serve as officers or directors at nonprofit organizations, a 19-page opinion released Jan. 11 stated. But agencies should take into account the appearance of an ethical violation before permitting employees to serve in a group that handles issues related to their government work. … 'Government employees [have a] . . . duty to "avoid any actions creating the appearance that they are violating the law ... or ethical standards,"' the Justice office's opinion said. … 'If an outside organization in which an employee is a director has been advocating its views directly to the federal government on a matter that the organization has identified as especially significant, there is a significantly heightened risk that the employee ... will at least appear less than independent in his judgments,' the legal counsel stated. 'And that risk ... calls for serious consideration by the employee's agency.' … Federal law requires government employees to recuse themselves from work activities when a nonprofit on which they serve has a financial interest in the matter. But just because nonprofits spend money advocating a position does not necessarily mean they have a financial interest in an agency action, according to the opinion." GE notes, "The case leading to the opinion originated in July 2004 when a senior executive at the Education Department was told by the Office of Government Ethics that election to the Senior Executives Association board of directors would result in a criminal conflict of interest due to his service on his department's Executive Resources Board."

Senate Committee Opens Hearings Into Lobbying Reform. USA Today (1/26, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports that after "weeks of calls for restrictions on how lobbyists influence Congress, lawmakers began Wednesday to grapple with the thorny details of just how to do it." The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee opened the first congressional hearing on reforms, and "lobbyists argued against proposals to ban privately financed trips for House and Senate members and their aides, saying travel helps them make good policy decisions in an era of globalization." And some senators "rejected calls for more restrictions, saying problems…are rooted in lawmakers' own behavior, the way Congress operates and a failure to enforce rules already on the books." The Washington Post (1/26, A6, Milbank, 744K) reports lawmakers "had no difficulty conceding they had a problem. But there was yawning disconnect between the problem and the proposed remedies. While most everybody agreed that Congress was being subverted by lawmakers' reliance on lobbyists for campaign cash, the proposals getting the most serious consideration yesterday were relatively minor: whether to ban lobbyist-paid lunches or a few million dollars' worth of privately funded congressional trips." Both newspapers quote Sen. Tom Coburn saying, "I don't believe lobbying reform's the problem; I believe Congress is."

However, CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Koppel) called the hearing "a bipartisan show of support for what Democrat Joe Lieberman called 'doing away' with what they believe is the faulty impression that their votes go to the highest bidder. The high-flying days of Congressional lobbying could be in for a rough landing as Democrats and Republicans alike rushed to put luxury vacations and expensive meals on the Congressional chopping block." The AP (1/25, Abrams) quotes Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairman Susan Collins saying, "The public's trust in Congress is perilously low." The panel's ranking Democrat, Sen. Joseph Lieberman, similarly said, "The status quo stinks and cries out for us to clear the air."

McCain Testifies In Opposition To Earmarks. The Washington Post (1/26, Branigin, 744K) reports Sen. John McCain, appearing as a witness before the panel, "was one of several senators to denounce earmarking, a practice he called 'disgraceful.' He outlined one of several proposals to tighten rules and require greater disclosure of lobbying activities. But he told the committee, 'We're not going to fix this system until we fix the earmarks.'" But "representatives of lobbying organizations urged the committee today not to overreact to what they described as the unscrupulous activities of one corrupt lobbyist," and Minority Whip Richard Durbin said the problem "goes beyond earmarks and that solving it must start with reducing the 'outrageous expense' of political campaigns."

Lewis Offers Steps For Earmarking Reforms. House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis writes in Roll Call (1/26), "The president's budget contains numerous earmarks inserted by nameless, faceless bureaucrats within each government agency. Teach for America, The Points of Light Foundation, and America's Promise are just a few examples of unauthorized, limited-scope initiatives that routinely receive a line-item request in the president's budget. Yet elected representatives know more about local, state or national priorities than the Beltway bureaucracy. It would be a mistake to ignore this expertise when determining how to allocate scarce federal dollars." Lewis calls for "curbing the appetite to spend by sharply reducing the number of earmarks in annual spending bills and making the appropriations process more open and transparent. In order to succeed, the House and Senate must jointly embrace these efforts. Specifically, the leadership of the House Appropriations Committee recommends the following: 1) Sharply limit the number of Member project requests. … 2) Require increased accountability, disclosure and transparency by requiring that Member request letters be made public prior to House consideration of each appropriations bill. … 3) Require that all project requests be submitted in writing to the appropriations subcommittee of jurisdiction via a Member-signed request letter or form. 4) Establish clearly defined criteria for all project requests and require Members to specify how each project meets the criteria. … 5) Increase the proportion of projects that have a dollar-matching requirement. … 6) Require all Congressionally approved projects to go through a formal executive branch contracting and auditing process. 7) Finally, require that all other committees adopt similar earmarking reforms."

Nelson, Coleman Call For Independent Commission. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Curtius, 958K) reports Sens. Ben Nelson and Norm Coleman, "convinced that Congress cannot overhaul its rules on ethics and lobbying in the politically charged atmosphere of an election year," called for the creation of an independent commission for the job. But their "proposal faced quick resistance from two senators leading the reform push," Lieberman and McCain, both of whom said they "feared creating an independent commission and that waiting for it to act would slow the momentum for change." McCain said, "I don't want to wait. We've got to act quickly."

House Democratic Leaders Float "Toughest Lobbying Reform Package Yet." Roll Call (1/26, Newmyer) reports House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer, and Democratic Caucus Chairman James Clyburn "circulated principles" of the "toughest lobbying reform package yet" to Democrats, seeking their support. The measure would "force lawmakers to report when they are sponsoring earmarks, require them to pay fair market value for travel on private jets and create an office of public integrity to oversee these and other new lobbying rules. Details of the plan emerged after a day in which lawmakers on both sides of the Capitol traded barbs, with each party claiming to want a bipartisan solution, but finding no partner across the aisle."

GOP Ends Vestige Of "K Street Project." The Washington Post (1/26, A2, Birnbaum, 744K) reports the

GOP has ended a "long practice of routinely summoning lobbyists to the Capitol to try to persuade them to hire their aides and colleagues," a "remnant of the K Street Project once championed by Rep. Tom DeLay." The Senate Republican Conference staff director said Wednesday that a "K-Street-job-vacancies memo -- the heart of Congress's remaining involvement in the effort these days -- will no longer be distributed during high-level meetings hosted by the conference on Capitol Hill between lawmakers and lobbyists."

Hill Staff May Rush To Lobbying Jobs Before Rules Change. Roll Call (1/26, Ackley) writes that while the two parties "might not agree on all things lobbying," they "seem united on doubling the current one-year cooling-off period for newly minted advocates. And that has Congressional staffers, who already had an eye toward employment on K Street, stepping up their job-seeking efforts. Lobbyists, headhunters and Capitol Hill aides speculate that a mini-exodus of staffers from both sides of the aisle may be coming as a result."

ASAE Opposes Proposal To Ban Privately Funded Travel For Lawmakers. The Washington Post (1/26, A23, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "The American Society of Association Executives (sometimes referred to as the 'association of associations') is weighing in on plans to overhaul lobbying laws. ASAE, like some other trade groups, is concerned Congress may being acting too fast. ASAE opposes a measure that would ban all privately funded travel for members of Congress because, it believes, the ban would discourage true fact-finding trips and meetings with diverse groups."

DeLay Unrepentant As Ethics Talk Dominates Washington. In his Washington Post (1/26, A25, 744K) column, George Will writes of a visit with Tom DeLay in Richmond, Texas, writing, "Most people, battered as he recently has been, would be curled up on the carpet in a fetal position. But DeLay is as direct and uncomplicated as the tool that supplies his nickname -- 'The Hammer' -- and his faults do not include being a whiner. Furthermore, he is not about to plea-bargain in the court of public opinion. He chafes under prudential reticence: His attorneys tell him not to trumpet the fact that the Justice Department told them he is not a target in the Jack Abramoff investigation. But about other matters, the bantam is belligerent." And in DeLay country, "unlike on the Potomac, the fever for reform is not high. To a visiting columnist who waxes censorious about earmarks for highway projects, DeLay responds with a notable lack of repentance: 'You just drove out on one.'"

Social Security Group Redefines Itself To Push For Lobbying Reform. The Washington Post (1/26, A23, Sarasohn, 744K) reports in its "Special Interests" column, "Fresh off its success in raising a grass-roots wave of public opposition that helped block President Bush's plan to overhaul Social Security, Americans United to Protect Social Security has redefined itself. The name is shorter -- Americans United -- and the mission is broader: public corruption, education, health and energy costs, economic prosperity and such. Yesterday, Americans United unveiled a $1 million advertising campaign urging support for legislation proposed by Democratic lawyers aimed at tightening the restrictions on lobbying." The group "has received initial support from organized labor, including the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. Brad Woodhouse , director of communication, says Americans United hopes to raise $10 million to $20 million from labor, individuals and others."

Blunt, Boehner Make Case For Their Candidacies. Rep. Roy Blunt, a candidate for House Majority Leader, writes in USA Today (1/26, 2.31M), "House members cannot ignore recent scandals that have many questioning the credibility of our system. Republicans will regain Americans' trust by enacting tough penalties for those who break the law and focusing on our agenda of limited government, personal responsibility and growing the economy by returning money to the Americans who earned it. … Lobbying reforms should include new rules governing travel and disclosure and regulations subjecting shadowy, tax-exempt '527' political groups to the same standards as others who attempt to influence the process. Then the credibility of honest public servants will be not be questioned -- even when some try to paint them with the same brush as those who break the law."

Meanwhile, Rep. John Boehner, a candidate for House Majority Leader writes in USA Today (1/26, 2.31M), "House Republicans need leadership that will help provide a vision and a plan for renewal. We need a leader who will stand up to Democrats when they're wrong, but who has credibility to work with them when it's in the country's best interests.' Boehner adds, "As of now, I am the only candidate who has released a detailed plan that would help House Republicans regain the spirit and energy of 1994, embrace real reform and reclaim the vision responsible for our success."

USA Today Says Blunt, Boehner Not Credible Reformers. An editorial in USA Today (1/26, 2.31M) says, "The former majority leader, Tom DeLay, stepped down after he was indicted in a Texas fundraising case and linked to crooked lobbyist Jack Abramoff. So where is the GOP seeking this fresh face and new start? With two lawmakers -- Roy Blunt of Missouri and John Boehner of Ohio -- who have cozy relations with lobbyists and a penchant for accepting perks from corporate friends." USA adds, "A third candidate for majority leader, John Shadegg of Arizona, is less enmeshed with the lobbying establishment and high-powered fundraising. That's one reason he's given virtually no chance of winning." USA continues, "Both Blunt and Boehner have one point right: Voters are clamoring for change. That requires recognition of what's wrong and the will to do something about it. Lawmakers who've spent their careers accepting perks and raking in special-interest campaign cash don't make for credible reformers."

Cornyn Emerges As Senate GOP's "Self-Appointed Public Relations Man." Roll Call (1/26, Pierce) reports, "With President Bush and Republicans struggling to regain their standing in public opinion as Senate Democrats hammer away daily at every perceived foible or folly committed by the ruling majority," Sen. John Cornyn "has made it his mission to strike back." Over the past year, Cornyn "has become a self-appointed public relations man for Republicans in Congress and the White House, filling a communications void that has developed in the Senate GOP leadership." Cornyn said, "I saw it as addressing this quick-response need that I don't think we had been set up for before, and really didn't need before the Democrats created their war room. It's not enough to come back later on, a week later, two weeks later, and respond. … A charge unrebutted is a charge believed." Cornyn has taken a key role in judicial nominations and also spearheaded "an aggressive effort among his colleagues in directing staff to send out partisan press releases, opposition research papers and talking points." He is now running for the "low-profile but still influential post of vice chairman of the Senate Republican Conference, which just happens to be the No. 2 'message' position."

First Lady's Approval Rating Is 82% In CNN/USA Today/Gallup Poll. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Crowley) reported, "In the latest CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll, 82 percent of Americans gave thumbs up to the way Laura Bush is handling her job. … Her approval rating is almost 40 points higher than her husband's." CNN added, "Despite that 82 percent approval rating, only 40 percent of Americans say they would like to see Mrs. Bush run for Senate. The truth is, when people see her as outside the world of politics, she is one of his biggest political assets."

Cheney Still A GOP Fundraising Draw. Roll Call (1/26, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "Despite a recent spate of bad publicity, Vice President Cheney is still a big draw for GOP fundraising. The vice president is slated to be the headline attraction this evening at a fundraiser for Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio). Anyone can attend for a simple $1,000. But the most generous donors may have a picture snapped with the veep: Going for that 'max out' opportunity before Ohio's primary in May, the DeWine re-election campaign is charging political action committees $5,000 per photo op."

Hillary Clinton Says Bush Disregarding Cities' Needs In Favor Of Tax Cuts. Reuters (1/25, Whitesides) reported, "Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton accused the Bush administration on Wednesday of ignoring the needs of cities in its politically driven zeal for tax cuts and told US mayors 'you are on your own.' Clinton, a potential White House candidate in 2008 who is seeking Senate re-election this year in New York, said that since the September 11 attacks President George W. Bush had reneged on his obligation to states and cities to pay for crucial security and social programs." Clinton said tax "cuts are desirable in the right political and economic climate but 'it is hard to square with the challenges we face at this time of terrorist threat.' At the federal level, 'the sense of urgency that marked the months after the 9/11 attacks has largely given way to politics as usual,' she said."

Clinton Stumbles Over Question On Her Time As Wal-Mart Board Member. The New York Daily News (1/26, McAuliff, 729K) reports that Sen. Clinton "easily pointed at Wal-Mart yesterday as not doing enough about health care but found it a little tougher when asked if she had ever suggested the retailer do more when she was on its board of directors. 'Well, you know, I, that was a long time ago, I have to remember,' she stammered, before pointing to her work on health care while First Lady. She sat on the Wal-Mart board from 1986 to 1992. Her spokesman insisted it's 'a very different company now.'"

Columnist Says Liberals Increasingly Unhappy With Clinton. Columnist Jonah Goldberg writes in the Los Angeles Times (1/26, 958K), "Liberals are sizing up Hillary Clinton for the umpteenth time, and they don't like what they see. … 'I will not support Hillary Clinton for president,' wrote Molly Ivins, the voice of conventional thinking on the left. 'Enough. Enough triangulation, calculation and equivocation. Enough clever straddling, enough not offending anyone.'" Goldberg adds, "The New Republic offers perhaps an even more devastating critique of Clinton for Democratic pragmatists: She can't win. Marisa Katz dismantled the myth that Clinton can appeal to 'red state' voters because she won in upstate New York. Turns out former Vice President Al Gore and Sen. John Kerry each did better in upstate New York than she did. … Meanwhile, a recent Gallup poll showed that 51% of Americans won't even consider voting for Clinton." Goldberg relates that there is "something oddly satisfying in the possibility that Clinton being herself is politically disastrous. And, if she's really just playing one more role according to some classically Clintonian political triangulation, there's something equally satisfying to the prospect that even her fans aren't falling for it anymore."

Obey, Frank To Propose Full Public Financing Of House Contests. Roll Call (1/26, Kornacki) reports that Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.) "is joining with Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) to propose full public financing of all House elections. They announced Wednesday that they will introduce the plan, which would bar all candidates from fundraising and self-financing in their campaigns, when the House reconvenes next week." Obey's "plan would radically curtail the financial advantage most incumbents now enjoy, even making it difficult for some of them to pay for television ads. And even if Democrats were to unite behind it, the prospect on a vote in the GOP-controlled House is less than remote. … Beyond that, the plan also faces an almost certain constitutional hurdle, in the form of the Supreme Court's 1976 Buckley v. Valeo decision that equated campaign spending with free speech."

Kondracke Says House GOP Group To Unveil "Suburban Agenda" Next Month. Roll Call Executive Editor Morton M. Kondracke writes in Roll Call (1/26), "A different kind of agenda -- different from the president's State of the Union address and the anticipated Democratic election year document -- is scheduled to be unveiled early next month to House Republicans: 'The Suburban Agenda.' It's the work of a group of 22 GOP Members from across the party's ideological spectrum and led by moderate Rep. Mark Kirk (Ill.), who's also tried to sell it to President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove." Kirk said "this agenda is designed to answer the problems faced by a suburban family as it moves through its day." Kondracke notes, "There's clearly strategic political intent behind trying to build the 2006 GOP legislative strategy around the suburbs: More than half of U.S. voters live in the 'burbs, and these places, formerly Republican strongholds, have been trending Democratic in recent years. … The agenda is designed to keep Republicans in power, but many of the items -- electronic health records and anti-gang measures, for sure -- ought to be bipartisan. It wouldn't be surprising if there's a bidding war for the support of the suburbs."

Postal Service Opposes Collins Bill On Mail Rates. The Washington Post (1/26, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The U.S. Postal Service headquarters launched a blitz yesterday to block a Senate bill, contending that the legislation, in combination with White House demands, could trigger a 20 percent increase in stamp prices in the near future. The bill's sponsors, Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), said they were 'outraged that the Postal Service would mislead senators.' In a statement, they said, 'Nothing in the bill would lead to rate increases.' Government agencies rarely risk incurring the wrath of committee chairmen who oversee their operations, as is the case with Collins. As head of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, she has made the overhaul of postal operations one of her priorities. Her bill would create a system of setting mail rates that she believes would give the post office greater pricing flexibility and would prevent it from raising rates each year in excess of inflation as measured by the consumer price index."

Federalist Society Protests Nightline Report On Scalia. The Washington Times (1/26, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column "The Federalist Society yesterday called on ABC to investigate a report by its news show 'Nightline' that suggested Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia had done something unethical by participating in a legal seminar sponsored by the group. 'The report grossly misled viewers about a recent trip Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia took to teach a 10-hour course on the Constitution and separation of powers. 'Nightline' suggested that Justice Scalia's trip was a "judicial junket," and even strained to manufacture a link with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff,' Federalist Society President Eugene B. Meyer said in a letter yesterday to ABC News President David Westin. The program, which aired Monday, emphasized that Justice Scalia had missed the September swearing-in of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. because of his commitment to attend the legal seminar at a Colorado resort, suggesting that the jurist spent most of his time playing tennis and engaging in other frivolous pursuits."

High Court Urged To Look To Foreign Opinions In Interpreting Law. Felix G. Rohatyn, the United States ambassador to France from 1997 to 2001, writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (1/26, 1.19M), "Globalization has made it not only 'appropriate or useful' but vital to look at foreign laws" when interpreting our own. "When we require European support on security issues…our job is made more difficult by the intensity of popular opposition in Europe to our policy" on the death penalty. "Contempt for the laws of our allies is a major factor in our increasing isolation in the world," and "that is why is it is deeply troubling that the next member of the Supreme Court will most likely share Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas's" opposition to that view. "Taking the views of 450 million Europeans into account is not a sign of weakness on our part, nor is it a commitment to change our views" but "simply recognition that the laws of our most important allies, our biggest foreign investors, foreign employers, foreign customers and trading partners are worthy of our attention."

OTHER NEWS:

Home Sales Drop Sharply. USA Today (1/26, Knox, 2.31M) reports, "Sales of existing homes fell in December for the third-consecutive month, in a surprisingly sharp drop that signaled the housing market is cooling off faster than expected. Home resales declined 5.7% from November to a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 6.6 million, the slowest since March 2004, the National Association of Realtors said Wednesday. Western states, notably California, suffered the worst, with home sales in the region skidding 11.4% from November and from December 2004." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Preciphs, 2.11M), however, adds that even if "sales of existing homes fell in December to their lowest level in three months," they "still set a record for the year." The New York Times (1/26, Bajaj, 1.19M) also reports "the housing market registered a fifth consecutive year of increased sales." The data, nonetheless, "appear to suggest that the era of rapidly increasing sales may be coming to a close."

Stocks Down. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) reports, "Stocks ended a two-day rally yesterday as a worsening profit outlook for oil companies and homebuilders, two of the market's best performers during the last 12 months, sent prices lower." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "fell 2.18 points, or 0.2 percent, to close at 1,264.68, its first drop this week. The Nasdaq composite index lost 4.60 points, or 0.2 percent, to 2,260.65. The Dow Jones industrial average dropped 2.48 points, or less than 0.1 percent, to 10,709.74, helped by a gain in General Motors." The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Patterson, 2.11M) and USA Today (1/26, 2.31M) also report the stock numbers.

Oil Industry Defends Record-High Profits. ABC World News Tonight (1/25, story 4, 2:30, Vargas) reported, "Some breath-taking numbers from the oil industry today. Conoco/Phillips said it made 13.5 $13.5 billion last year, an increase of 66% from the year before. The record-high profits are the result of record-high oil and gas prices people are paying at the pump and to heat their homes. So, the oil industry is feeling the heat. Today, it launched a counterattack." ABC (Stark): "Today the oil industry tried to argue that it's not just the companies themselves who benefit when profits are high. At the gas pump, where prices are once again increasing, news of the huge oil company profits had consumers up in arms." After "all the numbers are in, analysts expect oil industry profits for the fourth quarter to be up at least 46% over a year ago. The industry today was quick to go on the defensive, pointing out its earnings are just slightly above average for all corporations, just over 7 cents for every dollar spent. It also argued that what's good for big oil is good for average Americans." Stark concluded: "So, for oil companies and those who own shares in them, it has been a boom year. But for many consumers, it's a bust." Vargas: "Indeed it is."

Greenspan To Open Consulting Firm. When he leaves the Fed at the end of the month, Greenspan plans to set up a consulting firm, Greenspan Associates, in Washington, DC, the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) reports. The Journal adds, "One of his first hires will be Michelle Smith, who the Fed said yesterday will leave her job as director of its office of board members to join Mr. Greenspan's new firm. … In addition, the Fed said David W. Skidmore, Ms. Smith's deputy, would become the board's chief spokesman and Rose Pianalto Cameron will oversee other public information activities.

Greenspan Opposes Banking Loophole. Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan opposes a regulatory loophole that allows corporations to own banks. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Wysocki, 2.11M) says Greenspan's opposition puts him "into the middle of an effort by Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to establish a bank. Mr. Greenspan's salvo, outlined in a 12-page letter to Congress that was reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, is the latest in a controversy over the separation of commerce and banking. Wal-Mart, the Bentonville, Ark., retailer, is trying to obtain a state banking charter in Utah, using precisely the exemption in the banking laws opposed by Mr. Greenspan." The Journal adds that the remarks "could be Mr. Greenspan's last major statement to Congress as Fed chairman."

Investors Were Skeptical When Greenspan Took Over Fed Chair. USA Today (1/26, Hagenbaugh, 2.31M) reports, "Investors jittery about how incoming Federal Reserve chairman Ben Bernanke will pan out can take some solace -- folks weren't sure some guy named Alan Greenspan was up to snuff either. Investors didn't take the news so well on the day in June 1987 when Paul Volcker announced he was leaving the Fed after eight years and Greenspan was named to his position. Bond markets took their worst one-day beating in more than five years, and the dollar fell." USA adds, "In many ways, Bernanke — although widely respected in economic circles — is more of an unknown to the public than Greenspan was in 1987. … But no matter how well they knew Greenspan, people in 1987 were still nervous about him taking over the Fed."

Dow Chemical Loses Appeal On Life-Insurance Policies. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Matthews) reports, "A federal appeals court ruled Dow Chemical Co. is liable for $22.2 million in back taxes and interest for claiming tax-income losses on thousands of life-insurance policies it took out on its employees. … The ruling is a victory for the Internal Revenue Service, which for the past decade has been cracking down on companies that take out life-insurance policies on their executives and employees, often without their knowledge, in order to reduce their corporate-tax bill." The article says that only Dow Chemical had prevailed against the IRS in these cases, but lost that victory on appeal. The article explains that companies took out these insurance policies "to generate tax deductions with minimal cash outlay. They did this by taking a tax deduction for the interest they paid on loans taken out against the insurance policies, while allowing the policy to build value tax-free."

Ney Announces He Will Seek Reelection. CNN's The Situation Room (1/25, Blitzer) reported, "A leading target in the influence peddling investigation isn't letting the probe keep him from the campaign trail. Congressman Bob Ney announced today that he is running for re-election. The Ohio Republican recently gave up his committee chairmanship. State party officials have urged him to give up a seat as well if he is indicted. Ney denies any wrongdoing."

The AP (1/26, Hammer) notes that in stepping down as chairman of the House Administration Committee earlier this month, Ney "acknowledged that his ties to Abramoff were a distraction from his duties, particularly as Republicans push an ethics reform agenda -- part of which must be implemented by the Administration Committee. But Ney spokesman Brian Walsh said no such distraction has affected Ney's work for his district, where he's known for hands-on constituent service and independence from GOP trade and labor policies."

The New York Times (1/26, Hauser, 1.19M) relates that Ney, in a statement, said "that the campaign this year promises to be a 'vigorous' one 'and I am ready for the fight.' 'I look forward to joining my friends and supporters, including the many state and local officials backing my re-election bid, as we kick off the 2006 campaign this Thursday and Friday,' he said." Ney "is referred to as 'Representative No. 1' in court documents filed in connection with the corruption scandal surrounding" Abramoff. Ney's statement "said he would announce his re-election bid at a campaign rally in Dover tomorrow evening and then travel to the southern part of the district for a second rally in Chillicothe on Friday at noon."

Roll Call (1/26, Whittington) adds, "Chillicothe Mayor Joe Sulzer and Dover Law Director Zack Space are vying in the May 2 Democratic primary for the chance to face Ney, who has held the expansive 18th district seat since 1994."

Ehrlich Says Stem-Cell Funding Decisions Should Be Based On Science. The Washington Post (1/26, B4, Wagner, 744K) reports that Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich (R) "is pushing a plan to spend $20 million next year on stem cell research," but "is not committing himself on the question that has stirred the most controversy: whether the money should be used primarily for work on stem cells derived from human embryos or from less controversial adult stem cells." Ehrlich, in an interview, said, "I'm not going to make that decision. … The point here is that the decision should be a function of the science. These are fundamentally science questions, not political questions." Ehrlich "would leave it to a state-founded technology corporation to decide whether to provide grants for work on adult stem cells or work on embryonic stems cells, which many scientists say holds greater promise but some in his party consider tantamount to abortion." Ehrlich, "who has supported stem cell research since his days in Congress," said, "The strong pro-life members know the administration does not share their views on this issue, but we wanted to try to lower the temperature on the politics. … I wanted to try to keep everyone's eye on the ball, and I believe this approach accomplishes that goal."

Republicans Say They Have Bipartisan Support For Stem-Cell Bill Filibuster. The Washington Times (1/26, Ward, 90K) reports that Democratic and GOP Maryland state senators on Wednesday vowed "to stop a bill that would promote the creation of embryos for research. 'If [Senate President Thomas V. Mike] Miller wants to do this extraordinary thing, he will get a filibuster that lasts as long as he wants it to last,' said Senate Minority Whip Andrew P. Harris, Baltimore County Republican. Senate Minority Leader J. Lowell Stoltzfus said he had more than the minimum 19 votes to filibuster. 'We think we have 20,' said Mr. Stoltzfus, an Eastern Shore Republican." The Times notes, "There are 14 Republicans in the 47-member Senate, which means six Democrats have agreed to filibuster. Sen. Paula C. Hollinger, Baltimore County Democrat, is sponsoring the Senate bill in support of embryonic stem-cell research for the second year. … 'I'm sure they will filibuster, and I'm sure we will round up the votes,' she said. Mrs. Hollinger also said she would fight for the bill and against the filibuster for 'as long as it takes.'"

Ford Released From Hospital. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 9, 0:10, Vargas) reported, "Gerald Ford was released from the hospital today. He spent the last 12 days being treated for pneumonia at the Eisenhower Medical Center near Rancho Mirage, California. His doctors say he is doing well."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 7, :45, Williams) added, "At 92, he is the oldest living former president. His spokesperson said he's doing well but it's safe to say doctors will be keeping a close eye on him."

The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Rosenblatt, 958K) reports, "Ford, 92, originally had been scheduled to leave Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage on Jan. 19, but doctors kept him for additional treatment."

Professors Say Maryland Wal-Mart Defeat Stems From Government-Employed Voters. Steve H. Hanke, professor of applied economics at Johns Hopkins University, and Stephen J.K. Walters, professor of economics at Loyola College in Maryland, write in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M), "The consequences of"

Maryland's "legislature's override of Republican Gov. Robert Ehrlich's veto of their 'Fair Share Health Care Act' on Jan. 12 will be tragic for some of the state's neediest residents." The reason for the override is that legislators "are simply eager for Big Labor's votes and money and therefore subservient to its interests." Estimates show "that as much as a third of the state's economic activity stems from federal employment and purchases," that "sector where revenues appear to arrive automatically and inefficiency never leads to bankruptcy," so "many Marylanders are simply unmindful of the necessities of survival in the private sector." This elects legislators who "often behave as if business is a problem to be solved." However, "legislators should be mindful that companies like Wal-Mart are not the enemy but rather front-line soldiers in a real war on poverty."

Hamas Wins Palestinian Elections; Government Resigns. The AP (1/26) reports this morning, "The Islamic militant group Hamas said Thursday it won control of the Palestinian parliament and officials from the ruling Fatah Party confirmed the estimate -- though Palestinian election officials delayed the release of preliminary official results." The claim by Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh "was based on reporting by Hamas activists who observed the counting in the polling stations, the group said. He said Hamas had won about 70 seats, enough for a majority in the 132-seat parliament. … Officials with Fatah also said that Hamas had won about 70 seats, which would give the Islamists a majority in the 132-seat parliament. They spoke on condition of anonymity because counting in some districts was continuing."

Meanwhile, CNN.com (1/26) reports, "In a stunning development ahead of official election results, Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qorie said he and the rest of the Palestinian Authority government will resign in the wake of militant group Hamas' apparent victory in historic elections. The announcement was an acknowledgment that election results showed Hamas had won a majority of seats in the 132-seat Palestinian Legislative Council, supplanting the ruling Fatah party." This announcement came before official election results had been released, CNN.com reported. According to the article, Qorie's office "said it will be up to Hamas to form a new government."

Previously, most reports had referred to exit polls showing a narrow Fatah win. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Leggett, 2.11M) reports that "according to Beir Zeit University's exit poll, the ruling Fatah party emerged victorious with 46% of the vote and Hamas captured about 40%, making its Reform and Change party the second-most popular among voters. Independent parties accounted for the difference. Final results are expected today." The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 5, 2:00, Schieffer) reported that "exit polls show that a militant group dedicated to Israel's destruction did very well, maybe even well enough to gain a role in the Palestinian government." NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 4, 1:30, Williams) showed Ali Zarbawi, Birzeit University saying, "Hamas will be an active opposition, a very strong opposition, but Fatah is going to lead the government."

USA Today (1/26, Gutman, 2.31M) adds "about 1 million Palestinians voted Wednesday in parliamentary elections that threaten to end the ruling Fatah Party's decade-long monopoly over Palestinian politics." The Washington Post (1/26, A1, Wilson, 744K) headlines its story "Hamas Makes Strong Showing In Vote," while the Washington Times (1/26, Mitnick, 90K) titles its reprot "Fatah Edges Hamas In Polls." The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Prusher, Mitnick, 61K) and Los Angeles Times (1/26, King, 958K) run similar reports.

Bush Touts Palestinian Elections But Says He Will Not Deal With Hamas. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site,, the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) reports, "President Bush, in an Oval Office interview, declared that he isn't ready yet to deal with the radical Palestinian Islamist group Hamas no matter how well it does in Wednesday's Palestinian elections. Speaking to The Wall Street Journal as Palestinians were electing a new parliament, Bush lauded the Middle Eastern trend toward democracy that produced Palestinian elections, but he said that Hamas isn't a suitable partner for diplomacy until it renounces its position calling for the destruction of Israel. 'A political party, in order to be viable, is one that professes peace, in my judgment, in order that it will keep the peace,' the president said. 'And so you're getting a sense of how I'm going to deal with Hamas if they end up in positions of responsibility. And the answer is: Not until you renounce your desire to destroy Israel will we deal with you.'"

The Washington Post (1/26, A19, Kessler, 744K) reports "yesterday's better-than-expected electoral showing by a group labeled a terrorist organization by the United States greatly complicates the administration's diplomacy in the region, U.S. officials said yesterday.' Hamas, "which is dedicated to the destruction of Israel, appears to have ridden a wave of popular disgust at the perceived corruption and incompetence of the ruling Fatah Party. Exit polls indicate Fatah will have only a slim edge over Hamas in the Palestinian Legislative Council, giving Hamas a strong claim to a role in the government." The results "suggested the risks inherent in the Bush administration's campaign to bring democracy to the Middle East." Administration spokesmen "officially celebrated the 'historic moment' for the Palestinians while officials privately reeled at the outcome."

All three network news programs briefly noted Bush's pledge the US would not deal with Hamas unless it renounces violence. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 2, 0:20, Woodruff) reported, "The Bush Administration declared the election 'historic' and called this 'a great day for the Palestinian people.' But President Bush made clear the US will not deal with Hamas, no matter how well it did in the election. He told 'The Wall Street Journal' today 'We view Hamas as a terrorist organization. We don't deal with Hamas. … I don't see that changing.'"

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 6, :30, Schieffer) reported, "Hamas may have won a lot of Palestinian votes, but they got no vote of confidence from President Bush in a 'Wall Street Journal' interview today. The President says he will not deal with Hamas unless the group renounces its call for Israel's destruction."

ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, lead story, 3:10, Woodruff) reported "Israel's new foreign minister holds out little hope." Israeli Foreign Minister Tsipy Livney: "The essence and the reasons of the existence of the Hamas is not because they want to gain some political gains in the conflict. They are talking about demolishing the state of Israel, to erase the state of Israel from earth."

NBC Nightly News (1/25, story 4, 1:30, Williams) in its coverage also noted, "President Bush told 'The Wall Street Journal' today he would not deal with Hamas unless it renounces its call for the destruction of Israel."

The New York Times (1/26, Erlanger, Myre, 1.19M) reports "the acting prime minister of Israel, Ehud Olmert, said his country could not accept a situation in which Hamas would be part of the Palestinian Authority if the group remained armed with unchanged goals."

Carter Hopes Hamas Will Moderate Stance And Renounce Violence. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, lead story, 3:10, Woodruff) reported, "What no one knows is if Hamas will change, now that it has gained political power. Former President Jimmy Carter came to monitor today's election elections. There are some that believe Hamas will be pragmatic." Former President Carter: "That's my hope. Everybody hopes Hamas will be pragmatic. Because one thing is, if not for their own benefit but maybe for the benefit of the people they represent. Because no doubt if Hamas is not, as you say, pragmatic, then there will be a reduction in foreign assistance."

The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 5, 2:00, Hawkins) reported "Former President Jimmy Carter, who is leading international election monitors here, says bringing Hamas into the system may soften its hard-line positions." Carter: "My hope is and my prayer is that this will be a moderating influence on Hamas, that they'll see the responsibility in the government itself that they will moderate their position, forgo violence and terrorist acts."

Sharon's Absence From Stage Said To Make Peace Process Uncertain. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 7, 2:00, Schieffer) reported that former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon's medical condition "leaves Israel with many unresolved matters, including that wall being built in the West Bank." CBS (Pizzey) added, "The most troublesome and obvious symbol of the unfinished business Ariel Sharon has left behind is the security wall separating Israelis and Palestinians on the West Bank. It wasn't Sharon's idea, but he made it a reality, an unplanned but now integral feature of the so-called road map that is supposed to lead to a peace deal. The problem for those who built on Sharon's legacies is that his plans and policies were like this wall: Only gaps that only he seemed to know how to fill."

Iran Open To Russian Enrichment Of Their Uranium. The Washington Post (1/26, Finn, 744K) reports that Ali Larijani, head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council," said "that his country was open to a compromise proposal from Russia that it enrich uranium for Iran on Russian soil," but added that that "the idea needed fine-tuning in advance of further talks scheduled for the middle of next month." The New York Times (1/26, Myers, 1.19M) adds that Larijani "indicated that no agreement had been reached and that significant details remained to be negotiated" and "warned that Iran would begin enriching uranium on an industrial scale if Iran's nuclear program was referred to the United Nations Security Council." His "remarks made it clear that further discussions on it would not take place until later in February, after the meeting at the atomic energy agency's headquarters in Vienna."

Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Rosen) reported that the head of Iran's national security council, "said in Moscow today Iran now takes a positive view of the so-called Russian proposal, which the Iranians previously rejected. The proposal would have Russia enrich uranium and ship the resulting nuclear fuel to Iran for nonmilitary use."

The AP (1/26, Gutterman) adds that President Bush said "Russia's proposal offered the best chance for resolving the impasse, adding 'it's important for us to exhaust all diplomacy' in dealing with Iran."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/26) says "Chief negotiator Ali Larijani also reiterated Iran's threat to renew enrichment activities if it is referred to the United Nations Security Council." The Washington Times (1/26, 90K) runs the same AP story. The Washington Post (1/26, A21, Finn, 744K) runs a similar report under the headline "Iran Says It Is Open To Russian Plan On Nuclear Program," while the New York Times (1/26, Myers, 1.19M) titles its report "Iran Welcomes Russia's Offer To Enrich Uranium Jointly; Details Remain."

Iran's Non-Cooperation Said To Be At Heart Of The Standoff. Knight Ridder (1/26, Landay) reports, "Iran's…obfuscation, conflicting answers and stonewalling on…the enrichment program are at the heart of the crisis over its nuclear program." It is "only by reconstructing the complete history and extent of Iran's nuclear work" that the

IAEA can "determine the truth. So far, that's been impossible," and while "Iran has filled some gaps and is promising to fill the rest," IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei said "in a Nov. 18 report to the IAEA board…that 'there still remain issues to be resolved' and Iran's 'full transparency is ... long overdue.'"

Blix Says Bush Administration Overemphasizing Possible Military Action. Fox News' Special Report (1/25, Rosen) reported that "one of the world's best-known weapons inspectors, one who clashed with the Bush Administration before, is criticizing it again now for its approach in the current standoff. Hans Blix, the chief UN weapons inspector in Iraq prior to the war, argued the Administration is overemphasizing the potential for US military interaction in Iran."

Washington Backs Off Linking Iran Vote To India Nuclear Deal. The AFP (1/26) reports, "Washington moved to unlink a landmark US-India civilian nuclear deal with how New Delhi votes on the Iranian nuclear question at a key meeting of the UN atomic watchdog agency." The US Ambassador to India, David Mulford, "had warned Wednesday that a historic deal giving American nuclear technology to India might fall through if New Delhi did not vote against Iran at the February 2-3 meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA)." However, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "we deal with the Indian Government on these two issues as separate issues."

Reuters (1/25) added that "Mulford, told the Press Trust of India news agency that if India decided not to vote against Iran, 'the effect on members of the U.S. Congress with regard to the civil nuclear initiative will be devastating.'" He was also quoted "as saying the deal would 'die,'"

The AP (1/26, Rosenberg) adds, "The State Department in Washington said later that Mulford wasn't speaking for the U.S. government."

Reuters (1/26, Hafezi) also covered this story.

US Envoy Says China's US's Approach To Iran Differ. The New York Times (1/26, Kahn, 1.19M) reports, "China and the United States want to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, but their 'approach may differ' on the best tactics to achieve that result, Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick said after a round of meetings on the subject in Beijing." He also "called the diplomatic discussions fluid and said there were still differences over what steps should be taken to respond to what Western powers say is a covert program by Iran to build nuclear bombs." This suggests "hat China, despite heavy lobbying, had left some doubts as to whether it is prepared to back a proposal…to get the United Nations Security Council involved in deciding how to handle Iran's nuclear program."

Annan Doesn't Expect IAEA To Be Ready In February To Refer Iran To Security Council. Reuters (1/26, Leopold) reports, "U.N. chief Kofi Annan said on Wednesday he doubted that a U.N. nuclear watchdog would be able to come to a decision by early February on referring Iran to the Security Council over its nuclear programme," adding that "Mohamed ElBaradei, the director-general of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, did not expect to have a report on Iran ready until the end of February, for the IAEA's regular board meeting in March."

Iran Accuses British Military Of Aiding Bombers. The Washington Post/Reuters (1/26, A17) reports, "Iran accused the British military on Wednesday of cooperating with bombers who killed eight people in southwest Iran, an allegation Britain described as ludicrous. A little-known group campaigning for independence for Iran's Arab minority asserted responsibility in a Web statement for Tuesday's attacks on a bank and government building in the oil city of Ahvaz." Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki "said that London's involvement was clear and that Tehran would make strong protests." A spokesman in British Prime Minister Tony Blair's office "said Iran's allegation 'deserves to be treated with scorn by the whole international community.'"

UN Peacekeepers To Maintain Monitoring Of Israeli-Lebanese Border. The New York Times/Reuters (1/26) reports, "The members of the United Nations Security Council have agreed that United Nations peacekeepers should keep monitoring the Israeli-Lebanese border for six more months, the current Council president said on Wednesday." Lebanon wanted "a renewal of the mandate of the United Nations' peacekeeping mission for the border area for a year, until Jan. 31, 2007." Yet "the 15 Security Council members instead reached a consensus on an extension until July 31."

Frist Says US, International Community Must "Ramp Up The Pressure" On Syria. In a New York Sun (1/26) op-ed, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist writes, "A year ago this month, a car bomb killed the former Lebanese prime minister, Rafic Hariri. An ongoing U.N. investigation has implicated the Syrian government in the murder. The Syrian president, Bashar al-Assad, may have played a personal role. Several additional high-profile bombings have occurred in the last several months. Enough is enough: Syria's actions in Lebanon have proven that it has no desire to play by the rules of civilized nations. Now, the United States and its partners need to ramp up the pressure on Damascus. We need to push Syria away from its homegrown brand of Arab fascism and toward democracy, peace, and an authentic end to its interference with Lebanon's affairs. We should start by increasing and expanding our funding for prodemocracy groups in Lebanon and Syria. In the coming Congress, I plan to support legislation that will do just that."

Bush Administration Criticizes Mexico's Plan To Distribute Border Maps. Following an announcement Tuesday by Mexico's National Human Rights Commission that it will print and distribute maps showing immigrants the safest routes to cross the border into Arizona, Mexican President Vicente Fox distanced his government from the group, saying that it was an "autonomous commission." However, the Washington Times (1/26, Kralev, Seper, 90K) reports, "The Bush administration yesterday accused the Mexican government of facilitating illegal entry into the United States after Mexican officials said they would distribute maps of dangerous border areas and posters with safety instructions and other tips. … 'We oppose in the strongest terms the publication of maps to aid those who wish to enter the United States illegally,' said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. 'It is a bad idea to encourage migrants to undertake this highly dangerous and ultimately futile effort.'" Meanwhile, "Rafael Laveaga, spokesman for the Mexican Embassy in Washington, said the NHRC is an independent body and receives no government funds."

Hutchison, Border Sheriff Seek Investigation Of Suspected Mexican Military Incursions. The Washington Times (1/26, Seper, 90K) reports Zapata County Sheriff Sigifredo Gonzalez Jr., who heads the Texas Sheriff's Border Coalition, demanded yesterday "that the US and Mexican governments investigate incursions into the United States by heavily armed drug escorts dressed in Mexican military uniforms 'before someone gets killed.'" He "said a growing number of suspected incursions and violence aimed at the area's law-enforcement officers is making the border 'a pretty dangerous place.'" Also yesterday, "Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas Republican, said she was 'deeply concerned' about the possible incursions and asked Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to 'fully investigate this matter and report to Congress the details and confirm whether or not Mexican military officials were involved. … The Mexican government has denied that the men in any of the incidents were soldiers, saying that some drug smugglers dress in military-style uniforms, carry automatic weapons and drive military-style vehicles."

Kyl Says Border Encounters "Undermine Efforts" To Keep Drugs Out Of US. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Marosi, Lopez, Connell, 958K) reports, "Armed Mexican government personnel made unauthorized incursions into the United States five times in the last three months of 2005, including one incident last month in Southern California, according to confidential Department of Homeland Security records. … The records obtained by The Times provide new details on more than a dozen incursions into the US, including the five most recent ones." Meanwhile, "US Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar said "that incursions have declined by more than 50% since 2002. Still, with assault rates against agents at record highs, any incursion is taken 'very seriously.' However, "US Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) said in an interview Wednesday that this week's incident in Texas was 'about as serious as it gets' and noted that dozens of reported incursions have occurred in his state. The encounters seriously undermine efforts to stop the flow of drugs coming across the US border and suggest possible cooperation among Mexican authorities and traffickers, he said."

Mexico Said To Be Helping US Secure Southern Border From Terrorists. Meanwhile, the Christian Science Monitor (1/26, Bowers, 61K) reports, "A top priority of the United States government is to prevent a determined terrorist from crossing the US- Mexico border. It is also becoming a primary mission for Mexico - and the first place it's focusing on is the 375-mile, desolate stretch of land that abuts Arizona. In addition to sharing intelligence and cooperating on investigations with its US counterparts in Arizona, Mexico last year set up three checkpoints along known human-smuggling routes on its side of the border and plans to add two more. Between August, when the checkpoints became operational, and December, Mexican officials stopped 1,277 non-Mexicans (OTMs, for 'other than Mexicans') from crossing into Arizona, according to a Mexican government report obtained by the Monitor. The report shows that most of the OTMs came from Central and South America, but seven are listed as Iraqis." Meanwhile, "the US government is apprehending record numbers of illegal immigrants on the Arizona side of the border."

State Legislators Considering Immigration Legislation. USA Today (1/26, Cauchon, 2.31M) reports, "Frustrated by slow action in Congress, state legislatures are debating whether to increase border enforcement at their own expense, fine employers who use undocumented workers and get local police involved in deporting them." However, "like Congress, legislatures are divided on what to do about the estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants who provide a low-wage workforce in the USA." It "is one of the hottest issues as 37 legislatures convene this month. Last year, states considered 300 immigration laws and approved 40." Meanwhile, "Congress is considering changes to immigration policies — a border fence, a guest worker program — but it's uncertain whether action will be taken this year."

Provision Of Immigration Bill Compared To Nazi Practice. Andrew S. Grove, a member of the board of overseers of the International Rescue Committee, in an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (1/26, A10, 2.11M) writes that the recently passed "Sensenbrenner-King" immigration bill "scares me because it has the potential of turning neighbor against neighbor -- and of changing our country into a place of fear and mistrust. … The bill contains a provision punishing anyone who 'assists, [or] encourages . . . a person who . . . lacks lawful authority to remain in the United States' to remain here." Grove states, "This could change the nature of our society in a way that I have seen firsthand. As a Jewish child hiding from the Nazis in Hungary, I saw how the persecution of non-Jewish Hungarians who hid their Jewish friends or neighbors cast a wide blanket of fear over everyone. This fear led to mistrust, and mistrust led to hostility, until neighbors turned upon neighbors in order to protect themselves. Is this what we want?"

Mexican Presidential Candidate Seeks To Boost Profile. The New York Times (1/26, McKinley, 1.19M) reports on Mexican presidential candidate Felipe Calderón's efforts to succeed President Vicente Fox. After "a bitter primary fight last year, Mr. Calderón transformed himself from a little-known former energy commissioner into the best hope for the president's right-of-center party. He is running a strong second in most opinion polls to the leftist former mayor of Mexico City, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, and many political strategists say he has a chance to win the election on July 2." Yet, "outside the capital's opinion-makers and party insiders, surveys show that one in five Mexican voters still do not know who Mr. Calderón is, and as the presidential campaign officially kicked off last week, he made his first tour to try to change that."

Musharraf Vows To Construct Natural-Gas Pipeline To Iran. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Champion, Kempe, 2.11M) reports, "Pakistani president Pervez Musharraf "said his country would build a planned natural-gas pipeline from Iran without India's participation if talks among the three nations continue to produce no result." His "threat came at a delicate time for Gen. Pervez Musharraf, while he is having to balance domestic public opinion and relations with the U.S., India and Iran." At the World Economic Forum he "said Pakistan had opened bilateral talks with Tehran to build a gas pipeline that would run from Iran." But India has "expressed concern about recent attacks on existing gas and power lines in Baluchistan, the region of South Western Pakistan through which a pipeline from Iran would pass. Gen. Musharraf played down the threat posed by Baluchistan militants, dismissing the conflict as limited to one isolated local tribe." His "tough line on the pipeline talks contrasts with that of his prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, while in New York last week."

OPEC Will Refrain From Cutting Oil Output. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Bahree, 2.11M) reports that OPEC "is widely expected to refrain from trimming output levels when its oil ministers meet in Vienna next week, but Iran remains a wild card." The Journal notes, "With the price of oil nearing records recently, an OPEC decision to continue pumping oil at close to capacity should reassure markets of plentiful supply, something Saudi Arabia appears to favor and the U.S. seems to be counting on. In short, there is no economic incentive for OPEC to trim output when market forces have sent billions of extra dollars pouring into the coffers of oil-rich countries anyway." But Iran "could use the OPEC meeting to send a warning to Western Europe and the U.S., both big oil importers." Meanwhile, "U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman says he has been in regular contact with oil producers. 'By and large, they seem to be understanding that we have a situation where there needs to be more oil rather than less oil in the world,' Mr. Bodman said this week."

South Korea Ignores US Call For Action On North Korean Financial Activity. The Washington Times (1/26, Salmon, 90K) reports, "A day after the United States urged South Korea to take an active stance against what it contends are North Korea's illicit financial activities, Seoul refused to say whether it would take action and made clear it opposed any attempt at regime change in Pyongyang." South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun said, "When it comes to the North Korean regime, raising issues about it or pressuring it or sometimes wishing for its collapse, on that position of some Americans, we do not agree." The Times notes, "By 'some Americans,' Mr. Roh appeared to be referring to hard-liners in the Bush administration who favor toppling North Korean strongman Kim Jong-il."

US, South Korea Close To Reaching Free Trade Deal. The Washington Post (1/26, D6, Blustein, 744K) reports, "The United States and South Korea are very close to launching negotiations for a free-trade agreement, which would be the most economically significant free-trade pact for Washington since the North American Free Trade Agreement." Yet "both sides have been reluctant to start formal talks until they are reasonably confident that the negotiations would end in agreement. South Korea's farmers are bitterly opposed to opening their country's agricultural markets, and their political clout could scuttle a deal." While "plans to launch the U.S.-Korea talks could still founder, officials and other sources who have spoken recently with negotiators said an announcement is likely to materialize before long. Asked about the prospects, one administration official replied, 'How do you say 'soon' in Korean?'" And "Rob Portman, the U.S. trade representative, heightened the speculation Friday when he told reporters, 'We'll be announcing some additional [free-trade agreement] partners soon. As I think you will notice, they will not be with small economies because I do think we need to move on to some larger economies.'"

"Gas War" Between Russia And Ukraine Leads To European Shortages. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, White, Crawford, 2.11M) reports, "Bickering over natural-gas shipments intensified between Moscow and Kiev has reduced supplies of Russian gas to Europe, led to shortages in several countries and fueled energy-security anxieties across a continent gripped by an arctic cold snap." Few experts "expect a repeat of Russia's New Year's gas cutoff to Ukraine. … But as details of the Jan. 4 deal have emerged, doubts have grown about whether it sets the stable foundation for supplies and exports to Europe that its backers claim." Despite reassurances from both countries, "the two sides yesterday failed to reach agreement on the details of implementing the Jan. 4 compromise, intended to halt what is known as the 'gas war' in the region."

Putin Claims Alleged British Spies Linked To NGOs. The Washington Post (1/26, A16, Finn, 744K) reports, "Russian President Vladimir Putin on Wednesday linked the scandal to foreign financing of nongovernmental organizations in Russia, a connection that grass-roots activists say is tangential and being used to smear their work." Putin said, "The situation is regrettable, as we have seen, when attempts are made to use secret services to work with nongovernmental organizations and when financing is carried out through secret services' channels." The UK government "has refused to comment on the espionage charges, but has denied it was doing anything illegal with nongovernmental organizations." And "Russian authorities have so far presented no evidence that the alleged spy ring recruited human rights activists." Yet the claims have been "seized on by many Russian politicians. The lower house of parliament, by a vote of 401 to 6, passed a resolution Wednesday condemning the involvement of foreign intelligence services with the private groups."

The New York Times (1/26, Myers, 1.19M) notes, "Putin's "remarks intensified a furor" that "could worsen relations with Britain and other countries as Russia presses its assault on European and American financial support of groups that criticize the Kremlin." Putin "said Russia was still considering whether to expel the four diplomats, all mid-ranking secretaries in the British Embassy, indicating for the first time that they had not yet been expelled or withdrawn, though the espionage that was alleged was reported to have been uncovered last fall."

Google Complies With Chinese Censorship. The CBS Evening News (1/25, story 10, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "Google has launched a new search engine today in China, but in order to do it, it had to agree to restrictions from the communist government." CBS (Gonzales) added, "Just last week, Google stood up to another government, the US government, and refused to turn over personal information the Justice Department wants for its defense of an anti-pornography law." Larry Magid, CBS technology analyst: "The fact that they're making a strong, stand firm with the Justice Department over privacy and then being very loose with the Chinese over censorship, I find a little bit disturbing." Gonzales: "Both decisions actually make good business sense for Google. The company can't afford to spook American users, and it has to get a foothold in the world's largest market."

GOP Lawmaker To Question Google's Move. The Financial Times (1/26, Kirchgaessner) reports, "Google will be called to task in Washington next month following a controversial decision by the internet search engine to launch a China-based version of its website that will censor results to avoid angering the country's Communist government." Rep. Chris Smith's decision "to call for a February 16 hearing to examine the operating procedures of US internet companies in China, represents the first signs of what could become a serious backlash against Google and other internet companies in Washington that are perceived as capitulating to the Chinese government."

Zoellick Sends Message About Strengthening US Relations With China. The Washington Post (1/26, A16, Cody, 744K) reports that deputy secretary of state Robert Zoellick's appearance with a Chinese panda "was seen at least in part as a signal to China about where he wants to steer U.S.-Chinese relations. The official New China News Agency received his message 10-4. It immediately transmitted a happy photo of Zoellick and Jing Jing around the country, illustrating the government's view that good U.S.-China relations are essential and, in fact, getting better and better." His "gesture, in another reading, could also be seen as a signal of where he stands in the Washington debate about China. Interpreted that way, becoming a public panda-hugger was an eloquent endorsement of the view that engagement with Beijing is the best path for the United States and that China's emergence as an Asian power does not have to mean conflict in the Pacific." Zoellick's trip "also included specific talks on issues that could be seen as a test of the U.S.-Chinese engagement his panda photo was meant to symbolize. These, he said, included China's stand on the effort to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, China's role in diplomacy to persuade North Korea to eliminate its nuclear weapons program and China's currency policies at a time of soaring U.S. trade deficits."

Concerns Raised Chinese Economic Growth May Be Too Rapid. The Washington Post (1/26, D1, Goodman, 744K) reports, "Led by surging exports, China's economy grew by 9.9 percent last year, the government announced Wednesday, underscoring the swiftness by which this once insular communist country has remade itself into a global trading power." But "the news also increased concern that China could be growing too fast, despite measures aimed at cooling the hottest parts of the economy. Aggressive investment has produced too many factories, heightening trade tensions with the United States as China exports surplus wares such as steel, depressing prices globally. Chinese officials worry that unneeded plants could deliver a crippling era of deflation -- falling prices -- which hurts profits and reduces incentives for companies to invest. Such a syndrome kept Japan mired in recession and unemployment for much of the past 16 years."

Report Suggests China Has Fewer AIDS Cases. The New York Times (1/26, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "China countered the long-held suspicion that it has undercounted the number of people with H.I.V. and AIDS by releasing a new, more extensive estimate on Wednesday that found the opposite: that the country had actually overestimated its number of cases." The new WHO and United Nations AIDS program report "lowered the country's estimated number of H.I.V. and AIDS cases to 650,000 from the official figure of 840,000 released by the government in 2003. Many experts and AIDS workers have long believed that China has at least 1.5 million cases, possibly far more, and some expressed skepticism that the new figure was any more reliable than past estimates."

European Commission Proposes "Nordic-Style" Economic Reforms. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, Echikson, 2.11M) reports, "The European Commission presented a new plan to reinvigorate Europe's economies, calling for a Nordic-style, seemingly social-democratic approach rather than an Anglo-Saxon free-market model." The report "gave the most praise to northern European countries that are increasing spending on research and development universities and pursuing interventionist jobs policies." It "also called for the creation of a competitive, continent-wide energy program, and support for small and medium-size businesses." It represents Commission President José Manuel Barroso's attempt to recover the initiative after a tough first year in office. Many of his previous plans for jump-starting Europe's economies have faltered."

Sri Lankan Factions To Resume Peace Talks. The New York Times (1/26, Senanayake, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports, "In a measure of how intractable this country's ethnic conflict is, the warring parties agreed Wednesday to begin talking to each other again, after more than 18 months of deadlock over a site for peace talks and with scores of killings in the meantime." The negotiations "would focus on strengthening an all-but-ineffectual four-year-old cease-fire agreement. They are scheduled to take place in Geneva, starting as early as February." While "modest," the agreement "represents a major breakthrough in the decade-long war."

African Worshipers Mix Islam With Christianity. The Christian Science Monitor (1/26, McLaughlin, 61K) reports that "worshipers at 'The True Message of God Mission' say it's entirely natural for Christianity and Islam to coexist, even overlap. They begin their worship by praying at the Jesus alcove and then 'running their deliverance' - sprinting laps around the mosque's mosaic-tiled courtyard, praying to the one God for forgiveness and help. They say it's akin to Israelites circling the walls of Jericho - and Muslims swirling around the Ka'ba shrine in Mecca." The group represents "a window on an ongoing religious ferment in Africa. It's still up for debate whether this group, and others like it, could become models for Muslim-Christian unity worldwide or whether they're uniquely African. But either way, they are 'part of a trend,' says Dana Robert, a Boston University religion professor."

Villagers Flee Nigerian Troops. The New York Times/Reuters (1/26) reports, "Villagers fled Nigeria's lawless delta on Wednesday amid fears of military reprisals after a wave of attacks on foreign oil companies by ethnic Ijaw militiamen." Reuters adds, "The army deployed more troops to major installations, and oil companies tightened security around offices a day after heavily armed men stormed the headquarters of the Italian oil firm Agip, robbing a bank on the premises and killing eight policemen and a civilian."

Annan Denies Arranging Deal For Son's Car. The Los Angeles Times (1/26, Farley, 958K) reports that after his son, Kojo Annan, agreed to reimburse Ghana for the import duties on a car he misidentified as belonging to his father, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan "welcomed news of his son's move. 'It was the right thing to do. … He knew I wanted him to sort it out, clean it up. It was between him, his lawyer and the government." Asked if "he, as secretary-general, secured the tax break for his son, Annan said, 'Absolutely not. It was done behind my back.'"

Former Surfer Volunteers For International Disaster Relief. ABC's World News Tonight (1/25, story 11, 2:20, Wright) reported, "The remarkable story of one American making so much of a difference. He was a laidback, California surfer, until he saw the damage done by the tsunami" ABC (Wright): "If relief organizations had special forces, Matt George would be a Green Beret. He's a one-man trauma ward, in what may be the coldest clinic on earth. A builder doing what he calls extreme home makeovers. And he delivers supplies where no aid workers have gone before."

Pinochet's Daughter Seeks Asylum In US. The Washington Post (1/26, A20, Reel, Constable, 744K) reports, "The oldest daughter of the former Chilean dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet was detained Wednesday at Dulles International Airport outside Washington, where she requested political asylum, a Chilean official said." Lucia Pinochet "had been served with a subpoena over the weekend in Chile, along with her mother and three siblings. They had been ordered to appear in court on Monday…on tax fraud charges connected to a probe of her father's illegal bank accounts." A DHS spokesman "said she was in U.S. custody at the airport in Virginia 'pending resolution of her immigration status.'" And "Chile's Interior Minister, Francisco Vidal, said U.S. Ambassador Craig Kelly informed his government that Pinochet, sought on an international arrest warrant, had requested asylum. U.S. officials said they could not comment on that issue."

Success Of Bush Allies In War In Iraq Contrasted With Opponents' Downfall. Columnist Mark Steyn in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) writes, "Remember the conventional wisdom of 2004? Back then, you'll recall, it was the many members of George Bush's 'unilateral' coalition who were supposed to be in trouble, not least the three doughty warriors of the Anglosphere -- the president, Tony Blair and John Howard -- who would all be paying a terrible electoral price for lying their way into war in Iraq. The Democrats' position was that Mr. Bush's rinky-dink nickel-&-dime allies didn't count: The president has 'alienated almost everyone,' said Jimmy Carter, 'and now we have just a handful of little tiny countries supposedly helping us in Iraq.' (That would be Britain, Australia, Poland, Japan . . .) Instead of those nobodies, John Kerry pledged that, under his leadership, 'America will rejoin the community of nations' -- by which he meant Jacques Chirac, Gerhard Schröder, the Belgian guy." But now "Bush, Blair, Howard and Koizumi are all re-elected, while Mr. Chirac is the lamest of lame ducks, and his ingrate citizenry have tossed out his big legacy, the European Constitution; Mr. Schröder's government was defeated and he's now shilling for Russia's state-owned Gazprom ('It's all about Gaz!'); and the latest member of the coalition of the unwilling to hit the skids is Canada's Liberal Party, which fell from office on Monday. John Kerry may have wanted to 'rejoin the community of nations.' Instead, 'the community of nations' has joined John Kerry, windsurfing off Nantucket in electric-yellow buttock-hugging Lycra, or whatever he's doing these days."

WSJournal Honors Memory Of Free Market Leader Of Hong Kong. The Wall Street Journal (1/26, 2.11M) editorializes, "Hong Kong's prosperity since World War II is sometimes referred to as a 'miracle.' But miracles require the intervention of a deity, whereas Hong Kong's remarkable economic growth between 1945 and its handover to China in 1997 owes a great deal to the nonintervention of a mortal man, John James Cowperthwaite, who died over the weekend at the age of 90." As Financial Secretary from 1961-1971, Cowperthwaite "was the architect and guardian of the greatest natural experiment in free-market capitalism in the postwar world." The Journal concludes, "Other would-be central planners could learn a lot from what John Cowperthwaite didn't do."

NYTimes Applauds African Union Rejection Of Sudan Leadership. The New York Times (1/26, 1.19M) editorializes, "The African Union did the right thing in rejecting Sudan's bid for the rotating presidency of the organization. Allowing President Omar Hassan al-Bashir of Sudan to become Africa's face to the world would have sent just about every wrong message imaginable." But while "rebuffed for now, Mr. Bashir was promised the group's presidency in 2007, and for now the chair will go to the Congo Republic, hardly a model of human rights. Giving Sudan the African Union presidency next year will be just as unacceptable as it was this year."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter To Grill Gonzales On Spy Program (PPG)

By Michael Mcgough, Post-gazette National Bureau

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- If Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales thought he might be spared tough questioning from Republican senators when he testifies about the warrantless wiretapping of Americans thought to be in contact with foreign terrorists, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., yesterday disabused him of that notion.

In a letter sent to the attorney general and shared with the press, the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee propounded a series of questions that in a courtroom setting might be called "leading" and requested that Mr. Gonzales answer them in his opening statement before the committee on Feb. 6.

The combative nature of the letter wasn't altered by the fact that the printed salutation to "Attorney General Gonzales" was replaced by a hand-written "Al."

The letter honed in on the Bush administration's assertion-ridiculed by critics -- that Congress empowered the president to engage in electronic surveillance of Americans without a court order when it passed a resolution after the Sept. 11 2001, attacks authorizing him to "use all necessary and appropriate force" against terrorists.

Mr. Specter asked: "In interpreting whether Congress intended to amend the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act by the Sept. 14, 2001, resolution, would it be relevant on the issue of congressional intent that the administration did not specifically ask for an expansion for executive powers under FISA?"

Mr. Specter further asked: "If Congress had intended to amend FISA by the resolution, wouldn't Congress have specifically acted to [do so] as Congress did in passing the Patriot Act giving the executive expanded powers and greater flexibility in using 'roving' wiretaps?"

Mr. Specter also made it clear he would press Mr. Gonzales about the administration's other legal rationale for the surveillance -- that it flowed from Mr. Bush's constitutional authority as commander-in-chief.

On this point, Mr. Specter asked: "isn't President Carter's signature on FISA in 1978, together with his signing statement, an explicit renunciation of any claim to inherent executive authority under Article II of the Constitution to conduct warrantless domestic surveillance?"

In what might be the most ticklish question for Mr. Gonzales, Mr. Specter said he would ask if the administration would be willing belatedly to seek approval from the FISA court for "the ongoing surveillance program at issue."

In posing these other questions, Mr. Specter made it clear that Democrats won't be the only members of the committee to grill Mr. Gonzales about the rationale for the NSA program. That will make it harder for the administration to portray criticism of the operation as partisan.

On Tuesday, before the committee voted on the Supreme Court nomination of Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr., Mr. Specter was praised by Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., for scheduling hearings on the NSA program.

Mr. Leahy, the ranking Democrat on the panel, said that "most committees in the Senate have been unwilling to hold hearings because of the pressure from the White House."

Lawmakers Seek Details On Administration's Spying (NJTD)

By Sarah Lai Stirland, National Journal's Technology Daily

National Journal's Technology Daily, January 25, 2006

Pressure mounted on the Bush administration Wednesday to provide lawmakers with answers on domestic spying activities.

DOJ_NMG_0011835

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., released a three-page letter with detailed questions to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on the president's decision in 2002 to secretly authorize domestic wiretaps without warrants.

The letter includes many of the questions that constitutional scholars have been posing about the president's order, and several questions could put Gonzales in an awkward position.

Specter's Tuesday letter asked Gonzales why the president did not ask lawmakers to include the authority to conduct such surveillance as part of the USA PATRIOT Act. Congress passed the legislation shortly after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, specifically to loosen legal standards governing terrorist investigations.

The letter also asks Gonzales to justify the administration's selective briefing of particular members of Congress, rather than of all of the members of the House and Senate Intelligence committees, as required by law.

At the same time, Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee demanded that Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., hold a business meeting so the committee can vote to investigate several aspects of the administration's domestic spying.

Under committee rules, Roberts is obligated to hold a meeting if at least five members formally ask for one. All seven Democrats on the panel signed the request to Roberts.

A majority vote is needed to move ahead with the investigation. Two Republicans on the committee, Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia Snowe of Maine, have asked Roberts for a hearing on the matter. Roberts has said nothing publicly about holding a hearing. A press call asking whether the senator plans for any hearings was not returned by press time.

Also on Wednesday, a group of Democrats, including Sens. Richard Durbin of Illinois and Charles Schumer of New York, sent a letter to President Bush asking him for specific changes in the law that he believes are necessary to permit effective surveillance of suspected terrorists.

When asked whether they were posing the questions so new provisions could be included in pending legislation to reauthorize the USA PATRIOT Act, a spokesman for Durbin replied: "No. that's because we believe that the president is breaking the law, and we would rather have him not do that."

The spokesman added, "If [Bush] feels that he doesn't have the tools he needs, he has an obligation under the Constitution to come to Congress."

In a speech delivered at National Security Agency headquarters at Fort Meade, Md., President Bush sounded defiant.

"I'll continue to reauthorize this program for so long as our country faces a continuing threat from al Qaeda and related groups," he said. "This enemy still wants to do harm to the American people. We cannot let the fact that we have not been attacked lull us into the illusion that the threats to our nation have disappeared."

Senators Questioning Spy Program (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

The Baltimore Sun, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- On a day when President Bush visited the National Security Agency to defend its warrantless eavesdropping operation, questions mounted about the administration's legal justifications for the program.

A key Republican senator took issue with Bush's defense of the operation, which was secretly authorized by the president after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and targets some communications inside the United States. Also, new reports surfaced suggesting that the administration had rejected an earlier proposal in Congress that would have made it easier to obtain court approval for domestic wiretapping.

In a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter took issue with major themes of Bush's legal defense of the program, including that Congress gave implicit approval for it in a 2001 resolution authorizing the use of force against terrorists.

Specter, who has called Gonzales to testify at hearings into the NSA surveillance activities, asked the attorney general to answer more than a dozen questions about the legal reasoning behind the operation. Among them: why Bush sidestepped a 1978 law requiring approval by a secret court for most domestic wiretaps; why the administration did not ask for express authority to carry out the program; and how the administration can justify briefing only eight members of Congress about the activities when the law requires that congressional committees be kept up to date on intelligence matters.

The letter from Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, asked Gonzales to appear for a full day of testimony at the hearings, scheduled to open Feb. 6. Specter was particularly pointed in questioning whether it actually was Congress' intent to let Bush circumvent the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which generally requires warrants for domestic surveillance.

ßsubhed 'Necessary' force

Bush contends the post-9/11 resolution, which authorized the use of "all necessary and appropriate force" to pursue al-Qaida, extends to wiretapping terrorist communications that originate or end inside the United States.

Still, legal experts and several lawmakers in both parties have questioned why Bush did not seek court approval for the program, or ask that the standards of the 1978 law be relaxed, if necessary, to accommodate it. Late last year, Gonzales said officials determined that such an expansion was "not something that we could likely get" from Congress.

But the Bush administration opposed loosening FISA's legal standards in 2002, when Republican Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio introduced legislation that would have done so for wiretaps on non-U.S. persons. The change might not be necessary and could be unconstitutional, James A. Baker, the Justice Department intelligence counsel, testified on Capitol Hill in July 2002.

The issue is important to the raging debate over the legality of the NSA program, which operates without such warrants, since Bush and his top advisors argue that the secret authorization was needed because the FISA approval process is too unwieldy for intelligence officers tracking terrorist communications.

To obtain a domestic wiretap warrant through the FISA court, authorities must show "probable cause." In his 2002 testimony, Baker questioned whether relaxing the standard to "reasonable suspicion" would pass constitutional muster.

"If the current standard has not posed an obstacle, then there may be little to gain from the lower standard and, as I previously stated, perhaps much to lose," he said.

A Justice Department spokesman said there was no contradiction between Baker's statement and the administration's position on the NSA program. Officials carrying out the surveillance program operate on a "reasonable basis to believe" standard, which is similar to "probable cause," and a higher threshold than "reasonable suspicion," said Brian Roehrkasse, the spokesman.

"The legal standards are essentially the same; however, when time is of the essence, interposing additional layers of review sacrifices critical speed and agility," Roehrkasse said.

National security lawyers, however, view "probable cause" as a higher standard than "reasonable basis to believe."

Bush pressed ahead with his campaign to quell public anxiety about the program during a visit to the NSA's Fort Meade headquarters, painting his critics as weak-kneed in the face of terrorist threats. "There's some in America who say, 'Well, this can't be true [that] there are still people willing to attack,'" Bush said. "Listen to the words of Osama bin Laden and take him seriously. When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it."

Flanked by senior advisors and Lt. Gen. Keith B. Alexander, the NSA director, Bush spoke to reporters from outside the NSA's Threat Operations Center, a high-tech hub of activity with a video wall displaying snippets of the vast amounts of information the agency collects and crunches. Earlier, in a portion of his visit that was closed to reporters, Bush addressed NSA employees. His remarks were beamed to agency personnel around the world, including in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Democrats pounced on Bush's NSA visit Wednesday to criticize the operation. "I regret that President Bush has chosen to use NSA, and its hard-working employees, as a photo opportunity for his own political purposes," Maryland Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski said. "Instead he should be working to sort out the complicated issues surrounding his domestic spying program."

Democratic Rep. Elijah E. Cummings of Baltimore said Bush should focus on helping Americans without jobs, health insurance or access to a quality education, rather than speaking out on the spying program.

"I urge our president to open his eyes and address the nation's immediate needs instead of defending the illegal action of listening in on private telephone conversations," Cummings said in a statement.

Republicans sent word to millions of supporters, asking them to rally behind the program in letters to newspapers and calls to radio shows and lawmakers. In an e-mail, National Republican Chairman Ken Mehlman accused Democrats of "deliberately distorting the truth" about the operation, and urged Republicans to "separate fact from fiction."

Democrats' letter

DOJ_NMG_0011837

A group of Democratic senators released a letter to Bush that accused the president of breaking the law through the eavesdropping program. They called on him to tell Congress by Feb. 1 what changes he would seek in current law to carry it out.

"If you or officials in your administration believe that FISA, or any law, does not give you enough authority to combat terrorism, you should propose changes in the law to Congress. You may not simply disregard the law," wrote the group, including Sens. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Harry Reid of Nevada, the minority leader.

A request by Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the top Intelligence Committee Democrat, for prompt hearings on the NSA program touched off a testy exchange of letters between him and Sen. Pat Roberts of Kansas, the panel's Republican chairman, with each accusing the other of playing politics with the issue.

House Intelligence Committee Democrats, too, renewed their calls for hearings on the NSA program. Also, Senate Democrats called on Specter to widen the scope of the Judiciary Committee hearings by calling current and former administration officials, including Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff.

White House Dismissed '02 Surveillance Proposal (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

The Bush administration rejected a 2002 Senate proposal that would have made it easier for FBI agents to obtain surveillance warrants in terrorism cases, concluding that the system was working well and that it would likely be unconstitutional to lower the legal standard.

The proposed legislation by Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) would have allowed the FBI to obtain surveillance warrants for non-U.S. citizens if they had a "reasonable suspicion" they were connected to terrorism -- a lower standard than the "probable cause" requirement in the statute that governs the warrants.

The administration has contended that it launched a secret program of warrantless domestic eavesdropping by the National Security Agency in part because of the time it takes to obtain such secret warrants from federal judges under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA).

The wiretapping program, ordered by President Bush in 2001, is used when intelligence agents have a "reasonable basis to believe" that a target is tied to al Qaeda or related groups, according to recent statements by administration officials. It can be used on U.S. citizens as well as foreign nationals, without court oversight.

Democrats and national security law experts who oppose the NSA program say the Justice Department's opposition to the DeWine legislation seriously undermines arguments by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and others, who have said the NSA spying is constitutional and that surveillance warrants are often too cumbersome to obtain.

"It's entirely inconsistent with their current position," said Philip B. Heymann, a deputy attorney general in the Clinton administration who teaches law at Harvard University. "The only reason to do what they've been doing is because they wanted a lower standard than 'probable cause.' A member of Congress offered that to them, but they turned it down."

But Justice Department officials disagreed, saying the standard the department opposed in 2002 is legally different from the one used by the NSA.

"The FISA 'probable cause' standard is essentially the same as the 'reasonable basis' standard used in the terrorist surveillance program," said spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos, using the term for the NSA program the White House has adopted. "The 'reasonable suspicion' standard, which is lower than both of these, is not used in either program."

Justice officials also said that even under a different standard, the process of obtaining a surveillance warrant would take longer than is necessary for the NSA to efficiently track suspected terrorists.

The DeWine amendment -- first highlighted this week by Internet blogger Glenn Greenwald and widely publicized yesterday by the Project on Government Secrecy, an arm of the Federation of American Scientists -- is the latest point of contention in a fierce political and legal battle over the NSA monitoring program.

DOJ_NMG_0011838

Many Democrats and some Republicans, along with legal experts from both sides, have criticized the program as a clear violation of the 1978 FISA law, which makes it a crime to conduct domestic surveillance without a criminal or intelligence warrant. The administration argues that Bush acted legally under the congressional authorization to use military force against al Qaeda, and that FISA would be unconstitutional if it constrains his power as commander in chief.

During separate appearances this week, Gonzales and Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the deputy intelligence chief, also said the legal requirements under FISA made it difficult for intelligence agents to act quickly enough in many cases.

Under the NSA program, Hayden said, "the trigger is quicker and a bit softer than it is for a FISA warrant."

During Senate debate over DeWine's amendment in July 2002, James A. Baker, the Justice Department's counsel for intelligence policy, said in a statement that the Bush administration did not support the proposal "because the proposed change raises both significant legal and practical issues."

Baker said it was "not clear cut" whether the proposal would "pass constitutional muster," and "we could potentially put at risk ongoing investigations and prosecutions" if the amendment was later struck down by the courts. He also said Justice had been using FISA aggressively and played down the notion that the probable cause standard was too high.

A DeWine spokesman declined to comment on the issue yesterday.

Also yesterday, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) sent a list of 15 sharply worded questions to Gonzales in preparation for a Feb. 6 hearing on the legality of the NSA program. Specter asks, among other things, why the government did not ask Congress for new legislation to allow the spying.

Words, Deeds On Spying Differed (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Four years ago, top Bush administration lawyers told Congress they opposed lowering the legal standard for intercepting the phone calls of foreigners who were in the United States, even while the administration had secretly adopted a lower standard on its own.

The government's public position then was the mirror opposite of its rationale today in defending its warrantless domestic spying program, which has come under attack as a violation of civil liberties.

Government wiretapping — and who sets the rules — has emerged at the center of a growing debate between the White House and Congress since the disclosure last month of the administration's warrantless spying program.

A Justice Department spokesman confirmed Wednesday the administration had opposed changing the law in 2002 in part because it did not want to publicly debate the issue.

"There was a conscious choice not to have a public discussion about it. It could have exposed the program. This was a military defense intelligence program," said the spokesman, who asked not be named because of the sensitivity surrounding the still-classified presidential order on wiretapping.

After the terrorist attacks of September 2001, lawmakers proposed several changes that would make it easier for the government to detect terrorists and their allies who might be operating in the United States.

Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio) proposed making it easier for officials to obtain warrants to conduct wiretapping. The current law, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, said officials must have "probable cause" to believe someone was an agent of an international terrorist group before they could obtain a warrant to tap their phones.

This high standard proved to be a stumbling block at times. When Zacarias Moussaoui — the man later dubbed the 20th hijacker of the Sept. 11 attacks — was arrested in Minnesota in August 2001, officials in the Justice Department did not seek a warrant to search his laptop computer because they did not have probable cause to believe he was an Al Qaeda operative.

This was later judged to be a mistake. DeWine cited this when he proposed to lower the standard for obtaining a warrant to one of "reasonable suspicion." This would permit the government to move quickly to search or eavesdrop on suspicious foreigners such as Moussaoui, he said, even if they lacked "probable cause" to show they were members of Al Qaeda.

But when the proposal came before a Senate committee, the administration's lawyers testified that no change was needed.

DOJ_NMG_0011839

"The administration at this time is not prepared to support it," the Justice Department's James A. Baker said of the DeWine amendment in congressional testimony. As counsel for intelligence policy at the time, he headed the office that sought search warrants from the secret Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act court that meets inside the Justice Department.

The administration now defends the constitutionality of the warrantless domestic spying program and says it is necessary to avoid the "cumbersome" process of getting a warrant from the FISA court.

But in 2002, Baker told Congress it was not clear "whether a 'reasonable suspicion' standard for electronic surveillance would … pass constitutional muster."

Baker also said the existing standard was not a problem.

"We have been aggressive in seeking FISA warrants, and thanks to Congress' passage of the [Patriot Act] we have been able to use our expanded FISA tools more effectively to combat terrorist activities," he said. "It may not be the case that the probable cause standard has caused any difficulties in our ability to seek FISA warrants we require."

DeWine's proposal failed to pass the committee.

This week, top administration officials confirmed that before DeWine even made his proposal, they had adopted a "reasonable basis" standard for this eavesdropping.

"The president's authorization allows us to track this kind of call more comprehensively and more efficiently. The trigger is quicker and a bit softer than it is for a FISA warrant," Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the No. 2 ranking intelligence official and the former head of NSA, told reporters Monday.

Asked whether the key change was to switch from "probable cause" to a "reasonableness" standard, Hayden said, "I think you have accurately described the criteria under which this operates."

A Senate Democrat, Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, accused the administration of having tried "to paper over the legality of a secret spying program. If they really believed the current law is too burdensome, the Bush administration should have asked Congress to change it, but they did not. Instead a top lawyer in the Bush administration did just the opposite."

Timothy Edgar, a lawyer on national security policy for the American Civil Liberties Union, also accused the administration of "remarkable duplicity" for having testified in public against the legal change while carrying it out in private. "It seems they were being incredibly deceptive," he said.

The Justice Department's conflicting statements came to light Wednesday after Glenn Greenwald, a New York lawyer, posted the differing statements on a blog.

In 2002, Justice Department Said Eavesdropping Law Working Well (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - A July 2002 Justice Department statement to a Senate committee appears to contradict several key arguments that the Bush administration is making to defend its eavesdropping on U.S. citizens without court warrants.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, the law governing such operations, was working well, the department said in 2002. A "significant review" would be needed to determine whether FISA's legal requirements for obtaining warrants should be loosened because they hampered counterterrorism efforts, the department said then.

President Bush, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other top officials now argue that warrantless eavesdropping is necessary in part because complying with the FISA law is too burdensome and impedes the government's ability to rapidly track communications between suspected terrorists.

In its 2002 statement, the Justice Department said it opposed a legislative proposal to change FISA to make it easier to obtain warrants that would allow the super-secret National Security Agency to listen in on communications involving non-U.S. citizens inside the United States.

Today, senior U.S. officials complain that FISA prevents them from doing that.

James A. Baker, the Justice Department's top lawyer on intelligence policy, made the statement before the Senate Intelligence Committee on July 31, 2002. He was laying out the department's position on an amendment to FISA proposed by Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio. The committee rejected DeWine's proposal, leaving FISA intact.

So while Congress chose not to weaken FISA in 2002, today Bush and his allies contend that Congress implicitly gave Bush the authority to evade FISA's requirements when it authorized him to use force in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks three days after they occurred - a contention that many lawmakers reject.

Glenn Greenwald, an Internet blogger, first connected the earlier Justice Department statement to the Bush administration's current arguments on his Web log, called Unclaimed Territory.

Baker's 2002 statement drew new attention Wednesday as the White House continued its campaign to justify eavesdropping on Americans who are suspected of being in contact with al-Qaida or other terrorist groups, despite possible violation of FISA.

Bush visited the NSA's sprawling complex at Fort Meade, Md., on Wednesday to deliver a closed-door morale-boosting talk to its workforce.

He later repeated to reporters that the eavesdropping operation was limited to communications in which one participant was outside the United States.

"When terrorist operatives are here in America communicating with someone overseas, we must understand what's going on if we're going to do our job to protect the people," Bush said.

The administration insists that Bush has the legal and constitutional authority to order the NSA program, which began after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. But Democrats and some Republicans contend that Bush may have violated FISA, which governs how the government can monitor international calls and e-mails.

The law requires the government to show a secret federal court that it has "probable cause" to believe that a target for domestic eavesdropping is an agent of a foreign government or involved with a terrorist organization like al-Qaida.

DeWine's bill would have lowered the "probable cause" standard to one of only "reasonable suspicion" for warrants involving foreigners in the country.

Baker said in 2002 that because the "proposed change raises both significant legal and practical issues, the administration at this time is not prepared to support it."

He said that Justice Department lawyers were trying to determine whether the lower standard would pass "constitutional muster."

Baker also said that the Justice Department had "been aggressive in seeking FISA warrants" and that congressional approval of the USA Patriot Act had allowed investigators "to use our expanded FISA tools more effectively to combat terrorist activities."

"It may not be the case that the probable cause standard has caused any difficulties in our ability to seek the FISA warrants we require," he said then.

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said Wednesday that Gonzales stands by the administration's current view that FISA warrant requirements impose "additional layers of review" that sacrifice "critical speed and agility."

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, sent Gonzales a letter detailing a series of pointed questions that he intends to ask during a Feb. 6 hearing into the NSA program's legality.

The letter noted that under FISA, federal authorities can wiretap anyone and then seek a warrant within 72 hours.

Specter said he wanted Gonzales to explain why Bush didn't ask Congress to change FISA to make it easier to conduct surveillance with judicial approval.

He also indicated that Congress could have adjusted the law when it passed the anti-terrorism Patriot Act in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Bush PR Blitz Races To Frame Spying Debate (DMN)

By Michelle Mittelstadt, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON – The Bush administration raced this week to defend its warrantless domestic spying program, with several aims in mind, experts say: Win over a conflicted public; force Democrats into an arena that plays to GOP strength; and head off talk of impeachment and special prosecutors.

With polls showing the public sharply divided over the controversial surveillance program, the White House and its critics – Democrats, small-government conservatives and civil libertarians – are engaged in a high-stakes contest to frame the debate.

"If it's defined primarily as 'government abuse, the president out of control, the White House running roughshod over basic constitutional rights,' it would be a major problem for an extended period of time for the president – both on Capitol Hill but also with the voters," said political analyst Stuart Rothenberg.

"If the issue is defined more as 'protecting national security, keeping people safe, stopping terrorism,' then what the Democrats immediately saw might be a good issue for them could actually be turned around for the president and the Republican Party."

Though the court of public opinion is key, some suggest that the political system or the courts will be the ultimate arbiter of the program's legality – and the far weightier question of whether Mr. Bush is claiming executive powers outside the bounds of the Constitution or the law.

"This is the dangerous side of what's going on," said David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union.

He argues that the White House has gone too far in its assertion of presidential powers.

"It sets the stage for a clash between institutions of government because what the executive claims, when it claims the inherent power to do anything it wants in times of war, is saying that what Congress thinks doesn't matter and ultimately what the courts think doesn't matter."

Little oversight?

But Caroline Fredrickson, head of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington office, said she fears that clash won't materialize because the GOP-led Congress has shown little appetite for oversight of the administration's anti-terrorism efforts.

"Where you have bipartisan groups of individuals from the broadest spectrum of American political life suggesting that the president's actions are illegal, I think this is where Congress should be undertaking extensive hearings," she said.

Thus far, the Senate Judiciary Committee is the only one committed to hold hearings, with Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., voicing skepticism about the program's legal justification.

Mr. Specter has summoned Attorney General Al Gonzales for a Feb. 6 hearing and is under pressure from Democrats to invite former Deputy Attorney General James Comey and other administration officials who reportedly raised concerns about the legality of the domestic surveillance.

Mr. Gonzales and other top aides joined the president this week in a public relations blitz to assert that Mr. Bush had full authority to initiate warrantless surveillance of Americans believed to be engaged in communication with people overseas suspected of ties to al-Qaeda or its affiliates.

"We must be able to quickly detect when someone linked to al-Qaeda is communicating with someone inside of America," Mr. Bush said Wednesday during a visit to NSA headquarters in Maryland.

But critics say that can be done, with court review, under the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Though administration officials complain that the law is too cumbersome for "hot pursuit" surveillance, FISA backers note that the law permits emergency eavesdropping so long as court approval is sought within 72 hours.

Legal challenges

While the ACLU and the Center for Constitutional Rights have sued to challenge the spy program's constitutionality, some suggest that the controversy may not be settled in the courts.

"It's very unlikely it will ever make it to the Supreme Court or a federal court because it basically is a disagreement between the executive branch and the legislative branch over who has power," Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, said Wednesday. "And the truth is, both branches have a responsibility and have authority."

The groups' lawsuits were brought on behalf of Americans troubled by the thought of domestic spying without court oversight.

DOJ_NMG_0011842

But they will probably be deemed to lack legal standing because the groups weren't wiretap targets, said Kate Martin, head of the Center for National Security Studies. And while lawyers for defendants charged in terrorism cases have sued to learn if the warrantless wiretaps were used against their clients, Ms. Martin predicted that they are unlikely to pierce the veil of secrecy around the program.

Her solution? Congressional hearings. And if lawmakers deem that Mr. Bush exceeded his power, Congress should censure him.

Asked on a recent Sunday news show what he thought the remedy would be for a president breaking the law, Mr. Specter said, "Impeachment is the remedy."

He quickly noted that he was speaking theoretically. And thus far, impeachment isn't being touted by the political establishment. Nor is the possibility of a special prosecutor, though a new USA Today/CNN/Gallup poll found that 58 percent of Americans favor appointment of a special prosecutor.

But Bruce Fein, who served in the Nixon Justice Department, noted that it took many months for impeachment to gain currency during Watergate.

"I think that it would be premature to write off the impeachment option," Mr. Fein said.

Impeachment is not likely to gain political traction, said Larry Sabato, a University of Virginia political scientist. "Only hard-core Democratic partisans want to see Bush impeached, so it just turns people off."

Congressional Democrats, who have been burned at the polls after jousting with Mr. Bush over national security issues, are far less likely to raise impeachment, Mr. Rothenberg agreed.

A better option for them, he said, is to push the question of whether Mr. Bush broke the law or abused his power.

Backlash predicted

Mr. Keene, typically a staunch Bush ally, predicted that the administration's stance would "create an institutional backlash," with Congress moving to assert its power.

The best outcome, Mr. Fein said, would be for the White House to seek a rewrite of the FISA law if changes are deemed necessarily – and to quietly renounce the idea that the Constitution grants the president unparalleled wartime power.

Few of those challenging the administration's actions have suggested that the spy program should be terminated, and congressional Democrats have urged the administration to come to Congress for legislative approval.

The White House sees no need to do so, spokesman Scott McClellan said. "The president has the authority and responsibility to do what he's doing to prevent attacks from happening," he said.

Mr. Keene and others predicted that resolution may be years away.

"I'm not sure how it plays out, but ultimately it plays out by getting some kind of balance," he said.

After all, he noted, executive excesses in the past – such as President Harry Truman's seizure of U.S. steel mills during the Korean War – ultimately were corrected.

NSA Surveillance Legality Debate Narrows (FOX)

Fox News, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — After three days of a Bush administration offensive and weeks of debate and accusations, some legal experts are coming to terms on what is illegal and what is not in the National Security Agency electronic surveillance program.

"When the president goes around and speaks ... and says we're monitoring calls from overseas from Al Qaeda to the United States, the NSA can go ahead and do that now under the law," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said after the Senate Judiciary confirmation hearing of Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito.

But Kennedy said independent organizations, like the Congressional Research Service, have studied the legality of the NSA program and say the president has gone beyond what the rules allow. Bush, however, says the eavesdropping program is legal and doesn't overstep the boundaries allowed to him by the Constitution and congressional resolution.

"These tools include surveillance to protect and prevent further attacks by our enemies," Bush said Wednesday after visiting the NSA to give a morale boost to workers there. "I have the authorization both from the Constitution and the Congress to undertake this vital program. The American people expect me to protect our lives and our civil liberties and that's exactly what we're doing with this program."

On Monday, the president described exactly what the NSA is doing.

"What I'm talking about is the intercept of certain communications emanating between somebody inside the United States and outside the United States and one of the numbers would be reasonably suspected to be an Al Qaeda link or affiliate," Bush told an audience at Kansas State University.

He added that just because the United States hasn't been hit in more than four years, the threat persists.

"Listen to the words of Usama bin Laden and take them seriously when he says he's going to hurt the American people again -- or try to -- he means it," Bush told reporters. "I take it seriously and the people of NSA take it seriously and most of the American people take it seriously, as well.

"This enemy still wants to do harm to the American people. We cannot let the fact that we have not been attacked lull us into the conclusion that the terrorists have disappeared. They have not disappeared," he said.

According to legal experts, hypothetically, if the NSA had intercepted calls from alleged terrorists such as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed or Ramzi Binalshibb, both now in custody, while they were abroad, then U.S. intelligence agents could listen to the calls without a warrant. That goes for phone calls with people on the other end of the line who happen to be in United States.

Only when the person inside the United States becomes the target of surveillance is a warrant from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance court required.

"You wouldn't need a warrant to do the initial interception, but afterwards, once you're targeting the American citizen, then you need that warrant," said Bruce Fein, a former official in the Reagan Justice Department and a fierce critic of the Bush' administration's terror surveillance.

Other experts agree that a warrant is not needed until the U.S.-based individual becomes a suspect.

"If ... you are not targeting the person in the United States, you get the conversations, you are perfectly free to use those, that information provide it to other government agencies, if you want," said Bryan Cunningham, a former official with the Bush National Security Council.

Once the government agencies are given the information, they can open investigations with warrants to conduct further surveillance.

But others argue that the law says domestic communications monitoring rules apply even when only one end of the call is on U.S. soil. They say that's why Bush signed a highly classified directive approving the program and has to re-approve it every 45 days.

Current and former government officials familiar with electronic monitoring say that accidental eavesdropping — so-called "incidental intercepts" — are also a dark part of the business. When it happens, the NSA has procedures to protect the identities of Americans and their privacy.

Lt. Gen. Michael Hayden, the former head of the NSA at the time the president first authorized surveillance of terrorists, addressed that issue and others in a speech at the National Press Club on Monday.

"When you're talking to your daughter at state college, this program cannot intercept your conversations. And when she takes a semester abroad to complete her Arabic studies, this program will not intercept your communications," Hayden said.

He added that it would be impossible to monitor all phone calls between the United States and abroad because in 2003 alone, Americans participated in 200 billion minutes of international calls.

"The purpose of all of this is not to collect reams of intelligence, but to detect and prevent attacks. The intelligence community has neither the time, the resources nor the legal authority to read communications that aren't likely to protect us. And NSA has no interest in doing so. These are communications that we have reason to believe are Al Qaeda communications," Hayden said.

Critics say they don't believe Bush or administration officials when they say the program is limited. Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., said Wednesday that Senate Democratic leaders as well as Kennedy and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin have signed a letter to Bush outlining their concerns with the program and the fact that they know very little about it.

Durbin noted that while an emergency exception to current law allows domestic wiretaps without court approval in the case of an emergency, it should not be the norm that the court is circumvented.

"This is not about whether we should wiretap terrorists. Democrats believe we should use every legal resource we have to put an end to Usama bin Laden's deadly franchise," Durbin said. "It isn't a matter of missing an opportunity; the government can act instantly to deal with a wiretap on a suspected terrorist and has 72 hours to contact the [FISA] court and advise them of the action that's been taken. If the president thinks the current laws are inadequate to wiretap terrorists, he should come to Congress."

Durbin said most lawmakers only know what the media has been reporting about the program. Although it appears from those reports that the president has gone beyond his authority, Durbin said, he's waiting to make his own judgment on that.

"I'd like to, before I reach that point, at least know how the program is being used," he said. "I'm not sure any member is looking for political confrontation. We want to establish a legal framework to keep America safe. I am concerned on a constitutional basis this president is saying, 'I don't need a political framework.' And that, I think, goes too far."

Sen. Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., echoed complaints about how the president created the program but not about its importance. Defending Congress' oversight responsibilities and the need for civil liberties protections, Schumer said he worried about abuses similar to those before the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act was enacted in 1978.

"My view has generally been that when the president needs powers to protect us, he ought to get them, but there ought to be debate and it ought to be done with safeguards in place so that there aren't abuses, which we've seen in other wiretaps such as in the days of (J. Edgar) Hoover," Schumer said.

The latest Gallup Poll, taken just before the administration's public relations blitz this week shows a slight majority, 51-46, thinks the administration was wrong to allow warrantless wiretapping. The 5 percent difference is equal to the survey's margin of error.

After a Justice Department briefing Wednesday for former government officials on the president's so-called "terrorist surveillance program," former FBI and CIA Director William Webster, who served under Republican and Democratic presidents, expressed his support.

Asked if the U.S. government has done its due diligence regarding the law and civil liberty protections, Webster said, "I'm confident that we're, that they do have their act together."

Former CIA Director James Woolsey sides with the president, but recently said it's a close call.

"If anyone says it's a crystal clear issue one way or another, that is the only position I regard as wrong," he said.

All kinds of congressional hearings have been demanded regarding the program. The only one scheduled to date is on Feb. 6 by the Senate Judiciary Committee where Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is scheduled to testify.

On Wednesday, Committee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., sent Gonzales a letter with 15 opening questions on the legality of the communications intercepts, and he warned that the committee would want to question him the entire day.

"Would you consider seeking approval from the FISA court at this time for the ongoing surveillance program at issue? ... Why did the White House not ask Congress for changes to a 1978 foreign surveillance law? ... Why didn't the administration go to an established intelligence court to get approval for the monitoring?" are some of the questions asked by Specter.

Democrats say they want to see the committee call more witnesses than now planned, including former Attorney General John Ashcroft Deputy Attorneys General James Comey and Larry Thompson and White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card.

Bush Says Takes Threats From Bin Laden Seriously (REU)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, January 26, 2006

President George W. Bush said on Wednesday he took Osama bin Laden's threats of another attack seriously and invoked the al Qaeda leader's recent audiotape to defend a domestic eavesdropping program.

DOJ_NMG_0011845

"I understand there are some in America who say, 'Well this can't be true, there aren't still people willing to attack.' All I would ask them to do is listen to the words of Osama bin Laden and take him seriously," Bush said at the National Security Agency.

"When he says he's going to hurt the American people again or try to, he means it. I take it seriously and the people of NSA take it seriously and most of the American people take it seriously as well," Bush said.

Democrats have criticized Bush for authorizing the warrantless monitoring of international telephone calls and e-mail messages of people in the United States suspected of aiding al Qaeda.

Critics say the program, conducted by the NSA, violates the U.S. Constitution and the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which makes it illegal to spy on U.S. citizens in the United States without the approval of a special secret court.

Bin Laden in an audiotape that aired last week warned that al Qaeda was preparing attacks in the United States but was open to a conditional truce with Americans.

"Just last week ... we heard from Osama bin Laden," Bush said. "The terrorists will do everything they can to strike us. I am going to continue to do everything I can within my legal authority to stop them."

Top Senate Democrats sent a letter to Bush on Wednesday asking he outline, by February 1, any changes in current law he would propose to improve surveillance of suspected terrorists.

"We are ... gravely concerned that sometime in 2001, in apparent violation of federal law, you authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on Americans in the United States without court approval," said the letter, signed by Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and others.

The senators noted that in a speech in 2004, Bush said, "When we're talking about chasing down terrorists, we're talking about getting a court order before we do so." They quoted Bush saying, "A wiretap requires a court order."

Democrats have noted that in special cases the NSA is allowed to conduct domestic surveillance but has to obtain a warrant within 72 hours.

Democrats in the Senate and House of Representatives also pressured Republicans on Wednesday to submit Bush's domestic eavesdropping program to the scrutiny of Congress' intelligence oversight committees.

'FAR-FETCHED'

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, said the administration's argument it needed to bypass the warrant process in order to go after al Qaeda was "far-fetched."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, plans hearings on the NSA program on February 6.

Bush told reporters he would continue to authorize the eavesdropping program.

"The American people expect me to protect their lives and their civil liberties and that's exactly what we're doing with this program," he said.

Touring the NSA in Fort Meade, Bush visited a room with a large screen highlighting statistics about cyberspace, including one saying over 592 billion instant messages were sent daily. That was projected to grow to 1.38 trillion by 2007.

The NSA is one of the most secretive of the U.S. spy agencies. Founded in 1952, it uses high-tech equipment such as satellites and bugs to pick up foreign electronic signals such as telephone calls and computer messages.

Bush: Bin Laden Should Be Taken Seriously (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 26, 2006

President Bush, defending the government's secret surveillance program, said Wednesday that Americans should take Osama bin Laden seriously when he says he's going to attack again.

"When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it," Bush told reporters after visiting the top-secret National Security Agency where the surveillance program is based. "I take it seriously, and the people of NSA take it seriously."

It was Bush's first comment about bin Laden since the al-Qaida leader warned in a tape aired last week that his fighters are preparing new attacks in the United States. Bin Laden offered a truce, without specifying the conditions, and the White House responded that the United States would never negotiate with the mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Bush's NSA visit was part of an aggressive administration effort to defend the surveillance program. Experts and lawmakers from both parties have questioned whether it's legal for the government to listen to conversations in the United States without a warrant, which the administration could get through the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

Four leading Democratic senators wrote Bush Wednesday saying they support efforts to do everything possible within the law to combat terrorism, but that the NSA program is an "apparent violation of federal law."

"If you or officials in your administration believe that FISA, or any law, does not give you enough authority to combat terrorism, you should propose changes in the law to Congress," wrote Sens. Harry Reid, Edward Kennedy, Richard Durbin and Russ Feingold. "You may not simply disregard the law."

Reporters traveling with the president were only allowed to see a few minutes of Bush's NSA tour, as he walked through the high-tech Threat Operations Center where intelligence experts monitor Internet traffic. He spoke to reporters from a podium set up in a hallway after completing his tour, but did not take questions.

In keeping with the NSA's secrecy, reporters were required to leave their cell phones, pagers, laptops and wireless e-mail devices outside the complex. The White House negotiated so that the journalists could bring in cameras and video equipment, but they were allowed only to take photos of the president, not the inside or outside of the facility itself.

Bush said the NSA program is limited to communications between the United States and people overseas who are linked to al-Qaida. He said it has helped prevent terrorist attacks and save American lives, although the government has not given any specifics.

Bush urged that people "listen to the words of Osama bin Laden and take him seriously."

His critics say the law requires him to get permission from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court to eavesdrop on communications involving Americans.

"Obviously, I support tracking down terrorists," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., said in a speech Wednesday. "I think that's our obligation. But I think it can be done in a lawful way."

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said the administration should have asked Congress to change the law if it wanted additional surveillance powers.

"Instead, a top lawyer in the Bush administration did just the opposite," Leahy said Wednesday, circulating 2002 testimony from a Justice Department official who said the administration had no position on a bill that would have made it easier to get warrants from the FISA court.

Bush said he had the legal right to do whatever he could to prevent further attacks and that the NSA program "is fully consistent with our nation's laws and Constitution."

"I'll continue to reauthorize this program for so long as our country faces a continuing threat from al-Qaida and related groups," Bush said.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said he's eager to learn more. Asked on NBC's "Today" show, if Bush broke the law, McCain replied: "I don't know. I want to be perfectly clear. I don't know the answer."

Bush Reiterates Spy Authority (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

President Bush yesterday defended National Security Agency employees who eavesdrop on suspected terrorists, even as the legality of the program was questioned by senators from both parties.

"I have the authority, both from the Constitution and the Congress, to undertake this vital program," Mr. Bush said after a private speech to employees at the NSA headquarters in Fort Meade, Md.

"The American people expect me to protect their lives and their civil liberties, and that's exactly what we're doing with this program."

The president took the unusual step of imploring Americans to heed the warnings of Osama bin Laden, who threatened additional attacks against the U.S. in an audiotape that surfaced last week.

"Listen to the words of Osama bin Laden and take him seriously," Mr. Bush said. "When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it. I take it seriously, and the people of NSA take it seriously."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton was skeptical of such arguments by Mr. Bush and his advisers, who are in the midst of a public-relations offensive to justify the eavesdropping program.

"Their argument that it's rooted in the authority to go after al Qaeda is far-fetched," the New York Democrat told reporters at a gathering of the nation's mayors. "Their argument that it's rooted in the Constitution inherently is kind of strange."

Mrs. Clinton, who is widely expected to run for president in 2008, questioned the legality of the program, which targets conversations between Americans and overseas terror suspects.

"Obviously, I support tracking down terrorists -- I think that's our obligation," she said. "But I think it can be done in a lawful way."

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, said the legalities of the program will be explored in Senate Judiciary Committee hearings scheduled to begin Feb. 6. The committee chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, yesterday outlined 15 areas of inquiry in a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, who has agreed to testify.

Asked by NBC whether the president "broke the law," Mr. McCain said, "I don't know the answer. That's why I welcome the hearings. If I was sure whether it's legal or not, then I wouldn't feel that these hearings are important."

Still, Mr. McCain said the program serves a vital purpose.

"There's no American that wouldn't want us to absolutely be able to listen in on al Qaeda cells," he said. "This is a new threat, and frankly, a lot of us are very concerned."

The president was unambiguous about the legality of the program, which allows eavesdropping without a warrant.

"This terrorist surveillance program includes multiple safeguards to protect civil liberties, and it is fully consistent with our nation's laws and Constitution," he told reporters. "Federal courts have consistently ruled that a president has authority under the Constitution to conduct foreign intelligence surveillance against our enemies."

Mr. Bush suggested that some of the same people who criticized him for not doing enough to prevent the terrorist attacks of September 11 are now criticizing him for doing too much.

"Two of the hijackers who struck the Pentagon were inside the United States communicating with al Qaeda operatives overseas," he said. "But we didn't realize they were here plotting the attack until it was too late."

He added, "The 9/11 commission made clear, in this era of new dangers we must be able to connect the dots before the terrorists strike so we can stop new attacks. And this NSA program is doing just that."

In a letter sent yesterday to Mr. Gonzales, Mr. Specter said he will ask the Bush administration why it didn't seek expanded congressional authority for the program.

"Was it because you thought you couldn't get such an expansion as when you said: 'That was not something that we could likely get?' " he asks, referring to a press briefing by Mr. Gonzales in December.

Mr. Specter said he also plans to ask the Bush administration why it bypassed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court, the secretive judicial panel designed to consider issuing warrants for surveillance.

In a separate letter, Democrats yesterday called on Mr. Bush to immediately notify Congress of the changes in current law to "permit effective surveillance of suspected terrorists."

"When you concluded over four years ago that existing law did not provide you sufficient authority to conduct the program, you had an obligation to propose changes in the law to Congress," wrote Sens. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, Harry Reid of Nevada and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Also yesterday, the Senate Democratic "war room" released a "fact check" that said "there is evidence that the spying program is diverting valuable FBI resources and making America less safe."

Sen. John Cornyn, a member of the Judiciary Committee and chairman of the emerging threats and capabilities subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee, chided the Democrats, asking the rhetorical question, "Are the Democrats just playing politics with national security? You decide."

DOJ_NMG_0011848

The Texas Republican noted that Mr. Reid, the Senate minority leader, "has been briefed on the NSA's efforts, as have the heads of the intelligence committees in both houses of Congress. Are they now calling for the president to stop intercepting al Qaeda-related calls?"

Take Bin Laden Threat Seriously, Bush Warns (USAT)

USA Today, January 26, 2006

President Bush, defending the government's secret surveillance program, said Wednesday that Americans should take Osama bin Laden seriously when he says he's going to attack again.

"When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it," Bush told reporters after visiting the top-secret National Security Agency, where the surveillance program is based. "I take it seriously, and the people of NSA take it seriously." It was Bush's first comment about bin Laden since a tape was aired last week in which the al-Qaeda leader warned that his fighters are preparing new attacks in the USA.

Meanwhile, four leading Democratic senators sent Bush a letter Wednesday saying they support everything possible within the law to combat terrorism, but the NSA program is an "apparent violation of federal law." The letter was signed by Sens. Harry Reid of Nevada, Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, Dick Durbin of Illinois and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin.

Few soldiers seek money for body armor

Just 29 Army soldiers have sought reimbursement for body armor and other equipment they bought to protect themselves on the front lines, the Associated Press reported. It said the requests, mostly for updated ceramic body armor, total $21,000 under a repayment program begun in October. Defense Department officials said last year that the program could be costly if people pressed for reimbursement for large amounts of protective gear. "It hasn't been what we thought it would be, but we didn't have any real judgment what it would be," said Army Maj. Paul Cucuzzella, who runs the program at Fort Meade in Maryland. Troops and their families had complained that soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan weren't getting vital pieces of body armor from the Pentagon.

Alito heads closer to confirmation

Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito accepted congratulations from Republican leaders as lawmakers moved toward confirming him in a largely party-line vote.

A few hours after the Senate debate began, Alito thanked "all of the senators who supported me and were kind enough to meet with me."

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois, the Senate's No. 2 Democrat and one of 22 Democrats who have announced their opposition, said Alito "will tip the balance against protecting our basic privacy and personal freedoms. He will tip the balance in favor of presidential power even when it violates the law."

Alito, a judge of U.S. 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, has enough support from 51 Republicans and Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska to ensure his confirmation. He would replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who is retiring.

Rift Between Parties Over NSA Wiretapping Grows (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

In a pep talk yesterday to intelligence experts at the National Security Agency, President Bush defended eavesdropping on overseas communications to and from U.S. residents as legal and imperative to stopping terrorists.

In the latest sign of the escalating debate on the issue, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) called Bush's rationale a "strange" and dangerous legal stretch.

The conflicting views of the NSA spying program highlighted by the Bush-Clinton exchange reflect a widening divide over warrantless eavesdropping, and how leaders in both major parties are trying to shape the debate in preparation for upcoming congressional hearings and this year's elections.

Bush, whose aides said they consider the issue a clear political winner, is resurrecting tactics from the last campaign to make the NSA spying program a referendum on which party will keep the United States safe from terrorists. He has dispatched top White House officials almost daily to defend the program and has sent a message to party activists that he considers fighting terrorism with tools such as NSA eavesdropping the defining issue of the November elections.

Exhibiting an obsession to detail not seen in the Social Security rollout a year ago, the White House is even waging a war on the semantics being used in the debate, lashing out at reporters who call the program "domestic" spying, because the monitored calls involve a person overseas. It is also putting out pages of highly detailed -- and often hotly disputed -- legal analyses of the program and drawing what Democratic critics and many independent analysts regard as questionable historical parallels to show Bush is following a long wartime tradition.

Speaking to reporters, Clinton took aim at what she called a lawless assertion of power: "My question is, why can't we do what we want to do within the rule of law?"

Her comments came after an appearance at the winter meeting of the U.S. Conference of Mayors. Clinton, a leading contender for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, rejected Bush's argument that the president had power to order surveillance after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. She said established procedures for approval for such spying from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act would have protected civil liberties and national security.

"Their argument that it's rooted in the authority to go after al Qaeda is far-fetched," Clinton said. "Their argument that it's rooted in the Constitution inherently is kind of strange because we have FISA, and FISA operated very effectively and it wasn't that hard to get their permission."

Bush staged his latest defense at NSA headquarters at Fort Meade, Md. Speaking to the code breakers, analysts and linguistic experts who help sift through the information obtained with the warrantless searches of overseas phone calls and e-mails involving at least one person in the United States, Bush called the program a "vital" defense tool.

The issue is different but the message is similar to the one many political analysts credit for Bush's 2004 victory: He can be trusted to protect U.S. citizens, and Democrats cannot. In a recent speech to the Republican National Committee, White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove previewed a similar strategy for this year's elections, in which the GOP majorities in the House, Senate and governorships are at risk. When news of the NSA program broke, Bush was put on the defensive, but he and strategists quickly decided this fight could be an asset at a time when the president was struggling to regain his balance, advisers said.

"It is amazing to me -- not only are the Democrats not learning from costly policy mistakes, they are not learning what happened from the political mistakes of 2002 and 2004," said RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman.

Some Democratic strategists say the NSA program is a political loser for Democrats, whom many voters still see as soft on national security. But there is no way for elected Democrats to avoid the fight -- and few want to. With congressional hearings on the topic expected early next month, Democrats and several Republicans have serious policy differences with Bush and consider the NSA fight part of a much larger battle over presidential power and congressional oversight.

"I don't think it's bad politics," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "I don't think the national security attack works this time," he said, because "we have a politically weakened president whose poll numbers are down and whose credibility is under increased scrutiny."

Although arguments about the legality of the eavesdropping program are boiling, details about what the NSA is doing remain hidden from all but eight members of Congress: the House speaker and minority leader, the Senate majority and minority leaders, and the chairmen and ranking minority members of the House and Senate intelligence committees.

Pressed yesterday by Democratic members of the Senate intelligence committee for a closed hearing or briefing on the NSA program, Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) said he had scheduled a Feb. 1 Justice Department briefing on the legal issues involved but not on the program itself. Under Roberts's proposal, the committee will meet on Feb. 16 "to discuss the terrorist surveillance issue" but apparently will not be briefed on what it entails.

Democrats told Roberts yesterday they want a business meeting of the committee Tuesday, when they will call for a vote on whether to hold a hearing or briefing with NSA witnesses, congressional sources said.

In The Eye Of The Spying Storm (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0011850

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush made a rare visit Wednesday to the National Security Agency, the office at the center of the controversy over warrantless eavesdropping, telling employees there: "When terrorist operatives are here in America communicating with someone overseas, we must understand what's going on."

And he urged Americans to take seriously the words of Osama bin Laden, likely the NSA's No. 1 target, in an audiotape released last week.

"When he says he's going to hurt the American people again, or try to, he means it," Bush said. "I take it seriously, and the people of the NSA take it seriously."

Challenging assertions that his approval of the wiretapping and inspection of e-mail violated the law, Bush said, "The American people expect me to protect their lives and their civil liberties, and that's exactly what we're doing with this program."

Bush's visit to NSA headquarters at Ft. Meade, Md. — a site once so secret that NSA was said to stand for "No Such Agency" — was part of a stepped-up campaign in recent days to gain public support for the spying program.

Earlier, White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan defended Bush's decision not to ask a special court for warrants to monitor people in the United States.

"This is a time of war. This is about wartime surveillance of the enemy," McClellan said, adding a refinement of his earlier arguments: "We don't ask our commanders to go to the court and ask for approval while they're trying to gain intelligence on the enemy."

The administration contends that Bush's inherent powers as commander in chief and a congressional resolution approved after the Sept. 11 attacks, authorizing him to use all necessary force to fight terrorism, gave him the power to order domestic intelligence-gathering without getting warrants.

With the administration focused on Senate Judiciary Committee hearings on the eavesdropping which are to begin Feb. 6, the panel's chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), signaled the approach he would take.

He sent 15 questions to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales, one of the witnesses from the executive branch.

Among the questions:

• Why didn't the administration seek the authority to conduct such surveillance when Congress passed the Patriot Act, the post-Sept. 11 expansion of anti-terrorism law?

• Didn't President Jimmy Carter's signature on the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, and the statement Carter issued at the time, amount to a renunciation of presidential authority "to conduct warrantless domestic surveillance"?

• When foreign calls are made through U.S. switches, isn't such monitoring against the law or a violation of regulations that restrict the NSA from conducting surveillance inside the United States?

The last question goes to the heart of an argument McClellan has made in recent days that takes issue with calling the program "domestic spying."

The administration has said it allows the surveillance only when at least one end of the phone call or e-mail traffic is outside the United States and one person involved is a suspected terrorist.

"I think it leaves an inaccurate impression with the American people to say that this is domestic spying," McClellan said. "You don't call a flight from New York to somewhere in Afghanistan a domestic flight. It's called an international flight."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), speaking at a meeting of the nation's mayors, joined the criticism of the program, challenging Bush's contention that he has the authority to conduct the monitoring.

"Their argument that it's rooted in the authority to go after Al Qaeda is far-fetched. Their argument that it's rooted in the Constitution inherently is kind of strange," Clinton said, citing the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, under which she said it would not be hard to gain permission for the wiretaps.

Bush Visits Security Agency And Defends Surveillance (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller And Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0011851

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — President Bush went Wednesday to the heart of the debate over the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program, the supersecret agency itself, where he sought to bolster employee morale and make a case for ordering a surveillance program that has come under increasing political attack.

"It's just such an honor to be able to tell these people that the work they do is vital and necessary, and I support them a hundred percent," Mr. Bush told reporters during a rare presidential trip to the agency at Fort Meade, Md., in the suburban sprawl between Baltimore and Washington.

Mr. Bush's trip was part of a weeklong news media offensive to push back against lawmakers who argue that the program may be illegal. Hearings into the program by the Senate Judiciary Committee are to begin next month.

Mr. Bush first met privately with employees at the agency, then told a small group of reporters who accompanied him that the program, which intercepts international phone calls and e-mail messages of people in the United States suspected of links to Al Qaeda, had been a crucial tool in fighting terrorism.

"We've seen that part of the terrorist strategy is to place operatives inside of our country," the president said. "They blend in with the civilian population. They get their orders from overseas, and then they emerge to strike from within. We must be able to quickly detect when someone linked to Al Qaeda is communicating with someone inside of America."

The National Security Agency, the largest American intelligence agency, specializes in eavesdropping on foreign communications. It is so secret that for years the joke has been that its initials stood for "No Such Agency."

But its heavily guarded campus just off the Baltimore-Washington Parkway opened up a bit to the news media in recent years under the leadership of Gen. Michael V. Hayden, now the principal deputy director of national intelligence and Mr. Bush's point man on the eavesdropping program.

While the president was visiting the agency, the two parties on Capitol Hill spent the day in an exchange of dueling letters. Senate and House Democrats pressed their Republican counterparts to hold additional hearings beyond those already scheduled by the Senate Judiciary Committee, while Republicans suggested that Democrats were trying to use the issue for political advantage and jeopardizing national security.

In a letter released Wednesday to the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, all nine Democrats on the panel said that only public hearings could provide the kind of "vigorous oversight" needed to answer questions about the program.

Likewise, all seven Democratic members of the Senate Intelligence Committee urged the panel chairman to hold hearings to address, among other issues, "the legal justifications for the program."

Leading Democrats, in another letter, told Mr. Bush that they were "gravely concerned" about the eavesdropping program. Rather than going to the court that governs foreign intelligence for wiretaps warrants, the letter said, "you have apparently chosen to ignore the law." The letter was signed by four Senate Democrats — Harry Reid of Nevada, Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin.

In yet another letter, Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, the Republican who leads the Intelligence Committee, fired back expressing annoyance over the Democrats' complaints.

Mr. Roberts said he was already planning a closed-door briefing for the committee by the Justice Department on Feb. 1, and another closed-door meeting related to the program two weeks after that. He suggested that Democrats had bypassed protocol by making their pleas public before giving him a chance to respond.

"I think we can all agree that intelligence issues, especially in the middle of a war, should not be used as fodder for political advantage," Mr. Roberts said. "Doing so is unnecessary, unwise and potentially dangerous."

So far, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, who leads the Judiciary Committee, is the only Republican to commit to a public hearing on the N.S.A. program. It is scheduled for Feb. 6 with testimony from Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

But in a letter to Mr. Specter, Senator Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who sits on the Judiciary Committee, said the committee should seek testimony from other former administration officials who may have had misgivings about the program, including former Attorney General John Ashcroft and James B. Comey, the former deputy attorney general. If necessary, Mr. Schumer said, the committee should subpoena the former officials to testify.

The New York Times reported this month that Mr. Comey refused to reauthorize the continuation of the N.S.A. program in 2004, prompting senior White House officials to visit Mr. Ashcroft in a hospital after an attack of pancreatitis to press for his agreement. He was also said to have voiced concerns about the program. The episode led to the suspension of the program for months.

Mr. Specter said Friday that he was already considering calling other witnesses beyond Mr. Gonzales.

Spying By Another Name (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

WITH POLLS SHOWING THE American public increasingly skeptical about the need to abridge core constitutional freedoms to wage the war on terrorism, the Bush administration launched a major PR offensive this week to justify its decision to conduct warrantless wiretapping within the United States. The White House deserves credit for at least making its case. Unfortunately for the president, it's a weak case, and repetition doesn't make it any better.

Indeed, the administration's marketing team may be more adept than its legal theorists. All White House references to the National Security Agency's eavesdropping now call it a "terrorist surveillance program." That sounds far less objectionable than the media's blanket term, "domestic spying program." After all, it's hard to support domestic spying, but who wants to oppose "terrorist surveillance"? Maybe the Los Angeles Police Department could suspend the 4th Amendment's protections against unreasonable searches by launching a "criminal surveillance program."

Semantics aside, the administration's legal case remains wobbly, which may explain President Bush's churlish attitude toward his critics. On Wednesday, Bush defended the need for the program at NSA headquarters in Maryland. "Now, I understand there's some in America who say, well, this can't be true that there are still people willing to attack," he said. He then referred to Osama bin Laden's latest threatening audiotape.

Get it? The president is equating concerns about the legality of bypassing the courts to obtain a warrant to eavesdrop on Americans with a lack of appreciation for the threats posed by Al Qaeda. In Bush's world, only appeasers stand up for the Constitution.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which created courts that act quickly and secretly to approve such requests for wiretaps, remains a sensible law. It strikes the proper balance between the need for judicial oversight and the requirements of national security — and helps to ensure that the government does not trample on individual liberty. These courts are extremely accommodating to government requests, which sometimes needn't be supported until after the wiretapping has taken place.

In a long letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist last week, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales said that the FISA law itself allows for the possibility that Congress could authorize electronic surveillance in another statute, and argued that the post-Sept. 11 congressional authorization "to use all necessary force" in response to the terrorist attacks is just such a statute. For anyone who feels it's a stretch to think that Congress meant to suspend basic 4th Amendment principles by supporting military action against the Taliban and Al Qaeda, Gonzales is quick to point out that warrantless wiretapping also took place in the Civil War.

The administration is also de-emphasizing the fact that the eavesdropping is taking place on American soil by pointing out that it is only targeting communications that involve one party outside the United States. This is irrelevant as a legal matter. And as a practical matter, it's not entirely true. Lt. Gen. Michael V. Hayden, who led the NSA in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks and is now the nation's second-ranking intelligence official, conceded on Monday that some purely domestic communications might be accidentally wiretapped under the program.

Senate hearings on the NSA program are scheduled to begin Feb. 6. They could prove interesting if GOP senators opt to cast themselves as defenders of the Constitution, and not of their president.

U.S. Must Submit Papers To Moussaoui Team (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — A federal judge has ordered the government to give admitted terrorist conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's defense team documents describing what officials knew before Sept. 11, 2001, about al-Qaeda threats and some of its hijackers.

With a trial to determine Moussaoui's sentence set to begin next month, U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema granted part of a Jan. 20 defense motion for documents without waiting for the government's response.

DOJ_NMG_0011853

"Several of the categories of information are so critical to the issues in this case that the court can address some of the requests without a response," Brinkema wrote. "Moreover, given the increasingly shortening time before the start of the trial, discovery issues must be resolved quickly."

Granted Tuesday under seal, her order was released Wednesday after government censors blacked out about five lines of it.

She ordered the government to immediately turn over any threat assessments, especially those completed in the year before the Sept. 11 attacks.

Defense attorneys also will get all reports, cables, slides, talking points, memos and other documents about Moussaoui's arrest a month before the attacks and about two Sept. 11 hijackers, Khalid al-Mihdahar and Nawaf al-Hazmi, whose presence in the United States was known to federal officials before the attacks.

That data clearly was sought by the defense for use in the first part of the upcoming court proceeding, in which prosecutors will try to convince jurors that the FBI would have prevented the Sept. 11 attacks if Moussaoui had told federal agents what he knew about al-Qaeda's desire to fly planes into U.S. buildings.

The defense will argue that agents had more information about the plot than Moussaoui could provide but still could not prevent the attacks. If the jury disagrees with prosecutors, Moussaoui will receive life in prison. If jurors agree with prosecutors, they will decide whether he should be executed.

Brinkema also ordered that she be given both an unclassified and a classified version of a CIA inspector general report. Defense attorneys already have seen the unclassified version, but Brinkema said she wanted to determine for herself that the deletions from the original were appropriate.

A 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent, Moussaoui is the only person who has been charged in the United States as part of the Sept. 11 al-Qaeda attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Last April, he pleaded guilty to six conspiracy charges, but insisted he was not part of the Sept. 11 plot. However, he said he was taking flight lessons to prepare to hijack a 747 jet later and fly it into the White House if the U.S. government refused to release a radical Egyptian cleric serving a life term for the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and 1995 plots against New York landmarks.

Moussaoui was in custody in Minnesota on immigration violations when the hijacked jets crashed on Sept. 11.

WASHINGTON Judge Orders Release Of Pre-9/11 Attack Assessments (SCRIPPS)

By GREG GORDON, McClatchy Newspapers

Scripps Howard, January 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - A federal judge has ordered the government to turn over to Zacarias Moussaoui's defense lawyers pre-Sept. 11 documents assessing the threat of an al Qaeda attack, calling the material "critical" to his upcoming trial, it was disclosed Wednesday.

It could not immediately be determined whether the ruling by U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema of Alexandria, Va., will create a significant, 11th-hour snag over protection of classified data in the only U.S. prosecution to stem from the suicide hijackings.

The ruling could create a legal showdown, for example, if it requires intelligence agencies to produce classified information that they consider too sensitive to release, even to defense lawyers with government security clearances.

Jury selection is set to begin on Feb. 6, with opening arguments slated for March 6 in a sentencing trial to determine whether Moussaoui, who pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts last April, should live or die.

Defense lawyers asked the court last week to compel the government to release the intelligence assessments and an array of other documents shedding light about what U.S. counter-terrorism officials knew of al Qaeda's plans before the attack.

Brinkema said in her ruling, issued Tuesday and made public Wednesday in declassified form, that the intelligence assessments are "highly relevant" to the case.

She also ruled that the defense is entitled to copies of additional material surrounding the Minnesota arrest and investigation of Moussaoui and the government's tracking of two suicide hijackers who slipped into the United States in early 2000.

Moussaoui, who was arrested while learning to fly a jumbo jet at a Twin Cities flight school, has denied knowing details of the Sept. 11 plot despite his guilty plea.

Prosecutors contend that Moussaoui should be sentenced to die because he lied when he was interrogated by Minneapolis FBI and immigration agents after his arrest on Aug. 16, 2001, and failed to disclose his role in the hijacking conspiracy. They say they will prove beyond a reasonable doubt that if he had revealed the plot, the government would have been able to stop the attack or limit the toll of nearly 3,000 deaths when hijacked planes slammed into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and the Pennsylvania countryside.

Defense lawyers sought the pre-Sept. 11 records for the first phase of the two-stage trial, when a jury will be asked to determine whether he is eligible for a death sentence. Moussaoui's lawyers argue that counter-terrorism officials overlooked clues and made so many other missteps before the attacks that they never would have thwarted the attacks, even if Moussaoui had told them all he knew.

If the government complies with Brinkema's ruling, it could give defense lawyers new ammunition in their efforts to show that U.S. counter-terrorism agencies and national security officials knew more about the suicide hijacking scheme than Moussaoui did, and that his assistance wouldn't have changed the outcome. The threat assessments presumably were reviewed by the Sept. 11 Commission, which said in its public report in 2004 that U.S. intelligence agencies received a stream of warnings in the spring and summer of 2001 that al Qaeda was planning "something very, very, very big"

If the government fails to produce the records, Brinkema could issue a sanction, such as dismissing the case. In that event, prosecutors could ask an appeals court to intervene in the case for a third time or drop the charges. Even if the government scuttled the case, Moussaoui would face a minimum sentence of life in prison without parole.

The four-year-old case has been delayed repeatedly by legal tangles over classified information, though the 28-year-old federal Classified Information Procedures Act offers methods for moving ahead by using substitute language to shield national security secrets.

A Justice Department official declined to comment on Brinkema's ruling.

"I won't discuss it under any circumstances," said Edward MacMahon, a lawyer for Moussaoui.

Al-Arian's Attorneys Want Off The Case (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

TAMPA -- Defense attorneys for Sami Al-Arian asked a federal judge to let them off the case if prosecutors retry the former college professor on charges of aiding terrorists.

While federal prosecutors are deciding whether to retry nine mistrial counts on Al-Arian, attorneys Linda Moreno and Bill Moffitt are asking to withdraw from the case. A hearing is scheduled for Friday.

"We gave everything we had, and I'm too exhausted to give anymore," Moffitt, an attorney for the law firm Cozen O'Connor in Washington, said Tuesday.

Moreno, who works for a civil litigation firm in Tampa, declined to comment.

Al-Arian's wife, Nahla, said her husband was looking for other attorneys but had yet to find replacements.

After six months of trial jurors failed to return a single guilty verdict against Al-Arian and three co-defendants. Al-Arian was found not guilty on eight counts but the jury deadlocked on the nine others. Two of the defendants were acquitted of all the charges.

The four were charged with raising money for terrorist attacks by the Palestinian Islamic Jihad in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Federal prosecutor Terry Zitek told the court that if the case is retried, his team will need until June to present "a streamlined case," which should take about two months to present to a jury.

Two Get Prison In Exports To Syria, Libya (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

DALLAS — Two brothers convicted of sending exports from their U.S. company to countries considered sponsors of terrorism were sentenced Wednesday to federal prison, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

Hazim Elashi was sentenced to 5 1/2 years in prison and will be deported after serving his sentence. His brother Ihsan "Sammy" Elashi was given a six-year term, which will run consecutively to the four-year sentence he is currently serving.

Hazim and Ihsan Elashi, their three brothers and their company were convicted in 2004 on charges of making illegal technology shipments to Libya and Syria.

The Elashis ran InfoCom Corp., a Richardson firm that did up to $5 million in business a year selling computers and Internet services to mostly customers in the Middle East. Prosecutors say they shipped computer products to Libya and Syria from 1997 to 2000, violating a ban on exporting technology, goods or software to countries the U.S. government lists as state sponsors of terrorism.

Agents from the FBI investigated InfoCom for years and raided the business the week before the Sept. 11 terror attacks. Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the original indictments against the brothers, calling it part of a campaign against "the financiers of terror."

The men also were involved in the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, a Muslim charity that was closed after the Treasury Department accused it of being a front for the militant group Hamas.

Bayan Elashi, Ghassan Elashi and Basman Elashi have not been sentenced on the exporting charges.

Lawsuit Filed In Support Of Muslim Scholar Barred From U.S. (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

Citing the case of a prominent Muslim scholar who has been barred from the United States, the American Civil Liberties Union filed a federal lawsuit yesterday seeking to strike down a clause of the USA Patriot Act that bars foreigners who endorse terrorism from entering to this country.

The suit was filed in Federal District Court in Manhattan on behalf of the scholar, Tariq Ramadan, and three national organizations of academics or writers who have invited him to speak to their members. The groups, including the American Academy of Religion, the leading American organization of scholars of religion, say Mr. Ramadan has never expressed support for terrorism. They also argue that the Patriot Act clause has been applied to stifle academic debate in the United States.

Mr. Ramadan, a Swiss citizen, has been denied a United States visa since July 2004, when he was on the verge of moving with his family to Indiana to take up a tenured professor's position at the Joan B. Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies at the University of Notre Dame.

In a telephone interview from Oxford University in England, where he is currently a visiting professor, Mr. Ramadan said he had never had an explanation why his visa was revoked, after he had been approved to teach at Notre Dame and had been a frequent traveler to the United States for many years.

"It's clear there is nothing in my record supporting terrorism," Mr. Ramadan said.

Speaking to reporters in August 2004, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, Russ Knocke, cited the Patriot Act clause as the reason that Mr. Ramadan's visa was canceled. The clause, adopted when the act was passed in 2001 and amended last May, bars foreigners who "endorse or espouse terrorist activity or persuade others" to support terrorism.

The author of some 20 books on Islamic theology and the place of Muslims in the Western world, Mr. Ramadan, 43, is an outspoken critic of the Bush administration's policies in the Middle East. He has also rejected Muslim terrorism, calling it "anti-Islam." Last August, he was invited by Prime Minister Tony Blair to participate in a task force to counter extremism after the London bombings in July.

The A.C.L.U., joined by the New York Civil Liberties Union, brought the suit against Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asserting that the Patriot Act clause is unconstitutional and that the ban on Mr. Ramadan violates the First Amendment rights of American thinkers who want to meet with him. The American Association of University Professors and the PEN American Center are also plaintiffs.

After Notre Dame applied a second time for a visa for Mr. Ramadan and he waited for five months with no response, Mr. Ramadan resigned in December 2004 from his position there. R. Scott Appleby, the director of the Kroc center, said the government never gave an explanation to the university. Notre Dame saw Mr. Ramadan as a theologian who could help build ties between Middle Eastern Muslims and the West, Mr. Appleby said.

Mr. Ramadan filed a new visa application on Sept. 16, after receiving about 40 invitations for speaking engagements in the United States over the past year. Interviewed in December in Bern, Switzerland, by agents of the Homeland Security and State Departments, Mr. Ramadan said he was mainly questioned about his views of the war in Iraq.

"I told them what I have said many times publicly, that I think the war was a mistake and illegal," he said. "Even the United Nations has said that. I think the resistance is legitimate but the means they are using are not."

A State Department spokeswoman, Janelle Hironimus, confirmed Mr. Ramadan's 2005 visa application but said the department did not comment on pending visa or legal matters.

Mr. Knocke of the Department of Homeland Security also declined comment on the suit or Mr. Ramadan's status. But he noted that the criteria for revoking visas included "public safety and national security risks," among others.

"We have a strong commitment and clear responsibility to restore integrity to our immigration system, which includes preventing people who might present risks from entering the country," Mr. Knocke said.

The controversy about Mr. Ramadan's ideas arises in part because he is the grandson of Hasan al-Banna, a founder in 1928 of the Muslim Brotherhood, an Egyptian group that has turned to violent attacks in recent decades. Some critics say that he speaks with two voices, espousing moderate views in Europe but embracing more militant ideas when he addresses Muslims in the Arabic world.

Barbara DeConcini, the executive director of the American Academy of Religion, described Mr. Ramadan as "one of the most respected scholars of Islam working today."

He was invited to give a keynote address at the group's annual meeting in November, Ms. DeConcini said, but without a visa he was limited to giving a lecture to a small audience by videoconference, which she called a poor substitute for his participation in the group's discussions. He has been invited to address the next annual meeting, she said.

While the government has the authority to exclude terrorists, Ms. DeConcini said, the Patriot Act clause "is being used much more broadly to censor and manipulate academic and political debate."

Mr. Ramadan said the ban had damaged him professionally, and the disruption had been jarring to his wife and children. He said he has not been offered another tenured university position.

U.S. Sued Over Islam Expert's Visa (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

Three scholarly organizations sued the federal government over its 2004 decision to revoke a visa granted to a European expert on Islam, preventing him from taking a faculty position at the University of Notre Dame.

The lawsuit, on behalf of Tariq Ramadan, a visiting scholar at Oxford University and critic of U.S. policy in Iraq, intensifies the debate over the Patriot Act and reflects concerns in academia that the U.S.'s security precautions are hampering the flow of ideas between foreign and U.S. scholars. A Department of Homeland Security spokesman and a State Department spokeswoman declined to comment.

The lawsuit asks the U.S. District Court in New York City to declare unconstitutional a portion of the Patriot Act that denies entry on the grounds of "ideological exclusion" to those who have endorsed or espoused terrorist activity or who have persuaded others to do so.

"There is simply no evidence" of Mr. Ramadan supporting terrorism, said Barbara DeConcini, executive director of the American Academy of Religion, one of the plaintiff groups.

ACLU Says Patriot Act Excludes Muslim Scholar From U.S. (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 25, 2006

NEW YORK – The ACLU sued the federal government Wednesday for blocking a Muslim scholar from entering the United States, arguing that the government should not use anti-terrorism laws as "instruments of censorship."

The lawsuit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union in U.S. District Court sought to open the way for Tariq Ramadan, a Swiss intellectual and Muslim scholar, to accept invitations to speak to audiences in the United States.

Ramadan was blocked from accepting a tenured teaching position at the University of Notre Dame when his visa was revoked in August 2004 because of a provision of the Patriot Act, said Jameel Jaffer, an ACLU staff attorney.

Jaffer said the provision blocks entry into the United States by any prominent alien who has used his status to endorse or espouse terrorism or to persuade others to endorse or espouse terrorist activity.

"We don't think there's any evidence at all that he has endorsed terrorism," Jaffer said. "In fact, there is overwhelming evidence that he has condemned terrorism."

Academic Groups Suing To Stop U.S. From Denying Visas To Scholars Based On Their Political Views (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - Three academic groups, backed by the American Civil Liberties Union, sued the Bush administration Wednesday to stop it from barring foreign scholars from the United States based on their political views.

The lawsuit seeks to overturn the government's use of the so-called "ideological exclusion" provision of the USA Patriot Act, which the Bush administration cited in revoking a visa for Tariq Ramadan, a prominent Islamic scholar, in August 2004.

Ramadan has sought to reconcile the Islamic and Western worlds and was offered a teaching position at the University of Notre Dame. His case has become a symbol for concerns over restrictions on academic freedom.

"If the instance of Ramadan is any indication, we are concerned about scholars ... who may be prevented from coming to speak with us, to meet with us," said Barbara DeConcini, executive director of the Georgia-based American Academy of Religion, which invited him to speak at its annual conference in 2004.

The group, which calls itself the world's largest association of scholars of religion, rarely takes stands on public policy issues. "It was important for us to step up to the plate," DeConcini said.

Megan Gaffney, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan, said she had no comment on the lawsuit.

It was filed by the ACLU on behalf of the religion group, the American Association of University Professors and the literary group PEN American Center.

Many scholars are expressing concern that security restrictions invoked in the name of fighting terrorism have constricted academic debate on controversial issues.

Knight Ridder reported last month that the State Department has been using ideological litmus tests in a program that sends American experts overseas to represent the United States, weeding out critics of the Iraq war. The department denied it was doing so.

In the last two years, the government also has barred 61 Cuban scholars who were to have attended a 2004 conference, and Dora Maria Tellez, a Nicaraguan scholar and former minister of health.

"The government has resurrected a practice that existed during the Cold War of excluding people because of their views" and is manipulating immigration laws to do so, said Jameel Jaffer, an ACLU staff attorney.

The Bush administration has never fully explained its decision to revoke Ramadan's visa days before he was to come to the United States.

Russ Knocke, a Department of Homeland Security spokesman, said at the time that the decision was based on "public safety or national security interests."

DOJ_NMG_0011858

A provision of the Patriot Act, amended last May, allows the government to exclude a foreigner who's found to "endorse or espouse terrorist activity or persuade others to endorse or espouse terrorist activity or support a terrorist organization," according to the lawsuit. The suit seeks to invalidate that provision.

Ramadan's many defenders say that, although he's been highly critical of the Bush administration's foreign policy, he has condemned terrorism.

Ramadan, a Swiss citizen, was invited by British Prime Minister Tony Blair last year to join a government task force on the sources of extremism in Britain.

Critics, including analyst Daniel Pipes, say Ramadan's been much more equivocal on the issue of terrorism. Pipes called Ramadan "Islamist royalty" in an article because his grandfather, Hassan Banna, founded the Muslim Brotherhood, the Middle East's oldest Islamist group.

Ramadan reapplied for a U.S. visa but was told last month that it could take almost two years to get an answer, the suit says.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

ACLU Decries 'Spying On Georgians' By Feds, Locals (AJC)

By Bill Montgomery, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 26, 2006

In the name of fighting terrorism, the U.S. government and police agencies from the federal to the local level have been spying on Georgia anti-war rallies, peace and social action groups, and even a vegan protest, the state legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union charged Wednesday.

Documents and surveillance photos obtained by the ACLU through a Freedom of Information Act request reveal a pattern of "spying on Georgians who are our friends and neighbors, and are leading lawful lives," attorney Gerald Weber said at a chilly morning news conference Wednesday outside the Georgia Homeland Security offices in downtown Atlanta.

"We have just seen the tip of the iceberg, but it's clear that citizens throughout Georgia have been spied upon by their own government," said Weber. "It's clearly an intimidation process."

"Many of us remember the days of J.Edgar Hoover, and this is another reminder," said state Rep. Nan Grogan Orrock (D-Atlanta). "If excessive power is not challenged, it can and will lead to abuse of power."

Officials from state and federal Homeland Security offices did not respond to requests for comment Wednesday.

Weber said some of the documents involve the National Security Agency, whose surveillance program has come under fire since it was disclosed in December by NBC News. That program, approved by President Bush, allowed the agency to eavesdrop, without warrants, on communications within the United States.

Weber said the released documents from a classified Pentagon database of suspicious people revealed that two local protests by the pacifist group Georgia Peace and Justice Coalition were monitored by federal agents last spring. The demonstrators were termed a "credible threat" in the documents. The surveillance was done at a meeting at the Piedmont Drive Quaker headquarters and at a vigil at an Atlanta Army recruiting station on Ponce de Leon Avenue.

"Why is our government spying on us?" asked Coalition organizer Ann Mauney. "While not the terrorist threat that the Bush administration claims as a rationale for all its surveillance, we are indeed a threat to the Bush administration's policies ... spying by the government has long been the first line of attack on citizens who challenge those in power."

A special agent at the FBI press office in Washington who would not give her name said the FBI "investigates groups or individuals when we have information or allegations of federal law being broken. We do not investigate groups or persons exercising their constitutional right of protest or dissent."

Other local organizations that complained of being targeted by surveillance include two other anti-war organizations, Atlanta Refuse and Resist and WAND (Women's Action for New Directions); a media watchdog group, the Atlanta Independent Media Center; and even a group of Georgians who eat only plants.

Vegan Caitlin Childs recounted Wednesday how she was detained for close to two hours last September for writing down the license plate number of a plainclothes DeKalb Homeland Security officer taking pictures of her and five others picketing outside a HoneyBaked Ham store on Buford Highway just before Christmas 2003.

"I was handing out fliers and couldn't help noticing the unmarked [police] car ... I wanted to know who was taking our pictures," Childs said.

A handout provided by Weber included copies of 20 photos taken by DeKalb Homeland Security of Childs and the other vegan protesters.

DeKalb's director of Homeland Security, Moses Ector, declined to discuss it. "We understand they have filed an intent to sue, so it's now a legal issue. Whatever I might say could come back to haunt us for years in that case, so I can't make any comment," said Ector.

ACLU Releases Documents It Says Show Government Spied On Georgians (AP)

AP, January 26, 2006

ATLANTA - The American Civil Liberties Union has released two documents from the FBI and DeKalb County Homeland Security related to an anti-war protest and a vegan protest that it says show those agencies spied on Georgia residents.

The ACLU's Gerry Weber said during a news conference in Atlanta Wednesday that the documents are part of a case the group is building that will show that officials at all levels of government are doing surveillance of government critics.

Weber says so far the ACLU has received complaints from six organizations and nearly two dozen people who fear they have been spied upon, photographed, videotaped or had their events infiltrated by government agents.

He says none of them did anything that would justify surveillance but rather are critics of the Bush administration.

Democratic State Representative Nan Orrock of Atlanta says Congress must check what she calls the government's excessive power.

The leader of an umbrella pacifist organization -- the Georgia Peace and Justice Coalition -- says her group is the one that organized two Atlanta peace events cited in a Defense Department database as ``credible threats'' to the Pentagon.

The coalition's Ann Mauney says spying is the government's first line of attack in trying to silence those who dissent.

FBI spokesman Bill Carter says all FBI investigations are conducted in response to information that the people being investigated were involved in or might have information about crimes.

A Mountain Of Documents On Hurricane Response, But Democrats Seek More (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — In their four months of digging, House and Senate investigators have collected hundreds of thousands of pages of documents and testimony from governors, mayors, Homeland Security and Pentagon officials and dozens of others touched by Hurricane Katrina.

To the Republican leaders of the two committees, the mountains of still-accumulating evidence are sufficient to answer questions about why the government did not do more to prevent a well-predicted disaster scenario from turning into a catastrophe.

Democrats say crucial holes still remain, particularly related to what senior White House aides and the president knew, and how they reacted to this knowledge, right before the storm and after it.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut and other Democrats on the investigative committees say they are not looking for a smoking-gun document implicating the White House. Instead, they say, they are trying to resolve contradictions and questions that have come up.

"What do they have to hide?" Representative Gene Taylor, Democrat of Mississippi, said in a telephone interview on Wednesday. "Why don't they just come forward and say, 'This is what we knew, when we knew, and this is how we reacted?' "

The White House said on Tuesday that it would deny requests for e-mail and other correspondence among top White House aides, including the chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr. and the homeland security adviser, Frances Fragos Townsend.

DOJ_NMG_0011860

In September, speaking in New Orleans, President Bush vowed to "work with members of both parties to make sure this effort is thorough," and his aides say he has done that.

"There are some 120 administration officials that have been made available to the committees for interviews or for hearings," Scott McClellan, Mr. Bush's press secretary, said Wednesday, adding that 15,000 pages of White House documents were provided. "We believe they're getting the information they need to do their job."

Yet certain questions remain. Michael Brown, the former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, testified to the House committee that he repeatedly e-mailed or spoke on the telephone to Mr. Bush, Mr. Card and Mr. Card's deputy, starting Saturday and Sunday before the hurricane struck.

Asked what kind of aid he requested, Mr. Brown replied, "I'm being advised by counsel that I can't discuss with you my conversations with the president's chief of staff and the president."

Documents uncovered during the investigation show that the White House was notified early Monday, hours before the storm hit later that morning, that it was probable that Hurricane Katrina would "lead to severe flooding and/or levee breaching," adding, "This could leave the New Orleans metro area submerged for weeks or months."

That night, after the storm passed, a report sent to the White House warned of a quarter-mile breach "in the levee near the 17th Street Canal" and that "an estimated 2/3 to 75 percent of the city is underwater."

Yet Mr. Bush and the homeland security secretary, Michael Chertoff, in interviews after the storm hit, said they never expected the levees to be breached. They said that after the storm had passed Monday, they were convinced that the city had survived without catastrophic damage.

"There was a sense of relaxation," Mr. Bush said at a news conference in New Orleans on Sept. 12, recounting his reaction. "I was listening to people, probably over the airways, say, the bullet has been dodged."

Mr. Lieberman wants to know more about how the White House could have felt it was appropriate to relax.

"That is central to the investigation," Mr. Lieberman said in an interview Wednesday.

A closed-door briefing provided to investigators by Ken Rapuano, Mr. Bush's deputy domestic security adviser, did not resolve these and other discrepancies, Mr. Taylor said.

At the briefing, Mr. Rapuano acknowledged that the government's response was deeply flawed, participants said. But when asked about the involvement of Mr. Bush, Mr. Card or Ms. Townsend, he also declined to offer details, saying, "I am really not here to discuss specific information that was passed to the president," according to a written summary of the briefing prepared by Democratic staff members.

"It was as shallow and phony a presentation by the administration as they possible could conceive," Mr. Taylor said, adding that he walked out in frustration.

Democrats also said that the documents provided by the White House consisted largely of news conference transcripts or e-mail sent to many people, instead of correspondence disclosing the decision-making process at the White House.

But Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, said that based on what his committee had, he was convinced that the report would be complete.

"The Select Committee has all the information we need to fulfill our duties and produce a comprehensive, fair, no-holds-barred report about the failures in response to Hurricane Katrina," Mr. Davis said Tuesday.

Mr. Lieberman said Wednesday that he realized it was unlikely he could get the information he wanted by threatening to subpoena. Even if one were issued, the administration would probably fight it in court.

Mr. McClellan all but invited such a response Wednesday.

"The president believes that Senator Lieberman ought to have the right to confidential conversations with his advisers, just like all presidents have asserted they ought to have that same right," he said. "That's what this is about."

Rejection Of Building Plan Causes Dismay In Louisiana (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0011861

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 25 — The White House decision to withhold support from a major Congressional reconstruction plan left Louisiana officials expressing bewilderment on Wednesday over what they characterized as the lack of a workable alternative from the Bush administration.

Congress has appropriated $6.2 billion in reconstruction aid, but officials say that is not enough to meet housing needs.

"The White House simply needs to tell us what their plan is," Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco said Wednesday at a news conference in Baton Rouge. "We don't see an adequate plan. You can't fix a $12 billion problem with $6 billion."

Other estimates have put the reconstruction cost much higher, with some going as high as $80 billion.

With whole neighborhoods in ruins nearly five months after Hurricane Katrina, officials of both political parties had lined up behind the Congressional reconstruction plan, which would have set up a federal agency to buy out flooded homeowners, cleaned up the land and sold it to builders.

Planners and officials had described the proposal, by Representative Richard H. Baker, Republican of Louisiana, as the best hope for avoiding what is starting to occur, islets of rebuilding in seas of destruction.

A measure setting up the agency, the Louisiana Reconstruction Corporation, was approved by the House Financial Services Committee before Congress adjourned last month. White House officials told Mr. Baker on Monday, however, that they would not support his bill.

He joined Ms. Blanco at the news conference on Wednesday.

Thousands of homeowners remain in limbo. Officials here say the storm destroyed or damaged more than 200,000 houses.

Emerging from the officials' statements on Wednesday was a sharp disagreement with the White House over the state's needs. Although Mr. Baker and Ms. Blanco described a sight that has become grimly familiar to residents, block after block of ruined houses, the administration has begun to concentrate on a much smaller picture of destruction.

Donald E. Powell, the federal coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, spoke this week of helping homeowners who lacked flood insurance because they were not in the federally designated flood plain, a number that comes to 20,000, an aide said. The $6.2 billion in block grants for Louisiana will be enough to help them, Mr. Powell said.

Louisiana state officials say that number understates the problem, failing to include tens of thousands of other homeowners whose houses were destroyed .

"Our count indicates far in excess of 200,000," Mr. Baker said. "What happened to the other 185,00?"

Administration officials have suggested that Louisiana follow Mississippi's lead in providing grants to homeowners. Ms. Blanco, a Democrat, rejected that approach on Wednesday, saying the state did not have enough money for it.

Representative Bobby Jindal, a Republican from New Orleans suburbs, also said 20,000 homeowners represented a significant understatement.

"I very strongly disagree with their methodology in terms of the final numbers," Mr. Jindal said.

Administration objections to Mr. Baker's bill centered on two aspects, Mr. Powell suggested. The bill would add a federal bureaucracy and set up what would be a government real estate agency, "which we don't think is a good business," said Mr. Powell, a former chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

The cost of Mr. Baker's plan— he and an aide used figures from $30 billion to $80 billion — prompted wariness, too. Old suspicions about how Louisiana spends its money have not disappeared.

Mr. Powell has all but put state officials on notice that close watch will be kept on the Community Development Block Grant money.

"I think it's important for Louisiana to spend this money in a very prudent and wise manner," he said on Tuesday.

That was echoed by an administration supporter on a rebuilding committee, Donald T. Bollinger, a shipbuilder, who said, "I think we have to demonstrate to Congress and the president that we are going to handle our C.D.B.G. grants responsibly."

Mr. Bollinger, a major fund-raiser for President Bush, was not so pessimistic about the rejection of Mr. Baker's plan.

"Everybody wants to think that if the Baker bill fails we have no other solution," he said. "I don't agree with that at all. I know we need a tool similar to that."

DOJ_NMG_0011862

More typical of the disappointment was a statement by Walter Isaacson, a member of the Louisiana Recovery Authority, created by Governor Blanco.

"We tried to have a prudent plan that was a way to build a safer city," Mr. Isaacson said. "This undercuts us, and undercuts the credibility of a president when he says he wants New Orleans to be able to rebuild itself."

Bush Eyes Grants, Not Agency, For La. Recovery (REU-Y2)

By Kristin Roberts

Reuters, January 26, 2006

The White House on Wednesday opposed a plan from a Louisiana Republican to create a federal agency to buy homes destroyed by recent Gulf Coast hurricanes, saying grants to state governments were a better approach.

The Bush administration said it was concerned about creating an outside entity to funnel federal money into housing redevelopment, and instead allocated $11.5 billion in previously approved funds to states hurt by the 2005 storms.

"We believe a more direct, better approach is to provide assistance directly to the local communities so that they can get that to the people through things like a Community Development Block Grant," said White House spokesman Scott McClellan.

But the Bush administration's rejection of Louisiana Rep. Richard Baker (news, bio, voting record)'s proposal was criticized by some government officials in Louisiana, which with Mississippi suffered most of the damage from hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma last year.

A group representing mortgage bankers also said President George W. Bush had yet to offer an alternative that was comparable to the plan proposed in Baker's legislation to create the Louisiana Recovery Corp.

"We'll really pay attention to the State of the Union address because we'll be anxious to see what the president is going to propose as a plan for rebuilding those devastated areas," said Kurt Pfotenhauer, senior vice president of government affairs at the Mortgage Bankers Association.

"It's clear that some plan has to be in place in order to spur the investment of private capital."

Pfotenhauer said he expects to see an increase in property abandonment and foreclosures over the coming months as people in the Gulf region are unable to make mortgage payments on homes that were destroyed or damaged by the storms.

Baker's legislation, already approved by a House committee, would create a corporation to buy and redevelop tracts of land devastated by the hurricanes, helping property owners in Louisiana avoid defaults on home and business loans.

The bill would redirect $17 billion in previously approved funds to pay for rebuilding in Louisiana, including $13 billion in Community Development Block Grant money.

The corporation would take over destroyed properties at the request of owners and pay off lenders. Under the legislation, the U.S. Treasury Department could sell bonds to pay for the corporation's property purchases.

"If there truly is a better way, then we should ask to see it, and I will help lead the fight to get it done," Baker said in a prepared statement. "But if there isn't, or if other plans prove unfair or ineffective, then we should not accept that this matter is settled."

Senate Banking Committee Chairman Richard Shelby, an Alabama Republican, said he would hold hearings on the proposal.

"It's an ambitious program," he said. "We'll look at it real thoroughly; that's what hearings are for."

GRANT APPROACH

The U.S. Housing and Urban Development Department on Wednesday afternoon set distribution levels for $11.5 billion in grants authorized under a bill Bush signed in December.

Louisiana will receive $6.21 billion in grants -- the statutory maximum. Mississippi will receive $5.06 billion and another $231.8 million in grants will be sent to three other states affected by the storms.

"This program allows states' leaders -- who are closest to the people -- to decide exactly how this grant money should be spent," said Donald Powell, a former bank regulator who took over as coordinator for the federal government's Gulf Coast rebuilding effort.

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin said the grant funds were a "good step."

DOJ_NMG_0011863

"The question that I'm going to raise is, are the dollars enough to really stand up our economy," he said.

Katrina Aid Falls Short, Blanco Says Grant To Give $6.2 Billion For La. Areas (USAT)

By Oren Dorell And Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, January 26, 2006

Storm-ravaged areas of Louisiana will get $6.2 billion in federal relief funds in a controversial plan that recommends giving the money to a small fraction of homeowners affected by the storm.

Donald Powell, President Bush's coordinator for Gulf Coast rebuilding, suggested that money from the government's funding grant, announced Wednesday, be doled out to roughly 20,000 homeowners who weren't in a flood zone and did not have flood insurance when Hurricane Katrina hit. State officials must draw up plans for disbursing the money and get federal approval. Louisiana officials had proposed a far more ambitious $30 billion initiative to rebuild ruined areas and said the government's relief effort would exclude at least 140,000 homes.

"It simply will not work," said Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, adding that she won't use the money as the White House recommends. "We are not in the business of choosing between our citizens."

Powell told reporters the money should go to homeowners without flood insurance who lived outside the area where federal officials thought flooding would occur. Under that proposal, homeowners who lived inside the flood zone and did not buy flood insurance would not be eligible for the federal funds.

Four other states affected by Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma also will get relief money from the grant, Powell said. Alabama will receive $74 million; Florida, $83 million; Mississippi, $5.1 billion; and Texas, $74 million.

Areas that were severely hit by the storm, including large portions of New Orleans and nearly all of St. Bernard Parish, would be excluded from the compensation plan.

Blanco spoke at a news conference in Baton Rouge with Rep. Richard Baker, R-La., architect of a proposal for the federal government to buy and later resell damaged homes. The White House rejected the plan, but Baker said Wednesday, "I've had inquiries from the House and the Senate in the last 48 hours for more information on the bill." He said he has passed bills before that initially were rejected by the White House.

Blanco said she appreciates the government's effort, but "they've almost designed this as a prescription for failure. … They gave us a ladder but took away the top two rungs."

In Mississippi, where 65,000 homes were left uninhabitable by the storm, authorities expect to be ready to accept applications for federal funds from homeowners in about a month, said Scott Hamilton, spokesman for the Mississippi Development Authority.

Mississippi plans to spend about $4 billion on homeowner assistance and the rest on public works, transportation and economic development. People who accept federal money will have to abide by new, stricter building codes and new Federal Emergency Management Agency flood maps, which might mean they will have to elevate their homes to rebuild, Hamilton said.

Powell said the government is leaving the door open for more money, should the grant not be enough.

'Chocolate' Aftertaste: Bittersweet, Indeed (WP)

By Wil Haygood

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin blew into the original Chocolate City yesterday. Everywhere he goes these days, there seem to be things to explain, his words and comments tossed about as if, well, in yet another hurricane.

"Everything I say gets zoomed in on," sighs Nagin, in town to attend the winter meeting of the U.S. Conference of Mayors at the Capital Hilton. "I don't get what all the fuss was about when I talked about New Orleans being a chocolate city. I mean, I understand the frustration with my 'God' comments. Maybe I went a little overboard. But Chocolate City? Come on."

In the aftermath of the horrific Hurricane Katrina, the mayor has been richly and routinely quotable.

He said, "How do I make sure New Orleans is not overrun with Mexican workers?"

He said to federal officials, whom he criticized for a feeble response to Katrina, "Get off your asses."

DOJ_NMG_0011864

He said, "Surely, God is mad at New Orleans. He sent us hurricane after hurricane after hurricane, and it's destroyed and put stress on the country."

And he said, of God, "But surely he is upset at black America also."

And he said that New Orleans will be a "Chocolate City" again.

The Chocolate City reference, Nagin has explained, exploded when he did not mean it to. The term was widely used by Washington's black radio announcers in the early '70s and referred proudly to the city's majority-black status and its prominent place in the black cultural scene. It gained wider recognition as the title of a 1975 album by the funk band Parliament.

Before Katrina, New Orleans was 67 percent black. Nagin says he was appealing to those evacuated to come back to a welcoming New Orleans. But there were those who believed his comment could be interpreted to mean that whites were no longer wanted.

Nagin says he wants anyone and everyone to return to New Orleans, heretofore known as the Crescent City.

"I thought, personally," says San Bernardino, Calif., Mayor Judith Valles, "with his 'Chocolate City' comment, he was just saying to the people who left -- and let's face it, most were African American -- that this is still your city. I think he meant it in a positive way. But it was politically incorrect, I guess. It missed the proper gesture." Then she says: "I'm a Democrat. That's why I understand the 'Chocolate City' phrase."

"I stepped out there and did something bold and unique," Nagin was saying yesterday. "I created a need for people to try to corner me. I think it's just me stepping out and being right."

Nagin is a tall, confident man with a shaved head and a bright smile. He was dressed in a smart black pinstriped suit and wore a Mardi Gras-like bracelet of black and white beads on his right wrist. A native of New Orleans, he had never run for political office before winning the mayor's race in 2002. He's married with three children. He's got a degree from Tuskegee University and one from Tulane. Before he entered politics, he was a vice president at Cox Communications. Before Katrina hit, much of the world did not know of Clarence Ray Nagin.

"It has been tough," acknowledges Seletha Smith Nagin, the mayor's wife. "It takes a toll on you." She says she has been gratified by outpourings of support. "We'll be okay. We'll be fine."

Nagin is up for reelection this year. He figures his chances are pretty good.

"At the end of the day, people look at my track record," he says. "Before the hurricane hit, real estate purchases were up, people were coming off the poverty rolls."

Many in the city gave him credit for tackling corruption, a chronic problem in the city government. Then came Katrina, and verbal clashes with the White House and with the administration of Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco.

"He's a human being. He's stressed," says Camden, N.J., Mayor Gwendolyn Faison, a conference attendee. "How many people say 'God has forgotten me' when there's been an accident in their family? He's human. It's not easy. His city has been destroyed and he's getting criticized for everything he does."

In a brief address to the conference yesterday, Nagin was rueful, hopeful and candid, offering a kind of "Our Town" look back, and ahead, for New Orleans.

"Imagine, if you will, being the mayor of a city where 80 percent of the city took on water and the water stayed three weeks. Imagine that city in the midst of an awful crisis, and 40,000 people are stuck. Then, the cavalry arrives and sends your devastated citizens to 44 different states. On airplanes. With one-way tickets."

He went on:

"Think of those people, who have gone through hell, sitting on that airplane. They don't know where they're going next. Some went to Alaska. And so the doors of the plane opens and after having gone through hell, you are in Alaska. And you see Eskimos and penguins."

The mayor's narratives have often been revealed to be apocryphal. He went on to say he didn't mind the criticism that has been heaped upon him, much of it from inside New Orleans. "I had to be their psychological punching bag."

He cautioned the gathering that the woes of FEMA need to be addressed. He said government infighting must stop. "We don't need to do a dance between the governor and the president when people are suffering." He said too many in New Orleans didn't have flood insurance because they had been told by mortgage lenders it was unnecessary. "We must take care of the people who did the right thing and got caught up in the worst disaster in the history of this country."

He was very warmly received.

Nagin said at the start of his address he would not be controversial. When he said it, a man sitting behind him grinned. It was Anthony Williams, the often-praised, often-maligned mayor of Chocolate City.

Changes Are Sought In Flood Insurance (NYT)

By New York Times Regional Newspapers

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

New York Times Regional Newspapers

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25 — The administrator of the National Flood Insurance Program asked Congress on Wednesday to allow the elimination of discounts on as many as 1.2 million policies and suggested that the government consider requiring millions more homeowners to buy coverage.

The program expects to borrow $23 billion from the Treasury to pay claims from Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma. In written testimony to a Senate committee, David I. Maurstad, the administrator, said the program would reach its debt limit by mid-February and require another infusion of up to $5.6 billion.

About 1.2 million policyholders, or about 24 percent, receive discounts on premiums because their homes predate flood maps. Mr. Maurstad asked Congress for the authority to phase out those discounts.

Mr. Maurstad also asked Congress to order the program's parent agency, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, to study expanding coverage requirements to properties in areas known as 500-year flood plains, with a 0.2 percent chance of flooding in any year, and to properties protected by levees and dams. He estimated that would affect four million to six million properties.

Massive Hurricane Claims Force U.S. Flood Insurance Overhaul (WSJ)

By Michael Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Amid massive claims from last year's Gulf Coast hurricanes, the Senate Banking Committee is preparing to overhaul the federal flood insurance program, resulting in much higher premiums for many homeowners and a likely taxpayer bailout.

Hurricanes Katrina and Rita put the National Flood Insurance Program so deeply in the red that experts are calling for radical surgery. So far, 239,000 damage claims have been filed by property owners around the Gulf Coast. Costs amounting to $23 billion are expected to dwarf the $2 billion in premiums and fees the program collects each year. "The flood-insurance program is in need of fundamental reform if we expect it to exist in the long term," said David Walker, who heads the Government Accountability Office, Congress's audit and investigative arm.

While broad legislation hasn't yet been proposed, several committee members and experts who appeared before the banking panel yesterday agreed that the insurance program needs to be restructured to operate more like a private insurance company. They suggested that subsidies given many policyholders now must be cut back and coverage should be curtailed for properties that are repeatedly flooded. Congress has rejected such moves in the past, but the program hasn't faced such a cash crunch. "We don't have the luxury of doing nothing. We have to make this program as actuarially sound as possible," said Committee Chairman Richard Shelby of Alabama.

The debate is over creating a premium and cost structure to allow the program to build surplus reserves that would cover costs of unusually expensive natural disasters. But it is unrealistic to think premiums could be raised high enough to repay the Treasury Department for the costs of last year's hurricanes, some committee members said. Property owners are required to buy the policies -- which for residences can cover as much as $250,000 in structural damage and $100,000 in lost belongings -- if they meet two conditions: They live in the most flood-prone parts of more than 20,100 communities that participate in the flood-insurance program, and they have mortgages from federally regulated banks or the Federal Housing Administration.

Legislation likely will roll back the program's premium subsidies, valued at about $1.3 billion a year, that go to about 25% of policyholders whose properties were built in the most flood-prone areas before the program's creation. The annual average premium for regular policies was $340 last year, while the average subsidized policy cost $710, according to the Congressional Budget Office. If the subsidy were removed the average premium on those risky properties would jump to about $1,800 a year.

WAR NEWS:

Insurgent Attacks Repelled (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Jan. 25 -- U.S. Marines and Iraqi soldiers repelled coordinated attacks on the provincial government headquarters in the western city of Ramadi on Tuesday afternoon, killing seven insurgents, the military said Wednesday.

Five insurgents -- whose assault included mortar, small-arms and machine-gun fire -- were killed by a strike from a Marine Harrier jet as they gathered in a nearby cemetery, according to a statement from Capt. Jeffrey S. Pool, a Marine spokesman in the city. Two other fighters died in a firefight after insurgents used a rocket-propelled grenade to attack a military convoy entering the city's main government compound.

No U.S. or Iraqi forces were wounded in the clashes, the statement said.

During the fighting, Zaal Shehan Mahmoud, 30, a cameraman for the Baghdad TV network, was killed by more than 20 bullets to the head, abdomen and legs, according to Mohammed Dulaimi, a doctor at the Ramadi hospital.

Baghdad TV is owned by the country's dominant Sunni Arab political organization, the Iraqi Islamic Party, which recently re-entered politics after boycotting elections held a year ago. A party official, Baha Aldin Naqshabandi, said Marines mistook Mahmoud for a fighter while he was gathering footage in the city's main market. He had been sent to Ramadi to report on the condition of residents after the recent outbreak of violence.

Ramadi, capital of the insurgent stronghold of Anbar province, has in recent months experienced some of the heaviest exchanges between U.S. and Iraqi forces and Sunni-led insurgents, who in early January killed dozens of police recruits in a suicide bombing.

Tension also mounted Wednesday in the predominantly Shiite southern city of Basra. Several hundred protesters took to the streets to denounce raids conducted Tuesday by British forces in which at least a dozen people were detained, most of them members of the city's police force.

Provincial Gov. Muhammed Waili joined the protesters, many of whom were of the same tribes as the detainees. They chanted slogans calling for independence from the foreign forces that police their region.

The police forces in Basra and across southern Iraq have increasingly come under the control of sectarian militias blamed for widespread kidnappings, assassinations and other acts of political violence. In September, British troops plowed armored vehicles through the wall of a police station in an attempt to free two service members believed to be detained there. The men were later found in a house nearby controlled by militiamen.

In Samarra, north of Baghdad, where more than 40 police recruits were killed by gunmen this week, Sunni Arab cleric Abdul Karim Jasim Muhammed was shot dead by police at a checkpoint on the road to the Iraqi capital on Wednesday.

Muhammed's mother, who was traveling with him in the vehicle, said police "shot randomly to frighten the people and force them to go back. I was about to tell my son to go back, but it was too late. One of the bullets reached his head and killed him immediately."

Meanwhile, a U.S. government audit of its spending in Iraq published Tuesday revealed irregularities and improprieties, including tens of millions of dollars in cash deposited and withdrawn from a vault without any tracking documentation and up to $60,000 in reconstruction funds gambled away by an American soldier traveling in the Philippines.

U.S. officials "did not effectively manage" more than 2,000 contracts worth $88 million, according to the report by the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, which covered spending during 2003 and 2004 in six southern and central provinces.

DOJ_NMG_0011867

In the southern city of Hilla, the document said, the United States paid $108,140 for renovations that were never made to an Olympic-size swimming pool and signed off on repairs to an elevator in the city's general hospital that later crashed to the ground, killing three people.

Special correspondents Salih Saif Aldin and Bassam Sebti contributed to this report.

General Sees Rift In Iraq Enemy Local-foreign Divide Could Aid U.S. Goals (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 26, 2006

BAGHDAD — A deepening rift between radical foreign-led fighters and native Iraqi insurgents has turned violent, the top U.S. intelligence officer in Iraq says. That creates an opportunity for American forces to try to persuade local guerrillas to put down their weapons and join the political process, he says.

"Now you actually have a wedge, or a split, between the Sunni population and al-Qaeda in Iraq," said Maj. Gen. Richard Zahner, deputy chief of staff for intelligence for multinational forces in Iraq. "It poses a significant crossroads for these groups as they look at where they head."

The U.S. military cited incidents of insurgent infighting in a rare public description of a split:

•At least six ranking members of al-Qaeda in Iraq have been assassinated by Sunni insurgents or tribal gunmen in separate incidents since September, Zahner said. The killings are usually in retaliation for al-Qaeda's role in violence, such as the execution of local police officers, he said.

•In Ramadi, in western Iraq, he said, armed clashes have erupted between local Iraqi insurgents and al-Qaeda operatives in recent months. At least one high-ranking al-Qaeda member, Abu Khatab, was recently run out of Ramadi by insurgents loyal to the local tribe.

•Near the Syrian border, members of the Albu Mahal tribe, which attacked U.S. positions as recently as March, have lately been pointing U.S. troops to al-Qaeda hideouts, Zahner said.

Iraq's national security adviser, Mouwafak al-Rubaie, also said there is a rift in the insurgency, calling it a "a major step forward in our fight against terrorism."

However, the significance of fighting among Iraq's diverse insurgent groups is difficult to determine. In the past 10 weeks, 18 groups have claimed responsibility for separate attacks in Iraq, said Ben Venzke of IntelCenter, a Washington-area think tank that works for U.S. intelligence. "With all those different moving pieces, you're going to see this constant movement and realignment," he said.

The U.S. military has described the insurgency as a mix of former Saddam Hussein loyalists, foreign militants and disenfranchised Sunni Arabs.

Zahner said the insurgency consists of about 12,000 to 15,000 hard-core Iraqi fighters and supporters, as well as 1,000 militants loyal to al-Qaeda in Iraq, of which about 10% are foreign.

Several trends have accompanied the split:

•The constitutional referendum in October and parliamentary elections in December attracted more Sunni voters than in the past. Voter turnout in the largely Sunni province of Anbar, for example, climbed from 2% in elections Jan. 30, 2005, to 55% in the vote last month. Al-Qaeda insurgents, however, have continued to attack voters and people involved in politics.

•Iraq's complex network of tribes and family relations means some families have members on both sides of the conflict. The foreign fighters' killing of police and government officials is beginning to trigger a response from local insurgents who are more loyal to tribe and family than to ideology, Zahner said.

•Al-Qaeda's aim of turning Iraq into a strict Islamic caliphate has turned some Iraqi fighters against the group, Zahner said.

Insurgents Give U.S. Valuable Training Tool Video Of Attacks Provides Up-close Look At Fighters' Tactics And Capabilities (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0011868

WASHINGTON — Videotapes of insurgent attacks in Iraq have become a potent propaganda tool for militant Islamists but also a handy training aid for U.S. forces, according to Army briefing documents being given to U.S. officers deploying for duty in Iraq.

Insurgents routinely videotape their attacks and sometimes post the footage on the Internet as propaganda to show tactical victories against U.S. military convoys or helicopters.

A briefing report prepared by the intelligence division of the Army's Training and Doctrine Command shows how the Army is mining the insurgent tapes for ways to avoid casualties.

"Insurgent videos have grown complex and sophisticated, with detailed graphics, English subtitles, English narrators, Jihadist 'humor,' and insults directed at the coalition to weaken (coalition forces') resolve and popular support," the report says. The document warns U.S. soldiers that "any non-media or not-CF (coalition forces) personnel with a camera should be considered suspicious."

The briefing is presented in the form of PowerPoint slides that have also been shown to soldiers already deployed in Iraq. It offers insights into insurgent tactics with the help of videos and photos taken by the insurgents themselves.

One shows an incident Aug. 10 when an Army supply truck passed a homemade road sign that concealed a bomb. In one image, the tractor-trailer is completely obscured by the fiery blast. The briefing warns that some roadside bombs are "victim activated," meaning that the motion of a passing vehicle sets off the explosive.

The overall thrust of the report is to show Army officers how and where Americans are dying in Iraq. The information in the report was current up to last month.

The briefing report says 55% of U.S. military deaths in Iraq are attributed to improvised explosive devices, the military's term for roadside bombs, and small-arms attacks. It says 59% of U.S. military deaths occurred in Baghdad and Sunni-dominated Anbar province, which runs from just west of Baghdad to the Syrian border.

Designed to help soldiers know what to expect and how to counter insurgent tactics, the briefing also warns that Iranian-backed Shiite militants as well as Iraqi Sunnis and foreign Sunni fighters are regularly mounting attacks.

Maj. Mark VanHout of the Training and Doctrine Command, based at Fort Monroe, Va., confirmed the authenticity of the report, which is unclassified but not released publicly.

Training commanders had asked for the report to give officers "a statistical analysis of what enemy tactics, techniques and procedures kill most soldiers," according to Gary Phillips, a threats specialist at the command's intelligence branch at Fort Leavenworth, Kan.

Phillips, a retired Army colonel who travels to military bases around the country preparing officers for duty in Iraq, says the roadside bombs are the most worrisome threat.

"They continue to move forward in how they're emplaced, how they're configured and how they're used," Phillips says.

His son, Army Capt. Dustin Phillips, deploys to Iraq in late February to train Iraqi police. "I told him this weekend, the issue is, don't let complacency set in. Don't think everything's copacetic. There is no safe spot."

The briefing characterizes insurgents as difficult to find, let alone defeat, and able to change their tactics as the U.S. military changed its own. Adjustments have included more powerful roadside bombs as the number of armored U.S. military vehicles has increased, the use of secondary bombs to kill those responding to initial roadside bombing attacks, and coordinated daylight raids.

The threat of small-arms fire, often directed at military checkpoints and convoys, "comes from all ages and sexes," according to the briefing, and usually originates from homes, vehicles or crowds that allow quick escape. The insurgents have also emulated the U.S. military's preference for "stand-off" style attacks in which the enemy can be hit without exposing the attacker, it says.

US To Release Five Female Prisoners In Iraq (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, January 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0011869

BAGHDAD - A US military spokesman in Baghdad confirmed Wednesday statements by Iraq Justice Ministry officials who said five women detainees are scheduled to be released Thursday.

Iraqi officials have been at odds with their US counterparts over the release of the five, among nine women terrorism suspects in American custody in Iraq.

The Justice Ministry said last week that six women were about to be freed. Reuters reported that Iraqi officials have suggested the delay in releasing the women was linked to the demands of the kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll, who threatened to kill her by last Friday unless all women prisoners were freed.

The deadline passed with no word on Ms. Carroll's fate. The US says it does not negotiate with kidnappers.

The handful of Iraqi women in detention at any given moment are a source of particular anger for average Iraqis and insurgents alike.

The US military says it makes special efforts to process women more quickly than men, because of the anger and violence generated by US detention of women. Many Iraqis assume that women are abused in US detention, and in a culture in which a family's honor is seen as tied up with their ability to protect their women, female detainees are an especially emotional issue.

Sunni Arab political leaders complain frequently about women in detention here. Demands that women be released have been made in other cases than Carroll's.

Shortly after the abduction of Iraq Interior Minister Bayan Jabr's sister on Jan. 4, for instance, her captors demanded that all women be released from the ministry's jails. She was later released unharmed.

The American military spokesman said Thursday's release of the female Iraqi detainees is unconnected to Carroll's abduction. He stated that the US military and Iraqi government had processed the women's cases according to normal procedures and determined they did not need to be held any longer.

The US military is holding about 14,000 security detainees following the release of about 500 guerrilla suspects last week. An Iraqi Justice Ministry official said the women would be among 424 prisoners released Thursday.

Deputy Justice Minister Busho Ibrahim Ali told the Associated Press that an Iraqi government commission had reviewed the six women's cases and suggested they be released due to lack of evidence. US authorities would not comment on his claim.

Carroll was kidnapped on a Baghdad street on Jan. 7 and her translator was killed. Muslim leaders have joined her family, friends, and colleagues in calling for her release.

Female Detainees Will Be Freed (WT)

By Jay Deshmukh

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraq will release women detainees from the infamous Abu Ghraib prison today in a move that might help free a U.S. reporter abducted by insurgents, one of a number of foreigners taken hostage in recent weeks.

An Iraqi Justice Ministry official said 424 detainees were to be freed today after a review of their cases by a joint Iraqi-U.S. board. These would include six of the nine women known to be in detention.

The kidnappers of U.S. journalist Jill Carroll, seized on a Baghdad street on Jan. 7, have threatened to kill her unless all Iraqi women detainees are set free. The deadline set for her has passed; her condition is unknown.

The official denied that the release of the women had anything to do with kidnappers' demands, and U.S. forces have stressed they do not negotiate with hostage-takers.

But a recent spike in hostage-taking of foreigners has embarrassed the government.

"Government services are doing all they can to free people kidnapped and detained," President Jalal Talabani's office said yesterday, quoting National Security Minister Abdul Karim al-Anizi, who met with the president.

More than 250 foreigners have been seized since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein. A number of them, including Westerners, have been killed.

U.S. and Iraqi forces are searching for two German engineers, Rene Braunlich and Thomas Nilzchke, the most recent kidnap victims, seized at gunpoint Tuesday by men posing as Iraqi soldiers in Beiji in northern Iraq.

"We are trying at the moment to obtain any information possible," German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said in Berlin, adding that no contact had been established with the captors yet.

The two Germans arrived in Iraq only on Sunday for a brief assignment at a detergent plant, the Associated Press reported citing German and Iraqi officials.

Two Kenyan telecommunications engineers were abducted last week after their bodyguards were gunned down in Baghdad, and there was still no news on the fate of four Western peace activists seized in November.

Meanwhile, a Jordanian hostage said in a videotape his captors had set a new deadline to execute him.

Meanwhile, the military said a U.S. Marine was killed by small-arms fire Tuesday in Karmah, 50 miles west of Baghdad.

A prominent Sunni Arab cleric, Karim Jassim Mohammed, 39, was fatally shot yesterday by police at a checkpoint heading into the northern city of Samarra, police said.

The Other Beat Of Her Heart (WP)

By Jackie Spinner

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

That can't be Jill, I whispered to myself, over and over, even as her picture hung on the TV screen.

No, it's not her, I said to myself in denial. Jill? Jill Carroll? Being kidnapped in Iraq, sitting cross-legged with black-hooded, gun-toting men behind you, was there any worse fate for an American reporter in Baghdad? I couldn't imagine it. This was my friend, a correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor, who, like me, had fallen in love with Iraq.

The day I left to join The Post's Baghdad bureau in May 2004, my twin, Jenny, told me that if anything happened to me, she would never feel joy again. I went anyway, selfishly clinging to an ideal, a quest for truth, grasping for a sense of purpose that even my twin could not give me.

In our 34 years, Jenny and I had never been apart for more than a few months at a time. She was always my identity, the other half of the Spinner twins who grew up in a blue-collar town in the Midwest, chasing lightning bugs and a sense that the world extended beyond the corn and soybean fields surrounding us.

For 13 months in 2004 and 2005, my half was in Baghdad, dodging mortar rounds, roadside bombs and potential kidnappers, while Jenny worried from home that I would not be able to keep my promise to my nephew, her young son. "Aunt Jackie always comes back," I told him each time I returned to Baghdad, to a place that began to feel more like home the longer I stayed.

Although I had tucked Jenny's warning words deep inside of me when I left, I realize now that on this journey of a lifetime, I had gone alone. And I was alone that day outside Abu Ghraib prison, when a stranger grabbed my arm and began dragging me toward a car.

After the kidnapping and killing of Nicholas Berg in May 2004, journalists were more careful when gathering outside Abu Ghraib to cover the release of U.S. security detainees. These releases occurred outside the secure compound, on an open stretch of highway between Baghdad and volatile Fallujah. Post reporter Daniel Williams had been ambushed on that road, his car raked with bullets. We reporters had become targets, forced to send our Iraqi translators out to interview those being released from Abu Ghraib.

Frustrated with this awkward interview system, I devised a new plan -- to cover the release from inside the prison. No other reporter had done this. It would be a good exclusive. I persuaded the military officials on the ground to let me do it, then consulted with my more experienced colleagues about the best way to get there. We decided it would be safer if a driver dropped me off with Post photographer Andrea Bruce. I had an abaya for disguise and a bodyguard with an AK-47. We would go at dusk. Our overnight bags for prison would be dirty hotel pillowcases, because they looked like the flour sacks Iraqi women often used. Abu Saif, who was working for The Post as an interpreter, made sure I knew a few words in Arabic. "Say it like this," he instructed. " Ani Sahafiya ," I repeated after him. "I am a journalist."

On Sunday night, June 13, 2004, Andrea and I slipped out of the car and walked into Abu Ghraib under a pink sky.

We settled into a small, whitewashed cell in a large warehouse and plotted how to cover the next day's story. The Army had painted the cell's walls, but the stains were still there: sweat, dirt, blood. Saddam Hussein had crammed as many as 64 prisoners into the same space where Andrea and I had two single cots, separated by only an arm's length.

Jenny. Her name often came out of nowhere when I found myself in a nearly unimaginable place. I needed to describe this to her. I needed her to see the colorful murals of Hussein still painted above the cell blocks: Hussein in a white military uniform surrounded by white doves, with the snow-capped mountains of the Kurdish north over his left shoulder; Hussein in dark glasses and a white fedora against a splashy black and orange background; Hussein in a dark suit, his eyes scratched by vandals.

I took my satellite phone outside and pointed it southeast, spinning around to get a signal. Bats fluttered in the artificial lights as I talked to Jenny a half-world away. "You'll never guess where I am. Abu Ghraib! The prison. Yes, I'm inside. It's so creepy, Jenny. I have to sleep in a cell. And I'm looking up right now, and there are all these bats, which makes it even more creepy. But I had salad for dinner."

With Jenny, I could be wide-eyed, excited, sad, scared, elated, real. In the bureau and with my editors, I had expectations to meet. The other correspondents were so hardened. They had seen war many times, had faced down dictators, guerrilla leaders and warlords in exotic, far-off places. This -- Iraq -- was all I had. I could not pretend to be more experienced than I was. But I could hide how green I was. I didn't need to act like a clown who had just joined the circus. No, I saved that for Jenny.

My words gushed out, as usual. I tried to call her at least once a day, never talking long, to check in, to bring her with me, when I just needed to hear her voice, when I was full of new sights and sounds and had to empty some of it. I could tell Jenny the part of the story that could not go in the news articles. I could tell her my story.

Back on my cot in the cell, I could not sleep. I kept imagining the ghosts of the detainees who had died in that room, kept hearing their screams, their voices finally growing hoarse, then fading into the nothingness that had already consumed them.

Andrea and I got up early the next morning to watch the release of about 500 detainees. The prisoners lined up according to the direction they were headed, Tikrit here, Baghdad there. They clutched homemade bags sewn from brown plastic MRE packages. Most professed their innocence to me.

From a guard tower, Andrea and I watched for hours as the buses with released prisoners rolled out, the crowd of nearly 600 waiting family members slowly thinning as the morning went on. Ghazwan and Bassam, our driver and interpreter for this trip, were outside the prison watching for us to come out. I wanted to wait until most of the onlookers had left so we would not attract as much attention.

Andrea decided to follow a bus of released detainees and jumped into a car with an Associated Press photographer and reporter. I called Bassam to let him know I was on my way and asked the Marines in the tower to make sure I made it to my car. I said it with such breeze, as if I were leaving a movie theater in the United States and getting ready to walk across a dark parking lot.

I followed a narrow path through barbed wire that led from the prison to a small parking lot near the front. Several cars idled in the noon heat. No one seemed to pay much attention to me. I walked along the perimeter of the parking lot and headed for the highway. I could not see Bassam or Ghazwan, but based on our telephone contact, I knew they were waiting in Ghazwan's yellow sedan.

Suddenly, a man ran toward me, grabbed me by the wrist and began pulling me toward an orange and white car. At first I said in Arabic, " La. La. Rajan. " No. No. Please. I pointed to the highway, where Bassam and Ghazwan were hidden from view. But he kept pulling me by the wrist. Another man came up behind me and grabbed me around the waist. Someone else grabbed the pillowcase that held my belongings and threw it aside. At first I couldn't fathom what was going on. What was happening to me? Were they trying to kidnap me? They were trying to kidnap me! My heart pounded.

I had avoided watching the video footage of Berg's beheading that played repeatedly on Arab satellite television. I imagined it now anyway. I could not let these men put me in that vehicle.

I was trying to remember how to say "I am a journalist" in Arabic as Abu Saif had instructed. I couldn't find the words. Instead, in a panic, I told them that I was a vegetarian. Ani Nabatiya! Ani Nabatiya! I fell to the ground and started kicking them. It did not stop them. They just dragged me on the ground, still trying to pull me by my hand. Someone yanked me up, and the man who first grabbed me ripped off my abaya. They saw the blue bulletproof flak jacket that foreigners wore in Iraq. He said, "No Iraqi, no Iraqi." I realized instantly: They think I'm CIA. So I screamed back, Washington Post! Washington Post! Until then, I had tried not to raise my voice. I did not want to attract the relatives still waiting for the detainees, but our tussle finally drew their attention, and a crowd formed around me. Where was Bassam? Where were the Marines I had asked to watch me as I walked to my car?

I looked over at the faces in the crowd, and I didn't see a single person who saw me as a human. I tried to plead with a woman standing there, plead with my eyes, and she looked like she wanted to spit on me. I was an American woman, no better than the American soldier in the photographs of the abused detainees who dragged one of their bloodied sons or husbands naked on a leash.

Bombs were going off almost daily. Iraqis were dying. They blamed the Americans. This is not what they had imagined when they imagined democracy. There was no distinction made between the American press and U.S. soldiers and contractors who had promised electricity and had not delivered it. They felt occupied, and I was part of that occupation.

I saw the helicopters blaze in the sky coming out of the prison, while the Marines followed on foot, pointing their weapons and shouting at the crowd. I didn't hear anything at first but the sound of my own voice, which had grown hoarse from my mantra: Washington Post! Washington Post!

Once the men who grabbed me saw the Marines, they let go, and everyone scattered. Bassam came running as the crowd parted. He had been trying to get a better look at what had drawn the people. But he had not seen me. Please, my bag, I mimed to Bassam, as the Marines led us back inside Abu Ghraib.

I balled up my head scarf and threw it on the dirt. "It didn't even work!" I yelled. I was furious that something about me -- my walk, my body, the way I carried myself -- had tipped them off that I was a foreigner. I leaned against a concrete barricade inside the prison, folding my hands in my lap to stop them from shaking. My entire body convulsed. I looked over at Bassam. "When we get back to the office, you tell them I didn't cry. Tell them," I insisted until he agreed. I needed them to know. I had not buckled. I had not broken down. I was intact.

When I called Jenny later, my voice shook. "These guys tried to kidnap me!" I exclaimed. I had already talked to my editor back in Washington, had heard myself begging: "Please, do not make me come home. I want to stay. Please, do not call me home."

Although I could tell Jenny the truth that I could not tell my editor -- that I was rattled but also resigned -- I did not tell her that I had pleaded to stay in Iraq. I did not want her to know that I had gotten so close to terror, so far from her, and yet I could not bring myself to come back, so that I could take away her own fears.

In the book, Jenny Spinner, an English professor, writes about getting Jackie's call about the attempted kidnapping.

I always knew it was her before she said anything, my "hello" met by a long pause, then the "click click" of the satellite phone as it attempted to shrink the miles between us. Sometimes I waited for her to speak; other times, I shouted eagerly into the phone, "Jackie? Is that you, Jackie? Can you hear me?" When she left for Iraq, she promised to call me as often as she could. We usually talked every few days, taking advantage of her journalist's access to the world outside Iraq. When she couldn't call, we e-mailed, often several times a day. As far away as she felt to me, it helped that I rarely went half a day without communicating with her, and we both understood what a privilege that was. But it also made her journey to Iraq seem closer, easier, than it truly was -- at least for me. As long as I could reach her, she was within my grasp.

This phone call, though, was different -- the pause longer, heavier, before I heard her voice. "Jenny," she whispered.

"What's wrong?" I asked, leaning into the kitchen counter where I had been cleaning breakfast dishes, steadying myself for whatever dark and unimaginable news she was about to share. I recognized that tone, the way she wrapped the letters of my name around a barely contained gasp. "Somebody tried to kidnap me," she said.

My world heaved. "Say that again," I said, even though I heard her the first time. Say it again and again and again. Say it until I begin to reconcile the bright Connecticut morning, happy and oblivious, with your world in Iraq. "I fought like a dog," she said, the narrative steadying her shaky voice. "I kicked and screamed until the Marines finally rescued me."

I tried to picture it: my thin sister, on the ground, her hands digging into someone else's dirt, scrambling for freedom.

"I don't understand," I stammered.

DOJ_NMG_0011873

"I'll be okay," she said, shifting into protective mode. "We left the prison and are -- " She stopped, interrupted by a loud voice. "Oh, no," she said, before the phone clicked and went silent.

I stood at the sink, unsure what to do, how to go about the morning, the day, the rest of my life.

It would be hours before she would call again, and by then she was a new self, resolved, distant, yes, farther away than ever before.

Abduction Forces A Grim Look At What A Story Is Worth (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

BAGHDAD — When Jill Carroll was kidnapped, other journalists in Iraq were aghast that something so horrible had happened to someone they knew. But many insisted privately that it never would have happened to them.

They would have traveled in an armored car. They would have taken two vehicles so the second, the chase car, could have scared off the gunmen. They never would have gone to that neighborhood.

Maybe, maybe not. You could avoid western Baghdad, where she was abducted, only to be nabbed in the southern district. You could have two cars and the second could have its tires shot out and careen off the road. You could be in an armored car and your driver could lose his nerve.

The truth is that we are working in a war zone where no rules apply. No one is safe: not Iraqis, not Westerners, not men, not women.

For most journalists in Iraq, it's hard to be honest about danger, even though we talk about it all the time. We follow daily reports about the number of roadside bombings, suicide attacks and abductions. We chart violence the way other people watch the weather.

But talking about the danger in Iraq for what it is — my life, my death — is too scary. So we make it ordinary. "Oh, did you see any gunmen on your way over, there were some at the intersection yesterday, and would you like a cup of coffee?"

To family and friends not in Iraq, it is incomprehensible why you came here, and certainly why you returned twice, three times — in my case, over and over for nearly three years.

I could say something like "The cycle of risk and survival makes life more valuable," but that wouldn't be true, although some journalists do become addicted to the danger, to the high of sidestepping death.

Witnessing History

For me, at least, what is true is that once in a while as a journalist you get the chance to witness history, a moment when tectonic plates shift, when more is at stake than you ever imagined you would touch or see. It's the adrenaline surge of being in a place where people's lives are in the balance, where every decision counts and where what you're writing might, might just matter.

And you feel more alive than you've ever felt — but you're also often closer to being killed. You notice I wrote "often." I needed a qualifier.

As I said, I wasn't drawn to the danger; it crept up on me. I put out of my mind unsettling questions about just how close I might be to getting killed. But it lurked out there, inescapable. Is a 50-50 chance of survival acceptable? Or are you only comfortable if the odds are better than 80-20?

These are the calculations I've made every day, sometimes several times in a day. Calculations about the odds of being caught in a suicide bombing, abducted, shot by mistake or on purpose. I've become a bookmaker of sorts. I can tell you that the chance of being caught in a suicide bombing is slight, unless you have to go through a checkpoint, at which point it skyrockets. But the chances of my being kidnapped, well, I don't even want to write about that.

I remember an American security contractor with a faraway, almost happy look telling me in 2003, when we could still drive around Baghdad without worrying about it, "Nothing clarifies your thought like a gun to the head." Well, I assured myself, I'm not that far gone.

DOJ_NMG_0011874

A year later, I had a chance to test his assertion. I had gone to a hospital in Fallouja to report on the killing of four Iraqis, reportedly by U.S. Marines. But a relative of one of the dead saw in me an infidel intruding on his family's private grief, and in a rage he pulled a gun on me and my interpreter. In that moment, I learned that with a gun near my head, I didn't feel clear about anything except that what I was doing wasn't worth it and that I had put my interpreter, whom I cared about deeply, in danger. He had four children and a wife. What did I think I was doing? And I couldn't bear to think about my family and what it would do to them if I were killed in a foreign place.

The waves of nausea came hours later and I kept trying to breathe more deeply, but for almost a day I felt like I couldn't fill my lungs.

Trying to Blend In

Still, it took nearly two years before I turned back from an assignment. Because something changed for me when Jill Carroll, an American freelance journalist for the Christian Science Monitor, was abducted Jan. 7.

I had always told myself that despite my blue eyes and pale skin, I would slip unnoticed through Iraq with my hijab, head scarf and black abaya. The abaya was my cloak of invisibility, my body armor.

I studied the way many Iraqi women walked — with a slight shuffle, from wearing slip-on mules much of the time. I studied how they linked arms with other women when they walked in the markets. I noted the kind of purses they carried — large and black. I blended. I was thrilled when people addressed me in Arabic; perhaps they really thought I was one of them.

Carroll had gone one better than me — she actually spoke Arabic — and still she was unable to avoid the wash of fury and hatred that now confronts Westerners. We are not wanted.

The words of a dear colleague floated to my consciousness on my most recent trip to Iraq. We used to argue daily about safety, and each thought the other took unnecessary risks — the truth was that we each took risks in our own way. I had proposed driving to Najaf, a city south of Baghdad, at a time when the road was known for ambushes, kidnappings and beheadings. "Alissa, an abaya is not bulletproof," he had said.

So when Carroll was kidnapped, although I did not know her, my heart went out to her.

I was aware of the statistics: Since the beginning of the war, 60 journalists, five of them women, had been killed in Iraq and at least 37 abducted, according to a tally by the Committee to Protect Journalists. But like all the other foreign journalists in Iraq — fewer than 75 of us, down from more than a thousand after the war — I needed to believe that I was going to slip through.

After Carroll's abduction, I don't feel that way anymore.

Last week I set out in the early morning for Kut, a city about two hours south of Baghdad. We left early so that we could get back in a day, adhering to the rule that you shouldn't stay long in a single place because word will get around that a Westerner is in town.

I roused one of our British security advisors at 7 a.m. and had him remind the drivers of protocol (keep the cars apart, don't look like a convoy, rely on radios to communicate). But when I went out, it turned out the driver had brought his own vehicle, not an armored car.

Moment of Truth

Carroll's experience hung in my mind. She had been abducted in part because she lacked the protection of an armored car, and her interpreter had been shot dead. I looked at my interpreter, a beautiful young Iraqi woman who loved to read English literature, had helped me buy Iraqi shoes so that I would appear more local and had taught me about the world of Iraqi women. But I pushed ahead.

Then it turned out we didn't have a Thuraya satellite phone in the car. Cellphones are notoriously unreliable in Iraq because the U.S. military often blocks signals during its operations. Traveling without a satellite telephone as a backup is at best foolhardy. But we had already left, so I resigned myself to traveling without it.

We weaved through the Baghdad traffic. The road was crowded and people could easily see us through the car windows. Although I usually look out at the passing scene, I forced myself to look into the car so that my eyes and skin would not be visible.

The most dangerous part of the trip is the 15 miles of road immediately south of Baghdad proper. It runs through a largely Sunni farming area, one where mutilated, headless bodies have turned up often. It feels like outlaw country: Someone could grab you and no one would say anything.

As we went through the last Baghdad checkpoint, a policeman told our driver that a new security plan was in effect and we would not be able to reenter the capital for 48 hours. The driver pulled over and turned to me: Did I still want to go?

It was a moment of truth. I had to get back that night. Was there any other way I could get into Baghdad if the roads were closed? Yes, my driver said. "You can walk across the Diyala bridge and the office can send a car to meet you."

He nodded to a stream of people who were doing that right then — women in swirling abayas picking their way through the mud, men striding along. "How far would I have to walk?" I asked. About a mile. "Is it safe?" The driver shook his head. "There are bad people here. Everyone can see you when you are walking. We cannot honestly tell you it is safe."

I appealed to my interpreter. "What do you think, Zainab? Is it that unsafe?" She turned and looked at me. "I'll go with you if that's what you decide to do, but the driver wants to know what he can do with his car. He can't leave it outside Baghdad on the road for the night. It would be stolen. He can't stay with it — it's dangerous. And then we have the chase car. What do you want them to do? "

'We Can't Go'

I was silent. I had come back to Iraq to do a small number of interviews. If I didn't go to the one in Kut, I wouldn't be able to finish the story.

I thought about close calls I had had in the past. About my interpreter, who said she would go with me no matter what. About my parents, who hated that I was in Iraq. About Carroll, whom I imagined alone in a room, perhaps cold, perhaps not knowing that thousands of people were thinking about her.

And I thought about an autumn night more than a year ago when a colleague had rushed off into western Iraq to cover a suicide bombing. I remembered how worried I had been, and when I finally reached him on the satellite phone I had said: "It's not about us. We can die if we want to here, but we can't put those who work for us in more danger than they already are. We're making decisions for more than ourselves."

I remember that he had listened and, hard as it must have been, said, "You're right, I'm coming back."

I heard my own words now in my head. There was no choice. "We can't go. There's no way to make it a safe trip," I said. "Let's turn around and go back to the office."

Was it the right decision? Could I have walked across the bridge unnoticed? Did the drivers really assess the danger correctly? I don't know. But what I do know is that Iraq is hostile ground and nothing I do can make it safe.

Kurd's Writings Land Him In Jail: A Critic Of Party Corruption, Or A Reckless Defamer? (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

ERBIL, Iraq, Jan. 25 — Kamal Sayid Qadir had just returned here from Austria in late October when two trusted former students invited him for coffee at the Hotel Avista.

For Mr. Qadir, the meeting held the promise of a reunion of kindred spirits from Salahaddin University where, as a faculty member a few years back, he had clashed with administrators allied with the Kurdish leader Massoud Barzani. From Austria he had written articles accusing Mr. Barzani's all-powerful Kurdistan Democratic Party of corruption while calling members of its intelligence service, the Parastin, criminals and its chief — Mr. Barzani's son — a "pimp."

But Mr. Qadir said he never made it home from the hotel that night. Betrayed by his former students, who unknown to him had joined the Parastin, he says he was abducted after he left the hotel. He is now imprisoned here, sentenced last month to 30 years for defaming the Parastin and Kurdish political leaders after a trial that he said had lasted 15 minutes.

His case, while extraordinary, is by no means unique. Two journalists from Wasit Province in east central Iraq face 10 years in prison for suggesting that Iraqi judges kowtow to the American authorities just as Saddam Hussein's courts rubber-stamped edicts of the Baath Party. The journalists, Ayad Mahmoud al-Tamimi and Ahmed Mutair Abbas, had also accused the then-governor of Wasit of corruption and labeled him a bastard, a grave insult here.

Taken together, the prosecutions indicate how much remains at play in newly democratic Iraq. The nation has made remarkable steps away from totalitarian rule: the overthrow and prosecution of a genocidal dictator, two national elections and the adoption of a Constitution. But it remains to be seen how far Iraq will ultimately travel toward true Western-style democracy.

In much of southern Iraq, for example, real power increasingly lies with Shiite militias that serve religious leaders and enforce a rule of strict Islamic mores and second-class treatment of women. Now, the prosecutions of journalists suggests that the new Iraqi government is at another crossroads. Will it revert to state-sanctioned intimidation of the news media or allow the sort of free-flowing exchange of ideas that flourish in newspapers, blogs and other media in the Western world?

"These cases set a terrible precedent and are sure to make any Iraqi journalist think twice before writing about powerful political figures," said Joel Campagna, senior program coordinator for the Middle East and North Africa for the Committee to Protect Journalists, a watchdog group in New York.

As with other nations newly liberated from authoritarianism, Iraq is still testing the limits of responsible free speech, and some of the name-calling and rumor-mongering that goes on clearly oversteps the boundaries. Many of Mr. Qadir's criticisms exceeded what would be tolerated in other Middle East countries, particularly his assertions about the sexual proclivities of the Barzani clan.

A number of Kurdish journalists who have called Mr. Qadir's imprisonment outrageous say they are nevertheless uncomfortable with some of his writings, calling them offensive and reckless. Indeed, Mr. Qadir said in a prison interview that he had apologized for parts of articles he now says contained improper personal insults. But he vowed to continue to criticize official corruption, including what he says are secret abductions by the police.

But the Iraqi authorities increasingly go beyond merely responding to unfair or false claims, Mr. Campagna and other observers say, using the courts as an instrument of intimidation to discourage reporting on corruption and abuses of power. Iraq, he added, "is following the poor example of its neighbors who routinely detain, criminally prosecute or imprison reporters for their work."

For its part, the Kurdistan Democratic Party says almost all Mr. Qadir's accusations are false. His arrest came after he was served with a proper warrant, said a senior official of the K.D.P. and the Parastin, who asked that his name not be used because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the case. He said Mr. Qadir had been given a fair trial and had not, as he has asserted, been abused in prison, forced to sleep in his own excrement, threatened with torture or denied food and water. Massoud Barzani "has nothing against him," the official added.

The Kurdish party tolerates reporting of official corruption and supports narrowing defamation laws so fewer types of articles might be subject to criminal prosecution, the official said. But he also said defamatory writings intended "as a political weapon" should still be subject to prosecution. Mr. Qadir's writings would fall in this category, he said.

Mr. Qadir's case has drawn international attention and put enormous pressure on Kurdish leaders. The senior official of the K.D.P., which controls western Kurdistan, said that Mr. Qadir's sentence would be reduced to one year and that his family would be permitted to bail him out. The senior official said a court would make the ruling in the next few weeks.

But Mr. Qadir still could face serious criminal jeopardy from complaints yet to be prosecuted, said Ismael Khalil Shakeeb, the presiding criminal court judge in Erbil and one of the judges who sentenced him last month. "He has insulted many other people," he said.

Mr. Qadir, 48, credits a statement issued by the United States over the Voice of America for possibly saving his life. An American official in Baghdad said Washington had discussed the case with Kurdish officials. Delegations including Austrian officials have paid prison visits, he says, adding pressure that greatly improved his living conditions.

Kurdistan is, in most respects, the most westernized and prosperous part of the new Iraq, having experienced a decade or more of virtual independence even before the American invasion. But writers here face threats and arrest for running afoul of the K.D.P., Mr. Qadir says.

"We have no freedom of the press," he said in an interview conducted Friday afternoon in the Erbil prison. "It's all arbitrary; they can arrest anybody. I never thought I'd be a victim of the Kurds."

Mr. Qadir's complaints about curbs on press freedoms are supported by Rebin Ismael, a former senior editor of a large Kurdish newspaper who now runs an American aid organization in Erbil.

In Kurdistan, he says, it is not unusual for the secret police to threaten or arrest journalists who fail to toe the line of the K.D.P. More than a dozen journalists have been arrested in recent years, he says, but the cases are never reported on in Kurdistan because other journalists fear saying anything critical of the party.

DOJ_NMG_0011877

"Generally, any journalists or writers not connected to the party are under threats," Mr. Ismael said. "If you write anything not in their interest, they will arrest you or call your cellphone and threaten you."

He said he and his wife, a Kurdish reporter whose articles have mocked the party, had not slept in their house for nearly a month, having fled after she received threatening calls.

The senior Kurdish party official described Mr. Ismael as a credible and respected journalist but took issue with his comments. Told the names of four of the writers Mr. Ismael said had been arrested, the official said the four had not been arrested but had been called to "interviews" by the police.

He said he did not know how many other journalists had submitted to such police interviews. He said only one writer aside from Mr. Qadir had been sent to prison in recent years.

Mr. Qadir, born and raised in Kurdistan, is now a citizen of Austria, where he studied and lived until 1991, when Kurdistan was effectively liberated after the Persian Gulf war. He returned to teach law and political science at Salahaddin University but clashed with the administration as he lectured students about K.D.P. abuses, he said. Nepotism and graft are still rampant today, he said.

He left the university a few years ago, he said, and returned to Austria, where he continued to write about Kurdistan for Internet publications, adopting a strident and disparaging tone that pushed his criticism well past what anyone living here would contemplate. He accused K.D.P. officials of siphoning public funds and spying for the K.G.B. and the Israeli Mossad, and he wrote that one Barzani clan member was homosexual and another had had trysts with Russian women.

He say he regrets calling Massur Barzani, the Kurdish leader's son, a pimp. But he argues that the Parastin often use prostitutes to gather information.

The senior K.D.P. official said the criticism of the Parastin and the personal attacks on the Barzanis were all false. But he admitted he did not know whether the Parastin used prostitutes to aid intelligence gathering.

If freed and allowed to stay in Kurdistan, Mr. Qadir says he will continue to criticize what he characterizes as the police-state atmosphere in Kurdistan. "I never knew Kurdistan was in this shape, where people get abducted by the secret police," he said.

British Arrests Of Police Strain Relations In Basra (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 26, 2006

BAGHDAD — Tensions continued to simmer Wednesday between local Iraqi officials and British troops in the Shiite-dominated southern city of Basra, where the British this week arrested 14 law enforcement officials, including two senior police intelligence officers, allegedly linked to political corruption and assassinations.

The British released several of the men Wednesday, but a spokesman for the Basra provincial council said that eight remained in custody, including three who had been transferred to a prison facility after British authorities said they had bomb-making materials in their possession.

Among the officers still being held by the British are Maj. Jasim Qasim Hassan Daraji, Basra's deputy chief of intelligence, and intelligence officer Capt. Abbas Munis Abdalali Hilfi.

The province has responded to the arrests by threatening to cut off all cooperation with British forces in Iraq's second-largest city.

"For some time, the British forces have made random arrests in a provocative way against the citizens of Basra without the knowledge of the local government," said a statement released by provincial officials. "We have demanded over and over that these forces stop these arrests and release detainees, but all in vain."

Iraqi officials also demanded the unconditional release of the police officers and threatened to "suspend all dealings with British forces" if the men were not freed by Wednesday afternoon.

Maj. Peter Cripps, a British military spokesman in Basra, said the arrests were part of an ongoing investigation of police corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0011878

"These men were all part of the former internal affairs department that was disbanded by the Ministry of Interior and are now in the criminal intelligence unit and the serious crimes unit," Cripps said. "They are alleged to be following their own agenda, including corruption, assassinations and persecutions of citizens."

Although Basra, a predominately Shiite Muslim port city and oil hub, has experienced less of the insurgent violence that has wracked Baghdad, it has seen a wave of sectarian-driven killings and political attacks since the beginning of last year. Shiite militia members are believed to have a strong presence in the police force.

In October, scores of Iraqi policemen raided the Thar Allah Party headquarters, a small militant Shiite political organization based in Basra, and burned the building down. Four Thar Allah members were killed in the incident. Party leaders blamed Al Fadila al Islamiya, or the Islamic Virtue Party, which holds a narrow majority on the Basra provincial council, and Al Mahdi militia. Both groups are associated with radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr.

And in September, Shiite militiamen clashed with British troops after tanks rescued four British soldiers from a Basra jail.

In recent months, British officials in Iraq and in London have also complained that Basra militiamen may be involved in bomb attacks against British troops, using ordnance fashioned in Iran. Basra is a suspected hub for Iranian intelligence agents.

"The Iranians have interests in Basra and have organizations in Basra, Amarah and Nasiriya," said Mansour Alkanaan, an Iraqi National Assembly member from Basra.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, members of the United Iraqi Alliance, the Shiite bloc that won the most seats in the parliament elected Dec. 15, named four Shiite candidates for prime minister to be chosen by its members. Candidates include current Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, Adel Abdul Mehdi of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, deputy parliament speaker Hussein Shahristani and Fadila party member Nadim Jabiri.

In initial negotiations with Kurdish and Sunni Muslim Arab legislators on the new government, United Iraqi Alliance member Baha Araji said the Shiite bloc would not consult with other coalitions on the selection of prime minister, but would offer the presidency to a Sunni Arab candidate.

However, Saad Ilyan, a member of Iraqi National Dialogue, a Sunni Arab party, said he would be satisfied to keep the incumbent president, Jalal Talabani, a Kurd. The Kurdish slate won the second-highest vote total in the December election.

"We only now want the security situation to be better, whether the government is going to be Sunni, Shiite or Kurdish," Ilyan said.

In other developments, the Iraqi Ministry of Justice announced Wednesday that it would release five of eight female detainees today as part of a larger release program. This month, a group claiming to be the abductors of American freelance journalist Jill Carroll issued a statement demanding the release of all female prisoners in Iraq.

The five are in U.S. custody, but Iraqi and U.S. officials have denied any connection between the planned releases and the kidnappers' demands.

Carroll's condition is unknown, as is the fate of two German contractors who were kidnapped near the northern oil refinery in Baiji and two Kenyan engineers seized last week. More than 250 foreigners and hundreds of Iraqis have been kidnapped since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

Times staff writers Suhail Ahmad, Shamil Aziz and Saif Rasheed, special correspondent Asmaa Waguih and a special correspondent in Basra contributed to this report.

On Iraq's Front Lines, Digital Memorials For Fallen Friends (WSJ)

By Dionne Searcey

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

The night his buddy was killed by insurgent gunfire in Iraq last March, Army Spc. Mitchell Bass hopped out of his bunk and grabbed his laptop. He searched his computer for every digital photo he could find of the friend, Staff Sgt. Juan Solorio, and then wandered around the camp in Mosul with his portable hard drive asking other soldiers whether they had any photos or video clips.

They gave him shots of Sgt. Solorio sporting a newly shaved head and leaning against a burned-out truck on an Iraqi roadside. They found footage of Sgt. Solorio reaching for his pistol, dropping it in the mud and laughing. Spc. Bass strung all the images together into a video and added a soundtrack, "The Night That the Lights Went Out in NYC" by punk band the Ataris. Then he played it at a memorial service in Iraq.

"As a joke he grew this huge, disgusting mustache," Spc. Bass said of his friend. "I made sure to add a few of those photos in there."

Digital photography, video and Internet access have let soldiers in Iraq stay closer to distant friends and family than troops in any other war. Now, these electronic records are also creating a powerful and raw new wave of war memorials.

A dusty tent in Mosul served as Army Capt. Kevin Latham's studio, where he made videos to honor the four soldiers in his unit who had died just before Christmas 2004 when a suicide bomber detonated explosives in the camp's mess hall. Mortars boomed in the distance as he worked long past midnight to carefully select music to go with the videos.

Paul Rieckhoff, who served in the Army National Guard in Iraq in 2003-2004, said that in the early days, soldiers in his unit made action videos of themselves raiding insurgent hideouts and carrying out other wartime tasks. "It was kind of like the ESPN highlight reels -- the music is pumping and everyone was running around," said Mr. Rieckhoff, who founded the advocacy group Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America.

When a fellow soldier, Spc. Robert Wise, a 21-year-old from Tallahassee, Fla., was killed in Baghdad in November 2003, his friends used a laptop to create a digital slideshow, set to music, of photos of Spc. Wise. It was projected onto a screen at his memorial service in Baghdad.

"When soldiers are killed in Iraq, all you see in the paper is name, rank and age," said Mr. Rieckhoff, a first lieutenant. The videos, he said, are "cathartic and a way to eternally honor their memory."

DIGITAL MEMORIES

Watch the memorial videos for Sgts. Juan Solorio1, Zachary Wobler2 and Christopher Pusateri3. (Windows Media Player required4)

In another memorial video, Army Master Sgt. Brian Mack, who died in Mosul a year ago this month, is shown in photos riding in a Blackhawk helicopter and in a short video clip rushing a stationary target during gun practice, shooting repeatedly while friends laugh. It's set to the melancholy song "Clocks" by Coldplay.

"Every time someone was killed, we put together a little thing like that," said Sgt. Emmet Cullen, a sniper who fought alongside Master Sgt. Mack. "It helps the grieving process putting them together. Talking about them, seeing them with a big goofy smile on -- it helps."

Wartime cinematographers say commanders ask to review the videos before they're shown at memorial services to make sure they don't degrade the image of soldiers with, for example, footage showing them drinking. In Master Sgt. Mack's video, some officers initially objected to a clip that showed the soldier firing his weapon without wearing his helmet, a violation of military safety standards, said soldiers who helped make the video. But the clip was allowed to go into the finished product.

Lt. Col. Christopher Gibson, who has completed two tours in Iraq as commander of an 82nd Airborne battalion, said he watched the videos for two of his troopers -- Sgt. Christopher Pusateri and Staff Sgt. Zachary Wobler -- several times in advance of their memorial services "so I could keep myself together when I delivered my remarks," he said.

When Sgt. Pusateri was shot to death last winter, Col. Gibson turned to members of his communications team to make his memorial video because they were familiar with computer equipment. One of them was Capt. Jerrold Castro, who met with fellow troopers and laid out a storyboard of sorts, to select the order of the photos and video clips. On his laptop, he used Microsoft's Movie Maker to fiddle with the photos, changing some to a sepia tint and adding special effects.

The final product is set to the song "Rough and Ready" by country singer Trace Adkins, a funny song that he said matched Sgt. Pusateri's personality. The video shows Sgt. Pusateri smirking in his floppy camouflage hat and gritting his teeth in full battle gear.

"Going through the process of building it was a little emotional," said Capt. Castro. "It's a feeling inside of you saying you have to honor this person. If it wasn't them, it could have been me."

A couple of weeks later, a member of that unit who was home on leave from Iraq presented the video to Sgt. Pusateri's mother, Brenda West. Ms. West watched it two or three times and then put it away.

DOJ_NMG_0011880

"I don't know if it's something every parent can handle," said Ms. West. "It's almost like being outside of yourself watching it. It's not real."

She says she plans to look at it again Feb. 16, the anniversary of her son's death.

For Spc. Bass, the process of creating Sgt. Solorio's video was therapeutic, he said. "He was like a dad to me," said Spc. Bass, 20 years old, who was with 32-year-old Sgt. Solorio when he was killed.

After he put the finishing touches on the video, Spc. Bass offered an advance screening to a few members of his platoon, who gave their approval. The video finally had its premiere on the big screen in a darkened auditorium where soldiers gathered for Sgt. Solorio's memorial service in Mosul.

"The whole time I was working on it, it didn't really hit me what it was. I just wanted to get it done," said Spc. Bass. "When it started playing at the actual service, it got pretty sad."

Where Iraq Goes Now (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Iraq's official election returns bring glad tidings for Ibrahim Jafari, the country's nebulous interim prime minister. For a chastened Bush administration, Jafari becomes something better than an unknown entity: He is a known nonentity.

Jafari's sudden strength in his bid to stay on stems entirely from his weakness: He does not command a major political party or militia. He has done little since taking office nearly nine months ago but give poetic and confusing speeches. If some leaders suck all the oxygen out of a room, Jafari fills it with mist and will-o'-the-wisp.

It is this elusive quality that belatedly recommends him to Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador in Baghdad and crafty overseer of American efforts to be a midwife to a new coalition government.

Iraq's Dec. 15 balloting was orderly and inspiring, but it has created an aftermath that is neither of those things. It has also forced the Bush administration into a silent reassessment of where Iraq is going and how it is going to get there. Increasingly, the country drifts toward the future as two relatively stable autonomous regions and a violently unstable central zone, all linked by a weak central government and a reduced, reactive U.S. military presence.

All things considered, such a loose, imperfect federalism is not the worst outcome that could befall Iraq. Totalitarian systems, whether run by Saddam Hussein or Soviet commissars, create weak power centers when they collapse. A decade of managing their own affairs and security could provide an important transition stage for Iraq's Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds to sort out oil revenue, relations with neighbors and other troublesome issues.

That kind of future -- and a renewal of Jafari's term in office that would make it more likely -- did not figure in the hopes and predictions of U.S. policymakers before the December parliamentary election. Back then, the word passed to Iraqi officials visiting Washington was to form a strong central government, much more quickly and transparently than after the January 2005 election, when Jafari emerged from electoral stalemate as the lowest common denominator in Iraqi leadership.

The administration now gives no sign of trying to hurry things along as it concedes it must deal with the election results it has, not the results it wanted. Those were canceled by the poor showing of Ayad Allawi and Ahmed Chalabi -- secularists who conceivably could have been strong, independent executives -- and successful electioneering by Iranian-backed Shiite parties distrusted by Washington.

As the largest bloc in parliament, the United Iraqi Alliance -- dominated by the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq and the radical cleric Moqtada Sadr -- will ultimately choose the prime minister. Jafari's Dawa party is a junior partner in the alliance and, unlike its Shiite allies, does not have a large militia.

The release of the final results has triggered a new round of three-dimensional chess to allocate cabinet positions among Iraq's three major population groups -- the Shiite majority of the south, the Kurds of the north and the Sunni minority that is the source of central Iraq's continuing violent rebellion.

The Sunnis voted in greatly increased numbers this time and now have a serious claim on cabinet posts. President Bush has hailed this as a breakthrough, portraying voting as an alternative to insurgency.

But a renewal of violence since the election suggests that the Sunnis, egged on by neighboring Arab regimes and Baathist remnants, may be adopting a long-term "vote and fight" strategy to reclaim the kind of power they wielded under the Baathists. That is one outcome far worse than a de facto partition of Iraq, if it comes to that.

Working with nudges, winks, long sit-downs with Iraq's fledgling politicians and inexhaustible patience -- qualities alien to L. Paul Bremer and John Negroponte, his two predecessors as U.S. proconsul -- Khalilzad seems to be maneuvering toward a cabinet that would effectively be run by strong deputy prime ministers while Jafari floats effortlessly above the hard work.

Allawi, both proud and lazy, is reportedly resisting U.S. entreaties to take such a post under Jafari. Chalabi and Sadoun Dulaimi, a Sunni who is currently defense minister, are other possibilities. But Khalilzad's dealmaking talents will be stretched to their limits in getting the Shiite parties to accept U.S.-inspired limits on the political victory they have achieved.

Reality has bitten the Bush administration in Iraq and forced the president to settle for less than he wanted. Let's hope that reality can now do the same with Iraq's newly empowered Shiite leaders.

History Lessons (WT)

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

Dec. 28, 1998, statement by the president:

President Clinton: Ladies and gentlemen, before I get into my remarks ... I think I should say a few words about an incident early this morning over the skies of Iraq, where American and British air crews were enforcing a no-fly zone in Northern Iraq. They were fired on by Iraq[i] surface-to-air missiles. They took evasive action, returned fire on the missile site, and returned safely to their base in Turkey ... They attacked because they were attacked. And they did the appropriate thing. We will continue to enforce the no-fly zones.

Pakistan Pledges To Push Forward On Iran Pipeline (WSJ)

By Marc Champion And Frederick Kempe

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

DAVOS, Switzerland – Pakistan's president said his country would build a planned natural-gas pipeline from Iran without India's participation if talks among the three nations continue to produce no result.

The threat came at a delicate time for Gen. Pervez Musharraf, while he is having to balance domestic public opinion and relations with the U.S., India and Iran. Gen. Musharraf also said a suspected U.S. missile attack on a Pakistani village that killed civilians this month "probably" killed five or six al Qaeda operatives, but had "harmed our interests" by violating his country's sovereignty and feeding domestic unrest.

In an interview during the annual meeting of the World Economic Forum in the Swiss Alps, Gen. Musharraf said Pakistan had opened bilateral talks with Tehran to build a gas pipeline that would run from Iran, which has the world's second-largest natural-gas reserves, after Russia. Negotiations to build a line that would run on to India have proved difficult, he said, although Pakistan remains open to "the trilateral track if it comes through."

"We aren't reaching any agreement and our [energy] requirements have increased with our growth and the increasing foreign investment in Pakistan," he said, noting foreign direct investment has grown 500% over the past five years. "We are energy-short."

Indian government officials have expressed concern about recent attacks on existing gas and power lines in Baluchistan, the region of South Western Pakistan through which a pipeline from Iran would pass. Gen. Musharraf played down the threat posed by Baluchistan militants, dismissing the conflict as limited to one isolated local tribe.

The Pakistani president's tough line on the pipeline talks contrasts with that of his prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, while in New York last week. Mr. Aziz stressed the project's potential to help stabilize still-strained relations between Pakistan and India. Gen. Musharraf, too, said a three-way deal remains the best option, but said Pakistan's energy needs couldn't wait forever.

Pakistan's gross domestic product grew 8.4% in the fiscal year ended June 30. Analysts in the past have doubted that the $4 billion pipeline would be viable for Pakistan alone if it didn't continue to India, but Gen. Musharraf said that is changing.

Gen. Musharraf, whose term as president expires in 2007, said his goal is to transform Pakistani society by ending conflicts like the one in Baluchistan, defusing Islamist extremism and generally calming "a nation in turmoil."

Partly for that reason, Gen. Musharraf said the recent U.S. missile attack by an unmanned drone on a village where al Qaeda leaders were expected to have dinner had been against Pakistan's national interests. The attack, which killed women and children, has sparked a series of street protests in Pakistani cities. The U.S. hasn't officially acknowledged a role in the missile strike.

Gen. Musharraf said that he hadn't been informed ahead of time of the attack and that Pakistan had told the U.S. that "we don't want anyone to operate in Pakistan" -- even if that means responding more slowly to intelligence about al Qaeda. Pakistan doesn't have unmanned drones.

"We want to guard our own sovereignty," he said. But he also said his close cooperation with the U.S. in the fight against terrorism hadn't been damaged, and that Pakistan needs the technical help the U.S. can offer to gather intelligence. "Intelligence is far more significant and difficult than operating against [al Qaeda]," he added.

Gen. Musharraf said human, technical and aerial intelligence-gathering had helped Pakistan sweep up 95% of groups that carried out terrorist bombings within Pakistan, including assassination attempts on himself. "There is a perception that everything we do with al Qaeda is in the U.S. interests. I would like to clarify -- it is first of all in our interest," he said.

Gen. Musharraf also rejected criticism that he has failed to deliver on promises to shut down religious schools, known as madrassas, that preach violence. He said 80% of madrassas had accepted that they should teach subjects on the secular state school curriculum, although talks were continuing because the madrassas wanted to set their own exams for the subjects. He said troublesome foreigners at the schools had been expelled from the country as promised, although perhaps 150 remain in hiding.

Stressing success in the campaign against al Qaeda, Gen. Musharraf said he is able to move around the country freely. "I go to marriages, I visit my friends in their houses. I take people out to restaurants," he said.

He declined to say whether he would give up his military command or attempt to extend his term.

India Sends Aid, Despite Pakistani Block (WT)

By Erica Lee Nelson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

NEW DELHI -- India has poured more than a half-billion dollars of foreign aid into Afghanistan in the past three years in an attempt to create a friendly and stable neighbor in a volatile part of the world.

The effort, which continues despite a Pakistani blockade of Indian goods bound for Afghanistan, touches all aspects of life -- biscuits for 1 million children, planes for the national airline, artificial limbs for thousands of land-mine victims, jeeps for the military, scholarships, energy, dams, telephone lines and even satellite downlinks.

India also has helped train those deprived of an education during the Taliban rule -- from diplomats to doctors to elevator operators. Indian engineers are even helping to design and build the new Afghan parliament building.

"We would like to see Afghanistan develop in our own image -- pluralistic, democratic, free from interference from its neighbors and prosperous," a senior official in New Delhi said.

But Indian officials say Pakistan is putting up obstacles to the effort.

The historic rivalry between India and Pakistan has complicated proposed energy pipelines from Afghanistan, which would have to run through Pakistan on the way to India.

Additionally, Pakistan usually refuses to let Indian aid pass through its borders to reach Afghanistan.

"There was much trade between India and Afghanistan before, but Pakistan is creating problems. They allow Afghan goods to go to India, but not Indian goods to come to Afghanistan," said Younus Momtaz, first secretary at the Embassy of Afghanistan in New Delhi.

Officially, Pakistan has said the blockade will not stop until steps are taken to resolve the long-standing dispute over Kashmir, a territory claimed by both India and Pakistan since they achieved independence in 1947.

However, some analysts think Pakistan is more worried about losing its dominant position in Afghan trade.

DOJ_NMG_0011883

Since the fall of the Taliban, Pakistan's trade with Afghanistan has risen exponentially, from $192 million in 2001 to '02 to more than $1 billion in 2004 to '05.

Indian trade with Afghanistan, meanwhile, is estimated by the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industryat $202 million for 2004 to '05. Total Indian aid to Afghanistan since 2003 is approaching $600 million.

In ancient times, Afghanistan traded easily with the Indian subcontinent. Merchants traveled on the Grand Trunk Road from the fertile plains of northern India, through Pakistan and onward to Kabul, Afghanistan.

Now, Indian aid and trading goods are unloaded at ports in Iran and trucked to Kabul over winding mountain roads.

Indian aid often takes a month to reach its destination -- and sometimes cannot get through at all. The same goods could be transported through Pakistan in about a week.

India's aid effort includes an $84 million joint project with Iran to build a 136-mile road from Iran's Chabahar and Bandar Abbas ports to Afghanistan. That will eliminate a detour of 900 miles and cut travel time substantially.

It is hoped that the road will also bring development to a relatively lawless region of southwestern Afghanistan, which has turned into a center of opium farming in recent years.

Travel in the region remains highly dangerous; one Indian worker on the project was kidnapped and killed in November.

India and Pakistan backed contending factions during Taliban rule in Afghanistan, with the rebel Northern Alliance being allowed to maintain an embassy in New Delhi.

Now, 10 movie theaters in Kabul screen India's Bollywood blockbusters throughout the day, and a Bollywood film is being made in the Afghan capital for the first time in more than a decade.

"We have a long relationship, we share our joys and sorrows," said Mr. Momtaz of the Afghan Embassy in New Delhi.

Rumsfeld Says Army Isn't Overextended (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld on Wednesday disputed reports suggesting that the U.S. military is stretched thin and close to a snapping point from operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, asserting "the force is not broken."

"This armed force is enormously capable," Mr. Rumsfeld told reporters at a Pentagon briefing. "In addition, it's battle-hardened. It's not a peacetime force that has been in barracks or garrisons."

Mr. Rumsfeld spoke a day after the Associated Press reported that an unreleased study conducted for the Pentagon said the Army is being overextended, thanks to the two wars, and may not be able to retain and recruit enough troops to defeat the insurgency in Iraq.

Congressional Democrats released a report Wednesday that also concluded the U.S. military is under severe stress.

Reports suggesting that the U.S. military is close to the breaking point "is just not consistent with the facts," he said.

In an apparent shot at the Democratic Clinton administration, Mr. Rumsfeld said a number of components of the armed forces were underfunded during the 1990s, "and there were hollow pieces to it. Today, that's just not the case."

He said there were over 1.4 million active U.S. troops, and some 2 million -- counting National Guard and Reserve units -- of which only 138,000 people were in Iraq.

"Do we still need more rebalancing? You bet," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

The secretary suggested he was not familiar with reports suggesting an overburdened military. But, he said, "It's clear that those comments do not reflect the current situation. They are either out of date or just misdirected."

Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and former Secretary of Defense William Perry, both members of the Clinton administration, were credited among the authors of the study that congressional Democrats released.

It said that U.S. ground forces are under "enormous strain," adding, "This strain, if not soon relieved, will have highly corrosive and potentially long-term effects on the force."

In the earlier report obtained by the Associated Press, Andrew Krepinevich, a retired Army officer who wrote it under Pentagon contract, concluded that the Army cannot sustain the pace of troop deployments to Iraq long enough to break the back of the insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0011884

As evidence, he pointed to the Army's 2005 recruiting slump -- missing its recruiting goal for the first time since 1999 -- and its decision to offer much bigger enlistment bonuses and other incentives.

Mr. Rumsfeld said that "retention is up" and that recruitment levels must meet higher goals, ones raised because of the operations on the ground.

At the same time, Mr. Rumsfeld added: "There is no question if a country is in a conflict and we are in the global war on terror, it requires our forces to do something other than what they do in peacetime."

"The force is not broken," Mr. Rumsfeld said, suggesting such an implication was "almost backward."

"The world saw the United States military go halfway around the world in a matter of weeks, throw the Al Qaida and Taliban out of Afghanistan, in a landlocked country thousands and thousands of miles away. They saw what the United States military did in Iraq.

"And the message from that is not that this armed force is broken, but that this armed force is enormously capable," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

The Army fell more than 6,600 recruits short of its goal of enlisting 80,000 troops last year, the first time it missed its annual target since 1999 and the largest shortfall in 26 years.

But the Army exceeded its monthly recruiting goal in December for the seventh consecutive month, though some of those targets were lowered from last year's. It will have to increase its recruiting pace, however, to meet its target of 80,000 that it has set for the budget year ending next Sept. 30.

A new law will let the Army attract older recruits, raising the top age from 35 to 42. In addition, financial bonuses for enlistments and re-enlistments have increased.

Also, according to Mr. Rumsfeld, an increased emphasis and spending on Special Operations forces and intelligence operations results from lessons learned in Iraq.

The Pentagon's next budget and a broadbased review of U.S. defense strategy should be seen as "the next step in a long line of bold changes" for the military, rather than a list of program adjustments, he said. Both the budget for fiscal 2007 and an update of the Pentagon's long-range plans are to be released early next month.

Special operations and intelligence are among the programs expected to see increased funding in the new spending plan. Mr. Rumsfeld said that improvements in the programs reflect setbacks and successes since the first days of combat in Iraq.

Rumsfeld Says Army 'Not Broken' (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 26, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld sparred from afar yesterday with a Pentagon consultant and former Clinton administration officials who say the Army is in danger of "breaking."

A report by retired Army officer Andrew F. Krepinevich Jr., who directs the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, said the Army could not meet war-fighting missions unless the demands slacken in the coming years.

The report surfaced as former Clinton administration officials and retired officers who backed the presidential bid of Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, put out a similar study saying that the 1.4-million-active-member military is frayed.

Mr. Rumsfeld responded with a combative appearance at a Pentagon press conference. He reminded reporters that during the Clinton years, when the military was sent on about 50 war and peacekeeping missions, that the force suffered from lack of funding and that some units were "hollow pieces."

The Bush administration has requested huge spending increases for the military, with this year's budget at $442 billion, plus about $350 billion to fund operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Mr. Rumsfeld said anyone who concludes that the Army is breaking does not know what he or she is talking about.

"I suspect the people writing these things don't know, either, because I suspect that they don't have any more insight than the other people around here do," he said. "I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they're close to breaking. That's just not the case."

He said, "The force is not broken ... the world saw the United States military go halfway around the world, and in a matter of weeks throw the al Qaeda and Taliban out of Afghanistan, in a landlocked country thousands and thousands of miles away. They saw what the United States military did in Iraq, and the message from that is not that this armed forces is broken, but that this armed forces is enormously capable."

Mr. Rumsfeld said he was at the White House yesterday, where a group of senators asked about the Army. He said Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, responded that "it's just not correct" that the Army is breaking.

The Associated Press obtained a copy of the Krepinevich study, which contains one chapter titled "The Thin Green Line."

The Army has been a frequent target of such criticism. Last year, the active-duty Army and the Army National Guard missed recruiting goals, as the force of 500,000 active soldiers and reserves waged two wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, forcing year-on, year-off overseas deployments for many.

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, heightened the criticism by calling for a quick pullout from Iraq.

The Army issued a statement that although the force is stressed by commitments in the global war against terrorism, it is far from broken. The Army has met recruiting goals for seven consecutive months, after raising enlistment bonuses to as much as $40,000, deploying more recruiters and changing advertising.

Rumsfeld Denies Military Is Stretched Too Thin Defense Secretary Says Troop Retention Up (USAT)

By Steven Komarow

USA Today, January 26, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on Wednesday dismissed two new reports warning that the U.S. military is badly stretched by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, calling their authors ill-informed about America's "battle-hardened" forces.

The Clinton administration military had "hollow pieces" that have now been fixed under his leadership, Rumsfeld said. Worries about recruiting and keeping veteran troops are also unfounded, he said.

"People just don't fully understand," he told reporters at a news conference. Today's military is "battle hardened. It's not a peacetime force that has been in barracks or garrisons."

On Wednesday, former Defense secretary William Perry, former secretary of State Madeleine Albright and congressional Democrats released a report calling on the Bush administration to increase the size of the Army and spend more on replacing equipment worn out in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The two members of the Clinton administration cited the Army's failure last year to meet its recruiting needs as an early sign of trouble. The Army missed by almost 6,600 its goal of 80,000 new recruits in the fiscal year ending Sept. 30. To help prevent another shortfall, this year the Army has increased its percentage of recruits who scored in the lowest category on an aptitude test that every soldier must take.

The Bush administration's actions "fall far short of what is required," Perry said.

"In order to carry out effective diplomacy, you have to have an effective (military) force," Albright said. Things are so stretched today that the United States was unable to contribute troops for Haiti's elections, she said.

Their report said U.S. ground forces are under "enormous strain." It warned of "highly corrosive and potentially long-term effects on the force" if nothing is changed.

The Democratic report came a day after a Pentagon-sponsored review by a retired Army officer issued a similar warning. The study, first reported by the Associated Press, said the military was on "a thin green line," especially in recruiting, that could snap because of the strain of extended deployments. The author, Andrew Krepinevich, said commanders were weighing their battle plans against the potential strain on forces.

Rumsfeld called such assertions false. "The force is not broken," he said, and not breaking.

"And there isn't any reason in the world why we shouldn't be able to maintain, with an active and reserve total force … of over 2 million people, why we shouldn't be able to maintain 138,000" troops in Iraq, he said.

Rumsfeld also said the retention of troops is up.

DOJ_NMG_0011886

Pentagon sponsored studies such as the one by Krepinevich, head of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, are good to have because they present differing viewpoints, Rumsfeld said.

"It's a useful thing to invite people to make comments and critiques and to opine on this and to opine on that," he said.

Rumsfeld said he hadn't yet read the Democratic report. However, he said, "These are the people basically, who did that report, who were here in the '90s. And what we're doing is trying to adjust what was left us to fit the 21st century."

Rumsfeld: Army Not 'Broken' (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld yesterday strongly rejected warnings in a Pentagon-contracted study that the Iraq war risks "breaking" the U.S. Army, and he said a recent decision to scale back U.S. troop levels in Iraq did not grow out of a need to relieve the strain on American ground forces.

"The force is not broken," Rumsfeld said at a Pentagon press briefing yesterday. "I just can't imagine someone looking at the United States armed forces today and suggesting that they're close to breaking. That's just not the case."

On the contrary, Rumsfeld said, the U.S. military is "battle-hardened" and an "enormously capable force," as demonstrated to the world by its swift overthrow of governments in Iraq and Afghanistan. Such proven capability "ought to increase the deterrent rather than weaken it," he added.

Rumsfeld's remarks came in response to questions about two studies released yesterday -- one by a Democratic advisory group chaired by former defense secretary William J. Perry, and another by a military analyst contracted by the Pentagon -- that warned of the long-term consequences of strains on U.S. military manpower and equipment from repeated war-zone deployments. Such stress, if not alleviated, could worsen recruiting and undermine retention, threatening the all-volunteer force, the studies found.

"Soldiers and brigades are being deployed more frequently, and for longer periods, than what the Army believes is appropriate in order to attract and retain the number of soldiers necessary," Andrew F. Krepinevich, executive director of the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, wrote in a November 2005 study for the Pentagon first disclosed Tuesday by the Associated Press. "It is not clear, even to Army leaders, how long this practice can be sustained."

Krepinevich concluded that "vigorous efforts should be made to enable a substantial drawdown in U.S. force levels" from Iraq, because "the Army simply cannot sustain the force levels desired to sustain the momentum needed to break the back of the insurgent movement."

Rumsfeld, however, expressed confidence yesterday that the Pentagon could maintain the current troop level of 138,000 in Iraq indefinitely, although he said he did not expect to do so. "There isn't any reason in the world why we shouldn't be able to maintain, with an active and reserve total force concept of over 2 million people, why we shouldn't be able to maintain 138,000," he said.

Rumsfeld also said that a decision announced in December to cut the number of troops in Iraq by this spring to about 130,000 was not driven by a need to ease strain on U.S. forces. "That's just false," Rumsfeld said in response to a reporter's question. He said Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior U.S. commander in Iraq, "is not making his recommendations based on that."

Since mid-2004, troop levels in Iraq have ranged from about 135,000 to 160,000, requiring Army and Marine combat units to rotate into Iraq with shorter-than-usual stays at home in between. Active-duty Army units, for example, have been spending a year in Iraq and then 15 to 22 months at home -- less than the goal of two years set by Army leaders.

The prospect of serving in Iraq contributed to a shortfall in Army recruiting of nearly 7,000 soldiers last year, Army officials have said, despite large increases in bonuses and incentives. High overall retention helped make up for the deficit, Army figures show.

The second study, by the group commissioned by congressional Democrats and chaired by Perry, criticized what it called the Bush administration's inadequate planning for Iraq. It said not sending sufficient troops and equipment has put the Army and Marine Corps under "enormous strain" that risks undermining national security.

The active-duty Army has a deficit of about 18,000 junior enlisted personnel, the study found. Army manpower has dropped over the past year, falling to the current level of about 492,000 -- about 10,000 short of the goal of 502,000 authorized by Congress, Defense Department figures show.

The study proposed increased funding for recruiting, equipment, as well as a permanent increase of 30,000 soldiers in the Army's active-duty deployable forces. That would allow the Army to increase active-duty combat brigades from 37 to 48, the study said.

But Rumsfeld reiterated yesterday that Army leaders do not seek a permanent growth of 30,000. Moreover, the Army, which had planned to increase its active-duty combat brigades from 33 to 43, last week announced that it seeks to grow to 42 as a result of a top-level review of Pentagon strategy and resources. Together with a cut in National Guard combat brigades, from 34 to 28, that would give the Army 70 total combat brigades instead of the previously planned 77.

Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey said in an interview that the change resulted from a new Pentagon goal of being able to sustain a deployment of 18 or 19 combat brigades around the world -- a reduction from a target set by Army leaders of 20 to 21 brigades.

Reserve Members On Active Duty Earn More, Pay Study Says Findings By RAND Counter Prevailing View Of Service (USAT)

By Steven Komarow

USA Today, January 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Nearly three-fourths of military reservists called to serve in Afghanistan and Iraq are taking home more money on duty than in their civilian jobs, according to a study on military pay released Wednesday.

In many cases, the troops earn a higher gross salary in civilian life. But when the federal tax exemption and other allowances approved by Congress for troops in combat are factored in, about 72% are better off, according to a study by the RAND Corp., a research institute.

The RAND study, which was funded by the Pentagon, showed an average benefit of 25% over civilian pay, about $10,000 a year.

The study results run counter to complaints by Reserve and Guard troops that they have suffered financially when activated. It is part of an effort to track the war on terrorism's effects on part-time troops. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, those troops have been called up by the tens of thousands.

The Army National Guard, heavily used in Iraq, missed its recruiting goals last year. Currently, about 108,000 Guard and Reserve members are activated.

News coverage of the National Guard and Reserves often focuses on the financial hardships of its members. In 2004, the Defense Department conducted a survey of reservists in which more than half said they lost income when they were deployed.

However, the RAND study found that only about one-fourth of reservists suffered a loss in income after being activated. RAND researchers compared Social Security earnings data for servicemembers before deployment with Defense Department records afterward.

RAND surveyed more than 110,000 Army and Air National Guard and Reserve members for the study.

Though the study ends in 2003, the beginning of the U.S. deployment of troops to Iraq, preliminary figures for later deployments show the pattern continues.

Deployed reservists may have an even higher comparative earnings advantage, said Jacob Klerman, a RAND senior economist and co-author of the study. That's because the data do not track the additional income provided by major corporations to their employees who are in the Reserves or Guard.

Klerman said the study focused on earnings and doesn't include the extra expenses that reservists often must pay. Also, he said, more research is needed on the long-term effect that being called to active duty has on the careers of Guard and Reserve members.

“We are looking here at earnings while people are activated,” Klerman said. “That's different than the question about what will happen when (they) get back.”

DOJ_NMG_0011888

Stephen Koper, a retired brigadier general and president of the National Guard Association, says the results do nothing to ease the concerns of current or potential Guard members. Koper said the Pentagon needs more professional people and entrepreneurs, but they're being driven away by financial problems caused by serving in the part-time military. "Guardsmen and reservists accept the fact that they are … going to run into certain shortfalls."

Judge Extends Appointment Of U.S. Attorney (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Register, January 26, 2006

Chief U.S. District Judge Ginny Granade has extended the term of U.S. Attorney Deborah Rhodes, whose temporary appointment to the Mobile office expires this month.

Rhodes took over for David York, who resigned in September amid reports of an internal Department of Justice investigation into allegations that he had an improper relationship with an assistant prosecutor.

The U.S. attorney oversees all federal prosecutions in the Southern District of Alabama, which covers 13 counties. The office includes a staff of 25 lawyers and 27 support workers, and operates on an annual budget of about $5.7 million.

Under the law, the Justice Department could replace York for a maximum of 120 days. The statute gives the chief judge of the district the power to name the U.S. attorney beyond that, and Granade said Tuesday that she complied with a request by the Justice Department to extend Rhodes' tenure until President Bush names a permanent successor.

When appointed to Mobile, Rhodes, 47, was on special assignment to the Justice Department in Washington as a counselor to the assistant attorney general of the criminal division.

From 1990 to 2003, Rhodes served as an assistant U.S. attorney in San Diego, where she prosecuted large drug organizations and returned the first indictments against the leaders of the Tijuana cartel.

In Mobile, Rhodes said, she has not made major changes. "We've been focusing on our work and focusing on our cases," she said.

Rhodes, who eventually will return to the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego, said she has no guess as to how long her stint in Mobile might last.

That depends on how long it takes Alabama's two U.S. senators to agree on a recommendation to the president. With less than three years remaining in Bush's term, it is possible Rhodes will serve until the next presidential election, though Granade said that's unlikely.

"My guess is there will be an appointment. But when or who or how, I don't know," she said.

DHS Helps DOJ With Case Management Systems (FCW)

By Michael Arnone

Federal Computer Week, January 25, 2006

The Homeland Security Department is helping the Justice Department develop new case management systems for the entire federal government, DHS' chief information officer said today.

DHS is working with DOJ to create a Consolidated Enforcement Environment (CEE), which allows access to all available data, analyzes data and links relevant law enforcement partners, DHS' CIO Scott Charbo said.

One goal of the collaboration is to move beyond products and create a layer of information that can be used governmentwide, Charbo said. "The real core to solving the business problem is standardizing data" and real-time information sharing, he said.

Charbo said he didn't know if DHS will have a procurement for CEE because both departments want to leverage as much existing infrastructure as possible, Charbo said.

Big Test Looms For Prosecutors At Enron Trial (NYT)

By Kurt Eichenwald

The New York Times, January 26, 2006

In the court of public opinion, they were convicted long ago. But as Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, the onetime leaders of Enron, step into a court of law next week, the outcome of their fraud trial is far from certain, creating one of the most closely watched and hotly contested white-collar criminal cases ever.

On one side of the Houston federal courtroom starting Monday will be two top-flight teams of defense lawyers, who will be taking the risky approach of proclaiming many of the controversial actions of Enron and some much-criticized statements of their clients to be legal and truthful.

On the other, the prosecutors for the Justice Department's Enron Task Force, who have racked up an impressive array of guilty pleas in the case, but whose performance at trial has been decidedly less dazzling.

"For the government, if they lose the Enron case, it will be seen as a symbolic failure of their rather significant campaign against white-collar crime," said John C. Coffee Jr., a professor at Columbia Law School. "It will be seen as some evidence that some cases are too complicated to be brought into the criminal justice process."

Of the three major Enron-related criminal cases brought by the government before juries, guilty verdicts stand from only one, which involved Enron's booking what the government said were phantom profits on the sale of Nigerian barges to Merrill Lynch. A second case, against the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, was thrown out by the Supreme Court on appeal. The third, involving the broadband division of Enron, resulted in no convictions, but the five defendants await a retrial.

Those cases involved narrower accusations of wrongdoing than those against Mr. Skilling, 52, who has been charged with dozens of counts, including fraud, conspiracy and insider trading, and Mr. Lay, 63, who is accused of seven counts of fraud and conspiracy. Indeed, this trial will be the first time that the government's theory of the existence of an overarching criminal conspiracy at the company has been put to the test.

Learning its lesson from previous corporate fraud trials involving Enron and other companies, the government is expected to keep this trial as simple as possible to avoid confusing and boring the jury. Riding on the prosecution's success, experts said, is public support.

The implications of the outcome of the case against Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, whose names have become fused to the scandals that have exploded across corporate America in recent years, are sure to be felt far beyond the courtroom.

"Most people in the white-collar world would agree that Enron is the granddaddy of all frauds in the last two decades," said Stephen L. Meagher, a former federal prosecutor who is now a lawyer in San Francisco. "How this comes out is a test of the limits of what the corporate community will tolerate in business practices."

The importance of the trial to the government and the defense is underscored by the millions of dollars each side is committing to the case.

Mr. Skilling, for example, has hired Daniel Petrocelli, a top civil lawyer who has no criminal trial experience but made his name winning a $33.5 million verdict for the family of Ronald Goldman in a wrongful-death suit against O. J. Simpson. Mr. Skilling alone has some two dozen people, half of them lawyers, working full time at a makeshift office near the courthouse. Several more are employed as trial consultants helping with jury selection, which begins Monday.

The government is also committing significant resources, with 8 lawyers and 10 agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation working exclusively on this case.

In presenting the case, the government will be depicting a company where law breaking was commonplace. In official reports from the government, the bankruptcy court and the independent directors of Enron, and in the guilty pleas of former executives, Enron has emerged as a company that failed to follow the dictates of federal securities laws, with executives who deceived investors, directors and, in some cases, one another. While that is helpful to prosecutors, experts said that the government would have to be wary of focusing too much on the broad problems within the company.

DOJ_NMG_0011890

"To the extent this becomes more of a trial about Enron and less of a trial about Skilling and Lay, that is likely to play into the defense's strategy to put the accounting techniques on trial rather than the individuals," said Robert A. Mintz, a former federal prosecutor who is now head of white-collar criminal defense at McCarter & English in Newark.

The defense case will focus on the requirements and dictates of accounting and securities rules. While both defendants deny knowledge of some of the brazen crimes, like transactions that resulted in millions of dollars from Enron's coffers being drained into other executives' personal bank accounts, there will be little effort to distance themselves from some of the financial dealings that have become infamous over the last few years. These include Enron's use of byzantine off-books partnerships that helped pretty up the company's balance sheet and improve its income statement.

Instead, according to people who know both men, their statements and actions will be defended with a simple response: their business practices may have been aggressive, but everything they did was lawful. Both men, who are expected to testify, plan to maintain that many of the accounting and financial decisions were both correct and appropriately disclosed, and their statements about them were truthful.

There are dangers to this strategy. At times, the defense — particularly that of Mr. Skilling, a former chief executive who is charged with playing a direct role in some of the partnership deals — will have to maintain that accounting rules allowed Enron to exaggerate earnings or hide losses, practices that strike outside experts as bizarre and that jurors may have a hard time accepting. There is the complexity of explaining why, if so much of what Enron did was legal and the company's finances were as strong as the executives maintain, the company quickly collapsed into bankruptcy.

There is also one final challenge, which experts refer to as the Simon problem. In a decision from the early 1970's in United States v. Simon, a federal court held that compliance with accounting rules is not, in itself, enough to disprove an accusation of fraud. In that case, the court held that there was also a positive duty for full and fair disclosure under the securities laws, which might not be met simply by following generally accepted accounting principles.

That these executives and this case would ultimately serve as a symbol of an era of corporate corruption might have seemed laughable five years ago, when Enron was repeatedly proclaimed by Wall Street and academics as among the best of the best, a cutting-edge company redefining the boundaries of business.

The government, however, hopes to bring in evidence that it contends will prove that Mr. Lay oversaw a reckless organization from soon after its founding as a gas pipeline company in 1985 with the merger of Houston Natural Gas and Internorth of Omaha. By early 1987, Mr. Lay, then the chairman and chief executive, was confronted with evidence of potential financial wrongdoing by top executives at Enron's oil trading unit in Valhalla, N.Y.

The government will seek to admit testimony that despite hearing the evidence, Mr. Lay allowed the executives to remain and, months later, those same executives committed other improper acts that exposed Enron to as much as $1 billion in losses. While prosecutors have been arguing that they should be allowed to present the Valhalla episode to the jury to show that Mr. Lay had a pattern of tolerating wrongdoers, the federal judge who is hearing the case, Simeon T. Lake III, has not issued a final ruling on whether he will allow such evidence.

A crucial witness in the government's case will be Andrew S. Fastow, the former Enron chief financial officer who has pleaded guilty and is cooperating with the prosecution.

Mr. Fastow was a specialist in the growing business of structured finance, a technique that companies use to gain access to new capital by essentially selling off portions of their risk through the use of off-books partnerships. When such transactions are done properly, at least 3 percent of the entity's capital is contributed by an independent investor. Under the accounting rules, assets sold to the entity can then be moved off the balance sheet and the purchase price can be reported as revenue.

By 1996, Mr. Fastow began committing crimes through use of the off-the-books entities for personal enrichment. He arranged to be the 3 percent investor himself — a strategy that would not have met the accounting standards for independence — then set up elaborate schemes in which bogus "investors" stood in as fronts for him. In one deal, called RADR, Mr. Fastow funneled money to various investors, who then returned profits to him. In another, called Chewco, Mr. Fastow allowed a close colleague, Michael J. Kopper, to control the 3 percent investor, then accepted kickbacks on the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0011891

While neither RADR nor Chewco appear in the criminal indictments against Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, the defense lawyers have already argued that they need to explore both transactions in front of the jury to try to prove that Mr. Fastow had a pattern of hiding illicit personal profits from his bosses.

It is this point — from Mr. Fastow's crimes beginning in 1996 to the charges against Mr. Skilling for actions years later — that will serve as a crucial battleground, with both the defense and the government fighting over the questions that the jurors should be asking themselves.

If Mr. Fastow engaged in crimes involving RADR and Chewco without the knowledge of his superiors, the defense argues, how can the jury believe that he told his bosses in later years about similar illegal acts that were used to manipulate Enron's financial reports? But, the government will counter, would Mr. Fastow — along with other executives who have pleaded guilty, including Richard A. Causey, the former chief accounting officer — have engaged in subsequent illegal acts that seemed to solely benefit the company without consulting superiors?

Numerous allegations against both Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling relate little to Mr. Fastow. Instead, they portray the executives as consistently working to disguise the true economic realities of Enron in violation of federal securities laws.

The economic underpinnings of Enron began to become unhinged in 1998. That summer, Enron entered into several capital intensive transactions that ultimately proved to be abject financial disasters, including a venture into the water business and the purchase of a portion of an electricity distribution plant in Brazil.

The government's case is built not so much on showing that Enron was destroyed by fraud, but rather on showing that fraud, including the suspected deceptions by Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling, prevented the marketplace from knowing how badly things were going inside the company. But the cases against the two men are very different. Mr. Skilling faces the most complex series of allegations, which essentially accuse him of leading a concerted effort to make Enron appear more financially sound than it actually was.

Through the use of the off-books partnerships, the company avoided reporting losses and was able to generate tens of millions of dollars in profit. It wrote up the value of certain assets when it needed income, and did not write them back down when circumstances changed. It entered into transactions in which there were secret buyback agreements that would have required accountants, had they known, to remove the related profits from the company's books. All of this, according to the indictment, involved Mr. Skilling.

The charges against Mr. Lay are far narrower, on the other hand. He is not accused of involvement in the partnership machinations; rather, the vast majority of the allegations against him involve public statements he made in the final few months of Enron's existence. The government says that many of those statements, including upbeat assessments of the company's liquidity and business performance, were lies through which Mr. Lay continued the earlier deceptions involving Mr. Skilling.

In many ways, it is fitting for Enron's tale to end with a trial that is widely viewed as a verdict on business practices in the late 1990's. When it was flying high, the energy giant was celebrated from boardrooms to business schools as a lodestar for the future of the corporate world, the embodiment of a company that got everything right. But with its collapse into bankruptcy in 2001 — costing investors billions and pushing thousands of employees out onto the street — it became emblematic of everything wrong in corporate America.

"Enron has become a poster child for an era, so I think people will remember what happens at this trial more than any other white-collar trial that occurs," said Linnea Bernard McCord, associate professor of business law at the Graziadio School of Business and Management at Pepperdine University. "It made a real imprint on everybody's psyche."

Opportunity For Corporate Fraud Has Shrunk -- But It's Still There (WP)

By Carrie Johnson And Ben White

The Washington Post, January 26, 2006

Four years after the collapse of Enron Corp. spurred the most sweeping revisions in business regulation since the Great Depression, experts warn that the ingredients for a similar financial disaster remain.

Despite new laws and regulations, companies still face enormous pressure to meet short-term financial goals, creating a powerful motive for accounting fraud. Outsized executive compensation grows by the year, offering another rich incentive to cook the books. And there is no certainty that Congress will continue to fund regulatory budgets at current levels.

But some things have changed since December 2001, when Enron's sudden descent into bankruptcy protection rocked investor confidence and left the markets reeling. Accountants face independent oversight for the first time in 70 years. Most corporate board members take their jobs far more seriously. Wall Street is somewhat less willing to accommodate clients' interests.

Nearly a dozen experts contacted by The Washington Post, including regulators, accountants, chief executives, board members and investor advocates, agreed to fill out a corporate governance report card on the eve of the Enron trial.

The Houston energy trader's implosion exposed wide gaps in the safety net designed to protect shareholders, some of which remain today. Former executives Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling go to trial Monday on fraud and conspiracy charges.

Accountants exploited loopholes to curry favor with companies that paid their fees. Executives collected more than $400 million in salary and bonuses but denied knowing about fraud on their watch. Investment bankers engaged in sham deals to help clients meet quarterly profit targets. Boards of directors waived conflicts-of-interest policies and turned a blind eye to overly aggressive business practices. And overwhelmed regulators failed to devote enough resources to combat fraud.

Congress passed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act in July 2002, imposing new duties on corporate executives, auditors and directors. The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department spent tens of millions of dollars to root out malfeasance. Along the way, prosecutors won criminal convictions and decades-long prison terms for former leaders of Adelphia Communications Corp., Tyco International Ltd. and WorldCom Inc.

But in a sense, the government efforts may have backfired, inspiring a dangerous overconfidence among investors.

"I just don't think we are as far along as we need to be," said former SEC chairman Harvey L. Pitt, who led the agency when it brought the biggest-ever fraud case against telecommunications company WorldCom Inc. in 2002. "Many shareholders may have been led to believe that [reforms] have cured all the problems, and we're home free. Unfortunately, that's a prescription for disaster."

The lingering problems were on display late last fall, when commodities-trading firm Refco Inc. collapsed in an accounting scandal just two months after an initial public offering, led by blue-chip investment bank Goldman Sachs and Co. Investors snapped up Refco shares even though the company admitted in its prospectus that there were serious problems with accounting controls. "Could Enron happen again? Sure it could. Just look at Refco," said Henry T.C. Hu, a law professor at the University of Texas at Austin.

The grades suggest that the greatest improvement has been in the regulation of the behavior of accountants who serve as gatekeepers to the markets. New York Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer said the profession has been "scared straight" by fallout from the scandals, which included the death of accounting firm Arthur Andersen LLP and a $456 million deferred prosecution settlement by KPMG LLP last year.

Corporate boards get fair marks for meeting more often and paying more attention to the work of auditors. Last year, longtime directors at insurer American International Group Inc. overthrew Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg as chairman after nearly 40 years at the helm after regulators stepped up an accounting probe at the company. And Hewlett-Packard Co.'s board fired star chief executive Carly Fiorina because of dissatisfaction with the way she handled a merger. She was not accused of any wrongdoing at the company.

Even so, many board members still lack the financial know-how to interpret complex information, said Dennis R. Beresford, former chairman of the audit committee at MCI Inc.

At the same time, opposition to some of the changes made since Enron is growing. Increasingly, trade groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and securities law professors, have complained that boards and accountants spend too much time meeting meaningless criteria rather than getting to the root of more insidious problems.

DOJ_NMG_0011893

Bob Merritt, the former finance chief at Outback Steakhouse Inc., noisily resigned his post last April after decrying "overzealous" regulations that tied him up in minutiae, far away from business decisions. Many other executives across the country privately applauded his stance.

Jeffrey Stone, a former federal prosecutor who now heads the white-collar defense practice at McDermott Will & Emery, said some new rules, especially one that requires a company and its auditors to examine financial controls, impose heavy costs "that far outstrip the protections that are afforded."

Each of the experts stressed that crooks bent on stealing from a company will still take their chances and some will succeed. Regulators can never pass laws that will force executives to act with integrity -- or force investors to do their homework before they buy stock.

Little has changed to shrink the incentives for taking big risks, business as well as ethical, that can give rise to misdeeds.

Wall Street analysts and reporters still seek guidance about company revenue each quarter. Businesses pay a price for missing targets by even a penny or two. The earnings guidance is "like heroin" for analysts, said Colleen Saytherr Cunningham, who leads a trade group for corporate finance officials. "Once you put it into your arm, you can't kick it."

There has been no slowdown in the race for higher executive pay, the experts said. Chief executives won a median pay raise of 30 percent in 2004, twice the increase from 2003, according to the Corporate Library, a watchdog group that rates public companies on corporate governance. Repeated studies have shown virtually no connection between high compensation and good corporate performance.

"As long as CEO pay is so fundamentally out of whack, we cannot say that boards are doing their job or that corporate governance reform has been accomplished," said Nell Minow, an investor advocate and co-founder of the Corporate Library.

Some companies have moved away from compensating top executives with stock options now that they are required to count them as an expense. But in numerous cases, they have simply replaced options, which pay off only if a company's stock performs well, with restricted shares, which promise a gain for executives no matter what. Critics refer to such compensation as "pay for pulse."

William J. McDonough, former leader of an accounting industry oversight panel, said recent initiatives, including a drive by the SEC to beef up disclosures about executive pay, are heartening. In all, though, there is "not as much [progress] as I'd like to see. I don't think anybody including me has any theory of how executive compensation should be set."

In addition, investor advocates said they fear that once the Enron trial ends and the focus on corporate crime fades, regulatory budgets could again get squeezed. "Already, recent appropriations have not matched agency funding requests," said Barbara Roper, chief of investor protection at the Consumer Federation of America.

The outcome of the Enron trial could have a more profound impact on attitudes among corporate executives in the long run than the regulatory changes, said Harvey J. Goldschmid, a law professor and former SEC official.

"Deterrence is very important, and this trial is of large consequence for that reason," Goldschmid said.

Enron Woes Reverberate Through Lives Many Saw Retirement Plans Evaporate With Stock Price (USAT)

By Stephanie Armour

USA Today, January 26, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS — Roger Boyce was looking forward to retirement from Enron's Minneapolis Gas Pipeline Group in 2000.

His Enron stock was worth more than $2 million on paper. With that nest egg and other investments, Boyce anticipated a comfortable retirement that he'd spend traveling and funding his six grandchildren's college educations.

That didn't happen. At 71, he works full time in the summer months doing business consulting at a pool and spa company. Much of his savings evaporated in Enron's financial collapse in 2001, leaving him less able to travel and with little to contribute to the grandchildren's college expenses. Initially, there was a lot of bitterness and resentment because of the sense of betrayal that he and other former employees felt.

Four years after the Texas energy giant began its meltdown — and on the eve of a criminal trial for its former top executives — many former Enron employees still feel betrayed.

How did it happen? Like many employees, Boyce believed in Enron's stock. He bought and held Enron shares until it was too late to get out. About 20,000 participants in Enron retirement plans lost about $1.1 billion in their accounts, according to a lawsuit and lawyers for the workers.

Former employees who thought they'd be well off have abandoned retirement visions that included taking expensive pleasure trips and financing philanthropic projects. Some, at the end of their careers, have started over again in new jobs — but working harder to keep up with younger co-workers. They've turned to churches and food pantries to eat, sold homes they could no longer pay for, and endured financial stresses that frayed their marriages.

"A lot of them aren't doing well. The older workers had retired, and then they had to go to work. They're too old to make it up," says Lynn Sarko, a Seattle-based lawyer representing many employees in lawsuits to recover some of the lost retirement funds. "They've had trouble getting jobs, and some have taken jobs that are a step down. There's a lot of anger."

Enron workers' retirement savings were demolished because their 401(k) assets were mostly invested in company stock, which was considered a sound investment until late 2001. That October, Enron shocked Wall Street by announcing a quarterly loss and a big write-off of some investments. The Securities and Exchange Commission began an investigation. But for about three weeks in October and November, employees were blocked from selling the stock in their accounts. Enron shares, which had reached $90 in 2000, fell to less than a $1 after the company filed for bankruptcy-court protection on Dec. 2, 2001.

"Enron was held in such high esteem that employees had confidence in the company. We were misled all the way. This has compromised the quality of all of our lives after so many years of saving to that end," says Boyce, of Edina, Minn., who was director of human resources for the northern region of Enron's pipeline group. "The trial is finally bringing this thing to an end; it's bringing some closure."

Dale and Darlene Roberts are still waiting for closure. In 2001, Dale earned $3,000 a month as a field mechanic at Enron in Oklahoma. The Enron stock in his 401(k) account was worth roughly $50,000.

Within months, the couple lost it all: his job and the money in the stock. Dale was laid off, and the couple got by on $1,200 a month in unemployment until that ran out after six months. Darlene, a hairdresser, was disabled and couldn't work. Dale was out of work for more than two years.

The family house was briefly put into foreclosure, but they sold one of their cars to make the payments.

"I was devastated. We'd owned that home for almost 10 years. It was horrifying," Darlene says.

They also sold belongings such as tools and went to their local church for basic food supplies. It was humiliating, she says, to get a chicken, canned goods, toilet paper and soap from strangers.

"We lost everything. We had to sell things just to be able to live. We had to go to the church to eat," says Darlene, of Duncan, Okla.

Dale, 54, now has a job as a mechanic for a different company, but bitterness about the experience lingers. He earns less than he did at Enron.

"Things are much, much better, but it caused physical and mental anguish, and it caused stress on our marriage," says Darlene, 54. "I am very bitter. I don't believe there's enough justification for what they did. Greed is a horrible, horrible thing."

Enron's collapse has delayed retirements and led to desperate efforts to rebuild savings.

Roy Rinard, 57, has worked since 1980 at Portland General Electric (PGE), which Enron purchased in 1997. PGE is a stable, well-known utility founded in 1889. Many of those at PGE have had parents and grandparents who worked there; employees such as Rinard felt comfortable with their future.

Rinard says he lost $470,000 after Enron went under. At first, he and his wife, Vicki, a nurse, felt panic. "It was just gone overnight. You can't imagine the feeling that everything you've worked your whole life for — your retirement — is dashed," Roy says. "We would drive around and say, 'What are we going to do now?' "

Within six months, they made the painful decision to sell their home, a 2,800-square-foot house on two acres in Damascus, Ore., to buy a much smaller home in Welches. That meant they could put more money away for retirement. They began saving furiously, living on a tight budget, giving up plans to travel or buy expensive presents for their two granddaughters and two grandsons.

Roy realized he could not retire at 60. He wouldn't have enough money. Now, he's trying to work until 67, hoping that by then, he'll have saved at least $200,000, half what he'd expected to have four years ago.

It's tough work. In one two-week stretch, Roy put in more than 130 hours of overtime on top of 80 hours of regular work in his job as a lineman troubleshooter.

"You're out in the cold, up on poles at night in all kinds of weather. I'm hoping physically I can work to 67. But even then, I won't have near the retirement nest egg," he says. "It's a sick feeling. To start over at 55 — it's hard."

Some employees say that they strive not to become bitter or to think about what might have been. Steve Lacey, an emergency repair dispatcher with PGE in Portland, didn't see any reason to worry. The value of his Enron shares ranged from $160,000 to $260,000 before Enron fell apart.

"It was all fake," he says.

Lacey, 49, of Salem, Ore., still works for PGE. The now independent company is expected to become a publicly traded company again in April. He says he still feels the reverberations of the Enron turmoil. But he's trying hard, he says, to put those days behind him.

"I'm not going to say that I feel good about losing that money. You scrounged and saved in those early working days to save that, and that makes me mad. It's made me a pretty bitter American citizen," Lacey says. "But if you dwell on it, it will ruin the rest of your life."

The experience also brought him to Washington. In 2002, Lacey spoke before a congressional hearing on Enron pension and retirement issues and tried to explain what losing savings is like.

"That was the hardest thing I've ever done, was to sit down and explain to my wife that I had lost everything," he said. "And that's probably one of the few times I've ever really emotionally broke down and cried in my whole life. And that was a tough night, and I won't forget it."

But in some cases, former employees — especially younger workers who were far from retirement — have rebounded.

Matt Hommel, 36, lost several thousand dollars and his job at Enron Online in Enron's unraveling, but was recalled after a few days. While still working for the beleaguered company, he took his time picking over job offers. For the past four years, he's worked as a technology consultant at Texas Instruments.

"There was such a media furor over Enron's crash that everyone knew the whole story. People ask, 'What was it like to go through a piece of history like that?' " says Hommel, a married father of two young daughters in League City, Texas. "It's something I actually went through."

Despite a rebound more successful than that of some former employees, the experience changed him. "I'm a little more careful now. If I work at a company, I ask more questions. I want to be sure my trust is appropriately placed," he says. "It shows you that no matter how up the Fortune 500 you are, anything can fall."

Recovering from the Enron crash has been especially hard for those on the cusp of retirement, who had counted on 401(k)s and have little time left in their working years to save again.

In 2001, Tom Padgett, 63, was within six months of retiring and was feeling pretty good about his retirement. The former senior lab technician had 11,000 Enron shares — worth about $700,000 before Enron's bankruptcy — in his 401(k). He and his wife, Karen, had planned to spend their retirement opening and operating a ranch for disabled children.

Then the scandal erupted. Now, he's a lab technician at another company, and expects to work another seven or eight years. The stress of the financial loss has worsened Karen's rheumatoid arthritis, he says.

"I have to continue to work even though I don't want to. And it's harder at my age. I've had to work a lot harder than I used to," says Tom, of Mont Belvieu, Texas. "It's had an emotional impact on me and my wife both. She had always wanted to start a ranch for handicapped kids, to allow parents to have a free week or weekend. … Some days are good, and some are bad. They're bad when we sit and think about what we could have done."

Former Broker Pleads Guilty In Market Timing Probe (AP)

By Michael Gormley, The Associated Press

AP, January 26, 2006

A former Las Vegas securities broker pleaded guilty to a felony charge Wednesday in a mutual fund investigation in which investors were defrauded through improper late trading and market timing, according to New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

Daniel Calugar, 52, now of Ponte Vedra, Fla., pleaded guilty in state Supreme Court in New York City to violating a state business integrity law called the Martin Act. He was accused of entering into a secret agreement in August, 2001, that defrauded a mutual fund called the Franklin Small-Mid Cap Growth Fund.

He faces up to four years in prison when he is sentenced March 23.

His attorney didn't immediately respond to a request for comment.

Earlier this month, Calugar agreed to pay $153 million to settle civil charges brought by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. Calugar will relinquish $103 million in ill-gotten gains and pay a civil penalty of $50 million, the largest penalty regulators have imposed on an individual in a late trading and market timing case, SEC officials said.

Calugar is also banned from working for a brokerage firm.

Spitzer said Calugar secretly agreed to a deal with an employee of Franklin's investment adviser. Calugar would be allowed to rapidly trade in the mutual fund without paying a 2 percent penalty. Calugar then invested $10 million in another hedge fund run by Franklin and defrauded the fund and its shareholders of more than $1 million in fees that he avoided.

Calugar also paid $72 million to settle a class action civil suit that will compensate investors.

Market timing of mutual funds, which involves rapid in-and-out trades, is not illegal but is prohibited by many funds because it can disadvantage ordinary shareholders by diluting the value of their shares. Late trading involves trades placed after the market close at that day's closing price. Many of the cases brought by Spitzer and the SEC in recent years have targeted mutual fund companies that allowed favored clients such as hedge funds to engage in market timing.

In 2004, two Franklin Templeton Investments units agreed to pay $5 million to settle a Massachusetts complaint that accused the firm of allowing a big hedge fund investor to make inappropriate mutual fund trades. The San Mateo, Calif.-based Franklin Templeton said that while it did not admit or deny any wrongdoing, the company settled to move forward. No individuals were charged.

Livedoor Inquiry Prompts Focus On Japan's Accounting Rules (WSJ)

By Yuka Hayashi And Andrew Morse

The Wall Street Journal, January 26, 2006

TOKYO -- The investigation into Internet company Livedoor Co. has pointed a spotlight on another practice in Japan that needs upgrading: accounting standards.

On Monday, Tokyo district prosecutors arrested Livedoor Chief Executive Takafumi Horie on suspicion of violating securities law, raising questions about how the company used complex financial practices to grow through acquisitions and whether it manipulated its financial statements to prop up shares of an affiliate.

Prosecutors also raided the office of Koyo & Co., a small accounting firm in Yokohama that audited Livedoor's financial statements, according to Japanese media reports. A Koyo spokeswoman declined to comment on the investigations.

Separately, Livedoor said yesterday that Mr. Horie resigned as a director, a day after he stepped down as president and chief executive of the company he founded 10 years ago.

Yesterday on the Tokyo Stock Exchange, Livedoor shares fell 22%, or 39 yen (34 U.S. cents), to 137 yen a share, a fifth of what they were worth before Livedoor offices were raided Jan. 16. Trading was limited to 90 minutes on concerns that high volume could overwhelm the exchange's computers.

In the U.S., similar investigations into such companies as Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. resulted in sweeping changes in accounting rules. In Japan, experts now are calling for stepped-up efforts to improve accounting standards, as companies -- particularly smaller start-ups -- increasingly use sophisticated and aggressive financial techniques.

DOJ_NMG_0011897

Japan has no standards on accounting for special-purpose companies -- a tool used by Enron and other U.S. firms in the past to keep certain financial deals off their books. Tokyo prosecutors alleged that Livedoor relied on a similar vehicle to make an acquisition and to print and sell more shares of an affiliate.

Also lacking are rules on how to interpret revenue at Internet and software companies, whose business structures tend to differ significantly from those of traditional companies.

Changes are beginning to take place. In October, the Financial Services Agency issued a guideline calling for closer examination of accounting firms and requiring companies to rotate their accountants more frequently. Meanwhile, the Accounting Standards Board of Japan adopted a handful of standards in the past two months, covering areas from mergers and acquisitions to executive compensation.

Other newly established standards are forcing Japanese companies to be more transparent, investors say. Just a few years ago, publicly traded companies were required to release their earnings only twice a year. Now, they give investors updates on a quarterly basis.

Still, Livedoor raises questions about Japan's accounting practices, including the nature of the relationship between a company and its accounting firm. These include what resources an accounting firm should have to handle a publicly traded company and how dependent it should be on a single client.

Koyo, founded in 1998, has just 12 certified public accountants, according to its Web site. It had no publicly traded companies as clients until April 2000, when it did the books for the initial public offering of Livin' on the Edge, Livedoor's predecessor. A person at Koyo declined to discuss the company's involvement with Livedoor.

As Livedoor acquired more companies, it shifted their accounting services to Koyo, even though those acquisitions had been using bigger, more established accountancies. Now, Koyo works with many Livedoor-group companies, making the Internet conglomerate one of the accountancy's biggest clients.
